jection of all particularism (Mk 2:15–16 and Lk 15:2). These meals, which indicate an option for social and religious tolerance, are set against a background of the much-awaited messianic banquet of the end of times (Mt 8:11–12). They anticipate the banquet of salvation while already embracing those who would be taken into the Kingdom of God to come. We should note that community meals at Qumran were also considered as anticipation of the messianic banquet that would be presided by the Messiah-priest (1Qsa II:17–21 and 4Q 521). Thus it appears that the meals of which Jesus partook are “expressions of the mission and the message of Jesus (Mk 2:17); these are the eschatological banquets, first manifestations of the banquet of Salvation at the end of time (Mk 2:19)” (Jeremias 1971). Table companionship with the outcast displays Jesus’ hope for a reign that invests the entire society of his times, contradicting the structure of Jewish society as partitioned by the religious order founded on the Torah and the temple.

4. Disciples and Adherents

The Gospels clearly stress the group of twelve disciples gathered around their master; the entourage of the historical Jesus, however, was organized in three concentric circles. First, the circle of the Twelve, all Galileans; then, men and women who followed Jesus (Lk 8:1–3 and Mk 15:40–41); and a larger circle of sympathizers, such as Joseph of Arimathea, Nicodemus, and Martha and Mary.

This large range was the opposite of a sect. Unlike the Master of Justice of Qumran, Jesus did not found a cell and did not retire to the desert in order to preserve the purity of his followers. The composition of the group of the Twelve confirms the option of openness; there was a tax collector, a Zealot, and men with Greek and Hebrew names (Mk 3:16–19). All or most came from the “people of the land” marginalized by the law. This anti-elite composition was all the more striking in that the number 12, based on the 12 tribes of Israel, is indicative of a symbolic reconstitution of the people of God (Lk 22:30). The circle of the Twelve prefigures the Israel of the Kingdom, the family of God. The God of Jesus does not select or classify when he reassembles in his reign; he welcomes all those who recognize themselves as seeking forgiveness (Mk 2:17).

Jesus’ strategy of integration was the opposite of that practiced by the Pharisees, John the Baptist, and the messianic prophets who sought by exclusion to constitute a pure Israel. Jesus did not found the Nazarene sect, or a remnant of Israel, nor a separate synagogue that would become the Church. His ambition was to reform the faith of Israel by breaking up the internal fundamentalist strains that nourished the hope of the Kingdom. The Twelve symbolized and at the same time realized a salvation that excluded no one. This prepared a theology of a universal God, the God of each and every one, which would later be spread by the first Christians (Acts 10:34–35 and Rom 1:16).

5. Recomposition of the Torah

Within the extraordinary diversity of first-century Judaism the Torah represents the seat of identity par excellence. Thus, it is not surprising that representatives of Jewish factions who wished to evaluate Jesus questioned him on his interpretation of the law.

The Gospels point out Jesus’ infractions against the Law of the Sabbath, based on the axiom: “The Sabbath was made for man, not man for the Sabbath” (Mk 2:27). This position, which corresponds to the most liberal currents of Judaism, did not invalidate the principle of Sabbath rules. The novelty of Jesus is that, unlike the rabbis, he placed the preservation of life as an absolute instead of regulating the particular cases for exemption. The individual is free to manage this as he sees fit, but the rule must bend before this absolute.

The posture adopted with respect to the Sabbath exemplifies the position of Jesus with regard to the law. Jesus placed himself within the practice of the Torah, which he ratified like any other observant Jew. But his assent to the divine imperative went with a recomposition of the law around the call to love. The will of God is entirely recapitulated in the double call to love God and love one’s fellow man (Mk 12:28–34). Jesus was not the first to opt for the priority of the ethical law over the ritual law; Hellenistic Judaism had already done this. The focus on love, and notably placing love of one’s neighbor over love of God, was not foreign to the great liberal rabbi Hillel, who lived one generation before Jesus. But these rapprochements, though they confirm the integration of Jesus in the debate of Judaism on the Torah, should not obscure the originality of his interpretation of the law, which can be particularly grasped in his new reading of the Decalogue (Mt 5:21–48).

First, the decision to give predominance to love was portentous because it placed in the heart of the Torah an instance that must govern its reading and can authorize the validation or invalidation of such any given rule. Thus, the prohibition against murder must be broadened to wrath (Mt 5:21–22), whereas the Talion Law is abrogated (Mt 5:38–42). This means that the law is no longer to be respected because it is the law; it should be followed because it serves love, and only when it serves love.

Second, when Jesus recomposed the Torah around the imperative of love, he ignored the rabbinical rule that requires exegesis* to be based on the tradition of the elders. Jesus opposed to the elders an “I” that was at the same time sovereign, impertinent, and liberating (see Marguerat 1991). The “but I say to you” of the antitheses (Mt 5:21–48) indicates that Jesus takes his authority from God without deriving it from Moses. The thrust of God’s unconditional love is so strong that it leads him to collide with the dogma* that Judaism holds most dear—the infallibility of the law. Jesus declared that only obedience guided by love could claim to be infallible. But what was the image of God that authorized him to overturn the law?

6. The God of Jesus

Side by side with the reference to the God of the Kingdom who will give welcome to the eschatological banquet, along with the reference to the God-judge who will reward each according to his works, the ethical discourse of Jesus was open to tonalities close to the literature of the wise men of Israel.

Jesus’ call to take no heed for the morrow is based on the example of the birds in the sky and the lilies of the fields, whose needs are magnificently satisfied by God (Mt 6, 25–34). The exhortation to the disciples to testify without fear refers back to the God-providence* who watches over every single creature (Mt 10:29–31). The moral exhortation is governed here by a theology of the Creation* that does modify the eschatological register.

The same holds true when Jesus calls on the experience of God: “Love your enemies, and pray for those who persecute you, so that you may be sons of your Father who is in heaven; for he makes his sun rise on the evil and on the good, and sends rain on the just and on the unjust” (Mt 5:44–45). Several parables work on this precedence of God’s gracious offer over the response of the believer—the invitation to the banquet (Mt 22:1–10 and Lk 14:16–24), the Unmerciful Servant (Mt 18:23–35), the fig tree (Lk 13, 6–9), the treasure in the field and the pearl (Mt 13:44–46). These parables confirm the preponderant place occupied by the precedence of God’s bounty over the call to act. The God of Jesus is a God of unconditional love. On this conviction he establishes his practice of welcome (partaking of meals with reprobates) as well as the invitation to call God by the familiar name abba, that is, “daddy” (Mk 14:36), and the call to unbounded love for others (Mt 5:43–48).

Here we confront a sapiential dimension of Jesus’ preaching that led some scholars to ask if he is not closer to the wise men than the messianic prophets (see Chilton-Evans 1994). However, the factor that clearly distinguishes Jesus from the wise men is the absence, in his thought, of reflection on the possibility of acting according to the required obedience. The ethic of the Sermon on the Mount, with its immoderate demands (to love one’s enemies, not to have concern for the morrow), contradicts the concern of sages and rabbis to limit obedience, keeping it within the measure of the reasonable. Jesus did not follow this policy of the acceptable. The conscience of God that inhabited him was so imperious that the shadow of the reign totally invaded the present. Excess and absolutism were the only fitting tones (Marguerat 1997).

V. The Crisis

According to the scenario retained by the synoptic Gospels, the conflict between Jesus and the religious leaders of Jerusalem culminated during Jesus’ visit to the holy city at the end of his life.

1. The Attack against the Temple

We do not know what led the historical Jesus to leave Galilee, where he had been practicing his activity and recruiting disciples, and go to Jerusalem for the Passover* pilgrimage in the year 30. Up until then he had been a local prophet. Did he now want to give national scope to his message? Did his disciples push him? Was the spectacular Cleansing of the Temple his sole objective?

As it happens, his entry into the holy city fired a latent, explosive messianic effervescence (Mk 11:1–10). The celebration of a Last Supper with his companions does denote that Jesus was aware of the gravity of the conflict engaged with the priestly authorities. Even if we do not project into this event the salvational dimension of his death, as would the first Christians, the way that Jesus integrated the eventuality of his death as a manifestation of his theological conviction can be noted. (Schürmann, 1975, speaks of “pro-existence.”)

Basically what the sources report on his life in Jerusalem is the cleansing of the temple (Mk 11:15–17). This act is, of course, related to the prophetic protest against the moral perversion of cultural rites (Jer 7:11). Moreover, its destructive symbolism fits into the messianic perspective of the disappearance of the old temple in favor of the new temple that would mark the era of salvation (see Sanders 1985). The first Christians interpreted this act as an abolition of the institution of the temple in favor of mediation with God within the framework of the community, the body of Christ* (1 Cor 3:16–17 and 6:19, Mk 14:58, Acts 6:14, and Jn 2:19–22). Might this interpretation be postulated on the commentary Jesus made on this act in the circle of his followers? Whatever the case may be, the sympathy of the crowd that Jesus had acquired was lost by the attack against the temple. The crowd turned against the prophet from Nazareth, facilitating the manipulation by the religious authorities that resulted in the withdrawal of all popular support from Jesus.

2. The Crucifixion

Jesus was sentenced to death by crucifixion for the crime of high treason against the state, in application of the Lex Juliae majestatis. It is common knowledge that the procurators, and especially Pontius Pilate, made extensive use of this jurisdiction. But the denunciation, according to all evidence, was Jewish. The Sanhedrin, dominated by the Sadduceen aristocracy, gave Pilate the motive for capital punishment.

Execution on the cross was a long, drawn-out torture, a slow process of tantalization that ended in death by asphyxiation. The agony of the Nazarene was abnormally brief, indicating a weak constitution, which surprised Pilate (Mk 15:44). Jesus died in the afternoon on the eve of Passover (Mk 15:34). Already the lambs were slaughtered at the temple and families were preparing to partake of the Passover supper. Joseph of Arimathea, a follower, got permission to bury Jesus in a sepulcher instead of letting his corpse be thrown to the dogs.

3. Why Was Jesus Condemned?

The crime of messianic insurrection sufficed to set in motion the repressive apparatus of Pontius Pilate, who was described by King Agrippa I in the year 40 as a merciless, cruel governor (see Lk 13:1). But what was the real motive for the physical elimination of the Galilean?

The scene of the trial before the Sanhedrin is a Christian recomposition (Mk 14:53–65). Judaism did not generally denounce men to the Romans for messianic pretension. However, the attack against the temple was infinitely serious, considering the symbolic role of the temple in the national conscience. Josephus reports the case of Jesus ben Ananias, an oracular prophet who, four years before the Jewish War, went around Jerusalem announcing the destruction of the city and its temple. The priestly aristocracy handed him over to the Romans, who took him for a madman and released him (The War of the Jews Book 6, 5:3). This parallel accredits the idea that Jesus was rejected for false prophecy (prophet* and prophecy) (messianic) and sacrilege against the holy place.

J. Klausner, a Jewish scholar, explains that Judaism had to get rid of Jesus because he was an extremist whose radical, extravagant interpretation of the Torah and critique of religious practices imperiled national cohesion. By his outrages, Jesus gave the “kiss of death” to Judaism (Klausner 1933). We will also note that Klausner includes liberties taken by Jesus in interpreting the law among the causes for this incrimination. It is likely that this was an additional motive, though it was not reason enough for accusing Jesus. The absence of any mention of participation of Pharisees during the proceedings might well indicate that the sympathy awakened by Jesus in their ranks was not extinguished and, further, that the dispute was not primarily centered on the Torah. Several years later, Stephen was accused of crime against the temple and the law and stoned to death in Jerusalem (Acts 6:8–7:60).

VI. Jesus the Messiah

What awareness did the historical Jesus have of himself, his role, and his mission? Documentary sources situate us before a paradox: On the one hand, Jesus kept silent about his identity; on the other hand a clear claim to authority transpired in his preaching on the reign.

1. Jesus and the Son of Man

Almost all the declarations Jesus made about his identity (see the Johannine pronouncements beginning “I am”) emanated from the Christian community. The synoptics respected the Nazarene’s discretion about his identity. None of the titles such as Son of God, Son of David, Messiah, Christ (except in Mark 12:35–37) is pronounced by him. However “Son of man” often comes up in his statements.

Since the parables of Enoch (1 Enoch 37–71) the expression Son of man had designated a celestial figure connected to the eschatological judgment. On several occasions Jesus associated his person with the Son of man (Mk 2:10, Mt 19:28, and Lk 7:34, 9:58, 12:8–10, and 17:26–30,). However, the Aramaic expression he used, bar nasha, can also be understood as the common equivalent of “I.” Jesus drew on the title Son of man to claim the power to forgive sins (Mk 2:10), consequently rendering obsolete the mediation of the sacrificial cult. He ruled that the attitude adopted toward him would be sanctioned in the Kingdom by the Son of man (Lk 12:8–10). He contrasted the dignity of the Son of man with the fragility of his own nomadic existence (Lk 9:58).

Exegetes are divided on this point; some deny all authenticity to the sayings on the Son of man, others think that Jesus did declare himself to be the Son of man. But it is observed that: 1) Jesus never identified himself explicitly with the Son of man; and 2) the profusion of sayings on the Son of man prohibit a priori their attribution to the primitive Church. To sum up, the historical Jesus understood himself to be the person who by his words and deeds introduces the reign of God into history. He saw himself as the one who initiated the ending, but without confusing himself with the principal agent of that end. Nevertheless, he was convinced that the position adopted with respect to him would be a decisive criterion at the time of judgment by the Son of man (Lk 12:8–10; see also the Gospel of Thomas 82).

2. Implicit Christology

Did Jesus call himself the Messiah (messianism*/Messiah)? Except for the Christian recomposition in Mark 14:62, the Gospels attribute a deferred reply when the question is put to him (Mt 11:2–5). This vagueness about his identity is the signature of a man who effaces himself behind the event he brings to fruition. The Galilean does not say he is the Messiah but the “finger of God” (Lk 11:20). Jesus was certainly aware that he surpassed the prophets. He categorically affirmed that here there was more than Jonas and more than Solomon (Lk 11:31–32), but it is clear that this statement avoids any clear fixation of identity. The announcement of the coming of the reign predominates over any form of messianic pretension. Jesus’ preaching was millenarian; it was not the harangue of a pretender to the title. This subtle game can be labeled “implicit Christology [Christ* and Christology].”

The refusal to assume any messianic title could well express a withdrawal from the underlying nationalistic ideology associated with all the Jewish messianisms, whether prophetic, royal, or priestly. But in upsetting the game of messianic aspirations, in claiming the prerogatives of the Son of man without confusing himself with him (Mk 2:10), in referring back to messianic signs without declaring himself (Mt 11:2–5), Jesus announced and prepared for the surpassing of the messianic categories on which the faith of the first Christians worked (see Grappe in Marguerat 1997).

Nonetheless, the Romans condemned Jesus as a messianic pretender (Mk 15:18 and 26 and Jn 19:19). This confirms to what extent the words and deeds of Jesus, despite his reserve, offered a hold to popular messianic aspirations (Mk 6:30–44, 8:27–30, and 11:1–10).

3. Easter: Blossoming of the Faith

The events of Easter are inscribed in history as a strong spiritual experience for the companions of Jesus. Even if the outlines of this revelation remain historically out of reach (irreconcilable divergence among the Evangelists), its effects in history are obvious. The disciples in flight reassembled, their fear turned into courage, and the death of Jesus was no longer considered as a failure but as the solidarity of God with the impotence of the reprobate. The memory of the Master’s words begins.

Overwhelmed witnesses, the disciples, bring a decisive testimony—the identity of the Crucified/Resuscitated is not to be detached from that of the Galilean.

Easter would function as focal point of new reading or rather new readings of the history of Jesus. The question of the identity of the Galilean became primordial as the spread of Christologies made explicit that which the Master had deliberately left in suspense. The varying Christologies should be understood as so many attempts to respond to the mystery of the one who had always been a question for those who encountered him. The first formulations of faith in Jesus found their cultural matrix in the Jewish apocalyptic tradition, reservoir of messianic hopes.

VII. The Jesus of History and Theology

By preserving and canonizing four Gospels, which are four new Pascal readings of the history of the earthly Jesus, the primitive Church sanctioned a theological choice. The identity of Christ cannot be grasped outside of a narrative reconstruction of the Galilean’s life. All Christological discourse, then, finds its standard and limit in the exposition of the words and deeds of Jesus of Nazareth. Forever after, the scripture of the Gospels refers the knowledge of the Lord that the Christians confess to the field of a past history. Whoever claims to approach the Christ of faith must verify his knowledge by attachment, by the narrative mediation, to the words and deeds of the Jesus of history.

This choice is theological. By posing the irreducibility of the history of the Galilean as criterion of all christological words, the gospel assigns to theology a responsibility of conformity with the Incarnation*. A theology attached to the vicissitudes of the life of the Galilean, his encounters and conflicts, his wrath and his compassion, will not be inclined to turn into an escapist spirituality. In the Christian regime, reference to the earthly Jesus constitutes the site of obligatory verification of all words on salvation.

It has already been said that the memory of the earthly Jesus that structures the theology of Paul, Mark, and John is not to be confused with the reconstruction of the historical Jesus undertaken in modern research. The first Christian theologians assuredly did not subscribe to the canons of historical exactitude, though in his way Luke was not a stranger to the concerns of a historian. Yet the Evangelists and the scholars who search for the historical Jesus participate in the same movement back to the Jesus of history. In canonizing the four Gospels, the primitive Church ratified both the plurality of access to the worldly Jesus and the impossibility of claiming a unique reading of the Galilean’s life. The quest for the historical Jesus confirms this verdict by its very incompleteness because, like all historical undertakings, it remains constantly open to new reconstructions. But this incompleteness in research makes sense theologically, for the outstanding uncertainty about the biography of the Galilean impedes closure of the dogmatic debate on Christ.

- H. S. Reimarus (1778), Von dem Zwecke Jesu und seiner Jünger, Ed. G. E. Lessing, Braunschweig.
- E. Renan (1863), Vie de Jésus, Paris.
- A. Loisy (1902), L'Évangile et l'Église, Paris.
- A. Schweitzer (1906), Von Reimarus zu Wrede: Eine Geschichte der Leben-Jesu-Forschung, Tübingen.
- O. Cullmann (1925), "Les récentes études sur la formation de la tradition évangélique," RHPhR 5, 459–77, 582–94.
- R. Bultmann (1926), Jesus, Berlin.
- J. Klausner (1933), Jésus de Nazareth: Son temps—sa vie—sa doctrine (original in Hebrew), Paris.
- E. Käsemann (1954), "Das Problem des historischen Jesus," ZThK 51, 125–53.
- G. Bornkamm (1956), Jesus von Nazareth, Stuttgart.
- H. Conzelmann (1959), "Jesus Christus," RGK 3 3, 619–53.
- E. Fuchs (1960), Gesammelte Aufsätze, II: Zur Frage nach dem historischen Jesus, Tübingen.
- J. M. Robinson (1960), Kerygma und historischer Jesus, Zurich.
- X. Léon-Dufour (1963), Les Évangiles et l'histoire de Jésus, Paris.
- D. Flusser (1968), Jesus, Reinbek.
- J. Jeremias (1971), Neutestamentliche Theologie, I: Die Verkündigung Jesu, Gütersloh.
- E. Trocmé (1971), Jésus de Nazareth vu par les témoins de sa vie, Neuchâtel.
- J. Becker (1972), Johannes der Täufer und Jesus von Nazareth, BSt 63; id. (1996), Jesus von Nazareth, Berlin-New York.
- K. Schubert (1973), Jesus im Lichte der Religionsgeschichte des Judentums, Vienna.
- G. Vermès (1973), Jesus the Jew, Glasgow.

- J. Dupont (1975) (Ed.), Jésus aux origines de la christologie, BETHL 40.
- H. Schürmann (1975), Jesus ureigener Tod, Leipzig.
- P. Grelot (1978), L'espérance juive à l'heure de Jésus, Paris.
- Ch. Perrot (1979), Jésus et l'histoire, Paris.
- R. A. Horsley (1985), Bandits, Prophets and Messiahs: Popular Movements at the Time of Jesus, San Francisco.
- W. G. Kümmel (1985), Dreissig Jahre Jesusforschung (1950–1980), BBB 60.
- E. Sanders (1985), Jesus and Judaism, London.
- G. Theissen (1986), Der Schatten des Galiläers, Munich.
- J. Schlosser (1987), Le Dieu de Jésus, LeDiv 129.
- C. A. Evans (1989), Life of Jesus Research: An Annotated Bibliography, NTTS 13.
- D. Marguerat (1990), L'homme qui venait de Nazareth: Ce qu'on peut aujourd'hui savoir de Jésus, Aubonne; id. (1991), "Jésus et la Loi dans la mémoire des premiers chrétiens," in La mémoire et le temps: Mélanges P. Bonnard, Geneva, 55–74; id. (1997) (Ed.), Jésus de Nazareth: Nouvelles approches d'une énigme, Genève.
- J. D. Crossan (1991), The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant, San Francisco.
- J. P. Meier (1991 and 1994), A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, 2 vols., New York.
- B. Chilton, C. A. Evans (1994) (sous la dir. de), Studying the Historical Jesus: Evaluation of the State of Current Research, NTTS 19.
- Ch. Perrot (1998), Jésus, Paris.

DANIEL MARGUERAT

See also Apocalyptic Literature; Apostle; Bultmann, Rudolf; Christ and Christology; Conscience; Gospels; History; Kingdom of God; Law and Christianity; Mary; Messianism/Messiah; Miracle; Mysticism; Narrative; Parable; Passion; Resurrection of Christ; Son of Man; Temple; Theology

Joachim of Fiore

1135–1202

The work of the Calabrian abbot Joachim of Fiore (1135–1202) represents the first attempt at apocalyptic* millenarianism during the Middle Ages. It was, however, an orthodox millenarianism, compared with the literal chiliasm refuted by Augustine*. Joachim was a monastic reformer who in 1187 abandoned the Cistercians to found a new order in Fiore. Like Bernard of Clairvaux, he disputed Scholastic (Scholasticism*) Trinitarian theology* and accused Pierre Lombard of quaternitas—that is, of introducing too clear a disjunction between substance and Person* (Psalt, 229 r-v, e 277, De vita s. Benedicti, 76–77, Liber Figurarum, ms. Dresden, f. 89r).

Joachim could conceive of neither a unity separate from Persons and anterior to them nor of Persons cut off from substance. And in order to preserve the prerogatives of a God who was "triune but not composed," a but which was not singular (De articulus fidei 8), he went from the “trinum” to the “unum.” The fundamental question, therefore, was how can three Persons be one? The answer was based upon the notion of inesse (to exist within). Each of the three Persons exists within the two others; the dynamism of the reciprocal relations constitutes the substance of divine life. Considering intra-Trinitary relations, Joachim mentioned two diffinitiones of the Trinity. The first was symbolized by the triangular letter alpha (missio): the Father* was at the summit, and he sent the Son and the Spirit. The second was symbolized by the lowercase letter omega (processio), of which the virgula in the center represented the Spirit (Holy* Spirit) that emerged from the Father and the Son. And these two figures referred back to two different representations of history, according to a ternary model (three states, three orders) and a binary model (two Persons [person*], two testaments).

Joachim was convinced that the two models were not mutually exclusive, and he endeavored, therefore, to integrate them reciprocally. As a result, his name and his doctrinal legacy remain tied to this ternary, which represents the most innovative aspect of his doctrine. Joachim believed that all through history, therefore, there came three stages, in succession and partially superimposed—that of the Father (the time before the law and under the law, ordo conjugalis), the Son (the time of grace*, ordo clericalis), and of the Holy Spirit (the time of an even greater grace, ordo spiritualis). The third state, which had been gestating since the time of Benedict, marked a significant progress in comparison with the two preceding ones. It was indeed through the Holy Spirit that the full manifestation of the Spirit would allow “spiritual men” to decipher in its entirety the divine mystery still sealed in the letter of the Old and New Testament. The third state was, therefore, an era where history would grow younger. The meek and humble would be its protagonists, and during this time the promise of the Magnificat would be fulfilled, and the mystery of the divine election (choice*) of the youngest—Jacob—instead of the eldest—Esau—would be fully revealed (see Dial. de praesc. I). Issues such as the future existence of an ecclesiastical hierarchy, of the permanence of the sacraments (sacrament*), and of the role and the aims of the monastic elite remained open for historiography to debate.

In Joachimism, the principle of concord, fundamental for a precise understanding of history, was no longer applied simply to the relations between Old and New Testaments, as in the earlier exegetic tradition. The Joachite concord was more complex and allowed one to establish a perfect, or almost perfect, rule of correspondence among various generations situated at the same level in the historical development of the three orders and the two nations. Even for the concord there were, therefore, two models (Joachim speaks of the duplex assignatio concordiae) and a double calculation, with a gap of 10 generations between one and the other (Conc. II, 44).

While Trinitary theology had led him to the vision of the second state, the exegesis of the Book of Revelation would lead Joachim to draw the same conclusions (Exp. in Ap., 1184–200). The dominant method of interpretation at that time was to proceed “vision by vision,” a method perfected by Bede and shared, among others, by Richard of Saint Victor. In this perspective, the text was divided into seven visions, viewed in turn as so many autonomous thematic blocks. Each vision contains a complete knowledge of the history of the Church (divided in turn into seven states). After one vision mysteriously described the entire history of the Church, that which followed started again at the beginning, recapitulating the entire story from another angle.

Joachim shared this disposition of the visions, while affirming, however, that there were eight of them and not seven; but he endeavored first of all to read Revelation as a text tracing the entire course of the history of the Church, progressively, vision upon vision, from the origins until the final expected outcome. And from this perspective, he perceived Revelation 20 as the announcement of a future era that would be fully intramundane, in which he recognized the features of a third state. Joachim agreed with Augustine, therefore, on the criticism of literal millenarianism, but, unlike Augustine, he remained convinced (non tam opinio, quam serenissimus intellectus, Exp. 211r) that a sabbatical period, a brief interlude of peace and freedom within history, would occur between the coming of the Antichrist and the final attack of Gog and Magog. Joachim’s millenarianism resided in just such a concept.

The Fourth Council of Lateran* (1215) condemned Joachim’s Trinitary theology (DS 803–7) without attacking his person or his historico-eschatological vision. That vision would be disseminated over the coming decades, thanks not so much to the monachism* of Fiore as to certain Franciscans, who saw a prefiguration of their experience in the prediction of an order of “spiritual men.” The first pseudo-Joachite writings appeared in the atmosphere of prophetism that arose both around and against the figure of Frederick II. The most famous of these, the commentary Super Hieremiam, was transmitted in at least two different versions, the first of which seems to have originated in the circles of the order of Fiore, while the second (about 1243) was the fruit of a new elaboration by Franciscan circles.

The spread of Joachim's ideas encountered difficulties from the middle of the 13th century on. Convinced that the work of the Calabrian abbot constituted "the eternal Gospel" that he himself advocated, the Franciscan Gerard de Borgo San Donnino provoked a reaction among the secular masters in Paris, bringing about his own condemnation and the censure of excerpts from Joachim's work by a cardinalial commission (Protocols of Anagni, 1255). Also criticized in more assertive theological contexts (Thomas Aquinas, ST Ia IIae, q. 106, a 4 ad 2: against the idea of a third state of the Spirit), Joachite theses nevertheless did endure, with changes, in the minority circles of the spiritual Franciscans. In his Lectura super Apocalipsim (1297–98), Peter Olivi advanced the doctrine of the three comings of Christ: between the first coming, in the flesh, and the last, in the glory of the last judgment, Olivi posited an intermediary coming, through the Spirit, to work an evangelical reform of the Church. And this second coming had already taken place through St. Francis of Assisi at the beginning of the third age of the world. The schema of the three comings imposed a thorough revision of the Joachite point of view, since it sought to place the period of the Spirit within a Christocentric sphere and give it a historical significance of a Franciscan nature. But as far as the millennium itself was concerned, Olivi took a decisive step in the direction of a literal millenarianism, for he seemed convinced that the third age was destined to last for 70 years. In his wake, in 1349, the Franciscan Jean de Roquetaille dared to maintain that the duration of the world between the death of the great Antichrist and the last judgment would be exactly 1,000 years by the solar calendar.

In the 14th and 15th centuries the wave of Joachite prophetism expanded remarkably, all the more so in that with the flow of authentic works was mixed an even greater influx of works of dubious origin (attributed progressively to the Calabrian abbot in order to invest them with authority). Prophetic literature of a Joachite mold, in claiming to foresee and to calculate, represented either an instrument for political and ecclesiastical propaganda or a motive for erudite accumulation—and sometimes both at once—which accompanied the ever-increasing occurrences of visions, vaticinations, sibylline oracles, and cabalistic calculations. The deepest layer of Joachite apocalypse, in turn, fueled the representations and expectations of popular religious movements, thus working to radicalize its revolutionary social impetus. At the threshold of the modern era, the frail profile of the third reign was finally projected into a situation that differed significantly from the one originally envisaged by the Calabrian abbot.

- Expositio super Apocalypsim, Venice, 1527, 1–224 (reissued in Frankfurt, 1964); Psalterium decem chordarum, Venice, 1527, 226–81; Concordia Novi ac Veteris Testamenti, Venice, 1519 (reissued Frankfurt, 1964); TAPhS 73, 8th part (1983) (critical edition of books I–IV); Dialogi de praescientia Dei et de predestinatione electorum, Rome, 1995.

GIAN-LUCA POTESTA

See also Apocalyptic Literature; Church; Exegesis; History; Kingdom of God; Spirituality, Franciscan

Johannine Theology

More than any other text of the New Testament, the Gospel (Gospels*) of John is the product of a long and complex composition spread over several generations, with two major stages: 1) in Palestine before 70; 2) in the pagan world, once the break between the synagogue and the Johannine community had been completed. It is therefore not surprising to encounter in the fourth gospel distinct and even contradictory points of view. However, its completed version as a single book makes it possible to speak of a unified Johannine theology, even if the many internal tensions between the views expressed cannot be ignored. In addition, in order to account for the particularity of the fourth gospel in relation to the synoptics, various sources have been mentioned: Gnostic (R. Bultmann*) or hermetic (C.H. Dodd) movements, Samaritan religion, heterodox Jewish movements like the Qumran sect. Nevertheless, the fact that it belongs to the genre (literary* genres in Scripture) "gospel" is not in any doubt: the first conclusion (Jn 20:30f.) is explicit about the purpose of the book. Finally, the fourth gospel belongs to a corpus that includes the three epistles of John and Revelation. There is near unanimity in treating Revelation separately, in view of its important stylistic and theological differences from the fourth gospel. On the other hand, the three epistles seem to be indissociable from the gospel; for example, for R. Brown, the first constitutes a rereading of Johannine theology in reaction against certain deviations that had appeared in the community in the late first or very early second century.

1. The Son Sent by the Father

As the conclusion of John 20:30f. asserts, the purpose of the fourth gospel is to inspire faith in “Jesus Christ the Son of God*.” The central axis is radically christological, but the intention to illustrate the mystery of the Son inevitably raises the question of his relation to the Father.

a) Reinterpretation of Messianic Titles. In the final stage of composition, the titles “Christ” and “Son of God,” applied to Jesus (20:31), whose actions are reported by the book (20:30), take on a fullness of meaning that is favorable for later theological developments. But the fourth gospel nonetheless sets out the Old Testament roots of these designations. The first scene of the gospel (1:19–51), devoted to the witness of John the Baptist (v. 19), is set against the background of a many-sided messianic hope, associating with the royal Davidic Messiah* (vv. 20, 25), translated by “Christ” (v. 41), the figures of Elijah restored to life and the Mosaic prophet* (vv. 21, 25), following the lines of Deuteronomy 18:15. In fact the protagonists of the narrative recite a series of titles, all of which may refer back to messianic expectation, something that was intense in Baptist circles: for example, the Lamb of God (Jn 1:29, 36); the Son of God (vv. 34, 49) (variant “God’s chosen one”: v. 34), the king of Israel (v. 49). Added to this are characteristic traits such as the presence of the Holy Spirit (vv. 32f.), the unknown character (vv. 31, 33) fitting for the Messiah (see Justin, Dialogue with Trypho 8. 4; 49. 1; 110. 1); the recapitulation of the Scriptures (Scripture*) (v. 45); and, in light of the Messiah’s link to Bethlehem (7: 40ff., 52), Nathanael’s surprise about Nazareth (v. 46). In this sense, Johannine Christology does not derive from belated speculations but originates in the earliest Christian memory, applying to Jesus of Nazareth all the titles and characteristics supposed to characterize the divine envoy who is the inaugurator of the salvific age.

b) Exposition of “High” Categories. Rooted in apostolic preaching, Johannine Christology emphasizes the heavenly character of the divine envoy. More than a providential man, for whom the traditional titles might be fitting, the figure of the Son of man, which is of apocalyptic origin (Dn 7:13), forms the basis for understanding the initial pericope (Jn 1:19–51). Assimilated to Jacob’s ladder (1:51), Christ occupies a mediating position between God and humanity, and the future (“you shall see”: vv. 50f.) invites the reader to interpret the gospel narrative as a whole as illustrating the quasi-divine condition of the one whom the Baptist and the first disciples recognized as the Christ-Messiah. In these circumstances the ancient titles take on added meaning. This is particularly the case for filiation, intended to express not only divine election but the community of destiny with God. Similarly, in what follows in the gospel, various debates illustrate the equality of Jesus with God, for example in reference to the Sabbath rest, which is judged to contradict the permanence of divine activity (5:17–21). And again, urged to locate himself in relation to Abraham (8:53), Jesus asserts his absolute antecedence (8:56) and places his existence under the sign of an eternal present that assimilates him to God himself: “Before Abraham was, I am” (8:58). In the eyes of the Jews, such a claim to divinity is blasphemous (10:33). Although Jesus does escape from stoning at that point (10:31), the close link between the resurrection of Lazarus and the final plot reveals, beyond strictly political arguments (11:48f.), the Jewish rejection of a “high” Christology. This Christology comes after the experience of Easter, but the fourth gospel proposes an explicit formulation of it even before the event of the cross.

c) The Impact of the Prologue. The prologue (Jn 1:1–18) opens the gospel narrative by attaching it to categories of thought familiar to the reader (theology* of the Word*) and also to the liturgical experience of the community (the hypothesis of an original hymn reworked by the writer of the prologue). It also determines the conditions for interpreting the text, as well as its grammar. The heart of the prologue consists of the identification between the historical Jesus, the subject of the Baptist’s witness (vv. 6ff.) and founder of a community of believers (vv. 12f.), and the divine Word that preexists creation (vv. 1f.) and that is both distinct from God (v. 1b) and identified with him (v. 1c). The source of life and principle of creation (vv. 3ff.), the Word is addressed to humanity as a whole (the “world,” v. 9). Responses are diverse (vv. 10ff.), but the universality of his mission is nonetheless strongly asserted. In these circumstances, the concrete being of Jesus (the “flesh,” v. 14) is an instance of particularization on the basis of the broadest universal, existing before the universe and encompassing history.

Whatever the origin of the prologue and the time at which it was set at the beginning of the gospel, its proleptic function invites us to read the succeeding narrative as a whole not only in the binary thematic context of the two covenants (covenant*) (v. 17) but as the decisive manifestation of God, through the mediation of his only Son, himself God in a relation of perfect proximity to the Father (v. 18). This perspective authorizes a consideration of christological statements at the deepest level of their meaning.

d) The Relation to the Father. The divine origin of Jesus is his true legitimation (see the image of the royal “seal,” the basis for the authority* of a duly appointed minister: 6:27). The Son of man descended from heaven (3:12), Jesus presents himself as the only Son of God (the “monogenic”: 1:18, 3:16 and 18); He defines his mission as that of an envoy (3:31f.) from the Father (6:46) entrusted with speaking the words that have been entrusted to him (3:34, 12:49f.) and as one armed with full authority (3:35). This is why the attitude adopted toward him adequately expresses the acceptance or rejection of God (3:33, 36). The participation of human beings in the work of God is nothing other than the faith in Jesus as an envoy of God (6:30, 12:44, 13:20). The attachment of Jesus to the divine plan is such that even adherence to his person comes from the initiative of the Father (6:37, 38, 44). Between the Father and the Son there exists a perfect communion of wills (6:37–40), on the ground of a love that, although reciprocal, nevertheless proceeds first from the Father (3:35), for whom the gospel recognizes a perfect priority of initiative.

Hence, whereas the existence and the mission of Jesus derive from the Father, his Passion and death are themselves a return to the Father (13:1, 16:28). Anguish and suffering seem to be overshadowed by the certainty of accomplishing a mission in full conformity with the will of the Father and carried to its conclusion in perfect order (the motif of the “hour”: 12:23, 13:1, 17:1). The intimate union of Father and Son then reaches its perfection and, although the superiority of the Father is not denied (14:28), shared love turns out to be fully reciprocal: the mutual indwelling of Father and Son (14:10f.) establishes Jesus’ claim to accomplish the work of the Father, in complete fidelity to the mission he has been given (14:31).

2. The Son Revealing the Father

a) The Motif of Glory. Already in the prologue, the intimate relation that characterizes Jesus as Son (1:14) is a matter for communication to believers, themselves born of a divine will (v. 13) to the point of sharing the condition of children of God (v. 12). This manifestation of Jesus as Son, which makes up the body of the gospel (v. 18), is called “glory” (twice in v. 14), a term which has to be given its full relational value. Present from the opening sign of Cana (2:11), the motif of glory comes to the fore principally at the time of the Passion, constituting a veritable leitmotif throughout the speeches before the cross (ch. 14–17) (noun doxa: 17:5, 22, 24; verb “to glorify” [doxazein]: 14:13, 15:8, 16:14, and 17:1, 4f., and 10). It is the Father’s initiative that remains predominant: he alone has the power to manifest his Son in Jesus, thereby revealing his own paternity, through the nonviolence of the crucified one (8:54, 12:28, 13:31f., 16:14, 17:1–5 and 10). However, Jesus is not simply passive: his own obedience, freely given, represents in itself a manifestation of the Father and contributes to the revelation of Jesus as Son (13:31f., 14:13, 15:8, 17:6ff.). In short, from the perspective of the fourth gospel, glory is not a static attribute of God but resides in the reciprocal revelation of the Father and the Son (17:1–5), from the first days of public life (in Cana: 2:11) up to the fulfillment of the cross.

Above all, the disciples are fully associated with this manifestation of glory, not only as spectators (1:14, 17:24) but insofar as they themselves contribute to this revelation, by means of a mission (15:15ff.) that qualifies them as witnesses in the heart of the world (17:18). Centered on the motif of community unity (17:21f.), the “priestly” prayer of chapter 17 assigns to the disciples the task (14:21f.) of pursuing the revelation of the Father and the Son in their mutual relation (17:10f., 23, 26).

b) The Mention of the Paraclete. Witnesses to and actors in the mutual revelation of Father and Son, believers benefit from the support of the Holy Spirit, called “Paraclete” (14:16 and 26, 15:26, 16:7), a social term designating an advocate “called to” (verb parakalein) an accused to assist him in his defense. Identified with the Spirit of truth* (14:7, 15:26, 16:13), the Paraclete is presented as a personal being, the subject of a certain number of actions having principally to do with the realm of knowledge: teaching, remembering, testifying (14:26, 15:26), or speaking, proclaiming, glorifying (16:13f.), always with reference to the Son and on the basis of the Son’s teaching.

The mission of the Paraclete is in some sense to make up for the absence of Christ (14:16). Its arrival among human beings is dependent on the departure of Jesus (7:39, 16:7). A substitute for the Son, the Paraclete comes from the Father (15:26); we can say that it is sent or given by the Father (14:16, 26), but it is sent by the prayer of the Son (14:16) or in his name (14:26), when not simply by the Son himself (15:26); but the Holy Spirit is sent from the Father. Thus the relations of the Holy Spirit with the Father and with the Son turn out to be intimately connected; later theological difficulties were to arise on this point.

Developed in the section of speeches (ch. 14–17), the Johannine theology of the Holy Spirit sheds light on the entire gospel narrative. From the baptism* (1:32ff.) to the cross (19:30), the gift of the Holy Spirit accompanies the designation of Jesus as Son and marks the advent of the Church (represented in 20:22 by the disciples), itself pointed toward the universal, according to the principle of a new cult* “in spirit and truth” (4:23f.). Similarly, it falls to the Holy Spirit to ensure the “spiritual” understanding of the teachings of Jesus, so that they may be received as a revelation of his divine mission (3:5–8, 6:63).

c) The Ambiguity of Signs. While the disciples who came after the Resurrection, assisted by the Holy Spirit, had the ability to bring out the deep sense of the words and actions of Jesus (2:22, 12:16), the witnesses to his public life were confronted with actions whose spectacular or unprecedented character should have been enough to reveal the singular personality of Jesus. We might also speak of a series of signs (see miracles [miracle*]), coextensive with the earthly existence of Jesus (2:11, 4:54, 20:20f.) and supposed to be able to lead directly to faith (2:11 and 23, 6:2 and 14, 12:18), since signs form a part of the process of revelation or “glory” (2:11).

But the great misunderstanding of the multiplication of the loaves reveals the partial failure of signs, that is the lack of recognition of their role as signs and the excessive attachment to apparent material reality (6:26). In this sense the reiterated demand for signs (2:18, 6:30) is less the mark of an attachment to Jesus than the refusal to follow him on his own territory. Similarly, actions following signs remain vague and imprecise (3:2, 6:14, 7:31, 9:16), sometimes even hostile (11:47). It is easy to understand the impatience of Jesus in the face of a reception of a sign that reduces him to the status of a vulgar miracle worker (4:48). Finally, the fourth gospel emphasizes the inability of signs to give rise to faith (12:37). Conversely, the nakedness of the cross and the emptiness of the tomb call for an act of faith (19:35, 20:8), beyond any tangible appearances, in an absence of signs that is in harmony with the very excess of the mystery. Only then does perfect coincidence of “seeing” and “believing” occur (20:8). A similar experience is offered to the post-Resurrection disciples (20:29) who, like Thomas, are asked to find their happiness in bare faith, with no support other than the gaping wounds of the Crucified One (20:27), a reminder of the cross and the tomb. Thus, the Easter experience of the first day of the week (20:1, 19), repeated a week later (20:26), informs the time of the Church, a time of faith in “Jesus Christ the Son of God” (20:31) and a time of missionary proclamation (20:17, 21), in continuity with a witnessing (21:24) whose source is located precisely at the place of the cross (19:35). This is the place of the “lifting up” (3:14, 8:28, 12:32) of Jesus.

d) The Debate on Works. If the actions of Jesus are truly signs only in the framework of a church-based rereading of his entire career (20:30f., 21:24f.), the motif of works, also frequent in the fourth gospel, expresses a complementary point of view with respect to the revelatory function of the Son and the circumstances in which human beings receive revelation.

In the speech to Nicodemus, Jesus refuses to be constrained by the problematic of signs, as urged by the Pharisee rabbi (3:2), who is effectively a spokesman of the Jewish world (2:23). The call to be born “from above” (3:3) or “from water and the spirit” (3:5–8) is an introduction into a spiritual understanding of the teachings of Jesus (3:8). Their subject is not only “earthly realities,” related to the condition of disciple (3:12), but also “heavenly realities”: the divine origin of the Son (3:13) and his salvific mission (3:15, 17), manifested in the event of the cross (13:14). In this context, mention is made of good and bad works (3:19f.), which themselves have the effect of revealing the deep nature of the man who has accomplished them.

Applied to the activity of Jesus, the motif of works has a revelatory function: it throws light on the close connection between the action of the Son and the will of the Father who has sent him (5:19f., 14:10ff., 15:24, 17:4). Thus, the works of Jesus are included in the category of authorized witnesses (5:36), on the same basis as the word of the Father (5:37f.) and the letter of the Scriptures (5:39f.). Similarly, a symbolic action like the healing* of the man born blind is a manifestation of the works of God (9:3) and attests to the unity between the activity of Jesus and the will of the Father who has sent him (9:4). Finally, the great controversies of chapters 8 and 10 demonstrate the opposition between the works of Jesus, accomplished in the name of the Father (10:25f., 32, 38), and the persistence in unbelief displayed by the Jewish authorities of Jerusalem (8:39–47, 10:33). Far from automatically bringing about an acceptance of faith, the works of Jesus strengthen the hostility of his opponents (15:24f.) and accelerate the judicial process that has been unleashed against him (8:59, 10:3, 11:53).

As for believers, who receive the works of Jesus as the sign of his close communion with the Father (14:10), they enter into a movement of love that gives them the capacity in turn to carry out similar works or even “greater” ones than those of Jesus (14:12). Thus, to fulfill their function as revelation, works call for the commitment of the disciple in an act of faith (20:30f.). Without this act of faith the actions of Jesus are meaningless.

3. The Son as Mediator of Salvation

From the outset (1:51) the identification of Jesus with Jacob’s ladder designates the Son of man as the mediator, instituting perfect communication between heaven and earth: the definitive opening (past participle: v. 51) of heaven makes the tearing of the veil of the temple related by the synoptics unnecessary.

a) The Images of Salvation. On two occasions (3:17, 12:47), the verb “to save” (sôzein) explicitly designates Jesus’ activity with respect to the world. But rather than describing the content of this action, the fourth gospel contrasts it to its opposite, “judgment,” understood in terms of condemnation, given the malignity of men, more inclined to “love the darkness” than “the light” (3:19). The mission of the Son sent by the Father consists of “saving” the world, by protecting it from the “judgment” and the death that would ensue if human beings, left to themselves, were to bring forth only their own works (3:20). Conversely, from their very faith in Christ (3:16), believers open themselves to the light, which reveals to them their own truth (3:21a) and enables their works to find their fulfillment in God (3:21b).

The metaphors of life (6:33, 35, 48, 51, 53, 57), often characterized as eternal (4:14 and 6:27, 47, 54, and 58), and of light (8:12) are associated with one another from the prologue onward (1:4) and are the privileged expressions of a salvation expressly linked to the person of Jesus. Repeating the miracles of the desert, he also presents himself as food (6:33, 41, 48, 51) and source of living water (4:10, 14). The victories over hunger (6:35) and thirst (4:14, 6:35) are metaphors for a salvation born of faith (6:35), itself understood as the work of God (6:29), as a free gift (6:44, 65). This salvation brings about more than intellectual acceptance. It enables believers to enter into the communion of divine life, permitting them to be engendered in filial status (1:12f.) through a birth from above (3:5) and finally brought to an everlasting resurrection (6:39f.). Thus, believing in “Jesus Christ the Son of God” and “having life in his name” (20:31) are the two inseparable aspects of salvation.

However, the fourth gospel manifests a certain reserve with regard to physical healing, whereas the synoptics emphasize its continuity with the overall experience of salvation, particularly through the for-givenness of sins (sin*). Only one passage evokes physical healing as a form of salvation (11:12), but the remark is placed in the mouths of the disciples and rather expresses a lack of understanding of Jesus’ purpose: only victory over death adequately expresses the radical nature of salvation.

Finally, the universality of the divine plan of salvation (3:16f., 12:47) does not exclude the historical mediation of Israel (4:22), even as Jesus reveals to the Samaritan the overcoming of ethnic and religious divisions (4:21, 23).

b) The Time of Salvation. Coinciding with the act of faith in Jesus Christ the Son of God (20:31), salvation is rooted in the current situation of the believer (17:3). Access to eternal life (life*, eternal) implies not so much projection onto a distant horizon as grasping the present as the location of a possible judgment (3:18ff., 5:24). According to the perspectives of an eschatology* known as “realized” or “anticipated,” the gift of life is often expressed in the present (6:27, 32f., 50, 53f., 56), but we also find the future (6:35, 51, 17), including the evocation of a last judgment opening onto a final resurrection (5:28f., 6:39f., 44, 54).

The tension between the “already there” of salvation and the “not yet” of its fulfillment finds expression in the motif of the “hour.” Identified with the moment of the cross (7:30, 8:20, 12:27, 13:1, 19:27), the Johannine hour is presented as already having “come,” not only with respect to the historical fate of Jesus (12:23, 13:1) but in its later manifestations: the universal assembly of believers (4:23), the resurrection of the dead (5:25), the unleashing of persecutions (16:32). However, the anticipation of the hour (“And it has come”; “And it is now”) is inseparable from the striving toward an expected fullness (“The hour is coming”: 4:21ff., 5:25–28, 16:2 and 25). Only the first epistle, in an outburst related to persecution, goes so far as to identify purely and simply the “now” of the church crisis and the “final hour” of the Antichrist preceding the final revelation (1 Jn 2:18–25). The emphasis placed on realized eschatology derives from the christological presentation of the fourth gospel. The cross is indeed the specific place of revelation (Jn 17:1–5), but Jesus’ public life anticipates his full manifestation as the Son. This is true of the “glory” of Cana (2:11), following directly from the prologue (1:14) and in conformity with the promise made to Nathanael (1:51). It would, however, be erroneous to think that the “already there” of glory can overshadow the reference to the cross as the central event of salvation. At Cana the manifestation of Jesus and the belief of the disciples represent glory (2:11), but there is no confusion with the hour of the cross (2:4).

c) The Place of the Church. The Johannine preference for existential metaphors, like life (10:10), light (8:12), and knowledge (8:19), brings in its wake a relative thinness in collective or historical expressions of salvation. For example, the notion of the Kingdom* of God appears in a single passage (3:3, 5), and we do not know whether this was an early element, preceding specifically Johannine perspectives, or a late compositional addition with a harmonizing aim. Similarly, the traditional metaphors of the people of God (flock, vineyard) are modified in a personal sense. Emphasis is placed on the relationship between Christ the vine and each of his branches (15:1–10) or on the close knowledge linking each of his sheep to the shepherd (10:1–5, 27f.); the image of the door (10:8f.) makes of salvation a personal passage into Christ.

The reality of the church does not escape unscathed from this individualization of salvation. Not only are the Twelve marked by their inadequacy to accomplish the plan of Jesus (hence the clumsiness of their interventions: 13:22, 14:5, 8, and 22, and 16:17f.—including Peter*: 13:6, 8f., 36), but their very existence as a symbolic community of the Church (6:70) proceeds from a rigorous selection carried out through the discourse on the bread of life (the crowd: 6:22, 24; the Jews: 6:41, 52; the disciples: 6:60, 66; finally the Twelve: 6:67, 70f.). Constituting the final remainder who have gone through the ordeal of faith (6:67ff.), the Twelve nevertheless remain open to division, symbolized by Judas, called a “devil” or “divider” (6:70f.)

On the other hand, the privileged reference to the beloved disciple, recognized interpreter of Jesus’ sayings (13:23–26), eyewitness of the crucifixion (19:25ff., 35), and initiator of the Easter act of faith (20:8, 21:7), evidences the particular character of a community jealously protective of its singularity. The authority of the “disciple” (21:24) takes the place of the referential function of the Twelve, but the last stage of composition (ch. 21) proceeds to a redistribution of roles (21:10), around the symbolic figure of Peter, recognized as pastor (21:15ff.) on the grounds of his martyrdom* (21:18f.).

d) The Role of the Sacraments. Since John proposes to lead one to a faith that is first of all a “life” in Christ (20:31), it is not surprising that, since the Fathers of the Church, commentators have recognized many allusions to the bread and wine of the Eucharist (speech at Capernaum: 6:22–71; the wedding of Cana: 2:1–12), as well as to the celebration of baptism (birth of water and the spirit: 3:3–8; a spring providing eternal life: 4:14; restoration of sight to the blind man sent to the pool of Siloam: 9:6f.; the washing of feet as participation in the Easter mystery of Christ the servant*: 13:7f.).

However, deeper study of the documents shows that the sacramental motif is neither primary nor unique. For example, the discourse on the bread of life is first of all a homily on faith in the divine envoy (6:27ff.), whose coming to earth repeats the miracle of manna (6:31f.) and constitutes the true food for believers (6:35, 48, 51a). The practice of the Eucharist appears only in second place, with the explicit allusion to the sacramental reality (chewing the bread: 6:54, 56ff; the two species: 6:53–56), which is performed as a memorial of the cross (6:51b).

Similarly, the narrative of the washing of the feet brings together two aspects. It represents a symbolic act carried out as a prefiguration of the cross (13:7f.), within a perspective that is close to that of baptism. It also contributes a teaching of Jesus with respect to community behavior (13:12–16), lived in the form of service, in imitation of the exemplary gesture made by Jesus (13:14f.).

Thus, sacramental practices do not constitute the principal object of John’s narrative but are rooted in the logic of a discourse centered on the person of Christ and communion with his life (20:31). The effusion of both water and blood at the moment of death (19:34), before explicitly designating baptism and the Eucharist, evidences the continuity between the concrete being of Jesus and the communication of the Holy Spirit (19:30; see 1 Jn 5:6–9), according to the promise made to the disciples (7:39, 14:17, 15:26, and 16:13, 20, 22).

Conclusion

Marginal in many respects, the Johannine community nevertheless had its theology canonized by the great councils (council*) of the fourth and fifth centuries. For example, the motif of the “Incarnation*,” inaugurated by the prologue (1:14) in the framework of a “high” Christology implying the preexistence of the Word (1:1), became the authorized expression of Christian faith in Jesus Christ, the son of God and Savior. One can therefore understand the interest in shedding historical light on chapter 21, in relation to the integration of the Johannine community and the audacious theology of John’s book into the Great Church as a whole.

- R. Bultmann (1941), Das Evangelium des Johannes, Göttingen.
- C. H. Dodd (1953), The Interpretation of the Fourth Gospel, Cambridge; id. (1963), Historical Tradition in the Fourth Gospel, Cambridge.
- R. Schnackenburg (1965, 1971, 1975), Das Joannesevangelium, ThK IV, 1–3.
- R. E. Brown (1966, 1970), The Gospel According to John, 2 vols., New York; id. (1979), The Community of the Beloved Disciple, New York.
- O. Cullmann (1976), Le milieu johannique: Étude sur l’origine de l’Évangile de Jean, Neuchâtel-Paris.

- D. Mollat (1979), Études johanniques, Paris.
R. A. Culpepper (1983), Anatomy of the Fourth Gospel, a Study in Literary Design, Philadelphia.
X. Léon-Dufour (1987, 1990, 1993, 1997), Lecture de l'Évangile selon Jean, 4 vols., Paris.
Coll. ACFEB, A. Marchadour (Ed.) (1990), Origine et postérité de l'Évangile de Jean, Paris.
J.-D. Kaestli, J.-M. Poffet, J. Zumstein (Ed.) (1990), La Communauté johannique et son histoire (La trajectoire de l'évangile de Jean aux deux premiers siècles), Geneva.

Y.-M. Blanchard (1995), Des signes pour croire? Une lecture de l'Évangile de Jean, Paris.

YVES-MARIE BLANCHARD

See also Bultmann, Rudolf; Eschatology; Father; Filiation; Flesh; Glory of God; Holy Spirit; Incarnation; Judgment; Lamb of God/Paschal Lamb; Love; Sacrament; Truth; Word; Works; World

John Duns Scotus. See Duns Scotus, John

John of Ripa. See Duns Scotus, John

John of Salisbury. See Chartres, School of

John of the Cross

1542–1591

a) Humanist and Mystic at the Heart of the Spanish Golden Age. Juan de Yepes was born in Fontiveros (Avila), the third son of a family of weavers. Left fatherless from his first months, his mother had to send him to an orphanage for the poor in Medina del Campo, where his first education was oriented toward craftwork. Very early on he acquired an exceptional artistic and religious sensibility. Noticed by a benefactor, he was able to receive a solid classical education from the Jesuits in the town before entering the local Carmel in 1563. From 1564 to 1568 he worked his way through the university of Salamanca, an institution that was still basking in the glory of Vitoria and Melchior Cano and was under the present influence of Luis de León. All the theological schools were represented here and could debate freely. Besides a solid biblical and patristic training, the university gave him all that he would later need in order to link the realities of the mystical life to a technically flawless theology.

Spain was experiencing a spiritual explosion at that time and despite censorship directed against the Illuminism of the Alumbrados (a censorship that was not actually effective), the works of the northern mystics, as well as the interiority of the Devotio moderna* introduced by Montserrat around 1500, became widespread. John was ordained to the priesthood* in 1567, which was also the year he met Teresa of Jesus. She made him abandon his idea of complete withdrawal into a Carthusian monastery, recruiting him instead to help her in the reform of Carmel, which she had just begun. In 1568 he returned to Medina and then began to reform the male branch of Carmel by founding the small monastery of Duruelo. Here he adopted the name John of the Cross. Henceforth he divided his time between the spiritual formation of the reformed Carmels and management of the reform.

Internal and external frictions, which resulted in his nine-month incarceration in the dungeon at the monastery of Toledo between 1577 and 1578, would lead to him being marginalized within his own religious family. He preferred not to impose himself on the institution that he reformed. He died of osteitis on 14 December 1591 in the monastery of Ubeda.

b) Works and Influence. It was after his release from the Toledo dungeon that John of the Cross began to put in order a poetical work that showed perfect mastery of the new style—it was employed in Italy by Garcilaso de la Vega—and to write down the commentaries that he had given orally in the parlors of Carmelite convents. The Spiritual Canticle, which traces the mystical (mysticism*) journey with reference to the games of the couple in the Song of Songs, achieved its first completed form in 1584. It was dedicated to Anne of Jesus, Teresa's companion. Anne took it to northern Europe, where she launched the reform of the French and Belgian Carmels after 1604. The development of this essential text, reworked until John's death, was later lost. The Vive Flamme, written in the last few weeks of 1585, would be a dazzling account of the final developments of mystical perfection. At the same time he carefully began writing The Ascent of Mount Carmel and The Dark Night of the Soul. Both represent a clearer explanation of his spiritual doctrine.

Because the second generation of Spanish reformers did not favor him, because his manuscripts were destroyed and not made available, and because obvious doctrinal changes introduced obscure circumstances, a genuinely critical edition of John's work has still not appeared today even though his writing was published in stages from 1618 onward. His gradual return to favor would only lead to his beatification in 1675 (Teresa was already canonized in 1622). It was in France that he had the earliest and deepest influence (thanks to the magnificent French translation of the Complete Works by Cyprian of the Nativity of the Virgin [1605–80], 1641), even though his works were also translated into Italian, Latin, Dutch, and German, less than a hundred years after his death. When, on 24 August 1926, John of the Cross was declared a Doctor of the Church, he became a main reference for mystical doctrine in the modern West.

Much more proficient in theological discourse than some other writers, and therefore more open to attacks in this terrain, John was to pay a high price for the divorce between theology and mysticism. The permanent disputes over his work, the quasi-universal moralism of some of his best-intentioned translators and commentators, as well as the intense opposition that he and his disciples faced show to what point mysticism has become unintelligible to modern theology. It is when John describes a journey that entails man's acquiescence, a journey of which God is nonetheless the sole driving force, that rational and apologetic theory has relentlessly chosen to find the difficult rise of a mandatory asceticism*. He does warn us, however, that he is speaking of a theology "in which we know by love, and in which we do not only know, but simultaneously taste" (CT, prologue).

c) The Ascent of Mount Carmel. My main intention is not to address everyone, but only some of the persons of our holy Order of the Primitive Observance of Mount Carmel, both friars and nuns, whom God favors by putting them on the path leading up this mount" (S, prologue). All of John of the Cross's doctrine presupposes this vocation, which involves nothing more than letting it be carried out by marking the way to the summit "where only the honor and the glory of God can be found" (diagram of Mount Carmel). However, the honor and glory of God come together to join man through love: "The summit of the mount is the high state of perfection that we call the union of the soul with God." (S, argument). John of the Cross's entire work does nothing but develop this theme of union. On the path leading to this union, man does not belong to any system: he allows God to act and eliminates any pretext for not allowing him to act, always leading the soul (soul*-heart-body) back to the passivity of unconditional faith.

Entrance into contemplation, strictly speaking, corresponds to this transition to passivity. In order to identify it, John of the Cross offers three signs, which have become classic in spiritual guidance (spiritual* direction): it is authentic if 1) the soul has become incapable of meditation; 2) if it feels detached from what is not God; and 3) it feels established in “simple and loving attention to God” (S. II, 13).

On this path of enlightenment, phases of bedazzlement, of hyper-lucidity, will be perceived painfully. This is precisely the theme of the nights, which denotes the process of the soul’s accommodation to the divine light. John distinguishes two principle nights, corresponding to the two regions of the soul, the sensitive and the spiritual. These must be gathered and returned from the outside to the inside. Once these nights are completed the soul is reestablished to its original state in the image of God; henceforth, “in this state, the soul cannot perform acts (action*). It is the Holy Spirit that makes them all, moving the soul—which is the reason that all these acts are divine, because it is moved and activated by God” (LI. 1–4). This state of union is called “spiritual marriage,” in that it presupposes a reciprocal and free commitment between the soul and God, to which all pedagogy of nights led, and which initiates a stable and continuous delight between the two partners. Even death will be received in this state as abundant love, a complete assumption of the person in God: “Here, all the wealth of the soul comes together, and the soul’s rivers of love start to flow into the sea . . . , all their treasures uniting to accompany the righteous one who is leaving to go to [God’s] kingdom” (LI. 1, 30).

d) The Fundamental Spiritual Attitude. The necessary passivity of the soul takes the shape of both solitude and poverty, the two vectors of all spiritual progress. Solitude is necessary in that love is secret, impossible to identify from the outside. This is the theme of the hiding place, of the soul in disguise, needing to pass unnoticed by the world, or by the tempter, or even by itself, so as to go forward in the total security of one who is allowing himself to be guided by another who sees better: “In an obscure night,/ in the anxiety and blaze of love,/ Oh happy adventure!/ I left without being seen,/ my house now at rest.—In darkness and safety,/ by the secret ladder, in disguise,/ Oh happy adventure!/ in darkness and in hiding” (poem of the night). Poverty is liberation, enabling a greater joy in true wealth: this is the spirit of the celebrated todo y nada (S. I, 13), which is the spirit of contemplation and not asceticism. It is because the soul already has all—that “all” that was at the starting point of its vocation—that the soul can consider all the rest as nothing. At both the beginning and the end of his famous litany on how it is necessary to be completely dispossessed before advancing toward the summit of Carmel (“to be inclined always to the most difficult, the most insipid, the most exhausting, etc.”), John designates the only motive that should suffice to satisfy us: “For the sole honor and the sole glory of God . . . through the love of Jesus Christ” (ibid.).

In this solitude and poverty the soul knows that the union has in fact already been carried out since Good Friday (see Ct. 28), although hidden in its eyes, and it knows that its unveiling only presupposes entrusting oneself to God who, from the beginning, does all the work. It is from this, then, that comes the fundamental optimism that runs through John of the Cross’s work. In the deepest darkness of the night, his words are filled with encouragement, and if he can be forthright when it is a question of what is essential, he reserves his harshest words for those nervous spiritual directors who, alarmed by the night’s obscurity, discourage souls who are called to make this leap into the light.

- Silverio de Santa Teresa (1929), Obras de San Juan de la Cruz, Burgos.
- ♦ R. Garrigou-Lagrange (1923), Perfection chrétienne et contemplation, Saint-Maximin.
- J. Baruzi (1924), Saint Jean de la Croix et le problème de l’expérience mystique, Paris.
- Crisógono de Jesús (1929), San Juan de la Cruz, su obra científica y su obra literaria, Avila.
- J. Maritain (1932), Distinguer pour unir ou les degrés du savoir, Paris, 615–765.
- Crisógono de Jesús (1946), Vida de san Juan de la Cruz, Madrid.
- H. Sanson (1953), L’esprit humain selon saint Jean de la Croix, Paris.
- G. Morel (1960), Le sens de l’existence selon saint Jean de la Croix, 3 vols., Paris.
- J. Orcibal (1966), Saint Jean de la Croix et les mystiques rhéno-flamands, Paris.
- F. Ruiz Salvador (1968), Introducción a San Juan de la Cruz, Madrid.
- M. Andrés (1976), La teología española en el siglo XVI, Madrid.
- A. Cugno (1979), Saint Jean de la Croix, Paris.
- M. Huot de Longchamp (1981), Lectures de Jean de la Croix, Paris; id. (1991), Saint Jean de la Croix, Paris.
- Coll. (1991), Juan de la Cruz: espíritu de llama, Rome-Kampen.
- O. Steggink, E. de la Madre de Dios (1992), Tiempo y vida de san Juan de la Cruz, Madrid.

MAX HUOT DE LONGCHAMP

See also Carmel; Contemplation; Mysticism; Rhineland-Flemish Mysticism

John the Evangelist. See Johannine Theology

Judaism

a) Historical and Social Context. Relations between Judaism and Christianity take place in a concrete context, notably the presence of Jewish communities in Christian lands. Even though the life of these communities, with its economic and social aspects, does not concern us here, it does dictate the nature of the strictly theological question. First, because this places the confrontation of ideas against a background that necessarily falsifies it, in that the Jews live under the domination of Christian rulers. Second, this very situation becomes part of the argument: the fact that the Jews are dominated is taken as proof of withdrawal of the divine favor promised to Israel.

Legally prohibited from owning land in many parts of medieval Europe, the Jews had to turn to financial professions: commerce and lending money against interest (the latter being forbidden to Christians). By institutionalizing their position, in a certain sense, these laws encouraged a residual anti-Jewish resentment that existed prior to Christianity (see Juvenal, Tacitus). This was further complicated by various phantasms such as the accusation of “ritual crime.” Forced conversions (conversion*) were outlawed by the Council of Toledo (633) and again by the bull of Calixtus II Sicut judeis (1122 or 1123), which defined the legal status of Jews in Christian lands. The Fourth Lateran* Council (1215) imposed the wearing of a distinctive garment, later replaced by a round yellow badge.

Intellectual controversy was lively and reciprocal. Sometimes it was institutionalized. Jews were forced to take part in debates (wikkuah), often at the insistence of Christian converts. Treatises by Christians against Jews were usually addressed to fellow Christians. And there was no lack of Jewish treatises against Christianity during the whole medieval period, before the expulsion of Jews from Spain in 1492 (Lasker 1977). The first treatises were written in Arabic in the Islamic East, then in Hebrew in Christian lands, and even in Catalan; for example, the Refutation of the principles of Christians of Crescas (1412 manuscript). The controversy continues in modern times, in a more moderate tone, but also in that wider public space that is opened up by publication in modern languages.

Jewish philosophers sketch out a theology of Christianity, sometimes reversing categories forged by Christian theologians. This has been the case in Germany (Hirsch, Formstecher), and Italy (Benamozegh) (Fleischmann 1970).

However, the controversy is not to be confused with the question of relations with Judaism and does not prevent intellectual exchange (Dahan 1990). This is true even in the theological domain: with Rachi, Jewish exegesis came to have an important influence on the exegesis of the Victorines and Nicholas of Lyre, and, by way of the latter, on Luther*. The philosophy and theology of Maimonides influenced Thomas Aquinas (Wohlman 1988) and Meister Eckhart. Reciprocally, late Scholasticism is present, without explicit citation, perhaps in Gersonide, certainly in Crescas (Pines) and Joseph Albo, and explicitly in Hillel of Verona. The Kabala influenced the Renaissance and humanism. Present-day Catholic and Protestant theologians read Martin Buber, Franz Rosenzweig, and Emmanuel Levinas.

b) Conceptualizing Continuity. Christianity’s relation with Judaism is not on the same level as its relations with other religions that are either foreign to the Abrahamic tradition (religions of India and China) or claim to be connected but reject the preceding sacred books (Islam). Christianity and Judaism are not simply exterior to each other. Christianity “came out of” Judaism in the two senses of the word: it constituted itself in distinguishing itself from Judaism as such. Therefore, in conceptualizing Judaism, Christianity is indirectly conceptualizing itself.

Christianity arose and developed in a Jewish environment. Jesus and the apostles were Jewish, as were all the authors of the New Testament except for Luke. The Christian Church appeared at first as nothing more than a tendency within first-century Judaism. The separation occurred gradually, beginning when Paul prevailed over James and imposed his solution, that of requiring of pagan converts only a minimal respect for the law (Acts 15). Judeo-Christian communities persisted for centuries. Within the second-century Church there was a strong temptation to push Paulinism to the extreme and reject the Old Testament. Marcion's rejection of this claimed a justification in attributing it to the evil creator posited by Gnosticism. Under the influence of Tertullian* and Irenaeus*, the Church rejected this temptation.

It remained to be demonstrated that the Old Testament announced the coming of Christ and a new law. On the first point, passages such as Psalms 2 and 110 were invoked and above all Isaiah's prophecy of the "suffering servant" (Is 53), and on the second, Jeremiah's prophecy of the new covenant inscribed in the heart (soul*-heart-body) (Jer 31:31–34). Various solutions were offered to the problem raised by the abandonment of certain legislative provisions. First, a distinction was made between those provisions that were permanent and those that had only pedagogical and therefore transitory value. This was simple in principle but difficult to apply. Laws labeled "ceremonial" were no longer in effect; but moral laws were deemed permanent and sometimes labeled with the Stoicist term "natural" (Justin, Dialogue with Trypho). Later, the commandments (Decalogue*) were interpreted allegorically (Gospel of Barnabas 9, 7; SC 172, 146 Sq). Prophecies (prophet* and prophecy) of messianic times were interpreted not as referring to the first coming of Jesus but his glorious second coming.

It also had to be shown that Christianity did not go back on the affirmation of monotheism. The theology of the Trinity* strove to distinguish itself from any kind of triplicity. Indications of the Trinity were sought in the Old Testament, as in the plural "Let us make man" (Gn 1:26) or in the passage where Abraham receives three supernatural visitors (Gn 18). Similarly, it had to be shown that the cult of images and of the cross did not amount to the worship of idols (idolatry).

However, the relation to the ancient covenant and the texts that tell its story (the Old Testament) is just one aspect of the relationship with Judaism. Post-Christian Judaism crystallized after the destruction of the temple and the loss of the land. Jewish elements that had been centered on the temple and the land—such as the Sadducees—disappeared, leaving only the Pharisees, whose focus was the study of the Torah.

c) Conceptualizing the Persistence of Judaism. The question for Christianity was that of knowing what role remained for the unconverted people of Israel. This problem already tormented Paul, himself born and raised as a strictly observant Jew, and he entertained in coexistence themes that were hard to reconcile. On the one hand, by adhering to the law, the Jews refuse grace (Gal 5:4). The Epistle to the Hebrews, basing its argument on Jeremiah 31:31–34, notes with the same sense: "In speaking of a new covenant, he [God, through the mouth of Jeremiah] makes the first one obsolete. And what is becoming obsolete and growing old is ready to vanish away" (Heb 8:13). On the other hand, "the gifts and the calling of God are irrevocable" (Rom 11:29) so it follows that "all Israel will be saved" (Rom 11:26). The same ambiguity is expressed in the Johannine writings: in the fourth gospel (gospels*) Jesus' enemies are plainly named "the Jews," but it is also affirmed that "salvation is from the Jews" (Jn 4:22).

The church fathers introduced a new theme: the Church is verus Israel, "the real Israelite race" (Justin, Dialogue with Trypho). The promises (promise*) made to ancient Israel are understood to be valid for the Church, that is, for all of Christianity. The fact that the scepter has left Jacob proves that "the one to whom it must return"—if the word šiloh is interpreted this way—has come (Gn 49:10). So it should be no surprise that the Jews are deprived of their land and all political power and dispersed throughout the world. Nor, conversely, that Christians should appropriate cultural features taken from the Old Testament and abandoned by Judaism, such as the anointing of kings and the Aaronic imagery of the priesthood. The universalist prophecies are interpreted as referring to the conversion of the nations to the Church.

The Church's claim to being the true Israel is interpreted as an exclusive one: the Jewish communities are no longer Israel (Augustine, En. Ps. 75, 2; CChr.SL 39, 1038), and this means that they are situated outside of themselves. An explanation must be found for their persistence. The effective cause is the hardening* of hearts and blindness, as expressed in the image of the blindfolded synagogue. The final cause is the testimony they give, in spite of themselves, of the validity of the gospel. As Augustine has it, the Jews are kept in their dispersion in order to bear witness (Augustine, City of God XVIII, 46; BAug 36, 653).

A change in themes can be observed from the 12th century onward (Funkenstein 1968). From around 1240 the procedure of allegorization of the Bible was extended to the Talmud, until then unfamiliar to Christians, and then to the Kabala, both of which understood as announcing a messiah (messianism*/Messiah) who resembled Jesus.

d) Recent Developments. The favorable context created by the religious neutrality of modern states does not explain everything but does facilitate matters. On the other hand there was an upsurge of a modern, social, pseudo-biological anti-Semitism dissociated from Christian anti-Judaism even if it shared certain themes (Hadas-Lebel 1993). The Shoah, ultimate consequence of this anti-Semitism, led to the concretization of the Zionist project and the creation of the State of Israel.

But intellectual factors are also at work. Emancipation allows Jews to participate in modern intellectual life and Christians have a more positive attitude, which had been developing for centuries. Some called Bernard of Clairvaux a “saint” for his action against the pogroms connected with the Second Crusade (Joseph ha-Cohen, Vale of tears . . . 1881). Abelard*, at the same period, provides an example of irenic dialogue sensitive to the sufferings of Israel (Dialogue between a philosopher, a Jew, and a Christian). From the 15th century onward, knowledge of Hebrew spread. Progress in biblical studies produced a better awareness of the implications of Jesus’ Jewish origins. At the Council of Trent the Catholic Church explicitly condemned the idea of a “deicide people.” In Le salut par les Juifs [Salvation by the Jews] (1892), the writer Léon Bloy (1846–1917) opposed anti-Semitism. He was followed by Jacques Maritain (1882–1979), Erik Peterson (1932), Charles Journet (1945), and the Jesuit Gaston Fessard (1960), who deepened an irenic meditation on the mystery* of Israel. At the same time, Jews rediscovered the person of Jesus.

Vatican II* represents an important stage, but not an entirely new departure. The declaration Nostra Aetate, §4, extended by Orientations and suggestions for the application of the conciliar declaration Nostra Aetate (1975), and then Notes for a proper presentation of Jews and Judaism in the Preaching and Catechism of the Catholic Church (1985), sought to reorient Christian teaching as a whole. The work of Franz Mußner (1979) is important, if only for the symbolic impact of its title: it marks the transition from a discourse against the Jews to a discourse about the Jews.

However, the theological problem of the status of non-converted Israel is not specified in any official document and continues to be disputed. It is further complicated by the division of the Jewish people into different congregations (Reform, Conservative, Orthodox) and by the foundation of the State of Israel. It is in itself a mysterious question, one reserved for God alone. Among the questions that can be dealt with, some are concerned with the very status of Israel, others with its relation to the Church.

Paul called for immediate conversion (Rom 12:31), while suggesting that a conversion will eventually occur (Rom 11:25). For what period, era, or epoch does the Church have the right to hope for this conversion? Within the time of human history? Will it be gradual or en masse? Or is it an eschatological event, reserved for Christ’s second coming?

Are there two peoples of God? Will the Church only be fully the true people of God after the conversion of Israel? Is there a separate path of salvation for Israel that could forego belief in Christ? Of course, “there is one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus” (1 Tm 2:5). But acceptance of this, which is an article of faith for Christians, might, for the Jews, be a vision, the eschatological vision of “him whom they have pierced” (Jn 19:37 citing Zec 12:10).

- E. Peterson (1933), “Die Kirche aus Juden und Heiden,” Theologische Traktate, Munich, 1951, 241–92.
- C. Journet (1945), Les destinées d’Israël, Paris.
- M. Simon (1948), Verus Israel. Étude sur les relations entre Chrétiens et Juifs dans l’Empire romain (135–425), Paris.
- G. Fessard (1960), De l’actualité historique, I. A la recherche d’une méthode, Paris.
- S. Pines (1967), Scholasticism after Thomas Aquinas and the Teaching of Hasdai Crescas and His Predecessors, Jerusalem.
- A. Funkenstein (1968), “Changes in the Patterns of Christian Anti-Jewish Polemics in the 12th Century” (hebr.), Sion 23, 126–44.
- E. Fleischmann (1970), Le christianisme “mis à nu”: La critique juive du christianisme, Paris.
- D.J. Lasker (1977), Jewish Philosophical Polemics Against Christianity in the Middle Ages, New York.
- C. Thoma (1978), Christliche Theologie des Judentums, Aschaffenburg.
- F. Mußner (1979), Traktat über die Juden.
- P. van Buren (1980–87), A Theology of the Jewish-Christian Reality, San Francisco.
- J.-M. Garrigues (Ed.) (1987), L’unique Israël de Dieu, Paris.
- A. Wohlman (1988), Thomas d’Aquin et Maïmonide: Un dialogue exemplaire, Paris.
- M. Sales (1989), Le corps de l’Église, Paris.
- C. Thoma (1989), Theologische Beziehungen zwischen Christentum und Judentum, Darmstadt.
- G. Dahan (1990), Les intellectuels chrétiens et les Juifs au Moyen Age, Paris.
- M. Hadas-Lebel (1993), “Renan et le judaïsme,” Commentaire 62, 369–79.
- H. U. von Balthasar (1995), “Le problème Église-Israël depuis le Concile” (posth.), Com(F) XX/3, 23–36.

RÉMI BRAGUE

See also Church; Choice; Ecclesiology; Israel; Judeo-Christianity; Pauline Theology

Judeo-Christianity

a) Various Notions. The notion of Judeo-Christianity employed in the history of ancient Christianity, as in the history of Christian doctrines, expresses the connection between nascent Christianity and Judaism. The content varies from one author to another, but three major concepts can be brought out.

In its first meaning Judeo-Christianity represents Christians who were born Jewish and confess the messianism of Jesus, his resurrection from the dead, and the new life he begins according to the announcement made to the prophets (prophet* and prophecy). Those Christians who continued to observe Jewish law became the minority by the end of the first century as a result of the development of Christian communities made up of a majority of formerly pagan (pagans*) believers.

This concurs with the definition of “Judeo-Christians” given in his time by L. Marchal (DThC 8, 1925, col. 1681): Christians of Jewish origin who kept the Mosaic observances while confessing the Christian faith. According to this hypothesis, confession of Christ’s divinity would mark the limit between orthodox and heterodox Judeo-Christians. To one side of this line there would be the Nazarenes and on the other the ebionites and the elchasaïtes, a group of marginal Christian communities mentioned or described by some church fathers from the middle of the second century to the fourth century.

From another viewpoint, Judeo-Christianity would include communities that came from Judaism and recognized Jesus as the Messiah (messianism*/Messiah) but not as God. The Judeo-Christians would constitute heterodox primitive Christian communities, on the fringes of other Christian communities, at the end of the first or beginning of the second century.

Another line of research starts with the observations that the Christian communities express and celebrate their faith with the use of Jewish theological and liturgical notions taken from the environment in which they were born. From this viewpoint Judeo-Christianity designates a Christian theology and practice of Jewish origin.

These varied notions in fact all use a similar approach. They all seek to bring out Judaizing intellectual fashions or practices within a number of more or less important of Christian communities developed notably after the year 70. In so doing, all of these notions place the Judeo-Christian problematic in a period after the first Jewish war (66–73) and identify the Judaism of that time with the rabbinical Judaism derived from the Pharisaic tradition. And from this viewpoint, the majority of the Christian communities of that period were characterized by their abandonment of traditional, that is, Pharisaic Jewish observances.

However, by revealing first-century Judaism in its diversity and not as a uniform entity, recent studies invite reconsideration of the question.

b) First-Century Christianity and Judaism. Judaism at that time was composed of various groups that shared an ensemble of practices and beliefs: faith in the unique God who revealed himself to the Fathers, covenant established by God with Israel, law that engages observances, in particular the cult celebrated in a unique temple. On this common basis, each group was characterized by particular practices and doctrinal interpretations; the Christians appeared then as a new group among other older ones, Sadducees, Pharisees, Essenes, Zealots... They were all designated by the same term, hairesis (sect or group), in literature of that time, whether Jewish (for example, Flavius Josephus, Antiquities of the Jews 13, 5, 9; 18, 1, 2) or Christian (Acts 5:17, 15:5, 24:5; etc.). Thus, the Church and rabbinical Judaism do not derive from a uniform clearly defined Judaism but from two different traditions of first-century Judaism (see Neusner 1991; Dunn 1991).

Early Christianity went through a phase where it elaborated its own practices while still belonging to Judaism. This phase lasted up to the separation from Judaism, which took place after the first Jewish war* in the opening decades of the second century. After this war, in fact, certain groups constituting Judaism would more or less rapidly be jeopardized, mainly the Essenes, Sadducees, and Zealots. However, there is no indication of their total disappearance. Though most Jewish traditions other than the Pharisaic and Christian lost importance, the Judaism from which Christianity separated cannot be identified exclusively with the Pharisaic group.

The fact is that the Roman authorities considered the Christians as belonging to Judaism up to the early second century. Up to that period, the same accusations were made against Jews and Christians, which shows that they were not distinguished (Flavius Josephus, Against Apion 79; Suetonius, Nero 16, 3; Tacitus, Annales 15, 44).

The Christians were still subject to harassment down through the second century but it became occasional. They were prosecuted by judges who used their police power to restore order, and their attitude shows the beginnings of a distinction between Christians and Jews. The prosecution of Christians around 111–12 by Pliny the Young, governor of the Pont and Bithynie, shows that the Christians were no longer considered as Jews. Letters exchanged on that occasion between Pliny and the Emperor Trajan are the first documents attesting the separation, at least in that site. This is far from the date usually given, which is the reign of Nero (54–68) or Domitian (81–96).

c) New Perspective on Judeo-Christianity. The question of Judeo-Christianity should be posed from the question of what was first-century Judaism. Christianity at that time was a new group within Judaism and can legitimately be called Judeo-Christianity during the period in which it was part of Judaism (see Dunn, 234). The duration of that period varied according to different communities, because the characteristic diversity of first-century Judaism also marked all the groups that constituted it. Christianity did not escape from this situation. In fact it shared with the other groups constituting the Judaism of the Second Temple a common stock of practices and beliefs that also included Scripture (the Old Testament), an ensemble of prayers (prayer*) and liturgical practices, and a way of organizing communities. But this common stock was interpreted and valorized in different ways according to the communities. This led to tensions and conflicts, not only between Christians and other groups within Judaism, notably the Pharisees, but also within Christianity, to such an extent that when Christianity and Judaism separated in the second century, some Christian communities did not find a place within Christianity as it was defined. Those are the communities that the church fathers in the second century perceived as Judaizing.

The notion of Judeo-Christianity, thus redefined, takes into account the characteristic diversity of the first Christian communities and the Jewish nature of their practices. From this perspective, the classical interpretations of Judeo-Christianity reflect, in their divergence, the situation of Christianity during the initial, Judeo-Christian phase of its history.

- M. Simon (1948), Verus Israel. Étude sur les relations entre chrétiens et juifs dans l'Empire romain (135–425), Paris (2nd Ed. 1964).
- H. Schoeps (1949), Theologie und Geschichte des Judenchristentums, Tübingen.
- J. Daniélou (1958), Théologie du judéo-christianisme, Tournai-Paris (2nd Ed. 1991).
- M. Simon, A. Benoît (1968), Le judaïsme et le christianisme antique, Paris (4th Ed. 1994).
- G. Strecker (1988), "Judenchristentum," TRE 17, 310–25.
- J.H. Charlesworth (Ed.) (1990), Jews and Christians. Exploring the Past, Present and Future, New York.
- J.E. Taylor (1990), "The Phenomenon of Early Jewish-Christianity: Reality or Scholarly Invention?" VigChr 44, 313–34.
- J.D.G. Dunn (1991), The Partings of the Ways between Christianity and Judaism and Their Significance for the Character of Christianity, London-Philadelphia.
- J. Neusner (1991), Jews and Christians: The Myth of a Common Tradition, London-Philadelphia.
- S. Mimouni (1992), "Pour une définition nouvelle du judéo-christianisme ancien," NTS 38, 169–82; repr. in Le judéo-christianisme ancien, Paris, 1998.
- L.L. Grabbe (1994), Judaism from Cyrus to Hadrian, London.

JACQUES FANTINO

See also History of the Church; Judaism

Judgment

1. Preliminary Philosophical Remark

Man perceives reality both as being and as an obligation to be; he experiences himself as existing in the present but at the same time his relationship to the external world allows him to take a detached look at his own behavior. Western philosophy* bears witness to this irreducible duality: metaphysics and practical philosophy (in the classical tradition), or the critique of pure reason and the critique of practical reason (for Kant*), are fundamental forms of philosophical activity. It follows that history is neither mere contingency nor an immediate realization of morality. It is of a mixed nature and asks to be evaluated. It is therefore inevitable that, from within faith, with the living and revealed God as starting point, there should be postulated an evaluating and judging act of God. God can have no other relation to history. The idea of divine judgment is thus not merely an allegory derived from human judicial practice and transposed to God by analogy*. We perceive that reality and history call for judgment through a transcendental experience, implicitly contained in everything that we live through. The widespread opinion that sees in theological discourse about the judgment of God a mythological survival to be abandoned, or merely a symbol (see, e.g., Tillich, Systematic Theology* Chicago, 1963, vol. 3), does not take this point of departure into account. If it is also true that the relation of God to history is determined by grace, then judgment and the fulfillment of history constitute two indissociable notions.

2. Old Testament

The categories of judicial procedure are amply employed in biblical literature, in both the Old and New Testaments, because the exercise of human and divine justice is represented there in an elevated form. The concept of justice in particular has a specific range of meaning insofar as it condenses a whole series of operations carried out to “do justice” in circumstances in which justice is threatened or flouted.

a) Judicial Procedure in Israel. Conflicts break out between individuals, who, often provoked by wrongs suffered or presumed, feel that their rights have been infringed, and who institute proceedings (rib) against the responsible party to bring a complaint before a competent judicial body so that justice may be done. The law regulates this procedure (Dt 19:1f.; 2 Sm 15:2), which contains organically structured stages that assure the lawfulness of the judgment.

The starting point of any judicial consideration is a criminal deed, that is, the violation of a law. It is also necessary that the offense be brought to the knowledge of the legal authority, who is attributed the title and the competence of judge (shôfét) and who will then assume the action of punishment.

At an evolved stage in the history of Israel, judicial bodies seem to have been divided into specific jurisdictions: “elders” probably presided over local tribunals “at the gates” of the city (Dt 21:19, 22:15, 25:7; Jos 20:4; Proverbs 31:23); “priests” decided questions concerning sacred norms (Nm 5:15–28; Dt 17:8ff., 19:17ff.; 2 Chr 19:8–11); and the most difficult cases were reserved for the king and his officials (1 Kgs 3:16–28), who may have also dealt with cases on appeal (2 Sm 14:4–8; 2 Kgs 8:1–6). The judicial body usually had a collegial form in order to guarantee greater impartiality; this model was also followed in imagining the heavenly tribunal in which God administers justice, assisted by a counselor (1 Kgs 22:19; Ps 82:1; Jb 1:6).

The judge was responsible for all actions necessary for a judgment to be lawful (shêfêt). Simplifying greatly, the procedure provided that the magistrate would examine the validity of relevant legal matters: by means of careful investigation (Dt 13:15, 17:4 and 9, 19:18) he would make certain of the facts and circumstances, and by questioning witnesses and the accused, he would develop a conviction leading to the pronouncing of a sentence (1 Sm 22:7–16; 2 Sm 14:5ff.; 1 Kgs 3:16–27; 2 Kgs 6:28, 8:6; Greek Dn 13:50–59). The public aspect of the entire procedure, as well as the involvement of the people, would be emphasized in the various stages of the process (Jer 26).

The totality of the acts decided or verified by the judge was called “judgment” (mishepat). Each moment of the procedure might, by metonymy, signify its end; for example, “accusing,” arresting a guilty person, or turning him over to the authorities might each be enough to designate the entire procedure. This is particularly true for poetic texts, which prefer allusive language to the technical terminology of the law. The term judgment was applied particularly to the concluding stage of the process, becoming a synonym with verdict, a sentence of condemnation or absolution, as well as the articulation of motives, all making up the end and the summit of the judicial action as a whole.

The purpose of punitive judgment was threefold: repression of evil (Dt 13:6, 17:7 and 12, 19:19, 21:21, etc.), social deterrence (Dt 13:12, 17:13, 19:20, 21:20; 1 Kgs 3:28, etc.), and reformation of the guilty (2 Kgs 19:4; Jer 2:19; Ps 6:2, etc.).

b) Judgment in the Prophetic Tradition. The entire judicial proceeding revolved around the figure of the judge; it was incumbent on him to see that justice was done, because the actions of any other legal subject were rendered futile if not ended in a decision by the competent body and made in a speech authoritatively defining the judicial truth that was imposed on everyone. With that purpose in mind, the law prescribed that the choice of magistrates take into account the level of wisdom and moral uprightness indispensable for the office; judges indeed had to be “men of value who fear God, men of truth who hate venality.” (Ex 18:21; see also Dt 1:15). Impartiality and incorruptibility were in a sense the bedrock of the tribunal (Ex 23:6; Lv 19:15f.; Dt 1:16f., 16:18f.).

The history of Israel did not conform to that ideal. Prophets (prophet* and prophecy) repeatedly denounced the perversion of judicial acts, subjected to venality (1 Sm 8:3; Is 1:23; Jer 5:28, 22:17; Ez 22:27; Mi 3:11) and used by the powerful against whom an innocent man was unable to defend himself. Given that improper administration of justice was the hallmark of an iniquitous government (shâfat meant both to judge and to govern), the prophets proclaimed that God himself would establish a higher tribunal to pronounce a judgment against both judges and rulers. Thus, once the mighty had been brought lower and the poor saved, justice would reappear on Earth. Many exegetes have therefore identified the message of the prophets with the proclamation of judgment.

The literary genre (literary* genres in Scripture) characteristic of prophecy (prophet* and prophecy) may be called “judicial discourse” (Gerichtssrede). It should, however, be noted that in order to be able to speak of judgment, a legal structure consisting of three elements is necessary; that is, that two opposing parties must be present. These take on the figures of the accuser (accompanied by his witnesses) and that of the accused (who may have a defender but is often alone). The judge, the third element, stands above the parties; he listens (holds “audience”) and decides (separates good* from evil). But not all legal proceedings in the Bible have this structure. For example, the prophets frequently evoke the procedure of the trial (rib), which was essentially bilateral and thus did not provide for mediation between the accused and the accuser. This process typically took place within the family and was metaphorically applied in circumstances in which covenant relationships were in force. The accuser tried to convince the accused to recognize his wrongs and to recover the conditions of an understanding based on reciprocal respect; but if his words turned out to be futile, he could also turn to punitive means to the extent necessary—always, however, with the intent of reaching a reconciliation. Whereas in the dynamic play of judgment the accuser tended to seek the condemnation of the opposing party, in the logic of the bilateral trial the one who accused, even if he threatened in anger, wished only for the other to confess his wrong so that he might be forgiven.

c) Judgment of God. In the Bible the power of judgment rests heavily on those who also hold another form of authority (political and religious). It is therefore clear that, since sovereignty over the entire world is recognized as belonging to YHWH, the character of a judge is also attributed to him (Gn 18:25; Ex 5:21; 1 Sm 24:13–16; Is 2:4; Jer 11:20; Ps 7:12, 9:5, 82:1).

Of course, the judgment of God does not only apply to the rather limited number of cases of ordeals, where individuals, unable to decide, leave it to chance or to prescribed rituals to decide between guilt and innocence (Ex 22:6ff.; Nm 5:16–28; Jos 7:16–19; 1 Kgs 8:31f.). But Scripture sees the entire history of the human race subordinated to the constant judgment of the God of heaven, who knows all and intervenes whenever people fail to render justice.

The stories of Cain and Abel (Gn 4:9–12), of Sodom (Gn 18:16–33), of the liberation from the Egyptian yoke (Ex 3:20), and the like are examples of the price God attaches to an equitable judgment, to punishing the guilty and to rehabilitating and saving innocent victims. Thus, not only is God’s absolute and impartial justice revealed but also his sovereign concern for the poor. Indeed, he listens to the lament of the weak, and his judgment is equivalent to saving intervention. This explains why the judgment of God and his justice are so often signs of salvation (1 Sm 26:23f.; Is 19:20; Ez 34:22; Ps 7:9, 26:1, 43:1, 54:3). It should also be noted that God’s judgment is often accomplished through warlike actions; a defeat in war is in fact seen as a verdict of condemnation issued by God against the guilty party.

This vision of things, which governs the biblical narration (and not only the Deuteronomist strand) and largely inspires prophetic and omniscient literature, corresponds to the axiom in which “God rewards everyone according to their deeds” (Ps 62:13; Prv 24:12; Jbb 34:11; Eccl 12:14; Rom 2:6). Negative events of individual and collective history are interpreted as the manifestation of the just judgment of God, who punishes faults with rigor. The exile of the people of Israel is to be read as the tragic outcome of a history subordinated to divine judgment, the emblem of an analogous condemnation of all nations (Jer 25).

The metaphor of the judgment of YHWH claimed to explain the meaning of history. However, the doctrine was criticized by various prophetic and intellectual currents, which objected that the wicked prospered in the world while the poor continued to suffer injustice and abuse. The protest of the prophets (Jer 12:1f.; Hb 1:2–4:13; Mal 3:15) and of the suppliants of Israel (Ps 10:13, 73:3–12, 94:3–7 and 20f.) was echoed by the denunciation of the wise (Jb 21:7–33; Eccl 7:15, 8:14, 9:2). Thus, history does not provide an adequate revelation of the divine government of the world. In order to maintain complete faith in a supreme justice that was inherent in human events, the metaphor of the tribunal was displaced to a concluding act of history: judgment became the “last judgment,” or final judgment, the quintessentially eschatological act, which would definitively separate the just from the wicked (Is 26:20f.; Jl 4:1–17; Mal 3:19–21; Dn 7:9–14). The Wisdom of Solomon (5) adopts this line of interpretation. New Testament passages proclaim that the final event of God’s judgment is “imminent” (Mt 3:7–12, 24, 25, and parallel passages).

3. New Testament and Historical Theology

a) The background in the Old Testament, the mishepat of YHWH, is indispensable for any understanding of the preaching of John the Baptist. He too establishes an immediate relationship between the condemnation and the favor of God; no one may feel safe in the face of the coming judgment. Only conversion and repentance, sealed by baptism, give promise of salvation (Mt 3:7–12). If we were to reduce the judgment announced by Jesus to formulas, parables (parable*), and the like, we would lose sight of the fact that the proclamation of the Kingdom of God, like the message of John the Baptist, brings together the idea of unreserved concern for sinners and the idea of their condemnation (see in particular the Sermon on the Mount [Mt 5:22, 26 passim] or the images used in Mt 13:24–30, 47–50 and 24:50f. passim). The measure of this twofold divine justice is the commandment (Decalogue*) of love, which is valid for Jews as well as for Gentiles (Mt 25:32).

Human beings can be saved from divine condemnation by divine forgiveness, which is granted to the sinner without restriction (Lk 15), whatever the gravity of his sin (see Lk 7:36–50; Mt 18:21–35). But man will be saved only if he can also pardon himself with that same unconditional intention to forgive (see Mt 6:14, 18:22 and 35 passim). The Kingdom of God, in which divine judgment is situated, is the future that is being prepared on the threshold of the present, a future that takes form in the words and deeds of Jesus. Although only some exegetes argue that Jesus designated himself as the Son* of man through whom judgment is fulfilled (Mk 14:62), there is on the other hand no doubt that the post-Easter Church* expected that the Christ who had ascended to heaven would return to judge humanity (for the synoptics, see Mt 13:41, 24:31, 24:35–51, 25:31 passim; Acts 10:42, 17:31; 2 Thes 1:5–10; 1 Cor 4:5; 1 Pt 4:5). The one who returns to judge humanity is the savior and the establisher of law* inasmuch as he condemns evil.

This fundamental structure of Jesus’ proclamation, and of the Easter faith in relation to the judgment of God in and through Jesus Christ, is found in various forms in the different corpuses of New Testament. The Pauline writings, through the doctrine of the justification of the sinner, develop the present aspect of judgment and forgiveness worked by God in Jesus Christ. They define justification in relation to the future judgment of God (Rom 2:6) or of Christ (2 Thes 1:7). In the proclamation of the last judgment, Paul calls on many apocalyptic elements, and a comparison of 1 Thessalonians 4:13–5:11 with 1 Corinthians 15:20–58 exhibits the freedom with which he varies these images. The proclamation of salvation and judgment in this context are based on the death and resurrection of the Lord, both harbingers to the resurrection of the dead (see 1 Cor 15:17, 20). The imminence of final events is thus attenuated to some degree. Deutero-Pauline writings (see Eph 2:1f.; Col 3:1–4) more strongly emphasize the present character, already at work, of the mystery of Jesus Christ, although they do not exclude the future dimension. This aspect of judgment is even more strongly emphasized in the Johannine corpus. “He who believes in God is not judged, he who does not believe is already judged” (Jn 3:18). In John 5:24–30 we can see how apocalyptic* language is used to proclaim the present event of judgment, the already given reality of resurrection to eternal life (life*, eternal) and of condemnation. H. Conzelmann comments: “The future dimension is not dismissed but rather made present . . . John is of course acquainted with the expectation of the Parousia* (as of the resurrection and judgment). He does not eliminate it, but integrates it into the present understanding of salvation” (Grundriß der Theologie des NT [Munich, 2nd Ed. 1967]).

The future dimension of judgment certainly appears in John (John 5:28ff., 6:39f.). Entirely similar pronouncements can be found in Acts. Christ brings together the present and future realities of judgment and fulfillment; he is the Lord, and he comes as the Lord. In the Johannine corpus, judgment is understood as condemnation. The believer is not subject to judgment, which affects only “this world” (John 12:31). According to the synoptic Gospels, although those who believed or loved are nevertheless subject to judgment (Mt 25:31), as disciples of Jesus they are also those who exercise judgment with him (see Mt 19:28; Lk 22:30). In the Gospel (Gospels*) of John, in accordance with his interest in the present aspect of judgment, the Church is created by the Holy* Spirit to confound and judge the world (see Jn 16:8, 11).

b) The first formularies of faith in the early Church—like the great majority of Western and Eastern confessions of faith, including the creeds of Nicaea* and Constantinople* (see DH 10–76)—attest to a belief in the judgment of God or in the return of Jesus Christ to judge the living and the dead. Debates about Marcionism*, Gnosis*, millenarianism*, and the doctrine of apocatastasis* (see Constantinople II*, DH 433) gave rise to deeper theoretical developments, in the areas of both ethics and theology. In part, these developments went back to Plato (Apology 40c ff.; Gorgias 523a–527a; Republic X. 614–615d) and were also not distant from the ideas about judgment as held by Plutarch, the neo-Pythagoreans, and the Neoplatonists. The three Cappodocians, especially Basil*, (see Com. in Isaiah I. 43, PG 30. 201), understood divine judgment strictly as the end point of human liberty, so that even one condemned by God acquiesces to the divine sentence. Judgment is thus the advent of liberty to truth. In that way, the freedom of the created being is implicitly conceived not only as the capacity to choose but also as the ability to do good and evil, a thought that in the modern era finds full theoretical expression in Kant and Schelling*.

Latin theology of judgment was later essentially governed by the profound Augustinian synthesis of the eschata or last things (see Civ. Dei XX–XXII) and the more parenetic discussions of Gregory the Great. Both were weighty authorities whom medieval theologians invoked to defend the idea of individual judgment after death, a doctrine that appeared only implicitly in Eastern and early Latin theology, for example in the cult of martyrs and saints. Art and religious practices show how belief in a universal judgment deeply marked spirituality and piety. There is abundant evidence of this in Romanesque and particularly in Gothic churches, as well as in the illuminations produced by monks. At the same time, judgment was one of the principal themes of preaching up to and beyond the Reformation and the Counter Reformation; it also played a central role in literature and plastic art.

The theology of the early Middle Ages up to the 12th century did not undertake a systematic discussion of divine judgment in the framework of the eschata. Such discussion was made possible only in the 13th century, with the development of an anthropology* endowed with a structured conceptual apparatus. Death now represented the threshold through which the soul, after undergoing an individual judgment, acceded to its fulfillment. As a rational principle, the soul found its supreme perfection in the beatific (vision*, beatific) vision: that is, in the immediate vision of divine essence, granted by God without the mediation of any created being. Conversely, damnation was characterized by eternal privation of that vision. The souls in purgatory*, for their part, acceded to the beatific vision only at the end of a period of purification. As for the body, the material principle of the human person, it was inextricably tied to the physical world, but its reality continued beyond the death of the individual (see Thomas* Aquinas, ST IIIa. q. 59. a. 5); this is why it was included in the universal judgment. It would be resurrected for that judgment and then receive its sentence. In this way the theologians of the great medieval period emphasized that a close bond united individual and universal judgment. According to Thomas and Benedict XII, for example, the resurrection and exaltation of the body would bring to the human soul both a quantitative and a qualitative increase in happiness.

This systematization of eschatology brought about a tension between Latin and Eastern theology, because the latter had not undertaken the same conceptual development of anthropology. Whereas the Latin formularies of the early Middle Ages were still content with emphasizing the judgment of Christ “according to works” (see DH 574, 681 passim), the creed of the Second Council of Lyons* already reflected the systematization of Latin eschatology (see DH 856–59). The constitution Benedictus Deus (DH 1000–02) of Benedict XII, intended to correct the sermons of his predecessor John XXII, adopted the doctrine of divine evaluation of individual souls after death, although without using the term judgment, which Thomas was the first theologian to do.

The attribution of judicial power to Jesus Christ was frequently debated in medieval theology. According to Thomas Aquinas, the judiciaria potestas of Christ is based on the fact that, as Son, he is the truth and the work of the Father (ST IIIa. q. 59. a. 1). This power falls to him as a man, as leader of humanity and as author of salvation. For Thomas, judgment was essentially a part of the salvific unveiling of the truth, the truth of man and the truth of history. The three possible sentences of the judgment of God or of Jesus Christ—eternal beatitude, eternal damnation, and purification—are justified in a strictly argumentative mode.

c) Martin Luther argued against this idea of a twofold judgment; he spoke of a sleeping of the soul until the last judgment, rejected the doctrine of purgatory, and understood the judgment of Christ as a condemnation, the antithesis of grace. In Calvin*, with the notion of positive predestination* (see Inst. III. 20–22), these two elements, condemnation and grace, were again placed in an immediate relation to one another, although in a way different from that of the medieval tradition. Moreover, the Protestant polemic against the piety of works denounced with some reason an understanding of indulgences that, in preaching, in popular faith, and even in the theology of the period, often manifested magical characteristics that tended to place restrictions on the sovereign judgment of God and Jesus Christ. In its decree on justification (DH 1545–49, 1582) the Council of Trent characterized Jesus Christ as the “equitable judge” who grants eternal life tamquam gratia...et tamquam merces. That council rejected the principal characteristics of “justice by deeds” and maintained purgatory as the moment of judgment (DH 1580, 1820).

Although Catholic Scholasticism of the baroque period and Protestant orthodoxy presented many common points in relation to the doctrine of universal judgment, Enlightenment thought led theology to concentrate almost exclusively on morality. In this perspective, divine judgment served to strengthen the moral motivation of human beings. The doctrine of judgment disappeared entirely from the dogmas (dogma*) of certain liberal Protestant currents. Despite the reaction of the dialectical theology of Barth*, H. Merkel is able to take note of the uselessness of the concept of judgment in current Protestant theology: “Whoever proclaims the absolutely gratuitous character of grace can no longer grant decisive importance to judgment according to works” (TRE 12, 492). The development of Catholic theology followed other paths. Under the influence of the confrontation with Schleiermacher, German idealism, and romanticism, the school of Tübingen again granted a particular place to eschatology. In his Encyclopedia of Theological Sciences (1834–40), A. Staudenmaier treated universal judgment as an essential moment in the fulfillment of revelation and of the kingdom of God. Conversely, neoscholastic theologians, who did not generally demonstrate a very developed sense of history, saw the traditional doctrine of judgment as a strict calling to judgment of humanity and the world, some of them distinguishing clearly between a period of divine mercy lasting until the death of the individual and a period of rigorous justice beginning after death. This idea was carried to an extreme in the work of J. Bautz, Weltgericht und Weltenende. Im Anschluß an die Scholastik und die neuere Theologie dargestellt (Mainz, 1886). Some Anglican writers, as well as some neoscholastics, had a view of modernity that expressed the expectation, not devoid of apocalyptic tones, of an imminent judgment (see P. Toulemont, “La question de la fin du monde et du règne de Dieu sur la terre,” Études, 1868).

Hermeneutic (hermeneutics*) reflection on eschatological pronouncements (Rahner*), a better articulation of individual judgment and individual eschata with what is said about a universal resurrection and judgment (Y. Congar, M. Schmaus, R. Guardini, P. Teilhard de Chardin), and the attachment of judgment to the domain of soteriology and Christology (Balthasar*, Blondel*), have all given new impetus to recent theological analysis. The Second Vatican* Council, for its part, integrated its articles on judgment into the universal eschatological perspectives of the Christian experience of faith (see LG 48, GS 45).

- M. Blondel (1946), La philosophie et l'esprit chrétien, Paris.
- D. Mollat (1949), “Jugement II. Dans le NT,” DBS 4, 1344–94.
- L. Scheffczyk (1957), “Das besondere Gericht im Lichte der gegenwärtigen Diskussion,” Schol. 32, 526–41.
- K. Rahner (1960), “Gericht,” V, “Systematisch,” LThK (new Ed.) 4, 734–36.
- M. Blondel (1961), Carnets intimes, Paris.
- J.-P. Martin (1963), The Last Judgment in Protestant Theology from Orthodoxy to Ritschl, Edinburgh-London.
- K. Rahner (1965), “Schuld—Verantwortung—Strafe in der Sicht der katholischen Theologie,” Schr.zur Th. 4, Einsiedeln, 238–61.
- J.N.D. Kelly (1968), Early Christian Doctrines, 4th Ed., London, in particular 459–85.
- G. Augustin (1969), “Das Gericht Gottes: Interpretationsversuch zu einem eschatologischen Thema,” Conc(D) 5, 3–9.
- P. Grelot (1971), De la mort à la vie éternelle: Études de théologie biblique, Paris; id. (1974), Le monde à venir, Paris.
- H.U. von Balthasar (1983), Theodramatik IV: Das Endspiel, Einsiedeln, especially 223–337.
- K. Seybold et al. (1984), “Gericht Gottes,” TRE 12, 459–97.
- M. Schmaus et al. (Ed.) (1986 f), HDG IV 7 a–d.
- R. Schaeffler (1987), “Vollendung der Welt oder Weltgericht. Zwei Vorstellungen vom Ziel der Geschichte in Religion und Philosophie,” in H. Althaus (Ed.), Apokalyptik und Eschatologie. Sinn und Ziel der Geschichte, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna.
- W. Pannenberg (1993), Systematische Theologie 3, Göttingen, 656–77.

PETER HÜNERMANN

See also Eschatology; Hell; Kingdom of God; Limbo; Mercy; Parousia; Purgatory

Jurisdiction

The term jurisdiction is of Roman origin. It concerns the exercise of a power or potestas. In canon* law, commentators gave it a more precise definition beginning in the 12th century, a period of a certain renaissance of Roman law. Certain concrete questions arose, and although these questions were admittedly old, commentators used them to articulate tools for legal analysis. Two major problems presented themselves: the validity* of celebrations of the Eucharist and ordinations (ordination*/order) carried out by excommunicated, heretical, or schismatic (schism*) ministers; and the origin of the power exercised by the pope* and the bishops (bishop*) before their consecration. Doctrine relied more and more systematically on the distinction between two powers, one of order, potestas ordinis, the other of jurisdiction, potestas iurisdictionis. The former, which could not be lost, was acquired by ordination and granted the authority to carry out sacramental acts. The latter was given in a canonic mission and authorized the exercise of the power of governing and teaching. In particular it authorized the carrying out of magisterial acts, understood in their jurisdictional sense, which made it possible to impose on the faithful a doctrine that was to be believed or followed. The distinction between the two powers is reiterated in the Code of Canon Law of 1917.

The Second Vatican* Council* made little use of the term jurisdiction. It sought rather to go beyond the duality between order and jurisdiction by endorsing a mode of presentation of the functions of the Church on the basis of a distribution that Catholic theology had used since the 19th century and that had been adapted from Calvin. As priest (priesthood*), prophet, and king, Christ has given a mission to the Church to carry out duties of teaching, sanctification, and government. After Vatican II, Catholic canon law was influenced by this way of presenting the activity of the Church, although it did not abandon the distinction between the power of order and the power of jurisdiction. New theories on the origin of the power of the pope and the bishops have taken shape, because the council was unable to set out with clarity the elements of an acceptable position. The council clearly set forth the sacramentality of the office of bishop and introduced the notion of potestas sacra received in ordination but failed to clarify the efficient role played by the canonic mission. If ordination is the source of the power of the bishops, does the canonic mission simply determine the place in which power is exercised, or does it confer a portion of a power that can be fully acquired only with a canonic mission? A nota praevia attached to the dogmatic constitution Lumen gentium did not answer the questions left unresolved by doctrine.

In the CIC of 1983, the power of jurisdiction is also called “power of government” (potestas regiminis). It may be exercised personally or in the name of another. In this case, power is called personal or vicarious. It may be delegated. The legal categories organizing the power of jurisdiction are described for themselves or on the occasion of the definition of competencies attached to various canonic offices or duties. However, even if the organization of the Church is presented as a structure of duties that may be entrusted to the faithful clergy (cleric*) or laity (lay*/laity), some of these duties are restricted to ordained ministers, and when a competency including jurisdictional power is involved, they are reserved for those who have received holy orders, bishops or priests. Canon 129 of the Latin Code of Canon Law makes an innovation by declaring that faithful laymen may cooperate in the exercise of the power of government. But the use of such cautious terms shows that the principle of a link established between ordination and jurisdiction remains an essential principle of the Church’s organization.

Elements of reflection on the exercise of government in the Catholic Church are to be sought more in relation to the question of pastoral responsibility (cura pastoralis) within communities. In fact this is organized in such a way that the faithful participate in the power that is conferred on the bishop set at the head of a diocese or a priest set at the head of a parish. The canon law that came out of the revision that took place after Vatican II has considerably furthered the implementation of participation in the power of government in the Church. We should also mention the place taken by the movement to increase the prestige of synods (synod*) in the Church, synods in which participation in legislative power is institutionalized. This is true for diocesan synods, ancient institutions of the Church, that have often met in dioceses following Vatican II. With respect to participation in executive power, the law sets out principles to be implemented within the participatory institutions whose competency may be expanded. Through the exercise of this power, the holder of an office is given the possibility of making decisions, but he may also be given the obligation in particular cases of making known the decisions he intends to make in order to solicit advice and consent.

Finally, canon law has set in place mechanisms for the control of the exercise of the power of jurisdiction, the constituent elements of which come from canonic tradition* and from the experience of major state systems. Legislative power is under the control of the Pontifical Council for the interpretation of legislative texts, an organ that has jurisdiction over the entire Church and may receive complaints about the nonconformity of particular laws to universal laws. This recourse to an institution is not possible in the case of universal laws, which remain subject to the principle of discretionary appeal. Executive power may also be subject to control in case of an appeal made against particular decisions considered to be illegal or requiring reparation for a violation of subjective rights. Canon law provides a system of administrative appeals, followed by appeal to an administrative jurisdiction that was established in 1967 and that needs further development in canonic doctrine. Lastly, the exercise of judicial power is itself carried out in a hierarchy of jurisdictions allowing persons who are seeking reparation for rights violated by another member of the Church to present their complaint to a judge or to have a legal fact recognized, as in cases of marriage annulment. This hierarchy of tribunals is ancient and includes diocesan, regional, or interdiocesan tribunals and a tribunal in Rome, the Rota Romana, which judges in the name of the pope and largely functions as a court of appeal.

- J. Gaudemet (1985), "Pouvoir d'ordre et pouvoir de juridiction. Quelques repères historiques," ACan 29, 83–89.
- P. Valdrini (1994) (Ed.), "Charge pastorale et communautés hiérarchiques: Réflexions doctrinales pour l'application du can. 517, §2," ACan, 37, 25–36.

PATRICK VALDRINI

See also Canon Law; Ecclesiastical Discipline; Law and Legislation; Hierarchy

Justice

In our time, justice refers to an ideal of fairness in the distribution of the goods and burdens of society. It is primarily a virtue (virtues*) of institutions and social arrangements; indeed, it is the fundamental moral quality of a society. By contrast, in classical and medieval writings, more emphasis was given to justice as a personal virtue, defined as "a constant and perpetual will to render to each person his due" (Digest I, 1 tit. 1, leg. 10). Of course, justice, so understood, has a social dimension: it is preeminently (although not exclusively) a virtue of rulers and judges.

I. Antiquity

(a) Old Testament. In the Bible, the term that is generally translated as "justice," mishpat, has various meanings. Sometimes, it refers to one of the legal ordinances in the Pentateuch. In other passages, it refers to a custom or ordinary practice and does not necessarily carry a positive moral connotation. Most importantly from our perspective, mishpat can also refer to the right order of society, which may be violated in practice but respect for which is morally obligatory. Used in this sense, it is often paired with çedaqah, "righteousness," and the two together are characteristics of God (e.g., Am 5:24). Both the Pentateuch and the prophetic writings stress that justice includes a special concern for children, widows, orphans, aliens, laborers, and the poor (e.g. Am 5:7–13 and 8:4–8; Mi 6:9–14).

(b) Greece. In Greece during the Homeric era, the word usually translated by "justice," dike, referred to an eternal order of right relations that structured the natural and social worlds. In human society, this order was expressed in a hierarchy of roles, within which each individual found his or her place; the individual's role, in turn, determined either his or her obligations to others and the claims that he or she could make on others and on the wider society. Both gods and human judges were thought to be bound by this order, and the justice of a particular law or judgment was evaluated in terms of its conformity to dike. As Greek society became more urbanized, this model of justice was increasingly called into question; this provides the context for understanding the work of Plato and Aristotle.

In both the Republic and the Laws, Plato identifies justice as one of four qualities that comprise moral goodness; this led to the traditional identification of justice as one of four cardinal virtues (Rep. 4, 433 b–c; Laws 1, 631 d). Plato also internalizes justice, interpreting it as a quality of the soul (soul*-heart-body) in virtue of which the individual's passions* are brought under the control of reason (Rep. 4, 434 d–445 c). Justice is thus presupposed by the other virtues.

Aristotle identifies two senses of justice and injustice. In the wider sense, justice comprises the practice of any virtue insofar as the act in question affects another person. Correlatively, any vicious action that harms another can be considered as a form of injustice (NE 5, 1129 b 1–1130 a 15). In a more limited sense, justice is a specific virtue: it consists in a commitment to render to each person what is due to him in accordance with fairness (NE 5, 1129 a 1–20; 1130 b 30–1131 a 30). That is, neither party to a transaction should benefit more than the other or at the expense of the other (NE 1132 a 10–1132 b 20). In Aristotle's view, this conception of justice as fairness was compatible with a strict social hierarchy because, according to him, persons are naturally unequal (Pol. 1, 1260 a 9–15).

Finally, the Stoic idea of a natural law—the idea of a moral order set by nature and discerned by reason—set the context for reflection on justice well into the modern period. Although this natural law never had one definite, fixed content, for the Stoics it always implied the idea that all persons are equal as moral agents, and therefore that the institutions of society are conventional rather than natural. The idea of natural law, with its corollary notion of natural justice, served as a vehicle for the classical notion of a moral order that is more basic than particular social arrangements and can serve as a basis for criticizing them.

2. Christian Conceptions

(a) New Testament. In the New Testament, God's justice is held up as the standard by which all human conceptions of justice are evaluated. In the synoptic Gospels, this ideal is taken as the basis for a radical critique of human relations, as set forth in the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5:1–6:29; see Lk 6:14–29), in accordance with the injunction, "You must therefore be perfect just as your Heavenly Father is perfect" (Mt 5:48). However, Paul's contrast between the justice of God, manifested in Christ, and human unworthiness has been even more influential for subsequent theology. In Paul's view, the human person is incapable of attaining justice through his or her own efforts, even through obedience to the law (Rom 2:12–29). Justification (dikaiosisune), that is, finding grace before God, can only come through faith in Christ (Rom 5:1–11).

(b) Augustine. Augustine expounds his views on justice in the Civitas Dei (City of God). Taking as his starting point the definition of a republic offered by Cicero (106–43 B.C.), as a community organized around a common good, Augustine argues that neither the Roman Empire nor any other community has ever attained true justice (Civ. Dei 19.21). In order to do so, it would be necessary to acknowledge the true God and to place all other relationships and goods in their proper relationship to God (ibid., 19.21, 23). There cannot be even a true idea of justice apart from God's revelation in Christ. At the same time, Augustine acknowledges that human societies can attain a kind of justice that is not without value, since life would be impossible without it. Accordingly, the Christian can and should give allegiance to earthly societies, so long as he or she recognizes their imperfect and transient character (ibid., 19.5, 6, 17, 26).

(c) Thomas Aquinas. Aquinas (Thomas* Aquinas) accepts the view, shared by civilian jurists and canon lawyers in his day, that there is a natural justice, the demands of which can be known, at least in their broad outlines, by all persons (ST Ia IIae, q. 94, a. 6; IIa IIae, q. 57, a. 2). Thus, in contrast to Augustine, Aquinas believes that a genuine justice can exist even in non-Christian communities, and he argues that Christians are bound by natural justice to respect the legitimate claims of non-Christians (ST IIa IIae, q. 10, a. 12). For Aquinas, too, justice is one of the four cardinal virtues, more specifically, the virtue of the will (ST Ia IIae, q. 56, a. 6; q. 61, a. 2; IIa IIae, q. 58, a. 4). He accepts the traditional definition of justice as the will to render to each his due, in accordance with the norm of equality (ST IIa IIae, q. 58, a. 1, 2, 11). On this basis, he distinguishes between "commutative" and "distributive" justice (ST IIa IIae, q. 61, a. 1, 2). Distributive justice comprises the norms by which society distributes rewards and punishments (punishment*) and imposes obligations on its members. Commutative justice comprises the norms that govern relations among individuals, including norms of non-maleficence; for example, the prohibition against murder, adultery, or theft. Aquinas also incorporates the traditional virtue of epieikeia, or equity, into his account of justice: through this virtue, one acts outside the letter of the law if that is necessary to preserve the intention of the legislator (ST IIa IIae, q. 120, a. 1). The significance of equity for Aquinas can only be appreciated once we realize that, in his view, no moral rule can be applied with absolute certainty in every possible situation (ST Ia IIae, q. 94, a. 4; IIa IIae, q. 47, a. 2, ad 3).

3. Modern and Contemporary Conceptions

In the late Middle Ages and during the Reformation, preoccupation with the notion of justification displaced reflection on justice from the center of theological attention. However, the school of Salamanca (e.g., Suarez* and Vitoria [c. 1485–1546]) offered an exception to this trend, anticipating later doctrines of the rights of man. At the beginning of the modern period, the Stoic-Christian conception of natural law was reformulated into a doctrine of natural rights, and the idea of the rights of man offered a basis for moral claims across social boundaries; it was then a revolutionary element in the political transformation of societies. In the late 18th century and, above all, in the 19th century, it was replaced by utilitarianism* in English-speaking countries.

(a) Contemporary Theories of Justice. In Anglophone political philosophy, A Theory of Justice, by John Rawls (1921–), has the greatest influence. Rawls criticizes the utilitarian conception of social order in the name of a constructivist account that attempts to establish the norms of justice by asking what social rules would be accepted by rational legislators who know nothing about their own particular situation and interests. Rawls argues that, in these circumstances, rational persons would agree to create a social order characterized by respect for fundamental liberties (liberty*); furthermore, social and material inequalities would be justified only to the extent that they generate a higher standard of living for those who are worse off than would be possible in a more nearly equal society.

On the European continent, reflection on justice has been most deeply influenced by the Frankfurt School. Its most influential representative is probably Jürgen Habermas (1929–), whose account of justice is based on his theory of communicative action. Like Rawls, Habermas argues that social norms can only be justified through a process of reasoned discussion, leading to consensus among those subject to these norms. He further insists that this process must take place through public dialogue in which all participants try actively to place themselves in the position of their interlocutors. Unlike Rawls, Habermas believes that a conception of justice can be grounded in something more universal than the particular tradition of liberal universalism, namely, in the universal features of social and linguistic interaction.

Theological reflection on justice has not been wholly detached from philosophical thought on the subject, but it has different priorities. As a result, some issues that are central to political philosophy today have scarcely surfaced in theological discussions, such as the distinction between substantive and procedural conceptions of justice, whereas others are almost exclusively theological, for example, the question of the limits of human societies from the perspective of God's justice.

(b) Problem of Social Justice. Trenchant theological critiques of government policies were a feature of life in both Europe and the United States throughout the early modern period. In the late 19th century, the focus of this criticism shifted to society itself. Within Protestantism*, this new emphasis on society gave rise to “social Christianity” in Europe (e.g., Charles Gide [1847–1932]) and the “Social Gospel” in the United States (W. Rauschenbusch [1861–1918], A Theology for the Social Gospel [1917]). Within Catholicism*, the encyclical Rerum novarum (1891) laid the foundations for what was to become the “social teaching of the church.” The Protestant movements attempted to take Jesus's moral sayings as a basis for a social order characterized by social and economic equality. The encyclical of 1891 was not so radical, but it also attempted to develop a Christian response to social injustice. It was a response to Marxism: it acknowledged the force of Marx*'s critique and offered an alternative model of society in which laborers and owners of capital would work together for the common good.

Protestant theologians were responsive to the social ideas of the movements that we have just mentioned. While the two world wars (war*) disillusioned them, they continued nonetheless to draw inspiration from these ideas well into the middle of the 20th century. Perhaps the most influential Protestant theory of justice is the “Christian realism” of Reinhold Niebuhr (1892–1971), who argued that Christians are morally obliged to work with others to attain the best possible social order, even while acknowledging that any society will necessarily fall short of the ideal of Christian love. The debate between Karl Barth and Emil Brunner (1889–1966) on the possibility of natural justice has also exercised a profound influence on Protestant thought.

Catholic thought drew inspiration from Rerum novarum, expanding Aquinas's categories of justice with a third, social justice, which is concerned with the obligations of society to its members. The most notable figure in the revival of Thomistic political thought (Thomism*) was Jacques Maritain (1882–1973), whose defense of human rights has had a great deal of influence. Maritain should be linked with the German Jesuit O. von Nell-Breuning, who has inspired numerous pontifical documents. More recently, the combination of Marxist elements with Catholic social teaching that constitutes the theology of liberation, with its insistence on reaffirming God’s love for the poor, has sought to mount a radical critique of the global economic order. It has been widely criticized, but some of its ideas have been incorporated into official Catholic teaching, notably the claim that God has a “preferential option for the poor.” This idea certainly has enduring value as a critique of uncontrolled liberalism.

- O. Lottin (1931), Le droit naturel chez saint Thomas d’Aquin et ses prédécesseurs, 2nd Ed., Bruges.

- J. Rawls (1971), A Theory of Justice, Cambridge, Mass.
- C. Bruaire (1974), La raison politique, Paris.
- R. Tuck (1979), Natural Rights Theories, 2nd Ed., Cambridge.
- J. R. Lucas (1980), On Justice, Oxford.
- O. von Nell-Breuning (1980), Gerechtigkeit und Freiheit: Grundzüge katholischer Soziallehre, Vienna.
- J. Habermas (1983), Moralbewußtsein und kommunikatives Handeln, Frankfurt.
- G. Grant (1985), English-Speaking Justice, 2nd Ed., Toronto and Notre Dame, Ind.
- K. Lebacz (1986), Six Theories of Justice, Minneapolis.
- A. MacIntyre (1988), Whose Justice? Which Rationality?, Notre Dame, Ind.
- M. Colish (1990), The Stoic Tradition from Antiquity to the Early Middle Ages, Leyden.
- T. Nagel (1991), Equality and Partiality, Oxford.
- C. Audard (1996), “Justice,” DEPhM, 781–89.

JEAN PORTER

See also Authority; Epieikeia; Justice, Divine; Justification; Law and Christianity; Political Theology; Society

Justice, Divine

The definition of justice (cedâkâh, dikaiosunè) cannot be used as the starting point for an understanding of divine justice because in this case the term is polysemic. In fact, before justice was thematized as a property of the divine essence it was understood or experienced as an action or manifestation of God with respect to human beings (Descamps 1949; Quell-Schrenk 1935). Justice, then, is clearly an attribute related to God (divine attributes*, III). Now the question is to say exactly how they are related.

I. Scripture

a) Old Testament. “The Lord is righteous in all his ways and kind in all his works” (Ps 145:17). This divine justice confessed throughout the Old Testament has, as this verse implies, a double aspect: a legal or judicial aspect of conformity to standards by which the judge rewards or punishes, and an aspect of intervention to deliver and save (Johnson 1987). The latter corresponds to the function of the judge in the ancient Near East, the essential function of the king responsible for establishing peace and prosperity for his people. These two senses mutually imply each other because it is in judging human beings, individually and collectively, that God communicates his salvation* to them.

Firstly then, God is the just judge who does not favor one person over another (carried over in the New Testament, Rom 2:11; Eph 6:9; Gal 2:6; Col 3:25; 1 Pt 1:17; Acts 10:34; Jas 2:1), meaning that he cannot be corrupted (Dt 1:17; 2 Chr 19:7; Jb 34:19). It follows that he does not favor the rich and powerful. On the contrary (Wis 6:1–8), he does justice for the poor, the abandoned, the widow, the orphan, the stranger (Dt 10:18). Consequently, he is called upon in the Psalms*, when one is sure of being in the right: sure, that is, of one’s own “justice” (for example, 7:9–12, 34:18–21, 35:24). But he is also the judge of sin, before whom one admits transgression (Ps 130:3, 51:5f.), and imploring his pardon.

In liberating the oppressed and pardoning the sinner God manifests the fullness of his justice, which is more concerned with salvation than chastisement. This is shown, for example, in the episode where Abraham intercedes on behalf of Sodom (Scharbert 1984). Far from being exclusively punitive (of the oppressor or sinner), divine justice is essentially faithful to the promise and the covenant, gift of salvation, the “communication of grace and glory” (Descamps 1949) within a universalist (ibid.; Aubert 1974) and even a cosmic perspective (ibid.; Pidoux 1954).

b) New Testament. The theme of divine justice is rarely carried over into the non-Pauline texts (Descamps; Aubert), unless from an eschatological viewpoint (Rev 15:3f, 16:5, 16:7, 19:2, 19:11, e.g.). Though Paul also preaches about the last judgment* (Acts 17:31), when one will reap what one has sown (Gal 6:7ff.) and God will “render to each one according to his works” (Rom 2:6), he usually employs the expression “justice of God” in a new sense that it is not always easy to harmonize with the earlier meaning. Here, justice is no longer proper to God, it is the justice he communicates to man “justified by faith” (justification*, Pauline* theology). The theme of redemption by the death* of Christ*, who acquits the debt to divine justice owed by sinful humanity, runs through the whole of the New Testament (Mt 20:28, 26:28; Mk 10:45; Gal 3:13; Eph 1:7; 1 Tm 2:6; 1 Pt 1:18f.; Rev 1:5, 5:9 par. ex., see 1 Cor 6:20, 7:23).

2. Theology

a) The Fathers. Within the Greco-Roman context in which Christianity developed it became increasingly difficult to resolve the latent tension between the two different aspects of divine justice. In that context the Bible was read first in Greek. In the Septuagint (older translations* of the Bible) ḡedâqâh was usually translated by dikaïosunè (ThWAT 6, 922–23), a term that does not (any more than justitia in Latin) convey the idea of a merciful salvific justice (ibid., 923; see ThWNT 2, 197) but rather the Aristotelian concept of distributive justice (see EN 5) (Aubert). If God’s justice consists in rendering to each his due, if one should “only have what one deserves,” how can one hope for salvation and divine life? The massa peccati, to use the words of Augustine, owes an unpaid debt to divine justice (Quaestiones ad Simplicianum, BAUG 10, 480; De diversis quaestionibus, BAUG 10, 274). How then can God’s love and mercy be reconciled with his justice? Almost all the Fathers responded to these questions using a soteriological language: if salvation consists in the fact that Christ paid this debt, then justice and love are profoundly united. Irenaeus, for example, argued against the Gnostic (gnosis*) distinction between a good god and a just god (Adv. Haer. III, 25, 2–5). Divine justice and bounty shine in the redemption that the Word of God gives to humanity by his blood (Adv. Haer. V, 1, 1); God “recovers his own good in all justice and goodness” (V, 2, 1). In all justice because he pays for us the ransom due, instead of using violence, be it against the demon (demons*) (same idea in Augustine, Trin XIII, 14–15, BAUG 16, 314–19; in Gregory* of Nyssa, Oratio catechetica 20–26, PG 45, 55–70). Augustine understands divine justice in the same sense as Paul: “The justice of God does not signify that by which God is just, but that justice which God gives to man so that he will be just by the grace of God” (Homilies on the Gospel of St. John 26, BAUG 72, 482; see Council of Trent*, session 6, ch. 7).

b) Middle Ages. For Anselm*, “God is justice” (existit justitia—Monologion 16) and justice is the very example (ibid.) of those divine attributes that belong by essence to the supreme nature (summa natura). But mercy is also one of those attributes, because we know for sure that God pardons and saves. Highly aware of the problem raised by attributing to God seemingly contradictory properties (as that of justice itself: “can he do an injustice” in sparing evildoers?; Proslogion 9), Anselm resolves the antinomy with recourse to the unity of the divine essence in which all the attributes of the sovereign good* mysteriously coincide. God is just, not in that he treats us according to our merits, but in that he treats us in a manner fitting to what he is: “You are just, not because you render us our due, but because you do that which is worthy of you, Sovereign good” (ibid., 10. Note the same idea in Barth*, KD II/1).

This shift in sense with respect to the ordinary notion of the virtue (virtues*) of justice is found also in Thomas, for whom God, by being just, renders to himself that which he owes himself (ST Ia, q. 21, a. 1, ad 3). This justice is indeed distributive (CG 1, 93), but above all it is fundamental because it consists in “given to each that which is fitting in virtue of his nature.” And it has a cosmic dimension, to the extent that it also constitutes an order of the universe (q. 21, a. 1). There is no opposition between justice and mercy (which are treated in the same question) because mercy is the fullness (ibid., a. 3) of justice. Even more deeply, it is its “root” and “foundation,” because nothing is due to the creature but by the will of his Creator, but everything is given superabundantly, “more than the measure of things demands” (a. 4).

c) Modernity. Apparently the message of Thomas did not persist. Divine justice was reduced to retributive or vindictive justice, with all the problems that entailed for considering justification. When Luther set forth the justice of God in the Pauline and Augustinian sense—the justice that God bestows on us, which he named “passive justice”—it was in opposition to an “active justice” that he regarded as solely a justice of condemnation (e.g., WA 40/1, 45, 25–26; 40/2, 331). This explains why he understood justice as an action of salvation by God, not a divine attribute (Hauser 1974).

K. Barth should be credited with rethinking the unity of mercy and justice, retaining for the latter its proper sense of “distributive justice” (countering modern interpretations, KD II/1). This justice is manifest in the death of Christ as both the chastisement of sin and of the sinner (ibid.): justice is therefore a mercy that saves. Barth is one of the rare theologians of modern times who still posit a justice in God and consequently affirm the seriousness of redemption (§30, 2, 3, e.g.). By being absorbed in mercy, which in fact changes its nature, justice, divine justice is dissolved in it and, without being explicitly denied, today often disappears from the list of divine attributes (Pesch 1995). Perhaps modern thinkers find it difficult to discern the justice of God in creation and in history. After all, as one of them has said, “the vision of justice is the pleasure of God alone.”

- Anselm, Monologion 16.
- Anselm, Proslogion 9–11.
- Thomas Aquinas, ST 1a, q. 21; CG 1, 93.

- Luther, Commentary on Galatians (1531), WA 40/1, Commentary on the Psalm 51, WA 40/2.
- K. Barth, KD II/1, §30, 2.
- ♦ G. Quell, G. Schrenk (1935), “Dikaiosunè,” ThWNT 2, 194–214.
- A. Descamps, L. Cerfaux (1949), “J. et justification,” DBS 4, 1417–1510 (bibl.).
- G. Pidoux (1954), “Un aspect négligé de la j. dans l’Ancien Testament: Son aspect cosmique,” RThPh 4, 283–88.
- J.-M. Aubert (1974), “J. (de Dieu et de l’homme, Justification),” DSp 8, 1621–40 (bibl.).
- R. Hauser (1974), in “Gerechtigkeit,” HWP 3, 330–34 (bibl.).
- J. Auer (1978), “Die Rede der Gerechtigkeit Gottes,” KKD 2, §43, 523–32.
- B. Hägglund (1984), “Gerechtigkeit” I, TRE 12, 432–40.
- H. Merkel (1984), “Gerechtigkeit” V, TRE 12, 420–24.
- J. Scharbert (1984), “Gerechtigkeit” I, 3, TRE 12, 408–11.
- B. Johnson (1987), “Çadaq,” ThWAT 6, 898–924.
- K. Kertelge, O. H. Pesch (1995), “Gerechtigkeit Gottes,” LThK (new Ed.) 4, 504–7.

IRÈNE FERNANDEZ

See also Attributes, Divine; Cosmos; Eternity of God; Immutability/Impassibility, Divine; Judgment; Justice; Justification; Knowledge, Divine; Omnipresence, Divine; Providence; Simplicity, Divine

Justification

a) New Testament. How are people to please God? Or, more specifically, how are they to enter into communion with him? According to Christian theology, this question can only be answered by bearing in mind the following two points. On the one hand, the situation of sin in which human beings are immersed makes them incapable of this communion—they are unable to free themselves from the distorted vision, or from the weakness and the corruption of the will, that the situation imposes on them. On the other hand, God’s liberty is total: he cannot be compelled or even persuaded to act in one way or another. So, if human beings are to find grace in his eyes, it can only be on his account.

As early as the Dead Sea Scrolls, there is reference to God’s acting to enable human beings to enter into communion with him by virtue of his justice (tsedâqâh). Divine justice does not condemn but rather liberates: “Thanks to God’s justice, my justification will endure for ever” (1QS11, 12): “Your justice has brought me into the service of your Covenant*” (1QH7, 19). It is true that the primary sense of the Hebrew words formed from the root ts-d-q is “to acquit,” “to declare innocent”; but it should also be noted that, in the case of a number of the texts from Qumran, God’s action brings about a change in the sinful man and makes him capable of bearing genuine witness to the covenant. So we see arise the complications that would characterize later Christian thinking: was the divine action above all an acquittal (a simple declaration), or was it above all a transformation?

The New Testament usage of dikaion (to justify) and dikaiosunè (justice) does not resolve the problem. In the parable of the Pharisee and the tax collector (Lk 18:14), we see that the tax collector goes home “justified,” in other words innocent in the eyes of God, because he has laid claim to no innocence or virtue (virtues*) of his own; but no conclusion can be drawn as to the effect that this has had upon him. Paul discusses this question at length, particularly in the Epistle to the Romans; he is chiefly concerned with the reasons why God treats us as if we were not culpable, a decision based only on his free choice. Thus we are “justified” by God’s grace manifested in Jesus Christ (Rom 3:24ff.), or by the blood of Jesus stretched upon the cross (Rom 5:9). When we fully acknowledge the divine action, we receive its fruits; it is for this reason that it can be said that we are justified by faith (Rom 3:28, 5:1; Gal 2:16, 3:24). Whoever has confidence in what was accomplished by the death of Jesus is therefore innocent in the eyes of God (Rom 3:26). The later and disputed formula of “justification by faith alone,” the sola fide of some Protestants, is not to be found in these terms in Paul’s writings; and the very expression “justification by faith” must be understood in the context of the whole dramatic scheme set out in Romans and Galatians, in which God, in the person of Jesus, redeems and remits sins. Failing this, there is a risk of forgetting that it is God who has taken this unparalleled initiative.

According to Paul the divine acquittal is the beginning, in history, of a process of transfiguration of humankind, which nonetheless has its origin in God’s eternal foreknowledge (Rom 8:29f.). But this is not his only observation concerning salvation, and it would be wrong to detach this point from his whole conception of it: salvation also includes “glorification” and is achieved in union with the glorified Christ, by participation in his death and resurrection, and by incorporation into his body, the Church. It very soon became clear, however, that the intensity, the excessiveness even, of Paul’s language in Romans and Galatians when he speaks of a “justice” entirely distinct from obedience to the law, could be interpreted in an antinomian or quietist sense; consequently the Epistle of St James strongly opposes the idea that one can be “justified” by faith alone, without avoiding sin and without practicing justice and generosity in human relations (2:14–26).

b) Before Augustine. The question was hardly discussed in Christian literature before Augustine, although Origen* is very close to Pauline* thinking in his commentary on Romans (4:1): “It cannot be said that justice derives from works*; rather it is the fruit of good works which derives from justice”; and this “justice” comes from faith, since it is with respect to those who show proof of their faith that God exercises his power of granting it. Origen also employs dikaion in its less technical but significant sense of “to rectify”

(Against Celsus 4, 7): from this point of view, “justifying” human beings is a matter of making them live in accordance with the rational principle that is within them, and thus with God’s will. Origen aside, few of the Greek Fathers* really dealt with the question. Later Greek catechesis* (in the work of Cyril of Jerusalem or John Chrysostom, for example) generally recognized that human liberty* played a part in the observance of the commandments (Decalogue*) but did not consider that this was the means by which our relationship with God might find its full expression. An excellent summary of the Eastern attitude to the subject is to be found in a work attributed to Mark the Hermit (certainly from the fifth century), On those who consider that they are justified by works: Two hundred and twenty-six texts. Good works act to counterbalance sin and are essentially defined negatively. They make it possible to “retain the purity*” of baptism. But perfection (“justice” or “sanctification”) is a matter of living fully as adoptive sons of God, free from all passion (passions*). It is an inner state resulting from God’s grace alone but which may be prepared for by way of asceticism and attentive prayer. The problem of justification is located here in the typically monastic context of the relationship between praktikè, the active practice of the virtues, and theologia, the gift of inner purity and stability. This is certainly not a very Pauline point of view, but it would be a mistake to see it as mere Pelagianism*.

c) Augustine. Augustine was the first to take the Pauline doctrine seriously in the sense in which Paul himself had conceived it; and despite what is often alleged, the Pelagian controversy was not the sole reason for his absolute conviction of the supreme priority of God’s grace. From his works of the 390s, indeed, he increasingly emphasizes God’s initiative in everything concerning salvation: our will is corrupt and has no freedom, and even when we fleetingly glimpse the good we are incapable of fulfilling it (this point lies at the heart of his theology, as can be seen from the Confessions). It is certain, nonetheless, that the Pelagian controversy led him to formulate more and more energetically the central idea that God, “when he crowns our merits, is merely crowning his own gifts” (Ep. 194:19). Left to its own devices, our will can do nothing to deserve God’s gifts, since it is incapable of turning itself toward him. It must, however, be recognized that for Augustine divine justification is precisely what makes us righteous. To be a righteous person is to fulfill the law; but the fulfillment of the law, according to Paul, is love (Rom 13:10), and this love is the gift made us by the Holy Spirit (Rom 5:5), so that in the last analysis, to be righteous is to participate in the divine life (Treatise 26, 1). For Augustine, justitia is in effect equivalent to caritas: justice thus consists of our incorporation into the body of Christ, and the indwelling of the Trinity within us, by the operation of the Spirit (De Trinitate 15, 18, for example). From a slightly different standpoint, it can also be said that to be righteous is to be in one's place in the universe, since justitia may also denote the balance and interconnection of all things in their proper order and hierarchy (City of God 19, e.g.): to be "justified," then, is to have this just relationship with the rest of creation and with the Creator. Our love must be properly ordered, so that we may take created things for what they are and not for God; the divine life present in the baptized will thus find expression in a measured love of the world. If God is truly present to us, it is impossible to confuse his beauty with the beauty of the world. The inner justice of the divine life is expressed in the outward justice of ordered relations, which demands the exercise of a will that has been redeemed and healed: "He created you without your help, but he will not justify you without your help; he created you without your knowing, he justifies you with the assent of your will" (Fecit nescientem, justificat volentem, sermon 169, 3). It is not that our acts of will bring about our justification, but rather that the process of justification brings about a willed activity on our part. Justification would not be real if it was not expressed in a transformation of the will.

d) Latin Middle Ages. For Augustine, justification was inseparable from a whole series of processes, including our adoption as children of God, our sanctification, and even our "deification." Until the 13th century the Latin West accepted this model, on the one hand attaching great importance to the quasi-identity between the Holy Spirit and justifying and sanctifying grace, and on the other hand approaching the question from the standpoint of the divine presence in the soul (soul*-heart-body). Scholasticism, however, was more interested in the effect produced by that presence. On the basis of observations that Augustine had made in passing on the necessity of expressing our justice through the will to good, it erected the theory of what came to be known as "created grace" (this expression, doubtless derived from the 13th-century Summa Alexandri, is uncharacteristic of Thomas* Aquinas). The "formal" cause of our justification was the sum of the created aptitudes produced in us by divine action and presence. There was not the slightest doubt as to the author of the real initiative: it was God who brought about justification. In concrete terms, however, justification was a transformation—the acquisition of new aptitudes, and the formation of a particular moral and spiritual state. God's grace worked to make us ready to receive his gifts to the full and to ensure that those gifts took root in us. As in Augustine's conception, we can do absolutely nothing by ourselves to deserve divine favor, but grace does not come upon us unawares. There is in fact a preparation for grace, which makes us worthy to receive it. This "merit" that prepares us for supernatural life is itself the work of God within us and is in no way binding on God. At every stage God's action remains free. There is thus a distinction between merit de condigno, in which there is an exact parity between an act and its consequences, and merit de congruo, which is an openness to or a general fitness for God's gifts. In the view of some authors, the second type of merit left mankind with a limited degree of initiative (though it never existed without divine help). Generally speaking, Thomas and the Dominicans limited the role of merit de congruo, while the first Franciscans (Alexander of Hales and Bonaventure* among them) allowed it more scope and considered that there was a predictable relationship between human activity (assisted by grace) and the culmination of God's gift in justification: he who endeavored to do what God inspired him to do had no right to justification but could reasonably hope that God's mercy would not fail him.

In the 14th century, above all among the Franciscans influenced by Duns* Scotus, a much stronger emphasis began to be placed upon the absolute gratuitousness of the divine initiative, to the point that the formal cause of justification was increasingly defined as God's declaration of our state of justice. The habitus created by grace ensued from it, admittedly, and could even be considered as a second formal cause; but, above all, it was never to be seen as the reason for the decision that God took to look upon us with favor. God decided from all eternity that some sinners would be treated as righteous, and that they would be distinguished from other sinners by the fact of receiving the grace to live in supernatural love; but this last decision was not a condition of the first one. God could have decided that the distinction would be quite different. So at the end of the Middle Ages the problem of justification was discussed with the help of the idea of God's "two powers," potestas absoluta and potestas ordinata, the absolute power to do what pleases him, and a power in which he restricts himself and decides that he will "react" in a given way to a given situation. The same emphasis was placed on the priority and liberty of the divine will by William of Ockham, Gabriel Biel, and other supporters of the via moderna in the 14th and 15th centuries and is also found at the same period in the work of numerous theologians of the Augustinian order, for example Gregory of Rimini. All agreed that there was nothing in the life of grace of a created being, with all its resulting faith, love, and so on, to oblige God to accept it. Such a life could, in the abstract, be meritorious on a moral level, but this moral quality had nothing to do with salvation. However, God had decided that he would accept this life. If therefore we lived according to God's law, we could presume that our salvation was probable—with reservations, however, since we never know for certain whether we have observed the law as well as we could have done.

e) Reformation. It is a characteristic trait of late medieval thought to make a complete separation between justification and participation in divine life. For Augustine and for many other older authors, to be acceptable to God entailed living a life that reflected the nature of God; but for the theologians of the via moderna, there was in the life of grace nothing intrinsically connected to the divine nature. It is paradoxical that the two main currents in the Reformation returned to the earlier model, albeit in fundamentally different ways. Luther is faithful to some aspects of the via moderna, in particular to the principle that God alone can be the cause of what God does or decides, but concludes that the principle of our justice must be God *in Christ. Faith grasps the essential and decisive fact that God chooses to regard us as though Christ's justice were our own. This justice remains "foreign" to us—we can never own, cultivate or develop it—and so there can be no question of there being a model of grace inherent to us. It is a mistake, as is generally recognized today, to say that Luther makes justification dependent upon our faith; rather he sees faith as a consequence of justification, which is simply God's decision to ascribe Christ's justice and faith to us. Luther's lectures on the Epistle to the Galatians (early 1530s) offer a powerful conception of the unity of the believer and Christ (by conglutinatio and inhaesio); and this unity is seen as initially dependent upon God's decision, and only later taken up by faith. Christ's justice thus remains forever external to us; however, as faith grasps the reality of the divine decision, we begin to act in a way appropriate to our new status. So our lives reflect the fact that we are accepted by God and also the basis of this acceptance—Christ's justice.

For Augustine and earlier writers in general, justification implied a participation in Christ's justice, and thus in the life of God. For Luther, on the other hand, there is certainly an identity between Christ and ourselves, but it is still dependent upon God's pleasure and never upon anything that might become innate to us. Nonetheless, the Christocentric nature of his theology in this field, and the force of the language* he employ to talk of the effective identity that exists in God's eyes between Christ and ourselves, mean that he is still very close to the patristic tradition. Among the Lutherans of the following generation (Lutheranism*), however, it is the purely juridical character of justification that is highlighted: justification is considered as the remission of a debt without (human) payment. The Latin technical term acceptilatio was often used to convey this (Erasmus* had pointed out that it could denote the decision to consider an unpaid debt as paid, and Melancthon [1497–1560] seems to have taken this as his starting point in order to understand the meaning of the "imputation" of justice); it was distinguished from acceptatio, which presumed that one had actually been paid. So theologians concerned themselves more and more with the way in which Christ pays our debts for us and less and less with what interested Luther, namely the union between Christ and the believer. The latter point was treated in more depth, indeed, within Calvinist theology (Calvinism*). Calvin shared with Luther the conviction that Christ's justice and obedience could be attributed to the believer by virtue of his union with him, which brought with it the gift of sanctification. Christ had "consecrated" or sanctified himself for us, according to the Fourth Gospel (Gospels*) (Jn 17:19; in the Vulgate [translations* of the Bible] pro eis ego sanctifico meipsum), and God considered his justice, his perfect obedience, and his sanctity (holiness*) to be ours, as well as the sacrifice* that he offered for us as our high priest. Other Calvinist theologians put a greater emphasis on the eternal and unconditional acquittal pronounced by God. It was Calvin and John Knox (1505 or 1513–72) who situated both justification and sanctification most firmly in our adoption by God in Christ. Seventeenth-century Protestant thought was almost completely dominated by the idea of the covenant between God and humanity in general (the covenant of obedience to the law promising grace under the old dispensation, and the new covenant in which salvation is promised in exchange for faith in Christ). It offers many echoes of the late medieval speculation on the decisions in which God limits his power, though this theology is increasingly remote from Calvin himself.

f) Counter Reformation. The Catholic reaction to the Reformation was extremely complex, but the Council of Trent's decree on justification (COD 671.681) is actually much closer to Luther and Calvin than to the medieval debate, in particular because it largely abandons the technical vocabulary of Scholasticism in favor of an Augustinian or even Pauline language. Justification is seen as entailing the gift of a new status as adoptive children of God, a gift that remits sins by virtue of incorporation into the second Adam*. Even though baptism is defined as the instrumental cause of justification, it is very clearly stated that it has one and only one formal cause, God's justice, understood as the justice by which he makes us righteous. By linking justification so clearly to the nature of God in actuality, the council was therefore clearly asserting that there could be no created cause of justification. Certainly one could speak of merit de congruo to describe gifts granted before justification properly speaking, but this would be to take the words in their Dominican sense, according to which merit was never effective before the grace of justification. The brevity and the general nature of the Trent decree nonetheless opened the way to many further debates on the relative priority of created and uncreated grace.

The Catholic controversies of the late 16th century show that disagreements concerning justification do not follow denominational lines—some Catholic authors of the period are closer to some Protestant theologians than to their own coreligionists, and more than one of the various theological opinions presented at the Calvinist synod of Dordrecht in 1619 would have met with the complete approval of some Catholics. The pope's condemnation of Baianism (Bañezianism*-Molinism-Baianism) in 1567 was directed against the idea of a grace that would be necessary even to perform actions related to the natural order of things—a much more pessimistic vision of the human condition than Calvin's. But no papal decision came to put an end to the debate de auxiliis that began in Spain at the close of the century between the Jesuits and the Dominicans. The Jesuit position, represented by Molina, gave a major role to liberty in justification: God created conditions that he knew (by his perfect foreknowledge) would be sufficient for a human will to turn to him. The Dominicans, whose most formidable representative was Domingo Bañez (confessor to Teresa of Ávila) (Bañezianism-Molinism-Baianism) maintained that the soul always turned to God as a result of a "physical premotion" of divine grace. The final Roman document on the subject (in 1607) was careful not to take sides; but the later condemnation of Jansenism* was to incline Catholic theology somewhat toward Molinism.

The Anglican theology of this period (Anglicanism*) also underwent a debate on the problem of justification. At that time in England there were supporters of an extreme position that categorically refused any idea of a grace "internal" to the justified soul—a position more extreme than Calvin's and one that led to the conclusion that Catholics were absolutely outside the true Church and excluded from salvation. Richard Hooker (c. 1554–1600) spoke out against these views during the 1580s, which caused him to be regarded by some as a traitor to Protestantism*. But his understanding of the relationship among justification, adoption, and sanctification would to a large extent have met with Luther's agreement as much as Calvin's. He summarizes it in his first sermon on the subject: in this life, the justice that justifies us (that of Christ) is "perfect but not inherent," while the justice that sanctifies us, and that depends entirely upon the first, is "inherent, but not perfect"—it expresses, but neither causes nor influences in any way, the justice by which we are adopted and incorporated into Christ. Anglican theology subsequently evolved at best toward a kind of Molinism, at worst toward what was effectively Pelagianism. The teaching of Newman* (while still an Anglican, 1837) on the subject belongs broadly to this tradition, although it accords great importance to the priority of the divine presence.

g) Modern Times. The religious thinking of the Enlightenment made a fundamental break with Protestantism's central concern and rejected the idea of an absolute priority of divine action in our reconciliation with God, which appeared particularly arbitrary. In Religion Within the Limits of Simple Reason, Kant* ingeniously transposes the idea of justification by a justice not our own onto a moral and individualistic plane: the virtues of a man new born from a free conversion* to moral virtue may be ascribed to the man he used to be before he turned toward the good—a fact that ensures the forgiveness of his sins, since God considers the former man as though he were new and converted. In the same way, once the will has turned toward the good, God regards the newly (even if imperfectly) virtuous person as though he had already attained perfect virtue: he looks on such a person with approval and compensates for his deficiencies. (This is already far removed, however, from the kind of thinking to be found elsewhere at the time, which maintained a strict parity between virtue and reward.) Schleiermacher*'s position resembles Kant's, though it is much more Christocentric: we need a salvation that does not come from ourselves, and this need is fulfilled through the gift of participation or communion in Christ, in whom there is a perfect correlation between moral goodness and divine favor.

The most important contribution to the study of the issue, at the close of the 19th century, was undoubtedly that of A. Ritschl (1888–89), by virtue of the balance he was able to achieve between the objective and subjective aspects of justification. For Ritschl, justification is the pardon granted by God to the sinner, as revealed by Christ, and the purpose of this pardon is to establish a perfectly just society, the Kingdom of God. The goal of justification is thus a moral situation, the existence in the world of a just and peaceful (peace*) community; and in order for this to come about, the freedom and action of the believer are necessary to make manifest God's plan as revealed by the absolution of our sins. Ritschl says little about the way in which the event of Jesus Christ reveals to us the (eternal) fact that God is a forgiving God, and he was criticized for not clarifying the specific nature of God's action in Christ.

Barth approaches the problem of justification in various ways. In his earliest works, particularly the second Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans (1921), he insists that no human virtue, knowledge, or achievement is commensurable with God's justice; on the contrary, the incommensurability is so complete that without grace we would not even know that it existed—without grace, indeed, we would have no criterion of comparison. Moreover, we discover God's justice at the same time as his judgment on all our works, good or bad. It is at the very moment when we hear the devastating “No” pronounced by God upon all that we are, that we also hear the divine “Yes,” since it is at this point that we learn what God is, and who he is—a God who does not hide but who manifests himself. “God's justice is the place where we remain in uncertainty, in other words where it is impossible to remain...the place in which we are entirely in his hands, so that he may treat us as he pleases” (Der Römerbrief [1922], new corr. Ed. 1967).

For God, to reveal himself as just is to reveal his desire for reconciliation. Barth was to say the same in the first parts of the Dogmatics, leading to criticism of the notion of a salvation apparently based exclusively upon a progression in knowledge. In the fourth part, however (see above all §13), the theory is complemented by a reference to the deed of Christ who allowed himself to be judged in our place. By accepting condemnation and even “annihilation” in our place, he in fact showed that there could no longer be any condemnation for anybody and so established a truly new humanity, an objectively new status of communion with the God who has chosen us all in him. The tendency to emphasize knowledge is still apparent but is more clearly linked to the traditional themes of incorporation and adoption.

We owe one of the most important ecumenical contributions on the subject to Hans Küng (1957), in whose view there is no fundamental difference between Barth's theory of justification (or those of the great reformers) and the teaching of the Catholic Church. The pronouncements of Barth and the reformers on faith in justification would be more meaningful, in general, if they were interpreted in the context of the Catholic doctrine of hope: we put our trust in God to look upon us in the light of his eschatological plan. This concern for eschatology is evident in the declaration on “justification by faith” that emerged from the Lutheran-Catholic dialogue of 1983 (in the United States) and in the document Salvation and the Church produced by ARCIC II (1987). These texts prove that Catholics and non-Catholics are able to agree on key aspects of the doctrine and to recognize in particular that the community of believers, while it exists in via, is nonetheless able to proclaim and realize sacramentally the sanctity of Christ on which it is based. Contemporary Protestantism increasingly recognizes that the idea of sanctification within the Church, or even through the community and sacramental life of the Church, does not put God under any “obligation” toward it. Contemporary Catholicism, moreover, is increasingly prepared to incorporate into its theology a consideration of the sins of the Church throughout history and to accept that Christ's justice, celebrated and made present and effective in the sacraments (sacrament*), is nonetheless given in an entirely gratuitous and unconditional way.

- A. Ritschl (1888–89.), Die christliche Lehre von der Rechtfertigung und Versöhnung, 3rd Ed., Bonn.
- K. Barth (1922), Der Römerbrief, Munich (new corr. ed., Zurich, 1967).
- K. Barth (1953), KD IV/1 (Dogmatique), Geneva, 1966–67).
- F.J. Taylor (1954), The Doctrine of Justification by Faith, London.
- H. Küng (1957), Rechtfertigung: Die Lehre Karl Barths und eine katholische Besinnung, Einsiedeln.
- J. Chéné (1961), La théologie de saint Augustin: Grâce et prédestination, Le Puy-Lyon.
- W. Joest (1963), “Die tridentinische Rechtfertigungslehre,” KuD 9, 41–59.
- T.F. Torrance (1965), Theology in Reconstruction, London.
- O.H. Pesch (1967), Theologie der Rechtfertigung bei Martin Luther und Thomas v. Aquin, Mayence (3rd Ed. 1985).
- O. Loyer (1979), L'anglicanisme de Richard Hooker, Lille.
- O.H. Pesch, A. Peters (1981), Einführung in die Lehre von Gnade und Rechtfertigung, Darmstadt (2nd Ed. 1989).
- J. Reumann (1982), Righteousness in the New Testament: Justification in the United States Lutheran-Roman Catholic Dialogue, Philadelphia.
- E.P. Sanders (1983), Paul, the Law and the Jewish People, Philadelphia.
- G.H. Tvard (1983), Justification: An Ecumenical Study, New York.
- H. Anderson et al. (1985), Justification by Faith (Lutherans and Catholics in Dialogue, vol. 7), Minneapolis.
- A. McGrath (1986), Iustitia Dei. A History of the Christian Doctrine of Justification, 2 vols., Cambridge.
- K. Lehmann, W. Pannenberg (Ed.) (1987), Lehrverurteilungen-Kirchentrennung?, vol. 1: Rechtfertigung, Sakramente und Amt im Zeitalter der Reformation und heute, Freiburg-Göttingen.
- K. Lehmann (Ed.) (1989), Lehrverurteilungen-Kirchentrennung?, vol. 2: Materialien zu der Lehrverurteilungen und zu Theologie der Rechtfertigung, Freiburg-Göttingen.

U. Kühn, O. H. Pesch (1991), Rechtfertigung im Disput, Tübingen.
M. Beintker et al. (1995), Rechtfertigung und Erfahrung, Gütersloh.

See also Augustinianism; Choice; Indulgences; Judgment; Knowledge, Divine; Mercy; Nature; Predestination; Puritanism; Wrath of God

ROWAN WILLIAMS

Justin. See Apologists

K

Kant, Immanuel

1724–1804

To begin with, one must examine the concept of religion as it is presented in Kant's work. This will serve to reveal that which may be of interest to theology* in Kant's thought and also to understand the significance of his actual influence upon Christian theology.

a) The Kantian Notion of Religion. "Religion is the recognition of all our duties and of divine commandments." The first appearance of this definition can be found in the Critique of Practical Reason (1788, AA V, 129). It would continue to be valid, above all in the two major works devoted to religion: Religion Within the Limits of Reason Alone (1793) and The Conflict of the Faculties (1798). It hinged upon that which the Critique of Practical Reason called the "primacy of practical reason*" (AA V, 119), which referred on the one hand to the theological attitudes adopted in the Critique of Pure Reason (1781–86) and on the other to the major features of the theology contained in the Critique of Practical Reason.

This primacy comes at the expense of theoretical reason, whose aim to know, supported by proof, fails when the idea of God* is in question. Such knowledge is indeed restricted to the phenomenal object, given to sensibility, and of which we can henceforth dispose, a last feature that suffices to make one understand why a proof (existence* of God, proofs of) of God's existence is out of the question. Moreover, one must be able to think of God, something that can only be done on the basis of our knowledge, which is still linked to sensibility. Kant would develop an analogous use of the idea of God, which he did not hesitate to describe as anthropomorphism* (AA III, 457–59). The main thing was in fact to not remain limited to deism (deism*/theism) (the "Supreme Being") and to move on to theism, to the affirmation of the personal God, which implies an analogy* with the human person*. The theology of the Critique of Practical Reason is double. On the one hand, the moral obligation present in the conscience* of moral law* (the "categorical imperative") does not need a theological foundation, as moral law is henceforth autonomy (that in which reason recognizes itself). But if one's relation with God does not precede duty and its fulfillment, it is nevertheless called upon an exigency contained in the moral imperative itself, that of the possibility of an achievement, the "sovereign good*", where accomplished virtue (virtues*) and happiness are joined. (Critique of Practical Reason, AA V, 110–13). This amounts to "postulating" the immortality of the soul (soul*-heart-body) and the existence of God, object of a "faith* of reason" (Critique of Practical Reason, AA V, 142–46).

Religion Within the Limits of Reason Alone, in a first stage, expounds upon a religion of reason, transcribing original sin* into a radical evil* and setting forth in Christ* "the idea of a man who is pleasing to God" (AA VI, 62–63). In a second stage, moral law, taken from the violence* of history*, demands to become, as a law of liberty*, the law not only of individuals but also of the group. This is equivalent to setting up a legislator of inner law, one who “scrutinizes hearts,” as the link of “people* of God under ethical laws” (AA VI, 98–100). One must read it as an interpretation of the *Church.

b) Christian Theology. The problem stated is that of a rationalization of religion reduced to morality (a reduction with no trace of the Pietism* in which Kant was raised). It would be found again all through the theological reception of Kant, with some notable differences, however, between Protestant theology (Protestantism*) and Catholic theology (Catholicism*).

Protestant reception began during Kant’s lifetime, and the debate was centered upon the “religion of reason.” Its moral interpretation, which placed the value of the act (action*) first of all in respect for the law, and not in “works*,” refusing any “merits,” was an explicit acknowledgment of the Gospels* (Critique of Practical Reason, AA V, 81–83) and was consonant with the ideas of Martin Luther*. But it would be too easy to view it as a departure from biblical revelation*. One might be reminded of Schleiermacher*, who initially leaned toward Kant but later moved away from his ideas when he turned toward a hermeneutic (hermeneutics*) theology. Of note, in the era of neo-Kantism, are the works of Albrecht Ritschl (1822–89), who insisted in particular on the socio-political dimension of Kant’s religious writings. With Karl Barth*, dialectical theology would be opposed to such a position and would firmly refuse any reduction of the Word* of God to a moral or political attitude.

It is remarkable that on the Catholic side the debate moved from the notion of religion toward its foundations, the critique of the proofs of God’s existence, and the morality of autonomy. During Kant’s lifetime, it was in southern Germany that supporters and adversaries confronted each other. In the 19th century, Georg Hermes (1775–1831) would firmly uphold a dogmatic* theology that preserved, from Kant’s work, the dignity of the person and his analyses of faith. Rome* banned the teaching of Hermes’s ideas in 1835. The negative image of Kant would characterize the beginnings of Neoscholasticism at the end of the century. A change of great significance occurred in the first half of the 20th century, when the Belgian Jesuit Joseph Maréchal (1878–1944) published Le point de départ de la métaphysique, notebook 5, Le thomisme devant la philosophie critique (Brussels-Paris, 1949). This work introduced Kant in order to accomplish the initial aims of Neoscholasticism: a return to Thomas* Aquinas, but taking modernity into account—something that could not be done if Kant were merely an adversary. Kant’s a priori was reexamined within the framework of the Thomist “formal object”; access to the being* was maintained, however. Development within a German context was enriched by the contact with Heidegger*, as with J.-B. Lotz. It was in this fertile ground of “transcendental Thomism” that Rahner* was educated, and this fact alone is proof of the movement’s fertility.

c) Theology in a Plural World. The above remarks, both from a Protestant and a Catholic point of view, show that Kant can still provide “food for thought” to the theologian. It is no accident that Catholic reception, undoubtedly more hesitant than the Protestant one, found its most fertile development when, with Joseph Maréchal, it discovered in Kant one of the most radical interrogations of Christian thought, that of the possibility of being human, in the understanding and accomplishment of the moral imperative, without first making the relation to God explicit.

Kant’s Critique of Judgment is exemplary: There Kant acknowledges the full moral sense of the atheist and concludes that in order not to lessen the transformative power of moral law, he will become a “believer from a practical point of view” (§91, AA V, 469–70). This is the radical proposal that a plural world* is possible, one that will form a whole despite the radical differences in religious options. The “practical point of view” means that no confession* of faith can be separated from an exchange among freedoms. No idea about God can be anything other than the act of free thought, which does not exclude the fact that it is committed to ties of solidarity* that may be those of a Church.

Kant did not find his inspiration from theologians: his reexamination of incarnation* is poor and is in strong contrast to the treatment given by Hegel*. It was rather to Scripture that Kant returned. He knew how to give it the status of a reading, as in the appendix to the first section of the Conflict of Faculties. In this capacity, Paul Ricoeur belongs to the best Kantian tradition in his programmatic aims: “Symbols make us think,” a long path to follow, where Kant is merely a starting point.

- (1922), Kant’s gesammelte Schriften herausgegeben von der königlich preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften, Berlin-Leipzig (AA).
- Kant-Bibliographie 1945–1990*, Ed. M. Ruffing, Frankfurt.
- ♦ K. Jaspers (1952), “Le mal radical chez Kant,” Deucalion 4, 224–52.
- P. Ricoeur (1960), La symbolique du mal, Paris.
- J.-L. Bruch (1968), La philosophie religieuse de Kant, Paris; id. (1969), Kant. Lettres sur la morale et la religion, Paris.
- O. Reboul (1971), Kant et le problème du mal, Montréal.
- R. Malter (1980), Das Reformatorische Denken und die Philosophie, Luthers Entwurf einer transzendental-praktischen Metaphysik, Bonn.

F. Marty (1980), La naissance de la métaphysique chez Kant: Une étude sur la notion kantienne d'analogie, Paris.

H. d'Aviau de Ternay (1986), Traces bibliques dans la loi morale chez Kant, Paris.

FRANÇOIS MARTY

See also Agnosticism; Ethics; Ethics, Autonomy of; Hegel, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich; Kierkegaard, Soren Aabye; Knowledge of God; Rationalism; Reason; Schleiermacher, Friedrich Daniel Ernst

Kenosis

1. Scriptural Basis

The term kenosis, coined by the Greek Fathers of the Church* from the verb kénoō, “to empty” (hence, used reflexively, “to empty oneself of oneself”), derives from an expression in the hymn of Philippians 2:7. The naming of Jesus* as Lord (2:9) is preceded by a sequence describing the humbling of the man who was “of divine condition” (2:6). His elevation comes at the end of a descent and an annihilation (heauton ekenôsen) that takes him, because of his obedience, to his death* on the cross. The entire event of Jesus is the outcome of the free initiative of the man “who was not considered as a victim, but as equal to God” (2:6), who chose the “condition of servitude.” Whether this text refers to the Son before his incarnation (following the ancient tradition*) or in Jesus as incarnate (following the majority of modern exegetes), pre-existence is understood. Jesus comes from God and returns into the glory* of God, after having divested himself in a human existence. In the Gospel of John, Christ*’s journey is also represented as a dramatic descent and ascension. The path he follows begins in heaven (1:1f.) and leads him to earth (1:11f.) and eventually to the cross (19:17f.); there follows the reascension of the Risen One in his earlier glory. According to the prologue of John, the divine Word has become flesh (1:14); however divine the Word may be in God, its presence in the “flesh” is nonetheless absolutely real. The originality of the Johannine contribution lies in the sharpness of this contrast. In Greek thought, indeed, there can be no stronger contrast than that between logos and sarx.

2. Revival of the Theme in the Fathers of the Church

The problem of kenosis remained misunderstood in gnosticism*, which attributed to the Word as only an apparent body; in Arianism*, which denied the equality of being* between Son and Father; and in Nestorianism*, which emphasized the “promotion” of a man to the dignity of man-God. In its struggle on these three fronts, orthodoxy had to tread a fine line: it had to avoid defending divine immutability* in such a way as would have implied a sheltering of the Word from a real event, and on the other hand it had to avoid falling into an immediate affirmation of a change in God. A first fundamental idea was used by Athanasius* against Arius and Apollinarius, by Cyril* against Nestorius, and by Leo against Eutyches: the divine decision that the Word should become man indicated a genuine humbling. For God, the Incarnation is not an “increase” but an emptying, an exhaustion. Hilary* went a step further. He sees everything as taking place by virtue of the sovereign liberty* of God, who, while dwelling in himself, has the power to lay his glory aside (De Trin. VIII. 45; PL 10. 270). If the two forms were simply compatible (as the three Doctors of the Church* previously mentioned thought), nothing would occur in God. For Hilary, the subject no doubt remains the same; but between the form of slave and the form of glory there is the “disposition to annihilation” (ibid. IX. 41; PL 10. 314 B), which does not change the Son of God but signifies the action* of “internally ridding himself of power” (ibid. XI. 48; PL 10. 432 A). The only thing lacking in these arguments is the Trinitarian dimension. The eternal condition for the possibility of the kenosis of the Incarnation indeed lies in the tri-personal gift. For divine “power” (omnipotence*, divine) is so constituted that it can contain within itself the possibility of an emptying of self, such as is represented by the Incarnation and the cross.

3. Modern Theological Essays on Kenosis

There is a common distinction between 1) a theory improperly called a theory of kenosis, and 2) kenotism properly speaking.

a) In the 16th and 17th Centuries. Lutheran kenosis of the period had as its basis the concept of the “communication of idioms*” adopted by Luther*. According to him, certain attributes* of the divine nature of Christ become attributes of human nature. Later there was discussion of an “attenuation” or kenosis of these “divine” attributes in humanity, so as not to alter their divine character. The school of Giessen, under the influence of M. Chemnitz (1522–86), taught that Christ possessed divine majesty in his humanity and during his earthly life but customarily refrained from using it. It was only upon his glorification that he would make full use of that majesty. The theologians of Tübingen*, on the other hand, following J. Brentz (1499–1570), contended that Christ had never renounced the use of his divine attributes, but that he had only hidden them for a time, “according to the economy.” They criticized their opponents for abandoning Lutheran principles in favor of the Calvinist doctrine known as the extra, according to which, throughout the time of the Incarnation, the government of the world was to be entrusted to the Word considered separate from its flesh. Whatever the divergences among these theories, for them, kenosis has a direct effect on humanity. They consider the exaltation and the humbling of Christ with respect to his human nature alone and not a humbling of the Son of God himself. Hence, they do not touch on the central point of kenosis.

b) In the 19th and 20th Centuries. The 19th-century German theorists of kenosis wrote under the influence of Hegel*, for whom the absolute subject, in order to become concrete and for-itself, becomes finite in nature and in the history* of the world. Unlike the schools of Tübingen and Giessen two centuries earlier, the subject of kenosis is no longer he who became man, but he who becomes man, the divine Word himself. This represents a “self-limitation” of the divine (G. Thomasius, 1802–75). The Word abandons the attributes related to divinity, which concern the Trinity* considered in its relations with the world* (omnipotence, omniscience, omnipresence*) but not the absolute attributes of the immanent Trinity (truth*, sanctity [holiness*], love*), which, far from being emptied out, are revealed in the Incarnation. F. Frank (1827–94) spoke more radically of a self-degradation of the consciousness of the eternal Son into a finite consciousness of self; the Son made man, however, has the consciousness of being the Son of God. For the Calvinist W.F. Geß (1819–91), an incomprehensible lacuna even interrupts the course of divine life: the Word made man gives up the immanent properties of God and his eternal consciousness of self. He recovers the latter only gradually, through his human experience (notably through a reflection on the prophecies [prophet* and prophecy] concerning himself); once glorified, he recovers his divine attributes and divine functions.

The “kenotic torrent” found in Anglican theology between 1890 and 1910, no doubt stimulated, under the influence of T.H. Green, by Hegel, constitutes an independent, more cautious, and less speculative attempt to reconcile patristic theology* with the earthly realism of the man Jesus, as highlighted by scholarship on the Gospels*. Ch. Gore (1853–1932) accepts a mitigated kenosis, refusing to divide divine attributes and to posit a metamorphosis in God. According to him, the Word does not abandon his attributes but limits their use; in the act of his Incarnation, he restrains his omnipotence and refuses omniscience; he limits himself only in relation to the sphere of his individual humanity. But as Creator he retains the full use of all his attributes. Gore is thereby forced to posit two vital centers of consciousness in the Word according to his divine nature. The duality for which Scholasticism* had been criticized is here not distributed according to the two natures but conceived as a psychological division in the divine nature and hence in the divine person* himself. F. Weston (1871–1924) tries to harmonize the conception of the councils (council*) with a psychological idea of the person. Arguing against Gore, he asserts that there is in Christ only a single consciousness of self; he accepts, however, two volitional and intellectual faculties, one dependent on the other. Through the Incarnation the Word limits the use of his divine attributes so that they are always conditioned by the status of his humanity.

Kenotism also made its way into Russian Orthodoxy. V. Tareev (1866–1934) develops the idea that creation* itself is a kenotic action. But his most original ideas bear on the temptations (temptation*) over which Christ triumphs by ratifying his kenotic status; this very ratification brought about a deeper ordeal for his “faith*.” According to S. Bulgakov (1871–1944), there is a divine kenosis in the Incarnation only because there is a kenosis in the Trinity as a whole and a divine kenosis in creation. The kenosis in the Trinity consists of the mutual love of the divine persons, which goes beyond any individuation. The creation situates God in time* and involves for him a certain risk of failure. The kenosis of the Incarnation is located principally in God, in the Word’s will to love (it is the infinite* who limits himself). The Word ceases to be subjectively a divine hypostasis, while remaining such in his objective being. As incarnate Word, he becomes conscious of his divine filiation* only in accordance with his human and gradually developed consciousness of self. The Father and the Holy* Spirit participate in the eternal kenosis of the Incarnation, as well as in the historically accomplished kenosis that takes Christ to his death. It seems possible to strip Bulgakov's basic conception of its sophiological presuppositions and of the Gnostic temptation that leads him to think that the historical cross is merely the phenomenal translation of a metaphysical Golgotha.

4. Presence of the Theme in Philosophy

Nineteenth-century kenotism would probably not have existed without the impulse of Hegelian philosophy*. Hegel thereby returned to theology what he had borrowed from it. An intense kenotic schematism is at the heart of his system: the absolute Idea empties itself like the Word. It was Hegel who gave philosophical credentials to the term Entäußerung, the translation of kenosis in Luther's Bible*. In The Phenomenology of Mind the term reveals all its spiritual scope only in the representation of the Absolute Spirit, religion*. It evokes the dual movement of substance becoming self-consciousness and self-consciousness becoming universal being. The redemptive incarnation of the Word appears as the Entäußerung of absolute essence, which emptying itself of itself, leaves nothing unrelated to the accomplishment of its kenosis. The Entäußerung of Absolute Spirit implies a disappropriation of finite consciousnesses; but this abnegation does not estrange consciousness from itself. By stripping itself of itself, consciousness accedes in truth, according to Hegel, to its most authentic essence. One might, however, fear that Hegel reduces religious representation of kenosis to a sort of speculative allegory. Schelling* more fully preserves the positive content of Christianity. He offers an original conception of kenosis. The Incarnation reveals true divinity, and kenosis, as a divestment of the divine glory acquired in the course of the mythological process, removes from the Word only a fallacious glory. Unlike Schelling, Kierkegaard* does not identify incarnation and kenosis. His kenotic theory touches on the mode of the Incarnation, an incessant self-emptying of the Word as he places himself within the reach of created beings. It does not bring about an eclipse of divinity.

On the other hand, the Christ of Baron F. von Hügel (1852–1925) is immersed body (soul*-heart-body) and soul in human obscurity: kenosis obliterates his consciousness of his own divinity. Blondel* protests that his divine consciousness could at no point have deserted Jesus Christ and that exinanition is purely mercy and charity. It resides in the “stigmatizing sympathy” through which Christ experiences human suffering. Christ does not know himself as God otherwise than by identifying himself with human beings through love. Humanity, the humanity of all of us, serves as “a screen for his,” which would otherwise be set ablaze and consumed by the flame of divinity. The divine union of the man Jesus is also a deadly embrace. But “the vessel of his humanity” is “dilated by divinity.” For S. Weil (1909–43), the divine attitude that dictates his conduct to the created being is thoroughly kenotic. The Creator has withdrawn in order to allow us to be. God has gone to an infinite distance. “This infinite distance between God and God, supreme rift . . . marvel of love, is the crucifixion” (Weil 1950).

5. General Assessment

Christology (Christ* and Christology) must take seriously the fact that God himself, in the Son, abased himself while remaining entirely God. In his total powerlessness, in the mortal distress of the Crucified One, is found undiminished the full divinity of God. God's humiliation shows the superabundance of his power; grandeur “allows itself to be perceived in baseness without being impaired in its exalted condition” (Gregory* of Nyssa, PG 45. 64 D). As God's renunciation of self, kenosis depends on sovereign divine liberty* (Hilary), which excludes any conception according to which the process is natural and Gnostic or logical and Hegelian. The problem of the true humanity of Jesus only arises when his true divinity is maintained; one cannot therefore deduce from kenosis that Jesus was ever in a really sinful condition. To link the extremes, reference may be made to the theme of “The sacrificial lamb since the creation of the world” (Rev 5:6–9 and 12, 13:8), which must not in any way be conceived as a heavenly sacrifice* independent of Golgotha but as the historical sacrifice offered on the cross considered from the point of view of eternity. The heavenly sacrifice of the Lamb binds together the world and God; in him, creation and redemption intersect. The cross “reveals a mystery* of divine life itself” (Temple 1924, 262). God alone goes to the very end of the abandonment of God. It is therefore appropriate to consider kenosis in three perspectives. Its ultimate presupposition is the “disinterestedness” of the persons (as pure relations) in the intra-Trinitarian life of love. Then, with the creation, a fundamental kenosis takes place because God, from all eternity, assumes responsibility for the success of creation and, in anticipation of sin*, takes into account the cross. Finally, in the sinful world, the redemptive Passion of Christ begins at the moment of his Incarnation. And since the will to redemptive kenosis is an indivisibly Trinitarian will (Bulgakov), God the Father and the Holy Spirit are deeply engaged in it (Balthasar* 1969).

• G. Thomasius (1853, 1857, 1861), Christi Person und Werk, 3 vols., Erlangen.

Kenosis

- F. Frank (1878–80), System der christlichen Wahrheit, Erlangen.
- W. Geß (1887), Das Dogma von Christi Person und Werk, Basel.
- Ch. Gore (1891), The Incarnation of the Son of God, London.
- F. Weston (1907), The One Christ, London.
- P. T. Forsyth (1909), The Person and Place of Christ, London.
- W. Temple (1924), Christus Veritas, London.
- S. Boulgakof (1943), Du Verbe incarné, Paris.
- S. Weil (1950), Attente de Dieu, Paris.
- ♦ F. J. Hall (1898), The Kenotic Theory, New York.
- O. Bensow (1903), Die Lehre von der Kenose, Leipzig.
- N. Gorodetsky (1938), The Humiliated Christ in Modern Russian Thought, London.
- J. St. Lawton (1947), Conflict in Christologies, London.
- P. Henry (1957), “Kénose,” DBS 5, 7–161, especially 136–58.
- P. Althaus (1959), “Kenosis,” RGG3 3, 1244–46.
- A. M. Ramsey (1960), From Gore to Temple, London.
- D. G. Dawe (1962), “A Fresh Look at the Kenotic Christologies,” SJTh 15, 337–49.

- P. Lamarche, Y. Congar (1967), “Kénose,” Cath 6, 1399–403.
- R. P. Martin (1967), Carmen Christi: Philippians II 5–11 in Recent Interpretation and in the Setting of Early Christian Worship, Cambridge (bibl.).
- H. Urs von Balthasar (1969), “Mysterium Paschale,” MySal III/2, 133–326.
- M. Lienhard (1973), Luther témoin de Jésus-Christ, Paris.
- X. Tilliette (1975), “L’exinanition du Christ: théologies de la kénose,” Les Quatre fleuves 4, 48–60; id. (1986), La christologie idéaliste, Paris; id. (1990), Le Christ des philosophes, Paris.
- E. Brito (1983), La christologie de Hegel, Paris.

EMILIO BRITO

See also Anglicanism; Calvinism; Christ’s Conscientiousness; Hegelianism; Hypostatic Union; Johannine Theology; Lutheranism; Modernism; Orthodoxy, Modern and Contemporary; Pauline Theology

Kerygma. See Creeds

Kierkegaard, Søren Aabye

1813–1855

1. Life

In Kierkegaard’s lifetime, Denmark began a process of modernization and liberalization that brought into question the traditional sources of authority in church (church* and state) and state. The period of his youth also coincided with the “golden age” of Danish literature, a time of high idealism that was followed by a more materialistic and even cynical reaction. Kierkegaard himself defended the values of the older generation on many occasions. His critique of Hegel* has extensive affinities with the critiques developed by older Danish philosophers, such as P. M. Møller or F. C. Sibbern. A common theme is the absence from Hegel’s system of a distinctive sense of individual personality (human and divine) and an incorrect understanding of the relationship between logic and life. Yet Kierkegaard also flirted with Danish Hegelians (Hegelianism*), such as J. L. Heiberg, whose influence was particularly marked in Kierkegaard’s formalistic view of art. His own writings also reflected the doubts of the 1830s and 1840s and were themselves to culminate in an attack on the church/state establishment.

Kierkegaard’s father bequeathed him a melancholy but deeply religious outlook. A brief engagement (1840–41) to Regine Olsen seemed to promise him a normal life, but a combination of his sense of guilt and something on the order of a religious vocation led him to break the engagement and commit himself entirely to his writing. After completing the pseudonymous books that made his reputation, he became involved in a bitter controversy with a satirical journal, The Corsair (1846), and this led to his increasing isolation. In the last year of his life (1854–55), he published a series of tracts bitterly attacking the established church for its compromise with worldly values.

2. Thought

Kierkegaard's works can be divided into four: the pseudonymous works, the religious discourses, the literary and other works published under his own name, and the extensive journals, published posthumously. Kierkegaard's influence is directly associated with the pseudonymous works. However, he both distanced himself from the views expressed in these works and asserted the distinctiveness of each pseudonym: it is therefore an open question as to how far his thought can be understood as offering a systematic view of things. Even the threefold schema of the aesthetic, the ethical, and the religious is only one way of organizing the complexity of his work. It should also be acknowledged that much of the impact of Kierkegaard's work is due to the parables, stories, and aphorisms that it contains and to its elements of satire, irony, and humor, all of which are used to disrupt the reader from a simple intellectual approach of its fundamental themes. Nonetheless, it is possible to group much of his work around two such themes: the problematic nature of human liberty*, and the qualitative transcendence of God*. The elliptical path of his writing around these two points makes it possible for us to see him as the forerunner of both Bultmann* and Barth*. It remains an open question as to which is decisive or whether they are both held in a tensile balance.

a) Anthropology. The Concept of Anxiety is a psychological exploration of original sin*. Seeing the prelapsarian state of human beings (Adam*) as one of innocence, he draws attention to the curious phenomenon of nothingness*, the correlate of the subject's potential freedom that has as yet no object. In anxiety at its own freedom—the openness of its future—the subject “grasps at finitude” and submits itself to all the sexual and other compulsions. Thus, although “subjectivity is truth,” as “Johannes Climacus” (one of Kierkegaard's pseudonyms) states, the subject exists in untruth, as a failed project. This failure, called “despair,” is analyzed in Either/Or as it appears in various forms of aesthetic existence, building on his dissertation On the Concept of Irony, where he had unmasked romantic idealism as a solipsistic flight from the claims of ethical reality. In Two Ages, the focus is on collective forms of failure: idle chatter, envy, association, cowardice, leveling—all the characteristics of an “age of reflection.” Later, in The Sickness unto Death, the emphasis is on the inability of the self to synthesize its constitutive polarities: possibility and necessity, finitude and infinity (infinite*), time* and eternity.

Is there any way out of despair? In Either/Or, assessor William, proponent of the ethical viewpoint, argues for a transcendental act of self-choice in which the subject chooses himself “from the hand of God” in the entirety of his existence. Is such a choice possible? In Philosophical Fragments, it is argued that the recollection of a truth immanent in human existence—such as William's position seems to imply—is essentially Socratic and ignores Christianity's revelation of the incorrigibility of human error. In Fear and Trembling, a distinction is drawn, using the story of Abraham and Isaac*, between infinite resignation, in which the world is surrendered for the sake of eternity, and authentic faith, in which, by the power of the absurd, the “knight of faith” believes he will receive again what he has surrendered. Thus, the faith of Abraham is not that he consented to offer Isaac but that he continued to believe that God would restore Isaac to him in this life. Kierkegaard asks whether we can understand Abraham. In Repetition, a poetic youth who has left his fiancée reflects on Job as offering hope that a “repetition” might be possible, and that God might transform him, making him capable of marriage. Repetition is thus the idea that the subject's self-choice can never be a given, a constitutive datum of the self, but must be affirmed repeatedly—but can the subject himself ground such an act?

In the Edifying Discourses that accompany all these books and represent an immanent form of religiousness, the ultimate possibility of the human subject is seen as a voluntary act of annihilation that removes the obstacles to God's transfiguration of human finitude. Yet this psychological anthropology* requires a theological and dogmatic grounding.

b) Theology. Kierkegaard's theological sources are chiefly Lutheranism*, and, especially, Pietism*. In works such as Philosophical Fragments or their Concluding Unscientific Postscript, he stresses that a true relationship with God is dependent on the redeeming activity of God himself, incarnate in human form. Indeed, it is only the revelation of the uniquely individual incarnation* of God that absolutely demonstrates our incapacity and our need of redemption. In faith, each believer becomes a contemporary of that event, historical knowledge and philosophical speculation being irrelevant to such contemporaneity. Faith also demands a qualitative leap by the individual, leading Kierkegaard to acknowledge his kinship with Gotthold Ephraim Lessing (1729–81) and David Hume (1711–76) against Hegel. This leap cancels out all intrahistorical differences, so that the contemporary disciple of Jesus* (who literally saw and heard him) is no more privileged than the 19th-century believer is.

However, even faith—as a merely external religious confession or a merely passive state of inwardness (quietism*)—can itself be a way of evading the task of acceding to authentic selfhood. In his later works, Kierkegaard therefore increasingly emphasizes the importance of what he calls “reduplication,” that is, supplementing faith with works*, above all the active suffering witness of the authentic imitation* of Christ. Although respectful of Luther*, he is critical of how Luther’s teaching on faith undermines the ideal of discipleship. Kierkegaard also stresses the irreducibility of apostolic and kerygmatic preaching*, warning against the dangers of judging apostolic authority on the basis of such human criteria as poetic artistry or intellectual depth.

In his religious discourses, Kierkegaard offers sensitive studies of prayer*, spiritual trial, and the practice of Christian love. He counsels submission to God in patience, silence, and obedience. Those who aspire to this life must accept that they will become as nothing and give thanks for all things, even sufferings, willing the “one thing” only of God’s will for us in repentance. Although God is separated from humanity by an “infinite qualitative difference,” he cares for the believer as a father for his children, having a special providential care for each individual. The divine image in humanity is to be renewed through self-abandonment in worship. The lilies in the field and the birds in the sky (Mt 6:25–30) are repeatedly cited as “teachers” of faith. Among Kierkegaard’s religious writings, the short meditations for the Friday Communion* should also be mentioned: they provide a singularly powerful exploration of the Lutheran understanding of the Eucharist* as the offering of forgiveness by the present Christ*.

The Bible* is central to Kierkegaard’s spirituality. His treatment of Scripture is highly original, and he reworks or develops biblical themes in an imaginative and idiosyncratic fashion, as he tells the story of the Incarnation as the fairy-tale love of a king for a humble maiden, or has David criticizing Nathan’s parable on aesthetic grounds. Apart from the Sermon on the Mount, his most used text is the Epistle of James (despite Luther’s criticism of it), with its stress on works. He is critical of the scholarly approach to Scripture, both orthodox and revisionist (exegesis*), not only because of its tendency to reduce scripture to a merely human text but also because it lacks the passion that must fire an authentic engagement with the Word* of God. Scripture is a mirror in which we are to read our own destiny, and we should read it as urgently as a lover reads a letter from the beloved.

Despite Kierkegaard’s statement of the absolute authority of faith, he was no mere dogmatist, and his work has a strongly apologetic element. He is committed to meeting his readers where they are and therefore, necessarily, to communicating the truth in forms that belong to untruth. His critique of the aesthetic attitude, for instance, is presented in a highly aesthetic form—so much so that these works are important documents in literature. Johannes the Seducer is a leading representative of this aesthetic attitude, and Kierkegaard could see his own literary activity as a kind of seduction, deceiving the reader in the cause of truth. Another model for such “indirect communication” was that of Socrates, the Socrates who compared himself to a midwife, assisting others to see the truth that was in them. In Kierkegaard’s case, however, such maieutic practice aims to show readers that, apart from faith, they are not in possession of the truth. He was himself insistent that his literary activity had been religious from the beginning, adducing as proof the publication of his religious discourses alongside the pseudonymous aesthetic works.

The importance of “indirect communication” to Kierkegaard cannot be overestimated. To present his teachings, as objective results, would be to falsify his fundamental project, for it is only in the process of appropriating the truth that the subjective passion that is a necessary precondition of faith can be fully aroused. The unique form of his served the awakening of such subjective self-concern and, in the later works, to call the subject from the concealment of hidden inwardness onto the stage of public witness. Kierkegaard had two reasons for using such indirect communication: the exigencies of an apologetic approach and the requirements of faithfulness to the principles of the incarnation. The God-man, as Kierkegaard argues in Training in Christianity, exists as a sign of contradiction: his humble and suffering human form is entirely incommensurable with the reality of his divinity. His truth can therefore never be directly assimilated into any human system, not even one that is theologically “correct.”

c) Philosophy. Kierkegaard’s main influence on modern philosophy* has doubtless been through Heidegger*’s adoption of his anthropological description in Being and Time: the “existentialist” themes of anxiety, guilt, repetition, nothingness, subjectivity, and the absurd are all anticipated in Kierkegaard. So too are the critique of totalizing systems of truth and the depersonalizing effects of mass culture.

At the same time, Kierkegaard made important contributions to the critique of idealism, arguing in the Concluding Unscientific Postscript that all idealism is essentially skeptical. No philosophy can completely guarantee its own presuppositions but must accept the givenness of being. Idealism can therefore serve only to clarify the concept, not to determine the concept in its existence. Whereas a logical and a priori system may be possible, an existential system is altogether impossible, except from the standpoint of God.

Kierkegaard's most interesting contribution to philosophy probably comes from his interest in the boundaries between kinds of discourses: psychology, logic, faith, and so on. In this respect, we should read him not so much as seeking to demonstrate the falsity of Hegel's position as showing the inappropriateness of Hegel's method for dealing with religious issues. Wittgenstein's admiration for Kierkegaard is known and it is possible to see in Kierkegaard an early philosophical grammarian, when, for example, he points out the differing rules that govern some of the diversity of language games, especially those that concern God.

- (1901–6), Samlede Værker, Copenhagen, 15 vols. (3rd Ed. 1962, 20 vols.)
- (1909–48), Papirer, Copenhagen, 24 vols.

- ◆ Georg Brandes (1877), Søren Kierkegaard, Copenhagen.
- E. Hirsch (1933), Kierkegaard Studien, Gütersloh.
- Jean Wahl (1938), Études kierkegaardienes, Paris.
- G. Malantschuk (1968), Dialektik og Eksistens hos S. Kierkegaard, Copenhagen.
- L. Mackey (1971), Kierkegaard: A Kind of Poet, Philadelphia.
- J. Colette (1972), Histoire et absolu, Essai sur Kierkegaard, Paris.
- N. Thulstrup, M.M. Thulstrup (1978–88), Bibliotheca kierkegardiana, 16 vols., Copenhagen.
- M. Theunissen, W. Greve (Eds) (1979), Materialen zur Philosophie S. Kierkegaards, Frankfurt.
- N. Viallaneix (1979), Écoute, Kierkegaard: Essai sur la communication de la parole, 2 vols., Paris.
- H.-B. Vergote (1982), Sens et répétition: Essai sur l'ironie kierkegardienne, 2 vols., Paris.
- R.L. Perkins (Ed.) (1984–), International Kierkegaard Commentary (24 vols.), Macon, Ga.
- G. Pattison (1992), Kierkegaard: The Aesthetic and the Religious, Basingstocke.
- J. Colette (1994), Kierkegaard et la non-philosophie, Paris.

GEORGE PATTISON

See also Beauty; Fideism; Hegel, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich; Kant, Immanuel; Language, Theological; Marx, Karl; Nietzsche, Friedrich Wilhelm; Rationalism; Schelling, Friedrich Wilhelm Joseph von; Schleiermacher, Friedrich Daniel Ernst

Kingdom of God

A. Terminology: Reign and Kingdom

While Hebrew or Aramaic (malekoût) treat it as a single term, as does Greek (basileia) in certain contexts, the term kingdom encompasses various nuances through which English expresses different words: royalty, kingdom, and reign (the nuance expressed by royalty is of little importance in New Testament texts and may be ignored here). Kingdom is to be used for texts where the spatial connotation is predominant; for example, the phrase “in the basileia” (Mt 18:1, 4), or where a movement is implied of which the basileia is the goal—to enter into (for example Mt 7:21). Reign expresses the act of ruling, the exercise of royal power. This dynamic meaning, which appears fundamental, emerges quite clearly from a number of observations:

1) the verb to reign in the Hebrew text is more than once rendered by the noun in the Aramaic versions (e.g., Is 52:7 and the targum to this verse) (translations* of the Bible, ancient); 2) the Semitic noun is used in parallel with a synonymous nomen actionis such as domination (e.g., Dn 4:33); 3) the same phenomenon is borne out in corresponding terms in Greek (e.g., Rev 12:10); 4) there is a parallelism between the noun basileia and the corresponding verb (e.g., Lk 1:33).

Important as it is, the distinction between reign and kingdom cannot account for every usage: where the vocabulary concerns a gift, inheritance, or property, the term basileia is effectively used as an all-embracing term for the totality of salvific good* that God intends for his own people. Two forms appear in the New Testament: reign of God (the usual expression) and reign of the heavens (an expression typical of Matthew, who is not, however, unaware of the other). This distinction does not affect the meaning, since heavens has here, as in some other texts (e.g., Lk 15:18), the status of a divine epithet. The expression reign of God seems to be original. As was his habit, Matthew appears to have shifted the accepted vocabulary in the direction of the developing rabbinical phraseology.

I. Old Testament

The expression reign of God is practically absent from the Old Testament. It is found as such only once (Wis 10:10—but see 1 Chr 28:5; 2 Chr 13:8) and rarely in equivalent forms (e.g., Ps 103:19; Dn 3:33; Tb 13:2). The thematic unity appears more substantial, however, when one considers the royal title (God is referred to as “king” around 30 times, the oldest text being without doubt Is 6:5), the affirmations in verb form (various verbs: mâlak, mâshal, etc.), and the various royal symbols or attributes (throne, etc.).

It appears that the perception of God as king cannot have begun earlier than the royal period: it owes its admission into the faith* of Israel* to the influence of the prevailing milieu, chiefly “Hierosolymitan,” perhaps in association with the building of the temple* where God henceforth “sat over the cherubs” (2 Sm 6:2). Despite the tradition of hostility to the monarchy in Israel, the human king was not generally considered to be in competition with the divine king. In keeping with the royal ideology common to the ancient East, the king was seen as God’s lieutenant, but there was no question in Israel of his being of divine descent; while he is sometimes referred to as “son of God” (e.g., Ps 2:7) (filiation*), this is solely in terms of the judicial reality of adoption. God’s reign is initially shown as being beneficial for the people of Israel, whose attentive shepherd he is; but it also encompasses creation* and other peoples, as appears particularly in the psalms* of the reign (Ps 47:93, 96–99). The eschatological dimension of divine royalty, which certainly cannot be ruled out from these psalms, is more clearly expressed in the great texts of Deutero-Isaiah (52:7, etc.), by which Jesus* was in all probability strongly inspired. After the exile, the former conviction of the actual and permanent reign was adopted and reinforced in the theocratic tradition represented by the “Chronist.” The tradition established by Deutero-Isaiah was consolidated in the texts that bear witness to the birth of apocalyptic* literature, above all in Isaiah 24–27.

II. Ancient Judaism

As in the Old Testament, the theme of the reign is expressed in ancient Judaism* by way of the predicates attributed to God and the verbs that express his actions. However, the noun reign now appears more frequently, albeit by no means as frequently as would be the case in the New Testament. The theme is presented above all in apocalyptic and related literature (Dn, The Testament [or Assumption] of Moses, etc.), as well as in ancient prayers (prayer*) (the Kaddish). At Qumran, the theme assumes some prominence in the Scroll of War (1QM) and in the fragments of 4Q on the Songs for the Sabbath Holocaust (or Sacrifice). As for the documents deriving from rabbinism, their dominant idea is that obedience to the law* is a matter of taking upon oneself the yoke of the reign and of recognizing this reign. These documents, however, are hard to date.

There is nothing uniform about the ideas of the reign: alongside a reign already in force, which one recognizes by submitting to it and in which one may participate through the liturgy*, there is recognition of a reign that has yet to appear and that will crown the history* of God with his people, with humanity, and with the cosmos*. At times the transformation by comparison with the present world* is emphasized to a point at which the reign to come is seen as a reality situated in a heavenly hereafter (particularly in Testament of Moses 10). More often, however, the perspective remains that of the earth—a renewed earth, of course. God’s sovereignty is emphatically established over all people, but the centrality of Israel is strongly accentuated.

III. New Testament

1. Jesus’ Preaching

The critics are almost unanimous in judging that the theme of the reign forms the heart of the historical Jesus’ preaching*. Jesus gives it an emphasis that goes well beyond that which it had in the Old Testament and in ancient Judaism, and which it was to have in the post-Easter Christian tradition*. Explicitly or implicitly present in the majority of the parables (parable*), the reign is the object of many maxims attested in all currents of the synoptic tradition (notably in the source of the logia) (Gospels*) and belongs to a large extent to the earliest layers of this tradition. The principal characteristics of this preaching are as follows:

a) Reign as Activity. The dynamic sense is fundamental; this is linked to a conception firmly centered on God himself. An eschatological reference—presented in this instance through an insistence on newness—seems very probable, even if this point is freshly disputed today by some of the most recent (in particular American) research (B. B. Scott 1981; M. J. Borg 1984 and 1994).

b) Salvation. Contrasting with the theme of judgment* and in tension with it, reign is the supreme category tending to salvation, employed by Jesus much more emphatically than, for example, the vocabulary of salvation* or of eternal life (life*, eternal). God assumes power in order to succor and reward the poor (Mt 5:3; see Mk 10:25) and the young, along with those who resemble them (Mk 10:14), as well as the little flock of disciples (Lk 12:32).

c) Bipolarity. It is generally accepted nowadays that, in its temporal aspect, Jesus' message regarding the reign is characterized by a polarity between the future and the present. The reign is an eschatological reality, a fulfillment (Scripture*, fulfillment of) of divine promises, and belongs fundamentally to the future; on this point Jesus does not reject the apocalyptic tradition. The future dimension of the reign is proclaimed in the Lord's Prayer* (Lk 11:2), for example, or in the logia of the "entry into the kingdom" (Mk 9:47, 10:25), or again in the Beatitudes (Lk 6:20f.). However—and this characteristic is almost unparalleled in ancient Judaism—Jesus also maintains that God is in the process of invading the world, that his eschatological work is under way and may be verified: Luke 11:20; Matthew 11:12; Luke 17:21; see Luke 7:18–23, 10:18, 10:23f.; Mark 3:27. It was perhaps because he was anxious to affirm both aspects that Jesus did not have recourse to the dualist vocabulary of ages ("this world"/"the world to come"), which implies a radical opposition between the two temporal spheres. The language of reign, with its dynamic overtones, allowed him, on the basis of the fundamental continuity of divine action, to express the idea that the future had already burst in upon the present and affected it with its eschatological character. The experience of the present reign, meanwhile, would doubtless have intensified the expectation of fulfillment. Several parables (e.g., Mk 4:26–29) appear to have as their message the paradox of the temporal bipolarity of the reign.

d) Christ and the Reign. The resolutely theocentric conception of the reign does not prevent there being a connection between it and the person of Jesus*. As far as the reign in its present dimension is concerned, the impact of God's coming may be seen in Jesus' words (word*) and salutary actions (especially in his exorcisms [exorcism*] and healing*). The role of God's lieutenant or representative in his actions should undoubtedly be seen in the context of Jesus' close proximity to him whom he calls, with emphasis, his Father*. Did Jesus assign himself a similar role concerning fulfillment? The christological title of Son* of man seems at first sight to suggest as much. It may be remembered that in Daniel 7, he who rises up "like a son of man" receives investiture, and that the "Reign" of God is entrusted to him. However, criticism has thrown up almost insurmountable difficulties—at any rate, not surmounted yet—on this point. In actual fact, the connection between the maxims of the reign and the logia of the Son of man is never explicitly stated. Moreover, it is not clear that Jesus ever spoke of the Son of man; and even if one accepts that he did speak of him, one should not be too ready to assume that he identified himself with this figure. Besides, in the one speech in which Jesus speaks of his own person in connection with the reign to come (Mk 14:25), he offers no information that would enable one to conclude that he was expecting to play a defining role: he simply expresses the conviction that he will not remain in the thrall of death*, and that he will be a guest at the banquet of the reign. The very pronounced theocentrism of Jesus' teaching means that only for general reasons, namely the very reality of the Christology (Christ* and Christology) implicit in his message and the continuity between the present reign and the future reign, can one assume for Jesus a particular role in the coming and the life of the future reign.

2. Post-Easter Resumptions of the Theme

Even if it was not its sole focus, the "kerygma" of the post-Easter communities was centered on Christ, and in particular on the salvific events of his death and resurrection*. The announcement of God's reign was no longer foremost, but it did not disappear.

a) Gospels and Acts. The theme remains prominent over the whole course of synoptic tradition, even as far as its compilation is concerned. It is taken up differently by each of the evangelists, though it is very hard to attribute an absolutely coherent and precise position to each of them. However, it is at least possible to recognize characteristic emphases. In Matthew, for example, one may note the prominence afforded to ethics*: the entry into the Kingdom, which remains a strictly eschatological reality and should not be confused with the Church*, is linked to a respect for certain ethical demands (see Mt 5:20, 7:21, 18:3; see 5:3–12, 21:43). In the case of Luke and Acts, a dominant characteristic is the presentation of the reign as an object of preaching or teaching, with a tendency—as can be seen especially in some phrases from Acts (19:8, 2:31, etc.)—to endow the term with a wide, vague meaning: the phenomenon of Christianity or the Christian religion (see Col 4:11). The relationship between the expressions concerning the reign in the two parts of Luke's work suggests that it may be one of the symbols by which the author emphasizes the continuity between Jesus' time and that of the Church. In John, only two statements concerning the reign (Jn 3:3, 5) are to be found. But the semantic connotations of the theme are quite widely present in the vocabulary of "eternal life," with which John makes clear connections (see 3:3 and 3:36), as indeed the synoptic tradition had already done (Mk 9:43–47, 10:17–31).

b) Pauline Corpus. The first impression here is that the theme of reign is ephemeral and merges into that of justification* or justice* (with which, moreover, a connection is made in Rom 14:17): the instances are relatively infrequent and above all seem largely stereotypical. By analogy with the logia of the entry into the Kingdom preserved in the synoptic tradition and in the compiling of Matthew, most of Pauline (in the broad sense) uses the theme present in the Kingdom as the eschatological dwelling of the righteous (1 Cor 6:9f.; Gal 5:21; 1 Thes 2:12; 2 Thes 1:5; Eph 5:5). Nonetheless, the presence of reign, linked to justification (Rom 4:17) and to the active power (omnipotence*, divine) (of the Holy* Spirit) (1 Cor 4:20) is not neglected, so that one finds again in Paul's writings the fundamental tension to be seen in Jesus. In spite of the lack of emphasis in his explicit references to it, the gospel theme of reign undoubtedly played a more important part in Pauline* theology than appears at first sight.

c) Specific Character of the Reign. Two distinctive characteristics recur within various theological currents of developing Christianity and deserve special mention: the christological application of the theme and its transcendental interpretation.

The christological application is revealed in the fact that the vocabulary of reign or kingdom is used in various ways concerning Jesus. The variety of epithets employed in the texts and the late character of most of the latter encourage us not to overemphasize the strictly messianic strand (though see Lk 1:33) but to accord full importance to the exaltation of Easter and the perspective of the Second Coming (Mt 13:41, 16:28, 20:21; Lk 22:30, 23:42; 1 Cor 15:24; Col 1:13; 2 Tm 4:1, 18; 2 Pt 1:11). Understood in the vast majority of texts as being God's prerogative, once reign is attributed to Christ there arises the problem of the relationship between the two forms of reign. Only Paul, however, considers this point explicitly (1 Cor 15:20–28). Christ's reign is temporary: at the "end" the "Son" will submit to the Father and God will be "all in all"—it being understood that the emphasis is on God's universal sovereignty and not on the transitoriness of the Son's reign. It is generally considered enough to associate God and the Son in various ways (see Eph 5:5; Rev 3:21, 11:15, 12:10, 22:1)—in fact this is a distinctive aspect in the connection between Christology and theology*. The group of texts relating to the Son's reign present several assertions that call for speculation as to the relationship between reign and the Church (see especially Mt 13:41; Col 1:13; Eph 5:5). Generally speaking, it is not possible to identify the Church with the Kingdom of God, but it is legitimate to consider the Church as the community over which Christ's rule is exercised and which has received a call to participate in the fullness of God's reign.

As far as the oldest layers of the tradition are concerned, it is very hard to characterize the nature of the reign. Is it a matter of an eschatology* of restoration, the reign being exercised over an Israel that is renewed but that remains centered on the earth and thus retains its institutions? Or, does it rather belong to a transcendental, celestial, and strictly indescribable universe? The indications seem rather to argue for the totaliter aliter. In any event, the post-Easter resumption of the theme and its reinterpretation on the basis of Christ's exaltation at Easter were to favor a transcendental conception that is clearly to be seen in a number of texts, especially in the connection or even identification with what later Christian tradition would call "heaven." The second century saw a highlighting of Jesus' pronouncements on the entry or on inheritance; of the identification of reign with eternal life; and of its being set in opposition to punishment. Above all, it is overwhelmingly referred to as "heavenly." But these descriptions are already to be found in some New Testament texts. According to 2 Timothy 4:18, salvation is equivalent to entry into the "heavenly kingdom" of Christ, and "the eternal kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ" of 2 Peter 1:11, which can be identified with a heavenly hereafter that the elect will attain, in a kind of triumph, on the day of judgment. It is not impossible that a similar idea is expressed in Acts 14:22. Certainly the traditional image of the entry is to be found there—an image that does not in itself point to a transcendental conception. However, if one takes account of the beginnings of an individual eschatology to be found in the writings of Luke (especially Lk 16:19–31, 23:39–43), and if one brings into play the resemblance between Acts 14:22 and Luke 24:26, there is some reason to think of the entry into heavenly glory as taking effect from the very moment of death.

- R. Schnackenburg (1959), Gottes Herrschaft und Reich, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna (4th Ed. 1965).
- J. Schlosser (1980), Le Règne de Dieu dans les dits de Jésus, Paris.
- J. Coppens, J. Carmignac, A. Feuillet, E. Cothenet, P. Prigent (1981), “Règne (ou Royaume) de Dieu,” DBS 10, 2–199.
- H. Merklein (1983), Jesu Botschaft von der Gottesherrschaft: Eine Skizze, Stuttgart (3rd Ed. 1989).
- H. Schürmann (1983), Gottes Reich – Jesu Geschick, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna.
- O. Camponovo (1984), Königtum, Königsherrschaft und Reich Gottes in den frühjüdischen Schriften, Freiberg-Göttingen.
- E. P. Sanders (1985), Jesus and Judaism, London.
- G. R. Beasley-Murray (1986), Jesus and the Kingdom of God, Grand Rapids-Exeter.
- E. Zenger, A. Lindemann (1986), “Herrschaft Gottes/Reich Gottes,” TRE 15, 176–89, 196–218.
- W. Willis (Ed.) (1987), The Kingdom of God in 20th-Century Interpretation, Peabody, Mass.
- D. C. Duling (1992), “Kingdom of God, Kingdom of Heaven,” AncBD IV, 49–69.
- B. Chilton (1994), “The Kingdom of God in Recent Discussion”, in B. Chilton, C. A. Evans (Ed.), Studying the Historical Jesus, Leyden, 1994, 255–80.
- J. P. Meier (1994), A Marginal Jew, II, New York, 237–506.

JACQUES SCHLOSSER

See also Church; Cosmos; Creation; Eschatology; Gospels; Jesus, Historical; Judgment; Messianism/Messiah; Parousia; Preaching; Psalms; World

B. Historical Theology

In Jesus*’ announcement of the Kingdom* of God, and in the New Testament declarations that bear witness to the fact that Christ* crucified and raised to heaven truly inaugurates the perfect communion* of God* with human beings—the goal of creation* and of history*—the Christian tradition* has at all periods found a theme that it has been able to present with the help of the conceptual, cultural, and linguistic means at its disposal. Since these elements have themselves been modified in the course of this process, belief in the Kingdom also appears as a factor in historical change.

a) Pre-Nicene Theology of the Kingdom of God. The earliest Fathers* characterized the Kingdom of God by bringing together different elements provided by the New Testament declarations, including their purely narrative and allegorical aspects. Thus the announcement of the Kingdom of God, together with Jesus Christ’s crucifixion and elevation, is seen as the axis of a history of salvation* that runs from the creation and original sin (sin,* original) to the judgment* and the fulfillment of creation in God (Irenaeus*, Adv. Haer., PG 7, 431–1224). Jesus Christ, God’s Word* made flesh, is the “autobasilèia” (Origen*, Tertullian*, Adv. Marc. 4, 33, PL 470–72), the “Kingdom of God himself” (Cyprian*, De orat. domin., PL 4, 535 Sq.): in his life as in his death*, it is God who determines everything.

Christians attain the Kingdom of God through faith* and baptism*. They merge more closely within it by “becoming like” God through the practice of the virtues*. This sense of participation is expressed especially in the state of virginity (Tertullian, De virg. velandis, PG 2, 935–62), in the “angelic life” directed toward the Kingdom of God, and in martyrdom* (Cyprian, Exhort. de mart., PL 4, 677 Sq.). In this way Christians testify to the completely finite nature of all created reality and reject any mythical glorification of state authority* and of the Empire. They live among the nations, integrating themselves into social relationships as one people among others (Epistle to Diognetus, SC 33 bis).

The apocalyptic events announced in the New Testament were at this time interpreted as a process of purification, sanctification, and illumination. In opposition to the opinion of, for example, Dionysius of Alexandria (in Eusebius, HE, PG 20, 691–95), many Fathers then distinguished between a first and a second resurrection*, each heralded by a final period of calamity. These two resurrections framed the seventh week of the world*, during which Christ, after chaining Satan, would reign for a thousand years and prepare the saints for perfect communion with God (Victorinus of Pettau, Methodius of Olympus, etc.).

The idea of the Kingdom of God, so conceived from the standpoint of the history of salvation, takes its main conceptual framework from the Platonic doctrine of man’s absorption into the divine mystery*, through a gradual succession of eschatological situations.

b) Post-Constantinian Theology of the Kingdom of God. The assertion of the essential identity of the Son and the Father*, and of the divinity of the Holy* Spirit (Nicaea* [325] and Constantinople* [381]), brought about obvious changes in the theology* of the Kingdom of God. The eschatological significance of the Lord's first coming on earth was reinforced, so that the idea of an intermediate reign of a thousand years before the Last Judgment became less plausible (Jerome, Comm. in Evang. sec. Matt., PL 26, 15–228; Ep. CXX ad Hedibiam, PL 22, 908–1006; Augustine, De civ. Dei 20, 7, PL 41, 666–69). Henceforward, a number of narrative elements, which the pre-Nicene Fathers had accorded the status of historical reality, were now understood as a stock of images and metaphors applicable to the present-day experience of the faithful (see Augustine, op. cit., on the subject of the chaining of Satan).

