D'Ors proposed that man is an interplay of work and play based on two principles: that philosophy is not pure contemplation but inscribed in action, and that, in turn, contemplation is conceived as open to action and must embrace a dualistic conception of values that compares and contrasts power with resistance, spirit with matter, will with reality. Reason must draw from both nature and history to become a genuine power that can perceive the individual and concrete as well as the general and abstract. The synthesis of the former and the latter is embodied in the Catalan concept of seny (common sense or measure).

D'Ors formulated a philosophical interpretation of history, proposing a new view of the traditional philosophy of history. His aim was to explain, organize, and systematize history according to certain unchanging values of culture manifested over the course of time. La ciencia de la cultura (1964; Science of culture) charts d'Ors' creation of a philosophy of history and a theory of historiography. He acknowledges that his conception of history as both flowing and cyclical has antecedents in the philosophy of Plato, Giambattista Vico, Nietzsche, and Spengler. He makes a distinction between civilization and culture, with a theoretical approach that is philosophical as well as sociological, and gives as antecedents the work of sociologist Benjamin Kidd, who applies biological discoveries to sociology, Houston S. Chamberlain as a pioneer in systematizing the concept of culture, Leon Frobenius and his formulation of the “spirit of each culture,” and the relativism of Oswald Spengler.

D'Ors formulated the problem of culture in its theoretical aspect within his “systematics of culture,” and in its formal character as “morphology of culture”; he applied his newly conceived system to a series of “epiphanies” or successive manifestations along the history of culture. Thus he conceived of culture as a systematic entity where history is examined not descriptively but in a vital and constitutive form. He introduced the term “eon” or “historic constant,” a living and archetypal category inserted in the fabric of history, in the contingent flow of events. Among the “pure eons” are language, virility and femininity, classicism and baroque, Rome and Babel. This conceptualization reflects the vision of reality within a dual system in which the universe is framed in a gigantic synoptic scheme.

Morphology of culture is defined as the close relation between spiritual content (idea) and formal manifestation (form). One of d’Ors’ most felicitous examples is the pair of values Cupola-Monarchy, elicited by the visual image of St. Peter’s cupola in Rome and the corresponding concept of the monarchic institution of the papacy. Within this morphological formulation, dual corresponding schemes can be found in nature and art, nature and human customs, and botany and architecture, among many other examples. D’Ors claimed that his morphology of culture establishes theoretical and general principles that are simultaneous and symmetrically valid in areas of knowledge that were never before related.

D’Ors’ aesthetic criticism is rooted in his system of the science of culture and is structured within a scheme of figurative thought. He wrote several essays and innumerable glosses on painters, whether Spanish, French, Italian, Dutch, or his contemporary Catalans. However, of all his essays dealing with aesthetics the best known is Tres horas en el Museo del Prado (1923; Three Hours in the Prado Museum). Ostensibly he aimed to provide the visitor with an itinerary giving information and a clear and rational classification, but in reality the book is an illustrated expository of d’Ors’ aesthetic ideas. He selects subjectively but preserves some constant guiding norms by using the principles of the morphology of culture and tectonics, which he advocated in all his art criticism.

PILAR G.SÁENZ

Biography

Eugenio d’Ors Rovira. Used the pseudonym Xenius. Born 28 September 1881 in Barcelona. Studied at the University of Barcelona, law degree, 1905; the Sorbonne, Paris; University of Madrid, Ph.D. in philosophy, 1913. Lived in Catalonia and wrote in Catalan for the first half of his life, then broke with the Catalan government, 1920, moved to Madrid, and wrote mainly in Castilian. Contributor to various journals and newspapers, from 1899; correspondent in Paris for La Veu de Catalunya, from 1906, where he began publishing glossaris (glosses); also published glosario in ABC, 1923–31, El Debate, 1932–34, and Arriba España (Above Spain), 1937–39. Elected Secretary of Education in the Union of Catalonia, 1917–20 (dismissed). Lived on and off in Paris, 1927–37; Spanish representative to the Institute of Intellectual Cooperation, League of Nations, 1927. Elected to the Royal Spanish Academy, 1928. Elected general director of fine arts and perpetual secretary, Institute of Spain. Lectured in Europe and South America. Awards: honorary degree from Coimbra University. Died in Villanova i Geltrú, Barcelona, 1954.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Glosari, 5 vols., 1907–16

El Valle de Josafat, 1921

El nuevo glosario, 7 vols., 1921–23

Tres horas en el Museo del Prado, 1923; as Three Hours in the Prado Museum, translated by John Forrester, 1954

Cinco minutos de silencio, 1925

Las ideas y las formas, 1928

Cuando ya esté tranquilo, 1930

La tradición, 1939

Jardín botánico, 1940

Teoría de los estilos, y Espejo de la arquitectura, 1944

Del barroco, 1945

Arte de entreguerras, 1946

Nuevo glosario (Glosario completo, 1920–43), 3 vols., 1947–49

La palabra en la onda: Glosas para la radio, 1950

Glosari (1906–1910) (most complete collection of glosari in Catalan), 1950

Other writings: the novel La ben plantada (1911), other fiction, plays, philosophical works, and art criticism.

Bibliography

Amorós, Andrés, Eugenio d'Ors, crítico literario, Madrid: Prensa Española, 1971:241–48

Further Reading

Aguilera Cerni, Vicente, Ortega y d'Ors en la cultura artística española, Madrid: Ciencia Nueva, 1966

Amorós, Andrés, Eugenio d'Ors, crítico literario, Madrid: Prensa Española, 1971

Aranguren, José Luís, La filosofía de Eugenio d'Ors, Madrid: Espasa-Calpe, 1981 (original edition, 1945)

Benítez Claros, Rafael, "Eugenio d'Ors y la ciencia de la cultura," Cuadernos del Idioma 1 (1965):129–38

Díaz Plaja, Guillermo, Lo social en Eugenio d'Ors y otros estudios, Barcelona: Cotal, 1982

FerrZn, Jaime, "El dialogo con Europa de Miguel de Unamuno y Eugenio d'Ors," in Spanish Thought and Letters in the Twentieth Century, edited by German Bleiberg and E.Inman Fox, Nashville: Vanderbilt University Press, 1966:193–99

Ferrater Mora, José, "D'Ors: Sentido de una filosofía," in his Obras selectas, vol. 1, Madrid: Revista de Occidente, 1969: 189–97

Guy, Alain, Les Philosophes espagnols d'hier et d'aujourd'hui, Toulouse: Privat, 1956:167–72

Guy, Reine, “Cultura y unidad según Eugenio d’Ors,” Cuadernos Hispanoamericanos 300 (1975):694–98

Hina, Horst, “Eugenio d’Ors, precursor del estructuralismo,” Cuadernos del Sur 11 (1972):194–209

Jardí Casany, Enric, Tres diguem-ne desarrelats: Pijoan, Ors, Gaziol, Barcelona: Selecta, 1966

Jardí Casany, Enric, Eugenio d’Ors, Barcelona: Ayma, 1967

Jiménez Moreno, Luís, Práctica del saber en filósofos españoles: Gracián, Unamuno, Ortega y Gasset, Eugenio d’Ors, Tierno Galván, Barcelona: Anthropos, 1991

López Quintas, Alfonso, El pensamiento filosófico de Ortega y d’Ors, una clave de interpretación, Madrid: Guadarrama, 1972

Muro Romero, Pedro, “La teoría de la forma de Eugenio d’Ors,” Archivo Hispalense 55 (1972):63–77

Ortega y Gasset, José, “Sobre la fenomenología de Eugenio d’Ors,” Revista de Occidente 108 (1990):13–28

Resina, Joan Ramón, “Eugenio d’Ors y la obra continua,” Annali Instituto Universitario Orientale 28 (1986):321–36

Resina, Joan Ramón, “Barcelona ciutat en la estética de Eugenio d’Ors,” Revista Hispánica Moderna 43 (1990):167–78

Saenz, Pilar G.Suelto de, Eugenio d’Ors: Su mundo de valores estéticos, Madrid: Plenitud, 1969

Saenz, Pilar, The Life and Works of Eugenio d’Ors, Troy, Michigan: International Book Publishers, 1983

Ortega y Gasset, José

Spanish, 1883–1955

José Ortega y Gasset is Spain’s greatest philosophical essayist, and arguably one of the finest essayists of the 20th century in any language. Most of his writings (now collected in 12 thick volumes) were originally published in Spain’s leading newspapers and journals, or delivered as lectures in his philosophy classes or in public venues. These writings are remarkable for their thematic diversity, intellectual verve, and stylistic brilliance. Ortega practiced many subtypes of the essay: note, gloss, review, prologue, fragment, thesis, article, meditation, lecture, dialogue, and biographical sketch. A voracious reader with panoramic interests, he wrote about an astounding range of subjects, from art to zoology. Specialized studies of literary, philosophical, or political aspects of Ortega’s thought abound, but the magnitude and diversity of his oeuvre, and the partial truncation of his career by the Spanish Civil War and its aftermath, have delayed a fuller appreciation of his work. If antihumanist trends since the 1960s have partly eclipsed Ortega’s existential humanism, excellent recent studies by Cerezo Galán (1984), Gray (1989), and others have made important strides in demonstrating the continuing relevance of Ortega’s thought.

Coming of age around the turn of the century, Ortega embraced the project of Francisco Giner de los Ríos and Joaquín Costa to regenerate and modernize Spain by emulating the scientific ethos of more advanced European countries. In his various roles of essayist, critic, journalist, editor, lecturer, teacher, and political leader, Ortega carried on his mission of bringing Spanish culture up to the European “height of the time.” He armed himself for this mission by extended periods of study in German universities and by wide reading in the classics, in European literature, philosophy, and history, and in contemporary science. From 1910 to 1936 he held the chair in metaphysics at the University of Madrid. He disseminated, both in his own works and through the Revista de Occidente (1923–36; Western review), the latest ideas of German philosophers Georg Simmel, Edmund Husserl, Max Scheler, and other leading European thinkers of the day. Ortega not only imported European philosophy into Spain; he also exported his own “Spanish interpretation of the world” to the international reading public.

Ortega shared many of the aesthetic and literary preoccupations of Miguel de Unamuno and José Martínez Ruiz (i.e. Azorín), his immediate predecessors from the Generation of 1898, especially their efforts to reinterpret Spanish culture by way of recovering authentic national values. But Ortega and his generation (that of 1914) distanced themselves from the mythologizing tendencies of the preceding generation, advocating a more rigorous and optimistic approach to national regeneration. To Unamuno’s brooding Romanticism and “tragic sense of life,” Ortega opposed his own “sportive” and “festive” sense of life, adopting such bold personae as hunter, archer, bullfighter, explorer, and navigator in his essays. One key to Ortega’s style and its appeal is that his essays constantly enact his contention that each person’s life is an adventure, with its urgent mission and stakes: to succeed or fail at realizing one’s destiny. By dramatizing the hazards and pleasures he encountered in his own inquiries, Ortega hoped to incite readers to take up and develop the issues under discussion.

His wish to address contemporary Spanish readers where they lived led him to publish his ideas in the form of newspaper articles rather than systematic treatises. As he revealed in “Prólogo para alemanes” (1934; Prologue to Germans), he had never written for humanity at large, but had chosen to address only Spanish-speaking readers, with whom he could carry on an intimate conversation. Cordial without being familiar in tone, his limpid Castilian prose often echoes the rhythms and colloquial flavor of Madrid speech. He was a charismatic lecturer and orator, and his personal warmth and expressiveness are apparent throughout his writings. But Ortega’s relation to the reader was not always one of straightforward dialogue. In “Ni vitalismo ni racionalismo” (1924; Neither vitalism nor rationalism), Ortega wrote that, since he had not been blessed with subtle, philosophically inclined readers, his strategy had been to “seduce the reader to philosophy by lyrical means.” He added that this strategy had been successful enough to allow him to take the next step of “speaking philosophically about philosophy.” In fact, Ortega never stopped using rhetorical means to entice the reader and to dramatize his ideas.

Chief among the distinctive qualities of his prose is a lavish use of metaphor. From his early writings on, he theorized about the nature and uses of metaphor in art, philosophy, and ordinary language. He aptly uses a metaphor to define the trope’s cognitive function: “Metaphor is a supplement to our intellectual arm, and represents, in logic, the fishing pole or the rifle.” Other favorite rhetorical figures are paradox, irony, oxymoron, chiasmus, hyperbole, personification, and digression. Ortega's knowledge of classical and modern literature, the sciences, and visual arts supplied his fertile imagination with a rich lexicon and copious source of analogy and allusion. He is fond of coining ingenious neologisms, and of embellishing a passage with a well-chosen foreign expression. The effect is occasionally precious, but never pedantic. Ortega presumes not an erudite reader, only an intelligent and curious one. His phrasing is felicitous, his exposition lucid—he calls clarity “the courtesy of philosophers.” He has a gift for concise definitions, and for clinching a point with a memorable aphorism.

Ortega's thought evolves organically, as the continuous elaboration of themes broached early in his career. His mature work can be divided into three periods, according to biographical and thematic developments: 1914–27, 1927–36, and 1936–55. In the first period, extending from the publication of his first book, Meditaciones del Quijote (1914; Meditations on Quixote) to his encounter with Martin Heidegger's Sein und Zeit (1927; Being and Time), Ortega explores the role of circumstance and perspective in human life, and works out his philosophy of “vital reason.” In a long prologue to Meditations on Quixote, he sets forth his lifelong essayistic program, inviting his compatriots to join him in “the negation of decrepit Spain” and in “experiments toward a new Spain.” In his view, hatred and rancor had dulled Spaniards' spirits, leaving them isolated and unable to appreciate their surroundings. He proposes “new ways of looking” which would reconnect individuals to their world, rescuing marginal phenomena from oblivion and restoring an authentic scale of values. Ortega offers his “essays in intellectual love” as “salvations,” or redemptive integrations of self and milieu: “The reabsorption of circumstance is the concrete destiny of man...I am myself plus my circumstance, and if I do not save it, I cannot save myself.” This is the vital core of Ortega's philosophy, expressing the “radical reality” to which he returns throughout his writings: life as a ceaseless, intense dialogue between oneself and one's environment.

Despite its belletristic presentation, the program adumbrated in this early work went beyond literary criticism. Ortega approaches Cervantes' great novel, Don Quixote—the ostensible subject of his meditation—obliquely, as a pretext, for he has bigger game in view: a new metaphysics of human life. As Philip Silver (1978) has shown, Ortega's “new ways of looking” amounted to a “mundane phenomenology” aimed at giving each individual's concrete sensory experience of the world its due, and thereby avoiding what he considered the intellectualist error of transcendental phenomenology, as expounded by his German contemporary, Edmund Husserl.

In the same prologue, Ortega gives a much-quoted if equivocal definition of the essay. Although his essays are motivated by philosophical desires, “they are not philosophy, which is science. The essay is science, minus the explicit proof.” It is not that the essayist lacks such proof: “it is a matter of intellectual honor not to write anything susceptible of proof without possessing the latter beforehand.” But the essayist elects for stylistic reasons to withhold “the rigid mechanical apparatus of proof,” which he commands no less than the philosopher or scientist, so as not to interrupt the flow or conceal from the reader “the inner warmth with which the thoughts were conceived.” By reducing the distinction between essay and science to rhetorical strategy, Ortega seems to minimize or gloss over possible differences of method, scope, and subject matter. This is an instance of what Thomas Mermall (1994) calls a fundamental tension between the rhetorical nature of Ortega's writings and their epistemic claims: he somehow intended his essays to be at once circumstantial and systematic.

In El tema de nuestro tiempo (1923; The Modern Theme), Ortega attends to the biological basis of culture and proposes a synthesis of vitalism and rationalism. Human life, having both spiritual and biological aspects, is governed by countervailing imperatives: "Man, a living being, must be good—commands the cultural imperative. The good must be human, lived: that is, compatible with human life—orders the other imperative, the vital one." Modernity, according to Ortega, has made two opposite and unsuccessful attempts to resolve the antinomy of life and culture—first rationalism (which he calls "the irony of Socrates") and then, in response, relativism ("the irony of Don Juan"). The first denies life to save culture; the second reacts by denying the objective value of culture, thus making way for life. Ortega considers these to be two "complementary forms of blindness," and argues that the task of his time is to seek a third way. "Pure reason" must yield to "vital reason."

In his "La doctrina del punto de vista" ("Doctrine of the Point of View"), the final essay of The Modern Theme, Ortega argues that perspectivism can break the impasse of rationalism and relativism in the sphere of knowledge, or "the acquisition of truths." The question is, how can truths, by definition "eternal, unique and invariable," be apprehended by ephemeral human subjects? According to rationalism, the knowing subject must be an unchanging, transparent medium which can receive reality without deforming it. Relativism, recognizing that human beings do not meet those criteria, holds trans-individual knowledge to be a vain project. For Ortega, the subject is not a "pure I," the transparent medium posited by rationalists, but neither does the subject's perception of reality deform it, as relativists claim. Rather, the subject is likened to a sieve or net which, placed in a current, retains some things and lets others pass. Thus, the knowing subject selects but does not distort reality. When two individuals look at the same landscape from different vantage points, they see different scenes: each sees something which eludes the other's point of view. To infer from this that one or both views must be false or illusory would be to posit a third, ideal landscape, independent of any definite point of view—the persistent "utopian" error of rationalist philosophy. There is no such "archetypal landscape," declares Ortega. Reality, like a landscape, lends itself to an infinite number of perspectives, each one true and authentic as far as it goes.

Ortega was well aware that perspectivism, while sanctioning the individual point of view, does not answer the question of how there can be "eternal and invariable" truths. He apparently felt it necessary to reinvent an absolute point of view which would synthesize all partial viewpoints. "By juxtaposing everyone's partial views, it would be possible to weave them together and attain the universal and absolute truth." He ends the essay on a distinctly "utopian" note: the sum of all individual viewpoints would be "God...the symbol of the vital torrent through whose infinite nets the universe gradually passes...mankind is the visual organ of divinity." It may be argued that Ortega solved the problem of relativism more satisfactorily in his many evocative essays devoted to the Spanish landscape, in which he showed how provincial perspectives may be overcome through travel, comparison, and dialogue. He also explored the implications of perspective in aesthetics and the arts in a number of seminal essays, including his well-known "La deshumanización del arte" (1925; "The Dehumanization of Art").

Ortega reached the height of his powers during the intense second period (1917–36), which saw the fruition of such important works as La rebelión de las masas (1930; The Revolt of the Masses), Misión de la universidad (1930; Mission of the University), Goethe desde dentro (1932.; Goethe from within), and “Historia como sistema” (wr. 1935, pub. 1936 as “History as a System”), as well as dozens of influential political articles and speeches. He also gave three important series of lectures not published until after his death: ¿Qué es filosofía? (given 1929, pub. 1958; What Is Philosophy?), Unas lecciones de metafísica (given 1932–33, pub. 1966; Some Lessons in Metaphysics), and En torno a Galileo (given 1933, pub. 1956; On Galileo, translated as Man and Crisis).

In The Revolt of the Masses, his most famous and influential work, Ortega extends the sociological diagnosis of modernity that he had begun in previous works of the 1920s. The initial symptom of the problem—“the fact of agglomeration”—is registered as the realization that public places are now filled by teeming masses. The instruments of civilization, and the refined pleasures once reserved for the few, are suddenly to be found in the possession of the “multitude.” The crowd, which had previously stayed in the background of the social stage, has advanced to the footlights and assumed the starring role: “There are no longer protagonists; there is only the chorus.” Contrary to a common misunderstanding, Ortega’s “elitism” is not a defense of inherited privilege; his opposition between “select minorities” and masses does not correspond to the distinction between “upper” and “lower” classes. By select minorities, Ortega means those who wish to excel and therefore make high demands on themselves, living in the service of ideals. Mass man, by contrast, demands nothing of himself and is quite content to be like everyone else. The distinction is between “noble life and common life, or effort and inertia.” In Ortega’s view, human society is always “aristocratic” in this sense—a dynamic unity of relatively inert masses led by creative minorities—or it ceases to be a society. Unlike its 19th-century counterpart, which respected law and followed the lead of qualified minorities, the modern mass is a “hyperdemocracy” which rejects any appeal to higher standards and ideals, and imposes its will through direct action or violence. The mediocre, commonplace mind “has the effrontery to proclaim the right to vulgarity and to impose it everywhere.” Minorities have abdicated their role, leaving the masses to rule civil society but without the vision or capacity to rule. Lacking a vital program or compelling moral code, European societies are demoralized and adrift.

Ortega is not simply retelling Spengler’s pessimistic version of Western decline. He takes the new prominence of the masses first as a sign that the general quality of human life has risen dramatically. The average man represents history’s field of action; “he is to history what the sea-level is to geography.” The advent of the masses represents a dramatic surge of human potentiality, an ambiguous success story, resulting from the previous century’s “noble experiment” at combining liberal democracy with what Ortega dubs “technicism”—itself the offspring of the marriage of industrial capitalism and science. Unfortunately, the masses, like spoiled children, have inherited the fruits of these experiments but not the heroic effort and inventive spirit required to produce and sustain them. The result is paradoxical: “the modern world is a civilized one; its inhabitant is not.” Mass man is “a primitive who has slipped through the wings onto the age-old stage of civilization.” His prototype, ironically, is the average man of science, widely regarded as the finest flower of European civilization. The increasing specialization mandated by scientific research has produced a new and paradoxical species, the “learned ignoramus”—a human type with myopic, fragmentary vision; a new “barbarian” whose complacency and narrowness are a betrayal of the scientific ideal of integrated knowledge.

But the greatest danger facing European civilization, Ortega writes prophetically, is that of state intervention. The contemporary state is, like science, one of the glories of European culture, whose very success has created the conditions for a possible reversion to barbarism. Failing to see the state as the delicate human artefact it is, created and sustained by political values and civic virtues whose preservation requires vigilance and effort, the masses instead view it as an anonymous instrument for the realization of their every whim. The grave danger in this tendency is “the absorption of all spontaneous social effort,” the crushing of creative minorities, and the “bureaucratization of existence” by the State. Means and ends are reversed: “the people are converted into fuel to feed the mere machinery which is the State. The skeleton devours the flesh around it. The scaffolding becomes the owner and tenant of the house.” Ortega’s prophecy has been amply fulfilled in this century, by totalitarian regimes of left and right. His study concludes on another prophetic note, envisioning a new vital project—the unification of Europe—which might avoid the dangers, and reap the potential, symbolized by the revolt of the masses.

This transitional period saw both the zenith and the nadir of Ortega’s involvement in Spanish politics. For a generation he had been at the forefront of liberal intellectual reformers, leading the call in 1930 for the replacement of Spain’s tottering parliamentary monarchy by a democratic Republic. After serving for a year as an elected representative to parliament at the beginning of the Second Republic (1931–32.), Ortega grew disillusioned with the polarized political situation, withdrew, and kept a pointed silence about Spanish politics from then on.

In Ortega’s evolving thought of this period, “historical reason” subsumed “vital reason” as he meditated on the historical dimension of human life. After reading Heidegger’s great work, Being and Time, Ortega reaffirmed (but never really fulfilled) his earlier commitment to presenting his work as a philosophical system. He occasionally reminded his readers that his own early works had anticipated many of Heidegger’s central ideas. Nelson Orringer (1979) has shown that in fact many of Ortega’s main aesthetic and philosophical concerns were heavily indebted to his early readings in German thought. Ortega’s influences, however, were always imaginatively transformed by his unique vision and idiom. For example, one of his root metaphors—life as shipwreck—is an ancient Greek one. Ortega does not invoke the pathos of shipwreck to suggest the absurdity or hopelessness of man’s fate. In “Pidiendo un Goethe desde dentro” (1932.; “In Search of Goethe from Within”) Ortega uses the metaphor to stress the human need for action and invention, for an urgent, vital project, in order to survive. “To be shipwrecked is not to drown.” He equates culture to the swimming motions which the drowning individual makes to save himself. “The consciousness of shipwreck, being the truth of life, is already salvation. This is why I no longer believe in any thoughts but those of the shipwrecked.”

During the third and final period, from the outbreak of the Civil War (and his decade-long self-exile) until his death, Ortega continued to publish and lecture, and to work on his announced major treatises on history, society, and philosophy—leaving them unfinished, to be published posthumously as El hombre y la gente (1957; Man and People), La idea de principio en Leibniz y la evolución de la teoría deductiva (1958; The Idea of Principle in Leibniz and the Evolution of Deductive Theory), and Sobre la razón histórica (1979; Historical Reason). In these rewarding works—which are for the most part distillations or elaborations of earlier themes rather than new departures—Ortega probes the growing sense of crisis in European thought, especially the erosion of faith in reason. One cause of the crisis is the failure of modern philosophy and science to give an adequate account of human nature. In Historical Reason, delivered originally as lectures in Buenos Aires (1940) and Lisbon (1944), Ortega explains this failure and announces a new mode of thought to remedy it. “Man has no nature; what he has is history; because history is the mode of being of the entity that is constitutionally, fundamentally, mobility and change.” Man, an “unknown” whose existence cannot be fixed or quantified, only interpreted, “will not be discovered in the laboratories. The hour of the historical sciences is at hand. Pure reason...must be replaced by narrative reason... This narrative reason is historical reason.” When Ortega left Spain in voluntary exile in 1936, he lost the immediate contact with the Spanish public on which the dynamism of his style and thought had depended. While leaving him freer to work on his long-promised systematic works, his relative isolation could only adversely affect the character and pace of his production.

Some critics have reproached Ortega for being “only” a great stylist, a creator of metaphors, instead of becoming the systematic philosopher he aspired to be. His principal virtues are admittedly synoptic and heuristic, not systematic; they are those of the discoverer and trailblazer, not those of the colonizer or city-builder. But the tension between his literary vocation and his philosophical aspirations needs no apology, for it is the source of his unique mode of essaying. His philosophy of “authentic life”—life as an ever-renewed process of selfinvention, of discovering one’s necessary task in the crucible of circumstances—is precisely what he practiced in his incandescent essays.

R.LANE KAUFFMANN

Biography

Born 9 May 1883 in Madrid. Studied at a Jesuit school in Miraflores, Málaga, 1891–97; University of Deusto, Bilbao, 1897–98; University of Madrid, 1898–1904, degree, 1902, Ph.D. in philosophy, 1904; Universities of Berlin, Leipzig, and Marburg, 1905–07. Professor of psychology, logic, and ethics, Escuela Superior del Magisterio, Madrid, 1908–10. Founder, Faro, Madrid, 1908. Married Rosa Spottorno Topete, 1910: three children. Professor of metaphysics, Central University of Madrid, 1910–29 (resigned in protest against the military dictator Miguel Primo de Rivera) and 1930–36. Elected to the Royal Spanish Academy of Moral and Political Sciences, 1914. Cofounder, League of Political Education, 1914. Founder, España review, 1915–23, and Revista de Occidente, 1923–36, and cofounder, El Sol (The sun), 1917. Founder, with Ramón Pérez de Ayala and Gregorio Marañón, Agrupación al Servicio de la República (Group at the Service of the Republic), 1931; deputy for the province of Leon, Constitutional Assembly, Second Spanish Republic, and Civil Governor of Madrid, 1931–32. Self-imposed exile in France, the Netherlands, Argentina, and Portugal, 1936–41; professor of philosophy, University of San Marcos, Lima, from 1941; returned to Spain, 1945. Founder, with Julián Marías, Institute of the Humanities, Madrid, 1948–50. Lectured frequently in Germany, Switzerland, and the United States, 1950–55. Awards: Gold Medal of City of Madrid; honorary degrees from two universities. Died in Madrid, 18 October 1955.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Meditaciones del Quijote, 1914; as Meditations on Quixote, translated by Evelyn Rugg and Diego Marín, 1961

Personas, obras, cosas, 1916; as Mocedades, 1973

El Espectador: Colección de ensayos filosóficos y literarios, 8 vols., 1916–34; in 1 vol., 1943

El tema de nuestro tiempo, 1923; as The Modern Theme, translated by James Cleugh, 1933

La deshumanización del arte: Ideas sobre la novela, 1925; as The Dehumanization of Art and Notes on the Novel, translated by Helene Weyl, 1948; in Velázquez, Goya and The Dehumanization of Art, edited by Christine Bernard, translated by Alexis Brown and others, 1972

Tríptico (on Mirabeau, Kant, and Goethe), 3 vols., 1927–33

Misión de la universidad, 1930; as Mission of the University, translated by Howard Lee Nostrand, 1944

La rebelión de las masas, 1930; The Revolt of the Masses, translated by J.R.Carey, 1932, and Anthony Kerrigan, 1986

La redención de las provincias y de la decencia nacional (articles), 1931

Goethe desde dentro, 1932

Ensimismamiento y alteración; Meditación de la técnica, 1939; first essay as “The Self and the Other,” translated by Willard R. Trask, in Partisan Review, 1952; second essay as “Man the Technician,” translated by W. Atkinson, in History as a System and Other Essays Toward a Philosophy of History, 1961

El libro de las misiones (includes Misión del bibliotecario; Misión de la universidad; Miseria y esplendor de la traducción), 1940; first essay as The Mission of the Librarian, translated by James Lewis and Ray Carpenter, 1961

Teoría de Andalucía y otros ensayos, 1942

History as a System and Other Essays, translated by Helene Weyl, 1946

En torno a Galileo, 1956; as Man and Crisis, translated by Mildred Adams, 1958

Meditación de la técnica, 1957

Ensayos escogidos, 1957

El hombre y la gente, 1957; as Man and People, translated by Willard R. Trask, 1957

Kant, Hegel, Dilthey, 1958

Meditación del pueblo joven, 1958

¿Qué es filosofía?, 1958; as What Is Philosophy?, translated by Mildred Adams, 1960

La idea de principio en Leibniz y la evolución de la teoría deductiva, 1958; as The Idea of Principle in Leibniz and the Evolution of Deductive Theory, translated by Mildred Adams, 1971

- History as a System and Other Essays Toward a Philosophy of History*, translated by W. Atkinson, 1961
- Misión del bibliotecario y otros ensayos afines*, 1962
- Unas lecciones de metafísica*, 1966; as Some Lessons in Metaphysics, translated by Mildred Adams, 1970
- The Dehumanization of Art, and Other Essays on Art, Culture and Literature*, 1968
- Velázquez, Goya and The Dehumanization of Art*, edited by Christine Bernard, translated by Alexis Brown and others, 1972
- Escritos políticos*, 3 vols., 1973
- Pasado y porvenir para el hombre actual* (selected speeches), 1974
- Sobre la razón histórica*, 1979; as Historical Reason, translated by Philip W. Silver, 1984
- Ensayos sobre la "Generación del 98" y otros escritores españoles contemporáneos*, 1981
- Meditación de la técnica, y otros ensayos sobre ciencia y filosofía*, 1982
- Misión de la universidad y otros ensayos sobre educación y pedagogía*, 1982
- Meditaciones sobre la literatura y el arte*, edited by E. Inman Fox, 1987
- Other writings: philosophical works.
- Collected works editions: Obras completas, 11 vols., 1946–69, and 12 vols., 1983.

Bibliographies

- Donoso, Anton, and Harold C. Raley, José Ortega y Gasset: A Bibliography of Secondary Sources, Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green State University, 1986
- Rukser, Udo, Bibliografía de Ortega: Estudios Orteguianos 3, Madrid: Revista de Occidente, 1971

Further Reading

- Cerezo Galán, Pedro, La voluntad de aventura: Aproximamiento crítico al pensamiento de Ortega y Gasset, Barcelona: Ariel, 1984
- Copleston, Frederick, "Ortega y Gasset and Philosophical Relativism," in his Philosophers and Philosophies, New York: Barnes and Noble, 1976
- Dust, Patrick H., editor, Ortega y Gasset and the Question of Modernity, Minneapolis: Prisma Institute, 1989
- Gaos, José, Sobre Ortega y Gasset y otros trabajos de historia de las ideas en España y la América española, Mexico City: Imprenta Universitaria, 1957
- Graham, John T., A Pragmatist Philosophy of Life in Ortega y Gasset, Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1994
- Gray, Rockwell, The Imperative of Modernity: An Intellectual Biography of José Ortega y Gasset, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1989
- Gray, Rockwell, "Ortega y el ensayo (I–II)," article published in two parts, El País, 8–9 June 1992
- McClintock, Robert, Man and His Circumstances: Ortega as Educator, New York: Teachers College Press, 1971
- Mariás, Julián, Ortega y Gasset: Circumstance and Vocation, Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1970

- Marichal, Juan, "La singularidad estilística de Ortega," in his Teoría e historia del ensayismo hispánico, Madrid: Alianza, 1984
- Mermall, Thomas, "Entre epísteme y doxa: El trasfondo retórico de la razón vital," Revista Hispánica Moderna 47 (1994)
- Morón Arroyo, Ciriaco, El sistema de Ortega y Gasset, Madrid: Alcalá, 1968
- Nicol, Eduardo, El problema de la filosofía hispánica, Madrid: Tecnos, 1961
- Orringer, Nelson, Ortega y sus fuentes germánicas, Madrid: Gredos, 1979
- Ouimette, Victor, José Ortega y Gasset, Boston: Twayne, 1982,
- Regalado García, Antonio, El laberinto de la razón: Ortega y Heidegger, Madrid: Alianza, 1990
- Rodríguez Huéscar, Antonio, José Ortega y Gasset's Metaphysical Innovation: A Critique and Overcoming of Idealism, Albany: State University of New York Press, 1995
- Rossi, Alejandro, and others, José Ortega y Gasset, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1984
- Senabre Sempere, Ricardo, Lengua y estilo de Ortega y Gasset, Salamanca: Universidad de Salamanca, 1964
- Silver, Philip W., Ortega as Phenomenologist: The Genesis of "Meditations on Quixote", New York: Columbia University Press, 1978

Orwell, George

British, 1903–1950

Although George Orwell is probably best known for the two novels he wrote late in his life, Animal Farm (1945) and Nineteen Eighty-Four (1949), his reputation as an essayist clearly ranks with the finest of the 20th century. His achievement is something of an anomaly given the artistic and cultural movements of the 1930s and 1940s when he produced the majority of his essays. At a time when the Modernists were struggling to produce a new aesthetic and traditionalists were reviving classical forms, a writer who willingly sacrificed the literary integrity of his work for political purposes must have seemed altogether beyond the pale.

In "Why I Write" (1946), a landmark essay on the writer's life, Orwell examines the motives behind literary production, including sheer egoism, aesthetic enthusiasm, historical impulse, and political purpose. To some degree, he finds these various impulses to be beyond the writer's control. His own natural inclination would have led him to write less polemical works, but the exigencies of his time—deprivation of human rights in the British Empire, massive unemployment among the working classes in England, the rise of fascism in Europe—made it impossible for him to retreat to the novel of manners or elegiac poetry. His experience in the Spanish Civil War was pivotal in driving him to sublimate his literary ambitions to political necessity. He was also transparent about the nature of his political motives: "Every line of serious work that I have written since 1936 has been written, directly or indirectly, against totalitarianism and for democratic Socialism."

However, Orwell did not think that political writing was necessarily devoid of artistic merit. In his own writing, he clearly distinguished rapidly produced newspaper articles and reviews from more significant essays that combined political purpose and aesthetic enthusiasm. Instead of identifying writers as essayists or journalists, Orwell's tendency is to connect the essay to the conditions of publication. He produced a steady stream of "potboilers" for most of his life which were written primarily for the money, including the radio scripts he produced for the BBC during World War II. Interspersed with these ephemeral creations were the carefully crafted essays written for important journals such as Adelphi, Horizon, and the Partisan Review.

Of course, writing that is motivated by political purpose can potentially undermine the aesthetic achievement of the text. In "Why I Write" Orwell recalls a conversation with one of his critics about Homage to Catalonia (1938), his book on the Spanish Civil War. The majority of the book describes Orwell's experiences as a foot soldier in a badly disorganized army. His depiction of the war has the qualities we associate with a great novel: vivid description, interesting characters, suspenseful action. However, the political purpose which motivated his writing was the need to alert the West to the betrayal of the ordinary soldiers and workers by their duplicitous leaders. For this reason, Orwell spends a chapter in the book describing the political in-fighting among the various Marxist factions in the war. Orwell's critics argued that this chapter should have been omitted in order to maintain the artistic integrity of the book. Orwell believed passionately that to delete this chapter would have undermined the whole purpose of the book.

Still, the aesthetic failure of Homage to Catalonia led Orwell to look for new ways to "fuse political purpose and artistic purpose into one whole." His search led him to examine the work of many canonical writers who were "political" to one degree or another. In "Charles Dickens" (1940), Orwell noted that although everyone is sure that Dickens is politically motivated, no one can be sure what his politics are. He is claimed by both Marxists and Christians, proletariat and bourgeoisie. He is assumed to be a reformer, but he is as cynical about reformers as he is about capitalists and landowners. In essence, Dickens' political philosophy can be summed up as behaving decently toward one another. In this essay Orwell clearly stipulates that "all art is propaganda," but he quickly adds "not all propaganda is art." One of the things that defines the great writer, he believes, is the ability to avoid the party line, to write honestly and independently. The eccentricity, and even inconsistency, of Dickens' work is a sign of his genius.

Orwell takes up this theme again in "Politics vs. Literature" (1946), his examination of Jonathan Swift's moral philosophy as expounded in Gulliver's Travels. Orwell was a great admirer of Swift's work, and no one can read Animal Farm without recognizing Orwell's indebtedness to Swift's satire. On the other hand, Swift's Tory politics were completely antithetical to an avowed socialist. Can such literature be "good" if it espouses a false world view? For Orwell the answer is clearly "yes." He argues first that what represents a false world view can only be understood within the political possibilities of a particular age. But beyond this, Orwell is willing to separate artistic achievement from political progressivism: "The views that a writer holds must be compatible with sanity, in the medical sense, and with the power of continuous thought: beyond that what we ask of him is talent, which is probably another name for conviction." It is worth noting that Orwell considers talent to be virtually synonymous with conviction. For him a writer need not possess the “correct” world view, but he must hold some view with conviction in order to succeed as an artist.

Perhaps even more problematic for Orwell as a writer was the nature of his own political convictions. He was well aware that most art was inherently elitist and aristocratic. Good books were produced by and for the upper classes. As a proponent of “democratic Socialism” what sort of “art” was possible for the serious writer? Orwell grappled with this dilemma in many of his major essays.

One consequence of his socialist position was a tendency to savage the cultural elite. Yeats is a fascist (“W.B.Yeats,” 1943); H.G.Wells is out of touch with reality (“Wells, Hitler and the World State,” 1941); Shaw writes “cracker-mottoes” (“Rudyard Kipling,” 1946); Salvador Dalí is decadent (“Benefit of Clergy,” 1946); even Gandhi comes in for some criticism (“Reflections on Gandhi,” 1949). On the other hand, he often defends the most unlikely heroes. He rehabilitates Kipling, who was, without doubt, a “jingo Imperialist,” but who spoke the language of the common people. In fact, Orwell identifies a whole genre of what he calls “good bad poetry.” In essence, this is poetry that gives pleasure to the masses; it is a “graceful monument to the obvious.” Even more remarkably, Orwell defends the German broadcasts of P.G.Wodehouse, which were considered treasonous by many British citizens. As someone who had dedicated his life against fascism, how could Orwell defend a German sympathizer during the war? Furthermore, how could he defend Wodehouse’s novels, which seemed tailor-made for Orwell’s socialist critique? At first, such a defense must seem pure perversity on Orwell’s part. More likely, however, is that Orwell sees in Wodehouse a harmless dupe, much less guilty of abetting the enemy than his accusers, many of whom had cheered the policy of appeasement in 1938.

Perhaps Orwell’s sympathy for Wodehouse sprang from his own sense of culpability as an officer in the Indian Imperial Police in Burma. Some of his best essays reflect upon his experience in Burma. One of his earliest essays, “A Hanging” (1931), is a chilling description of the death of a Burmese native and the inhumanity of his executioners. “Shooting an Elephant” (1936) displays Orwell’s self-loathing as a British officer who is trapped between his hatred of the Empire, which is clearly morally indefensible, and his hatred of the people, who take every opportunity to humiliate their oppressors. The irony of the essay is that he ultimately shoots the elephant, not because it represents a real threat, but “solely to avoid looking a fool.” The dilemma of those serving the Empire is also the theme of Orwell’s early novel, Burmese Days (1934).

Another theme running through many of Orwell’s essays is his sympathy for the lower classes. After returning from Burma, Orwell more or less deliberately plunged into a life of poverty. These experiences were recorded in Down and Out in Paris and London (1933). One of Orwell’s last essays is also drawn from his experience when taken ill in France. “How the Poor Die” (wr. 1946, pub. 1950) describes the degrading medical treatment given to the destitute in public hospitals. Even after Orwell resumed middle-class life, he often disguised himself as a tramp in order to understand the hardships of the lower class. His experiences are recorded in articles such as “The Spike” (1931) and “Common Lodging Houses” (1932). Some of them were included in his 1935 novel, A Clergyman’s Daughter. Ultimately, they led to his first popular success, The Road to Wigan Pier (1937), a description of unemployed laborers in the north of England.

One other recurring theme in Orwell's essays is his attachment to childhood. In his weekly articles for the Tribune, he sometimes returned to childhood pleasures, as in his "Thoughts on the Common Toad" (1946) and "A Good Word for the Vicar of Bray" (1946). He was also one of the earliest critics to consider the effect of popular children's literature on the formation of political principles. His review of "Boys' Weeklies" (1940), though erring in some factual details, argues that the stories contained in such papers are all tracts for conservative, if not fascist, points of view. It is perhaps fitting that his last major essay, "Such, Such Were the Joys" (wr. 1947, pub. 1953), treats the subject of his boarding school education. In this essay, many of Orwell's lifelong themes—contempt for authority, sympathy for the oppressed, and a love of simple pleasures—readily coalesce.

Orwell's principal contribution to the essay was his unification of political purpose and human sympathy into a genre that was largely divided between ideological diatribe on the one hand and sentimental recollection on the other. As a stylist, he contributed unforgettable passages of prose. No one who has watched Orwell's elephant die can soon forget it: "He neither stirred nor fell, but every line of his body had altered. He looked suddenly stricken, shrunken, immensely old, as though the frightful impact of the bullet had paralyzed him without knocking him down."

The early criticism of Orwell, coming in the political climate of the Cold War, was frequently devoted to illuminating Orwell's vision of the totalitarian state. Contemporary studies of Orwell have focused more on the effects of technology on human privacy and the connections between language and bureaucratic institutions of all kinds. His essay "Politics and the English Language" (1946) is considered foundational to understanding the influence of language on political decision-making. He argues forcefully that political chicanery not only debases language, but that bad habits of language undermine the political process. His view that language is not morally neutral—expounded both here and in the "Newspeak" addendum to Nineteen Eighty-Four—has had a profound impact on both the practice of the essay and the nature of political discourse in our times.

DAVID W. CHAPMAN

Biography

Born Eric Arthur Blair, 25 June 1903 in Motihari, Bengal. Moved with mother and sister to England, 1904. Studied at St. Cyprian's, Eastbourne, Sussex, 1911–16; Wellington School, Somerset, 1917; Eton College, Berkshire, 1917–21. Member of the Imperial Indian Police in Burma, 1921–27. Lived in London, 1927 and 1930–31, and Paris, 1928–29; teacher and bookshop clerk, 1929–36. Reviewer for the New English Weekly, 1935–36, Time and Tide, 1940–41, the Tribune, 1940–47 (literary editor, 1943–45), and Horizon, 1940–49. Married Eileen O'Shaughnessy, 1936 (died, 1945): one adopted son. Shopkeeper, Wallingford, Hertfordshire, 1936–40. Went to Spain as a journalist and served in the United Marxist Workers' Party militia in Catalonia, 1937: wounded in the neck. Served in the Home Guards, 1940–43. Columnist of "London Letter," Partisan Review, New York, 1941–46; coeditor, Searchlight Books series, Secker and Warburg publishers, London, 1941–42; talks producer in the Empire Department, BBC, London, 1941–43; contributor, the Observer, London, 1942–49 (war correspondent, 1945); columnist, Manchester Evening News, 1943–46. Lived on Jura, Hebrides Islands, Scotland, 1946–47. Married Sonia Mary Brownell, 1949. Died (of tuberculosis) in London, 21 January 1950.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Inside the Whale, and Other Essays, 1940

The Lion and the Unicorn: Socialism and the English Genius, 1941

Critical Essays, 1946; as Dickens, Dali and Others: Studies in Popular Culture, 1946

The English People, 1947

Shooting an Elephant, and Other Essays, 1950

England, Your England and Other Essays, 1953; as Such, Such Were the Joys, 1953

A Collection of Essays, 1954

The Orwell Reader: Fiction, Essays, and Reportage, edited by Richard H. Rovere, 1956

Selected Essays, 1957; as Inside the Whale and Other Essays, 1965

Collected Essays, 1961

Decline of English Murder and Other Essays, 1965

The Collected Essays, Journalism, and Letters, edited by Sonia Orwell and Ian Angus, 4 vols., 1968

The Penguin Essays of George Orwell, 1984

Other writings: six novels (Burmese Days, 1934; A Clergyman's Daughter, 1935; Keep the Aspidochelone Flying, 1936; Coming Up for Air, 1939; Animal Farm, 1945; Nineteen Eighty-Four, 1949) and three volumes of reportage (Down and Out in Paris and London, 1933; The Road to Wigan Pier, 1937; Homage to Catalonia, 1938).

Bibliographies

Hammond, J.R., "Select Bibliography," in his A George Orwell Companion, London: Macmillan, and New York: St. Martin's Press, 1982:266–74

Meyers, Jeffrey, and Valerie Meyers, George Orwell: An Annotated Bibliography of Criticism, New York: Garland, 1977

Further Reading

Aldritt, Keith, The Making of George Orwell: An Essay in Literary History, New York: St. Martin's Press, and London: Arnold, 1969

Atkins, John, George Orwell: A Literary Study, London: Calder, and New York: Ungar, 1971 (original edition, 1955)

Bal, Sant Singh, George Orwell: The Ethical Imagination, New Delhi: Arnold-Heinemann, and Atlantic Highlands, New Jersey: Humanities Press, 1981

Bolton, W.F., The Language of 1984: Orwell's English and Ours, Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, and Oxford: Blackwell, 1984

Gardner, Averil, "Orwell the Essayist," in her George Orwell, Boston: Twayne, 1987:80–

95

- Good, Graham, "George Orwell: Myth and Counter-myth," in his The Observing Self: Rediscovering the Essay, London and New York: Routledge, 1988:151–75
- Gross, Miriam, editor, The World of George Orwell, London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1971; New York: Simon and Schuster, 1972
- Hammond, J.R., "The Essays," in his A George Orwell Companion, London: Macmillan, and New York: St. Martin's Press, 1982:187–227
- Harris, Harold J., "Orwell's Essays and 1984," Twentieth Century Literature 4 (1959):154–61
- Kubal, David L., Outside the Whale: George Orwell's Art and Politics, Notre Dame, Indiana: University of Notre Dame Press, 1972
- Meyers, Jeffrey, A Reader's Guide to George Orwell, London: Thames and Hudson, 1975; Totowa, New Jersey: Littlefield Adams, 1977
- Meyers, Jeffrey, editor, George Orwell: The Critical Heritage, London and Boston: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1975
- Oldsey, Bernard, and Joseph Browne, editors, Critical Essays on George Orwell, Boston: Hall, 1986
- Patai, Daphne, The Orwell Mystique: A Study in Male Ideology, Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1984
- Rees, Richard, George Orwell: Fugitive from the Camp of Victory, London: Secker and Warburg, and Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1961
- Wemyss, Courtney T., and Alexej Ugrinsky, editors, George Orwell, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1987
- Williams, Raymond, Orwell, London: Collins, 1971; as George Orwell, New York: Viking, 1971
- Williams, Raymond, editor, George Orwell: A Collection of Critical Essays, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice Hall, 1974
- Woodcock, George, The Crystal Spirit: A Study of George Orwell, Boston: Little Brown, 1966; London: Cape, 1967
- Zwerdling, Alex, Orwell and the Left, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1974

Ouellette, Fernand

French Canadian, 1930–

Fernand Ouellette is that young man who, in the 1960s, without any technical knowledge of music, simply because he profoundly loved the works of Edgard Varèse, wrote to him, talked with him in New York, and wrote a biography that is still one of the mainstays of the Varèse bibliography (Edgard Varèse, 1966). This is how Ouellette has always worked, in all the literary genres he has practiced—poetry, novel, essay—with a kind of calculated temerity, forging ahead without any regard for the commonplace or the strictures of narrow professionalism. "Stuck between rapture and darkness," he wrote in his second book of essays, Journal dénoué (1974; Untied journal), "I have learned not to care about the fear of ridicule. I have accustomed my intelligence to make jumps, to take risks, like a tight-rope walker.” “How does he dare?” a Paris critic wrote in response. What he dared, in Journal dénoué, was to reveal how he managed to escape a traditional fear of life and love, while at the same time immensely enlarging his grasp of modern thought by reading such writers as Rainer Maria Rilke, Friedrich Hölderlin, T.S.Eliot, PierreJean Jouve, and Søren Kierkegaard. What he asked from the authors he read was not simply culture, but a kind of salvation.

Ouellette is a passionate writer, sometimes to the point of candor. In his essays he remains true to the poetic nature he revealed in Les Heures (1987; The hours), one of his most celebrated books of poems; yet his essays are not purely impressionistic. His book on the German poet Novalis, for instance, entitled Depuis Novalis (1973; Since Novalis), sprang from a course he taught with his friend André Belleau at the University of Quebec in Montreal. His numerous essays on painters, a subject that increasingly preoccupies him, bear the mark of serious documentation. Ouellette’s essays are all more or less autobiographical, sometimes directly, as in Journal dénoué, but more often, as the years go by, as part of a spiritual quest. It would not be excessive to say that the light he discovers (or rather pursues) in the paintings of Vermeer or Matisse is the same mystical light he talks about in his more explicitly religious essays.

Ouellette’s spiritual quest informs his consideration of the world in which he lives, the larger world with its tragedies of war, torture, hunger, and lack of freedom, as well as his own small world of Quebec, which concerns him deeply. His contributions to public debate, though not numerous, have been important. An ardent nationalist, he has written against bilingualism, arguing that it would lead to the victory of English over French in Quebec. When terrorism broke out in the 1960s, taking a number of innocent victims, he lashed out against all forms of violence. Those essays were published first in the magazine Liberté, of which he was one of the founders, and were reprinted in a book entitled, significantly, Écrire en notre temps (1979; Writing in our time). Poetry itself, a frequent subject in Ouellette’s essays, is deeply rooted in “our time.” Poetry is not a refuge from the issues of the contemporary world, nor should it necessarily be concerned with these issues. Poetry signifies hope and the survival of hope, giving humans, speaking beings, a possible future.

Ouellette’s voice is grave, noble, and earnest, and speaks about the essential themes of human thought: love, death, language, and God. His essays do not read like treatises. They are, as he has said, “flashes of lightning, fragments of a foreign time, desperate leaps out of form.” Ouellette has often used the word “fulgurance” (fulguration) to describe the inner movement of his poetry. The same term can be applied to his essays.

GILLES MARCOTTE

Biography

Born 24 September 1930 in Montreal. Studied at the Collège Séraphique, Ottawa, 1943–47; social sciences at the University of Montreal, licence, 1952. Book sales representative, 1953–60; scriptwriter for the National Film Board of Canada, 1955–59. Married Lisette Corbeil, 1955. Director for the radio network of Société Radio-Canada, 1960–91. Cofounder, Liberté, 1959, and of the International Quebecois Meeting of Writers, 1972. Awards: France-Quebec Prize, for biography, 1966; Governor-General's Award, for nonfiction (refused), 1970, for fiction, 1985, and for poetry, 1987; France-Canada Prize, for poetry, 1972.; Études Françaises Prize, for nonfiction, 1974; David Prize.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Les Actes retrouvés, 1970

Depuis Novalis: Errance et gloses, 1973

Journal dénoué, 1974

Écrire en notre temps, 1979

Ouvertures, 1988

Commencements, 1992

En forme de trajet, 1996

Other writings: three novels (Tu regardais intensément Genevieve, 1978; La Mort vive, 1980; Lucie ou un midi en novembre, 1985), poetry, and a biography of Edgard Varèse (1966).

Further Reading

Bilodeau, François, Action et errance: Les Essais de Fernand Ouellette, Montreal: McGill University, 1984

Mailhot, Laurent, "Récit-Essai: Le Journal dénoué de Fernand Ouellette," in his Ouvrir le livre, Montreal: L'Hexagone, 1992: 205–12 (article originally published, 1975)

Nepveu, Pierre, "Fernand Ouellette: La Lumière hors d'elle-même," in L'Essai et la prose d'idées au Québec, Montreal: Fides, 1985: 711–22

Ouyang Xiu

Chinese, 1007–1072

Known as one of the eight great prose stylists of the Tang and Song dynasties, Ouyang Xiu is remembered for both his output and his influence upon the course of literary history. More than any other single writer, Ouyang was responsible for developing a new expressiveness in expository prose, setting prose writing of the Northern Song era on a course markedly different from that of earlier periods.

Ouyang's voluminous literary production contains expository prose in a large number of distinct genres, including the letter, preface, record or inscription (ji), farewell, tomb inscription, colophon, "poetry talks," "calligraphy exercises," and the thesis or discourse (lun). Ouyang produced dozens of pieces in each of these forms. While the lun is the closest approximation of the Western "essay," any general consideration of Ouyang's achievement as an essayist must take his work in all of these forms into account. Whatever its origin or utilitarian purpose, Ouyang utilized each form to develop and express his thinking on diverse topics in the manner of the essayist.

Standard evaluations of Ouyang in literary histories identify him as the leader of an 11th-century stylistic revival known as the “ancient prose movement” (guwen yundong). A complex event in the intellectual history of the period, this “movement” had ethical and political dimensions that made it far more than merely a matter of aesthetic preference for one type of prose style over another. Ouyang and his supporters were dissatisfied with the vogue of parallel prose in their day, a style that required language to be cast in a series of paired statements exhibiting rigid grammatical parallelism between the two members and a diction that was heavily reliant upon recondite and elaborate tropes and literary allusion. While not denying that such a style had its place, “ancient prose” adherents decried the requirement that it be used by candidates for the civil service examinations (jinsi) and, by extension, throughout the written documentation produced in the huge imperial bureaucracy.

Parallel prose, or the “current style,” as it was called, was attacked as intellectually stultifying or, worse still, morally degenerate: it encouraged attention to scintillating ornamentation at the expense of stress upon the fundamental Confucian values which writing should serve. The “ancient style” alternative that Ouyang and others championed was supposedly a return to the nonparallel rhythms and “unadorned” diction of the Tang statesman Han Yu, which could itself be traced back to ancient classics such as Mencius and The Book of Rites. The defining moment of the movement came in 1057 when Ouyang was appointed to administer the highest examinations. He failed all those who wrote their answers in parallel prose and honored instead young men who showed their mastery in the ancient style. This event is credited with effecting a change in examination standards thereafter, and in seriously weakening, if not ending, the ascendancy of the “current style” for decades to come.

The controversy described here, while undoubtedly real, tends to be exaggerated in modern accounts, the rivalries too sharply drawn. What also tends to be distorted in standard literary histories is the huge gulf between the expository tone and style of Ouyang’s writing and that of his supposed model, the prose of Han Yu. As with most archaizing movements in Chinese aesthetics, while the slogan may have been “return to the past,” what in fact took place was the development of a new style. To be sure, Ouyang did write essays, such as his “Pengdang lun” (1044; “On Factions”) and “Ben lun” (1042; “On Fundamentals”), which project an image of him as a staunch Confucian moralist, much in the tradition of the conventional image of Han Yu. But as soon as one moves beyond these anthology pieces and begins to explore the full corpus of Ouyang’s prose works, a very different impression is formed.

Ouyang managed to cultivate a level of flexibility and informality in expository prose quite unlike what had been previously achieved. A reading of his compositions set against those of any of the great Tang masters, even Liu Zongyuan, will reveal a relaxation of the high seriousness of earlier centuries in Ouyang’s style. This key innovation was already recognized in Ouyang’s time by Su Xun, an important figure in his own right. Su Xun likened Han Yu’s writing to a mighty river which flows with a great surge and conceals terrifying water monsters in its depths, so that anyone who ventures to its banks and gazes into its murky depths shrinks back in fear. Ouyang's prose he likened instead to a meandering stream, twisting supplely this way and that, never hurried or belabored or intimidating.

Ouyang's fondness for injecting himself and his own feelings into his prose pieces is an important factor in his distinctive tone. In prefaces, studio records, and even grave inscriptions, Ouyang does not hesitate to speak personally and openly about his feelings for the person or object under consideration. The result is a tone in prose that verges on the lyrical, something that had never been accomplished on any sustained level by previous writers. Ouyang's most celebrated compositions, the autobiographical "Zuiweng ting ji" (1046; "The Old Drunkard's Pavilion") and "Liuyi jushi zhuan" (1070; "Biography of Recluse Six-Ones") exemplify this tone, albeit with a special playfulness. Although a detailed study has yet to be done, the particular features of Ouyang's diction and prose rhythm surely also contribute to his tone. Avoiding archaic language, Ouyang strove for a "plain and bland" (pingdan) style, as he did in poetry as well. Consequently, the language of his essays is unexpectedly close to that of Five Dynasties and Song period anecdotal writing (biji), which may have influenced Ouyang.

Among the compositions with the greatest literary merit one common trait stands out. Ouyang is adept at selecting a particular object or site (a rock, a studio, a zither, a painting) and writing about his relationship with the subject in a way that endows it with multiple layers of significance or meaning. This method is a departure from the simpler technique of prose parable, widespread in Tang writings, in which the symbolism of the subject eclipses all other meanings. Here too, an affinity may be detected between this richness of meaning in Ouyang's prose and what we normally expect to find in personal, lyric poetry.

Ouyang Xiu was the first of a number of Northern Song dynasty figures known for their multiplicity of interests and accomplishments in philosophy, classical studies, historiography, poetry, and literary prose. While his output in these other fields is certainly important, and particularly so in the two poetic forms (shi and ci), it is arguably as a prose stylist that he was most innovative and most influential. Su Shi, his protégé, became a greater poet, Sima Guang a more important historian, Zheng Yi a more seminal thinker, and Wang Anshi a more original and ambitious, if controversial, statesman. But no writer of the time matched the richness of Ouyang's collected prose or developed so distinctive a style.

RONALD EGAN

Biography

Born in 1007 in Mianzhou prefecture (now Mianyang, Sichuan). Moved to Suizhou as a boy. Studied privately; passed the qualifying exams for one of the imperial colleges in Kaifeng, 1028, and the jinshi (civil service) exams, 1030. Married, 1031 (wife died, 1033): one child; married Miss Yang (died, 1035). Prefectural judge, Luoyang, 1031–34; collator of texts, Imperial Library, Kaifeng, from 1034 and 1040–43. Exiled to Yiling for supporting Fan Zhongyan's criticism of the court, 1035. Married Miss Xue, 1037. Magistrate, Qiande, 1038–40; policy critic, then drafting official, from 1043; part of a group of liberals who promoted the Minor Reform, 1043. Exiled on a technicality, 1045, after charges of incest (for which he was acquitted three times) damaged his reputation; governor of Chuzhou, 1045–48, Yangzhou, 1048–49, and Yingzhou, 1049–52.; returned to Kaifeng, 1054; various government appointments, including to the Bureau of Academicians, from 1054; compiler of the official history of the Tang dynasty, from 1054; assistant chief minister, 1061–67. Accused of incest with his daughter-in-law, 1067: acquitted but again his reputation was damaged, and he requested a transfer; governor, Bozhou, 1067–68; retired from government service, 1071. Died in Yingzhou, Anwei province in 1072.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Ouyang Xiu sanwen xuan (Collected essays), edited by Chen Bixiang, 1990

Translations of essays in: Chinese Classical Prose: The Eight Masters of the T'ang-Sung Period, edited and translated by Shi Shun Liu, 1979:141–209; The Literary Works of Ou-yang Hsiu (1007–72) by Ronald Egan, 1984: Chapter 2 and the Appendix; Inscribed Landscapes: Travel Writing from Imperial China, translated by Richard E. Strassberg, 1994:162–67

Other writings: poetry, songs, and works on history.

Collected works editions: Ouyang Wenzhong gong ji, 1933; Ouyang Xui quan ji, 2 vols., 1961.

Further Reading

Egan, Ronald C., The Literary Works of Ou-yang Hsiu (1007–72), Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984

Liu, James J.Y., Ou-yang Hsiu: An Eleventh Century NeoConfucianist, Stanford, California: Stanford University Press, 1967 (original Chinese edition, 1963)

Locke, Marjorie A., The Early Life of Ou-yang Hsiu and His Relation to the Rise of the Ku-wen Movement of the Sung Dynasty (dissertation), London: University of London, 1951

Yan Jie, Ouyang Xiu nianpu, Nanjing: Nanjing chubanshe, 1989

Ozick, Cynthia

American, 1928–

Cynthia Ozick explores many forms in her several hundred essays, including the literary review, biographical sketch, editorial, travelogue, and autobiography. Several topics occur again and again in her essays, such as feminism, Henry James' literary influence, what it means to be a writer, of both nonfiction and fiction, and, most importantly for Ozick, what it means to be a Jewish writer in 20th-century America. Her nonfiction has been published in a wide variety of magazines and journals, from the New Yorker, Ms., and the New York Times Book Review to Judaism, Commentary, and the Partisan Review. Despite Ozick's being better known for her novels and short stories, critics increasingly analyze her collections of essays in their studies of her fiction. She continues to contribute frequently to periodicals, and clearly desires her essays to be accepted as separate entities from her fiction. In the preface, entitled "Forewarning," to Metaphor & Memory (1989), she writes that it is "plain foolishness" for readers to think that "the stories were 'illustrations' of the essays" or that "the essays expressed the ideational (or even at times the ideological) matrix of the stories."

Whether Ozick writes for a general or more specialized readership, she makes several consistent assumptions about her audience. For example, though many of her essays were originally composed as speeches, she assumes a kind of intellectual crossover, an attentiveness, between a hearing and a reading audience. Furthermore, her formal style reveals her belief that authorial expertise is neither divisive nor distancing, but rather expected by those who read nonfiction prose. Her tone is authoritative, didactic, at times even polemical, yet she assumes an openmindedness, a willingness to explore the unknown, in her audience. Her broad literary and historical knowledge, and especially her learned readings of the Torah and Pentateuch, act as a foundation for her readers and herself, and she teaches rather than declaims. Ozick seems to believe that both the writing and reading of an essay are parts of a journey, and she makes the journey along with her readers. She writes in the foreword to Art and Ardor (1983) that the "only nonfiction worth writing—at least for me—lacks the summarizing gift, is heir to nothing, and sets out with empty pockets from scratch."

Two of Ozick's best-known pieces on Judaism illustrate several characteristics of her approaches to the essay. In her preface to "Toward a New Yiddish" (1970) in Art and Ardor, Ozick states that "my own striving is to be one thing all the time, and to everyone; not to have one attitude or subject matter (or imagining or storytelling) for one kind of friend and another for another kind." Though the essay argues that "there are no major works of Jewish imaginative genius written in any Gentile language," Ozick's selection of the essay for Art and Ardor suggests that she assumes her Gentile as well as her Jewish readers will be open to her revolutionary ideas. Her purpose in the essay is to encourage Jews to develop a central liturgical language, by and for Jews, that will allow them to develop in the Diaspora a Jewish oeuvre. She responds to her own ideas in "Bialik's Hint" (1983), altering them slightly, to conclude that a new language is not what is necessary—what is needed for Jews to accomplish a new literature is to replicate the combination of the Hebraic and the Platonic that produced the Jewish holiness of study in a new assimilation of Hebrew and Enlightenment thought—"for Enlightenment ideas of skepticism, originality, individuality, and the assertiveness of the free imagination to leach into what we might call the Jewish language of restraint, sobriety, moral seriousness, collective conscience." Her shift in thought does not contradict her desire to be the same person to all people; rather, it expresses the kind of openness that marks the capacity of writer and reader to learn.

Even Ozick's more polemical style, reminiscent of Mary Wollstonecraft, in her feminist essays belies the conclusion that she writes for the converted. For example, in “Previsions of the Demise of the Dancing Dog” (1972.), Ozick argues that “the enlightenment has, for women, and especially by women, not yet occurred”; however, in “The Hole/Birth Catalogue” (1972.), written for Ms., she rails against the idea that anatomy is destiny; and in “Literature and the Politics of Sex: A Dissent,” written for the same magazine, she emphatically distances herself from the “new” feminism. In the latter essay, she objects to the term “woman writer,” believing that it further solidifies the intellectual disenfranchisement of women that classical feminism struggled to dissipate. Ozick might choose to modify her ideas over time; but she will not give an audience what it expects, and her voice is often tough, cheerless, and demanding.

In her essays on contemporary writers, such as Saul Bellow, John Cheever, and John Updike, Ozick’s tone recalls William Hazlitt’s—opinionated, cranky, educated, and above all, unapologetic. Her explorations of literary figures from the past, however, take the forms of introduction, recovery, or rediscovery, and in them her tone is affectionate, her didactic style easier and more forgiving of her audience’s unfamiliarity with her subject. In “What Henry James Knew” (1993), for example, one of her many essays on the most influential writer of her career, she explores the effect of James’ theatrical failure, Guy Domville (1894), upon his later novels, in which he “looked freely into the Medusan truth.” In “Sholem Aleichem’s Revolution” (1988), she historicizes Yiddish, and explains Aleichem’s revolutionary insistence that the language be taken seriously. In “More than Just a Victorian” (1995), she avers that late 20th-century readers reject Anthony Trollope because he understands them too well.

In “Metaphor and Memory” (1986), Ozick explicitly discusses the morality she believes should undergird any enterprise, including writing. Intellectual passion is the hallmark of Ozick’s esoteric essays, lyricism that of her rare personal reflections. When freed from the constraints of erudition, Ozick’s writing soars, and the “metaphorical concentration” she believes allows all “strangers to imagine the familiar hearts of strangers” emerges unbidden. In her eulogy to Bernard Malamud (1986), she writes that after a telephone conversation with him, she felt she “had been blessed, anointed, by an illumination of generosity fetched up out of the marrow of human continuity.” In her memoir, “Alfred Chester’s Wig” (1992.), Ozick characterizes the instructor at New York University who pits Chester and her against one another in Freshman Composition as a “sly, languid, and vainglorious Roman emperor presiding over the bloody goings on in the Colosseum of his classroom, with the little green buds of Washington Square Park just beginning to unfold below the college windows.” Finally, in her childhood recollection, “A Drugstore in Winter” (1982), Ozick recalls how one year Pelham Bay “froze so hard that whole families, mine among them, crossed back and forth to City Island, strangers saluting and calling out in the ecstasy of the bright trudge over such a sudden wilderness of ice.”

Joseph Epstein (1984) uses the adjectives “brilliant, quirky, profound, outrageous” to describe the pieces in Art and Ardor, while Sarah Blacher Cohen (1990) finds that some of the essays in Metaphor & Memory are the “illuminations” Ozick strives to achieve. Yet each of these writers views the essays through the lens of the fiction. Ozick’s ongoing and varied composition of essays elicits the hope that they will continue to be collected, and that they will some day be viewed by their own light.

SIOBHAN CRAFT BROWNSON

Biography

Born 17 April 1928 in New York City. Studied at New York University, B.A. (cum laude) in English, 1949 (Phi Beta Kappa); Ohio State University, Columbus, M.A., 1950. Married Bernard Hallote, 1952: one daughter. Taught at New York University, 1964–65, and Indiana University, Bloomington, 1972.; distinguished artist-in-residence, City College, New York, 1981–82; Phi Beta Kappa Orator, Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1985. Awards: many, including the Wallant Award, 1972.; B'nai B'rith Award, 1972; Jewish Book Council Epstein Award, 1972, 1977; American Academy of Arts and Letters Award, 1973; Hadassah Myrtle Wreath Award, 1974; Lamport Prize, 1980; honorary degrees from 11 universities and institutions.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Art and Ardor, 1983

Metaphor & Memory, 1989

What Henry James Knew, and Other Essays on Writers, 1993

Portrait of the Artist as a Bad Character, and Other Essays on Writing, 1996

Fame & Folly, 1996

A Cynthia Ozick Reader, edited by Elaine M.Kauvar, 1996

Other writings: three novels (Trust, 1966; The Cannibal Galaxy, 1983; The Messiah of Stockholm, 1987), short stories, poetry, and a play.

Bibliography

Currier, Susan, and Daniel J. Cahill, "A Bibliography of Writings by Cynthia Ozick," Texas Studies in Literature and Language (Summer 1983)

Further Reading

Cohen, Sarah Blacher, "The Fiction Writer as Essayist: Ozick's Metaphor & Memory," Judaism 39 (Summer 1990): 276–81

Epstein, Joseph, "Cynthia Ozick, Jewish Writer," Commentary 77 (March 1984):64–69

Pinsker, Sanford, "Jewish Tradition and the Individual Talent," in Cynthia Ozick, edited by Harold Bloom, New York: Chelsea House, 1986

Pollitt, Katha, "The Three Selves of Cynthia Ozick," in Cynthia Ozick, edited by Harold Bloom, New York: Chelsea House, 1986

Strandberg, Victor, Greek Mind/Jewish Soul: The Conflicted Art of Cynthia Ozick, Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1994

P

Paine, Thomas

British/American, 1737–1809

Thomas Paine was a pioneer in popular rhetoric, a form of discourse most familiar now in advertising, which he employed primarily in support of the natural rights of humankind, but he is best known for his association with the American and French Revolutions and for his rejection of conventional Christianity. Although this last position was common among his Enlightenment contemporaries, it was the ruin of Paine. He was a serious writer, never humorous, whose plainness and lack of pretense, were it not for allusions to contemporary issues, more closely resemble good political discourse of the 20th century than of his own, especially in his most famous work The Rights of Man (1791–92).

Paine was nearly 40 when he became an overnight sensation with his first published work, Common Sense (1776), a pamphlet which urged the American colonies to consider the rightness of separation from England. He spent the next two decades basking in the glow of various revolutionary fires, although he personally objected to violent overthrow and viewed revolution as ideally a “natural selection” in government. While in France, he nearly lost his life in a failed defense of Louis XVI on these grounds. Controversy followed him wherever he went, inviting a popular form of personal attack at the time; his biography is, unfortunately, a part of all readings of Paine. Political enemies funded the first Paine biography with money provided by an English MP after the publication of the first half of The Rights of Man. It suggests that he was cruel to his mother, killed his first wife, abandoned his second, drank excessively, and did not wash. Although cleverly written, it is neither history nor biography, and has colored all subsequent Paine scholarship. Controversy surrounding The Rights of Man culminated in a conviction on charges of treason for too nearly suggesting the overthrow of the English monarchy to some readers, although modern readers will have difficulty seeing it.

With the publication of the first part of his statement of personal belief, The Age of Reason (1794–95), Paine’s infamy was complete. He lost his popularity in America, the only country he claimed as his own, a final, deeply ironic failure as an essayist in a lifetime of spectacular success in that genre. Immediately after his death, a large body of unpublished work was probably destroyed by a former French revolutionary out of combined loyalty to Paine and to the Catholic Church, to which she had converted while caring for Paine in his old age. A fire destroyed the rest several years later. Near the end of the 19th century, the first editor of Paine's collected works ended his biography of Paine with a call for world government and religious tolerance in a style reminiscent of Paine's own, the first scholarly testament to the power Paine continues to wield with readers.

The basic elements of the Paine myth—the scurrilous biography, the late-life apostasy, the legions of loyal Paineites—have always overshadowed the essayist Paine. It goes without saying that any serious appreciation of the simple logic of his essays—all of it intended as public discourse and unrelated to the controversies which followed him to the grave—should absolutely exclude the “life” of Thomas Paine, especially since the private Paine is lost with the lost papers.

All that remains of the popular Paine are the opening lines of the first installment of what is now collectively referred to as The American Crisis (1776–83): “These are the times that try men’s souls...” With this essay, Paine invented an American identity and with it the possibility of an American nationalism necessary in times of war. These lines, written to rouse disheartened soldiers in General Washington’s army, have reappeared in wartime speeches of commanding generals ever since, although Paine’s personal political views were idealistic and pacifist, founded on the idea of the people’s right to establish or re-establish their own government based on present need rather than on either tradition or the fundamental notion of “might makes right.” His philosophy proved impractical, even to himself in the end when he failed to influence the French with his rhetoric of reconciliation, a realization which lent much of the bitterness to The Age of Reason.

At the height of his powers, Paine produced the immensely popular The Rights of Man in support of the French and in response to Edmund Burke’s Reflections on the Revolution in France (1790). Unlike the philosopher Burke, Paine approached the essay form as a populist means to current ends rather than as a literary form in the service of philosophy. Although he succeeded, according to relative sales of the two documents, he did not do justice to the subtleties of Burke’s argument. While Burke addressed a social and political elite with the power of England’s literary past behind him, Paine produced rhetoric that inflamed a broader readership, choosing what proved to be a superior moral high road.

Now that the argument no longer matters, Paine’s is clearly the superior rhetoric, although Burke is of course the superior philosopher, as Paine was neither systematic nor profound in his thinking. Without exception, his well-circulated works set off a storm of print reaction. Much of this reaction, both contemporary and in the large body of subsequent scholarship, suggests a linguistic counterpoint—an unmistakable mirroring of Paine’s style—resembling face-to-face argumentation (in which disputants tend toward the code of the strongest speaker), unlike the strictly rule-bound style of formal debate taught in the university system which had produced Burke. Olivia Smith suggests in The Politics of Language (1984) that the keen awareness of audience which characterized Paine’s prose is even more apparent in The Rights of Man than in his American writing because Paine studied Burke’s use of himself as a narrative device, noting his broadly drawn images as well as his frequent attention to his readers. Whether or not Paine was constructing himself in this document as the ideal opponent to Burke, only Paine knew, but his relationship to his audience is clear. He set up two audiences—on the one side his larger audience, to whom he speaks sometimes boldly, sometimes patiently, the rhetorician using his skill to inspire a range of emotions according to his will. On the other is Edmund Burke, whom he repeatedly challenges to respond to his response. The effect of the clearly distinct audiences is to strengthen the voice of Paine himself and to place the reading audience always in the position of taking up the dialectic in opposition to a common foe.

CLARA SPEER

Biography

Born 29 January 1737 in Thetford, Norfolk, England. Studied at grammar school until age 13. Apprentice to his father in the staymaker trade; privateer at sea, 1756; staymaker, London, 1756–57, Kent, 1758–60, and Norfolk, 1766. Married Mary Lambert, 1759 (died, 1760). Excise officer, Thetford, 1761, Lincolnshire, 1762–65 (dismissed), and Sussex, 1768–74 (dismissed for organizing a demand for a pay rise); usher, London, 1766–68. Married Elizabeth Ollive, 1771 (legally separated, 1774; died, 1808). Traveled to Philadelphia, 1774; editor, Pennsylvania Magazine, Philadelphia, 1775–76; contributor, Pennsylvania Journal. Secretary, Continental Congress committee to negotiate treaty with the Indians, 1777, and the committee on foreign affairs, 1777–79; clerk, Pennsylvania Assembly, 1779–81; secretary on a mission to France to raise money for George Washington's army, 1781. Lived in Bordentown, New Jersey, and on a farm near New Rochelle, New York, 1783–87; lived in England and France, from 1787. Tried in absentia for treason (over The Rights of Man) and outlawed from England, 1792. Made a French citizen by the French Assembly, 1792; member of the National Convention, for Pas de Calais, 1792, as part of Gironde group, which supported the banishment rather than death of Louis XVI; at the fall of the Girondists he was deprived of French citizenship and imprisoned, 1793–94; resumed seat in Convention, 1795, and lived in Paris until 1802. Returned to the U.S., 1802, and lived in New Jersey, New Rochelle, and New York City, 1802–09. Awards: honorary degree from the University of Pennsylvania. Died in New York City, 8 June 1809.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Common Sense, 1776; revised edition, 1776; edited by Isaac Kramnick, 1976

The American Crisis, 13 nos., 1776–83

The Rights of Man: Being an Answer to Mr. Burke's Attack on the French Revolution, 2 vols., 1791–92; edited by Henry Collins, 1969, Arthur Seldon, 1969, Eric Foner, 1985, and Gregory Claeys, 1992

The Age of Reason: Being an Investigation of True and Fabulous Theology, 2 vols., 1794–95

Selections from the Writing of Thomas Paine, edited by Carl Van Doren, 1922

Representative Selections, edited by Harry Hayden Clark, 1944

Common Sense and Other Political Writings, edited by Nelson F. Adkins, 1953

The Thomas Paine Reader, edited by Michael Foot and Isaac Kramnick, 1987

Political Writings, edited by Bruce Kuklick, 1989

Rights of Man, Common Sense, and Other Writings, edited by Mark Philp, 1995

Other writings: works on history and politics.

Collected works editions: Life and Works, edited by William M. Van der Weyde, 10 vols., 1925; Complete Writings, edited by Philip S.Foner, 2 vols., 1945; Collected Writings (Library of America Edition), 1995.

Bibliographies

Aldridge, A.O., "Thomas Paine: A Survey of Research and Criticism Since 1945," British Studies Monitor 5 (1974):3–29

The Thomas Paine Collection at Thetford: An Analytical Catalogue, Norwich: Norfolk County Library, 1979

Wilson, Jerome, "Thomas Paine in America: An Annotated Bibliography, 1900–1973," Bulletin of Bibliography 31 (1974): 133–51, 180

Further Reading

Aldridge, A.Owen, Man of Reason: The Life of Thomas Paine, Philadelphia: Lippincott, 1959; London: Cresset Press, 1960

Aldridge, A.Owen, Thomas Paine's American Ideology, Newark: University of Delaware Press, 1984

Butler, Marilyn, editor, Burke, Paine, Godwin and the Revolution Controversy, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1984

Conway, Moncure Daniel, The Life of Thomas Paine, New York: Putnam, 1892; London:
Watts, 1909

Dyck, Ian, editor, Citizen of the World: Essays on Paine, London: Helm, 1987; New York: St. Martin's Press, 1988

Fennessy, R.R., Burke, Paine, and the Rights of Man, The Hague: Nijhoff, 1963

Foner, Eric, Tom Paine and Revolutionary America, New York: Oxford University Press, 1976

Fruchtman, Jack, Jr., Thomas Paine: Apostle of Freedom, New York: Four Walls Eight Windows, 1994

Keane, John, Tom Paine: A Political Life, Boston: Little Brown, and London:
Bloomsbury, 1995

Philp, Mark, Thomas Paine, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1989

Powell, David, Tom Paine, The Greatest Exile, London: Croom Helm, 1985

Smith, Olivia, The Politics of Language, 1791–1819, Oxford: Clarendon Press, and New York: Oxford University Press, 1984

Wilson, Jerome D., and William F.Ricketson, Thomas Paine, Boston: Twayne, revised edition, 1989 (original edition, 1978)

Palmer, Nettie

Australian, 1885–1964

Nettie Palmer is one of the most important Australian writers who emerged between the 1920s and the 1940s, but where her contemporaries were novelists, dramatists, or poets, she worked almost exclusively within the essay form, the book review, and the journal. She was self-effacing and self-critical, considering that her writing was of minor importance compared with that of the “creative writer,” but it has stood the passage of time much better than that of many of her contemporaries. Her lively style went hand in hand with an exceptional critical shrewdness. While she was underrated in her time, her posthumous reputation has continued to grow.

Like her husband Vance Palmer, Nettie Palmer was concerned with breaking down entrenched colonial attitudes that refused to consider local writing on its own merits. She wanted to encourage an intellectual, critical approach to Australian writing and increase the writer’s sense of an audience. She wrote on a range of topics such as the Australian accent, suburbs, Australian English, surfing, Italian immigrants, and wooden houses. But she also wanted Australian writers to keep in touch with the great currents of world literature and not to become enclosed in the limited world of the merely local. University educated, Nettie Palmer spoke French and German, had studied Greek and Latin and later took up Spanish to study South American literature, seeing important analogies between the Australian and South American situations.

Her first extended publication (apart from two early volumes of verse) was Modern Australian Literature, 1900–1923 (1924), a milestone in the study of 20th-century Australian writing. Throughout the 1920s she contributed literary essays to major Australian newspapers and the weekly Bulletin, her main aim being to introduce women writers like Mary Gilmore and Katharine Susannah Prichard to as wide an audience as possible. In 1929 she began contributing a personal column to All About Books, but her most important essays appeared in the Illustrated Tasmanian Mail. In those articles there is a conscious but flexible and unstrained merging of overseas and local writers. She brought the same quality of attention to bear on the poetry of John Shaw Neilson as on Thomas Mann’s Der Zauberberg (1924; The Magic Mountain) or Osbert Sitwell’s England Reclaimed (1927). Most of the best-known English, American, and Australian writers of the time are mentioned in her columns. Within the limits of weekly and fortnightly literary journalism and working within the belletristic tradition of the 1920s (less deliberately politicized than her work in the late 1930s), she was able to produce much relevant criticism and alert, lively comment. She dealt with a wide range of authors, including Spenser, Goethe, Ibsen, Strindberg, Yeats, Hardy, Lawrence, Sigrid Undset, Proust, Joyce, Pound, and O’Neill. Most of this work remained uncollected during her lifetime though some of it appeared in slightly different form in her journal Fourteen Years (1948). Her opinions could be trenchantly independent. Writing of Aldous Huxley in April 1929 she judges Point Counter Point to be glittering journalism, claiming that Huxley is a writer of ingenuity rather than imagination, and that his skeptical materialism puts him on the side and in the service of the philistines.

For all her absorption in the European tradition, Nettie Palmer took every opportunity to discuss the work of Australian writers and their particular situation. She insisted that Australian culture was still at the stage where writers had to interpret and humanize the country and give the lie to D. H. Lawrence's statement that "Australia is a country with no word written across it yet." Palmer wanted to see a movement in Australian writing away from a prolonged colonialism to an independent and autonomous literary tradition. No one wrote more forcefully than she about the literary situation in Australia in her time: she pointed to the poor publishing conditions, the lack of weekly and monthly reviews which are indispensable to the growth and nourishment of a sound literary culture, the unavailability or inaccessibility of Australian books, the impossibility of a writer making a living purely as an author, the indifference to local work, the stifling censorship laws. She had a marked gift for focusing on the significant writers and issues of her time. In her best essays she did not merely serve Australian literature, she contributed to it.

Fourteen Years: Extracts from a Private Journal, 1925–1939 was originally published in an edition limited to 500 copies, a fact that reveals much about the condition of Australian literary production at the time. A collection of some of Palmer's best writing, it contains character studies and portraits of figures as different as Barbara Baynton, Christina Stead, Shaw Neilson, and Henry Handel Richardson, among many others; nature notes and observations of places ranging from Barcelona to Paris, London to Green Island and Melbourne. Miles Franklin compared Nettie Palmer with Mary Collum and Lady Gregory; A.D. Hope wrote of Fourteen Years that "it gave the impression, rare in Australian literature before the present day, of a really professional writer in the European sense." There is no other volume quite like it in Australian writing.

VIVIAN SMITH

Biography

Born Janet Gertrude Higgins, 18 August 1885 in Sandhurst (now Bendigo), Victoria. Studied at the University of Melbourne, 1905–09, B.A., 1909, M.A., 1912; traveled to Europe to study modern languages in Marburg, Berlin, and Paris, 1910–11, then returned to Australia. Returned to London, 1914. Married Vance Palmer (died, 1959), 1914: two daughters. Staying at Tregastel, Brittany when war was declared, 1914; returned to Australia, 1915. Literary journalist and essayist, 1920–35, contributing to various journals, including the Argus, All About Books, the Brisbane Courier, the Bulletin, the Illustrated Tasmanian Mail, and the Australian Woman's Mirror. Traveled to Europe again, 1935–36. Active in the Spanish Relief Committee during the Spanish Civil War. Died in Melbourne, 19 October 1964.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Modern Australian Literature, 1900–1923, 1924

Henry Bournes Higgins: A Memoir, 1931

Talking It Over, 1932

Fourteen Years: Extracts from a Private Journal, 1925–1939, 1948

Henry Handel Richardson: A Study, 1950

The Dandenongs, 1952

Bernard O’Dowd, with Victor Kennedy, 1954

Nettie Palmer: Her Private Journal Fourteen Years, Poems, Reviews and Literary

Essays, edited by Vivian Smith, 1988

Other writings: poetry and correspondence.

Bibliography

Smith, Vivian, “Nettie Palmer: A Checklist of Literary Journalism, 1918–1936,” Australian Literary Studies 6, no. 2 (October 1973): 190–96

Further Reading

Hope, A.D., “The Prose of Nettie Palmer,” Meanjin 18 (1959): 22–27

Hope, A.D., “End of an Age” (obituary article), Australian, 24 October 1964; reprinted in his Native Companions, Sydney: Angus and Robertson, 1974

Jordan, Deborah, “Towards a Biography of Nettie Palmer,” Hecate 6, no. 2 (1980): 6–72

Jordan, Deborah, “Nettie Palmer as Critic,” in Gender, Politics and Fiction, edited by Carole Ferrier, St. Lucia: University of Queensland Press, 1985

Jordan, Deborah, “Nettie Palmer: The Writer as Nationalist,” in Double Time: Women in Victoria—150 Years, edited by Marilyn Lake and Farley Kelly, Ringwood: Penguin, 1985

Modjeska, Drusilla, Exiles at Home: Australian Women Writers, 1925–1945, Sydney: Angus and Robertson, and London: Sirius, 1981

Serle, Geoffrey, The Creative Spirit in Australia: A Cultural History, Richmond, Victoria: Heinemann Australia, 1987

Smith, Vivian, “Vance and Nettie Palmer: The Literary Journalism,” Australian Literary Studies 6, no. 2 (October 1973)

Smith, Vivian, Vance and Nettie Palmer, Boston: Twayne, 1975

Stewart, Douglas, “Conversation Piece,” The Bulletin, 3 August 1949

Tipping, Marjorie, “Remembrance of Palmers Past,” Overland 100 (1985): 10–18

Palmer, Vance

Australian, 1885–1959

Vance Palmer was the leading man of letters of his generation in Australia as well as poet, novelist, dramatist, and short story writer, but his reputation as an essayist, literary journalist, social commentator, and key figure in the development of Australian culture in the first half of the 20th century has received less attention than it deserves. He tried to bring breadth, flexibility, and maturity to the Australian theme by never losing touch with what was happening in writing and thought abroad and by trying where possible to incorporate it into the Australian situation. He understood and affirmed the close relationship between a national literature and national experience. Palmer believed that it is the business of the artist to create interest in the life around him. “Art is really the interpretation of the inner life of his surroundings. There must be no seeing through English spectacles. Our art must be original as our fauna and flora are original” (Steele Rudd’s Magazine, 1905).

Palmer’s first important London recognition came through the journal New Age, where some of his early sketches were published. On his return to Australia Palmer was associated with the journal Fellowship in the pursuit of a national identity. In the March 1917 issue “A Note on Joseph Furphy” was a determined effort to promote a relaunch of Furphy’s 1903 novel Such Is Life. Palmer was convinced that the recognition of this novel was intimately related to the status of Australian culture as a whole and a large part of his writings as an essayist is devoted to establishing a canon of Australian writers. From his return from World War I until the late 1930s, and subsequently in his articles and reviews for the Australian Broadcasting Commission, his essays aimed at enhancing the quality of Australian cultural life. A quiet note of social criticism is rarely absent. Early essays draw on visits to France and Ireland; others respond to the situation of American writers like Sherwood Anderson and Ambrose Bierce, H.L. Mencken and Robert Nathan, later to Hemingway and Faulkner. Palmer noted points of comparison between the situation of writers in America and Australia, agreeing with his wife Nettie Palmer in 1930 that “Australia in literary matters, is probably where America stood a century ago.”

Some of his most interesting essays are those on the conditions of literary production in the Australia of his time. He objected to the way novelists had to address a public overseas; he complained that “There is practically no criticism of such literary work as is produced in Australia, and consequently no responsive public” (1923) and that “there is no critically informed and alert public in Australia” (1925). Palmer saw literature as a unifying force in society with a power to change life.

World War II precipitated a new national awareness and inspired Palmer to produce three books, tributes to figures of the past who had directly or indirectly influenced his life and the course of Australian culture. National Portraits (1940) is a series of essays devoted to those pioneers who had originated ideas and tapped springs that were later to enrich the public life. It celebrates those men of vision who fought against the intellectual timidity that went with “colonialism” in all its forms. Arranged chronologically, the essays as a whole present an outline of the country’s history, and illustrate one of Palmer’s major preoccupations: the need for Australia to become a home to the imagination.

By 1940 Palmer was coming to be considered the leading figure in Australian letters and more and more of the official tasks of warden of Australian culture fell to him. He was asked to assemble a commemorative volume in honor of A.G. Stephens, whose policy on the “Red Page” of the Bulletin and in the Bookfellow he had so admired—to “stimulate Australian writing, to assess its value, and to connect it with the main stream of European culture.” Frank Wilmot (1942) is a tribute to one of the most popular poets of his time. Palmer saw the Australian writer’s task as the transformation of the environment—“to water the dry soil of this country to give it richer life” and he valued Wilmot’s contribution to this end.

The Legend of the Nineties (1954) stands at the head of the numerous inquiries that have since been made into the Australian tradition and the formation of a distinctive national character. As a study of the aspiration toward a specifically Australian outlook and the emergence of a recognizable Australian identity, the book is more valuable for the questions it raises than for any answers it proposes. It remains an essential text of its time.

VIVIAN SMITH

Biography

Edward Vivian Palmer. Born 28 August 1885 in Bundaberg, Queensland. Youth spent in a succession of outback country towns. Studied at Ipswich Grammar School, Queensland, 1899–1901. Traveled to London for the first time, 1905, returning to Australia via Finland, Russia, and Japan, 1907. Tutor in Abbieglassie, near Mitchell, Queensland, 1909. Traveled to London again, 1910, returning to Australia via the United States and Mexico, 1912. Married Janet Gertrude Higgins (i.e. the writer Nettie Palmer), 1914: two daughters. Served in the Australian Imperial Forces, 1918. Associated with the Pioneer Players, Melbourne, 1922–13. Traveled to London and New York, 1931, and France, England, and Spain, 1936. Delegate to the World Peace Conference, Helsinki, 1955. Died in Melbourne, 15 July 1959.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

National Portraits, 1940; enlarged edition, 1954

A.G. Stephens: His Life and Work, 1941

Frank Wilmot, 1942.

Louis Esson and the Australian Theatre, 1948

The Legend of the Nineties, 1954

Intimate Portraits and Other Pieces, edited by H.P.Heseltine, 1969

Other writings: 16 novels, five volumes of short stories, plays, and poetry.

Further Reading

- Barnes, John, "The Man of Letters," Meanjin 18 (1959):193–205
- Barnes, John, editor, The Writer in Australia: A Collection of Literary Documents, 1856 to 1964, Melbourne: Oxford University Press, 1969
- Barnes, John, Introduction to An Australian Selection, Sydney: Angus and Robertson, 1974
- Heseltine, Harry P., Vance Palmer, St. Lucia: University of Queensland Press, 1970
- Indyk, Ivor, "Vance Palmer and the Social Function of Literature," Southerly (September 1990):346–58
- Smith, Vivian, Vance Palmer, Melbourne: Oxford University Press, 1971
- Smith, Vivian, Vance and Nettie Palmer, Boston: Twayne, 1975
- Walker, David, Dream and Disillusion: A Search for Australian Cultural Identity, Canberra: Australian National University Press, 1976

Paludan, Jacob

Danish, 1896–1975

Jacob Paludan had established himself as both a poet and a novelist before, relatively late in his career, he came to the essay. Qualified as a pharmacist, Paludan had an unusual background. He moved to Ecuador for two years after completing his training in Denmark. From there, via New York, he returned to Denmark. In his novels and indeed later in his critical work he is a conservative who voices skepticism about culture in the United States. Thus he stood in opposition to his Danish contemporaries Tom Kristensen and Johannes V. Jensen, who admired American technology and traveled several times to the U.S.

When asked what Paludan's major contribution has been, a student of Danish literature will answer the novel Jørgen Stein (1932–33). In this important work and other novels, Paludan is a social critic in much the same way as Henrik Pontoppidan, Nobel Prize winner in 1917, had been a critic of the social situation in Denmark. As an essayist, however, Paludan's attitude changed over time. To begin with, his essays reflected his somewhat rigid approach to and analysis of culture. Later, however, while remaining an essentially conservative thinker, Paludan became more flexible and less dogmatic, no longer making sweeping condemnations of American or Danish culture, but rather addressing himself to small details in Danish life and letters. It is at times startling to find the gentle essayist of the war and postwar eras to be the same writer as the abrasive critic of the 1920s and 1930s

Paludan's career as an essayist began with the volume Feodor Jansens jeramiader (1927; The jeremiads of Feodor Jansen). Paludan claimed he was the editor rather than the author of the volume; there was, however, no other candidate for the position of Jeremiah. Ten essays make up the jeremiads section; they read like traditional essays on subjects such as newspapers, friendship, the new youth, and poets. The last part of the volume is entitled “Jansen og det kvindelige” (Jansen and the feminine); here there are clear echoes of Paludan’s dislike of life in the United States. In particular, in evincing his skepticism concerning feminism, Paludan makes several disputable statements, declaring, for instance, that women attach themselves to people, and men to objects. Another of his odd observations is that young women do not need friends, and that friendship with men exists only once they are older. “What the young woman needs is admirers!” he claims. What Paludan must have thought of these ideas in later decades, when his essays were more charitable, benevolent, and good-natured, is a matter of conjecture.

In contrast to this first collection of essays, Paludan’s later essays turn to other subjects, often situations in the natural world, and his experiences and reflections. His essays in the 1960s are easier to read, more general in nature, but with little point. We read them in the same way we read his memoirs like Siden de spørger—og andre omkredsninger (1968; Since you are asking and other roundabout ways). The collection Mørkeblåt og sort (1965; Dark blue and black) to an extent sums up the author’s work with an abundance of aphorisms Paludan described as a rough mosaic.

Paludan’s work as a journalist gave him access to a large audience, permitting him to submit short articles and essays to periodicals, newspapers, and journals for several decades. While some of his essays may seem dated today, they are nevertheless the testimony of an eyewitness, of a thinking man, whose concern is his country and its future.

P.M.MITCHELL

Biography

Jacob Stig Henning Paludan. Born 7 February 1896 in Copenhagen. Trained as a pharmacist, qualified 1918. Traveled to Ecuador and the United States, 1920–21. Literary critic for various newspapers, after 1925, including Dagens Nyheder (Daily news), Politiken, and Århus Stiftstidende; editor, Hasselbalchs Kulturbibliotek, from 1940. Founding member, Danish Academy. Awards: several, including Holberg Medal, 1939; Danish Academy Prize, 1964. Died in Copenhagen, 26 September 1975.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Feodor Jansens jeramiader, 1927

Aaret rundt: Trykt og utrykt, 1929

Tanker og bagtanker, 1937

Som on intet var hændt, 1938

Smaa apropos'er, 1943

Søgende aander: Redegørelse og debatter, 1943

Facetter, 1947

Han gik ture, 1949

Skribenter på yderposter: Redegørelser og debatter, 1949

Retur til barndommen, 1951

Fremad til nutiden, 1953

Sagt i korthed, 1929–1954, 1954

Bøger, poeter og stilister, 1954

Littercert selskab, 1956

Glæde over Danmark, 1958

Røgringe, 1959

Landeveje og tankeveje: Udvalgte essays fra 30 aar, 3 vols., 1963

Mørkeblåt og sort, 1965

Skrivebord og stjernehimmel, 1972

Other writings: several novels (including De vestlige veje, 1922; Søgelys, 1923; En vinter lang, 1924; Fugle omkring fyret [Birds Around the Light], 1925; Markerne modnes, 1927; Jørgen Stein, 1932–33), a collection of poetry, and four volumes of memoirs.

Bibliography

Benthien, Børge, Jacob Paludan, en bibliografi, Copenhagen: Gyldendal, 1980

Further Reading

Danske digtere i det 20. aarhundrede, vol. 1, edited by Ernst Frandsen and Niels Kaas

Johansen, Copenhagen: Gyldendal, 1951:331–52

Frederiksen, Emil, “Der Essayist und Prosaverfasser Jacob Paludan,” Ausblick:

Zeitschrift für Deutsch-Scandinavische Beziehungen (1964):43–44

Frederiksen, Emil, Jacob Paludan, Copenhagen: Gyldendal, 1966

Hallar, Søren Christian, Jacob Paludan, Copenhagen: Hasselbalch, 1927

Heltberg, Niels, “Jacob Paludan,” American-Scandinavian Review 40, no. 2 (1952):142–45

Profiler: Jacob Paludan et al., Copenhagen: Andersen, 1944

Smith, Johannes, “En fornem pen-i dansk skrivekunst,” Perspektiv 3 (April 1956)

Pamphlet

According to George Orwell, a pamphlet is “a short piece of polemical writing, printed in the form of a booklet and aimed at a large public.” Orwell differentiates the pamphlet from similar productions of the press, “such as leaflets, manifestoes, memorials, religious tracts, circular letters, instructional manuals,” and so forth, by emphasizing its oppositionality: “in essence it is always a protest.” In many cases, however, neat distinctions such as Orwell’s are impossible to draw. Pamphlets are thus considered in this essay as writings printed and circulated so as to have an immediate political or social impact, and therefore to influence public opinion.

The English word “pamphlet” entered the vernacular in the 15th century: William Caxton, for example, refers to “many dyuerse paunflettis and bookys” (Oxford English Dictionary). Bibliographers, emphasizing form over function, tend to define pamphlets according to the number of pages they contain, the type of binding used, or other physical features. Before 1610 English printers often used black-letter (or Gothic) type for news pamphlets, a typeface generally reserved for ballads, proclamations, and other publications intended for a wide audience (D.C.Collins, 1943). Pamphlet writing rose in importance with the growth of the letterpress and later declined with the appearance of newspapers and magazines. Usually associated with the essay and the medium of nonfiction prose, the term “pamphlet” has nevertheless been applied historically to forms such as plays, poems, and romances. When James Boswell remarked to Samuel Johnson that “a pamphlet meant a prose piece,” Johnson retorted, “No, sir. A few sheets of poetry unbound are a pamphlet, as much as a few sheets of prose” (Boswell’s Life of Samuel Johnson, 1779). The pamphlet’s relation to specific forms of writing is complex and varies according to circumstance. A sense of the pressure of historical events and a spirit of relentless critique are almost always discernible in anything describable as a pamphlet.

Pamphleteering generally thrives in an atmosphere of controversy, in relatively open political cultures where a literate public creates a market for timely and inexpensive printed materials that address contemporary issues. The London bookseller George Thomason made a collection of materials on the English civil wars that included more than 20,000 items, many of them pamphlets. During the Fronde in France (1648–52) more than 5000 political pamphlets appeared (called mazarinades after their usual subject, Cardinal Mazarin), and had a measurable effect on public discourse. Pamphlets are not invariably a product of protest movements or popular consciousness. In his study of Dutch pamphlets in the 17th century, Craig Harline (1987) shows a political elite working to control pamphleteering and thus shape the climate of opinion. In 17th-century England the word “pamphlet” was sometimes used pejoratively to suggest invective or violent and irresponsible public discourse. A 1610 pamphlet, Martin Mark-All, Beadle of Bridewell denounced Thomas Dekker as “an upstart pamphlet maker and a most inuiurious and Satiricall Libeller,” and Dekker’s writings as “malitious and iniurious Pamphlets” (quoted in Sandra Clark’s The Elizabethan Pamphleteers, 1983). The French word pamphlet (lampoon, satire), introduced in the late 17th century, retains something of this association with aggressive rhetoric. As one might assume, one legacy of the French Revolution is a large body of pamphlet literature, now housed in the collections of the Bibliothèque Nationale and the British Library.

While most English pamphlets of the 17th and 18th centuries are rarely read today except by specialists, John Milton’s Areopagitica (1644), written to contest a parliamentary order forbidding the publication of unlicensed books and pamphlets, remains a canonical work. No less appreciated for its “literary” merits is Jonathan Swift’s A Modest Proposal for Preventing the Children of Poor People from Being a Burthen to Their Parents or the Country, and for Making Them Beneficial to the Publick (1729). This brilliantly ironic defense of cannibalism as a remedy for overpopulation, however, had a less immediate impact on contemporary events than Swift’s Drapier’s Letters (1724). The historical circumstances behind the Drapier’s Letters at first might seem parochial and unpromising—a struggle between the Irish Revenue Commissioners and the London government over the minting of copper coins in Ireland. Yet Swift's writing here was quietly devastating in its indictment of British policy: "Our neighbours, whose understandings are just upon a level with ours (which perhaps are none of the brightest) have a strong contempt for most nations, but especially for Ireland" (Letter 4). Another 18th-century movement for independence from colonial rule produced Thomas Paine's 1776 pamphlet Common Sense, the great success of which can be measured by its circulation (100,000 copies sold in three months). Paine's admirer William Cobbett veered from the radical views he advocated while in England (and to which he reverted upon his return) to a career in the United States that made him a fierce partisan of the British monarchy and a relentless critic of democracy, republicanism, and Paine. In a series of pamphlets written between 1794 and 1800 Cobbett infused his newly acquired Toryism with satirical indignation. These and other examples bear witness to the pamphlet writer's motivation as being a desire to intervene in public affairs, often in contentious times.

The pamphlet played a significant role in the development of modern political life, engaging public debate and challenging the practices of secrecy and censorship. Sharon Achinstein (1994) argues that 17th-century pamphleteers and polemicists in England contributed to the formation of a new type of political subject. Milton wrote both his poetry and his pamphlets in the context of a widely shared project to instruct the reading public in techniques of interpretation and textual resistance. Until mass media and advertising took its place, the pamphlet remained an important vehicle for shaping public opinion and expressing political dissent.

ALVIN SNIDER

See also Polemical Essay

Anthologies

British Pamphleteers (vol. 1: From The Sixteenth Century to the French Revolution; vol. 2: From the French Revolution to the Nineteen-Thirties), edited by George Orwell, London: Wingate, 2 vols., 1948–51

Political Pamphlets, edited by A.F. Pollard, London: Kegan Paul Trench Trubner, 1897

The Women's Sharp Revenge: Five Women's Pamphlets from the Renaissance, edited by Simon Shepherd, London: Fourth Estate, and New York: St. Martin's Press, 1985

Bibliographies

Catalogue of the Pamphlets, Books, Newspapers, and Manuscripts Relating to the Civil War, the Commonwealth, and Restoration, London: British Museum Department of Printed Books (Thomason Collection), 1908

Lindsay, Robert O., and John Neil, French Political Pamphlets, 1547–1648 (microfilm), New Haven, Connecticut: Research Publications, 1978; supplement, 1981

Further Reading

- Achinstein, Sharon, Milton and the Revolutionary Reader, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1994
- Adams, Thomas R., American Independence: The Growth of an Idea: A Bibliographical Study of the American Political Pamphlets Printed Between 1764 and 1776, Providence, Rhode Island: Brown University Press, 1965
- Ahrens, Rudiger, "The Political Pamphlet: 1660–1714: Pre- and Post-Revolutionary Aspects," Anglia 109, nos. 1–2 (1991): 21–43
- Balcque, Antoine de, "La Dénonciation publique dans la presse et le pamphlet (1789–1791)," Studies on Voltaire and the Eighteenth Century 287 (1991): 261–79
- Birn, Raymond, "The Pamphlet Press and the Estates General of 1789," Studies on Voltaire and the Eighteenth Century 287 (1991):56–59
- Clark, Sandra, The Elizabethan Pamphleteers: Popular Moralistic Pamphlets, 1580–1640, Rutherford, New Jersey: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1983
- Collins, D.C., A Handlist of News Pamphlets, 1590–1610, London: Southwest Essex Technical College, 1943
- Harline, Craig E., Pamphlets, Printing, and Political Culture in the Early Dutch Republic, Dordrecht: Nijhoff, 1987
- Sawyer, Jeffrey K., Printed Poison: Pamphlet Propaganda, Faction Politics, and the Public Sphere in Early Seventeenth-Century France, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1990
- Smithers, James R., "Propaganda and Theater: Authorial Intent and Audience Response to Political Pamphlets, 1550–1650," Cahiers du Dix-Septième 5, no. 2 (1991):179–94

Pardo Bazán, Emilia

Spanish, 1851–1921

Emilia Pardo Bazán was an extremely prolific writer, with almost two dozen novels and hundreds of short stories to her credit. Her writing career spans several literary periods, including realism, naturalism, and Spanish Modernism, and her work reflects the changing values and literary styles of late 19th- and early 20th-century Spain. In addition to her narrative production, she also cultivated biography and various forms of the essay, including literary criticism, travel literature, social commentary, and critique. The leading Spanish feminist of the 19th century and one of the most important women writers of all of Spanish literature, she is a polemical figure who enjoyed the limelight but also exhibited the anxiety that typifies many women writers of the period as they test the limits of traditional patriarchal society. In a Spain that lagged behind the rest of Europe in industrial and social modernization, Pardo Bazán's feminist writings and her active participation in international feminist congresses and campaigns created considerable opposition and required the elaboration of a complex public persona in order to counter public disapproval and condemnation. Her novels and essays display a dual rhythm of rebellion and submission, but under the guise of acquiescence there can usually be found a dissonant or ambiguous voice that allows for an alternative and more defiant reading.

Nineteenth-century writers as well as many contemporary critics classify Pardo Bazán as a conservative, Catholic writer and approach her essays from this perspective. Pardo Bazán clearly encouraged such a view at different times in her writing career, invoking her Catholic faith and traditional Spanish values as a shield against accusations of radicalism. However, her defense of free will, her repudiation of determinist philosophies, and her invocations of nationalist or class privilege also reflect a feminist impulse and a desire to liberate women from essentialist definitions and reformulations of female inferiority under the guise of Darwinism and biological determinism. This double-voicing begins as early as 1877 in her “Reflexiones científicas contra el darwinismo” (Scientific reflections against Darwinism) and continues in her later essays and her literary criticism.

Pardo Bazán’s much-cited La cuestión palpitante (The burning question), which originally appeared as a series of articles between 1881 and 1883 in La Época and then as a book in 1883, studies the naturalist movement initiated by Émile Zola in France and offers a moderate defense of the movement as it evolved in Spain. Critics have generally studied the ensuing polemic as an exclusively literary event; however, Pardo Bazán’s text represents much more than a cautious acceptance of literary naturalism and exerts an important influence on questions of art and literature as well as on broader issues of social and political transformation. The text exploits the discursive complexity of essay writing, inserting multiple and often contradictory voices and interweaving them in order to give expression to silenced or muted social and political issues that underpin the debate on literary naturalism. These include the fear of social and sexual revolution and the connections between these two 19th-century phenomena.

The presence of a female speaker in a national polemic in itself altered the terms of the debate and brought to the foreground issues of female access to public space, female sexuality, and radical social transformation, all of which had been avoided assiduously by writers in the period following the First Spanish Republic (1873–74). La cuestión palpitante provoked numerous responses among Spanish writers on the left and the right, as male writers struggled with their own and their readers’ fears of a breakdown of the established social and sexual order. In this and all of her essays, Pardo Bazán employs a number of strategies to deflect anticipated criticism and opposition to a female speaker. She makes abundant use of quotations drawn from male writers and canonical works to enhance her authority, adopts an epistolary or fictional form to minimize the effect of a single speaker, or attempts to efface her personality and sexuality through the use of scientific and historical discourse.

Many of Pardo Bazán’s better-known essays deal directly with topics of female emancipation, as in “La mujer española” (1907; The Spanish woman), “La educación del hombre y la de la mujer” (1892; The education of men and of women), “Del amor y la amistad” (1892; On love and friendship), and “La cuestión académica” (1891; The question of the Academy). In these texts the complex tension between the establishment of an authoritative textual voice and deference to the authority of the reader becomes even more acute as the female speaker, more or less disguised behind an impersonal narrator, attempts to move the primarily male reader to an acceptance of malefemale equality. Like all essayists, Pardo Bazán makes use of contemporary discourse but also seeks to channel it in new directions and reveal its inconsistencies. The essays that argue for women's rights invoke 19th-century liberal values and language with frequent allusions to human rights, to a belief in the individual capacity for improvement, and to the value of scientific discovery. However, they also seek to deconstruct these discourses and expose the irrational fears that undergird contemporary definitions of women. Through a continual interweaving of multiple and contradictory voices and discourses drawn from 19th-century Spanish and European culture and the introduction of a new female voice that interjects irony, mockery, exaggeration, and other dissonant perspectives, Pardo Bazán moves the late 19th-century Spanish essay toward a new and more modern form.

MARY LEE BRETZ

Biography

Born 16 September 1851 in La Coruña, Galicia. Self-educated. Married José Quiroga, 1868 (separated, 1885): two daughters and one son. Traveled to Paris, London, Italy, and Austria, 1871–72; moved to Madrid, 1886, where she frequented court and artistic circles and opened her own salon. Contributor to various periodicals, including La Ciencia Cristiana (The Christian science), 1876–81, La Revista Compostelana (The review of Compostela), 1876–77, La Época, from 1881, La Ilustración Artística (The artistic illustration), from 1886, El Imparcial, 1887–1920, España Moderna, 1889–90, Blanco y Negro (Black and white), 1895–1920, La Lectura, 1901–05, La Ilustración Española, from 1908, La Esfera (The sphere), from 1910, Los Contemporáneos, from 1914, Raza Española (The Spanish race), 1919–21, and ABC; founding editor, El Nuevo Teatro Crítico (The new critical theater), 1891–93. First female president, literary section of the Athenaeum, Madrid, 1906. Made countess, 1908. Advisor to the Ministry of Education, 1910. Professor of Romance literature, University of Madrid, 1916. Founder, Women's Library. Died in Madrid, 12 May 1921.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

La cuestión palpitante, 1883; edited by Carmen Bravo-Villasante, 1966, and José Manuel González Herrán, 1988

De mi tierra, 1888

Mi romería, 1888

Al pie de la Torre Eiffel, 1889

Los poetas épicos cristianos, 1894

Cuarenta días en la exposición, 1901

Por la Europa católica, 1902

De siglo a siglo, 1902

El lirismo en la poesía francesa (lectures), 1926

La mujer española y otros artículos feministas, edited by Leda Schiavo, 1976

Crónicas en "La Nación" de Buenos Aires (1909–1921), edited by Cyrus DeCoster, 1994

Other writings: 19 novels (including Los pazos de Ulloa [The House of Ulloa], 1886; La madre naturaleza, 1887; Una cristiana [A Christian Woman], 1890; La quimera, 1905; La sirena negra, 1908; Dulce dueño, 1911), short stories, plays, and works on literary criticism and history.

Collected works editions: Obras completas, 43 vols., 1891–1926, and edited by Federico Carlos Sainz de Robles, 3 vols., 1964.

Bibliographies

Clémessy, Nelly, Emilia Pardo Bazán como novelista, vol. 2, Madrid: Fundación Universitaria Española, 1982,:831–922

Scari, Robert M., Bibliografía descriptiva de estudios críticos sobre la obra de Emilio Pardo Bazán, Valencia: Albatros/Hispanófila, 1982

Further Reading

Bravo-Villasante, Carmen, Vida y obra de Emilia Pardo Bazán, Madrid: Revista de Occidente, 1962

Bretz, Mary Lee, Voices, Silences and Echoes: A Theory of the Essay and the Critical Reception of Naturalism in Spain, London: Tamesis, 1992

Clémessy, Nelly, Emilia Pardo Bazán como novelista, Madrid: Fundación Universitaria Española, 2, vols., 1982.

El Saffar, Ruth, "Emilia Pardo Bazán," in Spanish Women Writers: A Bio-Bibliographical Source Book, edited by Linda Gould Levine, Ellen Engelson Marson, and Gloria Feiman Waldman, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1993:378–88

Lissorgues, Yvan, editor, Realismo y naturalismo en España en la segunda mitad del siglo XIX, Barcelona: Anthropos, 1988

Pattison, Walter, El naturalismo español, Madrid: Gredos, 1969

Pattison, Walter, Emilia Pardo Bazán, New York: Twayne, 1971

Torre, Guillermo de, Del 98 al barroco, Madrid: Gredos, 1965

Partisan Review

American journal, 1934–

Partisan Review was founded by William Phillips and Philip Rahv in 1934. It entered the arena of American left-wing cultural and political controversies with a verve and energy that immediately distinguished it as a political and cultural voice in the struggles over who spoke for the new literary radical left. Impatient with and yet attracted to indigenous American liberalism, populism, and bohemianism, and restless with the views expressed in journals such as the proletarian New Masses, Partisan Review began as a literary adjunct to the communist John Reed Club, whose mandate was to recognize unknown writers and artists with proletarian leanings. Partisan Review immediately announced itself as the inheritor of proletarian impulses and the prophetic voice for the future of new literary values. Its audience would be those who should be affected by the class struggles and upheavals sweeping through industrial societies, and those who would challenge the uneven control of the bourgeoisie over cultural values.

However, the twists and turns of communist cultural policies around propaganda and realism, the Spanish Civil War, Stalinism and its cruelties, the precarious nature of Trotskyism, the rise of the American New Deal, and the necessity to interpret Modernist writers both to themselves and to the new generation caused the editors to reconsider their allegiance to the John Reed style of populism. Partisan Review suspended publication in 1936 and joined with Anvil as a monthly, Partisan and Anvil, beginning what would become the intellectual trademark of the magazine: to criticize leftist politics from the vanguard Modernist position of a literary and radical culturalism that would accommodate American circumstances.

In 1937 the journal suspended publication, severed any residual connection to the Communist Party, and refashioned itself almost immediately as an independent quarterly under the editorial guardianship of Phillips and Rahv, Fred Dupee, Dwight Macdonald, Mary McCarthy, and George L.K. Morris. Fearing conformist leftism, it identified itself in a 1937 Editorial Statement with a larger historical project that would place the “accent chiefly on culture and its broader social determinants.” While there were compelling political reasons for changing the journal’s outlook to one critical of Stalinism and the bureaucratic academicism of the organized left, besides the more urgent need to fight against fascism and philistinism in culture and politics, the Partisan Review’s concern was to speak in a truly American cultural idiom that would register the changes in American culture through literary values not usurped by ideology. This need to identify with American culture continued to plague the journal’s identity crises and editorial policies until the 1990s.

During and after World War II Partisan Review overcame its political alliances of the 1930s by developing a following among serious readers literate and hungry for avant-garde controversies and Modernist experiments. The rapidly fading dependency on realism and proletarian tendencies gave way to the new literary values of T.S.Eliot, André Gide, and William Faulkner, finally fulfilling the call to “independence in politics as well as art” (Editorial Statement, 1937). In retrospect it may be possible to overestimate the influence of Partisan Review on the sensibilities and self-image of the American cultural left; however, it is difficult to underestimate the journal’s sense of its own importance and influence. During the war the struggle over fascism, pacifism, and rapprochement with the reactionary Modernist politics of figures like Eliot or Ezra Pound brought its defense of the mystifying Modernist styles into stark political relief. Its readership during and after the war may have been 10,000, but its influence was certainly wider, causing Richard Hofstadter (1963) to declare that it was the “house organ of the American intellectual community.”

During the war the journal’s inner circle was broken when Dwight Macdonald’s pacifism clashed with the muted acceptance of the war by Phillips, Rahv, and the art critic Clement Greenberg. Typical of its frequent symposia is the wartime discussion, given the ambiguously traitorous sounding title, “The Failure of Nerve” (1943), in which religion, existentialism, and science become entangled with the issue of whether loyalty to the war effort can be defended. The wartime “London Letter” (1940), a column written by George Orwell, D.S.Savage, and others, forged a link to British intellectuals’ ideological agonizing over commitment to the war, and whether pacifism, anarchism, and anti-fascism were objectively pro-Hitler or self-serving.

It was only after the war that the journal began to take on the voice of the American “intellectual community,” that the accent of the “New York intellectual” became authoritative, if somewhat priggish. New York was a crossroads to Europe, to dissent, to immigrant cultures, to history, and to a barbed independence that gave its writers a style of mind and sense of publicity and purpose that defined its name and aura. Its phases since the war have mirrored the changes in the fortunes and tendencies of American left cultural politics.

In the 1950s the nervous loyalty to the crusade against fascism, the affluence of postwar reconstruction, and the unraveling of socialism forced Partisan Review to confront the “age of conformism.” The attempt to find and defend any positive value of American democracy was complicated by the ravages of McCarthyism and the barbaric nature of cold war communism and capitalism. The road of accommodation to the perceived demands of its audience can be marked by the flags of some of its symposia and exchanges: “The Situation of American Writing,” 1939; “Colloquium About Liberalism,” 1948; “Religion and Intellectuals,” 1950; “Our Country and Our Culture,” 1952; “This Age of Conformity,” 1954; “The Crisis in Communism,” 1957; “The Negro Writer in America,” 1958; “The Cold War and the West,” 1962; “What’s Happening to America,” 1967; “On the New Cultural Conservatism,” 1972; “Writers in Exile,” 1984; “The Politics of Political Correctness,” 1993. The journal’s rapprochement with American culture is clearly part of its history.

After the 1960s, the notorious critiques of kitsch and conformism that gave the journal a nuanced position against mass culture were turned into an often heavy-handed critique of the countercultural generation who formed part of the self-consciously democratic culture of late capitalism. Struggles for and against the student movement divided the editorial board and its writers. As Partisan Review’s audience aged and moved on from the necessary difficulties of Modernism against its enemy, indifference, massmindedness, and conformity, the journal’s engagement with a clearly defined audience grew problematic, and its responses to the new generation’s political preoccupations were quarrelsome and defensive.

Originally Partisan Review’s editors and writers were not part of university life. The formative intellectual personality can best be characterized by a tone of detachment from the academy, and its incorrigible, often gnarled defense of experimental Modernism and socialism gave its intellectuality a quality that distinguished it from other journals like the genteel Kenyon Review and Southern Review. It debated the American New Criticism, Russian formalism, surrealism, film, Modernism and the novel, psychoanalysis and culture, Sartrean existentialism, the self and society, and diverse theories of alienation. The journal published a range of independent intellectuals like C.Wright Mills, Paul Goodman, Harold Rosenberg, Hannah Arendt, Karl Jaspers, and Lionel Trilling, whose preoccupations were perhaps most typical of its intellectual style. It was an organ for the essays and prose of writers like Stephen Spender, James Baldwin, Edmund Wilson, Saul Bellow, Vladimir Nabokov, Norman Mailer, Philip Roth, Mary McCarthy, Diana Trilling, and Alfred Kazin. These writers defined Modernism as a total cultural condition, not simply a literary movement. Often its own contributors attacked the journal as if its parental voice were the center of the entire intellectual world (Leslie A. Fiedler, 1956; Norman Podhoretz, 1979).

As wide-ranging as the modern themes appeared to be, some questions seemed superficially addressed. Jews and the Holocaust, race and segregation, Jewish intellectual identity, and the fate of the labor movement were considered but not with adequate depth. Often Partisan Review was simply “keeping abreast” but losing ground to more culturally avantgarde positions (Harvey Teres, 1996). For Russell Jacoby (1987), however, the New York intellectuals were doomed to be “the last intellectuals,” who no longer had a public role after the 1950s.

In the 50th anniversary edition of Partisan Review (1984), the founding editor, William Phillips, mused that the New Left was “a complex of outworn Marxist notions, vaguely progressive ideas, trendy causes like environmentalism and various liberation movements, sympathy for something called the Third World, pacifism, anti-Americanism, an obsessive fear of nuclear power.” Struggling to keep Partisan Review from becoming a neoconservative journal, it spoke for a new calling—a new liberalism—which would “examine each issue on its own,” perhaps reflecting, in the name of social responsibility, the very fragmentation that the early passionate calling to Modernism wanted to understand and heal.

Today the original incentives toward a revolutionary critique of capitalism would appear distant, instead giving ground to a critique of how democratic values have declined. The powerful incentive for its readers is not to identify with its 1930s’ anti-capitalism or its postwar critique of the American system, but to remain closer to the mainstream of American intellectual life and to excavate some fragments of ethics from the tradition. In this Partisan Review is indistinguishable from other small journals. However, the proliferation of books on its history and significance by both its founding writers and the next generation who observe it from afar indicates that it retains its presence, not only as one of the longest lasting journals on the American scene, but as a cultural institution whose history reflects the American struggle for an intellectually respectable left identity.

JERALD ZASLOVE

Anthologies

The Partisan Reader: Ten Years of Partisan Review, 1934–1944, New York: Dial Press, 1946

The New Partisan Reader, 1945–1953, edited by William Phillips and Philip Rahv, New York: Harcourt Brace, 1953

The Partisan Review Anthology, edited by William Phillips and Philip Rahv, New York: Holt Rinehart and Winston, 1962,

Writers & Politics: A Partisan Review Reader, edited by Edith Kurzweil and William Phillips, Boston: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1983

- Partisan Review: The 50th Anniversary Edition*, edited by William Phillips, New York: Stein and Day, 1985
- A Partisan Century: Political Writings from Partisan Review*, edited by Edith Kurzweil, New York: Columbia University Press, 1996

Further Reading

- Bloom, Alexander, Prodigal Sons: The New York Intellectuals and Their World, New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1986
- Cooney, Terry A., The Rise of the New York Intellectuals: Partisan Review and Its Circle, Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1986
- Fiedler, Leslie A., An End to Innocence: Essays on Culture and Politics, New York: Stein and Day, 1972, (original edition, 1955)
- Fiedler, Leslie A., "Partisan Review: Phoenix or Dodo?" Perspectives USA 16 (Spring 1956)
- Gilbert, James Burkhart, Writers and Partisans: A History of Literary Radicalism in America, New York: Columbia University Press, 1992 (original edition, 1968)
- Greenberg, Clement, Art and Culture, Boston: Beacon Press, 1989 (original edition, 1961)
- Guilbaut, Serge, How New York Stole the Idea of Modern Art: Abstract Expressionism, Freedom, and the Cold War, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1983
- Hoffman, Frederick J., Charles Allen, and Carolyn F. Ulrich, The Little Magazine: A History and a Bibliography, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1946
- Hofstadter, Richard, Anti-Intellectualism in American Life, New York: Knopf, 1963; London: Cape, 1964
- Hook, Sidney, "The Radical Comedians: Inside Partisan Review," American Scholar (Winter 1984–85):45–61
- Howe, Irving, A Margin of Hope: An Intellectual Autobiography, San Diego: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1982.; London: Secker and Warburg, 1983
- Jacoby, Russell, The Last Intellectuals: American Culture in the Age of Academe, New York: Basic Books, 1987
- Kazin, Alfred, New York Jew, New York: Knopf, and London: Secker and Warburg, 1978
- Krupnick, Mark, Lionel Trilling and the Fate of Cultural Criticism, Evanston, Illinois: Northwestern University Press, 1986
- McCarthy, Mary, Intellectual Memoirs: New York, 1936–1938, New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1992
- Macdonald, Dwight, The Root Is Man: Two Essays in Politics, Alhambra, California: Cunningham Press, 1953
- Macdonald, Dwight, Against the American Grain, New York: Random House, 1962; London: Gollancz, 1963
- Phillips, William, A Partisan View: Five Decades of the Literary Life, New York: Stein and Day, 1983
- Podhoretz, Norman, Breaking Ranks: A Political Memoir, New York: Harper and Row, 1979; London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1980
- Rahv, Philip, The Myth and the Powerhouse, New York: Farrar Straus Giroux, 1965
- Rosenberg, Harold, Discovering the Present: Three Decades in Art, Culture, and Politics, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1973

- Teres, Harvey, Renewing the Left: Politics, Imagination, and the New York Intellectuals, New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1996
- Trilling, Lionel, The Opposing Self: Nine Essays in Criticism, New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1979; Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1980 (original edition, 1955)
- Trilling, Lionel, The Last Decade: Essays and Reviews, 1965–1975, edited by Diana Trilling, New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1979; Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1982
- Wald, Alan M., The New York Intellectuals: The Rise and Decline of the Anti-Stalinist Left from the 1930s to the 1980s, Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1987
- Wilford, Hugh, The New York Intellectuals: From Vanguard to Institution, Manchester: Manchester University Press, and New York: St. Martin's Press, 1995

Pascal, Blaise

French, 1623–1662

Although known primarily as a scientist, mathematician, and religious apologist, Blaise Pascal can also justly be seen as a major essayist. Much of his written output consists of polemical exchanges and discourses.

The work that distinguishes him above all as an essayist is the Lettres provinciales (The Provincial Letters). Appearing initially as a series of pamphlets between January 1656 and June 1657, the 18 letters were first published together, under the pseudonym of Louis de Montalte, in 1657. The reason for anonymity resulted from the highly flammable debate between two leading Catholic sects, the Jesuits (who had the support of the King, Louis XIV) and the Jansenists (whom Pascal was trying to defend).

The Jansenists (never officially accepted by the Catholic Church) were named after Cornelius Jansenius (1587–1638), a Flemish theologian and Bishop of Ypres, whose posthumously published Augustinus (1640) was an attempt to vindicate the teaching of St. Augustine against the doctrines of more recent Jesuit theologians. The Jansenists, situated initially at a convent near Paris, known as Port-Royal des Champs, and then also in Paris itself at Port-Royal, based their beliefs on the doctrine of original sin. They argued that, since the Fall in the Garden of Eden, all humankind has been corrupted by sin. Their objection to the Jesuits stemmed from what they saw as the over-reliance of the Jesuits on human free will, to the detriment of divine grace.

At the beginning of 1656, a defender of those at Port-Royal was badly needed. Antoine Arnauld, a leading theologian at Port-Royal, was about to be censured by the Sorbonne for taking a stand on five so-called heretical propositions which were allegedly to be found in Jansenius' Augustinus. However, with the risk of imprisonment which the Port-Royal sympathizers ran if they were discovered to be the authors of any attack on the Jesuits, it was difficult to find someone who could champion their cause. Pascal turned out to be the ideal person. At that time he was famous only for his mathematical and scientific gifts, and was not known for his links with Port-Royal; it was therefore easier for him to preserve his anonymity. Another great advantage was that, because he was not trained as a theologian, he could write with a freshness and immediacy that was appealing and understandable to a wider audience, not simply to those interested in the intricacies of the religious debate. It is this seeming spontaneity which has maintained the appeal of The Provincial Letters to this day.

The letters can be divided into two main groups: letters 1-10 and letters 11–18. In the first group, we find an interplay between a naive persona (often referred to as the Louis de Montalte figure) writing to his friend in the provinces, a Jansenist friend, and some Jesuit priests. By employing the interview technique (especially in letters 4–10), Pascal manages to make the Jesuits condemn themselves with their own words. He also achieves this by the highly selective quotation of various Jesuit writers. The comedy of the situation is heightened by the contrast between Pascal's portrayal of an irascible and buffoon-like Jesuit central figure and the quietly knowing and reasonable Jansenist friend. Much of the debate in the early letters surrounds the Jesuits' use of terms like "proximate power" and "sufficient grace," which, according to Pascal, enabled them to explain away their pursuit of morally reprehensible lives. Whereas the Jesuits believed that human beings had sufficient grace within them to be saved, Pascal followed the more rigorous idea of "efficacious grace," where God alone is seen as capable of bestowing grace upon human beings. Pascal had elaborated upon these ideas in his Écrits sur la grâce (wr. c. 1657–58; Writings on grace), in which he contrasts the "disciples of St. Augustine" (Jansenists) with the Calvinists and the Jesuits (or "Molinists," as he calls them, named after the Spanish Jesuit theologian, Molina).

In letters 11–18, all pretense of a real exchange between different personae is dropped. The speaker (now much more knowledgeable) engages in direct polemic with the Jesuits as a whole. In the final two letters (17–18), the attack is directed specifically at Père Annat, one of the leading Jesuits and the King's spiritual confessor. The reason for the shift in emphasis in letter 11 onward stemmed from the fact that the Jesuits themselves had launched a vigorous counterattack against the author of The Provincial Letters, and Pascal felt it necessary to respond more directly to accusations that he was making fun of religion by writing such satirical pamphlets.

Many other shorter works also mark Pascal as an essayist. In addition to a large number of scientific treatises, there exist several writings on religious or related topics. Even the preface to his treatise on the vacuum, written in 1651 (long before his definitive conversion in 1654), contains a discussion of religious issues. In it he compares the value of recent research, where the use of reason (as in scientific experiments) is paramount, with other forms of knowledge, where the importance of tradition or authority (as in theology) is stressed.

Between 1654 and 1656, Pascal wrote a number of significant short works. A document, known as the "Mémorial," which was found sewn into Pascal's clothing after his death, testifies to the conversion experience he underwent on the night of 23–24 November 1654. Another work that can be linked to the conversion, the "Entretien avec Monsieur de Saci" (wr. c. 1655; Conversation with Monsieur de Saci), contains an account by Nicolas Fontaine of the conversation Pascal had soon after his conversion with his spiritual director, Isaac Le Maistre de Saci, on the subject of the worldly writers Montaigne and Epictetus. Although first published only in 1728, the "Entretien" is generally accepted as authentic, and it is probable that Fontaine based his account on a written text (now lost) by Pascal. Another work, “De l’esprit géométrique” (wr. c. 1655; On the geometrical mind), concentrates on different kinds of reasoning and reveals the influence of Descartes (much of whose philosophy Pascal would refute in his later religious writings). There is an interesting subsection of “De l’esprit géométrique” entitled “De l’art de persuader” (On the art of persuasion), in which Pascal considers the importance of different persuasive methods, acknowledging moreover that rational methods are often less persuasive than those that appeal to the heart or will. He was to develop these ideas in his most celebrated work, the posthumously published Pensées (1670).

Because the Pensées remained uncompleted at Pascal’s death, it is uncertain what form the work would have taken. However, there is some evidence to suggest that Pascal would have juxtaposed different kinds of discourse, including fragmentary writings, maxims, letters, and dialogue. It is significant that Montaigne’s Essais (1580, 1588) were a major influence on the Pensées, as the disparate ordering of the former can be discerned to some extent in the latter. However, one of Pascal’s major purposes in writing the Pensées was to try and convince the non-believers and skeptics of his day, many of whom were admirers of Montaigne, of the necessity of religion, and Pascal deliberately attempts to distance himself from what he sees as the extreme egotism of Montaigne.

A number of longer passages in the Pensées constitute essays in their own right. The most notorious (and most widely interpreted) section is that known as the Wager, where Pascal uses various mathematical arguments to convince the reader of the necessity to bet in favor of the existence of God. One long passage on the “disproportion de l’homme” (disproportion of man) depicts man as caught between two extremes of infinity and nothingness. Another section chronicles the debate between pyrrhonists (or skeptics) and dogmatists (or rationalists). The conflict between these leading sects is used by Pascal to demonstrate the contradictions which abound in human philosophy, contradictions which he argues can only be resolved by a recognition of original sin. Pascal also discusses at length the dangers of “divertissement” (diversion), showing how the quest for entertainment distracts humans from reflecting upon their wretched state. The long fragments devoted to the three orders (material, intellectual, and spiritual) are typical of his methods in other extracts, where he speaks of a “renversement continuel du pour au contre” (constant swing from pro to contra). In the passages devoted to “raison des effets” (cause and effect), for example, he considers the different attitudes of a varied range of people to appearances, showing how different kinds of people come to the same conclusion but for different reasons.

Pascal writes at length in the Pensées on the “puissances trompeuses” (deceptive powers) which cloud man’s self-awareness and which can even create their own world, named by Pascal as “une seconde nature” (a second nature). Prominent among these are imagination, which has the strength to form its own ideal of such abstract notions as beauty, justice and happiness, self-love (amour-propre), which turns man away from love for God, and custom or habit, which plays a large part in determining social attitudes or choice of employment. Other long essay-like passages include those on the concupiscences (influenced by Augustine), human justice (largely influenced by Montaigne), and that known as “le mystère de Jésus” (the mystery of Jesus), where Pascal uses prosopopoeia to depict Christ as speaker in the fragment. Other essays in the Pensées, like those on miracles, might have been intended for separate publication.

Among Pascal's lesser-known writings, there are a number of essays, such as "Sur la conversion du pécheur" (wr. c. 1653; Upon the sinner's conversion), which charts the different stages a sinner might encounter on the path toward recognition of God, and "Trois discours sur la condition des grands" (wr. c. 1650; Three discourses on the condition of men of noble estate), in which Pascal advises a young nobleman on the implications of his rank.

Pascal's confrontational style has earned him many enemies as well as admirers over the centuries since his death. Significantly, Pascal himself has been the subject of essays by writers as diverse as Voltaire, Chateaubriand, Valéry, and T. S. Eliot.

NICHOLAS HAMMOND

See also Pensée

Biography

Born 19 June 1613 in Clermont-en-Auvergne (now ClermontFerrand). Moved with family to Paris, 1631, and to Rouen, 1640. Studied privately, tutored mostly by father. Scientist and mathematician; invented the "Pascaline," a machine performing mathematical calculations, 1642–52, and conducted experiments with the vacuum, 1646–48. Converted to Jansenism, 1646. Returned to Paris on father's second retirement, 1647; had second conversion, 23–24 November 1654, a mystical experience he described in the "Mémorial" document of faith, which was found sewn in his doublet on his death. Made occasional retreats to Jansenist community at Port-Royal des Champs, from 1655. Worked on a public transportation system for Paris, 1660–62. Died in Paris, 19 August 1662.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Lettres provindales (18 letters), January 1656-June 1657; in book form (as Louis de Montalte), 1657; edited by Louis Cognet, 1965, and Michel Le Guern, 1987; as The Provincial Letters, translated by William Andrews, 1744, Thomas M'Crie, 1847, and A.J.Krailsheimer, 1966

Pensées de M.Pascal sur la religion, et sur quelques autres sujets, edited by Étienne Périer, 1670, revised edition, 1684, Voltaire (Condorcet Edition), 1778, A.P.Faugère, 1844, Louis Lafuma, 2 vols., 1947, Georges Brunet, 1956, Louis Marin, 1969, and Philippe Sellier, 1976; as Discours sur la religion, et quelques autres sujets, edited by Emmanuel Martineau, 1992; selections edited by André Comte-Sponville, 1992; many translations, including by J.Walker, 1688, H.F.Stewart, 1950, John Warrington, 1960, J.M.Cohen, 1961, Martin Turnell, 1962, A. J.Krailsheimer, 1966, and Honor Levi, 1995

Great Shorter Works of Pascal, translated by E.Cailliet and John C.Blankenagel, 1948
Selections, edited by Richard H.Popkin, 1989

The Mind on Fire (selections; various translators), edited by James M.Houston, 1989
Selected Readings, edited by Robert Van De Weyer, 1991

Other writings: scientific works and a life of Jesus.

Collected works editions: Œuvres complètes, edited by Léon Brunschvicg, 14 vols., 1904–14; Œuvres complètes (Pléiade Edition), edited by Jacques Chevalier, 1954; Œuvres complètes (Intégrale Edition), edited by Louis Lafuma, 1963; Œuvres complètes, edited by Jean Mesnard, 4 vols., 1964–92. (in progress).

Bibliographies

Heller, Lane M., and Thérèse Goyet, Bibliographie Blaise Pascal (1960–1969), Clermont-Ferrand: Adosa, 1989

Maire, Albert, Bibliographie générale des œuvres de Blaise Pascal, Paris: Giraud-Badin, 5 vols., 1925–27

Further Reading

Croquette, Bernard, Pascal et Montaigne: Étude des réminiscences des Essais dans l'œuvre de Pascal, Geneva: Droz, 1974

Davidson, Hugh M., Blaise Pascal, Boston: Twayne, 1983

Hammond, Nicholas, Playing with Truth: Language and the Human Condition in Pascal's Pensées, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1994

Krailsheimer, A.J., Pascal, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1980

Mesnard, Jean, Les Pensées de Pascal, Paris: Société d'Édition d'Enseignement Supérieur, 1993 (original edition, 1976)

Norman, Buford, Portraits of Thought: Knowledge, Methods and Styles in Pascal, Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1988

Parish, Richard, Pascal's Lettres provinciales: A Study in Polemic, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1989

Rex, Walter E., Pascal's Provincial Letters: An Introduction, London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1977

Wetsel, David, Pascal and Disbelief: Catechesis and Conversion in the Pensées, Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America Press, 1994

Pater, Walter

British, 1839–1894

Most of Walter Pater's work appeared initially in leading Victorian periodicals such as the Westminster Review, the Fortnightly Review, Macmillan's Magazine, and similar publications. With the exception of his novel Marius the Epicurean (1885), the volumes that were published in Pater's lifetime, for example Studies in the History of the Renaissance (1873), or posthumously edited, for example Greek Studies (1895), were thematically related collections of periodical essays or similar pieces, such as introductions and lectures. Moreover, even Marius was an “ideological” or “critical” novel, resembling a group of essays tied together by an ancillary plot. Indeed, Pater’s second, incomplete novel, Gaston de Latour (1896), appeared serially as a historical romance in Macmillan’s, but its chapter on Giordano Bruno was printed initially in the Fortnightly as an essay. Pater felt that the essay, lying between lyric poetry and the didactic treatise, was the “characteristic literary type of our own time, a time so rich and various in special apprehensions of truth, so tentative and dubious in its sense of their ensemble, and issues,” as he says in Plato and Platonism (1893). For the famous Renaissance essayist Montaigne, the genre, says Pater, provided “precisely the literary form necessary to a mind for which truth itself is but a possibility, realisable not as general conclusion, but rather as the elusive effect of a particular personal experience.”

Pater produced studies not only of Montaigne, but also of such eminent English essayists as Sir Thomas Browne and Charles Lamb. Sainte-Beuve’s Portraits contemporains (1846; Contemporary portraits) probably supplied Pater with the “imaginary portraits” label for his fiction, though portraiture is the characteristic form of Pater’s nonfictional essays as well. Pater’s pen portraits of real or imaginary figures—literary writers, artists, mythological figures, and political rulers—depict the living personality behind cultural productions, epitomizing particular historical phases, philosophic schools, and works of art. In his portraits, the accent is on finely discriminated “sensations and ideas” (the subtitle of Marius)—that is, on perception and the fleeting impression rather than on action or dialogue. This critical or analytic turn of mind is associated with a Romantic or Wordsworthian sense that eye and ear subjectively half-create the world they perceive. Pater agreed with Flaubert and Stendhal that prose was greatly superior to poetry for inquiring into those elusive mouvements de cœur, nuances of a consciousness conscious of itself.

Despite successive stages of composition and revision that often seemed to involve a disproportionate effort for the results obtained, Pater’s texts contain a certain irreducible core of factual and grammatical error as well as rhetorical ambiguity. Perhaps his private emotional tensions resisted final formulation in the logic and rhythm-phrases of prose. Yet Pater’s essays do achieve a unique “imaginative sense of fact,” a “vision within,” as he defined his purpose in “Style” (1888); accordingly, they radically revise the Victorian positivist/utilitarian prose standards of mimetic objectivity and rhetorical persuasion.

The customary synopsis of Pater’s style as precious, overrefined, artificial, or exotic is perhaps more fantasy than fact. His two most famous “purple panels,” both in his first book, The Renaissance, are passages on the sinister Mona Lisa in “Leonardo da Vinci” (1869), in which he imagines Lady Lisa to be “older than the rocks among which she sits; like the vampire, she has been dead many times, and learned the secrets of the grave”; and on aesthetic experience in the volume’s Conclusion (1868), in which Pater advises young men to seek the quickening “passion” of art, “to burn always with this hard, gemlike flame.”