So Christ's first coming inaugurated the sixth age of the world (Augustine, De civ. Dei 22, 30, PL 41, 801–4), which was to be followed only by eternal fulfillment (the seventh age). Modifying the Neoplatonist theme of the “intelligible world,” Augustine* here develops his doctrine of the heavenly city, consisting of disciples living in communion with God, who, loving only him and seeking only beatitude*, fight against the earthly city*. The Church* that has existed since Abel (Ecclesia ab Abel) thus becomes the sacramental representative of the Kingdom of God, in which nonetheless the chaff may mingle with the good grain. The history of the world and the history of salvation are inextricably linked, without, however, merging. The different theological positions were distinguished at this time by the way in which they conceived the actuality of a Kingdom of God whose advent remained fundamentally postponed until the fulfillment of time. Cassian, as a monastic theologian, considers that it is above all through purity (purity*/impurity) of heart (soul*-heart-body) that the Kingdom of God is announced in the present (see Collatio nona, De oratione XIX, PL 49, 791 Sq.); other Fathers emphasize its official representation. In the “imperial theology” inaugurated by Eusebius, the Christian emperors act as Jesus Christ's vicars for the Empire, and the Empire itself is elevated to the status of a Christian reality (see, e.g., Orat. Eusebii de laud: Constantini in eius tricennialibus habitae, PG 20, 1315–456). Some writers, moreover, boldly identify the Church with the Kingdom of God. Gregory* the Great, for example, takes Jesus' parables (parable*) concerning the Kingdom (e.g., Mt 13:41) as direct allusions to the Church (Homil. in Evang., II, Homil. 32, 6, PL 76, 1236) at the risk of abandoning all critical distance with regard to the latter.

c) Medieval Theology of the Kingdom of God. While the patristic “imperial theology” found prolongment in the Eastern Church, the sacrum imperium was similarly understood in the Western Empire as an initial materialization of the Kingdom of God, whose propagation, internal organization, and defense were the responsibilities of the emperor, as a new David—while to the pope* and the bishops (bishop*) fell the role of Moses in prayer*. An opposite understanding was to develop in the context of the Cluniac reform, under the banner of “liberty* of the Church”: the universal and cosmic order established under God's salvific counsel was represented in time* by the priesthood*. Thus it was the pope who held the fullness of power (plenitudo potestatis), and imperial or royal power played only a secondary role: it was necessitated by human sin, inasmuch as this threatened the temporal order (see Gregory VII, Dictatus Papae). Boniface VIII's bull Unam Sanctam (DH 870–75) is an intensified expression of this political and ecclesiological theology of the Kingdom of God. The medieval movement of return to evangelical poverty nonetheless reemphasized the difference between the Kingdom of God and all the forms of power exercised through history. One entered it by way of poverty, humility, and simplicity. In this regard the doctrine of Joachim of Fiore was spectacularly successful among the Franciscan “spirituals.” According to this view it was necessary to distinguish three ages of the world: the reign of the Father, characterized by the Old Testament economy of salvation and the ascendancy of secular powers; the reign of the Son, subject to the New Testament economy of salvation and to priestly domination; and finally the reign of the Spirit, which was that of the monastic community inspired by the Paraclete. Francis of Assisi was considered to be the herald of this third age and sometimes represented as alter Christus. The ideas of Jan Hus* and the Czech friars (Moravian Brethren) and the theories of Thomas Münzer and the Anabaptists* of Münster would be steeped in this theology of the Kingdom of God.

In the face of these arguments, Thomas* Aquinas—like other theologians of his time, who marked the high point of the Middle Ages—did not accept the theme of the Kingdom of God but rather developed an overall vision of reality based on the scheme of emanation from and return to God (egressus/regressus). The world thus conceived is characterized by a perfect communication with God, within which it is at the same time judged.

d) Thematics of the Kingdom of God in Modern Times. The tendencies of medieval theology survived until the modern period. Nicholas* of Cusa developed a speculative conception of the Kingdom of God: humankind and the world, in their history, were the expressions that God unfolded outside himself. Their relationship with God was inherent in the present moment but simultaneously encompassed all history: “There is only one heavenly reign, of which there is but one archetypal image [...] what Zeno says on the subject of truth* is the same as what Parmenides, Plato and all the others say of it; all had the same thing in mind, but expressed it in different ways” (De filiatione Dei op. IV, 83).

This assimilation of the Kingdom of God with the rule of the Spirit or of liberty* was to form an important theme in modern philosophy. For Leibniz* the existing world was the best of all possible worlds by virtue of a preestablished harmony based on divine rationality. In Kant*'s opinion the Kingdom of God represented the development of human society* according to ethical laws: this society—the Church—sprang from faith in revelation* but must raise itself to the level of a pure religious faith. In Hegel*'s view, finally, the doctrine of the reign of the Father, the Son, and the Spirit concluded the succession of forms that the Spirit assumed in its journey toward itself.

This conception of the Kingdom of God was also echoed in the utopias of Savonarola, Campanella, Thomas More, and Bucer*, whose tradition is in a sense continued in the ideas of the left-wing Hegelians, the Marxist theory of the communist society, and the utopian philosophy of E. Bloch. In this context the Kingdom of God is no longer the effect of God's unforeseeable grace* but rather a vision of what humanity can make of its own existence.

Luther* developed a doctrine of the two reigns that was distinct on the one hand from a Catholic and theocentric view of the Church and on the other hand from millenarian fanaticism. God's invisible spiritual government was based on justification* by faith, while secular government was based on the law*. Calvin* and Zwingli* developed a conception of Christian society that has bibliocratic and theocratic characteristics. The idea of the Kingdom of God also played a central role in Pietism*: biblical teaching, set out and put into practice in conventicles, allowed God's sovereignty to exercise itself over the world. Schleiermacher*, under the influence of Pietism, defined the Kingdom of God as “the free community, united in pious belief” (WW, III-2, 466), whose members developed their individuality as a living work of art. For A. Ritschl, finally, the Kingdom of God was the ethical (ethics*) community instituted by Jesus Christ, a conception that was used to glorify the bourgeois ideals of liberal Protestantism. Within Catholicism*, for its part, Ignatius Loyola and a number of Counter Reformation leaders identified the hierarchical Church with the reign of Christ, which was to be extended by throwing all one's strength into planned missionary activity (Spiritual Exercises, no. 137–48, 365).

Within Catholic theology the doctrine of the Kingdom of God has been principally developed (following B. Gallura) by the school of Tübingen*. According to J. S. von Drey, the Kingdom of God is “that idea of Christianity which contains within it and draws from itself all others” (Einleitung in das Studium der Theologie, Tübingen 1819, 19). J.-B. von Hirscher envisages his “Christian morality” as a doctrine of the realization of the Kingdom. The rediscovery of the eschatological message of Jesus (J. Weiss), as well as the theologies of Barth* and Tillich*, helped to orient Catholic exegesis* (L. Cerfaux, J. Bonsirven, R. Schnackenburg, etc.) and ecclesiology* (M. Schmaus) toward the problematics of the Kingdom of God.

Building on this preparatory work, the Second Vatican* Council was able to define the Church as the Kingdom of God already present “in mystery” (LG 3) and also as the community that must at the same time, with (perhaps add “the cooperation of”) all its members, serve the Kingdom of God by the proclaiming of the Word* (LG 35), the giving of mutual assistance, and daily observance (LG 36). It was right, moreover, to distinguish between the growth of the Kingdom and earthly progress (GS 39). The theology of hope* since the Council, along with political* theology, liberation* theology and feminist theology (woman*), all oppose one or other implication of the Kingdom of God—universal salvation, liberty, justice*—to the fixed certainties of Church and society or to the traditionalism* of theology. These movements, however, often expose themselves to the risk of dissociating the Kingdom of God and the Church, or even of moving away from Jesus Christ, as a result of their ideological commitment and their drift toward political messianism. There is an opposite danger, too: the making absolute—from an apparently orthodox standpoint—of the received forms of Christianity.

e) Systematic Perspectives. If man is a paradoxical being who achieves fulfillment only beyond humanity, and so beyond the historical scope of all human powers, then the same must go for history, inasmuch as it constitutes the space in which human existence, being together, and being in the world are enacted. In terms of faith, the fulfillment of the human is attested as divine salvation. This salvation allows itself to be conceived negatively, for as long as philosophy highlights the fragility and insufficiency of all the other ideas that human beings advance of their end and fulfillment. As an all-inclusive promise guaranteed by Jesus Christ's death and resurrection, the Kingdom of God thus plays a defining role in humankind's historical practice; and in philosophical terms it represents an asymptotic idea that can be approached only by way of successive negations. It follows that faith is alive in the Church only when, sustaining its hope and love* in the real expectation of the Kingdom of God, it rejects the limits and obstacles that history puts in the way of human salvation. This concrete action breaks the shell of certainties and established traditions, steering clear of fanaticism while it integrates the negative and critical dimension of the idea of the Kingdom of God, which emphasizes the relative nature of all the real progress achieved in this direction.

Kingdom of God

- E. Hirsch (1921), Die Reich-Gottes Begriffe des neueren europäischen Denkens, Göttingen.
- R. Frick (1928), "Die Geschichte des Reich-Gottes Gedankens in der alten Kirche bis zu Origenes und Augustin," ZNW, suppl. no 6.
- A. Dempf (1929), Sacrum Imperium. Geschichte und Staatsphilosophie des Mittelalters und der politischen Renaissance, Munich-Berlin.
- E. Staehelin (1951–63), Die Verkündigung des Reich Gottes in der Kirche Jesu Christi: Zeugnisse aus allen Jahrhunderten und allen Konfessionen, vols. I–VI, Basel.

- É. Gilson (1952), Les métamorphoses de la cité de Dieu, Louvain-Paris.
- K. Löwith (1953), Weltgeschichte und Heilsgeschehen: Die theologischen Voraussetzungen der Geschichtsphilosophie, Stuttgart.
- J. Bonsirven (1957), Le règne de Dieu, Paris.
- Ch. Walther (1961), Typen des Reich-Gottesverständnis: Studien zur Eschatologie und Ethik im 19. Jahrhundert, Munich.
- J. Pief (1965), Reich Gottes und Gesellschaft nach J.S. Drey und J.B. Hirscher, Paderborn.
- E. Benz (1969), Ecclesia spiritualis. Kirchenidee und Geschichtstheologie der franziskanischen Reformation, Darmstadt.
- W. Pannenberg (1971), Theologie und Reich Gottes, Gütersloh.
- J. Moltmann (1980), Trinität und Reich Gottes: Zur Gotteslehre, Munich.
- A. von Ström et al. (1986), "Herrschaft Gottes/Reich Gottes," TRE 15, 172–244.
- M. Seckler (1988), "Das Reich-Gottes-Motiv in den Anfängen der katholischen Tübinger Schule (J.S. Drey and J.B. Hirscher)," in ThQ 168, 257–82.
- M. Arndt (1992), "Reich Gottes," HWP 8, 510–30.

PETER HÜNERMANN

See also Church; Eschatology; History; Life, Eternal; Millenarianism; Salvation

Kleutgen, Josef Wilhelm Karl. See Philosophy; Realism

Knowledge of God

It is a commonplace that the first theological fact is that God* is known by human beings and known because he has made himself known to them. But what does "knowing" mean in the case of knowing God? Several themes come together here to clarify the topic of an experience* that is not without analogies, though certainly without equal.

- 1) Biblical language indicates that the knowledge of God expresses its meaning primarily in a logic of existence. Before being theoretical, meaning is practical, ethical (ethics*), and spiritual. Knowledge of God is a matter of conversion*, obedience, and recognition (Bultmann* 1933; Bergman-Butterweck 1982); it is articulated significantly in a symbolism of betrothal (Hos 2:22). Man is shown to us not as a rational animal but as a religious and moral subject. According to the Old Testament the one who knows God is the one who fulfills his law* and lives in the covenant* according to justice*. Knowledge is a way of being; it marks the existent in his

- totality. And because it originates in a history*, its intelligibility is not articulated in a framework of metaphysical references but calls upon the construction of a logic of existence in history, a “metahistorical” perspective (Müller 1971).
- 2) The term existence refers to a general aptitude for experience, so that nothing fundamentally determines human beings that is absent from the conditions according to which they achieve knowledge of God. The logic of knowing brings liberty*, rationality, and emotion into play. Liberty, because the existence of God does not impose itself on human beings but solicits consent (see Thomas* Aquinas, ST IIa IIae. q. 2. a.1). Rationality, because that consent depends on the work of an “intellect in search of faith*,” intellectus quaerens fidem, and is accomplished in the work of a faith seeking its greatest understanding, fides quaerens intellectum (Anselm*). Lastly, emotion, because it is also as the Lovable Sovereign that God confronts the human person; rationality is thus indissociable from an ordo amoris (M. Scheler) in which the person plays the role of animal amans.
 - 3) The primacy of conversion requires that human beings should not have known God from time immemorial, or at least that the manner of being that is implied by conversion is born of a rupture, rather than relying on continuities. But are human beings born in a state of total ignorance with respect to God? Or do the prethematic structures of their experience already represent an implicit confrontation with the mystery* of God and, as it were, a certain pre-knowledge? “Transcendental Thomism” (Rahner* 1976; Lotz 1978) has followed the second path; it remains possible, however, to read the native condition of the human person in terms of atheism* and/or of paganism* (Lacoste 1994). It is in any event the major task of the theology of religions*, of the philosophy of religion*, and indeed of philosophy* itself, to say under what conditions the human person is a being to whom God is not foreign. This task has particular urgency in Catholic theology*, insofar as the latter grants to the secular experience of reason* the intrinsic possibility of acceding to a “certain” (DS 3004) knowledge of God. However, not only in Catholic theology but in all Christian traditions (tradition*), man appears in his deepest self as an animal (animals*) in whom God is in question, hence as an animal in a hermeneutic (hermeneutics*) situation who always “pre-understands” God in some way (Bultmann 1952).
 - 4) From the fact that the question is first of all existential, it does not follow that it does not have a theoretical dimension. In the Bible, knowledge of God is related to what Bertrand Russell calls “knowledge by acquaintance,” knowledge born of the familiarity between human beings and God within the space of the covenant. But it is also in terms of knowledge, of gnōsis, that God is spoken of from as early as the Pauline writings, so that knowledge also designates the right to use of God a language that can be called cognitive (knowledge of God thus also matching Russell’s knowledge by description). Knowledge of God is first a spiritual fact, but it also plays a role in the work of theologies. Divine knowability has as a privileged consequence the possibility of articulating a true discourse. And while the act of faith relies on a divine act of speech, the very conditions under which that act of speech asks to be understood today commit the believer to speak in his turn, and to speak with rigor; theological experience is nothing but a theological experience that is capable of being articulated with complete precision.
 - 5) The production of a theology is not only possible but also necessary, because faith deals with an act of speech. However, the logos here comes up against divine incomprehensibility as a critical factor present at every level. It is possible to speak logically of God (God is of no genus but may enter into many classes), and he may be spoken of through speculative concepts, but only with the reservation of excess: that is, reason can confront the God who is “always greater” or “always more God” only by accepting the status of an intelligence that is not comprehensive. The last word always escapes human beings. And what is said in terms of being* (Przywara) must also be said in terms of knowledge: it is not possible to posit a knowledge of the Creator by the created being without also positing an even greater lack of knowledge (see DS 806).
 - 6) Knowledge, moreover, enjoys no particular privilege. Theological theories and theorems articulate knowledge and the knowable, but knowledge needs to be appropriated in a living way, beyond the simple conceptual appropriation of theoretical knowledge; and this vital appropriation may very well take place in the absence of a formal appropriation of words and concepts. In opposition to logics of experience that culminate in the enjoyment of knowledge (Hegel*), and to intellectualist theologies that attribute to the experience of Christian “Gnostics” greater richness than to the faith of the humble (of the “Pistics,” e.g., in Clement of Alexandria and Origen*), the coherence of theological reasoning requires us to counter the insurmountable meaning of the faith of the simple or of children (spiritual childhood*). On the one hand, knowledge may exist when theoretical knowledge is weak, and it is also, on the other hand, called upon to raise up theoretical knowledge; if there is an expression of the theological in theology, there is also an assumption of the theological in the theological that imposes a bond between theology and sanctity (holiness*) (Balthasar* 1948). It is not a love of paradox that is the basis for attributing to Silouan or Theresa of Lisieux the status of Doctor of the Church.

- 7) Knowledge of God is the work of individuals, and the act of faith may even operate as a spiritual principle of individuation (Kierkegaard*). It is, however, not possible to account for it without recognizing its interpersonal and more specifically “communal” coordinates, hence without linking knowledge and “ecclesial being” (Lubac* 1938; Zizioulas). This link itself is both diachronic and synchronic. On the one hand, the act of knowledge is inserted into the history of a confessing, narrating, and interpretive community that guarantees the continuity of meanings through the discontinuities of time. On the other hand, the present community provides the living context for knowledge; in its word* and in its sacraments (sacrament*), it is primordially through the medium of the Church* that God gives himself to be known.
- 8) Knowledge of God is thus centrally attested in the liturgical action of the Church. In the liturgical celebration the sense of what it means to know God is played out in the most precise manner possible. On the one hand, God gives himself to be known by a people whom he assembles. On the other hand, the God who communicates himself gives himself sacramentally, while his proximity in no way undermines his transcendence but rather accentuates it. Finally, the gift of divine proximity finds its proper response in the language of memorial (anamnesis), praise* (*Eucharist), and invocation (*epiclesis), and this language appears to be the most appropriate one in which to express knowledge.

- 9) The liturgy* anticipates the eschaton in history and thus cannot be mentioned without also noting the strictly inchoate character of all knowledge of God in the time* of the world. Eternal life*, beatific vision*, these key concepts tell us that, in the final analysis, the knowledge of God is an eschatological event, which in history can only be anticipated or sketched out. Between a lack of knowledge to which human beings are not abandoned and a full knowledge that cannot be experienced this side of death*, a mediating term is thus supplied: sacramental knowledge and its preeschatological order. Here and now, the knowledge of God bears the stamp of the time before the end.

- R. Bultmann (1933), “Ginôskô, gnôsis...,” ThWNT 1, 688–719; id. (1952), “Das Problem der Hermeneutik,” GuV 2, 211–35.
- H. de Lubac (1938), Catholicisme: Les aspects sociaux du dogme, Paris, 4th Rev. Ed. 1947, especially 51–55, 169–78, 283–305.
- H. U. von Balthasar (1948), “Theologie und Heiligkeit,” WuW 3, 881–96, new Ed. in Verbum Caro, Einsiedeln, 1960, 195–225.
- Cl. Bruaire (1964), L’affirmation de D., Paris, especially 113–34.
- C. Yannaras (1967), Hè theologia tès apousias kai tès agnôsis tou Theou, Athens.
- M. Müller (1971), Erfahrung und Geschichte, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna.
- J. Splett (1973), Gotteserfahrung im Denken, Freiburg.
- K. Rahner (1976), Grundkurs des Glaubens, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna, 35–96.
- P. Miquel (1977), L’expérience de D., Paris.
- J. B. Lotz (1978), Transzendente Erfahrung, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna.
- J.-L. Marion (1978), “De connaître à aimer: l’éblouissement,” Com(F) III/4, 17–28.
- B. Welte (1978), Religionsphilosophie, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna.
- J. Bergman, G. J. Botterweck (1982), “Yadac,” ThWAT 3, 479–512.
- R. Schaeffler (1982), Fähigkeit zur Erfahrung, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna.
- I. U. Dalferth (1984), Existenz Gottes und christlicher Glaube, Munich.
- J.-Y. Lacoste (1994), Expérience et Absolu, Paris.
- S. L. Frank (1995), Das Unergründliche: Ontologische Einführung in die Philosophie der Religion, Freiburg-Munich (original Russian edition published in Paris in 1939).
- T. Pröpper (1995), “Erkenntnis Gottes,” LThK3 3, 781–86.

JEAN-YVES LACOSTE

See also Experience; Faith; Mysticism; Theology

Knowledge, Divine

Following the distinctions established by Pseudo-Dionysius* in the treatise Divine Names, divine knowledge classically designates an affirmative divine attribute (attributes*, divine); that is, an operation of God* that qualifies his intellectual life. Its use therefore posits that there is an action in God for which intellect or intelligence—that is, what allows human beings to have knowledge—is the created analogue (see, e.g., Origen, Periarchon, I. 1. 6).

a) Divine Knowledge in the Typologies of Divine Attributes. Two passages in Paul (Rom 11:33 and Col 2:3) couple wisdom* (sophia, sapientia) with Gnosis* (gnôsis), the latter translated by the Latin scientia, the French science, and English “knowledge,” sanctioning a distinction reinforced by the division of gifts in 1 Corinthians 12:8. In Chapter VII of Divine Names, wisdom is not identified with intellect (the latter may exist without the former, even though it derives from it, as demonstrated by the intellect of devils (demons*), of which it is a “waste”). This distinction of wisdom from knowledge, thematized by book II of the Sentences, dist. 35, was of capital importance for the whole of medieval theology*. But divine knowledge was often also assimilated to the wisdom of God, since, according to Augustine* (Trin XIV.I. 3), wisdom is properly speaking the knowledge of divine things. Treatises on divine attributes assign a definition and a function to knowledge following a dual typology. On the one hand there is the tripartite division wisdom/knowledge/intelligence (sunesis, intellectus, or intellegentia), attested by Isaiah 11:2 (Sentences, book III, dist. 35 then adds the distinction mentioned above that intelligence is a speculation whereas wisdom is rather a contemplation* and a delectation); on the other hand there is the triad power (omnipotence*, divine)/knowledge (sapience)/will (goodness), often reduced from the 17th century onward to the duality of divine knowledge and divine power. But the latter notion, probably by reason of the importance of what was at stake (in particular the question of the existence of evil*), gave rise to more theoretical developments than that of knowledge, which appeared less problematical and was therefore less frequently denied (explicitly or not) and less frequently worked through. In addition, the affirmation in the creed, doxologies, and blessings (blessing*) of the omnipotence of the Father* clearly manifests an imbalance between power and knowledge. The oldest mention in DS of divine knowledge refers to the Council of Rome of 382, which said that God the Son can do all and knows all in the same way as God the Father (DS 164), and repeated the same thing of the Holy* Spirit (DS 169). But it is not until 15 centuries later, in Vatican* I, that we find an explicit dogmatic* formulation of the infinity of divine knowledge (DS 3009), irreducible to a worldly order (§1 of the Syllabus condemned those who deny a very wise [sapientissimum] divine Being [Numen] distinct from the universality of things, DS 2901). The Church* confesses a God infinite* in all perfection, hence in intellect (intellectu ac voluntate omnique perfectione infinitum, dogmatic constitution Dei Filius, DS 3001).

The divine attribute of knowledge contains within itself two difficulties. What does “knowledge” mean when the concept is applied to God? To what does the postulated totality of divine knowledge extend? A third question may also express the problems: is the analogy* between divine knowledge and human knowledge valid, with the proviso that the former is unlimited? Like all his other attributes, God’s knowledge is marked by its infinity (Augustine, De civitate Dei, I. 12. 18–19). Divine knowledge is then characterized as omniscience or all-knowingness, understanding by these words (which appear to have been coined in the modern period, whereas “omnipotence” is much earlier) that divine knowledge or intelligence extends to everything and perhaps beyond (infinitely); that is, beyond what we ourselves can consider an object of thought: everything that is, everything that is not but is to come, the possible, indeed the impossible, God himself. But the development of the concept by the Greek and Latin Fathers very largely precedes the word, particularly with respect to prescience (Augustine). A. Michel (1941) recapitulated patristic treatment of the subject on the basis of the Enchiridion patristicum. The examination of various objects of divine knowledge is organized with varying degrees of difficulty depending on whether the theologies concerned borrow their concepts from Platonism* or Aristotelianism*.

b) Biblical Treatment: From the Knowledge of Secrets to the Knowledge of Everything. The Old Testament frequently asserts that God knows what it is difficult to know: the secret thoughts of man (Ps 91:11), his sins and his offenses (Ps 69:6), the depths of the heart (soul*-heart-body) and the mind (Ps 7:10; Prv 15:11; 1 Kgs 8:39—repeated against indifferentism in the encyclical Quanto conficiamur moerore of 10 August 1863, DS, 2866), the person* even before he or she exists (Jer 1:5; see also Rom 8:29; 1 Cor 13:12), or events before they occur, which is known as prescience (Is 44:7; Dn 13:42). The knowledge that God has of human beings is always more than information: it expresses his interest in humankind (Ps 33:13), his tender love, or indeed his choice* (e.g., Gn 18:19). God sees what is hidden (Dn 13:42), the Father sees in darkness (Mt 6:4f.), the Son knows what is in man (Jn 2:25), and he knew in advance who would betray him (Jn 6:65). Nothing is invisible for God (Heb 4:13, which Vatican I relies on). But this lucidity on God's part is not enough to provide a conceptual foundation for omniscience. As for the pairing wisdom and knowledge, sometimes joined by intelligence, it is not infrequent in the Old Testament but is attributed to the one to whom God has given the gift of his spirit (e.g., Ex 35:31; 2 Chr 1:11f.; Eccl 2:26; Is 33:6; Dn 5:11), or to the spirit as given (Is 11:2), and is not predicated of God himself (commentators have not been unanimous in relating to God the counterexample, Jb 12:13). Unlike omnipotence, omniscience therefore does not seem as such to constitute a divine name* in the Old Testament, whereas Paul clearly mentions the “riches and wisdom and knowledge of God” (Rom 11:33 and Col 2:3).

1 Samuel 2:3 says of the Lord that he is the “God of knowledge” (gnôseôn, scientiarum [Bernard* of Clairvaux, De consideratione V. 4]). In Islam, omniscience is one of the 99 names of God. The three Old Testament passages that the treatises De Deo uno traditionally quote to confirm the omniscience of God are the following (the Vulgate each time translates scientia): Esther 14:15 (Vulg. = Greek Esther C, 25), “Lord, Thou hast knowledge of all things (gnôsis)” (see also 13:12 = C, 5); Ecclesiasticus 42:18 (Vulg. 19), “The Most High knows all that may be known (eidêsis)”; Job 21:22, “Will any teach God knowledge (sunesis kai epistêmè)?” (we might add Bar 3:32 and Jb 28:24). Except for the Pauline references already mentioned, the New Testament is rather preoccupied with the knowledge of Christ*, as in John 21:17. Similarly, in John 16:30 it is the omniscience of Jesus* that causes him to be recognized as Son of God (see also Jn 4:19, 25, 39); 1 Corinthians 2:10, for its part, confirms the omniscience of the Holy Spirit. However, it is not certain that the question of the knowledge of Christ finds a clear basis in the New Testament. Relying on Acts

2:23 (“this Jesus, delivered up according to the definite plan [boulè, consilium] and foreknowledge [prognosis, praescientia] of God”), one might propose the schema: there is prescience on the Father's part and obedience on the Son's part to what the Father knows. Acts also contains a single occurrence of pronoia in the sense of providentia (and not cura): in Acts 24:2 the pagan Tertullus speaks of the pronoia of the governor Felix. The “pre-thought” of Proclus was also translated by providentia.

c) Does God Know Himself? The argument according to which God knows himself is problematical in the framework of a Neoplatonic philosophy* that thinks of God as the One, and this for two reasons. On the one hand, since knowledge implies a distinction between the knower and the known, or the intelligence and the intelligible, and so produces a duality, it must be excluded that the One may know; it is the second hypostasis (noûs) that has the capacity to contemplate the One in itself and hence to know itself (see, e.g., Enneads V). There would thus be a contradiction between the transcendental predicate of unity and the operative attribute of knowledge; this is why Dionysius, although he holds that the wisdom of God knows itself, has no hesitation in saying that God has no intellectual activity (Divine Names VII. 2). Further, taking seriously the fact that God is infinite makes it impossible for his essence to be known, even by himself. For John the Scot Eriugena, the proposition “God does not know himself” is true if it is understood to mean “God does not know himself in his quiddity, for God is not an objectified quid,” not being any of the knowable existents (nothingness*). In this sense alone it is possible to say that “God remains unknowable both for himself and for any intelligence” (De divisione naturae, Book II. 589 B–C); and the intelligence is forbidden to inquire about the substance of God even more than about his name (Jgs 13:18). Furthermore, if God knew himself in his substance, he could define himself: his infinity would then be relative, not absolute (587 B).

On the other hand, God's knowledge of himself causes no difficulty in an Aristotelian context, nor later for natural* theology. According to the Metaphysics 7 and 10 (which also joins together sophia and epistêmè) and De Anima III. 6 (“if there is anything that has no contrary, then it knows itself and is actually and possesses independent existence”), the God of Aristotle, an act of intelligence (energeia noûs), knows himself, he is noêsis noêseôs (Metaphysics 9, 1074_b 35), thought of thought: “And thought thinks on itself because it shares the nature of the object of thought... so that thought and object of thought are the same” (Metaphysics 7, 1072_b 20–22). Thus the epistêmè is théologikè (even though Aristotle does not use the word) because it is the knowledge that God has of God; here is posited the central thesis of theological knowledge of the Middle Ages. Thomas strictly repeated the argument in showing that in the case of God, as pure act, the intellect (operating) and the intelligible (object of the operation) are identical (ST Ia. q. 14. a. 2 resp.; CG I. 45); for if God were intelligent without being himself the object of his intelligence, a distinction would have to be made in him between power and act. God's intellect is thus his essence, and God knows his essence (1 Cor 2:10) through his essence itself, which is the intelligible species of his intellection (CG I. 46–47). To know, for God, is to know first his essence, hence to know himself (CG I. 48); that is, to know what is fundamentally incomprehensible to us, God himself. We must therefore posit a (for us) unknowable knowledge, a (for us) incomprehensible comprehension. It is therefore not paradoxical that omniscience and incomprehensibility have always been linked, from Pseudo-Dionysius (Divine Names VII. 2–3) to Descartes* (Letters to Mersenne of April and May 1630).

d) Does God Know What Is Not Himself? It is a disputed question in Scholastic (Scholasticism*) theology whether, on the basis of Physics 8 and Metaphysics 7, the God of Aristotle knows the world. It is obvious that he does know it, since the primum mobile is known; but because his intellect is what is best and must think what is best, it could only think of itself. His thought is nothing but the act of thinking his own act of thinking (a fortiori the idea of omniscience was radically foreign to Aristotle, and to Greek philosophy in general, despite the fragment [21 B24 DK] of Xenophon of Colophon, whose interpretation is open to question). Thomas* Aquinas, following Themistius (In Metaphysicam 28. 28f.), asserts that the God of Aristotle thinks the world. In this debate, Hebrews 4:13 again provides the necessary reference for a positive answer. Thomas demonstrates it as follows: God could not know himself perfectly without knowing his power. Knowing power implies knowing what that power governs; that is, the existing things of which it is the efficient cause. This demonstration of the knowledge of God is mediated, at least for created things, by recourse to his power. In addition, every effect, pre-existing in God as in its cause, is necessarily known in him according to its intelligibility (as the intelligible is in the intellect). In this way we see that the knowledge of things other than the self is for God still knowledge of himself (ST, ibid.; CG I. 49; see also De veritate, q. 2). For God knows or sees the things that are outside himself only in himself and not in themselves. August-tine claimed that God sees nothing outside himself (q. 46 of the Eighty-Three Questions) and God, “in thinking himself, thinks all things” (CG I. 49): Thomas adopts from Dionysius (Divine Names VII. 3) a formulation first used by Plotinus about the noûs (IV. 4).

Neoplatonism indeed made it easy to think that God knows everything in himself, since intelligence reaches the intelligible without going outside itself (Enneads V. 2). For Dionysius, relying on Daniel 12:42, it is as cause of all things that divine intelligence contains in itself in advance the notion of all things and hence knows all things in their principles (Divine Names VII. 2). The divine intelligence therefore knows not on the basis of existing things but on the basis of itself: “God does not know existing things by knowing them, but by knowing himself”—it is by anticipating the knowledge of the thing that the divine intelligence confers on it its essence (ibid.). The concept of cause thus has a dual function: not only does God give being to all things as their cause, but it is in the same way that he knows all things. Similarly, Augustine says: “It is not because they are that God knows all created beings . . . but it is because he knows them that they are” (De Trinitate XV. 13, based on Ecclesiasticus 23:20). Thomas, quoting Dionysius in CG I. 49, reiterates the argument (ibid., a. 8; see De veritate, q.2, a. 14): “God is the cause of things by his intelligence” (CG I. 51). It is thus through the same modality that God knows himself and knows what is not himself: he sees himself in himself, he sees truths in himself, and he still sees things in himself and not in themselves, by means of his universal causality. This entire schema fell apart with Duns Scotus and was ignored as long as it was thought that God produced representations themselves.

e) Objects and Modalities of Divine Knowledge. The plurality of objects of knowledge imposes on divine knowledge—which itself remains single—conceptual determinations and specific denominations. Alexander of Hales distinguishes between divine knowledge considered in itself, considered relatively (prescience and disposition), and finally, considered in relation to divine government (providence*, fate, predestination*, reprobation, election, tender love). Thereafter, Bonaventure*, among others, soon prepared a list in the Breviloquium (Ia. c. 8), which he chose to subsume under the heading of wisdom: knowledge of possible things; vision of what happens in the universe; approbation of what is good; prescience or foresight with regard to what will happen; disposition for what God will do; predestination of what is worthy of recompense; reprobation of what deserves to be condemned.

We cannot fully examine here these various objects, all of which pose particular problems: the singular, for the knowledge of God has the same extension as his causality (CG I. 50); matter, the principle of individuation; evil, which God knows as limitation (in accordance with its nature); and the infinite, for “all infinity is in some ineffable way made finite to God” (De civitate Dei, book 12. c. 18). We will mention here only the questions of the contingent as contingent and the prescience of God. Among the things that are not, some have been or will be: God knows them through a knowledge called “of vision” (ST Ia. q. 14. 1. 9), for the present gaze (intuitus) of God extends through all time* (see eternity* of God). As for things that have never been or will never be, God knows them through a knowledge called “of simple intelligence” (ibid.), for these things have no being distinct from the subject that conceives them.

In modern times the invention of combinatorial analysis gave Leibniz* the means of thinking about this knowledge of simple intelligence in order to rationalize the divine choice of bringing into being the best of all possible worlds. Indeed, God knows not only all things but all possible relations between possible things or phenomena (compossibility). God “looks at all the facets of the world in every possible manner, since there is no relationship that escapes from his omniscience” (Discourse on Metaphysics, §XIV). For Leibniz (Letters to Arnauld), the divine calculus even takes into account the possible decrees of his will. These arguments were adopted in a Scholastic vein by the Theologia naturalis (p. I/1 §§141–311) of Wolff, important for the history of the treatises and the teaching of De Deo uno until the middle of the 20th century. For Wolff as for Leibniz, it is God’s intelligence, and not his power or his will, that is the source of the possibilities that power actualizes (he calls actualizable possibilities “existables,” §221).

It can thus be understood that divine knowledge extends to contingent futures; the basic scriptural reference is Ecclesiasticus 23:20 (= Vulg. 29), and commentaries on it by Augustine (De Trinitate XV. xiii; see also De Genesi ad litt. book V. 18) and Origen (Super epistolam ad Romanos VII), quoted by Peter Lombard in Book 1 of the Sentences (d. 38. c. 1), which organizes the entire subject of prescience around the initial dilemma with which the Middle Ages and the modern period were to pose the question: are knowledge and prescience the cause of things, or are things the cause of knowledge and prescience? What is at stake is the status of human liberty*: does God’s prescience not abolish it? It was intellectually necessary to maintain both that an action is free (hence contingent) and yet that God knows what man will freely choose. The Thomist solution refers again to the eternity of divine knowledge (ST Ia. q. 14. a. 13). Later Scholasticism was divided between the hypothesis of physical pre-motion (that is, physically and not only psychologically determinative) and that of middle knowledge (scientia media), which works on the conditions required in order to maintain that the contingent is known in a way that is certain (God knows what a given free will would do in given circumstances); this kind of contingency (Mt 11:21) is called “futurible” (see Bañezianism*-Molinism-Baianism). Leibniz speaks of necessity ex suppositione and in this context distinguishes between a “necessitated” event (something that [an act of the] unconstrained human will is not) and a “determined” event (following the principle of sufficient reason). In every case the infallible knowledge that God has of free actions is characterized as “independent knowledge,” for it takes place a priori.

In relation to the Aristotelian conceptual system and to a modern determination of science, divine knowledge appears more as concrete knowledge-of-content than as rational knowledge-as-way-of-knowing (epistèmè, despite a few occurrences in the Septuagint in Job), to the extent that it never proceeds by discursive reasoning: it accommodates neither compound nor division (Divine Names VII. 2; CG I. 57 and 58; ST Ia. q. 14. a. 7). Thought of as visio or intuitus, the knowledge of God is a simple and immediate act: “God sees everything at once” (Augustine, De Trinitate book 15. c. 14). Intelligence, knowledge, wisdom, counsel, or prudence (that is, practical knowledge) are thus identified in God who knows everything according to a single and simple knowledge (ST Ia. q. 14. a. 1. ad 2). Because of its amplitude as because of its modality (knowing in its essence), this is called “comprehensive knowledge.”

The affirmation of the univocal character of knowledge continued to grow in strength during later Scholasticism to the point that in the modern period, comprehensive knowledge, reserved for God, became the conceptual model for all knowledge. Of course, for Descartes, “only God himself is perfectly wise, that is, only he has complete knowledge of the truth* of all things” (Letter-Preface to the Principles). In resistance to this dominant position, he asserts that “in God it is a single thing to will, to understand, and to create, with none preceding the others, ne quidem ratione” (Letter to Mersenne of 27 May 1630); this is why he firmly maintains the Augustinian distinction between conceiving (“touching with thought”) God and understanding him (“embracing with thought”); we are capable of the former, not the latter (ibid.). Descartes tirelessly repeats that the power of God, creator of our rationality, is incomprehensible to us.

But his principal contemporaries and successors were not afraid to think of human knowledge following the model of the knowledge of vision or of the beatific vision*. This is true of Spinoza, for whom knowledge of the third type makes it possible to know as God knows (Ethics II, prop. 40, note 2 and props. 45–47); and for Malebranche, for whom we see all things in God and who totally subjects divine power to divine wisdom (Treatise of Nature and Grace I, a. 1, add.); and for Leibniz, who articulates the univocal character of knowledge by making finite and infinite understanding totally homogeneous, subject to the principles of contradiction, of sufficient reason, and of the best. Finally, the “absolute knowledge” of Hegel enables man to accede to knowledge of a comprehensive type. Schleiermacher*, for his part, proposes the interpretation adopted by the principal current of Protestantism* in the 19th century: what is to be understood by divine omniscience is the absolutely spiritual character of divine power.

VINCENT CARRAUD

f) Perspectives. Even though one major question, that of the divine knowledge of evil, has never ceased to be a subject of debate in Catholic theology (Nicolas 1960; Maritain 1963; Garrigues 1982; Sentis 1992), it seems that recent scholarship has undergone a displacement of the problem of divine knowledge. On the one hand, the theological repercussions of critical exegesis* of the New Testament have necessitated a renewed interest in the knowledge of Christ, itself interpreted most frequently, in a kenotic perspective omnipresent since the 19th century, as the “faith* of Christ” (J. Guillet, Balthasar*; see Christ*’s consciousness), implying a certain ignorance on Christ’s part. On the other hand, the concept of divine intellect, already criticized by Spinoza and Hume, then by Fichte at the dawn of the Atheismusstreit, and finally shattered in the Hegelian logic of the absolute spirit (see Brito 1991), is an unquestionable subject of embarrassment in more than one contemporary theology (e.g., the critique of God conceived as noûs in Pannenberg 1988). The notion of divine subjectivity is not absent from contemporary dogmatic* discussion, and the theory of predestination is not dead (e.g., in Barth*); nevertheless, a reelaboration, governed in particular by the concept of divine love* or divine charity, has preoccupied contemporary theology in the most fruitful manner. And this reelaboration is no doubt still incomplete enough for us not yet to have at our disposal well-developed theories of the modes of knowledge appropriate to love. Anglo-American philosophy, however, has shown continued interest in the problem of divine omniscience, either in denying the consistency of the concept (A.N. Prior, Philosophy 37 [1962] 114–29; N. Kretzmann, Journal of Philosophy 63 [1966] 409–22; also Castañeda, 1989, and Hasker, 1989) or in maintaining the possible existence of a spiritual being who knows everything that it is logically possible to know while restraining his preknowledge of the future to preserve his own liberty and to leave human beings free (Swinburne 1977). Finally, omniscience cannot be attributed to the God of Process Theology, whose very being* is a “process” and one that he does not entirely govern.

JEAN-YVES LACOSTE

- Origen (v. 230), Peri archôn, Super epistolam ad Romanos.
- Augustine (388–96), De diversis quaestionibus LXXXIII, q. 46 (BAug 10, Paris, 1952, 126–27); (v. 420), De Trinitate XV, 13 (BAug 16, 484–89); (v. 420), De civitate Dei, 1. 12, c. 18–19 (BAug 35, 208–17).
- Pseudo-Dionysius (v. 480–500), Divine Names VII.
- John the Scot Eriugena (864–66), De divisione naturae, I. II.
- P. Lombard (1152), Sentences, I. I, d. 35–41 (new Ed., Rome, 1971, vols. I/II, 254–91).
- Alexander of Hales (1240–45), ST, tract. V (Ed. Quaracchi, vol. 1, 1924, 244–359).
- Bonaventure (1254–56), Questiones disputatae, De scientia Dei (in Opera omnia, Ed. Quaracchi, vol. 5, 1891, 1–43); id. (1256), Breviloquium Ia, c. 8 (ibid., 216–17).
- Thomas Aquinas (1259), CG I, 44–49; id. (1261), In Dionysium De divinis nominibus; id. (1266) ST Ia, q. 14; id. (1268–72), In Metaphysicam, I. XII.
- Molina (1588), Concordia liberi arbitrii cum gratiae donis, divina praescientia, providentia, praedestinatione et reprobatione ad nonnullos partis divi Thomae articulos, Lisbonne.
- F. Suarez (1597), Disputatio metaphysica XXX, “De divina scientia naturaliter cognoscibili,” in Disputaciones metaphysicae, Madrid (repris in Opera omnia, vol. 26, Paris, 1861, 170–83); id. (1599), De scientia Dei futurorum contingentium, in Opuscula theologica sex, Madrid (repr. ibid., vol. 11, 1858, 294–375); id. (1606), De divina substantia ejusque attributis, I. III, c. In–V, in De Deo (repr. in ibid., vol. 1, 1856, 194–214).
- Lessius (1610), De gratia efficaci, decretis divinis, libertate arbitrii et praescientia Dei conditionata, Antwerp.
- Salmenticensis, Cursus theologicus* (1631–1712), tract. III, in q. 14, Iae p., Salamanca-Madrid (new Ed., Paris, 1870–83, vol. 1, 315–670).
- Jean de Saint-Thomas (1637), Cursus theologicus, t. 2, in q. 14, Iae p., Alcalá (new Ed., Paris, vol. 2, 1883, 417–684).
- D. Petau (1644), De Deo Deique proprietatibus, I. IV, in Opus de theologicis dogmatibus (new Ed., Bar-le-Duc, vol. 1, 1864).
- B. Spinoza (1677), Ethica, Amsterdam.
- L. Thomassin (1680), De Deo Deique proprietatibus, I. VII, in Dogmata theologica, Paris (new Ed., Paris, 1865, vol. II).
- N. Malebranche (1684), Traité de la nature et de la grâce, 4th Ed., Rotterdam.
- G. W. Leibniz (1686), Discours de métaphysique.
- C. Wolff (1736), Theologia naturalis I, §141–311, Frankfurt and Leipzig (repr. of the 1739 edition, Hildesheim, 1978).
- D. Hume (publ. 1779), Dialogues Concerning Natural Religion, London (Ed. H. D. Aiken, London, 1977), parts 3 and 4.
- J. G. Fichte (1798), “Über den Grund unseres Glaubens an eine göttliche Weltregierung,” WW (Ed. I. H. Fichte), vol. 5, 177–89.

- G. W. F. Hegel (1807), Phänomenologie des Geistes, Bamberg-Würzburg (Ed. Hoffmeister, 549–64); id. (1816), Wissenschaft der Logik II, Nuremberg (Theorie Werkausgabe, Frankfurt, 1969, vol. 6, 487–573).
- D. F. Schleiermacher (1821), Der christliche Glaube, Berlin, §55 (Ed. Redeker, Berlin, 1960, vol. 1, 289–300).
- ♦ M.-J. Scheeben (1869–75), Handbuch der katholischen Dogmatik II, I, c. III (GS, Freiberg, 1948–54, 4).
- D. Kaufmann (1877), Geschichte der Attributenlehre in der jüdischen Religionsphilosophie des Mittelalters von Saadja bis Maimuni, Gotha.
- M. J. Rouët de Journel (1911), EnchP (25th Ed. 1981).
- K. Barth (1932), KD II/I (French trans. Dogmatique II/1/2, 1957, Geneva).
- A. Michel (1941), “Science de Dieu,” DThC 14, 1598–620.
- L. Gardet, M.-M. Anawati (1948), Introduction à la théologie musulmane, Paris.
- J.-H. Nicolas (1960), “La permission du mal,” RThom 60, 5–37, 185–206, 509–46.
- J. Maritain (1963), Dieu et la permission du mal, Paris (3rd Ed. 1993).
- C. Bérubé (1964), La connaissance de l’individuel au MA, Paris-Montréal.
- A. Plantinga (1967), God and Other Minds, Ithaca, N.Y.
- R. Imbach (1976), Deus est intelligere, Das Verhältnis von Sein und Denken in seiner Bedeutung für des Gottesverständnis bei Thomas von Aquin und den Pariser Questionen Meister Eckharts, Freiberg.
- R. Swinburne (1977), The Coherence of Theism, Oxford, 162–78.
- J.-M. Garrigues (1982), Dieu sans idée du mal, Limoges (new Ed., Paris, 1990).
- A. de Libera et al. (Ed.) (1984), Maître Eckart à Paris, une critique médiévale de l’ontothéologie, Paris.
- A. Funkenstein (1986), Theology and Scientific Imagination, Princeton, N.J.
- R. Brague (1988), Aristote et la question du monde, Paris.
- W. Pannenberg (1988), Systematische Theologie, vol. I, 401–16.
- H. N. Castañeda (1989), “God and Knowledge: Omniscience and Indexical Reference,” in Thinking, Language, Experience, Minneapolis, 143–59.
- W. Hasker (1989), God, Time and Knowledge, Ithaca-London.
- J.-F. Courtine (1990), Suarez et le système de la métaphysique, Paris.
- R. Brague (1991), “Le destin de la “Pensée de la Pensée” des origines au début du MA,” in T. de Koninck, G. Planty-Bonjour (Ed.), La question de Dieu selon Aristote et Hegel, Paris.
- E. Brito (1991), Dieu et l’être d’après Thomas d’Aquin et Hegel, Paris, 211–51.
- L. Sentis (1992), Saint Thomas d’Aquin et le mal: Foi chrétienne et théodicée, ThH 92.
- S. T. Bonino (1996), Introduction générale à Thomas d’Aquin, De la vérité, Paris-Fribourg, 1–240.

V. C.

See also Attributes, Divine; Bañezianism-Molinism-Baianism; Eternity of God; Immutability/Impassibility, Divine; Intellectualism; Justice, Divine; Negative Theology; Omnipotence, Divine; Omnipresence, Divine; Predestination; Providence; Simplicity, Divine; Theology; Truth; Vision, Be- atific

Kuhn, Johann Evangelist von. See Tübingen, Schools of Laity. See Lay/Laity

Lamb of God/Paschal Lamb

Of all the books of the Bible*, the Gospel of John is the only one to use the phrase “Lamb of God.” With the exception of the two passages concerned (Jn 1:29, 1:36), amnos for “lamb,” only appears in Acts 8:32 and 1 Peter 1:19. The term used in Revelation is arnion (28 times). Interpretation will vary depending on what one considers to be the completed form of the figure of the book, thus granting the christological titles of John 1:19–51 their full meaning, or, depending on whether one refers to the origins, adhering to a more archeological approach.

a) Baptist Origins. Lamb of God appears to be a christological title and should not be disassociated from other titles in the litany that accompanies the story of the four inaugural days (Jn 1:19–51), which are themselves referred to John the Baptist’s authority (1:19). He sees in Jesus* the one who “comes,” “the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world” (v. 19), then the “Lamb of God” (abbreviated form, v. 36). Then come the titles “Son of God” (v. 34, with variations “Chosen One,” or “Chosen Son”), “Messiah*,” which means Christ* (v. 41), “Son of God” and “King of Israel*” (v. 49), and even the mysterious reference to the “Son of man,” in relation to the image of Jacob’s ladder (v. 51). Even the unknown Jesus (v. 31, 33) can be understood as a messianic feature, as can the insistence on the Holy* Spirit (v. 32 f.). Several authors (e.g., Brown and Schnackenburg) now share the view that this story contains an affirmation both of Jesus’ own baptist roots, and those of the Johannine community itself, which seems particularly attached to the memory of John the Baptist (see Jn 3:22–30, 4:1 f., 5:33 f., 10:40).

b) The Paschal Lamb. The reading that is most influenced by the last stage of the book consists in interpreting it through the Paschal Lamb, starting from the founding story of Exodus 12. This figure appears in 1 Peter 1:19: “You know that you were ransomed . . . with the precious blood of Christ, like that of a lamb without blemish or spot”; and in 1 Corinthians 5:7: “For Christ, our Paschal Lamb, has been sacrificed.” This theme is not neglected in the fourth Gospel: the chronology of the Passion implies a coincidence with the sacrifice of lambs for the paschal dinner that very night (Jn 19:14), and the crucified Christ is identified with the Paschal Lamb, not one of whose bones would be broken (Jn 19:36; see Ex 12:46). Nevertheless, this interpretation does not fit well in the context of royal appointment in a baptist environment.

c) Servant of Isaiah. With 1 Peter 1:19, the catechism scene described in Acts 8:32 offers the second occurrence of amnos. Here, the “Servant” found in Isaiah 52:13–53:12 is presented “like a lamb that is led to the slaughter, and like a sheep that before its shearers is dumb,” (Is 53:7). It is therefore tempting to relate the “Lamb of God” to the Servant. Jeremias suggested that “lamb” could be explained as a pun involving the Aramean talya (lamb) and the Hebrew talèh (servant). The latter term bears traits of archaic Christology (pais: Jesus, “child” or “servant”), still employed by the Apostolic* Fathers (Clement 59, 2. 3. 4; Didache 9, 2 f., 10, 2 f.). However, aside from the fact that the possibility of word play has not yet been definitively established (Dodd), the reference to Servant presents the same difficulty as the mention of the Paschal Lamb. Referring to the beginning of Jesus’ ministry, it does not seem to match the pericopal context. Furthermore, the “Lamb of God” (Jn 1: 29) “takes away” (Greek hairein) sin, while the Servant of Isaiah 53:4 “carries” it (pherein), according to the perspective of the emissary victim (Is 53:5 f., 53:10).

d) The Victorious Lamb. Revelation gives the Lamb, called arnion (originally a diminutive of arèn, but as early as the Septuagint, the three terms—amnos, arèn and arnion—seem equivalent), a certain number of characteristics related to royal power (Rev 7:17, 17:14). The same perspective can be found in apocalyptic* literature (Testament of Joseph 19:8; 1 En 90:6–19). Rather than the sacrificed lamb, we now encounter a young ram with budding horns, whose insolent spirit represents the vitality of the messiah-king. This suggestion, supported by Dodd, has not been unanimously accepted by exegetes. Nevertheless, given the current state of research, it at least seems the best suited to the context of the pericope devoted to the testimony of John the Baptist. Given that, through the theme of the Lamb, the apocalyptic aspect brings together royal symbolism and the tradition of sacrifice (see especially Jn 5:6, 5:9), exegesis* can take into account that process of reinterpreting Old Testament figures by means of which, as early as the New Testament, the first christological ideas were developed.

Thus, far from being incompatible, the various levels of meaning attest to the integration of the pericope of John 1:19–51 into the whole hermeneutic plan of the Gospel according to John.

- J. Jeremias (1933), “Amnos-arèn-arnion,” ThWNT 1, 342–5.
- C. H. Dodd (1963), Historical Tradition in the Fourth Gospel, Cambridge.
- R. E. Brown (1966), The Gospel according to John, I–XII, New York.
- A. Dupont-Sommer, M. Philonenko (Ed.) (1987), La Bible: Écrits intertestamentaires, Paris.
- P. Grelot (1994), L’espérance juive à l’heure de Jésus, 2nd Ed., Paris.

YVES-MARIE BLANCHARD

See also Animals; Apocalyptic Literature; Expiation; Messianism/Messiah; Passover; Sacrifice; Sin

Language, Theological

The problem of theological language, and the criteria for its coherence and validity, is not new in theology*. But the most important debate on the subject in our times has doubtless taken place in England, where the validity of religious language has been questioned by linguistic philosophy*. The latter is based on the premise that the traditional metaphysical problems are not real problems but only follow from linguistic misunderstandings. Many statements in reality have a very different function from the one they appear to have.

a) Logical Positivism. Post-1945 linguistic philosophy was a reaction against the logical positivism dominating English language philosophy and, specifically, the philosophy of religion* since the publication of Language, Truth and Logic (1936) by Alfred J. Ayer (1910–89). During the next five decades it was impossible to deal with these questions without including long introductions devoted to the nature of religious language. Logical positivism, which was born in Vienna in the 1920s, was in itself a reaction against metaphysical idealism. Its proponents maintained that all propositions were either analytical or synthetic and that all synthetic propositions were empirical—that is, based on tangible observation. A metaphilosophical problem thus ensues: are philosophical propositions empirical or tautological? What the Viennese were mostly interested in was giving an empirical content to the terms employed by the natural sciences*. If these did not come down directly to tangible observation, they had to be at least part of a theory consisting of propositions that could be verified or falsified through observation. This meant that scientific language had its basis in experience, while metaphysical language or a fortiori theological language did not. Therefore, the latter were languages devoid of meaning. As for the language of ethics or esthetics, it was a disguised way of expressing emotions: This language of values was meaningful without having any claims to truth*. Facts and values were strictly distinguished.

Theology was quickly called into question. In fact, its very existence became problematic: was it really a rational discourse whose statements were subject to verification or falsification? How was a discipline to be taken seriously if it did not state its solution to the problem of truth-value and the cognitive status of “religious language” to begin with? In reality, it was “religious language” and not “theological language” that was discussed—and this was misleading, since it was precisely the justification and truthfulness of theological statements that were at issue. It was only very late, for example, that interest in metaphor and symbol appeared. As for what constituted the essentials of religious language (such as rituals and gestures) for believers, as well as for liturgists, historians, and sociologists of religion, it was as if it did not exist.

As much as Ayer subsequently modified his version of logical positivism, he still denied the value of all claimed statements on the subject of God* (see his last important work of 1973). But in so doing, he based his reasoning much more on the distinction between fact and value, than on any contribution by the philosophy of language. In fact, all terminology in the debate on the cognitive status of religious language was, for the most part, prescribed by philosophers who had no subtle or innovative ideas with regard to language but who, carrying Hume’s legacy, were obsessed by the distinction between value and fact. According to Hume, what ought to be cannot be deduced from what is; there is such a “logical hiatus” between fact and value that we can principally separate all things respectively concerning them in any statement.

These philosophers were more interested in ethics* than in theology, and in the context of this debate they evolved in the direction of moral noncognitivism. Ayer, for example, classifies into four categories what had previously been considered in ethics to be statements endowed with a value of truth: 1) term definitions, 2) descriptions of moral phenomena, 3) exhortations to good conduct, and 4) ethical judgments. Only the first of these categories is philosophically respectable, since it is analytical in the Kantian sense. The second category refers to “soft” sciences such as sociology and psychology. Exhortations, in their turn, have no relation to reality, but are “exclamations or orders whose goal is to lead the reader [sic] to such and such an action.” As for ethical judgments, they “express only sentiments.” This is how Ayer formulated his version of moral theory known by the name of emotivism.

The same criterion of verifiability is then applied to assertions about a transcendental God. The affirmations of believers express only what they are feeling and can by no means depict or represent what is, or what could be, in reality. As Ayer observes, not without malice, this analysis goes very well with the idea of negative* theology. After all, theologians are very fond of saying that existence and divine nature are beyond language. We must make Pascal*’s wager or Kierkegaard’s leap, but we must also stop thinking that theological statements speak of the reality of things. Ayer does not quote any theologian (it is unlikely that he never read a single one), but it is evident that a kind of radical fideism* would fit very well, at least on a superficial level, with the purely subjective theological statements. In fact, those theologians who wanted to keep up with the times felt obliged to adopt the perspective of logical positivism and to reject to a great extent the usual theological discourse. Instead of reaching into the heart of things and objecting to the reduction of all esthetic, ethical, and religious statements to a noncognitive status, many theologians between the 1940s and the 1980s instead tried to reformulate Christian theism in a way that would satisfy all of Ayer’s principles.

b) Logical Empiricism in Theology. We must cite here David Cox’s essay “The Significance of Christianity” (Mind, 1950), a remarkable document that is clearly symptomatic of theological reductionism. The word God is rightfully used only in phrases like “meeting God” but is considered improper any time it is meant to designate a reality independent of the speaker's subjective experience*. We should not take the proposition "God is love*" as some sort of information; in fact, it means that one cannot call "meeting God" the meeting with some person who does not love one. The statement that "God created the world from nothingness" (creation*) means that everything we can call "material" can serve to benefit humanity. According to the author, this kind of reinterpretation allows Christianity to avoid "the exile to which metaphysics are relegated, and rightfully so, by logical positivists." Cox's example is obviously an extreme case of submission to the criteria of logical positivism, but many other theologians admire the fact that theological language does not claim to convey truth and loses nothing from being considered purely an expression.

R. B. Braithwaite, for instance, supported the idea that Christianity provided a fund of "stories" to help us to behave well while the question of their truthfulness or falsity was not posed at all (An Empiricist's View of the Nature of Religious Belief, 1955). The essence of Christian stories is to inspire "a disposition to agape." John Hick's theory of "eschatological verification" shows a bit more respect for the cognitive status of theological statements. For Hick, religious affirmations that are not susceptible to being verified experimentally will be so in the future world (Faith and Knowledge, 1957). Richard M. Hare, who had a great influence on the debate, maintained, for his part, that moral judgments as well as some religious judgments have a "prescriptive" meaning. To say that an act, for example, is good or bad, does not mean one attributes it a value of its own but that one recognizes that it is universally imperative to give it some standing or to avoid it in this or that case. For Hare, religious affirmations certainly do not represent reality; nevertheless, he suggests (see Flew and MacIntyre, 1955) that we regard them as quasi-metaphysical outlooks on the world (he even proposes a name for them, "blik").

It is understandable that the problem of religious language should arise in these terms. However, we shall see in retrospect that a dilemma of choice between factual usage and emotional usage of language cannot lead anywhere and dooms one to incomprehension, both in the area of religion and in the moral and esthetic area.

Some philosophers, such as Ian T. Ramsey (1915–72), while staying in the essentially positivist framework of linguistic analysis, made great efforts to explain the "strangeness" of religious expressions. Upon further scrutiny, theological propositions, even though lacking the realism that is usually attributed to them, are neither totally devoid of cognitive content

(as Ayer, Cox, Braithwaite, and Hare believed), nor do they offer direct information on the world (as traditional metaphysical realism was supposed to believe). As Ramsey rightly saw, to say that theological language is not concerned with reality is not the result of some extraordinary progress made by the philosophy of language, but it is a sign that the distinction between truth and value persists. Hence, the importance of some religious affirmations comes, for him, from what they can express or from their ability to create what he calls "revelation" situations. He attempts to show, by means of familiar expressions—such as "break the ice" and "it sticks out a mile"—that an everyday event can sometimes be a "revelation" and that ordinary relationships can suddenly become meetings that can change one's life. Ramsey supplies the perfect example of a fundamentally orthodox theologian who accepts the rules of logical empiricism and must, therefore, turn to everyday life to find cases of language escaping the distinction between truth and value. In any case his conclusions are perfectly valid: there is a kind of language usage that, although it expresses subjectivity, can reveal and transform a real situation.

c) Principle of Falsification. The volumes of essays coming out under the editorship of A. Flew and A. MacIntyre (1955) as well as Ramsey (1966), testify to an evolution of ideas leading, for example, from Flew's fierce antitheological position ("Theology and Falsification," 1949) to a more open agnosticism*, as demonstrated by R. W. Hepburn and Iris Murdoch ("Vision and Choice in Morality," 1956). According to the "principle of falsification," a proposition is devoid of meaning if it cannot be falsified, at least in principle, by an empirical observation. A proposition that cannot be falsified, cannot be verified either. Therefore, it has no cognitive status. If we apply this principle, as Flew does, to the theological propositions that speak of a loving God-Creator, we can say, still according to Flew, that the observable state of affairs—the order of nature—remains the same, whether we say that there is a Creator or not. We add nothing and take nothing out of this order by our affirmation or rejection. Therefore, the notion of a Creator is an empty one. The same is valid for the proposition "God is love," which is empty of meaning because it is obviously compatible with the most atrocious suffering. It is only by playing infinitely with the word love that we can avoid or circumvent the contradiction between God's love and suffering. In a famous formulation, Flew says that suffering is a word that has ended up a hundred times dead by virtue of its subtleties; it is a word that has gradually emptied itself of all empirical sense since it excludes no state of things observable, and no specific kind of suffering.

In Anglo-American culture it is generally assumed that only empirically verifiable propositions are cognitive and that all others are either analytical (tautological) or noncognitive (emotive). Plenty of theologians have adopted this view. Among them, Don Cupitt, for example, is the most eloquent representative of the noncognitive and nonrealist theology. He views religion as a great collective work of art, a profound expression of the human spirit, and a spontaneous burst of creative faith that “cannot, strictly speaking, be attributed either to God or to the ego, for it precedes any distinction between them” (Life Lines, 1986). Hence, religion can comply with the criteria of logical positivism while at the same time being what Cupitt calls an esthetic expression.

d) Philosophy of Anti-Empiricist Religion. Other philosophers, such as Hepburn and Murdoch, while being interested in ordinary language, and therefore recognizing linguistic analysis, pay equal attention to poetry and prose (Murdoch was also a novelist). As the latter says in her 1956 essay, which was the first sign of a moral philosophical evolution allowing her to abandon emotivism and regain a certain realism, we must distinguish between “the man who believes that moral values are a type of activity that can be observed empirically and of which he approves, from the man who believes that they are visions, inspiration, powerful forces coming from a transcendent source that he is called upon to discover, and about which he knows very little at the moment.” But philosophers still had a long way to go before they realized that linguistic analysis was prisoner to the truth/value distinction and returned to metaphysics.

By the time Ayer arrived in Vienna, Wittgenstein (1889–1951) had already discovered that the members of the Viennese circle had not really understood his Tractatus Logico-Philosophicus and mistook him for a supporter of logical positivism. Indeed, in the beginning of his career Wittgenstein had been influenced a great deal by the works of Bertrand Russell (1872–1970) on the foundations of mathematics and logic. Russell was trying to restructure mathematics on a purely logical basis. To achieve this, he made use of a type of logic where the truth (or falsity) of a whole (e.g., “It is raining and it is Friday”) was fully determined by the truth of each of its parts (“It is raining” and “it is Friday”) considered separately. The truth of a whole is a function of the truths of its constituents. This inspired in Russell a concept of reality that he called “logical atomism”: reality is essentially constituted of atoms of perceivable observation, each of which is certain and beyond doubt, all making up the basis for any knowledge. One can determine the truth or falsity of any statement by reducing the complex statement to its founding atoms and comparing them one by one, by means of observation, to “atomic” facts.

In the Tractatus Wittgenstein sought to demonstrate which type of propositions made sense within the limits of this logic and which didn’t. It turned out there were very few that made sense. And in any case, it was no longer possible to talk about ethics, esthetics, metaphysics, or theology. However, this did not make Wittgenstein much of an ally to the Vienna Circle. He believed that reality was above what could be said about it and that the inexpressible was far more important than the expressible. “The meaning of the world is to be found outside of the world” (§6, 41), but “whereof one cannot speak thereof one must be silent” (§7). This last remark from the Tractatus is far from being a warning to the positivists. On the contrary, “even if one has resolved all the scientific issues, one has not touched on the problems of life” (§6, 52).

Wittgenstein’s thought, which had grown roots in Cambridge since 1930, helped English philosophy to rid itself of the tyrannical truth/value opposition. In his view, whenever philosophers speak of knowledge, being*, subject, object, and so on, they should always consider first whether these terms have the same meaning in ordinary language—“the point is to bring these terms of metaphysical use back to daily use” (1953, §116). This is clearly reminiscent of the antimetaphysical project of logical positivism, and it has usually been understood in that fashion. But the truth/value distinction is no less metaphysical than the propositions that logical positivism attacks, and according to Wittgenstein’s principles, it does not resist being “transferred” to ordinary language. Instead of talking about language in the abstract, as he had reproached himself for doing in the Tractatus, it suffices to see how language is used in reality to define what can and what cannot be said, and to understand what is meant. Speaking is like playing a game or, rather, playing multiple games. Wittgenstein invented the expression “language games” (§23) in order to note that speaking is part of an activity, a “form of living.” It is about giving orders, obeying, describing, making attempts, telling a story, singing, joking, congratulating, praying (1953, §23). Although he did not write much on the usage of religious language (see, however, Lectures and Conversations on Aesthetics, Psychology and Religious Belief), his insistence on the “multiple kinds of language games” was deeply liberating.

John Wisdom (1904–94), who had already published some important work in the area of logical atomism, wrote, under Wittgenstein's influence, several essays of philosophical theology. One of these, "Gods" (1944; in Philosophy and Psychoanalysis, 1953) is a fundamental text in the philosophy of religion. It basically discusses Hume's position and aims to show that Hume's concept of reason* is too narrow. Calling upon the authority of ordinary language, Wisdom draws his inspiration from Wittgenstein in criticizing a philosophical theory he finds inadequate. He shows very accurately that the kind of reasoning that is at work here does not correspond to the truth/value opposition. It is like in a trial (his favorite example): the facts may be known, but this does not necessarily mean that they will be reasonably interpreted; and it is not because one gets at this interpretation informally, instead of through deduction, that it will be arbitrary or entirely subjective. By this analysis of the real usage of language, Wisdom demonstrates to what extent our thoughts are richer and more complex than philosophical theories sometimes allow. His redemption of "informal reasoning" influenced some theologians (e.g., Renford Bambrough, who wrote Reason, Truth and God, 1969, and Basil Mitchell, author of The Justification of Religious Belief, 1973).

For Kai Nielsen, it was a "Wittgensteinian fideism" to try to avoid in this way working out the proof of the existence* of God by studying only the way of speaking about "God" in a religious context (Philosophy, 1967). However, there is one philosopher, D. Z. Phillips, who on first consideration might be considered an absolute fideist of Wittgenstein's type. Phillips is credited with the idea that religious language is such a different kind of play from all other forms of language play that it can only be understood by initiates; what makes sense in religious discourse can only be determined by believers; religious propositions cannot be criticized from the outside; and finally, religious beliefs cannot be affected by the evolution of the world. In this case, religion is a "language game" or a "form of living" that has its own rules of meaning and truth, and which the nonbeliever cannot enter. Nielsen did not accept this view in the name of an atheism* that sought to imply that he understood religious language too well to expose it as false.

It is not too certain, however, that Phillips was such a fideist in reality. He seems to be defending mostly the idea that since religion is necessarily related to birth, death*, and sexuality, the language of believers, at least in its fundamental forms (liturgy* and prayer*), is quite close to that of the common people. Once again the Wittgensteinian process lies in remembering how language is truly used in spite of what philosophical theories say. For Phillips, religious philosophy within the English academy has never really ceased to be logico-positivist, and he sees it as his task to combat theological rationalism*, which consists in applying to beliefs and religious practices criteria that are not appropriate to them. Theological language must be rooted in the language of piety and Christian life without forgetting the more general concerns of humanity.

The work of J. L. Austin (1911–60), independently of Wittgenstein's later research, owes a great deal to the Aristotelian tradition at Oxford and has had a considerable influence. From the perspective of "linguistic phenomenology," Austin created a distinction between performative and constative statements (1962). Constative or descriptive statements are true or false; performative statements are "felicitous" or "infelicitous," but they cannot be either true or false. For example, the statement "I christen this vessel Queen Elizabeth" cannot be false but it can be "infelicitous" if this is not my business or if it is not the right moment to do it. Inversely, "I have christened this vessel" is true or false.

Austin distinguished three kinds of linguistic acts: locutionary, in which one speaks to describe what is happening; illocutionary, in which one tells something to somebody with a certain "force"; and perlocutionary, which is the indirect effect of the statement upon the listeners. He ended up believing that all statements were simultaneously locutionary and illocutionary, and by the time of his premature death he had even abandoned these distinctions except in an approximate sort of way, for the sake of restoring to contemporary philosophy the meaning of language that we see in Aristotle's Rhetoric. In Austin's wake, John Searle (1969) examined the necessary logical conditions for accomplishing illocutionary acts, such as "to promise" or "to give an order." This allowed theologians to understand better that forgiveness, blessing*, and praise* have a different function from stories and descriptions (see A. C. Thiselton, New Horizons in Hermeneutics, 1992). But it is quite clear today that the theory of linguistic acts was only one more effort to evade the truth/value distinction.

By 1970, under the influence of Wittgenstein and Austin, English philosophers no longer treated the problem of religious language with their initial empirico-positivist aggressiveness; they were also open to Continental philosophy, particularly thanks to Paul Ricoeur. Well-acquainted with Anglo-American philosophy, Ricoeur expanded the deliberations on language by integrating Freud*'s contribution and the phenomenological tradition of Edmund Husserl and Maurice Merleau-Ponty. Although he may not have marked English-language philosophy in general, his influence is still quite clear in the sphere of theology and the philosophy of religion.

e) Beyond the Debate on Religious Language? Today, analytic philosophy is far more interested in the issues of meaning, truth, and reference (Quine, Dummett, and Davidson) than in the issue of language. Philosophers of religion—and therefore theologians—are wondering if it is not time to stop questioning themselves on the cognitive status of theological language and start treating the more general problem of metaphysical and ethical realism. Janet Martin Soskice's book (1985) and the collected essays of J. Runzo (1993) approach the question without allowing logical positivism to direct their process.

This trend is evident in textbooks. In 1967 the index of God-Talk by John Macquarrie had more references to "language" than to any other concept; in 1982 the word "language" did not even appear in the index of Brian Davies's book Philosophy of Religion. We can therefore consider the matter of religious language, which lasted in English language philosophy from 1936 to 1986, to be closed. It is now part of history. This does not mean that it did not leave a trace on people's minds. It is impossible to doubt metaphysics for years on end without losing all dogmatism. Today English-speaking philosophers and theologians are very careful whenever they need to affirm something—which has nothing but advantages. On the contrary, for a philosopher like Soskice, what needs to be done is to put aside the distorted theories of language (and the rejection of metaphysics supposedly authorized by these theories) and reexamine the cognitive possibilities of metaphors, analogies, and symbols. In her studies on the referential aspect of metaphor, Soskice maintains that theists can reasonably claim to be speaking of God, but that this affirmation is linked to a more general strategy seeking to speak in a valid way of that which cannot be fully defined in other areas as well. With the help of H. Putnam's work in particular, Soskice moves away from the empiricism that linguistic philosophy and the analysis of religious language never managed to get rid of, and moves closer to metaphysical realism.

- L. Wittgenstein (1922), Tractatus Logico-Philosophicus, London.
- A. J. Ayer (1936), Language, Truth and Logic, London.
- L. Wittgenstein (1953), Philosophical Investigations, Oxford.
- L. Wittgenstein (n.d.), Lectures and Conversations on Aesthetics, Psychology and Religious Belief, Berkeley-Los Angeles, 53–72.
- A. Flew, A. MacIntyre (Ed.) (1955), New Essays in Philosophical Theology, London.
- I. T. Ramsey (1957), Religious Language, London.
- J. L. Austin (1962), How to Do Things with Words, Oxford.
- J. M. Bochénski (1965), The Logic of Religion, New York.
- I. T. Ramsey (Ed.) (1966), Christian Ethics and Contemporary Philosophy, London.
- J. Macquarrie (1967), God-Talk, London.
- John Searle (1969), Speech-Acts, London.
- D. Z. Phillips (1970), Faith and Philosophical Enquiry, London.
- A. J. Ayer (1973), The Central Questions of Philosophy, London.
- B. Casper (1975), Sprache und Theologie: Eine philosophische Hinführung, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna.
- I. Murdoch (1975), The Sovereignty of Good, London.
- I. U. Dalferth (1981), Religiöse Rede von Gott, Munich (bibl.).
- J. M. Soskice (1985), Metaphor and Religious Language, Oxford.
- M. Dummett (1991), The Logical Basis of Metaphysics, London, 322–51.
- H. Putnam (1992), Renewing Philosophy, London.
- J. Runzo (Ed.) (1993), Is God Real? London.
- I. U. Dalferth (1995), "Sprache und Theologie," EKL 4, 425–34.

FERGUS KERR

See also Credibility; Deism and Theism; Existence of God, Proofs of; Hermeneutics; Knowledge of God; Narrative Theology; Nominalism; Philosophy; Religion, Philosophy of; Truth

Last Things. See Eschatology

Lateran I, Council

1123

The first three Lateran councils formed a continuity with the efforts of Pope Gregory VII (1073–85) to liberate the church* from any secular tutelage, especially from the German emperor, and with his active desire for reform, especially of the clergy. The “investiture controversy” had to be resolved during the pontificate of Calixtus II (1119–24). The antipope Gregory VIII was arrested and died in 1121. The Concordat of Worms was signed on 23 September 1122. According to the terms of this concordat, the emperor was to renounce the appointment of the prelates on the spiritual level (appointment “by the cross and ring”). He would respect the full freedom of election and consecration and would restore the goods of the Holy See and of other churches. The elected prelate would receive from the emperor, “by the scepter,” his worldly possessions (regalia), and would observe the commitments made toward the ruler. The edict of Worms was ratified by the “general council” that met in the Lateran between 19 and 27 March 1123 in the presence of at least two hundred bishops* and priests. Canons 3, 4, 8, and 123 refer to this question.

On the jurisdictional and disciplinary level, Lateran I strengthened episcopal power in several ways, notably in relation to the absolution of the excommunicated (can. 2), and canonical institutional and pastoral responsibility in churches served by monks (can. 12). It prohibited simony—all practices that consist in giving or receiving a spiritual good (for example, the sacrament* of Holy Orders) in exchange for a worldly good, generally money (can. 1). It condemned the omission of any of the formal stages on the way to Holy Orders (can. 6), as well as the cohabitation of clerics with women other than their close relations (can. 7). It prohibited marriage* in the case of high-ranking clerics* and imposed separation to prevent this law from being violated (can. 21). It renewed previous prescriptions regarding the “peace*” and the “truce” of God*, the safety of travelers and pilgrims (cans. 14 and 15), the status of crusaders, and the protection of families and their property (can. 10). The council also condemned intermarriage (can. 9) and counterfeiters (can. 13).

Although previous councils (Clermont in 1095 and Toulouse in 1119) had inspired Lateran I, this council would serve as an example for numerous reforming synods* of Western Europe. Furthermore, canons 1, 4, 6, 9, 10, 15, 17, 18 and 20–22 were integrated into Gratian’s Decree (c. 1140).

• Acts: Mansi 21, 277–304.

Decrees: COD, 187–94 (DCO II/1, 409–25).

R. Foreville (1965), Latran I, II, III et IV, HCO, 44–72 and 165–79.

G. Alberigo (Ed.) (1990), Storia dei concili ecumenici, Brescia.

JEAN LONGÈRE

See also Church and State; Cleric; Ecclesiastical Discipline; Structures, Ecclesial

Lateran II, Council

1139

The Second Lateran Council was, like the first, known for abolishing a schism*, in this case the schism of the antipope Anacletus II (reigned 1130–38). Convened by opened the assembly with a solemn speech on the unity* of the church; he dismissed Antecletus's supporters, including Peter of Pisa (can. 30), who was nevertheless supported for several months and defended by Bernard* of Clairvaux.

Pope Innocent II (reigned 1130–43), it brought together roughly a hundred participants, mainly from western Europe, between 2 and 9 April. Innocent II

The 30 canons of Lateran II are more developed than those of Lateran I. They are often upheld by the Acts of the Councils of Clermont (1130) and Pisa (1135).

Ecclesiastical* discipline was greatly stressed and a number of practices were condemned, including: simony (cans. 1, 2, and 24), secular investiture (can. 25), and the holding of churches or tithes by laity*, giving ecclesiastic responsibilities to adolescents or clerics* who had not received the required orders (can. 10). Monks and canons were forbidden to be lawyers or doctors for payment (can. 9). Episcopal seats could not remain vacant for more than three months (can. 28). The decision made at the Council of Pisa (1135) that annulled the marriage* of a major cleric or monk was reiterated (cans. 6 and 7) and was applied to cloistered nuns (can. 8). Proclaiming the annulment of a major cleric's marriage was supremely important in the legislation concerning ecclesiastic celibacy. Moreover, the council defended the sacraments (the body and blood of Christ*, baptism* of children, priesthood*, and marriage*) against heretics—that is, the Cathars (can. 23). It warned against “false penance*” which consists of, for example, repenting for only one sin* (can. 22) and it renewed the prohibition of marriage between blood relations (can. 17).

In terms of social morality, the council aimed at limiting violence by encouraging truce and the peace* of God* (cans. 11–12). It also discouraged tournaments (can. 14) and issued condemnations of arson (cans. 18–19), brutality against clerics and violations of the right of sanctuary (can. 15), and the use of deadly weapons against other Christians (can. 29).

• Acts: Mansi 21, 423–546.

Decrees: COD, 195–203 (DCO II/1, 427–45).

R. Foreville (1965), Latran I, II, III et IV, HCO, 73–95 and 180–94.

G. Alberigo (Ed.) (1990), Storia dei concili ecumenici, Brescia.

JEAN LONGÈRE

See also Catharism; Ecclesiastical Discipline; Heresy; Lateran I, Council; Schism; Unity of the Church

Lateran III, Council

1179

On 7 March 1159, Orlando Bandinelli was appointed pope under the name Alexander III; a minority favored Octaviano of Monticello, whom Frederick Barbarossa would acknowledge at the Council of Pavia (1160) under the name Victor IV. This new chapter in the battle between church and empire was marked by the emperor's incursions into Italy, the exile of the pope*, and the support given to Alexander by most of Europe's rulers. The peace* brought about in Venice in July 1177 was a victory for the papacy; the agreement prepared for a general council* for ratification intended to guarantee the unity* of the church, which had been upset over the past decades by schisms* and a series of antipopes.

The Third Lateran Council opened with a speech given by Rufinus, the bishop* of Assisi, on universality and the unity of the church around Rome*. The council's three sessions were held between 5 March and 19 March and brought together about 300 members—predominantly the bishops of Italy, but also including eight Fathers of the Latin East and representatives of central Europe.

To avoid schisms resulting from contested papal elections, it was decided that from then on, a pope could be elected only by members of the College of Cardinals and by no less than a two-thirds majority (cans. 1 and 16), a principle that was thereafter respected. Moreover, the elections of the “heresiarchs” (antipopes) were declared null and void (can. 2).

On a doctrinal level, Lateran III examined certain christological opinions attributed to Peter Lombard, who had taught in Paris before becoming bishop (1158–60) (Scholasticism*). Peter was reproached for his notions concerning Christ's humanity—as a man, Christ “was not something.” Some concluded “that he was nothing,” and the name Christological nihilism was given to this odd position. Today it is thought to have been influenced more by Abelard*. Adversaries of Peter Lombard and Alexander III himself sometimes judged Peter’s christological teachings severely. But there were several Fathers linked to him and his thought who did not want his memory to be tainted by any reprobation, and so the council did not make any dogmatic decisions against him.

Without accusations of specific errors, Lateran III condemned the Cathars, those who protected them, and also armed groups that “destroy and devastate everything.” Bearing arms against them was authorized (can. 27). Two canons regulated and limited the relationships Christians had with Jews and Saracens (cans. 24 and 26). The council also wanted to broaden access to knowledge. Thus, each cathedral church was obligated to offer a benefice to a teacher so that he might teach for free; the council asked that the licentia docendi, or authorization to teach, be awarded free of charge (can. 18). Lateran III greatly helped to make the bishops’ right to monitor the group of priests in charge in his diocese indisputable. It sought to preserve the heritage of churches (cans. 4, 9, 14, 15, and 17); it forbade nonresidence and amassing benefices (cans. 13 and 14), and provided for a priest* and chapel for lepers (can. 23).

Books on moral theology* from the end of the century would partly make the teachings of Lateran III known. In particular, its 27 canons would appear in the collections of papal decrees (Compilationes 1–5) at the end of the 12th and beginning of the 13th centuries. They all appeared in Decretals by Gregory IX (1234).

• Acts: Mansi 22, 209–468.

Decrees: COD, 205–25 (DCO II/1, 447–85).

R. Foreville (1965), Latran I, II, III and IV, HCO, 116–58 and 210–23.

J. Longère (Ed.) (1982), “Le troisième concile du Latran (1179): Sa place dans l’histoire.” Paper presented during a round table session of the CNRS, Paris, 26 April 1980.

G. Alberigo (Ed.) (1990), Storia dei concili ecumenici, Brescia.

JEAN LONGÈRE

See also Christ and Christology; Church and State; Cleric; Ecclesiastical Discipline; Structures, Ecclesial

Lateran IV, Council

1215

After the fall of Jerusalem* in 1187, the pope* was able to have the leaders of the West suspend their debates and focus on helping the East. The Third Crusade, a partial success, led to the seizure of Saint-Jean-d’Acre in 1189. The Fourth Crusade, called by Pope Innocent III (reigned 1198–1216) was, for political reasons and in spite of the pope’s opposition, turned toward Constantinople. The pope thought, incorrectly, that the attacks on Constantinople might favor unification between the Greek and Latin Churches and lead to renewal of the crusade on better foundations.

In the West there continued to be conflict between France and Germany, and between the emperor of Germany and southern Italy. Cathar heresy* ravaged southwestern France. South of the Pyrenees the reconquest gained ground with the victory of Las Navas de Tolosa (1212). In Paris, spurred by the construction of Notre Dame Cathedral, there was intense theological activity, mainly pastoral in nature. In the end, the seven sacraments* were emphasized and teachers on the faculty were obliged to preach. It was first in Paris, then in Bologna, that Innocent III had been trained. Around 1205, the bishop of Paris, Eudes de Sully, promulgated synod statutes. Many of their canons inspired Lateran IV. As a group, they would guide all synod legislation for European dioceses in the 13th century. Starting in 1206 Dominic de Guzman preached, alone or with others, in the countries won by Catharism*. That same year Francis of Assisi gave away all his possessions and left for Gubbio. The first friars joined him in 1208.

Innocent III’s personality strongly marked the government* of the church. Despite defeats and deviations, he never abandoned the idea of a crusade. He thought that the development of Cathar heresy resulted from a general decline in morals and from the pastoral passivity of clerics* and passion for profit, especially among the prelates. On 19 April 1213 he launched one bull to convene the Fourth Lateran Council and another to announce the crusade for which he claimed responsibility so as to avoid any drift toward temporal ends.

Attendance at the November 1215 council was high and much greater, in number and representation, than at the three preceding councils. At least 400 Fathers were present, including many from the Latin East. Heads of orders, abbots, and representatives from cathedrals and collegiate churches came in throngs. The leaders from the West all sent delegates.

Lateran IV opened with a canon, The Catholic Faith, which is often called by its first word, Firmiter. Thus it raised the dogmatic concerns from the first ecumenical councils. The first of the canon's three parts is on the Trinity* and Creation*. The second part concerns the mysteries of the Incarnation* and Redemption, emphasizing judgment* and eschatological sanctions. The third part focuses on the church* and questions of sacramental theology—especially on the Eucharist*, baptism*, and penance*.

Without naming them, canon 1 designates the Cathars and the Waldensians*. It refers to the Cathars by affirming the goodness of all creatures, even demons*, who were created good but became evil through their errors and who bring down man with them (liberty*). The canon refers to the Waldensians when it declares the priest the only minister of the Eucharist and affirms that baptism is necessary for the salvation* of children and adults. Canon 3, on preachers without a mission, among other itinerant preachers, involves both the Cathars and the Waldensians.

During the council an accusation of Tritheism was made against Joachim de Flore (†1201) in connection with a lost work in which he attacked Peter Lombard. But the thought of Joachim de Flore, represented in his other texts, was always orthodox with regard to divine unity*. It was rather because he attacked Peter Lombard that Joachim de Flore was condemned by Lateran IV (can. 2), a sentence that would scar his memory, even though his loyalty to the church was recognized and even though Pope Honorius III spoke in favor of him and his order (December 1220).

Canon 2 “reproaches and condemns the extravagant beliefs of the ungodly Amaury.” It does not, however, note any heresy in Amaury (Amalric) of Bène, undoubtedly to avoid a repeat of the notoriety that had surrounded the Council of Paris in 1210, which forbade teaching Aristotle's books on natural philosophy.

Lateran IV also focused on all the sacraments*, except for Confirmation*. In addition to favoring baptism for children (can. 1), it forbade rebaptism—a prohibition aimed at the Greeks, who had had “the temerity to do it” (can. 3).

The most famous decision (can. 21) concerns the obligation of every Christian to confess at least once a year to his or her parish priest and to receive the Eucharist at Easter. Many believers would respect these requirements until the 20th century. This same canon also invites the confessor to discernment, to pastoral prudence*, and to strict respect of the sacramental secret. Priests and believers must show reverence for the Eucharist (cans. 19–20). The council authenticated the word transubstantiation to denote the conversion of bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ*. This term was fairly new, having been used and discussed by theologians only since the middle of the 12th century. Coined independently from any Aristotelian influence, it would henceforth become part of dogmatic* vocabulary.

Because of pastoral concerns, marriage was forbidden only between blood relations (can. 50). In order to safeguard the liberty* of spouses and the unity of the couple, secret marriages were condemned (can. 51).

The council also took interest in church government* and the life of clerics. The diversity of rituals and languages in a single area was acknowledged to fall under the responsibility of a single bishop* (can. 9). The council instituted the practice of appointing preachers to help ordinaries (bishops and other officials) in their teaching work (can. 10) and establishing teachers in each cathedral to undertake the training of clerics (can. 11; see also Lateran III, can. 18). Monks were to have general chapters every three years (can. 12). Prohibition of new orders (can. 13) was to only slightly curb the development of new religious families, but the obligation to choose an existing rule was to bring the Order of Preachers (Dominicans) to adopt the Rule of Saint Augustine and to be considered canons.

Lateran IV sought to consolidate the dignity of the clergy. It condemned any disrespect of chastity and accompanied these condemnations with heavy sanctions. Clerics were prohibited from doing many things (cans. 14–18). Lateran IV once again denounced all forms of simony or greed for clerics (cans. 62–66). The council Fathers also made several positive recommendations. They called for simplicity of clothing and the worthy celebration of offices, and they insisted that close attention be paid to church cleanliness, the maintenance of holy oils and the Eucharist, and the choice and veneration of relics* (cans. 16, 17, 19, 20, and 62).

While the council acknowledged the patriarchates of the East and the eminence of Constantinople, after Rome*, its centralized and pyramidal notion of the church was completely foreign to Orthodoxy* (can. 5).

Finally, the constitution “To liberate the Holy Land” (14 December 1215, can. 17) mobilized people and resources, set the times and place for meeting, specified protective measures concerning all crusades, and declared peace* for four years in order save all the forces for expedition. It renewed the indulgence* of crusades.

Innocent III had planned a trip to the East on 1 June 1217, but he died on 16 July 1216 at age 56. The Fifth Crusade would first capture Damietta (1218–19) and then lose it (1221). All the canons of Lateran IV, except for canon 71, were included in the Decretals (1234) of Pope Gregory IX.

• Acts: Mansi 22, 953–1086.

Decrees: COD, 227–71 (DCO II/1, 487–577).

R. Foreville (1965), Latran I, II, III and IV, HCO, 227–386.

G. Alberigo (Ed.) (1990), Storia dei concili ecumenici, Brescia.

JEAN LONGÈRE

See also Cleric; Hierarchy; Marriage; Ministry; Penance; Scholasticism; Structures, Ecclesial

Lateran V, Council

1512–17

The Fifth Lateran Council took place in Rome between 3 May 1512 and 6 March 1517 under Popes Julius II and Leon X. The context was essentially political—to oppose the activities of King Louis II of France, who, in order to secure his territories in Italy, had successfully assembled a small ecclesiastical gathering, first in Pisa and then in Rome. (Louis’s gathering was called a conciliabulum by the pope*’s supporters). Even if the legitimacy of Lateran V was never questioned, historians have been harsh, referring to it as the “draft for the Council of Trent*” or even “the Council of the Indecisive.” Erasmus* even wondered if it could really be considered a council at all.

Lateran V had three set goals: peace* in Europe, reform “of the head and of the parts,” and the crusades in Turkey. But even though these issues were continually discussed during deliberations, it was unquestionably the church’s plans for reform that most occupied the council, and had done so even during the period of its preparation. Nearly everything cleared the way for Trent, including the meeting at Burgos in November 1511, which was summoned by King Ferdinand of Aragon; the Libellus of the Venetian Camaldolese Paul Giustiniani and Pietro Quirini; the major speeches delivered at the council by Giles of Viterbo, Cajetan, Pucci, and others—see N. H. Minnich’s The Fifth Lateran Council (1512–1517), 1993, IV—and, finally, shortly before the final session, the De Reformandis Ecclesiae Moribus by Giovanni Francesco Pico della Mirandola. But it is true that even the council’s theological contribution seems to have been more a matter of urgency or current events—for example, the legislation on the state-owned pawn shops—than a grand and needed vision.

a) Ecclesiology. The council first wanted to react against the almost conciliarist* or Gallican* tendencies of the Pisa-Milan meeting. Its victory over the schismatic meeting is in itself an assertion of pontifical ecclesiology*, determined in the 11th session (1516): “The pope has authority* over all councils; he therefore has full power to convene, adjourn, and dissolve them” (see J. D. Mansi’s Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio 32, 967). The ecclesiological doctrine of the council drew inspiration from the doctrine offered by the Dominican Cajetan (Thomism*) as early as 17 May 1513 (Sacrorum Conciliorum 32, 719–27). It could be called “curialist” (see O. de la Brosse’s Latran V et Trente, 1975). The monarchical structure of the visible church* was clearly stated here—a monarchy modeled after that of the Lord Jesus Christ, who reigns over Jerusalem* from above.

From this perspective, the council did not specially legislate on the responsibilities of bishops*, and did not need more than to reaffirm their dignity and their necessary independence before secular powers. The council also discussed their relationship to members of religious orders, but the pastoral problems posed by the exemption of episcopal jurisdiction*, a privilege for regulars, was regulated in a much more practical than theoretical manner.

Although the Maronite Christians had actually been in contact with Rome since at least the 13th century, the union had never been officially acknowledged. Negotiations for acknowledgement began in 1514 and were ratified by the council, contributing to the pope's prestige. The concluding of a concordat with France was a similar success.

b) Doctrinal Work. Pope Leo X refused to have the council discuss the delicate question of the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin Mary*. He stuck to Pope Sixtus IV's constitutions of 1477 and 1483.

The Averroist school of Padua, represented by Pietro Pomponazzi (1462–1525), a teacher in Bologna at the time of the council, considered—contrary to Thomas* Aquinas—that the Christian doctrine on the immortality of the soul* could not be defended in philosophical terms (that is, in Aristotelian terms). In opposition to this, Lateran V referred to the decisions of the Council of Vienna* (1312) and reasserted the doctrine that the soul is the form of the human body, that it is immortal, and that it is individually infused in a multitude of bodies (see the 1513 bull Apostolici Regiminis and Mansi's Sacrorum Conciliorum 32, 842). In its pronouncement, the council was refuting the Averroist theory that purported the existence of a single intellectual soul that was the same for all people (even Pomponazzi himself was against this theory). The council's text continues by asking "Christian philosophers" to fight against arguments that back the mortality of the soul or the idea of a single intellectual soul for all men, and condemns the idea of "double truth*," stating: "Any assertion opposing the truth of faith is false," for "the truth cannot oppose truth."

The council decree required a retraction from Pomponazzi, which he gave in 1518, but this did not end the controversy that incited theologians like Spina, Javelli, Contarini, and Nifo to interpret the text. Apostolici Regiminis stated that clerics* could not study philosophy* or the liberal arts without having been trained beforehand in theology*. Lateran V, therefore, was wary of humanism*, whether it was Christian or not.

c) The Council and Humanism. Nevertheless, there were talented humanists like Giles of Viterbo, Alexis Celadoni from Greece, the astronomer Paul de Middelbourg, and Cajetan himself. Lateran V took place at the same time as the "Reuchlin affair," in which the German humanist Johannes Reuchlin was reproached for recommending the study of Jewish books to Christians. The 4 May 1515 Inter Sollicitudines constitution (see Mansi's Sacrorum Conciliorum 32, 912–13), while offering congratulations for the invention of printing, which was seen as a "gift from Providence*," foresaw the dangers involved for faith* and proper standards of behavior. It therefore organized censorship codes to be applied before books were printed.

In its final session, the council voted for a text on the need and importance of preaching* in the church, warning against scandalous sermons. Less than a year later, Luther* rose up against indulgences*, taking a first step toward a Protestantism* that would strive to base itself on preaching "the pure Word* of God."

• Acts: Mansi 32, 665–1002.

Decrees: COD 593–655 (DCO II/1, 1211–1338).

P. Pomponazzi (1516), Tractatus de immortalitate animae, Bologna.

O. de La Brosse, et al. (1975), Latran V et Trente, HCO 10, Paris.

É. Gilson (1986), Humanisme et renaissance, Paris.

N.H. Minnich (1993), The Fifth Lateran Council (1512–1517), Aldershot.

GUY BEDOUELLE

See also Conciliarism; Gallicanism; Humanism, Christian; Philosophy; Trent, Council of; Truth

Law and Christianity

A. Biblical Theology

In principle, every interpretation of the law of God in Christian theology* should be based on the teachings of Jesus*. However, each New Testament text is understood as transmitting this teaching by way of an interpretation on behalf of a concrete community. Modern research hesitates when it comes to recovering the thinking of Jesus from such discordance (Marguerat 1991). If, as some have thought, Jesus clearly challenged the Law of Moses, then Matthew “judaized” his teaching. On the other hand, if Jesus never abrogated that law, then it was Paul who betrayed him. Perhaps the terms of the debate are poorly posed. Paul’s teaching concerning “the law” is based on the cross, which opens up the messianic age. He emphasizes what is new, and the novelty is such that his position has nothing to do with whatever might shed light on the personal behavior of Jesus. Moreover, the disciples of Jesus may have been more ready to recommend a radical change in the system of the law because their master had encouraged them to do so by his own activity. On the other hand, during his trial no one accused Jesus of having transgressed “the law.” We should point out that when the New Testament mentions “the law,” the reference is generally to the Jewish Torah. Coherence is therefore to be found only through a study of the whole of the Torah.

I. Law in the Old Testament

1. Vocabulary

Originally, each of the different terms for “the law” related it to the specific authority* from which it emanated: to the priests, in the case of torah and ‘edout; to the judges, in the case of mishepat; and to the king in the case of choq and miçewah. Later, the psalmist took pleasure in meditating lovingly upon all the names of the law in order to express its unity and to make it come alive for the whole people.

The primordial meaning of torah is an oracle given by a priest, after consultation, in order to settle a contested point (Hos 4:6; Is 8:20). In Deuteronomy, the word refers to a collection of statutes. In the Septuagint, this is translated as nomos, which is an equivalent rather than a direct translation.

‘Edout is a response obtained from God* positioned above the ark (Ex 25:22); in the plural, it refers to the prescriptions of God in the Covenant* (Dt 4:45). In another context, the stipulations of treaties of covenant in the Middle East are called adey in Aramaic.

Mishepat originally meant a judgment by the elders aimed at reestablishing peace* within a clan. In Israel*, the prosperity of the state depended on the king having respect for mishepat, which was associated with Moses (Ex 21:1 ff.) and God on Sinai.

An choq is a royal decree. 1 Kings 3:3 mentions the chouqqot of David; Micah 6:16 refers to those of Omri. It is said of Moses, as of a king, that he has given an choq to Israel (Ex 13:10, 15:25). In Ex 18:16–20, the term means no more than written statutes.

A miçewah is a royal order. Abimelek (Gn 26:11), the Pharaoh (Gn 47:11), and David (1 Kgs 2:1–43) give such orders; God imposes his miçewot (Gn 2:16, 3:11; 1 Sm 13:13; 1 Kgs 13:21, etc.). In the Septuagint, this is generally translated as entole.

The devarim are the words of the code in Exodus 34 and the Ten Commandments, the Decalogue* (Ex 20:1 and Dt. 5:22). In Deuteronomy, the singular form came to refer to the “Word of God.”

Underlying all these terms, what predominates is the unity of the law, which has its source in God. By contrast to the law codes of the Middle East, the laws in the Bible* are not gathered together under the names of kings: law comes from God through Moses according to the faith* of Israel.

2. Sets of Statutes

According to recent research (Crüsemann 1990), the statutes gathered in the Pentateuch are those that were promulgated on the authority of the King of Persia as the law of Israel at the time of the return from exile. They were compiled from two major traditions*, Deuteronomy and priestly writings, which had previously been rivals. The coupling of law and narrative* that structures the Torah encouraged the contemporary practice of the commandments by illustrating them through the examples of the patriarchs. Alongside the codes applicable in Judea, the stories of the patriarchs also offered a Jewish way of life that was more practicable in the eastern diaspora.

The legal sections comprise, first of all, the statutes compiled in relation to Sinai (Ex 20:1 to Nm 10:10, and Nm 28:1–30:17). Aside from the Decalogue, one can also distinguish the code of the Covenant (Ex 20:22–23:19), the code in Deuteronomy (1–6), and the law of sanctity* (Lv. 17–26); then comes the testament of Moses (Dt 4:45–30:20).

The code of the Covenant is probably the oldest of these. It states the consequences of belief in the one God in terms of life in the real world.

The code in Deuteronomy sets out a demanding program—one God, one sanctuary, one people, one law—constructed by compiling prescriptions that, in many cases, are restatements of the code of the Covenant, although in new formulations and with a new spirit (e.g., Dt. 15:1–11 and Ex 23:10 ff.; Dt 15:12–18 and Ex 21:2–11; Dt 15:19–23 and Ex 22:28 ff.). One of its characteristics is the concern for others, whether neighbors or strangers (Dt 15:12–18, 24:6 and 10–13, 17–22, etc.).

The law of sanctity is concerned with ritual and priesthood*, but also with marriage* and sexuality (ethics*, sexual). YHWH invites Israel to reveal its sanctity to the world* through its practice of the Torah. One should note its parallels with the code in Deuteronomy (e.g., Lv 19:26 and Dt 18:10; Lv 19:27 ff. and Dt 14:1; Lv 19:29 and Dt 23:18), as well as its attention to the poor and to immigrants.

3. Forms of Law

There are purely imperative, “apodictic” laws, given as short sentences, which sanction death* (Ex 21:12 and 21:15–17), subject certain crimes to curses (Dt. 27:15–26), and prohibit certain forms of sexuality (Lv 18:7–17). Deuteronomy 27:1–11 gives us the context for such laws: a solemn festival where everyone reaffirms the clauses of the Covenant. These formulas are specifically Israelite and ancient. There are also “casuistic” laws, based on the exposition of a case (“if...”): the law codes of the Middle East have been shown to contain laws very similar to these.

II. The Torah in the Jewish World

Until A.D. 70, the Jewish world was multiform. The Jews of Qumran (probably the Essenes) are well known to us because of the discovery of their library from 1947 onward, while the tradition of the Pharisees is known through its transmission in rabbinical literature. The Sadducees were also important, but we know little about them.

1. The Torah of the Pharisees

Following the reception of the Torah on Sinai, within the framework of the Covenant, every Israelite had to confess the sovereignty of God on earth, to take upon himself “the yoke of the kingdom of heaven,” to enter into the concrete practice of the Torah, and to take upon himself “the yoke of the commandments.”

a) Written and Oral Torah. The Torah gives no more than general principles: it must be summarized; it contains contradictions that need to be reconciled; and, while it is perfect, it cannot regulate life once for all, so there is a permanent need for actualization. The Pharisees did not hesitate to say that “Moses received two Torahs” on Sinai (TB Shab. 31 a; TJ Péah 2, 6, 17 a), one written and one oral, which continue to complement each other. In this way, the masters secured the responsibility for stating practice for Israel here and now, through debate and majority voting.

b) The Torah in the Days of the Messiah. The Messiah will be a new Moses, but the Jewish sources avoid the idea of a radical change in the Torah. The tradition gives two answers to the question of the status of the Torah in the messianic age: 1) radicalization—understanding and observance of the Torah will be perfect; 2) mystical renewal, for a precept* can hardly be the same both when human beings struggle against evil* and when the Torah existing in their hearts is practiced in liberty*.

2. The Torah at Qumran

The Rule of the Community (1QS) affirms that every novice must swear “to return to the law of Moses” according to “all that has been revealed of it to the sons of Zadok” (5, 8–9; see CD 6, 18 f.). The law is to be rewritten, to become a more contemporary and coherent code. Thus, the Temple Scroll (11QT) promulgates new laws for Israel under the very authority of God. The Book of Jubilees is a rewriting of Genesis and Exodus that proclaims the “perpetual status” of the Torah. At Qumran, the law was also interpreted in the light of practice, as is shown, for example, in 4QMMT (see DJD X, 5): the Zadokites reproach the priests of Jerusalem* for abandoning the rules of purity at the Temple, in more than 20 detailed cases, under the influence of the Pharisees.

3. The Sadducees

This group venerated the Torah above all, although they did not reject the Prophets* or the Psalms*. Their exegesis* was literal: the Torah was clear in and of itself. As with the Pharisees, there were disputes about its content, but there were still more disputes about the authority and the obligatory nature of tradition.

III. Law in the New Testament

1. Paul and the Law

In Paul’s writings, nomos generally means the law of Moses. However, the term is never defined, and moral laws are never distinguished from ritual laws. It follows that he assumed that those receiving his letters were capable of perceiving the variations in the meaning of the term.

a) Impotence and Necessity of Law. The law cannot save: for Paul, as for every other Jew, it is God alone who saves human beings. A Jew should practice “the whole of the law,” but he knows that he can never succeed in this, and the days of penance* exist to remind him of it. Paul departs from this faith by radicalizing it (Gal 3:10; Rom 2:17–24, 3:19–23, 8:7 f.), passing from fact to the affirmation of principle. Through his experience* of Christ*, he understands the following paradox: in his effort to become righteous before God, he has made himself into an “enemy of God,” rejecting the dependence that is the truth* of the created being and the glory* of the Creator. Paul reinterprets the whole of the history* of his people in this light, and understands the danger that threatens it. On the other hand, by displaying man's sin* to him (Rom 7:7–10), the law is man's "guardian" (Gal 3:23 ff.), revealing its truth to him and opening him up to the expectation of a savior (Rom 8:1–4).

b) "Christ is the end of the law" (Romans 10:4). In the light of the relationship between the Old Testament and the New Testament (1 Cor 10:1–11), all the events in which the law is present must be understood as manifestations of Christ. According to Romans 10:5, it is necessary to come to the end of the process of reasoning: human beings live only through Christ, and therefore the justice* that comes from the law, of which Moses speaks, today comes from Christ. The commentary that Romans 10:6 ff. applies to Deuteronomy 30:12 ff. confirms this: only Christ, who has descended from heaven and risen from the abyss, provides the justice that the Old Testament proclaims.

c) Messianic Age of the Spirit. Jesus inaugurates the messianic age. For Paul, the law has become internal and everyone practices the whole of the law in the Spirit: this is the "law of Christ." The "law of the Spirit" is to bring oneself into conformity with Christ: this is what Paul has done (1 Cor 9:21) and taught (Phil 2:5–8), and this is what baptism* gives (Rom 6:1–11). Paul sees the fulfillment of the law in love*, and can announce its commandment with every certainty from now on (Rom 13:8 ff.; Gal 5:14).

2. Matthew and the Law

Alone among the synoptics, Matthew makes the law into a central theme.

a) Jesus and Moses. Moses on Sinai received the whole of the Torah (see Abot I, 1): that was the traditional belief of the Pharisees, but Christ transposed this into the statement: "All things have been handed over to me by my Father" (Mt 11:27). According to Matthew, one must learn from Jesus, for the law of Moses finds its plenitude in him (11:28–31): this is God's plan (11:26). Jesus presents himself as having authority over the law (7:29), which is a radical innovation. Jesus, the new Moses, has received this authority from the Father*. He has the power to command his apostles* to make disciples (see Abot I, 2), but they are to be from every nation; he also commands them to transmit the Torah (see ibid.), but in the form that they have received from him; finally, he has the right to assure them that "All authority in heaven and earth has been given to me" (Mt 28:18 ff.).

b) Fulfillment. Jesus came to fulfill the whole of the Torah (5:17), initially through his interpretation of it, but also through his life and his paschal sacrifice*, and, finally, through the inauguration of the messianic age. The Christian must invest the whole of his life in faithfulness to the Torah (6:33), in "perfect righteousness" (5:20). This is, first and foremost, a call to follow Christ; in this way, the happiness of the kingdom is assured (5:6–10). Its fulfillment goes so far as to radicalize the law: Jesus calls us to "do more" than the Pharisees (5:20) in these times, which are the times of the Messiah. The last two "antitheses" in the Sermon on the Mount (5:38–48) show that this "more" is love, which can even lead us to transgress the law (Mt 12:15–22, 15:1–20). Jesus invites us to pass beyond all hypocrisy (Mt 23) in order to achieve the conversion* of the heart. He restores the primary purpose of the law: righteousness and pity (Mt 9:13, 12:7). The imitation of God is the ultimate motif that he proposes.

3. James's Epistle and the Law

James polemicizes against justification* by faith separated from works* (2, 14–26). The law must be practiced as a whole (2:11); it is summarized in the Decalogue and completed in the "royal law" (2:8), which is the love of one's neighbor. The "law of liberty" (1:25, 2:12) dwells in the heart of the believer. According to James, it is "mercy" (eleos) that accomplishes the whole of the law and the triumph of judgment* (2:13).

4. Law in the Johannine Tradition

The law belongs to the Jews (Jn 8:17, 10:34, 15:25, 18:31), but John applies himself to demonstrating that Jesus fulfills it (5:16 f., 7:21–24), that he witnesses in its favor (1:45, 8:16–20), and that he interprets it better than his opponents (10:34–36), who are in fact violators of the law (7:17, 7:19, 7:24, 7:51, 8:15).

a) "The Truth." John asserts in principle that while the Torah remains a gift from God, the truth brought by Jesus represents a full understanding of the Torah (1:17). Two expressions summarize this principle: to do "what is true," which, for the Jews, is to act according to the Torah, is, for John (Jn 3:21; 1 Jn 1:6), to recognize Jesus as the revelation* of God; while to "walk in the truth," which, for the Jews, is to be faithful to the Torah, is, for John (2 Jn 4; 3 Jn 3 and 4), to walk in the footsteps of Christ.

b) Commandments. Placed in relation to the will of the Father (Jn 4:34, 7:17), the commandments are concentrated in love (10:18, 12:25 f., 13:34). Jesus leaves his commandments to his disciples (14:15 and 15:10; see 1 Jn 2:3, 3:22, 3:24; 2 Jn 6)—his new commandment of love (Jn 15:12; see 1 Jn 3:23). “Keeping” the commandments is “not burdensome” (1 Jn 5:3), for God, through his gift of faith, permits the Christian to vanquish evil and practice the commandments readily: this is a sign of the messianic age.

c) Jesus As the Norm for Christian Conduct. “I am the path” (Jn 14:6); “Whoever follows me will not walk in darkness” (8:12): the true disciple practices the halakha of the Master. It is through the law (Abot III, 19) that a Jew becomes a child of God, while for John it is through faith in his only Son (1:12).

d) Jesus Is the Perfect Law. In the Old Testament, the law is identified with Wisdom* (Bar 4:1; Sir 24:23) and with the Word (Ps 119:15–18): on this basis, John affirms that Jesus is Word and Wisdom incarnate. John attributes the Jewish teaching on the role of the law in the creation*, and on its preexistence, to the only Son (Jn 1:3, 14, 18). Accordingly, the diversity of interpretations of the New Testament should not lead us to overlook the point on which they agree: that the law finds its fulfillment in Jesus, the Messiah. This is why the christological reinterpretation that is presented to us in the New Testament—the Gospel understood as an oral and messianic Torah—has to be the foundation of all Christian action.

- A. Alt (1934), Die Ursprünge des israelitischen Rechts, Leipzig.
- H. Cazelles (1946), Études sur le Code de l'Alliance, Paris.
- W.D. Davies (1952), Torah in the Messianic Age, Philadelphia.
- N. Lazure (1965), Les valeurs morales de la théologie johannique, EtB, Paris, 119–59.
- H. Cazelles (1966), “Le sens religieux de la Loi,” Populus Dei, CPIUI 10, 177–94.
- G.G. Scholem (1971), The Messianic Idea in Judaism, New York.
- S. Pancaro (1975), The Law in the Fourth Gospel, New Testament, TS 42.

- Coll. (1977), “L’enracinement du droit canonique dans l’Écriture, XIIIe sess.-SIDC,” ACan 21, 19–230.
- U. Lutz (1978), “Die Erfüllung des Gesetzes bei Mt.,” ZThK 75, 398–435.
- D. Marguerat (1979), “Jesus et la Loi selon Matthieu,” CBFV 18, 53–76; (1982), “L’avenir de la Loi: Matthieu à l’épreuve de Paul,” ETR 57, 361–73.
- E.P. Sanders (1982), Jesus, Paul and Judaism, in ANRW 25, 1, 390–450; (1983) Paul, the Law, and the Jewish People, Philadelphia, 3–167.
- M.-J. Seux (Ed.) (1986), Loi de l’Ancien Orient, CEv.S 56.
- H. Cazelles (1987), “Le Pentateuque comme Torah,” in M. Tardieu (Ed.), Les règles de l’interprétation, Paris, 35–68.
- R. Martin-Achard (1987), La Loi don de God, Aubonne.
- B. Lindars (Ed.) (1988), Law and Religion: Essays on the Place of the Law in Israel and Early Christianity, Cambridge.
- S. Amsler (1989), “Les documents de la Loi et la formation du Pentateuque,” in A. de Pury, T. Römer (Ed.), Le Pentateuque en question, Genève, 235–57 (2nd Ed., 1990).
- G.J. Brooke (Ed.) (1989), Temple Scroll Studies, JSPE.S 7.
- E.P. Sanders (1989), The Jewish Law from Jesus to Mishnah, London.
- D. Marguerat (1991), “Jesus et la Loi dans la mémoire des premiers chrétiens,” in D. Marguerat, J. Zumstein (Ed.), La mémoire et le temps, Geneva, 55–74.
- F. Crüsemann (1992), Die Torah, Theologie und Sozialgeschichte des Old Testament Gesetzes, Munich.
- G. Lasserre (1993), “Quelques études récentes sur le Code de l’alliance,” RThPh 125, 267–76.
- D. Luciani (1993), “Paul et la Loi,” NRTh 115, 40–68.
- L.H. Schiffman (1993), Law, Custom and Messianism in the Dead Sea Scrolls (Hebrew), Jerusalem.
- G. Lasserre (1994), Synopse des laws du Pentateuque, VT.S, Leyden.
- E. Quimron (1994), “The Halakha,” DJD X, 5, Oxford, 123–30.

MATTHIEU COLLIN

See also Casuistry; Covenant; Decalogue; Ethics; Faith; Jesus, Historical; Judaism; Judeo-Christianity; Judgment; Justification; Liberty; Pauline Theology; Priesthood; Purity/Impurity; Sacrifice; Scripture, Fulfillment of; Spirit; Violence; Works

B. Law As a Theological and Philosophical Problem

1. Moses and Jesus: Continuity or Categorical Reversal?

The problematic of the “law,” and the meaning, whether constant or variable, that this notion takes on at different points in the Bible*, may be summarized in the following question: should the parallel drawn in John 1:17 be understood as a synthesis or as an antithesis? The writer of the Letter of Barnabas (Apostoloc* Fathers), from around A.D. 130, clearly opts for the first solution when evoking “the new law of Our Lord Jesus Christ” (Barn 2, 6). With this interpretation of the gospel as the “new law,” the writer lays the foundation on which the primitive church* was to develop a doctrine of the law that Catholicism* continues to be influenced by. Conversely, one can find in Paul’s writings (Pauline* theology) a contrast between Christ

(that is, the gospel) and the law of Moses (2 Cor. 3:6)—and this is the approach that Protestantism* has restored to a place of honor. Thus, ever since it began, Christianity has contained the seeds of questions that, even today, do not receive a unanimous response from within the oikoumene.

2. Conceptual Approach

a) Concept and Vision of the Law. Following the fundamental biblical orientations we have just outlined, theology should first of all understand the law as the law of God*. It must determine what should be attributed to this divine law, with regard both to content and the tasks and functions that it once accomplished and still accomplishes today. There is also the question of the relationship between this divine law and the positive law expressed in the legislation of the societies* that history* has witnessed arising and disappearing. Do both types of law equally depend on particular situations and need to be brought up to date in line with the development of such situations? Or is it necessary to attribute to the divine law, or to part of it, a supratemporal validity?

b) Concept and Vision of Natural Law. In every case, law requires a founding authority. God is the authority in Holy* Scripture, while Plato and the Stoics, for example, prefer to invoke a “natural law,” a universal order inherent in the Ideas or the Logos that rule the world, and that human beings have knowledge of through their contemplation* of nature or in their own consciences* to the extent that they participate in this universal order. With the idea of creation, Christianity combines the two approaches, referring simultaneously to the divine authority of the biblical law and to natural law (see 4 a below). By contrast, Enlightenment critics sought evidence for what is best called a “rational law,” which the individual can arrive at solely by the exercise of his own will and intelligence. In opposition to theorists of positive law and supporters of utilitarianism*, who reject all suprahistorical norms, there have been several attempts—most notably in response to experience of totalitarian political systems—to restore such ideas as justice (see 4 f below) or human dignity to their rightful places as ultimate norms.

3. Law in the Catholic Tradition

a) Beginnings. The combination of the gospel, understood as the “new law,” with the philosophical tradition of natural law was reinforced in the primitive church by a number of internal and external controversies. On the one hand, the combination provided a means of rejecting the Gnostics’ hostility to law—the antinomianism of gnosis*—as well as the diastases of Marcionism*. On the other hand, this same combination formed part of the extended attempt by apologists* to demonstrate that Christianity represented the true philosophy*. Accordingly, some fundamental elements of tradition* were put in place during this early phase of Christianity. Tertullian*, for example, interpreted the double commandment of love* and the second table of the Decalogue* as the natural law previously given to Adam* and saw Jesus as the bearer of the “new law” that extends the law of Moses by spiritualizing its ceremonial precepts.

b) Augustine. Augustine* assimilated the “eternal law”—a Stoic concept referring to God’s ordering reason*—to natural law and the law of Moses, but, following Paul, he related this single law to grace*. The law accuses human beings and convicts them of sin in order to make them open to grace, just as, conversely, grace places human beings in a condition to satisfy the demands of the law. Augustine made this idea more profound in his dispute with the Pelagians (Pelagianism*). In their view, grace entails the attribution of free will, the gift of the law, the example of Christ, and the remission of sins; with these, human beings are able to fulfill the law. According to Augustine, however, original sin entails the loss of free will—the “power not to sin” (see, e.g., De civitate Dei 22, 30)—and thus produces a fundamental distortion of the will, which henceforth “can no longer avoid sinning,” based on a real corruption of human nature. Such corruption cannot be healed by any human endeavor, but solely by grace (gratia sanans), that is, by the remission of sins and the infusion of the Spirit of love (Rom 5:5). Only grace, or the faith* that it produces, allows human beings to be just in the eyes of God, that is, to be sanctified: “Faith obtains what the law ordains” (e.g., En.Ps. 118, XVI, 2).

c) Thomas Aquinas. In his treatment of the law (ST Ia IIae, q. 90–108), Thomas* Aquinas distinguishes among the eternal law, human law, and the divine law, and then divides the divine law into the old law (Old Testament) and the new law (New Testament). It is human law, above all, that it seems possible to define as “a command of reason aimed at the common good, promulgated by him who has responsibility for the community” (q. 90, a. 4). However, this definition also applies, on a higher plane, to the divine law, to the extent that, along with grace (ST Ia IIae, q. 109–14), it constitutes an “external” aid through which God assists human beings to gain beatitude* and to make progress on the way of love, which leads them on toward their creator: “The external principle that makes us act well is God, whether he instructs us by his law or sustains us by his grace” (q. 90, prol.). In the history of salvation*, the old law and the new law take the place of the natural law, which, in a broad sense, demands faith and, above all, love of God, but which can also be restricted to the commandments in the second table of the Decalogue, for they can be recognized by natural reason independently of divine revelation*. Just as human beings, because of the Fall, cannot attain beatitude through the natural law alone, so they are no more capable of attaining it within the framework of the Old Covenant, which, being incapable of bringing about grace, cannot be really satisfying; as a result, it fulfills the function of accusation, or death*. It is only through the new law, the New Covenant, that human beings can rediscover the grace (q. 106, a. 1) that they enjoyed in their primordial state, in order to fulfill the natural law. Grace is the new law as a conferred law (lex indita), a law of liberty* (Jas 1:25, 2:12), the law of the Spirit who gives life (Rom 8:2). Aquinas thus has a different vision than Augustine’s of the relationship between law and grace. Christ, as the pivot of the history of salvation, perfectly fulfills the law and, through the salvific action of his life and death, abolishes the old law. Of course, Christ is also a law-giver, in a secondary sense; but the new law consists principally of grace, and it is in this regard that Aquinas writes of Christ as the “founder of the New Covenant” (auctor novi testamenti; q. 107, a. 1, ad 3). Grace, acting through the new law, allows human beings to love God, to offer themselves to him in a “singular mixture of liberty and dependence” (Pesch 1967), and thus to return to their Creator.

d) Nominalism and Late Medieval Piety. Aquinas uses the term “new law” only in a derivative sense and refers to Christ’s law-giving function as a secondary matter. However, these references were sufficient to encourage later theologians once again to make the gospel, understood as the new law, into a way that human beings can and must take for themselves—with the assistance of grace, of course—in order to achieve salvation. As a result, there appeared within the theology of nominalism*, and in the forms of piety linked to it, some tendencies toward legalism that seem to have had little to do with either Augustine or Aquinas. Luther* could thus denounce the “Pelagianism” of Gabriel Biel (before 1410–95), who took up an idea that Aquinas had condemned in this form (ST Ia IIae, q. 112, a. 3) and taught that God does not refuse grace to those who do that which is in them (see, e.g., Collectorium II, d. 27, q. un. O). While the accusation of Pelagianism does not do justice to the whole of Biel’s theological thought, Luther, for his part, did not remain content with reformulating the ideas of Augustine and Aquinas: taking Paul’s teaching as his primary guide, he developed an authentic and profound understanding of the gospel and its justifying action, which is independent of any law (see 4 a–c below).

e) Council of Trent. Reformation theologians formulated their conception of law primarily within the framework of the doctrine of justification*. The Council of Trent*, in turn, brought about a dissociation from the tendencies of the late Middle Ages that we have referred to above. Its decree on justification (13 January 1547), the first dogmatic definition of this doctrine, relates salvation to grace as mediated by the sacraments*, and not to human merit. However, it also teaches that human merit can cooperate in the action of divine grace by virtue of created grace (gratia creata), although it does not state precisely what role human liberty plays in this cooperation. (This question later gave rise to the conflict between Bañezianism and Molinism; see Bañezianism-Molinism-Baianism*). The council also rejected certain opinions that were central to the Reformation. For example, chapter 11 deals with “the necessity and possibility of observing the commandments” (DH 1536–39), and canon 21 lays down that “Christ Jesus was given by God to humanity . . . also as a law-giver who is to be obeyed” (DH 1571). This proposition clearly expresses a refusal to confess Christ exclusively as Redeemer, and, along with canons 18–20 (DH 1568–70), constitutes an explicit rejection both of Luther’s teaching on justification by faith alone, and of the distinction between law and gospel (see 4 b below, and Pesch 1995) that Jerome Seripando (1492–1563), the general of the Augustines, had sought in vain to have accepted at Trent.

f) Present State of the Discussion. The Catechism of the Catholic Church (1992, no. 1965) recognizes that “the new law, the law of the gospel” is stated “first and foremost in the Sermon on the Mount,” even though there may also be a question of grace in this regard (nos. 1949–86). Ecumenical dialogue has more to expect from new research on Aquinas and from the concern for direct interrogation of the sources over and above what has been handed down within the Thomist tradition. It is not by chance that this work of exhumation, conducted along the major lines that we have set out (see 3 c above), appropriately constitutes one of the structural supports for ecumenism (Kühn 1965, Pesch 1967).

4. Understanding of the Law in Luther and in Protestant Teaching

a) Universality of the Law: The Decalogue and Natural Law. Reformation theologians also made an association between the Decalogue and natural law, thus affirming the universality of God's will. This universalism* is attested in Holy Scripture, for example in Matthew's Gospel, in which the "pagan" Golden Rule is placed on the same level as the double commandment of love: "This is the Law and the Prophets" (Mt 7:12; see 22:40). It is also attested in the intermingling of a morality of faithfulness to Christ (e.g., Lk 9:57–62) with a morality of family* (e.g., Eph 5:21–6:9), and in Paul's restatement of certain Stoic themes (e.g., Rom 2:14 f.). Luther cites this text, as well as Romans 1:19–21 and 3:29, to affirm that "the Ten Commandments . . . are nothing other than the law of nature, naturally inscribed upon our hearts" (WA 16, 431, 26–28).

The Decalogue had this universal validity in Luther's view because it tallies with the Word of the Creator, as may be seen by comparing Genesis 2:16 f. with Exodus 20:2 f. Both these words of God to humanity contain promises* of life (Gn 2:16 and Ex 20:2) reinforced with threats of death (Gn 2:17 and Ex 20:3): one must fear God if one does not entrust oneself to his love. In this sense, the first commandment is to be contrasted, as "Do not be anxious about your life" (Mt 6:25), to the existential anxiety of humanity: it recalls us to our finite nature, and discharges our anxiety about infinity*. This bond of correlation between the first commandment and the Word of the Creator may be formulated as follows: without the first commandment, concern for the world would be blind; without concern for the world, the first commandment would be null and void.

Furthermore, this thesis means that Luther's doctrine of the law is structurally related to his theory of the three "estates," which represent fundamental forms of life, irreducible modes of being that the creative Word of God has assigned to humanity: the church; the economy, which includes marriage* and the family; and political organization. The church, understood as an "estate," does not mean the Christian church in particular, but the fundamental condition, prior to any economic or political determination, of each human being before God, which is inherent in creation (Gn 2:16 f.). These "estates" precede the commandments. Thus, the fourth commandment, for example, presupposes marriage and the family, while the first presupposes the church, conceived as an order of the creation (Bayer 1994).

In this sense, the Decalogue is universally applicable to every individual. It is on the basis of these commandments that God has willed life in the universe, created it, desired it, and preserved it. However, the commandments have a positive content only on the level of immanence: they have value only in the domain of "civil justice" (iustitia civilis). By contrast, they play no role in the justification of human beings before God. According to Luther, the rupture marked by baptism*—a rupture that, according to the Catholic tradition, obliges us specially to observe the law (DH 1620–22)—must be understood as a renewal of the intellect (Rom 12:2) that brings human beings into relation with the commandments in this world. Nevertheless, the law has no effect on justification.

b) Law and Gospel. Luther had learned from Paul and Augustine that respect for the law plays no role in our justification before God; but he had also had profound experience of this himself. He was thus capable of describing his reforming work as the discovery of the difference between the law and the gospel (WA.TR 5, no. 5518). The law confounds human beings, judges them, and even kills them. Within the law, God comes to human beings with harsh and ineluctable questions, saying to Adam, "Where are you?" (Gn 3:9), or to Cain, "Where is Abel your brother?" (Gn 4:9). Such questions confound human beings; they see what they had no awareness of appearing in the light of day (Ps 90:8). They are revealed, alone, as human beings destined to die: "You are the man" (2 Sm 12:7). Human beings cannot say these things to themselves: they must come to them from outside, from an Other. Nevertheless, they are so clearly confounded that they pronounce their own condemnation at the same time (2 Sm 12:5). The externality of the law does not mean that there is any heteronomy.

However, while God speaks against human beings in the law, he speaks for them in the gospel, the decisive and definitive Word of God that acquits them, promises them life, and makes them live. It is to this promise that faith responds within human beings: and "faith alone justifies" (sola fides iustificat). The gospel is therefore not a new law. Even in the form of grace, it is not to be confused with the law (see 3 c above), for it is "something other," a second Word of God. It cannot be related to the word of the law by reference to some third term, such as the unique self-manifestation of God (see 4 d–e below), any more than one of these two words can be made to lead to the other. One cannot play tricks with the distinction between the law and the gospel: to neglect this distinction is, in reality, to recognize only the law, which no human being can fulfill and which therefore brings death.

It is not enough, however, to grasp this distinction between the law and the gospel solely on the level of knowledge. It is not to be confused with the distinction between the Old Covenant and the New Covenant, as may be seen by comparing Genesis 2:16 f. and Exodus 20:2 f. (see 4 a) above). On the contrary, it must be realized again and again, at every instant, and particularly in cases of temptation*. Here, the techniques of homiletics or spiritual* direction are of no use, for what matters is the divine Word, through which God himself brings us either consolation or terror, death or life. The distinction between the law and the gospel thus evades the commands of our will: it takes effect and is a gift renewed on each occasion.

What can be said is that, if the gospel is a promise, then faith is power and permission. One must guard against the gospel becoming a law, to which faith responds as a positive act. It is this that Luther seeks to demonstrate when he distinguishes between the gift and the example in Christ. Christ must first be accepted as a gift, by which God freely accords all his goods to us, before he can provide a model for our actions. If we already possess all the divine gifts in Christ, our actions will no longer be aimed at justice before God, but will be entirely directed toward our neighbors.

c) Double Usage of the Law. In this perspective, Luther refers to a “double function of the law” (duplex usus legis), in accordance with the sacred terminology. The first function is the “political usage of the law,” that is, its application within the domain of civil justice (see 4 a above); the second function is the “elenctic or theological usage of the law,” which convicts us of our sins and thus recalls us to the distinct reality of the gospel (see 4 b above). In Luther’s view, it is this second usage that constitutes the “principal” (praecipuus) usage of the law, in conformity with the preponderant role that the doctrine of justification plays in his theology. A comparison with the Catholic tradition will underline the meaning that this second usage has in this instance: Luther could still accept natural law within the domain of civil justice, but he could not give it any role in relation to justice before God. He reached this intuition, which was so decisive for the Reformation, by following Paul and Augustine: the gospel is not a new law, nor a demand, but an acquittal and a consolation that makes real what it promises: promissio (Bayer 1971).

d) Law and the Regenerate in Reformation Doctrine. While the Council of Trent (see 3 e above) finally refused to follow Luther down this road, the internal development of Protestantism shows that divergences could appear even among those who fundamentally adhered to the Reformation project. This is what happened in the disputes over “antinomianism” and the “third usage of the law.” In these cases, what was at stake—depending on the position adopted with regard to the law—were different conceptions of the way in which Christian ethics* should be formatted and applied. Have those human beings whom the gospel proclaims to be just already fulfilled the will of God in themselves (“Every healthy tree bears good fruit,” Mt 7:17 f.), or must they—can they—be exhorted and guided by the law to be made by this will? Conversely, can the law, through its exhortations and directives, guide human beings toward authentically Christian practice, or does it result in a pure legalism that no longer sees one’s neighbor as the primary criterion of a free act, in accordance with the double commandment of love? To put the question more crudely: does Christian practice have need of a law, or will the law always be a hindrance to it?

In the history of the church, the term antinomianism is used with reference to two controversies that arose during the age of the Reformation. While they should not be confused with each other, both were centered on the question of the power and form of the gospel, which could be obscured in two different ways. On the one hand, too much might be expected from the gospel, if one assigned it the functions of the law and thus deprived it of its specificity. On the other hand, too little might be expected from it, if one sought in some sense, through fear of enthusiasm and abuse of the liberty that the gospel accords and guarantees us, to come to its aid in order to support its action.

The first of these two dangers was awakened by J. Agricola (1499?–1566), who maintained that the gospel was not only the declaration of grace, but also a message of penance* and judgment*. Agricola, and others, inevitably misconstrued the role of the law by failing to distinguish between the law and the gospel and by attributing to the gospel the functions proper to the law, which are to accuse human beings and convince them of their sins, and thus to lead them to repent. Not only did they then fall into antinomianism, but, above all, and as an unforeseen consequence, they misconstrued the specific character of the gospel, its form as pure promise. This promise does not contain any ambiguity and is thus the source of all certainty.

Philipp Melancthon (1497–1560) and his followers, the Philippists, originated the second danger, within the framework of a discussion of sanctification and the role of the law with regard to those who are justified. The question was debated in the chapter on the “third usage of the law” (tertius usus legis) or the “usage of the law among the regenerated” (usus legis in renatis). These terms appear not only in Melancthon’s writings (e.g., Loci, 1559; StA II/1, 325 f.), but also, and most importantly, in those of Calvin*. Contrary to Luther (see 4 b above), Calvin does not make the distinction between the law, which condemns, and the gospel, which acquits—the center and principle of his theology. Instead, he subordinates this Pauline opposition to the unity of the divine Covenant. Thus, the gospel is reduced in practice to a new form of obedience to the law. It is no longer a pure message of consolation and acquittal: instead, consolation and acquittal are no more than aspects of the single Word of God, which also contains a requirement to fulfill the law by living in conformity with the divine will. The focus of interest is thus displaced away from justification and toward the sanctification of believers, which is understood as a distinct process, oriented toward the single Word of God, which in this case takes on the characteristics of law. Hence, the central function of the law is no longer to accuse human beings and convince them of their sins—even though Calvin still accepts this “elenctic usage,” which, contrary to the order established by Luther, he makes into the “first usage” of the law (Inst., 1560, II, 7, 6 f.). Instead, the central function of the law is to give shape to Christian morality: this is the “third usage,” which constitutes the “principal usage of the law” (praecipuus usus legis; Inst., 1560, II, 7, 12). The crucial question for theology is no longer how the human being condemned by the law can be regenerated, but how the regenerated human being can live in accordance with the will of God. Concrete ethical practice thus finds a distinguished theological legitimization.

By comparison, Luther’s ethics, in which the event is never separated from justification, is remarkably free. This theological liberty leaves every latitude to the gospel to accomplish its work of giving life and regeneration to humanity, with all that is entailed on the ethical plane. However, to the extent that Christians continue to belong to the old world, they remain under the command of the double usage of the law until they die, as is emphasized in Article VI of the Formula of Concord (1577), which basically reprises Luther’s position (BSLK 793–95 and 962–69, in particular 969, 16–37).

e) Monism and Dualism: The Dispute between Barth and Elert. The dispute over the Lutheran conception of the law found an echo in 20th-century Protestantism when the Calvinist theologian Karl Barth* reversed the order established by Luther as between the law and the gospel (Barth 1935). Like Calvin with his idea of the divine Covenant, Barth reduces the gospel and the law to the higher unity of the single Word of God, which he understands primarily from a christological perspective. Starting from the basic postulate that “God’s speaking to us is already, in itself and in every way, a form of grace” (6), he arrives at the thesis that “the law is nothing other than the necessary form of the Gospel, and its content is grace” (13).

This monistic approach was met with lively criticism by some Lutherans. W. Elert (1885–1954), for example, opposed Barth and the very principle of a “third usage of the law,” resolutely taking his stand with Luther in order to affirm, in a still more energetic manner, the validity of the conceptual coupling of law and gospel (Elert 1948).

f) Christological Revelation versus Natural Law. Emil Brunner (1889–1966), a Calvinist theologian who had been an ally of Barth’s in the early stages of his “dialectic theology,” opposed Barth’s christological monism from a different perspective. He reproached Barth for neglecting the other task of theology, which is to bring to light the anthropological repercussions of the Word of God. Brunner’s fundamental conception of humanity led him to take an interest in the justice that we are capable of realizing in this world. In order to apprehend this level of reality, notably in the face of Nazism (this was in 1943), he deliberately made use of the ideas of natural law and of order in creation.

5. Law and Gospel in Modern Times

According to Luther, what makes an authentic theologian is the capacity to distinguish between the law and the gospel (see 4 b above). Even Protestants have often lost sight of the precise content of this distinction, or have reduced it to a purely circumstantial preoccupation, related to the Reformation and Luther’s theology. Nevertheless, the problem affects relations between reason and faith, and between faith and politics; it underlies the condemnation of evil* and violence*, as well as reflections on the possibility of bringing them to an end, and, therefore, reflections on the future of humanity. It thus touches upon fundamental questions of anthropology*, ethics, and eschatology*.

It may be possible to clarify this problematic with the aid of the following assertion: that the modern age, by giving the gospel a universal meaning, has been an antinomian age, but has also increasingly returned toward a conception that may be called “nomist.” In its self-designation as “modern,” the new age was already betraying an “evangelical” trait: it was understood as a rupture without any equivalent, placed under the sign of liberty. However, within this enthusiastic generalization, the concrete christological determination of the gospel took on an abstract character. The christological formula “It is finished” (Jn 19:30) was replaced by the idea of a liberation already and forever accomplished. All human beings are by nature “emancipated” and “mature” (naturaliter maiorenes), according to Kant* (Antwort an der Frage: Was ist Aufklärung? 1784). This presupposes that the law has, fundamentally, already been abolished: human beings in themselves are free, good, and spontaneous (Rousseau). It is in this sense that “modernity” is antinomian (see 4 d above).

However, what this new human being has been forever he still has to become. At the same time, the universal gospel of liberty obliges human beings to conform themselves to it and to give it a body. Not only are human beings liberated, as in the concrete promise of the gospel, but they are “condemned” to be liberated (Jean-Paul Sartre, L’existentialisme est un humanisme, 1946). One cannot be authorized to be free: one must liberate oneself. Here we see a form of “nomism” being outlined on the other side of antinomianism.

Antinomianism and nomism are two sides of the same process. In its secular or secularized forms, this process is understood as a rapport between law and liberty. With his concept of autonomy, Kant sought a position above and beyond antinomianism and nomism alike. Hegel* discussed liberty as “law and conviction,” and thus, in his turn, came up against the question of secularized liberty, in which one can see the post-Christian version of the problem of the law and the Gospel. In this sense, the importance that Luther attached to this distinction is still as topical as ever (Bayer 1992).

• a) Conciliar or Confessional Texts

BSLK.

CEC.

DH 1520–83 (COD 671–8).

b) Works by Specific Theologians

Thomas Aquinas, ST Ia IIae, q. 90–114.

M. Luther, Commentary on the Epistle to the Galatians, WA 40/1, Commentary of the Epistles to Romans, WA 56.

P. Melancthon (1559), Loci praecipui theologici, in StA II, 164–780, 1952 (II/1) and 1953 (II/2).

J. Calvin (1559), Inst. de la religion chrestienne, 1560, Ed. J.-D. Benoît, Paris, 1957–63.

K. Barth (1935), “Evangelium und Gesetz,” TEH 32 (New Ed., TEH 50, 1956; see also E. Kinder, K. Haendler [1968] below).

W. Elert (1948), “Gesetz und Evangelium,” Zwischen Gnade und Ungnade: Abwandlungen des Themas Gesetz und Evangelium, Munich.

E. Brunner (1943), Gerechtigkeit: Eine Lehre von den Grundgesetzen der Gesellschaftsordnung, Zurich (3rd Ed. 1981).

◆ U. Kühn (1965), Via caritatis: Theologie des Gesetzes bei Thomas von Aquin, KiKonf 9.

O. H. Pesch (1967), Theologie der Rechtfertigung bei Martin Luther und Thomas von Aquin: Versuch eines systematisch-theologischen Dialogs, WSAMA.T 4.

E. Kinder, K. Haendler (Ed.) (1968), Gesetz und Evangelium, WdF 142.

O. Bayer (1971), Promissio: Geschichte der reformatorischen Wende in Luthers Theologie, Göttingen (New Ed. 1989, Darmstadt).

K. Koch, et al. (1984), “Gesetz,” TRE 13, 40–126 (bibl.).

A. Peters (1989), “Gesetz 3.,” EKL3 2, 143–9 (bibl.).

O. Bayer (1992), Leibliches Wort. Reformation und Neuzeit im Konflikt, Tübingen; (1994), Theologie, HST 1.

S. Feldhaus, W. Korff (1995), “Gesetz V,” LThK3 4, 586–8.

O. H. Pesch (1995), “Gesetz und Evangelium II-IV,” LThK3 4, 591–4 (bibl.).

J.-F. Kervégan (1996), “Law,” DEPhM, 855–62.

OSWALD BAYER AND AXEL WIEMER

See also Casuistry; Gospels; Justice; Justification

Law and Legislation

The term law does not admit of easy definition. Viewed as the collection of norms that govern life within society*, law comprises everything that regulates human conduct, including, for example, moral precepts*, state statutes, church* canons, rules of family life, commercial habits, and customs. Viewed in narrower terms, law consists of norms formulated by political authority* and actualized by persons subject to its jurisdiction*. In the Western legal tradition, the principal responsibility for law has fallen to the state, but other institutions have played key roles in its development, notably the church, with its canon* law. The religious history of Western law had four key periods.

1. Rome before and after Christianity

a) Roman Law. Until the conversion* of Constantine, Roman law reigned supreme throughout the West. It defined the status of persons* and associations, established legal actions and procedures, proscribed delicts and crimes, protected the welfare of the state, and regulated commerce, private property*, inheritance, and the family*. Roman law established the imperial cult* and ordained its priests, architecture, rituals, and festivals. A refined jurisprudence emerged in the first century B.C. Cicero (106 B.C.–43 B.C.) and Seneca (A.D. 4–65), for example, cast in legal terms Aristotle’s methods of reasoning, rhetoric, and interpretation, as well as concepts of natural, distributive, and commutative justice*. Gaius (110–80), Ulpianus (†228), Pomponius (second century), and other Roman jurists drew classic distinctions between civil law (ius civile), custom, or the law of nations (ius gentium), and natural law (ius naturale). Civil law is the set of statutes and procedures that deal with actions, persons, and things in a particular community. The law of nations is the set of principles, customs, and rights common to several communities, and is the basis for treaties and diplomatic relations. Natural law is a set of immutable principles perceived by reason*; their authority is sovereign and they must prevail in instances of legal or diplomatic dispute.

b) The Church and Roman Law. The church initially stood largely opposed to Roman society. Christians could not accept the imperial cult or participate in the pagan rituals required for military service, commercial relations or civil litigation. Their ideal of liberty* with nomos—a term that was related as much to the institutional aspect of law as to the moral aspect of statutes—and of faithfulness to evangelical love* compelled them to form communities largely withdrawn from society. Ecclesiastical constitutions such as the Didache (c. 120) or the Didascalia Apostolorum (c. 250), rooted in the Decalogue* and the teaching of Christ* and his apostles*, set forth rules for church government*, liturgy*, ecclesiastical* discipline, charity, the family, and property. Following Christ and Paul, the clergy taught obedience to political authority up to the limits of what was authorized by conscience*. However, following Tertullian* and Ambrose*, the clergy also urged their Roman rulers to make political and legal reforms consonant with Christianity. From the late first century onward, such attitudes provoked severe imperial edicts and waves of persecution.

The conversion of Constantine in 312 and the establishment of Christianity as the official religion of the Roman Empire in 381 blended Roman and Christian elements. The empire came to be understood as the universal Christian body (corpus christianum) on earth. The emperor, who reigned supreme throughout Christendom, was viewed as both pope and king. Roman law, particularly as codified in the Corpus iuris civilis (534), was viewed as the pristine expression of statute (ius civile) and custom (ius gentium). However, according to Augustine*, Isidore of Seville (c. 560–636), and other writers, secular law derived its authority and core content from natural law, now understood as the expression of the commandments of God* written on the hearts and consciences of all, and rewritten in the Bible*, particularly the Decalogue and the Beatitudes*. The ius civile and ius gentium were thus viewed as vehicles for establishing the basic precepts of moral and natural law. Knowing precisely which precepts should be established by secular law, however, was a problem theologians kept discussing from the late fourth century onward.

This syncretism of Roman and Christian beliefs allowed the church to imbue Roman law with its teachings. The Codex Theodosianus (438), and Justinian’s Corpus iuris civilis (482–565) and Novellae (565), incorporated Christian teachings on the Trinity*, the sacraments*, the liturgy*, the Sabbath*, sexual ethics*, charity, and education. Similarly, various heresies* were proscribed, especially Arianism*, Apollinarianism*, and Manicheanism*. However, the church was also subordinated to imperial rule. The emperors convoked councils* and synods*, appointed and removed clerics*, established and administered parishes, monasteries, and charitable foundations, and controlled ecclesiastical property. This “caesaropapism” was accepted with little resistance in the Orthodox churches of Byzantium until well into the 14th century. Eastern Bishops readily merged the Christian and the secular, leaving the legal affairs of the church to the emperor as Vicar of Christ and devoting themselves to Christian mystery* and liturgy. Caesaropapism met with more resistance in the West, where popes such as Gelasius I (492–96) and Gregory* the Great insisted on a sharper separation of the spiritual and the secular.

2. Papal Revolution

a) Autonomy of the Church. The second key period came with the papal revolution of the late 11th through 13th centuries, aimed at the emancipation of the church from the temporal power. The initiative was taken by Gregory VII (c. 1021–85) in the investiture dispute, and this resulted in legal and political autonomy for the church. The church now claimed to exercise jurisdiction over such persons as clerics, pilgrims, students, the poor, Jews, and Muslims, and over such subjects as doctrine and liturgy, ecclesiastical property and polity, patronage of benefices, marriage* and the family, education, charity, inheritance, oral promises, oaths, contracts, and all manner of moral or ideological crimes and delicts. The church predicated these claims in part on its traditional authority over the sacraments, in part on the power of the keys bequeathed by Christ to Peter* (a key of knowledge and a key of power). It used the extent of its jurisdiction to translate its dogma* into legal terms.

The oldest canon law provisions were synthesized in the famous Decretum Gratiani (c. 1140), and then heavily supplemented by papal and conciliar legislation, not to mention juridical glosses and commentaries. By the late 13th century, canon law was preeminent in the West. Many private parties litigated their claims in consistory courts, and civil law appropriated the substance of canon law. Canonists such as Hostiensis (Heinrich von Segusio, †1271) or Joannes Andreae (c. 1270–1348), and civilians under their influence, such as Gandinus (13th century), Bartolus of Saxoferrato (1314–57) or Baldus de Ubaldis (c. 1319–1400), developed new doctrines of public, private, and criminal law, comprehensive rules for the resolution of conflicts of laws, and elaborate hermeneutical methods for their equitable application. They also developed concepts of legislation, adjudication, and executive administration, and many other concepts that still form the core of Western constitutionalism. They developed a good deal of the Western law of corporations and associations, as well as refined doctrines of popular sovereignty, representation and consent, and individual and corporate rights and liberties.

b) Theories of Law. This legal transformation brought new theories of law and authority by such Scholastic writers as Anselm*, Abelard*, John of Salisbury (c. 1115–80), Albert* the Great, and Thomas* Aquinas. Aquinas's synthesis proved to be the most enduring. For Aquinas, all law and authority are rooted in the eternal law (lex aeterna), the divine reason that ordains and orders all creation*. All human beings participate in this eternal law through the natural law (lex naturalis) that is within them (ST Ia IIae, q. 91, a. 2, and q. 94), that is, through intuitive knowledge (synderesis) of the core principles of practical reason (Ia, q. 79, a. 12; conscience*). These principles—doing good*, avoiding evil*, preserving self, living in a couple, having children, seeking truth*, living in society, and avoiding harm to others (Ia IIae, q. 94, a. 2)—must be adapted to particular circumstances by human statutes (leges humanae, q. 91, a. 3) of canon, civil, criminal, and customary law. Aquinas's theory of law met with sharp criticism by John Duns* Scotus, then by William of Ockham (c. 1285–1347) and other proponents of nominalism*, but it was dominant within Catholicism by the time of the Council of Trent* and Iberian Neoscholasticism, led by Vitoria (c. 1485–1546) and Suarez*.

3. Reformation

a) Protestant Reformers. The third key period for law came with the Reformation. Protestant reformers such as Luther*, Bucer*, or Calvin* taught that canon law obscured a true understanding of the Bible* and denatured the church by making a community of saints into a political corporation. The jurisdiction of the bishops had obstructed the church's mission of preaching the Word*, administering the sacraments, educating the young, and caring for the needy; moreover, it had usurped the role of the state, perceived as the representative of divine authority. To be sure, the church must have internal rules of organization, teaching, and discipline. The church must also criticize legal injustice and combat political illegitimacy. Nevertheless, the law is primarily the province of the state, not the church.

b) Effects of the Reformation. European law was transformed by the Reformation and Christian humanism*. The international rule of the Catholic Church and canon law was permanently broken, and Western Christendom was fractured into competing nations and regions, each with its own religious and political system. State rulers now assumed jurisdiction over numerous subjects previously governed by the church. Particularly in Lutheran and Anglican polities, inspired by the writings of Philipp Melancthon (1497–1560) and Richard Hooker (c. 1554–1600) respectively, as well as by Roman prototypes, the state came to exercise considerable control over the clergy, organization, and property of the church.

These changes did not suddenly deprive western law of its religious dimension. Canon law remained an ineradicable part of European law and one of its principal legal sources. Moreover, in Catholic countries and their Latin American colonies, the papacy still held considerable sway over legislators and judges. In the Protestant countries and their North American colonies, a certain number of Protestant concepts shaped new law: new social statutes, new criminal law, new legislation on marriage and divorce, and new doctrines of rights and liberties. The idea that power corrupts helped to inspire such restraints as the separation of powers, limited terms, and the codification of statutes.

4. Enlightenment

a) Revolutionary Individualism. The fourth key period in the history of law was the Enlightenment. Hume (1711–76), Rousseau (1712–78), and Jefferson (1743–1826) offered a secular theology of individualism, rationalism*, and nationalism. The individual was no longer viewed primarily as a sinner who has need of salvation*. For the philosophes, every individual was created equal in dignity, vested with the same rights to life, liberty, and property, and the same capacity to choose his own conception of happiness. Reason was no longer the handmaid of revelation*, and rational disputation was a sufficient source of morality and law. The nation was no longer identified with a national church or a chosen people. The nation deserved to be glorified in its own right. Its constitution and laws were sacred texts, reflecting the morals and mores of the national culture. Its officials were like priests, representing the sovereignty and will of the people.

Such ideas were revolutionary in their time, and contributed to the American and French Revolutions*; they had already been present in the English Revolution of 1688–89. Then, too, Western law underwent sweeping changes: constitutional provisions for limited government and civil liberties, separation of church and state, new criminal and commercial law, new laws of property and inheritance, shifts toward a definition of criminal and civil responsibility, abolition of slavery, and the gradual removal of discrimination based on race*, religion, or gender.

b) Influence on the Philosophy of Law. One can see the influence of the Enlightenment in many theories of law. Numerous writers, from John Locke (1632–1704) to Thomas Paine (1737–1809), postulated a mythical state of nature that antedated and integrated human laws and natural rights. Nationalist myths were grafted onto this myth* of origins to unify and sanctify national legal traditions. Thus, Italian jurists appealed to a utopian Roman heritage, English jurists to their ancient constitution and Anglo-Saxon roots, French jurists to the Salic law, and German jurists to ancient constitutional liberties. No one placed much faith in all of this, and three legal philosophies came to prominence in the later 18th and 19th centuries. Positivists such as Jeremy Bentham or John Stuart Mill (utilitarianism*) contended that the ultimate source of law lies in the will of the legislator and its ultimate sanction in political force. Natural law theorists, notably Kant*, sought the ultimate source of law in pure reason and conscience, and its ultimate sanction in moral suasion. Jurists of the German historical school, such as Friedrich Karl von Savigny (1779–1861) or Otto von Gierke (1841–1921), contended that the ultimate source of law resides in the customs and character of the people, and that its ultimate sanction is the condemnation of crime by the community. These three philosophies have persisted to this day, although they are heavily supplemented by an array of realist, socialist, feminist, and other theories.

c) Influence on Legal Institutions. The ideas of the Enlightenment also led to the transformation and secularization* of legal institutions. Individualism was expressed in measures for the protection of privacy, and rationalism in the freedom of speech, press, and association; as for nationalism, it manifested itself in diverse ways in democracy*, fascism, and socialism. The clear separation of church and state in America and in certain European countries served to privatize religion, and to drive religious organizations from the political process. Increasingly, there are laws rather than law in the singular: each nation tends to have its own legal system, itself divided into several types of law according to domains of application. This tendency was offset somewhat, in the second half of the 20th century, by the growth of international law, and by the new social and political programs of liberation* theology, Catholicism after Vatican* II, and the ecumenical movement (ecumenicism*). However, this has not prevented a number of writers from announcing a worldwide law crisis.

Today, there are still many links between law and religion, and many forms of mutual interaction, ranging from the domain of concepts to that of institutions. In recent years these interactions have attracted a considerable body of interdisciplinary studies. It can be hoped that these studies will contribute to a better understanding of law and justice, and to preparation for the emergence of a common law of all humanity in the new millennium.

- Codex Theodosianus, Ed. T. Mommsen, 2 vols., Hildesheim, 1890.
- Corpus iuris canonici*, Ed. E. Friedberg, 2 vols., Graz, 1955 (repr.).
- Corpus iuris civilis*, Ed. T. Mommsen, P. Krüger, Berlin, 1889.
- O. von Gierke, Das deutsche Genossenschaftsrecht, 4 vols., Berlin, 1868–1913.
- La Didachè, ou Doctrine des douze apôtres*, SC 248.
- La didascalie, ou Doctrine catholique des douze apôtres*, in Constitutions apostoliques, SC 320.
- ♦ J. Ellul (1946), Le fondement théologique du droit, Neuchâtel.
- B. Tierney (1981), Religion, Law and the Growth of Constitutional Thought 1150–1650, Cambridge.
- L. Vallauri, G. Dilcher (Ed.) (1981), Christentum, Säkularisation und modernes Recht, 2 vols., Baden-Baden.
- J. Gaudemet (1985), Les sources du droit de l'Église en Occident du IIe au VIIIe s., Paris.
- J.M. Kelley (1992), A Short History of Western Legal Theory, Oxford.
- H.J. Berman (1993), Faith and Order: The Reconciliation of Law and Religion, Atlanta.
- J. Witte, Jr., J.D. van der Wyver (Ed.) (1995), Religious Human Rights in Global Perspective, 2 vols., The Hague.

JOHN WITTE

See also Authority; Church and State

Lay/Laity

From the lexicographic point of view, the word lay and its derivatives fall into two main semantic domains. On the one hand, lay means “independent from any specific religious belief” (Robert sv). This is a modern sense, used in speaking of the secular state or secular education in order to indicate the absence of any religious reference in the political or educational system. There is another meaning, specifically connected to the structuring of the church* as a religious society*: here a distinction is made between the laity, members of that society who perform only the activities deriving from a shared belonging to the church through baptism*, and the clergy, who receive a specific status in the same society, a status from which derive acts of government, teaching, and presiding over ritual celebrations. This second sense (a member of the laity is someone who “does not belong to the clergy”) has sometimes been transposed onto other religious societies, but it comes specifically from the Christian ecclesiastical tradition*.

Modern usage of the term in fact derives from this second meaning to the extent that it is rooted in the process by which the civil authorities of the Christian West attempted, from the late Middle Ages, to assert their independence in the conflict between the two powers, spiritual (the pope* and the church) and temporal (the power of princes conceived of as not clerical and therefore secular). From the 18th century on the conflict became increasingly violent. It conditioned the entire religious and political history of the 19th century and resulted in rather varied legal solutions, ranging from the legal separation of church and state to a series of concordats. The secular spirit, which claims absolute autonomy for temporal power and defines itself by rejecting any reference to the religious dimension of man (see Bedouelle and Costa 1998) is the latest manifestation of the conflict.

I. Historical Determination

The meaning of the term lay in the church was constructed in several main stages, which are themselves revealing of the theological and ecclesiastical problems underlying historical reality. It is not by chance that one of the major ecclesiologists of this century, Y. Congar, elaborated one aspect of his ecclesiological analysis on this theme in a classic work, Jalons pour une théologie du laïcat (1953).

1. A Term Absent from the Biblical Tradition?

Lay comes from the Greek laikos (one who belongs to the people or comes from it: nonofficial, civil, or common, Liddell Scott sv). The absence of the term from the New Testament has often been noted. We must however remember that laikos is an adjective derived from laos (people), a term that is omnipresent in both Old and New Testaments (see, e. g., the key passages of Exodus 19:5 [frequently repeated in the New Testament, in 1 Pt 2:5, 2:9; Rev 1:6; 5:10; 20:6], and Lv 26:12 and Jer 31:33 [repeated in 2 Cor 6:16; Heb 8:10; Rev 21:3]; see Grelot 1970). And since belonging to the people* of God formally constitutes the Christian experience* (by comparison, the disciples of Jesus* were very early given by pagans the name christianus [Acts 11:26], which is precisely an epithet of belonging [-anus = supporter of] to Chrestos), it is probable that when it appeared in the vocabulary of the church, laikos carried this meaning. The laikos is then the one who belongs to the people of God, established as the heir of the covenants* and the beneficiary of the promise* of salvation*: “You too, laymen, Church elect of God, listen to this: Church means first of all people; you are the very holy Catholic Church, the royal priesthood, the holy multitude, the adopted people, the great assembly, the bride adorned for the Lord God” (Didascalios II. 26. 1). Hence, “our word ‘lay’ is connected to a word that in Jewish and then in Christian usage precisely designated the consecrated people in opposition to the profane peoples” (Congar 1953).

The term does appear in certain texts like Clement, Ep. to Cor. 40.5 and Tertullian, De Praescriptione Haereticorum 41. 8, which enumerate series of distinct functions in the assembly (high priest, priests, levites, laity), but we should not use that fact to infer categories linked to a later ecclesiological approach make the opposition between clergy and laity into a principle of analysis. Congar points out that we are, at this stage, in a context where the institution of the church is not yet seen “as an order of means for the calling of salvation” (ibid., 21). Thus, even if the progressively greater emphasis on a hierarchy in both secular life and church membership became an element of Christian consciousness from the third century onward, and led in particular to seeing in the ordines the structuring elements of the society (Hippolytus, In Daniele I. 17; Tertullian, Ad uxorem I. 7; De monogamia 12; De exhortatione castitatis 7. 3 and 14. 1–4; Methodus of Olympus, Symposium VII. 3), something that further led to the distinction proposed by Pope Gregory the Great between pastores, continentes, and conjugati (see Moralia I. 14; V. 13 and 30), we cannot yet speak of a systematic division in which the laity were defined only negatively in terms of their distinction from clergy or pastors*. Ecclesiological reflection has always instinctively sensed the foundational character of a baptismal and sacramental belonging to the people of God, whatever the specific status of each individual.

2. Canonical Divergence about Laity in the Medieval Period

It is still difficult to evaluate the importance of the pastoral, canonical, and ecclesiological orientations of the Gregorian reform. In a Western Europe that was becoming self-aware through a renewal of the dual legacy of ancient political thought and the Augustinian theological tradition (the two cities), the mutual relations of church and princes took shape in terms of a conflict of powers (spiritual and temporal). Generally, the division took place as follows: the church exercised its power in the person of the clergy (pope and bishops*); and the princes, who were laymen not clergy, became holders of temporal power. The task was then to determine in legal terms the scope of the two powers; and a new schema took shape according to which the laity did not exercise power in the church, because the clergy alone had that responsibility. This new ecclesiological approach, heavily conditioned by political and social circumstances, produced three results. In the first place there was an attempt to clarify and distinguish the respective domains of natural (political) society and church society, with an inevitable logical hardening of the opposition between what fell under the temporal (power of lay princes) and what fell under the spiritual (power of the clergy). Second, there was an attempt to justify clergy's specific character in relation to the laity, including, as this did, the massive introduction of a legal problematic of power within the life and the mystery* of the church. This is the framework in which we can locate the axiom of the decree of Gratian, Duo sunt genera christianorum..., contrasting the "clergy given over to the divine office, devoted to contemplation* and prayer*, removed from the affairs of the world*," to the laity, who possessed temporal goods, could marry, cultivate the soil, administer human justice*, carry on business, and offer gifts at the altar (c. VII, c. XII. q. 1; see commentary in Congar 1953 and GVEDL I, 678). Finally, there emerged an ecclesial power that claimed the right to operate even over the "natural" structure of society, the church believing that its role included helping to construct a present world whose institutions were influenced by the ethical, social, and cultural implications of revelation*.

At this point we can evaluate the differences in which the two understandings of the laity specific to the churches of the West and the East developed. Because it had always existed in a preestablished civil and political society, the Eastern church had always spontaneously understood itself in its sacramental essence. Political power (the Byzantine Basileus) was thus understood as one component of the gift of the church as sacrament, and the king was recognized as having a particular priestly identity and therefore the formal right to intervene (see Dagron 1996). This represented a perspective of integration of the prince and of natural society into the mystery of the church. The Western church, on the other hand, was very early defined by the separation between the sacerdotium and the imperium (the donation of Constantine symbolizing, by the "gift" of the Papal States, this radical autonomy of the sacerdotium). It was not long before there emerged a situation of conflict between the two powers, which saw spiritual power constantly attempting to assert its supremacy over temporal power.

3. Crisis of the Reformation and Contemporary Rediscovery of the Baptismal Priesthood

The coming of the Reformation was as deeply connected to the secular powers and their claims to autonomy as to a radical critique of the church as objective mediation for salvation. It is therefore against the background of a new situation that we must understand the positions adopted by Luther*, and his assertion of the absolute primacy of a common priesthood* of the faithful in radical opposition to the ministerial priesthood. This crisis situation provoked in the Catholic Church a hardening of the opposition between clergy and laity within the very life of the church, in a theology that accentuated contrasts like that between the teaching church (the clergy) and the taught church (the laity), and which saw in the clerical state the preeminent representation of Christian identity.

The appearance of societies based on a recognition of the free individual as the subject of rights and duties; a critical rereading of historical sources (biblical, patristic, medieval); a renewal of evangelization in societies with a Christian tradition (Catholic Action*)—these factors enabled contemporary theology to take up in new terms the major ecclesiological notions, and consequently also the notion of lay/laity. To the work of Y. Congar already mentioned, we should add that of M.-D. Chenu, H. de Lubac*, and H. and K. Rahner*, who have all had a profound influence on the aggiornamento of the church proposed by Pope John XXIII and formulated programmatically in the major documents of Vatican* II (particularly LG, chaps. II, IV, and V; GS; AA; AG, chap. VI; IM; DH; GE; as well as the Messages of the Council, of 20 October 1962 and 8 December 1965). The implementation of these major programmatic documents was continued in particular by the Roman synod* of October 1987 on “the vocation and the mission* of the laity in the Church and the world twenty years after Vatican II,” and the publication by John Paul II of the post-synodal apostolic exhortation Christifideles Laici (CL) of 30 December 1988. Current theological thinking is not really unanimous, but the various tendencies are rooted in a few major shared convictions.

II. Dogmatic Approach

1. Difficulties of a “Positive” Approach to the Notion of Laity

As history shows, the difficulty encountered in defining the reality of the laity comes from the use of a negative concept: formally, a lay person is any member of the church who does not belong to the clergy, that is, who has not received the sacrament* of ordination*. For this reason the customary tripartite division of the members of the people of God into priests, monks and nuns, and laity is formally inaccurate, since monks may be members of the clergy (if they are ordained) or lay brothers (if they are not). Basically, the notion of laity is a pastoral-canonical notion that makes it possible conveniently to make rules concerning the members of the people of God according to the way of life or ministerial activities that are specific to them. This is clearly evident in the procedure of the CCC of 1983, which begins by defining the christifideles, those “who, insofar as they are incorporated into Christ* by baptism, are established as the people of God” (can. 204. 1), and later asserts that “by divine institution, there are in the Church, among the faithful, sacred ministers who are of right (in jure) called clergy, and others who are called laity” (can. 207. 1; see LG 31).

The principal problem is thus one of ecclesiological methodology. Is it possible to begin with a practical given of a pastoral and legal character and give it dogmatic value in ecclesiology* without committing a kind of paralogism? It is on the basis of this question that we should understand the attempts of the several theologies* that try to define the laity positively: those of the canonists (Corecco 1990); of theologians intent on promoting specific features of certain charisms pertaining to lay movements (G. Chantraine); of actual members of those movements (Communione e Liberazione and Opus Dei principally, as far as Europe is concerned); of the earlier theoreticians of Catholic Action who derived the apostleship of the laity from a mandate of the hierarchy*; and finally, of historians who, in a concern for “declericalization,” criticize the “bipolar structure” of the church (e.g., A. Faivre, Ordonner la fraternité, Paris, 1992).

Behind the apparent diversity of approaches, the point of departure is in fact always the same: it is the life of the church, essentially seen from the perspective of functionality, activity, and powers, that legitimates the questioning. As a consequence, some theologies of the laity may take on a combative or challenging aspect and be organized essentially in order to ask what the laity may or may not do, in reference to the presbyteral or diaconal ministry. This aspect is no doubt exacerbated by the current situation of a church that is experiencing not only a deep crisis of vocations but also considerable uncertainty about the identity of the ministerial priesthood. Similarly, to make the distinction between charism and institution (Congar) a constituent element of ecclesiology creates the danger of assimilating institution to ministerial responsibility on the one hand, and on the other, lay life to the spontaneous diversity of charisms, which leads to the desire for a “promotion” of the laity in terms of charismatic diversification (Corecco 1990; Chantraine 1987). This would represent a modern extension of the theology of the founding charisms of religious institutes. Last, another tendency that can rightly call on tradition and certain conciliar documents (particularly LG 31: “the secular character [indoles saecularis] is the specific and particular character of the laity,” repeated in CL), seems to wish to give a positive specificity to the Christian laity in entrusting it with a concern for the affairs of the world (saeculum), and in this way providing a contemporary version of the medieval division of powers, the clergy being concerned with affairs of the church and the laity with temporal affairs. This dichotomy, however, even very attenuated, does not seem capable of responding to the fundamental question of the theological determination of the status of the laity in the Church. The question, in fact, brings us back to that of the pairing baptismal priesthood/ministerial priesthood, and it is this pairing that structures the church in its very being.

2. Reconsideration of the Problem in Terms of the Sacramentality of the Church

To respond to contemporary ecclesiological requirements, a theology of the laity seems to be obliged to go beyond the canonical oppositions that define it negatively in relation to the ministerial priesthood and to call on a theology of the sacramentality of the Church as it is defined in LG 1: “The Church being, in Christ, in some sense the sacrament of—that is, both the sign and the means of—the intimate union with God and of the unity of the whole human race [intimae cum Deo unionis totiusque humani generis unitatis],... This assertion implies that the Church is inseparably what signifies (sacramentum) the communion* that it is (unio or communio).”

The fundamental and insurpassable form in which the Church signifies itself, in and by the acts of its members, is the common or royal priesthood of the baptized. Thus, all members (laity or clergy) receive through baptism the priestly existence defined in Scripture in Romans 12:1 (“I appeal to you therefore, brothers, by the mercies of God, to present your bodies as a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable to God, which is your spiritual worship”; see Rom 1:9, 15:15 f.). There is no more fundamental basis for a life of faith than this filial gift of one’s life to the Father* in and through the single priesthood of Christ, “sole Mediator between God and man.” Vatican II comments as follows: “Christ the Lord, high priest taken from among men (see Heb 5:1–5), has made of the new people ‘a kingdom of priests for his God and Father’ (see Rev 1:6, 5:9 f.)” The baptized, in fact, through the regeneration and the anointing of the Holy* Spirit, are consecrated to dwell in a spiritual home and a holy priesthood; to offer, through all the activities of the Christian, so many spiritual sacrifices and to proclaim the wonders of the one who has called them out of darkness into his own admirable light (see 1 Pt 2:4–10). This is why all the disciples of Christ, persevering in prayer and the praise* of God (see Acts 2:42–47), should offer themselves as holy victims, acceptable to God (see Rom 12:1), and should bear witness to Christ over the face of the earth, giving to all who ask an account of the hope that lies in them of eternal life (see 1 Pt 3:15)” (LG 10).

The problem is thus not to be a member of the laity (not the clergy), but to be baptized (laikos as member of the people [laos] of God): no longer a canonical definition by negative differentiation, but a positive recognition of the sacramentality of all Christian existence, both in the world and within the Church, of the sacramentality of the royal baptismal priesthood based on the one priesthood of Christ. Because Christian existence is given by grace* in a sacramental mode, it is itself called on to be totally sacramental: “pastors should recognize and promote the ministries*, the offices, and the functions of the lay faithful *which have their sacramental basis in baptism, Confirmation, and for many in *marriage” (CL 23).

At this point arises the question of the relationship between the two priesthoods (baptismal and ministerial). The major document of Vatican II formulates it in these terms: “The common priesthood of the faithful and the ministerial or hierarchical priesthood, although they differ in essence and not in degree (licet essentia et non gradu tantum differant), are nevertheless ordered together; in fact, each in its own way participates in the single priesthood of Christ (suo peculiari modo de uno Christi sacerdotio participant)” (LG 10).

Even though the document does not provide a formal solution with respect to the constituents of this essential difference, it appears to be a difference in the order of meaning: the two priesthoods (baptismal and ministerial) signify the same res (the one priesthood of Jesus Christ), but following two different registers of meaning (and that is enough to provide an essential difference, for two signs, as signs, do not differ in degree but in essence, even if they designate a single reality). Both signify the same Christ high priest but in two different aspects. The ministerial priesthood signifies Christ acting to save the world, the Lord taking the initiative to fulfill the purpose of the Father, founding and establishing the actions of salvation, the eternal Word* making himself the means and bearer of salvation by grace. Each time that the Church appears as the sacramental sign of Christ the Savior the ministerial priesthood signifies the gratuity of the grace given in this saving act. The baptismal priesthood, for its part, signifies Christ insofar as he realizes in us and recapitulates in himself his work of salvation, the Christ-Pleroma, the one who shapes us to himself as he offered himself to the Father “once and for all,” the one who contains all and in whom all things are brought together.

Understanding baptismal existence as a sacrament of the priesthood of Christ then makes it possible to articulate the condition of the laity in the Church following the theology of the “triple function” (prophetic, royal, and ritual). One might schematize it as follows:

a) Prophetic Function. To the extent that any baptismal life relies on the confession of faith*, everything that derives from confession, witnessing, and the proclamation of faith belongs fully to all the baptized. Only the function of authentication of faith in all its forms belongs to the ministry as charisma veritatis (Irenaeus*).

b) Royal Function. The royal function of the baptismal priesthood consists of the exercise of a liberty* moved by the charity that is the Holy Spirit and pertains equally to all the baptized. It sounds the basic note of the sacramentality of their Christian existence, in the infinitely varied forms required by the diversity of human needs and human distress. Only the critical function of bringing these charisms together in the service of communion belongs formally to the ministerial priesthood.

c) Ritual Function. The ritual function is the work of the whole assembly: “This entirely redeemed city, that is, the assembly and the society of the saints, is offered to God as a universal sacrifice* by the high priest who, in the form of a slave, went so far as to offer himself for us in his Passion*.” (Augustine*, De civitate Dei X. 6)

Thus, every liturgical action is the work of all, with the ministerial priesthood, through the sacramental sign of presidency, manifesting in it the transcendent initiative of Christ the Head, the source of grace. In this perspective it is clear that the reality of the ministerial priesthood is totally subordinated to that of the royal priesthood as a means to an end, since the ultimate reality of the Church is the participation of all (through adoptive filial life) in the Son’s eternal gift of himself to the Father in the Holy Spirit. We can imagine no more fundamental recognition of the dignity of the estate of a baptized lay person in the Church.

- Y.M.-J. Congar (1953), Jalons pour une théologie du laïcat, Paris.

- K. Rahner (1955), “Über das Laienapostolat,” Schr. zur Th. 2, Einsiedeln, 339–73.
- Y.M.-J. Congar (1959), “Conscience ecclésiologique en Orient et en Occident du VIe au XIe siècle,” Ist 6, 187–236.
- M. Jourjon (1963), “Les premiers emplois du mot l. dans la littérature patristique,” LV (L) 65, 37–42.
- B.D. Dupuy (1967), “L,” (théologie et droit canon), Cath 6, 1627–43.
- P. Grelot (1970–1981 [5th ed.]), “Peuple,” VThB, 979–91.
- P.F. Bradshaw (1983), “Modèles de ministères, le rôle des l. dans la liturgie,” MD 154, 127–50.
- G. Chantraine (1987), Les l., chrétiens dans le monde, Paris.
- E. Poulat (1987), Liberté, laïcité: La guerre des deux France et le principe de modernité, Paris.
- E. Corecco (1990), Théologie et droit canon: Écrits pour une nouvelle théorie générale du droit canon, Fribourg.
- A. M. Ritter, et al. (1990), “Laie,” TRE 20, 378–93.
- M. Spinelli (1990), “L,” DECA 2, 1399–1400.
- D. Bourgeois (1991), L’un et l’autre sacerdoce, Paris.
- G. Chantraine, et al. (1996), Baptême et ordre: L’un et l’autre sacerdoce, Com(F) XXI/6, 9–83.
- G. Dagron (1996), Empereur et prêtre: Étude sur le “césaropapisme” byzantin, Paris.
- G. Bedouelle, J.-P. Costa (1998), Les laïcités à la française, Paris.

DANIEL BOURGEOIS

See also Baptism; Cleric; Church; Ministry; Priesthood; Sacrament

Laying on of Hands

The laying on of hands (or of the hand: the usage is undecided) is a gesture used in several religions. The gesture has many meanings, however, so that its significance must be specified on each occasion by the context.

In the Old Testament the laying on of hands is used (under the name of semikah) in sacrifices* (Lv 4), blessings* (Gn 48:13–20), when bestowing a particular function on someone (Nb 27:15–23), or to exclude a troublemaker (Lv 24:14). Most authors acknowledge the existence of a semikah for the inauguration of rabbis: Ehrhardt (1954) considers that this usage can only date back to A.D. 70, but Hoffman (1979) disputes Ehrhardt’s view.

As in the Judaism* of his time and in the pagan world, Jesus* laid on his hands in order to heal (Mk 6:5), or to bless children (Mk 10:16). The early church* understood the laying on of hands as a complement to Baptism* (Acts 8:17, 9:17 ff., 19:6; Heb 6:2), as a means of designating someone to a function (Acts 6:6, 13:1 ff.), as an ordination* rite (1 Tm 4:14, 5:22; 2 Tm 1:6), and as a gesture of healing* (Acts 9:12).

The laying on of hands was widely used in the early church. The Apostolical Tradition (Rome*, v. 215) saw it as a rite of exorcism* used during the catechumenate (no. 20; see 19), as a gesture for invoking the Spirit (epiclesis gesture), to be performed by the bishop* after the water rite of baptism (no. 21). The ordination of bishops, presbyters*, and deacons* also required the laying on of hands (nos. 2, 7, and 8). This last passage specifies: “During the ordination of the deacon, only the bishop lays on his hands, because the deacon is not ordained to the priesthood*, but to the service of the bishop”; and regarding the widow: “There will not be a laying of hands, because she does not offer the oblation and does not have liturgical service (leitourgia)” (no. 10). The presbyters and the bishop also perform a laying on of hands during the eucharistic prayer (no. 4).

Cyprian* also mentions that the Roman Church performed the laying on of hands to reconcile heretics (Ep. 74:2, 2–3; see baptism*).

These practices were taken into the future, to the extent that the laying on of hands plays a role today in the rites of all the sacraments*, though with various meanings (exorcism, healing, blessing). It most often has a pneumatological and ecclesiological value (Confirmation*, eucharistic epiclesis, ordination).

The laying on of hands is used by other Christian churches. Orthodoxy distinguishes between chirotony (laying on of hands for major functions) and chirothesy (for secondary functions).

- J. Coppens (1925), L'imposition des mains et les rites connexes dans le NT et dans l'Église ancienne, Wetteren-Paris.
- A. Ehrhardt (1954), “Jewish and Christian Ordination,” JEH 5, 125–38.
- J. Coppens (1979), “L'imposition des mains dans les Actes des Apôtres,” in J. Kremer (Ed.), Les Actes des Apôtres: Traditions, rédaction, théologie, BETHL 48, 405–38.
- L. Hoffman (1979), “L'ordination juive à la veille du christianisme,” MD 138, 7–47.

PAUL DE CLERCK

See also Liturgy; Sacrament

Legend. See Myth

Legitimate Defense

The question whether it is morally justified to kill in order to defend oneself is an important moral question in itself, and the answer that one gives is key in the ethics* of war*. Does justice alone warrant death, or does legitimate defense constitute a right that fundamentally justifies war? Christian notions of legitimate defense have shifted between Christianity's origins and the modern era.

The response of the Fathers* is typified by Tertullian*, following texts such as Matthew 5:39 and 26:52. He thought that Christians ought rather to be killed than kill, and that when harmed they should not seek revenge, even by means of a tribunal. No cause in the world, not even the protection of one's own life, could justify being tainted with the sin of killing.

Ambrose* and Augustine* agreed with this point, but differed from Tertullian about war. Ambrose did not think it legitimate for a wise man to save his life from a shipwreck at the expense of an ignorant sailor; analogously, it is no more legitimate to save one's life at the expense of an assailant's life (De officiis). For Ambrose and for Augustine, who agreed with him on this point, the necessity of self-defense did not justify murder. Augustine wrote that he could not accept that people could be condemned to death to prevent them from killing others, unless the executioner were a soldier or a civil servant legally appointed to do so and not acting on his own behalf, but on the behalf of others (Ep. 47).

Tradition changed with Thomas* Aquinas, who found it legitimate to use force against an unjust assailant in order to save one's life (ST IIa IIae, q. 64, a. 7). Debating the issue led him to the doctrine of “double effect” or “twofold intention.” Luther* would say on the other hand that “no Christian shall wield or invoke the sword for himself and his cause” (WA 11, 267). Maintaining order and waging war were matters for public authority* alone.

The Counter-Reformation refined and systemized Aquinas’s authorization. Vitoria (c. 1485–1546), along with many others, considered legitimate defense as a kind of private war (bellum privatum) and referred to discussions by the Scholastics* on what might justify self-defense in case of an attack (De iure belli 1, 2). Some accepted legitimate defense only as an emergency measure, to save one’s life, while others extended it to saving one’s honor and property. Vitoria thought that an individual could legitimately declare a “private war,” but only to defend himself and as the offense occurred. One could not wage a private war to seek revenge or to punish, although these are reasons a state can invoke to declare war, even if defense is its immediate object. Suarez* also thought that only the necessity to defend one’s life and property allowed for legitimate defense, but would not extend this right to dueling. The deliberate defense of one’s honor, with the possibility of killing one’s opponent, is not to be compared with the necessity to defend oneself against an actual act of aggression, and a challenge to a duel is not an aggression (De bello diss. XIII, 9, in De fide, spe et caritate).

For Grotius (1583–1645), legitimate defense was permissible only when faced with an actual assailant. The danger had to be immediate and certain. The assailant himself might be blameless, as, “for instance, a soldier acting in good faith, or one who mistakes you for someone else,” but this did not abrogate the right of legitimate defense. Grotius did not, however, go as far as to allow killing an innocent person who would hinder one’s flight to safety. Certainly, “if we look to nature alone,” this might be accepted, but the law* of the gospel did not permit the killing of the innocent (II, 1, 3–5).

When the doctrine of human rights replaced the classical tradition of natural law in the 17th century, legitimate defense replaced justice as the fundamental cause for war, as in Samuel von Pufendorf (1632–94) or Emmerich de Vattel (1714–67). All men and all states, according to Vattel, had the absolute right to do what was necessary for their preservation. This notion slowly gained importance and is understood in the teachings of John XXIII on war, which was no longer seen as a means to reestablish justice. Therefore, there could no longer be any war of recovery or punishment, but only defensive wars (Pacem in terris 127). Similarly, the United Nations Charter speaks of the inherent right of individual or collective legitimate defense in case of an armed attack (Art. 51). Moral thought thus has now moved away from Ambrose and Augustine’s initial direction.

- H. Grotius, De iure belli ac pacis, Ed. W. Whewell, Cambridge, 1853.
- John XXIII, Pacem in terris, AAS 55, 257–304.
- M. Luther, Von weltlicher Obrigkeit, WA 11, 245–80.
- E. de Vattel, Le droit des gens; ou, Principes de la loi naturelle appliquée à la conduite et aux affaires des nations et des souverains, London, 1758.
- F. de Vitoria, Relectio de iure belli, Ed. L. G. Alonso Gatino, Madrid, 1933–36.
- ♦ G. Fletcher (1996), “Légitime défense,” DEPhM, 815–18.

DAVID ATTWOOD

See also Intention; Love; Violence; War

Leibniz, Gottfried Wilhelm

1646–1716

During a long career as a jurist and counselor to the German princes (in Mainz and then Hanover), Leibniz wrote a great deal and published little. In addition to his administrative duties as a jurist, feudist, and historian, he devoted considerable time to science, especially mathematics, and to philosophical and theological reflection. In an era marked by changes in religion owing to the political adventures of the Germanic states, Leibniz, who was a Lutheran, entertained a lengthy and abundant correspondence with eminent Catholics, Anglicans, and Calvinists. A German “patriot” above all (he invented the word), he refused any form of conversion* (even to become librarian to the Vatican), but played an active role in both the public and secret discussions regarding the union of the different churches*. The primacy of his religious concerns goes some way toward explaining his initial hostility toward Cartesianism, which he later compared to Spinozism. Nevertheless, it was in the midst of this hostility that he built his own system, renewing, by means of the concept of force, the notion of substance, reintroducing formality in method, responding with harmony to the issue of the union of soul* and body.

Moral responsibility was dependent upon the metaphysical basis of Leibniz’s system. Every simple, or monadic, substance possesses an inner force, which is its principle of action; the plurality of what is possible maintains contingency; the finality of the mind makes it capable of deliberately choosing the best. But that does not eliminate individual responsibility: although there are an infinite number of possible worlds, all our personal shortcomings are contained in the world that is called into existence by virtue of its great goodness, and with a view to the highest perfection (Letter to Arnauld). God* is to creatures “what the inventor is to his machine,” and to the mind “what a prince is to his subjects, or even a father to his children” (Monadology §84, 1714). The harmony of the “divine city of the mind” and its happiness are therefore ascertained through “the reign of final causes.” Leibniz did not attempt to avoid the “labyrinth” created by the question of the origin of evil*, however, and he suggested that evil was determined by three sources—metaphysical, physical, and moral—in order to make the theses of God’s omnipotence* compatible with his goodness and the existence of evil (Essais de Theodice and Causa Dei, 1710).

Leibniz asserted both the freedom of man, even if man is ignorant of the divine plan, and the confidence that will obtain through one’s reasonable certainty of having made the best choice. To existing proofs of the existence* of God (those described as cosmological and ontological) he added his own proof of divine reason*, as an argument against atheists and as the source of possibilities that implicated a will capable of choice: “His understanding is the source of essences, and his will is the origin of existence” (Theodice I, §7). God is duty bound to “act in perfection, obeying his supreme reason” (Discourse on Metaphysics §3, 1686). Leibniz was a champion of the univocity both of being and of knowledge. Like Malebranche, Leibniz believes that the perfection of the work is achieved through the simplicity of means; but the world, which remains contin-gent, necessarily refers to a Creator, to whom one returns as “the final reason of things” through the principle of sufficient reason. Leibniz was the first to formulate this idea in his catholic demonstrations (1668–9). It takes on a twofold canonical form: Nothing ever happens without a reason 1) for which this thing exists; 2) for which it exists in this way rather than in any other (Theodice I, §44).

However, it is difficult to determine to what degree, for Leibniz, God himself is subject to the principle that allows us to have access to him, in the way that Descartes*’s God was subjected to a degree to the principle of causality in the form of the causa sui. The rational and reasonable unity of Leibniz’s thought emphasized the urgent nature of a meeting among the churches, something that had already been suggested for geopolitical reasons in Europe in the face of the Ottoman advance. Following in the path of Georg Calixt and the masters of the University of Helmstadt, and as a resident of a Catholic milieu, be it in Frankfurt or Mainz, in Paris or at court in Hanover, Leibniz encouraged exchanges in the form of meetings and correspondence: with Bossuet; with Nicholas Sténon, a Danish Protestant and anatomical scholar who had converted to Catholicism, become a priest*, bishop* and head of a mission* in Northern Europe; with Spinola, the bishop of Neustadt; with the Calixtine pastor Molanus, who was president of the Hanoverian consistory; and with Burnett, an Anglican. Leibniz’s interest in missions, to China in particular, came from the same source (Chinese rites*); he found among the Jesuits and the monastic models similarities with his own academic and religious projects. The union of churches was, in fact, not only a matter of circumstances; for Leibniz, it represented the precise application of his system, narrowed down to three main issues: 1) grace*, for there is a preestablished harmony between the realm of nature and the moral realm of grace; 2) pure love*—an issue where Leibniz’s definition and the use of classical distinctions (pleasure/interest, concupiscence/kindness/cupidity) were not favorable to Fénelon (“It is not possible to have a love of God above all things, separate from our own interest, since the pleasure which we find in the contemplation* of his perfection is essential to love” Leibniz wrote in his Letter to Princess Sophia); 3) the Eucharist*, for which he suggested in the 1670s a rational explanation, that of transubstantiation. As the extension is not primitive, the essence of the body consists of strength. It is not, therefore, unthinkable for a corporeal substance (the body of Christ*) to act in several places at once. Real presence, therefore, is a presence of force or virtue, at a distance, and transubstantiation amounts to a “real multi-presence” (Letter to Arnauld, 1671). It is the supernatural operation through which the bread and wine are converted into elements of the corporeal substance of Christ.

In his correspondence with the Jesuit Des Bosses, 30 years later, Leibniz would expound his theory of the “substantial link” to complete and complicate this first explanation, promoting the idea of the unity of the body without reducing the organism to the phenomenality of the unum per accidens. In transubstantiation, according to this new theory, God uses a supernatural application of a new substantial connection (that of the body of Christ) to the accidents of bread. Leibniz’s death brought an end to the correspondence and left the complex hypothesis of the substantial link unresolved. It was the last great attempt to provide a physical explanation of the Eucharist. It provided Blondel* with the subject for an important thesis.

Leibniz’s theories on human freedom, divine rationality, and the unity of substance allowed him to hope for a consensus on these debated issues. His system, or successive systems, have an ecumenical virtue. In the face of failure and incomprehension, Leibniz appealed to a universal Christianity: he offered to assemble—beyond the churches, which would retain their particular confessions of faith*—an elite body, an “order of charity” that would implement on a practical level the unification of Christians separated by dogma.

- Leibniz-Bibliographie, pub. K. Müller and supplemented by A. Heinekamp, et al., I: Die Literatur über Leibniz bis 1980, 1967 (2nd Ed., 1984); II: 1980–1990, 1996, Frankfurt.

- Sämtliche Schriften und Briefe*, 31 vols., Darmstadt-Berlin, 1923.
- C.J. Gerhardt (Ed.) (1879), Die philosophischen Schriften, 7 vols., Berlin (New Ed., Hildesheim-New York, 1978).
- P. Schrecker (Ed.) (1934), Lettres et fragments inédits sur les problèmes philosophiques, théologiques, politiques de la réconciliation des doctrines protestantes (1669–1704), Paris.
- G. Grua (Ed.), (1943), Textes inédits, Paris (2nd Ed. 1999).
- Y. Belaval (Ed.) (1961), La profession de foi du philosophe, Paris.
- C. Fremont (Ed.) (1981), Lettres au P. des Bosses, Paris.
- C. Fremont (Ed.) (1987), Discours sur la théologie naturelle des Chinois, Paris.
- M. Fichant (Ed.) (1991), De l’horizon de la doctrine humaine: La restitution universelle, Paris.
- ♦ M. Blondel (1893), De vinculo substantiali et de substantia composita apud Leibnitium, Paris.
- J. Baruzi (1907), L. et l’organisation religieuse de la terre, Paris; (1909), L. (with many unpublished texts), Paris.
- A. Boehm (1926), “L.,” DThC 9, 173–95.
- J. Baruzi (1927), “Le problème du salut dans la pensée religieuse de L.,” repr. in L’intelligence mystique, Paris, 1985.
- G. Grua (1953), Jurisprudence universelle et théodicée selon L., Paris.
- G. Preti (1953), Il cristianesimo universale di G. G. Leibniz, Milan-Rome.
- E. Naert (1959), L. et la querelle du pur amour, Paris.
- J. Jalabert (1960), Le Dieu de L., Paris.
- V. Mathieu (1960), L. e des Bosses (1706–1716), Turin.
- Y. Belaval (1962), L.: Initiation à sa philosophie, Paris.
- J. Le Brun (1976), “L.,” DSp 9, 548–57.
- E. Holze (1991), Gott als Grund der Welt im Denken des Gottfried Wilhelm L., Stuttgart.

JEAN-ROBERT ARMOGATHE

See also Descartes, René; Ecumenism; Eucharist; Lutheranism; Quietism; Rites, Chinese

Leo the Great. See Chalcedon, Council of

Levinas, Emmanuel. See Infinite

Lex Orandi. See Liturgy

Liberalism

The terms liberal and liberalism commonly denote various currents of thought—political, economic, religious, and theological—that appeared at the time of the Reformation and solidified between the Enlightenment and the 19th century. They have in common an appeal to the concept of liberty*, but have never formed a homogeneous whole. In the history of theology, moreover, Protestant liberalism and Catholic liberalism represent two similar but distinct forms of a debate between Christianity and modernity, or between Christianity and the Enlightenment, in which liberty and authority* still to some extent maintain a relationship of fundamental antagonism.

a) Liberty and Liberties. Modern philosophy* did not invent the concept of liberty, but it did put it in the context of new structures of meaning. In its modern sense, the self asserts itself in the work of Descartes* by bracketing the authority of the philosophical tradition. Luther* affirmed the liberty of the Christian by curbing the pretensions of the Catholic Church's magisterium*. In Luther's century, scientific reason was also affirmed by Bacon, who did so by staking the authority of the real against that of the traditional discourses. Likewise during the same century, texts and testimonies—religious texts included—were subjected to the critical attention of philologists and historians (Christian humanism*, the appearance of a critical history* of the church* in the work of Valla, then Baroni- us, etc.). This period also witnessed the rebirth of the classical Greek ideal of the liberty of the citizen; and following the English political philosophers of the 17th century, absolute political power no longer appeared reasonable.

The ideas, as well as the ideals, of the Enlightenment hardly did more than radicalize (and popularize) the principles of a direction that had already been taken. Liberty of conscience, religious freedom, the hope of a rational reshaping of social and political ties—most of these themes were already in place. Nonetheless, an acute awareness of belonging to a new age was the source of the 18th century's intellectual unity: the consciousness of representing a humanity that had reached adulthood and finally dared to know (see the manifesto published by Kant* in 1784, Was ist Aufklärung? Weischedel IX, 53–61), and self-consciousness as the consciousness of a break and “progress.”

Committed to the ideal of liberty and to various attainments of the French Revolution—the legacy of the Enlightenment—Catholics such as Chateaubriand set themselves up during the Restoration as defenders of freedom of the press and of opinion. When liberal revolutions* broke out all across Europe in 1830, Lamennais and his followers Lacordaire and Montalembert founded the newspaper L'Avenir, whose program called for six freedoms: 1) freedom of conscience or religion (and therefore a separation between church* and state); 2) freedom of teaching; 3) freedom of the press; 4) freedom of association; 5) freedom of suffrage (the extension of the electoral principle); 6) freedom of local administration (in the face of revolutionary and imperial centralization). This liberal Catholic school of thought enthusiastically advocated the freedom of nations (the Belgians, the Polish, the Irish). “Liberty as in Belgium”—a new state that enjoyed liberal institutions—became a watchword, and Pope Gregory XVI caused outrage when he urged the Poles who had revolted to submit to the czar.

b) Catholicism and Revolution. It is a remarkable peculiarity of Catholicism that its acceptance of the Enlightenment, or its refusal to accept it, has always been linked to an interpretation of the French Revolution. So liberal Catholicism initially found expression in a moderate interpretation of the Revolution, which distinguished the Constituent Assembly and its achievements (1789) from the Convention and the Terror (1793) (e.g., in the work of H. Maret and F. Ozanam), in the same way as conservative Catholicism (Maistre, Bonald) initially took the form of explicitly counter-revolutionary theories in terms of which the fall of the ancien régime was a theological event and the plain product of the forces of evil. Counterrevolutionary Catholicism was impelled by its own logic to develop traditionalist theological epistemologies (the heterodox parts of which would be determined by the church's magisterium). The logic of liberal Catholicism, on the other hand, led it to more limited theorizing: the search for a theological method that would link history and the "philosophy" of dogma* ("The dignity of human reason and the necessity of divine revelation," Maret, 1856), the defense of Christian democracy (Maret and Ozanam's L'Ère nouvelle, 1848), and the defense of the separation of church and state ("The free church in the free state"—Montalembert's speech at Malines, 1863).

The real theological problem was of course that of preaching the gospel* in a changed society* and a new culture. While in the Aufklärung (Enlightenment) these changes initially (though not exclusively) took the form of a critique of Christianity by non-Christians or sinful Christians, liberal Catholicism took as its main aim the critique of Christianity (or its traditions* and institutions) by Christianity itself (or its evangelical message). A theology renewed through contact with the dominant philosophies of the time (the School of Tübingen*); concern with identifying the particula veri of the objections raised against Christianity (e.g., Monsignor d'Hulst's stance concerning Renan); and concern with ensuring that the theologian's theoretical work enjoyed sufficient independence within the church—all this does not add up to a "liberal" school in 19th-century Catholicism, but the distinctive signs of a trend are certainly there.

c) Protestantism and Modernity. The French Revolution has never been the object of fear and censure on the Protestant side, and the history of "liberal" Protestantism is one of continuity—the continuity of successive currents, each bringing a plan for the modernization or "revision" of Christian theology. Liberal Protestantism takes its place in this sequence of ideas after physico-theology, neology, and rationalism*, and also after Kant and Schleiermacher*. Moreover, it arose in its pure form after the left-wing Hegelians (D. F. Strauss's Life of Jesus, Feuerbach, etc.) or the "free" theologians (A. I. Biedermann, E. Zeller, F. Overbeck, etc.) had shown how far the criticism of Christianity could go—that is, to the point of anthropological reduction, or of a demythologization that allowed none of the affirmations of faith to survive. In the face of this impoverishment, liberal Protestantism aimed to be Christian while being supremely scientific. However, when Harnack gave liberal Protestantism its catechism (his lectures on The Essence of Christ) he illustrated perfectly how the movement of which he was the last and most glorious representative came to redefine Christianity: its distinctive characteristic ceased to be faith* in Christ* and became the faith of Christ, which reveals God as the Father*; and under the influence of numerous criticisms of the development of Christian dogma, the traditional affirmations of the Christian faith came to seem (even to Harnack) to be no more than "products of the Greek spirit in the soil of the gospel." With its refusal of "Hellenized" forms of Christ, its refusal of "metaphysics" due to the moral implications of the Christian faith (A. Ritschl) and to the "dogmatic* method" in theology (E. Troeltsch), and its refusal even of the Jewish origins of Christ (Harnack again, Marcion: Das Evangelium vom fremden Gott [repr. Darmstadt, 1996]), liberal (or "cultural") Protestantism was full of good intentions for bringing about an aggiornamento (updating) of Christian discourse that would make it audible and credible in the context of a new culture. Rather than enabling a new access to the "essential," however, the path that it took was one that reduced Christianity to a form of bourgeois humanism.

d) Refusals and Condemnations. Within Catholicism the history of liberal tendencies, from the end of the Napoleonic Wars until the middle of the 20th century, is in part one of failure. In 1832 Gregory XVI (in his encyclical Mirari Vos) condemned Lamennais's liberalism, in particular the idea of freedom of conscience, which the pope saw as a "madness" deriving from indifferentism and extending to the freedom of the press. In Pius IX's Syllabus (1864)—a compendium of "modern errors"—liberalism, when not targeted specifically, is targeted indirectly "in all its forms: rationalism, or the human intellect's tendency to free itself from the authority of revelation* and the doctrinal magisterium; moral and religious indifferentism, or the tendency to reject moral norms and the demands of truth* in the name of the rights of the individual; laicism, or the rejection of the church's influence on the life of societies; and Gallicanism*, which was increasingly seen in Rome* as encompassing a tendency to conceive church organization after the model of parliamentary governments and to reduce the pope*'s divine authority in favor of subordinate powers" (Aubert 1963). Prior to this, the repudiation of the conference of Catholic scholars who met under Döllinger in Munich (1863) had censured the theologians' demand for freedom from the magisterium in matters of research. Finally, Montalembert was reprimanded for maintaining in his speech at Malines (1863) that the extension of civil and political liberties was conducive to the freedom of the church.

Moreover, the same period saw the establishment of the theological and philosophical project of Neoscholasticism. With its manifesto provided by J. Kleutgen (Die Theologie der Vorzeit vertheidigt, Die Philosophie der Vorzeit vertheidigt), under the papacy of Leo XIII it became an official project of the church. Despite this setback, theological liberalism came back in force only to be condemned still more forcefully: this time, however, it bore the name of modernism*. (With all the irony of history, the modernist crisis exploded with the publication of Loisy's "little book," L'Évangile et l'Église, conceived by its author as a refutation of the ideas advanced by Harnack in The Essence of Christ.)

Within Protestant theology, Barth*'s commentary on the Epistle to the Romans aimed to sound the death knell of liberalism, in the name of everything the latter rejected, which was indisputably a great deal (the eschatological meaning of the Christian experience*, the church's responsibility for theological work, fidelity to confessions of faith, etc.); a celebrated exchange of letters between Barth and Harnack (in Barth, Fragen und Antworten, Gesammelte Vorträge 3, 1957) summarizes the theoretical disagreements with the utmost clarity and concision. To the idea of a Christianity comfortably rooted in the culture of its time, "dialectical" theology opposed that of a humanity perpetually plunged into crisis—along with its time, its culture, and its religious sense—by God's Word*. To a theology that Barth regarded as entirely derived from Schleiermacher, and in which God* was always in danger of being the variable while the religious man, the moral man, and the scientific man were the constants, it opposed the absolute primacy of a God whose "unavailability" Bultmann emphasized, borrowing a term from Heidegger*. (Moreover, in the face of a liberal Protestantism that was politically and economically short-sighted, dialectical theology offered sustained attention to sociopolitical questions and exhibited a pronounced sympathy with the social Christianity exemplified before Barth, in Switzerland, by H. Kutter and L. Ragaz.)

e) Rehabilitations. The history of theological liberalism did not end with the modernist crisis, nor with the bracing violence of the dialectical theologians. 1) Recalled by Barth (whose masterpiece was a work of "Church" dogmatics, Kirchliche Dogmatik) to the demands of ecclesiasticism, Protestant theology clearly could not however cut itself off from the demands of academia's scientific standards, the criticism of sources, and so forth—the strongest contemporary defense of the scientific nature of theology was, after all, the work of one of Barth's students, T. F. Torrance. For all Bultmann's continuing fidelity to the intuitions that guided the founders of dialectical theology, the same Bultmann was also the originator of a program—of "demythologization"—that one of his followers, F. Buri, could take with little addition as the basis for a "liberal neo-Protestantism." 2) Doubtless because liberalism had never assumed a violent form within it, contemporary Catholicism was able to break with a policy of blanket condemnation and do justice to the profoundly truthful aspects of the liberals' demands. Pius IX and even Leo XIII defended the freedom of consciences against totalitarianism—as distinct from the freedom of conscience, which they saw as making undue claims for the creature in relation to the Creator. In the political field the "coming together" that Leo demanded of French Catholics sanctioned the existence of forms of government derived from the Revolution, and Catholicism was ultimately able to accommodate many models of separation between church and state. In the economic sphere, the "social doctrine of the church" established under the influence of the encyclical Rerum Novarum (Leo XIII, 1891) enabled progressively more varied and less naïve stances to be adopted. In the field of biblical exegesis* a belated but effective liberation of critical work (in the encyclical Divino Afflante Spiritu, 1943) simultaneously brought a healthier atmosphere to theological circles and produced brilliant intellectual results. Despite the persecutions that followed the modernist crisis and continued until just after the Second World War, innovative thinkers who took no part in the Neoscholastic revival, from Newman* to Lubac and Congar by way of the young Blondel*, were attended to and frequently thanked. Finally, the Second Vatican* Council, in its texts and often in its decisions, had the distinction of putting an end to the Catholic fear of modernity and of designating as a perpetually urgent task an aggiornamento of ecclesiastical concepts and practices, something that had previously been regarded as a perverse temptation.

Some problems remain, while additional ones have emerged. There are voices in theology, particularly from the United States, that object that liberalism is the child of a situation that has passed: if we are now in the age of postmodernism* (J.-F. Lyotard, et al.), then theology should be striving toward a "postliberalism" (G. Lindbeck, et al.). The Hegelian criticism of the Enlightenment (that it presented only an impoverished aspect of thought, “understanding,” Verstand, and that it lacked true “reason*,” Vernunft) is more in evidence today than formerly. While the opposition between liberty and authority seems more and more to have been founded on misunderstanding with regard as much to the essence of liberty as to that of authority, tensions still remain to which no precise and satisfactory theological answer has been found. In Catholicism and Protestantism alike there is lacking a detailed theology of the Church’s teaching; and in Catholicism the freedoms conceded to biblical scholars appear sometimes not to be extended to the exegetes of the magisterium’s texts. In any event, one thing is clear: theology must go beyond liberalism and the Enlightenment, but it must also go as far as them.

- H. Stephan (1911), Die heutigen Auffassungen von Neu-protestantismus, Giessen.
- R. Aubert (1963), Le pontificat de Pie IX, in A. Fliche, V. Martin (Ed.), Histoire de l’Église depuis les origines jusqu’à nos jours, New Ed., Paris.
- M. Prelot, F. Gallouedec Genuys (1969), Le libéralisme catholique, Paris.
- Coll. (1974), Les catholiques libéraux au XIXe siècle, foreword by J. Gadille, Grenoble.

- G. Mathon (1975), “Libéralisme,” Cath 7, 548–63 (bibl.).
- M. Prelot (1975), “Libéralisme catholique,” Cath 7, 563–77.
- B. Reardon (1975), Liberalism and Tradition, Cambridge.
- C. Bressolette (1978), L’abbé Maret, le combat d’un théologien pour une démocratie chrétienne, 1830–1851, Paris.
- J. J. Sheehan (1978), German Liberalism in the 19th Century, Chicago (2nd Ed., Atlantic Highlands, N.J., 1995).
- U. Dierse, et al. (1980), “Liberalismus,” HWP 5, 256–72.
- R. S. Michaelsen, W. C. Roof (Ed.) (1986), Liberal Protestantism: Realities and Possibilities, New York.
- J. Schmidt (Ed.) (1989), Aufklärung und Gegenklärung in der europäischen Literatur, Philosophie und Politik von der Antike bis zur Gegenwart, Darmstadt.
- D. Langewiesche, H. Vorländer (1991), “Liberalismus,” TRE 21, 78–83.
- H. M. Müller (Ed.) (1992), Kulturprotestantismus: Beiträge zu einer Gestalt des modernen Christentums, Gütersloh.
- W. Behr (1995), Politischer Liberalismus und christliches Christentum.
- J.-Y. Guiomar (1996), “Romantisme politique,” DPhP, 583–88.
- M. Lilla (1996), “Anti-Lumières,” DPhP, 16–19.
- P. Raynaud (1996), “Libéralisme,” DPhP, 338–44.
- P. Colin (1997), L’audace et le soupçon: La crise du modernisme dans le catholicisme français, Paris.

CLAUDE BRESSOLETTE AND JEAN-YVES LACOSTE

See also Gallicanism; Modernism; Rationalism; Ultramontanism

Liberation Theology

a) Origins. Liberation theology arose in Latin America in the years immediately following Vatican* II. The council (and some texts that followed it, such as Paul VI’s letter Octogesima adveniens of 14 May 1971 to Cardinal Roy) had accorded social and political change a greater meaning than official Catholic theology generally gave them, and had insisted upon the social dimension of salvation* (Sigmund 1990; earlier, Lubac*’s Catholicisme of 1938). At this time, moreover, the bourgeoisie and intelligentsia of Latin America had lost confidence in the concepts of “development” and “progress” on the European or North American model, which had led to the adoption of the market economy and liberal democracy* (and sometimes even of Protestantism*, Sigmund 1990). The conference of Latin American bishops met at Medellín in 1968 and adopted several elements of what was to become liberation theology—the most important being the idea of the church*’s “preferential option” for the poor. Finally, the political* theology inspired by J. B. Metz had considerable influence, as did discussions in Latin America on European (and North American) theology (see Hoffmann, Glaubensbegründung, FTS 36, 1988).

b) Concept of Liberation. In the sense in which it became common parlance, following a book by Gutierrez (1971) that was its first structured manifesto, liberation has a fourfold meaning. 1) The term alludes first of all to the Exodus, in other words, the idea of a salvation achieved within history, whose content may be expressed in terms of the disappearance of social evils and the construction of a just society* here on earth (Miranda 1974, Assmann 1976). Liberation theologians have taken great pains to prove that Jesus* preaching* did not abandon this Old Testament theme in favor of a “faith*” whose “inwardness” might obscure social and political needs. 2) It assumes a theory of secularization*, borrowed in part from European and North American thinkers (F. Gogarten, H. Cox), that defines it as liberation, itself defined as the negation of all alienation. 3) Next, it assumes that this process of liberation will be multiplied by the destruction of capitalist society and the appearance of a classless—in other words, just—society. 4) Finally, it assumes an idea that derives from Rahner* (e.g., “Theologie der Freiheit,” Schr. zur Th. 6, 215–37): in every person there exists, as a sign of his or her receptiveness to God*, an a priori tendency to free the self from all natural or societal constraints.

c) Relationship with Marxism. No liberation theologian is Marxist in the strict or orthodox sense of the word, and most owe to L. Althusser an (inexact) interpretation of Marx (see Marx* 4) that enables them to dissociate the supposedly “scientific” aspects of Marxism from its supposedly purely “metaphysical” aspects. At any rate, all are indebted to Marxism (and to Hegel* by way of Marx) for a dialectical vision of history in which no progress is conceivable without struggle (Segundo 1973–74; there are parallels in Dussel’s liberation philosophy, 1985). They maintain, moreover, that it is possible to take the side of the oppressed, violently if need be, without compromising the Church’s mission, insofar as the oppressors behave in a clearly “idolatrous” way. Finally, they take a central theme from Marxism: that of the “priority of praxis,” making theology into either a reflection of Christian praxis or a Christian commentary on a theoretical consideration of political praxis (Gutierrez, Segundo; philosophical groundwork in C. Boff 1987).

The views of liberation theology on the question of revolutionary violence* are not unanimous. Most authors refuse to identify the peaceful revolution* preached by Jesus with the revolution demanded by Marxism. The latter is held to be justified in some cases, and the traditional theory of the just war* is often invoked to justify it. Sometimes, too, Jesus’ opposition to violence is played down, on the basis that the historical conditions of proletarian revolution did not yet exist in his time (Segundo).

Once Marxism and socialist revolution ceased to be the paramount subjects of debate in Latin America, in particular after the failure of Nicaragua’s experiment, in which liberation theology had been heavily involved (see Berryman 1984), the latter evolved so as to concern itself more with ecclesiological questions—the experience of the “base communities,” of course, was not without ecclesiological lessons—and more concrete political, social, and economic programs (Sigmund 1990).

d) Reactions from Rome. During the 1980s liberation theology was several times on the receiving end of criticisms formulated by Pope John Paul II and Cardinal J. Ratzinger (prefect of the Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith). It was rebuked for accepting the idea that violence was necessary for the progress of history, for reducing doctrine to the mere expression (historically and culturally limited) of a religious impulse, for transforming the history of the church into a simple by-product of relations of production, for accepting the concept of class struggle and taking sides in that struggle, for identifying the poor in the Bible* with the victims of capitalism, and finally, for making the theologian into an “organic intellectual.” A work by L. Boff (1982) crystallized Rome’s anxieties and led to his being disciplined. In it the author defended an ecclesiology* of a conciliarist character (conciliarism*) and called for a redefinition of papal supremacy (Sigmund 1990). Boff was reproached above all for offering a political reading of theology (as opposed to a theological reading of politics); for constantly opposing “charisma” and “power”; for seeing the present structure of the church as an obstacle to the proclamation of the gospel; and for applying Marxist categories to the relations between clergy* and laity, accusing the former of appropriating the means of spiritual production and depriving the latter of them. However, John Paul II did not discourage the Latin American bishops, who at Puebla (1979) reiterated and amplified the declarations they had made at Medellin. Then in 1988 the encyclical Sollicitudo Rei Socialis offered acceptance to themes originating in liberation theology: while defending the “right to economic initiative,” it also defended a “preference for the poor.”

Going beyond the use of Marxist theories, it may be noted that liberation theology is first of all astonishingly modern in its relativistic approach to the metaphysical, mythical, doctrinal, and mystical dimensions of Christian experience*, and often reveals the influence of liberal Protestantism* upon the Latin American intelligentsia. While liberation theology is frequently criticized for its collectivism and its utopian ideals, it is rarely remarked that it often still lacks a conception of religious and Christian acts which fully integrates their social meanings. The influence of Rahner means that the liberation theology is still somewhat tempted by the belief that the content of revelation* is external to history and indifferent to its concrete manifestations—and thus peculiarly insensitive to historical and dialectical processes that are held to be all powerful in a social order considered a priori as secular. An insufficiently perceptive approach to the links between sociohistorical exteriority and religious interiority explains why it took a long time for liberation theology to concern itself with ecclesiology and a specifically theological doctrine of social realities.

Nonetheless, it should be added that right from its first manifestos, usually misunderstood, liberation theology had the means to avoid the pitfalls into which critics saw it falling by the sheer force of theoretical gravity. So, for example, in the work of Gutierrez, to whom we will give the last word: “The growth of the kingdom is a process that is historically fulfilled in liberation, insofar as the latter signifies a better realization of mankind, which is the precondition of a new society. But it goes further than this: because it finds fulfillment in historical events that bring liberation, it exposes their limits and ambiguities, announces its full accomplishment and in effect impels it to total communion. We are not dealing with an identification. Without liberating historical events, there can be no growth of the Kingdom” (1971).

- J. Comblin (1970), Théologie de la révolution, Paris.
- G. Gutierrez (1971) Teologia de la Liberacion, Lima.
- J.L. Segundo (1973–74), Theology for Artisans of a New Humanity, 5 vols., New York.
- J. Comblin (1974), Théologie de la pratique révolutionnaire, Paris.

- J.P. Miranda (1974), Marx and the Bible, New York.
- J.L. Segundo (1976), The Liberation of Theology, New York.
- L. Boff (1978), Jesus Christ Liberator, New York; (1982), Church, Charism and Power, New York.
- E. Dussel (1985), A Philosophy of Liberation, New York.
- C. Boff (1987), Theology and Praxis: Epistemological Foundations, New York.
- ♦ D.E. Mutchler (1971), The Church As a Political Factor in Latin America, New York.
- G. Fessard (1973), La Théologie de la libération, Paris.
- H. Assmann (1976), Theology for a Nomad Church, New York.
- Internazionale Theologenkommission (1977), Theologie der Befreiung, Einsiedeln (contributions by K. Lehmann, H. Schürmann, O. González de Cardedal, and H.U. von Balthasar).
- G. Fessard (1978), Chrétiens marxistes et Théologie de la libération, Paris-Namur.
- P. Berryman (1984), The Religious Roots of Rebellion, London.
- J. Ratzinger (1984), Libertatis Nuntius (Instruction sur certains aspects de la Théologie de la libération).
- John Paul II (1988), Sollicitudo Rei Socialis, AAS 80, 513–86.
- P.E. Sigmund (1990), Liberation Theology at the Crossroads? Democracy or Revolution, Oxford.
- G. Collet, et al. (1994), “Befreiungstheologie,” LThK3 130–7.

JOHN MILBANK

See also Catholicism; Liberty; Market Economics, Morality of; Marx, Karl; Property

Liberty

A. Systematic Theology

The Christian concept of liberty was essentially developed through a confrontational relationship with Greco-Roman antiquity, in particular with the ancient concepts of necessity (anagke) and destiny (moira). Paul integrated liberty into the Christian message, as the perspective of salvation*.

1. Concepts

In linguistic terms, Greek initially had an adjective eleutheros, “free,” which referred to a man who did not depend on any master; eleutheria, “liberty” in the philosophical sense, was eventually derived from this. The Latin term libertas was understood in the same sense, and in Rome* there was certainly never any notion of guaranteeing individual civil rights. The words free, liberty, and liberate were linked above all to the polis (city*) as an urban entity, and to the status of citizen.

Starting with the philosophical usage of the term, we may distinguish a series of concepts of differing content. First, the Greek word ekon (related to “autonomous”), referred to individual liberty and signified that a man is not subject to, or bound by, any external power. Second, Socratic liberty consisted in “doing what is best” (Xenophon) and found its most fitting characterization in the principle of autarky (autarkeia), or self-sufficiency. Third, Aristotle understood man as a being capable of making choices, and therefore interpreted liberty as freedom of choice (proairesis), by contrast with the will (boulesis). Fourth, Augustine* distinguished voluntas, a fundamental faculty of human beings, from freedom of decision (liberum arbi- trium). Finally, since Kant*, liberty, as a transcendental reality, has been linked with the faculty of acting spontaneously, outside any external determination (causality as liberty, liberty as autonomy).

As for the Christian concept of liberty, it has a double meaning, with reference to “divine liberty” and “human liberty.” It is the task of every type of Christian theology* to determine exactly what relationship can bring these two meanings together.

2. Divine Liberty

a) The Bible. No detailed conception of liberty appears in the Bible. The Greek notion of eleutheria has no exact equivalent in the Old Testament, yet God’s liberating action* is attested throughout its text. Liberty never appears independently of such divine action, and is therefore always to be understood as liberation. Since the departure out of Egypt constitutes the symbolic act of birth for the people of Israel*, the Exodus provides the central reference for the biblical idea of liberty: “I am the Lord your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of slavery” (Ex 20:2). In Deuteronomy, God’s liberating action appears for the first time by contrast with juridical or profane uses of the word (Ex 21:8, 21:30), and within the theological category of redemption (pdh, meaning “to set free” or “to liberate”: Dt 7:8, 9:26, 13:6, 21:8, 24:18; Mi 6:4): “You shall remember that you were a slave in the land of Egypt, and the Lord your God redeemed you” (Dt 15:15). The decisive factor here is that Israel understands God’s intervention as an act of power for which there can be no corresponding human compensation. Finally, the witness of the prophets* connects the salvation of the people, associated with the desired end of the exile, with the definitive liberation of the last day (Is 35:10 and 51:11; Jer 31:11).