Many readers familiar with these early essays are not acquainted, for example, with his portrait of the historical memoirist and femme fatale, Margaret of Navarre, in a diptych of essays on poisonous love in his late work, Gaston de Latour. Oscar Wilde had sent Pater a copy of his play, Salomé (perhaps because Pater earlier had given Wilde a book by Flaubert that suggested the topic), and accordingly Pater began his portrait of Margaret on a “moon-lit street,” reminiscent of the sensuously charged moon in Wilde’s play. Wilde’s predatory princess and her trophy on a silver shield either echoes or is echoed in Margaret’s relic of a beheaded lover. Describing the pallor of the princess, “like white lilac or roses in winter,” Pater’s paradoxes catch something of her ambiguous beauty and the fate of Narcissus to which her beholders are driven: “there was almost oriental blue richness, blackness, in the king-fisher wings or waves of hair which over-shadowed ce beau visage blanc so abundantly, yet with lines so jealously observed along the proud, firm, smooth flesh, making you think, by its transparent shadows, of cool places around—yes! around dangerously deep water-pools, amid a great heat. Like such water, the black eyes surprised you by their clear dark blue, when in full sunlight for a moment, as the trees opened above.” Often in Pater’s prose, the larger unities of book, essay, paragraph, or sentence dissolve in qualifications, digressions, postponements, and delays as Pater works toward a final impression left vibrating in consciousness—here, Margaret’s dark blue eyes as perilous pools. This aggregate image through which all the other ideas rush anticipates what Ezra Pound in “Vorticism” (1914) called “a radiant node or cluster” that records “the precise instant when a thing outward and objective transforms itself, or darts into a thing inward and subjective.” In Pater’s essays, we have a mind watching itself in motion; hunting its aesthetic equivalent within hesitant, exquisitely adjusted prose; and aspiring to permanence in “a fragment of perfect expression.”

GERALD MONSMAN

Biography

Walter Horatio Pater. Born 4 August 1839 in London. Studied at King’s School, Canterbury, 1853–58; Queen’s College, Oxford, 1858–62., B.A. in classics, 1862. Tutor in Oxford, 1862–64; elected to the Old Mortality, an essay society in Oxford, 1863; Fellow, from 1864, and tutor, until 1883, Brasenose College, Oxford, M.A., 1865. Traveled to Italy for the first time, 1865, and lived in Rome, 1882, 1883. Contributor to various journals, from 1866, including the Westminster Review and the Fortnightly Review. Associated with the Pre-Raphaelites, particularly Swinburne, from 1869. Lived in London, 1885–93, and Oxford, 1893–94. Awards: honorary degree from the University of Glasgow, 1894. Died in Oxford (of rheumatic fever), 30 July 1894.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Studies in the History of the Renaissance, 1873; revised edition, as The Renaissance, 1877; revised editions, 1888, 1893; edited by Donald L.Hill, 1980, Adam Phillips, 1986, and William E.Buckler, in Three major Texts, 1986
Imaginary Portraits, 1887; edited by William E.Buckler, in Three Major Texts, 1986
Appreciations, with an Essay on Style, 1889; revised edition, 1890; edited by William E.Buckler, in Three Major Texts, 1986

Plato and Platonism: A Series of Lectures, 1893

Greek Studies: A Series of Essays, edited by Charles L. Shadwell, 1895

Miscellaneous Studies: A Series of Essays, edited by Charles L. Shadwell, 1895

Essays from The Guardian, 1896

Uncollected Essays, 1903

Sketches and Reviews, 1919

Selected Works, edited by Richard Aldington, 1948

Essays on Literature and Art, edited by Jennifer Uglow, 1973

Selected Writings, edited by Harold Bloom, 1974

Three Major Texts, edited by William E. Buckler, 1986

Other writings: two novels (Marius the Epicurean, 1885; Gaston de Latour [unfinished], 1896, revised edition edited by Gerald Monsman, 1995).

Collected works edition: Works, 10 vols., 1910.

Bibliographies

Court, Franklin E., Walter Pater: An Annotated Bibliography of Writings About Him, De Kalb: Northern Illinois University Press, 1980

Wright, Samuel, A Bibliography of the Writings of Walter Pater, New York: Garland, and Folkestone: Dawson, 1975

Further Reading

Block, Ed, "Walter Pater's 'Diaphaneite' and the Pattern of Reader Response in the Portrait Essay," Texas Studies in Literature and Language 25 (1983):427–47

Buckler, William E., Walter Pater: The Critic as Artist of Ideas, New York: New York University Press, 1987

Chandler, Edmund, "Pater on Style," Anglistica 20 (1958):1–100

Court, Franklin E., "Walter Pater's Impressionism: A 'New Line' in English Prose," in Der englische Essay: Analysen, edited by Horst Weber, Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1975: 263–74

Donoghue, Denis, Walter Pater: Lover of Strange Souls, New York: Knopf, 1995

Duffy, John J., "Walter Pater's Prose Style: An Essay in Theory and Analysis," Style 1 (1967):45–63

Fletcher, Ian, Walter Pater, London: Longman, revised edition, 1971 (original edition, 1959)

Fraser, G.S., "Walter Pater: His Theory of Style, His Style in Practice, His Influence," in The Art of Victorian Prose, edited by George Levine and William Madden, New York: Oxford University Press, 1968:201–23

Inman, Billie A., "Pater's Appeal to His Readers: A Study of Two of Pater's Prose Styles," Texas Studies in Literature and Language 14 (1973):643–66

Monsman, Gerald, "Walter Pater: Style and Text," South Atlantic Quarterly 71 (1972):106–23

Monsman, Gerald, Walter Pater, Boston: Twayne, 1977

Monsman, Gerald, "Introduction: On Reading Pater," in Walter Pater: An Imaginative Sense of Fact, edited by Philip Dodd, London: Cass, 1981:1–11; also in Prose Studies

4 (1981):1–11

Seiler, R.M., editor, Walter Pater: The Critical Heritage, London and Boston: Routledge, 1980

Zangwill, Israel, "Pater and Prose," in his Without Prejudice, London: Fisher Unwin, and New York: Century, 1896:207–19

Paz, Octavio

Mexican, 1914–

Octavio Paz is the author of many shorter and book-length essays of literary and multifaceted cultural analysis; these studies are often centered on Mexico, but are not limited to that country. For many years now the first publication in Spanish of his essays, whether collections of shorter pieces or books, has been quickly followed by translation into the principal European languages. Paz's most important current editorial position is as founder in 1976 of the monthly magazine Vuelta (Return), titled to mark his return to Mexico from voluntary exile following the 1968 government massacre of protesting students in the Tlatelolco district of Mexico City. In Vuelta, as contributor and editor, Paz publishes literary, artistic, political and historical essays by leading writers and intellectuals from all over the world.

The central theme of Paz's essays and, indeed, of much of his writing, is a dialectic between the fact of the individual's solitude and its need for suprapersonal reality. Paz views the individual as alone by virtue of the totally solitary manner of birth and death; all else is the Other. He seems to have come to this basic notion in the process of writing his first and perhaps most famous essay, El laberinto de la soledad (1950; The Labyrinth of Solitude). There he states: "The Mexican and his Mexicanism must be defined as separation and negation." This notion, with time, is not limited to the Mexican context; rather it becomes in Paz's view a hallmark of human life. Paz then points to how the Mexican reacts to his solitude: his life can also be defined "as a search, a desire to transcend this state of exile." As Paz's thought evolves, this search becomes another hallmark of human beings as they try to communicate, to form community, to make society and life a communion through understanding and love.

Given Paz's self-image as being primarily a poet, and only secondarily an intellectual who writes essays and scholarly studies, it may not be surprising that he sees poetry as one of the ways in which humankind may best transcend its solitude. In "La otra orilla" ("The Other Shore"), an essay contained in his 1956 book El arco y la lira (The Bow and the Lyre), Paz suggests succinctly how poetry may create such experience: "Poetic rhythm does not fail to offer analogies to mythical time; the image, to mystical utterance; participation, to magical alchemy and religious communion. Everything leads us to insert the poetic act into the realm of the sacred." He believes that poetry and religion "spring from the same source and that it is not possible to dissociate the poem from its pretension to change man without the risk of turning the poem into an inoffensive form of literature." Paz notes that the public festivals which are so much a part of Hispanic life on both sides of the Atlantic Ocean, and which have their roots in popular, pre-Christian religions, are also striving to overcome solitude and engage in communion.

As a theorist of cultural identity and difference, for example in both The Labyrinth of Solitude and the later Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz; o, Las trampas de la fe (1982.; Sor Juana, or, The Traps of Faith), Paz may be at his best when he compares and contrasts Hispanic and Anglo-Saxon culture in the Old and New Worlds. In addition to his explanation of the more positive role of public festivals in Hispanic culture than in Anglo-Saxon, Paz's analysis of the reasons for the traditional—not necessarily contemporary—Hispanic rejection of the scientific method based on criticism and reason is especially compelling. Most interesting is the way he links this issue to the different cultures' positions in the Reformation and Counter Reformation.

At the same time, Paz is keenly aware that an increasingly dominant theme in the Hispanic world is the acceptance of the cultural models of post-industrial societies. In Postdata (1970; The Other Mexico) and the 1975 interview "Vuelta a El laberinto de la soledad" (Return to The Labyrinth of Solitude), Paz reacts to such sociohistorical change in Mexico. Subsequently he discusses the conflicts created, for instance in the Miskito Indian homelands of Nicaragua or in the Mexican state of Chiapas, when pressure builds on underdeveloped Hispanic and third-world countries to reach the levels of material prosperity and political maturity which developed countries have achieved as part of their organic evolution.

While Paz takes very seriously the specific themes, issues, and problems treated in his essays, it may be argued that there is something more important to him than the content of any of his essays: the commitment to disinterested observation and thought guided by critical reason. For Paz human life and history are totally dynamic. He habitually approaches his subject by means of a historical study, and identifies the ongoing synthesis of new and old which is the history of the entity being considered. The fact of change and the need to understand its direction and consequences make the method of critical thought more important than any specific subject to be studied.

STEPHEN MILLER

Biography

Born 31 March 1914 in Mexico City. Studied at the National Autonomous University of Mexico, Mexico City, 1931–37. Stayed in Spain during Civil War, 1937 (on Republican side). Founder or editor of the literary journals Barandal (The railing), 1931, El Popular, late 19305, Taller (Studio), 1938–41, El Hijo Pródigo (The prodigal son), 1943–46, and Plural, 1971–75, later Vuelta, from 1976. Married Elena Garro, 1937 (later divorced); one daughter. Won Guggenheim Award to study and travel in the United States. Worked for the Mexican Embassy, Paris, 1946 and 1959–61, and Tokyo, 1951 and 1953–58; Mexican ambassador to India, 1961–68 (resigned). Married Marie José Tramini, 1964. Taught at various American and British universities, 1968–71. Awards: many, including the Jerusalem Prize, 1977; Critics' Prize (Spain), 1977; National Prize for Letters, 1977; Grand Aigle d'Or (Nice), 1979; Yoliztli Prize, 1980; Cervantes Prize, 1981; Heinse Medal (Germany), 1984; Gran Cruz de Alfonso X el Sabio, 1986; Ingersoll Foundation T.S.Eliot Award, 1987; Nobel Prize for Literature, 1990.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

- El laberinto de la soledad*, 1950; revised edition, 1959; edited by Enrico Mario Santí, 1993; as The Labyrinth of Solitude: Life and Thought in Mexico, translated by Lysander Kemp, 1961, enlarged edition, 1985
- El arco y la lira: El poema, la revelación poética, poesía e historia*, 1956; revised edition, 1967; as The Bow and the Lyre: The Poem, the Poetic Revelation, Poetry and History, translated by Ruth L.C.Simms, 1973
- Las peras del olmo*, 1957
- Cuadrivio*, 1965
- Los signos en rotación*, 1965
- Puertas al campo*, 1966
- Claude Lévi-Strauss; o, El nuevo festín de Esopo*, 1967; as Claude Lévi-Strauss: An Introduction, translated by J.S.and Maxine Bernstein, 1970
- Corriente alterna*, 1967; as Alternating Current, translated by Helen Lane, 1973
- Marcel Duchamp; o, El castillo de la pureza*, 1968; as Marcel Duchamp; or, The Castle of Purity, translated by Donald Gardner, 1970
- México: La última década*, 1969
- Conjunciones y disyunciones*, 1969; as Conjunctions and Disjunctions, translated by Helen Lane, 1974
- Postdata*, 1970; as The Other Mexico: Critique of the Pyramid, translated by Lysander Kemp, 1972,
- Traducción: Literatura y literalidad*, 1971
- Las cosas en su sitio: Sobre la literatura española del siglo XX*, with Juan Marichal, 1971
- Los signos en rotación y otros ensayos*, edited by Carlos Fuentes, 1971
- El signo y el garabato*, 1973
- Apariencia desnuda: La obra de Marcel Duchamp*, 1973; as Marcel Duchamp: Appearance Stripped Bare, translated by Rachel Phillips and Donald Gardner, 1978
- La búsqueda del comienzo: Escritos sobre el surrealismo*, 1974
- Los hijos del limo: Del romanticismo a la vanguardia*, 1974; as Children of the Mire: Modern Poetry from Romanticism to the Avant-Garde, translated by Rachel Phillips, 1974, revised, enlarged edition, 1991
- Teatro de signos/Transparencias*, edited by Julián Ríos, 1974
- The Siren and the Seashells and Other Essays on Poets and Poetry*, translated by Lysander Kemp and Margaret Sayers Peden, 1976
- Xavier Villaurrutia en persona y en obra*, 1978
- In/Mediaciones*, 1979
- México en la obra de Octavio Paz*, edited by Luis Mario Schneider, 1979; enlarged edition, 4 vols., 1987
- El ogro filantrópico: Historia y política, 1971–1978*, 1979; as The Philanthropic Ogre, translated by Lysander Kemp, Yara Milos, and Rachel Phillips, 1985
- Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz; o, Las trampas de la fe*, 1982.; as Sor Juana: Her Life and

- World*, and as Sor Juana, or, The Traps of Faith, translated by Margaret Sayers Peden, 1988
- Sombras de obras: Arte y literatura*, 1983
- Tiempo nublado*, 1983; as One Earth, Four or Five Worlds: Reflections on Contemporary History, translated by Helen Lane, 1985
- Hombres en su siglo y otros ensayos*, 1984; as On Poets and Others, translated by Michael Schmidt, 1986
- Convergences: Essays on Art and Literature*, translated by Helen Lane, 1987
- Primeras letras (1931–1943)*, edited by Enrico Mario Santí, 1988
- La otra voz*, 1990; as The Other Voice: Essays on Modern Poetry, translated by Helen Lane, 1991
- Essays on Mexican Art*, translated by Helen Lane, 1993
- Itinerario*, 1993
- The Double Flame: Essays on Love and Eroticism*, translated by Helen Lane, 1996
- Other writings: many collections of poetry, a play, and works on literature and culture.

Bibliographies

- Foster, David William, in Mexican Literature: A Bibliography of Secondary Sources, Metuchen, New Jersey: Scarecrow Press, 1992,
- Valencia, Juan O., and Edward Coughlin, Bibliografía selecta y crítica de Octavio Paz, Cincinnati: University of Cincinnati, 1973
- Verani, Hugo J., Octavio Paz: Bibliografía crítica, Mexico City: National Autonomous University of Mexico, 1983

Further Reading

- Antípodas* issue on Camilo José Cela, Gabriel García Márquez, and Paz, 4 (December 1991):171–250
- Gullón, Ricardo, “The Universalism of Octavio Paz,” Books Abroad (October 1972)
- Jiménez Cataño, Rafael, Octavio Paz: Poética del hombre, Pamplona: EUNSA, 1992
- Montoya Ramírez, Enrique, coordinator, Octavio Paz (week’s conference on Paz in Madrid, 9–12 May 1988, at the Instituto de Cooperación Iberoamericana), Madrid: Cultura Hispánica, 1989
- Ruy Sánchez, Alberto, Una introducción a Octavio Paz, Mexico City: Planeta, 1990
- Wilson, Jason, Octavio Paz: A Study of His Poetics, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1979
- Wilson, Jason, Octavio Paz, Boston: Twayne, 1986

Péguy, Charles

French, 1873–1914

Charles Péguy, a poet as well as an essayist and by turns an ardent socialist and Christian, was never less than an idealist. Of peasant stock from Orléans, although not so working-class as he pretended, Péguy won a series of scholarships and finally gained admission on his third attempt in 1894 to the exclusive École Normale Supérieure in Paris. His study was nicknamed “Utopia” by his fellow students and, influenced by the socialist leader Jean Jaurès, Péguy’s later essays were all to be devoted, if not exclusively to planning an ideal society, at least to denouncing the injustices and errors of that in which he lived. Péguy was not academically successful, failed his final agrégation, which would have given him a job for life, and experienced serious economic deprivation.

When Émile Zola published his celebrated newspaper article J'accuse on 13 January 1898, attacking the army’s cover-up by falsifying the evidence against the Jewish Alfred Dreyfus, who had been accused of betraying French military secrets to Germany, Péguy met with Zola and summoned other French socialists to support him. In 1898, he opened a commercially disastrous bookshop which became the Dreyfusard headquarters, and began his series of essays on the Dreyfus affair which were published in the Revue Blanche (White review).

While remaining a non-Marxist socialist, but after breaking with the socialist hierarchy who wished to control his activities, Péguy founded in 1900 the famous Cahiers de la Quinzaine (Fortnightly notebooks), a review which was itself to become a movement of political and moral reform, although never a financial success throughout its 15 series and 229 numbers. He boasted that, as a movement, the Cahiers were “a perfectly free association of people who all believe in something,” but subscriptions rarely rose above 1000. Péguy published a glittering list of political essayists, and the Cahiers remain an important source for materials not available elsewhere in their full texts. Publication ceased only with the outbreak of World War 1 in 1914.

Although his emphasis was to change as Péguy moved toward a Christian synthesis combining social justice, civilized values, and the anti-materialism of Henri Bergson, there is a sense in which he never strayed far from an initial series of preoccupations. His whole life was spent exploring ever more deeply—chiefly in his Cahiers essays—the major themes of education, history, the implications of the Dreyfus affair, French national pride, Bergson’s philosophy, and Christianity. The movement is from anti-rationalism and antipositivism, expressed in Péguy’s hostility to Hippolyte Taine and a host of prominent French academics who adopted Taine’s “method” and anti-clericalism, toward a growing patriotism and national pride. The mysterious, the religious, and the poetic seemed to Péguy to be beyond the reach of the idol erected in the name of science.

As the anti-clerical elements gathered strength within the French administration around the turn of the century, laicizing the educational system and exiling religious orders, even democracy—linking itself with declericalization and scientism—became suspect to Péguy. By 1908 he had moved closer to Catholicism—in company, it should be said, with a whole group of other important French writers, although at that date in France socialism was considered to be virtually incompatible with Catholicism on account of the materialism and the determinism associated with it.

By 1908 too, Péguy clearly foresaw the approaching European conflict. He was alarmed by the danger of mystiques and ideals being transformed into political stances and ideologies. Péguy never discontinued his essays, but more of his energy during the immediate prewar years went into his poetic production, investigating the Christian mysteries of suffering, sacrifice, and salvation, and defining as the best quality in French culture its developed sense of the heroic. His own death, leading his company at Villeroy in September 1914, was the result of taking a risk so perverse that it resembled the acting out of an heroic fantasy.

The attitudes to be found in Péguy's essays are based on an artisan background, a love of rural French life, with its deeply ingrained Catholicism, the poverty and ordinariness of his experience, and his undisciplined search for spiritual answers which made him vulnerable to idealistic mystiques. Stylistically, his essays are unpolished, often rambling, invariably overextended, and weakened by his tendency to pursue topics with only a tangential bearing to his main theme. His treatment of major themes may be much enriched in the process, but it is often difficult to follow, as Péguy rarely relates the side issues to the main themes with adequate explicitness.

He was nonetheless a great writer, made so by an originality deriving from the honesty, integrity, and idealism which refused to follow intellectual fashion, or to link attitudes which had no intrinsic connection. A stalwart Dreyfusard, he nevertheless believed in the mystic force of the nationalistic French tradition, an attitude normally associated with the military.

ANTHONY LEVI

Biography

Charles Pierre Péguy. Born 7 January 1873 in Orléans. Studied at the lycée in Orléans, 1885–91, baccalauréat, 1891; Lycée Lakanal, Sceaux, 1891–91; military service, 1891–93; Collège de Sainte-Barbe, Paris, 1893–94, licence in philosophy, 1894; École Normale Supérieure, Paris, 1894–95, 1896–97. Contributor to the Revue Socialiste, from 1896, and the Revue Blanche, 1899. Married Charlotte-Françoise Baudouin, 1897: three sons (one born after Péguy's death) and one daughter. Owner of a socialist bookshop in the Latin Quarter, 1898, turning it into a cooperative to avoid bankruptcy, 1899; founder and editor, Les Cahiers de la Quinzaine, 1900–14. Served in the army during World War I. Killed in the Battle of the Marne, near Villeroy, 5 September 1914.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Cahiers de la Quinzaine, 15 vols., 1900–14

Basic Verities: Prose and Poetry, translated by Ann and Julien Green, 1943

Men and Saints: Prose and Poetry, translated by Ann and Julien Green, 1947

Temporal and Eternal, translated by Alexander Dru, 1958

Œuvres en prose (Pléiade Edition), edited by Marcel Péguy, 2 vols., 1957–59

Œuvres en prose complètes (Pléiade Edition), edited by Robert Burac, 3 vols., 1987–92

Other writings: a play and a long poem about Joan of Arc, two mysteries (religious plays), and other poetry.

Collected works editions: Œuvres complètes, 20 vols., 1916–55; Œuvres complètes, edited by Jean Basteire, 10 vols., 1974.

Bibliography

Vergine, Pia, Studi su Péguy: Bibliografia critica ed analitica (1893–1978), Lecce: Milella, 1981

Further Reading

Basteire, Jean, Péguy l'inchretien, Paris: Desclée, 1991

Burac, Robert, Charles Péguy, la révolution et la grâce, Paris: Laffont, 1994

Charles Péguy et la Critique Littéraire, Australian Journal of French Studies 1 (1973)

Delaporte, Jean, Connaissance de Péguy, Paris: Plon, revised edition, 2 vols., 1959

Dru, Alexander, Péguy, London: Harvill Press, 1956; New York: Harper, 1957

Finkielkraut, Alain, Le Mécontemporain: Péguy, lecteur du monde moderne, Paris: Gallimard, 1991

Guyon, Bernard, Péguy, Paris: Hatier, 1960

Halévy, Daniel, Péguy and "Les Cahiers de la Quinzaine", London: Dobson, 1946; New York: Longman Green, 1947 (original French edition, 1919)

Jussem-Wilson, N., Charles Péguy, London: Bowes and Bowes, 1965

Laichter, František, Péguy et ses Cahiers de la Quinzaine, Paris: Maison des Sciences de l'Homme, 1985

Porché, François, Charles Péguy et ses Cahiers, Paris: Bloch, 1914

Rolland, Romain, Péguy, Paris: Albin Michel, 2 vols., 1944

St. Aubyn, F.C., Charles Péguy, Boston: Twayne, 1977

Schmitt, Hans A., Charles Péguy: The Decline of an Idealist, Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1967

Servais, Yvonne, Charles Péguy: The Pursuit of Salvation, Cork: Cork University Press, and Westminster, Maryland: Newman Press, 1953

Tardieu, Marc, Charles Péguy, biographie, Paris: Bourin, 1993

Villiers, Marjorie, Charles Péguy: A Study in Integrity, New York: Harper, 1965

Pensée

The use of the French word pensée (literally, thought) to designate a literary genre necessarily brings to mind the Pensées of Blaise Pascal, the only major work to have the term in its title. Pascal did not choose it himself, and was not responsible for the publication of the fragments posthumously collected, arranged, very heavily edited, and issued as the Pensées de M. Pascal sur la religion, et sur quelques autres sujets (1670; Thoughts of M. Pascal on religion, and on some other subjects). The word pensée, like portrait and maxime (maxim), then underwent a certain vogue during the decade following 1670.

In French, pensée also occurs as the title of a work of aphorisms composed by the Abbe Nicolas d'Ailly, tutor to Mme. de Longueville's children, and published in 1678 with the maximes of Madeleine de Souvre, as Maximes et pensées diverses (Maxims and diverse thoughts). D'Ailly's pensées were for the most part much shorter than the disjointed paragraphs which Pascal's family had stitched together. As a genre, therefore, the pensée blended with the aphorism, although, like maxime, it had a tendency to develop into a lengthier, more speculative elaboration of a simple idea. The equivalent English "thought" experienced a considerable popularity some decades later, appearing, for instance, in John Locke's Some Thoughts Concerning Education (1693) and the posthumous Some Thoughts on the Conduct of the Understanding in the Search for Truth (1762). His usage was followed by Mary Wollstonecraft in her Thoughts on the Education of Daughters (1787).

The only work known to posterity as pensées remains Pascal's mass of fragments, heterogeneous both in form and in content. It is, essentially, no more than notes relevant to the possible redaction of a book about a series of problems concerned with human nature and its weaknesses, Christian devotion, and theology. Some of the fragments are notes for a work of religious apologetic which we are told Pascal intended to write, though this may have been planned rather as some more general religious work about the human condition. It was clearly abandoned, and the notes were never meant for publication as fragments, nor given any title by Pascal.

After his death, Pascal's friends and family, led by his sister Gilberte, constructed a sequentially coherent work from some of the fragments more obviously conducive to devotion, containing sharp insights into the predicament of the human individual in the cosmos, with the individual seen as at once so important, because rational, yet also as physically insignificant. Pascal's family, however, had also carefully gathered together every discoverable scrap of paper on which he had written, and a copy of the fragments, now lost, was made exactly as he left them. This copy was at least twice recopied with meticulous exactness, and the two copies made from it still exist, as do the original fragments as pasted onto a large sheet of paper and partly arranged into files by Pascal himself. Many editions of the Pensées have appeared, most based on some conjectural structure which, it is speculated, Pascal would have adopted. More recent editions have, with increasing success, reproduced the fragments as Pascal actually left them in what is known as the second of the two copies made from the lost original, but which is certainly the earlier of the two.

It is no doubt unusual for a literary genre to have been constituted virtually in its entirety by a single work; but the contents of Pascal's fragments are so profound, disparate, and difficult, while displaying so many changes of intention and offering so many ambiguities of interpretation, that it has become inappropriate to use the term pensées to describe any lesser collection of aphorisms. Some of Pascal's fragments are movingly lyrical, some witty and ironic, some quite polished passages of cadenced prose extended over a page or two. Some are addressed to a reader, while some are merely notes on how a projected book might, at different moments, have been composed. The overwhelming probability is that Pascal at no time envisaged the publication of a work in aphoristic form. It is, on the contrary, plain that he was tempted both by the dialogue form and by an epistolary exchange. (The forms were brilliantly combined in PascaPs Lettres provinciales [1656–57; The Provincial Letters].)

It does, however, remain pertinent to draw attention to the meaning that the word pensée had acquired in the context of Descartes' Discours de la méthode (1637; Discourse on Method). Descartes memorably used the verb penser in the fourth part of the Discourse, when discussing how he could know that something existed from his awareness of his own existence—"Je pense, donc je suis" (I think, therefore I am)—going on to conclude that he knew himself to be a spiritual substance whose nature was simply to think. But he also used "pensée" in the first paragraph of the first part of the Discourse, when distinguishing between the power of judgment, the raison or bon sens equal in all human beings, and the esprit, the power of the application of thought, which distinguishes the brilliant from the less talented.

Although the Discourse was not widely disseminated, it showed that the pensée, as a form of spiritual power, was not universally equal among human beings, but could refer to a spiritual capacity of much wider significance. Pensées, for Descartes and for PascaPs editors, were not aphorisms so much as an indication of a totality of spiritual powers, which is what made it as apposite a title as any for the diversified collection of fragments Pascal's editors published. His contemporaries rightly saw the Pensees as containing some of the most penetrating comments on human nature and behavior known to their culture. They may have understood the fragments incorrectly, falsified and simplified their purpose, and incensed historians by the liberties they took with the text and its arrangement. But it is difficult to know what other word in the French language would more aptly have indicated the nature of its content.

ANTHONY LEVI

Further Reading

Hammond, Nicholas, Playing with Truth: Language and the Human Condition in Pascal's Pensées, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1994

Jaouen, Françoise, Discours aphoristique et pensée minimaliste: Le Classicisme en petits morceaux (dissertation), Berkeley: University of California, 1991

Mesnard, Jean, Les Pensées de Pascal, Paris: Société d'Édition d'Enseignement

Supérieur, 1993 (original edition, 1976)

Perelman, S.J.

American, 1904–1979

S.J.Perelman's prolific output of essays, plays, and film and screen credits attests to his extraordinary versatility as a writer who enjoyed the challenge of moving from one genre to another. Of all his works, however, his essays in the popular, sophisticated magazines of his day, including the New Yorker, Holiday, Life, and the Saturday Evening Post, gave him a wide and devoted audience of readers.

At age 13 he wrote an essay entitled "Grit" which won him first prize in a writing contest. Published in American Boy magazine, the essay extols the virtues of big-city taxi drivers. At Classical High School, his essay "Why I Am an Atheist" caused a stir because of its accomplished prose but the controversial topic deterred the judges from awarding him the Anthony Medal for first prize.

Entering Brown University in Providence, Perelman planned to pursue his artistry as a cartoonist, but could not resist sending in short humorous pieces to the Brown Daily Herald. He developed a column called the "Genial Cynic" and began signing his name S.J.P., the habit of using only his initials becoming his trademark. Eventually he wrote essays for the Brown literary magazine, Casements, and distinguished himself with "The Exquisite: A Divagation" (May 1924). From this experience he moved on to writing college humor essays, collected and published with Quentin Reynolds in Parlor, Bedlam, and Bath (1930). Then, in 1931, he began a lifelong association with the New Yorker.

Perelman's genius for satire and his facility with language appeared early, and his admirers in the Algonquin Circle, which included Dorothy Parker, Heywood Broun, and Robert Benchley, placed him at the center of New York's top magazine writers of the day. But his reputation did not stop there. F.Scott Fitzgerald wrote of Perelman's work that "Sid had an exquisite tact in prose." Such a comment would surely have pleased Perelman, who always thought of himself as a writer rather than a humorist.

Perelman's first important collection of essays, Strictly from Hunger (1937), contains 24 New Yorker essays, including a parody of Constance Garnett's translation of Dostoevskii entitled "A Farewell to Omsk." Robert Benchley's foreword reports that "Perelman took over the dementia praecox field and drove us all to writing articles on economics for the Commentator."

Perelman also wrote essays for the Saturday Evening Post, producing a popular column, "A Child's Garden of Curses, of the Bitter Tea of Mr. P." A new collection of essays for Random House, The Dream Department (1943), earned him the title "the funniest man in America." Another collection of 46 New Yorker essays appeared in Crazy like a Fox (1944), followed by Keep It Crisp (1946). This volume contains a parody of Raymond Chandler's popular detective novels, "Farewell, My Lovely Appetizer," and captured the critics' attention. No subject was sacred. Perelman even poked fun at Bennett Cerf, editor at Random House, with "No Dearth of Mirth—Fill Out the Coupon."

Time magazine (12 August 1940) reported that next to Edgar Allan Poe and “not excepting Henry Miller,” Perelman was “the most proficient surrealist in the United States.”

His commercial breakthrough came with the publication of Westward Ha! or, Around the World in Eighty Clichés (1948). The book sold 60,000 copies, twice any previous book’s sales, and featured work focusing on his new passion for travel and satirizing resorts of the rich and famous. Perelman began to emphasize travel satire as Holiday magazine sponsored his travels to Madagascar and Europe. Of his stay in London, he writes in “Call and I Follow, I Follow!” that “The clientele, picturesque without being intrusive, consists in the main of dehydrated colonials with saffron faces, bishops in gaiters, and elderly spinsters who still cling to ruching and avian headgear.” Every locale provided fodder for parody. Other essays feature adventures in St. Augustine, Hollywood, Las Vegas, and a dude ranch in Arizona. His travels netted him a tropical bird he named Cyrano, who became the subject of “Look, My Toucan” (1957), in which Perelman describes the bird’s raucous yelling and the effect on his Bucks County Farm neighbors.

Perelman’s Home Companion (1955) is a collection of earlier and out-of-print works, while The Road to Milton (1957) features a review by Dorothy Parker in which she notes that Perelman stands alone as a humorist. The Most of S.J. Perelman (1958) provides the most comprehensive collection of his humorous essays, 96 in all covering a period of 38 years. The Rising Gorge (1961) includes Perelman’s New Yorker trip to the East Coast of Africa and several travel essays written for Redbook. He continued his adventures in the Balkans, recounting them in Chicken Inspector no. 23 (1966) and Baby, It’s Cold Inside (1970).

Perelman, like his Algonquin contemporaries, was a “screwball wit,” with a delightful sense of the cliché and the ability to use mimicry as an art. His mastery of language gave him the power to create satires and parodies that cut to and revealed the human heart.

ADELAIDE P. AMORE

Biography

Sidney Joseph Perelman. Born 1 February 1904 in Brooklyn, New York. Studied at Brown University, Providence, Rhode Island, 1921–14, B.A., 1925. Contributor, Judge magazine, 1924–29, College Humor magazine, 1929–30, and the New Yorker, from 1931; also contributor to many other journals and magazines, including the Saturday Evening Post, Life, McCall’s, Redbook, Holiday, and Travel and Leisure. Married Laura West, 1929 (died, 1970): one son and one daughter. Wrote plays for Broadway and screenplays, including two for the Marx Brothers. Lived in London, 1970–72. Awards: New York Film Critics Award, 1956; Academy Award (Oscar), for screenplay, 1957; Writers Guild West Award, for screenplay, 1957; Special National Book Award, 1978; honorary degree from Brown University. Member, American Academy of Arts and Letters. Died in New York, 17 October 1979.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

- Dawn Ginsbergh's Revenge*, 1929
Parlor, Bedlam, and Bath, with Q.J.Reynolds, 1930
Strictly from Hunger, 1937
Look Who's Talking!, 1940
The Dream Department, 1943
Crazy like a Fox, 1944
Keep It Crisp, 1946
Acres and Pains, 1947
The Best of S.J.Perelman, 1947
Westward Ha! or, Around the World in Eighty Clichés, 1948
Listen to the Mocking Bird, 1949
The Swiss Family Perelman, 1950
The Ill-Tempered Clavichord, 1952
Perelman's Home Companion, 1955
The Road to Milton; or, Under the Spreading Atrophy, 1957; as Bite on the Bullet, 1957
The Most of S.J.Perelman, 1958
The Rising Gorge, 1961
Chicken Inspector no. 23, 1966
Baby, It's Cold Inside, 1970
Vinegar Puss, 1975
*Eastward Hal!*1977
The Last Laugh, 1981
That Old Gang o' Mine: The Early and Essential S.J.Perelman, edited by Richard Marschall, 1984

Other writings: several plays (including the musical One Touch of Venus, with Ogden Nash, 1943), screenplays (including Monkey Business, with Will.B.Johnstone, 1931; Horse Feathers, 193z; Around the World in Eighty Days, with James Poe and John Farrow, 1956), and correspondence.

Bibliographies

- Gale, Steven H., S.J.Perelman: An Annotated Bibliography, New York: Garland, 1985
 Toombs, Sarah, "S.J.Perelman: A Bibliography of Short Essays, 1932–1979," Studies in American Humor 3, no. 1 (Spring 1984): 83–97

Further Reading

- Fowler, Douglas, S.J.Perelman, Boston: Twayne, 1983
 Gale, Steven H., S.J.Perelman: A Critical Study, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1987
 Gale, Steven H., editor, S.J.Perelman: Critical Essays, New York: Garland, 1992

- Herrmann, Dorothy, S.J.Perelman: A Life, New York: Putnam, 1986; London: Simon and Schuster, 1988
- Pinsker, Sanford, "Perelman: A Portrait of the Artist as an Aging New Yorker Humorist," Studies in American Humor 3, no. 1 (Spring 1984):47–55
- Teicholz, Tom, Conversations with S.J.Perelman, Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1995

Pérez de Ayala, Ramón

Spanish, 1880–1962.

Although Ramón Pérez de Ayala is best known for his novels, the genre he practiced all his adult life was the essay. Most of his essays were short magazine articles which showed keen observation, immense knowledge, and individual, occasionally polemical, ideas. Ayala believed that Bacon, Montaigne, and Hume had cultivated the true essay, the kind published in the Spectator. The Spanish author took pleasure in that English title, which reflects the true spirit of the essayist: one who observes attentively in expectation. Ayala often chose lesser labels for these conversations with his readers—apostillas (marginal notes), divagaciones (musings), pequeños ensayos (little essays). Despite the brevity of these writings and Ayala's denigration of their importance, the reader always learns something from his entertaining chats, about literature, international or Spanish politics, travel, art, or war as seen from the trenches. His words are carefully chosen, often evincing his extensive knowledge of classical Latin and Greek. His style is personal, yet measured; erudite, yet seldom snobbish; entertaining while informing. One technique Ayala uses is an apparent wandering from the topic announced in the title, only to draw upon that "tangential information" as a key illustration of a difficult concept. In an article written soon after his arrival in Argentina, his desire to communicate with his audience is clear; he celebrates a large number of letters from readers, praising, questioning, and even suggesting topics for future essays. This, he said, was unheard of in Spain, where he received few letters, and those few were injurious or insulting.

Pérez de Ayala published in at least 16 leading magazines in Spain and Latin America, among them the pro-Republican España, Nuevo Mundo (New world), El Imparcial, La Tribuna, and Argentina's La Prensa (The press). Ayala was a war correspondent for the last during World War I; those essays comprise Hermann, encadenado: Notas de un viaje a los frentes del Isonzo, la Carnia y el Trentino (1917; Hermann in chains: notes on a trip to the front lines of Isonzo, la Carnia and il Trentino). He was also a correspondent for the Spanish newspaper ABC during his exile in Argentina (1940–54), as well as after his return to Spain in 1954. Because of the disparate nature of these publications (on two continents, in so many sources, and over a wide range of topics), Ayala's editors face a monumental task in collecting and publishing his essays.

Spaniards were treated to Pérez de Ayala's personal observations of other countries in several volumes of collected essays. In El país del futuro (1959; The country of the future), Ayala reports his observations of the United States during two visits (1913–14, 1919–20). His Tributo a Inglaterra (1963; Tribute to England) collects articles written about and from England, and Crónicas londinenses (1958; London chronicles) includes his newspaper articles written during his visit in 1908. Ancient Greece is the focus of Viaje entretenido al país del ocio: Reflexiones sobre la cultura griega (1975; Entertaining journey to the land of leisure: reflections on Greek culture). Fábulas y ciudades (1961; Fables and cities) considers the educational importance of fables for all ages and the origins of great cities. Ayala proves that neither archaeologists nor anthropologists have answered the question of how cities begin, subsequently offering his own theories.

A majority of Ayala's essays treat two themes: literature (especially drama and the novel) and politics. In Política y toros (1918; Politics and bulls), he analyzes the Spanish perspective of the world, indicating that the Spaniard believes himself to be an expert on both politics and the bullfight. Ayala, however, calls Spain uncivilized, for, unlike any civilized nation, Spain has neither resolved nor stated its political problems. In a later collection, Escritos políticos (1967; Political writings), editor Paulino Garagorri includes Ayala's denunciation of Primo de Rivera's dictatorship and his welcoming the fall of the monarchy and the beginning of the Second Republic.

Spanish or international letters and history are explored in Ante Azorín (1964; In the presence of Azorin), Amistades y recuerdos (1961; Friendships and remembrances), Nuestro Séneca y otros ensayos (1966; Our Seneca and other essays), Principios y finales de la novela (1958; Beginnings and ends of the novel), Divagaciones Hterarias (1958; Literary musings), and Más divagaciones literarias (1960; More literary musings). In Las máscaras (1917–19; Masks), his famous two-volume collection of theatrical criticism and reviews, Ayala criticized and analyzed the leading Spanish playwrights of his day, at times heavilyhandedly. In later years, he revised some of his more vitriolic reviews, especially on Benavente. He did, however, continue to appreciate most drama which followed classical and Aristotelian principles.

From the other essays on literature, one can glean Ayala's theory of the novel. He stated, for example, that the essay and the novel are the culmination of the development of genres; classicism is likewise the zenith of literary movements. Ayala believed that the novel must present many (perhaps even contradictory) viewpoints in order to portray three-dimensional reality by one-dimensional description. Although the novel's purpose is communication, and therefore content must be privileged, style is still important, though it should never be used solely for decorative effect. The plot, he stated, is merely melodramatic if it is founded on a conflict between good and evil. Instead, the best plot presents the confrontation of two or more just causes. The best topics for novels, therefore, are love and tolerance.

Miscellaneous collections cover all the above topics as well as art, education, and geography. Among these are Pequeños ensayos (1963; Little essays), Apostillas y divagaciones (1976; Marginal notes and musings), Tabla rasa (1963; The table cleared), and Las terceras de ABC (1976; The third page of ABC). The latter's title refers to Pérez de Ayala's essays appearing on that Madrid newspaper's third page. El libro de Ruth (1928; The book of Ruth) is an anthology of essays extracted from Ayala's novels.

Pérez de Ayala contributed significantly to Spaniards' understanding of themselves and the world for nearly 50 years. It is only fitting, therefore, that he should be appreciated for his most constant genre, the essay.

EUNICE DOMAN MYERS

Biography

Born 9 August 1880 in Oviedo, Asturias. Studied at the Jesuit school in Gijón, 1890–94; University of Oviedo, 1896–1902, law degree; University of Madrid, 1902. Contributor to Helios, 1903–04; London correspondent, El Imparcial, 1908. Traveled to Germany, 1912, and the United States, 1913–14. Married Mabel Rick, 1913: two sons. War correspondent for La Prensa (Buenos Aires), 1916; contributor to Madrid newspapers while in the U.S., 1919–20. Elected to the Royal Spanish Academy, 1928. Founder, with José Ortega y Gasset and Gregorio Marañón, Agrupación al Servicio de la República (Group at the service of the Republic), 1931. Spanish ambassador in London, 1931–36 (resigned); lived in Biarritz and Paris, 1936–39, returning to Spain at the end of the Civil War. Lived in Buenos Aires, 1940–54; worked for a time at the Spanish Embassy, Buenos Aires; returned to Spain, 1954. Contributor, ABC, 1954–62. Awards: Mariano de Cavia Prize, for journalism, 1922; National Literature Prize, 1926; Juan March Prize, 1960; honorary degree from the University of London. Died in Madrid, 5 August 1962.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Hermann, encadenado: Notas de un viaje a los frentes del Isonzo, la Carnia y el Trentino, 1917

Las máscaras, 2 vols., 1917–19

Política y toros, 1918

El libro de Ruth: Ensayos en vivo, 1928

Selections from Perez de Ayala (in Spanish), edited by Nicholson B. Adams and Sterling A. Stoudemire, 1934

Principios y finales de la novela, 1958

Divagaciones literarias, edited by José García Mercadal, 1958

Crónicas londinenses, 1958; edited by Agustín Coletes Blanco, 1985

El país del futuro: Mis viajes a los Estados Unidos, 1913–1914, 1919–1920, edited by José García Mercadal, 1959

Más divagaciones literarias, edited by José García Mercadal, 1960

Amistades y recuerdos, 1961

Fábulas y ciudades, 1961

Tabla rasa, 1963

Pequenñs ensayos, edited by José García Mercadal, 1963

Tributo a Inglaterra, edited by José García Mercadal, 1963

Ante Azorín, edited by José García Mercadal, 1964

Nuestro Séneca y otros ensayos, edited by José García Mercadal, 1966

Escritos políticos, edited by Paulino Garagorri, 1967

Viaje entretenido al país del ocio: Reflexiones sobre la cultura griega, edited by José García Mercadal, 1975

Apostillas y divagaciones, edited by Jose Garcia Mercadal, 1976

Las terceras de ABC, 1976

Artículos y ensayos en los semanarios "España," "Nuevo Mundo," y "La Esfera", edited by Florencio Frieria Suárez, 1986

Other writings: nine novels (Tinieblas en las cumbres, 1907; A.M.D.G., 1910; La pata de la raposa [The Fox's Paw], 1912; Troteras y danzaderas, 1913; Belarmino y Apolonio, 1921; Luna de miel, luna de hiel [Honeymoon, Bittermoon], 1923; Los trabajos de Urbano y Simona, 1923; Tigre Juan, 1926; El curandero de su honra, 1926), novellas, poetry, and a play.

Collected works edition: Obras completas, edited by José García Mercadal, 4 vols., 1964–69.

Bibliographies

Best, Marigold, Ramón Pérez de Ayala: An Annotated Bibliography of Criticism, London: Grant and Cutler, 1980

Bibliografía de Ramón Pérez de Ayala en la Biblioteca Pública de Oviedo (Bibliografía para un centenario), Oviedo: Biblioteca Pública, 1980

Fernandez, Pelayo H., "Bibliografía sobre Ramón Pérez de Ayala," in his Estudios sobre Ramón Pérez de Ayala, Oviedo: Instituto de Estudios Asturianos, 1978:153–93

Further Reading

Bobes Naves, María del Carmen, and others, Homenaje a Ramón Pérez de Ayala, Oviedo: University of Oviedo Department of Literary Criticism, 1980

Campbell, Brenton Kay, "The Esthetic Theories of Ramón Pérez de Ayala," Hispania 50, no. 3 (September 1967):447–53

Campbell, Brenton Kay, "Free Will and Determinism in the Theory of Tragedy: Pérez de Ayala and Ortega y Gasset," Hispanic Review 37 (July 1969):375–82

Feeny, Thomas, "Subjectivity in the Dramatic Criticism of Pérez de Ayala," Revista de Estudios Hispánicos 17, no. 1 (January 1983): 55–64

Fernández, Pelayo H., editor, Sitposio internacional Ramón Pérez de Ayala, Gijón: Flores, 1981

Fernández, Pelayo H., "Bergson y Pérez de Ayala: Teoría de lo cómico," Cuadernos Americanos 248, no. 3 (May–June 1983): 103–09

Fernández Avelló, Manuel, "Ramón Pérez de Ayala y el periodismo," Boletín del Instituto de Estudios Asturianos 42 (April 1961):37–56

García Calderón, Francisco, "Ramón Pérez de Ayala y la política española," in La herencia de Lenin y otros artículos, Paris: Garnier, 1929:153–61

González del Valle, Luis T., El canon: Reflexiones sobre la recepción literaria-teatral (Pérez de Ayala ante Benavente), Madrid: Huerga & C Fierro, 1993

Insula issue on Pérez de Ayala, 404–05 (July-August 1980)

Myers, Eunice D., "Tradition and Modernity in Pérez de Ayala's Literary Theories," Crítica Hispánica 2, no. 2 (1980):157–66

O'Brien, MacGregor, El ideal clásico de Ramón Pérez de Ayala en sus ensayos en la Prensa de Buenos Aires, Oviedo: IDEA, 1981

- Pérez Ferrero, Miguel, Ramón Pérez de Ayala, Madrid: Publicaciones de la Fundacion JuanMarch, 1973
- Rand, Marguerite C, Ramón Pèrez de Ayala, New York: Twayne, 1971
- Sallenave, Pierre, "La estética y el esencial ensayismo de Ramón Pérez de Ayala," Cuadernos Hispanoamericanos 234 (June 1969): 601–15
- Sallenave, Pierre, "Ramón Pèrez de Ayala, teórico de la literatura," Cuadernos Hispanoamericanos 82, no. 244 (April 1970):178–90
- Suarée, Octavio de la, Jr., Sociedad y política en la ensayística de Ramón Pèrez de Ayala, New York: Contra Viento y Marea, 1982
- Villanueva, Darío, editor, La novela lírica, vol. 2, Madrid: Taurus, 1983
- Weber, Frances Wyers, The Literary Perspectivism of Ramón Pèrez de Ayala, Chapel Hill:University of North Carolina Press, 1966

Periodical Essay

In a general sense, the term "periodical essays" may be applied to any grouping of essays that appear serially. Charles Dickens once referred to himself as a "periodical essayist," and various 20th-century columnists whose syndicated work appears with some frequency might be given this designation. The term "periodical essay" appears to have been first used by George Colman the Elder and Bonnell Thornton in their magazine the Connoisseur (1754–56). By the time it occurred to them to use these two words to describe the form of publication in which they were engaged, serial essays which shared a number of characteristics with the Connoisseur had been published (in England especially) for half a century. So numerous were these serials, so persistent a feature of the reading diet of people throughout English society during nearly the entire century, and so natural did it seem to an 18th-century author to develop a periodical essay series or at least to contribute a paper or two to a series established by another writer, that any discussion of the periodical essay is most appropriately situated in this period.

The confluence of three separate cultural developments appears to have caused the emergence of the periodical essay form early in the 18th century. The first of these was the rise of publications that conveyed news, commentary, and (frequently) political propaganda to the general reading public. Governmental licensing controls over publishing had been allowed to lapse in the latter years of the 17th century, and by the end of the first decade of the 18th a variety of publications, most appearing weekly or two to three times per week, were serving a wide reading audience. Daniel Defoe estimated the total national weekly circulation of such periodicals at 200,000 in 1711, and the sharing of papers at coffeehouses and within families doubtless created a larger audience even then. The second development was the rise of the informal essay at the same time, undoubtedly influenced by the writings of Montaigne as well as by the recognition that particular kinds of prose style might be more appropriate to some discourses than to others. Ephraim Chambers' entry on the essay in his Cyclopaedia (1728) refers to "sudden, occasional Reflexions, which are to be wrote much at the Rate, and in the Manner a Man thinks..." A third factor contributing to the popularity of this form was the 18th-century fondness for pseudonymous writing—the adoption of fictitious personae appropriate to the expression of particular views. Jonathan Swift and Richard Steele are only two of the most visible practitioners of this technique; it is also to be found employed with similar energy by hundreds of other writers.

The formal properties of the periodical essay were largely defined through the practice of Joseph Addison and Steele in their two most widely read series, the Tatler (1709–11) and the Spectator (1711–12, 1714). Many characteristics of these two papers—the fictitious nominal proprietor, the group of fictitious contributors who offer advice and observations from their special viewpoints, the miscellaneous and constantly changing fields of discourse, the use of exemplary character sketches, letters to the editor from fictitious correspondents, and various other typical features—existed before Addison and Steele set to work, but these two wrote with such effectiveness and cultivated such attention in their readers that the Tatler and Spectator served as the models for periodical writing in the next seven or eight decades. Unlike their contemporary Defoe, whose Review of the Affairs of France (1704–13) moved to more general cultural topics from a central engagement with political issues, Addison and Steele devoted themselves to matters of style, fashion, behavior, opinion, and manners characteristic of middle-class life; it was this rapidly growing and prospering audience that established so solid a readership for periodical essays in several successive generations.

A listing of the most successful and influential 18th-century periodical essays would be a very long one. When the popularity of the form was at its height in the middle and later years of the century, the leading series included: Henry Fielding's Covent Garden Journal (1752); Samuel Johnson's Rambler (1750–52) and Idler (1758–60); John Hawkesworth's Adventurer (1752–54), to which Johnson also contributed; the World (1753–56), which Edward Moore conducted in collaboration with Horace Walpole, the Earl of Chesterfield, and Richard Owen Cambridge; the Connoisseur (1754–56) of Coleman and Thornton; Oliver Goldsmith's “Chinese Letters” in the Public Ledger (1760), which he published separately as The Citizen of the World two years later; and Henry Mackenzie's Mirror (1779–80) and Lounger (1785–87).

One measure of the popularity of periodical essays was the emergence of an entirely new and separate periodical form, designed to allow readers better access to such literature: in 1731, Edward Cave's Gentleman's Magazine was established as a monthly collection of the best periodical essays from the previous month. Cave and his staff printed digests of the essays they selected in the interests of gentlemen who wished to keep abreast of the latest periodical commentary but simply did not have sufficient time to read it all as it appeared. Ultimately, the form evolved in ways that integrated it into the general conventions of literary publication; that is, the essay series was continued until sufficient numbers had been published to make up two- or four-volume sets. In 1764, when William King published as The Dreamer a group of essays (infused with all the qualities of the periodical essay form) which had never been published serially, the serial form may be said to have reached historical closure. Wonderful essays continued to be written—by gifted new writers such as Charles Lamb and by others who perpetuated the stylistic and topical qualities that had made the periodical essay so important. But such essays came to readers as preformed collections in bookshops or lending libraries, rather than as segments of discourse delivered to readers as a regular feature of their daily lives.

JAMES M.KUIST

See also Topical Essay

Bibliography

Weed, Katherine Kirtley, and Richmond Pugh Bond, Studies of British Newspapers and Periodicals from Their Beginning to 1800: A Bibliography, Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1946

Further Reading

Bateson, F.W., "Addison, Steele, and the Periodical Essay," in Dryden to Johnson, edited by Roger Lonsdale, New York: Bedrick, 1987

Black, Jeremy, The English Press in the Eighteenth Century, Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1987

Bond, Richmond Pugh, Studies in the Early English Periodical, Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1957

Bond, Richmond Pugh, Growth and Change in the Early English Press, Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1969

Graham, Walter, English Literary Periodicals, New York: Nelson, 1967 (original edition, 1930)

Marr, George Simpson, The Periodical Essayists of the Eighteenth Century, New York: Appleton, 1924

Watson, Melvin Roy, "The Spectator Tradition and the Development of the Familiar Essay," English Literary History 13 (1946): 189–215

Watson, Melvin Roy, Magazine Serials and the Essay Tradition, 1746–1820, Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1956

Wiles, R.M., Serial Publication in England Before 1750, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1957

Periodicals

The periodical publication of journals, reviews, and magazines is a phenomenon of Western European culture closely tied to the evolving hegemony of secular science and especially technology in the 17th century. During the 16th century, print had replaced manuscript as the primary mode for circulating philosophical and scientific ideas, expanding and in some senses actually creating the idea of a "community of scholars," an abstract notion whose real impact as an historic event is best witnessed in the continental effect of the publication of Galileo's manuscripts. One can safely agree with Elizabeth Eisenstein's assertion in The Printing Press as an Agent of Change (1979) that the medium and not the message was the subject of the trials of Galileo. At any rate, the development of serialization in learned printing created a mode of communication eventually constructed around the essay because of its discursive predisposition toward scrutiny and knowledge. Periodical writing adds to these distinctive attributes of the essay temporal and spatial qualities that came to define the way in which European culture views knowledge. The serial nature of periodicals contributes significantly to the modern concept of learning as tentative and utilitarian. With each week and each month, new ideas appear to alter the contours of or entirely displace those that came before them. Learning is no longer limited to the learned or the specialist as journals and reviews expand their circulation and accessibility, with the result that the simple pursuit of knowledge for its own sake steadily gives way to knowledge for the sake of its useful application to industry, trade, and economics. It is thus no great exaggeration to say that periodicals both initially defined and subsequently fostered mass communication and international media, seminal attributes of Modernism.

The two works usually cited as the first examples of the periodical appeared respectively in France and England in the same year, 1665; however, Denis de Sallo's Le Journal des Savants came out in Paris in January, predating Henry Oldenburg's London publication of the Philosophical Transactions of the Royal Society (March 1665) by two months. These were quickly followed by a number of imitations and plagiarisms across Europe, of which the most important and independent offspring was Il Giornale de' Letterati (The journal of letters), first published in Rome in 1668 and continued through 1675, when it was reconceived and issued as a new series until 1769. Among the attempts at periodical journalism before 1665 in both France and England, the best—and perhaps the first—is the Bureau d'Adresse, which was edited and printed by Théophraste Renaudot between 1633 and 1642, and was composed entirely of summaries of the current activities in the sciences and literature, much of the information garnered through court gossip and correspondence. Jean Loret's Muse Historique ran through 1651 in Paris and spawned a London imitator in 1656 called the Sportive Wit: The Muses Merriment, both interesting early examples of what Walter Graham (1926) identifies as the “periodical of amusement.” This category of serial publication has its early master later in the century when Peter Motteux, the Huguenot journalist and professional writer, began to issue in France his journal Le Mercure Galant (1672–1724; The gallant Mercury; then Le Mercure de France, 1724–1965), which dealt in articles about court news and gossip. In January 1692 Motteux started the English-language Gentleman's Journal, more or less a miscellany of domestic and foreign news, questions and answers on history and philosophy, and news of the learned world, particularly abstracts of learned publications. The Gentleman's Journal averaged 64 pages with each issue and was a substantial forerunner of the later achievements in this kind of format, Edward Cave's Gentleman's Magazine (1731) and the Edinburgh-based Scots Magazine (1739). Still, at its inception, the periodical eschewed commentary and analysis in favor of abstracts and summaries, which is certainly the hallmark of both the Journal des Savants and the Philosophical Transactions. Only with the 1690s, and particularly in England, did the periodical become the focus of public debate and controversy, a development brought about in part by the innovative combination of the polemical style of the pamphlet with the learned periodical's objective of conveying scientific and philosophical knowledge.

Two aspects of 17th-century English prose writing contribute significantly to the emergence of what the modern reader would recognize as the periodical style: the pamphlet wars during and after the Civil War, especially those dealing with Protestant controversy; and the evolution of character sketches from their modern beginning in Joseph Hall's refashioning of the Characters of Theophrastus in his Characters of Vertues and Vices (1608), with its subsequent secular cousin, Sir Thomas Overbury's enormously successful and influential characterization in A Wife (1613). What develops steadily in both kinds of writing is a sensitivity to voice, and especially a rhetoric that takes up the intense awareness of the private self which characterizes the essay from its inception at the hand of Montaigne and applies that language of intimate experience and personal belief to a very public kind of work, the political and religious pamphlet. Character writing like that of Hall, Overbury, and John Webster, however, lacked any kind of genuinely psychological element of the sort that makes Montaigne's Essays compelling. This rhetorical development can be located in the religious pamphlets of self-examination popular among Protestants, of which the finest example is, perhaps, John Donne's Devotions upon Emergent Occasions (1624), which takes the tradition of the spiritual autobiography into its most psychologically self-conscious mode.

By the 1680s, a type of periodical writing began to appear in which contemporary issues and controversies were addressed not in the cold language of abstract and summary but in the rhetorical heat of journalistic dialogue. Roger L'Estrange can be said to have pioneered this format in his periodical the Observer (1681–87), with its "dialogue papers" in which various characters debate issues in dramatic voices. Perhaps the most eccentric and compelling of L'Estrange's imitators is Charles Leslie, whose Rehearsal (1704–09) was structured around the editor's debates with a character called simply "the Countryman" who posed controversial questions concerned with contemporary issues of Church and State, emulating L'Estrange's question-and-answer format. Leslie was a Tory who began his periodical in direct response to John Tutchin's Whig revival of the Observer in 1702. This partisanship in journalism, growing out of the political divisions, left over from the Civil War, did much to advance the characterization of voice in periodical writing by establishing an implicit tradition of political identification and opposition in the majority of journalistic undertakings. The paradigm is evident in what are probably the earliest examples of journalism in English, the royalist paper Mercurius Aulicus (January 1643) and its opposition response Mercurius Britannicus (August 1643). This dialectic in the English periodical press was continued in such 18th-century publications as George Ridpath's Whig Flying-Post (1695–1731) and Abel Roper's Tory Post-Boy (1695–1736). In part, the domination of the English-language periodical as the exemplary model across Europe can be traced to this volatile format of partisan controversy in the public periodical press in England. The instability of the social experiment of religious tolerance in England after the Civil War, with its explicit protagonist-antagonist relationship between Anglican and Dissenter, Tory and Whig, created a literary model for public debate that quickly presented itself in the three most influential examples of this genre: the Athenian Gazette (1690–97), the Tatler (1709–11), and the Spectator (1711–1712, 1714).

Throughout the 17th century in Europe, there was a sharp division between what we have called "learned" and "amusement" journals, particularly in evidence when we contrast the Philosophical Transactions and its professional readership with something like the News from Parnassus, first issued 2 February 1680, which was written in the style of a roman-à-clef, as a sort of political entertainment, in part a parody of the Spanish novelist and essayist Francisco de Quevedo, whose work Los sueños (1627; Visions) had been translated by Roger L'Estrange in 1667. John Dunton, however, saw a way to bring together the popular and the professional periodical press in his Athenian Gazette, begun 17 March 1690 and printed thereafter twice weekly on Saturdays and Tuesdays. Dunton assembled a "Society of Athenian Gentlemen," more or less a parody of the Royal Society that included, along with Dunton himself, the mathematics teacher Richard Sault, the Church of England divine Samuel Wesley (father of John and Charles Wesley), the polymath John Norris and, on occasion, Daniel Defoe. The Gazette set out "to endeavour the Answering any reasonable Question which should be proposed." Here for the first time knowledge was applied not abstractly but in response to the specific needs of readers; Dunton openly described this method as one that mixed common sense with scholarly research. The Gazette listed sources from Aristotle to the Philosophical Transactions among its resources. The content ranged from the admirably eclectic to the bizarrely arcane, including essays on natural science, theology, mathematics, and Hebrew and Greek grammar alongside folklore, domestic truisms, and advice for the lovelorn. The paper was printed as two columns on a folio half-sheet and often answered a dozen questions, although single-issue topics did occur. The writing was not yet fully evolved into the periodical style of Addison and Steele, but it was recognizably essayistic and employed polemic and opinion in a way unlike any previous periodical.

Of especial interest is Dunton's awareness of his readership. He identified a significant number of women among his following and quickly produced a special issue for the female reader which appeared on the first Tuesday of every month, becoming the first periodical published specifically for women. Dunton's format combined the dissemination of knowledge and information with opinion and analysis, producing a critical journal which was at the same time the first "democratic" periodical, intended for a broadly representative readership in terms of gender, class, religion, and education. His question-and-answer practice took the dialogue technique in periodical writing to its next step where the readers themselves engaged directly in the discourse; Dunton established a convention that became the letter to the editor in the Tatler and Spectator and remained a staple rhetorical tactic in periodicals from the Rambler through to the Atlantic Monthly.

John Dunton had many emulators, beginning within months of his first Athenian Gazette when Jean de la Crose published his monthly History of Learning (July 1691). Retitled Works of the Learned, this periodical continued until 1712 and followed Dunton in breaking with the use of abstracts to convey information about the book world. De la Crose is credited with being the first journalist to offer his reader actual reviews and critical articles. Peter Motteux took the further step of publishing original work by a wide range of contributors in his previously mentioned Gentleman's Journal (1692–94), described by George Sherburn (in The Restoration and the Eighteenth Century, 1948) as "more like a modern magazine than any other periodical for years to come." The last of the innovators of the 1690s was Edward (Ned) Ward, whose London Spy (1698–1700) took characterization and voice outside of the question-and-answer, letter to the editor, and dialogue models into the realm of true personae. In each issue, Ward used a stereotypical character like the Quack or the Gossip to take his readers into the day-to-day activities of London life. His language is colloquial, even coarse and brutal at times, but Ward made human interest stories and the business of the city street a category of information just as desirable to the reader and profitable to the publisher as the knowledge of the scholars or the news of government strategies. The best periodical writing of the 1690s is distinguished by its evocation of voices representative of the spectrum of urban life. Periodicals now spoke in recognizably contemporary and individual ways, sounding Tory or Whig, high or low, and increasingly reflecting national characteristics. A critically informed voice that was private at its origin but public in its effect was one of the significant contributions made by Dunton's Athenian Gazette to the periodical style; it remained, however, for Richard Steele and Joseph Addison to create the illusion of informed conversation and in so doing bring the periodical essay to its fulfillment in the Tatler and the Spectator.

If the 1690s had been a period of frenetic innovation in periodical writing, the first decade of the 18th century was one of proliferation. There were 21 periodicals in London in 1702, increasing to 31 in 1707 and 50 in 1711 when the Spectator made its appearance. Most of these were irregular and shortlived publications, struggling to define a market as reliable and lucrative as the one that served Dunton's Athenian for seven years. Richard Steele made the next significant impact upon that market with the Tatler, which ran to 271 numbers, sold for a penny—although the first four issues were offered free to engage an immediate readership—and was offered to the public three times a week, on the days when the London mail coaches left for the country. For all of its stylistic innovations, the Tatler is obviously just as important for its acute business sense, using the now common strategy of the loss leader to attract a market and attaching itself to a readership outside of London to extend that market as far as possible through—in Steele's words—"the convenience of the post." In its way, the Tatler was the first periodical to use national identity as both a selling and an editorial point, resolving as the first paper declares to settle "a correspondence in all parts of the known and knowing world," which amounted to the coffeehouses of London, perhaps the first journalistic designation of that urban precinct as "the City." Steele wrote 188 Tatlers, Addison 42, with contributions from other sources filling out the run. The Tatler combined the streetwise observations of Ned Ward's London Spy with review writing after the fashion of Motteux and editorializing in the manner Defoe had initiated with his Review of the Affairs of France (1704–13). But it is the moral tone and literariness of the Tatler that signify its originality. Steele fashioned the periodical essay in journalism by combining the intimacy of the essay form as derived from Montaigne with the dramatic personae which had gradually evolved into the journalistic voices of the popular press. Steele's persona in the Tatler, Isaac Bickerstaff, spoke with the inflections of a city gentleman; he sounded as if he were speaking to the reader over a fashionable cup of coffee. He was the first voice of the editor, informed, erudite, but at ease with his authority. It was a rhetorical innovation that seized the imagination of the reading public—and sold very well.

Like the Tatler, the Spectator was a folio half-sheet, but it appeared daily between 1 March 1711 and 6 December 1712, running to a total of 555 numbers with the writing shared by Addison and Steele. Addison resumed publication on his own 18 June 1714, producing another 80 papers through 20 December 1714. The Spectator was one of the few periodicals to survive Bolingbroke's half-penny tax and consequently sold at twopence, twice the cost of the Tatler. A more intellectually ambitious periodical than any of its predecessors, the Spectator developed the critical essay to a sophisticated degree through Addison's papers on Milton's Paradise Lost and other literary topics. It also continued to employ and enhance the persona of the worldly editor whose subtle, informed, and often ironic voice guides the reader with patriarchal authority; where Steele's Bickerstaff was part of the world he moved in and seemed to feel its moral dilemmas, Addison's Mr. Spectator is often detached, his stoicism at times giving way to cynicism. The success of Addison's rhetorical methods in the Spectator encouraged wide imitation, notably Eliza Haywood's Female Spectator, and was the inspiration for Samuel Johnson's resurrection of the periodical essay in his Rambler (1750–52), as well as the Edinburgh periodicals of the late 18th century, the Mirror (1779–80) and the Lounger (1785–87). On the continent, the Spectator was widely translated and established the standard for several generations of essayists, its greatest impact appearing in the work of the French encyclopedists, especially Voltaire and Diderot.

After Addison, there were few gentlemen journalists. Hack writing paid the bills for most, not the least among whom were Samuel Johnson and Benjamin Franklin. Johnson along with Daniel Defoe charted the career of the professional periodical writer in his own life. In fact, Johnson and Defoe between them created and brought to its highest form the art of literary journalism, Johnson as a political conservative and Defoe as a socialist. Both contributed in very different ways to the development of the magazine, which Ben Franklin then took up in the United States. Defoe, traveling and writing journalism in France, Scotland, and Holland, essentially invented foreign correspondence in the modern sense of that term, and was the founder, editor, and sole contributor to A Review of the Affairs of France (1704–13), a periodical appearing three times a week and dedicated to bringing England to a mature understanding of international politics. Defoe developed a Scottish edition of the Review in 1709 while he was in Edinburgh editing and writing for the Edinburgh Courant and the Scots Postman. His politically savvy style did much to advance the polemical style in periodical writing.

Samuel Johnson, in turn, developed a political awareness in his journalism through his work for the publisher Edward Cave, whose Gentleman's Magazine, begun in 1731, had the most significant overseas influence of any English periodical after the Spectator. The Gentleman's Magazine had an average circulation of some ten thousand readers throughout the 18th century; Johnson contributed to it as a hack writer for several years, chiefly as the "author" of its accounts of the speeches and transactions of the Houses of Parliament under the allegorically disguised heading, "Senate of Lilliput." The essay style Johnson adopted in his early journalism for the Gentleman's Magazine reached its fulfillment in his three subsequent periodical ventures: the Rambler (1750–52); the Universal Chronicle, a newspaper for which he wrote a column under the title of "The Idler," in all producing a further 104 essays; and the Adventurer (1752–54), edited by John Hawkesworth, the other great English periodical writer of the mid-18th century, whose career began with the Gentleman's Magazine.

The 1740s saw a surge in magazine production outside of England but especially in the American colonies. Following the example of the Gentleman's Magazine and the equally successful Scots Magazine (launched in 1739 as a monthly in Edinburgh and published without interruption to this day), such periodicals as the Italian Novelle Letterarie (1740–70; Literary news) began to appear on the continent, distinguished in large part by their attempts to emulate the impartiality of the English magazine format. However, the most significant flourishing took place across the Atlantic, mostly because the suppression of the press in Catholic Europe blocked periodical publication on the continent. In the American colonies, the first magazines were founded in turn by Benjamin Franklin and John Webbe. The proposal for Franklin's General Magazine appeared early in 1740 and he employed Webbe as an editorial assistant. Webbe then abruptly abandoned Franklin and published his own proposal for the American Magazine on 30 October 1740. Webbe brought out his periodical first, on 13 February 1741, followed three days later by Franklin's. Both monthlies failed after six issues, neither being able to generate a subscription list which was the financial foundation of Cave's Gentleman's Magazine. Only after the American Revolution did the magazine market become stable. In 1788 Noah Webster revived Webbe's American Magazine and in the next year published the New York Magazine (1789). Charles Brockden Brown, the first professional journalist in the United States and a successful novelist, launched his Monthly Magazine and American Review the same year, but circulation remained a problem, as he wrote in his May issue: "...it is impossible to arrest the attention of those attached to the active scene of business." Only Mathew Carey's American Museum, with a readership of 1200, could sustain a viable circulation.

For whatever reason, Protestants seem to have been the driving force in periodical publication from its beginning in the late 17th century. This is true even in the examples of French journalism where the Huguenot writers Peter Motteux and Jean de la Crose were the chief innovators before their exile to England. The tradition of religious commentary in Protestantism, with its emphasis on the voice of the individual, may well have contributed to the direction taken by periodical writing in English; certainly the English Protestant press took Montaigne's essay in a very different direction as a model for journalism.

Further supporting this argument is the example of Scottish periodical writing, which from the 1770s became the source for the most striking new developments and which by the early 19th century had redirected and reinvigorated the form. William Smellie and Gilbert Stuart began this renaissance in periodical publication with their Edinburgh Magazine and Review (1773–76), which radically altered the reviewing technique then prevalent in such English magazines as the Monthly Review and the Critical Review. Smellie and Stuart wrote reviews which continued over several issues and in which they never hesitated to express their personal positions on politics and literary taste. They attacked as they criticized and created in the process a public outcry that eventually closed down their magazine. Their style, however, served as an example for the Scottish periodicals of the subsequent generation, especially the great arbiter of literary taste, the Edinburgh Review (1802–1929) and the mercurial and innovative Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine, established by the publisher William Blackwood in 1817. Published by John Constable and edited by Francis Jeffrey, Henry Brougham, and Sydney Smith, the Edinburgh Review made and broke literary careers and, unlike the Gentleman's Magazine, openly espoused a political position. But it was Blackwood's, under the direction of John Gibson Lockhart, James Hogg, and John Wilson, which brought new energy to periodical publication by reviving the satirically aggressive stance of Smellie and Stuart. Blackwood's had a flippant, even nasty, quality to its writing which generated a significant readership and numerous libel suits, in every way reminiscent of the Edinburgh Magazine and Review. It also revived the dialogue journalism of early 18th-century periodicals with particular success in its "Noctes Ambrosianae," a series of fictional conversations set in a pub and touching on various issues of life and literature with each of the magazine's editors adopting a different persona. Together with John Murray's Quarterly Review, launched in February 1809 with Walter Scott as its chief contributor, this revival of the literary periodical at Scottish hands had its influence on England with the founding of the London Magazine (1820), the Westminster Review (1824), and Fraser's Magazine (1830), the forerunner of Punch (1841).

Increasingly in the 19th century across Europe and in the United States, speciality magazines began to define the periodical. In Britain, there were the important radical and labour publications where the political nature of the English periodical most fully expressed itself. Beginning with the anti-London activist paper the Manchester Herald (1792–93), the best efforts of this kind were William Cobbett's Evening Post (1820) and Leader (1850–60), the first periodical truly for the working man. In Italy, the periodical marketplace was much disrupted until well into the 19th century when three influential specialist publications took root, the Annali di Matematica (1867; Annals of mathematics), the Nuovo Giornale Botanica (1869; New botanical journal), and the Giornale di Filologia Romanza (Journal of romance philology), which continued to publish into the 20th century. In France, the 19th century saw the burgeoning of art periodicals, most prominently L'Art (1875–1907). This weekly was international in its coverage and historically inclusive. So dominant was its adjudication of public taste that it effectively marginalized Impressionism in France when it damned the movement in all its works and artists in a famous review of the crucial impressionist exhibition in 1876. L'Art inspired the English language periodical the Artist (1880–1902), a monthly directed mostly at an audience of artists and dealers to which Oscar Wilde, John Ruskin, and James McNeill Whistler contributed.

Musical periodicals have been a particular strength in German publishing from their appearance in the 19th century. Of the early examples, the most distinguished and longest running was Robert Schumann's Neue Zeitschrift für Musik (New journal for music), founded in 1834 and renamed Zeitschrift für Musik in 1920 when it was taken over by the Leipzig publisher Steingraber. Once a trendsetting periodical, it became traditional and reactionary in the 1930s. Many German musical periodicals tended to be popular publications, reflecting public taste and responding to political pressures, unlike the esoteric and specialized art magazines in France. Die Musik, established by Bernard Schuster in 1901, was the most successful of the periodicals intended for a wide and inclusive readership. It was remarkable for its variety and attention to jazz but was silenced for political reasons in 1934. Still, the dominant periodicals for musicology have been German and were oriented entirely toward the specialist. In the 1920s, periodicals began to treat seriously the new influences of jazz and experimental music. Of these, Melos was among the first to appear, launched in 1920 by the Berlin conductor Hermann Scherchen and designed to focus on contemporary music.

In the 20th century, the periodical has spread to every literate culture and has become a crucial shaper of national identities. The present format is still recognizably derived from the first efforts of Jean de la Crose, Peter Motteux, and Edward Cave, and in its unmistakably European sensibility, the periodical's worldwide proliferation is a lasting reminder of colonialism. Still, if the business of the periodical has usually been to create or impose community and identity on its readers, it is also within its power to dissolve community and recover identity. Periodicals, in this sense—whatever their apparent special interest, however obscure their literary or scientific bias, and despite the seeming eccentricity of their material—are always political organs. This is most obvious today in the editorial work of writers like the pan-African historian Paul Zeleza, founder of the Odi, the bilingual Malawian quarterly, and in Brick, the international literary magazine re-established by the Sri Lankan-Canadian Michael Ondaatje in the 1980s, which now specializes in creative nonfiction, a genre invented by Daniel Defoe.

At their best, periodicals have taken the modern genre of the essay and used its rhetoric of private scrutiny to fashion a public discourse that emulates conversation. The illusion in periodical writing is a simple but powerful one: the reader hears the voice of the essayist as part of a public dialogue which imparts an identity—social, national, professional—to all who acknowledge and participate in it. The best periodicals are eclectic in appearance only; they contain a wealth of information about the world through correspondence from many sources, but that variety is brought to uniformity by the authority of editorial opinion and political bias. The first British periodical of an international character, the Strand (1891–1958), with its contributions from writers across Europe, Russia, and the Americas and its combination of articles and stories, essays and fiction, was finally a testimony to the political triumph of the Commonwealth and died with the passing of that political moment. So too with the great American periodicals of the 20th century, Harper's (1850–), the Atlantic Monthly (1857–) and the New Yorker (1925–)—they represent a political moment that will also pass. Essentially, the periodical is distinguished from its poor cousin the miscellany by its political identity; it is the literary expression of the European attraction to hegemonies.

STEPHEN W. BROWN

Further Reading

- Bond, Donovan H., and W. Reynolds McLeod, editors, Newsletters to Newspapers: Eighteenth-Century Journalism, Morgantown: West Virginia University School of Journalism, 1977
- Cowan, R.M.W., The Newspaper in Scotland, Glasgow: Outram, 1946
- Downie, J.A., and Thomas N. Corns, editors, Telling People What to Think: Early 18th-Century Periodicals from the Review to the Rambler, London: Cass, 1993
- Gardair, Jean-Michel, Le "Giornale de' Letterati" de Rome, 1668–1681, Florence: Olschki, 1984
- Graham, Walter, The Beginnings of English Literary Periodicals, New York: Octagon, 1972 (original edition, 1926)
- Griffiths, Dennis, editor, The Encyclopedia of the British Press, 1422–1992, London: Macmillan, and New York: St. Martin's Press, 1992
- Harris, Michael, editor, Journal of Newspapers and Periodical History (1984–)

- Harris, Michael, and Alan Lee, editors, The Press in English Society from the Seventeenth to Nineteenth Centuries, Rutherford, New Jersey: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, and London: Associated University Presses, 1986
- Hughes, Linda K., and Michael Lund, The Victorian Serial, Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1991
- Mott, Frank Luther, A History of American Magazines, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 5 vols., 1930–57
- Rogers, Pat, Literature and Popular Culture in Eighteenth Century England, Brighton: Harvester Press, and Totowa, New Jersey: Barnes and Noble, 1985
- Sutherland, James, The Restoration Newspaper and Its Development, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1986

Personal Essay

The personal essay is what most people mean when they consider the essay as a genre. It has the characteristics usually mentioned in defining the essay generally: an informal style, a casual, meandering structure, a conversational tone, the clear imprint of the author's personality, and a tendency toward subjects Phillip Lopate (1994) has dubbed "the familiar and the domestic, the emotional middle of the road." Most of the great essayists have been masters of the personal essay, from the genre's founder Montaigne onward.

It is useful to define the personal essay by comparing it to its close relations. The label is often used interchangeably with the familiar essay, but where the familiar essay is characterized by its everyday subject matter, the personal essay is defined more by the personality of its writer, which takes precedence over subject. On the other hand, the personal essayist does not place himself firmly center stage, as does the autobiographical essayist; the autobiographical element of the personal essay is far less calculated. The writer's presence is not secondary, but his approach is usually humble, and often self-deprecating and wryly humorous. The personal essay is an exploration of self only insofar as it translates into universal experience. In the best personal essays, the reader senses what Lopate calls a "shiver of self-recognition."

The personal essay began with Montaigne, though he referred to the letters of Seneca—informal, intimate dialogues with the self—as influential precursors. It is Montaigne the man we look for and marvel at in his essays: his unabashed presentation of self, warts and all, and his deftness at drawing us into his experience and making it our own. His writing possesses three qualities essential to the personal essay: honesty, intimacy, and a definitive point of view. In a personal essay the reader must trust the writer to tell his story as truthfully as possible; the narrator cannot be unreliable. In addition, the writer sets up a kind of dialogue with the reader, creating an intimate bond of understanding. As Seneca addressed his letters to a friend, so Montaigne wrote with his late friend La Boétie in mind. Finally, Montaigne's strong, clear point of view permeates his essays without being didactic or self-righteous.

As with the history of the essay in general, the personal essay leapt from France to England, with some continental variations, before finding a strong place in American letters, particularly in the 20th century. It can be found in elements of the periodical essays of Addison and Steele, before reaching what many believe was its most glorious representation in the writings of William Hazlitt and, to a lesser degree, Charles Lamb. It was picked up by Ralph Waldo Emerson and Henry David Thoreau in mid-19th-century America, and shared in the 20th century between England and America in writers such as Max Beerbohm, Virginia Woolf, H.L.Mencken, George Orwell, E.B.White, James Baldwin, and Joan Didion, among many others.

Many of today's essays, particularly in the United States, are suffused with the personal; indeed, Carl Klaus (1995) has pointed out that the former courtesies and conventions of restraint in the personal essay have been all but abandoned for the practice "to speak out, to let it all hang out, to come out, to bear witness, to testify, to talk back, to be heard." Intimate self-revelation has taken the place of the kind of genteel entertainment that was all personal essayists aspired to in the past. However, Klaus believes that while discretion may have been abandoned, so has the class-consciousness of earlier generations, the linking of personality with social demeanor. The personal essay is no longer a bourgeois, middle-class phenomenon, but a truly universal expression.

The subject matter of personal essays traditionally concerns common things, tending, as Lopate puts it, toward "a taste for littleness." Human relations with family and friends is a frequent topic, as are childhood reminiscences, and the consideration of pastimes such as travel, walking, and sheer idleness. While the personal essayist often has a serious point to make, it is rare that the essay's subject will be overtly political, with the exception perhaps of Orwell, one of the few writers consistently to maintain a balance between the personal and the political.

The tone of the personal essay is usually light, often nostalgic without being sentimental, gently humorous, rarely didactic. Its finest practitioners are often middle-aged, perhaps, as Lopate suggests, "because it is the fruit of ripened experience, which naturally brings with it some worldly disenchantment, or at least realism." Its structure is rambling, intuitive and organic rather than logical and rigid. It reflects the inner, often contradictory workings of the mind; it is, as Theodor W. Adorno described the essay in general, a reflection of "man thinking."

One of the finest examples of the personal essay is E.B. White's classic "Once More to the Lake" (1941), also one of the most anthologized of all essays. Ostensibly a comparison of White's childhood experience at a lake in summer with a return trip to the lake he made as an adult with his young son, it is really a meditation on growing up, the passing of time, the nature of memory, and the recognition of mortality. Gentle and self-deprecating ("I guess I remembered," he undercuts himself), White is nonetheless ruthless in his recognition of his desire to be young again, to the point where he feels he cannot tell where his son's experience at the lake begins and his own ends. While the tone is light and lovingly descriptive, the essay is almost unbearably sad, without being self-pitying. Detailed in its depiction of White's boyhood memories, it is yet not exclusive but speaks to the reader of the common human experience.

Joseph Epstein (1997) describes the personal essay as the "freest form in all of literature." It "is able to take off on any tack it wishes, building its own structure as it moves along, rebuilding and remaking itself—and its author—each time out." Its continuing popularity today may stem from its being “the ideal form for ages of transition and uncertain values.”

THERESA WERNER

Anthologies

The Art of the Personal Essay: An Anthology from the Classical Era to the Present, edited by Phillip Lopate, New York: Doubleday, 1994

Intimate Exile: Personal Essays, edited by Rosellen Brown, Ploughshares 20, nos. 2–3 (Fall 1994)

The Norton Book of Personal Essays, edited by Joseph Epstein, New York: Norton, 1997

Further Reading

Epstein, Joseph, Introduction to The Norton Book of Personal Essays, edited by Epstein, New York: Norton, 1997

Klaus, Carl H., “Embodying the Self: Malady and the Personal Essay,” Iowa Review 25, no. 2 (1995): 177–92

Lopate, Phillip, Introduction to The Art of the Personal Essay: An Anthology from the Classical Era to the Present, edited by Lopate, New York: Doubleday, 1994

Repplier, Agnes, “The American Essay in Wartime,” Yale Review 7, no. 2 (January 1918): 249–59

Zeiger, William, “The Personal Essay and Egalitarian Rhetoric,” in Literary Nonfiction: Theory, Criticism, Pedagogy, edited by Chris Anderson, Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1989: 301–14

Philosophical Essay

Philosophy has been closely linked to the essay since the genre’s inception. Both of the essay’s founding fathers, Michel de Montaigne and Francis Bacon, attempted to endow it with a philosophical status despite the diametrically opposed stances they took in their treatment of the genre. Montaigne was the first to use the term “essay,” in the title of his Essais (1580, 1588), not only to designate a literary composition but also to stress the significance of the term’s original meaning, “trial” or “attempt.” Montaigne saw the essay more as an ongoing process of discovery, while Bacon saw it more as a didactic, finished reflection—the subtitle to the latter’s Essays (1597, 1612, 1625) being “Practical and Moral Advice.” Nonetheless, both conceived of the essay as fundamentally philosophical in nature.

This shared conception was at least in part a result of their times, which introduced extreme philosophical doubt about human nature and man’s place in the universe. The end of the 16th century was marked by great political and social unrest, which saw the collapse of scientific doctrines long accepted as truths—notably, Copernicus’ toppling of Ptolemaic astronomy. From the beginning, then, and indeed throughout its history, the philosophical orientation of the essay has been fundamentally a skeptical one. Not surprisingly, both Montaigne and Bacon were attracted to the philosophical doctrine of skepticism, which can be traced to the ancient philosopher Pyrrhon of Elis (c. 365–0. 270 BCE) and his disciple Sextus Empiricus (fl. c. 200 CE), whose works were published with a Latin translation by Henri Estienne in about 1560—well within the lifetimes of both Bacon and Montaigne. The skeptics developed a systematic demonstration that man is deceived by both empirical evidence and reason. Unlike the nihilist, the skeptic reserves judgment and describes the world as a detached observer. While Montaigne’s subjective presence is felt often in his practice of the essay, his fundamental skepticism led him to question human nature and the solidity of the self or a central “I”—what Descartes later called cogito.

According to Stanley Cavell (1988), skepticism’s fundamental tenet—which underlies the philosophical essay—is paradoxical: it implies the quest for the “ordinary,” the “everyday,” and the “human,” which at the same time it seeks to deny and transcend. With the German Romantic Jena School’s conception of “fragment” as an unsystematizable form of writing, the essay becomes even more closely associated with skepticism’s contradictory tendencies. German Romantics, notably Friedrich Schlegel, wrote extensively on skepticism and the fragment. Indeed, Schlegel’s notion of “fragment” bears a striking affinity to the essay. Philippe Lacoue-Labarthe and Jean-Luc Nancy (1988) maintain in their reading of Schlegel’s Athenäum fragments (1798–1800) that the fragment, like the essay, reflects a similar paradox: “subjective” and “objective” modes are virtually inextricable. This conflation of opposites has its roots in the Romantics’ notion that writing is meant to enact its subject.

Writing in the mid- to late 19th century, Ralph Waldo Emerson and Friedrich Nietzsche were heavily indebted to the Romantic Jena School tradition, and both continued to link the essay with the fragment and with unsystematic philosophy. According to Emerson, every superior being “belongs” to the skeptical class which Montaigne represents. Like skepticism, which attempts to maintain a “middle ground” between extremes, transcendentalism aimed to find a balance between realism and idealism, and thus fuse the everyday with the sublime. Much influenced by Emerson’s “skeptical” spirit, Nietzsche’s aphoristic writings bear striking similarities to both the fragment and the essay. Indeed, Zarathustra, Nietzsche’s “alter-ego,” seems to embody skepticism with his Ja-sagen, which is neither affirmation nor negation, but which belongs to a paradoxical third category that shuns extremes as well as definitions. Following the German Romantics’ example, both Emerson and Nietzsche conceived of content and form as a single entity, and their writings as the very enactment of their lives. For Emerson, the essay was “essaying to be”: it was the enactment of the process of accommodation between the world and the “I,” and thus it became the act of consciousness realizing itself. Similarly, in Nietzsche’s work, form and content remain inextricable, and the writer/philosopher becomes inseparable from Zarathustra.

In the 20th century, the philosophical essay has moved further away from ideas of the self, and become more critical and more self-conscious, in so far as it is obsessed with language, discourse, and methodology. The broader intellectual context of the modern essay is no longer that of Montaigne's times, nor even that of Emerson's and Nietzsche's. Whereas Montaigne refused to separate himself from method, or the living subject from the experienced object, the modern essay is much more fragmented and attenuated. Schooled in the German Romantic tradition, and writing before and after World War I, Central European writers such as Robert Musil, Rudolf Kassner, Georg Lukács, and Georg Simmel conceived the essay as the perfect synthesis of seemingly contradictory elements such as form and content, science and art, and ethics and aesthetics. To them, the essay had to fulfill a "sacred" mission: to provide the world with a spiritual orientation it had long been lacking. In Die Seelen und die Formen (1911; Soul and Form), written before he joined the Communist Party, Lukács maintained that the essayist is by nature a precursor to a greater figure or system, a John the Baptist who goes out to preach in the wilderness about another who is yet to come. According to Lukács, the modern essayist can no longer pose his questions directly, as Montaigne did, but must necessarily use a "mediating medium." In other words, he must consider all the ways others pose their questions before formulating his own. By underlining this preoccupation with style and methodology, Lukács linked the modern essay with criticism, and raised a debate that continues today—between those who view the essay as art and those who view it as criticism.

This debate on the status of the essay has, in turn, stimulated two divergent schools of thought—the Frankfurt School of the mid-20th century, and the French poststructuralists of the late 20th century. Both groups reject Lukács' HegelianMarxist validation of totality and system, and conceive the modern, philosophical essay more as a fragmentary mode that refuses the ontological priorities of systems and their privileging of the timeless over the historical, and the universal over the particular. Although the two schools continue the essay's philosophical tradition, they diverge mainly in their respective views of essayistic "fragmentation." For the German theorists, such as Walter Benjamin and Theodor W. Adorno, still working, in a sense, within a humanist-idealist tradition, the fragmentary nature of the essay serves to decenter the self, so that the subject may experience the object without dominating it. For the French poststructuralists, however, who take this process a step further, essayistic fragmentation serves to eliminate all vestiges of Cartesianism and humanism from the text. Indeed, they pronounce the subject anachronistic, and the author dead.

While the German thinkers ascribe to the essay the heroic role of defending critical and creative thought against reason, as embodied in systems, the French have resisted identifying their writings with any established genres, questioning even the very notion of genre. Indeed, they have at times distanced themselves from the essay especially, mistrusting a discourse that encourages self-representation, whether in the traditional role of the Cartesian cogito, or in the more congenial guise of Montaigne's essays. Despite such objections, the French theorists, as well as the Frankfurt School thinkers, still belong in the tradition of the philosophical essay. Indeed, it is revealing that both Michel Foucault and Roland Barthes, who criticized bourgeois individualism in their early works, made the self a central concern in their late works. Both paid a final homage to the essay as well. Foucault, for example, describes the essay, in L'Usage des plaisirs (1984; Use of pleasure), as the "living substance of philosophy...an exercise of oneself in the activity of thought."

With its avowed fragmentariness and its unmethodological method, the philosophical essay is inherently a pluralistic and interdisciplinary genre. At once art and criticism, literature and philosophy, imagination and reason, its task is not to stay within well-charted boundaries, nor to shuttle back and forth across these boundaries, but rather to reflect on and to challenge them.

ALINA C.HUNT

Further Reading

- Adorno, Theodor W., "The Essay as Form," New German Critique 32 (Spring 1984):151–71 (original German article published 1954)
- Atkins, Douglas G., Estranging the Familiar: Toward a Revitalized Critical Writing, Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1992
- Butrym, Alexander J., editor, Essays on the Essay: Redefining the Genre, Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1989
- Cavell, Stanley, In Quest of the Ordinary: Lines of Skepticism and Romanticism, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1988
- Harrison, Thomas, Essayism: Conrad, Musil, and Pirandello, Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1992
- Jay, Martin, The Dialectical Imagination: A History of the Frankfurt School and the Institute of Social Research, 1923–1950, Boston: Little Brown, and London: Heinemann, 1973
- Joeres, Ruth-Ellen Boetcher, and Elizabeth Mittman, editors, The Politics of the Essay: Feminist Perspectives, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1993
- Lacoue-Labarthe, Philippe, and Jean-Luc Nancy, The Literary Absolute: The Theory of Literature in German Romanticism, Albany: State University of New York Press, 1988
- Lukács, Georg, Soul and Form, Cambridge, Massachusetts: MIT Press, 1974 (original German edition, 1911)
- Snyder, John, Prospects of Power: Tragedy, Satire, the Essay and the Theory of Genre, Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1991

The Physiology of Taste

by Brillat-Savarin, 1825

Jean-Anthelme Brillat-Savarin (1755–1826) is known almost exclusively as the author of the witty and urbane Physiologie du goût (1825; The Physiology of Taste). He was a lawyer and judge by profession, and his previous work included an essay on political economy (Vues et projets d'économie politique [1802; Views and projects of political economy]), one on legal theory (Fragments d'une théorie judiciaire [1808; Fragments of a judicial theory]), and another on duelling (Essai historique et critique sur le duel [1819; Historical and critical essay on the duel]). While intelligent and erudite, these writings enjoyed little contemporary success, and are virtually forgotten today.

For the last quarter of his life, however, he had worked in near total secrecy on another project. In late 1825, a few months before his death, Brillat-Savarin published his magnum opus—anonously, at his own expense, and to the great surprise of even his closest friends. Entitled Physiologie du goût; ou, Méditation de gastronomie transcendante (The Physiology of Taste; or, Meditations on Transcendental Gastronomy), it soon became immensely popular; numerous editions have followed, in many languages. Brillat-Savarin's influence has likewise been enormous. For better or worse, his example has, in large measure, spawned the innumerable volumes of "food writing" which now crowd the shelves of bookstores.

As its full title suggests, Brillat-Savarin's essay pretends to be both a scientific treatise (physiologie) and a philosophical rumination (méditation). With mock seriousness, the self-proclaimed "professor" tries his hand at codifying the new "science" of gastronomy, and in so doing touches upon an astounding variety of subjects related to food, its preparation, consumption, and, most of all, enjoyment. Indeed, little seems to escape Brillat-Savarin's omnivorous pen: from the culinary eccentricities of ancient Rome, to the effects of different foods on dreams, to the best way to cook an unusually large turbot.

The Physiology opens with four introductory sections, including "Aphorisms of the Professor" and "The Author's Preface." The main body of the essay is made up of 30 "meditations" (e.g. "On Appetite"; "Theory of Frying"; "On Gourmandism"). These are followed, in turn, by a brief "Transition," a substantial section of "Varieties" and, finally, a "Parting Salute to the Gastronomers of the Old and New Worlds."

Brillat-Savarin's opening aphorisms—billed as "a preamble to his work and...a lasting foundation for the science of gastronomy"—have indeed remained the best-known and most-quoted part of the Physiology. Twenty in all, they include such perennial favorites as "Tell me what you eat, and I shall tell you what you are." In the "Author's Preface," Brillat-Savarin deals, most notably, with his style: while asking indulgence for his digressiveness and "garrulity," he begs not to be considered a simple "compiler"; he also defends his frequent use of foreign words and neologisms.

Most of Brillat-Savarin's 30 meditations are made up of several smaller sections (e.g. "Definition of Taste," "Turkey Lovers," "Inevitable Longevity of Gourmands"). Typically, a meditation proceeds from ostensibly serious, scholarly-sounding developments on the history and theory of gastronomy (entitled "Origin..." "Definition..." or "Analysis..."), to more lighthearted, digressive, and often autobiographical musings (entitled "Anecdote," "Reflection," "Sketch," or "Portrait"). This tendency informs the entire Physiology as well, for even when Brillat-Savarin's prose seems at its most serious, a wellspring of mirth lies just beneath the surface. Finally, in the "Varieties," Brillat-Savarin abandons any "scientific" pretense, unleashing a veritable flood of witty observations, amusing anecdotes, and other such hors d'œuvre. As he explains, these could not fit into his earlier, "theoretical" expositions, but are entertaining and worth writing nonetheless. No doubt the most emblematic of these widening and thoroughly heterogeneous "Varieties" is a brief section entitled, simply, "Miscellanea."

In its digressiveness, its amiable verbosity, and its largely unsystematic encyclopedism, Brillat-Savarin's Physiology belongs to a French tradition of the essay beginning with Montaigne. As a supposedly "scientific" and "philosophical" treatise, moreover, it parodies influential works by certain late 18th- and early 19th-century thinkers. These include, most notably, the Enlightenment sensationalist Étienne Bonnet de Condillac's Traité des sensations (1754; Treatise on the Sensations), which owes a great deal to Locke, and the idéologue P.J.G.Cabanis' Rapports du physique et du moral de l'homme (1802; On the Relationship Between the Physical and Moral Aspects of Man), which seeks to ground psychology in physiology.

Written at a time when cooking was becoming increasingly professionalized, and when the restaurant was becoming a major force in French culture, the Physiology also belongs to an emerging body of writing on culinary arts and gastronomy: from Karl Friedrich von Rumohr's Geist der Kochkunst (1823; The Essence of Cookery) to Marie-Antoin Carême's L'Art de la cuisine française au XIXe siècle (1828; The art of French cooking in the 19th century) to Alexandre Dumas' Grand Dictionnaire de cuisine (1873; Dictionary of Cuisine), to name but a few. Yet the author to whom Brillat-Savarin is most often compared remains the nearly forgotten Alexandre-Balthazar-Laurent Grimod de la Reyniere, who wrote Le Manuel des amphitryons (1808; The almanac of Amphytryons) and L'Almanach des gourmands (1803; The almanac of gourmands), and edited a short-lived Journal des gourmands et des belles (Journal of gourmands and beauties) years before the Physiology of Taste was published. While commentators generally hail Grimod's originality as the inventor of new forms (i.e. the gastronomic treatise, guide, and periodical), Brillat-Savarin is considered by far the superior stylist.

Indeed, from the 19th century to the present, Brillat-Savarin has often been celebrated for his style. Balzac (1835) attributes the Physiology's rapid success to the "savor" (saveur) of its style; M.F.K.Fisher, in the introduction to her 1949 translation, admires the "simplicity" and "restrained discretion" of Brillat-Savarin's "straightforward" yet gently "tongue in cheek" style; Roland Barthes (1975) characterizes the professor's language as "gourmande"; and Jean-François Revel (1982) hails his discovery of an "amiable style." Yet to see Brillat-Savarin solely as a stylist is to underestimate the philosophical depth of his work. Gastronomy, for Brillat-Savarin, is an eminently human pursuit: eating for pleasure, not just sustenance, is what separates us from the beasts. In the largest sense, then, The Physiology of Taste is an eloquent apology of epicureanism, a celebration of savoir-vivre—the art of living well. It is that most rare of books, for, as M.F.K.Fisher wrote in 1949, it succeeds in articulating "a well-balanced expression of one thinking man's attitude toward life."

MICHAEL D.GARVAL

Editions

Physiologie du goût; ou, Méditation de gastronomie transcendante, 1825; many subsequent editions, including those edited by Michel Guibert, 1975, and Jean-François Revel, 1982; translated under many titles, including The Handbook of Dining (1859), Gastronomy as a Fine Art (1877), A Handbook of Gastronomy (1884), and The Philosopher in the Kitchen (1970), but most often as The Physiology of Taste; or, Transcendental Gastronomy, translated by Fayette Robinson, 1854, and as The Physiology of Taste; or, Meditations on Transcendental Gastronomy, translated by

M.F.K.Fisher, 1949

Further Reading

- Balzac, Honoré de, “Brillat-Savarin (Extrait de la Biographie Universelle, tome 59),” in Œuvres complètes, vol. 23, Paris: Club de l’Honnête Homme, 1956 (original piece, 1835)
- Barthes, Roland, “Lecture de Brillat-Savarin,” in Physiologie du goût by Brillat-Savarin, edited by Michel Guibert, Paris: Hermann, 1975
- Boissel, Thierry, Brillat-Savarin, 1755–1826: Un chevalier candide, Paris: Presses de la Renaissance, 1989
- MacDonogh, Giles, Brillat-Savarin: The Judge and His Stomach, London: Murray, and Chicago: Dee, 1992
- Revel, Jean-François, “Brillat-Savarin ou le style aimable,” introduction to Physiologie du goût by Brillat-Savarin, Paris: Flammarion, 1982

Picón-Salas, Mariano

Venezuelan, 1901–1965

Before Mariano Picon-Salas, the Venezuelan literary tradition had produced several prominent essayists: Andrés Bello, Simón Rodríguez, Rufino Blanco Fombona, and Manuel Díaz Rodríguez. As was the case with his predecessors, not only did Picón-Salas attempt to reconcile nationalistic and purely aesthetic concerns in his work, but his direct involvement in politics proved to be decisive for the evolution of his career. When he was a young man, his liberal convictions strengthened in response to the atrocities of Juan Vicente Gómez’s dictatorship (1909–35). In 1922, escaping the repressive and stagnant atmosphere of his homeland, Picón-Salas settled in Chile, where he obtained an advanced degree in history and later worked as a university professor until Gómez’s death. This first international experience gave the young writer a truly continental scope, which continued to expand throughout his life. In 1948, he had to abandon Venezuela again after the overthrow of Rómulo Gallegos and, once democracy was restored years later, served as ambassador to Mexico, UNESCO, and Brazil.

Picón-Salas’ works may be roughly defined by setting them within a Latin American literary and artistic trend that prevailed from the 1910s to the 1950s and has been called mundonovismo (from Nuevo Mundo—“New World”) by some critics or, simply, americanismo (“Latin Americanism”). At the end of the Hispanic Modernist era (which began in the 1880s and started to decline in 1916, after the death of its leader, Rubén Darío), some poets and prose writers felt the need to compensate for what they considered to be an excessive cosmopolitanism among the Modernists. The mundonovistas’ reaction against what they saw as escapism, occasional political indifference, and egotistical distance from the problems of the Latin American masses was full of irony, and they soon tried to distinguish themselves from their predecessors by depicting Modernists as irresponsible inhabitants of ivory towers. In contrast, the mundonovistas described themselves as incarnations of the voice of the people or as pedagogues whose basic aim was to educate their fellow countrymen and prepare them for modern political reform and material progress. As simplistic as this ideology may sound, it was sometimes combined with true stylistic mastery or solid erudition. In fact, some of the most respectable Spanish American writers in the first half of the 20th century were, at one time or another, mundonovistas, including the novelists José Eustasio Rivera and Ricardo Güiraldes, the poets Gabriela Mistral, Nicolás Guillén, and Pablo Neruda, and the essayists Alfonso Reyes, Pedro Henríquez Ureña, José Carlos Mariátegui, and Eduardo Mallea. Rómulo Gallegos' novels, as well as Arturo Usler Pietri's and Picón-Salas' essays, are the best Venezuelan contributions to a movement that deeply shaped the first half of the 20th century in all of Latin America.

The topics chosen by Picón-Salas were always related to the definition of a continental identity, a goal he sometimes attained by portraying exemplary historical personages, as in Miranda (1946), Pedro Claver: El santo de los esclavos (1950; Pedro Claver: the saint of the slaves), and Simón Rodríguez (1953). At times he studied aspects of an isolated nationality, as in Intuición de Chile (1935; Intuiting Chile), Comprensión de Venezuela (1949; Understanding Venezuela), and Gusto de México (1952; Savoring Mexico). Finally, he tried to grasp the totality of the New World essence in classic essays such as De la Conquista a la Independencia: Tres siglos de historia cultural latinoamericana (1944; A Cultural History of Spanish America, from Conquest to Independence) and Europa-América: Preguntas a la esfinge de la cultura (1947; Europe/America: questions for the sphinx of culture).

Although his first book, Buscando el camino (1920; In search of a path), was still permeated by the modernista exquisiteness of vocabulary and syntax, Picón-Salas' work opposes the egocentrism he attributed to the turn-of-the-century intellectuals. Interestingly enough, his belief that the essayist must act as a social conscience soon clashed with his own conception of the essay as a genre. In fact, on some occasions Picón-Salas acknowledged Montaigne as the patrono de los ensayistas (patron saint of the essayists), which forced him to try to explain why the French author insisted on referring to his inner world. This desperate endeavor produced shallow and unconvincing conclusions in short texts such as "En torno al ensayo" (1954; On the essay), where Picón-Salas asserts that "Montaigne described in himself the supreme chaos of his time." It is, however, precisely the tension Picón-Salas felt between his private life and his public obligations that fuels the volume considered to be his masterpiece, Regreso de tres mundos (1959; Returning from three worlds), an autobiographical essay that synthesizes his philosophy and his Latin Americanist passion. In this work the representation of the essayistic "I" splits into many different subpersonalities that do not always co-exist harmoniously: the young man from the Venezuelan Andes, the human being, the intellectual, the man from the 20th century, the ambassador, and others. The result is a poignant and dramatic polyphony of viewpoints that surprisingly subverts the monotonous magisterial attitudes typical of other mundonovistas less concerned about the contradictions inherent in their aesthetics.

Juan Liscano, Francisco Rivera, Guillermo Sucre, and Óscar Rodríguez Ortiz, the best Venezuelan essayists of the second half of the 20th century, have always avoided assuming the role of the voice of the people, perhaps taking into account the problematic example set earlier by Picón-Salas, who, nevertheless, is still revered as one of the most influential writers Venezuela has produced.

MIGUEL GOMES

Biography

Born 26 January 1901 in Mérida. Studied privately with a tutor; studied law at the Central University of Venezuela, Caracas, 1920–22; moved to Chile, 1922, living in Santiago for 13 years; studied history in Santiago. Librarian and history professor. Returned to Caracas, 1936. Appointed chargé d'affaires, Prague, 1936–37. Professor in Santiago, 1937–38. Lived in Caracas for four years. Founder and editor, Revista Nacional de Cultura (National review of culture); also contributed to El Nacional, Cultura Universitaria, Sardio, and other journals and newspapers. Traveled to the United States and taught at various colleges and universities, 1941–44. Founder, Faculty of Philosophy and Letters, Central University of Venezuela, Caracas, 1946. Venezuelan ambassador to Colombia, 1947–48, Brazil, 1958–59, UNESCO, Paris, 1959–62, and Mexico, 1962. Organized founding of the Instituto Nacional de Cultura y Bellas Artes (National institute of culture and fine arts), Caracas, 1964 (founded 1965 after his death). Awards: National Prize for Literature, 1954. Member, National Academy of History. Died in Caracas, 1 January 1965.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Buscando el camino, 1920

Hispano-América, posición crítica, 1931

Intuición de Chile y otros ensayos en busca de una conciencia histórica, 1935

Formación y proceso de la literatura venezolana, 1940

1941: Cinco discursos sobre pasado y presente de la nación venezolana, 1940

De la Conquista a la Independencia: Tres siglos de historia cultural latinoamericana, 1944; as A Cultural History of Spanish America, from Conquest to Independence, translated by Irving A. Leonard, 1962

Europa-América: Preguntas a la esfinge de la cultura, 1947

Comprensión de Venezuela, 1949; revised edition, 1955

Dependencia e independencia en la historia hispanoamericana, 1952

Gusto de México, 1952

Suramérica, 1953

Crisis, cambio, tradición: Ensayos sobre la forma de nuestra cultura, 1955

Ensayos escogidos, edited by Juan Loveluck, 1958

Regreso de tres mundos: Un hombre en su generación, 1959

Los malos salvajes: Civilización y política contemporáneas, 1962; as The Ignoble Savages, translated by Herbert Weinstock, 1965

Hora y deshora: Temas humanísticos, Nombres y figuras, Viajes y lugares, 1963

Suma de Venezuela: Antología de páginas venezolanas, 1966

Viejos y Nuevos Mundos, edited by Guillermo Sucre, 1983

Las formas y las visiones: Ensayos sobre arte, edited by Juan Carlos Palenzuela, 1984

Other writings: novels, works on Spanish American cultural history, three biographies, travel, and autobiography.

Further Reading

Azzario, Esther A., La prosa autobiográfica de Mariano Picón-Salas, Caracas: Equinoccio, 1980

Gomes, Miguel, Poéticas del ensayo venezolano del siglo XX, Cranston, Rhode Island: Inti, 1996:121–38

Morin, Thomas D., Mariano Picón Salas, Boston: Twayne, 1979

Rodriguez Ortiz, Óscar, “Picón Salas y la imaginación del presente,” in Placebo, Caracas: Fundarte, 1990:74–80

Rosenblat, Ángel, “Mariano Picón-Salas: El estilo y el hombre,” Thesaurus 20 (1965):201–12

Sucre, Guillermo, Prologue to Viejos y Nuevos Mundos by PicónSalas, Caracas: Ayacucho, 1983:ix-xli

Uslar Pietri, Arturo, “El regreso de los mundos de Mariano PicónSalas,” in his En busca del Nuevo Mundo, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1969:161–67

Plato

Greek, c. 429/427–347 BCE

If Plato is unambiguously one of the greatest philosophers in history, his relation to the art of prose is paradoxical. In dialogues such as the Protagoras and Gorgias, he expresses his suspicion of rhetoric. Yet throughout his works, he demonstrates a masterful command of rhetorical modes, figures, and register, from the formal oration to the colloquial conversation. In works such as the Ion and the second and third books of the Republic, he attacks the power and pretension of literature. Yet his works are realistic dramas, choreographing action and dialogue with the fluency of a playwright. Out of the historical Socrates, he creates one of the most memorable and well-formed characters in Western literature. Finally, in works such as the Cratylus and Phaedrus, he articulates his mistrust of written language. Yet Plato was one of the best stylists of classical Attic Greek prose. Even long works such as the Republic show the care and intricacy of a sonnet. Noting that Plato had a reputation for revision, the ancient critic Dionysus of Halicarnassus observed wryly that “up to his eightieth year Plato never ceased combing and curling and every way braiding his own dialogues.”

The dialogue developed out of Plato’s ambivalence about the limits of written language. The genre imitates the form of the dialectic, preserving the dynamic and open-ended character of conversation. One ancient commentator noted that “just as dialectic compels the soul to reveal the labors it undergoes... so also the dialogue may compel the reader to assent to the things said..." At the same time, it allows Plato to explore issues while suspending any final judgment on his own part. Plato himself is noticeably absent in most of the dialogues.

Plato's philosophical and literary activities extend over a period of 50 years. His works fall into two categories: the letters and the dialogues. Of the letters, 13 are extant. Most are addressed to Dionysus the Tyrant of Syracuse, or to Dionysus' son and successor, Dion, and are concerned with political advice and Plato's aspirations for creating a philosopher-king. Of the dialogues, 26 can be firmly attributed to Plato, with several others of questionable authorship. Looking at shifts in philosophical doctrine and stylistic evidence, scholars divide them loosely into three periods, roughly bounded by his voyages from Athens to Sicily. Thus the Apologia, Crito, Laches, Lysis, Charmides, Euthyphro, Hippias minor, Protagoras, Gorgias, Ion, and perhaps Hippias major belong to the early period before his first trip around 387 BCE. The Meno, Phaedo, Republic, Symposium, Phaedrus, Euthydemus, Menexenus, and Cratylus belong to the middle period, the years of the Academy from 388 to 367 BCE. The late period falls between a second trip to Sicily around 367 and a third trip around 361, and includes the Parmenides, Theaetetus, Sophist, Politicus (Statesman), Timaeus, Critias, Philebus, and Laws.

The dialogues of the first period generally feature Socrates in debate with some antagonist. These tend to focus on moral issues, in which the interlocutor, after whom the dialogue is named, makes a statement, and is then interrogated by Socrates. They are marked by the use of argument and counterargument, and represent the purest form of the Socratic method, the elenctic debate, a via negationis in which Socrates moves toward some understanding or truth by determining what he does not know, even if he cannot establish with certainty what he does know. Both the method and the moral themes closely reflect those attributed to the historical Socrates, but even at this early stage Plato plays an active role in shaping the material. This is evident, for example, when one compares Plato's version of the Apology, Socrates' defense of himself, with the account given by Xenophon.

The dialogues of the middle period take on a different tone. The animated and often hostile format of the debate gives way to more leisurely conversations. In turn, Socratic ignorance and dialectic give way to long stretches of exposition. The Symposium, for instance, Plato's famous examination of love, is in the form of a succession of encomia by a group of friends at a drinking party. Although morality and virtue are important, these dialogues are more concerned with metaphysical issues, including an examination of love, language, and the afterlife. They also develop Plato's theory of forms (or ideas). The work of the third period extends the tendencies of the middle period; the figure of Socrates moves to the background in the Sophist and the Politicus, and disappears altogether in the Laws, replaced by an interlocutor simply identified as "the Athenian." In these late works, Plato is primarily concerned with questions of knowledge, and a critical re-examination of his early ontological doctrines.

The importance of Plato's dialogues was recognized almost immediately. References and allusions to almost every one of them can be found among ancient writers. More importantly, Plato's dialogues created the genre, influencing all subsequent philosophical dialogues from Cicero's Tusculanae disputationes (47–44 BCE), Thomas More's Utopia (1516), and George Berkeley's Three Dialogues Between Hylas and Philonus (1713), to Giacomo Leopardi's Operette morali (1827; Essays and Dialogues), to mention some of the best. While this genre has spawned many imitators, none has surpassed Plato's command of language, the profundity of his thought, or the power of his dramatic invention. If Plato is one of the greatest philosophers, he is also one of the most eloquent.

THOMAS L. COOKSEY

See also Classical Influences

Biography

Born c. 429–427 BCE probably in Athens (possibly in Aegina). Met Socrates c. 407 and became his disciple; after Socrates' execution, 399, Plato went with other Socratic disciples to Megara, then traveled for 12 years, visiting Egypt, Sicily, 390–388, where he met Dionysius I of Syracuse, and Italy, where he met Archytas of Tarentum; began teaching pupils near the grove of Academus outside Athens, 388, and continued until his death; summoned to court of Dionysius II of Syracuse by Dion, the ruler's uncle, 366–365, and by Dionysius II himself, 362–361. Died in Athens in 347 BCE.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose (dialogues in chronological order)

Hippias minor, edited by George Smith, 1895; translated by Floyer Sydenham, 1767, and Robin Waterfield, 1987

Hippias major (authorship questionable), edited by Dorothy Tarrant, 1928; translated by Floyer Sydenham, 1767, Paul Woodruff, 1982, and Robin Waterfield, 1987

Laches, edited by M.T. Tatham, 1888 (reprinted 1966), and F.G. Plaistowe, translated by T.R. Mills, 1898; translated by W.R. M. Lamb (Loeb Edition), 1924, Rosamund Kent Sprague, 1973, and Iain Lane, 1987

Charmides, edited by Richard F. Hipwell, 1951; translated by Rosamund Kent Sprague, 1973, T.G. and G.S. West, 1986, and Donald Watt, 1987

Ion, edited by George Smith, 1895, St. George Stock, 1909, and J. M. Macgregor, 1912; translated by Percy Bysshe Shelley, in The Banquet of Plato and Other Pieces, 1887, W.R.M. Lamb (Loeb Edition), 1925, Lane Cooper, 1938, W.H.D. Rouse, 1956, Paul Woodruff, 1983, and Trevor J. Saunders, 1987

Protagoras, edited by James and A.M. Adam, 1981; several translations, including by W.R.M. Lamb (Loeb Edition), 1924, W.K.C. Guthrie, 1956, B.A.F. Hubbard, 1982, Patrick Coby, 1987, and Stanley Lombardo and Karen Bell, 1992

Euthyphro, edited by C.E. Graves, revised edition, 1935, and C.J. Emlyn-Jones, 1991; several translations, including by Lane Cooper, 1941, Basil Wrighton, 1948, W.D. Woodhead, 1953, John Warrington, 1963, R.E. Allen, 1970, and G.M.A. Grube, 1986

Apologia, edited by Edward Henry Blakeney, 1929, Robin Barrow, 1977, and John Burnet, 1977; many translations, including by Lane Cooper, 1941, Basil Wrighton, 1948, W.H.D. Rouse, 1956, John Warrington, 1963, R.E. Allen, 1980, G.M.A. Grube, 1986, and Thomas C. Brickhouse, 1989

- Crito*, edited by John Burnet, 1977, and James Adam, 1988; many translations, including by Lane Cooper, 1941, Basil Wrighton, 1948, W.H.D.Rouse, 1956, John Warrington, 1963, A.D. Woozley, 1979, R.E.Allen, 1980, and G.M.A.Grube, 1986
- Phaedo*, edited by C.J.Rowe, 1994; many translations, including by Lane Cooper, 1941, Basil Wrighton, 1948, G.M.A.Grube, 1977, John Burnet, 1979, and R.Larson, 1980
- Gorgias*, edited by E.R.Dodds, 1959, revised edition, 1990; translated by W.R.M.Lamb (Loeb Edition), 1932, Lane Cooper, 1938, W.Hamilton, 1960, Terence Irwin, 1980, and D. J.Zeyl, 1986
- Meno*, edited by R.S.Bluck, 1961, and A.Sesonske and N. Fleming, 1965; several translations, including by W.R.M. Lamb (Loeb Edition), 1924, W.K.C.Guthrie, 1956, W.H. D. Rouse, 1956, R.W.Sharpley, 1985, and G.M.A.Grube, 1986
- Lysis*, translated by W.R.M.Lamb (Loeb Edition), 1932, David Bolotin, 1979, Donald Watt, 1987, and Benjamin Jowett and E. O'Connor, 1991
- Menexenus*, edited and translated by T.R.Mills, 1902; several translations, including by Percy Bysshe Shelley, in The Banquet of Plato and Other Pieces, 1887, and A.S.Way, 1934
- Euthydemus*, edited by G.H.Wells, 1881, and E.H.Gifford, 3 vols., 1905; translated by W.R.M.Lamb, 1924, Rosamund Kent Sprague, 1972, and Robin Waterfield, 1987
- Cratylus*, edited by G.Pasquali, 1908; translated by Thomas Taylor, 1793
- Symposium*, edited by R.G.Bury, 1973, and K.J.Dover, 1980; many translations, including by W.R.M.Lamb (Loeb Edition), 1932, Lane Cooper, 1938, W.H.D.Rouse, 1956, R.Larson, 1980, Tom Griffith, 1986, A.Nehamas and Paul Woodruff, 1989, R.E.Allen, 1991, and Robin Waterfield, 1994
- Republic*, edited by James Adam, revised by D.A.Rees, 2 vols., 1963, and Allan Bloom, 1968; several translations, including by P.Shorey (Loeb Edition), 2 vols., 1930–35, W.H.D.Rouse, 1956, I.A.Richards, 1966, G.M.A.Grube, 1974, revised by C. D.C.Reeve, 1992, Richard W.Sterling and William C.Scott, 1985, and Robin Waterfield, 1993
- Parmenides*, translated by A.E.Taylor, 1934, Francis M.Cornford, 1939, John Warrington, 1961, R.E.Allen, 1983, and Glenn R. Morrow and John M.Dillon, 1987
- Theaetetus*, edited by Lewis Campbell, 2nd edition, 1883; several translations, including by H.N.Fowler (Loeb Edition), 1921, Seth Benardete, 1986, and Robin Waterfield, 1987
- Phaedrus*, edited by W.H.Thompson, 1868; several translations, including by Lane Cooper, 1938, Robin Waterfield, 1982, and C. J.Rowe, 1986
- Sophist*, translated by H.N.Fowler (Loeb Edition), 1921, Francis M.Cornford, 1935, A.E.Taylor, 1961, John Warrington, 1961, and Seth Benardete, 1986
- Statesman*, translated by H.N.Fowler (Loeb Edition), 1925, A.E. Taylor, 1961, John Warrington, 1961, and Seth Benardete, 1986; as Politicus, translated by J.B.Skemp, 1952
- Philebus*, translated by F.Sydenham, 1767, R.Hackforth, 1945, A. E.Taylor, 1956, J.C.B.Gosling, 1975, and Robin Waterfield, 1982
- Timaeus*, edited by Christopher Gill, 1980; several translations, including by R.G.Bury (Loeb Edition), 1929, A.E.Taylor, 1929, Francis M.Cornford, 1937, and John Warrington, 1965
- Critias*, edited by C.Gill, 1981; translated by A.E.Taylor, 1929, and H.D.P.Lee, 1971
- Laws*, edited by E.B.England, 2 vols., 1921; translated by R.G. Bury (Loeb Edition), 2 vols., 1926, A.E.Taylor, 1934, Trevor S. Saunders, 1970, and Thomas L.Pangle, 1988 [Dialogues], edited by John Burnet, 5 vols., 1900–07; edited and translated by R.E.Allen,

- 3 vols., 1985–96; translated by Benjamin Jowett, 4 vols., 1868–71, Henry Cary, 1900, H.N. Fowler and others (Loeb Edition), 12 vols., 1914–29; Collected Dialogues (including Letters), edited by Edith Hamilton and Huntington Cairns, translated by Lane Cooper and others, 1961
- The Portable Plato* (selected dialogues), translated by Benjamin Jowett, 1948; edited by Scott M. Buchanan, 1977
- The Death of Socrates: An Interpretation of the Platonic Dialogues*, translated by Basil Wrighton, 1948
- Socratic Dialogues* (selection), edited and translated by W.D. Woodhead, 1953
- Great Dialogues of Plato*, edited by Eric H. Warmington and Philip G. Rouse, translated by W.H.D. Rouse, 1967; revised edition, 1970
- Five Dialogues*, translated by G.M.A. Grube, 1986
- Early Socratic Dialogues*, edited by Trevor J. Saunders, translated by Saunders, Iain Lane, Donald Watt, and Robin Waterfield, 1987
- The Roots of Political Philosophy: Ten Forgotten Socratic Dialogues*, edited and translated by Thomas L. Pangle, 1987
- Collected works editions: Works, translated by Thomas Taylor and Floyer Sydenham, 5 vols., 1804, reprinted 1995– (in progress); Platonis opere (Clarendon Edition), edited by E.A. Duke and others, 1995– (in progress).

Bibliographies

- McKirahan, Richard D., Plato and Socrates: A Comprehensive Bibliography, 1958–1973, New York: Garland, 1978
- Saunders, Trevor J., A Bibliography on Plato's "Laws," 1920–1970, with Additional Citations Through May 1975, New York: Arno Press, 1976

Further Reading

- Brandwood, Leonard, The Chronology of Plato's Dialogues, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1990
- Brickhouse, Thomas C., and Nicholas D. Smith, Plato's Socrates, New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1994
- Frede, M., "Plato's Arguments and the Dialogue Form," in Oxford Studies in Ancient Philosophy, supplement, edited by Julia Annas and Robert H. Grimm, Oxford: Clarendon Press, and New York: Oxford University Press, 1988:201–19
- Friedländer, Paul, Plato: An Introduction, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1973 (original edition, 1928)
- Grube, G.M.A., The Greek and Roman Critics, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, and London: Methuen, 1965
- Guthrie, W.K.C., A History of Greek Philosophy, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 4 vols., 1962–71
- Hadas, Moses, Ancilla to Classical Reading, New York: Columbia University Press, 1961 (original edition, 1954)
- Havelock, Eric A., Preface to Plato, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1982 (original edition, 1962)

- Irwin, Terence, Plato's Ethics, New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1995
- Kahn, C.H., "Did Plato Write Socratic Dialogues?" Classical Quarterly 31 (1981):305–20
- Lesky, Albin, A History of Greek Literature, New York: Crowell, and London: Methuen, 1966 (original German edition, 1959)
- Morgan, Michael L., Platonic Piety: Philosophy and Ritual in Fourth-Century Athens, New Haven, Connecticut and London: Yale University Press, 1990
- Vlastos, Gregory, editor, Plato: A Collection of Critical Essays, Garden City, New York: Anchor, and London: Macmillan, 2 vols., 1972
- Vlastos, Gregory, Socrates: Ironist and Moral Philosopher, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, and Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991

Plutarch

Greek, c. 46–c. 120/125 CE

Although Plutarch was Greek, he was as familiar with the history and culture of Rome as he was with that of his native land. A disciple of Plato and Aristotle, he nevertheless had his own views of humanity and expressed them in his works. He was a prolific and varied writer who produced two extensive collections of essays, Moralia (Morals) and Vitae parallelae (Parallel lives; translated simply as Lives).

The Morals reveals Plutarch's personal interests as well as his scholarly knowledge of a wide range of subjects. Using the forms of dialogue, letter, and diatribe, he is ever the lecturer on human weaknesses and problems, but always with an optimistic turn of mind that provides the reader with the solace that such weaknesses and problems do have answers if one will just look for them. These essays are a pleasure to read not only for their style, but also for their wide variety of topics, such as the education of children, how to distinguish between flattery and true friendship, the significance of Isis and Osiris in Egyptian mythology, the genius of Socrates, rules for husband and wife, the eating of meat, whether water or fire is more useful, and superstition. Although some are long and can be difficult to read, they nevertheless reflect a broad familiarity with literature and history and a keen insight into many human concerns, both esoteric and practical. Often referred to as a "physician of the soul," Plutarch probably wrote more on moral topics than any other writer of ancient times.

As interesting as Morals may be, however, it is the Lives for which Plutarch is best known. These are biographical essays on illustrious Greeks and Romans produced in successive books probably between 105 and 115 CE. The essays are paired, one Greek and one Roman. Plutarch's primary concern is not with history or politics specifically, but with the personal aspects of his subjects, particularly the ways their qualities and virtues might serve as guides for himself and his readers. "It was for the sake of others that I first began to write biographies," he says, "but I find myself continuing to do it for my own."

Although he understood human nature well, Plutarch had in him more than a touch of the romantic. An accomplished storyteller, he seeks to reflect the truth in his essays, at least as he sees it. Admitting, for example, that “nothing can be said of Lycurgus, the lawgiver of Sparta, which is not open to dispute,” he goes on to say that he will nevertheless “endeavor to write a history of his life, following the statements which are least contradicted and depending upon the authors who are most worthy of belief.” In this way, then, Plutarch approaches all of the Lives.

While the subjects of Plutarch’s Lives left their imprints on their times, he writes about them from his own moral point of view. Like most biographers, he does not try to hide that perspective, thus adding to the interest and readability of the Lives. Plutarch seeks to bring out those aspects of his characters’ lives that, while they may seem minor in some cases, are in his mind just as important as heroic exploits in illustrating virtues and vices. “I must,” he says, “be allowed to dwell especially on things that express the souls of these men, and through them portray their lives, leaving it to others to describe their mighty deeds and battles.”

Not only does Plutarch skillfully balance Greek with Roman, he also balances the weaknesses and strengths, as he sees them, of his subjects. Themistocles, on the one hand, might be an ambitious person hungry for fame and a keen moneymaker; yet on the other, he was liked by all the people, “for he called every citizen by name, and would act as a safe and a fair judge in private disputes between citizens.”

When he comes to Alexander and Caesar, Plutarch finds himself with “such an abundance of material that I shall make no other preface but to beg my readers not to complain of me if I do not relate all their celebrated exploits... I am writing not histories but lives, and a man’s most conspicuous achievements do not always reveal best his strength or his weakness.” Likening himself to a portrait painter, he points out that he must be allowed to go beyond the mere faces of his subjects and to “dwell especially on things that express the souls of these men.” That statement probably best describes the strategy and the goal that Plutarch had in writing the Lives.

Although Plutarch is ever the moralist in the Lives, he presents an education in Greek and Roman history that surpasses any other extant ancient work. That the work has been read and has influenced other writers for almost 2000 years attests not only to the superb research and tremendous effort that Plutarch put into its creation, but also the vitality and spirit of his narrative style and to his love for humankind.

WILTON ECKLEY

See also Classical Influences

Biography

Born Lucius (?) Mestrius Plutarchus, c. 46 CE in Chaeronea, Boeotia, central Greece. Studied in Athens, mid-60s. Married Timoxena: at least four sons and one daughter. Lectured in Rome and visited Egypt; priest at Delphi, and helped revive the shrine there; held numerous municipal posts in Chaeronea; possibly made a procurator by the emperor Hadrian. Died c. 120–25 CE.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

- Moralia*, edited by H.Wegehaupt and others, 1925–; as Morals, various translators, 5 vols., 1684–94, revised by W.W.Goodwin, 5 vols., 1874–78; also translated by Frank G.Babbitt and others (Loeb Edition), 15 vols., 1927–69, and Harold Cherniss, 1976; selections translated by T.G.Tucker and A.O.Prickard, 2 vols., 1913–18, Rex Warner, 1971, Robin Waterfield, 1992, and Donald Russell, 1993
- Vitae parallelae*, edited by K.Ziegler and C.Lindskog, 8 vols., 1926–39, revised edition, 4 vols., 1957–80, and by Robert Flaceliere and others, 1957–; as Lives, translated by Thomas North, 1579; edited in translation by John Dryden, 5 vols., 1683–86, revised by A.H.Clough, 1900; also translated by Oliver Goldsmith and Joseph Collyer, 5 vols., 1762 (abridged version), J. and W.Langhorne, 6 vols., 1770, and Bernadotte Perrin (Loeb Edition), 11 vols., 1914–26; selections translated by G.Long, 5 vols., 1844–48, W.R.Frazer, 1906, Aubrey Stewart and G.Long, 1906, C.E.Byres, 1907, T.G.Tucker, 1913, Moses Hadas, 1957, Rex Warner, 1958 (revised edition, 1972), Ian Scott-Kilvert, 1960–73, and Richard J.A.Talbert, 1988

Further Reading

- Barrow, R.H., Plutarch and His Times, London: Chatto and Windus, and Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1967
- Berry, Edmund, Emerson's Plutarch, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1961
- DeLacey, Phillip, "Biography and Tragedy in Plutarch," American Journal of Philology 73 (April 1952):159–71
- Gianakaris, C.J., Plutarch, New York: Twayne, 1970
- Helmbold, W.C., and E.N.O'Neil, Plutarch's Quotations, Baltimore: American Philological Association, 1959
- Jones, Christopher P., Plutarch and Rome, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1971
- Oakesmith, John, The Religion of Plutarch, London and New York: Longman Green, 1902
- Rose, H.J., Introductory Essays to the Roman Questions of Plutarch, New York: Arno Press, 1975 (original edition, 1924)
- Russell, D.A., Plutarch, New York: Scribner, and London: Duckworth, 1973
- Stadter, P.A., Plutarch's Historical Methods: An Analysis of the Mulerium Virtutes, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1965
- Tracy, H.L., "Notes on Plutarch's Biographical Method," Classical Journal 37 (1941–42):213–21
- Trench, Richard C., Plutarch: His Lives and His Morals, London: Macmillan, 1873

The Poetic Art

by Horace, written c. 12–8 BCE

The centrality of the poetic epistle to the Pisos by Horace (65–8 BCE), Epistula ad Pisones, popularly known as Ars poetica or The Poetic Art, to Western literary theory is partly adduced by the number of concepts and phrases from it that have passed into standard usage by critics, often unacknowledged. Whenever we speak of a misplaced eloquence as a “purple patch,” or of epic poets beginning “in medias res”; whenever we speak of poetry’s purpose to “delight and instruct,” or excuse a poet’s error by saying that “Homer nods,” or refer to the revision process as taking the writing “back to the anvil,” we are borrowing from Horace’s Ars poetica.

Ars poetica is cast in the form of a sermo, or verse epistle, which gives the poem a remarkably conversational style. It seems to ramble, as conversation does, though many readers have discerned a structure beneath the apparent randomness. If an early commentator was right in asserting that the work originated as an informal commentary on the maxims of Neoptolemus of Parium, then that may account for its unstructured appearance. Addressed to the aristocratic Piso family, a father and two sons (although there is some debate as to which Pisos are meant), the verse essay offers practical advice on poetry to would-be poets. It is important to keep in mind the practical nature of its putative intention, for while it has rightly taken its place as a classic of literary criticism, it pretends to be more of a how-to manual for writers.

The admonitory nature of the work heightens its sense of audience. Many lines are simple imperatives: “Don’t begin like this”; “let no god intervene”; “handle your Greek models day and night.” Periodic vocatives keep the intended audience in the text, referring to all three as “Pisos,” “writers,” or “Sons of Pompilius.” Horace’s frequent use of second-person pronouns and verb forms creates an intimate tone, especially when he uses the vos to distinguish his chosen readers from the rabble, as in his discussion of Plautus, whom “your ancestors praised” though “you and I know how to tell crudity from wit.”

Yet as much as these techniques contributed to conversational effect, and as much as Ars poetica is ultimately a poem and not a treatise, it yields to most readers a coherent rhetorical structure beneath the seemingly random talk. Because his transitions are gradual, and bridge topics by seeming to apply now to the preceding, now to the following, the divisions in Horace’s treatise are not universally agreed upon. But allowing some leeway of a few lines in either direction, general sections can be distinguished. The first 40 lines are an introduction of sorts, but introduce a critical principle of unity. The wouldbe poet is advised to leave out of his poem any element that is inconsonant with the poem as a whole. Lines 40–118 discuss order and style: Horace rejects a reigning dictum against neologisms, though he urges caution in coining new words; metrical patterns should be appropriate to the poetic type; the poet must truly feel what he wants his reader to feel.

Lines 119–294 suggest how to organize larger poems, and categorize their generic types. Much of the structural advice echoes Aristotle’s Poetics: begin in the middle of the action; insure a beginning, middle, and end; keep violence offstage; avoid the artificial deus ex machina. The poet’s models for subject and meter should be Greek, says Horace; revise carefully over a long period of time. The final section, lines 295 to the end, entertains specific questions about literary criticism. This section begins with Horace’s relinquishing of the title of poet, in order to introduce the distinction between poet and critic—an irony since, as a work of criticism, the letter to the Pisos takes a writer’s point of view rather than a critic’s. After a lament that Romans can count money better than poetic meter, Horace lays down his famous principle: poetry must delight and instruct. He admits, however, that even Homer fails to delight at times; it is inevitable in longer poems.

The concluding pronouncements (if indeed the poem as we have it is complete) concern revision: the Pisos are enjoined to put each work away for nine years, to avoid making public something that will embarrass them later; the poem should be “returned to the anvil” for reshaping. The issue of revision brings in the controversy of art versus nature: is the hard work of revision necessary for a work of genius? Is poetic skill inborn or acquired? To Horace, both innate genius and craftsmanship are needed to make great poetry.

The poem ends rather abruptly with a satiric attack on mad poets who inflict their poetry on unwilling readers. The suddenness of the ending has led many readers to consider the poem a fragment, yet the end comes no more suddenly than the ends of Horace’s other epistles; the abruptness is a part of the conversational style. When we consider also that The Poetic Art is longer than any other poem by Horace, there is no reason to believe that we do not have the whole of it.

The sound, practical advice in Horace’s Poetic Art dominated literary theory in Europe into the 19th century. It continues to exert a strong influence, and its easy, intimate style makes it more accessible to the modern audience than virtually any other classical essay.

JOHN R.HOLMES

See also Classical Influences

Editions

Ars poetica, edited and translated by A.F.Watt, 1905, and edited by C.O.Brink, 1971; as Ars poetica, translated by H.R. Fairclough (Loeb Edition), 1926, R.C.Trevelyan, 1940, Burton Raffel, 1974, and Niall Rudd, 1989; as The Poetic Art, translated and adapted by C.H.Sisson, 1975

Further Reading

Brink, C.O., Horace on Poetry, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1963
 Commager, Steele, The Odes of Horace: A Critical Study, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1962
 Costa, C.D.N., editor, Horace, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1973

Fraenkel, Eduard, Horace, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1957

Lee, M.Owen, Word, Sound, and Image in the Odes of Horace, Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, and Toronto: Clark Irwin, 1969

Rudd, Niall, The Satires of Horace: A Study, Berkeley: University of California Press, and Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1966

West, David Alexander, Reading Horace, Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1967

Polemical Essay

Bernard Quémada (1980) noted that in the essay, the subject matter is treated through successive approaches, and generally by using methods or viewpoints that are put to a test. Marc Lits (1994) has pointed out that this idea of the confrontation of different approaches is an essential characteristic of the genre, more important and relevant than the notions of modesty or superficiality usually advanced. In considering the polemical essay, we are brought back to the analysis carried out by Dominique Maingueneau in Sémantique de la polémique (1983). Polemic constitutes a means for reinforcing its own enclosure by exposing itself to an imagined, threatening Other. Polemic, like other forms of the essay, would appear to operate in a discursive niche of confrontation, openness, and redefinition.

As Marc Angenot (1982) observed, polemic, like the pamphlet or the satire, presupposes the demonstration of a thesis and the refutation or disqualification of an opposing thesis. In this sense, polemical and other essay forms would appear to share common ground. If polemic commits itself, it is because the polemicist presupposes—whatever the gap separating the views at issue—that the opposing argument is underpinned by shared premises, on the basis of which it can be refuted. It is in this manner that polemic marks itself out from satirical prose. Satire deliberately denies a contrary view any rational basis. Although both satire and polemic, to varying degrees, imply a persuasive function and an aggressive function, the polemicist, however hostile he shows himself or herself to be, must technically be able to construct the antithesis, and rework his or her assertions in order to achieve the intended effect of rejection.

Among the many variations of the essay, the place successfully taken by the polemical essay is directly linked to the development of journalism. The work of Joseph Addison and Richard Steele on the Spectator is traditionally cited as the defining moment in the development, during the 18th century, of the essay as a periodical-based genre. When it became part of journalism, the essay became lighter, less philosophical and serious. The rapid growth of the press was henceforth to give many essayists an opportunity to express themselves in the political and satirical arenas. Taking France as an example, from the Third Republic to May 1968, and considering the Dreyfus affair on the way, a tradition of violent confrontations has been forged, with close links to the press. Among the outstanding French polemical writers, mention might be made of Henri de Rochefort, Émile Zola, Léon Daudet, Édouard Drumont, Louis-Ferdinand Céline, and Jean-Paul Sartre. But it must also be acknowledged that although current editorial pages have, to a certain extent, replaced the polemical essay, the genre has, additionally, experienced a certain loss of vitality. By going back to Julien Benda's La Trahison des clercs (1927; The Treason of the Intellectuals), Marc Angenot has shown that here we may uncover what characterizes the existential position of the modern pamphleteer: a feeling of detachment with regard to a set of perverse and scandalous practices, in which resentment and twilight prophetism are combined. On a formal level, everything indicates the neutral objectivity typical of the cognitive essay. Perhaps this formal neutrality, for journalism, too, has replaced outright polemic.

BENOÎT GREVISSE

Bibliography

Baskerville, Edward J., A Chronological Bibliography of Propaganda and Polemic Published in English Between 1553 and 1558, Philadelphia: American Philosophical Society, 1979

Further Reading

Angenot, Marc, Contribution à la parole pamphlétaire: Typologie des discours modernes, Paris: Payot, 1982

Barbey d'Aurevilly, Jules, Journalistes et polémistes, chroniqueurs et pamphlétares, Geneva: Slatkine Reprints, 1968 (original edition, 1895)

Bertaut, Jules, Chroniqueurs et polémistes, Paris: Sansot, 1906

Billy, André, Les Écrivains de combat, Paris: Les Œuvres Représentatives, 1931

Boyce, Benjamin, The Polemic Character, 1640–1661: A Chapter in English Literary History, Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1955

Burgess, Glenn, "Protestant Polemic: The Leveller Pamphlets," Parergon 11, no. 2 (1993):45–67

Corns, Thomas N., "Archetypal Mystification: Polemic and Reality in English Political Literature, 1640–1750," Eighteenth-Century Life 7, no. 3 (1982):1–27

Corns, Thomas N., "The Literature of Controversy: Polemical Strategy from Milton to Junius," Prose Studies 9, no. 2 (1986)

Daudet, Léon, Flammes: Polémiques et polémistes, Paris: Grasset, 1930

Dominique, Pierre, Les Polémistes français depuis 1789, Paris: La Colombe, 1962.

Kerbrat-Orecchioni, Catherine, L'Énonciation de la subjectivité dans le langage, Paris: Colin, 1980

Lits, Marc, L'Essai, Brussels: Hatier, 1994

Maingueneau, Dominique, Sémantique de la polémique: Discours religieux et ruptures idéologiques au XVIIe siècle, Lausanne: L'Âge d'Homme, 1983

Moore, Evelyn Knopp, Lessing's Theory of Polemic (dissertation), Urbana: University of Illinois, 1990

Propaganda in England and France: Polemic, Art, and Literature, edited by James Leheny, Eighteenth-Century Life 7, no. 3 (1981)

Quémada, Bernard, Trésor de la langue française: Dictionnaire de la langue du XIXe et du XXe siècle (1789–1960), vol. 8, Paris: CNRS, 1980

Revel, Jean-François, Qu'est-ce que la polémique?, Paris: Pauvert, 1966

Thrash, Cheryl Haines, The Polemical Body in Seventeenth-Century Toleration Tracts (dissertation), Atlanta: Emory University, 1992

Watson, George, The Certainty of Literature: Essays in Polemic, New York: St. Martin's Press, 1989

Polish Essay

The beginnings of the Polish essay can be traced back to Renaissance secular moral treatises. Mikołaj Rej (1505–69) with Wizerunek własny żywota człowieka poczciwego (1558; A faithful image of an honest man) and Lukasz Górnicki (1527–1603) with Dworzanin Polski (1566; The Polish courtier) initiated a productive trend in Polish nonfiction prose that is concerned with the moral and intellectual perfection of man. The 17th century contributed to laying the foundations of the essay genre with a few original works, all of which were published for the first time only in the 19th century: Jan Chryzostom Pasek's (c. 1636–c. 1701) Pamiętniki (wr. 1690–95, pub. 1839; Memoirs), Stanisław Zoikiewski's (1547–1620) diary, entitled Początek i progres wojny moskiewskiej (wr. 1612, pub. 1833; Beginning and progress of the Muscovite war), and King Jan Sobieski's (1629–96) letters to his French-born wife Mariette, Listy do Marysienki (wr. 1664–83, pub. 1823; Letters to Marysienka). In a distinctively critical and often satirical tone, the Renaissance theme of human perfection was pursued in Enlightenment essays published in the popular social-political and cultural magazine Monitor (1765–85).

With early Romanticism, the first refined Polish essayist and literary critic appeared: Maurycy Mochnacki (1804–34), known for his study O literaturze polskiej w wieku dziewiętnastym (1830; On Polish literature in the 19th century). Although in mature Romanticism prose was supplanted by poetry and drama, this period was also important for the genre of the essay. It was a time of the accumulation of problems and issues bound up with national identity which were to inspire essay writers in the 20th century. This period was dominated spiritually by the so-called “Wielka Emigracja” (Great emigrants) in Paris (after the November Uprising of 1831, 6000 of its leaders were forced into exile), responsible for creating the model of the emigre writer: one who is sensitive to the present and obligated to the future of his homeland. Polish messianism and nationalism as a uniting force in the period from the Third Partition of Poland (1795) until its liberation (1918) and the image of the poet as a prophet and spiritual leader of the nation are Romantic themes still vital in the public discourse.

At the beginning of the 20th century the Romantic ideals were reconsidered and revised by essayists like Stanisław Brzozowski (1878–1911), Tadeusz Żelenski (Boy) (1874–1941), and Karol Irzykowski (1873–1944). In his Legenda Młodej Polski (1910; Legend of young Poland), Brzozowski criticized Polish neo-Romanticism for its “lazy” aestheticism and decadence of the will, which he viewed as a revival of the weaknesses of Romanticism. According to Brzozowski (influenced by Marx and Nietzsche), it was the will to persuade and to change society—that is, the “strong side” of Polish Romanticism—which was to be cherished. The entertaining French-style essays of Boy-Żeleński (the translator of Montaigne's Essais into Polish) challenged Polish Romantic myths from the “common sense” point of view. Irzykowski in his Walka otreść (1929; The struggle for contents) opposed both Żeleński's cult of “real life” as a point of reference for literature and the theory of pure form advocated by Stanisław Ignacy Witkiewicz (1885–1939). Against these, Irzykowski urges writers to go beyond unquestioned meanings and to remove the “masks” that hide reality. These three authors represent different styles in essay writing. The witty and elegant essays of Boy-Żeleński, popular among liberals and anticlericals, are considered to be an influential promotion of French rationalist thought and of the French incarnation of the essay genre. Brzozowski in his turn was, above all, an intricate thinker concerned with ultimate questions of human existence; consequently, his was a serious, laconic style with broad allusions and no jesting whatsoever. To Irzykowski, the essay was mainly a vehicle for detailed critical analysis, incompatible with any generalizations or wittiness. Subsequently, the Polish essay developed within the wide and fruitful space between Boy-Żeleński and Brzozowski.

The interwar period favored the genre of the essay in two ways. On the one hand, after centuries of struggle for national independence, Poland was liberated in 1918 and the pressure of the national problem was diminished. The attention of Polish essayists then switched to a variety of cultural and philosophical problems peculiar to European civilization. On the other hand, the classical orientation of the high school educational system of the first decade of the 20th century, preserved after World War I, created a fertile environment for the emergence of both writers and a readership with humanistic erudition. Jerzy Stempowski's (1893–1969) work is the best example of this new stage in the development of the Polish essay. In the interwar period Stempowski was published in all the popular literary and cultural journals, with writings on the relation between literature (especially the avant-garde) and the ongoing economic and social changes (Chimera jako zwierzę pociągowe [1933; Chimera as a beast of burden]; Literatura w okresie wielkiej przebudowy [1935; Literature in the period of great rebuilding]). His main concern, however—the decline of European civilization—was spelled out later, in the volume Eseje dla Kasandry (1961; Essays for Cassandra). Two interwar essayists—Bolesław Miciński (1911–43) and Stanisław Vincenz (1888–1971)—were the most truthful to the spirit of Stempowski's essays. Miciński, an antagonist of academic philosophy, took his own metaphysical experiences as subject matter for his essays. His Podróże do piekieł (1938; Journeys to hell) and Portret Kanta (1947; Portrait of Kant) are built around great historical figures of European thought, mythology, and literature and are influenced by Freudian psychology. Vincenz, who wrote essays on Homer and Dante as well, is known mainly for his three-volume book Na wysokiej potoninie (vol. 1, 1936; On the High Uplands; vols. 2 and 3 were published in the 1970s), a collection of stories and myths of the Carpathian Huculs written in the spirit of Homeric epic. Vincenz's narrative is a characteristic example of the so-called “talk” or gawenda style of storytelling, similar to the Russian skaz, viewed by Czesław Miłosz and Marta Wyka as a typically Polish feature of the essay. Jan Parandowski (1895–1978) popularized the ancient heritage of European civilization through adaptations of Greek mythology, the Iliad, and the Odyssey, and through his travel essays Rzym czarodziejski (1924; The enchanting Rome) and Dwie wiosny (1927; Two springs). He also penned one of the best examples of the biographical essay, Króć życia (1930; The king of life), about Oscar Wilde.

In the interwar period, with its abundance of cultural events, literary periodicals, and visions for the future of independent Poland, the essay ceased to be an auxiliary form of expression for poets and novelists and began to enjoy its “full rights” as a genre with well-developed varieties: the literary, historical, biographical, or philosophical essay, the memoir, and the manifesto. Polish essayists saw themselves as members of the international community of humanists, called upon to preserve and popularize the European cultural heritage and to apply its standards to their contemporary culture. Most of them felt as much citizens of Europe as Poles. They lived in different countries, but wrote mainly in Polish, and for the Polish public. Poets and novelists, philosophers and painters—all reached for the genre of the essay to present their innovative theories of literature and art. Stanisław Ignacy Witkiewicz, a painter, playwright, novelist, and philosopher, promoted his avant-garde doctrine on the pure form in art in Nowe formy w malarstwie i wynikające stąd nieporozumienia (1919; On the new forms in painting and on the resulting misunderstanding) and Szkice estetyczne (1912.; Essays on aesthetics), and especially in his prophetic anticipation of the theater of the absurd, Teatr: Wstęp do czystej formy w teatrze (1923; Theater: introduction to pure form in the theater). Bruno Schulz (1892–1942.), whose cycles of poetic stories are the most original phenomenon in interwar prose, also published an essay about poetry as a regeneration of the elemental myths hidden within the words themselves (“Mityzacja rzeczywistości” [1936; Mythologizing reality]) and essays on contemporary Polish and foreign authors, among which are his particularly persuasive interpretations of Gombrowicz and Kafka. The logician and painter Leon Chwistek (1884–1944), in his essay Wielość rzeczywistości (1921; The plurality of reality), elaborated on the idea that there are four kinds of non-interfering realities expressed by different artistic approaches (primitivist, naturalist, impressionist, and futurist).

In 1939, after only two decades of independence, the western border of Poland was invaded by the German army and its eastern border by the Russians. World War II (which took six million Polish lives) again thrust Polish culture into an abnormal situation. The rethinking of the experience of war and occupation, of the German and Russian concentration camps, and of the Holocaust naturally came to dominate postwar prose. However, the critical consequence that the war and the subsequent establishment of communist rule had for literary culture was the division of Polish writers once more, as in the 19th century, into an émigré wing and a domestic wing. They faced different social environments, wrote for different readerships, saw their calling differently, and chose different genres to fulfill their intellectual responsibilities and their artistic cravings.

Paradoxically, this situation, unfavorable for the national literature as a whole, in exile brought about the golden age of the Polish essay. Stempowski (now under the pseudonym Paweł Hostowiec), Miciński, and Vincenz reflected on the decadence of European civilization, seeking the cure for it in antiquity. The decline of humanistic values is one of the leading themes of the essays of Czesław Miłosz (1911–), who emphasizes the moral dimensions of this crisis. Along with the originality of Miłosz’s essays, the peculiar development of the contemporary Polish essay is manifest in Witold Gombrowicz’s (1904–69) Dziennik (1953–69; Diary) and Gustaw Herling-Grudzinski's (1919–) Dziennik pisany nocą (1969–; Journal written at night, translated as Volcano and Miracle), both published by the Paris-based émigré monthly Kultura (1947–; Culture). Although the overwhelmingly playful element in Gombrowicz's "diary" and the erudite reflections in Grudziński's "journal" represent two opposite approaches to the writing of nonfiction, both authors exemplify one of the main genre characteristics of the essay—subjectivity. The journal form they employ is to some extent a matter of convenience (they write for a monthly magazine), but it also allows them to exploit fully another peculiarity of the essay—its link with the spirit of the present time. Both journals can be read as a process of self-construction of the narrator's image (including some mystification) and as a response to the most urgent problems of contemporary European culture, of Poland under communist rule, and of Eastern European intellectuals in exile. The potential of this "hybrid" between the essay and the diary was revealed by Miłosz in Rok Myśliwego (1990; A Year of the Hunter), Aleksander Wat (1900–67) in Mój wiek (wr. 1963–65, pub. 1977; My Century), Andrzej Bobkowski (1913–61) in Szkice piórkiem (1957; Sketches with a quill), Kazimierz Wierzyński (1894–1969) in Moja prywatna Ameryka (1966; My private America), and Marek Htasko (1934–69) in Piękni dwudziestoletni (The beautiful 20 year old), published in the second half of the 1960s in Kultura.

The circumstances of exile—a familiar Romantic theme—were discussed by most Polish émigré writers. Some of them, like Gombrowicz and Herling-Grudzinski, were inclined to see their situation in a positive light. Gombrowicz considered the exile of the artist to be a universal problem; Herling believed that a writer in exile, being free to express himself, is much better off than a writer under totalitarian rule. Czesław Miłosz in his Nobel Lecture (1980) and other essays is concerned with the dramatic choices and compromises forced onto a writer in exile. The most critical of these compromises is, of course, the language—an issue discussed by Stanisław Barańczak (1946–) in a few of his essays collected in Breathing Under Water (1990). Józef Wittlin (1896–1976) in "Blaski i nędze wygnania" (1957; "Sorrow and Grandeur of Exile") discusses both the positive and the negative sides of the problem. Exile does not seem to be so unbearable to the philosopher Leszek Kolakowski (1927–), who responded by becoming a citizen of the world, convincingly demonstrated by his essays in Modernity on Endless Trial (1990). This also holds true for the theater critic Jan Kott (1914–), who published the representative English selection of Polish essays Four Decades of Polish Essays (1990).

Until 1978, when samizdat (underground publishing) rendered émigré literature accessible to the domestic audience, the reception of emigre publications was relatively limited. In the 1980s, however, the presence of emigre essayists on the home literary market became one of the important motors of the movement toward the abolition of the communist system. In their native country, authors in exile were read as moral authorities. The process of uniting two wings of Polish literature, however, took more than a decade, for the whole system of literary and moral values had to be revised. Several essayists who remained in Poland during the communist era (although some were eventually forced to emigrate in the 1980s) survived the test of the new epoch: the poet and master of the travel essay Zbigniew Herbert (1924–), Kazimierz Wyka (1910–75), Mieczysław Jastrun (1903–83), who wrote on literature, the science-fiction writer and philosopher Stanisław Lem (1921–), and the historian and politician Adam Michnik (1946–).

At the end of the 20th century the essay genre is a vital trend in Polish literature—now finally united—and enjoys the constant attention of a wide readership. Along with poetry, the essay represents Polish culture abroad and is the preferred form for discussion of the cultural and moral problems of the period of transition to a free market economy.

KATIA MITOVA-JANOWSKI

Anthology

Four Decades of Polish Essays, edited by Jan Kott, Evanston, Illinois: Northwestern University Press, 1990

Further Reading

Danielewicz Zielińska, Maria, Szkice o literaturze emigracyjnej, Wrocław: Zakład Narodowy im. Ossolińskich-Wydawnictwo, 1990

Kott, Jan, Introduction to Four Decades of Polish Essays, edited by Kott, Evanston, Illinois: Northwestern University Press, 1990

Miłosz, Czesław, The History of Polish Literature, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1983

Olejniczak, Józef, “Esej i dziennik na emigracji,” in Literatura emigracyjna, 1939–1989, vol. 1, edited by Józef Garliński and others, Katowice: Śląsk, 1994:226–60

Wyka, Maria, editor, Polski esej: Studia, Cracow: Universitas, 1991

Portuguese Essay

Francisco Sanches (c. 1550–1623) could be considered the first Portuguese essayist, despite the fact that he moved to France while still a youth. Sanches was a contemporary of Montaigne (who incidentally was his cousin), and his Quod nihil scitur (That Nothing Is Known) was published in Lyons in 1581. In this book-length essay he defends a form of skepticism which provoked strong reactions from 17th-century German theologians, who considered him the most (potentially) destructive of the skeptics.

Carta de guia de casados (1651; The Government of a Wife, or, Wholesome and Pleasant Advice for Married Men) by Francisco Manuel de Mello (1608–66) can also be read as a volume of essays. Written in colloquial style, though tempered with a baroque spirit and humor, it is a collection of considerations about aspects of married life. Father Manuel Bernardes’ (1644–1710) five-volume Nova floresta (1706–28; New forest) includes, among his serene, short prose writings, authentic essays. Father António Vieira (1608–97), a Jesuit who spent most of his life in Bahia, Brazil, is a master of Portuguese prose. His baroque style is more temperate than the exuberant expressions commonly associated with baroque art. Vieira is a master of language and rhythm, playing with the emotions of his audience, and combining great clarity with an often sinuous, even cunning, logic. Many of his Sermões (Sermons), 15 volumes published between 1679 and 1699, together with some of his letters—particularly those in which he emerges as a staunch defender of the Brazilian Indians—as well as some of his reports could easily take their place in a collection of classic essays.

Francis Bacon had his admirers in Portugal. The physician Jacob de Castro Sarmiento suggested to King John V that Novum organum (1620) be translated into Portuguese. Another admirer, Luís António Verney (1713–92), became, in the words of Silvio Lima, author of a book-length essay on the nature of the essay, “a propagandizer of the critical essayism of modernity” by virtue of his Verdadeiro método de estudar (1746; True method of studying). The same can be said of the physician Ribeiro Sanches (1699–1783) and his Cartas sobre a educação da mocidade (1746; Letters on the education of youth). Both Verney and Sanches were considered “estrangeirados” (literally, “foreignized”) by their Portuguese contemporaries for their “un-Portuguese” views. Verney in particular was a harsh critic of a culture he felt was immersed in an excessive baroque taste, with its nefarious impact on letters, thought, and education. He chastised baroque writing for being hollow, obscure, and illogical, and advocated the introduction of modern ideas in Portugal.

The state of the nation vis-à-vis Central and Northern Europe became a fertile ground for national reflections in the first half of the 19th century. Alexandre Herculano (1810–77) wrote pieces on political, historical, educational, literary, and moral topics which easily qualify as essays. Collected in his Opuúsculos (1873–1908; Minor works), they provide a good window from which to observe Portugal’s battles in the process of adjusting its institutions to the times. In the second half of the century, Causas da decadência dos povos peninsulares (1871; Causes of the decline of the Iberian people), a long essay by Antero de Quental (1841–91), mentor of the formidable “1870 generation,” stands out. It sketches the history of the Iberian peoples after the Counter-Reformation, and identifies the moral, political, and economic causes of the Iberian Peninsula’s backwardness compared with the rest of Europe. Quental wrote other remarkable essays, such as Tendências gerais da filosofia na segunda metade do século XIX (1890; General trends in philosophy in the second half of the 19th century), as well as others on literary and philosophical themes. Oliveira Martins (1845–94) wrote extensively with the same concerns as Herculano and Antero. His collection of essays A Inglaterra de hoje (1893; England today) is a telling document of the cultural differences between the Portuguese and the English, and how he envisioned a modernization of Portugal that could avoid what he considered to be the pitfalls of British civilization.

Eça de Queiroz (1845–1900), the most admired of Portuguese fiction writers, was a member of Quental’s group. Several volumes of his collected works—A correspondência de Fradique Mendes (1900; The correspondence of Fradique Mendes), Cartas de Inglaterra (1905; Letters from England), Notas contemporâneas (1909; Contemporary notes), and Crônicas de Londres (1945; London chronicles)—are precious collections of social commentary by a master of irony, wit, and elegant prose. Fialho de Almeida (1857–1911) is another example of a prolific writer with many pieces in his five-volume Os gatos (1889–94; The cats) fitting the essay genre; its topics range from theater and literature to social commentary.

Leonardo Coimbra (1883–1936), a philosopher with his own grand conception of life known as creationism, independently conceived but with significant links to Henri Bergson's philosophy, wrote about love and death, joy, pain, and grace; the liberal and the reactionary spirit; experimental reason; man and destiny; the spirit and war. A synthesis of his view can be found in O criacionismo: Esboço de um sistema filosófico (1912; Creationism: a synthesis of a philosophical system). The mind of this original essayist can also be appreciated in his A alegria, a dor e a graça (1916; Joy, pain, and grace). The poet Teixeira de Pascoaes (1877–1952), in part under Coimbra's influence, wrote numerous short essays attempting to depict the traits of the collective Portuguese soul, which he thought was best captured by the concept of saudade, a bittersweet feeling of nostalgia for a lost, or a not-yet-found world, a longing for an absent love. Some of his collected essays on the topic were collected in the volume A Saudade e o saudosismo (1988; Saudade and saudosism).

The essay was also cultivated by members of the Modernist group Orpheu, with Fernando Pessoa (1888–1935) as its greatest representative. Known above all as a poet and creator of a constellation of heteronyms, Pessoa also wrote short essays, most of them unfinished or briefly sketched. His Livro do desassossego (The Book of Disquiet), written under the name Bernardo Soares, appeared for the first time only in 1982, almost 50 years after the author's death. The work is a collection of prose manuscripts resembling Nietzsche's work; its many entries are condensed essays, outlines of ideas to be developed, although the overall structure and style of the book make it most like an intimate diary. Its contents, though, point to reflections on the broken self, the absence of meaning—"Today I suddenly experienced an absurd but quite valid sensation. I realized, in an intimate lightning flash, that I am no one. No one, absolutely no one... And I, truly, I am the center that doesn't exist except as a convention in the geometry of the abyss; I am the nothingness around which this movement spins..."

In the first half of the 20th century, António Sérgio (1883–1969) stands out as the great cultivator of the genre. The title of his eight volumes of Ensaios (1920–58) is a conscious affiliation with Montaigne and Bacon. A rationalist who wanted to use reason to change the Portuguese mentality from obscurantism to rationalism, he revisited historical myths in order to extricate what he felt were the hard realities his countrymen had to confront.

After Sérgio, the genre proliferated, multiplied in a rich and diversified variety of themes and styles. In this century most major Portuguese writers have written essays, mostly in the literary field. In this respect, the best tradition of the genre as practiced by T.S.Eliot, Edgar Allan Poe, E.M.Forster, Aldous Huxley, Charles Baudelaire, George Bernard Shaw, Edmund Wilson, and Paul Valéry, to name a few, has plenty of cultivators among Portuguese literary figures. Sílvio Lima (1904–93) was the author of the remarkable and influential Ensaio sobre a essência do ensaio (1944; Essay on the essence of the essay). For Lima, an essay is an exercise in personal critical thinking about universal realities. During his times and in subsequent years, names like Vitorino Nemésio (1901–78), Jorge de Sena (1919–78), Vergílio Ferreira (1916–), David Mourão-Ferreira (1927–), and Jose Regio (1901–69) became associated with the genre, together with others whose work privileged the essay format—Joaquim de Carvalho (1892–1958), Eduardo Lourenço (1923–), António José Saraiva (1917–93), Joel Serrão (1919–), Manuel Antunes (1918–85), Jacinto do Prado Coelho (1920–84), Oscar Lopes (1917–), José Marinho (1904–75), and Vitorino Magalhães Godinho (1918–).

In the last years of the Salazar-Caetano dictatorship, which ended in 1974, the essay became heavily politicized. Cinema joined literature as a main topic, but both were simply a pretext for social and political commentary. During the years immediately following the so-called “April 25th Revolution,” literature was somewhat abandoned and the essay became doctrinal, with prose heavily weighted with Marxist jargon. Little by little, however, the voices of the established writers re-emerged. Reviewing for the journal Colóquio-Letras a decade of the Portuguese essay (1974–84), Eduardo Prado Coelho recognizes that a narrow definition of essayism would certainly include Eduardo Lourenço—without a doubt the great essayistic presence of the post-April 25th period—Vergílio Ferreira, some works by Jorge de Sena, two or three books by António José Saraiva, the dispersed reflections of Father Manuel Antunes, or Nuno Teixeira Neves, some of the cultural interventions of Miguel Serras Pereira, but little else. Most of these authors had established their reputations before the arrival of the democratic state in 1974.

It was only in the early 1980s that literature recovered its importance in Portugal, and Portuguese authors actually began to receive in their own country attention unmatched in any previous period. An assessment of the last decade leaves us with most of the same names at the top of the list, if we are to consider the essay in the strict sense. An important shift occurred in the Portuguese literary scene, however: the academicization of the essay. The proliferation of conferences, national as well as international, standardized Portuguese writing according to the international norms of the academic paper. In effect, only the old generation continued cultivating the old-fashioned essay: Lourenço, Ferreira, Saraiva, and de Sena.

The cultural and literary historian António José Saraiva had a creative mind which did not allow him to remain within the straitjacket of professional scholarship. He wrote freely and loved toying with the ideas of great thinkers and writers. A good example of his essay writing was published in 1990, three years before his death. A tertúlia oddental (Western literary group) is a pleasant excursion into the lives and thought of renowned figures of the “1870 generation.” Other studies, both old and more recent, such as Poesia e drama (1990; Poetry and drama) and the two volumes of A cultura em Portugal (1981–83; Culture in Portugal), a series of essays on late medieval and early modern Portuguese cultural and literary themes, or Ser ou não ser arte (1973; To be or not to be art), and Filhos de Saturno (1980; Children of Saturn), on political topics, confirm his brilliance as an essayist.

Jorge de Sena, a superb poet of the generation of Ferreira and Lourenço, wrote in every genre (close to 100 books published despite his premature death at 58), including numerous essays, which reflect his desire to write about everything. In spite of his death, he is alive and well in his works, which continue to be published thanks to the energy of his wife, Mécia de Sena. In 1992, another volume appeared for the first time: Amor e outros verbetes (Love and other words), a collection of entries written upon request for the Encyclopaedia Britannica and other reference works. In the introduction, Mécia de Sena explains that the volume contains the Portuguese version of the pieces rather than the cut and edited versions which appeared in English. She refers to incidents with the editors and criticizes the peculiar demands of English writing, which she calls “non-style” and which Jorge de Sena had classified as “mono-style.” The pieces in this volume are excellent examples of his particular style—an outpouring of facts, woven with comments, asides, and tangents which sometimes last for pages, but always with a fascinating force conducting the reader through the labyrinths of a great mind.

Among the recent volumes of Sena’s posthumously published works is the impressive collection of essays O dogma da Trindade poética (Rimbaud) e outros ensaios (1994; The dogma of poetic trinity (Rimbaud) and other essays). The sheer range of topics is impressive—Rimbaud, Cavafy, Antonio Machado, T.S.Eliot, Sartre, Rilke, Ungaretti, expressionism, Modernism, Don Juan, and Garcilaso, among others. Sena’s torrential style is both refreshing and overwhelming.

An original, hard-to-classify essayist, with a paradoxically modern classical prose and a penchant for venturing into uncommon territory in Portuguese letters (e.g. virtue, tolerance, God, Latin comedy) is Agostinho da Silva (1906–94). Two good collections of his writings—essays in the strictest sense—are Dispersos (1988; Dispersals) and Considerações e outros textos (1988; Considerations and other texts).

Of the younger generation, Eduardo Prado Coelho (1944–), Arnaldo Saraiva (1939–), and José Augusto Seabra (1937–), also academics and scholars, are three excellent cultivators of the genre, publishing their pieces in the literary and cultural supplements of major newspapers. Prado Coelho has published two volumes of a journal which is really a reader’s response to books—Tudo o que não escrevi (1992–94; Everything that I did not write), a title taken from Ludwig Wittgenstein. Most of the entries, though, are essays on a variety of contemporary debates ranging from literature to philosophy and the arts. Saraiva is a heterodoxical writer who writes in an engaging style about topics from national anthems and graffiti to advertisements, epigraphs, and polemics, as can be found in his Literatura marginal/izada—Novos ensaios (1980; Marginalized literature—new essays), a delightful collection in the best tradition of the forefathers of the genre. Seabra’s subjects are more conventional, and his style more academic.

The list of essayists could be longer, particularly as the boundary between the essay and the scholarly study further breaks down. Other important writers of essays include Luís de Sousa Rebelo (1922–), Natália Correia (1923–), José Enes (1924–), Eugénio Lisboa (1930–), Fernando Cristóvão (1929–), Maria Alzira Seixo (1941–), Vasco Graça Moura (1942–), José Augusto França (1922–), João Medina (1939–), Alexandre Pinheiro Torres (1923–), Isabel Allegro de Magalhães (1942–), Boaventura de Sousa Santos (1941–), Silvina Rodrigues Lopes (1950–), Fernando Guimarães (1928–), Antonio Ramos Rosa (1924–), João Barrento (1940–), and Diogo Pires Aurélio (1946–).

Those familiar with the contemporary Portuguese literary scene may find this survey rather conservative, keeping to established figures of the older generations, and short on women writers. While this is indeed the case, the reason may be that the essay seems to be an offspring of maturity. Presently, the members of the younger generation of men and women (there has been a considerable increase in the female presence in Portuguese literature since 1974) are either in the process of establishing academic careers (and thus writing scholarly papers) or writing excellent newspaper articles and crônicas (a favorite genre in Portugal, lighter than the essay) for such dailies as Diário de Notícias, and O Público, and the weeklies Expresso and Jornal de Letras, and have not yet published books collecting their best pieces.

ONÉSIMO T. ALMEIDA

Further Reading

- Coelho, Eduardo Prado, “Ensaio,” Cóloquio-Letras 78 (March 1984):43–54
- Coelho, Jacinto do Prado, editor, Dicionário de literatura, 5 vols., Porto: Figueirinhas, 1981 (original edition, 1956–60)
- Lima, Sílvio, Ensaio sobre a essência do ensaio, Coimbra: Arménio Amado, 1944
- Logos: Enciclopédia Luso-Brasileira de filosofia.*, Lisboa and São Paulo: Verbo, 1989
- Saraiva, António José, and Oscar Lopes, História da literatura Portuguesa, Porto: Porto Editora, 1996 (original edition, 1949)

Pound, Ezra

American, 1885–1972

Ezra Pound, the most prolific essayist among his Modernist contemporaries, wrote from within an astonishingly wide range of allusion, yet his thematic interests remain relatively narrow. It is only a slight exaggeration to say that after The Spirit of Romance (1910), he wrote only endless installments—many brilliant—of two extended essays. Pound is initially concerned with poetry and its place in society, and then, beginning around 1924, with the ways economic systems promote or debase culture. Pound’s cultural criticism is almost always aimed at establishing the proper grounds for poetry’s growth and appreciation. Whatever their particular occasion, the essays exude polemical intensity, for Pound seldom took up his pen without meaning to argue or instruct. T.S.Eliot, in his introduction to The Literary Essays of Ezra Pound (1954), writes, “Mr. Pound has never valued his literary criticism except in terms of its literary impact.”

The discoverer of James Joyce and the champion of Eliot, Ford Madox Ford, and Henri Gaudier-Brzeska, Pound can lay claim to being the inventor of Anglo-American Modernism, or at least its greatest impresario. Largely through the medium of the personal essay, Pound exerted substantial influence on the arts of painting and sculpture, as well as literature, and took intelligent notice of music. The “Treatise on Harmony” (1924) and the two essays on Arnold Dolmetsch (1918) are still of interest.

Beginning as a late Victorian admirer of Browning and the early Yeats, steeped in the traditions of European poetry, Pound was transformed by the destruction, waste, and stupidity of World War I into a radical stylist and eccentric economic and aesthetic theorist. The same experiences turned him toward the fascism of Mussolini, whom he naively believed would be interested in the economic theories of Social Credit. The fullest and most coherent of Pound’s political writings is “Jefferson and/or Mussolini" (1935). The least coherent and most noxious of his fascist statements are to be found in the radio scripts of the early 1940s, broadcast over Rome radio. Pound's real passion, however, was always the arts, and his fondest hope in the 1920s and 1930s was that fascism could establish the sort of society in which the arts could flourish. He was, obviously, wrong; at the same time, his error was shared by many intellectuals in England and America.

Something of Pound's characteristic tone during this period can be heard in the very brief "The Constant Preaching to the Mob" (1916), which argues that poetry is not "entertainment," but a mode of feeling crucial to the functioning of a healthy society. After quoting and translating from Old English four lines of "The Wanderer," Pound remarks that "Such poems are not made for after-dinner speakers... Still it flatters the mob to tell them that their importance is so great that the solace of lonely men, and the lordliest of arts, was created for their amusement." Pound, like Eliot, is an unashamed elitist with no use for the common reader except to decry his ignorance.

No Modernist poet relied so heavily upon the genre of the essay as Pound. Throughout his life he employed it to promote poetry as the highest and most exclusive of the arts, and to defend it against sentimentality and the fuzzy thinking that results, he believed, from economic and political corruption. The mature style of Pound's poetry is highly essayistic, his essays poetic. In both genres he makes extensive use of juxtaposition, which he called "the ideographic method," an idea derived from the work of the Orientalist Ernest Fenollosa. Donald Davie (Pound, 1975) sees what he calls an intellectual "rhythm" in the way Pound juxtaposes the materials of his art. In both poetry and prose, Pound's technical innovations were always designed to achieve what he called "hardness." In "Credo" (1918) he writes, "I believe in technique as the test of a man's sincerity."

Expatriate from his early twenties, Pound saw American culture as smugly sentimental and isolated from the traditions that make the arts possible. In "What I Feel About Walt Whitman" (1909) Pound writes that his great predecessor was "an exceedingly nauseating pill," but admits that "he accomplished his mission." "His crudity is an exceeding great stench," Pound added, but later, in the brief lyric "A Pact" (1915), admits Whitman had "broken the new wood." Much the same can be said of Pound himself. It is hard to overestimate the effect of Pound's poetics on American and British poets of the second half of the 20th century.

Pound's literary reputation rests on his poetry, but the greater part of his influence has been transmitted through the essays. Generations of poets have been instructed in the tenets of their art by the ABC of Reading (1934), which evolved from a cluster of key essays from the 1920s. Among these, "Credo" and "A Retrospect" (1918) may be said to have established Modernist poetic technique. In "The Prose Tradition in Verse" (1913), Pound can be said to have created the academic literary taste of the 20th century. Virtually all Pound's famous mottos are to be found in these three brief pieces. "An image is that which presents an intellectual and emotional complex in an instant of time" from "A Few Don'ts" (1913) launched imagism as a literary movement. By 1918, Pound is definitely propounding a system of composition. In "Credo" he writes, "Rhythm—I believe in an 'absolute rhythm,' that is in poetry which corresponds exactly to the emotion or shade of emotion to be expressed... Symbols—I believe the proper and perfect symbol is the natural object ... Technique—I believe in technique as the test of a man’s sincerity...” In “A Retrospect,” he offers the following three prescriptions for poetry: “1. Direct treatment of the ‘thing’ whether subjective or objective. 2. To use absolutely no word that does not contribute to the presentation. 3. As regarding rhythm: to compose in the sequence of the musical phrase, not in the sequence of the metronome.”

Pound’s most influential essay may be a “translation.” He compiled The Chinese Written Character as a Medium for Poetry (comp. 1914; pub. 1936) from the notes of Ernest Fenollosa. It is hard to distinguish where Fenollosa leaves off and Pound begins. In any event, Pound’s meditations on the Chinese character, which he and Fenollosa supposed less distant from the processes of both human thought and the natural world, gave rise to imagism as a literary movement, as well as to Cathay (1915), a collection of Pound’s versions of Chinese poems. As a poet Pound is justly famous for creating a different analogue in English—almost a separate version of the language—for each writer he “brought over”; he seems to have done the same for Fenollosa’s fragmentary prose.

The ABC of Reading formalizes the doctrines of the early essays and adds an extensive syllabus. Its theoretical underpinnings are taken over from The Chinese Written Character. Throughout Pound addresses himself to the poet who wishes to become part of the tradition, as well as to the reader who aspires to an adequate understanding of the canon. The ABC of Reading presents the reader with Pound the pedagogue. It also exhibits the paradoxical relations of Romantic and scientific modes of thought in Pound’s criticism.

Confronted with the body of Pound’s work, especially in prose—full of screeds against his countrymen and venomous reviews of his contemporaries—the reader encounters a similar paradox. Pound’s fascism is nauseating, certainly, and his elitism, while it avoids Eliot’s religiosity, seems rooted in an equally untenable vision of the social world. Against these deficits is counterbalanced the beauty of Pound’s music, his genius for polemic, his astonishing literary energy on behalf of other writers, and a profound personal integrity.

JOSEPH DUEMER

Biography

Ezra Weston Loomis Pound. Born 30 October 1885 in Hailey, Idaho. Studied at the University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia, 1901–03 and 1907–08, M.A. in Romance languages, 1906; Hamilton College, Clinton, New York, 1903–05, Ph.B., 1905. Lived in Venice, 1908, London, 1908–11, Paris, 1921–24, and Rapallo, Italy, 1924–45. Contributor or editor, New Age, from 1911, Poetry, 1912–19, New Freewoman (later the Egoist), 1913–14, Blast, 1914, Little Review, 1917–19, Athenaeum, 1910, the Dial, 1920–23, the Exile, 1927–18, Il Mare (The sea), 1931–40, and New English Weekly, 1931–35. Married Dorothy Shakespear, 1914: one son; also had one daughter with Mary Rudge. Made broadcasts over Rome Radio critical of United States involvement in World War II, from 1940, and as a result jailed by the U.S. army, 1945, first near Pisa, but then found mentally unsound and committed to St. Elizabeth's Hospital, Washington, D.C., 1946–58. Returned to Italy and lived mainly in Venice, 1958–71. Awards: Bollingen Prize, 1949; Harriet Monroe Award, 1962; honorary degree from Hamilton College. Died in Venice, 1 November 1971.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

The Spirit of Romance: An Attempt to Define Somewhat the Charm of the Pre-Renaissance Literature of Latin Europe, 1910

Pavannes and Divisions, 1918

Instigations, 1910

Make It New, 1934

ABC of Reading, 1934

The Chinese Written Character as a Medium for Poetry, edited from a work by Ernest Fenollosa, 1936

Polite Essays, 1937

Guide to Kulchur, 1938; as Culture, 1938

Literary Essays, edited by T.S.Eliot, 1954

Pavannes and Divagations, 1958

Impact: Essays on Ignorance and the Decline of American Civilization, edited by Noel Stock, 1960

Selected Prose, 1909–1965, edited by William Cookson, 1973

Ezra Pound and Music: The Complete Criticism, edited by R. Murray Schafer, 1977

“Ezra Pound Speaking”: Radio Speeches of World War II, edited by Leonard W.Doob, 1978

Ezra Pound and the Visual Arts, edited by Harriet Zinnes, 1980

Ezra Pound and Japan: Letters and Essays, edited by Sanehide Kodama, 1987

Ezra Pound's Poetry and Prose: Contributions to Periodicals, edited by Lea Baechler, A.Walton Litz, and James Longenbach, 1991

Other writings: many volumes of poetry (primarily The Cantos, from 1925), works on literary criticism and culture, and much correspondence. Also translated work from the Japanese, Chinese, and Italian.

Bibliographies

Ezra Pound Criticism, 1905–1985: A Chronological Listing of Publications in English, Marburg: University of Marburg Library, 1991

Gallup, Donald, Ezra Pound: A Bibliography, Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, revised edition, 1983 (original edition, 1963)

Ricks, Beatrice, Ezra Pound: A Bibliography of Secondary Works, Metuchen, New Jersey: Scarecrow Press, 1986

Further Reading

- Coyle, Michael, "Determining Frontiers: T.S.Eliot's Framing of the Literary Essays of Ezra Pound," Modern Language Quarterly 50, no. 3 (September 1989):248–71
- Harmon, William, "Pound's Earlier Critical Writings on Cultural Time and Value," and "Pound's Later Critical Writings on Cultural Time and Value," in his Time in Ezra Pound's Work, Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1977:3–23, 24–43
- Harris, Natalie, "A Map of Ezra Pound's Criticism," Southern Review (Summer 1983):548–72
- Knapp, James F., Ezra Pound, Boston: Twayne, 1979
- Longenbach, James, Stone Cottage, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1988
- McLuhan, Marshall, "Ezra Pound's Critical Prose," in Ezra Pound: A Collection of Essays to Be Presented to Ezra Pound on His Sixty-Fifth Birthday, edited by Peter Russell, London: Nevill, 1950; New York: Haskell, 1968
- Ruthven, K.K., Ezra Pound as Literary Critic, London and New York: Routledge, 1990
- Wellek, René, "Ezra Pound's Literary Criticism," Denver Quarterly 11(1976):1–20

Preface

A preface, formally considered, is a preliminary part of a book or long essay, and in this physical sense it shares, with introductions, forewords, dedications, and prolegomena, an initiatory and, in some cases, participatory relation to the text it precedes, commending either the work, the reader who takes it up, or the author who wrote it. Although Greek and Roman rhetoricians identified the recurrent topoi of classical prefaces or exordia (i.e. the conventional forms of modesty designed to create the transparent public persona of the writer), the modern preface, reflecting changing conceptions of the author as a representable, private, individuated self, is nongeneric, and so resists precise description. A preface may confine itself to the factual circumstances surrounding a work, its development, and publication (like Dickens' prefaces to "the Original Edition, 1837" and "the Cheap Edition, 1847" of The Pickwick Papers) or range in memoir fashion over the history of its reception (like his preface to "the Charles Dickens Edition, 1867" of that work). Henry James used the 18 prefaces written for the New York Edition of his works to say about his own and others' writing "what he hoped all his life the critics would say for him" (Leon Edel, Henry James: The Master, 1901–16, 1972), while George Bernard Shaw's prefaces are a reader's supplement to the ideas (perhaps not fully realized) in the staged productions of his plays. Paradoxically, the most famous prefaces are those that transcend the usual secondary status of the preface and become independent critical essays—Conrad's preface to The Nigger of the Narcissus (1897), for instance, or Wordsworth's preface to the Lyrical Ballads (1798). John Dryden, who wrote dedications, prologues, a celebrated essay, and a discourse, as well as prefaces, and whose use of the latter term is more precise than most, nevertheless remarks in his

“Preface to The Fables” (1700) that “the nature of a preface is rambling, never wholly out of the way, nor in it.”

In general, prefaces state what (for one reason or another) cannot be stated in the works they accompany—the author’s motivation, assumptions, and self-imposed regulations, the credentials of authorship or authority. The preface is the place where the private author may introduce himself to the public to gain its attention and acceptance. In early periods, when writers depended upon the patronage of an aristocratic minority, this function was accomplished in dedications, but as the reading public became more anonymous, writers had to establish a less specific relationship with their more general audience. The preface allowed the author to engage his or her readers on some common ground, to assume for the moment the mask of a reader in a mutual project of understanding or, more formally (as Dryden does in the preface to The Fables), in a judicial appeal to a jury.

Prefaces of works of nonfiction are more narrowly focused on the work than on the author. Here the preface becomes a metadiscourse rather than a familiar essay. The author appears to step outside his work in order to prepare the reader for what is to follow. Such prefaces pretend to begin at the beginning, to say in advance what has not yet been said, and perhaps even to answer as yet unspoken objections to what is still to come. But in fact, a preface is retrospective, not anticipatory; it is written after the work it precedes and in some manner introduces. Equivocally anterior and exterior to the works that prompt them, prefaces thus tend to cancel themselves out. “Preceding what ought to be able to present itself on its own,” Jacques Derrida observes, “the preface falls like an empty husk, a piece of formal refuse...” Paradoxically, Derrida’s deconstruction of the preface appears itself in a preface to his La Dissémination (1972; Dissemination), where it conceals its prefatory nature behind a series of alternative labels—“Hors Livre,” “Outwork,” “Hors d’œuvre,” “Extratext,” “Foreplay,” etc.

The suspicion of bad faith and superfluousness that hovers about prefaces is not new. Aristotle, in the Rhetoric, observed that “Introductions are popular with those whose case is weak ...it pays them to dwell on anything rather than the actual facts of it.” Since the 18th century, at least within the world of belles-lettres, the preface has become a form of apology and an object of parody. Laurence Sterne may serve as the modern exemplar. Near the middle of Tristram Shandy (1759–67), the putative author pauses to remark: “All my heroes are off my hands; ‘tis the first time I have had a moment to spare,—and Pll make use of it, and write my preface... No, i’ll not say a word about it [the book],—here it is,—in publishing it,—I have appealed to the world,—and to the world I leave it;—it must speak for itself.” Tristram only resumes his story after a further ten pages, however.

GEORGE WASSERMAN

Further Reading

Auerbach, Erich, “Germinie Lacerteux,” in his Mimesis: The Representation of Reality in Western Literature, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1953 (original German edition, 1946)

Blodgett, E.D., A.G.Purdy, and S.Totosy de Zapetnek, editors, Prefaces and Literary

- Manifestoes*, Edmonton: University of Alberta, 1990
- Curtius, Ernst Robert, European Literature and the Latin Middle Ages, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1990: especially Chapter 5 (original German edition, 1948)
- Derrida, Jacques, "Outwork, Prefacing," in his Dissemination, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1981 (original French edition, 1972)
- Dunn, Kevin, Pretexes of Authority: The Rhetoric of Authorship in the Renaissance Preface, Stanford, California: Stanford University Press, 1994
- Edelstein, Marilyn Joan, At the Threshold of the Text: The Rhetoric of Prefaces to Novels (dissertation), Buffalo: State University of New York, 1984
- Georgulis, Christine, "This is a true story": Fiction Disguised as Fact in the Prefaces of Late Seventeenth- and Eighteenth-Century French and English Prose Works (dissertation), New York: City University of New York, 1988
- Janson, Tore, Latin Prose Prefaces: Studies in Literary Conventions, Stockholm: Almqvist & Wiksell, 1964
- Jullien, Dominique, "La Préface comme auto-contemplation," Poétique 21, no. 84 (1990):499–508
- Navarette, Ignacio, "The Preface as a Platform for Theories of Translation," Publishing History 16 (1984):21–32.
- Shale, Michele Magnin, Metamorphosis of the Preface: A Diachronic Study of Prefaces of French Novels (dissertation), San Diego: University of California, 1986
- Tatlock, Lynne, "The Process of Recognition in Satire and Realism: The Prefaces of Seventeenth-Century Novels as a Guide to AuthorIntention," Colloquia Germanica 18, no. 3 (1985):238–47
- West, Catherine Jones, La Mise en jeu de l'autorité dans la préface du roman (dissertation), Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina, 1989

Priestley, J.B.

British, 1894–1984

Over the course of a long and generally successful career, J. B. Priestley was a journalist, novelist, playwright, travel writer, radio broadcaster, biographer, and autobiographer. It was as an essayist that Priestley first established himself, however, and the essay—particularly the familiar essay—was a genre to which he frequently returned.

Priestley's first articles were published in local newspapers in his native Yorkshire while he was still in his teens, but his life as an author really commenced in the early 1920s when, following service in World War I and taking a degree at Cambridge, he began publishing essays in periodicals such as the London Mercury, the Nineteenth Century, the Outlook, and the Cambridge Review. He later called these early essays "mostly literary exercises," saying that although he "took great pains with them," they were like a musician's practice pieces and therefore inconsequential. Priestley's earlier essays are less focused than his mature pieces and exhibit a somewhat imitative and florid prose style; however, they are more than the "exercises" he dismissed them as, but are in fact wellcrafted and articulate essays. One of the most noteworthy characteristics of Priestley's prose is its consistency—from the essays in the 1922, collection Papers from Lilliput to the short pieces collected in Outcries and Asides (1974) his prose is marked by a consistent tone of good humor, with unostentatious erudition and a sense imparted of a genial and unpretentious narrative persona.

Priestley called the short essay his “favourite literary form,” and it was the familiar essay in the tradition of Montaigne and Hazlitt that Priestley made his own. Although he contributed critical articles to the Times Literary Supplement beginning in the 1920s, and was to turn to more polemical essays, primarily in the New Statesman, after World War II, Priestley saw the familiar essay as the only legitimate essay. Although most of his essays were issued in collected form, most originally appeared in periodicals. Priestley believed that an essayist who writes frequently for the same periodical develops a certain rapport with the reader; the essayist “tends to lose a certain stiffness, formality, self-consciousness that would inevitably make its appearance if he were writing a whole book at a time.” This easy relationship with the audience was important, Priestley felt, because “the real essayist has no subject, or if you will, has every subject in the world at his command, for the simple reason that his business is to talk about himself or express the relation between any subject and himself” (introduction to the anthology Essayists Past and Present, 1925). The audience Priestley wrote for was the “middle brow” audience. Although he assumes a certain level of knowledge of classical and contemporary literature, Priestley despised literary snobs, particularly academics, the “dons yapping at your feet.”

Priestley continually alludes to Romantic authors, especially Lamb and Hazlitt, and there are some clear traces of influence to be found in terms of theme and treatment. The gently quizzical treatment of the eccentric acquaintance in Priestley's “The Editor” (1922) has echoes of Lamb's similar subject in his “Captain Jackson” (1823). “The Ring” (1932), Priestley's essay on the old boxing hall in the Blackfriars Road, has several echoes of Hazlitt's 1822 essay “The Fight,” both in subject matter, treatment, and general tone. He called Hazlitt “my favourite, my model author, and the only one who directly influenced my writing” (William Hazlitt, 1960). Although the direct allusions and echoes of the Romantics become fewer in the later essays, as Priestley developed his own voice and themes further, he remains grounded in this tradition of the Romantic familiar essay.

The topics and themes of Priestley's essays are numerous: reflections on contemporary media (newspapers, radio, and later television); commentary on music, theater, and popular entertainment; remarks on the writing process and the profession of authorship; and many pieces musing on aspects of the English national character or recounting impressions of travel or the incidents of domestic life. All of these are typical of the English familiar essay, but there are certain threads, ideas, and themes throughout which are distinctive to Priestley.

As a novelist and playwright, Priestley was interested in the nature of subjective reality, returning often to the ideas of time and human understanding of reality; these are frequent themes in his essays as well. Often, Priestley seeks to evoke the sense of transience, of the just vanished moment in depictions of the ephemeral nature of reality. The theme of impermanence is worked out in essays such as “A Vanished Lodging” (1931), which describes Priestley's response to news that his college in Cambridge was pulling down the cramped, “elfin” back gate lodge where he had lived in “the queerest rooms in all the University.” Now that the physical place he associates most strongly with his university experience is no more, he no longer feels connected to that past, declaring “I’ll to the Cam no more, the laurels all are cut.” Priestley explores the nature of dreams, and the shifting nature of apprehended reality in essays like “The Dream” (1922), “The Berkshire Beasts” (1927), and “Midsummer Day’s Dream” (1927). The first is a nightmarish description of a dream of pursuit and danger, reminiscent of Thomas De Quincey’s descriptions of his opium dreams. In it, and in “The Berkshire Beasts,” a more whimsical account of an absurd dream, Priestley reflects on how the internal logic of dreams gives them a reality that, by implication, calls into question how authentic our perceptions in our waking moments are, a speculation he returns to in essays like “Midsummer Day’s Dream,” where he describes the dreamlike quality that can occur in the actual world. “The Strange Outfitter” (1928) is notable for being a nightmare rendition of another of Priestley’s favorite subjects, his difficulty in shopping for clothing. He discusses the seemingly random nature of insight in “A Road and Some Moods” (1922), of how “we realise the beauty and blessing of life itself only in rare, inexplicable moments, and then most keenly,” an idea he was to express again in “The Moments” (1966), where he describes how the “great blue bottle of happiness” comes upon us suddenly, seemingly unconnected to our physical reality, and we realize that our perceptions are shaped by “influences beyond our understanding.” In “This Insubstantial Pageant” (1923), he remarks that ideas “have a trick of taking to themselves some of the glamour of the time when they were first conceived,” that we may continue to cling to a foolish intellectual position merely because it was adopted when we were experiencing a period of happiness. The subjective nature of apprehension is also addressed in this essay, as Priestley describes how, in just the right light, from just the right angle, London becomes a place of ethereal beauty.

Although Priestley wrote a number of book reviews and essays on literary topics, he eschewed the critical or scholarly approach of those whom he frequently disparaged as “Eng. Lit. types.” His choice of subjects in The English Comic Characters (1925) and Figures in Modern Literature (1924) is generally canonical, and here, as in his other literary essays, he is less concerned with critical analysis and more intent on presenting a subjective “appreciation” of the work or author discussed. This approach is exemplified in the brief pieces on art, music, and theater in Particular Pleasures (1975), tellingly subtitled Being a Personal Record of Some Various Arts and Many Different Artists. Priestley argued for a literature which was “extroverted” rather than “introverted,” believing that works of art should meet some need, spiritual or otherwise, for the reader, and should not be evaluated on narrow, programmatic grounds. Thus, in the ironic “Those Terrible Novelists” (1925) he laments what he saw as the “motiveless sneering and confounding” of writers in the 1920s, a concern echoed in “The Outsider” (1956), a critique of John Osborne’s Look Back in Anger and what Priestley saw in the postwar Angry Young Men as a fruitless alienation, “poisoned by an embittered egoism.” Writing in “Disturbing” (1967), Priestley again critiques contemporary playwrights and novelists for exacerbating contemporary problems, creating works that sought to “disturb” a reading public already disturbed by the myriad problems of the day. Rather than valuing literature which spoke to the common reader, Priestley argues, among contemporary critics and authors “a new snobbery of pessimism” had arisen. He frequently criticized what he saw as the arrogance of academic literary critics, who he remarked “seem to regard themselves as the ferocious theologians and grand inquisitors of art” (“Another Revolution,” 1957).

Although committed to a form of liberal socialism throughout his life, Priestley despised ideologues, declaring in Outcries and Asides that the “Iron Maidens of our age are ideologies, whether of the Left or Right.” He was also ambivalent about the writer’s role in the political arena, calling it in his autobiographical Margin Released (1962) a world that the writer enters “without confidence and probably with loathing.” While recognizing that the writer is a citizen, with the same rights and duties as any other, he believed that the professional writer should be wary of engaging in political activities, recognizing the danger of what he called the “ego-swelling ham Theatre” of political speaking. Despite this professed wariness of political action, Priestley wrote many polemical pieces, becoming increasingly politicized during and immediately following World War II. His pamphlet Letter to a Returning Serviceman (1945), for example, is somewhat Marxist in orientation, sharing the then common sentiment that Britain was obliged to rebuild after the war along socialist lines. In the 1950s Priestley became a director of the New Statesman, helping to shape its development as a “conscience” for the governing Labour Party. He wrote many articles for the journal, the most notable probably being “Britain and the Nuclear Bombs” (1957), in which he cogently refutes many of the arguments for Britain continuing to maintain a nuclear arsenal, arguing for the moral superiority that unilateral nuclear disarmament would bring. It is this article which is widely recognized as instigating the formation of the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament. Another of his New Statesman pieces, the frequently anthologized “Wrong Ism” of 1966, is a critique of current geopolitics, notably of nationalism, which Priestley likened to “the rotten meat between the two healthy slices of bread” that were regionalism and internationalism.

Priestley has not fared well at the hands of critics, and his contemporary reputation is negligible, with most of his works being out of print or difficult to obtain. At his peak, he was dismissed by critics such as F.R. Leavis and Virginia Woolf as a mere popular novelist; but he was never a deliberate “bestseller” author. In Margin Released he writes that “I am too conventional for the avant-garde, too experimental for Aunt Edna...a lowbrow to highbrows, a highbrow to lowbrows.” A few of his essays continue to be anthologized, although the majority are neglected. He should be considered important to serious students of the English essay, however—as Susan Cooper notes in her preface to Priestley’s Essays of Five Decades (1968), his essays reflect and helped shape a crucial stage of the development of this literary form, the transition from the “graceful and discursive” familiar essay that Priestley inherited from the Edwardians to the “more genuinely personal framework and mind” of the modern English essay.

JAN PETER F. VAN ROSEVELT

Biography

John Boynton Priestley. Born 13 September 1894 in Bradford, Yorkshire. Worked for wool traders, 1910–14. Served with the Duke of Wellington's and Devon regiments, 1914–19. Studied at Trinity Hall, Cambridge, 1919–2.1, B.A. in history, 1921. Married Patricia Tempest, 1919 (died, 1925): two daughters. Journalist and reviewer for various newspapers and periodicals, including the New Statesman, from 1922. Married Mary Wyndham Lewis, 1926 (divorced, 1952): two daughters and one son. Founder, English Plays Ltd., a production company for his own work; director, Mask Theatre, London, 1938–39; broadcaster of “Postscripts” for the BBC, 1940–41. Chair, president, or member of various organizations and conferences concerning theater; U.K. delegate to UNESCO conferences, 1946–47. Moved to Kissing Tree House, Warwickshire, 1959. Awards: James Tait Black Memorial Prize, 1930; Ellen Terry Award, 1948; honorary degrees from three universities; Order of Merit, 1977. Died at Kissing Tree House, 14 August 1984.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Papers from Lilliput, 1922

Brief Diversions, 1922

I for One, 1923

Figures in Modern Literature, 1924

The English Comic Characters, 1925

Essays of To-day and Yesterday, 1926

Talking, 1926

Open House: A Book of Essays, 1927

Apes and Angels: A Book of Essays, 1928; as Too Many People and Other Reflections, 1928

The Balconinny and Other Essays, 1929

Self-Selected Essays, 1932

Postscripts (radio broadcasts), 1940; as All England Listened, 1968

Letter to a Returning Serviceman, 1945

The Secret Dream: An Essay on Britain, America, and Russia, 1946

Delight, 1949

All About Ourselves and Other Essays, edited by Eric Gillett, 1956

Thoughts in the Wilderness, 1957

The Art of the Dramatist, 1957

William Hazlitt, 1960

Man and Time, 1964

The Moments, and Other Pieces, 1966

Essays of Five Decades, edited by Susan Cooper, 1968

Over the Long High Wall: Some Reflections and Speculations on Life, Death, and Time, 1972

Outcries and Asides, 1974

Particular Pleasures, Being a Personal Record of Some Various Arts and Many Different Artists, 1975

English Humour, 1976

Other writings: many plays (including Dangerous Corner, 1932; Laburnum Grove, 1933; Eden End, 1934; / Have Been Here Before, 1937; When We Are Married, 1938; An Inspector Calls, 1945; The Linden Tree, 1947), novels (including The Good Companions, 1929; Angel Pavement, 1930; Bright Day, 1946; Lost Empires, 1965), a few short stories, one collection of poetry, works on literature and politics, and several volumes of autobiography (including Margin Released, 1962). Also edited the anthology Essayists Past and Present (1925).

Bibliography

Day, Alan Edwin, J.B.Priestley: An Annotated Bibliography, Stroud: privately printed, 1980

Further Reading

Atkins, John, J.B.Priestley: The Last of the Sages, London: Calder, 1981
 Braine, John, J.B.Priestley, London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1978
 Brome, Vincent, J.B.Priestley, London: Hamilton, 1988
 DeVitis, A.A., and Albert E.Kalson, J.B.Priestley, Boston: Twayne, 1980
 Hughes, David, J.B.Priestley: An Informal Study of His Work, London: Rupert Hart-Davis, 1958

Pritchett, V.S.

British, 1900–1997

For the greater part of the 20th century V.S.Pritchett almost singlehandedly preserved the tradition of the English man of letters. A professional writer, Pritchett composed successful travel books, autobiographies, and biographies, but he is best known for his short stories and for his literary essays, which have appeared, primarily in the New Statesman, since 1926.

Pritchett's literary essays are not those of a rigorous academic critic, and his ideas reflect no philosophical or literary dogma. They are the informal literary reflections of a widely read and intelligent "common reader," for whom each book is a new experience requiring an individual response, one that usually involves summary, description, and evaluation. Although Pritchett's criticism is eclectic, certain broad themes underlie much of it.

One of Pritchett's principal concerns is the historical aspect of books and their authors. Believing that "one of the obligations of the critic is to possess himself of the eyes with which a novelist's contemporaries read him" ("The Shocking Surgeon," 1946), Pritchett often begins an essay by describing a scene representative of a book or an author, as in a stagecoach ride ending in crash and chaos to introduce the scientific romances of H.G.Wells ("The Scientific Romances," 1946) or his long, novelistic description of London's East End as a foreign city to introduce the work of Arthur Morrison ("An East End Novelist," 1946). The other aspect of Pritchett's historical approach is his belief that the relevance of older works to contemporary readers should be stressed. In his preface to In My Good Books (1942) Pritchett emphasizes that the best works of fiction "are those in which the cries of an age are like echoes of our own... We hold up the crystal sphere; we see ourselves in miniature reflection and, perhaps, if our minds are not too literal, we may also see our future." Thus in an essay on Fielding's Jonathan Wild Pritchett finds the mock biography "the perfect medicine for the present time" because it treats contemporary subjects, while in novels "the news is already absorbed and digested. We see our situation at a manageable remove" ("An Anatomy of Greatness," 1942). Literature, in Ezra Pound's phrase, is news that stays news, so that "Tyranny abroad, corruption at home—that recurrent theme of the eighteenth-century satirists who were confronted by absolute monarchy and the hunt for places—is our own."

Another common Pritchett approach is the biographical. Many of Pritchett's essays are reviews of literary biographies, and he uses these works as a springboard to discuss the subject's background and surroundings that influence the writing. For Pritchett the "death of the author" has not occurred, and when useful he will discuss Eugène François Vidocq's flamboyant life as a criminal and policeman, Thomas Day's personality as that of "a crank who is the guide to all cranks, the pattern of the tribe" ("The Crank," 1946), or the effects of Synge's and Joyce's respective return to and escape from Ireland, as necessary to a full understanding of their work. For Pritchett the living novel, as he titled one of his collections, is written by living writers.

A third avenue of Pritchett's criticism is more technical. A notable writer of novels and short stories himself, Pritchett can knowledgeably and effectively comment on certain literary aspects of a writer's art with professional insight. In his discussion of Sons and Lovers, for instance, Pritchett defines Lawrence's originality as the ability to write "from within—from inside the man, the woman, the tree, the fox, the mine" ("Sons and Lovers," 1946). Lawrence's characters and settings are "grasped with both hands, with mind and senses. The impersonal novelist has gone...the people, the trees, the mines, the fields, the kitchens come physically upon the page."

These brief insights, rather than sustained criticism, are the most notable and valuable aspects of Pritchett's literary essays, and such insights can be found almost at random in them. Pritchett provides the germ of an idea in brief, provocative statements, for instance that Sheridan Le Fanu "might be described as the Simenon of the peculiar" ("An Irish Ghost," 1946), that for the lower middle class life as described in The Diary of a Nobody, "Reality was the joke, its awful, dreary grayness" ("The Nobodies," 1942), or that The Ring and the Book is not an epic poem but "a great Victorian novel, or, more accurately, the child of a misalliance between poetry and the novel" ("A Victorian Misalliance," 1942). Pritchett then briefly discusses the idea but pays his readers the compliment of assuming that they can pursue such considerations for themselves.

A final aspect of Pritchett's criticism is its enormous range and inclusiveness. Pritchett's literary essays include discussions of the literature of many countries, not just England, and like his near contemporary Virginia Woolf he is as interested in the cranks, iconoclasts, and eccentrics of literature as he is in its major figures. In Pritchett's work a Peacock, Le Fanu, Jerome, or Perelman is responded to as readily and intelligently as a

Joyce or Mann.

This wide range of literary interests, together with his concern with literary biography and his relatively simple style, may make Pritchett seem a rather old-fashioned figure in an era dominated by scholarly approaches and sometimes arcane literary theory, and like his nearest American equivalent Edmund Wilson, Pritchett has not always appealed to the academic specialist. However, he did not write for the academic specialist, but for the nonspecialist intelligent reader, and those readers who persevere through the enormous volume of Pritchett's Complete Collected Essays (1990) will acquire, in a highly informative and entertaining way, a broad knowledge of both the major and the minor currents of world literature.

JOHN H. ROGERS

Biography

Victor Sawdon Pritchett. Born 16 December 1900 in Ipswich, Suffolk. Studied at Alleyn's School, Dulwich, London. Worked in the leather trade in London, 1916–20, and in various trades in Paris, 1920–32. Correspondent for the Boston Christian Science Monitor in Ireland and Spain, 1923–26; critic, from 1926, and director, 1946–78, New Statesman, London. Married Dorothy Rudge Roberts, 1936: one son and one daughter. Held lectureships and visiting professor and writer-in-residence posts at various American universities as well as at Cambridge University, 1953–81. President, PEN English Centre, 1970, International PEN, 1974–76, and Society of Authors, from 1977. Elected Fellow, 1969, and Companion of Literature, 1987, Royal Society of Literature. Knighted, 1975. Awards: Heinemann Award, 1969; PEN Award, 1974; W.H. Smith Award, 1990; Silver Pen Award, 1990; honorary degrees from four universities. Commander, Order of the British Empire (CBE), 1968. Died in London, 21 March 1997.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

In My Good Books, 1942*The Living Novel*, 1946; revised, enlarged edition, 1964*Books in General*, 1953*The Working Novelist*, 1965*George Meredith and English Comedy* (Clark lectures), 1970*The Myth Makers: Essays on European, Russian, and South American Novelists*, 1979*The Tale Bearers: Essays on English, American, and Other Writers*, 1980*A Man of Letters: Selected Essays*, 1985*At Home and Abroad*, 1989*Lasting Impressions: Selected Essays*, 1990; as Lasting Impressions: Essays, 1961–1987, 1990*The Complete Essays*, 1991; as Complete Collected Essays, 1991

Other writings: five novels (Clare Drummer, 1929; Shirley Sanz, 1932 [published in the U.S. as Elopement into Exile]; Nothing like Leather, 1935; Dead Man Leading, 1937;

Mr. Beluncle, 1951), many volumes of short stories, two volumes of autobiography, and books on travel and literary criticism.

Further Reading

Baldwin, Dean R., V.S.Pritchett, Boston: Twayne, 1987

Borkland, Elmer, "V.S.Pritchett," in his Contemporary Literary Critics, London: Macmillan, and New York: St. Martin's Press, revised edition, 1982:452–57 (original edition, 1977)

Kermode, Frank, "Books in General," New Statesman and Nation, 19 March 1965:455–56

Lewis, Peter, "Loner with a Master's Touch," Daily Telegraph, 14 December 1980:21

Marcus, Stephen, "An Ideal Critic," New York Review of Books, 8 October 1964:12–15

Marks, Harry S., "V.S.Pritchett," in British Novelists, 1930–1959, Dictionary of Literary Biography, vol. 15, part 2, Detroit: Gale Research, 1983:464–71

Maxwell, William, "The Two Merlins," The New Yorker, 29 August 1970:77–78

Vidal, Gore, "Secrets of the Shell," New York Review of Books, 28 June 1979:6–7

Propaganda

Propaganda has so broad a meaning that it is almost impossible to define on the basis of specific literary values that may be recognized in traditional literary forms like the sermon, treatise, or tract. Historical contexts are critical in understanding what propaganda is, what its uses are, and how it is perceived by its analysts and proponents. Historians agree that the origin of the term dates from the Catholic Church's Congregatio de propaganda fide in 1622, which sanctioned missionary projects throughout the world. However, definitions of propaganda vary depending on the contexts in which opinion forms. Propaganda, then, may have a neutral or descriptive meaning, or it may be used, as it tends to be in modern times, with negative connotations. René Wellek's classic Theory of Literature (1949) argues that "The term 'propaganda' is loose and needs scrutiny. In popular speech, it is applied to doctrines viewed as pernicious and spread by men whom we distrust. The word implies calculation, intention, and is usually applied to specific, rather than restrictive doctrines or programmes." Wellek claims, as would many literary theorists, that literature as art is opposed to propaganda; yet if we argue that all writers sincerely attempt to influence, then all writing may be "propaganda."

Wellek's views are influenced by propaganda as a problem in the function of literature in the period after World War I, when the partisanship and political engagement of writers were linked to social movements, and questions of ethics and belief in literary interpretation were on the agenda. Instructive was T.S.Eliot's turn to Christian culture as a solution to democratic individualism, collectivism, and fascism. Eliot's essays like "Journalism and Literature" (1931) and "Christianity and Society" (1939) attempt to answer the question of belief and unbelief versus disinterested truth. Eliot even says that Dante and Lucretius are “good propagandists” (“Poetry and Propaganda,” 1930).

But if rhetorical persuasion cannot be equated with propaganda, can there be both “positive” propaganda and “negative” propaganda? Even an authority on propaganda like Harold Lasswell (1959) can define it ahistorically as a neutral technique: propaganda is “in the broadest sense...the technique of influencing human action by the manipulation of representations” in different media. How deliberate the manipulation may be is clearly a problem in defining what it is. We can see that propaganda in this sense touches other literary forms, since it cuts across genres, including didactic and educational essays which may contain many rhetorical or literary conventions. However, this still does not distinguish it from other vehicles or ideologically oriented cultural attitudes like myths or belief systems which also frame truths.

We may define “soft” propaganda minimally as an instrument of persuasion and manipulation of public opinion which coerces truth by claiming universality for its views. Propaganda in this sense would be distinguished from education, which assumes that the listener is rational, can understand several points of view, and will make up his or her mind on the basis of the evidence. Yet a recent commentator on propaganda, Lucy Lippard (1980), argues the reverse, namely that propaganda is a function of knowledge itself: feminists “...have to keep in the back of our minds that we wouldn’t have to use the denigrated word ‘propaganda’ for what is, in fact, education, if it weren’t consistently used against us.” She argues that quality, objectivity, and neutrality in art “belong to them,” and that “Feminism has potentially changed the terms of propaganda as art by being unashamed of its obsessions and political needs, and by confirming the bonds between individual and social experience.”

The difficulty of defining propaganda is such that it is often tempting to look for its origins in ancient and medieval cultures. For example, it might be claimed that Plato’s Republic is propaganda for or against the state or that the Homeric epics or Greek drama contain propagandistic elements that praise the laws or the rule of tyrants. We could say that the poems of Hesiod or the Iliad and Odyssey, and similarly Dante or Milton, use fixed conventions and styles that appropriate the responses and expectations of the listener. However, even though belief, ritual, religion, and the symbols may exist as separate spheres for the modern reader, the syncretic, artistic forms of ancient genres do not allow us to claim that they are used as propaganda, even though they may reinforce belief or faith in the gods. At the same time, it is fair to say that Aristophanes in Athens and Horace in Rome parodied the popularization of literature and the debasing of the word. This indicates that political demagoguery is a feature of the ancient world.

The humanist movements that dramatically separate politics from religion from the 14th to the 18th centuries constitute another phase in understanding the problematic political origin of propaganda. In the Middle Ages literary and rhetorical techniques in both high and low culture were dependent on the degree of literacy and education in the secular institutions of society. The rise of a reading public from the 14th to the 19th centuries in Europe led to an explosion of pamphlets, broadsides, and polemical tracts of a personal, heretical, and dissenting nature. These later became a feature of the revolutionary traditions in France, England, and Germany in the late 18th and 19th centuries. Already in the 16th century Rabelais, Montaigne, and Erasmus were writing in the humanist tradition that draws out the relationship of power to the increasing consciousness of absolutism. The English humanism of Sir Thomas More's Utopia (1516) is a particularly striking example of schooling and education defended as higher goods that are tied to social issues. Milton's Areopagitica (1644) constructs freedom of speech against intolerance, but at the same time propagandizes against popery.

But More's Utopia, Edmund Burke's Reflections on the Revolution in France (1790), and the political essays of Wyndham Lewis like The Art of Being Ruled (1926), or even Nietzsche's Also sprach Zarathustra (1883–85; Thus Spoke Zarathustra), are more than mere ideas. They insist that ideas change the world and that using a personal language in essayistic form can change the reader's convictions about reality. Propagandists seem to be intoxicated by ideas and language. Humanistic propaganda is typically concerned about social justice, the welfare of the poor, the injustices of man, and the inequalities associated with religion and monarchy. The techniques used are not just emotional expressions. Humanist essays contain elements like name-calling, ridicule, and degrading invective, judgments about the motivations of enemies, blasphemy, and caustic sarcasm formed in the crucible of the dissenting traditions. The audience would be familiar with satirical, polemical, hortatory, and parodic styles of speech. Indeed, oaths, curses, and rhetorical inversions are used by "good" and "bad" propagandists to travesty enemies, and the false "truths" of opponents. To subvert the mind of the reader and build up one's own case is considered fair. Learning and preaching are not easily separated, but to the polemicist the pedantry of official speech is open game.

If propaganda comes from those who control the means of persuasion, like the intelligentsia, it can also be used by those who do not fit into the dominant world view. Indeed, it can be argued that with the rise of printing in the mid-15th century, combined with the spread of the Reformation with its emphasis on literacy and schooling, a new audience was created which would be open to both religious and secular demagoguery. By appealing to the base motives of the powerful, the propagandist attempts to psychologize about motives and builds up the status and esteem of those who are outside of the cultured and educated classes in order to make them feel like insiders. Both Calvin's and Luther's treatises use sacred texts in order to open a new audience to the criticism of doctrinal and theological values; since many of the new readers were members of the commercial classes, both leaders and addressees were familiar with vernacular speech.

As the bearers of social transformation, the new classes were particularly prone to the crises that accompanied economic and political change. Clerical forces not only "propagated the faith," they also attempted to combat change and the spread of knowledge. Galileo, Copernicus, and Bruno are vivid examples of the effects of "positive" clerical propaganda used against secular thought. Censorship in France and most of Europe was official policy from the 17th century to the French Revolution. If propaganda is placed in the context of the humanist tradition it can be seen as a subset of institutional discourses, a medium in which ideas are used to change the beliefs of others and above all to promote action or conversion in ways that not only represent the truth, but demand action on behalf of truth.

Propaganda only began to assume negative attributes in the 19th century, well beyond the time when the "propagation of the faith" was a neutral activity of a benign church. In the aftermath of the French Revolution, workers' movements, educational and abolitionist movements, along with the missionizing zeal of Catholic and Protestant churches, created conditions for mobilizing opinion for ideological causes. It was clear that traditional cultural or normative ethics could be attacked in the name of coercing audiences on behalf of religious or political truths.

The pamphlets, screeds, and manifestos written in the revolutionary times of the 18th and 19th centuries show us that sedition and censorship are two sides of the propaganda coin. However, seen from the perspective of the manipulation of public opinion during times when the fragmentation of communal values occurs, it is clear that propaganda and censorship are the children of the marriage of rising literacy and democratic movements. The propagandist assumes an attitude that people in masses cannot reason for themselves and are basically irrational. This permits writers to degrade an enemy and use indirect suggestion rather than argue with reasonable auditors. The formation of social movements and publics within modern nation-states gives rise to special interests which attempt to mobilize opinion and solidarity for their causes. The rise of new classes and groups—the masses are open to movements for reform, reeducation, and politicizing—leads to the development of literary and rhetorical tools for the manipulation of the mind and emotions in ways that go beyond mere rational persuasion.

Propaganda became both a public issue and a writer's issue in England and America during World War I. Following the religious and colonial wars of the 19th century, when nationalism appeared to be an answer to the upheavals and transformations of social movements, new ideological conditions prevailed. World War I was fought on the basis of loyalty to national identity, and propaganda became an official arm of governments for maintaining national unity against the dark European "Central Powers." Appropriating writers for warmaking causes marked a shift from the previous centuries when writers decried nationalism and xenophobia. England's propaganda machine in World War I affected writers as diverse as Henry James, H.G.Wells, Ford Madox Ford, and John Galsworthy, who enlisted themselves on the side of England's cause. Other writers, however, like D.H.Lawrence ("Education of the People," 1920) and E.M.Forster ("Two Cheers for Democracy," 1951), opposed the use of propaganda to bring the masses in line with war-making.

In modern times propaganda is almost always associated with the political coercion of opinion, war-making, and the militarization of society. This explains why avant-garde writers and artists are often associated with propaganda or are attracted by the techniques that encourage art to achieve a direct relationship to society. "Agitprop"—the most conscious of propagandistic movements in art and literature in the 1930s in the Soviet Union and Germany—is a term coined expressly to sanction the connection between publicity, agitation, and propaganda.

It is easy to see how in modern times propaganda is associated with advertising and brainwashing, because propaganda is now assumed to be deliberate manipulation. The "hidden persuaders" of the advertising and consumer industries successfully create conditions for obedience to official values and organizational behavior. Jacques Ellul (1965) argues that language and imagery condition and absorb individuals into the mechanical reproduction of reality. However, advertising as well as the written text, images, and the daringly graphic designs of agitprop can entertain as well as lure willing spectators into hostile attitudes toward an enemy. Yet folk songs and popular songs, proverbs, and political songs are themselves vehicles for propaganda. Propaganda uses slogans that scapegoat members of a class, race, or ethnic community as the enemy who is outside the boundaries of the human community. Both sophisticated and simplistic, psychologically loaded techniques like caricature, distortion, displacement, and sexual stereotyping demonize foreigners and outsiders. At the same time, techniques of propaganda can be used to control how information is disseminated. Noam Chomsky (1988), following in the tradition of John Stuart Mill, Alexis de Tocqueville, Harold Lasswell, and Jacques Ellul, coined the phrase “manufacturing consent” to describe how Western governments, newspapers, and the media propagate the official line by developing sophisticated verbal and documentary techniques that deceive a public unable to distinguish political policy from expedience. The democratic obligations to educate and enlighten about controversial political and cultural issues are evaded.

The historical and political forces that create the genre “propaganda” are clear. But the relationship to the essay as a form of thought may be elusive. While propaganda is often associated with social transformation and revolution or counter-revolution, it is useful to remember that propaganda is not only a genre of writing, but a framework which helps us understand and become aware of the relationship between language, reason, and coercion. Historically, intellectuals and writers have been attracted to the issues raised by propaganda. Intellectuals interpret reality and criticize reason; thus they often find themselves searching for ways to identify forces in society which criticize absolutist political domination. Writers often seek approval and power and join the forces that control ideas or promote hostility.

Propaganda can be described as a tool for establishing the consensual basis for new alliances in society. This is not a new tactic. Addison’s and Steele’s journals or Jean-Paul Marat’s agitational pamphlets can promote a rationalist view of the world in order to secure new modes of consent among those who are out of power, just as the enemies of power, like William Godwin or Percy Bysshe Shelley, plead for a higher rationality. Critics of official thought, like Jonathan Swift in “An Essay upon the Art of Political Lying” (1710) and A Modest Proposal (1729) or George Orwell in “Politics and the English Language” (1946), object to the use of language that cajoles, threatens, frightens, or obsequiously praises authority or mass-mindedness. Shelley’s “A Defence of Poetry” (1821), the essays of Bertolt Brecht on partisanship and commitment in the 1930s, H.L.Mencken’s tirades against mediocrity and conformism in language, while anchored to different political alignments, are sophisticated analyses of the culture of official speech, because they are aware of the illiberal influence the manipulation of language can have among both the educated and the uneducated. For them publicists are “legislators” who must be responsible to the people, and their essays do not shy away from passionate criticism of the standardization of thought that swallows up and digests reason.

Agitprop under communism—often called the propaganda of the deed—or lurid Nazi anti-Semitic propaganda, or war propaganda in England and America, shared the common end of coercing ideological realignment by projecting a powerful enemy in the name of maintaining power. Propaganda appeals to the purity and superiority of those groups who are struggling against forces which are deemed capable of annihilating the self-identified good or just cause. Propaganda should be understood as a cross-generic phenomenon embedded within a variety of forms and genres that may be equally popular, plebeian, or official. In attempting to bring the reader to a point where acting, performing, or changing consciousness and identity can be effected in the name of powerful forces of social and cultural transformation, propaganda is framed by the platitudes and clichés of prejudice and conventional wisdom, but its essence lies in its function as a discourse between preconstructed audiences and images of audiences. The social consequences of propaganda reveal the objectives of propaganda, namely that by subjecting truth to coercive forms, a crisis of legitimation in the nature of citizenship (and particularly, belonging) is precipitated. Essays which harbor propagandistic elements, or can be clearly identified as propaganda, should make the reader consider whether it is possible to entrust the enlighteners with our minds and souls.

JERALD ZASLOVE

Further Reading

- Adorno, Theodor W., "Anti-Semitism and Fascist Propaganda," in his The Stars Come Down to Earth and Other Essays on the Irrational in Culture, edited by Stephen Crook, London and New York: Routledge, 1994 (article originally published 1946)
- Bauman, Zygmunt, Legislators and Interpreters: On Modernity, Post-Modernity, and Intellectuals, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, and Cambridge: Polity Press, 1987
- Brecht, Bertolt, Brecht on Theatre, edited by John Willett, New York: Hill and Wang, and London: Methuen, 1992 (original edition, 1964)
- Buitenhuis, Peter, The Great War of Words: British, American, and Canadian Propaganda and Fiction, 1914–1933, Vancouver: University of British Columbia Press, 1987
- Chomsky, Noam, American Power and the New Mandarins, New York: Pantheon, and London, Chatto and Windus, 1969
- Chomsky, Noam, Manufacturing Consent: The Political Economy of the Mass Media, New York: Pantheon, 1988; London: Vintage, 1994
- Darnton, Robert, and Daniel Roche, editors, Revolution in Print: The Press in France, 1775–1800, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1989
- Eliot, T.S., "Poetry and Propaganda," Bookman 70, no. 6 (February 1930)
- Ellul, Jacques, The Technological Society, New York: Knopf, 1964 (original French edition, 1954)
- Ellul, Jacques, Propaganda: The Formation of Men's Attitudes, New York: Vintage, 1973 (original edition, 1965)
- Elshtain, Jean Bethke, Women and War, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1995 (original edition, 1987)
- Godzich, Wlad, The Culture of Literacy, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1994
- Graff, Harvey, The Legacies of Literacy: Continuities and Contradictions in Western Culture and Society, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1987
- Habermas, Jürgen, The Structural Transformation of the Public Sphere: An Inquiry into a Category of Bourgeois Society, Cambridge, Massachusetts: MIT Press, and London: Polity Press, 1989 (original German edition, 1962)
- Hauser, Arnold, "Propaganda, Ideology and Art," in Aspects of History and Class

- Consciousness*, edited by Istvan Meszaros, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1971
- Hilvert, John, Blue Pencil Warriors: Censorship and Propaganda in World War II, St. Lucia, Queensland: University of Queensland Press, 1984
- Jackall, Robert, editor, Propaganda, New York: New York University Press, 1995
- Jacoby, Russell, Dogmatic Wisdom: How the Culture Wars Divert Education and Distract America, New York: Doubleday, 1994
- Kracauer, Siegfried, From Caligari to Hitler: A Psychological History of the German Film, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1974 (original edition, 1947)
- Lasswell, Harold, "Propaganda," in Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences, vol. 11, edited by Edwin R.A. Seligman and Alvin Johnson, New York: Macmillan, 1959
- Lippard, Lucy R., "Some Propaganda for Propaganda," Heresies 3, no. 1 (1980):35–39
- MacKenzie, John, Propaganda and Empire: The Manipulation of British Public Opinion, 1880–1960, Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1984
- Mencken, H.L., The American Language: An Inquiry into the Development of English in the United States, New York: Knopf, 1980 (original edition, 1919; original 3rd revised edition, 1923)
- Messinger, Gary S., British Propaganda and the First World War, Manchester: Manchester University Press, and New York: St. Martin's Press, 1992
- Mumford, Lewis, The Myth of the Machine: The Pentagon of Power, New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1964
- Orwell, George, "Politics and the English Language," in The Collected Essays, Journalism and Letters of George Orwell, vol. 4, edited by Sonia Orwell and Ian Angus, London: Secker and Warburg, and New York: Harcourt Brace World, 1968 (essay originally published 1946)
- Rosenberg, Bernard, and David Manning White, editors, Mass Culture: The Popular Arts in America, New York: Free Press, and London: Collier Macmillan, 1964 (original edition, 1957)
- Scott, William G., and David K. Hart, Organizational America, Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1979
- Thompson, E.P., The Making of the Working Class, London: Gollancz, 1980 (original edition, 1963)
- Tocqueville, Alexis de, Democracy in America, New York: Knopf, 1993 (original French edition, 1835–40)
- Williams, Raymond, The Long Revolution, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1975 (original edition, 1961)
- Williams, Raymond, Writing in Society, London: Verso, 1983

Pushkin, Aleksandr

Russian, 1799–1837

Less well known than his unparalleled poetry and pioneering imaginative prose, Aleksandr Pushkin's essays, advocating supple language and a modern approach to literature, emerged from the crucible of the critical and journalistic polemic of his times. Pushkin wrote over 100 essays, critical fragments, rebuttals, notes, and reviews which in content are literary, theoretical, polemical, autobiographical, biographical, critical, historical, political, and satirical. The majority are short in length and brilliantly concentrated. Most remained in draft form and over half were published posthumously due to repressive censorship and the restrictive political situation. Friends learned of his ideas through discussion, the familiar letter, or circulation in manuscript form.

While Pushkin's primary focus is on the issues of literature as an institution (classical, Romantic, and incipient realistic), as well as language, the readership, and publication, his concern for social, political, and historical issues is always present, at times in the form of circumspect discourse within other contexts. Indeed, some scholars perceive Pushkin's notes as sketches toward an autobiography in lieu of the memoirs that were destroyed following the ill-fated Decembrist Rebellion in 1825.

Foremost in the remarkably erudite Pushkin's focus is literature—Russian and foreign, particularly French, German, English, and classical—with increasing attention given to history, primarily to revolutions and cultural conflicts—from the Time of Troubles (1598–1613) to contemporary issues. His voice is that of the vanguard of the cultured elite, often years ahead of the times. In fact, his essays lend legitimacy to a nascent genre in Russian letters. John Bayley (1986) calls Pushkin's "sense" of literature "dazzling" with "an unerring feeling for what makes a really great genius," arguing that "Pushkin the artist is as detached and objective about a work of art—his own or another's—as is Pushkin the critic." Pushkin's first known essay, "Moi zamechaniia ob russkom teatre" (wr. 1820; "My Observations on the Russian Theater"), advocates professionalism on the boards. The first published essay, "Pismo k izdateliu Syna otechestva" (pub. 1824; "Letter to the Publisher of Son of the Fatherland"), tactfully subdues a polemic on Romanticism versus classicism concerning Pushkin's poem, Bakhchisaraiskii fontan (The Fountain at Bakhchisarai), between his friend Prince Viazemskii and M.A.Dmitriev by maintaining that Romanticism finds resistance only in Western Europe.

Pushkin's overarching concern is the unsuitability for modern abstract reasoning of contemporary Russian prose, despite the merits of Nikolai Karamzin's literary and historical writings. Accordingly, Pushkin's first article on literature, "O proze" (wr. 1822; "On Prose"), promotes "accuracy and brevity" as the premier merits of prose and demands abundant ideas and thoughts. As in his poetry, the semantic and metaliterary, political, and personal levels of discourse are often encoded in the primary narrative. Paul Debreczeny (1983) finds that Pushkin's expository prose is closest in language to his imaginative prose. In fact, the language and conceits of poetry and prose often intertwine and complement each other, as in his rebuttal poem "Moia rodoslovnaia" ("My Genealogy") and the essay "Oproverzhenie na kritiki" (wr. 1830; "Refutation of Criticisms").

Few of Pushkin's essays were published until his confidant Baron Anton Delvig founded the Literaturnaia Gazeta (1830–35; Literary gazette). Fifteen of Pushkin's 18 contributions filling the critical void deplored in his "O zhurnal noi kritike" (pub. 1830; "On Journalistic Criticism") were anonymous or pseudonymous. Pushkin contends that some literary works, lacking sophisticated criticism, "appear, live, and die without receiving due evaluation." He seeks critical interpretation rather than evaluative generalization of good versus bad. Nor are the critics the final judges, although reading them explains their relations among themselves and with the writers ("Razgovor o kritike” [draft undated; pub. 1884; “Conversation About Criticism”]). Pushkin founded Sovremennik (The contemporary) in 1836 to generate quality literature and criticism and to raise the aesthetic and critical awareness of his primarily upper-class readership after the authorities closed Literaturnaia gazeta. Six of his approximately 20 essays appeared anonymously in Sovremennik to circumvent the Tsar’s growing censorship.

Pushkin’s crisp, elegant, and precise style is informed by his Romantic leanings and Westernizing tendencies, on the one hand, and is part of the best of the Russian literary tradition, on the other, drawing from the wellspring of Russian chronicles and the vernacular. His precise yet nuanced vocabulary embraces foreign words and phrases for concepts lacking Russian equivalents. Pithy sayings, proverbs, and quotes, often in other languages, liven his cogent narrative. Many essays are responses, such as the unequivocal and reasoned “O prichinakh, zamedlivshikh khod nashei slovesnosti” (wr. 1824; “On the Factors That Delayed the Progress of Our Literature”), which lays the blame on the overwhelming use of French by the upper class, on Russian writers, and on the increasing influence of scholarly and scientific language. Pushkin’s objective of creating the institution of literary criticism and essays is at the fore of his polemical essay “Vozrazhenie na stat’iu A. Bestuzheva ‘Vzgliad na russkuiu slovesnost’ v techenie 1824 i nachala 1825 godov” (pub. 1834; “Objection to A. Bestuzhev’s Article ‘A View on Russian Literature During 1824 and the Beginning of 1825’”).

Crafting his essays as instructive models, Pushkin underscores the nascency of Russian literary criticism in “‘Istoriia poezii’ S.P. Shevyreva” (wr. 1836; “S.P. Shevyrev’s ‘History of Poetry’”). He further addresses the question in “O poezii klassicheskoi i romanicheskoi” (wr. 1825; “On Classical and Romantic Poetry”) by articulating that form (genre) determines which of the two schools poetry belongs to and rather broadly assigns to classicism all genres emanating from the Greeks. He credits the troubadours with inventing new genres, rhymes, and Romantic poems unfamiliar to the ancients. Acknowledging his friend’s mind, learning, and literary grace in “Vozrazhenie na stat’i Kiukhelbekera v Mnemosyne” (wr. 1825–26; “Objection to Kiukhelbeker’s Articles in Mnemosyne”), Pushkin goes on to illuminate several of his errors concerning the superiority of classical genres over Romantic ones; he also defines the aesthetic categories of the beautiful and maps out the theoretical conditions of inspiration and imagination. Ernest J. Simmons (1935) ranks Pushkin’s critical judgments on English literature with those of Keats for keenness of perception and farsighted veracity.

Without compromising his integrity of thought in fulfilling Emperor Nicholas’ commissioned “O narodnom vospitanii” (wr. 1828; “On Public Education”), Pushkin shifts the responsibility for the “recent events” (the December Rebellion) onto insufficient enlightenment and morality as well as onto foreign influences that find fertile ground in poorly educated minds. He introduces several criticisms, such as the preoccupation with advancement and the insular patriarchal education of young nobles by their social inferiors. He hints at his own situation, as in other essays. This essay exemplifies Pushkin’s advocacy of the Lancaster method of mutual teaching, of abolishing both corporal punishment and examinations, the latter by then having become a clandestine business for professors. Republican concepts, he argues to an autocratic emperor, should be part of the curriculum, the better to undermine their allure of novelty. While Pushkin seems fascinated by democratic republicanism and the American experience, he also perceives the faults of and the tendency to idealize both the natural state of life (James Fenimore Cooper, Chateaubriand) and the United States, as shown in his essay “Dzhon Tenner” (1836; “John Tanner”).

Censorship receives oblique attention in a commentary on an ultra-conservative inveighing against seditious and amoral foreign literature in “Mnenie E.E.Lobanova o dukhe slovesnosti, kak inostrannoi, tak i otechestvennoi” (1836; “E.E. Lobanov’s Opinion on the Spirit of Foreign and National Literature”). Pushkin parries Lobanov’s call for the censor “to penetrate all designs of writers” by quoting rules restricting judgment to the text’s actual meaning rather than its alleged intent.

In “Frakiiskie elegii: Stikhotvoreniia Viktora Tepliakova” (1836; “Thracian Elegies: The Poems of Viktor Tepliakov”) Pushkin expounds an enriching tenet of Russian poetics—imitation as faith in one’s own ability to discover new worlds by following in the footsteps of genius and the desire to study one’s model in order to give it new life.

Pushkin’s essays were published gradually as the political situation permitted, many in 1855, 1885, even as late as 1930; consequently their influence on the Russian essay was kept to a minimum, while Vissarion Belinskii and others reigned supreme. No sizable study of Pushkin’s essays exists, although several recent publications discuss them. Instead Pushkin’s essays are used in biographical studies and as sources for elucidating his imaginative writing.

SONIA I.KETCHIAN

Biography

Born 8 June 1799 in Moscow. Studied at the Imperial lycée, Tsarskoe Selo, near St.Petersburg, 1812–17. Member of the Arzamas literary society. Civil servant, St.Petersburg, 1817–20. Exiled in southern Russia and Pskov province, for unpublished political poems, 1820–26, then returned to St.Petersburg. Visited his brother Lev and friends who were fighting the Turks in the Russian Army in Transcaucasia, 1829. Married Natalia Goncharova, 1831. Founding editor, Sovremennik, 1836–37. Died (following a duel) in St.Petersburg, 11 February 1837.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

The Critical Prose, edited and translated by Carl R.Proffer, 1970

Pushkin on Literature, edited and translated by Tatiana Wolff, 1971; revised edition, 1986

Pushkin-kritik, edited by E.N.Lebedev and V.S.Lysenko, 1978

Other writings: poetry, the novel-in-verse Eugene Onegin (1831), the drama-in-verse Boris Godunov (1831), the novel Kapitanskata dochka (1836; The Captain’s Daughter), short stories (including Pikovaia dama [The Queen of Spades], 1834), and correspondence (collected in Letters, edited and translated by J.Thomas Shaw, 3 vols., 1963).

Collected works editions: Polnoe sobranie sochinenii, 17 vols., 1937–49, reprinted 1994–(in progress); Polnoe sobranie sochinenii, edited by B.V.Tomashevskii, 10 vols., 1977–79.

Bibliographies

Bibliografiia proizvedenii A.S.Pushkina i literatura o nem, 1886–99, 1918–57,

Moscow/Leningrad, 8 parts, 1949, 1952–60

Pushkiniana 1900–10 and 1911–17, Leningrad, 2 vols., 1929, 1937

Wreath, P.J., and A.I.Wreath, “Alexander Pushkin: A Bibliography of Criticism in English: 1920–75,” CanadianAmerican Slavic Studies (Summer 1976):279–304

Further Reading

Bayley, John, “In Search of Pushkin,” in Pushkin on Literature, edited and translated by Tatiana Wolff, Stanford, California: Stanford University Press, and London: Athlone Press, revised edition, 1986

Debreczeny, Paul, The Other Pushkin: A Study of Alexander Pushkin’s Prose Fiction, Stanford, California: Stanford University Press, 1983

Driver, Sam, Pu(kin): Literature and Social Ideas, New York: Columbia University Press, 1989

Frank, Semion, “Pushkin kak politicheskii myslitel’,” in Pushkin v russkoi filisofskoi kritike: Konets XIX-pervaia polovina XX vv, edited by R.A.Gal’tseva, Moscow: Kniga, 1990

Levkovich, Ia. L., Avtobiograficheskaia proza i pis’ma Pushkina, Leningrad: Nauka, 1988

Petrunina, N.N., Proza Pushkina: Puti evoliutsii, Leningrad: Nauka, 1987

Simmons, Ernest J., English Literature and Culture in Russia (1553–1840), New York: Octagon, 1964 (original edition, 1935)

Todd, William Mills III, The Familiar Letter as a Literary Genre in the Age of Pushkin, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1976

Q

The Quarterly Review

British periodical, 1809–1967

The Quarterly Review originated in opposition to the Whiggish Edinburgh Review, whose success as a weighty and popular journal dealing with every aspect of contemporary culture added substance to its liberal politics, a fact unwelcome to supporters of a distinctly conservative administration. The Edinburgh's decisive offense was to publish in 1808 a vigorously radical article by Henry Brougham on the Spanish insurrection against the French invaders. It was insufficiently enthusiastic about the war itself, and this was felt to make the establishment of a truly patriotic review imperative. The Quarterly, however, turned out to be very much a conservative organ, and contributors like Robert Southey, who had a radical past and prided himself on his free and fearless thinking, were sometimes indignant at the way their reviews were “gelded” to tone them down. This was not just in connection with sensitive political or theological questions. Charles Lamb wrote a sympathetic review of Wordsworth’s Excursion, and was distressed to find, when he read the published text, that it had been altered beyond recognition. As he put it in a letter to Wordsworth, “Every warm expression is changed for a nasty cold one... The eyes are pulled out and the bleeding sockets are left.”

The editor who performed these mutilations was William Gifford, according to Hazlitt a “low-bred, self-taught man” who was formed in the school of “anti-Jacobin” journalism, savaging any manifestation of liberality or intimation of reforming sentiment. This was the reason for the notorious review by John Wilson Croker of Keats’ Endymion (1818): the poet was an associate of Leigh Hunt, the editor of the radical Sunday newspaper the Examiner, so inevitably the poem had to consist of “the most incongruous ideas in the most uncouth language.”

In 1826 the Quarterly was taken over by Walter Scott’s son-in-law J.G.Lockhart, but the Gifford mode continued to feature in the reviews written or revised by Croker, in his heavily sarcastic notice of Tennyson’s 1833 volume, for example, but perhaps most strikingly in his revision of a review by P.H.Stanhope, Lord Mahon, of a book by the Whig politician Lord John Russell on the causes of the French Revolution. Stanhope included his own version of the review in a collection of historical essays published in 1849. It is a temperately critical analysis. But the review in the Quarterly for April 1833, though it retains large fragments of the original text, is transformed into a scurrilously abusive party-political polemic.

All this may seem to reinforce the early 19th-century liberal consensus that the Quarterly was a brutal bully hired by a corrupt establishment. But like the Edinburgh, a large proportion of the review essays dealt with a wide range of topics likely to be of interest to the intelligent reader. Walter Scott's contributions are invariably magnanimous, not least when reviewing (anonymously of course, and with some editorial enhancements) his own Tales of My Landlord (1817). His essay on the Culloden Papers (1816) is a moving lament for the Highland clearances. The number that contained Croker's attack on Endymion included an article on Egyptian antiquities which helped to inspire Keats' vision of the temple of Moneta in the second version of Hyperion. Many of Southey's articles on the state of the poor are pioneering formulations of the concerns of Victorian social reformers, and when a late 20th-century publisher attempted to illustrate the Victorian social conscience in a score or so volumes of reprints of contemporary periodical essays, the Quarterly featured extensively.

The ethos of the Quarterly in mid-century is perhaps best illustrated by Benjamin Disraeli's Coningsby (1844), with its satirical portrait of Croker in the appalling Mr. Rigby—author of many “slashing” pieces in the Quarterly Review—and its idealized mentor for the hero in Sidonia, who had “exhausted all the sources of human knowledge” and was master of the learning of every nation: precisely the impression that writers tried to create when adopting the reviewers' “we.” John Ruskin, for one, provides a pleasant example of this in one of his rare excursions into reviewing, when he made Lord Lindsay's history of Christian art the occasion for his own wide-ranging survey (1847).

At their best, reviews in the Quarterly convey a vivid sense of public discussion in the more conservative parts of British society. There is a fine review of Vanity Fair and Jane Eyre by Lady Eastlake (1848), which has usually been cited as an illustration of Victorian moral outrage with its allegation that Charlotte Brontë's novel breathes the spirit of disaffection and revolution that has threatened the social fabric in Britain and abroad. But the reviewer's frank avowal of how disturbing readers find Jane Eyre, enabling normally reticent English people to drop their defenses in unwontedly uninhibited discussion, is a conscious and perceptive tribute to Brontë's literary power.

The Quarterly took an intelligent part, from a conservative angle, in most of the major Victorian controversies. William Ewart Gladstone appeared as a formidable critic of Roman Catholicism, while Bishop Wilberforce was the reviewer chosen for Darwin's Origin of Species. W.J. Courthope contributed his view of the debate on culture initiated by Matthew Arnold (“Modern Culture,” October 1874), and it was writers like himself, with Francis Turner Palgrave and Churton Collins, who did much to establish the canon that initially dominated the teaching of literature in British universities. The process may be usefully examined in the pages of the Quarterly.

The review continued publication until 1967, and perhaps retained its preeminent position at least until the early years of the century. Latterly it became just one periodical among many, but its very survival for over a century and a half is in itself deeply impressive.

GEOFFREY CARNALL

Further Reading

- “The Centenary of the Quarterly Review,” Quarterly Review 210 (1909):731–84; 2–11 (1909):2–79–324
- Graham, Walter J., Tory Criticism in the “Quarterly Review” 1809–53, New York: AMS Press, 1970 (original edition, 1921)
- Koss, Stephen, The Rise and Fall of the Political Press in Britain, vol. 1: The Nineteenth Century, London: Hamilton, 1981
- L., C.E., “Retrospect: Nos. 1–500, Quarterly Review” Quarterly Review 253 (1929):1–17
- “Musings Without Method: The Quarterly Review—Its Origins—The Slashing Article—The Reigns of Gifford and Lockhart,” Blackwood’s Edinburgh Magazine 173 (1903):100–17
- Shattock, Joanne, Politics and Reviewers: “The Edinburgh” and “The Quarterly” in the Early Victorian Age, Leicester: Leicester University Press, 1989
- Shine, Hill, and Helen Chadwick Shine, The Quarterly Review Under Gifford: Identification of Contributors, 1809–24, Chapel Hill:University of North Carolina Press, 1949

R

The Rambler

British periodical, 1750–1752,

Samuel Johnson stands at the crossroads between the Renaissance and the Modern period, and so played a crucial part in the development of the essay. There can be no doubt that Johnson found the essay an especially congenial literary form. As its origin in the French word essai suggests, the essay is an informal “attempt” to say something worthwhile. In an essay one was not promising much, only that one was trying; this more relaxed generic tone suited Johnson well. Above all, the essay as a literary form offered him freedom: it had no set agenda, no rules about topic, no prescribed length, and no required content.

Looking back, Johnson considered the achievements of Montaigne in the 16th century, of Francis Bacon in the 17th, and of Addison and Steele in the early 18th. When, however, his chance came to follow in the footsteps of his predecessors in the middle of the 18th century he chose instead to develop the essay in a somewhat new direction. The result was what James Boswell would later call “bark and steel for the mind,” and what Walter Jackson Bate (1955) would describe as “the closest anticipation of Freud to be found in psychology or moral writings before the twentieth century.”

Johnson’s chance to do something significant with the essay form came after he had been at work for two or three years on his Dictionary, which would appear in 1755. Financially strapped, he was unable to keep up with his many expenses. At this fateful juncture he was approached by a trio of London booksellers. Edward Cave, John Payne, and Joseph Bouquet offered him the chance to become the author of a new set of periodical essays which they were hoping could match or surpass the earlier successes of the Tatler (1709–11) and Spectator (1711–11, 1714). Johnson was to be paid two guineas per essay, and there were to be two essays each week. This would provide him with four extra guineas each week, or with slightly over 200 guineas in extra annual income—a not insignificant sum of money for a writer who only a year earlier had accepted the sum total of 15 guineas for the rights to his great poem The Vanity of Human Wishes. The offer from the booksellers was irresistible.

Johnson thus found himself in early March 1750 committed to producing two essays each week—one to be published on Tuesday, the other on Saturday—indefinitely. They were to address important issues of the day, though Johnson was by no means sure just what those would be. Consequently, he designated himself “the Rambler,” undoubtedly to allow himself as much flexibility as possible when it came to choosing his subjects. However, as Steven Lynn (1992) has suggested, his title may also have been drawing attention to a religious meaning in his work. It is clear enough that Johnson conceived of himself as a pilgrim soul on a journey toward God. But it is equally clear that he did not have the same sense of clear direction which had guided those who thought of themselves as pilgrims in earlier times. It was his lot here on earth to be but a Rambler.

Johnson eventually brought his project to a conclusion in Rambler no. 208, published on 14 March 1752, just before the death of his beloved wife Tettie on 17 March 1752. During the two years that he devoted to the Rambler there were only four occasions when he allowed someone else to compose one of the essays, though others had been responsible for a few small parts of other essays.

Apparently the Rambler was not a great financial success initially. The sale of individual folio numbers, we are told, never went much beyond 500. However, even when they were first being published in pamphlet form some of the individual essays did enjoy a much wider circulation than the numerical count would indicate, for they were reprinted in country newspapers and monthly magazines. Individual numbers of the Rambler sold for two pence each, so simple arithmetic would tell us that Johnson's financial backers at first lost money on this venture. However, it is also true that, in one of the odder turns of literary history, the reputation of the Rambler began to grow almost immediately among the British reading public. Not long after Johnson ceased publishing there was enough demand for a collected edition of the Rambler essays, printed in a duodecimo edition. Before Johnson's death in 1784, there were to be ten authorized editions of the collected Ramblers, and even more by the end of the 18th century.

Though Johnson's reputation as the author of the Rambler papers would soon be overshadowed by his great achievement with the Dictionary, most members of the brilliant social and intellectual set surrounding him in his later years first came to know and admire him as "the Rambler." Young James Boswell is but one instance of someone who was not looking for "Dictionary" Johnson when he came to London in 1762: he was instead seeking out the author of the Rambler papers.

It is not easy to assess Johnson's overall achievement in the Rambler essays. The 204 essays mostly or entirely by him cover a wide range of topics and ideas. To a great extent, what any individual reader will value in these essays will almost certainly depend upon what he or she is looking for. Johnson is perhaps most admired as a teacher of wisdom, and it is not hard to find essays that exemplify the kind of Johnsonian wisdom that has long been valued. Rambler no. 32 on the value of patience under extreme duress is mentioned admiringly by most who have read carefully through the essays. Boswell mentions no. 54 on the death of a friend and no.110 on the value of penance as two that had a profound effect on him. No. 25 urging us to overcome feelings of timidity in the pursuit of excellence is yet another essay that continues to be widely admired.

Essays of other types are also still appreciated. Johnson does make a few attempts at humor. The most successful of these is probably no. 117, which contains a tongue-in-cheek argument in praise of a garret's beneficial effects on writing. Other essays tell stories, a few extending to more than one number: the story of Misella, for example (nos. 170 and 171), or that of Seged (nos. 204 and 205). Misella's tale illustrates Johnson's remarkable sensitivity to the plight of women, particularly to the horrors of prostitution.

The story of Seged is commonly read as an early version of Rasselas, Prince of Abyssinia, one of Johnson's most celebrated literary works, which he published in 1759. On the whole, though, he is not especially successful as a storyteller in the Rambler essays.

Much easier to admire are the essays devoted to what we now call literary criticism. Praise for Rambler no. 60, which sketches out Johnson's theory of biography, has been almost universal. It was a major inspiration for Boswell, who quotes from it extensively at the beginning of his own much-heralded biographical work, The Life of Samuel Johnson (1791). There can be little doubt that Boswell found its carefully chiseled prescriptions and shrewd observations on biography as a literary form sufficient justification for doing things with biography that had never been done before. Rambler no. 4 contains an early argument on behalf of moral fiction, and is frequently cited as one of the first serious efforts to come to terms with the new literary form we now call the novel. Rambler no. 92. is an especially valuable contribution to our theoretical understanding of poetry. In it Johnson takes up the question of the relationship between sound and sense. After examining numerous illuminating examples he concludes that the intimacy of the relationship between the two has been wildly exaggerated. Whatever the essence of great poetry may be, it must lie in something other than sound. Other critical essays beyond these—on Milton, on pastoral poetry, on the “rules” for writing—are also of considerable value.

The Rambler continues to be of interest for a variety of reasons. Its essays reveal to us how one of the best writers in English employed the form at an important moment in its development. Some consider ideas of storytelling, while others make still valid points about issues in literary theory and criticism. Perhaps, though, most significantly, a surprising number of the Rambler essays still offer a wisdom that most of us can make use of in our daily lives.

JOHN J. BURKE, JR.

Editions

The Rambler, 208 nos., 20 March 1750–14 March 1752; in 6 vols., 1752; in The Works of Samuel Johnson (Yale Edition), vols. 3–5, edited by Walter Jackson Bate and Albrecht B. Strauss, 1969; selections in Essays from the Rambler, Adventurer, and Idler, edited by Walter Jackson Bate, 1968

Further Reading

- Alkon, Paul K., Samuel Johnson and Moral Discipline, Evanston, Illinois: Northwestern University Press, 1967
- Bate, Walter Jackson, The Achievement of Samuel Johnson, New York: Oxford University Press, 1955
- Bloom, Edward A., “Symbolic Names in Johnson’s Periodical Essays,” Modern Language Quarterly 13 (1952):333–52
- Bloom, Harold, “Dr. Samuel Johnson, the Canonical Critic,” in his The Western Canon:

- The Books and School of the Ages*, New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1994; London: Papermac, 1995:183–202
- Boswell, James, Boswell's Life of Johnson, Together with Boswell's Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides and Johnson's Diary of a Journey into North Wales, edited by George Birkbeck Hill, revised by L.F.Powell, 6 vols., Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1934–64: especially vol. 2:212–26
- Burke, John J., Jr., "Excellence in Biography: Rambler No. 60 and Johnson's Early Biographies," South Atlantic Bulletin 44, no. 2 (May 1979):14–34
- Clifford, James L., Dictionary Johnson: Samuel Johnson's Middle Years, New York: McGraw Hill, 1979
- Damrosch, Leopold, "Johnson's Manner of Proceeding in the Rambler," ELH 40 (1973):70–89
- Greene, Donald, Samuel Johnson, Boston: Twayne, revised edition, 1989
- Hagstrum, Jean, "Johnson and the Concordia Discors of Human Relationships," in The Unknown Samuel Johnson, edited by John J.Burke, Jr. and Donald Kay, Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1983:39–53
- Lynn, Steven, Samuel Johnson After Deconstruction: Rhetoric and "The Rambler", Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1992
- Olson, Robert, Motto, Contest, Essay: The Classical Background of Samuel Johnson's "Rambler" and "Adventurer" Essays, Lanham, Maryland: University Press of America, 1984
- Rogers, Pat, Johnson, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1993
- Selden, Raman, "Deconstructing the Ramblers," in Fresh Reflections on Samuel Johnson, edited by Prem Nath, Troy, New York: Whitston, 1987:269–82
- Wharton, T.F., Samuel Johnson and the Theme of Hope, London: Macmillan, 1984
- Wiles, R.M., "The Contemporary Distribution of Johnson's Ratnbler," Eighteenth-Century Studies 2 (1968):155–71

Ranke, Leopold von

German, 1795–1886

Prussian historian Leopold von Ranke is generally regarded as the founder of modern historiography. While the 20th century has produced a substantial number of German historians who are also interesting as essayists, there was a paucity of such in Ranke's day. The great or near-great can, indeed, be counted on one hand: Mommsen, Friedrich Christoph Dahlman, Heinrich von Treitschke, and Alfred Dove, as well as Ranke himself. Though he apparently never wrote consciously as an essayist—even though the genre had established itself as such by the mid-19th century in Germany, with such writers as Herman Grimm and Karl Hillebrand, and fellow historians Georg G.Gervinus, Otto Gildemeister, and Theodor Mommsen—Ranke did write a number of shorter works that could well qualify as essays. These were often in the form of dialogues, intended as prefaces to his major works, or were otherwise relatively informal and briefer works without the usual formidable scholarly apparatus characteristic of Ranke's major writings.

Ranke's essayistic writings, though by definition not displaying the meticulous and distanced craftsman, are nonetheless perfectly consistent with the tenor, predispositions, and general style of his most famous scholarship, Die Römischen Päpste (1834–36; The History of the Popes), Deutsche Geschichte im Zeitalter der Reformation (1839–47; History of the Reformation in Germany), and other works. Notably, there are no significant changes in the style, tenor, or general purport of Ranke's essays over the course of an extensive stretch of time.

Essayistic compositions sometimes occur as parts of longer works, such as the oft-excerpted pieces from the Vorträge (lectures) for the benefit of King Maximilian II of Bavaria—for instance, “Wie der Begriff Fortschritt in der Geschichte aufzufassen sei” (1854; How the concept of progress in history should be understood) and “Was von den sogenannten leitenden Ideen in der Geschichte zu halten sei” (1854; What should one think of the so-called leading ideas in history); such contributions show the best side of Ranke as essayist. Two even briefer pieces from the same series, “Die nordamerikanische Revolution” (1854; The North American revolution) and “Die französische Revolution” (1854; The French Revolution), though displaying the careful historian reluctant to make easy generalizations unsupported by mountains of data and detail, yet reveal the more relaxed and expansive essayist who implicitly assumes an understanding between himself and his reader that the author is not writing for archival record.

While Ranke edited and wrote most of the contributions for a journal he founded, the Historische-politische Zeitschrift (Historical-political journal), this work is hardly a mine for those exploring Ranke as essayist: its primary purpose was to function as an organ for the policies of the Prussian government. The journal did, however, contain his two most important contributions to the essay: “Das politische Gespräch” (1836; “A Dialogue on Politics”) and “Die grossen Mächte” (1832; “The Great Powers”).

In “A Dialogue on Politics” the character of Friedrich is patently the writer's spokesman, while the figure of Karl is representative of Ranke's friend, the renowned Prussian jurist Friedrich Karl Savigny. It examines, among other themes: the political situation in the 1830s; the nature of the state; the state vis-à-vis political parties; the varying role of the army according to the form of state it serves; states considered as individual personalities; the duties and limitations of government; and the relationship between church and state. Seemingly under the influence of Johann Gottfried Herder, Giambattista Vico, and Edmund Burke, Ranke maintains that each state has its unique personality and Zeitgeist (a term popularized by but not originating with Ranke) and, consequently, reforms—no matter how attractive in theory—should never be arbitrarily imposed upon an existing state. Moreover, the individual citizen gains his full development as a human being only through his life within the state. Based upon this rootedness of the citizen in a particular state, the continued vitality of European civilization itself is made possible. The past, therefore, should never be judged from the perspective of the present or with criteria by which epochs are evaluated according to their contribution to some notion of progress. This form of historicism, while certainly intended in part to refute such politically engaged historians as Gustav Droysen and Heinrich von Sybel, surely had the dominant political thought of Hegel as its primary target. Moreover, unlike some of his fellow historians (e.g. Friedrich Christoph Schlosser, Karl von Rotteck, Gervinus, and Thomas Babington Macaulay), Ranke felt that the historian should be a technician rather than a moralizing judge “distributing praise and blame” (Pieter Geyl, 1958).

Written consistently in the tone of a broadminded and freewheeling discussion, the dialogue is lively, realistic, and often compelling, never stepping out of its guise and degenerating into a dissertational style. It comes as no surprise that Ranke regards drama as the most effective literary means for gaining insight into the human heart. Peter Gay (1974) comments on this: “In Ranke, the shaping hand of the literary artist is never far from the constructive effort of the historian.” Frequent use is made of the rhetorical question and what Gay calls the “counterfactual alternative.” Lyricism, smoothness, and breadth are characteristic, but—perhaps surprisingly, given the frequent use of irony—there is little genuine humor.

The second of Ranke’s most important essays, “The Great Powers,” is a wide-ranging survey of those European powers—England, France, Austria, Prussia, and Russia—among whom a political and cultural, seemingly perpetual, competition serves to keep the balance of power (and thus the civilization) of Europe in a healthy condition. Everything, Ranke asserts, is secondary to the authority of the state, while foreign policy is the state’s most important function. Although not as lively a piece as “A Dialogue on Politics,” this earlier work must be regarded as one of the most perceptive and instructive contributions to the subject during the author’s lifetime.

Ranke’s letters, diaries (Tagebücher), and notebooks also contain much that can be classified as essayistic in nature. Unfortunately, little scholarly attention has been paid to these sources as contributions to the genre. In them can be found occasional statements of belief, attitude, and feeling—ruminations and speculations rather than tightly reasoned arguments, e.g. on the nature of history, its place among other academic disciplines, the primacy of political history (almost to the exclusion of everything else), and the importance of the great historical figure (the “Great Man” theory of history).

Beyond the considerations of theme and content in Ranke’s essays, there is always the compelling excellence of his style and form. It seems that Ranke took the preceding century’s Buffon to heart (“le style est l’homme même” [style is the man himself]) and believed that it was only through style that a writer—especially the historian—could rise above the prosaic role of reporter and recorder (Gay). He took obvious pleasure in his role as a historical commentator and speculator, a disposition eminently appropriate for the accomplished essayist.

ROBERT V. SMYTHE

Biography

Born 21 December 1795 in Wiehe, Kursachen. Studied at the Schulpforta, near Naumburg; University of Leipzig, 1816–17, doctoral degree, 1817. Taught history at the gymnasium in Frankfurt-on-Oder, 1818–24; chair of history, University of Berlin, 1825–71, where he taught Jacob Christoph Burckhardt. Traveled and studied in Italy, 1828–31. Editor, Historische-politische Zeitschrift, 1832–36. Ennobled, 1865. Died in Berlin, 25 May 1886.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Über die Epochen der neueren Geschichte: Neunzehn Vorträge für König Maximilian von Bayern, edited by Alfred Dove, 1888, and Theodor Schieder and Helmut Berding, 1971

Zeitbilder und Charakteristiken, edited by Alexander Eggers, 1918

Ausgewählte Schriften, edited by Friedrich Ramhorst, 1918

Volkssagenforschung: Vorträge und Aufsätze, 1935

Geschichte und Politik: Ausgewählte Aufsätze und Meisterschriften, edited by Hans Hofmann, 1942

Weltgeschichtliches Lesebuch, edited by Fritz Ernst, 1957

The Theory and Practice of History, edited by Georg G. Iggers and Konrad von Moltke, translated by von Moltke and Wilma A. Iggers, 1973

Other writings: many volumes on history, particularly on the 16th and 17th centuries, as well as an unfinished history of the world (Weltgeschichte, 16 vols., 1881–88) and a history of the popes (1834–36), diaries, and correspondence.

Collected works editions: Sämtliche Werke, 54 vols. (in 29 vols.), 1867–90; Gesamtausgabe (German Academy Edition), edited by Erich Marcks and others, 1925– (in progress).

Bibliography

Helmolt, Hans F., Ranke-Bibliographie, Leipzig: Dykschen, 1910

Further Reading

Barnes, Harry Elmer, A History of Historical Writing, New York: Dover, revised edition, 1962 (original edition, 1937)

Gay, Peter, Style in History, New York: Norton, 1988 (original edition, 1974)

Gay, Peter, and V.G. Wexler, editors, Historians at Work, vol. 3, New York: Harper and Row, 1975

Geyl, Pieter, Debates with Historians, New York: Meridian, 1958: especially Chapter 1, "Ranke in the Light of the Catastrophe"

Gilbert, Felix, History, Politics or Culture? Reflections on Ranke and Burckhardt, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1990

Guillard, Antoine, Modern Germany and Her Historians, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1970 (original French edition, 1915)

Iggers, Georg G., The German Conception of History, Middletown, Connecticut: Wesleyan University Press, 1968

Iggers, Georg G., and James M. Powell, editors, Leopold von Ranke and the Shaping of Historical Disciplines, Syracuse, New York: Syracuse University Press, 1990

Kohn, Hans, editor, German History: Some New German Views, Boston: Beacon Press, and London: Allen and Unwin, 1954: especially "Ranke and Burckhardt" by F.

Meinecke

Krieger, Leonard, Ranke: The Meaning of History, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1977

Rohner, Ludwig, Deutsche Essays: Prosa aus zwei Jahrhunderten, vol. 1, Berlin and Neuwied: Luchterhand, 1968

Read, Herbert

British, 1893–1968

Sir Herbert Read, knighted by Winston Churchill in 1953 “for services to literature,” is one of the most enigmatic of the modern essayists who interpreted Modernist aesthetic values and styles to a reluctant English literary culture. Of those who established their mark in the vanguard movements of English literary circles during the period between World Wars I and II, and in spite of his over 60 books, Read remains one of the forgotten, even though his reputation in the 1950s placed him alongside well-known cultural-literary critics such as Matthew Arnold, William Morris, Paul Valéry, T.S.Eliot, and George Orwell. Read became visible after World War I as a young poet and defender of the newest Modernism. Along with more notorious Modernists like Georges Sorel, Friedrich Nietzsche, Henri Bergson, Ezra Pound, James Joyce, T.E.Hulme, Wyndham Lewis, and T.S.Eliot, Read identified himself with the dissident movements in literary and cultural values. Inspired by the convergence of the visual arts and letters and philosophy in continental movements, he founded a journal, Arts and Letters (1917), which joined Modernism to the criticism of the philistine bourgeoisie and the mass culture encroaching on England.

His editing of T.E.Hulme’s notebooks for A.R.Orage’s The New Age (1922) and Hulme’s Speculations (1924) helped secure Read’s solidarity with Eliot and the Criterion, to which Read began contributing in 1922. Read’s long association with Eliot, whom he first met in 1917, remains even today not easy to assess. Both writers published and encouraged other writers—Read at Routledge and Kegan Paul, Eliot at Faber and Faber—and both writers were not afraid to relate ethical and cultural values to forgotten literary figures or emergent artistic movements. But Eliot’s conservative Christianity and Read’s anarchism and his commitment and engagement to a political outlook, as well as his affirmation of the creative nature of the unconscious self, separated them into intellectually opposed camps. What often joins them in a common cause is the necessity to come to terms with the Romantic principle of imagism translated into the impersonality of form in poetry.

Read’s essays in the 1930s, whether polemical, austere, or personal, were written in a style accessible to the reader searching for new insights into modern life through the surrealist journals that linked art and surrealism to the radical and politically changing cultures in Spain, Germany, England, and Russia. In the 1930s alone Read published over 400 essays and books. Socialism versus barbarism was on the agenda, and being engaged with the “contemporary” was a required stance. Placed against the smaller number of Eliot's essays, which are written in an imperious, scholastic style, or Orwell's journalistic plain speaking, Read may sound remote, didactic, or tendentious. But his work avoided mannerism and maintained diversity, including essays on art exhibitions, literature, education, social action, and aesthetics; all together it numbers well over 1100 publications and reveals a protean intelligence in his public essays and an introspective lyrical turn in his autobiographical writings.

Read was a philosophical anarchist and outspoken pacifist during World War II, and his defense of craft-based work and syndicalist working habits marks his entire outlook and must be associated even with his essays championing Wordsworth, Shelley, and Coleridge. This development of the ideology of Romanticism would inevitably stamp him as an outsider in the face of Eliot and Pound's objectivism and classicism. Read's visionary side was infused with the mystique of nonviolent anarchism, guild and revolutionary socialism, and the mythology of place, especially the northern English landscape, symbolized in his essayistic Blakean novel, The Green Child: A Romance (1935), which was puzzled over by Jung and admired by a range of literary and artistic fellow travelers of Modernism and mysticism, including the writer Kenneth Rexroth, and artists of the Dynaton Group around Wolfgang Paalen. Read's lifelong admiration first for Freud and then for Jung allowed him to place the unconscious into a direct relationship with the artistic process. By linking inorganic imagery to abstraction, and empathy to the human need for primal form, and both with the drive for aesthetic freedom, he provided readers with a unique intellectual context for a social consciousness that is different, if not absent, from many of his contemporaries, for example F.R. Leavis, Christopher Caudwell, or, later, Raymond Williams.

Just as his attempt to set standards for understanding modern art did not appeal to later cultural critics like Raymond Williams, Read's association with the anarchists of the Freedom Press group puzzled the sensibilities of traditional leftists like Stephen Spender. Read's advocacy of anarchism and of education through art, and his lingering lifelong admiration for Hegel, Schiller, and Marx reinforced his belief that alienation was a condition of modern life that could not be resolved through Eliot's Christian stoicism or religion. In his essays on industrial design he drew parallels between a utopian vision of a human-scale, abstract technology, and primitive and children's art, which are also abstract and sensual. His desire to see our nature through depth psychology that reveals the inner biological basis of form informs his 1920s essays as well as the psychoanalytically informed essays on aesthetics in the postwar period. But ultimately Read focuses his moral disgust for the ugliness of industrialism on the systems that grind individuals down into robotic dependency on the state. He pilloried the English (Poetry and Anarchism, 1938) for failing to understand literary values that were not simply culturally acceptable values, and his pamphlet essay "To Hell with Culture: Democratic Values Are New Values" (1941) became the cornerstone essay for other works like The Politics of the Unpolitical (1943) and The Education of Free Men (1944).

Read's lucid prose was neither academic nor fashionably belletristic, but was suffused with an energetically pamphleteering, albeit feuilletonist quality that brought together analysis, defiance, and acquaintance with the work at hand. He ultimately scorned the Bloomsbury literati, and his defense of surrealism and "degenerate art" in little journals like Axis, Minotaur, Southern Review, or Circle identified him as a spirited voice addressing apologists for bourgeois culture in the name of the outsiders and aesthetically dispossessed. At the same time his reviews in publications like the Times Literary Supplement, the Nation, Adelphi, the Listener, Horizon, and Architectural Review gave him license, guerrilla-like, to speak patiently and intelligently about the cultural contradictions between insider, official culture, and artistic innovation and experiment.

Often labeled a highbrow Modernist voice, or primarily a poet (George Woodcock, 1972), Read, like his counterparts in the United States, Lionel Trilling or Clement Greenberg, came to be seen as an apologist for liberal values—one who sought the assimilation of modern literature and art into the mainstream. Yet his work is too broad in scope for these reductions. His prose style is deceptively and consciously personal without imposing the voice of his private “personality.” Hating the stridency of a Wyndham Lewis, he stands with Swift, Hazlitt, Coleridge, Nietzsche, Tolstoi, Lawrence, and Freud those writers who do not cater to the common reader as “a passive recipient of pleasures for which he pays a fair market price” (English Prose Style, 1928) or to the often decadent manner of being leisurely, tasteful, and unconcerned. In the final analysis, he sees himself as a psychologist of the soul. In this, a Romantic attachment to both scientific analysis and the desire to dissect the realities of modern life, where science and art both conflict and coincide, Read consciously adopted the persona of the diagnostician, discoverer, and psychologist as the basis of the essay form. In Collected Essays in Literary Criticism (1938), his introduction boldly states that psychoanalytic depth psychology is necessary for understanding literary creation, and that through the psychoanalytic domain we understand the place of the irrational in an irrational age. He writes: “I have been gradually drawn towards a psychological type of literary criticism because I have realized that psychology, more particularly the method of psychoanalysis, can offer explanations of many problems connected with the personality of the poet, the technique of poetry, and the appreciation of the poem.” One of the first in England to advance and develop this perspective in the mid-1920s, and at home as a Romantic in an anti-Romantic age, he recognized that he wrote against the grain of the expectations of an age limited to traditional moral ideas about realism in art. As a crusader for contemporary art Read never lost touch with the Romantic idea that art is in a sense speaking to us as moderns.

JERALD ZASLOVE

Biography

Herbert Edward Read. Born 4 December 1893 at Muscoates Grange, Kirbymoorside, Yorkshire. Studied at the University of Leeds, 1911–14. Served in the army, 1915–18, fighting in France and Belgium: made captain, 1917; mentioned in dispatches; Military Cross, Distinguished Service Order, 1918. Founder, with Frank Rutter, Arts and Letters, 1917–20 (during the war via correspondence and when on leave). Married i) Evelyn Roff; z) Margaret Ludwig; four sons and one daughter. Assistant principal of the Treasury, London, 1919–22. Assistant keeper of ceramics and stained glass, Victoria and Albert Museum, London, 1922–31. Contributor, the Criterion, 1921–39, editor, Burlington Magazine, 1933–39, and editor, English Master Painters series, from 1940. Watson

Gordon Professor of Fine Arts, University of Edinburgh, 1931–33; Sydney Jones Lecturer in Art, University of Liverpool, 1935–36; Leon Fellow, University of London, 1940–42.; Charles Eliot Norton Professor of Poetry, Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1953–54. Knighted, 1953. Fellow, Center for Advanced Studies, Wesleyan University, Middletown, Connecticut, 1964–65. Awards: Erasmus Prize, 1966; honorary degrees from four universities. Honorary fellow, Society of Industrial Artists; Foreign Corresponding Member, Academie Flamande des Beaux Arts, 1953; Foreign Member, Royal Academy of Fine Arts, Stockholm, 1960; Honorary Member, American Academy of Arts and Letters, 1966. Died at Stonegrave house, Yorkshire, 12 June 1968.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Reason and Romanticism: Essays in Literary Criticism, 1926

English Prose Style, 1928

The Sense of Glory: Essays in Criticism, 1929

Julien Benda and the New Humanism, 1930

Wordsworth, 1930

Art Now, 1933

The Innocent Eye, 1933

Henry Moore, Sculptor, An Appreciation, 1934

Essential Communism, 1935

Art and Society, 1936

In Defence of Shelley and Other Essays, 1936

Collected Essays in Literary Criticism, 1938; as The Nature of Literature, 1956

Poetry and Anarchism, 1938

To Hell with Culture: Democratic Values Are New Values, 1941

Education Through Art, 1943

The Politics of the Unpolitical, 1943

The Education of Free Men, 1944

A Coat of Many Colours: Occasional Essays, 1945; revised edition, 1956

The Grass Roots of Art, 1947

The Philosophy of Modern Art: Collected Essays, 1952

The True Voice of Feeling, 1953

Anarchy and Order: Essays in Politics, 1954

The Tenth Muse: Essays in Criticism, 1957

The Forms of Things Unknown: Essays Toward an Aesthetic Philosophy, 1960

A Letter to a Young Painter, 1962

The Contrary Experience: Autobiographies, 1963

To Hell with Culture, and Other Essays on Art and Society, 1963

Art and Alienation: The Role of the Artist in Society, 1967

Essays in Literary Criticism: Particular Studies, 1969

A One-Man Manifesto and Other Writings for Freedom Press, edited by David Goodway, 1994

Other writings: poetry (including The End of a War, 1933), three radio plays, the novel The Green Child (1935), works on art history and literature, and a book on English prose style.

Bibliographies

Gerwing, Howard, and Michael W. Pidgeon, A Checklist of the Herbert Read Archive, Victoria, British Columbia: University of Victoria McPherson Library, 1969
 Read, Benedict, and David Thistlewood, in Herbert Read: A British Vision of World Art, edited by Read and Thistlewood, Leeds: Leeds City Art Galleries, 1993

Further Reading

Goodway, David, editor, Herbert Read, Liverpool: University of Liverpool Press, 1997
 Hortmann, Wilhelm, Wenn die Kunst stirbt, Duisberg: Braun, 1976
Ideologies of Britishness in Post-War Art and Culture, Collapse special issue, 1 (1994)
 Keel, John Siegfried, The Writings of Herbert Read and Their Curricular Implications (dissertation), Madison: University of Wisconsin, 1960
 King, James, The Last Modern: A Life of Herbert Read, London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, and New York: St. Martin's Press, 1990
 Read, Benedict, and David Thistlewood, editors, Herbert Read: A British Vision of World Art, Leeds: Leeds City Art Galleries, 1993
 Skelton, Robin, editor, Herbert Read: A Memorial Symposium, London: Methuen, 1970
 Thistlewood, David, Herbert Read: Formlessness and Form: An Introduction to His Aesthetics, London and Boston: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1984
 Treece, Henry, editor, Herbert Read: An Introduction to His Work by Various Hands, London: Faber, 1944; Port Washington, New York: Kennikat Press, 1969
 Woodcock, George, Herbert Read: The Stream and the Source, London: Faber, 1972

Religious Essay

In some ways, the term “religious essay” is an oxymoron, since “religious” is commonly used to suggest faithful devotion or orthodox certainty while as Graham Good suggests in The Observing Self: Rediscovering the Essay (1988), the essay tends to explore “inconsistencies” rather than reinforce existing systems. Yet the essay, like much literature in the West, has deep roots in Christian tradition and practice. Although in “Über Form und Wesen des Essays” (“On the Nature and Form of the Essay”) in Die Seele und die Formen (1911; Soul and Form), Georg Lukács saw medieval German mystics as a source of the essay form, medieval writers drew on a tradition of confession, apology, and polemic begun by early Church Fathers such as Augustine of Hippo. In his Confessions (wr. 397–98 CE), Augustine initiated a tradition of reflection on experience that placed the subjective “I” in a dynamic dialogue with both God and the reader.

Before the Reformation, that dialogue usually took place within a framework of doctrinal certainty, yet, in the 12th to 14th centuries, visionaries such as Julian of Norwich and Catherine of Siena affirmed the authority of subjective experience. Graham

Good, like other critics, describes the essay using terms that reflect its roots in this tradition: it is concerned with “illumination” rather than with “the accumulation of knowledge,” it substitutes a subjective “configuration” of experience for the “figura” of a received system, and its structure is “provisional” rather than “providential.” While medieval mystical texts foreshadowed this emphasis on subjective vision, the essay genre came into being as the mystics’ world was passing away.

The Reformation provided later essayists with strong models of religious texts in the vernacular, including translations of Scripture, polemical treatises, and sermons. Vernacular translations of the Bible, including Martin Luther’s (completed in 1534) and the English Authorized Version (1611) helped to produce the “plain style.” In Germany, Luther’s religious prose also made its mark. Works like Von der Freiheit eines Christenmenschen (1520; The Freedom of a Christian) provided later writers with a model of a ruggedly plain style, which gained force from its use of popular idiom.

Perhaps the Reformation’s greatest gift to the essay and to religious prose was its elevation of the sermon to the center of religious life among Protestants and Dissenters. In The English Sermon, 1550–1660 (1976) Martin Seymour-Smith notes that from 1550 to 1850 the sermon was “one of the main vehicles for current reflections about the way of the world,” exerting an important influence on prose, particularly in England. The word “sermon,” which comes from a Latin root meaning “talk” or “speech,” denotes a discourse, usually based on a text of Scripture, designed to present religious instruction or exhortation in oral form. Although from the 16th to the 19th centuries most sermons were written out, the fact that they were intended to be spoken shaped their length and rhetorical techniques. Like the essay, the sermon explores a limited subject, is relatively brief, and often is structured as an unfolding reflection on received tradition in the light of individual experience. The plain style coming into being at the end of the 17th century owes much to the ways sermons sought to communicate complex ideas in accessible language. In addition, while the sermon was an oral form, sermons were often printed and thus read by a wide audience. In the 16th century, the lucid prose of Thomas Cranmer’s Book of Homilies (1547) and the carefully crafted sermons of Hugh Latimer, who, Seymour-Smith suggests, seemed to “invite his listeners casually into the ramifications of his mind,” were influential.

In the 17th century, the meditative tradition shaped both the sermon and the prose essay. In “Meditative Poetry” (1971), Louis L.Martz states that by the 17th century, European Christians had developed a widely accepted method of meditation as “interior drama” in which the individual examined himself or herself, engaged in a dialogue with God, and imaginatively re-created the scenes of Christ’s life. This tradition shaped the dramatic preaching of John Donne as well as his prose “meditations” and “devotions.” Sir Thomas Browne embodied his attempt to sort out his beliefs in Religio Medici (1642) and in Hydriotaphia, or Urn Burial (1658), ornate prose essays that delight in paradox and depict the believing writer as “that great and true Amphibium, whose nature is disposed to live...in divided and distinguished worlds.” These words embody one of the central patterns enacted by religious essayists as they dramatized tensions in their experiences of faith and doubt in an increasingly rational and secular world.

Alongside the subjective drama of the meditative tradition, a number of other patterns developed during the 17th century. The sermons of Lancelot Andrewes contributed to the popularity of a witty, metaphysical style, ornate and linguistically playful, which is sometimes labeled “euphuistic.” In pamphlets such as Areopagitica (1644), John Milton forged a rhetoric of argument that is ordered yet imaginative, grounding his arguments equally in faith in a providential God and in the experience of the questing individual. In France, Jacques Benigne Bossuet’s sermons and prose writings created a polemic model that was balanced, dignified, and courteous, while clothing important ideas in simple language. While his fellow countryman Blaise Pascal is best known for the fragmentary Pensées (1670), his Lettres provinciales (1656–57; The Provincial Letters) exemplify another strategy for the religious essayist in his satirical dramatization of a plain Frenchman’s questioning of a Jesuit official. The pattern of aphoristic and fragmentary reflection in the Pensées influenced many 20th-century religious essayists.

In colonial America, existing patterns of meditation, spiritual autobiography, preaching, and polemic were reshaped by what Reverend Samuel Danforth called the “errand into the wilderness.” In “Religion and Literature” (1988), Lynn RossBryant notes that the Bible was a central literary model and suggests that the plain style’s reliance on “clear, concrete images” demanded that writers bring the details of their everyday experience in the New World into their prose. She also argues that the utopian aspirations of early religious settlers made the jeremiad an important pattern for American writers, since it not only examines the failures of the covenant people, but reasserts their providential relationship to God. This sense of providential mission is apparent in Increase Mather’s “An Essay for the Recording of Illustrious Providences” (1684), which follows the format of a scientific treatise, suggesting that the language and prose strategies of the new sciences were already reshaping the way religious writers examined the evidence for their faith. Jonathan Edwards best exemplifies the resulting combination of observing intellect and mystical faith in the prose of his sermons, treatises, narratives, and reflections. The spiritual autobiography of his “Personal Narrative” (wr. 1739?–42?) and the visionary exposition of A Divine and Supernatural Light (1734) suggest two central patterns for North American religious writing.

By Edwards’ day, in England as well as in America, the plain style and the rational epistemology of the scientific era dominated religious discourse. While the sermon was still an important form, it had become increasingly plain and direct. In The English Sermon, 1650–1750 (1976) C.H.Sisson describes the sermon in the new style as “on the whole, shorter than the old; it made three good points and sent people home to their dinner. Above all, it said nothing that would strike sensible people as out of the way...” At the same time, the burgeoning popular periodical press made the essay a major means of disseminating information and opinion. In the periodical presses, the essay began to replace the pamphlet as a means of public debate on religious issues, as is evidenced by the many responses to David Hume’s skeptical consideration of revelation and the supernatural in “On Miracles” (1748).

While many who saw their faith as endangered by rationalism and empiricism attempted to respond by using rational arguments and natural law analogies, another sort of religious essay flourished under the influence of writers like William Law. His A Serious Call to a Holy and Devout Life (1728) kept alive an affective, mystical, and pietistic approach to faith which flowered in the evangelical revivals later in the century. This strain of religious writing favored confessional modes, emphasizing spiritual autobiography shaped by patterns of self-scrutiny, conversion and epiphany, and pilgrimage or spiritual quest.

Both skeptical demythologizing and spiritual pilgrimage were important 19th-century modes of dealing with issues of faith. By the 19th century, the essay had gained a cultural authority that enabled the essayist to assume the role of sage or prophet. Many 19th-century essays stretch the boundaries of the genre by incorporating narrative and extending its length. In England, writers such as Samuel Taylor Coleridge and Thomas Carlyle sought to redefine received Christian tradition. From his “Religious Musings” (wr. 1794–96) to Aids to Reflection (1825), Coleridge, who “never yet read even a Methodist’s ‘Experience in a Gospel Magazine’ without receiving instruction and amusement,” sought to create a tolerant faith grounded in experience, intuition, and process. In Sartor Resartus (1833–34) Carlyle combined the techniques of autobiography, novel, and essay to embody his sense of the need for a “natural supernaturalism” to counter the spiritually and morally deadening force of mechanistic views of the universe. In contributions to Tracts for the Times, which was published between 1833 and 1841, and in works like Essay in Aid of a Grammar of Assent (1870), John Henry Newman set another pattern, addressing questions of faith and belief in ways intended to restore confidence in religious orthodoxy. Newman’s learning, his elegant style, and his successful embodiment of his own motto, cor ad cor loquitur (heart speaking to heart), gained him a wide reading audience.

On the continent and in the United States, 19th-century religious writers used a variety of essay forms to explore their religious crises and to reshape the language of conviction for an increasingly skeptical world. In the United States, Ralph Waldo Emerson combined the sage’s office with oratorical techniques in his Essays, First Series (1841) and Essays, Second Series (1844). In works like “The Divinity School Address,” “Self-Reliance,” and “The Oversoul,” Emerson rejected orthodoxy, redefining the sacred in terms of complete, honest personhood, harmony with the natural, and the spontaneous, oracular utterances of the “Orphic” voice. In Russia, Lev Tolstoi described the crisis which led him to reject orthodox religion in Ispoved’ (1884; A Confession) and went on to construct a gospel ethic stripped of supernaturalism in V chem moia vera? (1884; What I Believe). In Denmark, Søren Kierkegaard’s essays were both theologically and stylistically innovative, creating a genre of religious essay that combines theological reflection and imaginative construction in EntenEller (1843; Either/Or) and Stadier paa Livets Vej (1845; Stages on Life’s Way). He is one of the first writers to explore what he called the “existential” sense of man’s tragic situation in a universe that seems entirely at odds with man’s spirit.

The dilemma Kierkegaard named has been central for many 20th-century religious essayists. Albert Camus used the essay to explore philosophical and moral questions, creating a sort of theology without God. In Spain, Miguel de Unamuno’s essays, like his fiction, explore the tensions between reason and faith in the context of a strongly Catholic culture. In such works as Del sentimiento trágico de la vida (1913; The Tragic Sense of Life) he explored living in uncertainty.

The 20th century has also been rich in the work of writers who, like Newman, find it possible to embrace some sort of religious orthodoxy or supernatural religion. Early in the century, G.K.Chesterton and Hilaire Belloc both used the weapon of laughter to defend Roman Catholic orthodoxy. During and after World War II, English popular essayists C.S.Lewis and Dorothy L.Sayers created a vigorous Christian apologetic grounded in humor, reason, and the experience of everyday life. French essayists Simone Weil and Pierre Teilhard de Chardin responded to the challenges of skeptical science, social tyranny, and human need; their posthumously published works exerted a strong influence, particularly in America. Teilhard sought to recover the consciousness of the world as a "divine milieu," while in works like Attente de Dieu (1950; Waiting for God), Weil embraced a faith grounded in identification with the suffering outsider. Dietrich Bonhoeffer, executed by the Nazis in 1943, provided the model of a reasoned, devout, and deeply moral faith in his posthumously published Letters and Papers from Prison (1953).

For essayists in the Jewish tradition, the Holocaust has provided a literal and metaphorical crisis of faith which demands a theological answer. Abraham Joshua Heschel and Elie Wiesel, two notable writers in this tradition, attempt to synthesize Eastern European and Western experience and ideas. Heschel's essays present the "pathos" of God in order to reinvent the ground on which 20th-century rationalists can meet the Divine. Wiesel explores the mystery of suffering in journalistic essays and fictional narratives that have earned him the label of "a modern Job."

In the United States, the 20th century has seen a lively variety of writers on religious topics, with several patterns emerging. Thomas Merton and Henri J.M.Nouwen exemplify the revival of the contemplative tradition in essays that combine spiritual autobiography with moral and spiritual guidance. Wendell Berry and Annie Dillard have embodied a strong spiritual response to the natural world, coupled with a keen sense of moral responsibility, and, in Dillard's case, a soaring, magical prose style. Frederick Buechner and Madeleine L'Engle have taken fresh looks at old spiritual paradigms, through the lens of the joys and pains of ordinary life. Walker Percy examined the malaise of modern life and diagnosed the need for a renewal of belief to fill the vacuum created by skepticism, technological advancement, and materialism. The sheer variety and energy of these voices suggest that the United States has remained open to belief, fulfilling the dream of another influential American essayist, William James, who declared in The Will to Believe (1897) that "Religious fermentation is always a symptom of the intellectual vigor of a society" and urged his readers in a pluralistic society to continue to take "the risk of belief."