Liberty also appears as God’s liberating action in the New Testament. The coming of the kingdom*, in the life, death, and Resurrection* of Jesus*, may be interpreted entirely as a free decree and free gift from God. In Jesus Christ, God reveals the plan of universal salvation by which, through his unfathomable, free, and gracious will, he has destined human beings to enter into communion* with him (Eph 1:3–14). In this regard, the family of words eleutheros, eleutheroo, eleutheria are used in the New Testament to express no more than a part of the history* of God’s liberating action toward humanity. Thus, we see in Paul’s writings the development of an outline of a theology of liberty in which liberty appears as a gift from Christ* (Gal 5:1 and 2:4). Liberty is probably not a truly crucial concept in the Pauline corpus, yet it does have a conceptual function. Paul’s idea of liberty, which he understands as a salvific universal good*, attests to the gratuitous character of salvation, which frees humanity from all powers, including the power of death* (Rom 8:2, 8:19, 8:21). Liberty thus acquires an eschatological dimension.

b) Early Church to Contemporary Theology. In the course of their debate with Greek philosophy* on the subject of liberty, the theologians of the patristic period based their arguments exclusively on the biblical conception. It was first and foremost from a theological perspective that they developed the theme of liberty. Irenaeus* took a decisive step in Christian thought when he established that God alone is absolutely free, that he has “by himself, freely, and on his own initiative, made and ordained all things, and that his will alone is the substance from which he has drawn everything” (Adv. Haer. II, 30, 9; see IV, 20, 2). In the writings of the Greek theologians, divine liberty is rooted in the omnipotence of God the Creator, who integrates reconciliation and redemption in a unique plan of salvation.

Augustine, by contrast, thought of liberty as the bestowal and power of God’s grace*. This was followed in Western theology by speculations on God’s will that were to shape conceptions of liberty. Thus, to begin with, Thomas* Aquinas related God’s will to his intellect: God’s will is his essence, which has total liberty to act effectively (CG I, 72; I, 73). Next, nominalism* provided the pure outline of a theory of God’s unconditional liberty. Hence, in the writings of William of Ockham and others, while the determination of God’s will depends entirely on potentia absoluta, a divine power that is limited to ordaining purposes (potentia ordinata), its absolute lack of any limitation is an authentic theological and metaphysical mystery.

Luther*, in his debate with late medieval theology and humanism, rediscovered the biblical theme of liberation and placed God’s grace at the heart of his salvific action. The idea of liberty was thus entirely absorbed into the overriding theme of justification*. God alone has freedom of decision, which is exclusively “a divine name” (De servo arbitrio, WA 18, 636). This idea is expressed still more clearly by Calvin* (Inst. III, 19, 1).

Following on from German idealism, in particular as expounded by Hegel* and Schelling*, as well as from the philosophy of Kierkegaard*, it fell to Barth* to give God’s liberty a central place in recent Protestant theology. Barth defines “the being of the living and loving God” as “his being in liberty,” and thus repositions the question of liberty as an aspect of the definition of the divine essence; as a result, Barth is able to perceive the origin of God's liberty in his grace and love* (KD II/1, 340, 394). Eberhard Jüngel drew on Barth for his meditation on God's being in his coming into the world, from a Trinitarian perspective, and on the basis of his self-determination as love. Within Catholicism*, Karl Rahner* has discussed the subject of the essence of the transcendental God as an occasion in a "forgiving self-communication" of God that "must be understood as an act of supreme and personal liberty" (Grundkurs des Glaubens). Consequently, it has become possible to expound the classical doctrine of grace in the form of a doctrine of liberty. This approach has also been taken up within liberation* theology, which proposes a radical identification between God's action, in its history alongside humanity, and the abolition of the unjust structures that weigh down upon human communities.

3. Human Liberty

a) The Bible. Human liberty is not explicitly addressed in the Old Testament: humanity is subject to the power of God, who alone can deliver humanity from slavery and captivity. Emphasis is placed on the contrast between slave and free man, with the result that human liberty is hardly ever evoked except in the context of the freeing of slaves (Ex 21:2, 21:5; Lv 19:20, 25:10; Dt. 15:12 f.). It is also primarily in this juridical and social sense that liberty appears in the New Testament (1 Cor 7:21, 12:13; Gal 3:28, 4:22; Eph 6:8; Col 3:11).

Nevertheless, Paul is also capable of interpreting this contrast between slave and free man in a christological and eschatological sense, thus opening up a new and specifically Christian perspective that was to have a profound influence on the concept of liberty: "For he who was called in the Lord as a slave is a freedman of the Lord. Likewise he who was free when called is a slave of Christ" (1 Cor 7:22). Within the Christian community, those contrasts that prevail in the world* are abolished: the slave "called in the Lord enjoys the same rights as the free man. As an eschatological good, the gratuitous gift and bestowal of Jesus Christ (Gal, 5:1, 5:13, 2:4), liberty is universal. For the Christian called by Christ, liberty takes on a concrete form as liberty in relation to sin* and the power of death: "We know that our old self was crucified with him in order that the body of sin might be brought to nothing, so that we would no longer be enslaved to sin. For one who has died has been set free from sin" (Rom 6:6–7). It is, however, the work of Christ alone, and humanity plays no part in it at all: "having been set free from sin, you have become slaves of righteousness" (Rom 6:18). As a human being is freed from the power of sin, so liberty appears ultimately as liberation from the law* and from any piety based on works* (Rom 7:5 f.). This does not, of course, imply arbitrary judgment or licentiousness, for love is the law of liberty (Rom 13:18; Gal 5:14). Liberated by Christ, Christians receive the Spirit in faith* and thus become free human beings (Gal 3:14), because they accomplish God's will.

b) Early Church. Early Christian thinkers attempted to establish a fitting relationship between divine grace and human liberty by finding a balance between the tradition of Greek philosophy, biblical texts, and the proclamations of the church. Clement of Rome linked human behavior to God's commands, thus making a connection between liberty and the love due to God. According to Irenaeus, human beings can participate in the perfect liberty of God provided that they opt freely for God and for self-integration into the order that he has created (Adv. Haer. IV, 34, 2). Clement of Alexandria and Origen* emphasized the free decision (proairesis) of human beings, to the point of accentuating the antinomian nature of liberty. Eastern patristics reached its final summit in the thought of Maximus* the Confessor, who associated human liberty, conceived as self-determination, with divine grace in the work of divinization (theosis) of humanity. Human beings, whose will tends toward salvation, attempt in their liberty to develop the seed of goodness that they carry within themselves (Ambigua ad Iohannem 7; PG 91, 1081–84). Liberty is thus presented as a process of assimilation (homoiosis), a realization of God's image (eikon); and the principle of liberty has been inscribed within nature since the creation* (Amb. Io 42; PG 91, 1345). It is in their movement of love toward God that human beings are realized as human (Amb. Io 45; PG 91, 1353).

c) Late Antiquity and the Middle Ages. The question of the relationship between divine grace and human liberty was explicitly conceptualized for the first time in the dispute between Augustine and Pelagius (Pelagianism*). Augustine, drawing on his experience of an unmediated encounter with God, turned away from the Eastern vision, centered on the history of salvation, and put the emphasis on the primacy of the will (voluntas). For Augustine, the will is the fundamental faculty and active principle in the spiritual nature of humanity, and it exerts itself as free will in the act of deciding (De spiritu et littera V; De libero arbitrio I, 12, 26; II, 19, 51; III, 3, 7). Since, in the final instance, every will is turned toward God, liberty is fulfilled in decisions for or against what is demanded of the will. Consequently, evil* proceeds only from the free will of human beings, and to the extent that the will is consciously turned away from God (CD XII, 6). God gives the will its importance by inclining human beings to love him. Human liberty thus finds its fulfillment in the capacity given to the sinner to love God. Liberty is so fundamentally connected with divine grace that human beings appear to be incapable of winning this grace by themselves, and can do no more than receive it (Retractationes II, 1).

From Augustine onward, the theme of Christian liberty was always discussed in terms of an unbreakable dialectical relationship with grace. Within early Scholasticism*, Anselm* of Canterbury helped to elaborate a definition of liberty that went beyond Augustine's conception in a fundamental sense: for Anselm, the freedom of the will is defined on the basis of its end, designated by reason* and freely chosen by the will (De libertate arbitrii III). Finally, Thomas Aquinas investigated the metaphysical bases of liberty. Because the source of liberty is in God himself, human beings fulfill their liberty by attaching themselves to God; indeed, in each of their actions, liberty is implicitly related to God, and it thus takes on its material form in the concrete decisions of the will (ST Ia, q. 83). The voluntarism* that Aquinas thus laid the foundations for was developed later by John Duns* Scotus; William of Ockham reprised his approach without going beyond it.

d) Reformation. The problem of liberty cropped up in the dispute over what free will is capable of in itself, in the face of the salvation that comes from God. The humanists saw Luther's doctrine of justification as a mortal threat to human liberty. Erasmus* understood free will as "the effective action of the human will that permits human beings either to attach themselves to that which leads them to eternal salvation, or to turn themselves away from it" (Discourse of Free Will). Obscured by sin, yet not extinguished by it, the will is corrupted; but the grace that remits this sin makes the will free once again to open itself up to eternal life*, and sustains it constantly in its effort (ibid.). Luther, replying to Erasmus, declared that, on the contrary, he relied entirely on Christian revelation*. In the confrontation between God and human beings, it is absurd to speak of free will: "for if I can obtain grace through my own effort, what need is there for the grace of Christ?" (De servo arbitrio, WA 18, 777). It is certainly not the case that the human will does not exist; but it is so corrupted that it cannot do anything other than "those things that are contrary to the will of God" (WA 18, 709). Following Paul, Luther maintains accordingly that human beings are justified only by God's grace, independently of their works.

However, Luther occasionally speaks of human liberty in positive terms. In his view, it is the fruit of the liberation effected by Christ: it therefore arises from faith, and signifies that the Christian enjoys sovereign liberty and is subject to no other person. When faith is combined with charity, human beings discover the liberty of becoming slaves, bound by love to their neighbors: in this sense, Christians are servants zealously subject to all (Von der Freiheit eines Christenmenschen, WA 7, 21). Faith in justification gives Christian liberty the capacity of being exercising as spontaneity.

e) Modern Times. A purely human conception of liberty, intended to be affirmed and delineated in contrast to Christian liberty, has emerged in modern times. This fundamental will to liberty expresses the ethical demand of the era, defined in an exemplary fashion by Kant. The idea of human liberty thus finds appropriate expression in the concept of autonomy: liberty is the capacity to determine oneself as a being endowed with reason. Against the idealist interpretation that Fichte and Hegel developed later, Kant shows that human beings can represent liberty to themselves only as the untraceable origin of their unconditioned self-realization (Critique of Practical Reason I, §6). In this sense, the principle of autonomy serves to bring to light a logic of absolute obligation inherent in human liberty, which for Kant also constitutes the foundation of human dignity (Fundamentals of the Metaphysics of Morals).

Since contemporary human rights ethics* is organized on this foundation, Christian thought, if it is to be topical, can be asserted only through a fertile dialogue with the modern concept of liberty that has been developed on the basis of such rights. Christian liberty must be capable of being expounded as the promise* contained in God's grace, and that grace as the advent of a meaning that does not annul human liberty, but fulfills it. For Christianity, the dignity of the human person, and therefore the liberty of that person, are grounded in the grace that calls us to supernatural communion with God.

- H. de Lubac (1965), Le mystère du surnaturel, Paris (1st Ed., 1946, Surnaturel: Études historiques, Paris).
- E. Jüngel (1966), Gottes Sein ist im Werden, Tübingen (3rd Ed. 1976).
- J. Schwartländer (1968), Der Mensch ist Person: Kants Lehre vom Menschen, Stuttgart, etc.
- D. Nestle (1972), "Freiheit," RAC 8, 269–306.
- W. Warnach, O.H. Pesch, R. Spaemann (1972), "Freiheit," HWP 2, 1064–98.
- K. Rahner (1976), Grundkurs des Glaubens, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna.
- J.J. Stamm (1976), "Pdh, auflösen, befreien," THAT 2, 389–406.
- G. Ebeling (1979), Dogmatik des christlichen Glaubens, vol. III, Tübingen.
- H. Krings (1980), System und Freiheit, Freiburg-Munich.

- G. Greshake (1981), Geschenkte Freiheit, 2nd Ed., Freiburg-Basel-Vienna.
- G. Chantraine (1982), Érasme et Luther: Libre arbitre et serf-arbitre, Paris-Namur.
- W. Kasper (1982), Der Gott Jesu Christi, Mayence.
- H.-W. Bartsch, et al. (1983), "Freiheit," TRE 11, 497–549.
- W. Thönissen (1988), Das Geschenk der Freiheit, TTS 30.
- G. Bausenhardt (1992), "In allem uns gleich, außer der Sünde": Studien zum Beitrag Maximus' des Bekenner zur altkirchlichen Christologie, TSTP 5.

- K. Niederwimmer (1992), "Eleutheros," EWNT 1, 1052–58.
- T. Pröpper (1995), "Freiheit Gottes," LThK3 4, 108–13.
- F. Ricken, J. Eckert, T. Pröpper (1995), "Freiheit," LThK3 4, 95–105.

WOLFGANG THÖNISSEN

See also Anthropology; Grace; Justification; Sin, Original

B. Moral Theology

a) Christian Liberty. In the New Testament, it is chiefly through the Pauline epistles that the question of liberty is addressed (but note significant occurrences in James and John 8). The term appears in the synoptic Gospels hardly at all. Yet contemporary interpretations of Jesus*'s message that relate it especially to expectations of Israel*'s renewal (e.g., E. P. Sanders) warn us against putting too much weight on this terminological divergence. The Old Testament has its own vocabulary for speaking of Israel's liberation, for example, redemption or salvation (see 1 Macc 4:9–11). The kingdom* of God was a social transformation that must loosen the hold of the powers, political, demonic, moral or natural, that held Israel in bondage. Thus, the "sons of the kingdom" are free from taxation (Mt 17:26); a "daughter of Abraham" is "loosed" from her infirmity (Lk 13:12). Political liberty ("salvation from our enemies") was included in the "putting away of sins" for which Israel looked (Lk 1:71 ff.). This gave Christian understandings of liberty psychological as well as political elements. Here, it found a certain affinity with the Stoic paradox that "every good man is free" (Philo), which made liberty into a moral reality, although Christian thought never discounted its social aspect, something Stoics tended to do.

A perennial observation of political philosophy* distinguishes two sorts of liberty: "negative" or "formal" liberty, and "positive" or "material" liberty. The first is the slave's dream of overcoming constraint, the second is the condition for self-realization, the ideal of the aristocrat. The one lacks any goal other than the removal of restraint upon choice; the other requires no act of negation to bring the goal of self-realization within view. Both these ideas have a theological value: the first, because the imprisoned cannot free themselves entirely on their own (see Lk 4:18), so that it would be false, from a Christian point of view, to admit no need of deliverance, in the name of positive liberty alone (Jn 8:32–36); and the second, because liberty is not only an escape from constraints but an entrance into a new life (Gal 5:1), a life of liberty that has its own law* (Rom 8:2; Jas 1:25 and 2:12). A purely negative liberty would afford no stability, but would open the way to enslavement. A paradoxical dialectic thus aligns the liberty of the believer with a "slavery to righteousness" (Rom 6:18). The notion of freedom as untrammelled will (Aristotle, Pol. 1317 b: "to live as one likes") is rejected for something closer to the Roman republican ideal: "to be a slave of the laws...in order to be capable of being free" (legum servi...ut liberi esse possimus, Cicero, Pro Cluentio 146). That the service of Christ* is perfect liberty became a patristic commonplace (e.g., Ambrose* of Milan, De Spiritu sancto 44, 60). It could claim antecedents in Seneca (De Beneficiis, Ad Lucilium Epistulae Morales), as well as in Paul.

Life in liberty is a life available for others, even, paradoxically, "to serve" others (Gal 5:13). It is social, not solitary. Much of the polemic about liberty in Christian history has been concerned, therefore, with the "liberty of the church*" (libertas ecclesiae), the self-ordering of the Christian community in sole obedience to its Lord. In the modern period, theological ideas of liberty have clashed with contractarian ideas of a state of nature in which the individual could be considered as free from all social commitments. Rousseau's famous dictum in The Social Contract that "man is born free, but everywhere he is in chains" seems to be a direct echo of Ambrose's formula, ut qui nascimur in libertate moriamur in servitute ("in order to be born in liberty, we die in slavery," Ep. 7, 32), but the sense is opposite. For Ambrose, man was born into a state of liberty, but the Fall has deprived him of it. Yet within the social bonds of the Church, the individual is a free partner, the member of a brotherhood. The sign of individual liberty is baptism*, undertaken singly and voluntarily by each believer, the ambiguities surrounding infant baptism notwithstanding. Without the community, the believer could have no focus for this act of self-determination; without the believer's act, the community would not know itself as a community of liberty. In the Church, distinctions are abolished (Gal 3:28; Jas 2:1 ff.). The natural structures of social order remain in place, however, and this opens the way to the idea of a free obedience, of wife to husband, child to parent, and so on, which is rendered intelligible within the context of mutually serving love (Col 3:18 ff.; Eph 5:21–6:9; 1 Pt 2:12–3:7).

Obedience is key in monastic life (monasticism*), but it is not always free of danger. Losing its dialectical relation to liberty, obedience can be presented as abnegation of personal judgment, since one submits oneself to the judgment and authority of another (ambulantes alieno iudicio et imperio, Reg. Mag. SC 105–7 7; see Reg. Ben. SC 181–86 5). By contrast, the idea of liberty in the Holy* Spirit (2 Cor 3:17) contributed to the formulation of the idea of democracy* in Europe. The Pentecost experience (Acts 2:18), interpreted in the light of Joel's oracle that men and women slaves would prophesy (Jl 2:28 ff.), was one of liberty of utterance for every believer, not confined to any order of ministry. The New Testament term parrhesia (Acts and John especially) refers to the liberty of speech born of confidence, especially in the proclamation of the gospel.

b) Slavery. The early Christian attitude to slavery has often been a matter of controversy, not because the facts are in doubt but because the interpretation of them is complicated. Ever since the great debate over the abolition of slavery in the 18th and 19th centuries, there has been a distinct idea of slavery as an institution that could be present in, or absent from, any given society, and that could be challenged on its own terms, apart from other economic or social practices. Such an idea was lacking in early Christianity. The dependence and subjection in which a slave was placed were seen as comparable to other forms of dependence and subjection, such as that of women, children or subjects. All of them reflected what early Christians took to be the core reality of subjection, namely the moral and psychological impotence of sin. Their talk about slavery was more wide ranging than ours and more fluid, passing easily from one manifestation of dependence to another. Their vocabulary lacked a clear distinction between “servitude” and “service,” encouraging a tendency to paradox. Where moderns are tempted to accuse early Christians of evading the real point about slavery, they could be imagined to reply that moderns take formal economic and legal structures too much at their face value, thereby falling into an unhistorical abstractness that is sometimes not free of self-righteousness, given the forms of dependence that persist in the modern social world.

Presented with the propositions that are supposed to have defined ancient slavery, such as that the slave was a property of his master (Lex Aquila, 286 B.C.), or that friendship was impossible between slave and free, early Christians never hesitated to deny them categorically (e.g., Gregory* of Nyssa, In Eccl. Hom. 4 SC 416). In this, however, they merely associated themselves with positions taken by the Stoics on this subject (Stoicism*, Christian). The Stoic paradox that every good man is free, and every bad man a slave, was intended as more than a psychological truth* metaphorically expressed; it was meant to expose a social reality underlying legal appearances. Common humanity bound slave and free together in equality; to refuse to respect human nature was to fall victim to delusion (Philo, Seneca). Sociolegal slavery was an unreal fiction that had no purchase except on the mind enslaved to passion*. The legal sphere of bodily slavery lay beneath serious philosophical notice.

Christians attached themselves to this approach, adding distinctive arguments. Slave and master alike were servants of Christ, or “freedmen” of Christ. As such, their relation to each other was determined by a higher obligation that each owed independently. It had to be reconceived, therefore, in terms of free mutual service. While the formal roles remained the same, the content was changed. The slave who saw his master as a brother recognized him as one to whom he was bound in trust and love (1 Tm 6:2); the master conscious of his own slave status recognized in his slave one who had a right to his “justice and equity” (Col 4:1). Slavery to Christ excluded slavery to human beings; this conviction could support an ambition on the slave's part for emancipation, but it at least demonstrated that one could heed Christ's call to liberty in any condition of life (1 Cor 7: 20–23). The major difference between Stoic and Christian approaches was that liberty took a concrete form in the church, where social barriers were broken down. Within that context, Paul refused to acknowledge any legal obligation to return the fugitive slave Onesimus to his master, while claiming the authority to require Philemon to renounce the right of punishment that Roman law accorded him (Phlm 4–20).

The assertion that the church knew no distinction between slave and free was maintained in the patristic era (Lactance, D.I. 5, 16, SC 204 and 205; Ambrose, Ev. Luc. 9, 29, SC 45 and 52). The rite of manumission could be performed with legal effect before a bishop*, at least after Constantine's legislation of 321. Emancipation was praised as an act of mercy*. Yet the integral role of slaves in the agrarian economy made slaveowning inevitable, and in the fourth century churches as well as lay Christians owned slaves. Preachers urged humane treatment, including the protection of the sexual dignity of slaves and the integrity of their marriages*. Access to the monastic life was open to slaves without their masters' permission; the same principle, however, was not maintained in relation to ordination*. There was a deep reluctance to take any step that might result in someone's becoming a slave (Augustine, Ep. 24, BAUG 46 B); yet it was recognized that there were worse plights into which one suffering from economic calamity or war* might fall. The conception of slavery as being, like all other forms of subjection, a providential discipline of God (providence*) for punishing sin formed the basis for a later denial that slave status could be inherited (Wyclif, De dominio civili I, 32–34).

The disappearance of slavery in Europe (effective in most regions by the end of the 12th century) has sometimes been credited to the influence of Christian criticism (e.g., Leo XIII). While Christian attitudes were a significant factor, an essential precondition was the evolution of alternative economic patterns. The reappearance of slavery in the colonial context was based on Roman law*, which permitted the enslavement of captives in war, reinforced in some humanist circles by Aristotle's doctrine of "natural slavery" (race*), which theologians denied.

- J. Maritain (1933), Du régime temporel et de la liberté, in J. and R. Maritain, OC 5, Paris-Fribourg, 1982.
- C. Verlinden (1955), L'esclavage dans l'Europe médiévale, Bruges.
- I. Berlin (1969), Four Essays on Liberty, Oxford.
- H. Gültzow (1969), Christentum und Sklaverei in den ersten drei Jahrhunderten, Bonn.
- J. Ellul (1973), Éthique de la liberté, Geneva.
- C. Taylor (1979), "What's Wrong with Negative Liberty," in A. Ryan (Ed.), Idea of Freedom: Essays in Honour of Isaiah Berlin, Oxford, 175–93.
- R. Minnerath (1982), Le droit de l'Église à la liberté: Du Sylabus à Vatican II, Paris.
- U. Faust (1983), Christo Servire Libertas Est: Zum Freiheitsbegriff des Ambrosius von Mailand, Salzburg-Munich-Pustet.
- J. Raz (1986), The Morality of Freedom, Oxford.
- R. Klein (1988), Die Sklaverei in der Sicht der Bischöfe Ambrosius und Augustinus, Stuttgart.
- H. Chadwick (1994), "Humanität," RAC 16, 663–711.

OLIVER O'DONOVAN

See also Democracy; Religious Freedom; Society

Lie. See Veracity

Life, Eternal

Belief in eternal life is a key element of the Christian faith*. In the Church*'s oldest documents, the Apostles' Creed ("I believe in...the resurrection of the body, and the life everlasting") and the Creed of Nicaea-Constantinople ("I await the resurrection* of the dead and the life to come"); indeed the expression "eternal life" seems to be associated with "Credo" and "amen," and appears as an epithet for God* himself. Indeed, knowledge* of God and sharing in eternal life nourish one another. From the standpoint of the eschatological realities (purgatory*, hell*, heaven), eternal life corresponds to heaven (or "paradise"). On a biblical as well as a theological level, statements of faith concerning the beatific* vision, the resurrection of the dead and the kingdom* of God demand a consideration of eternal life. This calls into play both the collective and individual dimensions of eschatology*.

1. Biblical Sources of the Theme of Eternal Life

a) Old Testament. In the Old Testament, God is the Living Being above all others and the source of life (Psalms 36, 10). If he withdraws his breath, creatures return to dust (Ps 104:29). Eternal life is thus an exclusive property of God (Dt 32:40; Dn 12:7). While not in direct opposition to time*, eternity* ('olam)—which, incidentally, is very rarely attributed to God—denotes a life that encompasses all time, from the furthest past to the most distant future. In the Garden of Eden man could have tasted immortality (the “tree of life” in Gn 2:9), but as a result of his disobedience he was subjected to death*, just like every other earthly creature. The idea of an eternal life following the sleep of death in Sheol* does not appear until late in the Old Testament. For that we have to wait until the “apocalypse” of Isaiah (Is 26:19) and especially Daniel: “Many of those who sleep in the dust will wake, some for eternal life, others for opprobrium, for eternal horror” (Dn 12:2).

b) New Testament. Even though the concept of eternal life may already denote a form of earthly life, the New Testament unquestionably proclaims it as a promise* for the hereafter. In other words, it interprets the mystery* of Christ*, who in his death and Resurrection* abolished the law of sin* and death, as a promise made to all humanity.

- 1) As for what lies beyond death, Jesus’ clearest statements before he “returned to his Father*” are to be found in John’s Gospel: “There where I am, you will be also.” (Jn 14:3); “Eternal Life, it is for they who know you, you the only true God, and he whom you have sent, Jesus Christ” (Jn 17:3). According to Paul, faith* in Christ implies faith in an eternal life: we should be the most wretched of people if we put our faith in Christ only for the duration of this life (1 Cor 1:9). “For now we see through a glass, darkly, but then face to face” (1 Cor 13:12).
- 2) However, in many New Testament passages, eternal life is not only the object of a hope* for the hereafter, but is already anticipated for all those who have a share in God’s reign. In the Gospels especially, the terms “eternal life” and “God’s reign” are practically interchangeable. One enters the kingdom of God as one enters eternal life (see Mk 9:43 ff.; Mt 5:20, 19:29, 25:34). John establishes close connections between eternal life and the Word* of life received in faith (3:15, 3:36), the Eucharist* (6:54), and brotherly love*: “We know that we have passed death in life, since we love our brothers” (1 Jn 3:14).

- 3) The New Testament concept of eternal life belongs essentially to a doctrine of salvation*. Because humanity is under the yoke of sin, there is no continuity between earthly life and eternal life. Paul interprets the existence of a human being saved by grace* and glorified (Rom 5:8, 5:21, 6:22) as a new creation*. By faith, the believer already shares in the life of the risen Christ, even if it is not yet clear what he really is. By way of baptism*, the believer’s life is a death and a burial with Christ (Rom 6:3f; Gal 2:20; 2 Cor 6:9), as well as a complete participation in the life of the risen Christ: “I live but it is no longer me, it is Christ who lives in me” (Gal 2:20). This new life, which is a promise of eternity, remains nonetheless “Hidden in God with Christ” (Col 3:4).
- 4) Finally, the New Testament uses a variety of images to illustrate the hope of a joyful eternity. The image of heaven itself is the first, and as in the Old Testament denotes “the abode of God.” The concrete images of the meal and the wedding feast (Lk 22:29 f.) deserve particular emphasis. In the New Testament the basic elements of human existence, bread (John 6), water (John 3) and wine (John 2), take on an anticipatory symbolic value. Eternal life is described in the Apocalypse as a celestial liturgy* in which the elect will take part in the eternal wedding of the Lamb* (19:6) in a new heaven and a new earth (19:6 ff.).

2. Historical Landmarks

Belief in eternal life has been unceasingly taught by the Fathers* and the church’s dogmatic* tradition. And, since the latter cannot proclaim eternal life without using whatever cosmological images are current at the time, the progression which led “from the closed world to an infinite universe” (A. Koyré) is also reflected in the history of theological doctrines.

The Fathers and the doctors of the Middle Ages, who in their theory of final destinies employed a cosmology hardly different from that of the Bible*, acknowledged (as an inadequate creed and with constant reference to Augustine*’s formula Ipse Deus post hanc vitam sit locus noster, “It is God who will be our place after this life”) the existence of “places” surrounding the world. Eternal life was thus associated with a “place,” heaven, located above the sky, by contrast with hell, which was situated beneath the earth, and purgatory, which was considered as an intermediary. When man, who is composed of a soul* and a body whose union was the work of the Holy* Spirit, died, his soul was supposed to separate from his body. While the latter decayed in the earth, waiting to be brought back to life by the soul on the last day, the soul appeared before God. If the soul had believed and acted according to the principle of charity during this life, it entered heaven immediately to enjoy eternal beatitude*, which was the Love that repaid love. If it had not believed in this sharing to come, and had gone astray, it was cast into hell, there to undergo eternal punishment. At the end of time, when Christ returned and the world came to an end, the general resurrection would ensue and souls finally reunited with their own bodies would be able to love God without hesitation or anxiety, just as they were loved by him.

Having discovered the infinite nature of the universe and the difficulties that follow from it, the modern period has ceased to assign a location to the hereafter, even symbolically, since it can no longer recognize the existence of “places” beyond the world. Because of its biblical origin the vocabulary of places continues to be used, but the images of a “heaven” beyond the firmament and a “hell” have tended to disappear in favor of states or modes of being. So recent theologies* of the “history of salvation” (particularly in the work of Protestant thinkers such as O. Cullmann) define the hereafter in chronological terms. Three successive stages are distinguished, corresponding to earthly life, the sleep of death, and the resurrection:

- 1) From birth to death, the eternal life promised in Christ’s Resurrection has already begun, but has not yet triumphed over death.
- 2) After death a second period begins: the believer has escaped the mortal state but is not yet alive with the definitive life of the kingdom; since immortality is not a property of human nature, the just await Christ’s return, living with him in a kind of sleep (like the just of the Old Testament in Sheol or the “bosom of Abraham”).
- 3) The third period corresponds, finally, to the coming of God’s kingdom, where God will be “all in all.” It coincides with the resurrection of the dead for an eternal life of blessed communion* with God.

Contemporary theology also has an existential current, which in eschatological terms tends to remove the hereafter from a cosmological and temporal framework. So, while the differences are respected, this world and the hereafter, the present and the future, must be considered as simultaneous. For R. Bultmann* eternal life is not linked to a place or a time to come, but is rather a quality of Christian existence. The person who lives by faith in Christ has already died and risen. (“You are resurrected with Christ himself and by him,” Col 2:12). And without denying an eternal life after death, a writer such as Tillich* considers it an inexpressible reality: the immortality of the soul, the resurrection of the body, and the bold image of the “spiritual body” constitute a set of symbols that can evoke it, but nothing more.

3. Theological Consideration

a) Concept of Eternal Life. Whereas the Platonist tradition conceives access to eternity as a natural return to immortality beyond death, Christian thought sees eternal life as a free gift, a sharing of divine life. Thus it is not a return to a former life, but a new creation, a life totally renewed and received from God. It responds to spiritual death on a more profound level than freeing people from biological death; and between man’s earthly life and his eternal life there exists the same distance as exists between the animal (psychic) body and the spiritual body of which Paul speaks (1 Cor 15:42 ff.). This is an imperfect comparison, however, inasmuch as the concept of human life denotes, as a single whole, both the carnal and the spiritual dimensions of existence. So, insofar as man defines himself in terms of spirit and liberty*, eternal life expresses the fulfillment of the moments of eternity that man already experiences in his earthly life; but insofar as he is spirit present in flesh, it conveys the fact that this fulfillment is inconceivable unless it is the whole man, body and soul, who receives an eschatological vocation from God.

b) Time and Eternity. Eternal life denotes something more than an endless duration, something that could be conceived entirely outside the context of salvation. On the contrary, the concept of eternal life is meaningful only in relation to the mystery of sanctity* and blessed life which is the very mystery of God—the mystery, that is, of a “living” God. Scripture, moreover, envisages the possibility of an “eternal death” (Jn 5:29) that is the opposite, not of earthly life, but of eternal life. And while it is a free gift offered to those whom Christ’s death and Resurrection have justified, eternal life is not a reward that comes as it were from the outside, without respect to the spiritual destiny of the faithful. These axioms, then, make it impossible to define eternity in terms of the absence of time. On the contrary, the eternity promised to humanity “occurs in time as its proper fruit, come to maturity” (Rahner*). While immortality merely denotes the emancipation of temporality and the endless continuation of a spiritual existence, eternity is a part of the history of human destiny and brings it to perfection. It is the visitation of earthly time (chronos) by “vertical” time (kairos—that is, the irruption of God’s grace*) that enables the former to give birth to eternity (aiôn). In order to suggest that eternal life is not alien to our temporal destiny, Scripture and theological tradition frequently employ symbols of unending joy. The beatific vision*, for example, evokes the kind of rapture we experience when confronted with beauty*; and the metaphor of the wedding anticipates the bliss that humanity will enjoy in communion with the exchanges of the three divine Persons* in a Trinity* whose life is itself supremely joyful.

c) Eternal Life and Historical Responsibility. A remarkable feature of the modern period is the nominal Christian, who confesses the God of Jesus Christ without believing in the promise of a hereafter beyond death. This attitude is in part a reaction to a certain type of Christianity, historically dated, that linked the expectation of another world to a devaluing of life in this world (the “valley of tears”) and to the refusal of historical responsibility. Thus Christian salvation, reduced to a matter of the individual sinner’s reconciliation with God, was understood first and foremost as a remedy for the mortal finitude intrinsic to the human condition. Faced with this confusion between the condition of a sinner and that of a created being, however, Christian eschatology objects that the created state, far from being an evil to be overcome by obtaining eternal life, is on the contrary a promise of eternal life. Eternal life does not impose meaning on this present life from without. Far from being experienced as a means of escape, the hope of eternal life gives the history of human liberty, and the ethical choices that determine an eternal destiny, their whole value.

d) Communion with God and Personal Identity. By eternal life we mean the culmination of a communion with God that is begun in this life by participation in the risen Christ. “Your life is hidden with Christ in God. When Christ, your life, appears, then you will also appear with him in full glory” (Col 3:3 f.). And while it is a communion with God, eternal life cannot be properly conceived without an awareness also of the promise of a new communion between human beings in the image of the life of the Trinity, this latter being understood as a perfect communion of divine Persons as completely united as they are wholly distinct. The “heaven” of popular devotion and the “eternal life” of theology both refer to the perfect fulfillment of the Church in coincidence with the kingdom of God. As the concept of the resurrection of the dead expresses (better than others), the personal identity of each individual will be preserved for all eternity. Nonetheless, the relationship of communion between the elect, freed from the limits inherent in the spatiotemporal condition and the obstacles entailed by the sinner’s withdrawal into himself, will attain the greatest possible transparency. Glorified alongside the Father, the blessed will take part in the celestial liturgy of the sacrificed Lamb*; and the faithful who pursue their earthly pilgrimage are already a party to their intercession (the communion of saints). In the same way that the communion between the elect does not do away with their personalities and therefore the relationships of otherness between them, of I and Thou, so the sight of God does not bring about the dissolution of the glorified subject like a drop of water in the ocean of divinity. The elect merely participate in God’s eternity and in his knowledge of himself. They remain creatures “before God” in adoration and praise. The divinization of man coincides with the culmination of his personal destiny. There is certainly a knowledge of God “face to face” (1 Cor 13:12), but God does not cease to live in an “inaccessible light” (1 Tm 6:16). And it is precisely because the eternal life of the blessed is nothing more than a sharing in the eternity of God himself that it is not absurd to maintain, as does the Latin tradition, that there are levels of beatitude measured by the degree of charity shown in this life; and that there is a progression in the discovery of God’s unfathomable mystery—a living eternity that therefore cannot turn into an eternal boredom.

e) Disparity between Eternal Life and Eternal Death. Eternal life is intimately connected to Christ’s victory over sin and death—it is a promise of eternal bliss. It is not easy to see, therefore, what an eternity of woe might involve. However, some scriptural texts do envisage a kind of resurrection, or, more accurately, survival of woe (see Mt 25:31–46; Jn 5:29). The Book of Revelation, moreover, introduces the idea of a “second death” (2:11; 20:14), which in contrast to the first and temporal death is an eternal death, and thus the opposite of eternal beatitude. It is clear that the resurrection of the dead coincides with a judgment* that may lead to eternal damnation (Mt 25:46). This possibility has to be upheld, since without it, the free decisions made by human beings would lose their infinite seriousness. At the same time, however, care must be taken not to put the assertions of eternal life and eternal death on an equal footing. Certainly, the church’s official theology has always refused to incorporate apocatastasis* into its official doctrines and foresees the possibility of eternal woe for some. It is advisable, therefore, to maintain the discretion that the subject of the “last things” demands, while preserving an asymmetrical approach. In other words, because of the victory of God’s merciful grace manifested in Jesus Christ, the church proclaims ceaselessly that all the just who have died in Christ will obtain eternal life; but, as far as the eternal perdition of a specific number of sinners is concerned, the church does not consider itself qualified to make an equivalent pronouncement.

- R. Bultmann, G. von Rad, G. Bertram (1935), “zōê, zōê, bios,” ThWNT 2, 833–74.
- F. Mußner (1952), ZOE, Anschaung von “Leben” in vierten Evangelium, Munich.
- O. Cullmann (1956), Immortalité de l’âme ou résurrection des corps? Neuchâtel.
- P. Althaus (1958), “Ewiges Leben,” RGG3 2, 806–9.
- K. Rahner (1960), “Theologische Prinzipien der Hermeneutik eschatologischer Aussagen,” Schr. zur Th. 4, 401–28, Einsiedeln-Zürich-Köln (Theological Writings 9, 1968, 141–70).
- P. Tillich (1963), Systematic Theology 3, Chicago, 406–23.
- P.H. Menoud (1966), Le Sort des trépassés, Neuchâtel.
- C. Bruaire (1968), Philosophie du corps, Paris, 231–68.
- D.Z. Phillips (1970), Death and Immortality, London.

- G. Martelet (1975), L’Au-delà retrouvé, Paris (New Ed. 1995).
- J. Ratzinger (1977), Eschatologie: Tod und ewiges Leben, Regensburg, (6th Ed. 1990).
- H. Thielicke (1978), Der Evangelische Glaube, III: Theologie des Geistes, Tübingen, §32.
- C. Ebeling (1979), Dogmatik des christlichen Glaubens, III, Tübingen, §38–39.
- H. Küng (1982), Ewiges Leben? Munich.
- H. U. von Balthasar (1983), Theodramatik, IV: Das Endspiel, esp. 389–446.
- R. Marlé (1985), “Peut-on encore parler de la vie éternelle?” Études, 245–56.
- A. Gounelle, F. Vouga (1990), Après la mort qu’y a-t-il? Le discours chrétien sur l’au-delà, Paris.
- J. Hick (1990), Death and Eternal Life, London.
- C. Chalier (1993), Pensées de l’éternité: Spinoza, Rosenzweig, Paris.
- A. Gesché (1995), La Destinée, Paris.
- A. Gounelle (1995), “Mort et vie éternelle,” Encyclopédie du protestantisme, Paris, 1045–56.

CLAUDE GEFFRE

See also Beatitude; Death; Eschatology; Eternity of God; Kingdom of God; Resurrection of the Dead; Vision, Beatific

Life, Spiritual

I. Definitions

The term spiritual life is relatively modern. Earlier ages seem to have used both words in a much more restrictive sense than in modern usage. Life, in the sense of “way of life” (Greek bios or politeia), could hardly be characterized so generally as to apply to all Christians, although the expression “way of life belonging to Christians” (ho bios ho Khristianon) is found (Clement, Paedagogus 1, 13). There was, however, a wealth of terminology used to characterize the pursuit of monasticism: “single [literally: monadic] life,” “godlike life,” “angelic life,” “philosophical life.” The term spiritual, if used at all, tended to refer to the clergy. In its modern use, the expression spiritual life shares many of the determinants of the expression spiritual theology*: a vagueness as to dogma* and the sacraments*, combined with a sense that what is important about religious profession is the manner of life. Such appeals to “spirituality” suggest disillusionment with the traditional categories of theology, and a yearning for some deeper meaning to life, characterized by the “spiritual.” It is legitimate to explore what resources Christian reflection can offer for such a quest, without yielding to its exclusions.

As with spiritual theology, spiritual life may be analyzed from two distinct points of departure, depending on the way in which one understands spiritual. This term can refer to the Holy* Spirit, or to the spiritual element (pneuma) in human beings. The latter point of departure leads down a path much trodden in the world in which Christianity first developed, for it is based on philosophical analysis of the person*. Since the text of the Bible* read by Christian circles (as by earlier Hellenistic Jewish circles) was that of the Septuagint (ancient translations* of the Bible), they regularly used pneuma to refer to spirit, instead of the more normal Greek nous. However, the equivalence remained: the spiritual life, the life proper to the pneuma (bios pneumatikos), was therefore the life that is proper to the nous, the contemplative life.

II. Scriptural Foundations

Both the word pneuma and the Hebrew word rouach that it translates have the original meaning of “breath” or “wind,” and have the meaning of the life that God* breathed into the first human beings (Adam*). The spiritual is the life that is a gift of God: this life is not just a series of natural processes (although there is no suggestion that it does not include these), but something given by God, which will return to him after death* (Eccl 12:7). Spirit is something powerful, in contrast to the frailty of flesh: it is this contrast between the powerful and the frail that is implied in the well-known contrast between spirit and flesh, not the contrast between the immaterial and the material (Is 31:3).

The spiritual life in this sense is a life lived in dependence on God: a life exemplified by the prophets*, and also by the “poor,” for whom in their poverty the only source of strength is God (see the use of the term poor in the Psalms*, esp. Ps 71 [72], 81 [82], 108 [109], and 131 [132]). The “poor in spirit” whom the Lord blesses are those who have no source of strength save God (Mt 5:3).

I. New Testament

This notion of spiritual life, a life lived in communion* with God, is developed in the New Testament as the life that grows out of faith* in Jesus Christ.

a) The Kingdom of God. In the synoptic Gospels, this life is spoken of in terms of the kingdom* of God, the coming or imminent presence of which Jesus* proclaims. Life in the kingdom is life in accordance with God’s will, a life in which barriers among human beings, and between human beings and God, will have been broken. Several sayings of Jesus, and also his response to the repentant thief (Lk 23:42), suggest that the kingdom (and life within it) become reality as a result of the Crucifixion, in which these barriers are finally broken down (something symbolically suggested in the rending of the Temple* veil: see Mt 27:51 and par.). It is perhaps for this reason that in the main theological traditions of the New Testament, the notion of the kingdom of God is displaced by the notion of the life that Jesus has released: “eternal life” in the Johannine tradition, “life in Christ” in the Pauline tradition.

b) Eternal Life. For John, eternal life is a present reality in this world, in communion with Jesus; but it is a present reality that transcends death, because of the power of Jesus’ Resurrection*. To enter into eternal life it is necessary to be “born again” (Jn 3:3), to be born of “water and the Spirit” (Jn 3:5), an evident reference to baptism*. Possession of eternal life is dependent on a eucharistic eating of the body and blood of Christ (Jn 6:56): “Whoever feeds on my flesh and drinks my blood abides in me, and I in him. As the living Father sent me, and I live because of the Father, so whoever feeds on me, he also will live because of me. This is the bread that came down from heaven. . . . Whoever feeds on this bread will live forever.” Eternal life, for John, is synonymous with knowledge* of God: “And this is eternal life, that they know you the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom you have sent” (Jn 17:3)—eternal life is thus mostly contemplative.

c) Life in Christ. Paul’s understanding of life in Christ is the same, but he expresses it in different language. Entry into life in Christ still takes place through baptism, but, whereas John sees baptism in terms of rebirth, Paul sees it primarily in terms of sharing in Christ’s death and Resurrection (Rom 6:3 f.): “Do you not know that all of us who have been baptized into Christ Jesus were baptized into his death? We were buried therefore with him by baptism into death, in order that, just as Christ was raised from the dead by the glory of the Father, we too might walk in newness of life.” This imagery of death and resurrection does not apply simply to our initiation into this life, but to our continuing in it: Paul speaks of “carrying in the body the death of Jesus, so that the life of Jesus may also be manifested in our bodies” (2 Cor 4:10). Participation in the Eucharist* is a means of sharing in this life (1 Cor 10:16 f.): “The cup of blessing that we bless, is it not a participation in the blood of Christ? The bread that we break, is it not a participation in the body of Christ? Because there is one bread, we who are many are one body, for we all partake of the one bread.” Paul brings out how life in Christ is essentially life in the Church*, and that participation in the Eucharist constitutes belonging to the Church, which is the body of Christ. This sacramental life in the Church is also characterized in terms of the Spirit: within the Church, the Spirit dispenses his gifts, which are different for each member, but to all are forms of love (agape). However, the Spirit is still more intimately involved in the living of this new life in Christ. It is the Spirit who realizes our status as adopted sons and daughters of the Father, brothers and sisters of the Son. It is through the Spirit that we can make our own Jesus’ way of addressing God as “Abba” (an intimate, though not familiar, form of address); it is the Spirit that overcomes our frailty and enables us to enter into a communion with God that transcends anything human (Rom 8:26 f.): “Likewise the Spirit helps us in our weakness. For we do not know what to pray for as we ought, but the Spirit himself intercedes for us with groanings too deep for words. And he who searches hearts knows what is the mind of the Spirit, because the Spirit intercedes for the saints according to the will of God.” This Trinitarian (and cosmic: see Rom 8:19–23) understanding of life in Christ as a life of prayer* through the Spirit is a powerful illustration of the way in which reflection on the spiritual life can issue in dogmatic clarification.

d) Fruits of the Spirit. One feature of the spiritual life as depicted in the New Testament is that it is not simply seen in terms of the perfection of human life. The Christian lives a life that is not his own. As Paul puts it, “I have been crucified with Christ. It is no longer I who live, but Christ who lives in me” (Gal 2:20). The virtues* of the Christian life are therefore not something that we can develop by ourselves, but something that blossoms within us. So Paul speaks, not of virtues, but of the “fruits of the Spirit”: “love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, gentleness, self-control” (Gal 5:22 f.). Similarly, love, in which is summed up the essence of the Christian life according to the command of Christ (Mt 22:37 and par.), is presented by Paul as the greatest of the gifts of the Spirit (1 Cor 13).

2. Imitation of Christ

Imitation* of Christ, as modeling one’s life on the features of Jesus’ earthly life, is not such a prominent feature in the New Testament and the early church as would later become. Imitation of Christ is an ideal, but more as following Christ, or imitating what was involved in the Incarnation* of the Son of God. When Jesus speaks of giving his disciples an example (Jn 13:15), it is that they should “wash one another’s feet”: that they should love one another (Jn 13:35). When Paul speaks of the example of Christ that Christians are to imitate, it is the example of Christ in his becoming human and accepting the human lot—“though he was rich, yet for your sake he became poor, so that you by his poverty might become rich” (2 Cor 8:9)—or his humility in becoming man (Phil 2:5–11). The example of Christ to which Peter* appeals is that of innocent suffering in his passion* (1 Pt 2:21–25).

In all these cases, instead of a model against which one measures oneself, Christ is presented as an example, in the following of whom one shares in his grace*: “in order that you by his poverty might become rich”; “work out your own salvation with fear and trembling, for it is God who works in you” (Phil 2:12, immediately following the hymn to Christ’s kenosis); “by his wounds you have been healed” (1 Pt 2:24). In following Christ, one is tracing the movement of God’s coming down to the level of the human in order to raise the human to the level of the divine: Christ as an example is not that of an exemplary man, but of God living a human life. All these ideas are merged in the prayer of Ignatius of Antioch, when he begs the Christians of Rome to let him, in his coming martyrdom*, be an “imitator of the passion in my God” (Rom. 6:3).

III. Martyrdom

This plea by Ignatius holds together two themes that have been powerful in shaping the Christian understanding of the spiritual life: martyrdom and deification. Although persecution was by no means systematic imperial policy during the first centuries of Christianity, it was a perennial threat, and most early Christian communities experienced persecution at some stage. Martyrdom thus became the ideal of Christian living: not that all Christians expected to become martyrs (and they were discouraged from courting martyrdom), but that all Christians were expected to live such a life that, if they were faced with the choice between apostasy or death, they would choose martyrdom. The martyr became the archetypal saint, that is, one who fulfilled what was potentially the vocation of every Christian, who in baptism had been called to be holy.

The accounts of martyrdom (the acta martyrum) became the earliest form of hagiography. A strong apocalyptic sense pervades them: the Christian martyr (like the Jewish martyr before him) is seen as fighting on the front line in the war between good* and evil*. The persecuting power of the Roman state is only the tool of cosmic powers of darkness, which are the real enemies of the martyrs. The martyrs are soldiers of Christ, on active service, and all Christians are seen as being in training for this struggle. The language of warfare and athletic contest is used to describe the Christian condition (see, notably, Eph 6:10–17; 2 Tm 4:7 f.; Heb 12:1 f.; 1 Clement 5, 1; Ignatius, Polycarp 1, 3 and 3, 1). Already in the second century, there developed alongside the challenge of actual (“simple”) martyrdom, the ideal of spiritual (or “gnostic”) martyrdom (see Clement of Alexandria, Strom. IV), which is manifest in “the perfect work of love” (ibid., IV, 4, 14, 3).

When, with the Peace of the Church, martyrdom ceased to be a threat, the ideal of martyrdom was fulfilled by the growing popularity of monasticism*. The monk stepped into the martyr’s shoes: monasticism became a seedbed for holiness* and preserved the sense of living in the last days, on the brink of the final struggle between the forces of good and evil. Monasticism thus came to replace martyrdom as the ideal of the spiritual life.

IV. Monasticism

1. Monasticism As the Archetypal Form of Spiritual Life

Within monasticism, there developed a rich understanding of the spiritual life. The idea of struggle with evil powers, with demons*, was inherited from the concept of martyrdom, and is a prominent feature of the early monks, the “Desert Fathers.” A great deal of reflection was devoted to understanding the nature of demonic warfare. Alongside this, however, there developed an understanding of the spiritual life as the development of the spiritual in the human, which drew on the resources provided by classical philosophy. The notion of the eight temptations—in its later Western form, the seven deadly sins* (asceticism*)—is part of this development. Although monasticism might seem a specialized and minority form of Christian life, from the fourth century onward it was held up as the exemplary form of Christian life, working out in a strikingly clear form ideals that applied to all Christians, whether monastic or not. According to John Chrysostom*, those who live in the world*, although they have wives, must live the same life as that of monks (Hom. 7 on Hebrews). The contemporary Orthodox Church still holds that there is no essential difference between the requirements of the monastic life and those of life in the world.

2. Stages of the Spiritual Life

Within monastic circles, there developed an understanding of the spiritual life as the fulfillment of the new life implanted in baptism, although monastic conversion—the turning from the world to join the monastic community—was seen as the practical starting point. It was a life with a beginning, a middle, and an end, and notions of development, or of stages, were readily applied to it.

a) Spiritual Growth. The analogy of human growth was widely used, with a progression to eventual spiritual maturity, although the idea of growing out of spiritual infancy was not readily entertained. Closely associated with the notion of growth was the theme of the spiritual senses (spiritual theology), their discovery, reawakening, and use. The idea of progression in the spiritual life as a journey was also common. This journey was often seen as making one’s way back to paradise, or as an ascent: these two themes were often associated, since paradise was often thought of as a mountain. The spiritual life was also seen as a passage from earth to heaven (the monastic life was regularly called the “angelic life”), by a ladder, as dreamed of by Jacob (Gen 28:12) and alluded to by the Lord (Jn 1:51).

b) Pilgrimage. The one who embarked on this journey was a pilgrim, peregrinus, an alien who was no longer at home where he was sojourning. The radical dispossession that lies at the heart of the monastic life was readily evoked by the imagery of the pilgrim, who travels light and has no time for nonessentials. Sometimes the spiritual journey became a literal journey, as with the Celtic monks whose detachment from the world took the form of tireless traveling. Already by the sixth century, the heyday of the Celtic peregrinatio, others saw such wandering as a form of self-indulgence, and a way of escaping any discipline: Saint Benedict thought them the worst kind of monks and called them “gyrovagues.”

c) Spiritual Ladders. Ladders became popular as images for the spiritual life in monastic circles. The longest chapter in the Rule of Saint Benedict (chap. 7) discusses the “ladder of humility.” Unusually, the discussion concerns the construction of the ladder, and not just its ascent: the sides are our body and soul*, and the rungs the degrees of humility. These 12 rungs give a good idea of the essential qualities of the monastic life, as Benedict saw it. They are: fear of God, lack of self-will, subjection to the superior, patience with the difficulties and contradictions involved in obedience, confession of sins and thoughts to the abbot, being content with the meanest and worst of everything, sincere inward humility, strict adherence to the Rule, silence, abrogation of laughter, brief speech when necessary, and external humility in one’s behavior. There is no progression, as such, in this list: they are all ways of establishing and preserving humility and obedience, the essential virtues of the monk. Having made this ladder, the monk will be able to ascend it and come to that “perfect love of God that casts out fear.” Six centuries later, Bernard* of Clairvaux expounded Benedict’s ladder in his treatise De Gradibus Humilitatis et Superbiae (On Degrees of Humility and Pride), making it much more a ladder that traces an ascent, from humility through love to contemplation*, and complementing it with a ladder of pride that leads from curiosity by various stages to contempt of God. In the East, the most influential monastic “ladder,” The Ladder of Divine Ascent, which is read in Orthodox monasteries each year in the course of Lent, is that attributed to John of Sinai (seventh century), of whom we know nothing save his having written this work, for which he is usually named John Climacus, or John of the Ladder. This is very much more elaborate than Benedict’s ladder, with 30 rungs to his 12, and is clearly arranged in a progression, leading from the break with the world (renunciation, detachment, exile), through the fundamental virtues needed for the monastic life (obedience, penance*, remembrance of death, sorrow), to a detailed analysis of ascetic struggle, with all its temptations, a struggle that bears fruit in the virtues of simplicity, humility, and discernment. Having reached this stage, the monk is able to engage in contemplation, and to progress from stillness (hesukhia) through prayer and dispassion (apatheia) to love.

d) The Three Ways. Rather simpler than the ladder is the division of the spiritual life according to the three ways. In the later Western terminology, these are the three ways of purgation, illumination, and union. Although similar ideas can be traced back at least as far as Origen*, they first clearly emerged as a triad in the writings of Dionysius* the Pseudo-Areopagite (early sixth century). For Dionysius, this triad of purification, illumination, and union (or sometimes perfection) is valuable in expounding the operation of the sacraments and the ministers of the sacraments. This remained the case in the Orthodox tradition, as can be seen from The Life in Christ by Nicolas Cabasilas (14th century). God, through the sacraments, overcomes the effects of the Fall by purifying and illuminating those human beings who respond to his call, and leading them to union. The sacraments are central to this process, as is the sacramental community, which itself imitates a process typified in the celestial hierarchy of angelic beings. In the Western tradition, the triad was interiorized and individualized: it is a threefold path leading from a state of sin and alienation from God to a state of union with him. The purgative way is concerned with the overcoming of vice and the fostering of virtue. It takes place in response to God's call, but consists of practices that are within human control. It is a matter of acquiring self-control and openness to God. The prayer characteristic of this way is vocal prayer, and meditation on Scripture and the truths* of the faith. On the illuminative way, there is growing experience of the grace of God. The soul is now settled in virtuous habits, and meditation yields to stillness as the mind is opened to the illuminating effect of divine grace (this stage is sometimes called "prayer of quietude"). This leads ultimately, for some at least (spiritual theology, III 2 b), to the way of union, where the soul comes to contemplation, that is, a simple openness to God in which the soul is filled by grace and united with God (prayer*, V 2 b). Unlike in Pseudo-Dionysius's use of the triad, where these three phases, even though they are progressive, allow for overlap, the Western "three ways" impose a more rigid progression. Instead of a continuous synergy between the soul and God, as in the Eastern conception, there is a movement from apparently purely human activity to purely divine activity that is theologically unsatisfactory. Despite these limitations, the definition of the three ways trodden by beginners (the purgative way), proficients (the illuminative way), and the perfect (the way of union), attained almost canonical authority in the West from the High Middle Ages until the 20th century.

e) Spiritual Direction. According to Father de Caussade (1675–1751), "God still speaks today as he spoke in earlier times to our fathers, when there were no directors and no methods" (L'abandon à la providence divine 25). Although Caussade envisaged a golden age when God revealed himself directly, without any need for spiritual* direction, the institution of spiritual fatherhood is in fact very ancient. Paul himself speaks of being a father to those whom he has brought to the faith (1 Cor 4:15). Spiritual fatherhood is perhaps first clearly glimpsed in the Christian tradition in the gnostikoi of Clement of Alexandria (see Quis dives salvetur; Which Rich Man Shall be Saved 31–34): it lies behind his characterization of Christians as nepioi ("little children") throughout his Paedagogos, and the qualities of a gnostikos are the subject of Stromata VII. However, the institution of spiritual fatherhood coincides with the growth of monasticism in the fourth century. The Desert Fathers were the pioneers of monasticism, but they also fulfilled an important role in relation to the society* that they had rejected, as sources of spiritual wisdom* and guidance. Many of the stories about them concern people who come to ask them for personal guidance: "Speak a word to me." Within the monasteries themselves, especially in the East, one of the basic relationships into which the monk entered was that which he had with his spiritual father or geron (elder). A monk would regularly visit his geron, not simply for confession but for the revealing of his thoughts, and strict obedience to his geron was required. The geron was a senior monk (or nun), and not necessarily a priest*. This institution continued and even underwent periods of revival, notably in 19th-century Russia, (where the geron was called a staretz), and in Byzantine and Slav monasticism. A similar role, although much more closely related to the sacrament of penance, was found in the West.

There are two fundamental documents about the nature of spiritual fatherhood: the letter called "The Shepherd" by John Climacus (often printed as chap. 31 of his Ladder); and the first Letter of Symeon the New Theologian (949–1022). From these closely related works there emerges a rounded picture of the geron, who is held to fulfill in relation to his spiritual children the role of physician, counselor, intercessor, mediator—which entails, especially for Symeon, personal experience of the grace of the Spirit—and sponsor, that is, one who assumes responsibility for, and bears the burdens of, his spiritual children (see Gal 6:2).

V. A Way of Affirmation?

The dominance of monasticism in reflection on the spiritual life has given the traditional account of this life in Christianity a markedly ascetic turn. It is a way of detachment, of dispossession: in short, a way of negation. There have, however, occasionally been attempts to construe the spiritual life affirmatively, to see it in terms of attachment and the enjoyment of created things. An example of this can be seen in the priest and poet Thomas Traherne (c. 1636–74), especially in his prose meditations Centuries of Meditation (first published in 1908). For Traherne, attachment and the fulfillment of desire are positive principles in which we reveal our likeness to God (Centuries I, 44 f.): “You must want like a God, that you may be satisfied like God. Were you not made in his image? He is most like God that is sensible of every thing. Did you not from all eternity want some one to give you a being? Did you not want one to give you a glorious being? Did you not from all eternity want someone to give you infinite treasures?” It is significant that such a way of affirmation develops its own ascesis, since selfishness deprives us of enjoyment. Such a way of affirmation, explicitly called such in contrast to the way of negation, is sketched out in the works of the Anglican lay theologian Charles Williams (1886–1945), who was probably influenced by Traherne, and is also explored by T. S. Eliot (1888–1965) in Four Quartets, especially “East Coker” and “Little Gidding.”

- F. X. Funk, K. Bihlmeyer, W. Schneemelcher (Ed.), Die apostolischen Väter, 3rd Ed., Tübingen, 1970. Apophthegmata Patrum, PG 65, 71–440 [Les sentences des Pères du Désert, Solesmes, 1981].

- La Règle de saint Benoît*, SC 181–6.
- Bernard de Clairvaux, De gradibus humilitatis et superbiae, in Sancti Bernardi Opera 3, 13–59, Rome, 1963.
- J.-P. de Caussade, L'abandon à la providence divine, Paris, 1966.
- N. Cabasilas, La vie en Christ, SC 355, 361.
- Clement of Alexandria GCS 12, 89–340 (Le pédagogue, SC 70, 108, 158).
- Dionysius the Areopagite, Corpus dionysiacum, 2 vols., PTS 33, 36.
- John Chrysostom, In epistulam ad Hebraeos homiliae, PG 63, 9–236.
- John Climacus, Le livre du Berger, PG 88, 1165–1210; Scala Paradisi, PG 88, 628–1164 (L'Échelle sainte, Bégrolles-en-Mauges, 1978).
- T. S. Eliot, Four Quartets, London, 1944.
- Origen, Exhortatio ad martyrium, Origenes Werke 1, 3–47, GCS 2.
- Simeon the New Theologian, Letter 1, in K. Holl, Enthusiasmus und Bußgewalt beim griechischen Mönchtum. Eine Studie zu Symeon dem neuen Theologen, 110–27, Leipzig, 1898.
- T. Traherne, Centuries, Poems and Thankgivings, 2 vols., Oxford, 1958.
- C. Williams, The Image of the City, Oxford, 1958.
- ♦ D. Bonhoeffer (1937), Nachfolge, Munich (DBW 4, 1994).
- I. Hausherr, Direction spirituelle en Orient autrefois, OCA 144 (English trans. with a preface by K. Ware, repr. of StPatr XVIII/2, 299–316).
- M. Lot-Borodine (1958), Un maître de la spiritualité byzantine au XIVe s.: Nicolas Cabasilas, Paris.
- H. von Campenhausen (1960), “Die asketische Heimatlosigkeit im altkirchlichen und frühmittelalterlichen Mönchtum,” in Tradition und Leben. Kräfte der Kirchengeschichte, Tübingen, 290–317.
- E. J. Tinsley (1960), The Imitation of God in Christ, London.
- M. Lot-Borodine (1970), La déification de l'homme, Paris.
- Sophronius (Archimandrite) (1984), Voir Dieu tel qu'Il est, Geneva.
- Sophronius (Archimandrite) (1988), La félicité de connaître la voie, Geneva.
- J.-Y. Lacoste (1994), Expérience et Absolu, Paris.

ANDREW LOUTH

See also Asceticism; Contemplation; Mysticism; Prayer; Spiritual Theology

Liguori, Alphonsus. See Alphonsus Liguori

Limbo

The classical Latin word limbus, meaning “border,” has come to mean both the Old Testament Sheol* from which Christ delivered the just from the Old Covenant* and that part of hell* inhabited by children who have died unbaptized (baptism*).

a) Limbo of the Fathers. There is theological consensus about the eschatological destiny of the just who have died before the Resurrection* of Christ. “Paradise” and “hell” are christological realities that could not exist before the salvation* of the world has been realized. The eschatology* of Israel* was valid until Easter: the dead survived in Sheol; or again, they rested and were “carried by the angels to Abraham’s bosom” (Lk 16:22). But since the salvation bestowed by Christ also applies to those who did not know him, the icon of Easter Saturday represents the Son of God* breaking down the gates of Sheol to open the kingdom* of God to the just of the Old Testament, to whom a verse from 1 Peter 3:19 says that he went to preach (ekèruxen). The “limbo of the Fathers” was therefore deeschatologized. It is now nothing more than a superseded reality. Bonaventure* specified that the limbo of the Fathers really was an infernal place, but that it was a hell in which, paradoxically, hope* lived (Commentary on the Sentences, IV, Dist. 45, Art.1, Q. 1).

b) Limbo of Children. Gregory* of Nyssa devoted a treatise to children who had died prematurely, Ephraim placed little children in his paradise, but it was not until the advent of Augustine’s theology* of original sin* that the fate of children who had died unbaptized became a topic of urgent theological concern. In the terms chosen by Augustine*, the question had only one possible answer: children who had died without baptism were damned. In 418 the anti-Pelagian Council of Carthage formally ratified this theory. “If anyone says that the Lord said ‘in my Father’s house are many rooms,’ (Jn 14:2) in order to make us understand that in the kingdom of heaven there will be an intermediary place—wherever it is situated—where will live as blessed the children who have left this life unbaptized, without which sacrament one cannot enter the kingdom of heaven, that is, life eternal, let him be anathema. For, since the Lord said ‘unless one is reborn of water and the Spirit he cannot enter the kingdom of God’ (Jn 3:5), what Catholic will doubt that whoever has not deserved to be the co-heir of Christ belongs to the Devil?” (DS 224).

Once this thesis was accepted, it became necessary to decide on the infernal punishments reserved for these children. They could have chosen an extremist position, which consisted of dooming these children to the “tortures of the fires of hell” as did the Pseudo-Augustine in De Fide ad Petrum (PL 40, 774). A middle position was also available, and—along with Augustine himself—that position prevailed. It entailed reserving for those children the gentlest punishment* possible: “The punishment of those who have added no sin to the one they contracted originally will indeed be the gentlest of all” (PL 40, 275). The chief movement in medieval Latin theology would thus endeavor to diminish the infernal tortures incurred by children who had died unbaptized. The accepted solution came from Peter Lombard’s Sentences (II Sent., Dist. 33, C. 2): the punishment they had to undergo was that of damnus, an everlasting banishment from the beatific vision*, and they did not undergo the punishment of the senses—that is, the physical tortures endured by the damned in their resurrected bodies.

In 1201 Pope Innocent II stated what became the accepted opinion. “The punishment undergone as a result of original sin is the deprivation of the vision of God. The punishment undergone as a consequence of actual sinning is the torture of everlasting Gehenna” (DS 780). Henceforth, since a new word, limbo, existed, the concept of an intermediary place, which had been condemned by the Council of Carthage, could in fact be traced. Thus, regarding the children in limbo, Bonaventure confirmed that “in some ways they hold the middle ground between the blessed and those who suffer eternal damnation” (Commentary on the Sentences, II, Dist. 33, Art. 3, Q.1). It would be only a step to conceive, as did Thomas* Aquinas, the notion of a limbo that was in fact a place of natural beatitude* (Quaestiones Disputatae de malo 5). That notion would be taken up again by Duns* Scotus (Commentary on the Sentences II, Dist. 33).

Faced with these theological elaborations, the magisterium*’s formal statements showed less zeal to know and to describe. The Council of Florence would define the disparity among the torments of Hell (DS 1306). In opposition to the Jansenist Council of Pistoia, Pope Pius VI emphasized that the existence of limbo was not a “Pelagian fable” (DS 2626—the only formal document in which limbo is mentioned by its name). By the end of the Middle Ages, the question of the fate of the children who had died without baptism had ceased to center on the certainty of their damnation, and theology as a whole endeavored thenceforth to envisage the conditions for their salvation.

Durand de Saint-Pourcain (c. 1275–1334), J. Gerson (1363–1429), and then Cajetan (1469–1534) developed a theory destined to influence all future discussions: the intercession of the parents would in fact amount to a “desire for the sacrament*” (votum sacramen). Karl Rahner* would specify that the “Church’s desire” (votum Ecclesiae) is allied with the “parents’ desire” (Schriften zur Theologie 2:7–94). H. Schell would propose an interesting hypothesis: the death of unbaptized children would be the equivalent of a quasi-sacrament insofar as, like Christ, they do penance* for sinners (Kath. Dogmatik III:2, Paderborn, 1893, 478). One point at least seemed to have been gained: even if it was still possible in 1972 for Jacques Maritain to propose an imperturbable readoption of the theory of Thomas Aquinas, today the limbo of the children hardly exists anymore outside the domain of historians of Latin theology.

• a) Limbo of the Fathers

- I. Lans (1583), De limbo patrum, Köln.
 L. A. Muratori (1755), De Paradiso, Venice.
 T. M. Mamochi (1766), De animabus iustorum in sinu Abrahae ante Christi mortem, Rome.
 C. Gschwindt (1911), Die Niederfahrt in die Unterwelt, Münster.

- J. Kroll (1922), Beiträge zum Descensus ad inferos, Königsberg.
 J. Kroll (1932), Gott und Hölle: Der Mythos vom Descensus Kampfe, Leipzig.
 G. Philips (1932–33), “La descente du Christ aux enfers,” REcL 24, 144–5; “L’œuvre du Christ aux enfers,” ibid., 272–86.
 I. Chaîne (1934), “Descente aux enfers,” DBS 2, 391–435.
 A. Grillmeier (1975), “Der Gottessohn im Totenreich,” Mit ihm und in ihm: Christologische Forschungen und Perspektiven, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna, 76–174.

b) Limbo of Children

- V. Bolgeni (1787), Stato dei bambini morti senza Battesimo, Macerata.
 J. Didiot (1896), Morts sans baptême, Lille.
 D. Stockum (1923), Das Los der ohne die Taufe sterbenden Kinder, Freiburg.
 I. Lelièvre (1948), “Sort des enfants morts sans baptême,” La pensée catholique 2, 43–50.
 A. Michel (1948), “Salut des enfants morts sans baptême,” L’ami du clergé 58, 33–43.
 A. Michel (1951), “Encore le sort des enfants morts sans baptême,” L’ami du clergé 61, 97–101; (1954), Enfants morts sans baptême, Paris.
 P. Gumpel (1954), “Unbaptized Infants: May They Be Saved?” DR 72, 342–58.
 W. A. van Roo (1954), “Infants Dying Without Baptism: A Survey of Recent Literature and Determination of the State of the Question,” Gr 35, 406–73.
 P. J. Hill (1961), The Existence of a Children’s Limbo according to Post-Tridentine Theologians, Shelby, Ohio.
 V. Wilkin (1961), From Limbo to Heaven, New York.
 G. J. Dyer (1964), Limbo, Unsettled Question, New York.
 J. Maritain (1992), “Idées eschatologiques,” in Approches sans entraves, 2nd Ed., OC 13, Paris-Fribourg, 455–64.

GALAHAD THREEPWOOD

See also Descent into Hell; Life, Eternal; Salvation; Vision, Beatific

Literary Genres in Scripture

Before belonging to the biblical field and to the history of exegesis*, the concept of literary genre derives from the field of universal literature and more precisely suggests the idea of comparative literature. By its very nature, any literary genre—any “category of literary or artistic work defined by a group of rules and common characteristics” (Larousse, 1987)—runs through literatures separated in time and space and is thus recognizable wherever it may be found. In this sense it derives from the principle of classification, with its requirements for signposts and relative stability in its conception. In its theoretical development, the notion of literary genre and its system of categorization or classification have their roots in Plato (Republic III) and Aristotle (Poetics). Closer to our time, in Goethe (Notes and Remarks for the East-West Divan), that is, in our cultural sphere, the universalism of the notion has been relativized. But whatever the theories, the definition of genres also belongs to spontaneous common practice: for example, in sorting the mail or reading the daily newspaper, where in one case we spontaneously recognize and distinguish a bill, a death announcement, and a love letter, and in the other, an editorial, a weather report, and a news item. Sometimes confused with literary form, literary genre has, however, been fairly clearly distinguished from form in the history* of the last two centuries and particularly in the history of biblical exegesis.

Marked by the school of the history of forms (Formgeschichtliche Schule) that emerged in Germany in the early 20th century, whose indebtedness to Hermann Gunkel (1862–1932) must be mentioned, the concept of form is more dynamic than that of genre (Gattung). It is used to “designate the literary aspect of a particular Gospel element, but also, and even especially, the various transformations undergone by the materials that were transmitted in the early church* between the death* of Jesus* and the composition of the first written Gospel*—in this sense the term is almost synonymous with formation (“Formes, méthode de la critique des,” Encyclopedia Universalis, Thesaurus, 1996, col. 1316). Two exegetes were influential in this development: Martin Dibelius, with Die Formgeschichte des Evangeliums (Tübingen, 1919), and Rudolf Bultmann*, with Die Geschichte des synoptischen Tradition (Göttingen, 1921).

There is, however, an organic link between the two concepts, even if it is sometimes difficult to specify, because the sense of each term varies depending on the literary critic or the biblical exegete.

In some ways, critical biblical exegesis, beginning in the second half of the 18th century and pursued most vigorously in the course of the 19th, considerably overloaded the concept of literary genre because of the truth* that was at stake, particularly the historical truth implicated in the reading of the Bible. The reliance on distinctions, and hence on the diversity and multiplicity of literary genres, is closely dependent on questions that the reading of the Bible raised for modern rational and critical consciousness. This explains the suspicion that such a reliance incurred on the part of ecclesiastical, and particularly Catholic, authorities* in the late 19th and early 20th centuries, until it was accepted and even recommended by Pius XII in his encyclical Divino Afflante Spiritu (1943).

In the biblical framework we can distinguish three possibilities for the determination of literary genres: by explicit designation in the biblical text, by implicit definition, and by the more or less extrinsic contribution of an exegesis, properly speaking, of the text. Explicitly designated are, for example, the parable*, when Jesus is said to “speak in parables” (Lk 6:39, 8:4–10); the song (Is 5:1) and the oracle in the prophets* (Am 3:10, 3:13); the psalms* (various as they are) in the collection that bears that name; the proverbs in the book of Proverbs, and so on. Implicitly defined are genres that arise from the context, such as the parable that the prophet Nathan recounts to King David whose unjust conduct he denounces (2 Sm 12:1–15); the prophecy when it is placed in the mouth of a person designated as a prophet or occasionally performing that function (Caiaphas in Jn 11:47–52); wisdom* in the books that fit into this genre. But in all these cases, subclassifications are often necessary.

It is more difficult to establish a literary genre by means of critical exegesis, an operation that can follow two methods or techniques: that of the “recognition” of a genre on the basis of other cultures in which that genre has been identified and recognized, and that of a genre peculiar to the biblical corpus, which is therefore established on the basis of the text. In both cases, even if rigorous analysis and precision are the rule, things are always relative, subject to verification or revision. It is easy enough, particularly because of the historical improbabilities and narrative exaggeration, to recognize, for example, the characteristics of the tale in the books of Jonah and Judith, following the laws of the genre in any literature, as long as we specify that it is an edifying genre appropriate to the biblical context. On the other hand, it is more difficult to speak of myth* or mythic narrative* with reference to the first four chapters of Genesis, for example, or to the gospel accounts of the infancy of Christ* (Matthew 1–2 and Luke 1–2), even if it is possible to recognize in them mythic elements characteristic of the ancient Near East. At this point the culture of the exegete enters into play. He has seen the concept of myth vary over the course of almost two centuries between the Hellenistic legacy, conceptions of ethnography, and the history of religions, psychoanalysis, and biblical studies themselves. This determination is also complicated by the fact that, in the Old Testament corpus (from Genesis to 2 Kings) and in the Gospels, literary genres designated as such are applied to elements of books taken from a historically synthesized whole that, in principle, abrogates all distinctions.

This is why literary genre cannot be reduced to the static condition of a classification, however universal and generally understood it may be. The study of the Bible, and not only the history of its exegesis, requires a constant refinement of concepts insofar as, in both Old and New Testaments, any literary element reveals a particular situation, a precise need, and a specific function. Hence, if any designation of a literary genre by the exegesis of the text always implies the possibility of a revision, it at least makes possible the discovery of the complexity of a text that is itself the product of a rich history.

- H. Gunkel (1910), Genesis, XI-LXXXIX, 2nd Ed., Göttingen.
- A. Robert (1957), "Littéraires (Genres)," DBS 5, 405–21.
- O. Eissfeldt (1966), Einleitung in das Alte Testament, 3rd Ed., Tübingen.
- H. Bausinger (1968), Formen der "Volkspoesie," Berlin.
- C. Koch (1974), Was ist Formgeschichte? Methoden der Bibelexegese, 3rd Ed., Neukirchen.

- P. Gibert (1979), Une théorie de la légende: Gunkel et les légendes de la Bible, Paris.
- E. Kushner (Ed.) (1984), Renouveau dans la théorie de l'histoire littéraire, Ottawa.
- H. Dyserinck, M. S. Fischer (1985), Internationale Bibliographie zur Geschichte und Theorie der Komparatistik, Stuttgart.
- Y. Chevrel (1995), La littérature comparée, 3rd Ed., Paris.

PIERRE GIBERT

See also Bible; Book; Bultmann, Rudolf; Exegesis; Hermeneutics; History; Holy Scripture; Myth; Narrative; Parable; Truth

Literature

There are two main reasons for considering "theology* and literature." On the one hand, the sources of theology belong to the history of literature, and theology itself belongs to the history of written language. On the other hand, literary creation can have theological relevance. This second reason has two aspects: first, a work of literature may have genuinely theological ambitions; and second, theology may attempt to interpret its concerns in the mirror of literary works.

a) The Bible As Literature. The Word* that Christianity claims to represent is set out in writings made up of many literary* genres: narrative claiming historical truth, saga, poem, proverb, and so on. Among these writings, some have literary value (Psalms, Song of Songs, etc.), some are written in awkward language (a large part of the New Testament matches this description) but possess a highly developed literary structure. Postbiblical Christian writings also fall into several categories: the language is often mediocre, but Augustine* is one of the greatest prose writers in Latin. The liturgy*, on the other hand, very early on produced numerous works, and Christian hymnography (like its Jewish counterpart, for that matter) includes some fine literary compositions. Old translations* of the Bible* are often of mediocre literary quality (e.g., the Greek of the Septuagint and the Latin of the Vetus latina), but the exercise has also produced great works: the German Bible of Luther*, the King James Version in English, the French Psalms of Clément Marot, and, more recently, the English Psalms of P. Levi. Among the most fruitful studies that the biblical corpus has recently stimulated, the contributions of literary historians and theorists occupy a privileged place (e.g., Frye 1982).

b) Spiritual Literature. Spiritual, or mystical, literature abounds in fine writings in prose (The Cloud of Unknowing, the works of François de Sales) and verse (Jacopone de Todi, Hadewijch of Anverd, John of the Cross, the French translation of John of the Cross by Cyprien de la Nativité). We may add that major Christian thinkers (Montaigne, Pascal*) are also major writers, and that theology written in modern languages since the 16th century has included first-rate prose stylists (Newman*, the Calvin* of the Institutes). We should mention the apologetics of G. K. Chesterton and the theological writings of C. S. Lewis, two masters of the English language. Moreover, some theologians have chosen to use literary fiction (e.g., the novels of Newman, Callista and Loss and Gain, and the Fragments of Tegel by Bonhoeffer*). The literary history of religious feeling and religious thought is a very rich history, showing a large Christian contribution to the literatures of the world. Bremond's great virtue was to have demonstrated this fact persuasively.

c) Literature and Theological Intentions. Alongside works with an edifying purpose and great literary value, such as the sermons of Bossuet or the religious discourses of Kierkegaard*, there is a great deal of fiction that conveys theological themes. The purest example may be found in the fiction of C. S. Lewis or of his friend J. R. R. Tolkien. On occasion, the literary form of the fairy tale or the science fiction story is used either to rewrite biblical events or to “sub-create” (Tolkien 1947) worlds with a history rich in spiritual teachings. In some cases, a work is theological in an anonymous or pseudonymous way (see Lacoste 1990): in Lewis (Chronicles of Narnia), the Christ figure is a lion named Aslan; in Tolkien, elves and goblins embody the traditional figures, angels*, demons*, and others, of Christian narratives (see Lacoste FZPhTh 36 [1989]). In addition to these extreme examples, the literary appropriation (or the expression in literature) of Christian themes and episodes is very widespread: Racine’s biblical tragedies, literary versions of the martyrdom of the Carmelites of Compiègne (in works by both von Le Fort and Bernanos), theatrical hagiography in Corneille’s Polyeucte, embellishment of a biblical episode in Victor Hugo’s “Booz endormi,” Milton’s eschatological epic; a substantial part of Western literature was written with reference to the Bible and to the history of the church*, and there is at least one major literary work that occupies an important place in theology: The Divine Comedy of Dante*. We might add that some works were written with this context in mind, although they had no Christian theological purpose: e.g. “Moïse” by Vigny or Port-Royal by Montherlant. Other works reflect a philosophy of religion*: for example, Lessing’s Nathan the Wise. Some works refer to the Bible while violently challenging Christianity (e.g., Kazantzakis).

d) Literature, Images of Experience, and Creation of Languages. Other literary works lend themselves to a theological reading because of the realities that they mirror, as well as because of the manner in which they perform that function. Whether exploring the logic of spiritual experience with Christian novelists (Dostoyevsky, Bernanos, Pater, Graham Greene, Flannery O’Connor), the logic of a wholly atheist world with novelists unconcerned with Christianity (Stendhal, Flaubert), or the logic of evil* in Thomas Mann’s Doctor Faust, the novel is often the best key to a theological hermeneutics of modernity. Poetry, which may take on the appearance of a confession of faith* (e.g., in Claudel and Péguy), or the expression of theological positions (e.g., the mixture of Scotism and nominalism found in Hopkins), is important in any event, because as Heidegger* says, it “makes being more present,” presents reality better than reality shows itself to us outside the mediation of language: eucharistic meanings in Hölderlin and Trakl, the feeling of praise* in Pessoa, prayer* in Rilke, repentance in Apollinaire, or a sense of the cosmos in Hugo, are all reflected in poetry. It can also, as with Celan, express human distress in the face of horror, and attempt to do what Adorno said was unthinkable, to write poetry after Auschwitz (see Dupuy 1994). Everything can be made into poetry. Any poem, in a sense, can provoke a theological or philosophical commentary. And every poem can provide new words with which to speak of God.

e) “Literary Theology.” Theology’s interest in literature is recent but extensive. It has several sources and several aspects. 1) The existence of secular universities, in which biblical and Christian works are subjected to the same protocols of reading as any other work, has made it necessary to investigate the specifically literary character of the biblical sources of Christianity: the multiplicity of literary genres in the sources of Christianity has provoked, among others, structural readings and narratological analyses (e.g., Frye 1982). In the same context of secularization*, there have also been explorations of the strictly “religious” ways of reading a work (Griffiths 1999). 2) The influence of Henri Bremond (1865–1933) made possible a revision of the history of French literature, in which spiritual works receive the literary attention they deserve, and it has also made it possible to build bridges between literary and religious experience; to Bremond we may add Charles Du Bos (1882–1939), an exemplary reader of Claudel, Bérulle, Pater, and the English poets, as well as a commentator on Bremond’s Prière et Poésie. 3) The influence of H.U. von Balthasar cannot be overestimated and has led to the recognition that the best modern theologians were often men of letters. It was often through the mediation of Balthasar, both his books and his translations, that Hopkins, Bernanos, Péguy, and others were admitted into the club of theologians. 4) The question of language has been subjected to profound reexamination in recent philosophy* and theology, and this has led to a reevaluation of the image, metaphor, narrative—of everything that cannot be reduced to expression in strictly propositional terms. The recognition that all religious language is metaphorical (see J.M. Soskice, Metaphor and Religious Language, Oxford, 1985) has led to a better understanding of the language of parables*, of biblical symbolism, and of the narrative formulation of theological ideas (narrative* theology). We might also note the defense and illustration of liturgical language by K. Pickstock (After Writing, Oxford, 1998), an original response to the critique of “phonocentrism” by Jacques Derrida. 5) The liturgical reform that came out of Vatican* II has given rise to literary and theological endeavors: the composition of new prefaces and the translation of biblical passages for liturgical use, among other things, have led to collaborations between men of letters and theologians: the poet Patrice de la Tour du Pin, for example, was involved in the French translation of Paul VI's missal. 6) At the same time, the interest taken by men of letters in theology has given rise to fruitful undertakings: the poetry of P. Levi (1931–2000), for example, attempts to speak of Christmas and Good Friday, and the poetry of C. Campo (1923–77) is saturated with Christian themes. More generally, the persistence of a poetry interested in the “religious” (Rilke, T. S. Eliot, Kathleen Raine, among others) has helped to make poetry a sui generis “theological locus.” 7) Finally, by developing the concept of the “world of a text,” the hermeneutics of Paul Ricoeur has given us the means to link reading and existence, text and world, in a manner that has as much resonance in theology as in philosophy. Biblical* theology now has more resources than ever before to draw attention to the “habitability” of biblical texts. A new discipline is in the process of development under the combined impetus of all these factors, “literary theology,” which seeks “to demonstrate the possible opportunity for a renewal of the language of faith, not by using writers but by listening to them” (J.-P. Jossua).

- H. Bremond (1916–36), Histoire littéraire du sentiment religieux en France, 12 vols., Paris.
- J. R. R. Tolkien (1947), “On Fairy-Stories,” in Essays presented to Charles Williams, Oxford, 38–89.
- H. U. von Balthasar (1962), Herrlichkeit II/1 and II/2, Einsiedeln.
- N. Frye (1982), The Great Code: Bible and Literature, London.
- J.-P. Jossua (1985), Pour une histoire religieuse de l'expérience littéraire, vol. 1, Paris (vol. 2, 1990; vol. 3, 1994; vol. 4, 1998).
- J.-Y. Lacoste (1990), “Théologie anonyme et christologie pseudonyme: C. S. Lewis, Les Chroniques de Narnia,” NRTh 112, 381–93.
- R. Faber, et al. (1991), “Literatur und Theologie,” NHThG 3, 240–78.
- P. Gerlitz, et al. (1991), “Literatur und Religion,” TRE 21, 233–306 (bibl.).
- B. Dupuy (1994) “Selon le mot d’Adorno—L’invocation par Paul Celan de la poésie de Mandelstam,” Istina 39, 242–67.
- O. González de Cardedal (1996), Cuatro poetas desde la otra ladera, Madrid.
- K. J. Kuschel (1997), Im Spiegel der Dichter: Mensch, Gott und Jesus in der Literatur, Düsseldorf.
- P. J. Griffiths (1999), Religious Reading: The Place of Reading in the Practice of Religion, Oxford.

JEAN-YVES LACOSTE

Liturgical Cycle. See Liturgical Year

Liturgical Year

This notion appeared in the 18th century, a period in which the West clearly distinguished secular time* from the time of religious practice. In this perspective the liturgical year designates the particular manner in which numerous Christian churches* live the time of the year and organize over its course the unfolding of their celebrations. It expresses theologically the specific style according to which Christians are aware of living within the time of salvation* unfolded by God*.

a) Liturgical Year until the Fourth Century. The New Testament clearly shows that, as early as the time of the apostles*, the church celebrated every Sunday*. Had it begun at this time to celebrate other days in addition to Sunday? Or did Christians first give up all the festivals customary among the Jews, and then after the apostolic age establish a Christian festival of Easter by strongly emphasizing the paschal character of the Sunday closest to the Jewish Passover? For lack of clear indications in the New Testament, past historians tended to incline toward the former hypothesis. Today, however, it is the latter that seems most probable, although it is still not certain. In fact, it makes it easier to understand the argument over Easter that first arose within the Church of Rome at the time of Pope Victor (c. 189–200), and then caused serious conflict between the Asian churches (in Asia Minor) and the Roman Church (joined by most other churches). The Asian churches celebrated the Christian Easter on the same day as the Jewish Passover, that is, the 14th day of the month of Nisan, whatever the day of the week: hence the name quartodecimans. The other churches, by contrast, celebrated Easter (or had come to celebrate it) on the Sunday following 14 Nisan, and thereby established a coherence between the weekly celebration of Sunday and the annual celebration of the Christian festival of Easter. On either side, as far as we know, these churches certainly had the same celebration of the death* and Resurrection* of Christ*, the same celebration of the paschal mystery*, even if their respective approaches to Christology* and to redemption, Pauline in the one case and Johannine in the other, had a different coloration. After a while, Easter was celebrated on Sunday everywhere, including in Asia Minor.

By the second century at the latest there was a paschal vigil, with preparatory fast, which celebrated both the death and the Resurrection of Christ. By the late second century, there was a celebration on the 50th (pentekostè) day after Easter, a festive time whose song is the alleluia and which brings eschatological joy into the time of the church. It was not until the fourth century that there developed the Liturgy* of the paschal triduum (from the night of Maundy Thursday through Easter), the 50th day of the paschal time was celebrated as the day of the descent of the Holy* Spirit, and the 40th as the day of Ascension.

By 240 the preaching* of Origen* in Jerusalem* indicates that there was a period of 40 days in preparation for Easter (Renoux 1993). It therefore does not seem (against Talley's hypothesis) that Lent derives its origin from a fast coming immediately after the Epiphany. In any event, this time became the exclusive (or privileged) time for patristic catecheses* and for the preparation of adult catechumens for the sacraments* of Christian initiation.

b) Christmas and Epiphany. Christmas was certainly celebrated in 336 in Rome, and the festival is probably earlier than the Peace of the Church (edict of Milan, 313). It is possible that its date was set during the winter solstice to oppose the pagan celebration on that day of the birth of the sun god (the invincible Sun, sol in- victus). In another part of the Mediterranean world, in Egypt, the baptism of Christ was celebrated on 6 January. In the course of the fourth century the two festivals came to be celebrated in the East as well as the West, although the gospel events commemorated did not exactly correspond. The Roman liturgy celebrated the Nativity of Christ on 25 December, and on 6 January principally the adoration of the Magi and the revelation* of the Savior to the Gentiles (and secondarily the baptism of Christ). The Byzantine liturgy celebrates both the Nativity and the adoration of the Magi on 25 December, and the baptism of Christ on 6 January. The Roman liturgy of Christmas is strongly influenced by the dogma of the two natures of Christ, as it was defined at the Council of Chalcedon*, whereas the piety of the faithful, from the 13th century onward, was gradually colored by the devotion of Francis of Assisi to the Infant Jesus in the manger, which gave Christmas an importance comparable to that of Easter.

c) Complete Liturgical Year. The celebration of Easter, on the one hand, and those of Christmas and Epiphany on the other, have since Christian Antiquity been the two high points of the liturgical year. Times of preparation or prolongation were spread around those points. In addition, and independently of the two cycles, there was the ordinary time of the year, in the course of which each Sunday was celebrated in its own right, and throughout which the Holy* Scriptures were read in the liturgy in a continuous or semicontinuous manner. Several new elements appeared in the fourth and following centuries:

- 1) The importance in the year of baptismal and monastic declarations of intent: the former considerably influenced the development of the 40 days before Easter (Lent) as well as the Easter vigil, and the latter later took on great importance in the Byzantine year.
- 2) The passage (particularly for Easter) from a celebration of the mystery* taken in its unity to a celebration, that was in a sense historical, of the detail of the events lived through by Christ. This displacement appeared in Jerusalem in the late fourth century, according to the pilgrimage narrative of the Spanish woman Egeria (late fourth century), then in the following century in the unfolding of the liturgical year in the various sanctuaries of the Holy City, as we know it from the Armenian lectionary (the fifth century Jerusalem lectionary, which was adopted in its entirety in Armenia).
- 3) An eschatological element of varying importance depending on the times and the liturgies. In Western liturgies this was prominent in Advent, placed as much at the end of the year as in preparation for Christmas, and perhaps even more so, in the broad patristic perspective of the two advents of Christ, the first in humility and the second in glory*, that formed the framework for the time of the church. From this point of view, the theme (proposed by Bernard* of Clairvaux) of an intermediate advent in hearts and the emphasis on Christmas might make less perceptible how the history* of salvation strove toward its final end.

- 4) The beginning of the year differed in East and West, depending on particular liturgies. In the Roman liturgy it began at Christmas, and subsequently on the first Sunday in Advent.

d) In the Churches from the Reformation there was sometimes preserved, in particular with respect to the organization of eucharistic readings, a liturgical year inherited from the Middle Ages. This was the case for Anglicans* and Lutherans*.

e) The liturgical movement, which began in the 19th century, showed the importance of the liturgical year for the Christian life. Among many writers, two Benedictines warrant particular mention: in France, Prosper Guéranger (1805–75), restorer of the monastic life at the abbey of Solesmes, with his Année liturgique (completed after his death by Dom Lucien Fromage); in Germany, Odo Casel (1886–1948), a monk of Maria Laach, whose numerous writings emphasize the presence of the mystery of salvation in the Divine Liturgy, particularly at Easter. Their work was bound up with the action undertaken by Pope Pius X to reform the liturgical year by restoring the primacy of Sunday over saints' days.

f) The liturgical reform of Vatican II gives a prominent place to the liturgical year, which is the subject of an entire chapter of the conciliar constitution on the liturgy. This chapter emphasizes the commemoration of the history of salvation, centered on Easter, the celebration of Easter and Sundays, the baptismal and penitential aspect of the liturgical year, and the subordinate position of the cult* of the saints in relation to the commemoration of the mysteries of Christ. The implementation of this program, which included the Roman missal and the lectionary of 1970, as well as the Liturgy of the Hours (formerly the breviary) of 1971, was particularly noteworthy for a very substantial increase in biblical readings in the Mass, as the council had demanded. From now on the biblical readings would be spread over a liturgical cycle of three years. This lectionary has been very warmly welcomed in English-language Protestant Churches.

- P. Guéranger, L. Fromage (1841–66, 1878–1901), L'année liturgique, Le Mans-Poitiers-Paris.
- B. Botte (1932), Les origines de la Noël et de l'Épiphanie, Louvain.
- O. Casel (1932), Das christliche Kultmysterium, Regensburg.
- A. Baumstark (1940), Liturgie comparée, Chêvetogne.
- B. Botte (Ed.) (1967), Noël, Épiphanie, retour du Christ, Paris.
- C. Renoux (1969–70), Le codex arménien Jérusalem 121, 3 vols., Paris-Turnhout.
- H. Auf der Maur (1983), Feiern im Rhythmus der Zeit, I: Herrenfeste in Woche und Jahr, Regensburg.
- P. Journel (1983), "L'année," in A.-G. Martimort (Ed.), L'Église en prière, IV: La liturgie et le temps, Paris, 43–166.
- T. J. Talley (1986), Origins of the Liturgical Year, New York.
- P. Bradshaw (1992), The Search for the Origins of Christian Worship, London.
- C. Renoux (1993), "La quarantaine pré-pascale au IIIe siècle à Jérusalem," MD 196, 111–29.

PIERRE-MARIE GY

See also Cult of Saints; Passover; Time

Liturgy

Liturgy here denotes the Christian worship* considered as a whole, particularly in its historical forms and in relation to the tradition* of the church* and the rules of its discipline. Reference should be made to the article Cult for the theological interpretation of the acts through which human beings express their religious relationship to God*.

1. Meanings of the Word Liturgy in History; Equivalent Terms

a) The word leitourgia, in Christian Greek as earlier in the Greek translation of the Old Testament, had various uses, but it did not serve to designate Christian liturgy in its totality, as has become the case in the modern West. In the Byzantine tradition the term Divine Liturgy became the specific name for the celebration of the Eucharist. In the West the term began to be used after the Protestant Reformation, when there was an attempt to find a neutral term permitting the avoidance of the two denominational designations of Mass (Catholic) and Communion (Protestant). In the 17th and 18th centuries liturgy took on a general sense among Catholics, Anglicans, and then, more gradually, Protestants* as a whole. Once this general sense was established, a series of derivative terms appeared: liturgist (specialist in the liturgy), liturgical (liturgical* year; liturgical law; liturgical science—with different connotations in the German Liturgiewissenschaft and the English liturgiology). Thereafter, the scope of reference of the word liturgy was expanded by reference to its etymology, which made it possible to emphasize a dimension of public service, service of the people* (laos) of God in its religious practice.

b) The historical equivalents are many. In the Latin Middle Ages two general terms corresponded to the modern meaning of the word liturgy. The first was ecclesiastical offices (officia ecclesiastica), already attested in the seventh century by Isidore of Seville, who received and transmitted the culture of late antiquity. The second term was divine service (corresponding to the German Gottesdienst). Theologians and jurists (the latter under the influence of Roman law) also used the expression cultus Dei, it being understood that the Latin word had, until the beginning of modern times, a very broad scope (like the French cultiver and the English worship), and that only the object (of God, divine) gave it a religious sense. The Renaissance borrowed from antiquity the expression rites and ceremonies, from which come expressions such as religious ceremony, ceremonial, ritual, and especially the use of the word rite to designate all the liturgical practices of a particular church, especially in the case of Eastern churches.

2. Liturgy and Various Aspects of Theology

a) Liturgy and the Theology of the Sacraments. Around the 12th century Western theologians distinguished within the liturgy an essential kernel made up of the seven sacraments*. In the course of the centuries that followed, this sometimes meant that the importance of the liturgy as a whole was lost sight of. Vatican* II, by contrast, attempted to restore a global vision.

b) Liturgy and Mystery of the Church. In New Testament Greek the word ekklèsia designates, depending on circumstances, the local* church community or the universal Church, or even the liturgical assembly as such. The liturgy thus must be the action of the Church (Congar 1967; Pottie 1988), an action in which, of course, roles are sacramentally diversified.

c) Liturgy as Locus Theologicus. This is one of the fundamental reference points in Catholic and Orthodox theology*, and it holds for the faith* of all Christians as it does for the work of theologians. In this respect Catholic theology refers to a formulation sometimes attributed to Pope Celestine I (DS 246), according to which liturgical prayer (prayer* III 1) expresses what should be believed: lex orandi, lex credendi.

d) Liturgy and the Praying Life of the Christian in the Church. It seems clear that there are quite profound differences in this domain between Orthodoxy*, the approach of the Protestant Reformers, and the current expression of the Catholic vision.

In the Orthodox perspective liturgical practice is closely bound to the experience* of the Christian mystery* on the one hand, and on the other, to the identity of a concrete church community, from which it has never been dissociated.

Various 16th-century Protestant Reformers attempted to distinguish what came from the New Testament from later accretions. The latter were all considered as optional, even if the manner of experiencing them might strongly color the identity of various communities.

Over the last few centuries there have been tensions in Catholic liturgical theory and practice between law*, spirituality, and sacramental dogmatic* theology. Following the liturgical movement growing out of the work of Dom Prosper Guéranger (1805–75), Vatican II and its liturgical reform sought to restore unity between spiritual life* and liturgical practice, and to resituate the experience of the church so that it would be seen less in its institutional reality than in its mystery and its sacramental reality. This movement seems often to have encountered genuine interest on the part of Protestant churches.

3. Liturgical Books and Liturgical Law

According to their conceptions of the Church and tradition, different Christian perspectives have different positions of principle on the relationship of each celebration to traditional practices and to the books used in the celebration. At one extreme there is a feeling that the books or the rules provide merely a convenient outline for the celebration as it may be organized in any particular place, and at the other a concern for conformity in the greatest detail to what is provided by custom or the prescriptions of the liturgical books. In history* and practice, the liturgy has been performed from memory and by custom for centuries and, to a large extent, by using books, but it has gradually given an ever larger place to written material—to liturgical books and written rules—as well as to the desire to conform to the practice of the principal churches, especially those of Rome* and Constantinople. In the West liturgical books were divided first according to the role of each person (bishop*, priests*, deacons*, cantors) in the liturgy, and then, because of the growing importance of the private mass and the individual recitation of the divine office, according to complete liturgical actions (missal, breviary).

In the Catholicism* of the West the liturgical reform of Vatican II relaxed uniformity and attributed some degree of liturgical responsibility to the bishops of the various countries.

4. Liturgical Languages

In the early church the principal languages used in the liturgy were Greek, Syriac, and later also Latin. Latin replaced Greek in the Roman Church in the third and fourth centuries, and it remained for centuries the language of culture and the liturgy, even as it gradually ceased to be understood by the majority of worshippers. In the 16th century, the liturgical use of spoken languages was adopted by the Reformation churches, while the Council of Trent* maintained the nearly exclusive use of Latin in the liturgy of the Catholic Church. Vatican II left it to the bishops of the various countries to choose the languages to be used in the cel-ebation, as has traditionally been the case in the Eastern churches.

• A.-G. Martimort (Ed.) (1984), L'Église en prière, vol. 1, New Ed., Paris.

1)

J. Oehler (1925), "Leiturgie," RECA 12/2, 1871–79.

O. Casel (1932), "Leiturgia-Munus," OrChr 3/7, 289–91.

H. Frank (1936), "Leiturgia-Munus," JLW 13, 181–3.

P.-M. Gy (1990), La liturgie dans l'histoire, Paris, 50–57, 177–194.

2)

Y. Congar (1967), "L'Ecclesia ou communauté chrétienne, sujet intégral de l'action liturgique," in J.-P. Jossua, Y. Congar (Ed.), La liturgie après Vatican II, Paris, 246–82.

I.-H. Dalmais (1984), "La liturgie et le dépôt de la foi," in A.-G. Martimort (Ed.), L'Église en prière, vol. 1, New Ed., Paris, 282–9.

C. Pottier, D. Lebrun (1988), "La doctrine de l'Ecclesia: Sujet intégral de la célébration dans les livres liturgiques depuis Vatican II," MD 176, 117–32.

3)

P.-M. Gy (1990 a), "Typologie et ecclésiologie des livres liturgiques," in La liturgie dans l'histoire, Paris, 75–89; (1990 b), "Traits fondamentaux du droit liturgique," MD 183, 7–22.

T. Elich (1991), "Using Liturgical Texts in the Middle Ages," in G. Austin (Ed.), Fountain of Life, Washington D.C., 69–83.

4)

A.-G. Martimort (1966), "Essai historique sur les traductions liturgiques," MD 86, 75–105.

PIERRE-MARIE GY

See also Architecture; Cult; Images; Music; Prayer

Local Church

By local church is meant the Church present in a particular place. The definition, significance, and role of the local church have evolved in the course of history*, and differ from one Christian family to another. The universal Church is the communion* of local churches.

a) The New Testament uses Church (ekklèsia) in the singular as a name for the One Church of Christ* (Mt 16:17 f.; 1 Cor 12; Rom 12:4 ff.; Eph 4:4 ff.;

1 Pt 2:4–9, etc.), and in the singular or plural to denote the local churches: the church of God* at Corinth or Rome (1 Cor 1:2; 2 Cor 1:1, etc.), the churches of Asia, or the domestic churches (1 Cor 16:19; Rom 16:3–5; Col 4:15; Phlm 2). Diversity was not simply a matter of territory: it could also be theological (pagan-Christian or Judaeo-Christian communities), or based on differing church structures. The question of the unity* of the local churches within the One Church of Christ was raised from the outset, and resolved by means of visits, synods*, or joint assemblies (such as the “council of apostles” in Acts 15), and later by a common reference to the canon of Scriptures.

b) Within the triadic structure of ministry* instituted by the early church*, the bishop* was responsible for the local or territorial church. He was assisted by presbyters* and deacons*, to whom he could delegate some functions. In the empire under Constantine, when Christianity had become the state religion, the local church was an ecclesiastical district: there were eparchies (provinces) in the East and dioceses (from the Greek diokèsis, which originally denoted an administrative region of the empire) in the West. The word parish (paroikia), at first synonymous with the local church governed by a bishop, was used to denote either the diocese or the various locations within the diocese where Christian communities lived. Alongside the diocesan local churches there began to appear the religious orders, which were not in any sense local churches, but which enjoyed an “exemption” under canon law removing them from episcopal jurisdiction*—an exemption destined to become an ecclesiological problem in the 13th century. The monasteries themselves would sometimes be regarded as ecclesiolae in Ecclesia, but this expression had no canonical authority.

c) Vatican* II confirmed that

A diocese is a portion of the people of God which is entrusted to a bishop to be shepherded by him with the cooperation of the presbytery. Thus by adhering to its pastor and gathered together by him through the Gospel and the Eucharist in the Holy Spirit, it constitutes a particular church in which the one, holy, catholic, and apostolic Church of Christ is truly present and operative. (Christus Dominus 11).

The terminology is certainly “hesitant” (H. Legrand 1983), since dioceses are referred to either as local churches or “regional” churches. The ecclesiological vision is clear: the diocese or local church is the place in which the Church of Christ is actualized. However, it attains completeness only in communion* with the other local churches: together they comprise the Catholic Church. Unity is maintained by the college of bishops, the pastors of the local churches answerable to the bishop of Rome*, and finally, the pope*. He has power of jurisdiction and magisterium* over the local churches, collectively and individually.

d) The Orthodox churches have a similar approach, but insist on the autonomy of the local churches. In the celebration of the Eucharist (sunaxis), each local church is a full expression of the one Church of Christ. The bishops ensure the unity of the local churches. A centralized authority with power of jurisdiction exists at the level of the autocephalous churches (indeed this is what defines them), but not at the level of the Orthodox Church as a whole.

e) In Protestant* terms the local church is the parish. Wherever Christians celebrate the Word* and the sacraments* together there is a church: thus local churches are not defined in terms of the bishops, whose power was strongly contested by the Reformation. In some denominations (Anglicanism*, Lutheranism*, etc.) the overall direction of local churches is achieved by means, on the one hand, of a consensus between the direct representatives of the local churches gathered as a synod*, and by the bishops or presidents of the regional or national church structures on the other (the Episcopalian synodal system). In other traditions (for example the Calvinist tradition), such direction takes place on a synodal basis (the Presbyterian synodal system), while in yet others the autonomy of each local church or parish is central and it alone has authority (Congregationalism*).

f) The fragmentation and loss of identity of local structures in all areas of society* has not been without consequences for local churches. Alongside the geographical structure of parishes, there exist sectional communities (academic, hospital, and professional chaplaincies, Catholic Action, etc.). Shared spiritual choices give rise to new, sometimes interdenominational, incarnations of the Church. The unity of this multiplicity of incarnations of the Church is a question raised within each Christian family and between the different churches. It represents a new ecclesiological challenge, which calls for a new form of the ministry* of épiskopè to serve the communion of these different churches coexisting in the same place.

- W. Elert (1954), Abendmahl und Kirchengemeinschaft in der alten Kirche, hauptsächlich des Ostens, Berlin.
- H. de Lubac (1971), Les Églises particulières dans l'Église universelle, Paris.
- J. Neumann (1980), “Bistum,” TRE 6, 697–709.
- J. Hoffmann (1983), “La recomposition de l'unité,” in B. Laurent and F. Refoulé (Ed.), Initiation à la pratique de la théologie, vol. 3, Paris, 347–84.
- H. Legrand (1983), “La réalisation de l'Église en un lieu,” ibid., 143–345.
- C. Möller (1984), “Gemeinde I,” TRE 12, 316–35.
- A. Houssiau (1985), “Paroisse,” Cath 10, 671–87.
- J.-M.R. Tillard (1987), Églises d'Églises: L'ecclésiologie de communion, Paris.
- G. Siegwalt (1992), Dogmatique pour la catholicité évangélique II/2, 11–82, Paris; (1993), “Confessionnalité et catholicité,” PosLuth 41, 222–38.
- M. Lienhard (1995), “La direction personnelle, collégiale et communautaire de l'Église,” PosLuth 43, 177–202.

Loci Theologici

Catholic theology gives the name loci theologici to the various fields from which theological knowledge may develop its understanding, and to the various sources it uses: Scripture, tradition*, the Fathers* of the Church, the magisterium*, the liturgy*, and so on. The problematics developed around this expression are essentially the work of the Dominican theologian Melchior Cano (1509–60), whose treatise De locis theologicis, published in the historical context of the Council of Trent*, enjoyed a following for several centuries and exercised a decisive influence on the history and teaching of theology.

a) Melchior Cano and the Reform of Catholic Theology. The renewal of Catholic theology in the 16th century was the result of struggles between various tendencies—Thomism*, Scotism, nominalism*, Augustinianism*—and especially of the challenge represented by the radical work of Luther*. It was characterized by a renewal of the Scholastic method in the Spanish schools brought by the return of humanism* to Latinity and classical culture, and by the weight granted to arguments drawn from the authority* of the church* (see the Council of Sens, held in Paris in 1528). For example, Ignatius of Loyola composed “rules to follow in order that we never depart from the true feelings that we should have in the Church militant” (Spiritual Exercises, Rule 11, no. 363). Spain was experiencing at that time a revival of Thomism whose most brilliant representative was Thomas of Vio (Cajetan, 1470–1534), and for which the Dominican school of Salamanca was the standard-bearer before the creation of the Society of Jesus. There, the great theologian Francisco de Vitoria (1483–1546) taught Dominique de Soto (1494–1560) and Melchior Cano. In this school the treatment of each theological question required the successive exploration of the various fields that were later named loci theologici. These methods, transmitted to the early

Jesuits Laynes and Salmerón, were later used at the Council of Trent.

Cano was a professor at the University of Salamanca, bishop* of the Canary Islands, and an active architect of the decisions of the Council of Trent. A contemporary historian judges him harshly: “an intellectual wrapped up in doctrine and devoted to the power of scholarly language”; “major architect of the policy of repression and the closed mind” (A. Milhou, Histoire du christianisme, Paris, 1992). Along with the Grand Inquisitor Fernando de Valdès, he took an active part in the Inquisition: against illuminism, sometimes against the Jesuits, and even against the Dominican Bartolomeo Carranza (confessor of Charles V and Philip II, provincial of the Dominicans, theologian at the Council of Trent, and archbishop of Toledo).

Cano, whom Gardeil calls “the founder of the theological method,” bitterly criticized decadent Scholasticism*, primarily for its lack of rigor. For example, he stigmatized those who transformed the opinions of a school into indisputable dogmas* and the contrary opinions into heresies*. Vitoria had launched a movement, and Cano was to codify it. J. de Maldonat (1533–83) was the faithful propagator of the Salamanca method of Cano and defined the ideal of theology as the union of sacred letters with the Scholastic method.

b) Sources of the Notion of Locus Theologicus. Although Cano’s work was without precedent, the key notion of De locis theologicis was not radically new. Cano obviously referred to the idea of loci dialectici, repertoires of arguments for eristic controversies codified by Aristotle in the Topics, on the basis of the most general notions (logical predicates: genus, species, difference, particularity, and accident). But it was less from Aristotle himself than from the De inventione dialectica of Rodolphus Agricola (1527), and through him the Topics of Cicero, that Cano drew in importing the notion into theology. Because theology relied on particular propositions of diverse origins and because it made broad and precise use of the argument from authority, the topics of Cicero and Agricola were more applicable than those of Aristotle to a study of the principles of faith. Indeed, those principles had to be connected to one another in order to be able to reach more general conclusions.

The notion of locus theologicus was current at the time of De locis theologicis, but it designated the governing positions of theology or of a theologian, or else the commonplaces of theology, or the loci of the Protestant theologians (see Lang 1924, c. II, §2–3). Melancthon, for example, had written a Loci communes rerum theologicarum (1521, revised in 1559, Loci praecipui theologici). This was an exposition of the principal themes found in the heart of Scripture: the fallen human condition, sin*, justification*, faith*. The way in which Cano understood it, on the other hand, and in accordance with the spirit of the Topics, the notion designated the repertory of fields from which the arguments (loci arguandi) of the discipline of theology could be drawn. He defined them as the “domiciles of all the theological arguments, where theologians will find support for all argumentations, either to prove or to refute” (De locis theologicis I. III). A sketch of Cano’s doctrine had already appeared, curiously, in a speech delivered at the Council of Trent in 1547 by B. Carranza, although it is impossible to say which of the two “enemies” influenced the other. They both referred to a passage from Thomas* Aquinas (ST Ia. q.1. a. 8. ad 2) in which locus appears incidentally applied to theology, with the sketch of an enumeration. Vitoria had noted it. But it was less to this passage than to the theological practice of Thomas that Cano often referred, taking him as a model in the use (invention) of loci theologici (De locis theologicis XII. c. III). The originality claimed by Cano cannot, however, be questioned, because the systematization of theology that he proposes on the basis of the loci theologici is specific to him.

c) Organization of De locis Theologicis. Published in 1563, one year after the close of the Council of Trent and three years after the death of Cano, the 12 books (out of 14 planned) of De locis theologicis are presented by the author as a systematic and original work. The enumeration of the ten loci theologici, however, should not be considered an exhaustive decalogue (I. III). He divides and subdivides them as follows (I. III and XII. III):

A) The loci proprii are those that rely on authority and are divided into fundamental loci, which contain the entire revelation*: 1) the authority of Scripture; and 2) that of the (oral) traditions of Christ* and the apostles*, and declarative loci, concerning only the preservation, interpretation, and transmission of the revealed content, themselves distinguished according to whether they provide absolutely certain principles; 3) the authority of the Catholic Church; 4) the councils (especially the general councils), 5) the authority of the Roman Church (magisterium of the pope), or probable principles; 6) the ancient saints, that is, the Fathers of the Church; 7) Scholastic theologians and canonists.

B) The secondary loci call upon reason* and might correspond to the use of the social sciences in theology; they are: 8) natural reason, 9) philosophers and jurists, 10) history*, documents, and oral traditions.

According to Cano the work of the theologian is to practice both invention (that is, the search for intelligible elements in revealed phenomena) and judgment. The art of theology lies in the combination of the two: neither in pure invention and discussion for the love of discussion (the academy), nor in the conclusion alone (the Stoics). Invention discovers its arguments in the ten loci theologici. Theological judgment, for its part, should train itself to use the loci theologici with relevance, by appreciating the nature and the probative force of each authority for each particular question. It may well be, for example, that human history, although an inferior locus theologicus, is a more certain authority (a more effective locus theologicus) than reference to a verse of Scripture with too vague a meaning. The “theological notes*” designed to qualify certain propositions from the point of view of their agreement or disagreement with Catholic faith function as a way of evaluating the theological questions and conclusions. When those conclusions are unanimous, whether they come from the church, a council, the pope, or saints, they belong to the faith with the same right as the content of Scripture and the apostolic traditions (XII. V).

The second part of the work, beginning with Book XII, would have set out the way of using loci theologici depending on interlocutors and contexts: Scholastic argument (XII), explanation of Scripture (XIII), controversies with heretics, Jews, Muslims, and pagans (XIV).

d) Aspects of the Theology of De locis Theologicis. The book is a fairly accurate representation of the Tridentine theology that Cano strongly helped to shape.

The systematization by means of loci theologici gave two distinctive characteristics to almost all Catholic theology of the succeeding centuries: a central reliance on authority and a necessary reliance on copious erudition (scriptural, patristic, magisterial).

As for Scripture, Cano deals with its inspiration, its inerrancy, and the church's determination of the canon (canonicity being distinguished from authenticity). He defends the value of the Vulgate. On tradition, formulations very close to those of Trent cannot conceal the fact that his theory says a bit more than the conciliar documents, which fundamentally remained rather cautious (see Ratzinger in Rahner and Ratzinger, Offenbarung und Überlieferung, Freiburg, 1965). Cano speaks most frequently of traditions in the plural, considering them in objective fashion as "transmitted things," and stressing that they constitute a locus theologicus independent of Scripture, since the Church is older than Scripture. Against the sola scriptura of Luther's disciples it seems that we can attribute to Cano the paternity of a theology of the two sources of revelation (partim...partim, an expression that was, however, withdrawn by Trent), which long remained a dominant model (see Holstein 1969).

It is probably with reference to the certain declarative loci, which specify the various forms of the authority of the church, that Cano presented his most influential arguments, once again more because of their systematic character than because of their content. The authority of the Catholic Church is that of the entirety of the body of the visible Church, which cannot be mistaken in its faith (in credendo), whatever the period of time. Inerrancy is also attributed to the pastors* and the doctors in their teaching (in docendo). Cano hierarchizes the authority of the councils according to their representativeness: the general councils, ecumenical and sufficient in size, represent in fact the entire church and thus have an authority equivalent to that of the church if they have been called and confirmed by the pope. A council's decision is infallible if it bears the character of a universal and definitive obligation, even if its subject does not belong to faith while being sufficiently linked to revelation for the church to guarantee its validity. Finally, the authority of the pope is linked to that of Peter*, and to his inerrancy as guaranteed by Christ. Pontifical inerrancy is thus a truth of faith limited to the public exercise of the authority of the pope; and against the supporters of absolute and universal inerrancy, Cano says that the pope "does not need our lies and does not need our adulation" (Lang, quoted by Sesboüé 1996).

e) Influence. De locis theologicis went through 30 editions up to 1890. The historical context of Cano's work and the gradual discrediting of the Scholastic method in philosophy* and theology justify its success. Together with the breadth and the composition of the book, this explains its influence. Without radically contrasting the style of medieval Summas, which gave a privileged place to speculative argumentation, to that of the treatises (and particularly of treatises De locis based on Cano's model) and manuals that flourished after the Council of Trent, the true birth of positive* theology can be dated from De locis theologicis. The place given by Cano to authority, and that reserved for Scripture and the ecclesiastical magisterium, followed by the argumentation of the Fathers of the Church and of theologians, as well as his appeal to history, shows in fact his concern to support dogmatic proof with positive data. Cano himself does not use the term (it was in use earlier, found in Jean Mair in 1509 and, in 1556, in Rule IX of the Constitutions of Ignatius Loyola), and, because of his attachment to the speculative method, he can only be considered as the initiator per accidens (Gardeil 1926, col. 740) of positive theology.

The expression became general by the end of the century as a means of characterizing a manner of teaching that emphasized more the affirmation of revealed phenomena than speculative questioning. It was only gradually that a distinction was established between positive theology, which was concerned with establishing the whole matter of the theologian's study, and speculative or Scholastic theology, which limited itself to rational argumentation on the basis of what positive theology had established. But the priority given to the positive establishment of doctrine, to the qualification of any given thesis by the theological note that specifies the degree of assent due to it, before showing the speculative reasons for it and drawing from it possible theological conclusions (contrary to the order followed by Thomas in the chapters of CG, as Cano notes, De locis theologicis XII. XI), presages the abandonment of the Scholastic method as the principal means of teaching.

Two independent, if not contradictory, consequences may be attributed to the influence of Cano's theology of loci. The first is the gradual narrowing of focus of theological science onto the problems of critical history, whether sacred history or the history of the church, which gave to the 10th and final locus a growing importance. In the 17th century Petau and Thomassin, by a return to the Fathers of the Church and a copious historical erudition, developed an important erudition that had started in the preceding century. The new importance granted to authority was strengthened by that which the Enlightenment gave to reason alone, and by the influence of Enlightenment thinkers on the theology of the Reformed Churches.

The 19th century, with the school of Tübingen* and Newman*, saw the apogee of the positive method (Hocedez 1949–52) and of a theology taught according to the order of its loci (De locis theologicis was modernized by J. Berthier in his own De locis theologicis, Turin, 1900). This occurred under the pressure of the nascent social sciences and of Protestant theologies, whose “scientific,” exegetical, and patristic argumentation was often directed against the speculations of the Catholic tradition. The idea of a history of dogmas and the idea of a development of dogma certainly have an important source in Cano.

The other influence is to be sought in the evolution of the notion of the pontifical magisterium and in the increasing role that the pope was led to play after Trent, by means of bulls, briefs, and constitutions. Although the specific notion of magisterium was not developed until the 18th century, the political organization of the church along the lines of modern states, the universal regulation by means of different forms of censure (defined by Benedict XIV, 1740–58), and the debate on the indefectibility (before the infallibility* defined by Vatican* I) of the pope and the councils, as well as on the relative superiority of the former or the latter (Jansenist polemic), together form a bridge between Trent and Vatican I. The reestablishment of Catholic universities in the 19th century went along with the spread of Roman teaching by means of encyclicals (Mirari Vos, 1832), by the recall of the magisterial tradition (first edition of the Denzinger), and by the concern to attribute theological notes and dogmatic notes to old and contemporary teachings.

Although for historical and pedagogical reasons emphasis had been placed on the positive ground of theology and on the authority of the various sources of teaching, this change of perspective was not accompanied by a new conception of theological science. Cano remained an Aristotelian and could define science only by the deduction of conclusions. His successors did not take up the challenge. The development of a doctrine of science adapted to the new reality, such as Thomas Aquinas had accomplished in his time by his reception of Aristotle, did not take place. Cano and the succeeding centuries long maintained the coexistence of a “positive” theology of sources, derived from the new requirements of thought and a “scholastic” theology that had retained a medieval status (Tshibangu 1964, 330). This unstable balance, finally upset in the contemporary period, perhaps partly explains the now chaotic evolution of “theological science.”

- M. Cano, De locis theologicis (1714), Ed. H. Serry, Padua. (1839), Ed. Migne, Cursus completus, vol. I; (1890), Ed. Cuchchi, 3 vols., Rome; a new edition by the Navarre University is in the works.
- M. Jacquin (1920), “Melchior Cano et la théologie moderne,” RSPPhTh 9, 121–41.
- A. Lang (1924), Die loci theologici des Melchior Cano und die Methode des dogmatischen Beweises, Munich.
- A. Gardeil (1926), “Lieux théologiques,” DThC 9, 712–47.
- A. Duval (1949), “Cano (Melchior),” Cath 2, 465–7.
- E. Marcotte (1949), La nature de la théologie d’après Melchior Cano, Ottawa.
- E. Hocedez (1949–52), Histoire de la th. au XIXe s., 3 vols., Brussels.
- V. Beltrán de Heredia (1953), “Cano (Melchior),” DSp 2/1, 73–76.
- J. Beumer (1954), “Positive und Spekulative Theologie: Kritische Bemerkungen an Hand der Loci theologici des Melchior Cano,” Schol. 29, 53–72.
- C. Pozo (1962), Fuentes para la historia del método teológico en la escuela de Salamanca, vol. 1: Francisco de Vitoria, Domingo de Soto, Melchior Cano y Ambrosio de Salazar, Grenada.
- T. Tshibangu (1964), “Melchior Cano et la théologie positive,” ETHL 40, 300–339; (1965), Théologie positive et théologie spéculative: Position traditionnelle et nouvelle problématique, Louvain-Léopoldville, esp. 169–210.
- G. Holstein (1969), “Les deux sources de la Révélation,” RevSR 57, 375–434.
- J. Belda-Plans (1982), Los lugares teológicos de Melchior Cano en los comentarios a la Suma, Pamplona.
- B. Körner (1994 a), “Cano Melchior,” LThK 2, 924–5; (1994 b), Melchior Cano—De locis theologicis: Ein Beitrag zur theologischen Erkenntnislehre, Graz.
- B. Sesbouë (1996), “Melchior Cano et les lieux théologiques,” Histoire des dogmes, vol. 4: La parole du salut, 165–73.

CYRILLE MICHON AND GILBERT NARCISSE

See also Hermeneutics; Notes, Theological; Revelation; Theology

Logos. See Word

Lombard, Peter. See Lateran III, Council

Lonergan, Bernard John Francis

1904–84

Bernard Lonergan, Canadian Jesuit, philosopher, and theologian, taught at Montreal, Toronto, and the Gregorian University in Rome*. His work is dedicated to an ever more adequate understanding of both human intelligence and the mysteries of Christian faith*.

a) Writings on Thomas Aquinas. In Grace and Freedom: Operative Grace in the Thought of St. Thomas Aquinas, Lonergan traces the development of the theology* of grace* from Augustine* to Aquinas*, sets out the relations between operative grace and cooperative grace, and presents an analysis of Aquinas's theory of causation, operation, divine transcendence, and human liberty*. This work convinced Lonergan that what was needed to reach up to the mind of Aquinas was not simply historical, philosophical, or theological reconstructions of Aquinas's work. For any of these reconstructions to be accurate, profound changes are needed within those who work on them.

From Augustine, Lonergan learned that conversion* to Jesus Christ involves intellectual and moral dimensions, as well as the religious dimensions. The psychological and phenomenological narratives of Augustine's intellectual conversion to truth, his moral conversion to good*, and his religious conversion to God* revealed in Christ Jesus ground experientially the shift toward theory in Aquinas. This threefold conversion becomes in Aquinas the division of the virtues* into intellectual, moral, and theological virtues (ST Ia IIae, q. 55–67; IIa IIae, q. 1–170). To understand the systematic breakthrough in Aquinas's theology, Lonergan realized that he had to undergo what he later termed an "intellectual conversion."

Lonergan's Verbum: Word and Idea in Aquinas sets out the basic terms operative in Aquinas's cognitional theory, and also how these terms are derived from the human experiences of questioning, understanding, and judging. Insight into images generates understanding, and this understanding expresses itself in concepts. Human understanding is not content with thinking, however: we want to know what is true, so questions of truth emerge, and only when we grasp the sufficiency of the evidence do we reach judgment, and therefore truth or falsity. Lonergan shows that what Aquinas terms "the light of active intellect as a created participation in divine light" is in fact our human capacity to raise ever further questions.

b) Studies on Human Knowledge and Theological Method. In Insight: A Study of Human Understanding, Lonergan transposes the cognitional theory that he learned from Aquinas into contemporary contexts. The book is an invitation to the reader to appropriate his or her own acts of experiencing, understanding, and judging. The first part sets out insight as activity, showing how attention to acts of understanding enables the reader to correlate the methods of the sciences in such a way as to arrive at a coherent and open understanding of the world*, designated as "emergent probability." The second part builds on the reader's own self-appropriation as a knower, showing how developmental and dialectical methods operate in cognitively grounded metaphysics, ethics*, and natural theology*. The work demonstrates how human understanding does in fact consist in related and recurrent operations, and that failure to attend to these operations has led to the dialectical contradictions in modern culture, philosophy*, and theology. The program of the book is succinctly stated by Lonergan (Insight, p. xxviii):

Thoroughly understand what it is to understand, and not only will you understand the broad lines of all there is to be understood, but also you will possess a fixed base, an invariant pattern, opening upon all further developments of understanding.

From his discoveries in Insight, Lonergan advanced to Method in Theology, where he shows that his notion of transcendental method can restructure how theology is done. Transcendental method is neither Cartesian (Descartes*) nor Kantian (Kant*), but is a set of related operations of understanding yielding cumulative and progressive results. After treating human good, meaning, and religion, the book develops the notion of functional specialties in theology. There are three types of specialties. 1) Field specialties continually divide and subdivide the fields of data to be investigated, as in the field of biblical studies. 2) Subject specialties classify the results of the investigations in order to teach those results, as when departments are separated into areas such as Hebrew history*, early Christian antiquities, and so on. 3) Functional specialties differentiate the successive stages in the process from the data to the results of the investigations.

- The Collected Works of Bernard Lonergan (CW), Toronto, 1988. (1957), Insight: A Study of Human Understanding, London (CW III, 1992).
- (1967), Collection, London (CW IV, 1988).
- (1967), Verbum: Word and Idea in Aquinas, Notre Dame, Ind.

- (1971), Grace and Freedom: Operative Grace in the Thought of St. Thomas Aquinas, London.
- (1972), Method in Theology, New York.
- (1976), The Way to Nicea: The Dialectical Development of Trinitarian Theology, London.
- (1980), Understanding and Being: An Introduction and Companion to Insight (CW V, 1990).
- (1982), Les voies d'une théologie méthodique, Paris (collection of articles on theology by Lonergan).
- (1991), Pour une méthodologie philosophique, Montréal (collection of articles on philosophy by Lonergan).
- ♦ H. Meynell (1976), An Introduction to the Philosophy of Bernard Lonergan, London.
- Coll. (1978), The Lonergan Workshop, Atlanta.
- M. O'Callaghan (1980), Unity in Theology: Lonergan's Framework for Theology in Its New Context, London.
- M. Lamb (1981) (Ed.), Creativity and Method: Essays in Honor of Bernard Lonergan, Milwaukee.
- L. Roy (1982), "La méthode théologique de Bernard Lonergan," Com(F) VII/1, 66–74.
- Method: A Journal of Lonergan Studies*, Los Angeles (1983–91), Boston (1992–).
- M. Lamb (1984), History, Method and Theology, Atlanta.
- V. Gregson (1988) (Ed.), The Desires of the Human Heart: An Introduction to the Theology of Bernard Lonergan, New York.
- F. Crowe (1992), Lonergan, London.

MATTHEW L. LAMB

See also Augustine of Hippo; Bible; Ethics; Knowledge of God; Mystery; Nature; Theological Method; Thomas Aquinas; Thomism

Lord. See Christ/Christology; Name

Love

If God* reveals himself to humanity as love, or agape (1 Jn 4:8), it would follow that he makes himself known through love: we know God by loving him and by loving our fellow human beings. But we also know a love that is independent of the love of God. Human beings love themselves in their search for happiness; they love others by inclination, desire, or passion. Are these two radically distinct and incompatible kinds of love? Or does love of God presuppose a strictly human love if it is to be understood by human beings? Is charity—the love inspired by grace*—a transformation of natural love or does it require a total rupture with that love? To answer these questions we must know what love itself is. Is it the search for self-satisfaction by possession of the other or, on the contrary, dispossession of oneself, ecstasy?

I. Metaphysics of Love

1. An Essential Trial for Human Beings

a) Unsuitable Love. Amorous passion is not the only form of love. Compared to indefectible maternal love it is in fact the most fragile and vulnerable form. But passion is an event that, by its unpredictability, has the nature of a revelation. One discovers that the meaning of one's existence does not depend on oneself but on another who bursts into one's life without warning. The beloved object does not correspond to the expectations, tastes, and interests—that is, to the constitution—of the ego. On the contrary, the beloved exceeds the ideal image a person could make of his or her happiness. In this way, the beloved breaches all propriety. This disparity serves as the essential mechanism of tragedy, poetry, and the novel, in which love is most often connected with its forbidden forms: adultery, social incompatibility, incest, misalliance (Tristan and Isolde, Romeo and Juliet, Phaedra and Hippolyte, Swann and Odette).

b) Ecstatic Quality of Love. Passion works a transformation, an alienation of the subject. In that it arises from hope (Stendhal, De l'amour [On Love] chaps. 2 and 3) that is, from the subject's representation of the happiness the beloved object could bring him, passion would seem to be derived from self-love. But the egoistic point of departure, which leads the subject to try to possess the other, functions like a lure to bring the subject out of himself or herself and make the very existence of the ego depend on the other: without you I am nothing. The totality of meaning is gradually transferred to the other ("crystallization"): the object is not lovable because of his/her value (qualities); on the contrary, love is the first cause on the basis of which the subject places value and meaning.

The lover sees the beloved with new eyes. Instead of being considered as a dangerous illusion, as blindness, this alteration should be recognized as deep wisdom*. In the trials of love, in the pure pathos of devouring fire, the subject acquires essential knowledge of sacrifice and the gift of self without discursive or logical mediation. In the detachment from self, self-renunciation, putting one's destiny in the hands of the other, abandoning one's self to the other, the subject can give meaning to his or her existence.

c) Oath of Fidelity. If passion arises out of emotion, out of the contingency of a physical upheaval such as sexual desire, it prolongs itself in a willed act that engages the totality of being. The truth of love does not lie in the satisfaction extorted by possession but in the generosity of heart that gives emotion a value of essence. The oath of fidelity which love immediately calls forth is not a guarantee of inalterable emotion. Rather, it attests to the will's full assent to that gift of oneself that transports the subject beyond all self-interest and self-satisfaction.

Love acquires a value that not only exceeds the ego, but also the me-you relation. It tends to diffuse and transform the world*, regardless of the obstacles the world might place in its path.

2. Love and the Meaning of the World

a) Cosmic Principle. Traditional forms of wisdom make love the unifying principle that presides over the formation of the world. The most ancient ritual practices associate sexuality with the renewal of the seasons and the fertility of crops. Empedocles taught that love assembles the elements in such a way that they "constitute a unique order" (Fr. B. 17), whereas hatred separates them. Here love is participation in a universal movement of nature rather than an individual sentiment. In the cosmic myth* related by Aristophanes in Plato's Banquet (189 d-193 d) the love that moves a man to unite with a woman manifests the aspiration to return to an original unity, lost and forgotten since the occurrence of separation.

b) Ruse of the Life-Wish. But if the meaning of love is extended to the dimension of the world, it no longer has meaning for the subject who feels it. It is as if love were the phenomenon of an obscure fundamental force that toys with the helpless individual in its power. The sentiment that moves the individual to discover his or her ipseity through the choice of a singular, unique, irreplaceable object would be an illusion employed by the cosmic principle to achieve its own ends of self-realization. This "metaphysics of love" (Schopenhauer, The World As Will and Representation) leads to pessimism. If love is an individualization of the sexual instinct by which the life-wish indefinitely repeats itself, then the individual has no other truth than dissolution in the species, death*. The sacrifice to which the individual consents, believing it has meaning, is in reality a return to nothingness*: that is, the affirmation of absence of sense. The only escape from this fatality is to renounce the illusion of meaning and so to renounce love.

Love has no meaning because it is not the source of any [real] fertility. The reproduction of the same obstructs all future, all novelty, all possibility. It is not, strictly speaking, procreation. If the difference between the sexes, between lover and beloved, is reduced to an illusion and dissolved in cosmic unity, love is not the ecstatic élan toward the other, it is the indefinite return to an impersonal self. But this is not an explanation of love, it is simply its denial.

3. Eros and Transcendence (Plato)

a) Sons of Poros and Penia. Diotima, whose comments are related by Socrates, (Banquet 201 e–212 a) understands love (Eros) as an intermediary, (metaxu 202 a Sq) a demon (daimôn) born of the union between Penia (penury) and Poros (resource) (203 a–d). To love is to desire something one lacks (200 a), so love is deprived of beauty (201 b) and poor like its mother (203 c). But it is not enough to think of love in negative terms, as lack. Lack has its term in satisfaction. Need can be satisfied by fulfillment, but the same is not true of love, which does not seek possession. And yet this radical dissatisfaction is not any kind of impotence, because love is activated by its father’s inventiveness (203 d–e).

b) Transcendence. The person who loves recognizes in the other all the beauty* or value that he himself does not have, and yet he does not seek by fusion to become that which he is not. His aim is not to be beautiful (or learned): it is to contemplate the beauty in the other, as that which in this other exceeds all communication. By uniting with the other he does not appropriate the other’s beauty, but maintains it in its constitutive alterity. Love is made possible only by the transcendence of the Beautiful.

c) Fertility. This is why love is in itself operational and can only be thought in its works (ergo, 199 a, developed starting from 204 c). The object of love is not to obtain something from the beloved, because love is already in itself in relation with that which is beyond essence, the Good* (206 a, see The Republic 509 b). Its object is rather “to give birth in the Beautiful” (206 b), that is, to be made fertile by the transcendence that, in enlightening it, gives meaning to being. The interest of lovers’ conversation is not their reciprocal satisfaction but the creativity by which they, mortals, give birth to the absolute novelty of the immortal (206 e Sq).

If love has a universal, divine sense (206 c) valid as well for physical love as for love of thought, it is because, born of the difference between same and other, it is creative—it produces the unpredictable, the new.

4. Friendship and Being (Aristotle)

a) Unity of the Community. Whereas the Platonic Eros is animated by a perpetual motion of going beyond self, the Aristotelian philia (Nicomachean Ethics I. VIII and IX) is inscribed in the stability of a community of which it forms the bond and maintains the unity. Man is destined by nature to live in a city* (Politics I, 1253 a 2). This is not only because he is endowed with language and can discuss with other men what is just and unjust, but because he is united to others by a form of familiarity and friendship (NE 1155 a 22). Unlike Eros, philia is not the exclusive choice of another, it is the relation of mutual affection and benevolence (1155 b 32) that naturally unites those who live together (1157 b 7) and who, consequently, resemble each other (1159 b 2).

However, just as there are several forms of community, there are several kinds of friendship. When people unite out of self-interest or for pleasure, they do not seek out the presence of the other for its own sake. Friendship is perfect only between virtuous beings because they prefer loving to being loved, desire the Good for their friends without expecting anything in return (1156 b 9), and thus draw their pleasure from friendship alone (1159 a 27 Sq).

b) Ethics. Aristotle resolves the contradiction between self-love and love of one’s fellow human being. True friendship presupposes that one be disinterested and renounce egoism (1168 a 32). Nonetheless it is founded on a proper understanding of self-love. Because he who prefers the Good over all things and consequently sacrifices his own interests to the welfare of his friend, in reality loves that which is best for himself; so he loves himself by attaching himself to the higher part of the soul* (1168 b 28–1169 a 35).

Friendship is “intimately connected with virtue” (1155 a 3) because it is beautiful in itself (1155 a 28) and because perfect friendship is necessarily accompanied by virtue (1156 b 7), but also because one cannot “live well” without having friends (1169 b 3–1170 b 19). For human beings, “living well” means “living well together,” so friendship is “the greatest good for Cities” (Politics II, 4, 1262 b 9).

c) Friendship As Experience of Being. Friendship is not only an ethical and political value, it is an experience of an ontological nature. Aristotle repeatedly emphasizes the pleasure procured by association, intimacy, and presence of friends, particularly when they are virtuous (1157 b 7; 1157 b 17–18; 1158 a 4 Sq; 1171 a 1; 1171 b 14; 1172 a 7). The incapacity to live together spoils friendship, whatever the feelings of benevolence and inclination toward the other. Aristotle gives the justification for this physical proximity by explaining why a happy man needs friends. He develops the idea that a friend is an alter ego (1170 b 7). I need another who is at the same time me, not so I can withdraw into self-satisfaction and find myself in others, but in order to contemplate (1170 a 2) or rather feel (1170 a 31) in or with him that which I cannot fully feel in myself, for lack of distance and communion*. For a happy man, what is most worthy of being felt is the “good life” that is his—in other words, life-in-act, the fact that his life is not drudgery but an activity having its end in itself, a praxis. We enjoy being alive because we rejoice at our friends’ being alive. Aristotle goes further: what we enjoy in the presence of friends is supremely desirable Being itself (1170 b 8) through the shared feeling of existence.

II. Revelation of Love

Though Aristotle thinks the perfection of the relation that can exist between free and equal human beings, he cannot conceive of the possibility of friendship between beings as dissimilar as human beings and gods (1158 b 35). But Thomas* Aquinas, defining charity as “a sort of friendship of man for God,” (ST IIa IIae, q. 23, a. 1, resp.) speaks of a commerce or intimacy (conversatio) between man and God. That God could consider human beings as friends (Jn 15:15) is the revelation* that changes the meaning of love.

1. Old Testament

a) God’s Love for Humanity. Love of God for human beings is manifest in the creation* by the role given to them (Gn 1:26–29) and renewed in the covenants* concluded with his people (Noah, Gn 2:18; Abraham, Gn 12:3, Gn 15 and 17; Moses, Ex 19). God loves his people by grace, without judging them on their merits. He helps them in times of affliction and delivers them from slavery in the land of Egypt (Dt 4:37; 8:17; 9:4–6; 10:15). God recalls his eternal love and unflinching fidelity to the Covenant (Dt 7:7–9) at times when he suffers the infidelity of his people (Jer 31:3; Sg 3:17; Mal 1:2). This is why the love of God (Hebrew chesed, Greek eleos) takes the form of mercy* (Is 54:8).

This fidelity resembles the love and tenderness (Ex 3:14; Ps 103 (102):4, 103:8, 103:13) of a father or mother for their children. They give birth to their children, cherish and nourish them, bring them up, and forgive their escapades and rebellion (Is 1:2, 49:15; Jer 31:20; Hos 11:1, 11:3 f.). But the violence* of love and the exclusivity of election place God in the position of a husband jealous or betrayed because his wife has prostituted herself (Is 54:5, 62:4–5; Jer 2:2, 31:22; Ez 16). The marriage* of Hosea with a harlot is the symbol of the marriage of God with Israel* (Hosea 1–3).

The Psalms* invoke the mercy of God in asking for his help or forgiveness (Ps 51 [50]:1; 89 [88], 89:2, 89:3, 89:25, 89:29, 98 [97]:3, 145 [144]:8). They express the desire and expectation of being loved by God (Ps 89 [88]:50, 119 [118]:41), as well as confidence in his eternal love (Ps 136 [135]).

b) Love of Human Beings for God. As a counterpart of the love of God for his people should correspond, according to a commandment* that sums up the entire law*, the love of human beings for God (Dt 6:5; Hebrew ahaba, translated in the Septuagint by agape, quite rare in Greek), manifest not only by observance of precepts* but by the heart’s disposition to receive the Word* (see Psalm 119 [118]). The fear that goes with the love of God is not slavish submission; to fear nothing but God means to have no object of fear on earth (Dt 7:18).

c) Love of One’s Fellow Human Beings. God also commands love of one’s fellow human being, (Lv 19:18) who is not only the child of Israel, but the stranger, “for you were sojourners in the land of Egypt” (Ex 22:20, 23:9; Dt 10:18 f., 19:33; Prv 25:21 f.).

d) Love between Man and Woman. The Old Testament grants an important place to love between man and woman*: it is as “male and female” that God created humanity in his image (Gn 1:27); the history of the people of Israel is traversed by couples* united in love: Adam* and Eve, Abraham and Sarah, Isaac and Rebecca, Jacob and Rachel, Samson and Dahlila, Boaz and Ruth, David and Bathsheba. The Song of Songs celebrates carnal union.

2. Synoptic Gospels

a) Love As Center of the Law. The preaching* of Jesus* is inscribed in the Jewish tradition* that centers the precepts of the law around the two commandments of love (most often agape). The commandment to love God (Deuteronomy 6) is “the greatest commandment”; but Jesus immediately associates it with its likeness, the commandment to love one’s neighbor (Mt 22:36–40; Mk 12:28–31; Lk 10:25–28; Lv 19:18). Recalling that love is the essential of the law—in a context in which there is an attempt to test him—Jesus shows that his doctrine is not meant to be original. But he insists on the actualization, in the heart and in practice, of the already well-known sense of the “law.”

b) Love of Neighbor. This recentering of the law on love entails displacements in the order of ethical priorities. Love for God has no sense unless it is translated into love of one's neighbor, which is the touchstone of justice*. We do not honor God through respect for ceremonial and cultural precepts but by helping those who are in need (Mt 12:1–8; Mk 2:23–28; Lk 6:1–5, 13:10–17). Human beings will be judged by their love for their fellows, and particularly for the least of these (Mt 26:31–46).

Love and the works of mercy it brings forth are addressed to the poor and downtrodden, the prisoner, the sick, and the stranger. Forgiveness should also go out to those whose behavior is judged reprehensible: publicans and sinners (Mt 9:10–13; Mk 2:15 ff.; Lk 5:29–32). The great parables* of mercy (Lk 15:1–32) show the gratuitous nature of the gift of forgiveness and the joy that accompanies it.

c) Love for One's Enemy. The commandment to love is radicalized when it is extended to one's enemy (Mt 5:43–48; Lk 6:27–35). In the Gospel of Matthew Jesus underscores the opposition between his own teachings and the tradition as kept by the Jews. The new way comes not to “abolish [them] but to fulfill [them]” (Mt 5:17), to bring the precept back to its original meaning by pushing it to its most extreme case. It is incumbent upon the one enlightened by the law, the Jew, to be better than publicans and pagans. These last do not have the law and yet they love their friends. Jesus believes that the commandment to love as a simple movement of the heart would not be immediately universal. The Samaritan is not a pagan; he knows the law and, showing more love than the priest* or the Levite (Lk 10:29–37), accomplishes it better than those at whom it is directly aimed.

d) The Chosen One. The major revelation of the synoptic Gospels is the name* given to Jesus by God at his baptism (Mt 3:17) and transfiguration (Mt 17:5; Mk 9:7): “The Chosen One” (Lk 9:35). This citation from Isaiah 42:1 (repeated in Mt 12:18) makes Jesus the Servant who must face suffering (Isaiah 53) in order to liberate Israel (Isaiah 54). This parallel allows for the interpretation of his Passion (announced in a passage close to the account of the transfiguration in Mt 17:22–23; Mk 9:31; Lk 9:44) and Resurrection* as a manifestation of the love of God.

3. Letters of Paul

For Paul, “the love of God in Christ Jesus our Lord” (Rom 8:39) is not so much an object of teaching or preaching as a mystery* “which surpasses knowledge” (Eph 3:19). We do not participate in this love by conforming to precepts, no matter how legitimate and useful they may be, but by giving ourselves over to the Holy* Spirit, whose fruit is love (Gal 5:22).

a) The Event of Love in Christ. In fact it is in the very event of Christ's coming, his death and Resurrection that love radiates and gives itself to be seen by those whose eyes have been opened by the Spirit. It is no longer a matter of the sign of God's love but of its absolute advent. God not only sent the Liberator to save his people, he delivered (both gave to the world and abandoned into the hands of sinners) his own Chosen One. The Son offered by the Father* offers himself in turn. He abandons himself, renounces himself to the point of dying on the cross (Phil 2:7–8; Rom 5:8). Love is the condition, the meaning, and the fruit of this sacrifice*, which is the decisive event of the passage from the old to the new for the world, for the Jewish people, for all humanity (Eph 2:15, 4:22; 2 Cor 5:17; Col 3:9).

b) Theological Virtue. By the Spirit we participate in the death of Christ and so are introduced into the mystery of his life (Rom 6:8–11). We cannot think of our death in Christ without being incited by love (2 Cor 5:14), because sacrifice* inspires love. This spiritual life* in communion* with Christ rests on a bringing together so that now “faith*, hope*, and love abide” (1 Cor 13:13). These are known as the “theological virtues*” because in their diversity and complementarity they structure the constitution of human beings in their relation to God. It is as an element of that structure that love becomes charity: the Vulgate, which translates agapè as dilectio, uses the term charitas in the letters of Paul. However, the term charity, which came to mean compassionate beneficence in French (charité), may be preferable to love, despite the theological usage. Love exists only in its relation to the other two virtues, and is often named together with them (1 Thes 1:3, 5:8; 2 Thes 1:3; 1 Cor 13:7; Gal 5:6; Rom 5:1–5, 12:6–12; Col 1:4 f.; Eph 1:15–18, 4:2–5; 1 Tm 6:11; Ti 2:2); faith brings us to discover love in God, which in turn is diffused in the heart of the believer and expands his or her faith to the dimension of hope, which is confidence in the love of God already manifest in its fullness (Rom 8:35–39).

c) Primacy of Love. But the greatest of the three virtues is love, (1 Cor 13:13; Col 3:14) not because faith represents an imperfect certainty, but because it is by love that we believe and hope (1 Cor 13:7; Rom 5:5). Love is the source of all values. Generosity, the gifts of the Spirit, liberty*, respect for the law, all of these have value only because they derive from love and produce love (1 Cor 13:1 ff.; Gal 5:14; Rom 13:8 ff.). Not only does love communicate life, it is life.

4. The Johannine Texts

The Gospel* of John is the gospel of love. Jesus came into this world to bear witness to the love of the Father for Jesus himself (3:35, 10:17) and for all human beings (3:16).

a) A New Commandment. Jesus gives his disciples a new commandment of love: “that you love one another just as I have loved you” (Jn 13:34). The measure of love that one must give to others is no longer the love one bears for oneself, as in Leviticus 19:18. The radical exigency of love consists of giving what one does not have, being for the other as Christ was for his disciples. This is possible only if the Spirit (Jn 14:16, Jn 26) creates new human potentialities. Moreover, the reciprocity of this love (each other) supposes a community of those who love in Christ (Jn 17:20).

b) Trinitarian Love. The love which human beings have for one another should be a reflection of the love of Christ for them because the source of this love is the Son’s love for the Father (Jn 15:9) as expressed in the priestly prayer* (17:1–26). The Son offers himself out of love for his Father, but he knows that the sacrifice to which he consents demands in return the same love from his Father. At the time of the Passion it is love that unites the Father and Son (17:10, 17:21). Love manifests the Trinitarian dimension of God; it is, strictly speaking, the Spirit.

c) “God Is Love” (1 John 4:8). This statement, which decisively brings together the entire revelation, is not a deification of love (which would have a purely anthropological import), nor a simple evocation of a loving God. God is not a loving ego, he is the very event of love such as it is manifested in the Passion and the Resurrection. God did not keep the beloved for himself: he gave him, and thus included the world itself in his love. In loving Jesus all the way to the cross, he loved humanity like his Son and introduced humanity into his mystery, so that, abiding in his love, it pursues his works.

III. Developments

1. Love of Self and Love of God

a) Saint Augustine* (De civitate dei XIV, 28) radicalized the opposition between love of self and love of God, which are at the origin of the two cities, the earthly city (born of “love of self unto contempt for God”) and the heavenly city (born of “love of God unto contempt for self”). In The Confessions he describes the spiritual journey of one who has renounced a vain love oriented toward pleasure (III, 1) for an ever greater love of God (XIII, 8).

b) This opposition is an essential theme of Protestant* doctrine, which perceives only one rupture between the order of grace* and the order of nature*. Luther* (thesis 28 of the Heidelberg dispute, April 1518, WA 1, 365) criticizes the love that consents to go out toward an object only to the extent that it recognizes a value, in other words, where it expects satisfaction in exchange. The love of God for man is totally gratuitous because it is not conditioned by the certainty of being accepted. It is pure gift.

c) Eros and Agape. Taking an even more severe position within this Protestant tradition, A. Nygren states the radical difference between love that comes from God (agape) and purely human love (Eros). The romantic exaltation of love is a form of self-complacency, a deification of the human that leads to self-destruction and death (Tristan and Isolde). Agape, on the other hand, is received as a grace in filial obedience.

But however relevant the opposition between amor hominis and amor Dei, it can hardly be validated by the terminological opposition between eros and agape. Eros cannot be reduced to the search for satisfaction; as Plato reminds us. True Eros consists in giving one’s life for those one loves (Banquet 179 b Sq). And it is not out of the question that love for God can also take the form of Eros. Nonetheless, Nygren rendered service to contemporary theology in proving untenable the contradiction between Eros and agape, thus giving contradictors the opportunity to suggest more precise topologies and more subtle conceptualizations (D’Arcy 1945; Lotz 1971).

d) Eros More Divine. Dionysius* the Pseudo-Areopagite (Divine Names IV, 12) went so far as to assert that “Eros is a term more worthy of God than agape.” Thomas Aquinas took the idea and made it his own (ST Ia IIae, q. 26, a. 3), arguing that the attraction exerted by God and passively endured by man in love (amor = eros) is stronger than the motives man draws from his own reason*. Love can indeed be motivated by concupiscence (when we seek satisfaction for ourselves) but this does not preclude the existence of a “love of friendship,” where the object is loved for itself and the lover wishes its good (ST Ia IIae, q. 26, a. 4).

e) Self-Love out of Charity. While self-love that deflects the subject from alterity and keeps him from loving God and his fellow human being is the source of sin*, love of God, charity, commands a form of self-love (ST IIa IIae, q. 25, a. 4). After loving God for love of self, man “loves himself for God alone” (Bernard* of Clairvaux, Traité de l’amour de Dieu, chaps. VIII-X [Treatise on the love of God]). Sinners do not really love themselves, because they mistake what is truly for their own good; the good do love themselves because they want to conserve the inner person in its integrity (ST IIa IIae, q. 25, a. 7; see I 4 b above).

2. Mystical Love

a) Ecstasy. If the furthest extreme of love is the void it produces, the self-dispossession, then Eros is indeed its most divine manifestation. Eros is in itself a kenosis* in that the lover must abandon the images he has drawn over his personality, and reveal himself in his nakedness. If I am nothing without you I have to go through this nothing in order to reach you. The asceticism* of destitution, pushed in this way to the extreme of nothing, characterizes both mysticism and eroticism. The common error is that of thinking of mysticism, like eroticism, in terms of union and possession, whereas their common ecstasy is separation from self, dispossession. To intoxicate oneself with divine love is to “forget oneself,” “hold oneself for nothing more than a discarded vase,” “in a way, to lose oneself as if one did not exist any more, to lose the feeling of self and be emptied of oneself, almost canceled out” (Bernard of Clairvaux, Traité de l’amour de Dieu X, 27).

b) Indifference to One’s Own Happiness. What is reduced to nothing in the ego is the will, inasmuch as it seeks satisfaction. To this end it must renounce all objects, renounce all desire. In the Song of Songs passion is put to the test of the night (Sg 3:1–3). One wanders without finding anything, the beloved escapes, the Lovable does not let itself be confused with phantoms. “Charity . . . makes a void of all things in the will, seeing that it makes us love God over all things?” (John of the Cross, Ascent to Carmel II, 6). The soul* “totally destitute, desiring nothing” (ibid. II, 7) is in imitation* of Christ, who at the moment of his death was “annihilated and reduced as to nothing” (ibid.). This passage through death is the affirmation of life, because death was vanquished in death by love: “Oh death amorously vital, oh love vitally mortal!” (François de Sales, Traité de l’amour de Dieu VII, XIII). Fire is simultaneously the erotic and the spiritual metaphor of this vivification in annihilation (see the liturgy* of Pentecost: Et tui amoris in eis ignem accende; John of the Cross, Vive flamme d’amour, stanza II, verse 1).

Once the will is liberated of all self-interest, all expectation of personal happiness, the soul experiences “pure love,” “without the mixture of any motive other than that of loving, solely in itself, the sovereign beauty of God” (Fénelon, Explication des maximes des saints [Explanation of the maxims of the saints], Art. II). God’s love for us being both source and end of our love for him, our love is a reflection of its gratuitous origin. Consequently, love for God cannot be conditioned by the expectation of happiness, even that of salvation*. This is love experienced in a historical present where the individual simultaneously exists in the element of hope (major lesson to be drawn from the quietist crisis), and this is quite different.

To construe hope as primarily a logic of interest is a fundamental misunderstanding. Hope is that relation to the future in which the promises* of God are engaged, and these promises (and all they imply in terms of anticipated realization, centered on the Resurrection of Jesus) bring forth the action of graces and love on the part of the believer. “Pure love,” correctly understood, is lived in the fullness of a theological experience. Perhaps it must be said that hope is lived in that experience as a truly “erotic” transcendence toward God. And perhaps that transcendence is the secret of all hope, a secret that would let hope be not just a way of being-in-time but also being eternally.

c) Absence As a Mode of Presence. Pure love accomplishes the precept of virtuous friendship: “love the friend for himself” (see I 4 a above). But Christianity introduced a radical difference: when the friend is God, the intimacy, the “living together” that is the act of love and source of pleasure, is a mode of presence characterized by infinite distance. The closer God comes to human beings in his love, the more he makes felt his inaccessible grandeur. “When he loves, all the actions of his love are infinite. He comes down from heaven to earth to look for the creature of clay that he loves, he makes himself man and clay with him, he gives his flesh to be eaten. Such are the prodigious feats of love by which the infinite* surpasses all affection of which men are capable. He loves in God, and nothing is incomprehensible in this love” (Fénelon, Lettres et opuscules spirituels XXXI). Claudel describes an “essential absence” that unites the lovers in presence itself (Le soulier de satin, Ive journée, sc. VIII).

3. Ethics of Love

a) Principles of Moral Virtues. Pure love has been criticized (by Bossuet) because the disinterestedness of love, the abandon, the state of prayer may plunge the will into indifference, leading it to forget good and evil* and enter into a state of passivity that could turn it away from action. The other extreme is a busy involvement in what is useful, to the extent that the quest for meaning is forgotten. Authentic love is in itself ethical because it is the rectitude of the heart, the virtue that commands man to the good. That is why it is “the principle of all good deeds,” and all the moral virtues are enclosed in it.

b) Law of Love. A work cannot be said to be good if it is not accomplished by love. Conversely, all that is done by love accomplishes the law (Rom 13:8). There is no need to fear that love might be mistaken in its conduct or remain idle in the face of a suffering person. The Christian is liberated by love from all external prescription that does not flow from an internal movement of the will (Rom 7:1–7). Ama et fac quod vis. But this liberty is not license, precisely because it is conditioned by a love whose demands are superior to those of the ancient law. Love institutes a new law (ST Ia IIae, q. 107, a. 2, resp.), which is not written but rather introduced into the heart by grace (ST Ia IIae, q. 106, a. 3).

c) Love and Respect. It is common practice to oppose the rigorism of Kantian moral law to this ethic of love. Kant* does in fact warn against a morality derived from the love of men. Because this love cannot “be commanded,” moral action would be abandoned to the arbitrariness of each individual’s subjective dispositions, which ruins duty in its principle (Critique of Practical Reason, AA t. V, 83). But this love is definitely not the love of which Scripture speaks: it is a pathological love, a philanthropy that operates, or does not, according to passing moods. However, Kant admits a practical love (ibid.) that is “good will” put to the accomplishment of duty. It remains the case, however, that this love itself cannot be the principle of duty; it is simply an ideal that completes the duty. The discipline of the law then remains the only standard. Duty toward one’s fellow man is not the consequence of love for him, but of respect, and is primarily addressed to the law. Nevertheless, morality is not confused with legalism, that is, a purely external conformity with prescriptions. The common point between respect and love is that neither is subordinate to the principle of personal happiness, and therefore they are not conditioned either by hope for advantages or fear of punishment. The law, like pure love, demands that the will void itself of all objects (or matter).

4. Conclusion

It is always possible to explain the ecstatic dimension of love as a ruse of self-love, to explain mystical love as a sublimation of the sexual instinct, and annihilation before the other as delectation in oneself, as if love were nothing but a cultural valorization of self-satisfaction, self-esteem, vanity (La Rochefoucauld). It is true that the flame that consumes is in itself a purely subjective mode of experience. For love to be truly distinct from egoism the other must exist and precede me by his love. There is no love without revelation of the other. But how can we be reassured without falling into the aporias of subjective confinement? Here, whatever form it takes, love demands that we resolve its ambiguity and make a decision: it is for the will to say what love is. Consequently, the general definition of love supposes a form of generosity: we have to give it credit and consent to absence as an essential mode of being*. This is the confidence of the lover who by oath gives infinite sense to the finitude of his emotions; the confidence of the Socratic philosopher who desires thought within the heart of nonknowledge; the confidence of the believer who accepts to be loved by someone he does not see.

- P. Rousselot (1908), Pour l'histoire du problème de l'amour au Moyen Age, Münster (repr. Paris, 1933; 3rd Ed. 1981).
- H. Arendt (1929), Der Liebesbegriff bei Augustin, Berlin.
- H. Scholz (1929), Eros und Caritas, Halle.
- A. Nygren (1930, 1936), Eros och Agape, 2 vols., Stockholm.
- G. Quell, E. Stauffer (1933), “Agapaō . . .,” ThWNT 1, 20–55.
- L. Robin (1933), La théorie platonicienne de l'amour, Paris.
- É. Gilson (1934), La théologie mystique de saint Bernard, Paris.
- D. de Rougemont (1938), L'amour et l'Occident, Paris (Rev. Ed. 1954).
- M. C. D'Arcy (1945), The Mind and Heart of Love—Lion and Unicorn: A Study of Eros and Agape, London.
- L.-B. Geiger (1952), Le problème de l'amour chez saint Thomas d'Aquin, Montréal-Paris.
- G. Bataille (1957), L'érotisme, Paris.
- C. Spicq (1958–59), Agapè dans le Nouveau Testament, 3 vols., Paris.
- C. S. Lewis (1960), The Four Loves, London.
- M. Lot-Borodine (1961), De l'amour profane à l'amour sacré, Paris.
- H. U. von Balthasar (1963), Glaubhaft ist nur Liebe, Einsiedeln.
- E. Levinas (1964), Totalité et infini, The Hague.
- V. Jankélévitch (1970), Traité des vertus, vol. 2: Les vertus et l'amour, Paris.
- I. Murdoch (1970), The Sovereignty of Good, London.
- J. B. Lotz (1971), Die drei Stufen der Liebe, Frankfurt.
- J. Pieper (1972), Über die Liebe, 3rd Ed., Munich.
- G. Wallis, et al. (1973), “Ahab,” ThWAT 1, 105–28.
- B. Welte (1973), Dialektik der Liebe, Frankfurt.
- H. Kuhn (1975), “Liebe”: Geschichte eines Begriffs, Munich.
- E. Jüngel (1977), Gott als Geheimnis der Welt, Tübingen, 430–70.
- J. Leclercq (1979), Monks and Love in Twelfth-Century France, Oxford.
- L. A. Blum (1980), Friendship, Altruism and Morality, London.
- J. Macquarrie (1982), “Love,” In Search of Humanity, London, 172–86.
- C. Yannaras (1982), Person und Eros, FSÖTh 44.
- J.-L. Marion (1986), Prolégomènes à la charité, Paris.

- J.-L. Chrétien (1990), "Le regard de l'amitié," La voix nue: Phénoménologie de la promesse, Paris, 209–24.
 P. Gerlitz, et al. (1991), "Liebe," TRE 21, 121–91.
 J. Derrida (1994), Politiques de l'amitié, Paris.
 T. De Koninck (1995), "L'amitié," De la dignité humaine, Paris, 203–22.
 M. Adam (1996), "Amour de soi," DEPhM, 45–51.
 M. Canto-Sperber (1996), "Amour," ibid., 33–45.

- A. Petit (1996), "Amitié," ibid., 27–32.
 J.-L. Marion (1997), Étant donné: Essai d'une phénoménologie de la donation, Paris.
 P. Barmann (1998), Das Gebot und die Tugend der Liebe, Stuttgart.

YVES-JEAN HARDER

See also Communion; Faith; Hope; Trinity

Lubac, Henri Sonier de

1896–1991

a) Life. Born in Cambrai on 20 February 1896, Henri de Lubac became a novice in the Society of Jesus in 1913. Between 1915 and 1917 his Jesuit training was interrupted by the First World War, in which he received head wounds. During the first half of 1920, while he was in Canterbury undergoing the six months of training known as the juvenat, he became "entranced" by Saint Augustine's Confessions and by the last three books of Irenaeus's Adversus Haereses. There he also read, "in a state of wonderment," the article "Jésus Christ" by L. de Grandmaison (1868–1927) and the thesis "L'Intellectualisme de Saint Thomas" by P. Rousselot (1878–1915). From 1920 to 1923 he completed his required philosophy* studies on the Island of Jersey where he formed firm friendships with C. Nicolet (1897–1961), G. Fessard (1897–1978), Y. de Montcheuil (1899–1944), A. Valensin (1879–1953), and P. Teilhard de Chardin (1881–1955). A dozen years after Pius X's condemnation of modernism* (1907), which affected the intellectual climate in theological colleges, Lubac and his companions were forced to endure P. Descoqs's highly Suarezian* instruction. On the other hand, they enjoyed the courses taught by J. Maréchal (1878–1944). In 1922, in Aix-en-Provence and in the company of Auguste Valensin, Lubac met M. Blondel*, whose L'Action he had read in its 1899 edition. In 1924 he began his theological studies in Hastings, continuing them after 1926 at Fourvière. After his ordination as a priest in 1927 he began to teach fundamental theology at the Institut Catholique in Lyons in 1929. From 1931 on he also taught a course there on the history of religion.

On friendly terms with J. Monchanin (1895–1957), a priest in the diocese of Lyons who read Sanskrit and was preparing for a journey to India, Lubac independently studied Buddhism by studying the volumes held in the Musée Guimet. In 1935 he began an extra course on Buddhism at the Jesuit Faculty at Fourvière. He renewed his contacts with Teilhard, made the acquaintance of P. Claudel (1868–1955), and befriended H. U. von Balthasar*, a Jesuit and a theology student at Fourvière with Daniélou. In 1938, at the request of Y. Congar (1904–95), Lubac published his first book, Catholicism. In the early 1940s he stopped his courses at Fourvière and took a stand alongside P. Chaillet (1900–1972) and G. Fessard in a "spiritual war" against Nazism. In the Free Zone, the three of them created the Cahiers du témoignage chrétien.

Inspired by an idea of V. Fontoynt, he founded the collection Sources Chrétiennes (SC), for which J. Daniélou (1905–74) was the correspondent in the Occupied Zone. From 1924 on, at J. Huby's suggestion, Lubac began an investigation into the problem of the supernatural*, which was to challenge the then-current interpretation of Thomas* Aquinas's concept of "pure nature." E. Gilson (1884–1978) would confirm this topic's "centrality." Lubac's Le Surnaturel (The Supernatural) was published in 1946 and would soon become the subject of a polemic linked to the debate over the "new theology." In 1947 Lubac was appointed group leader of the periodical Recherches de sciences religieuses (Studies in religious sciences), but in 1950, in the wave of Roman suspicion that displaced several French theologians, he was relieved of this post as well as of his chair at the Institut Catholique.

Lubac took advantage of the health problems that followed his war wound to read in Migne's folio editions all the ancient and modern authors who interested him. He became a great expert on the medieval Latin writers and tried to elucidate the caesura of the Renaissance. Having already written a book in 1950 on Origen's understanding of the Scriptures, between 1959 and 1964 he published his Exégèse médiévale, whose importance for recent developments in hermeneutics* has been acknowledged by P. Ricoeur.

When it appeared in 1953 (although it was made up of texts written before 1950), Lubac's Méditation sur l'Église (Meditations on the Church) played somewhat the same role in his life as the Apologia had done in Newman's. In August 1960 John XXIII completed Lubac's rehabilitation by calling on him to become, together with Congar, a consultant to the theological commission that was doing preparatory work for Vatican* II. Although this labor initially caused him some unease, Lubac was to become one of the most respected experts at the council*. After it was over, it pained him to notice a certain breach of trust that only accentuated his own solitude, even within the Society of Jesus. He upheld the Communio enterprise and drew up several commentaries on the Vatican II documents Dei Verbum, Gaudium et Spes, and Lumen Gentium. But above all he pursued wide-ranging research, as witnessed by his publication in 1979 and 1981 of the two volumes of La Postérité spirituelle de Joachim de Flore (The Spiritual Heirs of Joachim de Flore), in which he criticized the eschatological utopia. Pope John Paul II elevated him to the rank of Cardinal in 1983. Lubac died on 4 September 1991.

b) Aspects of Lubac's Complete Works. Although several of Lubac's writings might be regarded as "occasional theologies," to use Lubac's own phrase, Balthasar was correct in saying that he is the author of an "organic body of work." Moreover, his early Catholicism supplied most of the themes he would later tackle. In the above work he shows the social, historical, and inner character of Christian dogma*. By means of a method that has become famous, his expositions are peppered with quotations drawn from the inexhaustible wealth of a tradition* in which the author felt at home. He has the style of a writer and his reflections respond to the needs of the time. In both tone and content he disconcerts those readers accustomed to textbook-style theses.

In his Corpus Mysticum: Essai sur l'Eucharistie et L'Église au Moyen Age (Corpus Mysticum: An Essay on the Eucharist and the Church in the Middle Ages) Lubac demonstrates that until the middle of the 12th century the expression corpus mysticum (mystical body) was applied exclusively to the Eucharist*. Its later application to the Church makes the sacramental realism (sacrament*) of the Pauline doctrine of Christ*'s body all the more evident. This was the source of the famous definitions that Lubac's Méditation sur l'Église would expand: "The Church creates the Eucharist... the Eucharist creates the Church." Behind the historian of dogma could already be glimpsed one of the forces inspiring Vatican II's ecclesiology*. All the same, it was thanks above all to his Supernatural (1946) that Lubac was to profoundly change the field of theology. Battling with the critics, he would supply, with his Le mystère du surnaturel (1965) his most polished synthesis on the subject.

Lubac had to rediscover the deep meaning of Thomas Aquinas's texts by going back through four centuries of Thomist commentaries, all of which had been based on a misinterpretation by Cajetan (1468–1533) that had subsequently been passed on by Suarez. According to these authors, Thomas Aquinas was supposed to have defended the idea of a finality proper to man according to nature*, and to which his supernatural finality had been appended. From this derived a theology that, by allowing a "separate philosophy" to deal with everything that had to do with the life and history of man, confined itself to speaking only about the extrinsic fringes of that reality.

Even if, as he confessed, other problems had caused him more toil (especially those involving the history of religions), it is indeed in the natural desire for God, innate in man created (creation*) in his image*, that the guiding thread to all Lubac's works should be sought. Such is the "paradox" of man, a spiritual but finite creature whose unique finality is supernatural. "Whence comes his sort of lurching gait, his mysterious limping, which is not only the lameness of sin*, but primarily and more radically that of a creature created out of nothing, who, strangely, approaches God" (Mystère du surnaturel 149). Lubac's truly humanist feelings are revealed in many works that find in that "paradox" the essential key to understanding. Pic de La Mirandole (1974) is a model of the type. Lubac's enterprise, in conjunction with works by Rahner*, Balthasar, M.-D. Chenu (1895–1990), Y. Congar, and others, allowed theology to return from an "exile" that had forbidden it all contact with living thought. He himself confronted that thought through the "Western atheism*" of P. J. Proudhon (1809–65), Marx*, and A. Comte (1798–1857) (Le drame de l'humanisme athée, first published in 1944, went through seven editions during Lubac's lifetime) as well as through "Eastern atheism," and particularly through Buddhism. Lubac's specific contributions to the Christian intellectual current of his own century can be summarized as a theology of the call that opens onto the mystery* of the Church as convocatio and as congregatio.

c) “New Theology.” Under this term, used for the first time in the Osservatore romano by P. Parente, the representatives of neo-Thomist orthodoxy fustigated everything to do with efforts to change theology in postwar France. M.D. Chenu’s little book, Une École de théologie: Le Saulchoir (1937) was the first to be put on the Index for having dared to make an appeal for theology’s practical function as opposed to the hypertrophy of its speculative function. The controversy flared up again with an article by Daniélou in Les Études of April 1846, “Les orientations présentes de la pensée religieuse” (Current directions in religious thought). There Daniélou boldly advocated a return to the sources of Christian thought, scriptural, patristic, and liturgical (Fathers* of the Church, liturgy*), in order to enable it to make contact again with contemporary thought. M. Labourdette answered him in La Revue thomiste, an answer that in turn received an immediate response in Le Bulletin de l’Angelicum in R. Garrigou-Lagrange’s (1877–1964) “La nouvelle théologie: Où va-t-elle?” (Where is the new theology going?). The latter attacked in particular a book by a young companion of L.H. Bouillard, Conversion et grâce chez Thomas d’Aquin (1944). Following in the footsteps of Garrigou-Lagrange, the Dominicans of Saint-Maximin claimed to be defending the Thomist notion of grace* and attacked the investigative methods of the Jesuits of Fourvière. B. de Solages, dean of the Institut Catholique of Toulouse, came to the defense of the latter for “the honor of theology.”

Already suspect, Lubac was soon at the center of a polemic because of an article in Recherches de science religieuse (1948) devoted to the question of the development of dogma (Newman*). C. Boyer, dean of the Gregorian University, could not rest until he and Garrigou-Lagrange had obtained the condemnation of a mythical “School of Fourvière,” of which Lubac was supposed to be the leader. As early as 19 September 1946 Lubac had managed to get the “new theology” mentioned negatively by Pius XII himself in a speech at the close of a General Congregation of the Jesuits. The encyclical Humani Generis (1951), although it attacked no one directly, was considered a victory by the conservative wing and brought a temporary halt to the renewal of theology.

Although the “new theology” can today be viewed as a “chimera from a fable,” in line with Y. Congar’s retrospective judgment, the debate of the years 1938–50 is perhaps not definitively over. During that period, the adversaries of renewal, moved by their antimodernist phobia, were wrong to scent doctrinal relativism* everywhere. By their recourse to the “symbolic theology” of the Fathers, the supporters of renewal were, on the contrary, right to refuse to restrict themselves to a “theology of conclusions” that paid no attention to the historical aspect of dogma. But according to Guardini’s observation, dogma will always be like “an arc flashing between two poles.” A rigorous effort must therefore be made so as to be able to distinguish an authentic development from its corruptions. Besides, scholarship cannot do without a sense of Christian mysticism* or personal contact with the great spiritual traditions. Lubac’s works bequeath us an extraordinary testament to that fact.

- K.-H. Neufeld, M. Sales (1974), Bibliographie Henri de Lubac, 1925–1974, Einsiedeln.
- For 1974–89, see H. de Lubac (1990), Théologie dans l’histoire II, 408–20, Paris, and Com(F) (1992), 1715, 133–7.
- H. U. von Balthasar (1976), Henri de Lubac: Sein organisches Lebenswerk, Einsiedeln.
- H. de Lubac (1985), Entretien autour de Vatican II, Paris.
- H. de Lubac (1989), Mémoire sur l’occasion de mes écrits, Namur.
- E. Guerriero (Ed.) (1991–), Henri de Lubac, Opera Omnia, Milan. OCC (1998–), Paris, 57 vols. planned.
- ♦ M. Figura (1979), Der Anruf der Gnade: Über die Beziehung des Menschen zu Gott nach Henri de Lubac, Einsiedeln.
- E. Maier (1979), Einigung der Welt in Gott: Das Katholische bei Henri de Lubac, Einsiedeln.
- H. U. von Balthasar, G. Chantraine (1983), Le cardinal Henri de Lubac: L’homme et l’œuvre, Paris.
- A. Russo (1990), Henri de Lubac: Teologia e dogma nella storia: L’influsso di Blondel, Rome.
- R. B. Martinez (1991), La teologia del sobrenatural en los escritos de Henri de Lubac, Burgos.
- B. Sesboüé (1992), “Le surnaturel chez Henri de Lubac,” RSR 80, 373–408.
- O. de Berranger (1994), “Des paradoxes au Mystère chez J.H. Newman et H. de Lubac,” RSPHTh 78, 45–79.
- A. Russo (1994), Henri de Lubac, Paris.
- R. Winling (1994), “Nouvelle théologie,” TRE 24, 668–75.
- Coll. (1995), Henri de Lubac et la philosophie, EPh 161–267.
- A. Vanneste (1996), Nature et grâce dans la théologie occidentale: Dialogue avec H. de Lubac, Louvain.
- F. Inciarte (1999), “Natur und Übernatur: Ihr Verhältnis nach Henri de Lubac,” ThPh 74, 70–83.

OLIVIER DE BERRANGER

See also Aristotelianism, Christian; Balthasar, Hans Urs von; Blondel, Maurice; Dogma; Fathers of the Church; History; Humanism, Christian; Newman, John Henry; Nietzsche, Friedrich Wilhelm; Philosophy; Spirituality, Ignatian; Supernatural; Thomism

Lulle, Raymond. See Positive Theology

Luther, Martin

1483–1546

Martin Luther was the initiator of a vast religious movement known as the Reformation, the ecclesiastical, cultural, and political consequences of which can still be felt to this day.

a) Education. After studying at the faculty of arts at the University of Erfurt in 1505, Luther entered the convent of Augustinian hermits. There he experienced an inner crisis: he was haunted by a Christ* perceived above all as a judge and underwent the experience* of the permanence of sin* and the impossibility of producing proof of a perfect obedience to God* that might enable him to subsist before him.

During his studies at the faculty of arts and then of theology*, Luther was confronted with the via moderna and with nominalism* represented by Gabriel Biel (†1495), who had himself been inspired by the ideas of William Ockham (†1349), John Duns* Scotus, and the earlier Franciscan tradition (Bonaventure*). Through its conception of God not as a Supreme Being* but as will, through its insistence upon revelation* as the sole source of his knowledge*, through its criticism of the use of Aristotle in theology and, in form more than in content, through its concept of salvation*, this movement had a lasting influence on Luther. He was also influenced by Saint Augustine*, particularly by his anti-Pelagian treatises, and this would lead Luther to campaign vigorously against the idea that man can, through his own efforts, prepare to receive grace*. (According to Lortz, Luther's Augustinianism* enabled him, by criticizing nominalism, to overcome "a Catholicism* that was not Catholic" but neo-Pelagian. But Ockhamism was never condemned by the magisterium*, and Luther's attacks were such that they encompassed all of Scholasticism* in one reprobation.)

German mysticism* also played a role in Luther's intellectual development. Like Tauler, Luther located the root of sin in will and self-affirmation; and in his insistence upon humiliation he expanded upon Tauler's discourse on the ad nihil reduction—that is, on the annihilation of man. Luther's readings were always selective, not exempt from misunderstandings, and sensitive to convergences before they discovered differences. If, like Augustine, Luther spoke of sin as the true corruption of man, in fact he went even further. After conversion*, he contended, there subsists in man more than a "remnant" of weakness. Sin, according to Luther, is a reality that is permanently present in human will itself. As for grace, which Augustine considered to be an innate gift conferring upon man new strength and qualities, Luther saw it rather as an attitude of God. Moreover, Augustine's Neoplatonism is absent from Luther's ideas, with the exception of a few references in the first lecture on the Psalms*. As for German mysticism, Luther followed neither its speculative orientation nor its concept of man deemed capable "in the fine point of his soul*" of apprehending God.

Humanism* no doubt had a greater impact upon Luther than is generally admitted, given his confrontation with Erasmus*. Proof of this is to be found in the preference given to the Fathers* of the Church regarding the later tradition*, Luther's aversion for Scholastic theology, the importance given to the Bible*, the critical examination of the texts, the use of ancient authors, and the influence of humanist rhetoric.

b) At the Heart of Luther's Interpretation: Holy Scripture. In his first lecture on the Psalms (1513–15), Luther interprets the text according to the traditional schema of the four senses of Scripture, but new interpretations were developing. In opposition to the medieval exegete Nicolas de Lyre, who vouched only for a literal sense, Luther resorts to a literal-prophetic sense to explain the Psalms. Moreover, he refines the tropological sense by establishing a link between the biblical text and the existence of the believer—whatever is said of Christ is applied to Christians. The faithful therefore appropriate Christ—his life, his work, and his death. The schema of the four senses would be abandoned with the Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans (1515–16); allegory would never totally disappear, but Luther thereafter concentrated on the literal sense. Especially when controversy arose, only the literal sense carried authority in Luther's opinion. He would not limit himself, however, to a purely philological commentary, but always sought out the fundamental idea of the text, the “scopus” in relation to the actual situation of the faithful. The interpretation of Scripture is set within a broader perspective, as a function of the message of salvation clearly proclaimed in the Letter to the Romans. The love* of God is revealed through Jesus Christ; because of Christ, God awards grace to the sinner, independently of his works* and merits. From that moment, Jesus Christ becomes, as Savior, the key to a global interpretation of the books in the Bible. He is the center of Scripture, “its mathematical point” (WA, TR 2, no. 2383).

When the experience of “seeing the gospel” was challenged by the ecclesiastical authorities, Luther proclaimed that the primary authority* lay within Scripture, and denied that in its interpretation the last word should be granted to the magisterium. Scripture is sufficiently clear, in his opinion, to be understood by all Christians. It is not the book* as such that is the Word* of God. Scripture is, in fact, a “good shout” before being a text. It is a living message, first entrusted to the apostles*, then handed down through the ages, but it always refers back to the apostolic message. To be sure, when confronted with heretical distortions of preaching* one had to have recourse to what was written, and the written word also comprised a sort of counterweight to the ministers, allowing the faithful to maintain a critical distance toward those ministers. Luther affirms that “Scripture provides its own interpretation” (WA 10, III, 238, 10). This principle was in opposition both to Rome*, which granted too much power to the magisterium, and to various spiritualists, who sought to include the Spirit. The Spirit comes to readers through Scripture, and not from outside Scripture. Luther also emphasizes the clarity of Scripture: ordered in relation to the center that was Jesus Christ, it suffices to inform man of what needs to be known of God and of salvation. Traditional ecclesiastical customs can certainly be maintained if they do not contravene the biblical message; and the doctrinal and dogmatic tradition of the ancient church will be useful, as a secondary authority, in helping one to read the Scripture.

c) God's Justice. In his lecture on the Letter to the Romans and in various theses, Luther attacks the concept of man in which man sees himself as an autonomous subject called on to produce a certain number of acts in order to fulfill himself as a person*. When Luther speaks of sin, he does not mean a moral shortcoming, but more radically a human tendency to affirm oneself in the sight of God, to wish to live according to one's own justice* and not that which God wants to deliver; through his criticism, a vision of original man would be born, in which the founding instant was a relation to an exterior reality, Christ. (See, in particular, the commentaries on the Magnificat of 1521 and the theses on man from 1536.)

Scholastic theologians, according to Luther, did not really think through the idea of sin and man as sinner; they merely added the need to obtain help from a supernatural source—grace, that is, which insofar as it is innate has become an inherent quality of the soul, “like the whiteness of a wall,” according to Luther's critical expression. However, in Luther's view the will of the sinner is strictly incapable of accomplishing acts that lead to the attribution of grace, and grace cannot become a quality of the soul. (Luther rejects the concept of “habitual” grace.) Only a new relation to God brought on by his Word of pardon can make man just in the sight of God and capable of accomplishing just deeds. The justification* of man by faith* does not depend on qualities or accomplishments peculiar to man, for one, nor is it acquired once and for all, by virtue of the permanence of sin. Christians, according to Luther, will be both sinners and penitents by virtue of what they are in themselves, and they will become just through the divine pardon imputed upon them through the justice of Christ.

But although Luther criticizes the Ockhamist idea that justification occurs when God extends his grace as a new quality to those who “do what is within their power,” is this not nevertheless bound to another Ockhamist concept, which posits that man might be just because God, in his potentia absoluta, would accept him as such outside of any infusion of grace, through a simple imputation of justice? The objection is not exact, for the Lutheran concept of imputation does not base salvation on divine omnipotence* alone, but on the accomplishment of the law* through Jesus Christ and his merits. To the abstract sense of the Ockhamist imputation Luther opposes his principle of the propter Christum, “because of Christ.” In later autobiographical texts, Luther evoked what was for him the liberating discovery of the exact meaning of Paul's characterization of the gospel as "the power of God for salvation to every one who has faith" (Rom 1:17). This is when he understood that the issue was not the punishing justice of the God, who aims at the works of man, but the (passive) justice by which the just live from the gift of God—that is, justice by faith (see in particular WA 54, 186, 8–9; the date of this liberating experience is debatable: either 1514–15 or the spring of 1518).

d) Conflict with Rome and the Question of Authority in the Church. The 95 theses against indulgences* that Luther wrote in October 1517 quickly made him known to the general public. For Luther, indulgences led to a deceptive sense of security: the faithful received them not only as a temporal penalty due for sin, imposed upon penitents after they had confessed their sins and received absolution, but also as a dispensation of authentic contrition and a guarantee of salvation. He also rejected the idea of a "treasure" constituted by the supererogatory merits of Christ and his saints, and which the church could dispose of as a sort of celestial bank account in order to give benefits to those faithful who were less well endowed in sanctity. The only treasure that the church can and must transmit is the Word of God. And as for indulgences, which Luther did not impugn as such, they encompassed only the canonical penalties imposed by the church on earth, and not the penalties of purgatory.

The question of indulgences led back to the pope*, evoked in over a third of Luther's theses. Was it not the pope who gave them authority? Luther did not set himself up as a revolutionary against traditional authority, but aimed to bring about a return to the standard of the Scripture. Referring to the 15th-century canonist Nicolas de Tudeschi, Luther affirmed as early as 1518 that "the pope, as well as the council*, can err" (WA 1, 656, 32)—and during the Leipzig Disputation, which would pit him against Johann Eck in 1519, Luther would say that the church had no need of a leader on earth, for Christ alone was its leader. When confronted by the pope's legate, Cardinal Cajetan, Luther refused to recant unless he were proven wrong by biblical arguments, and he affirmed that "truth* is master even over the pope" (WA 2, 18, 2). The debate with Cajetan also centered upon the certainty of salvation. According to Scholastic theology, it was only in the form of a conjecture that individual believers could affirm their salvation, when they managed to discern signs of Christian life in their existence: no one could know with certainty whether they were in a state of grace. However, according to Luther, salvation is granted to man from without, through the promise* of God, and this is the basis for certainty. It is only if a believer has the benefit of a personal certainty of salvation that a justifying grace can be of use to him during the absolution of sins.

e) Sacraments and the Church, Faith, and Works. In 1517–18 Luther published numerous treatises. Some, in German, were addressed to laymen; others, more technical and written in Latin, were instead intended for theologians. The most important were published in 1520: Von den guten Werken (Of Good Works), Von dem Bapstum zu Rome: Widder den hoch berumften Romanisten zu Leiptzck (On the Papacy at Rome: Against the Most Celebrated Romanist in Leipzig), An den christlichen Adel deutscher Nation (Appeal to the Christian Nobility of the German Nation), De captivitate Babylonica ecclesiae praeludium (A Prelude Concerning the Babylonish Captivity of the Church), and Von der Freiheit eines Christenmensche (Of the Liberty of a Christian Man).

In dealing with the question of the sacraments*, Luther emphasized that only the believer can make a salutary use of them. Thus he challenged the Scholastic distinction between sacraments of the Old Covenant*, which had effect only ex opere operantis—that is, on the basis of the faith of those who made use of them—and the sacraments of the New Covenant, which had effect simply by virtue of their celebration, ex opere operato—provided the faithful did not raise any obstacles thereto by consciously opposing an obex. But Luther placed an emphasis on the inner attitude—the opus operantis—of those who made use of the sacraments, with the understanding of course that faith itself was a work of God. Luther also reacted against the medieval tendency that led people to increase the importance of sacraments in relation to the importance of the Word that was preached, for Luther regarded the Word as a means of salvation: grace was communicated not only through the sacraments, but also through preaching.

Luther further reduced the number of sacraments to two: baptism* and the Eucharist*, which he viewed as the visible form of God's promise and the only sacraments possessing a biblical legitimacy. It was for that reason that he would fight against what he considered to be the principal error of the Roman Church: the error was neither the Communion under one species (even though the practice diverged from the biblical account of the institution of the Eucharist), nor was it the doctrine of transubstantiation (a useless Scholastic hypothesis), but the doctrine of the Mass as sacrifice* and as a deed of man offered to God, which prevented one from perceiving that there was a promise of God, the gospel calling for faith. Several liturgical consequences resulted from this theological presupposition, including the spoken recitation of the story of the institution and the suppression of masses destined for particular purposes—private masses or low masses in which the faithful did not participate.

The question of the Church was then inevitable. Excommunication from the Church of Rome, affirmed Luther, does not deprive the believer of communion* with the Church of Jesus Christ. The gift of grace is not linked solely to the sacraments bestowed by the Church of Rome. The pope, and the council, were capable of error; between priests* and laymen there was only a difference of function. Assertions of this nature called to question the traditional tripartite power of the Church of Rome (sanctification, magisterium, and jurisdiction*) in favor of the unique and exclusive power of the Word of God. The Church, according to Luther, is a communion of faith that extends to the entire earth and is not identified with the organism of the Church of Rome. It is not the fact of belonging to a visible community which makes one a Christian. The two types of Christianity could certainly not be dissociated, for they are linked as body and soul are linked. But where spiritual communion is concerned, Christianity has only one leader, Christ, for Christ alone can infuse faith. To be sure, Christ can use messengers, but strictly speaking he has no representative or vicar on earth. He communicates with mankind through the Gospels and the sacraments. When preaching, baptism, and Holy Communion are in keeping with the Gospels, the true Church is present.

What, then, is a Christian? The major criterion is faith, which Luther describes as trust, a connection to Christ, an attachment to the Word, something he opposes to a purely intellectual belief, to moralism, and to sentimentalism. Faith exists because God speaks: “The soul can do without everything except the Word of God” (WA 7, 22, 9–11). God’s Word reaches man in two forms, as a law and as the gospel. In Scripture there are texts whose purpose is to accuse man and make him aware of his sin (the Ten Commandments, e.g.); others, on the contrary, announce God’s pardon (the Gospels, therefore). Only this distinction can keep faith from moralism, by revealing man’s powerlessness on the one hand, and on the other, by emphasizing the miracle* of grace.

Attached by faith to God alone, Christians are supremely free, both with regard to the conditions in which they live and to the accusations brought by the law of God. They are free, too, to approach God directly, in trust. All believers, from this point of view, are priests. Sincere faith, however, must necessarily be proven by the good deeds that it will inform and direct.

These deeds are not addressed to God to obtain his grace, since salvation is granted freely to man; they are addressed to one’s neighbor, in conformity with the vocation, or call, that God entrusts to each man.

In June 1521 Rome ordered Luther to recant within 60 days. He asked to be convinced of his “errors” by means of scriptural arguments. On 3 January 1521 he was excommunicated. Authorized to appear before the Diet of Worms in April, he made his famous reply: “Unless I can be convinced through the testimony of the Scripture and through evident reason—for I believe in neither the infallibility of the pope nor in that of the councils, since it has been established that they have often made mistakes and contradicted themselves—I am bound by the biblical texts that I have mentioned. For as long as my conscience is the captive of God’s Word, I cannot and will not recant, for it is neither safe nor salutary to act against one’s conscience” (WA 7, 838, 3–8).

f) Pastor and Inspirer of Evangelical Churches. Luther’s influence began with his translation of the Bible. The New Testament was published in 1522, and the Old Testament was completed in 1534). The translations met with considerable success, continuing right up to the 20th century. Luther’s commentaries and preachings (some two thousand sermons have been preserved) have also played an important role, as has his advice for the establishment of an “evangelical” worship. In these writings, Luther asked that the weak be taken into consideration, and that before changes were introduced there be a convincing argument, and above all that a distinction be made between the necessary, the articles of faith, and the relative, something that had the right to vary according to the different liturgical usages and ecclesiastical structures*. In comparison with others, the first liturgical formularies that Luther published in 1523 were fairly conservative, even though they had been purified of anything that might suggest a sacrificial concept of the Mass.

Luther contributed to the development of liturgical music by composing 36 hymns, including the famous “Ein fester Burg ist unser Gott” (“A Mighty Fortress is Our God”). He was also aware very early on of the necessity of educating the young, particularly in faith (1529, Small and Larger Catechism).

After 1525 Luther asked the prince elector to act in the capacity of a “provisional bishop” (Notbischof) by undertaking an inspection of the parishes by jurists and theologians in order to bring some order to the pastoral cure and to solve financial problems. In this way the territorial church was born, where political authority would exercise a greater power than Luther had originally envisaged. It has often been supposed that Luther wanted a total separation of the religious domain and the sociopolitical domain; in fact, even though it was not up to the preachers themselves to establish new institutions or elaborate a political program, Luther considered that they must be vigilant, must remind those who governed of their duty, must instruct all the states in Christianity of “that which is useful and salutary,” and, when needed, must voice their criticism. The aim was to sharpen people’s consciences*, thus to address individuals, and to take a stand on the various institutions of society—schools (which must be promoted), systems of trade, marriage*, law*, and political institutions—to ensure that they served the concrete needs of mankind and conformed to the will of God.

Through his correspondence (2,650 letters in his own hand) and numerous occasional writings, Luther also practiced the cura animarum (cure of the soul), and gave pastoral directives, providing enlightenment on the attitude to be adopted in times of plague, taking up the defense of baptism for children, giving indications on prayer*, consoling or reprimanding, and giving counsel to those authorities who wished to introduce the Reformation.

g) Doctrinal Conflicts. The controversy with the theologians of the traditional church was unrelenting (see in particular Against Latomus, Reply to Ambrosius Catharinus, and the Articles of Schmalkalden). The polemic was above all about justification by faith, about the church and the sacraments, and about the papacy. In 1518 a doubt was born in Luther’s mind: since the pope established new articles of faith and did not want to conform to Scripture, perhaps he could—as an institution (not as a person)—be the Anti-Christ announced in 2 Thessalonians 2:3–4. Luther remained uncertain about this until 1521. Meanwhile, his struggle against the papacy grew increasingly bitter.

In 1522 controversies also arose opposing Luther to partners who had been close to him but who had become more radical, or more nuanced—Erasmus, for example. Thus, in the treatise De servo arbitrio (1525), Luther once again denied that the will of man could prepare him to receive grace and cooperate in his salvation. In everyday things man disposes of a certain amount of freedom of choice; but with regard to God or the realities that concern salvation or damnation, free will does not exist (WA 18, 638, 9–10).

Luther also set himself against those he qualified as “fanatics” (Schwärmer), and challenged the Old Testament justifications to which they resorted in order to remove images* from the churches (Karlstadt’s point of view) or to implement a sort of theocracy where the impious would be excluded (Thomas Münzer). Luther also stigmatized these “fanatics” for conduct that, in his opinion, led to an immediate experience of the Holy Spirit in a way that relativized the Bible and the Word preached. Finally, he reproached them for once again allowing themselves to be in thrall to the idea of justification through deeds, by making Christ an example to follow rather than the Savior proclaimed by the gospel of the justification by faith.

Between 1525 and 1529 Luther was in opposition to Zwingli* over the real presence of Christ in the Eucharist, in particular in That These Words of Christ “This Is My Body” Still Stand Firm against the Fanatics (1527) and the treatise, Confession of the Lord’s Supper (1528). Since Christ, from the time of his ascension, can no longer be present on earth in his humanity, argued Zwingli, Holy Communion has only a symbolic meaning. Luther refuted this affirmation by vigorously upholding the idea of real presence: the bread is the body of Christ. The ascension, in fact, did not shut Christ away in a given place, but placed him “above and in all creatures.” Luther referred to Ockhamist distinctions to assert that there exist several types of unity, and that there is one thinkable unity, a sacramental unity, between the bread and the wine of Holy Communion, on the one hand, and the body and blood of Christ on the other. Real presence, in his opinion, prolonged Incarnation*. It was Christ himself, in the way in which he brought about the work of redemption, who offered himself to the believer and thus founded his certainty. Along with the Word, this sacrament is one of the paths chosen by God to communicate salvation.

From 1527–28 on, Luther also entered into conflict with those who would be called the Antinomists. According to their spokesman, Johann Agricola, true penitence cannot be achieved through preaching of the law, as Luther had affirmed, but only through preaching of the gospel, and law no longer concerned the Christian. For Luther, however, to preach the gospel without the law is the same as losing the gospel as a form of “good news.” The law, to be sure, does not justify, but it impels all humans, Christians included, for as long as they remain sinners, to receive the gospel—that is, forgiveness. To fail to distinguish the law of the gospel prohibits one in fact from acknowledging the redemptive role of Christ. Luther does concede, however, that penitence, in the full sense of the term, is compelled by faith, and that for those who simply remain under the law there is nothing left but despair.

h) God, Christ, and Man: History in Luther’s Theology. The majority of Luther’s writings—more than one hundred volumes, or roughly 60,000 pages, in the Weimar edition—were occasional works. He was more a commentator on the Bible than a systematician.

His ideas were not always presented in the form of a doctrinal body, but, using a theological process that was always centered upon Christ and the Bible, he placed his emphases differently according to the time and circumstances.

The existential implication of the theologian is primordial in this case. Indeed, only those who allow themselves to be judged and liberated by the Word of God can truly apprehend the mysteries* of faith. One receives the liberating gospel through an unceasing effort of reading and interpreting Scripture. The idea that reason* could, by analogy, trace a path from the Creation* to the Creator via a purely theoretical process is therefore excluded. Luther insists in his theses of the Heidelberg Disputation (1518) that the true God can be known only in the flesh of the Crucified. And to a theology that speaks of God without this reference (a “theology of glory”) Luther opposes a “theology of the cross” in which the power of God is revealed in his weakness: God reveals himself by concealing himself, and it is through his death that man will live. Only those who renounce speculation and adopt the paradoxical revelation chosen by God, only those who renounce the glory of deeds to live in a faith experienced in the shadow of the cross, can obtain knowledge* of God.

Luther’s God is a person who speaks and to whom one speaks. The unceasing activity of the Creator is emphasized (WA 7, 574, 29–31), and if Luther insists upon the sovereignty of God in relation to the world, he can also describe his transcendence in terms of a hidden presence within the very depths of the creature’s being. God, above all, is love, the very nature of which is to create and to give to those who deserve nothing. But, given the sins of man, the biblical text also speaks of the wrath* of God, a wrath that must serve to remind the believer that God’s love cannot be taken for granted, but that it is the victory of God through Jesus Christ over that which accuses man—wrath and the law. Wrath and law are, in their way, the “improper works” of God, and they cause man to flee toward the heart of God.

Despite certain reservations with regard to the vocabulary used, Luther adopted the Trinitarian and christological dogma of the early church. They were truly fundamental from his soteriological perspective: if Jesus Christ was not truly God, man would not be saved. And how could man attain faith, his only means of salvation, without the divine work of the Holy Spirit? In a very Western way, Luther also insists upon the unity between the three Persons of the Trinity*, in such a way that he might be accused of modalism*. But if faith is born when man discovers the face of the Father* in Jesus Christ, Luther also knew how to express, in various ways, the encounter between Father and Son. As a theologian of Incarnation he insisted, contrary to Zwingli in particular, upon the close union of Christ’s two natures. To establish Christ’s presence in the Eucharist, Luther sets himself up as a theoretician of the communication of idioms*; and the same theory enables him to say that divine nature also plays a part in the suffering of Jesus* the man.

As for redemption, the Lutheran position is also traditional, and has similarities in a number of ways to Anselm*’s in the Cur Deus homo. But although it was in our place that Christ satisfied the law and submitted to its accusations, his act of substitution did not elicit the love of God, for that love was primary and was made evident through the sending of the Son. The Christ of reconciliation was, moreover, the Christ who liberated man from the evil power, classically, of death* and the devil, to which Luther added the law and the wrath of God. Christ’s work of “satisfaction” and redemption, finally, was not confined to the past. Christ did not extend grace, but stood “before the Father as a comfort [to man] and an intercessor” (WA 20, 634, 18) and gave himself to the believer as his justice.

“Justification by faith alone” is at the heart of the Lutheran message, affirming that only man’s faith in Christ will render him just before God. What is more, faith for Luther took on a full meaning that the Scholastic tradition had not ascribed to it. Faith was in fact interpreted as the act of reason that acquiesces to revelation, and any process of this kind must be completed by the love for God. But, for Luther, faith immediately implies one’s entire person. It is not only knowledge, it is also trust. This existential concept is one of the reasons why Luther reacted against everything that in theology and in the practice of the Catholic Church could turn grace into a sort of supernatural force transmitted by the sacraments to take root in the soul as a quality: one cannot speak of faith and grace without insisting upon the Word, that of Christ and of his witnesses. To insist upon mediation—of Christ, of the witnesses, of the Word, including its sacramental form—was also a way of forewarning against the numerous forms of mysticism and spiritualism. Luther’s theology granted considerable importance to the immediacy of a relationship founded on belief, but it did not give rise to absolute individualism, and did not reduce Christianity to a pious interiority.

Luther did not speak only of faith or inner realities. He also often evoked the works of God in Creation and in history, and he called on believers to cooperate. In the face of an ascetic piety, Luther restored value to the human body and to everything that comprises life on earth, marriage in particular. Christians are not permanent in the world*, however good that world may be through the will of God the Creator. Aware of the reality of evil*, confronted with the incessant activity of Satan, man remains a stranger on earth and aspires to the sudden arrival of the “last day.” Luther often evoked the devil, and this was more than a mere medieval legacy for him. He viewed history* as the uninterrupted struggle between God the Creator and Satan the destroyer. Satan attacks the worthy institutions willed by God, destroys civil society* through sedition (the peasant uprising), usury, and war*. But Satan also intervenes in the realm of faith, perverting the preaching of the gospel or attacking its witnesses. In accordance with the Lutheran distinction between the two reigns, the struggle against Satan is waged on two levels: on the one hand, through temporal institutions, law, and constraint; on the other hand, through the message of the gospel and the lives of Christians themselves. It is to his acute awareness of the permanence of evil that Luther owes his eschatological expectation, free of any millenarianism*. There will be no perfect state, either in the church or in secular society. Progress will never be anything more than relative. Only on the last day will one witness the appearance of Jesus Christ and the total destruction of the powers of the devil.

- The standard Weimar Edition (WA), Böhlau, 1883–, comprises four sections: (1) Writings (treatises, commentaries, preachings, etc.): Vols. 1–59, 61–63; (2) Correspondence, 18 vols. (WA.B); (3) Tischreden (Table Talks), 6 vols. (WA.TR); (4) Deutsche Bibel (German Bible) series, 12 vols. (15 vols.) (WA.DB).

Complementary collection: Archiv zur Weimarer Ausgabe.

- ◆ K. Holl (1927), Gesammelte Aufsätze zur Kirchengeschichte, vol. 1: L., Tübingen (7th Ed. 1948).
- L. Febvre (1928), Un destin: Martin L., Paris (5th Ed. 1988).
- P. Vignaux (1935), Luther, commentateur des “Sentences,” Paris.
- P. Althaus (1952), Die christliche Wahrheit, 3rd Ed., Gütersloh; (1952), Paulus und Luther über den Menschen, 2nd Ed., Gütersloh.
- L. Grane (1962), Contra Gabrielem: Luthers Auseinandersetzung mit Gabriel Biel in der Disputatio Contra Scholasticam Theologiam 1517, Copenhagen.
- H. Strohl (1962), Luther jusqu’ en 1520, Paris.
- P. Althaus (1963), Die Theologie Martin Luthers, Gütersloh (3rd Ed. 1983).

- P. Althaus (1965), Die Ethik Martin Luthers, Gütersloh.
- T. Süß (1969), Luther, Paris.
- J. Lortz (1970), La Réforme de Luther, 2 vols., Paris.
- M. Lienhard (1973), Luther, témoin de Jésus-Christ: Les étapes et les thèmes de la christologie du Réformateur, CFI 73.
- L. Grane (1975), Modus loquendi theologicus: Luthers Kampf um die Erneuerung der Theologie 1515–1518, Leyden.
- W. Joest (1975), Ontologie der Person bei Luther, Göttingen.
- D. Olivier (1978), La foi de Luther: La cause de l’Évangile dans l’Église, Paris.
- T. Beer (1980), Grundzüge der Theologie Martin Luthers, Einsiedeln.
- M. Brecht (1982), Martin Luther, vol. 1: Sein Weg zur Reformation 1483–1521, Stuttgart.
- O. H. Pesch (1982), Hinführung zu Luther, Mayence.
- Y. Congar (1983), Martin Luther: Sa foi, sa Réforme: Études de théologie historique, Paris.
- G. Ebeling (1983), Luther: Introduction à une réflexion théologique, Geneva.
- H. Junghans (1983), Leben und Werk Martin Luthers von 1526 bis 1546, Berlin.
- M. Lienhard (1983), Martin Luther: Un temps, une vie, un message, Paris-Geneva (3rd Ed. 1991).
- M. Monteil (1983), Martin Luther, la vie, oui la vie, Paris.
- H. Junghans (1984), Der junge Luther und die Humanisten, Weimar.
- M. Brecht (1986), Martin Luther, vol. 2: Ordnung und Abgrenzung der Reformation 1521–1532; vol. 3: Die Erhaltung der Kirche 1532–1546, Stuttgart.
- R. Schwarz (1986), Luther, Göttingen.
- M. Lienhard (1989), L’Év. et l’Église chez Luther, Paris; (1991), Au cœur de la foi de Luther: Jésus-Christ, Paris.
- H. Guicharrousse (1995), Les musiques de Luther, Geneva.
- M. Arnold (1996), La correspondance de L.: Étude historique, littéraire et théologique, Mayence.
- D. Crouzet (1996), La genèse de la Réforme française, Paris.
- H. Flachmann (1996), M. L. und das Buch, Tübingen.
- G. Ebeling (1997), Luthers Seelsorge, Tübingen.
- M. Lienhard (1999), M. L.: La passion de Dieu, Paris.

MARC LIENHARD

See also Baptism; Ecclesiology; Erasmus, Desiderius; Faith; Grace; Holy Scripture; Indulgences; Law and Christianity; Lutheranism; Mass, Sacrifice of the; Nominalism; Pope; Scripture, Senses of; Word of God; Works; Zwingli, Huldrych

Lutheran Church. See Lutheranism

Lutheranism

1. Concept and Origin

The term Lutheranism denotes the totality of Christians, churches*, and Christian communities whose life and faith* are distinctly marked by a new understanding of the biblical message of salvation*, as formulated and defended by the 16th-century Reformation in Wittenberg and especially by Martin Luther*. This movement arose, of course, in the context of the social, cultural, and political upheavals of the time, and was influenced by them. Essentially, however, it was a spiritual phenomenon, which signaled the revival of the biblical message of salvation at a time when it appeared that this was no longer being preached in a satisfactory way. This reorientation was conducted through an appeal to apostolic testimony, as definitively preserved in Holy Scripture*, but at the same time it claimed a continuity with the teaching and doctrine of the early church. The adjective Lutheran was initially used by the opponents of the Reformation, while its supporters (especially Luther) accepted the term only with reluctance, since it seemed to accord a central importance to the person of the reformer. The term is nonetheless perfectly justified, on both a historical and a theological level.

2. Fundamental Beliefs

This new understanding of the biblical message of salvation is expressed in three fundamental beliefs, all closely interlinked.

a) God's Disinterested Condescension toward Mankind Is the One Path to Salvation. In Jesus Christ, God* himself approaches mankind and takes it back into communion with him. Therein is salvation. Mankind does not need to lift itself toward God. Through the virtue of the Incarnation* the meeting between God and man takes place in the finite sphere—that is to say, in the audible words of the preaching* of the gospel and in the material nature of the sacraments*.

b) Justification of the Sinner Is the Center of the Church's Message and Doctrine, and the Heart of the Christian Existence. In Christ*, God mercifully welcomes the sinner, in other words, the person stricken by judgment*. Whoever believes wholeheartedly in this event is justified by God and at the same time inroduced to another life. This is the “principal element” or “center” of the Christian message, to which all Christian proclamation and teaching must conform.

c) Law and Gospel Are to Be Distinguished and Put in Order. The Word* of God is on the one hand a word of command and judgment (law*), and on the other hand a word of absolution and regeneration (gospel). These two things should be clearly distinguished, but not dissociated. They must be distinguished in order to ensure the gratuitous nature of salvation; and they must be put in order or linked with one another in order to prevent the gospel of God's grace* being understood as the granting of a “just grace.” These fundamental convictions are linked to a particular vision of the Church, which is seen as a “communion* of believers” and a “creature of the gospel” (creatura evangelii). This means that the Church is born of and lives by the gospel, which leads people to God, and thereby also unites them by means of preaching and the sacraments (baptism* and the Eucharist). In these two ways, people receive the gospel, which gives rise to the Church. The ecclesial ministry* conferred by ordination* is not eliminated, however, since it is instituted by God. As a ministry of preaching and administering the sacraments it is the instrument of the proclamation of the gospel.

The Lutheran understanding of the world and society*, and Lutheranism's activity in the cultural, social, and political spheres are linked by three guiding principles: 1) a positive attitude toward the world, seen as the good work that God will not abandon, even in the face of the destructive power of sin* and evil*; 2) the idea that an earthly profession (work*) is the framework that God assigns the Christian within which to realize and bear witness to his “sanctity,” in other words, the liberty* that is accorded him in faith to serve his neighbor; 3) the doctrine of the two rules (or of the two orders of sovereignty) by which God fights evil in the world: the spiritual rule, which God exercises through the Holy* Spirit, causing the gospel to be proclaimed through Word and sacrament, and, second, the worldly rule, which God assumes by way of civil authority. This doctrine should not be interpreted as implying a separation between the two kingdoms of God, as Lutheranism has done at certain periods and in certain situations.

3. Church Doctrine and the Confession of Faith

On the level of principles as much as in practice, church doctrine plays a more important role in Lutheranism than in the other Protestant churches. Lutheran confessions of faith appeared at a very early date, modeled on the credo of the early church. First came the Augsburg Confession (1530), which was followed by other confessional writings; all were finally collected in the Book of Concord (1580). This attachment to the creeds of the early church (the Creed of Nicaea-Constantinople, the Apostles' Creed, and even the apocryphal Athanasian Creed) and to the Lutheran confessional writings is proclaimed in the constitutions of all the Lutheran churches. The church's creed is clearly subordinate to the authority* of Holy Scripture, which is accepted as the "only rule and measure." For all that it is seen as historically determined, the confession of faith retains a sense of permanent obligation within the churches, serving above all to guarantee the authenticity of church teachings. The Augsburg Confession is the first and principal confessional writing, and is recognized in almost all Lutheran churches. The others, which have not been so widely accepted, can mostly be understood as interpretations of, and complementary to, the Augsburg Confession. Among these texts, Luther's Little Catechism (1537) has been particularly influential, especially in terms of religious teaching and parish activities. In fact, the Lutheran credo has not evolved since the completion of the Book of Concord (1580), a fact that today more than ever appears to pose a problem. When new developments arise in response to specific circumstances (e.g., in Indonesia) the church strives to preserve "substantial agreement" with the historical creed. The relationship between Luther's own theology* and Lutheran confessional writings is a complex one, and not without occasional tensions. Indeed, while Lutheranism is inconceivable without Luther, in practice the doctrine officially professed by the churches is most often given priority.

4. Institution of the Church

The Lutheran Reformation initially and for a long time saw itself as a movement of renewal within the Catholic Church. The reformers had no intention of founding their own church. But insofar as the existing church was not prepared to tolerate such a movement within itself, it was inevitable that this movement should form itself into a separate church. This development took place under the then-prevailing sociopolitical conditions in the various countries of Europe. It displayed two characteristic traits: on the one hand, the universal—one might say "ecumenical"—aim of the reforming movement, for which the new vision of the biblical message of salvation was a matter for the whole of Christendom; and on the other hand, the belief that the transformation of the movement into a church would be a merely provisional step. However, the end of the religious disputes and the conclusion of the Peace of Augsburg (1555) heralded another outcome—sealed by the Treaty of Westphalia (1648)—in which the Lutheran Reformation's universal, ecumenical project foundered. Breaking with the established church, Lutheranism set up its own churches. In Northern Europe whole countries went over to Lutheranism in this way. In Germany various regional churches arose and found a place within the established sociopolitical landscape. Elsewhere, Lutheran communities and churches developed in opposition to the established political power.

The Lutheran Reformation's reservations concerning this new church it was producing, and its own original intention rather to set up a movement of renewal within the one Church, have nevertheless remained strong features of Lutheranism. They find expression today in energetic ecumenical activity (see 8 below).

5. Spread of Lutheranism

In Germany, Lutheranism's period of growth ended, for all intents and purposes, as early as 1580—at the latest in 1648 (Treaty of Westphalia). The same may be said of the Scandinavian countries, where Lutheranism became the official or dominant religion, and of the countries of central and eastern Europe, where it remained a minority faith. Emigration from Germany and Scandinavia in the 18th and 19th centuries led to the founding of Lutheran churches, first in North and South America, and then in Australia. During the 19th and 20th centuries missionary activity gave rise to Lutheran churches in Asia and Africa. Today there are around 58 million Lutheran Christians in the world. In quantitative terms Lutheranism is undoubtedly strongest in the Scandinavian countries, with 21 million followers, and Germany, with 15 million. There are 8.7 million Lutherans in North America, 5.5 million in Africa, 4.5 million in Asia, 1.6 million in central and eastern Europe, and 1.2 million in Latin America.

6. Lutheranism's Internal Diversity

A fundamental unanimity in the understanding and confession of faith enables Lutheranism to assume the most varied forms: state churches, multitudinist churches, and free churches; episcopal, synodal, and congregationalist structures; an elaborate liturgy* derived from the classical mass, or a sparse liturgy chiefly focused on preaching. At present, however, there is a clear tendency toward frequent and regular celebration of the Eucharist, and toward a development of the episcopal ministry. This diversity of forms of worship and ecclesial structures is made possible and justified by the Lutheran conception of the Church and its unity*. For Lutherans the necessary and sufficient condition of this unity lies in a fundamental agreement on the understanding of the gospel and its proclamation by Word and sacrament. Thereafter, the particular form of worship and ecclesial organization is only a secondary question, to which different responses are permitted. Both this conviction and the practices that result from it are not without danger, however. They can lead to indifference and to an unrestrained pluralism in liturgical and organizational matters, which could endanger the ecclesial community. Both these attitudes were alien to the Lutheran Reformation: on these subjects, too, it was clearly aware of the limits within which diversity could be tolerated, and strove to maintain as much coherence as possible.