LINDA MILLS WOOLSEY

Further Reading

Cline, Dorothy Peake, The Word Abused: Problematic Religious Language in Selected Prose Works of Swift, Wesley, and Johnson (dissertation), Newark: University of Delaware, 1991

Cockshut, A.O.J., Anglican Attitudes: A Study of Victorian Religious Controversies, London: Collins, 1959

Frye, Roland M., Perspective on Man: Literature and the Christian Tradition, Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1961

Gordon, Mary, editor, Spiritual Quests: The Art and Craft of Religious Writing, Boston:

Houghton Mifflin, 1988

Gunn, Giles B., editor, Literature and Religion, London: SCM Press, 1971

Hudson, Elizabeth K., "English Protestants and the Imitatio Christi, 1580–1620," Sixteenth Century Journal 19, no. 4 (1988):541–88

Jarrett-Kerr, Martin, Studies in Literature and Belief, London: Rockliff, 1954

Kantra, Robert A., "Undenominational Satire: Chesterton and Lewis Revisited," Religion and Literature 24, no. 1 (1992):33–57

Keeble, N.H., The Literary Culture of Nonconformity in Later Seventeenth-Century England, Leicester: Leicester University Press, 1987

Link-Salinger, Ruth, editor, Of Scholars, Savants, and Their Texts: Studies in Philosophy and Religious Thought, New York: Lang, 1989

McDiarmid, John, "Humanism, Protestantism, and English Scripture, 1533–1540," Journal of Medieval and Renaissance Studies 14, no. 2 (1984):121–38

Panikas, George Andrew, Mansions of the Spirit: Essays in Literature and Religion, New York: Hawthorn, 1967

Reedy, Gerard S.J., The Bible and Reason: Anglicans and Scripture in Late Seventeenth-Century England, Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1985

Ruland, Vernon, Horizons of Criticism: An Assessment of Religious Literary Options, Chicago: American Library Association, 1975

Sasek, Lawrence A., The Literary Temper of the English Puritans, Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1961

Scott, Nathan, Modern Literature and the Religious Frontier, New York: Harper, 1958

Shuger, Debora K., Sacred Rhetoric: The Christian Grand Style in the English Rhetoric, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1988

Smith, Nigel, Perfection Proclaimed: Language and Literature in English Radical Religion, 1640–1660, Oxford: Clarendon Press, and New York: Oxford University Press, 1989

Willey, Basil, More Nineteenth-Century Studies: A Group of Honest Doubters, London: Chatto and Windus, and New York: Columbia University Press, 1956

Renan, Ernest

French, 1823–1892

Although Ernest Renan is probably best known for his L'Avenir de la science (1890; The Future of Science), his history of Judeo-Christian origins (especially Vie de Jésus [1863; The Life of Jesus]), and his autobiography, Souvenirs d'enfance et de jeunesse (1883; Recollections of My Youth), the several hundred articles he wrote over a period of some 40 years—notably for the Revue des Deux Mondes (Review of two worlds) and the Journal des Débats, and collected in seven books and part of two others—form an important cross-section of his oeuvre and are among his finest works. It is in these essays, furthermore, that we best encounter Renan in the many sides of his personality: the scholar proficient as archaeologist, epigraphist, philologist, and historian; the tireless and joyful traveler; the political analyst and acute critic of contemporary affairs; the "penseur," as the French call their thinkers who are not systematic or professional philosophers; and the marvelously gifted prose writer. The essays' importance is enhanced by the fact that Renan was very conscious of their belonging to a "new literary genre" (preface, Études d'histoire religieuse), a type of writing that he considered, in fact, characteristic of his century and of its best literary efforts.

Renan's essay production may be roughly divided into three periods: the inartistic, combative journalism of the 1840s; the mature, artistically sensitive criticism of the 1850s, 1860s, and early 1870s; and the somewhat frivolous pieces of his late years, from about 1876 to his death in 1892. In this last phase one still finds, exceptionally, a few of his greatest essays.

From 1848 to 1850, in the pro-revolutionary, republican, socialist Liberté de Penser: Revue Philosophique et Liéteraire, the brilliant young scholar of Semitic languages took his first bold journalistic strides into two fields that were to interest him permanently: the history of religion and contemporary political and religious questions. In a partisan polemical spirit, the former Catholic seminarian, who had abandoned orthodox faith under the pressure of rationalism and biblical criticism, attacks clericalism and defends liberalism in a crude, dogmatic style (not without real vigor) as different from his mature style as night from day. That he had Pascal's brilliant polemic against the Jesuits, the Lettres provinciales (1657; The Provincial Letters, signed "Louis de Montalte"), in mind as a model is shown by his use of the pseudonym "Ernest de Montalte" for one of the most caustic satiric essays of the series.

The stylistic revisions that Renan made in these articles when he published them in later essay collections reveal in striking fashion the evolution of his style and its growth into the subtly refined, artistic, often poetic prose of his mature manner. This profound change, coinciding with his elevation of the article de revue into a "new literary genre," was due in part to the influence of his mentor, the great historian of medieval France, Augustin Thierry, and to that of such purists and advocates of classical French prose style as his sister, Henriette, and the editor of the Journal des Débats, Ustazade de Sacy (both this journal and the Revue des Deux Mondes had much higher literary standards than the Liberté de Penser); but above all it was due to the aesthetic awakening he experienced as the result of his academic mission to Italy in 1849–50. He had also discovered, thanks largely to Thierry, that refinement of form was inseparable from force of argument, even in historical and philosophical writing.

The first fruit of his literary conversion, at age 34, was the Études d'histoire religieuse (1857; Studies of Religious History), a landmark in the history of the French essay, which introduces a number of features that will remain characteristic of Renan's essay art. In his hands the essay, already given a new dignity by the choice of the word "study" in the title, becomes a supreme instrument of "vulgarisation," even "haute vulgarisation," as the French call it (as distinct from mere "popularisation"), or the art of rendering erudition accessible to the common reader. (Sainte-Beuve had paved the way with his humanization of literary scholarship.) Renan's subjects include religions of antiquity, Judaism, Christianity, Islam, Calvin, Unitarianism, neo-Hegelianism, and religious art. Criticism, with its synthesis of the "sentiment religieux" ("religious sense," as distinct from dogmas and creeds) and scholarly historical analysis, has become nothing less than "an original form of creation peculiar to our age" (preface). Although the Études may be read independently of one another, the author, very conscious of the need to provide a truly unified and organic whole (preface), arranges them with an eye to the thematic structure of the book as a whole.

These formal features are continued and perfected in Renan's second collection, the Essais de morale et de critique (1859; Moral and critical essays), which surpass the Études and may well be his greatest essay work. It consists of an important preface followed by 13 essays, divided roughly into two parts: the first, a series of critical portraits aiming to define the originality of his own generation (the generation of 1848) by comparing it with the preceding one (the Romantic), represented by a philosopher (Victor Cousin), a religious writer (Félicité Robert de Lamennais), and a historian (Thierry); and the second, using history as a springboard, a moral and political critique of the Second Empire. The main theme, giving coherence to the different essays, is "the establishing of freedom by way of the regeneration of the individual conscience" (preface). Resistance, in the name of an intellectual and moral elite, is urged against middle-class mediocrity and vulgarity and against the tyranny of the centralized, bureaucratic state. Various examples of forces counteracting materialism culminate in the final essay, the famous "Poésie des races celtiques" (Poetry of Celtic races). Renan, as a Breton, makes of his Celtic inheritance from a "golden age" of idealism and spirituality the supreme symbol of resistance to what he calls "an age of lead and tin."

The essayist's method here is to employ an intricate pattern, almost rhythmical in nature, of abstract thought, concrete detail, anecdote, poetic image, and reflection, subtly suggesting his message more often than he directly states it. It is the method of "grasping one's object by way of successive approximations" (this last term was taken up by Renan's admirer, Charles Du Bos, to become the title of his own essay masterpiece, Approximations [1922–37]). The style, with its subtle harmonies and its "slow and calm manner of breathing" (Jules Renard), for the most part appeals less to the eye than to the ear—and to the moral sense.

By contrast, Renan's two subsequent essay volumes, the Questions contemporaines (1868; Contemporary questions) and La Réforme intellectuelle et morale (1871; Intellectual and moral reform), deal in a much more direct and vigorous style with political problems in the broadest sense, including education, and with proposed solutions. The first is a sober critique of the Second Empire in its final phase, while the second is a zealous, provocative, at times apocalyptic vision of the ills of a France seeking to recover from its defeat in the Franco-Prussian War. "Reactionary" as La Réforme is, in its pushing of the elitist thesis of the Essais to authoritarian if not protofascist extremes, it makes more exciting reading than the Questions and contains some of Renan's most prophetic writing. In both books he has mastered the art of conferring on essays written for specific political occasions ("écrits de circonstance") a more universal, permanent interest and value; at his best he ranks with such great political essayists as Walter Bagehot and Lord Acton.

Renan's philosophical essays, though only four in number, form a significant part of his total philosophical work. Three, composed in the 1860s, appeared as "fragments" in Dialogues et fragments philosophiques (1876; Philosophical Dialogues and Fragments), and the fourth, "Examen de conscience philosophique" (Examination of philosophical conscience), one of his greatest essays, is the concluding piece in his final book, Feuilles détachées (Detached leaves), published in the year of his death in 1892. To come to these from his political essays is to leave “importunate truths” expressed in forceful prose for a tenuous verbal music expressive of their author’s belief that philosophy, apart from its usefulness as a handmaid of history and science, and especially in that branch of it known as metaphysics, is essentially a form of poetry. Renan’s famous “play of ideas” occurs to some extent in these essays, but for a freer, more unpredictable, more “essayistic” form of such play one must turn to what he called the “conversations between the different lobes of [his] brain” in the dialogues, where he reveals himself to be a worthy successor of Plato and Malebranche. As a philosophical essayist he is perhaps less great than Emerson (with whom he had a remarkable affinity, as noted by Bland Blanshard, 1984), George Santayana, or Bertrand Russell.

In his final period Renan produced four essay collections, if we include the “oral essays” of the Discours et conférences (1887; Speeches and lectures), containing one of his most famous and most lastingly relevant pieces, “Qu’est-ce qu’une nation?” (What is a nation?). On the whole these collections of “songeries crépusculaires” (twilight musings), as Maurice Barrés called them in Huit Jours chez M. Renan (1913), contain a greater number of charming trifles and miscellaneous bits of erudition and fewer of the polished, deliberate essays of the kind to which the earlier Renan has accustomed us. He seems to have felt that the heyday of such “grands articles” had passed. The style has become somewhat facile and flaccid. Nor is the “renanisme” that marks many of these pieces—the attitude of a Gallic Buddha smiling ironically at the spectacle of a world that should not be taken too seriously—to everyone’s taste. The Nouvelles études d’histoire religieuse (1884; New studies in religious history, translated as Studies in Religious History) is a superficial successor to the great Études of 1857. The Mélanges d’histoire et de voyages (1878; Miscellany of historical and travel essays), on the other hand, is a neglected book containing several fine specimens of historiography in the best Renanian tradition as well as a great travel essay, “Vingt Jours en Sicile” (20 days in Sicily). This essay, based on his trip to a learned congress in Palermo in 1875, is a beautiful, sensuous recapturing of youthful spirit on the part of the aging and ailing scholar; it corresponds in his work to the place held by Montaigne’s “Sur des vers de Virgile” (1588; “On Some Verses of Virgil”) in his Essais. Exceptionally fine essays are also still found in the Feuilles détachées, with its lovely play on words of the title—autumnal pages detached from the tree of his work; leaves falling from the tree of his life; his death anticipated with serene detachment. In reality the book offers the last variation on the Renanian theme of the “poetry of the self,” and is offered as a sequel to his Recollections of My Youth. It rises to a fitting culmination in his final essay, a philosophical last testament and summing up of his deepest beliefs, the “Examen de conscience philosophique.” An important counterweight to the skepticism and frivolity of renanisme itself, it is also nothing less than Renan’s “De l’expérience” (Montaigne, 1588; “On Experience”).

Renan as an essayist learned much from Sainte-Beuve’s Portraits and Lundis, although he had serious reservations about their author as a thinker. It was Sainte-Beuve, on the other hand, who with no less modesty than critical acumen singled out his younger contemporary as “the master of a new genre,” that is, the “article de revue.” In his essays in religious history Renan succeeded in annexing that field into the realm of literature (Brunetière, Cinq lettres sur Renan, 1904). The breadth of his essays, equaled in France only by those of Sainte-Beuve and Montaigne (who surpasses them both), is derived not only from his extraordinarily broad learning and culture, but also and even more from his lifelong insistence on representing multiple and contradictory points of view, on “not letting a single component of humanity stifle any other” (Fragments intimes et romanesques [1914; Intimate and fictional fragments]). His essays faithfully reflect the “fabric woven of contradictions” that he exulted in being. He also enriched his essay work by combining subjective and objective points of view. Like Sainte-Beuve, he avoided deeply personal disclosures à la Montaigne, reserving these, again like Sainte-Beuve, for his intimate notebooks. He reproached his contemporaries “for being too subjective, too wrapped up in themselves,” a criticism that would seem to augur poorly for a would-be essayist. Yet, paradoxically, like Sainte-Beuve, he succeeded in speaking meaningfully of himself while at the same time being “absorbed in the object, that is, in all that lies before us, the world, nature, history” (preface, Feuilles détachées). Among essayists who learned from his example are, in France, Anatole France, Émile Faguet, Jules Lemaître, Paul Bourget, Charles Du Bos; abroad, Matthew Arnold, Walter Pater, George Santayana.

RICHARD M.CHADBOURNE

Biography

Ernest Joseph Renan. Born 28 February 1823 in Tréguier, Brittany. Studied at the École Ecclésiastique, Tréguier, 1831–38; seminary of Saint-Nicolas du Chardonnet (run by Abbé Dupanloup), Paris, 1838–41, and seminaries at Issy, 1841–43, and Saint-Sulpice, 1843–45; tutor, 1845–48; studied privately for licence in letters, 1846, agrégation in philosophy, 1848, and doctorate in letters, 1852. Contributor to Liberté de Penser and Journal de l'Instruction Publique, late 1840s, Journal des Débats, early 1850s, and Revue des Deux Mondes, from 1853. Sent by government to classify manuscripts of major Italian libraries, 1849–50; lived with his sister Henriette in Paris, from 1851; worked for the manuscript section, Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris, 1851–60. Elected to the Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres, 1856. Married Cornélie Scheffer, 1856: one daughter (died in infancy) and one son. Led archaeological expedition to Phoenicia (Syria), 1860, and Palestine, 1861, where Henriette died of malaria. Professor of Hebrew, Collège de France, Paris, 1861–64 and from 1870 (administrator, from 1883). Traveled to Egypt and the Upper Nile, 1864. Assistant director of manuscripts department for the Imperial Library, 1864. Founded collection of Semitic inscriptions, Corpus Inscriptionum Semiticarum, and named secretary of the Société Asiatique, 1867. Ran unsuccessfully as liberal candidate for deputyship in district of Meaux, 1869. Elected to the French Academy, 1878. Award: Volney Prize, 1847; Officer, 1880, Commander, 1884, and Grand Officer, 1888, Legion of Honor. Died (of pneumonia and heart trouble) in Paris, 2 October 1892.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Études d'histoire religieuse, 1857; as Studies of Religious History, translated by O.B.Frothingham, 1864

Essais de morale et de critique, 1859

Questions contemporaines, 1868

La Réforme intellectuelle et morale, 1871

Dialogues et fragments philosophiques, 1876; as Dialogues philosophiques., edited by Laudyce Rétat, 1991; as Philosophical Dialogues and Fragments, translated by Râs Bihâri Mukharjî, 1883

Mélanges d'histoire et de voyages, 1878

Nouvelles études d'histoire religieuse, 1884; as Studies in Religious History, translated by William M.Thomson, 1886

Discours et conférences, 1887

Feuilles détachées, 1892

La Réforme intellectuelle et morale et autres écrits (selection), edited by Alain de Benoist, 1981

Renan histoire et parole, œuvres diverses (selection), edited by Laudyce Rétat, 1984

Other writings: a book on the future of science (1890), a seven-volume history of the origins of Christianity (Les Origines du christianisme, 1863–82), a history of the people of Israel (1887–93), other works on religion, the autobiography Souvenirs d'enfance et de jeunesse (1883; Recollections of My Youth), Drames philosophiques (1888), and a book about his sister Henriette (1862). Also translated several books of the Bible from Hebrew.

Collected works edition: Œuvres complètes, edited by Henriette Psichari, 10 vols., 1947–61.

Bibliography

Girard, Henri, and Henri Moncel, Bibliographie des œuvres de Ernest Renan, Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1923

Further Reading

Arnold, Matthew, "M.Renan," in his Essays in Criticism, Third Series, Folcroft, Pennsylvania: Folcroft, 1969 (original edition, 1910)

Babbitt, Irving, "Renan," in his The Masters of Modern French Criticism, Boston and New York: Houghton Mifflin, 1912

Blanshard, Bland, "Ernest Renan," in his Four Reasonable Men: Marcus Aurelius, John Stuart Mill, Ernest Renan, Henry Sidgwick, Middletown, Connecticut: Wesleyan University Press, 1984

Chadbourne, Richard, "Renan or the Contemptuous Approach to Literature," Yale French Studies 2 (1949):96–104

Chadbourne, Richard, "Renan as Prophet of the European and World Future," American

- Society of Legion of Honor Magazine* 11 (1951):199–309
- Chadbourne, Richard, “Renan’s Revision of His Liberté de Penser Articles,” PMLA 66 (1951):917–50
- Chadbourne, Richard, “Renan and Sainte-Beuve,” Romanic Review 44 (1953):127–35
- Chadbourne, Richard, Ernest Renan as an Essayist, Ithaca, New York: Corneli University Press, 1957
- Chadbourne, Richard, Ernest Renan, New York: Twayne, 1968
- Darmsteter, James, “Ernest Renan,” New World 2 (1893): 401–33
- “Ernest Renan,” in Nineteenth-Century Literary Criticism, vol. 26, edited by Janet Mullane and Robert Wilson, Detroit: Gale Research, 1990:361–428
- Guéhenno, Jean, Aventures de l’esprit, Paris: Gallimard, 1954
- Guérard, Albert, “Renan,” in his French Prophets of Yesterday, London: Unwin, and New York: Appleton, 1913
- James, Henry, “Renan’s Dialogues and Philosophic Fragments” in his Literary Reviews and Essays on American, English, and French Literature, edited by Albert Mordell, New York: Twayne, 1957 (original article published 1876)
- Monod, Gabriel, Les Maîtres de l’histoire: Renan, Taine, Michelet, Paris: Calmann-Levy, 1894
- Mott, Lewis, Ernest Renan, New York and London: Appleton, 1921
- Neff, Emery, “History as Art: Renan, Burckhardt, Green,” in his The Poetry of History, New York: Columbia University Press, 1947
- Peyre, Henri, “Ernest Renan, critique littéraire,” PMLA 44 (1929): 288–308
- Pommier, Jean, Renan, d’après des documents inédits, Paris: Perrin, 1923
- Psichari, Henriette, Renan d’après lui-même, Paris: Plon, 1937
- Sainte-Beuve, Charles-Augustin, “M.Ernest Renan,” in his Nouveaux Lundis, vol. 2, Paris: Lévy, 3rd edition, 1870
- Sainte-Beuve, Charles-Augustin, “Vie de Jésus par M.Ernest Renan,” in his Nouveaux Lundis, vol. 6, Paris: Lévy, 1872
- Saintsbury, George, “Ernest Renan,” Fortnightly Review 27 (1880): 625–43
- Smith, Colin, “The Fictionalist Element in Renan’s Thought,” French Studies 9 (1955):30–41
- Smith, Colin, “Renan’s Final Cosmology,” Forum for Modern Language Studies 14 (1978):231–46
- Wardman, H.W., Ernest Renan: A Critical Biography, London: Athlone Press, 1964
- Wardman, H.W., “L’Esprit de finesse and Style in Renan,” Modern Language Review 59 (1964):215–24
- Wilson, Edmund, “Decline of the Revolutionary Tradition: Renan,” in his To the Finland Station: A Study in the Writing and Acting of History, New York: Harcourt Brace, and London: Secker and Warburg, 1940

Reportage

Theories of contemporary journalism and literature reveal a variety of sometimes contradictory definitions of the term “reportage,” which is often used in relation to the essay broadly conceived. Two distinct traditions exist for defining the nature of reportage. First, there is the journalistic perspective, restricting the term to a subgenre of reporting. Second, there is the literary perspective, particularly discussed in relation to the New Journalism.

From the Latin reportare (to bring news, to announce, to report), the word “reportage” is generally used in Romance languages to refer to an enriched variation of what in standard journalistic English is known as the news story, meaning a piece of direct, informative reporting, as opposed to comment (editorials and columns). This system of dividing all journalistic work into two categories (news and comment) reflects the success of American-led theory in journalism schools. In other cultural traditions, especially Southern Europe and until very recently Latin America, “news” is considered as at least three different variations of informative journalism. First, there are stories, second reportage, and third a hybrid category using terms derived from the word “chronicle.”

In modern journalism two elements distinguish a pure news story from reportage: the purpose of the “lead-in,” and the language and structure. In a pure news story, the lead-in summarizes the main points of the news by answering the so-called five “W” questions (Who, What, Where, When, and Why); the lead-in of a piece of reportage attempts to attract the attention of the reader and presents a wider stylistic range: an epigram, an ironic fact, the use of color and contrast, a question, or a relevant quotation. The main body of an item of reportage, as well as the traditional news story, has at last three kinds of approach: the fact story (a series of facts in descending importance), the action story (initial event, then follow-up with details, then return to the initial event with additional arguments, etc.), and the “quote” story (lead, quotation, new summary of context, documentation, more quotation, etc.). Models of fact story and action story are the items in news magazines such as Time and Newsweek.

What in continental Europe is called “in-depth” reportage corresponds to the American “in-depth reporting,” also known as interpretative reporting, and even investigative reporting. Its distinctive ingredients are the provision of background, a human element to the story, a degree of explanation and clarification, and an attempt to help the reader understand the underlying significance of the events.

Theorists of journalism also comment on related subgenres such as the French chronique, related to the American “column” and therefore belonging to the realm of opinion, along with the editorial. In contrast, the Spanish crónica and the Italian cronaca are considered as hybrid subgenres, lying somewhere between the column and the story, and retain as their goal the provision of information. A standard definition of crónica includes direct and immediate narration, which evaluates the chronological progression of an event. Such elements are also the primary criteria for the inclusion of certain texts in English anthologies of reportage, for example the writings of Xenophon, Marco Polo, Amerigo Vespucci, Bartolomé de Las Casas, and Garcilaso de la Vega, as well as recent accounts by such distinguished writers as George Bernard Shaw, George Orwell, Stephen Crane, John Reed, and John Steinbeck, and nonprofessional writers such as Hitler’s general Erwin Rommel and the astronaut Neil Armstrong.

It is not surprising, therefore, that a wide variety of writing is routinely catalogued as reportage by publishers and libraries. First, there is the work of the practitioners of New Journalism, a school or trend that is not really so “New” since it corresponds to what is also called “literary journalism.” Contextual evidence questions the “journalistic” nature of the best of New Journalism: though many typical examples of the trend have appeared in newspapers or magazines, they might just as easily have been published as books. However, literary journalists do have to follow certain procedures, such as researching the topic, maintaining an interwoven structure, reporting the facts accurately, keeping a sense of responsibility, and often adding an element of symbolism.

In its widest sense, reportage also includes nonsyndicated columnists as well as some of the classic syndicated journalists, writers who exhibit a personal style that transcends the standard formats pursued by editors. The term “reportage” could also embrace the work of some of the best Pulitzer Prize winners, and take in some of the more elaborate varieties of the journalistic form more usually known as the feature.

All the variations of reportage have certain characteristics in common with the essay. First, they usually reflect the author’s own concerns and personality. Second, they express a greater interest in the human elements than in the facts of the newsworthy events themselves. They are more attracted to aspects of what in the Spanish tradition is called the intrahistoria, the daily activities of ordinary people, than the milestones of official history. Third, the structure and style show a degree of flexibility that obviates the need to use the inverted pyramid (in which facts are presented in descending order of importance) prevalent in standard informative newspaper writing. Finally, they attempt to persuade the reader of a particular stance even as they claim objectivity in the presentation of facts. It could be said that the essay and reportage share similar characteristics and constraints, the most apparent being the opinion-prone and author-centered nature of the writing.

JOAQUÍN ROY

See also Journalism and the Essay

Anthologies

The Best of Granta Reportage, London: Granta/Penguin, and New York: Viking Penguin, 1994

The Faber Book of Reportage, edited by John Carey, London: Faber, 1987; as Eyewitness to History, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1987

The New Journalism, edited by Tom Wolfe and E.W. Johnson, New York: Harper and Row, 1973

A Sourcebook of American Literary Journalism: Representative Writers in an Emerging Genre, edited by Thomas B. Connery, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1992

Further Reading

Copple, Neale, with Emily E. Trickey, Depth Reporting: An Approach to Journalism, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice Hall, 1964

Foley, Barbara, Telling the Truth: The Theory and Practice of Documentary Fiction, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1986

Frus, Phyllis, The Politics and Poetics of Journalistic Narrative: The Timely and the

- Timeless*, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1994
- Geisler, Michael, Die literarische Reportage in Deutschland: Möglichkeiten und Grenzen eines operativen Genres, Königstein: Scriptor, 1982
- Hernadi, Paul, Beyond Genre: New Directions in Literary Classification, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1972
- Rothmeyer, Karen, Winning Pulitzers: The Stories Behind Some of the Best News Coverage of Our Time, New York: Columbia University Press, 1991
- Scholes, Robert, and Carl H.Klaus, Elements of the Essay, New York: Oxford University Press, 1970
- Winterowd, W.Ross, The Rhetoric of the "Other" Literature, Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1990
- Wolfe, Tom, The New Journalism (includes an anthology edited by Wolfe and E.W.Johnson), New York: Harper and Row, 1973

Replier, Agnes

American, 1855–1950

In her “happy half century” as an essayist, Agnes Replier produced 18 volumes of essays. She placed the first of her Lamb-like “conversations” in the Atlantic Monthly in 1886 and continued to appear regularly in the Atlantic and other outlets of higher journalism, such as the Century Magazine and Harper’s, until the late 1930s.

Replier used what she called “the light essay” to explore such specific and seemingly random subjects as mirrors, dogs, letters, diaries, spinsters, cakes and ale, as well as topics as abstract and diverse as superstition, education, pleasure, ennui, Christianity, humor, and war. Of her many subjects the two she returned to the most were those that made up the title of her first book—Books and Men (1888)—with the “men” usually being authors.

Replier was an autodidact. Though she would eventually receive honorary degrees from Notre Dame, Pennsylvania, Princeton, Yale, and Columbia, her formal education ended when her rebelliousness got her expelled from convent school at the age of 15. The many allusions and quotations in her essays testify to the fact that she read voraciously and always with a pencil in hand. Her essays flow from the tradition of the commonplace book. An early (1894) and anonymous reviewer in the Atlantic cited them as examples of “the bookish essay,” a “harvest of book-browsings” that makes “no attempt at criticism beyond the report of the effect of a volume upon the personality of the essayist.” Such a summary statement overstates the case, but Replier’s displays of knowledge are sometimes intrusive. Witness for example the piling up of (often obscure) allusion in this single sentence:

Actaeon flying as a stag from the pursuit of his own hounds; Circe’s swinish captives groveling at their troughs; Björn turned into a bear through the malice of his stepmother, and hunted to death by his father, King Kring; the swans of Lir floating mournfully on the icy waters of the Moyle; the loup-garou lurking in the forest of Brittany, the oborot coursing over the Russian steppes; Merlin sleeping in the gloomy depths of Broceliande, and Raknar buried fifty fathoms below the coast of Helluland, are alike the victims of “woven and of waving hands,” whether the spell be cast by an outraged divinity, or by the cruel hand of a malignant foe.” (“On the Benefits of Superstition,” 1888)

Repplier does not so much criticize literature as talk about her reading, which ranged widely in the Latin classics and the established canons of both France and England. She offers impressions, but does not build a system. She is often enthusiastic, sometimes acerbic, but never a true theoretician.

Repplier’s essays ramble, but Repplier’s style is always polished and energetic. Her tone is at once companionable and ironic, gentle and biting. She wrote often on humor—e.g. “A Plea for Humor” (1891), “Wit and Humor” (1893), “Humor: English and American” (1894), “The Mission of Humor” (1912), “Cruelty and Humor” (1920), “The American Laughs” (1924), and “The Unconscious Humor of the Movies” (1931)—and though she criticized the tendency in both individuals and nations to hold the humor of others in disdain, she herself favored the English brand of wit and drollery. She expects, even requires, an alert reader. Of motion pictures, which she termed a “kind of amplified and diversified Punch and Judy show, depending on incessant action and plenty of hard knocks,” she wrote, “Even the animals—dogs, donkeys and pigs—are subject to catastrophes that must wreck their confidence in life” (“The American Laughs”). Of the snobbery of colonial Philadelphia Anglicans who were willing to forego their privileges as British subjects in order to have their way with the Quakers, she noted, “The ardent churchman felt no sacrifice too great for the coveted privilege of correcting his neighbor’s misdemeanors” (Philadelphia: The Place and the People, 1898).

Her humor was her saving grace, for her opinions were firmly held and often unpopular. Her irony was as self-deprecating as it was wicked. Unmarried herself, she wrote essays on “The Spinster” (1904) and “Three Famous Old Maids” (1895)—e.g. “Miss Austen, Miss Edgeworth, Miss Mitford.” She was a political conservative and devout Catholic, but did not shirk from alluding to her own weakness for drink (“The Strayed Prohibitionist,” 1920), though it should be noted that she wrote with equal enthusiasm about tea (To Think of Tea!, 1932). She was less evenhanded with other topics. Her attacks on feminists, pacifists, and other reformers were always uncompromising and sometimes contemptuous. Immigrants were holding America back. Liberals were pessimists who lacked “sympathy with man and with his work, with the beautiful and imperfect things he has made of the chequered centuries” (“Consolations of a Conservative,” 1920).

She saw herself as a classicist and a patrician whose task it was to defend literary tradition, that “little band of authors who, unknown to the wide careless world, remain from generation to generation the friends of a few fortunate readers” (introduction to the biography James Howell, 1907). If she could choose one “happy half century,” she said, it would be the one that straddled 1800. For her, this meant that the essay should be Lambian. She recognized the obstinacy of such a position, but persisted. As early as 1894 she allowed that “the essay may die, but just now it possesses a lively and encouraging vitality” (“The Passing of the Essay”). To prove her point, she cited the popularity of seven particular essayists. Unfortunately, three of them were already dead and two more would die within the year. By 1918, she was admitting defeat: “The personal essay, the little bit of sentiment or observation, the lightly offered commentary which aims to appear the artless thing it isn’t—this exotic, of which Lamb was a rare exponent, has withered in the blasts of war” (“The American Essay in War Time”).

Replier’s version of the personal essay may have been narrow and antiquated, but she practiced it with enough energy, wit, and style that James Gray in American NonFiction: 1900–1950 (1952) credits her with keeping it “alive almost without aid far into the 1930’s.”

NED STUCKEY-FRENCH

Biography

Born 1 April 1855 in Philadelphia. Studied at the Convent of the Sacred Heart, Philadelphia: expelled at age 10; Eden Hall Sacred Heart convent, Torresdale, Pennsylvania, 1867–70; Miss Agnes Irwin’s School, Philadelphia, 1870–71: expelled. Lived primarily in Philadelphia; traveled a great deal in Europe. Contributor to many journals, from 1881, including Catholic World and the Atlantic Monthly. Friends with other writers, including Oliver Wendell Holmes and Walt Whitman. Awards: Laetare Medal, 1911; American Academy of Arts and Letters Gold Medal, 1935; honorary degrees from five universities. Died in Philadelphia, 15 December 1950.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Books and Men, 1888

Points of View, 1891

Essays in Miniature, 1892

Essays in Idleness, 1893

In the Dozy Hours, and Other Papers, 1894

Varia, 1897

Philadelphia: The Place and the People, 1898

The Fireside Sphinx, 1901

Compromises, 1904

A Happy Half-Century, and Other Essays, 1908

Americans and Others, 1912

Counter-Currents, 1916

Points of Friction, 1920

Under Dispute, 1924

Times and Tendencies, 1931

To Think of Tea!, 1932

In Pursuit of Laughter, 1936

Eight Decades: Essays and Episodes, 1937

Other writings: the autobiography In Our Convent Days (1905) and biographies. Also edited A Book of Famous Verse (1892).

Further Reading

- “Contemporary Essays,” Atlantic Monthly 73 (February 1894): 265
- Flanagan, John T., “A Distinguished American Essayist,” South Atlantic Quarterly 44 (1945):162–69
- Hall, James Norman, “A Word for the Essayist,” Yale Review 32, (September 1942):50–58
- Pattee, Fred Lewis, A History of American Literature Since 1870, New York: Century, 1915:42,8–32
- Pattee, Fred Lewis, The New American Literature, 1890–1930, New York: Century, 1930:434–35
- Replier, Emma (Mrs. Lightner Witmer), Agnes Replier: A Memoir, Philadelphia: Dorrance, 1957
- Rickenbacker, William F., “Agnes Replier Revisited,” Modern Age: A Quarterly Review 36, no. 4 (Summer 1994):341–50
- Stokes, George Stewart, Agnes Replier: Lady of Letters, Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, and London: Oxford University Press, 1949

Rêverie

It is irony rather than paradox that the French genre of rêverie should have been born of the rationalist 18th century, the siècle des lumières, which saw the emergence of scientific rationalism as the supreme authority in philosophy. Yet that was the period during which was also born what with hindsight we have decided to call “pre-Romanticism,” a movement connected with the cultivation of tenderness, the expression of feeling, and concern with the nonlogical, irrational forms of human experience, including rêves or dreams. The connection between the French Romantic movement and pre-Romanticism is actually tenuous, but a continuity is apparent in the increasing interest in mental states, of which the rêverie represents one type, existing outside the sphere of strict logic and relaxing the enforcement of strict rational control.

As a mental event, the rêverie, to which the English “daydream” is merely an approximation, represents only a moderated relaxation of rational control, such as used to be cultivated chiefly by imaginative artists and their followers in developing their sensitivity to nature and beauty, in search of aesthetic stimulus or satisfaction. Our inadequate vocabulary for dealing with such phenomena nonetheless allows us to distinguish the realm of imagination, in which the rêverie explores with some degree of realism the meaning of emotional experience, together with any possible alternative forms which it might take, from the realm of mere fantasy, in which all degree of conscious control or logical coherence can be jettisoned.

The rêverie as a genre is an extension of the rêve, which came into prominence when Diderot used Le Rêve de d’Alembert (D’Alembert’s Dream) as the title of the second and most poetic of the three dialogues he wrote in August 1769, when toward the end of his life he had time at last to return to philosophy. The dialogue is probably the most imaginatively powerful of all Diderot's works, and also that which most successfully unites literature with philosophy. It concerns the awakening of sensibilité in hitherto inert matter when, under the impetus of an external stimulus like warmth, the "soul" becomes the organic principle unifying a living and sentient being, and the directing force of its growth. The Rêve was released in Autumn 1782. to Grimm's private fortnightly newsletter to subscribing heads of European courts. A run of the letters was later gathered together and published as the Correspondance littéraire (16 vols., 1829).

The most famous set of rêveries in French, Rousseau's Les Rêveries du promeneur solitaire (1782; Reveries of the Solitary Walker), was a very late confessional work, largely provoked by rumors of his death in 1776. It was intended to be a sequel to the Confessions (wr. 1764–70, pub. 1782–89). The choice of titles raises some complex issues. Rousseau, in spite of the apparent formality of some of his works, was not a polished writer, and the informality of tone indicated by the rêverie, and underlined by the reference to the solitude of the unsupported thinker in the title, is not an affectation. The late confessional writings, including the Confessions themselves, are not among Rousseau's more powerful works, and the light in which he wished to present himself distorts the truth. Nevertheless, his title denotes a touch of boastful independence. The Rêveries, even if apparently little more than an epilogue to the Confessions, are idealized visions, often of serious philosophic interest, although also frequently set off by some trivial anecdote, experience, or incident. But they are the visions of one who attempted to live his life in a mental solitude unconstrained by the intellectual pressures which society imposed on its members. They were, then, in an unusually full sense, Rousseau's own visions.

Rousseau's 1960 editor, Henri Roddier, claims that the Rêveries inspired the literary form of both the intimate personal essay and the ostensibly private diary written for publication. The rêverie as a genre certainly belongs to the category of self-revelatory, often fictionalized, autobiography. The genre did move toward fiction, apparently in order to allow serious philosophical and social principles to be presented in the tentative guise of a fantasy.

The form's next important author, Étienne Pivert de Senancour, who once applied to the government for support to lead his life as a solitary thinker, suppressed his first two books, signed "Rêveur des Alpes," written in 1792, and 1793. Best known for his novel Oberman (1804), he nonetheless composed a Rêveries sur la nature primitive de l'homme (Reveries on the primitive nature of man) in 1799, to be reworked in 1809, and again, simply as Rêveries, in 1833. In 1834, shortly after the appearance of Rousseau's Rêveries, Senancour published Libres méditations d'un solitaire inconnu (Free meditations of a solitary unknown) less hostile to Christianity than his previous work had been, but still looking for guiding principles in human and physical nature. Intellectually Senancour's life was dominated by the need to balance nature's menace against the therapeutic effects it exercised on the sensibility and to weigh the protection afforded by civil society against the constraints it imposed.

With the full-blooded Romanticism of the 1820s the rêverie, like the meditation, went out of fashion as a genre. It was essentially a pre-Romantic form, but it contained several works which constitute literary apexes of that movement in France.

ANTHONY LEVI

Further Reading

Much of the literature on the rêverie concerns specific examples and specific authors, particularly Rousseau (see the Further Reading under his entry).

Bachelard, Gaston, The Poetics of Reverie: Childhood, Language, and the Cosmos, New York: Orion, 1969 (original French edition, 1960)

Morrisey, Robert J., La Rêverie jusqu'à Rousseau: Recherches sur un topos littéraire, Lexington, Kentucky: French Forum, 1984

Tripet, Arnaud, La Rêverie littéraire: Essai sur Rousseau, Geneva: Droz, 1979

Review

Genetically, the genre of the review is closely related to the essay. The family resemblance points to their common origin. While Montaigne's Essais can be understood both as an examination of the self and as a running commentary of books that reviews the entire tradition as such, the review is like the essay's younger sibling.

In the 17th century, reviews emerged at the moment when correspondence between scholars, philosophers, and scientists no longer satisfied the demands for communication of a growing intellectual community. As a response, Pierre Bayle began in 1684 his journal Nouvelles de la République des Lettres (News from the Republic of Letters). Twenty years earlier, in 1665, Denis de Sallo initiated Le Journal de Sçavans (The journal of the educated), the pioneering model for 18th-century review journals. The Journal was just a few months ahead of the Royal Society's Philosophical Transactions, founded the same year. In Germany, the Acta Eruditorum followed in 1682, and from 1688 to 1690 was published Christian Thomasius' Frey müthige Gedancken oder MonatsGespräche (Frank thoughts or monthly entertainments), the first review journal in German.

While the first review journal began in France, it was in Germany, and, by way of the importation of German Romanticism, in Britain, that the review gained importance as an independent literary genre. Among the multitude of literary forms the great essayists of 17th- and 18th-century France employed, book reviews in effect did not exist. It was not until the arrival of Romanticism that reviewing took hold in France. While encyclopedias served as the new medium in France, the review of books and periodicals took center stage in 18th-century Germany. Whereas intellectual life in France was reduced to small coteries in Paris which made the writing of reviews obsolete, cultural life in Germany and Britain remained largely decentralized and dependent on the flow of printed news. And while the Parisian pecking order secured some stability, decentralized republics of letters established discursive order by way of mutual critical reviewing.

It was not long before the new book reviewing, advertising, and often self-advertising industry was taken to task. In 1714, Thomasius launched another journal, his Aufrichtige und Unpartheyische Gedancken über die Journale, Extracte und Monats-Schriften (Honest and impartial thoughts about the journals, excerpts, and monthly periodicals) just for the purpose of such meta-reviewing. With the increase of publications, it became more and more necessary to maintain an overview of the book market, which, in the 18th century, expanded exponentially.

From 1739, the Göttingische Gelehrten Anzeigen reviewed publications in all fields. In 1749 Ralph Griffiths started the Monthly Review, and in 1756 Tobias Smollett introduced fierce competition with his Critical Review, which counted Samuel Johnson, David Hume, Oliver Goldsmith, and later Samuel Taylor Coleridge among its contributors. With the emergence of literature as a field in its own right, and an onslaught of fiction produced for mass consumption, the demand for review journals exclusively dedicated to literature led to specialized periodicals. With Friedrich Nicolai's Bibliothek der schönen Wissenschaften und schönen Künste (1757–65; Library of the humanities and fine arts), Briefe die neueste Literatur betreffend (1758–61; Letters on contemporary literature), and Allgemeine deutsche Bibliothek (1765–1806; Universal German library), reviews broke ground for modern German literary criticism and aesthetic theory. The Allgemeine Literaturzeitung (1785–; Universal literary news) became the organ for Kantian philosophy. Here, Schiller published his reviews which shaped the program for the canon of German literature he envisaged. The publication of Athenäum, edited by the Schlegel brothers in 1798, announced a shift in literary criticism to the newly discovered subjectivity. Novalis' remark, "the review is complement to the book," commented on the new critical significance the review had gained. In 1826, Hegel's two-decade-old project, the Jahrbücher für wissenschaftliche Kritik (Yearbook for critical humanities), was realized. Its turn away from the Romantics carried the mark of Hegel, who turned the review into fullfledged philosophical critique, reflecting upon the theoretical implications of the stand the author under review takes.

Until the Revolution, publishers in France were dependent on the tightly regulated granting of printing privileges. It was thus only after the Revolution that review journals proliferated. In Britain, the English Review (1783–) was absorbed in 1796 into the Analytical Review (1788–99) which, however, won a reputation not for its abstracts but for its radical opinions. In 1793, the British Critic joined the scene. The Edinburgh Review (1802–1929) set a new style and became the model of all British reviews of the 19th century. Independent from the book trade, it took on the review of publications in all fields in a liberal, challenging, and critical fashion. More than merely a Whig party organ, it was so successful that it led in 1809 to the establishment of a counter journal, the Quarterly Review, which by 1820 was a distinctly conservative periodical. Among the 60 British periodicals carrying reviews in the first quarter of the 19th century, the Edinburgh and the Quarterly were the leaders.

By the early 19th century, the basic types of reviews had been introduced, from the abstract to lengthy studies of the books at hand, which could also become merely the pretext for independent essays associated with the subjects of the books reviewed. Anonymity of reviewer was customary. The Jahrbücher für wissenschaftliche Kritik was the first to have articles signed with full names; before then, reviews had been either unsigned or signed with a letter or symbol. Contributors could be identified only by insiders. Protected by anonymity, reviews could be impartial and objective, or simply a disguise to promote one's opinions or own works. However, shameless self-promotion or favorable reviews of friends under the shield of anonymity could lead to the erosion of trust and reputation. As early as 1778, the author of Anfangsgründe der Rezensirkunst (Introduction to the art of reviewing) joked that the only difference between an author of pasquinades and a reviewer was that the latter could not be sued.

Today reviewing has become an industry in its own right, crucial for library acquisition and the dissemination of information. But, interestingly, while scholarly publishing has become subject to explicit control mechanisms, reviews have escaped such examination. Reviews have remained an arena for debate, and abuse of the freedom they offer is regrettable. Yet to "referee" them would in the end abolish their distinguishing characteristics. Self-regulation is crucial to the review, even where it seems to set up its writer as judge. The best practitioners of the Enlightenment and Romantic reviews, from Moses Mendelssohn to Lessing to Hegel, kept close to the review's relative, the essay, in that they aimed not to judge and sentence, but to contextualize and examine the books under review to provide sufficient analysis for the readers to judge for themselves. This, it could be argued, is still the ultimate criterion for what makes a good review.

While book reviews are now considered de rigueur for a serious intellectual paper, changes in the wake of the electronic revolution will have far-reaching consequences; to the extent that books as we know them disappear, reviews in print form will become anachronistic. For the time being, London's Times Literary Supplement, the New York Times Book Review, and especially the New York Review of Books may—in the Englishspeaking world—serve as reliable trend spotters. Sophisticated readers may wish to turn to the richly diverse market of print media to satisfy their need for current reviews. No single paper can claim any longer to cover book production in its entirety.

WILLI GOETSCHEL

Further Reading

- Carlsson, Anni, Die deutsche Buchkritik von der Reformation bis zur Gegenwart, Berne and Munich: Francke, 1969
- Clive, John Leonard, Scotch Reviewers: The Edinburgh Review, 1802–1815, London: Faber, 1957
- Drewry, John E., Writing Book Reviews, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1974
- Hayden, John O., The Romantic Reviewers, 1802–1824, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, and Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1969 (original edition, 1945)
- Morgan, Peter F., Literary Critics and Reviewers in Early 19th-Century Britain, London: Croom Helm, 1983
- Roper, Derek, Reviewing Before the "Edinburgh," 1788–1802, London: Methuen, and Newark: University of Delaware Press, 1978
- Roland, Herbert, and Karl J. Fink, editors, The Eighteenth Century German Book Review, Heidelberg: Winter, 1995
- Walford, A.K., editor, Reviews and Reviewing: A Guide, London: Mansell, and Phoenix, Arizona: Oryx Press, 1986

A Review of the Affairs of France

British periodical, 1704–13

This periodical was conducted by Daniel Defoe, it is thought singlehandedly, from 19 February 1704 until the end of July 1712. The original title, A Weekly Review of the Affairs of France and of All Europe, as Influenced by That Nation, was changed to A Review of the Affairs of France and of All Europe, with Observations on Transactions at Home later in the year, and then, at the beginning of 1706, to A Review of the State of the English Nation. Only the first eight numbers appeared weekly. Thereafter, the periodical was published twice a week for about a year, and then three times a week. Beginning in August 1712, a new series entitled simply the Review appeared twice a week until June 1713. The entire body of writing Defoe produced in this journalistic enterprise amounts to some 5610 pages.

Such a sustained performance required unusual gifts of mind and personal resourcefulness. Defoe—whose fertile imagination and grasp of the mechanisms of publication led him in the early 1720s to produce a flurry of prose fiction which constitutes in certain ways the beginning of the modern novel—happened to possess such qualities. He was ideally positioned during these years to carry forward a periodical concerning itself with the variety of issues of which the general reading public was conscious. The energetic Defoe probably served as a publicist for both political parties at different times (depending on the issue and the pay), perhaps even for both at the same time. Certainly he was well placed to get information, and he had a nose for issues that mattered. His commentary in the Review was often pungent, dismaying or angering those whose partisanship he offended. To the reader distanced by time from the issues about which Defoe was writing, however, the Review is a fascinating serialization of one person's thoughts on public affairs during an intriguing epoch.

The dominating feature of the Review throughout its history was the essay, about 1200–2000 words in length, spread across the columns of the front page and most of its verso. Advertisements for a range of patent medicines and cosmetics along with books and pamphlets filled in whatever space was free of other text (and were not insignificant sources of revenue for the periodical). At certain times, primarily in 1704 and 1705, Defoe ran a feature responding to the personal questions of his (real or imagined) readers. In these years it was called “Advice from the Scandalous Club...Being a Weekly History of Nonsense, Impertinence, Vice and Debauchery.” There was sometimes the added juicy suggestion that the column was translated from a French original. Here Defoe touched on subjects such as courtship, marital relationships, problems arising in domestic life, habits such as smoking, and religious practices of both priesthood and laity. He ran these columns at first as monthly supplements, then as a feature he called the “Little Review.” It appears to have been quite popular with Defoe's readers, but his packaging of it and decision to discontinue it indicate that he regarded the Review primarily as a medium for his broader discourse as an essayist.

Defoe used his opportunity in writing the Review to address many subjects to which he returned throughout his career as a journalist: the distribution of wealth, aristocratic privilege, workhouses and public policies related to human need, charitable institutions, the theater and other public entertainments. The nominal purpose of the periodical—to consider questions about relations with France—framed many papers on the conduct of military operations, on the actions of individual military leaders, and on Marlborough, Charles XII of Sweden, and Queen Anne. He wrote on issues related to union with Scotland, on a variety of subjects having to do with the church, and on a broad variety of economic matters. Defoe's essays in the Review are marked by the flow of ideas and energetic rhetoric which is characteristic of his prose: "Land is a fund of wealth, that's true; but trade is the fund of land, from your trade springs your land's wealth... What was the land in Barbados good for when the island was unpossessed by us? It was as rich as now, the fund was there—but that trade gave that fund a value. It was a fund and no fund—a fund of nothing; and take trade from that island now, with all its wealth, and what will it be good for still? Will it feed and employ 60,000 Negroes, &c., in a place of but 25 leagues round?" (1 May 1711).

Defoe's Review was one of the principal factors in the establishment of the periodical essay form in 18th-century England. Certainly other periodicals developed features and methods of distribution which were as important as those used by Defoe, and doubtless later essayists chose as models the papers of Addison and Steele more consciously than those of Mr. Review. Addison and Steele took as their audience the middle and upper-middle classes of English society, and their subject matter was largely significant in its cultural implications. Defoe seems to have felt that he was writing for the world at large, and he was by nature far more interested in economics, politics, and history than he was in aesthetics, behavior, or style. His discourse as an essayist is characteristically argumentative rather than conversational, and he experimented very little with the adoption of various points of view which entertained readers of the personae—from the Spectator club to Mr. Rambler and his friends—who ostensibly conducted so many of the other periodicals of the age. With wonderful consistency, however, over more than a decade, Defoe produced essay after essay on a range of topics which were certainly important enough concerning daily life in England. His readers then—and now—have in his Review the work of one of England's most significant essayists.

JAMES M. KUIST

Editions

Defoe's Review, facsimile edition, edited by Arthur Second, 23 vols., 1938; index to this edition by William L. Payne, 1948; selection as The Best of Defoe's "Review": An Anthology, edited by Payne, 1951

Further Reading

Backscheider, Paula R., Daniel Defoe: Ambition and Innovation, Lexington: University

Press of Kentucky, 1986

Backscheider, Paula R., Daniel Defoe: His Life, Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1989

Dobree, Bonamy, "Some Aspects of Defoe's Prose," in Pope and His Contemporaries: Essays Presented to George Sherburn, edited by James L. Clifford and Louis A. Landa, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1949

Dobree, Bonamy, "The Writing of Daniel Defoe," Journal of the Royal Society of Arts 108 (1960):729-42

Graham, Walter, English Literary Periodicals, New York: Nelson, 1967 (original edition, 1930)

James, E. Anthony, Daniel Defoe's Many Voices: A Rhetorical Study of Prose Style and Literary Method, Amsterdam: Rodopi, 1972

Matchen, D., "Daniel Defoe's Rhetorical Art in the Review" College Language Association Journal 4 (1982):417-46

Moore, John R., Daniel Defoe: Citizen of the Modern World, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1958

Novak, Maximillian E., "Defoe's Use of Irony," in his The Uses of Irony: Papers on Defoe and Swift, with Herbert J. Davis, Los Angeles: Clark Memorial Library, 1966

Payne, William L., Mr. Review: Daniel Defoe as Author of "The Review", New York: King's Crown Press, 1947

Revista de Occidente

Spanish journal, 1923-

Revista de Occidente (Western review), an international journal of humanistic inquiry, was founded in 1923 by the Spanish philosopher José Ortega y Gasset. Its publication history is divided into four distinct periods, the first of which runs from the year of its founding to 1963, the second from 1963 to 1975, the third from 1975 to 1977, and the fourth from 1980 to the present. In addition to continuity of name, the magazine's four stages are linked by their shared commitment to providing the cultured, though not necessarily erudite, reader of Spanish with a cosmopolitan variety of rigorously conceived writings on contemporary issues in the arts, humanities, social sciences, and physical sciences. They are unified by the pursuit of the ideals displayed in Revista de Occidente's first epoch prior to the outbreak of the Spanish Civil War, when the charismatic Ortega himself controlled the journal's editorial agenda.

Ortega's audacious aim in founding Revista de Occidente was, as Evelyne López Campillo (1972) has said, to create "a journal that would bring the Spanish reader up to date on all the new ideas in every domain of culture." For Ortega, becoming intellectually "up to date" meant becoming highly conversant not only with the ideas and attitudes of the outstanding contemporary thinkers of Spain, but more importantly, with those of the finest intellectuals of Europe. Almost from the time he began publishing articles in his family's newspaper, El Imparcial (The impartial), in 1904, Ortega had repeatedly advocated the need to "regenerate" a decadent Spain through the adoption of foreign, mainly European, ideas. As he said in his 1910 speech, “La pedagogía social como programa político” (Social pedagogy as political program), “Regeneration is the desire; Europeanization is the means of satisfying it.”

In the period previous to the founding of Revista de Occidente, during which Ortega wrote hundreds of newspaper articles, participated in the founding of four journals and one newspaper—Faro (1908–09; Beacon), Europa (1910; Europe), España (1915–24; Spain), El Espectador (1916–34; The spectator), and El Sol (1917–37; The sun)—and published his celebrated Meditaciones del Quijote (1914; Meditations on Quixote) and España invertebrada (1921; Invertebrate Spain), he conceived of the process of Europeanization largely in terms of the goal of radically transforming Spain’s political culture. By 1923, however, his doubts about the possibility of effecting such profound political change in his country (which had come to light as early as 1916 when he founded El Espectador as a self-styled refuge from political speculation) led Ortega to adopt an intellectual approach that was markedly less “Spanish” and “political” in its focus. The most immediate fruits of this new, more “universalist” orientation, which would only be reinforced by the fear of falling foul of the censorship of the Primo de Rivera dictatorship (September 1923–January 1930), are the appearance, in the summer of that year, of the essay “El tema de nuestro tiempo” (The modern theme), in which he outlines what would later become his concept of ratiovitalism, and the first issue of Revista de Occidente.

Within months of its debut, Ernst Robert Curtius compared the Revista de Occidente favorably with the Nouvelle Revue Française (New French review), the Criterion, and the Neue Rundschau (The new review), widely considered to be the most prestigious cultural journals in Europe at that time. A look at its impressive list of collaborators would appear to confirm this judgment. From the German-speaking countries, which supplied the largest number of foreign contributors, came articles from, among many others, Carl Jung, Thomas Mann, Max Scheler, Georg Simmel, Albert Einstein, and Werner Heisenberg. From the English-speaking world there were contributions from Aldous Huxley, Bertrand Russell, George Santayana, Joseph Conrad, William Faulkner, Sherwood Anderson, D.H. Lawrence, and Eugene O’Neill. Notable collaborators from other European countries included Jean Cocteau, Luigi Pirandello, Benedetto Croce, and Johan Huizinga.

Because Revista de Occidente did so much to promote the work of trans-Pyrenean luminaries within Spain, it is possible to overlook its important role in stimulating home-grown cultural production. In the magazine’s foundational period, Ortega’s famous tertulia, or discussion group, held regularly in the editorial offices of the Revista de Occidente, was, in the eyes of many, the epicenter of Spanish intellectual life. This gathering, together with the Revista’s allied publishing company (the purpose of which was to make the latest developments of intellectual thought in other countries available in Spanish translation) and, of course, the magazine itself, did much to promote the development of what became arguably the most cosmopolitan and widely read generation of Spanish intellectuals since the country’s vaunted Golden Age in the 16th and 17th centuries. Included in this impressive group of young writers were Rafael Alberti, Vicente Aleixandre, Dámaso Alonso, Max Aub, Francisco Ayala, Américo Castro, Luis Cernuda, Rosa Chacel, Federico García Lorca, Ramón de la Serna, Jorge Guillén, Benjamin Jarnés, Gregorio Marañón, José Antonio Maravall, Ramón Pérez de Ayala, and María Zambrano. Ortega had also originally hoped to encourage the broad participation of Latin American intellectuals in Revista de Occidente. Though important Latin American figures such as Jorge Luis Borges, Pablo Neruda, Eduardo Mallea, Victoria Ocampo, Alonso Reyes, and Torres Bodet did contribute articles to the journal, the vision of creating a truly pan-Hispanic intellectual forum was never fully realized.

What Ortega did undoubtedly accomplish with Revista de Occidente, however, was to create an institution which greatly furthered the process of more fully integrating what he liked to call the “select minorities” of Spanish society into the larger, and perhaps more intellectually demanding, context of modern European culture.

THOMAS S.HARRINGTON

Anthologies

La recepción de lo nuevo: Antología de la Revista de Occidente (1923–1936), edited by Magdalena Mora, Revista de Occidente special issue, 146–47 (July–August 1993)
Selección y recuerdo de la Revista de Occidente, Madrid: Revista de Occidente, 1950

Further Reading

- Calvet, Rosa, “Literatura francesa en la Revista de Occidente I,” Epos 3 (1987):303–28
 Calvet, Rosa, “Literatura francesa en la Revista de Occidente II,” Epos 4 (1988):437–67
Desde Occidente: 70 años de Revista de Occidente, Madrid: Grupo Endesa, 1993
 Escudero, Javier, “La segunda época de Revista de Occidente (1963–1975): Historia y valoración,” Hispania 77, no. 2. (May 1994):185–96
 López Campillo, Evelyne, La Revista de Occidente y la formación de minorías, 1923–1936, Madrid: Taurus, 1972,
 McClintock, Robert, Man and His Circumstances: Ortega as Educator, New York: Columbia Teachers College Press, 1971
 Niedermayer, Franz, José Ortega y Gasset, New York: Ungar, 1973 (original German edition, 1959)
 Sabugo Abril, A., “Pasión política e intelectualidad creadora: De la revista España a Revista de Occidente” Cuadernos Hispanoamericanos 403–05 (January–March 1984):583–601
 Segura Covarsi, Enrique, Índice de la Revista de Occidente, Madrid: Instituto “Miguel de Cervantes” del Consejo Superior de Investigaciones Científicas, 1992,
 Vicente, Arie, “Nación, raza y razones, en el ensayo español de los años 30 al 45,” Cuadernos de Aldeu 7, no. 1 (April 1991): 67–85

Revue des Deux Mondes

French journal, 1829–

The Revue des Deux Mondes: Journal des Voyages (Review of two worlds: journal of voyages) was founded in 1829 with a capital of 550,000 francs, and then sold by its two founders, Prosper Mauroy and Ségur-Dupeyron, to the printer Auffray. In 1831 Auffray, educated at the well-known Parisian Lycée Louis-le-Grand, installed as editor a former school friend, François Buloz. Before taking this position Buloz had worked on a biographical dictionary and as a typesetter and proofreader. He was the true creator of the Revue des Deux Mondes, turning it into the weightiest literary organ of 19th-century France. When he began editing the RDM the circulation was 350; when he retired in 1874 it was 18,000. By 1914 it had reached 40,000.

Buloz was a martinet with a fundamentally kind heart and a genius for promoting the often young and generally radical writers whom he allowed to provoke political and social reactions from his staid but cultivated readership. He was a moderate liberal who reined in his progressive contributors before they could seriously frighten his readers, pandering to the weighty, diffuse, and ponderous style they preferred. It was a way of alleviating their bourgeois anxieties, quite justifiable in the second quarter of the 19th century, while promoting political and social attitudes generally just left of center, although occasionally also just to its right. The editorial attitude of the review became markedly more conservative after the 1848 Revolution.

On his appointment Buloz continued for a while to publish accounts of travel, then dropped the “Journal des Voyages” from the review’s title and changed its focus to matters of literary and philosophical interest. Buloz himself wrote nearly nothing, but was an immensely hard worker and had an almost infallible sense of public feeling. He was fortunate when Victor Hugo introduced him to Sainte-Beuve, whom Hugo wanted to review his novel, Notre-Dame de Paris. Sainte-Beuve had left the Saint-Simonian Le Globe in April 1831, and Buloz published a first piece by him on 15 June that year, followed by a second in August, taking the critic onto the staff and relying on him to draw up policy statements in Buloz’s name. It was Sainte-Beuve who wrote the statement published in March 1833 to the effect that the review had no philosophical, religious, social, or aesthetic commitment, but believed in the evidence afforded by accumulated historical fact, and looked forward to “the future goal, the great social unity... toward which the age is clearly moving.”

In 1834 the company owning the RDM also acquired the Revue de Paris, founded by Louis Véron in 1829. Buloz, who became director of the Comédie-Française while still editing the RDM, was also made editor of the Revue de Paris, making him virtual dictator of serious periodical literature in France. He used the Revue de Paris to publish his second-rank material not quite suitable for the RDM.

It was largely through Sainte-Beuve that Buloz came into contact with the circle of young Romantics surrounding Charles Nodier and then Hugo, and it was partly through Sainte-Beuve that Buloz recruited his famous galaxy of authors: Hugo, Prosper Mérimée, Gustave Planche, George Sand, Alfred de Vigny, Alphonse de Lamartine, Étienne Pivert de Senancour, Marceline Desbordes-Valmore, Heinrich Heine, and Alfred de Musset. Few contributed anything that could properly be called essays, but it was Buloz who invented the famous editorial criterion of accepting nothing not so written that he could understand it. He sent back a piece on Kant by Victor Cousin, France's major philosopher, on the grounds that it was incomprehensible. Buloz's insistence on structured argument and simplicity of line was one of the great forces shaping the development of the essay as a literary genre in 19th-century France.

From 1845, when the previous owners retired, all the shares in the holding company of the RDM passed into the hands of Buloz, his immediate family, and his authors. From the beginning he had put the review behind the July monarchy inaugurated in 1830, despite the strong blandishments of François Guizot, who was backed by the Journal des Débats (Journal of debates). Although the launching of the cheap press in 1836 forced Buloz to seek out novelists for serialization in his columns, the RDM remained virtually unchanged, with essays on serious social and political topics next to pieces in the more imaginative genres. It forged ahead after the decline of the feuilleton from about 1846. After the Revolution of 1848, the review published authors whose attitudes were more reactionary than those favored earlier by Buloz, although the cautious new conservatism did not prevent him from publishing selected essays of Hippolyte Taine, in spite of his radical determinism, and did not go far enough to allow him to yield to pestering by the right-wing Catholic legitimist dilettante, Barbey d'Aurevilly. The RDM went on to publish a whole group of important authors—including Ernest Renan's middlebrow essays—and it is a tribute to Buloz that they considered it an honor to have appeared in the review.

Buloz was succeeded as editor by his son Charles, who himself died in 1893, and was succeeded by Ferdinand Brunetière, introduced to the review by Paul Bourget in 1875. Politically the review remained liberal conservative, although now also republican, favoring in literature the Parnassian school as represented by Sully Prudhomme, José-Maria de Heredia, and Charles-Marie Leconte de Lisle. It published Anatole France alongside Bourget, François Coppée, Pierre Loti, René Bazin, and Guy de Maupassant. In the Dreyfus affair the RDM was uncommitted.

During the first decade of the 20th century until the eve of World War I the importance of the RDM diminished even as its circulation was increasing. During World War II it was hostile to the occupying forces and was obliged to suspend publication. It reappeared in 1948, becoming strongly Gaullist in 1958, but never won back the dominant position in French culture it had enjoyed under Buloz.

ANTHONY LEVI

Further Reading

- Brogliè, Gabriel de, Histoire politique de la "Revue des Deux Mondes" de 1829 à 1979, Paris: Perrin, 1979
- Cent ans de vie française à la "Revue des Deux Mondes", Revue des Deux Mondes* centenary issue (1929)

Du Val, Thaddeus Ernest, The Subject of Realism in the "Revue des Deux Mondes" (1831–1865) (dissertation), Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania, 1936
 Furman, Nelly, La "Revue des Deux Mondes" et le romantisme, 1831–1848, Geneva: Droz, 1975

Rexroth, Kenneth

American, 1905–1982

Kenneth Rexroth was primarily a poet and translator who occasionally wrote essays and book reviews. Although he believed that poets should write prose only for money, he took the writing of his commissioned assignments seriously. Altogether he wrote over 400 essays, book reviews, and newspaper columns. Most were on literary topics, but Rexroth also wrote authoritatively on modern art, jazz, religion, the Orient, and contemporary society. Regardless of the topic, the essays and reviews are all marked by his strong opinions on aesthetics, morality, and community.

In the introduction to his first collection, Bird in the Bush (1959), Rexroth wrote that his essays “are not criticism but journalism. It is my hope that they may find a modest place in what critics call a ‘tradition’—the tradition of [James Gibbons] Huneker, [H.L.] Mencken, [Edmund] Wilson.” The writers he cites each wrote on social as well as artistic issues, for a mass audience in popular magazines, all the while expressing unpopular opinions. Like them, Rexroth expressed his often radical views in popular magazines such as the Nation, the Saturday Review, the New York Herald Tribune, and Art News. Like his predecessors, Rexroth used these organs to bring a middle-class audience news of the avantgarde in jazz and art and literature, as well as of social movements such as those of the Beats in the 1950s and the hippies in the 1960s and 1970s.

The voice in the essays is instantly recognizable as Rexroth’s—lucid, learned, anecdotal, sometimes dogmatic (“Baudelaire was the greatest poet of the capitalist epoch. Does anyone doubt this?” from “Unacknowledged Legislators and ‘Art pour art,’” 1958), and informed by a strong sense of aesthetic, political, and social values. An autodidact himself, Rexroth assumed an equal desire for education and information on the part of his audience. For instance, he wrote long essays on such recondite topics as alchemy, gnosticism, and Hasidism. His anecdotal manner stems from his frequent personal involvement with the issues of his essays (“Recently police activity began to impinge upon my own life” from “The Heat,” 1966) or to develop a sense of immediacy, if not of a somewhat truculent authority (“As [Charles] Mingus once said to me...” or “I knew Bird [Charlie Parker] pretty well...” from “Some Notes on Jazz,” 1957). But behind the lightly worn learning and the occasional swaggering is a deeply felt and frequently stated view that modern civilization has gone dreadfully wrong.

Rexroth believed that “organized society in our epoch simply has nothing good about it. It is a deadly fraud from start to finish” (“The Ennobling Revulsion,” 1957). Human beings, he felt, are alienated from their work, their fellow beings, and themselves. He ranks Mark Twain’s Huckleberry Finn as one of the world’s greatest novels primarily because of the book’s “realization that the official version of anything is most likely farce and that all authority is based on fraud” (“Would You Hit a Woman with a Child?,” 1957). A home-grown anarchist-socialist, Rexroth emphasized the virtues of community and cooperation. His book-length essay, Communalism (1974), is an examination of attempts at cooperative living from Neolithic times to the present.

Believing that “Literary criticism can play its role in social change” (“The Art of Literature,” 1974), Rexroth felt that “official high-brow culture,” as evinced in specialized academic journals and critical reviews, was “the enemy” of true culture, communication, and change (“Disengagement: The Art of the Beat Generation,” 1957). But although regarded as a father figure and spokesperson for the Beat Generation of the 1950s, Rexroth was highly critical of that ostensibly rebellious movement, finding it aimless, without principle, and ultimately conformist. To Rexroth, true revolutionaries, unlike the escapist Beats and the later hippies, work vigorously—in art and life—to overthrow the “social lie” of church, state, and capitalism (“Revolt: True and False,” 1958).

Although Rexroth’s best essays present the spectacle of a thoroughly engaged intelligence attempting to explain the cultural manifestations of the middle years of the 20th century, perhaps his most lasting prose works are the 101 short essays collected in Classics Revisited (1968) and More Classics Revisited (1989). First published in the Saturday Review, these brief essays seek to distill the essence of enduring literary works while giving a sense of their social and moral importance. In his introduction Rexroth declared that “The greatest works of imaginative literature...objectify the crucial history of the subjective life. They make reality, nature, out of man.”

In these short essays the traditional classics are discussed—Homer and Sophocles, Shakespeare and Tolstoi, Mark Twain. But also—and long before the academics he detested began their debates on the canon—Rexroth included masterpieces from around the world: the Finnish Kalevala, the Icelandic Njal’s Saga, the Hindu Mahabharata and Bhagavad-Gita, Murasaki Shikibu’s The Tale of Genji, the Chinese novel The Dream of the Red Chamber, and the poetry of Tu Fu. In his essays, as well as in the poetry to which he devoted his life, Rexroth’s proved an early and resonant voice for an increasingly multicultural time.

CHARLES L.O’NEILL

Biography

Born 22 December 1905 in South Bend, Indiana. Studied at the Art Institute, Chicago; Art Students League, New York. Married Andree Dutcher, 1927 (died, 1940). Active in libertarian and anarchist movements during the 1930s and 1940s, San Francisco; orderly, San Francisco County Hospital, 1939–45. Married Marie Kass, 1940 (divorced, 1948). Conscientious objector during World War II. Cofounder, Pacifica Foundation, 1949. Married Marthe Larsen, 1949 (divorced, 1961): two daughters. Involved with the Beat writers, 1950s. San Francisco correspondent for the Nation, 1950s; book reviewer and critic, the New York Times; columnist, San Francisco Examiner, 1958–68, San Francisco Magazine, and San Francisco Bay Guardian, from 1968. Taught at San Francisco State College, 1964, University of Wisconsin, Madison, and University of California, Santa Barbara, from 1968. Married Carol Tinker, 1974. Awards: several fellowships and grants; Shelley Memorial Award, 1958; Copernicus Award, 1975. Member, American Academy and National Institute of Arts and Letters, 1969. Died (as the result of a stroke) in Montecito, California, 6 June 1982.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Bird in the Bush: Obvious Essays, 1959

Assays, 1961

Classics Revisited, 1968

The Alternative Society: Essays from the Other World, 1970

With Eye and Ear, 1970

American Poetry in the Twentieth Century, 1971

The Elastic Retort: Essays in Literature and Ideas, 1973

Communalism: From Its Origins to the Twentieth Century, 1974

World Outside the Window: The Selected Essays, edited by Bradford Morrow, 1987

More Classics Revisited, edited by Bradford Morrow, 1989

Other writings: many volumes of poetry, a play, and the autobiographies An Autobiographical Novel (1966) and Excerpts from a Life (1981). Also translated poetry from the Japanese, Chinese, Spanish, Greek, Latin, and French.

Bibliography

Hartzell, James, and Richard Zumwinkle, Kenneth Rexroth: A Checklist of His Published Writings, Los Angeles: University of California Friends of the UCLA Library, 1967

Further Reading

Bartlett, Lee, Kenneth Rexroth, Boise, Idaho: Boise State University, 1988

Beach, Joseph Warren, Obsessive Images: Symbolism in Poetry of the 1930s and 1940s, edited by William Van O'Connor, Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1960

Foster, Richard, "With Great Passion, a Kind of Person," Hudson Review 13, no. 1 (Spring 1960):149–54

Foster, Richard, "Lucubrations of an Outside Insider," Minnesota Review 3, no. 1 (Fall 1962):130–33

Gibson, Morgan, Kenneth Rexroth, New York: Twayne, 1972

Hamalian, Linda, A Life of Kenneth Rexroth, New York: Norton, 1991

Kazin, Alfred, "Father Rexroth and the Beats," Reporter 22 (3 March 1960):54–56

Lipton, Lawrence, The Holy Barbarians, New York: Messner, 1959; London: Allen, 1960

Mills, Ralph J., "Recent Prose," Poetry 102, no. 4 (July 1963):270

Montague, John, "American Pegasus," Studies 48 (Summer 1959): 183–91

Parkinson, Thomas, "Phenomenon or Generation," in A Casebook on the Beat, edited by Parkinson, New York: Crowell, 1961

Reyes, Alfonso

Mexican, 1889–1959

Alfonso Reyes was one of the leading essayists from Mexico—indeed, from all of Latin America—during the first half of the 20th century. His literary production excelled in quantity (comprising 24 large volumes in his Obras completas [1955–91; Complete works]), in breadth of scope, and in quality. While his vast output lacks the exotic originality of Jorge Luis Borges, for instance, Reyes' eloquent essays reveal an extensive knowledge of the classic Greco-Roman world and, at the same time, of pre-Hispanic indigenous Mexico, along with past and present literatures of Spain, France, England, Germany, and Latin America. Reyes' stylistic versatility in several genres—novels, short stories, poems, and plays—is obvious, but it is unquestionably in his essays that the broad humanism of his production is most evident. They range from brief, casual, impressionistic sketches to well-composed, serious, precise studies—and yet all are personal in spirit.

Reyes published his first book, the collection of essays titled Cuestiones estéticas (1911; Aesthetic questions), when he was only 21. It contained unusually penetrating and far-reaching comparative studies of aesthetic approaches from ancient to modern periods. Its immediate success augured well for the work to follow, as Reyes became the undisputed dean of Mexican letters, writing prodigiously for the next 48 years and influencing generations of writers in his native land and elsewhere in Latin America.

An accomplished linguist, Reyes reveled in puns and wordplay. Among charming works in a light vein were essays on razor blades (used ones, no less), onions, and flies, published in popular journals and various collections. On a more sober level, along with his interest in the complexities of Greek and Roman classical texts, Reyes maintained a consuming fascination with European (especially Spanish) and Latin American (especially Mexican) literature. He wrote insightful essays on authors as diverse as Goethe, Stéphane Mallarmé, Oscar Wilde, and George Bernard Shaw, but his major European passion was for Iberian figures, ranging from Miguel de Cervantes and Pedro Calderón de la Barca to Miguel de Unamuno and José Ortega y Gasset—all examined in his scholarly Capítulos de literatura española (1939–45; Chapters in Spanish literature).

Reyes resided for many years outside of Mexico, in France and Spain, as well as in both Argentina and Brazil as the Mexican ambassador. Yet despite the years of absence, he was a devoted student of his native land, its origins and character. From his youth Reyes was caught up in a search for Mexican identity and the influences of the conquered indigenous and the conquering Spanish cultures on the development of Mexico. The genesis of this interest may have been his membership as a young man of the Ateneo de la Juventud (Atheneum of youth), an organization which had as one of its tasks a search for national identity (necessary because of, among other things, Mexico's multiple cultural heritage).

In the prologue he wrote for a Mexican film, Raíces (Roots), Reyes announced: “Mexico is at once a world of mystery and clarity: clarity in her landscape, mystery in the souls of her people.” This statement was written after decades of endeavors by Reyes to scrutinize carefully, if not to dispel, this mystery. In the essay “México en una nuez” (1944; “Mexico in a Nutshell”), he described concisely the development of colonial Mexico: “During three centuries the races mixed as they pleased, and the colony was governed and maintained through a miracle of respect for the monarchic idea and through religious submission to the categories of the state... Meanwhile a new nation—with Indians underneath, the Spaniards on top, and the arrogant and domineering creoles and the astute and subtle mestizos in the middle—was quietly being evolved.”

Much earlier in Visión de Anáhuac (1917; Vision of Anahuac) Reyes presented colorful, poetic depictions of ancient Tenochtitlan (now modern Mexico City), whose mansions and palaces, zoos and gardens, and perhaps most impressive of all, giant marketplace left the Spanish invaders dazzled. Recent archaeological studies of this magnificent ancient site have expanded and refined details about it, yet none has surpassed the cogency or beauty of Reyes’ descriptions.

Over the years Reyes became more concerned with questions concerning the relative importance of regional and universal expressions of culture; he came to view the significance of Mexican cultural and artistic values as contributing to a universal art and culture. During the 1930s he developed this philosophy of culture in such collections of essays as Discursos por Virgilio (1931; Discourses about Virgil) and Homilia por la cultura (1935; Homily for culture), while during the 1940s his concerns shifted to issues of social philosophy in books like Norte y sur and Los trabajos y los días (1944; Works and days).

In later years Reyes wrote a series of essays on strictly literary topics, published in such works as La experiencia literaria (1942; Literary experience) and Letras de la Nueva España (1948; Letters of the New Spain). There were also a whole series of essays on Greek and Roman philosophy, religion, and literature in his Obras completas, many of which appeared in a wide variety of journals but were not published originally in book form.

Special mention must be made of El deslinde (1944; Demarcation), Reyes’ most developed, systematic elaboration of literary theory. It was based on four lengthy “lessons on the science of literature” he presented at the College of St. Nicholas in Morelia, Michoacán in 1940. In several essays Reyes established the differences between literature with and without an extrinsic purpose (“pure literature and service literature”) as well as within the disciplines of science, mathematics, history, and theology. This was clearly his scholarly tour de force.

If there is a weakness in Reyes’ writings, it is a tendency at times to oversimplify, and to rely on poetic license. This may be because he was so prolific—perhaps if he had written less he would have written better.

Unfortunately for non-Spanish-literate readers very few of Reyes’ essays have been translated into English, with ten appearing in The Position of America, and Other Essays (1950) and 12 included in Mexico in a Nutshell, and Other Essays (1964). Each volume is composed of essays from a wide variety of sources dating from 1915 to 1948. This dearth of sources in English is unfortunate, for Reyes’ works are a vital part of a rich literary tradition.

JOHN H.HADDOX

Biography

Born 17 May 1889 in Monterrey, Mexico. Moved to Mexico City, 1906; part of the Centennial Generation lecture society, and the Ateneo de la Juventud literary society; cofounder and secretary, 1912, School of Higher Studies, National Autonomous University of Mexico, Mexico City, where he also took a law degree, 1913. Married: at least one child. Second secretary of the Mexican legation in France, 1913; moved to Spain because of the war, 1914; editor of cultural section, El Sol (The sun) newspaper; second, then first secretary of the Mexican legation in Spain, 1920–24; diplomat in Paris, 1924–27; Mexican ambassador to Argentina and Brazil, Buenos Aires and Rio de Janeiro, from 1927. Publisher, Monterrey literary bulletin, Rio de Janeiro, 1930–37. Returned to Mexico City, 1939. Cofounder, El Colegio Nacional, Mexico City, 1945; professor, College of St. Nicholas, Morelia, Michoacán, 1940, and the National Autonomous University of Mexico, Mexico City, 1941. Helped to form, and honorary president, 1954, Fédération des Alliances Françaises, Mexico. Elected director, Mexican Academy of the Language, 1957. Awards: National Prize in Literature, 1945. Died (of a heart attack) in Mexico City, 27 December 1959.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Cuestiones estéticas, 1911

Cartones de Madrid, 1917; edited by Juan Velasco, 1988

El suicida, 1917

Visión de Anáhuac, 1917; as Vision of Anahuac, translated by Harriet de Onís, in The Position of America, and Other Essays, 1950, and translated by Charles Ramsdell, in Mexico in a Nutshell, and Other Essays, 1964

Retratos reales e imaginarios, 1920

El cazador: Ensayos y divagaciones, 1911–1920, 1921

Simpatías y diferencias, 5 vols., 1921–26

Calendario, 1924

Cuestiones gongorinas, 1927

Discursos por Virgilio, 1931

Tren de ondas (1924–32), 1932

Horas de Burgos, 1932

Homilia por la cultura, 1935

Las vísperas de España, 1937

Aquellos días (1917–1920), 1938

Mallarmé entre nosotros, 1938

Capítulos de literatura española, 2 vols., 1939–45

La crítica en la edad ateniense, 1941

Pasado inmediato, y otros ensayos, 1941

- La antigua retórica*, 1942
La experiencia literaria, 1942
Última Tule, 1942
El Brasil y su cultura, 1944
Los trabajos y los días, 1934–1944, 1944
El deslinde: Prolegómenos a la teoría literaria, 1944
Dos o tres mundos: Cuentos y ensayos (includes stories), edited by Antonio Castro Leal, 1944
Norte y sur (1925–1942), 1944
Tentativas y orientaciones, 1944
Letras de la Nueva España, 1948
Entre libros, 1912–1923, 1948
Junta de sombras: Estudios helénicos, 1949
Tertulia de Madrid, 1949
De viva voz, 1920–1947, 1949
Sirtes (1932–1944), 1949
The Position of America, and Other Essays, edited and translated by Harriet de Onís, 1950
Ancorajes, 1951
Trazos de historia literaria, 1951
Medallones, 1951
Marginalia, 3 vols., 1952–59
Memorias de cocina y bodega, 1953
De la antigüedad a la edad media, 1954
Trayectoria de Goethe, 1954
Quince presencias 1915–1954, 1955
Estudios helénicos, 1957
Las burlas veras, 2 vols., 1957–59
A campo traviesa, 1960
Al yunque, 1944–1958, 1960
Antología: Prosa, teatro, poesía, 1963
Mexico in a Nutshell, and Other Essays, translated by Charles Ramsdell, 1964
Universidad, política y pueblo, edited by José Emilio Pacheco, 1967
Ensayos (selection), edited by Roberto Fernández Retamar, 1968
Monterrey (Correo literario de Alfonso Reyes) (facsimile edition), 1980
Última tula y otros ensayos, edited by Rafael Gutierrez Girardot, 1991
 Other writings: many volumes of poetry, several novels, prose narratives, plays, memoirs, and correspondence. Also translated Homer's Iliad (1951).
 Collected works edition: Obras completas, edited by Reyes and Ernesto Mejía Sánchez, 24 vols., 1955–91.

Bibliography

Robb, James Willis, Repertorio bibliográfico de Alfonso Reyes, Mexico City: National Autonomous University of Mexico, 1974

Further Reading

- Cepeda Adan, Luis, and others, Comiendo con Reyes: Homenaje a Alfonso Reyes, Mexico City: Posada, 1986
- Olgúin, Manuel, Alfonso Reyes, ensayista: Vida y pensamiento, Mexico City: Andrea, 1956
- Perea, Hector, España en la obra de Alfonso Reyes, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1965
- Robb, James Willis, Patterns of Image and Structure in the Essays of Alfonso Reyes (abstract of a dissertation), Washington, D.C.: Catholic University Press of America, 1958
- Robb, James Willis, El estilo de Alfonso Reyes, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1965
- Robb, James Willis, Estudios sobre Alfonso Reyes, Bogotá: El Dorado, 1976

Rich, Adrienne

American, 1919–

Adrienne Rich is one of the most influential self-identified lesbian feminists of 20th-century America. Her writing reflects the development of feminist thought, and documents events in the history of the women's movement. Her talents as an essayist have been acknowledged mainly in this context, as distinct from her poetry. Throughout her decades of work as a writer-activist, Rich uses essays, speeches, conference papers, magazine articles, book reviews, and personal reflections to articulate with stunning complexity issues of women's liberation, individual identity, and the role of poetry. She has collected these writings in three volumes: On Lies, Secrets, and Silence: Selected Prose, 1966–1978 (1979), Blood, Bread, and Poetry: Selected Prose, 1979–1985 (1986), and What Is Found There: Notebooks on Poetry and Politics (1993). Rich introduces each piece with information about its first publication (or delivery). She also supplies updated facts, sketches out controversies that particular passages evoke, and cites references for further reading. Her prose complements her poetry by expanding upon metaphors epitomizing her hopes for the future.

On Lies, Secrets, and Silence contains Rich's first essays about the damaging effects of patriarchy, which she sees as a product of a gynophobic splitting of thought from emotion. Rich resists this division by bringing personal experience back into the political realm. Relying heavily on the wisdom of Virginia Woolf, she envisions communities of women that will create a politics of addressing women's questions. She discusses issues surrounding daycare, education, safety from violence, and the politics of birth control and of housework. Her essays on education connect sexism with other systems of oppression, while motherhood becomes a central social and political issue in "The Antifeminist Woman" (1972). (This essay inspired her to write a separate prose volume on the ideology of motherhood under patriarchy, Of Woman Born: Motherhood as Experience and Institution, 1976). Rich also resurrects female writers as mentors for women who are unearthing the unspeakable elements of their lives, since “women’s minds cannot grow to full stature, or touch the real springs of our power to alter reality, on a diet of masculine ideology” (“Conditions for Work: The Common World of Women,” 1976.)

Patriarchal dualisms create other divisions (gay/straight, white/black) which Rich scrutinizes in her second anthology, Blood, Bread, and Poetry. Her formulation of feminist issues now foregrounds their connections to racism, class-blindness, and anti-Semitism. She quotes and reviews the work of black feminists, and credits the civil rights movement as a model for the women’s movement. She also focuses on issues of lesbian identity and history; “Compulsory Heterosexuality and Lesbian Existence” (1980), her most famous essay, documents a breakthrough in sexual politics: the recognition of how patriarchal culture uses the assumption that everyone is heterosexual to disempower women. In the second half of the book, Rich interrogates her position and privileges as a United States citizen, leading ultimately to “Notes Toward a Politics of Location” (1984). Location encompasses all the differences among women, men, places, times, cultures, conditions, class, and movements that contribute to one’s perspective. This formulation refines her earlier ideas about acknowledging individual experience in a political sphere.

Rich moves from a revolutionary social agenda in early essays toward the ostensibly narrower purpose of examining poetry and politics in her third anthology, What Is Found There. As she compiles excerpts about poetic power from diverse authors and from her own reflections, her scope widens to encompass poetry in prisons, malls, public art, and everyday epiphanies. Her vision grows global as she contends that the most exciting recent poetry comes from indigenous, mestiza/o, and women’s poetry movements in all the Americas, the Caribbean, the Pacific Islands, New Zealand, and Australia, as well as Europe and Africa (“What If?,” 1993). Unfortunately, as Rich attempts to interweave the political concerns of more people from more places, her writing loses focus. In the middle of reading any given essay, it can be hard to isolate the original thematic issue.

Rich’s later writings seem scattered—not because she is trying to deal with too many issues (her earlier writings prove that she is eminently capable of combining breadth and subtlety), but rather because the format of many selections reads like an imprecise gathering of journal fragments, with few connecting arguments or commentaries on quotations. The powerful, direct rhetoric that characterizes her earlier anthologies is sadly diffused by this profusion of information. Her earlier experiments with alternative styles seem more deliberate. The psychoanalytically rich “Women and Honor: Some Notes on Lying” (1975) discusses relationships in an elegantly impressionistic format; in “Split at the Root: An Essay on Jewish Identity” (1982), Rich meanders through time and circumstance to explore her Jewish heritage. Episodic writing is well suited for these reflections, but the wide-ranging political goals of her most recent volume fall between the cracks of this writing style. Although an open format best matches Rich’s political vision, it is not purposeful enough to support her convictions.

The most astonishing element of Rich’s essays is an ever more exacting vision of politics. When she returns to topics in order to develop her thoughts further, her self-criticism is fearless. In one particularly lucid example, Rich describes an audience’s reactions to her statement that “It is the lesbian in us who is creative, for the dutiful daughter of the fathers in us is only a hack” (“It Is the Lesbian In Us...,” 1976). Recounting the various opinions becomes an occasion to reevaluate her assertion. Rich notes that “I probably oversimplified the issue, given limits of time, and therefore obscured it. This experience made me more conscious than ever before of the degree to which, even for lesbians, the word lesbian has many resonances.” As she goes on to describe some possibilities, Rich discards any solution that implies an escape from radical complexity (“The Meaning of Our Love for Women Is What We Have Constantly to Expand,” 1977). Here, as in her writing in general, the essays indicate a continuing exploration, not a destination.

KAREN SCHIFF

Biography

Adrienne Cecile Rich. Born 16 May 1929 in Baltimore. Studied at Radcliffe College, Cambridge, Massachusetts, A.B. (cum laude), 1951 (Phi Beta Kappa). Married Alfred H. Conrad, 1953 (died, 1970): three sons. Taught at the YM-YWHA Poetry Center Workshop, New York, 1966–67, Swarthmore College, Pennsylvania, 1966–68, Columbia University, New York, 1967–69, City College of New York, 1968–75, Brandeis University, Waltham, Massachusetts, 1972–73, Douglass College, New Brunswick, New Jersey, 1976–78, Cornell University, Ithaca, New York, 1981–85, San Jose State University, California, 1985–86, and Stanford University, California, 1986–93; visiting professor at various colleges and universities. Columnist, American Poetry Review, 1972–73; coeditor, Sinister Wisdom, 1980–84; member of the editorial collective, Bridges: A Journal for Jewish Feminists and Our Friends, from 1989. Awards: many, including several grants and fellowships; Yale Series of Younger Poets Award, 1951; Ridgely Torrence Memorial Award, 1955; American Academy Award, 1961; Poetry magazine Bess Hokin Prize, 1963; Poetry magazine Eunice Tietjens Memorial Prize, 1968; Shelley Memorial Award, 1971; National Book Award, 1974; Ruth Lilly Prize, 1986; Elmer Holmes Bobst Award, 1989; honorary degrees from seven colleges and universities.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

On Lies, Secrets, and Silence: Selected Prose, 1966–1978, 1979

Blood, Bread, and Poetry: Selected Prose, 1979–1985, 1986

What Is Found There: Notebooks on Poetry and Politics, 1993

Adrienne Rich's Poetry and Prose: Poems, Prose, Reviews, and Criticism, edited by Barbara Charlesworth Gelpi and Albert Gelpi, 1993

Other writings: many collections of poetry (including Diving into the Wreck, 1973; The Dream of a Common Language, 1980; A Wild Patience Has Taken Me This Far, 1981; The Fact of a Doorframe, 1984; Your Native Land, Your Life, 1986; Time's Power, 1989; An Atlas of the Difficult World, 1991; Dark Fields of the Republic, 1995), two plays, and Of Woman Born: Motherhood as Experience and Institution (1976).

Further Reading

- Cooper, Jane Roberta, editor, Reading Adrienne Rich: Reviews and Re-Visions, 1951–81, Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1984
- Diaz-Diocaretz, Myriam, The Transforming Power of Language: The Poetry of Adrienne Rich, Utrecht: HES, 1984
- Diaz-Diocaretz, Myriam, Translating Poetic Discourse: Questions of Feminist Strategy in Adrienne Rich, Amsterdam and Philadelphia: Benjamins, 1985
- Farwell, Marilyn R., “Adrienne Rich and an Organic Feminist Criticism,” College English 39 (October 1977):191–103
- Flowers, Betty S., “The ‘I’ in Adrienne Rich: Individuation and the Androgyne Archetype,” in Theory and Practice of Feminist Literary Criticism, edited by Gabriela Mora and Karen S. Van Hooft, Ypsilanti, Michigan: Bilingual Press, 1981:14–35
- Griffin, Susan, and Beverly Dahlen, Skirting the Subject: Pursuing Language in the Works of Adrienne Rich, Uppsala: Uppsala University, 1993
- Keyes, Claire, The Aesthetics of Power: The Poetry of Adrienne Rich, Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1986
- Ratcliffe, Krista, Anglo-American Challenges to the Rhetorical Traditions: Virginia Woolf, Mary Daly, Adrienne Rich, Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1996
- Templeton, Alice, The Dream and the Dialogue: Adrienne Rich’s Feminist Poetics, Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1994

Richler, Mordecai

Canadian, 1931–

Mordecai Richler has been a working essayist since the 1950s, appearing in virtually every major Canadian, British, and American journal. Over that time, he has written most often about politics and social customs, travel and sports, Jews and Gentiles. He has also regularly reviewed books. Throughout, the touchstone has been his growing up on Montreal’s largely Jewish and working-class St. Urbain Street, which has also been central to his fiction. His success as an essayist has frequently supported that fiction, which remains the work on which he clearly wishes his reputation to rest. But Richler writes essays not merely to make a living: the genre affords him the obvious pleasure of exercising his “sense of the ridiculous.”

Although Richler has appeared in journals like the New York Review of Books and the New Statesman, he has often written for larger audiences (in Playboy and Inside Sports, for example). Throughout, his voice has been that of a sane man in a world only intermittently sane. His ideal reader, although never surprised by human nonsense, is still astonished by its variety. Critics have sometimes complained that Richler’s work lacks enough of a moral center to be satiric; indeed, he is more likely to puncture the ridiculous than offer remedies. In Richler’s work there is no overarching political or religious “Truth,” but simply the individual, doing his best by family and friends.

Richler’s style reflects the broad audience he has written for: it is readable, smart, and occasionally bawdy, a mix of learning and street talk. It is also funny. A review of Gay Talese’s Thy Neighbor’s Wife (1990) quotes an understandably breathless Talese on the life of the penis—“endlessly searching, sensing, expanding, probing, penetrating, throbbing, wilting, and wanting more.” To which Richler adds: “And not to quibble, but merely to introduce a personal note, in my case, it also pisses.” Discussing Canadian uneasiness that the world is always happening elsewhere, he notes that “the Canadian kid who wanted to be prime minister wasn’t thinking big” (“The October Crisis, or Issue Envy in Canada,” 1984).

Richler’s Jewishness is seldom absent from his work. His essays, however, do not deal in chicken soup yiddishkeit but in the absurdities of the comfortable Jewish middle class making its way in North America. He lets The Encyclopedia of Jews in Sports, for example, self-destruct simply by quoting the jacket copy (“A noteworthy contribution to mankind’s quest for knowledge”); he then suggests it may be a precursor to other bar mitzvah presents such as a “compilation of Famous Jewish Homosexuals, Professional and Amateur, Throughout History.” An essay on the Catskills (a resort area with a mostly Jewish clientele) characterizes one hotel as “a Disneyland with knishes,” then deftly recounts how a militant black civil rights singer (inexplicably booked into the “All Star Friday Nite Revue”) is asked to sing “Tzena Tzena,” a popular Hebrew folksong—which he does.

Richler’s writing about Jews, is, in fact, highly sympathetic—indeed, with a hair trigger look-out for anti-Semites. But like Philip Roth, he has not been especially popular with the pillars of the Jewish community: “‘Why,’ I was once asked ... ‘does everybody adore Sholem Aleichem, but hate your guts?’” (“Hemingway Set His Own Hours,” 1990). For Richler, of course, Jewish ridiculousness is merely a subgenre of the much larger human variety. It just happens to be the kind he knows best.

Richler has also written much about Canadian politics. As Quebec has become ever more nationalistic, he has attacked its laws which sharply limit the public display of any language but French. For Richler, these laws do not protect French culture (as their defenders claim) but instead are merely spiteful and xenophobic. Oh Canada! Oh Quebec! (1992) begins with a self-appointed language vigilante solemnly taking photographs of a restaurant menu written illegally in English. Elsewhere, Richler comments that “when thousands of flagwaving nationalists march through the street roaring ‘Le Québec aux Québécois!’ they do not have in mind anybody named Ginsburg. Or MacGregor, come to think of it.” Not surprisingly, Richer has himself become a target of Quebec nationalists, who see his attacks (especially in non-Canadian publications) as the typical arrogance and treachery of English Montreal. It is a very public debate, and quite a nasty one, with Richler characteristically dismissing one editorial denunciation of him as “the sort of letter many write in anger but have the wit not to mail” (Oh Canada! Oh Quebec!).

Canadian nationalism fares little better, especially cultural nationalism. As English Canada has itself become increasingly fixed on expressing its own distinctiveness, Richler has criticized that expression as mere anti-Americanism, parochialism, or greed masquerading as love of country: “The nationalists [were]...determined to win through legislation, for the second-rate but homegrown writer, what talent alone had hitherto denied him: an audience, applause” (“Pourquoi Pas—A Letter from Ottawa,” 1984). Not for Richler is it ever enough to be “world famous in Canada” (“The October Crisis, or Issue Envy in Canada”).

Richler, to repeat, wishes his reputation to rest with his fiction, not his essays, most of which were written to deadlines. Nonetheless, as several collections show, his essays lose surprisingly little of their bite, even years after their targets have been forgotten. If those targets sometimes seem sent by Central Casting solely for his amusement and laceration, they are, Richler would no doubt remind us, not his invention but the world’s.

ARNOLD KELLER

Biography

Born 27 January 1931 in Montreal. Studied at Baron Byng High School, Montreal, 1944–49; Sir George Williams University, Montreal, 1949–51. Lived in Europe, 1951–52 and 1954–72. Worked for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, 1952–53. Married Florence Wood, 1959: three sons and two daughters. Writer-in-residence, Sir George Williams University, 1968–69; visiting professor, Carleton University, Ottawa, 1972–74; judge, Book-of-the-Month Club, 1972–88; columnist of “Books and Things,” GQ magazine; regular columnist, Saturday Night magazine. Awards: several, including the University of Western Ontario President’s Medal, for nonfiction, 1959; Paris Review Award, 1968; Governor-General’s Award, for fiction and nonfiction, 1968, and for fiction, 1971; Berlin Film Festival Golden Bear, for screenplay, 1974; Jewish Chronicle-Wingate Award, 1981; Commonwealth Writers Prize, 1990.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Hunting Tigers Under Glass: Essays and Reports, 1968

Shovelling Trouble, 1972

Notes on an Endangered Species and Others, 1974

The Great Comic Book Heroes and Other Essays, edited by Robert Fulford, 1978

Home Sweet Home: My Canadian Album, 1984

Broadsides: Reviews and Opinions, 1990

Oh Canada! Oh Quebec! Requiem for a Divided Country, 1992

This Year in Jerusalem, 1994

Other writings: nine novels (The Acrobats, 1954 [published in the U.S. as Wicked We Love]; Son of a Smaller Hero, 1955; A Choice of Enemies, 1957; The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz, 1959; The Incomparable Atuk, 1963 [published in the U.S. as Stick Your Neck Out]; Cocksure, 1968; St. Urbain’s Horseman, 1971; Joshua Then and Now, 1980; Solomon Gursky Was Here, 1989), short stories, screenplays, and books for children.

Bibliography

Darling, Michael, "Mordecai Richler: An Annotated Bibliography," in The Annotated Bibliography of Canada's Major Authors, vol. 1, edited by Robert Lecker and Jack David, Downsview, Ontario: ECW Press, 1979

Further Reading

- Brenner, Rachel Feldhay, Assimilation and Assertion: The Response to the Holocaust in Mordecai Richler's Writing, New York: Lang, 1989
- Brenner, Rachel Feldhay, "A.M.Klein and Mordecai Richler: The Poetics of the Search for Providence in the Post-Holocaust World," Studies in Religion 19, no. 2 (1990):207
- Craniford, Ada, Fiction and Fact in Mordecai Richler's Novels, Lewiston, New York: Mellen Press, 1992
- Darling, Michael, editor, Perspectives on Mordecai Richler, Toronto: ECW Press, 1986
- Davidson, Arnold E., Mordecai Richler, New York: Ungar, 1983
- Greenstein, Michael, "Breaking the Mosaic Code: Jewish Literature vs. the Law," Mosaic 27, no. 3 (1994):87
- Henighan, Stephen, "Myths of Making It: Structure and Vision in Richler and Beauchemin," Essays on Canadian Writing 36 (Spring 1988):22–37
- Iannone, Carol, "The Adventures of Mordecai Richler," Commentary 89 (June 1990):51–53
- McNaught, Kenneth, "Mordecai Richler Was Here," Journal of Canadian Studies 26 (Winter 1991–92):141–43
- McSweeney, Kerry, Mordecai Richler and His Works, Toronto: ECW Press, 1984
- Ramraj, Victor J., Mordecai Richler, Boston: Twayne, 1983
- Sheps, G.David, editor, Mordecai Richler, Toronto and New York: McGraw Hill Ryerson, 1971
- Woodcock, George, Mordecai Richler, Toronto: McClelland and Stewart, 1970

Rodó, José Enrique

Uruguayan, 1871–1917

"Superbly irritating," "insufferable," "admirable," "stimulating," are some of the qualifiers offered by the Mexican writer Carlos Fuentes in his prologue to Ariel, the best known of José Enrique Rodó's literary works and one of the most influential pieces in the field of the Latin American essay. Despite its brevity, it has had a lasting impact on the evolution of Latin American literature in general, and Latin American thought in particular.

Ariel may be irritating to some contemporary readers, for Rodó writes in a rhetorical fashion that defies the attention of today's readers. This style is the culmination of modernismo, whose towering figures were Nicaragua's Rubén Darío and Cuba's José Martí. While they deserve a special place in Latin American literary history mainly as poets, Rodó is the quintessential pensador, a prototype of the French philosophe and the clearest example of the Latin American thinkers who dedicated themselves almost exclusively to the craft of the essay.

Ariel was published in 1900 when Rodó was only 29, but the author had achieved enough maturity to grasp the political context resulting from the Spanish-American War and the warning signals of unstoppable U.S. dominance of the hemisphere. The literary setting was staged by modernismo, a Latin American intellectual movement that elevated literary standards to a level never before reached in the Spanish language. By the first decade of the 20th century, modernismo had captured the philosophical approach of idealism, substituting it for positivism, which had dominated the social and political arena since the demise of Romanticism. The application of Comte's philosophy of "order and progress" to guarantee Latin American development was the logical crowning touch of the search for a cultural and political model proposed by Rodó's most direct predecessor, Domingo Faustino Sarmiento. His search for civilization and his proposal that the United States be used as a model to replace the remaining traces of Spain's influence is exactly what Rodó invites the reader to reject in Ariel.

The essay narrates a seminar-style lecture given by a professor, and uses symbolic characters borrowed principally from literary classics. From Shakespeare's The Tempest (1610) Rodó takes Prospero and the angel, Ariel. In Montaigne's Essais (1580, 1588) Caliban appears in the role of a cannibal, who was mentioned by Christopher Columbus in his Diary, and is later revamped in Ernest Renan's Caliban: Suite de la Tempête (1878), alongside a transformed Prospero more to Rodó's taste. While Shakespeare made Caliban out to be a savage, Renan painted him as a deformed main character, contrasting sharply with Ariel, the son of air, representing a fading spirituality. With brief mentions of Calibán by Darío in one poem and by the Argentine writer Paul Groussac in a speech in the emblematic year of 1898, Rodó provides the final warning for Latin American survival facing Caliban, who represents a culture based on utilitarianism, democratic mediocrity, and material goal-seeking. Rodó pays tribute to a number of aspects of North American culture ("although I do not love them, I admire them"). However, he stresses the need to recover the roots of the Latin American way of being—a more spiritual, authentic, Mediterranean, classical Greek sense of civilization, represented by Ariel. While he recognizes "the grandeur and power of work" and the role of curiosity, philanthropy, and industry in the United States, he invites Latin American youth to adopt an authentic model of beauty, quality, and good taste that he insists are part of an innate Hispanic heritage.

While criticism of the negative aspects of Latin American societies is absent in Ariel, Rodó can claim that his aristocratic attitude is paradoxically a precedent for the harsher literature that the regionalists would generate in the first decades of this century. He will also be recognized as the initiator, along with Martí and Darío, of an anti-imperialist literature, a permanent subgenre of both Latin American literature and a more sophisticated chapter of Latin American thought known as dependencia theory. Rodó's dichotomy reappeared in a variety of books during the course of the century, until its repudiating character was transformed into a positive symbol of mestizo culture by Cuban writer Roberto Fernández Rematar in Caliban (1971).

Since Ariel, the resulting negative consequence of the use or abuse of the work is called arielismo, a pervading trend that consists of a Latin American moral and spiritual superiority, rejecting measures of modern development, and consistently blaming the United States for all the ills of Latin America. Venezuelan journalist Carlos Rangel aptly summarized this trend in his bestseller Del buen salvaje al buen revolucionario (1976; The Latin Americans: Their Love-Hate Affair with the U.S.).

The lasting impact of Ariel explains the irritating overuse of Rodó's lines or key words such as arielista or rodoniano. Without reading the book or mentioning the author, presidents during inaugurations, diplomats in international conferences, editorialists in search of contrasting arguments, and professors seeking to impress students have used (and still use) Rodó's best-known phrases to make a point.

Besides the specificity of Ariel's impact on both Latin American intellectual history and its place in the evolution of the Latin American essay, Rodó's lasting legacy as an essayist is best illustrated by his use of variations of the genre, as expressed in his philosophically oriented books and in his works as a literary critic. The most outstanding example of the first is Motivos de Proteo (1909; The Motives of Proteus), a more global proposal for intellectual enrichment. Its motto is a correction of D'Annunzio's "To reform or to die" into "reformarse es vivir" (to reform oneself is to live). Its form is a variable structure of essays, prose poems, anecdotes, and parables in prose.

As a literary critic using the form of the essay, Rodó's best-known work is El mirador de Próspero (1913; Prospero's outlook), a compendium of articles, lectures, speeches, literary comments, and travel columns. In this book Rodó elevates each variation of essayistic prose to the highest level attempted in Latin America. However, as with Ariel, the dense declamatory nature of his writings made his style a progressively less attractive example for future generations.

JOAQUÍN ROY

Biography

Born 15 July 1871 in Montevideo, Uruguay. Studied privately, and at the Escuela Elbio Fernández. Cofounder, Revista Nacional de Literatura y Ciencias Sociales (National review of literature and social sciences), 1895–97. Professor of literature, University of Montevideo, 1898–1902. Elected to the House of Representatives, 1902–05 (resigned) and 1908–14. Contributor to La Nación, Buenos Aires, from 1907, and traveled to Europe as its correspondent, 1916. Fell ill in Genoa, Fall 1916. Died (of abdominal typhus and nephritis) in Palermo, 1 May 1917.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

La vida nueva, I: "El que vendrá" and "La novela nueva", 1897

La vida nueva, II: Rubén Darío, 1899

Hombres de América, 1899

- La vida nueva, III: Ariel*, 1900; edited by Leopoldo Alas (Clarín), 1948, Gordon Brotherston, 1967, Raimundo Lazo, 1968, Ángel Rama, 1976, and Abelardo Villegas, 1982; as Ariel, translated by F.J.Stimson, 1922., and Margaret Sayers Peden, 1988
- Motivos de Proteo*, 1909; as The Motives of Proteus, translated by Ángel Flores, 1928
- El mirador de Próspero*, 1913
- Bolívar*, 1914
- Cinco ensayos*, 1915
- El camino de Paros (meditaciones y andanzas)* (European travel notes), 1918
- Los últimos movitos de Proteo*, edited by Dardo Regules, 1932
- Parábolas, y otras lecturas*, 1935
- La tradición intelectual argentina*, edited by Rafael Alberto Arrieta, 1939
- Ideario*, edited by Luis Alberto Sánchez, 1941
- La América nuestra*, edited by Arturo Ardao, 1977
- Collected works editions: Obras completas, edited by José Pedro Segundo and Juan Antonio Zubillaga, 4 vols., 1945–58, and Emir Rodríguez Monegal, 1957, revised edition, 1967.

Bibliography

- Scarone, Arturo, Bibliografía de Rodó, Montevideo: Imprenta Nacional, 2 vols., 1930

Further Reading

- Albarrán Puente, Glicerio, El pensamiento de José Enrique Rodó, Madrid: Cultura Hispánica, 1953
- Benedetti, Mario, Genio y figura de José Enrique Rodó, Buenos Aires: University of Buenos Aires, 1966
- Benedetti, Mario, Rodó, el pionero que quedó atrás, Montevideo: La República, 1991
- Bollo, Sarah, Sobre José Enrique Rodó, Montevideo: Imprenta Uruguaya, 1951
- Bosco de Bullrich, Nieves, La imaginación del signo, Buenos Aires: Vinciguerra, 1993
- Costabile de Amarin, Helena, Rodó, pensador y estilista, Washington, D.C.: Organization of American States, 1973
- Crow, John A., "Ariel and Caliban," in his The Epic of Latin America, Berkeley: University of California Press, revised edition, 1980:675–97 (original edition, 1946)
- Earle, Peter G., and Robert G.Mead, Jr., "José Enrique Rodó (1871–1917)," in their Historia del ensayo hispanoamericano, Mexico City: Andrea, 1973:61–64
- García Morales, Alfonso, Literatura y pensamiento hispánico de fin de siglo: Clarín y Rodó, Seville: University of Seville, 1992
- Gómez-Gil, Orlando, Mensaje y vigencia en José Enrique Rodó, Miami: Universal, 1992
- González Maldonado, Edelmira, El arte del estilo en José Enrique Rodó, San Juan, Puerto Rico: Edil, 1968
- Guevara, Dario C., Magisterio de dos colosos: Montalvo, Rodó, Quito: Minerva, 1963
- Langhorst, Frederick Hart, Three Latin Americans Look at Us: The United States as Seen in the Essays of José Martí, Jose Enrique Rodó and José Vasconcelos (dissertation), Atlanta: Emory University, 1976
- Lauxar, B., Rubén Darío y José Enrique Rodó, Montevideo: Agencia General de Librería

y Publicaciones, 1924

Martínez Durán, Carlos, José Enrique Rodó, en el espíritu de su tiempo y en la conciencia de América: Homenaje al maestro de América en el centenario de su nacimiento, 1871–1971, Caracas: Central University of Venezuela, 1974

Pereda, Clemente, Magna patria, Rodó: Su vida y su obra, Caracas: Imprenta Universitaria, 1973

Perez Petit, Victor, Rodó: Su vida, su obra, Montevideo: Garcia, 1937 (original edition, 1918)

Simón, Luis, José Enrique Rodó, San José, Costa Rica: Ministry of Culture, Youth, and Sports, 1985

Torres Ríoseco, Arturo, “José Enrique Rodó and His Idealistic Philosophy,” in his Aspects of Spanish-American Literature, Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1963:31–50

Zaldumbide, Gonzalo, José Enrique Rodó, Montevideo: Garcia, 1944 (original edition, 1919)

Rousseau, Jean-Jacques

French (Swiss-born), 1712–1778

Jean-Jacques Rousseau published nothing that could be called an essay, in the sense that even his late confessional works, although obviously personal in tone, as the essay must be, are not written in the objective style demanded by the essay form. However, Rousseau’s earlier, often polemical works of philosophical speculation, even when called discours (discourses), present their case in a form nearer to essay than to treatise, and the longer works like Julie; ou, La Nouvelle Héloïse (1761), ostensibly a novel, and Émile; ou, De l’éducation (1762), ostensibly a treatise on education, each contain speculative passages which could easily be regarded as self-contained essays. Neither confines itself to the form in which it starts. Sometimes Rousseau disguises an essay as a letter, as to d’Alembert on the theater (1758). Both the Discours sur les sciences et les arts (1750; A Discourse on the Arts and Sciences) and the Discours sur l’origine et les fondements de l’inégalité parmi les hommes (1755; A Discourse on the Origin of Inequality) were actually written as prize essays for the Dijon Academy, and Du contrat social (1762; The Social Contract) itself, the 18th century’s best-known treatise on political philosophy, is speculative and personal enough to be categorized more suitably as an essay.

Rousseau never wanted to write. He had no formal education, and his consciousness of a lack of grace about his person, clothing, dress, appearance, and manners always eroded his self-confidence. He established for himself the circumstances of life which allowed him to think out as far as possible from first principles—without intellectual or social constraints from outside—the major truths about God, humanity, nature, life, art, education, love, society, and death. The focus of his interest was emotionally inspired activity of all sorts. He was aware that the results of his work were part theory, part dream, never completely coherent or even internally consistent.

Until he was 37, Rousseau had written nothing except libretti for his own music. Then, in the summer of 1749, the Dijon Academy announced a prize to be offered for an essay on the subject, “Has the progress of the arts and sciences contributed to the purification of morals?” Rousseau changed the title to include the possibility that they had contributed rather to their corruption, wrote A Discourse on the Arts and Sciences, and won the prize. He later said that what he wrote in the first flush of inspiration was the oration of Fabricius, at the end of the first part of the published discourse, in which he laments the decadence wrought by luxury and science. The essay ends with a plea to strive for simplicity, virtue, and obedience to the inner voice of conscience.

The second, better-known Discourse on the Origin of Inequality, on the origins and basis of inequality among human beings, is the most powerful of Rousseau’s early works, although in response to the invitation to write about both the origins and the basis it moves bewilderingly from an historical account of the development of human social organization to the discussion of constitutional principles. Essentially Rousseau’s point of view is moral, extrapolating primitive human innocence from what is artificial and morally corrupt in the present state of society. He does not yearn for an impossible return to humanity’s primitive state, prior to the creation of society and morality, but points to the fact that the social order at present rests, and always has rested, on relations of subservience between those who should be equals. He draws on the tradition established by Hugo Grotius (1583–1645) that human liberty, unlike goods which can be bought and sold, is inalienable by contract. The need for corporate activities, like hunting and cultivating the soil, created both society and ownership, so that Rousseau does not need to presuppose that society was created by a contract, which could become binding only by virtue of the morality which was itself the result of the existence of society.

Rousseau’s most famous essay is the unsatisfactory Social Contract, a work he himself came to think needed rewriting. Its four books are devoted respectively to the nature of society, the nature of sovereignty, the different forms of government, and the administrative institutions appropriate to each. The published text of 1762 can be seen to have grown out of an earlier article on political economy, out of other material prepared for the “Institutions politiques” abandoned in 1758, and out of the Geneva manuscript of The Social Contract itself. The definitive text sets out from the premise that, since we are born free, our subjection to government must be the result of free assent to a social pact with our fellows. The famous opening declaration, “Man is born free and everywhere is in chains,” must refer to political freedom, although the second sentence understands freedom in a moral sense: “A man may believe himself the master of others and yet be more enslaved than they are.”

Rousseau is here going no further than the natural law school of political theorists derived from Justinian’s Digest through Aquinas and Grotius to Samuel Pufendorf. What is new in Rousseau is the inalienability of political liberty, even by the contract, an idea which Rousseau took from the Calvinist Johannes Althusius’ Politica (1603). Rousseau’s essay begins from the eighth chapter of the second book to be heavily dependent on Montesquieu’s De l’esprit des lois (1748; The Spirit of Laws), whose reliance on the Roman concept of virtue Rousseau incorporates, and whose argument he quite closely follows, although his social philosophy is by no means the same.

In fact, Rousseau’s desire to follow John Locke and the English liberals clashes with his fundamental concepts of moral and political liberty, so that there are several inconsistencies in his argument, as in the need he sees for a legislator, in society's right to impose the death penalty, in his admission that his democratic ideal was unattainable, and in the notion of civil liberties, where he allows that when the individual can be forced to follow the general will, "he will be forced to be free." Rousseau argues against Locke that the social contract can have only one form, and, unlike Montesquieu and Voltaire, he was uncompromisingly republican. He was, however, clearly thinking only of small societies in which corruption was not necessarily endemic, like Corsica and Geneva.

Like The Social Contract, Rousseau's Émile further draws out the principles implicit in the first two discourses. Émile only begins as a treatise on education, eventually turning into a Bildungsroman, but it contends that a child is born innocent and is educated through its feelings, and at least the work's earlier portion can be regarded as an essay, as no doubt can the nationalistic Considérations sur le gouvernement de la Pologne (1782.; Considerations on the Government of Poland)—not, however, intended for publication.

Only by stretching the meaning of the term essay to include a mixture of anecdote and intimate personal confidence can Les Rêveries du promeneur solitaire (1782; Reveries of the Solitary Walker) be said to belong to the genre. The ten promenades are a mixture of anecdote and confessional introversion, very possibly an attempt to ward off the paranoia which they describe, and with which Rousseau felt himself threatened. They were written in the wake of the psychological crisis he suffered after his readings of the autobiographical Confessions were banned, and are not polished literary pieces, but indications of varying moods, certainly of greater psychological and biographical than literary interest. The eighth starts with a reference to "meditating" on his soul's feeling in all the situations he has experienced, and it is perhaps better to look on the Reveries as meditations or "rêveries" (daydreams) than to regard them as essays, since they lack formal structure. There are philosophical reflections throughout the text, as on the mutability of things, but they seldom warrant being referred to as insights, however interestingly they reveal Rousseau's own intimate feelings.

Rousseau took the essay very near the genre of formal treatise, keeping it distinct only through intrusive personal speculation. His frequent exploitation of the dialogue, epistolary, and fictional forms showed that he needed a genre which openly admitted the expression of speculative opinions based on personal feelings and allowed play to his imagination. Nonetheless, the two discourses and The Social Contract are genuine essays, however marginal their influence on the development of the essay as a literary form in France, especially once pre-Romantics such as Chateaubriand gave full rein to the expression of their views, even on abstract, theoretical subjects, as inspired by personal feeling.

ANTHONY LEVI

Biography

Born 28 June 1712 in Geneva. Apprenticed to an engraver, 1725–28. Left Geneva to travel, 1728; converted to Catholicism in Turin, 1728; lived with or near Madame de Warens, Annecy and Chambéry, 1729–42, then moved to Paris. Secretary to the French Ambassador to Venice, 1743–44. Began liaison with Thérèse Levasseur, 1745 (married her, 1768): five children (all given to foundling hospital). Music copyist, 17505; returned to Geneva, reverted to Protestantism, and regained citizenship, 1754; moved to Montmorency, 1756; condemned for religious unorthodoxy, 1762, and fled to Switzerland, first to Neuchâtel, 1762–65, then to Bienne, 1765; renounced Geneva citizenship, 1763; visited England, 1766–67; lived in Paris, from 1770; moved to Ermenonville, 1778. Award: Dijon Academy Prize, for Discours sur les sciences et les arts, 1749. Died (of apoplexy) in Ermenonville, 2 July 1778.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Discours sur les sciences et les arts, 1750; edited by George R. Havens, 1946, and Gérard Allard, 1988; as A Discourse on the Arts and Sciences, translated anonymously, 1752, and by Roger D. and Judith R.Masters, in The First and Second Discourses, 1964, and Victor Gourevitch, 1986

Discours sur l'origine et les fondements de l'inégalité parmi les hommes, 1755; edited by Bertrand de Jouvenal, 1982, Jean Starobinski, 1989, and Gérard Allard, 1993; as A Discourse on the Origin of Inequality, translated by G.D.H.Cole, 1952, Roger D. and Judith R.Masters, in The First and Second Discourses, 1964, Maurice Cranston, 1984, Victor Gourevitch, 1986, Donald A.Cress, 1992, and Franklin Philip, 1994

Discours sur l'économie politique, 1758; edited by Barbara de Negroni, 1990; as Discourse on Political Economy, edited by Roger D.Masters, translated by Judith R.Masters, 1978, and Christopher Betts, 1994

Lettre à d'Alembert sur les spectacles, 1758; edited by M.Fuchs, 1948; as A Letter to M.d'Alembert, translated anonymously, 1759, and by Allan Bloom, in Miscellaneous Writings, 1960

Du contrat social; ou, Principes du droit politique, 1762; edited by C.E.Vaughan, 1918, and Jean-Pierre Siméon, 1977; as A Treatise on the Social Compact, translated anonymously, 1764; as The Social Contract, with The Discourses, translated by G.D.H. Cole, 1913, translation revised by J.H.Brumfitt and John C. Hall, 1973; as On the Social Contract, edited by Roger D. Masters, translated by Judith R.Masters, 1978; as Of the Social Contract, or, Principles of Political Right, with Discourse on Political Economy, translated by Charles M.Sherover, 1984; as On the Social Contract, translated by Donald A.Cress, 1987; as The Social Contract, translated by Christopher Betts, 1994

Lettres écrites de la montagne, 1764

Essai sur l'origine des langues, 1781; edited by Charles Porset, 1976, Pierre-Yves Bourdil, 1987, and Catherine Kintzler, 1993; as On the Origin of Language, translated by John H.Moran and Alexander Gode, 1966

Considérations sur le gouvernement de la Pologne, 1782; as Considerations on the Government of Poland, translated by Willmoore Kendall, 1947, and Frederick Watkins, 1953

Les Rêveries du promeneur solitaire, 1782; edited by Marcel Raymond, 1948, and John S.Spink, 1948; as The Reveries of the Solitary Walker, translated anonymously, 1783; as The Reveries of a Solitary..., translated by John Gould Fletcher, 1927; as Reveries of the Solitary Walker, translated by Peter France, 1979

Political Writings, edited and translated by Frederick Watkins, 1953

The First and Second Discourses, edited by Roger D.Masters, translated by Roger D.Masters and Judith R.Masters, 1964

Lettres philosophiques, edited by Henri Gouhier, 1974

The First and Second Discourse Together with the Replies to Critics; and Essay on the Origins of Languages, edited and translated by Victor Gourevitch, 1986

Basic Political Writings, edited and translated by Donald A.Cress, 1987

Selections, edited and translated by Maurice Cranston, 1988

Political Writings: New Translations, Interpretive Notes, Backgrounds, Commentaries, edited by Alan Ritter and Julia Conaway Bondanella, translated by Bondanella, 1988

Other writings: fictional works (including Julie; ou, La Nouvelle Héloïse, 1761; Émile; ou, De l'éducation, 1762), two volumes of autobiography (Les Confessions, 1782–89), a pastoral opera, correspondence, and philosophical and political works.

Collected works editions: Œuvres complètes (Piéiade Edition), edited by Bernard Gagnebin and Marcel Raymond, 4 vols., 1959–69 (out of projected 5); Œuvres complètes (Intégrale Edition), edited by Michel Launay, 3 vols., 1967–71; The Collected Writings (various translators), edited by Roger D.Masters and Christopher Kelly, 3 vols., 1990–92 (in progress).

Bibliographies

McEachern, Jo-Ann, Bibliography of the Writings of Jean-Jacques Rousseau to 1800, Oxford: Voltaire Foundation, 2 vols., 1989–93

Senelier, Jean, Bibliographie générale des œuvres de Jean-Jacques Rousseau, Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1949

Trousson, R., "Quinze Années d'études rousseauistes," DixHuitième Siècle 9 (1977)

Further Reading

Blum, Carol, Rousseau and the Republic of Virtue, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1986

Broome, J., Rousseau: A Study of His Thought, London: Edward Arnold, 1963

Cranston, Maurice, Jean-Jacques Rousseau, London: Allen Lane, 2 vols., 1983–91 (in progress; 3 vols. projected)

Crocker, Lester G., Jean-Jacques Rousseau: The Quest (1712–1758) and The Prophetic Voice (1758–1778), New York: Macmillan, 2 vols., 1968–73

Derathé, Robert, Jean-Jacques Rousseau et la science politique de son temps, Paris: Librairie Philosophique, 2nd edition, 1970

Guéhenno, Jean, Jean-Jacques Rousseau, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, and New York: Columbia University Press, 2 vols., 1966

Havens, George R., Jean-Jacques Rousseau, Boston: Twayne, 1978

Masters, Roger D., The Political Philosophy of Rousseau, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1976

Melzer, Arthur M., The Natural Goodness of Man: On the System of Rousseau's Thought, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1990

Miller, James, Rousseau, Dreamer of Democracy, New Haven, Connecticut and London: Yale University Press, 1984

Rozanov, Vasili

Russian, 1856–1919

Renowned as both a leading religious thinker and an innovative Russian stylist, Vasili Rozanov has often been called the most remarkable writer among Russian philosophers. His first published work, O ponimanii (1886; On the understanding), was a neo-Slavophile philosophical tract. His literary reputation, however, was established with the publication in 1891 of the long essay Legenda o velikom inkvizitore F.M. Dostoevskogo (Dostoevsky and the Legend of the Grand Inquisitor), which dealt with the implications of Ivan Karamazov's parable for modern Russia, whose current historical experience and fate Rozanov conceived in apocalyptic terms. After this initial success, Rozanov expressed his philosophical, political, and religious ideas almost exclusively in essays and in shorter, more topical journalistic articles, principally in Suvorin's conservative newspaper Novoe Vremia (The new times), but also in papers of different political stripes under numerous pseudonyms.

Rozanov's ideas, particularly his mystical religious understanding of sexuality and procreation as man's main link to God and the transcendent world, appeared in his oeuvre from the late 1890s on, giving it a kind of internal consistency. Nevertheless, his essay production and the often contradictory ideological positions he espoused, often within the same essay, led to his being accused of what for the Russian essayists of the period were the greatest of sins: lack of all principle and intellectual dishonesty. Rozanov was considered dangerous for the reader by such diverse figures as Leon Trotskii, Petr Struve, and Vladimir Solov'ev because the volatility of his ideas was expressed in often beautiful and always hypnotic verbal magic.

Not only were Rozanov's ideas fresh and even outrageous, he, like Lev Shestov, had a genius for aphorism, and his often paradoxical and humorous witticisms make his oeuvre a gold mine for the compiler of quotable quotes. Realizing this near the end of his life, Rozanov created in Russia what was hailed by some as a new genre—a species of free-form writer's notebook in which he claims to register his immediate thoughts, to give the words that ceaselessly flowed through his mind full and immediate expression. These late works—Uedinennoe (1912; Solitaria), Opavshie list'ia (1913–15; Fallen Leaves), and Apokalipsis nashego vremeni (1917–18; “The Apocalypse of Our Times”)—contain a variety of materials, from aphorisms and anecdotes to personal letters and short stories, as well as a number of brilliant short essays. They were hailed as surpassing literary achievements, albeit of a new kind, and have secured Rozanov's reputation as one of the greatest writers of the Silver Age (1890–1920), a period of unparalleled brilliance in Russian arts and letters.

Called the Russian Nietzsche in part because of his aphoristic and fragmentary writings, Rozanov was the pioneer of the fragmentary literary form in Russian Modernism. Its influence has been great in the 20th century—on Aleksei Remizov, Velimir Khlebnikov, the experimental prose of Osip Mandel'shtam and Viktor Shklovskii, Andrei Siniavskii (Abram Tertz), and most recently the late Soviet and post-Soviet cult figure Venedikt Erofeev. In the English-language tradition Rozanov most strongly influenced D.H.Lawrence in his writer's notebooks. Almost all these writers have acknowledged Rozanov's direct and decisive influence on their writings, most in essay form, Erofeev by making Rozanov a literary character.

Besides their fragmentary character, these last works are undoubtedly polyphonic. The mode of writing is not only "motley," as some have claimed, it is the often cacophonous colloquy of at least eight discrete voices, each with its own point of view, peculiar language, and recognizable style. These Rozanovian personae can be categorized as: the Prophet of Doom—poetic mouthpiece of Rozanov's Old Testament affinities and apocalyptic foreboding; the Fervent Mystic—a voice of religious, often pagan ecstasy; the Mentor—formulator of morals often in aphoristic form; the Objective Critic—the standard, restrained, serious essayistic voice; the Confessor—source of all manner of intimate detail about Rozanov's feelings and personal and family life; the Homebody—Rozanov's version of the views and feelings of the lower-middle-class Russian Everyman; the Gossip—an often vicious ad hominem critic of contemporary people and events; and the Buffoon, who is Dostoevskii's Fedor Karamazov, or Lebedev from Besy (1872; The Possessed), suddenly let loose in a literary essay (Anna Lisa Crone, 1978). Rozanov appears to have taken literally Montaigne's claim that he was a different person at every moment, and to have realized its implications in these last texts, as well as in the unfinished Mimilemoe (Fleeting things).

Yet the voices combining in a free-for-all in Rozanov's late works were already familiar to the Russian reader from his essays. In his earlier essays in the 1890s his prose was dominated by the authoritative, often erudite voice of the Objective Critic; only the ideas were polemical, provocative, or new. As time went on he increasingly flouted the decorum of the essay genre with the introduction of everything from irrational mystical outbursts, to emotional and "unseemly" attacks on societal mainstays such as Russian Orthodoxy, Christ and Christianity, and marital and divorce laws, to gossipy attacks on respected cultural figures (Solov'ev, Lev Tolstoi, Nikolai Chernyshevskii). The very manner of writing became as controversial as the contradictory collection of ideas Rozanov espoused.

Reading Rozanov from the late 1890s on, one senses the presence of two or more voices in his essays—usually both ideologically and stylistically incompatible. Rozanov claimed he respected all ideas and believed there was a grain of truth in all positions; he enjoyed "giving expression" to these various Russian points of view, all of which he wanted to feel and experience. In a modern way Rozanov comes close to saying that his whole essayistic and literary enterprise was only about writing, about the music of words, their articulation and resonance, and that he had a physiological need to converse, mutter, and commit his verbal rambling to written form. He built a mysticism around the individual's word, his voice, pronunciation, and even handwriting being expressions of unrepeatable personality. A poet's sense of words as bearers of a unique human spirit far outweighed interest in the word as a tool for other ends; Mandel'shtam was the first, after Rozanov himself, to point out that placing too much emphasis on the semantic aspect of Rozanov's words was the surest way to misunderstand him. Rozanov, of course, thrived on selfcontradiction, an almost baroque clashing of opposing ideas. Yet his essayistic prose does not submit well to structural analysis in terms of mere binary oppositions. Cavalier in his attitude toward fact and fiction, truth and lies, and all manner of serious moral categories, Rozanov sets up oppositions dialectically in essays and proceeds to subvert and destroy them himself. This makes the mature Rozanov a prime subject for deconstructionist treatment as he often takes the first steps at deconstructing the meaning and form of his utterances himself. Truth for Rozanov was “an omelet”; the more ideological and/or semantic “eggs” one cracked and mixed into it, the better. Subverting a dialectical opposition, Rozanov shied away from satisfying or elegant synthesis or resolution. For him it was enough to challenge received ideas and provoke an open dialogue inside his reader’s mind as long as the language in which he did so was powerful and satisfied his aesthetic requirements.

Rozanov wrote in this internally contradictory way about almost every issue of interest to Russians in the period between 1891 and 1919. The briefest list of his essay collections reveals an almost unprecedented variety of topics. Perhaps his greatest achievement was to subject almost every received notion to doubt and negative scrutiny and to expose the relativism of most ideas and judgments. This exposé of the emotional and irrational motives behind even the most rational of human thoughts was coupled with his constant elevation of the mystical and irrational sides of the human psyche. For this Rozanov was idolized as the messenger of a new, deeper Russian truth and detested as a cynical nihilist. He was so hated by the Left that he was rendered a nonperson in Soviet Russian letters, and his works and studies about him went unpublished from the early 1920s to the later 1980s. Since 1988 this fascinating essayist has been published in Russia again, generating considerable public and scholarly interest in his work.

Unlike Shestov, who used rational argument and systematic means to demolish rationalism, Rozanov began as a more standard essay writer and slowly through a proliferation of voices and multiple points of view came to a complex and intermittently rational/irrational relativism. But whether one deals with the serious Rozanov or the more scandalous and outrageous Rozanov, his polyphonic style was so unique that Dmitrii Merezhkovskii, quoting him in Bol’naia Rossiia (1910; Sick Russia), could say with conviction: “These lines were written anonymously. But there is no need to name their author, because every reader knows that there is only one man in Russia who could have authored them—Vasilii Vasil’evich Rozanov.”

ANNA LISA CRONE

Biography

Vasilii Vasil’evich Rozanov. Born 2 May 1856 in Vetluga. Studied history and philosophy at Moscow University, graduated 1880. Taught at gymnasiums in Simbirsk, Elets, Belyi, and Viaz’ma, 1880–1893. Married Apollinariia Suslova, 1880 (separated, 1886: she refused to divorce him); companion of Varvara Rudneva, from 1889: five children. Worked in the Office of State Control, 1893. Contributor to various journals, from 1893, including Novoe Vremia, Mir Iskusstva (World of art), Russkii Vestnik (Russian herald), Rosskoe Obozvenie (Russian review), and Novyi Put’ (The new way). Died in Sergiev Posad, 5 February 1919.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

O ponimanii, 1886

Mesto khristianstva v istorii (The place of Christianity in history), 1890

Legenda o velikom inkvizitore F.M.Dostoevskogo, 1891 (in periodical); 1894 (in book form); as Dostoevsky and the Legend of the Grand Inquisitor, translated by Spencer E.Roberts, 1972

Teoriia isoricheskogo progressa i upadok (The theory of historical progress and decline), 1892

Sumerki prosveshcheniia (The twilight of enlightenment), 1893 (in periodical); 1899 (in book form)

Literaturnye ocherki (Literary sketches), 1899

Religiia i kul'tura (Religion and culture), 1899

Priroda i istoriia (Nature and history), 1900

V mire neiasnogo i nereshennogo (In the world of the obscure and unsolved), 1901

Semeinyi vopros v Rossii (The family problem in Russia), 2 vols., 1901

Okolo tserkovnykh sten (Around the church walls), 2 vols., 1906

ItaViamkie vpechatleniia (Italian impressions), 1909

Kogda nachal'stvo ushlo (When the authorities went away), 1910

Tiornii lik (The dark face), 1911; part as "Sweetest Jesus and the Bitter Fruits of the World," translated by Spencer E.Roberts, in Four Faces of Rozanov: Christianity, Sex, Jews and the Russian Revolution, 1978

Liudi lunnogo sveta, 1911; as "People of the Moonlight," translated by Spencer E.Roberts, in Four Faces of Rozanov: Christianity, Sex, Jews and the Russian Revolution, 1978

Uedinennoe, 1912; as Solitaria, translated by S.S.Koteliansky, 1927

Opavshie list'ia, 2 vols., 1913–15; vol. 1 as Fallen Leaves, Bundle One, translated by S.S.Koteliansky, 1929

Literaturnie izgnanniki (Literary exiles), 1913

Sredi khudozhnikov (Among artists), 1914

Oboniatel'noe i osiazatel'noe otoshenie evreev k krovi (The attitude of the Jews toward the smell and touch of blood), 1914

Iz vostochnykh motivov (From Eastern motifs), 1916–17

Apokalipsis nashogo vremeni, 1917–18 (in periodical); part as "The Apocalypse of Our Times," translated by S.S.Koteliansky, in Solitaria, 1927, and by Spencer E.Roberts, in Four Faces of Rozanov: Christianity, Sex, Jews and the Russian Revolution, translated by Spencer E.Roberts, 1978

Collected works edition: Sobranie sochinenii, edited by A.N. Nikoliukina, 1994–(in progress).

Bibliography

Gollerbakh, E., in V.V.Rozanov: Zhizn' i tvorchestvo, Paris: YMCA Press, 1976 (original edition, 1922)

Further Reading

- Crone, Anna Lisa, Rozanov and the End of Literature: Polyphony and the Dissolution of Genre in "Solitaria", Würzburg: Jal, 1978
- Crone, Anna Lisa, "V.V.Rozanov and the Russian Art of Autobiography," in Autobiographical Statements in Modern Russian Literature, edited by Jane Gary Harris, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1990
- Gulyga, Arseni, "'The anguish of being Russian': A Note on the Life and Works of Vasilii Rozanov," Glas: New Russian Writing 6 (1993):184–200
- Hutchings, Stephen C., "Breaking the Circle of the Self: Domestication, Alienation and the Question of Discourse Type in Rozanov's Writings," Slavic Review 52, no. 1 (Spring 1993): 67–86
- Kaulbach, Z.K., The Life and Works of V.V.Rozanov (dissertation), Ithaca, New York: Cornell University, 1973
- Poggioli, Renato, Rozanov, London: Bowes and Bowes, 1957; New York: Hillary House, 1962
- Putnam, George F., "Vasilii V.Rozanov: Sex, Marriage and Christianity," Canadian Slavic Studies 5 (1971):301–26

Ruskin, John

British, 1819–1900

John Ruskin was a prolific essayist who, like his intellectual and stylistic mentor Thomas Carlyle, railed against many of the advances of modern society. Many of his major works were epistolary or delivered as lectures, making generic classification problematic; nevertheless, the wide range of Ruskin's interests may be viewed as a series of interrelated essays. As an art critic and social economist Ruskin defined the relationship between art and society and between the worker and society in novel ways, influencing figures as diverse as Proust and Gandhi. In a rapidly changing world, in which workers were becoming alienated from the works they produced and science was competing with art and literature as a source of knowledge and spiritual sustenance, Ruskin championed art as both ethical teacher and moral yardstick against which society could be measured.

The publication of volume one of Modern Painters in 1843 launched Ruskin's career as "sage" and intellectual guide for his era. Expanding on ideas espoused in uninspired essays written while Ruskin was a student at Oxford, Modern Painters began as a defense of Turner's landscape painting against the charge that it was untrue to nature. The five volumes of Modern Painters (1843–60) became an ambitious series of essays on the social context in which art is produced and which in turn mirrors the society that produces it. Art, therefore, appeals to the intellect as well as to the aesthetic sensibility. In accordance with his lofty aims, Ruskin employs a formal and literary prose in the first three volumes of Modern Painters. He is a master at exemplifying major points through succinct examples. In illustrating the connection between art's power to evoke great thought, as well as its capacity to give aesthetic pleasure, Ruskin states in volume three: "A finished work of a great artist is only better than its sketch if the sources of pleasure belonging to colour and realization—valuable in themselves—are so employed as to increase the impressiveness of the thought."

The writing of Modern Painters was interrupted by the creation of two of Ruskin's most important works, The Seven Lamps of Architecture (1849) and the three volumes of The Stones of Venice (1851–53). The Seven Lamps is largely a theoretical work applying many of the standards of art to architecture. Ruskin, in great part, attempts to resolve the apparent dichotomy between architecture's practical restraints and what should be one of its important aims: the imitation of nature. In The Stones of Venice he applies theoretical considerations to Venetian architecture. No doubt influenced by his recent visit to Northern Italy in 1849, where he made many sketches of Venice's famous buildings, The Stones of Venice contains Ruskin's characteristic attention to detail and a luxuriant "painterly" prose, syntactically harmonious, full of minute descriptions of the forms and colors of the city. His "portrait" of Piazza San Marco demonstrates his rich prose:

...for beyond those troops of ordered arches there rises a vision out of the earth, and all the great square seems to have opened from it in a kind of awe, that we may see it far away;—a multitude of pillars and white domes, clustered into a long low pyramid of coloured light; a treasure-heap, it seems, partly of gold, and partly of opal and mother-of-pearl, hollowed beneath into five great vaulted porches, ceiled with fair mosaic, and beset with sculpture of alabaster, clear as amber and delicate as ivory,—sculpture fantastic and involved, of palm leaves and lilies, and grapes and pomegranates, and birds clinging and fluttering among the branches, all twined together into an endless network of buds and plumes...

Ruskin admittedly had little reading in economic theory, but his philosophical assumptions about the relationship between art and morality led him naturally into the field. Believing that only a spiritually nourishing environment could lead to great art, Ruskin opposed Bentham's laissez-faire economic doctrines as morally debilitating. In a series of forceful but sometimes illogical essays published in Cornhill Magazine, Ruskin contests the popular view that man is selfishly motivated in pursuit of his economic interests. The public was infuriated by many of Ruskin's assertions and publication of the essays was terminated. The essays were later collected in Unto This Last (1862), which many years after its publication became a popular and influential work.

Several books followed, which were collections of essays and lectures Ruskin delivered to a variety of audiences, including his students at Oxford. They demonstrate an impressive eclecticism and intellectual prowess, but also a self-indulgence and lack of logic which may have been caused by several bouts of mental illness suffered during the later years of his life.

Ruskin's views were often extreme, exalting minor artists and vilifying others such as Whistler, who won a libel suit against him. His strict evangelical upbringing, his daily reading in the Bible, and his frustrated personal life have all been offered as causes of his sermon-like prose; but his breadth of knowledge and his masterful use of language to help us “see” mark him as a unique essayist of the English language.

ROBERT ZWEIG

Biography

Born 8 February 1819 in London. Studied at Christ Church, Oxford, 1836–40, 1842, B.A., 1842, M.A., 1843. Married Euphemia Chalmers Gray, 1848 (marriage annulled, 1854). Lived mainly in Venice, 1849–53. Wrote annual review catalogues for Royal Academy exhibitions, 1855–59 and 1875; taught drawing, Working Men’s College, London, 1850s; lectured throughout England, 1855–70; catalogued Turner bequest to the National Gallery, London, 1857–58; teacher, Winnington Hall girls’ school, from 1857; Rede Lecturer, Cambridge University, 1867; first Slade Professor of Fine Art, Oxford University, 1869–79 and 1883–84. Founder of a drawing school in Oxford, 1870, a school in Camberwell, London, Whitelands College, Chelsea, London, St. George’s Museum, Walkley, near Sheffield, and the Guild of St. George, 1871 (wrote the guild’s journal Fors Clavigera, 1871–74). Bought Brantwood house, by Coniston Lake, 1871, and lived there from 1889. Suffered first of several mental breakdowns, 1878. Awards: honorary degrees from Cambridge and Oxford Universities; Honorary Fellow, Corpus Christi College, Oxford, 1871; Honorary Member, Royal Society of Painters in Water-Colours, 1873; Fellow, Royal Geological Society, Royal Zoological Society, and Royal Institute of British Architects. Died at Coniston, 20 January 1900.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Modern Painters, 5 vols., 1843–60; abridged edition, edited by David Barrie, 1987

The Seven Lamps of Architecture, 1849

The Stones of Venice, 3 vols., 1851–53; selections edited by Arnold Whittick, 1976, and Jan Morris, 1981

Lectures on Architecture and Painting, 1854

The Political Economy of Art (two lectures), 1857; enlarged edition, as “A Joy for Ever”, 1880

The Two Paths, Being Lectures on Art and Its Application to Decoration and Manufacture, 1859

Unto This Last: Four Essays on the First Principles of Political Economy, 1862; edited by J.D.C.Monfries and G.E. Hollingsworth, 1931, and Lloyd J.Hubenska, 1967

Sesame and Lilies: Two Lectures, 1865

The Ethics of the Dust: Ten Lectures to Little Housewives on the Elements of Crystallisation, 1866; edited by R.O.Morris, 1914

The Crown of Wild Olive: Three Lectures on Work, Traffic, and War, 1866; edited by W.F.Melton, 1919

Time and Tide, by Weare and Tyne: Twenty-Five Letters to a Working Man of Sunderland on the Laws of Work, 1867; edited by P.Kaufman, 1928

- The Queen of the Air: Being a Study of the Greek Myths of Cloud and Storm*, 1869
Lectures on Art, 1870; revised edition, 1887
Fors Clavigera: Letters to the Workmen and Labourers of Great Britain, 8 vols., 1871–84
Munera Pulveris: Six Essays on the Elements of Political Economy, 1872
Aratra Pentelici: Six Lectures on the Elements of Sculpture, 1872
The Eagle's Nest: Ten Lectures on the Relation of Natural Science to Art, 1872
Love's Meinie: Lectures on Greek and English Birds, 3 vols., 1873–81
Ariadne Florentina: Six Lectures on Wood and Metal Engraving, 3 vols., 1873–75
Val D'Arno: Ten Lectures on the Tuscan Art Directly Antecedent to the Florentine Year of Victories, 1874
Proserpina: Studies of Wayside Flowers, 10 vols., 1875–86
Deucalion: Collected Studies of the Lapse of Waves, and Life of Stones, 9 vols., 1875–83
Mornings in Florence, Being Simple Studies of Christian Art for English Travellers, 6 vols., 1876–77
Arrows of the Chace, Being a Collection of Scattered Letters Published Chiefly in the Daily Newspapers, 1840–1880, edited by A.D.O.Wedderburn, 2 vols., 1880
On the Old Road: A Collection of Miscellaneous Essays, 1834–1885, edited by A.D.O.Wedderburn, 2 vols., 1885; revised edition, 3 vols., 1899
Verona and Other Lectures, edited by W.G.Collingwood, 1894
Lectures on Landscape, 1897
The Lamp of Beauty: Writings on Art, edited by Joan Evans, 1959; revised editions, 1980, 1995
The Genius of Ruskin: Selections, edited by John D.Rosenberg, 1963
Ruskin Today (selections), edited by Kenneth Clark, 1964
The Art Criticism, edited by Robert L.Herbert, 1964
The Literary Criticism, edited by Harold Bloom, 1965
Unto This Last, and Other Writings, edited by Clive Wilmer, 1985
The Social and Economic Works, 6 vols., 1994
Selected Writings, edited by Philip Davis, 1995
 Other writings: the three-volume autobiography Praeterita (1886–89) and many volumes of correspondence.
 Collected works edition: Works (Library Edition), edited by E.T. Cook and A.D.O.Wedderburn, 39 vols., 1903–12, reprinted in microfiche, 1986.

Bibliographies

- Beetz, Kirk H., John Ruskin: A Bibliography, 1900–1974, Metuchen, New Jersey: Scarecrow Press, 1976
 Cate, George Allan, John Ruskin: A Reference Guide, Boston: Hall, 1988
 Wise, Thomas J., and James P.Smart, A Complete Bibliography of the Writings in Prose and Verse of John Ruskin, LL.D., London: privately printed, 2 vols., 1889–93

Further Reading

- Helsing, Elizabeth K., Ruskin and the Art of the Beholder, Cambridge, Massachusetts:

Harvard University Press, 1982

Hewison, Robert, John Ruskin: The Argument of the Eye, Princeton, New Jersey:

Princeton University Press, and London: Thames and Hudson, 1976

Hilton, Tim, John Ruskin: The Early Years, New Haven, Connecticut and London: Yale University Press, 1985

Hunt, John Dixon, The Wider Sea: A Life of John Ruskin, New York: Viking, and London: Dent, 1982

Kirchhoff, Frederick, John Ruskin, Boston: Twayne, 1984

Rosenberg, John D., The Darkening Glass: A Portrait of Ruskin's Genius, New York: Columbia University Press, 1961; London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1963

Rosenberg, John D., "Style and Sensibility in Ruskin's Prose," in The Art of Victorian Prose, edited by George Levine and William Madden, New York: Oxford University Press, 1968:177–200

Russian Essay

In Russian letters the essay genre has a weak tradition. This fact is reflected in the absence of an exact, single-word translation for the genre known in English as the essay. Other words such as opyty (experiments), ocherk (sketch), etiudy (studies), zapiski (notes), rassuzhdenie (thoughts), and pouchenie (instruction) only partially cover the requirements of the genre, which S.I.Ozhegov in his Russian dictionary Slovar' Russkogo iazyka (1952) defines as a "short prose work of any style on a personal theme which is treated subjectively and usually not exhaustively."

Although the reasons why a tradition never developed can be partially explained by the absence of the genre in early modern Russian literature, one can claim with certainty that the essay as employed by Montaigne appeared in Russia very late. Although the first translation of Montaigne into Russian was published in 1803, and between 1806 and 1808 there appeared two short articles about him, the genre "essai," translated as opyty, never set down deep roots. The Russian word esse did not appear until the middle of the 19th century. Thus, instead of borrowing directly, Russian authors molded this foreign form to their own particular needs and desires. Instead of "essays," Russian writers cultivated literary criticism, political writing, and philosophical speculation.

A study of the essay in Russian culture poses certain problems for scholars, due to the dearth of secondary literature on the subject. The main danger lies in the identification and classification of the genre. Since a broad variety of hybrid literary forms can fall under the rubric "essay" in Russia, there is no consensus about what exactly constitutes an essay. At present scholars are obliged to make independent choices based on criteria which have emerged from Western definitions of the genre. For our purposes, we identify those works which belong to one of three categories—the political essay, the meditative or philosophical essay, and the critical essay. By identifying the essay's qualities, it may be possible to locate those normative features characteristic of the Russian experience with this literary form.

The genre as it is known in the West came late to Russia, appearing only in the second half of the 18th century. It bears clear marks of its derivation from Western European sources. While literary genres similar to the essay certainly appeared earlier—polemical works and religious apologetics—medieval conventions remained longer in Russian literature than in the West. Russian writing was characterized by thematic topoi and formal conventions, which lasted with few exceptions up to the 17th century. Thus, we may distinguish between the essay as it was practiced in the West (at least by the time of the Renaissance), in which the concrete views of an individualized author were expressed, and those in which the identity of the author was unknown or reflected a conventionalized persona, a monk, a benevolent ruler, or a courtier. In such works the subject matter lacked the personal, meditative quality or the critical bite we associate with the genre.

In the first half of the 18th century the term “essay” did not appear, nor is it easy to identify works belonging to the genre. The classification of genres in classicism, the leading literary style, offered philosophical writing primarily in the form of “odes” or “epistles.” Moreover, subjectivism in general was not characteristic of classicism, which was founded rather on rules and norms. The leading writers in the 18th century, Mikhail Lomonosov (1711–65), Vasilii Trediakovskii (1703–69), and Aleksandr Sumarokov (1718–77), authored treatises on the rules of writing poetry. In such prose works the authors tried to present an objective and authoritative view.

Writing which resembled essays appeared in the satirical journals which proliferated in the early part of the reign (1762–96) of Catherine the Great. These journals, while based on foreign, especially English models such as the Tatler, Spectator, and Guardian, were adapted to Russian conditions. Catherine sponsored her own journal and challenged others to follow suit. The most interesting were Nikolai Novikov’s (1744–1818) Truten’ (1769–70; The drone), Aleksandr Sumarokov’s (1717–77) Trudoliobivaia Pchela (1759; Worker bee), and Catherine’s own Vsiakaia Vsiachina (1769; Odds and ends). In these journals the authors published short instructive writings in which they mocked social conditions and criticized universal human foibles. New scholarship has shown that such criticism was not rebellious in intent as was previously thought, but rather was governed by the conventions of satirical journals. These journals, however, did provide a forum for a kind of discourse in which a subjective treatment of intellectually lively subjects could find expression.

The final quarter of the 18th century reflected the growing intensity of political concerns. As Russia’s critical intelligentsia formed, it began to demand a political voice, and several major writers of the period—Prince Mikhail Shcherbatov (1733–90), Denis Fonvizin (1745–92), and Aleksandr Radishchev (1749–1802)—penned political articles in which each tried to describe the proper and most propitious means for governing the state. For example, in his essay O povrezhdenii nraov v Rossii (1786–89; On the Corruption of Morals in Russia), Prince Shcherbatov argued in favor of the rights of the hereditary nobility and “ancient Russian virtues” against the interests of the court and its “western-aping” habits. Similarly, Denis Fonvizin, in his “Rassuzhdenie o neprimennykh gosudarstvennykh zakonakh” (“Discourse on the Indispensable Laws of the State”), advised the new tsar Paul to shun favoritism and tyrannical rule and create inalterable laws that would bring harmony and stability.

Aleksandr Radishchev, the famed author of the fictional Puteshestvie iz Peterburga v

Moskvu (1790; A Journey From St. Petersburg to Moscow), also argued forcefully for revolution in his “Beseda o tom, chto est’ syn otechestva” (1789; Conversation about who is his nation’s son). Here he railed against serfdom, denouncing the unchecked power of landowners over their human chattel and the illegitimate source of political power in Russia. While the authors delivered serious criticism of Russia’s political system, their presentation of arguments and use of vocabulary from a variety of disciplines link these works with the political essay.

At the end of the 18th and beginning of the 19th centuries, Romanticism replaced classicism as the leading literary sensibility. A change occurred in social and artistic consciousness, the subjective “I” becoming an important source for creative writing. This new tendency gave a strong impetus to essay writing. Sentimentalism gradually destroyed the genre system of classicism; new genres with the potential for confessional narratives appeared (to a great degree influenced by JeanJacques Rousseau’s Confessions [1782–89]). A variety of travel narratives—journeys, walks, and travel notes (puteshestvie, progulki, putevye zametki)—permitted the expression of personal, spontaneous impressions. In addition, in 1803 Montaigne’s essays were translated and served as a blueprint for many Russian authors.

Nikolai Karamzin (1766–1826) reflected the ethic of sentimentalism, especially its rationalistic and didactic character. For example, in his essay “Nechto o naukakh, iskusstvakh i prosveshchenii” (1793; A bit about the sciences, arts, and Enlightenment), he polemicalizes with Rousseau, who had said in one of his discourses that “the sciences ruin morals.” Karamzin argued that enlightenment, science, and art possess an enormous instructive significance. Karamzin also wrote political articles for the journal Vestnik Evropy (The messenger of Europe) in which he analyzed the political situation of Europe before the French Revolution and the wars France waged in Europe and Africa. Karamzin held a conservative position, arguing for the preservation of religion and the restoration of the monarchy. He offered a utopian picture of Europe and the world, employing the stylistic manner typical of sentimentalist aesthetics.

The spirit of Romanticism, known as the “Golden Age” of Russian poetry, was conducive to producing Russia’s first serious literary criticism. In newly established journals, Poliarnaia Zvezda, Aglaia, Msemodia, and Literaturnaia Gazeta (Literary gazette), Vasilii Zhukovskii (1783–1852.), Aleksandr Bestuzhev-Marlinskii (1797–1837), Dmitrii Venevitinov (1805–27), Vil’gelm Kiukhel’beker (1797–1846), O.M. Somov (1793–1833), and Kondratii Ryleev (1795–1825), set forth aesthetic criteria with which they judged the most recent poetic creations. Principally, they emphasized the artistic expression of the author’s unique personality. Furthermore, critics applauded the appearance of their favored works of poetry, viewing them in a national cultural context. Thus appeared the literary survey, critical articles adumbrating the trends in Russian literary life.

Vasilii Zhukovskii is often considered the originator of Russian Romanticism in poetry, but he was also an important critic. Many of Zhukovskii’s critical articles, however, have a programmatic character and served as manifestoes of Romanticism. As a translator he made available the philosophical essays of David Hume, such as “On Simplicity and Refinement in Writing,” “On Tragedy,” and “Of Eloquence.” In his own “Rafaeleva ‘Madonna’” (1824; Raphael’s Madonna), Zhukovskii described his view of the Romantic artist, setting forth his impressions of the painting. He claimed that inspiration from on high is the source of the writer's art and the author is a prophet or messenger of divine knowledge.

A critical figure in Russian essay writing is Konstantin N. Batiushkov (1787–1855). In his first collection entitled Opyty v stikhakh i proze (1817; Essays in verse and prose—the title imitates Montaigne's book, and he takes the epigraph from him), he includes prose texts from a variety of genres: the letter, speech, travelogue, philosophical essay, and critical article. In his essay “Nechto o poete i poezii” (1816; A bit about the poet and poetry), Batiushkov depicted the sentimental poet, claiming that art, or spiritual experience, should correspond to real life. In his famous essay, “Progulka v Akademiiu khudozhestv” (1814; A walk to the Academy of Arts), Batiushkov expressed his aesthetic viewpoint, taking as his touchstone the culture of antiquity. From this position, he evaluated the Renaissance and contemporary Russia, illustrating his patriotism with praise for the achievements of national culture.

Petr A. Viazemskii (1792–1878) also penned a number of important essays. The majority were written for monthly journals and can be seen as critical reflections on literary events of the time. Despite the subjectivity of most of his critical opinions, these essays were important in instigating a critical appreciation of literature. Examples are “O Derzhavine” (1816; On Derzhavin), “Sonety Mitskevicha” (1829; Mickievich's sonnets), and “O duxe partii; o literaturnoi aristokratii” (1830; On the spirit of parties; on literary aristocracy).

During this period Russian literary criticism played a central role in literary life, becoming a permanent feature of the political and literary journals. Bestuzhev-Marlinskii's survey articles on Russian literature for 1823 and 1824–25 and Vil'gelm Kiukhel'beker's “O napravlenii nashei poezii osobenno liricheskoi v poslednee desiatiletie” (On the direction of our poetry especially lyrical during the last decade) are representative examples. These articles have common traits with the essay, since the authors freely express their views on literature, literary life, and society. As B. Egorov writes in On the Craft of Literary Criticism (1980), “For criticism of the romantic method, a state of chaos, an intentional disconnectedness of ideas and subjects was very characteristic. The post-Karamzinian epoch, in the period of the birth of a powerful intrusion of the subjective voice of the critic contributed to such discursiveness.”

As a writer of essays, the greatest of Russian poets Aleksandr Pushkin (1799–1837) was prolific. Pushkin's essays are characterized by a broadness of theme, clarity of thought, and richness of philosophical speculation. In them he expounds on history, philosophy, education, literature, and poetry. As a literary critic, Pushkin observed the subtleties of literary craft, judging with precision the best and worst of the literature of his day. He wrote about his friends, the poets Evgenii Batiushkov and Baron Delvig, and expressed his views on literary life with critical articles on Nikolai Polevoi, Mikhail Zagoskin, and Ivan Krylov. Pushkin also offered thoughtful reflections on poetic inspiration and the role of literature in society in such essays as “O literaturnoi kritike” (1830; “On Literary Criticism”) and “Trebuets li publika izveshcheniia” (1830; “Does the Public Demand Instruction?”). He wrote on history and historiography with reviews of the Dictionary of Saints and in his famous letter (1836) to Petr Chaadaev.

Often called the father of Russian philosophy, Chaadaev (1794–1856) wrote philosophical essays, which he presented in the form of a fictional correspondence. His Filosoficheskie pis'ma (Philosophical Letters) consisted of eight letters, only one of which was published in his lifetime, appearing in the journal Teleskop in 1836. In this essay, Chaadaev levied all his critical anger at his native land, juxtaposing inferior Russia to a superior Western civilization. Russia, Chaadaev complained, having never experienced the Renaissance and Reformation, lacked the civilizing experiences of the West, the emblem of which he considered the Roman Catholic Church. Although Chaadaev overstated his case, the questions he posed about the meaning of Russia's history and its relations to the West would become central to the two main philosophical movements of the 19th century, the Slavophiles and the Westernizers.

The great Russian writer Nikolai Gogol' (1809–52) also wrote a variety of essays. His early attempts at the genre are contained in the volume Arabeski (1835; Arabesques). Part of the volume deals with aesthetic problems: "Ob arkhitekture" ("On Architecture"), "Skul'ptura, zhivopis', muzyka" ("Sculpture, Painting, Music"), and "Poslednii den' Pompei" ("The Last Day of Pompei"). The other section is connected with Gogol's university teaching. In "O srednikh vekakh" ("On the Middle Ages") he disputed Enlightenment thinkers, who considered the Middle Ages a primitive period, and the Romantics, who idealized it. In "Vzgliad na sostavlenie Malorossii" ("A View on the Formation of Little Russia") and "O Malorossiiskikh pesniakh" ("On Little Russian Songs"), Gogol' revealed his interest in Ukrainian national culture and folklore.

Among the Westernizers—individuals whose value system was oriented toward ideas originating in the West—Vissarion Belinskii (1811–48) was the most important literary critic and essayist; he contributed to the development of the profession of literary criticism. He was passionate and personally engaged with his subject, and his prose reflects this involvement. As the literary historian Leonid Grossman put it (in Vissarion Belinsky, 1954), "Belinsky's primary and favorite form is criticism as speech, criticism as lecture, criticism as conversation. Concentrating on the main intonation of his writings, we can truly imagine him standing on a tribunal before a large audience which he instructs, educates, convinces and entertains with his talk. This is a critic-orator."

While the political views of a writer were important to Belinskii, aesthetics also mattered a great deal. In part, in his articles on Pushkin (1843–46), he was responsible for canonizing Pushkin as the national poet; in his article "O russkoi povesti i povestiakh g.Gogolia" (1835; On the Russian story and Gogol's stories) he crowned Gogol' the leader of the "Natural School." In his annual review of the year's events in Russian literature (starting in 1841), Belinskii drew a portrait of the epoch, while presenting theoretical issues about literature. In addition to claiming that literature was an expression of the national spirit, Belinskii promulgated his theoretical position that literature is "thinking in images." Besides seeking out the political "ideals" in a literary work, Belinskii also "emphasized the dialectical unity of content and form and the indivisibility of progress and historical development" (B.F.Egorov, in Russkie pisateli, 1800–1917, 1992.). Thus, he believed in the transforming role of literature in the general and inexorable improvement of humanity. This commitment to progress led Belinskii into a polemic with Gogol', and in one of the most influential essays of Russian intellectual history, "Pis'mo k Gogoliu" (1847; "Letter to N.V. Gogol'"), which because of censorship could not be published in Russia, Belinskii condemned the tyranny of tsarism, the unfreedom of serfdom, and Gogol's own misdirected and unfortunate religious conservatism.

In addition to Belinskii, the "men of the 1840s" included distinguished writers such as Aleksandr Herzen (1812–70), Mikhail Bakunin (1814–76), Ivan Turgenev, Nikolai Stankevich (1813–40), and Timofei Granovskii (1813–55). Herzen became the most illustrious and was a master of the political essay. Despite having been born into great wealth, early in his life Herzen became enamored with the ideals of socialism. After having been exiled twice within Russia for his views, he left Russia voluntarily in 1847. However, it was in emigration that he was to play his greatest role. As the editor and primary writer for his journal, Kolokol (1857–67; The bell), which was smuggled back into Russia, Herzen influenced government policy in the years just before and after the emancipation of the serfs in 1861.

In Kolokol Herzen published political essays such as "Moskva i Peterburg" (1857; Moscow and Petersburg), "Zapadnye knigi" (1857; Western books), "Very Dangerous" (1859; original title in English), and "Lishnie liudi i zhelcheviki" (1860; Superfluous men and revolutionaries). He railed against the illusions of Slavophilism, while criticizing the radicals for not considering the significance of the liberals of the 1840s (of whom Herzen was one) in the struggle against tsarism. Furthermore, in response to witnessing the revolutions of 1848 in Europe and to his own experiences in Russia, Herzen wrote two books composed of essays, Pis'ma iz Frantsii i Italii (1847–52.; Letters from France and Italy, 1547–1851) and S togo berega (first published in German, 1850, in Russian, 1855; From the Other Shore). In these deftly written, philosophically astute, and personally engaged articles, Herzen spurned the radicals, rejecting the view that history is progressing inexorably to a predestined or purposeful end. He considered that personalities rather than abstract ideas make history.

Another fine essay writer among the Westernizers was the novelist Ivan Turgenev (1818–83). Although he wrote only a few essays, they are important as reflections of the conflicts between the "men of the 1840s" and the revolutionaries of the 1860s. The most important of them is "Gamlet i Don Kikhot" (1860; "Hamlet and Don Quixote"), in which Turgenev describes two basic human types. Hamlet represents a person paralyzed by self-doubt and reflection, someone socially useless or "superfluous." Don Quixote, on the contrary, is "completely devoted to his ideal, for which he is prepared to sacrifice everything, including his life. It is true that this ideal is sometimes based on fantasy or illusion, so much so that Don Quixote may appear to be a madman. But this does not in any way diminish its purity or sincerity, or Don Quixote's determination and strength of will" (Leonard Schapiro, Turgenev: His Life and Times, 1978). Like his novels, Turgenev's essays had a powerful effect on society, since they appeared with perfect timing at a moment of social convulsion.

Protests against the Westernizers were levied by their intellectual antitheses, the Slavophiles, who widely employed the philosophical essay. Thoroughly Western in their education and sensibility, Ivan Kireevskii (1808–56) and Aleksei Khomiakov (1804–60) used references from European literature, history, and philosophy in order to promulgate their view of Russia as unique from the West. At the start of his career, in his own journal Evropeets (The European), Kireevskii wrote "Deviatnadsatyi vek" (1832; The 19th century), perhaps the most absorbing essay of his time. In it he treated the intellectual movements of the 18th and 19th centuries in Europe from the viewpoint of a “conservative favorably disposed toward the West,” criticizing European irreligiosity but “happy for the return of religion to its rightful central place” (Peter K. Christoff, An Introduction to Nineteenth-Century Russian Slavophilism, 1972.).

Later Kireevskii, together with Khomiakov, would articulate the basic premises of the Slavophile doctrine. In philosophical articles such as Kireevskii’s “O neobkhozhdimosti i vozmozhnosti novykh nachal dlia filosofii” (1856; On the necessity and possibility of new principles in philosophy) and Khomiakov’s “O sovremennykh iavleniakh v oblasti filosofii” (1859; On contemporary trends in the area of philosophy), the two thinkers indicated the differences between Russia and the West. The West, they held, was based on rationalism and religious agnosticism, while the Russian people were religious in their essence. Furthermore, while in Europe the single individual’s well-being was the central goal, Russia was based on principles of unity and inclusion. For these reasons, the latter was superior spiritually, while Europe languished in moral turpitude.

The division between the followers of the Slavophiles and the Westernizers widened in the tumultuous years following the abolition of serfdom in 1861. The conflict grew in part because of the uncompromising attitude of the nihilists, who demanded nothing less than the overthrow of the tsar. Nevertheless, these same nihilists, extremist in their political program, were powerful critics, enormously influential on the thought and behavior of subsequent generations of radicals. Nikolai Chernyshevskii (1828–89), for example, depicted positive heroes useful for public emulation. Furthermore, these radical social critics, such as Chernyshevskii himself, Nikolai Dobroliubov (1836–61), and Dmitrii Pisarev (1840–68), intended to incite the reader’s anger about the wrongs of Russia’s social structure and to provoke action on behalf of political change. Thus, for reasons of censorship, essays purporting to be literary criticism were actually sociopolitical tracts in disguise. Incidentally, Pisarev also wrote educational essays on popular science, transmitting to a Russian audience the ideas of positivism, utilitarianism, and educational reform.

Among the next generation of critics, Apollon Grigor’ev (1822–64) reflected the influence of both the Westernizers and the Slavophiles. Practicing a type of reading he called “organic criticism,” Grigor’ev saw a work of art as a complicated whole, an entity in which the depiction of life emerges from the author’s inner vision. The artist is seen as a prophet or clairvoyant who “opens the mysteries of life” and reveals their relationship with eternal ideals. In critical essays such as “O pravde i iskrennosti v iskusstve” (1856; On truth and honesty in art), Grigor’ev creatively interpreted Russia’s poets as sharp observers of reality and metaphysical visionaries.

During the 1860s, the novelist Fedor Dostoevskii (1821–81) wrote many articles about Russia’s social, political, and psychological character. Many of his journalistic articles he signed under the heading “A Writer’s Diary,” and these have been republished in separate volumes. As editor and owner of his own journals Vremia (1861–63; Time) and Epokha (1864–65; Epoch), and as editor of Grazhdanin (1873–78; The citizen), Dostoevskii had an outlet for his philosophical deliberations about Western civilization and Russia in the years following the liberation of the serfs. Opposing the nihilists, Dostoevskii advocated, in the words of R.L. Belknap (in Handbook of Russian Literature, edited by Victor Terras, 1985), “not a Slavophile repudiation of the West as such, nor a denial of the need to better the lot of Russia's poor, and certainly not any sympathy with the ideals of Russian aristocrats, bureaucrats, or plutocrats, but a doctrine that he and his associates called pochvennichestvo, or 'grassroots.' They argued that Peter the Great's Westernization had enriched Russia, but that now Russia must turn to the wisdom of its rural past if it is to say its own word in the history of mankind."

One feature of Dostoevskii's essays, however, is contradictory and morally disconcerting. In his essays a shrill voice sometimes expresses deep resentment against religions other than Russian Orthodoxy and ethnic races other than Russian. The objects of Dostoevskii's wrath include Jews, Poles, and Germans. He does not appear to have had much patience with those elements of society which were different or contrary to his idealistic vision of a theocratic Russia.

Lev Tolstoi (1828–1910) wrote his essays primarily in the periods of retreat from fiction writing. The first period of essays follows Tolstoi's return to his estate, lasnaia Poliana, after feeling snubbed by Petersburg's professional intellectuals. There he began to write a periodical describing his theory of education and the practical results of his work as a teacher of peasant children in his own school. Twelve issues of lasnaia Poliana appeared between 1862 and 1863. Tolstoi articulated his ideas most strikingly in "Komu u kogo učit'sia pisat', krest'ianskim rebiatam u nas, ili nam u krest'ianskikh rabiat?" (1862; "Who Should Learn to Write from Whom, the Peasant Children from Us, or We from the Peasant Children?"). In the years of writing Anna Karenina (1875–77) and thereafter, Tolstoi became engaged in a struggle to remodel Christianity, and expressed his new religious outlook in book-length didactic treatises aimed at attracting readers to his views of nonresistance to evil, the abolition of private property, and the utility of art for moral edification: Tak chto zhe nam delat'? (1888; What to Do?), Tsarstvo Bozhie vnutri vas (1893–94; The Kingdom of God Is Within You), and Chto takoe iskusstvo? (1898; What Is Art?).

The other great realist, Anton Chekhov (1860–1904), was not a prolific essayist, although his articles, letters to the editor, and reviews make entertaining reading. In part, this can be explained by Chekhov's ability to treat contemporary problems in his fiction; nonfiction therefore held less interest for him. Nevertheless, he did complete Iz Sibiri (1890; From Siberia) and Ostrov Sakalin (1895; A Journey to Sakalin), that "remarkable book," made up of separate essays about the social, economic, and medical conditions of Russia's Far East. In addition, Chekhov also published exposés of social problems and sketches of contemporaries: for example, essays on Sarah Bernhardt (1881), I.A.Mel'nikov (1893), N.N.Figner (1893), and "Novoe vremia" (1894), a letter to the editor of The New Times.

A contemporary of Chekhov and a brilliant intellectual, Vladimir Solov'ev (1853–1900) was a remarkable essayist and gifted stylist. Inspired by Slavophile thought, Solov'ev was a religious philosopher who created his own Christian world view by uniting boundless faith in the divinity with a tremendous respect for science and human creativity. Among his most famous philosophical essays are "Obschchii smysl iskusstva" (1890; "The General Meaning of Art") and Smysl liubvi (1892–94; The Meaning of Love). His personality and thought were extremely influential for poets and philosophers associated with the younger symbolists.

During the 1880s and 1890s the positivist school of literary criticism dominated the “thick” journals. The leader of the movement, Nikolai Mikhailovskii (1842–1904), was a fine essayist and an important figure, since his blending of utilitarianism, individual egoism, and populism influenced revolutionary thought of the time. In the 1890s, however, a new school of writers arose who attacked the general confidence in rationalism and political collectivism in the name of artistic creativity and Nietzschean apolitical individualism. At times called Russian decadents or symbolists, Dmitrii Merezhkovskii (1865–1941), Zinaida Gippius (1869–1945), and Valerii Briusov (1873–1924) were energetic writers and self-advertisers who for at least a decade devoted their energies to spreading the new aesthetic until it became the leading artistic movement in Russia.

The best statement of the tenets of this new movement can be found in Merezhkovskii’s programmatic essay “O prichinakh upadka i o novykh techeniakh sovremennoi russkoi literatury” (1893; On the reasons for the decline and the new trends in contemporary Russian literature). Briusov also wrote polemical essays against those intellectual movements antagonistic to symbolism—positivism, materialism, and political conservatism; for example, “Kliuchi tain” (1904; The keys of mysteries) and “Sovremennye sobrazheniia” (1905; Contemporary thoughts). Later Briusov began to write about the necessity of considering the real world, not simply the inner experiences of the authors. In addition, Briusov wrote many important critical essays about Russian literature, especially on the poetry of Aleksandr Pushkin, for example in “Stikhotvornaia tehnika Pushkina” (1915; Pushkin’s verse techniques).

The 1905 Revolution was the central event of the first decade of the 20th century and it became a major theme for writers. For example, at the same time that the centrist and leftist parties were wresting from the tsar the right to establish the Duma, an elected legislature, a group of intellectuals, notably Viacheslav Ivanov (1866–1949) and Georgii Chulkov (1879–1939), wrote political essays advocating “misticheskoi anarkhizme” (mystical anarchy). Later, addressing the unfulfilled expectations of the Revolution, seven non-Marxist philosophers published a collection of essays entitled Vekhi: Sbornik statei o russkoi intelligentsii (1909; Landmarks: A Collection of Essays on the Russian Intelligentsia). These political essays by Nikolai Berdiaev (1874–1948), Sergei Bulgakov (1871–1944), Mikhail Gershenzon (1869–1925), Semion Frank (1877–1950), A. Kistiakovskii (1868–1920), Petr Struve (1870–1944), and Aleksandr Izgoev (1872–1935) had a scandalous success; the volume incited over 200 published responses within the first year alone. Although the contributors disagreed among themselves about a positive solution for Russia’s problems, they joined forces to criticize the revolutionary intelligentsia’s moral maximalism and indifference to truth, beauty, or knowledge, independent of its use for the political cause.

This period of cultural flowering, known to scholars as the “Silver Age” (1890–1920), also featured excellent essay writers among the religiously-minded intelligentsia. Of special interest are Vasilii Rozanov (1856–1919) and Lev Shestov (1866–1938). In his essays Rozanov treated the issues of Christianity, Judaism, the Russian idea, and his own biography, blending them together in a surprising and idiosyncratic way (in his personal life he was friendly with both anti-Semites and Jews, educated philosophers and peasant artists). His erratic, “irrational” views are matched by a bizarre, personal writing style. Breaking down genre barriers, in his greatest books, Uedinennoe (1912; Solitaria) and Opavshie list'ia (1913–15; Fallen Leaves), Rozanov included short essays on a variety of topics, which he treated with his characteristic shifting of intonation, from irony to complete seriousness in a single breath.

Lev Shestov was one of Russia's greatest essay writers because of his clear and limpid style. Writing about literature and philosophy, Shestov created his own approach, organizing his essays around an analysis of his subjects' biographies. Influenced by Nietzsche, Shestov claimed that creation emerges from personal tragedies, and that authors try to hide their horrifying experiences or transform them in fiction. It is up to the critic, therefore, to reconstruct the artist's psychological condition. Shestov masterfully applied his subjective method to the study of Shakespeare, Dante, Dostoevskii, Tolstoi, Chekhov, Pushkin, the Greek philosophers, and the heroes of the Bible.

The poet Aleksandr Blok (1880–1921) is also well known for his essay writing. He wrote especially on social and political problems in essays such as “Narod i intelligentsia” (1909; “The People and Intelligentsia”), “Intelligentsiia i revoliutsiia” (1918; “The Intelligentsia and Revolution”), and “Krushenie gumanizma” (1921; “The Collapse of Humanism”). In these works Blok expressed doubts about the value of the humanist tradition and revealed an attraction for the apocalypse, which would bring a conclusion to the unjust and spiritually incomplete world. Thus, Blok fatally embraced the Bolshevik putsch which brought Lenin to power. Blok's position was a sign to the entire intelligentsia, and the historian Ivanov-Razumnik (1878–1946) in the journal Skifii (1917–18; Scythians) expressed the view that intellectuals had fully to accept the October Revolution as a fait accompli.

Another group of writers and thinkers, however, interpreted the Bolshevik Revolution as nothing less than unlawful violence. In 1918, under the direction of Petr Struve, a group of religious philosophers and political liberals (the core group from Landmarks plus several other thinkers, minus Gershenzon) contributed essays to De profundis, a volume which was intended to provide a theoretical repudiation of Bolshevism.

Maksim Gor'kii (i.e. Aleksei Peshkov, 1868–1936) was at once a powerful political writer and an important literary critic. In his early years he wrote revolutionary manifestoes, awakening the world proletariat to action (1905–06). In the period during which he resided in Capri (1906–13), Gor'kii published many articles of literary and social criticism. He attacked decadence, individualism, and trounced the leading Russian authors, while praising the ideals of socialism and the virtues of the working class in essays such as “Razrushenie lichnosti” (1909; “The Destruction of the Individual”), “O Karamozovshchine” (1913; “About Karamazovism”). In the revolutionary years, Gor'kii published two books of articles, Revoliutsiia i kul'tura (1918; Revolution and culture) and Nesvoevremennye mysli (1917–18; Untimely Thoughts), in which he argued for the preservation of cultural values and called for the popularization of knowledge and culture for the masses. After the Revolution, in emigration, Gor'kii continued to write critical articles, working as an editor of the journal Dialogue.

The early years of Bolshevik rule are paradoxical in that, while intellectuals in Petersburg and Moscow were literally starving, there occurred a vibrant flowering in the arts. Given the desire to understand the social changes which had taken place since the Revolution, much of the creative energy in literature took the form of philosophical speculation and literary criticism. In weekly issues of the Letopis' Doma Literatorov

(1918–21; Chronicle of the house of writers), famous intellectuals such as Vladislav Khodasevich (1886–1939), Fedor Kuzmin (1875–1936), Viktor Shklovskii (1893–1984), Aleksandr Blok, and new talents, Evgenii Zamiatin (1884–1937), Mikhail Zoshchenko (1895–1958), and Benedikt Livshits (1881–1939), published their works. During this period Viacheslav Ivanov and Mikhail Gershenzon created their masterpiece, Perepiska iz dvukh uglov (1921; Correspondence Across a Room). Although the work consists of 14 letters, each is in itself a self-contained essay about the purpose of history, metaphysics, and the Russian Revolution. The book has an interesting history, since the two authors actually lived together in a sanatorium and sent letters “across a room.”

While the October Revolution offered communist writers such as Leon Trotskii (1879–1940), Nikolai Bukharin (1888–1938), and Anatolii Lunacharskii (1875–1933) an advantage in getting into print, they did not have exclusive control over publishing during the 1920s. The relative freedoms of the period permitted other writers to emerge. Among the nondogmatic communists, the best essayist was Aleksandr Voronskii (1884–1943), who published his critical articles on Soviet literature in the thick journal he edited, Krasnaia Nov’ (1921–27; Red virgin soil). Voronskii was something of a sore point for the dogmatists, since he was adamant that Soviet literature had to offer more than merely a message: it should also be aesthetically and formally “beautiful.”

In the 1920s and 1930s the Acmeist poets Anna Akhmatova (1889–1966) and Osip Mandel’shtam (1891–1938) offered excellent examples of the genre. Mandel’shtam impressed readers with his essays on the idea of Acmeism—“François Villon” (1913)—and poetic language—“O prirode slova” (1922; “About the Nature of the Word”) and “Utro akmeizma” (1922; “Morning of Acmeism”). He also revealed in part the mysteries of poetic creation with “Razgovor o Dante” (1933; “Conversation About Dante”). Simultaneously, Akhmatova’s various essays on Pushkin, while scholarly and well-written, also reveal in cryptic ways her own creative process. The author Evgenii Zamiatin (1884–1937) also wrote essays in which he expressed his observations and thoughts on the problem of literature in a totalitarian state. In part he argued against censorship and ideological dogmatism in articles such as “Zavtra” (1920; Tomorrow) and “O segodniashem i sovremennom” (1924; On today and the contemporary).

In post-revolutionary Russia literary scholars such as Viktor Shklovskii offered personal reflections, sociological observations, and insights about literature in short prose works which were collected in Gamburgskii schet (1928; Hamburg account). His student Lidiia Ginzburg (1902–90) also penned synthetic essays in which she joined personal reminiscences and thoughts on literature; these have been published recently in Chelovek za pis’mennym stolom (1989; A person at the writing table).

The exile from Russia in the 1920s of so many leading intellectuals brought about a split between Soviet and émigré literature. Despite the difficulties of life in emigration, intellectual life was surprisingly multifarious and vivacious. In the 1920s collections of essays appeared in which émigré movements such as Eurasianism and Smena Vekh (Changing of the signposts) publicized their ideological credo. In addition, émigré journals such as Vozrozhdenie (Resurrection), Put’ (The way), and Dni (Days) were established, and the best writers, poets, and philosophers wrote for them. Among the finest essayists of the period were Vladimir Nabokov (1899–1977), Vladislav Khodasevich (1886–1939), Georgii Adamovich (1884–1972), Georges Florovsky (1893– 1979), Mark Aldanov (1886–1957), and Prince Dmitrii Sviatopolk-Mirskii (1890–1939). During World War II the most important emigre journals were Novyi Zhurnal (New journal) and Novoe Russkoe Slovo (New Russian word).

During the post-Stalinist “Thaw” (1954–62) in Soviet Russia, essay writing was heralded by Il’ia Ehrenburg (1891–1967), who published a book of literary-critical articles and essays, Frantsuzskie tetradi (1958; French notebooks). During this period, Andrei Siniavskii (1925–97), writing in Russia under the pseudonym Abram Tertz, published his critical essay “Chto takoe sotsialisticheskii realizm” (1959; On Socialist Realism), which, although published abroad, was a brilliant critique of the Soviet policy of engendering literature “by dictate.” In many senses, the Thaw period was a time for revelations of the horrors of the past, a period of literary education rather than a rebirth for Russian letters.

In the “Third Wave” of emigration from Russia (1970–80s), the essay form was dominated by émigré novelists who contributed to the journals appearing in the West and in Israel: Aleksandr Zinov’ev (1922–), Vasili Akseonov (1932–), Vladimir Voinovich (1932–), and Iuzh Alezhkovskii (1929–). The exception to this rule was the poet Joseph Brodsky (1940–96), who published two excellent collections of essays in English, Less than One (1986) and most recently On Grief and Reason (1995). Brodsky’s command of English and insights into the essay form display a mastery rarely encountered.

The 1980s ushered in the era of glasnost, political reform from above and new “openness” in the arts. The essay form found practitioners in new or newfangled reformist journals, Argumenty i Faktii (Arguments and facts), Ogonek (Little flame), and Znamia (The banner), among others. Among the popular essayists during the period, Lev Anninskii (1934–), Natal’ia Ivanova, Dmitrii Likhachev (1906–)—the doyen of Russian scholarship—and Viktor Erofeev were perfect barometers for the mood of the liberal intelligentsia.

In the new postcommunist world the spectrum of intellectual life has broadened considerably, and the essay form is finding ever greater use among religious thinkers, academic philosophers, literary critics, muck-raking journalists, economists, and culture-watchers of all types. While it is difficult to make predictions about the pathways of literary life, signs from the past indicate that the critical, philosophical, and political essays are alive and kicking in all directions in present-day Russia.

BRIAN HOROWITZ

Further Reading

Brown, William Edward, A History of 18th Century Russian Literature, Ann Arbor, Michigan: Ardis, 1980

Segel, Harold B., The Literature of 18th-Century Russia, New York: Dutton, 2 vols., 1967

Todd, William Mills III, The Familiar Letter as a Literary Genre in the Age of Pushkin, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1976

This page intentionally left blank.

S

Sabato, Ernesto

Argentine, 1911–

Ernesto Sabato is one of the most important thinkers and essayists of Latin America. His works deal mainly with life's contradictions, where the dichotomy between flesh and spirit is presented as the central source of man's existential problem. Sabato's academic background is in mathematics and physics. In 1938 he was working at the Curie Laboratory in Paris when the first experiments with nuclear energy were conducted. This experience precipitated a personal crisis, which made him eventually abandon science and devote his life to literature. Foreseeing the horrible and destructive future of nuclear energy, Sabato became one of the main critics of science and scientific knowledge, defending the power of intuitive knowledge as humanity's main source of understanding. His three novels and several books of essays are primarily a development of this idea. As an essayist Sabato has developed his own style of short, highly ironic and concise commentaries, dealing with one problem at a time, but organized in a collection through which a common problem or theme runs.

His first collection of essays was Uno y el universo (1945; One and the universe), a series of short essays on different topics ranging from the "astronomic lens" to "truth and beauty." This book is composed of 75 sections that as a whole investigate different aspects of the relationship between humankind and the world. In this book Sabato presents his position vis-à-vis science and the course of technological advances, which, as he sees it, are taking us down the road to automatization and destruction. Uno y el universo was his first contribution to the literary world, and like most of his subsequent publications was polemical and controversial.

Hombres y engranajes (1951; Men and gears) was his second book of essays, written three years after the publication of El túnel (1948; The Tunnel), the novel that made him a famous writer in Latin America. The four parts of the book analyze the development of the human spirit since the Renaissance, outlining the changes that took place in man's view of the world, and how these changes have affected our perception and our hopes. In the second part, "El universo abstracto" (The abstract universe), Sabato discusses the role of abstract reasoning in the current crisis, and how reason has become the new god, the omnipotent force able to control and explain all human reactions. In the end, reason fails us as a way of understanding our role in life, and humans rebel in response. Rebellion is the topic of the third part of the book, where Sabato writes about the Romantic revolution, Marxism, and existentialism, the three most important “revolts of human intellectual history,” as he calls them. The fourth and final section deals with the role of the arts and letters in the crisis. Literature is for Sabato the only road to the secrets of life, the only sincere and direct access to our most intimate fears and deepest secrets. Art and literature are therefore the only way we can face ourselves and surpass the crisis of the modern world.

Two years later Sabato published Heterodoxia (1953; Heterodoxy), a collection of philosophical comments on gender and sexuality, the writer and the artist, the human condition and the irrational mind. The polemical nature of the book aroused many favorable opinions but also evoked critical reactions, including a reply by Victoria Ocampo that led to the end of their friendship and of Sabato’s collaboration with Sur (South), the most important literary journal of Argentina.

El escritor y sus fantasmas (1963; The writer and his phantoms) is perhaps his most important book of essays. In this volume Sabato presents his concept of art as “the only means to reintegrate man’s divided self” and the novel as “the comprehensive genre able to articulate reason and intuition.” The book attempts to answer the question of why, how, and for what purpose fictions are written, and serves as a spiritual guide for aspiring authors. Literature is for Sabato an exploration of the unconscious. While the essay is a rational contemplation of the world, it is the novel, with all its ambiguities and contradictions, which is the genre that can best express human essence and true nature. Only behind the masks of fiction can writers say what they really think about the things that truly matter to them.

Among Sabato’s other publications should be mentioned Tres aproximaciones a la literatura de nuestro tiempo (1968; Three approaches to the literature of our times). The three essays included in this book address three different concepts of literature, as exemplified by Alain Robbe-Grillet, Jorge Luis Borges, and Jean-Paul Sartre. From the pure objectivism of the nouveau roman, to the intellectual games of Borges, to the politically engage literature of Sartre, Sabato dissects each of these positions with his characteristic irony and wit, outlining their values as well as their pitfalls. At times Sabato’s constant criticism might seem unreasonable, but a careful reading of his works shows that he is always looking for the existential experience behind the abstraction, always interested in how art and science, knowledge and intuition, affect human lives. That is the center of his analysis, the main idea he has been working with for 50 years throughout his novels and essays.

NICASIO URBINA

Biography

Author has chosen not to use an accent on his surname. Born 24 June 1911 in Rojas, Argentina. Studied at the Colegio Nacional, 1924–28; National University of La Plata, 1929–37, Ph.D. in physics, 1937; Joliot-Curie Laboratory, Paris, 1938; Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Cambridge, 1939. Married Matilde Kuminsky-Richter, 1934: two sons. Professor of theoretical physics, National University of La Plata, 1940–45: dismissed because of conflict with the government. Executive post with UNESCO, 1947 (resigned after two months). Editor, Mundo Argentino (Argentine world), from 1955. Director of cultural relations, Ministry of Foreign Relations and Culture, 1958–59 (resigned). Chair, National Commission on the Disappearance of Persons, 1984. Awards: several, including Buenos Aires Municipal Prize, for essay collection, 1945; Argentine Writers' Society Sash of Honor, 1945, and Grand Prize, 1974; Institute of Foreign Relations Prize (West Germany), 1973; Consagración Nacional Prize, 1974; Prix du Meilleur Livre Étranger (France), 1977; Gran Cruz al Mérito Civil (Spain), 1979; Gabriela Mistral Prize, 1984; Cervantes Prize, 1985; Jerusalem Prize, 1989. Chevalier, Order of the Arts and Letters (France), 1964; Chevalier, 1979, and Commander, 1987, Legion of Honor (France).

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Uno y el universo, 1945

Hombres y engranajes: Reflexiones sobre el dinero, la razón y el derrumbe de nuestro tiempo, 1951

Heterodoxia, 1953

El otro rostro del peronismo: Carta abierta a Mario Atnadeo, 1956

El caso Sábato: Torturas y libertad de prensa—Carta abierta al Gral. Aramburu, 1956

Tango: Discusión y clave, 1963

El escritor y sus fantasmas, 1963

Tres aproximaciones a la literatura de nuestro tiempo: Robbe-Grillet, Borges, Sartre, 1968

Itinerio, 1969

La convulsión política y social de nuestro tiempo, 1969

Obras: Ensayos, 1970

Claves políticos, 1971

La cultura en la encrucijada nacional, 1973

Apologías y rechazos, 1979

La robotización del hombre y otras páginas de ficción y reflexión, 1981

Nunca más: Informe de la Comisión Nacional sobre la Desaparición de Persona, 1985

The Writer in the Catastrophe of Our Time, translated by Asa Zatz, 1990

Other writings: three novels (El túnel [The Tunnel], 1948; Sobre héroes y tumbas [On Heroes and Tombs], 1961; Abaddón, el exterminador [The Angel of Darkness], 1974).

Bibliographies

Urbina, Nicasio, "Bibliografía crítica completa de Ernesto Sabato, con un índice temático," Revista de Crítica Literaria Latinoamericana 14, no. 27 (1988):117–222; also in Pre-Texto 19:1–84

Urbina, Nicasio, "Bibliografía crítica comentada sobre Ernesto Sabato con un índice temático," Hispania 73 (1990):953–77

Further Reading

- Benedetti, Mario, "Ernesto Sabato como critico practicante," in his Letras del continente mestizo, Montevideo: Arca, 1967:47–50
- Brushwood, J.C., "Ernesto Sabato: Hombres y engranajes," Books Abroad 26, no. 3 (1952):281–82
- Catania, Carlos, Sabato: Entre la idea y la sangre, San José: Editorial Costa Rica, 1973
- Correa, Maria Angelica, Genio y figura de Ernesto Sabato, Buenos Aires: University of Buenos Aires, 1971
- Dellepiane, Ángela B., "Dialogo con Ernesto Sabato," El Escarabajo Deoro 5 (1962):4–6, 20
- Dellepiane, Ángela B., "Sabato y el ensayo hispanoamericano," Asomante 22, no. 1 (1966): 47–59
- Dellepiane, Ángela B., Ernesto Sabato: El hombre y su obra, New York: Las Américas, 1968
- Fernandez Suarez, Alvaro, "Ernesto Sabato: Heterodoxia," Sur 204 (1951):129–32
- Fernandez Suarez, Alvaro, "Ernesto Sabato: Hombres y engranajes" Sur 204 (1951):71–74
- Giacoman, Helmy F., editor, Los personajes de Sabato, Buenos Aires: Emece, 1972
- Giacoman, Helmy F., editor, Homenaje a Ernesto Sabato, New York: Las Américas, 1973
- Oberhelman, Harley Dean, Ernesto Sdbato, New York: Twayne, 1970: especially Chapter 2, "Sabato the Essayist"
- Ocampo, Victoria, "Carta a Ernesto Sabato," Sur 211–12 (1952): 166–69
- Ocampo, Victoria, "Correspondencia sobre 'La metafísica del sexo'," Sur 213–14 (1952):161–64
- Petrea, Mariana D., Ernesto Sabato: La nada y la metafísica de la esperanza, Madrid: Porrúa Turanzas, 1986
- Urbina, Nicasio, "La lectura en la obra de Er nesto Sabato," Revista Iberoamericana 53, no. 141 (1987):823–36
- Urbina, Nicasio, La significacion del genero: Estudio semiotico de las novelas y ensayos de Ernesto Sabato, Miami: Universal, 1992
- Vázquez Bigi, A.M., editor, Epica dadora de eternidad: Sabato en la crítica americana y europea, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana/Planeta, 1985

Sacks, Oliver

British, 1933–

Oliver Sacks is a physician gifted in seeing the concrete, individual plights of patients and exploring his insights in medical essays that lead the reader to perceive the marvelous in the mundane, the beautiful in the twisted and suffering, the meaning in the individual rather than a disease possessing an individual. He is best known for his 1985 collection of essays entitled The Man Who Mistook His Wife for a Hat, and Other

Clinical Tales and for his 1973 book Awakenings, based on his work with post-encephalitic patients; this volume led to a British documentary and subsequently became the basis for an American film starring Robin Williams and Robert De Niro.

Sacks' first book, Migraine (1970), foreshadows his sensitivity to patients. A scholarly study accessible to the educated public, the book explores case histories that reveal Sacks' concern for the individual. He sees migraine as an event that is not just physical, but "emotional and symbolic" as well. He also carefully traces records of the illness and describes cases from history, such as the visions of the medieval mystic Hildegard of Bingen, whose drawings he reproduces to complement the text.

In Awakenings, Sacks' "clinical tale" comes of age as he characterizes Parkinsonism and describes the pandemic of "sleeping-sickness" of 1916–17 that left thousands of patients in a Parkinsonian state of suspended animation often lasting many years. Sacks' work in the late 1960s, administering the drug L-dopa to patients whose consciousness had often remained suspended since their youth, led to stunning "awakenings." Some remained trapped in an earlier time, unable to realize that 40 years had passed. The patients' responses varied, with some able to adapt and find new lives, while others regretted being brought into a strange new world, and some tragically relapsed. What sets Sacks apart as an essayist is his sensitivity to the human plight of these individuals, quoting the patients' observations and sympathetically describing them.

Sacks' central essay in Awakenings, "Perspectives," exemplifies his wide reading not only in medical texts but in literature and philosophy, all of which he weaves into his commentary on the L-dopa experiment. Contending that we can fight our own maladies by inner strength, Sacks turns to everyday language, to what he calls "metaphysical" terms we use for things that are not measurable. In explaining the resources this language provides, Sacks eloquently explores the effects of metaphors on modern medicine and its patients; he notes the destructive effects of the mechanistic world view—traceable to Newton, Locke, and Descartes—that has reduced human beings to mechanisms and systems that can be measured with a misled notion of objectivity. In place of the reductionist approach of modern medicine, Sacks extols a language that includes both the individual patient and a larger view of nature, both the particular and the general. Fragmenting human beings in order to explain, measure, and cure is, for Sacks, a form of blindness in modern medicine.

Sacks' widely read The Man Who Mistook His Wife for a Hat describes unique patients with unexpected neurological deficits, such as that of the title character, a music professor for whom faces had become puzzles and the world a muddle of abstractions. While he retained his musical abilities, his perceptual abilities waned so that once, searching for his hat, he placed his hand on his wife's head as if to pick it up. In his preface, Sacks laments the decline of the clinical tale since the 17th century, comparing such tales to classical fables, for both have heroes, battles, martyrs, and archetypes. He suggests that we need to look for new symbols and myths, such as are richly represented in narratives of the sick. Here he describes himself as both "a naturalist and a physician," "a theorist and dramatist" who is intrigued not only by science by also by the "romantic." Sympathetic observation and dramatization characterize Sacks' approach to the essay, just as his wide readings in literature and in neurology characterize his style.

A Leg to Stand On (1984) is Sacks' account of his own experience as a patient. He describes his encounters with aloof members of the medical community who refuse to accept his damaged proprioceptive sense after a fall. For Sacks, a broken leg simply ceased to be there; his existential horror is juxtaposed to his physicians' impatience with something that cannot be "measured." Sacks details his own turn toward a new philosophical and medical position, requiring an archetypal journey/narrative, a reading of an old volume on neurosurgery on a train ride, and an avowed determination to embrace "the ideal of a humane medicine," a "heretical" science.

In Seeing Voices (1989) Sacks explores the world of the deaf, which he treats as a "culture" to avoid terms of "dysfunction" or "disease." Approaching this marginalized culture, Sacks reveals not only the neurological potential among deaf people, but the equally exciting latent potential for all human beings. As he explores the visual potential of American Sign Language, Sacks investigates the possibilities for the hearing culture to expand both left-brain and right-brain capabilities through Sign. In Sign's linguistic use of space Sacks finds a challenging extra dimension.

Finally, in An Anthropologist on Mars (1995), Sacks pursues not only clinical tales, but personal follow-ups that give insight into the individuals he describes, all of whom have experienced some inexplicable neurological condition: Tourette's syndrome—in which the individual compulsively touches him/herself, others, or objects, and often swears unexpectedly, but can function calmly while singing, flying a plane, or performing surgery—and autism—in which the individual may be isolated from other human beings but may have a remarkable talent, as for instance a young man who can draw in minute detail buildings he saw days or even years ago.

In all his texts, Sacks' focus is on how the anomaly affects the individual. His interest is more than clinical: it extends to the patient's potential and relationship with the larger world, and what we can learn about ourselves from those whose neurological experiences are outside the norm. In these penetrating explorations of alternative worlds, Sacks demonstrates a concern for empathy, the role of language, and the role of the individual in the greater whole.

MARY ELLEN PITTS

Biography

Oliver Wolf Sacks. Born 9 July 1933 in London. Studied at St. Paul's School, London; Queen's College, Oxford, B.A., 1954; Middlesex Hospital, London, M.A., B.M., B.Ch., 1958. Intern in medicine, surgery, and neurology, Middlesex Hospital, 1958–60; moved to the United States, 1960; rotating intern, Mt. Zion Hospital, San Francisco, 1961–62; resident in neurology, University of California, Los Angeles, 1965–65. Fellow in neuropathology and neurochemistry, 1965–66, instructor in neurology, 1966–75, assistant professor, 1975–78, associate professor, 1978–85, and clinical professor of neurology, from 1985, Albert Einstein College of Medicine, Bronx, New York; consultant neurologist, Bronx State Hospital, from 1966, and at the Little Sisters of the Poor, New York. Fellow, American Academy of Neurology. Awards: Hawthornden Prize, for Awakenings, 1974; Felix Mart-Albanez Award, 1987; American Psychiatric Association Oskar Pfister Award, 1988; Guggenheim Fellowship, 1989; Harold D.Vursell Memorial Award, 1989; Odd Fellows Award, 1990; University of Southern California Scriptor Award, 1991; honorary degrees from four universities.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Awakenings, 1973; revised editions, 1976, 1982, 1991

The Man Who Mistook His Wife for a Hat, and Other Clinical Tales, 1985

An Anthropologist on Mars: Seven Paradoxical Tales, 1995

Other writings: a book on migraines (1970), A Leg to Stand On (1984), a memoir about being a patient, and Seeing Voices: A Journey into the World of the Deaf (1989).

Further Reading

Comprone, Joseph, "Reading Oliver Sacks in a Writing-Across-the-Curriculum Course," Journal of Advanced Composition 8, nos. 1–2 (1988):158–66

Hawkins, Anne Hunsaker, "Oliver Sacks' Awakenings: Reshaping Clinical Discourse," Configurations 1, no. 2 (1993):229–45

Hawkins, Anne Hunsaker, "The Myth of Cure and the Process of Accommodation: Reconsidering Awakenings," Medical Humanities Review (Spring 1994):9–21

Kusnetz, Ella, "The Soul of Oliver Sacks," Massachusetts Review 33, no. 2 (1992):175–98

McRae, Murdo William, "Oliver Sacks' Neurology of Identity," in The Literature of Science: Perspectives on Popular Scientific Writing, edited by Murdo William McRae, Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1993:97–110

Pitts, Mary Ellen, "Reflective Scientists and the Critique of Mechanistic Metaphor," in The Literature of Science: Perspectives on Popular Scientific Writing, edited by Murdo William McRae, Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1993:249–90

Pitts, Mary Ellen, "Toward a Dialectic of the Open End: The Scientist as Writer and the Revolution Against Measurement," Centennial Review 38, no. 1 (1994):179–204

Sainte-Beuve, Charles-Augustin

French, 1804–1869

Sainte-Beuve's earliest essays appeared from 1824 to 1835 in several Parisian periodicals: the newspapers Le Globe and Le National, and the reviews Revue de Paris (Paris review) and Revue des Deux Mondes (Review of two worlds). They were published in book form posthumously in 1874–75 and given the title Premiers lundis by his editor to associate them with what in the meantime had become his most famous essay collections, the Causeries du lundi (1851–62; Monday Chats) and Nouveaux lundis (1863–70; New Mondays). As a former medical student, trying to earn his living as a journalist-critic, Sainte-Beuve found that his true ambition was to become a great poet and perhaps a great novelist as well. It was clear from these first pieces, which he called “my gropings and beginnings,” that he sought to use the books given him to review, which covered a great variety of subject matter, as the pretext for his own thought and—even more unusual—for his own artistic expression. His aim was to bring his subjects to life, as vividly as possible, to “paint” or “depict” them (the verb peindre recurs frequently), emulating not other critics so much as the novelists he admired, such as Sir Walter Scott and James Fenimore Cooper. Something highly original was stirring here: no critic had ever spoken of his ambition “to depict mankind in all its variety of passions and circumstances,” like Shakespeare, Molière, or Scott, allowing himself, like them, “to be transformed into an infinite number of characters” (“Mort de Walter Scott” [1832; Death of Walter Scott]).

Between 1829 and 1846 Sainte-Beuve pursued two parallel, overlapping, and interdependent vocations: that of the critic and that of the poet/novelist. During these remarkably productive years he published his first and most famous verse volume (in reality a mixture of prose and verse), Vie, poésies et pensées de Joseph Delorme (1829; Life, poetry, and thoughts of Joseph Delorme), followed by three more books of verse; his only completed novel, Volupté (1834); and three series of critical essays, Portraits littéraires (1844; Literary portraits), Portraits de femmes (1844; Portraits of Celebrated Women), and Portraits contemporains (1846; Contemporary portraits), in the Revue de Paris and the Revue des Deux Mondes. That he eventually abandoned poetry and fiction in favor of criticism was due less to his lack of success in these genres (he in fact enjoyed a modest success) than to his greater success as a critic and to his awareness (he was his own best critic) that he would never achieve the greatness he aspired to as poet and novelist. However, he made up for this loss by applying his imaginative gifts to his critical essays, in which erudition became imbued with poetic feeling, as several of his more astute contemporaries, including Victor Hugo, recognized.

The Portraits embrace a rich variety of primarily literary topics: authors both major and minor, professional writers as well as marginal ones who left nothing more than memoirs or letters. Literary criticism is broadened to include the study of human behavior traditionally associated in France with “le moraliste” (the student of mores, of mœurs). Literary opinions, Sainte-Beuve wrote to a friend, mattered much less to him than reflections on “life itself, its purpose, the mystery of our own heart, the nature of happiness and holiness.” In the Portraits of Celebrated Women he states: “Literary criticism is never anything more for the mind of moralist bent than a point of departure, an opportunity.”

His method in these essays is primarily biographical and combines both the objective, impartial, sometimes clinical approach that he called “physiology” (assimilated perhaps from his medical studies) with poetic expression (“hidden poetry” is his term) of a somewhat elegiac nature. The fictionist’s art is also sometimes put to use, as when he calls the essay on Madame de Charrière one of his “little short stories with a single character.” In the second of his essays on Diderot (Portraits littéraires) he describes the process of re-creating his character-models and how it should ideally culminate in the magic moment when “analysis disappears into the act of creation, the portrait speaks and lives, one has found the man” (almost as often it is “the woman”). In overall form there is little resemblance in these pieces, or in other essays of the author, to the artful disorder or studied randomness of Montaigne, Marivaux, or the English essayists, for these qualities were alien to his basically neoclassical taste and sense of order. Nor did the intimate first-person style of the “personal” or “familiar” essay appeal to him. For his self-revelations one must turn to his poetry or to Volupté, or to his superb intimate journals, the Cahiers (wr. 1834–47, pub. 1973), selections of which have appeared under the titles Pensées et maximes (1955) and Mes Poisons (1926), admired and emulated by Cyril Connolly in his The Unquiet Grave (1945). In the Portraits, as in his other essays, self-revelations are very subtly and indirectly presented. The style tends to be involved syntactically, is sometimes labored or clumsy, and is heavily laden with metaphors and other images; but at its best it is highly readable; the use of spatial images (topographical, landscape) in the analysis of his subjects is an original, striking feature.

Had Sainte-Beuve published only the Portraits his stature as an essayist of the first rank would be secure. However, in 1849, at age 45, he renewed himself in extraordinary fashion by launching a series of articles appearing each Monday in various journals and reviews, first in Le Constitutionnel (The constitutional) and then in Le Moniteur (The monitor), Le Temps (The times), and the Revue des Deux Mondes. They were interrupted only by his death in 1869. These Causeries du lundi and Nouveaux lundis (their titles in book form) consist of no less than 28 volumes containing roughly 600 separate titles and almost 400 different topics. Based for the most part on publications the critic was given to review, the majority concern French literature and history, especially contemporary works and those of the two preceding centuries. Others deal with Greco-Roman antiquity and English, German, Italian, and Spanish authors. Writers great and small are found beside royalty, aristocrats, magistrates, diplomats, statesmen, soldiers, women of polite society (femmes du salon), saints, and scientists, to name but a few, providing only that these “non-professional” writers left something worth reading. Women continue to figure prominently. The thematic range is also extraordinarily wide: purely literary or aesthetic questions form merely part of a vast inquiry into the nature of the writer (Thibaudet [1936] calls this Sainte-Beuve’s “Comédie littéraire”) and into the broader human drama of the “Comédie humaine.” Not unlike his arch-enemy and rival, Balzac, he carried whole societies in his head.

Several new elements not characteristic of the Portraits are introduced into the Lundis. The style, as promised in the title Causeries, is more “oral,” more “conversational,” less laden with imagery, sharper and wittier than in the Portraits (in his preface the essayist describes it as “more concise and more unencumbered”). This “spoken” manner Jean Bonnerot (in Bibliographie de l'œuvre de Sainte-Beuve, vol. 3) attributes to the fact that the critic dictated many of these pieces to his secretary or “talked them out” before giving them a final form. Another new feature is the more authoritative tone, as the essayist, citing the examples of Nicolas Boileau, Samuel Johnson, and Jean-François de La Harpe, asserts his right to be a judge and an arbiter of taste, especially in regard to contemporary works. Finally, the critique-peintre and critique-moraliste are now enriched by the addition of the critique-naturaliste, a “naturalist of minds” whose aim is to found “the natural history of literature,” the classification of writers according to species, the “science of minds.” The assimilation of literary criticism to a science, however, takes place within distinct limits determined by the ultimately elusive and mysterious nature of creative genius. Criticism itself continues to be viewed by Sainte-Beuve as a form of creation (see “Diderot,” Causeries, vol. 3) in which the critic, paradoxically, “disappears” into his subjects, taking on their nature (“metamorphosis” is the term Sainte-Beuve uses), while at the same time sketching his own “profile” (his “apotheosis”).

Sainte-Beuve’s greatness as an essayist lies in his raising the periodical article, in the form of the critical essay, to a new level of creative power rivaling (as his admirer Matthew Arnold understood) all but the greatest of poets or novelists. The “Tenth Muse,” Thibaudet calls it. Among readers whom he influenced are such other essayists as Ernest Renan, Henry James, George Saintsbury, and Edmund Wilson. Sainte-Beuve had few models on which to draw: chiefly Plutarch’s Lives, Johnson’s Lives of the Poets (1779–81; known most probably by reputation), Fontenelle’s biographical sketches or éloges, and Diderot’s art criticism. He devoted several fine essays to Montaigne, whom he acknowledged as one of his “masters,” but eschewed Montaigne’s type of self-portraiture and his capricious form. His collected essays, as remarkable for their sustained level of quality and readability as for their quantity, represent one of the most extraordinary feats in the history of journalism. Although they may be dipped into anywhere and read independently of one another, their author recommended that they best be read in the order of their appearance, so as to grasp the evolution of his thought and his revisions of opinion.

RICHARD M.CHADBOURNE

Biography

Born 23 December 1804 in Boulogne-sur-Mer. Studied at the Institut Landry and the College Charlemagne, Paris, 1818–21; Collège Bourbon (now the Lycée Condorcet), Paris, 1821–23, baccalauréat in letters, 1823; studied medicine in Paris, from 1823, baccalauréat in science, 1824. Contributor to many journals, from 1824, including Le Globe, Revue de Paris, and Revue des Deux Mondes. Close friends with Victor Hugo, 1827–34, and had an intermittent affair with Hugo’s wife Adèle, 1832–36. Lectured in Lausanne, 1837–38, Liège, 1848, Collège de France, Paris, 1854–55, and the École Normale Supérieure, Paris, 1857–61. Appointed conservateur, Bibliothèque Mazarine, Paris, 1840–48. Elected to the French Academy, 1844. Columnist of “Les Lundis,” appearing in various periodicals, 1849–69. Made member of the Senate, 1865. Health deteriorated after an operation to ease an obstruction of the bladder, 1869. Died in Paris, 13 October 1869.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Critiques et portraits littéraires, 1832; enlarged edition, 5 vols., 1836–39

Portraits de femmes, 1844; as Portraits of Celebrated Women, translated by Harriet

W.Preston, 1868; in Essays on Men and Women, edited by William Sharp, translated by William Matthews and Harriet W.Preston, 1890

- Portraits littéraires*, 2 vols., 1844; edited by Gerald Antoine, 1993
- Portraits contemporains*, 2 vols., 1846; enlarged editions, 3 vols., 1855, and 5 vols., 1869–71
- Causeries du lundi*, 15 vols., 1851–62; revised edition, 15 vols., 1857–62; enlarged edition, 16 vols., 1882–85; as Causeries du lundi, translated by E.J.Trechmann, 8 vols., 1909–11; selection as English Portraits, translated anonymously, 1875; selection as Monday Chats, edited and translated by William Matthews, 1877; selections edited by George Saintsbury, 1885
- Derniers portraits littéraires*, 1852
- Nouveaux lundis*, 13 vols., 1863–70
- Essays* (selection), translated by Elizabeth Lee, 1869(?)
- Premiers lundis*, 3 vols., 1874–75
- Chroniques parisiennes (1843–1845)*, 1876
- Select Essays*, translated by A.J.Butler, 1890
- Essays on Men and Women*, edited by William Sharp, translated by William Matthews and Harriet W.Preston, 1890
- Portraits of Men*, translated by Forsyth Edeveain, 1891
- Portraits of the Eighteenth [Seventeenth] Century, Historic and Literary*, translated by Katharine Wormeley and George Burnham Ives, 4 vols., 1904–05
- Œuvres*, edited by Maxime Leroy, 2 vols., 1951–56
- Selected Essays*, edited and translated by Francis Steegmuller and Norbert Guterman, 1963
- Literary Criticism*, edited and translated by Emerson R.Marks, 1971
- Other writings: poetry, the novel Volupté (1834), a five-volume history of Port-Royal (1840–59), correspondence, and journals.

Bibliographies

- Bonnerot, Jean, Bibliographie de l'oeuvre de Sainte-Beuve, Paris: Giraud-Badin, 4 vols., 1937–52.
- Bonnerot, Jean, Un demi-siècle d'études sur Sainte-Beuve, 1904–1954, Paris: Les Belles Lettres, 1957
- Phillips, E.M., "The Present State of Sainte-Beuve Studies," French Studies 5 (1951):101–25
- Regard, Maurice, "Esquisse d'un état présent des études sur Sainte-Beuve," Information Littéraire 11 (1959):139–48

Further Reading

- Arnold, Matthew, "Sainte-Beuve," in his Complete Prose Works, vol. 5, edited by R.H.Super, Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1965 (article originally published 1869)
- Babbitt, Irving, "Sainte-Beuve," in his The Masters of Modern French Criticism, New York: Farrar Straus, 1963
- Billy, André, Sainte-Beuve, sa vie et son temps, Paris: Flammarion, 2 vols., 1952
- Bradford, Gamaliel, A Naturalist of Souls: Studies in Psychography, New York: Dodd

Mead, 1917

Chadbourne, Richard, "Symbolic Landscapes in Sainte-Beuve's Early Criticism," PMLA 80 (1965):217–30

Chadbourne, Richard, "La Comédie humaine de Sainte-Beuve," Édes Françaises 9 (1973):15–26

Chadbourne, Richard, "Criticism as Creation in Sainte-Beuve," L'Esprit Créateur 14 (1974):44–54

Chadbourne, Richard, Charles-Augustin Sainte-Beuve, Boston: Twayne, 1977

Chadbourne, Richard, "Sainte-Beuve and Samuel Johnson," Transactions of the Samuel Johnson Society of the Northwest 9 (1980):1–14

James, Henry, "Sainte-Beuve's Portraits," "Sainte-Beuve's First Articles," and "Sainte-Beuve's English Portraits," in his Literary Reviews and Essays, edited by Albert Mordell, New York: Grove Press, 1957 (articles originally published 1868, 1875, 1875)

Lehmann, A.G., Sainte-Beuve: A Portrait of the Critic, 1804–1842, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1962

MacClintock, Lander, Sainte-Beuve's Critical Theory and Practice After 1849, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1920

Molho, Raphaël, L'Ordre et les ténèbres, ou La Naissance d'un mythe du XVIIe siècle chez Sainte-Beuve, Paris: Colin, 1972

Mott, Lewis, Sainte-Beuve, New York: Appleton, 1925

Regard, Maurice, Sainte-Beuve, l'homme et l'œuvre, Paris: Hatier, 1960

Richard, Jean-Pierre, "Sainte-Beuve et l'objet littéraire," in his Études sur le romantisme, Paris: Seuil, 1970

Thibaudet, Albert, "Sainte-Beuve," in his Histoire de la littérature française de 1789 à nos jours, Paris: Stock, 1936

Saint-Évremond

French, 1614–1703

Saint-Évremond displayed in both his life and his essays the studied negligence of an unpedantic scholar. He was an Epicurean and a skeptic, and serves as a transitional figure between the libertine circles of free thought in the 17th century, and the philosophical writers of the Enlightenment, who saw in him one of their precursors.

In his privileged youth as a Norman noble, he entered into contact with Gassendi, the famous libertine thinker, who was one of his preceptors and who influenced his thought profoundly. Throughout his life Saint-Évremond cultivated the company of the great minds of his age, including Heinsius, Spinoza, and Vossius, especially during his long exile in London. During this time he maintained a lively correspondence with major thinkers and writers throughout Europe, which provided him an international forum and cosmopolitan outlook on the issues of his time.

Saint-Évremond's consciously cultivated, negligent style is apparent in both the form his writings took, that of letters and essays, and the fact that he did not publish any of his nontheatrical works, although friends and associates oversaw the printing of several editions of various pieces during his lifetime. He was not systematic in his thought or his approach to various subjects, but was guided by the occasion of the writing of a letter or observation, and by the course of his own reflections. In many ways he represents a 17th-century Montaigne, who served as a primary source of influence and whose essays Saint-Évremond enjoyed and often read. He can be considered a moralist, in that he often meditated in his texts on aspects of human conduct and analyzed emotional states. He created prose portraits, sometimes of real figures, sometimes imaginary, which often illustrate a point of morality, although he remained a detached observer rather than an ardent preacher.

His highly developed wit and refinement characterize him as a fine example of polite French society in the second half of the 17th century. His “Conversation du maréchal d’Hocquincourt avec le Père Canaye” (wr. 1654, pub. 1687; Conversation between the Maréchal d’Hocquincourt and Father Canaye) continues many of the themes and critical attacks found in Pascal’s Lettres provinciales (1657; The Provincial Letters). Saint-Évremond revealed his mistrust of religious dogma and intolerant rigidity in theological issues. He saw in the dispute between Jesuits and Jansenists a power struggle more than a religious conflict, and found fault with both sides. Although highly skeptical in matters of religion, especially in terms of doctrine and institution, Saint-Évremond did display a genuine admiration for Christianity and discreet morality in certain aspects of his life and works.

Rather than lamenting the uncertainty and misery of humankind’s condition, Saint-Évremond chose a life of diversion, according to the dictates of an aristocratic honnêteté and the principles of good taste. He cultivated the social virtues of good deeds, charity, and friendship, placing importance on individual acts of this world, rather than an ascetic rejection of society. Although acknowledging that it is nearly impossible to know oneself, Saint-Evremond held consistently throughout his writings that humankind is neither entirely good nor entirely evil, and that in order to account for human behavior and morality the coexistence of the noble and the base must be seen as a fundamental aspect of humanity. This view, which stresses the confusion of qualities and constant change in human behavior, is more characteristic of a baroque perspective on reality, and of the historians from classical antiquity, rather than the French classical view of a more static unity having distinct components which was promoted during the second half of the 17th century.

If Saint-Évremond’s preference for the earthly pleasures of fine food, good art, and sensual pleasure appears egotistical, it is nonetheless a sincere and overt choice. It has none of the deception and hypocrisy of the contemporaries he observed, who, like Moliere’s Tartuffe, feigned public indifference to worldly pleasures only to hide privately indulged passions. He saw realistically, perhaps even somewhat cynically, that reputation and virtue are often quite separate, and that few people are truly devout or honorable, despite their claims. Instead, he accepts people for what they are: imperfect, powerless, fickle. A tacit optimism informs much of Saint-Évremond’s writing, which insists that life is worth living, and that people basically have merit.

Many of his works contain insights into contemporary matters of literary criticism. In the early 1660s he wrote an essay critical of Alexandre le Grand (1665; Alexander the Great), one of Racine’s first tragedies. Saint-Évremond believed that Racine incorporated too many modern elements into his depiction of characters and situations taken from antiquity, whereas Corneille, whom he preferred, retained more of a sense of the nations and historical periods represented in his tragedies.

Moral and literary criteria for excellence were closely connected, as is evident in his judgments of contemporary authors. While literature is a major diversion and source of pleasure, it requires a great degree of accuracy in its depiction of human traits and actions. The ideal subject is the civilized person, whose tastes and rationality are explored in a psychological, especially theatrical, approach. He did not care much for poetry. He rejected the novelistic, fantastic aspects of certain texts. Referred to as the Petronius, the Arbiter of Taste, of his time, Saint-Évremond also rejected many of the constraints imposed upon contemporary authors, although he did agree that Christian subjects should not appear on the stage. Whereas in general he admired Corneille's work, he found that Polyeucte (1642) would have made a beautiful sermon, but was instead a miserable tragedy. His opinions on good taste were shaped by his immense reading from antiquity, as well as by the French précieux and writers of the first half of the century and also by English critics, especially Hobbes.

Saint-Évremond was widely read in ancient history, especially Roman, and held firm views on the proper writing and use of history both on the stage and in cultured society. In his "Réflexions sur les divers génies du peuple romain dans les différents temps de la République" (1662.; Reflections on diverse characteristics of the Romans during various phases of the Republic) he attempted to discover what really transpired in antiquity, reacting against prevailing credulity and simplistic views. Many of his insights are penetrating, and his portraits of various historical figures still stir the imagination. His call for accuracy in historical writing was unusual for its time, and did not gain wide acceptance or practice until at least a century later. His erudition in matters of Roman history also influenced his political philosophy, which was mainly republican.

Despite his ardent passion for Roman history, he took the position of a Modern in the quarrel of the Ancients and the Moderns. His great admiration for antiquity did not change the fact that he saw in his own times more discontinuity than similarity with the past. He could not understand why contemporary French authors would strive so hard to imitate authors from antiquity, setting them as the standard, when so much had changed, and generally for the better, in the interval.

His views on women are ambiguous, and depend on the context of their expression. These gentle creatures were worthy of serving his own personal pleasure, but regarded in his essays as full of faults. Responsible for much court intrigue, they are vain and weak, and easily persuaded to error. But such comments reveal a general criticism of all human conduct. Women are scarcely inferior to men, who suffer from the same defects. In fact, he is astonished that women are excluded from so many human affairs, since many of them are "wiser and more capable than men" ("Observations sur Salluste et sur Tacite" [1668; Observations on Sallust and Tacitus]). In taking the position that those who wish to bar women from public life are blinded by self-interest and error, Saint-fivremond was certainly stating a minority opinion for his time.

Saint-Évremond wrote for his own pleasure, and considered pleasure an essential element of human existence. He developed the notion of good taste in many of his essays, which discussed the interplay of several contributing factors: delicacy, good sense, and naturalness. His writing is marked by a witty intelligence and conversational informality, rather than a systematic approach to issues or an exposition of profound ideas. It is uniquely personal in its observations, while conveying a representative picture of Saint-Évremond's libertine and honnête milieu.

By the urbane tone and unpretentious style of his texts, which contain witty observations and intelligent comments on issues of human conduct, Saint-Évremond, living in exile in London, originated the form of the essay which was to be practiced in 18th-century England. In his essays he was rarely paradoxical in his own views, in spite of the many seemingly contradictory aspects of life he discussed, and never superficial. His apparent nonchalance was a pose, creating an ironic distance between himself and the material of his essays. He discounted the importance of these little texts, which he alluded to frequently as "bagatelles," but their influence was widespread at the time, and for a century later.

ALLEN G. WOOD

Biography

Charles de Marguetel de Saint-Denis, Seigneur de Saint-Évremond. Born 5 January 1614. Studied at the Jesuit Collège de Clermont, Paris, from 1623; University of Caen, 1628; Collège d'Harcourt, Paris, 1628–29. Career in the army: ensign, 1630, lieutenant, 1637, and in the Duc d'Enghien's Guards, 1642, wounded in the knee at Nordlingen, 1645, and made marechal de camp, 1652. Imprisoned in the Bastille for offending Mazarin, 1653; exiled for satirizing government policy, 1661: lived in Nantes, 1661, London, 1662–65; Holland, 1665–70, and London, 1670–1703; governor of Saint James's Park, 1698. Died in London, 20 September 1703.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Œuvres mêlées, 1668; revised editions, 2 vols., 1689, 5 vols., 1690–94, 5 vols., 1705, 3 vols., 1709, 5 vols., 1726, and 5 vols., 1739; edited by Charles Giraud, 3 vols., 1865

Miscellaneous Essays, translated by John Dryden and others, 2 vols., 1692–94

The Works, translated anonymously, 2 vols., 1700

Critique littéraire, edited by Maurice Wilmotte, 1921

Œuvres en prose, edited by René Ternois, 4 vols., 1962–69

Lettres, edited by René Ternois, 2 vols., 1967–68

Textes choisis, edited by Alain Niderst, 1970

Other writings: plays (unperformed), poetry, and correspondence.

Collected works editions: Œuvres, 10 vols., 1740; edited by René de Planhol, 3 vols., 1927.

Further Reading

- Baker, S.R., "The Rhetoric of Self Presentation in Saint-Évremond," French Literature Series 19 (1992):19–27
- Barnwell, Henry T., Les Idées morales et critiques de Saint-Évremond, Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1957
- Bouysse, Patrice, "Essai sur la jeunesse d'un moraliste: Saint-Évremond (1614–1661)," Papers on French Seventeenth-Century Literature 14 (1987):1–346
- Hope, Quentin M., Saint-Évremond, the "Honnête Homme" as a Critic, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1962
- Lanniel, J.M., "Un scepticisme nuance de regret, Saint-Évremond et la dévotion," Dix-Septième Siècle 93 (1971):13–25
- Rosmarin, Leonard A., Saint-Évremond, artiste de l'euphorie, Birmingham, Alabama: Summa, 1987
- Schmidt, Albert-Marie, Saint-Évremond, ou L'Humanisme impur, Paris: Cavalier, 1932
- Taittinger, Claude, Saint-Évremond, ou Le Bon Usage des plaisirs, Paris: Perrin, 1990
- Viala, A., "Saint-Évremond ou les regards de l'exilé," in Horizons européens de la littérature française au XVIIe siècle, edited by Wolfgang Leiner, Tübingen: Narr, 1988:345–52.
- Wolfe, P., "Sincérité et insincérité dans la 'Conversation de M.le maréchal d'Hocquincourt'," Papers on French Seventeenth-Century Literature 10, no. 18 (1983):213–20

Saltykov-Shchedrin

Russian, 1826–1889

Mikhail Evgrafovich Saltykov (pen name "Shchedrin") was a prominent figure in the literary world of Russia from the 1850s to the 1880s. In his widely read satirical writings he maintained a consistent criticism of the political establishment and society of his time. His work was published mainly in the journals Sovremennik (The contemporary) and Otechestvennye Zapiski (Fatherland notes)—of the latter he was an editor from 1868 to 1884. All that he wrote related to some aspect of contemporary social or political life and was of a radical tendency, in keeping with the tone of the journals to which he contributed. He had an unusually broad experience of Russian conditions, gained partly from his many years' service as a provincial official, and he was an authoritative commentator on officialdom, the state of society of all classes in town and country, and the political attitudes of the government and of the conservative, liberal, and radical intelligentsia. Critical of most things, he promoted no particular ideology or faction: in his works he was simply concerned, he said, with depicting "those features which make Russian life not altogether comfortable."

Saltykov wrote principally in two modes: the discursive essay and the illustrative narrative sketch; both modes were often employed in the same piece. He made use of various other forms—the diary (Dnevnik provintsiala v Peterburge [1872.; Diary of a provincial in Petersburg]), letters (Pis'ma o provintsii [1868–70; Letters on the provinces]; Pis'ma k teten'ke [1881–82; Letters to Auntie]), the mock historical chronicle (Istoriia odnogo goroda [1869–70; The History of a Town]), and fables in prose (Skazki [1869–86; Fables]), as well as parodic documents and dramatic interludes. In some works he adopts the persona of a character who is the object of his satire, and writes in the first person (Ubezhishche Monrepo [1878–79; The haven of Mon Repos]; Sovremennaia idilliia [1877–83; A contemporary idyll]). His discursive essays are written in the heavyweight manner favored in 19th-century Russian journalism and generally require close reading to follow the laboriously developed argument. In contrast, the narrative sketches, which were his forte, are pointed and lively; here, in particular, his robust humor and pungent irony come to the fore. Saltykov had the gift of encapsulating in a single character or brief narrative episode some fundamental aspect of the conduct or psychology of a social group; this ability is exemplified in his fables, each of a few pages, which together provide a convenient summary of the principal themes which he treats in the score or so of his sketch-cycles.

Saltykov's numerous journal contributions can only loosely be termed "essays." Few of them give a complete, one-off treatment of a topic. His general practice was to develop a subject in a succession of pieces published over a period of months (the journals for which he wrote appeared monthly) or, in some cases, considerably longer. Each item would make a point, explore a facet of a theme; between one piece and the next there might, or might not, be a sequential link. When the cycle was completed, it was published separately under the title designated at the outset. Some cycles are of variegated content and individual items can be read separately, but in others it is necessary for full comprehension to read each part in the context of the whole.

Saltykov used a wide range of styles and had an impressive command of the different registers of the Russian language. In his discursive articles the style is dense and often ponderous, with long periods, complex syntax, and weighty formal vocabulary; he employs the various rhetorical devices commonly found in publicistic writing (e.g. questions to introduce declarative statements, inversions, anaphora). This manner is not infrequently lightened by an overt or underlying irony, and the tone is occasionally broken by some unexpected linguistic incongruity. The narrative sketches are distinguished by the lively variety of the characters' speech modes—Saltykov could reproduce precisely the speech of bureaucrats, gentry, merchants, peasants, lawyers, journalists, priests, men-about-town; he was also an accomplished parodist, as he demonstrates with his imitations of ancient chronicles, official documents, academic dissertations, and the discourses of conservative and liberal publicists. Fantasy and the grotesque play a part in some of his brightest works. As well as the Russian of his day, he makes use of Church Slavonic in biblical phrases, French (particularly as a social marker in his sketches), and school Latin tags.

A feature of Saltykov's writing was his employment of aesopic language. This was necessitated by the stringent censorship that operated in his time. For an "oppositionist" writer, as Saltykov was, it required much ingenuity to convey his views in such a way as to avoid infringing the censorship regulations. This aesopic language involved the use of circumlocution, oblique reference, and a variety of allusive denominators: e.g. serdtseved (“sunder of hearts”) for a police officer assessing political reliability, or vnezapnosti (“suddennesses”) for acts of administrative repression. Such terms of reference became conventional in Saltykov’s writings and were readily understood by the initiated reader. The relatively subversive content of much that Saltykov wrote, presented in this encoded form, created a kind of conspiratorial bond between the author and his readers which he valued highly. Unfortunately, the tactical obfuscation practiced by him creates for the modern reader a formidable barrier, additional to that presented by most readers’ unfamiliarity with the historical context in which he wrote. English translations of Saltykov’s works, except for his novel Gospoda Golovlevy (1875–80; The Golovlevs), are understandably few.

I.P.FOOTE

Biography

Mikhail Evgrafovich Saltykov. Born 27 January 1826 in Spas-Ugol, Tver province. Studied at the Moscow Pension for the Nobility; the Tsarskoe Selo lycee (the Aleksandr Lycée, from 1844), St. Petersburg, graduated 1844. Civil servant, War Ministry, from 1844. Exiled to Viatka for “subversive” writing, 1848–55, though he continued to be employed as a government official. Married Elizaveta Apollonovna Boltina, 1856: one daughter and one son. Worked for the Ministry of the Interior, St. Petersburg, 1856–58; vice-governor, Riazan, 1858–60, and Tver, 1860–62. Left government service to pursue journalism full-time, 1862, publishing mainly in Sovremennik, 1862–64. Rejoined government service, 1864, working at Penza, 1865–66, Tula, 1866–67, and Riazan, 1867–68. Coeditor, Otechestvennye Zapiski, 1868–84; also contributor to various other journals. Died in St. Petersburg, 10 May 1889.

Selected Writings

Cycles of Sketches and Related Prose (published in cycles mainly in Sovremennik and Otechestvennye zapiski)

Gubernskie ocherki, 1856–57; part as Tchinovnicks, translated by Frederic Aston, 1861

Satiry v proze (Satires in prose), 1859–62

Priznaki vremeni (Signs of the times), 1863–71

Pompadury i pompadurshi (Pompadours and pompadouresses), 1863–74; as The Pompadours: A Satire on the Art of Government, translated by David Magarshack, 1985

Pis'ma o provintsii, 1868–70

Gospoda Tashkenttsy (Gentlemen of Tashkent), 1869–72.

Blagonamerennye rechi (Well-intentioned speeches), 1872–76

V srede umerennosti i akkuratnosti (In the world of moderation and precision), 1874–77

Ubezhishe Monrepo, 1878–79

Za rubezhom (In foreign parts), 1880–81

Pis'ma k teten'ke, 1881–82

Pestrye pis'ma (Variegated letters), 1884–86

Selected Satirical Writings (in Russian), edited by I.P.Foote, 1977

Other writings: the novels Gospoda Golovlevy (1875–80; The Golovlevs), and Sovremennaia idilliia (1877–83), the novel/diary Dnevnik provintsiala v Peterburge (1872), the mock historical chronicle Istoriia odnogo goroda (1869–70; The History of a Town), Skazki (1869–86; Fables), and the fictionalized autobiography Poshekhonskaya starina (1887–89; Old times in Poshekhonie).

Collected works edition: Sobranie sochinenii, edited by S.A. Makashin and others, 20 vols., 1965–77.

Bibliographies

Baskakov, B.N., Bibliografiia literatura o M.E.SaltykoveShchedrine, 1918–1965, Moscow and Leningrad: Nauka, 1966

Baskakov, B.N., in Saltykov-Shchedrin, 1826–1876: Stat'i, materialy, bibliografiia, Leningrad: Nauka, 1976:391–428

Dobrovol'skii, L.M., Bibliografiia literatury o M.E. SaltykoveShchedrine, 1848–1917, Moscow: Izd-vo Akademii Nauk SSR, 1961

Foote, I.P., "M.E.Saltykov-Shchedrin in English: A Bibliography," Oxford Slavonic Papers 22 (1989):89–114

Further Reading

Blankoff, Jean, La Societe russe de la seconde moitie du XIXe siecle: Trois témoignages littéraires: M.E.Saltykov-Šchedrin, Gleb Uspenskij, A.F.Pisemskij, Brussels: Éditions de l'Université de Bruxelles, 1972

Draitser, E.A., Techniques of Satire: The Case of SaltykovShchedrin, Berlin and New York: de Gruyter, 1994

Foote, I.P., "Quintessential Saltykov: Ubezishche Monrepo," Oxford Slavonic Papers 12 (1979):84–103

Sanine, Kyra, Saltykov-Chtchedrine: Sa vie et ses oeuvres, Paris: Université de Paris Institut d'Études Slaves, 1955

Strelsky, N., Saltykov and the Russian Squire, New York: AMS Press, 1966 (original edition, 1940)

Sanders, Scott Russell

American, 1945–

Scott Russell Sanders began his career as a literary critic (publishing a book on D.H.Lawrence in 1973) and as a writer of fiction, including science fiction, but since the early 1980s when his essays began appearing regularly in the North American Review and especially since the publication of his second book of essays, The Paradise of Bombs, which won the Associated Writing Programs Award for Creative Nonfiction when it appeared in 1987, he has focused his attention on the personal essay. Between 1987 and 1995 he published three more collections of essays, and his first, In Limestone Country (1985), was reissued.

In addition to his many personal essays, Sanders has also written widely on the form of the essay. In his prefaces and essays on writing—e.g. “The Singular First Person” (1988), “Speaking a Word for Nature” (1991), “The Writer in the University” (1995), and “Writing from the Center” (1995)—he has turned his skills as a literary critic on himself and his form, gaining, as a result, a reputation as one of America’s foremost theoreticians of the essay.

Sanders continues to publish essays in the North American Review and other literary quarterlies—e.g. the Georgia Review, Gettysburg Review, Kenyon Review, Michigan Quarterly Review, and Sewanee Review. He has also published in large circulation magazines such as Harper’s and appeared twice (1987, 1993) in The Best American Essays yearly anthology. He also takes seriously his responsibility, as a teacher and writer, to the academic and writing communities, and has published position pieces in the organs of the Association of Departments of English and the Associated Writing Programs.

If Sanders can be said to have a central topic, it is place. His titles and subtitles regularly testify to this preoccupation. In Limestone Country collects 13 pieces on life around the southern Indiana quarries that have produced the stone for many of America’s most famous buildings, including the Pentagon and the Empire State Building. Staying Put: Making a Home in a Restless World (1993) and Writing from the Center (1995) focus on the geography—spiritual, emotional, and artistic—of the American Midwest. Even the expansively titled Secrets of the Universe (1991) returns to the center with its subtitle—Scenes from the Journey Home. “Every work of literature,” he has written, “is the drawing of a charmed circle, since we can write about only a piece of the world” (“Speaking a Word for Nature”).

Sanders’ concerns with place, landscape, and home have led logically to a passionate commitment to nature writing. Several of his essays have appeared in magazines associated with the environmental movement (Orion, Parabola, and the Sierra Club Wilderness Calendar). He has also edited the writings of ornithologist and painter John James Audubon (1986) and written about his life (1984). His nature writing is scientifically informed—he began his university education studying physics, though he later switched to literature—but always accessible to the general reader. He has characterized his project as an attempt to explore the connections between writing and landscape, and the writer and his or her locale. His work can be seen as part of the re-emergence of nature writing in America, and he has expressed his admiration in many ways for the work of contemporaries such as Wendell Berry, Barry Lopez, Robert Finch, Terry Tempest Williams, Leslie Marmon Silko, Gretel Ehrlich, Richard Nelson, and John Haines.

Besides environmentalism, Sanders’ political concerns include the struggles for justice, women’s rights, and peace. He usually writes on these larger issues by connecting them to a personal experience such as serving jury duty (“Doing Time in the Thirteenth Chair,” 1987), growing up on an Ohio arsenal (“At Play in the Paradise of Bombs,” 1987), discussing feminism with a female friend (“The Men We Carry in Our Minds,” 1987), or traveling to the Soviet Union (“Living Souls,” 1991).

Though he has written movingly about many public issues, his work has achieved perhaps its most powerful effects when he has confronted dark themes that are at once more private and universal—death, love, and the tangle of guilt and shame within families. His most anthologized essays deal with his father’s death (“The Inheritance of Tools,” 1986) and his father’s drinking (“Under the Influence,” 1989). In these essays, Sanders’ careful, polished style becomes infused with the details of memory and the energy of emotion, and they open up into the full and dramatic honesty he believes to be the province of the essay. His intention as an essayist is to “pay my respects to a minor passage of history in an out-of-the-way place” and “speak directly out of my life into the lives of others” (“The Singular First Person”).

In search of such directness, Sanders writes in a familiar, accessible style. Yet, as befits someone who began as and remains a fiction writer, his essays are full of scene, narration, and dialogue. He wears humor lightly, reveals himself with self-deprecation, and often achieves immediacy by means of the present tense and precise imagery: “Ticktock. The judge assures us that we should be finished in five days, just in time for Christmas. The real jurors exchange forlorn glances. Here I sit, number thirteen, nobody looks my way. Knowing I am stuck here for the duration, I perk up, blink my eyes. Like the bear going over the mountain, I might as well see what I can see” (“Doing Time in the Thirteenth Chair”).

Sanders, who has taught literature at Indiana University since 1971, also displays in his essays the wide reading of an English professor. An awareness of audience, however, helps him vary the ways in which he employs his allusions. In pieces addressed to fellow academics and writers, he may mention Theodor W. Adorno, Jacques Derrida, and Paul de Man (for instance in “The Writer in the University”), and two of his four collections of essays have included endnotes; but when writing for a wider audience, as he usually does, Sanders explains his allusions, keeps them biblical, or confines himself to the unpacking of clichés—“Solid as a rock, we say. Build your foundations upon stone, we say. But of course the rocks are not fixed” (“Digging Limestone,” 1985).

Sanders has described his texts as expeditions, the sniffings of a hunting dog, and an amateur’s raids into the realms of experts, but, finally, somewhat less figuratively, as “essays, by which I mean they are experiments in making sense of things, and...personal, by which I mean the voice speaking is the nearest I can come to my own voice” (introduction to The Paradise of Bombs).

NED STUCKEY-FRENCH

Biography

Born 26 October 1945 in Memphis, Tennessee. Studied at Brown University, Providence, Rhode Island, B.A. in English, 1967; Cambridge University, 1967–71, Ph.D., 1971. Married Ruth Ann McClure, 1967: one daughter and one son. Literary editor, Cambridge Review, 1969–71. Taught English at Indiana University, Bloomington, from 1971. Awards: several fellowships; Penrod Award, for In Limestone Country, 1986; Associated Writing Programs Award for Creative Nonfiction, for The Paradise of Bombs, 1987; American Library Association Award, for Bad Man Ballad, 1987; PEN Syndicated Fiction Award, 1988.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

In Limestone Country, 1985

The Paradise of Bombs, 1987

Secrets of the Universe: Scenes from the Journey Home, 1991

Staying Put: Making a Home in a Restless World, 1993

Writing from the Center, 1995

Other writings: three novels (Terrarium, 1985; Bad Man Ballad, 1986; The Engineer of Beasts, 1988), short stories, children's books, D.H. Lawrence: The World of the Major Novels (1973), and a fictional account of the life of John James Audubon (Wonders Hidden, 1984).

Further Reading

Stafford, Kim R., "In Short: The Paradise of Bombs," New York Times Book Review, 24 May 1987:13

Stuttaford, Genevieve, "Nonfiction: Secrets of the Universe: Scenes from the Journey Home by Scott Russell Sanders," Publishers Weekly 238, no. 44 (October 1991):74

Stuttaford, Genevieve, "Nonfiction: Writing from the Center by Scott Russell Sanders," Publishers Weekly 242, no. 34 (August 1995):54

Walzer, Kevin, "Staying Put: The Invisible Landscape of Scott Russell Sanders's Nonfiction," Journal of Kentucky Studies 11 (September 1994):117–25

Santayana, George

Spanish/American, 1863–1952

Idiosyncratic and paradoxical, George Santayana has been a largely neglected figure among modern philosophical essayists for several reasons: he had no homeland with colleagues and a following (though he taught for many years at Harvard); his essays on aesthetics (for which he is probably best remembered) are in some cases difficult and in many ways elusive, if not obscure; and, finally, his deliberate failure to create anything like a complete system of thought has perhaps kept a dedicated coterie or school of "Santayanans" from forming. Nonetheless, Santayana is a fascinating essayist with challenging insights, a beautiful (if at times florid) writing style, a disarming honesty (which is the source of certain contradictory facets of his thought), and on occasion an ability to penetrate to the very depth of wisdom.

Born in Madrid (his mother was Scottish, his father Spanish), Santayana came to the United States when he was nine. He spoke no English on arrival and continued to converse in Spanish at home even after he learned the new language, though he was to become a master stylist in it and all of his books would be written in English. He lived in the United States for 40 years and taught there until he was 50 years old, yet he never admitted being more than an alien in the United States and (at times) a friendly observer. Santayana once commented that his Americanism (discussed, among other places, in his volume of essays Character and Opinion in the United States, 1920) was two-sided—one involuntary and one voluntary. The first of these was due simply to the fact that he was sent to the U.S. and lived there not through free choice. The second, voluntary side, he said was due to his American friendships, which were more numerous, loyal, and sympathetic than any others of his life.

The spirit of Santayana's philosophy was summarized in his earliest book, The Sense of Beauty (1896), when he writes: "To have imagination and taste, to love the best, to be carried by the contemplation of nature to a vivid faith in the ideal, all this is more, a great deal more, than any science can hope to be. The poets and philosophers who express this aesthetic experience and stimulate the same function in us by their example, do a greater service to mankind and deserve higher honor than the discoverers of historical truth." This is clearly the purpose and meaning of all his later work.

He emphasized on numerous occasions that his primary concern was with values, both ethical and aesthetic, and believed that such areas were too complex and difficult for any one theory or system to explain. He insisted that there is no "snug" universe, not even a rational one in any simple sense. Rejecting all orthodoxies, Santayana regarded philosophy as an art of sorts whose practice is valued as life-enhancing and significant; and while he felt that no system of thought is to be trusted, all systems may be used if they produce a degree of understanding. Further, he argues in Interpretations of Poetry and Religion (1900) that the human mind has five senses providing data, a moderate power of understanding to interpret the sensory data, and "A passionate fancy to overlay that interpretation." This "passionate fancy" is the human imagination, which compensates for the limitations of understanding by opening up vistas and filling in outlines.

In the essay "A General Confession" (1940), Santayana also proclaims that critical reflection has freed him from "the horrid claim" of his ideas having literal truth. He comments: "Mind does not come to repeat the world but to celebrate it" and "All is a tale told, if not by an idiot, at least, by a dreamer; but it is far from signifying nothing." Thus, as Santayana explains in The Sense of Beauty, art arises in response to our need for entertainment through our senses and imagination. Here he emphasizes that the pleasure accompanying sensuous and/or imaginative activity is real and basic. Humans gain positive and immediate pleasure when experiencing certain objects, associating pleasure with these objects. Santayana believed this association is the ground for attributing beauty to the objects experienced instead of recognizing that the term "beauty" has its origin in the experiences themselves, in a person's senses and feelings. Beauty is most accurately described as "objectified pleasure"; Santayana explained that aesthetic pleasure takes us directly to the object at the same time as the bodily organ is stimulated. He thus writes, "Beauty is an emotional element, a pleasure of ours, which we nevertheless regard as a quality of things.”

The most significant aspect of Santayana’s philosophical essays is clearly his enthusiastic emphasis on the value of art, beauty, imagination, and human creativity. He once commented that the arts “are employments of our freedom after the work of life is done and the terror of it is allayed”—but clearly he did not see the enjoyment of art and the appreciation of beauty as an escape from life. On the contrary, they are essential elements in any life but the most spiritually and culturally impoverished. Without the development of aesthetic taste, our experiential lives will become nothing but, as he puts it, “drowsy reverie relieved by nervous thrills.”

JOHN H.HADDOX

Biography

Born Jorge Agustin Nicolas de Santayana, 16 December 1863 in Madrid. Moved to the United States, 1872. Studied at Boston Latin School, from 1874; Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1882–86, A.B., 1886, A.M. (Walker Fellow in Germany and England), 1888, Ph.D., 1889; King’s College, Cambridge, 1896–97. Taught at Harvard University, 1889–1912.; Hyde Lecturer, the Sorbonne, Paris, 1905–06. Moved to Europe, 1912, living in England, France, then primarily in Rome, 1925–52. Spencer Lecturer, Oxford University, 1923. Awards: Royal Society of Literature Benson Medal, 1928; Columbia University Butler Gold Medal, 1945; honorary degree from the University of Wisconsin. Member, American Academy. Died in Rome, 26 September 1952.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

- Interpretations of Poetry and Religion*, 1900
Three Philosophical Poets: Lucretius, Dante and Goethe, 1910
Winds of Doctrine: Studies in Contemporary Opinion, 1913
Egotism in German Philosophy, 1916; as The German Mind: A Philosophical Diagnosis, 1968
Character and Opinion in the United States, 1920
Little Essays, edited by Logan Pearsall Smith, 1920
Soliloquies in England and Later Soliloquies, 1922
Dialogues in Limbo, 1925; enlarged edition, 1948
The Genteel Tradition at Bay, 1931
Some Turns of Thought in Modern Philosophy: Five Essays, 1933
Obiter Scripta: Lectures, Essays, and Reviews, edited by Justus Buchler and Benjamin Schwartz, 1936
The Idea of Christ in the Gospels; or, God in Man: A Critical Essay, 1946
Dominations and Powers: Reflections on Liberty, Society, and Government, 1951
Essays in Literary Criticism, edited by Irving Singer, 1956
The Idler and His Works, and Other Essays, edited by Daniel Cory, 1957
The Genteel Tradition: Nine Essays, edited by Douglas L. Wilson, 1967
Animal Faith and Spiritual Life: Previously Unpublished and Uncollected Writings, edited by John Lachs, 1967

George Santayana's America: Essays on Literature and Culture, edited by James Ballowe, 1967

Selected Critical Writings, edited by Norman Henfrey, 2 vols., 1968

The Birth of Reason and Other Essays, edited by Daniel Cory, 1968

Santayana on America: Essays, Notes, and Letters on American Life, Literature, and Philosophy, edited by Richard C. Lyon, 1968

Physical Order and Moral Liberty: Previously Unpublished Essays, edited by John and Shirley Lachs, 1969

Other writings: the novel The Last Puritan (1935), poetry, many books on philosophy (including The Sense of Beauty, 1896; The Life of Reason, 5 vols., 1905–06; Reason and Art, 1922; Scepticism and Animal Faith, 1923; Realms of Being, 4 vols., 1927–40), correspondence, and three volumes of autobiography (1944–53).

Collected works editions: Works (Triton Edition), 15 vols., 1936–40; Works, edited by William G. Holzberger and Herman J. Saatkamp, Jr., 4 vols., 1986–94 (in progress).

Bibliography

Saatkamp, Herman J., Jr., and John Jones, George Santayana: A Bibliographical Checklist 1880–1980, Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green University Philosophy Documentation Center, 1982.

Further Reading

Arnett, Willard E., Santayana and the Sense of Beauty, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1955

Cory, Daniel, Santayana: The Later Years: A Portrait with Letters, New York: Braziller, 1963

McCormick, John, George Santayana: A Biography, New York: Knopf, 1987

Schilpp, Paul Arthur, editor, The Philosophy of George Santayana, La Salle, Illinois: Open Court, 1971 (original edition, 1940)

Sarmiento, Domingo Faustino

Argentina, 1811–1888

Domingo Faustino Sarmiento, one of 19th-century Latin America's most accomplished essayists, also had a distinguished career in education and government, culminating in his term as Argentina's President from 1868 to 1874. No other leader of that century accomplished more to benefit the masses through promotion of technology, social and economic reform, and universal public schooling.

Until the age of 28 this autodidact in languages and new ideas resided in Argentina's isolated Andean province of San Juan, which was nearly devoid of libraries, educational institutions, and newspapers. Exiled to Chile in 1840, he found instant success as a journalist with his forceful writing style and stellar intelligence. In the next 15 years he wrote several of his most acclaimed book-length essays, which are a written testimony of his impassioned personal life and his participation in the turbulent social and political events of his time. From 1854 until the end of his life he lived primarily in Buenos Aires, the country's capital, where he combined his chosen profession of journalist—or “public writer”—with a long succession of positions in government and public administration.

Writing for Sarmiento was largely a means of furthering a worthy social cause. He disdained poetry and fictional narrative, but found the essay to be a valuable tool for his ideological struggles. The 53 volumes of his Obras completas (Complete works) unite the short essays written for the daily or weekly press throughout his long career of public service: costumbrista (essays on customs or personality types), sketches, reviews of books and theater productions, all with reformist intention; his 1842 polemic in defense of Romanticism and against classicism; promotional pieces for public education, highways, innovative industrial practices, and trade; studies on the impact of governmental policies for immigration or the sale of public lands; and considerations on constitutional and political issues. Also included in the Obras completas are his longer essays, which circulated widely in book form, and are variously classified as literature, biography and autobiography, travel commentary, and sociological and political studies.

Since the greater part of Sarmiento's essays were first published in the press, it is not surprising that the style, tone, and focus of these writings were influenced by that medium. His was political writing at its best, conceived in the passion of polemic and intended to move the reader to action. Logic and system were often sacrificed in favor of effect. He wrote with the “performative” goal of altering reality rather than merely describing it. Writing for him was a type of action, and its impact on the reader was often as important as what it said. Critics have called attention to how Sarmiento's emotional or irrational “intent” overshadows a conscious or prescribed “intention,” how he dynamically incorporates his own person into the narration, and how his prose persuades through affective rather than logical conduits. For these and other reasons literary anthologies often place Sarmiento's name at the head of Latin America's Romantic literary tradition.

Yet Sarmiento's essayistic prose defies such easy classification. His defense of Romantic literature in the 1842. polemics in Chile was primarily a means of shaking up that country's complacent intellectual elite, whose members still ignored the fertile literary and ideological contributions emanating from Western Europe since the late 18th century. Romanticism, Sarmiento believed, already belonged to a preterite age. Nevertheless, he recognized the insurrectional value of that literature in the face of tradition, and was conscious of the need for writers of his own age to forge an original expression that would agitate on behalf of liberal institutions and material progress. In this respect he embraced the dictum accredited to Victor Hugo, that Romanticism was nothing less than liberalism in literature. So although certain characteristics of his essayistic writing were undeniably “Romantic,” it was a Romanticism at the service of progress. Early on he and his renowned cohorts of the Argentine Generation of 1837 labeled this orientation socialista—not to be confused with the collectivist and proletarian orientation that Engels and Marx later lent to the term—which they borrowed from the writings and thought of Claude-Henri de Rouvroy, the Count of Saint-Simon, who was a precursor of positivism.

This pre-positivist orientation found expression in Sarmiento's style. For example, one passage of his most acclaimed work, Facundo; o, Civilizacion y barbarie (1845; Life in the Argentine Republic in the Days of the Tyrants; or, Civilization and Barbarism) portrays the emotional authorprotagonist who is moved to tears upon observing the intense religious devotion of a cattle rancher living in the isolated countryside. Reason, however, finally prevails when the narrator, now sounding like a social scientist, ends the passage with an explanation of how the barbaric countryside causes a degeneration in the people's religious practices and in their social institutions in general. A similar procedure is observed with Sarmiento's description of a pampa storm: few writers have captured in more forceful words the destructive power of nature over humble humanity. But then there is an abrupt stylistic transition: "Romantic" prose is followed immediately by a physiological explanation, perhaps influenced by the theories of galvanism, whereby untamed nature activates the "electrical fluid" in man's brain, arouses his passions, and clouds his reason. Sarmiento then concludes the passage by underlining how the untamed physical setting is a major contributor to the stunted intellectual faculties of the rural inhabitant. Here again, the writer initially builds toward the reader's "Romantic" appreciation and then destroys it. Other examples could also be given of positivistic literary stratagems whereby rationality predominates over emotion and science over Romanticism. On the written page and in his public career Sarmiento always placed literature and the essay at the service of politics.

One could argue that, on account of this tolerance of textual contradiction and propensity for stylistic movement, Sarmiento exemplifies well the model of writing offered by the essayist who baptized the genre, Michel de Montaigne. For both, the process of writing was in itself a search for truth whereby different ideas would be registered, treated, digested, and discarded. Neither feared self-contradiction and ideological or stylistic inconsistency. But here the similarities end. Whereas Montaigne wrote for himself and a small coterie of readers, Sarmiento wrote primarily for the public forum. With justification his detractors have called attention to Sarmiento's ideological expediency whereby writing was his form of denying or overwhelming other interpretations and making his own ideas prevail.

Facundo was composed, in the author's own words, in a "rapture of lyricism" for publication by installments in Chile's weekly press before circulating throughout the Río de la Plata region (Argentina, Uruguay, Paraguay, and southern Brazil) in book form. The essay unites three highly contrasting sections. The first, inspired by sociological or ethnographic theory and heavily flavored by the biases and idiosyncratic beliefs of the author, attempts to account for the state of Argentine society after 20 years of devastating civil skirmishes. As such, four successive chapters of this first section focus on the region's landscape of endless pampas; the psychology of rural inhabitants that resulted from their residence in that primitive environment; the social institutions arising in that physical setting and in accordance with the particular values and orientations of its inhabitants; and the historical events of recent years that were the product of all the geographical, psychological, and social factors previously discussed. Within these chapters Sarmiento includes memorable costumbrista passages that romantically portray character types of the Argentine pampas: the pathfinder, the cattle hand, the bad gaucho, and the singer. The work's second section, which is Sarmiento's subjective incursion into biography and romantically rendered history, re-creates in negative terms the events surrounding the life and exploits of the Promethean caudillo, or charismatic rural leader, Juan Facundo Quiroga. The work's third section, excluded entirely from the English translation, analyzes the tyrannical practices of the Buenos Aires dictator, Juan Manuel de Rosas.

Over the years critics have disputed the work's generic classification on account of the wide range of materials treated. The term "essay" was not then in current usage. Sarmiento himself characterized the work as a form of "poem, political pamphlet, history." Informed readers have agreed about only two issues: the intense impact of Sarmiento's forceful prose, and the immense influence of this uneven and untidy essay over thought and politics, and subsequent conceptual writing, in Argentina and Latin America.

Three other essays merit consideration here. First, Viajes en Europa, África y América (1849–51; Travels through Europe, Africa, and America), which compiles the long letters that Sarmiento wrote during his extensive travels a few years earlier. The work features penetrating observations of customs and practices flavored by familiarity with a not insignificant number of written sources. Also important is De la educación popular (1849; About public education), only one of many studies he published to promote free and universal schooling for the masses of his continent. The work unites observations and studies of educational systems across northern Europe, and presents the author's own practical plan for implementing such practices in the South American republics. More important for literary readers is Recuerdos de provincia (1843; Memories of provincial life), demonstrating Sarmiento's considerable talents as historian and describer of customs. With autobiographical focus, the work venerates the personages and progressive institutions that prevailed in San Juan's patriarchal society at the time of his youth.

WILLIAM H. KATRA

Biography

Born 15 February 1811 in San Juan, Argentina. Studied at the Escuela de la Patria, San Juan, 1817–19; moved to the province of San Luis with his uncle, 1825, and tutored by him. Lieutenant with the Unitarist forces against General Facundo Quiroga's army, captured and held for four months, 1829–30, then escaped briefly to Chile; returned to San Juan, then fled again to Chile, 1831, where he taught in Los Andes, worked in a store, and in a silver mine in northern Chile. Had one daughter (possibly by María de Jesús del Canto), 1832. Contracted typhoid fever and allowed to return to San Juan, 1836. Founder, Colegio para Señoritas, San Juan, 1839; copublisher, El Zonda newspaper, 1839. Imprisoned for conspiracy and almost executed, but saved by intervention of governor and exiled to Chile again, 1840. Founder, El Progreso newspaper, Santiago, early 1840s. Traveled to Europe and the United States to inspect educational systems, 1845–47. Married Benita Martínez Pastoriza, 1848 (separated, 1862): one son (probably his). Lived mostly in Buenos Aires, from 1854. Appointed minister of Mitre, 1860; governor of the province of San Juan, 1861–64 and 1874. Leader in the repression of the Peñalosa rebellion, 1863–64. Argentine ambassador to the United States, 1865–68. President of the Argentine Republic, 1868–74. Appointed director of schools, Province of Buenos Aires, 1875, minister of Avellaneda, 1879, and general superintendent of Argentine schools, 1881. Unsuccessful candidate for President, 1879. Died in Asuncion, Paraguay, 11 September 1888.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Recuerdos de provincia, 1843; edited by Guillermo Ara, 1966

Civilización y barbarie: Vida de Juan Facundo Quiroga, 1845; as Facundo; o, Civilización y barbarie en las pampas argentinas, 1868; edited by Emma Susána Speratti Piñero, 1971, Jorge Luis Borges, 1974, Luis Ortega Galindo, 1975, Nora Dottori and Silvia Zanetti, 1977, and Robert Yahni, 1990; as Life in the Argentine Republic in the Days of the Tyrants; or, Civilization and Barbarism, translated by Mrs. Horace Mann, 1868

Viajes en Europa, África y América, 2 vols., 1849–51; edited by Delia S. Etcheverry, 1940, Alberto Palcos, 1955, and Javier Fernández, 1993; Part as Travels in the United States in 1847, translated by Mrs. Horace Mann, 1868, and Michael A. Rockland, 1970; part as Travels: A Selection, translated by Inés Muñoz, 1963

De la educación popular, 1849; as Educación comun, 1855; edited by Gregorio Weinberg, 1987

Discursos populares, 1927

Ideario, edited by Luis Alberto Sánchez, 1943, and Bernardo Mowsichoff, 1988

A Sarmiento Anthology, edited by Allison Williams Bunkley, translated by Stuart Edgar Grummon, 1948

Sarmiento: A través de sus mejores páginas, edited by Andrés Iduarte and James F. Shearer, 1949

Cartas y discursos políticos, edited by José P. Barreiro, 1963

Other writings: many political works, biographies of Abraham Lincoln and Benjamin Franklin, memoirs, and correspondence.

Collected works editions: Obras, edited by Augusto Belín Sarmiento, 53 vols., 1885–1903; Obras completas, 53 vols., 1948–56.

Bibliography

Becco, Horacio Jorge, "Bibliografía de Sarmiento," Humanidades 37, no. 2 (1961): 119–44

Further Reading

Anderson Imbert, Enrique, Genio y figura de Sarmiento, Buenos Aires: University of

- Buenos Aires, 1967
- Barrenechea, Ana María, "Notas al estilo de Sarmiento," Revista Iberoamericana 41–42 (1956):275–94
- Borello, Rodolfo, "Facundo: Heterogeneidad y persuasión," Cuadernos Hispanoamericanos 263–64 (1972):283–302
- Bunkley, Allison Williams, The Life of Sarmiento, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1952
- Carilla, Emilio, Lengua y estilo en Sarmiento, La Plata: National University of La Plata, 1964
- Crowley, Frances G., Domingo Faustino Sarmiento, New York: Twayne, 1972
- Gálvez, Manuel, Vida de Sarmiento: El hotnbre de autoridad, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1945
- Halperín Donghi, Tulio, Prologue to Campaña en el Ejército Grande Aliado de Sud América by Sarmiento, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1958: xx–xxvi
- Jitrik, Noé, Muerte y resurreccion de "Facundo", Buenos Aires: Centro Editor de América Latina, 1968
- Jones, Cyril Albert, Sarmiento: "Facundo", London: Grant and Cutler, 1974
- Katra, William H., "Discourse Production and Sarmiento's Essayistic Style," in Simposio el ensayo hispánico: Actas, edited by Isaac Jack Levy and Juan Loveluck, Columbia: University of South Carolina, 1984
- Katra, William H., Sarmiento: Public Writer (Between 1839 and 1852), Tempe: Arizona State University Institute of Latin American Studies, 1985
- Katra, William H., "Facundo as Historical Novel," in The Historical Novel in Latin America: A Symposium, edited by Daniel Balderston, Gaithersburg, Maryland: Hispamérica, 1986: 31–46
- Katra, William H., Sarmiento de frente y perfil, New York: Lang, 1993
- Katra, William H., "Sarmiento in the United States," in Sarmiento: Author of a Nation, edited by Tulio Halperín Donghi and others, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1994
- Katra, William H., The Argentine Generation of 1837: Echeverría, Alberdi, Sarmiento, Mitre, Rutherford, New Jersey: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1995
- Lugones, Leopoldo, Historia de Sarmiento, Buenos Aires: Babel, 1931 (original edition, 1910)
- Martínez Estrada, Ezequiel, Sarmiento, Buenos Aires: Argos, 1956
- Palcos, Alberto, Sarmiento: La vida, la obra, las ideas, el genio, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1962 (original edition, 1929)
- Patton, Elda Clayton, Sarmiento in the United States, Evansville, Indiana: University of Evansville Press, 1976
- Pomer, León, "Sarmiento, el caudillismo y la escritura histórica," Cuadernos Hispanoamericanos: Los complementarios 3 (1989): 7–37
- Rockland, Michael A., Introduction to Travels in the United States in 1847 by Sarmiento, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1970
- Rojas, Ricardo, El profeta de la pampa: Vida de Sarmiento, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1945
- Salomon, Noël, "À propos des éléments 'costumbristas' dans le Facundo de D.F. Sarmiento," Bulletin Hispanique 52 (1968): 342–412
- Verdevoeye, Paul, Domingo Faustino Sarmiento: Éducateur et publiciste (entre 1839 et 1852), Paris: Institut des Hautes études de l'Amérique Latine, 1963

Sartre, Jean-Paul

French, 1905–1980

Jean-Paul Sartre is largely responsible for our image of the postwar French intellectual—a man of letters who is not merely that, but an “écrivain engagé” or “committed writer,” putting his thoughts into action in the political vanguard. It was Sartre’s intellectual versatility and his frenetic energy as a writer and activist that allowed him to assume this leading role. His essays are only one dimension of a prodigious written output (Sartre is said to have averaged 20 pages a day throughout his life), including philosophical treatises, biographies, plays, novels, political journalism, and scripts for film, radio, and television, in addition to diaries and letters.

While Sartre wrote some of his most important work before and during World War II—including the novel La Nausée (1938; Nausea) and the treatise L’Être et le néant (1943; Being and Nothingness)—it was in the immediate postwar period that he leapt to fame. In 1945 he delivered his famous lecture “L’Existentialisme est un humanisme” (published 1946; “The Humanism of Existentialism”) and founded Les Temps Modernes (Modern times). The original editorial committee of this journal headed by Sartre included such prominent figures as Raymond Aron, Maurice Merleau-Ponty, Simone de Beauvoir, and the surrealist Michel Leiris. It immediately became a focal point for intellectual and political controversies, and while Sartre normally left its day-to-day editing to others, his association with the journal helped guarantee a lasting audience for his essays. These essays, which range in length from two-page editorial pieces to short books, originally appeared in Les Temps Modernes, in other journals and newspapers, and often as prefaces to books by other writers; many are collected in the ten volumes of Situations (1947–76). They can be divided broadly into essays in social and political commentary, literary and artistic criticism, biography, and philosophy.

The breadth of Sartre’s concerns and his literary inclinations are clearly in evidence in his philosophical texts. His first philosophically significant essay is “La Transcendance de l’égo” (1937; “The Transcendence of the Ego”). While this essay is written for an audience versed in the technical terminology of Edmund Husserl’s phenomenology, the literary and anecdoteloving side of Sartre makes refreshing appearances, as when he refers to Rimbaud or tells the story of a “young bride [who] was in terror, when her husband left her alone, of sitting at the window and summoning the passersby like a prostitute.” Sartre shows a talent here for memorable phrases, and he uses straightforward and effective philosophical terms, such as “the I and the me.”

Sartre’s talent for vivid explanation (which he does not always employ as much as one would wish) was no doubt enhanced by his experience as a teacher of philosophy in French schools. Sartre also knows how to capture the attention of his audience, as when he begins “La République du silence” (1944; “The Republic of Silence”) with the shocking line, “We were never more free than under the German Occupation.” (What Sartre means is that under the occupation “each gesture had the weight of a commitment.”)

“The Humanism of Existentialism” is Sartre’s best-known essay, although he could hardly have expected that it would gain such fame. The opening of the essay (“I should like on this occasion to defend existentialism against some charges which have been brought against it”) indicates that it was not intended as the primary manifesto of existentialism, but as a response to specific criticisms Sartre’s philosophy had recently received from enemies on the right and the left. However, the essay was composed just as the label “existentialism” was gaining its vogue, and it provides a convenient definition for the term: existentialism is the position in which for human beings, “existence precedes essence.” In other words, “first of all, man exists, turns up, appears on the scene, and, only afterwards, defines himself.” Phrases such as this succeed in condensing some major themes of the abstruse Being and Nothingness into clear, colloquial terms. This essay exercised a seemingly irresistible power, as it provoked heated responses from both critics and admirers, including Martin Heidegger’s important “Brief über den Humanismus” (1947; “Letter on Humanism”). The power of Sartre’s essay is due partly to its accessible language and vivid examples, partly to the confidence with which he enters into debate with his contemporaries, and partly to the overconfidence which leads him into some provocative yet unsubstantiated positions (in particular, his sketch of an existentialist ethics of freedom, which he himself came to see as premature).

“Présentation des Temps Modernes” (1945; “Introducing Les Temps Modernes”) is an important source for Sartre’s theory of the committed writer. (The theory is developed at greater length in “Qu’est-ce que la littérature?” [1947; “What Is Literature?”].) In “Introducing Les Temps Modernes,” Sartre analyzes literary production in terms of the writer’s involvement in a community, arguing that the myth of the disengaged author who bears no responsibility for his or her surroundings is a bourgeois illusion. Like it or not, “we have only this life to live, amid this war, and perhaps this revolution.” Thus, aesthetes such as Proust are denounced as “accomplice[s] of bourgeois propaganda.” Those who try to write for the ages rather than the moment, says Sartre in a direct and elegant line, “have allowed their lives to be stolen from them by immortality.” The ambition of Les Temps Modernes, as described here, is nothing less than to produce a new, emancipatory vision of human existence. To this end, the journal was to publish criticism, fiction, poetry, journalism, history, and even psychiatric studies.

The theory of “committed writing” views aesthetic and political analyses as complementary parts of a unified attempt to understand and influence one’s world; nevertheless, we can place Sartre’s postwar essays on a spectrum which ranges from the primarily aesthetic to the primarily political. The aesthetic end of the spectrum can be illustrated by “Le Séquestré de Venise” (1957; “The Venetian Pariah”), an essay which also displays Sartre’s biographical techniques and hints at his political views. Here Sartre writes on Tintoretto in a carefully crafted style that arouses the reader’s curiosity from the beginning of the essay: “Nothing. His life is an enigma: a few dates, a few facts, and then the cackling of ancient writers. But courage: Venice speaks to us” Pouring his imagination into the biographical details that have come down to us, Sartre produces a vivid series of sketches of the painter’s life and personality—often speculating well beyond the documented evidence (“Never during his entire life did he allow himself an indulgence, a dislike, a preference, or even the comfort of a dream”). At the same time,

Sartre investigates numerous aspects of Tintoretto's relation to his society, its material conditions and its authorities, driving home his point that human beings are situated—or to put it in existentialist terms, “the painter knows full well that he will not leave the world, that even if he could, he would bear with him everywhere the Nothingness that transpierces him.” This essay is notable for some of Sartre's most flamboyant and enigmatic descriptions of art: for example, “every artifice should be employed to replace the representation by a hollow participation of the spectator in the spectacle, so that horror and tenderness would thrust men against their images and, if possible, into their midst, so that desire, burning all the fires of perspective, would discover the ersatz of divine ubiquity—the immediate presence of flesh; the logic of the heart.”

At the political end of the spectrum one finds Sartre's most polemical pieces of writing. These plunge energetically into controversial questions of their day—the war in Algeria, the Vietnam War, the student movement of 1968—and analyze these events from a decidedly left-wing perspective, while usually avoiding any brand of Marxist orthodoxy (“Introducing Les Temps Modernes” had promised that the journal would not serve the interests of any particular party, and Sartre was never comfortable aligning himself with a dogma). Many of these political essays remain thought-provoking today, but they are susceptible to two apparently contradictory flaws: unnecessarily technical verbiage and overly simplistic analysis. A case in point is the late essay “Élections, piège à cons” (1973; “Elections: A Trap for Fools”). Here Sartre uses a substantial dose of jargon that stems from his Critique de la raison dialectique (1960; Critique of Dialectical Reason): for example, “One finds serialization in the practico-inert field.” (Fortunately, he promptly explains this particular bit of jargon with a straightforward example of a man who by driving a car “becomes no more than one driver among others.”) As the title of this essay indicates, it is an unabashedly propagandistic piece, in the sense that it exhorts its readers to choose a clear good over a clear evil. While Sartre cites many facts in the process of criticizing liberal democratic institutions, his positive vision of an alternative to electoral politics is strikingly vague—in fact, he himself describes the utopian concept of “legitimate power” as “embryonic, diffuse, unclear even to itself.” Sartre concludes with a call to “organize the vast antihierarchical movement which fights institutions everywhere.” A subtle mind such as Sartre's could not fail to note the ironic incongruity of a call to organize an anti-organizational force—but the propagandistic tenor of the essay seems to rule out any acknowledgment of this irony.

It was Sartre's goal to combine careful crafting of words with political activism: “Introducing Les Temps Modernes” cautions that “in ‘committed literature,’ commitment must in no way lead to a forgetting of literature” But it can be argued that there is a tension between Sartre the writer and Sartre the political activist, and that his growing emphasis on political effectiveness tended to come at the expense of careful editing of his prose. Not all of Sartre's essays will stand the test of time. However, they were not written for the future; they are the products of a writer consciously situated in a time and place.

RICHARD POLT

Biography

Jean-Paul Charles Aymard Sartre. Born 21 June 1905 in Paris. Studied at the Lycée Montaigne, 1913–15, and Lycee Henri IV, Paris, 1915–22, baccalauréat, 1922; Lycée Louis-le-Grand, Paris, 1922–24; ficole Normale Superieure, Paris, 1924–29, agrégation in philosophy, 1929; studied phenomenology at the Institut Français, Berlin, 1933–34. Began a lifelong relationship with Simone de Beauvoir, 1929. Military service, 1929–31. Taught at lycées in Le Havre, Laon, and Paris, 1931–44. Worked in the army meteorological section during World War II: captured, 1940, repatriated and returned to France, 1941. Founding editor, with Beauvoir, Les Temps Modernes, from 1945. Member, Rassemblement Démocratique Révolutionnaire (Democratic revolutionary assembly), 1948–49. Editor, La Cause du Peuple (The cause of the people), from 1970, Tout (Everything), 1970–74, Révolution, 1971–74, and Libération, 1973–74. Awards: New York Drama Critics Circle Award, 1947; Grand Novel Prize, 1950; Omegna Prize (Italy), 1961; Nobel Prize for Literature, 1964 (refused); honorary degree from the University of Jerusalem, 1976; Foreign Member, American Academy of Arts and Sciences. Died (of oedema of the lungs) in Paris, 15 April 1980.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Situations 1–10, 10 vols., 1947–76; selections published under various titles, translated by Bernard Frechtman, 1949, Annette Michelson, 1955, S.W.Allen, 1963, Benita Eisler, 1965, Martha H.Fletcher and John R.Kleinschmidt, 1968, Irene Clephane, 1969, John Mathews, 1974, and Paul Auster and Lydia Davis, 1977

Essays in Aesthetics, edited and translated by Wade Baskin, 1963

Essays in Existentialism, edited and translated by Wade Baskin, 1967

The Writings of Jean-Paul Sartre, vol. 2: Selected Prose, edited by Michel Contat and Michel Rybalka, translated by Richard C. McCleary, 1974

“What Is Literature?” and Other Essays, 1988

Other writings: four novels (La Nausée [Nausea], 1938; L'Âge de raison [The Age of Reason], 1945; Le Sursis [The Reprieve], 1945; La Mort dans l'âme [Iron in the Soul], 1949), a collection of stories (Le Mur [The Wall], 1939), ten plays (including Les Mouches [The Flies], 1943; Huis clos [No Exit], 1944; Les Séquestrés d'Altona [The Condemned of Altona], 1959), screenplays, biographies of Flaubert and Genet, and books on existentialism (including L'Être et le néant [Being and Nothingness], 1943) and literature.

Bibliographies

Contat, Michel, and Michel Rybalka, The Writings of Jean-Paul Sartre, vol. 1: A Bibliographical Life, Evanston, Illinois: Northwestern University Press, 1974

Gabel, Gernot U., Sartre, a Comprehensive Bibliography of International Theses and

- Dissertations, 1950–1985*, HiirthEfferen: Gemini, 1991
- Lapointe, François H., and Claire Lapointe, Jean-Paul Sartre and His Critics: An International Bibliography 1938–1980, Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green State University, revised edition, 1981
- Nordquist, Joan, Jean-Paul Sartre: A Bibliography, Santa Cruz, California: Reference and Research Services, 1993
- Rybalka, Michel, and Michel Contat, Sartre: Bibliography, 1980–1992, Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green State University, 1993
- Wilcocks, Robert, Jean-Paul Sartre: A Bibliography of International Criticism, Edmonton: University of Alberta Press, 1975

Further Reading

- Adereth, Maxwell, Commitment in Modern French Literature: A Brief Study of "Utterature engagée" in the Works of Péguy, Aragon, and Sartre, London: Gollancz, 1967; as Commitment in Modern French Literature: Politics and Society in Péguy, Aragon, and Sartre, New York: Schocken, 1968
- Bauer, George H., Sartre and the Artist, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1969
- Champigny, Robert, Stages on Sartre's Way, 1938–1952, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1959
- Halpern, Joseph, Critical Pictions: The Literary Criticism of JeanPaul Sartre, New Haven, Connecticut and London: Yale University Press, 1976
- Hayman, Ronald, Writing Against: A Biography of Sartre, London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1986; as Sartre: A Life, New York: Simon and Schuster, 1987: especially Chapter 15 on the immediate postwar period
- Jameson, Fredric, Sartre: The Origins of a Style, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1961
- La Capra, Dominick, A Preface to Sartre, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1978
- McCleary, Richard C., "Translator's Preface" to The Writings of Jean-Paul Sartre, vol. 2: Selected Prose, edited by Michel Contat and Michel Rybalka, Evanston, Illinois: Northwestern University Press, 1974
- Poster, Mark, Existential Marxistn in Postwar France: From Sartre to Althusser, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1975
- Suhl, Benjamin, Jean-Paul Sartre: The Philosopher as a Literary Critic, New York: Columbia University Press, 1970
- Thody, Philip, Jean-Paul Sartre: A Literary and Political Study, London: Hamilton, 1960
- Ungar, Steven, Introduction to "What Is Literature?" and Other Essays by Sartre, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1988

Satire

Satire is a literary response to life in the city: its basic cynicism and especially its political nature seem to require an urban culture to spawn and thrive. There are other less sophisticated kinds of verbal and literary vitriol; flyting and invective, what might best be described as creative name calling, occur almost universally, but satire proper derives from a parodic association between literature and the hypocrisy of civil behavior. While the term itself has its etymological roots in the Latin satura, meaning “a full or mixed dish” in the sense of a cacophonous variety, the Greeks had a rich satiric tradition, especially evident in the Athenian Old Comedy, which played scatologically with the pretentious behavior of particular contemporary citizens recognizable to the audience. Aristophanes’ lampoons on Socrates and Euripides are prominent examples. The great Roman poets Horace and Juvenal set the literary standards for European satire, their best work being much imitated models, even well into the 20th century. They also lend their names to the two essential types of satire: Horatian is the gentler kind, which exposes human folly to correct it and thus strengthens the social fabric; Juvenalian is harsh, even abusive, and sees little chance of social progress. Horace and Juvenal use language that is colloquial and immediate, and most importantly, like Aristophanes’, their subjects are actual and contemporary people and current issues. These remain the distinguishing elements of satire: it is colloquial, immediate, and recognizably real in style and subject.

In a peculiar way, satire’s generic qualities and social motives are very close to those of the essay. The satirist, like the essayist, is intensely aware of his or her subjectivity and attempts to engage the reader on a personal and even conversational level. In both genres, the dominant impression is one of immediacy, of a face-to-face exchange in which opinion and interpretation take precedence over fact and objectivity. The attitude is casual, however charged with message, and the whole has about it the feel of the marketplace or coffeehouse. The wit, worldliness, and sophistication of the satirist declare his urbanity; this is not the familiar mode of a pastoral country cousin. Both satirist and essayist assume a sophisticated literacy in their readers, relying on the reader’s abilities to recognize cultural allusions and to detect subtle variations in literary voice and tone.

Gilbert Highet identified three satiric modes in his Anatomy of Satire (1962): monologue, parody, and narrative. Each has a long literary pedigree and finds practitioners in, respectively: Jonathan Swift, whose A Modest Proposal (1729) is among the best examples of a satiric monologue; Robert Burns, who used parody with uncanny precision in “Holy Willie’s Prayer” (wr. 1785, pub. 1799); and Rabelais, whose Gargantua and Pantagruel (1532–34) influenced most subsequent satiric narratives, especially mock travels. These three satirists, however different the cultural objectives of their work, have one thing in common: they share with most satirists a talent for observing the excesses and absurdities of those social conventions designed specifically to control human behavior. Satire in this way is almost always political, focusing as it does on the methods by which the group and the individual impose restrictions on human appetites and ambitions. Just as the satirist takes up a position outside the norm to observe critically the human scene, so the satiric voice or persona usually represents a position of alienation or otherness. At the very least, the satirist is set apart because of a disenchantment with the way things are; often that isolation is the result of the more intense emotional experience of the satirist’s anger and hatred. That is certainly true of those satiric narratives that also pass so easily for children’s literature: Carlo Collodi’s Le avventure di Pinocchio (1883; The Adventures of Pinocchio), Lewis Carroll’s Alice in Wonderland (1865), and Frank Baum's Wizard of Oz (1900). The child's perspective is easily made into one of bewilderment, frustration, and separation. Similarly, the traveler, whether Homer's Odysseus or Swift's Gulliver, makes a ready satiric persona because of his naturally alien condition. Naivety and credulity are also necessary elements of much satiric narrative, however complex and ironic their contributions.

Sometimes, it is the narrator or the satirist's chief character who is the credulous ingenu, as in Voltaire's Candide (1759), or much of the recent work of the Australian novelist, Elizabeth Jolley; in other cases, the credulity of the reader is manipulated and exploited by the satirist, as in the work of Mark Twain, or hoax literature such as Daniel Defoe's The Shortest Way with the Dissenters (1702) and Denis Diderot's La Religieuse (1796). The effect of most satire is to create in the reader not just a sense of doubleness, of the world's duplicity and falseness, but of outright separation, an experience that truth is, ironically, not enlightening but disabling, that the reality of social conventions is wholly at odds with moral and ethical goodness. Innocence, naivety, openness, and honesty are all risky postures in satire; the satirist assumes such attitudes only ironically and invites the reader to adopt them only to be humiliated. Satiric irony at its extreme leaves the reader in a position of "enlightened isolation": we see truths about our society but in acknowledging those insights we are made to feel ashamed of our own hypocritical social identity. In summary, great satire is seldom constructive.

Swift's notoriously cutting observation, that man is an animal only capable of reason, is a disturbingly double-edged sword. To the Horatian satirists, it suggests that humanity, with the prodding of a little critical laughter at itself, may be nudged into more reasonable if not wholly rational behavior. But to the Juvenalian, humanity's mere capacity for reason is an unattainable condition, the promise of sensibleness and justice which exists only to reveal and deride the human animal for the vain and foolish thing it is. The darker ironic tendencies of satire and its necessary, if parasitic, relationship to a sophisticated and literate culture predispose it well to the genre of the essay, with its narrative self-consciousness, its tradition of sharp social observation, and especially its sensitivity to the ephemerality of meaning and language.

STEPHEN W. BROWN

See also Satiric Essay

Anthologies

English Satire: An Anthology, edited by Norman Furlong, London: Harrap, 1946

The Naked Emperor: An Anthology of International Political Satire, edited by Barbara Fultz, New York: Penguin, 1970

Satire: A Critical Anthology, edited by John David Russell and Ashley Brown, Cleveland: World, 1967

Satire: An Anthology, edited by Ashley Brown and John L. Kimmey, New York: Crowell, 1977

Further Reading

- Guilhamet, Leon, Satire of the Transformation of Genre, Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1987
- Highet, Gilbert, The Anatomy of Satire, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1962
- Paulson, Ronald, editor, Satire: Modern Essays in Criticism, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice Hall, 1971
- Pollard, Arthur, Satire: The Critical Idiotn, London: Methuen, 1970
- Rawson, Claude, editor, English Satire and the Satiric Tradition, Oxford: Blackwell, 1984
- Rosenheim, Edward W., Jr., Swift and the Satirist's Art, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1963
- Sullivan, J.P., editor, Satire: Critical Essays on Roman Literature, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1963

Satiric Essay

The essay is a literary mode peculiarly well disposed to satire. Both the Encomium moriae (1511; The Praise of Folly) by Erasmus and the Utopia (1516) of Sir Thomas More employed a politically sensitive irony to set old and new world views of the moral life against one another. While not satiric in any way, Machiavelli's Discorsi (1531; Discourses) and Francis Bacon's Essayes (1597, 1612, 1625), in the unwavering critical scrutiny they brought to bear on their subjects, indicated the direction satire was to take in the form of the essay; Machiavelli and Bacon, from their respectively suspicious and skeptical perspectives, were engaged in the business not so much of providing as of criticizing knowledge. The analytical revisionism of the Renaissance, by questioning the authority of received learning and by drawing attention to the limitations and problems surrounding all human ways of knowing, assumed a critical posture akin to the traditional position of the satirist. While Machiavelli and Bacon cannot be described as satirists, their methodology is latently satiric in its essential skepticism.

It is Montaigne who fully developed the essay's potential as a vehicle for satire, and in so doing made satire a crucial way of seeing and analyzing the world. The evolution of prose into the primary medium of literary expression in Renaissance Europe altered the nature of satire radically, with its novel emphasis on the written word and on the solitary and silent business of reading. Montaigne's Essais (1580, 1588) illustrate this new dynamic exquisitely. He wrote much about the act of reading, about his own critical and intellectual engagement with other texts and authors; in this he drew attention to the word as its own reality, to the way in which literature, reading, and intellectual reflection create a space apart from nature where the human personality experiences itself. Critical selfawareness is the source of the ironic epiphanies that characterize Montaigne's satiric essays. This sort of satire is especially evident in “Des cannibales” (1580; “Of Cannibals”), where the object of ironic analysis is finally not the anthropological truth about cannibals, but the literary ambiguity of texts and especially the slipperiness of meaning that allows the European to disguise himself and his culture, using language deliberately to render truth incognito. In the final paragraph of the essay, Montaigne complains about the impediment that inaccurate translation places in the path of understanding, blaming the stupidity of a translator for his difficulty in getting the answers he wants from a certain chieftain among the cannibals: “I spoke with one of them a long time but I had an interpreter who followed me badly and was so unresponsive to my ideas that I had little pleasure from it.” Montaigne’s reading of various texts about the New World aboriginals becomes a satire on the inhumanity of European governance in areas where cannibalism is institutionalized. But his ultimate satiric concern here is with the language by which moral neglect is disguised as necessary policy rather than with the actions themselves. Flawed interpretations, intellectual impatience, and the failure, often deliberate, to grasp and express meaning with clarity become the ultimate joke in Montaigne’s essay: politically self-serving language cannibalizes meaning and denies all access to truth. The satiric essay, as Montaigne rendered it, provides a means for regurgitating truth through the ironic manipulation of texts. “Of Cannibals” is the seminal example of the satiric essay: it becomes the very thing it satirizes, duping the unwary reader into mistaking its purposes while using a clever parody of contemporary accounts of the Americas to expose European political duplicity.