7. Church Union

During the second half of the 19th century rapprochements developed, at both a national and a regional level (in Europe and North America), between Lutheran churches and groups that previously had often been cut off from, or even in conflict with, one another. At the beginning of the 20th century these attempts at internal unification spread to Lutheranism as a whole, leading in 1947 to the creation of the Lutheran World Federation. Almost all Lutheran churches—with the exception of the Lutheran Church Missouri Synod in North America, and a few free churches—now belong to this organization, which encompasses some 55 million Christians. For a long time the Lutheran World Federation saw itself as a purely federative structure, whose constitution did not envisage the eucharistic Communion of the member churches. However, consciousness of the universal solidarity of Lutherans has recently grown to such an extent that the federation now officially regards itself as a “communion of churches,” united in the communion of pulpit and altar.

8. Ecumenical Commitment

In its early period Lutheranism retained a strong ecumenical focus inherited from the Lutheran Reformation (which saw itself as a movement of renewal within the established church and did not aim to found a new church). At that time Lutherans were in regular discussion with representatives of the official church, and also with members of the Swiss wing of the Reformation and the Church of England; they even attempted to establish links with the Eastern Orthodox churches. By and large these ecumenical efforts lapsed over the following centuries. At the beginning of the 19th century, united Lutheran-Reformed churches were formed in Germany; these however were rejected by large sectors of Lutheranism. The churches, and a number of well-known Lutherans, have since played a part—sometimes a leading one (as in the case of Archbishop Söderblom, for example)—in the 20th century ecumenical movement, and the Lutheran World Federation has set itself in its constitution the objective of encouraging Christian unity*. The interdenominational dialogue that opened up in the wake of Vatican* II gave a new impetus to these ecumenical efforts. From the outset the Lutheran churches and the Lutheran World Federation have been among the chief promoters of this dialogue. Since then a huge network of national and international exchanges has arisen, in which the Lutheran churches take part. Some of these exchanges, as for example the discussions between Lutherans and the European Reformed churches, have already led to the creation of a communion of churches (Leuenberg Concord, 1973). Others, such as the dialogue with the Anglicans, have at least come close to this goal.

The nature of this ecumenical commitment is determined by the Lutheran conception of the Church (see 2 and 6 above): the communion of churches, and thus the unity of the Church, is essentially a communion in the profession of the one apostolic faith. Consequently the ecumenical efforts of the Lutheran churches are particularly focused on this communion in the apostolic faith. This means that Lutherans give priority to doctrinal dialogue with the other churches, and that they are more reserved about the ecumenical initiatives that have been developed in other directions. More so than in the past, it is nonetheless accepted today that this communion in the confession of the apostolic faith may be achieved even when the churches present and formulate their confessions of faith and their doctrines in different ways. In this sense the goal of the ecumenical movement, especially from the Lutheran perspective, is understood as “unity in a reconciled diversity.”

- H. Stephan (1907), L. in den Wandlungen seiner Kirche, Berlin (2nd Ed. 1952).
- W. Elert (1931–32), Morphologie des Luthertums, 2 vols., Munich (3rd Ed. 1965).
- P. Althaus (1962), Die Theologie Martin L., Gütersloh (5th Ed. 1980).
- Coll. (1976), “L’identité luthérienne face aux défis de notre temps,” PosLuth 24, 214–20.
- T. Bachmann (1977), “Lutherische Kirchen in der Welt,” LR 27, 163–500.
- V. Vajta (1977) (Ed.), Die evangelisch-lutherische Kirche, Vergangenheit und Gegenwart, Stuttgart (2nd Ed. 1983).
- Coll. (1980), La Confession d’Augsbourg, 450e anniversaire: Autour d’un colloque œcuménique international, PoTh 37.

- A. Birmelé (1981), La tradition luthérienne, Chambray.
 M. Lienhard (1983), Martin Luther, un temps, une vie, un message, Paris-Geneva (3rd Ed. 1991).
 A. Birmelé, M. Lienhard (1991) (Ed), La foi des Églises luthériennes, Confessions et catéchismes, Geneva-Paris.
 A. Birmelé (1993), "Responsabilité et engagement des Églises luthériennes dans le domaine de la théologie," PosLuth 41, 20–37.
 P. Bühler (1993), "La responsabilité devant Dieu, fondement théologique de l'engagement éthique," ibid., 48–67.
 A. Joly (1993), "Histoire de l'Église luthérienne à Paris: Affermissement et expansion, 1809–1872," ibid., 5–19.
 G. Siegwalt (1993), "Les Églises luthériennes, responsabilité et engagement dans le domaine de la spiritualité," ibid., 38–47.
 I. Dingen (1996), Concordia controversa: Die öffentlichen Diskussionen um das lutherische Konkordienwerk am Ende des 16. Jahrhunderts, Gütersloh.

HARDING MEYER

9. Intellectual History of Lutheranism

Toward the end of the 16th century Lutheranism crystallized into what has been called "Lutheran orthodoxy*": a theology meant to develop and consolidate (especially under the pressure of its polemics with Catholicism*) the ecclesial and doctrinal structure that issued from the Reformation. The emphasis was then placed both on the preservation of the Lutheran heritage and on its systematization, which was not possible without considerable modifications and reorientations, both in the field of theology and in that of spiritual doctrine. A theory of the literal inspiration of the Scriptures thus arose (also incidentally to be found in post-Tridentine Catholicism) which had a different emphasis to that of the Reformers. Further, the "doctrinal texts" came to be isolated from their historical context and regarded as immutable norms that were, moreover, in perfect agreement with one another. A systematic theology worthy to be called Scholastic was finally developed, under the influence of Melancthon and within his circle. Associated with a learned metaphysics betraying Aristotelian origins and above all the considerable influence of Suarez* (Pedersen 1921, Wundt 1937, Courtine 1900), it was notable for abandoning (in the work of J. A. Quenstedt, J. Gerhard, and many others) the kerygmatic and homiletic style characteristic of Luther's great reformist writings.

The end of the 17th century, for Lutheranism as for all Christian denominations, was a period of crisis (see Pelikan 1989, 9–59, e.g.), which broke up what could have been seen as an untroubled marriage between Christianity and a kind of modernity (that of Luther's existential faith, or of the Cartesian metaphysics of the subject, etc.). Lutheran theology was to offer two concurrent (and not entirely antagonistic) responses to this crisis: Pietism* and theological rationalism*.

Pietism was a movement of spiritual regeneration that influenced every Christian denomination; within Lutheranism it was associated with various elements peculiar to the Reformation and which orthodoxy had in part obscured: a personal understanding of the Christian faith, a return to Scripture as a living source of faith, a refusal to reintroduce the metaphysics implemented by Melancthon, a justification of universal priesthood* against any tendency to set up a church of ministers, and finally a vision of the Church as communion*. In other respects, however, its "modern" understanding of man and the world led Pietism astray from its reformed heritage: the devout man, the regenerate individual, assumed such importance that the objective elements on which Christian faith and life are based were largely obliterated. In this way the church found itself viewed above all as an assembly or gathering of the regenerate. Sacramental life was in danger of breaking down because the emphasis was placed on the dignity of the person receiving the sacrament and on the transformation to which his or her life bore witness; the significance of confessions of faith was played down, and denominational links were loosened. Even in the area of justification, there was less interest in the God who gives grace, and in the faith that receives that grace, than in the justified man and the effects of justification on his life. Zinzendorf produced a commentary on the Augsburg Confession, admittedly, and the majority of Lutheran Pietists remained orthodox, to judge by the beliefs they confessed. However, the "affective transposition of doctrines" (Pelikan 1989, 119–30) in which they all engaged, combining quietist influences (e.g., in the work of the great hymnographer G. Teerstegen [1697–1769], a disciple of the Huguenot P. Poiret), recollections of Rhineland*-Flemish mysticism, and a desire for a God "who can be felt in the heart," and so on, represented a genuine shift: in a Lutheran context, which was its environment of choice, Pietism was more pietist than Lutheran. Moreover, there arose a Pietist critique of Luther (by P. J. Spener and G. Arnold, e.g.), which accused him of carrying out a reformation in the doctrinal sphere, but not in that of piety.

The influence of modern thought was more strikingly present in the Enlightenment's effects on Lutheran theology. In the complex history of theological rationalism, in both the broad and the strict sense, any connection with the original inspiration of the Reformation seems to disappear among authors who nonetheless present themselves as its heirs and followers, but who are often impelled by the image of Luther the liberator to liberate themselves from Luther himself (see TRE 21, 571). In this way the Reformation came to be understood as an emancipating force, paving the way for the Enlightenment, and as a refusal of all the restraints (priestly, "supernaturalist,” and institutional) that hampered the autonomy of the rational subject. Man’s immediate relationship with God offered an argument against mediation through the church and against the constraints imposed upon faith by dogmas and confessions. As well as a decline in the liturgical and sacramental elements of the Christian faith, faith itself was now barely considered except on an ethical level, with the result that practical reason served as the yardstick for all religious life or discourse (Kant* would have the last word on behalf of this trend). Preaching consequently took on a strong moral and pedagogical focus. Everything supernatural* was expunged. Theological rationalism (like Pietism) was admittedly to bear fruit in the biblical field, where it made a great contribution to the development of historico-critical research (J. S. Semler, etc.); but in so doing it accorded its method power over any Christian document—including the confessional texts of the Reformation—and denied the church any authority in the matter.

In reaction against Enlightenment theology (and against the state’s hold over the church), the 19th century witnessed a Lutheran revival (neo-Lutheranism) that took up the polemic begun during the previous century by supernaturalist theologians, and also attempted to find a middle way between Schleiermacher*’s theology (in which a kind of neo-Pietism may be discerned) and the demands of a confessional theology. Exemplified above all by the Erlangen School (A. von Harleß, G. C. K. von Hofmann, F. H. R. von Frank) and widely disseminated by the Zeitschrift für Protestantismus und Kirche, this current opposed the ruptures of rationalism with a system of thought based on a principle of organic development. Moreover, by bringing about a return to confessional dogmatic* theology, it attempted to give an important place to the Lutheran orthodoxy of the 17th century (see the Dogmatik by H. Schmid, the “Kirchenschmid” [1843], the most widely read German theology manual of the period). This movement was not limited to academic work, but formed part of a process of awakening felt throughout the Christian world, both in theology and in the daily life of the church (see TRE 10, 205–20), and linked in Germany to great evangelical preachers such as the Blumhardts, Johann Christoph (1805–80) and his son Christoph Friedrich (1842–1919). Lutheranism thus opened out to encompass new dimensions, thanks to the development of a lively and varied missionary project, as well as intense social and diaconal activity. Ecclesiology* aroused new interest, from a nonindividualist perspective: the rehabilitation of the ministry of the church, and the reestablishment of the divine service in its full sacramental dimension.

The 19th century, however, was also the century of Hegel* (who incidentally gave the annual commemorative speech for the Augsburg Confession, at the behest of Berlin University, in 1830) and his theological following (F. C. Baur and the Protestant school of Tübingen, etc.). It appears to have culminated, in the work of its greatest scholar, A. von Harnack, in the triumph of a “liberal” or “cultural” Protestantism/Lutheranism, which, of the sources of Christianity, kept only a portion of the New Testament texts, and retained virtually nothing of the content of the Christian faith but Jesus’ revelation* of the fatherhood of God.

The tendencies of neo-Lutheranism and a return to Luther also ran through the 20th century in various ways. Studies of Luther; a theological response to Kierkegaard* (a Lutheran who died an apostate from Danish Lutheranism, famous among many other things for his polemic against Luther on the subject of the Epistle of Saint James, but with obvious Protestant loyalties); the resumption of some fundamental Reformation ideas in the shape of “dialectical theology” and its rejection of liberal Protestantism; the development, in the mature works of Barth* (a Calvinist who owed much to Luther), of a theological project with a neo-orthodox structure; denominational realignment necessitated by the demands of ecumenical dialogue; and often a liturgical realignment too: these are among the influences and impulses that have shaped contemporary Lutheranism and given it its living face, visible as much in the internal debates that trouble it as in its participation in the debates common to all Christian denominations.

- P. Petersen (1921), Geschichte der aristotelischen Philosophie im protestantischen Deutschland, Leipzig (2nd Ed., Stuttgart-Bad Cannstatt, 1964).
 - M. Wundt (1939), Die deutsche Schulmetaphysik des 17. Jahrhunderts, Tübingen.
 - K. Barth (1946), Die protestantische Theologie im 19. Jahrhundert, Zürich.
 - E. Hirsch (1960), Geschichte der neuern evangelischen Theologie im Zusammenhang mit den allgemeinen Bewegungen des europäischen Denkens, 5 vols., Gütersloh.
 - J. Pelikan (1989), The Christian Tradition, vol. 5: Christian Doctrine and Modern Culture, Chicago.
 - J.-F. Courtine (1990) Suarez et le système de la métaphysique, Paris.
 - W. Mostert (1991), “Luther III: Wirkungsgeschichte,” TRE 21, 567–94 (bibl.).
 - K. Beyschlag (1993), Die Erlanger Theologie, Erlangen-Nürnberg.
 - M. Matthias (1995), “Orthodoxie I: Lutherische Orthodoxie,” TRE 25, 464–85 (bibl.).
- For further references, see bibliographies for Hegelianism; Liberalism; Pietism; Rationalism.

HARDING MEYER AND JEAN-YVES LACOSTE

See also Anglicanism; Calvinism; Congregationalism; Ecumenicism; Family, Confessional; Luther, Martin; Methodism; Protestantism; Puritanism

Lyons I, Council of

1245

The First Council of Lyons belongs to the series of general or pontifical councils of the Middle Ages (see Lateran* I). Post-Tridentine canonical tradition regards it as the 13th ecumenical council.

Pope Innocent IV, having established himself at Lyons in 1244, convoked a council in the city with the aim of settling the problems of Christendom—the chief of these being the disagreement between the Roman Church and the emperor Frederick II, whose desire for hegemony was threatening the pope in Italy.

Around 150 bishops* and prelates came to Lyons, along with abbots, princes such as the Latin emperor of Constantinople, and ambassadors, including representatives of Frederick II. After a preparatory sitting on 26 June 1245, the council held its first session on 28 June. The pope asked the council to find solutions to the five woes or “wounds” of the church: the moral corruption of clerics* and laity*; the plight of the Holy Land; the weakening of the Latin empire in the east in the face of Greek reconquest; the threats of the Tartars (Mongols); and, last but not most important, the persecution of the church by Frederick II. The second session (5 July) dealt largely with the imperial question. During the third and final session (17 July), despite the opposition of some bishops and ambassadors, the emperor was found guilty by the majority, and was excommunicated and deposed.

Frederick II's deposition was the principal achievement of the council. The theological dimension and the desire for reform were almost entirely lacking. The history of the council's decrees is confused: some texts that had not been composed in the context of the council were nonetheless associated with it by Innocent IV. Apart from the bull for Frederick II's deposition, two groups of documents are generally considered as official texts. The first comprises 22 canonical decrees or constitutions concerning ecclesiastical trials (1–3, 6, and 8–17), elections (4–5), the powers of legates (7), the punishment of hired killers (18), and excommunication (19–22). The second consists of five constitutions, more extended, that address the first four wounds of the church mentioned by the pope at the opening of the council: measures were agreed against the corrupt management of church properties and against usury (1); assistance was promised to the Latin empire of Constantinople (2); the fight against the Tartars was encouraged (4); and steps were taken to restart the Crusade (taxes, measures against Jews, and a prohibition on the sale of strategic goods to the Saracens) (3 and 5). The 22 decrees were adopted almost wholesale into the Sext, Boniface VIII's canonical compendium (1298).

Lyons I is remembered chiefly as marking a new stage in the assertion of pontifical “theocracy,” as well as for its acknowledgement of the sudden influx of Asian peoples into the church's domain, which initially gave rise to fear before being seen as a new opportunity for evangelization.

• Acts: Mansi 23, 605–86.

Decrees: COD 273–301 (DCO II/1, 581–633).

Brevis nota (contemporary account of the council.), Ed. L. Weiland, MGH.L, 1886, IV, 2, Constitutiones II, 513–6 (no. 401).

Matthieu Paris, Chronica majora (council told through witness accounts), Ed. H. R. Luard, Rolls Series 57, 4, London, 1877 (2nd Ed. 1964), vol. 4, 410–4, 430–78.

♦ J.-B. Martin (1905), Conciles et bullaire du diocèse de Lyon, Lyon.

H. Wolter, H. Holstein (1966), Lyons I et Lyons II, HCO 7 (bibl.).

M. Mollat, P. Tombeur (1974), Les conciles Lyons I et Lyons II, Concordance, Index, Listes de fréquence, Tables comparatives, Conciles œcuméniques médiévaux 2, Louvain.

G. Alberigo (1990) (Ed.), Storia dei concili ecumenici, Brescia (Les conciles œcuméniques, I: L'histoire, 189–201).

B. Roberg (1990), “Zur Überlieferung und Interpretation der Hauptquelle des Lugdunense I von 1245,” AHC 22, 31–67; (1991) “Lyons I,” TRE 21, 634–7 (bibl.).

JEAN COMBY

See also Church and State, Political Theology

Lyons II, Council of

1274

The Second Council of Lyons, like the first, belongs to the series of general or pontifical councils of the Middle Ages (see Lateran* I). Canonical tradition regards it as the 14th ecumenical council.

Pope Gregory X was elected in 1271 after the see of Rome had been vacant for three years, during which period he had witnessed at Saint-Jean d'Acres the death throes of the Christian settlements in the Holy Land and the intrigues of the Latin church against the Greek Empire, the latter having been reestablished in 1261. He immediately decided to convoke a council at Lyons. The council would have three aims: to relaunch the Crusade, to reunite the Greek and Latin churches, and to reform Christian morals.

With the ground prepared by reports sent to the pope*, in particular those of the Franciscan Guibert of Tournai, the Dominican Humbert of Romans, and the bishop* of Olomouc, Bruno of Holstein-Schauenberg, the council brought together an impressive number of prelates. Some sources speak of five hundred bishops and several hundred other prelates. Thomas* Aquinas died on the way there, but Bonaventure*, the minister general of the friar minors attended, as did Peter of Tarentaise, the former archbishop of Lyons, and cardinal and future Pope Innocent V. Besides the six official sessions (7 and 18 May, 4 June, 6, 16, and 17 July) the council witnessed some memorable events: the arrival of the representatives of the Greek Church and a first common celebration of the Eucharist (24 and 29 June); the welcoming of Tartar ambassadors and the baptism* of one of them (4 and 16 July); and the death and funeral of Bonaventure (15 July).

Gregory X was overoptimistic in thinking that the council had realized its proposed aims. The constitution Zelus fidei reorganized the Crusade, introducing a tithe spread over six years and offering indulgences* in return for unsolicited gifts. The highly unpopular decimations were not reintroduced; and the last settlement in the Holy Land, Saint-Jean d'Acres, fell in 1291.

The council made a large contribution to canonical legislation: its 31 decrees were almost all incorporated into the Sext (1298), and several saw some application. The constitution Ubi periculum (can. 2) regulated the election of popes by introducing the conclave. The traditional election procedure for appointments to offices and benefices, and the conditions of ordination* were more strictly defined (can. 3 and Sq). Clerics* were reminded of their duty of residence (can. 14) and the prohibition of the accumulation of benefices (can. 18). Religious orders created without the consent of the pope were to be disbanded (can. 23). There were measures concerning the safeguarding of the dignity of worship and the church, and devotion to the name* of Jesus* was encouraged (can. 25). The prohibition of usury (lending with interest) was repeated, and usurers were refused religious burial (cans. 26–27). Excommunication (cans. 29–31) was again discussed.

Lyons II is remembered as the council at which the Greek and Latin churches were briefly reunited. The desire for reunion which had existed prior to Gregory X's pontificate arose in the context of complicated political and religious circumstances. The emperor Michael VIII Paleologus, who had restored Constantinople to Byzantine rule (1261), judged that reconciliation with the Roman Church would preempt a reopening of hostilities by the Latin barons, and was prepared to make the necessary concessions, though these were refused by the Byzantine patriarch, the bishops*, priests*, and monks. The popes' reason for welcoming the reconciliation were of a more religious kind, but they wished to impose the Roman point of view without discussion. The union was proclaimed at the fourth session of the council on 6 July, when Michael Paleologus's representative read out the Byzantine emperor's profession of faith. This was not a text worked out jointly by Latin and Greek theologians, but a form of words imposed and revised several times by various popes, in particular Clement IV, who had died in 1268. The emperor professed the Filioque, and recognized that "the holy Roman Church has sovereign and entire primacy and authority over the whole Catholic Church." He furthermore accepted a number of points of doctrine and discipline contested by the Greeks, regarding eschatology* and sacramental theology: immediate retribution after death*; the fire of purgatory*; the seven sacraments (including Confirmation*, administered by a bishop, and extreme unction); the permissibility of unleavened bread for the Eucharist*; the concept of transubstantiation; the lawfulness of second and third marriages after the death of a spouse; and the condemnation of the repetition of baptism upon moving from one church to another. The emperor insisted, however, that the Greeks should not in any respect change their traditional liturgical formulae. The whole assembly sang the Credo in Latin, and then in Greek, inserting the words, ex patre filioque procedit.

The constitution Fideli ac devota on the Trinity* (can. 1) was the only official trace retained by the council of this reconciliation between the two churches. This was no more than a reminder of the Latin theology* of the Filioque: “The Holy* Spirit proceeds eternally from the Father* and the Son, not as from two principles, but as from a single principle, not by two spirations but by one single spiration.”

The Greeks were then asked for a straightforward capitulation. The emperor Michael attempted to impose by force a union, which was universally refused in Constantinople. The patriarch Joseph was deposed and replaced by John Bekkos, who accepted the Latin theology before himself being disgraced. Michael died having been twice excommunicated: by Rome* for having failed to bring about the union, and by the Greek Church for having wished to impose it. The union was immediately denounced (1283). Lyons II had ultimately succeeded only in widening the chasm that separated the two churches. The issue would be taken up again under more favorable conditions at the Council of Florence (1439).

- Acts: Mansi 24, 37–136.
- Decrees: COD 303–31 (DCO II/1, 637–89).
- Brevis nota* or Ordinatio Concilii generalis Lugdunensis per Gregorium Papam X (contemporary account of the council.), Ed. A. Franchi, Rome, 1965.
- V. Laurent, J. Darrouzès, Dossier grec de l'union de Lyon (1273–1277), Paris, 1976.
- ♦ J.-B. Martin (1905), Conciles et bullaire du diocèse de Lyon, Lyons.
- H. Wolter, H. Holstein (1966), Lyon I et Lyon II, HCO 7 (bibl.).
- M. Mollat, P. Tombeur (1974), Les conciles Lyon I et Lyon II, Concordance, Index, Listes de fréquence, Tables comparatives, Conciles œcuméniques médiévaux 2, Louvain.
- Coll. (1977), 1274, année charnière: Mutations et continuités, Paris.
- C. Capizzi (1985), “Il Ilo Concilio de Lione e l’Unione del 1274: Saggio bibliografico,” OCP 51, 87–122.
- B. Roberg (1989), “Einige Quellenstücke zur Geschichte des II. Konzils von Lyon,” AHC 21, 103–46.
- G. Alberigo (Ed.) (1990), Storia dei concili ecumenici, Brescia.
- B. Roberg (1990), Das zweite Konzil von Lyon (1274), Paderborn; (1991) “Lyon II,” TRE 21, 637–42 (bibl.).

JEAN COMBY

See also Ecumenicism; Filioque; Lyons I, Council of

M

Magisterium

a) Magisterium according to the Catholic Church. Just as medieval universities had a body of masters authorized to teach and decide points of doctrine, similarly, the magisterium designates in the Catholic Church* a body authorized to speak in matters of theology* and church practice. According to the Catholic understanding, it was Christ* himself who conferred on the church the legacy of faith* by instituting an authentic magisterium (DH 3305). The church has the right and the duty to expound revealed doctrine, for it is its guardian and dispenser (DH 3012, 3020).

The magisterium adds nothing new to the legacy of faith; it explains what might beforehand have appeared obscure and reaffirms what has been called into question (DH 3683). The representatives of the magisterium, the pope* and the bishops*, do not receive a new revelation* (DH 4150–51). The magisterium does not prevail over the word* of God*, but serves it by teaching solely what has been preserved by tradition* (DH 4214). By nature the magisterium can only be exercised within the hierarchical community, which brings together the head and members of the episcopal college (DH 4145).

The pope is the supreme doctor* (or teacher) of the church. He has the right to define the articles of faith and to interpret the decisions of the councils (DH 3067). The bishops succeed to the college of apostles* in the exercise of the magisterium. They preserve the apostolic doctrine and lead, “in the place of God” (loco Dei, LG 20), the flock that is entrusted to them (DH 4144, 4146, 4233). The episcopal college holds supreme power over the church as a whole and solemnly exercises this power in the course of the ecumenical council* (DH 4146). The council, however, is not superior to the pope (DH 3063). The magisterium is exercised in an ordinary way (through the pope and the bishops’ teaching and preaching) or in an extraordinary way (through the teaching of a council or the dogmatic decisions of a pope).

b) Historical Development of the Magisterium. Very early on, certain passages of the New Testament (e.g., Mt 16:16–19; Lk 10:16; Jn 21:15ff.) were understood as indicating that a magisterium had been conferred by Christ. Historical and critical exegesis*, however, cannot draw any precise conclusions from these passages. The idea and the practical realization of the monarchical episcopate in the second century (particularly attested in the letters of Ignatius of Antioch), as well as the organization of the ecclesiastical ministry* along the lines of imperial Roman administration, played a decisive role in the historical formation of the magisterium. As Congar’s studies (1976) have shown, in church Latin, magisterium originally denoted a position of authority* or leadership.

In the Middle Ages discussion of the magisterium took place within the framework of the theory of the two powers—the “sacred authority” of bishops and the “royal power” of princes. Within the church itself the clergy occupied a position superior to that of the laity*. Thomas* Aquinas made a further distinction between the magisterium cathedrae pastoralis of bishops and the magisterium cathedrae magistralis of university theologians. Controversies between supporters of the pope and supporters of the councils further complicated the picture.

The current meaning of the term magisterium was principally introduced by German canonists in the early 19th century (see Congar 1976). But, strictly speaking, it was not until the First Vatican* Council (1870–71) that a normative and coherent doctrine of the magisterium was established, with the affirmation of the jurisdictional and doctrinal primacy of the pope over the entire church, not only in matters of faith and morals but also in the realm of ecclesiastical* discipline.

c) Magisterium outside Catholicism. At the time of the Reformation and in later Protestantism* the theology of ministries was often defined in opposition to Catholicism*. The more the Catholic Church gave to its magisterium a broad and detailed theological basis, the more Protestantism emphasized the liberty* of Christians. This general statement must, however, be qualified.

For example, depending on the context, there are already some variations in Luther*'s statements on the power of church leaders. From a terminological point of view, for Luther and often in Protestantism in general, the concept of “ministry” encompasses all the questions that Catholics treat under the term “magisterium.” According to Lutheran confessional writings, God established the ministry of preaching* (CA 5). A minister of the church must be appointed according to the rules (CA 14). Episcopal power is understood as a divine order to preach the gospel, to remit sins*, and to administer the sacraments*. In their spiritual government, bishops do not have the right to introduce rules contrary to the gospel (CA 28). It follows from these principles that, even in Lutheranism*, ecclesiastical ministry is of divine right, although the power of the clergy is strictly limited. Holy* Scripture and it alone provides the criterion for the magisterium of the church.

In addition, in Protestantism the concept of “doctrine” (Lehre) is often used in a broad sense to mean proclamation, witness, or confession. Thus the formulation pure docere (CA 7) may mean “dispense pure teaching” or “preach the true word,” with the task of the magisterium (Lehramt) consisting primarily in preaching and teaching rather than defining normative articles of faith. Nevertheless, Lutheran confessional writings do, for example, seek to expound the lineaments of doctrine (forma doctrinae, BSLK 833), something that also confers on their articles the status of a doctrinal norm in the strict sense. It is incumbent on ecclesiastical leaders, if need be on bishops, to ensure that the gospel is indeed proclaimed in accordance with the content of the confession of faith.

For Anglicans the episcopate is a ministry of divine right that may be traced back to an act of institution by the apostles* or by Christ himself. This high status conferred on the position of bishop brings the Anglican understanding close to the magisterium of conciliarist Catholicism. In the Orthodox Church as well, the bishop represents the central and supreme spiritual authority. It is through him that the Holy* Spirit implements the prophetic gift of teaching. In his own diocese the Orthodox bishop enjoys absolute and independent power, and indeed all bishops are absolutely equal in theological terms. Only an ecumenical synod* has authority over the whole body of Orthodox churches. Through its coherent episcopalianism, the Orthodox understanding of the magisterium presents both hierarchical characteristics and democratic elements.

d) Doctrinal Discipline. In spite of the different conceptions they have of the magisterium, all churches in fact have procedures for doctrinal discipline that make it possible for the magisterium to control the pronouncements of ministers. Catholic canon* law (CIC) specifies in detail the duties and rights of the clergy, as well as the sanctions and proceedings incurred in case of fault. A theologian who professes dissenting opinions, for example, may have his authorization to teach (missio canonica) withdrawn.

With respect to problematical theological theses, the Catholic magisterium, with the help of canonical scholarship, had established a series of censures that variously characterized these theses. A proposition might thus be judged heretical, next to heresy*, schismatic, false, rash, erroneous, scandalous, blasphemous, offensive to pious ears, or evil sounding. The use of these censures, or “theological notes*,” became obsolete in the 20th century.

On the Protestant side the vows of ordination* of pastors* often contain doctrinal commitments. These vows and commitments are formally invoked in the case of disciplinary procedures. In such circumstances the ecclesiastical authorities examine the teaching of the accused minister, generally at the request of the parish, to determine whether it is in accord with the confession in question.

e) Magisterium in Ecumenical Discussion. The multilateral ecumenical movement has avoided discussion of the concrete jurisdictions* on which might be established a “visible unity*” of the churches. Models of unity often begin with the principle that local churches must preserve their specific structures within the one Church (“the unity of all in each place”) or that confessional churches may survive as structural units while recognizing without reservations the teachings of sister churches (“unity in reconciled diversity”).

In these complex discussions the relationship between pluralism and obligatory doctrine poses a fundamental problem, which can be formulated in the following way with respect to the magisterium: must a theological magisterium exercise complete and undivided jurisdiction in order to be really efficacious? Ecumenical discussions tend to answer in the negative, by relativizing the need for the jurisdictional component. The Catholic-Lutheran commission, for example, declared in 1972: “Greater awareness of the historicity of the Church . . . requires that in our day the concepts of ius divinum and ius humanum be thought through anew. In both concepts the word ius is employed in a merely analogical sense. Ius divinum can never be adequately distinguished from ius humanum” (31). This idea was extended in 1994: “Even where, in line with the traditional view and terminology, the character of “divine law,” a ius divinum, is attributed to church legislation, it has a historical shape and form, and it is therefore both possible and necessary to renew and re-shape it” (Kirche und Rechtfertigung, 227).

On the other hand, Protestants today to a certain extent accept the principle of a magisterium with a legal character: “Catholics and Lutherans together say that God, who establishes institutional entities in his grace* and his faithfulness, and who uses them to preserve the church in the truth of the gospel, also uses church law and legal ordinances for this purpose” (ibid., 224).

- CIC, 1983.
- H. Meyer et al. (Ed.), Dokumente wachsender Übereinstimmung 1–2, Paderborn, 1983–92 (International Catholic-Lutheran Commission, Face à l’Unité, Paris, 1986).
- BSLK (FEL), DH, DS. Kirche und Rechtfertigung*, Paderborn, 1994.
- ♦ W. Bassett, P. Huizing (Ed.) (1976), Conc. 12, no. 8–9.
- Y. Congar (1976), “Pour une histoire sémantique du terme magisterium” and “Bref historique des formes du ‘magistère’ et de ses relations avec les docteurs,” RSPHTh 60, 85–98 and 99–112.
- D. Michel et al. (1978), “Amt,” TRE 2, 500–622.
- J. Lécuyer (1980), “Magistère,” DSp 10, 76–90.
- A. Maffei (1991), Il Ministero della chiesa, uno studio del dialogo cattolico-luterano (1967–1984), Rome.
- J. Brosseder, W. Hüffmeier (1992), “Lehramt, Lehrbeantwortung,” EKL3 3, 60–70.
- R. R. Gaillardetz (1997), Teaching with Authority: A Theology of the Magisterium of the Church, Collegeville.

RISTO SAARINEN

See also Authority; Bishop; Collegiality; Council; Ministry; Pope

Malebranche, Nicholas. See Augustinianism

Man. See Adam; Anthropology

Manicheanism

Up to the early 20th century, Manicheanism was known only through the polemical writings of the church fathers*, principally Augustine*. He had been an adherent of Manicheanism for six years—although as a “hearer,” not as one of the “elect”—and hence knew its teachings from the inside. Despite the refutation that he composed after his conversion* to Christianity, he remains a reliable source, quoting its scriptures accurately, as was demonstrated during the 20th century by discoveries in the Turfan (early 1900s) and at Tebessa (1918), Medinet Madi (1929), and Oxyrynchus (1979).

a) Manichean Sources. These three series of discoveries confirmed the new image of Manicheanism that was already being formulated by scholars. Up to the 18th century, Manicheanism appeared to be a Christian heresy* that the Fathers had struggled against. It was Isaac de Beausobre who, as recently as 1728, undertook the first critical studies of the Manichean sources. As a result, Mani ceased to be characterized as a heretic and came to be seen as the founder of a religion. During the 19th century, F. C. Baur demonstrated that the main source of the dualism in Manicheanism was to be found in Indian religion, and had parallels with Buddhism: ever since then, Manicheanism has been given its own place in the history of religions. In addition, materials uncovered by Assyriologists helped to show the Babylonian origins of some of Mani’s ideas. However, the decisive change followed the discoveries of Manichean scriptures during the 20th century: they have shown that Manicheanism was in fact not a mere sect at all, but a major Eastern religion, which had its basis partly in such scriptures. Those that have survived into our own day include the texts gathered in the Shabuhrgan (dedicated to King Shabuhr I); the Kephalaia, found at Medinet Madi, which recount the revelations* that Mani received; and part of the Codex Mani, found inside a tomb in Oxyrynchus, to the South of Cairo, which contains three fragments of Mani’s “gospel.” As well as its scriptures, the Manichean religion had a set liturgy and a communal organization, and its missionaries taught a catechism of which one example has been found in the Turfan.

b) Life of Mani. The life of Mani, the founder of Manicheanism, has been known ever since the Codex Mani, which itself draws on the “gospels” of his childhood, was deciphered. According to the Shabuhrgan, Mani was born on 14 April 216 at Mardinu in northern Babylonia. It is known for certain that from 220 to 240 he lived with his father, Pattikios, in an Elchasaite community, where ritual played a dominant role. He experienced his first vision of an angel*, his “twin,” in 228; the second took place in 240. It was on these occasions that, according to the first of the Kephalaia, “the mystery of light and darkness, their struggle, and the creation of the world, was revealed” to him. This revelation led Mani to break with the Elchasaite, to reject the Old Testament, and to set out on a mission* to proclaim his new religion. He founded communities, which received protection from King Shabuhr I, and by 270 his religion had been established throughout what is now Iran. In around 277, however, Mani was put to death on the orders of Shabuhr’s son, Vahram. After his death, Mani’s disciples spread his teachings to the East and the West, and his influence lasted into the Middle Ages, when his doctrines were revived, in part, by Catharism*. In Augustine’s time, there were some particularly active Manichean communities in North Africa, where they brought together part of the intellectual elite of the region.

Mani’s teachings are to be found mainly in two works: the Shabuhrgan, which is an exposition of the bases of Manichean dualism, by way of the doctrine of the two principles; and the Pragmateia, an exposition of Mani’s cosmogony, which is worked out in terms of three “ages.” During the first age, according to Mani, there was nothing but the two principles of “good” and “evil.” During the second age, there are various confrontations between the King of Darkness and the Father of Light, which give rise to several “emanations,” including the Mother of the Living, the Primordial Man, the Living Spirit, the Archons, and Jesus in Splendor. The last age has yet to begin: Mani’s eschatology foresees a last judgment* and the decisive triumph of his religion.

c) Augustine and Manicheanism. It is understandable that Augustine was drawn to this religion, which was of a new type, and which combined mysteries* that he hoped to be initiated into with an ethical rigor of the kind that he was seeking. However, his meeting with Faustus of Milevis led him to question both of the principal doctrines in the Manichean system, the doctrine of the two principles and the doctrine of the three ages (first, second, and last). In the De Gn. contra manichaeos, he abandons the Manichean theme of an evil world, the result of the various “emanations,” which are also stages in degeneration, in favor of the theme of a creation* that is basically good. Augustine was impelled to write this polemic against Manicheism very soon after his return to Africa by his need to justify to himself, and to demonstrate to others, the process whereby he had ceased to be an adherent of Manicheism, having been a Manichean when he left Africa. Later, he had to defend his community, as its pastor*, against the Manicheans, and this is why he wrote De natura boni (On the Nature of Good) and De libero arbitrio (On Free Will), in which he argues that evil* does not arise from an evil principle, but from a free choice of the will (see also BAug 17, Six Anti-Manichean Treatises).

- P. Alfarié (1918), Les écritures manichéennes, 2 vols., Paris.
- H. C. Puech (1972), “Le manichéisme,” Histoire des religions II, coll. “Pléiade,” 637–41 (list of sources), Paris.
- Der Kölner Mani-Kodex* (1988), pub. by L. Koenen and C. Römer, Opladen.
- ♦ I. de Beausobre (1734–39), Histoire critique de Maniché et du manichéisme, 2 vols., Amsterdam.
- F. C. Baur (1831), Das manichäische Religionsystem nach den Quellen neu untersucht und entwickelt, Göttingen.
- H. C. Puech (1949), Le manichéisme, son fondateur, sa doctrine, Paris; (1979), Sur le manichéisme, Paris.
- M. Tardieu (1981), Le manichéisme, Paris.
- J. Ries (1988), Les études manichéennes, Louvain-la-Neuve.
- A. Böhlig (1992), “Manichäismus,” TRE 22, 25–45 (bibl.).

MARIE-ANNE VANNIER

See also Creation; Eschatology; Evil; Religions, Theology of Manning, Henry Edward

1808–1892

a) Life. Manning was the third and youngest son of a Tory member of Parliament and governor of the Bank of England. Undistinguished at school, except as a cricketer, he preceded Gladstone, his later theological opponent, as president of the Oxford Union. After a short spell in business he returned to Oxford, was ordained under evangelical influences into the Church of England, and became a fellow of Merton College. In 1833 he was presented to a Sussex rectory and married at a ceremony conducted by Samuel Wilberforce, brother-in-law of the bride and afterward bishop of Oxford and of Winchester. Grief on the death of his wife in 1837 was assuaged by a religious move toward the High Church, Newman*, and the Tractarians. He paid a first visit to Rome with Gladstone late in 1838, calling on Wiseman, and in 1842 published his treatise On the Unity of the Church. He was by now a noted preacher, and four volumes of his sermons were published between 1842 and 1850.

Newman’s secession to Rome forced Manning into a higher profile as a High Church leader, but a serious illness in 1847 led him to recuperate in Rome, where he spent the following winter, getting to know Wiseman, the Catholic scholar whose erudite works on the early church had a profound influence on Newman and the Anglican dignitaries of the Oxford movement. Manning was twice received in audience by the pope, and became both increasingly aware of what appeared to him to be the defects in the Church of England and drawn to the religious qualities of the Roman communion. On his return to England he continued to devote himself to pastoral duties and an ascetic way of life, turning down a post normally leading to a bishopric. His own religious crisis came to a climax late in 1850, when he found himself unable to join in the protests against the insensitively aggressive ecclesiastical style of Wiseman, recently made a cardinal and charged with reestablishing the Roman hierarchy in England.

On Passion Sunday 1851 Manning became a Roman Catholic, a week later receiving communion and confirmation from Wiseman. Nine weeks thereafter Wiseman ordained Manning priest. Manning then studied theology in Rome, where he was frequently received by the pope. During brief returns to England he acted as Wiseman's assistant, contriving to remove the Catholic army chaplains from subordination to Anglican military superiors, and in 1857 was appointed head of the Westminster cathedral chapter and superior of the "Oblates of St Charles." These were similar to Newman's Oratorians, except that they placed themselves at the disposal of the local bishop.

Manning swiftly became the leader of the Romanizing Ultramontane party among English Catholics, distrusted by the older, more liberal Catholic families. On Wiseman's death in 1865 it was against considerable opposition that Pius IX imposed Manning as archbishop of Westminster. Manning's contribution to Catholic life was henceforward more social than theological. He furthered Catholic education, especially industrial and reform schools; opposed the attendance of Catholics at Oxford and Cambridge; failed in an attempt to found a Catholic university; and, to the detriment of all ecumenical endeavor, emphasized the exclusivity of Roman claims, strongly supporting the dogmatic definition of papal infallibility at the First Vatican* Council. On 15 March 1875 he was created cardinal, and in 1878 was considered a plausible candidate to succeed Pius IX. He himself supported Pecci, who became Leo XIII and whose famous encyclical on the claims of labor, Rerum novarum, was influenced by Manning. His later years were devoted chiefly to social questions and to the care of the Irish immigrants who formed the chief part of his flock. He sat on royal commissions on housing for the working classes (1884) and on primary education (1886), and played a leading part in the settlement of the dockers' strike in 1889.

b) Thought. Manning was not notable as a theologian, whether speculative or evangelical, although he much influenced the thinking of pastoral and moral theologians by his own pastoral attitudes and by his concern for the well-being and organization of labor. It was the religious style of everyday Catholicism rather than the erudition of Wiseman or the theological niceties of Newman that drove him to leave the Anglican communion for Rome, although the crux was the dogmatic impropriety implied by the controversial investiture of G. C. Gorham with the benefice of Bramford Speke in spite of Speke's declared disbelief in baptismal regeneration.

In 1860 Manning delivered a series of lectures defending the pope's temporal power, having already, while still an Anglican, denounced in an open letter to his bishop the appellate jurisdiction of the English crown in spiritual matters. He strongly believed in the divine institution of a hierarchical church, not only headed by an infallible pope, but also intolerant of such widespread exemptions from the normal chain of hierarchical authority as were enjoyed by the regulars, particularly the Jesuits.

- Lemire, Le cardinal Manning et son action sociale, Paris, 1893.
Edmund Sheridan Purcell, Life of Cardinal Manning, 2 vols., London, 1896.

ANTHONY LEVI

Marcionism

Marcion, the propagator of the most threatening Christian heresy* to face the "Great Church" in the latter half of the second century, is known only through what his adversaries said about him. Nonetheless, anti-Marcionite patristic literature provides a countertestimony from which we are able to reconstruct the original characteristics of the doctrine and the movement.

1. Doctrine

Marcion's major intuition was to theorize the opposition between the Old Testament and the New Testament. In order to declare the radical separation of the law and the gospel,* he erected a dualistic system governed by ditheism.

a) Theology. Two gods are placed in opposition, a just god* and a good god. The first, who has been known for the longest time, is revealed in the Old Testament. Demiurge or creator of the universe that he organized out of preexisting matter, a principle of evil*, he also created man, and is his despotic master. Though not essentially wicked, this god of the world and of the Jews is characterized by his exclusive concern for justice*, his vindictiveness, and his inconstancy and lack of foresight. Above him—and unknown to him—reigns the higher god, the god of pure goodness who neither judges nor punishes. This god remained foreign to our world until his revelation* in Jesus Christ*. And through his manifestation in the gospel, he came to liberate human beings from the power of the Creator and bring them salvation*.

b) Christology and Soteriology. They are essentially Docetist. In the 15th year of the reign of Tiberius, the son of a higher god—a spiritual being hardly distinct from the Father*—suddenly appeared in Jesus Christ, who came into the world without experiencing the humiliations of human birth. In a “flesh” of pure appearance, he manifested his divinity by his preaching and his miracles*, beginning in the synagogue of Capernaum. His work was to undo that of the Creator, and to substitute his own teachings and institutions for those of the Creator. He endured the Passion* and death* on the cross, a victim of the powers of the Creator and those faithful to him, and at this price he “bought man” from his master. Those who believe in Jesus Christ are “saved” by their faith*, but this salvation applies only to the soul*: the “flesh*” or “matter” is unworthy of salvation and is doomed to annihilation, as the Creator too will be annihilated once his function in the economy of the world and history* is accomplished.

c) Morality. Marcionite ethics* is based on the law of love* as articulated in the “beatitudes*,” and opposed to Judaic prescriptions such as talion law. Its main aim is to detach the person from the grasp of a “flesh” that is essentially evil, and its principle is to refuse to perpetuate the world* of the Creator. Consequently, Marcionite ethics advocated the ascetic practices of “Encratism”: strict abstention from marriage and procreation*, vegetarianism, fasting, and a willing acceptance of ordeals, notably martyrdom.*

d) Scriptural instrumentum. The originality of Marcionism is that it justified its doctrine with the help of a historico-philological reconstruction based on the idea that the church* went astray from the original gospel, polluting it with Judaizing interpretations and interpolations. Marcion composed an instrumentum drawn from a revision of New Testament literature combined with an explanatory treatise that served as foundation. This treatise, entitled Antitheses, which included explanations of the role of Paul, seen as the sole possessor of the authentic gospel, placed both in parallel and in opposition the words and deeds of the Creator and those of Jesus Christ. As for the instrumentum strictly speaking, it was composed of a gospel without an author’s name (the gospel of Luke, corrected and excluding the first chapters) and an apostolicon (10 letters of Paul, also revised, and placed in a particular order, giving the greatest importance to Galatians because of the incident at Antiochus). Aside from the notion of a scriptural “canon*,” which he may have helped the church to establish, Marcion stimulated the reflection of the Fathers by refusing all christological and typological exegesis* of the Old Testament, notably the prophecies*: for these texts he followed the literalist interpretation of Judaism.

2. Organization and History of the Movement

As Hippolytus recounts, Marcion was born in Sinope, the son of a bishop. He went to Rome around 140 after being excommunicated by his father for immorality. In 144 he broke with the Christian community of Rome* and created his own church, which spread rapidly and widely throughout the empire. This success can be explained by Marcionism’s radical attitude toward Judaism* and by a moral rigor that was in harmony with certain pagan intellectual trends at the time. Sacramental life and liturgical life followed the “Catholic” model, with some differences: baptism* was granted only at the price of a commitment to absolute continence; the Eucharist* was performed with bread and water; the hierarchy* was not as rigid, and women fulfilled certain ministries. Whereas in the West, and notably in Africa, the movement ceased troubling the church around the mid-third century, it retained its vitality much longer in the East, where it finally blended into Manichaenism.*

3. Modern Interpretations

Was Marcion, classified with the Gnostics by the heresiologues of the patristic period, really a Christian theologian overcome by a Pauline* conception (the opposition between the law and faith) that had been pushed to its extreme consequences by Marcion’s ditheism? This is the position taken in a work—in other respects fundamental—by Harnack (1924). The position was recently repeated by Hoffmann (1984), who combined it with views taken from Knox (1942) and a questioning of the chronology, and who portrayed Marcion as a theologian who restored authentic Christianity, a legitimate interpreter of the Pauline gospel, ignorant of the apostolic tradition* that was employed to attack him. Critics have stressed the weaknesses of this thesis in its two successive forms; the point of view prevalent today accords with the interpretation of the Fathers: despite the particular feature of his refusal to speculate on the Pleroma, Marcion was indeed a Gnostic, marked by the philosophy* of his time, who put a Christian “veneer” on a dualist doctrine nourished by the basic preoccupations of gnosis* (systematic depreciation of the world and matter, belief in a higher, “separate” god).

- A. von Harnack (1924), Marcion: Das Evangelium vom fremden Gott, 2nd Ed., Leipzig (repr. 1960, Darmstadt; English trans. 1990, Durham).

- J. Knox (1942), Marcion and the New Testament, Chicago.
- E. C. Blackman (1949), Marcion and His Influence, London.
- U. Bianchi (1958), Il dualismo religioso, Rome; (1967), “Marcion théologien biblique ou docteur gnostique,” VigChr 21, 141–49.
- B. Aland (1973), “Marcion: Versuch einer neuen Interpretation,” ZThK 70, 420–47.
- G. Quispel (1981), “Gnosis,” Die orientalischen Religionen im Römerreich, EPRO 91, 425–26.
- R. J. Hoffmann (1984), Marcion: On the Restitution of Christianity, Chico, Calif.
- G. May (1986), “Ein neues Markionbild,” ThR 51, 404–13.
- E. Norelli (1987), “Una ‘restituzione’ di Marciano,” CrSt 8, 609–31.
- G. May (1988), “Marcion in Contemporary Views: Results and Open Questions,” SecCent 6, 129–51; (1993), “Marcione nel suo tempo,” CrSt 14, 205–20.
- A. Orbe (1990), “En torno al modalismo de Marción,” Gr 71, 43–65; (1991), “Marcionitica,” Aug. 31, 195–244.
- D. W. Deakle (1991), The Fathers against Marcionism, thesis, Saint Louis University.

RENÉ BRAUN

See also Canon of Scriptures; Christ and Christology; Docetism; Gnosis; Tertullian

Marechal, Joseph. See Thomism

Market Economics, Morality of

The church* has never found it easy to come to terms with market forces. It has tended to oscillate between an over dismissive criticism of commercial activity, often based on inadequate information or poor understanding, and an uncritical acceptance of the status quo. Some Christian thinkers, however, have combined empirical knowledge with a theological basis for understanding business, from which its operation can be constructively challenged.

1. Old Testament

The Old Testament contains a considerable amount of material on the conduct of economic life. The basic economic unit is land. In his gift of the Promised Land, God* gives Israel* a rich resource (Dt 8:7–10), which it is expected to make productive. There is freedom for buying and selling, and some movement in landholding is allowed, but effectively this is only a matter of lease holding for a limited time, because in the 50th ("Jubilee") year property* is expected to be returned to its original owner (Lv 25:8–17). A sabbatical year (sabbath*) for the land to lie fallow, to prevent its over-exploitation, is also ordained (Lv 25:1–7). The Torah's concern for the potential plight of the poor is illustrated by its insistence that the borders of fields should be left for "gleaning" (Lv 19:9–10); that the payment of a hired laborer's wages should not be delayed (Lv 19:13); and that interest should not be leveled on loans made to a fellow Israelite (Ex 22:24–26; Lv 25:35–37). By contrast, interest on loans to foreigners is allowed (Dt 23:20), allowing Israel to play its part in the commerce of the ancient Middle East. In the descriptions of trading activity under King Solomon, for example (1 Kgs 3–10), we see that substantial national wealth resulted, although it tended to be concentrated disproportionately at the royal court. The eighth-century prophets* condemn the exploitation of the poor by the rich (Am 5:21–24; Mi 3:9–12), while the wisdom* literature strikes a different note, seeing prosperity as the sequel to industrious endeavor, but also recommending trustworthiness and integrity (e.g., Prv 10:9 and 12:11).

2. New Testament

In the New Testament, the basic assumption that human beings should work remains (e.g., 2 Thes 3:6–13), but references to economic activity tend to be more incidental. Some claim that in parables* such as the laborers in the vineyard (Mt 20:1–16) or the talents (Mt 25:14–30), Jesus* was laying down principles for the payment of wages (the one seemingly very egalitarian, the other highly meritocratic). This is very doubtful, however: it is more likely that the parables were means for him to explain and teach God's relationship with humanity. On the other hand, Jesus repeatedly warned about the dangers of wealth and the worship of Mammon (Mt 6:19–34; Mk 10:17–31; Lk 12:15–21). Merchants are included along with rulers and mariners in the condemnation of Babylon in Revelation 18, in which they are seen as no more than traffickers at the service of ostentation.

3. From the Patristic Period to the Reformation

The difference in emphasis between Old Testament and New helps to explain why the function and occupation of trade were accepted more readily in Jewish communities than Christian ones in the patristic period and in the Middle Ages. However, while the church often sought to distance itself from such activities, it could not wholly avoid questions relating to it, not least because the church was an institution that depended on wealth-creating activity for its survival.

This is graphically illustrated in the case of the monastic orders, which were committed to vows of poverty. The Cistercian order, for example, eventually acquired considerable economic power. In the 13th and 14th centuries, issues of economic morality became associated with the Dominican and Franciscan chairs of theology in Paris. Three key issues dominated the debates.

a) Compulsion (ius necessitatis). Thomas* Aquinas affirms the right to private property, qualified by concern for the common good*. There is an obligation to minister to those in need and, if this is not met, the person in dire need may steal (ST IIa IIae, q. 66, a. 7). This latter was not a view that met with universal agreement, and other writers (particularly, later, the Puritans) would emphasize the rights of property holders.

b) Just Price. Aquinas, Duns* Scotus, and Peter Olivi (1248–98) developed the concept of a "just price," the one that rewards the seller and satisfies the customer. A seller may guard against loss, but should not take advantage of the buyer's need. This was also taught by Luther*, who criticized the avarice of contemporary merchants, but recognized that such considerations as the cost of labor, distance of transport, and level of risk serve to make precise calculation of a just price complex, and something that could be variously settled by local law, custom, or individual conscience*.

c) Usury. Basil* (Hom. II in Ps. 14, PG 29, 264D–80D), Ambrose* (De Tobia, PL 14, 591–622), and John Chrysostom* (Hom. in Matt. 56, 5–6, PG 58, 555–58) explicitly condemn the charging of interest, or usury, which they believed ran contrary to Christian obligations of love* and mercy*. (It is only much later that the word "usury" would acquire the meaning of excessive charging of interest.) This disapproval was embodied in church canons from the Council of Elvira (306) onward, and maintained for the next millennium, although enforcement of it was never complete. A variety of arguments were used in condemning usury, some being borrowed from the Bible* (e.g., Lk 6:35, cited alongside Old Testament references), others being based on natural law (e.g., Aristotle's argument that money is essentially barren, so that it is "unnatural" to make money out of it, Politics 1, 10, 1258 b 7). Aquinas argues that money has no value except in use, and that therefore lending represents double-charging and is unfair (ST IIa IIae, q. 78). However, he allows payment of compensation for the risk involved in lending, an exception formalized by other Scholastic theologians (Scholasticism*) in the phrase damnum emergens and a practice that came to be commonplace at the time loans were made. Hostiensis (†1271) and Antoninus (1389–1459) also permitted interest on the grounds of loss of gain (lucrum cessans). Questioning of the ban on interest therefore predated the Reformation, but relaxation of it accelerated from that period. Calvin* did not regard the Israelite prohibition as universal (regarding it as an aspect of the Mosaic law particular to their “political constitution”); he therefore allows interest, in a limited way, so long as it does not infringe charity and equity (CR 24, 679–83). From the 16th century onward, there was a tendency, reflected in national legislation (e.g., the 1571 Act in England) to evaluate lending not so much in terms of the declared motive, but in terms of the level of interest charged.

4. Modern Times

Calvin’s more tolerant attitude to trade is often linked to the expansion in economic activity that took place in the 16th century. In exploring why Protestant countries grew faster than Catholic ones, Max Weber (1864–1920) posited a link between the burgeoning spirit of capitalism and the Calvinist doctrine of predestination*, claiming that insecurity about salvation* led people to look for signs of God’s blessing* in their material condition. Attitudes of thrift and industriousness, and an understanding of God’s world as ripe for discovery and development, probably did encourage a “work ethic” that paved the way for the Industrial Revolution. However, this ethic has gradually become secularized, just as economics has come to be regarded as an autonomous discipline in which the laws of supply and demand wield ultimate authority when it comes to the setting of wages and prices. As the global economy has grown increasingly sophisticated, so the influence of the churches had been reduced, although they sometimes intervene in the economic domain. Christian individuals and organizations (e.g., in England, trade unions inspired by Methodism*) played a part in the struggle against inhuman conditions during the initial period of industrialization.

5. Contemporary Problems

The growth of the modern company has been accelerated, in many countries, by legislation that limits the liability of shareholders and reduces the risk in investment. Although limited liability has helped to provide industry with the capital it needs, it has not escaped moral criticism from some observers (Goyder 1987). First, it tends to separate stewardship from ownership, since shareholders, increasingly represented by intermediate institutions, such as pension funds, have little or no involvement in the running of the company. Share-ownership schemes among employees go a small way toward overcoming this separation. Second, limited liability fails to guarantee the exercise of corporate moral responsibility, because creditors of a failed company are often left with debts unpaid.

The large, anonymous nature of many modern organizations and the repetitive nature of work on assembly lines have also been challenged (e.g., Schumacher 1987) on the grounds that they fail to respect the person and allow no space for creativity and responsibility. Changes, however, are taking place, with companies being restructured into smaller units and semiautonomous work groups, while nonspecialized work is increasingly done by robots. This in turn creates a new problem, since it leads to the unemployment of unskilled workers.

Another practice that has been criticized is the way goods are marketed and advertised. Marketing has been blamed (Packard 1957) for high-pressure sales, misleading claims, the use of subliminal messages, and promoting materialism. Yet if goods are to be bought and sold in the marketplace, a process of communication between consumers and producers is inevitable. Nevertheless, the techniques used warrant careful attention.

Finally, some fundamental questions remain and are still being debated. Some Christians (e.g., Novak 1991) have embraced economic liberalism enthusiastically; others have criticized it strongly, on Marxist lines (theology of liberation*). The history of eastern Europe, however, demonstrates that a centralized economy is not viable. A more balanced view of capitalism recognizes that it is not simply an unjust system, and that there are many variants upon it, rather than a single entity of this name. One thinks of the difference between the social or “communitarian” concerns of Germany or Japan, on the one hand, and the individualism of the United States and Britain on the other—not to mention the French paradoxes in this respect.

Perhaps the main moral challenge facing affluent countries today is that of aid to the Third World, which is not just a matter of the provision of emergency aid, but of finding ways to help poorer countries to become true participants in the world’s trading system. At present, producers in these countries struggle because of the high cost of loans from the West (which triggered a “debt crisis” in the 1980s) and the low level of prices for primary commodities. Their plight will be alleviated only by the emergence of a new type of self-denying “ethical” investors and consumers, and by employees from such countries reaching positions of seniority and influence in multinational corporations. At present, all this is somewhat unlikely to happen.

- M. Weber (1920), Die protestantische Ethik und der Geist der Kapitalismus, in Gesammelte Aufsätze zur Religionssoziologie, vol. 1, Tübingen.
- R. Tawney (1926), Religion and the Rise of Capitalism, London.
- W. Temple (1942), Christianity and Social Order, Harmondsworth.
- J. Ellul (1954), L'homme et l'argent, Neuchâtel.
- J. T. Noonan (1957), The Scholastic Analysis of Usury, Cambridge, Mass.
- V. Packard (1957), The Hidden Persuaders, New York.
- C. J. H. Wright (1983), Living as People of God, Leicester.
- B. Griffiths (1984), The Creation of Wealth, London.
- A. Storkey (1986), Transforming Economy, London.
- G. Goyder (1987), The Just Enterprise, London.
- C. Schumacher (1987), To Live and Work, Bromley.
- M. Tamari (1987), With All Your Possessions, London.
- D. Hay (1989), Economics Today, Leicester.
- John Paul II (1991), Centesimus annus, AAS 83, 793–867.
- M. Novak (1991), The Spirit of Democratic Capitalism, London.
- R. H. Preston (1991), Religion and the Ambiguities of Capitalism, London.
- O. Langholm (1992), Economics in the Medieval Schools, Leyden.
- R. Higginson (1993), Called to Account, Guildford.
- T. J. Gorrige (1994), Capital and the Kingdom, London.
- H. Puel (1995), L'éthique au défi, Paris.
- P. van Parijs (1996), "Économie," DEPhM, 459–65.

RICHARD HIGGINSON

See also Ethics; Marx, Karl; Property; Society; Work

Maritain, Jacques. See Thomism

Marriage

A. Sacramental Theology

1. Overview

From the beginning, Christian communities intervened, in certain circumstances or situations, in order to guide and celebrate the life of couples*, whose members received baptism* and had to take part in the Eucharist*. As the Eastern churches (Greco-Byzantine, Armenian, Syriac, Coptic, and others) developed over the course of the first millennium, the practice of having a bishop* or a priest* solemnly bless a couple became widespread. This mystery* in the form of liturgy* became the obligatory form for the entry of believers into the state of marriage. Its development took longer in the Latin West, where it was linked to the elaboration of the notion of sacrament*. Later, the Eastern churches adapted some aspects of this notion to their own dogmatic* theologies. According to this approach, a sacrament is a sacred sign instituted by God*, through Jesus Christ, so that the sanctification that this sign has received as its signifying function may be operative, by this means, among the believers in question. A definition of this type acquired its technical status around 1150. From then on, it was applied to seven sacred signs, including marriage (Peter Lombard, Summa Sententiarum IV, d. 2 and 26; PL 192, 842, and 908).

This did not put an end to debate, which was given new impetus when the Reformers expressed an extreme attachment to the idea that marriage between believers does not have the status of a sacrament of Christ in the strict sense. This was the view taken by Luther*, for example, from whose writings were derived the formulas suggested to pastors* in the "booklet on marriage" attached as an appendix to the Lesser Catechism of 1529 (BSLK 528–34, FEL 320–22).

Calvin* takes the same view in the final version of the Institutio Christianae Religionis (Institutes of the Christian Religion, 1560, Book IV, ch. XIX, §34–37). Nevertheless, the Reformers strongly emphasized the honor and duties of the conjugal bond, and of the family*, and the formation of couples among the faithful was normally accompanied by the giving of a blessing by a pastor.

Both in the East and in the West, such theological positions were based on a small group of fundamental texts, above all on the words of Jesus* that had established the Christian rule of the indissolubility of marriage. According to the Gospels*, Jesus interpreted the verse “they shall become one flesh” (Gn 2:24, quoted in the New Testament in Greek, from the Septuagint) as evidence for the primordial vocation of the sexes at the time of the Creation*, and provided the authentic and definitive interpretation of it: “What therefore God has joined together, let not man separate” (Mt 19:6; Mk 10:6–9). With his sovereign authority*, Jesus rejects the forms of divorce that the law* of Moses had provided for Jewish couples (Mt 5:31f. and 19:7–9; Mk 10:3–9; see Lk 16:18 and 1 Cor 7:10f.).

The same text, “one flesh,” is repeated on other occasions in the New Testament, in teachings that became important to the theology of marriage. The union of a man and a woman* is an image for the participation of believers in Christ according to the body and the spirit (1 Cor 6:15–20); above all, it is an image of the relationship between Christ and the church, his spouse (Eph 5:29–32). The latter passage uses the term “mystery,” and the Latin translation of this term as sacramentum helped to fix the image of marriage in medieval theology and in Catholicism*. However, there is a larger body of biblical texts at stake.

2. Biblical Sources

a) Ancient Israel. Marriage in Israel is not marked by any religious act and has nothing to do with priestly authority, but being united in marriage is defined as entering a holy covenant* (Ez 16:8; Prv 2:17; Mal 2:14) and is celebrated by a blessing, either in public (Gn 24:60; Ru 4:11f.) or in private, between the man and the woman (Tb 8:4–8; the formula given in this apocryphal work has had an influence on Christian liturgies). Violation of marriage (adultery) is generally regarded as an offense against the law of God, which is the basis of the collective existence of the holy people; it is subject to public punishment. Marriage to a foreigner is strictly forbidden (Dt 7:3f.) as an offense against the holiness* of the people. To turn away from the true God is, by analogy, to commit adultery (Hosea; Jer 3:1–10; Ez 16 and 23). Conversely, God’s faithfulness and tenderness are praised in images of marriage: these are reprised in the New Testament (Rom 9:25, quoting Hos 2:25, or 2:23 according to the Septuagint; 2 Cor 11:2; Rev 19:7f. and 21:1–11). These same images came to typify the spiritual theology* both of the relationship between humanity and Christ and the relationship between Christ’s human soul* and the eternal divine nature of the Word*.

b) Christ’s Disciples. The disciples of Christ form a holy community in their turn (Acts 9:13 and 9:31–41; 2 Cor 1:1 and 13:12; Col 1:2ff.; 1 Pt 2:9f.). Infidelity to the Son of God is compared to prostitution (Rev 2:18–23); it follows that the misconduct of one who has been baptized calls for a response from the assembled church (1 Cor 5, which concerns an incestuous relationship). It is not to his hearers in general but to his disciples that Jesus teaches the absolute rejection of divorce—at any rate, that is the narrative construction that Mark puts on the point (Mk 10:10ff.). Again, it is to his disciples alone that Jesus addresses the saying (Mt 19:10ff.) about those who are celibate for the sake of the Kingdom*, a condition of life that presupposes a special vocation or gift—what Paul calls a charisma (1 Cor 7:7).

In New Testament times, abstention from marriage could be presented as a duty for all the disciples. Two verses in Luke’s Gospel (14:26 and 18:29), praising those who leave their wives, could be interpreted in this sense. Paul is aware of this view, but refuses to approve it as a rule of conduct valid for all (1 Cor 7:25ff.). Although his condemnation of marriage (“Encratism”) was possible in the spiritual climate of the time, one letter in the Pauline corpus denounces it as a false doctrine (1 Tm 4:3) and presents motherhood as a good way of life (2:15 and 5:14).

Those Pauline texts that describe the life of a married couple situate it within the framework of the Hellenistic household as a whole, including children as well as servants or slaves. Christian husbands and wives form the focus of the household, being ordained for one another through relations of faithfulness and love* (Col 3:12ff.; Eph 5:18ff.). At the heart of the household, the Christian couple, living in mutual accord, open up a privileged space for prayer* (1 Cor 7:5; 1 Pt 3:7). Additionally, the household is quite frequently presented as the center of a local church, a specific community (1 Cor 16:15f. and 16:19; Rom 16:5; Col 4:15; Phlm 2; see Heb 13:1–6). This is not in every case a matter of couples in which both husband and wife are believers. According to Paul, a man or woman who is converted to Christianity is not required to end his or her marriage to a spouse who remains a non-Christian (1 Cor 7:14ff.; see 1 Pt 3:1f.). Nevertheless, a widow who wishes to remarry “is free to be married to whom she wishes, only in the Lord” (1 Cor 7:39).

These themes could be interpreted, as they frequently have been within Protestantism* (see Grimm 1984), in the context of family and social ethics*. The inspiration of Christianity could overhaul behavior, or provide it with clearer motives, but this did not mean the introduction of any new notion of marriage within the church, specifically related to the conditions of life shared by men and women. Nevertheless, the theology of the Eastern churches, as of the Catholic Church, has based the value of Christian marriage not on a simple ethical confirmation of the primordial status of the conjugal vocation but on the gift of participation, through the grace* of the Spirit of God, in the new creation* and in the body of Christ (2 Cor 5:17). Certain types of Protestant theology, interpreting Paul’s ideas, have adopted a similar approach (see Schrage 1995). Within these churches, there has been a recognition of marriage as something truly new: the novelty of an intimately transforming grace that is not simply the grace of the aid that God might give on other occasions in order to support the maintenance of family virtues*.

In respect of the nature of family structures, the innovation in Christianity, by contrast to the first covenant, is based first and foremost on the figure of Christ himself. According to the faith* of the church, the Son of God is also the Son of David, and belongs to the house or lineage of David, which is the lineage of the kings appointed by God for his people. With Jesus, the genealogical principle that sustained the series of royal anointments and structured the history* of God’s people ceases to be valid. Jesus does not prolong the line of descent, and the central group of disciples formed for the future does not include his brothers and sisters: the genealogical structure ends with Jesus (Mt 1:17f.), because the totality of the innovation is present in him, in the plenary action of God’s Spirit (Mt 3:17 par.). The permanent celibacy of some of the baptized could then be understood within the church as a participation in Christ’s innovation, as a charisma.

Paul’s teaching suggests (1 Cor 7:7) that, nonetheless, the married life of the baptized might contain a complementary innovation, a specific grace that parallels such celibacy for the sake of the kingdom. Yet it also suggests—as in the statement that “it is better to marry than to be aflame with passion” (1 Cor 7:9)—that the innovation of Christ’s graces in respect of married couples is merely that of protection against misuse of sexuality. The Western church spoke of marriage as a sacrament, a sacred sign of the relationship between Christ and the church, long before there was a recognition, during the 13th century, of the positive, sanctify-ing efficacy of marriage, similar to that of the other sacraments of the New Covenant (Schillebeeckx 1963).

3. Traditions of the Churches

a) Churches in the First Centuries. During its first centuries, there was a tendency within Christianity to distrust marriage, as Encratism was taken up by certain forms of gnosis* and then by Manicheism*. However, the churches recognized marriage as having a positive value in the life of Christian communities. Ignatius of Antioch suggests that the formation of a couple by two baptized people should be subject to the supervision of a bishop (Ad Polycarpum 5, SC 10 bis, 174–77); Tertullian* eulogizes the marriages that the church has fostered and blessed (Ad Uxorem II, 8, 6, SC 273, 148f.). Yet there was no systematic development of the liturgical aspect of marriage within the churches, if we are to believe the sources that are available to us. By contrast, we have evidence of numerous disciplinary decisions, in line with the spiritual and ethical guidance contained in the apostolic writings. The precise wording of these decisions varies from region to region and from period to period, but the issues that they address are fairly constant: whether a marriage is legitimate, whether it is to be prohibited as incestuous or degrading, or whether a separation is required in view of the reception of baptism by an adult or participation in the Eucharist.

The main problem in respect of marriage concerned the situation that may have been the intended topic of two passages in Matthew’s Gospel that both include the clause “except on the ground of sexual immorality [porneia]” (5:32 and 19:9). The church fathers* usually interpreted this clause as referring to the situation that arises for a couple when one of them has committed the sin of adultery. Three questions then arose: whether the other spouse should separate from the one who has committed adultery and cease to cohabit with him or her; whether the other spouse could contract a new marriage; and whether the same rules applied for husbands as for wives. Such questions followed on from Paul’s question (1 Cor 7:15) about a couple in which one spouse remains a nonbeliever, thus disrupting the marriage: how should the Christian spouse behave?

The problem of remarriage after being widowed was also the subject of varying responses; the prohibition on remarried men being ordained was particularly strict (ordination*). For the laity*, remarriage was merely tolerated, and it was not honored in the same way as first marriages were. This is one example of a moral question (see B below) being treated in the patristic period as if it were a legal question. Unlike the New Testament texts on marriage, these decisions could not be interpreted simply as exhortations or pieces of wisdom.

Among Jews and pagans, sterility, attributed to the woman, had often been regarded as a sufficient motive for allowing the husband to become free to contract a new marriage. According to the consensus among the churches, however, failure to produce children could not justify a couple separating. On this point, the Christian position was clearly a distinctive one: it is agreement between a man and a woman that constitutes the essence of marriage, not fertility as such. It was then asked whether a spiritual agreement of wills could in itself be an authentic marriage, or whether bodily union was necessary for a relationship that had been given as a sign of the union between the Word and humanity. Theology and law both accepted that a marriage that is valid according to the laws of the church—in the medieval Latin phrase, ratum—could exist between two baptized spouses without being consummated (consummatum) in sexual union. What was essential in order for a marriage to be valid was the free and responsible exchange of consent to be joined to one another indissolubly and irreversibly. However, according to the canonical statements issued during the Middle Ages—and still accepted in the canon law of the Catholic Church—a marriage that is merely ratum may be dissolved by a church tribunal. Hence, one could argue that, strictly speaking, only a marriage that is both ratum and consummatum is indissoluble. Nowadays, nonconsummation can be established on the basis of the apparent affective and psychological comportment of the couple, whether or not there have been physical sexual relations. Annulments are a different matter: they depend on the initial absence, recognized later, of a true agreement, conscious (fully informed) and free, between the two parties.

Despite the influence over the church fathers of the ancient popular philosophy* that saw the purpose of marriage as procreation*, it is clear that patristic theology made a fundamental connection between the holiness* of marriage and the union of two persons seeking mutual support and love. The union of their bodies, whether it produced descendants or remained infertile, was seen as the normal accompaniment to this spiritual agreement of two wills. This theology endowed the sexual act with spiritual meaning but did not regard it entirely without suspicion. According to Augustine* in particular, whose influence was enormous, the sexual act, while it is good in itself, is always accompanied by a culpable indulgence among the sons of Adam*. The act appears suspect even in the case of those who have been redeemed; and this reservation had an impact upon views of marriage itself as a way of life.

One more factor influenced the history of marriage as sacrament. Rabbinical Judaism* had developed a marriage ceremony that includes blessings in which God is praised for his gifts and his favor is sought on behalf of the young couple (according to the Talmud, Posner 1973, 1038f.; on contemporary practice, see French translation in Boudier 1978, 36f.). In particular, these texts celebrate the primordial fertility of the woman. Similar sentiments can be found in the formulas of blessing that gradually came into use in the Christian churches, yet these were not necessarily understood as being part and parcel of the formation of an indissoluble marriage as such.

b) The East. A crucial step was taken in the Christian East around 900, when the Byzantine Emperor Leo VI ordered the official codification of legal decisions on marriage among the subjects of the “New Rome*.” The law required that for a marriage between two baptized people to be authentic, the couple had to receive a liturgical blessing administered by a bishop or a priest.

This imperial legislation, in the form of decrees, also confirmed an older Eastern practice by permitting remarriage for the husband of a woman who had been found guilty of adultery. This interpretation of the clauses in Matthew’s Gospel* remains in force today, with variations, such as on the question of whether tolerance of remarriage extends to wives betrayed by their husbands. From time to time, remarriage was sometimes accepted in the Latin West, but it was definitively rejected by the Catholic Church. The seventh canon of the Council of Trent*, on the sacrament of marriage (DCO 1532–35), confirmed the rejection of tolerance of remarriage, but it is written in such a way as to exclude any formal or direct condemnation of practice among the Greeks.

Of course, the development of the theology of marriage in the East did not depend on imperial legislation alone: analogous theological positions are also to be found in several non-Byzantine Eastern churches. This may be explained by reference to the fundamental role of the liturgy in Christian life as interpreted in the traditions* of these churches. In its celebrations, presided over by a bishop or a priest, the liturgical gathering takes part in the new creation engendered by the Easter mystery, made present by the Holy Spirit. Within this gathering, the making of a marriage, the sign of the covenant between Christ and the church, is, in some sense, also called to take part in this holy act of new creation. It is this participation that is announced and effected by the liturgical blessing on the couple at the threshold of their shared life. The full and solemn form of this blessing cannot be renewed, and a simpler ritual is provided for a second marriage, which can take place only after one has been either widowed or separated as a result of one's spouse having committed adultery.

c) The West. The decree Tametsi, issued by the Council of Trent in 1566 (DCO 1534–39) has had an impact comparable to that of Leo VI's Novellae. The decree established a strict obligation to celebrate marriage in public, in the presence of a minister, being a priest endowed with a special power of jurisdiction* for this purpose: normally, this is the priest of the prospective wife's home parish, or a priest whom he has delegated. The council laid down that the absence of such a privileged witness was sufficient to render a couple incapable of giving a mutual consent that would be valid and therefore sacramental.

By adopting this complex formulation, the council avoided making the involvement of the priest into the basis of the matrimonial bond. While the priest's involvement was necessary, the council respected the doctrine that had become most widely accepted among Western canonists and theologians in earlier centuries: that the element that constitutes marriage is the valid exchange of consents—an exchange that was not required to be performed in public before the Council of Trent. The rules laid down by the council were gradually imposed throughout the Catholic Church. However, the rules that came into effect in the wake of Vatican* II have modified the decisions made at Trent by accepting that the privileged witness mentioned in Tametsi need not be a priest (or a bishop). In “ordinary” cases, a deacon* may also receive jurisdiction to exercise this ministry; and in cases where it is necessary, laypeople may also be given it, as what Catholic canon law calls an “extraordinary” measure. However, these two modifications are valid only for Catholics of the Latin Rite. The special code issued in 1990 for Catholics of the Eastern Rite, on the authority of the Holy See, does not contain these provisions; canon 828 of this code (AAS 1990, 1225–26) recognizes valid sacramental unions among such Catholics only on the basis of the liturgical rite of marriage, that is, on the basis of the blessing celebrated by a priestly minister, in line with the common tradition of the Eastern churches mentioned above. Thus, the 1990 code adopts the same position as the Eastern churches, which do not permit deacons to preside at the sacramental celebration of marriage.

In opposition to the Reformers, the Council of Trent also affirmed the sacramental nature of marriage between baptized persons: not only did Christ desire that marriage should signify the union of the Son of God with the church, his spouse, but he also conferred upon this sacrament the power to raise the union of the couple into the life of grace, giving this union a definitive sacred aspect. This view of marriage has been continually reiterated in the teaching of the Catholic Church. However, it has often been subject to both legal and theological questioning.

Questions have been raised on the interpretation of the respective roles, in the constitution of the sacramental and indissoluble bond, of the two main elements, the exchange of consents, which, in a sense, the couple themselves “administer,” and the public celebration in a church, which a priest normally “administers,” not only on the basis of his jurisdiction but also, and in correlation, on the basis of his status as a priest (priesthood). It seems that the Eastern theology on the role of the liturgy in the sacrament of marriage was not rejected at Trent (Duval 1985; Bourgeois and Sesboué 1995). Other questions have been raised on the relationship between the authority of the church and that of the state and its tribunals. Following the Council of Trent, one of the commonest sources of conflict was the question of the need for children to have the consent of their parents in order to be married. States often supported parents against children, while Catholic canon law tended to do the opposite. In modern states, a doctrine has been developed that makes a distinction between, on the one hand, the establishing of a conjugal bond according to the rules and values of the existing social order—a “contract” that, of course, goes beyond the mere financial “contract” of marriage in the contemporary sense—and, on the other hand, the elevation of this contract to the rank of a holy sacrament within the life of the church. In opposition to the opinions of the jurists of the modern state, the Catholic Church has consistently affirmed that it is impossible to separate the “contract” from the “sacrament” among the baptized members of the church.

4. Contemporary Issues

Today, Catholic practice is characterized by a greater attention to the liturgical celebration of marriage, comparable not only to the traditional position of the Eastern churches, but also to recent practice among Protestants, who are also tending to strengthen the role of the blessing of marriage, although there are divergences as to the interpretation of this ceremony (on French Protestants, see Ansaldi 1995). This common tendency has been encouraged in many countries by the rise in the number of marriages between Christians from different churches.

There are shared difficulties too. Nowadays, baptized people who no longer clearly confess their agreement with the faith of the church, or even state plainly that they have distanced themselves from it, frequently request the liturgical celebration of their marriages. Catholic theologians in particular have discussed whether their requests should be granted, and how the nature of their conjugal bond should be defined (Millas 1990; Candelier 1991; Lawler 1991). The diversity of cultures and customs poses different problems: in Africa, in particular, the problem of ancestral heritage; in the East, changes in sexual socialization and marital morality. Some Christians influenced by such cultures live in family situations that have a certain stability and human value but, for Catholics in particular, do not meet the conditions required for them to be granted access to the sacrament. Should the canon law principle of the inseparable nature of the “contract” and the “sacrament”—a principle frequently reiterated and upheld (Baudot 1987)—go on being applied, or should the churches, in conditions to be determined, recognize a certain moral and social value in the “contract” that links such couples? Could a public status for such couples be combined with the duties of Christian life that they obviously have? Within the Catholic Church, which has seen such questions being urgently raised, some theologians have formulated responses compatible with the tradition that their church has inherited (e.g., Sequeira 1985; Örsy 1986; Deimel 1993; Puza 1993).

A spirituality of Christian marriage has frequently developed within the various churches since 1940, and numerous documents have been influenced by it. Vatican II defined the role of marriage in the structuring of God’s people in the second chapter of the constitution Lumen Gentium (no. 11, §2). The constitution Gaudium et Spes (December 1965, nos. 47–52) combines spiritual perspectives with attention to contemporary problems concerning fertility (see B below). The decree on the apostolic tasks of laypeople (AA, November 1965) includes an important passage on the role of married couples in society and in the church (no. 11). Other terms, and other ideas, are used in other Christian traditions, but it appears that there is a common tendency among the churches to breathe new life into the liturgies that govern the celebration of the realities of married life, and give spiritual guidance to Christians so that they may cope with the sorrows and joys of this vocation.

- W. Kornfeld and R. Cazelles (1957), “Mariage...,” DBS 5, 906–35.
- E. Schillebeeckx (1963), Het huwelijk, vol. 1, Bilthoven (Le mariage, 1966).
- R. Posner (1973), “Marriage Ceremony,” EJ 11, 1032–42.
- P. Vallin (1974), “La croissance de l’espèce humaine...,” RSR 62, 321–46.
- J. Meyendorff (1975), Marriage: An Orthodox Perspective, Crestwood, N.Y.
- P. Boudier (1978), Mariages entre juifs et chrétiens, Paris.
- C.H. Ratschow et al. (1982), “Ehe/Eherecht/Ehescheidung,” TRE 9, 308–62.
- P. Rémy (1983), “Que l’homme ne sépare pas...,” RDC 33, 250–75.
- E. Schmitt (1983), Le mariage chrétien dans l’œuvre de saint Augustin, Paris.
- R. Grimm (1984), L’institution du mariage, Paris.
- A. Duval (1985), Des sacrements au concile de Trente, Paris.
- J.-B. Sequeira (1985), Tout mariage entre baptisés est-il nécessairement sacramentel? Paris.
- W. Günther et al. (1986), “Marriage...,” Dictionary of New Testament Theology 2, Exeter, 575–90.
- L. Örsy (1986), Marriage in Canon Law, Wilmington.
- D. Baudot (1987), L’inséparabilité entre le contrat et le sacrement de mariage, Rome.
- J.A. Brundage (1987), Law, Sex, and Christian Society in Medieval Europe, Chicago.
- J. Gaudemet (1987), Le mariage en Occident, Paris.
- C. Brooke (1989), The Medieval Idea of Marriage, Oxford.
- P. Brown (1989), Body and Society, New York.
- J. Vernay (1989), “Le droit canonique du mariage,” in P. Valdrini (Ed.), Droit canonique, Paris, 370–437.
- J.M. Millas (1990), “Fe y sacramento del matrimonio,” Gr 71, 141–51.
- G. Candelier (1991), “Incroyance et validité du mariage sacramentel,” RDC 41/42, 81–145.
- M.G. Lawler (1991), “Faith, Contract, and Sacrament,” TS 52, 712–31.
- S. Demel (1993), “Standesamt, Ehe, Kirche,” StZ 211, 131–40.
- G. Mathon (1993), Le mariage des chrétiens, vol. 1, Paris.
- R. Puza (1993), “Der Abschluss des Ehebundes,” ThQ 173, 81–98.
- P. Vallin (1994), “Les traditions chrétiennes...,” in Religions et démographies..., Colloque du Saulchoir, Paris, 17–35.
- J. Ansaldi (1995), “Notes sur la bénédiction nuptiale,” ETR 70, 99–103.
- H. Bourgeois and B. Sesboüé (1995), Les signes du salut (Histoire des dogmes, vol. 3), Paris, 110–42, 192–99, 214–17.
- W. Schrage (1995), Der Erste Brief an die Korinther, 2 Teilband, 1 Kor 6–11 (Evangelisch-Katholischer Kommentar z. NT, VII/2), Göttingen.

PIERRE VALLIN

See also Anointing of the Sick; Baptism; Church and State; Confirmation; Eucharist; Family; Ordination/Order; Penance; Sacrament

B. Moral Theology

a) Scriptural Witness. In the Old Testament, marriage is envisaged first and foremost as a structure of patriarchal authority*, intended mainly to secure the perpetuation of the clan: the institutions of the levirate (Dt 25:5–10), concubinage (Gn 16), and provisional polygamy should be understood in this light. However, with the principle of exogamy, which makes its appearance in the prohibition of certain consanguineous marriages (Lv 18:6–18), marriage is also interpreted as an institution through which persons can recognize others: the other person becomes, through the very relationship of the couple*, a necessary “opposite,” to whom a bond of obligation is formed.

Under the influence of the theology* of the covenant*, in particular, marriage was increasingly understood as a relationship involving the human person in all his or her integrity, an exclusive relationship placed under the protection of the law of YHWH (Ex 20:14). Hosea evokes the one and only God* who, out of his free will and love, turns to his one and only chosen people* and reaches a lasting covenant with them (1–3; Jer 2:2; Ez 16). This approach, taken up in other books of the Bible, reinforced the tendency toward monogamy and gave a positive value to the woman* as the personal partner of the man (Mal 2:14ff.). The legal regulation of divorce reflects this approach: while the decision to divorce is left in the hands of the husband, he is obliged to write a letter of repudiation that will allow the wife to remarry (Dt 24:1–4).

As for the idea of the shared life of husband and wife, based on a personal and reciprocal relationship, its origins were traced to the narratives of the Creation*, in which individuals of both sexes are created in the image of God (Gn 1:27) and their living together is established by God, who wants to remedy human solitude by creating sexual union (Gn 2:18). Of course, there is no question here of an explicit basis for marriage, but the Yahwist commentator does make a link between the two partners becoming “one flesh,” having sexual relations, and conceiving children, on the one hand, and the legal act of “abandoning” one’s clan of origin.

Finally, as a basic unit of shared life, marriage is directly involved in original sin* and its consequences, manifested in the loss of innocence (Gn 3:7), and in the establishment of a structure of male domination over women (Gn 3:16).

References to marriage in the New Testament take up the traditions of the Old Testament, in particular those that are linked to the theme of the covenant.

They are marked by a characteristic tension. On the one hand, Jesus*—who himself remained unmarried, even though it was normal for rabbis to have wives—reduces the importance of all the old, familial bonds (Lk 14:26) in view of the approach of the Kingdom* of God, and attributes to celibacy a specific evangelical value (Mt 19:12). On the other hand, however, Jesus radically alters the status of the reciprocal commitment that constitutes marriage. Adultery is no longer to be understood as harming the well-being of another person, but as a wrong directly inflicted on one’s partner, and equally in the case of men as in the case of women (Mk 10:11f.). Just as Jesus does not limit his definition of adultery to the legally reprehensible act, but extends its meaning to the very moment that it is born “in his [the adulterer’s] heart” (Mt 5:27), so, in his view, marriage is a matter, not of effective possession, but of feeling. This is why the prohibition of divorce (Mk 10:2–12; Mt 19:9, subject to cases of “sexual immorality”) should lead the believer to repent his “hardness of heart.” While Moses took this hardening* into account when he authorized divorce, Jesus recalls us to the primordial will of the Creator, and presents marriage as a created order, attributing to God himself the Yahwist’s commentary on the union of a man and a woman who leave their parents in order to attach themselves to each other. Hence, he declares that those whom God has united may not be separated by human beings (Mt 19:4ff.). This rule should, however, be understood as being related not to the law* but to the gospel*: Jesus fulfils the prophecy* of the heart of flesh* that is to replace the “heart of stone” (Ez 36:26).

Jesus’ sayings are characterized by a tension arising from the expectation of the coming of the Kingdom. Once it had come, marriage would be abolished as an institution, if not as a way in which human beings relate to each other (Mk 12:25); at the same time, the notion of the Kingdom is specially expressed precisely through the image of the wedding (Mt 22:1–14; Acts 19:7). This eschatological tension is maintained in the teachings and exhortations of the apostles*. On the one hand, marriage is presented as one of the domains of everyday life ordained “in Christ” (Col 3:18f.; Eph 5:22–33; 1 Pt 3:1–7). On the other hand, Paul recommends that, because “the appointed time has grown very short” (1 Cor 7:29), the faithful should either follow his example and remain unmarried, or live within their marriages “as though they had [no wives]” (hos me, 1 Cor 7:29). Paul generally elaborates his precepts* in opposition to three rival positions. Against those who tended toward Encratism, he emphasizes the value of marriage as a gift of the Creator, who permits human beings to enjoy it “with thanksgiving” (1 Tm 4:3ff.). Against those who upheld the ascetic ideal of unconsummated marriage, he upholds the sharing of the sexual life as an integral and reciprocal obligation (1 Cor 7:3ff.). Finally, against those who tended toward spiritualism or libertinism, he celebrates the body as the temple of the Holy* Spirit and recognizes sexuality as a factor in social cohesion (1 Cor 6:12–20). Paul’s endorsement of the submission of wives in Ephesians 5:22–33—the locus classicus of the New Testament’s theology of marriage—is tempered by the exhortation that precedes it: “submitting to one another” (Eph 5:21), and the duties of husbands are to be motivated by their devoted love of Christ*. Thus, the idea that marriage should be modeled on the relationship between Christ and his church* forms the link between the Christian ethics* of marriage and the church as a community within which one’s first training is conducted.

b) Ancient and Medieval Church. There was a tendency within the ancient and medieval church to transpose the eschatological tension that pervades these New Testament texts into a system of values. The value of marriage certainly continued to be emphasized, in opposition both to Manicheism* and to Montanism*, but marriage came to be definitively subordinated to the ideal of virginity (Thomas* Aquinas, ST IIa IIae, q. 152, a. 3), partly as a consequence of the general deprecation of the active life as compared to contemplation*. Separation by mutual consent, which was permitted in Roman law*, was strictly forbidden to Christians, with the sole exception of those cases in which both husband and wife entered the monastic life. The ideal of virginity was even introduced into the doctrine of marriage. Thus, Augustine* was able in his later works to emphasize the physical nature of marriage while postulating an ideal progression from sexuality without desire to “continent” marriage, and then from such marriage to celibacy.

By identifying what could be called concupiscence with sexual desire, Augustine reinforced a traditional attitude of anxiety about the passions*, which Christianity had inherited from Greek thought, and introduced an internal tension in the doctrine of the “three goods” of marriage: procreation* (proles), control of sexuality (fides), and indissolubility (sacramentum). Of course, these goods presupposed physical union, but they were also celebrated as counterweights to carnal desire, which became a venial sin within marriage. In particular, the indissoluble sacramental bond of marriage could be envisaged, through a remarkable abstraction, as being independent of the actual conjugal union, so that, for example, the sacrament could be seen as in itself an obstacle to remarriage (De nuptiis et concupiscentia I, 11). In this way—and despite the fact that Augustine set his reflections on marriage within the framework of a way of life, considered more generally—he opened the way, despite himself, to an approach that saw these goods as “ends,” to which the life shared within marriage could be subordinated. This attitude lasted from Augustine’s day into modern times.

It fell to Aquinas to open up a new line of thought within this overall development. Adopting Aristotle’s teleology of nature* and reason*, Aquinas makes the perpetuation of the human species through procreation the decisive criterion for sexual union. Accordingly, the conscious pursuit of this purpose determines whether specific actions “conform” (ST IIa IIae, q. 153). In this context, sexual pleasure itself is reevaluated to the extent that, despite the momentary extinction of individual reason, it nonetheless serves the superior purpose of nature and reason (perpetuation of the species). This logic still characterizes the Catholic Church’s teaching on marriage today, including its answers to specific questions of moral theology, such as the question of contraception. The Western Christian tradition* has generally been characterized by a degree of rigor—notably in its prohibition of remarriage after civil divorce—and by the role that it gives to theological conceptions. The teaching and practice of the Eastern churches in this domain have been shaped above all by the liturgy* of marriage: the remarriage of divorced spouses gives rise to a specific ritual in which this act is presented as a penance* and a new beginning.

Marriage was initially regarded as a purely secular matter, to which the church did no more than give its blessing* (missa pro sponsis, c. 400). Eventually, however, it became an authentically ecclesiastical institution, both in the West (Decretum Gratiani, 1140) and in the East (Leo VI, 886–912). In German-speaking regions, the priest* even took the place of the provost who united the couple in facie ecclesiae: the legal act itself was performed in the nave of the church and integrated into the religious service.

c) Reformation and the Early Modern Period. Luther* defended liberty* in marriage on a number of grounds. As against the plethora of complications to which marriage was subjected in his day, both in secular law* and in canon law, he emphasized that no one could be excluded from marriage, which is a necessary aspect of the identity of every man and woman as created beings. As against the church’s assertion of the superior status of the monastic life, he argued for the preeminence of the married state, which represented a “vocation” to faith* and love. It is a vocation to faith because, unlike the “clerical state” and the vows that commit the clergy to it, marriage does not give human beings the power to justify themselves by their characters or their works*. It is a vocation to love because, unlike monks, married men do not remove themselves from daily interaction with the distress of their neighbors, as represented by their wives and children. Finally, as against the sacramental conception of marriage as a way of salvation*, Luther emphasized the fact that sexual relations need to be purified and sanctified by the word* of God. Accordingly, while he regarded marriage as a “profane thing,” subordinate to the earthly government of God, he never considered it to be a condition deprived of spirituality. On the contrary, the everyday temptations and miseries of marriage make it the “most spiritual condition of all” (WA 12, 105, 29), to the extent that “by nature, it teaches us to see the hand and the grace of God, and obliges us truly to believe” (WA 12, 106, and 126f.). This conviction pervades Luther’s pamphlet on marriage, the Traubüchlein (1529), in which the consent of husband and wife is also conceived as a “witness of humility,” an appeal to the “divine aid” provided in the blessing* of the wedding. On the question of divorce and remarriage, Luther adopts a pastoral approach, permitting them for injured parties in cases of adultery, voluntary abandonment of the marital home, and concealment of impotence. Zwingli* in Zurich (from 1522) and Calvin* in Geneva also took care to establish matrimonial courts; in Geneva, legitimate grounds for divorce remained decidedly more limited. (There were frequent appeals from these institutions to regional consistory courts.) Some groups of radical Reformers developed a libertine and functionalist ethics of marriage: for example, polygamy was permitted in the “Anabaptist kingdom” of Münster as a way of ensuring that the holy ones of the apocalypse could be born.

d) Contemporary Problems. The traditions of the Enlightenment and romanticism have formed an unstable compound in modern thinking on the couple and on marriage.

During the Enlightenment, marriage, like all other social relations, was conceived on the model of the contract. Marriage did not merely begin with a contract—as in the traditional formula, consensus facit matrimonium (“consent makes a marriage”), it was by its very nature a contract, by which two individuals consented, in the formula devised by Kant*, to “the reciprocal possession, throughout their lives, of their sexual attributes” (Grundlegung zur Metaphysik der Sitten [Foundations of the Metaphysics of Morals], Doctrine of Law, §24). As a result, considerations of individual, social, and political utility came to be regarded as primary, as evidenced in the massive increase in the number of grounds for divorce, emancipation from the moral teachings of the churches, and the establishment of (compulsory or optional) civil marriage. The “rational” easing of restrictions on divorce was already implied in the logic of contractual thought: the principle of individual autonomy, which permitted the partners to conclude the contract, also allowed them to break their commitment whenever it ceased to bring them the benefits that they had anticipated.

This “reification” of the conjugal bond inevitably provoked a reaction, which arrived in the form of “romantic subjectivization.” The formal element of marriage was reduced to a troublesome detail, and marriage was based entirely on affection. Love is marriage: such was the motto that Friedrich Schlegel (1772–1829) popularized through his novel Lucinde, and for which the young Schleiermacher* provided a theological foundation by exalting love and lovers into the celestial realm. Yet, while romanticism was a protest movement, it also had some obvious affinities with Enlightenment thought: for both movements, marriage had its roots in the resources of the individual. Whether it was interpreted as a “contract” or as a “relationship,” marriage remained an artifact, a bond that could be made, and broken, by the exertion of the sovereign will.

It was on this basis that the two traditions became compounded, producing the contemporary state of mind, which is defined by the dubious attempt to combine the greatest possible degree of individual autonomy with the greatest possible degree of affective intensity in mutual relations. Enlightenment utilitarianism* is thus freighted with all the demands of romanticism, which have become the very purpose of marriage and are therefore no longer necessarily linked to the concrete reality of a shared life. The relationship need not be maintained if it does not bring the partners the happiness that they expected. However, happiness is not something that can be directly assigned as a purpose, and it is characteristic of modernity that it expects more from the relationship of couples than it is capable of providing. The tendency to favor nonmatrimonial forms of shared life does not resolve the problem, for such relationships are also structured on the assumption that the bond should last only as long as it fulfils its affective purpose.

Christian theology and ethics must undoubtedly oppose this new version of the purposes of marriage by reactivating the critical system that they have already used over the course of the 20th century against traditional notions of the purposes of marriage. Karl Barth*, for example, has emphasized that marriage, as a form of shared life established by God, carries its own purpose in itself and is not to be legitimized by the realization of other purposes: he therefore defines marriage as an “exemplary sharing of life” (KD III/4, 211f.). This idea has not failed to find a response, for the canon law of the Catholic Church, as overhauled in the CIC of 1983, has also placed an emphasis on the personal dimension of marriage—marriage as unity of personal life (canon 1,055)—as against an approach invoking contract and purpose. However, in opposition to modern thought, which reduces the traditional goods of marriage to the self-fulfillment of the partners conceived as its only purpose, it is worth recalling once again the role that liberty* plays in the institution of marriage, and the organic solidarity that unites marriage as a form of life with the “fruits” that it produces. It is true that children do not give meaning to marriage; nevertheless, they must not be excluded a priori from the shared life of the married couple. Like those who are “celibate” on principle, couples who remain childless are displaying not disobedience to the “commandment” to multiply the species, but rather a radical lack of confidence in the goodness of the world*, as creation, and in the promise* of God’s blessing. Every marriage is also blessed in its children, through whom the world continues to be turned toward its eschatological goal. To claim a right to marriage and/or to the religious ceremony for homosexual couples is to neglect this organic link between marriage and its benefits, and to fail to understand that marriage is based on the physical and structural difference between the sexes, which are destined to experience their “unity” not on the basis of the same sex, but by finding their complement in the other sex.

- Augustine, De Genesi ad litteram; De bono coniugali; De nuptiis et concupiscentia; De civitate Dei, book XIV (BAug 18–19, 2, 23, 35).

- K. Barth (1948–51), KD III/2, III/4, (Dogmatique, vol. 11–12, 15–16, Geneva, 1961–65).
- J. Calvin (1559), Institutio Christianae Religionis, §34–37. CIC (1983).
- M. Luther, Ein Sermon von dem ehelichen Stand, WA 2, 166–71.
- M. Luther, Vom ehelichen Leben, WA 10/2, 275–304.
- M. Luther, Ein Traubüchlein für die einfältigen Pfarrherrn, WA 30, 3, 70–74.
- M. Luther, Das siebente Kapitel S. Pauli zu den Corinthern, WA 12, 95–142.
- F.D.E. Schleiermacher (1800), Vertraute Briefe über Friedrich Schlegels “Lucinde,” Lübeck-Leipzig; Die christliche Sitte, Berlin (2nd Ed. 1884).
- Thomas Aquinas, ST Ia IIae, q. 30–31; IIa IIae, q. 151–55.
- ♦ Kenneth E. Kirk (1933), Marriage and Divorce, London (2nd Ed. 1948).
- O. Lähteenmäki (1955), Sexus und Ehe bei Luther, Turuku.
- R. Bainton (1962), Sex, Love, and Marriage, London.
- H. Thielicke (1964), Theologische Ethik III, Tübingen.
- John T. Noonan (1965), Contraception, Cambridge, Mass. (2nd Ed. 1986).
- H. Ringeling (1968), Theologie und Sexualität, Gütersloh.
- M.F. Berrouard (1971), Saint Augustin et l’indissolubilité du mariage, StPatr 11, 291–306.
- J. Meyendorff (1975), Marriage: An Orthodox Perspective, New York.
- P. Ramsey (1975), One Flesh, Bramcote, Great Britain.
- M. Foucault (1976), Histoire de la sexualité, t. I: La volonté de savoir, Paris.
- W. Kasper (1977), Zur Theologie der christlichen Ehe, Mainz.
- William E. May (1981), Sex, Marriage, and Chastity, Chicago.
- C.H. Ratschow et al. (1982), “Ehe, Eherecht, Ehescheidung,” TRE 9, 311–62.
- S. Hauerwas (1984), “Marriage and the Family,” QRT 56, 20/2, 4–24.
- L. Orsy (1986), Marriage in Canon Law, Wilmington, Del.
- O. Bayer (Ed.) (1988), Ehe: Zeit zur Antwort, Neukirchen-Vluyn.
- Ch. Brooke (1989), The Medieval Idea of Marriage, Oxford.
- B. Wannenwetsch (1993), Die Freiheit der Ehe, Neukirchen-Vluyn.
- P.L. Reynolds (1994), Marriage in the Western Church, Leyden.

BERND WANNENWETSCH

See also Adam; Couple; Creation; Ethics, Sexual; Family; Procreation; Woman

Marsilius of Inghen. See Nominalism

Martyrdom

1. Origin and Meaning of the Term

“Martyrdom” comes from the Greek marturia or marturion, meaning “witness,” “testimony”; but in Christian usage it means, more narrowly, death undergone in witness to Christ*. (Those whose sufferings for Christ did not result in death are called “confessors.”) This narrower meaning is not attested until the latter half of the second century, in the Martyrdom of Polycarp, and there are a number of theories as to how it developed. An obvious link between witness and suffering is provided by the Roman practice of verifying the testimony of legal witnesses (other than honestiores, those from “honorable” families) by torture: by his suffering and death*, the witness, martus, demonstrates the truth* of his witness to Christ and the gospel.

However, the idea that the martyr is rather a witness of the truth of the age to come finds support from the passion* narrative* in Luke, where we see Jesus* passing directly from the cross to Paradise, taking with him the repentant thief (Lk 23:43); from the account of the death of the first Christian martyr, Stephen, who, as he dies, sees “the heavens opened and the Son of Man standing at the right hand of God” (Acts 7:56); and from the vision of the Apocalypse, in which John, exiled on Patmos “on account of the word of God and the testimony of Jesus” (Rev 1:9), sees Heaven opened (Rev 4:1) and a throng of martyrs, worshipping God and the Lamb*, and bearing palms of victory (Rev 7:9–17). Such an understanding of martyrdom (but not the term) had already existed within Judaism*, where it had been developed especially in connection with the age of the Maccabees. The martyr was seen to stand on the threshold of the age to come. His death was an atonement for the failings of those who lived in expectation of the coming age, and it brought that age nearer. His death was part of the final struggle between good* and evil* that would usher in the final age: the opponents of the martyrs were not so much the earthly authorities as the spiritual powers of darkness, who were later called demons* (Eph 6:12).

2. The Martyr as Saint

The death of Jesus was much more than a martyrdom: of the Evangelists, only Luke comes close to presenting Jesus as an archetypal martyr. Nevertheless, Jesus is occasionally called a martyr in the New Testament (1 Tm 6:13; Rev 1:5, 3:14), and the martyr was soon seen as the perfect disciple: indeed, the term teleiosis, “perfection,” came to be used of the martyr’s death. The martyr was very early assimilated to Christ, and his death to the paschal mystery* celebrated in the Eucharist*. Thus, Ignatius of Antioch begs the Christians of Rome* to do nothing that will prevent him from being an “imitator of the passion of my God” (Rom. 6, 3), and sees his martyred body as becoming the “pure bread of Christ” (ibid., 4, 1). Similarly, Polycarp’s prayer* before his death is a paraphrase of the eucharistic prayer (M. Pol. 14).

Because the martyr is to pass to Paradise and there join the angels in the court of God, even in his lifetime his intercession was regarded as peculiarly efficacious, and his words as having prophetic power (M. Pol. 16, 2). Jesus himself had promised that the Spirit would speak through the mouths of those who bore him faithful witness (Mk 13:11 par.). After their deaths, the bodies of martyrs were treasured and preserved as relics*, and altars were built over their tombs (architecture*). The anniversaries of their martyrdom (their “heavenly birthdays”) were honored by the celebration of the Eucharist on such altars. The image of the martyr thus became that of the saint, one who had fulfilled the common vocation of all Christians to holiness* (see Rom 1:17; 1 Cor 1:2; 1 Pt 2:9; and the common designation of Christians as hagioi—“holy”—in Acts and by Paul). The martyr, as saint, was not simply a model but also a friend in the heavenly courts, to whom one could turn for help. He was especially concerned for those who lived where he had lived during his earthly life or who showed special devotion to him. It is not surprising that the church* felt the need to discourage those who provoked martyrdom (“voluntary martyrdom”) and presented martyrdom as a vocation not to be sought, but not to be refused.

3. Martyrdom and Persecution in the Roman Empire

This understanding of the martyr developed very rapidly: almost all its features can be found in the Martyrdom of Polycarp, a largely eyewitness account written around the middle of the second century. Three centuries of persecution by the Roman Empire made it an ineradicable part of Christian consciousness.

Henceforth, Christians looked back on these centuries as the “Age of Martyrdom,” and they exaggerated the nature and extent of the persecutions. It is not in fact known for certain why they took place. The veneration of one who had died a criminal’s death would hardly be regarded with much favor by the authorities, and they would have had little hesitation about oppressing a group that refused to conform to what were regarded as little more than acts of courtesy to the gods, on whose favor the prosperity of the empire depended, and to acts of loyalty to the deified emperor, whose cult* symbolized the fragile unity of the empire. It is clear from the “acts” of the martyrs that Christians were executed simply for being Christians (“for the Name”), but there was no systematic attempt to exterminate Christians (as there was with regard to the Druids, for instance). For the first two centuries, persecution seems to have been local and sporadic. Nevertheless, to become a Christian carried the risk of someday being faced with the alternative of apostasy or death. General persecution—throughout the Roman Empire, and by imperial decree—seems to have occurred first during the reign of Decius (c. 200–51), when, in what looks like an attempt to secure their failing support, everyone was required to sacrifice to the gods. This provoked mass apostasy and also many cases of martyrdom. It also provoked a crisis in the Christian community, for martyrs awaiting their death (called confessors in the West) claimed the power to forgive their frail fellow Christians who had apostatized, thus overruling the power of the bishops*. Some bishops acknowledged the power of the martyrs, for example, Dionysius in Alexandria (Eusebius, HE VI, 42, 5f.), but others did not, notably Cyprian* in Carthage. Further general persecutions underlined the limits to the assimilation of Christianity into the pagan empire, culminating in the “Great Persecution” initiated by Diocletian in 303. Again, there was much apostasy, but there was also a long drawn-out attempt, by torture, imprisonment, and forced labor, to weaken the church fatally; and this resulted in many martyrdoms. The Great Persecution came to an abrupt end in 312 with the conversion* of Constantine and the toleration of Christianity established by the Edict of Milan.

4. The Ideal of Martyrdom after the Peace of the Church

During these persecutions, the combination of widespread apostasy, followed by a desire to return to the church, and, by contrast, the steadfastness of the few focused attention on the intercessory power of the martyrs, and also challenged the authority* of the bishops, whose control over admission to eucharistic communion* had developed as a way of preserving the integrity and identity of the church. For both bishops and martyrs, baptism* and its opposite, apostasy, defined the boundaries of the church. With the acceptance of the church in the empire in the course of the fourth century, the boundaries became much less clear. The age of the martyrs now receded into the past, but the church of the martyrs did not. There was active promotion of the cult of the martyrs, notably in Rome under Pope* Damasus, who sought to make the city into a center of pilgrimage* on account of its wealth of martyrs. On the other hand, one of the main ideas that accompanied the development of monasticism* was that the monk was a successor of the martyr, his asceticism* matching the martyr’s passion, so that monks inherited the role of intercessors with God. Monks now became saints.

5. Development of the Cult of Saints/Martyrs

With the Peace of the Church, the memory of the age of the martyrs was preserved by the cult of the martyr and the production of increasingly embroidered accounts of martyrs. These had a liturgical role, not just in the yearly celebrations of martyrs’ relics, but also in the celebrations of the liturgical year, which became a roll call of martyrs. There were, increasingly, other saints, mainly monks and bishops, but the martyr remained the archetype of sainthood. The relics of martyrs and other saints did not lie undisturbed: their bodies were dismembered and their relics, with their miraculous powers, found their way throughout the Christian world. It soon became normal for altars to house relics, a practice that was made obligatory by the Seventh Ecumenical Council (Nicaea* II, canon 7).

6. Later Martyrs

a) Byzantine Martyrs. The Peace of the Church did not, however, bring martyrdom to an end. Christians persecuted Christians, and, when the emperor was a heretic, he made martyrs. Monothelism*, for example, was responsible for the death of Martin I (the last martyr-pope) and the torture of Maximus* the Confessor during the seventh century. Iconoclasm yielded Stephen the Younger and several other martyrs. Theodore the Studite (759–826) presented compromise with iconoclasm as apostasy and thus sought to revive the spirit of the age of the martyrs. Confrontation with paganism* and Islam also produced martyrs in the Byzantine Empire.

b) Royal Martyrs. Although martyrs were regarded as spiritual fighters, death while fighting, even against the enemies of Christianity, was rarely regarded as martyrdom (by contrast to Islam). Most Christian soldier martyrs lost their lives because of a perceived conflict between the requirements of military practice and those of the Christian life. Despite the rhetoric that accompanied the Crusades, none of the Crusaders was canonized, with the exception of Saint Louis, who did not become a saint solely because he was a Crusader. Nevertheless, in the history of the Christianization of Europe there was a small number of royal martyrs, some of whom died fighting pagan foes. Anglo-Saxon England, where the struggle against paganism* was most prolonged, produced most of these: Oswald of Northumbria (641), Oswin of Deira (651), Ethelbert (794) and Edmund of East Anglia (839), and the Anglo-Saxon Edward (978). Other royal martyrs include Wenceslaus of Bohemia (929), Olaf of Norway (1030), Magnus of Orkney (1116), and, in Kievan Rus', Boris and Gleb (1015), the sons of the first Christian ruler, Vladimir. Their immediate significance was the dynastic validation that their cults provided. In several cases (Wencelaus, Magnus, Boris and Gleb), it is not at all clear that they died because of their faith.

The history of Christian martyrdom does not end there. The precarious cohabitation of Christians with Islam (despite the privileged status of *dhimmi*s that Islam accorded to them as "people of the Book") included some persecutions and martyrdoms. The history of missions, from the 16th to the 19th centuries, was also distinguished by numerous martyrdoms. The 20th century has probably seen more extensive martyrdom than at any other time in the history of the church. The full story of the persecution of Christians under Nazism and Communism, as well as in various parts of Africa and Latin America, has yet to be written.

- F. X. Funk, K. Bihlmeyer, W. Shneemelcher (Ed.), Die Apostolischen Väter, Tübingen, 1903.
- H. Musurillo (Ed.), The Acts of the Christian Martyrs, Oxford, 1972.
- Ignatius of Antioch, Polycarp of Smyrna, Letters: Martyrium Polycarpi, SC 10 bis.
- Eusebius of Caesarea, Ecclesiastical History, SC 31, 41, 55, 73.
- ♦ E. E. Malone (1950), The Monk and the Martyr, SCA 12.
- Coll. (1953), Limites de l'humain, EtCarm 32.
- J. Moreau (1956), La persécution du christianisme dans l'Empire romain, Paris.
- H. von Campenhausen (1964), Die Idee des Martyriums in der alten Kirche, 2nd Ed., Göttingen.
- W. H. C. Frend (1965), Martyrdom and Persecution in the Early Church, Oxford.
- K. Rahner (1965), Zur Theologie des Todes: Mit einem Exkurs über das Martyrium, QD 2, 73–106.
- H. U. von Balthasar (1966), Cordula oder der Ernstfall, Einsiedeln (3rd Ed. 1967).
- T. Baumeister (1980), Die Anfänge der Theologie des Martyriums, Munich.
- W. Rordorf, A. Solignac (1980), "Martyr," DSP 10, 718–37.
- D. Balfour (1983), "Extended Notions of Martyrdom in the Byzantine Ascetical Tradition," Sob. 5/1, 20–35.
- G. Bonner (1983), "Martyrdom: Its Place in the Church," Sob. 5/2, 6–21.
- N. Russell (1983), "Neomartyrs of the Greek Calendar," Sob. 5/1, 36–62.
- Kallistos Ware (1983), "What Is a Martyr?" Sob. 5/1, 7–18.
- A. M. Allchin (1984), "Martyrdom," Sob. 6/1, 19–29.
- G. Klaniczay (1986), "From Sacral Kingship to Self-Representation: Hungarian and European Royal Saints in the 11th–13th Centuries," in E. Vestergaard (Ed.), Continuity and Change: Political Institutions and Literary Monuments in the Middle Ages, Odense (repr. in G. Klaniczay, The Uses of Supernatural Power, Princeton, 1990).
- P. Gerlitz, E. Kanarfogel, M. Slusser, E. Christen (1992), "Martyrium," TRE 22, 196–220.
- J. A. Coope (1995), The Martyrs of Cordoba, Lincoln and London.

ANDREW LOUTH

See also Asceticism; Cult of Saints

Marx, Karl

1818–1883

1. Introduction

Between the October Revolution and the demolition of the Berlin Wall, the hostility between Christianity and atheistic Communism has been a defining feature of the 20th century; it ranged from official denunciations of "Marxism" to the persecution of Christians by Marxist regimes. In contrast, theologians showed little interest in Marx's writings. Paradoxically, while most of what Marx has to say about religion in general and Christianity in particular is unoriginal, the themes he discussed, and the manner of their treatment, remain of central significance for Christian life and thought.

2. Life

Marx was born in Trier, of rabbinical lineage, although baptism was the price that his father had paid for retaining his position as a lawyer. At Bonn and, later, at Berlin, Marx studied law* and philosophy* (his doctoral thesis was on the philosophies of nature of Democritus and Epicurus) and spent much time in “Young Hegelian” company. Exiled to Paris in 1843, he moved to Brussels in 1845 and in 1849, to London, where he remained until his death. The “Economic and Philosophical Manuscripts” of 1844 were followed by the Theses on Feuerbach (1845), the first part of the German Ideology (1846), the Communist Manifesto (1848), and the Grundrisse, or notebooks preparatory to Capital (1857, 1858), while the first volume of Capital appeared in 1867. Devoted to his wife (who died in 1881) and to his children, he combined revolutionary politics with the lifestyle of a Victorian gentleman.

3. Themes

a) Religion. Assuming that religious beliefs reflect social circumstances and self-understanding and, in particular, that images of God* are reflections of the state, Marx took it for granted that once human beings have taken their existence into their own hands, and external forms and structures of oppression have been abolished, then religious beliefs will fade away with the healing of the suffering that called them forth. From as early as 1843, he showed little interest in religion. The assumption that religion would simply disappear, whereas others forms of thought, literary or aesthetic, philosophical or political, would find ideal form in an ideal society, indicates Marx’s indebtedness to the widespread early modern belief that the reality, autonomy, and liberty* of “god” and “man” are antithetical.

b) Truth. For Marx, truth* is the coincidence between appearance and reality, fact and description, the way things are and the way they seem to be. It is a relationship in both theory and practice, and, in this sense, truth does not exist independently of knowledge and right action. A “true” human individual could only be “truly” such as a member of a “truly human” society. There is, accordingly, a utopian or eschatological element in Marx’s account. For Christians, his account may illuminate the mutuality between Christology* and eschatology*: between the confession that a truly human individual has existed and the hope that, in him, all things in heaven and on earth will be united.

c) Materialism. Marx’s “historical materialism” (adapted by Engels [1820–95] into “dialectical materialism”) emphasizes, as against Hegelian idealism, that it is people, rather than ideas, that make and change the world. It is also opposed to Feuerbach (1804–72): people make and change the world by their work* with hand and head, and not by thought alone. The link between Marx’s materialism and his atheism* lies not in some metaphysics, reducing all reality to extension, but in the assumption that God is, and can only be, an idea, and that it is idealist to worship an idea. If Christians or Marxists speak of love* or liberty while acting otherwise, or if they act as if the redemptive transformation of the world occurs in consciousness alone, then one is confronted with the idealist sin par excellence, that of idealist practice, whether it arises from idealist theory or contradicts materialist theory.

d) Ideology. Marx’s metaphor of a socioeconomic “base” and an ideological “superstructure” (law, politics, religion, art, and philosophy) is easily and frequently misread as meaning that the latter exert no influence on the former; yet Marx constructed a theory of their interaction. However, despite this interaction, it remains the case that, in Marx’s view, “structure” and “reflection” are initially unified through a relationship of contradiction, such that the distorting pressure of the former on the latter prevents reliance on the elements of the superstructure alone. Moreover, if one considers that the way of thinking of people in power becomes an element of this power, then it is understandable that the Marxist theory lends a pejorative connotation to the term “ideology.”

e) Alienation. To alienate a good is to give it to another: ad alium. Marx, unlike Hegel*, does not see objectification as the direct cause of alienation (that is, becoming estranged from oneself). We may give something of ourselves to our work, but that does not necessarily mean that we lose that something. It’s only within the measure that our work, our relations, and our selves become commodities; the system they depend on becomes an alien power ruling an alienated world. Marx sees religion as the paradigm of alienation: the alien power of God renders humans aliens to themselves. However, since God’s power is in fact a dispossession (of the self), so that, theologically, the cure of any alienation comes from a divine kenosis, there are fruitful analogies to be explored between Marx’s account of the transcendence of alienation and Christian doctrines of redemption. Nevertheless, Marx omits one point: his critique can certainly help Christian theory not to deal with God (in word or deed) as an alien omnipotence, and not to allow a theory of redemption to substitute for the work of its achievement. Christianity, however, takes seriously an aspect of alienation that Marxism virtually ignores, our dependence on the “alien power” of death.

f) Poverty and Revolution. Under capitalism, wealth takes the form of private property* and poverty the form of dispossession. Consequently, the rich is defined as one who “needs” to have more; the poor as one who needs to be more. The need of the poor is closer to reality than the desire of the rich is (Marx was much influenced by Hegel’s dialectic of master and slave). In a world in which all alienation has been superseded, “poverty” would then only refer to our need for each other, and “wealth” the relationships created by this need. The idea of the proletariat as the agent of the final revolution*, which would thus invert the fact and sense of wealth and poverty, is, in part, mythological, for no social class exists in pure negation nor acts without particular self-interest. The Marxist analysis of social transformation contains nonetheless rich materials for Christian soteriology.

g) Hope. Marx had no time for speculation: insofar as circumstances permit effective action to be undertaken, the utopian imagining of a better world must give way to its construction. By contrast, the eschatological dimension of Christian hope prevents its contraction to the realm of social action, and always contains (in Marx’s sense) utopian elements. Hope is always for more than can be given in the transformation of the world. One could also point out that Marx’s understanding of the future is irredeemably flawed by an abstract and ungrounded optimism, while Christianity retains a tragic element even within its optimism. “Alleluia” is always to be sung while remembering the tension that unites it with the silence of Gethsemane.

4. Marxisms and Christianity

Christianity had little to learn from the Marxist-Leninist “dialectical materialism” that became Communism’s orthodoxy (except, perhaps, the ease with which an all-embracing faith*, inflexibly interpreted and ruthlessly applied, coagulates into an inhuman system). There were other Marxist currents with which more fruitful interaction was possible. Thus, with the shift in mood during the 1960s, and the transition from anathema to dialogue, theologians, especially in Germany, began to pay serious attention to the utopian humanism of Ernst Bloch (1885–1977) and the “critical theory” of the Frankfurt School. More generally, the awakening, at this period, of theological interest in public fact and social transformation (under such labels as “political theology,” “theology of the world,” “theology of revolution,” “theology of work,” “theology of earthly realities,” and so on) was diffusely influenced by aspects of Marxism without, for the most part, close examination of Marx’s texts. Theologies of liberation* are a special case, not only because they were linked to the flourishing of base communities in countries of the Third World (whereas most European and North American theology has remained a largely academic enterprise) and had a general indebtedness to the Marxist idea of the primacy of praxis, but also because of the brief use in Latin America of the thought of Louis Althusser. Althusser took an extreme position in Marxist debates concerning the continuity between Marx’s “early” and “mature” thought and sought to save the appearances of Communism’s claims for the finality of its theories by arguing for radical discontinuity between Marxism’s final (“scientific”) form and its idealist or ideological beginnings (a view rendered untenable with the publication of the Grundrisse). Because of their Althusserian interpretation of Marx, some Latin American theologians sought to endorse Marxist theories of social transformation as “scientific,” while dismissing the atheism* associated with them as a discredited ideology.

- K. Marx and F. Engels, Marx Engels Gesamtausgabe (MEGA), 11 vols., Moscow, 1927–35.
- K. Marx, Grundrisse, Berlin, 1953.
- K. Marx and F. Engels, Marx Engels Werke (MEW), 39 vols., Berlin, 1957–72.
- ♦ E. Bloch (1959), Das Prinzip Hoffnung, 3 vols., Frankfurt.
- L. Althusser (1965), Pour Marx, Paris.
- J.-Y. Calvez (1970), La pensée de Karl Marx, Rev. Ed., Paris.
- L. Althusser (1972), Lénine et la philosophie, Paris.
- D. McLellan (1973), Karl Marx: His Life and Thought, London.
- L. Kolakowski (1978), Main Currents of Marxism, 3 vols., Oxford.
- E. P. Thompson (1978), The Poverty of Theory and Other Essays, London.
- N. L. A. Lash (1981), A Matter of Hope: A Theologian’s Reflections on the Thought of Karl Marx, London.
- D. McLellan (1987), Marxism and Religion, London.
- H. Fleischer and H. Rolfes (1992), “Marx/Marxism,” TRE 22, 220–58.

NICHOLAS LASH

See also Deism and Theism; Hegelianism; Religion, Philosophy of Mary

A. Biblical Theology

Mary, the mother of Jesus*, occupies a relatively small place in the New Testament as a whole. Theology* and piety have given considerable weight to those texts that mention her, with major differences in appreciation from one Christian confession to another. For this reason the exegete must be careful to distinguish between the objective givens of the texts and later constructions, however legitimate the latter might be from a dogmatic* point of view (see Mary in the New Testament [1978], an exemplary work carried out by Catholic and Lutheran exegetes in the United States).

1. Paul, Synoptics, Acts

a) Paul. A theologian of the paschal mystery, Paul speaks little of the life of Jesus. He mentions his birth on only one occasion: “God sent forth his son, born of woman, born under the law” (Gal 4:4). The expression is surprising: one might have expected the name of the father. Paul is here emphasizing the solidarity of Christ* with mankind, the weakness of the Son of God*, born of woman among a people* subject to the law.

b) Mark. In the Gospel of Mark, where the birth of Christ is not narrated at all, the Judeo-Christian opposition becomes evident. Mary is to be found in only two episodes. In Mark 3:21, “his [Jesus’] family” are hostile, but Mary is only named later (opposition between blood family and the family made up of those who obey the will of God [3:31–34f.]). In Mark 6:3—“Is not this the carpenter, the son of Mary and brother of James and Joses and Judas and Simon? And are not his sisters here with us?”—the designation “son of Mary” is noteworthy, when in Matthew and Luke, both of whom attest to the virginal conception, we find: “son of a carpenter.”

c) Matthew. Matthew, on the contrary, draws on Judeo-Christian tradition*, while at the same time forging an opening to the universal mission* (28:18ff.). The prologue (1–2) provides answers to the questions (K. Stendahl): “Who is the Messiah*?” “Where does he come from?” Studies of the type “The Childhood Stories in the Haggada” (C. Perrot), and particularly those of the childhood of Moses (R.

Bloch), are decisive in enabling us to appreciate the literary genre of these chapters.

In the book of Matthew, the introductory genealogy of Jesus Christ, son of David, son of Abraham, contains anomalies (foreign or sinful women) and comes to a strange conclusion: “and Jacob the father of Joseph the husband of Mary, of whom Jesus was born” (Mt 1:16). Matthew 1:18–25 is written from the point of view of Joseph, the just and steadfast man and who has received the mission to introduce Jesus into the line of David. The revelation* revolves around Mary’s virginal conception (see below, 2) under the action of the Holy* Spirit, according to Isaiah 7:14 (LXX). Matthew is thus in opposition to the Ebionites, for whom Jesus was the “son of Joseph.” The point being christological, Matthew 1:25 (Joseph “took his wife, but knew her not until she had given birth to a son”) is not concerned with what would happen later. The episode of the epiphany is reinforced by the ancient themes of the royal star (Nm 24:17) and the Davidic messiah (Mi 5:1). While elsewhere Joseph plays a leading role, here the Magi see “the young child with Mary his mother” (Mt 2:11): it is she who is charged with introducing her son to the people. In narrating Christ’s public life, Matthew removes anything that might have seemed offensive in Mark (compare Mt 12:46–50 with Mk 3:21 and 31ff.).

d) Luke, Acts. To Christians of pagan origin who are tempted to reject the Jewish heritage, Luke shows that the life and works of Christ cannot be understood without their roots in the Old Testament, which reveal the continuity of God’s design despite the interference of history*. Unlike Matthew, Luke 1–2 is more interested in Mary than in Joseph. The style is inspired by the Old Testament, particularly the story of the young Samuel. A typical format connects two stories: the annunciation of Gabriel to Zechariah (1:11–20), and the annunciation to Mary (1:26–38). Differences are enhanced: thus, Mary believes while Zechariah doubts. The angel*’s message to Mary (khairé) seems to be a return to the prophecies inviting the “daughter of Zion” to messianic joy (Sg 3:14; Zec 9:9). Mary is hailed as the recipient par excellence of God’s kharis (that is, of his salvific intentions). The Catholic dogma* of the Immaculate Conception (Mary protected from original sin* from the moment of her birth) would be based upon this salutation.

Mary's question to the angel, "How will this be, since I am a virgin?" (Lk 1:34), is aimed at introducing the rest of the revelation and cannot be interpreted as signifying a vow of virginity. The event is presented in two stages: the messianic royalty of the child and, given the fact of the Spirit, his divine origin. Suggestions of "an apocalypse" (Legrand 1981) have been made, as the unveiling, in a paschal light, of the divine plan of salvation.* Projecting onto the origin formulas of faith* that had come later, Luke insists on the free consent with which Mary, the "servant of the Lord," yielded to God's intervention, in this case even more astonishing than in the case of Isaac (Lk 1:37 and Gn 18:14).

The comparisons between the Visitation (Lk 1:39–45) and the history of the Ark of the Covenant* (Laurentin 1964) are too tenuous to be retained on an exegetical level. Elizabeth praises Mary's faith (1:45). Mary recites the "Magnificat," which Luke has drawn from Judeo-Christian hymnology (with an emphasis on Israel* and the expectation of imminent justice* for the poor). Marian devotion would take inspiration from 1:48: "For behold, from now on all generations will call me blessed"—Mary's faith is underlined again as a passage through obscurity (2:41–52), a quest for the meaning of events (2:19–51), and an acceptance of the Word* (8:15, 11, 28). With Joseph she is depicted as a faithful observer of the law. Simeon's prediction "and a sword will pierce through your own soul also" (2, 35) refers to the rejection of the Messiah by his own people, and would be applied to the compassion of Mary at the foot of the cross (Jn 19:25). Like Matthew, Luke avoids anything that might suggest an opposition between Jesus and his mother. After the Resurrection, Mary prays in the Cenacle with the apostles, a few women, and the brothers of Jesus (Acts 1:14). There is a correspondence between the sudden descent of the Spirit* upon the church* in Acts 2 and the coming of the Spirit upon Mary in Luke 1:35.

2. Virginal Conception

Matthew and Luke are the only New Testament authors who affirm that Jesus was born miraculously of Mary. The reading of John 1:13 in the singular (qui natus est) is too weakly attested to be retained. However, on numerous occasions Jesus is designated as the "son of Joseph" (Lk 3:23, "being the son [as was supposed] of Joseph", 4:22; Jn 1:45, 6:42). A number of questions arise, therefore, concerning the origin of the tradition* of the virginal conception, and its theological impact.

Agreeing in their fundamental affirmation, Matthew and Luke nevertheless diverge too significantly in their presentation to be seen as mutually dependent. Each text needs to be explained on its own.

The milieu out of which Matthew was writing would have been familiar with the Jewish haggada, which knew of no virgin conception. The prophecy of Isaiah 7:14 refers to the 'alemah (meaning a young woman, married or not) as the mother of the royal heir, to which Micah 5:2 also refers. These texts can be explained by the role played at the royal court by the queen mother (H. Cazelles). Matthew, however, refers to Isaiah 7:14 not according to the Hebrew but the LXX: parthenos (the reading of which was prohibited by Justin and Irenaeus* as being against Aquila's neanis, which they regarded as more in keeping with the Hebrew). Must it be said that the idea of a virginal conception emerged in Alexandria? Philo, commenting on the birth of Isaac, would develop the allegory of the engendering of virtues*, but the Evangelists had a real birth in mind (Grelot 1972). Parthenos in LXX is also used as a description for towns that have nothing exemplary about them (Is 47:1; Lam 1:15, 2:13; see Dubarle 1978). A direct reading of Isaiah 7:14 could not therefore have inspired Matthew's story; moreover, the point of the story is that of the conception by the Spirit, and the quotation is only of interest for the additional light it sheds on the matter. In the biblical creation* stories the Spirit's role is to communicate life (Gn 2:7; Ps 104:30). According to the physiology of the era, woman did no more than gather the seed that would develop in her womb.

In Luke's text there are no references to Isaiah 7:14, but the theme gathers force with the account of John the Baptist, who is filled from his mother's womb with the Holy Spirit (1:15). Here the Spirit is at work in the conception itself. Its intervention is indicated by a verb evoking the presence of God's glory* on the Ark of the Covenant (episkiazein, as in Ex 40:35; Nm 9:1, 9:22, 10:34). John 1:14 has recourse to the same typology for the advent of the Logos. This comparison shows that for the authors of the second century the Word itself took form in the womb of Mary. In any event, we cannot speculate here on the personal nature of the divine pneuma: a principle of life, it assures the divine origin of the child.

In the Judeo-Christian tradition to which Matthew adheres, any borrowing from pagan mythology seems unthinkable. The delicacy with which Luke treats his subject illustrates well that he is at an opposite extreme from the eroticism of Greek and Roman mythology.

Was the virginal conception, then, simply a theologoumenon, a theological interpretation without a factual basis, or was it an affirmation based upon the reality of things? The silence of the rest of the New Testament would seem to favor the first hypothesis. However, it must be acknowledged that a literal interpretation imposed itself very early on in the church: Ignatius of Antioch (To the Smyrnaeans 1:1; To the Tralians 1 X, 1) was the most prominent witness of this evolution, and then Irenaeus, who developed the parallel between Mary and the virgin soil whence Adam* was formed (Adv. Haer. 111, 21, 10). The exegete would emphasize the unprecedented nature of the texts of Matthew and Luke and the great difficulty involved in finding a satisfactory explanation for them outside of a tradition that, in the final analysis, must be as old as Mary herself, however discreet that tradition may have been in other respects.

3. John, Apocalypse 12

a) John. John was interested primarily in the divine origin of the Logos made flesh (1:14). He does not name Mary. However, she does appear, as the “mother of Jesus,” in two scenes that correspond to each other. She appears first of all at Cana, with the group of “brothers” (2:12). In this prototype of “signs” accomplished on the third day (the paschal token), she intervenes but is met with a blunt refusal (2:4). Here, as in the synoptics, Jesus marks his distance from his family. But the words Mary addresses to the servants (see Gn 41:55) show that the conflict has been overcome. For those who see in this story a response of the covenant of Sinai, Mary expresses commitment of the people to whom the wine of the New Covenant is destined (Serra 1978).

In 8:41, does John allude to accusations of illegitimacy brought against Jesus by the Jews? These are affirmed by Celsus and provoked the reply of the Protevangelium Jacobi (v. 175). Clues are very tenuous where John is concerned.

The second scene in question is the narrative of the crucifixion, the “hour” of Christ’s agape. Only John mentions the mother of Jesus at the foot of the cross, with the beloved disciple (19:25ff.). In the verse “Woman, behold, your son” the fathers* of the church recognized a sign of filial solicitude. Subsequently, the “Behold, your mother” served to support teaching about Mary’s spiritual maternity. Modern commentators, in various ways, have emphasized the symbolic nature of the scene. Would not the surprising form of address, “Woman,” (see 2:4) justify the Eve-Mary typology? But for Justin and Irenaeus, the first instances of this linkage, it was at the time of the Annunciation that Mary repaired Eve’s disobedience. If the disciple was called upon to take Mary “into his home” (and thus into the community that he had founded), was this not a call to maintain the ties with the Israel of God, represented by Mary? We know with what care John seeks to show Jesus is truly the “king of Israel” (1:49), the long-awaited Messiah.

b) Revelation 12. The sign of the Woman is the symbol of the Israel of God (Rev 12:1ff.), predestined, but nevertheless exposed to the rage of the original serpent (12:9). Genesis 3 therefore constitutes a major background element for understanding the text. Although the birth followed by the lifting up into the heavens refers to the “hour” of Easter, we cannot altogether rule out a reference to Mary, for she was present at Calvary. At the level of biblical* theology, where arguments are constructed on a basis of the various facts given in the New Testament, comparisons between Cana, Calvary, and the “great sign” of Revelation 12 suggest the establishing of a typological correspondence between Eve, the mother of the living, and Mary, the mother of the people of the New Covenant. The application of the text to Mary’s Assumption came fairly late.

The overall interpretation of the above points to a “trajectory” within the New Testament where Mary is concerned. This extends from Mark to the Johannine corpus, giving a central place to Luke. To realize this deeper reading is to give legitimacy to the development of the subsequent tradition that would lead to the proclamation of Mary as theotokos, “mother of God.” Paul’s extreme discretion and Mark’s reserve appear as a counterpoint; they must be given serious consideration by the theologian and serve as corrective measures against mariological deviations.

4. Brothers of Jesus

The term “brother” is subject to a great variety of interpretations. According to Old Testament usage, and that of the Eastern world, “brother” implies a person one is close to, regardless of the exact degree of blood relation. The word anepsios (cousin) is only found once in the entire New Testament (Col 4:10). The disciples received the title of brothers (e.g., in 1 Cor 15:6). A group who shared their origins in Nazareth was set apart (as in Mk 6:3); they never called themselves formally the “sons of Mary.” Initially unbelievers (Mk 3:21; Jn 7:3ff.), they figured among the disciples after Easter (Acts 1:14). The most prominent of them, “James, the brother of the Lord,” was the leader of the Judeo-Christian community in Jerusalem (Gal 1:19).

Were they the uterine brothers, half-brothers, or cousins of Jesus? At issue is Mary’s virginitas post partum (after childbirth), an affirmation that the title of firstborn (Lk 2:7) conferred upon Jesus does not suffice to call into question. Examination of New Testament texts throws up a number of difficulties. Thus, James and Joseph, “brothers of Jesus” in Mark 6:3, appear as the children of another Mary in Mark 15:40, 15:47, and 16:1. “Brother of the Lord” is an honorific title, the transposition of an original Aramaean title. One cannot conclude therefore that the New Testament obliges one to take the expression “brothers of the Lord” literally.

From the end of the second century, the Protevan- gelium Jacobi upheld against the Jews the idea of Mary’s perpetual virginity and presented the brothers of Jesus as those born from an earlier marriage on Joseph’s side. Although lacking any historical value, this apocryphal (apocrypha*) text nevertheless became widespread; it seems to be the first evidence of a belief that would come to be held in common by the church until recent refutations.

B. Historical Theology

The Marian theology* that developed from Scripture* had very modest beginnings before the fourth century, which is when it began to take shape. It continued to develop throughout the Middle Ages and was the object of dogmatic definitions in Catholicism* in the 19th and 20th centuries. Its main themes will be looked at here from a historical rather than a systematic point of view (but connections will be pointed out), with particular attention being paid to the patristic period. Doctrinal themes will be covered to begin with (virginity, sanctity and Immaculate Conception, divine motherhood, Assumption), followed by the place of Mary within piety and worship (spiritual maternity, Mary and the church*, the “mediation” of Mary and cooperation in salvation*, the Marian cult*), and concluding with the contributions of Vatican* II.

I. Doctrinal Themes

1. Virginity

The earliest Marian theology, in the second and third centuries, was wholly integrated into Christology*: the aim was to affirm the virginal conception of Christ.

a) In the Second Century. Ignatius of Antioch mentioned Mary with a twofold purpose: to uphold against Docetism* the reality of the Incarnation*, since Christ was truly born of woman* (Smyrn I, 1; Trall. IX, 1; Ephes. VII, 1), and to show that through his birth of a virgin he was not an ordinary man (Ephes XVIII–XIX: Christ was “of the seed of David and of the Holy* Spirit”; ibid. VII, 1: Christ was “of [ek] Mary and of God*”). Ephes. XIX emphasizes the humility and the silence of this unobserved birth of the Prince of the World* (see The Ascension of Isaiah, IX–XI). In the same way, the Ode of Solomon 19 (second century) may also allude to the virginal conception and birth, if the “virgin” is not a symbolical figure.

Justin, in the Dialogue with Trypho (c. 150), aimed to show that Isaiah’s prophecy* (7, 14, a virgin shall conceive..., with controversy over the term “virgin” or “young girl” depending on the Greek or the Hebrew) was fulfilled only through Jesus (Dial. 66). He also saw in the virginal conception a sign that Jesus was more than an inspired prophet or the Messiah* (67; see Apology 30): he was not born through human works, but by the will of God (Dial. 76) intervening in history as at the time of the Creation* (84). Justin established for the first time the parallel between Eve and Mary (see below, 1.c). Following on from him, Irenaeus* saw in the virginal conception the mark of the Creator himself: Mary’s virginity is a reference to that of the earth, from which Adam* was made (Demonstration 32, see Adv. Haer. III, 21, 7, and 10), and it refutes Gnosticism by linking creation and salvation (see below, 1.c, the parallel between Eve and Mary). The twin significance of the virginal conception is found here also: it attests a true human birth (Adv. Haer. III, 19, 3) and is also the sign that Jesus is more than a mere man (Adv. Haer. III, 21, 4; Dem. 57). At that time there was no interest in Mary outside of Christology. Irenaeus specified that Christ truly received his flesh from Mary (Adv. Haer. III, 22, 1–2; see I, 7, 2). The Protevangelium Jacobi on the other hand (second century?) was entirely centered on Mary, to affirm her purity from the moment of birth and her virginity preserved until childbirth (XX, 1) and forever after (the “brothers of Jesus” were sons of Joseph from a first marriage).

The insistence during the second century on virginal conception shows that there was some doubt about it. For the Ebionites Jesus was simply a man, born of Mary and Joseph; Jewish polemics, sometimes taken by pagans, maintained that Jesus was the illegitimate son of Mary and an unknown father (see Origen*, Commentary on John XX, XVI, 128; Contra Celsum I, 32). Gnostic groups viewed the virginal conception as a pure symbol (see The Gospel according to Philip 17). Tertullian*, out of a concern for realism, replied that Mary had lost the signs of virginity by bringing Christ into the world (The Flesh of Christ XXIII, 2–5; see Origen, Hom XIV on Luke, 3). He saw the brothers of Christ as Mary's children (Against Marcion IV, 19, 7). His virginal conception then became a proof of Christ's divinity (Tertullian, The Flesh of Christ XVIII; Origen, Contra Celsum I, 69; in the fourth century, Eusebius of Caesarea, Demonstr. Gospel VII, 1, 30; in the fifth century, Proclus, ACO I, 1, 1, 104, 3–6).

b) From the third century, with the development of Christian asceticism, there was a growing interest in Mary's virginity for its own sake. The Ps.-Justin said that through the virginity of the mother of Christ, God had wanted to show that one can do without the sexual act (Treatise on the Resurrection 3). Clement of Alexandria, shortly after the year 200, affirmed the belief in the virginity of Mary after childbirth (post partum) (Strom. VII, XVI, 93–94). Origen affirmed that Mary could not have coupled with a man after giving birth to Christ: she is the archetype of feminine virginity, as Christ is of masculine virginity (Comm. Mt X, 17; see in the fourth century, Athanasius*, Letter to Virgins, 86–88, and in 371, Gregory of Nyssa, On Virginity. II, 2, 18–25; XIV, 1, 24–30); Athanasius (ibid., 100–101) moreover attributes to Mary a role of intercessor with Christ on behalf of virgins; Ambrose* does likewise (De virgin. ad Marc. II, 9). Augustine*, because of Luke 1:34, even attributes to Mary a vow of virginity preceding the Annunciation (On Holy Virginity IV, 4, which initiated an entire tradition).

At the end of the fourth century Mary's perpetual virginity during and after childbirth (in partu, post partum) became virtually an article of faith, defended by Ambrose (On the Institution of Virgins, 35–62, with the subsequently classical image of the shut gate, Ez 44:2) and Jerome against Helvidius, Jovinian, and Bonosus, or by Epiphanius (Panarion 78) and Augustine against others who refuted Mary's virginity (antidicomarianites). The title "ever virgin" (aeiparthenos) is found in Epiphanius in 374 (Ancor. 119, then Panarion 78, 5, 5, etc.) and probably in Didymus (other passages or fragments are dubious). Mary's perpetual virginity would henceforth no longer be contested in either the East or the West. But it was a topic for discussion wherever opinions were freely voiced among the churches born of the Reformation.

In partu virginity was affirmed at the time of the Council of Ephesus* (431) on the Cyrilian side (Proclus, ACO I, 1, 1, 104, 3–6) and the Eastern side (Theodoret of Cyrhus, On the Incarnation of the Lord 23). The acts of Chalcedon* (451) authorized the Tome of Leo (449); Pope Leo the Great professed it (COD 77, 31–33). Constantinople* II (553) gave Mary the title of "ever virgin" (aeiparthenos/semper virgo) in the judgment against the Three Chapters and in the second anathematization (COD 113, 17 and 114, 20–21). The Lateran Council of 649 did likewise in canon 3 (DS 503), as did the final decree of Nicaea* II in 787 (COD 134, 45).

c) Mary, the New Eve. A certain number of exegetes had already remarked on the parallel between Eve and Mary in Rev 12, and in the second century Justin compared the virginity of the two women, opposing disobedience and corruption (Eve) with obedience and joy (Mary). The parallel was also drawn in the Protevangelium Jacobi XIII, 1, but with another point of view in mind (Joseph believed that Mary, like Eve, had sinned when she was alone). It was exploited by Gnostics to show that the new Adam was spiritual and not carnal (Gospel acc. to Philip 83). Irenaeus developed the issue a contrario to show the continuity between the Old and the New Testament (Dem. 33; Adv. Haer. III, 22, 4; 23, 7; V, 19, 1; 21, 1). The comparison was also found shortly after 200 in Tertullian (The Flesh of Christ, XVII). It would fade somewhat for a time in favor of the parallel between Eve and the church, then resurface at the beginning of the fourth century in the works of Victorinus of Pettau, and at the end of the century in Epiphanius (Panarion 78, 18–19). He declared that the title of Mother of the Living (Gn 3:20) should apply to Mary, who engendered life, rather than to Eve, who caused death* (see not long thereafter, Peter Chrysologos, Sermon 140). It then reappeared in the fifth century (an opposition between Gn 3 and Lk 1). The parallel never gave rise to the idea that Mary was the spouse or betrothed of Christ. In particular, Genesis 2:24 and the Song of Songs are understood as speaking of Christ and the church, not Christ and Mary: with the exception of one instance in Ambrose, who does not derive a nuptial theme from it (On the Institution of Virgins 89 Sq), it was not until the 12th century (Rupert of Deutz, Honorius of Autun) that there would be a Marian reading of the Song of Songs, perhaps because the attributes of the church were extended to Mary, beginning with spiritual maternity (below, II.1). Gueric of Igny, Sur l'assomption I, 2–4, is a witness of the transition from Eve-Mary to Eve—the church (ibid. II, 1–4 for the Marian interpretation of the Song of Songs). Similarly, the early 11th century had seen the first Marian readings of Genesis 3:15. In the modern era, Scheeben* gave renewed development to the theme of Mary as the new Eve, spouse of Christ (see Maria III, 553–71). Vatican II (LG 56, COD 893) went no further than to recall the parallel between Eve and Mary by quoting the Fathers*.

2. Holiness and Immaculate Conception

a) Faith and Mary's Doubt. Mary's holiness is distinct from her virginity: the same authors (Origen, John Chrysostom*, Ephraim) taught Mary's perpetual virginity yet attributed failings in faith to her, or feelings of vanity. There was no unanimous position on the question until the early fifth century, even if the title of "holy" was already fairly current in the fourth century, even among those authors who thought that Mary needed to be sanctified before the Incarnation. Moreover, the notion of Mary's holiness would be slow in evolving into the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception. In the second century the Protevangelium Jacobi presented the Virgin as utterly holy from the beginning; the text suggests that perhaps she was conceived virginally. Her holiness was seen as a total separation from the profane world. If there were any suggestions in the legends of an Immaculate Conception, they were isolated examples.

Several passages in the New Testament have caused commentators to think that Mary was criticized for her lack of faith or for her boasting: Matthew 12:46–50 par.; Luke 1:34, 2:35, 2:48; John 2:4; the Passion* narratives. Tertullian understood Matthew 12:48 as indicating that Christ rejected his mother and brothers because of their lack of faith (Against Marcion IV, 19, 11–13, see The Flesh of Christ VII, 9). Origen (Hom. VII on Luke, 4) spoke of a heretic who professed that Christ had rejected Mary because she united with Joseph after his birth. For Origen, Mary did not immediately believe in the angel*'s promise (Hom. I on Gn, 14); she did not yet have complete faith during Jesus' childhood (Hom. XX on Luke, 4); she doubted during the Passion (Hom. XVII on Luke, 6–7), although this did not prevent her from prophesying, for she was "filled with the Holy Spirit from the moment she bore the Savior within her" (Hom. VII on Luke, 3). Titus of Bostra (late fourth century) interpreted Luke 2:49 (TU 21–2, 152) as a reproach from Jesus to Mary, reminding her of the virginal conception that meant that God, and not Joseph, was his father. Ephraim spoke of Mary's doubt at Cana (Comm. on Diatess. 5, 2–4). John Chrysostom also had little praise when commenting on the Annunciation, Cana, and Matthew 12:48 (Hom. on Mt, 4, 4; on Jn 21 (20), 2; on Mt 44:1f.). In the fifth century Cyril* of Alexandria wrote that Mary as she stood at the foot of the cross (Comm. on Jn XII, ad Jn 19, 25), as did his contemporary Hesychius of Jerusalem, who interpreted Simeon's prophecy of the sword as referring to this, after many other meanings (Hom. I on the Hypapante 8). Mary's doubt regarding the angel's message could also be found, in the sixth century, in the works of Romanos of Melos (Hymn 9 on the Annunciation 7). In the same way, various fourth-century authors deemed that Mary needed a purification before the Incarnation: Hilary* of Poitiers (De Trin II, 26), Gregory* of Nazianzus (Disc. 38, 13), and Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. 17, 6); Atticus of Constantinople also said as much in the early fifth century (Syriac hom. On the Holy Mother of God).

b) Holiness and Absence of Sin. Ambrose was the first to maintain that Mary was the only one whose faith did not waver at the cross (Letter 63, 100; On the Institution of Virgins 49). She was unflinching and immaculate (Letter 42, 4 to Sirice). The Pelagian controversy (Pelagianism*) marked a turning point. In Nature and Grace XXXVI (42), in 415, Augustine echoed Pelagius's words by refusing to speak of sin* in relation to the Virgin, but he specified that it was because of the honor of the Lord and through an excess of grace* that she was victorious over sin. Later, Julian of Eclanum, another follower of Pelagius who held Mary to be without sin, accused Augustine of "delivering Mary over to the devil" because of his theology of original sin* marking every birth. Augustine replied in 428–30 (Unfinished Work against Julian IV, 122) that "Mary was liberated from her condition (at birth) through the grace of rebirth," a somewhat unclear expression that has been variously interpreted, but that did not envisage a special exemption for Mary from the legacy of sin. The fact that the Pelagians were the first to maintain that Mary was exempt from original sin, together with Augustine's opposition, would long make it difficult for the Catholics to accept the idea of the Immaculate Conception. Again, at the beginning of the sixth century, disciples of Augustine specified that Mary had inherited "the flesh of sin" (Rom 8:3), unlike Jesus (Fulgentius of Ruspina, CChr.SL 91 A, 571–72; Ferrandus of Carthage, PL 67, 892–93); the expression "flesh of sin" applied to Mary comes from Augustine, On Penance and the Remission of Sins, II, 24.

c) Toward the Immaculate Conception. In the East the Council of Ephesus, which was held in 431 in the church of "Saint Mary," inspired homilies in praise of Mary (Proclus, Acacius of Melitene); but it must be noted that words like "incorruption" or "purity" often meant nothing more than Mary's virginity preserved through and despite the birth of Christ (Theodotus of Ancyra, ACO I, 1, 2, 74, 25–26; see Fulgentius, loc.

cit.). After this council the liturgy* became the primary place for Marian theology, particularly in the East (where homiletics and hymnody were preferred to argumentation), less so in the West (but in the period immediately after the council, in Rome*, there was the reconstruction and dedication of Saint Mary Major by Pope Sixtus III).

In 634 Sophronis of Jerusalem celebrated “Holy Mary, resplendent, of divine sentiments, free of all stain of body, soul*, and thought,” and spoke of a Virgin “sanctified in her body and in her soul” (it may again be a purification before the Incarnation), “pure, holy, and without stain” (PG 87–3, 3160 D–3161 B). He contested the usual exegesis of the prophecy of the sword: at issue was Mary’s pain at the cross, not a weakening in her faith. In the following century Andrew of Crete, in his Canons (PG 97, 1305 s.) and in his homilies for the Marian feast days (particularly the Conception of Anne), also celebrated Mary’s purity without stain from the moment of her conception. In the ninth century Saint Theodore the Studite (PG 96, 684 C–685 A) evoked the absence of all sin for which God had predestined the Virgin for all eternity. Photius would echo these statements (see DThC 7/1, 924–25). The idea of Mary being without sin seems to have quietly taken hold in the Byzantine theological arena, although there was no actual affirmation of the Immaculate Conception and it never was the subject of a precise definition.

In the West, after a dormant period, attention was once again focused on the issue after the 12th century. The development of the feast day of the Conception of Mary (below, II.3) gave rise to debate: Bernard* of Clairvaux and subsequently Thomas* Aquinas opposed the Immaculate Conception of Mary, convinced as they were that the carnal union of the spouses must necessarily be marked by sin and would therefore pass on its legacy. This conviction was largely shared, and it explained the fact that during the Middle Ages, perhaps in the light of the Protevangelium Jacobi, people liked to believe in Mary’s virginal conception in order to preserve her from all sin (see the confusion often encountered nowadays between Immaculate Conception and virginal conception). In the light of these objections, the Franciscans (including John Duns* Scotus) prepared the way for modern Catholic theology by affirming that Mary had been redeemed in anticipation of the merits of her Son.

The Council of Basle (in the 36th, nonecumenical session, on 17 September 1439) declared the Immaculate Conception to be “a pious doctrine in accordance with the worship of the Church, the Catholic faith, uprightness, and Holy Scripture” (Mansi 29, 183 B–C). On several occasions Pope Sixtus IV approved and encouraged belief in the Immaculate Conception, and promoted the feast day of the Conception of the Virgin (Constit. Cum praeexcelsa in 1477, DS 1400; Constit. Grave nimis in 1483, DS 1425–426). The Council of Trent*, in the decree on original sin (fifth session, June 1546, COD 667, 21–25), declared that it did not want to include the Virgin in the decree. Clement XI prescribed that the feast should be celebrated everywhere (Constit. Commissi nobis divinitus from 1708). The last remaining reticence was gradually overcome within Catholicism (and given the clear affirmation that the privilege of the Virgin was a grace conferred in advance by the accomplished redemption of her Son), and the dogma* of the Immaculate Conception was defined by Pope Pius IX, after long consultation, in the Bull Ineffabilis Deus of 8 December 1854 (DS 2803): “From the first instant of her conception, through the unique grace and privilege of almighty God, the Blessed Virgin Mary was, in consideration of the merits of Jesus Christ the savior of humankind, preserved pure of all stain of original sin.” The Bull insisted on the title of “mother of God” as the foundation of the Immaculate Conception (rather than on the Eve-Mary parallel, put forth by Newman*; see Maria III, 540–44).

We should also note the importance of the liturgical feasts as a theological locus (loci theologici*), both in East and West. The feast of the Conception of the Virgin (below, II.3.a) logically celebrates the first moment of salvation by tracing a path from the Incarnation to the birth of the Virgin (celebrated in the East from the sixth century) and right back to her conception. Founded upon an implicit belief, this feast day brought about further dogmatic precision.

The attitude of other churches with regard to the Immaculate Conception varies. The Orthodox* Church opposes even the idea of a Roman definition and its language (see Cath. 5, 1284–90; DThC 7–1, 962–79 and 1211–14), preferring to speak of the absence of all sin in Mary, who rather than exempt from original sin was pure from the first instant. As for the churches created during the Reformation (with the exception of certain Anglican circles), they are overwhelmingly hostile to the Immaculate Conception, not only for reasons of content (the Immaculate Conception seems to allow Mary to avoid the redemption) but also because of the very principle of the “deduction” of dogma so long after the closing of revelation*, not to mention the risk of encouraging the autonomous discipline of “Mariology” within theology (a complaint also found in present-day Catholicism).

3. Divine Maternity

The theological theme of Mary’s divine maternity is linked, with some justification, to the Council of Ephesus (431). The debate over the subject of the title of theotokos (mother of God, literally “who gives birth to God”, in Latin Deipara) drew attention to the christological question of the communication of idioms*. Can one say Mary “mother of God,” rather than simply “mother of Christ” (in his humanity)? Cyril of Alexandria defended the title theotokos against Nestorius (Nestorianism*). Two Christologies confronted each other over the word. Debate focused on the historical age and legitimacy of the title theotokos.

Before the word itself, the idea appeared very early on to attribute to the preexisting Word* the birth from Mary (Justin, Dial. 100), encouraged perhaps by the expression: “the mother of my Lord” in Luke 1:43. The word theotokos was found on a papyrus (third century?: John Rylands Library, 470). Other occurrences prior to the fourth century are very suspect. Alexander of Alexandria seems to have been the first to have definitely used the word, in a letter written around 320 (Theodoret, Hist. Eccl. I, 4, 54, GCS v. 44, 23, 3). The term is also found in Athanasius (PG 26, 349 C; 385 A; 393 A and B; but the Life of St. Anthony 36, 4 is suspect, see REAug 41, 1995, 157); it is found in Basil*, if the homily is authentic (PG 31, 1468 B), Gregory of Nazianzus (SC 208, 42), and Gregory of Nyssa (PG 46, 1136C, and if the homily is his, 1157B and 1176B, also with theometor, “mother of God”). Theodore of Mopsuestia, Nestorius’s master, may also have used it (see Maria I, 94, n. 36). Among the Latins, Ambrose uses “mother of God” twice (On Virgins II, 2, 7, and Exameron 5, 20, 65), and twice “she who engendered God” (Comm. Lc X, 130, CChr.SL 14, 383 and On Virgins II, 2, 13), an expression that was no doubt found in Athanasius (Letter to Virgins, CSCO 151, 59). Cyril himself did not use the expression before Ephesus.

After Ephesus the title theotokos took the place of honor and was frequently used in homiletics (Proclus of Constantinople, Hesychius of Jerusalem). It became part of the common patrimony, even for those of the Eastern faith who favored Nestorius: Theodoret of Cyrhus adopted the word and added anthropotokos, mother of man (PG 75, 1477 A). At Ephesus, Cyril’s Second Letter to Nestorius, which defended the use of the title, was canonized (COD 44, 2); Chalcedon adopted it for its definition of faith (COD 84, 39), as did Constantinople II in its sixth anathematization (which referred not to Ephesus but to Chalcedon, COD 116, 29). Divine maternity remained a christological question rather than a “privilege” of Mary; it was explained after other themes (perpetual virginity, e.g.) and could not, historically, be considered a starting point for the deduction of other privileges.

4. Assumption

The last Marian dogma defined by the Catholic Church was that of the Assumption, which concerns Mary’s final destiny. Ancient tradition* offers little to go on. At the end of the fourth century Epiphanius declared his ignorance on the subject (Panarion 78, GCS, v. III, 462). From the fifth century on, in addition to the apocryphal writings On Mary’s Transfer, there were allusions in homiletics to the fate of her body (see DECA I, 280–81). The texts (Mimouni 1995) waver between notions of dormition (Mary’s body, separated from the soul and transported to a hidden place, waits uncorrupted for the final resurrection*) and of assumption (the soul is reunited with the body, which has been raised up to join Christ in glory) with or without resurrection; for, according to certain texts, Mary is immortal. Belief in dormition seems to be the most ancient, often later supplanted by assumption (certain texts have dormition followed by assumption). Assumption seems to have been called into question again in the ninth century, in the East (John Geometres and others, see Jugie 1944) as well as in the West (Ps.-Jerome alias Paschasius Radbertus). In the modern era, even in the East, the majority of theologians seem to have adopted assumption. But only Catholicism has defined it as a dogma, something Orthodoxy has refused to do.

In 1950, appealed to by a number of voices, Pope Pius XII proclaimed (Constit. Apost. Munificentissimus Deus, DS 3900–3904) that “the Immaculate Mother of God, the ever Virgin Mary, when the course of her earthly life was run, was assumed in body and in soul to heavenly glory.” He argued on the basis of divine maternity for the union of the Virgin to Christ who is Life, her place in the economy of salvation, her title as the new Eve and her Immaculate Conception, and the long existence of the feast of the Dormition or of the Assumption of the Virgin were mentioned (see below, II.3). While he specified that by the grace of Christ the body of Mary knew no corruption, he did not reach a decision on the question of her death. As with the Immaculate Conception, this definition is not explicitly reinforced by Scripture (the verses cited, such as Rev 12, are read symbolically). The definition therefore is of the nature of a deduction with a doctrinal motivation (the body that bore Christ could in no way be submitted to corruption; she who was so closely associated with Christ could not be separated from him in her final destiny), which explains its rejection by the Protestant churches.

II. Mary in Piety and in Worship

Given the unique place held by Mary in the history of salvation, there has been much debate on her active role in the work of redemption and in its reception by human beings. Certain themes have emerged, some of which remain much debated: spiritual maternity, universal “mediation,” “coredemption.”

1. Spiritual Maternity: Mary and the Church

Several factors have contributed to the emergence of this theme: Jn 19:26 Sq; the theology of virginity affirming the spiritual fecundity of virgins, who have Mary as their model; the parallel between Mary and the church, which is also a spiritual mother; and finally the parallel between Eve and Mary, which holds Mary rather than Eve as the “mother of the living” (see above, I.1). It is difficult to determine which factor came first, or has been most decisive.

Origen outlined the theme on the basis of Jn 19:26 (Comment. on Jn I, IV, 23): as with John, any believer “in whom Christ lives” (see Gal 2:20) is the son of Mary. Ambrose saw Mary in the figure of the church (On the Instit. of Virgins 89, and above I.1.c, for the reading of the Song of Songs). For Augustine the church is virgin and mother (On Holy Virginity II, 2); and Mary, like the church (VI, 6), is the spiritual mother of all the members of Christ’s body (already in Ambrose, op. cit. 98). In the 13th century the Missal (Q. 29) of the Ps.-Albertus Magnus speaks of Mary’s suffering at the cross, which made her mother of all humankind. In the 15th century Bernardine of Siena attributed this maternity to her consent to the angel’s message (Serm. 6 On Consent, 2). Modern Catholicism has developed the notion of Mary’s spiritual maternity (Leo XIII, DS 3262 and 3275, who quotes Jn 19:26 Sq). But this theme was never the subject of a definition. Vatican II mentioned the link Augustine makes between Mary and the church (LG 53 and 63–65, COD 892–94). But Pope Paul VI, in the margins of the conciliar text, insisted on proclaiming Mary “Mother of the Church,” without giving this title a dogmatic significance (DC 61 [1964], 1544).

2. Mary’s Mediation and Her Cooperation in the Work of Salvation

The Catholic tradition has exalted the role of Mary as auxiliary to the work of her Son, insisting at times on its importance in the believer’s reception of salvation (Mary as mediatrix of all graces) and at times in the granting of salvation itself (Mary’s cooperation in salvation, coredemption).

a) “Mediation” From the fourth century on Mary was viewed as having an intercessory role on behalf of virgins (see above, I.1.b). As time went on she was recognized as having a more extensive role: Bernard of Clairvaux called her the “mediatrix of salvation” (PL 182, 333B). The Salve regina (c. 12th century) called her an advocate (the same notion of protection and intercession is found in the Byzantine tradition). In 1896, to account for 1 Tm 2:5 (Christ the sole mediator), Pope Leo XIII specified that Mary was “the mediatrix alongside the mediator,” thus emphasizing her subordinate and nonparallel role (Encycl. Fidentem piumque, DS 3321). But Mary’s mediation, despite 20th-century requests, has not been defined. Vatican II only mentioned this title on one occasion (LG 62), in a marginal way, within the framework of a series of terms expressing Mary’s intercession. However, Pope John Paul II made it an important theme of his encyclical Redemptoris Mater; but in speaking of “maternal mediation,” “participant and subordinate,” being expressed through the intercession of the Mother of God (DC 84 [1987], 399–401).

b) Cooperation in Salvation: “Coredemption”? The parallel between Eve and Mary tends to give Mary a role in the work of salvation that is as significant as that attributed to Eve in the Fall; the preservation from all sin (original sin for Catholics) makes Mary an exception and associates her with Christ; finally, Mary’s yes to the angel is, as it were, the first act of salvation. Irenaeus (Adv. Haer. III, 22, 4) opposes Eve, a cause of death, to Mary, “cause of salvation” for herself and all of humankind (Heb 5:9 transposed from Christ to Mary). Ps.-Albertus of the Missal applies Gn 2:20 to Christ and to the Virgin, “a help similar to him.” The title of coredemptrix emerged in the 16th century and became widely used in the 17th (Carol 1950, to be corrected by Laurentin in 1951). The idea would be found in Leo XIII. Pope Pius X declared in 1904 that “by virtue of Mary’s communion of suffering and willingness with Christ, she has been deemed worthy to become the one who repairs the lost world” (Encyclical Ad diem illum, DS 3370). Pope Benedict XV produced a sacrificial reading of the Passion: the Virgin offers her Son, and one might say that with Christ she redeems humankind (Inter sodalicia, AAS 10, 1918, 182; see Carol 1950). Logic causes that which concerns Christ’s works to flow back onto Mary, since her yes is the starting point of Christ’s works. Pope Pius XI used the word “coredemptrix” in 1935 in a message broadcast by radio. The magisterium* has never made a decision about this title (intentionally avoided by Vatican II and thereafter), rightly a subject of controversy because of its ambiguity (the risk of diluting Christ’s singularity) and its rejection by Protestants (see Barth* in his Dogmatics). The legitimate idea is that of the grace conferred upon Mary, in order that she might cooperate through the response of her faith in a salvation of which she is the first beneficiary.

3. The Marian Cult

a) Liturgy. The first feast with a partially Marian theme was that of the Hypapante, the meeting between Christ and Simeon, a feast recorded in Jerusalem and in Cappadocia from the fourth century onward. It was initially held on 14 February and then 2 February. The first strictly Marian feast was that of the commemoration of Mary (or Mary Theotokos), most often linked with the cycle of Christmas and Epiphany, celebrated in Jerusalem on 15 August from the fifth century onward, and on other dates elsewhere (Mimouni 1995); and imposed throughout the empire as the feast of the Dormition and the Assumption on 15 August by the Emperor Maurice shortly before 600 (ibid. 67, n. 95). The Annunciation may go back as far as the fourth century, but there is insufficient documentation to establish this as fact. The Nativity of Mary on 8 September appeared, undoubtedly in Jerusalem, from the sixth century onward; and finally the Conception of Mary (or of Anne), on 9 December, was recorded in the eighth century in the East and passed to the West through the Byzantine territories in Italy. Here it was celebrated under the name of the Conception of the Virgin on 8 December; following some controversy, it was revived in the 12th century in England or in Lyons. These feasts gave rise to liturgical texts on the Virgin. From the sixth century onward, Romanos of Melos devoted several kontakia to the Virgin; the Acathist Hymn (recited standing) dates from the same era. Moreover, in the fourth century, Eastern anaphora (eucharistic prayers) mentioned the Virgin (J. Doresse—E. Lanne, Un témoin archaïque de la liturgie copte de saint Basile, Bibliothèque du Muséon 47, Louvain, 1960).

The fairly late and gradual emergence of these feasts, all of which have a basis in the Bible or in doctrine, precludes the received notion that the influence of pagan cults might have given birth to the worship of the Virgin in Christianity, even though, here and there, the risk of making Mary a divinity became quite real (the “Collyridians” according to Epiphanius, Panarion 79). This led to a gradual definition of the way in which the Virgin was to be honored as the mother of God (John Damascene, Exposition of Faith 88, 63, Kotter II, 205) and to the distinction between the cult of adoration (latría) owed to Christ and the honor accorded to creatures (cult of dulia for the saints, where the cult of Mary is emphasized as a hyperdulia: Thomas Aquinas, ST IIIa, q. 25, a. 5). For this reason, and to be rigorous about the terminology here, believers do not “pray” to Mary, but commend themselves to her prayer: “Holy Mary, Mother of God, pray for us.”

b) Devotion. It was not until the middle of the fifth century (Barré 1963) that there was seen in the West a prayer* addressed to Mary (the Eastern Sub tuum is alleged to be older by a whole century, according to the papyrus quoted in L3). The major prayers and Marian chants gradually took shape during the Middle Ages, during which time the devotion of the rosary became widespread, associating the repetition of the Ave Maria with the contemplation* of the mysteries* of Christ. Marian devotion is essentially liturgical in Orthodoxy; in Catholicism, such devotion has been the subject, on several occasions, of a readjustment (from the Avis salutaires in 1673 to Vatican II, which encouraged liturgical over private devotion, LG 66–67, COD 897–98, not without having also encouraged the liturgy itself to become recentered on Christ by eliminating a number of Marian feasts).

Among the themes of modern devotion, that of Mary’s queenship became widespread from the Middle Ages in both the East and the West (Barré 1939); Luther* was hostile to this idea. It has been promoted by the Catholic magisterium (institution of the feast of Mary Queen of the World by Pius XII in 1954, Ad coeli Reginam, DS 3913–17), but not been made the object of a definition.

Conclusion: Vatican II, in a tight vote, integrated the Marian doctrine into the schema on the church (instead of making it a separate document): this would be Chapter 8 of Lumen Gentium. For the first time a council gave a synthetic presentation of the Virgin, situating her “in the mystery of Christ and of the Church”: on the one hand, a very sober biblical* and patristic theology reduced the mysteries of the life of the Virgin to their significance within the economy of salvation; on the other hand, Mary was placed within the communion* of saints and the mystical body, and her link with the church was expressed through three major terms: member, type or model, and Mother in the order of grace. After the council Paul VI returned to the demands of the Marian cult (Marialis cultus, DC 71 [1974], 301–9, and John Paul II devoted an important encyclical to her that was largely in the same vein as the conciliar text. Present-day theological reflection emphasizes the theme of Mary-as-Servant and the link between Mary and the Holy Spirit.

- D. Casagrande (1974), Enchiridion Marianum Patristicum, Rome.
- S. Alvarez Campos (1970–85), Corpus Marianum Patristicum, 8 vols., Burgos.
- G. Gharib (1988–91), Testi Mariani del Primo Millennio, 4 vols., Rome.
- ♦ DICTIONARIES: DThC 7/1, 1927, 845–1218 (IC).
DSp 4/2, 1961, 1779–84 (Eve-M.); 10, 1980, 409–82 (M.).
Cath. 5, 1963, 1273–91 (IC); 8, 1979, 524–85 (M.).
TRE 22, 1992, 115–61 (M.).
- REVIEWS: EtMar 5, 1947 (holiness of M.); 6–8, 1948–50 (As- sumption); 9–11, 1951–53 (M. and the church); 12–15, 1954–57 (M., new Eve); 16–18, 1959–61 (spiritual maternity); 19–21, 1962–64 (mariology and ecumenism).

- Conc(F)* 188, 1983 (mariology and ecumenism).
- ENCYCLOPEDIAS: H. du Manoir (Ed.), Maria: Études sur la Sainte Vierge, I–VIII, Paris, 1949–71.
- R. Bäumer and L. Scheffczyk (Ed.), Marienlexikon, St. Ottilien, 1988.
- STUDIES: H. Barré (1939), “La royauté de M. pendant les neuf premiers siècles,” RSR 29, 129–62, 304–34.
- M. Jugie (1944), La mort et l’assomption de la Sainte Vierge: Étude historico-doctrinale, SfT 114.
- C. Balic (1948–50), Testimonia de Assumptione Beatae Virginis Mariae ex omnibus saeculis, Academia mariana, 2 vols., Rome.
- G. Jouassard (1949), “M. à travers la patristique. Maternité divine, virginité, sainteté,” Maria I, 69–157.
- J. B. Carol (1950), De Corredemptione (Franciscan Institute Publications), Rome, Vatican.
- H. Barré (1951), “M. et l’Église du vénérable Bède à saint Albert,” EtMar 9, 59–143.
- R. Laurentin (1951), Le titre de corédemptrice, Paris.
- R. Laurentin (1952–53), M., l’Église et le sacerdoce, 2 vols., Paris.
- H. Coathalem (1954), Le parallélisme entre la Sainte Vierge et l’Église dans la tradition latine jusqu’à la fin du XIIe siècle, AnGr 74, Rome.
- Ch. Journet (1954), Esquisse du développement du dogme m., Paris.
- K. Rahner (1954), “Die Unbefleckte Empfängnis,” Schr. zur Th. 1, 223–37; “Zum Sinn des Assumpta-Dogmas,” ibid., 239–52.
- Coll. (1954–58), Virgo Immaculata, 18 vols. (Acts from the Congress of Rome, 1954), Academia mariana, Rome.
- A. Wenger (1955), L’Assomption de la T. S. Vierge dans la tradition byzantine du VIe au Xe siècle: Études et documents, Institut français d’études byzantines, Paris.
- K. Rahner (1960), “Virginitas in partu,” Schr. zur Th. 4, 173–205.
- D. M. Montagna (1962), “La liturgia mariana primitiva (sect. IV–VI). Saggio di orientamento,” Mar. 24, 84–128; “La lode alla Theotokos nei testi greci dei secoli IV–VII,” ibid., 453–543.
- W. Tappolet (1962), Das Marienlob der Reformatoren, Tübingen.
- M. Thurian (1962), M., Mère du Seigneur, Figure de l’Église, Taizé.
- J. A. de Aldama (1963), Virgo Mater, Granada.
- W. Delius (1963), Geschichte der Marienverehrung, Munich-Basel.
- R. Laurentin (1963), La question m., Paris; (1965), La Vierge au concile, Paris.
- H. Graef (1963–65), Mary: A History of Doctrine and Devotion, 2 vols., London.
- O. Semmelroth (1965), M. archétype de l’Église, Paris.
- R. Laurentin (1967), Court traité sur la Vierge M., éd. postconciliaire, Paris.
- R. Caro (1971–73), La homiletica Mariana Griega en el siglo V, Dayton, Ohio.
- A. Kniazeff (1990), La Mère de Dieu dans l’Église orthodoxe, Paris.
- S. M. Perella (1994), “Il parto verginale di Maria nel dibattito teologico contemporaneo (1962–1994). Magistero-Esesesi-Teologia,” Mar. 146, 95–213.
- S. C. Mimouni (1995), Dormition et assomption de M. Histoire des traditions anciennes, Paris.
- B. Sesboüé (Ed.) (1995), Histoire des dogmes, III: Les signes du salut, Paris, 563–621.
- J. Pelikan (1996), Mary through the Centuries: Her Place in the History of Culture, New Haven and London.

MAURICE JOURJON AND BERNARD MEUNIER

See also Chalcedon, Council of; Christ and Christology; Church; Cult; Ephesus, Council of; Vatican II

Mass, Sacrifice of the

a) Concept. The concept of the Sacrifice of the Mass is a particular aspect of eucharistic (Eucharist*) theology* that took on a specific emphasis in the work of Luther* and, correspondingly, at the Council of Trent*, where it was made the object of a special decree, De sacrificio missae—the title was given by the editor of the council, though it corresponds closely to the content of the document. These two factors have earned it an important place in Western theology, in the 16th century and since. Even though Luther saw in it one of the three “Babylonian captivities” of Catholic eucharistic theology, the expression “Sacrifice of the Mass” is barely attested before him—though, having once been used by the reformers, it would be constantly employed by Catholics.

b) Liturgical Tradition. The idea of the Sacrifice of the Mass is supported by two characteristics of early practice. On the one hand it is based on the early Christian practice of offering eucharists for the dead, a tradition that underwent considerable development in the medieval Latin world, particularly in the final centuries before Luther; and on the other hand it is founded on the place accorded to the sacrificial aspect in the celebration of the Eucharist and in the very text of the eucharistic prayer*. In the course of celebration, as much in the East as in the West, the faithful were allowed and encouraged to bring an offering as a eucharistic sacrifice, and this offering was considered from a standpoint already to be seen in the work of Irenaeus*: the offerings presented to God* constituted the returning to God of the gifts that he had made to mankind. Expressed in terms borrowed from the prayer of Solomon (1 Chr 29:14), this idea found a place in the Antiochian anaphorae (“we offer you these gifts which come from you,” ta sa ek tôn sôn soi prosperontes) and thence in Roman eucharistic prayer (“this offering taken from the wealth that you give us,” de tuis donis ac datis). The eucharistic prayers—originally that of the apostolic tradition, then those of Antioch and Roman eucharistic prayer—also included in their anamnestic sections the idea of an offering of that which one commemorates, in a conception in which the act of offering is subsumed within the act of commemoration, and in a sense constitutes part of its realism.

Taking account of these characteristics shared by eucharistic prayers as a whole, Roman eucharistic prayer is distinctive in that the sacrificial aspect occupies a more important place in it than in the others, and to some extent overshadows the role of thanksgiving for the history of salvation*.

c) Theology. Until the 13th century, theology was hardly concerned with the sacrificial dimension of the Eucharist, being content to allude in passing to Augustine*'s formula (Ep 98, 9) according to which “Christ* is immolated every day in the sacrament*,” and the Antiochene idea of the commemoration of the sacrifice (Peter Lombard, Sent. IV, 12, 5). Thomas* Aquinas, who gave a new emphasis to Christ's priesthood, did initiate the distinction between Eucharist as sacrament and Eucharist as sacrifice, but was far from making it the basis of his eucharistic theology. In contrast to other theologians, such as Duns* Scotus, who held that it was the Ecclesia that offered the sacrifice, Thomas moreover linked the act of offering with the priest's (presbyter/priest) consecrating role: a position that led to a divergence in the theory of mass offertories, which developed and grew in importance from the end of the Middle Ages.

The 16th-century Reformation rejected any notion of a church offering sacrifice. On the contrary, the Eucharist was God's offering to the faithful: “We allow ourselves to be done good by God” (Luther, WA 6, 364). The church's only offering was its thanksgiving.

In 1562, opposing Luther, the Council of Trent (DS 1738–59) defined the Mass as a true bloodless sacrifice, including a propitiatory sacrifice for the living and the dead, and stipulated that Christ at the Last Supper had instituted both the Eucharist and the priesthood*. The conciliar document was however careful to avoid the idea (which could be attributed to medieval theology) that Christ was “sacrificed anew” in the Mass (Gregory* the Great, Dialogues IV, 58, PL 77, 425), whereas his sacrifice had been offered once for everybody on the cross (Heb 9:4, 9:27). It seems, moreover, that the fact that communion* with the chalice was more expressive of the sacrificial aspect of the Eucharist was not highlighted. In any event it is clear that the sacrificial aspect of the Eucharist henceforth became an increasing concern of Catholic theology—for example in the work of Suarez*, who devoted a third of his treatise on the Eucharist to sacrifice.

The texts of Vatican* II, a council that could not but be attentive to the ecumenical dimension of this question, emphasize the unity of the Eucharist and the sacrifice on the cross (LG no. 3), state that the priest offers the sacrifice “sacramentally” (PO no. 2 and 5), note the unity between the spiritual sacrifice of all the baptized and the eucharistic sacrifice (ibid.), and finally entitle the chapter in SC that deals with the Mass De mysterio missae, where one might have expected De sacrificio missae.

- M. Lepin (1926), L'idée du sacrifice de la messe d'après les théologiens depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours, Paris.
- J. A. Jungmann (1953), “Das Gedächtnis des Herrn in der Eucharistia,” ThQ 133, 385–99.
- B. Neunheuser (Ed.) (1960), Opfer Christi und Opfer der Kirche, Düsseldorf.
- E. Iserloh (1961), “Der Wert der Messe in der Diskussion der Theologen vom Mittelalter bis zum 16. Jahrhundert,” ZKTh 83, 44–79.
- K. Rahner, A. Häussling (1966), Die vielen Messen und das eine Opfer, 2nd Ed., Freiburg.
- J. Chiffolleau (1980), La comptabilité de l'au-delà, Rome.
- A. Duval (1985), Des sacrements au concile de Trente, Paris.
- P.-M. Gy (1993), “Avancées du traité de l'eucharistie de saint Thomas,” RSPHTh 77, 219–28.

PIERRE-MARIE GY

See also Eucharist; Luther; Martin; Mystery

Mathematics and Theology

The nature of the reality of mathematical objects and the objectivity of mathematical statements constitute two of the deepest problems in the philosophy of mathematics. Objectivity would imply a fundamental harmony between the structure of the human mind and the intelligibility of the universe; it would imply that knowledge arrived at through mathematical theories accurately represents the nature of the world and that there is an intrinsic harmony between the nonempirical, logical worlds of the mind and the empirical worlds of experience. But there are huge difficulties with such a view, and some have even suggested that logic itself is empirical. Mathematical objects and their properties do not have the a priori status Kant believed them to have. For example, whether the angles of a triangle sum to 180 degrees depends on whether the underlying geometry is taken to be Euclidean. It is possible, in other words, to construct an internally coherent mathematical theory without supposing that any reality exhibiting the properties corresponding to that theory can be found in the physical universe. Indeed, mathematics seldom regards the physical universe as an appropriate criterion to employ in deciding upon the intrinsic interest of its theories, and once the question is asked it is not easy to say why the physical universe should be the final arbiter of “reality” except under one particular preference.

A mathematics based on number will differ from another based on space. A unit Euclidean square has a diagonal of length root-two. This geometrical representation of number is seemingly elementary. But it is impossible to write down root-two as a finite decimal, to store it accurately in any physically realizable computing device, or to draw a line of length root-two in any physical medium except by chance, and even then one could never know that one had done so. Root-two, in other words, despite being a perfectly clear and intelligible number, has a problematic status as a property of any object in the physical world whether conceived under a numerical or spatial description. Yet despite these difficulties, mathematics as an instrument of the mind seems to have afforded human beings unprecedented powers to understand, predict, and control the natural world, the realm of the senses. The philosophy of mathematics therefore takes us directly into the deepest question of metaphysics concerning the natures of and the connections between reality, discourse, knowledge, and intelligibility, questions themselves dependent on assumptions about the place of human cognition in the universe.

This description shows a prima facie similarity between the mathematical and theological enterprises. It is possible to construct countless internally consistent theologies without supposing that there is an objective reality, a god or gods, to whom they refer. To the numerous major world religions can be added a large number of variants, each with its distinctive way of speaking about a god or some kind of ultimate reality. The nature of the reality of theological objects and the objectivity of theological statements constitute two of the deepest problems in the philosophy of religion. Theology and mathematics nevertheless differ in two important respects, one empirical and one experiential.

It seems possible to arbitrate between different mathematical theories about the physical world by employing empirical criteria. For example, we know from empirical evidence and criteria of epistemic economy that certain kinds of non-Euclidean geometry afford in some sense better models of the universe under Einstein’s theories. Despite ongoing disagreements about detail, there is worldwide agreement about these general principles. Neither unequivocal evidence nor such a consensus can be claimed for any theology. Einstein asserted that to the axioms of any coherent geometry we need only add one, that this particular geometry models the universe, to obtain a theory about the world. To that extent we may take any internally consistent theology and add only one equivalent assertion, to obtain a theology that describes the reality of God. Both a mathematical theory and a theology are then tried in the fire of human experience: do they afford an adequate means to describe the reality of which human beings wish to speak?

Judaeo-Christian theology also posits an active reality of which it attempts to speak. Whereas mathematics strives to represent the properties of a physical or conceptual universe that is not actively seeking to communicate its truths to the mathematician, theology supposes the opposite: that God is actively engaged in trying to communicate with human beings, among them theologians. Theology therefore leaves room for existential conviction that overrides empirical criteria and ratification by like-minded competent persons, whereas mathematics does not. In mathematics what is a truth for one person must be a truth for another, other things being equal. There is no room for opinion in mathematics because the structure of logic eliminates the possibility that anything new can be introduced into the theory once the assumptions are granted. Proofs preserve truths; they do not generate them.

The conservative, preservative nature of logical deduction forces us to acknowledge that proofs only show us explicitly what is implicit in the assumptions we grant. No proof of the existence of God can therefore do more than demonstrate that our presuppositions assume that there is a God even though we cannot see that they do so. Moreover, proof has no force: if we dislike the correctly deduced conclusion of an argument, we are always at liberty to revise our assent to its assumptions. What we are not at liberty to do and remain rational is to insist upon the assumptions and deny validly deduced conclusions.

Mathematics is concerned with the exploration of the properties of a system of conceptual spaces that can be defined axiomatically. Those properties are often immeasurably complex, however simple their axioms, and frequently surprise us. For example, the system of natural numbers $\{1, 2, 3, \dots\}$ has proved sufficiently rich to generate conjectures that remain unproved to this day. Cantor was able to show in the 19th century that the irrational numbers such as root-two, known to the Greeks, cannot be counted. This century, quite unexpectedly, Kurt Gödel showed that a formal logical system capable of generating elementary arithmetic must permit undecidable propositions, and that such systems, if consistent, cannot prove their own consistency. Alan Turing and Alonzo Church showed that certain processes are noncomputable, and there are further classes of computation that cannot be completed because the number of calculations they require will always grow more quickly than any conceivable available computing power. In chaos and complexity theory the apparently insignificant constraints necessarily imposed upon the accuracy of the measurements we can perform (such as root-two) and the accuracy to which transcendental numbers can be represented in a computer have been shown to have potentially fatal consequences for our capacity to project the evolution of nonlinear systems into the future.

In all these cases, something conceived initially in terms of essentially simple axioms has been found to have properties of unforeseen and frequently counter-intuitive complexity. The mathematics that began as the subservient child of the human mind has grown up to demonstrate the limitations of the conceptual capacities of the mind that created it.

James Clerk Maxwell once said, in a remark often wrongly attributed to Einstein, that insofar as the theories of mathematics refer to reality they are not certain, and insofar as they are certain they do not refer to reality. In this he reiterated Giambattista Vico's question about whether the truths of mathematics are found or made, for a mathematics that is made is certain because it is completely under our control and neither allows nor needs any reference to an external world to verify or authenticate it, whereas a mathematics that is found is uncertain because it can never proceed without perpetually referring itself back to the nature of the reality it purports to model. Once an axiomatic deductive system is defined, in other words, so are all its properties; it ceases to be necessary to ask whether those properties are "real" because they are properties of the system. We can proceed without reference to the world. And it is possible to do theology in the same way: to set up a system of assumptions and then to see what can be deduced from them without reference to the reality of an external, independent, autonomous God.

This illustration pinpoints the kernel of a difficulty we face in all our attempts to tie together God, humanity, and the world. While we model the world using mathematics, the world must seem autonomous and mechanical, even granted the difficulties of quantum mechanics. But the autonomy arises because the deductive conceptual tools we employ are autonomous and leave no room for newness to enter the system. We compensate for deficiencies in our models by making interim adjustments. We can rationalize the need for those compensations in many ways: by acknowledging that the model was inadequate; by accepting that the initial conditions were known with insufficient accuracy; even by acknowledging that there may have been worldly or divine forces involved that we had failed to take into account. What we seem reluctant to contemplate is the possibility that the world might not be susceptible to completely accurate mathematical modeling at all, for such a concession would lead us to doubt whether we can properly understand the universe. What is certainly true is that the world does not proceed on its way by solving differential equations.

Ever since Plato formulated the relationship between the particular and the general in terms of the theory of forms, human cognitive theories have struggled to understand the relationship between the two. Mathematics, as a theory of the mind, deals most comfortably with generality; it is most comfortable when least specific or quantified, as in geometry; the more accurate we need to be in terms of specific numbers associated with particular realities, the more clumsy and inaccurate it becomes. It remains a deep question whether mathematics is therefore an appropriate metaphor to use of the mind of God. Is God a Greek mathematician, a geometer, dealing with vast generality, or is God one who deals with the utterly specific and who allows the general to emerge from that specificity as a by-product of divine consistency and benevolence? Do we make a conceptual and even a theological mistake when we assume or insist that the world be understood mathematically and therefore in terms of boundless generality? Could it be that such general laws as we can discern in the universe are the emergent properties of a world governed by the deepest possible involvement of God in the singular and the particular, and that there is no traffic from the general to the particular at all, that specific events are not instantiations of universal forms, as Plato taught us, but the universal forms, like mathematics, necessary inventions of a human mind too limited to comprehend the majesty of God's specific and singular presence in the world?

Although mathematical proof proceeds by deduction, the hypotheses that mathematics seeks to prove are the products of mathematical intuition, and that intuition is based upon such things as aesthetic sense, as Henri Poincaré stressed, and heuristic power. Without good ideas, mathematics cannot proceed, yet even with good ideas many hypotheses defy proof or disproof.

It is from the work of Kurt Gödel that some of the most pressing speculations of the relationship between mathematics and theology have arisen in recent years. Gödel was able to show that sufficiently rich axiomatic systems admit the formulation of well-formed propositions that are undecidable in the system, and that such consistent systems are unable to prove their own consistency. The first result relates intimately to the capacity of some systems to refer to themselves. Such self-reference can introduce endless logical loops of the kind seen in other philosophical dilemmas. For example, if Epimenides the Cretan asserts "All Cretans always lie," then as a Cretan he is lying; but then all Cretans do not always lie, in which case what he says may be true, and so on. Or a relativist may say that all truths are only relatively rather than absolutely true, but this appears to be a universal truth, in which case there is at least one truth that is universally true, and so the assertion of the relativist is self-contradictory. Some have seen the undecidability of Gödelian statements as indications of the inherent superiority of the human mind over computation, even as a proof of the existence of an upwardly open hierarchy of intellectual power culminating in God.

The same sorts of claims follow the consistency result: if we cannot prove consistency, then we cannot be sure that in any system to which the theory applies there are not theorems whose contradictions are also theorems. This seems to be devastating for mathematics at a theoretical level, but in practice nobody worries about it, because when we have a good proof we know that a proof of the converse will not be possible. It is only in the general and abstract case that problems arise.

Most recently mathematics has been involved in issues germane to theology over computational questions and issues in artificial intelligence and the mind/body problem. The questions boil down to whether what something is made of makes a difference to what it can compute. Turing thought not, and so envisaged the possibility of a thinking machine; others think that there must be a biological substratum to thinking, that what things are made of does have a bearing on what those things can do, and so they deny that the brain is engaged in machinelike computation.

The philosophy of mathematics engages with questions about the ultimate intelligibility of the universe, for a universe of which mathematics is the preferred conceptual instrument is only as intelligible as that instrument can render it. Unresolved problems in the foundations of mathematics, in which no universal agreement exists, persist; and logicians, formalists, intuitionists, and pragmatists continue to debate central questions about actual infinities, constructive proofs, and alternative logics, suggesting that our confidence in mathematics as a monolithic homogeneous paragon of rationality is misplaced. The innocent equation of logical and empirical realities to which mathematics and its associated sciences are prone with their predominantly naive realism serves only to blind us to the possibility that the queen of human sciences may systematically mislead us about the nature of the world.

Is there an alternative? Theology in its best manifestations seeks always to be structured and guided by the nature of its divine object. The inner structure of theology, which we suppose to be its logic, is therefore constrained by the need at all points to connect with the revealed nature of God in scripture and tradition. There has always been a tendency for the logic of theology to set up systems with an autonomous structure that then mitigate against certain of these revealed truths. There is therefore a need for theology self-consciously to acknowledge the possibility of an unsystematic nominalism if it is to be true to the nature of the revealed reality of God, for the logos of God's being may well be contrary to the autonomous logic of our rationality. If that is so, then the logic that governs the universe may also be counter to the autonomous logic of the mathematical sciences; there may well be a contingency about the world that renders it unpredictable, unsystematizable, just because it exists as the creation of a God whose logos surpasses our logic. In that case, mathematics may, precisely by virtue of its autonomy, one day prove to be the consummation of all idols, a Tower of Babel that tempts humankind to reach for knowledge that lies by its nature beyond it.

Perhaps the most important parallel between mathematics and theology concerns the question of reference, the question with which we began. The nature of mathematics means that we can conduct a coherent conversation about mathematical objects without adjudicating on the question of their existence or its nature; much the same is true of theology. One cannot suppose that the quality of a conversation entails the existence of its subject-matter without conflating empirical and nonempirical worlds, as happens in logicism; one can scarcely ignore the need to understand what it is one converses about, pretending that it is sufficient just to manipulate the symbols, as in formalism; one can sympathize with those who wish to deny actual infinities and nonconstructive proofs, as in intuitionism; and one can deplore the effective unbelief of those content merely to identify a discipline with what those engaged in it actually do, as in pragmatism. The issues confronting us concerning the kind of realism theology envisages for its God are strikingly similar to those the philosopher of mathematics envisages for its objects. Both can continue relatively happily without considering such issues, but neither has any real purpose beyond that of a pastime unless it engages with the questions of ultimate reality that such issues entail.

- H. Poincaré (1902), La science et l'hypothèse, Paris.
- D. Hofstadter (1979), Gödel, Escher, Bach, London.
- L. Wittgenstein (1983) Remarks on the Foundations of Mathematics, Ed. Rush Rhees, G. E. M. Anscombe, Oxford.
- P. Benacerraf and H. Putnam (Ed.) (1984), Philosophy of Mathematics: Selected Readings, Cambridge.
- J. C. Puddefoot, Logic and Affirmation: Perspectives in Mathematics and Theology, Edinburgh.
- R. Penrose, The Emperor's New Mind: Concerning Computers, Minds, and the Laws of Physics, Oxford.
- M. A. Boden (Ed.) (1990), The Philosophy of Artificial Intelligence, Oxford.
- J. N. Crossley et al. (1990), What Is Mathematical Logic? Oxford.
- W. D. Hart (1996), The Philosophy of Mathematics, Oxford.
- R. Hersch (1997) What Is Mathematics, Really? London.

JOHN PUDDEFOOT AND IRÈNE FERNANDEZ

Maximus the Confessor

580–662

1. Life

Maximus the Confessor, the great monk-theologian, was a champion of, and martyr for, Chalcedonian Christology* at its most exacting. Only the last part of his long life is reliably documented, from the time of his presence in Carthage (Whitsun 632) and above all from his involvement in the monoenergist and monothelite controversies (634). The whole of his earlier life remains for the most part unclear and open to debate. According to the traditional Life, he was for the most part in Constantinople, where, on completing his education, he fulfilled various important roles in the imperial administration before entering the monastic life around 614 at Chrysopolis (Scutari) on the Asiatic side of the Bosphorus. On the other hand, a Syriac biography of Maronite origin considers him a native of the upper Jordan valley (Golan). Orphaned young, he is said to have grown up in the Lavra of Saint Chariton (Palea lavra), an important center of Origenist controversies, which would explain the importance of their refutation in his writings.

According to this theory he took refuge in Constantinople during the Persian invasion of Palestine (613–14), and in 617, at Chrysopolis, would have met the young monk Anastasius, who was to become his lifelong disciple and biographer. Around 624–26 he evidently made a long stay at Cyzicus (Erdek) at the monastery of Saint George, in the company of bishop John, whose questions would inspire his expositions of ambiguous passages in the work of Gregory* of Nazianzus, and perhaps also his Centuries on Theology and Economy. In 626 the Persians and Avars attacked Constantinople, once again forcing Maximus into exile. It was undoubtedly at this time that he met some Severian bishops in Crete and perhaps, in Cyprus, the priest (presbyter/priest*) Marinus, with whom he was to correspond.

Having settled in Carthage around 630 he joined the Eastern community of Eucratas, led by Sophronius, the future patriarch of Jerusalem* (634–38), who enlisted his help to refute monoenergism*. He was still there in 645 at the time of his disputation with Pyrrhus, the deposed patriarch of Constantinople. He then went to Rome*, where he gave his signature, as a monk, on the occasion of the synod* of 649, which condemned monotheism*. Returning to Constantinople—in 652, according to the Syriac Life—he was arrested there in 654. Exiled to Bizya (Thrace) after an initial trial, he became involved there in a dispute with bishop Theodore in the summer of 656, which led to a harsher exile at Perberis. After the patriarchal synod had exiled him to Lazica (Caucasus) and ordered the cutting off of his hand and tongue, he died on 13 August 662. Nineteen years later, the third Council of Constantinople* (681), without naming him, would canonize his doctrine of the two wills in Christ*.

2. Works

For the theologian, Maximus's most important writings are first of all the Replies to the 65 Questions of the Libyan monk Thalassios on scriptural texts (Q.T., PG 90, 344–785, critical edition by Laga-Steel, CChr.SG, 2 vols.) and on difficult passages of Gregory of Nazianzus and Pseudo-Dennis*; and then the Ambigua (Amb.) I to Thomas and II to John of Cyzicus (PG 91, 1031–1418). Taking advantage of the opportunities offered by the subject texts, Maximus treats, more or less fully, the themes that stimulate his thought. Especially important are Q.T., Prol., 21, 22, 42, and above all 60, and Amb. 7, 10, 41, and 42, in which he clarifies more particularly the main elements of his theological synthesis.

The same is true of several minor works: the Exposition of the Lord's Prayer (Pater, PG 90, 871–910), the Book of Asceticism (Asc., PG 90, 911–56), and the Mystagogy (Myst., PG 91, 657–718). Following a literary genre common in the monastic tradition*, Maximus delights in condensing his thoughts into short "sentences" grouped into "decades" and "centuries." Examples include the Four Centuries on Charity (Char., PG 90, 959–1080), evidently one of his earliest works and one of the most widely disseminated, and the Two Centuries on Theology and Economy, sometimes known as the Gnostic Centuries, which are steeped in the influence of Origen (Gnost., PG 90, 1083–176). The first 15 sentences in the huge compilation of Five Centuries on Various Subjects, which is largely drawn from works by Maximus, are also considered to be authentic (PG 90, 1177–86). The 27 Theological and Polemical Opuscles (ThePol., PG 91, 9–286) deal with a wide variety of topics relating to the christological controversies provoked by Monophysitism* and monothelitism. They include patristic anthologies (15, 27), definitions of philosophical or theological terms (14, 23, 26), and an account of the procession of the Holy* Spirit (10). Likewise, some of the 45 surviving Letters (Ep., PG 91, 363–649) are practically treatises. One such, in the spiritual field, is Ep. 2 on charity to John the Chamberlain; others, concerning christological controversies, are Ep. 13 and 19. Finally, on the question of Christology, the most important and explicit text is the account of Maximus's discussion with Pyrrhus, the deposed patriarch of Constantinople, at Carthage in July 645 (Pyrrh., PG 91, 288–353).

3. Maximus's Synthesis

Over the course of such a diversity of works, for the most part occasional and broken up into short sections—whether the two major collections Amb. and Q.T. or the treatises of monastic character such as Asc., Pater, and Myst.—there can be discerned the main outline of a synthesis firmly constructed around a small number of technical terms grouped into pairs or triads: being, being well, being forever (einai, eu einai, aei einai); movement, stability (genesis, kin sis, stasis—a triad opposed to the triad "henad, movement, stability" of Origen's followers); substance, power, operation (ousia, dunamis, energeia). More fundamental still is the pairing "organizing principle, mode" (logos, tropos).

It is above all in Q.T. 60 and Amb. 41–42 that Maximus clearly brings out the fundamental outline of his thought, organizing and sometimes correcting the Alexandrian theology of the Logos (above all that of the school of Origen) with the help of his constant reading of the Cappadocians, Gregory of Nazianzus, and especially Gregory* of Nyssa—and also, to a lesser extent, of Evagrius and the Areopagitic corpus. He deploys both Chalcedonian and post-Chalcedonian thinking on Christ to refocus this theology on the incarnate Logos. Christ is the organizing principle of creation and of the evolution of the cosmos. It is he who gives created beings the logoi, which ensure their stability. He guides their development according to modes (tropoi)—a new concept—and by his humility assumes human nature, which he restores to its original condition and leads to its final fulfillment by bringing it to share in his divine condition (théōsis). Thus God becomes all in all and everything is brought to unity in a périchorèse (circumincension*)—a term that Maximus seems to have been the first to use with a precise christological sense—which preserves the indispensable qualities of each nature.

Maximus explains this imposing synthesis first and foremost in a monastic perspective, setting out to develop the anthropological lines of reasoning that lead naturally to its fulfillment. While his reasoning is strongly inspired by the Cappadocian texts on the nature and condition of human development, his ascetic approach is largely based on the ideas of Evagrius, though he alters the emphasis of these in order to give prominence to the order of charity (Asc. and Ep. 2).

a) Ontology and Cosmology. In keeping with the dialectical mode that had dominated Greek thought since Parmenides and Heraclitus, Maximus’s ontological thinking is organized in terms of the triple aporia of the absolute and the contingent, the one and the many, and being* and development, as employed by the Christian doctrine of Creation that ensures the inalienable, though relative, consistency of the second term. Its solution is found in the acknowledged polysemy of the word logos, whose various senses involve reference to a certain order and an organizing principle. For the tradition in which Maximus was working the divine logos was that in which and by which everything that exists acquires meaning and receives existence (Col 1:16). On the one hand the logoi of creatures, with all their differences and diversity, are merely parts of that (Amb. 42). On the other hand, inasmuch as they are “divine wishes” (see Clement of Alexandria and Origen), they may assume existence by means of his creative freedom (Amb. 7).

Here development comes into play: it is a necessary characteristic (see Q.T. 13) of created existence and indicates the “distancing” (Gregory of Nyssa’s diastema) between divine immutability* and the intrinsic mutability of creatures. For this reason Maximus rejects the order of the Origenist triad, which begins with the status of henad (Amb. 7). This dynamism of created existence requires at the outset a beginning (arkhè), which supposes a “becoming” (genesis) that may take the form of generation (gennèsis). But this movement (kinèsis) tends toward a completion (telesis), which is stability (stasis), or participation in God’s plenitude, and may therefore be called deification (théōsis). The three modes of existence—being, well-being, and eternal being—are shaped by the rhythm of the triad “substance, power, operation.” The first is intrinsic to every nature by virtue of its being placed in existence, the second pertains to free will, but the last can only be attained by means of a divine gift that surpasses the potentiality of nature (Amb. 65). On occasions Maximus compares them to the three days in which the Creation was completed, or to the three days of the paschal triduum (Gnost. I, 50–60); and also to the three laws (the law of nature, the written law, and the law of grace, Amb. 65; Q.T. 64); or to the threefold birth of Christ by the flesh (logos tou einai), by baptism* (logos tou eu einai), and by the Resurrection* (logos tou aei einai, Amb. 42). Indeed, while the ontological logos (logos phuseôs), being intrinsic to each nature, remains identical in itself, its modes of existence (tropoi tès huparxeôs) may be altered or renewed. This distinction, borrowed from the Cappadocians, comes to play a vital part in Maximus’s Christology.

b) Anthropology. In the works preceding his involvement in the monoenergist and monothelite controversy (634), Maximus’s anthropology deals mainly with man’s becoming: his status and role in the scheme of creation, his present condition after the original Fall, and the path of asceticism* that makes possible the fulfillment of his first vocation. The keynote of this anthropology is the perfect man, Christ, the incarnate Logos. The monothelite controversy forced Maximus to take a more considered approach to the structure of the human being, especially regarding the will. He drew support for this from the writings of the neo-Chalcedonian theologians of the sixth century and, through them, from Aristotelian ideas.

Maximus’s thinking on human becoming is inspired by Gregory of Nyssa’s The Creation of Man (PG 44, 123–256), though with reservations concerning the theory of a double creation, and with an emphasis on the unity of the hypostasis in a “compound nature” of soul and body—or of intellect (nous), soul* (psukhè), and body. Since man is created in God’s image and according to his likeness, it is up to him to realize this image by exercising virtues* modeled on those of Christ, who gives him by grace* the status of divine filiation* (Amb. 42; Char. 3, 25; 4, 70). In so doing, man fulfills his double role of microcosm and mediator by the union of the five divisions: between the sexes, between paradise and the inhabited earth, between heaven and earth, between the visible and invisible worlds, and between uncreated and created nature (Amb. 41).

Adam*’s free decision to turn his “rational appetite” (orexis logikè), neutral in itself, not toward God but toward sensual pleasure involved him in the infernal dialectic of pleasure and pain (hèdonè-odunè), which can end only in death*. This is the interpretation Maximus gives, following Gregory of Nyssa, for the trees in Paradise (Q.T. Prol. and 43). Adam is imprisoned in self-love (philautia) and passionate love of the body (Char. 3, 8, 57, 59), the source of all vice. In this field Maximus takes his inspiration from the tradition of Evagrius, particularly in Asc. and Char. The normal exercise of the will, instead of being governed by reason*, is disrupted by the disturbance of the passions of sexual desire and anger (Q.T. Prol), whence the ambiguous nature of the “gnomic will” (Pater, PG 901–3). In one of his last writings Maximus offers an analysis of the various stages of voluntary activity (ThePol. 1), which would be taken up by John of Damascus and acquire classic status.

c) Christology. Until recently Maximus’s thought has attracted the attention of theologians largely in a christological context. This focus is justified provided that his full breadth is recognized. Indeed from the very first lines of his earliest writings (Asc. or Pater) Maximus clearly sets out the fundamental aim of his thinking, offering both a general overview (Asc. 1) and a glimpse of its core: “The request for everything of which the Logos of God, in his kenosis*, became by his flesh the author, is contained within the words of the prayer. It teaches us to appropriate that fortune of which only God the Father*, by his Son, naturally mediating in the Holy Spirit, is the true dispenser (khoregos), since indeed the Lord Jesus* is, in the words of the divine apostle*, the mediator between God and mankind (1 Tm 2:5). By his flesh he makes manifest to men the unknown Father; by the Spirit he leads to the Father those men who are reconciled in Him” (Pater, PG 90, 876). Q.T. (22, 28, 60, 61) clarifies the various aspects of this “mystery* of Christ” (60) (as also Amb. 41, 42, and Gnost. 1, 66–67; 2, 23, 60).

By means of his incarnation*, taking on human nature within his unique divine hypostasis, the two natures remaining distinct “without confusion or alteration” in a single “compound hypostasis”—and not, as the followers of Severus maintained, a “compound nature” (Ep. 13)—Christ, the incarnate Logos, restores man to his original condition, created in the image and likeness of God, or rather for the perfection of that likeness by the path of virtue (Q.T. 53; ThePol. 1), shaping him after his own filial condition. With this in mind, Maximus never ceased to refine his observations on the ontological status of human nature and its activities—observations that occupy an important place in the Ep. (13, 15) and above all in ThePol., and which find their most consummate expression in the discussion with Pyrrhus of 645.

The monothelite controversy forced Maximus to go deeper into the structure and operations of the will in order to recognize the proper character of Christ’s human will, as distinct from the divine will to which it willingly submits. This necessity would lead Maximus, as previously stated, to specify the modes and sequences of voluntary actions (ThePol. 4, 19, 25): an achievement that represents one of his major contributions to anthropology.

- Unfinished, the edition prepared by F. Combefis (Paris, 1675, 2 vols.), was completed by the important Ambiguorum Liber (F. Oehler, Halle, 1857) and reprinted by Migne (PG 90–91).
- A few texts of lesser importance and of uncertain authorship were published by Epifanovic (Kiev, 1917).
- CChr.SG, Questions à Thalassios (1992), Ambigua (1994), Opuscules théologiques et polémiques (1998), Lettres (1998), Questions et difficultés (1999), Paris.
- J. Touraille (trans. 1985), Centuries sur l’amour; Centuries sur la Théologie et l’Économie, Brève interprétation de la prière du “Notre Père,” in Philocalie des Pères neptiques, fasc. 6, Bellefontaine.
- ♦ Articles “Maxime”: V. Grumel (1928), DThC 10, 448–59; A. Cesera-Gastaldo (1962), LThK2 7, 208–10; I.-H. Dalmais (1980), DSP, 10, 836–47.
- H. Urs von Balthasar (1941), Kosmische Liturgie, Einsiedeln (2nd Ed., 1961).
- P. Sherwood (1952), Annotated Date-List, Rome.
- P. Sherwood (1955) The Earlier Ambigua of M. Conf., Rome.
- L. Thunberg (1965), Microcosm and Mediator, Lund.
- W. Völker (1965), M. Confessor als Meister des geistlichen Lebens, Wiesbaden.
- A. Riou (1973), Le monde et l’Église selon M. le Confesseur, Paris.
- J. M. Garrigues (1976), M. le Confesseur: La charité avenir divin de l’homme, Paris.
- F. Heinzer and C. Schönborn (Ed.) (1982), Maximus Confessor, Fribourg (Switzerland).
- P. Piret (1983), Le Christ et la Trinité selon M. le Confesseur, Paris.
- V. Karayiannis (1993), M. le Confesseur: Essence et énergies de Dieu, Paris.
- J.-C. Larchet (1996), La divinisation de l’homme selon M. le Confesseur, Paris; (1998), M. le Confesseur, médiateur entre l’Orient et l’Occident, CFi 208, Paris.

IRÉNÉE-HENRI DALMAIS

See also Aristotelianism, Christian; Chalcedon, Council of; Constantinople III, Council of; Gregory Palamas; Monothelitism/Monoenergism

Mechtild of Magdeburg. See Rhineland-Flemish Mysticism

Mediation. See Mary; Salvation

Meister Eckhart of Hohenheim. See Rhineland-Flemish Mysticism

Mendicant Religious Orders

The entry on monasticism* draws attention in the High Middle Ages to the decline in power of the traditional Benedictine monasteries as assertions of Christian values. The entry on Franciscan spirituality* analyzes the personal spiritual attitudes of Francis of Assisi. Both the diminution in the spiritual power of the monasteries and the personal spirituality of Francis of Assisi do however have important ecclesiological dimensions. Institutionalized mendicancy was the way in which the church met the challenge of the rise of a society based on feudalism and mercantilism, both of which put a premium on the private property whose legitimacy in any circumstances the early church had been reluctant to allow.

The term “mendicant orders” (ordines mendicantes) was used in the Second Council of Lyons in 1274 of those orders that had arisen in the 13th century and lived from begging. Its canon 23 suppressed all except Franciscans and Dominicans, giving temporary approval to the Hermits of Saint Augustine and the Carmelites, both to be formally approved in 1298. The number was to grow to 17 by 1993. Begging had become redundant by the 16th century, when the Council of Trent allowed corporate possessions to the mendicant orders, which by then included the Jesuits.

The mendicants not only bore witness to newly threatened Christian values, but also undertook necessary activities beyond the competence of either the monastic or the diocesan clergy. They fulfilled the need for a clerical force that was mobile and answerable directly to the pope, at whose disposition for apostolic missions they had to hold themselves ready. Such missions included preaching, the only means of religious instruction for the majority of the faithful, and also that part of the administration of the sacramental penitential regime pertaining to sins whose absolution was reserved to the pope. They were also entrusted with rights in respect of burials and the administration of other sacraments. Preparation for such work required training, and houses of study were founded by the new orders at Paris and sometimes elsewhere, often at Oxford or Cologne.

In time the mendicant orders took on the character of urban monasteries, with a spirituality based on the love of their neighbor shown by their pastoral activity. Their university training took them to the forefront of scholastic dispute, with various specific philosophical positions and tendencies associated with each order, and they filled the need to transmit to the faithful in towns a lay adaptation of monastic spirituality based on the canonical hours of the divine office. Inevitably their independence of the hierarchy and their superior powers led to clashes with the diocesan clergy, of which one of the most notable occurred in Paris between 1250 and 1260, and epitomized in the differences between the Franciscan Bonaventure* and the Dominican Thomas* Aquinas, whose order repeatedly found it difficult to enforce adherence to Thomist theology within its own ranks.

a) Franciscans. Known as the Order of Friars Minor (O.F.M.) since 1517, the Franciscans, also called Grey Friars (in French “Cordeliers”), split into branches, including the Minorites and the Conventual, Reformed, Observant, and Discalced Franciscans. The ideal of Francis of Assisi, whose core was the penitential following of the impoverished Jesus in humble solidarity with society’s weaker members, attracted a number of companions between 1206 and 1208. Francis sought ecclesiastical approval first granted by Innocent III in 1209–10 for his band of “penitents from Assisi.” It expanded with surprising speed and decided in 1215 to seek formal ecclesiastical incorporation, granted when the rule was approved in 1221 and 1223.

Its evangelical base was concretized in the three vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, but it embraced laymen as well as clerics. All worked for their living, falling back on begging when necessary. The continuity of the young order with Benedictine monasticism was ensured by prayer* in common and by making the aim of its preaching to believers and unbelievers alike simply the furthering of the praise of God by his rational creation, which had been the motive force behind the church’s earliest formal worship, and which became the overriding purpose of Benedictine life. The spirituality of the Franciscans was that which had originally been personal to its founder.

By the middle of the 13th century the order had spread throughout Europe, and in 1245–46 founded its first mission in Asia. Expansion ceased with the end of the intense urbanization of Europe around the end of the 13th century, and the order’s houses, heavily dependent on the alms and patronage available in the towns, found themselves open to exploitation by the towns and their more prominent citizens, who could pay through donations for the intercessory power of the prayers of the friars, whose churches and cemeteries also conferred a certain prestige.

Internal splits occurred between members of the order who wished to remain rigorously true to the obligations laid on them by Francis’s Testament to keep true to the original rule and those, who won, who were willing to accept papal modifications to their constitutions, made as circumstances changed. Devotionally, all branches of the Franciscans were united by a characteristic blend of devotions centering on Christ’s humanity, the Blessed Sacrament, the name of Jesus, and the Virgin. Ecclesiologically, their readiness to place themselves at the disposition of the pope, notably for missions to pagan countries, again showed the church’s power to react to new needs and new situations by gestating an appropriately institutionalized response. In the case of the Franciscans, that response included the establishment from the beginning of an equivalent order for women and of a lay “third” order for the married, all linked closely together by their common spirituality and devotional attitudes.

b) Dominicans. The Dominicans, known as the Order of Preachers (O.P.) and called “black friars,” were founded by papal bull in 1216 with constitutions incorporating a version of the Augustinian rule (see monasticism), modified to ensure retention of the contemplative element in their spirituality. Innocent III had insisted at the Fourth Lateran Council in 1215 that the necessary approval for the new group would be granted only if they chose an old rule. Their aim, specifically to bring about the salvation of souls by preaching the gospel, was confirmed by papal mandate in 1217, and extended to the whole Christian world. In other words, the Dominican Order from the beginning exclusively devoted itself to fulfilling the church’s obligation to announce to the world the gospel tidings. Its monastic, penitential, and ascetic norms were subordinate to its preaching role and, like the Benedictines, the Franciscans, and others, their assumption of part at least of the church’s mission gives their foundation and success fundamental ecclesiological significance.

The evangelical poverty practiced by their founder, Saint Dominic (1170–1221), and enjoined by him on his companions, was as strict as that of the Franciscans and was written into the Dominican constitutions in 1220, intensifying the young group’s participation in the new testimony to Christian values required by the developments in secular Western society. Its effectiveness was increased by the importance it attached to theological learning and to the study required to achieve it. Strong links with the universities of Paris and Bologna made clear the commitment of the group to intellectual endeavor, and the nature of their apostolate required mobility rather than stability of territorial presence.

Like the other early-13th-century foundations, the Dominicans, in adapting the Augustinian rule, in fact moved away from a strictly contemplative spirituality toward one compatible with missionary life, although it is still usual to speak of their spirituality as a combination, “contemplative in action,” which other groups were to take as a model. The Dominicans also found that their apostolate created a greater need for priests in their ranks than had been experienced by the more purely contemplative orders.

Dominic himself had traveled round the south of France three times before devoting himself to the existence of a wandering preacher, traveling on foot to convert the Albigenses. When joined by companions he established a first house in Toulouse and an asylum for women threatened by heresy whose inmates eventually became an order of nuns. He became associated with the anti-Albigensian crusade called by Innocent III under the leadership of Simon de Montfort, and with its instrument, the papal inquisition. The order drew heavily on the educated laity for its recruitment, which meant establishing houses in the larger towns, where even in the High Middle Ages good schools were to be found, leading inevitably to some clashes with the diocesan parish clergy. Only toward the end of the 13th century were foundations made in the smaller central European towns.

As papal preachers with special powers, however, the Dominicans were also heavily involved in preaching both the Crusades* and their attendant indulgences*, including that to which Luther* took such exception. They were to be permanently associated with the Inquisition, both in Spain, where it was a civil institution, and elsewhere. It is, however, necessary to point out that Dominican spirituality also led, alongside the missionary activity of teaching, to the contemplative heights attained by some of the Rhineland mystics, like Meister Eckhart, John Tauler, Henry Suso, and others. Many of them were Dominicans. In theology the Dominicans led an intellectually humanizing movement that regarded human reason as participating in divine rationality, so that human rational search for meaning in the cosmos was necessarily correlative to divine revelation. Often seen as a recourse to Aristotle in place of the Platonic inspiration of early Christian theology, this approach came to be known as the via antiqua, and was regarded as overnaturalistic by certain followers of the Franciscan tradition, notably Ockham (c. 1285–1349), who founded the via moderna, based on the absolute transcendence of God above his creation. Christian moral norms were revealed and did not necessarily have of their nature to conform to the moral exigencies of rational beings.

Western society outgrew the need for a Christian witness based on mendicancy, as distinct from individual poverty. The norm was altered by allowing the orders themselves to own property and to accept endowments for pious purposes. A legal means was devised to allow the Franciscans to enjoy revenue without themselves owning the capital from which it derived. From the beginning their constitutions allowed Jesuit colleges to possess capital and to receive endowments, with only the houses of their professed fathers obliged to live from alms. As the socioeconomic foundations of society moved on, the ecclesiological functions of its religious orders necessarily changed, usually demanding the appearance of new congregations to challenge new values and new circumstances. Mendicancy in the strict sense became obsolete.

- J. Morrman (1968), A History of the Franciscan Order from Its Origins to the Year 1517, Oxford.
- P.L. Nyhus (1975), The Franciscans in South Germany, 1400–1530, Philadelphia.
- J.B. Freed (1977), The Friars and German Society in the Thirteenth Century, Cambridge, Mass.
- A. Rotzetter (1977), Die Funktion des franziskanischen Bewegung in der Kirche, Schwyz.
- D. Berg (Ed.) (1992), Bettelorden und Stadt, Werl.

ANTHONY LEVI.

Mennonites. See Anabaptists

Mercy

The Latin word miser cordia, mercy, derives from the word describing one who is misericors, one whose heart is moved by the sight of the suffering of others. This implies that mercy is applied to one of the aspects of human sensibility. However, by means of a resolute anthropomorphism*, it is very much upon God* that the Latin version of the Bible* confers this attribute. Not including the New Testament, the Vulgate employs the term 273 times, to which one must add the 137 occurrences of the verb misereor and the 31 uses of the adjective misericos: in the vast majority of cases, these different lexemes refer to the divine actor. It is therefore clearly as a divine attribute* that the Latin Bible represents miser cordia.

It remains to be determined which Hebrew lexicon covers this family of words. Since it is necessary to eliminate the Old Testament texts that were not originally written in Hebrew, our discussion can be based on only 369 occurrences. Usage reflects three Hebraic roots: râcham, chânan, and châsad. Commentators have focused on the first root, while pointing out that the plural noun that derives from it (râchamîm), translated as “compassion,” has as its singular rèchhèm, which in turn designates a woman’s uterus. The biblical attribute of mercy thus discreetly presents the divine actor under a maternal aspect. Henceforth the pairing “justice*/mercy,” which appears in every section of the Hebrew Bible, could be interpreted as designating a symbolic wholeness that integrates both paternal and maternal features.

In the absence of a rigorous definition of these two terms one can at least attempt to describe them. While the attribute “justice” connotes severity and an uncompromising quality, but also the transcendence of divine sanctity, that of “mercy” refers to a fundamental compassion, to the understanding kindness of a God who “knows our frame” (Ps 103:14), and who has always shown himself capable of clemency and forgiveness.

It must be noted that the pair “justice/mercy” appears in the texts of the Qumran (1QSI, 26–II, 1), and in intertestamentary literature (intertestament*) (2 Ba 48, 17–18). But this literature, following the example of the Bible, already has a tendency to overestimate the latter term to the detriment of the former: (Test. Zab. 8, 1–3).

In considering this “attribute of mercy,” rabbinical literature was quick to derive, in turn, this essential ethical consequence: if the vocation of man is to imitate God, he must develop this quality within himself. Thus the Talmud states: “Since God is clement and merciful, be thou also clement and merciful” (TB Shab, 133 b). What is more, at the beginning of our era, Rabbi Gamaliel would even assert, in commenting on Dt 13:18: “He who shows himself merciful towards others will be treated by the Heavens with mercy, whereas he who shows no pity for his fellow man will have no right to the pity of the Heavens.” Similarly, the whole Jewish people was urged, as indicated by another text in the Talmud, to be “merciful and modest, and to practice acts of kindness” (TB, Yev. 79a).

The Islamic tradition would also examine this divine attribute. Thus, all the surahs of the Koran open with the basmalah, a formula where the root râcham is repeated again and again, since it is voiced in this way: bismillâh al-Rachmân al-Rachîm, “In the name of God, the Kind, the Merciful.” Moreover, numerous commentaries are devoted to the exact difference between these two divine titles.

The New Testament had already developed all of these features. Drawing its lexicon from the Septuagint, it made great use of words derived from the roots eleein (to pity), oikteirein (to have compassion for), kharis (“grace*”), and splankhna (“entrails,” but above all “compassion”)—the very words that the Greek translation used to render the three Hebraic roots mentioned above.

In perfect compliance with the Jewish tradition* the New Testament also revealed the consequence, at the level of human behavior, of the revelation* of divine mercy, both in the “descending” direction (“Be merciful, even as your father is merciful,” Lk 6:36) and in the “ascending” direction (“Blessed are the merciful, for they shall receive mercy,” Mt 5:7). The originality of the New Testament corpus on this point consisted in its transferring the traits of divine mercy to Jesus*. To be sure, God was still described as the source of this mercy—and from time to time there were unflinching evocations of his entrails (splankhna) of mercy (Lk 1:78), and even of their “plurality” (polusplankhnos: Jas 5:11)—but Jesus also possessed this “maternal” characteristic (12 instances), as well as the “pity” and “compassion” of the one who sent him.

The church* of the early centuries would do little more than develop various notions that it had received from Scripture*. In the liturgy the call for Christ*’s mercy would be condensed into the brief formula Kyrie eleison. This formula, which appeared in Greek language liturgies during the second half of the fourth century, would be adopted somewhat later by the Roman liturgy, and then progressively by the entire Latin-speaking world. (It should be noted that the Latin liturgy does not translate the Kyrie eleison but adds to it a twin formula, also Greek, Christe eleison.) In the Greek world the Kyrie eleison constituted the response of the people to the litanies of intercession recited by the deacon*. Clearly the omnipresence of this invocation in the liturgical text polarized the attention of the faithful onto the divine attribute of mercy—at least this is what is suggested by Saint John Chrysostom* (Homercy in Mt. 71, 4). And even well before the fourth century, Christian authors had frequently evoked the eleos of God (I Clemency 9,1), his oiktirmos (I Clemency 20, 11), or his splankhna: “Always merciful and kind, the Father is touched by those who fear him; with gentleness and goodness, he places his grace upon those who come to him with a simple heart" (I Clemency 20, 11).

In Latin the privileged term remains that of miseri-cordia, whether applied to God (Tertullian*: Paen. 2; Cyprian*: Laps. 15; Ambrose*: In Ps. 118:8, 22) or to human beings (Tertullian: Paen. 1; adu. Marc. 4, 27; Ambrose: Off. 1, 11, 38). Augustine* would justify this notion in opposition to the criticism voiced by the philosophers: "The stoics, it is true, habitually blame mercy. However, how much more honorable it might have been for our Stoic to be moved by pity for a man to save him from danger, than to be troubled by the fear of a shipwreck. . . . Then what is mercy if not the compassion of our heart for the misery of others, moving us to help them if we can?" (Civ. Dei IX, 5).

It was in the monastic world that the exercise of mercy would find its broadest scope. Through this virtue "beyond all virtues*" the monks could set off on the royal path of imitation of God. Among the countless illustrations one might provide of such an ideal, the following two "apothegms" might be retained, deriving as from the very earliest monasticism*, that of the Desert Fathers in Egypt. They immediately proposed what one could call a "maximalism of mercy": "A brother who had sinned was chased from the church by the priest; and abba essarion stood up and went out with him and said, 'I too am a sinner.' A brother questioned father Poemen and said, 'If I see a fault in my brother, is it good to hide it?' The old man said, 'In the hour where we hide the faults of our brother, God also hides ours; and in the hour where we bring forth the faults of our brother, God also brings forth our faults'" (Apothegms, Systematic collection, IX, 2 and 9).

By following the direction indicated here, one could develop the spiritual aspects of the virtue of mercy, as elaborated by the monastic tradition. All the same, the strictly theological current would not fade away, however. Where the Latin tradition was concerned it would, on the contrary, expand in two directions. Until the 13th century the primary task of theology* remained that of commenting on the Scriptures. Authors encountered therein the pairing "justice/mercy," and they would try to define each concept in terms of the other. For example, Bernard* of Clairvaux considered that the tension between them would only be resolved at the end of time: "At the time of the Judgment*, he will exalt mercy more than judgment" (In. Cant. 73, 2, 4). But later, mercy would disappear (Dil. 15, 40), no longer having any purpose. In the Summa Theologica, Thomas* Aquinas would mention mercy as beatitude* (Ia IIae, q. 69) and as virtue (IIa IIae, q. 30). For him it corresponded with the gift of counsel (IIa IIae, q. 52, a. 4).

The relation of justice to mercy is in the background of the debate on predestination* that followed in the wake of Augustine's work. It would thus resurface among the Carolingian theologians, in the Cur Deus homo by Anselm* of Canterbury, and later in the lively controversy that surrounded the Reformation. If Augustinianism* seemed clearly to favor the attribute of justice, it aroused counterreactions. It is no doubt in this perspective that one can interpret the apparition in the 17th century of devotion to the Sacred Heart, which moved rapidly from being a private devotion to one inscribed in the liturgy as a norm. Did it not counterbalance the austerity of the then-dominant Jansenist tendencies?

This last example is proof of a tendency toward "feminization," applied here to the figure of Christ. Certain mystics* went very far in this direction. Julian of Norwich, for example, an English mystic of the 14th/15th century, did not hesitate to speak of "Jesus our mother." But more often it was to the figure of the Virgin Mary* that the attribute of mercy was assigned. In the 12th century the Salve Regina designated Mary as Mater misericordiae, and after Bernard of Clairvaux a host of spiritual authors would develop, at times with a considerable lack of discretion, the evocation of this "mothering" (In Nat. beat. Mar. 7). Indisputably, the theme of mercy raised the issue of the "feminine in God."

Apart from a few isolated examples in magisterial texts (John Paul II's encyclical Dives in misericordia) or in certain spiritual writers (the "Revelation of Merciful Love" to Sister Faustine), it does not seem that the present era has developed this particular theme to any degree. And yet, philosophers and theologians have resolutely reevaluated the notion of forgiveness—perhaps within the context of "crimes against humanity," which in the 20th century have attained a global dimension. Their thoughts and ideas have contributed to a revival—although somewhat reformulated—of the theme of mercy. For example, the principle according to which "there can be no forgiveness without justice" is a direct echo of the most ancient biblical tradition.

- V. Jankélévitch (1957), Le pardon, Paris.
- A. Gouhier (1969), Pour une métaphysique du pardon, Paris.
- W. Haase (1974), "Großmut," HWP 3, 887–900.
- T. Koehler (1980), "Miséricorde," DSp 10, 1313–28 (bibl.).
- S. Breton (1986), "Grâce et pardon," RSPHTh 70, 185–96.
- O. Abel (Ed.), Le pardon, Paris.
- A. Chapelle (1988), Les fondements de l'éthique, Brussels.
- D. Gimaret (1988), Les noms divins en islam—Exégèse lexicographique et théologique, Paris.
- J.-Y. Lacoste (1996), "Pardon," DEPhM 1069–75.

DOMINIQUE CERBELAUD

See also Attributes, Divine; Ethics; Grace; Heart of Christ; Imitation of Christ; Judgment; Life, Spiritual; Love; Penance

Messalianism

a) History. In the second half of the fourth century, starting in Mesopotamia and spreading to Syria and Asia Minor, a movement called Messalianism grew up in monastic circles. The word Messalian, constructed from the Syriac participle of the verb “to pray,” means “one who prays.” The movement soon joined the list of heresies* and was condemned as such. Its first mention dates from about 370, when Ephraim and Epiphanius advised of its presence in Mesopotamia and in Antioch. Ephraim insisted that these “prayers” (those who pray) were guilty of debauchery and/or of agitation and enthusiasm (the Syriac word chosen has two meanings). Epiphanius reproached them for deviating from social norms by their allowing men and women to live together and by refusing to work. He did not, however, accuse them of doctrinal deviation.

After 380, the Messalians suffered official condemnations. The first of these condemnations seems to have been carried during the synod* held in Antioch under Bishop Flavian’s guidance (therefore after 381). Along with Flavian sat not only the clerics* from Syria but also a bishop from Byzantine Armenia and another from Isauria, which seems to indicate that monks suspected of Messalianism were in those regions too. This synod decided to expel the Messalians from Syria and Mesopotamia. A little later, doubtless, another synod held in Side, in Pamphylia, in which Amphilochus of Iconium played the chief role, also condemned them, which perhaps suggests that the exiles had taken refuge in that region. In any event, at the beginning of the fifth century the controversy was centered in Asia Minor. Bishop Atticus of Constantinople (406–25) wrote to the Pamphylian bishops asking them to evict the Messalians. A synod held in Constantinople in 427 under Atticus’s successor, Sisinnius, repeated this request. The following year, a law against heretics mentioned them, also calling them Euchites or Enthusiasts.

In 431 the Council of Ephesus was also apprised of this problem and anathematized the Messalians. It also condemned propositions from a work that it attributed to them, the Asceticon, which was doubtless made up of writings circulated under the pseudonym of Macarius the Great (and which can probably be attributed to Symeon of Mesopotamia, who was active between 380 and 390 and in 430). The Asceticon is a collection of texts in which the work of “Messalian” communities can still be detected today.

b) Doctrine. Heresiologists and synods accused the Messalians of two kinds of errors, doctrinal and moral. Messalian heretical doctrines were said to be: (1) that a demon* has a permanent abode in everyone’s soul*, a demon that baptism* has not proved capable of expelling and that prayer* alone can evict, and (2) prayer summons the Holy* Spirit into the soul and promotes union with the celestial Bridegroom, which gives rise in the perfect ones to freedom from the passions,* to impassiveness. In addition to these doctrinal statements, the Messalians were accused of claiming to acquire inspiration from visions and dreams, of claiming to be prophets*. They were also accused of spurning work*, even work demanded by charity, preferring instead to sleep (during which time they experienced their dreams). Finally, they were accused of despising the sacraments*, the ecclesiastical hierarchy*, and institutions, as being futile for spiritual people, and of perjuring themselves, even of exhibiting sexual license—things of no moment to the perfect ones.

Some accusations about the behavior of the Messalians are doubtless only exaggerations or examples of individual instances. But what is the truth about the doctrines for which they stood reproached? Elements of these doctrines certainly appear in the works of Pseudo-Macarius, but they have been taken out of context and isolated from the overall spiritual vision that these texts offer. A terminological analysis of the Macariana seems to show clearly that the Messalian crisis was inspired by the collision of two different cultural worlds—the world of Syriac-speaking monks and the world of Greek-speaking bishops and theologians. Pseudo-Macarius (who wrote in Greek) had borrowed his central themes from Syriac monasticism as well as from the poetic and symbolic images and phraseology in which were expressed an intensely lived spiritual experience* (metaphors of mixture, of uninhabited regions, and of filling in). The ambiguity of this language, in which the sensory experience of grace* occupies a predominant place, and which has undeniably led on occasion to misinterpretation in Greek-speaking circles, explains the accusations of heresy brought against the Messalians.

In fact, Messalianism was a movement lacking either a leader or precise doctrines. The proper term should be Messalian tendencies. These tendencies continued to appear in monastic circles in the East and even in the Christian West. Egypt was affected by them, and in Carthage there were also “Euchite” monks, against whom Augustine* wrote a volume about the labor proper to monks. All the same, these tendencies show differences that are sometimes deviations. The Pseudo-Macarian works are the first witness to that. In their present state they reveal, through the revisions they have undergone, that they echo discussions in the circles that read them. In any case, their rereading and rectification by orthodox authors, as well as by the author of the De Instituto Christiano (who may have been Gregory* of Nyssa), show their influence, and that influence has continued to make itself felt in Byzantine monasticism.

- H. Dörries, E. Klostermann, M. Kroeger (Ed.), Die 50 geistlichen Homilien des Makarios, PTS 4, 1964. Ps.-Macaire, Œuvres spirituelles I, SC 275.
- ♦ J. Grihomont (1972), “Le dossier des origines du m.,” in Epektasis, Mélanges patristiques offerts au cardinal J. Daniélou, Paris, 611–25.
- H. Dörries (1978), Die Theologie des Makarios-Symeon, Göttingen.
- R. Staats (1982), “Beobachtungen zur Definition und zur Chronologie des Mess.,” JÖBG 32, 235–234.[AuQ3]
- C. Stewart (1991), “Working the Earth of the Heart”: The Messalian Controversy in History, Texts, and Language to AD 431 (bibl.), Oxford.
- A. Guillaumont (1996), “Mess.: Appellations, histoire, doctrine,” “Le témoignage de Babai le Grand sur les mess.,” “Le baptême de feu chez les mess.,” in id., Études sur la spiritualité de l’Orient chrétien, SpOr 66, 243–81.

PIERRE MARAVAL

See also Hesychasm; Monasticism; Orthodoxy; Spiritual Theology

Messianism/Messiah

1. Vocabulary

Today, the term messianism is frequently used to express expectation. In the context of politico-religious movements this expectation often applies to radical, permanent, historical change. This is a derivative exploitation and extension of a word that comes from traditional biblical exegesis*, beginning with the New Testament itself.

The Hebrew word māshîach in the Old Testament, translated in English as “messiah” (and in Greek, Christos, giving the title of “Christ”), rarely or never refers to the eschatological savior. It means “anointed” and designates either the historical king or the high priest (six times) and, in one occurrence, (metaphorically) the Fathers (Ps 105:15). The New Testament confers eschatological value on the word by applying it to Jesus*. Further, it gives a new reading of certain Old Testament texts, granting them prophetic value in light of the event of the message and the person of Jesus. The term messianism is applied to these representations as a whole.

2. Problematic

Generally speaking, modern critical research eschewed this theological apologetics in favor of an approach focused on the meaning of the texts in their original political, economic, and social environment. In so doing, it gradually turned away from the traditional reading to the point of losing interest, at least temporarily, in this field of biblical* theology. We might add that the shift in current language from a personal figure (messiah) to a grouping of rather vague representations (messianism) probably contributed to that disaffection. More recent research is returning to a focus on this field, where numerous questions remain unanswered.

Is the figure of the messiah confused with the royal figure? Does it suit other personages related to “the last days” (eschatology*)? What is the connection between messianic expectation and the hope* of salvation* in general? And what about the sources and mechanism of this expectation, the “eschatological” nature of this hope? If the “eschatological” is confused with the apocalyptic*, then the only messianic text would be Daniel 7:13! And then only if the personage of the “Son of man” is recognized as a personal character, which is widely contested. The broader sense of the term has led to the notion of a “messianism without a messiah,” which is, to say the least, paradoxical. In this sense “messianism” would encompass the eschatological representations of the “God* who is coming” or the “reign of God” (Kingdom* of God). These are genuine difficulties. It remains that Christian theology* has to take into account relations between the Old and New Testaments. Since the church* and Jesus himself referred to the Old Testament, it is fitting to analyze Old Testament texts that refer to a coming Savior, even if they are inchoate. In this perspective we suggest an inventory of texts that might have a relation, be it distant, with the figure of Jesus.

3. Basic Representation: The Figure of the King

The biblical messiah originates in the royal line, in particular that of David, designated as the “anointed of God” (see 1 Sm 16; 2 Sm 5:3). The institution of monarchy is the enduring framework of the complex ensemble of representations known as messianism. Other models later condensed around the royal figure, which remained the reference model. Israel* borrowed the royal institution from its Middle Eastern neighbors; as a result it is charged with an ideology partially shared with different sectors of that cultural area. In the organization of the state (city) as in that of the cosmos, the king played a central role. The royal psalms* broadly reflect that ideology. The king’s mission is to ensure peace* on the borders and, to this end, subdue the nation’s enemies (Ps 2 and 110). He is also the guarantor of order in society* and in the cosmos*. He must ensure shalôm—peace, social harmony (Ps 72:1f., vv. 12–14)—and also the fertility of the fields (Ps 72:6f., v. 16). The king becomes the mediator of blessing* (Ps 21:7).

This foreign ideology, riddled as it was with pagan sacralism (paganism*), was something from which Israel had to distance itself. The solution was to cast off polytheistic references and leave the historical initiative to YHWH. Deuteronomist theology sometimes refers to a specific covenant* with David (and his descendants) (Ps 89:4f., vv. 20–38). However, the solemn dynastic promise* of 2 Sm 7:1–17 that constitutes the charter of monarchy is placed at the very heart of the Sinai covenant, to avoid the dangers of an overcentralized power and safeguard divine transcendence. The king takes responsibility for the covenant and protects its interests (Renaud 1994a), but God remains master of the game. The king is altogether relative to YHWH. This is clearly indicated by the title “anointed of God” (notably in the books of Samuel), which has no equivalent in any other contemporaneous religious system. The effect of that theology was to reinforce the collective dimension of the monarchy. The Davidic king, “son of God” (Ps 2:7, a designation inherited from Middle Eastern royal ideology) embodies Israel, “child of God” (Hos 4:22, 11:1, etc.).

This double current of royal ideology and covenant theology mutually reinforcing each other crystallizes the hope of the people around the figure of David. He becomes an emblematic and paradigmatic figure, as shown in the prophetic oracles of Isaiah 7, 9:1–6, and 11:1–9 and Jer 23:5f. There is no doubt that, save rare exceptions (perhaps Hezekiah, Josiah), none of the historical kings fulfilled the ideal. The monarchy, whether in the north or the south, left memories of leaders unfaithful to their mission. And yet from one royal birth to another, one coronation to the next, hope for fulfillment of the promises was reborn. The gap between painful reality and the awaited realization did not undermine the people’s hope. Far from fading, the promises were constantly reinforced, nourishing hopes for an empire that would place Israel at the center of the world (see Ps 2 and 110). This hyperbolic language was of course descended from the court rhetoric of the great empires, transferred to the petty kings of Palestine. It was also the fruit of hope in an idealized personage who would initiate an era of peace and happiness.

4. Eschatological Messianism

a) Messianism and Eschatology. The ruin of Jerusalem and the temple, the collapse of the royal and priestly institutions that structured the life of the community, and the deportation of the nation’s elite, all these provoked a grave psychological trauma as testified in Psalm 89:39–51 and brought about a profound theological upheaval. Jeremiah declared that the covenant was broken (Jer 31:32). The institutions inherited from the past no longer functioned as sources of salvation. Israel was forced to project itself into the future. The center of gravity shifted from the past to the future, at least in certain theological currents. Jeremiah announced a “new covenant” (Jer 31:31–34). The monarchy had disappeared but not the hope attached to it, and this hope was carried over into the expectation of a coming messiah, a mediator of a stable and permanent salvation. This hope can rightfully be qualified as eschatological, even if the designation is subject to terminological debate. We consider here as “eschatological” all projection into the future, even an indeterminate future, of figures and representations of unsurpassable perfection. Already present in germ in a preexilic messianism that envisaged an ideal historical figure, this eschatological messianism flourished during and after the exile, though the time frame of this advent was not defined. The ideal figure awaited as mediator of salvation was subsequently enriched as a result of various spiritual experiences of the chosen people.

b) Survival of Royal Messianism. From the time of exile and despite the disappearance of the actual institution of the monarchy, the monarch remained an emblematic figure. Preexile prophecies were significantly supplemented (see Am 9:11f.; “and David their king” added in Jer 30:9 and Hos 3:5). The promise during the exile in Micah 5, 1ss refers to 1 Samuel 16, 2 Samuel 7, and Jeremiah 30:21. Envisaging the resumption of the Davidic enterprise at its source, it evokes the shepherd of Bethlehem Ephrathah (Mi 5:1) rather than the warrior king of Jerusalem*. Ezekiel takes up this pastoral figure to make the messianic descendant of David the representative of the divine pastor* and confer on him the mission of unifying the chosen people and healing their ancestral divisions (Ez 34:23f., 37:24f.). By his mediation YHWH will conclude a covenant of peace with his people (Ez 34:25ff., 37:26ff.).

The more sober figure of Solomon was superimposed on this Davidian figure. A psalm book editor entitles Psalm 72 “Solomon,” though it is presented as a “prayer of David” (72:20), and he inserts in its heart the oracular section of vv. 8–11, full of Solomonian reminiscences (1 Kgs 5:1, 5:4, 10:1–13). The very name of Solomon (connected to the root shalôm) and the pacific nature of his reign point toward the central eschatological message of peace. Similarly, the humble messiah in Zec 9:9f., who works for peace because he destroys weapons of war*, seems to designate the new Solomon, riding on a little ass at his royal coronation like his distant ancestor (1 Kgs 1:33–40).

c) Emergence of Prophetic Messianism. It is no surprise that the community in exile, grouped around these vigilant “watchmen” (Ez 3:16f; 33:1–9) Jeremiah, Ezechiel and the second Isaiah, favored an eschatological promotion of the prophetic function and experience in the person of a mysterious Servant. Four poems of the Deutero-Isaiah (42: 1–9; 49:1–9; 50:4–11; 52:13–53, 12) trace his spiritual journey towards a most humiliating death* which nonetheless assumes an expiatory value (expiation*).

d) Traces of Priestly Messianism. With the end of exile and the reconstruction of the temple, the priesthood* regained an eminent position, due in part to the disappearance of the institutions of prophecy and monarchy. The idealization of this priesthood may have contributed to the early outlines of the messianic figure, facilitated by the fact that kings in antiquity had priestly functions. Psalm 110 is a particularly eloquent witness; Jewish and Christian communities would read into it the announcement of a messiah-priest (Heb 5:5, 5:8, 6:20, 7:1–17), though attestations of this dual function are relatively infrequent (texts identified by critics as “new readings” such as Jer 33:14–18 or Is 52:10–12). Furthermore, the name of the high priest Joshua was substituted for Zerubbabel in an oracle (Zec 6:11–15) that originally concerned the latter. And there was a desire to see in the anonymous personage (Is 61:1ff.) a priestly messiah. These details, few and far between, never ascribe to the messianic high priest the brilliance of the Davidic figure. The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs and the Essene writings of Qumran attempt, more or less skillfully, to harmonize these divergent lines and envisage the coming in eschatological times of two messiahs, one a king and the other a priest. The Psalms of Solomon remain faithful to the Davidic (and Solomonian) ideal (Ps Sal 17).

e) Messianic Hope and Expectation of the Coming of the Reign of YHWH. The modern broadened concept of messianism led to envisaging a “messianism without a messiah” that would characterize the hope of the eschatological coming of the reign of God. The concept is not a particularly satisfactory one. However, recent editors of the prophetic books have tried to articulate Davidic messianism and eschatology of the “God who is coming” in an organic synthesis—for example, in the book of Micah 4–5 (Renaud, La formation du livre de Michée, Paris, 1977). The effort is not without artifice and the result quite unsatisfactory. This integration works best in Psalm 2 in its eschatological reading, which tightly subordinates the function of the messiah to the exercise of a divine government in which the king is merely the agent.

5. New Testament

a) Jesus and the Messianic Claim. In the face of Jesus’ miracles*, his contemporaries wondered if he might be the messiah (Jn 4:29, 7:40ff.; Mt 12:23). His disciples did not hesitate to recognize him as such (Jn 1:41, 1:45–49). Peter*, provoked by Jesus, solemnly declares: “You are the Christ” (Mk 8:29). But Jesus holds back, at least until the Passion*. He himself carefully avoids the term and imposes secrecy on those who have identified him—whether they be devils (Lk 4:41) or the Twelve (Mt 16:20)—for popular notions connected with this title were too ambivalent, charged with too much political and military hope, too closely connected to temporal agency. Jesus used the title “Son of Man” (Mk 8:31; Mt 17:9, 17:22, 24:30, 26:2, 26:24, 26:64, etc.). Originally collective (Dn 7), this figure received a properly individual meaning in certain currents of Judaism* contemporaneous with the New Testament. Derived from the apocalyptic* milieu, it was open enough for Jesus to be able to introduce into it the characteristics of the suffering servant* of YHWH (Mk 8:31, 9:12, 10:32ff.) borrowed from Is 53.

However, in an increasingly hostile context, Jesus appropriated this title of messiah shortly before his death and, on Palm Sunday (Mt 21:1–11 and par.) mimicked the oracle of Zechariah 9:9f. Ordered by the high priest to identify himself before the Sanhedrin, Jesus reverted to the title of “Son of Man” (Mt 26:63) instead of “Christ,” adding that he is the one whom “you will see . . . seated at the right hand of Power and coming on the clouds of heaven” (see Ps 110:1). By doing this he restored the original content to the title of messiah, distinguishing it from all deviant popular representations.

b) Primitive Christian Community. In the light of the Resurrection* the primitive church forthwith applied to the risen Jesus the title of Messiah, “Christ” (from the Greek christos), a term that was thereafter free of all ambiguity. Jesus is the true son of David (Mt 1:1; Lk 1:27, 2:4). At Pentecost, Peter declares: “God has made him both Lord and Christ, this Jesus whom you crucified” (Acts 2:36). Moreover, the term loses its appellative quality and becomes a proper noun, a name* that designates the very person of Jesus (“Jesus-Christ”), a name that draws to itself all the other qualifications. Jesus is recognized as the true Messiah because God “anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Spirit and with power” (Acts 10:38, see 4:26f.; Lk 4:16–22; see Is 61:1ff.).

- T. N. D. Mettinger (1976), King and Messiah, Lund.
- J. Becker (1977), Messiaserwartung im Alten Testament, Stuttgart.
- H. Cazelles (1978), Le Messie de la Bible, Tournai-Paris.
- P. Grelot (1978), L'espérance juive à l'heure de Jésus, Paris.
- E. J. Waschke (1988), “Die Frage nach dem Messias im Alten Testament als Problem alttestamentlicher Theologie und biblischer Hermeneutik,” ThLZ 113, 321–32.
- U. Struppe (Ed.) (1989), Studien zum Messiasbild im Alten Testament, Stuttgart.
- H. Srauss, G. Stemberger (1992), “Messias,” TRE 22, 617–29.
- Coll. (1993), Le messie dans l'histoire, Conc. no. 245.
- B. Renaud (1994 a), “La prophétie de Natan: Théologies en conflit,” RB 101, 5–61; (1994 b), “Salomon, figure du Messie,” RevSR 68, 409–26.

BERNARD RENAUD

See also Christ and Christology; City; Eschatology; History; Jesus, Historical; Kingdom of God; Priesthood; Promise; Prophet and Prophecy; Psalms; Scripture, Senses of; Servant of YHWH; Son of Man

Metaphysics. See Being

Methodism

A worldwide Christian communion*, numbering 60 million members and followers in 1995, Methodism arose from the evangelical revival that occurred in England in the 18th century.

1. Origins and Institutional History

The principal founders of Methodism were the two Wesley brothers, John (1703–91) and Charles (1707–88), ministers in the Anglican Church*. Both of them, particularly Charles, opposed the idea of schism*, but the missionary and pastoral structures they put in place made a separation from the Church of England more or less inevitable (Anglicanism*), itself crippled by the demographic consequences of the Industrial Revolution then under way. These structures included the joining together of the converted, or seekers, into “societies,” “classes,” and “bands”; traveling preachers, some of them laypeople*, who met in an annual conference; prayer and preaching meetings, alongside parish worship; the building of chapels; and the establishing of charitable institutions. In fact separation from the Church of England first occurred in America, where in 1784 John Wesley had sent a number of ministers whom he had consecrated. In so doing he was effectively laying claim to the power of administering the sacrament of order (ordination/order*) in the capacity of a presbyter*-bishop: a power that he exercised in the urgent pastoral situation in the newly independent United States—in other words, outside the political jurisdiction* of the Crown and the canonical jurisdiction of the established church.

In the United States the superintendents-general received the title of bishop*, and the Christmas 1784 conference in Baltimore led to the creation of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Methodism spread rapidly, in line with the expansion toward the West. It adapted so well to the conditions of the place and time that it became the epitome of American churches, and it enjoyed a degree of cultural influence at the same time as it lost some of its critical detachment regarding the political and ideological developments in the country. In England Methodism developed more slowly. While it established itself in every region of the country (“I consider the whole world to be my parish,” John Wesley had said, Works, Jackson 1, 201), it remained a minority denomination, attracting mainly artisans, the middle class, and, as time went on, the professional classes. For a long time, by far the most important component of English Methodism (the Wesleyan Methodist Connexion) retained the Anglican form of the liturgy (John Wesley had passed on the principal offices of the Prayer Book with slight adaptations), especially for the celebration of the sacraments*: the Wesleyan movement was characterized from the outset by the revival of Holy Communion as a means of grace*. However, in reaction to the rise of a Roman-influenced Anglo-Catholicism, and also of a more confident “evangelicalism” within the Church of England, Methodism aligned itself more and more with the (other) free churches in Great Britain from the second half of the 19th century, while remaining itself autonomous.

In America as much as in England Methodism underwent internal schisms during the 19th century. In the United States “black” churches were created, of which three main ones are still flourishing: the African Methodist Episcopal (AME), the African Methodist Episcopal Zion (AMEZ), and the Christian Methodist Episcopal (CME). Leaving aside the great division between the American North and South over slavery (for the abolition of which John Wesley had already fought), disagreements between clergy and laity on the question of authority* were the usual cause. During the 20th century Methodism largely reunited: in the United States the Methodist Episcopal Church, the Methodist Episcopal Church South, and the Protestant Methodist Church merged into the Methodist Church (1939), which in turn formed the United Methodist Church (1968) along with some communities of German-speaking origin. Since 1932 the Methodist Church of Great Britain has united the Wesleyan Methodist Church and a number of small communities that appeared during the 19th century. At the present time the United Methodist Church of the United States (8.5 million adult members, and an overall community of between 15 and 20 million people) and the Methodist Church of Great Britain (400,000 adult members, 1.2 million in total) are suffering from the general trend toward secularization*. Methodism is at its most vigorous in Africa and in some countries in Asia and Oceania, where its presence is the result of energetic mission* work in the 19th and early 20th centuries. Methodist churches also exist in central and northern Europe, where they were at first composed mainly of immigrants returning from the United States.

2. John Wesley, Spiritual Founder and Doctrinal Master

In the words of a Catholic theologian, Methodism is indebted to John Wesley “in the same way that, in the Catholic Church, a religious order or a spiritual family derives its spirit from its founder” (Frost 1980). According to a Catholic historian, in the development of Protestantism* Wesley’s Methodism represents a reaction analogous to Lutheran “solafideism” (Piette 1927). How then may one characterize the thought of this man, a handful of whose writings constitute the official doctrinal basis of the great majority of Methodist churches (the first four volumes of his Sermons, his Notes on the New Testament, and, for American Methodism, his abridgement of the Articles of Religion [24 instead of the 39 of Anglicanism] and the General Rules of Methodist Societies)?

a) Catholicity of Sources. By referring to himself as homo unius libri, “the man of a single book,” Wesley indicated his reliance on the Holy* Scriptures as a doctrinal source and criterion (see Article VI of the Thirty-nine Articles). He regarded the ecclesiastical writers, in particular those of the first three centuries, as the “most authentic commentators on the Scriptures, being at the same time the nearest to the source and singularly endowed with the same Spirit by which the whole of Scripture was given” (Works, Jackson 10, 484). While he continued to quote from the most important of the later Fathers*, he had less confidence in the testimonies of the post-Constantinian Church, in view of the moral and practical corruption that had entered it by way of the empire. The Apostles*’ Creed, and that of Nicaea*-Constantinople*, provide the dogmatic* key to Wesley’s hermeneutics*. He was an heir of the Reformation in its English form (Articles, homilies, Prayer Books) and drew on English spiritual writers of the 17th and 18th centuries (Jeremy Taylor, Thomas Ken, Henry Scougal, William Law, Nathaniel Spinckes, Thomas Deacon). He encountered continental Protestantism by way of the pietist Moravian Brethren of Herrnhut, whom he met during his travels in America (1736–38). It was under their influence that he underwent his “evangelical conversion*” (see c below), though he held aloof from their quietist tendencies. On another front, Wesley rejected a number of “errors and superstitions” of Roman Catholicism* (he republished the Anglican bishop John Williams’s A Roman Catechism faithfully drawn out of the writings of the Church of Rome, with a Reply thereto) but included some medieval spiritual writers (The Imitation of Christ) and even some more recent ones (Pascal*, Fénelon, Madame Guyon, John of Ávila, Gregory Lopez, Molinos) in the “Christian Library” (1749–56) in 50 volumes that he produced for his ever more educated preachers and laypeople (Orcibal 1951).

b) Doctrinal Orthodoxy. Faced with the deism* and neo-Arianism* of some intellectual and even ecclesiastical circles of his time, Wesley held firm to the “Triune God” and his work of redemption. Rejecting excessive speculation on the mystery* of God*’s inner life, he affirmed the death* and the merits of the incarnate Christ* and the free action of the Holy Spirit as indispensable for leading the faithful to the Father by way of the Son (Sermon 55, On the Trinity), in expectation of the day when “there will be a deep, intimate and uninterrupted union with God; a constant communion with the Father and his Son Jesus Christ, through the Spirit; a continual rejoicing of the Three-One God, and of all creatures in him” (Sermon 64, The New Creation). Amid the prevailing latitudinarianism, Wesley insisted on the “essential doctrines,” while tolerating (no more) “those opinions which do not undermine the very root of Christianity” (Works, Jackson 8, 340).

c) Anthropological and Soteriological Focus. The optimism of grace*—a phrase E. G. Rupp uses concerning Wesley—occupies the middle ground between Calvinist pessimism and the Pelagianism* of which the Lutherans suspected the father of Methodism. Wesley himself said that “our principal doctrines are three in number: repentance, faith*, and sanctity,” adding that they resembled “the porch of religion, its door, and religion itself” (Works, Jackson 8, 472). A modern English Methodist formula has summarized Wesley’s position under four headings:

- 1) Everyone needs redemption. Wesley’s most extensive theological treatise is devoted to original sin* (Works, Jackson 9, 196–464). The purpose of redemption is to restore human beings to the image of God, understood in a christological sense.
- 2) Everyone may be saved. In opposition to the doctrine of predestination, Wesley affirmed God’s desire that all might receive that salvation (1 Tm 2:5) for which Christ had paid the price. By virtue of Christ’s redemptive work, every person enjoyed “prevenient grace,” enabling each to respond freely in faith to the offer of the Gospel. The initial justification* was received by faith alone.
- 3) Everyone may know himself to be saved. Wesley describes his “evangelical conversion” (Works, Jackson 1, 103) in the following terms: “In the evening [of 24 May 1738], against my better judgement, I went to Aldersgate Street where a religious society was meeting. Luther*’s preface to the Epistle to the Romans was being read. At around a quarter to nine, whilst he was describing the change which God works in the heart by faith in Christ, I felt my heart strangely warmed. I felt that I had confidence in Christ, in Christ alone, for my salvation; and I was given an assurance that he had taken away my sins, yes mine, and that he had saved me, me, from the law of sin and death.” This classic text of Methodist spirituality mentions “assurance,” “a regular privilege of the faithful,” which is manifested as an expression of the Spirit of adoption (Rom 8:15). Against the doctrine of absolute perseverance, however, Wesley teaches that God’s promises* are valid (only) insofar as they are freely welcomed by faith.
- 4) Everyone may be saved fully (“to the uttermost”). Against the doctrine of simul iustus et peccator in the Lutheran sense of a permanent paradox, Wesley preached that sanctification was a real transformation that could lead from this world (in contradiction of Calvin*’s doctrine) to perfection. Without excluding the ignorance, weaknesses, and errors that still resulted from the Fall, this perfection consisted in a faultless love* of God and one’s neighbor. While good works* alone did not merit salvation*, the believer would not be finally justified without these fruits of faith (2 Cor 5:10). (This is the social significance of sanctification as conceived by Wesley, which would inspire the involvement of English Methodists in trade unions, or that of American Methodists in the campaign for prohibition.)

d) Ecumenical Openness. Without playing down Wesley's criticisms of certain Catholic doctrines and practices, the pacific tone of his Letter to a Roman Catholic, written in Dublin in 1749 (Works, Jackson 10, 80–86), must be emphasized. Calling on the one Creator and Redeemer of all mankind, he sets out in particular the faith shared by Protestants and Catholics (by way of a discussion of the Creed of Nicaea and Constantinople), as well as their common spiritual and moral aspirations. On this basis he calls for mutual charity, prayer, and assistance in all matters that “lead to the Kingdom* of God.” In his Sermon 39 of 1750, entitled Catholic Spirit (Works, Jackson 5, 492–504), Wesley extends a hand to all those who, in terms of doctrine, worship, and morals, affirm at least “the first elements of Christ's Gospel” according to the Scriptures and offers them “unity in affection” even if “an entire external union” is prevented by differences of opinion, liturgical forms, or government*. (According to Wesley, the one “purpose of any ecclesiastical order” is to “lead souls* from Satan to God and to teach them to fear* and love him”; Works, Jackson 12, 80 Sq.)

e) A Sung Faith. Charles Wesley is the principal poet of Methodism, whereas John acted mainly as critic and publisher, although he did produce excellent translations of 30 or so German hymns. Together the two brothers provided Methodism, and to a lesser extent all English-speaking churches, with a huge wealth of hymns, rich in meaning, which mark the major feasts of the year, embellish the celebration of the Eucharist (the collection of 166 Hymns on the Lord's Supper, 1745), and above all trace the way of the experience* of faith (A Collection of Hymns for the Use of the People Called Methodists, 1780).

3. Denominational Aspect of Methodism

Methodists do not like to consider themselves a “denomination” in the Lutheran or Reformed sense of the term. A. C. Outler (1991) describes them rather as an “abortive church,” an “evangelical order” in search of a “catholic environment.” The institutional realities do not permit an unqualified acceptance of this description—it must be acknowledged that there exist two ways of viewing Methodism and of putting it into practice in the context of a disunited Christendom.

a) American Trend. Considering its independent constitution and its rapid expansion, Methodism in the United States quickly acquired the character of a church (church as confessional denomination), indeed of a multitudinist church in which freedom* of opinion favored theological (as well as liturgical) pluralism. In the cultural milieu of America this led to a reversal of Wesley's emphases: “from revelation* to reason*,” “from the sinful man to the moral man,” and “from free grace to free will” (Chiles 1965). Inasmuch as during the years 1970–90 the existence of a “Wesleyan quadrilateral” of sources or criteria for theology* was put forward, the progressives highlighted the epistemological importance of reason and above all of experience (sociopolitical and individual), while the orthodox camp emphasized the substance of the Scriptures and tradition*. As far as ecumenical strategy is concerned, the American approach has consisted in upholding a “reconciled diversity,” permitting the survival of denominations in a coexistence that is marked by cooperation, but also perhaps by healthy competition on the capitalist model.

b) English Tendency. As a minority denomination English Methodism has so far retained a more strictly Wesleyan identity, due above all, on the popular level, to its attachment to Wesley's hymns, and on the intellectual level to the devotion of its theologians to traditional biblical, historical, and theological disciplines. On the ecumenical front, successive generations of Methodist theologians have contributed to the “Faith and Order” movement, and Methodist churches of the English type have participated in the founding of churches* that have come together organically in various countries or regions (Southern India, 1947; Northern India, 1971; Australia, 1977). In 1969 and 1972 the conference of the Methodist Church of Great Britain approved a plan to reunite with the Church of England, though this came to nothing.

c) Bilateral Dialogues. Thanks to the World Methodist Council, comprising 70 member churches, Methodism has pursued, and continues to pursue, bilateral dialogues with the Catholic Church (since 1967: see in particular The Apostolic Tradition of 1991 and The Word of Life: On Revelation and Faith of 1996), the Lutheran World Federation (The Church, Community of Grace, 1984), the World Alliance of Reformed Churches (Together in the Grace of God, 1987), the Anglican Communion (Sharing the Apostolic Communion, 1996), and the Orthodox churches

Methodism

(a document is in preparation under the direction of the Ecumenical Patriarchate*).

- The Works of John Wesley, Ed. T. Jackson, 14 vols., 3rd Ed., London, 1872.
- The Works of John Wesley: Bicentennial Edition*, critical edition, 35 vols., Nashville, 1975.
- The Poetical Works of John and Charles Wesley*, Ed. G. Osborn, 13 vols., London, 1868–72.
- John Wesley*, Ed. A. C. Outler, New York, 1964 (anthology).
- Charles Wesley: A Reader*, Ed. J. R. Tyson, New York, 1989 (anthology).
- ♦ M. Piette (1927), La réaction de John Wesley dans l'évolution du protestantisme, Brussels.
- G. C. Cell (1935), The Rediscovery of John Wesley, New York.
- J. E. Rattenbury (1938), The Conversion of the Wesleys, London.
- J. E. Rattenbury (1948), The Eucharistic Hymns of John and Charles Wesley, London.
- J. Orcibal (1951), "Les spirituels français et espagnols chez John Wesley et ses contemporains," RHR 139, 50–109.
- J. Bowmer (1951), The Sacrament of the Lord's Supper in Early Methodism, London.
- M. Schmidt (1953–66), John Wesley, 2 vols., Zürich-Frankfurt.
- J. Orcibal (1959), "L'originalité théologique de John Wesley et les spiritualités du continent," RH 222, 51–80.
- C. W. Williams (1960), John Wesley's Theology Today, Nashville.
- F. Baker (1962), Representative Verse of Charles Wesley, London.
- R. E. Chiles (1965), Theological Transition in American Methodism, 1790–1935, Nashville.
- R. E. Davies, A. R. George, E. G. Rupp (Ed.) (1965–1988), A History of the Methodist Church in Great Britain, 4 vols., London.
- F. Baker (1970), John Wesley and the Church of England, London.
- J. Weissbach (1970), Der neue Mensch im theologischen Denken John Wesleys, Stuttgart.
- C.-J. Bertrand (1971), Le méthodisme, Paris.
- O. E. Borgen (1972), John Wesley on the Sacraments, Zürich.
- C.-J. Bertrand (1974), "Le méthodisme, 'province' méconnue de la communion anglicane?" in Aspects de l'anglicanisme: Colloque de Strasbourg, 14–16 juin 1972, Strasbourg.

- F. A. Norwood (1974), The Story of American Methodism, Nashville.
- F. Frost (1980), "Méthodisme," Cath 9, 48–71.
- T. A. Langford (1983), Practical Divinity Theology in the Wesleyan Tradition, Nashville.
- G. Wainwright (1983), "Methodism's ecclesial location and ecumenical vocation," OiC 19, 104–34 (repr. in id., The Ecumenical Moment, Grand Rapids, Mich., 1983, 189–221).
- J. M. Turner (1985), Conflict and Reconciliation: Studies in Methodism and Ecumenism in England, 1740–1982, London.
- A. Coppedge (1987), John Wesley in Theological Debate, Wilmore, Ky.
- H. D. Rack (1989), Reasonable Enthusiast: John Wesley and the Rise of Methodism, London.
- R. L. Maddox (1990), "John Wesley and Eastern Orthodoxy," AsbTJ 45, 29–53.
- T. A. Campbell (1990–91), "The 'Wesleyan Quadrilateral': The Story of a Modern Methodist Myth," MethH 29, 87–95.
- T. A. Campbell (1991), John Wesley and Christian Antiquity, Nashville.
- A. C. Outler (1991), The Wesleyan Theological Heritage, Grand Rapids.
- W. Klaiber and M. Marquardt (1993), Gelebte Gnade: Grundriss einer Theologie der Evangelisch-methodistischen Kirche, Stuttgart.
- R. L. Maddox (1994), Responsible Grace: John Wesley's Practical Theology, Nashville.
- R. P. Heitzenrater (1995), Wesley and the People Called Methodists, Nashville.
- S. J. Jones (1995), John Wesley's Conception and Use of Scripture, Nashville.
- G. Wainwright (1995), Methodists in Dialogue, Nashville.
- K. B. Westerfield Tucker (Ed.) (1996), The Sunday Service of the Methodists, Nashville.

GEOFFREY WAINWRIGHT

See also Anglicanism; Calvin, John; Calvinism; Ecumenism; Family, Confessional; Luther, Martin; Lutheranism; Pietism; Puritanism; Quietism

Methodist Churches. See Methodism

Millenarianism

a) Origins. In the strict sense of the term, millenarianism designates the belief in the Christian tradition according to which Christ* will return to earth with the just who have risen to reign in glory for 1,000 years. Universal resurrection* and judgment* will follow this thousand-year period, and then the end of the world will come, and the establishment of the reign of God*. This belief is based on a literal interpretation of Revelation 20:1–6.

In actual fact, the passage from Revelation is no more than a Christianized adaptation of a theme already present in Jewish apocalyptic* literature. Since the second century B.C. this literature had tended to speculate on duration, with a view to establishing the date of the coming of the Messiah*, as can be seen in the books of Daniel, Enoch, and Jubilees. In rabbinic debates, varying time spans were attributed to the reign of the Messiah. These ranged from 40 years, according to Rabbi Aqiba, to 1,000 years, according to Rabbi Eliezer ben Yose (see, in particular, Pesiqta Rabbati 1, 7; Midrash Tanhuma, section 'Egev, 7b; and Midrash Tehillim 90, §17; see also 4 Esdras 7:28, which mentions 400 years). The appearance of the millennium was most frequently based on Psalm 90:4: "For a thousand years in your sight are but as yesterday when it is past, or as a watch in the night." It would seem that the author of Revelation himself subscribed to this exegesis*.

Quite obviously, it is essentially through the Book of Revelation that the millenarian idea became widespread among Christian authors of the 2nd century A.D. One must emphasize that—with the notable exception of the Gnostic current—it was adopted by all the other Christian tendencies from the most orthodox to the most dissident (provided such a distinction had any relevance in the second century). However, it would seem that the birthplace of this idea can be situated in Asia Minor. It was, in fact, from this region, in the early second century, that Cerinthus (Eusebius, HE III, 28, 2) and Papias (HE III, 39, 12) were born. If we are to believe Irenaeus*, Papias transmitted details said to originate with the Lord about the 1,000-year reign, details that had considerable similarities with other elements of Jewish apocalyptic literature (compare Irenaeus's Adv. Haer. V, 33, 3 with 1 Enoch 10:19, 2 Baruch 29:5, etc.). Montanus also hailed from Asia Minor; he was the initiator in 172 A.D. of the "new prophecy," which bears his name—Montanism—but, in fact, Montanism is not characterized by any particular emphasis on millenarianism. In the Epistle of Barnabas 15:3–5, however, one can find the equivalence between one day and "1,000 years") and, above all, Justin, in his Dialogue with Trypho 80:4, mentioned this theme as a normal element of Christian belief. Justin writes: "For me, and for Christians of integral orthodoxy, for as long as they may be, it is clear that a resurrection of the flesh will occur for 1,000 years in a rebuilt, decorated, and expanded Jerusalem*, as has been affirmed by the prophets Ezekiel, Isaiah, and others."

In Dialogue with Trypho 81:3, Justin also refers to the equivalence between "one day" and "a thousand years," and in 81:4, he mentions the Book of Revelation.

b) Developments and Debate up to the Time of Augustine. While the second century represented the golden age of Christian millenarianism, later periods would gradually abandon this consensus. To be sure, the millenarian idea was still quite widely held until the fifth century. In the note he devoted to Papias (De viris illustribus 18), Jerome referred, in this regard, to Apollinaris, Tertullian*, Victorinus, and Lactantius. And at the beginning of Book 18 of his commentary on Isaiah, he added Irenaeus to the list. Irenaeus had, in fact, adopted the teachings of Justin on that point for his own use (Adv. Haer. V, 28, 3; 36, 3). In Tertullian's opinion, Jerome was referring to a lost work, De spe fidelium, which Tertullian himself mentioned in support of his millenarianism (Adv. Marc. III, 24, 3–6). The case of Apollinaris of Laodicea seems more difficult to evaluate. Basil*, in fact, reproached him with having judaizing tendencies, which were not necessarily millenarian (Ep. 263, 4; 265, 2). Finally, while Jerome did, advisedly, refer to Victorinus of Pettau (Scolia on Apocalypse. 20) and Lactantius (Inst. div. VII, 22.24), he could have added Commodianus (Instructiones I, XLV, 9) and Methodius of Olympus (Banquet IX, 5) to his list. On the other hand, as the De viris illustribus dated from 393, Jerome could not include a certain Hilarion, whose treatise dates from 397 (De mundi duratione 18), nor could he refer to Gaudentius of Brescia, who was still millenarianist at the beginning of the fifth century (Sermon 10).

Alongside this first group of authors were others who were beginning to challenge the millenarian model, and it seems most likely that their protests were an integral part of the debate on the canonicity of the Book of Revelation. Eusebius of Caesarea mentioned the debate in writing about Dionysius of Alexandria (HE III, 28, 1–5; VII, 25, 1–8), as did Dionysius Barsalibi (a Syrian Monophysite from the 12th century) in writing about Hippolytus of Rome (In Ap. Intr.).

As for Origen*, he overcame the difficulty by developing a decidedly allegorical reading of Revelation, thus avoiding any expressions of doubt over the literal meaning (De princ. II, 11, 2–3; Com. Mat. XVII, 35; Com. Ct., prol.). Following Origen's example, Augustine* would understand the 1,000 years of the reign of Christ as referring to the time of the church* (Civ. Dei XX, 7), while admitting that he himself had been drawn to millenarianism (see Sermon 259, 2). One might say that millenarianism began to fade during the fifth century. From that time on the church would consciously settle into duration.

- H. Leclercq (1933), "MI.," DACL 11/1, 1181–95.
- L. Gry (1934), Le millénarisme dans ses origines et son développement, Paris.
- W. Nigg (1954), Das ewige Reich: Geschichte einer Hoffnung, Zürich-Stuttgart (2nd Ed. 1967).
- J. Daniélou (1958), Théologie du judéo-christianisme, Tournai-Paris (2nd Ed. 1991).
- B. E. Daley (1991), The Hope of the Early Church: A Handbook of Patristic Eschatology, Cambridge.
- S. Heid (1993), Chiliasmus und Antichrist-Mythos: Eine frühchristliche Kontroverse um das Heilige Land, coll. Hereditas 6, Bonn.
- C. Nardi (Ed.) (1995), Il Millenarismo: Testi dei secoli I–II, Rome.

DOMINIQUE CERBELAUD

See also Apocrypha; Apollinarianism; Apologists; Eschatology; Judeo-Christianity; Montanism

Ministry

A. Biblical Theology

a) Nature of the Problem and Principal Questions. In the beginning Jesus* addressed to the first disciples a call and a duty of service (Mt 4:21). But at what point did the disciples become ministers and their service a ministry? Was it with the institution of the Twelve; was it in the Galilean period or in the Judean period (which includes the Last Supper); was it with the appearances of the Risen One, or with the appointment of Matthias (Acts)? The mention of the "hundred and twenty" (Acts 1:15) suggests the community has a collegial role. In the Gospels* the vocabulary of ministries varies. For example, Matthew 9 and 10 use "disciples," "the Twelve," and "twelve apostles*."

The variety of titles denotes an evolution, between Jerusalem* and Rome*, starting from a specifically apostolic ministry and moving toward an "ecclesial" (E) ministry and more institutional forms: 1) in Jerusalem, the Twelve (who are "Hebrews"), the seven ("Hellenists": E), then come prophets, "elders" (presbuteroi: E), teachers (rabbi); 2) in Caesarea, an evangelist (Philip): his daughters prophesy; in Joppa, the widows (Tabitha); 3) in Antioch, a pastoral triad in hierarchical form: apostle + prophet (E) + teacher (E); 4) in Ephesus, an evangelist (Timothy), the episcopi (E) (Acts); 5) in Corinth, the same triad as in Antioch; diakonos emerges (Romans, 1 and 2 Corinthians); proïstamenos, "president" (see Romans); 6) in Rome, hègoumenos "leader" (Hebrews).

The evolution and stabilization of ministries is explained by: 1) the situation of the Church* of Jerusalem from Pentecost to the Jewish War; 2) the growth of the church (from 60,000 c. 60 A.D. to 240,000 c. 80 A.D., a quarter of them in the province of Asia); 3) the disappearance of the apostles and of traveling ministers; and 4) the role of the Church of Rome, which replaced that of Jerusalem. A close analysis reveals several developments. The term "presbyter*" was gradually extended to all the communities. In Ephesus, episcopus, a term derived from civil administration, gradually achieved dominance (the function was conferred by a laying* on of hands according to 1 Tm 4:14, 5:22; 2 Tm 1:6; see Acts 6:6 for deacons*).

With nuances and variations, we can note the contrasts: charism vs. institution; traveling vs. localization with universality; and temporary vs. permanent ministries.

b) Before Easter. The mention of Judas as “one of the Twelve” argues for a pre-Easter origin of the Twelve. In Matthew, 11 times; Mark, 14 times; Luke, 13 times; John, 12 times; Acts, two times; they are called disciples and then apostles (12 men plus three priests; differing from the version of Qumran). The closeness of the Twelve to Jesus even before Easter is the prototype of the relationship of Jesus to the people* of God. Their being sent on a mission* had a universal apostolic meaning; Jesus acts through his apostles and hence through the whole Church. “Eleven” (Matthew; Acts), used after the defection of Judas, confirms the existence of the Twelve. The term “Twelve” is ancient, and that of apostle is posterior to it.

The ministry of the Twelve differs from the Jewish priesthood*: it is not hereditary, and there are no degrees of purity*, no canonical age, and no judgment of their colleagues (Mt 7:1–5). Seven logia attribute to Jesus the rejection of the institution of a hierarchy between them—, for example, Mark 9:35: “if anyone would be first, he must be last of all and servant of all.” According to these logia the community gathered around Jesus is not to possess a structure of power analogous to that of the surrounding society (whether civil, priestly, or that of Qumran).

What role was played by the trio of Peter*, James, and John? The personal role of Peter, who received the first appearance of the Risen One (Lk 24:34), is already attested in Paul (1 Cor 15:5). The primacy claimed by James and John shows the absence of a hierarchy by rights (Mk 10:35–45) or of a mebaqqér (supervisor) of the Qumran type.

c) Jewish and Christian Church of Jerusalem (Acts 1–7): Hierarchy and/or Collegiality? With a dual allegiance, the apostles frequented the temple daily, and many priests serving in it became followers of Jesus. The integration of Matthias into the now institutional apostleship of the Twelve serves to bring out the bond with the Risen One, the initiative of Peter, the collegiality* of the group, the action of the Holy* Spirit, and recognition by the one hundred and twenty. According to Acts, Peter and John jointly exercise a special authority*. Various collegial authorities may be distinguished: diarchic (Peter and John), oligarchic (the “Twelve,” the seven, the elders), democratic (the community: the hundred and twenty). The Judeo-Christian Hebrews practice communal ownership. The Greeks, without this type of economic organization, are more open to female participation in ministries (Acts 21:9).

d) In Corinth. Paul moved from the Semitic world to the Hellenistic (all the provinces of Anatolia), Greek, and Roman worlds. Paul had 162 collaborators (among them 60 women). Their classification is beyond the scope of the present article.

The influence of the surrounding society is clear in Corinth. Small religious groups, Christian thiases, sprang up spontaneously, each a leader at its head: Paul, Apollos, Cephas, Christ (1 Cor 1:12). They emphasized personal performance; Paul rejected their ministerial fluidity.

In place of the triad of Corinthian ministries—prophecy in the Greek manner, speaking in tongues, Greek wisdom*—Paul instituted the three pastoral ministries of the apostolic triad: apostle, prophet, teacher (1 Cor 12:28). He knew the value of this, for he was himself apostle, prophet, and teacher.

To designate the ministries (G. Friedrich), Paul does not use the vocabulary current in the Greek world. Eight terms are excluded: timè, duty; doxa, dignity; telos, power of decision; arkhè, power; bathmos, rank; topos, position; taxis, assigned place; and finally leitourgia in the sense of priestly office (but see 2 Cor 9:12, and the verbal form in Rom 15:27). Hence, the ministry is neither a position of honor nor a post of authority, nor an institution with several grades, nor a priestly organization. In addition, Paul never uses the word “elder” (presbuteros), common in the Church of Jerusalem and in the synagogues.

Paul retains five words for the ecclesial ministry: 1) oikonomia, “administration” or “management,” designates duty; 2) exousia, “power conferred for the building up of the community”; 3) kharis, “grace*,” designates Paul’s own apostleship, entrusted to a sinner; 4) kharisma, “gift for a service with a view to the common good,” is almost unknown in the Old Testament and in the speech of the time; eliminates pneumatikon, related to inspiration; 5) diakonia, which Paul adopts in Corinth, designates service in the broadest sense and not a precise ministry: “gift of service” in Romans 12; “ministry of the apostle” in 2 Corinthians and Romans. The word may be qualified: “of the spirit”; “of justice*”; “of reconciliation” (2 Cor). In Romans 12 diakonia is associated with the gifts of teaching (didaskalia), of exhorting (paraklèsis), of presiding (proïstamentos), and of exercising mercy (eleôn). The distinction between temporary gifts and instituted permanent ministries has already emerged.

e) Marriage, Widowhood, or Celibacy of the Minister. Just one passage speaks of celibacy (Mt 19:12), and this not in relation to ministry. Only Luke mentions giving up a wife to follow Jesus (Lk 14:26, 18:29). The call of Jesus involves giving up one's home, one's livelihood, and one's possessions: "leaving all" (Lk 5:11, 5:28, 18:22). At the time of their call nothing is said of the possible separation of the disciples from their wives. Peter is married (Mk 1:30: his mother-in-law), and the other disciples may also have been. According to 1 Corinthians 9:5 all the first apostles except Paul "take along a believing wife." Barnabas the Levite must be or must have been married.

Paul arrives in Corinth without a wife and makes of his situation "outside marriage*" a gift of God (1 Cor 7:7ff.). He does not count himself among the celibates, or "virgins" (1 Cor 7:25), but among those outside marriage, agamoi (1 Cor 7:8, and vv. 11, 32, 34), having been married, but married no longer. Is he a widower? The fact that he cites his example next to that of widows might suggest as much. If his wife had abandoned him after his conversion* to Christ*, the "Pauline privilege" (1 Cor 7:12ff.) would be the application to others of his personal case. Without a wife, Paul is more available and can live on little. If Barnabas is also a widower, the two apostles are in the same situation.

f) Minister's Means of Existence. Only those of Paul are known to us. He is a maker of heavy cloth (sails, tents, and the like), of the same craft as Priscilla and Aquila (Acts 18:3). In Miletus he reminds the elders of the Church of Ephesus of his refusal to be a burden, of his unselfishness (Acts 20:33ff.; see 1 Thes 2:9). In 1 Corinthians 9:1–18 Paul explains why he does not apply to himself the rule that comes from the Lord: "The Lord commanded that those who proclaim the gospel should get their living by the gospel" (9:14; see Mt 10:10; Lk 10:7), although he has the right to do so (1 Cor 9:6, 12).

From 1 and 2 Corinthians, Galatians, Romans, and Philippians, it emerges that: 1) the minister has the right to be provided for where he proclaims the gospel; 2) he may also receive subsidies from a church other than the one in which he is working (Phil 4:10–20); 3) he may refuse any "salary"; 4) the respective situations of Silvanus, Timothy, and Titus are not known in detail (2 Cor 1:16ff.). Manual labor, normal for a Jew, was not normal for a free Greek man. And by refusing any salary, Paul risked the exercise of a ministry that was not recognized (see Simon Magus against Peter in Acts 8:18–24).

g) Participation of Women in the Ministry. Does the rule of equality of Galatians 3:28 apply to the ministry? In 1 Corinthians 7, Paul mentions marriage, celibacy, separation, or widowhood, without alluding to ministry, for ministry does not depend on any of them (the celibacy envisaged in verses 25–35 does not apply to ministry). Greek society in Corinth was more favorable to a ministry of women (unmarried?) than Palestinian society. But the pagan context (priestesses, bacchantes) made the church attentive to 1) dress at worship (1 Cor 11:5); 2) restrictions already applicable to men; and 3) ecstatic experiences (1 Cor 14:34f.). The case of the couple of Priscilla and Aquila (1 Cor 16:19 ...) does not make it possible to determine whether there is a ministry for a married woman whose husband has no ministry. 1 Timothy 5 articulates the conditions for the ministry of widows (60 years old, married only once, enrolled in the church). We do not know whether Lydia (Acts) and Phoebe (Romans) were widows.

- B. Reicke (1954), "Die Verfassung der Urgemeinde im Licht jüdischer Dokumente," ThZ 10, 95–112 (English trans. in The Scrolls and the New Testament, Ed. K. Stendahl, New York, 1957, 143–56).
- L. Cerfaux (1956), La communauté apostolique, 3rd Ed., Paris.
- J. Jeremias (1957), "Presbyterion ausserchristlich bezeugt," ZNW 48, 127–32.
- N. Brox (1961), Zeuge und Martyrer: Untersuchungen zur frühchristlichen Zeugnis-Terminologie, Munich.
- J. Roloff (1965), Apostolat-Verkündigung-Kirche: Ursprung, Inhalt und Funktion des kirchlichen Apostelamtes nach Paulus, Lukas und Pastoralbriefen, Gütersloh.
- P. Schubert (1968), "The Final Speeches in the Book of Acts," JBL 87, 1–16.
- A. Lemaire (1971), Les ministères aux origines de l'Église: Naissance de la triple hiérarchie: évêques, presbytres, diacres, Paris.
- H. Merklein (1973), Das kirchliche Amt nach dem Epheserbrief, StANT 33.
- J. Dupont (1974), Les ministères de l'Église naissante d'après les "Actes des apôtres," StAns 61.
- J. Delorme (Ed.) (1974), Le ministère et les ministères selon le Nouveau Testament, Paris.
- K. Kertelge et al. (1977), Das kirchliche Amt im NT, Darmstadt.
- M. Carrez (1980), "Les incidences des conjonctures historiques et géographiques sur la naissance et l'évolution des ministères," Bulletin de Saint-Sulpice 6, 29–55.

MAURICE CARREZ

See also Apostle; Authority; Bishop; Church; Deacon; Deaconesses; Government, Church; Hierarchy; Presbyter/Priest; Priesthood; Structures, Ecclesial; Woman

B. Historical and Systematic Theology

1. Ministry: Singular or Plural?

The New Testament offers the picture of a plurality of ministries that, with adjustments, was to persist through the first five centuries and even into the 13th, in spite of a strong tendency to emphasize the clerical and the priestly. From that time on, the ordained ministry was concentrated in the figure of the priest*, the diaconate having become a temporary order*, and the title of bishop a dignity associated with powers superior to those of priests; and if there were other ministries, they participated in or supplemented those mentioned. In Reformation churches we observe the same concentration on the ministry—which became the only one—of the pastor*; references to universal priesthood did not recover their pertinence until the revolutions of 1848. With doctrinal nuances, and at different rates, the contemporary period in both Catholicism* and Protestantism* has been characterized by a rediscovery of New Testament ecclesiology*: the people* of God (N.A. Dahl, Das Volk Gottes, Oslo, 1941); Christian fraternity (J. Ratzinger, DSp 5, 1141–67); the priesthood of the faithful (P. Dabin, Le sacerdoce royal des fidèles dans les livres saints, 1941; Le sacerdoce royal dans la tradition ancienne et moderne, 1950); the diversity of gifts and the laity* (Y. Congar, Jalons pour une théologie du laïc, 1953; H. Krämer, Theology of the Laity); coresponsibility. These rediscoveries (also associated with egalitarian and functionalist impulses) have enriched the search for a rearticulation of the specific ministry of pastors with the plurality of other services and ministries.

2. Ministry and Service

a) Concepts. In the church* no one is exempt from serving. Every ministry must be a service if it is not to be distorted. But is all Christian service ministerial? Theology* written in German, which distinguishes Amt (ordained ministry) from Dienst (service), has more difficulty with this assertion than theology written in Romance languages or in English, where the term “ministry” is generic (ordained or not).

By entitling a report “All responsible for the Church? The presbyteral ministry in an entirely ministerial Church,” the plenary Assembly of the Bishops of France (1973) wished to articulate the responsibility of all in the diversity of their ministries, while not however making the presbyteral ministry a simple service with no basis other than empirical necessity for the church to distribute the services necessary for its life. Indeed, being assigned a role in the church, even when ordination is associated with a choice, does not derive solely from the service rendered by the one who agrees to preside, but expresses structurally and symbolically (in an order that is not that of simple utility) the fact that the word and the sacraments* do not come to us from ourselves.

b) Practice. Since the 1970s, ministries without ordination have proliferated. Very few lectors or acolytes have been commissioned, a path open to men alone by Ministeria Quaedam in 1973. On the other hand, many Christian men and women are catechists, liturgical leaders, leaders of youth groups, and hospital and prison chaplains. Further, in a situation of a dearth of priests, and in virtue of the Code of Canon Law, can. 517, §2, bishops* also entrust a “participation in the exercise of the pastoral duties of a parish to a deacon*, another person who is not a priest, or a community of people.” Final responsibility, in this case, lies of course with a “regulating priest, invested with the powers of a priest.” But one might ask whether the ecclesologically important distinction between ordained and nonordained ministry can thereby be preserved, especially in the long term. There are questions along these lines in Christifideles laïci of John Paul II (1989), no. 23; B. Sesboué, N'ayez pas peur (1996).

3. Ministry and Representation of Christ

According to the Reformation, the ministry instituted by God is assigned a certain role in the church: with the gospel that it preaches and the sacraments that it celebrates, it is a means of giving the gift of the Holy Spirit and faith* (CA 5). Protestantism, on the other hand, is classically opposed to a certain number of formulations, frequent in Catholic literature without actually having become dogma, that seem to obscure the uniqueness of the ministry of Christ*.

The priest is thus not a mediator between God and man, in the sense in which Christ is a mediator, and he adds nothing to the mediation of Christ. He can be a mediator only in an instrumental sense, in the acts of his ministry, as Calvin, echoing CA 5, says in the Institution: “God does his work through them, just as a worker uses a tool” (IV. 3. 1). The expression alter Christus has the same meaning but is used no more than mediator by Vatican II because it leads to confusion. As for the formula in persona Christi (nine uses in Vatican II), it denotes the attribution to Christ of certain acts accomplished by the priest in accordance with his ministry, and these acts must in addition be situated in the context of the invocation of the Holy Spirit (epiclesis*). But taken the wrong way, this formula might seem to favor a certain isolation of the action of priests from the action of the church, and suggest that there might be priests who are priests in and for themselves, and who are, moreover, situated above the church. Indeed, the link between ministry and church poses several problems.

4. Articulation between the Ministry and the Church

Vatican II's ecclesiology of communion* ("central and fundamental concept of the council documents," according to the final report of the extraordinary synod* of 1985) might simultaneously require and facilitate a better link between ordained ministries and the church.

a) "Absolute Ordinations." A certain number of bishops are legitimately ordained without being assigned to a church (can. 376). For Protestant theology an apostolic* succession thus detached from local churches is too individualized or too abstractly collegial to be credible. An analogous question arises with respect to priests, for whom installation in a diocese is only one possibility among others (can. 266). Almost unknown in Orthodoxy*, these practices are the symptom of a bond that is too weak between ministry and church.

b) Hierarchical Interpretation of Ministries. In Vatican II and in the 1983 CIC, the pope and the bishops continue to receive the name "hierarchy." This vocabulary remains suspect to Protestantism because it seems to indicate a plenitude of power such that "hierarchical" decisions would have no need to be accepted by the faithful, that it would extend to the temporal realm (indirect power), and, moreover, that it could impose, on pain of sin*, obligations in domains in which the gospel established liberty* for the Christian (see rejection of fasts, Lenten diets, monastic vows, and priestly celibacy by CA 27 and 28). Melancthon, for example, formally rejects a hierarchy understood in these terms: "Our adversaries wish the Church to be defined as an external monarchy whose supremacy is extended over the entire world and in which the Roman pontiff must have an unlimited power that no one has the right to discuss or to judge (anupeuthunon); he can at will establish articles of faith...promulgate laws... But for us, in the Church as it was defined by Christ, we must not apply to pontiffs (non est transfereendum ad pontifices) what is said of the Church as such" (Apology VII–VIII).

Dispelling the misunderstanding of an identification of the church with its hierarchy is easier since Vatican II has reinvigorated the equal dignity of all Christians (LG 32) and their active participation in the liturgy* (SC 14), made presbyteral councils obligatory (PO 7), and recommended pastoral councils (CD 27). The council also wished to give new life to plenary councils and diocesan synods in which laypeople might hold a majority (CD 26), and in which "all questions proposed [might] be submitted to free discussion" (CIC can. 465). There is thus taking shape in Catholic ecclesiology a greater integration of personal, collegial, and synodal authority. The concept of hierarchy must, however, be preserved in order to express the legitimate capacity of bishops to make decisions that commit the faithful; as, for example, in councils.

5. The Person of Ministers and the Object of the Ministry

Dogmatically, the content of the ministry ought to have authority over the person of the minister. Protestant theologians (e.g., Persson 1961) nevertheless think that in Catholicism the person of the minister has authority over the object of the ministry—for example, in the case of the magisterium*, preaching*, and the Eucharist*. This unsatisfactory balance also appears when, in a situation of a dearth of priests, the conditions requisite for acceding to the ministry (E. Schillebeeckx, Plea for the People of God) seem to contradict the right of the faithful to the word* of God and the sacraments (CIC can. 213).

a) Vocation to the Ministry: System of Candidacy or of Consent? In the early church the vocation to the ministry, considered as coming from God, coincided with the church's choice. The current system of candidacy was unknown, and priests and bishops were legitimately ordained against their will (Congar 1966). In deciding a famous controversy between Branchereau and Lahitton, Pius X covered the objective conception of the latter with his authority: "What is called 'priestly vocation' consists not at all, at least necessarily and as a general rule, of a certain interior attraction on the part of the subject, or of invitations by the Holy Spirit to embrace the ecclesiastical state" (AAS 4. 1912. 485). However, 20 years later the Congregation of the Sacraments required of every ordinand that he swear that he "freely desires (ordination), experiences and feels that he is truly called by God" (AAS 22, 1931, 127). Current vocabulary ("have a vocation," "live one's priesthood"), like the vocabulary of the CIC, which regularly designates ordinands as candidates, thus evidences what is hardly a traditional—neither medieval nor especially modern—subjectivization of the vocation for the ordained ministry. And this subjectivization has brought about a system of volunteering that makes it more difficult for episcopal authority to bring together pastoral needs and competent people, which would more easily be possible through a system that involved a call from the church and a consent to that call.

b) Personal Status of Ministers. The personal status of ministers comes only indirectly under the heading of faith. For example, Vatican II states: “Celibacy was imposed by a law of the Latin Church. . . . it is not required by the nature of the priesthood” (PO 16). In the case of a reexamination of this status, two theological criteria would need to be taken into account: the pastoral good of the church, superior to the status of individuals, and the correlation between church and ministry, which makes it possible to think that a universal decree would not necessarily bear spiritual fruit. Modifying or maintaining a custom that has been so highly valued would also require the spiritual involvement of the churches concerned. The question of whether Christian women can be called to the ordained ministry, novel in its present form, is more complex (woman*). Permanence of the person in the ministry is not to be confused with the permanence of the effects of ordination, as expressed through the theology of the indelible character (Council of Trent*, sess. VII, can. 9 [COD 685, 7–9]). Here too the object of the ministry provides a criterion for the persons: just as one “does not make oneself a priest,” one ought not to decide by oneself to leave the ministry. The conjunction between the needs of the service of the gospel and the aptitudes of the person (his faith, his health, his age) will be decisive in the matter (the CIC [can. 401 and 538] ordinarily provides for the resignation of ordained ministers at the age of 75).

6. Ecumenical Perspectives

Long thought to be insoluble, the question of the ministry has recently undergone a clarification.

a) Diverging Perspectives. Catholics and the Orthodox do not have the same initial doctrinal emphases as Protestants. In Protestantism the ministry is a secondary preoccupation. Even if it is a part of the esse of the church, as implicit in the proclamation of the Word and the celebration of the sacraments, its forms and its modes of exercise are part only of its bene esse. Lutheran bishops, for example, are not always ordained bishops and do not always have that title. Reformed churches, for their part, ordinarily exercise the episcopè collectively. Almost everywhere, the ministry is linked to a synodal form of government. Ordination is not a sacrament, and the diaconate is not governed by a sacrament; the emphasis is placed on the ministry of the Word and on administrative tasks, and all “sacerdotalization.” (The Anglicans have a different position on each of these points.)

In the Catholic and Orthodox churches, on the other hand, ministers are recognized to have strong personal authority. They play a decisive role in the communion among local churches and in the expression of the faith. Linked to that of the apostles*, their ministry is also a priestly ministry.

b) Convergences. These divergent doctrinal emphases could, however, be brought into unity, on the condition that the churches take more account of their actual practices and less of the theoretical explanations they offer for them. For example, no church exists without a regulated supervision of its liturgical life and without continuous leadership: ministers are called, commissioned, and ordained according to rules established by other ministers. Ministry includes preaching, teaching, presiding over the life of the church, and representing it to the outside world. We can see everywhere the existence of an episcopè: the right of visitation, vigilance over doctrine and over the call to the ministry, participation in ordinations, and the like. The “Faith and Constitution” Commission of the COE has developed a document (Baptism, Eucharist, Ministries—BEM, “Lima Document”) that could be fruitful for Catholics and Protestants. Catholicism could learn from it how to supplement its highly personalized practice of the ministry through collegial and synodal bodies; and the Protestant churches could accept a greater personalization of the episcopacy while not abandoning their synodal structures.

- P.E. Persson (1961), Kyrkans ämbete som Kristus-representation, Lund (see c.r. by L.M. Dewailly, RSPHTh 46, 1962, 650–57).
- Y. Congar (1966), “Ordinations, invitus, coactus, de l’Église ancienne au can. 214,” RSPHTh 50, 169–97.
- R. Gryson (1970), Les origines du célibat ecclésiastique du Ier au VIIe s., Gembloux.
- Y. Congar (1971), Ministères et communion ecclésiale, Paris.
- H. Dombois (1971), Hierarchie: Grund und Grenze einer umstrittenen Struktur, Freiburg-Basel-Vienna.
- H. Legrand (1972), “M. et caractère indélébile,” Conc(F) no. 74, 63–70.
- Commission internationale catholique-luthérienne (1981), official texts (Ed. H. Legrand, H. Meyer), Le ministère dans l’Église, Paris (with excursus by Y. Congar); (1985), Face à l’unité, Paris.
- Commission mixte catholique-orthodoxe (1982), “Le mystère de l’Église et de l’eucharistie à la lumière du mystère de la Sainte Trinité,” DC 79, 941–45.
- F. Frost (1982), “M.,” Cath. 10, 185–286.
- P. Eicher (1991), “Hierarchie,” NHThG, vol. 2, 330–49 (Dictionnaire de théologie, 1988, 287–98).
- J. Freitag (1993), “Amt,” LThK3 1, 547–50.
- H. Legrand (1993), “Les m. de l’Église locale,” in B. Lauret and F. Refoulé (Ed.), Initiation à la pratique de la théologie, vol. 3, 3rd. Ed., Paris, esp. 239–73 (and bibl. 333–42).
- J. Delorme (Ed.) (1994), Le m. et les ministères selon le Nouveau Testament, Paris.

HERVÉ LEGRAND

See also Baptism; Bishop; Church; Deacon; Deaconesses; Ecumenism; Hierarchy; Ordination/Order; Synod; Woman

Minucius Felix. See Apologists

Miracle

A. Biblical Theology

I. Vocabulary

There is no equivalent in either Hebrew or biblical Greek for the word “miracle,” understood as denoting an exception to the laws of nature* that is attributed to divine agency because it is otherwise unexplainable. The religious experience in the presence of a miracle outweighs its element of interrupting ordinary causality (see Bultmann [1926], Jesus). The universality of physical laws is no longer observed.

The Hebrew ’ôṭ (78 times), “sign” (Septuagint sèmeion) and môfêṭ (36 times), “prodigal” (Septuagint teras) are often associated (18 times): a miracle is a message; môfêṭ, alone, can also signify “omen” (Ez 12:6–11). One will find nifelâ’ôṭ (rare in the singular), “wonders” (Septuagint thaumasia) or the verb pl’, “to make wonders”; nôrâ’ôṭ (44 times), “fearsome actions”; gevoûrôt, “exploits;” ma’asêh[AuQ7] (Septuagint ergon), “action,” or “work,” an encompassing term; paradoxon (Wis 5:2, 19:5; in the superlative: 16, 17), “extraordinary.” The synoptic Gospels prefer dunamis for the miracles of Jesus*, while John favors sèmeion (27 times), or ergon.

II. Old Testament

1. Diversity of Miracles

A miracle does not necessarily come from God* (Dt 13:2ff.). Moses and Aaron before Pharaoh surpass his magicians only after a long competition (Ex 7–8). Owing to their proximity within the main current of tradition, certain miracles can be grouped together. Miracles of the Moses cycle belong to the very heart of the Torah, at the point where tradition is transmitted: didactic texts (Dt 4:34, 7:19, 29:2, 34:11), catechesis* for the son (Ex 13:14; Dt 6:22; Ps 44:2, 78:1–7, 78:43, 105:5, 105:27) narrative “credo” of Dt 26:5–9 (see Jos 24:5). In the case of the miracle of Joshua (“Sun, stand still!”: Jos 10:12b), there is no recurring motif. The cycle of Elijah and Elisha illustrates the prophetic tradition: cosmic signs (1 Kgs 18:19–46), the gift of food (1 Kgs 17:8–16; 2 Kgs 4:1–7, 4:42ff.), the healing of a pagan (2 Kgs 5), the dead brought back to life (1 Kgs 17:17–24; 2 Kgs 4:18–37), and so on. But there are no miracles attributed to the prophets* of the eighth century (except in Is 38:1–8; 2 Kgs 20:1–11) or their successors.

2. Changes in Literary Form

In the myth* of origin the irruption effect that belongs to miracles does not exist: the improbable, briefly touched upon, is continuous (Gn 2–3; see Mt 4:1–11, Jesus in the desert) and is not surprising. Comical flavor and naïveté color local traditions (a corpse brought back to life after having been quickly thrown in Elisha’s tomb: 2 Kgs 13:20f.). Late legends are fantastical, detailed, and artificial in character (2 Macc 2:1–6, 3:24–34; Dn 3). On the other hand, there was nothing miraculous in either the long story of David and of Solomon, or even in the story of Joseph, however literary this may be otherwise (Gn 36–50).

3. New Interpretations

a) Change in Scale. The Red Sea parts without the help of the natural forces that were mentioned in Exodus 14:21 and 14:25: Israel* walks between two liquid walls (Ex 14:16, 14:22f., 14:29). The writer’s intention is to highlight God’s act of separation in Genesis 1:6–10: the savior thus presents himself as the Creator. The phenomenon of the manna is presented with many nuances: miraculous (Ex 16:26) or rather enigmatic (Ex 16:15), natural (color, shape, consistency, taste: Ex 16:14, 16:31; preparation: Nm 11:8). According to Exodus 16:14, manna is discovered; it “falls” according to Numbers 11:9; it becomes “bread from heaven” in Psalm 105:40 (embedded in the writing of the miracle of Joshua: Jos 10:10–14).

b) Interiorization. Israel had to overcome its fear of death to cross the Red Sea (Ex 14:13f., unknown source). In order for the Jordan river to part, the bearers of the ark would have had to dare to put “the soles of the feet” (Jos 3:13) in it.

c) Rationalization. The Hellenistic period saw the simultaneous rise of a specifically apocalyptic* form of the fabulous and a new interest in the laws of physics, particularly with respect to medicine (terminology of 2 Macc 7:22b; Moses and the pharmacist: Sir 38:5; Salomon: Wis 7:20c). Song of Songs records the miracles of Exodus (plagues, crossing of the sea, manna) by recombining the same cosmic elements.

4. Disappearance of the Miracle

a) Interruption. Lamentations rise toward God: marvels are distant (Ps 74:11f., 77:11, 80:3–17, 89:50, 143:5); they belong to former days (Ps 44:2, 78:3f.; Is 51:9; Mi 7:14), to the time of the Fathers. This schema became a common concept: Judges 6:13 and 15:18 (for rabbinical literature: Hruby 1977). Deuteronomy indicates the distance between the time of the Fathers and the present time (5:3, 29:13f.). What is left of the miraculous? The relics* kept with the ark (manna: Ex 16:33f.; Aaron’s staff: Nm 17:25) have disappeared. In the second century B.C. God hands over to martyrdom those who obey his law (1 Macc 2:38; 2 Macc 7). The theme of Wisdom 2:10–20 concerns the righteous possibly being killed without God intervening.

b) Series. Miracles “are lightning” (Pascal*), but they open a course of closely linked events. The crossing of the desert is interpreted as an itinerary punctuated by miracles (Ex 15:23–26, 16:1–4, 17:2–7; Ps 78; see Dt 6:16). Its disappearance turns a miracle into a test. It leads either to a deepening of faith* or to insatiable demands for proof, an increase in challenges: Israel in the desert “tempts” God (nâsâh, intensive) (temptation*). A request of God for a sign is not necessarily an occasion for divine anger (Jgs 6:17, 6:36–40; 2 Kgs 20:8; Is 7:1). But when the Israelites put God “to the test ten times” (Nm 14:22), God reveals that to test him is the opposite of “believing” (Ps 78; Nm 20:12). Each miracle only exacerbates the thirst to see God act (Ex 17:2–7) without satisfying it. For Wisdom

2:17–20, this inclination goes as far as planning to kill the righteous to “see if” God will act (Wis 1:2, 2:22c). But God will act only in secret (Wis 2:22a), a secrecy that is all the more profound when the act is decisive.

III. Miracles of Jesus

1. Continuity

a) Confirmation of the Signs. In Matthew 11:2–6, miracles are called “the works of Christ* (the Messiah*)” by the evangelist, and Jesus himself borrows from Isaiah to describe them (Mt 11:5): healing the blind (Is 42:18); the lame (Is 35:6); the deaf and blind (Is 29:18, 35:5, 42:18); the dead raised (Is 26:19), all this inaugurated by the announcement made to the poor (Is 61:1 Septuagint). The exorcisms* in Matthew 12:28 prove that the Kingdom* that was prophesied has come. The pairing “signs and wonders” (also occur in the reverse order) that evokes the miracles of the tradition* (see above, II, 1) appears in Acts 2:19, 7:36, 2:22, 6:8, 4:30, and 5:12 (sèmeia kai dunameis in 8:13). The expression, when it is used in Romans 15:19 and 2 Corinthians 12:12, serves to authenticate Paul’s credentials as an apostle*.

b) Repetition of Schemas. John 6:31f. (bread/manna) refers to Moses (see the “desert” in Mk 6:31). And Jesus, who subjugates the winds and the sea (Mk 4:41), probably also refers to him (Ex 14:16, 14:21, 14:26f.). More than one story about the miracles of Jesus and his apostles refers, through certain details, to the miracles of Elijah and Elisha (the raising of the widow’s son: Lk 7:11; see 1 Kgs 17:17–24; and of Jairus’s daughter: Lk 8:42; see 1 Kgs 17:21; of Tabitha: Acts 9:36–42; see 2 Kgs 4:8–37). Even the miracle of the loaves in Matthew 14:13–21 and 15:32–38 is a copy of 2 Kgs 4:42ff.

2. Specific Characteristics

a) Types of Miracles. Certain miracles (known as “epiphanies”: Cana, the loaves, walking on water, the miraculous catch of fish) are meant to reveal who Jesus is. As a healer (healing*), Jesus can find himself before large groups of sick people, especially in Matthew 8:16f., 9:36, 12:15, and 15:30f. The goal is social and collective. Jesus saves from sickness (15 times) or death (three times). He delivers the possessed (eight times), who are sometimes also sick (three times). In the final analysis, these acts have several dimensions: to save, or even to confirm a truth (“apothegm” [Bultmann] illustrated by healing work in Mk 2:1–12, after the pardon, 3:1–6; Sabbath* by an anecdotal marvel in Mt 17:24–27: temple* tax.). As in the past, discernment was needed: Jesus and his adversaries drive out demons* (Mt 12:27; par. Lk 11:19). Jesus will condemn those who have performed miracles in his name (Mt 7:22f.). There are some counterfeits (Acts 8:9–13, 13:8).

b) Meaning. A miracle is always a sign, linked to teaching in Matthew 4:23 and 9:35; Mark 1:21, 1:27, and 6:34–44; and Luke 5:17, 6:6, and 13:10. The accounts of the principal miracles do not reveal all their symbolic impact, hidden in Mark (Lamarche 1977), and expounded upon in John. They partake of a truth* that will be revealed only later on. It should be noted that Jesus does not perform any miracles to protect himself from death and that, in the scheme of things, it does not matter if there are no miracles. Nevertheless, the miracle of the loaves does not belong to this category: a crowd, which could give Jesus political power, benefits from it (Jn 6:15).

3. New Characteristics

a) Main Features. The fact that Jesus' miracle stories have roots in the Old Testament does not lessen their originality. 1) They focus on the human body and compassion (reference to the Servant in Mt 8:16f., 9:36, 12:15). 2) Though they are not entirely free of embellishments, their sweep is reduced. We are far from the great deeds of Moses. Indeed the parallel and contrast between the "desert" of Galilee and that of Exodus, between the bread from the sky and the basket that a child brings, are part of the message. 3) The effect of communicative intensity, however, increases correspondingly: the eyes, the ears, the mouth are healed by the eyes, the ears, the mouth; the miracle worker transfers his power to the disciples; the spectators praise God. 4) The great number of demons concretizes the apocalyptic atmosphere in everyday life. 5) Jesus more than once resists performing miracles (Mk 8:11f., 9:19; Jn 4:48) and forbids their being publicized (Mk 1:34, 1:44, 5:43; Lk 8:56; Mk 7:36, 8:26; Mt 9:30).

b) Overall Narrative Movement. The beginning and end of the story shed light on Jesus' reserve. The initial appearance of the tempter provides a key to the miracles. On the one hand it establishes a link to the Exodus (Mk 1:13: "desert"; Mt and Lk: dialogue consisting of verses from Deuteronomy). In particular, Satan tempts Jesus to "test God," as Israel had done in the past (see above, II, 4, b) so that his status as "Son of God" cannot be contested by anyone (filiality) (Mt 4:16; Lk 4:12; Dt 6:16). On the other hand, Luke 4:13b anticipates Calvary, where Jesus' miracles will be turned against him: "He saved others; he cannot save himself" (Mk 15:31; see "Physician, heal yourself" in Lk 4:23). The challenge will parallel Satan's (Mk 15:31): a miracle "that we may see and believe" (Mk 15:32). Matthew 27:40—"If you are the Son of God, come down from the cross!"—adopts Matthew 4:3, 4:6 words. However, the very absence of a sign has, in a certain way, become a sign: the centurion believes.

c) Miracles, Signs, Parables. For faith*, each miracle signifies more than it shows. Either the series of miracles becomes progressively more invisible or the cross invalidates the series of miracles: it can only go forward or backward. The miracles are a risky way of teaching, but an unavoidable risk. Hence the strongly underlined parallel between miracle and parable* (Mk 4:11f.: "for those outside everything is in parables"; 8:18: the blind and deaf before miracles). John clarifies the transition from the visible to the invisible when he interprets a healing as a figure of the Resurrection* (5:21), or interprets the miracle of the loaves as a figure of eternal life (Jn 6:27). His series of seven "signs" (2:1–11, 4:46–54, 5:1–15, 6:1–15, 6:16–21, 9, 11) represents an escalation. The signs, for him, create faith (Jn 2:11, 6:14, 11:42, 11:45), but this faith is not always solid (Jn 12:42f.). The cumulative effect leads to the miracle of the raising of Lazarus (perhaps a later elaboration), which triggers the murderous plan of the high priest (Jn 11:49–53; characteristic without historical impact, see Brown 1966). The real outcome is the summary of John 12:37–41, which firmly connects the reception given to signs with that given to parables: John 12:40 here transposes the quotation in Isaiah 6:9, used by Mark 4:12.

The "sign of Jonah" announced to "an evil and adulterous generation" (Mt 12:39), when all signs (Mk 8:12) were denied to it, could not be the Resurrection, which is invisible to nonbelievers. It could only be this sign that they could receive from the Resurrection: its announcement in the preaching*, as with sinful Nineveh that received for its salvation* the preaching of Jonah, who had been delivered from the abyss.

- R. Bultmann (1933), "Zur Frage des Wunders," in GuV 1, 214–28.
- R. E. Brown (1966), The Gospel according to John I–XII, New York, App. III: "Signs and Works," 525–32.
- G. Theissen (1974), Urchristliche Wundergeschichten: Ein Beitrag zur formgeschichtlichen Erforschung der synoptischen Evangelien, Gütersloh.
- X. Léon-Dufour (Ed.) (1977), Les miracles de Jésus, Paris, especially K. Hruby, "Perspectives rabbiniques sur le miracle," 73–94; P. Lamarche, "Les miracles de Jésus selon Marc," 213–26; X. Léon-Dufour, "Structure et fonction du récit de miracle," 289–353.

J.-M. van Cangh (1982), "Santé et salut dans les miracles d'Épidaure, d'Apollonius de Tyane et du Nouveau Testament," in J. Ries (Ed.), Gnosticisme et monde hellénistique, Louvain-la-Neuve, 263–77; (1987), "Miracle," in Dictionnaire encyclopédique de la Bible, Bruges, col. 833–46.

P. Beauchamp (1989), "Paraboles de Jésus, vie de Jésus," in coll. "ACFEB," Les Paraboles, Perspectives nouvelles, LeDiv 165, 151–70; (1992), "Le signe des pains," LV(L) 209, 55–67.

Y. Zakovitch (1992), "Miracle," AncBD 4, 845–56.

J. P. Meier (1994), Rethinking the Historical Jesus, vol. 2, New York–London, pt. 3, 509–1038.

PAUL BEAUCHAMP

See also Faith; Fundamentalism; Healing; Jesus, Historical; Literary Genres in Scripture; Narrative; Passion; Resurrection of the Dead; Temptation

B. Historical and Systematic Theology

A theory of miracle is apparently absent in the earliest Christian theology*. There are good reasons for this. The idea of miracle is indeed neither Jewish nor Christian. In the religious world of late antiquity, miracle working was common activity. The boundary between the magical and the medical had not yet been delineated, and the number of divine entities that populated the cosmos* was high enough to render banal what was later to be called "supernatural*" or "preternatural." And even though popular theology, as expressed in the Gospels* and apocryphal acts, surely betrays a taste for wonders, this penchant is absent from the more or less scholarly theology, as it is from the New Testament corpus. Isolated from contexts that give them the force of meaning and revelation*, the miracles of Jesus* undoubtedly called for an apologetic: on the one hand they were real miracles, not trickery; on the other, they were miracles of divine origin, not demonic wonders (e.g., Origen*, Contra Celsum II, 48 Sq.). Above all, it was a question of meaning. The miracle could only be integrated in terms of proof, as a part of a whole, "the event of Jesus Christ," in which, first of all, the hopes (and the Scriptures*) of Israel* were fulfilled, and in which were also fulfilled the hopes of a paganism* that certainly did not expect another miracle worker.

It was thus within a framework rather larger than that of apologetics—the framework, that is, of a mystical cosmology—that Augustine approached the question of miracles. For centuries this approach provided important terms of reference. The first precise definition of miracle can be attributed to Augustine: "Miraculum voco, quidquid arduum aut insolitum supra spem vel facultatem mirantis apparet" (I call miracle that which appears to have an unusual quality and that which exceeds all that which the one to be enchanted expected or could do) (De util. cred. 16, §34). For Augustine, however, beyond these distinctive features, the miracle is par excellence (and it is not strange that a convert to Manicheism* saw in this the material for theological emphasis) nothing else but the totality of a creation* in which nothing is lacking to give witness to the Creator and his omnipotence (Ep. 137). Without ever denying the realist meaning of the Christian Eucharist* (it is, moreover, after having recalled the divine power manifested in the Eucharist that he discusses miracles in Trin. III, V, 11), Augustine never refuted a theological argument that made an appeal to wondrous episodes in world history. But, just as his theology of the Eucharist is first developed as a doctrine of the figura, of the "mode of apparition," his theology of miracle is developed in the same way as the contemplation* of a meaningful totality. Each fragment of the totality deserves the awe (mirari, thaumazein) with which one must praise divine manifestation. A dialectic of miracle remains possible—it is nevertheless an aesthetic of miracle that occupies the foreground, and, to one who possesses a spiritual sensibility toward the created order of things, it appears that everything deserves to be called miraculous.

The Augustinian concept prevailed over Western theology as long as there also prevailed the concept of a sacramental and diaphanous world in which all is symbolic and in which each symbol fulfills a theophanic function. It therefore dominated until, in a process that was to begin as early as the Carolingian Renaissance, a school of thought fascinated by causes gradually supplanted one that was concerned with signs and symbols. Aristotle's gradual "introduction" into the West, the reappearance of a philosophical urgency to which the universities would grant some independence from theology, and the resurgence of a scientific interest in the real: such factors would in the 13th century impose a worldview in which the nature of things had an intrinsic intelligibility sufficient to render obsolete the intrusion of all supernatural elements. The explanation of the immanent networks of causality henceforth replaced the contemplation of an order woven with transcendental references. From this there arose a new cosmology—and with it a new theory of miracle—in which any such occurrence appeared as an aberration, as something uncaused, an exception to the physical/metaphysical laws that govern the world. Because the world has a Cause—a God* who has the dignity of the primary cause—the causes that rule over the correct order of the world are themselves only secondary causes (Augustine already knew this very well, e.g., Trin. III, VIII, 13–IX, 18). The primary cause, which is not counted with the secondary causes, exercises its authority through their mediation. It is, however, not limited to manifesting itself through mediation, and it is precisely with its manifestation that it confronts us. The miracle therefore reveals the sovereignty of the primary cause in that it sets aside the causal order that the primary cause has given to the world, and inasmuch as it acts “against the very order of all created nature” (Thomas* Aquinas, ST Ia, q. 110, a. 4). Once this had been stated, the miracle ceased to be subjected in the first place to strictly theological inquiries: it was first of all a matter of physical questions (the miraculous being defined as a violation of physical laws), and the response provided by theologians was a metaphysical answer that utilized only one theological doctrine, that of divine omnipotence.

A theory of miracle that posited the synergy of the primary cause and the secondary causes, and the immediate operation of the primary cause suspending the regulated interplay of secondary causes, was endowed with consistency (and still has this quality) and could answer all the demands of rationalism. The use of the theory nevertheless contained a trap of which medievalists were not aware because of their great trust in the Greek physics that the Arabs had passed on to them, but which modern objectors easily spotted. Whereas both do not belong to the network of secondary causes, it does not necessarily follow that it cannot be integrated. The miracle is an exception to the laws of our physics—but it will suffice to form the idea of scientific progress to make of the miracle not a manifestation of divine lordship but only an index of our present ignorance. The medieval theory of miracle, in fact, only allowed the epistemological status of the unexplained to be defined.

It was up to the Reformers, who had great reservations about the theoretical strategies of Scholasticism*, to carry out a first critique of the appeal to miracles.

For Luther*, faith*, which is the interior miracle, is more important than healing*, the external miracle (WA 41, 19). Miracles belonged to the past; present miracles could only endanger church doctrine, and the only miracle was now to be found in the experience of forgiveness and faith (WA 10/3, 144 Sq). Calvin followed Luther in regarding miracles as a distinctive characteristic of the early church, and of it alone. Indeed, Protestant orthodoxy would routinely contest the appeal of modern Catholic thought to current miracles. But this same orthodoxy would later readopt the Scholastic concept of miracle as a contra et supra naturam event, against nature and beyond nature (e.g., Quenstedt, Syst. Theol. I, 671), and it would also abandon the Lutheran concept of faith as miracle par excellence.

Nevertheless, the most incisive criticism came from the development of historical science. The physical theory of miracles seeks to specify that one thing or another is a miracle. However, the major miracles of which theology aims to speak (above all, the miracles of Jesus) are susceptible not to the test of observation but instead to the work of memory: these are the recounted miracles. Even in the time of rationalism*, miracles could certainly happen and play a role in the life of rational human beings: thus the “miracle of the holy thorn tree” in Pascal*’s experience. But what about reported miracles? On this point, Hume posed objections that were much older than the Enlightenment. He said that the miracle story could be considered true only under one condition, namely the impossibility of attributing any improbability at all to the account given. Only the infallible account can lend credibility to the miracles of which it speaks, since the error of such an infallible account would represent an even greater miracle (An Enquiry Concerning Human Understanding, Ed. Selby-Bigge). And since the present experience of the world does not present us with any miracles, it is doubtful that there ever were any. Those things happen, or “occur,” that can happen and occur. The present conditions of experience—the world as it is and the nature of things as they are—provide the conditions of all possibilities.

Whether tacitly or explicitly, all the hermeneutics* of historical accounts developed from the end of the 17th century up until Troeltsch made these affirmations their own. Only a certified miracle, Lessing suggested, could be “the proof of spirit and power,” but we only ever deal with recounted miracles. Henceforth, the ontological status of miracle would only be that of a textual object (miracles find their true home in mythical texts), or of a product of faith. It would not be denied that miracle stories have a meaning. Nevertheless, throughout a long chapter in the history of thought—one that would not end until Bultmann* (although Bultmann only gave his theological blessing to a split between “meaning” and “fact,” the origins of which are not theological)—it was our world, understood as our “vision of the world,” that was asked to determine from which facts this meaning originated. Philosophical modernity and theological modernity thus come together in analogous policies of exclusion. Scholasticism tended to perceive exclusively in the miracle a miraculous fact. The kind of thinking that foreshadowed the Enlightenment and also that came out of it undoubtedly retained the idea of the miraculous fact. But this was in order to set the logic of facts (occurred facts and narrated facts, Geschichte and Historie) in opposition to the logic of miracles.

Systematic theology could not find many answers to contemporary critiques that flourished in the biblical exegesis* of Strauss’s and Renan’s era. Protestant supernaturalism certainly did not miss the opportunity to defend the classic theory with the help of modern terminology. Thus, F. G. Süsskind (1767–1829) defined miracle as “a phenomenon that belongs to the world of the senses, but is founded in a reality that is in itself supra-tangible and to which it must be linked.” The Protestant 19th century also saw one R. Rothe (1799–1867) make of miracle “an element of revelation*.” The most influential decisions were also the most timid. In the theory of pious consciousness that constitutes the backbone of Schleiermacher*’s dogmatic* theology, the miracle, for such consciousness, is the finite leading sometimes to the infinite*—but it is clearly noted that the finite does not, therefore, cease to belong to the network of natural causalities (Christ. Glaube, §47). In Catholicism, a certain J. S. Von Drey readopted a theory that had already been championed by Leibniz* and saw in miracles the action of hidden natural forces. These forces only manifest themselves in an exceptional way (theory of the preformation). Among other Catholic scholars, as divergent as J. M. Sailer, G. Hermes, and L. Bautain, a certain Kantian influence and the concern for emotional apologetics led to the marginalization of the idea of “proof by miracle.” It is therefore not surprising that it was during this period that the magisterial authorities of Catholicism* first expressed themselves on the question of miracles (previously, this had only been approached in terms of canonical regulations, and by Benedict XIV to determine the need for a miracle to promote a cause of beatification or canonization). Moreover, the series of reminders (DS 2768, 2779, 3009), which were to be adopted again in the 20th century by the antimodernist oath (DS 3539) and the encyclical Humani generis (DS 3876), was less about proposing a definition than defending the possibility and the convincing force. These texts consider miracles a demonstration of divine power, without explicitly linking them to a violation of natural laws.

As the keystone of an apologetics of demonstration and proof, an apologetics that hardly questioned the status of demonstration and proof, whether in theology or in philosophy*, the miracle was bound to meet the same fate as this aspect of apologetics, which only barely survived in fundamentalist Protestantism* and in Catholic Neoscholasticism. However, it was also bound to find new meaning and a role in recent fundamental theologies. It was above all thanks to E. Le Roy and to Blondel*, after the latter had provided his specifications and outline for a method for revived apologetics (1896, Lettre sur l’apologétique, OC 2, 97–193), that miracle was afforded the dignity of a philosophical and theological subject in debate (Le Roy 1906; B. de Saligny 1907 and Blondel OC 2, 725–40) that marked the end of all purely physical definitions of the miraculous and the rebirth of sign thought of as the “seed of faith” (OC 2, 728). The influence of Blondel would also play a role in the tradition* illustrated in the 19th century by theologians like Cardinal V. Dechamps (whose influence preponderated at the First Vatican* Council) or J. H. Newman, and then in the 20th century by P. Rousselot and those who were inspired by his work. It contributed to the development of a form of understanding in which all Christian reality in particular, as it is actualized and transmitted by the church, was asked to have credibility, and in which global human experience, at once intellectual, free, and emotional, was asked to note the believable suggested by the mediation of the church.

The discourse on proof was of course reorganized. The factuality of miracle, if there are miracles (and certain phenomena like healings witnessed in the sanctuaries in Lourdes, for example, have maintained within Catholicism an interest in miraculous happenings; see Pius XII, encyclical A Pilgrimage to Lourdes, AAS 49 [1957], 605–19), is more than that of a marvel since it calls for theological deciphering that would allow its insertion in a network of significations. And in order precisely to reach these meanings, one will have to borrow in a privileged manner—probably from the theology of the Resurrection of Jesus—categories within which all other miracles can be accounted for. Thus, the miracle emerged again as a sign, and specifically as a messianic and eschatological sign. Perceiving this sign therefore requires an ability to interpret, and the interpretation is spiritual more than rational (R. Latourelle, DSp 10, 1281). For, although it is quite clear that there is no room for the miraculous in the “modern world,” it should also be clear that Christian experience has its own world* (“world” designating a totality of relationships, prejudices and forms of behavior), the world of biblical experience, and that this world has the characteristic of remaining habitable in the discontinuity of time. Access to biblical experience, access to the Resurrection of Jesus as the mark of this experience, access to the eschatological community that transmits the kerygma of the Resurrection, the founding acts that retain the meaning of all miracles and the conditions of its recognition: retrospectively, the Resurrection of Jesus allows us to see, in the miracles recorded in the Old Testament, signs foreshadowing the Easter event, and likewise in Jesus’ miracles themselves. Prospectively, it allows us to see a certain memory of the Resurrection of Jesus in the miracles of the time of the church. Perhaps theology needs no other miracles than the double event of Easter and Pentecost in order to know that Christian experience is the experience of a new age and a new world. But for a reasoning mind—believing or only borne along by a “budding faith that strives to test itself or develop” (E. Le Roy)—that accepts leaving questions open about what is possible and about God (Marion 1989), the miracle is evidence of the new order of the world. Not everyone regards the appearance of anything strange, inexplicable, or unfathomable as miraculous. It is only in the horizon of meaning opened by the Resurrection of Jesus that the miracle is recognized for what it really is. In this respect the doctrine of miracles is a footnote to that first chapter of Christian theology.

Finally, the philosophical discussion of miracles has remained alive in the Anglo-Saxon world, whether it has been under the continued influence of Hume (Gräfrath 1997) or under the guidance of Wittgenstein.

- J. H. Newman (1897), Two Essays on Miracles, London.
- E. Le Roy (1906), “Essai sur la notion du miracle,” AphC, 4th series, vol. 3, 5–33, 166–91, 225–59.
- B. de Saily (M. Blondel) (1907), “La notion et le rôle du miracle,” AphC, 4th series, vol. 4, 337–61.
- P. Rousselot (1910), “Les yeux de la foi,” RSR 1, 241–59, 444–75.
- J. Huby (1918), “Miracle et lumière de grâce,” RSR 8, 36–77.
- R. Bultmann (1933), “Zur Frage des Wunders,” GuVI 1, 214–28.
- R. M. Grant (1952), Miracle and Natural Law in Graeco-Roman and Early Christian Thought, Amsterdam.
- C. S. Lewis (1947), Miracles, 2nd Rev. Ed., London, 1960.
- R. Guardini (1959), Wunder und Zeichen, Würzburg.
- L. Monden (1961), Theologie des Wunders, Freiburg.
- R. Latourelle (1963), Théologie de la révélation, Paris-Bruges, 416–34.
- D. Dubarle (1967), “Réflexions sur le miracle,” Approches d’une théologie de la science, CFI 22, 77–99.
- A. Kolping (1968), Fundamentaltheologie I, Münster, 297–314.
- H. C. Kee (1983), Miracle in the Early Christian World, New Haven–London.
- H. Fries (1985), Fundamentaltheologie, Graz, 276–95.
- L. Pearl (1988), “Miracles and Theism,” RelSt 24, 483–96.
- J.-L. Marion (1989), “A Dieu, rien d’impossible,” Com(F) XIV/5, 43–58.
- T. L. Nichols (1990), “Miracles, the Supernatural, and the Problem of Extrincism,” Gr. 71, 23–40.
- R. Bauman (1991), “Wunder,” NHThG 5, 286–99.
- S. Slupik (1995), “A New Interpretation of Hume’s Of Miracles,” RelSt 31, 517–36.
- B. Gräfrath (1997), “Wissenschaftstheorie oder Ästhetik der Wunder,” ThPh 72, 257–63.

JEAN-YVES LACOSTE

See also Credibility; Faith; Fundamental Theology; Sciences of Nature

Mission/Evangelization

In the broad sense, the mission is a basic characteristic of the church,* which is called upon to be the sign and instrument in the world of God*’s salvation* for all of mankind. Two major tasks are incumbent on the church as on every true believer: to testify to the gospel (evangelization) and serve man (diaconate). In a narrower sense mission means the work of spreading the faith* and founding new communities outside “traditionally Christian countries.” This meaning attained increasingly special importance after the 17th century, when the Jesuits pronounced the votum de missionibus, a vow of readiness to be “sent on mission” by one’s superiors. Furthermore, all religions that claim to be universal see themselves as missionary communities, as distinguished from tribal and national religions.

1. Biblical Foundations

In the Old Testament the idea of a God who sends envoys is found primarily in narratives* of prophetic vocation (Ex 3:10; Jer 1:7; and Is 2:3–4 and 3:4–5). With the prophets* was born the hope of a conversion of the nations to faith in the unique God (Is 2:2–4, 19:21–25, and 45:20–25, and the books of Ruth and Jonah). “Proselytes” who become Jewish are evoked in post-exilic literature (Est 8:17; Tb 13:13; and Dn 3:17–20 and 6:26–28).

The New Testament sees Jesus* first as the envoy of God among men; the Gospel* According to John bases the authority* of Jesus on this mission—he is the Son sent by the Father* (Jn 3:17, 10:36, and 17:18). Jesus is sent first (Mt 15:24) to Israel*, but his mission also has a universal dimension, which is made evident by his attitude toward outcasts and pagans, as when he shares the table of the sinners and takes liberties with Jewish dietary practices (Mk 7:15–23 and Lk 10:8). Jesus’ disciples, too, are envoys, from before Easter (Mk 3:13–15 and 6:7–13 and parallels to both) bearing responsibilities similar to their master’s (to announce and heal). This mandate is renewed at Easter: the Risen Lord appears before his followers to send them out on mission (Mt 28:19; 1 Cor 15:5–8; and Jn 20:21–23). However, the mission does not begin until after Pentecost, for the indispensable condition of the apostolate of the community of disciples is the gift of the Holy* Spirit. The beginnings of the church’s mission is related in the Acts of the Apostles; Paul occupies a special place as the one who transmits the gospel to the pagans (Rom 11:13 and Gal 1:15–16). He saw his mission as that of a plenipotentiary envoy (Rom 1:5; 1 Cor 9:2; and Gal 2:8).

2. Historical Landmarks

The mission of the church met with rapid, spectacular success in the first centuries of the Christian era. During this period of cultural and religious distress in the Roman Empire, Christianity could take advantage of the network of Jewish communities and synagogues that served as points of departure for Christian missionaries in many cities. By the third century, and despite numerous persecutions, the church was present and active on all social levels. Christianity, which was tolerated in the empire before it became the official religion, became increasingly influential in every walk of political, social, and cultural life. The missionary extension of Christianity was methodical, apologetical, and didactic.

The most remarkable phenomenon in the fourth century was the missionary enterprise of Irish and British monks who had taken a vow of “pilgrimage” and saw themselves as envoys of the pope to the pagans. A political dimension was then added to the religious dimension of evangelization, and cultural prestige also came into play. Since this mission imposed a rather lengthy cohabitation of Christian faith with paganism*, the church developed means of cultural adaptation and accommodation well beyond the practices of the ancient church.

The Nestorian Church was the ultimate in missionary churches in the medieval East. Despite the existence of other missionary religions, this church, which had no political backing or possibility of creating a strong ecclesial structure*, developed considerably.

After the 16th century the opening of new lands stimulated renewed missionary enthusiasm for Catholicism*, especially in the Iberian peninsula, with Latin America as the major field of action. In reaction to the brutality and cupidity of the conquerors and with the intent of ensuring the survival and the evangelization of Indian tribes, the Jesuits set up missionary enclaves, called reductions, that remained in operation from 1610 until their expulsion from Argentina and Paraguay in 1768. The Jesuits sought to transmit the faith liberated from its traditional forms, in order to bring forth a Christianity adapted to local situations. At the same time indigenous forms of Christianity arose in India and China.

To develop the mission, Gregory XV created the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith in 1622, and Urban VIII founded a Collegium Urbanum to train priests* for missionary work. In 1663 the Société des missions étrangères (Society of Foreign Missions) was created in Paris at the initiative of François Pallu (1626–84), with the double purpose of training missionaries and encouraging the formation of a native clergy in Asia. However, this native clergy did not really take shape until the early 20th century.

In the Orthodox East, the Russian missions were very active, with the support of the princes of Kiev and then the czars, notably Peter the Great (1682–1725). These missions would often start out under the impetus of a single person; the gospel would be translated into a local tongue followed by the creation of monachal-type poles of evangelization resembling small groups of fervent believers. However, when Czar Alexander I (†1825) decided to tolerate cults* other than the Byzantine Orthodox, the Russian Church had great difficulty containing the apostasy of baptized pagans.

In the Reform churches, pietism* made way for development of the missionary idea by liberating it from its traditional dogmatic and territorial bonds. When the Dutch and the Danish took over certain Portuguese colonies they set up Protestant missions focused on personal conversion*, created native churches, and favored the study of native religions. In 1795 the creation of the Mission of London opened what could be called “the great century of the Protestant missions” (K. S. Latourette), a period in which missionary development influenced the entire European continent with the creation of numerous missions. It was also a great century for Catholic missions.

Probably the most important fruit of this movement was the unitary dynamic engendered by the dissemination of the missionary idea in the different churches. An initial encounter of Protestant missionary societies from all over the world was held in Edinburgh in 1910. This climate of international collaboration was concretized in 1921 by the creation of the International Missionary Council—a decisive step in the process that led to the creation of the World* Council of Churches (WCC) in 1948. Then, in 1961, two factors favored the integration of the entire International Missionary Council into the WCC: 1) the realization that Europe and America had also become “lands of missions” (this had already been acknowledged by the founders of the “interior missions” in the 19th century), and (2) the fact that the African and Asian churches had become independent. The “overseas missions” became “missions on the six continents.” Economic crisis and secularization* in Europe, along with the decolonization and emancipation of Asian and African nations, resulted in the decline of Western missions and the development of autonomous churches on all continents.

3. Theological Challenge

The theology* of missions implied a theology of non-Christian religions. This theology has been subject to significant development over the past two centuries, posing a challenge to many traditional missionary practices. At the Edinburgh missionary conference (1910) a study group that attempted an interpretation of religions concluded that they were auxiliaries of the missions in their struggle “for the liberation of souls* that are prisoners of error and perdition.” The Jerusalem conference (1928) considered non-Christian religions as potential allies against secularism; the idea of dialogue and a common presence gradually prevailed, particularly when there was a need to take a stand on ethical questions. However, the WCC was never able to settle the question of salvation by other religions: “We cannot indicate any pathway to salvation other than Jesus-Christ. Nor can we set limits to the redemptive power of God” (San Antonio Missionary Conference, 1989).

The Catholic Church also asserted the exclusivity of salvation in Christ* (Vatican* II, AG 7), while acknowledging that fidelity to a non-Christian tradition could allow men to participate in salvation. The work of the missions then became to purify “all the truth* and grace* already found among the nations, as if by a secret presence of God” (Paul VI) and bring it to perfection. This goes back to a patristic thesis in which non-Christian religions are deemed partially worthy, as “preparation” for the gospel. For believers of other religious traditions, “the salvation of Christ is accessible in virtue of a grace which has a mysterious relation with the Church; it does not formally introduce them into the Church, but brings them an enlightenment adapted to their state of mind and way of life” (John Paul II). Even if God can save outside the church, this does not dispense the church from its missionary work. For it is the missions that bring authentic liberation, opening men to the love* of Christ; and all men seek “a new life in Christ” (Paul VI). “The Church is the normal path to salvation and it alone possesses in plenitude the means to salvation” (John Paul II). Compatibility with the gospel and communion* with the universal Church are the criteria for regulating practices and doctrines while preserving its irreducible content, “the specificity and integrity of the Christian faith.”

Lively debate on these same questions took place within the Reform movement. The “evangelical” current did not go along with advocates of dialogue with other religions; they feared that affirming the possibility of salvation outside the explicit confession of Christian faith replaced and discouraged evangelization.

There arose a need for redefinition of the relation between the missions founded by the Western churches and the “young churches” they created. In the 19th century, missions were generally undertaken in a “colonial” spirit that projected on a worldwide level a “paternalist” attitude consisting of “entrusting authority and control to a man meant to play the role of the father” (R. Mehl). However, from the mid-19th century, theologians stressed the need to promote an indigenous pastorate and local churches that were autonomously directed, financed, and developed. Though remnants of dependence still exist, this wish is largely fulfilled today. The Whitby Missionary Conference (1947) proposed a model of “partnership in obedience” to define this new relation that places all churches on an equal footing. The Bangkok Conference (1972–73) marked the height of demands for theological, financial, and human autonomy, including a proposal for a moratorium on interecclesial support. The only other option envisaged by the conference followed the model of the CEVAA, Communauté évangélique d'action apostolique, or Evangelical Community of Apostolic Action, that unites the French-speaking Protestant churches: The “ancient” and the “new” churches place their goods in common and manage them according to the “round table principle.”

Today all churches agree that the missions are not meant to impose a Western ecclesial model on an international scale. They all share the problematic of acculturation. The Christian message needs to be translated to all cultural and social contexts; no particular style of ecclesial life shaped in a particular culture can claim to be its sole possible incarnation. The organisms that guarantee the unity of local churches vary, of course, according to their traditions whatever their mode of operation—federal (WCC or confessional families), communions of bishops* among themselves (in the Orthodox* movement), or colleges of bishops joined with the bishop of Rome* (in Catholicism). And they are all careful to leave room for legitimate differences.

The question of the connection between evangelization and social commitment is still on the agenda of missionary reflections in all the churches. The WCC Assembly in New Delhi (1961) affirmed that God “is at work in all the great changes of our times.” The Uppsala assembly (1968) expressed the conviction that the church is called on “to anticipate the kingdom* of God by making visible here and now something of the newness that Christ will accomplish.” In this perspective, the mission of the church is to encourage and accompany major social changes by deliberate commitment. In certain cases missions might even be called upon to support revolutionary-type movements. These WCC policy statements provoked a rupture with the evangelical movement, whose theological position is that the purpose of missions must be the conversion of individuals and not the transformation of society. The evangelicals believe that spiritual needs precede physical needs, and man himself is not capable of creating a just and peaceful society. Nevertheless, assemblies organized by the evangelicals in Lausanne (1974) and Manila (1989) clearly affirmed that there can be no opposition between evangelization and social action.

The question was studied anew by the WCC in Canberra (1992), bringing forth a proposition to support “intergovernmental organizations such as the United Nations Organization and the International Court of Justice that can speak in the name of the majority of peoples.” At the Canberra congress particular attention was given to questions of human rights, with pointed criticism of economic systems. “The economic adjustments, imposed by managers of the ‘free market system,’ that asphyxiate poor, indebted countries” were rejected in the name of the gospel.

The same debate occurs within the Catholic Church, though it is seemingly less tense than the Protestant* version. Vatican II’s decree on the church’s missionary activity, Ad Gentes divinitus, did stress the social consequences of evangelization, acknowledging that the person to be evangelized is always caught in concrete social and economic situations. Notwithstanding, similar challenges (liberation* theologies, e.g.) were faced with the same urgency, and Pope Paul VI had to take a stand against “the temptation to reduce the missions [of the church] to the dimensions of a simply temporal project.” Also noteworthy is the interpretation of the evangelizer, in the encyclical Evangelii nuntiandi, as first recipient of the gospel: No one can be truly qualified to transmit the gospel if he is not himself willing to be evangelized.

The mission calls for a new analysis of ecclesial practices with reflection on the different contexts and interreligious dialogue, and a redefinition of the connection between the word and social action. Moreover, it determines the style and content of all theology; it is “the mother of theology” (M. Kähler) as well as a “note” from the church (Barth*, KD IV/3, §72. 2). Every encounter between the gospel and a different culture brings forth a new intelligence of the biblical message and the church’s mission.

• Catholic Church

Vatican II: Documents conciliaires (1966), Paris.

COD, 817–1135 (DCO II/2, 1661–2300).

Paul VI (1976), Evangelii nuntiandi, Vatican City.

John-Paul II (1987), Sollicitudo rei socialis, Vatican City

John-Paul II (1991), Redemptoris missio, Vatican City.

Reports from the General Assemblies

(1962), New Delhi 1961, Neuchâtel; (1969), Rapport d’Uppsala 1968, Geneva; M. Henriet (Ed.) (1976), Briser les barrières, rapport de Nairobi 1975, Geneva; J.-M. Chappuis and R. Beaupère (1984), Rassemblés pour la vie: Rapport officiel de l’assemblée du COE Vancouver, 1983, Paris; Th. Best, M. Westphal (Ed.) (1991), Signes de l’Esprit: Rapport officiel: Septième assemblée Canberra, Geneva.

World Mission Conferences

(1973), Rapport de Bangkok, Geneva; (1980), Que ton règne vienne! Perspectives missionnaires: Rapport de Melbourne, 12–25 mai 1980, Geneva; (1982), La mission et l’évangélisation, affirmation œcuménique, Geneva; (1990), “San Antonio 1989,” Informations Évangélisation 1/1990, Paris.

Committee of Lausanne for World Evangelization

(1976), “Déclaration de Lausanne 1974,” in Au-delà des confessions, Paris, 81–92; (1989), Le Manifeste de Manille, Pasadena.

Journals

International Review of Missions, 1912–70; International Review of Mission, 1970–; The Ecumenical Review 1948–.

♦ H. de Lubac (1946), Le fondement théologique des missions, Paris.

J. Daniélou (1946), Le mystère du salut des nations, Paris.

S. Delacroix (Ed.) (1956–59), Histoire universelle des missions catholiques, 4 vols., Paris.

R. Mehl (1964), Décolonisation et missions protestantes, Paris.

J. de Santa Ana (Ed.) (1982), L'Église et les pauvres, Lausanne.
L. Newbiggin (1989), En mission sur le chemin du Christ: Perspectives bibliques, Geneva.
N. Lossky et al. (Eds.) (1991), "Mission," Dictionary of the Ecumenical Movement, Geneva, 690–96.
H. Rzepkowski (Ed.) (1992), Lexikon der Mission: Geschichte, Theologie, Ethnologie, Graz-Vienna-Cologne.
J.-F. Zorn (1993), Le grand siècle d'une mission: La mission de Paris de 1822 à 1914, Paris.

A. V. Ström et al. (1994), "Mission," TRE 23, 18–80.
H. J. Findeis et al. (1998), "Mission," etc., LThK3 7, 288–327.

FRITZ LIENHARD

See also Conversion; Inculturation; Liberation Theology; Paganism; Philosophy; Salvation; World Council of Churches

Modalism

Modalism is a modern term coined on the basis of the notion of "mode," of modality (Latin modus; Greek tropos). Under this notion are grouped various theologies that, during those centuries when Trinitarian and christological doctrines were being formulated, attempted to understand the relation of the Father* and the Son, but in a way that ended by appearing to be heterodox. Beginning with the confessions of faith* of Nicaea* and the First Council of Constantinople*, what was considered the modalist heresy took on several forms in the second and third centuries. Their common characteristic was a concern to maintain some kind of preeminence for God* the Father, something that was broadly inherited from fidelity to the one God of Judaism*. A distinction is usually made between monarchian modalism, adoptionism, and Sabellianism.

a) Monarchian Modalism. We owe the epithet "monarchians" to Tertullian* (Adv. Praxean 3. 1), who included Praxeas among them, contrary to modern opinion (see Studer 1985 and Simonetti 1993). Noetus of Smyrna, in the late second century, was perhaps the earliest representative of this manner of thinking; his disciple Epigones propagated his doctrine in Rome* in the early third century. The anonymous work Contra Noetum (before 213), as well as Tertullian and the De Trinitate of Novatian, condemn monarchianism on the grounds that, in attempting to preserve monotheism*, it does not give its proper place to the economy of salvation* or to the redemptive role of the incarnation.

Patripassianism (see Cyprian*, Ep. 73) is one of the variants of monarchianism. It maintains that "the Father suffered on the cross," but it is difficult to know which writers explicitly affirmed what is scripturally indefensible (see Slusser 1982). This concept had some influence in the late second century, particularly in Rome, but also in Italy and North Africa.

b) Adoptionism. According to adoptionism the Son is merely a man adopted by God because of his merits; and, before the incarnation*, the word* of God was an impersonal power not distinct from the Father. Although Harnack saw in the Pastor of Hermas (apostolic fathers) the archetype of adoptionist Christology*, today scholars are more cautious (Simonetti 1993). The earliest representatives of this tendency were, in the Rome of the late second century, Theodotus of Byzantium, known as the Cobbler, and his disciples (Eusebius, HE V. 28. 6), another Theodotus of Byzantium, known as the Banker, followed by Artemon (also Artemas) in the third century.

Monarchianism and adoptionism were able to blend into a more highly developed whole—for example, in the two bishops Beryl of Bostra (according to Eusebius, HE VII. 23. 1–3) and Heraclides (according to Origen, Conversation with Heraclides, SC 67). Paul of Samosatus and, in the fourth century, Marcel of An-cyrus and Bishop Photinus of Sirmium may also be classified among supporters of an adoptionist brand of Christology.

c) Sabellian Modalism (Sabellianism). Assimilated by Methodus of Olympus (Symposium 8. 10) to a patri-passian, and presented by Hilary* of Poitiers as the preeminent heretic, Sabellius was perhaps a native of Libya (Basil* of Caesarea, Ep. 9. 2; 125. 1). He was condemned by Callixtus in Rome around 220. Several ancient sources attribute to him the creation of the compound term huiopatôr, “Son-Father,” to designate the one God. After 325 the ambiguity of the word ousia, which the Council of Nicaea used in order to define the Son as consubstantial*, homoousios, meant that it could be made an equivalent of the term hypostasis, which was how the Sabellians understood it. This cast suspicion on the doctrine of Nicaea, and the Arian front had Nicaean bishops deposed under the accusation of Sabellianism. This doctrine, in any event, revived monarchianism while also giving a place to the Holy* Spirit. By favoring the term prosôpon to designate the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, the Sabellians emphasized appearance—the three prosôpa were thus only modes of the single divinity. According to other documents, sometimes attributed to the same writers (e.g., Marcel of Ancyra, according to Simonetti), prosôpon and ousia are synonyms and the Trinity* is nothing but a single prosôpon. Sabellianism thus appears in the Trinitarian debates as the opposite pole to Arianism*, and it was between these two understandings that the fathers of the church developed the definitions of Constantinople I (see Gregory* of Nyssa, Adversus Sabellium, GNO II. 1).

- J. Daniélou (1958), La théologie du judéo-christianisme, Tournai (2nd Ed. 1991, Paris).
- M. Simonetti (1975), La crisi ariana nel IV secolo, Rome.
- V. Grossi (1976), “Il titolo cristologico ‘Padre’ nel antichità cristiana,” Aug 16, 237–69.
- P. Th. Camelot (1982), “Monarchianisme,” Cath 9, col. 536–43.
- M. Slusser (1982), “The Scope of Patripassianism,” St. Patr. 17, Oxford, 169–75.
- B. Studer (1985), Gott und unsere Erlösung im Glauben der Alten Kirche, Düsseldorf.
- M. Simonetti (1993), Studi sulla cristologia del II e III secolo, Rome.

HENRI CROUZEL

See also Adoptionism; Arianism; Christ and Christology; Subordinationism; Tertullian; Unitarianism

Modernism

The word “modernism,” which came into use in Italy and France in the late 19th century, came to refer to a crisis that confronted the Catholic Church* in the early 20th century. From the perspective of Rome*, modernism was a set of doctrinal errors born out of heterodox tendencies, but the phenomenon had a broader cultural and institutional significance. In the words of E. Pulat, it was “the encounter and confrontation between a religious past, long since set in stone, and a present that had found powerful sources of inspiration elsewhere than in this past.”

From the 1880s onward, Catholics became preoccupied with adapting their church to the modern world. Many of them were aware of the gap between the teachings of the church and the nascent discipline of religious studies; similarly, a number of institutions and activities no longer seemed to meet the needs of the apostolate, in the midst of populations that had moved away from Christian practices and beliefs. The church’s position and role in society was called into question over the course of the conflict that culminated, in France, for example, in the separation of church* and state (9 December 1905). By the end of the century, political power, social life, and culture were all escaping the church’s control.

Freethinkers and anticlericals celebrated this turn of events, but Catholics, whether priests* or laypeople*, did not resign themselves to it. The years from 1880 to 1910 were characterized by a ferment of ideas and initiatives, which did not, however, form any general, organized movement: several participants in the crisis were isolated or went unheard, although there were networks of correspondence and friendship among them. Should the church change in response to developments in the world? Could it change? There was a diversity of answers to these questions.

a) Geography of the Crisis. In Germany, some decades earlier, liberal Protestantism* had attempted to reconcile new knowledge with the requirements of faith*. During the 1860s, this “German science” had induced Catholics to address the problem of the legitimate autonomy of university research in relation to the legitimate doctrinal authority of the church. Pope Leo XIII was well aware of the influence of Kantian thought (Kant*) and of German idealism (Hegel*, Schelling*), as well as of the low level of philosophical training provided within the Catholic Church. Following his accession, he thus revived instruction in the teachings of Thomas* Aquinas in the seminaries and universities, with his encyclical Aeterni Patris (4 August 1879), and supported the Catholic institutes that were founded from 1875 onward to improve the educational standards of the French clergy. In line with the pope's directives, the future Cardinal D. Mercier (1851–1926) developed in Louvain a form of Neoscholasticism that sought to integrate the progress made in physical, psychological, and social studies into the traditional expression of the faith.

In France, “progressives” (progressistes), such as Monseigneur P. Batiffol (1861–1929) in the field of history or M.-J. Lagrange OP (1855–1938) in exegesis*, made scholarly advances by mastering modern methods, but did not challenge theology. By contrast, the “modernists” (modernistes) thought that the development of scientific culture required a sort of intellectual conversion, along with a profound revision of received ideas and intellectual work within the Catholic Church. The modernist tendency may be exemplified by A. Loisy (1857–1940), in the domain of biblical criticism, and by E. Le Roy (1870–1954), a mathematician who was a disciple of Henri Bergson. “Rationalists” (rationalistes), such as J. Turmel (1859–1943) or A. Houtin (1867–1926), rejected what they saw as an illusory compromise and were prepared to renounce Catholic beliefs. Finally, those who became engaged in controversy and were then “suspected of being modernists” included the philosophers Maurice Blondel* and L. Laberthonnière (1860–1932), the historian L. Duchesne (1843–1922), and the philologist P. Lejay (1861–1920). Outside the realm of culture, the “democratic abbots,” supporters of Christian democracy* and of the journal Sillon (Furrow) by Marc Sangnier (1873–1950), were accused of “social modernism.”

France was the epicenter of the crisis, which echoed through Britain and Italy. F. von Hügel (1852–1925), an erudite layman based in London skilled in biblical criticism, religious philosophy*, and the history of spirituality, cultivated relations with other scholars, notably in Italy. He had some influence over the preacher G. Tyrrell (1861–1909), who wrote essays in apologetics, emphasized the mystical element in religion, and denounced the confusion between the Christian faith and its medieval expression. In Italy, a number of separate movements made their appearance, centered on outstanding individuals. E. Buonaiuti (1881–1946) promoted the intellectual renewal of Italian Catholicism* and the extension of the religious education of the masses. R. Murri (1860–1944) sought to develop cultural bases for an authentic Christian democracy and supported radical reforms within the church. A. Fogazzaro (1842–1917), heir to the political liberalism and religious reformism of the Risorgimento, wrote a novel, Il Santo (1905), in which he popularized the ideal of reform in opposition to the spirit of “immobilism.”

b) Issues at Stake. According to R. Aubert (Nouvelle histoire de l'Église [New History of the Church], vol. 5, p. 205):

In a matter of years, the Tridentine calm of an entire church (A. Dupront) was suddenly and almost simultaneously disrupted on a range of fundamental issues: the nature of revelation, scriptural inspiration, and religious knowledge; the personality of Christ and his true role in the origins of the church and its sacraments; the nature and function of the living tradition in the Catholic system; the limits of dogmatic development; the authority of the church's magisterium; the real meaning of the notion of orthodoxy; and the value of traditional apologetics.

Before the crisis erupted, Blondel had sought to face up to those who negated revelation and transcendence by proposing a “method of immanence,” stating that “the human order has a part in everything but does not find adequacy in anything”: the dynamism of humanity, in the full play of its faculties, calls for a superior and supernatural truth* that fulfills the truth of its nature by grace (see L'Action, 1893). It followed that there was a need for a new apologetics that could avoid the twin pitfalls of an apologia for dogma* independent of history (“extrinsicism”) and a history independent of dogma (“historicism”). This was the goal of Blondel's Lettre sur les exigences de la pensée contemporaine en matière d'apologétique et sur la méthode de la philosophie dans l'étude du problème religieux (1896; Letter on the Requirements of Contemporary Thought in Matters of Apologetics and on the Method of Philosophy in the Study of the Problem of Religion). A new trend in reflection on the Catholic tradition, concerned with the future as well as with the past, developed from this point. Laberthonnière set out to conceive a theory of moral and religious knowledge that could give due regard to the role of subjectivity in the free assent of the intellect to revealed truth (see Le problème religieux [The Problem of Religion], 1897, and Le dogmatisme moral [Moral Dogmatism], 1898). E. Le Roy returned to the problem of the meaning of dogma for a scientific mind in his article “Qu'est-ce qu'un dogme?” (What Is a Dogma?, in La Quinzaine, 16 April 1905), reprinted in Dogme et critique (1907; Dogma and Criticism).

In parallel with these discussions, the application of methods of literary and historical criticism to Holy* Scripture, as well as to the history of the origins of the church, marked the beginning of the crisis in France. Some Catholic exegetes accepted many of the results of these criticisms, while rejecting any conception of the history of Israel* and the church that eliminated the supernatural. Others, such as Loisy, did not hesitate to demand a total transformation of apologetics on “the general problems posed by Scripture, the meaning of the divine truth that it expresses, and the value of the church that preserves that truth” (R. Aubert). The publication of a French translation of A. Harnack’s lectures on The Essence of Christianity provided Loisy with the occasion to present a detailed synthesis of his system in his book L’Évangile et l’Église (The Gospel and the Church), which appeared at the end of 1902, and was backed up and explained a little later in his Autour d’un petit livre (On the Subject of a Little Book). According to Loisy himself, L’Évangile et l’Église was “primarily a historical outline and explanation of the development of Christianity, and, secondarily, a general philosophy of religion, and an attempt to interpret dogmatic formulas, official symbols, and conciliar definitions, with a view to bringing them into accord with the facts of history and the mentality of our contemporaries by sacrificing the letter to the spirit.” In the course of the controversy that followed, it quickly became apparent that, in Loisy’s view, revelation is merely “the awareness acquired by humanity from its relationship with God,” and dogmas serve to maintain “harmony between religious belief and the scientific development of humanity.” Loisy’s system presupposed a set of dualities: within the philosophy of religion, between revelation and dogma; within historical criticism, between dogma and history; and, when it came to Christology*, between the historical Jesus* and the Christ of the Catholic faith.

With considerable insight, Blondel demonstrated that Loisy’s positions implied dualism, and emphasized the true notion of tradition within the Catholic synthesis (see the series of articles, “Histoire et dogme” [History and Dogma] in La Quinzaine, 16 January, 1 February, and 16 February 1904). He thus took the problematic elaborated several years before to a new level.

c) Rome’s Condemnations and Reactions. Loisy’s “little books” were placed on the Catholic Church’s Index of Prohibited Books at the end of 1903, and refutations were published by P. de Grandmaison in Études and by Batiffol in the Bulletin de littérature ecclésiastique. In Rome, the Holy Office prepared a list of errors and set out to identify the body of doctrine that underlay the positions of various writers. On 3 July 1907, it published a decree, Lamentabili, that cataloged and condemned 65 propositions: Loisy recognized around two-thirds of these as having been taken from his writings. On 8 September the same year, Pope Pius X issued the encyclical Pascendi, in which he described various modernist “figures”—the philosopher, the believer, the theologian, the historian, and others—and then reconstructed the system of errors that they had in common. This system was said to center on two fundamental errors: agnosticism*, which denies that rational demonstration can have any value in matters of religion; and “vital immanentism,” which makes faith dependent on the religious feelings and needs of human beings. Tyrrell was excommunicated in 1907, Loisy in 1908, and more works were placed on the Index (notably, works by Duchesne, Laberthonnière, and H. Brémond). The teaching staffs of seminaries and faculties of theology were purged; an antimodernist oath was imposed in 1910; and committees of vigilance were established in the dioceses. In general, these repressive and preventative measures were accepted and obeyed. However, their impact was aggravated by the campaigns of denunciation against “integral Catholics” that altered the climate in the closing years of the pontificate of Pius X (1903–14).

d) Historical Process or Special Case? The modernist crisis erupted at the turn of the 19th and 20th centuries as an internal phenomenon within the Catholic Church, revealing the tensions between traditional theological instruction and progress in the sciences, criticism, and history, between the church’s institutions and the new aspirations, and between the church’s official position and a society that was becoming more secular (secularization*). Since the word “modernism” reappeared in the disputes that followed Vatican* II, it may be the case that, as Poulat has contended, modernism is “an authentic historical process, with the slowness” that that implies, and with a dynamism that ensures continuity despite the differences in circumstances. In La pensée de M. Loisy (Monsieur Loisy’s Thought, p. 204), J. Guittou concludes that “modernism seems to us to be a special case of a more general system, a form of thought that will return again and again in the course of the history of Catholicism whenever the intellect seeks to base the faith on the spirit of the age, instead of integrating the spirit of the age into the faith.”

- Correspondence: H. de Lubac (Ed.) (1957–65), M. Blondel–Aug. Valensin, 3 vols., Paris.
- C. Tresmontant (Ed.) (1967), M. Blondel–L. Laberthonnière, Paris.
- A. Blanchet (Ed.) (1970–71), H. Brémond–M. Blondel, 3 vols., Paris.

Modernism

- ◆ J. Rivière (1929), Le modernisme dans l'Église, Paris.
- R. Marlé (1960), Au coeur de la crise moderniste, Paris.
- É. Poulat (1962), Histoire, dogme et critique dans la crise moderniste, Paris.
- E. Poulat (1969), Intégrisme et catholicisme intégral, Tournai-Paris.
- P. Scoppola (1969), Crisi modernista e rinnovamento cattolico, Bologna.
- R. Aubert (1975), "La crise moderniste," in id. et al. (Ed.), Nouvelle histoire de l'Église, vol. 5, Paris, 200–18.
- C. Tresmontant (1979), La crise moderniste, Paris.

- A. Boland (1980), La crise moderniste, hier et aujourd'hui—un parcours spirituel, Paris.
- G. Daley (1980), Transcendence and Immanence, Oxford.
- D. Dubarle (Ed.) (1980), Le modernisme, Paris.
- E. Poulat (1982), Modernistica, Paris.
- P. Colin (1997), L'audace et le soupçon, la crise du modernisme dans le catholicisme français, 1893–1914, Paris.

CLAUDE BRESSOLETTE

See also Blondel, Maurice; Exegesis; Fundamentalism; Rationalism; Secularization; Traditionalism

Möhler, Johann Adam. See Tübingen, Schools of

Molina, Luis de. See Bañezianism-Molinism-Baianism

Molinism. See Bañezianism-Molinism-Baianism

Molinos, Miguel de. See Quietism

Monarchianism. See Modalism

Monastic Theology. See Bernard of Clairvaux

Monasticism

A. Ancient History

Confirmed by a papyrus as early as 324, the word monakhos (“monk”) entered into literature with The Life of Anthony written by Athanasius of Alexandria immediately after the latter’s death (356). Derived from the Greek monos (“unique”), the word suggests a plan for a simple life, unified by abstention from marriage* and a distancing of oneself from society* as well as by a total self-consecration to God*, who is One. After celibacy, of which the term seemed to refer initially, the idea of physical isolation took priority with Jerome (c. 342–420) (Letters 14, 6, etc.) until inner unification became the key idea in Pseudo-Dennis (Hier. eccl. VI, 1–3) and in Gregory* the Great (In I Reg. I, 61). With an original twist, Augustine* interpreted monachus as a union in charity with one’s neighbor, that is, communal life (En. Ps. 132, 6).

a) Antecedents. The most important of the cognates is monastèrion (“monastery”), which designates a monk’s abode. It can already be found in Philo (De vita contemplativa 25), applied as a sort of individual study room where certain Jewish ascetics, the “Therapists,” “isolated” themselves in order to study the Bible,* the only book admitted into this sacred place.

This precedent hints that Christian monasticism had its precursors. Aside from Philo’s Egyptian therapists, who lived a fundamentally solitary life while living in mixed groups, actual monastic communities, those of Essenes, described by Philo as well as by Flavius Josephus, also existed in Palestine toward the beginning of the Christian era. The Sectarians of Qumran, uncovered by recent discoveries near the Dead Sea, are also related to these communities.

While similar to their predecessors, Christian monks do not seem to have been indebted to them at all. In the second half of the third century monasticism appeared quite independently in the church*. Of course the term monakhos had already made its appearance around the year 140 in Thomas’s evangelical apocrypha*, but there seems to be no relation between this distant Gnostic precedent and the movement that developed in orthodox circles a century later.

Where then did monasticism come from? Apart from its deep human roots, which have produced similar phenomena elsewhere (Hinduism, Buddhism), this great Christian creation was inspired above all, if not exclusively, by the Scriptures*—even if the pagan model of the philosophical life might have played a role. At an epoch when persecutions were growing rare and then ceased entirely, the monk responded personally to the evangelical appeals that had inspired so many martyrdoms. “Selling one’s goods and giving them to the poor,” “abandoning everything,” “taking up one’s cross and following Christ*”: these watchwords were the source of Anthony’s vocation and of that of the majority of his imitators. One has to choose between love* of the world* and love of God (Jas 4:4; 1 Jn 2:15–17, and 4:4–6). “Whosoever hates his soul* in this world will keep it for eternal life*” (Jn 12:25). Those maxims and so many other similar ones from the New Testament explain for the most part a movement, which refers to them constantly.

Other referential figures can be added: Elijah and Elisha, as well as the “sons of the prophets*” Jeremiah the celibate, the solitary, the persecuted; above all, John the Baptist, the man of the desert; finally, Jesus* himself, son of the Virgin and totally chaste, who fasted in the desert and sought solitude in order to pray. A communal model should be added to these individual examples: the primitive Church of Jerusalem* and its ideal of “communion*.” All being of a single heart and a single soul, because no one owned anything privately and everything was shared mutually (Acts 4:32); such would be the ambition of the majority of the cenobitic enterprises (from koinos bios, “communal life”) that have made their mark on the history of monasticism.

b) Origins. The first biography of a monk was therefore Anthony’s. Written in Greek for Western readers, this fundamental text was quickly translated into Latin, but the only definitive version by Evagrius of Antioch, which would make its fortune in the West, wasn’t established until about the year 370. A rural proprietor in the Thebaid, Anthony “converted” around the age of 20, sold his goods, spent 15 years near his village and made contact with other ascetics; then he took the plunge that made him famous. Going into the desert, he imprisoned himself in a small abandoned fort where they brought him bread twice a year. When, after 20 years his admirers’ curiosity made him show himself, this man of about 55 years old impressed those who saw him by his self-mastery and by his gifts. But after an intensely influential period, when his abode in the desert near the Nile “became a city*,” this lover of solitude retreated further into the “inner desert,” toward the Red Sea. He died there at more than a hundred years old, mourned by everyone as the “physician of Egypt,” on which he had lavished the healings* of the body and of the soul.

Anthony was the first anchorite (from anakhôrein, “to go into a retreat”). Among his numerous imitators, the hermit Palaemon deserves a special mention for having been the master of Pachomius (c. 290–346), the founder of cenobitism. Born of pagan parents, the young Pachomius converted to Christianity during his military service, moved by the charity that the Christians had shown him. His vocation from the start was “to serve the human race,” in the steps of these charitable men. After having been initiated into ascetism* with Palaemon, he left him to make himself available to those who would come to him. After difficult beginnings marked by trials and errors, he began around the year 320 to gather monks around him whose numbers grew rapidly, so many as to populate about 15 giant monasteries. Upon his death, Pachomius left a Koinônia (“fraternity”) in upper Egypt, grouping thousands of brothers, which, despite a serious crisis, would develop even more under his successors Orsiesius and Theodore. The Rule, or rather, the four collections of “Precepts,” that he had set down in writing for this vast group, would be translated into Latin by Jerome (404) and would have its influence on several Western monastic codes of law.

c) Forms. Anthony and Pachomius created the two main types of monastic life: hermitry and cenobitism.

These two men’s histories prefigure the transfers, which would constantly occur between the two forms of monasticism. Anthony’s life was at first semicomunal, then completely solitary, but at the end it did include the role of a spiritual father. As for Pachomius, he offered a vast community gathered around him the relationship of a disciple to his master, which he had lived himself, one on one, with the hermit Palaemon.

This coming and going between cenobitism and anchoritism can be confirmed for the most part by two common phenomena. On the one hand, the great anchorites often attracted numerous disciples and thus engendered communities, often involuntary; this influence was sometimes understood as a call from God and the goal of a constructive search. On the other hand, the anchorites “derive from the Coenobia,” wrote Jerome in 384 (Letters 22, 35). This process, which the Western witnesses and theorists (Sulpicius Severus [c. 360–c. 420], Cassian [c. 360–435], the anonymous author of the Rule of the Master, Benedict [c. 480–c. 550]) would give the rigor of a law, is based on the nature of things: a communal apprenticeship should normally precede the solitary life.

Moreover, between cenobitism and hermitry in their pure forms lay many intermediate forms. There were anchorite colonies, of which the most famous in fourth-century Egypt were those of Nitria. The Cells and Scetis brought together monks who lived alone but who gathered together on Saturdays and Sundays for the Eucharist* and for feasts. A little later, in the East, the name “lauras” would be given to groups that were similar but who lived in closer contact with each other, since the homes of the solitaries bordered the same street (lavra). Another type of association of the two kinds of life was that of the hermit living near a community where he had often received his training and on which he sometimes exerted a spiritual influence while receiving its material help. Well documented in Egypt and Palestine about the year 400, this sort of symbiosis would be institutionalized by Cassiodorus (c. 485–c. 580) in Vivarium, where Mount Castellum’s solitude was adjacent to the coenobium, and many centuries later by a Saint Romuald (c. 950–1027) in Camaldoli.

Several of these phenomena are illustrated by Benedict of Nursia’s life and work. A student in Rome* at the beginning of the sixth century, when he decided to become a monk, he was given the habit by a cenobite called Romanus and settled secretly in a cave near the latter, who fed him with bread from his own ration. In an original way (Romanus’s community and his abbot were unaware of the nearby young hermit’s existence) that was a case of symbiosis between the two lives. After three years, the clandestine anchorite was discovered, and a monastery in the vicinity took him as its abbot. This first abbacy ended badly, but, once he had reverted back into solitude, Benedict saw dozens of disciples come to him, for whom he organized 12 small monasteries of which he retained the administrative duties: a typical example of a hermit engendering cenobitism. Finally, in his Rule for the Monks, probably written later at Monte Cassino, Benedict set down right from the first chapter the traditional doctrine that required a long cenobitic apprenticeship before moving on to a solitary life. Moreover, the latter life had retained a certain attraction for him as suggests his biographer Gregory of Nyssa, who reported that the abbot of Monte Cassino did not sleep in the communal dormitory but lived in a separate tower, where he used to pray alone at night.

Excluded by Basil* as contrary to the Gospels*, solitary monastic life would, however, be generally considered the height of monastic renunciation. Elijah and John the Baptist are models of it. Less naturally accepted today perhaps, hermitry's Christian authenticity was only rarely challenged in the early centuries.

d) The Goal and the Means. According to classical viewpoint, which regards hermitry as the term of the monastic goal, monks began by purifying themselves in the coenobium through the "active life" before leading the "contemplative life" in solitude. Such was the schema followed in the majority of his Institutions and Conferences by John Cassian. The "active life" consisted of combating the eight main vices, following the methodical list drawn up by Evragius Ponticus (346–99) (greed, lust, anger, avarice, sadness, acidie [spiritual discouragement], vanity, and pride) in order to achieve purity of heart, the condition for entering the Kingdom*: "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." Already, from this point, apatheia (mastery of the passions*) gave access to contemplation*. The battle against the vices took priority in communal life, while contemplation flourished in solitude. Another comparative schema laid greater stress on cenobitism, acknowledging its capacity for developing two major virtues*: abandonment of one's own will and absence of any thought for the morrow (Cassian, Conf. 19, 8).

The asceticism by which the monk purified himself especially stressed food consumption (fasts, abstinence, rationing), sleep (vigil), and the use of words (silence). Born of faith*, this asceticism led to charity. It was in order to devote himself to charity that the monk separated himself from the world. This separation, in which Basil saw a requirement imposed by God's love, led, among other signs, to wearing the distinctive habit.

A conscious and constant relation with God: this ideal of the monk is called prayer*. This prayer draws its sustenance from the Bible, read and learned by heart for two or three hours per day, then recited constantly during the periods of manual work. The monk answers and listens to the voice of God with prayer as often as possible and continuously in this way. As for the moments set aside for prayer, in Egypt there were two (morning and evening), and more in other places, where a canon of seven daily prayer periods would end by being set, this number suggested by a word of the Psalmist (Psalms 118, 164). At these day and night offices, every psalm* was followed by a silent prayer, which diminished little by little and finally disappeared.

The will to "pray constantly" (1 Thes 5:17) did not preclude work. The monk had the duty to perform it, so much as to earn his living and to give alms as to avoid idleness, the soul's enemy. On that point, Paul's injunctions and example would win out over a Syrian movement, which understood his call to constant prayer too literally. The movement of the Messalians ("Praying people") of Syria would, however, produce in Constantinople the perpetual praise performed by the Acemetes ("Those who do not go to bed"), who relayed each other in the choir day and night, and similar attempts at laus perennis (perpetual praise) in a few of the big Western monasteries in the seventh century.

e) Two Forms of Communal Life. In the cenobitic environment a typical development that took its inspiration from the New Testament was frequently seen: a group of disciples gathered together around their master transform into a fraternal communion. In the first type of association, the unifying principle was each member's relation to its leader; between them, the subordinates were united only by their common relationship with their leader. Favoring the vertical and hierarchical schema, this kind of community was like a school or a troop. But often, as time passed, there also arose a concern about the horizontal relations between individuals. Thus they progressed from a school to a communion.

An evolution of this type appears in Pachomius's code of laws. Its first three volumes (Institutia, Iudicia, Praecepta) mentioned only obedience to rule and to superiors, while the last one (Leges) displayed a new concern about peace and harmony among the brothers. Similarly, the "fundamental pact" of the Egyptian coenobium described by Jerome in 384 (Letters 22, 35) implied everyone's obedience to the superiors, whose educative acts they unilaterally praised, without saying a word about fraternal relations. Taking up this bit a little later, Augustine took special care to make an explicit reference to the Church of Jerusalem (De mor. I, 67). Between Lérins's first two Rules, that of the Four Fathers and the “Second Rule,” just as between the two great Italian Rules of the sixth century, the Rule of the Master and the one by Benedict, similar contrasts can be seen.

This kind of law goes back to the origins of Christianity. The group of the Twelve was initially a school, where each disciple had been called or attracted by that master who was Jesus. Before he died, the latter gave to each one the “new commandment” of mutual love, whence flowed new relationships. Henceforth, the “teaching of the apostles*,” which continued Christ’s teaching, engendered communion (Acts 2:44). Without giving it any thought, it seems that monastic circles often followed the same process, which reflected a religious society’s very nature. The primordial relationship to God and to his representatives was the first essential; then, the awareness of spiritual unity and obedience to the law of love, just as much as the experience of a difficult communal life, caused attention to be paid to the relations among the brothers.

f) The Coenobium and Its Scriptural Models. In the Rule of the Master, the monastery is called the “school of Christ.” When Benedict picked it up again, this definition made the coenobium a continuation of the group of the Twelve, where Christ was represented by the Abbot. The division of many communities into groups of 10, while reminiscent of the Roman army, also looked back to the model of Israel* in the desert. The same can be said of the “houses” and “tribes” of Pachomius’s koinônia. Basil’s favorite image was Christ’s body. This Pauline metaphor was also allied to the image of the community in Jerusalem, so often evoked by monastic legislators. For the Master, who hardly gave a thought to the primitive church of the Acts, the model instead was the church of his own time, since the monastery’s hierarchy* was compared to the clergy. Elsewhere, and particularly in Pachomius’s Rule, the monastic tradition was conceived as a replica of the great ecclesial tradition*.

g) Obedience: Its Forms and Motives. Whether he was an anchorite’s disciple or a member of a coenobium, the monk had to obey. This obligation gave rise to many commentaries. Certain people, like Augustine, invoked texts from the New Testament that order children to obey their parents, and the faithful to obey their pastors. Others instead thought of Christ, viewed as the one obeyed through his representatives (Lk 10:16), or as the one who was obedient to his Father* even unto death* (Jn 6:38; Ph 2:14). Whether as a commanding leader or as a model of obedience, Christ gave this virtue a mystical character that goes far beyond the simple necessities of communal life.

Obedience was required first of all from the novice, who had everything to learn. But it was also commended to the more advanced monk, who through obedience renounced his own will just as Christ accepted death through his obedience. When applied to the superiors, their obedience was given to God, whom they represented. But it could also be mutual, with no other motive than humble charity.

h) Paths of Perfection. In the Benedictine Rule, which the Carolingian age would make the common charter of Western cenobitism, obedience was not viewed in isolation, but taken as one of the aspects of a general trend toward humility. From the initial fear* of God up to the perfect love that drives away fear, the monk ascended by humbling himself, according to the evangelical paradox, and this path of humility that the Master and Benedict borrowed from Cassian passed through the stages of obedience and patience, self-effacement and submission, to renunciation of speech and laughter. In this program, the two key virtues were obedience and taciturnity. The first consisted of humility in deeds; the second represented humility in speech.

i) Clergy and Sacraments. In the Life of Anthony, although he was a bishop, Athanasius never mentioned the Eucharist*, of which the saint seems to have been deprived for long periods. At the end of the sixth century, however, Apollonius and the anchorites who gathered around him met daily at the ninth hour to take communion before they ate, and Jerome’s coenobium in Jerusalem keenly felt their need for a priest who could consecrate the Eucharist. In sixth-century Italy, the Master’s entirely lay communities would be ministered to by those of Benedict, which included priests* and clerics*. The conventual Mass, however, would not become a daily event until much later. During the week, a simple communion service preceded the meal at the Master’s, and probably also at Benedict’s.

At the period when the monasteries tended to provide themselves with the clergy necessary for celebration of the Eucharist, bishops and their clerics adopted a quasi-monastic way of life. During the second half of the sixth century, Eusebius (†371) in Vercell, Martin (†397) in Tours, and Augustine in Hippo set the example for the hybridizations whose fruitfulness Jerome himself acknowledged in some of his letters. Monasticism and the clergy were also allied in the missionary enterprises of monks like Columban (c. 543–615) and so many other Irish or Anglo-Saxon islanders, whose original aim was to “peregrinate” like Abraham far from their native land.

j) From the Cell to the Dormitory. Finally, speaking again of the most common practice, we should note an important change that occurred about the year 500 in the majority of monasteries, as much in the East as in the West. From its anchorite origins, cenobitism had retained the practice of living in individual cells where the monks spent their time alone with God. Now, to remedy certain drawbacks of a moral nature, at that period cells were replaced by a communal dormitory. Communal life thus lost an element of solitary contemplation that had made it akin to hermitry. It was that integrated community life that for a long time codified the Rule of Saint Benedict, until cells reappeared at the height of the Middle Ages among the Carthusians, and later among the Benedictines themselves.

The dying days of antiquity therefore opted modestly for a monastery more concerned with transparency and regularity (disappropriation) than with meditation and leisure given over to contemplation. It was a acknowledgment that the monk was a weak being, and that cenobitism was an institution forever threatened with decadence, in line with a certain historic pessimism that was particularly evident in Benedict and that provoked an appeal on his part to the good faith of the most generous so that they might go beyond the overly lax common norms and thus come closer to perfection.

- H. Weingarten (1877), “Der Ursprung des Mönchtums im nachkonstantinischen Zeitalter,” ZKG 1, 1–35, 545–74.
- K. Heussi (1936), Der Ursprung des Mönchtums, Tübingen.
- P. Cousin (1959), Précis d’histoire monastique, Paris.
- P. Cousin (1961), Théologie de la vie monastique, Paris.
- A. de Vogüé (1961), La communauté et l’abbé dans la Règle de saint Benoît, Paris.
- D.J. Chitty (1966), The Desert a City, Oxford.
- A. de Vogüé (1971), “Sub regula vel abbate: Étude sur la signification théologique des règles monastiques anciennes,” CCist 33, 209–41.
- G.M. Colombás (1974), El monacato primitivo, vol. I–II, Madrid.
- A. Guillaumont (1979), Aux origines du mon. chrétien: Pour une phénoménologie du mon., SpOr 30.
- W. Dircks (1982), Die Antwort der Mönche, Frankfurt.
- A. de Vogüé (1985), Les règles monastiques anciennes (400–700), Tournai.
- C.S. Frank (1988), Geschichte des christlichen Mönchtums, Darmstadt.
- A. de Vogüé (1991–), Histoire littéraire du mouvement monastique dans l’Antiquité. Première partie: le mon. latin, Paris (vol. I to V published in 1998).
- H. Holtze (1992), Erfahrung und Theologie im frühen Mönchtum, Göttingen.
- A. de Vogüé (1998), Le monachisme en Occident avant saint Benoît, Bégrolles-en-Mauge.

ADALBERT DE VOGÜÉ

B. Theological Stakes

A well-known phenomenon in the history of religions, and a phenomenon lacking in the earliest Christian experience*, monasticism succeeded in showing an extremely pregnant theological sense. Its founding word was anchoritism: the monk in fact appears as a person who disappears, who abandons the city and the company of men. What he leaves or what he wants to leave bears a name that covers a theological concept, the world. Considered in Pauline and Johannine terms as the sphere of decadent existence, since it had compromised with sin, the world is in fact that which is proper to flee and is nothing more than that. To break with the world is therefore an elementary Christian task: this break is nothing more than that elementary task. First of all, therefore, anchoritism should refer to a spiritual deed: the theological life lived “in Christ*” is as such victorious over the world, and as such an act of exodus and of joining an eschatological community: anchoritism’s spiritual reality takes precedence over the topological reality that the monastery gives it. It does not follow that monastic anchoritism might be a naïveté or an aberration (that it might be confusing existential distancing with spatial distancing). For if any one trait is constant in the monastic experience it is indeed the fact that the world weighs just as heavily on man in the desert as in the midst of a city. In the solitude that he finds, the monk has no privileged right to possess peace* of the soul* and of the heart.

His experience is not that of an otium reserved for whoever has taken leave definitively of the world: it is the ascetic experience of a labor to achieve conversion*. The paradox of the symbolic distancing that is life in the desert is thus its cruel emphasis on distances that have not been taken: the monastic experience is first of all one of temptation*.

With the proviso that that fact be acknowledged, and clearly acknowledged, it is then possible to do full justice to the monastic plan. The negative concept of anchoritism is counterbalanced by its positive images of the “angelic life” led by those who labor at perpetual praise*. As the heir to the Greco-Roman philosopher of antiquity, the monk presents himself as the man who lives life itself, life as it deserves to be lived by a man (Balthasar* 1961). And then the organization of a monastic anthropology* that is identical to an eschatological anthropology can be seen. Logic in action is therefore a logic of anticipation. Negatively speaking, the monk is the man who refuses to incarnate historical images of man's humanity: positively speaking, he is the man whose deeds reveal a certain hold over the final destiny in the present time. His celibacy sets him apart from those who, in the sequence of the generations, assure humanity's history*; but it also makes him the image, in the period before death, of a complete man who transcends in his flesh the differences between the sexes (Mt 22, 30 apr., hōs angeloī and isangeloī). His silence seems like the renunciation of an eminent form of human experience, the intersubjectivity achieved in the element of language—but this silence is not dumbness, and while accusing the daily use of words of being just verbiage, it also has the role of restoring man to his most human state, his role as listener to the divine word*. The cenobite's obedience deprives him of his own will and falls under the suspicion to which are exposed all alienated behaviors; but it is also a christological reality, a kenotic deed that restores the will to a sense that it does not possess in the limits of the world, and which is its eschatological secret. The monk's poverty makes him marginal and troubling, because it stipulates that the right to poverty is more human than any right to property*; but it is also a kenotic behavior lived in imitation of God who made himself poor (2 Cor 8:9).

Lastly, the existence of a fraternal community devoted to incessant praise is the purest eschatological sign that the monastic project owns: in a period of temporary realities, the monk appears in it as the witness to the definitive, to what does not die. The life that wants to be totally liturgical is the present icon (and the only possible illustration) of an eternity within man's grasp; and communal life where the neighbor has no other identity than the theological identity of a brother proves that man's being* is a being of communion*, and proves moreover that communion is not a reality within the grasp of the world, thus suggesting ways of becoming worthy of everlasting life.

The project's "theoretic splendor" (G. Bedouelle) is undeniable; it also constitutes its paradoxical weakness. The monastic tradition* has made its own the beatitude* of the pure in heart, "who will see God" (Mt 5:8). By conceiving the ambition of attaining peace, hēsukhia, it also wants to share in the eschatological joys. But if the "desert" or the monastery wants to display itself as the domain of an experience intended to subvert any hold over man that the world might have, and if the monk, in this sense, is among those who try to take possession of the Kingdom by force (Mt 11:12), the desire to symbolize the final destiny does not have the power to make real what it symbolizes. The eschatological meanings unfolded by the monastic experience cannot therefore mask that, like all Christian experiences, it has a pre-eschatological reality, and that the first monastic requirement is the eminently historical one of the "conversion of morals." If the monk sets himself the goal of living life itself, it must also be understood that the logic of his experience does not aim at the definitive except by being constantly at war with the weaknesses, temptations, and sins that constitute the temporary fabric. And Protestantism's objection—in which the monastery is the Pelagian enterprise of men and women trying ascetically to take possession of the good of which, by definition, is to be granted only by God—can only be answered as monastic spirituality being a spirituality of humility and of openness to grace*: "no man makes himself a monk, he is made a monk by a force which does not come from himself" (Theophanes the Recluse [1815–94]). If the monk reveals no immoderation, if the project of a vita angelica is neither an arrogance nor an absurdity, it is—and it is only—because the monk knows himself to be all the more a sinner in that "the work" at which he labors, opus Dei, is holy work. Only the humble man can assign himself the dangerous mission of symbolizing the eternal in the temporal, for only the humble man can let the sublime symbolism of his deeds judge the empirical person who performs these deeds. In the person of Anthony the Great, every candidate to the monastic experience is set the example of the shoemaker from Alexandria who prayed by repeating: "I alone shall perish, all will be saved."

In the end, monasticism's spiritual secret is its ecclesiological secret. In fact the monk tries to take leave of the world only to exist in the formal role of the being-in-the-church; and his prayer* therefore is less his own work than the church*'s work, Ecclesia orans. Monastic life affirms that the being-in-communion is the full realization of the being-with, of the Mitdasein, which describes man's relationship in the world with man. This life must also affirm that the particular monastic community itself exists only in the total communion of the whole church. The monastic project must explain itself in terms of vocation, and this vocation is the double call, of God and of the church—above all, the latter's call should not be forgotten. It is really from the church, understood in the linked and hierarchized totality of its communion, that the monk receives the mission to pray for all men, and to praise God on behalf of those who do not do so or do so rarely. Then can one understand that his entry into the ecclesial community might allow the monk to also take on, paradoxically but in a perfectly exact sense, the clothing of the apostle*.

“The institutions fully devoted to contemplation* . . . contribute to the greatness of the people* of God by the abundant fruits of holiness*, they attract the people by their example and procure their growth by a secret apostolic fecundity, arcana fecunditate apostolica” (Vatican* II, PC, §7).

- C. Marmion (1922), Le Christ, idéal du moine, Namur-Paris.
- L. Bouyer (1950), Le sens de la vie monastique, Paris-Turnhout.
- H. U. von Balthasar (1961), “Philosophie, Christentum, Mönchtum,” in Sponsa Verbi, Einsiedeln, 349–87.
- G. M. Colombás (1961), Paradis et vie angélique, Paris.
- T. M. Cannon, G. Traub (1969), The Desert and the City: An Interpretation of the History of Christian Spirituality, London.

- G. M. Colombás (1975), El monacato primitivo, vol. 2: La espiritualidad, Madrid.
- L. Gutiérrez Vega (1976), Teología sistemática de la vida religiosa, Madrid.
- A. de Vogüé (1977), La règle de saint Benoît, vol. VII: Comm. doctrinal et spirituel, SC 186.
- G. O. Girardi (1979), La vita religiosa: Teologia della vita religiosa, Naples.
- J. M. Lozano (1981), La sequela di Cristo: Teologia storico-sistemática della vita religiosa, Milan.
- P. Miquel (1986), La voie monastique, Bégrolles-en-Mauges, 11–58.
- A. M. Triacca, C. Andronikoff, et al. (1989), Liturgie, conversion et vie monastique, BEL.S 48, 73 Sq.
- B. Calati (1994), Sapienza monastica, saggi di storia, spiritualità e problemi monastici, StAns 117, Rome.

JEAN-YVES LACOSTE

See also Communion; Philosophy; Religious Life

Monogenesis/Polygenesis

a) Theological and Scientific Definitions. In the strict theological sense, monogenesis is the doctrine according to which all of humanity has its beginnings in one unique couple* created by God*. Uncontested during most of Christian history, in so much that it alone seemed compatible with the Holy* Scripture, this doctrine was questioned in the 17th century by I. de La Peyrère (1594–1676), who induced the existence of “Preadamites” from a singular reading of Romans 5:12ff. and saw the different human races* as many distinct species resulting from independent creations*. These extreme polygenetic concepts have been used as a basis for some racist theories, justifying slavery (J.-C. Calhoun, Liberty* B), then racial segregation.

At one time it was intended to distinguish a couple of theological terms (monogenesis/polygenesis) and a couple of scientific notions, monophyletism/polypyletism (the monophyletic hypothesis attributes to a given species one evolutionary class—unique phylum). In fact, today this last hypothesis is often considered as a “monogenesis” on the scientific level, in so far as it gives a common “spatio-temporal cradle” to all of humanity. The theological understanding of this makes it possible to speak of monogenesis in a larger sense.

b) Data of Positive Science. Today, the strict biological unicity of the human species is no longer contested. For 30,000 years, all human beings around the world are of the one type sapiens sapiens, whose monophyletic origin presently seems more than likely, even if it remains difficult to define precisely. The genetic, reproductive, and molecular unicity of the modern human is complete and without possible mixture. This was not always the case, however: during some 60,000 years, two distinct types of Homo sapiens coexisted, possibly without mixing, at least in Palestine (neandertalensis and sapiens sapiens, both issued from Homo erectus). As to strict monogenesis (one original couple), it seems difficult for science to make a pronouncement. If the essential passages were made by extremely thin “stalks,” according to Teilhard’s expression, one can hardly reconstitute them. Some people, however, argue that great mutations have an individual genetic beginning. Supporting this thesis, a recent study on the levels of divergence of mitochondrial (nonchromosomal) DNA transmitted purely through the maternal line has been invoked. Heavily discussed and no doubt contestable calculations have led to the conclusion of a singular origin of humanity, which would descend from an “African Eve” dating some 250,000 years. But these are, at the moment, speculations.

c) Theological Intelligence. To avoid all confusion, it is necessary to distinguish as much as possible the theological (theology*) question from that of the positive sciences. The Biblical data (Bible*) of the first three chapters of Genesis indicate a deep community of nature in the human species, all issued from the same act of creation proceeding from divine love*, and thus an essential fraternity and equality between all human beings—which is radically incompatible with the ideas of La Peyrère. They do not impose a strictly monogenetic interpretation (unicity of the original couple). In the Catholic Church*, the theological difficulty comes more from the transmission “by propagation, not by imitation” of the original sin*, as defined by the Council of Trent* (DS 1513) and recalled by Pius XII in his encyclical Humani Generis (1950, DS 3897). For Catholics (Catholicism*) this allowed the open discussion of the theory of evolution* of species—applied to the origin of the human body (DS 3896)—but not of the unicity of the original couple, considered as necessary for a correct interpretation of the original sin. It is rather more a matter of being warned about the possible consequences of an adventurous “conjuncture,” than a clear condemnation of all types of polygenesis. It is significant that the new Catechism of the Catholic Church (1992) recalls with force the unity of nature and the essential fraternity between all human beings, without alluding on this point to the encyclical Humani Generis (CEC 356–61): in this respect, the question is thus open in the Roman Church as in the other great Christian confessions.

In conclusion, the most probable position to the diverse points of view evoked seems to be that of a monogenesis in a broad sense—a single evolvable phylum biologically incarnating the essential unity of nature today’s humanity—without being able to make a pronouncement on the question of the originating couple.

- K. Rahner (1954), Schriften zur Theologie 1, Einsiedeln, 253–322.
- P. Teilhard de Chardin (1955), Le phénomène humain, Paris.
- P. Teilhard de Chardin (1956), Le groupe zoologique humain, Paris.
- T. G. Dobzhansky (1962), Mankind Evolution: The Evolution of the Human Species, New Haven.
- A. M. Dubarle (1967), Le péché originel dans l'Écriture, New Ed., Paris.
- B. Chiarelli (1979), L'origine dell'uomo, Bari.
- J. Reichholf (1991), L'émergence de l'homme, Paris.
- St. Parker (1992), L'aube de l'humanité, Fribourg (Switzerland).

MARC LECLERC

See also Adam; Evolution; Race; Sciences of Nature

Monophysitism

The term “Monophysitism” (from monos, “sole,” and physis, “nature”) designates the position of those who attribute to Christ* “a single nature.” But it is important to distinguish at least two types of Monophysitism. One, which was represented in particular by the monk Eutyches, implies a certain assimilation between the human nature and the divine nature of Christ, so that the divine absorbs the human rather than leaving to it its specific character. The other, although opposed to the “diphysite” language of Chalcedon* (that is, to the language of the “two natures”), recognizes in the humanity of Christ all the characteristics appropriate to a human nature. The former is contrary to Christian orthodoxy, the latter is not. Judgment must therefore be exercised between the positions that in the past were associated with Monophysitism, and this judgment continues today in the framework of the dialogue between the Chalcedonian churches and the Monophysite churches.

a) Monophysitism of Eutyches. By the last decades of the fourth century, Apollinarianism* had opened the way to Monophysite language by attributing to Christ “a single incarnate nature from God* the Word” (Ad Jovianum, in TU, 1904, 251). Certainly, a similar formula was later used by Cyril* of Alexandria with a fully orthodox meaning. But Apollinarius in fact believed that the divine Logos had replaced the human soul* or human spirit of Christ, which already implied a certain confusion between the humanity and the divinity of the incarnate Word.

Monophysitism (as a heresy*) found its most radical expression shortly before the middle of the fifth century. Its principal representative, the monk Eutyches, was at the head of a large monastery and had attained considerable influence at the court of Constantinople. He presented himself as a fierce opponent of Nestorianism* and ceaselessly repeated that it was necessary to recognize “a single nature of the incarnate Word.” He was to be harshly judged by some of his contemporaries, who saw him as an ignorant and obstinate old man. But his ideas became sufficiently widespread to provoke a refutation by Theodoret in 447 in The Beggar (which did not, however, mention Eutyches). This was followed by the intervention of Patriarch Flavian of Constantinople, who summoned the accused monk before a synod* in 448. Eutyches, while saying that he accepted the humanity of Christ, declared that his flesh was not consubstantial* with ours; and, above all, he unwaveringly maintained the same formula: “I confess that before the union Our Lord was of two natures, but after the union of only one nature.” Eutyches was then excommunicated. But he had the support of the emperor Theodosius and, in spite of the intervention of Pope Leo in his Tome of Leo, was rehabilitated in 449 at the tumultuous meeting that was later to be called “the robbery of Ephesus.” In 451 the Council of Chalcedon* condemned Eutyches’s doctrine and opposed to it the famous definition according to which Christ is “recognized in two natures, without confusion, without change . . . the difference between the natures being in no way abolished because of the union, the specificity of each nature being rather preserved.” Eutyches had of course claimed reliance on Cyril of Alexandria, but this reference was deceptive. For when Cyril said “a single nature of the incarnate Word,” he understood “nature” in the sense of individual and concrete existence, and his doctrine corresponded in essence with that of Chalcedon, which, in different terminology, recognized in Christ “a single hypostasis.” But in Eutyches the unity of nature implied the absorption of human nature by divine nature. This position, on the pretext of fighting Nestorianism, lost sight of the specific nature of the humanity assumed by Christ: it was in fact a new form of Docetism*.

b) Monophysitism after Chalcedon. The very ambiguity of the expression “a single nature” was the source of many conflicts in the period following Chal-cedon. The supporters of Cyril remained convinced that the expression should be maintained at all costs; but while some understood it as Eutyches had, others understood it in an orthodox sense and opposed in good faith the Chalcedon language of the two natures, which appeared to them to be a concession to Nestorianism. Many monks in particular pointed out that the formula “a single nature” preserved the absolute divinity of the Savior. In addition, religious motives were joined by political and ecclesial motives, for Monophysitism was particularly widespread in Egypt and Syria, whereas Western regions and Asia Minor were dominated by the Chalcedonians. It also happened that patriarchal sees were held sometimes by Chalcedonian bishops and sometimes by Monophysite bishops, in an atmosphere often marked by confused ideas and violent passions.

In 457 the Monophysite Timothy Aelurus became patriarch of Alexandria. Another Monophysite, Peter the Fuller, became patriarch of Antioch soon thereafter and introduced into the liturgy* the expression “holy God . . . who has been crucified for us.” In 482 Emperor Zeno, advised by the patriarch Acacius, proposed a compromise formula, the Henotics, which condemned both Eutyches and the defenders of Chalcedon. But this formula was rejected by the diphsites and condemned by the pope, who excommunicated Acacius (484). Monophysitism nevertheless continued to spread. It was supported by several theologians, such as Philoxenus of Mabbug and especially Severus of Antioch. The latter understood “a single nature” in the sense of “a single hypostasis” and rejected the “in two natures” of Chalcedon, which seemed to him to imply the erroneous affirmation of two hypostases. However, from 527 onward Emperor Justinian became a fervent defender of “neo-Chalcedonianism”: wishing to restore everywhere the faith* of Chalcedon (two natures in one hypostasis), he tried at the same time to win over the supporters of Monophysitism by reiterating the anathemata of Cyril against Nestorius and by imposing a formula that had been advocated by Scythian monks: “The one of the Trinity* suffered in the flesh.” But when his efforts failed he exiled the Monophysite bishops. One of them, James Baradeus, consecrated new bishops in the East; thus Monophysites were given the name “Jacobites,” whereas the Chalcedonians were called “Melkites” (that is, “imperial”). Justinian once again tried to win over the Monophysites at the Second Council of Constantinople* in 553, and his successor Justin II in turn tried a policy of openness. But the Monophysites, despite their internal divisions, maintained or consolidated their own positions. During the debates provoked by monotheism* in the seventh century, Emperor Heraclius published a new compromise document. But the Arabs had already invaded Syria and Egypt. They accommodated the Monophysite populations, who found their domination preferable to the pressures of the empire. In any event these populations were to survive down to the present, despite a history that turned out to be often difficult and troubled.

c) Monophysite Churches Today. Monophysite churches, known as “pre-Chalcedonian,” are divided into four groups: the Coptic Orthodox Church, that is, the Christians of Egypt who adopted Monophysitism; the Ethiopian Monophysite Church; the Armenian Orthodox or “Gregorian” Church, which includes the Church of Etchmiadzin and the Church of Cilicia; and the Syrian Orthodox or “Jacobite” Church, which in turn is divided into two branches, that of Syria and that of southern India.

For some years, efforts have been made toward doctrinal agreement. Meeting in Addis Ababa in 1965, leaders of Monophysite churches proposed to open a dialogue with the churches from which they had been separated. In 1971 the Syrian patriarch of Antioch, Ignatius Jakub III, signed a declaration with Pope Paul VI recognizing that their respective communities, despite divergences in language, professed the same faith with respect to the Word made flesh. In 1973 an analogous declaration was published by Paul VI and the Coptic patriarch Chenuda III; the same basic agreement was expressed again in 1984, at the meeting between Pope John Paul II and the Syrian patriarch Ignace Zacca I Ivas. Common declarations were also made by John Paul II and the Armenian patriarch Karekin I in 1996 and then by John Paul II and the Armenian catholicos of Cilicia Aram I in 1997. In addition an official dialogue has been established between the Monophysite churches and the Orthodox Church, first in Chambésy in 1985, and then in the Egyptian monastery of Anba Bichoï in 1989, and again in Chambésy in 1990 (see Towards Unity: The Theological Dialogue between the Orthodox Church and the Oriental Orthodox Church, Geneva, 1998).

Nonetheless, all difficulties have not been resolved, not only because the various churches must still continue their work of doctrinal clarification, but because even today they give evidence of many divergences in their liturgical and pastoral traditions.

- M. Jugie (1913), “Eutychès,” DThC 5, 1582–1609.
- M. Jugie (1928), “M.,” DThC 10, 2216–51.
- J. Lebon (1951), “La christologie du m. syrien,” in A. Grillmeier, H. Bacht (Ed.), Das Konzil von Chalkedon: Geschichte und Gegenwart, Würzburg, I, 425–580.
- R. Janin (1952), “Églises orientales,” Cath. 3, 1464–71.
- P.-Th. Camelot (1961), Éphèse et Chalcedoine, Paris.
- W. H. C. Frend (1972), The Rise of the Monophysite Movement, Cambridge.
- F.-X. Murphy, P. Sherwood (1974), Constantinople II et III, Paris.
- J. Pelikan (1974), The Christian Tradition: A History of the Development of Doctrine, vol. II: The Spirit of Eastern Christendom (600–1700), Chicago, chap. 2.
- L. Perrone (1980), La chiesa di Palestina e le controversie cristologiche, Brescia.
- J. Liébaert (1982), “M.,” Cath. 9, 576–83.
- G. Zananiri, “Monophysites (Églises),” ibid., 583–86.
- M. Simonetti (1983), “Monofisiti,” Dizionario patristico e di antichità cristiane, 2291–97.
- B. Dupuy (1986), “Où en est le dialogue entre l’Orthodoxie et les Églises dites monophysites?” Ist. 31, 357–70.
- B. Dupuy (1990 a), “‘La déclaration approuvée’ d’Anba Bichoï (24 juin 1989),” Ist. 34, 137–46.
- B. Dupuy (1990 b), “L’Église syrienne d’Antioche des origines à aujourd’hui,” ibid., 171–88.
- T. Y. Malaty (1990), “La christologie de l’Église copte: Mia phusis tou theou logou sesarkomenè,” Ist. 34, 147–58.
- P. Allen (1994), “Monophysiten,” TRE 23, 219–33.
- B. Sesboüé (Ed.) (1994), Histoire des dogmes, t. I: Le Dieu du salut, Paris, 417–28.

MICHEL FÉDOU

See also Christ and Christology; Hypostatic Union; Monothelitism/Monoenergism

Monotheism

I. Origin and Definition

Monotheism, defined in the Evangelisches Kirchelexikon as “the acknowledgment and adoration of a single God,” is distinguished from monolatry (worship of one god) and henotheism (acknowledgment of the supremacy of one God). In his Natural History of Religion (1767), Hume declares that polytheism is more primitive, and his view has become the prevailing one.

However, Wilhelm Schmidt (1912) argues that polytheism is a degeneration from the original cult of one God. The “sense of the numinous” posited by Rudolf Otto implies an undifferentiated deity*. Mircea Eliade notes that the sky-god (necessarily single) is often considered the supreme god, although he is worshipped only in extremis.

MARK J. EDWARDS

II. Biblical Theology

1. Old Testament

The Old Testament starts with Genesis 1:1 and its differentiation between God* and the world*; and the creator and the creation*. While it does not, of course, present the background to biblical monotheism, this passage fixes the limits within which it is to be understood.

In the Old Testament, certain unrelated representations or traditions are transposed onto the one God as a result of the absolute requirements of biblical faith*. Certain divine names, such as El Olam (“God of Eternity*, Everlasting God”) (Gn 21:33, 14:18ff., and 22; Ps 46:5f., etc.), may have been preserved because the ancient proper name ‘El could take on an appellative sense (“God”) and function as a surname or attribute of the single God YHWH.

We may distinguish six aspects or levels in the historical development or the objective content of this knowledge of faith:

a) Witness to the Unique Bond between the God YHWH and a Particular Group. Various fundamental traditions in the Book* of Exodus (Ex 3:14f., 18:12, 19:16ff., 24:10f.) attest to the unique and reciprocal relationship between a human group and YHWH, the God “of Israel” (Jgs 5:4f.; Dt 33:2).

b) God’s Superiority over Other Celestial Powers. Such powers (Ps 89:6ff.) are subordinated to him, honor him, and execute his wishes (e.g., Ps 29, 47, 93, and see 103:19ff.; Is 6; Jb 1–2).

c) Contribution of the Prophets in the Ninth and Eighth Centuries.* Elijah is already unwilling to restrict himself to defending the exclusivity of the faith (1 Kgs 18:21 and 36f.); without absolutely rejecting the existence of foreign gods, he asserts that in Israel* the one God alone is the rescuer on whom diseases and cures, life and death*, depend (e.g., 2 Kgs 1:3 and 6; see Hos 4:12ff.; Jer 2:27f.). Like the Decalogue, which is probably of a later date, Hosea links God’s declaration that “I am the Lord your God” with the formulation of the exclusive relationship that results from it: “You know no God but me, and besides me there is no savior” (Hos 13:4; see 12:10). The prophet Isaiah (2:17; see 31:3) affirms this exclusivity in the form of a universal prediction: “The pride of Men must crumble. . . and on this day, the Lord alone will be exalted.”

d) Legal Formulas. The relationship between humanity and the one God is developed within the law as a principle or an injunction. Its most ancient expression is probably to be found in the “book of the covenant” (Ex 22:19), with its reference to the consequence that follows from transgressing it (the expulsion of the culprit). Here, the prohibition concerns public and visible acts (see Ex 34:14: “you shall worship no other god”; 23:13: “make no mention of the names of other gods”; see also, e.g., Lv 19:4, 26:1; Dt 13). However, the first commandment in the Decalogue (Ex 20:3; Dt 5:7) also prohibits private acts hidden from the eyes of others: “You shall have no other gods before me.”

e) Confession of the “Uniqueness” of God. The invocation “Hear, O Israel,” which was to become the crucial profession of faith within Judaism*, expresses a new interpretation of the exclusivity of the faith: “The Lord our God, the Lord is one” (Dt 6:4; repeated in Zec 14:9; Mal 2:10; Jb 31:15). However, it follows immediately that “You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul and with all your might” (Dt 6:5). Human conduct must be “blameless, perfect,” and without reservation (Gn 17:1; Dt 18:13; see Lv 19:2 and Mt 5:48), turned toward God alone (e.g., Ps 51:6 and 71:16; Is 26:13).

f) Affirmation of Monotheism at Around the Time of the Exile. The Second or Deutero-Isaiah, the prophet of the Exile, uses phrases that unambiguously exclude the existence of any other gods: “Before me no god was formed, nor shall there be any after me” (Is 43:10); “I am the first and I am the last; besides me there is no god” (Is 44:6; see, e.g., 41:4, 45:5f., 45:18, 45:21f., 46:9). Nevertheless, this prophet is a herald of salvation* and consolation: he does not put forward a doctrinal system. He takes up the theme of Hosea 13:4: “Besides me [God] there is no savior” (repeated in Is 43:11). If other gods existed, it would be possible to deny his power (41:24, 41:29): “their works are nothing.” In the “priestly” narrative (Gn 1), neither chaos nor the stars are envisaged as mythical entities; no domain of activity is left to any other powers apart from God. However, the existence of other gods does not seem to be fundamentally denied (Ex 12:12). In Deuteronomy, the article of faith, “The Lord is one” (6:4), is explained later: “there is no other besides him” (Dt 4:35, 4:39; see 32:39). It is in this sense that it was to be understood later, in the New Testament (Mk 12:32): “He is one, and there is no other besides him.”

In general, then, monotheism is not the foundation of Israel’s belief, but only one of its consequences. The belief functions as an absolute requirement, rather than as a “doctrine,” and should be seen as involving an act of placing faith and trust in God.

Changes of period and name (Ex 6:2f.) gave rise in Israel to the hope that “all the peoples of the earth” would acknowledge the one God (1 Kgs 8:60; see, e.g., 2 Kgs 19:19 and 5:15; Is 19:21ff., 45:6, 45:22ff.; Sg 2:11; Ps 83:19). God’s power will triumph even over death (e.g., Am 9:2; Prv 15:11; Ps 22:30, 49:16, 73:23ff.; Jb 14:13, 26:5; Is 25:8, 26:19). The possibility of a new profession of faith is already accepted in the Old Testament (Jer 16:14f., 23:7f.; see Is 48:20).

2. New Testament

While the New Testament continues to profess belief in the one and only God (see Mt 4:10), it asserts it in a new way: “No one can serve two masters” (Mt 6:24; see 6:32f.). “Who can forgive sins but God alone?” (Mk 2:7, see 10:17f. and 12:28ff.; Mt 22:36ff., 23:9, 24:36; Lk 5:11).

a) The One God and Jesus. The earliest witnesses present the first Easter as the salvific act by which God manifests himself through Jesus*. While the Old Testament generally affirms that God “kills and brings to life” (1 Sm 2:6; see, e.g., Rom 4:17; Lk 1:51ff.), the New Testament bears witness that it is God who “raised [Jesus] from the dead” (1 Thes 1:9f.; Gal 1:1; Rom 8:11; see 1 Cor 15:3f.; Lk 24:27). According to Paul, God sent his Son (Rom 8:3; see 5:8 and Gal 4:4) and “gave him up for us all” (Rom 8:32; see 4:24f., but also, e.g., Gal 1:4). According to 2 Corinthians 5:18ff., reconciliation is the work of God “through” or “in” Christ* (see Rom 3:25). John’s Gospel* also says that God “sent” and “gave up” his Son (e.g., 3:16f., 7:16; see 1 Jn 4:9f.).

Nevertheless, as in the Old Testament, Paul is not able to make a rigorous denial of the existence of other divine powers, although in respect of such powers he maintains that “for us there is one God, the Father . . . and one Lord, Jesus Christ” (1 Cor 8:5f.; see Rom 11:36; 1 Tm 2:5f.; Eph 4:4ff.).

b) Maintaining the First Commandment. Even the christological hymn in Philippians 2:5–11 closes with a celebration of “the glory of God the Father (see 1:11, 4:20; Rom 15:6f.; as well as Lk 2:11, 2:14).

In the final analysis, Paul’s hope that “the Son himself will also be subjected to him who put all things in subjection under him, that God may be all in all” (1 Cor 15:28; see 3:23 and 11:3) is an expression of the Old Testament expectation that “On that day the Lord will be one and his name one” (Zep 14:9; see, e.g., Is 2:17 and 60:19f.). The Epistle to the Romans, in its present form, ends with a doxology that reprises the word “only”: “to the only wise God be glory” (Rom 16:25–27; see Eph 3:20f.; Jn 17:3; 1 Tm 1:17 and 5:15f.; Jude 24f.; Rev. 15:4; as well as the doxology of Our Father, Mt 6:13).

The “christological event” not only brought about a new interpretation of the first commandment but was itself interpreted in such a way that the intention of the commandment is preserved within the doctrine of the Trinity*, by which the early church attested, beyond the differences between the persons, the uniqueness and indivisibility of God.

• H. Ringgren (1963), Israelitische Religion.

H. Cazelles (1976), “Le Dieu d’Abraham,” Les Quatre Fleuves 6, 4–17, repr. in Autour de l’Exode (Études), Paris, 1987, 53–66.

N. Lohfink (1983), “Das Alte Testament und sein Monotheismus,” repr. in Studien zur biblischen Theologie, SBAB 16 (1993), 133–51.

G. Braulik (1985), “Das Deuteronomium und die Geburt des Monotheismus,” repr. in Studien zur Theologie des Deuteronomiums, SBAB 2 (1988), 257–300.

J. Briand (1992), Dieu dans l’Écriture, Paris, 111–26.

W.H. Schmidt et al. (1994), “Monotheismus I–IV,” TRE 23, 233–62.

W.H. Schmidt (1995), “Erwägungen zur Geschichte der Ausschließlichkeit des alttestamentlichen Glaubens,” VT.S., Congress Volume Paris 1992, 289–314.

WERNER H. SCHMIDT

See also Filiation; Idolatry; Knowledge of God; Paganism; People of God; Simplicity (Divine); Theophany; Universalism; Wisdom

III. Historical Theology

I. Antiquity

Already during Homer’s time, the sky-god Zeus occupied an elevated status. During the fifth century Pindar and Aeschylus carried that status even higher and made Zeus into the custodian of morality. At the time, Xenophanes already criticized the Homeric gods’ immortality, positing the existence of a single (or supreme) god without anthropomorphic features. Later, Plato argues in the Timaeus that the goodness of the world implies the existence of a single maker, the “Demiurge,” and a single paradigm, but Plato is not very clear on the relation of both to the Form of the Good*, the origin of all other essences (Republic 509). Aristotle identifies God with perfect actuality (Meta- physics 12); this God, being free of matter, is indivisible (1075 a). Stoics regarded the Homeric gods as allegorical names for the elements or the divine powers; but the singularity of the world also implied the existence of a single God, whom they often called Zeus. In late antiquity, Isis was sometimes identified with all other divinities, while Macrobius (c. 400) argues in the Saturnalia that all gods are identical with Dionysus, Apollo or the Sun. Neoplatonism, after Plotinus (204–270), allowed for popular divinities to be provisionally worshipped as lower energizations of the impersonal One. Finally, imperial formulas often allude to a single divinity, and, in the second century, Celsus and Apuleius compared lower gods to the ministers of a king.

2. Judaism and Islam

Written at the beginning of the first century, Philo's treatise De Opificio Mundi (The Creation of the World) maintains that there are only one world and one creator. Since the Bible* does not say that God created the lower powers, even such texts as Deuteronomy 6:4—"the Lord our God, the Lord is one"—could be interpreted henotheistically. Thus, angelic intermediaries were recognized and even revered. Subsequently, Cabalists admired the existence of 10 mediating powers below the unknowable Deity (Keter), or even a moral duality in God. Nevertheless, Maimonides (1135–1204) made the unity of God his second principle of faith*, while Crescas (1340–1410) included it as a consequence of his existence. Monotheism, whether as a simple belief or as reflection, could lead to an interpretation of Christianity as a form of polytheism, as, for example, in the case of Saadia Gaon (b. 882), or in the Kuzari of Judah Halevi (c. 1075–1141), which sees Judaism* vanquishing Christianity in dialogue. Islamic monotheism is consistent: even if the Al-Ghazzali (1058–1111) distinguishes 99 names for God, the Sura 19 of the Koran denounces the Trinity*. Maimonides, while denying that Islamic dialectic could prove God's unity (Doctor Perplexorum I. 75), himself draws proofs from revelation* and philosophy* (II.1).

3. Early Christianity

To the early Christian apologists*, pagans appeared to be polytheistic idolaters. However, the most cited verse in martyrology is Acts 4:24, which is a prayer to the only unique God. The Fathers* did not hesitate to draw their arguments in favor of monotheism from philosophers and tragedians (see, e.g., Ps-Justin, De Monarchia). After the Peace of the Church, some thought that the unity of the empire presupposed monotheism and consequently entailed universal monolatry (see above all Eusebius of Caesarea's Tria- contericus of 336). Augustine's Civitas Dei (City of God) mocks the petty deities of the Roman state and criticizes the theory that gods make use of intermediaries. Throughout this period, the development of the dogma of the Trinity had to avoid the twin pitfalls of modalism*, which denied the existence of real distinctions, within God, between Father, Son, and Spirit, and tritheism, which no one ever professed. (The tritheism detected by John Philoponus was the result of a conceptual confusion that Philoponus himself did not share.) However, Trinitarian belief was thought by some to threaten monotheism. This is the reasons for which Arius (c. 320) rejected the possibility of plurality in the Deity, and that Gregory* of Nyssa was undoubtedly not engaging in a mere exercise in style when, on the eve of the First Council of Constantinople*, he demonstrated that the three divine persons were not three gods (Ad Ablabium, c. 375). The continued presence of Jewish communities in the Byzantine Empire, and the confrontation with Islam, ensured that the defense and illustration of Trinitarian monotheism remained an urgent task for theologians in eastern Christendom.

The refutation of gnosis*, of Manicheism*, and then of medieval dualisms (the Bogomils, the Paulicians, the Cathars) also had a significant effect on the affirmation of Christian monotheism. Refuting the existence of two uncreated principles, and therefore of an uncreated principle of evil*, required theologians to think about evil. This in turn led, on the one hand, to the important emphasis on the classical thesis that evil is merely privation and nonbeing, and, on the other hand, as a consequence, to a reasoned affirmation of the absolute innocence of God.

4. Subsequent Developments

The search for proofs of God's uniqueness is an important feature of medieval and modern thought. Anselm*'s definition of God as the most perfect being conceivable, "the unsurpassable" (Monologion) implies divine uniqueness. In his Quaestiones Disputate of 1266–67, Thomas* Aquinas identifies God's existence with his essence, and hence provides the conceptual means for excluding the existence of more than one god. Descartes*, in the third Meditation, and Leibniz*, in the Monadologie, infer the unity of God from his infinity and from the necessity of his being*. In Spinoza's Ethica (I, 14), the axiom that only one substance can exist concentrates the whole of reality, without exception, in a God that lacks any personal traits and that is synonymous with nature (pantheism*). In the writings of Kant*, the God postulated on the basis of practical reason must be the God of monotheism (but a God who cannot be defined in terms of a trinity), which is also the case for Fichte, within the framework of his philosophy on the ego. In Hegel*, by contrast, the Trinity becomes increasingly important: the life of the Absolute is a “game of love with itself,” and God himself is engaged in history in such a way that he is not truly himself until it ends. Schelling* was the first to criticize this view. For the young Schelling, who defined nature as mind made visible (Ideen, 1797–1803), a single world implies a single God. In his later writings, his plan for a “philosophy of revelation” lead Schelling to develop a “theory of powers” aimed at linking the “economic” Trinity (God manifested as Father, Son, and Spirit) with the “immanent” Trinity (the divine life in itself). With deism* the modern period has seen a less determinate form of philosophical monotheism; by which it has even been possible to introduce certain types of theology (as with Tillich*’s description of God as the “ground of being”).

The theology* of the 20th century has consecrated fruitful debate to a reexamination of Eusebius’s “imperial theology,” whether in order to construct a political theology that draws distant inspiration from it (Carl Schmitt) or in order to deny that it is possible (E. Peterson). However, the main focus of the most inventive currents within Protestant and Catholic theology has been on the Trinity.

The order of reasoning adopted by Scholasticism* had led to a distinction between two types of theological treatise, the “treatise on the one God” and the “treatise on the triune God,” in such a way that the former could not be addressed until after the latter had been studied. Luther*’s theology contains an explicit rejection of this order of reasoning, but his asperities were quickly smoothed away. Barth*’s Dogmatik and Balthasar*’s trilogy constitute, perhaps, the first highly articulated ensemble capable of replacing the Scholastic program. Orthodox theology has also made a contribution to this development by permitting reflection on monotheism in terms of the monarchy of the Father (Vl. Lossky, J.D. Zizioulas), rather than in terms of the unique divine essence.

In addition, the 20th century has also known a radical critique of (mono)theism. In the face of this critique, it became possible to make a theological interpretation of the “death of God” predicted by Nietzsche* as implying conceptions that are themselves nontheological (such as the death of a God who possessed a “metaphysical essence,” essentia Dei metaphysica, the death of the highest value, or the death of the God of ontotheology). Such an interpretation led to a new affirmation of God, who seeking a way “between theism and atheism,” finds it, for example, in a theology of the cross (E. Jünger) oriented toward a theology of the Trinity. Occasionally, God’s unity and uniqueness have ceased to be taken as preconditions for Trinitarian discourse—on the contrary, only a Trinitarian theology can provide the conditions for its affirmation.

- Wilhelm Schmidt (1912), Der Ursprung des Gottesidee, Münster.
- E. Peterson (1935), Monotheismus als politischer Problem, Leipzig.
- M. Eliade (1953), Traité d’histoire des religions, Paris.
- J. Hick (1977), God and the Universe of Faiths, London.
- A. Kenny (1979), The God of the Philosophers, Cambridge.
- S. Breton (1980), Unicité et m., Paris.
- J. Moltmann (1980), Trinität und Reich Gottes, Munich.
- R. M. Grant (1984), Gods and the One God, Philadelphia.
- D. Halperin (1988), The Faces of the Chariot, Tübingen.
- P. Hayman (1991), “Monotheism—A Misused Term in Jewish studies?” JJS 42, I-15.
- D. Sibony (1993), Les trois monothéismes, Paris.

MARK J. EDWARDS

See also Angels; Arianism; Attributes, Divine; Deism and Theism; God; Trinity; Tritheism; Unitarianism

Monothelitism/Monoenergism

Monothelitism and monoenergism are two facets of the same christological doctrine set forth at the beginning of the seventh century. After enjoying great success, the doctrine was condemned by the Lateran Council (649) and Constantinople III (681). It stated that Christ had only one will (thélèma) and only one way of functioning or working (energeia). It raised a different question from that of Monophysitism*. For political and religious reasons, Patriarch Sergius of Constantinople (†638) elucidated the question in order to help Emperor Heraclius (†641) bring about the union of the Christians inside the Byzantine Empire, which was under serious threat from the Persians, then later from the Islamic Arabs. It was a matter of discovering a Christology capable of reconciling Monophysitic and orthodox Chalcedonian opinions. After long transactions with the bishops of both groups, the doctrines of both monothelitism and monoenergism seemed acceptable to everyone.

On the theological level, the Patriarch of Constantinople was tackling an essential christological point that until then had remained obscure, the point about Christ's human will and functioning. In fact, according to monothelitism and monoenergism, Christ possessed only a divine will and a divine way of working. In no way did the problem concern his divine will and divine way of working, for the Word* incarnate was acknowledged by all, by both the Chalcedonians and the Monophysites, as a divine person (or hypostasis), "one of the Trinity*," willing and working in common with the Father* and the Holy* Spirit. But, by that very fact, it had to be denied that he had a human will and way of functioning. To oppose Arianism*, the fourth century Fathers had stated clearly the three divine persons' unity of nature, will, and working.

During the same period, Apollinaris (Apollinarianism*) had already drew up an early form of monothelitism and monoenergism. But while the Fathers had vigorously asserted the reality of Jesus' human soul* and intelligence, they had left in obscurity the question of his will and way of functioning, which followed from that fact. Gregory* of Nazianzus is far from clear about the matter. The doctrine of monoenergism could also base itself on one of Pseudo-Dionysius*'s assertions, that in Christ could be found "a new theandric functioning (théandrikè energeia)" (Letter 4).

An early attempt at unity with the Monophysites, made in Alexandria in 633 on the basis of monoenergism, ended in failure because it was challenged immediately by the monk Sophronius, who then became patriarch of Jerusalem*. Sergius responded at once by publishing his Psèphos (Decree) in which he made a subtle move from monoenergism to monothelitism, by his reference to Jesus' prayer in Gethsemane, as it is recounted in the synoptic Gospels. Sliding from the hypothesis of the two ways of working to the hypothesis of the two wills, Sergius wrote (Mansi 11, 533 E): "We would admit two wills behaving in opposite ways to each other: on the one hand the God*-Word wanted to carry out the saving passion, but on the other hand, the humanity within him resisted his will by opposing it. By admitting this, we would be introducing two beings who wanted opposite things, which is impious." In fact, in the Gospel text, mention is made of Jesus' human will, which seems to oppose the divine will by its refusal of the passion (Mt 26:39). But afterward, Jesus renounced that will: "nevertheless not my will, but thine, be done" (Lk 22:42). In Sergius's theology, the problem of Christ's human will is presented in moral terms: This will is not examined as a simple human faculty of willing but as a potential capacity to oppose the divine will. The key expression is "contrariety or clashing of wills." The human will possesses the (sinful) ability to oppose the divine will. Denial of Christ's human will and affirmation of a single (divine) will was the logical result of these premises. (All the same, the expression "single will" is not used explicitly in the Psèphos.)

At first, in 634, Sergius's Psèphos received unanimous approval, from the bishop of Rome*, Honorius I, as well as from the man who would later become the chief adversary of monothelitism and monoenergism, Maximus* the Confessor (Epistle 19; PG 91, 592 BC). Sergius's greatest "success" was having brought Honorius to confess monothelitism explicitly in his reply (Kirch, no. 1058–59): "We confess our Lord Jesus Christ's single will, for our nature has obviously been taken in hand by God, and it has been taken in hand in a state of innocence, such as it was before the fall. . . . The Savior did not possess a different or contrary will. . . . and when the Holy Scriptures say: 'I did not come to do my will but to do the will of the Father who sent me' (John 5:30), and 'Not my will, Father, but thine' (Mark 14:36), they are not speaking in those terms to express any difference of will." The text leaves vague the distinction between a different will and a contrary will; if the human will is denied, it was because a clash of wills had to be denied at any price. The crisis then came to an end with the official monothelite doctrine, the Ecthèse, promulgated in 638 by Emperor Heraclius. Sergius, its drafter, again took up the main points from his Psèphos, while including in it Honorius's monothelite statement about the impiety of an affirmation of the two wills (Kirch, no. 1071–73): "How is it possible for those who confess the orthodox faith and who glorify an only Son, Our Lord Jesus Christ and true God, to accept two contrary wills in him? Hence, following the Holy Fathers in everything and on this point, we confess our Lord Jesus Christ and true God's single will."

The rigorous sequence of these three primary documents: the Psèphos, Honorius's Letter, and the Ecthèse, reveals monothelitism's cohesiveness and strength, but the refusal of the cup still needed an explanation. It can be said that in reality Christ's refusal sprang from his humanity without it being the expression of a will. An inframoral reality was seen in it, a "natural reaction of the flesh" provoked by fear of death*—that is the classical explanation on which Sergius fell back in his Psèphos and his Ecthèse. But the working of a true human will can also be seen in this refusal—then it amounts to an act of "opposition," which could not be attributed to Christ except by way of "rational appropriation" (oikeiôsis skhetikè). This second thesis finally won out in Byzantine monothelitism (see PG 91, 304 AB). Like the first thesis, it amounted to depriving Christ's humanity of its engine. Deprived of will, his humanity was nothing more than a passive instrument moved by divine will alone.

From 640 onward, thanks to Maximus the Confessor's theological activity, doctrines of monothelitism and monoenergism were attacked in the West by the Roman Church and by the African churches, leading Heraclius himself to disavow the Ecthèse (see PG 90, 125 AB). Heraclius's successor, Constans II (641–68), at first upheld this doctrine in a brutal and dictatorial way. Later, realizing the extent of the disagreement, he claimed the right to impose silence on the matter by means of his Typos of 647 (Mansi 10, 1029C–1032A).

See bibliography for "Constantinople III, Council of."

FRANÇOIS-MARIE LÉTHEL

See also Christ and Christology; Constantinople III, Council of; Maximus the Confessor; Monophysitism

Montaigne, Michel de. See Skepticism, Christian

Montanism

a) History. The term Montanist is first attested to in the fourth century by Cyril of Jerusalem (in his Catechesis XVI, 8) to refer to a much more ancient group, the Phrygians, or the "Pepuzians," from the name of their city-kingdom, Pepuza; certain ecclesiastic authors use the term Cataphrygians. These names indicate that the birthplace of Montanism was in the communities in Asia Minor. The movement probably developed at the beginning of the second century, during the reigns of Antoninus Pius and Marcus Aurelius.

Patristic testimonies about Montanism are varied and probably tendentious. The fullest information comes from Eusebius (HE 5, 14, 16–19) and from Epiphanius (Panarion 48–49.51). The attribution to Didymus of Alexandria of a Dialogue between a Montanist and an Orthodox Believer remains unverified. The names Montanus, Maximilla, and Priscilla are given as those of the movement's originators, and, according to Epiphanius (Panarion 51, 33), the Christian community of Thyatira was entirely won over to Montanism around the year 170. Perhaps because he recognized himself in the Montanists' moral rigor, in the second half of his life Tertullian* joined their ranks, and the works that he wrote during that period made him the group's major representative in Christian Africa. However, Montanism's history, traces of which survived in Asia Minor until the beginning of the ninth century, must be put back into its original context of second-century Asian Christianity—and, in particular, the community of Philadelphia (Trevett 1989; see Rev 3:7–13). Ignatius of Antioch's letters and the narrative of Polycarp's martyrdom constitute important testimonies to the place reserved in the communities for discussions on authority and the role to be assigned to the prophets (see Ignatius, To the Philadelphians 5:2).

b) Doctrine. Montanism was primarily a prophetic movement, and there still exist a series of oracles attributed to Montanus and Maximilla (Labriolle 1913 a), of which several had been transmitted by the Fathers*. The movement's Phrygian origin and its prophetic demonstrations of an ecstatic type have led to comparisons with the cult* of Cybele (see Strobel 1980). However, the "new prophecy" should also be linked with the eschatological expectation held by the first generations of Christians. According to ancient sources (Labriolle 1913 a), Maximilla asserted that her death would herald the end of the world. The "new prophecy" found its favorite references in the Johannine Gospel and stressed the Paraclete at work in the group's prophets*. Montanus seems to have adopted the name of Paraclete, but that does not prove that he identified himself with the Holy* Spirit or with any of the three divine persons (in fact, the upholders of orthodoxy did not challenge the Montanists' Trinitarian doctrine). In any case, the refutation of the Montanists clearly suggests that at that time prophecy was a topic of debate in the communities of Asia Minor.

Montanism probably also appealed for demonstrations of the extraordinary, and Jerome pointed out the existence of a treatise by Tertullian on ecstasy (fragments in CChr.SL 2, 1334–36). Such appeals were held all the more suspect because they were accompanied by protests against a ministerial-hierarchic conception of the church. The church answered Montanism by reinforcing its episcopal structure. In a commentary on Paul's statement that "the women should keep silence in the churches" (1 Cor 14:34), Origen* criticized the role to which the Montanist prophetesses aspired and answered with a restrictive analysis of the function of prophetesses in the Old and New Testaments (fragment of a commentary on 1 Corinthians, preserved in an collection of exegetic material).

The revisions that Tertullian made about the years 207–8 to his Adversus Marcionem (SC 365, 368, 399) show his enlistment in the Montanist ranks. Tertullian asserted that the possibility of prophecy was always open (Adversus Marcionem I, 21, 5; V, 8, 12), and in answer to the Marcionite condemnation of marriage, he made his own the Montanists' insistence on the exclusive nature of marriage* (Adversus Marcionem I, 29, 4). This affirms his definite break with the church*, and this break is stated even more clearly in his later treatises. From then on, the church would be defined as the community of "psychics"—and, therefore, the community of those who remained rooted in sin—and Tertullian would no longer acknowledge the primacy of the bishop of Rome (De Pudicitia, SC 394–95), contrary to the ecclesiology* he had earlier developed in his treatise on penitence.