Practitioners of the form after Montaigne continued to employ kinds of parody to disguise their subversive objectives, often with such success that their satires were mistaken by the majority of their first readers for straightforward essays. Two of the more remarkable instances of this sort are Daniel Defoe’s The Shortest Way with the Dissenters (1702) and Jonathan Swift’s A Modest Proposal for Preventing the Children of Poor People from Being a Burthen to Their Parents or the Country (1729), both savage satires written in the guise of domestic political pamphlets. In The Shortest Way Defoe set out to expose the Anglican Church’s repressive policies against dissenting denominations by assuming a High Church persona and arguing for more severe restrictions and punishments, insisting that “if the Gallows instead of the Counter, and the Gallies instead of the Fines, were the Reward of going to a Conventicle, to preach or hear,” then few if any Englishmen would profess dissenting beliefs or survive to witness them. Defoe succeeded only in outraging both his fellow Dissenters and the authorities because his ironies were too acute; neither side could see the humor in so devastatingly naked an exposure of actual repression. At its best, the satiric essay simply states the truth with an authority and a zeal for precision that almost recalls Bacon’s scientific method. Nowhere is that mock authority and ironic precision more disturbingly manipulated than in A Modest Proposal. Swift assumes the voice of a Tory gentleman to suggest that the English aristocracy encourage their Irish subjects to sell their own children as delicacies for the upper-class table, even going so far as to include recipes for this new epicurean delight. Swift’s debt to Montaigne’s “Of Cannibals” is an obvious one, but his own essay has assumed a transcendent place as the model for the ultimate reach of satiric irony, the phrase “a modest proposal” becoming a synonym for irony itself.

The extreme responses elicited by both Defoe and Swift from their readers have less to do with the obvious use of exaggeration and hyperbole in their essays than with the way in which both writers ironically manipulate the public discourse in their parody of recognizable political texts. These essays try to deceive their readers into overlooking their blatant ironies by closely imitating the language and emulating the rhetoric of the propagandists they intend to expose. Satiric essays are thus often more interested in humiliating readers by exposing our inattentiveness to the meaning of written language and our deafness to the tone of printed texts than in attacking their political foes. The danger that satiric essays warn about is the danger of the print medium itself, the power of a text-based culture to disarm the moral sensitivity of the reader by usurping the individual's reflective identity. That realization compels two satiric personae as unlike as Miguel de Cervantes' Don Quixote and Anthony Burgess' Alex (A Clockwork Orange, 1961) to destroy, respectively, the printing press and the typewriter that have imprinted their textual identities.

Bringing enlightenment through humiliation and empowering the reader through victimization are the paradoxical objectives that unite satiric essays as different as those of Francisco Gómez de Quevedo y Villegas (Los sueños [1627; Visions]), Laurence Sterne (A Political Romance, 1759), Victor Hugo (Napoléon le Petit, 1852), and Mark Twain (To the Person Sitting in Darkness, 1901). Even in the less ironic work of a William Makepeace Thackeray or an S.J. Perelman, the focus is still on the ambiguous nature of written language itself in its capacity to dull us to social inequalities and political injustice. By drawing the reader's attention to the dangerous inadequacies of language through entrapping that reader in a text of unexpected bewilderment, the satiric essay is ultimately an instruction in the fine and dangerous art of reading itself.

STEPHEN W. BROWN

Further Reading

- Elliott, Robert C., The Power of Satire, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1960
- Nokes, David, Raillery and Rage, Brighton, Sussex: Harvester Press, and New York: St. Martin's Press, 1987
- Paulson, Ronald, The Fictions of Satire, Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1967
- Rawson, Claude, editor, English Satire and the Satiric Tradition, Oxford: Blackwell, 1984
- Tave, Stuart M., The Amiable Humorist, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1960

Scandinavian Essay

1. Introduction

The genesis of the essay in Scandinavia is not a Northern phenomenon. Its origin and inspiration came from the English moral weeklies of the early 18th century such as Addison's and Steele's *Tatler and Spectator. Dano-Norwegians and Swedes became familiar with the moral essay primarily through translation into French or German, if not directly through the original English.

By the same token, the evolution of the essay in Scandinavia is not a unified phenomenon. Although the presumed homogeneity of the region sometimes engenders the hope of a common literature, each country has pursued its own path. While it is true that Denmark, Norway, and Sweden have inherited some shared experiences by dint of foreign literary influences and mutual political and cultural circumstances, the essay has more than any other genre retained its national character.

Notwithstanding, the essay in Scandinavia—linguistically speaking—can be traced to a single country; it was in Sweden, with the appearance in 1732 of Olof von Dalin's (1708–63) journal Then Swänska Argus (1732–34; The Swedish Argus), that the Scandinavian essay began. The Swedish essay in turn heralded the rise of the Danish essay in the hands of Norwegian-born Ludvig Holberg (1684–1754), whose Moralske Tanker (Moral Reflections) appeared in 1744, a dozen years after the demise of Then Swänska Argus. Unlike Holberg, who after Moral Reflections wrote five volumes of epistles (1748–54), Dalin did not continue along the same lines for the remainder of his life. Thus while his Swedish Argus had some impact on Danish literature, its limited range—in both subject matter and the duration of publication—meant that it did not enjoy the international popularity or influence of Holberg's essays. Dalin's journal may have appeared first, but Holberg's essays found a greater and more lasting place in literary history.

2. The Danish Essay

In point of fact, Ludvig Holberg was not Denmark's first essayist. His essays were preceded by those of Christian Falster (1690–1752), who wrote three volumes of essays in Latin entitled Amoenitates philologicce (1729–32; The pleasure of learning) in a neoclassical style. His themes are diverse; most are, however, scrupulously areligious. For both Danish writers, personal experience, moral philosophy, and the value of knowledge and philosophy are essential. While Holberg is still read today, Falster, whose essays were not translated into Danish until 1919, is only of historical interest.

By contrast, Holberg's Moral Reflections were translated into Dutch, French, Swedish, and German, while the Epistles, of which there are over 540, filling some 2000 pages, were translated into German, Dutch, and partially into Russian. Moral Reflections and the Epistles are complementary: the earlier work comprises the serious literary essay in the classical tradition (with echoes of Lucilius, Cicero, and Seneca), while the latter evinces a blend of satire and moral philosophy more aligned with Montaigne. Irony and parody became Holberg's main literary devices in addressing his public. His essays are of a dual nature: they reflect, on the one hand, individual experience, and demonstrate, on the other, the notion of common experience. The entertaining expert and occasional dilettante shows that he is well-read and informed on diverse subjects.

As the instigator setting the course of the Danish essay and the epistle, Holberg drew on foreign sources. It is difficult to speak of the essay tradition in Denmark—then or now—without taking account of foreign models. Both classical and French elements dominated the Danish essay up until Holberg's death in 1754. In the latter half of the 18th century, Denmark was more and more influenced by the English Spectator tradition. Twentieth-century Danish essays have likewise demonstrated a dependence on English and American authors.

Following Holberg's death, the Danish essay lived on in the spirit of the English moral weeklies. Jørgen Riis' Den Danske Spectator (1744–45; The Danish spectator) and Anti-Spectator (1744–45) were short-lived but nevertheless popular, inspiring a number of foreign-language Spectator publications. Among the most prominent were Johann E. Schlegel's Der Fremde (1745), La Beaumelle's La Spectatrice Danoise (1749), and J. A. Cramer's Der Nordische Aufseher (1758–61). Subsequently, another Danish-language publication, Jens Schielderup Sneedorff's (1724–64) Den Patriotiske Tilskuer (1761–63; The patriotic spectator), continued the tradition.

By the close of the 18th century, the essay in Denmark had been transformed from an expression of the neoclassical spirit into a sociopolitical undertaking which relied on the genre's ability to affect opinion and taste. The sudden change of emphasis can be ascribed to an enlarged audience and its increasingly bourgeois character. Eighteenth-century essays generally represented the learned class and in some cases, the learned elite. The transition from a theological to a secular society led, moreover, to new literary applications of the essay. Although the Spectator tradition was often the model for the popular Danish essay—the classical essay—the epistle in particular—remained the genuine representative of the genre. Toward the close of the 18th century, however, the epistle receded as a medium. The source of intimacy associated with epistolary dialogue became less and less compelling for both essayist and reader. Simultaneously, writers of essays developed a powerful sense of individualism and a diminished need to be morally instructive. What, then, had previously grounded itself in didactics transformed into an expression of individual experience. The resulting personal essay has since become the most practiced type of essay in Denmark. Whether Danish essayists describe life at home or abroad, they characteristically (and often ambivalently) express from an individual point of view what it is to be Danish and to live within Denmark's borders.

During the first half of the 19th century, a number of Danish writers excelled as masters of prose, but few as essayists per se. The primary emulator of English essayists was Johan Ludvig Heiberg (1791–1860), whose Københavns Flyvende Post (1827–37; The Copenhagen flying mail) includes critical essays which are both aesthetic and political. In considering the development of the Danish essay during the previous century, it becomes clear how the genre's purpose and emphasis changed with the times—namely, from a genre preoccupied with tangible concerns to issues more esoteric in nature. The change can be explained in part by the reaction to Denmark's political and ideological confrontations with Prussia. The Danish essay was no longer exclusively the domain of the privileged and learned, well-established critics of lesser means now took it upon themselves to give it new life. As a result, the essay gradually lost its entertaining quality; in its place emerged the serious treatise and polemical essay.

Georg Brandes (1842–1927) is recognized as one of Denmark's principal essayists. He was, however, less an essayist than a master of polemic. In contrast to Holberg, who looked back to well-versed authorities of antiquity, Brandes turned to spokesmen of an empirical spirit consonant with his own age. Brandes' particular blend of essay and polemic was symptomatic of works labeled "essay" during the first decades of the 20th century. Religion, morals, ethical values, and the limits and responsibilities of science provided the basis of public opinion through which modern essayists were inspired. As a result, essays in Denmark became for a time less artistic and more topical. Once again, the journal took on the role as the leading medium for the essay.

Just after World War II, a group of aspiring critics and poets identifying themselves as "Heretics" contributed to a journal entitled Heretica (1948–53). Internationally oriented, they concerned themselves with the condition of modern man. The essay, along with the lyric, was the primary genre of the journal's first years. In this and like-minded literary journals, Danish writers appeared side by side with representatives from an international array of poets and essayists, Rainer Maria Rilke, William Butler Yeats, Pablo Neruda, Bertrand Russell, and James Baldwin among them.

Heretica, and the essays it contained, brought new impulses for other genres and set the tone for the Danish essay in subsequent years. Despite the Danish essayists' collective vision to improve society through the aesthetic qualities of language, stylistically they remained individuals as they contributed to the evolution of what is referred to as the literary essay. The final decade of the 19th century had experienced a rejuvenation of the literary essay, which became popular among modern-day moral philosophers and stylists. The Danish literary essay acquired some new supporters of the genre who saw it not only as a literary form, but also as a tool for enacting social change. Today, one typically finds a blend and an exchange of philosophy and fiction in the Danish literary essay.

During the second half of the 20th century, an increasing number of essay collections by individual Danish authors have appeared. Jacob Paludan (1896–1975), known as the essayist who in modern times has done the most for the genre, fuses the subjective and the objective in a free-wheeling style. His essays have been likened to "jaunts." Critics like Paludan have enthusiastically examined the nature and form of the Danish essay. Per Lange (1901–91) is best remembered for his characterization of the essay in "Om Essayets Form" (On the art of the essay). The critic Conrad Raun gave an account of the Danish essay in 1958 in the literary journal Vindrosen (Wind rose). Increased consciousness of the genre no doubt led to its use by social critics from the 1950s to the 1970s. For some writers of prose fiction such as Villy Sørensen (1929–), the essay is employed as a means of explaining that which has been concealed in the metaphors of imaginative literature, making symbols of human values perceptible when other genres have failed.

The youngest representatives of the Danish essay tend to hold their readers at a distance. Unlike their predecessors, they are not inclined to instruct. These aesthetically disposed essayists are often engaged critics, whose primary concerns are the interrelationships between ethics and art.

3. The Norwegian Essay

Ludvig Holberg, the father of Danish literature, is conventionally referred to by Norwegian literary historians as the first Norwegian essayist. Holberg's internationalism and air of modernity extended to continental Europe. Although it may be argued that the contemporary Norwegian essay is in some ways still reflective of European culture, most essays from Norway are oriented toward the country's national character and its concern for national identity. The dominance of Danish language and culture in Norway hindered the cultivation of an autonomous Norwegian essay. Following its political independence from Denmark in 1814 and the accompanying campaign for written Norwegian, the country witnessed the strengthening of the Norwegian essay. However, it has still not entirely emancipated itself from the didactic function and pedagogical tone it acquired through the patriotic efforts of the 1830s and 1840s.

Not unlike essayists in Sweden and Denmark, Norwegian essayists have concentrated on descriptions of nature and on essays which portray national literature. Some of the country's leading essayists—Hans Ernst Kinck (1865–1926), Nils Kjsjer, and Arne Garborg (1851–1924)—provide outstanding examples of a nationally oriented literature with an awareness of landscape and language. Of particular interest has been the Norwegian essayist's portrayal of contemporary Norwegian writers; Gunnar Heiberg's (1857–1929) characterization of Henrik Wergeland and Knut Hamsun's (1859–1952) characterization of Henrik Ibsen are but two examples. The abstract quality often associated with the essay is consequently less visible in the Norwegian essay. In keeping with Norway's new national awareness, Norwegian essays have often resulted from internal social conflicts. Because of the popularity of this kind of writing, the social value of such pieces has from time to time dominated artistic elements. Particularly during the 1960s and 1970s, the Norwegian essay took on the character of monologue and polemic.

While in Denmark the essay has sometimes exposed the Danes' ambivalence toward their country, in Norway it has worked to create a mode of expression compatible with efforts to establish cultural unity. Linguistically, this is observed in the essays of Asmund Vinje (1818–70) in his periodical Dølen (1858–70; The dalesman). With his Spectator-like treatment of topics such as education, folklore, politics, and philosophy, Vinje found a conversational style which complemented his efforts to promote the written Norwegian language nynorsk, which was based on western Norwegian dialects. The continuation of the tradition, using the essay to strengthen nationalism, can be observed in the epistles and essays of the so-called 20th-century Vinje, Tor Jonsson (1916–51).

The essay has affected Norwegian literature in another way. This point was made clear by Nils Kjaer (1870–1924), who represents the last chapter of the era of Norway's literary dependence on Denmark. In 1895, Kjaer wrote in the journal Tidssignaler (Signs of the times) that the critical essay was about to supersede the novel as the dominant genre. There, he points to the French writer Paul Bourget as an example of a belletrist and philosopher who considers the critical essay to be an organic whole—that is, more than merely a literary review. According to Kjær, the growing popularity of the essay in Norway just before the turn of the century could be ascribed to new expectations and a thirst for intellectual growth by readers. More and more, the Norwegian public looked to literature less for entertainment than for intellectual stimulation. Kjær found a further explanation for the essay’s popularity in the critics’ changed perception of their goals and means. Contrary to Hippolyte Taine, the new Norwegian essayist wrote with the conviction that criticism is art and not science. Norwegian essays at the turn of the century reveal their authors’ individual personalities. In Kjær’s words, those essayists sought to create “sjælemonographier” (monographic accounts of the soul) rather than “kulturbilleder” (pictures of civilization).

4. The Swedish Essay

Notwithstanding the fact that individual Swedish authors wrote essays during the 18th century, there was no organized effort then to further the genre in Sweden. To the brief list of 18th-century Swedish essays belongs Count Johan Thuresson Oxenstierna (1666–1733), whose Recueil de pensées du Comte J. O. sur divers sujets (1720–21; Collection of thoughts of Count Johan Oxenstierna on diverse subjects) attracted international attention. Oxenstierna has been referred to as “the Montaigne of the North”; the allusion is to the authors’ similar choice of topics, their use of quotations, and the general disposition of their works. Pensées was printed 18 times in French, but it was not translated into Swedish until 1767.

Swedish-language epistles can first be identified with En gammal mans bref till en ung printz (1756; An old man’s letter to a young prince) by Carl Gustaf Tessin (1695–1770). The Swedish-language tradition continued, mostly in the form of Spectator literature. Even before Olof von Dalin’s Then Swänska Argus, Sweden could boast of Carl (1703–61) and Edvard (1704–67) Carleson’s Sedolärande Mercurius (1730–31; Didactic Mercury). In both of these publications, the essays were usually character portrayals. Following the cessation of Then Swänska Argus, a number of Swedish moral weeklies appeared. Parallel with the moral weeklies emerged essays in the form of literary criticism. Den Swänska Mercurius (1755–61, 1763–65; The Swedish mercury) of Carl Christoffer Gjörwell (1731–1811) can be described as the beginning of Swedish literary criticism published on a daily basis and in brief essays.

The early 19th century is represented by P.D.A. Atterbom (1790–1855), Johan Erik Rydkvist (1800–77), and Louis Gerhard de Geer (1818–96). Rydkvist’s journal Heimdall (1828–32) was English- and French-inspired at a time when the Swedish cultural climate was dominated by Germany. Associated with the familiar essay, and an admirer of Francis Bacon, de Geer produced pieces such as “Om dans” (On dance) and “Om konversation” (On conversation).

During the so-called “breakthrough” of modern literature in the 1870s and 1880s, increasing influence from France was evident. Sainte-Beuve and Paul Bourget inspired Swedish literary essayists; Atterbom’s Litterära karakteristiker I–II (1870; Literary characteristics) was largely influenced by Sainte-Beuve. Both writers tended to create psychological portraits, using anecdotes and, at times, fictional enhancements of authors' lives. In response to Atterbom, the number of literary, biographical, and historical essays increased in Sweden during the 1890s. The development of the Swedish essay during the latter half of the 19th century took its cues from Sainte-Beuve, as well as Taine and Brandes. Other noted essayists of this period are Gustav af Geijerstam (1858–1909) (Ur samtiden [1883; From our times]) and Ola Hansson (1860–1925) (Literära silhouetter [1885; Literary silhouettes]). Both works are compendia of literary portraits. Hansson, in particular, concentrated on the development of the critical-biographical essay as a literary form. Metaphor and lyric quality are essential elements in his writing. Sweden's general awareness of the essay as a genre can be accredited to Hansson's essays.

The dominant Swedish essayist during the period between 1890 and 1906 was Oscar Levertin (1862–1906), whose principal essay collection, Diktare och drömmare (1898; Poets and dreamers), reveals his distrust of contemporary movements. While some of his essays approach prose fiction, they retain personal elements which are identified with the essay.

Levertin's successor was Frederik Böök (1883–1961). Although he attracted considerable attention for his affinity with Nazism, his essays nevertheless inspired aspiring essayists, and by doing so pointed to the role of the genre in shaping political opinion. As an essayist, Böök can be characterized as a critic and moralist who was dedicated to Germany and to nationalism. His major work, Essayer och kritiker (1913–23; Essays and criticism), is a multi-volume collection of works often on literary topics and literary figures.

Most contemporary Swedish essayists evince a close familiarity with modern journalism and prose fiction. Characteristically, Levertin's essays demonstrate an affinity with descriptive metaphor and hypotactic associations. Analogies often reveal a relationship to art. All of this contributes to essays in which subjectivity replaces fact. Even an essayist as ideologically attuned as Book revealed a sensitivity to symbolism.

Frans G.Bengtsson (1894–1954) is recognized as the most widely read Swedish essayist. His style is largely associative, but also archaic and imitative. He is a master of the informal essay, holding his own with French and English essayists. Stylistically, Bengtsson is an anglophile, writing in the tradition of Charles Lamb, Thomas Carlyle, and Thomas Babington Macaulay. Bengtsson succeeds in mastering parallelism through the use of comic and musical elements. Analogies, anecdotes, and quotations create an ironic but also sympathetic pastiche.

During the second period in the development of the Swedish essay (1907–19), the essay emerged as a new form of expression, and developed dramatically. This growth can in part be attributed to a change in the structure of the reading public. Collections of literature and theater criticism increased. Some essayists and critics in Sweden felt that the term essay should be reserved for the literary essay. Even those who accepted the term "essay" recognized two forms: the aesthetic on the one hand, and the nationalistic on the other.

In Sweden, the term "essay" came to be used as a subtitle for literary, historical, and philosophical essays. "Essay" was accepted, for example, by Ola Hansson when he changed the name of his "silhouettes" to "essays," and by Ellen Key (1849–1924) when she described her pieces in Människor (1899; Man) as “essayer.” During the decade between 1920 and 1930, however, consciousness of the essay in Sweden decreased, for various political and economic reasons. At the same time, however, new forms of the essay such as the travel essay, descriptions of nature, and the historical essay gained popularity.

Over time, the essay has taken on many styles in Sweden. Inspired by Rousseau, Carl Jonas Love Almqvist (1793–1866) produced lengthy essays on national character. August Strindberg (1849–1912) wrote essays on cultural and social problems. Vilhelm Ekelund (1880–1949) gave expression to his search for truth and beauty in a long series of aphoristic essays. The 1930s saw a rash of critical essays in short-lived periodical publications such as Spektrum, the Fönstret (Window), and Fronten.

The essay flourished among 19th- and 20th-century Swedish speakers in Finland. In its origins, the Finland-Swedish essay can be traced to Johan Ludvig Runeberg (1804–77), who as an essayist wrote principally about Finland’s political and social conflicts and the problems of literary criticism, and to Johan Vilhelm Snellman (1806–81), who despite his Finnish sympathies wrote in Swedish against Sweden.

A number of Swedish essays in Finland can be described as discourses on aesthetics, as self-portrayals, and as self-analyses. Literary journals have played an important role in the reception of the essay, as literary criticism was thought to be edifying. Viktor Rydberg (1828–95) was known for what is called the extended controversial essay or polemic. Elmer Diktonius (1896–1961) mastered the “conversational essay.” The critical essay is associated with Rabbe Enckell (1903–74). In general, however, the Swedish essay in Finland has remained local and historical, as it reflects literary history and national concerns.

5. Conclusion

As with other genres, it may be argued that the essay in individual Scandinavian countries is marked by certain affinities. The Danish essay might be called the subjective, personal essay; the Norwegian essay, the essay of national character; the Swedish essay, the literary essay. Scandinavia’s production of essays has also been affected by conditions outside the realm of literature; for example, the historian must consider the effects of the world wars on book production, the ensuing climate of intellectual debate, and the influence of the press. And in all three countries, the cultural and literary journal has played a role in keeping the essay alive in the minds of readers. The essay has not, however, been a traditional genre in all parts of Scandinavia. In fact, the only Icelandic writer who can be identified as an essayist is Guðmundur Finnbogason (1873–1944), one-time national librarian of Iceland. Women make up a proportionately small number of essayists; the largest group is represented by Sweden. In some literary histories the term “essay” is not even indexed. In others, the essay is generally treated as an author’s secondary preoccupation; little effort is made to clarify the relationship between the essay and other genres. Although the essay is much discussed, it is relegated to the less important corners of secondary and university instruction. Nevertheless, there are superficial efforts to insure the future of the essay. Editors of anthologies of Scandinavian essays tend to comb and excerpt every major author's oeuvre.

To address the future of the essay in Scandinavia implies that solutions must be found to make it relevant to a wide range of readers, to portray ordinary and universal experience. In an essay entitled "Essayn," the Swedish writer Sven Lindqvist writes that the traditional gentleman's essay must lose its elitism. In order to survive as an art form, it must speak to both the joys and the sorrows of life, and it must be instructive.

P.M. MITCHELL

VIVIAN GREENE-GANTZBERG

Anthology

Norske essays, edited by Carl F. Engelstad, Oslo: Gyldendal, 1967

Further Reading

Billeskov Jansen, F.J., Holberg som epigrammatiker og essayist, Copenhagen: Munksgaard, 2 vols., 1938–39

Engelstad, Carl F., "Innledning," in Norske essays, edited by Engelstad, Oslo: Gyldendal, 1967

Grepstad, Ottar, "Det nynorske essayet fra a ti Aa," Vinduet 36, no. 3 (1982):24–34

Grepstad, Ottar, editor, Essayet i Norge: Fjorten riss av ein tradisjon, Oslo: Norske Samlaget, 1982

Hågg, Göran, Övertalning och underhållning: Den svenska essaistiken, 1890–1930, Stockholm: Wahlström & Widstrand, 1978

Sandersen, Vibeke, Essayet—Oprøret og tradition, Copenhagen: Gyldendal, 1975

Sandersen, Vibeke, Essayet—Filosofi og fiktion, Copenhagen: Gyldendal, 1977

Schoolfield, George, "The Literary Essay in Finland," in The Nordic Mind: Current Trends in Scandinavian Literary Criticism, edited by Fred Egholm Andersen and John Weinstock, Lanham, Maryland: University Press of America, 1986:103–10

Schiller, Friedrich von

German, 1759–1805

Although Friedrich von Schiller is principally known as a dramatist, he also produced a substantial body of critical and theoretical writings during the course of his career, some of which might be described as essays. The term "essay" requires some qualification, however, if it is to be applied to Schiller's work: his theoretical writings are never familiar or personal in tone and he is never concerned with trivia or with capturing the fleeting impressions of ordinary human existence. His vision is consistently broad and grand—but it is given life and energy through the dynamic, rhetorical style and organizational skills of the born dramatist, and underpinned by a distinctly practical concern (whether explicit or implicit) with how literary works can be put together effectively, and with the role they fulfill in the world.

Schiller's earliest surviving prose works, dating from his school days at Duke Karl Eugen's academy in Stuttgart, already exhibit the essential characteristics of his mature work. They include two speeches on the nature of virtue, composed for festive occasions at court and delivered by Schiller himself in 1779 and 1780. These display a confident, even exuberant, mastery of rhetorical structures and devices, and the ability to present an argument with persuasive forcefulness. Schiller's medical writings from the same period offer an interesting contrast to these party pieces, with a more sober tone and a coolly analytical approach. His later prose works derive their particular strength from a combination of these qualities: a highly analytical method sustained by often breathtaking stylistic virtuosity.

During the 1780s, alongside his early plays, Schiller produced a number of occasional pieces for journals, including two short essays on the theater and a number of reviews (among them reviews of Goethe's Egmont in 1788 and Iphigenie in 1789). The themes and stylistic features of later prose works are variously prefigured in these pieces, but it was not until the early 1790s, when he was professor of history at the University of Jena, that Schiller began to investigate aesthetic and philosophical issues in greater depth, inspired by his study of Kant. The result was a number of shorter treatises: two essays on tragedy ("Über den Grund des Vergnügens an tragischen Gegenständen" [1792.; On the reason for our enjoyment of tragic subjects] and "Über die tragische Kunst" [1792.; On the art of tragedy]), essays on the sublime and on pathos ("Vom Erhabenen" and "Über das Pathetische," which appeared in Neue Thalia in 1793), and an investigation into the nature of beauty ("Über Anmut und Würde" [1793; On grace and dignity]). Even amid the abstract speculations of these philosophical works the dramatic practitioner is constantly apparent: the analysis of tragic or literary effects veers repeatedly toward discussion of how these effects are to be achieved in practice.

Schiller's momentous meeting with Goethe in July 1794, the beginning of their decade-long friendship, proved to be a catalyst in terms of his own work, provoking a deeper investigation of aesthetic questions and inspiring a personal creative renaissance. In 1794 and 1795, under the impetus of this new association, Schiller produced his two major theoretical essays, Briefe über die ästhetische Erziehung des Menschen (On the Aesthetic Education of Man) and the treatise Über naive und sentimentalische Dichtung (On the Naive and Sentimental in Literature).

The Aesthetic Education began as a series of letters addressed to the patron who had intervened with financial assistance in 1791, when serious illness and poverty were threatening to bring Schiller's career to an untimely end. These early letters were destroyed in a fire in Copenhagen in February 1794 and in the Fall of the same year Schiller started work on a revised version, which was published in three installments in the journal Die Horen (The muses) in 1795. Two hundred years after their composition there is still much in these 27 letters that speaks directly to a modern readership. The early letters establish the basis of the argument, with Schiller's contention that aesthetic matters are not a peripheral issue but fundamental for the harmonious development of both society and the individual. This section of the work culminates in the tremendous fifth and sixth letters, which survey the current lamentable state of humanity: individuals turn between imagination and intuition on the one hand, and science and abstraction on the other; a fragmented society where people are just cogs in a larger machine, unable to develop fully as individuals. Schiller's resonant condemnation of a world in which progress is attained at the expense of individual wholeness is extremely effective; echoes of his argument can be heard distinctly in Freud's Das Unbehagen in der Kultur (1930; Civilization and Its Discontents). The later letters examine the concept of beauty, and argue that art has a vital function in enabling society and individuals to develop their full moral potential, through its ability to reconcile the basic drives underlying human existence (e.g. material and form, the finite and the infinite, sensation and reflection).

Much of Schiller's argument is clearly still pertinent today, when the distances between different areas of human endeavor and the chasms of ignorance between isolated specialist fields appear greater and their implications more terrifying than ever. Other aspects of the work may seem more historically specific—Schiller's contention, for example, that artists should turn to the Greek classics for inspiration, as a counterbalance to the stultifying conventions of the contemporary cultural scene. Yet all of it is compelling: the driving, dramatic style of presentation gives the writing immense force and presence, even where the author is dealing in abstractions. Schiller's ideal aesthetic resolution of the fundamental tensions in human existence has its stylistic equivalent in the beautiful, almost architectonic structures of his language.

Schiller's second major theoretical treatise, On the Naive and Sentimental in Literature, was begun at the same time as the Aesthetic Education and also appeared in installments in Die Horen, in 1795 and 1796. This work owes even more to the stimulating effect of Schiller's friendship with Goethe. It is no more familiar in tone than any of his other prose works, but it is, in a very profound way, thoroughly an "essay": in it Schiller is implicitly testing and defining himself (an archetypally "sentimental" or reflective writer) against literary traditions and ideals, and against his much-admired friend (an archetypal "naive" genius). In a letter to Wilhelm von Humboldt (7 September 1795), Schiller reveals that his examination of the "naive" in literature had necessarily forced upon him the question of how he could still claim to be a writer despite having no feeling of kinship with the ancient Greeks. Through this treatise he is effectively defining and validating his position as a modern writer.

The presentation of the argument in this treatise also has more traditional essay-like qualities: Schiller did not start out with an overall plan, but let the argument evolve as he progressed. He begins with an examination of the "naive" as if this is his only object of inquiry, moving on to consider the contrasts between the "naive" and "sentimental" modes (between nature and culture, feeling and thought, the finite and the infinite). This leads into an extended examination of different genres and writers. The essay ends with a more general application of the central categories to "realists" and "idealists" as human archetypes.

After 1795 Schiller devoted himself to his dramatic compositions (the plan for the Wallenstein trilogy was already under way); the correspondence with Goethe became his principal arena for literary discussion, and he produced little in the way of published theoretical writing—just the small essay on epic and dramatic poetry written jointly with Goethe, and a preface to Die Braut von Messina (1803; The Bride of Messina) on the use of the chorus in tragedy. All Schiller's theoretical writings, and especially those of the 1790s, display the consummate rhetorical and constructional skills of this master dramatist; the two major treatises formed a basis for, and a prelude to, the great dramatic works he produced in the following decade.

SUSAN MACKERVOY

Biography

Johann Christoph Friedrich von Schiller. Born 10 November 1759 in Marbach am Neckar, Württemberg. Studied law and medicine at the military academy of Duke Karl Eugen of Württemberg (i.e. the Karlsschule), Stuttgart, 1773–80, graduated as a regimental doctor, 1780. First play, Die Rduber (The Robbers), performed January 1782; left Württemberg because his writing displeased the Duke, 1782. Contracted to write for the National Theater, Mannheim, 1783–84. Editor, Die Rheinische Thalia (later Die Thalia and Die Neue Thalia), 1785–93; joined the Korner circle, Leipzig, then Dresden, from 1785. Professor of history, University of Jena, 1789–91; resigned because of ill health. Married Charlotte von Lengefeld, 1790; two sons and two daughters. Founder and editor, Die Horen, 1794–97. He refused professorship in Tübingen, 1795. Lived in Weimar, after 1799, and several plays produced under Goethe's direction at the Hoftheater. Ennobled by Emperor Franz II, 1802. Died in Weimar, 9 May 1805.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Briefe über die ästhetische Erziehung des Menschen, in Die Horen, 1795; edited by Wolfgang Iiising, 1981; as "Upon the Aesthetic Culture of Man," in The Philosophical and Aesthetic Letters and Essays, translated by J.Weiss, 1845; as On the Aestbetic Education of Man, translated by Reginald Snell, 1954, and Elizabeth M.Wilkinson and L.A.Willoughby, 1967

Über naive und sentimentaliscbe Dichtung, in Die Horen, 1795–96; edited by W.F.Mainland, 1950; as "On Simple and Sentimental Poetry," in Essays Aestbetical and Philosophical, 1875; as On the Naive and Sentimental in Literature, translated by Helen Watanabe O'Kelly, 1981

The Philosophical and Aesthetic Letters and Essays, translated by J. Weiss, 1845
Aesthetical Writings, translated by Charles J.Hempel, in Schiller's Complete Works, vol. 2, 1861

Essays Aesthetical and Philosophical (various translators), 1875

Essays and Letters, translated by A.Lodge, E.B.Eastwick, and A. J.W.Morrisson, 1901

Aestbetical and Philosophical Essays, translated anonymously, edited by Nathan Haskell Dole, 2 vols., 1902

Essays (various translators), edited by Walter Hinderer and Daniel O.Dahlstrom, 1993

Other writings: 18 plays (including Don Carlos, 1787; Wallenstein plays, 1798–99; Maria Stuart, 1800; Wilhelm Tell [William Tell], 1804), poetry (including An die Freude [Ode to Joy], 1786), fiction, histories of the Low Countries and of the Thirty Years' War, and letters.

Collected works editions: Works (Bohn Standard Library), 4 vols., 1847–49; Werke

(Nationalausgabe), edited by Julius Petersen, Gerhard Fricke, and others, 1943– (in progress); Werke und Briefe, edited by Klaus Harro Hilzinger and others, 6 vols., 1988–95 (in progress; 12, vols. projected).

Bibliographies

Vulpus, W., Schiller-Bibliographie 1893–1958, Weimar: Arion, 1959; supplements by Vulpus, 1967, P. Wersig, 1977, and Roland Bärwinkel and others, 1989; other supplements in Jahrbuch der Deutschen Schillergesellschaft.

Further Reading

Meyer, Hermann, “Schillers philosophische Rhetorik,” Euphorion 53 (1959):91–128
 Reed, T.J., The Classical Center: Goethe and Weimar, 1775–1832, Totowa, New Jersey: Barnes and Noble, 1980; Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1986
 Staiger, Emil, Friedrich Schiller, Zurich: Atlantis, 1967
 Üding, Gert, Schillers Rhetorik: Idealistische Wirkungsästhetik und rhetorische Tradition, Tübingen: Niemeyer, 1971
 Wilkinson, Elizabeth M., and L.A. Willoughby, Introduction to their translation of On the Aesthetic Education of Man by Schiller, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1982 (original translation, 1967)

Schlegel, Friedrich

German, 1772–1829

Brother of August Wilhelm (the great Sanskritist and Shakespeare scholar), contemporary of Goethe, Schiller, Ludwig Tieck, and Madame de Staël, and influenced by his predecessors Lessing, Herder, and Kant, Friedrich Schlegel was one of history’s great practitioners of the essay form. While he wrote in many other genres, his other best-known works were collections of aphorisms, in part probably inspired by S. R. N. Chamfort’s revival of the form. His critical masterpiece is generally agreed to be “Über Goethe’s Meister” (1798; “On Goethe’s Meister”), though an earlier essay, “Über das Studium der griechischen Poesie” (1797; “On the Study of Greek Poetry”), aroused much interest, inspired as it was by Schiller’s famous piece, Über naive und sentimentalische Dichtung (1795–96; On the Naive and Sentimental in Literature).

Schlegel developed further Herder’s earlier efforts to relate ancient and modern literature, using Herder’s insights into Shakespeare and historical relativism, and learning much from neoclassicists like Johann Winckelmann and Lessing, however much of their thought he also rejected. In 1797, Schlegel published his first collection of aphorisms in the journal Lyceum der schönen Künste (Lyceum of the fine arts), introducing central ideas about “romantische Poesie” from earlier conceptions of the character of modern literature as “interessant.” Three years later, the Gespräch über die Poesie (Dialogue on Poetry) was published, and became known as Schlegel’s manifesto of Romanticism.

By this time, Schlegel had begun to believe that the preoccupations of earlier critics with the differences between ancient literature (Greek, Latin, Hebrew) and modern writings had obscured the more important fact of their similarities. The tendency to revile and devalue modern literary works, forms, and styles in the 18th century in favor of ancient ones had begun to falter, as Herder, Johann Georg Hamann, August Wilhelm Schlegel, Tieck, and others began to perceive the appropriateness of new art for new eras—hence the centrality of Herder’s “historical relativism.” Yet, while other early writings of Schlegel’s, including “Über Lessing” (1797; “On Lessing”), “Über die Unverständlichkeit” (1800; “On Incomprehensibility”), “Athenäum Fragmente” (1798; “Athenaeum Fragments”), and “Ideen” (1800; “Ideas”), functioned to gain a new appreciation for modern literature, using Shakespeare’s works as a touchstone, Schlegel also established this evaluation by a new means. His writings reveal a dawning awareness that, in spite of all the differences—now perceived as valuable innovations and beauties, instead of fallings away from a classical ideal—there were central similarities between ancient and modern art and literature. Even further, Schlegel came to believe that these similarities were expressive of whatever those characteristics are which we feel to be “aesthetic” qualities, and which lead to “aesthetic” experiences. Thus, the earlier effort to understand better the “essentially modern” in literature led instead to a better appreciation of the “essentially aesthetic.” Eventually, the adverb “essentially” was dropped, and a historical, relative view of art, literature, and the aesthetic was fully developed, in which Schlegel and other contemporaries like Novalis, Tieck, Jean Paul (Richter), and Karl Solger explored the way concepts like “Romantic irony,” “self-criticism,” and “self-development” could contribute to an opened, non-absolutist, non-essentialist aesthetic theory. The essays, fragments, and other writings of these German Romantic ironists—as they are often known—combined with writings in England by their friend Coleridge and, later, Shelley, laid the theoretical grid for much modern critical theory, starting with the Russian formalists and leading, through Mikhail Bakhtin, the New Critics, and structuralism, to both deconstruction and new historicism. For the Romantic ironists, deconstructive ideas and historicist-relativist ideas would hardly seem as antagonistic as they are made out to be today. Schlegel’s concept of “Romantic irony” was, in large part, an attempt to show that historical and textual criticism are not antagonists, and not even alternative approaches, but necessary complements in any critical discussion of a work of art.

Schlegel’s essays, as well as his fragments, his novel Lucinde (1799), and his other writings proceed in the main through a playful, witty, and nonsequential mode which defies traditional essay forms and audience expectations. Much like Shelley, Schlegel released the energies of extended metaphors, symbols, images, and apparently anecdotal, miscellaneous asides to create a new kind of development which defied the reason while intriguing the imagination. Digressions, absurd asides, and other disruptions led to the juxtaposition of themes, styles, and manners not normally seen in such a relation, so that the usual discursive prose of the essay is turned into rhetorical fireworks, and the essay—the criticism—itself becomes a work of art. Like Coleridge with his Biographia Literaria (1817) or Shelley with “A Defence of Poetry” (1821), Schlegel nurtured a form of literary criticism which sought not to reveal objective truths or best interpretations of literary works. These writers sought to achieve a criticism which was so illuminating about how works of art delight the reader that it became a work of art itself. This is a case of “Romantic irony” in its most exemplary form. It led to such concepts as “self-cultivation” and “self-development,” ideas about which Schiller and Goethe had also written or in which they had also been interested. However, these two giants rejected, in the main, formulations that the younger, rebellious generation gave them.

Such central aesthetic concepts about the self were based on the Socratic/Platonic emphasis on self-knowledge: “Know thyself” as the end not only of philosophy, but also of art and its sister, religion. Schlegel’s essays, as well as his fragments and novel, were designed as implicit dialogues, functioning to draw the reader into the thinking and imagining processes embodied in the text. This dialogic trait helps to prevent the reader both from extracting notional truths in a subservient way and from being condescending. Schlegel’s ironic (selfimplicating) narrative structures gradually reveal to the reader that the “content” of all works of criticism/art/philosophy can be said metaphorically to be self-cultivation and self-knowledge. Moreover, as Novalis added, without a thorough knowledge of ourselves we can never understand others. This self-knowledge, however, is described by means of concepts of layers and strata with no center; like an onion, we peel away layer after layer. Schlegel described self-development as “eternal agility”: endless, purposeless play, with art as a central initiator—for both artist and reader—of opportunities for partaking in a feast of intense self-experiencing, which alone leads to a knowledge of the world.

Other characteristics of Schlegel’s essay form involved techniques of “indirect communication”—adopted with ironic intensity by Kierkegaard some decades later. Based on ideas discussed above, indirect communication is at the center of Schlegel’s aesthetics, and is demonstrated in his essay style, whereby in speaking and writing about one thing—some specific subject matter—he is actually speaking and writing about language, speaking, and writing. Since language is so fundamental to human consciousness, this leads to Schlegel’s indirect subject matter, the human mind and the reader as specific occasion of that mind. Yet, while individuality is one focus of Schlegel’s attention in his fragments and essays, it is situated in that quintessentially communal, social experience, namely literature. Through an emphasis upon Symposie and Gesellschaft or community, Schlegel’s essays often do actually succeed in demonstrating what he set out to expound in them.

KATHLEEN M. WHEELER

Biography

Carl Wilhelm Friedrich von Schlegel. Born 10 March 1772 in Hanover. Studied at the University of Göttingen, 1790–91; University of Leipzig, 1791–94. Apprenticed to a banker in Leipzig, 1788; moved to Dresden, 1794, and Berlin, 1797. Contributor, Deutschland, 1797, and Der Teutsche Merkur (The German Mercury), cofounder and editor, with his brother August Wilhelm Schlegel, Athenäum, 1798–1800. Lecturer, University of Jena, 1800–01. Lived in Paris, 1802–04. Founding editor, Europa journal, 1803–05. Married Dorothea Veit (née Mendelssohn; daughter of Moses Mendelssohn), 1804. Lived in Cologne, 1804–07. Converted to Catholicism, 1808. Moved to Vienna, 1808. Administrator, Austrian government diplomatic service, 1809; served in the Austrian army, 1809–10. Cofounder and editor, Deutsches Museum (German museum) periodical, 1812–13. Appointed by Metternich as member of Austrian delegation to the Bundestag, Frankfurt, 1815–18. Editor, Concordia journal, 1820–23. Died (of a stroke) in Dresden, 12 January 1829.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Die Griechen und Römer: Historische und kritische Versuche über das Klassische Alterthum, 1797

Gespräch über die Poesie, in Athenaum, 1800; as Dialogue on Poetry, with Literary Aphorisms, edited and translated by Ernst Behler and Roman Struc, 1968

Über die Sprache und Weisheit der Indier, 1808; edited by E.F.K. Koerner, 1977; as “On the Language and Philosophy of the Indians,” in The Aesthetic and Miscellaneous Works of F.von Schlegel, translated by E.J.Millington, 1849

Über die neuere Geschichte (lectures), 1811; translated by Lyndsey Purcell and R.H.Whitehead, in A Course of Lectures on Modern History, 1849

Geschichte der alten und neuen Literatur, 1812; as Lectures on the History of Literature, Ancient and Modern, translated by J.G. Lockhart, 2 vols., 1818

Philosophie des Lebens (lectures), 1828; as The Philosophy of Life, and Philosophy of Language, translated by A.J.W.Morrison, 1847

Philosophie der Geschichte (lectures), 2 vols., 1829; as The Philosophy of History, translated by James Burton Robertson, 2 vols., 1835, revised edition, 1846

Philosophische Vorlesungen, insbesondere über Philosophie der Sprache und des Wortes, 1830

The Aesthetic and Miscellaneous Works, translated by E.J. Millington, 1849

A Course of Lectures on Modern History: To Which Are Added Historical Essays on the Beginning of Our History, and on Caesar and Alexander, translated by L.Purcell and R.H. Whitehead, 1849

Kritische Schriften, edited by Wolfdietrich Rasch, 1956

Kritische Fragmente, edited by Wolfdietrich Rasch, 1956; as “Critical Fragments,” in Lucinde and The Fragments, translated by Peter Firchow, 1971

Literary Notebooks, 1797–1801 (in German), edited by Hans Eichner, 1957

Dialogue on Poetry; Literary Aphorisms, edited and translated by Ernst Behler and Roman Struc, 1968

Lucinde and The Fragments (includes the novel Lucinde; “Critical Fragments”; “Athenaeum Fragments”; “Ideas”; “On Incomprehensibility”), translated by Peter Firchow, 1971

Philosophical Fragments, translated by Peter Firchow, 1991

Other writings: the novel Lucinde (1799), a play, poetry, and correspondence.

Collected works edition: Kritische Friedrich-Schlegel-Ausgabe, edited by Ernst Behler and others, 28 vols., 1958–95.

Bibliography

Deubel, Volker, "Die Friedrich-Schlegel-Forschung, 1945–1972," Deutsche Vierteljahrsschrift 47 (1973):48–181

Further Reading

- Dieckmann, Liselotte, "Friedrich Schlegel and the Romantic Concepts of the Symbol," Germanic Review 34 (1959):276–83
- Eichner, Hans, "The Supposed Influence of Schiller's 'Naive and Sentimental Poetry' on Friedrich Schlegel's 'Über das Studium der griechischen Poesie,'" Germanic Review 30 (1955):260–64
- Eichner, Hans, "Friedrich Schlegel's Theory of Romantic Poetry," PMLA 71 (1956):1018–41
- Eichner, Hans, Friedrich Schlegel, New York: Twayne, 1970
- Henel, H., "Friedrich Schlegel und die Grundlagen der modernen literarischen Kritik," Germanic Review 20 (1945):81–93
- Immerwahr, R., "The Subjectivity or Objectivity of Friedrich Schlegel's Poetic Irony," Germanic Review 26 (1951):173–91
- Immerwahr, R., "Friedrich Schlegel's 'On Goethe's Wilhelm Meister'" Monatshefte 49 (1957):1–22
- Lange, Victor, "Friedrich Schlegel's Literary Criticism," Comparative Literature 7 (1955):289–305
- Szondi, Peter, "Friedrich Schlegel und die romantische Ironie: Mit einem Anhang über Ludwig Tieck," Euphorion 48 (1954): 397–411
- Walzel, Oskar, German Romanticism, New York and London: Putnam, 1932 (original German edition, 1908)
- Wheeler, K.M., Introduction to German Aesthetic and Literary Criticism: The Romantic Ironists and Goethe, edited by Wheeler, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984:1–27

Schopenhauer, Arthur

German, 1788–1860

Arthur Schopenhauer presented in his major philosophical work, Die Welt als Wille und Vorstellung (1819; The World as Will and Representation), a consistent, rationally defended pessimism unique in the history of Western thought. Published when he was 30, The World as Will and Representation is the centerpiece and point of reference of all his other writings. Written in a nonacademic style that is lucid, direct, and immediate, it is a philosophical book that hardly needs explication. Because of his focus on "the problem of existence" Schopenhauer has been linked to existential philosophy. His Olympian, ironic, and spiritually aristocratic tone presents the message that existence is the expression of an insatiable, pervasive will generating a terrible world of conflict and suffering, senselessness, and futility. The “will to live” perpetuates this dreadful cosmic spectacle, and the goal of one who sees through the deceptive illusions of life is the denial of this powerful will to live.

Schopenhauer wrote a number of purely philosophical essays which, in effect, were supplements to The World as Will and Representation. In his essay Über den Willen in der Natur (1836; “On the Will in Nature”), he presents a dark portrait of the brutality and cruelty in the natural world based on the studies of naturalists, a theme replicated in film and television in recognizable Schopenhauerian tones. Another philosophical essay, “Über die Freiheit des menschlichen Willens” (Essay on the Freedom of the Will) was awarded a prize in 1839 by the Scientific Society of Trondheim in Norway. In 1841 he combined this essay with another entitled “Über das Fundament der Moral” (The Basis of Morality) and had the two published in a single volume under the title Die beiden Grundprobleme der Ethik (The two fundamental problems in ethics).

Schopenhauer’s influence can be traced to some of the themes of the music dramas of one of his earliest admirers, the composer Richard Wagner, to the development of the theory of the unconscious in Eduard von Hartmann’s Philosophie des Unbewussten (1869; The Philosophy of the Unconscious), and (both positively and negatively) to the philosophy of Nietzsche. Given the depiction of humankind as under the sway of an unconsciously operative irrational will, which is manifested in a primal “will to live” and in the “sexual impulse,” as well as related features of his thought, it has often been said that Freud’s dynamic theory of the individual owes much to Schopenhauer’s writings.

Toward the end of his life Schopenhauer produced a remarkable collection of work, Parerga und Paralipomena: Kleine philosophische Schriften (1851; Parerga and Paralipomena: Short Philosophical Essays). The Greek terms in his ill-chosen title for “popular” essays suggest surplus, supplementary writings, matters left over. In these essays on a variety of topics Schopenhauer reveals himself as the Romantic ironist, the moral idealist, who repeatedly reminds humankind of its selfishness, egotism, hypocrisy, and malice. His cynicism toward humanity is expressed sharply, economically, and with sardonic wit. Always, he seeks to look beneath the civil, social “mask” or persona in order to reveal the often unattractive inner, willful ego.

In “Psychologische Bemerkungen” (1851; “Psychological Observations”) he remarks that “Our temperament is so despotic that we are not satisfied unless we draw everything into our own life, and force all the world to agree with us.” In the same spirit, in one of his better essays, “Unser Verhalten gegen Andere betreffend” (1851; “Our Relations to Others”) Schopenhauer proclaims that “Most men are so thoroughly subjective that nothing really interests them but themselves.” With characteristic directness he accepts as given that “In savage countries they eat one another, in civilized they deceive one another.” Seeing himself as a wise and shrewd observer of his species, as a “man of the world,” Schopenhauer issues sangfroid critical judgments throughout his lucid and cutting essays. In “Über die Menschlichkeit” (1851; “Human Nature”) he judges what Freud will later merely describe: “...it is Schadenfreude, a mischievous delight in the misfortunes of others, which remains the worst trait in human nature.”

In his notorious essay, “Über die Weiber” (1851; “Of Women”), Schopenhauer both reveals cultural attitudes toward women in his time and adds his own bitter misogyny. Here his vaunted “objectivity” fails him, no doubt due to the lifelong bitter hostility between himself and his mother, a woman who was totally unresponsive to him and coldly rejecting. Aside from occasional lapses of crankiness and blunt prejudices, most of Schopenhauer’s essays have persuasive power, caustic humor, and depth of insight. His “Über den Selbstmord” (1851; “On Suicide”) reveals his compassionate side and the essays in the section Aphorismen zur Lebensweisheit (The Wisdom of Life) in Parerga and Paralipomena advise the development of the inner world, the cultivation of personal qualities that fuel spiritual growth or what he sometimes calls “the higher self.” When he is truly objective and calm, Schopenhauer does attain an austere, impressive wisdom.

In the long essay “Die Ehre” (1851; “Honor”), Schopenhauer’s social criticism satirically demolishes the then reigning “code of honor” or modern version of “knightly honor,” characterizing it as “the child of pride and folly.” He brings to this essay, as he does to all his writings, an extensive breadth of cultural knowledge. His familiarity with French, Spanish, and English (a language which he spoke fluently and wrote fairly well) gave Schopenhauer an unusual cosmopolitan perspective which informs his accessible essays.

Although it is included in the second volume of The World as Will and Representation, “Metaphysik der Geschlechtsliebe” (“The Metaphysics of the Love of the Sexes”) has often been extracted as a separate essay. In it love is ultimately reduced to the physical satisfaction of the “sexual impulse” and romantic, erotic attachments are described as being in the service of nature, the “will to live,” and the reproductive interest of the species. For Schopenhauer, apart from the basic desire for existence, “the love of life,” the “sexual impulse” is the most powerful, most pervasive, motive in human existence. Nature is said to attain its goal, procreation, by implanting the illusion in individuals that they are satisfying their own desires while it is the aim of the species that is served.

In an appendix to the discussion on the metaphysical understanding of sexuality added to the third edition of The World as Will and Representation, Schopenhauer, at the age of 71, added a discussion about the then volatile subject of male homosexuality. Despite disapprobation of the practice, he points to its prevalence and discusses it with the coolness and objectivity of the student of human nature. He even speculates, like some recent sociobiologists, that homosexuality may have a natural developmental purpose: diverting adolescents and the elderly away from reproductive activity. In this instance, as in many others, we see a daring thinker who already anticipates not only Freud’s idea of the “life-instinct” (eros) and the centrality of libido in human life, but who also presents the rudiments of a Darwin-like evolutionary theory in his conceptions of the perpetual struggle for existence in nature, attraction in sexual selection, the intellect as a “tool” of the will to live, and much more.

Throughout the essays comprising Parerga and Paralipomena Schopenhauer typically illustrates many of his pointed judgments by citations from dramas, novels, from Baltasar Gracián’s The Oracle (which he translated into German), Montaigne, La Rochefoucauld, Georg Christoph Lichtenberg, Plato, Seneca, and numerous other figures in world literature and philosophy. He was an intellectual internationalist who had great appreciation for languages and cultures other than his own.

Although his writings were generally ignored (Schopenhauer claimed they were subject to “a conspiracy of silence”) during most of his lifetime, in the last decade of his life he began to receive recognition internationally and, in Germany, despite the powerful negations of his metaphysics, he was surprisingly popular for a time.

Schopenhauer expresses his literary-philosophical knowledge in a clear, appealing, unpedantic way that invites the reader into a realm of cultivated, civilized, though often harsh and opinionated, discourse. Because of his honesty, his penetration of the veils that conceal the tragic aspect of existence, and his psychological insights Schopenhauer’s essays still have the power to startle, sting, and charm. In his writings a polyphonic rhythm of ideas expresses the ultimate symphony of a cosmic Romantic-ironic pessimism.

GEORGE J.STACK

Biography

Born 22 February 1788 in Danzig (now Gdańsk). Apprenticed to merchants in Danzig, 1804, and Hamburg, 1805–07, with the expectation that he would take over his father’s business; however, after father’s death, terminated apprenticeship and enrolled in a gymnasium in Gotha, 1807; studied science and philosophy at the University of Göttingen, 1809–11; philosophy at the University of Berlin, 1811–13. Lived in Dresden, 1814–18. Lectured at the University of Berlin, 1820. Lived in Frankfurt, 1833–60. Awards: Trondheim Scientific Society Prize (Norway), 1839. Died (of a heart attack) in Frankfurt-on-Main, 21 September 1860.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Über die vierfache Wurzel des Satzes vom zureichenden Grunde, 1813; revised, enlarged edition, 1847; edited by Julius Frauenstädt, 1864, and Michael Landmann and Elfriede Tielsch, 1957; as “On the Fourfold Root of the Principle of Sufficient Reason,” translated by Mrs. Karl Hillebrand, in Two Essays, 1889, and by E.F.J.Payne, 1974

Über das Sehnen und die Farben (treatise), 1816; enlarged edition, 1854; edited by Julius Frauenstädt, 1870; chapter 1 as “On Vision,” translated by E.F.J.Payne, in The Fourfold Root of the Principle of Sufficient Reason, 1974

Über den Willen in der Natur, 1836; revised, enlarged edition, edited by Julius Frauenstädt, 1867; as The Will in Nature, translated anonymously, 1877, reprinted 1982; as “On the Will in Nature,” translated by Mrs. Karl Hillebrand, in Two Essays, 1889

Die beiden Grundprobleme der Ethik (includes “Über die Freiheit des menschlichen Willens”; “Über das Fundament der Moral”), 1841; revised, enlarged edition, 1860; first essay as Essay on the Freedom of the Will, translated by Konstantin Kolenda, 1960; second essay as The Basis of Morality, translated by Arthur Brodrick Bullock, 1903, and as On the Basis of Morality by E.F. J.Payne, 1965

Parerga und Paralipomena: Kleine philosophische Schriften, 2 vols., 1851; as Parerga and Paralipomena: Short Philosophical Essays, translated by E.F.J.Payne, 2 vols., 1974; selections translated by T.Bailey Saunders in various collections, including

- Studies in Pessimism*, 1890 (also translated by William M. Thomson, 1896), The Art of Literature, 1890, Religion: A Dialogue, and Other Essays, 1899, and Essays from the Parerga and Paralipomena, 1951; selection as Essays and Aphorisms, edited and translated by R.J. Hollingdale, 1970
- Select Essays*, translated by Garritt Droppers and C.A.P. Dachsel, 1881
- Aphorismen zur Lebensweisheit* (from Parerga und Paralipomena), 1886; edited by L.W. Winter, 1966, and Rudolf Marx, 1968; selections as The Wisdom of Life and Counsels and Maxims, translated by T. Bailey Saunders, 1890
- Two Essays* (includes “On the Fourfold Root of the Principle of Sufficient Reason”; “On the Will in Nature”), translated by Mrs. Karl Hillebrand, 1889
- Selected Essays*, translated by Ernest Belfort Bax, 1891
- The Art of Controversy, and Other Posthumous Papers*, edited and translated by T. Bailey Saunders, 1896
- On Human Nature: Essays (Partly Posthumous) in Ethics and Politics*, edited and translated by T. Bailey Saunders, 1897
- Essays*, translated by Mrs. Rudolf Dircks, 1897
- Complete Essays*, translated by T. Bailey Saunders, 1942
- Philosophical Writings*, edited by Wolfgang Schirmacher, 1994
- Other writings: the philosophical treatise Die Welt als Wille und Vorstellung (1819; The World as Will and Representation) and several volumes of manuscript fragments.
- Collected works editions: Sämtliche Werke, edited by Julius Frauenstädt, 6 vols., 1873–74, revised and enlarged by Arthur Hübscher, 7 vols., 1937–41.

Bibliographies

- Cartwright, David, “An English-Language Bibliography of Works on Schopenhauer,” Schopenhauer-Jahrbuch 68 (1987):257–66
- Hübscher, Arthur, Schopenhauer-Bibliographie, Stuttgart and Bad Cannstatt: Frommann-Holzboog, 1981

Further Reading

- Copleston, Frederick C., Schopenhauer, Philosopher of Pessimism, London: Burns Oates and Washbourne, 1946
- Fox, Michael, editor, Schopenhauer: His Philosophical Achievement, Brighton: Harvester Press, 1980
- Gardiner, Patrick, Schopenhauer, Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1971 (original edition, 1963)
- Hamlyn, David W., Schopenhauer: The Arguments of the Philosophers, London: Routledge, 1980
- Hamlyn, David W., “Schopenhauer and Freud,” Revue Internationale Philosophique 42 (1988):5–17
- Hübscher, Arthur, The Philosophy of Schopenhauer in Its Intellectual Context: Thinker Against the Tide, Lampeter, Dyfed: Mellen Press, 1989 (original German edition, 1982)
- Janaway, Christopher, Schopenhauer, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1994

- Magee, Bryan, The Philosophy of Schopenhauer, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1983
- Safranski, Rudiger, Schopenhauer and the Wild Years of Philosophy, London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1989; Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1990 (original German edition, 1987)
- Snow, James, "Schopenhauer's Style," International Philosophical Quarterly 33, no. 4 (December 1993):401–12
- Taylor, Richard, "Schopenhauer," in A Critical History of Western Philosophy, edited by D.J.O'Connor, New York and London: Collier-Macmillan, 1964
- Zimmern, Helen, Arthur Schopenhauer: His Life and Philosophy, London: Allen and Unwin 1932 (original edition, 1876)

Schröder, Rudolf Alexander

German, 1878–1962

For the first half of his life Rudolf Alexander Schröder was a profusely productive poet whose verse was shaped by fin-desiècle aestheticism, and by a stylistic versatility that is indebted to the canon of European classics. Above all, he cultivated a talent for absorbing and reactivating a diverse array of historical forms (odes, elegies, sonnets). Thus he saw himself as a creative assimilator of time-honored literary and artistic models rather than as a critical innovator. His predilection for refinement, and indeed his sense of cultural superiority, derived from his social status—he came from a patrician merchant family in Bremen—and reflect the social values of the German haute bourgeoisie at the century's end: faith in a broad humanistic education, retreat from public controversies into inwardness and a dignified style of leisure, promotion of the arts as a way to foster civic sociability. The privileges of wealth and talent are employed most legitimately, in other words, when they serve the conciliatory purposes of moderation and continuity.

This attitude of conservative guardianship is sustained by an essentially aesthetic response to the uncertainties of life, experienced both as private contradictions and as the encounter with sociopolitical controversies. Schröder did not really question, much less abandon, this orientation when, during the mid-1920s as a belated reckoning with the consequences of World War I, he curtailed his lyrical output significantly in favor of essays, articles, and speeches—and of his work as an architectural designer. It was his program after 1918 to contribute toward the preservation of a national culture that he felt was being threatened with obliteration from many different directions. The rhetorical approach he thought best suited for such a task reflects two seemingly contradictory features of his personality: the self-conscious elitism of the connoisseur, and a strong need for recognition, even for public acclaim. Schröder was never a haughty loner like his friend Rudolf Borchardt, or a melancholy recluse like the cautiously admired Rilke. Rather, he found in the classical literature of Europe and in the company of conservative artists a world of congenial sociability into which he could easily enter. And he always valued the appreciation of a discriminating audience.

Consequently, his essayistic prose often recaptures the style of knowledgeable colloquies in which a small group of people explore a variety of agreeable topics and concerns. They may not always arrive at a consensus, but they never argue dialectically or with polemical sharpness. Such a manner of presentation, for all its erudition and authoritative command over the material at hand, proceeds with graceful, or at least effortless and at times casual, naturalness. Its ease only rarely slips into folksiness, or assumes the egalitarian voice of intimacy. It does keep its distance but eschews at the same time anything more forceful than a slight hint of confrontational acerbity. Schröder never employs harsh tropes or strident metaphors, never uses sarcasm. He is clearly uncomfortable with irony and bathos. His preferred mode of expression is a gently didactic tone, learned, with touches of wisdom, and free as much as possible from pedantry. It is a diction that allows his readers and listeners to share their preceptor's delight in his pleasurable duties. His writing, in other words, is not driven by any sense of urgency, nor is it animated by a struggle with incongruities or by the perplexity of multiple viewpoints.

This was possible only because Schröder remained distant from politics or social problems, both during the turbulent years of the Weimar Republic and under the dictatorship of the Third Reich. Such aloofness from the tensions of public life and from ideological hostilities was voluntary and not the consequence of a defiantly powerless capitulation before a ruthless enemy. It accorded easily with his concept of history and with his distaste for the immediacy of mundane problems. While the fate of German democracy and ultimately the future of Europe was at stake, Schröder sought to reassert the indelible values of the Western cultural tradition, for example, by giving four different lectures on bibliophilism (1929) and by translating Homer, Cicero, the complete poetry of Horace and Virgil, the classics of French drama (especially Racine and Molière), and after 1945 the plays of T.S.Eliot. But there is no hint in any of his work, including over 150 essays, nearly all of which deal with poets and their environment, that any Modernist author or recent aesthetic debate or even the great writers of the 19th century attracted his attention. Among his contemporaries there is almost no one but Hugo von Hofmannsthal, perhaps the closest of his acquaintances, who elicited more than a few courteous observations, and this only post mortem, in the form of five commemorative appreciations. The rest of German (and world) literature might well have ended with Hölderlin, Brentano, and Jean Paul.

It should come as no surprise, then, that Schröder's interests did not fluctuate or expand significantly, either after 1936, when he moved from his native Bremen to the village of Bergen (Upper Bavaria), or after 1945 when he was greatly in demand as a speaker at memorial and other festive occasions. His response to the Nazi regime, whose favors he never courted, was an intensified search for spiritual assurances, which brought him close to the members of Martin Niemöller's Bekennende Kirche (Confessing church) and to the existentialist theology of Karl Barth. As a lay preacher (Lektor) in the Evangelical-Lutheran Church (1942–53) he wrote and delivered some 90 sermons, all meditative and consolatory; his few public statements that included a political message (for example, "Horaz als politischer Dichter" [1935; Horace as a political poet], "Dichter und Volk" [1937; Poet and people], or "Christentum und Humanismus" [1942; Christianity and humanism]) were formulated in such cautiously general terms as to give no specific offense or encouragement. This was inevitable because Schröder's concept of Geist (spirit or intellect) has little regard for the impermanence of earthly things. His attention, rather, is focused on the eternal and on those emanations both of the Holy Spirit and of the human mind which have withstood the ravages of time. Most prominent in Schröder's purview of timeless values are the piety expressed, for example, in baroque church hymns (he wrote essays on six of their authors), and the humanistic universalism he attributed to the genius of Goethe.

MICHAEL WINKLER

Biography

Born 26 January 1878 in Bremen. Studied architecture, art history, and music at the University of Munich, 1897–99. Cofounder, Die Insel, 1899. Lived in Paris, from 1901, and Berlin, 1905–08. Architectural designer, until 1931. Lay preacher for the Evangelical Lutheran Church, 1942–53; appointed member of the Protestant Church Synod, 1948. Awards: several, including the Lessing Prize, 1947; Bremer Literature Prize, 1959; honorary degrees from five European universities. Died in Bad Wiessee, Bavaria, 22 August 1962.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Die Aufsätze und Reden, 2 vols., 1939

Meister der Sprache, 1953

Über die Liebe zum Menschen, edited by Johannes Pfeiffer, 1966

Aphorismen und Reflexionen, edited by Richard Exner, 1977

Other writings: many volumes of poetry. Also translated Homer, Virgil, and others.

Collected works edition: Gesammelte Werke, 8 vols., 1951–65.

Bibliography

Adolph, Rudolf, Schröder Bibliographie, Darmstadt: Winter, 1953

Further Reading

Adolph, Rudolf, editor, Leben und Werk von Rudolf Alexander Schröder, Frankfurt-on-Main: Suhrkamp, 1958

Noltenius, Rainer, Hofmannsthal, Schröder, Schnitzler: Möglichkeiten und Grenzen des modernen Aphorismus, Stuttgart: Metzler, 1969

Tgahrt, Reinhard, and others, editors, Rudolf Borchardt, Alfred Walter Heymel, Rudolf Alexander Schröder: Eine Ausstellung des Deutschen Literaturarchivs im Schiller-Nationalmuseum, Marbach am Neckar, Munich: Kösel, 1978

Science Essay

Science has been part of the subject matter of the essay for as long as the essay has been a distinct genre. In the 20th century, the science essay has developed primarily as a means of informing the general public about scientific theories and what it means to be a scientist. These essays often use personal reflection as a means to teach, use a story to make a case, and discuss major cultural and scientific questions by relating episodes of the authors' lives. Loren Eiseley, one of the foremost science essayists of the 20th century, writes in his autobiography, All the Strange Hours: The Excavation of a Life (1975), of creating "the concealed essay, in which personal anecdote was allowed gently to bring under observation thoughts of a more purely scientific nature." The science essay is also characterized by its use of comparisons and allusions to familiarize the reader with the sometimes esoteric details of the scientific information being discussed. Usually there is an emphasis on style, as poetic devices and rhetorical figures focus the reader on the language of the message.

Montaigne, in his innovation of the essay genre, did much to make the form amenable to the concerns of science and natural history. In his essays he frequently functioned as an ethnographer or anthropologist, as in "Des cannibales" (1580; "Of Cannibals") and "De l'usage de se vestir" (1580; "Of the Custom of Wearing Clothes"). In both essays, he recounts information without judging, and explains his abstract, philosophical ideas through appeals to specific examples, often from his own life. Many contemporary science essayists also use their own lives as examples and starting points for their essays. Montaigne also established the essay as a genre characterized by a skeptical and ironic attitude toward old ideas and an interest in new knowledge. He celebrated diversity and backed it up with a multiplicity of quotations. The essay, as Montaigne conceived it, helped engender the scientific method, and the essay genre that developed is permeated with natural history subjects and underpinned by a sense of the importance of the trial and error of scientific inquiry.

The originator of the essay form in English, Francis Bacon, apparently conceived of his Essays (1597, 1612, 1625) as a way of presenting knowledge. Although the subtitle of his book of essays is Counsels, Civill and Morall, he also included scientific information about agriculture in "Of Plantations" and "Of Gardens." Both Montaigne and Bacon wrote about the medical practices of their time and included information about ways to live a healthy life. In such essays Bacon functioned as a teacher; in doing so he effectively utilized the persuasive power of the essay. The essay as Bacon wrote it allowed the presentation of facts and observations without the drawing of conclusions. His Essays are laden with quotations and short narratives, which are not personal, but instead "represent the discussion of a man, not involved in a private reverie or confession, but involved in public debate or address" (Otis Winchester and Winston Weathers, 1968). The science essay has throughout time been associated with public debate on issues of scientific controversy.

In the 18th century the term “science” came to acquire the definition it has today. Most educated men had some interest in natural history, science, and medicine. The 18th-century essayists included scientific topics among those they wrote about, a notable example being Samuel Johnson’s “On Birth, Health, and Diligence” (1753). Most scientific writing was aimed at the educated populace rather than specialists, and many of the articles included in the Philosophical Transactions of the Royal Society of London would today be considered science essays rather than scientific articles.

In England, the first collection of natural history essays—Gilbert White’s The Natural History and Antiquities of Selborne—was published in 1788. White’s essays were to prove widely influential. His writings are full of poetic quotations, literary and biblical allusions, and he merges scientific diction with his own Augustan style. His stated aim in the author’s “Advertisement” was “to bring his readers a greater appreciation of the wonders of the creation and to enlarge the stock of scientific knowledge.” White’s prominent place in the history of nature writing has been characterized by Joseph Wood Krutch in Great American Nature Writing (1950): “White was the student of natural history who used the materials of science in the composition of a work which became belles-lettres because these materials, treated intimately rather than with complete detachment, take on emotional significance.”

In the 19th century, science fundamentally changed people’s conception of the universe and their place in it. While specialized scientific publications did exist, and became more significant for the professional scientist, the majority of scientific information and debate was disseminated in general literary publications. The debate between two prominent American scientists, Asa Gray and Louis Agassiz, on the validity of Darwin’s On the Origin of Species (1859) was waged in the Atlantic Monthly. When science became controversial to the average citizen, scientists took advantage of the popular press to present ideas and opinions. T.H.Huxley is perhaps the preeminent scientist of the 19th century concerned with the presentation of scientific ideas to the emerging literate population; his prose ranks him as one of the best stylists of that century. His principal technique was to take a specific, commonplace object, such as a piece of chalk, and use it as an example by which the public could learn to appreciate and understand the scientific mode of apprehending the world.

Twentieth-century science essayists have continued the pedagogic tradition, engaging the public in scientific debate, and personalizing science through autobiography. Almost every significant 20th-century scientist, from Sigmund Freud and Albert Einstein to James D.Watson and Stephen Hawking, has written essays aimed at the general public. In addition, many academic scientists write in the genre to extend their own teaching beyond the classroom, examples being Lewis Thomas, Jeremy Bernstein, Stephen Jay Gould, Freeman Dyson, Harold J.Morowitz, and Gerald Weismann. Essays on scientific subjects have also engaged nonspecialist writers such as John McPhee, K.C.Cole, and Diane Ackerman. All of these writers produce essays that blend scientific fact and documentation with philosophical discussion and evocative, even emotional description as their hallmarks.

DIANE DOWDEY

Anthologies

- The Faber Book of Science*, edited by John Carey, London: Faber, 1995
- From Sea to Space: An Anthology of Scientific Prose*, edited by J. D. Stephenson and A. R. Moon, London: Edward Arnold, 1962
- Great American Nature Writing*, edited by Joseph Wood Krutch, New York: Sloane, 1950
- Science in Writing: A Selection of Passages from the Writings of Scientific Authors*, edited by Thomas Rice Henn, London: Harrap, 1960; New York: Macmillan, 1961
- The Scientific Background: A Prose Anthology*, edited by A. Norman Jeffares, London: Pitman, 1958
- A Treasury of Scientific Prose: A Nineteenth-Century Anthology*, edited by Howard Mumford Jones and I. Bernard Cohen, Boston: Little Brown, 1963; as Science Before Darwin: A Nineteenth Century Anthology, London: Deutsch, 1963

Further Reading

- Bazerman, Charles, "The Writing of Scientific Non-Fiction," PreText: A Journal of Rhetorical Theory 5, no. 1 (1984):39–74
- Beer, Gillian, "Parable, Professionalization, and Literary Allusion in Victorian Scientific Writing," AUMLA 74 (1990):48–68
- Black, Joel Dana, "The Scientific Essay and Encyclopedic Science," Stanford Literature Review 1, no. 1 (1984):119–48
- Dowdey, Diane, Literary Science: A Rhetorical Analysis of an Essay Genre and Its Tradition (dissertation), Madison: University of Wisconsin, 1984
- Findlen, Paula, "Jokes of Nature and Jokes of Knowledge: The Playfulness of Scientific Discourse in Early Modern Europe," Renaissance Quarterly 43, no. 2 (1990):291–331
- Gates, Barbara, "Retelling the Story of Science," in Victorian Literature and Culture, edited by John Maynard, Adrienne Munich, and Sandra Donald, New York: AMS Press, 1993
- Gross, Alan G., The Rhetoric of Science, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1990
- Harre, Rom, "Some Narrative Conventions of Scientific Discourse," in Narrative in Culture: The Uses of Storytelling in the Sciences, Philosophy, and Literature, edited by Christopher Nash, London: Routledge, 1990
- Rousseau, G.S., "Science Books and Their Readers in the Eighteenth Century," in Books and Their Readers in Eighteenth Century England, Leicester: Leicester University Press, and New York: St. Martin's Press, 1982
- Selzer, Jack, editor, Understanding Scientific Prose, Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1993
- Winchester, Otis, and Winston Weathers, The Prevalent Forms of Prose: The Popular Article, the Professional Article, the Personal Essay, the Formal Essay, the Critical Review, Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1968

Sei Shōnagon

Japanese, c. 965–?

Sei Shōnagon's Makura no sōshi (The Pillow Book) is a hybrid work whose combination of narrative sketches, desultory reflections, and categorical lists was held in generic limbo, known by its author and title or simply as “book” from the time of its composition in the late 10th century to 1774. It was not until then that the essayist Ban Kōkei labeled it zuihitsu, the Japanese transcription of a Chinese word that means “following the brush,” the equivalent of “essay” in Japanese. The Pillow Book fits the literal sense of essay, reading like a series of trials in various styles and subjects, and evokes the essayistic feeling of close and unpredictable contact with the authorial world. From these pages we know what was considered unthinkable, vulgar, precious, and sane in her milieu.

The courtly Heian period was known for its women writers. While schooling meant the continental classics for men, who employed a form of Chinese to write poetry and record important matters, women of the aristocracy wrote largely in the vernacular, using a simplified syllabic writing system. Kana, alternatively called onnade, or the “woman’s hand,” eliminated the need for most Chinese graphs. Sei was a master of the vernacular, with its agglutinative forms, honorifics, elliptical phrasing, and paratactic structures. Her lyric passages flow with rhythmic asymmetry. Although literate females knew the Chinese tradition, if mostly through translation (China was the source of Japan’s writing system, and added depth to its literary heritage), it was considered inappropriate to flaunt such knowledge. The greater ease with which women could express themselves, and the greater poignancy of their lives in a society that felt the ideal love affair should end in the woman’s abandonment, have been credited for women’s monumental achievements in belles-lettres.

Sei Shōnagon is the least retiring of these writers. Eager to display her Chinese learning, she uses allusions with such dexterity that it requires committees of men to match her. In vernacular poetry as well she informs us that her talent earned admiration among her peers, not to mention her social betters. Whereas resignation to their fates seems to motivate women characters in the fiction of the time, Sei portrays the triumph and insouciance of ladies who cajole the opposite sex and revel in the outcome, even when they are left behind. Her own relations with men feature stinging repartee rather than tears. Above all, Sei evinces wit and good taste, frequently judging things okashi, a term of approbation whose meanings include “delightful,” “splendid,” and “fascinating.” Her satire on the clumsy lover who knocks his cap askew while taking his leave in the pre-dawn darkness is delicious; her pronouncements on the ultimate in various kinds of experience, such as the memories provoked by old letters, strike home and incite the reader to join in a game of enumeration.

Much of the impetus for her composition comes from Sei’s mistress, Empress Teishi or Sadako (ruled 977–1000). Court-related events in the work span the years 986 to 1000, including the period of Sei's service from 993 until the untimely death of her patron. Part of the empress' ammunition in the polygamous struggles of the court was the literary accomplishment of her retinue. Sei never hesitates to enhance the reputation of her patron, who thus appears wiser, fairer, and more amusing than any contemporary. Considering Sei's own middling rank, such favoritism is inevitable, but it reminds us that she was writing as a representative of the ideals of a salon as much as an individual. The authority of this group underlies her confident tone.

The meaning of "pillow book" has been extensively debated, but it appears to refer to the inclusion of lists featuring "song pillows" (utamakura), place names established in the poetic tradition. Hills, trees, plants, bridges, temples, and poetry collections themselves are some of the topics Sei covers. Many items seem to form elegant puns, reinforcing another theory that her prototypes included Chinese compendia of witty sayings, such as the miscellany of Li Shang-yin (813–58). The makura may be a chronicle of all that mattered in her circle, and may have been meant to stimulate admiration and conversation among readers, but her work has also been said to resist the act of reading. Its amorphousness presents a challenge to linear comprehension and to fixed notions of the female gender. In her text Sei (or a later emendator) protests her shame that the work has come to light, but also notes its favorable reception—not surprising, she comments, given her perverse habit of disliking what others enjoy. Such modesty is characteristic of East Asian authors, and in no way contradicts her love of attention.

The Pillow Book received less notice over the centuries than classic tales, yet it was copied often enough to produce complicated variants. There are two main divisions, into texts that group similar segments together and texts of random order. Scholars believe the random texts are closest to the original, while the classificatory texts represent medieval redactors' aims to make the content on Heian era customs more accessible. A critique voiced by a group of women, the Mumyōzoshi of about 1220, aligns The Pillow Book with Genji monogatari (The Tale of Genji) as a moving work. Medieval anecdotes of Sei's comeuppance are evidence for a popular view of her as too strident and self-promoting. With the introduction of printing and the spread of education from the 17th century, The Pillow Book was widely read and parodied. A recent translation into the patois of fashionable young Japanese women uses exclamation points liberally, capturing the flavor that has so captivated readers. Only the sharp tongue of the woman author kept it from being a premier textbook. Although the notion of antiquarian interest would have appalled Sei (who preferred what was up-to-the-minute), that, combined with her prose style, regarded as the purest in the native language, eventually established the work as a pedagogical model. Generations of Japanese have been vastly enriched by imagining how Sei meant them to complete her opening words, "In spring, it is dawn..."

LINDA H.CHANCE

Biography

Real name unknown. Born c. 965 in Kyoto. Daughter of Kiyohara no Motosuke, governor of Higo, a member of the middle aristocracy. May have briefly married Tachibana no Norimitsu; may have had a son. Lady-in-waiting to Empress Teishi (Sadako), c. 993–1000. May have married Fujiwara no Muneyo, a much older man who died before her. Had one daughter. May have become a Buddhist nun. Legends of her extensive travel in later years are unsubstantiated. Probably died at Tsukinowa (her father's residence), Kyoto.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Makura no sōshi, edited by Tanaka Jūtarō (fully annotated), 5 vols., 1983, and Watanabe Minoru, 1991; as The Pillow Book, edited and translated by Ivan Morris, 1967, abridged vol., 1991; selections translated by Arthur Waley, 1928

Other writings: poetry.

Further Reading

Bowring, Richard, Murasaki Shikibu: Her Diary and Poetic Memoirs, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1982

Marra, Michele, "Mumyozoshi: Introduction and Translation," Monumenta Nipponica 39, nos. 2–4 (Summer/Autumn/Winter 1984):Part 1:115–45; Part 2:281–305; Part 3:409–34

Morris, Ivan, The World of the Shining Prince: Court Life in Ancient Japan, New York: Kodansha International, 1994 (original edition, 1964)

Morris, Mark, "Sei Shōnagon's Poetic Catalogues," Harvard Journal of Asiatic Studies 40, no. 1 (June 1980):5–54

Okada, H.Richard, Figures of Resistance: Language, Poetry and Narrating in The Tale of Genji and Other Mid-Heian Texts, Durham, North Carolina: Duke University Press, 1991

Sarra, Edith, "A Poetics of the Gaze in Makura no sōshi" in The Desire for Monogatari, Proceedings of the Second Midwest Research/Pedagogy Seminar on Japanese Literature, edited by Eiji Sekine, West Lafayette, Indiana: Purdue University, 1994:21–30

Selzer, Richard

American, 1928–

Richard Selzer's essays have appeared regularly for the past three decades in upscale magazines and are familiar, often painfully so, to American college students enrolled in analytical writing courses. His medical essays, densely written musings upon the meaning of life, are ideally suited to exercises in interpretation, and classroom uses have surely produced a loyal readership among the young and literate. Readers who approach Selzer uninstructed do best to savor the sound and balance in his use of language, and appreciate the challenge within the occasional impenetrable passage as one would if it were poetry, into which he sometimes slips. Selzer is a retired surgeon and Yale School of Medicine professor, but he has been an essayist as well since the early 1970s. His audience is not narrowly confined to colleagues, despite the fact that his vocabulary is occasionally obscurely latinate, and his approach to subject matter clinical and often bloody, as if he were filling a chart, but using the language of Wordsworth to do it.

Although Selzer shuns the plain prose expected of the essayist, his form is conventional and recognizable despite his florid but skilled use of language. He usually chooses and frames single ideas in ways reminiscent of Thomas Carlyle at his most whimsical, usually allowing for very plain Carlylean titles. Had Carlyle been a surgeon, he would surely have found in surgery what Selzer has found—a sticky, warm world where dying and dignity, suffering and silence are alliterative ideas and language holds the key to all philosophy. Like Carlyle, he does not attempt to be popular in his views and occasionally stretches his relationship with readers by blending moral analysis with twisted diction. He is a writer who claims to care more about truth than consequences, although consequences to essayists exist on a different plane from those faced by surgeons, a point clearly not lost on him.

Selzer anticipates readers who would note the professional dichotomy by never questioning himself in his professional role, when to do so would be inconvenient, even in the early essays written while he was still a practicing surgeon. In his essay “Abortion” (1974), he registers his disapproval of this practice through a deliberately artless shift to second person in which he describes the horror of a pedestrian who finds that he has stepped on a fetus, dropped from an overloaded garbage truck in a bag labeled “hazardous wastes.” “I am a surgeon,” he says, abruptly shifting to the first person, turning his back on the “Street of the Dead Fetuses” and the discomfited reader, who shares the knowledge that the second person is only grammatically distanced from Citizen Selzer while he proceeds to distance Dr. Selzer from the unnamed procedure. “I do not shrink from the particularities of sick flesh. Escaping blood, all the outpourings of disease—phlegm, pus, vomitus, even those occult meaty tumors that terrify—I see as blood, disease, phlegm, and so on. I touch them to destroy them. But I do not make symbols of them. I have seen, and I am used to seeing. Yet there are paths within the body that I have not taken, penetralia where I do not go. Nor is it lack of technique, limitation of knowledge that forbids me these ways.” From this explanation he proceeds to an abortion, which he has asked to witness. It is a late-term abortion, the mother a smiling, presumably healthy, bystander. He describes the procedure in lurid detail, placing the fetus in the central role, a conventional tragic hero. By the end, however, he is classic Selzer, immersed in his art, emotionally connected to the essayist, but completely estranged from the surgeon. “And who would care to imagine,” he asks no one, “that trapped within the laked pearl and a dowry of yoke would lie the earliest stuff of dram and memory?”

Selzer is impossible to read casually; however, he can be read for the pleasure of working through his thoughts. There are no indifferent readers or mixed reviews. The positive reviews are glowing, the negative vituperative, as has often been the case with essayists whose work falls in and out of fashion, but never fades. Joel Howell of the New England Journal of Medicine, a representative Selzer reader, identifies Selzer as a type, a scientist by trade who is by nature a poet and philosopher, and who succeeds in science only because of his ability to believe in his own power to dismiss the possibility of either order or chaos: “There are surgeons,” he writes, “capable of surrendering to romantic awe and wild philosophical speculation after confronting the body’s pulsating internal labyrinth, and who are driven to name the unnameable.” Selzer illustrates this type with a passage from his book on his own experience with Legionnaires’ Disease, Raising the Dead (1993), in which he imagines an uncomfortable confrontation between himself a dying patient and himself the doctor: “There is the sadness of a toad in his hazel eyes. The familiar landmarks by which he could once be identified are no longer to be seen: the zygomatic circles surmounting the cheeks, the iliac crests, the tapered phalanges. He has become something I would not want to touch.”

One among many sources of difficulty to Selzer’s readers are the unexplained medical terms, many of them hopelessly obscure, which are not in lay dictionaries and can be frustrating for the reader who wants clarification. This is not the reader Selzer wishes to keep. The physician who knows the language gets no more out of this passage from “The Exact Location of the Soul” (1974) than the nonspecialist: “Women are physics and chemistry. They are matter. It is their bodies that tell of the frailty of men. Men have not their cellular, enzymatic wisdom. Man is albuminoid, proteinaceous, laked pearl; woman is yolky, ovoid, rich. Both are exuberant bloody growths. I would use the defects and deformities of each for my sacred purpose of writing, for I know that it is the marred and scarred and faulty that are subject to grace.”

CLARA SPEER

Biography

Born 14 June 1928 in Troy, New York. Studied at Union College, Schenectady, New York, B.S., 1948; Albany Medical College, M.D., 1953; Yale University, New Haven, Connecticut, 1957–60. Married Janet White, 1955: two sons and one daughter. Practiced general surgery in New Haven, from 1960; associate professor of surgery, Yale School of Medicine; fellow of Ezra Stiles College. Contributor to various periodicals and magazines, including Antaeus, Redbook, Harper’s, Esquire, and American Review. Awards: National Magazine Award, for essay, 1975; honorary degrees from four colleges and universities.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Mortal Lessons: Notes on the Art of Surgery, 1976

Confessions of a Knife, 1979

Letters to a Young Doctor, 1982

Taking the World in for Repairs, 1986

Other writings: two collections of short stories (Rituals of Surgery, 1974; Imagine a Woman and Other Tales, 1990), the memoir Down from Troy: A Doctor Comes of Age (1992), and a book about his bout with Legionnaires' Disease (Raising the Dead, 1993).

Bibliography

Stripling, Mahala Yates, "Richard Selzer: A Checklist," Bulletin of Bibliography 47, no. 1 (March 1990):3-8

Further Reading

Anderson, Charles M., Richard Selzer and the Rhetoric of Surgery, Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1989

Davis, Robert Leigh, "The Art of Suture: Richard Selzer and Medical Narrative," Literature and Medicine 12, no. 2 (Fall 1993):178-93

Elbow, Peter, "The Pleasures of Voice in the Literary Essay: Explorations in the Prose of Gretel Ehrlich and Richard Selzer," in Literary Nonfiction: Theory, Criticism, Pedagogy, edited by Chris Anderson, Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1989:211-34

Josyph, Peter, What One Man Said to Another: Talks with Richard Selzer, East Lansing: Michigan State University Press, 1994

Morris, David B., "Beauty and Pain: Notes on the Art of Surgery," Iowa Review 11, nos. 2-3 (Spring-Summer 1980):124-30

Peschel, Enid Rhodes, "Eroticism, Mysticism, and Surgery in the Writings of Richard Selzer," Denver Quarterly 16, no. 1 (Spring 1981):87-98

Schuster, Charles I., "The Nonfiction Prose of Richard Selzer: An Aesthetic Analysis," in Literary Nonfiction: Theory, Criticism, Pedagogy, edited by Chris Anderson, Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1989:3-28

Tavormina, M.Teresa, "Richard Selzer: The Rounds of Revelation," Literature and Medicine 1 (1982):61-72

Whittier, Gayle, "Richard Selzer's Evolving Paradigms of Creativity," Centennial Review 33, no. 3 (Summer 1989):278-301

Seneca

c. 4 BCE-65 CE

The life of Lucius Annaeus Seneca the Younger often seems at variance with his Stoic philosophy. A rich and ambitious man who praised frugality and moderation, he was the moral tutor of the Roman Emperor Nero. When the Emperor Claudius was alive, Seneca celebrated his clemency in his essay De clementia, then ridiculed him posthumously in his satirical Apocolocyntosis ("Pumpkinification"). Thus, although Seneca never set himself up as a model of rectitude, even suggesting that his Epistulae morales were an exchange between two moral invalids, readers as early as Tacitus have admired the style more than the man.

Seneca was a prolific writer; his prose works fall into five groups, though they share much with regard to form, style, and content. These include the ten Dialogi, such as the early Ad Marciam de consolatione ("To Marcia on Consolation") and De ira ("On Anger"), and the later De otio ("On Leisure") and De providentia (Providence); the two longer treatises, De clementia (On Clemency) and De beneficiis (On Benefits); the seven extant books of Naturales quaestiones (Natural Questions); the Apocolocyntosis; and the 124 Epistulae morales ad Lucilium (Epistles or Letters to Lucilius). With the exception of the comic Apocolocyntosis, whose rich display of different styles makes it one of the few extant examples of Roman satura (satire) as defined by Quintilian, all of Seneca's prose works are modeled on the form of the letter. Though they differ in tone and intimacy, each presents Seneca writing to a friend, family member, or disciple with the intention of moral instruction or consolation. Parallels have been drawn with his contemporary, St. Paul. The epistolary style also shapes the Dialogi, which are really one-sided monologues. Even the Natural Questions, which discuss the workings of nature and various natural phenomena, are addressed to Lucilius. This epistolary form hints at the origins and nature of Senecan style.

European and English prose styles tend to fall into one of two camps: the Ciceronian and the Senecan. The former is complex and rich, formed of cadenced periodic sentences; the latter is spare and abrupt, marked by the so-called "exploded period," a series of independent statements set down in simple sentences or clauses linked by coordinating conjunctions. The result is lapidary and epigrammatic. Caligula described it as "sand without lime"; Thomas Babington Macaulay complained that it was "like dining on nothing but anchovy sauce." The difference between the Ciceronian and Senecan styles emerges from the difference between a rhetoric aimed at oratorical performance in the Forum, and one intended for written expression, in a world where free speech was limited. Cicero's repetitions and cadences are meant for the ears of a general audience, Seneca's understatement, irony, and paradox for the eyes of a reader.

Stoic philosophy informs most of Seneca's written works. For him the great paradox of the human condition is not between life and death, but between fate (fatum) and chance (fortuna). The measure of human happiness is not the achievement of pleasure, but the ability to accept suffering and the dictates of fate. Since we have little control over what we must endure, the concern is rather with how to endure. So saying, misfortune is that which allows the good person to show his moral worth, for he endures well, while the bad person does not. We must learn not only to understand correctly, but to act correctly, achieving self-command. Too often we are the slaves of our appetites. Attacking greed, avarice, and covetousness (gula, avaritia, and luxuria) in his Consolatio ad Helviam ("Consolation to Helvia"), he complains that in Rome, "they vomit to eat and eat to vomit." While Seneca's writings are deeply philosophical, they are not for the most part philosophical treatises, systematically developing a logical argument. Rather, as one commentator suggests, Seneca is a preacher, focusing on one or two themes in each letter, then reiterating them in a series of vivid and memorable variations in order to hammer home his point.

Seneca had an immediate and continuous influence as both philosopher and writer. If early Church fathers such as Lactantius were hostile to the materialism of Stoicism, others such as Jerome appreciated Seneca's moral doctrine. In the Middle Ages, he exemplified philosophy, exerting a profound influence on medieval thinkers as diverse as John of Salisbury, Bernard of Clairvaux, St. Bonaventure, and Dante, who referred to him in the Inferno as “Seneca morale.” The development of printing led to a resurgence of interest in Seneca’s work, and Erasmus of Rotterdam produced the first critical edition in 1515. Humanists such as Erasmus, Sir Thomas More, Justus Lipsius, and John Calvin, as well as later Renaissance writers such as Montaigne and Francis Bacon, admired both his independence of mind and conciseness of style, positing him as the model of anti-Ciceronian eloquence. Among later philosophers, Seneca’s influence can be found in moral thinkers such as Spinoza, Rousseau, and Emerson, and especially among various existentialists from Kierkegaard and Nietzsche to Heidegger and Paul Tillich. Among later writers, Shakespeare, Quevedo, and Racine frequently quote him, and Pope, Hazlitt, Wilde, T.S.Eliot, and H.L.Mencken draw on his style.

THOMAS L. COOKSEY

See also Classical Influences

Biography

Lucius Annaeus Seneca. Born c. 4 BCE in Corduba (now Cordoba, Spain). Taken to Rome as an infant. Studied grammar and rhetoric, then various schools of philosophy, in Rome. Married Pompeia Paulina: one son (died, 41 CE). Lived in Egypt for health reasons, returning to Rome c. 31 CE. Elected quaestor (financial administrator), 30s. Exiled to Corsica for alleged adultery with Julia Livilla, sister of Caligula and niece of Claudius, 41–49. Tutor to Nero, designated praetor (judicial officer), 50, and adviser and minister to Nero, with Burrus, 54–62; consul, 56; retired on Burrus’ death, 62. Forced to commit suicide for supposed participation in Pisonian conspiracy, near Rome, 65 CE.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

De beneficiis, edited by C.Hosius, 1914; as On Benefits, translated by Aubrey Stewart, 1887

De clementia, edited by C.Hosius, 1914; as On Clemency, translated by Aubrey Stewart, 1899

De providentia, as Providence, translated by W.B.Langsdorf, 1900

Dialogi, edited by E.Hermes and others, 3 vols., 1898–1907, and by L.D.Reynolds, 1977

Epistulae morales, edited by L.D.Reynolds, 2 vols., 1965; as Letters (Loeb Edition; bilingual), edited and translated by R.M. Gummere, 3 vols., 1917–25; as Morals, translated by Roger L’Estrange, 1678, and by J.W.Basore (Loeb Edition), 3 vols., 1928–35; selections as The Epistles, translated by T.Morell, 1786; as Select Letters of Seneca, translated by W.C.Summers, 1910; as Seneca’s Letters to Lucilius, translated by E.Phillips Barker, 2 vols., 1932; as Letters from a Stoic, translated by Robin Campbell, 1969

Naturales quaestiones, edited by P.Oltramare, 1929, and Harry M. Hines, 1981; as Natural Questions, translated by Thomas H. Corcoran (Loeb Edition), 2 vols., 1971–72

Minor Dialogues, translated by Aubrey Stewart, 1899

Moral Essays (Loeb Edition), 3 vols., 1928–35

Moral and Political Essays (selection), edited and translated by J. W. Basore, M. Cooper, and J. F. Procopé, 1995

Other writings: eight tragedies (and a further two attributed to him) and poetry.

Collected works edition: Works, 19 vols., 1981–84.

Bibliography

Motto, Anna L., and John R. Clark, Seneca: A Critical Bibliography, 1900–1980: Scholarship on His Life, Thought, Prose and Influence, Amsterdam: Hakkert, 1989

Further Reading

Arnold, Edward Vernon, Roman Stoicism, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1958 (original edition, 1911)

Bourgery, Abel, Sénèque prosateur: Études littéraires et grammaticales sur la prose de Sénèque le philosophe, Paris: Les Belles Lettres, 1922

Canter, Howard Vernon, Rhetorical Elements in the Tragedies of Seneca, Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1925

Coleman, Robert, "The Artful Moralist: A Study of Seneca's Epistolary Style," Classical Quarterly 24 (December 1974): 276–89

Costa, C. D. N., editor, Seneca—Greek and Latin Studies: Classical Literature and Its Influence, London and Boston: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1974

Croll, Morris, Style, Rhetoric, and Rhythm, edited by J. Max Patrick, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1966

Currie, H. M., "The Younger Seneca's Style," Bulletin of the Institute of Classical Studies 13 (1966): 76–87

Griffin, Miriam T., Seneca: A Philosopher in Politics, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1992 (original edition, 1976)

Hutchinson, G. O., Latin Literature from Seneca to Juvenal, Oxford: Clarendon Press, and New York: Oxford University Press, 1993

Hutchinson, Anna Lydia, Seneca, New York: Twayne, 1973

Sørensen, Villy, Seneca: The Humanist at the Court of Nero, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, and Edinburgh: Canongate, 1984 (original Swedish edition, 1976)

Williamson, George, The Senecan Amble: A Study in Prose from Bacon to Collier, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, and London: Faber, 1951

Sermon

Like essays, sermons vary a great deal in kind, but are generally prose pieces of moderate length. Both forms consider a variety of topics, with an attempt at explanation or definition, and are frequently anecdotal, with occasional personal elements, and significant deployment of narrative. A key distinction is that sermons are initially speeches—albeit fully crafted and often published—usually delivered from a pulpit as part of a religious service or sometimes in a civic context. While essays are occasionally moralizing, the sermon always is. Moreover, the sermon characteristically employs formal rhetorical devices to secure an immediate response from an audience. Writing out and memorizing were a common preparation, but the words of skillful preachers could be ex tempore dicendi, where reporters recorded and then submitted the text for the preacher's correction before publication in circulating collections. Printed publication, by the author or by others, was determined to preserve the texts. The sermon can be regarded, then, as a precursor of the essay, derived from a secular classic tradition and establishing a European style of explanation, subsequently developed by the essay.

Elements of form and style come from the Greek tradition of rhetoric, most notably the Rhetoric of Aristotle (384–22 BCE) and also Isocrates (436–338 BCE), largely through the great Latin writings. St. Augustine (354–430 CE) had identified, in De doctrina Christiana (On Christian Doctrine), respectable authorities, those not tainted by pagan Rome's immorality. This followed centuries of conflict, epitomized by St. Jerome's dream of God's declaration, "Thou art not a Christian, but a Ciceronian." Augustine admired Marcus Tullius Cicero (106–43 BCE), who followed Isocrates and was most influential in Western traditions; De inventione, along with the pseudo-Ciceronian Rhetorica ad herennium, and parts of the De oratore, were the basis of rhetorical theory during the Middle Ages, known through commentaries as well as the texts. Since Jesus urged a Christian duty to "Preach to all nations," homilists needed guidelines for organizing subject matter and devices for eloquent persuasion. There is no medieval parallel for secular speaking, because the Church assumed the role of popular oratory that was part of classical experience. Techniques in the early centuries of Christianity are suggestive of those of informal essayists, with an almost conversational style and directness analogous to St. Paul's Epistles. In the 13th century emerges the ars praedicandi rules for a "university style" of sermon; many specialized manuals explained how to construct a sermon, beginning with a theme (quotation from Scripture) and a statement of purpose, then dividing and amplifying to explain and introduce authorities. This description suggests dialectical argument, but an awareness of the audience kept the sermon from rigid scholastic design. Robert of Basevorn's Forma praedicandi (wr. 1322; The Form of Preaching) illustrates such concern with oral discourse, both in its theory and as an easy personal style that later informs the essay. Masters of rhetoric distinguished two media (oral and written), but as Brunetto Latini observed in Tresor (wr. 1266), "the precepts are common to both." Renaissance emphasis upon antiquity reaffirmed classical traditions of rhetoric, which remain crucial to many modern sermons, while other popular styles developed.

St. Augustine, Gregory the Great, and the Venerable Bede were significant writers of Latin sermons, widely available in the popular homiliary of Paul the Deacon (c. 720–c. 799). The customary transcription of sermons into Latin obscures their delivery in the vernacular. Among Anglo-Saxons is Ælfric (c. 955–c. 1012), prose stylist and scholar, whose reputation rests on two volumes of Catholic Homilies and the Lives of the Saints, each containing about 40 sermons. Exegetical explanations of typology, allegory, symbols, and full development of illustrative narratives combine with a memorable style, whose balance and alliteration are models of elegance. Ælfric's contemporary Wulfstan (d. 1023) also selected Latin passages about his topic, translated them, and then developed his comments on ethical and religious ideas, often, as in the "Sermon of Wolf to the English," about evil days, the lack of loyalty, and sins that caused the Danish persecution. Questions, exclamations, repetition, and other rhetorical devices achieve a high emotional pitch and show dependence on Cicero, with little realistic detail.

Preaching in English continued after the Norman Conquest, but the sermon became especially important with the guidelines for instruction of the Fourth Lateran Council (1215). Many manuals explained logical ways to treat themes, with subdivisions and proper citations, and the use of authorities. Preaching was basic for the two mendicant orders, the Franciscans and Dominicans, who brought religion directly to the people, giving more time to the sermon than to other parts of services. A number of collections survive, like the Northern Homily Cycle (c. 1300), along with manuals and handbooks of exempla. Among 34 collections made from 1250 to 1350 is the Franciscan Gesta Romanorum, which contains edifying and amusing stories, alphabetically arranged by themes and cross-referenced, derived from many sources. Sermons by John Wycliffe (c. 1324–84) and his followers seek a more direct return to biblical text, an emphasis upon the literal sense. The Lollard sermon has a greater simplicity of style and concentration upon argument, often becoming polemical in addressing church abuses and thus more resembling a satiric essay. Chaucer's Pardoner's Tale (wr. c. 1387–1390s) explicitly presented as an example of preaching, explores this popular medieval art, combining the importance of oral delivery and audience, arguments about sin—well illustrated with examples and buttressed by authorities—and illustration of a text (greed is the root of evil) with the exciting story of the three rioters. Similarly, John Mirk's Festial (early 15th century), a collection of homilies assigned to Sundays and feasts, combines explanation of Scripture and feast with lively stories to illustrate the theme.

Renaissance sermons were highly intellectual and valued entertainment; with pamphlets and treatises, they were read like essays. Among distinguished preachers were Lancelot Andrewes, Jeremy Taylor, and John Donne, famous for their delivery and art. Taylor's rich style and melody combined with violent imagery and learning, and The Eniautos (1653–55) is an illustrious collection. Andrewes' Sermons, designed for the court and a theologically sophisticated audience, were published shortly after his death in 1626 by the king's command. Andrewes' style is difficult; sentences are long but logically constructed, laced with Latin, and more concerned with exegesis than personal comment and exhortation. Such severity and intellectualism are also characteristic of Donne, but the Dean of St. Paul's is also powerfully emotional, revealing, as in his poetry, many unresolved conflicts. Over 160 of Donne's sermons have been preserved, many published in his lifetime. Donne's "baroque" manner includes extraordinary metaphors—from science and new exploration—questioning, wordplay, repetition, puns, and a rootedness in the physical world that appeals instantly to both sensibilities and mind.

Coexistence of worldliness with Anglican preaching continued in the 18th century, as the essay became an established genre. Laurence Sterne published seven small volumes, albeit at a time when religious oratory lacked literary distinction. Another clergyman, Jonathan Swift, published tracts and satires to urge the moral reform that in earlier centuries would have been communicated through sermons. A lay writer like Samuel Johnson wrote in the style and manner of sermons in many essays in the Rambler (1750–52) which are infused with high moral purpose and urge physical and spiritual health. The alternative popular evangelical sermons of John Wesley indicate further a drawing away from formalism.

In the 19th century preaching, especially “university sermons” at Oxford, enjoyed another glorious age as Victorian audiences responded to the eloquence of John Keble, Edward Pusey, and most notably John Henry Newman. Their theological arguments and compelling presentation sparked religious reform, as secular essays urged a change in attitude. Newman’s clear and logical analyses, knowledge of history, and mastery of scripture, all presented with elegance and warmth, have survived as the preaching of Charles Kingsley, chaplain to Queen Victoria, and Matthew Arnold have not. In an age of emerging skepticism, Newman’s extraordinary skill in making Christianity concretely realized without resorting to emotional rhetoric was to be as inspiring in his several published volumes of sermons as when first heard in his silvery voice. Their literary skill and persuasion show again an affinity with the essay.

Notable authors of sermons in the 20th century include Swiss theologian Karl Barth and American popular broadcaster Fulton Sheen. Ronald Knox sustained the English sermon of clarity and elegance. Part of the Oxford tradition, Knox moved from Anglicanism to Roman Catholicism, as had Newman. His two volumes, Pastoral Sermons (1960) and Occasional Sermons (1960), show the same knowledge of scripture, theology, history, and literature, and the careful organization around text and theme that go back to classical traditions of rhetoric. Knox follows the teaching method of expounding parables and miracles, typically finishing with a precise definition. His sense of audience leads to a conversational style, enriched with contemporary allusions and often humorous. Like many other distinguished sermons, these show the agility of mind, the searching self-analysis, and seriousness of purpose that characterize essays seeking to elucidate a topic of great importance to the author.

VELMA BOURGEOIS RICHMOND

See also Religious Essay

Anthologies

Lollard Sermons, edited by Gloria Cigman, n.p.: Early English Text Society, 1989
The Puritan Sermon in America, 1630–1750, edited by Ronald A. Bosco, Delmar, New York: Scholars’ Facsimilies and Reprints, 4 vols., 1978

Further Reading

Coleman, Janet, “Memory, Preaching and the Literature of a Society in Transition,” in English Literature in History, 1350–1400: Medieval Readers and Writers, London: Hutchinson, 1981
 Davidson, Edward H., ““God’s well-trodden foot-paths’: Puritan Preaching and Sermon Form,” Texas Studies in Literature and Language 25, no. 4 (1983): 503–27

- Fedderson, Kim Murray, The Rhetoric of the Elizabethan Sermon (dissertation), York, Ontario: York University, 1985
- Heffernon, Thomas J., "Sermon Literature," in Middle English Prose: A Critical Guide to Major Authors and Genres, edited by A.S.G. Edwards, New Brunswick, New Jersey: Rutgers University Press, 1984
- Hudson, Anne, The Premature Reformation: Wycliffite Texts and Lollard History, Oxford: Clarendon Press, and New York: Oxford University Press, 1988
- Jacoebee, W. Pierre, "The Classical Sermon and the French Literary Tradition," Australian Journal of French Studies 19, no. 3 (1982): 227–42.
- Miller, Joseph M., Michael H. Prosser, and Thomas W. Benton, editors, Readings in Medieval Rhetoric, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1973
- Murphy, James J., editor, Three Medieval Rhetorical Arts, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1971
- Murphy, James J., Rhetoric in the Middle Ages: A History of Rhetorical Theory from Saint Augustine to the Renaissance, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1981
- Owst, G.R., Literature and Pulpit in Medieval England, Oxford: Blackwell, 1966 (original edition, 1933)
- Reedy, Gerard S., "Essential Studies of the Restoration Anglican Sermon," Restoration 2., no. 2 (1978): 14–16
- Rivers, Cheryl, "The Jeremiad as Political Sermon," in Amérique révolutionnaire, edited by Jean Beranger and Jean-Claude Barat, Bordeaux-Talence: Maison des Sciences de l'Homme d'Aquitaine, 1976

Serrès, Michel

French, 1930–

To read Michel Serrès is to set sail on an essayistic, poetic, and philosophical journey of discovery and recovery of the history of sciences, human nature, and knowledge. Serrès was born in Agen, in his beloved Valley of Garonne, and later became a naval officer. He coined numerous maritime metaphors on his journeys on board military ships, at the same time developing a very different perspective of the earth and humanity, which led him to his cherished field: philosophy. This itinerary explains the tropological language that surfaces in his nature-oriented, essayistic writings, such as Détachement (1983; Detachment)—which he subtitles Apologue—and Le Contrat naturel (1990; The Natural Contract), in which he views earth as a spaceship that humanity must steer wisely. Here his philosophical views against violence, inspired by his reading of Simone Weil, gather a momentum that permeates all his work, influencing his exchange of maritime journeys for revolutionary ones across the archipelago of knowledge. He sees his exploratory passages as “re-educating revolutions” (La Traduction [1974; Translation]). These explorations were widened at L'École Normale Supérieure, where Serrès completed his doctorate in philosophy and the history of science in 1968. Since that time he has been best viewed as a philosopher-poet, which reflects his penchant for the pursuit of synthesis out of the complexity of humanity's inherited knowledge.

Serrès' essayistic methodology and approach to philosophy are epitomized by free thinking and random searching for passages and connections across the sciences, a Hermeslike method he deems essential to creativity. It is not by chance that he chooses the Greek god/messenger Hermes (Mercury/angel messenger in Roman tradition) as the pilot of his intellectual journeys. Serrès elects this symbol of the "power to communicate, to connect" (by the magic power of Hermes' wand), a power which he also perceives in our contemporary mass media. Under Hermes' aegis Serrès launched his five-volume series Hermès: La Communication (1968; Communication), L'Interférence (1972; Interference), La Traduction (1974; Translation), La Distribution (1977; Distribution), and Le Passage du Nord-Ouest (1980; The Northwest passage)—a series reflected in his subsequent writings, a complete Hermesian/Sèrresian system in itself.

These exploratory and revolutionary journeys provide us with the opportunity to reconsider the modern essay as a genuine locus of cultural mestizaje (adaptation), a view that springs from one of Serrès' most constructive philosophical metaphors: that of the "educated third" (Le Tiers-instruit, 1991). Serrès wants his readers to understand this metaphor as the philosophy of cultural adaptation, a metaphor that echoes Hermes' ability to transport cultural values from one place to another. Culture, for Serrès, stands as the foundation of human civilization; he sees its significance as comparable, for example, to a "plate tectonics" theory for understanding humanity's development.

While he visualizes humanity as passing from local through global frontiers (The Natural Contract)—a movement that parallels that of the essay—Serrès hopes cultural adaptation will return humanity to the original sense of philosophy as love of wisdom, as the urgently needed confluence of the soft and the hard sciences (humanities and natural sciences). This confluence, Serrès believes, is needed in order to reverse the regrettable departure of science from the humanistic sphere as brought about by the "scientification and technologization" of modern Western society. It is at this confluence that Serres foresees the main role and responsibility for the philosopher and writer toward the humanistic disciplines.

As for the possibilities for such cultural mestizaje to crystallize, Serrès reconsiders and redefines the fundamental physical constructs of time and space, as the primordial ambience where fruitful and countless contacts between diverse entities and principles may develop, beyond the positivistic and reductionist frontiers of hegemonic specialization. Here he acknowledges his debt to the poetic vision of Lucretius (c. 100–55 BCE) in his De rerum natura (On The Nature of Things). This Latin poet and philosopher gave Serrès insight into the existence of principles such as that of the clinamen (inclination), "the smallest conceivable condition," that sets in motion the creative processes of the turbulent universe (La Naissance de la physique dans le texte de Lucrèce [1977; The birth of physics in the text of Lucretius]). Like Lucretius, Serres envisions an ontological and structural grounding for a theory of systems, and the intricate series of processes of exchange, within and across countless systems. Thanks to these systemic interrelations, it is possible for Serrès to link, for instance, the processes of language, communication, and life. In turn, this structural vision allows us to perceive the poetic sense of Serrès' philosophy, for poetry gives us an image of the world and its being in time and space. Serrès' vision here may concur with that of Octavio Paz, who believes that poetry is what manifests itself in/as the poem, that very space from which things emerge out of the creative turbulence of chaos, and which we can perceive as an infinite array of kaleidoscopic images, colors, and a holographic dance of fractals. This connection helps explain Serrès' illuminating statement that "philosophy is profound enough to make us understand that literature [poetry] is even more so" (Stéphan Bureau rencontre Michel Serrès, Radio Québec, 1993).

The principal aim of these philosophical and poetic connections is the search for innovative, creative ways of solving problems in the perception of knowledge, and in the portrayal of what is called reality, as Serrès clarifies in a series of interviews with philosopher and anthropologist Bruno Latour, published as Éclaircissements (1992; Conversations on Science, Culture, and Time). As Serrès explains, the rationale for his essayistic methodology of comparative connections and interferences is that legitimate knowledge is disseminated everywhere, with no one claiming exclusive rights or possession. Accordingly, argues Serrès, there is as much logic and reason to be found in the essays of Michel de Montaigne as in poetry, physics, or biochemistry. Equally, there can be as much unreason scattered throughout the sciences as there may be found in myth and dream (Conversations on Science, Culture, and Time). Serrès echoes Montaigne's essayistic method when he states, for instance, that where philosophy cannot go, literature very well can. This is indeed an apology for the humanities, as well as a denial that science is the only illuminating sun of truth (paraphrasing Kepler).

As a philosopher-poet and humanist, Serrès also seeks a space for the senses, especially the spirit of beauty. Thus he feels that the soft sciences (humanities) provide us with that sense of "earthly residence" (Pablo Neruda), whereas the hard sciences such as mathematics—the very language both Leibniz and Serrès see as central to the study of a philosophy of communication—are the most effective means of dealing with the luminous spirit embodied in human rationality. Serrès regards philosophy as an enterprise in which the new culture will reconcile, not only exact sciences and humanities, but also the most advanced rational knowledge, ethics, and spiritual uneasiness (Statues, 1987).

CIRO A.SANDOVAL-B.

Biography

Born 1 September 1930 in Agen. Studied at the École Normale Supérieure, Paris, agregation in philosophy and the history of science, 1968. Professor of philosophy and the history of science at the Sorbonne, Paris, Stanford University, California, and the Institut de France, Paris. Elected to French Academy, 1990. Editor, Dominos, from 1993. President, Association pour le Corpus Philosophique de la Langue Française (Association for the philosophical body of the French language).

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Hermès I–V, 5 vols., 1968–80; selections as Hermès: Literature, Science, Philosophy (various translators), edited by Josué V. Harari and David F. Bell, 1982.

Jouvenances sur Jules Verne, 1974

Feux et signaux de brume, Zola, 1975

Auguste Comte: Leçons de philosophie positive, 1975

La Naissance de la physique dans le texte de Lucreèce: Fleuves et turbulences, 1977

Le Parasite, 1980; as The Parasite, translated by Lawrence R. Schehr, 1982.

Genèse: Récits métaphysiques, 1982; as Genesis, translated by Genevieve James and James Nielson, 1995

Rome: Le Livre des fondations, 1983; as Rome, the Book of Foundations, translated by Felicia McCarren, 1991

Détachement: Apologue, 1983; as Detachment, translated by Genevieve James and Raymond Federman, 1989

Les Cinq Sens, 1985

Statues: Le Second Livre des fondations, 1987

L'Hermaphrodite: Sarrasine sculpteur, 1987

Le Contrat naturel, 1990; as The Natural Contract, translated by Elizabeth MacArthur and William Paulson, 1995

Le Tiers-instruit, 1991

Discours de réception à l'Académie française et réponse de Bertrand Poirot-Delpech, 1991

La Légende des anges, 1993; as Angels: A Modern Myth, translated by Francis Cowper, 1995

Les Origines de la géométrie, 1993

Atlas, 1994

Les Messages à distance, 1995

Éloge de la philosophie en langue française, 1995

Other writings: works on philosophy, literature, and science.

Bibliography

“Bibliographie des travaux de Michel Serrès,” Critique 380 (January 1979):121–25

Further Reading

Auzias, Jean-Marie, Michel Serrès, philosophe occitan, Mussidan: Fèdèrap, 1992

Crahay, Anne, Michel Serrès: La Mutation du cogito: Genèse du transcendantal objectif, Paris: Éditions Universitaires, and Brussels: De Boeck University, 1988

Michel Serres: Interferences et turbulences, Critique issue on Serres, 35, no. 380 (1979)

Serrès, Michel, and Bruno Latour, Michel Serrès with Bruno Latour: Conversations on Science, Culture, and Time, Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1995 (original French edition, 1992)

Sévigné, Madame de

French, 1626–1696

Saint-Simon, himself a great essayist, wrote that Madame de Sevigne “knew a great deal about all kinds of things without ever wishing to give the appearance of it.” It is this combination of insight and modesty for which she is perhaps best known. Her fame as a writer is particularly remarkable because she never published any literary work during her lifetime. Rather, her renown stems from her surviving letters, over a thousand in all, the majority of which were addressed to her much loved daughter, Madame de Grignan (1646–1705), who in 1671 moved with her husband from Paris to Provence. The first published collection of her letters appeared in 1725.

Although the letters of Madame de Sévigné can be regarded on one level as a series of letters to relatives and friends, they represent on another level essential documents and highly literate essays on a wide variety of subjects relating to 17th– century France. A major source of debate among literary critics has been whether she should be considered as simply a letter writer or as an epistolary author. Some view her work as purely private communication between individuals, but others see the letters as one of the few means available to a woman at that time to express herself as a writer. By writing to her daughter, they argue, she was able to create a certain kind of textual persona. Whichever way we may view her output, it is incontrovertible that the acuteness of her observation permeates all the letters. In this context, although she does not take up and pursue subjects in the comprehensive way many essayists do, there are three categories of observation to which her letters give rise: historical, literary, and social.

Of the historical letters, the most significant are the 14 letters written between November 1664 and January 1665 to Simon Arnauld de Pomponne on the trial of their mutual friend Nicolas Fouquet. Fouquet had been Minister of Finance under Cardinal Mazarin, but, after the latter’s death in 1661, Colbert (the future Minister of Commerce and Internal Affairs) collaborated with the king, Louis XIV, to arrest Fouquet on the charge of financial maladministration. Not only can Madame de Sévigné’s letters on the trial be seen as an account of a significant historical event but, more importantly, she focuses on the human aspects of the drama, relating the emotions and responses of the leading participants and evoking both pathos and humor. Other historical events, such as wars and political marriages, are similarly suffused with her personal observations and accounts of other people’s reactions. In her famous description of the public execution in 1676 of the murderess Madame de Brinvilliers, for example, Madame de Sévigné concentrates on both the event and her own limited view of the proceedings.

Throughout the letters, Madame de Sévigné displays a broad literary knowledge. She quotes from a wide variety of authors and was herself closely acquainted with leading writers of the day such as La Rochefoucauld and especially Madame de Lafayette. Not only does she observe many interesting literary and religious debates, such as the dispute between the Jesuits and the Jansenists (with whom she had close ties), but she also acts as literary critic both of writers who are little known today, like Menage, Ségrais, and Coulanges, and of well-known writers like Molière, Corneille, Racine, and La Fontaine. Her literary judgment does not always concur with that of posterity, as is shown in her unfavorable comments on some plays by Racine.

Madame de Sévigné's social observation is perhaps most particularly acute, as she is always keen to point out the absurdity of certain appearances and pretensions. She is a close observer of court life as well as life in the country, where she had a home at Les Rochers in Brittany. But, besides the vignettes of 17th-century life, her perception of human relationships extends beyond the age in which she lived. The mother-daughter relationship that manifests itself in the vast majority of the letters provides a unifying structure to the correspondence, and her expressions of love and pain at her daughter's absence are readily comprehensible to all ages. Moreover, her prime wish was to entertain her daughter in her letters, and this is demonstrated in her highly inventive use of language. At times she creates suspense by purposefully withholding information until the end of a letter, while at others she invents dialogues and even includes messages from other people, such as her friend Corbinelli or her son Charles de Sévigné. Although most letters display her effervescence and continual good humor, occasionally her observations contain a deep sense of sadness, for example at the death of La Rochefoucauld or at the suicide of Vatel, the king's chef. Little mention is made of her husband, Henri de Sévigné, who was killed in 1651 in a duel over his mistress, Madame de Gondran, but the pain of his infidelity and the rigors of having been widowed at the age of 25 are briefly evoked.

Madame de Sévigné has been widely praised, for both the seeming spontaneity and the extreme artfulness of her style. In many ways her writing can be compared to that of the theater: she creates vivid scenarios in which several characters play different roles, she herself operating as both spectator and actress. In the Fouquet letters, for example, she describes the actions and words of the leading participants as well as the response of the onlookers, including herself. But she can also be viewed as an essayist in her own right, as it was through her letters that she was able to discuss and comment upon the society in which she lived.

NICHOLAS HAMMOND

Biography

Marie de Rabutin Chantal, Marquise de Sévigné. Born 5 February 1626 in Paris. Studied privately with tutors. Married Henri, Baron and Marquis de Sévigné, 1644 (killed in a duel, 1651): one daughter and one son. Frequented salons, and met many literary figures, becoming close friends with Madame de Lafayette. Wrote at least 1100 letters during her life, many to her daughter Françoise Marguerite, Comtesse de Grignan. Died (possibly of pneumonia or influenza) at Grignan, 17 April 1696.

Letters

- Lettres choisies de Mme. la marquise de Sévigné*, 1725
Lettres de Marie Rabutin-Chantal, marquise de Sévigné, 2 vols., 1726
Recueil des lettres de Mme. la marquise de Sevigne, edited by D.-M. Perrin, 6 vols., 1734–37
Lettres de Mme. de Sevigne, de sa famille et de ses amis, edited by M.Monmerqué, 14 vols., 1862–68
Lettres inédites de Mme. de Sévigné, 2 vols., 1876
Letters (selection), edited by Richard Aldington, translated anonymously, 2 vols., 1927
Lettres (Pléiade Edition), edited by Émile Gérard-Gailly, 3 vols., 1953–57
Letters (selection), edited and translated by Violet Hammersley, 1955
Selected Letters, edited and translated by H.T.Barnwell, 1960
Correspondance de Mme. de Sévigné (Pléiade Edition), edited by Roger Duchêne, 3 vols., 1972–78
Lettres (selection), edited by Bernard Raffali, 1976
Selected Letters, translated by Leonard Tancock, 1982
Lettres choisies, edited by Roger Duchêne, 1988

Further Reading

- Allentuch, Harriet, Madame de Sévigné: A Portrait in Letters, Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1963
 Duchêne, Roger, Madame de Sévigné, ou, La Chance d'être une femme, Paris: Fayard, 1982
 Duchene, Roger, Madame de Sévigné et la lettre d'amour, Paris: Klincksieck, revised edition, 1992
 Farrell, Michèle Longino, Performing Motherhood: The Sévigné Correspondence, Hanover, New Hampshire: University Press of New England, 1991
 Gibson, Wendy, Women in Seventeenth-Century France, New York: St. Martin's Press, and London: Macmillan, 1989
 Hawcroft, Michael, "Historical Evidence and Literature: Madame de Sévigné's Letters on the Trial of Fouquet," The Seventeenth Century 9, no. 1 (1994):57–75
Papers on French Seventeenth-Century Literature issue on Madame de Sévigné, 8 (1981):1–162
 Recker, Jo Anne Marie, "Appelle-moi Pierrot": Wit and Irony in the Lettres of Madame de Sévigné, Amsterdam and Philadelphia: Benjamins, 1986

Shaftesbury, Earl of

English, 1671–1713

Anthony Ashley Cooper, the Third Earl of Shaftesbury, was among the most widely read and influential writers of his era. A man of aristocratic bearing whose delicate health restricted his involvement in the public domain, Shaftesbury did not court fame through authorship. Unlike a number of his contemporaries, he disdained to engage in controversy, and he did not share in the Augustan propensity to display his talents in the various poetic genres as well as in prose. His fame derived wholly from his essays, and almost entirely from those he published as a collection in one book, the Characteristicks of Men, Manners, Opinions, Times, which appeared in 1711, two years before his death.

The Characteristicks represents Shaftesbury's gathering of essays he had written over the previous decade into a coherent and purposeful single text. At least one essay had appeared without his authorization, and his fastidiousness as a stylist compelled him to pay attention to the text of what must have occurred to him would be the ultimate collected edition of his writings. Besides such stylistic emendations, he restructured his texts to some degree, to enhance the clarity or to reduce the formality of his discourse. To complete the book, he wrote and published for the first time a long essay he called "Miscellaneous Reflections" on the earlier essays. Though he continued to write after publishing this book, and these and other pieces appeared posthumously, the Characteristicks had already established Shaftesbury's influence and reputation in England and on the continent. Eleven editions of the book had been published in England alone by 1790.

To his own and subsequent generations, Shaftesbury was known primarily as a philosopher. Though they cannot be said to originate with him, his ideas about the perfection of the universe, the innate goodness of man, and the natural human endowment with moral sentiment gave wide popular circulation to basic deistic treatments of the universe and the nature of man; the many writers and theologians who attacked him did so to get at these ideas. Shaftesbury's notions about poetry, music, architecture, and taste, while not presented systematically in his essays, also made him a contributor to the aesthetic discourse of his age. His comments on enthusiasm, which he disdained in religious behavior but admired as a constituent of the poetic imagination, helped to awaken English poets to the beauties of nature and the significance of the sublime.

As an essayist, Shaftesbury represents well the ease and grace of early 18th-century English prose. Though conservative in his taste and rather doctrinaire about the Rules, Shaftesbury cultivated a clear, relaxed style of discourse based (as he says in his "Advice to an Author") on the conversation of "good company, and people of the better sort." The Characteristicks presents blocks of argument developed with such leisure and rhetorical restraint that one is not aware of reading argumentation at all. Through conjunctive elements and bits of narrative he controls transitions of thought easily, and varies masterfully the levels of usage in his address to explicit or imagined readers. Consider the stylistic control of this passage from his essay on "enthusiasm":

We have a notable instance of this freedom in one of our sacred authors. As patient as Job is said to be, it cannot be denied that he makes bold enough with God, and takes his providence roundly to task. His friends, indeed, plead hard with him, and use all arguments, right or wrong, to patch up objections, and set the affairs of providence upon an equal foot. They make a merit of saying all the good they can of God, at the very stretch of their reason, and sometimes quite beyond it. But this, in Job's opinion, is flattering God, accepting of God's person, and even mocking him. And no wonder.

At its best, Shaftesbury's prose flows easily along a reader's consciousness with a quality which may perhaps best be called (to use one of his favorite terms) "serenity": "Whoever has been an observer of action and grace in human bodies must of necessity have discovered the great difference in this respect between such persons as have been taught by nature only, and such as by reflection and the assistance of art have learnt to form those motions which on experience are found the easiest and most natural" ("Advice to an Author"). Such passages—particularly those articulating ideas about virtue and the goodness of the Divine Being—awakened wide admiration for Shaftesbury in his own age (except in the realm of theological controversy), at home and abroad. Both Diderot and Herder read him with pleasure, and Montesquieu named him, with Plato, Malebranche, and Montaigne, among "the four great poets." The tough-minded Elizabeth Carter spoke of rising from the Characteristicks with her mind full of "beauties, and love, and harmony, but all of a divine and mysterious nature."

In the 19th and 20th centuries, Shaftesbury's reputation has waned—along with the subject matter, it must be said, with which his essays are principally concerned. Readers who discover the Characteristicks, however, now some three centuries after the first publication, are likely to agree (at the least) with John M. Robertson's assessment in the introduction to his edition of these essays (1900), still the only complete modern edition of the work: "Given fair play, the Characteristicks can still hold their own with most of the books with which they competed in their generation."

JAMES M. KUIST

Biography

Anthony Ashley Cooper, Third Earl of Shaftesbury. Born 26 February 1671 at Wimborne St. Giles, Dorset. Studied privately in Dorset, under the influence of John Locke; Winchester College, 1682–84; privately in London, from 1686. Toured the continent, 1687–89, then returned to look after his family and estate. Whig Member of Parliament for Poole, 1695. Suffered from asthma for the rest of his life. Stayed in Rotterdam, 1697, 1698–99, and 1703–04. Lived in Chelsea, south London, 1699–1709. Married Jane Ewer, 1709; one son. Moved to Reigate, 1709; moved to Italy for his health, 1711. Died in Chiaia, near Naples, 15 February 1713.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Inquiry Concerning Virtue in Two Discourses, 1699; facsimile reprint, 1991; edited by David Walford, 1977

A Letter Concerning Enthusiasm, 1708; edited by Richard B. Wolf, 1988

Sensus Communis: An Essay on the Freedom of Wit and Humour, 1709

Characteristicks of Men, Manners, Opinions, Times, 3 vols., 1711; revised edition, 1714; edited by John M. Robertson, 2 vols., 1900, reprinted 1964

Other writings: works on philosophy and moral behavior, and correspondence.

Collected works edition: Complete Works, Selected Letters and Posthumous Writings (in English, and translated into German), edited by Gerd Hemmerich and Wolfram Benda, 6 vols., 1981–93 (in progress).

Further Reading

Aldridge, Alfred Owen, "Shaftesbury and the Deist Manifesto," Transactions of the American Philosophical Society 41 (1951): 197–385

Crane, R.S., "Suggestions Toward a Genealogy of the Man of Feeling," Journal of English Literary History 1 (1934):205–30

Markley, R., "Style as Philosophical Structure: The Contexts of Shaftesbury's Characteristicks," in The Philosopher as Writer: The Eighteenth Century, edited by Robert Ginsberg, Selinsgrove, Pennsylvania: Susquehanna University Press, 1987

Moore, C.A., "The Return to Nature in the English Poetry of the Eighteenth Century," Studies in Philology 14 (1917):157–86

Tuveson, Ernest L., "The Importance of Shaftesbury," Journal of English Literary History 20 (1953):267–99

Tuveson, Ernest L., "Shaftesbury and the Age of Sensibility," in Studies in Criticism and Aesthetics, 1660–1800: Essays in Honor of Samuel Holt Monk, edited by Howard Anderson and John S. Shea, Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1967

Shaw, George Bernard

Irish, 1856–1950

George Bernard Shaw is best known for his plays, but at the end of his life he reproved one of his biographers for thinking of him only as a playwright: "For every play I have written I have made hundreds of speeches and published big books on Fabian Socialism" (Sixteen Self Sketches, 1949). Shaw actually began his career making speeches from soapboxes to anyone who would listen, and his style is predominantly a speaking one: forceful, witty, frequently paradoxical, and yet straightforward enough to be understood at one brisk reading. On the negative side, this does not leave much scope for personal emotion, and the shock statements and paradoxes can lead to oversimplification and brightly polished half-truths. Yet Shaw is seldom merely superficial; rather, he makes serious points in a witty manner.

Shaw first published book reviews, going on to review music, theater, and painting. He also wrote more generally on the arts, notably when discussing Ibsen and Wagner. He reminisced on his own career (though guardedly) and about people he had known. He added long prefaces to his plays, expanding on the ideas they presented. The majority of his writings are, in the wider sense, political—on how society should be organized. They often originated as speeches and then appeared as articles, pamphlets, books, and even lengthy letters to the editor. Nearly all of Shaw's prose is journalism, in the sense that it is based on "what everybody is thinking about (or ought to be thinking about) at the moment of writing" (preface to The Sanity of Art, 1908). Most journalism loses its significance as time passes and circumstances change; many of Shaw's articles do not read as independent literary essays because they are tied to a particular event or situation, such as a dramatic performance. However, other articles—a small proportion of his great output, but still enough to fill a sizable book—have outlasted the topics that prompted them, and survive as literature. These topics are usually biographical, artistic, or (most commonly) political.

Despite a reputation for self-promotion, Shaw seldom writes directly about his own personal experiences. There are the Self Sketches, but these are curiously unrevealing about his feelings and not very interesting as essays. However, his pen portraits of others are valuable, partly because many of the people are well known—William Morris, Oscar Wilde, H.G.Wells—but also because many have a personal tone usually missing in Shaw's writing. His affection is evident in the essays on Morris (1899), the editor H.W.Massingham (1925), and the drama critic William Archer (1927). Of the last he says: "... after more than forty years, I have not a single unpleasant recollection." His response to H.G.Wells' furious public criticisms of Shaw and other leaders of the Fabian Society (which aimed at gradual socialism) is typical of Shaw's ability to be hard-hitting and yet genuinely affable, partly, as he says elsewhere, by "the art of softening a touchy point by a stroke of humorous exaggeration" (1899).

Biography is combined with the discussion of art, particularly when Shaw describes the leading actors of his period and their performances. He wages a long campaign against actor-director Henry Irving who, Shaw claims, altered Shakespeare's plays so drastically that they were unrecognizable. He makes the same criticism of Herbert Beerbohm Tree, but goodnaturedly: "As far as I could discover, the notion that a play could succeed without any further help from the actor than a simple impersonation of his part never occurred to Tree. The author, whether Shakespeare or Shaw, was a lame dog to be helped over the stile by the ingenuity and inventiveness of the actor-producer" (1920). The success of Shaw's plays, without being rewritten by the actors, simply "bewildered" Tree.

Shaw is always willing to speak against the majority, and prepared to praise where others condemn. He strongly defends Henry James' ill-fated play Guy Domville, and defends Wilde against the fashionable charge that his plays are facile (1895): "As far as I can ascertain, I am the only person in London who cannot sit down and write an Oscar Wilde play at will." He does share the majority view on Dickens, and a pretended letter of complaint from the Rev. Stiggins about the Wellers of Pickwick Papers, "sensual, ribald, and unseemly" (1887), brings out the perennial attraction of Dickens' characters. His introduction to Hard Times (1913) anticipates Orwell's more famous essay ("Charles Dickens," 1940) in many important points, examining the novel as announcing a major shift in Victorian perceptions of society.

The political essays are usually tied to contemporary situations, but some address wider topics. "War Delirium" (from the preface to Heartbreak House, 1919) is a study of how, in World War I, "the ordinary war-conscious citizen went mad," and what this reveals of human nature. It combines a balanced, humanitarian view with trenchant judgments. "Fools exulted in 'German losses.' They were our losses as well. Imagine exulting in the death of Beethoven because Bill Sykes dealt him his death blow!" "Democracy" (1929) has similar qualities but the tone is lighthearted: Parliament is compared to a hot-air balloon that touches down briefly once every five years. "The Crime of Poverty" (1912) and "Death of an Old Revolutionary Hero" (1905) use sustained irony that, in the latter, becomes satire. The "revolutionary hero" has opposed all the reforms of the 19th century, however worthy, on the grounds that they did not go far enough. Shaw, the gradualist socialist, makes fun of "all or nothing" men. As usual, his genial skepticism allows him to be highly critical and yet open-minded and entertaining.

RALPH STEWART

Biography

Born 26 July 1856 in Dublin. Studied at various schools in Dublin, 1867–69. Worked for an estate agent in Dublin, 1871–76, then moved to London. Ghost writer for a music critic, 1876–77 and 1881; wrote serialized novels and literary and art criticism for various magazines and newspapers, 1879–83. Joined the Fabian Society, 1884, becoming a member of the executive committee, 1885–1911. Music, art, or drama reviewer for various journals, sometimes using the pseudonym Corno di Bassetto for his music reviews, 1885–98. Helped to establish the London School of Economics, 1895. Playwright: first play, Widowers' Houses, produced 1892. Vestryman and councillor, Borough of St. Pancras, London, 1897–1903. Married Charlotte Payne-Townshend, 1898 (died, 1943). Lived mainly at country home in Ayot St. Lawrence, Hertfordshire, from 1906. Cofounder, the New Statesman, 1913. Awards: Nobel Prize for Literature, 1926; Irish Academy of Letters Medal, 1934; Academy Award (Oscar), for screenplay, 1939. Died in Ayot St. Lawrence, 2 November 1950.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

The Quintessence of Ibsenism, 1891; revised, enlarged edition, 1913

Dramatic Opinions and Essays, 2 vols., 1906

The Sanity of Art, 1908

Music in London, 1890–1894, 3 vols., 1931

Our Theatre in the Nineties, 3 vols., 1931

London Music in 1888–89, 1937

Sixteen Self Sketches, 1949

Plays and Players: Theatre Essays, edited by A.C.Ward, 1952,

Shaw on Theatre: Sixty Years of Letters, Speeches, and Articles, edited by E.J.West, 1958

Major Critical Essays, 1958

Dramatic Criticism, 1895–98, edited by John F.Matthews, 1959

Shaw on Shakespeare, edited by Edwin Wilson, 1961

- The Religious Speeches*, edited by Warren Sylvester Smith, 1963
Shaw on Language, edited by Abraham Tauber, 1963
Selected Non-Dramatic Writings, edited by Dan H. Laurence, 1965
Shaw on Religion, edited by Warren Sylvester Smith, 1967
The Road to Equality: Ten Unpublished Lectures and Essays, 1884–1918, edited by Louis Crompton and Hilayne Cavanaugh, 1971
Nondramatic Literary Criticism, edited by Stanley Weintraub, 1972
Practical Politics: Twentieth-Century Views on Politics and Economics, edited by Lloyd J. Hubenka, 1976
Shaw and Ibsen: Bernard Shaw's The Quintessence of Ibsenism, and Related Writings, edited by J.L. Wisenthal, 1979
Shaw's Music: The Complete Musical Criticism, edited by Dan H. Laurence, 3 vols., 1981
Agitations: Letters to the Press, 1875–1950, edited by Dan H. Laurence and James Rambeau, 1985
Book Reviews: Originally Published in the Pall Mall Gazette from 1885 to 1888, edited by Brian Tyson, 1991
The Drama Observed, edited by Bernard F. Dukore, 1993
The Complete Prefaces, edited by Dan H. Laurence and Daniel J. Leary, 2 vols., 1993–95
 Other writings: many plays (including Arms and the Man, 1894; Candida, 1897; Mrs. Warren's Profession, 1898; Man and Superman, 1903; Major Barbara, 1905; Pygmalion, 1914; Heartbreak House, 1919; Saint Joan, 1924), five complete novels, screenplays, correspondence (published in Collected Letters, edited by Dan H. Laurence, 4 vols., 1965–88), diaries, and autobiography. Also edited (and contributed two essays to) Fabian Essays in Socialism (1889).
 Collected works edition: Works (Standard Edition), 37 vols., 1931–50.

Bibliographies

- Haberman, Donald C., J.P. Wearing, and Elsie B. Adams, G.B. Shaw: An Annotated Bibliography of Writings About Him, De Kalb: Northern Illinois University Press, 3 vols., 1986–87
 Laurence, Dan H., Bernard Shaw: A Bibliography, Oxford: Clarendon Press, and New York: Oxford University Press, 2 vols., 1983

Further Reading

- Barber, George S., "Shaw's Contributions to Music Criticism," PMLA 72 (December 1957):1005–17
 Barr, Alan P., "Diabolonian Pundit: G.B. S. as Critic," Shaw Review 11 (January 1968):11–23
 Breuer, Hans-Peter, "Form and Feeling: George Bernard Shaw as Music Critic," Journal of Irish Literature 11 (September 1982): 74–102
 Fromm, Harold, Shaw and the Theater in the Nineties: A Study of Shaw's Dramatic Criticism, Lawrence: University of Kansas Press, 1967
 Gassner, John, "Shaw as a Drama Critic," Theatre Arts 35 (May 1951):26–19, 91–95
 Glicksberg, Charles I., "The Criticism of Bernard Shaw," South Atlantic Quarterly 50

(January 1951):96–108

Hadsel, Martha, “The Uncommon-Common Metaphor in Shaw’s Dramatic Criticism,” Shaw Review 23 (September 1980):119–29

Hill, Eldon C., George Bernard Shaw, Boston: Twayne, 1978

Irvine, William, “G. B. Shaw’s Musical Criticism,” Musical Quarterly 32 (July 1946):319–32

King, Carlyle, “G. B. Shaw on Literature: The Author as Critic,” Queen’s Quarterly 66 (Spring 1959):135–45

Shenfield, M., “Shaw as a Music Critic,” Music and Letters 39 (October 1958):378–84

Silverman, Albert H., “Bernard Shaw’s Shakespeare Criticism,” PMLA 72 (September 1957):722–36

Smith, J. Percy, “Superman Versus Man: Bernard Shaw on Shakespeare,” Yale Review 42 (Autumn 1952):67–82

Shelley, Percy Bysshe

British, 1792–1822

If Percy Bysshe Shelley regarded poets as unacknowledged legislators, it was in the medium of prose that he explicitly formulated this creed. In the small body of essays, prefaces, and fragments that form his prose corpus, Shelley treats religion, morals, politics, and literature not as separate critical concerns but as aspects of a cultural totality constructed by and constructing his role as a poet—a role far removed from that of the “ineffectual angel” described by some later readers. Indeed, Shelley’s last and best-known essay, “A Defence of Poetry” (1821), defines poetry in explicitly functional terms as culturally mediated expression that “communicates itself to others, and gathers a sort of reduplication from that community.” Whether as poet or polemicist, idealist or skeptic, Shelley writes as an engaged citizen.

Shelley’s first public appearances as an author explore two poles of the expressive resources available to a prose writer. His first two prose publications, “The Necessity of Atheism” (1811) and “An Address to the Irish People” (1812), emerge from the philosopher’s closet and the hustings respectively. Its mild, reasoned tenor notwithstanding, the first resulted in Shelley’s expulsion (along with a friend) from Oxford. While the second effected no practical result beyond bringing home to its author the volatility of religious issues, it demonstrates a grasp of the plain style so effectively employed by radical writers like Thomas Paine and William Cobbett. The same year Shelley published “An Address” he also made an intervention on behalf of press freedoms in “A Letter to Lord Ellenborough,” addressed to the judge who had recently convicted a bookseller and publisher for publishing Thomas Paine’s The Age of Reason. The “Letter” speaks with what Blake terms “the voice of honest indignation,” adeptly assuming the persona of an Englishman asserting his outrage at an infringement of traditional liberties (“Whom has he injured? What crime has he committed?”).

An alternation between philosophical and popular modes characterizes Shelley’s subsequent prose—a dichotomy reflecting a division among his poems as well. The common threads running through all of these works, however, are an engagement with the social good—whether it concerns diet (“Essay on the Vegetable System of Diet,” wr. 1814–15) or political suffrage (“A Proposal for Putting Reform to the Vote Throughout the Kingdom,” pub. 1817)—and a rational public voice. While its author was sometimes portrayed by contemporaries as a self-dramatizing young Werther figure, Shelley’s prose eschews the personal, idiosyncratic, and often confessional impulses of the Romantic essay as practiced by Lamb, De Quincey, and Hazlitt. Shelley was a child of the Enlightenment and his essays reflect the encyclopedic cultural purview and the rational vantage of 18th-century moral philosophy. His writing is learned, employing even the most recondite classical references with ease, and capable of philosophical sophistication, treating fundamental questions in pieces like “Essay on Love” (wr. c. 1818) and “Essay on Life” (wr. c. 1812–14), for instance, with rigorous economy of exposition (“The words, I, you, they are not signs of any actual difference subsisting between the assemblage of thoughts thus indicated, but are merely marks employed to denote the different modifications of the one mind”). The work is fully engaged as well, directing its energies of inquiry to the most immediate issues affecting daily life. For Shelley, as a poet, these issues are ultimately implicated in the status and function of poetry in an age when the dominant modes of inquiry were rational in nature. In 1820, his friend Thomas Love Peacock published a witty essay entitled The Four Ages of Poetry, in which Peacock argues that poetry has outlived its usefulness: “It can never make a philosopher, nor a statesman, nor in any class of life an useful or rational man. It cannot claim the slightest share in any one of the comforts and utilities of life of which we have witnessed so many and so rapid advances.” In reply, Shelley wrote “A Defence of Poetry”—his best-known essay and, along with Wordsworth’s preface to the Lyrical Ballads (1800), a central critical document of English Romanticism. Taken together, both essays clearly look back to the Elizabethan controversy sparked by Stephen Gosson’s School of Abuse (1579), an angry attack on poetry that provoked Sir Philip Sidney to write his famous Defence of Poesy (1595). Where Gosson takes the moralistic line of puritanism, however, Peacock argues from the bloodlessly practical perspective of utilitarianism. What makes Shelley’s reply so effective is that it, too, proceeds from the principle of utility—albeit a much less reductive version.

Like Peacock’s essay, which traces poetry’s decline as a cultural force from its vital role in primitive heroic cultures to its puerile decadence at present, Shelley’s “Defence” is conceived on the model of the Enlightenment cultural survey. It starts out from the premise that “poetry is connate with the origin of man,” arguing for the priority of imagination over reason. Shelley’s method is by turns logical and declamatory, alternating rational exposition (“Reason is the enumeration of quantities already known; imagination is the perception of the value of those quantities, both separately and as a whole”) with rhetorical figures (“Reason is to imagination as the instrument to the agent, as the body to the spirit, as the shadow to the substance”). Shelley uses the term “poet” in its broadest sense as an originator of knowledge, a category necessarily including “all the authors of revolutions in opinion.” This argument—that it is through new figures of speech, new modalities of language, that new ways of thinking emerge—is what validates the heightened, declamatory language employed in the essay by Shelley when he speaks in the persona of the legislator/seer the essay itself celebrates: “[Poetry] is at once the centre and circumference of knowledge; it is that which comprehends all science, and that to which all science must be referred. It is at the same time the root and blossom of all other systems of thought; it is that from which all spring, and that which adorns all.” Rather than arguing against utility, then, the essay argues against a narrow conception of utility, and awards the civic laurel to poetry in the service of a higher utility.

JAMES MULVIHILL

Biography

Born 4 August 1792 at Field Place, near Horsham, Sussex. Studied at Syon House Academy, Isleworth, Middlesex, 1801–04; Eton College, Berkshire, 1804–10; University College, Oxford, 1810–11: expelled for the pamphlet The Necessity of Atheism. Eloped with Harriet Westbrook, and married, 1811 (died, 1816): one daughter and one son. Visited Ireland, 1812; lived in Lynmouth, Devon, Tremadoc, Wales, near Windsor, and on the continent, 1812–15. Left Harriet Westbrook for Mary Wollstonecraft Godwin (i.e. the writer Mary Shelley), daughter of William Godwin and Mary Wollstonecraft, 1814, and married her after Westbrook’s death, 1816: two sons and one daughter. Lived in Geneva, 1816, Great Marlow, Buckinghamshire, 1817, and Italy, from 1818. Drowned in a sailing accident in the Mediterranean, in the Gulf of Spezia near Lerici, 8 July 1822.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Essays, Letters from Abroad, Translations, and Fragments, edited by Mary Shelley, 2 vols., 1840

The Prose Works, edited by H.Buxton Forman, 4 vols., 1880

Prose Works, edited by Richard Herne Shepherd, 2 vols., 1888

Shelley’s Prose, or, The Trumpet of a Prophecy, edited by David Lee Clark, 1954; corrected edition, 1988

Selected Poetry and Prose, edited by Alasdair D.F.Macrae, 1991

The Necessity of Atheism, and Other Essays, 1993

The Prose Works, vol. 1, edited by E.B. Murray, 1993

Poems and Prose, edited by Timothy Webb and George E. Donaldson, 1995

Other writings: poetry, two romances, and the verse drama Prometheus Unbound (1820).

Collected works editions: The Complete Works, edited by Roger Ingpen and Walter Edwin Peck, 10 vols., 1926–30; The Bodleian Shelley Manuscripts, editor-in-chief Donald H.Reiman, 21 vols., 1986–95.

Bibliographies

Dunbar, Clement, A Bibliography of Shelley Studies, 1823–1950, New York: Garland, 1976

- Engelberg, Karsten Klejs, The Making of the Shelley Myth: An Annotated Bibliography of Criticism of Percy Bysshe Shelley 1822–1860, London: Mansell, and Westport, Connecticut: Meckler, 1988
- Erdman, David, The Romantic Movement: A Selective and Critical Bibliography, New York: Garland, 10 vols., 1982– (in progress)

Further Reading

- Cameron, Kenneth Neill, The Young Shelley: Genesis of a Radical, New York: Macmillan, 1950; London: Gollancz, 1951
- Cameron, Kenneth Neill, Shelley: The Golden Years, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1974
- Dawson, P.M.S., The Unacknowledged Legislator: Shelley and Politics, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1980
- Delisle, Fanny, A Study of Shelley's A Defence of Poetry: A Textual and Critical Evaluation, Salzburg: University of Salzburg Institute for English Language and Literature, 1974
- Hoagwood, Terence Allan, Skepticism and Ideology: Shelley's Political Prose and Its Philosophical Context from Bacon to Marx, Iowa City: University of Iowa Press, 1988
- Keach, William, Shelley's Style, New York: Methuen, 1984
- Scrivener, Michael, Radical Shelley: The Philosophical Anarchism and Utopian Thought of Percy Bysshe Shelley, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1982
- Verkoren, Lucas, A Study of Shelley's Defence of Poetry: Its Origin, Textual History, Sources, and Significance, New York: Haskell House, 1970 (original edition, 1937)

Shestov, Lev

Russian, 1866–1938

Perhaps the greatest stylist among Russian philosophers, Lev Shestov was in the main a writer of essays. His earliest works—Shakespeare i ego kritik Brandes (1898; Shakespeare and his critic Brandes), Dobro v uchenii Gr. Tolstogo i Nietzsche filosofii i propoved' (1900; “The Good in the Teaching of Tolstoy and Nietzsche: Philosophy and Preaching”), and Dostoevskii i Nietzsche: Filosofii tragedii (1903; “Dostoevsky and Nietzsche: The Philosophy of Tragedy”)—bridged the disciplines of philosophy and literary criticism. Shestov’s first fully philosophical work, Apofeoz bespochvennosti (1905; The apotheosis of groundlessness, translated as All Things Are Possible), is, like much of his subsequent philosophical writing, comprised of small aphoristic clusters, similar to those in Nietzsche’s Der Antichrist (1895; The Antichrist) or Morgenröthe (1881; The Dawn of Day), and contains brief essays of under five pages in length. All Things Are Possible reveals Shestov’s major theme: belief in the revelation of a divine mystical being who can be known only through faith, which for Shestov “is not a lower form of cognition.” Shestov conceives of the history of Western philosophy as the struggle between Athens—the rationalizing, secularizing spirit from Aristotle, through Thomas Aquinas, Descartes, Spinoza, Leibniz, Kant, and Hegel, and including materialist positivism and Marxism—and Jerusalem—the mystical faith in the God revealed in the Old and New Testaments.

Many of Shestov's early essays were collected in the books Nachala i kontsii (1908; Beginnings and endings, translated as Penultimate Words and Other Essays) and Velikie kanunii (1910; Great vigils). Vlast' kliuchei: Potestas clavium (1923; The power of the keys, translated as Potestas Clavium) was the first collection of Shestov's essays to appear abroad and was followed by a host of essays in the Parisian émigré journals Sovremennye Zapiski (Contemporary notes) and Russkie Zapiski (Russian notes). His late books Na vesakh lova (1929; In Job's Balances), Kierkegaard i eksistentsialnaia filosofii (1939; Kierkegaard and the Existential Philosophy), and Afiny i Ierusalim (wr. 1938, pub. 1951; Athens and Jerusalem) reiterate ideas that were already present in Shestov's earlier work, but are generally considered more dialectical and cogent presentations of those same views.

Shestov called attention to his own affinities with existentialism and has been classified as an existentialist, most notably by Nikolai Berdiaev. This is because he assumes the viewpoint of the human individual and champions his unhindered search for truth over and against any and all rational laws and ideological systems, be they materialist-positivistic, rational ethics, or rationalized religion—from Spinoza to Solov'ev. Shestov, of course, does not reject the knowledge of modern science for practical life, but dismisses it as totally useless for man's spiritual quest. His anti-moralist stance was evident in his early book on Lev Tolstoi and Friedrich Nietzsche, where he takes the side of the German thinker against Tolstoyan "preaching."

Despite the frequent label of "existentialist" and the influence he undoubtedly exerted on both Christian and atheistic existentialist philosophers in France, where he taught at the Sorbonne for many years, there is ample reason to view Shestov's thought as even more theocentric than man-centered. The shape of Shestov's own philosophical quest led him to focus primarily on God, specifically on defending the mystical God of his "Jerusalem" from philosophy's rationalist constructions. Anything anthroposophizing in relation to God is demeaning and inadequate, including all the constructions of Western philosophy. With God and for God literally "all things are possible"; all the laws of science can be invalidated at any moment. God can be felt and "known" only by nonrationalist, mystical means. Zenkovsky (in A History of Russian Philosophy, 1953) has characterized Shestov as "a believing consciousness, rare for its sustained and lucid quality." The sympathetic reader of Shestov will discover writing focused on the utter "otherness" and mystical nature of the deity and the ways of knowing God. Shestov provokes more interest in God and the things beyond immediate experience than most existentialist writers, even religious ones.

Philosophically an irrationalist like Nietzsche, or rather an anti-rationalist, Shestov uses a highly rational and clear discourse to demolish rationalism and its necessary laws in any and all forms he finds in the history of human thought. Unlike his irrationalist contemporary in Russia, Vasilii Rozanov, Shestov does not resort to poetic lines, prose poetry, illogicality, or mystical whimsicality. A mystical thinker at base, he uses razor-sharp logic to demolish, piece by piece, the manifold tenets of the whole Western philosophical tradition. Shestov's statements are striking and bold, often formulated as paradoxes. Yet there is a constant tension between his clear, logical, rational language and the actual thoughts expressed. Zenkovsky sees Shestov in the grips of rationalism, struggling against its hold upon him throughout his life. In In Job's Balances Shestov writes, "One can and must sacrifice everything to find God." Zenkovsky describes the philosopher as sacrificing the baggage of Western philosophical culture on the altar of his mystical faith.

The fact that his discourse is constantly calling attention to its own inadequacy, and the harm caused by the tradition from which such language derives, makes Shestov's work stronger in negation than in affirmation. All his works deal overwhelmingly with the destruction of what is inadequate to express the mystical positive content of revelation; however, they come up short as expressors of his positive faith.

It appears that Shestov accepted the revelations of the Old and New Testaments and felt that religion and philosophy must begin from the mystical truth revealed in the Bible. Shestov wishes to free man not only from rationalism, but also for his own creative spiritual activity. Divulging the positive content of Shestov's own mystical faith, even if it were possible in rational discourse, would counter one of the main purposes of his writing. He wishes to provoke creative religious thought in others, not supplant their old customary ways of thinking with an explicit philosophy of his own. In this he is like Nietzsche who wanted to make man aware of his radical freedom from the strictures of dogmatic Christianity and its morality.

To his credit, Shestov has an uncanny ability to see rationalism and its delimiting power in writers and systems that are not usually thought of in such terms. He is ever pitting the individual against the idea and defending God from human definition. Thus in his article "Procheskii dar. k dvadtsatipiatiletiu smerti Dostoevskogo" (1908; "The Gift of Prophecy: For the 25th Anniversary of Dostoevsky's Death") he attacks Dostoevskii, much as Nietzsche had, for his retreat from irrational "Truth" into a web of Orthodox and nationalist constructs. His essay on Anton Chekhov, the "poet of hopelessness," "Tvorchestvo iz nichego: A.P.Chekhov" (1908; "Creation from Nothing"), shows the pessimistic side of a thoroughgoing hatred of ideology. There are few societal or religious-moral sacred cows which escape Shestov's powerful and often ironic attack, for any rational system, even rationalized religion, is faithless secularism for Shestov.

ANNA LISA CRONE

Biography

Born Lev Isaakovich Shwarzmann, 13 February 1866 in Kiev. Studied mathematics, then law at Moscow University, 1884–89; University of Kiev, degree in law, 1889. Managed the family textile business, 1892–94. Went abroad, 1896, living in Italy and Switzerland, 1897–1914. Married Anna Eleasarovna Beresovskii, 1897: two daughters. Lived in Moscow, 1914–18; professor of philosophy, University of Kiev, 1918–19. Moved to Switzerland, 1920, then Paris, 1921. Member, Russian Academic Group, Paris, from 1921; Professor of Russian, Institut d'Études Slaves, the Sorbonne, Paris, from 1922.

Died in Paris, 20 November 1938.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Shakespeare i ego kritik Brandes, 1898

Dobro v uchenii Gr. Tolstogo i Nietzsche filozofii i propoved', 1900; as "The Good in the Teaching of Tolstoy and Nietzsche: Philosophy and Preaching," translated by Bernard Martin, in Dostoevsky, Tolstoy and Nietzsche, 1969

Dostoevskii i Nietzsche: Filozofii tragedii, 1903; as "Dostoevsky and Nietzsche: The Philosophy of Tragedy," translated by Bernard Martin, in Dostoevsky, Tolstoy and Nietzsche, 1969

Apofeoz bespochvennosti, 1905; as All Things Are Possible, translated by S.S.Koteliansky, 1920

Nachala i kontsii, 1908; as Anton Tchekhov and Other Essays, 1916, as Penultimate Words and Other Essays, 1916, and as Chekhov and Other Essays, 1966

Velikie kanunii, 1910

Vlast' kliuchei: Potestas clavium, 1923; as Potestas Clavium, translated by Bernard Martin, 1968

Na vesakh lova, 1929; as In Job's Balances: On the Sources of the Eternal Truths, translated by Camilla Coventry and C.A. Macartney, 1932

Kierkegaard i eksistentsialnaia filozofii, 1939; as Kierkegaard and the Existential Philosophy, translated by Elinor Hewitt, 1969

Afiny i Ierusalim, 1951; as Athens and Jerusalem, translated by Bernard Martin, 1966

Umozrenie i oktrovenie: Religioznaia filozofia Vladimira Solov'eva i drugie statii, 1964; as Speculation and Revelation, translated by Bernard Martin, 1982

Tolko veroi—Sola fide, 1966

Dostoevsky, Tolstoy and Nietzsche, translated by Bernard Martin, 1969

A Shestov Anthology, edited by Bernard Martin, 1970

Collected works edition: Sochineniia, edited by A.V.Akhutina, 2 vols., 1993.

Bibliographies

Baranoff, Nathalie, Bibliographie des oeuvres de Léon Chestov, Paris: Institut d'Études Slaves, 1975

Baranoff, Nathalie, Bibliographie des études sur Léon Chestov, Paris: Institut d'Études Slaves, 1978

Further Reading

Baranoff, Nathalie, Vie de Léon Chestov, Paris: La Différence, 2 vols., 1991–93

Davison, R.M., "Lev Shestov: An Assessment," Journal of European Studies 11, no. 4 (December 1981): 279–94

Jones, Malcolm, "Shestov on Chekhov," in Russian Writers on Russian Writers, edited by Faith Wigzell and Robin Aizlewood, Oxford: Berg, 1994

- Kline, George L., "Religious Existentialisms: Shestov and Berdyaev," in his Religious and Antireligious Thought in Russia, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1968
- Patterson, David, "Shestov's Second Dimension," Slavic and East European Journal 22 (1978): 141–52
- Shein, Louis J., The Philosophy of Lev Shestov (1866–1938): A Russian Religious Existentialist, Lampeter, Dyfed and Lewiston, New York: Edwin Mellen Press, 1991
- Valevičius, Andrius, Lev Shestov and His Times: Encounters with Brandes, Tolstoy, Dostoevsky, Chekhov, Ibsen, Nietzsche and Husserl, New York: Lang, 1993
- Wernham, James, Two Russian Thinkers: An Essay in Berdyaev and Shestov, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1968

Shklovskii, Viktor

Russian, 1893–1984

Viktor Shklovskii began his career as a futurist. Strongly attracted to the poetry of Vladimir Maiakovskii and Velimir Khlebnikov, he enthusiastically joined their crusade against the tenets of realism and symbolism. In his essay entitled Voskreshenie slova (1914; "Resurrection of the Word"), Shklovskii provided a theoretical basis for the work of the futurists, advancing the idea that futurist poetry emancipated words from their traditional significance and restored them to perceptibility by calling attention to their sounds. This essay is usually regarded as the cornerstone of the movement eventually known as Russian formalism.

Shklovskii showed the essay to the eminent scholar Baudouin de Courtenay, who introduced Shklovskii to his most brilliant linguistics students, Lev Iakubinskii and Evgenii Polivanov. Tired of analyzing ancient texts, they were intrigued by the possibility of applying their techniques to the language of futurist poetry. Together with Shklovskii they formed the nucleus of Opoiav (Society for the study of poetic language), and were subsequently joined by Osip Brik, Boris Eikhenbaum, and Iurii Tynianov. Before long, the group's interest in futurist poetry broadened into an interest in the specific nature of verse language as a whole. Collections of their essays were published in 1916, 1917, and 1919. The 1919 collection contained Shklovskii's seminal articles "Iskusstvo kak priem" (Art as device) and "Sviaz' suzhetnykh priemov s obshchimi priemami stilii" (The connection between plot devices and general stylistic devices), in which he enunciated the theoretical principles that laid the foundation for the formalist school of criticism.

Next Shklovskii set out to rescue literature from the critics who insisted on treating it as a mirror of society or the author's life. Discarding the conventional dichotomy of form and content, he substituted the dichotomy of form and material. He insisted that a work of literature, in all its component parts—hero, plot, motif—is form and only form. In one of the provocative formulations for which he was famous, he proclaimed, "A work of literature does not exceed the sum of its stylistic devices."

Literature restores outworn words, objects, and genres to perceptibility. To describe that process, Shklovskii coined two terms that subsequently gained wide currency: ostranenie (estrangement) and zatrudnennoe postroenie (obstructed form). Estrangement includes all the techniques by which a writer renders the material unfamiliar, such as the use of a peculiar narrative viewpoint (e.g. a child or a horse); obstructed form refers to the process by which a writer dismantles the material and arranges it into conspicuous verbal patterns.

In his essay on Vasilii Rozanov (1921), Shklovskii completed his theoretical edifice with a new hypothesis about the dynamics of literary history that drew upon his theory of perception. At any given time, literary forms exist in a complex hierarchy. As a dominant form ceases to elicit perception, it is replaced by one of the subordinate forms in the hierarchy. In other words, a major new writer originates not from the dominant predecessor, but from the minor genres and writers in the literary hierarchy of the time. As Shklovskii phrased it, "In the history of art, the legacy is transmitted not from father to son, but from uncle to nephew."

The seminal essays Shklovskii produced after the Revolution were collected in his landmark book, O teorii prozy (1925, 1929; Theory of Prose). He found in the work of Rozanov, Laurence Sterne, and Andrei Belyi not only ideal subjects for his theories, but models for his own prose. Influenced by Rozanov's rebellion against "tidy," cohesive literature, Shklovskii cultivated a deliberate stylistic and compositional nonchalance: a conversational tone, the use of ironic epigraphs, and a cavalier disregard of logical composition. Sterne taught him numerous methods for distorting the proportions of a work by using chronological shifts and digressions. From Belyi, Shklovskii learned how to lay bare the components of a work and to unify those components with a substratum of repeated images.

In his style Shklovskii obtained striking effects in a variety of ways. He interspersed literary language with slang and conversational idioms. He chose images that juxtaposed startlingly dissimilar items. He renounced the paragraph as a means of organizing a cluster of related material: instead, he either assembled incongruous ideas in the same paragraph or resorted to the one-sentence paragraph, which became his trademark.

After the Revolution, Shklovskii propagated the doctrines of formalism in countless essays and lectures, working with special intensity as mentor to a brilliant group of young writers who called themselves the Serapion Brothers. Threatened by arrest for his heretical views and activities, he fled to Berlin in Spring 1922. There he published an essay on Charlie Chaplin and a book called Literatura i kinematograf (1923; Literature and cinematography), in which he applied his theories about literature to the new medium. After his return to the Soviet Union in Fall 1923, he worked closely with the important film directors of the 1920s, especially Sergei Eisenstein, whose theories of montage owe something to Shklovskii's influence.

During the late 1910s, as the Communist Party imposed tight controls on art and literature, Shklovskii abandoned his early insistence on intricate forms and irony. Invoking his theory of perception, he asserted that the new Russian reader had ceased to respond to those forms and now preferred documentary literature. Accordingly, Shklovskii led the exploration and refinement of such genres as the newspaper article, the feuilleton, and the essay—forms that would dominate the Russian literary scene during the 1930s. He retained his much maligned dedication to formal analysis, but enlarged his scope to include the impact of society on the formation of literature.

In 1930 Shklovskii published his controversial essay “Pamiatnik nauchnoi oshibke” (A monument to scientific error), which has been widely misinterpreted as his unconditional surrender to the Party’s demand for orthodoxy in art. In fact, this essay took the position that the charges against the formalists apply only to the initial stage of their movement. Shklovskii argued that after 1924, the formalists evolved a more sophisticated approach to literature that included recognition of social and economic factors. He concluded the essay by flatly refusing to declare himself a Marxist.

Throughout the 1930s, 1940s, and 1950s, Shklovskii was pilloried by Marxist critics for his alleged adherence to the heresies of formalism. Finally, however, he was able to publish his critical masterpiece, Khudozhestvennaia proza: Razmyshleniia i razbory (1959, 1961; Artistic prose: reflections and analyses), in which he re-established himself as a superb comparatist with a series of essays on his old favorites: Shakespeare, Boccaccio, Cervantes, Fielding, Sterne, and Dickens, along with the Russian writers Tolstoi, Chekhov, and Sholokhov. In 1966, Shklovskii expanded this book by adding essays on Gogol’, Pushkin, and Dostoevskii and changing the title to Povesti o proze: Razmyshleniia i razbory (Tales about prose: reflections and analyses).

In 1970, at the age of 77, Shklovskii published Tetiva: O neskhodstve skhodnogo (Bowstring: on the dissimilarity of the similar), which one reviewer described as “the champagne of criticism” (TLS, 15 October 1971). In this book Shklovskii moved beyond the confines of the individual text into a sort of meditation on the essence of literature: the sources of unity, the shaping role of the author, the tension between component parts, and the deformation of fact by literary form.

The revolution Shklovskii led against hackneyed language, form, and thought in all the arts made a powerful contribution to the brilliant achievements of Russian art during the early part of the 20th century. He also left an indelible imprint on the schools of criticism that followed Russian formalism.

RICHARD SHELDON

Biography

Viktor Borisovich Shklovskii. Born in St. Petersburg, 6 February 1893. Studied philology at St. Petersburg University. Married Vasilisa Kordi, 1909 (later divorced): two children. Cofounding member, Opoiiaz (Society for the study of poetic language), 1916. Joined the Social Revolutionaries and fought against both the White Guard and the Bolsheviks during the Civil War, 1917. Professor, Institute of Art History, St. Petersburg, 1920–21. Fled to Berlin to avoid arrest for anti-Bolshevik activities, Spring 1922; after receiving an amnesty, returned to Russia, Fall 1923, and settled in Moscow, where he spent the rest of his life. Never forgiven by the Communist Party for his activities, both literary and nonliterary, during the 1920s. Hounded by the Marxist critics virtually all his life. War correspondent during World War II; consultant to Sergei Eisenstein in the making of the film Ivan the Terrible, 1944. Married Serafima Narbut after World War II. Awards: State Prize, 1979. Died in Moscow, 5 December 1984.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

- Voskreshenie slova*, 1914; as “Resurrection of the Word,” translated by Richard Sherwood, in Russian Formalism, edited by Stephen Bann and John E. Bowlit, 1973:41–47
- Rozanov*, 1921; as “Plotless Prose: Vasilii Rozanov,” translated by Richard Sheldon, Poetics Journal 1 (January 1982): 3–23
- Razvertyvanie priema* (The elaboration of the device), 1921
- Tristram Shendi Sterna i teoriia romana*, 1921; as “Sterne’s Tristram Shandy and the Theory of the Novel,” translated by Richard Sheldon, Review of Contemporary Fiction (Spring 1981): 190–211
- Khod konia*, 1923
- Literatura i kinematograf*, 1923
- O teorii prozy*, 1925; revised, enlarged edition, 1929; as Theory of Prose, translated by Benjamin Sher, 1990
- Udachi i porazheniia Maksima Gor’kogo* (Successes and failures of Maksim Gor’kii), 1926
- Piat’ chelovek znakomykh* (Five acquaintances), 1927
- Tekhnika pisatel’skogo remesla* (The technical devices of the writer’s craft), 1927
- Gamburgskii schet* (Hamburg account), 1928
- Mater’ial i stil’ v rotmane L’va Tolstogo Voina i mir* (Material and style in Lev Tolstoi’s novel “War and Peace”), 1928
- Matvei Komarov: Zhitel’ goroda Moskvy* (Matvei Komarov: inhabitant of the city of Moscow), 1929
- Kratkaia no dostovernaiia povest’ o dvorianine Bolotove* (A short but reliable tale about the nobleman Bolotov), 1930
- Podenshchina* (Day labor), 1930
- Poiski optimizma* (In search of optimism), 1931
- Chulkov i Levshin* (Chulkov and Levshin), 1933
- Zhizn’ khudozhnika Fedotova* (The life of the artist Fedotov), 1936
- Kapitan Fedotov* (Captain Fedotov), 1936
- Marko Polo*, 1936; revised edition, in Istoricheskie povesti i rasskazy, 1958; revised edition, as Zemli razvedchik (Marko Polo), 1969; revised edition, in Sobranie sochinenii, vol. 2, 1974
- Zametki o proze Pushkina* (Remarks on Pushkin’s prose), 1937
- Dnevnik* (Diary), 1939
- O Maiakovskom* (About Maiakovskii), 1940; revised edition, in Sobranie sochinenii, vol. 3, 1974; as Maiakovskii and His Circle, translated by Lily Feiler, 1972
- Minin i Pozharskii* (Minin and Pozharskii), 1940
- Vstrechi* (Encounters), 1944
- O masterakh starinnykh* (About the masters of old), 1951; revised, enlarged edition, 1953
- Zametki o proze russkikh klassikov: O proizvedeniiakh Pushkina, Gogolia, Lermontova, Turgeneva, Tolstogo, Chekhova* (Remarks on the prose of the Russian classics), 1953; revised, enlarged edition, 1955
- Povest’ o khudozhnike Fedotove* (A tale about the artist Fedotov), 1955; revised edition, in Istoricheskie povesti i rasskazy, 1958; revised, enlarged edition, 1965

- Za i protiv: Zametki o Dostoevskom* (Pro and con: remarks on Dostoevskii), 1957; revised edition, in Sobranie sochinenii, vol. 3, 1974
- Istoricheskie povesti i rasskazy* (Historical tales and sketches), 1958
- Khudozhestvennaia proza: Razmyshleniia i razbory*, 1959; revised, enlarged edition, 1961; enlarged edition, as Povesti o proze: Razmyshleniia i razbory, 2 vols., 1966
- Zhili-byli: Vospominaniia, memuarnye zapisi, povesti o vremeni: S kontsa XIX veka po 1962* (Once upon a time: reminiscences, memorial notes, tales about the era), 1964; revised, enlarged edition, 1966
- Za sorok let: Stat'i o kino* (In the course of 40 years: articles about film), 1965
- Staroe i novoe; Kniga stat'ei o detskoj literature* (The old and the new: a book of articles about children's literature), 1966
- Tetiva: O neskhodstve skhodnogo*, 1970
- Eizenshtein*, 1973
- Energiia zabluzhdeniia: Kniga o siuzhete* (The energy of delusion: a book about plot), 1981
- Za shest'desiat let: Raboty o kino* (In the course of 60 years: pieces on film), 1985
- Gamburgskii schet: Stat'i, vospominaniia, esse (1914–1933)* (Hamburg account: articles, reminiscences, essays), 1990
- Other writings: experimental memoirs (including Zoo: Pis'ma ne olyubvi, ili Tret'ya Eloiza [Zoo, or Letters Not About Love], 1923; Sentimental'noe puteshestvie: vospominaniia 1917–1922 [A Sentimental Journey], 1923), over two dozen screenplays, and a biography of Lev Tolstoi (1963–67).
- Collected works edition: Sobranie sochinenii, 3 vols., 1973–74.

Bibliographies

- Berman, D.A., and L.A.Verolainen, "Viktor Borisovich Shklovskii," in Russkie sovetskie prozaiki, vol. 6, pt. 1, Moscow: Kniga, 1969:229–89
- Galushkin, A.Yu., "Novye materialy k bibliografii V.B. Shklovskogo," De Visu 1 (January 1993): 64–77
- Sheldon, Richard, Viktor Shklovskii: An International Bibliography of Works by and About Him, Ann Arbor, Michigan: Ardis, 1977

Further Reading

- Galan, F.M., "Film as Poetry and Prose: Viktor Shklovskii's Contribution to the Poetics of Cinema," Essays in Poetics 9 (1984):95–104
- Gifford, Henry, "Viktor Shklovskii," Grand Street (Autumn 1988): 94–110
- Grits, Teodor, "The Work of Viktor Shklovskii," in Third Factory by Shklovskii, Ann Arbor, Michigan: Ardis, 1977:91–121 (original edition, 1927)
- Haber, Edythe C., "Bulgakov and Shklovskii: Notes on a Literary Antagonism," in New Studies in Russian Language and Literature, edited by Anna Lisa Crone and Catherine V.Chvany, Columbus, Ohio: Slavica, 1987:151–58
- Mitchell, Stanley, "From Shklovskii to Brecht: Some Preliminary Remarks Toward a History of the Politicization of Russian Formalism," Screen 15 (Summer 1974):74–80; see also Ben Brewster's article, "From Shklovskii to Brecht: A Reply": 81–102

- Nicholas, Mary A., "Formalist Theory Revisited: On Shklovskii's 'On Pil'nyak'," Slavic and East European Journal 36, no. 1 (Spring 1992):68–83
- Segre, Cesare, "Viktor Shklovskii, or the Structures of Pity," in Semiotics and Literary Criticism, The Hague: Mouton, 1973: 133–44
- Sheldon, Richard, "Shklovskii, Gor'kii and the Serapion Brothers," Slavic and East European Journal 12, no. 1 (Spring 1968): 1–13
- Sheldon, Richard, "Making Armored Cars and Novels: A Literary Introduction," in A Sentimental Journey by Shklovskii, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1984:ix-xxv (original edition, 1970)
- Sheldon, Richard, Introduction to Zoo, or Letters Not About Love by Shklovskii, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1971: xiii–xxxiii
- Sheldon, Richard, "The Formalist Poetics of Viktor Shkovskii," Russian Literature Tri-Quarterly 2 (Winter 1972):351–71
- Sheldon, Richard, "Viktor Shklovskii and the Device of Ostensible Surrender," Slavic Review 34, no. 1 (March 1975):86–108
- Sheldon, Richard, "Shklovskii and Mandelshtam," in Russian and Slavic Literature, edited by Richard Freeborn, R.R.MilnerGulland, and Charles A.Ward, Coiumbus, Ohio: Slavica, 1976: 396–406
- Sheldon, Richard, "The Itinerary of Viktor Shklovskii's A Sentimental Journey" in Norwich Symposia on Russian Literature and Culture, vol. 3, Northfield, Vermont: The Russian School, forthcoming
- Sherwood, Richard, "Viktor Shklovskii and the Development of Early Formalist Theory on Prose Literature," in Russian Formalism, edited by Stephen Bann and John E.Bowl, Edinburgh: Scottish Academic Press, and New York: Barnes and Noble, 1973:26–40
- Steiner, Peter, "The Praxis of Irony: Viktor Shklovskii's Zoo," in Russian Formalism, a Retrospective Glance: A Festschrift in Honor of Victor Erlich, edited by Robert Louis Jackson and Stephen Rudy, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Center for International and Area Studies, 1985
- Thompson, Ewa M., "V. Shklovskii and the Russian Intellectual Tradition," in Aspects of Modern Russian and Czech Culture, edited by Arnold McMillin, Columbus, Ohio: Slavica, 1989

Simmel, Georg

German, 1858–1918

Georg Simmel belongs, together with Emile Durkheim and Max Weber, to the founding fathers of modern sociology. From the 1890s onward, the essay plays a prominent role in his work. In addition to a rich production of essays published in newspapers, magazines, and journals, Simmel's academic writings illustrate the central role the essay assumes in his new method of sociology. Suspicious of system-building tendencies, Simmel fashions the essay into the suitable genre for his thought. Combining a Nietzschean critique of culture with a fin-de-siècle sensibility for symbolism and the wary postKantian soberness that outlines the aesthetics of Neue Sachlichkeit (new objectivism), he engages in a search for the typical forms of social interaction.

Given the fragmentary, fluid, and dynamic nature of the social sphere, Simmel argues that sociology can gain a firm hold of its subject only if its aesthetic qualities receive due attention. Sociology as a discipline must, therefore, methodologically reflect the aesthetic moment in the production of knowledge. Sociology, then, is not so much a science that depends on new facts; rather, in reconstructing the rules of their social relevance, it reinterprets facts critically. Less interested in society (Gesellschaft) per se, sociological reflection attends to the laws of association that form social relations (Vergesellschaftung). “Drawing a new line through the facts which are otherwise well known” creates perspectives which lead to new interpretations of the laws that govern social relations.

Looking at the dynamic, ever-differentiating process of social associations, Simmel distinguishes the content from the form of social interactions. While recognition of social forms reveals the laws of interhuman action, the distinction between content and form operates in areas where there are no fixed rules. Instead, aesthetic intuition leads the way to discovery. Any attempt at laying bare “pure forms of human behavior” hinges, therefore, on an “intuitive procedure,” i.e. “a special focus of the gaze.” Consequently, even Simmel’s textbook study Soziologie (1908; Sociology) is replete with fragments woven into a text that combines precise observations of the trivial with high-powered theorizing. Instead of a system, this approach offers vistas and highlights where the forms of associations that inform social experience appear in sharp profile: “...human association is continuously constituted, dissolved and constituted anew, a perpetual flowing and pulsating that concatenates the individuals.” Because instances of individual behavior represent crystallized forms of social interdependences, the method of knowledge production itself must reflect this. In describing the dynamics of human relations in their diverse, expanding, and often conflicting paths, Simmel reflects at the same time on the method with which to tackle the restless fluidity of the social sphere: “At every moment such threads are spun, dropped, resumed, replaced, and intenvoven with others.” This is exactly how Simmel’s essays themselves proceed.

The specificity of the individual event, sign, interaction, or exchange is, as a part, always connected to the whole, which it represents in its own manner. This unity of the social sphere, tentative and precarious as it may be, provides in all its fragility a common denominator for interpreting social laws. The essay takes advantage of this epistemological given as it launches an analysis that feeds off the unified but open-ended nature of human experience. It knows itself to be carried by the recognition that “from each point on the surface of existence—however closely attached to the surface it might seem—one may drop a sounding into the depths of the psyche so that almost all the most banal externalities of life finally are connected with the ultimate decisions concerning the meaning and style of life.”

This new approach redefines the scope of the essay. A whole new range of phenomena now comes into focus. Fashion, coquetry, conversation, communication, secrecy, discretion, competition, subordination, thankfulness, loyalty, jewelry, poverty, gender, acting, and landscapes and cityscapes now all become objects of the sociologist’s concern. In his essays on the handle, the bridge and the door, the rose, money, clothing and jewelry, Simmel turns to cultural artifacts which, at the intersection of interhuman relations, highlight the functioning of the social weave. Exposing the purely functional aspects of these social constructions, these essays bring out the formal codes of what constitutes society as a whole. With the bridge that connects the two sides of a river, humans fashion nature in their own minds' image, inscribing social forms onto the landscape. Likewise, the door connects to what it separates; clothing and jewelry expose what they obscure. As a result, social functions rather than the nature and materiality of the world determine human behavior, which thus assimilates everything to its own needs as it casts the categorical net of forms of social associations over the world. Probing the conditions of the possibility of such social associations, Simmel's essays abound with intellectual playfulness. Their self-referential turn relies on the literary nature of the essay.

Simmel's observations on the adventurer, the artist, the stranger, the traveler who enjoys ruins and the Alps, make manifest the essayist as theorist of margins and marginal existence. Like them, he travels the overwhelming realm of experience. His insights are only as good as the categories he brings into play. Like the adventure, the essay enacts the accidental coincidence which—marginal to existence as it may present itself—connects directly to the heart of life. As the continuum of the social sphere expands in all directions, sociology's procedure is the lucky gaze that, directed at infinitely reflecting mirrors, guides an enriched understanding.

Wherever the essay picks up a single thread in the fabric of appearances, it is sure to interconnect with the whole, a kind of "aesthetic pantheism," as Simmel calls it: "Every point contains within itself the potential of being redeemed to absolute aesthetic importance. To the adequately trained eye, the totality of beauty, the complete meaning of the world as a whole, radiates from every single point." With Simmel, the essay thus becomes the genre in which the intellectual and the existential conflict of modernity—the loss of mediation between individual and universal—finds its critical form.

WILLI GOETSCHEL

Biography

Born 1 March 1858 in Berlin. Studied history and psychology at the University of Berlin, Ph.D., 1881. Outside lecturer in philosophy, 1885–1900, and professor extraordinarius, 1900–14, University of Berlin; professor of philosophy, University of Strasbourg, 1914–18. Married Gertrud Kinel, 1890. Died in Strasbourg, 26 September 1918.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Kant: Sechzehn Vorlesungen, 1904

Die Probleme der Geschichtsphilosophie, 1905; as The Problems of the Philosophy of History: An Epistemological Essay, edited and translated by Guy Oakes, 1977

Soziologie, 1908; as The Sociology of Georg Simmel, edited and translated by Kurt

H. Wolff, 1950; part as Conflict, translated by Wolff, and The Web of Group

Affiliations, translated by Reinhard Bendix, 1955

- Philosophische Kultur: Gesammelte Essays*, 1911; revised edition, 1919
Der Krieg und die geistigen Entscheidungen: Reden und Aufsätze, 1917
Lebensanschauung: Vier metaphysische Kapitel, 1918
Schulpädagogik: Vorlesungen, edited by Karl Hauter, 1922
Zur Philosophie der Kunst: Philosophische und kunstphilosophische Aufsätze, 1922
Fragmente und Aufsätze, aus dem Nachlass und Veröffentlichungen der letzten Jahre, edited by Gertrud Kantorowicz, 1923
Brücke und Tür: Essays des Philosophen zur Geschichte, Religion, Kunst, und Gesellschaft, edited by Michael Landmann, 1957; as Das Individuum und die Freiheit, 1984
The Conflict in Modern Culture, and Other Essays, translated by K. Peter Etzkorn, 1968
Das individuelle Gesetz: Philosophische Exkurse, edited by Michael Landmann, 1968
On Individuality and Social Forms: Selected Writings, edited by Donald N. Levine, 1971
Georg Simmel: Sociologist and European (selections), edited by P. A. Lawrence, translated by D.E. Jenkinson, 1976
Essays on Interpretation in Social Science, edited and translated by Guy Oakes, 1980
Vom Wesen der Moderne: Essays zur Philosophie und Ästhetik, edited by Werner Jung, 1990
 Other writings: works on sociology and philosophy (including Philosophie des Geldes
 [The Philosophy of Money], 1900), coquetry, and German writers.
 Collected works editions: Gesammelte Werke, 1958– (in progress); Gesamtausgabe, edited by Otthein Rammstedt, 9 vols., 1988–95 (in progress).

Bibliography

- Gassen, Kurt, Georg Simmel 1858–1918: A Collection of Essays, edited by Kurt H. Wolff,
 Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1959:357–75

Further Reading

- Adorno, Theodor W., Noten zur Literatur, edited by Rolf Tiedemann, Frankfurt-on-Main:
 Suhrkamp, 1981 (original edition, 1958–65)
 Axelrod, Charles D., “Toward an Appreciation of Simmel’s Fragmentary Style,” Sociological Quarterly 18 (1977): 185–96
 Böhringer, Hannes, and Karlfried Griinder, editors, *Ästhetik und Soziologie um die
 Jahrhundertwende: Georg Simmel*, Frankfurt-on-Main: Klostermann, 1976
 Christen, Matthias, “Essayistik und Modernität: Literarische Theoriebildung in Georg Simmels Philosophischer Kultur,” Deutsche Vierteljahrsschrift 66 (1992):129–59 Coser, Lewis A., “Georg Simmel’s Style of Work: A Contribution to the Sociology of the Sociologist,” American Journal of Sociology 63 (1958): 635–40
 Dahme, Heinz-Jürgen, and Otthein Rammstedt, editors, *Georg Simmel und die Moderne:
 Neue Interpretationen und Materialien*, Frankfurt-on-Main: Suhrkamp, 1984
 Davis, Murray S., “Georg Simmel and the Aesthetics of Social Reality,” Social Forces 51
 (1973):320–29
 Frisby, David, Sociological Impressionism: A Reassessment of Georg Simmel’s Social Theory, London: Heinemann, 1981

- Frisby, David, Fragments of Modernity: Theories of Modernity in the Work of Simmel, Kracauer and Benjamin, Cambridge: Polity Press, 1985
- Gassen, Kurt, and Michael Landmann, editors, Buch des Dankes an Georg Simmel: Briefe, Erinnerungen, Bibliographie, Berlin: Duncker & Humblot, 1993 (original edition, 1958)
- Kracauer, Siegfried, Georg Simmel, Das Ornament der Masse, Frankfurt-on-Main: Suhrkamp, 1977
- Liebeschütz, Hans, Von Georg Simmel zu Franz Rosenzweig: Studien zum Jüdischen Denken im deutschen Kulturbereich, Tübingen: Mohr, 1970
- Susman, Margarete, Die geistige Gestalt Georg Simmels, Tübingen: Mohr, 1959
- Weinstein, Deena, and Michael A. Weinstein, Postmodern(ized) Simmel, London and New York: Routledge, 1993

Siniavskii, Andrei

Russian, 1925–1997

The essay played a vital role in the career of Andrei Siniavskii in each of his identities—that of a scholar, writing academic pieces under his own name, and as a belletrist, employing the pseudonym Abram Tertz. The latter pieces, in particular, are intimately connected with his fiction, providing insights about both the technique and the thematic concerns that predominate in his prose.

The critical pieces Siniavskii produced under his own name prior to his 1965 arrest lack the stylistic inventiveness of his stories, but they already reveal him as a probing and sensitive critic, most notably in the long introduction he wrote for a major 1965 collection of Boris Pasternak's poetry. Siniavskii's sensitivity to Pasternak's use of language, as evidenced by his incisive comments on the stylistic and tonal aspects of the poetry, as well as his emphasis on Pasternak's imagery and philosophical concerns, can, in retrospect, be seen as signaling his own interests as a writer. Perhaps surprisingly, much of his early writing was on a stalwart of socialist realism, Maksim Gor'kii, whose final, unfinished novel was the subject of his dissertation, part of which appeared as "O khudozhestvennoi strukture romana Zhizn' Klima Samgina" (1958; On the artistic structure of The Life of Klim Samgin).

Siniavskii's political sympathies during the early 1960s show up more clearly in the attitude he displays to the then current literature. Thus, besides his enthusiastic piece on Pasternak, he offers a warm appreciation of Anna Akhmatova's more recent poetry on the occasion of her 75th birthday ("Raskovannyi golos" [1964; "The Unfettered Voice"]). Conversely, when writing on those who strongly supported the repressive aspects of Soviet literary life, he could be merciless. "O novom sbornike Anatolia Sofronova" (1959; "On a Collection of Verses by Anatoly Sofronov") concludes with an excerpt from Vladimir Maiakovskii's original and powerful poetry of the 1920s to highlight the imitative and pallid nature of Sofronov's verse.

One of the earliest works to be signed Abram Tertz is the programmatic essay "Chto takoe sotsialisticheskii realizm" (1959; On Socialist Realism). Here his lively and witty manner partly masks a very serious purpose: to undermine the dogma that had by then ruled Soviet literature for a quarter of a century. In part he objects to the deadening effect of the realistic manner that was imposed on Soviet writers so that their works would be accessible to the masses, but more broadly he points to logical inconsistencies in the very terminology: why should “realism” necessarily be “socialist”? In fact, he goes on to point out that Marxism (and, by extension, communism) is not unlike a religious movement in its efforts to direct belief, and that by trying to make writing portray a future ideal society its advocates are calling for something that is closer to Romanticism than realism. Further, by forcing writers into a mode that is not of their own making, socialist realism results in simplistic, static, and ultimately uninteresting literature.

Mysli vrasplokh (1965; Unguarded Thoughts), also by “Abram Tertz” in the pre-arrest period, at first resembles a seemingly random collection of ideas and aphorisms, but upon closer inspection turns out to focus on a handful of themes—most notably, the nature of sexuality, which is not treated positively, and belief in God, which is. The work is thus important for treating two topics of concern to Siniavskii/Tertz elsewhere as well, while in both form and content it also signals his interest in the turn-of-the-century philosopher Vasilii Rozanov, later the subject of Siniavskii’s study, “Opavshie list’ia” V.V.Rozanova (1982; Rozanov’s “Fallen Leaves”). Furthermore, the fragmentary structure serves as a precursor of Golos iz khora (1973; A Voice from the Chorus), a much longer work constructed from the material in letters that Siniavskii sent to his wife while in prison. Voice, seen by some critics as a kind of autobiography, contains material based on his prison experience along with his views on literature, the nature of art, and a host of other themes. Siniavskii thus develops what might be termed an “anti-narrative” essay, which freely mingles a variety of forms and jumps seemingly arbitrarily from topic to topic; it requires the reader’s active participation to derive the broader themes and a sense of coherence.

Two other essays published after his emigration to France in 1973, and under the name Abram Tertz, have proved to be Siniavskii’s most controversial: Progulki s Pushkinym (1975; Strolls with Pushkin) and V teni Gogolia (1975; In Gogol’s shadow). The former in particular led to sharp protests by émigré figures in the West when it was first published, and then by Soviet critics when it finally appeared in the Soviet Union during the period of glasnost. Siniavskii’s detractors were disturbed by his iconoclastic treatment of Russia’s greatest writer; what they seemed to miss, or refused to accept, is that a “demythologizing” of Pushkin was precisely the point of the essay: only in this way could Siniavskii discover the essence of Pushkin’s true significance for subsequent literature (and for himself).

The remainder of Siniavskii’s work from his period abroad can be roughly divided into two categories: 1) sociopolitical commentary on the Soviet Union and on current developments in Russian political and intellectual life, and 2) a renewal of his earlier career as literary critic. The latter includes, besides his essay on Rozanov, articles on a wide range of figures in 20th-century Russian literature: Zoshchenko, Remizov, and, once again, Gor’kii, who is now, understandably, treated less reverently than before (cf. “Roman M.Gor’kogo Mat’ kak rannii obrazets sotsialisticheskogo realizma” [1988; Gor’kii’s novel Mother as an early model of socialist realism]). The first group opens with his “Literaturnyi protsess v Rossii” (1974; “The Literary Process in Russia”), in which he notes that the Soviet state's very efforts to control writers had the perverse effect of heightening their influence, often against the state's interests. He has also written about his own experiences as a dissident and about the resurgence of Russian nationalism; several essays in which he attempts to define the essential features of Bolshevism form the basis of his book Soviet Civilization (1990), to date published only in translation.

While on the surface Siniavskii had two identities as an essayist—the relatively straightforward commentary that he signed under his own name and the more literary type of essay that appeared under the pseudonym Abram Tertz—his concerns were similar in both guises: to examine the ideals and strivings of the artist, to explore issues of freedom and oppression, and to understand the nature of the creative urge.

BARRY P.SCHERR

Biography

Andrei Donatovich Siniavskii. Born 8 October 1925 in Moscow. Studied at Moscow University, literature degree, 1949, doctorate, 1952. Married Maria Rozanova-Kruglikova: one son. Senior research fellow, Gor'kii Literary Institute, Moscow, until 1965; lecturer in Russian literature, Moscow University, until 1960, and at the Theater Studio, Moscow Art Theater, until 1965. Reviewer for Novyi Mir, early 1960s. Arrested for supposed anti-Soviet writings published abroad, 1965: sentenced to seven years' hard labor, 1966; released, 1971, and allowed to emigrate to France, 1973. Professor of Russian, the Sorbonne, Paris, 1973–94. Cofounder and coeditor, Sintaxis (Syntax) literary journal and publishing house. Russian citizenship restored, 1990. Died in Paris, 25 February 1997.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

“Chto takoe sotsialisticheski realizm,” 1959; as On Socialist Realism, translated by George Dennis, 1961

“Thought Unaware,” 1965; as Mysli vrasplokh, 1966; as Unguarded Thoughts, translated by Manya Harari, 1971

For Freedom of Imagination, translated by Laszlo Tikos and Murray Peppard, 1971

Golos iz khora, 1973; as A Voice from the Chorus, translated by Kyril FitzLyon and Max Hayward, 1976

Progulki s Pushkinym, 1975; as Strolls with Pushkin, translated by Catharine Theimer Nepomnyashchy and Slava I.Yastremski, 1993

V teni Gogolia, 1975

Soviet Civilization: A Cultural History, translated by Joanne Turnbull, 1990

Other writings: three novels (Sud idet [The Trial Begins], 1960; Liubimov [The Makepeace Experiment], 1963; Spokoinoi nochii [Goodnight!], 1984), a collection of short stories, and a study of Vasilii Rozanov (1982).

Collected works edition: Sobranie sochinenii, 2 vols., 1992.

Further Reading

- Aucoutourier, Michel, "Writer and Text in the Works of Abram Terc (An Ontology of Writing and a Poetics of Prose)," in Fiction and Drama in Eastern and Southeastern Europe: Evolution and Experiment in the Postwar Period, edited by Henrik Birnbaum and Thomas Eekman, Columbus, Ohio: Slavica, 1980
- Dalton, Margaret, Andrei Siniavskii and Julii Daniel': Two Soviet "Heretical" Writers, Würzburg: Jal, 1973
- "A Discussion of Abram Tertz's Book Strolls with Pushkin," Russian Studies in Literature 28, no. 1 (1991–92): 63–88
- Fanger, Donald, "Conflicting Imperatives in the Model of the Russian Writer: The Case of Tertz/Sinyavsky," in Literature and History: Theoretical Problems and Russian Case Studies, edited by Gary Saul Morson, Stanford, California: Stanford University Press, 1986:111–24
- Hayward, Max, Introduction to A Voice from the Chorus by Tertz, New Haven, Connecticut and London: Yale University Press, 1995 (original edition, 1976)
- Holmgren, Beth, "The Transfiguring of Context in the Work of Abram Terts," Slavic Review 50 (1991):965–77
- Kolonosky, Walter F., "Andrei Siniavskii: The Chorus and the Critic," Canadian-American Slavic Studies 9 (1975): 352–60
- Levitt, Marcus C, "Siniavskii's Alternative Autobiography: A Voice from the Chorus," Canadian Slavonic Papers 33, no. 1 (1991): 46–61
- Lourie, Richard, Letters to the Future: An Approach to Sinyavsky/Tertz, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1975
- Murav, Harriet, "The Case Against Andrei Siniavskii: The Letter and the Law," Russian Review 53 (1994):549–60
- Nepomnyashchy, Catharine Theimer, Introduction to Strolls with Pushkin by Siniavskii (Abram Tertz), New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1993
- Nepomnyashchy, Catharine Theimer, Abram Tertz and the Poetics of Crime, New Haven, Connecticut and London: Yale University Press, 1995
- Nussbaum, Andrew J., "Literary Selves: The Tertz-Sinyavsky Dialogue," in Autobiographical Statements in Twentieth-Century Russian Literature, edited by Jane Gary Harris, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1990:238–59
- Pomerants, G., "Urok medlennogo chteniia," Oktiabr' 6 (1993): 178–83
- Rozanova, Mariia, "On the History and Geography of This Book [Strolls with Pushkin]," Russian Studies in Literature 28, no. 1 (1991–92):89–98
- Rubinshtein, Natalia, "Abram Terts i Aleksandr Pushkin," Vremia i My 9 (1976):118–33
- Sandler, Stephanie, "Sex, Death and Nation in the Strolls with Pushkin Controversy," Slavic Review 51 (1992):294–308
- Shafarevich, Igor', "The Emigration Phenomenon," Russian Studies in Literature 28, no. 1 (1991–92): 45–55
- Solzhenitsyn, Aleksandr, "...Koleblet tvoi trenozhnik," Vestnik Russkogo Khristianskogo Dvizheniia 142 (1984): 133–52
- Tikos, Laszlo, and Murray Peppard, Introduction to For Freedom of Imagination by Siniavskii, New York: Holt Rinehart and Winston, 1971

Slaveikov, Pencho

Bulgarian, 1866–1912

Pencho Slaveikov can be considered the father of the Bulgarian essay. Not only did he institute the genre of the essay in Bulgarian literature, but he also outlined the essential features of its future physiognomy: a highly critical approach to the phenomena of national cultural life, an ambition to mediate in the process of the Bulgarian appropriation of Western European spiritual values, and a twofold mission—to inform, and to influence public opinion on all momentous subjects. The tradition of essay writing that Slaveikov initiated during the first decade of the 20th century was fully internalized by the interwar readership through the publication, in the 1920s, of seven volumes of his works (edited by the literary historian and essayist Boian Penev), three of which contain his most representative essays. Slaveikov's essays are also considered by critics to be an insightful guide to his own poems, which occupy an eminent position as part of the intellectual trend in Bulgarian poetry.

Born into the family of Petko R. Slaveikov (a poet, publicist, and explorer of Bulgarian folklore heritage), Pencho Slaveikov extracted as good an education as he could in his native country (which in 1878 had just been liberated, after almost five centuries, from the Ottoman yoke) and supplemented it in Leipzig, where he studied philosophy, aesthetics, and literature (1892–98). German philosophy—mainly Nietzsche, Schopenhauer, and his professors J. Folkelt and W. Wundt—deeply influenced his views. Slaveikov's aesthetic taste bears the marks of his thorough acquaintance with the works of Goethe, Heine, Kierkegaard, and Ibsen. This general perspective allowed him to look at the cultural and political life of his native Bulgaria with the eye of an outsider.

The target of Slaveikov's harsh criticism included both works of contemporary authors and the activity of popular cultural and political figures of the time (such as Ivan Vazov, who is commonly recognized as "the patriarch of Bulgarian literature") as well as the freshly created mythology of the heroic period of the fight for national independence (e.g. Khristo Botev, the national symbol of a poet-revolutionary). The driving force behind Slaveikov's criticism was his conviction that an artist's good intentions and sincerity would not compensate for a lack of artistic merit and that the application of provincial criteria to the emerging modern literature in Bulgaria could only harm its development and kill whatever of value had been born within it ("Bulgarskata poezii: Predi, sega" [1906; Bulgarian poetry: before, and now]). According to Slaveikov, there were three main sources from which Bulgarian artists should seek models and criteria: Bulgarian oral poetry, as preserved in the folklore; the great achievements of other Slavic literatures (e.g. Pushkin, Tolstoi, and Mickiewicz); and German literature, especially its spiritual loftiness and refinement.

Slaveikov believed that it was not the written religious texts (which reveal Byzantine provenance), but the Bulgarian oral tradition that best mirrored the national character and creativity and could serve as fertile ground for literature in independent Bulgaria (“Bulgarskata narodna pesen” [1904; Bulgarian folksong]; “Narodnite ljubovni pesni” [1902; Love folksongs]). An important part of Slaveikov’s own poetry as well as his highly appreciative essays on the works of two Bulgarian symbolist writers—Peio lavorov and Petko Todorov, both greatly influenced by folklore—is a practical confirmation of his vision of the unity between the centuries-old oral tradition and the beginnings of written literature in the 19th century.

While looking at the foreign literary examples as models for Bulgarian literature, Slaveikov was fully aware of the impossibility of directly transplanting them into the Bulgarian context. Bulgarian writers and readers should, Slaveikov believed, form their taste on the greatest achievements of European literature; imitations of German and Russian poets, however, received nothing but Slaveikov’s scornful rejection. To Slaveikov, translation was the most beneficial way of overcoming the distance between the young Bulgarian literature and the European literary models. His essays on the reception of Heine’s and Pushkin’s poetry in Bulgaria (he also planned to write his doctoral thesis on Heine in Russia) disclose a mature conception of translation as a natural way of adopting alien ideas and literary forms.

As an enthusiastic reader of Nietzsche’s Also sprach Zarathustra (1883–85; Thus Spoke Zarathustra), Slaveikov often takes as a point of departure the charisma of the writer (as in his essays on Nietzsche, Goethe, Pushkin, and Tolstoi). The originality of a work of art, Slaveikov maintains, comes from the greatness of the writer’s personality: “One cannot question a personality, one only needs to understand it” (“Zarathustra,” 1920). Nevertheless, the lack of great personalities did not prevent Slaveikov from outlining a vivid picture of Bulgarian cultural life with its weaknesses and its promise (“Natsionalen teatur” [1910; National theater]; also his reviews of the Bulgarian literary and cultural journals). Slaveikov promotes the idea of the enlightened and creative leading figure (be it the editor of a journal or the director of a theater) with the highest aesthetic standards and the civic courage to pursue them. As a director of the National Theater (1908–09) and the National Library (1909–11), and as an editor at large of the literary journal Misul (Thought) (1892–1907), Slaveikov embodied this ideal and was loved by the talented and the inspired, but also hated by the mediocre.

Slaveikov’s conviction that literature and art should stay as far as possible from political struggles ran counter to the 19th-century Bulgarian understanding of the “utilitarian” role of literature and, in particular, of poetry which was supposed to serve as an instrument in politics. Slaveikov consistently followed this view in all his activities; along with his austerity as a critic, this contributed to his lonely position in Bulgarian culture during his life. Communist scholars, applying the Marxist methodology to his output, felt obliged to emphasize the “contradictions” in his aesthetic views and the “negative impact of idealistic philosophy” on his thought. Nevertheless, traces of Slaveikov’s refining influence can be detected in the whole subsequent development of the essay in Bulgaria.

KATIA MITOVA-JANOWSKI

Biography

Born 27 April 1866 in Triavna. Studied philosophy, aesthetics, and literature at the University of Leipzig, 1892–98. In poor health for most of his life, from 1884. Member of the literary group Misul, which emerged around the literary-cultural journal Misul (1892–1907) and included Peio Iavorov and Petko Todorov. Worked as a teacher; deputy director, 1901–09, and director, 1909–11, National Library, Sofia; director, National Theater, 1908–09: dismissed because of his attacks on the government. Companion of Mara Belcheva, from 1903. Died (as the result of a long-term chronic disease) at Lake Como, Italy, 28 May 1912.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Izbrani proizvedeniia, vol. 2, 1955

Suchmeniia, vol. 2, edited by Angel Todorov and Boris Delchev, 1966

Other writings: poetry (including the unfinished Kurvava pesen [wr. 1911–13, pub. 1919–20]).

Collected works editions: Subrani suchineniia, edited by Boian Penev, 7 vols., 1928; Subrani suchineniia, edited by Boris Delchev, 8 vols., 1958–59.

Bibliography

Furnadzhieva, Elena Georgieva, Pencho Slaveikov: Bibliografiia, Sofia, 1966

Further Reading

Hinrichs, Jan Paul, “On the Language of Penco Slavejkov,” in Dutch Studies in South Slavic and Balkan Linguistics, edited by A.A.Barentsen, B.M.Groen, and R.Sprenger, Amsterdam: Rodopi, 1987

Sarandev, Ivan, Pencho Slaveikov: Esteticheski i literaturnokriticheski vuzgledi, Sofia: Bulgarski Pisatel, 1977

Sociological Essay

Although sociology narrowly defined as the contemporary academic science of society has its roots in the French Enlightenment, the sociological impulse in contemporary criticism across the academic disciplines might best be considered a direct descendant of the great British and American essayists of the 19th century. From the Romantics to the organicist sociology of Lewis Mumford and his circle, from Matthew Arnold, Thomas Carlyle, and John Stuart Mill to contemporary New Historicism, the sociological critic has been, with some notable exceptions, first and foremost a “public moralist.” Although empirical sociology has long held prestige in the university, more broadly influential still has been the cooptation of sociological techniques and presumptions in interdisciplinary work across the humanities and social sciences. While the constellation of race, class, and gender as the sine qua non of the contemporary sociological essay owes much of its force to a century of empirical research and synthesis, few critics have noted that the shape of social criticism in the 20th century has been deeply informed by generic constraints. The short sociological essay—with strong links to the academic article and scholarly monograph—has exerted a powerful, if subtle, influence on contemporary discussions of culture across the academic disciplines and outside the academy. In short, the social sciences, cultural criticism, and the history of literature share common historical ancestors.

Georges Bataille’s short-lived Collège de Sociologie exemplified the newly perceived link between the personal and the political in the sociological essay, which began in the 20th century to reject the common, public language of “bourgeois” social science and Arnoldian critique. Anticipating the movement away from the broad national voice of the public intellectual in the latter half of the century—a national voice on the model of the New York intellectuals, and on Thomas Carlyle, John Ruskin, and John Stuart Mill before them—the Collège de Sociologie, whose members included sociologists, anthropologists, and philosophers, began to explore cryptic themes in an increasingly autobiographical idiom. Bataille’s “sacred sociology,” intended to dissolve the borders between the self and the society in which it is embedded, suggests the essayistic tenor in 20th-century sociological criticism. The selfreflexive textuality of the essay, represented in the work of Bataille and many admirers by a juxtaposition of rhetorical registers, literary styles, and authorial voices, signifies a turn toward the irrational and unrepresentable as sources of sociological concern. In Visions of Excess: Selected Writings, 1927–1939 (1985), for example, a posthumous collection of his sociological essays written in the new style, Bataille writes, “It is clear that the world is purely parodic, in other words, that each thing seen is the parody of another, or is the same thing in a deceptive form.” In its abandonment of academic decorum in favor of frank description and painfully personal detail, and in its insistence on the fundamental absurdity of social relations, the French sociological essay continued to estrange itself further from the critical essays of the popular press. A whole generation of Anglo-American critics—especially in the 1970s and 1980s—followed its example.

An anticipation of this new sociology was provided in 1923, when the anthropologist Marcel Mauss, a powerful influence on Georges Bataille and his generation, published his widely read “Essay on the Gift,” which distinguished between “primitive” gift economies and modern exchange economies, attributing to the former the nobility of gift-giving without reserve, and to the latter the stain of mass society and capitalist calculation. This distinction, so important to 20th-century intellectual life, with its Romantic hostility to utilitarianism, undergirded both social progressivism, such as that of Lewis Mumford and his circle, and neo-Luddite reactions against mass society, as expressed earlier in England by Thomas Carlyle and in America by John Crowe Ransom, Robert Penn Warren, Allen Tate, and the other Southern agrarian essayists. In sum, the new Nietzschean trend in sociological criticism experimented with interdisciplinary forms such as collage and free writing to gain access to the “primitive” forces buried by the psychological defense mechanisms symptomatic of civilization’s discontents.

As Julia Kristeva writes of the new intellectual milieu that developed out of the shambles of post-1945 French political culture, “what has emerged in our postwar culture, after the wave of totalitarianism, is these peculiar kinds of speeches and fouissance directed against the equalizing Word... This is something ignored by the machinery of politics, including that on the left, which has been caught up in a large history that excludes the specific histories of speech, dreams and fouissance” (quoted in Bensmaïa, 1987). We might take Kristeva’s words here as describing a general intellectual crisis of authority that has haunted social criticism for the last 50 years. As the micropolitics of language displaced the “metanarrative” concerns with large-scale radical transformation—“the equalizing Word”—the sociological essay adapted itself to accommodate these new intellectual priorities. Not unlike the Modernist aesthetic experiments from which contemporary literary and social theory has drawn much of its inspiration, the form of the sociological essay began to reflect its intellectual content and political orientation. Further strengthening the link between the essay’s form and its content, the insurgency of the critical voice, gently encouraged in the North Atlantic tradition by Ralph Waldo Emerson and the British and American Romantics, urgently demanded by the trans-Atlantic slave narratives—whose authors had “written themselves into being”—and righteously declaimed by the Young Americans, the insurgent voice became a commonplace in social and cultural theory by the last quarter of the 20th century. Taking Modernist experiments as paradigms for the limits of language and representation, and resisting the reification of everyday speech into stereotype and newspaper banality—Roland Barthes’ “necrosis in language”—many postwar intellectuals began to reject the worn-out and cliché-ridden language of the public sphere, a language which had been the medium of the critical essay since the public sociologists of the 19th century gave the genre wide currency.

Setting the trend for intellectual life on both sides of the Atlantic, and temporarily rescuing the oppositional potential of the cultural avant-garde from academic complacency, French intellectuals in the last quarter of the century have argued that literary Modernism’s self-reflexive experimentalism demonstrated sophisticated, albeit highly encrypted, insights into the mechanics of language and desire—insights they would later elaborate into fully fleshed-out theories of discourse and society. In fact, we might see in the poststructuralist essay of social criticism only the most recent version of the self-reflexive, exploratory tradition of writing begun in the 16th century with the birth of the early modern essay. Julia Kristeva notes the link between social criticism, methodology, and the essay genre when she remarks that “when thought concedes its debt to language—and that is the case, well before structuralism, within the French essayistic tradition—the speaking subject is thrown into Infinity conceived as the power and ruse of the Word.”

The insights of 20th-century French philosophers and sociologists have been borne out by other major intellectual traditions as well. In “Der Essay als Form” (1958; “The Essay as Form”), for example, Frankfurt School critical theorist Theodor W. Adorno argues that the seeming self-contradictions and paradoxes of the essay genre itself expose the reified rationality at the heart of positivistic social science. For Adorno, the essay’s rambling and unmethodical method reproduces the rational mind’s own hidden capricious rhythms, employing a dialectical language that doubles back on itself at every turn. Adorno writes: “...doubt about the unconditional priority of method was raised, in the actual process of thought, almost exclusively by the essay. It does justice to the consciousness of non-identity, without needing to say so, radically un-radical in refraining from any reduction to a principle, in accentuating the fragmentary, the partial rather than the total.” The heterodox essay genre, Adorno argues, rejects the metaphysical distinction between form and content, culture and nature, likewise abandoning the philosophical search for origins characteristic of both science and theology. Further, according to Adorno, the essay’s refusal to indulge itself in the illusion of unmediated representation characteristic of much sociology casts doubt on the spurious certainties and commonsense ideologies that reproduce the status quo. Georg Lukács provides a similar justification for the essay as an inherently critical genre in a letter to Leo Popper later published as “Über Form und Wesen des Essays” (1911; “On the Nature and Form of the Essay”): “the essay has to create from within itself all the preconditions for the effectiveness and validity of its vision. Therefore two essays can never contradict one another: each creates a different world...”

On the essay, then, traditions of social criticism as divergent as the Frankfurt School of critical theory and French poststructuralism concur. For Adorno and Lukács, as for Kristeva and Barthes, both critical theory and the essay similarly collude in the critique of ideology as it is transmitted by aesthetic form and scholarly method. From this perspective, then, poststructuralism’s hostility to narrative closure and emphasis on difference and dissemination, combined with the Frankfurt School’s critique of instrumental reason, lends the re-emergence of the essay genre in postwar criticism an air of inevitability.

Following the war, first in France, then across the Atlantic, the linguistic turn of social critique—underscored by the Althusserian, and later, Foucauldian emphasis on the social constitution of subjectivity—further placed the sociological essay at the eye of the university’s political storm. As theorists on both sides of the Atlantic fought to prevent their own critical work from ironically coalescing into new dogma, increasingly idiosyncratic, autobiographical rhetoric made its way into academic life. The performative aspects of thought now began to vie for an intellectual respectability formerly reserved for the disembodied, system-building Enlightenment as the foundation for a new sociological scholarship; this trend would culminate in poststructuralism, postmodernism, and the New Historicism. As Roland Barthes’ own work suggests, the essay genre, which encourages critical self-reflection with its ready-made tradition of writerly texts par excellence, is perhaps the best resource for postmodern social critics obsessed with the operations of discursive power on the level of the individual.

If a certain strain of sociological criticism has encouraged essayistic self-exploration, broader political developments have also renewed the essay’s lease as the most appropriate prose forum for theoretical inquiry across the disciplines. The rise of “new social movements” in and outside the academy in the late 1960s—including civil rights, feminism, environmentalism, and many others—has demanded theoretical cartographies supple enough to map out the intricate relationships between the personal and the political. From the revolution of the Modernist word and Kristevan “écriture feminine” to the materialist sociology of British cultural studies, a wide variety of “standpoint theories” of gender, race, and class have commanded academic center stage since the late 1970s. As with previous eras, the essay has proved itself the most durable and pliable testing ground for interrogating the sociological limits and boundaries of subjectivity. In perhaps the most notable recent example of aesthetic form abetting intellectual and political function, the sociological essay has accompanied the flourishing of contemporary feminism, aiding its efforts to rewrite and rework a masculine cultural tradition to suit properly feminist ends. Further, since (as philological scholars have been fond of pointing out) the essay has no “legitimate” patrilineage, the genre opens up new discursive space for the reinvention and revision of the Western tradition which continues apace in the Anglo-American academy. Citing Virginia Woolf, one of the most influential essayists for academic feminism, Rachel Blau du Plessis underscores this observation in the influential collection New Feminist Essays on Virginia Woolf (1981): “Writers know their text as a form of intimacy, of personal contact, whether conversations with the reader or with the self. Letters, journals, voices are sources for this element...[I] see ‘no reason why one should not write as one speaks, familiarly, colloquially’ expressing the porousness and non-hierarchical stances of intimate conversation in both structure and function.” The intimacy and porousness of conversation, justifiably lauded here as a principle of feminist textuality, suggests the dialogic coffeehouse of the 18th-century public sphere as readily as it does the art of liberal conversation praised by Emerson.

Finally, revising and extending the tradition of the essayistic public sphere of the 19th century, the 1990s have brought a spate of confessional, conversational, popular sociological texts such as Daughters (1994) by Gerald Early, Patricia Williams’ The Alchemy of Race and Rights (1991), Alice Kaplan’s French Lessons (1993), Nancy K. Miller’s Getting Personal (1991), and Mike Rose’s Lives on the Boundary (1989). These narratives signal a return of the sociological critic as public intellectual. While social theory narrowly defined remains largely opaque, despite its putative links to public concerns, these autobiographical narratives dismantle the opposition between the public and the private, the personal and the political, contributing to a broader tradition of cultural critique of which social theory is one element. Continuing in the tradition of the trans-Atlantic slave narratives, the reformist sociology of Lewis Mumford and his circle, and the New Journalism of the 1960s, this most recent revival of essayism in sociological criticism may at first appear novel, but is in fact as old as the essay form itself.

MATTHEW TITOLO

Further Reading

Adorno, Theodor W., “The Essay as Form,” in his Notes to Literature, vol. 1, New York: Columbia University Press, 1991 (original German essay published 1958)

- Bataille, Georges, Visions of Excess: Selected Writings, 1927–1939, edited and translated by Allan Stoekl, Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1985
- Bensmaïa, Réda, The Barthes Effect: The Essay as Reflective Text, Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1987 (original French edition, 1986)
- Gross, John, The Rise and Fall of the Man of Letters: A Study of the Idiosyncratic and the Humane in Modern Literature, London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, and New York: Macmillan, 1969
- Lepenies, Wolf, Between Literature and Science: The Rise of Sociology, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1988 (original German edition, 1985)
- Lukács, Georg, “On the Nature and Form of the Essay,” in his Soul and Form, Cambridge, Massachusetts: MIT Press, 1974 (original German essay published 1911)
- Nisbet, Robert, Sociology as an Art Form, London: Heinemann, and New York: Oxford University Press, 1976

El Sol

Spanish newspaper, 1917–1939

The morning daily newspaper El Sol (The sun) was first published in Madrid on 1 December 1917. Its lifespan can be divided into three clearly defined parts. Only during the first period, from the paper's appearance in 1917 to 25 March 1931, did it play a major role in restoring Spain's political culture, as well as in shaping the concept of journalism itself. On that latter date its founder, the Basque civil engineer Nicolás María de Urgoiti, was removed by the monarchist shareholders who owned a majority of the company's stock. These were the days immediately preceding the proclamation of the Second Spanish Republic. During the five years of that regime's tenure (April 1931 to July 1936), when frequent changes in ownership and management took place, El Sol ceased to be a major factor in shaping Spanish public opinion, although it maintained its high standards in news reporting. The third period in the life of El Sol, through the Spanish Civil War, ended with General Franco's entrance into Madrid. Limited to a secondary role among the Madrid newspapers and with a circulation of merely 25,000, El Sol was at that time controlled by Spain's Communist Party. In spite of this ideological reversal, the paper held to the same editorial format. Consequently, El Sol's intellectual history developed almost exclusively during the first of the three periods mentioned above. The main editors and contributors of Urgoiti's El Sol also founded with him Crisol (1931–32; Crucible) and Luz (1932–34; Light), two newspapers loyal to the policies of the famous daily.

El Sol's unique role in the history of the Spanish press has its roots in the paper's foundational purpose, to be instrumental in a cultural renewal involving the whole of Spanish society. “Renovación” (renewal) is indeed the key word for El Sol. After the national disaster of 1898, several attempts were made to promote publications that might help reduce the gap between the country's slow cultural progress and the demand for modernization. This is the Europeanization of Spain proposed by the philosopher José Ortega y Gasset in such media as the newspaper El Imparcial (The impartial) and the weekly review España. Ortega became the main contributor to El Sol, as well as the mentor of its political stance; it is in the daily that he published as serials some of his most renowned works, such as España invertebrada (1921 [book form]; Invertebrate Spain) and La redención de las provincias (1931 [book form]; The redemption of the provinces).

Within this framework Urgoiti tried to encourage, in the realm of culture, the modernization project that he had previously launched successfully as a civil engineer, by promoting the rationalization of Spain's paper industry. It was from among the industrialists of this special area that Urgoiti obtained most of the funds for the publication of the newspaper, a circumstance that would eventually cost him control over the daily. It was one thing to accept economic rationalization, but something else to admit political modernization and promote a more European Spain. (For instance, El Sol did not report on bullfights: a strong statement, since bullfights were the most popular pastime in Spain.)

In the process of implementing his project of renewal, Urgoiti was active on three fronts. On the technical level, he produced a newspaper which was up-to-date in its business structure, as well as in the distribution and management of the different sections and even in establishing its own news agency (Febus). Second, he recruited with an open mind contributors to the journal, from a wide range of thinkers of different political persuasion, but committed, as he was, to promoting modernization. Finally, he made clear that El Sol would promote reform by dealing in depth with the political problems of the country while maintaining a position of strict independence from the control or influence of political parties or the administration. This attitude meant, in the daily's first period, a firm defense of the allies' cause during World War I, within the polemical climate of neutral Spain.

The management of El Sol operated on two levels. As in any other daily, an editorial board, presided over by the directors (Félix Lorenzo and Manuel Aznar between 1917 and 1931), managed the day-to-day running of the paper, always under the supervision of Urgoiti. The editorial position and the analysis of important questions raised in the political and intellectual fields were discussed within a restricted circle—called “la tertulia de El Sol” or, humorously, “Olympus”—which included Urgoiti and his principal intellectual advisers: Ortega, in the first place, and other prominent figures such as Luis de Zulueta and Francisco Grandmontaigne. The group of regular contributors on the payroll of El Sol comprised most of the outstanding thinkers and writers of the time: Ortega, Américo Castro, Salvador de Madariaga, Gregorio Marañón, Luis Araquistáin, Fernando de los Ríos, Ramón Gómez de la Serna, Ramiro de Maeztu, Gabriel Miró, Ernesto Giménez Caballero, Luis Olariaga, Ramón Pérez de Ayala, Eduardo Gómez de Baquero, Ricardo Baeza. The weight of this important intellectual component is reflected in the front page articles and editorials, the latter accompanied by humorous cartoons, usually by Luis Bagaría. Likewise noteworthy is the sensitivity and care apparent in the section devoted to book reviews and reports of cultural events.

Like previous attempts at cultural renewal, El Sol's influence was restricted by the fact that the public interested in a product of such high quality was limited. In an attempt to remedy this problem, it was decided to publish La Voz (The voice), an evening daily of a more popular nature. It first appeared on 1 July 1920, and became El Sol's companion through all its vicissitudes until the extinction of both papers in 1939. However, they had widely different readers. In 1926 La Voz was selling 110,000 copies against the 80,000 sold by El Sol; the evening daily's success, however, was mostly confined to Madrid, while only 20 percent of the morning paper's output was sold in the capital, with the remaining 80 percent sold in the provinces—a fact that underscores El Sol's role in shaping public opinion on a national level.

In its early days, when Europe was aflame with World War I or immersed in postwar tension, El Sol stood for a democratization of the Spanish monarchy. Later it greeted with positive expectations the rise to power of General Primo de Rivera, who ruled from 1923 to 1930. The initial hope expressed in El Sol, based on the suppression of political corruption, was soon frustrated, however, and gave way to serious questioning of the need for political change. Finally in 1930, after the fall of the dictator, when the political line followed by King Alfonso XIII had reached a point of no return, El Sol published an article by Ortega that became famous for its closing line, “Delenda est monarchia,” forecasting the imminent demise of the regime. The price Urgoiti paid for this announcement was his exile from El Sol. Paradoxically, when Spain's regime changed 20 days later, the newspaper, now separated from its founder, main contributors, and editorial board, adhered enthusiastically to the republic. The founding project of cultural renewal was, however, irretrievably lost. The conservative owners appointed Manuel Aznar as director, trying unsuccessfully to establish a bridge with the past. After August 1932, the newspaper executive and entrepreneur Antonio Miquel took over the firm and for some time supported the policies of the republican leader Manuel Azaña. Miquel's failure led to a new political line with Fernando Vela as director, beginning in February 1934. Throughout these changes, El Sol was losing both money and readers. In July 1934, no more than 5000 copies were sold in Madrid. In the words of the historian Gonzalo Redondo (1970), it was the closing issue of Urgoiti's El Sol on 25 March 1931 that was really “the final issue of the newspaper.”

ANTONIO ELORZA
MARÍA SOLEDAD CARRASCO

Further Reading

- Aubert, Paul, and Jean Michel Desvois, “El Sol, un grand quotidien atypique (1917–1939),” in Typologie de la presse hispanique, edited by D.Bussy Genevois, Rennes: Presses Universitaires de Rennes 2, 1986
- Cabrera, Mercedes, La industria, la prensa y la política: Nicolás María de Urgoiti (1869–1951), Madrid: Alianza, 1994
- Cabrera, Mercedes, María Soledad Carrasco, Rafael Cruz, and Antonio Elorza, “Las fundaciones de Nicolás María de Urgoiti: Escritos y archivos,” Estudios de Historia Social 24–25 (January-June 1983):267–471
- Redondo, Gonzalo, Las empresas políticas de Ortega y Gasset, Madrid: Rialp, 2 vols., 1970

Soloukhin, Vladimir

Russian, 1924–

As a young writer Vladimir Soloukhin earned his living by turning out essays for the popular journal Ogonek (Little flame) on topics chosen by his editors. Little of enduring interest remains from these early efforts. His career as a serious essayist began in the early 1960s, after, as he has written, his “eyes were opened” to the Soviet regime’s distortion of Russia’s pre-Soviet past.

The scope and technique of Soloukhin’s mature work cannot be understood without reference to the Communist Party’s literary apparatus and its methods of rewarding, punishing, and censoring writers. The same agencies that awarded him the State Prize of the Russian Republic in 1979 and the Red Banner of Labor on his 60th birthday in 1984, and that elevated him to high office in the Writers’ Union and enabled him to travel widely outside the U.S.S.R., would also censure journals publishing his more offensive essays, and threatened him with expulsion from the Party and from the Writers’ Union for having written and published the series of short essays Nenapissanye rasskazy (1985; Stories not written). And when the essays collected under the title Vremia sobirat’ kamni (1980; A Time to Gather Stones) were published as a book, all 70,000 copies were sent to library reserve collections, so as not to fall into the hands of readers.

The essays of his mature years are almost all devoted to the same theme—that of recovering a past discarded and derided by Lenin’s heirs. The task of bringing that past to the Soviet reader leads Soloukhin to test the essay’s capacity for concealing offending truths in ostensibly acceptable discourse.

Mikhail Epstein has observed (After the Future, 1995) that the essay approaches its subject obliquely. This is true of Soloukhin’s essays, where paradox must take the place of forthright assertion of propositions. Thus in Poseshchenie Zvanki (1975; A visit to Zvanka) he finds the remains of the poet Gavriil Romanovich Derzhavin re-interred by the Soviet authorities under a tombstone identifying him as “an Actual Privy Councillor and Bearer of Many Decorations.” This is the same Derzhavin who provided Russia’s greatest field marshal with the epitaph “Here Lies Suvorin.” The contrast speaks eloquently, if obliquely, of the decline in the literary climate.

It is characteristic of Soloukhin’s essays that they begin on one theme, which turns out to be merely a device facilitating passage to the real theme. Chernye doski (1966; Searching for Icons in Russia) begins with the theme of collecting as an avocation, but eventually the reader sees that the real topic is the role of religious art in traditional Russian culture. Similarly, A Time to Gather Stones begins with a discussion of the Optina Pustyn Monastery’s importance for the writings of Dostoevskii and Tolstoi, whereas the real subject of the essay is the institution of elders within Russian monasticism. Bol’shoe Shakhmatovo (1979; Greater Shakhmatovo) begins with reference to plans for marking the centenary anniversary of Aleksandr Blok’s birth. In fact, the essay celebrates the liberal intelligentsia of pre-revolutionary Russia, a class incorrectly and unfairly dismissed in the Soviet period, Soloukhin notes, as “idlers and spongers.” In Poseshchenie Zvanki a recollection of seeing the ruins of Derzhavin’s estate is the pretext for an analysis of the intricate structure used by the poet in the construction of his ode to God.

In “Rasskazat’ i skazat’” (1976; Telling and saying) Soloukhin ponders what distinguishes works of a genius, such as Pushkin, from those of Mel’nikov-Pecherskii, a writer of far less talent. Great writers, he suggests, possess the quality of fokusirovka: the ability to reduce complex subjects to vivid images possessing immediate relevance to authentic life experiences. The term and the concept are characteristic of Soloukhin’s own work in the essay genre, especially in Kameshki na ladone (A handful of pebbles), miniature essays contributed to journals on a continuing basis and periodically printed in book form (1977, 1982, 1988). An enormous salmon being consumed at dinner in a portrait of Aleksei Tolstoi becomes in Soloukhin’s essay the objective representation of a writer who would leave the freedom and poverty of exile in order to prostitute his talent for Stalin’s regime. A visit to Joan of Arc’s parish church at Domremy reveals that the list of priests serving there since the 13th century contains fewer names than the list of chairmen in the troubled 50 years of the collective farm that consumed Soloukhin’s home village. In Bol’shoe Shakmatovo Soloukhin evokes early communism’s cultural nihilism by creating the image of village schoolchildren working out math problems on the back of handwritten manuscripts of Aleksandr Blok’s poems, looted from his family’s manor house before it was burned to the ground during Lenin’s campaign of terror against “class enemies.”

Soloukhin’s orientation toward his audience is that of Everyman on a voyage of discovery and self-discovery. In “Sovkhoz im. Lenina. Dom kul’tury” (1984; The house of culture at the Lenin Soviet farm), devoted to an exhibition of paintings by Konstantin Vasil’ev, Soloukhin refers to himself as a verkhogliad (a slang term meaning “superficial observer”). Yet he affirms the importance of the amateur when, after listening to professional academic artists dismiss Vasil’ev’s work as primitive and transparent, he recalls seeing a queue of 500 people waiting in inclement weather to see the artist’s work at an exhibition held on a remote collective farm. What the experts did not see, concludes Soloukhin, was Vasil’ev’s gift of spiritual resonance (odukhotvorennost’) with the Russian people’s innermost aspirations.

When Soloukhin was able to reduce his output of essays and begin writing fiction, the sensation, he has noted, was similar to that of removing heavy work boots and donning track shoes. The burden undertaken by the essayist is derived from the essay’s “capaciousness” (emkost’), its appetite for taking on features of all literary genres, in order to mediate between life and life’s sciences. In Soloukhin’s late and postSoviet essays, such as Drevo (1991; The tree), Pri svete dnia (1992; In the light of day), and Solenoe ozero (1994; Salt lake), the genre plays host to a wide assortment of expository devices in efforts to re-create in the reader’s imagination a vision of the past with the power and capacity to explain Russia’s 20th-century experiences.

HARRY WALSH

Biography

Vladimir Alekseevich Soloukhin. Born 14 June 1924 in Alepino Stavrovskii, Vladimir region. Studied at the Vladimir Engineering Technicum, 1938–42, graduated in tool mechanics; Gorkii Literary Institute, Moscow, 1946–51. Served in the army, until 1945. Married Rosa Soloukhin. Feature writer, Ogoneki. Joined the Communist Party, 1952. Member of the board of the Union of Soviet Writers, 1958–75; member of the editorial staff, Molodaia Gvardiia publishing house, Moscow, 1964–81. Awards: State Prize for Literature, 1979; Red Banner of Labor, 1984.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Vladimirskie Proselki, 1958; as A Walk in Rural Russia, translated by S.Miskin, 1966

Veter stranstvii (The wind of traveling), 1960

S liricheskikh pozitsii (From lyrical points of view), 1965

Pis'ma iz russkogo muzeia (Letters from the Russian museum); Chernye doski; Vremia sobirat' kamni, 1966; Chernye doski as Searching for Icons in Russia, translated by Paul Falla, 1971; enlarged edition of Vremia sobirat' kamni, 1980; as A Time to Gather Stones, translated by Valerie Z.Nollan, 1993

Tret'ia okhota (Third hunt), 1968

Poseshchenie Zvanki, 1975

Slovo zhivoe i mertvoe (o vremeni i o sebe) (The word living and dead [about time and self]), 1976

Kameshki na ladoni, 3 vols., 1977–88

Bol'shoe Shakmatovo, 1979

Volshebnaia palochka (Magical cane), 1983

Sozertsanie chuda (The contemplation of a miracle), 1984

Bedstvie s golubiami, 1984

Nenapissanye rasskazy, 1985

Chitaia Lenina (Reading Lenin), 1989

Rasstavanie s idolom (Parting with the idol), 1991

Drevo, 1991

Pri svete dnia, 1992.

Solenoe ozero, 1994

Other writings: several novels (including Smekh za levym plachom [Laughter over the Left Shoulder], 1988), poetry, and many works of Russian “village prose.”

Collected works edition: Sobranie sochinenii, 10 vols., 1995– (in progress).

Further Reading

Brown, Deming, Soviet Russian Literature Since Stalin, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1978

Dunlop, John, “Ruralist Prose Writers in the Russian Ethnic Movement,” in Ethnic

Russia in the U.S.S.R.: The Dilemma of Dotninance, edited by Edward Allworth, New York: Pergamon Press, 1980:80–88

Givens, John, Review of Soloukhin's A Time to Gather Stones, Slavic Review 54 (Spring 1995):245–46

Turkov, Andrei, "Energy and Talent," Soviet Literature 6, no. 435 (1984): 103–06

Solov'ev, Vladimir

Russian, 1853–1900

Vladimir Solov'ev is recognized as Russia's leading religious philosopher of the 19th century. He was also an important poet, whose thought and manner exerted a powerful influence on the most important religious symbolists, Aleksandr Blok, Viacheslav Ivanov, and Andrei Belyi. There is in fact probably no non-Marxist thinker in 20th-century Russia who was not profoundly influenced by Solov'ev.

Solov'ev was inspired by the mystical religious intuition of a being of resplendent beauty, which he called "Bozhestvennaia Sofiia" (Divine Sophia) and "Sofiia Premudrost'" (Divine Wisdom); his philosophical thought is a synthesis of Christian dogmatism with Eastern, particularly Russian, mysticism, the natural sciences, and rationalist idealist philosophy. One of the most erudite men of his day, Solov'ev undertook advanced study in both philosophy and the natural sciences. His prose style included discourses in both these disciplines, and in time took on a markedly poetic quality. In his mature essays Solov'ev increasingly used literary examples, and even poetry (particularly of those he considered "philosopher-poets") along with and at times in lieu of rational argument.

His early, more academic philosophical works—his M.A. thesis Krizis zapadnoi filosofii (1874; The Crisis in Western Philosophy), his doctoral dissertation Kritika otvlechennykh nachal (1880; A critique of abstract principles), and his neo-Slavophile book Filosofskie printsipy tsel'nogo znaniia (1877; The philosophical foundations of integral knowledge)—are written in the Russian rendition of Hegelian discourse, the so-called "school language." Solov'ev became less satisfied with that language over time. He was one of the greatest philosophical stylists. The historian of philosophy V.V. Zenkovsky (1953) writes of Solov'ev's philosophical idiom: "He always wrote with astonishing clarity, precision and vividness. Diffuseness is totally alien to him. In this respect Solovyov is extremely close to the French philosophical style. There was in Solovyov's very mode of thinking a penchant for rationalism, logical constructions and a dialectical binding together of heterogeneous ideas. These were the external peculiarities of Solovyov's creative activity which often made him a slave of his own mode of thinking and writing." Solov'ev was a mystical religious philosopher who wished to integrate all areas of intellectual endeavor with intuitive feeling. He himself remarked that he could always find adequate words for his thoughts, but never for his feelings.

A number of his essay-length works are publicistic, treating the reunification of the Eastern and Western churches and national and political divisions within Russia. He was also a bitterly sardonic polemicist, as seen in his essays attacking Vasilii Rozanov and his review-attacks on the fledgling symbolist movement led by Valerii Briusov. His reputation as a great essayist, however, rests on his religious lectures about the meaning of Dostoevskii's life and work (1881–83), his religious and philosophical Chteniia o Bogochelovechestve (1877–81; Lectures on Godmanhood), and his numerous aesthetically oriented essays written from the late 1880s to the end of his life.

The young Solov'ev knew Dostoevskii, and different critics have suggested that he was the living prototype for Ivan or Aliosha Karamazov. Solov'ev's important essays in this late period include five that are united under the title Smysl liubvi (1892–94; The Meaning of Love), as well as “Krasota v prirode” (1889; Beauty in nature), “Obshchii smysl iskusstva” (“The General Meaning of Art”), “O liricheskoi poezii” (1895; On lyric poetry), “Poeziia F.Tiutcheva” (1895; The poetry of F.Tiutchev), and the brilliant unfinished cycle of essays entitled Osnovy teoreticheskoi filosofii (1897–99; part translated as “Foundations of Theoretical Philosophy”). One of his more interesting late works, Tri razgovora o voine, progresse, i konste istorii (1900; War, Progress, and the End of History) is in Platonic dialogue form. It concludes with the fascinating “Kratkaia povest' ob Antikhriste” (“Short Tale of the Antichrist”), a brilliant reworking of Ivan Karamazov's prose poem “Legenda o velikom inkvizitore” (“The Legend of the Grand Inquisitor”) in Dostoevskii's Brat'ia Karamazovy (1880; The Brothers Karamazov). The Grand Inquisitor figure in this apocalyptically tinged work was an attack on Tolstorian rationalized religion, yet after Rozanov's suggestion it has often been viewed as Solov'ev's self-parody of his own attempts to unite the churches, a task which consumed him in the 1880s.

In his essay “The General Meaning of Art,” Solov'ev asserts the great importance of aesthetics: “For their genuine realization Truth and the Good must become a creative force in the human subject, transforming—not only reflecting, reality ...the light of reason can not be limited to knowledge alone, but the meaning of life must be incarnated in a new, more suitable reality...Real art, in essence—any sensible portrayal of an object or phenomenon from the point of view of its ultimate (teleological) state, i.e., in the light of the world's future, is a work of art.” He finds a practical example of this consciously created in the poetry of Fedor Tiutchev and unconsciously in that of Afanasii Fet. In his essay on Tiutchev (1895) Solov'ev writes: “The action of ideal beings on us, which produces in us both intellectual contemplation (Schelling's intellektuelle Anschauung) and the creation of their ideal forms or ideas is called inspiration. This action takes us out of our usual center, raises us to a higher sphere, makes us ecstatic.” In “On Lyric Poetry” he writes: “...for sensitive people... love poems like those here [of Fet] can serve as a better affirmation of mystical truths than any possible ‘school proofs’.”

In his great late essays, therefore, Solov'ev is clearly trying to bridge the disciplines of natural science, mystical religion, and aesthetics/poetic art. His writing style presents a somewhat polyphonic mixture of the discourses of the three disparate fields. The cacophony of natural science proofs and statistics and the exalted Romantic style are particularly sharp in the seminal essays “Beauty in Nature” and The Meaning of Love, so much so that Konstantin MochuPskii (1936) was moved to comment: “The poet [in Solov'ev] conquers the natural scientist and pure lyricism invades a very scientific scholarly exposition. Solov'ev felt ‘the heavenly life of flowers’ very deeply... After a lyrical digression the author returns to ‘realities,’ i.e., to zoology and the evolution of species, quoting Darwin.”

The attempt to integrate such different discourses in one essayistic style in Solov’ev was occasioned by the fact that for most of his intellectual life Westernized Russian intellectuals, his main audience, were profoundly uninterested in idealistic philosophy and even less moved by mystical religion. Scholarly and natural science discourses were used for their authority with his rather hostile readership. Thus while his point of view is extremely antipositivist, the positivist “idiom” of the “other” is coopted by Solov’ev as a means of overcoming the (for him) only apparent contradiction between Reason and Faith. The preponderance of nonmystical discourse in the philosophical essays and books of this mystic, and his lifelong crusade to systematize and rationalize the faith, led Zenkovsky to remark that “Solovyov characterized Russian religious thought from without.” This is less and less true in his late aesthetic essays, where the action of beauty on human individuality becomes virtually the cornerstone of philosophy.

Having achieved in his early philosophical works a lucid academic style, Solov’ev went on to abandon it for the mixed, often poetic discourse of his later years. His late essays, both in form and in their championing of the philosopher-poet and theurgic art, laid the foundation for the artistic essay of the next generation of poet-artists, particularly Ivanov and Belyi. Solov’ev’s late aesthetic-philosophical essays were the precondition of Belyi’s prophecy: “From now on philosophy and poetry will go hand in hand...after the crisis in philosophy ...it was inevitable that art should come forth to take the place of philosophy as the guiding light of mankind” (“Magiia slov” [1910; “The Magic of Words”]).

ANNA LISA CRONE

Biography

Vladimir Sergeevich Solov’ev. Born 28 January 1853 in Moscow. Studied natural sciences, philosophy, and history at Moscow University, 1869–73, M.A. in history, 1874; Moscow Theological Academy, 1873–74; St. Petersburg University, Ph.D., 1880. Lecturer, Moscow University, 1875; studied at the British Museum, London, July–October 1875; traveled to Egypt, November 1875–March 1876; gave a series of public lectures, 1877–81: in one lecture advocated clemency for Alexander II’s assassins: reprimanded by the Minister of Public Education, and as a result voluntarily resigned lectureship and abandoned his university career. Full-time writer, from 1881. Editor (also contributor) of the philosophical sections of the Brockhaus-Efron Encyclopedia, from 1891. Traveled again to Europe and Egypt, 1898. Died near Moscow, 13 August 1900.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Chteniia o Bogochelovechestve, 1877–81; as Lectures on Godmanhood, translated by Peter Zouboff, 1948; revised edition, as Lectures on Divine Humanity, edited by Boris Jakim, 1995

- Dukhovnye osnovy zhizni*, 1884; as God, Man and the Church, translated by Donald Attwater, 1938
- L'idée russe*, 1888; Russian edition, 1909
- La Russie et l'église universelle*, 1889; Russian edition, 1911; as Russia and the Universal Church, translated by H.Rees, 1948
- Smysl liubvi*, 1891–94; as The Meaning of Love, translated by Jane Marshall, 1945, revised by Thomas R. Beyer, Jr., 1985
- Opravdanie dobra*, 1897; as Justification of the Good: An Essay in Moral Philosophy, translated by Natalie Duddington, 1918
- Osnovy teoreticheskoi filosofii*, 1897–99; part as “Foundations of Theoretical Philosophy,” translated by Vlada Tolley and James Scanlan, in Russian Philosophy, vol. 3, 1965:99–134
- Tri razgovora o voine, progresse, i konste istorii, i kratkaia povest' ob Antikhriste* (Three conversations...), 1900; as War, Progress, and the End of History, Including a Short Tale of the Antichrist, translated by Alexander Bakshy, 1915, revised by Thomas R. Beyer, Jr., 1990
- A Solovyov Anthology*, edited by S.L.Frank, translated by Natalie Duddington, 1950
- Other writings: poetry, three plays, literary criticism, philosophical works, and encyclopedia articles. Also translated Schiller, Heine, Virgil, Petrarch, Dante, Mickiewicz, Longfellow, and Tennyson.
- Collected works editions: Sobranie sochinenii, 2nd edition, edited by Sergei M. Solov'ev and Ernest L.Radlov, 10 vols., 1911–14, revised edition, 12 vols., 1966–70.

Bibliography

- Sidorov, S.A., Bibliografiia rabot o VI. Solov'eva, n.p.: Obshchestvo Pamyati Vladimira Solov'eva (Vladimir Solov'ev society), 1916

Further Reading

- Cioran, Samuel D., Vladimir Soloviev and the Knighthood of the Divine Sophia, Waterloo, Ontario: Wilfred Laurier University Press, 1977
- Kline, George L., “Russian Religious Thought,” in 19th Century Religious Thought in the West, vol. 2, edited by Ninian Smart and others, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1985: 208–17
- MochuPskii, Konstantin, V.S. Solov'ev, Paris: YMCA Press, 1951 (original edition, 1936)
- Sutton, Jonathan, The Religious Philosophy of VI. Solovyov: Towards a Reassessment, Basingstoke: Macmillan, and New York: St. Martin's Press, 1988
- Zenkovsky, V.V., A History of Russian Philosophy, vol. 2., New York: Columbia University Press, 1953:469–531
- Zernov, N., Three Russian Prophets: Khomiakov, Dostoevsky, Soloviev, London: S.C.M. Press, 1944; Gulf Breeze, Florida: Academic International Press, 1973

Sønderby, Knud

Danish, 1909–1966

Knud Sønderby came to be known as a novelist, an essayist, and, to a lesser degree, a dramatist. He was also a prolific journalist. Many of the works included in essay collections appeared first in Danish newspapers as chronicles in essay form. His first collection of essays, Grønlandsk sommer (1941; Greenland summer) appeared ten years after his debut novel. This essay collection, which signaled Sønderby's transition to the essay, was followed by five principal collections, the last appearing posthumously in 1969. While some critics regard his essays as less significant than his fiction, others see them as a rejuvenation of his oeuvre. Indeed, Midt i en jazztid (1931; In the middle of a jazz age), his best-known novel on the crisis of the Danish youth, presages some of the underlying themes of his essays. The perspective of the young served as Sønderby's most effective medium in imparting the Danish character of his work. His subdued tone and casual style also suggest the influence of his narrative works.

Not unlike the novelist, the essayist Sønderby is an analytical observer. Major themes in Sønderby's essays embrace the interplay of past and present, the imminence of death, and man's concept of time; other work, in large part semi-autobiographical, portrays the disillusionment of the 1920s.

Notwithstanding the personal tone of his essays, Sønderby's perspective lends a special character to the relationship between the essay and its public. His jeg ("I") is not exact; it is, rather, an image of him as an observer. His reader is not left with the egotistical indulgences of the author, but afforded insight into how that author's images are perceived. The reader is held at a distance, permitting us to observe how Sønderby observes. His essays are filled with minute detail, chronicling the landscape, man, and the animal world. His point of departure is often specifically Danish, but he can also render pristine descriptions of life abroad. The seemingly insignificant phenomena of everyday life, such as a facial expression or a flower, acquire a sensory quality in his prose. His reader feels, smells, and hears. Accordingly, his language shows more than it tells. At times, Sønderby's language can be taut and subtle; at other times it is humorous and light.

In the collections Hvidtjørnen (1950; The Hawthorn) and Gensyn med havet (1957; Rendezvous with the sea), there is a gradual movement from a specific situation to a more encompassing contemplation of memories about the Danish landscape. Sønderby's digressions, imprecise expressions, and wordplay are reiterated in Det danske land (1952; This Danish land), a collection of essays by various writers which he edited with Otto Gelsted. In his contribution he combines epic and descriptive styles in order to bring his reader closer to the landscape.

The proliferation of Sønderby's essays precludes their remaining within the confines of the traditional essay. He preferred to think of his prose pieces as myter (myths), like those of Johannes Vilhelm Jensen. While Sønderby's prose fiction is often critical and pessimistic in tone, his essays are artistic and optimistic. By transgressing space and time, the essays speak encouragingly to man's common values.

VIVIAN GREENE-GANTZBERG

Biography

Born 10 July 1909 in Esbjerg, Denmark. Studied at the Øregaard Gymnasium, graduated 1927; law at the University of Copenhagen, law degree, 1935. Journalist, including film reviewer, for several Copenhagen newspapers, 1930s–1940s. Secretary to the director, Government Committee for Greenland, 1935. Solicitor, 1936–37. Married, 1940. Founding member, Danish Academy, 1960. Died in Thy, 8 August 1966.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Grønlandsk sommer, 1941

Forsvundne somre, 1946

Hvidtjørnen, 1950; as The Hawthorn, translated by Reginald Spink, 1966

Gensyn med havet, 1957

De blå glimt, 1964; as The Blue Flashes, translated by Reginald Spink, 1966

The Blue Flashes; The Hawthorn; Danish Harbours, translated by Reginald Spink, 1966

De danske havne: Efterladte essays, edited by Inge Sønderby and Mogens Knudsen, 1969

Danmarkskortet: Udvalget essays om landskaber og mennesker, edited by Inge Sønderby and Mogens Knudsen, 1970

Other writings: four novels (Midt i en jazztid, 1931; To mennesker mødes, 1932; En kvinde er overflodig, 1936; De kolde flammer, 1940), plays, and memoirs. Also coedited (and contributed to) the anthology Det danske land (1952).

Bibliographies

Gadman, Peter, in Knud Sønderbys forfatterskab, Copenhagen: Vinten, 1976

Hellum, Dan, Knud Sønderby: Bibliografi og produktionsregistrant, 1925–74, Copenhagen: Danmarks Biblioteksskole, 1976

Further Reading

Bager, Poul, Fylde og tomhed: Om Knud Sønderbys forfatterskab, Copenhagen: Gyldendal, 1984:167–76

Bjørnvig, Thorkild, Digtere, Copenhagen: Gyldendal, 1991

Gadman, Peter, Knud Sønderbys forfatterskab, Copenhagen: Gyldendal, 1976

Kaas Johansen, Niels, in Danske digtere i det 20. aarhundrede, vol. 2, edited by Kaas Johansen and Ernst Frandsen, Copenhagen: Gyldendal, 1951:451–64

Sandersen, Vibeke, Essayet—oprør og tradition, Copenhagen: Gyldendal, 1975:55–64

Svendsen, Hanne Marie, “Livsstil og klasseforskel,” in Tilbageblik på300'erne:

Litteratur, teater, kulturdebat, vol.1, Copenhagen: Vendelkær, 1967:80–93
 Wamberg, Niels Birger, “Knud Sønderbys gratie,” Vinduet 17 (1963):86–89

Sontag, Susan

American, 1933–

Susan Sontag’s label “the Dark Lady of American Letters” refers to more than her physical features. From her persistent championing of European writers and thinkers to her refusal to ally herself with any particular school of thought, Sontag is usually considered an outsider by American academia—respected for her sharp intelligence but treated warily. In part this may be because she has been so critical of the approach that modern academics take to art. Sontag demands nothing less than a revamping of the way we perceive art; to some this may be too demanding and threatening a shift in perspective.

In Sontag’s first collection, Against Interpretation and Other Essays (1966), the title essay (first pub. 1964) and “On Style” (1965) together serve as a position statement from which Sontag has never deviated. In them she discusses the way we look at art and the distorting nature of modern interpretation, in which we no longer see works of art as simply existing, but look for their underlying meanings. This act of interpretation ignores the true nature of art. As Sontag explains in “On Style,” “A work of art encountered as a work of art is an experience, not a statement or an answer to a question. Art is not only about something; it is something. A work of art is a thing in the world, not just a text or commentary on the world.” Rejecting interpretation, she advocates what she calls in the title essay “transparence,” which means “experiencing the luminousness of the thing in itself, of things being what they are.”

Crucial to approaching art experientially is the abandonment of the distinction between content and form, a distinction which usually privileges content over form and further encourages the search for meaning. Sontag contends that style and content are so intricately interwoven that they cannot be disentangled without damaging the integrity of the artwork. Separating art into different levels implies a hierarchy, whereas a transparent surface reveals everything at once; there are no hidden depths or meanings. In other words, style is a part of content, and content a part of style; the “meaning” of art lies in the experiencing of both together without analysis.

The other essays in Against Interpretation either extend Sontag’s initial argument into specific areas of culture, such as in her famous essay “Notes on ‘Camp’” (1964), or provide examples of how that argument might be applied, for instance in essays on theater, film, and European authors and thinkers like Nathalie Sarraute, Georg Lukács, and Simone Weil.

Sontag’s second collection, Styles of Radical Will (1969), confirmed her reputation as a major, but controversial, intellectual force in the U.S. In it she writes again on theater and film, on European thinkers such as Walter Benjamin and E.M.Cioran, and on pornography. Also included is “The Aesthetics of Silence” (1967), a restatement of Sontag's thesis against interpretation, this time focusing on what the spectator should bring to the contemplation of art: silence. In the ideal meeting between art and viewer, Sontag explains, "The spectator would approach art as he does a landscape. A landscape doesn't demand from the spectator his 'understanding,' his imputations of significance, his anxieties and sympathies; it demands, rather, his absence, it asks that he not add anything to it. Contemplation, strictly speaking, entails self-forgetfulness on the part of the spectator: an object worthy of contemplation is one which, in effect, annihilates the perceiving subject."

The act of perception is given book-length treatment in one of Sontag's best-known works, On Photography (1977). Sontag finds in photography the ideal art form for her pursuit of transparency. Because photography has a leveling effect on its subject matter (i.e. anything can be photographed and so nothing is privileged) and is so prolific in society that it destroys the boundaries and definitions of art, the viewer can approach a photograph freely with no expectation of discovering what it means; its transparency is anticipated.

Given Sontag's suspicion of levels of meaning, it is not surprising that her own writing style is clear, unfussy, and free of metaphors. She is also careful to remove herself from the text, even from a work like the extended essay Illness as Metaphor (1978), which considers the symbolic meanings attached to tuberculosis in the 19th century and cancer in the 20th. Sontag wrote Illness as Metaphor after she herself had cancer, but avoided the easy temptation of mentioning her own experience, only referring to it briefly in the later Aids and Its Metaphors (1989), which extends her argument to include Aids.

Throughout her essays, most of Sontag's references are to Europeans, to the point where she can appear scathing and condescending about her fellow countrymen. Certainly in "What's Happening in America" (1967), she is very negative about the state of her country. Her sensitivity and alliance to the European intellectual tradition display the generalist nature of her work and her position as a universal intellectual. Monika Beyer has called her "a free-floating commentator on the general culture, unaffiliated to specific interest groups or institutions" (Liam Kennedy quoting Beyer, 1995).

However, as Liam Kennedy points out, despite acting as a free agent, Sontag has long been associated with the "New York intellectuals" of the 1960s, particularly through her connection with the Partisan Review, which she idolized as a youth and began contributing to in 1961. The New York intellectuals advocated cultural criticism and intellectual generalism, and used the essay form as the most appropriate genre in which to explore ideas. Kennedy feels that "It is no accident Sontag should find herself most at home with the essay form, selfconsciously manipulating its provisional and performative features, using it to 'try out' ideas. She favours disjunctive forms of argument: aphoristic and epigrammatic modes of critical expression are widely applied in her writings."

In 1992, Sontag published her third novel, The Volcano Lover, and since then has declared that she will concentrate on writing fiction rather than essays. Perhaps she feels she has made her point; it is now up to her readers and admirers to apply to her fiction the approach to art she has advocated since "Against Interpretation" and has herself so successfully applied throughout her oeuvre.

THERESA WERNER

Biography

Born 16 January 1933 in New York City. Studied at the University of California, Berkeley, 1948–49; University of Chicago, 1949–51, B.A., 1951; Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1954–57, M.A., 1955; St. Anne's College, Oxford, 1957. Married Philip Rieff, 1950 (divorced, 1958): one son. Taught English, philosophy, or religion at the University of Connecticut, Storrs, 1953–54, Harvard University, 1955–57, City College of New York and Sarah Lawrence College, Bronxville, New York, 1959–60, and Columbia University, New York, 1960–64. Editor, Commentary, New York, 1959; also contributor to various other periodicals, including Partisan Review, New York Review of Books, Atlantic Monthly, Nation, and Harper's. Also directed several plays and films. Awards: several fellowships; American Academy Ingram Merrill Foundation Award, 1976; National Book Critics Circle Award, 1977; Academy of Sciences and Literature Award (Germany), 1979. Member, American Academy, 1979; Officer, Order of Arts and Letters (France), 1984.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Against Interpretation and Other Essays, 1966

Styles of Radical Will, 1969

On Photography, 1977

Illness as Metaphor, 1978

Under the Sign of Saturn, 1980

A Susan Sontag Reader, 1982

Aids and Its Metaphors, 1989

Other writings: three novels (The Benefactor, 1963; Death Kit, 1967; The Volcano Lover, 1992.), short stories, the play Alice in Bed (1993), and screenplays.

Further Reading

Hardwick, Elizabeth, Introduction to A Susan Sontag Reader, New York: Farrar Straus Giroux, 1982; Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1983

Jeffords, Susan, "Susan Sontag," in Modern American Critics Since 1955, edited by Gregory S. Jay, Dictionary of Literary Biography, vol. 67, Detroit: Gale Research, 1988

Kennedy, Liam, Susan Sontag: Mind as Passion, Manchester: University of Manchester Press, 1995

Poague, Leland, Conversations with Susan Sontag, Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1995

Sayres, Sohnya, Susan Sontag: The Elegiac Modernist, New York: Routledge Chapman and Hall, 1989; London: Routledge, 1990

Sørensen, Villy

Danish, 1929–

Recognized as contemporary Denmark's most significant philosopher, Villy Sørensen also enjoys a reputation as an accomplished writer of fantastic tales, short stories, and criticism. In an interview in 1966, Sørensen pointed to the related themes of his fiction and essays and confessed that he began to write philosophically in order to explain what he had said in other ways. When asked whether there is a line between his essays and his fiction, he replied that while there are different ways to express oneself, what one expresses remains the same. Sørensen ended his remark with the reminder that the reading public of the 1950s understood and discussed symbols less than they did a decade later. He had initially turned to the essay out of a practical need to be understood.

Following his debut in 1953 with the collection of symbolic tales entitled Sære fortællinger (Strange Stories), Sørensen proceeded to pursue in nonfiction themes of division and dualism as they affect the individual and society. In several of his essays he attacks totalitarian tendencies which endanger the development of individual personality. To a large extent, both his fiction and his essays deal with the consequences of man's metaphorical "fall" (faldet) from grace which signaled the breakdown of values and man's inability to act. In interpreting the "fall" in the context of contemporary society, Sørensen lends his oeuvre a cyclical character.

Although Sørensen had written short prose pieces as a member of the group of young philosophically inspired writers identified as Heretikere (Heretics), he did not publish his first collection of essays until 1959. In Digtene og dæmoner (Poets and demons), Sørensen takes up an underlying theme also identifiable in his fiction: the contradiction between the absolute and the abstract. In doing so, he offers interpretations and evaluations as a literary, aesthetic, and social critic. The presence of opposites in the dialectical concept of man, in the conflict of myth and the critical denial of myth, and in the discrepancies of ontological versus societal determinants of man's environment define the contradictory texture of Sørensen's essays.

The irony that Sørensen does not consider himself an essayist ("I do not regard myself as anything described by a word ending in -ist. Neither philosophically nor artistically") and yet composes works which reflect the characteristics of the essay suggests not so much his refusal to identify with other authors of this genre as it does his individuality as a writer and thinker and his ambition to employ the genre consistent with his own goals. Notwithstanding, the titles of his collections of essays and the tone of the individual works seem to justify the use of the term "essay." Hverken—eller (1961; Neither—nor), Uden mål—og med (1973; With and without a goal), and Den gyldne middelvej (1978; The golden mean) all suggest the noncommittal attitude assumed by the essayist. Moreover, Sørensen's consciousness of the requisites of the essay are now revealed in his diaries. In contemplating the nature of the goals of Digtene og dæmoner, for example, Sørensen uses not only the term essay, but essaysamling (collection of essays) and essaybog (essay book) as well. In his struggle to create “the book,” he reminded himself that a work which comprises a collection of essays must have organic cohesion.

Sørensen’s readers view him in large part as an author of essays grouped around themes, reflecting the recognition of opposites. He addresses the contrasting relationships between art and democracy, natural science and psychology, as well as the interplay of power, morality, and nature. Although Sørensen’s thinking is grounded in the classical tradition, at the same time it reflects his personal thoughts as well as current debate. Sørensen’s concern for society’s development takes the form of social criticism. He admonishes not only with respect to the welfare of Denmark (“Det indre Danmarksbillede” [Denmark from within]), but that of Europe as well (“Det faldne Europe” [Fallen Europe]).

As a writer of essays, Sørensen understands how to intimate knowledge without tiring his readers. He is free of provincialism and sees as one of his goals awakening the sensitivity of his readers to critical thinking. He does not deny the pedagogical vein of his writing; in fact, he emphasizes that irony and pedagogy have always been compatible. Moreover, Sørensen expresses himself in an accessible manner, using humor as one of his most effective tools.

A good example of his essay style can be found in “Den frie vilje” (Free will), which appeared in the literary and cultural journal Perspektiv (Perspective) in 1957–58. In it he echoes Montaigne and Ludvig Holberg, employing the dialectic of gallantry to present his views as the nobleman who circumvents war by keeping his sword in the sheath. For him, the essay essentially becomes a test of strength, a proving ground; he fluctuates between argument and counterargument, examination and reexamination. As soon as he exhausts one perspective, he turns the discussion toward another. Characteristically, “Den frie vilje” contemplates man’s relationship to freedom, guilt, and predestination by juxtaposing divergent means of interpretation, but offers no solution to its inherent problems.

In this and other essays, Sørensen’s prose is charged by his use of puns, his attention to hidden meanings, and his fascination with paradox. His leaning toward the essay as a genre grew partly out of his need to clarify his fiction and partly out of his recognition of the crisis of his time. No longer able to identify a unifying culture in Denmark or Europe, he sought to break the silence of his generation. His criticism of contemporary society made him a dominant figure in postwar Danish culture. Inspired by Søren Kierkegaard, Carl Jung, and Hermann Broch among others, he found in the essay a means of questioning the materialism and rationalism of the day.

VIVIAN GREENE-GANTZBERG

Biography

Born 13 January 1929 in Frederiksberg, near Copenhagen. Studied at the Veste Borgerdydskole, graduated 1947; philosophy at the University of Copenhagen, 1947–51, and the University of Freiburg, Baden, 1951–53. Editor, with Klaus Ribbjerg, Vindrosen (Wind rose), 1959–63; editor, På Vej (En route), 1978–81, and Gyldendal Kulturbibliotek, 1987–91. Awards: many, including the Danish Critics Prize, 1959;

Danish Academy Prize, 1962; Gyldendal Prize, 1965; Nathansen Award, 1969; Holberg Medal, 1973; Brandes Prize, 1973; Steffens Prize, 1974; Nordic Council Prize, 1974; Amalienborg Prize, 1977; Hans Christian Andersen Award, 1983; Swedish Academy Nordic Prize, 1986; Poul Henningsen Prize, 1987; Wilster Prize, 1988; honorary degree from the University of Copenhagen. Member, Danish Academy.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Digtere og dcemoner: Fortolkninger og vurderinger, 1959

Hverken—eller: Kritiske betragtninger, 1961

Uden mdl—og med: Moralske tanker, 1973

Den gyldne middelvej og andre debatindlaeg fra 70'erne, 1978

Demokratiet og kunsten, 1989

Den frie vilje, 1992

Other writings: several collections of short stories and retold Nordic myths, philosophical works, and diaries. Also translated Erasmus, Kafka, and Hermann Broch.

Bibliography

Sønderiis, Ebbe, Villy Sørensen: En ideologisk analyse, Kongerslev: GMT, 1972

Further Reading

Claussen, Claus, editor, Digtere i forhør, Copenhagen: Gyldendal, 1966:11–34

Petersen, Ulrich Horst, “Om (nogle af) Villy S0rensens historier,” in his Frihed og tabu:

Essays, Copenhagen: Gyldendal, 1971: 108–66

Rossel, Sven, “Villy Sørensen: Mythologist, Philosopher, Writer,” World Literature

Today 65 (1991):41–45

Schnack, Arne, “Den sørensenke dialektik,” Vindrosen 4 (1965)

Southey, Robert

British, 1774–1843

Robert Southey thought of himself primarily as a poet, but the bulk of his writing is prose. His “reactionary” image is only partially correct. In his youth he had been a committed radical, and as a mature man he was rather more liberal than his erstwhile friends Coleridge and Wordsworth. While The Life of Nelson (1813) is indeed a work imbued with nationalistic rhetoric and pride, and Southey’s opposition to an extension of civil rights to Roman Catholics (as well as his colonialist convictions) was unabashed, it is also true that his writings of journalistic history usually send mildly reformist messages, compatible with a benevolently ironic kind of Enlightenment ideology: he opposed anti-Semitism, supported the secret ballot, and protested against the conditions of the industrial proletariat.

Southey's gravitation toward the essay can be seen even in some of his poems such as "The Battle of Blenheim" (1798) or, in a more humorous vein, "Snuff" or "The Pig" (both 1799). It comes to full fruition in The Doctor (1834–47), a novel in name only, but in its substance an excellent connecting link between the English familiar essay of the 18th century and the newer, more whimsical, and more erudite developments that had been initiated by contemporaries such as Charles Lamb, Leigh Hunt, and William Hazlitt. Written in the tradition of Sterne's Tristram Shandy, the text (unfinished at the time of Southey's mental decline and death) further deconstructs or even explodes any novelistic framework. The different chapters become conversational essays, and as digressions gain full autonomy inside the text. Southey's impressive but disorderly and subjective erudition allows him to switch nonchalantly from disquisitions on topographical etymology to comments on equitation and horse-raising, from witty associative examinations of the symbolism of the letter "D" to loud admiration for folk superstitions, lore, or obsessions. Besides these we find anecdotes, homilies, genre sketches, exercises in the whimsical and the absurd, and Southey's ambition to distill "wine into alcohol," i.e. to develop symptomatology into a substitute for grave and systematic informational intake. The Doctor is a work in which a kind of philosophy of detail is worked out by concrete illustration; the book turns into an encyclopedia of the essay, bringing under one roof the different kinds of texts that had been the object of experimentation by other Romantics. There are also intriguing signs that (despite his patriarchal ideology) Southey was trying to approach by indirection a kind of feminine discourse (a fact to which he himself alludes several times) stripped of logocentric impositions.

More conventionally essayistic writings are those in which, by the late 1820s and early 1830s, Southey gives expression to his vision of a "traditional" England, a pre-capitalist and pre-modern, Horatian construct: a harmonious, modestly self-satisfied environment in which contact with nature could be preserved at all times, with the admission of slow and carefully selected movements toward progress. It is surprising how many of the key themes of Victorian England in general (and of Disraeli's "progressive conservatism" in particular) are clearly outlined in Southey's sociopolitical essays.

At the opposite end of the essayist spectrum is the short, dry notation of odd facts (Omniana, 1812; Common-Place Book, posthumously pub. 1849–51). Southey is overwhelmed by and enthusiastic about the explosive expansion of knowledge in history, geography, the natural sciences, and the humanities that occurred at the turn of the century. He plunges deep into this sea of knowledge, coming up with various objects and episodes which he holds up to attention. These are expected to have an eloquence of their own, so that readers can draw their own conclusions. The rhetoric of strange facts also becomes a kind of subjective alternative to the vast ordering and disciplinary systems emerging in Southey's time.

A consistently anti-canonical streak in Southey's intellectual make-up also connected him with essayistic attitudes. He turned happily toward the margins of Europe and the West (Portugal, Brazil, Wales), chose Indian and Arabic themes for some of his main epic poems, and lauded (with a puzzled smile) the “uneducated,” trivial, and “low-class” poets: “waterpoets,” “old servants,” men and women alike.

For all such preferences of taste, temperament, and ideology, it is obvious that a generic vehicle of ambiguity and multiple meanings, unsuited to definitive statements, was a sheer necessity for Southey. The continuing scholarly indifference to and public ignorance of him is strange, regrettable, and unjustified.

VIRGIL NEMOIANU

Biography

Born 12 August 1774 in Bristol. Studied at Westminster School, London, 1788–92: expelled for publishing a satire on corporal punishment in the school paper; Balliol College, Oxford, 1793–94, where he met and became friends with Samuel Taylor Coleridge; also studied law, 1797. Married Edith Fricker, 1795 (died, 1837): one daughter (another died in infancy) and one son. Lived in Portugal, 1795–96 and 1800–01, and at Westbury, near Bristol, 1798–99. Began writing reviews, from 1796, for journals including the Monthly Magazine, Morning Post, Critical Review, Annual Review, and Quarterly Review. Settled near William Wordsworth at Greta Hall, Keswick, 1803. Formed with Wordsworth and Coleridge the so-called “Lake School,” the most structured expression of early English Romanticism. Poet Laureate, 1813–43. Received a government pension, 1835. Married Caroline Ann Bowles, 1838. Died (of a stroke) at Greta Hall, 21 March 1843.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Letters Written During a Short Residence in Spain and Portugal, 1797; revised edition, 1799; revised edition, as Letters Written During a Journey in Spain, and a Short Residence in Portugal, 2 vok, 1808

Letters from England: By Don Manuel Alvarez Espiella, 2, vols., 1807

Omniana, or Horae Otiosiores, with Samuel Taylor Coleridge, 2 vols., 1812; edited by Robert Gittings, 1969

Vindiciae Ecclesiae Anglicanae: Letters to Charles Butler, Comprising Essays on the Romish Religion and Vindicating the Book of the Church, 1826

Sir Thomas More; or, Colloquies on the Progress and Prospects of Society, 2 vols., 1819–31

Essays, Moral and Political, 2 vols., 1832

Selections from the Prose Works, edited by I. Moxon, 1832; as The Beauties of the Prose Works, 1833

The Doctor, 7 vols., 1834–47 (vols. 6 and 7 edited by John Wood Warter)

Common-Place Book, edited by John Wood Warter, 4 vols., 1849–51

Select Prose, edited by Jacob Zeitlin, 1916

The Contributions of Robert Southey to the Morning Post, edited by Kenneth Curry, 1984

Other writings: poetry (including the long epic poems Thalaba the Destroyer, 1801;

The Curse of Kehatna, 1810; Roderick, the Last of the Goths, 1814), two plays, works of history, biographies of Nelson (1813), Wesley (1820), and Cowper (1835), journals, and much correspondence.

Bibliography

Curry, Kenneth, Robert Southey: A Reference Guide, Boston: Hall, 1977

Further Reading

Bernhardt-Kabish, Ernest, Robert Southey, Boston: Twayne, 1977
Curry, Kenneth, Southey, London and Boston: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1975

Dowden, Edward, Southey, New York: Harper, 1980 (original edition, 1879)

Simmons, Jack, Southey, London: Collins, 1945; New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1948

Raimond, Jean, Robert Southey: L'Homme et son temps, l'œuvre, le rôle, Paris: Didier, 1968

Sovremennik

Russian journal, 1836–1866

Founded by the poet Aleksandr Pushkin in 1836, Sovremennik (The contemporary) became one of the most successful and influential liberal journals of 19th-century Russia. Like the other so-called “thick journals” of the period, Sovremennik appealed to an increasingly broad readership by offering a mixture of contents, ranging from political essays to literary reviews and essays, to works of poetry and imaginative prose. Its political slant was always of a liberal, “Westernizing” tendency—that is, it advocated adapting to Russian society Western intellectual currents and the basic position of Western reform movements—but after 1856, when the radical critic Nikolai Chernyshevskii assumed the primary duties as editor, Sovremennik became the vehicle for political writings of the extreme socialist left.

Sovremennik went through three major phases in its 30-year career. The first of these, from 1836 to 1846, was its least successful, as the journal lost circulation and influence due to a combination of ineffective editorship and oppressive literary censorship. Although Pushkin had conceived of Sovremennik as a liberal political literary journal, he died after the journal’s first year, having produced only four issues. After his death and the political scandal surrounding it the journal became even more subject to scrutiny by the censorship department of Tsar Nicholas I. The editorship passed to the hands of Piotr Pletnev, Pushkin’s good friend and a professor of literature at the University of St. Petersburg. Under Pletnev Sovremennik became a strictly literary journal containing memoirs, short stories, and lyric poetry. Although by publishing some of these texts in Sovremennik—particularly the works of Nikolai Gogol’ and of the poet Fedor Tiutchev, as well as the posthumous works of Pushkin—Pletnev was performing an important service for the Russian reading public, on the whole he and his editors were offering fare not to the taste of Russian readers, who had outgrown (as they thought) lyric poetry and demanded instead greater realism from their writers. In 1846 Pletnev sold the journal to Nikolai Nekrasov and Ivan Ivanovich Panaev, under whose editorship Sovremennik became the most influential liberal journal in Russia.

Nekrasov’s acquisition of Sovremennik (Panaev’s contribution was essentially financial) launched the journal’s second period of ever-increasing influence and financial success, which lasted from 1847 to 1855. The first issue under Nekrasov (January 1847) contained contributions by the best-known names of Russian literature in the 19th century: poetry by Nekrasov, prose by Ivan Turgenev and Fedor Dostoevskii, political writings of Aleksandr Herzen, and literary criticism by Vissarion Belinskii. Subsequent issues would contain early works of such writers as Lev Tolstoi and Ivan Goncharov; almost every significant figure in Russian literature of this period appeared on the pages of Sovremennik under Nekrasov’s editorship.

The tone of Sovremennik in these years was heavily influenced by the legacy of Belinskii, the leading social and literary critic of the 1840s. Indeed, Belinskii had been involved in Nekrasov and Panaev’s original plans to take over Pletnev’s dwindling Sovremennik as a move to undermine, or at least to counterbalance, the influence of the primary Westernizer journal, Otechestvennye Zapiski (Fatherland notes): Belinskii had been its editor and main contributor, yet by 1846 he wished to break from it and establish a rival journal. Before his death in 1848 Belinskii published in Sovremennik two important articles surveying Russian literature in the years 1846 and 1847.

Despite the participation of Russia’s foremost writers and liberal-minded thinkers, the material published in Sovremennik was severely restricted by the censorship committee until the death of Tsar Nicholas I in 1855. The role of official censorship in tsarist Russia—no less than in the Soviet Union cannot be underestimated. After the revolutionary movements that swept Europe in 1848, censorship in Russia interfered with all publications to an even greater extent than before. As a result, the editors of Sovremennik had to be satisfied with publishing mild social criticism as it appeared in works of fiction; the most talented author of this type of writing was Turgenev (whose Zapiski okhotnika [1852.; A Sportsman’s Notebook] and other short fiction were published in Sovremennik in their entirety), although the works of the young Dostoevskii and the translated works of Charles Dickens also served this purpose.

After Nicholas’ death and the ascension to the throne of his more liberal-minded son, the “Reformer-Tsar” Alexander II, censorship in Russia enjoyed a respite, albeit a brief one. With Alexander’s reign the third phase of Sovremennik’s activity began, characterized by the radical socialist politics of its primary editors and contributors, Chernyshevskii and Nikolai Dobroliubov. Nekrasov was still the editor-in-chief of the journal, and indeed remained so until it was shut down in 1866; however, after 1856 he increasingly entrusted the editorial duties to his young protégé, Chernyshevskii, whose willingness and ability to work full-time for the journal had greatly impressed the older man as much as his critical abilities.

With Chernyshevskii's editorship the tone of Sovremennik changed tremendously. A particularly prevalent social issue which was aired in the journal's pages was that of Russian serfdom. On the eve of the emancipation of the serfs, Chernyshevskii, Dobroliubov, and their followers refused to support the Tsar's reform efforts and persistently published articles comparing serfdom in Russia to slavery in the United States; it is significant in this regard that the first Russian translation of Harriet Beecher Stowe's abolitionist novel Uncle Tom's Cabin appeared in the 1857 issues of Sovremennik. Typically, when the Emancipation Decree was finally passed in 1861 there was no mention of it at all in Sovremennik: Nekrasov as well as Chernyshevskii and Dobroliubov realized that the Tsar and his ministers had done the minimum they thought possible, and that it was the landowners and not the peasants who benefited from the "reform."

Although a large part of the journal was still devoted to belles-lettres, the literature of this period had a strong and undisguised dimension of social and political criticism, earning the label "literature of accusation" (oblichitel'naia literature). Although the more moderate liberal writers such as Turgenev and Lev Tolstoi continued to publish in its pages, clashes over politics became increasingly frequent. In 1858 a final break occurred between the liberals and radicals. Although as a result of this conflict Sovremennik lost many of its most celebrated contributors, its profits increased tremendously as the Russian reading public proved eager to read about the issues addressed in this newly radical journal. Turgenev's novel Nakanune (1860; On the Eve) was published in Sovremennik, yet the critical review of it by Dobroliubov, a dogmatic article entitled "Kogda zhe pridet nastoiashchii den'?" (1860; "When Will the Real Day Come?"), which has since become a classic of Russian revolutionary writing, so alarmed Turgenev that he attempted to have it withdrawn. When Chernyshevskii published the review anyway, which deliberately misinterpreted Turgenev's novel in order to cast a more revolutionary reading on it, Turgenev broke with the editors of Sovremennik for good.

Thanks to the radical politics of their contributions, Chernyshevskii and Dobroliubov's Sovremennik suffered increasing pressure from the censor. In 1862 it was shut down for eight months when Chernyshevskii was arrested for inciting student and peasant disturbances. Finally in 1866, after its editors printed Chernyshevskii's revolutionary novel Chto delat'? (1863; What Is to Be Done?), which he wrote in prison, Sovremennik was closed down.

The significance of Sovremennik for 19th-century Russian literature and social thought cannot be overstressed. In its 30 years of circulation the major liberal debates and ideas—not to mention some of the most important works of Russian literature—were aired in its pages. The well-known historical division of intellectual "fathers and sons" (made famous in Turgenev's novel of that name) is best documented by reading Sovremennik: this is the break of the "men of the sixties" (Chernyshevskii, Dobroliubov, and their followers) from the "men of the forties" (Belinskii, Herzen, and others), whose aesthetic liberalism was not to the taste of the more practicalminded younger generation. Among the most important essays in Russian thought and criticism that appeared for the first time in Sovremennik are Belinskii's above-mentioned "surveys" of Russian literature. These two articles both supported Sovremennik's political agenda by stressing the social significance of works of Russian literature, and alarmed the liberal editors by criticizing the “humanist” ideas of Russian Westernizers and insisting on a unique Russian national identity (P. V. Annenkov, 1968). In 1860 “Gamlet i Don Kixot” (“Hamlet and Don Quixote”), Turgenev’s celebrated characterization of Russian literary heroes, appeared. It quickly became a classic treatise on the Russian character. In it Turgenev identifies two primary “types” of hero in Russian literature: the “Hamlet” type, or intellectual, who thinks and reasons but is incapable of action, and the “Don Quixote” type, a dreamer, who alone is capable of effective action, however foolish he at times appears. In Sovremennik’s final years the most important critical reviews to appear were by Dobroliubov, particularly his reading of Turgenev’s novel, “When Will the Real Day Come?,” and his classic characterization of the “illness” of the Russian intelligentsia, “Chto takoe Oblomovshchina?” (1859; “What Is Oblomovitis?”).

CATHERINE O’NEIL

Further Reading

- Annenkov, P.V., The Extraordinary Decade: Literary Memoirs, edited by Arthur P. Mendel, Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1968
- Berlin, Isaiah, The Russian Thinkers, edited by Henry Hardy and Aileen Kelly, London: Hogarth Press, and New York: Viking Press, 1978
- Birkenmayer, Sigmund S., Nikolaj Nekrasov: His Life and Poetic Art, The Hague and Paris: Mouton, 1968
- Corbet, Charles, Nekrasov, l’homme et le poete, Paris: Institut d’Etudes Slaves, 1948
- Granjard, Henri, Ivan Tourguenev et les courants politiques et sociaux de son temps, Paris: Institut d’Études Slaves, 1954
- Hare, Richard, Pioneers of Russian Social Thought, London: Oxford University Press, 1951
- Harper, Kenneth E., “Criticism of the Natural School in the 1840’s,” American Slavic and East European Review 15 (1956): 400–14
- Herzen, Alexander, My Past and Thoughts, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1982 (original translation, 1973)
- Lampert, Evgeny, Sons Against Fathers: Studies in Russian Radicalism and Revolution, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1965
- Nikitenko, Aleksandr, The Diary of a Russian Censor, abridged, edited, and translated by Helen Saltz Jacobson, Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1975 (original Russian edition, 1893)
- Svyatopolk-Mirsky, Dmitry Petrovich, A History of Russian Literature, edited by Francis J. Whitfield, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1949; New York: Knopf, 1964 (original edition, 1926–27)
- Venturi, Franco, Roots of Revolution: A History of the Populist and Socialist Movements in Nineteenth Century Russia, London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1960
- Woehrlin, William F., Chernyshevskii: The Man and the Journalist, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1971

Soyinka, Wole

Nigerian, 1934–

Though best known as a playwright, 1986 Nobel laureate Wole Soyinka has also written numerous volumes of fiction, autobiography, and poetry, as well as over a thousand pages of dense, often difficult literary and cultural criticism. The majority of his essays are widely scattered throughout numerous small journals and obscure newspapers, and so can be difficult to locate. As a result, his best-known and most influential essays are those which are available in three volumes of collected essays: Myth, Literature and the African World (1976) and Art, Dialogue and Outrage: Essays on Literature and Culture (1988) bring together a number of his most important essays on literary criticism and aesthetic theory, while more recently The Open Sore of a Continent (1996) puts together in book form a series of Soyinka's public lectures which examine the present political crisis in Nigeria.

Obi Maduakor (1986) has commented that "Soyinka's literary essays are, to some extent, one large essay. His critical prejudices were formed quite early in his career, and both the early and later essays are crisscrossed by related threads of thought." This is due as much to Soyinka's persistence in examining and re-examining a limited set of issues and concerns, as to the way in which his essays are produced: almost all of them were originally written for lectures or conferences, and older essays are frequently "cannibalized" and used in the writing of newer ones. Hence ideas and phrases often recur in several essays; it is difficult to locate a "master-text" on any given issue that Soyinka discusses. Instead, reference must be made to a series of essays which, for all of their surface similarities, involve surprising about-faces and seemingly contradictory changes of position—inversions which Biodun Jeyifo (1988) attributes to Soyinka's deliberate attempt "almost" to bring about aporias in his writing.

The majority of Soyinka's essays, like those of Chinua Achebe, attempt to establish and argue for a certain vision of the possibilities of African literature. The polemical, passionate, explosive, and oppositional style of his writing has placed him at the center of a number of controversies over the form and function of African writing. Famously, he has been cast in the role of the most outspoken critic of négritude, a position most closely associated with the work of Senegalese writer (and past President) Léopold Senghor and the bolekaja ("come down and fight") critics associated with Chinweizu. In essays such as "The Future of African Writing" (1960), "From a Common Back Cloth" (1963), "Neo-Tarzanism: The Poetics of PseudoTradition" (1975), and the final section of Myth, Literature and the African World, Soyinka's case against négritude emerges. He is critical of both its philosophical and its aesthetic failings. Philosophically, he believes that "négritude's reference points took far too much coloring from European ideas even while its messiahs pronounced themselves fanatically African" (Myth). Instead of developing a genuinely African ontology, Soyinka sees négritude as simply affirming one of the central Eurocentric prejudices against Africans: Europeans are rational and intellectual, while Africans are emotive and intuitive. Aesthetically, négritude encourages “a mounting narcissism which involved contemplation of the contrived self in the supposed tragic grandeur of the cultural dilemma” (Myth). Soyinka discusses this failing of négritude in detail in “And After the Narcissist?” (1966), in which he accuses Senghor of a self-absorption which negates the kind of social action which African literature should ideally promote. For Soyinka, it is only when African fiction achieves a level of “indifferent selfacceptance,” as it does for him in the fiction of Achebe, that African literature becomes “authentic”—no longer, as Soyinka famously says, a “tiger” interested only in its “tigritude,” but a literature able to deal effectively with all aspects of contemporary African reality.

Soyinka’s criticism of négritude is in danger of seeming both unfair and overly dismissive unless it is understood in the context of his more general positions on writing and literature. His attack on négritude is analogous to the criticisms he has launched against the other favorite target of his ripostes Marxist literary criticism. In “Who’s Afraid of Elesin Oba?” (1977) and “The Critic and Society” (1980), he makes his distaste for the artificial imposition of any ideology on literature—whether in the form of négritude’s invocation of a past African pastoral idyll or the Marxist promise of an African utopia to come—abundantly clear. For Soyinka, “the practical effects of literary ideology on the creative process lead to predictability, imaginative constraint and thematic excisions” because literature consists of the “essentially fluid operations of the creative mind upon social and natural phenomena” (Myth). The constraint of having to produce literature within a predetermined ideological system leads to bad, useless, and irrelevant writing which inaccurately represents the conditions and problems of modern African culture. He argues repeatedly for the autonomy of the writer—an autonomy that does not exclude the social relevance of the writer so much as it insures his or her honest reflection of social experience.

Soyinka’s major achievement is perhaps to be found in the collection of interrelated essays entitled Myth, Literature and the African World. In “The Fourth Stage: Through the Mysteries of Ogun to the Origin of Yoruba Tragedy” (originally pub. 1973), he outlines a theory of tragedy uniquely rooted in African representations of experience and reality; this theory, combined with the other essays in Myth, becomes the basis of an entire mythopoeic aesthetics unique in African literature. His aesthetic theory, which takes its inspiration both from Yoruba mythology (most importantly, the gods Ogun, Sango, and Obatala) and from a confrontation with Friedrich Nietzsche’s Die Geburt der Tragödie (1872; The Birth of Tragedy), is notoriously complex and detailed, and resists any simple summary. By comparing the nature of Yoruba tragedy with European models of tragedy and the very different role of hubris in the story of the Yoruba gods, Soyinka produces a theory of tragedy which is anti-mimetic and anti-realistic, and finds its power and symbolic depth in ritual and myth. The significance of the “fourth stage,” the transitional passage between being and non-being, human and non-human, life and death, is that it is here that Ogun sacrifices his being, and tragedy arises. It is useful to consider Soyinka’s own plays through the aesthetics he proposes here; and in general, all of his essays may be seen as in some way offering commentaries and assessments of his own vast literary production.