The Montanists' moral and disciplinary prescriptions take up a lot of space in Tertullian's last writings (De Monogamia, SC 343, De Jejunio adversus Psychicos, and De Pudicitia). In an apocalyptic context that went far beyond the Montanist group, calls to purity* and to virginity, the condemnation of second marriages, the insistence on fasting and penitence, and exhortations not to avoid martyrdom* all signaled the desire to create a community of "the pure." Its ascetic tendencies have caused Montanism to be taxed with Encratism, but such an accusation proves the extent of the difficulty of defining the specificity of a movement born in a period in which heresy* was not yet a working concept.

- P. de Labriolle (1913 a), Les sources de l'histoire du montanisme, Fribourg (Switzerland)–Paris.
- P. de Labriolle (1913 b), La crise montaniste, Fribourg (Switzerland)–Paris.
- E. R. Dodds (1965), Pagan and Christian in an Age of Anxiety, London.
- F. Blanchetière (1978–79), "Le montanisme originel," RevSR 52 and 53, 118–34 and 1–22.
- A. Strobel (1980), Das heilige Land der Montanisten, Berlin.
- R. E. Heine (1987–88), "The Role of the Gospel of John in the Montanist Controversy," SecCent 6, 1–20.
- C. Trevett (1989), "Apocalypse, Ignatius, Montanism: Seeking the Seeds," VigChr 43, 313–38.
- W. H. C. Frend (1993), "Montanismus," TRE 23, 271–79.
- C. Trevett (1996), Montanism, Chicago.

FRANÇOISE VINEL

See also History of the Church; Millenarianism; Prophet and Prophecy; Tertullian

Moral. See Ethics

Moral Theology. See Ethics

Moses

Traditionally, Moses was the epic hero who lived in the reign of Rameses II (1290–1224) in the late 13th century B.C. Under divine guidance he led the Israelites from Egyptian oppression across the “sea of reeds,” formerly mistranslated as the Red Sea, and through the desert to “Mount Sinai,” and thence toward the promised land, which he was allowed to see but not to enter. The story is related in the Pentateuch, divided by the Jews before the advent of Jesus into its five constituent books (Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy), but still known collectively as the Torah. The Torah was considered by Jesus and the apostles (Jn 1:45–47; Rom 10:5) to have been written by Moses, himself both the hero and the author of the epic and the law.

The Pentateuch contains at least two creation narratives, two accounts of Cain’s genealogy, two combined versions of the flood story, and at least two accounts of the legal dispensations of the Jews, together with much other material in several variants, and is uncontroversially considered to be composed of different strata. A great deal of what it relates about Moses, like his abandonment in the river in a wicker basket lined with bitumen and pitch, is common to the mythology and folklore of different parts of the Middle East. The same fate is narrated of the infant Mesopotamian king Sargon who was to reign in the millennium before Moses. The deeds and stature of Moses are in part compounded of the heroic lore of non-Israelite traditions.

After the Pentateuch’s narratives of the Creation and the patriarchs in Genesis, in which the story of Noah is similar to that of Utnapishtim, hero of the Sumerian epic Gilgamesh, Exodus is primarily concerned with the laws given to Moses for the Israelites, not only the Decalogue but also the social, moral, religious, and ritual prescriptions ordained by YHWH, with its numerous sections preceded by such phrases as “Yahweh said to Moses . . .” YHWH’s instructions for the making of the ark and of the tent in which it is to be housed, for vestments, sacrifices, and ritual obligations are spelled out by Moses in great detail, down to measurements and types of wood. They must reflect some record of actual rites and customs, however they originated.

The next book, Leviticus, is devoted primarily to the legal prescriptions communicated by YHWH to Moses on Mount Sinai for the Israelites and interrupts the historical flow of the Old Testament. The Book of Numbers takes up the narrative again with a sporadic account of the desert march interspersed with long enumerations, formulae, and lists. Deuteronomy enshrines a whole legal code within a long discourse by Moses, the whole preceded and followed by further speeches by Moses, and ending with an account of his death.

The religious truth of the Pentateuch as we have it is therefore far removed from straight narrative or literal accuracy. The dimensions of the law given in the Pentateuch—once short enough to be engraved on stone, according to passages like Deuteronomy 27:3 and 27:8—have clearly undergone massive augmentation, and the original religious message has no doubt been corrupted by the addition of material later than the earliest stratum. Some at least of the legal procedure attributed to the Mosaic legislation dictated by YHWH in the present text can be shown by religious, ethical, and sociological evidence to be of post-Mosaic origin, while much of it preexisted Moses and the vocation of Israel.

In the early 21st century we can be only at the beginning of the confrontation of biblical narrative with scientific archaeological investigation, which is becoming increasingly sophisticated and which might eventually produce clear evidence of what actually happened, and what relationship different parts of the Pentateuch bear to an accurate chronicle of the events that they relate. We have, for instance, no convincing idea of where Mount Sinai might have been, or therefore of what route the Israelites took to get there. Reconstruction of the life and deeds of the historical Moses is therefore bound at present to remain to some extent a matter of academic controversy and informed religious conjecture, although behind the biblical figure of Moses there does indeed seem to lurk a real religious and political leader. He appears in the Pentateuch at the beginning of what we know as the second chapter of Exodus, which gives two similar accounts of Moses' calling and is devoted to accounts of the liberation of the Israelites from Egypt, their crossing of the desert, and the establishment of the alliance with YHWH.

Exodus tells of the oppression in Egypt by the king of the prosperous, numerically increasing, and powerful descendants of Jacob, whose firstborn males were on the Pharaoh's orders to be destroyed at birth. The mother of one male of the tribe of Levi put her firstborn male in the wicker basket in the reeds of the river. Pharaoh's daughter found the infant, unknowingly had him nursed by his own mother, and adopted him as her own son, giving him the name Moses, which Exodus uncertainly claims to be connected with a Hebrew root indicating that the baby had been taken from the water. We next hear of Moses when, fleeing after killing an Egyptian for beating a Hebrew, he settles in Midian to the east of the gulf of Aqaba, where he marries Zipporah, daughter of a local chieftain.

There are parallels for the raising of foreigners at the Egyptian court, and for escape after suspicion of murder leading to the marriage of a daughter of a local chieftain, but there is no nonbiblical warrant for the oppression of the Hebrews in Egypt, or for their mass exodus. It is safest to think in terms of the expansion into a national epic, "to fit the needs of theological ideology" (Ze'ev Herzog), of the private story of at best a few families falling into a general pattern of migration into Egypt and the acquisition of power there. Nationalistic propaganda reasons can be given for later modifications of the Pentateuch material into the national epic that it has in part become, and there are anachronisms in the Genesis account of the patriarchs, which suggest reworking by a later, historically unskilled hand.

Exodus continues with God's decision to have mercy on the Hebrews in Egypt, and with the appearance to Moses, while he is tending his father-in-law's sheep, of an angel of YHWH under the appearance of a burning bush that remains unconsumed, an easily recognizable symbol of the divinity. A voice from the bush addresses Moses by name, and reveals the speaker to be the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Joseph.

Moses covers his face out of fear that he might otherwise be harmed by seeing God. God announces his plan to relieve the children of Israel in Egypt and to have them led to the land flowing with milk and honey, confiding this mission to a reluctant Moses, giving him three miraculous signs by which the Israelites will recognize in him the envoy of YHWH, and promising prodigies sufficient to force Pharaoh to release them. He identifies himself with a term derived from the verb "to be," "I am who am," and gives Aaron to Moses for support.

Exodus then contains a second, abbreviated version of YHWH's mission to Moses. This conflation and many other elements in the text suggest that whoever finally edited it was glorifying the origins of Israel's conversion to monotheism. What occurred is more likely to have been some modification introduced into the preexisting cult of YHWH, which is known to have predated God's self-revelation to Moses as "I am who am," and Exodus may well contain the mythologization of a major religious dispute in Egypt redacted from an anti-Pharaonic point of view. It is now considered unsafe specifically to connect the exodus of the Israelites with the conversion to monotheism, which may actually have come later.

YHWH hardens Pharaoh's heart and brings him to submission by means of the nine plagues, ending with the death of Egypt's firstborn. The story is told twice before Exodus moves on to the crossing of the sea of reeds, with the waters closing behind the Israelites over the pursuing Egyptians, the march across the desert, and the theophany on Mount Sinai, the Decalogue, and the alliance. The miracles, the episode of the golden calf, and YHWH's idiosyncratic behavior make a list too long and too well known to be repeated here. Dozens of naturalistic explanations have been fabricated for everything, but they have all been discredited. In view of the repetitions, the propagandist intention, the omissions, and the unexplained motivations, the historical career of Moses must remain largely conjectural.

All that is certain is that the final editors of Exodus and Deuteronomy must have been working on a text to which they accorded religious respect sufficient to leave blatant contradictions, and one through which they intended to impart a strong nationalistic and religious message. Their YHWH is vengeful and at times capricious, conscious of power but not depicted in the Moses story as omnipotent. The editors were deeply attached to the minutiae of ritual, but were not clear about ethical standards. It is not clear for what sin Moses was punished by not being allowed to enter the promised land. At times Moses himself appears to be quasi-divine. He argues with YHWH, even lectures him, when he proposes to destroy Israel after the episode of the golden calf, and obtains mercy for the people from YHWH, only himself to fly into a rage and have three thousand executions carried out by the tribe of Levi, who thereby become the priests of YHWH.

What is clear is that Moses, as depicted in Exodus and Deuteronomy, is the figure of a great religious leader, portrayed as the founder of Judaism as a religion, and acknowledged by Christians as foreshadowing the very different ethical and priestly status of the Anointed One. The meaning of the revelation YHWH entrusted to him is not clear, and too much mythologizing and rewriting, incorporating alien folklore, has obscured the actual details of his career, but he is certainly the founder of one of the first of the three great religions to have come out of the Middle East: Judaism, Christianity, and Islam.

ANTHONY LEVI

Mouroux, Jean. See Experience

Music

Music—according to what is doubtless a rather vague consensus as to its content and boundaries—is understood as the practice of singing and playing instruments, in contexts as varied as the concert hall, musical theater, worship, and so forth. The use of music in Christian worship is a fact. In order to try to understand this fact and its implications, it can be shown that an interplay of historically based constraints and resources has given rise, within the Christian liturgy*, to a special type of musical practice, defining forms, producing repertoires, and deriving the logic of its development from certain principles.

It is, nonetheless, important to note that the term musica, which originates in Graeco-Latin theory, was scarcely used by Christian writers until Cassiodorus (c. 485–c. 580) introduced the theory of the liberal arts into clerical and monastic circles (Institutiones, PL 70). Even then, however, the word denoted a science related to mathematics—a kind of cosmology of sonic, rhythmical, and numerical phenomena—far removed from the practical and spiritual realities of the church's music. Isidore of Seville (c. 559–634), in his study of the voice and of singing, was to fuse Cassiodorus's approach with that of the rhetoric derived from Quintil-

ian. This fusion clearly indicates the two domains in terms of which the “effects of music”—henceforth an obligatory chapter in any treatise De musica (Hame-line 1978)—would subsequently be considered.

1. From the Origins of Christian Music to Clement of Alexandria

There was, at the outset, no Christian Church* music comparable to the musical establishment of the Temple at Jerusalem*, still less to that of the political and social institutions of the Mediterranean cities and their public worship. There were no bodies of musicians (singers, dancers, or instrumentalists) and no musical practices codified in a repertoire and a calendar. The musical practices of the earliest Christian communities seem to have been closer to what can be seen in the context of religious brotherhoods or associations centered on mutual enlightenment and drawing on the human resources of their members, understood as charismata in the service of the community (1 Cor 14). The domestic space, extended to the members of the community, seems to have been the main forum for this, and its importance would continue during the following centuries. The role of the family, or in a wider sense household, in the development of Christian prayer* and worship, and even of certain forms of urban monasticism*, cannot be overlooked.

Even if it appears necessary to play down somewhat the direct influence of the practices of the synagogue on the liturgical choices of the first communities (Taft 1985), it remains certain that the synagogue, a place of worship with a psychologically and materially restricted space, offered some very significant models: the reading of the Holy* Scriptures and their commentary, the singing of the Psalms*, and certain styles of prayer. In any event, all authorities agree that the first Christian groups displayed a remarkable degree of activity in the field of hymnody (Perrot 1985), at times spontaneous and even improvised. As Tertullian* attests, “each person is invited to sing to God, in the midst of the assembly, a song drawn from the Holy Scriptures or from his own inspiration” (Apol. 39, 18). There is also agreement in emphasizing the growing importance that the nascent church would come to attach to the Psalms of David.

As it developed, however, Christianity could not help providing itself with means of expression in keeping with what it saw as its religious originality, and with the forms taken by its institutions and its social organization. For this reason, the fundamental choices that would characterize the role of music and singing in Christian worship over the first millennium can offer a key to the understanding of all that was later to occur in this sphere.

Christian music, which as yet was hardly recognized as such, but which can be supposed to have been in search of its own form of expression, was at first led to define itself in opposition to a musical art that was an integral part of paganism, and to everything in this art that seemed to corrupt morals. On this point Christians were in agreement with civic Platonism, which banished effeminate poets and musicians from the city; and they shared the reservations of the numerous contemporary thinkers who condemned the art of music as unworthy of a virtuous and upright life (Quasten 1983). The growing theological conception of a sinful corruption of human nature* was then enough to strengthen this suspicion. For example, when Augustine came to deal with concupiscence, in particular abuses related to hearing, he expressed hesitation (fruitfully, moreover) over the church’s acceptance of such a frivolous and formidable art as singing.

In any event it is highly likely that the very concept of song, and more precisely that of new song (in the words of Ps 144:9), very soon appeared as a suitable term to denote what would henceforth be seen much less as a ritual or “artistic” practice than, metaphorically, as a properly Christian attitude to life and the renewal of life, as a felicitous way of living according to grace*. This metaphorical and truly innovative approach to the concept of song is clearly seen in the Protrepticus of Clement of Alexandria (†212), a text whose date and place of composition, in the especially cosmopolitan and multireligious context of the great Mediterranean city, correspond to a defining stage in Christianity’s organization and its interpretation of itself. So, according to Clement, song is a model of an intense and joyous presence in the world, but a presence that the worship of false gods can only render illusory and deceptive. Christ*, Logos and Wisdom*, but also a true man and the singer of his Father*’s praises, therefore intercedes as he who makes possible a “new song,” kainon asma, whose role is to convert the song of Amphion, Orpheus, or Homer to the succession of David and the prophets*. This new song, sustaining itself with hymns and psalms in order to constitute itself, is identified with a life (also new) of piety (theosebeia) and wisdom. Consequently, the art of music has no direct power of salvation* in itself, no more than it has the power to influence the deity. The new and musical harmony of beings must be attributed to the action of the Holy* Spirit, and song is therefore a fruit of wisdom, lit up as it were by the beatified humanity of Christ, but having a poetic reality, which cannot be separated from an ascetic dimension. And so the actual phenomenon of song, and all the musicians’ art, can do no more than evoke that other song—perhaps more real in its nature of song—that is the song of the virtuous life. This reversal of perspective was to sustain the whole subsequent conception of song and laus vocalis (“vocal praise”) that Christian moralists would develop (see, among many others, Augustine, En. in Ps. 146, 148, 149; John Chrysostom*, In Ps. 111; and, in general, commentaries on Ps 46 and 149).

If then we are obliged, in the absence of more precise evidence, to imagine on the basis of the Protrepticus a hypothetical practice of song in Christian assemblies, we should certainly emphasize the absence of any established musical organization. Clement rejects everything reminiscent of sacred theater, initiatory pilgrimage*, or Bacchic intoxication. His strong ascetic tendencies are, however, joined to a warm and imaginative impulse for hymnody, which permeates all his remarks, and suggests a lyrical, even a vocal quality.

This wisdom-centered asceticism recurs in monastic psalmody, with variants resulting from the greater or lesser strictness of the customs and rules of a community. Thus Athanasius*’s letter to Marcellinus (PG 27, 37–41) attributes a calming effect to the melodious chanting of the Psalms, which reconciles the rhythm of the soul* with that of the inspired author, and thereby prepares the heart for prayer (Dyer 1989). This theme was to have a lengthy history (Vogüé 1989).

The Christian concept, then, was characterized by three refusals. First there was the refusal of any form of song or music that might endow the art with a constraining effect on natural and supernatural forces. Then there was a refusal of any Gnostic tendency to attribute a power of illumination, and of access to the divine consciousness*, to musical forms (scales, numbers, rhythms, etc.) as such. Finally, there was a refusal of all association of musical practices with what appeared as moral dissoluteness, drunkenness, frenzy, extreme states, or trances.

2. Ethos of Song in Christian Celebration

The ritual of baptism called on the catechumen to renounce the “vanities of Satan,” and these were doubtless embodied most strikingly and resoundingly in the processions that opened the often bloody games at the circus, accompanied by a multitude of fanfares, shouts, and banners. Christian writers did not hesitate to express their feelings of loathing for this sound-world (e.g., Tertullian in De spectaculis, ch. 10, PL 1, 642–44). Once the establishment of the church, the local prestige of the bishops*, and the development of the clergy made possible the appearance of a liturgical ceremonial of broader scope than at first, the rejection of musical instruments and the use of the unaccompanied voices of the singers and congregation gave Christian celebrations a sonic ethos that was undoubtedly more innovative than historians of music have acknowledged, and without which it is hard to imagine the appearance in subsequent centuries of the great Latin monody, Roman, Milanese, Gallican, Hispanic, and Romano-Frankish.

The key characteristics of this ethos of song, or at least of a desired and suggested ethos, are clearly evident in a sermon by Niceta of Remesiana (c. 454–85), De psalmodiae bono (PL Suppl. 3, 191–98), the terminology and content of which would be taken up in part by Isidore of Seville (De ecclesiasticis officiis I, ch. 1–10, II, ch. 11–12). Niceta was not unaware that some in both the East and the West held the singing of psalms and hymns to be pointless and “unsuited to divine religion,” and confined themselves to a restrictive interpretation of the apostle*’s words, “be filled with the Spirit, . . . singing and making melody to the Lord with all your heart” (Eph 5:18–19)—or, in their interpretation of the phrase in cordibus vestris, “in the secrecy of the heart.” But the apostle spoke of singing, not of silence, and in point of fact his words refer to the union of the heart and voice. Niceta goes on to praise the psalms and canticles of the Bible, holding that for every situation in this life, and for every age and sex, they offer a remedy made effective by the sweetness and charm of the singing in such a way that the heart cannot help being moved when it has understood that all the mysteries* of Christ are celebrated in them.

The well-known expression from Psalm 46, psallite sapienter, clearly indicates that one must not sing with the breath alone, but also with one’s intelligence, awakened by the beauty of the song. If this is the voice of the church in its assemblies, the task of defining its characteristics can hardly be left to chance, still less to disorder. Christian simplicity cannot borrow the charm of its melodies from a vain and theatrical art. Rather, all must be in accordance with the sanctity of such a religion. Unfortunately, Niceta only indicates one feature of the realization of this program: the recommendation of singing ex uno ore, exemplified by the song of the three young men in the furnace (Dn 3). This insistence on una voce was akin to the horror of heterophony, and more generally of any vocal behavior that might evoke tumult and haste (Quasten 1983), evinced by a good many priests and monastic superiors.

When the voice was addressed to God, all booming sounds were forbidden, as Cyprian* had explained in his commentary on the Lord’s Prayer (Réveillaud 1964): “The mode of speech and the demands of those who pray should betray a concern for calm and restraint. Consider that we are in the presence of God. It is important to please the divine eyes by the attitude of the body and the intonation of the voice. As much as it is the mark of an insolent man to make shouts resound, so it is proper for Christian humility to make itself heard through measured prayer.” Of course this did not rule out the religious significance of groans and sighs (Armogathe 1980), nor the fervor and enthusiasm so emphatically praised by Ambrose* (Explanatio Ps. 1, PL 14, 924–25, Sermo contra Auxentium, PL 16, 1017), who in other respects was the theoretician of Christian verecundia (De officiis, PL 16, XVIII, 43–47).

In the organization of the musical repertoire, the Carolingian liturgists were thus obliged to distinguish different motivations and to allow song to find expression in a necessary (and theologically significant) diversity of modes of singing: the fullness of congregational psalmody sung in a moderate and flowing voice, the “artistic” and sustained (strenua voce) singing of the clerks in their own repertoire (particularly the soloists performing the versets), and the “secret” (in secreto) utterance of the priestly prayer in the canon of the mass (see Chrodegand, Bishop of Metz, Regula canonicorum, PL 89, L, 1079, taken up by the Council of Aix in 816).

3. Fundamental Questions of a Theory of Liturgical Music

In the patristic period, then, everything appears very straightforward, as though the church was faced with the open-ended task to define a music, or more precisely a musical quality of voice and singing, that would be in keeping with its worship and be able, through its performance and perpetuation, to maintain its forms (formal models and established repertoire), its principles, and its sensibility. The aim was to link the tradition* of songs to the tradition of song, understood within the church as a theological act. It is important to note, moreover, that the development and dissemination of Christian singing were not inherently tied to a particular language. Admittedly, the earliest historical languages of church music, apart from the geographical traces they left in the shape of a small number of revered and untranslated terms or formulae—such as those untranslated Hebrew terms (amen, alleluia, and hosanna) of which Augustine speaks (De doctrina christiana 1. 2, ch. 2)—did not fail to leave a strong influence on Christian diction, as demonstrated by the example of the psalmic verset, so alien to Graeco-Latin prosody (Gerson-Kiwi 1957).

Still more significant, however, was the character that the various languages and cultures were to impose on the musical material handed down to them. Serious attention must therefore be given to the phenomena of linguistic inculturation* (Gy 1990), invariably the joint product of a language and a religious self-awareness shaping one another at the very level of the medium of expression. Thus not only Ambrose's hymns, but also the poetic works of Paulinus and Prudentius, succeeded in reconciling the heritage of Latin poetry with the eloquio proper to the Christian message, in a "new song" (Fontaine 1981). And the strange melting pot in which psalmic declamation met Latin accentuation was to witness the appearance, after a slow process of maturation, of that new and still surprising musical object, the antiphon—and above all the development around it, and in keeping with the ars canendi proper to the institution (also new) of the schola cantorum (a qualified group of singers with a well-defined ceremonial status), of a systematic repertoire, the antiphonary, in which the mystery of the Christian liturgical year could be unfolded in a sonic form that was both continuous and differentiated, joining a musical hermeneutics* of the text to the offering of heartfelt and joyful praise.

A few insistent, if not essential, characteristics of Christian music can thus be identified (but see also Gelineau 1989 and Ratzinger 1995):

- a) The involvement of singing in the individual and collective experience of faith* is essentially a matter of oral confession, as defined once and for all in Romans 10:8–10, on which the whole theology* of the voice of the church in its assemblies is based. While confessing the faith, singing permits the understanding of whatever can be expressed in it. It does so however in its own musical mode, giving the text a sonic space in which, paradoxically, its weight of meaning appears more clearly than in the pure and simple utterance of the words. Singing works in favor of clarity by lengthening diction. The tarditas peculiar to sung utterance had already been well expressed by Boethius* (De Institutione Musicae, 1. 1, ch. 12, see Potiron 1961). More than the ceremonial function, what is important here is the establishment of a zone of audibility peculiar to the sung action. This development may be seen from this time on as the primary role of the provision of music for liturgies. It was to open the way to later innovations, in particular polyphony.

- b) The tradition of Christian singing cannot deny its Pentecostal and charismatic origins. It may be that the three terms "psalms and hymns and spiritual songs" mentioned in Colossians 3:16 and Ephesians 5:19 did not correspond to categories of singing actually in use. Nonetheless, the reference to these forms of singing offers a glimpse of a possible extension of established repertoires in the direction of forms in which art and didactic motives give way to the communication of an energy drawn from religious experience itself, to that "jubilation" (vox sine verbis) in which the commentators of the fourth century saw an excess and an overflowing, which both fell short of and lay beyond verbal expression (Hilary*, Tractatus in ps. 65, 3, PL 9, 425 and Augustine, Sermo 2 in ps. 32, PL 36, 283; in ps. 99, §4, PL 37, 1272).
- c) A lyrical heritage, consisting of both psalms and hymns, is contained within the Christian Scriptures. At its heart is the Psalter, a palette containing all the feelings of the fortunate or unfortunate believer, read through the symbolic figure of Christ the psalmist (Fischer 1951). Its invitatory structure, expressed by the imperatives cantate, psallite, magnificate, laudem dicite—and by the place occupied in the liturgy of the hours by Psalm 95, which begins, "O come, let us sing to the Lord"—offers an understanding of what is undoubtedly the most fundamental characteristic of Christian singing: the affirmation that God is in some sense "singable," indeed cannot perhaps be adequately acknowledged if the believer does not at some time place himself in a hymnodic situation. Of course God cannot have need of praise of any kind, and nothing is more repugnant to Christianity than adulation (John Chrysostom, 5th Homily on 1 Timothy, PG 62, 525–90 and Augustine, En. Ps. 134, PL 37, 1708–55). Singing is of benefit only to the singer and his audience. For them it signifies the liberality of the divine gifts, presenting itself as the (eschatological) restoration of a (protological) power of song. Singing sings the praises of God by singing its own possibility. It sings the possibility of giving praise, to which it ceaselessly repeats an invitation.

- d) The figure of the cantor, or psalmist, to which Augustine so frequently alludes (also of course the title on which Johann Sebastian Bach would pride himself), appears at this time as guardian of this lyrical heritage, and as responsible for keeping the invitatory tradition in a state of sufficient vitality. In the description he gives of ecclesiastical roles, after describing the responsibilities and the art of the reader, Isidore of Seville goes on to define those of the psalmist. Unlike Niceta, several of whose expressions he borrows, he offers an outline of a theologically sound vocal ethos in De ecclesiasticis officiis (1. 2, ch. 12): “It is important that the psalmist be notable and distinguished for his voice and art, in such a way that he can lead his listeners’ souls to give themselves over to the charm of a sweet psalmody. His voice should be neither harsh, nor coarse, nor out of tune, but resounding, melodious, clear, and dignified, a voice whose sonority and melody will be in keeping with a holy religion. It should not betray an interpreter’s art, but should exhibit a true Christian simplicity in its musical display. It should not smack of the ostentation characteristic of musicians, neither of theatrical art, but should rather bring about in its listeners a real softening of the heart.”

Thus the art of song properly conceived tends to produce a lifting of the resistance and heaviness of the heart, giving rise to a compunctio, which approaches the register of tenderness, but without weakness, since the voice must be direct, clear, and sonorous, as befits a religion that rejects theatrical effects and ostentatious music. It is fair to suppose that this program and this definition of an aesthetic of “suitability,” far from playing an artistically inhibitory role, were on the contrary able, by their advocacy of a lyricism, restricted to the search for an ideal form, to open the way to an unending search for forms and to give rise to an incessant striving for approaches and solutions that, in a sense, has merged with the history of Western music.

- e) One characteristic of this art—for by this time it was certainly an art—remains hard to pin down. It is expressed in the “charm” and “sweetness” (the oblectamenta dulcedinis) of which Isidore speaks. Everything that concerns the “sweetness of singing,” the suavitas canendi, might be assumed to be an almost meaningless literary cliché. The interpretation of a passage by Amalarius (c. 830), nonetheless, urges us to take it all seriously. For Amalarius, who was highly influential throughout the Middle Ages (Ekenberg 1987), singing quite specifically foretells the delightful reality of the rewards promised in the contract of faith. Following Augustine, Amalarius insists, moreover, that God does not attract “by necessity but by delight”—non necessitate sed delectatione—which bestows on singing the privilege of announcing that love* cannot be born from constraint (Amalarius, Liber Officialis, Opera omnia, Ed. J.M. Hanssens, Vatican, 1948, vol. 2, L. 3, ch. 5, §6).

- B. Fischer (1951), “Le Christ dans les Psaumes,” MD 27, 86–113.
- E. Gerson-Kiwi (1957), “Music (in the Bible),” DBS 29, 1411–68.
- E. Werner (1959), The Sacred Bridge: The Interdependence of Liturgy and Music in Synagogue and Church during the First Millennium, London–New York.
- S. Corbin (1960), L’Église à la conquête de sa musique, Paris.
- H. Potiron (1961), Boèce, théoricien de la musique grecque, Paris.
- M. Réveillaud (Ed.) (1964), Cyprien: L’Oraison dominicale, Paris, 81–82.
- O. Söhngen (1967), Theologie der Musik, Kassel.
- J. Claire (1975), Les répertoires liturgiques latins avant l’Oecumenisme, vol. 1: L’office férial romano-franc, Solesmes.
- J.-Y. Hameline (1978), “Histoire de la musique et de ses effets,” Cahiers Recherche-Musique, Institut national de l’audiovisuel, 66, 9–35.
- J.-R. Armogathe (1980), “Gemitibus inenarrabilibus, Notes on Rm. 8, 26,” Aug. 1–2, 19–22.
- J. Fontaine (1981), Naissance de la poésie dans l’Occident chrétien, Paris.
- J. Quasten (1983), Music and Worship in Pagan and Christian Antiquity, Washington, 52–57.
- C. Perrot (1985), “Le chant hymnique chez les juifs et les chrétiens au premier siècle,” MD 161, 7–32.
- R. Taft (1985), Liturgy of the Hours in East and West, Collegeville.
- E. Ekenberg (1987), Cur cantatur? Die Funktionen des liturgischen Gesanges nach den Autoren der Karolingerzeit, Stockholm.
- J. McKinnon (1987), Music in Early Christian Literature, Cambridge.
- J.-Y. Hameline (1988), “Acte de chant, acte de foi,” Catéchèse (Paris) 113, 31–46.
- J. Dyer (1989), “Monastic Psalmody of the Middle Ages,” RBEn 96, 41–74.

- J. Gelineau (1989), "Le chemin de la musique," Conc(F) no. 222, 157–70.
 A. de Vogüé (1989), "Psalmody n'est pas prier," EO 6, 7–32.
 P.-M. Gy (1990), La liturgie dans l'histoire, Paris, 59–72.
 J.M. Spencer (1991), Theological Music: Introduction to Theology, New York.
 H. Seidel et al. (1994), "Musik und Religion," TRE 23, 441–95 (bibl.).
 H. de La Motte-Haber (1995), Musik und Religion, Laaber.

- J. Ratzinger (1995), Ein neues Lied für den Herrn: Christusglaube und Liturgie in der Gegenwart.
 E. Fubini (1997), Geschichte der Musik-Ästhetik: Von der Antike bis zur Gegenwart, Stuttgart-Vienna.
 U. Taddai et al. (1998), "Musik," LThK3 7, 543–51.

JEAN-YVES HAMELINE

See also Architecture; Beauty; Cult; Images

Mystery

A. Biblical Theology

a) From the Term's Origins to Its Use in the New Testament. The word musterion is composed of a root (the root muo) and a desinence (-terion). The final terion seems to point to an original meaning that was either local or instrumental. For example: thusiasterion (altar, upon which sacrifices are made); bouleuterion (council chamber); and so forth. The root remains undetermined, even if the most probable seems to be muo (to close; whence "to remain silent," "preserve silence"); see LXX: mustes (initiated, masculine form; Wis 12:5), mustis (initiated, feminine form; said of wisdom* in Sg 8:4), mustikos (in a low voice; 3 M 3, 10).

With respect to this root, musterion might derive from the mystery religions, where it would initially have designated the place of initiation, and then the rites and secrets, the mysteries celebrated. LXX did not invalidate this impression, for musterion appears above all in texts of the Hellenistic period, written therefore directly in Greek (Tobit; Judges; 2 Maccabees; Wisdom), as well as in the later books of Sirach (Sir 22:22, 27:16, 27:17, 27:21) and of Daniel, where it is a translation for the Aramaic raz (Dn 2:18–19, 2:27–28, 2:29–30, 2:47), but literary contexts do not confirm it either.

In the New Testament the term is almost always used as in Daniel 2, where a) mysteries are related to coming events, in particular at the end of time (see Dn 2:29f.) (eschatology*); b) they are divine, in the sense that they concern the eternal decisions of God*, where he alone could make them known through revelation*; c) beneficiaries of the mysteries were those whom he had chosen, and not the wise men of the world (see Dn 2:27f., 2:47f. LXX). These three components can be found in the New Testament, in revelations either on a precise point (Rom 11:25; 1 Cor 15:51) or on the entirety of divine decisions and their implementation (Mt 13:11; Mk 4:11; Lk 8:10; Rom 16:25; 1 Cor 2:1, 13:2; Eph 1:9, 3:9; Col 1:26; Rev 1:20, 10:7, 17:5–7). But although in Daniel 2 the revelations touch upon events that have not yet taken place, in the New Testament musterion designates not only future events, but also have as their primary subject Jesus Christ* (see 1 Cor 1–2; Col 1:27, 4:3; Eph 3:9, 5:32), whose ministry*, death* on the cross, and resurrection*, proclaimed as gospel, are unprecedented proof of the divine plan of salvation*, and which—in particular through the Resurrection—give a foretaste of the end of time.

b) Dimensions of musterion according to Saint Paul. By naming the divine plan for salvation musterion, the texts of the New Testament not only aimed to emphasize the inability of humankind to gain knowledge of it by themselves, but also indicated that once this plan for salvation had been revealed, human wisdom would remain powerless to understand it and receive it, for it was accomplished through means and events that appeared unreasonable. It was therefore not only because the divine ways had not been revealed up until then that they were a mystery (Col 1:26–27, 2:2; Eph 3:9), but also because, even when they were revealed and proclaimed, the world could not recognize them as being willed by God. This explains therefore why Paul saw the mystery of God to be exemplified by the cross of Jesus (see 1 Cor 1:18–24). But the cross was not the only event that aroused astonishment. Colossians and Ephesians also insist on the way in which faith* in Jesus the Son of God (filiation*) could be experienced by all cultures (inculturation*), and this Paul calls “Christ among the nations” (see Col 1:27) (universalism*). This presence of Christ among the nations is unprecedented, because pagan nations were not waiting for a Messiah, and because in the Jewish hypothesis of their conversion* to the true God, it was up to them to go up to Jerusalem*, the holy city. The fact that, with the message of the gospel, salvation would reach the Gentiles wherever they were, and that their diversity went hand in hand with a strong unity under Christ, to the degree that the church* came to be called his body, were all part of the mystery (Eph 5:21–23).

c) Use of the Term and Its Reasons. The Pauline usage of the term is paradoxical, in particular in Colossians and Ephesians, for the gospel must be announced to all, whereas mystery contains the notion of a secret that surpasses understanding. However, Colossians and Ephesians make them practically synonymous (the mystery is the gospel itself; Eph 6:19), and this is not by chance. In telling of newness in Jesus Christ, mysterion in fact enabled the gospel to be proclaimed with the help of new concepts. But even as it led to new formulations within the gospel, it also provided a basis for their legitimacy. The remarks in Colossians and Ephesians about the church and its relation to Christ were not, of course, predictive. Nor were they announced as such in Scripture. But if messages such as these cannot be founded on Scripture, do they not run the risk of being invalidated and discredited? It is in this respect that the use of the term mysterion takes on its prime significance. For it is borrowed from Scripture—Daniel 2 was already a part of the holy books*—and, as the voice of Scripture, it signaled that Scripture had not announced everything, that at the end of time God would have new things to say. This was a paradoxical use of a scriptural term to justify the usage of nonscriptural terms (body/head, etc.)!

Even though, as a message of the unprecedented, mystery is not per se focused on the past, it nevertheless enables one to reread the past. Because it provides entry to the intelligence of the eternal wisdom of God, through the paradoxical coherence of his designs, mystery authorizes believers to (re)read Scripture on the basis of the novelty experienced and announced, and to see therein the correspondences and foundation stones for a spiritual and, above all, a typological reading (see Rom 16:26; Eph 5:32) (senses of Scriptures*).

Subsequently, mysterion would be expressed through sacramentum (from the first African Latin translations) and would come to designate the celebrations that are now known as sacramental.

- G. Bornkamm (1942), “Mustèrion,” ThWNT 4, 809–34.
- K. Prümm (1957), “Mystères,” DBS 6, Paris, 1–225.
- R. Penna (1978), Il mysterion paolino: Traiettorie e costituzione, Brescia.
- Ch. Reynier (1992), Évangile et mystère: Les enjeux théologiques de l'épître aux Éphésiens, Paris.
- J.-N. Aletti (1995), “Sagesse et mystère chez Paul,” in La sagesse biblique: De l'Ancien au Nouveau Testament, Paris, 267–90.

JEAN-NOËL ALETTI

See also* Apocalyptic Literature; Christ and Christology; Church; Evil; History; Intertestament; Knowledge of God; Pauline Theology; Religion, Theology of; Revelation; Sacrament; Scripture, Fulfillment of; Universalism; Wisdom

B. Liturgical and Sacramental Theology

a) In the Churches of the Aramaic and Syriac Languages. The tradition of these churches stemmed directly from the biblical heritage of the Jewish tradition. The word raza, whose Persian origin has been established—Raz designates the secret of the major royal council of the Achaemenid and Sasanid empires, where the most important decisions were made (Dalmais 1990)—corresponds to the Greek mysterion, and its plural, raze, to musteria. In the singular it designated either mystery or the Eucharist*. In the plural it could be extended to the other sacramental mysteries from before the fifth century, having previously referred exclusively to the divine plans that were kept secret, then revealed, as in Daniel. The enigmatic sense of these raze remains, but the idea of an anticipated unveiling prevailed, even when the plural raze referred to the rites destined to show and to give what they concealed. The result was a certain eschatological emphasis in the liturgy*.

This cultic sense of the term is attested in the fourth century by Aphraates, Ephraem, Theodore of Mopsuestia, and then by other masters from Edessa and Nisibis. Aphraates speaks of “these mysteries, raze, which the saint ordered for the celebration of Easter” (Demonstr. XII on Mosaic Easter, SC 349, 298, §1 and 10). Given to the “first people,” mysteries are no more than signs, ata, type, tupsa, figure, dmuta, dumya, salma, of a truth* fulfilled through the Easter of the Lord and through “true baptism*: the mystery, raza, of the passion* of our Savior,” which he prescribed to his disciples to give. The fruit of salvation* that issues from the cross is “the sign of the mystery of life,” rushma d-raza d-hayyé, communicated by the sacraments* (Dalmais 1990; Diatessaron by Ephraem XXI, 11, SC 121, 380).

For Ephraem, raza was combined with other words of the same semantic register to form expressions such as braza-w-tupsa, which designated the liturgical acts of the church. It was then the “already there” of their eschatological content that was emphasized by “often indicating a resemblance between the symbol and that which it symbolized” (P. Youssif in Dalmais 1990). After having been collected in the Torah, the mysteries were “incarnated” in Christ*, who fulfills all the symbols, in the expectation of their unveiling, but “to the point of comprising an integral part” (G. Saber in Dalmais 1990). This theology* would become more refined with Theodore of Mopsuestia (Catechesis and other representatives of this tradition) (Dalmais 1990).

b) In the Greek-Language Churches. Pagan mystery cults persisted from the seventh century B.C. until the third century A.D. in the Greek world and Hellenized regions. Their terminology was progressively adopted by Christians. Furthermore, their strong imprint on the Christian liturgy of the fourth century is clear, not solely in terms of language but even in the character of the ritual experience.

The shared root mu(s) of the related Greek terms mustes, musteria, in relation with the verb muo, which designated the act of “closing one’s eyes and lips” when confronted with something that would therefore remain secret (Burkert 1987), suggested the attitude of fear that dramaturgical activity aroused: the sensation of the presence of gods and sacred silence. The mysteries of Eleusis, for example, were called arretos telete: a prohibition, aporrheta, ensured their prestige and effectiveness. The fascination exerted by the gods required the ritual workings of the unexpected and unspeakable, arrheton, of the “terrible” presence, fascinating and gratifying, of an almost tangible holiness in the experience of knowledge, of agony, pathein, and of exaltation aroused by the initiatory ritual drama. In certain cases the mysteries were the expression of the human soul*’s religious fervor in its will to take part, from the moment of earthly life, in the mythical itinerary of the gods through the anamnestic story, through the initiatory rites and acts that constituted the sacred drama. This salutary experience of renewal was sometimes linked to a promise regarding the afterlife. The ritual symbolism that pagan mysteries practiced was more that of an initiation, telein and telete, into the divine, than that of a social link. There was no body of doctrine; nor were the followers required to repudiate the practices of shared religion. It is better therefore to speak of a cult of mysteries than of a religion of mysteries (Burkert 1987).

When the apologists of the second century developed the typological interpretation of history and of biblical writings on Philo’s model, the use of the word “mysteries,” musteria (Justin, Dial. 40 and 24; 44, 85, 111, 138), once again designated the events and the revealed secrets of God’s plan of salvation in Jesus Christ (Justin, I Apol. 1, 13; Dial. 74, 91). But the usage in worship culminated with Justin, when he denounced pagan mysteries as the demonic counterfeits of Christian rites (I Apol. 1, 54; 66, 4; Dial. 70, 78). Tertullian*, Firmicus, the Ambrosiaster, and Augustine* would do likewise.

Melito of Sardis sang of the mystery of Easter (SC 123, 2), which was, for him, the event of salvation “announced in the law,” the object of proclamation within the paschal Christian assembly and the ritual mystery of the New Covenant*. The technical expression of the mysteries of worship, “to accomplish the mystery entirely at night (nuktor diatelesas to musterion),” with regard to the ancient Easter festival according to Exodus 12:10 (ibid., 15, 16, 68, and 145 n. 95) leads one to conclude that it included Christian Easter, and its accomplishment, as a mystery, that is, as a ritual celebrated by a community of initiates bringing about through the acts they implemented the saving act of God, which took on the shape of an event.

Clement of Alexandria expressed the mysterious nature of Christianity with the help of the technical vocabulary of the ritual mysteries (Strom. IV, 3, 1; IV, 162, 3; V, 9–10; Protreptique, 12). The Gnostics appreciated the category of the mysterious, which had already enabled them to express an entire portion of the philosophical quest (Diotima of Mantinea in Plato’s Symposium, 210 a–212 c); Clement, in the same vein (Riedweg 1987), saw in Christianity the true gnosis* (Strom. V, 57, 2; VI, 124, 16).

According to Origen, “the mystery of Christ is refracted through the Church, as it appears in the Scripture. It is also manifest in the sacraments” (Bornert 1966). The sacraments, tupoi, enabled a participation, by both designating it and by hiding it, in the truth, aletheia, of the mystery, of which the old covenant was merely a shadow, skia. Unveiled through Christ, it would not be fully manifest until its eschatological accomplishment. This revelation* of the mystery provided the basis for the typological interpretation of Scripture found in Origen. It derived from Judaism*, which also applied it to rites. Origen did the same. It is therefore probable that these hermeneutics*, identical in the case of the mysteries (divine plans) proclaimed by the biblical text and in that of the ritual mysteries that signified them, led to a generalized acceptance of the notion of ritual mysteries. Origen called Christianity in general “the teletai which are our own” (Cels. 3, 59). Julian, his adversary, saw in Christianity a new telete (Burkert, 1987).

Eusebius of Caesarea saw in the “mysteries of [Christ’s] body and his blood” (Demonstr. Ev. V, 3) the best example of the fulfillment of the sacrifice* of the peoples (Demonstr. Ev. I, 10). Musteria then came to be a preferred term for the Eucharist. Expressions related to the adjective mystikos, “mystic eulogy,” would be found, for example, in Cyril* of Alexandria.

In the fourth century the celebration of the sacraments of initiation* was provided with systematic commentary by the Fathers*, who drew on the terminology of the pagan mysteries. The categories and language of the mysteries allowed them, it would seem, to elaborate a mystagogy of the celebration, the efficacy of which became culturally possible and pastorally urgent (Ph. de Roten 1993). The risks of confusion with pagan worship were disappearing. It was now possible to validate the liturgical experience by means of a more mysterious ritual capable of inciting those who were reluctant to convert* to become baptized, and to signify more effectively the essential graces* of illumination and their source: Christ, at the right hand of the Father (Kretschmar 1970). The emphasis was placed on the simultaneously gratifying, inexpressible, and “terrible” nature of the mystery of salvation realized in the terrible and sacred mysteries of the Easter drama. Cyril of Jerusalem, Epiphanius of Salamina, Basil* of Caesarea, Gregory* of Nazianzus, and Gregory* of Nyssa are noteworthy (Ph. de Roten 1993). The most typical author in this respect is Saint John Chrysostom*: there are 66 occurrences of the vocabulary of mystery in his work, and 17 in the eight baptismal catecheses (SC 50).

Pseudo-Dionysius* distinguished the number and degree of the holy mysteries and described a Christian theurgy where they were organized in hierarchical fashion. For their part, they contributed to the union of man to Trinitarian thearchy (the very principle of deity). The central concept was that of the illumination, which led to give to initiation the privileged dimension of contemplation. For Gregory* Palamas, the heir to Dionysius, the reception of divine light occurred through communion* with the mystery of the illuminating eucharistic body of Christ.

c) In the Latin Churches. The sacraments were also called mysteries in the Latin tradition, yet here again, it was only once the risk of confusion with the worship of pagan mysteries had disappeared (Ambrose*, Hilary* of Poitiers, etc.), but the ready transliteration of the plural musteria was carefully avoided throughout the first three centuries for Christian rites (Mohrmann 1952), whereas this was not the case of the singular musterion, which became mysterium. This singular mysterium could indeed be used without risk, for it had become a term in the common language that had a profane and general meaning—“secret,” “mystery”—whereas the implications of musteria or mysteria were still exclusively cultic and pagan. Also rejected were the Latin equivalents of Greek words designating sacred acts and the cultic experience of the mystery religions (sacra, arcana, initia, and so on), in favor of sacramentum and sacramenta, which were unambiguous (Tertullian) (see sacrament*). The word “mysteries” has sometimes been used in its cultic sense in the various liturgical books that emerged after the final liturgical reform called for by Vatican* II.

Related to such semantic evolutions, and considered from the point of view of their ability to make of the celebration an epiphany of the mystery, these three traditions of the inculturation* of the Christian liturgy permit various theological emphases, as well as the emergence of derivatives (excessive allegorization, didactic moralism, and so on) and elaborations (Dalmais 1990).

d) Theology of Mysteries. In returning to a concept of Christian mystery centered on the liturgy (Schilson 1982), this theology renewed all fields of theological inquiry in the 20th century. It was this theology that was the principal initiator of a number of patristic studies of the Musterion in our century.

In 1921 Dom Casel (1886–1948), a monk of Maria Laach (1907) and chaplain of the Benedictines of Herstelle (1922–48), was entrusted by his abbot, Dom Herwegen (†1946), with the compilation of the Jahrbuch für Liturgiewissenschaft (nowadays called the Archiv für L.), where up until 1941 he published a series of liturgical studies (Santagada 1967, Bibl. gen.). His spiritual teachings from Herstelle display a theology whose style and content are truly mystagogic. The spread of his teachings to France, at the instigation of the Centre de pastorale liturgique, began in the 1940s.

This theology would have to meet the challenge of historians of the modernist period who saw in the pagan mysteries the origin of the Christian sacraments. As a result, the Jewish antecedents of Christian worship were neglected; Casel (1921) detected in these pagan mysteries—initially in a balanced fashion, and then by forcing analogies—a providential “propaedeutics” of Christian worship. Although recent research (Burkert 1987) into these mysteries has corrected such perspectives on a historical level, Casel’s theological vision recalls for today the pertinence of a vision of wisdom that seeks to understand the soteriological status of religions and the rightful place of liturgy in any synthesis of Christian theology. Reference to pagan mysteries comes essentially within the method of a fundamental* theology of worship.

Casel’s perspective seeks to reconcile theology, spirituality, and liturgy. He insists less on the instrumental effectiveness of the sacraments than on their relation to the paschal mystery, which they accomplish in the form of communal liturgical acts; and in emphasizing their unity, Casel seeks to restore the theology of the church-as-mystery to the forefront, in its relation with the liturgy as the full realization of that mystery. A number of forgotten truths about the sacraments have thus been highlighted once again.

- O. Casel (1921), Die Liturgie als Mysterienfeier, Freiburg; (1932), Das christliche Kultmysterium, Regensburg.
- C. H. Mohrmann (1952), Latin vulgaire, latin des chrétiens, Paris.
- C. H. Mohrmann (1954), “Sacramentum dans les plus anciens textes chrétiens,” in HThR, 47, 141–52 (also Études sur le latin des chrétiens, Rome, vol. 1, 1958, 233–44; vol. 3, 1965, 181–82).
- R. Bornert (1966), Les commentaires byzantins de la divine liturgie du VIIIe au XVe s., Paris.
- O. D. Santagada (1967), “Bibliografia generale,” ALW 10/1, 1–77.
- G. Kretschmar (1970), Die Geschichte des Taufgottesdienstes in der alten Kirche, Leit 5, Kassel.
- A. Schilson (1982), Theologie als Sakramententheologie, Die Mysterientheologie Odo Casels, TTS 18 (2nd Ed. 1987).
- L. Bouyer (1986), “Mystèrion,” du Mystère à la mystique, Paris.
- Ch. Riedweg (1987), Mysterienterminologie bei Platon, Philon et Klemens von Alexandrien, Berlin–New York.
- W. Burkert (1987), Ancient Mystery Cults, Cambridge, Mass.
- I. H. Dalmais (1990), “Raza et sacrement,” in P. De Clerck and E. Palazzo (Ed.), Rituels: Mélanges offerts au Père Gy, Paris, 173–82.
- Ph. de Roten (1993), “Le vocabulaire mystagogique de saint Jean Chrysostome,” in A. M. Triacca and A. Pistoia (Ed.), Mystagogie: Pensée liturgique d’aujourd’hui et liturgie ancienne, conferences of Saint-Serge, XXXIXth week of liturgical studies, 1992, Rome, 115–35.

NICOLAS DERREY

See also Liturgy; Sacrament

Mystical Body. See Church

Mystical Theology. See Negative Theology

Mysticism

Over the course of many centuries, it is impossible to disentangle the concept and the field of mysticism from theology* in general. From Bernard* of Clairvaux (1091–1153) onward, however, a literature of mysticism took on independent existence. It frequently set itself in continuity with the patristic heritage, and in reaction against a scholarly theology that had moved further and further away from its contemplative foundations. It is fair to say that this distance became a definite break in the West in the 14th century, when mysticism as a form of knowledge definitively asserted its autonomy, as demonstrated for example by Gerson's methodological considerations in his Théologie mystique (1402–8). It flourished first in the countries of northern Europe (mysticism conventionally identified as primarily “speculative,” that is, invoking a “mirror” of God in the soul*, alluding to 1 Cor 13:12), and then in Spain in the 16th century and France in the 17th (a more “affective” mysticism, that is, more attentive to the psychological aspects of the experience that it described). Within this framework, mysticism can be grasped in itself, and that is how it will be considered here.

I. Mystery and Mysticism

The word “mysticism” has lost all precision since Rousseau and the romantics applied it to any irrational experiences, especially those attributed to religious phenomena. We will restrict it here to its most classic Christian meaning of a perception of God* that is, so to speak, experimental, a genuine celebration of the soul at the inner coming of Christ*. It consists of “an experience of the presence of God in the spirit, through the inner joy that is given to us by an entirely personal feeling of that presence” (Tauler [1300–1361] Sermon XII. 1, referring to Jn 7:6). A modern commentator explains: “There we discover, experienced by the mystic with the clarity of the obvious, what each of us knows through his faith and by which he lives” (Garonne, in Cl. Moine, Relation spirituelle 7). What is involved then is a very particular coming to consciousness of the mystery* of Christ, and it was to evoke this that the word entered the Christian vocabulary with Clement of Alexandria (160–220). Mysticism is knowledge of the mystery, that is, knowledge that goes beyond the letter of Scripture and the signs of the liturgy* to the very reality designated by both, and that is hidden in God (see Bouyer, Histoire de la spiritualité chrétienne I, 486–96). From this point of view, a fundamental continuity links Abraham and Moses to John* of the Cross and Theresa of Lisieux, and the latter two claimed never to say anything but what was substantially contained in Scripture and transmitted by the church*.

Let us conclude our definition of the scope of the field of mysticism with the words of its most knowledgeable French interpreter in the 20th century, H. Bremond: “Good or bad, pagans or Christians, God is in us. Or better, we are in him. . . . He is in us before all our actions, and from the very beginning of our existence. . . . He is in us as the living principle of all life, present in everything that is most myself in myself, [so that] we are all potential mystics. We become so in reality as soon as we reach a certain consciousness of God in us, as soon as we in some sense experience his presence, as soon as this contact—which is, moreover, permanent and necessary between him and us—seems palpable to us, takes on the character of an encounter, of an embrace, a sense of being possessed” (Autour de l'humanisme).

II. Mystical Experience in Its Raw State

Let us begin with a particularly clear description of mystical experience from the Ursuline Marie of the Incarnation (1599–1672): “In the year 1620, on 24 March, a morning when I was going about my business, which I was earnestly dedicating to God. . . . I was suddenly halted, inwardly and outwardly. . . . Then, in an instant, the eyes of my spirit were opened and all the faults, sins*, and imperfections that I had committed from the day of my birth were represented to me in general and in detail, with a distinction and clarity more certain than any certainty that human industry could express. At the same moment, I saw myself entirely immersed in blood, and my spirit [was] convinced that this blood was the Blood of the Son of God, for the shedding of which I was guilty through all the sins that had been shown to me, and that this precious Blood had been shed for my salvation*. . . . At the same moment, my heart felt ravished from itself and changed into love* for him who had granted this remarkable mercy*, which caused my heart, in the experience of this same love, to feel the most extreme sorrow and regret that can be imagined for having offended him.... What the soul conceives in this marvel cannot be expressed.... These visions and these operations are so penetrating that in an instant they say everything and express their efficacy and their effects.... And what is the most incomprehensible, the rigor [of this arrow of love] seems gentle.... Coming back to myself, I found myself standing, stopped in front of the little chapel of the reverend Feuillant Fathers... in Tours” (Écrits spirituels et historiques II, 181–84).

Narratives as spectacular as this often seem to imply that mystical experience is reserved to quite exceptional, if not abnormal, individuals. Let us therefore forget the divorce between theology and mysticism and read the same irruption of the supernatural* in its most minimal manifestations: “Mystics are not supermen. Most of them do not experience ecstasy or visions.... Moreover, it may be, and I am personally almost convinced of this, that in the most humble prayer*, and even more in the slightest aesthetic feeling, there takes shape an experience of the same order that is already mystical, but imperceptible and evanescent” (H. Bremond, loc. cit.).

Even so, the exceptional intensity of the episode recounted by Marie of the Incarnation makes it possible to observe under a microscope the characteristic elements of any mystical life:

- Complete discontinuity between that experience and all others: “I was suddenly halted, inwardly and outwardly.”
- Lucidity and certainty: “The eyes of my spirit were opened...with a distinction and clarity more certain”—and we should note the clarity of the memory when Marie was writing 34 years after the event, and from the distant Canada where she was to die.
- Loving and transforming presence of him who thus penetrates into the soul: “My heart felt ravished from itself and changed into love for him who had granted this remarkable mercy.”
- Suspension of the flow of time: “In an instant... at the same moment... at the same moment.”
- Hence the simultaneity of perceptions that the soul is accustomed to dissociate: the soul is immersed in a rapture that is at the same time sorrow, but whose “rigor seems gentle.”
- And by definition, the absolute inexpressibility of this experience: “What the soul conceives in this marvel cannot be expressed.”

III. Expressing the Mystical Experience

1. Mysticism and Language

We have just raised a question that has persisted since the 13th century, about the status of truly mystical texts. These claim to say inexpressible things, “things that were, are, and will be,” all at once, explains John of the Cross (Ascent of Carmel 26. 3), for, at the root of its experience, the soul “has been united with pure intelligence, which is not in time” (ibid., 14. 10–11). Hence language in this context is subjected to extreme constraints, for “the signifier [in a language] being of auditory nature, it takes place only in time” (F. de Saussure, Cours de linguistique générale 103). There is therefore an irretrievable devaluation between the mystical experience and the account of it: “Human and external conversation offers to us the things of God so that we may enter into them; but in offering them to us, it degrades them in their dignity, debases and lowers them in order to make them comprehensible to the being who is clothed with the outer man” (C. de Condren, Lettres et discours, 1668).

Of course, any language is the articulation of eternity in time, but it is precisely that degradation that the mystic wants to remedy, for he has had the privilege of tasting things in their eternity, of contemplating them in the Word* (Jn 1:3f., according to the punctuation of Tatian [second century], adopted by all mystics), beyond language. Having become a writer, he experiences a fundamental contradiction and resolves it as well as he can only by constantly denouncing the weakness of words, putting them together in unexpected combinations intended to hold onto the vanishing presence to which they testify. In this, the mystical writer is basically a poet, whatever literary genre he may adopt, “the one who rediscovers the buried relationships among things, their dispersed similarities” (Michel Foucault, Les mots et les choses 63).

We should note in passing that the surprising cultural richness of mystics (Hadewijch [13th century] and Ruusbroec [1293–1381] in Flanders, Teresa of Avila [1515–82] in Spain, Francis de Sales [Salesian spirituality*] in France) finds its explanation here: approaching the unspeakable, the mystic returns language to its origin, recharging it with all the virtualities contained in the Word from which it proceeds, and shows us in turn that all language is rooted in this kind of experience.

2. Mysticism and Theology

Whatever his reason for expressing himself (linked most frequently to spiritual* direction given or received), the mystic in the end turns himself into a theologian in his attempt to name him whom he knows to be above any name. His hyperconsciousness of God leads his language into a constant process of going beyond itself by means of simultaneous affirmation and negation. God is not this or that, for he is eminently this and that and much more. Negative* and affirmative theology support one another in a continual invitation to join in pure faith him who gave himself first, beyond all reason and all speech. In the 14th century Eckhart analyzed this obligatory transcendence to its ultimate theoretical consequences: “You must love God not because He is lovable; He is above all love and all attraction of love. . . . You must love Him inasmuch as He is a Non-God, a Non-Intellect, a Non-Person, a Non-Image. Even more: inasmuch as he is One, pure, clear, limpid, separate from any duality. And in that One we must eternally lose ourselves: from Something to Nothingness” (Sermon 83).

Although negation constantly returns the theologian to the luminous origin of his knowledge, in an attitude of pure receptivity that precisely defines the act of faith*, it bases its impetus on the affirmative experience of previous acts of faith, crystallized in articles of faith, and as such available for a new transcendence: “Just as there are two acts of understanding, one called intellection of the indivisible, in which there is neither division nor composition, and which consists of the apprehension of the simple substance, and the other that we can call composition and division of propositions, so there are also two acts in the knowledge of faith. The first of these acts is the simple apprehension of the objects of faith, that is, the prime truth*; and the other is the compound knowledge of the mysteries of faith directed toward that truth” (Quiroga, Mystical apologia, 4. 2).

In defending the legitimacy of a contemplative theology, Quiroga (1562–1628), last champion of the great Spanish tradition against a pervasive theological rationalism*, was merely taking up Pseudo-Dionysius*, heir of Greek patristics, endlessly commented on by the medieval West, who had provided for the expression of mystical experience a structure and a vocabulary that remained essentially unchanged: “As for you, Timothy, deeply engaged in mystical contemplations, forget the perceptible as well as intellectual operations, everything that is perceptible and intelligible, everything that is not and everything that is, and raise yourself in unknowing toward union, as far as that is allowed, to what is beyond all essence and all knowledge. In fact, it is only through a free and total ecstasy outside yourself that you will be borne toward the super-essential ray of divine darkness” (Mystical theology, I. 1).

IV. Restoration of the Soul in Mystical Experience

1. Rectification of Language and Rectification of the Soul

All language is a revelation of spirit in matter; it unveils “silences that have taken on bodily form”

(Valéry, Œuvres complètes I, 624). In the silence of his experience, the mystic has found himself carried above this body of language (“the perceptible and the intelligible” of Pseudo-Dionysius) through which each one of us weaves his history in contact with a particular culture. And it is again that carnal density of language that the mystic goes through when, returning to the universe of words, he invites us through them to join in pure faith with him whom he now knows is entirely other from what he earlier imagined.

Moreover, words do not only acquire a new density in the course of this passage; they recover their true meaning, and the entire spiritual organism is thereby reoriented, departing from illusion and again becoming able to say what is. The major patristic themes provide for the most recent mysticism the anthropology* that it needs. Since man had turned away from God and turned toward the earth, these thinkers asserted, his soul had been distorted: “When man inclines toward earthly concupiscence, in a sense he bows down. . . .” (Augustine, PL 36. 595; see P. Delfgaauw, Saint Bernard, maître de l’Amour divin). And this “curvature” of the soul due to original sin* is redressed in the very act of man’s spiritual assumption: “but when he raises himself to things above, his heart grows upright” (ibid.). This is the source of all the purifications that the mystic experiences as he progresses in his illumination; just as the light of the sun reveals the spots on a window, so the light of God makes it possible to perceive one’s impurities and to detach oneself from them. This image, thoroughly developed by John of the Cross (e.g., in the Ascent of Carmel II. 5, 6), makes it possible to understand that the process of mystical transformation is at the same time a process of purification, and that divine contact, while fulfilling Adam*’s calling to share divine life, restores him to his primal innocence: “Under the apple tree, that is where I wed you, that is where I gave you my hand and you were restored, there where your mother was violated; by the apple tree the Beloved means the tree of the cross, on which the Son of God redeemed and consequently married human nature and consequently every soul” (Spiritual Song A 28. 3). The theme of purification, within that of union and transformation, here ties up with the theme of the passage from the image to the likeness of God, as it was developed for example by William of Saint Thierry (1085–1148), in a founding text of medieval and modern spiritual literature: “Nowhere, indeed, is the measure of human imperfection better revealed than in the light of God’s face, in the mirror of the vision of God. There, the one who, in relation to eternity, sees better and better what is lacking to him, corrects by a daily likeness all the evil he had done by unlikeness, approaching through likeness him from whom he had been removed by un-likeness. And thus an ever clearer likeness accompanies an ever clearer vision” (SC 223, §271).

2. Classic Stages of the Inner Life

This journey goes through customary stages set forth as early as Origen*, and accounts of it have engendered a spiritual topography virtually the same in all mystics, even though all of them are careful to tell us that this is only a practical guideline, and that God maintains complete freedom to elevate and restore his image in created beings following another pace and another chronology: In the various communications that God makes to souls of his gifts and his visitations, there is no certain and limited order, so that it may be said, for example, that after one process will come this other one; or, that from one level of prayer one moves to this other one (L. Lallement [1586–1635], La Doctrine spirituelle VII. 4, 9). In this respect, the case of Marie of the Incarnation, immersed with almost no preparation in the fullness of a total union with God, is exemplary.

With this reservation, the standard mystical journey is divided into three principal phases, corresponding to the transformation of the three zones of the personality sequentially seized by the divine presence (spiritual* life): the zone of the lower faculties (the senses), the zone of higher faculties (spirit), the connection between the two being accomplished by the imagination; and finally the summit of the soul, the place where the free and conscious act that defines the particularity of man in the image of God takes shape: “When man, through all his exercises, has drawn the outer man into the inner and reasonable man, when thereafter these two men, that is, the faculties of perception and of reason, are fully drawn into the innermost man, in the mystery of the spirit, where the true image of God is found, and when man thus gathered into himself leaps into the divine abyss in which he eternally was in his state as an uncreated being . . . then the divine abyss inclines itself and descends into the purified depth that is coming to him, and he gives to the created depth a higher form and draws it into the uncreated, so that the spirit is no longer anything but one with God” (Tauler, Sermon 62).

Mystical union properly speaking thus completes the reharmonization of the soul. Restored to its paradisaical normality, it is now entirely passive, undergoing divine penetration; and also entirely active, God acting freely in it. There it leads a perfectly happy life, the “common life” of Ruusbroec, the “spiritual marriage” and “transforming union” of Teresa of Avila and John of the Cross: “When the soul has reached that state, it matters very little to it whether it is in the trouble of daily concerns or in the quiet of solitude. Everything is the same to it, because everything that touches it, everything around it, everything that strikes its senses does not prevent the enjoyment of present love. In the conversation and noise of the world, it is in solitude in the chamber of the Bridegroom, that is, in its own depths where it caresses him, converses with him, and nothing can trouble that divine exchange It seems that Love has taken hold of everything, when the soul made a gift of it by acquiescing to the higher part of the spirit, where this God of love has given himself to the soul, and the soul reciprocally to God” (Marie of the Incarnation, Écrits I, 360ff.).

V. Structure of the Soul and the Mystical Experience

1. The Soul Discovers That It Is Trinitarian

Knowledge* of God and knowledge of self thus advance at the same pace, a process summed up in Augustine’s expression noverim te, noverim me (“may I know You so that I may know myself!” Soliloquies I. 2). We must follow Augustine in the elaboration of a structure of the soul that was to dominate all of Western mysticism.

Twelve centuries before Descartes*, Augustine felt surprise at thinking, and saw in that single indubitable experience the core of his religious experience, the fixed point of every certainty, if not of all of reality. What is thinking, in fact, but wishing to know? But what is knowing but recognizing what is; better still, recognizing the one who is? In fact, my quest is not simple curiosity, but a groping response to a vital call, a response to a person whom I will perhaps never identify, but who draws me to a place before my thought, at the same time that he gives himself to me in the dual form of knowledge and love, Truth and the Good*: “Where then did I find you so that I could learn of you, if not in the fact that you transcend me?” (Confessions X. xxvi [37]). The place before my thought, where I exist in God, is my memory, the background of my consciousness, of which the capacity to remember is only a partial actualization, and which, for Augustine, fundamentally defines thought as recollection.

The exploration of that recollection then reveals to us three centers between which all spiritual activity unfolds as an advent of him whom we perceive as the source of truth and goodness, three centers that we will identify as Father*, Son, and Holy* Spirit when “the Truth himself, having become man and speaking with men, will reveal itself to those who believe” (De libero Arbitrio 13. 37). This sourceless source associates us with the Father in the exercise of our memory (in the sense, this time, of the faculty of remembering). This truth that we receive from it in the knowledge that we have of it associates us with the Son in the exercise of our intelligence. And this goodness that we attain when we actively conform ourselfes to this truth associates us with the Holy Spirit in the exercise of our will (see Trin. XIV. 7. 19). And we find again in this advent the movement from the capacity and the image of God, which every human person bears, to its actualization in the final likeness that presupposes having “put on Christ” (Gal 3:27).

2. Anthropological Vocabulary of the Mystics

For a minimal set of guidelines in the descriptions that mystics give us of their experience, here is their most common anthropological vocabulary, bearing in mind that the traditions to which they refer constantly intermingle, and that there would be little to be gained from attempting to disentangle lines of influence.

a) Summit of the Soul. Its mystical transformation corresponds to the “unitive way” (Pseudo-Dionysius), to the state of the “perfect” (Origen, William of Saint Thierry, John of the Cross), to the “spiritual man” (William of St. Thierry), to the “super-essential life” (Ruusbroec) or “super-eminent life” (Benet of Canfield, Bernières de Louvigny, Jean de Saint-Samson), and to the “transforming union” (John of the Cross). In an ascendant view of spiritual life, mystics speak of it as the “pinnacle” of the soul (Bonaventure*, Camus), or “pinnacle of the spirit” (Hugh of Balma), as the “heaven of the soul” (Marie of the Incarnation, who also expresses it as the “higher part of the spirit”). To express the fact that all psychic activity derives from it and returns to it, they speak of it as the “spark” of the soul (Bernard, Eckhart), as the “point of the soul” (Louis de Blois, Francis de Sales, 17th-century France), or “point of the intellect” (Yves de Paris), as its “center” (Teresa of Avila, John of the Cross, James of Milan, Marie of the Incarnation, Francis de Sales, Maria Petyt, Camus, Laurent of the Resurrection), and as its “ground” (Ruusbroec, Rhineland*-Flemish mysticism, Marie of the Incarnation, Jean de Saint-Samson, Laurent of the Resurrection).

At the same time it makes up the inalienable part of the soul, the “substance” (Julian of Norwich, John of the Cross), the “essence” (Thomas* Aquinas, Ruusbroec, Eckhart, Tauler, Harphius, Benet of Canfield), seat of the “unity of the spirit” (Camus), and of the “essential unity” (Ruusbroec). To indicate that only God can accede to it, they use the images of the “citadel” (Plato, Plotinus, Eckhart), the “seventh dwelling” (Teresa of Avila), and the “chamber” (Angela of Foligno). In a more psychological register, they speak of it as “simple intelligence” (Sandeus) or “intellectual part of the soul” (Piny). It is the Greek noûs or the Latin mens; the “animus” (Augustine, Tauler), the “synderesis” (Bonaventure, Hugh of Balma, Eckhart, with an emphasis on will; Thomas Aquinas, with the twofold aspect of knowledge and will), “intelligence and synderesis” (Gerson), “higher reason” (Thomas Aquinas), the “intellectual sense” (Richard of Saint-Victor), or again “memory” understood as the ground of the soul in Augustine. Finally, they sometimes simply call it “spirit,” in the triad spiritus, anima (higher part of the soul), corpus, referring to 1 Thessalonians 5:23.

b) Higher Part of the Soul. Its transformation corresponds to the “illuminative way” (Pseudo-Dionysius), to the state of the “progressors” (Origen, William of Saint Thierry, John of the Cross), to the “rational man” (William of Saint Thierry). In Augustine it is the memoria as it encompasses other faculties, that is, the “higher powers” (radiating in their variety from the mens: Ruusbroec, Harphius), or “rational powers”—“memory,” “understanding” (or “intelligence,” or “intellect”), and “will”—from Augustine on and for all those who follow him. It is also found as “rational sense” in Richard of Saint-Victor, and as the pairing “reason and will” in Gerson. It corresponds to the Greek psukhé and the Latin spiritus. It appears simply as anima in the spiritus, anima, corpus triad. This higher part is the seat of the “spiritual senses,” in mystical perception, with intellect paired with vision, memory with hearing, and will with the senses of smell, taste, and touch.

c) Lower Part of the Soul. Its transformation corresponds to the “purgative way” (Pseudo-Dionysius), the state of “beginners” (Origen, William of Saint Thierry, John of the Cross), to “animal man” (William of Saint Thierry). It groups together the “lower powers,” radiating out in their variety from the “heart” (Ruusbroec, Harphius). It includes the “sensitive powers” (the five senses) and the “appetitive powers” (the “irascible” and the “concupiscent” forming the “natural passions*,” expressed according to various divisions, notably, desire, repulsion, joy, sadness, love, hatred, fear, and so on). For Gerson it is “sensuality” (for its aspect as knowledge) and “animal appetite” (for its aspect as love). It sometimes appears simply as anima in contrast to the animus constituted by the higher powers.

The best traditional presentation of the spiritual organism can be found in the preface to one of the most read manuals of the Renaissance, the Institution spirituelle by Louis de Blois (1551).

VI. Authentication of Mystical Phenomena

1. Role of the Spiritual Director

We have seen that mystical rectification of the soul and rectification of language go hand in hand. This entry of God into words qualifies mystical experience as a phenomenon of revelation and of prophecy. Scholasti-cism* treated it as such (see the introduction of Thomas Aquinas to ST IIa IIae q. 171). This revelation (individual revelations*), private as long as the church does not officially take it into account (e.g., by giving the title of doctor to a Teresa of Avila or a Francis de Sales), may be compared for the Christian to already authenticated forms of revelation, namely, Scripture and tradition*. This comparison makes it possible for the mystic to judge the tree by its fruits in a domain in which the soul has no direct access to the source of its experience. The basic role of the spiritual director is to carry out this confrontation between revelation and Revelation, in order to invite the mystic either to follow or not to follow the inner call. In either case, it involves relying on the words of faith to reinvigorate the movement of faith, the only attitude toward salvation required of the Christian, whether or not he is a mystic. Without these words he would be at the mercy of the inadequacy of the relation between what he has experienced and what he believes he knows of God: “it is a difficult thing, full of suffering, for a soul not to understand itself in these moments and to find no one who understands it. It may happen, indeed, that God leads a soul along a very high road of obscure contemplation and dryness, on which it will seem to be lost” (John of the Cross, Ascent of Carmel, Prologue).

This explains the importance, emphasized by all the masters, of a competent and experienced director for the journey. It also explains the importance, from the Christian point of view, of the evangelization* of the experience, so that it may be liberated from all its false meanings and develop in correspondence to the fundamental revelation that is found in Jesus*, only Word* of the Father (see John of the Cross, Ascent of Carmel, II. 22).

2. Link with Scripture and the Magisterium of the Church

To return to spiritual* direction, there is a contribution of authentic mysticism to the tradition: in its adhesion to the revealing God that defines faith, it receives in its understanding more than any other experience “a certain impression of the knowledge of God” (Thomas Aquinas, ST Ia. q. 1. a. 3. ad 2). This is the creative role of contemplation in theology and preaching* (and the very word “theology” at first designated contemplation as such, before indicating its teachable result, and then only a theoretical result, when the divorce between the two was complete; see ST IIa IIae. q. 188. a. 6).

VII. Evaluation of Peripheral Phenomena

Faith alone qualifies Christian experience, and the lucidity of faith qualifies mystical experience. The fact remains that the mystic, Christian or not, is sometimes subject to spectacular phenomena, ranging from visions, rapture, and temporary loss of consciousness to levitation, extreme fasting, and stigmata. The variability of these phenomena, depending on time and place, indicates that none of them is essential to mystical experience. All are not susceptible to the same interpretation. Let us set out some guidelines.

- The restoration of the soul never occurs in a perfectly linear fashion. Even in the most classic journeys, its tangible zone is not definitively reorganized until that has been accomplished for its spiritual zone. This is why there are inevitable turbulences in perception, when the soul sees a union with God located high above it: “then for some there is a transport of impatience, within and without.... In this transport it happens that one perceives sublime and profitable words suggested and pronounced inwardly.... Some can then not prevent true tears from flowing.... Out of these transports and this impatience, some are on occasion drawn upward in spirit above the senses; and they perceive through words addressed to them, through images or tangible pictures shown to them, some truth...or the proclamation of things to come. This is what is called revelations or visions or the like” (Ruisbroec, Ornament of the Wedding II. 2).
- This kind of phenomenon is likely to become less marked in a more mature experience: “When the soul has been purified by the great number of ordeals that it has gone through, when it has life only for Jesus Christ, often all these favors are taken from it, or rather they are converted into other favors, more hidden but more precious and more excellent. It is led on a path more detached from the senses, a more spiritual path” (P. de Clorivière [1735–1820], Considérations sur l'exercice de la prière et de l'oraison II, 46).
- Within the union properly speaking, other kinds of refraction of the inner experience may occur in the body, either in a still disorderly form, or as a harmonious somatic expression of the experience. Levitation, for example, still belongs to a disorder, in that it reflects a certain divorce between body and soul: “Though mortal, he tastes the good of the immortal; though bound to the weight of a body, he acquires the lightness of a spirit. Thus, very often, his body is raised from the earth, thanks to the perfect union that the soul has achieved with me [Christ], as though the weighty body had become light. Not that it is deprived of its weight, but because the union that the soul has achieved with me is more perfect than the union between soul and body” (Catherine of Siena, Dialogues, ch. 79).

- In contrast, stigmatization (and its overtones, such as seraphic transverberation) is a complete association of the body with the same union: “Because the pains of him [Christ] whom I love come from his love, insofar as they afflict me through compassion, they delight me through kindness. . . . It was this love that brought the stigmata on the loving seraphic Saint Francis, and the burning wounds of the Savior on the loving angelic Saint Catherine of Siena, loving kindness having sharpened the points of loving compassion” (François de Sales, Traité de l’amour de Dieu V, 5).

This spectacular aspect of their experience has never been sought by mystics; all of them regret, as a lesser joy, what it may express of disorder, and they emphasize the purely accidental character of what is accidental to the union. For example, Marie of the Incarnation speaks of her own maturity: “There are no visions or imaginings in this state; what you know happened to me in the past [the vision of her Canadian mission when she was still in Tours] only had to do with Canada; all the rest lies in the purity of faith, in which, however, we have an experience of God in a wonderful way” (Letter 263, 888).

Thus proper course is to take no account of these phenomena, whether they take place at the beginning of spiritual life or in its full flower: “Men in this state must dominate themselves by reason, as far as possible, and await the end that God has established: thus the fruit of virtue* is kept for eternity” (Ruusbroec, op. cit., referring to beginners).

- A. Soudreau (1896), Les degrés de la vie spirituelle, Angers.
- W.R. Inge (1899), Christian Mysticism, London.
- H. Delacroix (1908), Études d’histoire et de psychologie du mysticisme, Paris.
- E. Underhill (1911), Mysticism, London.
- M. Grabmann (1922), Wesen und Grundlagen des Mystik, Munich.

- C. Butler (1922), Western Mysticism, London.
- A. Tanquerey (1923), Précis de théologie ascétique et mystique, Paris.
- J. Maréchal (1924–37), Études sur la psychologie des mystiques, 2 vols., Bruges-Brussels-Paris.
- A. Gardeil (1927), La structure de l’âme et l’expérience mystique, Paris.
- M. de la Taille (1928), “Théories mystiques,” RSR 18, 297–325.
- R. Otto (1929), West-Oestliche Mystik, Gotha.
- A. Poulain (1931), Des grâces d’oraison, Paris.
- Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique* (1932–95), 16 vols. plus charts, Paris.
- Crisógono de Jesús (1933), Compendio de ascética y mística, Madrid.
- H. Rahner (1935), “Die Lehre der Kirchenväter von der Geburt Christi im Herzen der Gläubigen,” ZKTh 59, 333–418.
- A. Stolz (1936), Theologie der Mystik, Ratisbonne.
- J. de Guibert (1937), Theologia spiritualis ascetica et mystica, Rome.
- VI. Lossky (1944), Essai sur la théologie mystique de l’Église d’Orient, Paris.
- R.C. Zaehner (1961), Mysticism Sacred and Profane: An Inquiry into Some Varieties of Praeternatural Experience, New York–Oxford.
- B. Jimenez-Duque (1963), Teología de la mística, Madrid.
- A. Ravier (1965), La m. et les mystiques, Paris.
- L. Bouyer, L. Cognet, J. Leclercq, F. Vandenbroucke (1966), Histoire de la spiritualité chrétienne, 3 vols., Paris.
- L. Gardet (1970), La mystique, Paris.
- W. Beierwaltes, H. U. von Balthasar, A. M. Haas (1974), Grundfragen der Mystik, Einsiedeln.
- Coll. (1977), “M.,” StMiss 26—W. Johnston (1984), Christian Mysticism Today, San Francisco.
- J. Colette (1986), “Mystique et philosophie,” RSPHTh 70, 329–48.
- B. McGinn (1992), The Foundations of Mysticism, vol. 1, New York, 265–343.
- N. Pike (1992), Mystic Union: An Essay in the Phenomenology of Mysticism, Ithaca-London.
- P. Gerlitz (1994), “Mystik,” TRE 23, 533–92 (bibl.).
- K. Albert (1996), Einführung in die philosophische Mystik, Darmstadt.
- P. Miquel (1997), Mystique et discernement, Paris.

MAX HUOT DE LONGCHAMP

See also Asceticism; Contemplation; Experience; Knowledge of God; Life, Spiritual; Prayer; Spiritual Theology

Myth

There is no universally accepted definition of myth, but a good starting point is that of Mircea Eliade: “Myth relates a sacred history*; it relates a history which took place in primordial times.” We might add that myth offers a way of experiencing the world and a model of active social integration.

a) Approaches to Myth. The Enlightenment placed myth in the sphere of the irrational. In the view of 19th-century evolutionism it represented an infantile stage of humanity, a savage or unhealthy form of language. For Tylor and J.G. Frazer, the latter being the author of The Golden Bough, myth was an attempt to explain the world, but one shackled by a confused way of thinking (which would be incisively criticized by Wittgenstein*). L. Lévy-Bruhl, in his early works, also insisted on the primitive character of myths and their connection with a prelogical mode of thought. According to Cassirer, on the other hand, myth had a logic, even if it was not the logic of scientific thought. For his part B. Malinowski proposed a functionalist approach, seeing myths as codifying and justifying the beliefs and practices of primitive societies, and making possible an active integration within those societies.

Nevertheless, the justification of social practices is not myth’s only function. In terms of the structural analysis developed by Georges Dumézil, mythological discourses have structures in common. According to Claude Lévi-Strauss the analysis of myth is to be undertaken by seeking out its particular logic. This leads to the development of a model inspired by Saussurean linguistics, in which myths form a closed system whose meaning derives from internal relationships. Permanent structures known as mythemes are thereby identified. These are stable “parcels of relationships” whose combinations make possible the diversity of the narratives*. Understanding myth is thus a matter of decoding its structural organization, and this analysis enables us to grasp the work of a human intellect, which is always the same, and which gives form to content and (unconsciously) organizes it into structures that reflect oppositions and tend gradually to mediate them. This is the work of an intellect that organizes myths just as strictly as it does societies.

By focusing in this way on the semiotic organization of language, the structural approach is inevitably led to take less account of the semantics that organizes units of discourse. Lévi-Strauss doubts whether human individuals and groups genuinely have the ability to construct themselves (Piaget). They are governed more than they govern; they merely choose combinations from a closed repertoire of possibilities. In the wake of structuralism the question is therefore to discover what becomes of the truth of myth when it is approached as a discourse, as an expressive phenomenon in search of meaning and reference.

According to Ricoeur, who asks this question, myth’s special characteristic is the deployment of a symbolic and metaphorical language, which shatters ordinary classifications and places at the disposal of human beings a tool that allows them to express that which can only be arrived at indirectly. Moreover, since myths are narratives, the manner in which their plots are constructed allows heterogeneous collections of events to become a unified story, making overall sense. Myth thus has a role of creative production, a poetic function; and also a heuristic function—that of opening up a world for itself at the same time as it gives rise to an expansion of language within language as such (semantic innovation).

Considered on the level of discourse, not all myths say the same thing. From the classifying approach favored in totemic societies to the metaphorical one cultivated in the Greek or Semitic worlds, a whole varied mythological repertoire may be sorted out and typologically categorized.

According to Freud*, myth is to be classed among those creations of the collective imagination that enable humankind to cope with the traumas that mark the passage to civilization. Guilty of assassinating its father in the person of Moses, the Jewish people was impelled by its guilt to set up a religion centered on a legalistic cult, while Christianity emphasized the murder of its God* and derived from it a religion of universal forgiveness. According to Jung, on the other hand, myth derives from a collective unconscious more archaic than the personal unconscious of Freud. E. Drewermann places himself within the Jungian tradition when he considers that Christianity draws on a timeless language of imagery, as presented equally in the Bible*, in myths, and in stories. In these terms myth performs two functions, reducing anxiety and contributing to the integration of the individual. G. Theissen disputes both these points: on the one hand, Christianity as a religion is a system of historically rooted signs; and on the other hand, far from reducing anxiety it offers the means to endure it.

b) Myth and the Bible. Is the Bible a myth or a collection of myths? To answer this question we must begin by focusing on the process of demythologization that goes on in it—already noted by Gunkel (see Gilbert 1979). The Bible, being monotheistic, abandons the theogonies of the Sumero-Semitic world. While mythological motifs do survive (e.g., Gn 6:1–2), a wholesale effort to combat polytheism is evident: in Genesis 1 the sun and moon are reduced to the status of light sources and are not named. The creation* of the world by God ensures that the gods are excluded from the universe.

If muthos is to be understood as a narrative entailing semantic innovation, then the Bible is close to such narratives, but the diversity of the literary genres that make up its structure tends to impose a characteristic literary style. That which gives such writing its coherence is to be found not in references to a primordial and theogonic period but in the recollection of an ostensibly historical sequence of events, that of the Exodus. This provides the motif for a history of salvation* that echoes throughout all the literary genres: the escape from Egypt, the covenant*, the gift of the law and of land. The creation narrative itself is charged with the history of salvation to come. For this reason the rabbi Rachi of Troyes (1040–1105) presented the creation of the world in terms of that of Israel*: “For the beginning, Israel, God created the heavens and the earth.”

Israel’s active integration into the world was achieved through the observance of the law. Of divine origin, this law was not in heaven but rather “very near you... in your mouth and in your heart” (Dt 30:14). Individual and collective behavior did not derive from a primordial past, but from a law that accompanied the people from the time of Sinai. The biblical myth, then, is not theogonic but exodic: God walked alongside his people to bring them out of Egypt (2 SM 7:7), and the founding law accompanied Israel throughout her history.

This entry into history of a saving God and the founding law may be described in terms of the cultural schemata of direct communication between the gods and history—but we should not be deceived. In fact Israel’s experience initiated her into the true stability of history and the density of its mediations. The relationship between heaven and earth is mediated through the memory of the saving event and by the observance of that law that “is not in heaven” (Dt 30:12). Thus the authors of the books of Samuel and Kings show themselves capable of a genuine historiographical work that establishes relationships between facts and persons and judges the actions of the kings of Israel without indulgence.

Messianic hope*, prophecy*, and apocalypics are all currents that would later emphasize the theme of the end. So salvation is hoped for from a future action of God. The memory of the Exodus leads on to an expectation that reuses protological and exodic images: a new creation, a new Adam*, a new law. The institutions and rites themselves are presented metaphorically in such a way as to open onto an unprecedented world: an ideal king, a heavenly temple*. The real world, its violence and its darkness, is reconsidered in terms of eschatological realities. The wisdom writings, for their part, take note of this imbalance between real and ideal history, and derive a modus vivendi from it.

In Bultmann’s “demythologizing” project the (theological and rational) treatment of myth consists of extracting from the muthos an older proclamation, the kerygma, kèrugma. The complex written forms of the narrative-muthos are thus dismissed in favor of oral utterances (the first apostolic preaching) that antedate their putting into narrative form—the structure of the text now represents only an objectification and an obstacle to faith*. Studies following Bultmann, on the other hand, have led to a rehabilitation of narrative and a more serious appraisal of that which makes the New Testament a written event, in which biblical myth is not repudiated but incorporated in the shape of the Old Testament, and in which Christ’s Passover* fulfils the original event of the Exodus. So the great narrative that runs from Genesis to the Apocalypse derives its unity from the plotting of a story narrated in terms of the figure of Christ. It is this plot structure that guarantees to the believer the Word* that inspires his faith.

Finally, in the work of Northrop Frye the Bible is explored as the myth—the narrative, the plot—that has acted as a source for Western mythologies (to be understood as the totality of discourses, including literature, which “explain the relationship between human beings and values”). Alongside science, which deals with our relationship with nature, myth expresses humanity’s concern with the ideal construction of a world of culture. All Western cultures over the last 2,000 years find their origins in the Bible and in a Judeo-Christian tradition* that has absorbed all the other myths: the Bible is thus the “great code” that offers us a model of both space and time.

- E. B. Tylor (1871), Primitive Culture, London.
- J. G. Frazer (1911–15), The Golden Bough, 12 vols., London.
- S. Freud (1912–13), “Totem und Tabu,” Imago.
- B. Malinowski (1916), Mythology of All Races, 13 vols., Boston.

- E. Cassirer (1922), Die Begriffsform im mythischen Denken, Leipzig-Berlin.
- L. Lévy-Bruhl (1935), La mythologie primitive, Paris.
- S. Freud (1939), Der Mann Moses und die monotheistische Religion, Amsterdam.
- C. G. Jung, Ch. Kerényi (1941), Einführung in das Wesen der Mythologie, Zürich.
- M. Eliade (1957), Das Heilige und das Profane, Hamburg.
- J. Henniger, H. Cazelles, R. Marlé (1957–58), “Mythe,” DBS 6, 225–68.
- C. Lévi-Strauss (1958), Anthropologie structurale, Paris.
- P. Ricœur (1960), Finitude et culpabilité II, Paris.
- C. Lévi-Strauss (1964–70), Mythologiques, 4 vols., Paris.
- G. Dumézil (1968), Mythe et épopée, Paris.
- P. Smith, P. Ricœur (1971), “Mythe,” EU 11, 526–37.
- M. Meslin (1973), Pour une science des religions, Paris.
- P. Gibert (1979), Une théorie de la légende: H. Gunkel et les légendes de la Bible, Paris.
- N. Frye (1981), The Great Code: The Bible and Literature, New York–London.
- E. Drewermann (1984–85), Tiefenpsychologie und Exegese, 2 vols., Olten.
- G. Theissen (1993), “Identité et expérience de l’angoisse dans le christianisme primitif,” ETR 68, 161–83.
- L. Wittgenstein (1993 post.), Bemerkungen über Frazers Golden Bough, in J. Klagge and A. Nordmann (Ed.), Philosophical Occasions, Indianapolis–Cambridge, 115–55.

PIERRE-MARIE BEAUDE

See also Anthropomorphism; Bultmann, Rudolf; Creation; Cult; Exegesis; Freud, Sigmund; Fundamentalism; Hermeneutics; History; Holy Scripture; Literary Genres in Scripture; Narrative; Narrative Theology; Schelling, Friedrich Wilhelm Joseph von; Schleiermacher, Friedrich Daniel Ernst; Sciences of Nature; Scripture, Senses of

N

Name

a) Biblical Anthropology and Theology. In the ancient Near East a name was not a mere label, alien to the reality it designated, but was mysteriously linked to that reality. To give a name to a place or person was to define the meaning or destiny. This much is clear from the conferment of names of rule upon the new Pharaoh, or even the Israelite king (see Is 9:5). Receiving a “great name” was consequently equivalent to “becoming powerful” or “renowned” (2 Sm 7:9; 8:13; see 1 Kgs 1:47). When God* changed Abram’s name to “Abraham” (Gn 17:5) or Jacob’s to “Israel” (Gn 32:29; 35:10), it marked for them the beginning of a new life.

Knowing and uttering the name of God had important implications: this invocation was found at the heart of all prayer* and defined the action of worship, since it signified the relationship of belonging and called down divine blessing* (see Nm 6:22–27). The Hebrew Bible* uses various terms to speak of God: Elohim (with or without an article), which is generally translated as “God”; “El” and different expressions based on this name (El Shaddai, El Olam, etc.), which can be attributed to Israel’s Canaanite heritage; and YHWH, the proper name of the God of Israel, which some translations render by “the Lord” or “the Eternal.” This phenomenon is exploited for theological purposes by the “priestly” author (P) or the final compiler of the Pentateuch: God is known as Elohim (see e.g. Gn 9:6), then he reveals himself to the patriarchs under the name of El Shaddai (Gn 17:1; 28:3, etc.), and finally to Moses under his name of YHWH (Ex 6:2f.). Thus we receive a progressive revelation* of the God of Israel by himself.

b) YHWH, the Name of the God of Israel. In the Hebrew Bible the Tetragrammaton is the proper name of the God of Israel, revealed to Moses at the burning bush (Ex 3:13ff.). Moses finds himself in the presence of the angel of YHWH, who sends him to free his oppressed people. Moses then asks God: “If I come to the people of Israel and say to them, ‘The God of your fathers has sent me to you,’ and they ask me, ‘What is his name?’ what shall I say to them?” (Ex 3:13). Three successive divine answers to this question are offered. The oldest—and the only one which truly answers the question—is that of v. 15: “The Lord, the God of your fathers, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob” (Ex 3:15). This reply would later be commented upon by v. 14b: “Say this to the people: ‘I Am’ [’èhyèh] has sent me to you” (Ex 3:14b). This sentence suggests an etymology for the name YHWH, relating it to a form of the verb hayah, “to be.” Finally, the famous phrase of v. 14a, “I am who I am” (’èhyèh ’ashèr ’èhyèh, sometimes rendered “I will be what I will be” or “I will be, yea, I will be”) develops v. 14b’s ’èhyèh.

The Septuagint interprets the phrase in an ontological sense: “I am the existant” (egô eimi ho ôn), and this reading long prevailed both in exegesis* and in dogmatics*. It occurs in the writings of the church fathers*, and also in those of Maimonides, Luther*, and Calvin*; the translation of the BJ (“I am he who is”—1975 ed.) still echoes it, while the 1954 edition put the emphasis on the first person: “[...] he who am.” In fact the author could not have intended a definition of God as the supreme Being*, since this type of abstract thought was not current in Israel. Moreover, the verb hayah does not refer to the concept of existence as such, but includes dynamism, action, and presence; the sense is rather “active being,” or “being for” or “with” (see v. 12). In short, Ex 3:14 resounds as the commitment of YHWH’s active and faithful presence in respect of his people*.

Occasionally the phrase is assumed to be evasive—God refuses to answer the question, as the parallelism with texts such as Ex 33:19 and Jgs 13:17f. may suggest; God remains ungraspable. This interpretation cannot be accepted. In the Semitic view it is knowledge of the name which ensures mastery of the other. This name (YHWH) is given in v. 15; v. 14a does not reveal the divine name, but offers an explanation of it. Moreover, the phrases based on the model of Ex 3:14a are not evasive in meaning either: on the contrary, in several cases they express an intensive sense (1 Kgs 8:60; see 2 Kgs 23:16; Ez 12:25; 14:23; 36:23).

The name of the God of Israel occurs in two forms: the long form represented by the Tetragrammaton YHWH and the short form YH (“Yah”, Ex 15:2; Isa 38:11; Ps 94:7, 94:12) or YHW, attested in some liturgical exclamations (“Alleluia” = “Praise Yah”). The short form appears in ancient theophoric names (names whose composition includes a divine name) such as Joshua (JHW-shua‘) and Jonathan (JHW-natan), and this usage continued until recent times. Moreover, “YHWH” occurs not only in the oldest texts of the Bible, but also on the stela of Mesha (Moab, ninth century B.C.), the inscriptions at Kuntillet-Ajrud (North Sinai, ninth to eighth centuries), a tomb at Khirbet El-Qom (eighth century), and the letters of Lakish (seventh century). According to conventional wisdom the short form is to be explained as an abbreviation of the older long form. However, M. Rose (1978) points out that there is no known example of the abbreviation of the name of a national deity, and sees the long form as resulting from the addition of a final hé as a mater lectionis (a letter added to facilitate reading, without the value of a true consonant). YHWH and YHW were in all likelihood no more than spelling variants, and it seems that the initial minority usage of the long form gradually won over.

Since the ancient Hebrew text is not vocalized, the pronunciation of the name (“Yahweh”) has been reconstructed on the basis of the Greek transcriptions of Epiphanius of Salamis and Theodoret of Cyrhus (iabè, iaouè); this pronunciation appears to be confirmed by the wording of Ex 3:14 (assonance with ’èhyèh). However, other older transcriptions (Clement of Alexandria, Origen*) suggest a reading of “Yahwô” or “Yahûh.” The use of the short form YHW and of the theophoric names in yehô- or yô- support this.

Chapter 3 of Exodus does not introduce the use of the name YHWH—it was already known from Gn 4:26. At the same time, it is impossible to prove that the Israelites borrowed it from another people (for example the Kenites, as has sometimes been supposed). Doubtless the name goes back to a period when the semi-nomadic pre-Israelites were barely distinct from other comparable populations. This would explain why a number of peoples of the ancient East had deities bearing rather similar names: Ya(w) (Ebla), Yao (Byblos), YW (Ugarit), and Yau (Hamat). Although other hypotheses have been suggested, it appears that this divine name derives from the root hwh/hwy, which became the Hebrew hayah “to be”—an etymology that corresponds to the explanation given in Ex 3:14.

In the Septuagint, “Elohim” is translated by ho theos, “God,” while “YHWH” is rendered by kurios, “the Lord,” or sometimes by kurios ho theos, “the Lord God.” This translation is revealing of the attitude of Judaism*, which from this time (especially from the third century B.C.) refused to utter the thrice-holy name in speech, to avoid disrespect. The reading ’adonay, “the Lord,” was soon preferred to “YHWH.” For this reason the Masoretes added the vowels a (very short), o and a under the letters of the Tetragrammaton, giving rise to the hybrid reading “Jehovah,” a linguistic barbarism unrecorded before the 14th century.

c) Name of Jesus. The New Testament does not use the name YHWH. When it speaks of God, it usually employs the expression ho theos, corresponding to “Elohim.” Kurios also denotes God (e.g. in the expression kurios ho theos), but it is used too to speak of Jesus as the risen Lord (see e.g. Acts 2:36). While this title may not express faith* in Christ*’s divinity in an obvious way, it tends to imply it. It is the risen Christ who receives “the name that is above every name” (Phil 2:9). Baptism is initially given “in the name of Jesus Christ” (Acts 2:38), then “in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit” (Mt 28:19).

- A.-M. Besnard (1962), Le mystère du Nom, Paris.
- J. Kinyongo (1970), Origine et signification du nom divin Yahvé, Bonn.
- M. Rose (1978), Jahwe: Zum Streit um den alttestamentlichen Gottesnamen, Zurich.
- W. Vogels (1981), “Dis-moi ton nom, toi qui m’appelles par mon nom”: Le nom dans la Bible,” ScEs 33, 73–92.
- W.H. Schmidt (1979), “Der Jahwename und Ex 3:14”, in

- A.H.J. Gunneweg and O. Kaiser (Ed.), Textgemäss., FS E. Würthwein, Göttingen, 123–38.
- D.N. Freedman and P. O'Connor (1982), "YHWH," ThWAT 3, 533–54.
- K. Waaijman (1984), Betekenis van de naam Jahwe, Kampen.
- M. Rose (1987), "Jahwe," TRE 16, 438–41.
- J.C. de Moor (1990), The Rise of Yahwism, Louvain.
- H. Kruse (1990), "Herkunft und Sinngehalt des Jahwe-Namens," ZThK 112, 385–405.
- R. Liwak (1994), "Name/Namengebung," III. Biblisch, TRE 23, 749–54.
- R. Rendtorff (1994), "'El als israelitische Gottesbezeichnung," ZAW 106, 4–21.
- H. Cazelles (1995), "Yahwisme ou Yahwe en son peuple," in R. Kuntzmann (Ed.), Ce Dieu qui vient: Mélanges offerts à B. Renaud, 13–29, Paris.

JACQUES VERMEYLEN

See also Attributes, Divine; Being; Blessing; God; Monotheism; Praise; Prayer; Preaching

Names, Divine. See Attributes, Divine

Narrative

1. Renaissance of the Narrative

Today a new interest in narrative has arisen, inspired by its place in the Bible* and by the historical nature of Christian faith*. For a long time narrative was neglected by a systematic theology* that reduced it to the level of an illustrated theme, and depreciated it through a historicist exegesis*, which stressed its discrepancy with the facts. Based on these viewpoints, the texts splintered into editorial layers, sources, and simple literary forms, bearers of ideas from which the history* was constructed. The final writing-up was conceived too much as an arrangement of materials showing a "theology" reduced to the motivations of such a project. Dialectic theologians (such as Karl Barth* and Rudolf Bultmann*), by insisting on the ever-current proclamation of the Word* for the principle of faith, hardly favored reflection on the narrative.

A reaction set in with Gerhard von Rad, who discussed the narrative form of the confession of faith (Dt 26:5–10) and the theological scope of the great narrative traditions in Genesis through Joshua, with the discovery of the role played by the narrative element in the texts about the covenant*. For E. Käse-mann, the kerygma is not everything and the creation of the narrative on Jesus* has a theological value; Bultmann, on the other hand, excluded the pre-Easter Jesus from the domain of a theology of the Word. Then, with regard to the parables, Jüngel raised the question of a theology of language: in the parables, narrative is what permits the Kingdom* of God to accede to the level of language and to be at work in communication. More recently, literary studies on fiction and the development of narrative analysis have begun to stimulate philosophical thought. (Paul Ricoeur holds that narrativity explores human temporality.) Other studies have spurred on theological research, touching on such topics as "narrative* theology" and salvation* as experienced and recounted history. In addition, exegetic research has considered the narrative construction of biblical writings and the features of Biblical narration.

2. Narrative's Anthropological Domain

As the most widespread form of discourse, narrative clearly attests to a human ability to tell a story, and it communicates a universal love of storytelling. In a narrative, one may distinguish between the series of utterances with a beginning and endpoint, the whole story that is being told, and the narration (or narrative operation) that is implied between two points; and also between the narrator, who is the organizer of the message, and the narratee, who is the potential receiver of the message.

a) Between History and Fiction. The past, a great supplier of narrative, is always revealed after the fact and the narrative, as a work of language, enjoys a real autonomy with regard to the past, so much so that the history recounted may be fictional. “Historical” narrative and fictional narrative do not differ on account of their content but through the often implicit contract between the narrator and the narratee, who commit themselves (or not) to encounter a real-life story. The “historical” narrative goes beyond the chronicle of successive facts by linking them together according to a causal logic. It cuts to the quick of the real-life experience, shapes what it retains of it, gives cohesion to the heterogeneous, and leaves open the possibility of recounting it in another way. All narration, therefore, contains a fictional element. A fictional narrative recounts events as though they have happened, while the most “historical” narrative tends to recount events as though they have happened as they are recounted.

Embedded in mankind’s general timeframe, recounted history detaches itself by means of a narration that is not tied to chronology, but that uses ellipses and pauses, flashbacks and anticipations. It creates moments of global transformation out of scattered incidents, integrating them according to an original “tempo.” The time recounted takes on a thinkable image, and the experience of temporality is humanized (Ricoeur). The narrative pays a debt to what is no more, but which still counts (ancestors, momentous or founding events, experiences* that must be attested to, sometimes to the limits of the sayable), and which becomes a signifier in the narration’s present. Individuals and collectives unfold their identity in the narrative. Simultaneously, the narration says that the past is irreversible, that it could have happened differently, and that life goes on. It attests to a freedom that endures, constructs an identity open to the future, and—faced with this freedom—constructs a form of possible existence.

b) Situation of Narration and Speech, Veracity and Truth. Through the interplay of the actors put on the stage, the narrative seems to stand alone without a narrator. And the recounted story’s interest risks causing the present of the narration to be forgotten. This present is not limited to the time of the narrative’s birth.

Thanks to the written form, it becomes real at the time of the reading. The stepping aside from the narrator and the listener in the text may be either a trap for readers—they forget themselves in the story and let themselves be manipulated—or it may be a piece of luck—not being involved directly, readers are in a dialogic position of listening freely to another spoken word. What is written does not abolish speech, but confers another pattern on it, favoring its otherness. It fixes its traces for the author as for the reader, and is not possessed by either of them. This type of communication is staged when an actor in a narrative begins to recount something—for instance, Jesus relating a parable*). What he recounts takes his place in order to solicit a hearing abandoned to the listeners’ freedom. It seems that the wish to recount and to hear what is recounted, attested in all cultures, is rooted in the desire for the speech of the Other.

The question of the narrative’s truth* splits into two parts: the first concerns the narration’s past, and the second concerns the narration’s present. Veracity* about the past is evaluated by historical criticism, which produces supporting arguments to establish the facts and to link them together (thus to interpret them). To that end it invokes a plausibility based on the constancy of human behavior (the logic of the same or the similar), but it may encounter the unknown, the other, the unexplained. It tends to produce another more or less probable narrative, which weighs its own veracity and does not exclude other possible narratives. This problem of veracity with regard to history (the referential dimension) does not tackle the question of the truth of the narrative as an act of language. Since the narrative’s dynamic is the bearer of the words just as much for the person who constructs it as for those who reconstruct it while reading it, whether it is historical or fictional, the narration can serve or not serve the subject’s truth by what is stated in it about man, his desire, and his relation with the other. In that sense, the narration, even historical narration, traces a “symbolic” course as a path of language for a subject of speech.

3. Narrative in the Bible

Narrative’s eminent place in the canon* (the great narrative that stretches from Genesis to 2 Kings, almost a third of the “Writings,” more than half of the deuterocanonical texts, and two-thirds of the New Testament) suits a faith founded on a historical revelation*. The narrative is composed of a story of salvation, from the “beginning” of everything to the post-exilic restoration (Hebrew Old Testament) and to the Maccabean crisis (Greek Old Testament), then from the beginning of the Gospels* to the spreading of the Word as far as Rome* (Acts). Unlike a history of modern conception, the biblical narrative covers varied literary* genres (elements of myth*, popular traditions, chronicles, and exemplary or romanticized biographies, such as those of Ruth, Esther, Judith, and Tobit).

a) Narrative in the Domain of the Word. Allied to other forms of discourse (legislative, prophetic, hymnal, sapiential, epistolary, and apocalyptic*) the biblical narrative is embedded in the wider domain of the word and under its authority. The Word is at the “beginning” (Gn 1, Jn 1). In the Hebrew canon, the Law gives its name to Genesis through Deuteronomy, which encompasses it, and the Prophets* give their names to the books of Joshua through 2 Kings, which tell their stories. The Gospels and Acts precede the Epistles, but it is the Epistles which, in the Churches’* present testify to the force of the Gospels, based on which Jesus’ past becomes tellable. And Mark founded his “beginning” on the earlier word written in Isaiah (Is 40:3). Just as the prophets open history to eschatology*, the evangelic narrative orients it toward the Parousia*, and Revelation subjects it to the light of a “revelation,” which it depicts in narrative with symbolic visions of a coming that is being heralded in the trials and persecutions of believers.

Thus, biblical narration places time under the impetus of an original gift, which strives toward its fulfillment. Its truth is felt in the “now” and the “soon” of a pact lived daily. This results in a form of writing that differs from the storyteller’s or the historian’s art, not in the way that the “religious” would differ from the “historical” or from the “literary,” but through the characteristics of its enunciation, through the intent and the relation to time implied in the narration.

b) Evangelic Narration. Evangelic narration, for instance, has its roots in a living testimony that gives it, in its choice and treatment of the facts, a freedom that the historian rejects. Criticism is faced with varied documents about a social history of the origins of Christianity that refer undeniably to Jesus, but the historical figure of the latter does not emerge from them as a well-defined subject of knowledge. That fact shows that the evangelic tradition* is something other than informative, that it takes on something of the form of a liberating declaration. The Scriptures are the echo of the “eyewitnesses and ministers of the word” (Luke 1:2), resulting in the name “Gospels,” which fits these writings better than the literary genre of the Hellenistic biographies. What makes people talk and narrate becomes history: the event becomes the word. So it is with Jesus. His deeds and his passion had marked those who perpetuated their memory and found their truth there.

A typical characteristic of the Gospels is the integration of short narratives into a global narrative from which they are easily detached. The narrative of the passion*, the only integrated account in the form of a sequence of several episodes that gave rise to others, has become the apex of every Gospel. Each particular narration presents itself to the reader on two levels—within its own limits, and within the global narration. Nothing is reported about Jesus apart from his progress toward death* and resurrection* (compare The Gospel of Thomas). His passion, death, and resurrection constitute the common source of evangelical preaching* and narration (see Mt 26:13), which form the passage that opens once and for all for believers onto a way of life*. The Old Testament is oriented in this direction by means of quotations, reminiscences, or evocations. Continuity follows a scriptural and not a causal or historical order. It undergoes a rupture in level that triggers a rereading in both directions. The promise* finds its realization in Jesus Christ* recounted, and the covenant sealed in the latter’s body reveals what was hidden beneath the great images of the biblical narrative, and which offers to live in the social body of the Church.

4. Analysis of the Narrative

On the one hand, narrative analysis springs from literary interest in narrative art and in the Bible as literature (Erich Auerbach, Frank Kermode, Robert Alter), and, on the other hand, from the encounter in the 1960s between the morphology of the story (Vladimir Propp) and the structuralism applied in linguistics (Ferdinand de Saussure), in poetics (Roman Osipovich Jakobson), and in mythology (Claude Lévi-Strauss). They generated two main movements: narratology and semiotics. Narratology (Claude Bremond, Roland Barthes, Gérard Genette, and S. Chatman) describes the narrative sequence, the various types of plot, and the moments they link together. It notes the interferences and distortions between narrated history and narrative recounting (the narration). The narrative follows or does not follow the order and temporality of history. It can vary its vantage point (from above, from behind, or with the characters) and the narrator’s position (he is omniscient, or he knows more, or he knows less than the actors, remains neutral or judges the action, delegates the speech, or takes the floor). Whether or not they are represented in the narrative, the narrator and the narratee are positions implied by narrative communication, and they are not the “real” author and reader who start the action (whence the name of the “implied” author and reader according to Wolfgang Iser). These specifications sharpen the attention paid to the text, as well as to the strategies directed at readers, with the aim of influencing them. The work's aim takes the place of the author's (Eco).

The semiotics that has taken the most interest in the Bible developed with A. J. Greimas and related researchers, including Geninasca and Zilberberg. Coupling theoretic and practical development of the texts, it tries to elucidate the linkage of the discourse (the content's form) by singling out several levels. The sequence of the actions (general grammar of the functions and the agents or fundamental roles)—which is inseparable from the knowledge of the actors and of their interpretations, their desires, affects, and emotions (the cognitive and thymic dimension)—can only be analyzed based on the figures of the actors linked together in time and space (figurative and discursive dimensions). The latter dimensions refer to the world, indicate the subject under discussion, and compose the narrated history. However, their linking together, specific to each narration, frees them from hackneyed meanings, to embark on a search that is not only for meaning, for it is a work of language and challenges in man a subject of speech divided between what can and cannot be said. Particularly in the Bible, narration often tackles a reality that resists language. Here we touch on enunciation, which tests itself through being written and read. As a trigger to the plot, it is narration, with an implied narrator and narratee. More deeply, as trigger to the discourse, it deals in them with the speaking subject confronted by the subject of the spoken word on condition of a possibility of meaning.

5. Reading and Theology of the Narrative

These analyses stimulate the reading, criticize it in the name of the text, and tend toward a global interpretation that does not limit itself to the reconstruction of a history or a didactic message. The narrative linkage and dynamic sustain an interest that goes beyond the anecdotal to ask the questions: What does this text want from me? What does it state about man, about his relations with the world and with time, with himself and with others, with desire and with speech? This anthropological dimension underlies a believer's reading: the recognition of the Other of the speech, under his biblical name, takes root in the relation of otherness that is learned through the language, the writing, and the reading. The latter can become theological—the sparking of a dialogue, of an unfinished encounter.

The act of reading becomes a theological act, not through paraphrase or extraction of doctrinal statements, but through participation in the understanding (rather than in the explanation) at work in the narrative, up to the limits of the knowable. Theology elucidates according to its own rules not only contents, but what, of the Word made flesh*, is at work in the narration and is borne out in the reading ecclesial body. The salvation that is recounted permits neither systematization nor objectivization outside the progress followed in a history of loss and of the new, of sin* and forgiveness, of suffering and joy. There the language confronts a reality whose resistance the biblical narrative calls to mind, while drawing attention to the resources of the figurative and of the conceptual for speaking about the interaction of man and of God, of time and of eternity*, of the ultimate and the contingent. From the narrative, theology learns to locate itself at the meeting point of absence and desire, of the provisional and of the word that endures.

- V. Propp (1926), Morphologie du conte, Leningrad (2nd Ed. 1969).
- G. von Rad (1938), Das formgeschichtliche Problem des Hexateuchs, Stuttgart.
- E. Auerbach (1946), Mimesis, Bern.
- G. von Rad (1957), Theologie des AT, Munich.
- C. Lévi-Strauss (1958 and 1973), Anthropologie structurale I and II, Paris.
- E. Jünger (1962), Paulus und Jesus, Tübingen.
- E. Käsemann (1964), "Sackgassen im Streit um dem historischen Jesu," in Exegetische Versuche und Besinnungen II, Göttingen, 31–68.
- H. Weinrich (1964), Tempus, Stuttgart.
- (1966), "L'analyse structurale du récit," Communications 8.
- P. Beauchamp (1970), "Propositions sur l'Alliance de l'AT comme structure centrale," RSR 58, 161–94.
- L. Marin (1971), Sémiotique de la passion, Paris.
- G. Genette (1972), Figures III, Paris.
- W. Iser (1972), Der implizite Leser, Munich.
- R. Jakobson (1973), Questions de poétique, Paris.
- J. Calloud (1973), L'analyse structurale du récit, Lyon.
- C. Chabrol, L. Marin (1974), Le récit évangélique, Paris.
- H. Frei (1974), The Eclipse of Biblical Narrative, New Haven.
- M. de Certeau (1975), L'écriture de l'histoire, Paris.
- P. Beauchamp (1976), L'un et l'autre Testament: Essai de lecture, Paris.
- R. Barthes et al. (1977), Poétique du récit, Paris.
- Groupe d'Entrevernes (1977), Signes et paraboles, Lyon.
- A. and D. Patte (1978), Pour une exégèse structurale, Paris.
- S. Chatman (1978), Story and Discourse, Ithaca.
- L. Marin (1978), Le récit est un piège, Paris.
- J.B. Metz (1978), Glaube in Geschichte und Gesellschaft, 2nd Ed., Mainz.
- F. Kermode (1979), The Genesis of Secrecy: On the Interpretation of Narrative, Cambridge, MA.
- U. Eco (1979), Lector in fabula, Milan.
- J. Delorme (1979), "L'intégration des petites unités dans l'évangile de Marc du point de vue de la sémiotique structurale," NTS 25, 469–91.
- Groupe d'Entrevernes (1979), Analyse sémiotique des textes, Lyon.
- A. J. Greimas, J. Courtès (1979), Sémiotique: Dictionnaire raisonné de la théorie du langage, Paris.
- R. Alter (1981), The Art of Biblical Narrative, New York.
- P. Beauchamp (1982), Le récit, la lettre et le corps, Paris.
- A. Gueuret (1983), L'engendrement d'un récit: L'évangile de l'enfance selon saint Luc, Paris.
- P. Ricoeur (1983–85), Temps et récit, 3 vols., Paris.

- L. Panier (1984), Récit et commentaires de la tentation de Jésus au désert, Paris.
- F. Hahn (Ed.) (1985), Der Erzähler des Evangeliums, Stuttgart.
- J.-M. Adam (1985), Le texte narratif, Paris.
- Coll. (1985), "Narrativité et théologie dans les récits de la passion," RSR 73/1–2.
- J. Calloud (1985–86), "Sur le chemin de Damas: Quelques lumières sur l'organisation discursive d'un texte," SémBib, nos 37, 38, 40, 42.
- J. Calloud, F. Genuyt (1985–91), L'évangile de Jean, 4 vols., L'Arbresle-Lyon.
- B. van Iersel (1986), Marcus, Boxtel.
- A. Chené et al. (1987), De Jésus et des femmes: Lectures sémiotiques, Montréal and Paris.
- J. Geninasca (1987), "Sémiotique," in M. Delcroix and F. Halryn (Eds.), Méthodes du texte, Gembloux.
- P. Bühler, J.-F. Habermacher (1988), La narration, Geneva.
- J.-N. Aletti (1989), L'art de raconter Jésus-Christ, Paris.
- J. Delorme, "Récit, parole et parabole," in ACFEB, Les paraboles évangéliques, 123–50, Paris.
- P. Beauchamp (1990), L'un et l'autre Testament, vol. 2: Accompagner les Écritures, Paris.
- J.L. Ska (1990), "Our Fathers Have Told Us": Introduction to the Analysis of Hebrew Narrative, Rome.
- L. Panier (1991), La naissance du Fils de Dieu, Paris.
- J. Delorme (1991), Au risque de la parole, Paris; (1992), "Sémiotique," DBS 12, 281–333 (with bib.).
- O. Davidsen (1992), The Narrative Jesus, Aarhus.
- J. Delorme (1995), "Prise de parole et parler vrai dans un récit de Marc (1, 21–28)," in P. Bovati, R. Meynet (Eds.), "Ouvrir les Écritures" (Mélanges P. Beauchamp), 179–200; (1997 a), "La tête de Jean-Baptiste ou la parole pervertie: Lecture d'un récit (Mc 6, 14–29)," in P. M. Beaudé (Ed.), La Bible en littérature, Metz, 294–311; (1997 b), "Évangile et récit: La narration évangélique en Marc," NTS 43, 367–84.

JEAN DELORME

See also Biblical Theology; Book; Covenant; Exegesis; Literary Genres in Scripture; Jesus, Historical; Language, Theological; Myth; Narrative Theology; Time; Scripture, Senses of; Word of God

Narrative Theology

a) Another Form of Theological Thought? Narrative* theology aims to "renew traditional theological thought by the integration of narrative forms" (Meyer zu Schlochtern 1979). Internationally, J.-B. Metz and H. Weinrich (1973) deserve the credit for proposing for discussion a number of analyses whereby conceptual and systematic thinking was enriched with new approaches focusing on metaphor, symbol, parable*, the art of rhetoric, the epic or biographical dimension, and so on. At the same time, they emphasized the experiential character taken on by the theological attestation of faith*, so that we may also speak of an "experiential" theology, proposed by J. Mouroux as early as 1952. It is important to distinguish here between the experiential and the empirical: narrative theology does not relegate theology to the empiricism of the social sciences, but rather examines it from the perspective of narrative and theories of narrative. The theoretical aspect of this new orientation has been forcefully articulated and developed by P. Ricoeur. Tradition* and history* are seen by narrative theology not so much from the point of view of the act of understanding (the hermeneutic* standpoint, as a "fusion of perspectives"), as from the point of view of narrative communication: "History tells stories" (Danto 1965). Rational communication takes place through the intelligibility of an argument whose every step is subject to logical control; but mutual understanding may still come up against insurmountable limits that the speaker can overcome only by means of narrative communication, by recounting how he reached his conceptions. This complementary function of the narrative element is most clearly seen in E. Schillebeeckx's Jesus (1974). Metz, in addition, emphasizes the critical function of narration understood as "dangerous memory," and conversely the need to "interrupt" the ideological narrative. For the insinuating power of the narrative act may have, like rhetoric or music*, the capacity to enchant (see Faye 1972). It was S. Crites (1971) who first pointed to the narrative structure of experience*. Narration, according to him, expresses "the full temporality of experience in the unity of a form." Thus history, according to Arthur C. Danto in his Analytic Philosophy of History, is a narrative governed by practical intention. Narrative, which transforms lived facts and events into a fund of personal experience, reinforces “experiential competence,” which is based on openness, on a capacity for critical evaluation and integration, on an understanding of meaning, and on a taste for praxis (Mieth 1976).

Narrativity cannot be separated from reflexivity, which is also shown with extreme clarity by modern literature. But literature emphasizes form, presentation, symbol, and image to the detriment of the ordinary pillars of argument: concept, reasoning, and coherence. Narrative theology, on the other hand, requires that narrative and reflection be bound together in the unity of a form (see Hauerwas 1974; even earlier, Dunne 1967). According to J. S. Dunne, the task of narrative theology is “the search for God* in time* and memory,” and along the way it has rediscovered the subjective witness of faith as a locus of theological reflection. It has also made a genuine exegetical contribution to the problem of the collective composition of narratives, as revealed in the observation of certain elementary schemas (see Jolles 1930). The American theologian S. McFague (1975) in particular, in a thorough discussion, has sketched the contours of a theology shaped into parables and metaphors. A number of her ideas have become part of the common heritage of theology, in particular the concern to highlight what there is in a story that goes beyond the explanatory and doctrinal propositions that constitute a skeletal image of the story in the mode of comprehension.

The classic examples are provided by the parables of Jesus*, principally in Luke (the good Samaritan, the prodigal son), which can be reduced neither to norms nor to doctrinal pronouncements. Indeed, in the first case, Jesus changes in a critical sense the lawyer’s question about his neighbor, and has him ask: “Who is my neighbor?”; in the other, he establishes a relationship of unity and tension between straying and mercy that cannot entirely be transposed into a conceptual dialectic. In order to understand what is intended, it is necessary to follow the story. This can be done in various ways, depending on personal creativity, as shown for example in the Latin American catechism Vamos caminando (1979).

The theoretical debate on narrative theology largely took place in the second half of the 1960s, but it remains influential today, particularly in reflections on temporality, the formation of identity, and ethics*.

b) Temporality, Identity, and Narrative Ethics. The rediscovery of and emphasis on narrativity influenced the debate in the 1980s on “communitarianism.” In theology, narrativity meant the encounter of experience, the examination of faith, and ethos in a narrative of liberation with a practical purpose (“orthopraxis”). In philosophy*, particular attention has been paid to the role of the collective and society* in the unity between the lived world* and a form of moral life attached to the virtues* (see A. McIntyre). This latter concern has also been addressed from a theological perspective, in a relatively exclusive variant of narrative theology (S. Hauerwas), and in a variant that was more open to the world (D. Mieth). The reflections of Ricoeur on “time and narrative” (1983–85) are noteworthy for coining the notion of “narrative identity,” which applies to communities as well as to individuals. In a differentiated theory of mimesis, the “model nature” of narrative forms is described by the transmission, confrontation, and discovery of the self (similarly, Mieth 1976, 1977). The question of the relationships between narration and the formation of identity has also been treated by Charles Taylor. Others—in part communitarians, in part neo-Aristotelians—associate with this the paradigm of a non-normative ethics that has been called an ethics of aspiration (in contrast to an ethics of duty; see H. Kramer). The theory of the ethical model, which is rooted in the tradition of the ethics of virtue, here opens a new path to moral cognitivism. The moral theology of the Church*, through the doctrine of sensus fidelium, also accepts the importance of personal convictions, as they are lived through in practice, for the knowledge and recognition of what is just (justice*). Tensions have thus arisen in Catholic moral doctrine due to the confrontation between a Neoscholastic system of logically coherent concepts that no longer correspond to any lived reality and questions raised by the self-recognition of moral tradition and moral creativity.

- A. Jolles (1930), Einfache Formen, Tübingen.
- J. Mouroux (1952), L'expérience chrétienne, Paris.
- W. Schapp (1953), In Geschichten verstrickt, Hambourg.
- A. C. Danto (1965), Analytical Philosophy of History, Cambridge.
- J. S. Dunne (1967), A Search for God in Time and Memory, Notre Dame (1975, London).
- S. Crites (1971), “The Narrative Quality of Experience,” JAAR 39, 291–311.
- J.-P. Faye (1972), Théorie du récit, Paris.
- J.-B. Metz (1973), “Kleine Apologie des Erzählens,” Conc(D) 9, 334–41.
- H. Weinrich (1973), “Narrative Theologie,” ibid., 329–33.
- R. Koselleck, W. D. Stempel (Eds.) (1973), Geschichte—Ereignis und Erzählung, Munich.
- St. Hauerwas (1974), Vision and Virtue, Notre Dame.
- S. McFague-TeSelle (1975), Speaking in Parables, Philadelphia.
- E. Schillebeeckx (1974), Jezus, het verhaal van een levende, Bloemendaal (as Jesus: Die Geschichte von einem Lebenden, 1975, Friburg-Basel-Vienna).
- S. Simon (1975), Story and Faith in the Biblical Narrative, London.
- D. Ritschl, H. O. Jones (1976 a), “Story” als Rohmaterial der Theologie, Munich.
- D. Mieth (1976), Dichtung, Glaube und Moral, Mainz.

D. Mieth (1976 b), Epik und Ethik, Tübingen.
 D. Mieth (1977), Moral und Erfahrung, Friburg.
 J. Navone (1977), Towards a Theology of Story, Slough.
 B. Wacker (1977), Narrative Theologie?, Munich.
 J. Meyer zu Schlochtern (1979), "Erzählung als Paradigma einer alternativen theologischen Denkform," Theol. Berichte 8, Zurich-Einsiedeln, 35–70.
 E. Arens (1982), Kommunikative Analysen, Düsseldorf.
 P. Ricoeur (1983–85), Temps et récit, 3 vols., Paris.
 R. Zerfass (Ed.) (1988), Erzählter Glaube—erzählende Kirche, QD 116 (bibl.).

M. C. Nussbaum (1990), Love's Knowledge: Essays on Philosophy and Literature, Oxford.
 H. W. Frei (1993), Theology and Narrative, New York.
 K. Wenzel (1997), Zur Narrativität des Theologischen, Frankfurt; (1998), "Narrative Theologie," LThK3 7, 640–643.

DIETMAR MIETH

See also Gospels; Exegesis; Experience; Hermeneutics; Liberation Theology; Narrative

Nationalism

In practice, some accommodation between sacred and secular authorities in organized societies (see sovereignty*) has historically always been necessary. Even where Christianity in one of its forms has been the dominant religion, the relationship between church and state has taken every possible form, from that of the theocratic state, in which civil authority has been subsumed into ecclesiastical power, to that in which sacred authority has been reduced to the status of a tool of the civil sovereign. The entry on sovereignty in this work briefly surveys the evolution of the theological theory underlying the relationship between sacred and secular authority. The present entry seeks to examine the nature of the development of the evolving theology as it can be inferred from the actual political history of the Christian West. The pragmatic attitude of the Christian churches to the rise of the large nation states of Western Europe allows important insights into the constraints behind the development of modern ecclesiology.

Theological theory followed political developments, often justifying them or pointing the way forward. From Constantine's early-fourth-century exercise of imperial authority over appointments to the Roman see, when he himself moved to Constantinople, to the investiture controversy of the 11th and 12th centuries, the theological principles at stake had been mired in pragmatic considerations and struggles for power in which popes and emperors had themselves sometimes been mere pawns. Then on 23 September 1122 it was agreed at the concordat of Worms that, following the custom already introduced into France, the emperor should renounce the right to invest bishops with the ring and crosier, symbols of spiritual authority, and should guarantee them canonical election and free consecration. Pope Callistus II (c. 1050–1124) conceded that elections to German abbacies and Episcopal sees should be held in the emperor's presence, and that the emperor should invest the abbots and bishops with the scepter, symbol of their temporal authority.

This rudimentary separation of temporal and spiritual powers respected the nature of the Church as, necessarily, a body with spiritual power to further the salvific purposes for which it was founded; but which had also in the course of time acquired buildings, lands, revenues, codes of behavior, and in general the legal structures and temporal rights and obligations for which the concordat conceded that it was in part answerable to a temporal power. Only very rarely in western Christendom, as in the papal states of later history or in Calvin's Geneva, was the spiritual power identical with the temporal one. Since it was at least arguable that the Church could no longer serve its divine purpose without temporal possessions, the regulation of the obligations of its bishops and abbots respectively to spiritual and temporal powers needed open acknowledgement and regulation. The solution was most famously established in this early concordat.

The Worms concordat did not, of course, remove further controversy, which continued to be fuelled by such matters as clerical immunity from the secular courts and ecclesiastical exemptions from taxation. In England John of Salisbury (c. 1115–80), later bishop of Chartres, witnessed Becket's murder in 1170 and developed his view of the secular primacy of ecclesiastical over civil authority that lay behind the practice of Innocent III (1160/1–1216), who ineffectively annulled Magna carta because it had been agreed without papal consent. In return King John handed over his domains as a papal fief.

It was the 13th century that saw the full measure of the canonists' claims that the spiritual power was prior and superior to the temporal power, but by its end Boniface VIII was being forced partly to withdraw his claims that clerical property was of its nature exempt from royal taxation. Civil authorities, especially the English kings, began more strictly to circumscribe the economic and legal rights of the clergy, while by the early-14th century Marsilio of Padua (c. 1275–c. 1342) was defending the simple subordination of the church to the state.

It was in the late-15th century that the widespread use of concordats redefined the theology of the relationship between spiritual and temporal powers by the creation of national churches. The nation states began at this date to consist of much larger units than hitherto. In Eastern Europe in the late-15th century Matthias Corvinus created the kingdom of Hungary, Casimir IV created a much larger Poland, and Ivan III brought together the Russian principalities as a single nation. On the Italian peninsula the popes absorbed the smaller independent cities into the papal state, and in western Europe Spain was unified by the merging of Castile and Aragón in 1474, while Louis XI of France took over Anjou, Maine, Provence, Roussillon, Artois, and Burgundy, finally annexing the duchy of Brittany in 1491. England was united under Tudor hegemony after the battle of Bosworth Field in 1485.

The system that was devised certainly had theological implications. Larger secular administrative burdens and Renaissance reform of non-clerical education appeared to justify the transfer of senior ecclesiastics to administrative posts, leaving their pastoral responsibilities to be fulfilled by substitutes, and the transfer of ecclesiastical revenues to charitable or educational foundations—as at Christ Church, Oxford, or at Ingoldstadt—or even to national treasuries. In 1438 the French clergy issued the Pragmatic Sanction of Bourges, upholding the right of the French church to administer its own temporal property independently of Rome, and to be granted automatic papal ratification for nomination to vacant benefices. Eugene IV protested, but in 1447 he made a similar agreement with the German Electors, although the papacy under Nicholas V won something back at the 1448 concordat of Vienna.

In Spain the crown annexed the grand masterships of the military religious orders established during the Crusades, and in 1476 the Spanish Cortes won the transfer of further legal powers to the crown. In 1482 Ferdinand and Isabella of Spain obtained an incipient right of nomination to bishoprics, which was later strengthened. From 1493 papal bulls could be published in Spain only after royal assent, and the Inquisition—in Spain a secular institution—was granted sufficient ecclesiastical jurisdiction to complete the hegemony of secular over ecclesiastical sovereignty. In France papal decrees, including in the 16th century those of the Council of Trent, remained without force until registered by the parlements. In England the chief justice Sir William Hussey could assert in 1485 that the king was superior to the pope within his realm.

In order to prevent clashes of civil and sacred jurisdictions, it became common practice in the early-16th century for lord chancellors already endowed with the plenitude of civil jurisdiction, like Ximenes in Spain, du Prat in France, and Wolsey in England, to be made papal legates a latere, giving them within their own territories the plenitude of papal jurisdiction. The closing of monasteries and the diversion of their funds in England to his Oxford foundation was set in motion by Wolsey with full papal powers to act as he did.

In the trade-offs of successive concordats, what was safeguarded was not the real power to nominate bishops or to receive ecclesiastical revenues, but the right of monarchs to exercise a widening civil jurisdiction, to name certain candidates for benefices, and often to receive ecclesiastical revenues, particularly from vacant benefices, while the right of Rome to supply all ecclesiastical jurisdiction required by nominees of national churches was safeguarded. The repudiation of Rome as the source of all spiritual jurisdiction, rather than any single unifying doctrine, was almost constitutive of the major 16th-century schismatic movements, as the unfolding of events in England makes clear. Henry VIII repudiated Roman spiritual jurisdiction and usurped the Church's ultimate teaching authority, but pursued anti-Lutheran religious policies for years after his break with Rome.

The theological implications of the European creation of national churches need therefore to be distinguished. In countries, provinces, and regions that remained in communion with Rome, the pope provided the ultimate source of all ecclesiastical jurisdiction, however much the real power to run their own ecclesiastical affairs devolved onto the nation states. In territories that broke with Rome, ecclesiastical and secular jurisdictions had both to be generated from within. With the birth of the modern world, in which countries contained citizens of different religious affiliations, it became necessary as well as normal for different religious communions to accept spiritual jurisdiction according to their own traditions.

In America the situation differed from state to state, with separation of church and state in nine of the original thirteen British colonies. The First Amendment to the Constitution subsequently prohibited the establishment of any religion and maintained the freedom of all to practice their religion. These provisions have been interpreted strictly by the Supreme Court, which has enforced the strict neutrality of the state in religious matters, thereby not only according with the dominant modern theology of church-state relations, but also creating an exemplar for it.

The existence of countries that continue to have established religions is scarcely a matter of great theological consequence, since the function of the religious affiliations and structures retained as established in such countries is, in so far as their established position is concerned, almost entirely administrative and ceremonial, as in Presbyterian Scotland or Anglican England. In neither country is there any constraint to practice the established religion or impediment to the practice of any other. The Church was disestablished in Wales in 1920, but in England the sovereign remains governor of the Church, appoints its senior officials on political advice, and still exercises widespread powers of patronage.

Some anomalies and difficulties remain in that established churches are normally in a position to exercise an influence greater than that warranted by their moral authority alone on legislation affecting the ethical norms that they profess, as for instance those concerning divorce, birth control, homosexual behavior, and modern techniques of fertilization. It can, however, be argued that the ability of established churches to exercise political pressure on legislation compromising the ethical norms to which they adhere is universally slight, and that the anomalies it entails are outweighed by the social and ceremonial contribution that the remaining established churches make to national life. The modern theology of a total separation of temporal and spiritual authorities is essentially uncompromised by the preservation of such ancient religious privileges as have been retained within modern states.

ANTHONY LEVI

Natural Religion. See Deism and Theism

Natural Theology

Natural theology refers to a knowledge* of God from the creatures, independently of revelation*. Natural theology underlines the relationship between the “book of nature” and the reasonable nature of man. Throughout history*, it expressed a tension between Christian claims of the universal and the historic contingencies of Christianity. In the 20th century, natural theology, a question disputed between Catholics and Protestants, showed a tendency to become a sign of two theological attitudes.

a) Pre-Christian Concept of Natural Theology. The notion of natural theology was already present among the Greeks, who did not oppose it to a supernatural theology, but distinguished it from mythical theology—that of poets, and from *political theology, which corresponded to the official civic religion. The physical theology of philosophers designated the knowledge of a divine expressed within the nature of things. Augustine* borrowed Varron’s distinction of three types of theology*: the mythicon, the physicon, and the civile, and he was the first to Latinize the expression of natural or physical theology (see De Civitate Dei VI, chapter V).

b) Natural Theology as Natural Knowledge of God. Even if the presocratics were not only physicists, but in some way the first theologians (see Jaeger, 1947), Christian thought could only view natural theology as being, if not opposite, then at least completely subordinated to the plenary revelation of God in Jesus Christ. With Tertullian*, natural theology plays but a secondary role, but he acknowledges a natural knowledge of God that relies either on the testimony of the exterior world (Apologia 18, 1), or on the testimony of the soul*, which enjoys a congenital knowledge of God (Apologia 17, 6; see also l'anima naturaliter christiana). Thus Augustine, who got the expression of natural theology from Varron, especially insists on the goodness of the creation* against the gnostic—that is, the identity of the Creator and the Redeemer. The two “books,” he contends—the Liber Naturae and the Liber Scripturae—should actually be attributed to the same author. This dual knowledge of God is present again in Bonaventure* (Brevil. II, 5.11), who asserts that the book of nature, made less legible because of sin*, has become once again legible thanks to the book* of Scriptures.

The term natural theology is not found per se in Thomas* Aquinas, who doesn't mention the book of nature either, and rejects the Platonists' work physica theologia as idolatrous (Summa Theologica IIa IIae, q. 94, a. 1 c). However, in his work De Deo uno, where he exposes the praeambula fidei (“preambles of faith”), he defends the legitimacy of the natural knowledge of God and of his main attributes* (see Summa Theologica Ia, q.12, a. 12). These questions De Deo uno represent the rational moment of the supernatural knowledge (supernatural*) of God. Faith perfects the power of reason*, as grace* perfects the power of nature*. He who adheres to God's existence by confessing the first article of the Creed, but who is capable of furthermore proving the existence of God, believes in a more noble manner (De veritate. q. 12, a. 12).

Therefore, it would be improper to talk of “natural theology” with regard to the natural knowledge of God that a theology understood as intellectus fidei requires for its own equilibrium. This equilibrium, however, would not be respected thereafter. By the time of the Renaissance, the first presentation of natural theology in monograph form appeared, the theologia naturalis seu Liber creaturarum by Raymond Sebond (1487), whom Montaigne praised (see Essais 1. II, chapter 12). In the 18th century, under the influence of Leibniz* and his theodicy, the theologia naturalis (1736–37) by Christian Wolff, discussed in his Special Metaphysics, would systematize a natural theology turned autonomous—in the context of the Aufklärung, it would become the science of religion within the limits of understanding.

c) During the Reformation. Neither the expression nor the idea of natural theology were to be found among the Reformers. The scriptural principle and the principle of justification* by faith alone do not lead them to exclude all natural knowledge of God. Using Romans 1:19 and 2:14, Luther* admits that natural reason might lead to some knowledge of God, whose action is manifested in nature. A correct reading of the book of the Bible* leads to a better reading of the book of nature and only reinforces faith in the creation. Calvin*, who admits a knowledge of God inherent in the human spirit, acknowledges a dual manifestation of God in creation and in the redemptive work.

d) Refutation of Natural Theology by Karl Barth. Barth violently rejects the possibility of a natural knowledge of God, as defined by Vatican* I (DS 1785) and he even calls the analogia entis, supported and illustrated by the Jesuit philosopher E. Przywara (Analogia entis, Munich, 1932) “the invention of the Antichrist” (KD I/1, preface). “The vitality of natural theology is the vitality of man as such” (KD I/1, 185). Thinking itself able to consider the Creator without considering the Redeemer at the same time, natural theology splits the idea of God and claims to know the true God by making an abstraction of the revelation. In fact, however, Barth contends that “one knows God through God and only through God” (KD I/1, 47). Not only is his position in open conflict with Catholic theology, but it also hardens the Reformers' doctrine: proof can be seen in his polemic against E. Brunner (who was trying to retain a Christian natural theology imposed by the existence of a revelation of God stemming from the creation) and in the manner with which he moved away from Bultmann* (who, by defining man as a “question of God,” confirmed a necessary precomprehension of God).

e) Beyond the Polemic. Barth's polemic conception—natural theology understood as an attempt to subordinate the revelation to an authority foreign to its essence—in fact led to a better interpretation of Vatican I's teachings on the capacity of knowing God in the light of reason. The council* did not rule on any particular historic form of natural theology and did not claim that the natural knowledge of God must precede the knowledge of faith. It defended a principle, that of the rational moment of Christian faith, or more precisely its transcendental condition (see Bouillard 1957). In contemporary theology, the question of natural theology is no longer really a matter of denominational controversy, despite the brilliant exception of E. Jüngel and his (Barthian) defense and illustration of a theology “more natural” than any natural theology. Protestant theologians such as W. Pannenberg have rehabilitated a certain natural theology while Catholic theologians are the representatives of a kerygmatic theology. Natural theology is more used as a revelator between two types of theologies: theology marked by manifestation, which insists on the presence of God in all that is, and theology marked by proclamation, which denounces all attempts at idolatry* in the name of the word* of God.

- K. Barth (1919), Der Römerbrief, Munich (2nd Ed. 1922).
- R. Bultmann (1933), “Das Problem der “natürlichen Theologie”,” in Glauben und Verstehen: Gesammelte Aufsätze 1, Tübingen, 294–312.
- E. Brunner (1934), Natur und Gnade, Zurich.
- K. Barth (1940–42), Die Kirchliche dogmatik II/1 and 2, Zurich (Dogmatik, Genève, 1956–59).
- W. Jaeger (1947), Introduction, The Theology of the Early Greek Philosophers, Oxford.
- H. Bouillard (1957), Karl Barth, vol. 3, 63–139, Paris.

- H. Brouillard (1960), “Le refus de la théologie naturelle dans la théologie protestante contemporaine,” in coll., L’existence de Dieu, Tournai.
- C. Geffré (1960), “Théologie Naturelle et révélation dans la connaissance du Dieu un,” ibid.
- K. H. Miskotte (1960), “Natürliche Religion und Theologie,” Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart 3 4, 1322–26.
- G. Söhngen, W. Pannenberg (1962), “Natürliche Theologie,” Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 2 7, 811–17.
- B. J. F. Lonergan (1968), “Natural Knowledge of God,” in A Second Collection, Toronto (2nd Ed. 1996).
- A.-M. Dubarle (1976), La manifestation naturelle de Dieu d’après l’Écriture, Paris.
- Ch. Link (1976), Die Welt als Gleichnis: Studien zum Problem der natürlichen Theologie, Munich.
- E. Jüngel (1980), Entsprechungen, Munich, 158–201.
- W. Pannenberg (1988), Systematische Theologie 1, chap. 2, “Der Gottesgedanke und die Frage nach seiner Wahrheit”, Göttingen.
- W. Sparr (1991), “Natürliche Theologie,” Theologische Realenzyklopädie 24, 85–98.
- O. Muck and G. Kraus (1998), “Natürliche Theologie,” Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 3 7, 673–81.

CLAUDE GEFFRÉ

See also Barth, Karl; Existence of God, Proofs of; Knowledge of God; Reason; Revelation; Vatican I

Naturalism

The term “naturalism” has a large spectrum of meanings and usages, from the fields of sciences to the figurative arts, and to literary production in general. It should be kept in mind, however, that it was originally coined by theologians. These theologians, in the atmosphere of disputes on the relationships between nature* and grace*, intended to qualify a general attitude with regards to natural and historical reality, the attitude that excludes “supernatural” realities and interventions, or does not take them into account (see e.g. the syllabus of Pius IX, §1–7, DS 2901–2907). The term’s connotation is evidently negative: it is about errors that eventually must be refuted and in any case condemned; these mistakes are deemed to be caused on the one hand by an appreciation of human nature that is too optimistic, and on the other hand by the conviction that everything can be explained and founded by way of causes and natural forces.

In this light, it is only in a metaphoric way that one could speak of naturalism with regard to classical thought: indeed, if we measure them by referring to Christian theology*, any theoretical perspective and any practical behavior anterior (or exterior) to the Judeo-Christian action (“revelation*”) could only be naturalist. And if, on the contrary, we speak of classical thought by following its own principles, we will realize that the connotations and spheres of application of the concept of nature vary from school to school, and especially since in many cases, nature is not at all the ultimate horizon of things, neither of speculation nor of action. In the Middle Ages, however, and more particularly in the 12th century, the reappropriation of Greek thought and the discovery of Arabic sciences by the Latin West posed the problem in terms that would be inherited by modernity. The problem that confronted all then was to understand how a model of the universe completely transparent to reason*, made up of a hierarchical series of causes (including the Primary Cause) that exerted their causality in a necessary mode and sufficed to explain the true nature of things, could reconcile itself with the idea of a world dependent of the free will of a God* who makes himself known by revealing himself. Likewise, the idea of man building his own ethics* in an autonomous fashion through the exercise of the intellect (that is to say following his own nature), and able to reach in this life a felicity in place of beatitude*, seemed irreconcilable with the main themes of Christian thought, which were the notions of sin* and grace. In the second half of the 13th century, however, a group of Christian intellectuals, professors at the faculty of arts at the University of Paris, proposed the simultaneous adoption of two models—a concord between faith* and science. Their thesis was that, in spite of appearances, the two models did not oppose each other, provided their principles and methods were rigorously distinguished: revelations and miracles* characterized faith and theology, reason and natural causes, science and philosophy*. This solution would be officially pushed back with the condemnation promulgated by the bishop of Paris, Etienne Tempier, on 7 March 1277 (Hissette 1977; Bianchi 1990; Libera 1991). Beyond the only theses concerned, it was the rebirth of a secular philosophy in a Christian milieu that the bishop and his theological counselors condemned: the emergence of a philosophy claiming its own autonomy from theology. Its proponents did not deny the existence of something superior to reason and natural causes; they even stated its possibility—but by giving up this field to theology and in recusing all interference of the truths of faith in a scientific and philosophical inquiry, they indeed posed a new challenge to theology.

The “naturalist” attitude was known for a long time under the name of “theory of the double truth*” (thus Tempier: “Indeed they say that certain things are true according to philosophy, which are not true according to Catholic faith, as if there were two truths.” Charularium Universitatis Parisiensis I, 542). Also linked to the doctrines of the eternity of the world, of the unicity of human intellect and of the reign of necessity in moral and physical things, the “double truth,” according to Renan and Mandonnet, would have been the characteristic of Averroism, often considered as the medieval beginning of all modern naturalism. A better knowledge of the texts and authors, however, showed that, if by Averroism one means a body of doctrines accepted by a compact and quite identifiable group of thinkers, then Averroism never existed (and many theses regarded as typical of Averroism do not come from Averroes). In the same way, no-one ever defended a doctrine of double truth. Indeed, for all the medieval proponents of the independence of the philosophical, the truth of faith remained the absolute truth. It is true, though, that beyond doctrinal differences, these “philosophers” (Masters of Arts) jointly worked toward the intellectual construction of a physical and ethical world that would do without miracles or post mortem rewards and punishments*.

The condemnations of 1277 had deep and lasting effects on the intellectual history of Western Europe, but the model that continued to prevail was the one legitimizing a strict separation between philosophy and theology, between causes or natural laws and the miraculous intervention of an omnipotent God. From John of Jandun and Marsilius of Padua to Agustino Nifo and Pietro Pomponazzi, the philosophers would continue simultaneously to recognize the limits of a strictly rational and natural approach to the real, and to reject all foreign intervention in philosophy’s principles and methods.

In the thoughts of the Parisian professors of the 13th century, a theory laden with consequences began to prevail: one could recognize the possibility of divine interventions (or even angelic, if not diabolic) infringing on the ordinary course of nature, but this did not exclude that the scientist would seek the possibility of driving everything back to natural causes, including events apparently extraordinary. This was done, for example, for visions in dreams and magical practices (Fioravanti 1966–67): Boethius of Dacia indeed reduced the firsts to being nothing but the imaginative transcription of physiological and pathological states, and Singer of Brabant stated that the virtutes naturales of elements and bodies (see soul*-heart-body) sufficed, in their diversity, to explain the second. In this way, philosophy and science always pushed back their limits, and pushed back the supernatural* toward a horizon always further away. This type of interpretation, present all through the 14th century, would multiply and strengthen near the end of the 15th and 16th centuries. Pomponazzi (De incantationibus, de fato) would explain the miracles, almost in the same way of Giordano Bruno, by already having recourse to exclusively psychophysical causes; he would place the highest human faculties in a system of natural forces, according to which it is useless to resort to external interventions to cause and explain each fact, not only physical, but also moral and historical, including the appearance of the great revealed religions, as well as the life and the character of their founder.

In the 16th century, this all-encompassing nature would progressively assume the characteristics of a subject that has an intrinsic force of development and self-organization. This type of natural materialism would survive Cartesian dualism, and would even inherit some of its characteristics by going from vitalism to mechanism: the matter and quantity of the movement then became the ultimate principles through which all diversity of events, not only physical but also psychological and ethical, could be renewed. An important part of the Enlightenment would support this program (La Mettrie, Holbach). From then on, the simple possibility that a being transcending nature could intervene in it could not be denied; and the belief in transcendent entities reduced itself to psychological processes that are individual or collective, completely natural and thus completely comprehensible from a rational point of view (Hume, The Natural History of Religion, 1757).

The varied naturalism of the 19th century (biological naturalism of Moleschott, evolutionary naturalism by Darwin) would maintain the general idea of nature as completely self-sufficient totality, fully intelligible by human reason (maybe in the terms of an indefinite progress). The totaling and metaphysical character of this idea of nature, however, would be criticized in the twentieth century in numerous trends of thought. The conviction would grow that man, the only being capable of a symbolic approach by means of language, was not reducible to his pure natural dimension. From naturalism, however, we keep the conviction that it is not acceptable, in the field of natural sciences*, to have recourse to first principles that transcend the course of this nature.

- Averroes, Aristotelis Opera cum Averrois commentariis, Venice, 1562–1574.
- Boethius of Dacia, Opera, Ed. A. Otto, H. Roos, et al., Corpus philosophorum danicorum medii aevi, Copenhagen, 1969–.

- A. Nifo, De immortalitate animae libellum adversus Petrum Pomponatium Mantuanum, Venice, 1518.
- P. Pomponazzi, Tractatus de immortalitate animae, Ed. G. Morra, Bologna, 1954.
- Singer of Brabant, Quaestiones in tertium de anima, De anima intellectiva, De aeternitate mundi, edited by B. Bazan, Louvain, 1972.
- Singer of Brabant Écrits de logique, de morale et de physique, edited by B. Bazan, Louvain, 1974.
- ◆ E. Renan (1852), Averroès et l'averroïsme: Essai historique (OC, vol. 3, Paris, 1949).
- P. Mandonnet (1911–18), Siger de Brabant et l'averroïsme latin au XIIIe siècle, 2 vol., Louvain.
- F. van Steenberghen (1931–42), Siger de Brabant d'après ses œuvres inédites, 2 vol., Louvain.
- É. Gilson (1932), “Le Moyen Age et le naturalisme antique,” AHDL 7, 5–37 (Études médiévales, Paris, 1986, 19–52).
- B. Nardi (1945), Sigieri di Brabante nel pensiero del Rinascimento italiano, Rome.
- É. Gilson (1955), “Boèce de Dacie et la double vérité,” AHDL 22, 81–99 (Études médiévales, 147–66); (1961), “Autour de Pomponazzi: Problématique de l’immortalité de l’âme en Italie au début du XVIe siècle,” AHDL 28, 163–278 (Humanisme et Renaissance, Paris, 1986, 133–250).
- G. Fioravanti (1966–67), “La ‘scientia sompnialis’ di Boezio di Dacia,” Atti della Accad. delle Scienze di Torino, Classe delle scienze morali, storiche e filolog. 101, 329–69.
- R. Hissette (1977), Enquête sur les 219 articles condamnés à Paris le 7 mars 1277, Louvain and Paris.
- L. Bianchi (1990), Il vescovo e i filosofi: La condanna parigina del 1277 e l’evoluzione dell’ aristotelismo scolastico, Bergamo.
- A. de Libera (1991), Penser au Moyen Age, Paris.
- R. Imbach (1997), Siger de Brabant, profession: philosophe, Paris.

GIANFRANCO FIORAVANTI

See also Intellectualism; Sciences of Nature; Paganism; Philosophy; Revelation; Supernatural

Nature

The concept of nature was imposed on Christian theology* from without. It does not correspond to any Hebrew term. In the Old Testament it appears only in the deuterocanonical books (Wis 7:20, 13:1, and 19:18), while in the New Testament it signifies merely the being* or normal order of things according to their origin, type, and definition (Jas 3:7). The pagans, for example, naturally follow the Law* (Rom 2:14 and 2:27) to which the Jews are bound by their birth (Gal 2:15). In Christianity, unlike gnosticism*, nature implies no negative or positive judgment. It merely serves to denote the totality of beings whom Christ* has come to save. Mankind is, of course, destined to participate in another nature, the divine nature (2 Pt 1:4), but God in his freedom is all-powerful over created nature; he can even intervene in it—for example to graft the branch of the pagans “against nature” onto the trunk of the Jewish nation (Rom 11:21–24). Moreover, the contradiction between the animate body (see soul*-heart-body) and the Holy* Spirit must finally be resolved (1 Cor 15:44), and the natural world become transparent to the Kingdom* of God (Mk 4:30–32 and 13:28–29).

The concept of nature was to play a considerable role in the patristic era, starting from the basis of a neutral definition: “Nature is nothing other than what one considers a thing to be in its kind” (Augustine, De moribus ecclesiae, 2, 2; PL 32, 134 b). Trinitarian and christological thought implied a distinction between the concepts of nature and person*, while the Pelagian controversy involved a confrontation between nature and grace*.

a) Nature and Person. God is unique in his nature, and the divine persons share in this same essence. According to the Cappadocians, phusis was equivalent to ousia, and the term “consubstantial*” (Nicaea* I) could be replaced by “connatural” (Basil*, Against Eunomius II, 580 b). It was then possible to say that God was “one nature in three hypostases” (Cyril of Alexandria, Contra Julianum VIII; PG 76, 904 C). In Christology*, the concept of nature gave rise above all to numerous misunderstandings. Athanasius* thought it appropriate to place the emphasis on the unity of God, who made himself flesh “in order to save men and to do them good, so that, by participating in humankind, he might enable it to participate in the divine and spiritual nature” (Life of Anthony 74, 4; SC 400, 324). Apollinarius spoke of Christ as an incarnation of the divine nature: “A single nature of God the incarnate Word*” (monophysitism*). For the Antiochenes, on the other hand, two hypostases (human and divine) were united in Christ to form his person* (prosopon). Cyril, who took up Apollinarius’s formula (which he believed to be Athanasius’s) and rejected what seemed to him to be a division of God, spoke of a single hypostasis and a single nature. At this time the terms had no strict technical sense. The definition of Chalcedon*, in clarifying Christology*, was to impose a rigorous definition of the concept of nature: Christ was “a single person” in which were united “two natures,” divine and human.

b) Nature and Grace. The opposition between nature and grace is based on these Trinitarian and christological considerations: Christ is the Son of God by nature, while man is so by adoption (Cyril of Alexandria, The-saurus XII, 189 AB). Hence, so Pelagius considered, it was necessary to affirm the goodness of human nature, its liberty*, and its power to do good* (De natura, 604;

see Pelagianism*) in order to give homage to the Creator. For Augustine*, on the other hand, a doctrine that considered man to be capable of good on his own accord rendered Christ’s incarnation* and sacrifice* superfluous: “Man’s nature was originally created without sin* and without any vice; but man’s present nature, by which everyone is descended from Adam*, is already in need of the physician, for it is not in good health [sana]” (De natura et gratia, PL 44, 249; BAug 21, 248). Inasmuch as it was created, all nature was good; and consequently all evil* derived from man and was but a distortion of the good. The corruption of nature had two aspects: it was both the automatic consequence of sin and the result of divine punishment. Having sinned of his free will, man was punished by way of his own sin, and lost his power of self-mastery. So was this corruption total? Augustine’s initial response is unsystematic: in the De Natura et Gratia he wavers between the notions of man’s subservience to bad habits, a weakening of free will, and its complete disappearance. Subsequently, in his De Correptione et Gratia, he is inclined to defend the idea of a radical loss of liberty.

These extreme developments were not all accepted by Catholic tradition*, though the concept of “tainted nature” was taken up by the Council of Orange in 529 (CChr.SL 148 A, 55; DS 174), and again by the Council of Trent* (5, 239; DS 174). According to Anselm*, the fall of the devil resulted from his voluntary abandonment of righteous will. Paradoxically, if God did not give him the gift of perseverance, it was because he did not accept it (The Fall of the Devil, or De Casu Diaboli, ch. 3). In the 12th century, however, theology was faced with the rediscovery of the sciences* of nature (School of Chartres*; Speer 1995); and in the 13th century it encountered the Aristotelian concept of nature: a nature that formed the object of physics, that had its own autonomy and stability, and in which theology could perceive only an unchanging capacity for the receipt of grace. From this point, the opposition between nature and grace grew stronger.

For Scholasticism*, the nature created by God obeyed the laws conferred upon it by its creator (Bonaventure, II Sent. d. 34, a. 1, q. 3, ad 4 prop. neg.). To act against these laws would be to contravene his very decision. There was thus an autonomy in the natural order.

Then divine omnipotence* promptly appeared as another focus, external to the previous one, and theology was to hesitate between the extremes of naturalism* and the absolute exaltation of omnipotence (nominalism*). Emphasized by Luther* (Heidelberg Dispute, 1518, WA 1, 350–74), the corruption of nature was played down on the Catholic side by Robert Bellarmine* (De Controversis Christianae Fidei, De Gra- tia Primi Hominis 5, 12): “The corruption of nature does not result from the lack of a natural gift, nor from the attainment of an evil state, but from the simple absence of the supernatural gift” (see Bañezianism*-Molinism-Baianism). The debate remains open between Catholics and Protestants, Catholic thinking being characterized by the harmony between nature and grace, while the radical corruption of nature remains an essential element of Protestant dogmatics*.

Finally, one might ask whether the concept of nature, as applied to mankind, retains its clarity and relevance, when man is a transcendent being not confined within limits assigned a priori (Rahner 1954).

- Augustine, De natura et gratia (BAug 21).
- Pelagius, De natura (PL 48, 598–606).

- ◆ R. Arnou (1933), “Unité numérique et unité de n. chez les Pères, après le concile de Nicée,” Gr. 14, 269–72.
- K. Rahner (1954), “Über das Verhältnis von Natur und Gnade,” Schr. zur Th. 1, 323–45.
- S. Otto (1960), Natura und Dispositio: Untersuchung zum Naturbegriff und zur Denkform Tertullians, Munich.
- F.-J. Thonnard (1965), “La notion de natura chez saint Augustin. Ses progrès dans la polémique antipélagienne,” REAug 11, 239–65.
- F.-J. Thonnard (1966), “Les deux états de la n. humaine, ‘intègre’ puis ‘corrompue,’ et la grâce du Christ,” in Augustin, La grâce, BAug 21, 614–22.
- H. Köster (1973), “Phusis,” ThWNT 9, 246–71.
- A. Speer (1995), Die entdeckte Natur: Untersuchungen zu Begründungsversuchen einer Scientia naturalis im 12. Jahrhundert, Leyden.

OLIVIER BOULNOIS

See also Being; Grace; Naturalism; Supernatural

Negative Theology

I. Apophaticism and Neoplatonism

1. Definition of Negation (apophasis, apharesis)

The Greek term aphairesis denotes the motion of discarding (remotio), cutting off, or taking away something (Plato, Critias 46 c). It is the opposite of prosthesis, the action of placing (Plutarch, Lycurgus 13). It is a mathematical term: in the Metaphysics A2, 982, a. 28 Aristotle opposes aphairesis to prosthesis as “subtraction” is to “addition.” It is also a term in logic: in Aristotle’s Posterior Analytics (I, 18, 7) ex aphaireseôs signifies “by abstraction,” and this sense was taken up by numerous Latin translations that render aphairesis by abstractio. Apharesis is opposed to thesis as negation is to affirmation, but it is also distinguished from apophasis (which equally signifies negation) inasmuch as aphairesis denotes a movement beyond.

Latin translators rendered aphairesis, according to context, either by the concrete sense of “cutting off” or “suppression” (ablatio), or by the sense of abstraction (abstractio) or negation (negatio). Thomas* Aquinas noted the two meanings of aphairesis, and translated it by remotio, mostly in his earliest works, and thereafter by negatio.

- 1) For Aristotle the aphaeretic method was a process of separation or subtraction that led to the grasping (noësis) of an intelligible form or an essence. This method of separation or cutting off is abstraction. It proceeds from the complex to the simple and from the visible to the invisible.

- 2) This method is represented in the work of other Middle Platonic writers such as Alcinous, who in his Didaskalikos (ch. 12) distinguishes four ways by which the human mind may raise itself to God*: affirmation, analogy*, transcendence, and negation.

2. Plato’s Parmenides and its Neoplatonic Commentaries

a) The key text for any study of negative* theology is the first hypothesis of the Parmenides (“The One is one”), in which after asserting that “the One in no way partakes of being*, and that it does not even have enough being to be one, since immediately it would be and would partake of being” (141 e), Parmenides reaches this formidable assertion: “It appears indeed, on the contrary, both that the One is not one, and that the One is not” (141 e)—which is a negation of the hypothesis itself. The conclusion of the first hypothesis is thus the unknowable and ineffable nature of the One: “Therefore it has no name*; of it there is neither a definition, nor knowledge, nor sensation, nor opinion” (Parm. 142 a).

b) This apophaticism recurs in the Neoplatonic commentaries on the Parmenides, both the anonymous commentary whose author has been identified as Porphyry by P. Hadot (Porphyre et Marius Victorinus, Paris, 1968), and that by Proclus. It is equally to be found in the apophatic theology of Pseudo-Dionysius*.

c) For Plotinus, as for Plato, the first principle lies beyond ousia. Unlike Plato, however, Plotinus asks what chance we have of knowing this transcendent principle, the One, which is neither being nor thought. Only the One, the first hypostasis, is simple, whereas in the second hypostasis, the intellect, there is a duality of being and thought. It is therefore not possible to conceive of the One, but only to have a non-intellectual apprehension of it, which is a kind of mystical* experience. This experience is described in the Enneads in terms borrowed from the love-madness of Plato’s Phaedra and Symposium. “The Plotinian mystical experience is a kind of oscillation between the intellectual intuition of the thought which conceives itself, and the amorous ecstasy of the thought which loses itself in its principle.” (Hadot, EU, vol. 22, p. 497). Mystical experience and negative theology remain distinct, however: “It is mystical experience which is the basis of rational theology, not the reverse” (ibid.).

d) It is in the work of Damascius (c. 458–533) that the negative method becomes most radical. In his treatise On the First Principles, he expresses perfectly the paradox of a first principle of everything that cannot be outside everything (since then it would not be the principle), yet which must at the same time transcend everything (if it is really the first principle). These difficulties lead to a radical apophaticism: “We demonstrate our ignorance and our incapacity to speak of it [aphasia]. . . . Our ignorance regarding it is total, and we know it neither as knowable or as unknowable” (see J. Combès’s preface to his edition of the treatise On the First Principles, v. 1, CUFr, Paris, 1986).

II. Negative Theology and Mystical Theology

1. Apophatic Theology

a) Philo of Alexandria and the First Church Fathers. Philo was the originator of a whole school of thought concerning the incomprehensibility of the divine essence (ousia): “The greatest good is to understand that God, according to his essence [kata to einai], is incomprehensible [akatalèptos]” (Poster. 15).

The assertion that knowledge* of the divine essence is beyond the natural powers of human beings is a commonplace of the earliest Christian theologians (Justin, Dialogue 127, 2; Clement of Alexandria, Strom. II, 2; Irenaeus* of Lyons, Adv. Haer. IV, 20, 5; Origen, Against Celsus VII, 42).

b) Eunomian crisis and Its Refutation by the Cappadocians. It was, however, in response to the heresy of Eunomius, who identified the divine essence with the nature of the unbegotten (agennètos) and thereby denied incomprehensibility, that a Christian negative theology was really developed by the Cappadocians and John Chrysostom*. For Eunomius, the concept of the unbegotten exactly (akribôs) expressed the divine essence, so that the latter no longer presented any mystery*, and we knew God as he knew himself: “God knows no more of his being than do we; his being is no clearer to him than to us” (Socrates, Hist. eccl. IV, 7).

Basil* of Caesarea and Gregory* of Nyssa, in their respective treatises Against Eunomius, then demonstrated that there was no concept that exactly expressed the divine essence, since it remained unknowable, and attempted to define the properties and relations of the divine persons*. John Chrysostom, meanwhile, took up the arguments of the Cappadocians in two series of homilies against the Eunomians, delivered at Antioch in 386–87 and at Constantinople after 397, which he collected into his Treatise on the Incomprehensibility of God. “God’s essence is incomprehensible to any creature” (IV, 6). This was as true for natural reason* as for the Bible*: the psalmist “is seized with vertigo before the infinite and yawning ocean of God’s wisdom*” (Ps 138:6); Moses testifies that none see God and live (Ex 33:20); and Paul says that God’s judgments are unsearchable and his ways “inscrutable” (Rom 11:33; see also Is 53:8).

So the vocabulary of negative theology became established. It employs New Testament terms such as invisible (aoratos), unutterable (arrètos), indescribable (anekdiègètos), unfathomable (anereunètos) and inaccessible (aprositos). Others come from Philo: inconceivable (aperinoètos), impossible to delimit (aperigraptos), to represent (askhèmatistos) or to contemplate (atheatos). Finally the term aphatos, ineffable, comes from Neoplatonism. This vocabulary is found in the Byzantine liturgy* of St John Chrysostom and St Basil, in Byzantine spiritual texts, and in the works of Maximus* the Confessor and Symeon the New Theologian.

2. Affirmative and Negative Theology According to Dionysius the Pseudo-Areopagite.

Dionysius was the first, in his Mystical Theology, to systematize the relationship between affirmative or cataphatic theology and negative or apophatic theology, and then to propose a rigorous theory of negation.

a) Status of Negation. Negation is defined from three points of view:

- 1) As the non-contradiction of affirmations and negations—there is no contradiction between negation and affirmation. This would be the case were one to restrict oneself to the realm of the existents, but it is not the case when dealing with the transcendent Cause.
- 2) As a surpassing of all privation. Negation is not practiced by means of privation (kata sterèsin) but, as is the case when speaking of the Darkness, by means of transcendence or superiority (kath' hyperokhèn). The Darkness is another negative metaphor for the transcendence of the inaccessible light.

To say that negation (aphairesis) is not a privation (sterèsis) is first of all to assert that there is no privation in the Cause, which is “above privations,” and thereby to assert some positivity of negation by transcendence (hyperokhikè aphaire-sis), which increases the negation. This idea would be developed later by medieval writers such as Thomas Aquinas, for whom negation, when it concerned God, was a negation of privation itself.

- 3) As being beyond all negation and all position. The surpassing of privation is reinforced by a surpassing of negation and position. Here Dionysius uses the term aphairesis in place of apophasis, in the opposition aphairesis–thesis.

b) Dual Limit of Negation. Negative theology is thus defined by a dual transcendence of the Cause, which marks its dual (lower and upper) limit.

- 1) The negation of privation. On the one hand, negative theology is not a negation by privation, but by transcendence; on the other hand, it is itself transcended by the Cause, which is beyond negation and position. “We affirm nothing,” says Dionysius, “and deny nothing, for the one Cause is beyond all affirmation, and transcendence beyond all negation” (MT V, 1048 B). There is thus a reinforcement of negation and of transcendence: the fact of affirming something is denied, and the fact of denying something is denied. There is a progression from “neither...nor...” to “nothing.”

- 2) The beyond of negation. What does this “nothing” mean? This is the final question of negative theology, and becomes apparent in its very transcendence. This nothing is the opposite of the beyond. It is the same to say “the Cause is beyond negation and position” as to say “we affirm nothing and deny nothing.” The “nothing” means that we cannot affirm or deny the transcendent Cause as if it were a “something,” nor speak of That which is above being (hyperousios) as if it were a being (on). The absolute nature of Dionysius’s final assertion—“we affirm or deny nothing”—sets out the absolute transcendence of the Cause without however invalidating negative theology. God is beyond everything, but this does not imply the destruction of language. And insofar as it is still a theo-logy, negative theology is able to avoid the two pitfalls of the reduction of God to an idolatrous representation (see Marion 1977) and the collapse of any possibility of a discourse on God.

Thomas Aquinas showed in his critique of Maimonides that radical apophaticism destroys the very possibility of a language about God. Admittedly God remains unknown in his essence, inasmuch as he is supere-sential, but he cannot be totally unknown. And while “idolatry*” reduces God to the representation of a something, of a this or that, radical apophaticism destroys negative theology itself as a possible discourse on God (see A. Osorio-Osorio, “Maïmonides: El lenguaje de la teología negativa sobre el conocimiento de Dios,” Sprache und Erkenntnis im Mittelalter, MM 1981; A. Wohlman, “Théologie négative et analogie,” in his Thomas d’Aquin et Maïmonide: Un dialogue exemplaire, Paris, 1988).

c) Negation and Eminence. God is thus named, in a naming according to his eminence, as “He who is beyond all essence and knowledge,” “He who is beyond everything,” “He who surpasses everything,” “He who is totally unknown,” “He who transcends vision and knowledge,” “the Ineffable,” “the Cause of everything who is above everything,” and “the transcendence of Him who is absolutely detached from everything and who is beyond everything.”

A dual series of adjectives prefixed by hyper- and privative alpha is used to describe him. On the one hand, he is beyond Being, the Good*, and the Divine (hyperousios, hyperagathos, hypertheos), super-luminous (hyperphaès) and super-unknowable (hyperagnòstos). On the other hand, he is invisible (aoratos, atheatos), impalpable (anaphès), ineffable (arrètos), lacking intellect (anous), speech (alogos), life (azòos), and substance (anousios), and inexpressible (aphthegtos). God may be referred to as Silence (sigè), Tranquility (hè-sukhia), or Ineffability (aphthegsia). He eludes all sight and all contact, as he does all knowledge. This is why the mystic, in order to know him, must carry out a “binding” of all the operations of the senses and the intelligence: the suspension of all knowledge or the absence of all intellectual activity (anenergèsia), the closing of the mouth (aphthegsia) and of the eyes (ablèpsia), the absence of vision and knowledge (agnòsia). So Moses, in penetrating the truly mystical cloud of unknowing, “shuts his eyes to all the apprehensions of knowledge and frees himself from the spectacle and the spectators.”

III. Negative Theology and Learned Ignorance

1. Thomas Aquinas

Dionysius’s doctrine of negative theology meets with “prudent correction” (V. Lossky) in the work of Thomas Aquinas, for whom God is not beyond being, but “being itself subsisting,” ipsum esse subsistens, who confers upon esse itself the nature of the unnameable. We know that God is, the an sit, but not what he is, the quid est.

Thomas locates himself unambiguously within the Dionysian tradition when he says that we join with God, not merely as with an unknown, but actually inasmuch as he is unknown, tanquam ignotum or quasi ignotum. “The peak of our knowledge in this life, as Dionysius says in his work De mystica Theologia, is that ‘we are joined with God as with an unknown’; this results from our knowing of him what he is not, his essence remaining absolutely hidden from us [quid vero sit penitus manet ignotum]. Hence, to emphasize the ignorance of this sublime knowledge, it is said of Moses that he ‘approached the obscurity in which God dwells’ [quod accessit ad caliginem in qua est Deus]” (CG, 1. III, c. 49; see also In Boethium de Trinitate, q. 1, a. 2, ad 1 and ST Ia, q. 12, a. 13, ad 1: In hac vita non cognoscamus de Deo quid est, et sic ei quasi ignoto coniungimus). It is nonetheless possible to speak of Thomas’s God: the via eminentia, endowed by Thomas with a positivity that it lacked in the work of Dionysius, enables him to develop a theo-logy.

2. Meister Eckhart

Following Dionysius the Pseudo-Areopagite, Meister Eckhart (see V. Lossky, Théologie négative et connaissance de Dieu chez Maître Eckhart, Paris, 1960, and E. Zum Brunn and Alain de Libera, Métaphysique du Verbe et Théologie négative, Paris, 1984) also maintains that the name* of God is at once the nomen innominabile and the nomen omninominabile. The opposition between the poluônumon and the anônumon corresponds to the two theologies, affirmative and negative, and the latter is more perfect than the former because it focuses on the ineffable nature. Eckhart also draws on Thomas Aquinas, however: the esse innominabile is an esse absconditum; and in his commentary on Cum quaeris nomen meum, quod est mirabile, Eckhart is also conscious of how Thomas had treated it. With the Parisian Questions, however, Eckhart commits himself to the Dionysian view of God beyond being: defining the esse as the esse of created beings, he obliges himself to state that God, being pure intellect, is non ens or non esse. So the theologian follows an intellectual mode of ascent that forces him to leave behind created things in order to try to reach God in himself, in his “unity” (einigkeit) or his “solitude” (wüestunge), two terms brought together in the German Sermon 12. In German Sermon 9, Eckhart goes as far as to deny the attribution of pure being to God: “I would be saying something equally unjust if I called God an essence as if I were to call the sun pale or black. God is neither one thing nor another.” Later however, he adds: “By saying that God is not a being and that he is superior to being, I have not denied him being: on the contrary, I have exalted being in God.”

In a third period, Eckhart was to return to a solemn declaration of the equivalence of being and God: esse est Deus. This was no rejection of negative theology, however, since being remains mysterious and hidden: deus sub ratione esse et essentiae est quasi dormiens et latens absconditus in se ipso (Exp. in Io., C., f. 122b).

3. Nicholas of Cusa

Nicholas of Cusa set out his negative theology in the De Docta Ignorantia (1440), an expression he borrowed from Augustine. The crux of this doctrine is the “coincidence of opposites.” Human beings are part of the world of duality; in order to raise themselves to God, however, they must attain the place where opposites are absorbed or reconciled into unity, or where they coincide in God. The divine names imposed by reason are contrasted with their opposites—for example unity and plurality, identity and otherness—but these opposites coincide in God, and it is through this coincidence that they befit God (§25). This is why “the theology of negation is so necessary...for the theology of affirmation, that without it God would not be worshipped as the infinite* God, but rather as a creature... Sacred ignorance has taught us that God is ineffable... We speak of God more truly through removal and negation, as the great Dionysius [does]” (Chap. 26).

4. Angelus Silesius

Silesius (1624–77) comes at the end of the great Rhineland*-Flemish mystical tradition of Tauler, Eckhart, Ruusbroec and Henry Suso, all of whom in their own way lie within the apophatic current originating with Dionysius. In the Cherubinischer Wandersmann, he goes even further than them in the expression of negativity, and even talks of superdeity as a way of expressing the bare and indefinable nature of the deity*: “What is said of God is not yet enough for me: Superdeity is my life and my light.” One must take oneself beyond the self and even beyond God: “Whither should I strive? Even into a desert, beyond God himself”; and “If God did not wish to take me beyond God, I would know how to force him by pure love*.” God is expressed by silence: “If you wish to express the being of eternity*, you must first abjure all speech.”

5. Mystical Theology and Negative Theology in the Twentieth Century: V. Lossky

The apophatic current that originated with Dionysius, enriched by the Carmelite experience of the “dark night,” continued up until the 17th century with the work of Cardinal de Bérulle*. However, while the Jesuits continued to write treatises on mystical theology in the 17th century, interest in these issues waned in the 18th century—there was presumably a conflict between mysticism and the Enlightenment, which aimed to dispel mystery. It wasn’t until the 20th century, and the renewal of interest in mysticism within both Catholicism* and Orthodoxy*, that we could pick up the thread of the via negativa intrinsic to all mystical theology.

Two books illustrate this renewal: A. Stolz O.S.B., Théologie de la mystique, Chèvotogne, 1947, and V. Lossky, Théologie mystique de l’Église d’Orient, Paris, 1944. The latter situates himself explicitly within the Dionysian tradition*, and regards apophatic theology as inseparable from the mystical theology of the Eastern Church*. In his conclusion—which he was to repeat in a lecture on the Trinity* and apophasis—he shows that the Trinity, and in particular the person of the Holy* Spirit, can only be understood in terms of the apophatic approach: “The apophaticism characteristic of the Eastern Church’s mystical theology ultimately appears to us as bearing witness to the plenitude of the Holy Spirit, a person who remains unknown, for all that he fills all things and guides them towards their final accomplishment.” (245)

IV. The Inexpressible and Silence

Wittgenstein’s Tractatus Logico-philosophicus presents issues analogous to those set out by Damascius.

The opposition is no longer between the whole and the principle, but between language, or the world*, and its meaning: “That which is expressed in language, we can only express by language” (4. 121). Certainly, everything is not expressible; and to that which can be expressed logically, Wittgenstein opposes an inexpressible that cannot be uttered, but which can be shown. Propositions “show” the logical form of reality; what is shown, however, is not of the order of logic, but of the “mystical”: “The mystical (das Mystische) is not ‘how the world is,’ but ‘the fact that it is’” (6. 44). Mystical experience cannot say to itself, “Whereof one cannot speak, thereof one must be silent” (7). Not only is the meaning of the utterable unutterable, but the end of language, as of all negative theology, is silence.

- VI. Lossky (1930), “La théologie négative dans la doctrine de Pseudo-Denys l’Aréopagite,” AHDL 5, 204–221.
- VI. Lossky (1944), Essai sur la théologie mystique de l’Église d’Orient, Paris.
- A. J. Festugière (1954), La Révélation d’Hermès Trismégiste vol. IV: Le Dieu inconnu et la Gnose, ch. 4, §6: “La voie de négation”, Paris.
- J. W. Douglass (1963), “The Negative Theology of Dionysius the Areopagite”, DR 81, 115–24.
- H.-J. Krämer (1967), Der Ursprung der Geistmetaphysik, Amsterdam.
- J. Whittaker (1969), “Neopythagoreanism and Negative Theology”, SO XLIV, 109–125.
- H. Theill-Wunder (1970), Die archaische Verborgenheit: Die philosophischen Wurzeln der negativen Theologie, Munich.
- J. Hochstaffl (1976), Negative Theologie: Ein Versuch zur Vermittlung des patristischen Begriffs, Munich.
- M. J. Krahe (1976), “Von der Wesenheit negativer Theologie,” thesis, University of Munich.
- J.-L. Marion (1977), L’idole et la distance, 183–250, Paris.
- P. Hadot (1981), Exercices spirituels et philosophie antique, ch. 8, 185–93: “Apophatisme et théologie négative,” Paris.
- É. des Places (1982), “La théologie négative du Pseudo-Denys: Ses antécédents platoniciens et son influence au seuil du Moyen Age”, StPatr 17, 81–92.
- C. Guérard (1984), “La théologie négative dans l’apophatisme grec,” RSPHTh 68, 183–200.
- H. U. von Balthasar (1985), Theologik II, Wahrheit Gottes 80–113.
- M. Corbin (1985), “Négation et transcendance dans l’œuvre de Denys,” RSPHTh 69, 41–76.
- D. Carabine (1988), “Apophasis in East and West,” RThAM 55, 5–29.
- H. D. Saffrey (1990), “Connaissance et inconnaissance de Dieu: Porphyre et la théosophie de Tübingen”, in Recherches sur le néoplatonisme après Plotin, Paris.
- M. P. Bezgos (1996), “Apophaticism in the Theology of the Eastern Church: The Modern Critical Function of a Traditional Theory,” GOTR 41, 327–57.

YSABEL DE ANDIA

See also Dionysius the Pseudo-Areopagite; Eternity of God; Jealousy, Divine; Justice, Divine; Knowledge, Divine; Mysticism; Omnipotence, Divine; Omnipresence, Divine; Simplicity, Divine.

Neoplatonism

For a broad understanding of the nature of Plato's contribution to the development of Christian theology from the fourth century onwards (and chiefly in the West), it is necessary to consider the reasons for which Christian thought has needed in successive waves to turn for its intellectual base to what since the 18th century has been known as Neoplatonism. This was an amalgam of elements of Stoic, Aristotelian, and Pythagorean thought, and the development by Plotinus (A.D. 205–270/1) of Plato's "middle period" metaphysics. It dominated the philosophical thinking of the ancient Mediterranean world from the middle of the third century to the closing of the pagan schools by Justinian in A.D. 529.

1. Sources and Documents

a) The most important early Neoplatonist document, synthesizing earlier Stoic, Aristotelian, and Pythagorean traditions but based on a development of Plato's metaphysics, is the Enneads of Plotinus, edited by Porphyry (232/3–c. 305), his disciple and biographer, only after his death. The Enneads, six groups of nine essays (54 developed from an earlier arrangement into 48) originally circulated for discussion among the pupils at his fashionable classes in Rome, are written in a confusing mixture of dialectic, allegory, analysis, and exegesis. They do not constitute a systematic metaphysics, but lean toward the view that all modes of being derive from a single immaterial and impersonal force, the 'One' of Plato's Parmenides and the 'Good' of the Republic, at once the source of all being and all values. All existence is related to this impersonal force by its degree of Oneness, which is higher in beings that transcend the temporal and the spatial.

The degrees of being envisaged by Plotinus were often later to be represented by a series of concentric circles denoting relative distance from the centre, the absolutely One. The descending degrees of reality move through pure mind (nous), within which are Plato's forms, the world soul (psyché), which creates time and space, and nature (physis), which projects the physical world. These sorts of existence are marked by increasing individuation and diminishing unity. Uninformed and unintelligible matter is the outermost circumference or boundary of all existence. Human beings possess all three major principles of reality and can attain unity within themselves in ecstasy, and even momentary identification with the One.

Plotinus had joined the Persian expedition of Gordian III in A.D. 242, and spent two years studying Persian and Indian philosophy in the East before the assassination of Gordian by his troops forced him to take refuge at Antioch, from where he moved to Rome in 245. It is to his study of oriental religion and philosophy that we owe the incorporation into his own thought of elements of the oriental doctrine of emanation against which Christian theology developed the Hebrew doctrine of creation* ex nihilo.

Plotinus himself had studied under Ammonius Saccas in Alexandria, and alongside his own mystical doctrine there entered into the Neoplatonist amalgam elements of the oriental modes of worship that had been easily accessible in the Alexandria of Plotinus's youth, as well as Judaic and Christian thinking, which had originated chiefly in Philo's attempts to present christianized Judaism, with its transcendent monotheistic Hebrew divinity, in acceptably Hellenistic attire to Greek-speaking pagans and the Jewish diaspora. In fourth century Neoplatonism there were therefore logically incompatible elements drawn from oriental and Jewish sources, to which were added some elements from early gnosticism (*see gnosis) as well as the Platonic mysticism of Plotinus.

Neoplatonism in the fourth century was neither a religion nor a coherent philosophy. Harnack is reduced to describing it as a "mood," characterized by "the instinctive certainty that there is a supreme good, lying beyond empirical experience," which is not a purely intellectual good (article "Neoplatonism" in the classic 11th edition of the Encyclopaedia Britannica, 1911). To this "emotional dream" which "treated the old world of fable as the reflection of a higher reality" can be ascribed the realization that "man cannot live by knowledge alone," and it continues to nurture the type of dedication that, effecting a renunciation of the world, "is never able to form a clear conception of the object of its own aspiration."

b) This attitude and the values it sustained were transmitted to the Middle Ages not only by Augustine, who was heavily dependent on Plotinus; not only by Origen*, and Gregory* of Nyssa, and by the Chalcidius commentary on the Timaeus by which Plato was himself chiefly remembered; but also in two collections of the greatest importance in later centuries, giving high Christian authority to Neoplatonist doctrines and attitudes, the Corpus hermeticum and the Corpus Dionysiacum.

The Corpus hermeticum is a series of treatises written in Greek probably in the second and third centuries by non-Christians living in Egypt, but in the 15th century Italian Renaissance understood as a single work and called after the first treatise, the Poimandres (Pimander). Its authorship was ascribed to Hermes (Mercury) Trismegistus, believed to have received it as an original divine revelation, in content homogeneous with the first five books of the Old Testament, which it was often believed to have ante-dated. Its content was thought to have been handed down through Orpheus, Aglaophemus, Pythagoras, and Philolaus (the list appears frequently and is often modified) to Plato, who was considered to have visited Egypt, where he is thought to have come into contact with the Mosaic tradition. As a result its content was thought necessarily to accord with the teaching of the Judeo-Christian revelation, since it ultimately derived from the same source.

The Corpus Dionysiacum, dating from the late-fifth or early-sixth century, consists of the Celestial Hierarchy, the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy, The Divine Names, the Mystical Theology, and ten letters all ascribed during the whole of the Middle Ages to Dionysius, Saint Paul's first convert at Athens (Acts 17:33–34), but now ascribed to an otherwise anonymous author referred to as Dionysius the Pseudo-Areopagite. This Dionysius, amalgamated by Gregory of Tours (c. 538–94) with the Dionysius sent to evangelize the Gauls, claimed to have known the apostles, to have seen the darkening of the sun at the death of Jesus, and to have been present at the dormition of the mother of Jesus. For the Renaissance, therefore, this corpus, too, linked Neoplatonism with Christianity, particularly in its teaching on the celestial and terrestrial hierarchies and on its division of the spiritual life into the three sequential categories of initiation/purgation, illumination, and perfection. For the French it had the added advantage of providing apostolic tradition and continuity for the French church, which could now trace its origins back to Saint Paul, whose doctrinal authority was thought equal to that of Saint Peter, the first bishop of Rome, giving the Gallican church parity of standing with the church of Rome.

2. Transmission and Influence

While the influence of Neoplatonism on Christian theological thinking is pervasive, enduring, and complex, there are clearly identifiable historical waves of specific recourse by Christian thinkers to Neoplatonism as contained in one or other of the three main sources.

a) Augustine's dependence on Plotinus in his anti-Manichaean* polemic, and his subsequent position for at least a millennium and a half as the father of Western theology, ensured that Plotinian Neoplatonism should provide the Christian theology of creation with its basic structure, placing the human body and soul between the angelic and the purely material creations. The image of concentric circles of being was called on implicitly or explicitly to oppose the different forms of cosmic dualism which did not cease to appear until the Renaissance. Augustine's Plotinian understanding of the body–soul relationship, which underlay his quest for the image of God in human beings, also provided the major Scholastic theologians with the basic anthropological categories that led them to distinguish cognitive and volitive activities and assign them to different human “faculties” of the soul, intellect, and will.

b) In mystical theology the Rhineland* mystics of the 14th century and their successors in the Low Countries, France, and Spain needed to have recourse to a different Neoplatonist tradition to explain mystical experiences that occurred outside the boundaries of discursive knowing. Post-Renaissance theologians such as André du Val (1564–1638), the French commentator on Aquinas, transformed what the mystics had referred to as the “high-point” of the soul (apex mentis), for which Scholastic anthropology did not account, into the “heart,” seat of both knowledge and virtue.

c) The Italian Renaissance, as represented chiefly by Marsilio Ficino (1433–99), translator of the hermetic corpus and pseudo-Dionysius, and both translator and commentator on Plato and Plotinus, whose thought was developed by Pico Della Mirandola (1463–94), exploited the full Neoplatonist tradition finally to provide a theoretical basis for the Renaissance enhancement of human dignity. Neoplatonism allowed Ficino, and those thinkers north of the Alps like Lefèvre d'Étaples (c. 1460–1536) who relied on him, to provide a way round the Scholastic impasse in which no orthodox theology of grace could escape making God's predestinatory decrees arbitrary. Neoplatonist assumptions allowed the obliteration of distinctions between nature and grace and made emotional love between human beings potentially the first step on the ladder ascending to divine love.

c). A current of Neoplatonist exemplarism transmitted by Augustine had, even during the high Middle Ages, provided an alternative epistemology to theories of knowledge relying on the abstraction of some essence (or “quidditas,” or “haecceitas”) from an external object by an intellectus agens. Such exemplarist theories of knowledge ultimately underlay the thought of philosophers such as Descartes* and Malebranche, who were intent on preserving an immaterial and immortal principle of knowledge in the human body–soul. When Locke riposted against Descartes the possibility of “thinking matter,” he unleashed the line of philosophical speculation that finally resulted in German idealism and Hegel’s phenomenology.

Augustine’s dominance, the Rhineland mystics, and the human anthropology of the Renaissance provide only examples. In the history of western theology, Neoplatonism as defined above is to be found, as Harnack saw, behind all attempts to see the good, and in particular the spiritual fulfillment of the individual, in a realm outside the knowledge in which, for Aquinas and the Aristotelian Scholastic tradition, beatitude* itself consisted.

ANTHONY LEVI

Neoscholasticism. See Thomism

Nestorianism

(a) From Antioch to Constantinople. Nestorius was born near the Euphrates in Syria at some time in the last 25 years of the fourth century. Having been a monk in the monastery of Euprepios, he became a priest in Antioch*, and was trained in theology at that city’s celebrated school. In 428, Emperor Theodosius II appointed Nestorius as Bishop and Patriarch of Constantinople (patriarchate*), where he became prominent from the outset in the struggle against Arianism* and Apollinarianism*. The difficulties that eventually led to his deposition and exile began when he supported one of his priests who had been accused of challenging the orthodoxy of applying the title Theotokos (“Mother of God”) to Mary*. Nestorius was concerned to safeguard the transcendental nature of the Word*, the Son of God, and to maintain without compromise the distinction between the humanity and the divinity of Jesus*. He therefore recoiled from the use of any expression that might imply “communication” of properties (or idioms*) between these two natures.

(b) Nestorius’s Christology. In response to reprimands from Cyril*, Archbishop of Alexandria*, Nestorius put forward the following exegesis of the introduction of the symbol of the Theotokos at Nicaea (DCO II/1, 115):

You have interpreted the tradition of these holy Fathers in a superficial way and have fallen into a pardonable ignorance. You have concluded that they said that the Word, coeternal with the Father, is passible [pathetos]. However, this divine gathering of Fathers did not say that the consubstantial [homoousios] divinity is passible, nor that the Word, coeternal with the Father, was recently engendered, nor that the Word, which restored its Temple after it was destroyed, has been resurrected.

Without any warning, Nestorius moves from the concrete term “Word” to the abstract term “divinity,” attributing to Cyril the notion that the events in the story of Jesus affected him because of his divinity. Nestorius then goes on (DCO II/1, 115–17):

They [the Fathers] say, I believe, therefore . . . in Our Lord Jesus Christ, his Only Son. Observe how they place first, as fundamentals, “Lord,” “Jesus,” “Christ,” “only begotten,” those names shared by his divinity and his humanity, and then construct the tradition of the incarnation, the resurrection, and the passion. In thus putting forward certain names with meanings common to both natures, their goal was to show that what concerns his filiation cannot be separated from what concerns his lordship, and that, within the uniqueness of this filiation, what concerns the two natures is no longer at risk of disappearing because of confusion.

Nestorius speaks of words shared by the two natures (“Lord,” “Jesus,” “Christ,” and so on) as if they are simply the sum of the natures that they unite (divinity and humanity). In his explanation, these words that Nestorius says are shared by the two natures do not describe a new ontological structure that could take account of their unification in Jesus, and therefore have no formal reference to what it is forbidden to separate (DCO II/1, 118–19):

In every case where holy Scripture mentions the economy of the Lord, the generation and the passion that are presented are not those of Christ’s divinity, but those of his humanity. It follows that the Holy Virgin ought to be given the more precise title of Mother of Christ [Christotokos] rather than Mother of God [Theotokos].

Here too, Nestorius makes an equation between humanity and Christ, on the one hand, and between divinity and God, on the other. Each nature is assimilated to a concrete subject (DCO II/1, 120–23):

It is good, and in conformity with the gospel tradition, to confess that the body is the Temple of the divinity of the Son, a Temple unified in accordance with a supreme and divine conjunction [sunapheia], so that the nature of the divinity appropriates that which belongs to this Temple. However, to attribute to the Word, in the name of this appropriation, the properties of the flesh in this conjunction—I mean generation, suffering, and mortality—is, my brother, either to take up the disturbed thinking of the Greeks, or to fall sick with the madness of Apollinarius, Arius, or other heretics.

Clearly, however much Nestorius feared confusion between the two natures, he was still capable of saying that the nature of the divinity appropriates that which belongs to the “Temple.” On the other hand, it is not clear how the conjunction (sunapheia) that is at issue in this passage can be anything other than a moral combination. Accordingly, Nestorius seems to compromise the integrity of the two natures, and to assume a duality between two concrete subjects, Jesus and the Word. In his defense, it might be pointed out that, on the eve of the Council of Ephesus*, the notions being deployed here did not have the precision and the clarity that they were to acquire two centuries later.

(c) Condemnation and Exile. At Ephesus in 431, following the reading of his second letter to Cyril (DCO II/1, 113–25), Nestorius was banished by the Emperor to a monastery near Antioch, and then sent into exile in Arabia, Libya, and Egypt. He wrote several texts in his own defense, notably the Tragoedia and the Book of Heraclides of Damas, of which a version in Syriac was discovered in 1895. Neither Nestorius’s statements about the relationship between the two natures in Christ—their interpenetration (circumincession*), inhabitation, accreditation, or confirmation—nor his statements on the meaning of prosopon (the mode of appearance of a concrete nature) removed all the doubts from his somewhat clumsy thinking. He died at around the time when the Council of Chalcedon* was beginning (451), believing himself to be in full accord with the Christology* of Flavian of Constantinople and of Pope* Leo I.

(d) Syriac Tradition. Nestorius’s own teachings must be distinguished from those of the Antiochene bishops* who rejected the Act of Union of 433 and gave their support to a “Nestorian” tradition in a declaration issued in 486. The Assyrian Church of the East (the Nestorian Church of the Edessa region) rejected the conclusions of the Council of Ephesus on the communication of idioms and the application of the title of Mother of God to Mary. However, as early as the seventh century the theologians of this church ceased to take anything more than some terminology and metaphors from Nestorius. On 11 November 1994, the Nestorian and Catholic Churches agreed on a declaration about Christology that put an end to the disputes initiated at Ephesus (Ist., 40/2 [1995], 233–35):

The Word of God... was incarnated through the power of the Holy Spirit by assuming from the Holy Virgin Mary a flesh animated by a rational soul, with which it was united indissolubly from the moment of conception... His divinity and his humanity are united in one person... The difference between these natures is preserved in him... but, far from constituting one thing and another thing, divinity and humanity are united in the person of the one and only Son of God and Lord, Jesus Christ, the object of a single worship. Christ was therefore not an ordinary human being whom God adopted, in order to reside within him and inspire him... but the very word of God, engendered by the Father... was born from a mother without a human father. The humanity to which the blessed Virgin Mary gave birth has always been that of the Son of God himself. This is why the Assyrian Church of the East prays to the Virgin Mary as Mother of Christ Our Lord and Savior. In the light of this same faith, the Catholic tradition addresses the Virgin Mary as Mother of God and also as Mother of Christ.

The study of the “Nestorius case” has been taken up with some enthusiasm during the 20th century, frequently with a degree of sympathy toward Nestorius, thanks to the editing of his writings, by F. Loofs and by P. Bedjan, and to research, most notably by E. Amann, L.I. Scipioni, M.V. Anastos, and L. Abramowski.

GILLES LANGEVIN

• DCO II-1, 112–125.

F. Loofs (1905), Nestoriana, Halle.

F. Nau (Ed.) (1910), Nestorius, Le livre d'Héraclide de Damas, Paris.

◆ L.I. Scipioni (1974), Nestorio e il concilio di Efeso, Milan.

A. Grillmeier (1979), Jesus der Christus im Glauben der Kirche I, Friburg-Basel-Vienna (2nd Ed. 1990).

A. de Halleux (1993), "Nestorius: Histoire et doctrine," Irén 66, 38–51; 163–78.

Coll. (1995), La tradition syriaque, Ist 40/1; L'Église de l'Orient, Ist 40/2.

L. Abramowski (1995), "Histoire de la recherche sur Nestorius et le nestorianisme," Ist 40, 44–55.

See also Chalcedon, Council of; Christ/Christology; Cyril of Alexandria; Ephesus, Council of; Hypostatic Union

“New Theology.” See Lubac, Henri Sonier de

Newman, John Henry

1801–1890

a) Life. John Henry Newman was born in London on 21 February 1801. Having become a student at Trinity College, Oxford, in 1817, then Fellow of Oriel College and Vicar of Saint Mary's, the university parish church, he lived in that town until his conversion to Catholicism on 9 October 1845. Entrusted with founding in England the Oratory of Saint Philip Neri, he set up his community in Birmingham, where he died on 11 August 1890. In 1879 Pope Leo XIII had made him a cardinal.

Newman's output is many-faceted (literature, history, philosophy, pedagogy, morality, spirituality). The core of his theological thought is based on the statement that access to revelation* comes about after an ascent that starts from natural* theology and leads through obedience to the moral conscience* up to the plenitude of the truth* revealed in all its multiplicity: the Holy* Scripture, Tradition*, the Church*, and the sacraments*.

b) Natural Knowledge, Revealed Knowledge. For Newman, the above descriptions represent two sources of our knowledge, distinct and yet linked together in the same individual, who knows facts through evidence or from demonstration and who believes with the steadfast certainty that faith* imparts to him. What is at stake in the relations of the two types of knowledge, which must become a perfect harmony, is revealed truth, which is threatened by a hegemonic rationality. Newman's writings on this question—the University Sermons (1826–43) and The Grammar of Assent (1870)—provide a good introduction to the more theological parts of his works.

At the end of the 18th century a school of apologetics, called the Evidential School, had arisen in order to study the challenges to revealed knowledge, insofar as they were founded on the requirement of rational proof. This school's ideas, and particularly those of its chief representative, W. Paley (1743–1805), did not please Newman, for Paley admitted that the proofs of Christian truth should have the rigor of a logical demonstration: he thus reduced faith to a rational belief and demanded the abandonment of unprovable statements of faith. In the University Sermons, Newman created a balance between the two forms of knowledge. Firstly he showed that knowing facts and believing are two of man's equally valid abilities; and then, that the rational evidence is not as clear and the mental certainty that stems from it is not as firm as the philosophers state. Borrowing the arguments of the Anglican bishop and philosopher J. Butler (1692–1752), he applied himself to proving, with numerous examples, that belief is a generally practiced human behavior, exercised far beyond the sphere of religious doctrines.

Newman not only concerned himself with the object of faith, but also with the defense of the believer. On the latter point he asserted every Christian's right, whether or not he could give his reasons for it, to believe with the same certainty that Newman observed in his own self. It is from this viewpoint that the Grammar of Assent clarifies the mechanics of inference that lead to assent, the logic of the "sense of inference," that is, of the "illative sense," which those mechanisms put into play, and the transition from notional assent (assent given to notions) to real assent (assent given to the realities named by these notions).

Yet Newman did not entrust the search for religious truth to pure intellectuality. On the contrary, this search is supported by a moral disposition that serves as its foundation and directs it toward its ultimate goal. It corresponds to the appeal to the moral conscience, and requires deeds subject to its orders. These orders come from outside and from above every individual, and they imply a supreme judge of human actions*. Spurring man to go outside himself in search of the one of whom conscience is the voice, this moral conscience prepares him also to accept a revelation if one should present itself. Obeying his own conscience impels man to compare its commandments with the teachings of the gospels. Therefore, the existence of conscience is not only an argument in favor of the existence* of God: it also disposes man to acknowledge the teachings of revealed religion. In answer to the British statesman W. E. Gladstone (1809–1898), who in 1874 had publicly expressed his fears that British Catholics would no longer be loyal subjects of Her Britannic Majesty if they accepted, as was their duty as Catholics, the dogma* of Papal infallibility* proclaimed during Vatican* I, Newman gave a reminder of that authority* of moral conscience. Writing, in the name of British Catholics, A Letter Addressed to the Duke of Norfolk (1875; the dukes of Norfolk are the premier lay Catholics in England), he defended the primacy of moral conscience over any other authority: in every individual, conscience is "the vicar of Christ*."

c) The Relations between Holy Scripture and Tradition: Anglicanism's "Middle Way." Through his contribution to the birth of the Oxford movement, Newman wanted to work on a systematic exposition of Anglican theology that would allow Anglicanism* to be seen as a via media or "middle way" between Roman Catholicism and Protestantism*. For Newman, the foundation of Anglican doctrine was the apostolic and patristic doctrine contained in the creeds of faith. And in his first book, The Arians of the Fourth Century (1833), he explained that the Church had triumphed over Arianism* because of its fidelity to the tradition of the apostles*, that is, to the credo which, "in those ancient times, was the chief source of instruction, in particular for the understanding of the obscure passages in the Scriptures" (134–35). The relations between scripture and tradition form the main theme of his Lectures on the Prophetic Office of the Church Viewed Relative to Romanism and Popular Protestantism (1837). There Newman defines the Church's teaching task: it receives the tradition as a rule of faith and conduct which it then expounds; all the same, this tradition is always "subordinate and auxiliary," while "the Scriptures are the foundation of all proof." The expression "fundamental doctrines," borrowed from the Anglican theologians R. Hooker (1554–1600), W. Laud (1573–1645), and E. Stillingfleet (1635–1699), refers to one of the most important foundations of the via media, that is, the doctrines contained in the three principal ancient symbols. These doctrines can already be found in Scripture and have been clearly specified in these symbols in order to answer the heretics and to instruct the faithful: accepted "everywhere and always by everyone" (according to Vincent of Lerins's canon from the Commonitorium) they form the "episcopal tradition." Alongside the fundamental doctrines, other doctrines have appeared in the Church's various branches: the Roman branch, the Greek branch, and the Anglican branch. These other doctrines form the "prophetic tradition," which varies from one Church to another, and they serve to explain the episcopal tradition without having the authority to do so. At the Council of Trent* the Roman Church had imposed such non-fundamental doctrines, granting them the same authority as the ancient doctrines. Conversely, by acknowledging only the authority of Scripture and of the private judgment of each believer, the Protestants had abandoned the fundamental doctrines. And yet, explained Newman in his Apostolical Tradition (1836) and in Tract 85 (1835), it is impossible to prove the great doctrines of the divinity of Jesus* by means of scriptural references which exclude the reader's referring also to the tradition that formulated them. Anglicanism is indeed, therefore, the via media between the extremes—that is, between the corruptions added by the Catholics, and the deficits—in other words, the losses—sanctioned by the Protestants.

His Lectures on the Doctrine of Justification (1838) also set out to define the Anglican position. The polemic was directed against the Protestant extremists. There he again asserted the Church's responsibility, its priestly or sacramental duty. Newman protested against the danger represented by the private feeling of being justified (justification*) by faith alone, without taking into consideration the external rituals or the obligation to live in conformity with this faith; and he gave a reminder about the role of the sacraments as instruments of grace*, as well as about the necessity for good works.

His exposition of the via media came to an end with his publication of Tract 90: the Thirty-nine Articles of Anglicanism can be understood in a Catholic sense because they are compatible with the doctrine of the Early Church. For Newman it was a matter of proving the factual reality of the via media. But the Oxford theologians rejected the tract and the bishops condemned it. Moreover, by extending his reading of the Fathers*, Newman became convinced that “the old Catholic truth” did not lie in the Church of England but in the Church of Rome*. Superimposing the present and former states of the Church, he perceived first of all, concerning the Monophysite* heresy, that the Church of Rome remained in his own time the same as it had been then, while the Church of England stood in the position of the Monophysites. And then he realized, with regard to the Arian crisis, that the Protestants took the same stance as the Arians had done and the Anglicans that of the semi-Arians, while the Catholics of that time believed as they still did in Newman's own day.

d) Development of the Christian Doctrine. Newman had believed for a long time that the Roman additions to primitive doctrine were corruptions. But the very direction of his thought brought him to reconsider his stance. If the additions made to doctrine were not corruptions, they ought to integrate with doctrine and explain it: in short, they should constitute its development.

At the end of 1842, having identified the principle of development as a fundamental phenomenon, he studied it first in itself and then applied it to the dogmas of the Catholic Church (University Sermons No. XV and Essay on Development of Christian Doctrine). Basing himself on the Scriptures (Lk 2:19), Newman thought that the case of Mary* illustrated the use of reason in the examination of the doctrines of the faith. The formation of the Catholic doctrines resembled an idea that is born, grows, makes progress, protects itself from deviations while feeding on other ideas, and becomes increasingly precise as it develops. This process culminates in dogmatic statements, whose function is to expose hitherto latent aspects of the idea. In reality, things could not be otherwise once a great idea arose in the mind (moreover, Newman also showed this in the idea of a university). In order to justify the application of this principle to divine revelation, Newman stressed that, whatever might be the mystery* of God, the idea of revelation included the communication of teachings addressed to the human intellect and therefore grasped according to this intellect's laws. If ever that ceased to be the case, one could no longer speak of revelation; but if God really speaks, what he communicates can be heard and understood by man according to the law of his own mind, and understood from more than one angle.

His Essay on Development of the Christian Doctrine is a reworking of the philosophical analysis of development and a very thorough verification of that idea in the form of an analysis of the Roman Church's doctrines. In it, Newman enumerates the categories applicable to the development of Christianity (political, logical, historical, ethical, metaphysical) and studies the seven signs of the idea's true development: preservation of the type, continuity of the principles, capacity to be assimilated, logical progression, anticipation of the future, active preservation of the past, enduring vigor.

He then draws two consequences that historical investigation would have to verify: firstly, if Christianity corresponded to the development of the idea it would undergo such a development; secondly, if development was shown to have happened, one should expect to find an infallible authority. Development is indeed an unpredictable effect and is only recognized retrospectively; it occurs under the stress of circumstances and appeals to an authority that controls its energies and whose existence should be no surprise. This authority should not reside in each individual's private judgment, for the individual is not infallible, nor should it reside in the Anglican use of the canon of Lerins, which Newman had put to a fruitless test with regard to the via media: it was found at the present time, he contended, in the Catholic Church. The remainder of this work is devoted to applying the signs of true development to numerous doctrines. Newman shows how the historical continuity of doctrine resulted from a dialogue between the teaching Church and the Church that receives instruction, with both of these aspects playing their role in the preservation of the truth.

- V.F. Blehl, John Henry Newman: A Bibliographical Catalogue of his Writings, Charlottesville, 1978. (1868–81), Standard Edition of Newman's works, London, Longman Green and Co. (1955), Sermons universitaires, Paris and Bruges. (1956), Écrits autobiographiques, Paris and Bruges.

- (1961) Letters and Diaries of John Henry Newman, edited at the Birmingham Oratory, 31 vols., Oxford.
- (1962), Esquisses patristiques, Paris and Bruges.
- (1964), Essai sur le développement de la doctrine chrétienne, Paris and Bruges.
- M.J. Svaglic (Ed.) (1967), Apologia Pro Vita Sua, Oxford (French trans. 1967)
- P. Murray (Ed.) (1973), An Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine, Harmondsworth.
- H.M. de Achaval and J.D. Holmes (Eds.) (1976), The Theological Papers of John Newman on Faith and Certainty, Oxford.
- I. Kerr (Ed.) (1976), The Idea of a University, Oxford.
- P. Murray (Ed.) (1980), Newman the Oratorian: His Unpublished Oratory Papers, Leominster.
- I. Kerr (Ed.) (1985), An Essay in Aid of a Grammar of Assent, Oxford.
- A.N. Wilson (Ed.) (1989), John Henry Newman, Prayers, Poems, Meditations, London.
- P. Murray (Ed.) (1991), Sermons 1824–1843, vol. 1, Oxford.
- V.F. Blehl (Ed.) (1993), Sermons 1824–1843, vol. 2, Oxford.
- P. Gauthier (Ed. and Trans.) (1993–96), Sermons paroissiaux, Paris.
- ♦G. Faber (1933), Oxford Apostles, London.
- M. Nédoncelle (1946), La philosophie religieuse de John Henry Newman, Strasbourg.
- (1948–), Newman Studien (18 vols. published by 2002), Nuremberg and Sigmaringendorf.
- J.H. Walgrave (1957), Newman: Le développement du dogme, Paris.
- T. Gornall (1981), “Newman,” DSp 11, 163–81.
- R. Strange (1981), Newman and the Gospel of Christ, Oxford.
- O. Chadwick (1983), Newman, Oxford.
- G. Casey (1984), Natural Reason. A Study of the Notions of Inference, Assent, Intuition, and First Principles of John Henry Cardinal Newman, New York.
- P. Gauthier (1988), Newman et Blondel: tradition et développement du dogme, CFi 147.
- O. Chadwick (1990), The Spirit of the Oxford Movement: Tractarian Essays, Cambridge.
- S. Gilley (1990), Newman and his Age, London.

PIERRE GAUTHIER

See also Anglicanism; Blondel, Maurice; Credibility; Dogma; Lubac, Henri Sonier de; Mono-physics; Sensus fidei; Vatican I

Nicaea-Constantinople, Symbols of. See Creeds

Nicaea I, Council of

A.D. 325

The First Council* of Nicaea, the first of seven ecumenical councils celebrated in the early Church*, is like the matrix for all of them. The proof is the praise showered upon the Council by the Fathers of Nicaea* II (held in 787), who remarked that they were putting finishing touches to the conciliar work of the earlier times of Christianity, at the very place where God* had inaugurated the Christian era. Two representatives of the Bishop* of Rome* took part in Nicaea I, which was labeled “ecumenical” by two direct witnesses, Eusebius of Caesarea and Athanasius* of Alexandria. Considered at first to have a territorial scope, the term quickly acquired authority. Such a council legislates in the Emperor’s name for all his subjects by enunciating divine truth* and law*, for which the Church stands guarantor everywhere.

a) History and Stakes. After his final victory over Licinius, on 19 September 324, Constantine wanted to organize a general meeting of the eastern episcopate at Ancyra (Ankara) in Galatia, in order to solve all the ecclesiastical disputes and crown his pacifying work.

He had underestimated the gravity of the conflict triggered five years earlier in Alexandria by the excommunication of Arius. Some personal letters of Constantine, brought toward the end of 324 by his theological counselor, Hosius of Cordova, to Bishop Alexander of Alexandria and to his priest Arius, attest his lack of knowledge concerning the dogmatic stakes. A synod* held in the presence of Hosius at Antioch reinforced the division of minds by ruling that Alexander was right. Hosius informed the emperor that it was urgent to deal with the Alexandrine matter by putting it on the agenda of the General Council he was planning to hold. Constantine sped up the preparations of the Council by holding it in Nicaea, in the immediate vicinity of Nicomedia, where he was residing. He would put the Imperial Post at the participants' disposal, and he would see that they get lodging and board at his own expense. Finally, the Council would be followed by the celebration, on 25 July, of the 20th anniversary of his accession to the imperial dignity.

In June 325, at the solemn inauguration, approximately 300 bishops were in attendance (from the 360s on, the symbolic number of 318 was to be adopted, following the number of Abraham's servants in Genesis 4:14). The Acts of that Council being lost, it is difficult to be more precise. The Emperor read a welcoming speech in Latin. Eusebius of Nicomedia, Metropolitan of the province of Bithynia, where the assembly was taking place, thanked him. Constantine himself chaired this first sitting, as well as the subsequent ones, but he left to Hosius the responsibility of conducting the doctrinal debate. Constantine intervened on several occasions and ratified the decisions made; in his capacity as pontifex maximus of the whole Empire, he had, in fact, the responsibility of establishing a religious peace duly controlled in the provinces that had recently fallen under his supreme authority.

All the parties in the dispute had been summoned. Arius himself was present, accompanied by his friends. Among the bishops engaged in the controversy over Arius's condemnation, it was possible to distinguish three groups. The first gathered around Alexander of Alexandria. The second group gathered around the intransigent Eustathius of Antioch; he was influencing the decision to excommunicate Arius again, on the grounds of his own conception (shared by Marcellus of Ancyra) of the unique Trinitarian hypostasis, whereas Alexander and his group had censored Arius in the name of the Origenian doctrine of the three divine hypostases. Finally, there was the group led by Eusebius of Nicomedia; it had rallied to that same Origenian tradition, but it had been more conservative and more favorable to Arius ever since the beginning of the dispute, primarily to trigger some trouble for the bishop of Alexandria.

A creed*, to which was added an anathema, was adopted on 19 June and submitted to the imperial authority by the Nicene assembly. Eusebius of Caesarea mentioned this Anti-Arian credo in his Letter to the Church of Caesarea (Opitz, III, U. 22), which was written as soon as the Council was over. Arius and two compatriots from Libya, Bishops Secundus of Ptolemais and Theonas of Marmarica, refused to sign. They were excommunicated, and then sent away in exile. This same Eusebius related that the Emperor recommended from the very beginning of the debates to have the word homoousios ("consubstantial*") inserted into the creed being prepared (U. 22, 7). Eusebius himself had, during the first sitting, presented his own profession of faith, which was in accordance with the baptismal liturgy* of Caesarea; he had done so in order to demonstrate his orthodoxy*, following the censorship he had sustained from the Antioch synod a few months earlier.

The creed of Nicaea is different from Eusebius's profession of faith; it is connected to the baptismal tradition of Antioch and of Jerusalem*. The Commission entrusted with writing its final version tried hard to formulate an acceptable interpretation, closer to the Scriptures*, of the nonbiblical attribute homoousios, by placing prior to it some significant explanatory notes. In Nicomedia, before the opening of the great imperial synod, Alexander of Alexandria had perhaps agreed with Hosius to resort to the "consubstantial" (Philostorgius). For all these circumstances, we have to rely, however, on mere conjectures. From the 350s on, the eastern bishops, who were hostile to the Alexandrine see, increased the number of synods intended to eliminate the controversial term from the official formula of faith. Athanasius of Alexandria had the merit of opposing, at the cost of an Episcopal ministry severely perturbed, what represented to his eyes a confusion of political matters and of the rule of faith. The cause of Nicaea ended up prevailing.

Aside from the business of dealing with the Arius affair, the Nicene Fathers had to take care of two more major stakes: the old dispute regarding the exact date for celebrating Easter and the elimination of the Melitian schism* in Egypt (Melicius, Bishop of Lycopolis, had opposed the patriarch, Peter of Alexandria, about the reintegration into the church of Christians who had apostatized during Diocletian's persecution, and had illegitimately ordained bishops). Decrees were promulgated regarding these points, as well as other aspects of ecclesiastical* discipline.

The activities of the Council were perhaps closed by 19 June, and certainly before 25 July. On 25 July, Constantine invited the whole assembly to a banquet in his summer palace, where the synod had taken place. Eusebius of Caesarea delivered there a famous eulogy, glorifying the reign of peace established by Constantine over the whole Empire; and he did so in light of his own political* theology of the divine Logos.

The Nicene formula of faith became, from the fourth century on, the central issue at stake in the doctrinal controversies. A solemn reading of that formula was delivered at the First Council of Constantinople* (381), which added to it a more elaborate mention of the article concerning the Holy* Spirit. The creed of Nicaea-Constantinople was later acclaimed in Ephesus* (431) and in Chalcedon* (451). It is still being recited in our Eucharistic liturgies.

b) Canonical Decrees. Concerning the Paschal matter, the compromise decision that was reached (a decision that did not assume necessarily the form of an actual decree) was to insist that the Churches of Rome and Alexandria reach an agreement every time their respective calculations demanded, in theory, dates that were different. The bishop of Alexandria was entrusted with the task of announcing every year the exact date for Easter.

The synodal letter which, beside an encyclical letter from the Emperor, informed the Alexandrians about all these matters, transmitted as well the particularly moderate recommendations of the Council that aimed at curbing the Melitian schism: Melitius would remain a bishop, under house arrest; he would lose his ordaining powers; the bishops, priests*, and deacons* he had ordained would keep their titles and responsibilities, as subordinates of Alexander, following a new imposition of hands.

The 20 canons of Nicaea confirm the rules in practice and eliminate the abuses. Six of them set the structures of government* straight. Canon 4 imposes a minimum of three bishops as co-celebrants in an episcopal consecration. Canon 5 approves the Metropolitan synods in spring and autumn. Canon 6 consecrates the primacy, over vast regions, of the sees of Alexandria, of Rome, and of Antioch. Canon 7 adds the privilege of honor recognized to the Church of Jerusalem, and so the ancient structure of the four Mother Churches identifying with a Petrine foundation was thus canonized. Canons 15 and 16 object to the mobility of the clergy from one diocese to another. Canons 1 (on eunuchs), 3 (on cohabitation with women), 17 (on usury), 18 (on deacons), and 19 (on deaconesses) deal with matters concerning the clergy. Four canons organize the penitential discipline, in a by-and-large lenient way. They are: canon 11 (dealing with Christians implicated in the persecution's unforeseen turn of events, the lapsi); canon 12 (on soldiers); canon 13 (on the dying), and canon 14 (on catechumens). Finally, canon 8 settles the question of the schismatic Novatians, and canon 9 settles the matter of the Paulinists, Christians who had remained faithful to Paul of Samosata. Canon 20 forbids genuflection on Sundays and on Whitsuntide.

- Decrees: COD, 1–19 (DCO II/1, 27–64).
- Ambrose, De fide, prol., 3–5; 1, 18; 3, 15: O. Faller (Ed.), CSEL 78, Vienna, 1962.
- Athanasius of Alexandria, De decretis, etc.: H.-G. Opitz (Ed.) (1934), Athanasius-Werke II/1, Berlin.
- Eusebius of Caesarea, Vita Constantini 3, 6–23: F. Winkelmann (Ed.) (1995), Eusebius I, GCS, Berlin; Lettre à l'Église de Césarée: H.-G. Opitz (Ed.) (1934), Athanasius-Werke III, 1/2, Berlin.
- Hilary of Poitiers, De synodis 86, PL 10, 534.
- Philostorgius, Histoire ecclésiastique: J. Bidez (Ed.) (1913), GCS 21, Berlin.
- ♦ G. Fritz (1931), “Nicée,” DThC 11/1, 399–417 (older, but still useful).
- E. Honigmann (1939), “La liste originale des Pères de Nicée,” Byz. 14, 17–76.
- P. Galtier (1948), “Les canons pénitentiels de Nicée,” Gr. 29, 288–94.
- I. Ortiz de Urbina (1963), Nicée et Constantinople, Paris.
- P. Th. Camelot (1964), “Les conciles œcuméniques des IVe et Ve siècles,” in coll., Le concile et les conciles, Paris, 5–73.
- E. Bouларанд (1972), L'hérésie d'Arius et la “foi” de Nicée, vol. II, Paris.
- C. Kannengiesser (1978), “Nicée dans l'histoire du christianisme,” Conc(F) 138, 39–47.
- H.J. Sieben (1979), Die Konzilsidee der alten Kirche, Paderborn, 25–67.
- A. de Halleux (1985), “La réception du symbole œcuménique, de Nicée à Chalcédoine,” ETHL 61, 5–47.
- G. Alberigo (Ed.) (1990), Storia dei concili ecumenici, Brescia.
- J. Ulrich (1994), Die Anfänge der abendländischen Rezeption des Nizänums, PTS 39, Berlin.
- H. C. Brennecke (1994), “Nicäa I,” TRE 24, 429–441 (bibl.).

CHARLES KANNENGIESSER

See also Arianism; Athanasius; Consubstantial; Trinity

Nicaea II, Council of

A.D. 787

The Second Council of Nicaea was the seventh ecumenical council*. It confirmed its entire faithfulness to the teaching of the ecumenical councils that had preceded it. By way of this faithfulness it wanted to guarantee the legitimacy of the cult* of images*. Because of the great difficulty in assessing the respective parts played by each of a variety of causes, historians give divergent interpretations of the iconoclastic quarrel and of its causes (see Brown, 1973). Possible causes include the pressure created by Islam with its conquering strength, the internal crisis of the Byzantine Empire, and the latent clash of two theologies that followed Nicaea II. It was also with Nicaea II and the reception it had that the gradual separation of Eastern and Western Christianity became clearer.

1. History

a) Iconodules and Iconoclasts (Seventh–Ninth Centuries). Nicaea II was preceded and followed by two periods of controversy over images (iconoclasm). From 692 on, canon 82 of the so-called Quinisext Council, which has been identified as the “first official evidence of a stand by the Church* in the matter of images” (Grabar 1957), forbids the representation of Christ* as a lamb, such an image resorting more to the typology of the old covenant* than to incarnation* (Dumeige 1978): “We order that Christ our God*, who removes the sins* from the world*, be henceforth painted according to his human form in the images, instead of the former representation as a lamb; thus, recognizing in him the splendor of the Word*'s humility, we will be led to remember his life in the flesh, his passion*, his salutary death and the redemption he brought to the world.”

In 726, while the caliphs were intensifying their fight against the Christian images (decree of Yazid II in 723), the Byzantine Emperor Leo III inaugurated an iconoclastic policy. This first attitude triumphed at the Council of Hieria, convened in 754 by Emperor Constantine V, which was attended by 338 iconoclastic bishops*. Any type of image cult was forbidden as heretical. The decisions of Hieria thus created a de facto separation between Constantinople and the other patriarchates*. In response, Pope Stephen III convened at the Lateran, in 769, a synod* that condemned Hieria and thus supported the primacy of Rome*. In 786 Empress Irene convened a council, to be held at Nicaea the following year. The sessions of Nicaea II were presided over by the patriarch of Constantinople, and the five patriarchates were represented; Pope Adrian I sent two legates. The decisions of the Council provoked strong reactions among the iconoclasts, and there was a long wait until 843 for the iconophiles to prevail, at long last, thanks to Empress Theodora and Patriarch Methodius. The solemn restoration of Christ's image at the entrance of the imperial palace, on 11 March 843, marks the “triumph of orthodoxy,” a festival inscribed since then in the liturgical calendar of Eastern Christianity (“the Sunday of Orthodoxy”).

b) Protagonists and Stakes of Nicaea II. Some actions, including the destruction and reestablishment of images and imperial coins bearing or not bearing the image of Christ (see Grabar 1957) and some written documents marked the different steps of the crisis. The works that survived and reached us concern mostly the defense of images, because Nicaea II proceeded to destroy the iconoclastic documents. In any case, far from being a manifestation of popular piety (see Brown 1973, who challenges the very relevance of that concept for early Christianity), the crisis proved that the cult of images was state business. The Constantinian Empire had already decided in the fourth century that the cross was a good sign of its victory; the acheiropoietae signs of Christ (those not created by human hands) had subsequently increased in number (Grabar 1957).

From the sixth century on, the cult of the Theotokos experienced new growth in Constantinople. This growth came together with the encouragement given to the reverence for images and relics* (Cameron 1978). A role of intercession and of protection for the Eastern capital was in fact recognized for Mary* (this was particularly obvious during the siege of the city in 726), and the controversy regarding the images may be interpreted partly as an interrogation, more insistent during a troubled period, of the manner in which mediations between God and men can be made clearer.

Starting with the reign of Leo III, the succession of iconophile and iconoclastic emperors and the divisions of the Eastern episcopate played a major role. A theocratic concept of power (“I am an emperor and a priest,” according to a declaration attributed to Leo III—see Dagron 1996) and the emperors’ interventions in matters of dogma* created conflicts between emperor and patriarch, and also between Constantinople and Rome. Within the pentarchy of the five patriarchates—considered, since the reign of Justinian I, to be of equal dignity (see Schatz in Boespflug-Lossky 1987), Rome tended to assert its preeminence. But it was the rise of Frankish power in the West, then the Carolingian Empire, that helped Roman primacy against the East and accelerated separation.

Other aspects are more difficult to assess, such as the role and the position of the Eastern monastic communities. They were rather iconophile prior to Nicaea II, as evidenced by the role of the monk George of Cyprus; but later they were divided. Under the influence of Origenism (see Schönborn 1976), iconoclastic tendencies appeared; they were interpreted also as the sign of some opposition between the city, where the seat of power was situated, and the rural areas (Brown, 1973).

2. Doctrinal Work

In order to rule on the matter of images, the horos, or final decree, relied on “the tradition* of the Catholic Church*,” and the Council declared itself first as ecumenical by anathematizing the decisions of Hieria (Dumeige 1978). The horos referred then specifically to a christological declaration by Basil* of Caesarea: “the honor paid to the image goes to the prototype” (Traité du S.E., 18, 45). Then it ordered the following: “As is the case for the representation of the precious and uplifting cross, venerable and holy images, mosaics and other works of art made in any other respectable manner should be placed in God’s holy churches, on holy objects and clothes, on walls and boards, in homes and on the roads; the image of our Lord, our God and Savior Jesus Christ, that of our Immaculate Lady, the Holy Mother of God, those of the angels*, worthy of our respect, those of all the Saints and the Just.”

The iconodules’ recourse to a christological argumentation should not lead to an increase in dogmatic dispute. The definitions of Chalcedon* are recognized on both sides, and the hypothesis of a connection between iconoclasm and Monophysitism* is as contested nowadays as that of a correlation with Nestorianism* (Desreumeaux and Dalmais in Boespflug-Lossky 1987). It is in fact the very meaning of the word icon, or image, which is at the source of the difficulties. For the iconoclasts, Christ alone is the unique and perfect image (see Col 1:15), and the divinity can be communicated through images only in the consecrated realities of the cross, the churches, and the Eucharist*. The answer given by the defenders of the images is founded on a theology of incarnation. If they state, like their adversaries, that God is aperigraptos, or “uncircumscribable,” Jesus*, the Son who has come in the flesh, can be represented because he is perigraptos, or “circumscribable” (anathema 1). As a corollary, Mary, the saints, and the angels can also be represented. And to bring an end to the accusations of idolatry* made by the Christian iconoclasts and by Islam, the fathers of Nicaea II make a clear distinction between veneration (proskunèsis) and adoration (latreia). Reserved for God, adoration confesses his salvific power; on the other hand, the veneration of images recognizes that they have merely the value of signs.

When added to the erroneous translation of proskunèsis into adoratio in the Latin Acts of Nicaea II, the ambivalence of the term icon meant that there had to be a deeper, more thorough examination of this theological matter before the council could get a full reception.

3. Reception

a) In the East. The Discourse Against Those Who Reject Images, written by John Damascene around 730, offered a first elaboration of the concept of image and of its various meanings; in the “icons,” the Discourse perceived, at first, material images pertaining, as all matter does, to the grace* of the Creator. Being the first defenders of the images, John Damascene, the patriarch Germanus of Constantinople, and George of Cyprus had been anathematized by the Council of Hieria. The decisions of Nicaea II were not sufficient to put an end to the controversy. In fact, at the beginning of the ninth century, the emperors Nicephorus and Leo V were openly opposed, and the latter openly went over to iconoclasm. A council convened at the Hagia Sophia in 815 condemned the decisions made by Nicaea II and brought Hieria’s decisions back into force. Faced with this second iconoclastic reaction, Patriarch Nicephorus (Antirrhetici) and Theodore of Studium offered further new expositions of the iconodulic theology (Schönborn 1976). The images had to wait until 843 to be solemnly reestablished; and under Photius’s patriarchate, a council spelled out the official condemnation of iconoclasm.

b) In the West. The reception of Nicaea II is one of the stakes in the opposition that asserted itself in the eighth and ninth centuries between the Pope and the Carolingian Empire. While Pope Adrian manifested his agreement with Nicaea II, the Council of Frankfurt, convened by Charlemagne in 794, condemned the “veneration” (adoratio) of images. The Livres carolins, composed around 791–94 by theologians from Charlemagne’s entourage, defined what was to be, throughout the Middle Ages, the Western theological opinion regarding images. Quoting the declarations of Gregory* the Great, they asserted that images have a pedagogical, catechetical, and ornamental value (see Schmitt in Boespflug-Lossky 1987), but that Eucharist alone could act as a full memorial of the salutary incarnation. It was thus that a theological shifting took place, from image to sacrament*; it was to be of central importance in medieval Western Europe and during the Counter-Reformation.

- COD, 133–156 (DCO II/1, 298–345).
Libri carolini or Capitulare de imaginibus, MGH, Concilia II, supplement, Leipzig, 1924.
- H. Hennepf (1959), Textus byzantinos ad iconomachiam pertinentes, Leyden.
- ♦ A. Grabar (1957), L’iconoclasme byzantin: Dossier archéologique, Paris.
- P. Brown (1973), “A Dark-Age Crisis: Aspects of the Iconoclastic Controversy,” The English Historical Review 88, 1–34.

- S. Gero (1973), Byzantine Iconoclasm during the Reign of Leo III, CSCO, Subsidia 41, Louvain.
- J. Pelikan (1974), The Christian Tradition: A History of the Development of Doctrine, vol. 2: The Spirit of Eastern Christendom (600–1700), chap. 3, Chicago.
- J. Gouillard (1976), “L’Église d’Orient et la primauté romaine au temps de l’iconoclasme,” Ist 25–54 (reprinted in La vie religieuse à Byzance, London, 1981).
- Ch. von Schönborn (1976), L’icône du Christ: Fondements théologiques, Fribourg (3rd Ed. 1986, Paris).
- A. Cameron (1978), “The Theotokos in Sixth Century Constantinople,” JThS NS 29, 79–108.
- G. Dumeige (1978), Nicée II, HCO, vol. 4, Paris.
- F. Boespflug and N. Lossky (Eds.) (1987), Nicée II, 787–1987, douze siècles d’images religieuses: Actes du Colloque international Nicée II, Paris.
- G. Alberigo (Ed.) (1990), Storia dei concili ecumenici, Brescia.
- G. Dagron (1993), “L’iconoclasme et l’établissement de l’Orthodoxie (726–847),” in Histoire du christianisme, vol. IV: Évêques, moines et empereurs (610–1054), edited by Ch. and L. Pietri et al., 93–166, Paris; (1996), Empereur et prêtre: Étude sur le “césaropapisme” byzantin, Paris.

FRANÇOIS BŒSPFLUG ET FRANÇOISE VINEL

See also Cult; Church and State; Images

Nicholas of Cusa

1401–1464

a) Life. Nicholas of Cusa—in Latin, Nicolaus Cusanus or Nicolaus Treverensis—was born in Cues on the Moselle. He studied philosophy* in Heidelberg (1416–17), ecclesiastical law in Padua (1417–23)—as well as mathematics, natural sciences*, and especially Aristotelianism*—returning to studies in philosophy and theology* in Köln (from 1425) under the guidance of Eymeric de Campo, who introduced him to the works of the late-medieval heirs of Albert* the Great and Raymond Lulle. On two occasions (in 1428 and 1435) Nicholas refused the chair of canon law* offered him by the University of Louvain. In 1432, during the Council of Basel*, he intervened in the political struggles that were stirring up the Church; initially conciliarist, he rallied to the Roman camp in 1437. After this he undertook important diplomatic missions, accompanying the emperor and the patriarch of Constantinople to the 1438 council of union in Ferrara-Florence. He was named cardinal in 1448, and bishop of Brixen in 1450. This led to a series of journeys of legation and inspection, notably to provincial synods* in Salzburg, Magdeburg, Mainz, and Köln. The fall of Constantinople in 1453 and the Turkish threat awakened his interest in Islam and led him to elaborate a philosophy of religion* that reconciled the different confessions. Following a disagreement with Duke Sigismond of the Tyrol, he left Brixen in 1458 to assume important functions in Rome and in Italy. He died on 11 August 1464 in Todi (Umbria).

b) Doctrines. One of the objectives of Nicholas of Cusa was to reform the life of Church* and State in the furtherance of religious peace*. In De concordantia catholica (1432–33) he traced the paradigm of a universal Christian order, following the schema “Spirit-soul*-body”: the one Church is the place where the divine Spirit, the sacerdotal soul, and the body of believers should be in harmonious agreement. In De pace fidei (1453) he defended the idea of a “single religion . . . in a diversity of rites” (VI, n. 16, H. VII, 15, 16 Sq), arguing that, more than any other religion, Christianity is in a position to respond to the expectations of the various national religions. In Cribratio Alchorani (Critique of the Koran, 1460–61), Nicholas tried to explain the mysteries* of the Christian faith to Muslims. De docta ignorantia (1440) is generally considered Nicholas’s major philosophico-theological work. The method of learned ignorance, by which the incomprehensible is understood in an incomprehensible way (incomprehensibile incomprehensibiliter comprehendere)—that is, imprecisely and approximatively—makes it possible to determine the absolute maximum that cannot be surpassed; since this maximum has no opposite, it is not opposed to a minimum, but on the contrary coincides with it (De docta ign. I, 4, H. I, 10, 4–16). This unique reality—which actually exists (actu) as a maximum and which simultaneously, as a minimum, is every possible being (omne possibile est)—according to the belief of all peoples, is God* (ibid., I, 2, H. I, 7, 3–15). Nicholas of Cusa then deals with the universe, which he conceives of as a “contracted maximum” (maximum contractum) because it does not precede and does not connect the contradictory opposites, but only the contraries (II, 4, H. I, 73, 8–16); a soul cannot be attributed to it, God being himself the soul and spirit of the world* (II, 9, H. I, 95, 29–96, 4). God is at the same time the center and the circumference of the universe, a notion that deprives the earth of the central position it occupies in ancient cosmology (II, 11, H. I, 100, 10–16). Nicholas concludes by turning to Christ*, conceived as a maximum that is both absolute and contracted (III, 2, H. I, 123, 11 s).

De coniecturis (written before 1444) expounds a conjectural method of knowledge*, but Nicholas clearly forgets his own theory in speaking of the mental unity of God divinaliter (De coni. I, 6, H. III, 31, 4), that is, from the viewpoint of divine unity itself, determining it as pure negation (ibid., I, 8, H. III, 38, 12–39, 3): the Neoplatonic tetrad “God-reason-intellect-body” is carried over here into a process of emanation/return and at the same time built—a point that Nicholas was not to develop anywhere else—into the concept of mens, spirit, that encompasses these four unities (ibid., I, 4, H. III, 18, 3–19, 1).

All his life Nicholas of Cusa sought to shape the most appropriate idea of God possible, while keeping his eyes fixed on the trinitarian structure of the divinity. In these approaches formulated in philosophical terms, he particularly attempted to retain that which is not known to philosophers (De venatione sapientiae XXV, n. 73, H. XII, 71, 24–26): the Holy* Spirit. God is not only absolute possibility and absolute reality, he is also the connection (nexus) between the two (Trialogus de possesset 6, H. XI/2, 7, 16–8, 17). But Nicholas (see De ven. sap. XIV, n. 40, H. XII, 39, 1 s) believed that no idea could better express God than the idea of “non-other” (non aliud); this non-other, against all Aristotelian logic and insofar as it defines itself by itself, is the quiddity of all quiddities. And this is the definition posited by Nicholas in 1462: the non-other is none other than the non-other (De non aliud I, H. XIII, 4, 29 Sq). In this trinitarian definition of self, the non-other is itself and therefore transcendent, but at the same time it is immanent to all that is other than it, because the other is none other than the other (Stallmach 1989).

Concerning Nicholas’s numerous mathematical writings (most of them composed in the period 1445–59), one observation should be made: just as God is at the origin of the real, the human mind is the source from which numbers are born. Geometrical figures, by their symbolic nature, make it possible to illustrate the coincidence of opposites (coincidentia oppositorum) in God. Reason (ratio), the principle of mathematical content, is not able to understand exactly the imparticipable truth*, the divine essence, any more than is intellect (intellectus), in which opposites can agree but not coincide.

c) Reception of Nicholas of Cusa’s Work. As a theologian engaged in the field of philosophy, Nicholas was especially concerned to establish the inadequacy of the “Aristotelian sect” of his time; he considered himself an innovator. He had to write an apology against Johannes Wenck de Herrenberg, who did not understand his ideas. His theory of coincidence was also criticized by Vincent d’Aggsbach, whereas it was favorably received by Bernard de Waging, Eymeric de Campo, Jacques Lefèvre d’Étaples, Gérard Roussel, Giordano Bruno, Athanasius Kircher, and Leibniz*. His ideas were afterward accommodated within a fideist perspective, or transmitted second hand; it was only in the 20th century that a critical edition of his complete works was published, stimulating an intense labor of interpretation.

d) Critical Perspectives. We will simply observe that although Nicholas of Cusa, in the context of his philosophical theology, was constantly inventing new concepts of God understood as a coincidence of opposites, and also advanced many innovative ideas in cosmology, he nonetheless remained faithful to a hierarchical model that, relative to God, excluded the thought of absolute auto-causality (God causa sui) and regression to the infinite. In a word, Nicholas of Cusa saw God as the cause of all but not of himself. God is infinite*, but he is also his own limit, beyond which it is impossible to go back. These are questions that a philosophico-critical theology must face today. It could lead to a new, philosophically justifiable idea of God as absolute possibility.

- Nicolai de Cusa opera omnia iussu et auctoritate Academia Litterarum Heidelbergensis (H.), Leipzig, 1932 ss, Hamburg, 1950–.
- ◆ MFCG 1–21.
- VerLex* 6, 1093–1113.
- E. Vansteenbergh (1920), Le cardinal Nicolas de Cues, Paris.
- M. de Gandillac (1941), La philosophie de Nicolas de Cues, Paris.
- R. Haubst (1952), Das Bild des Einen und Dreieinen Gottes in der Welt nach Nikolaus von Kues, Trier.
- R. Haubst (1956), Die Christologie des Nikolaus von Kues, Friburg.
- P. Duhem (1959), Le système du monde, vol. X, Paris.
- W. Beierwaltes (1964), “Deus oppositio oppositorum,” SJP 8, 175–85.
- E. Meuthen (1964), Nikolaus von Kues, Münster.
- G. von Bredow (1970), “Die Bedeutung des Minimum in der coincidentia oppositorum,” in Nicolò Cusano: Agli inizi del mondo moderno, Atti del Congresso...1964, Florence, 357–66.
- G. Schneider (1970), Gott—das Nichtandere, BCG 4.

- K. Flasch (1973), Die Metaphysik des Einen bei Nikolaus von Kues, SPAMP 7.
- K. Jacobi (Ed.) (1979), Nikolaus von Kues: Einführung in sein philosophisches Denken, Friburg and Munich.
- D. Pätzold (1981), Einheit und Andersheit, Köln.
- K. Flasch (1987), Einführung in die Philosophie des Mittelalters, Darmstadt.
- S. Meier-Oeser (1989), Die Präsenz des Vergessenen: Zur Rezeption der Philosophie des Nicolaus Cusanus vom 15. bis zum 18. Jahrhundert, BCG 10.
- J. Stallmach (1989), Ineinsfall der Gegensätze und Weisheit des Nichtwissens: Grundzüge der Philosophie des Nikolaus von Kues, BCG, HS.
- B. Mojsisch (1991), “Nichts und Negation: Meister Eckhart und Nikolaus von Kues,” in B. Mojsisch and O. Pluta (Eds.), Historia Philosophiae Medii Aevi. Studien zur Geschichte der Philosophie des Mittelalters II, Amsterdam and Philadelphia, 675–93.
- L. Hagemann and R. Gleis (Eds.) (1993), Hen kai plèthos: Einheit und Vielheit, Altenberg/Würzburg.
- G. Piaia (Ed.) (1993), Concordia Discors: Studi su Niccolò Cusano e l'umanesimo europeo offerti a G. Santinello, Padua.
- K.-H. Kandler (1995), Nikolaus von Kues: Denker zwischen Mittelalter und Neuzeit, Göttingen.
- B. Mojsisch (1995), “Epistemologie im Humanismus: Marsilio Ficino, Pietro Pomponazzi und Nikolaus von Kues,” FZPhTh 42, 152–71.
- K. Flasch (1998), Nikolaus von Kues: Geschichte einer Entwicklung, Frankfurt.

BURKHARD MOJSISCH

See also Cosmos; Infinite; Knowledge of God; Negative Theology; Religion, Theology of

Nietzsche, Friedrich Wilhelm

1844–1900

Nietzsche's self-presentation in Ecce Homo centers on what he sees as a veritable “crisis” in the history of thought, a crisis that imposes on him at least two tasks. One is the reinterpretation of the whole of Western history* from the perspective of nihilism. In this regard Nietzsche should be understood as analyzing an upheaval that affects our own era first and foremost. The other task is the proclamation of a new philosophy*, grounded in a new set of values and capable of being characterized as “the gay science” (to borrow the title of his 1882 book). Nietzsche is a radical philosopher because of the questions he asks, his undertaking to destroy the foundations of philosophy, and his desire to invent a new way of thinking. He remains, even today, one of the most controversial figures in the history of philosophy.

1. Nietzsche and His Image

The son of a Lutheran pastor, Nietzsche grew up in a religious and moral atmosphere permeated by a biblical and pietist spirit. From this starting point, and continuing right up to the end, he developed a merciless and ever more violent philosophical critique of religion and, more specifically, of Christianity.

Nietzsche was born in Röcken (Saxony) on 15 October 1844 and was educated in one of the best institutions of the time, the Schulpforta, before going on to study classical philology and, briefly but intensely, theology. He was appointed a professor of classical philology at the age of 25, but just ten years later he was compelled to resign. He succumbed to insanity at the age of 44 and died at Weimar on 25 September 1900, in his 56th year. During his 20 years of public activity, and in defiance of his failing health, Nietzsche displayed an exceptional intellectual fecundity. All his writings were initially received with total incomprehension, from his first published book, Die Geburt der Tragödie aus dem Geiste der Musik (1872, The Birth of Tragedy from the Spirit of Music), and his youthful critiques of the culture of his time, to the texts of his maturity—Menschliches, Allzumenschliches (1878, Human, All Too Human), Die fröhliche Wissenschaft (1882, The Gay Science), Also sprach Zarathustra (1883–85, Thus Spake Zarathustra), Jenseits von Gut und Böse (1886, Beyond Good and Evil), and Zur Genealogie der Moral (1887, On the Genealogy of Morals)—and then the vehement writings of his last period, Der Antichrist (1895, The Antichrist) and Ecce Homo (published posthumously in 1908). Even the way in which his ideas are formulated presents difficulties, since he simultaneously communicates them and uses esotericisms, aphorisms, and other stylistic methods to disguise them. They cry out for interpretation. “It is difficult to make oneself understood”—and perhaps Nietzsche himself did not even think that being understood was desirable.

Philosophical interpretations of Nietzsche’s works have been undertaken by such thinkers as Martin Heidegger*, Karl Jaspers, and K. Löwith. More recently, however, French and Italian interpreters have adopted a new approach. Going back to the authors who preceded Nietzsche in the history of thought, they examine the structural aspects of his style in order to decipher his intentions from the perspective of a theory of culture. Meanwhile, theological studies have made it increasingly clear that Nietzsche’s ideas need to be handled with subtlety.

2. Destruction as New Foundation

The destruction of metaphysics undertaken by Nietzsche—“philosophy by hammer blows”—has a clear purpose: to liberate the will from all constraints. The first discourse of Also sprach Zarathustra, “On the Three Metamorphoses,” lays out the chain of events by which the will may be liberated from all belief in a prior truth and from all duty, and at last given over in full to the power of affirming and creating life. Hence, Nietzsche’s philosophical project may be interpreted as an unconditional affirmation of humanity in respect of what is appropriate to humanity: homo semper maior. This aristocratic and elitist “experimental philosophy” (e.g., KGW VIII, 3, 288) is informed by the paths of an individuality that is capable of giving form to the world* and is embodied in “higher exemplars” (KGW III, 1, 313).

To this end, Nietzsche mounts a systematic critique of language, reason*, truth*, and morality—“We do not possess truth” (KGW V, 1, 382)—and, finally, of religion, and of Christianity first and foremost. In other words, he criticizes everything that might constrain this affirmation of humanity or of will, whether in the name of being* (in a beyond, or in terms of a “true” world), or in the name of the good* (morality). Accordingly, Nietzsche is hostile to any form of “background world,” to every naive or dogmatic belief in something beyond this Earth and this life, in a single being, self-identical and eternal, who knows nothing about becoming and the tragedy of experience. More specifically, he is hostile to any moral foundation for truth, which he interprets as the archetype for such background worlds. The Socratic figure of the theorizing man and the Platonic ideal of a “true world” are the earliest forms of this enfeebling of life that Nietzsche diagnoses and contests, although modern culture has produced many more of them. His aim is to set in train a “countermovement” (e.g., KGW VIII, 2, 432) in opposition to the will to self-negation and general decay, and to rediscover, through an apprehension of the Earth, the power of affirming life.

Nietzsche’s most original ideas and images are expressions of his conception of a world dominated by affirmation. They include the “eternal return,” the Übermensch (“superman” or “higher man”), amor fati (“love of fate”), and “Dionysus”; but, above all, there is the “will to power,” conceived as the power of life desiring itself, the essence of all reality. This is not to be interpreted as a substance in the traditional sense. Indeed, this phrase indicates the distance that Nietzsche traveled—and expressed ever more clearly over the course of his intellectual development—away from his first philosophical master, Arthur Schopenhauer. For Nietzsche, the will desires itself and tends to surpass itself in desiring its own growth, which is why it is the will to power. Being more powerful is its way of desiring and of affirming itself.

3. Critique of Religion and Christianity

The critical dimension of Nietzsche’s work culminates in a confrontation with Christianity. The rejection of “background worlds” leads into the theme of the “death of God.” Since Christianity is “Platonism for the people” (Jenseits von Gut und Böse, Preface), the critique of the one is naturally a continuation of the critique of the other. However, Nietzsche's polemic becomes more radical in the writings of his last period, giving rise, in the form of a self-interpretation, to the phrase "Dionysus against the Crucified" (KGW VIII, 3, 58).

a) God and the Gods. The famous statement that "God is dead" (Die fröhliche Wissenschaft 125), adopted not so long ago by "theologians of the death of God" (J.J. Altizer, W. Hamilton), was intended to describe the irreversible historical process of liberation from the traditional concept of God. However, Nietzsche has more than this simple observation in mind. He also seeks to confirm its legitimacy ("revaluation of values"), to show how God and religion may have been born ("genealogy"), and to justify the possibility of a different interpretation of the divine ("Dionysus").

It follows that Nietzsche's denunciation of the concept of God should be extended into a denunciation of the reactive forces that have constructed the concept. Nietzsche's "genealogical" project is intended to uncover, in the background of every system or concept, the instinct that has produced it. Behind morality and the concept of God, "genealogy" reveals the hidden intention to avenge oneself on life. God must die because he is, at least partially, connected with those reactive forces—resentment, bad conscience*, the ascetic ideal—that Nietzsche subjects to an implacable inquisition. Here the emphasis is no longer on the very existence of God, but on the power of humanity, its strength or weakness: "He who no longer finds greatness in God will not find it anywhere, and must either deny it or...create it" (KGW VII, 1, 28). What has been regarded until now as "divine" has entailed the "diminishing" of humanity (KGW III, 25).

Against the reduction of both the divine and the human that has resulted from asceticism*, and from distrust of the world, Nietzsche seeks to establish a new doctrine in which the divine retains a place, but within a new framework: that of the innocence of the world, and the complete, tragic, Dionysian affirmation of existence. Hence, Nietzsche can call for the creation of new gods, in line with his wishes. His philosophy entails a rejection of the idea of a transcendent divine subject, endowed with responsibility and "total awareness" (providence*); but it also entails a protest against commonplace forms of agnosticism* and atheism*. Between "monotontheism" (belief in a boring God; Der Antichrist 19) on the one hand, and atheism on the other, Nietzsche seeks to define a polytheistic conception of existence: "In fact, only the moral God has been surpassed" (KGW VIII, 1, 217). In other words, in the European context God has become an abstract, Platonic/Christian deity, understood, even within the structures of language, as a negation of life in all its fullness and abyssal depths.

b) Christianity and the Church. Nietzsche's critique of religion reaches its most concentrated expression in his attack on Christianity and the image of the priest*, the image par excellence of bad conscience. From Nietzsche's perspective, the devaluing of this world that is implied in the doctrines of sin*, redemption on the cross, and resurrection*, along with the moral practices of Christianity, represents "the most extravagant variation on the theme of morality" (Die Geburt der Tragödie, Preface, 5). Christianity has inoculated Europe with a "moral ontology" (KGW VIII, 1, 273); it is a religion of decadence, "an example of the alteration of personality" (VIII, 3, 98). The history of Christianity is thus a history of sin and guilt, a history of misfortune.

Nietzsche's specific target is Paul and his successors: "The Church was built in opposition to the gospel" (Der Antichrist 36). Yet, in praising Jesus* for his exemplary "practice" (Der Antichrist 35), free from resentment and moralizing, in opposition to a Church that believes in things, conditions, and effects "that do not exist" (KGW VIII, 3, 125), Nietzsche merely appears to avoid criticizing him. In fact, and most notably in his last period, he tags "Jesus' psychological type" (KGW VIII, 2, 407–08 and 417–20; Der Antichrist 29), and the message that Jesus conveyed, with the label of the blessed naif, the "idiot," belonging to a past age that was unaware of the reality of existence. It is true that Nietzsche eloquently contrasts Jesus' simple and radical "good news" with the subtle and vengeful "bad news" (Der Antichrist 39) of Paul and the Church, which promises salvation* as a reward, and he also reduces Christianity to a "simple phenomenon of consciousness" (Der Antichrist 39). Yet both the good news and the bad news are alike envisaged from a Protestant perspective, informed by dialogue with outstanding thinkers of the day, such as D.F. Strauss, Ernest Renan, Wellhausen, and Tolstoy. In fact, they are interconnected, since they are both infinitely far removed from the "gospel of the future" (KGW VIII, 2, 432), the gospel of the Antichrist, who, by contrast to Jesus and Christianity, is not content to deny reality, but creates it. The claim that Nietzsche attacked Christianity only in its distorted form cannot be sustained except by neglecting patent facts, by neutralizing his undeniable intentions, and by devaluing (above all with the intention of recuperating Nietzsche) the hostile attitude that Nietzsche intended.

4. Questions and Confrontation

Nietzsche's destructive enterprise poses some fundamental questions for a religion that has connections with metaphysics. The Christian ethics of resentment (servile and gregarious), and the dogmatic* theology that corresponds to it and precedes it, are caught up in an irreversible process of "self-overcoming" (Zur Genealogie der Moral III, 27). Nietzsche denies that this form of Christianity has any capacity or will to make a grand affirmation. By contrast he describes nihilism as the “logic, taken to its final consequences” (KGW VIII, 2, 432), of values and ideals that are Christian above all.

Nietzsche’s philosophy also leaves certain questions open with regard to his own enterprise, over and above the possibility that it depends on what it seeks to surpass. Is the Platonism that Nietzsche hoped to overthrow incorporated into his worldview? To what extent is the figure of Zarathustra derived from the Christ* of the Gospels (as opposed to the historical Zoroaster who is Nietzsche’s nominal model)? Nietzsche’s philosophy demands a response from theology, an unavoidable confrontation with the thinker who presents himself as “the implacable enemy of Christianity” (Ecce Homo, “Why I am so wise,” 7). In the end the main concern of his philosophy is to make an affirmation: he presents it as a confrontation between a Yes and a No, and as consisting in singing the song of Yes and Amen (Also sprach Zarathustra, “The Seven Seals”). Yet what is it that we must say Yes to? What must we recognize as the highest form of affirmation? Is it simply a matter of affirming the self, the will that is certain of itself, that extends its power and takes possession of the world by establishing new values? It is necessary to inquire whether all of Nietzsche’s texts belong within the same perspective, and to wonder, for example, what exactly it is that must be loved with amor fati. Nietzsche does not say that the affirmation of the “eternal return” is solely directed toward the self, any more than he says that it is directed toward God. Nietzsche’s philosophy, which is so often polemical, also calls for interpretation wherever it seeks to surmount its own violence. As for the polemic itself, Nietzsche frequently uses it to raise questions that he then neglects or leaves unresolved, such as the implacable and irreconcilable nature of reality*, or the nonevangelical cult* of God, Christ, and the Church, transformed into simple instruments of authority. He thus gives believers occasion to return critically to themselves. Yet his provocation also invites those who have faith* to think more about what they hope to mean. Whatever objections may be raised to them, his iconoclastic and demystifying attacks should nonetheless provide food for theological thought, clearing a path for a deeper understanding of biblical faith in the service of a living Christian practice.

- G. Colli, M. Montinari (Eds.), Kritische Gesamtausgabe, Werke (KGW), 1967– (30 vols. published); KGW Briefwechsel, 1975– (7 vols. published), Berlin and New York; Œuvres philosophiques complètes, Paris, 1967–, and Correspondance, Paris, 1986–.
- ◆ M. Montinari et al. (Eds.) (1972–), Nietzsche Studien: Internationales Jahrbuch für die Nietzsche-Forschung, Berlin and New York.
- J.-L. Marion (1977), L'idole et la distance: Cinq études, 49–114, Paris.
- E. Blondel (1980), Nietzsche: le 5e évangile?, Paris.
- J. Figl (1984), Dialektik der Gewalt: Nietzsches hermeneutische Religionsphilosophie, Düsseldorf.
- U. Willers (1988), Friedrich Nietzsches antichristliche Christologie: Eine theologische Rekonstruktion, Innsbruck and Vienna.
- U. Willers (1994), “Dekonstruktive Demontage oder Analyse der Wirklichkeit? Friedrich Nietzsches Rede vom finis christianismi,” in M. von Brück and J. Werbick (Eds.), Traditionsabbruch—Ende des Christentums?, 27–54, Würzburg.
- M. Fleischer (1994), “Nietzsche,” TRE 24, 506–524 (bibl.).
- D. Franck (1998), Nietzsche et l'ombre de Dieu, Paris.

ULRICH WILLERS AND JÉRÔME DE GRAMONT

See also Atheism; Freud, Sigmund; Heidegger, Martin; Marx, Karl; Paganism; Secularization

Nominalism

I. Terminology

We can distinguish two forms of nominalism, one narrowly defined in relation to logic and theory of knowledge, and the other, more broadly, taking into consideration metaphysical, ethical, and theological matters as well.

1. Nominalism in the Strict Sense

In the strict sense, nominalism is the theory holding that there is nothing outside the human mind corresponding to general terms such as man or living thing (universals). The term man refers to concrete individuals, not to a universal thing like humanity, in which individual men can be said to participate. The universality of the term, the fact that it corresponds to different individuals, does not have to do with what is signified (with the significatum) but with the manner in which the signified is designated by the term (with the significatio). The universal term, therefore, derives its universality from an activity of the human intellect, which is able to form universal concepts applicable to different individuals.

This universality thus exists only in the human mind, not outside it (differentiating nominalism from realism). For a nominalist, a universal is a sign (signum) and not a thing outside the mind (res). And because every science necessarily uses universal terms and looks for the universality of concrete phenomena, the theory implies that the object of the various sciences is not merely reality outside the mind, but that reality as it is expressed and signified by universal propositions. Nominalism thus makes a strict distinction between concrete reality (the real order of the res) and discourse concerning concrete reality (the rational order of signa). In nominalist theory, all sciences, including theology*, are conceptual constructions of reality; their structure depends on the manner in which man can know reality and on the way in which he can speak about it.

2. Nominalism in the Broad Sense

Nominalist epistemology is based on a few philosophical and theological propositions that make up nominalism in the broad sense, and the theological relevance of nominalism appears in this context. Reality is made up of different individual things, each of which exists in itself. There are no universal things, such as “humanity,” that give particular things their nature and being. There is no super-individual system of universalia ante rem and universalia in re structuring and necessarily determining reality. God* can make each individual exist without another. Particular created beings thus have a direct link with God. God is not obligated to act through a series of created causes organized hierarchically. If he likes, he can intervene directly and immediately anywhere in his creation*. In his activity, God is entirely free and omnipotent. The power through which God has ordered creation as it is called potentia dei ordinata. However, God might have acted differently; he might have made a different creation; this power that would have made it possible for him to act in a way other than the way he in fact did act is known as potentia dei absoluta.

The role played by the notion of potentia dei absoluta in nominalist philosophy* and theology is primarily a heuristic one. If God, de potentia dei absoluta, can make A exist without B, that means that A and B are two particular things that do not necessarily depend on one another, even if in reality they always exist together. It is possible that God has ordered creation in such a way that when the words of the Eucharistic consecration are spoken, hoc est enim corpus meum, the bread is thereby transubstantiated, but that does not mean that these words are always necessarily required. Because of his omnipotence, God himself is able to fulfill the function of the words. This heuristic principle is applied in epistemology, in the doctrine of grace* and the sacraments*, and in morality, as well as in other areas. Neither nature* nor the economy of salvation* has an internal structure giving either of them a necessary organization. In every detail, they are determined by a divine will that depends on nothing (voluntarism*).

The question that defines nominalism in the strict sense goes back to the ancient debate on the ontological status of universals, as set forth in the Isagogè of Porphyry. However, it did not really take shape until the 12th century, when the term nominales was used for the first time. In the 14th and 15th centuries it resurfaced in a more pronounced form, in which the term nominales was joined by terministae and moderni. This later form of nominalism deeply influenced the intellectual climate of the time; it strongly contributed to the birth of the modern conception of the sciences and of Reformation theology. Because of its critical epistemology and its emphasis on divine will, nominalism has provoked resistance up to the present, particularly on the part of Thomists.

II. 12th Century

Twelfth-century nominalism originated in the areas of grammar and logic—that is, in areas of knowledge dealing with propositions and nouns. The vocalism of Roscelin that reduced universals to mere noises seems to have been the final harbinger of nominalism (Jolivet 1992). The influence of theories of logic and semantics was felt at the time in theology—for example with reference to the object of faith*—and in Christology*, so that it is possible to speak of theological nominalism. The concept of nominales is found after 1150 in some texts, where it designates contemporary thinkers in general. It is difficult to determine with certainty when this current disappeared, but it must have been in the late 12th or early 13th century, at the time of the formation of universities. In general, the sources speak of an anonymous nominalis, of nominales, or of opinio nominalis, and not of particular individuals, which makes identification of the theories more difficult. The sources nevertheless provide information on the content of views that were considered nominalist at the time. They concern principally the ontological status of genus and species, the distinction between language and reality, the doctrine of the unitas nominis; and the conceptions of logical inference. The sources also show that in the 12th century the views of the nominales were often contrasted to those of the reales. We sometimes find the expression theologus nominalis.

1. Genus and Species

The anonymous 12th-century treatise De universalibus attributes to the nominales the view that genera and species are only words (vocabula). The argument goes back to Aristotle's Categories, where the naming of a first substance "states" (proferri) the species rather than the genus. "To be stated" is a property of words (voces); this is why genera and species are words (Iwakuma-Ebbesen 1992). We find an analogous view in the Summa of Peter of Capua (shortly after 1200), although he replaces the term vox ("word") with nomen ("name"). Peter of Capua says that, according to the nominalists, genera and species are names (nos nominales . . . dicimus genera et species esse nomina). The work further establishes a contrast between the nominalists' view and that of the reales (Iwakuma-Ebbesen 1992).

The same view is set forth in the early-13th-century nominalist treatise Positiones nominalium. According to the anonymous author, the nominalists agree in saying that universal terms, such as genus and species, are names—consentimus quod universalia sicut genera et species sunt nomina. Against the reales, they thus demonstrate that there is nothing in reality but particular individuals—nihil est praeter particulare (Ebbesen 1991). Albert* the Great interpreted the nominalist argument in conceptual terms. In his commentary on Porphyry, where he deals with the ontological status of genus and species, he attributes to the nominalists the view that the generality (communitas) of universal terms (universalia) to which particular things that come under the universal term are related exists only in the intellect (Borgnet ed. I, 19b). The interpretation proposed by Albert exercised strong influence on later views of the nominalist argument. It corresponds to what was considered typical of nominalism in the 15th century.

2. Language and Reality

The doctrine that the order of language is different from the order of reality is also characteristic of the nominalism of the 12th century. Propositional assertions are complex verbal realities made up of simple verbal realities rather than complex things made up of simple things. For example, according to the Summa Brevis sit (1160) by Robert de Paris, the nominalists distinguish the subject of a predicate (predicatum) from the subject of a saying (locutio) in such a way that only terms (termini) are subjects of predicates. In fact, terms are attributed only to terms. Real things, on the other hand, can be subjects only of sayings. And in fact, sayings deal with reality (Kneepkens 1987). An analogous distinction is noted in the nominalist treatise De praedicatione, in which the anonymous author contrasts an expression in which things are said of things (res de re praedicari) to one in which terms are said of terms (terminum de termino), and the first form of predication is attributed to the reales. The author, who calls himself a nominalist, prefers the second form, nos terminum de termino (Iwakuma-Ebbesen 1992).

3. Unitas Nominis

The theory of the unitas nominis is found primarily in works of the early-13th century. It states that the same event can be signified in different ways. It played a major role in the debates on the immutability* of divine knowledge* and on the immutable truth of a faith expressed at different moments in time*. The proposition Pf "Christ will be born" is true before the birth of Christ*, whereas the proposition Pp "Christ is born" is false. After the birth of Christ, the opposite is true; at that point Pf is false and Pp is true. That raises the question of whether the faith of Abraham is the same as the faith of Paul. Because the nominalists held the opinion that the content of faith is immutable, they resolved the problem by distinguishing what is signified from the way in which it is signified. The signified of Pf and Pp is identical (the birth of Christ), but the ways in which it is signified are different (the verb tenses are different).

In his Summa, Peter of Capua contrasts the views of the nominales and the reales on this point. He takes as his point of departure the question of divine knowledge. According to the reales, it is true that I exist now (me esse), whereas beforehand this was not true; this is why God knows now that I exist, whereas earlier He did not. The nominales, on the other hand, claim that the me esse was true from the beginning of creation (a principio mundi), but that earlier it was signified by the proposition ego erit tunc ("I will be at such a time"), and now it is signified by ego sum ("I myself am"). At this moment, then, God does not know any more than He knew earlier (Iwakuma-Ebbesen 1992).

Later in the Summa, Peter of Capua discusses the faith of the Old Testament and that of the New. He says that for the nominales, Abraham never believed that Christ would come (Christum esse venturum), for to say that "Christ will come" means even now that he will still come (Christum esse venturum est ipsum modo esse venturum). Abraham, therefore, believed the same thing that we believe—that is, that Christ has come (Christum venisse), for although that is now expressed by the proposition “Christ has come,” in Abraham’s time it was said that “Christ will come” (Iwakuma-Ebbesen 1992). In the Summa (1206–10) of Prévostin, the view of the nominales is presented concisely in the formulation “what is true once will always be true” (quod semel est verum, semper erit verum); this is why Abraham believed that Christ was born—Christum esse natum—and not that Christ would be born—Christum esse nasciturum (ibid.).

In an anonymous commentary on the Sentences, Peter Lombard’s view—God knows neither more nor less than he has known (Tertia, Ed., 1, 293)—is compared to the nominalist argument that what is once true will always be true (Iwakuma-Ebbesen 1992). This is also the case in the Summa aurea of Guillaume d’Auxerre (Ribailleur, Ed., 1, 181). The argument is also noted as the opinio nominalium in the works of Albert the Great (Borgnet, Ed. 26, 350 b) and Bonaventure* (Opera omnia 1, 740b). According to Bonaventure, this was the argument that gave the nominalists their name—dicti sunt nominales, quia fundabant positionem suam super nomini unitatem (Chenu 1935–36).

4. Logical Inference

In some 12th-century treatises, the doctrine of the nominalists is related to a few rules concerning logical inference. For example, the anonymous Fragmentum Monacense attributes to the nominales the view that a negative proposition cannot be deduced from an affirmative one (Iwakuma 1993). A later work, the Obligationes Parisienses, describes as incoherent the rule that the acceptance of a false proposition makes it possible to accept and prove any contingent thing (De Rijk 1975). Finally, the anonymous author of the treatise De communibus distinctionibus mentions the opinion of the nominales that from the impossible comes anything at all—ex impossibili sequitur quidlibet. According to the author, this view is opposed to that of the reales that nothing comes from the impossible—ex impossibili nihil sequitur (De Rijk 1988).

5. Theologicus Nominalis

In his commentary on Job, written in the third quarter of the 12th century, Pierre le Chantre uses the expression nominalis theologicus to characterize a theologian who considers only the name of Christ (nomen Christi) and not the thing designated by that name (the divinity and the humanity of Christ), unlike the theologus reales (Landgraf 1943). A sermon of the late 12th century by Hubert of Balsema also contrasts the theologi reales to the neutraliter nominales vel nominaliter neutrales, and he makes a clearly negative judgment of these nominales; they are not as good disciples of Christ (christiani) as the reales, because their doctrine is without commitment and it has little value (parum valet) (d’Alverny 1984).

III. 14th and 15th Centuries

After the 13th century, nominales was no longer used to designate contemporary thinkers. It reappears in the sources for the first time in the early-15th century. These sources show that the concept of nominales in the late Middle Ages derived its meaning from the debate between the philosophical schools (via nominalium against via realium) of the time. The discussion focused in the first place on the ontological status of human concepts and their relation to reality. For example, in a 1403 letter, Guillaume Euvrie wrote that the nominales of his time reduced all the differences between divine attributes* and divine ideas to mere differences between human concepts (humanae conceptiones). The letter includes among the nominales such 14th-century thinkers as Adam of Wodeham, Gregory of Rimini, and Henry of Oyta (Pellerin 1967–68). In his De universali reali (1406–18), Jean de Maisonneuve, a disciple of Albert the Great, criticized the view of the epicuri literales (Weiler 1968, 137), a term that his disciple Emeric of Campo transformed into epicurei nominales (Invectiva 117; see also Tractatus fol. 2v). These followers of Albert the Great connected the nominalist argument to the view that universals are nothing but concepts in the human mind—universalia post rem. William of Ockham, Jean Buridan, and Marsilius of Inghen were known as its most significant defenders. In a 1423 work, Jean Gerson identified the nominales with the terministae, apparently in connection with problems of logic—logici, quos alii vocant terministas seu nominales (OC 10, 127).

The situation had scarcely changed in the late-15th century. Fourteenth-century writers were those principally named, and the question at issue was always the status of human concepts in relation to reality. The edict of Louis XI of France against nominalism (1473) mentioned the following names: William of Ockham, Jean de Mirecourt, Gregory of Rimini, Jean Buridan, Pierre d’Ailly, Marsilius of Inghen, Adam of Wodeham, Jean Dorp, and Albert of Saxony (Ehrle 1925). The nominalists replied to Louis XI’s edict in 1474; in their view, with respect to divine attributes, there is a distinction between the order of language and the order of reality, and this is why the differences between the concepts of language do not always correspond to differences in reality—illi doctores “nominales” dicti sunt qui non multiplicant res principaliter per termi- nos secundum multiplicationem terminorum. The reales, on the other hand, in the view of the nominales, claim that every conceptual distinction refers to a distinction in reality—“reales” autem qui econtra res multiplicatas contendunt secundum multiplicatam terminorum (Ehrle 1925).

In the late Middle Ages, the concept of nominalism was thus attached to 14th-century writers, although it did not come to prominence until the 15th century. This historical fact makes it difficult to determine the precise content of “nominalism” in the late Middle Ages. But there are apparently clear correspondences among the 14th-century writers mentioned above, particularly with respect to universals and divine attributes.

1. William of Ockham

In his De universali reali, Jean de Maisonneuve saw the ideas of William of Ockham (c. 1300–c. 1350) as the origin of nominalism (Weiler 1968). The modern literature similarly considers Ockham as the first important representative of the nominalism of the late Middle Ages. This does not, however, mean that all of his ideas that are nominalist in character originate with Ockham himself. For example, his doctrine of the potentia dei absoluta is rooted in the traditions of the 13th century (Courtenay 1990), and the emphases on the individual and on voluntarism refer to passages of Duns* Scotus. Ockham’s nominalism, in any event, provides important elements in the areas of logic and epistemology, and divine attributes and ethics*.

a) Logic and Epistemology. Ockham defends the idea that universals exist only in the human mind, not outside it. Reality is made up only of individuals, and universals are also individual things—signs in the human mind. The generality of the universal, therefore, has to do only with its function as a sign that can be a sign for several things—quodlibet universale est una res singularis, et ideo non est universale nisi per significationem, quia est signum plurium (OTh 1, 48). Human knowledge begins with the knowledge of individual things. These individual things are the object of an intuitive grasp (notitia intuitiva) when they are known in such a way that the knower has an immediate certainty (notitia evidens) of the existence or nonexistence of the thing known. This has to do with the knowledge not only of necessary truths but also of contingent truths. If, on the other hand, it is impossible to deduce from knowledge of the thing its existence or nonexistence, we are dealing with abstract knowledge (notitia abstractiva). And that applies to memory or conceptual knowledge, deduced from sense perception (OTh 1, 30–33).

The question of the status of intuitive knowledge led to one of the most interesting problems in the application of the concept of divine omnipotence (potentia dei absoluta), whether God can deceive man. In his omnipotence (de potentia dei absoluta), can God assume the role of an intuitively grasped object and thereby give the knower the immediate certainty of the existence of the thing known, whereas in reality the thing does not exist? In the first book of his commentary on the Sentences, Ockham concedes this possibility. God can do everything that a created cause is capable of doing; he can thus cause immediate certainty; and, in addition, he can bring into existence everything existing in itself (res absoluta) without anything else. Intuitive knowledge of a thing is an activity of the soul* and exists in the soul; it can therefore be caused by God even if the thing known does not exist (OTh 1, 37–39).

In his later Quodlibeta, however, Ockham speaks with more reticence and shows that there is a contradiction in God causing in man an immediate grasp of, for instance, “this whiteness is” (haec albedo est), if that whiteness does not exist (OTh 9, 499). Divine omnipotence is thus limited by the principle of non-contradiction (ibid., 604), and immediate knowledge of the existence of a nonexistent object cannot be produced by God. This can also be applied to the intuitive (beatific) vision* of the divine essence. In this vision, God cannot deceive man, because although he can replace any created cause by His own causality, it will always be necessary, if he wishes to cause in man the intuitive knowledge of his essence, for he himself to exist as first cause. If man knows that God exists by basing himself on an intuitive vision, it is certain that God exists (ibid., 605–06).

b) Divine Attributes. Ockham distinguishes two ways in which divine attributes—knowledge, will, and so on—can be conceived: first, as an attribute perfectly identical to God (perfectio attributalis) and, second, as a thing in the human mind applicable to God (conceptus or nomen attributalis). The first conception concerns reality itself, and the second the way in which man thinks or speaks about reality; and according to Ockham, the answer to the question of the plurality and the ontological status of the attributes will be different depending on whether it is a question of the reality itself or of thinking about the reality. In the first case, there are not several attributes but a single perfection, perfectly one and identical to God. In the second case, on the other hand (attribute as predicate), the attribute is not really identical to God, but only a concept or a sign in the human mind. If we are dealing with predicates, then it is possible to say that God has several attributes. Hence, plurality does not exist in God but only in the human mind (OTh 2, 61–62).

c) Ethics. In Ockham's ethics, there is no supreme principle intelligible in itself to man. All ethical norms have been established by the omnipotent will of God. This certainly does not mean that the moral order is entirely arbitrary. The will of God is in fact identical to his intellect and his wisdom*, and he always acts according to recta ratio, which means that divine law* and natural law are identical (OTh 4, 610; 5, 352–53).

2. Adam of Wodeham

The thought of Adam of Wodeham, in the first half of the 14th century, is related to the nominalism of Ockham in various respects. Adam, too, defends the position that universals are only signs signifying particular things in a general way—sunt communes et universales in repraesentando quodlibet tale, licet nullum distincte (Gál-Wood Ed., 1, 21). Like Ockham, he also defends the idea that there is a distinction, with respect to divine attributes, between the order of language and the order of reality. In God the attributes are identified with the divine essence so that they cannot be distinguished from one another. On the level of language, however, they have to be understood as signs freely established by man and attributed to God—sunt quaedam signa mentalia vel ad placitum instituta quae Deo attribuimus per praedicationem. Each sign is a particular thing, and this is why the attributes really are different (differunt realiter) on the level of language (Gál-Wood Ed., 2, 324). But unlike Ockham, with respect to the object of knowledge, Adam of Wodeham holds to the doctrine of complexe significabilia, a concept that strikingly corresponds to the 12th-century nominalist doctrine of unitas nominis (Gál 1977).

3. Gregory of Rimini

The influence of Ockham and Adam of Wodeham can be clearly seen in the Lectura of Gregory of Rimini (c. 1300–49). He shares their opinion on universals: they exist only in the human mind, not outside it. Gregory also claims that reality consists only of particular things. Like Ockham and Wodeham, his epistemology gives priority to knowledge of the particular over knowledge of the universal (Würsdörfer 1917). His conception of divine attributes also clearly corresponds to that of the two other nominalists (Trapp Ed., 2, 88). Finally, like Adam of Wodeham, Gregory of Rimini defends the theory of complexe significabile as the object of knowledge. He does this in particular in his explanation of divine knowledge. God knows things that may be signified by a single word (incomplexe), for example men and angels*, and he knows things that can be designated by a collection of different words, such as “fire heats wood.” Gregory calls similar connections enuntabilia or cognoscibilia complexe significabilia (Trapp Ed., 227–28). And if he speaks of enuntabilia and not, like Ockham, of propositions, in order to name the objects of knowledge, this is because, according to him, the object of a judgment is not a proposition but what is meant by it (Nuchelmans 1973).

4. Marsilius of Inghen

The 15th-century sources also include Marsilius of Inghen (c. 1340–96) among the most important nominalists. A comparison of Marsilius's ideas with those of the other theologians mentioned clearly shows correspondences. Universals exist only in the human mind. Humanity (humanitas) in general does not exist. Even abstracting from all the individual characteristics of Socrates, the humanity of Socrates remains particular—it is only the humanity of Socrates (Strasbourg Ed., fol. 3 r).

Like the other nominalists, Marsilius clearly distinguishes the order of language from the order of reality. Divine attributes are identical to the divine essence, as attributive perfections (perfectiones attributales), but they are distinguished from divine essence in human thought as attributive concepts—licet enim intellectus et voluntas, intelligere et velle sint in deo omnimodo idem, tamen apud nos in mente nostra diversos conceptus de essentia dei important, or “even though in God the intellect and the will, thought and desire are absolutely identical, in our minds they imply different concepts of the divine essence” (Strasbourg Ed., fol. 61 r).

The thought of Marsilius nevertheless contains significant differences from that of his predecessors. For example, he criticizes Ockham's doctrine of ideas and the conception of complexe significabile (Hoenen 1993) as an attributive concept in Adam of Wodeham and Gregory of Rimini.

5. Gabriel Biel

In 1508 the University of Salamanca established a chair of nominalist theology (cátedrade nominales) for the study of the works of Marsilius of Inghen and Gabriel Biel (Andrés 1976). Gabriel Biel (1418–95) was included among the nominalists along with Marsilius because his commentary on the Sentences was in fact nothing but an abbreviatura of Ockham's Scriptum, made obvious by the correspondences in structure and content. According to Biel, the universal exists only in the human mind; it is a particular thing that signifies several things equally; its generality exists only at the level of the signifier—esse universale nihil aliud est quam repraesentare vel significare plures res singulares univoce (Werbeck-Hofmann Ed., 1, 180).

Biel also follows Ockham on the question of divine attributes. He distinguishes between the attribute as a thing identified with God in reality (res ipsa quae est perfecta) and the attribute as a sign that can be predicated about God (signum praedicabile de re perfecta; Werbeck-Hofmann Ed., 1, 147–50). In the first case as opposed to the second, there are not several perfections or attributes. However, Biel clearly distances himself from Ockham in matters of ethics. In fact, he accepts the existence of an objective norm in morality. One who sins acts not only against God but against right reason* (contra quamlibet rectam rationem). One commits a sin* by acting against recta ratio, and this would be true even if God did not exist—si per impossibile deus non esset. The norm for action is immutable and identical for everyone (Werbeck-Hofmann Ed., 2, 612). On this point, Biel follows Gregory of Rimini (Trapp Ed., 6, 235).

IV. Historiography

The historiography of nominalism began as early as 1474 when, in response to the edict of Louis XI, the nominalists presented an outline of the history of their school. The description is highly rhetorical (Kaluza 1995), but it nevertheless had a significant influence on the later image of nominalism. Two other works also influenced that image: the Annales Boiorum of Aventinus in the 16th century, in which Ockham, Gregory of Rimini, and Marsilius of Inghen are considered as antesignani nominalistarum (Trapp 1956), and the Historia Universitatis Parisiensis of Du Boulay in the 17th century.

In the 20th century, we should distinguish two angles of approach to the nominalism of the 12th century. The first considers nominalism primarily as a doctrine of universals (Vignaux 1930), whereas the second emphasizes the theory of the unitas nominis (Chenu 1935–36). These two approaches are still present in current research, although attempts have been made to combine them (Courtenay 1991). Until the 1960s, research on the nominalism of the 14th and 15th centuries was dominated by a negative judgment: by emphasizing the potentia dei absoluta, nominalism had made itself fundamentally skeptical (Michalski 1969) and disrupted the synthesis of faith and reason accomplished by the Scholasticism of the 13th century (Gilson 1938). Thanks to modern critical editions of nominalist writers and studies based on new sources (Baudry 1949; Boehner 1958; Oberman 1967, 1981; Courtenay 1978, 1984; Tachau 1988; Kaluza 1988), that negative image has been corrected. It has thus been possible to bring to light the specific contribution of nominalism to the development of philosophy and theology.

- Adam de Wodeham, Sent., Paris, 1512; Tractatus de indivisibilibus, Ed. R. Wood, Dordrecht, 1988.
- Adam de Wodeham, Lectura secunda in librum primum Sententiarum, Ed. G. Gál and R. Wood, St. Bonaventure, NY, 1990, 3 vols.
- Albert the Great, Opera omnia, Ed. A. Borgnet, Paris, L. Vivès, 1890–1899, 38 vols.
- Bonaventure, Opera omnia, Ed. Quaracchi, Florence, 1882–1902, 11 vols.
- Du Boulay, Historia Universitatis Parisiensis 1, Paris, 1665, Repr. Frankfurt, 1966.
- Gabriel Biel, Collectorium circa quattuor libros Sententiarum, Ed. W. Werbeck and U. Hofmann, Tübingen, 1973–92, 4 vols.
- Grégoire de Rimini, Lectura super primum et secundum Sententiarum, Ed. A.D. Trapp et al., Berlin, 1979–87, 7 vols.
- Heymericus de Campo (1496), Tractatus problematicus, Köln; Invectiva, in G. Meersseman, Geschichte des Albertismus 2, DHOP 5, 1935, 112–212.
- Jean Gerson, Œuvres complètes, Ed. P. Glorieux, Paris, 1960–73, 10 vols.
- Marsile d’Inghen, Quaestiones super quattuor libros Sententiarum, Strasbourg, 1501, Repr. Frankfurt, 1966.
- Peter Lombard, Sententiae in quattuor libris distinctae, Grottaferrata, 1971–81, 2 vols.
- William of Auxerre, Summa aurea, Ed. J. Ribailier, Grottaferrata, 1980–87, 5 vols.
- William of Ockham, Opera philosophica (OPh) et theologica (OTh), St. Bonaventure, NY, 1967–88, 17 vols.
- ♦ J. Würsdörfer (1917), Erkennen und Wissen nach Gregor von Rimini, BGPhMA 20/1.
- F. Ehrle (1925), Der Sentenzenkommentar Peters von Candia des Pisaner Papstes Alexanders V., FS Beiheft 9.
- P. Vignaux (1930), “Nominalisme,” DThC 11/1, 718–84.
- M.D. Chenu (1935–36), “Grammaire et théologie aux XIIIe et XIIIe siècles,” AHDL 10, 5–28.
- É. Gilson (1938), Reason and Revelation in the Middle Ages, New York (2nd Ed. 1966).
- A. Landgraf (1943), “Studien zur Theologie des zwölften Jahrhunderts, I: Nominalismus in den theologischen Werken der zweiten Hälfte des zwölften Jahrhunderts,” Tr. 1, 183–210.
- L. Baudry (1949), Guillaume d’Occam: sa vie, ses œuvres, ses idées sociales et politiques, Paris.
- A.D. Trapp (1956), “Augustinian theology of the 14th century,” Aug(L) 6, 146–274.
- Ph. Boehner (1958), Collected Articles on Ockham, Louvain and Paderborn.
- H.A. Oberman (1967), The Harvest of Medieval Theology: Gabriel Biel and Late Medieval Nominalism, 2nd Ed., Grand Rapids.
- E. Pellegrin (1967–68), “Un humaniste du temps de Charles VI: Guillaume Euvrie,” BIRHT 15, 9–28.
- A.G. Weiler (1968), “Un traité de Jean de Nova Domo sur les universaux,” Vivarium 6, 108–154.
- K. Michalski (1969), La philosophie au XIVe siècle: Six études, Ed. K. Flasch, Opuscula philosophica 1, Frankfurt.
- R. Paqué (1970), Das Pariser Nominalistenstatut, Zur Entstehung des Realitätsbegriffs der neuzeitlichen Naturwissenschafts, Berlin.
- G. Nuchelmans (1973), Theories of the Proposition, Amsterdam.

- L.M. de Rijk (1975), "Some Thirteenth-Century Tracts on the Game of Obligation II," Vivarium 13, 22–54.
- M. Andrés (1976), La teología española en el siglo XVI, vol. 1, Madrid.
- G. Gál (1977), "Adam of Wodeham's Question on the Complexo Significabile as the Immediate Object of Scientific Knowledge," FrSA 37, 66–102.
- D.M. Armstrong (1978), Nominalism and Realism: Universals and Scientific Realism, vol. 1, Cambridge.
- W.J. Courtenay (1978), Adam Wodeham: An Introduction to his Life and Writings, Leyden.
- H. A. Oberman (1981) (Ed.), Gregor von Rimini: Werk und Wirkung bis zur Reformation, Berlin.
- M.-T. d'Alverny (1984), "Humbertus de Balsema," AHDL 51, 127–91.
- W.J. Courtenay (1984), Covenant and Causality in Medieval Thought, London.
- R. Imbach (1987), "Philosophie und Eucharistie bei W. von Ockham," in E. P. Bos and H. A. Krop (Eds.), Ockham and Ockhamists, Nimegen.
- C. H. Kneepkens (1987), Het iudicium constructionis: Het leerstuk van de constructio in de 2e helft van de 12e eeuw, Nimegen, 4 vols.
- L.M. de Rijk (1988), Some Earlier Parisian Tracts on Distinctions Sophismatum, Artistarium 7, Nimegen.
- K. H. Tachau (1988), Vision and Certitude in the Age of Ockham, Leyden.
- Z. Kaluza (1988), Les querelles doctrinales à Paris: Nominalistes et réalistes aux confins du XIVe et du XVe siècle, Bergamo.
- W.J. Courtenay (1990), Capacity and Volition: A History of the Distinction of Absolute and Ordained Power, Bergamo.
- W.J. Courtenay (1991), "Nominales and Nominalism in the Twelfth Century," in Lectionum Varietates: Hommage à Paul Vigneaux (1904–1987), 11–48, Paris.
- S. Ebbesen (1991), "Two Nominalist Texts: 'Positiones' and a 'Categories' Commentary," Cahiers de l'Institut du Moyen Age grec et latin 61, 429–40.
- J. Jolivet (1992), "Trois variations médiévales sur l'universel et l'individu: Roscelin, Abélard, Gilbert de la Porrée," RMM 97, 111–55.
- Y. Iwakuma et S. Ebbesen (1992a), "Logico-theological Schools from the Second Half of the 12th Century: A List of Sources," Vivarium 30, 157–72; (1992b), "Twelfth-Century Nominalism Bibliography," Vivarium 30, 211–15.
- M. J. F. M. Hoenen (1993), Marsilius of Inghen: Divine Knowledge in Late Medieval Thought, SHCT 50.
- Y. Iwakuma (1993), "Parvipontani's thesis 'ex impossibile quidlibet sequitur': Comments on the Sources of the Thesis from the Twelfth Century," in K. Jacobi (Ed.), Argumentationstheorie, 123–51, Leyden.
- C. Michon (1994), N. La théorie de la signification d'Occam, Paris.
- Z. Kaluza (1995), "La crise des années 1474–1482: L'interdiction du n. par Louis XI," in M. J. F. M. Hoenen et al. (Ed.), Philosophy and Learning: Universities in the Middle Ages, 293–327, Leyden.
- A. de Libera (1996), La querelle des universaux, Paris.

MAARTEN J. F. M. HOENEN

See also Luther, Martin; Omnipotence, Divine; Realism; Scholasticism; Voluntarism

Notes, Theological

The preservation of faith* and discipline—the pairing fides et mores, whose scope has expanded and contracted from age to age—has been the object of constant vigilance on the part of Christian communities ever since the time of the apostles. Through the great Eastern councils*, the patristic age laid down the key points of orthodoxy and orthopraxy by means of creeds and canons; or, more often, in the form of condemnations, the most solemn of which was the anathema, long taken to imply heresy*. Nonetheless it was not until the rise of a speculative theological science, linked to the appearance and growth of the universities and the mendicant orders, that the use of increasingly precise and numerous “notes” arose and became widespread. These notes served to indicate, positively or negatively, the value of expressions of dogma* or of the doctrine peripheral to it, which was constantly growing in volume as a result of theological conclusions extending the revelabile. The great Parisian condemnation of 1277 (see also philosophy*, truth*) already illustrates the strengths and weaknesses of a system that the teaching authority*—in the first instance the Roman pontiff—was to borrow directly from the universities. The theology* faculties of the latter, in the course of their doctoral assemblies, would continue to advance numerous doctrinal opinions that, in the cases of Paris and its college of the Sorbonne, of Oxford and Köln, and later of Leuven, Douai, Alcalá, and Salamanca, met with considerable acceptance. Thus there was a distinction between the scholarly judgments of the universities, given doctrinaliter, and the authoritative judgment of the organs of the magisterium*—the bishops* as judges of the faith, the council, the Roman pontiff—given judicialiter, with canonical consequences if assertores were involved and displayed obstinacy. Only the collapse of the old political and ecclesiastical regimes at the end of the 18th century put an end to this regulatory activity carried out by the great studia generalia of Catholic Europe, and to that of the tribunals of the Inquisition, which while operating on a penal level did not leave aside the examination of doctrines. By the 19th century only the Sacred Congregation of the Roman and Universal Inquisition, or Roman Holy Office, survived. Founded in 1542, placed at the head of all the dicasteries in 1588, with the pope* as its prefect, and given the title of “supreme” in 1907, it retains a monopoly on the pronouncing of “censures” (denoting error) and the offering of “qualifications” (denoting the relationship to revealed truth or common doctrine).

Until the last century the Church* tended to clarify dogma by the negative approach of condemnations much more than by the positive one of canons, expositions of faith, or formularies, and in consequence notes of censure—until they gradually disappeared from the acts of the magisterium—attracted the attention of theologians more than did qualifications. As far as the latter are concerned, mention should be made of the attempts at classification presented by Holden in his Divinae fidei analysis (1652), Amort in his Demonstratio critica religionis catholicae (1741), Blau in his Regula fidei catholicae (1780), and Chrismann in his Regula fidei catholicae et collectio dogmatum credendorum (1792), and by the dogmatic specialists of the Germanic world and the Roman College, which after 1870 became the Gregorian University. This scale of relationship to revealed truth was closely dependent on the work of speculative thought, which alone makes it possible to determine the scope of specific concepts such as “dogma of faith,” “positively revealed,” “to be believed as a matter of divine faith,” “article of Catholic faith,” “virtually a matter of faith,” “theological conclusion,” “apostolic tradition,” “probable doctrine,” “dogmatic fact,” “morally certain,” “practice of the Church,” and so on. While the existence of a “hierarchy of truths*” can be recognized, applying it is an extremely sensitive matter: the idea of “faith,” like the opposite one of “heresy,” has only slowly assumed the character of a noetic concept, and has long included elements that would nowadays be placed in the moral or disciplinary field. This is particularly true of censures: over the centuries, especially since texts began to be disseminated by means of printing, these had been carried to a degree of complexity that from the 16th century made the ars notandi a theological specialty in its own right, with veritable experts, whether university doctors, members of religious orders, or advisers and qualificators of the Holy Offices. In the course of dissecting theological writings, these experts were sometimes tempted to stray imperceptibly from the strictly doctrinal and prudential register—the detecting of heresy or various forms of error—to that of a virtuoso exercise that came closer to a critical revision of the texts.

Consideration of the principal notes of censure confirms this progressive broadening of scope: if a proposition is judged “heretical,” “close to heresy,” “erroneous,” “close to error,” or even “reckless,” the normative judgment speaks for itself—even if it is not always clear, in the case of the note “heretical,” that the contrary proposition is ipso facto to be taken as a matter of faith. But it is a much more delicate matter to apply censures to a proposition, without leaving any room for objection, when such censures are aimed at every nuance of thought and expression, every latent meaning that can be contained in texts whose construction is usually highly elaborate and that lend themselves to countless ambiguities. This refinement in interpretation, encouraged by the asymptotic nature of error, led the experts to increase the number of notes—over a hundred certified by use. They range from those previously quoted that are directly concerned with the dogmatic substance of statements, to those that principally condemn the form—such as “misleading and ill-sounding,” “offensive to piety” (piarum aurium offensiva), “insulting to the Church,” or “ambiguous”—to others that judge the effect—such as “impious,” “scandalous,” “blasphemous,” “seditious,” or “schismatic”—and to yet others, even subtler in their application, that focus on latent meanings that may be brought out by circumstances of time, place, or person, such as “suggestive of heresy,” “suggestive of error,” “unlikely,” “false,” “questionable,” and so on. The most complete inventory of and commentary on notes of censure is to be found in the survey by Father Antonio Sessa (Antonius de Panormo), Scrutinium doctrinarum qualificandis assertionibus, thesibus ac libris conducentium... (Rome, 1709, folio). They were subsequently also considered by Du Plessis d’Argentré and C. L. de Montaigne, to name only the French.

Faced with a proliferation that was compromising the purifying role of censure and offering ample scope to odium theologicum, the teaching authority reacted. It went so far as to specify, in the conclusion to the decree of 2 March 1679 that condemned 65 laxist propositions, “that doctors, Scholastics, or whosoever else, should refrain henceforth from all offensive accusations... and use neither censure, nor note, nor polemical judgment against propositions commonly held in Catholic circles, as long as the Holy See has not pronounced judgment on these propositions.” This prohibition was repeated by Benedict XIV in his constitution Sollicita ac provida of 9 July 1753. Perhaps what was needed above all was to require the censors to give reasons for their judgments. Indeed, it is the most striking feature of the note system (which has never been officially codified, remaining a purely practical procedure whose secret is now lost) that no explanation is ever given for why a particular note is applied to a proposition. Because of this, the way is left open for suspicions of arbitrariness and for endless objections on the part of the authors or theological schools concerned. This characteristic was shared with the Roman Index, which did not justify its proscriptions, but confined itself—in even the most favorable cases—to a donec corrigatur (signifying a work placed on the Index “until it has been corrected”) without any further detail to shed light on the errors committed.

This lack of precision seems to have troubled neither the experts nor the teaching Church, in an age of rationality convinced that the meaning of a text could be condensed into a proposition without loss of substance, and that the doctrinal value of such a proposition could be unambiguously fixed. Nonetheless, difficulties soon became evident when it was necessary to go beyond the censure of categorical negations of the Catholic faith—for example Luther’s theses and those of the Protestants—to the unearthing of errors concealed in the depths of the text. For all that the possibility of judging propositions in themselves was maintained (absolute objective, ut jacent, ut verba sonant), there was often a tendency toward an examination of context (in sensu auctoris, in sensu ab assertoribus intento). This in no way implied that the target was the author’s personal meaning, his intimate thoughts, which God alone knew; but rather the sense that arose from a reading of the whole text of which the propositions formed a summary, made expressive by their concision. These propositions did not have to appear word for word, verbatim, in the text to which they were attributed, as in the case of the famous five propositions of Jansen’s Augustinus (see Jansenism*). It was enough that an examination of the writing or book in question should allow the understanding of a “proper and natural” sense that could be qualified by a theological note—positive or negative—applied to the proposition considered in its “obvious sense.”

The exact application of notes of censure to each proposition gave rise to as much difficulty as the relationship of propositions to a corpus (book, theses, university course). Censure could be brought to bear speciatim or singillatim, in other words individually; each proposition was qualified by the note or notes that applied to it. But censures could also be inflicted globatim, overall, the frequent comment respective indicating that each note applied of necessity to one or more propositions, none of which was exempt, but without specifying which one or ones. This left the reader, and especially the theologian, the task of allocating the notes. The deficiencies of this procedure, commonly used despite its (sometimes intentional) lack of rigor, became clear when 101 propositions taken from Quesnel’s Réflexions morales were condemned by the bull Unigenitus of 8 September 1713: more than twenty notes of censure were applied “respectively”, leading to endless quibbling over which heresy or errors should be attributed to each proposition. The court of Rome displayed more care over the condemnation of the canons of the synod* of Pistoia by the bull Auctorem fidei of 28 August 1794, which censured each proposition singillatim, one by one, and in addition referred to the Acts of the synod for the provenance of the proposition, thus forestalling any dispute over the facts.

What kind and degree of approval (assensus) is any believer to extend, then, to a decision that fixes, by means of notes (whether qualifications or censures), the value of a theological text or statement in relation to an author’s doctrine? The collegial judgment of the universities involved a scholarly competence that called for serious consideration of the doctrina communis expressed by it. The same went for the pronouncements of the Holy Offices of Spain, Portugal, and Italy. In the case of the Roman congregation of the Holy Office, decrees have been given “in common form,” in forma communi, involving the sole authority of the college of cardinals of the Inquisition and demanding complete submission; or “in specific form,” in forma specifica, with the express approval of the Roman pontiff. In the latter form, decrees constitute pronouncements that, like any act of the ordinary pontifical magisterium, call forth a religious assent, ore et corde, on a par with that extended to the bulls, constitutions, and briefs that can come directly from the head of the Church and contain condemnations of points of textual dogma. The judgment of the Roman pontiff may bear the marks of a solemn pronouncement—for example declaramus, damnamus, definimus—but infallibility* concerning points of dogma, including decisions on theological texts, has not been defined: the First Vatican* Council left this point aside, but on the other hand distinguished between credenda and tenenda, according to whether “divinely revealed truths” or “truths related to revealed truths” were involved. While Clement XI, in the bull Vineam Domini Sabaoth of 16 July 1705, rejected a simple silentium obsequiosum, or mere outward deference, he did not go so far as to call for an act of divine faith, but contented himself with a reception by “inward obedience,” interius obsequendo, quae vera est orthodoxi hominis oboedientia—a type of assensus confirmed by the decree Lamentabili of 8 July 1907, prop. 7.

In order to take account of this type of assent a number of theologians since the 18th century have proposed the idea of an “ecclesiastical faith,” justified by the infallibility of the Church and not directly by “the authority of the revealing God.” This has aroused strong opposition from Thomists, who maintain that points of dogma are also infallibly defined by the Church and are the object of divine faith in the same way as biblical revelation or the dogmatic definitions of the Councils or the Roman pontiffs. The analyses of P. Guérard des Lauriers, O.P., Les dimensions de la foi (1952, specifically excursus VIII–XI), made a decisive contribution to the clarification of this subject, even if some commentators have seen in the appeal to divine faith a danger of overemphasizing the magisterium. It is in any case “close to being a matter of faith” nowadays that the infallibility of the Church extends to that which is related to revealed truth. However, anyone who was to withhold his complete assent, internus assensus, to the condemnation of a doctrine advanced by theological texts, whether or not it had been evaluated by notes of censure, would not in consequence be a heretic—there being no negation of a truth directly revealed and proposed as such by the Church—but would be gravely culpable and wide open to the suspicion of heresy.

The International Theological Commission has recently called for a re-evaluation of theological notes: “It is to be regretted that the science of doctrinal qualifications has been to some extent relegated to obsolescence by the moderns. It is nonetheless useful in the interpretation of dogma, and for that reason should be revived and developed further” (Enchiridion Vaticanum 11, Documenti ufficiali della Santa Sede. 1988–1989, 1991, no 75, p. 1749).

- Fr. de Salignac de La Mothe-Fénelon (1704), Ordonnance et Instruction pastorale portant condamnation d'un imprimé intitulé "Cas de conscience" (OC, vol. 3, 1848).
- H. Tournély (1726), Praelectiones theologicae de Ecclesia Christi, Paris.
- H. Quillet (1905), “Censures doctrinales,” DThC 2, 2101–2113.
- L. Choupin (1907), Valeur des décisions doctrinales et disciplinaires du Saint-Siège, Paris (2nd Ed. 1928).
- L. Garzend (1912), L'inquisition et l'hérésie: Distinction de l'hérésie théologique et de l'hérésie inquisitoriale: à propos de l'affaire Galilée, Paris.
- Fr. Marin-Sola (1924), L'évolution homogène du dogme catholique, 2nd Ed., Fribourg.
- R. Favre (1946–1947), “Les condamnations avec anathème,” BLE 46, 226–41; 47, 31–48.
- J. Cahill (1955), The Development of the Theological Censures after the Council of Trent, 1563–1709, Fribourg.
- Y.J.-M. Congar (1956), “Fait dogmatique et foi ecclésiastique,” Cath 4, 1059–67.
- C. Koser (1963), De notis theologicis historia, notio, usus, Petrópolis.
- A. Kolping (1963), “Qualifikationen,” LThK 2 8, 914–19.
- P. Fransen (1968), “Enkele opmerkingen over de theologische kwalificaties,” TTh 8, 328–48.
- J. Schumacher (1974), “Der Denzinger” Geschichte und Bedeutung eines Buches in der Praxis der neueren Theologie, Fribourg.
- P. Legendre (1974), L'amour du censeur: Essai sur l'ordre dogmatique, Paris.
- L. Ceyskens (1974), “Le fait dans la condamnation de Jansénius et dans le serment anti-janséniste,” RHE 69, 697–734.
- R. Hissette (1977), Enquête sur les 219 articles condamnés à Paris le 7 mars 1277, Louvain.
- L. Ceyskens (1981), “Les jugements portés par les théologiens du Saint-Office sur les 31 propositions rigoristes condamnées en 1690,” Anton 56, 451–67.
- A. Houtepen (1987), “Hierarchia veritatum et orthodoxie,” Conc(F) no 212, 53–66.
- G. Thils (1982), “Notes théologiques,” Cath 9, 1389–94.
- B. Neveu (1993), L'erreur et son juge: Remarques sur les censures doctrinales à l'époque moderne, Naples.
- G. Fragnito (1997), La Bibbia al rogo: La censura ecclesiastica e i volgarizzamenti della Scrittura (1471–1605), Bologna.

BRUNO NEVEU

See also Heresy; Loci theologici; Magisterium; Theology; Truth

Nothingness

The concept of nothingness (nihil) or non-being (non ens), absolute (ouk on) or relative (mè on), is one of the key concepts in the history of metaphysics, from the Poem of Parmenides, Plato's Parmenides, or, on the Sophist side, Gorgias's treatise Peri tou mèn ontos (On the Non-existent) to Heidegger's* Was ist Metaphysik? or Sartre's L'être et le néant. Theology* has used the concept in a number of ways. On the one hand it has been called on with regard to questions and doctrines, often of considerable importance: most notably God*'s transcendence (that which is beyond being* has been conceptualized as non-being), creation* (conceived as ex nihilo), and evil* (error or sin* as participation in nothingness). On the other hand the concepts of annihilation or obliteration have been employed in order to view the dogma* of the Incarnation* in terms of the Son's kenosis*, or to consider ideas as essential as conversion* in the history of piety, or destitution in that of asceticism*; or indeed to apply the theme of "nihilization" (perhaps "the liberation of the consciousness from reality through denial") to Hell* (Augustine, En. in Ps. 38) or to illuminate the spiritual, rather than merely psychological, basis of suicide (self-hatred as a desire for non-being). We will mention here only those points that are not given an article of their own in this work.

Beside the scriptural references offered by the doctrine of creation, the negation of God (Ps 13:1 and 52:2; see atheism*), and the moral analysis of the emptiness and vanity of the human condition (Jb, Eccl), Christian meditation on nothingness has centered upon a small number of decisive biblical passages: Ps 41:8 (the abysses of God and of sin), Gal 6:3 and Ps 38:6 (the direct opposition in the texts of the Septuagint and the Vulgate between substance and nothingness: "[Jesus] made himself nothing, taking the form of a servant" (Phil 2:7 (exinanition, or abasement) and above all Romans 4:17 (God "calls into existence the things that do not exist"), and Jn 1:3–4 with its well-known problem of punctuation and the two main readings that the position of the caesura imply: "Without him was not anything made that was made; in him was life," or "Without him was not any thing made. That which has been made was life in him."

1. Mystical Theology: God as Cause and Nothingness

The way of negation allows theology to say what God is not: "We know not what God is, but what he is not" (Clement of Alexandria, Strom. V, 11). But from the knowledge of what God is not, and even of the fact that he is no known being, it does not follow that he does not exist. The impossibility of knowing God, insofar as he transcends all existence, including being (like the Neoplatonists' "One"), and even the One itself (in opposition to the Neoplatonists), does not imply that he should be characterized by nothingness—which would in any case be opposed to the letter of Ex. 3:14. The concept of God as nothingness was therefore not necessary to the negative way or to apophasis. According to Dionysius* the Pseudo-Areopagite, while super-essentiality "has no being according to the manner of any other being" (Divine Names 1, 1), the way of eminence (or cataphasis) grasps the fact that the cause of all things has no part of being, but also no part of non-being (Mystical Theology 5). For this reason God, who transcends both that which exists and that which does not, is not in opposition to anything, even to nothing. What brought about the progression—from the view of this transcendence (represented by the oxymorons of "shadow more than luminous" or "shadowy beams") as the superessential cause, having no part of what is, to the perilous formulations that went beyond the negations and declared it to be nothingness—was the realization that the mode of unknowing was like any mode of knowledge* for God (Divine Names 7, 3; see also the Ambigua of Maximus* the Confessor, PG 91, 1232). From this point, Dionysius's commentators would take the plunge and complete this "metamorphosis of apophasis" (A. Gouhier). So John of Scythopolis wrote: "Do not consider that the divine is, but cannot be comprehended; think rather that it is not; such indeed is knowledge in unknowing" (Commentary on the Divine Names, PG 4, 245 c). And in the words of Maximus the Confessor: "By reason of his super-being, the name* which is most appropriate for God is non-being . . . The two names of being and non-being should both be strictly applicable to God, even while neither of them is exactly fitting. The first is appropriate inasmuch as God is the cause of all things, the second through the eminence of the abstractive cause of the whole being of existing things" (prologue to the Mystagogy, PG 91, 664 b). Among Latin authors, John the Scot Eriugena in his De Divisione naturae distinguished five modes of opposition between being (that which can be perceived by the senses or understood by the intellect) and (relative) non-being, and made God the first type of non-being, since it was by the excellence of his nature that he was beyond the grasp of the senses and the intellect: "The divine nature . . . is nothingness, it exceeds all beings not inasmuch as it is not itself being, but inasmuch as all beings proceed from it" (De Divisione naturae 1. II, 589 B). However, for this whole tradition of commentators on the Dionysian corpus the key point is the following: it is always the method of causality that justifies the use of the concept of nothingness to conceive of God as the supereminent cause. This doctrine would be reinforced by the mystical* tradition (Hadewijch of Antwerp, Suso, Angela of Foligno). Thus even in the context of mystical theology, what is at stake is at bottom creation and causality; hence, conversely, the importance of this theologoumenon* to the history of metaphysics.

2. Natural Theology: Nothingness and the Intelligible

a) Renaissance Cosmologies. Speculations on nothingness formed an essential part of the Christian Platonism* of the Renaissance, which took the hierarchical cosmologies of Dionysius and Maximus and added a strong affirmation of God's transcendence. The opposition between God and nothingness, "a non-being immense and infinite in its action" but from which a proof of God's existence* can be drawn (since the existence of the impossible implies that of the necessary), is the prime example of "the art of opposites" that Charles de Bovelles developed after Nicholas* of Cusa: the paradoxical Liber de nihilo (1510) concludes with a restatement of the most daring theses of the Dionysian tradition, in particular the one that "links the name of nothingness to God... pronouncing in mystery* that God is nothing [nihil]" (c. 11). However, Bovelles firmly insists on the fundamental discontinuity or incommensurability that separates every creature from the Creator, and gives this gap the name of assurrectio. While laying claim to the paradoxes of the "coincidence of opposites," Renaissance natural* theology was thus able to avoid overstepping the prohibition set out in the Augustinian De natura boni: "It is an audacious sacrilege to equate nothingness and God" (X). This prohibition was intended to counter the Manichaeans who attempted to assign the same status to the Son born of (de) God and the creatures made by (ab) him "from nothingness, that is to say from (ex) that which absolutely is not" (I). The idea that creatures were de nihilo and had been drawn ex nihilo a Deo (though ex Deo could also be employed in this context), while the "begotten" Son was de and ex Deo, was constantly asserted. For this reason the idea that the self could tend toward nothingness was to be understood on an ontic and not simply a spiritual level (Gal 6:3; Augustine*, De civitate Dei XIV, XIII; En. in Ps 134:6; Bernard of Clairvaux, De gradibus humilitatis IV, 15).

b) Protestant Metaphysics. From the moment when modern metaphysics, finding fulfillment in ontology, defined the extant as the conceivable and thus subjugated being to representation, the opposition of ens and nihil was displaced. Johannes Clauberg (1622–65), the heir to Rudolf Goclenius (1547–1628) and Clemens Timpler (1567–1624), pronounced this dictum: "The extant is everything that can be conceived (intelligible), and nothing whatever can be opposed to it" (Ontosophia, §4). For this reason it was the most general of concepts, absolutely indeterminate, preceding the separation of something (aliquid, which could in turn be divided into substance and accident) from nothing (nihil). In spite of being a Catholic, N. Malebranche (1638–1715) developed a comparable metaphysics: to "think of nothing" was to have "the vague notion of being in general"—in other words, to sense the "clear, intimate, necessary presence of God" (Récherche de la vérité III, II, 8). Kant* falls within this tradition by way of the Tractatus philosophicus de nihilo by Martin Schoock (1614–69), Leibniz*, Wolff's (1679–1754) Ontologia (§132 Sq), and above all Baumgarten's (1714–62) Metaphysica (§7)—all these were writers who considered being primarily as the possibility of being. The conclusion of the transcendental analytics in the Critique of Pure Reason summarizes four senses of nothing (nichts): 1) the void concept without an object (ens rationis), a simple fiction such as the noumenon; 2) the void object of a concept (nihil privativum), in other words the negation of reality, such as cold; 3) the void intuition without an object (ens imaginarium), such as pure space and time*; 4) the void object without a concept (nihil negativum), the contradictory. The identification of being and nothingness was asserted in turn by Hegel* in his Wissenschaft der Logik: "Being and nothingness are the same thing" (Ed. of 1817, §40–41), an identification that attacks the idea of God as the absolute, "being in all being-there or supreme being (das höchste Wesen), since these definitions express him only in terms of pure negativity or indeterminacy. Rehabilitating the theologoumenon of creation ex nihilo, Schelling*'s later philosophy* in turn reworks the difference between the mè on—the negation of a position, simple nothingness, pure indefinite possibility—and the ouk on, the position of negation, the Nothing (Philosophie der Offenbarung), which expresses the doctrine of creation and makes possible the linking of natural theology and revelation* at the outset of positive philosophy. Once again, however, this takes place by way of a notion of God, "the Lord of being," as cause.

3. The Three Nothingnesses of Mankind

In the Miroir des âmes simples et anéanties, Marguerite Porete (†1310) identifies liberty* ("franchise") with annihilation. To know one's nothingness is, for the simple soul, neither to know nor to wish anything. The "desire for nothingness" disencumbers ("descombre") it of everything (including God) and leaves it free for union with God. No longer having a will of its own, the soul no longer feels desire except through the divine will. In Rhineland*-Flemish mysticism, especially in the work of Meister Eckhart, annihilation is in the same way a condition of divinization. The return to nothingness enables the creature to attain the being that it had in God before any creation. It also entails becoming the place where divine goodness must necessarily unfold, in keeping with the Dionysian principle: the good* diffuses of its own accord. “Deep calls to deep” (Ps 42:7) was thus an obligatory scriptural reference-point (and was commented on by John the Scot Eriugena). Mention must also be made of the anonymous 14th century mystical treatise The Cloud of Unknowing, whose influence was considerable, and Harphius’s Theologia mystica; and, as late as the beginning of the 17th century, La perle évangélique (1602) by Dom Beaucousin. Jean Orcibal has assessed the influence of the northern mystics on the spirituality of Carmel* and John* of the Cross, in whose work the concept of annihilation appears in the form of destitution: the “dark night” is the equivalent, in John’s contemplation*, of the negation of everything created, its nothingness.

The influence of the corpus dionysiacum, which can be clearly discerned throughout the Middle Ages, was however never so strong as at the beginning of the 17th century. Its remarkable translation into French by the Feuillant Jean de Saint-François (Goulu) in 1608 was of the highest importance for the vocabulary of mystical theology. What Louis Cognet has referred to as the “abstract school” kept alive the heritage of Rhineland-Flemish mysticism, by way of Benet of Canfield’s Rule of Perfection (1593) in particular. Bérulle* was its foremost exponent, which did not prevent him from producing an original body of work and highlighting, after Canfield and his praxis annihilationis (Rule of Perfection 3, 9), a christological understanding of nothingness. Bérulle enumerates “three sorts of nothingness: the nothingness from which God draws us by creation, the nothingness to which Adam* consigned us by his sin, and the nothingness into which we must enter with the Son of God, who annihilates himself in order to atone for us” (Opuscules de piété, 136).

Bérulle relies on Romans 4:17 to show that “nothingness relates to God” inasmuch as he is capable of fulfilling all his desires; and so we should imitate the “nothingness of being” from which God drew us in order to flee the second nothingness (that which Adam brought upon us) and place ourselves within the third by imitating the “annihilated state” of Jesus*: “We are a nothingness that strives toward nothingness, that seeks nothingness...that fills itself with nothingness, and that ultimately ruins and destroys itself for a nothingness. Whereas we should be a nothingness, in truth (for it befits us by nature), but a nothingness in the hand of God...a nothingness referred to God” (ibid., 111).

The concept of abnegation expresses this last sense (ibid., 132), and assigns its achievement to what Bérulle calls mystical theology (ibid., 8), by way of opposition to positive* theology and Scholastic* theology: it is abnegation that shapes the Christian’s spiritual and sacrificial annihilation to the objective annihilation of Christ.

4. Anthropology: Mankind as Midpoint between God and Nothingness

The concept of nothingness has on several occasions made it possible to assign mankind a metaphysical status, no longer as nothingness but as a midpoint between God and nothingness. Man is metaphysically limited (metaphysical sickness) because his status as creature means that he participates in nothingness: theodicies from Augustine onwards explain error, and on occasions sin, in these terms. Breaking free from the problematics of mankind’s situation in the universe of the medieval and Renaissance cosmologies, Descartes defined man’s position for the first time (Stellung, Heidegger 1961): “I am as it were a middle point between God and nothingness [medium quid inter Deum et nihil], situated in other words in such a way between the supreme being and non-being [inter summum ens et non ens] that, in truth, there is nothing to be found in me that could lead me into error, inasmuch as a supreme being has made me; but...if I consider myself as partaking in some way of nothingness or non-being, that is to say as I am not myself the supreme being, I find myself vulnerable to an infinity of lapses” (Meditatio IV). Pascal* took note of this new problematics in his Pensées in order to describe man’s relationship both to God and to nature: “What is man in nature? A nothingness with respect to the infinite*, an everything with respect to nothingness, a middle point between nothing and everything.” What is at stake in the possibility of error is nothing less than liberty, in other words subjectivity as a matter of “leaving it to oneself” (Heidegger 1961). With Sein und Zeit (1927) and Was ist Metaphysik? (1929), Heidegger started from the analysis of anguish, the affect that most fundamentally reveals nothingness, to illuminate the intrinsic connection between nothingness and human existence: “Nothingness is the condition which makes possible the revelation of the extant as such for the Dasein” (1929).

It is not clear whether contemporary spiritual* theology recognizes annihilation, or whether the concept of nothingness remains relevant to present-day speculative theology. At the very least its history shows that for Christianity the attribution to God of the concept of being has never ceased to be problematical.

- Parmenides (c. 475 B.C.), Poem.
- Gorgias (c. 440 B.C.), Treatise on Non Being.

- Plato (c. 368 B.C.), Parmenides.
 Clement of Alexandria (c. A.D. 200), Stromata.
 Augustine (399), De natura boni; (406–407), Tractatus in Joh. ev.; (401–414), De Genesi ad litteram.
 Dionysius the Pseudo-Areopagite (c. 480–500), Divine Names; Mystical Theology; Works.
 John of Scythopolis (before 530), On Dionysian Corpus.
 Maximus The Confessor (c. 630), Mystagogia; Ambigua.
 John the Scot Eriugena (864–866), De divisione naturae.
 M. Porète (†1310), Le Mirouer des simples âmes, Speculum simplicium animarum, CChrCM 69 (Turnhout, 1986).
 Anon. (mid-14th century), The Cloud of Unknowing.
 Nicholas of Cusa (1440), De docta ignorantia.
 C. de Bovelles (1501, 1510–1511), Ars oppositorum, Paris; (1510–1511), Liber de nihilo, Paris.
 Harphius (1538), Theologia mystica, Köln.
 C. Timpler (1604), Metaphysicae systema methodicum, Steinfurt.
 B. de Canfeld (1610), Regula perfectionis, Köln.
 R. Goclenius (1613), Lexicon philosophicum, Frankfurt (new edition, Hildesheim, 1980).
 R. Descartes (1641), Meditationes de prima philosophia... Paris.
 J. Clauberg (1647, 3rd ed., 1664), Metaphysica de ente, quae rectius Ontosophia... Groningue (new edition in Opera omnia philosophica, Amsterdam, 1691, and Hildesheim, 1965), 2 vols.
 M. Schoock (1661), Tractatus philosophicus de nihilo, Groningen.
 C. Wolff (1728), Philosophia rationalis sive logica, Leipzig (reprinted Hildesheim 1983); (1736), Philosophia prima sive Ontologia, Frankfurt and Leipzig (reprinted Hildesheim, 1977).
 A.G. Baumgarten (1739), Metaphysica (new edition Hildesheim, 1963).
 E. Kant (1781), Kritik der reinen Vernunft (Critique of Pure Reason), Riga.
 G. W.F. Hegel (1817), Wissenschaft der Logik, Berlin.
 F.W.J. Schelling (1841–42), Philosophie der Offenbarung, Stuttgart, 1861.
- M. Heidegger (1927), Sein und Zeit, Tübingen
 M. Heidegger (1929), Was ist Metaphysik?, Frankfurt, GA 9, 103–122.
 J.-P. Sartre (1943), L'être et le néant, Paris.
 ♦ E. Cassirer (1927), Individuum und Cosmos in der Philosophie der Renaissance, Berlin.
 A. O. Lovejoy (1936), The Great Chain of Being, Cambridge, MA.
 J. Orcibal (1959), La rencontre du Carmel thérésien avec les mystiques du Nord, Paris.
 É. Gilson (1948), L'être et l'essence, Paris (2nd Ed. 1981).
 J. Vanneste (1959), Le mystère de Dieu Essai sur la structure rationnelle de la doctrine mystique du Pseudo-Denys l'Aréopagite, Louvain.
 M. Heidegger (1961), Nietzsche, Pfullingen, 2 vols.
 L. Cagnet (1966), La spiritualité moderne, Paris.
 E. zum Brunn (1969), Le dilemme de l'être et du néant chez saint Augustin, Paris.
 Coll. (1978), Dieu et l'être: Exégèses d'Exode 3:14 et de Coran 20:11–24, Paris.
 P. Courcelle (1974), "Connais-toi toi-même" de Socrate à saint Bernard, Paris, 3 vols.
 A. Jäger (1980), "Gott: das Nichts als ens realissimum," in his Gott: 10 Thesen, Tübingen.
 A. Gouhier (1982), "Néant," DSp 11, 64–80.
 J.-L. Marion (1982), Dieu sans l'être, Paris.
 Th. Kobusch (1984), "Nichts, Nichtseiendes," HWP 6, 805–836 (bibl.).
 J.-F. Courtine (1990), Suarez et le système de la métaphysique, Paris.
 P. Magnard (1992), Le Dieu des philosophes, Paris.

VINCENT CARRAUD

See also Being; Bérulle, Pierre de; Creation; Dionysius the Pseudo-Areopagite; God; Heidegger, Martin; Incarnation; Infinite; John of the Cross; Kenosis; Mysticism; Negative Theology; Platonism, Christian; Rhineland-Flemish Mysticism

Novatianism

The Novatian schism* lastingly affected the early Church*. After the edict of Decius in late 249, requiring all subjects of the Roman Empire to honor the gods, and the ensuing wave of persecution, the Church had to deal with the question of the many lapsi, members of the clergy or laity* who asked to rejoin the Christian community after having apostatized. In 251, Cornelius was elected bishop* of Rome*, and with him the party of clemency won out. The correspondence on this question between Cornelius and Bishop Cyprian* of Carthage indicates the role played by the bishop of Rome in defining the attitude to adopt toward the lapsi (Ep. 49 and 50, letters to Cyprian included in Cyprian's correspondence; Ep. 55 from Cyprian).

Novatian was at the time an influential Roman priest whose theological works were thoroughly orthodox (he is noteworthy as the author of the first treatise on the Trinity* in Latin), but against Cornelius and Cyprian he represented a rigid position influenced by Montanism*. With ecclesiology* and ethics* calling for the same firmness, Novatian and his disciples refused penance* for the lapsi, as for adulterers. In response to the election of Cornelius, Novatian also had himself elected pope by his supporters, initiating the schism. He was joined in Rome by some members of the clergy of Africa, including Novat (the two names Novat and Novatian were often confused by writers in antiquity), and both were excommunicated by a council called by Cyprian in 251. Indeed, it was their combined opposition to Cyprian and Cornelius that brought the supporters of the two men together, because Novat had at first been noted for excessive indulgence toward the lapsi.

The Novatian Church was then established and its influence spread in the West, in the African Church (Cyprian wrote his treatise, The Unity of the Catholic Church, against the Novatianists), and as far as Asia Minor. In the late-fourth century, Ambrose* of Milan attacked the Novatianists in his treatise on penance (SC 179). Like the Montanists and Donatists with whom they have frequently been associated, the Novatianists, the “pure” (katharoi) as they called themselves, expressed one of the recurring questions of the early Church: are the perfect the only ones worthy to be a part of the Church? The conflict also marks a stage in the development of the recognition of the role of the bishop of Rome.

- H. Weyer (Ed.) (1962), Novatianus, De Trinitate: über den dreifaltigen Gott, Darmstadt.
- G. F. Diercks (Ed.) (1972), Novatiani opera, CChr.SL 4.
- ♦ H. J. Vogt (1968), Coetus Sanctorum: Der Kirchenbegriff des Novatian und die Geschichte seiner Sonderkirche, Bonn.
- H. J. Vogt (1990), “Novatien,” DECA, 1777–79.
- Ch. Munier (1991), Autorité épiscopale et sollicitude pastorale, Ier-VIe s., Aldershot.
- M. Simonetti (1993), Studi sulla cristologia del II e III secolo, Rome.

FRANÇOISE VINEL

See also Catharism; Donatism; Martyrdom; Tertullian

Obligation

In moral theology*, the concept of a command of God* functions either to indicate the ultimate origin of moral obligation, or to determine its content, or to provide a means by which we come to know what it requires of us. It does not explain the concept of obligation as such.

a) What It Is That Obliges. For materialists such as Hobbes (1588–1679), obligation is reducible to the instinct for survival. What obliges us is the fear of pain and death*. When enlightened by prudence*, our instinct will lead us to enter into mutually advantageous contracts with other people, but whatever obligations such contracts entail, they are secondary and instrumental to the primary obligation to avoid death.

Theologians standing in the teleological tradition of Augustine* and Thomas* Aquinas also regard moral obligation as reducible but not to a nonmoral category. They hold that, beyond fearing death, human beings naturally desire to pursue good* and that the preservation of life is only one of a range of goods, which also includes such things as friendship and knowledge of the truth*. Proportionalists (proportionalism*) such as R. A. McCormick argue that our basic obligation is to realize as many goods as much as possible and, if need be, to promote some at the expense of others. Other writers (e.g., John Finnis and Germain Grisez) argue that our basic obligation is not to intend harm to any good. In either case, the binding force of obligation is reducible not only to the terror of death or to any desire but specifically to the desire to maintain and promote goods.

However, those moral theologians who stand in the deontological tradition of Kant* contend that obligation is not reducible at all: it is entirely sui generis. What binds us is not desire or inclination but sheer respect for the moral law*; or, better, what binds us is the intrinsic authority of the law, which elicits our respect. (Barth*'s emphasis on obedience to God's command may fairly be read as a theological version of this position.) For Kantians, one cannot therefore reduce moral obligation to a nonmoral desire. However, they leave unanswered the question, Why should we respect the moral law?; for them, the question is, moreover, immoral, and to ask it is simply to withhold recognition of the law's nature as an axiom of practical reason*.

Nevertheless, the question does seem a reasonable one. The fact that it is perfectly intelligible to ask of any law, What purpose does it serve?, suggests that law is not in and of itself axiomatic. Let us take two of Kant's formulations of the "categorical imperative": "Act only according to that maxim by which you can at the same time will that it should become a universal law" and "Act so that you treat humanity, whether in your own person or that of another, always as an end and never as a means only" (Foundations, section 2). These prescriptions are, in fact, intelligible only as specifications of respect for certain goods that they presuppose, the good of being reasonable and the good of “humanity,” or, more precisely, the moral autonomy of the human individual.

Obligation

b) Subjective and Objective Obligation. The distinction between the objective aspect and the subjective aspect of obligation is made most forcibly by Kant, who makes the subjective aspect crucial. “Duty” refers not so much to particular acts that we are obliged to perform as to the motive for the right or good action; and it is the motive that determines the act’s moral quality. Moral goodness resides only in that principle of will that acts out of respect for the moral law, that is, out of “a sense of duty.” Kant understood his theory to explain the commonsense judgment that someone who performs his objective duty (e.g., caring for his elderly parents) out of a selfish motive (greed for a legacy) deserves no credit. In order to be morally praiseworthy, we must act not only as duty requires but also because duty requires it.

Motivation also mattered a great deal to Aquinas, who argues that we should always do as our conscience* instructs, even when it is erroneous (STh Ia IIae, q. 19, a. 5). We should always do what we mistakenly think is right rather than contradict our moral understanding. In placing such emphasis on the subjective perception of obligation, both Aquinas and Kant signal the high importance that they ascribe to the virtue of the moral agent, although Aquinas discriminates between the subjective moral quality of the agent and the objective moral quality of his act. For him, conscience is necessarily related to the objective order of morality.

At the opposite extreme are the consequentialists, for whom all that matters is that one fulfills one’s objective obligation to perform the act that will affect the greater proportion of good in a given set of circumstances.

c) Conflicts of Obligations. There are cases where prima facie obligations—such as keeping promises, telling the truth, and not harming others—are in conflict and where no one act can possibly fulfill them all. In such a case, one’s obligation must be determined by which obligation is the more important. Quite how such an estimate is to be made is not clear. Of those who have posed this problem, W. D. Ross (1877–1940), refuses to admit any hierarchy of duties and places his faith in intuition (The Right and the Good, Oxford, 1930). Consequentialists, on the other hand, resolve the problem by acknowledging only one obligation—namely, to perform that act whose consequences are most beneficial—and by calculating which act that is. However, critics of consequentialism such as Grisez and Finnis argue that this calculation has only the appearance of reason and that cases where meeting one obligation (e.g., telling the truth) involves failing to meet another (e.g., not harming others) should be resolved by taking as a basic obligation that of not intending harm and then applying the principle of double effect (intention*).

Some philosophers prefer to distinguish between obligation and duty. “Duty” is taken to refer to an obligation entailed by our role in an institution, a role that we may not have chosen—for example, the duties of parents toward their children and of children toward their parents. One of the contrasts, then, between duty and obligation is between what is natural and what is contractual. Another is between what is personal and partial and what is impersonal and impartial. The issue here is whether duties to family* or fellow countrymen take priority over obligations to strangers.

d) God’s Reason as the Ultimate Ground of Obligation. In moral theology, the ground of obligation is located in God. If it is located in God’s reason, then it will be mediated to human beings through conscience’s grasp of the moral order or natural law by which God has structured created reality and that reflects the eternal law of God’s own mind. Obligation will then be understood in terms of the pursuit of certain natural ends (Aquinas) or conformity to the axioms of practical reason (Kant).

Within this metaethical scheme, the commands of God in the Bible*—especially the Decalogue*—are restatements of what the created moral order requires. According to Aquinas, such restatement is necessary on account of the obscurity into which sin* casts the moral understanding. By contrast, according to Kant, whose confidence in the capacities of practical reason was supreme, revealed morality is redundant: the teaching and example of Jesus* should be measured against the norms of reason, not vice versa (Foundations, section 2).

e) God’s Will as the Ultimate Ground of Obligation. Some theologians have preferred to locate the foundation of obligation in God’s will. Our moral obligations are established by divine commands. These are found preeminently in the Bible though sometimes also in occasional utterances by the Holy* Spirit. There are several lines of argument in this type of voluntarism*: that the will transcends reason; that, since God is omnipotent, he cannot be constrained by laws and is free to command as he wills; that there is a need to account for passages in the Bible where God commands something immoral—most famously, that Abraham should sacrifice his son (Gn 22:1–19); that there is a need to disturb the complacency or rigidity of an ethical rationalism* that pretends to absolute comprehensiveness; or that there is a need to assert the importance of responsibility and authenticity against moral conformism. The first three factors inspire the voluntarist metaethic and the ethics of divine command characteristic of John Duns* Scotus, William of Ockham (1284/85–1349), and, through Ockham, of Luther*. The last two factors were the predominant influences on Kierkegaard* (see Fear and Trembling, OC 5, pp. 97–109) and Barth (KD II/2).

There are four main objections to this type of ethics. First, God's sovereignty requires him to be free only of external constraints, not of the internal order of his own reason; second, an ethics of command does not take adequate account of the first person of the Trinity*, the Father* or Creator; third, the biblical passages in which God is presented as commanding something immoral can be accounted for as expressions of a theology not yet sufficiently enlightened by Jesus Christ; and, fourth, if God can trump moral reason arbitrarily, by what criteria can we discriminate between a command of God and a wicked whim?

f) God's Commands in the Bible. Whereas Catholicism has regarded biblical prescriptions as an auxiliary means of apprehending our moral obligations, Protestants have tended to regard them as the primary means. Some Calvinists (Calvinism*) and Lutherans (Lutheranism*) have made the Ten Commandments (Ex 20:1–17; Dt 5:6–21) the basis of their ethics (e.g., the Loci communes theologici of John Gerhardt [1582–1637]). On the other hand, Anabaptists (e.g., John H. Yoder and Stanley Hauerwas) have thought it more appropriate for a Christian ethic to take its moral norms from the gospel* and from the example of Christ*. Barth, whose ethics shares this Christocentric focus, is wary of the moralistic and legalistic effects of attending too soon to moral prescriptions and insists that both the Decalogue and the Sermon on the Mount be interpreted in the larger context of the history of salvation*.

g) God's Commands in the Church. Counter-Reformation Catholicism saw Protestantism*'s affirmation of the right to private interpretation of Scripture as a factor of anarchy and strongly affirmed the role of the magisterium (the Church's teaching authority) in moral as well as theological matters. Under pressure from the strife kindled by Jansenism* and from the threats posed by the Enlightenment, the French Revolution, and Napoleon, this authority became increasingly concentrated in episcopal and papal hands. According to some conservative theories of the magisterium (e.g., Grisez's), certain episcopal and papal pronouncements, interpreting natural or revealed morality, are so immune from criticism and require such deference as to carry an authority difficult to distinguish in practice from that of God himself. An alternative ecclesiology*, more Pauline*, more Protestant, and perhaps more in line with Vatican* II (see Gaudium et Spes), sees the Church as a community rather than a hierarchy* and thinks that the knowledge of God's commandments is disseminated by dialogue rather than by official pronouncements.

However, the process of dialogue and the exercise of authority should not be regarded as alternatives. Dialogue seldom achieves consensus, and when it is about basic moral problems, it ought not to be resolved simply in favor of majority opinion. Therefore, persons of recognized expertise and wisdom* need to be vested with the authority to make judgments and to define what the Church believes God's commands to be. Nevertheless, if such judgments are to be made responsibly, it is arguable that they will always follow honest consideration of contrary opinion and remain open to the possibility of future revision, should reason require it.

- W.A. Pickard Cambridge (1932), "Two Problems about Duty," Mind 41, 72–96, 145–72, 311–40.
- G.E. Hughes (1944), "Motive and Duty," Mind 53, 314–31.
- B. Brandt (1964), "The Concept of Obligation and Duty," Mind 73, 374–93.
- J. Henriot (1967), Existence et obligation, Paris.
- G. Outka (1973), "Religion and Moral Duty: Notes on 'Fear and Trembling,'" in G. Outka, J.P. Reeder (Ed.), Religion and Morality, New York, 204–54.
- O. Nell [O'Neill] (1975), Acting on Principle: An Essay in Kantian Ethics, New York.
- P.L. Quinn (1978), Divine Commands and Moral Requirements, Oxford.
- J.M. Idziak (Ed.) (1979), Divine Command Morality: Historical and Contemporary Readings, New York.
- J. Finnis (1980), Natural Law and Natural Rights, Oxford.
- P. Plé (1980), Par devoir ou par plaisir?, Paris.
- P. Helm (Ed.) (1981), Divine Commands and Morality, Oxford.
- A.B. Wolter (1986), Duns Scotus on the Will and Morality, Washington, D.C.
- N. Biggar (1993), The Hastening That Waits: Karl Barth's Ethics, Oxford.

NIGEL BIGGAR

See also Authority; Ethics; Law; Liberty

Ockham, William of. See Nominalism

Olivi, Peter John (Olieu, Pierre Jean). See Bonaventure; Millenarianism

Omnipotence, Divine

a) Omnipotent or All-Powerful? Judaism* is founded on the memory of God*'s power: "By strength of hand, the Lord has brought you out from this place" (Ex 13:3). He can save his chosen people everywhere and do what he wants for them. Israel*'s strength lies in God (Gn 32:29), for YHWH is the only Omnipotent: From him comes the Creation*, the election*, the victory (Dt 4:32–39). This sovereign universal power is free—"he does whatsoever he pleases" (Ps 115:3; see also Is 46:10)—but it is a loving power (Ps 86:15–17). This power intervenes in history* and controls the planets and all the forces in the universe.

In the Hebrew Bible*, God is given the names Sabaoth—"the Lord of hosts, the God of the armies of Israel" (1 Sm 17:45)—and El-Shaddai ("Habitant of the Mountains"; Gn 17:1), translated in the Greek Septuagint as pantokratôr ("all-powerful") in 170 occurrences. Thus, the divine force is presented as a free power that dominates (kratein) everything (to pan), combining the initiative of salvation* and the power that maintains the cosmos*. Numerous texts proclaim God's sovereignty over everything. "Lord, Lord, all-powerful King, the universe is in thy power, and no one can challenge thee . . . for thou hast made the heavens and the earth" (Est 4:17 b). The saving power creates, preserves, and destroys. "Nothing is too hard" for God (Gn 18:14 and Jer 32:17; see also Lk 1:37). But divine will is not arbitrary; it yields before the power it has granted to man (Gn 19:22). Thus, the All Mighty becomes God's proper name*: "All Mighty is his name" (Ex 15:3, Vulgate). In the New Testament, this name has a liturgical function. Hymns of praise recall the pact with God, his paternity, his reign, his eternity* (once in 2 Cor 6:18 and nine times in Revelations). There he speaks in an eschatological context, to regulate the world for Christ*'s Easter glorification.

The term pantokratôr occurs in the earliest of the creeds. It passes from the Old Testament to the Christian liturgy* to mean the only God, Father* of his people* and of the world*. Since all the other occurrences of the term pantokratôr are posterior to the Septuagint (Montevicchi 1957), it is useless to look there for a cosmological principle inherited from philosophy*. It is more worthwhile to list the varied uses of kratein. Followed by the genitive it means "to rein, to dominate": Pantokratôr equals Lord of the universe; followed by the accusative it means instead "to hold in one's power, to seize" (Mk 1:31). God penetrates to the heart of everything by means of his power. A Stoic connotation, meaning the maintenance of the world by Providence*, a comparison with Plato's demigod, preserving what he creates (Timaeus 41 a), and its close connections to Zeus pankratês ("who upholds everything"), to Jupiter omnipotens, rerum omnium potens, make omnipotence gravitate toward the second meaning.

For Theophilus of Antioch, God was the creator, “but he is called pantokratôr because he holds (kratei) and embraces everything (ta panta)” (I, 4, 64; see Epistle to Diognetus, 7, 2, p. 66). Omnipotence slants the generation of the Son and the creation of the world toward God’s transmission of his glory* to the resurrected Christ: “In fact it is through his Son that the Father is omnipotent” (Origen*, Princ., 1, 2, 10). The term thus includes the cosmic function (adopted from the Hellenic heritage) in a Trinitarian synthesis: “When we hear the name of pantokratôr; our thought is that God maintains everything in existence” (Gregory of Nyssa, Contra Eunomium 2, 126, 366). The link should thus be made between biblical omnipotence (Almightiness, power over everything) and philosophical omnipotence (Greek pantodunamos, able to do everything; Geach 1973).

The controversies over the Trinity modified its meaning: God’s paternity is focused on the engendering of the Son (Filiation*), so much so that omnipotence expresses the identity between the God of the prophets*, whose name is All-Mighty, and the Father of the Lord. Since the act of creation was no longer evoked by the paternity, it was added as a development of omnipotence: “creator of heaven and earth” (Kelly 1950). Contrary to the Arians, who restricted omnipotence to the Father alone, Athanasius* gave a reminder of Christ’s universal reign: “Omnipotent is the Father and omnipotent is the son” (Letter to Serapion 2, 611). Then omnipotence became an attribute* common to the three Persons*. The symbol Quicumque became its radical echo: “All powerful is the Father, all powerful is the Son, all powerful is the Spirit; and yet there are not three all-powerful persons, but a single Omnipotent one” (DS 75). Nonetheless, Christ pantokratôr remains at the center of the Byzantine churches’ iconographic program (Capizzi 1964).

Latin distinguishes precisely two attributes: omnitenens and omnipotens (Augustine*, Confessions XI, 13, 15; CSEL 33, 290), the first, omnitenens, coined to translate pantokratôr (Pseudo-Tertullian, Carmen adversus Marcionem V, 9, 5, 1089 A), while omnipotens translates pantodunamos and refers to “the power to do all things”—“who is omnipotent if not he who can do everything?” (The Trinity IV, 20, 27; 197). But usage would give omnipotentia both meanings, as D. Petau would already know (1644, reedition 1885). A new problem arose from this equivocal meaning: God can do what he wills, but “he cannot die, he cannot sin, he cannot lie, he cannot make a mistake” (Augustine, Enchiridion 24, 96). Can he really do everything? Origen answered already: “God can do everything that he can do without ceasing to be God, to be good, to be wise.” One should particularly not understand “that he can even do unjust things but he does not want to.” “Neither can God perpetrate an injustice, for the power to commit an injustice is contrary to his divinity and to his omnipotence”—his nature entails the absolute impossibility of committing evil, and that does not depend on his will (Against Celsus 3, 70; 158–61). Augustine’s reply soon came: “All that, he cannot do it, for if he could, he would not be omnipotent” (Enchiridion 24, 96, 100). Omnipotence should be seen not as an isolated attribute but as that of the good God, who would cease to be himself if he ceased to be good, immortal, and so on. “If God can be what he does not want to be, he is not omnipotent” (PL 38, 1068; see Sermons 213 and 214).

b) Middle Ages: Absolute Power and Well-Ordered Power. In the Middle Ages divine omnipotence was a fact held in common by all the revealed religions, including Islam (Koran 46, 32). Reacting against God’s submission to Good* and considering every attribute in itself, medieval theology* demanded that divine power should be asserted as infinite* to the highest degree (Peter Lombard, Sentences I, d. 43, §1). Believing that God’s power was limited by his goodness or his will would amount to denying him certain perfections. Countering Jerome (Ep. 22:5; 150), Peter Damien thought that God could make a deflowered virgin a virgin again; he could even cause it to be that something that had existed had not existed, for instance, that Rome* had never existed. Abelard stressed the necessary conformity of God’s works with good, to the point of asserting that God could do only what he did do and that he could not make the world better than he made it. He was condemned, and Peter Lombard’s Sentences criticized him severely (Boulnois 1994).

For Anselm, Christ did not sin and was incapable of wanting to sin because he did not want to, having himself placed these restrictions on himself; there were, therefore, things that God could do but that he had refused to do (Cur Deus homo? 2,5. 10. 17; see Courtenay 1984). The foundation was thus laid for a distinction between absolute power—what God can do, within the scope of his power taken in the strict sense, but what he does not do—and well-ordered power—what God has freely chosen to do and that he knows through his prescience (Pseudo-Hugo of Saint Victor, Quaestiones in epistolam ad Romanos q. 91, 457; Hugo of Saint-Cher, Sentences, Boulnois 1994).

The 13th-century authors tackled anew this purely logical opposition between pure absolute power and God’s ordered autorestriction of this power. A new paradigm, often attributed to nominalism* but derived from John Duns* Scotus and interpreted by means of a political model, appeared in the 14th century: ordered power is the autorestriction of the law*; absolute power is the power to act de facto by making an exception to the law. Henceforth, absolute power changed from being an abstract concept to become an operational one that invaded every field of thought—cosmology, morality, and theology. The present order could always be suspended by a divine intervention. God could lie, deceive, and demand that man hate him. The world lost its order and God his intelligibility.

c) Modern Contemporary Period: The Sovereign and the Watchmaker. Luther's attacks destroyed the distinction between absolute power and well-ordered power: "I call God's omnipotence not that power through which he does not do many things that he could do, but that real power by which he does absolutely everything powerfully, in the same way as the Scriptures call his omnipotence" (De servo arbitrio, WA 18, 718). Either God is subservient to destiny (fatum), just like the pagan gods, or God knows the future and is all-powerful, and in that case man can do nothing—human freedom and divine omnipotence are contradictory. Absolute power took on a political meaning and meant the absolute power of the prince. Thus, the modern period hesitates between two models of power: the absolute ruler and the watchmaker subjected to the mechanisms of existence (E. Randi 1986).

Montaigne reasserted forcefully the omnipotence of God in comparison with mathematical truths (Essais II, 12), and Descartes* went so far as to suggest the creation of the eternal truths. On the other hand, Giordano Bruno fiercely rejected the existence of an absolute power belonging to God that would extend further than the necessary order of nature* (De immenso III, 1, Opera I, 1, 320). For Spinoza, well-ordered power was the equivalent of God's ordinary power—that is, the necessity of nature (Cogitata metaphysica II, 9).

Modern metaphysics fell into the aporia of God either as the watchmaker, subservient to the order of the world (deism*), or as the arbitrary sovereign. In reaction to that, contemporary thought distrusts omnipotence. Karl Barth* gives the reminder that omnipotence is commanded by divine election. Process* theology, and H. Jonas in Jewish thought, frankly denies omnipotence. Should the baby be thrown out with the bathwater? It is perhaps enough to become sober, to remember that power is always controlled by charity and that it is allied to human powerlessness through Christ's self-abasement. That view would simply be a return to the biblical and Patristic meaning, in which God is "Lord of all," which does not precisely mean "capable of doing anything whatsoever."

- Athanasius, Epistle to Serapion, SC 15.
- Augustine, Confessions, CSEL 33; De Trinitate, CChr.SL 50; Enchiridion, CChr.SL 46, 49–114.
- Theophilus of Antioch, Epistle to Diognetus, SC 33 bis.
- Gregory of Nyssa, Contra Eunomium, Ed. W.J. Jaeger, GNO II, Leiden, 1960.
- Ps.-Hugues de Saint-Victor, Quaestiones in epistulam ad Romanos, PL 175, 431–514.
- P. Damien, Lettre sur la toute-puissance divine, SC 191.
- Origen, First Principles, Ed. Koetschau, Berlin, 1913.
- [Ps.]-Tertullian, Carmen adversus Marcionem, PL 2, 1051–90.
- ♦ D. Petau (1644–50), Dogmata theologica I, new Ed. J.-B. Fournials, Paris, 1865–67.
- K. Barth (1940), KD II/1, 587–685 (Dogmatique, vol. 7, Geneva, 1957, 243–363).
- J.N.D. Kelly (1950), Early Christian Creeds, London, 1972³.
- H. Hommel (1956), Schöpfer und Erhalter, Berlin.
- O. Montevicchi (1957), Pantokrator, Studi in onore di A. Calderini e R. Paribeni, Milan, 401–32.
- P. Biard (1960), La parole de Dieu, Paris.
- C. Capizzi (1964), Pantokrator, Rome.
- H. Jonas (1968), "The Concept of God after Auschwitz," Out of the Whirlwind, Ed. A.H. Friedländer, New York.
- D.L. Holland (1969), "Pantokratôr in New Testament and Creed," StEv 6, 256–66.
- M.F. Lacan (1970), "Puissance," VThB 2 (1988⁶), 1060–68.
- M.-A. Pernoud (1972), "The Theory of the potentia Dei according to Aquinas, Scotus and Ockham," Anton. 47, 69–95.
- P.T. Geach (1973), "Omnipotence," Phil. 43, 7–20.
- T. Gregory (1974), "Dio ingannatore e genio maligno: Note in margine alle "Meditationes" di Descartes," GCFI 54, 477–516.
- K. Bannach (1975), Die Lehre von der doppelten Macht Gottes bei Ockham, Wiesbaden.
- A. de Halleux (1977), "Dieu le Père tout-puissant," repr. in Patrologie et acuminisme, Louvain, 1990, 68–89.
- F. Bergamelli (1984), "Sulla storia del termine Pantokratôr dalle inizi fino a Teofilo di Antiochia," Sal 46, 439–72.
- W. Courtenay (1984), Covenant and Causality in Medieval Thought, London.
- F. Oakley (1984), Omnipotence, Covenant and Order: An Excursion in the Theory of Ideas from Abaelard to Leibniz, Ithaca-London.
- A. Funkenstein (1986), Theology and Scientific Imagination from the Late Middle Ages to the XVIIth Century, Princeton.
- E. Randi (1986), Il sovrano e l'orologiaio: Due immagini di Dio nel dibattito sulla potentia absoluta, fra XII e XIV secolo, Florence.
- W. Courtenay (1990), Capacity and Volition: A History of the Distinction of Absolute and Ordained Power, Bergamo.
- G. van den Brink (1993), Almighty God: A Study of the Doctrine of Divine Omnipotence, Kampen.
- O. Boulnois (Ed.) (1994), La puissance et son ombre, Paris.
- J.-P. Batut (1998), Pantocrator, "Dieu le Père tout-puissant": Recherche sur une expression de la foi dans les théologies antécédentes, thesis, University of Paris IV and Institut catholique de Paris.

OLIVIER BOULNOIS

See also Attribute, Divine; Eternity of God; Images; Immutability/Impassibility; Justice, Divine; Knowledge, Divine; Omnipresence, Divine; Scholasticism; Simplicity, Divine

Omnipresence, Divine

a) Concept and Definition. Many forms of presence are attributed to God* in theology*: presence (“habitation”) in the soul* of the just, presence in Christ*, presence of Christ in the Eucharist* and in the Church*. The term “omnipresence” conveys an idea of divine ubiquity: the presence of the Creator, as first cause, throughout his creation*.

In Christianity this ubiquity is not, strictly speaking, defined; it appears in the notion of divine immensity (Symb. Ath., DS 75): God cannot be localized (incapabilis) or circumscribed (incircumscriptus) (Conc. Lat. 649, DS 504, with regard to Christ according to his divinity). Vatican* I (COD 805, 33–34) adopted the terms of Thomas* Aquinas (ST Ia, q. 8, a. 2) when he comments on Peter Lombard’s concept of omnipresence per potentiam, praesentiam, essentiam, by power, by presence, by essence (see infra, d.).

The 46th of the 99 names* given to God by Islamic thinkers (al-Djurdjani, Sharasthani) is the Omnipresent (al-wasi).

b) Sources in Scripture. The Old Testament speaks of the presence of God in creation and with his people* without making a clear distinction. God is said to be immense (Bar 3, 25), present in all parts of the world that he fills. This is noted particularly in Psalms 138:7–12, the text most often cited in theological tradition*, and carried over into line 115 of the II surat of the Koran (Nm 39; Jer 23:24; Is 6:2; Wis 1:4); his grandeur surpasses the world (Jb 11:8–9; 1 Kgs 8:27). Elsewhere, he makes a promise of his presence to the Fathers (Gn 17:7, 26:24, 28:15), to Moses (Ex 3:12, 39:4), to Joshua and the judges (Jos 1:5; Jgs 6:16; 1 Sm 3:19), to the kings and prophets* (2 Sm 7:9; 2 Kgs 18:7; Jer 1:8–19), and to humanity in the announcement of Emmanuel (Is 7:14; Ps 46:8).

The doctrine is not directly present in the New Testament; it is expressed in such a way that the divine omnipresence is limited to a presence within every human being (Acts 17:28; 1 Cor 15:28). Jesus* also makes a promise to abide with the disciples (Mt 28:20; Lk 22:30, 23:42), with those who pray in his name (Mt 18:20). He lives in those who have faith* (Gal 2:20; Eph 3:17), even if his corporeal absence is preferable (Jn 16:7). He will be all in all (1 Cor 13, 12). His presence for all believers (Rev 3:20) is not limited to any people (Col 3:11) or place (Jn 4:21). The hymnal fragment of Ephesians 4:6 is a chant about “a unique God and father of everything who is above all, through all, and in all”; the hymn in Colossians 1:15–18 is a chant to Christ “in whom everything subsists”; this is the scriptural text that particularly nourished the meditation of Teilhard of Chardin.

c) First Elaboration by the Fathers. The omnipresence of the first Principle was not thematized in Greek thought. The Stoicists represented a material God diffused like a fluid throughout the universe (SVF II, 306–8). But Plotinus’s concept, directed against the Stoicists, had a stronger influence on the patristic tradition because it was compatible with the idea of the omnipresence of the incorporeal and immutable (present in a place but without movement to lead it there), that is, the omnipresence of the soul to the body and of being* to the totality of beings (Enn. VI, 4 and 5).

For the Fathers*, the attribution of omnipresence answered the need to keep God limitless but entailed a danger of pantheism*, which the Stoicists apparently did not resist.

The Greek Fathers (first mention in Clement of Rome, who cites Ps 138, Epistle to the Corinthians, c. 28, nos. 1–4) articulated their thought on omnipresence around the notion of divine immensity: God escapes all limits (aperigraphos), all measure (ametretos), all location (akhôrêtos). Origen* reviewed all the biblical expressions that assign a place to God (PG 11, 485–86 D). He argued for divine incorporeity: “incorporeal” is used in the sense of “without body” (SC 252, 86–97). The dialogue with the Samaritan woman (Jn 4:24) clearly shows that God is spirit. All of these themes were pursued, notably by Gregory* of Nyssa in Against Eunomius III (PG 45, 603), thereafter frequently cited. John Damascene devoted a chapter of Orthodox Faith (I 13, PG 94, 869) to the question. He contributed to Scholasticism* a doctrine formulated with an Aristotelian vocabulary in which corporeal place is distinguished from spiritual place, the latter being the space where a spirit is manifest; God alone, among all spirits, manifests his power in all places (852 C -853 A). The Latin tradition interpreted this as meaning that God is not circumscriptively present (like a body in a corporeal place) or definitively present (like a spirit manifest in a place) but fully present (because he contains all things in all places).

The Latin Fathers inherited the Greek determination of omnipresence based on immensity, but their thought was more strongly influenced by the Stoicist concept of corporeality. Though Tertullian*, Hilary*, and Ambrose* (PL 16, 552) all emphasized the presence of God altogether in all places (Deus ubique totus), they did not always eschew Stoic images of liquid or luminous fluid penetrating all things. Once freed of these images, which he had employed during his Manichean period (Confessions I, 2 and 3), Augustine* formulated the most developed doctrine of omnipresence given by any of the Latins. In the letter to Dardanus (Letter 187), which he himself called “letter on divine omnipresence” (n. 11–21), he added to the precedent themes a derivation of omnipresence from divine creative causality. Along with Gregory* the Great, he was the authority most cited by the Scholastics.

d) Scholastics. It is nonetheless erroneous to attribute to Gregory, via the Song of Songs Commentary (c. 5), the triad per potentiam, praesentiam, essentiam, as did all the medieval doctors after it was introduced by Peter Lombard (Sent. I, d. 37, c. 1). In fact the origin is unknown. These mysterious words, associated with diverse commentaries, constitute the most original contribution of the Scholastics, who developed the two foundations of omnipresence established by the Fathers: immensity and the causal relation between God and creatures. The former alone guarantees the substantial, eternal nature of omnipresence, while the latter connects it to the actual existence of creatures.

Hugh of Saint Victor’s teaching on the creative and preservative causality of God (PL 176, 825 C, 826 B, 828 C) was a significant contribution to the systematization of Augustine’s doctrine and is worthy of mention beside Anselm*’s speculations on the vocabulary of omnipresence (v. Monologion XX–XXIV). Arguing against Honorius of Autun’s assertion of a ubiquity potentialiter but a presence of God in heaven substantialiter (PL 172, 1111 C), Anselm affirmed that the omnipresence is substantial because God is substantially identical with his power.

Thirteenth-century authors pursued this development in their commentaries on Peter Lombard. Thomas Aquinas’s argument stands out because it is based on the principles of Aristotle’s physics (notably CG III, 68) instead of creative action. Its most outstanding positive characteristic is the integration of divine ubiquity into metaphysics of being. The mode of presence remains the traditional one of operation: God is said to be present in all things as the causal agent because he is the cause of being of everything. But this causality does not maintain the transcendence of the cause with regard to the effect because the participation ensures a certain immanence that reinforces the notion of presence. Between his commentary on the Sentences of Peter Lombard and his Somme théologique (Ia, q. 8, a. 1–2), Thomas changed his interpretation of Lombard’s triad and revived the explanation of Albert* the Great (In Sent. I, d. 37, a. 6). Thereafter he attached the presence per potentiam to divine government, the per praesentiam to divine science, and the per essentiam to the creation (and preservation).

e) Development of the Concept. Subsequent developments of the doctrine of omnipresence fit into the systematic framework of the Scholastics. It became a matter of intense debate in the Protestant movement with the ubiquity controversy (the eucharistic presence explained by the ubiquity of the risen body of Christ), which led to a long-term division between the Lutherans and the Reformed. A secular controversy in which Clarke and Newton were pitted against Leibniz* gave new life to this divine attribute, this time by questioning its attachment to space (which Newton clearly distinguished from God; see Funkenstein 1986).

The question of the presence (and absence) of God was carried over into contemporary theology and concretized by Barth* (KD II/1, 395–451) with a test of traditional developments on ubiquity. The localizations attributed to God in Scripture (heaven, the temple, the human heart, Jesus) should not be withdrawn, but these places are not all places of God to the same degree. Barth would seem to question the sharp distinction between different modes of presence (by nature, by grace, by union), seeing them as simply a distinction of degrees, culminating in Jesus. Catholic theology (Congar 1958) chooses to place greater emphasis on the Church, the body of Christ, as the privileged place of God.

- D. Petau (1644–50), Dogmata Theologica, L. III, c. VII–X (New Ed., Paris, 1865–67).
- M.J. Scheeben (1873–82), Handbuch der Katholischen Dogmatik II, §§240–50 (New Ed., GA 4, Fribourg, 1943).
- D. Kaufmann (1877), Geschichte der Attributenlehre in der jüdischen Religionsphilosophie des Mittelalters von Saadja bis Maimuni, Gotha.
- J. Thomas (1937–38), “L’omniprésence divine,” CDTor 33, 69–79.
- K. Barth (1940), Kirchliche Dogmatik II/1, Zurich, 495–551.
- A. Fuerst (1951), An Historical Study of the Doctrine of the Omnipresence of God in Selected Writings between 1220–1270, Washington, D.C.
- M. Frickel (1956), Deus totus ubique simul: Untersuchungen zur allgem. Gottgegenwart im Rahmen der Gotteslehre Gregors des Grossen, Fribourg.
- Y.M.-J. Congar (1958), Le Mystère du Temple, Paris.
- M.-F. Lacan (1970), “Présence de Dieu,” VThB 2, 1019–23.

- J. Stöhr (1971), "Allgegenwart Gottes," HWP 1, 162–63.
 I. Kolodziejczyk (1972), "L'ubiquité de Dieu per potentiam, praesentiam, essentiam selon l'ontologie de saint Thomas d'Aquin", DT(P) 75, 137–48.
 A. Funkenstein (1986), Theology and Scientific Imagination from the Late Middle Ages to the XVIIth Century, Princeton, N.J.
 D. Gimaret (1988), Les noms divins en islam, Paris.

E. Brito (1991), Dieu et l'être d'après Thomas d'Aquin et Hegel, Paris.

CYRILLE MICHON

See also Aseitas; Attributes, Divine; Eternity of God; Immutability/Impassibility; Justice, Divine; Knowledge, Divine; Mercy; Omnipotence, Divine; Simplicity, Divine

Omniscience, Divine. See Knowledge, Divine

Ontologism

1. The Problem

a) Concept. The word ontologism comes from the Introduzione (III, 53) by V. Gioberti (1801–52). Against psychologism, which subordinated being* to the idea and was thereby allied with relativism* and subjectivism, Gioberti claimed that his ideas had an ontological foundation. On this basis, ontologism asserts that only the intuitive knowledge* of God makes all other forms of real knowledge possible, for only God* truly is.

b) Risk of Pantheism. A doctrine of this kind might tend toward pantheism*, which led to Gioberti's works being put on the Index of Forbidden Books (1852), the prohibition against teaching seven ontologist propositions (1861), and, finally (1887), the criticism of 40 propositions taken from Rosmini (1797–1855). Were these challenges from Rome* aimed at a hidden pantheism in ontologism or at ontologism itself? Those who were called ontologists attacked pantheism in any event. Already in the 17th century, Nicholas Malebranche (1638–1715), from whom the ontologists claimed descent, had opposed Spinoza (1632–77). In the 19th century, Gioberti criticized figures who were influenced by German idealism, such as V. Cousin (1792–1867). In the 20th century, Pantaleo Carabellese (1877–1948), the last advocate of ontologism, wrote polemics against G. Gentile (1874–1944). In fact, if ontologism remains within certain limits, it does not eliminate the plurality of consciousnesses. The thesis of the vision in God, as set forth by Malebranche, does not imply that of the vision of God or that of the identity of the principles of the intellect with the divine essence.

2. In the 17th Century

a) Malebranche. For Malebranche (Entretiens V), the light that illuminates the mind comes not from the nature of weak and distracted man but from the Eternal. An extension of the argument attributes an active role in knowledge to "vision in God." "The mind can see what there is in God who represents created beings, since that is very spiritual, very intelligible, and very present to the mind" (Recherche... III, vi). This doctrine does not deny the distinction between natural knowledge (in God, in via) and beatific vision (of God, in patria). Vision in God is not of God.

b) Gerdil. In 1748, Cardinal H.-S. Gerdil (1718–1802) gave a more “ontologist” twist to Malebranche’s theses. All knowledge is an intelligible union with being. God is immediately perceived not in His ineffable essence but in His attribute* of “being.” Knowing what is thus consists in knowing God in His being, which is simple and infinite*. The infinity of the divine being is the basis for His action. Human knowledge is passive. Everything in it that is active comes from God. We therefore know only in and through the Creator.

3. 19th Century

a) In Italy. According to the Nuovo Saggio (1830) of A. Rosmini-Serbati, we become aware of indeterminate and universal being immediately and prior to any judgment. The idea of being is fragmented into modifications that arise at the time of its application to experience*. However, Rosmini objects to a conception in the “vision in God” that is too “ontologist,” like that of Malebranche. We see God not directly but rather mediated through the idea of being. (For Gioberti, on the other hand, the mediation of the idea of being is of no use, for in order to be foundational, an intuition must have something to do with the real, not with the possible.) By thus distinguishing between the idea of being and God, Rosmini in fact moves away from ontologism. According to followers of Rosmini, the criticism of 1887 (see the proposition that “in the order of the created, something of the divine, or that which belongs to the divine nature, is manifested in itself immediately to the human intellect”) is a call for prudence* of thought rather than a condemnation.

b) In France and Belgium. For the Ontologie (1856–57) of F. Hugonin (1823–98), there are no created truths because the truth is absolute or it does not exist. We thus see all truth in the absolute—that is, in God. “Being, the law of thought, the being of truth, is God Himself substantially and not purely ideal” (I, 95). Hugonin asserts that we perceive all truth in the existence of God because we have no knowledge of His ineffable essence.

Ontologism was taught in Louvain before the Thomist revival brought about by Aeterni Patris (1879). For the Essais (1860) of G. Ubaghs (1800–1875), ontologism is Christian philosophy*. If reason is defined by the totality of truths according to which each human being naturally makes judgments, and because those truths are not the work of the created being who finds them before making judgments about them, but the work of God, and finally, because those truths are God, for in God attributes are God Himself, then reason judging reasonably necessarily judges in and through God.

c) Condemnation of 18 September 1861 (DS 1841–47). These doctrines unquestionably risked abolishing any distance between the intellect and God. The Holy Office, therefore, published a decree that spread alarm among ontologists who wished to defend the faith*. Of the suspect propositions, we note here the second and the fifth: “The being that we know in all things and without which we know nothing is the divine being” (this proposition confuses the ens commune and the esse subsistens). “Ideas are modifications of the idea through which God understands Himself simply as ens” (this echoes Spinozist ideas, along with elements from Rosmini).

As for the first proposition, the reason for its condemnation is not obvious: “An immediate knowledge of God that is at least habitual is essential to human intelligence, which can know nothing without it; this knowledge is the light of the intellect.” Faith says that there is an immediate communication from God to the reasoning created being. Roman authority* was in this instance probably attacking the particular form of ontologism articulated by traditionalism*. This form presupposed a revelation* of God at the origin of history* and a kind of continuing historical innateness through time that would make any effort on the part of freedom and the intelligence to know God futile.

- N. Malebranche (1674–75), Recherche de la vérité, Paris (1964–74).
- N. Malebranche (1688), Entretiens sur la métaphysique et sur la religion, Rotterdam (1964–74).
- J. S. Gerdil (1748), Défense du sentiment du P. Malebranche sur la nature et l’origine des idées contre l’examen de M. Locke, Turin.
- A. Rosmini-Serbati (1830), Nuovo saggio sull’origine delle idee, Rome, New Ed. in Opere edite e inedite, Rome, 1934.
- V. Gioberti (1840), Introduzione allo studio della filosofia, Brussels, (New Ed., Rome, 1941).
- F. Hugonin (1856–57), Ontologie ou étude des lois de la pensée, Paris.
- G. Hubaghs (1860), Essais d’idéologie ontologique, Louvain.
- ♦ J. Henry (1924), “Le traditionalisme et l’ontologisme à l’université de Louvain (1835–1865),” AISP, 39–150.
- A. Fonck (1931), “Ontologisme,” DThC 11/1, 1000–1061.
- L. Foucher (1955), La philosophie catholique en France au XIXe siècle avant la Renaissance thomiste et dans son rapport avec elle (1800–1880), Paris, 167–95.
- M. F. Sciacca (1958), Opere complete, Milan.
- D. Connell (1967), The Vision of God: Malebranche’s Scholastic Sources, Louvain.
- P. Ottonello (1967), L’essere iniziale nell’ontologia di Rosmini, Milan.
- F. Percivale (1977), L’accesso naturale a Dio nella filosofia di Rosmini, Rome.
- P. Ottonello (1978), L’attualità di Rosmini e altri saggi, Geneva.
- F. Évain (1981), Être et personne chez Antoine Rosmini, Paris-Rome.

G. Giannini (1985), Esame delle quaranta proposizioni rosminiane, Genoa.
H. Jacobs (1985), "Ontologisme," Cath 10, 95–98.

PAUL GILBERT

See also Aseitas; Being; Creation; Descartes, René; Infinite; Intellectualism; Nature; Rationalism; Reason; Truth

Ontology. See Being

Ontotheology. See Being

Optatus of Milevis. See Donatism

Oratory. See Bérulle, Pierre de; Newman, John Henry

Orders, Minor

So as to distinguish them from the major or holy orders of subdeacon, deacon, and priest, for a long time Catholic theology* designated as minor orders* those lower ministries that received an ordination* of either a permanent nature or as an interim stage on the way to the reception of major orders. The early Church*, by contrast, made a clear distinction between the ordained ministries, received through the laying* on of hands (those of bishops*, priests*, and deacons*), and the other ministries, which were instituted without ordination. The oldest document concerning ordinations, the Apostolic Tradition, a document that might date from the first third of the third century and is attributed to Hippolytus of Rome, states the instituted ministry of widows, lectors, and subdeacons. In the year 251, Pope Cornelius listed for the bishop of Antioch the lower ministries in the Church of Rome*: subdeacons, acolytes, exorcists, lectors, and doorkeepers (quoted by Eusebius, HE VI, 43, 11). The overlapping of subdeacons and acolytes arose from the fact that in Rome at that time there were as many subdeacons as deacons. This overlap never happened in the East, where the only lower ministries in common use were lectors and subdeacons (with the meaning of acolyte).

During the course of the centuries, the functions vouched for by Pope Cornelius were exercised in different ways (particularly between Rome and the Frankish countries), either in a permanent way, for the service of the liturgy*, or often as steps toward a higher order, the preliminary step being, since the time of Gregory* the Great, entering clerical ranks. On the other hand, the difference between the institution of the lower ministries and ordinations, properly speaking, lost its clear distinction.

Before the Middle Ages the notion of a holy order seems somewhat imprecise in the Roman vocabulary. It was applied to the subdiaconate and to the higher orders when the marriage* of subdeacons had been forbidden at Lateran* I in 1123 (can. 21) and at Lateran* II in 1139 (can. 6). Henceforward, the subdiaconate was no longer a minor order.

The Council of Trent* attempted to adapt the minor orders for a new situation in the Church and the liturgy but without managing to carry it through (sess. XXIII [1563], reform decree, can. 17).

After Pius XII had drawn attention, through his Constitution Sacramentum Ordinis (1947), to the legitimate importance of the three orders of diaconate, priesthood, and episcopate and after Vatican* II had confirmed the sacramental validity of the episcopate in the context of the participation of all the laity* in liturgical roles by means of its Motu proprio Ministeria quaedam (1972) (CIC 1983, can. 1035), Paul VI replaced the idea of minor orders with that of instituted ministries, a category that was reduced to two groups (lectors and acolytes) by doing away with the other minor orders and the subdiaconate. From then on, entry into clerical ranks would be through ordination into the diaconate.

- M. Andrieu (1947), "La carrière ecclésiastique des papes et les documents liturgiques du Moyen Age," RevSR 27, 90–120.
- W. Croce (1948), "Die niederen Weihen und ihre hierarchische Wertung," ZKTh 70, 257–314.
- P. Jounel (1982), "Les ministères non ordonnés dans l'Église," Not 18, 144–55.
- B. Kleinheyer (1984), Sakramentliche Feiern II, Ratisbonne, 61–65.
- A. P. Kazhdan (Ed.) (1991), The Oxford Dictionary of Byzantium, articles "Anagnostes" (P. Magdalino) and "Subdiacon" (A. Papadakis).

PIERRE-MARIE GY

See also Ministry; Ordination/Order

Ordination/Order

I. New Testament

Like episkopos and diakonos, the Greek term kheirotonia, "laying on of hands" or "ordination," is secular in origin. Ordination—that is, access to a ministry* through the laying* on of hands along with a prayer in the context of a liturgy* of the Christian assembly—is attested with certainty only in the pastoral epistles (1 Tm 4:14; 2 Tm 1:6; see also 1 Tm 5:22). Did Jewish ordination provide a model? There is little consensus on this point because that ordination is difficult to reconstitute. In Christian ordination, the laying on of hands falls to the presbyterium and is accompanied by prophetic words (1 Tm 1:16, 4:14); the assembly plays the role of witness (1 Tm 6:12; 2 Tm 2:2). Ordination confers on the ordinand a gift of the Holy* Spirit, in particular to see to the transmission of the gospel* (2 Tm 2:2; see also 1:14).

II. Basic Structures of Christian Ordination

No liturgy of ordination has come down to us from the second century. However, Clement's First Letter states that ministers are chosen with the consent of the whole Church* (1 Clement 44:3) and that they retain their position for life (1 Clement 44:3–5), and it formulates the idea of a succession beginning with the apostles* (1 Clement 42:4, 43:1, 44:2). By the middle of the third century, Cyprian* already had a precise conception of access to the position of bishop*: under the judgment* of God*, the people* and the clergy* of the local* Church contribute their votes and their witness; the consensus of neighboring bishops is also required.

The earliest ritual that has come down to us is the Apostolic Tradition attributed to Hippolytus of Rome. It is certainly pre-Constantinian, although it may contain later revisions, and its basic structures represent the most classic form of Christian ordination. The Apostolic Tradition was accepted in Syria and Egypt, and its influence can be seen in all current Eastern rituals. It also served as a model for the liturgical reform of ordinations after Vatican* II (Pontifical of 1968, revised in 1990).

For the intervening history of rites, governed principally by the Roman-Germanic Pontifical of the 10th century, modified by William Durandus, bishop of Mende, in the 13th century, and its theological interpretation, see P. De Clerck (1985). The focus here will be on the understanding of ordination expressed in current rites, which have explicitly revived the Apostolic Tradition.

1. Ordination as Bishop

In the Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus, the ordination of the head of the local Church, the bishop, is the principal center of attention, all the more because parishes did not yet exist. Here is the text: “The person ordained as bishop should be chosen by all the people. . . . When his name has been pronounced and he has been accepted, the people will gather with the presbyterium and the bishops who are present on Sunday. With the consent of all, the bishops should perform the laying on of hands and the people watch and do nothing. All should be silent, praying in their hearts that the Holy Spirit might come down. After that, one of the bishops present, at the request of all, should lay his hands on the one who has been made bishop and pray, saying: [the text of the prayer follows].”

a) Access to the Office. (1) Meaning of the Role Attributed to the Members of the Local Church: Christians played an active role in ordination—that is, in the choice and the liturgical entry into office by the one who presided over their Church. This role was expressed in four procedures, which were integral parts of ordination: election, witness, epiclesis, and reception.

Election. Although we do not know the details of the procedure (the clergy played a special role), the principle of election by the people was clearly affirmed in both East and West. For Pope Celestine in the mid-fifth century, “no one should be given as bishop to a community that does not want him” (Letters 4:5), and Leo the Great prescribed that “the one who is to preside over all should be elected by all” (Letters 10:6). Practice went through serious vicissitudes, including the intervention of secular authorities and the monopoly of certain clergy beginning in the 13th century, but the principle remained fixed in the general law* of the Catholic Church until 1917. Paradoxically, the “election day holiday” of the British monarch reflects the same principle.

The import of the principle is clear: congregation and ordained ministers are partners and share responsibility for the Church of God, according to a structure that binds and distinguishes all and some. Vocation for the ministry is a call from God mediated by the Christians and those who preside over the Church.

Witness. The Apostolic Tradition 2 indicates the agreement that is necessary, which was established by voting in all later rituals; it is concerned with the qualities and abilities of the ordinand and his faith*. There remain today a questioning of the people and a profession of faith before the assembly.

The import of the principle is clear: congregation and ordained ministers are together responsible for apostolic faith; the succession of some in the ministry is rooted in the faith of all; the lists of succession prove it because they are established according to the succession in a particular church, not according to the uninterrupted chain of the laying on of hands (L. Koep, Bischofsliste, RAC 2, 410–15). Faithful to this view, Catholic and Orthodox Churches thus still state today that “the minister receives from his church, faithful to the tradition*, the Word* that he transmits” (Munich 1982, II, DC 79, 941–45).

Epiclesis. “All should pray . . . that the Holy Spirit might come down”: The ministry is conceived as a gift of God to His Church; hence, the relation of a church to the pastor whom it elects is not that of electors to a representative. Ministry in the name of Christ* is also a ministry in the Holy Spirit.

Reception. The community of the baptized, who also have the Holy Spirit, accepts the ministry of the bishop as a gift and not as an emanation from the community, and this gift must continue to be accepted. Canon* law still requires it of priests (see CIC, can. 1741, §3).

(2) Meaning of the Role Attributed to Neighboring Bishops: The Apostolic Tradition prescribes the participation of neighboring bishops. Nicaea (can. 4, COD 8) requires the participation of all the bishops in the province, three at a minimum, with the others agreeing in writing; the rule is still in force in the Catholic and Orthodox Churches. The categories describing the action of the congregation can also describe that of the bishops.

Election. They also participate in the choice of the person; their role grew over time.

Witness. Coming from churches that have the apostolic faith, the bishops present attest that the church in which the ordination is taking place, as well as its future leader questioned in the presence of the people, have the same apostolic faith.

Epiclesis. The whole assembly is the subject of the epiclesis*, but only the bishops perform the laying on of hands for this purpose.

Reception. The bishops receive the newly ordained as one of their own. As early as Nicaea (can. 5, COD 9, 8–12), if a Church did not accept an ordination, it was not valid; the correctness of the liturgical performance and the will of the ordinands could have no effect if they were not carried out in explicit communion* with the other local churches.

The theological import of these procedures is clear: the cooperation among neighboring churches in the ordination of a bishop shows that they are in solidarity, (partners in the service of apostolic faith), that tradition creates communion, and that succession in the ministry presupposes both. The pneumatological aspect of the procedure, finally, excludes reduction of ordination to the schema of a transmission of power and simultaneously excludes the reduction of the Church to its hierarchy*.

b) Content of the Office Conferred by Ordination. The bishop is elected, receives the laying on of hands, and enters into his duties by presiding over the Eucharist* at his own ordination, in a single liturgical continuum (Apostolic Tradition 4). The first millennium had no absolute ordinations (ordinations of bishops not designated to occupy a see). Chalcedon (can. 6, COD 90) had declared null and void any ordination of a priest* or deacon* that had not been done for a particular Church, but in 1198 Pope Innocent III contravened this rule (Patrologia Latina 214:68). The meaning of the rule is clear: ordination is concerned first with the Church and not the person ordained; the power received is not personal but tied to the office received, even if one of the purposes of epiclesis is to make the person suitable for the office. This constitutes a theological criterion. To think that ordination is primarily an incorporation into a college succeeding the college of apostles and that the charge of a church is secondary would be doubly mistaken; it would respect neither the articulation between church and ministry nor the nature of powers conferred through ordination (see Yves Congar, Ministères et communion ecclésiale, Paris, 1971).

To set forth the content of the office of bishop, it is possible for the most part to follow the Apostolic Tradition. The office is:

- (1) A gift intended to guide the Church in the tradition of the apostles. The Holy Spirit confers on the bishop a pneuma hégemonikon, the spirit “given to the holy apostles who established the Church in every land” (Apostolic Tradition 3). The bishop must be able to guide the Church according to the gospel, the book of which has been opened on his shoulders during ordination since the fourth century.
- (2) A presiding in and for communion. The very structure of ordination is full of meaning. Elected by his Church and accepted by it to be at its head, the bishop is in a position to represent it before all others. But able to become a bishop only with the cooperation of the heads of neighboring churches, who accept him into their college, he also represents the entire Church in his own. The symbol and the task are clearly expressed: located both in his church and in the face of it, the bishop is in both senses the link between communion and the service of Catholic unity.
- (3) A ministry of pastor. After the pneuma hégemonikon, the Apostolic Tradition 3 asks for the bishop the grace to be “the pastor of the flock,” the classic designation of his ministry even today.
- (4) A priestly ministry. In two places, the Apostolic Tradition 3 asks that the bishop may exercise the “great priesthood”—offering of gifts and the power to forgive sins*. This begins the development of a priestly interpretation of the ordained ministry, which applies first to the bishop and then to the priest.

2. Ordination to the Priesthood

Is the priest elected by the people? The case is not as clear as it is for the bishop. At least the bishop, in choosing the priest, must ask the opinion of the clergy and the congregation, as the current Roman ritual still indicates with the question, “Do you know if they are worthy?” Another important characteristic, found in the Apostolic Tradition 7 and continuing today, is that priests perform the laying on of hands on the ordinand after the bishop—they too make up a college. The ministry of the priests is described by the gift that they receive: “a spirit of grace* and counsel so that they may help to govern Thy people.” No further details are given.

3. Ordination of Deacons

The deacon is apparently more directly chosen by the bishop because he is an even closer associate of the bishop than the priest. The Apostolic Tradition 8 prescribes that only the bishop performs the laying on of hands in his case “because he is not ordained for the priesthood* but for the service of the bishop, to do what the bishop tells him to do,” and also because “he is not part of the council of the clergy, but tells the bishop what is necessary.” It is asked that he have “the spirit of grace and zeal to serve the Church.”

4. Other Ordinations

For the bishop, the priest, and the deacon, the Apostolic Tradition speaks of ordination (kheirotonia); for the other orders (lector, subdeacon, exorcist, and widow), it speaks of institution (katastasis), the first appearance of minor orders*. Does the current proliferation of ministries entrusted to the baptized call for their revitalization under different names and with different contents? The question is open.

III. Ecumenical Rapprochements and Open Questions

1. Rapprochements

A consensus is now taking shape among the Churches engaged in bilateral or multilateral dialogue on the ministries (with the exception of the Congregationalists) that recognizes the fruitfulness of the basic concepts of ordination that can be derived from the Apostolic Tradition: election and calling, witness, epiclesis, reception, powers involved in the office, collegiality* of ordained ministries, articulation between all and some in the apostolic and priestly ministry, and the fragility of absolute ordinations—these are the bases from which the changes necessary to resolve remaining questions are now being proposed.

2. Open Questions

a) Convergences Are Emerging on the Threefold Division of Ordained Ministries. On the one hand, Vatican II restored the diaconate as a permanent ministry and made a clearer distinction between the offices of priest and bishop while recognizing that these forms of ministry are ab antiquo (LG 28) rather than from divine law. The abolition of minor orders in 1973 also clarified the scope of the ordained ministry. According to a document proposed for ecumenical consideration, the BEM (Lima, 1982, n. 25–16 and 28–31), an ecclesiological agreement on the threefold form of the ordained ministry is possible, on condition that the personal authority* of ministers be more clearly articulated with their collegial and synodal authority. The Lutherans, for example, have agreed throughout the world to restore the office of bishop on condition that its theological import be clarified. In the dialogue between Catholics and Lutherans, the document Church and Justification (1993) is a sign of an historic opening (n. 204, DC 91, 1994, 840): “The difference remaining in the theological and ecclesiological scope that should be recognized for the ministry of the bishop, connected to the historical succession, loses its acuteness when Lutherans can grant to the ministry of the bishop a value that makes restoration of full communion with the institution of the bishop desirable, and when the Catholics recognize that the ministry of the Lutheran Churches . . . carries out essential functions of the ministry that Jesus Christ instituted in His Church, and when there is no challenge to the status of Lutheran Churches as Churches. The difference in the importance given to the historical office of bishop is then interpreted so that the doctrine of justification* is no longer at issue, and so that the restoration of full communion in the institution of the bishop is therefore no longer a theological impossibility.”

b) Connection between the Concrete Church and the Ordained Ministry Is Necessary. Agreement in this context can be reached on the mutual belonging of ministry and Church. The ministry no more emanates from the Church than the Church depends entirely on the ministry. Hence, the practice of absolute ordination (which appeared late, in the 13th century, but became common practice in the Catholic Church) seems all the more problematic in a time when the Church is seen primarily as a communion of local churches. And following a similar kind of reasoning, it is possible to agree to interpret the indelible character of ordination not as a grace given to a person for himself but as a spiritual authorization for a ministry. From this derives the fact that Churches today that practice ordination never repeat it.

c) Although the theological understanding of collegiality is not always unanimous among Catholics, it has nevertheless become an integral part of the daily life of the Church through the restoration of the importance of the structures of the presbyterium and through the institutionalization of conferences of bishops.

d) Whereas Protestant theology* gives the name of sacraments* only to the spiritual actions necessary for salvation* (baptism* and the Eucharist*), the Council of Trent* defined ordination as a sacrament (DS 1766, 1773). However, this divergence is in the process of being overcome; the designation of ordination as a sacrament was not rejected in principle in the early Reformation (Apol. CA XIII, 11); moreover, it can be said today that it is the bearer of grace and that it “cannot be reduced to a sort of nomination to and installation in a church office” (International Catholic-Lutheran Commission, 1981, §§32–33).

e) *The ordination of women, practiced by all the Reformed Churches since the mid-1990s, remains a matter under discussion between them and the Catholic and Orthodox Churches.

• Hippolytus of Rome, Apostolic Tradition from the older versions, SC 11 bis, Paris, 1968.

Pontificale romanum: De ordinatione diaconi, presbyteri et episcopi, ed. Typica, Vatican, 1968.

Pontificale Romanum: De ordinatione episcopi, presbyterorum et diaconorum, ed. Typica Altera, Vatican, 1990.

♦ L. Ott (1969), Das Weihesakrament, HDG IV/5.

A. Faivre (1977), Naissance d'une hiérarchie: Les premières étapes du cursus clérical, ThH 40.

C. Vogel (1978), Ordinations inconsistantes et caractère inamissible, Turin.

Foi et Constitution (1982), BEM, Paris.

P. Journel (1984), “Les ordinations,” in L'Église en prière (Ed. A.-G. Martimort), Paris, 154–200.

B. Kleinheyer (1984), Sakramentliche Feiern II, Ordinationen und Beauftragungen, Regensburg.

P. De Clerck (1985), “Ordination, ordre,” Cath 10, 162–206.

H. Legrand (1993³), “Les ministères de l'Église locale,” in B. Lauret and F. Refoulé (Ed.), Initiation à la pratique de la théologie, Paris, vol. 3, 181–273.

P.F. Bradshaw (1995), “Ordination IV,” TRE 25, 343–62.

J.F. Puglisi (1996), The Process of Admission to Ordained Ministry: A Comparative Study, Epistemological Principles and Roman Catholic Rites, vol. 1, Collegetown, Minn.

HERVÉ LEGRAND

See also Bishop; Collegiality; Communion; Deacon; Epiclesis; Ministry; Presbyter/Priest; Reception; Sacrament

Origen

c. 185–c. 250

Alongside Augustine*, Origen was the dominant figure in Christian theology* during its first five centuries. Both in his lifetime and later, he was the one theologian who aroused the strongest and most conflicting feelings. What is known as “Origenism” covers a range of doctrinal and spiritual concepts as well as a form of exegesis* that Origen initiated and that was to be developed after his time both in the East and in the West. The denunciation of an Origenist tendency at the Second Council of Constantinople* in 553 led to the condemnation of Origen himself and to the disappearance of a very large part of his work.

a) Life. Origen’s life is relatively well known, thanks to Eusebius of Caesarea, who devoted almost the whole of Book VI of his Historia ecclesiastica to him. It appears he was born into a Christian family in Alexandria circa 185. He successively taught grammar, catechesis*, and Christian philosophy*. Under the influence of a patron, Ambrose, who had converted Origen to the faith*, he reluctantly agreed to start writing, although he was already more than 30 years old. After several journeys, to Palestine, Arabia, and perhaps Rome, he left the Egyptian metropolis once and for all in or around 232, having met with the hostility of the local bishop*, Demetrius. The second half of Origen’s life was spent mainly in Caesarea, in Palestine, where he was ordained as a priest* and continued to teach. At the request of Ambrose, he also continued his literary endeavors. He was invited to take part in several regional councils* in order to bring back to the orthodox faith certain bishops whose Trinitarian beliefs had caused problems. In 250, during the Decian persecution, Origen was arrested and tortured. His health broken, he died shortly after, probably in Tyre.

b) Works. Barely one-quarter of Origen’s immense literary output remains in existence, and a large number of those texts that have survived are available only in Latin versions composed by Rufinus and Jerome around the first decade of the fifth century. Setting aside his letters, which have almost all been lost, we may divide his work into two groups: his studies of Scripture, including commentaries, homilies, and “notes” (or “scholia”), and his treatises, which deal with theology, spirituality, and apologetics. In his commentaries, homilies, and, more rarely, scholia, Origen explained almost every scriptural text and returned several times to the same books of the Bible*. According to ancient testimony, he composed some 260 “volumes” (books) of commentary and almost 500 homilies. Today, there are no more than 31 volumes of commentaries, including some in Greek on Matthew and John and some in Latin on the Song of Songs and Romans, as well as 205 homilies, among which only 21 are in Greek. While the loss of some important commentaries, notably on Genesis, is to be deplored, the disappearance of his major treatises, which aroused controversy in Origen’s lifetime, is even more serious. They include On Natures, Dialogue with Candide, Stromata, and On the Resurrection. Fortunately, we do possess his most important theological work, the treatise De Principiis, a Latin translation of Peri Archôn, and his massive apologetic work for Christianity, Contra Celsum.

c) Intended Readership and Issues Addressed. Informed by a vast biblical and philosophical culture, Origen’s work is addressed primarily to Christians committed to improving themselves intellectually, morally, and spiritually. His treatises and commentaries gave him opportunities to develop a scholarly theology intended for “advanced” Christians, such as his patron Ambrose, while his homilies reveal his concern to provide edification for the community as a whole.

Origen aimed his most sustained and fiercest polemics at gnosis* and Marcionism*, but he also engaged in dialogue with Gnostics. His desire for dialogue is still more evident in his dealings with Judaism*—he learned about its methods and traditions from a Hebrew teacher—and with Platonic philosophy, to which he was apparently introduced by the Neoplatonist Ammonius Saccas, who was Plotinus’s teacher.

d) Origen and the Bible. Scripture, for Origen, was the source of all wisdom* and thus became the main focus of all his work. He approached it as a philologist, a grammarian, and a theologian. His capacity for textual analysis and critical editing is illustrated by the Hexapla, of which only fragments remain. This was an edition of the Old Testament laid out in six columns, in which the Hebrew text, transliterated in Greek letters, was accompanied by the Septuagint and other Greek translations by Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion. One of the objectives of this remarkable research tool was to pinpoint the differences between the Hebrew text used by Jews and the Greek Septuagint used by Christians.

However, Origen’s renown as a biblical scholar rests principally on his work as a theoretician of hermeneutics* and a practitioner of allegorical exegesis. Following in the tradition of Philo and of Clement of Alexandria*, he defended and developed a notion of the spiritual sense of Scripture* as being its fundamental meaning. Readers must receive the spirit of Christ* if they are to grasp, over and above the letter of the text, the meaning that the divine Spirit has placed within it. Origen established rules by which to reach this spiritual sense, which is always mysterious and which is related to the triune God*, to the intelligible world*, and to the end of time. One of his rules is that the Old Testament is to be interpreted by way of the New Testament, which in turn is to be interpreted by reference to the person* and revelation* of Christ. Another rule is that the interpreter must place any specific passage being studied in relation to the whole of Scripture. This approach requires rigorous attention to the words of the text and their various uses in order to distinguish their figurative or allegorical meanings, and it depends on the presupposition that Scripture forms a single entity.

Origen made the discovery of the spiritual sense the overriding objective of his interpretation, but he did not neglect research into the literal or historical sense (the history of Israel*, the acts and gestures of Christ, or testimony on the primitive Christian community). Hence, more often than not, his exegesis covers both the literal and the spiritual levels, although occasionally he refers to a third sense that he calls “moral,” though he is not very specific about what it is.

e) As Theologian. The Peri Archôn defines and accomplishes a theological program that had no precedent or counterpart in the patristic era: that of developing, on the basis of symbols, on the faith of the Church, and on Scripture, a coherent doctrine of God, humanity, and the world. The requirement of coherence led Origen to formulate certain hypotheses that were later held against him: the preexistence of souls*; the succession of worlds, which continues until every spirit has freely accomplished its conversion* to God; and the identical nature of the initial condition and the final condition. The inclusion of these and other hypotheses points to an important characteristic of Origen’s method that has often been misunderstood: his consistent commitment to research, which led him, whenever he was faced with a difficulty, to propose (rather than assert) a solution in the form of an “exercise.”

Within the system that Origen constructed, the decisive roles are played by the goodness of God and the liberty* of human beings. The Fall was caused by an evil use of liberty by created spirits, but this same liberty, educated and assisted by divine providence*, will lead human beings to a constant contemplation* of the triune God.

The Peri Archôn also represents a significant stage in the development of the doctrine of the Trinity*, notably in the two sections on the Holy* Spirit, in which Origen emphasizes both its individual substance and its two functions, the charismatic and the gnoseological.

Origen’s Christology* is complex. God the Son is both subordinate to the Father* and equal to him and exercises a multitude of revelatory and mediating functions that are indicated by the diverse epithets (epinoiai) that Scripture applies to him. Since before the Incarnation* he has taken on an unfallen human soul. His Incarnation is salvific in the sense that it conveys the full revelation of God and provides a model for the human will completely and freely subject to God.

f) The Spiritual. Knowledge* of God and contemplation of him are to be acquired through spiritual understanding of Scripture and imitation of the incarnate Logos. Human beings, each composed of a spirit, a soul*, and a body, are engaged in combat with themselves. The soul, the seat of free will, is subject to the passions: on the one hand, it is drawn away by the body, but on the other hand, the spirit, which is part of the divine Spirit, induces the soul to direct itself toward God. This struggle is not played out solely within each human being, for it is related to the struggle between the angels* and the demons* and, beyond them, between Christ and Satan. Asceticism*, prayer*, and the practice of the virtues* are all weapons that allow human beings to continue the fight to the point of victory. But the decisive weapon is the power, the light, and the love* that Christ, the image of the invisible God, brings to human beings when he comes to dwell and grow within them. In this way, Christ makes human beings into participants in his own character as image, and believers are gradually transformed into spiritual and perfect beings who can attain the contemplation of God through union with Christ. However, perfect vision is not attainable in this world. Origen’s ideal is a mystical one (mysticism*), yet his works do not contain any clear testimony to any mystical or ecstatic experience of his own.

g) Origenism after Origen. During his lifetime and throughout subsequent history, Origen has been attacked and defended, and the Peri Archôn has often become the focus of controversies. The liveliest debates took place between the fourth and sixth centuries. Origen’s admirers, some of them enthusiastic, others more moderate, included Eusebius of Caesarea, Athanasius*, Hilary* of Poitiers, Didymus, Basil* of Caesarea, Gregory* of Nazianzus, Gregory* of Nyssa, Evagrius, Ambrose*, Rufinus, and Jerome (in his early years). In the fourth century, two works, full of quotations, were entirely devoted to Origen: Pamphilus of Caesarea’s Apology for Origen and the Philocalia, traditionally attributed to Gregory of Nazianzen and Basil of Caesarea. Origen’s opponents included Methodius of Olympia, Eustathes of Antioch, Peter of Alexandria, Epiphanes, Theophilus of Alexandria, and Jerome (at a later stage).

The controversies that developed around Origen’s legacy from the fourth century on are not immediately accessible. They were concerned with elements of Origen’s thinking—such as the preexistence of souls, apocastasis*, the doctrine of the resurrected body, eternal creation*, subordinationism*, and his excessive use of allegory—but they also brought in elements that were foreign to his ideas, that contradicted them, or that were falsified by some of his readers. In the West these controversies culminated in Jerome’s spectacular conversion to the anti-Origenist cause around 400; in the East they culminated in the condemnation of both Origen and the Origenists in the middle of the sixth century.

Origen’s thought inevitably influenced the exegetical labors and theological reflections of later centuries and was also developed within monastic circles. From its earliest stages, Egyptian anchoritic monasticism* took from Origen’s spirituality such themes as asceticism, spiritual combat, and the struggle against demons. In the closing years of the fourth century, there were readers of Origen among the monks of Nitria and the Kellia, practicing a highly intellectual form of speculation that gave rise to problems because it rejected any form of piety related to material reality and any Christian use of anthropomorphism*. It was in this milieu that Evagrius (346–99) developed a theological system (see in particular his Gnostic Chapters) structured around hypotheses concerning the creation of intellects by God and the ultimate restoration of primal unity. During the first half of the sixth century, Evagrius’s version of Origenism won support among the monks of Palestine: it was in order to suppress them that, in 543 and 553 (at Constantinople II), Justinian condemned a form of Origenism that was closer to Evagrius’s teachings than to those of Origen himself.

The loss of the majority of Origen's writings was the direct result of this condemnation. It must be noted that Origen nonetheless continued to influence the scholarly theology of the East, both indirectly through such theologians as Gregory of Nazianzen and Gregory of Nyssa and more directly through the work of those who quite often used his commentaries in compiling exegetical sequences. In the West, throughout the Middle Ages, exegesis continued to be dominated by the Origenist principles, which had previously been used by Hilary, Ambrose, and Jerome. During the Renaissance, Origen was rediscovered for the first time, notably by Lorenzo Valla and Erasmus*, while the Reformers, in particular Luther*, displayed some serious reservations about his allegorical exegesis. More recently, in the middle of the 20th century, Origen's works, methods, and ideas have been brought to the forefront once again by theologians such as Henri Sonier de Lubac*, H. Rahner*, and Hans Urs von Balthasar*, all of whom have played a decisive role in the renewal of Catholic theology.

• Most of Origen's texts appear in GCS and SC; see also PG 11–17.

Exhaustive bibliography up until 1980 in H. Crouzel (1971 + supplement 1982), Bibliographie critique d'Origène, Steenbrugge.

• About Origen

J. Daniélou (1948), Origène, Paris.

H. de Lubac (1950), Histoire et Esprit: L'intelligence de l'Écriture d'après Origène, Paris.

H. Crouzel (1956), Théologie de l'Image de Dieu chez Origène, Paris.

M. Harl (1958), Origène et la fonction révélatrice du Verbe incarné, Paris.

J. Rius-Camps (1970), El dinamismo trinitario en la divinización de los seres racionales según Orígenes, Rome.

H.-J. Vogt (1974), Das Kirchenverständnis des Origenes, Köln-Vienna.

P. Nautin (1977), Origène Sa vie et son œuvre, Paris.

H. Crouzel (1985), Origène, Paris.

A. Monaci Castagno (1987), Origene predicatore e il suo pubblico, Milan.

B. Neuschäfer (1987), Origenes als Philologe, 2 vols., Basel.

M. Fédou (1995), La sagesse et le monde: Le Christ d'Origène, Paris.

T. Hermans (1996), Origène: Théologie sacrificielle du sacerdoce des chrétiens, Paris.

See also the Acts from international colloquia on Origen: Origeniana (1975), Paris; Origeniana Secunda (1980), Rome; Origeniana Tertia (1985), Rome; Origeniana Quarta (1987), Vienna; Origeniana Quinta (1992), Louvain; Origeniana Sexta (1995), Louvain.

On Origenism and Origen's Legacy

A. Guillaumont (1962), Les "Kephalaia Gnostica" d'Évagre le Pontique et l'histoire de l'origénisme chez les Grecs et chez les Syriens, Paris.

W.A. Bienert (1978), Dionysius von Alexandrien: Zur Frage des Origenismus im dritten Jahrhundert, Berlin-New York.

M. Schär (1979), Das Nachleben des Origenes im Zeitalter des Humanismus, Basel-Stuttgart.

J.F. Dechow (1988), Dogma and Mysticism in Early Christianity: Epiphanius of Cyprus and the Legacy of Origen, Macon, Ga.

ÉRIC JUNOD

See also Alexandria, School of; Anthropology; Resurrection of the Dead; Scripture, Fulfillment of; Spiritual Theology; Translations of the Bible; Trinity

Orthodox Church. See Orthodoxy

Orthodoxy

A. Doctrinal Orthodoxy according to the Churches

The concept of “orthodoxy”—orthè doxa, right opinion—was known and used outside Christianity: its Christian field of application became established as the complementary concepts of heterodoxy and heresy* were defined. Its use stems from a fundamental claim of Christian communities: to hand down words that are true, to define the meaning of these words, and finally to decide whether any given words uttered within their midst contradict the defined faith*. The believer’s orthodoxy is thus measured by what he or she believes and confesses: the orthodox person is one who on the one hand believes and confesses what the Church* believes and confesses (material orthodoxy) and on the other wants to believe and confess what the Church believes and confesses (formal orthodoxy). Since only a person who engages in the literal repetition of creeds and confessions of faith or who entrusts entirely to the Church the responsibility of saying what he or she believes (see Brague [1981] on “blind faith”) may be assured of faultless orthodoxy, error is always possible, whether it is born of ignorance (an *idiot*a may say things that are materially heretical while at the same time fully and firmly intending to confess the faith of the Church rather than his own private choices) or of conceptual mistakes. The theologian may, in good faith, say things today that the Church’s instruments of doctrinal decision—popes*, councils*, and bishops*—may tomorrow decide to be inadequate or erroneous: so, for example, a large part of Origen*’s Christology* suffers from subordinationist tendencies, even though Origen fully and firmly confessed the faith of the pre-Nicene catholica, whose words lacked the precision of the vocabulary that was formally adopted between Nicaea and Chalcedon. However, just as orthodoxy has two faces, objective (fides quae creditur) and subjective (fides qua creditur), so too heterodoxy may be deliberate: a person who says things that are judged materially heretical by the Church (which in so doing exercises its munus docendi, its teaching function) in the course of a legitimate proceeding will be found guilty of formal heresy in many cases if he or she persists in saying them after such a judgment.

To the concept of orthodoxy should be added that of “indifferent matters” (adiaphora). These matters fall into two categories: theological or quasi-theological questions that do not form part of the faith of the Church (questions of liturgical ceremonial, the celibacy of the priesthood*, and so on) and legitimate differences in the expression of the content of that faith (see inculturation* and theological schools). Legitimate dissent does exist, then, and has recently been fiercely debated within Catholicism* (see Dulles 1996)—but while its theoretical rights are clear, the limits within which they may be exercised vary from Church to Church (a given question may be an adiaphoron for Protestantism*, e.g., the apostolic* succession of hierarchs, while for the Catholic and Orthodox Churches it is nonnegotiable), and the exercise of this dissent raises difficult problems in terms of the ethics of Church life. In addition, moral commandments “related to revealed truths” may be so closely associated with the content of the faith (to the extent of receiving what Protestant theology* calls the status confessionis) that their violation gives rise to a situation of “ethical heresy” (see the Bekennende Kirche on the subject of anti-Semitism as a heresy, the World Alliance of Reformed Churches on apartheid as a heresy, and Pope John Paul II on unconditional respect for life). In Catholic circles, this is doubtless what the CEC means at §88 by “truths having a necessary connection with the former [i.e., the truths contained within revelation]” (see also §2035, which is more explicit). On the other hand, this is not what is to be understood when ecclesiastical texts refer to “morals” (e.g., in the expression fides et mores): in this context the word denotes the discipline of the Church, that which governs its own life, especially in liturgical matters; “morals” does not signify morality.

The use of the concept of orthodoxy obviously varies according to the faith confessed by each Church and the official procedures that each Church sets out to judge it by. In practice, these procedures are intended not so much to set out an orthodoxy in positive terms as to define its boundaries negatively; any interpretation that is explicitly not condemned is assumed to be orthodox, at least until a possible condemnation—of which the most serious form is traditionally the anathema, which is a formal notice of heresy.

- 1) In the Churches that describe themselves as “orthodox,” doctrinal orthodoxy is judged in terms of material and formal conformity with the doctrinal decisions of the seven councils recognized as “ecumenical,” from Nicaea* I to Nicaea* II (in the case of the Churches referred to as “pre-Chalcedonian,” conformity with the doctrinal decrees of the first two or three of these councils), it being understood that each council ratifies some development of the doctrines and that it is the responsibility of the College of Bishops to impart the teachings of the “Fathers” and bring them up to date for every age. Moreover, an influential current in recent Orthodox theology has suggested making Palamism (Gregory* Palamas) a preferred yardstick for the Orthodox faith.
- 2) The Roman Catholic Church also relies on the criterion of fidelity to the Fathers and the councils (albeit that it additionally recognizes as “ecumenical” the 14 general synods* of the Western Church between Constantinople* IV and Vatican* II) but accords the bishop of Rome* considerably wider powers of doctrinal definition than are conferred on the patriarchs by the Orthodox Churches. Within the defined limits of his infallible teaching, it also grants him the power solemnly to confer the highest possible orthodoxy on statements of faith (the power of dogmatizing).
- 3) The Churches that originated in the Reformation vary in their criteria. The Lutheran tradition links scriptural principle and denominational principle in such a way that ancient creeds* (the Nicene-Constantinopolitan, Apostles’, and Athanasian creeds) and 16th-century books of doctrine, considered as a “normalized norm,” constitute a proper exegesis of the unique “normative, not normalized norm,” which is the Word* of God. The Anglican tradition has also furnished itself with a denominational charter—the Thirty-nine Articles—alongside Scripture and the three ecumenical creeds; but it advances no official and normative interpretation of the articles and accepts as orthodox (or at least as not heterodox) any possible reading that does not violate the letter of them. As for the Calvinist Churches, not all have retained their 16th- or 17th-century confessions of faith in their present-day constitutions, but all live by reference to Scripture, the ancient creeds, and books of doctrine. Finally, the so-called free Churches accord to the scriptural principle alone the right of assessing sound Christian opinion but are able to maintain this principle strictly only by basing it on a theory of the inspiration of the Scriptures and, often, by extracting from Scripture “fundamental articles” on which Christianity stands or falls (fundamentalism*).

It is also noteworthy that while Catholicism has developed a very subtle set of theological criteria, orthodoxy has never become a precise theological designation within this (theological notes*). Moreover, the close link between faith as confessed and faith as lived out, between doctrinal orthodoxy and a life faithful to the Gospels, has been especially insisted on in recent theology, in which the concept of orthopraxis is frequently invoked to convey that it is not confessions of faith alone that make a Christian. Finally, it should be remarked that doctrinal orthodoxy is expressed within all Christian denominations by liturgical traditions compatible with the confessed faith: not only in liturgical texts but also in liturgical acts, such as the veneration (or not) of images*, blessings*, the layout of places of worship, and so on. The lex orandi of the Churches expresses the faith that they confess, whether explicitly or implicitly (the classic example of the latter being Trinitarian orthodoxy, which was implicitly present in Christian doxologies long before it was made explicit by a council; see Basil*).

- F. Lau (1960), “Orth. altprotestantische,” RGG 3 4, 1719–30.
- R. Brague (1981), “Oh, ma foi . . .,” Com(F) VI/3, 74–79.
- W. Henn (1990a), “Ortodossia,” Dizionario di teologia fondamentale, 838–40.
- W. Henn (1990b), “Ortoprassi,” Dizionario di teologia fondamentale, 840–42.
- J. Baur, W. Sparr, et al. (1991), “Orthodoxy,” EKL 3, 953–76.
- B. Neveu (1993), L’erreur et son juge: Remarques sur les censures doctrinales à l’époque moderne, Naples.
- J. Baur (1995), “Orth., Genese und Struktur,” TRE 25, 498–507.
- J.-L. Leuba (1995), “Orthodoxy protestante,” EncProt 1110.
- M. Mathias, O. Fatjo (1995), “Orth.,” TRE 25, 464–97.
- A. Dulles (1996), The Craft of Theology, new expanded Ed., New York, 105–19, “The Magisterium and Theological Dissent.”

JEAN-YVES LACOSTE

See also Heresy; Notes Theological; Race; Schism

B. The Orthodox Church

The Orthodox Church obviously retains the general sense that orthodoxy quite quickly assumed during Christian antiquity; however, as doxa also means glory*, the term has been reinterpreted in such a way as to emphasize the doxological character of the Orthodox faith, its character of righteous glorification—just as in the case of its Slavonic equivalent, “pravo-slavie,” slava (glory) is understood more than the original slovo (word). This faith is that of the communion* of Orthodox Churches or, in a second sense, of Orthodoxy: Orthodoxy comprises a group of Churches, mostly Chalcedonian but also pre-Chalcedonian, united under the general title of Orthodox Churches.

The Orthodox Church, like the Catholic Church, sees itself as the Church that dates back uninterruptedly to Pentecost: it therefore considers itself to be one, holy, catholic, and apostolic. From a doctrinal point of view, it was the Code of Justinian that brought together the fundamental principles of the Orthodox faith on the basis of the “four councils” of Nicaea*, Constantinople* I, Ephesus*, and Chalcedon*, supplemented by Constantinople* II and III as well as the important Nicaea* II. John of Damascus’s De fide orthodoxa is a classic presentation of this doctrinal corpus. The gradual breach between Catholicism* and Orthodoxy saw the Orthodox Church assimilated into a conception of the Christian East, the Greco-Byzantine world. However, Constantinople, for all its unrivaled importance—known as the “New Rome” since the first Council of Constantinople and capital of the Roman Empire—was not the whole East. Besides, for over a thousand years, Catholics and Orthodox formed one single Church with varied and multiple liturgical traditions*: these two Churches “not originating in the Reformation” have much in common, as the present climate of the ecumenical movement makes all the clearer.

Besides political factors (the sack of Constantinople in 1204, the forced reintegration into Orthodoxy of the Ukrainian Greco-Catholics in 1945, and so on) and cultural (languages, liturgies*) and intellectual ones (Orthodox theology* is dominated by the major figures of Athanasius* of Alexandria and the three great Cappadocian doctors, Basil* of Caesarea, Gregory* of Nyssa, and Gregory* of Nazianzene), the separation between the Orthodox East and the West has a doctrinal and an ecclesiological cause. 1) On the one hand, the unilateral addition of the Filioque* to the Nicene-Constantinopolitan creed and above all its medieval interpretation as implying the procession of the Holy* Spirit from the Father* and Son “as from a single principle” remain unacceptable to Orthodoxy (though this does not prevent a possible Orthodox interpretation of the Filioque in the economic order and in the eternal radiance of that which the Three have in common—what the Greek Fathers* called “energies” and the Latin Fathers “communion”). 2) On the other hand, Orthodoxy accepts neither the pope*’s universal jurisdiction* nor the concept of infallibility* as defined by Vatican* I. However, Pope John Paul II’s encyclical Ut unum sint (25 May 1995) declares that it is time to attend to the manner in which universal presidency should be exercised in the Church—a task that has already been begun by the COE’s commission on Faith and Constitution (a commission of which the Catholic Church is a full member despite not being a member of the COE). Thus, the two main points separating Catholics and Orthodox now seem capable of solution.

Orthodoxy is made up of local* Churches in full communion with one another; they are thus “sister-Churches” under the presidency (since the break with Rome*) of the patriarchate* of Constantinople. The universal primate, like that of each local Church, is a primus inter pares, first among equals; each bishop* has full responsibility for his diocese. The primate encourages the maintenance of unity* and intervenes locally only if he is asked to. The basis of Orthodox ecclesiology* is territorial rather than national. While numerous Churches are more or less coincident with sovereign states, nationalism—in the sense of the identification of Orthodoxy with one ethnic group—was condemned as a heresy*, “phyletism,” at the synod of Constantinople in 1872. Despite its unanimous condemnation, however, phyletism remains the chief temptation of contemporary Orthodoxy, with the result that often several jurisdictions coexist in areas where Orthodoxy is dispersed.

The local Churches are in the first place the ancient patriarchates, which together with Rome formed the “pentarchy”: Constantinople (see at Istanbul), Antioch (see at Damascus and jurisdiction over Syria and Lebanon, a vestige of the territorial and nonnational principle), Alexandria, and Jerusalem*. The other autocephalous Churches (those that elect their own primate) comprise the patriarchates of Moscow (numerically the most important, including the provinces of Ukraine and Belarus, which today enjoy considerable autonomy), Georgia (a very ancient Church, originating in the conversion* by Nino), Romania (second in numerical terms), Serbia and Bulgaria, and the Churches of Greece, Cyprus (also ancient), the Czech Republic (Bohemia and Moravia) and Slovakia, Poland, Albania (in the process of revival), and, smallest of all, Sinai. The remaining Churches are “autonomous” (the election of the primate is confirmed by the primate of an autocephalous Church), such as those of Finland, Crete, and Japan. America’s autocephalous Church (the Orthodox Church in America) is still not officially recognized by Constantinople. Finally, there are missions* in China, Korea, and several African countries.

The Orthodox liturgical tradition is a veritable patristic anthology, well served by its splendor and the force of its symbols. The Syro-Byzantine cycles (fixed and mobile) are available in their entirety to the French reader, in the translation by D. Guillaume (Rome). It may be concluded that the vitality of the Orthodox faith is due largely to the richness of its liturgy.

- J. Pelikan (1974), The Christian Tradition. A History of the Development of Doctrine, vol. 2: The Spirit of Eastern Christendom (600–1700), Chicago.
- O. Clément (1985), L’Église orthodoxe, Paris.
- N. Lossky (1987), “L’Église orthodoxe,” in M. Clévenot (Ed.), L’état des religions dans le monde, Paris.
- Jean-Paul II (1995), Lumen Encyclical. See the biblio. of “Orthodoxy, Modern and Contemporary.”

NICOLAS LOSSKY

See also Chalcedon, Council of; Church-State; Filioque; Gregory Palamas; Hesychasm; Orthodoxy, Modern and Contemporary; Patriarchate

Orthodoxy, Modern and Contemporary

Modern Orthodoxy can be considered the result of the fall of Constantinople (1453). At that time the great majority of the Orthodox world was under Muslim occupation. Already, from the seventh century on, the former patriarchates of the East, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem*, were under the yoke of Arab Mohammedanism. In the 15th century, the younger autocephalous Serbian and Bulgarian Churches* fell into the hands of the Turks, after Constantinople and the eastern part of the Empire. Russia, which was freeing itself from the Mongol yoke and whose political power was rising, represented the notable exception. However, despite the fall of the Byzantine Empire, Constantinople, the “New Rome” (Constantinople* I, 381, canon 3) held on to its place as the primatial see of Orthodoxy just as long as communion* was not reestablished with the first Rome*. After Russia became an empire, certain people were tempted to give it the ranking of a “third Rome,” but this more political than ecclesiological opinion would never be taken seriously.

a) Attempts at Union between Constantinople and Rome. Before the Turkish invasion, Constantinople was a center of intense intellectual activity. In the 14th century, in particular, on account of an imperial policy oriented toward the reestablishment of a union with Rome, interest in Latin culture saw considerable growth, including from people such as Nicholas Cabasilas (mid-14th century). But, although in his An Explanation of the Divine Liturgy (SC 4 bis) Cabasilas proved quite exceptional by his recognition of the plurality of rites, in particular of the Latin tradition (Meyendorff 1982), he proved less so in his knowledge of Latin culture. Gathered around Emperor John Cantacuzene, a whole group in fact (Demetrius Cydones and his brother Prochoros should be mentioned) showed deep interest in the philosophical and theological Latin revival. Augustine’s* major works and Thomas* Aquinas’s Summa Theologica were translated into Greek. Nonetheless, these Latinophile intellectuals were not opposed to Hesychasm*, as shown by Cabasilas’s example. But it is true that at the beginning of the 15th century, access to the chief sources of Latin theology* did not really bear fruit, as the failure of the Council of Ferrare-Florence in 1438–39 attests.

After the aborted union of Florence and under the Ottoman occupation, contact with the Christian West did not cease entirely. To be sure, Constantinople’s fall inspired in the majority of Orthodox believers a leaning toward conservatism. For this reason, in most of Orthodoxy at about this period, the Syriac-Byzantine liturgical tradition was frozen in the form in which it still exists today in traditionalist circles, which are in the majority in contemporary Orthodoxy. However, the empire's fall brought with it a phenomenon whose consequences for Orthodoxy would be important and enduring. At that time, many Orthodox believers left to study in the universities of Western Christendom. And from the 15th to the 17th centuries, instead of facilitating an authentic theological dialogue between the Greeks and the Latins, these contacts would result in what could be called the infiltration into Orthodoxy of the various trends in Western Catholic and even in Protestant Christianity.

Before we look at what G. Florovsky (1937) calls the "Babylonian captivity" of Orthodoxy, an event should be mentioned that represents another form of contact with the West and that also had long-term consequences: the Union of Brest-Litovsk of 1596. The Orthodox minority in southwestern Russia (the future Ukraine and Byelorussia and part of Poland), which belonged to the Polish-Lithuanian kingdom, suffered strong pressure from the King's Catholic Lords, who tried to assimilate it. These Orthodox believers appealed to the pope* for protection under the terms of the decrees of the Council of Florence, which recognized liturgical and canonic pluralism (in particular, the use of the Byzantine rite and the ordination* of married men as deacons and priests). Thus, it came about that six out of the eight bishops* present at the synod* of Brest-Litovsk (including the metropolitan of Kiev, Michel Ragoza) placed themselves under Rome's jurisdiction* and became "Greek-Catholics" (or Uniates, a pejorative term).

Southwestern Russia and other parts of Eastern Europe, such as Romania, are not the only places where Catholics of the Eastern rite can be found. The Near East had already had the Maronite Church since the 12th century. In the 16th century, the "Chaldean" Church was formed; later, the Syrian Catholic, Melchite Catholic, Armenian Catholic, and Coptic Catholic Churches sprung up. There is a Greek-Catholic Church in Greece and others further away, in India and in Ethiopia. The "Greek Catholic" Churches are far from being alike. Each region of the world offers an individual example, and the "problem of Uniatism," the central point on the agenda of the Orthodox-Catholic dialogue today, cannot be treated as a unified whole.

b) The Influence of Western Christianity. Alongside these questions of "union," which belong to the jurisdictional and ecclesiological fields, Orthodoxy and Western Christianity had some unusual encounters in which an Orthodoxy that was becoming "repetitive" was trying to have a dialogue with Latin theologians who held to the concepts of late Scholasticism* or those of the Reformation movements. Exchanges took place from 1570 to 1580 between Jakob Andreae and Martin Crusius, Lutheran theologians from Tübingen, and the patriarch of Constantinople, Jeremias II, who had been sent a Greek translation of the Augsburg Confession. The two parties came to a dead end, however, because they could not really understand each other. Among the points they discussed were grace* and free will, Scripture and Tradition, prayer for the dead, and the invocation of saints (Ware 1963).

Although Patriarch Jeremias II was able to counter the doctrines of the Reformation with an Orthodox criticism, that was not the case with one of his successors, Cyril Loukaris (1572–1638). Born in Crete, Loukaris studied in Venice, then in Padua, where he acquired a knowledge of Latin theology. He attended as a priest* the synod of Brest-Litovsk, where he represented the patriarchate of Constantinople. In 1602 he became the patriarch of Alexandria and in 1620 of Constantinople. Little by little, his favorable attitude toward the Church of Rome changed into an increasingly marked fellow feeling with the Churches born of the Reformation. Once on the throne of Constantinople, Loukaris fought the Catholic influence in the Ottoman Empire. To that end he used the Protestant arguments, and his Confession of his Orthodox faith, published in Latin in Geneva in 1629, is clearly inspired by Calvinism*. This Confession, whose original is in Geneva, was immediately translated into French (four times), into English, into German (twice), and finally into Greek, all in Geneva. After many vicissitudes, Cyril was strangled to death by Sultan Murad's janissaries.

The Protestant influence is clearly expressed in a letter that one of the creators of the Union of Brest-Litovsk sent to the patriarch of Alexandria, Meletios Pegas (who had studied in Augsburg). The letter says that, in Alexandria, Calvin* now stood in Athanasius's place; in Constantinople, Luther* (an allusion to Cyril Loukaris); and, in Jerusalem, Zwingli* (Florovsky 1937). Despite this tirade, the fact is that Cyril Loukaris's Calvinism was repudiated by the majority of his Orthodox brothers, notably by six local councils (Constantinople, 1638; Kiev, 1640; Jassy, 1642; Constantinople, 1672; Jerusalem, 1672; and Constantinople, 1691). In addition, it was and harshly condemned by two very able 17th-century theologians, Peter Moghila, the metropolitan of Kiev, and Dositheus, the patriarch of Jerusalem. Each of the two composed a confession of the Orthodox faith*. And this is where the Latin influences in Orthodoxy come fully to light.

Peter Moghila (1597–1647), born to a noble family in Moldavia, studied at the University of Paris and then in Poland before he became the abbé of the “Laura” of the Crypts of Kiev in 1627 and the metropolitan of Kiev in 1632. (Kiev was a prestigious town, even though Moscow had supplanted it as a primate see since the 14th century and would become a patriarchate in 1589.) Moghila tried to raise the educational level of clerical studies, which were extremely deficient. Paradoxically, his aim was to fight the Greek-Catholic influence encouraged by the King of Poland. Obviously, the Catholics found it easy to say that Orthodoxy had converted to Protestantism in the person of its patriarch primate, Cyril Loukaris. It was to answer him that Peter Moghila composed his Orthodox Confession in 1640. This Confession, written in Latin, neglected traditional Orthodox theology and reproduced what could be found in the post-Trent Catholic catechism textbooks. On several points it adopted purely and simply medieval Western theological positions: consecration of the eucharistic gifts restricted to the recital of the institution and concept of transubstantiation, affirmation of purgatory’s existence, and the seven sacraments*. (It was also Peter Moghila who introduced into the traditional wording of absolution, which speaks only of pardon granted by God, a second part that speaks of absolution by the priest, who has received a special authority for this purpose). Approved as it stood in Kiev in 1640, translated into Greek (with corrections concerning the Eucharist* and purgatory), the Confession was accepted at the local Council of Jassy in 1642, then in Constantinople in 1643. According to several historians (including Meyendorff [1960] and Ware [1963]), this document is the most “Latin” of those found among the official or “symbolic” Orthodox texts.

The Confession of Dositheus, patriarch of Jerusalem from 1669 to 1707, is another very systematic reply to Cyril Loukaris’s Calvinist Confession. Born in 1641 in the Peloponnese, from a modest background, Dositheus was placed very young in a monastery near Corinth. In 1637 he entered the service of the patriarch of Jerusalem, and in 1669 he was appointed to this see by a synod held in Constantinople. In 1672 Dositheus got his Confession approved by a council held in Jerusalem (in Bethlehem in fact), and this text is known most often as The Proceedings of the Council of Jerusalem. It is an extremely important document because not only do a considerable number of Orthodox believers still profess today an Orthodoxy close to this text but the majority of the non-Orthodox think it the most official expression of Orthodoxy.

In reality, like Peter Moghila, Dositheus was strongly inspired by the Catholic Reform and the Council of Trent*. He restricted himself to using against Protestantism the Catholic arguments on free will and grace, predestination*, the Church and the Scriptures, and the number and nature of the sacraments. He defended the thesis according to which sinners’ souls* could be purified after death* (a doctrine close to that of purgatory), and, finally, he conceptualized the eucharistic conversion by identifying metousiôsis and transsubstantiatio—that is, by adopting the Scholastic conceptuality to make a technical term of Eastern theology out of a Latin notion.

The Moghila and Dositheus Confessions were very important. In their wake, all Orthodox theological teaching was imbued for a long time with the ubiquitous Latin influences in the textbooks used in the seminaries and the theological academies. In Russia, all theological teaching would be done in Latin until the end of the 19th century and even at the beginning of the 20th. Its considerable effect can still be seen in Russia, which is now emerging from a long period of “imposed silence,” during which it had been almost impossible to acquire a worthwhile theological training. However, it can also be observed elsewhere despite various current theological revivals. And although a few individual exceptions exist here and there, it can be said that the inheritance in a degraded form of the Moghila and Dositheus Confessions, completed by Latin theology textbooks, shows an almost total lack of theological reflection, as George Florovsky (1937) stated forcibly. The abundant and interesting aspects of Latin (or Lutheran) theology are conspicuous by their absence. Perhaps it should be added that Peter the Great, who was not a theologian, took an interest in Protestantism, but solely from an ecclesiological viewpoint, in order to better watch over the organization of the Church in his state. It is difficult, therefore, not to speak of a decline when describing the theology of Orthodoxy from the 17th to the 19th centuries.

The 17th century would witness a schism* in Russia (which has still not been healed). The liturgical books were corrected to make them consistent with the Greek originals, which had been altered by Western influences. These corrections, undertaken by the patriarch of Moscow, Nikon (1605–81), provoked a strong reaction on the part of those who have become known in history* as the “Old Believers,” who were excommunicated in 1667 and persecuted. Their most remarkable representative was Archpriest Avvakum, a strong opponent of all Western influences.

c) The Revival of the Hesychastic Tradition. Alongside these Latinizing developments, the Hesychastic tradition remained alive in monasticism*, notably at Mount Athos, but also in Russian monasteries such as the Trinity, founded by Serge de Radonège (c. 1314–92), in which flourished a remarkable growth of iconography in the Hesychastic spirit, particularly with Andrei Rublev (c. 1370–c. 1430). Then, in the 18th century, in the middle of the Enlightenment, the renaissance of the Hesychastic tradition occurred, first at Mount Athos and then in the whole of the Orthodox world. It was spurred by the compilation of a vast anthology of texts by Fathers of the desert and spiritual writers of the fourth and fifth centuries. These ascetic and mystical texts, which focused on perpetual prayer* or the prayer of Jesus*, were collected by Nicodemus of the Holy Mountain (1748–1809) and Macarios Notaras (1731–1805), the metropolitan of Corinth, and published in Greek in Venice in 1783 under the title Philocalia (“Love of What Is Beautiful”). This collection’s influence can hardly be overstated. Nicodemus himself was also inspired by other Western spiritual texts, particularly those of Ignatian spirituality*, which proves again the compatibility of an attachment to Hesychasm and an interest in Latin spirituality.

The Philocalia began to be circulated in earnest thanks to a Ukrainian, Païssij Velitchkovsky (1722–94), who, unhappy with the spirit of theological studies in Kiev, left for Mount Athos, where he grew friendly with Nicodemus and got acquainted with the Hesychastic tradition. In 1763 Païssij left for Moldavia, where a little later he became the abbot of the monastery of Neamt, a big spiritual center of more than 500 monks who under his guidance undertook to translate the Greek Fathers into Slavonic. He himself translated the Philocalia, published in Moscow in 1795 (five volumes). In his own spiritual direction, Païssij was something of a partisan of ascetic monasticism and insisted on obedience to a spiritual father or starets (“elder”). Certainly the most prestigious starets was the world-renowned Seraphim of Sarov (1759–1833), whose dialogue with Nicolas Motovilov made known the Hesychastic experience of the Light of Tabor. In the 16th century, Russia also experienced the classic conflict between monastic reformers who accepted gifts of land and money, such as Joseph of Volokolamsk (1439–1515), and those who would not accept such gifts, such as Nil Sorsky (1433–1508). It is worth observing that both Joseph and Nils were canonized.

In its Slavonic version, the Philocalia was primarily the instrument of a strong monastic revival in Russia. In particular, an important center inhabited by startsy (plural of starets) grew up from 1829 on: the famous “Desert of Optino.” This center’s influence went far beyond the monastic world, and no one is unaware of the interest taken in it by writers such as Gogol, Dostoyevsky, and Tolstoy and such slavophiles as Alexis Khomiakov (1804–60) and Vladimir Solovyov* (1853–1900). Moreover, the spiritual revival did not touch only intellectual circles, as attested to by Accounts of a Pilgrim, a famous anonymous work written in a very popular style and imbued with perpetual prayer. In this work, the pilgrim, a simple peasant, travels with a copy of the Philocalia, in the edition obtained for the first time in a single volume (1857) by Bishop Ignatius Brianchaninov (1807–67). Between 1876 and 1889, another spiritual type, Theophanus the Recluse (1815–94), published the first complete (five-volume) edition of the work in Russian—and his own work and his correspondence are themselves very copious. It should be added that in the 20th century an even more ample edition (11 volumes in 1990) was produced in Romania by one of the greatest Romanian theologians of our century, Dimitru Staniloae.

d) Religious Philosophy and Contemporary Theology. Alongside the spiritual rebirth, from the middle of the 19th century, Russia witnessed a rediscovery of the fathers* of the Church in the big academies of theology, where critical editions, translations into Russian, and studies on the Fathers began to be published. This trend increased steadily until 1917. Even today, the theologians of Russia, many of whom know only Russian, use these translations. This patriotic revival was to bear fruit in the 20th century and especially abroad. However, as early as the middle of the 19th century, there sprang up a bishop-theologian who rediscovered the authentically Orthodox tradition and whose preaching* traveled beyond the Russian frontiers. He was Philaret Drozdov (1782–1867), the metropolitan of Moscow. (Peter the Great had suppressed the patriarchate, which was replaced by a synod.) Although Philaret had great respect for the Council of Jerusalem of 1672, he approved of the famous 1848 Encyclical in which the Eastern patriarchs answered Pope Pius IX’s appeal “to the East.” Philaret’s sermons, which urged the conversion of the mind in order to contemplate the mystery*, were translated into French as early as 1866 (three volumes, Paris). The 19th century also saw important thinkers and theologians. Khomiakov and Solovyov were doubtless the most creative among them.

The man who was considered the first original Russian theologian, Alexis Khomiakov (1804–60), born into the landed gentry, was a former military man. With Ivan Kirievsky (1806–56), he became the founder of the slavophile movement and a lay* theologian. Under the obvious influence of the Philocalia, as well as of the rediscovery of the Fathers, he reacted against borrowing from the theology of the schools of the West and advocated a return to the sources of Orthodox tradition—that is, to a sense of the Church situated above “Romanism” (“unity* without freedom*”) and above “Protestantism” (freedom without unity”). Khomiakov also reacted against German idealism (Schelling*, Hegel*), which was very influential in Russia. He wrote mainly in French, and L’Eglise latin et le protestantisme au point de vue de l’Eglise de l’orient, articles collected by his son, were published in Lausanne in 1872. Khomiakov coined the Russian neologism Sobornost. Based on the Slavonic translation of “Catholic” in the creed (Katholikè = sobornaïa), the word sobor means “synod” or “council” (also “Church”), giving rise to the idea of “conciliarity” to describe the Orthodox Church.

Vladimir Solovyov (1853–1900) provides a typical example of the birth of a Russian religious philosophy* by way of German idealism. A slavophile at first, he eventually progressed toward a more open attitude toward the West and devoted himself to a search for Christian unity (he would die in communion with the Roman Church). One of his chief contributions to Orthodox thought was the introduction of the feminine principle of “Wisdom” (Sophia) as the soul of the world. His Sophianism would have descendants in two great 20th-century theologians, Paul Florensky (1882–1952) and Serge Bulgakov (1871–1944).

In Russia, the end of the 19th century and the beginning of the 20th were characterized by an ecclesial activity in continuous expansion, and the preparation of a council for renovation struck many as a necessity. The Council of Moscow (1917–18) reestablished the patriarchate under Patrick Tikhon (recently canonized) and undertook a considerable renewal of Russian Orthodoxy’s liturgical, canonic, and academic structures. If the persecution had not begun immediately after the Bolshevik revolution, this council would have been able to represent for worldwide Orthodoxy the equivalent of what Vatican* II represented for Catholicism*.

In Greece, too, the beginning of the 20th century saw the renaissance of a more vital Orthodoxy that was expressed in the Zoé, the Sotèr, and the Apostolikè diakonia movements and in the works of great systematicians, such as Christos Androustos (1869–1935), Panagiotis Trembelas (1886–1977), and Ioannis Karmiris (1904–91).

The most productive revival of Orthodoxy in the 20th century was, nonetheless, the result of the Bolshevik revolution, which exiled the best minds among the Russian intelligentsia. The Russian exiles regrouped in Prague, where they founded a university, and then in Paris, where they started an institute of Orthodox theology (Paris, Saint-Serge, 1925). It was in these institutions that the various revivals (religious philosophy, study of the Fathers, reflections on the different aspects of liturgical life) bore their fruits.

Religious philosophy was represented in the persons of such philosophers as Nicolas Berdiaev (1874–1948), Simon Frank (1877–1950), and Nicolas O. Lossky (1870–1965) but also among the theologians, heirs to religious philosophy, such as Serge Bulgakov, who developed his Sophianism as an attempt to explain the relationship between God* and the creature, until his condemnation in 1936 by the synod of Russia (or what remained of it), a doctrinal condemnation and not, as has been said, a political one. This line of theology inspired by philosophy would show up again in Paul Evdokimov (1901–70), who was also the heir to the patristic revival.

This patristic revival itself was the creation of two amateur theologians (neither one of them had in fact studied in a theological institute): George Florovsky (1893–1973), a jurist by training, and Vladimir Lossky (1903–58), a historian of Western medievalism. Neither one had much interest in religious philosophy, and they taught that authentic Orthodoxy consisted not only of a knowledge of the Fathers but also of a way of thinking modeled on the Fathers today and for today. Their theology was adopted by such Russians as John Meyendorff (1926–92) and Alexander Schmemmann (1921–83), who developed a “liturgical theology,” and by Boris Brobinskoy as well as by such Frenchmen as Olivier Clément (who also inherited from religious philosophy), by such Greeks as Panagiotis Nellas (1936–86) and Christos Yannaras, and by others too, including the Englishman Kallistos (Ware), bishop of Diokleia.

The 20th century also experienced an ecclesiological renaissance focused on the idea of communion*, with Nicolas Afanassiev (1893–1966) and Metropolitan Jean de Pergame (Zizioulas). Finally, spurred by Leonid Ouspensky (1902–87), there was a revival of the theology of the icon, which spread throughout the West and was not limited to Orthodoxy alone (see, e.g., C. Schönborn, L’icône de Christ, 1976, and even CEC, 1992, 1159–62). A “theology” of liturgical music was also proposed by Maxime Kovalevsky (1903–88), composer, philosopher, and theologian.

A “great and holy pan-Orthodox Council” has been in preparation for several decades. The very process of its preparation is an opportunity to re-create the conciliar fabric of an Orthodoxy that has suffered greatly during the 20th century, especially from its jurisdictional divisions.

- F. Lau (1960), “Orth. altprotestantische,” RGG 3 4, 1719–30.
- R. Brague (1981), “Oh, ma foi . . .,” Com(F) VI/3, 74–79.
- W. Henn (1990a), “Ortodossia,” Dizionario di teologia fondamentale, 838–40; (1990b), “Ortoprassi,” Dizionario di teologia fondamentale, 840–42.

Orthodoxy, Modern and Contemporary

- J. Baur, W. Sparr, et al. (1991), "Orth.," EKL 3, 953–76.
B. Neveu (1993), L'erreur et son juge: Remarques sur les censures doctrinales à l'époque moderne, Naples.
J. Baur (1995), "Ortodoxie, Genese und Struktur," TRE 25, 498–507.
J.-L. Leuba (1995), "Orthodoxie protestante," EncProt 1110.

- M. Mathias, O. Fatio (1995), "Orthodoxie," TRE 25, 464–97.
A. Dulles (1996), The Craft of Theology, new expanded Ed., New York, 105–19, "The Magisterium and Theological Dissent."

JEAN-YVES LACOSTE

See also Heresy; Notes, Theological; Race; Schism

P

Paganism

A. Biblical Theology

The adjective “pagan” comes from the Latin paganus, which means “country-dweller,” often with a negative connotation. Its meaning as “non-Christian,” idolater, appeared in the third century in the context of a Christianity that was primarily urban. Previously, in biblical history*, other oppositions had been presented: Israel* confronts foreign “nations” or gôyim. The Greek Bible translates this Hebrew word with the plural ethnè. The New Testament adds (five times) the adjective ethnikos (belonging to the nations), and the Latin versions translate these two terms respectively by gentes (the Gentiles) and gentilis.

a) Old Testament. Choice*, consecration to the holy God (Lv 19:2), implies a radical separation from all ritual and moral impurity. The gôyim are impure (Lv 20:26); they are deprived of circumcision, the sign of the covenant* (Gn 17:11). The prophets (prophet* and prophecy) of the exile excluded these “uncircumcised” from the Holy Land and from the temple* to come (Is 52:1; Ez 44:4). The concern with purity* affects everyday relations. Although dietary rules (Lv 11) do not forbid sharing a table with gôyim, they make it complicated (e. g., Jdt 10:5, 12:1–4, 17ff.). The Israelites forbid lending at interest among themselves, but they practice it with pagans (Dt 23:21); they even give pagans meat of dubious cleanness (Dt 14:21). Marriages are made with gôyim (see R. de Vaux, Institutions de l’Ancien Testament, 1957). But Deuteronomy 7:1–4 prohibits these marriages, which lead the Israelites to

“to serve other gods.” Thus, Israel fears the seduction of idolatry* and relies on war* to destroy the cults that threaten the Yahwist faith* (Dt 7:5f.).

Attitudes vary according to situation. Priestly circles favor the assimilation of foreigners, particularly through circumcision (Ex 12:44), when Israel finds itself too much of a minority in its own land (Grelot VT 6, 1956). On the other hand, in the late fifth century, Nehemiah and Ezra were concerned about the dilution of Jewish identity in the midst of non-Jews, and demanded “separation” from foreign women (Ezr 10; Neh 13; see Dion 1975).

Political history influenced the judgment* of the chosen people* on their Canaanite neighbors and on the traditional oppressors (Assyria, Babylon, Egypt). While Canaan symbolizes the idolatry that is to be destroyed, the name of Sodom sums up pagan immorality (Is 1:9) and the name of Babel (Babylon) evokes the arrogance of the rivals of YHWH (Is 47; Ps 137). In this context the prophets composed “oracles against the nations.” According to them, God would carry out his eschatological vengeance*, in just compensation, by subjecting to Israel the gôyim who had enslaved it (Is 45:14–17, 60:1ff.). But he would also restore his honor, which had been tarnished by the sins* of Israel (Ez 36:23f.). As early as the seventh century Amos included Judah/Israel among the peoples subject to judgment (Am 1:3–2:16). In fact, God evaluates the conduct of all nations according to the same rules of morality (e.g., the relations between Tyre and Edom, Am 1:9f.), and chosenness is not a privilege without obligation (Am 9:7).

The complaints of the small nation against the powerful gôyim can be understood in the light of history. But other elements in the Old Testament point in different directions. For example, the gôyim are not circumcised, but Israel confesses itself uncircumcised in its heart, unfaithful to the Lord (Dt 10:16; Jer 9:24). The Canaanites are delivered by God to the conquering army of Israel; but, because of her faith, Rahab the Canaanite is accepted among the chosen people (Jos 2:1–21, 6:22–25). The burden of old conflicts prohibits the acceptance of Moabites and Ammonites (Dt 23:4–9), but Ruth the Moabite becomes the ancestor of David (Ru 4:13ff.); see also the case of Achior the Ammonite in Judith 5:5–6A:21; 13:5–10 (Dion 1975). The genealogy of Jesus* includes Rahab and Ruth (Mt 1:5). This remission of punishment, which sees in certain gôyim an exemplary faith and discovers within Israel the impiety for which other nations are reproached, fosters the universalism* of the Old Testament.

b) From the Old Testament to the New Testament. By foretelling an unavoidable cosmic judgment (see Dn 7), the apocalyptic prophets hardened the antagonism toward pagans; but they also altered its borders, since the camp of darkness now also included impious Jews.

Around 174 B.C., a faction of the leaders of Jerusalem* opted for a Hellenization*, which threatened the religion of Israel (1 Macc 1:10–15, 41–64). It was then that the word “Judaism*” appeared (struggle for Jewish values 2 Macc 2:21, 8:1, 14:38), in opposition to “Hellenism” (2 Macc 4:13).

According to the apocalypses of Enoch, the gôyim will not suffer an unbending judgment, since they know a pre-Mosaic law* demanding respect for the cosmic order (1 Enoch 82:1ff.) and for social justice* (1 Enoch 94–100). Although the prolific literature of the Jewish diaspora emphasizes the analogy between the revelation* of Israel and Hellenistic values (Conzelmann 1981), it also stigmatizes the immorality of the pagans and their difficulty in recognizing the Creator (Wis 13–14; see Sibylline Oracles III. 29–45). Romans 1:18–32 was to repeat this assessment in order to establish universal salvation on the single justice of God (Cerfaux 1954). Jesus knew the opposition between Israel and the gôyim, but he defined a new and more decisive border between those who accepted his message and those who rejected it. Thus the impenitent cities of Lake Tiberias are guiltier than ancient Sodom (Mt 11:20–24; see 10:15); and chosenness is not a safe-conduct for a final salvation that will include many pagans (Lk 13: 28ff. and parallel passages; Jeremias 1956).

In the Judeo-Christian circle that is reflected in Matthew, the ethnikos, along with the publican, remains the natural type of the sinner (Mt 18:17; see 5:47, 6:7). According to this circle, mission* should be confined, in imitation of Jesus, “to the lost sheep of the house of Israel” (Mt 10:5f., 23, 15:24); only after that, by its example, will the Jewish community restored in Christ draw the rest of humanity to salvation (Mt 13–16f.). Matthew notes this position with respect. But, for him, Jesus has completed his mission as Messiah* of Israel and, through his Resurrection*, has received a universal power. Mission must therefore now open itself to all the gôyim, without discrimination (Mt 28:16–20).

- G. Bertram, K.L. Schmidt (1935), “Ethnos,” ThWNT 2, 362–70.
- L. Cerfaux (1954), “Le monde païen vu par saint Paul,” in Revue L. Cerfaux, Gembloux, vol. II, 415–23.
- J. Jeremias (1956), Jesu Verheißung, Stuttgart.
- H.D. Preuss (1971), Verspottung fremder Religionen im AT, Stuttgart.
- P.E. Dion (1975), Dieu universel et peuple élu, LeDiv 84.
- H. Conzelmann (1981), Heiden, Juden, Christen, Tübingen.

CLAUDE TASSIN

See also* Choice; Idolatry; Israel; Kingdom of God; Mission/Evangelization; Purity/Impurity; Universalism; War

B. Historical Theology

In its threefold reality—social, intellectual, and religious—it was the Roman Empire that embodied the biblical reality of paganism for the Christianity of the early centuries; and it was in thinking concretely about the relationship between Christianity and Classical Antiquity that the earliest Christian theologies (theology*) established their relations with nonbelievers, more precisely with those among them who did not belong to the people of Israel*. As a nonbeliever the pagan was defined in negative terms; he was primarily the idolater, the member of a social body whose cohesion was guaranteed by false gods. But because Christianity understood itself from the very beginning as being charged with a universal mission, pagans were also an intended audience for the gospel. Furthermore, by virtue of a consistently developed doctrine of creation* and of providence*, patristic thought, in a movement that began with Justin and culminated with Eusebius of Caesarea, came to interpret pagan experience as a certain expectation of the gospel and a preparation for it.

Between the Peace* of the Church* and the end of the patristic age, paganism ceased to possess a social and religious reality within the confines of the Roman world. Since Theodosius, the Eastern Church existed on the lands of an empire of which Christianity was the official religion, and on the lands of the Eastern Empire, the Church had to deal with Arian heretics more than with pagans. In the same period, paganism had ceased to represent an intellectual entity in relation to which Christianity would have to take a position. The Empire still contained pagan intellectuals, but the Church now occupied the position of transmitter of the classical legacy. Outside cities the paganus had probably not disappeared, and the underlying presence of pre-Christian observances was to be a perpetual problem for a “multitudinist” Church whose task was now to proclaim the gospel within itself just as much as to the outside world. In any case, from then on the pagan no longer had the qualities of the Greek or the Roman in whom the quest for wisdom* fostered objections to Christianity.

The nominal Christian became an “internal” pagan who later became the target for actual missions (mission*/evangelization). The pagan on the fringes of the Church would be the Muslim, who demanded from Christianity (particularly Byzantine Christianity) a vigorous reaffirmation of its monotheism*, but never appeared as the representative of a culture awaiting evangelization—the relationship of medieval Christianity to Islam was in fact modeled on its relationship to heresies (heresy*). Finally, the “external” pagan would come to be represented by any member of those societies that had newly appeared in Christian consciousness as a result of the conquest of new worlds. The conquista again raised theoretical problems of evangelization in an acute form and a new Christian evaluation of non-Christian religious experiences became an urgent necessity. To attitudes of violent negation, for which the paganism of the “Indian” was merely barbarism, were opposed methods of evangelization respectful of the new recipients of the gospel (B. de Las Casas, the Jesuit missions of Paraguay, among others), or even reaffirmations of patristic themes (e.g., Luther* defined the theological status of the Indians as a situation of “waiting,” a definition taken up and extended by the Pietist theologian Zinzendorf).

It should also no doubt be noted that the Renaissance experienced a revival of the cultural ideals of classical antiquity (already at work, in fact, since the Averroist Aristotelianism of the faculties of arts in the 13th century had brought about the rebirth of a strictly Hellenic ideal of the philosophical life), which was in part accompanied by the reappearance of a pagan quasi-religiosity. Christianity entered into modernity by learning that it was no longer the only guardian of ancient paideia, that the philosophia Christi was no longer universally considered as the paradigm of the life worth living, and that the evangelization of the intelligence was a task to be undertaken rather than one already accomplished.

An intense missionary life (from the 16th to the late 19th century), then the conclusion (often critical) of centuries of mission by a genuine flowering of the theology of missions has led recent theology to adopt a new branch, the “theology of religions” (religions*, theology of). To this is owed simultaneously a new awareness of major theological problems—“salvation* of unbelievers,” “evangelization and inculturation*,” and so forth—the vigorous reaffirmation of patristic solutions, and, in some cases, innovative theories. An ecclesiology* wishing to reach its maximum dimensions was thus able to investigate the theme of the Church descended from Abel, Ecclesia ab Abel (Y. Congar). In a theology concerned with establishing a “transcendental” bond between God* and humanity, the non-Christian might then appear in the guise of the “anonymous Christian” (K. Rahner*). A renewed hermeneutics* of non-Christian religions has been able to draw attention to the “unknown Christ* of Hinduism” (R. Pannikar), or to the pre-comprehensions of the Christian experience* provided by the vodun of Bénin (B. Adoukonou). As a conclusion as well as an encouragement, the declaration Nostra aetate and the decree Ad gentes of Vatican* II, which were not addressed only to Catholics, finally set out the guidelines for a missionary praxis and theory conceived of on the privileged model of a “dialogue” with non-Christian religions, and which accepted as a first recommendation the need to “uncover with joy and respect the seeds of the Word*” hidden in non-Christian experiences (AG 11; see Dournes 1963). The term paganism itself has disappeared, except in a passage of AG 9, where its meaning is not negative.

These theological discourses have, however, been produced in a period in which the Christianity of the West, in the name of “secularization*,” is experiencing a phenomenon that cannot be interpreted solely in terms of the erosion of traditional religious meanings, because it is also accompanied by a certain anarchic reappropriation of a totally non-Christian form of religion, frequently called post-Christian. Nietzsche* is no doubt the intellectual source of this phenomenon, not content to proclaim the “death” of God, but also embracing the cause of Dionysus against that of the Crucified One. The question of paganism can thus be raised again; and since a “neo-paganism” has appeared that bears no relation, beyond an occasional borrowing, to traditional religions, it has to be posed in new terms. It will perhaps be the role of a theological hermeneutics of the end of modernity to ask whether pagan experience (whatever the variety of styles it may adopt) is not dialectically linked to an atheism* that was initially considered as the sole spring of secularization—in short, whether in the world* reduced to its “world-being,” it is not the same thing to live “without God” (Eph 2:12) as to live under the anonymous protection of numinous beliefs. And to this end, it will always be necessary that the highly differentiated work of the theology of religions also set aside a place for the theology of religion itself.

- E. Peterson (1933), “Die Kirche aus Juden und Heiden,” in Theologische Traktate, Ausgewählte Schriften 1, Würzburg, 1994, 141–74.

- G. Fessard (1960), De l'actualité historique, vol. 1, Paris.
- J. Dournes (1963), Dieu aime les païens: Une mission de l'Église sur les plateaux du Viet-Nam, Paris.
- L. Debruyne (1971), Le Païen? Le Salut? Questions posées au décret Ad Gentes, aux théologiens, aux missionnaires, Louvain.
- R. P. C. Hanson (1972), “The Christian Attitude to Pagan Religions up to the Time of Constantine the Great,” ANRW II, 23/2, 910–73.
- P. Damboriena (1973), La salvación en las religiones no cristianas, Madrid.
- R. Bastide (1975), Le sacré sauvage, Paris.
- Cl. Bruaire (1976), “Le nouveau défi du p.,” Com(F) I/1, 28–33.
- H. U. von Balthasar (1978), Theodramatik II/2, Die Personen in Christus 331–410, “Die Kirche aus Juden und Heiden,” Einsiedeln (Dramatique divine) II/2, 1988, 288–366).
- A. Dumas (1982), “Renaissance des paganismes,” LV(L) 31, 7–18.
- C. S. Song (1982), The Compassionate God: An Exercise in the Theology of Transposition, London, not. 41–64, 127–41, and 145–260.
- A. Dumas (1985), “La séduction nouvelle du néo-paganisme,” Conc(F) 197, 99–108.
- H.-G. Gensichen (1985), “Heidentum I,” TRE 14, 590–601.
- H. J. Klauck (1995), Die religiöse Umwelt des Urchristentums, vol. 1, Stuttgart.

JEAN-YVES LACOSTE

See also Hellenization of Christianity; Inculturation; Mission/Evangelization; Philosophy; Religion, Theology of

Pagans

The theology* of pagans as individuals or groups should be distinguished both from believers and from heretics who have lapsed from belief. The theology of pagans is particularly important because, historically, it created complications for generations of Christians, particularly but not only in the late Middle Ages, and while unevangelized continents were being discovered during the Renaissance*.

If the pagans could be saved without evangelization, what necessary role, if any, did the Church* play in the mediation of salvation to the individual, whether pagan or Christian? If the pagans could not be admitted to the beatifying vision* of God, was God not creating rational beings who were ineluctably destined to have the final satisfaction demanded by their nature thwarted through no fault of their own? Was it possible so to construe the theology of the creation* and fall that human nature was not itself inscribed with an aspiration to a supernatural destiny, but might find the only satisfaction it was owed by its creator in a purely natural felicity? Would such a solution also dispose of difficulties about those dying before the birth of Jesus*, or unbaptized as infants?

The intensity of debate occasioned by these questions for 1,500 years necessarily affected the development of doctrine in western Christendom. It explains the strength of current movements in theological thinking, like salvation history, which make such Scholastic questions otiose by by-passing the whole Augustinian understanding of original sin*, grace*, and individual salvation* and the Neoplatonist (Neoplatonism*) gradations of being on which they are predicated.

It was with Augustine* that the debate became acute, although it was dominated by the ancient Greek assumption, taken for granted by Aquinas and systematized by such Renaissance authors as Pico della Mirandola and Marsilio Ficino, that being itself admits of discrete degrees. In the formal exposition given to it during the Renaissance, an exposition derived by Ficino from Plotinus and no doubt from the various hierarchies of the Dionysian corpus, the theory was modified to place humanity mid point in the order of things, with God alone having the plenitude of being, and after him coming the angels* as pure spirits, humanity as body-soul, the animals*, and then the inanimate creation.

The assumption that there was a hierarchy* of being created a host of problems for the Scholastics, including their theology of beatitude*, which required “un-created” grace or participation in the divine being itself. But what principally concerns us here is that, on the assumption of any such hierarchy, aspiration and fulfillment do not cross from one order to another. Flowers do not aspire to bark. Human nature cannot itself aspire to, accept, or be fulfilled by a supernatural* satisfaction. It is true that human nature could have been considered to have been retrospectively endowed with an aspiration to supernatural fulfillment by virtue of the redemption, but that solution carried the heretical implication that the unevangelized pagans, too, would have shared that aspiration.

God would manifestly have been unjust in creating human beings destined to be deprived of the beatitude, which alone could fulfill their aspirations, or salvation would not have depended, as it was defined to depend, on orthodoxy* of belief. The moral theologians of the later Middle Ages struggled for centuries to define the minimum creedal content of the faith* without which there could be no justification*. Invariably they insisted at least on an acknowledgement of the existence of a God who remunerated after death, and even as late as the second half of the 20th century, Catholic theological textbooks normally insisted on belief in God’s triune form as absolutely necessary for salvation.

From Augustine in the fifth century to Aquinas in the 13th, there was no doubt that human nature aspired to a fulfillment that was supernatural. It was not until the publication of Henri de Lubac*’s 1946 Surnaturel, which had to be withdrawn, and the refinement of de Lubac’s view by Karl Rahner*, that a theologically acceptable explanation was elaborated for the aspirations of redeemed humanity to supernatural fulfillment, and with it the conceptual explanation of the implied act of faith necessary for salvation.

There was now no need to suppose that non-believers innocent of personal sin and capable of virtual or implied acts of faith were bound, along with unbaptized babies, to inhabit forever the limbo in which the saints of the Old Testament had waited for admission to heaven until its portals were opened by the risen Christ*. The act of faith implicit in all moral activity could be seen as depending on justifying grace whose availability became, by virtue of the redemption, an inviolable human right. Personal moral self-determination, involving the acceptance of sanctifying grace, could be asserted without Pelagian implications, and implicit acts of faith with no creedal content could be considered to create an invisible affiliation to the perhaps unknown or even repudiated Church, normally identified with the visible hierarchical institution. It was essentially the need to account for the fate of virtuous pagans that drove theology forward toward this solution, while discussion of the destiny of unbaptized babies forced the formal abandonment of the assumption that there were grades of being. Their redeemed human nature demanded that their ultimate felicity be in the supernatural order.

What de Lubac, Rahner, their precursors and followers, had achieved naturally meant a breakdown of the fundamental metaphysical assumption that there were orders of being. This, and not Pelagianism*, was the real flaw in Molina’s theology, and its rectification was at the root of the theology of Michel de Bey (Baius) and of its defense by Cornelius Jansen, both of whom were forced into the alternative heresy of refusing any power of autonomous self-determination—“free will”—to rational human adults. If human nature was elevated to supernatural status in Adam*, then after the fall it retained that aspiration, and human beings could do nothing at all to avoid damnation. Salvation depended on an inevitably arbitrary selection by God of individuals from among the massa damnata on whom irresistible efficacious grace was to be bestowed.

The Scholastic dilemma about pagan salvation therefore concerned matters of fundamental importance to all Christian theology, from the nature and purpose of the Church to the modality of salvation within it, and even, as Hebrews xi makes clear, outside it. The question, much discussed in the first four centuries while Christian theology was still in its formative stage, became acute during the high Middle Ages. The canonical work on its history is still Louis Capéran’s 1912 Le Problème du salut des infidèles. Essai historique, and it confirms that the problem was indeed by and large limited to Latin, that is essentially Augustinian, Christendom. For the Greeks, Christ’s “descent into hell” offered pagans a chance of posthumous conversion*.

The intolerance of the western Church was beginning to increase from perhaps the 12th century, when the first public lynchings for heterodoxy are recorded. Gratian, although himself hostile to the death penalty for heresy, drew attention to its possible justification in terms of the Roman law Quisquis, which transformed the crime of injuring the maiestas of the Roman people into that of injuring the maiestas of the emperor, and carried the sentence of death, the confiscation of goods, posthumous dishonor, and the exclusion of heirs from office.

This was easily extended to cover counterfeiting, since the emperor's image appeared on the coinage, and in the Middle Ages came to be used for any sort of treason, and in particular to the offense to God included in the crime of disbelief in his revelation. The death penalty for heresy* was introduced into legislation in Aragon by 1197, into France under Louis VIII and Louis IX, and into the empire between 1234 and 1238. Innocent IV extended it to the whole of western Christendom in 1252. In his bull Unam sanctam of 1302 Boniface VIII laid down formally that there could be no salvation outside the Church, itself conceived essentially as the communion of believers. That doctrine was reiterated in the 1564 profession of faith of the Council of Trent*, and was not withdrawn in any document of the magisterium until the bull Cum occasione of 1653, which condemned the view attributed to Jansen that it was heretical to hold that Christ had died for all humanity.

The formal teaching of the Church, no doubt not universally enforced, precluded the salvation of pagans for a good three and a half centuries, during which the unevangelized continents were discovered. The result, naturally, was the huge and hugely dangerous missionary endeavor of the newly founded missionary orders, and the administrative modifications needed to deal with the missions. In 1622 Gregory XV established the Sacred Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith.

A century earlier, encouraged by the abbot Trithemius and developing the idea of mitigated punishment after death for the unevangelized, Claude Seyssel had had recourse to the state of natural felicity without either the beatific vision or any pain of loss and the state of limbo, a solution that worked only on the hypothesis that human beings did not in fact have supernatural aspirations. Luther and Melancthon on the other hand had no doubt that God had his faithful among the unevangelized, and therefore saw less urgency in missionary activity in the New World. Nevertheless, the majority of 16th-century theologians on both sides of the schisms believed in the damnation of the pagans, or retreated between such hypotheses as that of Zwingli*, that the apostles had actually themselves evangelized most of the globe. Erasmus had come very near to stating openly that Cicero had been saved.

As the theology needed to solve the problem of the non-evangelized was forced into a more liberal stance, theologians like Suarez* began to speak of faith in voto, that is, by desire. It meant a religious attitude that would have been Christian had its holder known the gospel message. Finally, of course, it was the problem of morally upright and religious unbelievers, "pagans," that forced the rethinking of the Church's nature and function in the history of salvation that has taken place with growing intensity since the Second World War, having barely been adumbrated much before it.

- Louis Capéran, Le Problème du salut des indifféles. Essai historique, Paris 1912.
- Heiko Augustinus Oberman, The Harvest of Medieval Theology, Cambridge, Mass., 1963.

ANTHONY LEVI

See also Paganism

Pantheism

"Pantheist," coined by John Toland (Socinianism Truly Stated, 1705), joins two Greek words: pan (all) and theos (god). The noun "pantheism" spread rapidly. A good deal of confusion was created by the practice, soon adopted, of applying the term retrospectively to earlier metaphysical or theological doctrines and of considering pantheism, as deism* had been in the past, as a disguised atheism*. For example, the label was applied to any metaphysical or religious doctrine that, denying the idea of a transcendent creator god, identified God* and the world*, whether the world was seen as an emanation of God (following a Neoplatonic model); or even as the body of which God was the soul; or whether God was considered as the principle and unified totality of everything that is. “‘Pantheism’ means both that everything is God and that it is the totality that is God” (Alain, Définitions). However, the doctrine does not have the same meaning if God is identified with the whole or with nature as it does if the totality of existents is related to God, in whom all things, according to Paul (Acts 17:28), are said to have “life, movement, and being.” C. Krause (1781–1832) coined panentheism to designate the doctrine that everything is in God without implying that everything is God. In fact, when it comes to philosophies (philosophy*) such as that of Spinoza, this term is more suitable than pantheism, which is primarily a polemical term.

The basic ontological presupposition is that of the singleness of being*. By means of a monist argument (or even the idea of a singleness of substance), which implies the immanence of God in everything that is, minds as well as bodies (soul*-heart-body), pantheism carries to its logical conclusion the idea of a substantial unity of all things. In this sense, a physical monism such as that of the Stoics (for whom every mind was a body, a warm breath, and even God a body made of pure fire) may be considered a form of pantheism. For its advocates, pantheism had as consequences the perfect intelligibility of all reality, a thoroughgoing necessitarianism (hence the impossibility of miracles [miracle*]), divine omnipresence*, and the ascent of all things to God: in short, a mysticism* without mystery*. But its adversaries saw other consequences: 1) the confusion of all things and the loss of individuality, a fortiori of all personality, both for God and for individual minds; 2) indifference in morality because of the lack of discrimination between all values: good* and evil*, the true and the false, freedom and necessity; 3) the equivalence of all beliefs and all religions and, in the end, the death of religion, morality, and politics.

a) History of Doctrines. Spinoza is generally considered as the archetype of the pantheist system and the model of all those that followed, because of the monism of substance and the modal status of finite individuals, in particular of man. An orthodox theologian would accept without difficulty the proposition that “nothing can either be or be conceived without God,” but not what immediately precedes it: “Whatever is, is in God” (Ethics I, Prop. XV). Spinozism is, however, rather a panentheism than pantheism, for if everything is in God, God is neither identical with the world nor with the totality of its modes. Indeed, Spinoza maintains the distinction, of Scholastic* origin, between natura naturans (God as the principle of being and life irreducible to any particular living being) and natura naturata, the totality of infinite and finite modes. Since God is made up of an infinity of infinite attributes*, only two of which we possess—namely, thought and extension—Spinozistic metaphysics can be interpreted neither as a materialist pantheism nor as a spiritualist pantheism, because God is said to be both res extensa and res cogitans.

Since the refutation of the Abbot Maret, the term pantheism has been applied to henologist metaphysics, pre-Socratic (Xenophanes), and Neoplatonic (Plotinus, Proclus) metaphysics. But if the Principle or the First is indeed the source from which freely and necessarily proceeds everything that is, the One, which is “beyond being and essence,” as it is beyond any determination and thus any thing, can never be identified with the totality of beings of the second rank (the One that exists or the intellect, the soul of the world, individual souls, and bodies) that derive from it (procreation) and reascend to it (conversion) following an eternal and infinite movement.

Just as questionable is the description as pantheist of religious doctrines with no personal divinity, such as Indian Brahmanism or Buddhism. When John the Scot Eriugena (c. 800–877) attempted in the De divisione naturae to transpose Neoplatonic arguments into the framework of Christian thought and vocabulary, he arrived at ambiguous formulations (created things, creative and not creative, come from God and return to God in accordance with an eternal process) and was condemned by Pope Honorius III in 1225. Another modality of pantheism appeared in Germany in the late 18th century and served to reconcile the ancient veneration of nature, the aspiration to a mystical fusion with God, and the Christian concept of salvation*. This is found in Goethe, as well as in the English poet, Byron.

b) Disputes of Pantheism. The question of pantheism became particularly acute with the dispute that arose in Germany out of Jacobi’s disclosure of a concealed pantheism (or more precisely a Spinozism) in Lessing. A correspondence followed with Mendelssohn (who defended a rationalist theism* opposed to Jacobi’s religion of feeling). This dispute, into which all German philosophers were drawn, played a decisive role in the genesis of German idealism. For example, it was by challenging the presumed necessary link between pantheism and fatalism that Schelling* made pantheism into the precondition for a “system of freedom.” The debate once again raised the questions of the reality of the external world, of the nature of existence, of the understanding of identity, and of the status of the absolute.

A second dispute arose in France around 1840. This concerned the spiritualism of the school of Victor Cousin (1792–1867) and the defense of an impersonal divine reason* (Francisque Bouillier 1813–99). “There is no possible middle term between Catholicism* and pantheism,” according to the Abbot Maret, who set out in his Essai sur le panthéisme des sociétés modernes what became the common form of the accusation, in Catholic terms: the refutation of a pantheism inherent in rationalist philosophies, which denied revelation* and necessarily led to fatalism, “to the cult of the senses, to the adoration of matter identified with spirit” (I. Goschler). This dispute explains the reaction among Cousin’s disciples (such as Jules Simon, 1814–96), who were concerned to distance themselves from Spinoza’s pantheism.

c) The theological condemnation comes from the fact that pantheism, by making everything that is into a necessary emanation of God, denies in principle creation* ex nihilo (the world or reality is eternal), the Incarnation*, the spirituality of God, and the distinction between nature and the supernatural*. What has been considered retrospectively as the earliest condemnations of pantheism concern in fact theological formulations attempting to express the relationship of man to God or the paths to salvation in a Neoplatonic language, as in John the Scot Eriugena (the translator of Proclus, among others). This is the case, for example, for the proposition that through his creatures, as so many theophanies (theophany*), God creates himself as God, that is, moves from ineffability to intelligibility (Amaury de Bène, condemned by the Council of Paris in 1210). It is also true for certain formulations of Meister Eckhart. The formal condemnation of pantheism by the Catholic Church* dates from the Syllabus (§1, DS 2901) of 1864, which condemns the identification of God and nature and the substantial identity of God with beings, from which follows the confusion of all values and all orders. The First Vatican* Council (De fide catholica [April 24, 1870], ch. 1: De Deo omnium creatore, DS 3023–25) declared that God is distinct from the world in reality and by his essence. And in canons 3 to 5 it anathematized a certain number of propositions considered to be pantheist, such as the substantial unity of God and things, emanationism and the denial of creation ex nihilo, and the universal and indefinite character of a God who constitutes the totality of things in determining himself. Having ceased to be a theological position in the 20th century, pantheism is no longer the object of specific condemnation, except if we discern an implicit condemnation in the suspicion provoked by the thought of Teilhard of Chardin (1881–1955), sometimes considered as a resurgence of pantheism, even though he wrote in Le phénomène humain (1955): “. . . differentiated union. The parts perfect themselves and complete themselves in any organized totality. It is because they neglected this universal rule that so many pantheisms have led us astray into the cult of a great whole in which individuals were supposed to lose themselves like drops of water, to dissolve like grains of salt in the sea.” This is proof that pantheism has remained a polemical and reductive label in relation to the monist doctrines to which it should be applied.

- John the Scot Eriugena (864–66). De divisione naturae.
- Spinoza (1677), Ethica.
- J. Toland (1720), Pantheisticon.
- F. H. Jacobi (1785), “Über die Lehre des Spinoza,” in Briefen an den Herrn Moses Mendelssohn, Breslau.
- M. Mendelssohn (1785), Morgenstunden oder über das Daseyn Gottes, Berlin.
- M. Mendelssohn (1786), An die Freunde Lessings, Berlin.
- F. W. J. Schelling (1809), Philosophische Untersuchungen über das Wesen der menschlichen Freiheit.
- C. Krause (1828), System der Philosophie, Göttingen.
- H. Ritter (1829), Die Halbkantianer und der Pantheismus, Berlin.
- I. Goschler (1832), Du panthéisme, Strasbourg.
- G. W. F. Hegel (1832), Vorlesungen über die Philosophie der Religion, Berlin.
- Abbé H. Maret (1835), Essai sur le panthéisme dans les sociétés modernes, Paris.
- F. Bouillier (1844), Théorie de la raison impersonnelle, Paris.
- J. Simon (1856), La religion naturelle, Paris.
- Aug. Valensin (1925), A travers la métaphysique, Paris.
- W. Schröder (1989), “Pantheismus,” HWP 7, 59–63.
- H. L. Nouty (1990), “Le panthéisme dans les lettres françaises au XVIIIe siècle,” RSHum, 435 Sq.

JACQUELINE LAGRÉE

See also Atheism; Deism and Theism; Omnipresence, Divine; Platonism, Christian; Vatican I, Council of Pantocrator. See Omnipotence, Divine

Papias of Hierapolis. See Apostolic Fathers

Parable

1. A Method of Literary and Theological Expression of the Historic Jesus

a) Sources. As a teller of parables Jesus* joined the long Jewish Old Testament Tradition* of the mashal. In the Old Testament the mashal is a statement in the form of a comparison. The parable is a particular type of mashal. It aims to reveal the meaning of a person, object, or event by linking the subject—by means of a developed comparison—to another sphere of reality. The Old Testament includes five real parables: the one about the poor man's ewe that Nathan relays to David (2 Sm 12:1–7), Tekoa's parable (2 Sm 14:1–20), the parable of one of the Sons of the Prophets (1 Kgs 20:39–43), the Song of the Vineyard (Is 5:1–7), and the Parable of the Farmer (Is 28:23–29).

In the Jewish tradition, the mashal (matla in Aramaic) is a general term, used for any of a number of different types of figurative discourse, including simple comparison, developed example, parable, fable, allegory, symbol, saying, and maxim. Most of the rabbinic parables are authentic parables, to which should be added many allegories. Parables belong to the Haggada. "From a literary viewpoint, it is a form of the midrash, its Sitz im Leben [placement in social life] is the rabbinic homily, its aim is pedagogic" (Dietrich 1958). It borrows its wealth of imagery from everyday life. Thanks to the parable "one grasps the words of the Torah as a king finds a lost pearl in a palace thanks to the flame of a lamp" (Midrash Genèse Rabbah I, 8). Parabolè is the usual term in the New Testament (it is used 50 times); but John chooses the term paroimia (which he uses five times).

b) Attribution. In the unanimous opinion of the critics, parables are one of the most characteristic expressions of the historic Jesus' preaching*. The synoptic tradition (the Gospels* of Matthew, Mark, and Luke) has preserved about 40 of them. This important collection makes it possible to discover Jesus' language, his pragmatic aims, and the theological heart of his message. However, only a critical analysis makes it possible to reconstitute the original form of Jesus' words, for Jesus himself wrote nothing down and the only documentation available today consists of the Greek translations of the parables preserved in the first three Gospels in the second half of the first century (see also the Gnostic Gospel According to Thomas 9, 64, 65, 107, etc.).

2. Forms of the Parable

Among the extant parables, the history of biblical forms, or genres, distinguishes the following categories: 1) The word-image is a rhetorical device in which the thing mentioned and the image are juxtaposed, without a particle of comparison, as in Mark 2:21–22. 2) The metaphor is an abridged comparison without a particle of comparison; the image is substituted for the thing meant, as in Matthew 5:13. 3) The simile is a comparison in which the thing meant and the image are ordered correctly in relation to each other by the particle of comparison as or like—for example, Matthew 24:27. 4) The hyperbole is an exaggeration of the image, as in Matthew 10:30. 5) The similitude, in the strict sense of Gleichnis, is a word-image or a developed comparison that brings to the language a typical scene of everyday life. Its persuasive powers come from the evocation of what is commonly accepted. What is not very clear or disputed is thus elucidated analogically by what is well known—for example, Luke 15:4–7. 6) The true parable (Parabolè) seems like the narration of a particular interesting event involving one or several people. It makes no appeal to common sense but gets its suggestive powers from the extraordinary episode that it evokes, as in Luke 15:3–7, the Parable of the Lost Sheep. 7) The *exemplary narrative is similar to the parable because of its narrative character, but it differs from it by its lack of a metaphoric dimension. It offers an example of behavior that calls for imitation, without any other transposition—for example, Luke 10:30–36. 8) The Allegory is “a developed metaphor in which each trait has its own meaning” (X. Léon-Dufour, Dictionnaire du Nouveau Testament), as in Mark 4:13–20.

3. From Comparison to Metaphor

Among the forms listed above, two of them, similitude and the parable proper, attract particular attention. The controversy centers on the way in which they should be interpreted. Recent research, enriched by work on the metaphor (see Jüngel, Ricoeur, and Wilder) has proposed a new reading of the parables (see J. D. Crossan, Funk, Harnisch, and Weder) without, at the same time, totally abandoning the classical approach proposed by A. Jülicher. The question of the historicity of the opening formula: “the Kingdom* of God is like . . .” (which might lead to the discovery of the solution to the discussion. If this formula goes back to the historic Jesus, the parables should be read as similes. If this introductory phrase is a later addition, then another method is required. Both types of images appear, in fact, in the most ancient examples of the tradition.

a) Analogy. In at least five cases the introductory formula seems to go back to the historic Jesus (Mk 4:26 and 4:30–31 and Mt 13:33 and 13:44). If that is so, the image (Bildhälfte) set in motion by the parable—an image that consists either of an everyday scene or of a particular instance—is at the service of the theme (Sachhälfte). In this hypothesis (see Jülicher) the parable aims at cognitive enhancement. Based on the principle of analogy*, it invites the reader to make a transfer of judgment. The concept discovered at the level of the image (Bildhälfte) should be carried over to the initial theme (Sachhälfte). From the moment that the addressee has discovered the tertium comparationis, which links the theme and the image, he is empowered to solve the problem the parable wanted to deal with, and he can do that by applying to the set problem the solution induced by the image. The parable thus functions as a transfer of judgment by analogy, it has a rhetorical function.

One should beware of all simplifications. The appeal to common sense, which characterizes the parable constructed on the model of a simile, can also appear in parables lacking an introductory formula (see, for instance, Lk 11:5–8 and 15:3–10). Only the analysis of the logical functioning of the parable makes it possible to class it as a rhetorical parable-argument or as a parable-metaphor.

b) Change. However, it so happens that in their original phrasing the majority of the parables lack an introductory formula. How should these little fictional narratives be read then? Here the theory of metaphor is brought into play. The parable aims to be read as an expanded metaphor. What does that mean? In the poetic, the metaphor’s distinctive feature is the tension established between the word and the heterogeneous semantic field into which it is introduced. From the dissonance thus created flows a wealth of unexpected meaning. When the metaphor is got up as a narrative, the tension is embedded in the organization of the plot. This tension results from the collision of two conceptions of reality—that is, when an initial conception, derived from the ordinary and everyday, clashes with an extraordinary conception. This irruption of the extraordinary, although it may sometimes have dramatic reasons, responds, in fact, to deeper necessities. It is a matter of disconcerting the reader, of unsettling his image of the world, and of making him discover new existential possibilities. The parable then becomes a language of change.

c) Performativity. The above shows that Jesus’ parables are not in the first place a teaching about the reign/kingdom of God, but that the very enunciation by Jesus of a parable makes the reign/kingdom of God happen as an event in the present. This performative character of the parable signals at the same time that the identity of the speaker takes on a decisive significance. Only the one who claims to be the eschatological envoy of God* can create from the enunciation of a parable the space in which the reign/kingdom of God can become an event.

4. Message of the Parables

Jesus’ eschatological preaching, that is, the announcement of the fact that the kingdom of God is near, constitutes the central theme developed in the parables. This theme is approached from the following angle. What happens when God establishes his reign? How does this reign reveal itself in the midst of the world of men? How are human reality and existence affected by it?

According to Jesus’ parables, God enters the everyday in a hidden and unexpected way. He challenges reality as it is experienced; he transforms it and opens it onto a completely new and surprising future. For the listeners, this future comes to pass at the very moment when the parable is told by Jesus. A fragment of the eschatological kingdom, this future that bursts into the present, transforms it into a place of happiness and promise*. It bears witness to the immeasurable love of God for all his creatures and to his gift to mankind of incomprehensible liberty*. The God who suddenly appears in the parables frees men from their problematic past, from their alienating attachments; he begins a new history* with them. According to Crossan's beautiful expression, the parables are "the house of God" in the midst of the history of man. If that is so, the parable is not simply a pedagogical tool that Jesus used to expound in a figurative way a theological theme and that could, when necessary, be dispensed with; it is only as a parable and in the shape of a parable that the reign of God can enter into language and appear before Jesus' listener.

The reign of God that comes as Jesus tells a parable, constitutes a call to conversion*. The required change is adhesion to Jesus in whose person the Kingdom is near and divine love is offered to all, particularly to the excluded. But if the parables are an appeal to change, they simultaneously make change possible. The Jesus of the parables gives what he demands.

5. Reception of the Parables in the Gospels

The transmission of the parables during the first Christian generations led to their being put into writing. This transfer to written form was a major event, for the parables thus became texts open to interpretation. The act of putting the parables into a narrative form, the developments and modifications they underwent, the commentaries to which they gave rise are so many traces of this interpretative work. The history of the reception of the parables in the Gospels raises the following question: Are we dealing with a history of textual corruption marked by the distortion of the parabolic tradition or are we faced with a story in which the true tradition of Jesus has been preserved? It does not seem wise to make a unilateral decision on this alternative, because consistent arguments can be marshaled for both theses. It can be said at the onset that, during the course of their transmission, the original form of Jesus' words has undeniably been modified.

Joachim Jeremias, in his influential book on the parables, brought up four characteristic elements of this process: 1) the putting into narrative form of the synoptic parables in the Gospels involved a transfer of communication—a change of the speaker and of the listener; 2) the parables were often slanted in an ethical sense; 3) the time of the Church* from Easter to the Parousia*, with all its specific problems, was often inserted into the plot of the parables; 4) many parables were subjected to the process of allegorization. But, on the other hand, it should be noted that the history of the parable's reception is not necessarily the reflection of textual corruption; we should not exclude the idea that the processes of modification were induced by the parables themselves. Thus, the frequently observed secondary adjunction "the kingdom of God is like . . ." does no more than bring into the language the original theme of the parables—that is, the advent of God's reign.

Finally, the progressive Christologization of the parables (the inclusion of the parables in the evangelical narrative and the introduction of the person* of Jesus into the parable's narrative itself) does no more than assert in a pertinent way that the evangelical parables are inseparable from their original hearer. In the end, in order to evaluate in a relevant way whether the reception of the parables is marked with the seal of fidelity or of distortion, one should ask oneself, in each individual case, whether the parable has remained "that fictional narrative which makes the nearness of the basileia [Kingdom] happen as an event of which Christ* is an integral part" (Marguerat 1989).

- A. Jülicher (1910), Die Gleichnisreden Jesu, 2nd Ed., Tübingen (repr. Darmstadt, 1976).
- C. H. Dodd (1935), The Parables of the Kingdom, London (2nd Ed. 1941).
- J. Jeremias (1947), Die Gleichnisse Jesu, Göttingen (2nd Ed. 1970).
- R. Bultmann (1957), Die Geschichte der synoptischen Tradition, 6th Ed., Göttingen.
- E. L. Dietrich (1958), "Gleichnis und Parabel," RGG 3 2, 1616–17.
- W. Harnisch (Ed.) (1982 a), Die Gleichnisse Jesu: Positionen der Auslegung von Adolph Jülicher bis zur Formgeschichte, Darmstadt; id. (1982 b), Die neutestamentliche Gleichnisforschung im Horizont von Hermeneutik und Literaturwissenschaft, Darmstadt.
- H. Weder (1984), Die Gleichnisse Jesu als Metaphern, 5th Ed., Göttingen.
- H. J. Klaus (1986), Allegorie v. Allegorese in synoptischen Gleichnistexten, 2nd Ed., Münster.
- J. Delorme (Ed.) (1989), Les paraboles évangéliques: Perspectives nouvelles, Paris.
- D. Marguerat (1989), "La parabole, de Jésus aux Évangiles; une histoire de réception," in J. Delorme (Ed.) 1989, 61–88.

JEAN ZUMSTEIN

See also Hermeneutics; Jesus, Historical; Kingdom of God; Literary Genres in Scripture; Mystery; Narrative; Prophet and Prophecy; Wisdom

Paraclete. See Holy Spirit

Paradise. See Life, Eternal; Vision, Beatific

Parish. See Local Church; Pastor

Parousia

The Greek word parousia simply means “presence.” In Hellenistic usage, however, it was often used in a technical sense for the visit of a ruler or the manifestation of a god. The visit of an imperial ruler to a provincial city was a momentous occasion. Diodore of Sicily (4, 3, 3) tells of the cultic parousia of Dionysus in the Theban mysteries, and the parousia of a god could also be experienced in dreams.

In the New Testament, parousia is a technical term for the manifestation of Christ* in glory*. It occurs six times in the Thessalonian correspondence (1 Thes 2:19, 3:13, 4:15, 5:23; 2 Thes 2:1, 2:8), and once in Corinthians 15:23. In the synoptics, it is found only in Matthew, who uses it four times (24:3, 27, 37, 39) in his apocalyptic discourse. It also occurs in 1 John 2:28; 2 Peter 1:16, 3:4, and 3:12; and James 5:7f. The synoptic parallels to Matthew 24 point the way to Parousia in a Jewish context. Where Matthew speaks of the Parousia, Luke refers to the “Son of Man in his day” (Lk 17:24) or to the “days of the Son of Man” (17:26). It seems, therefore, that the term parousia is used primarily in Hellenistic contexts to refer to the coming of the Lord. The more traditional Jewish expressions are “the day of the Lord” and the coming of the Son of Man. Parousia does not occur in Revelation, the New Testament work that is most preoccupied with the coming of the Lord.

The Christian expectation of the Parousia of Christ must be seen against the background of Israelite and Jewish traditions. The oldest traditions concern the manifestation of YHWH as a warrior who leads his people from the southern mountains to the promised land (Dt. 33:2–3; Jgs 5:4–5). The Psalms* reflect the expectation that God* will come to judge the Earth (Ps 98:9). The prophet* Amos, however, turns this expectation against the people of Israel*. For him, the day of the Lord will be a day of darkness and not light (Am 5:18). Thereafter, the prophets associate the day of the Lord with the terrible judgment* of God (e.g., Zep 1:14–15 and 2:2; Jl 1:15 and 2:1). In the Book of Daniel, however, the emphasis is once again on the deliverance of Israel. Daniel’s vision of “one like a son of man” who comes on the clouds and receives a kingdom from the Ancient of Days (Dn 7) had enormous importance for early Christianity. The “one like a son of man” is clearly distinguished from YHWH, yet he rides on the clouds like a divine figure. From a very early time, this figure was identified as the Messiah*, even though he has a heavenly character (1 Enoch 37–71; 4 Ezr 13). We continue to find references to the coming of God in the Pseudepigrapha (e.g., 1 Enoch 1: 3–9; Assumption of Moses 10:3–7), but the advent of a messianic figure of God’s agent is more directly relevant to the Christian expectation of the Parousia of Christ.

In the New Testament, Parousia always refers to the coming of Christ in glory. This expectation must have arisen in the earliest stage of the Christian movement, after Easter. There can be little doubt that the formulation of this expectation in terms of the coming of the Son of Man originated in the Aramaic-speaking environment of Palestine. The use of the term Parousia in Paul’s letters is already a secondary development, which reformulates the expectation in Greek terminology for a Diaspora setting.

Matthew 24 provides the most complete description of the anticipated Parousia (compare the apocalyptic discourses in Mark 13 and Luke 26, where the term is not used). It will be preceded by various signs, but it will come “as lightning comes from the East and flashes as far as the West” (Mt 24:27). It will be accompanied by cosmic disturbances (the sun will be darkened, etc.) and then the Son of man will gather the elect with the blast of a trumpet (24:31). The trumpet blast is also mentioned in 1 Thessalonians 4:16. In this passage, Paul makes it clear that he expects the Parousia within the lifetimes of his generation. The sense of anticipation and vigilance required by the imminence of the Parousia is vividly seen in Matthew’s parable* of the 10 bridesmaids (Mt 25:1–13): “Keep awake, therefore, for you know not the day nor the hour.” Where Matthew urges wakefulness, James calls for patience (Jas 5:7–8). Paul finds in the imminence of the Parousia a source of encouragement.

Parousia is never used in the New Testament with reference to the earthly life of Jesus. There is only one Parousia and it is not properly a “return.” It is the first coming of Christ in glory. Only later, in the early church*, do we find the idea of two Parousias (e.g., Justin, Apologia 52, 3; Dialogus cum Tryphone 14, 8; 49, 2 and 7; 53,1; 54,1). By then, the expectation of a glorious Parousia had receded into the future.

- A. Oepke (1967), “Parousia, pareimi,” ThWNT 5, 856–69.
- C. Perrot (1983), La venue du Seigneur: Le retour du Christ, Brussels.
- R. Jewett (1986), The Thessalonian Correspondence, Philadelphia.
- C. Rowland (1992), “Parousia,” AncBD 5, 166–70.

JOHN J. COLLINS

See also Apocalyptic Literature; Eschatology; Intertestament; Judgment; Messianism/Messiah; Son of Man

Participation. See Analogy; Being

Pascal, Blaise

1623–1662

In Pascal’s complete works the word “theology*” occurs very seldom and it is doubtful whether the idea it represents would in itself have interested him. The famous §65 of his Pensées mentions it only as a representative example of “diversity”: “Theology is a science, but at the same time how many sciences are there?” No doubt Pascal would only have drafted a truly theological discourse at the close of his Apologie de la religion chrétienne. Several concepts or doctrines, however, can be defined as representing an undeniable theological endeavor on Pascal’s part.

a) Christology: Jesus Christ the Mediator. Despite his family’s (second) conversion under the influence of a disciple of Saint-Cyran in 1646, and despite his friendships at Port-Royal, Pascal would be known solely as a precocious scientific genius if he had not become aware of one certainty: nothing can separate us from the love* of God* that is in Jesus* Christ, according to Romans 8, 38 et seq. Apamphlet, called by its editors Le Mémorial, and dated 23 November 1654, attests to that awareness. Both existential and theoretical, this fundamental text unfolds the problematics of access to God: it is in Jesus Christ alone that God consents to manifest himself; God is “the God of Jesus Christ,” “not the God of the philosophers and scholars.” Access to God occurs within a struggle between separation, which is sin, and non-separation, which is acquired by conversion: “Jesus Christ, I separated myself from him: I fled from him, renounced him, crucified him. May I never be separated from him.” Pascal’s singularity consists in his simultaneous imagining of absolute separation, and even “the unconquerable difference between God and us” (§378; §418; see also Le Mystère de Jésus, §919), and conversion. The latter option is no longer understood as a metanoia or an épistrophè that would cause one to turn toward the being of which one is the image (Pascal never quotes Genesis 1, 26). Instead, conversion “consists of annihilating oneself” (§378), because it is Christ* himself who annihilates himself in one (Galatians 2:19 Sq; §919). The fact that Christ is the unique mediator means therefore that he is himself the disunion, the disproportion between God and man, the infinite* and the finite, holiness and sin: “In Jesus Christ all contradictions are brought into harmony” (§257), that is, not resolved but preserved and accepted. Conversely, God himself “regards men only through the mediator Jesus Christ” (Lettre sur la mort de son père, 1651).

b) Quarrels about Grace and the Morality of the Casuists. From the year 1655 onward, Pascal devoted the greater part of his energies to serving Port-Royal, firstly with his Écrits sur la grâce (1655–56), and then, in the polemic against the Jesuits, by composing under a pseudonym the Lettres écrites par Louis de Montalte à un provincial... (1656–57), better known as The Provincial Letters. The first four deal with the question of grace*. The remainder attack the Jesuits on the grounds of their moral theology. They are called “the new casuists,” and accused of having the “intention” of “corrupting morals” by means of their two highly effective weapons: the “doctrine of probabilism” and the “method of directing the intention.” In the Provinciales it is difficult to make a precise distinction between Pascal’s work, and that of Arnauld and Nicole, who prepared most of the documentation for him. Be that as it may, although Les Provinciales express a strictly Jansenist theology and morality, and although they became unprecedented bestsellers by using the clandestine press to carry into the public arena debates hitherto reserved for specialists, they are not totally exempt from a charge of unfairness in their treatment of the quotations borrowed from their Casuist adversaries. The magisterium* found the Jansenists in error regarding the question of grace: on the other hand it took its lead from the Provinciales as well as the Écrits des Curés de Paris (the production of which Pascal had been involved in) by condemning laxism (1665–66). But the final failure of the Provinciales (Pascal put an end to their campaign with the 18th Letter, dated 24 March 1657, after the Bull Ad sacram’s condemnation of the “Five Propositions of Jansenism”) led Pascal to turn toward an ambitious project, his Apologie de la religion.

c) Apologetics: The Greatness and Wretchedness of Man. The Conférence à Port-Royal (probably 1657) laid out the traditional bipartite anthropology* of man’s greatness (dignitas) and wretchedness (miseria), which had already provided the organizing principle of the Entretien avec M. de Sacy. The Conférence used the idea of a “twofold state of the nature*” of humankind (§131), incomprehensible to philosophy*, in order to undertake to show, by following the Augustinian model of apologetics in his De vera religione, that there exists a true religion that alone can explain the “astonishing contradictions” of/in man (§149). For wretchedness and greatness should be attributed to different objects, to nature and to grace respectively, of which man is a synthesis just as Christ is a union of two natures. Man is undecipherable without the key to the two states: the state that he had at the creation* and the one in which he found himself after the Fall (Magnard 1975). In the prosopoeia of §149, Wisdom* tells men: “You are not in the state of your creation . . . Look at yourselves and see whether you do not find in yourselves the living characteristics of those two natures.” His ahistorical use of the concept of state is seemingly an original point among Pascal’s resumption of classical themes; even more original appears to be his fixing of man’s state between two extremes, called “the two infinities,” a theme that Disproportion de l’homme (§199) elaborates.

Other reflections and other documents (probably conceived earlier) and that make up the collection that is known today by the title Pensées later joined the fundamental structure of Pascal's projected Apologie, based on that bipartite anthropology. Two of them should be mentioned. Firstly, the material about miracles (miracle*) as proof of the truth* of the Christian religion, a reflection provoked by the miracle of the Holy Thorn. This occurred a year before the last Provincial Letter, on 24 March 1656, at Port-Royal in Paris, and cured Marguerite Périer, Pascal's niece, of a weeping fistula (the ecclesiological and apologetic issues arising from miracles of the Holy Thorn would remain very important throughout the 17th century). Secondly, the concept of figurative structures, which orders all the proofs drawn from the Bible* ("That the law* was a figure," §245—Pascal's interpretation of the Scriptures is always basically figurative, which is remarkable for the 17th century). Pascal accomplished groundbreaking work in this area: because, although his God is a hidden God, Deus absconditus (Is 45:15), it would be a matter of seeing him, something of which the Eucharist is the paradigm: "This sacrament contains at the same time both Jesus Christ's presence and his image" (§733).

d) Ecclesiology: The Limbs of Thought. Pascal's last reflection abandons apologetics to meditate on Paul's doctrine of the mystical body by setting out the broad lines of a "Christian morality, that is, by developing the passage about the "the reflections of the limbs." Pascal used the model of the relation between the body's limbs (soul*-heart-body) (Rom 12 and 1 Cor 12) in order to solve the problem of justified self-love*, according to the Cartesian definition of love (Passions de l'âme, art. 80): "In order to regulate the love one feels for oneself, one must imagine a body composed of thinking members, for we are members of the whole, and then we must see how each member ought to love itself" (§368).

The I loves itself legitimately only by loving the whole, that is by loving itself as the whole loves it: the legitimate love of oneself consists therefore in internalizing a difference: the I should love itself in the way that another—Christ—loves it. This is how Pascal understood 1 John 4, 19 ("We love because he first loved us"). Thereafter, Descartes* supplied the conceptual tools for thinking about Christ's body, since it is love that creates the whole. There followed a new reading of 1 Corinthians 12, 14ff. followed, which differs from its mystical interpretation: "By loving the body, it [the limb] loves itself, because it has no being except in the body, through the body, and for the body. 'Qui adhaeret Deo, unus spiritus est' [He who cleaves to God is a single spirit]" (§372). The Trinity*, very rarely evoked by Pascal, forms its model: "We love ourselves because we are members of Jesus Christ; we love Jesus Christ because he is the body of which we are members. All is one, one is in the other, like the Three Persons [person*]" (§372).

The surprising metaphor according to which Christ is the body (and not the body's head) to which one belongs as a limb, and that the Port-Royal edition corrected, finds a parallel in the Prière pour demander à Dieu le bon usage des maladies (whose "thinking limbs" resemble his theological borrowing) that, after having addressed the Father, addresses the Son: "Your passion*, which you accomplish in your members, as far as the your body's perfect consummation." This original, somewhat Johannine-Cartesian doctrine of Christ's body, therefore constitutes a discourse on freedom of consent (§370), or on the identification of love and will. It is undoubtedly here that Pascal, making his final escape from the "narrow confines of Port-Royal" (Balthasar*), anticipates Rousseau by imagining a concrete figure of the will. Pascal's apologetics end with an "ecclesiological synthesis" (Martineau 1994), a synthesis accepted from the moment when "unity in love" forced Pascal to conceive "love as a unity."

• Works, Ed. L. Lafuma, Paris, 1963.

Oeuvres Complètes, Ed. Jean Mesnard, 4 vols. published, Paris, 1964–92.

About Pensées: Pensées de M. Pascal sur la religion, et sur quelques autres sujets (Ed. of Port-Royal), Paris, 1670 (repr. Saint-Étienne, 1971); Pensées..., Ed. L. Lafuma, 3 vols., Paris, 1951; Discours sur la religion et sur quelques autres sujets, Ed. E. Martineau, Paris, 1992; our citations follow the Lafuma numbering.

About Provinciales: Ed. L. Cognet, Paris, 1965.

♦ H. Bremond (1920), Histoire littéraire du sentiment religieux..., vol. 4, Paris.

J. Lhermet (1931), P. et la Bible, Paris.

R. Guardini (1935), Christliches Bewußtsein: Versuche über P., Leipzig.

J. Russier (1949), La foi selon Pascal, Paris.

J. Laporte (1950), Le cœur et la raison selon Pascal, Paris.

H.-U. von Balthasar (1962), Herrlichkeit II/2, Einsiedeln, 537–600.

G. Rodis-Lewis (1963), "Les trois concupiscences," ChPR 11–14 (and in coll., Pascal. Textes du Tricentenaire, Paris, 1963).

H. Gouhier (1966), Blaise Pascal Commentaires, Paris.

P. Sellier (1966), Pascal et la liturgie, Paris.

A. Gounelle (1970), La Bible selon Pascal, Paris.

J. Miel (1970), Pascal and Theology, London-Baltimore.

P. Sellier (1970), Pascal et saint Augustin, Paris.

J. Orcibal (1972), "La signification du miracle et sa place dans l'ecclésiologie pascalienne," ChPR 20–21, 83–95.

H. Gouhier (1974), Pascal et les humanistes chrétiens: L'affaire Saint-Ange, Paris.

P. Magnard (1975), Nature et histoire dans l'apologétique de Pascal, Paris.

J. Mesnard (1976), Les Pensées de Pascal, Paris.

A. Feuillet (1977), L'agonie de Gethsémani, Paris.

T. Shiokawa (1977), Pascal et les miracles, Paris.

Pascal, Blaise

- J. Mesnard (1983), "Pascal," DSp 12, 279–91.
H. Gouhier (1986), Blaise P. Conversion et apologétique, Paris.
J.-L. Marion (1986), Sur le prisme métaphysique de Descartes, ch. V, Paris.
P. Force (1989), Le problème herméneutique chez Pascal, Paris.
V. Carraud (1992), Pascal et la philosophie, Paris.
J. Mesnard (1992), La culture du XVIIe siècle, Paris, 305–484.
V. Carraud (1994), "Les deux infinis moraux et le bon usage des passions: Pascal et les Passions de l'âme," XVIIe siècle 46, 4, 669–94.
E. Martineau (1994), "Deux clés de la chronologie des discours pascaliens," ibid., 695–729.

- D. Leduc-Fayette (1996), Pascal et le mystère du mal, Paris.
V. Carraud (1997), "Des concupiscences aux ordres de choses," RMM 102, 41–66.

VINCENT CARRAUD

See also Anthropology; Apologists; Augustine of Hippo; Bañezianism-Molinism-Baianism; Casuistry; Christ and Christology; Conversion; Descartes, René; Ecclesiology; Jansenism; Love

Paschal Mystery. See Passover

Paschasius Radbert. See Eucharist

Passion

A. Biblical Theology

Passio in Latin and pathèma in Greek mean "what one experiences," in feeling or suffering. The last meaning survives in English only for the passion of Christ*, the sum of his suffering, from his agony in Gethsemane (Mt 26: 36–46 and parallels) to his death on the cross and burial (Mt 27:50–61 and parallels). The expression "passion of Christ" is found nowhere in the New Testament, and the noun is used only in the plural pathèmata. The Gospels* do not use the substantive but the verb form, notably in foretelling the passion: "And he began to teach them that the Son of man must suffer (pathein) many things, and be rejected...and be killed" (Mk 8:31 and parallels). The verb is also used without an object (without naming the types of sufferings) in Luke, Acts, and Hebrews, and in 1 Peter 2:21: "Christ also suffered (epathen) for you."

It is noteworthy that the Easter proclamation of Jesus'* resurrection* did not have the consequence of causing his passion to be understood as an unfortunate interlude that was soon remedied. On the contrary, believers were led to remember it all the better. Being the very fruit of his passion, the glory* of the Risen One revealed the value of his sufferings, which were understood as the source of “a newness of life” (Rom 6:4) and as providing “an example” to be followed (1 Pt 2:21).

a) Predictions. The narrative of the passion takes up a large part of the Gospels and forms a coherent whole. In the synoptics its importance is emphasized in advance by three predictions, which provide a structure for the second half of those Gospels (Mk 8:31–33, 9:31, 10:32–34 and parallels). The literary nature of this presentation should not lead us to doubt its historical basis. Jesus was aware that his words and actions were provoking growing hostility (see Mk 2:8, 3:5, and 3:22–23). Determined not to “resist one who is evil” (Mt 5:39), he foresaw the consequence and recognized in it an aspect of God*’s plan as revealed in the Scriptures, a plan that would find fulfillment in divine victory (see Mt 21:38–42 and parallels; Gn 37:20, 45:17, and 50:20; and Is 52:13–53:12). We see the same thing in the Fourth Gospel, where Jesus’ trial is anticipated in the course of his public life (Jn 5:16–45, 8:12–59, and 10:24–39). Jesus shows himself to be aware that he is threatened with death (Jn 7:1, 7:19, 8:37, and 8:40). There are attempts to arrest Jesus (Jn 7:30, 7:44, and 10:39) and to stone him (Jn 8:59 and 10:31), though these do not meet with success, “because his hour had not yet come” (Jn 7:30 and 8:20).

b) Principal Facts. The passion narratives are not historical reconstructions but religious narratives* intended for use in preaching* and meditation. The passion is presented as a mysterious and very disconcerting event, even though it was predicted by Scripture (Mk 14:49 and parallels). The narratives show human sin*, as well as the divine manner of confronting that sin by bearing its terrible consequences. Written with surprising restraint, the narratives do not express pity at Jesus’ suffering. His agony, however, shows him afflicted with deathly sorrow (Mt 26:38 and parallels; Ps 42:6), which he overcomes by praying intensely (Mt 26:39–44 and parallels). Then comes the arrest on the Mount of Olives, brought about through Judas’ betrayal of his master (Mt 26:47–50 and parallels); Jesus forbids his disciples to offer any armed resistance (Mt 26:51–54 and parallels). Taken before the high priest, he is questioned and accused; it is decided that he should be put to death (Mt 26:57–66 and parallels). Peter*, who has come as far as the courtyard, loses courage and denies his master (Mt 26:69–75 and parallels). In the course of the night Jesus is subjected to harsh treatment (Mt 26:67–68 and parallels). In the morning the Sanhedrin turns him over to the Roman authorities (Mt 27:2 and parallels). Pilate questions him (Mt 27:11–14 and parallel s), then makes an offer to the crowd either to release Jesus or a rebel called Barabbas (Mt 27:15–23 and parallels). Mocked by Roman soldiers, who crown him with thorns (Mt 27:27–31 and parallels), Jesus is whipped (Mt 27:26 and parallels), and taken to Calvary, where he is crucified between two thieves (Mt 27:31–38 and parallels). He dies on the cross, giving a loud cry (Mt 27:50 and parallels). A rich man takes care of his burial (Mt 27:57–61 and parallels). At more than one point, variations among the narratives and other considerations pose problems in establishing historical accuracy in the modern sense.

c) Spiritual Meaning. The beginnings of the synoptic narratives show that the passion is a part of God’s plan (Mt 26:42 and parallels) and was necessary for the fulfillment of Scripture* (26:54, 56 and parallels). The “must” of the passion predictions (Mk 8:31 and parallels) had already suggested this perspective. The narratives provide no other explanation as they unfold. The deeper sense of the events is never explained. It is in earlier portions of the Gospels that light is cast on the passion, as, for example, by Jesus’ words when he declares that he has come “to give his life as a ransom for many” (Mt 20:28 and parallels; see also Jn 6:51), and particularly by what he does during the Last Supper (Eucharist*). There he presents in advance his body and the blood he will shed, and he transforms these into a gift of himself to his disciples (Mt 26:26–28 and parallels). In this way he accomplishes a complete reversal of the meaning of the event: the execution of a condemned man, a radical break, is transformed into the foundation of a perfect covenant* (see 1 Cor 1:18–25). The Fourth Gospel provides the key to this accomplishment: The passion is a work of love*. The love given by God (Jn 3:16 and 15:9) has led Jesus to be “the good shepherd,” who “lays down his life for the sheep” (Jn 10:11). “Greater love has no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends” (15:13; see 13:1; 19:30). The apostle Paul sees the passion in the same light (Rom 5:6–8, Gal 2:20, and Eph 5:2 and 25–27). Understood in this way, the cross of Christ, instead of seeming absurd and scandalous, is recognized as “the power of God and the wisdom of God” (1 Cor 1:24), for it is an instrument of redemption, of reconciliation, and of the covenant. According to Hebrews the passion is a new type of priestly sacrifice, which makes of Christ a perfect “mediator of a new covenant” (Heb 9:15). On the one hand, he is fully accepted by God, whose salvific will he has generously fulfilled (Heb 5:8–10 and 10:5–10). On the other hand, he is closely united with the people, “his brethren,” whose suffering he has taken on himself (Heb 2:17–18).

d) Participation. To “share Christ’s sufferings” (1 Pt 4:13) is thus a grace* at the same time as a duty of love. One cannot be a disciple of Christ without bearing the cross after him (Mt 16:24 and parallels). Peter explains that it is a matter of “doing right” (1 Pt 2:15), even and especially when “you do right and suffer for it” (1 Pt 2:20). John declares: “we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren” (1 Jn 3:16). Paul insists on the necessity of participating in the passion in order to be united with Christ (Rom 8:17 and Phil 3:10). He calls his tribulations as an apostle* a sharing in “Christ’s sufferings” (2 Cor 1:5); they bring him comfort and great joy (2 Cor 7:4–7) and they are fruitful for the Church* (2 Cor 4:8–12 and Col 1:24).

e) Narrative Perspectives. While generally in agreement, each gospel narrative of the passion has its own perspective.

Writing with his customary spontaneity, Mark allows us to experience the shock of events, the disconcerting fulfillment of God’s plan. He bluntly describes Jesus’ fate as anguished, betrayed, denied, falsely accused, condemned, and crucified. To those who know how to read him, however, Mark shows light through the darkness. The passion, in his understanding, reveals the identity of Jesus, the “Son of God” (Mk 15:39; see also 14:61–62), as well as his work, which is that of putting an end to the old cult* and of building a new, immaterial, temple* so that human beings may meet God (Mk 14:58).

More ecclesial and doctrinal, Matthew sheds light on events by using Jesus’ own words (Mt 26:52–54) and by allusions to the Old Testament (Mt 26:38, 26:56, 27:9, 27:35, 27:43, and 27:46). The episode of the “blood money” (Mt 27:3–10) clearly establishes responsibility. Whereas a Gentile woman intervenes on the side of Jesus (Mt 27:19), his own people condemn him (Mt 27:25). Accompanied by an eschatological upheaval (Mt 27:51ff.; see also Mt 28:2–4), the death of Jesus provokes a collective confession of faith* (Mt 27:54).

Sometimes considered more of an historian, Luke moves the interrogation that Mark places at night to the morning (Lk 22:66–71) and adds an appearance before Herod (Lk 23:6–12). His narrative especially demonstrates the personal attachment of the disciple, seen in repeated affirmations of Jesus’ innocence (Lk 23:4, 23:14–15, 23:22, and 23:41), insistent exhortations (Lk 22:40, 22:46, 23:28–31, and 23:40), and the omission of offensive and cruel details, including accounts of hostile witnesses, condemnation, and harsh treatment. The cross produces conversion* (23:47–48) and salvation* (23:42f.).

Very different from the others, John presents a glorifying passion (see Jn 12:27–28 and 17:1). Against their intention, Jesus’ enemies contribute to the manifestation of his glory as sovereign (Jn 18:6–9), royal (Jn 18:33–37, 19:2–5, and 19:22), and filial (Jn 19:7–11). The passion is a “lifting up” (Jn 3:14, 8:28, 12:32–33). The episode of the piercing of Jesus’ side demonstrates the fruitfulness of the passion and calls on us to contemplate the Crucified One (Jn 19:31–37).

The writings of the New Testament are unanimous in presenting the passion as the decisive victory of Christ and of God over evil* for the good of humanity. “By his blood” the sacrificial Lamb* has redeemed us and made of us “a kingdom and priests” (Rev 5:10), able to conquer by his blood (Rev 12:11).

- M. Dibelius (1943), “La signification religieuse des récits évangéliques de la passion,” RHPPhR 13, 30–45.
- K. H. Schelkle (1949), Die P. Jesu in der Verkündigung des Neuen Testaments, Heidelberg.
- X. Léon-Dufour (1960), “Passion (Récits de la),” DBS 6, 1419–92.
- J. Blinzler (1969), Der Prozeß Jesu, 4th Ed., Regensburg.
- P. Benoit (1966), Passion et résurrection du Seigneur, Paris.
- A. Vanhoye (1967), “Structure et théologie des récits de la passion dans les évangiles synoptiques,” NRTh 89, 135–63.
- La mort du Christ (1971), LV(L) 20, 2–121.
- L. Marin (1971), Sémiotique de la passion, Paris.
- H. Cohn (1972), The Trial and Death of Jesus, London.
- G. S. Sloyan (1973), Jesus on Trial, Philadelphia.
- F. Bovon (1974), Les derniers jours de Jésus, Neuchâtel.
- H. Cousin (1976), Le prophète assassiné, Paris.
- M. Hengel (1976), “Mors Turpissima Crucis: Die Kreuzigung in der antiken Welt und die ‘Torheit’ des ‘Wortes vom Kreuz,’” in Rechtfertigung. Festschrift für E. Käsemann, 125–84, Tübingen.
- X. Léon-Dufour (1979), Face à la mort, Jésus et Paul, Paris.
- M. Hengel (1981), La crucifixion dans l’Antiquité et la folie du message de la croix (trans. of Mors Turpissima... and other texts), Paris.
- M. Limbeck (Ed.) (1981), Redaktion und Theologie des Passionsberichts nach den Synoptikern, WdF 481.
- Coll. (1985), Narrativité et théologie dans les récits de la passion, RSR 73, 6–244.
- I. de la Potterie (1986), La passion de Jésus selon l’Évangile de Jean, Paris.
- M. Gourgues (1989), Le Crucifié, Montréal.
- K. Kertelge (Ed.) (1989), Der Prozeß gegen Jesus, Freiburg.
- R. Meynet (1993), Passion de Notre Seigneur Jésus-Christ, Paris.
- R. Brown (1994), The Death of the Messiah, New York.
- S. Légasse (1994), Le procès de Jésus, Paris.

ALBERT VANHOYE

See also Death; Eucharist; Expiation; Gospels; Jesus, Historical; Lamb of God/Paschal Lamb; Passover; Sacrifice; Salvation; Scripture, Fulfillment of; Servant of YHWH; Violence

B. Systematic Theology

If the term the passion of Christ designates the totality of Jesus' suffering, from his agony in the garden to his death and burial, as stated above, it also refers to an essential aspect of the mystery* of Jesus Christ and his Easter experience; the aspect that precedes and conditions the resurrection* and that could also be designated by the word cross. The New Testament clearly shows the prominent place that Christian faith*, from its very beginning, accorded to the passion and the cross of Christ as it was understood. Neither the great patristic tradition* nor contemporary theology* lags behind in this respect. For clarity, it is useful to distinguish and to bring together four aspects: historical, eschatological, soteriological, and theological.

1) Historical Event

There is no doubt that Jesus* died on the cross after a hurried trial and after having experienced a harsh night of anguish. Jesus suffered various kinds of ill treatment, was abandoned by his disciples, and was mocked by the soldiers who had come to seize him, as well as by the curious mob that had followed him. Not only cruel but dishonorable, the torture of the cross, as practiced by the Romans, was used particularly against slaves and against conquered enemies whom they wished to deride (Tacitus, Hist. IV. 11). This element alone is enough to indicate that the execution of Jesus had a political character, as indicated moreover by the inscription on the cross stating, "This is Jesus the King of the Jews" (Mt 27:37). However, Jesus was handed over to Pilate, representing Roman authority, by the Sanhedrin, the religious ruling body of the Jewish people, which was determined to bring him down with the accusation of blasphemy (Mt 26:57–66). Jesus had in fact claimed "I am able to destroy the temple of God, and to build it in three days" (Mt 26:61). He had thereby—as with his behavior in general toward the sabbath*, sin*, and God* himself—undermined the principles and foundations of the Jewish religion and identified his person* with the fulfillment of the messianic hope* of his people*. Such blasphemy could only deserve death*.

But the passion and crucifixion of Jesus did not result only from the condemnation of human powers in opportunistic complicity with one another. These events were also, and even primarily, situated not only by a very conscious determination on the part of Jesus himself, but also—the first disciples soon discovered it—in the perspective of the fulfillment of a paradoxical divine intention. Just as much as it is intent on emphasizing the historicity of the passion, so is Christian faith intent on making it known that the passion enacted a drama that goes far beyond history*: In and through the passion of Jesus, God himself was "involved" (Balthasar*). The simple fact that the different New Testament traditions do not agree on the moment of the crucifixion shows that the evangelists wish to make their readers attentive to a meaning that goes beyond pure and simple historical fact. Whereas the synoptics present the Last Supper of Jesus as the new Passover, John by contrast places Jesus' death on the day of preparation for the Jewish Passover (John 19:14) in order to make Jesus appear as the true paschal lamb (John 19:36). In either case, the same historical reality is in question; the same event is being described. Contemporary scholarship tends to judge that John's version is more accurate; with the help of astronomical calculations, it has even specified that Jesus probably died on 7 April of the year 30.

2) Eschatological Dimension

The very motives that led Jesus to his passion and cross give the facts of the events a genuinely eschatological import. The accusation of blasphemy is revealing in this respect. In his attitude toward the temple, as in his public behavior as a whole, Jesus had expressed a veritable "demand for transcendence," a real "claim" (W. Pannenberg): a claim to echo in his speech (in the antitheses of the Sermon on the Mount, and in the invocation of God as "Abba") the very "authority" of God; a claim to set forth in his action (the miracles* and exorcisms*, the meals with sinners, and the forgiveness of sins) the signs of the coming of the kingdom of God, only hoped for until then. With his coming and his public ministry, in his personal fate, and finally in his very being, the eschatological times were beginning. What until then had been only promised and expected, or only present "figuratively," was now beginning to be fulfilled "in actions and in truth*." The end of time had arrived, salvation* had been definitively offered, and the "new and eternal covenant*" according to God's plan had been established.

This was the reading that the disciples of Jesus thought they should make of his life, and of his passion and death, after they had been led to experience and confess his resurrection. But this post-Easter reading of the passion and the cross was nonetheless in direct consonance with what had gradually and with increasing clarity entered into Jesus' own consciousness throughout his public ministry, as he confronted the reactions he provoked. Even if their formulation reflects in part a vaticinia ex eventu, there can be no doubt that the three foreshadowings of the passion (Mk 8:31, 9:31, and 10:33–34 and parallels) refer to the word and hence the consciousness of Jesus himself; the parable* of the wicked tenants (Mk 12:1–12) is sufficient evidence. The accounts of the Last Supper confirm it. Very probably authentic, the statement: “Truly, I say to you, I shall not drink again of the fruit of the vine until that day when I drink it new in the kingdom of God” (Mark 14:25), clearly shows that Jesus was convinced of two things. While, on the one hand, the passion and death toward which he was moving, and that he anticipated with the signs of bread and wine, seemed directly related to the eschatological character of his mission, they also seemed to him to make up both the culminating point and the basis for interpretation of that mission.

3) Soteriological Effect

Recognizing that the historical reality of the passion-cross-death sequence has an eschatological dimension implies the simultaneous recognition of its soteriological effect. According to Christian faith this sequence occupies an essential place in the revelatory and salvific plan of God. Why and how? An answer to these questions requires the development of a theology of salvation* and an understanding of how to interpret the cross and the death of Jesus as sacrifice*. However, it is appropriate first to specify the basis on which this confession of faith was developed. The essential point lies in the fact that, on the part of Jesus, the passion does not appear as something merely undergone, but rather clearly foreseen and formally accepted, in obedience to the mysterious and yet entirely loving will of the Father*. Indeed, this is the meaning Jesus’ words on two occasions. The first are spoken in prayer during his agony in Gethsemane: “My Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me; nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt” (Mt 26:39 and parallels; Mk 14:36 adds the Hebrew Abba). Jesus makes the second utterance just before his death on the cross: “My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?” (Mk 15:34 and Mt 27:46), for this final expression is not only a cry of distress but also an invocation addressed to the Father in total surrender “into thy hands I commit my spirit” (see Lk 23:46).

In relation to the will of Jesus fulfilling the will of the Father, the passion seems to be set under the sign of a radical “for us” outside of which it would be only a nonsense and a scandal. Having come “for us and for our salvation,” Jesus went to his death and gave himself up to it—during the Last Supper Jesus offered the gift of his life “for many” (Mk 14:24). This was to show how far the sin of human beings would go, for they would turn out to be capable of putting to death the “Holy and Righteous One” of God (Acts 3:14). It would also reveal to them that not only were they not rejected, but that God’s forgiveness was mercifully offered to them and that they continued to be loved by him despite all their sins, which they could now repent. All faith in salvation as the redemption brought by Christ originates there.

This point is all the more important because it merely brings to fulfillment—“to the end” (Jn 13:1)—what was characteristic of the teaching, the activity, and the existence of Jesus, because “the Son of man also came not to be served but to serve, and to give his life as a ransom for many” (Mk 10:45). Similarly, according to his explicit teaching, believing in him, following in his footsteps, and being able to benefit from the salvation that he brings means that his disciples are also called upon to make themselves “the last of all and servant of all” (Mk 9:35 and parallels). Each believer in Christ must in turn “take up his cross” (Mk 8:34). Through the ordeals of the apostolic ministry*, the apostle* is led to supplement “what is lacking in Christ’s afflictions for the sake of his body, that is, the church” (Col 1:24). We know the position held by the cross in the great Christian spiritual and mystical tradition (mysticism* of the passion or of the cross).

4) Theological Meaning

The fact remains, however, that the passion of Jesus could have that eschatological dimension and soteriological effect only to the degree that God himself was able to act through it and even truly engage himself in it. How can such a thing be accepted? How is it possible to reconcile weakness and suffering, abandonment, and even ignominy on the one hand, and sovereignty, lordship, and omnipotence—in other words, divinity—on the other?

a) The Scripture is clear: the hymn of Philippians 2:6–11 celebrates the *kenosis of the one “who though he was in the form of God...emptied himself, taking the form of a servant...and being found in human form he humbled himself and became obedient unto death, even death on a cross” But taking on the condition of servant did not bring about the loss of the divine condition. Christian faith asserts that it was as a man, and according to the common human condition—apart from sin, but including suffering and death—that Christ was incarnated, as God-the-Son in humanity.

The patristic tradition strove to hold the two aspects of the mystery together: the reality of the incarnation* of the Word (thus including vulnerability to suffering and death) and the truth of the Word's divinity (despite the undermining of the immutability* and hence the impassibility that Greek philosophy* in general and Neoplatonic philosophy in particular considered characteristic of the divine). Ignatius of Antioch is a good example of this when he speaks of "the Timeless, the Unseen, the One who became visible for our sakes, who was beyond touch and passion, yet who for our sakes became subject to suffering and endured everything for us" (To Polycarp III. 2; see also Irenaeus*, Adversus haereses IV. 20. 4 and Tertullian*, De Carne Christi V. 4). There were many debates, from the Trinitarian controversies of the second half of the third century, those surrounding monarchianism and modalism* and Sabellianism, with the Patripassianism that they implied (Noetus in Smyrna and Praxeas in Carthage, attacked by Tertullian in Carthage and Hippolytus in Rome*), down to the Theopaschite dispute of the sixth century involving Scythian monks and their formulation: "The one of the Trinity* was crucified." But the aspect of the "communication of idioms*" that was at issue was finally understood by the Alexandrians as well as the Antiochenes and the Latins in the orthodox sense of the doctrine of Ephesus on the Theotokos (DS 263).

Several Fathers* of the Church, however, expressed original views, which contemporary theology will have occasion to reconsider. Origen* (De Principiis IV.2.4) pointed out that it would be less surprising that the Son was able to share our misery—and the Father himself experience something of human suffering—if it were seen that the entire "economy" is governed by divine compassion and mercy*. Hilary* (De Trinitate. VIII.45), Gregory* of Nyssa (Catechetical Orations), and others suggested that this be seen not as the indication of a limit but as a sign of sovereign power and freedom. Maximus* the Confessor, arguing against monophysitism* and its monothelite revival, explained (Constantinople* III) that the existence in Christ of a complete human nature that remained distinct from divine nature—within the very union according to the single person of the Word*—permitted a true theology of the agony of Gethsemane.

b) Strongly shaped by the metaphysical approach, Scholastic* theology was on this point strongly challenged by the theologia crucis of Luther*. But although the theory of the "communication of idioms*" that Luther advocated clearly articulated the elements of the problem, it did not resolve it, as was shown by the development of the dispute over kenosis through the 16th and 17th centuries (schools of Giessen and Tübingen). German idealist philosophy—Hegel*, of course, above all—and the so-called kenotic theology derived from it in the 19th and 20th centuries in Germany, England, and Russia, further sharpened awareness of the importance of what was at stake: If the Absolute must necessarily "externalize" itself, does it remain the Absolute? If it cannot, can Christ continue to be considered God? If it does, to what extent can we recognize a true humanity in Jesus in whom it is supposed to reveal itself?

c) All contemporary theologies, from that of "the death of God" and "process* theology" to the dialectical theology of Karl Barth* and the existential theology of Rudolf Bultmann*, and even "liberation* theology," have dealt more or less systematically with these questions, in confrontation with the "hard word" characteristic of modernity: "God is dead." All modern theologians recognize that they still have to confront this assertion. At least three of them—J. Moltmann and E. Jünger on the one hand, and Hans Urs von Balthasar* on the other—have fostered significant advances in thinking, which we will describe briefly in concluding.

Among their propositions, the following elements are especially important: 1) The coming of the Son of God into humanity (incarnation) quite logically entailed that he had to experience passion and death, and even "descent* into Hell." 2) This represents neither an "alienation" nor a de-divinization of God, nor the manifestation in him of a limit, a lack, or a necessity, but the sovereignty free expression of a radical movement that can only be designated by the word "love*." 3) As a consequence, far from opposing to what indeed presents itself as a kenosis an objection derived from a preconceived idea of "God," we should make an effort to decipher his "essence" by starting with what he himself revealed of it in coming himself to open the way of Salvation to "what is not himself." 4) Beginning with that, we should learn to recognize that the divine power (omnipotence*, divine) is of the order of a love that is "communication," and a total "surrender" of the self. Such a love certainly entails and brings about some "effects of vulnerability," but that does not prevent him from being all-powerful. 5) In order to be effective in history, the self-communication of God must, however, already be verified from all eternity in the divine immanence itself. "The eternal intra-divine distinction between the Father and the Son is the theological-transcendental condition for the possibility of the self-alienation of God in the incarnation and on the cross (W. Kasper). As a consequence, it is the condition of his self-revelation*."

- See bibliography for Christ and Christology.
- P. Henry (1957), "Kénose," DBS 5, 7–161.
- J. Blinzler (1960), Der prozess Jesu.
- X. Léon-Dufour (1960), "Passion (récits de la)," DBS 6, 1419–92; id. (1963), Les Évangiles et l'histoire de Jésus, Paris.

- Th. Ogletree (1966), The Death of God Controversy, Nashville-New York.
- H. U. von Balthasar (1969), "Mysterium Paschale," MySal, III/2, Einsiedeln (Mysterium Salutis, vol. 12, 1972).
- H. Schürmann (1975), Jesu ureigener Tod, Leipzig.
- E. Brito (1978), Hegel et la tâche actuelle de la christologie, Paris-Namur.
- X. Léon-Dufour (1979), Face à la mort: Jésus et Paul, Paris; id. (1982), Le partage du pain eucharistique selon le Nouveau Testament, Paris.
- F.-M. Léthel (1979), Théologie de l'Agonie du Christ, Paris.
- C. Perrot (1979), Jésus et l'histoire, Paris.
- A. Gounelle (1981), Le dynamisme créateur de Dieu: Essai sur la théologie du Processus, Montpellier (ETR special issue).
- M. Hengel (1981), La crucifixion dans l'Antiquité et la folie du message de la Croix (original French ed.), Paris.
- W. Kasper (1982), Der Gott Jesu Christi, Mayence.
- B. Sesboué (1982), Jésus-Christ dans la tradition de l'Église, Paris; id. (1988, 1991), Jésus-Christ, l'unique Médiateur, vols. I and II, Paris.
- M. Lienhard (1991), Au cœur de la foi de Luther: Jésus-Christ, Paris.
- S. Légasse (1994–95), Le procès de Jésus, vols. I and II, Paris.
- O. González de Cardedal (1997), La entraña del cristianismo, Salamanca, 523–618, "La muerte de Jesús: símbolo, crimen, misterio."
- U. Köpf (1997), "Passionsfrömmigkeit," TRE, 27, 722–64.

JOSEPH DORÉ

See also Balthasar, Hans Urs von; Christ and Christology; Constantinople III, Council of; Descent into Hell; Ephesus, Council of; Jesus, Historical; Kenosis; Monophysitism; Monothelitism/Monoenergism; Resurrection of Christ; Salvation; Trinity a) Hellenistic Background. For the Greeks, the problem of the passions revolved around two notions: self-rule (autarkeia) and self-control (egkrateia). Reason endows whoever possesses it with a measure of self-sufficiency and free choice. By contrast, the passions are involuntary perturbations of the soul* that threaten and sometimes eclipse reason. The question is the extent to which egkrateia can achieve and preserve autarkeia by repressing the passions or making them serve rational ends.

Passions

Both Plato and Aristotle insisted that virtue* involves subordinating the passions to reason: the morally imperfect life is the fruit of ignorance and passions. According to Plato, the passions are diseases, engendered by a principle of covetousness (to epithumetikon) and a principle of anger (to thumikon), both opposed to the principle of reason (to logistikon) (Rep. IV, 439 d–41 c). It should be noted, however, that the principle of anger is also the principle of a virtue, that is, the principle of courage. Aristotle takes a different line. Because the order of the passions is that of motions imposed upon us, passions do not make human beings either good or bad (EN II, 1105 b 29–06 a 2). The order of the virtues and vices is not that of motion, but of disposition; yet Aristotle certainly draws a contrast between "living in accordance with passions" and the rational life (I, 1095 a 8–10; IX, 1169 a 1–5). Stoicism goes further. Identifying the rational and happy life with apatheia, the absence of feeling, and with ataraxia, the absence of internal disturbance, Stoicism in fact entailed identifying the passions with vices. Alongside patheia, passions that, as such, were seen as being contrary to nature, the Stoics also identified some eupatheia, "good" passions, such as joy, circumspection (eulabeia), and will; but such observations did not detract from their generally hostile attitude.

b) Early Christian Discussions. To begin with, these discussions do not stand out against the intellectual background of late antiquity. In the apostolic and subapostolic literature, the passions as such are neither affirmed nor rejected. Attention to the passions is generally limited to warnings against anger and "carnal lusts" (Jas 4:1, 1 Pt 2:11; Didache 1, 4; 2 Clem. 10). However, the literature of early Christian asceticism* is at times contemptuous of the passions, while the more urbane attitude of a moralist such as Clement of Alexandria seems thoroughly stoical: "the sacrifice that is acceptable to God is unswerving abstraction from the body and its passions" (Stromata 5, 11, 67). As late as the fourth century, even the most orthodox christological reflections display a certain reluctance to associate the passions with the perfect human nature of Jesus*.

Autarkeia is not an ultimate value in the New Testament, where the term appears only in 2 Corinthians 9:8 and 1 Timothy 6:6, in addition to autarkes in Philippians 4:11, and all three occurrences are unemphatic. Reason and liberty* are fulfilled in desire for God, and hence in the surrender of autonomy. It is this surrender that true egkrateia both assists in and reflects (Hermas, Shepherd 2, 1–5). This relativization of autarkeia goes hand in hand with Christian affirmation of the body and its passibility. These developments positively affected Christian attitudes to the passions in three ways. First, the integration of passivity into the notion of human reason enabled theology* to distinguish less sharply between the realm of reason and the realm of the passions. Second, the new dignity attached both to the body and to its suffering was reflected in the dignity accorded to the passions themselves. Finally, increasing respect for the body, in the light of the incarnation* of the Word* and the resurrection* of the flesh* yielded a corresponding respect for the passions, inasmuch as these demonstrate the close connection between body and soul. The improved moral status of the passions is illustrated early on in the Epistles of Ignatius of Antioch, who comes close to equating the emotional passion of the Christian in his life of prayer*, the physical passion of Christian martyrdom, and the spiritual passion of the rational soul as it yields itself in faith to the divine initiative (e.g., Ad Romanos 6). In all three senses, passion rivals autarkeia as a mark of moral action* and spiritual attainment. Another positive conception of the passions was provided by Lactantius († c. 325–30), for whom, by contrast to both Aristotelianism and Stoicism, affectus (“passion”) “is like a natural fecundity of souls” (CSEL 19, 337). However, ethical condemnation of the passions continued within Monachism: thus, Evagrius, with his teaching of praktike (monastic asceticism), reprises the theme of apatheia, making it into “the flower of practice” (SC 171, 670).

c) Augustine and Later Christian Thought. The Christian reversal of values achieved its clearest articulation in Augustine*. For him, sin* lies not in the unruly passions but in the rational will that refuses to be moved by God, and so becomes enslaved by passion for created things. However, true love* of God is itself a kind of passion, and it brings virtuous passions in its train. Far from standing in opposition to the rational will, the passions, whether virtuous or vicious, reveal the will’s true inclinations. The healthy soul will experience healthy passions, including grief and anger, and Augustine is loath to deny that the saints in heaven will experience at least the passions of joy and holy fear.

The exception to Augustine’s general account of the passions is his treatment of sexual desire, which can be rightly used but never innocently felt. It is notoriously easy to misread Augustine on this point. Despite his emphasis on the involuntary character of libido, Augustine’s negativity about sex is not a return to the glorification of autarkeia. On the contrary, Augustine insists that the involuntary character of sexual passion is the punishment inflicted on prideful reason, which has placed a higher value on self-rule than on submission to being ruled by God. It is not because sexual desire is a passion that Augustine condemns it, but because it is the otherwise unnecessary sign of spiritual perversity (Civ. Dei 14, 15). Whatever else we may say about Augustine’s view of sex, it does not constitute a rejection of the passions as such.

Thomas* Aquinas also locates sin in reason than in the passions, and provides an analysis of the connection between the passions, embodiment, and rational desire (STh Ia IIae, q. 22–48). Nevertheless, Aquinas’s subordination of will to intellect leads him to de-emphasize the intentional character of reason, thus opening a conceptual gap between desire and reason, and laying the groundwork for the problematizing of the notion of rational desire.

d) Modern and Contemporary Discussions. In the early modern period, a few theologians—notably Jonathan Edwards*—testified to continuing interest in the passions as indicators of the soul’s love for God, or lack thereof. Mostly, however, the early moderns betray two contradictory tendencies: either identifying reason with cognition only (e.g., Descartes, in an era marked, in France, by a renewal of interest in the Stoic theory of the passions); or unmasking reason as a function of “mere” passions and drives (e.g., David Hume [1711–76], Treatise on Human Nature 2, 2, 3). The second tendency has proved to be the more common one. Freud* asserts (with Augustine) that human reason is a dynamic of desire, but also claims (unlike Augustine) that reason is the expression of unconscious drives. Thus, the intentionality of reason reveals the irrationality of reason, and this irrational reason is in the service of passions whose object is only survival or pleasure.

Kant*’s moral project attempts once again to ground the rational will in the idea of a transcendent moral law*. Kant’s project may be understood largely as the recovery of Augustine’s understanding of reason, but this recovery is not possible without paying a high price: reason loses its passivity before God. Kant rehabilitates practical reason by defending it from any imputation of passivity: the “good will” is an autonomous legislator, free from the constraint or impulsion of any inclination, passion or divine command.

Recent theological discussion of the passions has been allied to an attempt to develop an understanding of rational desire that avoids the voluntarist and “decisionist” tendencies of Kantian ethics*, as well as the determinist presuppositions of Freudian psychology (McClendon 1986). This project involves attention to the human body, understood as the irreducible datum of selfhood (Ricoeur 1950, Wyschogrod 1990); reinterpretation of reason as a bodily and passionate faculty (Henry 1965); consideration of the moral status of human suffering (Porée 1993); and meditation upon the resurrection as it relates to Christian attitudes to embodiment (Bruaire 1968). At stake is the coherence of a Christian notion of freedom that also insists on human passivity in relation to the pure agency of God. At stake, also, is the making of passion into virtue.

THOMAS E. BREIDENTHAL

- J. Edwards (1746), A Treatise Concerning Religious Affections, repr. Grand Rapids, Mich., 1982.
- K. Kirk (1931), The Vision of God, London, 312–19.
- P. Ricoeur (1950), Le volontaire et l'involontaire, Paris.
- J.N.D. Kelly (1958), Early Christian Doctrines, London (2nd Ed. 1977), 280–309.
- S. Pfürtner (1958), Triebleben und sittliche Vollendung, Fribourg (Switzerland).
- M. Henry (1965), Philosophie et phénoménologie du corps, Paris.
- C. Bruaire (1968), Philosophie du corps, Paris.
- J. Lanz (1971), “Affekte,” HWP 1, 89–100.
- M. Miles (1979), Augustine on the Body, Missoula, Mont.
- A. Solignac (1984), “Passions et vie spirituelle,” DSp 12/1, 339–57.
- J. McClendon (1986), Ethics, Nashville, Tenn., 79–155.
- P. Brown (1988), The Body and Society: Men, Women and Sexual Renunciation in Early Christianity, London.
- E. Wyschogrod (1990), Saints and Postmodernism, Chicago.
- G. C. Harak (1993), Virtuous Passions, New York.
- J. Porée (1993), La philosophie à l'épreuve du mal: Pour une phénoménologie de la souffrance, Paris.
- D. Kambouchner (1996), “Passions,” DEPhM, 1081–87.

See also Ethics; Ethics, Autonomy of; Ethics, Sexual; Voluntarism

Passover

A. Biblical Theology

a) Origin of the Passover and Ritual. Originally, the Passover was a celebration for shepherds, whose flocks were their most important and most precious resource. This origin explains why the Passover was distinct from the other feasts of Israel*, in particular from the three pilgrimage* celebrations that are mentioned in the oldest liturgical calendars (Ex 23:14–17, 34:18–23) and that are indicative of a sedentary society (feast of unleavened bread, feast of weeks, feast of booth). The Passover is a spring festival; the celebration takes place at night, during the full moon; it brings together the whole family*. With the sacrifice of a year-old animal*, which is either a lamb or a kid, the head of the family fulfilled the ritual of the blood, and then he presided over a meal for which the flesh of the victim had been roasted. The ritual of the blood and the Passover supper are the most characteristic elements of the ancient Arabic sacrifice* and of the Israelites' Passover (J. Henninger).

The ritual of the blood consisted in anointing the poles of the tent with the blood of the paschal victim; it was an apotropaic ritual, with magical properties, intended to avert hostile powers and to protect the dwelling as well as those who live in it. Was it also aimed at protecting the cattle? This is possible, but the signs of such a practice in Pre-Islamic Arabia are extremely rare. In any case, the ritual was intended to ward off some beings outside the dwelling, since the anointing of blood was done only on the poles and on the lintel of the entrance (Ex 12:23). The blood ritual was to be associated with the ritual of the supper, which complemented it by representing communion* with the deity who dispenses rain and bestows fecundity on the flock. The Passover required neither sanctuary nor priest; it was a nocturnal celebration by the family.

According to Exodus 12:21ff., which is probably the oldest written account of the Passover, there is a relation between the ritual and YHWH's action that strikes Egypt and spares the homes of the Israelites. Next to God*, the written account presents another character, also capable of striking: he is the "destroying angel," whose identity is unclear. In this written account, he is a personal being (Ex 12:23), whereas another written account (Ex 12:13) transforms him into an impersonal power, in order to ensure the preeminence of the God of Israel. This destroying angel has been identified as the god of the plague in 2 Samuel 24, but the identification is far from certain. The destroying angel's presence is an element of the original Passover, but in the biblical account he is placed in a relationship of dependence with YHWH. He may have the power to strike, but he cannot do it against the Israelites. Although the account given in Exodus 12, 21 Sq does not mention the ritual of the supper, it must indeed have been real, but the Passover commemorates first of all the divine protection granted to the people of Israel.

b) Reform of the Passover. The oldest among the liturgical calendars (Ex 23:14–17, 34:18–23) do not mention the Passover, but Deuteronomy places it at the top of the calendar: "Observe the month of Abib and keep the Passover to the Lord your God, for in the month of Abib the Lord your God brought you out of Egypt by night" (Dt 16:1). The Passover is a nocturnal celebration related to the Exodus from Egypt. The main ritual, the sacrifice of the paschal victim, must take place in "the evening at sunset" (Dt 16:6). This indication is reinforced by the order to go back home in the morning (16:7). The celebration lasts from evening to morning, but that was possible only at the time when the Passover was not yet linked to the feast of the unleavened bread, which lasts seven days. This link was definitively established at the time of the post-exilic calendars (Lv 23:5–8; Nb 28:16ff., 25), but was already present in Deuteronomy 16:3–8, in which the seven-day duration necessarily included the feast of the unleavened bread.

The ritual, in Deuteronomy 16, is not greatly developed. The emphasis is on the place where the victim is sacrificed: "in the place that the Lord your God will choose" (16:5ff.). From then on the Passover becomes an official sacrifice celebrated in the central sanctuary. Furthermore, the animal that is being sacrificed may be taken from among the bigger cattle, which is a new feature; but this is easily understandable in a farming economy based in part on cattle-rearing. The victim must be cooked and not roasted, as was the case in the older ritual. Deuteronomy 16 tells of a paschal ritual in the local sanctuaries at a time prior to the end of the eighth century B.C.

Originally a family rite, in Deuteronomy the Passover becomes an action that all the Israelites celebrate when they come to Jerusalem*; it is the action that reunites the people* in order that they may proclaim their faith* to the God who made possible their Exodus from Egypt. The Passover is thus a national celebration that contributes to unity among people, but it seems that such a significance was attributed to the celebration before the reign of Josias (see 2 Kgs 23:21ff.). The allusions to the Passover in the book of Is (30:29, 31:5: psch) date back to the reign of that king.

c) Passover According to Exodus 12:3–14. The most precise text regarding the Passover and its ritual is still Exodus 12:3–14. In it, the Passover is carefully dissociated, in the way it unfolds, from the celebration of the unleavened bread (Ex 12:15–21). The Passover must be celebrated in the first month of the year (12:2), in a calendar that starts in the spring, another departure from the preexilic custom that placed the start of the year in the autumn. The victim must be obtained on the tenth day of the first month and kept apart until the 14th, which is to become the date of the Passover (Lv 23:5); the throat of the victim is slit between the two evenings (Ex 12:16) and the Passover meal should take place at night (12:8). The ritual is described in great detail, including the description of the clothes that the participants must wear. In contrast to what is recorded in Deuteronomy, the ritual goes back to ancient customs; the ritual of the blood has its place, as in the original Passover; the victim is taken from among the smaller animals, lamb or kid; it is roasted on the fire. The celebration does not take place in the sanctuary; the meal is taken at home (12:43–46); the blood must be used to anoint the poles and the lintels of the houses (12:7, 13). The vocabulary of sacrifice does not appear in this written account; likewise, there is no mention of an altar. The motive of the celebration remains, however, the same: it is to celebrate the fact that YHWH punished the Egyptians and spared the Israelites as they were coming out of Egypt. The Passover must serve as a memorial for the people of Israel (12:14).

This text from Exodus 12:3–14 takes up an ancient ritual. But why the concern to be absolutely precise? The text may have helped the people to observe the Passover during their exile, when, deprived of a sanctuary, they found themselves no longer capable of celebrating the pilgrimage feasts. It is also understandable why all these precise instructions were placed in the book of Exodus before the episode on Sinai, during which God gave Moses his instructions concerning the way to organize the ritual of worship.

It should be mentioned, however, that the celebration of the Passover and that of the unleavened bread are connected to the Exodus from Egypt and are linked to the law* concerning the firstborn (Ex 13:1f.; 11–16). This link finds its explanation in the account of the 10th plague (Ex 11), which befalls the firstborn of Egypt, a scourge that the Israelites are spared thanks to the paschal victim's blood (Ex 12:13). For this reason, Exodus 13:15 declares that all the firstborn of man must be "redeemed." This does not mean, however, that the Passover is transformed into a ritual of offering concerning the firstborn of the flock.

d) Judaism and the New Testament. In early Judaism* the paschal celebration gave rise to the development of a genuine theology*. Thus, the Targum interpretive tradition* links the Passover with the episode of Genesis 22 on the binding (aqedah) of Isaac, as expressed in the poem of the "four nights" (Le Déaut 1963). The night of the Passover, memorial of salvation* for Israel, is also a reminder of God's covenant* with Abraham (see Gn 15:13f.), and also signals a future liberation (according to Wis 18:6).

In the New Testament, the Passover occupies a decisive place on two accounts. On the one hand, the death* of Jesus* takes place in the context of the Passover. Thus, in the Gospel* of John there is a recurrent mention of the Passover (Jn 2:13, 6:4, 11:55; see 5:1), but above all Jesus died on the day of the Passover, as Jerusalem was experiencing the influx of a crowd of pilgrims for the feast. On the other hand, the meaning of Jesus' death is enhanced by the paschal symbolism. Jesus is the true paschal lamb* (Jn 1:29, 36, see Rev 5:6, 12); he was immolated at the time when the lambs intended for the paschal supper were being sacrificed in the Temple* (Jn 18:28, 19:36 quoting Ex 12:46 and Ps 34:21). Paschal symbolism can also be found in the synoptic Gospels, where the Last Supper (Eucharist*) has the characteristics of a paschal meal (Mt 26:26–29; Mk 14:22–25; Lk 22:14–20); and also in Paul (1 Cor 11:23). In the parable of the ten virgins (Mt 25:6), the arrival of the spouse in the middle of the night is a reminder of the messianic expectation linked to the paschal night.

- R. de Vaux (1960), Les institutions de l'Ancien Testament, vol. II, Paris, 383–94.
- R. Le Déaut (1963), La nuit pascale, AnBib 22.
- R. Martin-Achard (1974), Essai biblique sur les fêtes d'Israël, Geneva, 29–51.
- J. Henninger (1975), Les fêtes de printemps chez les Sémites et la Pâque israélite, Paris.
- S. Ros Garmendia (1978), La Pascua en el Antiguo Testamento, 3rd Ed., Vitoria.

JACQUES BRIEND

See also* Book; Eucharist; Liturgy; Passion; Pilgrimage; Sacrifice; Scapegoat; Temple

B. Paschal Mystery in the Liturgy

From a historical point of view the expression "paschal mystery" designates the event of the death* and of the resurrection* of Christ*; from a liturgical point of view it indicates the sum of rituals that celebrate that event, every year at Eastertide, and every day in the Eucharist*.

a) From the Origins to the Fourth Century. The expression "mystery of the Passover" (to tou paskha mustèrion), which first came into use in the second century (SC 123, 94; 27, 125) as an equivalent of the Pauline formula "mystery of Christ" (Col 4:3; Eph 3:4), designates the whole of God*'s saving plan, announced in the Old Testament and realized in Christ. In earlier times, when the notion of the Passover particularly evoked the Passion*, it referred mainly to the immolation of Christ (1 Cor 5:7) but also to the tension between death and resurrection, between abasement and exaltation, since the death of Christ is celebrated, in direct accordance with Johannine* theology, as the time of his glorification and as "the death out of which comes life."

The expression "paschal mystery" takes on a fairly different significance among those who, following Origen*, interpret the Passover as a rite of passage, in the allegorical sense that Philo of Alexandria had already attributed to it. In this context the expression designates what is deepest in the historical facts and in the accounts (narrative*) that concern the Passover; it designates their mystical (mysticism*) meaning: the flesh of the paschal lamb* represents the Scriptures, with which we must sustain ourselves (GCS 7, 218).

Augustine* gives the paschal mystery its definitive formulation by making a double synthesis between Passion and passage, and between the passage of Christ and the passage of man: "With his Passion, the Lord passed from death to life, and thus he opened the way for us who believe in his Resurrection also to pass from death to life” (CChr.SL 40, 1791).

Augustine distinguishes the Passover, celebrated “as a mystery” (in sacramento), from Christmas, and from all the other feasts that are celebrated as commemorations. By celebrating the Passover as a mystery, Christians not only recall an event whose anniversary is upon them, but they also understand and greet with their faith* the meaning that this event has “for them” (CSEL 34, 2, 170).

b) From Paschal Mystery to Liturgical Year. The notion of paschal mystery went through a profound change toward the end of the fourth century. A synthetic celebration included until then all the events of the Passover in one unique dialectic of death and life, like a unique mystery actualizing all the history* of salvation*, from the Exodus to the Parousia*. From then onwards, with the growing importance granted to other feasts such as Christmas, and under the influence of the rituals being followed in Jerusalem*, an analytical celebration started to make its appearance; this distinguished the different events from one another and commemorated each one on its anniversary day. Consideration for the unity of the mystery yielded priority to a historical concern for distribution over time*. We go from a unique celebration of the Passover to the paschal cycle, and then to the liturgical* year. For Leo the Great, the central importance of the paschal mystery resided uniquely in the fact that it offered in one single event, and more richly, what the various mysteries celebrated throughout the year in a partial manner (PL 54, 301).

In short, the name of the Passover became synonymous with “the Sunday of the Resurrection*,” and, save for very rare exceptions (e.g., Rupert de Deutz, CChr.CM 7, 207), this has remained so up to the present; it lost its organic link with the Passion of Christ, which tended, for its part, to move from the domain of mystery to that of piety. The Resurrection itself came to be considered from an apologetic angle, as an argument in favor of Christ and of the Church*, rather than for its significance as a mystery.

c) Rediscovery of the Paschal Mystery. In more recent times the reform of the paschal rituals under Pius XII, preceded by the liturgical movement and by the Mysterienlehre (Mystery) (Casel, L. Bouyer), brought about a revival of interest in the paschal mystery. The original unity of death and resurrection has been reaffirmed, as well as the saving characteristic that they possess by rights (F.-X. Durrwell). The expression “paschal mystery” is sometimes employed to designate the whole process of redemption (Balthasar*), and we are also seeing an attempt to refound on the paschal mystery—and on the cross in particular—everything up to the theology* of the Trinity* (J. Moltmann).

Having rediscovered within the paschal mystery the unity of death and resurrection, theology is applying itself nowadays to shedding light on the close unity between the Incarnation* and the paschal mystery, and, as a consequence of this, to uniting the Greek soteriology of deification (holiness*) with the Latin soteriology of atonement and of redemption (J.-P. Jossua, Balthasar). What remains to be achieved is a deeper understanding of Pentecost, as the coming of the Holy* Spirit, in relation to the Incarnation and the paschal mystery.

- O. Casel (1934), “Art und Sinn der ältesten christlichen Osterfeier,” JLW 14, 1–78.
- L. Bouyer (1945), Le mystère pascal, Paris.
- Fr.-X. Durrwell (1950), La résurrection de Jésus, mystère de salut, Le Puy-Paris.
- J. A. Pascual (1964), “El misterio pascual según san Leon Magno,” RET 24, 299–319.
- J.-P. Jossua (1968), Le salut: Incarnation ou mystère pascal, Paris.
- H. U. von Balthasar (1969), “Mysterium paschale,” MySal III/2, 133–392.
- J. Moltmann (1972), Der gekreuzigte Gott, Munich.
- R. Cantalamessa (1978), La pasqua nella Chiesa antica, Turin; id. (1985), Il misterio pasquale, Milan (3rd Ed. 1999).

RANIERO CANTALAMESSA

See also Cult; Liturgy; Scripture, Senses of

Pastor

From the Latin pastor, “shepherd,” the pastor is the head of a local* church. He is also called parochus, in charge of a parish (Latin parochia, from the Greek paroikia). Pastor is the usual Protestant term used to designate the minister of the local community. It is through him that Christ* brings together and builds the flock (the congregatio). The Second Vatican* Council gave new currency to the term within Catholicism* and speaks of the bishop* as a pastor.

a) Biblical Elements. In the Old Testament the common notions of shepherd and flock are applied to the relations between Israel* and its leaders: the king is charged by God* to be a shepherd for the people. The function is often badly performed, and we frequently hear the lament of a flock without a shepherd (1 Kgs 22:17; Zec 10:2; and so on), or whose bad shepherds (Jer 23:1–2 and Ez 34:2–4) will feel the judgment of God come down on them (Jer 23:34 and Zec 11:3 and 11:17). The prophets (prophet* and prophecy) foretell new and good shepherds (“shepherds after my own heart” in Jer 3:15, Cyrus in Is 44:28, and a new David in Ez 34:23–24), in the service of God, the supreme shepherd of his people (Ps 23, 80:2; Is 40:11; Jer 31:10; and Ez 34:11–13).

In the New Testament, Christ is the good shepherd (Jn 10:2, 10:11, 10:14–16, 10:27–28), just as he is the Lamb* of God who gives his life for his own (Jn 10:11 and 10:15 and Reve 7:17; see also Lk 15:3–5). He will exercise his pastoral function at the Last Judgment (1 Pt 5:4; see also Mt 25:32–33). It is to this pastor that we must turn in order to be saved (1 Pt 2:25 and Heb 13:20). He sends his disciples to the lost sheep of the house of Israel (Mt 10:5–7; see also Mt 9:36–38), then to all nations (Mt 28:18–20; see also Acts 10). Peter* (Jn 21:15–17; see also Mt 16:17–19) occupies a privileged place in this pastoral mission that he transmits to the elders (1 Pt 5:1–3), as does Paul, who institutes presbyters (presbyter*/priest) to watch over the flock (Acts 20:17, 28–30). In order to maintain his Church*, God gives it prophets and evangelists, pastors and teachers (Eph 4:11; in this connection, also see the Pastoral Epistles, 1 and 2 Tm and Ti).

b) Ancient and Medieval Church. A common theme of early Christian art, the figure of the Good Shepherd was used by the Fathers* of the Church to evoke Christ and the “pastoral” function of bishops and priests (priesthood*). It was linked particularly to their teaching responsibility: “He who is pastor should also be magister; no one in the Church can take the name of pastor if he cannot be the teacher of those for whom he is the pastor,” wrote Jerome (about 347–419; Comm. Eph., 4, 11). Gregory* the Great was the author of a pastoral (Liber Regulae Pastoralis). Pastoral responsibility was exercised in relation with the patriarchs, and, for the Latin Church, particularly with the bishop of Rome*. It was centered on the “cure of souls,” cura animarum, the spiritual support of souls (soul*-heart-body). According to Thomas* Aquinas, the pastoral charge included auctoritas and caritas. In the Middle Ages, “pastoral” defined both the ministry* of the diocesan bishop and that of the parish priest.

c) Reformation Churches. The Lutheran Reformation introduced a new emphasis by focusing on the tasks of preaching* and catechesis*. In the local community, the pastor played the role of a bishop. He guarded its unity and acted as minister of the Word* and of the sacraments* (see Augsburg Confession, art. 5, 7, 14, and 28). In principle, by virtue of the universal priesthood*, every believer participated in the cure of souls, the mutuum colloquium et consolatio fratrum (Articles of Smalcald, art. 4); but this collective exercise of the pastoral ministry supplemented the particular ministry of the pastor without replacing it. In Calvinism*, the pastoral charge was the responsibility of four offices (pastor, elder, teacher, and deacon). In fulfilling his duty, the pastor would visit the faithful, lead the parish with the presbyters or elders (who were of the laity [lay*/laity]), and with them carry out church discipline (ecclesiastical* discipline). Pastors met frequently for sharing and spiritual development based on the study of the Holy* Scriptures. Pastor and presbyters led the consistory, which brought together several parishes, and they formed the synodal structure of a regional or national church. The deacons provided service for the poor and the ill; the teachers were responsible for schools and teaching (see Ecclesiastical Ordinances from the Church of Geneva, 1561). All churches derived from the Reformation generally adopted this conception, which required from the pastor a high level of competence (note, e.g., the pastoral robe, an indication of his university training). A particular place was reserved for the pastoral family, the Protestant presbytery. Since Luther*, pastors have generally been married and assisted in their duties by their spouses. The pastoral ministry today is no longer confined to men; women are often pastors.

d) Contemporary Catholicism. Vatican II, following in the footsteps of Vatican* I, “Teaches and declares with it that Jesus Christ, the eternal pastor, has built holy Church by sending his apostles (apostle*), as he himself had been sent by the Father* (see Jn 20:21); he wanted their successors, that is, the bishops, to be pastors in his Church until the end of time” (LG 18). The unity of pastors is derived from the pastoral ministry of the successor of Peter (see the constitution Pastor Aeternus of Vatican I). Vatican II has confirmed his primacy of the pope and his infallible magisterium*. It emphasizes the teaching duty of the bishops, inseparable from their priestly duty and their ministry of church government* (LG 20:24–27). Priests participate in the pastoral ministry of the bishop; they are ministers of the Word* and of the sacraments (sacrament*), and in the first place of the Eucharist*. They are assisted by deacons “in the ‘deaconship’ of the liturgy*, of the Word, and of charity” (LG 20, 28, and 29).

e) Current Problems. In the contemporary context, the pastoral ministry is confronted with a number of challenges. The proclamation of the Word, the celebration of the sacraments, the cure of souls, the concern for the unity and the government of the community all remain central. The many expectations of the parish and of society*, however, often make the pastor a “representative of the Church” who must provide for almost everything; and these demands, which presuppose an extraordinary availability may go beyond the human capacities of the pastor. His or her ministry also requires a high level of qualification (including in the areas of communication, pedagogy, and psychology), which gives rise to a tension between professionalism and vocation, and, in the highly institutionalized majority Churches, even a certain “bureaucratization” of the ministry. All confessional families have to meet these challenges.

- J.J. von Allmen (1956), La vie pastorale, Neuchâtel; id. (1964), Le saint ministère selon la conviction et la volonté des réformés du XVIe siècle, Neuchâtel.
- O. Semmelroth (1958), Das geistliche Amt, Frankfurt.
- N. Jossutis (1982), Der Pfarrer ist anders: Aspekte einer zeitgenössischen Pastoraltheologie, Munich.
- P. Barrau (1984), “Pastorale,” DSp 12/1, 376–87.
- M. Greiffenhagen (Ed.) (1984), Das evangelische Pfarrhaus, Stuttgart.
- J.-M. Chappuis (1985), La figure du Pasteur: Dimensions théologiques et composantes culturelles, Geneva.
- J.-P. Willaime (1986), Profession Pasteur: Sociologie de la condition du clerc à la fin du XXe siècle, Geneva.
- P.-L. Dubied (1990), Le pasteur, un interprète: Essai de théologie pastorale, Geneva.
- G. Siegwalt (1992), Dogmatique pour la catholicité évangélique II/2, Paris-Geneva, 300–321, 354–76.

GÉRARD SIEGWALT

See also Apostolic Succession; Bishop; Deacon; Local Church; Ministry; Ordination/Order; Presbyter/Priest

Patriarchate

The title of patriarch was first used after the Council of Chalcedon*. It was long reserved for the most important sees, as determined by age, establishment by the apostles, and eminence of their position in the empire: Rome*, Constantinople (a “new Rome” after Constantinople* I)—Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem*—under the jurisdiction of Caesarea in Palestine until Chalcedon assigned it the fifth place in order of precedence at the session of 26 October 451 (see G. Alberigo et al., The Oecumeniques Councils 1, History). These five patriarchates, which the imperial novelles (or constitutions) called the five senses of the empire, made up what was called the “pentarchy.” This was the group of influential bishoprics that divided up the “inhabited world” (or the known world), the oikumenè, into spheres of influence in which each patriarch presided over the election of metropolitans and diocesan bishops (bishop*) and heard appeals. (For Rome, Alexandria, and Antioch, see Nicaea* I, can. 6.) Each of these patriarchates was an “autocephalous” church (one that chose its own primate, as distinguished from an “autonomous” church, the primate of which was chosen with the participation of the primate of an autocephalous church). Not included in the pentarchy was the Church of Cyprus, which had been made autocephalous by the Council of Ephesus* (“Vote,” DCO, 160–61), and whose primate was an archbishop not a patriarch. Thus a patriarchate was a group of metropolises, capitals of provinces, presided over by a patriarch, generally corresponding, especially since the beginning of the Constantine period, to administrative divisions of the empire. A metropolis, presided over by a metropolitan or a metropolitane, grouped together a certain number of dioceses (a diocese being a city with an Episcopal see, together with its dependent territory). These dioceses and metropolises met periodically, under the presidency of the patriarch, in a synod* or local council*. This practice is still followed in most Eastern, particularly Orthodox, churches, as well as in many Western churches (conferences of bishops, synods of Anglican provinces, and of Lutheran and Reformed Churches).

It should be noted that the patriarch, while playing the role of president within a patriarchate, was a bishop like other bishops, with no Episcopal power higher than that of the others. All bishops were equal, all participated in the same apostolic* succession, and all were similarly called upon to be guarantors of the true faith*. However, although the Episcopal power of a patriarch (or of a metropolitan) was the same as that of any other bishop and his title as primate essentially honorific, his role as president conferred on him a certain moral authority. For example, it devolved on him to approve elections of bishops for the provinces and metropolises in his jurisdiction; to preside over the election of metropolitans; and to call the synods or local councils (the Greek word synodos means “council”).

The pentarchy, as defined above, existed—with some tensions between Rome and Constantinople, which assumed the title of ecumenical patriarchate in 588, while still recognizing the traditional privileges of ancient Rome—until the gradual separation between the Catholic and Orthodox Churches. When communion* with Rome was broken, it was quite natural that Constantinople, second in the order of precedence, would become the see of the primate of the Orthodox Church. It has remained so until now (and will until communion with Rome is restored).

With the development of the Church of Russia and the transfer in the 14th century of the primate’s see from Kiev to the new capital of Moscow, the autocephalous status of that church was solemnly recognized in 1589, when the ecumenical patriarch Jeremiah II came to consecrate the first patriarch of Moscow “and of all the Russias,” Job. The pentarchy was thus restored for a short time, with Moscow assuming the fifth place previously held by Jerusalem.

Later developments were increasingly related to the rise of nationalism, particularly in the 19th century. Autocephalous churches appeared (or reappeared) in significant numbers. These churches increasingly identified themselves with the territories of sovereign states and thus tended to become “national” and not simply local churches (the Church of Antioch remains an example of a truly territorial church: its primatial see is in Damascus and its territory covers Syria and Lebanon). As a result, patriarchates proliferated, and the title of patriarch, formerly reserved, as we have seen, for bishops occupying prestigious sees, became widespread. The Orthodox world now includes eight churches headed by patriarchs, and, in all, sixteen autocephalous or “autonomous” churches.

The title patriarch has no specifically theological meaning. It has the same ecclesiastical significance as those of other primates (archbishop, metropolitan, catholicos, the title varying from one church to the next). In the Orthodox Church the primate presides over a local church as primus inter pares and in communion with all the other primates. One of these primates is endowed with a universal presidency under the same conditions: it is, actually, the patriarch of Constantinople.

Finally, it should be noted that some patriarchates, such as Antioch, Alexandria, and Jerusalem, now have several patriarchs: one Orthodox, one Catholic, one pre-Chalcedonian, which is contrary to the most ancient canon* law.

- J. Meyendorff (1960), L’Église orthodoxe hier et aujourd’hui, Paris (new rev. Ed., J. Meyendorff and N. Lossky, 1995).
- T. Ware (Bishop Kallistos of Diokleia) (1963), The Orthodox Church, 4th Ed., London (New Ed. 1993).
- J.-M.R. Tillard (1995), L’Église locale: Ecclésiologie de communion et catholicité, CFI 191, 241–99, 431–52, and passim.

NICOLAS LOSSKY

See also Government, Church; Hierarchy; Infallibility; Irenaeus of Lyons; Lay/Laity; Magisterium; Ministry; Ordination/Order; Pastor; Pope; Priesthood

Patripassianism. See Modalism

Paul of Tarsus. See Pauline Theology

Pauline Theology

The Pauline letters can be classified in three groups, from earliest to latest: 1) the letters known as ministry and recognized as authentic (1 Thes, 1 and 2 Cor, Gal, and Rom); 2) the prison letters, Philippians and Philemon, also authentic; Colossians and Ephesians, whose authenticity is questioned (as 2 Thes), considered by some as Deutero-Pauline; and 3) the Pastoral letters, 1 and 2 Timothy and Titus, attributed by most exegetes to disciples of Paul (Bible*).

Paul's letters are not systematic, exhaustive expositions but circumstantial texts addressed to problems that arose in the first communities. However, they contain a number of constants that do not derive from circumstances or from the religious milieu (Jewish and/or Greek), but from Paul himself. This applies particularly to a generalized christologization of theological discourse.

I. A Christologized Theology

1. The Gospel That Is Christ

Paul was sent (1 Cor 1:17a) to preach the gospel that is Christ* (1 Thes 3:2; 1 Cor 9:12, 2:2; 2 Cor 1:19, 2:12, 4:4f., 9:13, 10:14; Gal 1:7; Rom 1:1ff., 15:19, 16:25; Phil 1:12–18, 27; Col 1:27; etc.), a gospel that is also “of God*” (1 Thes 2:2, 8f.; 2 Cor 11:7; Rom 15:16) because it fully and paradoxically manifests his impenetrable ways (Rom 11:33). Why must the apostle’s proclamation be essentially christological? The answer is suggested at the end of the hymn in Philippians 2 (vv. 9ff.); if God glorified Jesus* and made him Lord so that all creation without exception recognizes him as such, how could one be excused for keeping silent about that lordship—and about all that preceded it. Accepting the gospel means believing in Jesus Christ. This is clearly illustrated in Romans 9:30–10, 21; the only reproach leveled against Israel* is that it refused the gospel, in other words Jesus Christ, in the name of fidelity to the Torah. To proclaim that divine justice* was fully and definitively manifest in Jesus Christ comes down to describing Christ’s course, presenting him crucified, dead, and raised to life for our salvation*.

Paul could not accept that anyone should preach or believe in “another Jesus” than the one he preaches (2 Cor 11:4), meaning a Jesus whose scandalous death is hidden, or a Jesus who came to put us back under the yoke of the law*. It is Christ’s death on the cross that determines the components of the evangelical message, and leads Paul to declare that circumcision (see Gal 5:11) cannot be an integral part of the gospel.

2. Christ and Salvation for All

Paul’s discourse on salvation is also fundamentally christologized. In it are recounted two complementary forms of salvific intervention that have taken place in the past: by God, who wished to show his justice and mercy* in sending Christ for our redemption or liberation (see, among others, 2 Cor 5:18f., 5:21; Gal 4:4ff.; Rom 3:21–26, 5:8, 8:3f.; Col 1:22, 2:13; Eph 2:4f.), and by Christ (1 Thes 5:9f.; 1 Cor 8:11, 15:3; 2 Cor 5:14f., 8:9; Gal 1:4, 2:20, 3:13; Rom 5:6, 5:8, 5:12–19, 14:15; Phg; 2:7f.; Col 2:14f.; Eph 2:13–17, 5:2, 5:23, 5:25). Depending on the thrust of his argument, Paul drew on different semantic fields to express the interventions of God and Christ: love*, grace*, redemption, liberation (from the law, from sin*, from death*), justification*, forgiveness, reconciliation, solidarity, obedience and humiliation, expiation* (or propitiation), sacrifice*, creation*, life, salvation. He also insisted on the efficacy and the universal scope of Christ’s redemptive work.

Christ’s salvific mediation is still exercised today because, being risen, he reigns over the living and the dead (1 Cor 15:23–28; Rom 14:9; Phil 2:10f.). Believers have died with him to the Law and to sin, and have been buried with him so as to live with him (Rom 6:1–11, 8:17; Col 2:11; Eph 2:4) and “for him” (2 Cor 5:15; Rom 14:7f.), to know him (Phil 3:8, 10; Col 2:2; Eph 3:19, 4:13), and even to live through him, because he lives, lives in them (Gal 2:20; Eph 3:17), his life (as Resuscitated) is manifest, shines in their mortal existence (2 Cor 3:18, 4:8, 4:11; Rom 8:29), they belong to him (1 Cor 3:23) and for them living is Christ (Phil 1:21; Col 3:4). Christ’s mediation also continues in the relation of believers to God, because he protects them from the wrath to come (1 Thes 1:10) and intercedes for them (Rom 8:34). Christ never abandons those he restored to God’s friendship.

Paul’s interpretation of the role of Mosaic law is determined by the effects of Christ’s mediation in his own life and the lives of other believers. Good and holy as it may be, Mosaic law remains in the service of sin, because it makes us know sin but cannot deliver us from it (Rom 7:7–25). Moreover, it was and remains the identifying feature of the people of the covenant*, protecting them and separating them from all other nations. By highlighting the saving universality of Christ’s death on the cross and of his resurrection*, Paul sets forth the common vocation of all mankind.

Admittedly, Paul’s vocabulary does not seem to be directly christological when he expresses the identity and dignity of the faithful. He says that they have become children of God (filiation*) (see 2 Cor 6:18; Gal 3:26, 4:5f.; Rom 8:15ff., 8:19, 8:21, 8:23, 9:26; Phil 2:15; Eph 1:5). But Christ does not stand outside the relation established between God and mankind, because “God has sent the Spirit of his Son into our hearts” (Gal 4:4): Christ lives in us, loves in us; we are sons/daughters with and in him. This is why the baptized can say “Abba! Father*!” to God who desires to seem them reproduce the image of his Son (1 Cor 15:49; 2 Cor 3:18, 4:6; Rom 8:29). The mediator carries them into his own relationship with his Father, so that their being-as-son becomes inseparable from his itinerary.

3. Christ and Awaiting the End of Time

a) Christological or Apocalyptic? Paul expresses his hope* primarily in christological terms. But do the death and resurrection of Jesus have decisive meaning and scope if separated from the apocalyptic interpretation of the imminent, final victory of God over evil*, the ultimate manifestation of his justice? Paul sees the resurrection of Jesus as the event that calls forth the final resurrection. He prefers to focus on the modalities or ways by which divine justice and mercy have already been revealed, because the real question is the “how” of that manifestation, meaning the death on the cross. This is why the apocalyptic framework is less important than has been thought in the structure of the Pauline eschatology*. The apostle was hardly interested in the final divine vengeance* or victory. Not that he denied them (see 1 Thes 4:6, 5:3, 5:9; 2 Thes 2:12; Gal 5:21; 1 Cor 6f.; Rom 1:32, 2:5–10, 2:16, 3:5f.; Eph 5:5) (violence*), but all his preaching* bears on the mercy granted to our humanity by the Son’s death on the cross, when the majesty of God had never been more triumphant! The apocalyptic scenarios in 1 Thessalonians 4, 15ff.; 1 Corinthians 15:23–28 and 1 Corinthians 15:52f. are important only for the coming of Christ; this alone gives all its weight to the events of the last days, because it allows the faithful, living and dead, to be forever with him in his glory*. The only true misfortune would be to not be with him forever.

The christologization of Pauline eschatology has an even more decisive function: eternal life* means not only being with Christ but inheriting his own risen life resuscitated. Resurrection (resurrection* of the dead) for punishment or destruction is totally excluded (see 1 Cor 15:35–49); the worst that can happen is to not be raised, not to share in the glory of Christ. Pauline eschatology is thus steeped in Christology (Christ* and Christology), and it is from this that it draws its finality, its content, and its scope.

b) Transformations of Eschatology. Did this insistence on the present and future relation of Christ with believers displace Pauline eschatology to a position where the final resurrection of believers (in 1 Thes 1; 2 Cor; Gal; Rom; Phil) was replaced by a resurrection and salvation that had already occurred (Col 2:12, 3:1; Eph 2:5f., 2:8)? In fact the tension between the “already occurred” and the “not yet” is not dissipated by Colossians and Ephesians because these letters do say that believers already have a glorious body (soul*-heart-body). Proclaiming that the faithful are raised to life with their Lord does not remove them from history*. Rather, it highlights the Christologization of their existence in all its dimensions—personal, ecclesial, and social.

4. Christ and the Discourse on God

a) Christ and His Relation to God. Paul places Jesus Christ next to God; this could be described as a progressive theologization of his Christology. From the first to the last letters, one or another divine title is attributed to Christ. He is declared “Lord” (kurios, e.g., 1 Cor 2:8, 8:5f.; 2 Cor 3:14–17; Rom 10: 6–13; Phil 2:9ff.) by his resurrection. This term may certainly be used of other figures, but applied to Christ it assumes a particularly strong connotation (see 1 Cor 8:5; Col 3:22, 4:1; Eph 6:5, 6:9). In fact Paul takes several biblical passages where kurios manifestly designates God, translating hb Adonai or even YHWH, and applies them to Jesus (see J1 3:5 in Rom 10:13; Is 45:23 in Phil 2:10f.) (name*). Other titles, such as sôtèr (“savior”), which appear only in the prison and pastoral letters, are applied equally to God (1 Tm 1:1, 2:3; Ti 1:3, 2:10, 3:4) and to Christ (Phil 3:20; Eph 5:23; 1 Tm 4:10; 2 Tm 1:10; Ti 1:4, 2:13, 3:6).

b) Christologization of Theology. Concomitantly, Paul christologizes his theology*. He never mentions God’s redemptive work without mentioning Christ, thus making of him the proof par excellence of divine love and mercy (Gal 2:20f.; Rom 5:8, 8:39; Eph 2:4f., 4:32, 5:1f.; 2 Thes 2:16). And from then on God is “the Father of Our Lord Jesus Christ” (see 2 Cor 1:3, 11:31; Rom 15:6; Col 1:3; Eph 1:3). Paul sees this paternity as the definition of God himself. In the Bible God is already called the Father of the poor and the orphaned, the Father of Israel (Ps 68:6f., 103:13f., etc.). But in the Pauline letters this relation of God to human beings is understood only as a function of the father’s relation to his son Jesus Christ; their filial adoption (huiothesia) is connected to the filiation of Jesus (Gal 4:4ff.). Further, it is the paths taken by the Son that reveal the extraordinariness of the paternity of God.

c) The Spirit of Christ. Paul underscores the connection between the sending of the Son and the reception of the filial Spirit (Gal 4:4ff.). And he refuses any separation of the Spirit (pneuma) from Christ, Lord and Spirit of God. His pneumatology depends on his Christology and theology (1 Cor 12:4ff.; Rom 8:9, 14ff.)

and is connected to his discourse on the Church* (1 Cor 12:12–30). The gift of the filial Spirit, the Spirit of the promise*, was made in connection with Jesus’ death/resurrection. Paul’s belief that Christ inaugurated the era of the pneuma and is himself “a life-giving spirit” (1 Cor 15:45) clearly indicates that all life comes through him.

The connection Christ/Spirit is also decisive for the opening of Scripture. According to what Paul himself says in 2 Co 3, it is by the Spirit that we can understand how Scripture itself, designated here as “the Old Testament” (2 Cor 3:14), takes meaning with reference to Christ, because all of Scripture speaks of him.

5. Christ and the Discourse on the Church

Pauline ecclesiology is not exclusively christological. When the term Church is used in the letters, it is followed by diverse noun complements (Church “of God,” “of the Thessalonians,” etc.) but is never designated as the Church of Christ. Furthermore, Paul does not limit himself to christological expressions to describe the community of the faithful in its unity and growth; for example, they form the temple* of God, an abode of the Spirit, or a single new man (1 Cor 3:9, 16f.; Eph 2:15, 2:21f.). Nevertheless the multiform presentation of being—in—the—Church is not separated from Christology, because Christ is the foundation (1 Cor 3) or the cornerstone (Eph 2) of the temple constituted by the Church.

a) Church as the Body of Christ. Numerous expressions show clearly that the Church was described by the Paul primarily in christological terms. First, the repetition of the syntagm “in Christ.” Second, the fact that, with the exception of two biblical citations (Rom 9:25f.; 2 Cor 6:16), the baptized are not called “people of God.” This term is reserved for Israel, including Jews who believe in Jesus Christ and those who reject him in the name of fidelity to the Mosaic law. The thematic of the people is too particular to designate God’s project for the whole human race; Paul prefers a familial vocabulary that makes the community of believers “the family*” of God. But it is a vocabulary of the body that allows him to signify the privileged relation between the Church and Christ. There were numerous reasons why this vocabulary was attractive, including its connotations of growth, of unity in diversity, and of the complementarity of members, but the christological determination is fundamental. The faithful do not form a social body but the body of Christ; of which they are the limbs (1 Cor 1:13, 6:15, 12:12–27; Rom 12:5; Col 1:18, 22; Eph 1:23, 4:12f., 4:25, 5:23, 5:30). Because this relation constitutes the Church as an eschatological entity, it is not counted with others of this world, such as the social, the political, or the religious. For that reason it is not a substitute for the people of Israel.

1 Corinthians 1–4 is a thorough demonstration of Paul’s use of Christology to formulate intra-ecclesial relations. The first section, which is christological, gives the values that generate the physiognomy of the ecclesial group and its true hierarchy (the ministers being in the service of the Church and not vice versa). In its fundamental dependence the Church must testify to the Son’s unique lordship over it. In Colossians 1:18a the vocabulary is the same as in the preceding letters (see Rom 12:4f.; 1 Cor 10:16f., 12:12f.) but the emphasis is different. What matters here is not the Church in its organic reality, forming a unity in the multiplicity and complementarity of its members, but its dependence with respect to the Son and the unicity of this relation (the Church alone is his body). He goes even further in Ephesians: because the Church is closely united to its Lord and vivified by him, it becomes the privileged sign of the grace of God offered to all humankind. Moreover, it becomes responsible for manifesting the totally gratuitous, reconciling love of Christ for all, and the new humanity should be traced in the Church, which is the body of Christ in growth.

Aside from the head/body relation used to describe the unique, privileged bond between Christ and his Church, a husband/wife type of relation figures in 2 Cor 11:2; this is articulated with the corporeal relation and treated at greater length in Ephesians 5:26f. (couple*).

b) Sacraments of Christ. The Church remains indelictably united to its Lord by the baptism* received in Christ, with Christ or in his name (see, e.g., 1 Cor 1:13; Gal 3:27; Rom 6:3f.; Col 2:12) and by the Lord’s, where the community also receives its unity (1 Cor 10:16f.) (Eucharist*).

Baptism determines the true dignity (Christly and spiritual) of believers, and it is on this basis that Paul is able to combat all kinds of false intra-ecclesial hierarchization. Though some ministries or charisms may be superior to others (1 Cor 12:27–31), they must not determine a difference in status (see 1 Cor 3).

c) Christ and the Ministries. Paul also connected to Christ the apostolic ministry and the proclamation of the gospel: he introduces almost all his letters by presenting himself as apostle, minister (diakonos), or servant “of Christ” The purpose of the ministry is also to make Christ known, make the faithful increase, etc. Paul does everything so that Christ will be formed in his converts (Gal 4:19); he is like a father who keeps his daughter pure and a virgin so as to present her to her husband, the Christ (2 Cor 11:2). When the finality is theological, it is associated with a christological determination (“in Christ” or an equivalent) as in 1 Corinthians 3. The true apostle can be recognized by the way he suffers and endures for the gospel, reproducing in his flesh the itinerary of Christ for his Church (see 1 Cor 4 and 9; 2 Cor 6:4–10, 11:23–12:10; Phil 3; Col 1:24; 2 Tm 1:12). And in Ephesians 4:7–12 the ministries are completely christologized; it is Christ who distributes them to his Church, thus ensuring its growth. This does not mean that Christ substitutes himself for God but that God himself, by giving Christ to the Church and making him its head, wished to give his all to the Church (Eph 1:20–23).

6. Christologization of Ethics and Anthropology

a) Christological Motives. Clearly Pauline morality does not draw on the the Mosaic Torah for its major justification, despite the Jewish background of several directives, in particular the commandment to love one’s fellow human being (Lv 19:18; Gal 5:14; Rom 13:9). Christ does have a decisive function because Paul’s exhortations are made in reference to him (1 Thes 4:1; Rom 14:14; 15:30; Phil 2:5) or in his name (1 Thes 4:2; 1 Cor 7:10f.). He cites Christ’s liberality and humility, his love for all, especially for the humble, and invites his readers to imitate him in that (1 Cor 11:1; 2 Cor 8:9; Rom 15:7; Phil 2:5–11; Col 3:13; Eph 5:2, 5:25–30). Along with God the Father, Christ is an ethical model to follow. This is why Paul does not entertain the question of the priority of the Torah over Christ. Granting that the requisite “Love your neighbor as yourself” is more appropriate in his day than ever, Paul does not attribute this to its origin as an order in the Torah, which undoubtedly expresses the divine will, but to the fact that the baptized have experienced the extent of the love of God and of Christ. Christ remains the ultimate recipient of ethical action and indication of its consequences (1 Cor 8:12f.). The dignity of the believer, which is derived from the love Christ has shown for him (in dying for him) and from his union with Christ, perhaps finds its most notable consequence here. Elsewhere Christ’s being and action served as a more elaborate principle of argumentation (1 Cor 5:6ff., 6:13 and 15, 8:11; Rom 6, 14:15; 1 Cor 11:4; Col 3:1; Eph 5:23). In more formal terms, the christological justifications pertain to what is commonly called “the indicative,” to which the “ethical” imperative is attached. Paul exhorts his readers in the name of their being-in-Christ (or with Christ), in virtue of what they themselves have perceived and received of the love of God in Jesus Christ.

In Colossians and Ephesians christological motivations are extended to every aspect of the life of the ecclesial group, especially relations between husband and wife, parents and children, masters, and servants. Does this mean that Christology validates society's assignment of statutory inferiority to wives, or its demand for the unconditional obedience of slaves? In reality such directives should not be interpreted as the ingenuous "baptism" of these culturally imposed social structures but a wish to humanize and transform them, to show how they can and must open themselves to the gospel. Far from bending the gospel to worldly values, these prison letters make of it an instrument for the conversion* of all codes, moral and otherwise.

b) New Humanity in Christ. Pauline anthropology* is also christologized. Christ is the last Adam* and the eschatological man bears his features (see 1 Cor 15:44b–49). It is because of the unity and dignity of our humanity in Christ that Paul is able to outline the kinds of worldly discrimination that are to be excluded from the Church (whether it be discrimination based on religion (Jew, Greek; circumcised or not), sex (man, woman*) or class (free man, slave; see Gal 3:28; Col 3:11). And again, on the basis of redemption in Christ he describes, in Romans 7:7–25, the enslavement of man as subject of the Law and still subject to the flesh* (sarx); and it is always in terms of Christ that he develops, in Colossians and Ephesians, the beginnings of a concept of a "new man," as opposed to the "old" one who is prisoner of sin and death (Col 3:9 ff.; Eph 4:22–25). But it is first and foremost in the Son that our humanity discovers the dimensions of its filial dignity, and at the same time the exigency of fraternity, of loving attention, so as to truly form the family of God (1 Thes 4:9; Rom 8:29, 12:9f.). As for Paul's preference for celibacy, that too is determined by christological reasons—the proclamation of the Gospel (1 Cor 7:29–35).

Thus the figure of Christ structures the various fields of Pauline theology. But this is more a christologization than a systematic reflection on the status and being of Christ. The importance of Christology in Paul's letters is measured more by its role and dissemination than its internal development.

II. A Paradoxical Theology

1. A Paradoxical Formulation of the Itinerary of Christ and the Baptized

a) Folly of the Death on the Cross. Although Jesus Christ is the primary subject of Paul's gospel, he retains little more than the death on the cross (1 Cor 1:18–25; Gal 3:1). Not that he had a predilection for this type of death—quite the contrary, he considered God's instrument as an abasement. But this unbearable event became the site of his absolute consolation. This does not mean that he sought to minimize the scandal*, in the sense that its soteriological purpose (a death on the cross for all) would reduce the enigma. Even though, following the apostolic tradition*, he reinterpreted and re-read the event in the light of Scripture (see 1 Cor 15:3f.), and even though he overcame his rejection and acknowledged the coherence of such a death, he always expressed it in paradoxical terms, in abrupt phrases meant to awaken his readers to the extremity of divine ways. God "gave up" his Son (Rom 8:32): could a father worthy of the name deliver his beloved son to such a death, even for the most worthy reasons? Then would he hesitate to give up all of humanity? There are other, stronger statements: "For our sake, he made him to be sin who knew no sin, so that in him we might become the righteousness of God" (2 Cor 5:21; a similar formulation in Rom 8:3f.). This gesture of God's is inseparable from that of his Son who so loved mankind that he gave up himself for its sake (Gal 1:4, 2:20), and became a curse so that in him the blessing of Abraham is extended to all people (Gal 3:13f.). There is nothing ornamental about this rhetoric—especially the two metonymies, sin and curse—it simply serves to mark the stupefaction of one who could not see the event of the cross as anything but a folly (1 Cor 1:21ff.) to which God resorted in order to save the world. Paul not only retained the excess of an ignominious death, he also underscored the extraordinariness and the extension of its effects for anyone who accepts to believe—filial adoption, Spirit received, etc. Again, it is the means taken by Christ to return us to divine friendship that are highlighted in 2 Corinthians 8:9, when he says that Jesus, rich though he was, became poor for our sake so that "you by his poverty might become rich."

Paul's paradoxical affirmations not only upset worldly wisdom*, they also indicate the orientation of Christian discourse. The apostle recognized that the extremity of divine ways could be recognized in the itinerary of Christ, and meditating on Jesus' death on the cross takes us into the mystery* of the fatherhood of God. Undoubtedly the best description of the importance of Christ's death on the cross for announcing the gospel is in the passage 1 Corinthians 1–2. Paul denies himself brilliant discourse so as not to reduce it to nothingness. In opting for a rhetoric of humility and simplicity, Paul definitively eschewed the seduction of the word. But Christ's death on the cross does much more than change the rules of the rhetorical game. It determines the message itself, because it indicates definitively God's wretched choice: that "unto" the death on the cross reveals a divine folly wiser than human wisdom, a poverty more powerful than anything. The cross changes how one views the world and its values: “But far be it from me to boast except in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by which the world has been crucified to me, and I to the world” (Gal 6:14). Paul can only proclaim the death of Jesus on the cross as the supreme, definitive subversion of worldly values.

This importance of the “extreme” also explains why Paul says almost nothing about the life of Jesus except that he was born to a woman, was Jewish and subject to the Law (Gal 4:4), and descended from David (Rom 1:3). This does not mean that the apostle did not know more, or found nothing else worthy of mention; he summarized his argument in a single expression, “being born in the likeness of men” (Phil 2:7), precisely obeying the dynamics of humbling. Certainly, the climax of humiliation and kenosis* is not the end of the journey, and the Pauline gospel also includes the element of the “resurrection” without which his preaching would be false Good News and our faith* vain and empty (1 Cor 15:17). But this element should not make us forget the first, because that is the source of the indispensable condition: the exaltation of a crucified, humiliated man who is the Son of God.

b) Paradoxical Condition of the Baptized. Several passages unequivocally indicate the connection between the Lord’s itinerary and that of the baptized (1 Cor 1:26–31; Rom 6; Phil 3:2–11), expressed no less paradoxically. Henceforth, the baptized are dead and their life is hidden with Christ in God (Col 3:3); liberated from sin they have become slaves of justice (Rom 6:18). Although they should not become slaves of men (1 Cor 7:23), they must “serve” (douleuete) one another (Gal 5:13), just as Paul, free with respect to everyone, made himself slave of all in order to win the greatest number (1 Cor 9:19). He goes so far as to praise—without masochism or complacency—his weakness (2 Cor 11:30), because in that weakness the strength of God can work (2 Cor 12:10). Does God need our chronic weakness so as to manifest in and by us his strength? In reality, he himself followed this path in his Son (Phil 2:6ff.). On this point Paul’s affirmations are comparable to those of Jesus—he who humbles himself will be raised up, the greatest will be in the service of all, etc. But Paul must turn to the rhetoric of excess (auxèsis) to formulate such reversals, especially with regard to the beautiful religious privilege granted to the Israelite he was and still is (Rom 11:1), now voluntarily turned into sweepings, filth, by love of Christ (Phil 3:8).

The event of the death of the Son on the cross and the life of the baptized are caught up in the broader logic of redemption in an even more paradoxical formulation in the Epistle to the Romans that seems to make God the first agent of our rejection (see Rom 5:20, 11:32). Paul does not forget human resistance but he sees it ordained and adopted by an unfathomable divine wisdom, just when it lets itself be recognized (Rom 11:33–36) (knowledge* of God).

2. A Paradoxical Description of Israel and the Torah

a) Destiny of Israel. Paul believed that the present and future situation of Israel was integral to the logic of salvation. Israel remained the people of God, even if most of its members rejected the gospel of Christ in the name of fidelity to Mosaic law. Their zeal for God paradoxically distanced them from his justice (Rom 10:1ff.) (hardening*), but this distance, which is not permanent, comes from God himself, who hardened them so that non-Jews could receive the gospel (Rom 11:25–32). How can God behave this way toward the people he loves? Paul can align these paradoxes by virtue of his own experience; he himself had fought against the gospel out of zeal (Gal 1:13f.), and if God had made him the instrument of the evangelization of the nations, is this to show in advance the future role of his people, a role now passive, but a people that retain a decisive eschatological vocation. Paul never calls Israel “people of the ancient covenant” because the reality of Israel cannot be exclusively or adequately defined by Mosaic law (for a Jew faithful to the Torah this idea was quite monstrous). And so it is the few Jews who have accepted the Gospel and proclaimed it to the nations—the remnants (Rom 11:5)—who bear the future deliverance of the whole people, and testify to God’s unending love for his chosen people (Rom 11).

b) Mosaic Law. It is true that Paul does call the books (book*) of the Mosaic law “Old Testament” (palaià diathèkè—the second word, meaning “disposition,” may designate an ordinance, testament, or covenant) (2 Cor 3:14f.). Does he mean this to indicate their age, or the fact that they have been supplanted? He does consider them prophetic books that announce not only the evangelical times (such as Dt 30:12ff. in Rom 10:6–10), but God’s impartial justice (Dt 10:17; see Gal 2:6; Rom 2:11) and justification by faith alone (Gn 15:6; see Gal 3:6; Rom 4). As for the ethical prescriptions, especially the Decalogue* (Rom 13:9), completely recapitulated in Leviticus 19:18 (Gal 5:14; Rom 13:9), the baptized are not dispensed from respecting them. Paul does not ignore the morality of the Pentateuch, but he is against imposing rites of circumcision and dietary purification (Col 2:20f.) on the non-Jewish baptized (Gal 5:2; Phil 3:3). Although he seems to pick and choose among prescriptions of the Torah, he never says that they are to take and leave; the Law is one, and its subjects should obey in all (Gal 5:3). Though not subject to the letter of the Law, the baptized should nevertheless respect and manifest its Spirit, by reciprocal love.

Paul did not deny the role of the Torah in the past (Gal 3:24) but his unconditional attachment to Christ—who had become his law—showed him that the Mosaic regime had to be regarded as culture-specific, not universal (1 Cor 9:20–23; Phil 3:7–11), and that the gospel could be practiced within any type of cultural system. Paul did not seek the abolition of Mosaic law as such, in its holiness* and finality. He did not want to impose a lawless regime in which the baptized would be free of all systems of ethical and religious values; but he did refuse subjection to this law as a condition of entry into the friendship of God and hope for salvation. Reduction of the soteriological extension of the Mosaic regime went along with a shift in Paul's language; the term people almost disappeared, replaced by frequent use of the vocabulary of family (father, children, husband, wife). Paradoxically, however, this refusal to confine the faithful within a single code is what led the Pauline gospel to adopt a standardizing universal quality.

3. Reading of the Biblical Past

The Pauline letters do not have the same perspective as the gospel narratives (narrative*) (Gospels*), where typology is omnipresent and often determines the choice of episodes. Not that the letters ignore typological exegeses (exegesis*) (see, among others, 1 Cor 10; 2 Cor 3; Rom 5:12–19), but Paul's positions on justification by faith alone (independent of Mosaic law) demanded a reading that underscored the coherence of the divine plan of salvation and verified the convergence of divine declarations according to prevailing rules of the times. This undoubtedly explains why the apostle's theology becomes more exegetical in Galatians and Romans.

Although Paul believes that faith in Christ lifts the veil that obscured the understanding of Scripture, he never claims that events of the past were nothing but shadows; the reality was already given to be experienced by the Fathers. The rock in the desert was Christ (1 Cor 10:4), the manna was really spiritual nourishment (1 Cor 10:3) and, well before the episodes in the desert, divine action had already signified its orientation because it justified by faith alone (Rom 4; see Gn 15:6). This explains why Rm presents the gospel not as something new but as the ultimate manifestation of divine justice, the confirmation of what God had said and done ever since the first patriarch (see Rom 3:21f.). So it is no surprise that scriptural argumentation such as found in Romans 4 is not christological. As object—whether ultimate or absolute—of the promise and faith of Abraham, Christ does not have to be mentioned; what matters is the “when” (before the Mosaic law) and the “how” (without the good works* required by that law) of the act of believing and the justification. What should be underscored is Paul's extraordinarily audacious reading of the story of Abraham against the interpretation of his Jewish contemporaries, found partially in James 2:14–26.

III. Influence of Pauline Theology

The pastoral letters—perhaps as early as Colossians and Ephesians—show that Paul's successors adapted Pauline themes and ideas for the post-apostolic period. There is a continuity of the desire to make the gospel live without compromise but with an open attitude based on the discernment that was demanded in a constantly changing world. The narrative in Acts presents the figure of the Paul more than the components of his theology. The narrator does not mention the existence of the letters, but he makes Paul the perfect representative of the Nazarene “sect” (see Acts 24:5, 14) that remained faithful to the promises, and in whom the promises were fulfilled (Acts 26:2–29). Even if it is not out of the question that the author of Acts wanted to present the Christian movement ad extra, his account is also a plea in favor of the Pauline position within the Church (the refusal to impose Mosaic law on converts from paganism*), to counterbalance the aggressive reactions of some Christian groups of Jewish origin. And in fact the influence of Pauline theology increased proportionately as the Church moved away from its Jewish birthplace, even if some interpretations of his theology, such as that of Marcion (Marcionism*) in the second century, did him more harm than good.

- A. Schweitzer (1930), Die Mystik des Apostels Paulus, Tübingen.
- L. Cerfaux (1942), La théologie de l'Église suivant saint Paul, Paris; id. (1951), Le Christ dans la théologie de saint Paul, Paris.
- J. Bonsirven (1948), L'Évangile de Paul, Paris.
- P. Benoit et al. (1966), “Paul (Épîtres attribuées à saint),” DBS 7, 155–279.
- J. A. Fitzmyer (1967), Paul and His Theology: A Brief Sketch, Englewood Cliffs, N.J. (2nd Ed. 1989).
- E. Käsemann (1969), Paulinische Perspektiven, Tübingen.
- J. Murphy-O'Connor (1974), L'existence chrétienne selon saint Paul, Paris.
- W. Klaiber (1982), Rechtfertigung und Gemeinde: Eine Untersuchung zum paulinischen Kirchenverständnis, Göttingen.
- G. Lüdemann (1983), Paulus, der Heidenapostel, t. 2: Antipaulinismus im frühen Christentum, Göttingen.

- E. P. Sanders (1983), Paul, the Law and the Jewish People, Philadelphia.
- A. J. M. Wedderburn (1987), Baptism and Resurrection: Studies in Pauline Theology against Its Greco-Roman Background, Tübingen.
- M. C. de Boer (1988), Defeat of Death: Apocalyptic Eschatology in 1 Corinthians 15 and Romans 5, Sheffield.
- S. Westerholm (1988), Israel's Law and the Church's Faith: Paul and His Recent Interpreters, Grand Rapids, Mich.
- J. Becker (1989), Paulus, der Apostel der Völker, Tübingen.
- W. S. Babcock (Ed.) (1990), Paul and the Legacies of Paul, Dallas.
- M.-A. Chevallier (1990), Souffle de Dieu: Le Saint-Esprit dans le Nouveau Testament, vol. II: L'apôtre Paul: L'héritage paulinien, Paris.
- R. O'Toole (1990), Who Is A Christian? A Study in Pauline Ethics, Collegeville, Minn.
- H. Hübner (1993), Biblische Theologie des Neuen Testaments, vol. 2: Die Theologie des Paulus, Göttingen.

- J.-N. Aletti (1994), Jésus-Christ fait-il l'unité du Nouveau Testament?, Paris, 29–117.
- Y. Redalié (1994), Paul après Paul: Le temps, le salut, la morale selon les épîtres à Timothée et à Tite, Geneva.
- J. D. G. Dunn (1998), The Theology of Paul the Apostle, Edinburgh (reported in JSNTSS 72, 67–112, author's response, ibid., 113–20).

JEAN-NOËL ALETTI

See also Adam; Anthropology; Apocalyptic Literature; Apostle; Barth, Karl; Bible; Christ and Christology; Church; Eschatology; Ethics; Faith; Filiation; Gospels; Grace; Hardening; Holy Spirit; Inculturation; Israel; Justification; Kenosis; Law and Christianity; Liberty; Luther, Martin; Scripture, Fulfillment of; Soul-Heart-Body; Universalism; Violence; Wisdom

Peace

Peace, in Christian thought, is not mere absence of conflict or the end of a state of war*. On the contrary, peace is an inclusive concept, encompassing the manifold reality—spiritual, interpersonal, social, international, and even ecological—of an order and a harmony that harken back to the creation* even as they prefigure the eschatological recapitulation of all things.

a) Biblical Theology. In the Old Testament, “peace” (shalom) has two meanings, one ontological and the other eschatological. The ontological sense of peace is based upon the essential goodness of the world, affirmed by the very word* of its Creator (Gn 1:21, 25, and 31). It is eschatological because true peace cannot be truly realized within the time-frame of history*, or can only be realized therein through an anticipatory mode. Certainly, the historical relationship between God and human beings opens up a realm of peace, as in the “covenant of peace” with Israel* (Ez 37:26); and peace, frequently associated with justice*, is God’s gift and blessing* truly provided to the righteous (Ps 85:10–11; Is 32:16–18). However, since human sinfulness (sin*) prohibits God’s peace to reign (Jer 6:13–14), the promises (promise*) of peace go beyond any present experience of peace. Peace is linked to salvation*, to which the historical Israel has already borne witness, but the full realization of which is the object of eschatological hope* (Is 57:19–21).

In the New Testament, peace (eirene) appears predominantly as a personal gift from Jesus*. The word is used conventionally as a salutation (Mk 5:34; Jn 14:27 and 20:19, 20:21, 20:26). “Peacemakers” are mentioned as the subject of one of the Beatitudes (Beatitude*) (Mt 5:9), and the declaration of the Kingdom begins with an invocation of peace (Lk 10:5f.). The commandments not to resist evil* with evil (Mt 5:39), to love one’s enemies (Mt 5:43–47), and to do unto others as you would have them do unto you (Mt 7:12) are also related to the preaching* of peace and peacemaking. Nevertheless, it is in the epistles of Paul that peace gains crucial importance. For Paul, peace means salvation realized, the reconciliation with God that results here and now from justification* by faith* (Rom 5:1); Jesus is thus, in the present, “our peace” (Eph 2:14–18). Used also as a formula of greeting to the churches, peace symbolizes the unity* of the church* in Christ*, as a community of the peace of God (Rom 14:17–19). The peacemaking duties of the faithful follow from the actualized reality of peace: in order to bear witness to Christ's work, Christians are called upon to live in peace with the whole world, and not only with other Christians (Rom 12:18).

b) Augustine. The biblical concept of peace was significantly developed by Augustine*, who defines peace on three levels. Ontologically and protologically, peace is a vestige of creational goodness in human nature. Christologically, it is a gift from Christ for a humanity that lost original peace after original sin*. Eschatologically, it is a reality that is hoped for but cannot be fully accommodated within earthly time*. Peace thus defined—with a sharp distinction between “perfect” and “imperfect peace”—should reign in all realms, from bodily to spiritual, from individual to social, from earthly to heavenly. Envisaging earthly peace as the proper but not wholly realizable goal of political activities, Augustine recognizes it as a value in itself, and urges Christians to “make use of... the temporal peace of the meantime, common to good and bad alike” (Civ. Dei 19, 26, BAug 37). However, he recommends that they labor for earthly peace without “taking pleasure in it,” that is, without treating it as an end in itself. We also owe to Augustine one of the first theological clarifications of the conditions for a just war: it must be part of coercive justice, waged in search of peace (Ep. 189, 6, CSEL 47) and in the spirit of love (Ep. 138, 13, CSEL 44), and ordered by a legitimate authority* (Contra Faustum 22, 75, PL 42, 448), for legitimate reasons (Civ. Dei 4, 15, BAug 33).

c) Modern Times. The Augustinian concept was dominant until the beginning of the modern era, when a less pessimistic view of human nature and of reason* appeared. According to Erasmus*, for example, peace is a divine imperative transmitted, of course, by Christ, but also by the rationality of human nature; and peace is guaranteed more by “a heartfelt desire for peace” than by “treaties and alliances” (IQP LB638, 636/ > Querela pacis, Opera omnia IV/2 [1977], 59–100/).

An optimistic faith in reason is indeed the main characteristic in the works of Hobbes (1588–1679). The state of nature is assuredly a state of war (“the war of all against all”), but peace may be fully instituted in the “artificial person” of the social body established by the social contract (Leviathan, chs. 16–17), through a rational calculation that aims to protect natural rights, without, however, dealing directly with the individual's moral or religious dispositions.

It was probably in the work of Kant* (Zum ewigen Frieden, Weischedel 7) that the modern political concept of peace found its fullest programmatic form. Perpetual peace, the ultimate goal of the historical progress of humanity, guided and guaranteed by “Nature,” is “the end of all hostilities” under a threefold rule of law: 1) in a state with a “republican” constitution based on social contract; 2) by a treaty to create a “confederation” of autonomous states; and 3) by the mutual recognition of “universal human rights.” The state of peace is therefore a legal condition in which the autonomy of a person* or a state is secured both individually and universally according to the dictates of practical reason.

d) Pacifism. The most widely debated problem in recent theology* is that of pacifism. Historically, pacifism has grown out of a strand of Christianity that has taken opposition to violence* to its logical conclusion and refused to participate in war. Theologically, pacifism is clearly based on the Gospels: pacifists literally interpret the commandment “thou shall not kill,” which they consider to be one of the fundamental implications of the divine commandment to love that was transmitted by Christ. There is also an eschatological element at stake: since Christians define themselves as having already begun a new life in the Kingdom, they can and must allow peace to reign already in this world. Pacifists are also cautious, and even suspicious, of political authority: its peacemaking methods, such as punishment and war, are inherently coercive and external.

The pacifist attitude was prevalent among Christians in the first three centuries, who were predominantly concerned with whether they could serve in a pagan emperor's army. “No,” says Tertullian*, not only for fear of idolatry*, but because killing is incompatible with the new law of love* proclaimed by Christ: “the Lord unbelted every soldier when he disarmed Peter” (De Idol. 19, CChr.SL II, 1120). While insisting that it is “more lawful” for Christians “to be slain than to slay” (Apol. 37, CChr.SL I, 148), Tertullian nonetheless sanctions a possibly coercive maintenance of order by political authority, which is not bound by the new law.

There was a minority of Christian pacifists in the Middle Ages, such as the Waldensians (Waldensian*), but a more systematic form of pacifism emerged out of the Reformation, advocated primarily by churches of Anabaptist* origin, like the Mennonites, and by the Society of Friends (Quakers). These advocates of strict nonviolence and antimilitarism all agree that peacemaking is the crux of the Christian life. For some (Anabaptists and Mennonites), however, Christian pacifism is a nonpolitical principle held only by believers, while others (Quakers) think it is a principle universally applicable to all peoples and nations. Tolstoy (1828–1910) represents a remarkable and yet controversial offshoot of this Christian pacifism. His renun-ation of violence and war proceeded by a radically simplified Christianity, one reduced to a way of “life” based on the Sermon on the Mount and combined with his almost anarchistic rejection of the state. He proclaimed that “Christianity in its true sense puts an end to government” (The Kingdom of God Is Within You, 1893).

Contemporary pacifism embraces a wide range of approaches, such as “vocational” pacifism, which is in line with the traditional view, and which treats the duty of peacemaking as a special calling for the most virtuous Christians; “humanistic” pacifism, widely shared both within and outside Christianity (e.g., Pacem in terris, 1963); “technological” pacifism, based upon scientific rationalism* (nuclear deterrence); and “just war” pacifism, which is concerned with, in principle, defining the limits of warfare. Consequently, there are numerous pacifist attitudes, ranging from nonresistance to nonviolent resistance, from total condemnation of war to selective limitation and justification of war. Moreover, pacifism must engage with new critiques. To the extent that pacifism defines peace in a negative way, as absence of open strife, it faces a challenge from a theology (or philosophy) of liberation* that reflects on structural violence and the justified use of force to put an end to it. To the extent that the classic problematic of pacifism leaves aside everything that is not involved in human relations, it must also respond to environmentalists who suggest that it should take the destruction of ecological balances into consideration and come to a theological understanding of peace between human beings and nature.

SHINJI KAYAMA

e) Systematic Theology. Theological discussion of peace stands at the crossroads of three problematics. The first is that of spiritual anthropology*. Because peace reigns between God and humanity, it may also reign between human beings and themselves. The spiritual traditions of East and West have thought of this pacification or unification of the self in terms of various concepts—quies, hesukhia—and have seen them as ways of being that anticipate the eschaton.

The second problematic arises from the fact that such a pacification cannot yield all its meaning except within the communion* of a church that has an obligation to be present within history as a pacified community. The idea of an ontology of communion (e.g., in the writings of J.D. Zizioulas) will always be liable to the objection that what it speaks of has only a limited descriptive force. On the other hand, its prescriptive force is very great: as the only association that believes in the possibility of an existence that is faithful to the Beatitudes, the church should seek to embody, as concretely as possible, the peace that it proclaims, signifies liturgically, and confers sacramentally.

The third and final problematic concerns the fact that the church is not the only space in which the blessing of the peacemakers is audible. Peace should reign in the city*, and Christians are citizens. Undoubtedly, they can only make a credible contribution to political life, in which they have only a limited power, if they have first given an evangelical visage to those communities in which their power is much greater. In any case, ecclesiastical responsibilities cannot be separated from political responsibilities. It is necessary to seek to make “all things new” (Rev 21:5).

THE EDITORS

- R.H. Bainton (1960), Christian Attitudes toward War and Peace, Nashville, Tenn.
- J.M. Hornus (1960), Évangile et Labarum, Geneva.
- Jean XXIII (1963), Pacem in terris, AAS 55, 257–304.
- P. Ramsey (1968), The Just War, New York.
- J.H. Yoder (1971), Nevertheless: The Varieties of Religious Pacifism, Scottsdale, Pa.; id. (1972), The Politics of Jesus, Grand Rapids, Mich.
- J. Ellul (1972), Contre les violents, Paris.
- W.B. Gallie (1978), Philosophers of Peace and War: Kant, Clausewitz, Marx/Engels and Tolstoy, Cambridge.
- S. Hauerwas (1983), The Peaceable Kingdom, Notre Dame, Ind.
- J.H. Yoder (1984), The Priestly Kingdom, Notre Dame, Ind.
- D. Brown (1986), Biblical Pacifism: A Peace Church Perspective, Elgin, Ill.
- J. Finnis, J.M. Boyle, G. Grisez (1987), Nuclear Deterrence, Morality and Realism, Oxford.
- O. O'Donovan (1988), Peace and Certainty: A Theological Essay on Deterrence, Oxford.

See also Anabaptists; Ecology; Eschatology; Legitimate Defense; Violence; War

Pelagianism

Understood for a long time solely in terms of its refutation by Augustine*, Pelagianism has today been restored to its context. Its fundamental characteristics—the orientation toward asceticism*, the rejection of original sin* and of traducianism*, and the emphasis on liberty*—now appear to have been distilled from various currents of thought belonging to the first decades of the fifth century.

a) Representative Figures. The best-known representative of the movement is Pelagius. Little is known about his background, other than that he was given the epithet “Britannicus” in reference to his country of origin. He lived in Rome*, where he was baptized in around 380. He then sought to uncover the roots of the gospel, possibly became a monk, and had some influence in the Christian community of the city. In 410, when Rome was conquered by Alaric, Pelagius departed to Africa and then went to Palestine. He explained in various writings that human beings are free, that they participate as created beings in the grace* of the Creator, and that they can become true images of God* by their own efforts alone. He also stated that some people could be without sin and that some had been liberated from sin before they died. He rejected the idea of original sin and proposed the abandonment of infant baptism* (which he accepted as a custom) in favor of a return to adult baptism. Above all, he desired a “Church of the pure,” a Church* of perfect Christians, and his ideal found an echo among aristocrats.

Celestius, a lawyer and an ascetic who became a disciple of Pelagius in around 390, made himself the spokesperson for Pelagius’s ideas and may even have become the first member of the Pelagian group. He took Pelagius’s ideas further, giving them a more rational and organized form, as set out in the Definitiones, which Celestius may have written.

Bishop Julian of Eclanum, born around 380–86, joined the Pelagians after refusing to sign Pope Zosimus’s Tractoria (418), a condemnation of Pelagius and Celestius. Julian had a reputation as an exegete and translator, notably of works by Theodore of Mopsuestia, but he brought few new ideas into the group. The second stage of the Pelagian controversy may be said to have begun with him.

b) Crisis of Pelagianism. It is in fact possible to distinguish three stages in the controversy: the first, which was relatively serene, up to 411; the second, which was more problematic, between 411 and 418; and the last, after 418, which then gave rise to what was later labeled “semi-Pelagianism.”

Up to 411 Pelagius was developing his ideas, which found expression in a treatise that has been attributed to him, God’s Hardening of Pharaoh’s Heart. He opposed the doctrine of predestination taught by Manicheism* and made himself the theologian of the notion of a salvation* that one comes to deserve through the exercise of one’s liberty. He even enjoyed a degree of approval from Augustine, with whom he had a brief meeting in Carthage.

Between 411 and 418, tensions culminated in crisis. In 412 Celestius, who refused to conduct infant baptisms—a practice cherished in the African church—was condemned by the Council of Carthage. After the Council of Diospolis, which reexamined the question of Pelagianism in a relatively favorable way, Augustine studied Pelagius’s teachings as set out in De natura, a treatise that presents an optimistic vision of humanity and its natural liberty. It was in response to this treatise that Augustine wrote his De gestis Pelagii. In 416 the African bishops asked Pope Innocent I to condemn Pelagius and Celestius: he did so in 417. This was the first occasion on which Pelagius was condemned. In order to justify himself, he wrote a Libellus Fidei and a treatise On Free Will. After the death of Innocent I, his successor, Zosimus, went back on the condemnation of Pelagius and suspended it. The African bishops* protested, while the Pelagians stirred up trouble. Pope Zosimus was compelled to reopen the question. In 418 he published a statement about the controversy, the Tractoria mentioned above, and renewed the excommunication of Pelagius and Celestius. As we have seen, Julian of Eclanum’s opposition to this document led him into the ranks of the Pelagians.

The controversy took a new turn after 418. While Augustine continued his polemic with Julian of Eclanum, the monastic theologians of Hadrumetum and Provence (Jean Cassien, Faustus of Riez, and Vincent of Lérins) developed a theology in which liberty played a larger role than it did in Augustine’s, although there is no evidence that Pelagius influenced them. Augustine responded calmly in four treatises: De gratia et libero arbitrio, De correptione et gratia, De praedestinatione sanctorum, and De dono perseverantia. There can be no doubt that these polemics led Augustine to take a harder line on his doctrine of grace and free will. After what had become one of the major theological debates of the fifth century, Augustine's disciples, among whom Prosper of Aquitaine was the most influential, put forward the version of Augustinianism* that was given official sanction by the Western Church at the Council of Orange in 529. Meanwhile, Pelagianism, as represented by Celestius, had been condemned as heretical by the Council of Ephesus*. These polemics made no impact on the development of doctrine in Eastern Christianity, and the theological refinements that they supported were never accepted within Greek theology—which, we should perhaps conclude, never had any need to accept them.

● BAug 21–24, Augustin et la crise pélagienne.
Julien d'Éclane, CChr.SL 88.
Pelagius, PLS 1, 1101–560.

◆ G. de Plinval (1943), Pélage, ses écrits, sa vie et sa réforme: Étude d'histoire littéraire et religieuse, Lausanne; id.

(1967), "Vue d'ensemble sur la littérature pélagienne," REL 29, 284–94.

T. Bohlin (1957), Die Theologie des Pelagius, Uppsala.

H.-I. Marrou, J.R. Palanque (1967), Prosopographie pélagienne, Paris.

P. Brown (1968), "Pelagius and His Supporters. Aims and Environment," JThS, NS 19, 93–114.

G. Bonner (1972), Augustine and Modern Research on Pelagianism, Villanova.

G. Greshake (1972), Gnade als konkrete Freiheit: Eine Untersuchung des Pelagius, Mayence.

O. Wermelinger (1975), Rom und Pelagius: Die theologische Position der römischen Bischöfe im pelagianischen Streit in den Jahren 411–432, Stuttgart; id. (1979) Das Pelagius-dossier, Stuttgart.

F.G. Nuovolone, A. Solignac (1986), "Pélage et le pélagianisme," DSp 12, 2889–942.

C. Pietri (1995), "Les difficultés du nouveau système (395–431): La première hérésie d'Occident: Pélage et le refus rigoriste," in C. (†) and L. Pietri (Ed.), Histoire du christianisme, vol. 2: Naissance de la chrétienté (250–430), 453–79, Paris.

J.M. Salamito (1997), "Excellence chrétienne et valeurs aristocratiques: la morale de Pélage dans son contexte ecclésial et social," in G. Freyburger, L. Pernot (Eds.), Du héros païen au saint chrétien, Paris, p. 139–57.

MARIE-ANNE VANNIER

See also Asceticism; Augustine of Hippo; Manicheanism; Predestination

Penance

1. Baptism, the First Sacrament of the Forgiveness of Sins

At Pentecost, Peter preached "Repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the forgiveness of your sins; and you shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit" (Acts 2:38). "I acknowledge one baptism for the forgiveness of sins," says the creed of Constantinople* (381). In Christian antiquity, baptism was often called "remission of sins" (e.g., Tertullian* in De bapt. 18. 5). Until the late second century baptism was in fact the only penitential practice, and for the first four or five centuries Christians who were faithful to their baptism knew no other "sacrament*" of forgiveness. Minor sins (later often called peccata minuta) committed after baptism were remitted by God* because of inner regret (conversion*) and its expression in outward "works" of penance, among which the triad of almsgiving, fasting, and prayer* held a privileged position. The first of these, because of its importance in the Bible (Tb 4:10 and 12:9, Sir 3:30; and Mt 6:2–4; and the theme of koinōnia through sharing: Acts 2:44–45 and Heb 13:16), was often preeminent: "Almsgiving is excellent penance for sin; fasting is better than prayer, but almsgiving is better than either" (2 Clement 16:4, about 150). Thus all of Christian life is a baptismal existence, which is nothing but the daily exercise of conversion (metanoia) and its outward expression in penitential behavior. Well before becoming the object of what was later called a "sacrament," penance was a fundamental attitude (a "virtue*") of the Christian. With few exceptions, the Fathers* of the Church spoke much more of this daily penance than of the disciplinary form of it that was reserved for serious sins.

When it came into existence, the practice of post-baptismal penance was understood and experienced as a kind of copy of baptism ("second baptism," "laborious baptism," "baptism of tears," says Tertullian). In any event, in the third and fourth centuries there was a generally parallel development in length (several years) and severity (harsh prohibitions) of catechumenical practice in preparation for baptism, and in the practice of penance for the forgiveness of serious sins committed after baptism. Similarly, when the catechumenate was reduced to the period of Lent in the seventh century, there was a parallel reduction in the period of penance (Old Gelasian Sacramentary I. 15–16 and 38). Moreover, catechumens and penitents each formed a group apart, and being considered only peripheral members of the Church*, were dismissed on Sunday* after the homily, that is, before the offering of the Eucharist*.

2. Origin and Development

a) Ecclesiastical Post-Baptismal Penance Appears. Until the second half of the second century, each local* church treated instances of unfaithfulness to baptism on a case by case basis, as Paul had done with the fornicators of Corinth (1 Cor 5). As long as Christian communities were small and found themselves in a precarious situation (harassed and threatened with persecution), and were moreover characterized by a vivid expectation of the coming Parousia* of the Lord Jesus*, the “sacrament-oath” of baptism was experienced as a veritable pact between God and the Christian. It marked a definitive passage from the kingdom of Satan to the kingdom of Christ*, from the “old nature” to the “new nature” (see Col 3:9–11), and there is a good deal of evidence to suggest that this passage had a psychological effect as powerful perhaps as that of the vows taken today by monks and nuns. It is understandable, in these circumstances, that cases of serious unfaithfulness were relatively rare.

Those cases became much more frequent when Christians began to find themselves in a Church that was growing in numbers (“multitudinism”), with the relative decline in fervor such a sociological situation involved (in contrast to that of a “sect”), and when they were less inspired by the “enthusiastic” expectation of an imminent Parousia. And it was in order to provide a remedy for the increase in cases of unfaithfulness to the “pact” and the sanctity of baptism that a penitential practice other than baptism came into being. It was a difficult birth. If we are to believe The Shepherd of Hermas (Rome*, mid-second century), many Christian “doctors” rejected the reintegration of serious sinners into the community. Against these rigorists who left no hope of salvation* to those who had betrayed their baptism, Hermas took a position, expressed in the course of a vision, that guaranteed a second chance—but in order to bar the door to laxity, this would be the last chance (Pastor[or Shepherd], Mandate IV. 29. 8). A few decades later, Tertullian attested to the existence of this penitential practice, which historians usually call “canonical” (De. paen.; SC 316).

b) System of Canonical Penance. The canonical system governed the penitential discipline of the Church until the seventh century. It was reserved for sins that were considered very serious, those that, like the triad of apostasy, adultery, and murder, constituted a break with baptism. Everyday sins were remitted by God through the practice of daily penance. Fully developed in the fourth century, canonical penance had two major characteristics. First it was an entirely ecclesiastical process, which meant not only that it was public (only the confession of serious sins to the bishop* himself was not, even though some people refused to confess until the bishop, knowing their sins, obliged them to), but also that its public nature, through association with the ordo poenitentium and the various forms of asceticism* that were connected to it in matters of dress, food, and sexual conduct, was not primarily intended to humiliate the penitent, but to call on the Christian community to support him with its prayer of intercession and by its example. Second, this process was unrepeatable: The second chance for salvation “after the shipwreck” (Tertullian), it was also the last, or else it would have “seemed [they were] opening a new path for sin” (DE paen. VII. 2). This second principle constituted a kind of practical dogma*. For example, speaking of “penance carried out publicly,” Ambrose* writes: “Just as there is only one baptism, so there is only one penance.” (De paen. II. 95; SC 179). Of course, many bishops, including some of the most eminent, demonstrated a certain pastoral flexibility, but these exceptions confirmed a rule that was considered inviolable.

However, although this long and severe system was able to function relatively well in the framework of “confessing” communities, its limits soon became apparent. This is attested to by many patristic sources from the second half of the fourth century. Many of the baptized who were guilty of serious sins constantly delayed their request to enter into penance because they were discouraged in advance by the rigors of the ordeal. As for those who had made the request, few carried out their penance “as they should” (Ambrose, ibid., II. 96). The situation even reached the point that, in order to avoid relapses that would now be irremediable, and in order not to create an aberrant ecclesiology* (Christian communities would have ended by being made up of a mass of penitents much more numerous than those faithful to baptism), several synods (synod*) in the fifth and sixth centuries took the step of prohibiting the entry into penance “to people who are still young...because of the weakness of their age” (synod of Agde, 506) and to married people insufficiently “advanced in age” (synod of Orléans, 538). The bishops themselves thereby officially recognized the failure of the canonical system. However, they did not replace it with any other institutional form; there was indeed no question of challenging the singleness of penance. For example, in the sixth century, Caesar of Arles took note of the fact that nearly all sinners who were seriously guilty would ask for and be given penance only toward the end of their lives or even on their deathbeds. But he warned them that a penance of this kind may well be ineffective if it is not prepared for by a truly penitential life (Serm. 60. 3–4; SC 330). This was perhaps an appropriate pastoral solution, but it made even more apparent the impasse at which the sacramental institution had arrived. In any event, the canonical system had become distorted. From a demanding remedy reserved for a few serious sinners so that they might experience a true conversion with the support of the community, it had now become a means of salvation demanded by everyone on their deathbeds.

c) System of Tariffs and Repeatable Penance. Given this impasse, it is easy to understand the rapid success achieved by the practice of establishing tariffs for repeatable penance that the Irish monks of Saint Columbanus introduced on the continent in the seventh century. Of course, there were protests, such as that of the synod of Toledo (589), scandalized by the “atrocious audacity” of those who allowed the faithful not to do penance “according to the canonical manner” and offered them reconciliation “each time they sinned”; there were similar objections from the synods of Chalon-sur Saône (813) and Paris (829) (Vogel 1969). But to no avail; social and cultural developments and the dominant position of the Church in society* had made it impossible to return to the old system, despite all the “authorities” with which it was crowned.

The new system remained in competition with other penitential practices, from entry into a monastery, considered the most efficacious penitential rite, to direct confession to God (Council of Chalon-sur-Saône [813], can. 33; Vogel 1969), and including pilgrimages (pilgrimage*) imposed by confessors and almsgiving. The new practice had three principal characteristics. The most important was the fact that Christians could now have access to “sacramental” penance as often as they wished. The second is related to the ritual process: Confession was most often made on the basis of a series of questions that the confessor would put to the penitent following the book known as a “penitential” that he had at hand. The confessor would then add up the tariffs corresponding to each sin, which often amounted to several months or years of fasting, or the recitation of a certain number of complete psalteries, or, from the Carolingian period and for particularly serious sins, a pilgrimage. The penitent would normally return after completing his penance to receive “absolution” from the priest (the term began to replace the former vocabulary of reconciliation). We may note in passing that oral confession, which was required only in the case of serious sins, was no longer merely a prerequisite for penance; it took on an entirely different significance, because it was now the means of establishing the expiatory punishment, which remained the most important element in the process, because, as Paschasius Radbert wrote in the ninth century, that was “what obtained the remission of sins” (In Mt., about 155). However, and this was the third characteristic, the length of penances imposed after confession was so great that a system of redemption or compensation had to be established: you could have a certain number of masses said, or recite a certain number of psalms*, or perform a certain number of genuflections, or give specific amounts of money in alms, these amounts redeeming a specific number of days, months, or even years of penance. As a consequence, this system too eventually became corrupt, since the better off could afford to have many masses said or even pay someone to fast in their place.

d) “Modern” System of Penance. After the first two “revolutions” represented by the institutionalization of a post-baptismal penance and then the possibility of repeated penance, there came a third. This has come to be called “modern,” for want of a better term, and made its first appearance in the 12th century. From that time onward, absolution preceded the penance that was to be carried out. In practice this had begun with the introduction of the system of tariffs. Many penitents, because of distance or misunderstanding, did not return to ask for absolution after completing their expiation*. But the practice was now justified theoretically, for, as was stated in the celebrated letter De vera et falsa paenitentia (11th century, although it was at the time attributed to the authority of Augustine*): “the shame inherent in confession itself accomplishes a large part of the remission” as well as “a large part of the expiation” (no. 10). In any event, in the late 12th century Pierre le Chantre stated what would soon become a commonplace: “Oral confession makes up the largest part of satisfaction” (PL 205, 342). This theory obviously presupposed that particular importance was now given to confession, in some ways more than to expiation, at a time, moreover, when the latter was becoming simultaneously less severe and more inward. In fact, in order to justify its expiatory import, confession, which was now expected to be precise and detailed (see the 16 conditions given in the Supplement to the Summa Theologica of Thomas* Aquinas, q. 9. a.4), became more humiliating; and this situation was aggravated by the fact that many priests (priesthood*) were ignorant and lacked the necessary discernment, as Thomas noted with sadness in the 13th century (Suppl. q. 8. a. 4. ad 6) and Johann Eck in the 16th (Duval 1974 [1985]). This shift in emphasis in the 12th century went along with the abandonment of the penitentials, which were out of tune with the new culture, and their replacement by the “confessors’ manuals,” which made their appearance in the 13th century. Even more significant was the fact that, in line with Thomas, confession was now considered as being, along with contrition and satisfaction on the one hand, and absolution by the priest on the other, one of the “integral parts” of the sacrament, which existed only when all four elements were present (ST IIIa. q. 90). As a consequence, the confession of each and every serious sin was no longer a mere prerequisite for the penitential process as in antiquity, nor a mere ritual device necessary for the establishment of the tariff as in the early Middle Ages. It had become a constituent element of the sacrament itself. It is also clear that the Church found in confession an effective tool for social control, both for detecting heretics (Suppl. q. 6. a. 3) and for inculcating the people with a Christian ethos.

In 1215, canon 21 of the Fourth Lateran* Council made it an obligation of every Christian to confess at least once a year to his own priest (but not to receive absolution, which had only ever been required by the Church for mortal sins) (DS 812). At the time, only a handful of perfectissimi, like Saint Louis, confessed weekly or more often; the majority of Christians confessed very infrequently (N. Bériou, in Groupe de la Bussière 1983): “It is usually thought that if annual confession gradually became customary, this was as much because of social constraint as because of the persuasive power of preachers.” The pastoral theory and practice that came out of the Counter Reformation succeeded in inculcating in a large segment of the population the practice of three or four confessions a year, whereas an elite frequented the confessional (due to Carlo Borromeo after Trent) every week or even more often. This practice of “devotional” confession, with the many debates to which it gave rise on attrition and contrition, on delays in absolution, on moral dilemmas, and on “probable” and “more probable” opinions (see Delumeau 1990), obviously derived from a conception of the sacrament different from the one that prevailed in the early Church. It is to be associated more with the monastic practice of therapeutic confession or the practice of spiritual* direction. In any event, it was grafted onto ecclesiastical penance for the forgiveness of serious sins—the definition of which, it is true, varied from period to period—and the sacrament of penance in its modern form was thus a blend of two different kinds of practice and of theory: sacramental penance for the reconciliation of Christians who have broken faith with their baptism, and spiritual companionship on the path to evangelical perfection (at the risk of making both lose their relevance).

e) Reformation and the Council of Trent. The leaders of the 16th-century Reformation recognized only two sacraments attested in the Scriptures: baptism and holy communion. However, in 1520 (WA 6. 501, 543, 572), 1522 (10/3. 395), and 1545 (54. 427), Luther* had been hesitant about confession, whose benefits he personally appreciated. As for Melancthon, he had explicitly recognized penance as a “sacrament properly speaking” in the Apology of the Augsburg Confession (BSLK 259, 292). In addition, they all attached great importance to the confession of sins, whether in a general form by the community at the beginning of the service (e.g., Calvin* in The Form of Prayers and Ecclesiastical Chants of 1542, CR 34. 172–83), or privately, “to a brother,” even if he was not a priest. In that case, wrote Luther, “I do not doubt that absolution of his hidden sins will be granted to whoever asks forgiveness and reforms in the presence of a brother alone” (De capt. bab., WA 6. 547).

In 1551 the Council of Trent* (DS 1667–1715) opposed the Reformation on three points. First, it affirmed the sacramental status of penance; second, it required the confession of all sins (still with the meaning of “mortal sins”) and reserved to priests the power to absolve in the name of God; finally, absolution was defined “as a judicial act,” which meant that, like a legal decision, it accomplished what it said. It had a “performative” and not merely a declarative effect (see Duval 1985).

f) Ritual of Vatican II. The ordo paenitentiae promulgated in 1973 was an innovation in the existing situation, in particular because it suggested several forms for the celebration of the sacrament: individual reconciliation of the penitents (numbers 41–47); reconciliation of several penitents with individual confession and absolution (numbers 48–59); reconciliation of penitents with collective confession and absolution (numbers 60–66), the latter possibility being reserved for exceptional circumstances. This pluralism has not stemmed a noticeable decline in the participation by Catholics in the sacrament, and the link between confession and communion* that was still so strong in the 1950s has very substantially loosened. In three decades (1952–83) the percentage of the French population that identifies itself as Catholic and going to confession “at least once a month” has fallen from 15 to 1 percent, and those going “at least once a year” from 51 to 14 percent (J. Potel, MD 167). A decline of this order is obviously linked to the cultural transformations of late modernity: displacement of the feeling of guilt, currently weak impact of the sacrament on the social fabric, loss of influence of the institution of the Church, emphasis on the individual ability to choose, and the like. But it is not out of the question that such social and cultural changes will gradually lead to a transformation of the current practice—despite its “modernization,” still very much bound up with the Tridentine spirit—into a new penitential system.

3. Some Particular Points

a) Each Penitential System is the Reflection of a Historical Period. The appearance of canonical penance corresponded to a necessity, that of struggling against a relative decline in fervor in a period in which Christian communities were becoming more numerous. However, because of its demands, the system could function well only in “confessing” communities; it thus proved inadequate when the Church became “multitudinist” and it became socially advantageous to be a Christian: “I have had less trouble meeting people who have preserved their baptismal innocence than people who have done penance as they should,” Ambrose noted bitterly (De paen. II. 96). And Augustine complained that “what should be a place of humility has become a place of iniquity” (Serm. 232. 7, 8). We have seen how the synods of Gaul declared that canonical penance was a failure. As for the system of tariffs, which came from outside the hierarchy*, it was fairly well adapted to a Church that wanted to convert the “barbarian” invaders. In a world marked by Germanic feudal law, in which any disorder, by an offense or the shedding of blood, was subject to carefully calculated compensation, the application of penitential tariffs was not at all surprising. And as for the modern system, with its insistence on the detailed confession of every sin and the evaluation of its gravity as a function of its subjective aspects, particularly in relation to intentions and circumstances, that itself seems to have corresponded to the new Scholastic culture that emerged in the 12th century. Hence, each penitential system was to some extent a reflection of the social and cultural situation of the Church, and that extended to the hierarchy of sins that it established and its emphasis on one kind of sin or another: sins, too, have their history. And it is no doubt the search for a new coherence of penance with contemporary culture that has given rise to current perplexities in this area.

b) Each System Emphasized a Different Point. Whatever the penitential system of the period, the Church never forgot the primordial role of inner repentance, or contrition, in the reconciliation of the sinner with God; it can even be said that the primary focus has always been placed on this conversion of the heart. The external manifestation of this inner movement has, however, been subject to different emphases. In antiquity the emphasis was on the effective conversion of the sinner throughout the penitential process, and not primarily on the rite of reconciliation by the bishop. The rite was certainly not without importance, but it was understood rather differently from the way the Scholastics were to understand it. First, it was related to the prayer for intercession by the entire community. The Didascalia (II. 12) says: “Bishop . . . lay your hand on the sinner while the entire assembly prays for him, and then allow him to go into the church and receive him into your community.” The exhortation that “all the brothers” join in the prayer of the penitent (Tertullian, De paen. IX. 4) and that the sinner ask God’s forgiveness “through the prayers of all the Christian people” (Ambrose, De paen. I. 89) was so insistent that Caesar of Arles had to warn penitents against the temptation of resting too comfortably on “the intercession of the whole community” (Serm. 67. 3). This intercession took place not only in the course of the period of penance, but in the course of the reconciliation itself. Was it not, according to Augustine, the whole Church (which required the bishop and his indispensable role of presiding), represented by the “confessing” Peter* in Matthew 16:16–19 or by the apostles in John 20:21–23, that remitted or retained sins (De bapt. XVIII. 23, BAug 29)? In any event, the bishop of Hippo had no hesitation in declaring to his entire community: “You also bind and you also loosen” (Serm. Guelf. 16. 2, SC 116. 41), clearly implying that this action of the Church in prayer during the celebration for the reconciliation of penitents shortly before Easter (Holy Thursday in Rome and Milan) achieved decisive efficacy only in its relation to the sacramental action of the bishop. This action demonstrated in particular that full reconciliation with God could not take place unless it was linked to a reconciliation with the Church (release from excommunication, understood in the form of an exclusion from Eucharistic communion, hence reintegration into the “peace” of the Church), which played the role of the “first effect of the sacrament,” res et sacramentum in Scholastic language (Rahner* 1955).

In the second place, the rite of reconciliation by the bishop was understood as putting a seal on a reconciliation with God that God himself, and he alone—for “who can forgive sins but God alone?” (Mk 2:7)—had accomplished as the sinner gradually returned to him. The last point is in agreement with two gospel pericopes that the Fathers of the Church commented on most frequently with reference to ecclesial penance: the healing* of the ten lepers (Lk 17:11–19) and the resurrection of Lazarus (Jn 11). God alone can heal or give life; the role of the Church is to officially recognize this or to “unbind” (Jn 11:44) the one who has recovered life to allow him to enjoy it. Most of the Fathers of the Church would probably have adopted the formulation of Gregory* the Great (†604) commenting on the resurrection of Lazarus: “We must absolve through our pastoral authority* those of whom we know that they have already been given life by grace*” (Homilies on the Gospels 26. 6; Vogel 1969).

In penance by tariff the emphasis was still placed on the conversion of the sinner and its link to expiation. Expiation, however, had particular weight, as indicated by the use of the word “satisfaction” to denote it at that time. It is probable that the greater part of the theologians of the early Middle Ages could have adopted the formulation of one of them, the ninth-century Paschasius Radbert: “Confession indicates repentance, repentance brings about satisfaction, and satisfaction brings about the remission of sins” (in Mt., about 154). Absolution is not even mentioned. But we know that it existed, although the only role that it played, as Anselm* (†1109) said, was that through it, sinners “are shown (ostenduntur) pure before men” (Homily on Luke, 13; PL 158. 662). The emphasis was thus placed on the penitential works through which the sinner “repaired” the disorder introduced into the world by his sins and thereby “satisfied” God.

In “modern” penance, on the other hand, the emphasis was rather placed on confession itself and on the shame that it provoked. We have earlier seen the principal reasons for this and their coherence with the new culture of the 12th and 13th centuries. The importance of confession became so great, as indicated by the expression “go to confession,” still in common use only a few decades ago, that a part was taken for the whole. We may wonder whether today, as shown by the success of community celebrations of reconciliation, the emphasis has not been displaced onto absolution itself.

c) What Is the Efficacy of the Sacrament? The first effect of absolution, reconciliation of the penitent with the Church, has always been clear as far back as the penance of antiquity; but it tended to be forgotten as the sacrament became more private and was associated almost exclusively with “venial” sins, particularly in devotional confession. The second effect, on the other hand, reconciliation with God, did not clearly appear until the 13th century, as indicated by the formulations of Gregory the Great, Paschasius Radbert, and Anselm of Canterbury, quoted earlier. Like the latter, all the theologians of the 12th century, beginning with Peter Lombard, considered that the power of binding and loosing granted to priests by God meant the power “to show that men are bound or loosed” (“... id est ostendendi homines ligatos vel solutos,” Sent. IV. d. 18; PL 192. 887). But that meant that the sinner was generally forgiven by God before the sacrament. This was true during the first millennium to the extent that his conversion was accomplished through a sincere expiation; it was true in modern penance through his contrition (his paenitentia interior, in which Lombard saw the res et sacramentum of penance): “However small it may be [referring the amount of pain or distress felt], contrition erases all sin,” wrote Thomas Aquinas (Suppl. q. 5. a. 3), because it proceeds from a true love* of God (unlike attrition, which is closer to “servile fear” and remorse). Thomas, however, opposed those of his predecessors and contemporaries who, like Bonaventure*, reduced absolution of the sin (culpa) to a simple manifestation of what God had already done (according to Bonaventure, “absolvit solum ostendendo, scil. demonstrando absolutum” [In IV Sent. d. 18. p. 1. a. 2. q. 2]). Of course, God does remit the sin when the sinner sincerely repents for it, but this repentance is authentic contrition only if, by virtue of the theory of the “integral parts” of penance, it implies the intent (votum) to submit to the “keys” of the Church. This is the usual case. However, Thomas explains, “nothing prevents that sometimes (aliquando) a person at confession receives grace and the forgiveness of the guilt of sin by the power of the keys at the very instant of absolution [and not before that moment],” just as this also “sometimes” happens to the catechumen at the time of his baptism (CG IV, c. 72).

In this respect, later doctrine effected a significant reversal, indicated by the Council of Trent itself. The adverb aliquando is indeed found in chapter four of its “doctrine on the sacrament of penance,” but it is used there to make an assertion in opposition to theologians of the 13th century: it is “sometimes” that a sinner may be justified by God before the sacrament, to the extent that he has “perfect contrition,” which includes the desire for the sacrament (DS 1677). But the notion of “perfect contrition” was set so high that it could clearly be reserved only for a small elite (see the Catechism of Trent, ch. XXIII. 2). The council thus closed the door on the presumptuous who would claim to have been forgiven before the sacrament. What was considered the rule three centuries earlier had become the exception, and this point manifests in pure form the difficulties that theology* has encountered in the articulation of a theory of penance and reconciliation. It was probably inevitable; it has always been difficult to find a balance between the subjective aspect of the sacrament, connected to the personal elements of guilt, sin, and contrition of the heart, and its objective aspect, connected to the Church as an institution. And it is not surprising that there has been a similar problem in the case of marriage*. As soon as the “matter” or rather the “quasi-matter” of a sacrament is no longer an objective reality such as water, bread and wine, or oil, but a reality dependent on human subjects (which is true for penance and marriage), sacramental theology comes up against its most troubling problems.

d) In the East. Since the Second Council of Lyon (1274, DS 860), “Greek theologians have expressly emphasized the sacramental character of penance” (Vorgrimler 1978). Important differences from the Latin Church nevertheless remained, particularly with respect to the meaning of confession and the role of the minister. 1) In the East, confession at first had a purpose that was more therapeutic than sacramental, and so the confessor had a role that was more medicinal than judicial. The latter aspect was not of course denied, but it “played no part” (ibid.). Therefore: “It has been emphasized since Basil* that not every ordained priest is qualified to receive the confession of sins, while conversely, for centuries, it was not required of the patēr pneumatikos that he be an ordained priest.” In any event, “from the eighth century . . . confessors were almost exclusively monks” (ibid.), and most monks were not priests. 2) The East, then, officially recognized that each monk had a role as spiritual therapist through confession and penance, so that the status of a monk who is not a priest cannot, contrary to the Western practice, be assimilated to that of a member of the laity* (Taft 1987). 3) In the third place, absolution is given in the East in deprecative (exhortatory), not declarative, form, as was true for the West until the 13th century, the period when Thomas Aquinas evidences the shift from “May God forgive you” to “I forgive you in the name of . . .” (De forma absol., c. 5); forgiveness by means of prayer sits easily with the status of monk. 4) Finally, we must take into account the more vivid awareness in the East than in the West of the Eucharist as a sacrament of the “blood shed for the remission of sins.” The requests for forgiveness in Eastern anaphorae, as well as communion itself, seem to hold not only for forgiveness of minor sins, but also for those that could be called “serious” though not “mortal,” absolution of the latter being reserved to priests (Taft 1987; Ligier 1963). On this point as on many others, the East shows a sensibility different from that of the Latin Church.

- C. Vogel (1966, 1969), Le pécheur et la pén., I: Dans l'Église ancienne, II: Au Moyen Age, Paris.
- H. Karpp (1970), La pénitence: Textes et commentaires des origines de l'ordre pénitentiel dans l'Église ancienne (Ier-IIIe s.), Neuchâtel.
- ♦ B. Xiberta (1922), Clavis ecclesiae, Rome, Barcelona (2nd Ed. 1973).
- K. Rahner (1955), “Vergessene Wahrheiten über das Bußsakrament,” Schr. zur Th. 2, Einsiedeln-Zürich-Köln, 143–83.
- I.-H. Dalmais (1958), “Le sacrement de pénitence n. chez les Orientaux,” MD 56, 22–29.
- L. Ligier (1963), “Pénitence et eucharistie en Orient,” OCP 29, 5–78.
- L. Braeckmans (1971), Confession et communion au Moyen Age et au concile de Trente, Gembloux.
- K. Rahner (1973), “Frühe Bußgeschichte,” Schr. zur Th. 11, Einsiedeln-Zürich-Köln.
- M.-F. Berrouard (1974), “La pénitence publique durant les six premiers siècles: Histoire et sociologie,” MD 118, 92–130.
- A. Duval (1974), “Le concile de Trente et la confession,” MD 118, 131–80.
- P.-M. Gy (1974), “Les bases de la pénitence moderne,” MD 117, 63–85; id. (1984), “La pénitence et la réconciliation,” in A.-G. Martimort (Ed.), L'Église en prière, vol. 3, 115–31.
- H. Vorgrimler (1978), Buße und Krankensalbung, HDG IV/3 (reference work).
- P. Adnès (1981), La penitencia, Madrid.
- H. P. Arendt (1981), Bußsakrament und Einzelbeichte, FThSt.
- P. De Clerck (1982), “Célébrer la pénitence ou la réconciliation? Essai de discernement théologique à propos du nouveau rituel,” RTL 13, 387–424.
- Groupe de la Bussière (1983), Pratiques de la confession, des Pères du désert à Vatican II: quinze études d'histoire, Paris.
- R. Marlé (1983), “Crise du sacrement de pénitence,” Études, 701–14.
- P. Rouillard (1985), “Sacrement de pénitence,” Cath 10, 1135–61.
- R. Taft (1987), “La pénitence aujourd'hui: État de la recherche,” MD 171, 7–35.
- J. Delumeau (1990), L'aveu et le pardon: Les difficultés de la confession: XIIIe-XVIIIe siècle, Paris.
- L.-M. Chauvet, P. De Clerck (Eds.) (1993), Le sacrement du pardon entre hier et demain, Paris.

LOUIS-MARIE CHAUVET

See also Anointing of the Sick; Baptism; Confirmation; Eucharist; Marriage; Ordination/Order; Punishment; Sacrament

Pentecostalism

1. Classical Pentecostalism

Pentecostalism is a revival movement dating from 1906. It is centered on the experience* of “baptism* in the Holy* Spirit, and its “first sign” is glossolalia or “speaking in tongues” (prayers in unknown or angelic languages: 1 Cor 13:1 and Acts 2:6), in accordance with Scripture (see Mk 1:8 and parallel passages; Lk 24:49; Acts 1:5, 2:4). Pentecostalism is today the largest of the Protestant churches (church).

a) History. Pentecostalism had precursors in the 19th century, but it really came into existence in 1906 in Los Angeles, in a chapel on Azusa Street whose pastor, W. Seymour, was the son of former slaves. At that time, there was a “new Pentecost,” with baptism in the Holy Spirit and charismatic manifestations (glossolalia, prophecy*, healing*). From 1910 to 1939 the movement spread throughout the world, particularly among the working classes. Other churches did not recognize Pentecostalism, which rejected them in turn as untrue to apostolic faith* and experience, although it too had internal tensions and divisions. The first world Pentecostal congress took place in Zurich in 1947, an expression of the desire for unity. Pentecostalism has continued to grow since the 1950s, but in spite of greater ecumenical openness (e.g., a dialogue with the Catholic Church begun in 1971), few Pentecostal churches have joined the Ecumenical Council of Churches, for fear of inopportune alliances and doctrinal compromises.

b) Doctrine. Most Pentecostals are doctrinally orthodox. They particularly emphasize salvation* by the blood of Christ*, charismatic gifts, and the return of Christ. According to them: 1) Any Christian at any time can have access to baptism in the Holy Spirit and to charismatic gifts (Acts 2:37–38). Baptism in the Holy Spirit has a dual purpose: to provide greater sanctity and a spiritual power for proclaiming the gospel. 2) The essential elements of salvation are repentance, conversion*, justification*, new birth, and personal relationship with Jesus* Christ. 3) Baptism by water, preferably by immersion, is associated with conversion. Baptism in the Holy Spirit may precede it, particularly for the newly converted, but it generally comes afterward for regenerated Christians. 4) For some Pentecostals, sanctification is an instantaneous experience, for others it is a process lasting an entire lifetime. It is difficult to reconcile the doctrines of justification and sanctification. 5) Emphasis is placed on eschatology* and on a Parousia* of a premillenarian kind; before his reign of a thousand years on earth, Jesus Christ prepares a people by baptizing it in the Holy Spirit, hence the importance of 6) the proclamation of the gospel. 7) The Bible* is the word* of God, inspired and inerrant. 8) Theology* is not very important, nor is direct change in political and social structures. 9) Pentecostal morality is rigid and aims for personal sanctity. 10) Pentecostal ecclesiology deals primarily with the local, autonomous assembly of the “born-again saints,” which is where the Holy Spirit manifests itself and makes visible the Church of Jesus Christ. But the existence of Pentecostal churches throughout the world, as well as the ecumenical experience, have obliged Pentecostalism to think more systematically in this area. 11) The organization of Pentecostal Churches has very varied forms. Pastors (pastor*) are in principle men, but women have played a major role in Pentecostalism, through the exercise of spiritual gifts and ministries (ministry*) (particularly in the proclamation of the gospel). 12) Charismatic manifestations, prayer* (sometimes spontaneous), and preaching* are the rule in Pentecostal services, where it is in fact difficult to reconcile liturgy* and free expression in the Holy Spirit. Communion is understood in the manner of Zwingli*, with no doctrinal insistence, but as the object of great fervor.

2. Charismatic Renewal

Charismatic Renewal, whose roots are Pentecostal, also attaches great importance to baptism in the Holy Spirit and to spiritual gifts, but it does not make glossolalia the “first sign” of that experience. Baptism in the Holy Spirit is a vital link between Pentecostalism and Charismatic Renewal, but the two movements are independent. Charismatic Renewal originated in the United States in the 1960s, first in Protestant churches, then in 1967 in the Catholic Church, among student groups who saw in baptism in the Holy Spirit a divine response to the initiatives of Vatican* II. Since then it has penetrated all Christian churches, including the Orthodox Church. It was established in France in the 1970s. Jews have also been influenced, and there are “messianic” communities, particularly in the United States and Israel. It has been estimated that in 2000, about a third of those who profess the Christian faith have had the experience of baptism in the Holy Spirit.

Charismatic Renewal, ecumenical in essence, has done a good deal for ecumenism. Officially accepted in the Catholic Church by Pope Paul VI in 1975, and in the Anglican Church by the archbishop of Canterbury, Donald Coggan, in 1978, it seeks to revitalize the whole body of Christ in every confessional family and to establish cooperation among churches for the spread of the gospel.

Charismatic Renewal has been able to adapt to different circumstances. Structured communities are frequent among Catholics, particularly in France (e.g., le Chemin neuf, L’Emmanuel, les Béatitudes); renewed parishes and groups are characteristic among Anglicans and Protestants. Small prayer groups can be found everywhere. Charismatic Renewal takes more interest than Pentecostalism in life in society*, but it does not give priority to political action. The essential thing is to be fully Christian, in the power of the Holy Spirit, and to seek to put into practice the ethics* of the kingdom* of God.

- L. Christenson (1963), Speaking in Tongues: A Gift for the Body of Christ, London.
- D. DuPlessis (1963), The Spirit Bade Me Go, Oakland, Calif.
- D. Wilkerson (1963), The Cross and the Switchblade, New York.
- M. Harper (1964), Power for the Body of Christ, London.
- M. Harper (1965 a), The Third Force in the Body of Christ, London; id. (1965 b), As at the Beginning: The Twentieth Century Pentecostal Revival, London.
- J. Sherrill (1965), They Speak with Other Tongues, Westwood, N.J.
- A. Bittlinger (1967), Gifts and Graces, A Commentary on I Corinthians 12: 12–14, London.
- D. Gee (1967), Wind and Flame, Croydon.
- D. Bennett (1969), Nine O’Clock in the Morning, Plainfield, N.J.

- W. Hollenweger (1969), Enthusiastisches Christentum: die Pfingstbewegung in Geschichte u. Gegenwart, Zürich-Wuppertal.
- K. and D. Ranaghan (1969), The Return of the Spirit, New York.
- D. Gelpi (1971), Pentecostalism: A Theological Viewpoint, London.
- V. Synan (1971), The Holiness-Pentecostal Movement in the United States, Grand Rapids, Mich.
- A. Bittlinger, K. McDonnell (1972), The Baptism in the Spirit as an Ecumenical Problem, Notre Dame, Ind.
- M. Carothers (1972), Prison to Praise, Plainfield, N.J.
- W. Pulkington (1972), Gathered for Power, New York.
- S. Tugwell (1972), Did You Receive the Spirit?, London.
- H. Mühlen (1974), Die Erneuerung des christlichen Glaubens, Munich.
- E. O’Connor (Ed.) (1975), Charismatic Renewal, Notre Dame, Ind.
- K. McDonnell (1976), Charismatic Renewal and the Churches, New York.
- A. Bittlinger (1978), Papst u. Pfingstler, Frankfurt-Bern-Las Vegas.
- K. McDonnell (Ed.) (1980), Presence, Power, Praise: Documents on the Charismatic Renewal, 3 vols., Collegeville, Minn.
- A. Bittlinger (Ed.) (1981), The Church Is Charismatic, Geneva.
- G. Stotts (1981), Le pentecôtisme au pays de Voltaire, Grézieul-la-Varenne.
- D. Dayton (1987), Theological Roots of Pentecostalism, Metuchen, N.J.
- P. Hollenweger (1988), Geist u. Materie, Munich.
- S. Burgess, G. McGee (Ed.) (1990), Dictionary of Pentecostal and Charismatic Movements, Grand Rapids, Mich.
- K. McDonnell, G. Montague (1991), Christian Initiation and Baptism in the Spirit: Evidence from the First Eight Centuries, Collegeville, Minn.
- Tychique*, Lyon, vol. 93 (1991), 20 ans de Renouveau charismatique en France; vol. 95 (1992), Brighton 91; vol. 99 (1992), Les 25 ans du Renouveau charismatique catholique; vol. 101 (1993), La prière.
- T. Smail, A. Walker, N. Wright (1993), Charismatic Renewal: The Search for a Theology, London.

GEORGE HOBSON

See also Ecumenism; Holy Spirit; Methodism; Millenarianism; Pietism; Protestantism; Scripture, Fulfillment of

People of God

1. Terminology

Two terms constantly interact in biblical Hebrew: ‘am and gôy, translated respectively as “people” and “nation.” A third term, le’ ôm, belongs to poetic language (psalms*).

‘Am is the most frequently used (1,826 times), with the following characteristics: most often in the singular, often followed by a possessive or a noun phrase, as in “my people” (Hos 1:9) and “the people of the Lord” (Ez 36:20). It may also become a proper noun (Ex 6:23; Nm 13:12). The word refers to a particular human community based on familial or political covenant relations. The expression ‘am ha’ ârèç, “people of the land,” designates a local population (Gn 23:12) or an assembly of the people distinguished from its leaders (Jer 1:18 and 2 Kgs 11:14).

Gôy is less frequent (561 times); in the plural (the majority of cases) it is used to designate the many “nations” scattered over the earth (Gn 10:32). The construction “nation of” followed by “YHWH” or another god does not occur. The “nations” are the other peoples in relation to a community of reference, ‘am.

Israel is thus normally designated by ‘am. But it may also be called gôy when its behavior makes it resemble other “nations.” The fact of having a king is a form of assimilation to the “nations” (1 Sm 8:20). It is possible to maintain both that Israel is a “nation” out of which God* makes a “people” (Ex 33:13) and that the descendants of Abraham will be a great “nation” (Gn 12:2).

The Greek of the Septuagint and of the New Testament generally respects the Hebrew distinction by using laos for ‘am and ethnos for gôy. But the tendency is to strengthen the identification of laos with the people of God—Israel in the Septuagint; sometimes for Luke the Gentile Christians (Acts 15:14) or the Jewish Christians (Acts 18:10).

2. Old Testament

a) Structures and Developments. The people does not originate from the coming together of subjects or citizens around the authority* of a king or a law*. It seems rather to be built up out of the alliance of human groups (“clans” and “tribes”) whose forms and places of residence are shifting (Gn 34:16) and on the basis of the recognition of belonging to a “God of the father” who gradually becomes the God of a people that is in making (Gn 49:24). The hypothesis that there was a stable organization, such as a “league” of tribes or a central cult* (in Gilgal?), at the time the Israelites conquered Canaan and defended themselves against the Philistines is not very likely; these events took place in a disorganized manner (Judges) rather than the contrary (Joshua). It was the need for a political and military order “like the other nations” that gave Israel the form of a monarchy. The people were then organized on a territorial and administrative basis that consolidated the settlement in the land of Canaan. The king made a covenant in the presence of YHWH (2 Sm

5:1–3) with the “twelve tribes of Israel” mentioned in Genesis 49:28. The king, a “son” of God (see Ps 2:7: “You are my son”) represented the unity of the people before the God of Israel. His greatness or his faults gave rise to the admiration of the wise (Sir 47) or the harsh criticism of the prophets (prophet* and prophecy) (Jer 36). What the prophets said in the presence of the people often represented a challenge to royal government. But the end of political monarchy with the exile could not bring about the end of God’s covenant with the people of Israel (Jer 31:31), nor of the dynastic promise made to David (Jer 33:14–15). The life of Israel was subsequently organized around the priestly class. The insurrection of the Maccabees (begun in 167 B.C.) succeeded in restoring independence to the people, though this was lost again with the arrival of the Romans (63 B.C.).