Biography

Born Akinwande Oluwole Soyinka, 13 July 1934 in Abeokuta. Studied at the Government College, Ibadan, 1946–50; University College, Ibadan, 1952–54; University of Leeds, Yorkshire, 1954–57, B.A. in English. Married: several children. Worked for the Royal Court Theatre, London, 1957–59; founding director, Masks Theatre, Lagos, 1960, and Orisun Theatre, Ibadan, 1964; research fellow in drama, University of Ibadan, 1961–62; lecturer in English, University of Ife, 1963–64, and senior lecturer in English, University of Lagos, 1965–67. Coeditor, Black Orpheus, 1964. Imprisoned for political reasons by the Federal Military Government, Lagos and Kaduna, 1967–69. Artistic director and head of the Department of Theatre Arts, University of Ibadan, 1969–72; fellow, Churchill College, Cambridge, 1973–74, visiting professor, University of Ghana, Legon, 1973–74, University of Sheffield, 1974, Yale University, New Haven, Connecticut, 1979–80, and Cornell University, Ithaca, New York, 1986; professor of comparative literature and head of the Department of Dramatic Arts, University of Ife, 1975–85. Editor, Transition (later Ch'indaba) magazine, Accra, Ghana, 1975–77. Nigerian passport seized, 1994: began living in France. Accused of treason by the Nigerian government, 1997. Awards: many, including the John Whiting Award, 1967; Nobel Prize for Literature, 1986; Benson Medal, 1990; Mondello Prize, 1990; honorary degrees from seven universities and colleges. Fellow, Royal Society of Literature; Member, American Academy of Arts and Letters, and the Academy of Arts and Letters of the German Democratic Republic; Commander, Federal Republic of Nigeria, 1986, Legion of Honor (France), 1989, and the Order of Merit (Italy), 1990; Akogun of Isara, 1989; Akinlatun of Egbaland, 1990.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Myth, Literature and the African World, 1976

The Critic and Society, 1982

This Past Must Address Its Present (Nobel lecture), 1986

Art, Dialogue and Outrage: Essays on Literature and Culture, 1988; revised, enlarged edition, 1993

The Open Sore of a Continent: A Personal Narrative of the Nigerian Crisis, 1996

Other writings: many plays (including The Road, 1965; Madmen and Specialists, 1970; Death and the King's Horseman, 1975), radio plays, two novels (The Interpreters, 1965; Season of Anomy, 1973), poetry, the prison diary The Man Died (1972), and memoirs.

Bibliographies

Gibbs, James, Ketu H.Katrak, and Henry Louis Gates, Jr., Wole Soyinka: A Bibliography of Primary and Secondary Sources, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1986

Okpu, B., Wole Soyinka: A Bibliography, Lagos: Libriservice, 1984

Further Reading

- Adelugba, Dapo, Before Our Very Eyes: Tribute to Wole Soyinka, Ibadan: Spectrum, 1987
- Appiah, Anthony Kwame, "Myth, Literature and the African World," in Wole Soyinka: An Appraisal, edited by Adewale Maja-Pearce, Oxford and Portsmouth, New Hampshire: Heinemann, 1994
- Black American Literature Forum* issue on Soyinka, edited by Henry Louis Gates, Jr., 22, no. 3 (Fall 1988)
- Booth, James, Writers and Politics in Nigeria, London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1981
- Chinweizu, Onwuchekwa Jemie, and Ihechukwu Madubuike, Toward the Decolonization of African Literature, Enugu: Fourth Dimension, 1980; Washington, D.C.: Howard University Press, 1983; London: KPI, 1985
- Crow, Brian, "Soyinka and His Radical Critics: A Review," Theatre Research International 12, no. 1 (Spring 1987):61–73
- Gibbs, James, editor, Critical Perspectives on Wole Soyinka, Washington, D.C.: Three Continents Press, 1980; London: Heinemann, 1981
- Gibbs, James, Wole Soyinka, Basingstoke: Macmillan, 1986
- Irele, Abiola, The African Experience in Literature and Ideology, London: Heinemann, 1981
- Jeyifo, Biodun, "Wole Soyinka: A Transition Interview," Transition 42 (1973):62–64
- Jeyifo, Biodun, The Truthful Lie: Essays in a Sociology of African Drama, London: New Beacon, 1985
- Jeyifo, Biodun, "Introduction: Wole Soyinka and the Tropes of Disalienation," in Art, Dialogue and Outrage by Soyinka, Ibadan: New Horn Press, and New York: Pantheon, 1988:ix–xxix
- Jones, Eldred Durosimi, The Writing of Wole Soyinka, London: Heinemann, revised edition, 1983 (original edition, 1973)
- Literary Half-Yearly* issue on Soyinka, edited by James Gibbs, 28, no. 2 (July 1987)
- Maduakor, Obi, Wole Soyinka: An Introduction to His Writing, New York: Garland, 1986
- Moore, Gerald, Wole Soyinka, London: Evans, 1978 (original edition, 1971)
- Research in African Literatures* issue on Soyinka, edited by James Gibbs, 14, no. 1 (Spring 1983)
- Senghor, Léopold Sédar, "Négritude: A Humanism of the Twentieth Century," in The Africa Reader: Independent Africa, edited by Wilfred Cartey and Martin Kilson, New York: Random House, 1970
- Wright, Derek, Wole Soyinka Revisited, New York: Twayne, 1993

Spanish Essay

Strict criteria based on the Montaignean model yield scant results if they are used in a search for essays through the corpus of Spanish literature. Since 711 Spain has been the Western frontier between the two great branches of Western civilization, Christendom and Islam. The intellectual consequence may be intuited in Lotario's admonition to Anselmo in Don Quixote (Part I, Ch. 33): "It seems to me, Anselmo, that thine is just now the temper of mind which is always that of the Moors, who can never be brought to the error of their creed by quotations from the Holy Scriptures, or by reasons which depend upon the examination of the understanding or are founded upon the articles of faith, but must have examples that are palpable, easy, intelligible, capable of proof, not admitting of doubt, with mathematical demonstrations that cannot be denied, like, 'If equals be taken from equals, the remainders are equal.'" Cervantes depicts the Muslim mind as having progressed no further than the third Common Notion of Euclid's Elements of Geometry, whereas the Christian engages in intellectual speculation. Hence the former has remained stuck in Euclidean space whereas the latter can ponder the indivisibility of infinity because he has been indoctrinated in the Athanasian Creed, which posits that the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost are uncreated, illimitable, and eternal and yet there are not three, but only one uncreated, illimitable, and eternal.

We now know that the Moors never went beyond their invention, al-jabr (algebra), and fell into intellectual oblivion while the Christians developed what Oswald Spengler calls the Faustian mathematics of capitalism, as well as, of course, the essay, a creation of secularized Christendom (also known as Western Civilization). But Cervantes was more broadminded than his nation's rulers. Scientific advances were reserved for the rest of Europe whereas in Spain people were denounced to the Inquisition for being mathematicians. Saint Teresa (1515–82), whose El castillo interior, o Tratado de las moradas (1588; Interior Castle) is deemed by José Luis Gómez-Martínez (1981) to be a model of the spiritual essay, writes in the penultimate chapter of her autobiography: "While reciting the psalm 'Quicumque vult' [i.e. the Athanasian Creed] I was given to understand the manner in which there were one God and three persons, so clearly, that I was awed and greatly consoled. It benefited me greatly in understanding the greatness of God and his wonders, and when I think of the Holy Trinity or when it comes up, it seems that I understand how it can be, and it brings me much contentment." In Spain, then, engaging in especulacion del entendimiento (examination of the understanding) with respect to the indivisibility of infinity appears limited to mystical experience; intellectual speculation in general posed considerable danger.

Owing to this danger, the Spanish mind is usually too cautious to divagate publicly. When a reforming elite acquires power, as during the 18th-century Enlightenment, the consciousness of its role induces it to keep its distance. (An exception to this habit occurs when the intellectual elite is marginalized, as were the early Liberals and the Generation of 1898.) The Spaniard presents a courteous exterior but his interior is hermetically sealed, so that digression and wearing one's heart on one's sleeve, important Montaignean criteria, are rare in Spanish literature. Yet the elegance, wit, and subtlety found in Spain's nonfictional prose more than compensate for this reticence.

When the danger seemed to dissipate, personal opinions were revealed in a manner untypical of Montaignean equanimity. Thus, the great novelist Pio Baroja (1872–1956), addressing his fellow Basques in his collection of essays entitled Las horas solitarias (1918; The solitary hours), judges the mentality of his compatriots in his usual caustic manner: "When one sees a Moor holding one book containing the whole truth, one understands that his race will never produce a Kant or a Newton. The majority of Spaniards, and almost all Basques, are Moors who, instead of carrying the Koran, bear in their spirit the doctrine of Father Astete.” The Jesuit Gaspar Astete’s (1537–1601) Doctrina Cristiana (1599; Christian doctrine) was one of the most widely translated and enduring Spanish works of all time.

It is appropriate, then, to broaden the concept of the essay by speaking of subgenres in which we find works that possess specific literary qualities: mystical essays, biographical essays, satiric essays, political, literary, social, journalistic, and philosophical essays. Even though the purist may categorize some as treatises and others as newspaper articles, they truly possess artistic quality. Moreover, the masterpieces of Spanish literature are often in hybrid genres.

Because it is the only subgenre offering real continuity for several centuries, the feminist essay merits consideration apart from the chronological arrangement used for the rest of the genre. We can begin with the seven “Prohemios” (Proems) placed by Álvaro de Luna (1388?–1453) at the head of his Libro de las claras y virtuosas mujeres (1446; Book of famous and virtuous women), dedicated to the queen. Its author, who seems to have been in correspondence with Joan of Arc, states that women should be allowed to do battle if they wish, and argues that woman is not more responsible than man for the Fall. Another important 15th-century work in this vein is the Triunfo de las donas (Triumph of the ladies) by Juan Rodríguez de la Cámara (c. 1390–c. 1450) who, among other topics, argues that it is woman who evinces the superiority of humankind to the animals because, unlike their females, she looks heavenward during coitus. Not until the early 18th century, however, do we find a truly modern feminist treatise, Defensa de la mujer (Defense of woman), by the most famous of all Spanish essayists, the Benedictine monk Benito Jeronimo Feijóo y Montenegro (1676–1764). Josefa Amar y Borbón (1749–1833) was the first Spanish woman to write feminist essays. The 19th century brings us La mujer (1860; The woman), a book of feminist articles by the Cuban-born poet Gertrudis Gómez de Avellaneda (1814–73), a book and an article by Concepción Sáiz (1850–?), and Concepción Arenal’s (1820–93) La mujer del porvenir (1868; The woman of the future), which antedates by one year John Stuart Mill’s The Subjection of Women. Because her father spent most of his life as a political prisoner, Arenal was brought up completely by women. In the first edition of her book she argues for the ordination of women to the priesthood and civil rights for the fair sex, though not political rights, fearful that it would double the number of assassinations and thus leave children totally rather than half-orphaned. After being informed of the peaceful results of female suffrage in parts of the United States, she changed her position on this point. Arenal was followed as leader of the feminist movement by the great novelist Countess Emilia Pardo Bazan (1851–1921), who, as a faithful Catholic, opposed feminine ordination, and, as a fairly conservative monarchist, opposed universal male suffrage as well because the latter would theoretically allow all males to subjugate all females. In truth, it did not bother her to have the political privileges of the moneyed classes maintained. A dozen years after her death the liberals finally agreed to enfranchise women who then, influenced by the priests, voted them out of power. The most outstanding feminist essayists of the 20th century are María de Maeztu y Whitney (1882–1948) and Carmen Díaz de Mendoza, Countess of San Luis (?–1929).

Antecedents of the essay appear early, as Spain was the first land in Europe to replace Latin with the vernacular in expository prose, partly in order to accommodate Jewish translators of Arabic books. King Alfonso the Learned (1221–84) encouraged the enrichment of Castilian in order to make it suitable for the many important treatises whose redaction he supervised. Oriental literature translated from Arabic sources under his aegis influenced his nephew, Don Juan Manuel (1282–1349?), whose treatises on the education of princes, Libro de los estados (wr. c. 1330; Book of estates), and on the meaning of life, Balaam y Josafat, exhibit a tolerant pragmatism anticipating the humanist basis of the essay. In the kingdom of Aragon, Ramon Llull (i.e. Raymond Lully, 1232–1315) and Francesch Eximenis (1340–1409), the medieval precursors of the mystic essay, wrote in Catalan.

The biographical essay was initiated in the 15th century with Generaciones y semblanzas (Generations and portraits) by Fernán Pérez de Guzmán (1376–1460) and Claros varones de Castilla (1486; Famous men of Castile) by Hernando del Pulgar (1436–93). These pithy sketches of the outstanding figures of the 15th century display unusual expressiveness in manifesting the authors' psychological intuition, for example, in Pérez de Guzmán's depiction of his uncle, the statesman, diplomat, and scholar Pero López de Ayala (1332–1407) who, as a historiographer, is comparable to his model, Livy. Of great interest likewise are his sketches of three bishops, the first of noble blood, the second of peasant stock, and the third, Pablo de Santa María, Bishop of Burgos, a converted Jew who had been Grand Rabbi of that city. His son (born before his conversion) Alonso de Cartagena (1384–1456), also bishop of Burgos like his father, authored the Respuesta al Marques de Santillana (1444; Reply to the Marquise of Santillana), considered by Juan Marichal (1957) to be the first essay written in Castilian.

Two famous Renaissance thinkers who left Spain wrote their treatises in Latin. Juan Luis Vives (1492–1540) held important posts in England but, as a faithful Catholic, left because of his opposition to Henry VIII's divorce; his De subventionem pauperum (1526; Concerning the Relief of the Poor) supposedly marks the beginning of the so-called Protestant ethic. Miguel Servet (1511–53), a forerunner of William Harvey in researching the circulation of the blood, authored De Trinitatis erroribus (1531; On the Errors of the Trinity), which eventually led to his burning at the stake in Geneva by Calvin and to his esteem among Unitarians. The writings of Erasmists like the Valdés brothers, Alfonso (1490–1532) and Juan (1501?–41), Pedro Mexía (1497–1551), Cristóbal de Villalón (c. 1505–58), and Antonio de Torquemada (fl. 1553–70) cannot really be called essays, but they strongly influenced the genre, and some of them were translated into English in their day. Closer to the genre are works by Antonio de Guevara (1480?–1545), whose Reloj de príncipes (1529; The Dial of Princes) was widely translated. Its most appreciated item is "El villano del Danubio" ("The Peasant of the Danube"), a fictional appeal to a Roman emperor, a veiled allegory, in Américo Castro's opinion, of the manner in which the Indians were being treated by the Spaniards. The antithetical rhetoric of Guevara distances his work from the essay genre, especially in Menosprecio de corte y alabanza de aldea (1539; Scorn for the city and praise for the country), which has not been translated into English, although another work was passed off on the British public with this title and authorship. If we admit that the pseudo-epistolary genre is a variant of the essay, then his Epístolas familiares (1539–41; Golden Epistles), many of which likewise have not been translated, are essays in the most humanistic sense of the word. It may puzzle the contemporary mind to learn that Guevara was, among other things, an Inquisitor, one of the many honors bestowed upon him which he could hardly turn down. Yet we must remember that what characterizes Spanish Renaissance thought is the attempt to Christianize humanism, as evidenced in the didactic prose of Fray Luis de Granada (1504–88), a precursor of Saint Teresa and Fray Luis de León (1527–91).

The baroque period provides us with an anti-Machiavellian treatise, Política de Dios y gobierno de Cristo (wr. 1617, pub. 1626; Politics of God and government of Christ), by the great poet and picaresque novelist Quevedo (1580–1645), and his ascetic treatise, La cuna y la sepultura (1635; The cradle and the grave). Quevedo's writing is always cited as a model of conceptismo (style laden with figures of thought), as opposed to the culteranismo (style laden with rhetorical figures) of the poet Luis de Góngora y Argote (1561–1627). In this respect the Jesuit Baltasar Gracián (1601–58) is a follower of Quevedo. His Criticón (1651–57; The Critick) may be deemed a hybrid of novel and essay, but other works, such as El héroe (1637; The Hero), El político D.Fernando el Católico (1640; The politician Fernando the Catholic), and El discreto (1646; The discreet man, translated as The Compleat Gentleman) fall more closely within the essay genre.

The advent of the Bourbons in the 18th century brought about a long-needed process of renovation and modernization to lift the country from Habsburg decadence. At the beginning of the Spanish Enlightenment the genre was dominated by Feijoo, although some of the writings of Diego de Torres Villarroel (c. 1694–1770) can be considered satiric essays. In the second half we find the incorruptible statesman Gaspar Melchor de Jovellanos (1744–1811), some of whose best work was composed during his political imprisonment. The first person is sparingly used in the expository prose of the Age of Reason, but personal revelation emerges at times in the work of the pre-Romantic José Cadalso (1741–82). His Cartas marruecas (wr. 1789, pub. 1793; Moroccan letters), inspired formally by Montesquieu's Lettres Persanes (1730; Persian Letters) but ideologically by Oliver Goldsmith's The Citizen of the World (1762), is a hybrid of essay and epistolary novel, with three correspondents rather than Montesquieu's two, and traditional enemies rather than inhabitants of a distant nation. Cadalso's Los eruditos a la violeta (1772; The pseudo-intellectuals), on the other hand, is a long satiric essay directed at pedantry. Among the many other meritorious works advocating national reform and modernization, one example is the Cartas sobre los obstáculos que la naturaleza, la opinión y las leyes oponen a la felicidad pública (1808; Letters on the obstacles that nature, opinion, and laws raise against public prosperity) by the economist and minister Francisco Cabarrús (1752–1810) written from prison in 1795, arguing that freedom is necessary for economic development. In the epistolary genre, mention must be made of the letters and impressions of foreign travel, especially to England, of the great playwright Leandro Fernández de Moratín (1760–1828), which in many instances border on the essay. It must also be pointed out that in the 18th century the renovation and perfection of the means of expression were of great concern to reformers, so that excellence of expository style gave treatises the status of literature. Hence the writings of men like the cultural historian Juan Pablo Forner (1756–97), the philologists Gregorio Mayáns y Sísacar (1699–1781) and Lorenzo Hervás y Panduro (1735–1809), the aesthetician Esteban de Arteaga (1747–98), the rhetorician Antonio de Capmany (1742– 1813), and the art critic Antonio Ponz (1725–92) may be included within the essay genre.

The period following the Napoleonic occupation was characterized by growing progressive and liberal agitation, cruelly repressed by traditionalist tyranny. As ecclesiastical authorities were sufficiently influential to suppress the drama and the novel, a genre known as costumbrismo, emulating French writers like Victor Jouy, made its way into newspapers to describe local color, plentiful in a growing capital to which peasants from various parts of Spain, with their peculiar dress, speech, and habits, were migrating in large numbers. The genre culminated in a collection entitled Los españoles pintados por sí mismos (1843–44; The Spaniards, painted by themselves). Some of its practitioners, like Ramon de Mesonero Romanos (1803–82.), were able to inject social criticism into their often witty sketches, but all were outshone by the Romantic suicide Mariano José de Larra (1809–37), who passed off his subtle barbs of political satire as costumbrismo. Mention should also be made of the Letters from Spain (1822), political essays written in English by the exiled poet José María Blanco White (1775–1841). It has been argued that Romanticism came late to Spain owing to rigid censorship during the reign of Ferdinand VII. Its displacement of neoclassicism was marked by a literary controversy between Juan Nicolás Böhl von Faber (1770–1863) and Antonio Alcal Galiano (1789–1865).

The Romantics were followed by the disciples of Julián Sanz del Río (1814–69), who brought back from his studies in Germany the philosophy of Karl Christian Friedrich Krause, whose “panentheism” suited the reforming efforts of the somewhat mystical mentality of the post-Romantic generation. Unlike the Enlightenment reformers, the followers of Krausismo, distrustful of the corrigibility or efficacy of governmental institutions, placed their hopes on the perfectibility of man. By making beauty equivalent to truth and goodness, the Krausists, as Juan López-Morillas (1956) points out, confused metaphysics, aesthetics, and epistemology. From their harmonic rationalism, apparently derived from Pythagorean ideas about music, they concluded that only by the study of art, which reveals the secret galleries of the genuine collective spirit, can history be truly humanized and point the way to universal harmony. Identifying epic poetry with homogeneous and unified culture, and lyric poetry with cultural bankruptcy, pluralist variety, and discordant multiculturalism, Krausists looked forward to a period of reconciliation and harmony brought about by dramatic poetry. Hence they raised the level of respect for belletristic endeavor, an attitude completely new to Spain, and paved the way for the re-examination of its history through its literature, a process that culminated decades later in the work of Américo Castro.

When the Krausists were barred from teaching at the universities, Francisco Giner de los Ríos (1839–1915) founded in 1876 the Institución Libre de Enseñanza (Independent secondary school), which contributed a renewed concept of education to Spain, freeing it from the current practice of indoctrination. The school’s Sunday morning field trips, scheduled at the same time as the church sermons, constituted an astonishing innovation in Spanish pedagogy. Giner’s Estudios sobre educacion (1886; Studies on education) antedate many of John Dewey’s ideas. In this collection can be found “La critica espontanea de los niños en bellas artes” (The spontaneous criticism of children in the fine arts), describing a field trip to the school of fine arts, which had recently received from Italy plaster casts of sculptures by Donatello and della Robbia; these had just been unpacked and were lying pell-mell on the floor. Giner asked his class which they preferred and why. The gist of the children's conversations, eventually resulting in a shift of preference from della Robbia to Donatello, is masterfully recounted in Giner's essay. Also of great interest are his Estudios literarios (1866; Literary studies), Estudios de literatura y arte (1876; Studies of literature and art), Estudios sobre artes industriales (1892; Studies on industrial arts), and Cartas literarias (1878–79; Literary letters).

According to López-Morillas, Krausismo went through three stages, the first being an exposition of its doctrines by Sanz del Rfo; the second, their application and hence adaptation by Giner, Francisco Fernández y González (1833–1917), and others, especially Francisco Canalejas (1834–83), whose optimism differentiates him from his colleagues' meliorism; and the third, represented by Manuel de la Revilla (1846–81) and Urbano González Serrano (1848–1904), in whose thought the philosophy of Krause has been considerably diluted by the influence of positivism, evolutionism, determinism, and neoKantianism. This third generation of Krausists also had to recognize that the dramatic poetry of Romanticism was out of fashion and being replaced by the novel, thus casting doubt on the poetic predictions of their doctrine. Undoubtedly Krausismo had a lasting influence much beyond its time, for example on Unamuno's concept of intrahistoria and on the Galerías of Antonio Machado's poetry. At variance with Krausismo, Catholic traditionalism is represented by the diplomat Juan Donoso Cortás (1809–53), whose Ensayo sobre el catolicismo, el liberalismo, y el socialismo (1851; Essay on Catholicism, Liberalism and Socialism) enjoyed some popularity in Germany, by the Thomist Jaime Balmes (1810–48), and by the great literary historiographer Marcelino Menéndez y Pelayo (1856–1912), the Krausists' most able opponent.

It sometimes happens that persons famous for other genres are not thought of as essayists, even though some of their writings may be more genuinely essayistic than those of colleagues known as practitioners of the genre. Such is the case with the great orator Emilio Castelar (1832–99), who is represented in a well-known collection of the world's famous orations. His Recuerdos de Italia (1872; Recollections of Italy, translated as Old Rome and New Italy) and Un año en París (1875; A year in Paris) are undeservedly forgotten. Castelar, who argued all his life for social justice, combined an impeccable aesthetic appreciation of architecture with a keen understanding of its dwellers. His insight into the character of the inhabitants of various Italian cities is extraordinary. When dealing with Rome, he spends more time on, of all places, the ghetto than on any other. But then, it was his speech in the 1869 Cortes that brought religious freedom to Spain.

The novelists of the latter part of the 19th century are known as the Generation of 1868, this being the date of a revolution that temporarily dethroned the Bourbons and brought about the short-lived reign of Amadeo of Savoy and the equally short-lived First Republic. Among these novelists we find two outstanding essayists in addition to Emilia Pardo Bazán. Juan Valera (1824–1905), besides his novels, is known for some beautiful short stories and an extraordinary erudition, evident in his literary and historical essays. Valera was a Platonist repelled by the excesses of the Romanticism prevalent in his youth as well as the positivism in vogue during his mature years, and his moderation served him well in his profession as a diplomat. Valera also excels in the epistolary genre, closely allied to the essay. His witty comments about the upper classes of the lands where he served constitute an eternal source of amusement. In his Cartas desde Rusia (Letters from Russia), composed at the beginning of his diplomatic career when he accompanied the Duque de Gor on a mission to St. Petersburg, he pokes gentle fun at the duke, at one of his colleagues, at the disparity between the classes, at Russian customs, and at the ugliness of the Russian aristocracy while also admiring their luxury and deploring their tyranny. On the other hand, as a moderate monarchist, in his letters from Washington he expresses some disdain for “the Great Republic,” whose capital had no palaces, and makes hilarious comments about American politicians and the courtship customs of their unchaperoned daughters.

Quite different from Valera’s Andalusian wit is the mixture of irony and sentimentality found in the great Asturian novelist Leopoldo Alas, “Clarín” (1852–1901), whose sarcastic “paliques” (chitchats) against intellectual and ecclesiastical backwardness and the mediocrity of literary figures favored by the politicized Royal Academy induced even more vicious attacks from those he ridiculed. When he criticized the Spanish navy for its ineptitude, evidenced by an inexcusable accident, his diminutive stature provided a pretext for turning down a challenge to a duel by angered officers. His Folletos literarios (1886–91; Literary pamphlets) are of similar tenor. When he was quoted as saying that contemporary Spain only had two and a half poets, Clarín, being asked who was the half-poet, named Manuel de la Revilla. When the latter attacked him in return, Clarín put out a folleto literario entitled A 0,50 poeta (1889; At 0.50 a poet). As a republican, he also directed unjust and nasty barbs at the conservative Catholic Countess Pardo Bazán for her feminism.

Reacting to the loss of the remnants of empire as the result of its war with the United States, a group of young writers to whom one of their members, “Azorín,” gave the name of the “Generation of ‘98,” set out radically to re-examine and alter the Spanish mentality, still immobilized in the ideology developed during the nation’s former glory. Inspired in part by the provocative attitude of Clarín and the caustic exasperation of Larra, whose fame they revived by a much-touted visit en masse to his grave, this generation periodically enjoyed greater freedom to impugn intellectual routinarianism than any previous one. In the essays of Miguel de Unamuno (1864–1936), who yearned to be the intranquilizador de España, we witness the writer’s eagerness to provoke hostile reaction. And some of the 66 articles comprising Las horas solitarias by the great novelist Pío Baroja can almost be called a hybrid of the essay and the temper tantrum. On the other hand, their contemporary, José Martínez Ruiz, “Azorín” (1873–1967), observes the Spanish scene with melancholy, tolerance, and resignation. The great poet Antonio Machado (1875–1939), fictitiously imitating what Plato did for Socrates, composed a long memoir of the thoughts of a nonexistent teacher, Juan de Mairena (1936), which must be called an essay for lack of a better word. The Nobel Prize-winning neurologist Santiago Ramón y Cajal (1852–1934) also published valuable essays on the possibility of scientific renewal in Spain.

Two other important essayists of this generation are Ángel Ganivet (1864–98) and Ramiro de Maeztu (1875–1936), both of whose analyses of the causes of the Spanish character have been superseded by the work of the philologist and historian Américo Castro (1885–1972), greatly influenced in his approach by the ideas of Wilhelm Dilthey.

The generation following that of ‘98, named novecentistas by one of its members, Eugenio d'Ors (1881–1954), includes the physician Gregorio Marañón (1887–1960), who produced extraordinary essays about life in the 16th and 17th centuries from the viewpoints of the history of medicine and Jungian psychology, and the erudite diplomat and novelist, Ramón Pérez de Ayala (1880–1962), whose essays are far more measured than those of the Generation of '98. Indeed, there was bound to be a reaction to the belligerency of Unamuno, and it came with José Ortega y Gasset (1883–1955), internationally recognized for his La deshumanización del arte (1925; The Dehumanization of Art) and La rebelión de las masas (1930; The Revolt of the Masses), the latter greatly influenced by Oswald Spengler, although a couple of comments regarding the German thinker evince a careless reading on Ortega's part. His essay on love attempts to rebut Stendhal's De l'amour (1822; Love) whose author, according to Ortega, was incapable of being in love. Conversely, Ortega, who never produced any fiction, fancied himself a literary critic, in which guise he proved himself incapable of appreciating the art of a great contemporary novelist, Gabriel Miró (1879–1930), some of whose costumbrista sketches surpass this subgenre's 19th-century models. Another great novelist, Ramón Gómez de la Serna (1888–1963), internationally known for his greguerías, produced several surrealist sketches which fit this subgenre. In this generation we should also mention the humorists Wenceslao Fernández Flórez (1885–1964) and Julio Camba (1882–1962), whose essays about the United States were widely read in his day, and Manuel Azaña (1880–1940), author of literary essays and President of the Republic.

The sobering experience of the Civil War injected a cautious tone into the genre. The new generation has been divided into the categories of Traditional Humanists, who sought harmony and compatibility among different viewpoints, Liberal Catholic Humanists, and Socialist Humanists. The term "Medical Humanist," used to characterize Ramón y Cajal and Marañón, was now applied to Pedro Lain Entralgo (1908–), who is also, with the philosophers Xavier Zubiri (1898–1983) and Juan Rof Carballo (1905–), a Conservative Humanist. José Luis Aranguren (1909–) is a Traditional Humanist who, along with the political scientist, philosopher, and late Mayor of Madrid Enrique Tierno Galván (1918–86), belongs to Socialist Humanism.

The end of the Franco era, the attainment of stability and democratic institutions, and the integration of Spain into the European Community have all provided the freedom to facilitate a flowering of literature and new ideas. Some of the émigrés who had returned during a mitigation of the regime's severity rejoined those who had remained. This group includes students of Ortega, like the cosmopolitan philosophers Julián Marías (1914–) and José Ferrater Mora (1912–), María Zambrano (1904–91), Joaquín Xirau (1895–1946), and José Gaos (1902–69), as well as the poets Luis Felipe Vivanco (1907–75) and Pedro Salinas (1891–1951), the diplomat Salvador de Madariaga (1886–1978), and the novelists Benjamín Jarnés (1888–1949), Francisco Ayala (1906–), Rosa Chacel (1898–1994), and Carmen Martín Gaité (1925–), along with scholars who combine literary criticism and historiographic method, like José Antonio Maravall (1911–86). Juan Marichal (1922–) argues in one of the essays of La voluntad de estilo (1957; The will for style) that a new sensitivity among the caste of the 15th-century conversos (descendants of Jews) is at the bottom of the origins of the Spanish essay. The Nobel Prize-winning novelist Camilo José Cela y Trulock (1916–) has composed two book-length essays about his travels through Spain on foot and by donkey. We cannot fail to mention the immensely popular and witty but erudite El español y los siete pecados capitales (1966; The Spaniard and the Seven Deadly Sins) and books with similar titles about other nations, including France and the United States, by Fernando Díaz-Plaja (1918–), not to be confused with the literary historiographer Guillermo Díaz-Plaja (1909–).

An overview of the Spanish essay reveals that some epochs were quite fruitful while others were almost barren, depending on the political situation. Certainly no period was as fiercely anti-intellectual as the Ominous Decade (1823–43) when, in 1827, the professors of the University of Cervera, most of whom belonged to the clergy, sent to the king an exposition stating that “the dangerous novelty of reasoning lies far from our minds.” At other times Spaniards enjoyed relative freedom. Yet the specter of possible repression never failed to haunt the minds of writers, who consequently preferred to express themselves in poetry or prose fiction that contained allegorical levels. In the words of Blanco White found in El Español of January 1811, “Peoples subjected to governments that do not allow free expression possess the liveliness of deaf-mutes to make themselves understood by signs.” Consequently, in order to put ideas in a mild form acceptable to censorship, some essayists may have made themselves appear more conservative than they really were at heart. Their influence might have been swept aside after a loosening of the reins, but they still deserve respect when we view them in their historical context. Conversely, as a result of revolution or national disaster, new generations engaged in bursts of passion, whose literary expression should also be accepted in its historical context. As Marichal puts it, “In the case of Spain, the essayist’s articulation with contemporaneous society is much more changeable [than in Great Britain], and hence, in our essays, the continuity of literary manner characteristic of the English is not as observable. The Spanish essay will prove its worth if we approach it while keeping in mind that relative social stability and political freedom are by no means universal.”

PIERRE L. ULLMAN

Anthologies

- Antología del feminismo*, edited by Amalia Martín-Gamero, Madrid: Alianza, 1975
El concepto contemporáneo de España: Antología de ensayos (1895–1931), edited by Ángel del Río and M.J. Benardete, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1946
El ensayo español del siglo veinte, edited by Donald W. Bleznick, New York: Ronald Press, 1964
Ensayos españoles, edited by Guido Mazzeo, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice Hall, 1973
The Modern Spanish Essay, edited by Alfred Rodríguez and William Rosenthal, Waltham, Massachusetts: Blaisdell, 1969

Further Reading

Alborg, Juan Luis, Historia de la literatura española, Madrid: Gredos, 5 vols., 1966–96

- Ferrater Mora, José, Ortega y Gasset, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, revised edition, 1973 (original edition, 1957)
- Gómez-Martínez, José Luis, Teoría del ensayo, Mexico City: Universidad Nacional Autónoma, 2nd edition, 1992 (original edition, 1981)
- López-Morillas, Juan, The Krausist Movement and Ideological Change in Spain, 1854–1874, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1981 (original Spanish edition, 1956)
- Marichal, Juan, La voluntad de estilo, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1957; revised, enlarged edition, as Teoría e historia del ensayismo hispánico, Madrid: Alianza, 1984
- Mermall, Thomas, The Rhetoric of Humanism: Spanish Culture After Ortega y Gasset, Jamaica, New York: Bilingual Press, 1976
- Río, Ángel del, Historia de la literatura española, New York: Holt Rinehart Winston, revised edition, 2 vols., 1963 (original edition, 1948)
- Salinas y Serrano, Pedro, Reality and the Poet in Spanish Poetry, Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press, 1940

Spanish American Essay

The essay, a protean form that Alfonso Reyes deemed the centaur of the genres, has assumed many shapes and roles in Latin America. Most critics agree that the literary essay was born in Spanish America toward the end of the 18th century as the voice of the Independence movements. The form it acquired did not faithfully follow its European precursors but assumed a sui generis model that reflected the realities of the new world. The Spanish American literary essay is the axis which has aligned the history of every country on the continent. Thus, intellectuals have utilized it as a means to examine, explicate, and theorize about the fate of the Spanish Americas as a whole. In the 20th century it has been instrumental in defining a distinctive Spanish American identity and the ethos of most countries. This does not imply that other types of essay have not been cultivated; however, the literary essay that ideologically follows the genesis of Spanish America is the most representative of the genre. Furthermore, most Latin American literati bring into their writing an eclectic intellectual baggage because of the multiple roles they play within the framework of their countries' circumstances: i.e. they are statesmen, physicians, professors, engineers, or philosophers whose work reflects their background. As a consequence, the literary essay can have, for example, strong philosophical or scientific overtones, in either style or content.

The first essayistic texts that dealt with ideals of independence date from the last decades of the 18th century. American and French revolutionary texts were smuggled in by educated criollos (Spaniards born in America), who translated and published them clandestinely. The news about the American and French revolutions and the Enlightenment ideals behind them created social and political unrest, which was reflected in the literature of the time. In exile, the Peruvian Jesuit Juan Pablo Vizcardo (1748–98) wrote Carta dirigida a los españoles americanos por uno de sus compatriotas (1792.; Letter directed to the American Spaniards by one of their compatriots), in which he expressed his urgent conviction for an independent America. In Colombia, Camilo Torres (1766–1816) wrote El memorial de agravios (1809; A brief of offenses) against the Spaniards, and the Argentine Mariano Moreno (1778–1811), one of the translators of Rousseau's Contrat social, defended free trade in Representación a nombre de los hacendados (1809; Representation in the name of the ranchers). Two Mexican writers come to mind in this period: José Servando Teresa de Mier (1763–1827), a Dominican, patriot, and adventurer, and José Joaquín Fernández de Lizardi (1776–1827). Teresa de Mier was persecuted by the Spaniards throughout his life because of his liberal thought and writings. He published Relación de lo que sucedió en Europa al Doctor Don Servando Teresa de Mier después que fue trasladado allá por resultados de lo actuado contra él en Mexico, desde julio de 1795 hasta octubre de 1805 (1820; Report of what happened to Doctor Don Servando Teresa de Mier after he was sent there as a consequence of what was done against him in Mexico from July 1795 to October 1805), Apología (1820; Apology), and Memorias (1820; Memoirs). The last was written in Spain and reflects Teresa de Mier's intense nationalism. Fernández de Lizardi wrote under the pen name of El Pensador Mexicano (The Mexican thinker). He founded various newspapers, including El Pensador Mexicano (1812–14), Alacena de Frioleras (1815–16; Cupboard of trinkets), El Conductor Eléctrico (1820; The electric conductor), and Conversaciones del Payo y el Sacristán (1824–25; Conversations between the peasant and the sacristan). Throughout his writings, Fernández de Lizardi disseminated the new ideals of independence as he criticized the political and social situations of the day. In Chile, the friar Camilo Henríquez (1769–1825) started the newspapers La Aurora de Chile (1812; The dawn of Chile) and El Monitor Araucano (1813; The Araucan monitor), in which he offered liberal reflections. Once exiled in Argentina, he published Ensayo (Essay), about demarcated radicalism, and “El catecismo de los patriotas” (1812; The patriots' catechism), in which he expressed his deep trust in reason as the means to eliminate ignorance and superstition in the colonies.

Another outstanding personality of this period is the Ecuadorian Javier Eugenio de Santa Cruz y Espejo (1747–95), son of an Indian and a mestizo woman. An erudite physician and liberal patriot, he was the subject of racial discrimination. Santa Cruz y Espejo devoted his life's work to denouncing the inequalities and injustices that plagued the colonies. He wrote political speeches and social criticism in a sarcastic style, as well as dialogues and scientific articles. Some appeared in the newspaper he founded, Primicias de la cultura de Quito (1792; First fruits of culture in Quito). Other works include El nuevo Luciano de Quito o despertador de los ingenios (1779; The new Luciano of Quito or the one who awakens talents), Marco Porcio Catón (1780), Reflexiones...acerca de un método seguro para preservar a los pueblos de las viruelas (1785; Reflections...on a safe method to protect people from smallpox), and Defensa de los curas de Riobamba (1786; Defense of the priests from Riobamba).

Simón Bolívar (1783–1830), the Venezuelan liberator of Bolivia, Peru, Venezuela, Colombia, and Ecuador, left a great essayistic legacy. Among his most important texts are “Record of the Enemy's Crimes and Reasons for Total War” (1813), a reflection about his mission of freedom, “Manifiesto de Cartagena” (1812; Cartagena manifesto), “Carta de Jamaica” (1815; Jamaica Letter), and “Discurso en el Congreso de Angostura” (1819; Speech at the Congress of Angostura). In these works, Bolívar examined how the course of Spanish American history shifted from a potential future full of hope and enthusiasm to one of disillusion and dismay as internal wars in the newly independent Venezuela and Colombia threatened to halt the liberation of South America before it was accomplished. Bolívar believed that Enlightenment principles and ideals conflicted with the idiosyncrasy of the new nations by reason of their ethnic composition and past history. In “Carta de Jamaica” Bolívar confesses: “Good and perfectly representative institutions are not suitable for our nature, customs and present intelligence.” In “Discurso en el Congreso de Angostura” he offers this caution: “Let us keep in mind that our people is not the European, nor the North American, but a composition of Africa and America rather than an emanation of Europe; since even Spain itself is not really European because of its African ascent, its institutions and their nature.” Bolívar’s solution to the reigning anarchy was the implementation of an authoritarian and despotic government. His a priori condemnation to failure of the new republics, because of a biological and historical determinism, became a recurrent motif in Latin American thought which has persisted to the modern day.

Another Venezuelan, Andrés Bello (1781–1865), devoted his life to the intellectual development and education of the new republics. In London he founded the literary magazines Biblioteca Americana (1823; American library) and El Repertorio Americano (1826–27; American repertoire), through which he tried to elaborate an Americanist cultural program. An adoptive son of Chile—where he spent most of his life—Bello wrote some of his most important works there: Gramática de la lengua castellana, destinada al uso de los americanos (1847; A Spanish grammar designed to be used by Americans), Principios de derecho de gentes (1832; Principles of international law), Código civil de la república de Chile (1855; Civil code of Chile), and Filosofía del entendimiento (1881; Philosophy of the Understanding).

Early in the second half of the 19th century, the failure of the independent regimes was evident. Freedom had only changed the surface of an infrastructure that had taken the Spaniards three centuries to build. The Romantic wave of the 19th century brought with it an infusion of liberalism, love for what was autochthonous, and a firm commitment to change the Spanish American reality through popular education and progress. The United States provided an example of a republican system, at least until its imperialistic intentions were revealed. Argentina was the first country to have a serious literary circle, Asociación de Mayo (May association), formed by young liberal intellectuals, most of them educated in Paris. Among this group was Esteban Echeverría (1805–51), who imported to the new continent the Romantic ideology from France even before it had reached Spain. Another member, Juan Bautista Alberdi (1810–84), anti-Romantic but an Americanist at heart, advocated the institution of laws that responded to the unique needs of Argentina and that were not imitations of foreign laws. He authored Bases y puntos de partida para la organización política de la República Argentina (1852.; Foundations and points of departure for the political organization of the Argentine republic), El crimen de la guerra (wr. c. 1880s, pub. 1915; The Crime of War), Estudios económicos (1916; Economic studies), and Cartas Quillotanas (1853; Quillotanas letters).

The most important intellectual among the Argentine Romantics was undoubtedly Domingo Faustino Sarmiento (1811–88). Not only did he become the president of his country, but his works influenced future essayists throughout the continent. Sarmiento was a fervent admirer of the U.S. democratic system, writing biographies of Abraham Lincoln and Benjamin Franklin. When Sarmiento lived in Chile, he started El Progreso (early 1840s; Progress), in which he interpreted Argentina's past and present circumstances. He firmly believed that education was the key to progress and that the Spanish heritage, as well as the American natives, greatly impeded development. Recent critical readings of Civilización y barbarie: Vida de Juan Facundo Quiroga (1845; Life in the Argentine Republic in the Days of the Tyrants; or Civilization and Barbarism) show that Sarmiento discriminated against the native elements of his country by outlining the quest for progress in Argentina as "a struggle between the European civilization and the Indian savagery, between intelligence and matter." In 1849 he wrote De la educación popular: Bases y puntos de partida para la organización política de la República Argentina (Of popular education: foundations and starting points for the political organization of Argentina). In one of his last works, Conflictos y armonía de las razas en América (1883; Conflict and harmony of the races in America), Sarmiento examined the racial characteristics of Spanish America from a positivist point of view.

José Victorino Lastarria (1817–88) represented Romantic thought in Chile. For Lastarria, literature was the best medium for intellectuals to identify the true national ethos, and he passionately advocated a national literature. His Investigaciones sobre la influencia social de la conquista y del sistema colonial de los españoles en Chile (1844; Research on the social influence and colonial system of the Spaniards in Chile) attacked the feudal system that the Spaniards imposed on the new continent for three centuries, and specifically targeted its major representatives: the Church and the army. In the texts Lastarria published under the title Misceldnea histórica y literaria (1868; Historical and literary miscellany), he argued that progress required the modernization of every aspect of the complex organism that comprises a country. Chile, therefore, needed a drastic change from the past, a total awakening of consciousness, education, and spiritual evolution in order to succeed in the future. Another Chilean intellectual who shared Lastarria's ideas was Francisco Bilbao (1823–65). Sociabilidad chilena (1844; Chilean sociability) examined the benefits of a liberal system as opposed to a conservative one; Chile was under a conservative regime for two decades during Bilbao's lifetime. Other works by Bilbao included La América en peligro (1862.; America in danger), and El evangelio americano (1864; American gospel). He always tried to demonstrate that the conservatism inherited from colonial times would only lead to backwardness.

Within the northern countries in South America, the Ecuadorian Juan Montalvo (1832–89) stands out as a major man of letters and eminent essayist. He spent most of his life in exile in Colombia, Panama, and Europe as a result of his ferocious and open denunciation of two of the presidents of his country: Gabriel García Moreno and Ignacio de Veintimilla. Montalvo is considered one of the best examples of the Spanish American essayist, achieving a perfect balance between analysis, feeling, and imagination. His work exposed the ills that afflicted his country, and expressed his political and social creed. From the pages of the newspapers he founded, El Cosmopolita (1866–69; The cosmopolitan) and El Regenerador (1876–78; The regenerator), he lashed out against the despots, clergy included, who ruled his country. A rebel, Montalvo was unafraid of polemics. Once, when he came back from one of his forced exiles to Europe, he wrote to the president of Ecuador, Gabriel García Moreno: "A few years living away from my beloved country, in the process of learning about and abhorring the despots in Europe, have taught me, at the same time, to know and scorn the petty tyrants of Spanish America. If for some reason I decide to take part in our poor dealings, you, and any other whose conduct would be hostile to the freedom and rights of a country, would have in me an enemy, and not a meek one.” His most important works are Siete tratados (1882–83; Seven treatises), Capítulos que se le olvidaron a Cervantes (1895; Chapters that Cervantes forgot), Geometría moral (1902; Moral geometry), published after his death, and the periodical Las Catilinarías (1880–82; Catilinarians), written against the Ecuadorian president Ignacio de Veintimilla.

In Mexico José María Luis Mora (1794–1850) published liberal, anti-clerical, and anti-military essays. He held the colonial powers responsible for the rampant backwardness and ignorance of Mexico; he advocated popular education, civil rights, and, overall, progress, as long as it was pursued on nonviolent terms. Some of Mora’s publications include México y sus revoluciones (1836; Mexico and its revolutions) and Obras sueltas (1837; Miscellaneous works). Cuba is represented during this period by Jose Antonio Saco (1797–1879) and José de la Luz y Caballero (1800–62), the latter a disciple of the former. Both devoted themselves to education. The podium was for them a vehicle for their nationalistic and liberal ideas, since Cuba had not yet obtained its independence. Saco published the three-volume Colección de papeles científicos, históricos, políticos, y de otros ramos (1858–59; A collection of scientific, historical, political, and other papers), and an unfinished work, Historia de la esclavitud (1875–77; History of slavery). Luz y Caballero’s life production was compiled in Escritos literarios (Literary writings) in 1946.

The intellectuals’ neoclassic and Romantic ideas did little to pull Spanish America out of chaos, and disillusion reigned among them. The aversion to the Spanish legacy proved insufficient to eradicate its idiosyncrasy. The positivism of Auguste Comte and Herbert Spencer proved more effective. Mexican statesman and physician Gabino Barrera (1818–81) applied Comte’s three states to Mexican history. The theological state was the colonial era, the metaphysical state was the period of independence and the years that followed, and the positivist state was the present. Religious beliefs, spirituality, and intuition were replaced by a deep faith in scientism. Although there were definite liberal changes, like those of Benito Juárez in Mexico, progress was viewed from the perspective of a privileged social class. The Indian, African, and mestizo groups were at the periphery of progress. In Mexico, positivist thought was represented by Justo Sierra (1848–1912.). A historian, statesman, and poet, Sierra also advocated development through public education. Some of his works are the “Prólogo” he wrote to Poesías by Manuel Gutiérrez Nájera (1896), México, su evolución social (1900–02; Mexico, Its Social Evolution), and Juárez, su obra y su tiempo (1905; Juárez, his work and his times).

A major intellectual who held a more humanist view of positivism was the Puerto Rican Eugenio María de Hostos (1839–1903). Though he was born on the island, his work was committed to the continent. He participated in the political life of Spain, but when he realized that the independence of the Antilles was not an issue there, he returned to the U.S., where he traveled extensively, spreading a message of freedom, civilization, and independence for Puerto Rico. He established himself in Chile until his death. Hostos published Moral social (Social morality) in 1888. His style tends to be positivist devoid of feeling and following a logical structure—but his speeches, the most renowned in Spanish America, were more lyrical. The speech given in 1884 at the Escuela Normal of Santo Domingo has been called by Antonio Caso “a masterpiece of moral thought in Spanish America.”

The Cuban sociologist, educator, philosopher, and literary critic Enrique José Varona (1849–1933) yearned, as Hostos did, for the independence of his country. Unlike Hostos, Varona witnessed the liberation of the island, but also the disenchantment that came later. Some of his works are compiled in Conferencias filosóficas (1880; Philosophical lectures), Discursos literarios y filosóficos (1883; Literary and philosophical studies), Seis conferencias (1885; Six lectures), Artículos y discursos (1891; Articles and speeches), Desde mi belvedere (1907; From my belvedere), and Violetas y ortigas (1917; Violets and nettles).

In Peru, the poet and writer Manuel González Prada (1848–1918) was prominent during this time, becoming a public figure after Peru’s disastrous defeat at the hands of Chile in the Pacific War. His speeches harangued his compatriots to wake up to their reality. González Prada was a positivist in that he believed only science could alleviate the ills inherited from the Colony. His prose is devoid of intimacy and strongly rejects the purity of Castilian Spanish, following the usage in Peru. González Prada was also the first to call attention to the absence of the Indian population in the national plans. A defender of the underdog and an enemy of Peruvian conservatism, he did not find much support in his country. Some of his major works are Páfnas libres (1894; Free pages), Horas de lucha (1908; Hours of struggle), and El tonel de Diogenes (1945; The barrel of Diogenes).

The Colombian Carlos Arturo Torres (1867–1911), an educator, statesman, journalist, literary critic, and poet, left behind an essayistic body of work with strong positivist overtones. In Idola fori (1910), he discussed in a scientific manner the consequences of the transplantation of European ideas to Latin America. Other essays are Literatura de ideas (1911; Literature of ideas), Estudios de crítica moderna (1917; Studies on modern criticism), and Estudios ingleses (1907; English studies).

Positivism was later joined by socioanthropological ideas that claimed to interpret the social and cultural development of a race according to their biological grouping. One of the European racial theorists who was widely read in Latin America, Gustave Le Bon, maintained that, just as there were physical racial traits, there were immutable psychosomatic traits that shaped the make-up of a national character. Thus, the concept of superior and inferior races emerged. An inferior race could experience positive but superficial changes through education and refinement, but the essence of its inferiority would never change. The explicit racism of this branch of sociology and social evolutionism found ready followers in Spanish America. Indian and African groups were considered pernicious elements that blocked progress in their countries, and those of mixed race were considered even worse. The only solution to this “malady” was a greater European migration to counteract the other two races. Deploying medical terminology, the essayists diagnosed the “sickness” of the continent. In Argentina, Agustín Álvarez (1857–1914), published his Manual de patología política (1899; Handbook of political pathology). That same year, the Venezuelan Cesar Zumeta (1860–1955) published El continente enfermo (The sick continent). In 1903 the Argentine Carlos Octavio Bunge (1875–1918) literally followed Le Bon's ideas, applying them to the continent in Nuestra América (Our America). In 1905, his compatriot Manuel Ugarte (1878–1951) authored Enfermedades sociales (Social maladies). Ironically, most of the rest of his extensive essay production expressed strong socialist tendencies. In 1909, the Bolivian Alcides Arguedas (1879–1946) condemned Bolivia in Pueblo enfermo: Contribucion a la psicologia de los pueblos hispanoamericanos (1909; Sick country: contribution to the psychology of the Spanish American countries). In his last edition of 1934, Arguedas agreed that pedagogy was Bolivia's only salvation, though it would never make illustrious men out of the Indians. Francisco García Calderón (1883–1953) was a Peruvian writer who concurred with the intellectuals mentioned above and who published mostly in French. His main piece, Les Démocraties latines de l'Amérique (1912; The Latin democracies of America), focused on the question of race, taking for granted that the non-European groups were inferior to those from the old continent. The racism and snobbism of this work should not cloud his other more humanist essays. Another prolific thinker of this school was the Argentine José Ingenieros (1877–1925), who, though a socialist, persisted in explaining the ills of Spanish America through the heterogeneity of superior and inferior races peopling it. He wrote La simulación en la lucha por la vida (1903; The simulation in the struggle for life), El hombre mediocre (1913; The mediocre man), and Psicología genética (1911; Genetic psychology).

Almost simultaneous with this somber and depressing view of Spanish America, a more spiritualist and aestheticist movement arose, highlighting humanist values, intuition, spiritualism, and a new respect for the Latin-Spanish tradition. The Peruvian Ricardo Palma (1833–1919) glorified the colonial era in La bohemia de mi tiempo (1887; The bohemian of my time) and the Mexican Guillermo Prieto (1818–97) recalled the past in Memorias de mis tiempos 1828–1853 (1906; Memoirs of my times 1828–53). Spiritualist tendencies made room for a literary movement called Modernismo (Modernism; not to be confused with the European Modernism), in which language and form bloomed anew. Even though poetry was the primary Modernist genre, the essay was invigorated stylistically and ideologically. The Cuban José Martí (1853–95) is considered the precursor of this movement, an outstanding representative of this humanist reaction to the problems of Spanish America and a hero to his country. He cultivated all genres, including journalism and translation. A renovator of Spanish prose and verse, he wrote in renowned newspapers like La Nación of Buenos Aires, El Partido Liberal (The liberal party) in Mexico and La Opinión Nacional of Caracas among others. Concern for his country and its independence was the main thread of key articles collected in El presidio político en Cuba (1871; The political prison in Cuba), La república española ante la revolución cubana (1873; The Spanish republic in view of the Cuban revolution), and in Martí's war journal. Guatemala (1878) represents a more mature prose—rhythmic and chromatic—and Poema del Niágara (1882; Poem to Niagara) laments the spiritual destitution and the constant change humanity undergoes. In "Nuestra América" (1891; Our America), he left behind the immortal words: "There is no battle between civilization and savagery, but between false erudition and nature." True to his convictions, Martí joined the Cuban army and soon died in a skirmish.

The Mexican poet Manuel Gutiérrez Nájera (1859–95), a prominent member of the Modernista (Modernist) movement like Martí, created the chronicle, a type of refined, mundane, frivolous, and poetic conversation published in the major newspapers of Mexico. He began the Revista Azul (Blue review), whose articles were paradigms of the French Belle Epoque. The Uruguayan poet Julián J. Casal (1889–1954) wrote journalistic articles on literary and artistic topics, as well as contributing to the chronicle. The Nicaraguan Rubén Darío (1867–1916) founded the Modernista movement. A true aesthete, Darío was a poet and fiction writer, as well as a journalist. His journalistic work, published in major newspapers in various cities, was gathered later. Los raros (1896; The rare ones) is a collection of essays about literary personalities. His various trips in Europe and Spanish America allowed him to write Peregrinaciones (1901; Peregrinations). Besides aesthetic thematics, Darío was also concerned with the U.S. imperialist attitude toward the continent. Many countries had succumbed: Mexico, the Central American countries, Colombia, and the coup fatal, the Spanish-American war that determined the destiny of the Antilles. His last essays—including in two of his final collections, La caravana pasa (1902; The caravan goes by) and Tierras solares (1904; Solar lands)—are permeated with melancholy and disillusion.

The Uruguayan writer and professor José Enrique Rodó (1871–1917) was the greatest representative of the Modernist essay. His readings of the classics and the philosophers of his time allowed him to develop a theory of meritocracy, although talent, as a measure of superiority, did not take into account the pyramidal structure of the Spanish American societies where the underprivileged were deprived of any education. Rodó had unyielding faith in a free and protean spirit. In his masterpiece Ariel (1900), he defended Spanish American spiritualism over the United States' pragmatic perspective on life. His philosophy was to return to Latin roots and to the humanist legacy the Spaniards brought to America. He coined the phrase "the colossus of the north" to refer to the United States. Other works are Motivos de Proteo (1909; The Motives of Proteus), El mirador de Próspero (1913; The outlook of Prospero), and El camino de Paros (1918; The way to Paros). Other Modernista writers include Rodó's disciple Carlos Nin Frías (1882–1937), the Colombians Carlos Arturo Torres and Baldomero Sanín Cano (1861–1957), the Guatemalan Enrique Gómez Carrillo (1873–1927), and the Venezuelans Manuel Díaz Rodríguez (1871–1927) and Rufino Blanco Fombona (1874–1944), the latter a multifaceted writer who later became a critic of this movement.

Two other ideological currents reacted against positivism. A group of young Mexican writers—Ateneo de la Juventud (Atheneum of youth)—looked for new answers under the guidance of the Dominican Pedro Henríquez Ureña (1884–1946). Hostos' follower and Rodó's admirer, Henríquez Ureña led the group in the study of the irrationalists. He believed that in every historical crisis Spanish America faced, its spirit remained unharmed and sound. The continent could become its own utopia, for it was only beginning to forge its future. Henríquez Ureña's message to the Ateneo de la Juventud could be summarized in his own words:

The universal man we dream of, the kind our America aspires to, will not be an outcast, will enjoy everything, will appreciate all hues, but will belong to his land; his land and not others', the land will give him the intense flavor of what is native, and that will be his best preparation to taste that which has a genuine flavor and a true character. Universality does not mean being an outcast: in a utopian world, character differences born of the climate, language and traditions should not disappear; but all of these differences, instead of signifying division and discordance, should be combined into diverse hues of human unity. Never uniformity, the ideal of sterile imperialistic systems; yes to unity, as a harmony of the multi-unanimous peoples' voices. (La utopía de América: Patria de la justicia [1925; America's utopia: country of justice])

His major works are Ensayos críticos (1905; Critical essays), Literary Currents in Latin America (1945), Historia de la cultura en la América Hispana (1947; A history of Spanish American culture), and his most notorious text, Seis ensayos en busca de nuestra expresión (1928; Six essays in search of our expression).

Great essayists and philosophers followed Henríquez Ureña: the Mexican Alfonso Reyes (1889–1959), for example, ranked by many as the best prose writer of the continent. Some of his outstanding collections of essays are Visión de Anáhuac (1917; Vision of Anahuac), Ancorajes (1951; Anchorages), El cazador (1921; The hunter), Última Tule (1942; Last Tule), Discursos por Virgilio (1931; Discourses about Virgil), and Letras de la Nueva España (1948; Letters of the New Spain). Antonio Caso (1883–1946) is remembered as the keen philosopher of the Ateneo and for his masterpiece, La existencia como economía, como desinterés y como caridad (1919; Existence as economy, as selflessness and as charity). He also published Discursos a la nación mexicana (1922; Speeches to the Mexican nation) and El peligro del hombre (1942; The danger of man). José Vasconcelos (1882–1959), the essayist most influenced by the Mexican Revolution, dreamed of a cosmic, Spanish American conglomerate of races. Absorbed in the triumph of the revolution, and in the energy that emanates from aestheticism, he believed it would be the fifth and most superior race. These ideas are expressed in La raza cósmica (1925; The cosmic race), Indología (1927; Indianology—Vasconcelos' term), and Ulises criollo (1935–39; A Mexican Ulysses).

In the Andean countries, a spiritualist movement instilled with telluric overtones was the response to the racism of scientism. In Bolivia, Franz Tamayo (1879–1956) rejected Alcides Arguedas' predeterminism and exalted the individual will in Creación de la pedagogía nacional (1910; The creation of a national pedagogy). Fernando Díez de Medina (1908–90), statesman, journalist, and writer, was active in the nationalization of the mines (Bolivia's main export was tin) and helped design the agrarian reform. He defended the Indian character and the magical powers that the earth exercises on humans. His major essays are Nayjama (1950) and El velero nacional (1935; The national sailing vessel). In Thunupa (1947), based on an Aymaran legend, Díez de Medina described the main god's son as a cosmogonic numen, the regenerative spirit of the Andean peoples. Guillermo Francovich's (1901–90) Pachamama (1942.) also exalted the telluric forces of the earth and their influence on humans. In Argentina, Ricardo Rojas (1882–1957), in La restauración nacionalista (1909; The national restoration), La argentinidad (1916; The Argentine ethos), and Eurindia (1924) followed the idealism of Martí, Rodó, and Vasconcelos, and constructed an aesthetic foundation for the Argentine culture. Rojas' solution for Argentina, and for the rest of the continent, was a synthesis of the different traditions that coexisted into a firmer, more cohesive one. Another Argentine, Manuel Gálvez (1882–1962), followed Rojas' ideas in El diario de Gabriel Quiroga (1910; The diary of Gabriel Quiroga), El solar de la raza (1913; The ancestral home of the race), and Este pueblo necesita... (1934; This country needs...).

In Peru, Marxist beliefs were entangled with the idealism of the irrationalists. The most important figure is José Carlos Mariátegui (1894–1930), who, following González Prada's indigenismo, advocated Indian human and civil rights. He founded Amauta (1926–30; Wise man), the best radical and influential magazine on the continent. In his Siete ensayos de interpretación de la realidad peruana (1928; Seven Interpretative Essays on Peruvian Reality), Mariátegui found in the Inca civilization a harmonious paradigm of religion, economy, culture, and government for Peru. Antenor Orrego (1892–1960) was the founder and director of El Norte (1922; The north), a left-oriented newspaper from Trujillo, and a regular collaborator of Amauta. He wrote El pueblo continente (1939; The people of the continent), where he emphasized the need to learn every aspect of the evolution of the Spanish American world, so as to differentiate it better from the European one. Luis E. Valcárcel (1891–?) followed the same tenets in three essays: Del ayllu al imperio (1925; From the Ayllu to the empire), Tempestad en los Andes (1927; Storm in the Andes), and Ruta cultural del Perú (1945; Cultural route of Peru).

Toward the second half of the century, the essay focused on the individual. Influenced by psychoanalysis, the Spanish American intelligentsia examined man as a microcosm of his country. At the same time it regarded him from a universal perspective, as a citizen of the world. As Emilio Uranga says in Análisis del ser del mexicano (1952; Analysis of the Mexican being): “It is not a question of interpreting that which is Mexican, that which gives us our identity as human, but rather the reverse—of interpreting that which is human as Mexican.” The Mexican Samuel Ramos (1897–1959) authored El perfil del hombre y la cultura en México (1934; Profile of Man and Culture in Mexico), a deep analysis of the national “personality” stemming from its “childhood” experiences or the experiences related to the traumatic encounter between the Indians and the conquistadores. Octavio Paz (1914–), in one of his most famous essays, El laberinto de la soledad (1950; The Labyrinth of Solitude), analyzed the Mexican ethos by reinterpreting history. The Mexican man, a product of his history, is an orphan, devoid of reality, covered with masks that constantly redefine him. He is alone: “We are finally alone. As all men are. Like them, we live in a world of violence, of simulation and of the self-effacing: that which is a tight solitude, if it defends us it oppresses us, and when it hides us it disfigures and mutilates us. If we tear away these masks, if we open up, if, ultimately, we confront ourselves, we start to live and to truly think... There, in the open solitude, hands of other solitary fellow men await us, and for the first time, in our history, we are contemporaries of all men.” Many essays in the same vein as Labyrinth followed, some published in the famous review Filosofía y Letras: Emilio Uranga's “Análisis del ser mexicano” (Analysis of the Mexican being), Jorge Carrión's “Mito y magia del mexicano” (1952; The Mexican's myth and magic) and “De la raíz a la flor del mexicano” (1952; From the Mexican's root to the flower). Carlos Fuentes (1928–) wrote París: La revolución de mayo (1968; Paris: the May revolution) on the Mexican army's massacre of students at Tlatelolco, Tiempo mexicano (1971; Mexican time), and Nuevo tiempo mexicano (1994; A new time for Mexico), among others.

Guatemala, las líneas de su mano (1955; Guatemala, the lines in her hand) by Luis Cardoza y Aragón (1904–92) explored and interpreted the history of his country in a passionate, lyrical, and objective manner. In Cuba, Fernando Ortiz (1881–1969) started his literary career with a positivist approach, but later, in Contrapunteo cubano del tabaco y del azúcar (1940; Cuban counterpoint between tobacco and sugar), he presented a complete analysis of the economic and social structures of Cuba. He coined the term “transculturation,” which signified the clash between diverse cultures and their interpenetration at an equal level. The founding of the leftist review Avance (1927) brought together essays like Jorge Mañach Robato’s (1898–1961) “Indagación del choteo” (1928; Inquiry about choteo), in which he analyzed the Cuban character, as well as Juan Marinello’s (1899–1977) “Sobre la inquietud cubana” (1929; About Cuban anxiety) and “Americanismo y cubanismo literario” (1932; Americanism and literary Cubanism). The Puerto Rican Antonio S. Pedreira (1899–1939) stated in Insularismo (1934) that the Puerto Rican soul, fragmented by its history, sought integration. However, his essay is heavily tinted with geographical and biological determinism. In Colombia, Eduardo Caballero Calderón (1910–) published Suramérica, tierra del hombre (1944; South America, land of man) and Americanos y europeos (1957; Americans and Europeans), in which he questioned Latin American identity. Germán Arciniegas (1900–) was a prolific essayist deeply involved with the continent’s destiny. Some of his collections include El estudiante de la mesa redonda (1932; The round table student), América, tierra firme (1937; America, inland), Biografía del Caribe (1945; A biography of the Caribbean), and El continente de los siete colores (1965; The seven-colored continent).

The Venezuelan Mariano Picón-Salas (1901–65) was one of the first essayists to point out the weaknesses of scientism in Buscando el camino (1920; In search of a path). His major essays are Intuición de Chile y otros ensayos en busca de una conciencia histórica (1935; An intuition of Chile and other essays in search of a historical conscience), De la Conquista a la Independencia (1944; A Cultural History of Spanish America, from Conquest to Independence), Comprensión de Venezuela (1949; Understanding Venezuela), and Europa—America, preguntas a la esfinge de la cultura (1947; Europe—America; questions for the sphinx of culture). The Ecuadorian Jorge Carrera Andrade (1903–78) followed the same path in Viajes por países y libros (1965; Travels through countries and books) and El volcán y el colibrí (1970; The volcano and the hummingbird). In Chile two major essayists deal with this theme: Benjamín Subercaseaux (1902–73) with Chile o una loca geografía (1940; Chile or a crazy geography), and Luis Durand (1895–1954) in Presencia de Chile (1942; Chile’s presence). Sebastián Salazar Bondy’s (1924–1965) Lima la horrible (1964) is a systematic and poignant analysis of Lima as perpetrator of the ills of the Colonial period in Peru. Mario Vargas Llosa’s (1936–) essays Políticos peruanos: Palabras, palabras, palabras, 1820–1989 (1989; Peruvian politicians: words, words, words, 1820–1989) and Desafíos a la libertad (1994; Challenges to freedom) reflect on the destiny of Peru.

Existentialism was a definite influence on the Argentine essays written by a generation concerned with the essence of human beings and the Argentine ethos. A great pessimism permeated their work. Among the most important of these essayists is Ezequiel Martínez Estrada (1895–1964), whose socialist perspective, tinted with existentialism, perceived a failing Argentina. He considered his country to be invisible and inauthentic.

Its nature was hostile, its citizens hid behind masks, and Buenos Aires was a corrupt capital which grew too fast. Its artificial world alienated humans from what was true and natural. His most important essays are Radiografía de la pampa (1933; X-Ray of the Pampa), La cabeza de Goliath (1940; The head of Goliath), and Muerte y transfiguración de Martín Fierro (1948; The death and transfiguration of Martin Fierro). Carlos Alberto Erro (1903–68) did not share Martínez Estrada's bleakness, but he tried to define criollismo (that which is representative of the culture), argentinidad, and eventually, americanidad as universal concepts. Eduardo Mallea (1903–82.), an agonist but not a pessimist, believed there were two Argentinas: a visible one which was superficial, selfish, cruel, and held false values, and an invisible one which believed in true values and was honest and generous. This dichotomy could be seen in human beings as well as in the land. His major works are Conocimiento y expresión de la Argentina (1935; Knowledge and expression of Argentina), Historia de una pasión argentina (1937; History of an Argentine passion), and El sayal y la púrpura (1941; The rough cloth and the imperial cloth). Héctor A. Murena (1923–75) concludes this existentialist interpretation with El pecado original de América (1954; The original sin of America). Murena asserted that the Spanish American, dispossessed of a history, was alienated from Western history and tried to find his place in someone else's world. A postmodernist, Julio Cortázar (1911–84), was a major innovator of the Spanish American essay. Within his oeuvre, the collections La vuelta al día en ochenta mundos (1967; Around the Day in Eighty Worlds) and Último round (1969; Last round), as well as Nicaragua, tan violentamente dulce (1983; Nicaraguan Sketches), are the most representative of the ideological essay. Silvina Bullrich (1915–), also Argentinean, penned La Argentina contradictoria (1986; Argentina, the contradiction).

The Cuban revolution left a profound impression on the Spanish American intelligentsia. The Uruguayan Eduardo Galeano (1940–) analyzed the history of the continent following the method of dialectical materialism in Las venas abiertas de América Latina (1971; The Open Veins of Latin America). He wrote: "Underdevelopment is not a stage of development. It is its consequence. The Latin American underdevelopment arises from a foreign development, and continues to feed it. Powerless, and agonizing since it was born, the system's role is that of international servitude..." Another Uruguayan, Mario Benedetti (1920–), who has lived most of his life in Cuba, believed Latin America is a political term not defined by a language or a culture, but by whatever is not of the United States. He wrote El país de la cola de paja (1960; The country with the straw tail) and Crónicas del 71 (1972; Chronicles of 1971). In Calibán: Apuntes sobre la cultura en nuestra América (1971; Caliban and Other Essays), the Cuban Roberto Fernández Retamar (1930–) analyzed the exploitation of Latin America by imperialist powers. The Bolivian Marcelo Quiroga Santa Cruz (1931–80), who was assassinated by a repressive military government, wrote Desarrollo con soberanía (1967; Development with sovereignty), Lo que no debemos callar (1968; What we cannot say), and most importantly, El saqueo de Bolivia (1973; Bolivia's plundering). The antithesis of these essays is Del buen salvaje al buen revolucionario (1976; From the good savage to the good revolutionary, translated as The Latin Americans, Their Love-Hate Relationship with the United States) by the Venezuelan Carlos Rangel (1929–), who returned to the idea that Spanish American history was one of total failure. Comparing Spanish America's progress to that of the United States, he attributed the difference to the attitude toward the native population of America: the Anglo culture alienated Native Americans while the Spaniards incorporated the Indian and black ethnic groups into their society, making them the major work force.

Women have not figured largely in the history of the Latin American literary essay, perhaps because of their disenfranchisement from the source of political and economic power. While several women writers have written exemplary essays, their concerns are often gender politics, education, and literary issues rather than the question of Latin American identity per se. Among women writers whose oeuvre includes outstanding essays are the Mexicans Yolanda Oreamuno (1916–56), Rosario Castellanos (1925–74), Elena Poniatowska (1933–), and Margo Glantz (1930–); the Argentines Victoria Ocampo (1890–1979) and Alfonsina Storni (1892–1938); the Chileans Gabriela Mistral (1889–1957) and Julieta Kirkwood; the Peruvians Flora Tristan (1803–44) and Magda Portal (1901–89); the Venezuelan Teresa de la Parra (1889–1936); the Costa Rican Carmen Naranjo (1931–); the Cuban Lydia Cabrera (1900–91); and the Puerto Rican Rosio Ferré (1938–).

The literary essay that chronicles the birth and development of the Spanish American countries is a unique form born of the realities of the continent. Although it adheres to the literary currents that were cultivated in the Western hemisphere, the essay acquired a shape of its own by becoming the political, social, and literary mouthpiece of the young continent. As the 21st century approaches, the Spanish American essayist is no longer so concerned with defining the essence of the Latin American people, now that its universality is irrefutable; as a genre, the essay continues to be the best tool for self-examination and self-criticism for a continent that is constantly redefining itself. According to Mario Vargas Llosa (in an interview with José Oviedo, Mexican TV, March 1997), Latin American writers would be irresponsible if they were not concerned with the political fabric of their homelands. As privileged citizens of countries where a large sector of the population is illiterate, they should participate directly or indirectly in the political life of the nation. Some essayists who continue to act as witnesses of their national and continental reality include the Mexicans Elena Poniatowska and Carlos Monsiváis (1938–), the Chilean Ariel Dorfman (1942–), the Argentines Joan José Sebreli (1930–), Blas Matamoro (1941–), and María Elena Rodríguez de Magis, and the Peruvian Julio Ortega (1942–).

VERÓNICA SAUNERO-WARD

Anthologies

El ensayo hispanoamericano del siglo XX, edited by John Skirius, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1994 (original edition, 1981)

Rereading the Spanish American Essay: Translations of 19th and 20th Century Women's Essays, edited by Doris Meyer, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1995

Further Reading

- Castañón, Adolfo, "La ausencia ubicua de Montaigne: Ideas para una historia del ensayo hispanoamericano," Vuelta 16, no. 184 (March 1992): 35–38
- Chachagua, Freddy, and Gleider Hernandez, "El discurso crítico hegemónico y crítico marginal en la genealogía del ensayo hispanoamericano," Confluencia 8–9, nos. 1–2 (Spring-Fall 1993): 63–79
- Concejo, Pilar, "Localismo y universalidad en el ensayo hispanoamericano," Cuadernos Hispanoamericanos 387 (September 1982): 631–38
- Earle, Peter G., "El ensayo hispanoamericano: Del modernismo a la modernidad," Revista Iberoamericana 48, nos. 118–19 (January–June 1982): 47–57
- Earle, Peter G., and Robert G. Mead, Historia del ensayo hispanoamericano, Mexico City: Andrea, 1973
- Fernández, Teodosio, Los géneros ensayísticos hispanoamericanos, Madrid: Taurus, 1990
- Fernández Retamar, Roberto, "Para una teoría de la literatura hispanoamericana," in his Para una teoría de la literatura hispanoamericana y otras aproximaciones, Havana: Casa de las Américas, 1975
- Gómez Martínez, Jose Luis, Teoría del ensayo, Salamanca: Ediciones Universidad de Salamanca, 1981
- Levy, Kurt, and Ellis Keith, editors, El ensayo y la crítica literaria en Iberoamérica, Toronto: University of Toronto, 1970
- Marichal, Juan, Teoría e historia del ensayismo hispánico, Madrid: Alianza, 1984
- Martínez-Echazabal, Lourdes, "Positivismo y racismo en el ensayo hispanoamericano," Cuadernos Americanos 2, no. 3 (1988): 121–29
- Meyer, Doris, editor, Reinterpreting the Spanish American Essay: Women Writers of the 19th and 20th Centuries, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1995
- Oviedo, José Miguel, "The Modern Essay in Spanish America," in The Cambridge History of Latin American Literature, volume 2: The Twentieth Century, edited by Roberto González Echevarría and Enrique Pupo-Walker, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1996:365–424
- Ripoll, Carlos, Conciencia intelectual de América: Antología del ensayo hispanoamericano, New York: Torres, 1974 (original edition, 1966)
- Sacoto, Antonio, "El ensayo como género," in El indio en el ensayo de la América española, New York: Las Américas, 1971
- Sacoto, Antonio, "El ensayo hispanoamericano contemporáneo," Cuadernos Americanos 2, no. 3 (1988): 107–20
- Shumway, Nicolas, "The Essay in Spanish South America: 1800 to Modernismo," in The Cambridge History of Latin American Literature, volume 1: Discovery to Modernism, edited by Roberto González Echevarría and Enrique Pupo-Walker, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1996:556–89
- Stabb, Martin S., In Quest of Identity: Patterns in the Spanish American Essay of Ideas, 1890–1960, Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1967
- Stabb, Martin S., The Dissenting Voice: The New Essay of Spanish America, 1960–1985, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1994
- Stabb, Martin S., "The Essay of Nineteenth-Century Mexico, Central America, and the Caribbean," in The Cambridge History of Latin American Literature, volume 1:

- Discovery to Modernism*, edited by Roberto González Echevarría and Enrique Pupo-Walker, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1996: 590–607
- Urrello, Antonio, Verosimilitud y estrategia textual en el ensayo hispanoamericano, Mexico City: Premiá, 1986
- Zum Felde, Alberto, El problema de la cultura americana, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1943
- Zum Felde, Alberto, Índice crítico de la literatura hispanoamericana: Los ensayistas, Mexico City: Guaranía, 1954

The Spectator

British periodical, 1711–12, 1714

In the Spectator, Joseph Addison and Richard Steele combined their talents and interests to produce a series of periodical essays that both established and defined the genre, rendering it more elegant, social, and edifying than ever before (or since). This periodical is distinguished by its high social topics, its formal and detached style, and its abstract and polite vocabulary. Its authors were witty, trenchant, perspicuous, and edifying, while its readers were assumed or encouraged to be attentive, literate, well-informed, and contemplative. Six days a week between March 1711 and December 1712, the Spectator exhibited and promoted common sense, decorum, discretion, equanimity, good nature, good taste, politeness, and virtue. These qualities still enrich its pages, even for those readers who no longer regard them as essential to human happiness and a well-ordered polity.

Addison's boast, in the Spectator no. 10, that there were already 3000 papers distributed every day, with some 60,000 readers, suggests how well and how quickly the publication took hold. He promised this sizable, thoughtful, and, above all, new readership that he would endeavor on their behalf "to enliven Morality with Wit, and to temper Wit with Morality," to the considerable advantage of their "Virtue and Discretion." Few periodicals, before or since, have concerned themselves with the virtue and discretion of their readers. Fewer still would have deftly balanced a figure drawn from the forging of swords in a sentence calculated to remind acute readers of the differences between "wit," which is lively and cutting, but brittle, and "morality," which is weighty, divisive, and sturdy.

In the same paper, "Mr. Spectator," the bland but pleasant and serviceable persona that Addison and Steele adopted, announced his ambition to have it said of him that, whereas Socrates "brought Philosophy down from Heaven, to inhabit among Men," he himself had "brought Philosophy out of Closets and Libraries, Schools and Colleges, to dwell in Clubs and Assemblies, at Tea-Tables, and in Coffee-Houses." Those unsocial, masculine, and pedantic places to which "Philosophy" (i.e. love of thinking, wisdom) had previously been confined were bookish, isolated, sparse, and argumentative. The places in which the Spectator proposed to make wisdom shine are, instead, social, pleasurable, conversable, and polite. Two of them, the Assemblies and the Tea-Tables, were frequented by women, and Addison and Steele presumed to discuss the concerns and behavior of women in many issues. It must be admitted, however, that the overall air of the Spectator is that of the male coffeehouse, into the workings, concerns, and assumptions of which we are given many vivid glimpses. Some 50 different coffeehouses are mentioned by name and location, and many of them are visited or described.

These places call attention to the Spectator's delicate and pervasive sociability, its concentration on the social realm, where representative individuals enter into select company. The essays deal with characters rather than identities, and with sets and clubs rather than private concerns or confusions. When Addison and Steele write about such psychological abstractions as jealousy, envy, zeal, and ambition (as they often do), it is with their social consequences in mind, and it is the reactions of others that the essays develop. Other essays pay sustained attention to the workings of such social abstractions as shame, derision, modesty, impertinence, impudence, cheerfulness, and esteem. Even courting and married couples, the most numerous characters of all, show themselves in public, where Mr. Spectator and others can observe them. Those who stay in their homes and contribute to the paper write of follies and extravagances, misfortunes and visits, rather than of intimacies.

Mr. Spectator might have done well to include two other places that his essays refer to and discuss repeatedly: the print shop and the theater. He relied on the first, of course, to print and distribute papers to an audience that, by definition, took printing very seriously. Books are quoted at the beginning of every paper, and quoted or referred to throughout most of them. Fewer journals have ever been more literate, in the exact sense of that word.

And when they weren't reading, subscribers seem to have been attending or thinking about the theater. A good many of the essays are, in effect, theater criticism, whether discussions of Tragedy (nos. 39, 40, 42, 44) or critiques of single plays (e.g. no. 270, on Beaumont and Fletcher's The Scornful Lady). Others deplore the new fashion for opera or puppets, which offend against the Spectator's insistence on language that makes sense, or correct the techniques of actors or the manners of the audience. Many other issues invoke passing references to plays or the theater. In no. 370 Steele quotes the motto above the stage in Drury Lane: "the whole World acts the Player." "It is, with me [he continues], a Matter of the highest Consideration what Parts are well or ill performed, what Passions or Sentiments are indulged or cultivated, and consequently what Manners and Customs are transfused from the Stage to the World, which reciprocally imitate each other."

Its continuing popular success is confirmed by a series of collected editions of the individual papers. The first collection was issued by subscription early in 1712. All seven volumes of the 555 original papers were out by 1713. There were innumerable reprints in the 18th century, and seven new editions thereafter, culminating with the definitive Clarendon Edition edited by Donald Bond in 1965. In 1714 Addison tried to revive the Spectator, writing 25 papers himself, and enlisting such contributors as Eustace Budgell, Thomas Tickell, and four or five others to compile 80 papers in all, generally agreed to be inferior to the original 555.

The readership that Addison estimated amounts to about 15 percent of the population of London; there is also contemporary evidence of scattered readers in Dublin, Scotland, Boston, and Sumatra. Glimpses of this readership may be had from the correspondents, real or imaginary, and the advertisements in the original papers, as well as the subscription list to the collected volumes. In his introduction to the Clarendon Edition, Bond quotes a personal advertisement from no. 297 in which we get a vivid glimpse of people we would like to think of as regular readers of the Spectator: “A Person in a white Cloth Suit, laced with Silver, who handed two Ladies out of the Box in the Gallery of the Play-house in Drury-lane, on Wednesday last, is desired to come this Day, without fail, to the Abby Church in Westminster, betwixt 3 and 4 in the Afternoon.” Bond also summarizes the list of subscribers to the 1712–13 collected edition in some detail, enumerating members of the Peerage, the Church, and the university (the names Isaac Newton and Godfrey Kneller figure in these lists), but also prominent bankers, merchants, and civil servants. The list also includes the names of 36 women.

The commercial nature of the venture is apparent not only in the authors’ attention to audience and sales, but also in the increasing number of advertisements for such things as books, plays, housing, and clothing. The business acumen of the two essayists carries over into the celebration of merchants (e.g. no. 174) and a gentle preference for Sir Andrew Freeport, with his eye for the main chance and the bottom line, over Sir Roger de Coverley’s outmoded, and landed, patriarchy. But the businessmen, like the gallants, the prostitutes, the servants, and the actors and actresses in the Spectator, are all uncommonly articulate and polite.

Several features of the Spectator which render it of importance to literary history complicate its status as a collection of essays: its joint, or rather divided, authorship; its reliance on letters from readers to form part of the content (Steele incorporated outside contributions into many of the papers he wrote, though it is probable that he and Addison wrote some of the letters themselves, and edited the content of others); its construction of a fictional “club,” with the personalities, opinions, and, occasionally, actions of the members becoming the focus of a single essay (e.g. no. 517, on the death of Sir Roger); its frequent veering from essay into narrative, with a story drawn from the past (e.g. no. 349, of Moluc) or imported from afar (e.g. no. 11, of Inkle and Yarico), or a representative and usually cautionary fiction featuring emblematic rather than particularized characters (e.g. “Constantia” and “Theodosius” in no. 164).

Twenty-six papers emanate from a visit to Sir Roger’s country estate and report and reflect on the social life of the countryside. Eighteen papers analyze the importance of Paradise Lost; six consider, seriously but wittily, wit in the empirical philosophy of Locke; and 11 delve into the psychology and aesthetics of the imagination. The Saturday papers, by Addison, ponder serious topics such as devotion and death; other numbers reflect soberly on what can only be called the human condition—one that has not changed noticeably since these essays were written: “Since we cannot promise our selves constant Health, let us endeavour at such a Temper as may be our best Support in the Decay of it” (no. 143).

Generally, however, the Spectator wrote about courtship and marriage, follies and extravagances, disappointments and impertinences, and other large, human concerns. It made the ordinary and social workings of the human body and the human mind its daily topic. What men and women wore and said, read, gossiped, quarreled or bantered about, how they greeted friends and treated strangers—these are its concerns, all vividly presented, thoughtfully developed, and eloquently expressed. The language used in public (and in letters) by real and imagined contemporaries of the original readers is one of the most frequent and fruitful of the Spectator's concerns. Whole essays are given over to appraising the social and semantic value of conversations, trivial or empty expressions, the conventional utterances of courtship, swearing, "ingenious Ribaldry" (no. 155), and a principled distrust of pedantry and "cant," wherever they are uttered (e.g. no. 147).

For Addison and Steele the essay was a social collaboration, not just between themselves and the other occasional contributors, but with their readers, who supplied them with materials, correspondence, and, sometimes, whole papers. (See no. 46, for an outline of topics and materials for future papers, supposedly mislaid in a coffeehouse!) Their style, as we have seen, is formal, witty, abstract, and elaborate. They delight in antithetical paragraphs contrasting wise and foolish behavior, and in extended examples, allegories, and analogies which set the reader's mind to work along clearly marked paths: "A modest Man preserves his Character, as a frugal Man does his Fortune; if either of them live to the Height of either, one will find Losses, the other Errors which he has not Stock by him to make up" (no. 206).

The authors frequently comment on their own style and methods: "When I make Choice of a Subject that has not been treated of by others, I throw together my Reflections on it without any Order or Method, so that they may appear rather in the Looseness and Freedom of an Essay, than in the Regularity of a Set Discourse. It is after this manner that I shall consider Laughter and Ridicule in my present Paper" (no. 249). Though emphasizing the relaxed structure of the essay, this statement also reminds us of Mr. Spectator's willingness to reflect, his consciousness of the work of others, his assortment of subjects, his attention to connections within an essay, and his overriding concern with abstractions that entail moods, attitudes, and behavior.

Subsequent writers admired and emulated the Spectator. It became a model from which Voltaire, Benjamin Franklin, and Giuseppe Baretti learned to write elegant English. In his Lives of the Poets (1779–81) Samuel Johnson praised Addison because "He not only made the proper use of wit himself, but taught it to others; and from his time it has been generally subservient to the cause of reason and truth" and for a "middle style...on grave subjects not formal, on light occasions not groveling" and that is pure, exact, and easy. Thomas Babington Macaulay, writing in the Edinburgh Review (1843), praised Addison as one who had "reconciled wit and virtue," though Macaulay and his contemporaries had a diminished conception of those two entities, as, indeed, do we. Nevertheless, the Spectator continues to be read, admired, and studied.

ALAN T.MCKENZIE

Editions

The Spectator, written and edited by Joseph Addison and Richard Steele, nos. 1–555, 1 March 1711–6 December 1712; second series (by Addison alone), nos. 556–635, 18 June–20 December 1714; edited by Gregory Smith (Everyman Edition), 4 vols., 1907, reprinted 1979, and by Donald F. Bond (Clarendon Edition), 5 vols., 1965; selection, as Critical Essays from "The Spectator," edited by Bond, 1970

Further Reading

- Bateson, F.W., "Addison, Steele, and the Periodical Essay," in Dryden to Johnson, edited by Roger Lonsdale, London: Sphere, revised edition, 1986; New York: Bedrick, 1987:117–35
- Bloom, Edward A., and Lillian D.Bloom, Addison's Sociable Animal: In the Market Place, on the Hustings, in the Pulpit, Providence, Rhode Island: Brown University Press, 1971
- Bloom, Edward A., and Lillian D.Bloom, editors, Addison and Steele: The Critical Heritage, London: Routledge, 1980
- Bloom, Edward A., Lillian D.Bloom, and Edmund Leites, editors, Educating the Audience: Addison, Steele, and Eighteenth-Century Culture, Los Angeles: University of California William Andrews Clark Memorial Library, 1984
- Bloom, Lillian D., "Addison's Popular Aesthetic: The Rhetoric of the 'Paradise Lost' Papers," in The Author in His Work: Essays on a Problem in Criticism, edited by Louis L.Martz and Aubrey Williams, New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 1978: 263–81
- Bond, Donald F., "The First Printing of the Spectator," Modern Philology 47 (1950):164–77
- Bond, Donald F., "Addison in Perspective," Modern Philology 54 (1956): 124–28
- Damrosch, Leopold, Jr., "The Significance of Addison's Criticism," SEL 19 (1979):421–30
- Elioseff, Lee A., The Cultural Mtlieu of Addison's Literary Criticism, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1963
- Furtwangler, Albert, "Mr. Spectator, Sir Roger and Good Humour," University of Toronto Quarterly (Fall 1976):31–50
- Furtwangler, Albert, "The Making of Mr. Spectator," Modern Language Quarterly 38 (1977):21–39
- Ketcham, Michael G., Transparent Designs: Reading, Performance, and Form in the Spectator Papers, Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1985
- Knight, Charles A., "The Spectator's Generalizing Discourse," Prose Studies 16 (1993): 44–57
- Knight, Charles A., "'The Spectator's' Moral Economy," Modern Philology 91 (1993):161–79
- Lewis, C.S., "Addison," in Essays on the Eighteenth Century Presented to David Nichol Smith in Honour of His Seventieth Birthday, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1945; New York: Russell and Russell, 1963
- McCrea, Brian, Addison and Steele Are Dead: The English Department, Its Canon, and the Professionalization of Literary Criticistn, Newark: University of Delaware Press, 1990
- McKenzie, Alan T., "Into Company and Beyond: The Passions in 'The Spectator'," in his Certain, Lively Episodes: The Articulation of Passion in Eighteenth-Century Prose, Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1990:89–117
- Saccamano, Neil, "The Sublime Force of Words in Addison's 'Pleasures'," ELH 58 (1991):83–106
- Watson, Melvin R., "The Spectator Tradition and the Development of the Familiar Essay," ELH (1946):189–215

Zeit, Lisa M., "Addison's 'Imagination' Papers and the Design Argument," English Studies 73 (1992):493–502.

The Spectator

British periodical, 1828–

From its beginning in 1828, the Spectator has consistently been regarded as one of the most influential weeklies in Britain. Its founders, Robert Rintoul, Douglas Kinnaird, and Joseph Hume, targeted an independent-thinking readership, "chiefly ...the men of culture who like to listen to all sides of controversies, provided the argument is conducted with fairness and moderation" (1 May 1858); to a great extent, those people—men and women—continue to make up its readership. The first issue of the paper (5 July 1828) described itself thus:

The tone and character of the Spectator, the variety of its contents, and even its external form, peculiarly fit it for the use of respectable families. Its plan is entirely new, comprising (1) the whole news of the week; (2) a full and impartial exhibition of all the leading politics of the day; (3) a separate discussion of interesting topics of a general nature, with a view to instruction and entertainment at the same time; (4) a department devoted to literature, consisting of independent criticisms of the new books, with specimens of the best passages; (5) dramatic and musical criticism; (6) scientific and miscellaneous information.

Its early tradition of intellectual quality was a result not only of its resolute political independence, but also of the continuity provided by the long-term stewardship of its first four editors: Rintoul (1828–58), Meredith Townsend and Richard Holt Hutton (1861–97), and John St. Loe Strachey (1897–1925). Its quality may also owe something to the fact that those editors were also the proprietors, a situation which assured editorial independence. Since Strachey, some proprietors have also served as editor, but more often than not the two positions have been separate. Modern-era editors have changed with more frequency, too; the only long-term twentieth-century editor has been J. Wilson Harris (1932–53).

Although Rintoul wrote very little for the paper during his editorship, he established what became known as the "Spectator style," and through careful selection of his writers, judicious editing, and sheer force of will he put out a weekly newspaper that, with few exceptions, read as if it were written by a single individual. The Spectator style consisted of wellreasoned, simply written articles that, as Rintoul wrote to William Blackwood, exhibited "straightforwardness, and the preference of plain, strong sense to affected finery or to Cockney simplicity" (Margaret Oliphant, 1897). The political articles were informed by Rintoul's liberal-radical leanings, and the literary criticism leaned toward a conservative, utilitarian view of the place of literature in society. The Spectator's most influential essays under Rintoul included the series in support of the Reform Bill of 1832, and Anti-Corn Law legislation in 1846, and of Edward Gibbon Wakefield's scheme for emigration reform in the 1840s.

Although the Spectator regularly lost money through its early years, by 1840 the circulation had risen to a respectable 3500 per week and it began paying dividends. Perhaps the paper's marketability and the quality of the writing under Rintoul can best be judged by what happened after he sold the paper to Benjamin Moran in 1858. Moran installed Thornton Hunt as editor, and for the next three years Moran's Journal (1948) recorded mounting losses as the circulation declined. Hunt tried to stamp his imprint on the paper, much as Rintoul had, but was unable to create a new Spectator style; instead, the paper lost much of its political influence through its support of pro-slavery factions in the United States, and, despite the publication of several occasional essays by Hunt's famous father Leigh Hunt, did not seem to have a consistent literary position.

Townsend's purchase of the paper from Moran, and his eventual partnership with Hutton, marked the beginning of a new Spectator style. The two re-established Rintoul's independent liberal-radical political position and added to it an emphasis on theological questions. They also improved the quality of the paper's literary criticism, jettisoning Rintoul's utilitarianism for a more art-centered approach. But the two did not try to produce a paper consistent in style; on the contrary, Hutton's essays were described by Virginia Woolf as a "voice which is as a plague of locusts—the voice of a man stumbling drowsily among loose words, clutching aimlessly at vague ideas" (The Common Reader, 1925), while Townsend's were described as "nervous, vivid, almost violent" (William Beach Thomas, 1928). Still, as Robert Blake said, "if their styles were diverse, unity was preserved by their common ideology" (1978). Townsend and Hutton were joined by some of the leading essayists of the day, including Francis Power Cobbe, Thomas Hughes, Walter Bagehot, Edmund Gosse, John Morley, Emily Faithful, Julia Wedgwood, Matthew Arnold, and A.C.Swinburne.

Under Hutton and Townsend, the Spectator's most important political essays were those in support of the North during the American Civil War (a position which caused a momentary decline in circulation), the series attacking the Disraeli government over the Bulgarian atrocities, and those in opposition to Irish Home Rule. Hutton also wrote a number of important theological essays, which he later collected and published. A tone of high seriousness marked most of the Spectator's essays; it was often noted that the paper was almost totally devoid of a sense of humor during the last half of the 19th century.

Strachey, who succeeded Hutton and Townsend as editor and proprietor, wrote most of the leaders and a large number of literary reviews during his first 15 years as editor. His regular contributors, including J.B.Atkins, Stephen Gwynn, C.J. Cornish, and Lord Cromer, did not approach the quality of earlier writers. However, Strachey doubled the paper's circulation from 11,000 to 22,000 in his first five years by producing simple, direct prose in support of such diverse issues as free trade, state-controlled alcohol sales, and Rudyard Kipling's poetry and prose. Unfortunately he worked himself into a serious illness toward the end of World War I and had to cut back his literary and editorial contributions to the Spectator. Circulation plunged to just over 13,000 in 1922, and Strachey turned over the operational control of the editorial office to Sir Evelyn Wrench. In 1925, upon Strachey's retirement, Wrench took over as both proprietor and editor.

Through the next three decades the Spectator maintained its respected position among the British weeklies. J. Wilson Harris continued the tradition of liberal independence politically while promoting a rather traditional critical position in the arts. He also increased circulation to a high of 53,500 in 1946. From the 1960s on, the Spectator has continued to provide a combination of thoughtful political essays and irreverent social criticism, seizing a position that Christopher Booker (1978) has described as midway between Anarchic Reaction and Boring Triviality. Its circulation reached 94,000 at its 150th anniversary in 1978, and its contributors included Richard Ingrams, Auberon Waugh, Richard West, Patrick Marnham, Jeffrey Bernard, Taki, and Michael Heath, who were also the core contributors to the notorious Private Eye.

Speaking of the Spectator's readers in 1975, George Hutchinson said: "There is, I believe, a durable if not permanent minority who like and value good writing, considered, unhurried argument and sound information presented at substantial length when occasion requires, free from irrelevance and invested with the independent expert authority frequently encountered among their contributors" (Robert Blake). The reader Hutchinson described sounds remarkably like the Spectator reader in 1828. Clearly, Rintoul's formula succeeded beyond what even he might have imagined.

RICHARD D. FULTON

Further Reading

- Atkins, J.B., "St. Loe Strachey's Spectator," Spectator, special supplement, 15 May 1953:xxx
- Blake, Robert, "A History of the Spectator," Spectator, 23 September 1978:30–35
- Booker, Christopher, "An Untimely Obituary," Spectator, 23 September 1978:37–39
- Colby, Robert A., "'How It Strikes a Contemporary': The 'Spectator' as Critic," Nineteenth Century Fiction 11 (June 1956): 182–206
- Escott, T.H.S., Masters of English Journalism, Folcroft, Pennsylvania: Folcroft, 1970 (original edition, 1911)
- Fulton, Richard D., "Spectator," in British Literary Magazines, vol. 2, edited by Alvin Sullivan, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1986
- Fulton, Richard D., "Spectator," in British Romantic Prose Writers, 1789–1832, 2nd series, edited by John R. Greenfield, Dictionary of Literary Biography, vol. 110, Detroit: Gale Research, 1991
- Grant, James, The Metropolitan Weekly and Provincial Press, vol. 3 of The Newspaper Press, London and New York: Routledge, 1872
- Graves, C.L., "The Spectator in the Eighties and Nineties," Spectator, centennial supplement, 3 November 1928:16–17
- Harrop, A.J., "Rintoul and Wakefield," Spectator, centennial supplement, 3 November 1928:10–11
- Hogben, John, Richard Holt Hutton of 'The Spectator', Edinburgh: Oliver and Boyd, 1899
- Jump, John D., "Matthew Arnold and the Spectator," Review of English Studies 25 (1949):61–64
- Leroy, Gaylord C., "Richard Holt Hutton," PMLA 56 (1941): 809–40
- Oliphant, Margaret, Annals of a Publishing House: William Blackwood and His Sons,

Their Magazine and Friends, New York: AMS Press, 3 vols., 1974 (original edition, 1897–98)

“The 6,000th Spectator,” Spectator, 25 June 1943:586–87

“The Spectator,” Nation and Athenaeum 44 (November 1928): 168–69

Strachey, Amy, St. Loe Strachey: His Life and His Paper, London: Gollancz, 1930

Strachey, John St. Loe, The Adventure of Living: A Subjective Autobiography, London: Hodder and Stoughton, and New York: Putnam, 1922

Tener, Robert H., “Richard Holt Hutton,” Times Literary Supplement, 24 April 1959:241

Tener, Robert H., “Swinburne as Reviewer,” Times Literary Supplement, 25 December 1959:755

Tener, Robert H., “The Spectator Records, 1874–1897,” Victorian Newsletter 17 (1960):33–36

Tener, Robert H., “Spectatorial Strachey,” Times Literary Supplement, 31 December 1964:1181

Thomas, William Beach, The Story of the Spectator, 1828–1928, London: Methuen, 1928

“The Truth Behind the Facts,” Spectator, 23 September 1978:3

Staël, Madame de

French, 1766–1817

In her most important book of essays, De la littérature considérée dans ses rapports avec les institutions sociales (1800; The Influence of Literature upon Society) and De l'Allemagne (1810; Of Germany), Germaine Necker, Baroness of Staël von Holstein can be considered a feminist avant la lettre, founder of the sociology of literature, and the first historian of comparative history. In her essays she reveals the spirit of the contemporary European movements she came to know during several exiles as a major opponent of Napoleon. The emerging Romantic generation in particular impressed her considerably. Already in The Influence of Literature upon Society she transformed the opposition between Christian medieval Romanticism and classicism as stated by August Wilhelm Schlegel in his Berlin lectures into an opposition between German folk literature and the classical tradition, discovering along the way the importance of Nordic literature as well as the tension between Northern and Southern within the history of European culture. Contemporary German literature was considered a necessary model for the renewal of French literature. Madame de Staël emphasized the institutional status of literature, considering the literary text as the expression of society and its history, although society was still understood in the sense of a leading social class. She believed the emergence of new literary classes to be a consequence of the emancipation of society from the monarchical system that resulted from the French Revolution. Freedom and emancipation were the new values of literature.

The sociological emphasis of her essays was inherited from the Enlightenment, especially from Montesquieu's theory of climates and the idea of the influence of literature on religion, habits, and law put forward by Marmontel, whose writings Madame de Staël linked to a Rousseauvian concept of perfectibility. Because of Marmontel's heritage, René Wellek, for instance, denies the originality of Madame de Staël. Her capacity for coherently synthesizing different sources is obviously a heritage of the Enlightenment, and already Vico, Lessing, and Herder had perceived the influence of people's moral and social habits on literature. Nevertheless, Madame de Staël focused on the importance of extraliterary factors such as nationality, history, and social institutions in an organic way, claiming a more dynamic theory of literature which takes into account historical processes and adapts classic normative poetics to contemporary needs. Methodologically, the sociology proposed by Madame de Staël is obviously not modern, since it does not include the consideration of economic factors. Moreover, her concept of history is not historically differentiated. The idea of perfectibility inherited from Rousseau only concerns the ideal of education, and her vision of nations is incomplete (especially concerning Spain). The aim of her essays is nonetheless not the establishment of universal history, but the position of French literature in relation to the literatures of other countries. Her comparative analysis of literary history corresponds with the purpose of defining national character through comparison with representative traditions such as classical literature.

In De l'Allemagne, a more meticulous work about German culture, de Staël plays the role of opinion leader for European intellectuals. Through the portraits and reportages (in the sense of modern interviews) as well as résumés of books contained in these essays, Madame de Staël influenced the image of Germans in France and throughout Europe. The emerging Romantic generation in Germany is presented as an idyllic republic of poets and erudite people working enthusiastically on the establishment of modern thinking during the crisis of the ancient social structures in Europe. Her image of Germans was partially a compendium of French common opinions, but more interesting than these stereotypes are her sociological arguments. She attributed what she saw as Germans' lack of taste and esprit as well as their inaccurate linguistic style (all of this in spite of their profound intellectual work) to both the nonexistence of a capital and the separation of court life and intellectuals.

Madame de Staël's essayistic style is extremely personal, resulting from discussions within the literary gatherings at her family residence at Coppet on Lake Geneva. Her portraits, particularly in De l'Allemagne, are a casual "montage" of impressions, a detailed reportage including quotations from texts (which she translated), as well as a mixture of information and meditations about German philosophy and religion and about questions on literary theory, though she did not examine music and the arts.

VITTORIA BORSÒ

Biography

Anne Louise Germaine Necker, Baronne de Staël von Holstein. Born 22 April 1766 in Paris. Studied privately at home. Grew up attending her mother's salon. Married Baron Eric Magnus de Staël von Holstein, 1786 (separated, 1800; he died, 1802): one daughter (died in infancy). Opened her own salon, 1787. Affair with Count Louis de Narbonne, 1788–93: two sons. Moved to Coppet on Lake Geneva for part of each year, from 1790; fled to England during the Revolution, 1793. Affair with Benjamin Constant, from 1795:

one daughter probably fathered by Constant. Exiled by Napoleon, 1795–96; reopened her salon in Paris, 1797; traveled often to Italy, Austria, Germany, Russia, Sweden, and England, from 1803; exiled by Napoleon for De l'Allemagne, 1810. Married Jean Rocca secretly, 1811, publicly, 1816; one son. Lived in England, 1813–14; returned to Paris after Napoleon's defeat, 1814. Died (after a stroke) in Paris, 14 July 1817.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Lettres sur les ouvrages et le caractère de Jean-Jacques Rousseau, 1788; revised edition, 1789

Réflexions sur le procès de la reine, 1793

Réflexions sur la paix, 1795; edited by C.Cordié, 1945

De l'influence des passions sur le bonheur des individus et des nations, 1796; edited by Michel Tournier, 1979; as A Treatise on the Influence of the Passions upon the Happiness of Individuals and Nations, translated anonymously, 1798

Essai sur les fictions, 1796; edited by Michel Tournier, 1979

De la littérature considérée dans ses rapports avec les institutions sociales, 2 vols., 1800; edited by Paul Van Tieghem, 1959, and Gérard Gengembre and Jean Goldzink, 1991; as A Treatise on Ancient and Modern Literature, translated anonymously, 1803; as The Influence of Literature upon Society, translated anonymously, 1812

De l'Allemagne, 1810; edited by Jean de Pauge and Simone Balayé, 1958

Réflexions sur le suicide, 1813; as Reflections on Suicide, translated anonymously, 1813

Essais dramatiques, 1821

Madame de Staël on Politics, Literature, and National Character, translated by Morroe Berger, 1964

An Extraordinary Woman: Selected Writings, translated by Vivian Folkenflik, 1987

Other writings: two dramas-in-verse (Sophie, 1790; Jane Grey, 1790), two novels (Delphine, 4 vols., 1802; Corinne, 3 vols., 1807), two volumes of short stories, a play, books on the French Revolution and on cultural comparisons between France and Germany, and many volumes of correspondence.

Collected works edition: (Œuvres complètes, edited by Auguste-Louis de Staël, 17 vols., 1820–21.

Bibliographies

Longchamp, F.-C., L'Œuvre imprimée de Mme. Germaine de Staël, Brussels: Mondeanum, 1966

Schazmann, Paul-Émile, Bibliographie des œuvres de Madame de Staël, Paris and Neuchâtel: Attinger, 1938

Further Reading

Balayé, Simone, Madame de Staël: Lumières et liberté, Paris: Klincksieck, 1979

- Balayé, Simone, Madame de Staël: Écrire, lutter, vivre, Geneva: Droz, 1994
- Besser, Gretchen Rous, Germaine de Staël Revisited, New York: Twayne, 1994
- Diesbach, Ghislain de, Madame de Staël, Paris: Perrin, 1983
- Gutwirth, Madelyn, Avriel Goldberger, and Karyna Szmurlo, editors, Germaine de Staël: Crossing the Borders, New Brunswick, New Jersey: Rutgers University Press, 1991
- Herold, J.Christopher, Mistress to an Age: A Life of Mme. de Staël, Indianapolis: Bobbs Merrill, 1958; London: Hamilton, 1959
- Hogsett, Charlotte, The Literary Existence of Germaine de Staël, Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1987
- Isbell, John Claiborne, The Birth of European Romanticism: Truth and Propaganda in Staël's "De l'Allemagne," 1810–1813, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994
- Posgate, Helen B., Madame de Staël, New York: Twayne, 1968
- Winegarten, Renée, Mme. de Staël, Leamington Spa: Berg, 1985

Steele, Richard

English, 1672–1729

Along with Daniel Defoe and his schoolmate, friend, and coadjutor, Joseph Addison, Steele stands as one of the inventors and masters of the periodical essay. After attending Charterhouse School and Christ Church, Oxford, and a stint in the Life Guards and Coldstream Guards, Steele, in the first decade of the 18th century, had a successful career as a playwright and political writer. He garnered several lucrative state offices, including the post of Gazetteer. But, as was the case throughout his life, he struggled financially as he pursued gentlemanliness, spending more than he earned.

On 12 April 1709, Steele published the first number of the Tatler, hoping it would be a moneymaker. As in the earlier Gazette (1707–10), Steele reprinted news items, but the Tatler achieved popularity, even fame, because it also offered an essay, frequently a gently ironic comment upon contemporary manners and mores. Steele took the name for the persona of the Tatler, Isaac Bickerstaff, from Jonathan Swift's Bickerstaff papers (1708–09). Steele's friendship with Swift, however, would soon fall victim to the divisions in British society created by the War of the Spanish Succession and the disputes between landed men and moneyed men, between Tories and Whigs that erupted during the ministry of Robert Harley, Earl of Oxford. Swift became Harley's chief propagandist; Steele became one of Harley's most visible and vociferous opponents.

In the years 1710 to 1714, Steele passionately defended the Duke of Marlborough's war policy, repeatedly accusing the Oxford ministry of threatening the Protestant Succession as it attempted to negotiate a peace with France. In October 1710, the Oxford ministry stripped Steele of his Gazetteership. He responded to his financial loss by starting the Spectator, the first number appearing on 1 March 1711. Addison, who had not written for the Tatler until the 18th number, had also lost state offices and wrote for the Spectator from its inception.

The Spectator claimed "an exact neutrality" in political matters, but political discord intensified, as the Oxford ministry attempted to remove Marlborough and to conclude peace negotiations. By 1712., Steele wished to comment directly upon events; hence the journal concluded its first run on 6 December 1712. (Addison would later revive it). The following March, Steele began publishing the Guardian, which was followed in October by the Englishman, both journals claiming to defend traditional English liberties threatened by the conditions of the Peace of Utrecht. Steele's political commentary became so controversial that, in 1714, he was expelled from Parliament and prosecuted for publishing seditious libels. With the death of Queen Anne and the Hanoverian Succession, however, Steele returned to political favor. He was awarded the Royal Patent for Drury Lane Theatre, and his last periodical, the Theatre (1720), concerned itself principally with matters of theater government and with establishing a model for comedy to replace that of the Restoration stage.

As Steele sought a large audience, so he avoided the Juvenalian satire of Swift, preferring to take a more Horatian tack, emphasizing social consensus and the importance of good nature. Steele tries to direct his satire at groups rather than at individuals, and he always seeks a temperate tone. Perhaps the best example of this is the most famous Spectator character created by Addison and Steele, Sir Roger de Coverley, a landed man and a Tory, the political opposite of Steele. Yet as he is characterized throughout the journal, most notably in a series of papers by Addison in which Mr. Spectator visits Sir Roger in the country, de Coverley acts with admirable if old-fashioned good will. He falls asleep at church services after requiring all other members of the congregation to remain awake; at the assizes he makes an irrelevant speech about a legal matter that he does not understand. He appears in equal parts superannuated and admirable.

As part of his campaign to shape manners (and to build a large following), Steele takes clarity as one of his great objects. "Hard and crabbed Words" (Tatler no. 2) are to be avoided, lest they alienate readers. In the Tatler no. 212, a letter from "Plain English" requests an explanation of a term, "Simplex Munitis," used in an earlier essay. Although Addison and Steele were both cultivated, even (at least in Addison's case) learned men, Steele, rather than jesting about his correspondent's lack of education, patiently offers the explanation required. "Plain English" sets the standard to which Steele aspires. Papers in both the Tatler and the Spectator open with epigrams from the classical languages, but it is a rare paper that, at some point, does not gloss the epigram in English.

As part of this pursuit of clarity, Steele attacks punning as a device for "Men of small Intellects" (Spectator no. 504) and characterizes the conversational counterpart of punning—"biting"—as one symptom of a "Decay in Conversation," as a technique in the "Art" of "being unintelligible in Discourse" (no. 12). He returns to the topic of biting in no. 504, dismissing it as an act of conversational duplicity and associating it with criminals. He claims that "a Biter is one who thinks you a Fool, because you do not think him a Knave."

Despite his attacks upon verbal artifice—ambiguity, punning, biting—Steele relishes extended explanatory analogies. While he strives always to eliminate "double meanings" from his diction, he makes persistent use of allegory, so long as the allegory maintains an unambiguous and fixed correspondence between the characters and objects it describes and the virtues or vices they represent; for Steele "fable" and "allegory" are synonymous. He uses allegory in its simplest form, the roman à clef, by inventing imaginary kingdoms that comment directly upon life in Great Britain.

Having established an analogy, Steele is loath to drop it; rather he will return to it and eliminate any ambiguity. In a series of Tatler papers on the evils of gambling, he opens by alerting his readers that an allegory will follow: “Aesop has gain’d to himself immortal Renown for figuring the Manners, Desires, Passions, and Interests of Men, by Fables of Beasts and Birds; I shall in my future Accounts of our modern Heroes and Wits vulgarly call’d Sharpers, imitate the Method of that delightful Moralist” (no. 59). He then compares sharpers to a “Pack of Dogs,” and, in subsequent numbers, categorizes the different species of “Curs,” even as he notes the similarities between a dog kennel and a gambling house. The last paper of the series (no. 76) describes the “Curs” as threatening the very being of the state because they illicitly acquire property, the basis of commonwealth in Steele’s Whiggish political thinking.

This last paper expands the relevance of the allegory and also links this series to ten papers in which Steele (along with Addison) compares the morally dead to the physically dead and urges many in his audience to consider if they should turn themselves in to “Upholders” (undertakers) for burial. Letters come in from upholders who defend the honor of their profession and from readers who wonder about their moral health, and Steele uses these to keep the topic alive, to refine our sense of what moral deadness actually is. At first, the comparison of the morally and the physically dead is witty, even ironic; the word “dead” is briefly ambiguous. But Steele never leaves his readers in this condition. He elaborates the analogy until it becomes familiar, even, as correspondents join in, conversational.

Steele frequently returns to comparisons and restates them. Statements like “In my last Thursday’s paper I made mention of” (Spectator no. 227) and “I shall reserve this Subject for the Speculation of another Day” (Spectator no. 275) bind the papers together. They also allow Steele to become his own interpreter. Steele—whose life was a busy blend of politics, attempts at commerce, and active socializing—was not above using such cross-referencing to ease his writing load. That load, heavy in the Tatler, which was published thrice-weekly, doubled in the Spectator. While the provenance of letters to the Spectator remains an open question, and some of the letters clearly were written by Addison and Steele, others come from actual correspondents. Correspondence both keeps issues going and helps to refine them. Thus, in the Spectator no. 268, a correspondent writes, “Your Discourse of the 29th of December [no. 201] on Love and Marriage is of so useful a kind, that I cannot forbear adding my Thoughts to yours on that Subject.” While what evidence we have shows that Steele used few letters as they were submitted, he did study them carefully, occasionally changing or improving them, so they could fit into a series of his devising.

The question of the respective contributions of Addison and Steele to the two great journals has been raised frequently and, in the 19th century, was pursued with remarkable intensity. Thomas Babington Macaulay in an 1843 essay on Addison praised him for bringing “suavity and moderation” to the political and literary conflicts of the early 18th century, even as he dismissed Steele: “His writings have been well compared to those light wines which, though deficient in body and flavour, are yet a pleasant drink if not kept too long, or carried too far.” Steele, however, found his defenders. John Forster (“Sir Richard Steele,” 1855) claimed that his stories “have all the warmth as well as brevity of unpremeditated accounts,” and that “the beauties as well as the defects of his style” follow from his mastery of the “colloquial.” Austin Dobson (1886), citing Leigh Hunt, judged Steele’s humor to be “so cheerful and good-natured, so frank and manly that ... ‘I prefer open-hearted Steele with all his faults to Addison with all his essays’.” The contrast between Addison’s suavity and Steele’s sentimentality recurs in 18th- and 19th-century criticism. W.J. Courthope (Addison, 1901) mediates the two positions by describing Addison as an improver of “the opportunity which Steele affords him.” In this view, the impetuous and impecunious Steele opens territory that the urbane Addison cultivates.

Steele had a remarkably busy life. His work as an essayist stands with his work as a playwright and critic; his literary career stands with numerous other public activities—be they as grand as speaking in Parliament or as mundane as fending off debt collectors. Seeking to gain income from his essays, Steele was closely attuned to his audience, necessarily sensitive to changes in the reading public in the early 18th century. Perhaps his greatest achievement was his offering, in the Tatler and the Spectator most notably, a mediation between landed men and moneyed men, between the aristocracy and the bourgeoisie, between tradition and change. In the breadth of his activities and his sympathies, he helped to define polite behavior for a middle class that was just coming into being and did not yet define itself as such.

BRIAN MCCREA

Biography

Born in Dublin; baptized 12 March 1672. Studied at Charterhouse, London, where he met Joseph Addison, 1684–89; Christ Church, Oxford, 1690; Merton College, Oxford, 1691–92. Served in the Life Guards, 1692–95, and as a captain in the Coldstream Guards, 1695–97; secretary to Lord Cutts, 1696–97; stationed at the Tower of London, by 1700, and in Lord Lucas’ regiment at Landguard Fort, Suffolk, 1702–05. Fathered an illegitimate daughter. Married Margaret Stretch, 1705 (died, 1706). Served Prince George of Denmark (Queen Anne’s husband), 1706–08. Married Mary Scurlock, 1707 (died, 1718): two sons and two daughters. Gazetteer, and editor, the Gazette, 1707–10. Founding editor of several periodicals, including the Tatler, 1709–11, the Spectator (with Addison), 1711–12, the Guardian, 1713, the Englishman, 1713–14, the Lover, 1714, the Reader, 1714, Town-Talk, 1715–16, the Tea-Table, 1716, Chit-Chat, 1716, the Plebeian, 1719, and the Theatre, 1720. Member of Parliament for Stockbridge, Hampshire, 1713–14 (expelled), Boroughbridge, Yorkshire, 1715, and Wendover, Buckinghamshire, 1722; on Hanoverian succession, held various appointed positions, including governor of the Theatre Royal, Drury Lane, 1714–24. Knighted, 1715. Died in Carmarthen, Wales, 1 September 1729.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

The Tatler, nos. 1–271, 12 April 1709–2 January 1711; edited by Donald F. Bond, 3 vols.,

1987; as The Lucubrations of Isaac Bickerstaff, Esq., edited by John Nichols, 6 vols., 1786

The Spectator, written and edited with Joseph Addison, nos. 1–555, 1 March 1711–6 December 1712; edited by Gregory Smith (Everyman Edition), 4 vols., 1907, reprinted 1979, and by Donald F. Bond (Clarendon Edition), 5 vols., 1965; selection, as Critical Essays from "The Spectator," edited by Bond, 1970

The Guardian, with others, nos. 1–175, 12 March–1 October 1713; edited by John Calhoun Stephens, 1982

The Englishman, nos. 1–57, 6 October 1713–15 February 1714; second series, nos. 1–38, 11 July–21 November 1715; edited by Rae Blanchard, 1 vol., 1955

The Reader, nos. 1–9, 22 April–10 May 1714

The Lover, nos. 1–40, 25 February–27 May 1714; edited by W. Lewin, 1 vol., 1887

Town-Talk, nos. 1–9, 17 December 1715–15 February 1716

Chit-Chat, nos. 1–3, March 1716

The Plebeian, nos. 1–4, 14 March–6 April 1719

The Theatre, nos. 1–28, 2 January–5 April 1720; edited by John Loftis, 1962

Periodical Journalism 1714–1716: The Lover, The Reader, Town Talk, Chit-Chat, edited by Rae Blanchard, 1959

Selections from the Tatler and the Spectator, edited by Angus Ross, 1982

Other writings: four plays, occasional verse, and correspondence (collected in The Correspondence of Richard Steele, edited by Rae Blanchard, 1968).

Further Reading

Bloom, Edward A., and Lillian D. Bloom, editors, Addison and Steele: The Critical Heritage, London: Routledge, 1980

Bond, Richmond P., The Tatler: The Making of a Literary Journal, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1971

Dobson, Austin, Richard Steele, London: Longman Green, and New York: Appleton, 1886

Goldgar, Bertrand A., The Curse of Party: Swift's Relations with Addison and Steele, Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1961

Ketcham, Michael G., Transparent Designs: Reading, Performance, and Form in the Spectator Papers, Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1985

McCrea, Brian, Addison and Steele Are Dead: The English Department, Its Canon, and the Professionalization of Literary Criticism, Newark: University of Delaware Press, 1990

Winton, Calhoun, Captain Steele: The Early Career of Richard Steele, and Sir Richard Steele, M.P.: The Later Career, Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2 vols., 1964–70

Stegner, Wallace

American, 1909–1993

During a writing career that stretched over half a century, from his first novel, Remembering Laughter (1937), to his last book of essays, Where the Bluebird Sings to the Lemonade Springs (1992), and his death in 1993, Wallace Stegner produced 13 novels (one of which won the Pulitzer Prize in 1972), three volumes of short stories, three historical and biographical works, and seven collections of essays. Although Stegner is best known to most readers for his fiction, many critics believe that his reputation as an essayist will eventually be just as strong.

Having spent his high school and college years, as well as the first years of his teaching career, in Salt Lake City, Stegner was well equipped to write Mormon Country (1942), a book which remains in print and continues to sell over 50 years after its first publication. In 28 essays he writes about the culture and history of a religious group often misunderstood, deftly weaving the religious beliefs and practices, history, culture, and personalities of a distinctly American denomination into an engaging book. A reading of these essays makes it clear that Stegner highly respected the strength and faith of these people even though he did not share their theology.

Wolf Willow (1962), whose subtitle is A History, a Story, and a Memory of the Last Plains Frontier, is an interesting blend of 19 essays in which Stegner deals with his youthful years from 1914 to 1920 in southern Saskatchewan. It is a loving evocation of the last years of the Canadian frontier in which he studies the relationship between the people and the harsh land in which they live. The town of Whitemud (actually East End) comes through in these pieces, Stegner says near the end of the book, as “a seedbed, as good a place to be a boy and as unsatisfying a place to be a man as one could well imagine.”

The Sound of Mountain Water (1969) contains 14 essays written over a period of more than three decades dealing with the American West, its history, local color, and culture. Two of the essays, “At Home in the Fields of the Lord” and “Born a Square,” are among his best, the first dealing with the author’s experience in growing up as a “Gentile” (i.e. nonMormon) in Salt Lake City, the second with the difficulties of writers from the American West trying to find their way in a literary world dominated by East Coast editors and publishers who know and care little about the West.

American Places (1981), lavishly illustrated with color photographs by the eminent American photographer Eliot Porter, is a collection of 14 essays Stegner wrote with his son Page (himself a well-known writer) dealing with North American human and natural history, the relationship between Americans and their environment, and the people themselves, sometimes told in the words of America’s explorers and immigrants. Stegner wrote eight of the essays himself and collaborated with Page on one.

One Way to Spell Man (1982), like American Places, was published after Stegner had retired from Stanford University, where he had directed one of America’s most distinguished creative writing programs. The book is a collection of 16 essays written over 30 years from the 1950s onward and previously published in a variety of quality magazines and as editorial introductions to literary works. In these pieces Stegner writes about the relationship of the arts to our understanding of the world around us, the craft of fiction, the problems of the young writer, the superfluity of four-letter words, adulthood, the seeking of excellence and pleasure, Canadian culture, the photography of Ansel Adams, and conservation. Three other essays are critical analyses of novels: Owen Wister's The Virginian, Walter Van Tilburg Clark's The Ox-Bow Incident, and A.B.Guthrie's The Big Sky. All of these essays, like his others and his fiction, are infused with the spirit of Stegner's statement in his preface: "I am terribly glad to be alive; and when I have wit enough to think about it, terribly proud to be a man and an American, with all the rights and privileges that those words connote; and most of all I am humble before the responsibilities that are also mine. For no right comes without a responsibility, and being born luckier than most of the world's millions, I am also born more obligated."

Where the Bluebird Sings to the Lemonade Springs (1992), Stegner's last book-length publication, brings together 16 essays previously published in magazines and books. He writes about, among other things, his migrant childhood in Canada and the American West, his relationship with his mother, Western American aridity, conservation, and the art of fiction; he also provides critical essays on George R.Stewart and John Steinbeck.

Stegner's essays, like his fiction, are strongly permeated with a moral sense. Whether writing about the beliefs and folk ways of a Mormon village in southern Utah, the place of a library in a civilization, or the art of fiction, Stegner believes that things matter.

ROBERT C.STEENSMA

Biography

Wallace Earle Stegner. Born 18 February 1909 in Lake Mills, Iowa. Studied at the University of Utah, Salt Lake City, A.B., 1930; University of Iowa, Iowa City, A.M., 1932., Ph.D., 1935; University of California, Berkeley, 1932–33. Married Mary Stuart Page, 1934: one son. Taught at Augustana College, Rock Island, Illinois, 1934, University of Utah, 1934–37, University of Wisconsin, Madison, 1937–39, Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1939–45, and Stanford University, California, 1945–71; also visiting lecturer or writer-in-residence at various universities and institutions. Staff member, Bread Loaf Writers' Conference, Vermont, from 1939. Editor, Houghton Mifflin publishers, 1945–53. Chair, National Parks Advisory Board, 1965–66. Editor-in-chief, American West, 1966–68. Awards: many, including several fellowships; O.Henry Award, 1942, 1950, 1954; Houghton Mifflin Life-in-America Award, 1945; Anisfield-Wolf Award, 1945; Pulitzer Prize, for Angle of Repose, 1972; Western Literature Association Award, 1974; National Book Award, 1977; Los Angeles Times Kirsch Award, 1980; honorary degrees from seven universities. Died in Santa Fe, New Mexico, 13 April 1993.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Mormon Country, 1942.

Wolf Willow: A History, a Story, and a Memory of the Last Plains Frontier, 1962

The Sound of Mountain Water, 1969

American Places, with Page Stegner, photographs by Eliot Porter, 1981

One Way to Spell Man, 1982

The American West as Living Space, 1987

Where the Bluebird Sings to the Lemonade Springs: Living and Writing in the West, 1992

Other writings: 13 novels (including The Big Rock Candy Mountain, 1943; Angle of Repose, 1972; The Spectator Bird, 1976; Crossing to Safety, 1987), short stories, biographies of John Wesley Powell (1954) and Bernard De Voto (1974), and works on history, especially the American West.

Bibliography

Colberg, Nancy, Wallace Stegner: A Descriptive Bibliography, Lewiston, Idaho: Confluence Press, 1990

Further Reading

Anthony, Arthur, editor, Critical Essays on Wallace Stegner, Boston: Hall, 1982

Benson, Jackson J., Wallace Stegner: His Life and Work, New York: Viking Penguin, 1996

Lewis, Merrill, and Lorene Lewis, Wallace Stegner, Boise, Idaho: Boise State College, 1972

Robinson, Forrest G., and Margaret G. Robinson, Wallace Stegner, New York: Twayne, 1977

Steinhardt, N.

Romanian, 1912–1989

N. Steinhardt belongs to a remarkable generation of Romanian essayists and philosophers (Generation '27) whose intellectual journey began in the late 1920s and first peaked in the 1930s. Among Steinhardt's friends at the time were Mircea Eliade, Eugène Ionesco, and E.M. Cioran, who later made brilliant careers abroad. Influenced by the predominant existentialist Zeitgeist, these young Romanian intellectuals were obsessed with authenticity, saw culture and life as indissolubly linked, and were familiar with the main intellectual debates of the time. Steinhardt's friendship with other distinguished essayists and philosophers who remained in Romania—Constantin Noica, Alexandru Paleologu, Mihai Sora, Sergiu Al. George, Dinu Pillat—had a lasting influence on his intellectual and spiritual life.

These similarities notwithstanding, Steinhardt's own destiny was a singular one, in many respects a coincidence of opposites. A Jew who converted to Eastern Orthodox Christianity, a writer and monk dividing his time between the cultural attractions of Bucharest and the contemplative atmosphere of Rohia monastery, an enlightened "nationalist" who loved the traditions of his country but also felt comfortable on the streets of London or in the gardens of Chevotogne monastery, Steinhardt considered himself a franc-tireur, a "liberal conservative," and a "dilettante." In his essays he mixed moral and aesthetic considerations and ignored the often rigid canons of academic literary criticism and philosophy. His works—published in the most distinguished Romanian journals such as Revista Fundațiilor Regale (The journal of royal foundations), Viața Românească (Romanian life), Secolul 20 (The 20th century), Steaua (The star), Familia (The family), and Vatra (The hearth)—range from theological essays to nonacademic literary criticism. Among his most beloved authors were G.K.Chesterton, Charles Dickens, Nikolai Berdiaev, Charles Péguy, and Mircea Eliade; his admiration was for the France of Blaise Pascal, Simone Weil, and Léon Bloy rather than that of René Descartes, Jean-Paul Sartre, and Michel Foucault.

A lover of liberty and an opponent of unconditional obedience and dogmatism, Steinhardt was rightly called by one of his fellows "the samurai of Romanian literary criticism." His eccentric profile stirred controversy and admiration; after the Revolution of 1989 he became almost a cult figure. Unexpected associations of ideas, the propensity to reconsider unduly ignored writers, the rejection of the ethics/aesthetics dichotomy—these were among the characteristics that formed the core of his personality as an essayist. The aim of art, Steinhardt once wrote (echoing Andrei Tarkovskii), is to prepare humans for death; culture cannot be separated from ethics simply because there is no hiatus between life and books. Furthermore, he believed that the key to understanding art and literature is to cherish all their forms and manifestations. The more one admires and loves, Steinhardt once wrote, the happier one is. Admiring, however, requires understanding otherness, overcoming one's own solitude, and sharing in the communion with others. The intellectual knows how to go beyond himself and is fascinated with human diversity. An intellectual, Steinhardt claims, does not read what interests him, he is simply interested in anything he reads.

Steinhardt's iconoclastic nature was powerfully conveyed in his first book, In genul tinerilor (1934; In the manner of youngsters), a collection of highly entertaining essays-pastiches published under the pseudonym Antisthius (taken from La Bruyère's Caractères), in which he mocks the verbosity and style of his friends' writings. Steinhardt's later essays were deeply influenced by an experience he had at a critical moment in his life. During his imprisonment for political reasons (1959–64), he converted to Eastern Orthodox Christianity. Entering this new world, he discovered joy as the eternal theme of Christianity and came to learn the value of courage and inner liberty. The book that would bring him posthumous fame, Jurnalul fericii (1991; The diary of happiness), describes Steinhardt's saison en enfer and was unanimously hailed as a revelation, combining irony and wit, vernacular language and sophisticated philosophical and theological references. The Jurnalul, along with the seminal essay “Secretul ‘Scrisorii pierdute’” (1975; The secret of “The lost letter”) and the posthumously edited sermons (which are, in fact, brilliant oral essays full of theological insight and persuasion), can be considered the most refined literary expressions of Steinhardt’s outlook, with forays into literature, ethics, religion, politics, and the philosophy of culture. His important essay-manifesto on liberty, “Taina libertății” (1987; The mystery of liberty), is a momentous apology of political courage and a firm denunciation of voluntary servitude.

The fascination with Steinhardt’s essays comes not only from his ideas, but also from his profoundly original and persuasive style. His is a fröhliche Wissenschaft (gay science) aiming at a wide audience with an appetite for wisdom rather than entertainment. Provocative ideas, rhetorical twists, and a ludic style captivate his readers, while skillful paradoxes and a nondidactic, nonsystematic approach couched in a peculiar, sometimes archaic vocabulary convey puzzling ideas and connections worthy of any great French moralist. Steinhardt’s writings are always warm and joyful, pathetic and enthusiastic, never formal or dry; an “ideal reader” himself interested in philosophy and thrillers, theology and physics, literature and history, Steinhardt was driven by the concupiscence of knowledge, yet he never forgot that all systems and theories are relative, partial, questionable, and uncertain. The breadth and variety of his interdisciplinary interests are indeed astonishing: he cherished classical as well as contemporary authors and had a special predilection for unduly forgotten—it is tempting to say second-rank—authors. His topics range from liberty to false idealism, from exile to physics experiments, from contemplation to the new French quantitative historiography. He wrote with equal interest, competence, and sympathy on Michelangelo Antonioni and Voltaire, Dickens and Barbusse, Eliade and Beaumarchais, Daudet and Aitmatov, Maria Callas and Dostoevskii, Kurt Gödel and Thomas Mann, Mateiu Caragiale and Marshall McLuhan. Writing on Chesterton, he celebrated the mystery of life and the value of fidelity. From Marcel Jouhandeau he learned the joy of life, while Péguy and Henry de Montherlant taught him the value of courage. Reading Cervantes, Dickens, and John Galsworthy was for Steinhardt an occasion to note that writing a novel is a happening in itself in which authors themselves gradually discover their characters. Milton reinforced one of his older beliefs that the writer must not be detached from history and contingency. Finally, writing on Sinclair Lewis was an opportunity to meditate, in the wake of Alexis de Tocqueville, on democratic conformity and the need to swim against the current.

To account for the puzzling breadth of Steinhardt’s writings, one should bear in mind that in his view the essay is much more than literary criticism or learned scholarship: it is a “happening,” a sophisticated and subtle form of commentary and meditation aiming at a “second creation.” Steinhardt preferred what he called a “field analysis” to a more detailed exegesis focusing exclusively on the text. He believed that every work of art is surrounded by a halo similar to that found around everyone; the essayist must study this halo and attempt to translate its aura into words. In Steinhardt’s view, to be an essayist one must learn the “art of admiration”; writing an essay amounts to composing a hymn in praise of the original work. This requires much more than hermeneutic skills: a calling is needed that combines attention to detail with synthetic intuition and empathy. Steinhardt was never wary of quoting Werner Heisenberg to the effect that the observer always influences the observed phenomenon; in a similar manner, the essayist interferes with the works he admires, thus creating new meanings. He cannot limit his interests, for he is “condemned” to universalism and an unending quest. The essayist is expected to be cultivated and intelligent, attentive and moderate, enthusiastic and capable of admiration, ambitious and daring.

AURELIAN CRĂIUȚU

Biography

Born in 1912 in Bucharest. Studied law at the University of Bucharest, law degree, 1934, Ph.D., 1936. Visited France and England, 1937–39. Contributor to various journals, including Revista Fundațiilor Regale, 1940s. Imprisoned for political reasons, 1959–64. Began to publish again, 1976. Entered the Rohia monastery, Maramures (northern Romania), 1980, but continued to be active in literary circles. Died March 1989.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

In genul tinerilor (as Antisthius), 1934

Essai sur une conception catholique du judaisme, with E. Neuman, 1935

Illusions et réalités juives, with E. Neuman, 1936

Între viață și cărță 1976

Incertitudini literare, 1980

Geo Bogza: Un Poet al efectelor, Exaltării, Grandiosului, Solemnității, Exuberanței și Pateticului, 1980

Critică la persoana întâi, 1983

Escale în timp și spațiu, 1987

Prin alții spre sine: Eseuri vechi și noi, 1988

Jurnalul fericirii, edited by V. Ciomoș, 1991

Monologul polifonic, edited by V. Bulat, 1991

Daruind vește dobâdi (sermons), 1992; enlarged edition, 1994

Primejdia mărturisirii, edited by I. Pinteș, 1993

Cartea împărtășirii, edited by I. Vartic, 1995

Further Reading

Alexandru, Ioan, “Elogiu simplității,” Flacăra, 3 April 1980

Ierunca, Virgil, “N. Steinhardt și ‘dreapta socotină’,” in his Subiect și predicat, Bucharest: Humanitas, 1993

Lovinescu, Monica, “N. Steinhardt la 70 ani,” in her Unde scurte III, Bucharest: Humanitas, 1994:342–44

Lovinescu, Monica, “Escale in timp si spatiu,” in her Unde scurte IV, Bucharest: Humanitas, 1995:356–61

- Grigurcu, Gheorghe, "N.Steinhardt ori samuraiul critic," in his Între critici, Cluj: Dacia, 1983:140–43
- Grigurcu, Gheorghe, "Creștinismul în tratare liberă," Viața Românească 9 (1991):93–99
- Mecu, Nicolae, "Portret al artistului la bătrânețe," Revista de Istorie si Teorie Literară 40, nos. 1–2 (1992): 57–69
- Negoïțescu, Ion, "Predicile lui N.Steinhardt," Transilvania 1–2. (1993):113–14
- Negoïțescu, Ion, "N.Steinhardt, escale în timp și spațiu," in his Scriitori contemporani, Cluj: Dacia, 1994:413–16
- Simuț, Ion, "Destinul unei cărți, cartea unui destin," in his Incursiuni în literatura actuală, Oradea: Cogito, 1994:306–13

Stempowski, Jerzy

Polish, 1893–1969

The major part of Jerzy Stempowski's output consists of thousands of pages of articles, letters, and feuilletons, yet its kernel is the essay. The selection of texts Eseje dla Kassandry (1961; Essays for Cassandra), prepared by the author himself, and the posthumously published volume Od Berdyczowa do Rzymu (1971; From Berdyczow to Rome) constitute merely a fourth of Stempowski's output.

From among the prewar essays, particular attention should be given to the pamphlet Pan Jowialski i jego spadkobiercy (1931; Mr. Jowialski and his heirs), which at first appears to be a critical study of the comedies of the Polish comic playwright Aleksandr Fredro. In fact it is a critique of the policies of Marshal Józef Piłsudski, the consequences of which Stempowski, who had access to ministerial cabinets, could observe from close up. Stempowski revealed his intentions in his preface to the essay, in which he cautions that "to read a little bit more than the author actually wrote is the normal task of the reader, who maintains the perennial illusion of the ever-new richness of old literature." An excellent essay about the Western European avant-garde in art, "Chimera jako zwierzę pociągowe" (1933; Chimera as a beast of burden), written around the same time, was particularly important in gaining Stempowski recognition as an essayist. In it he uncovers the hidden relationships between the economic processes of the first quarter of the 20th century and the "literary currents vital for European Bohemia": "Lautréamont, Rimbaud, Dostoevskii, Nietzsche created in loneliness, yet they opposed the whole world. Surrealists write as a school; they are encouraged and applauded by a certain elite in the audience, and, besides, by a crowd of snobs and nouveaux-riches."

A major subject of Stempowski's essays is the crisis and decline of European civilization, as, for example, in "Esej dla Kassandry" (1950; "Essay for Cassandra"), "Rubis d'Orient" (1954), and "Czytając Tukidydesa" (1957; Reading Thucydides). In invoking the mythological persona of Cassandra, Stempowski presents portraits of people who turned out to be perceptive in their "prophecies" regarding the future of Europe. In common with the daughter of Priam, they had been pushed aside and misunderstood by their own contemporaries. The end of the essay leaves no room for doubt: "If Europe, ruined by so many insanities, is to avoid annihilation, her population must learn to foresee more accurately the results of its actions, and it can no longer afford to ignore those who possess this gift.” In the text alluding to Thucydides’ Peloponnesian War, Stempowski uses a similar artistic device, accepting that the present can be investigated in an interesting way if we assume the perspective of past generations. Moreover, human fate likes to repeat itself; the nature of man does not change. The words of Erast Jünger quoted at the beginning of the essay are telling: “The great world theater has a small cast. In historical costumes, with the languages from different epochs on their lips, they always play the same characters. They star in a couple of perennial conflicts.”

Apart from the crises of European culture, two other important themes appear in Stempowski’s essays. The first is ancient culture and the world of its values. An excellent testimony to the fertility of ancient culture is the essay about Stempowski’s sojourn during World War II in the mountains, in “the hidingplace of smugglers” who, quite unexpectedly, offered him a box full of old books. Having found Ovid’s Metamorphoses and Virgil’s Bucolics and Georgics, Stempowski once again discovered the charm of the unforgettable verse: “In the smugglers’ hideout,” he writes, “...I was struck for the first time by the realistic and psychological content of the Bucolics. An exile departing from his native land instinctively clings to the soil, absorbs it with his eyes as if to preserve it forever in memory... This perspective is the secret of Virgil and the source of the timeless appeal of the Bucolics” (“Księgozbiór przemytników” [1948; “The Smugglers’ Library”]).

The second theme of Stempowski’s essays is man’s attitude toward nature. Stempowski was fascinated with the world of nature and, like the 17th–and 18th-century writers and thinkers, with the various attempts to humanize it. These essays are full of brilliant descriptions of landscapes, roads, gardens, and parks. The deep melancholy which permeates Stempowski’s observations has as its source the conviction that humanized nature—as a result of wars, cultural changes, and changes in customs—has strayed far from its original state. His La Terre Bernoise (1954), written in French, is an attempt to transpose Virgil’s Bucolics and Georgics into the form of an essay. “In Europe,” Stempowski writes in the book’s introduction, “nature in its pure state exists only in high mountains, among the rocks and snow. Below, the surface of earth was reshaped many times by man’s hand in accordance with his tastes and needs. In this way landscape becomes part of civilization. The economic structure, ideas, as well as the history of society find their reflection in it.”

Along with Bolesław Miciński, Stempowski was one of the first writers to introduce the essay into Poland; scarcely an essayist in Poland has not been influenced by him. Among those who influenced Stempowski himself were Marcel Proust and Simone Weil, as well as writers like Tacitus, who tried to combine a succinctness of form with a precision of thought without, however, breaking the connection with the experiences of past generations. Stempowski was primarily interested in demonstrating that the experiences of the past were not in vain, and that cultural continuity should be preserved—even at the expense of originality.

KRZYSZTOF KOZŁOWSKI
translated by Zbigniew Janowski

Biography

Born 10 December 1893 in Cracow. Studied philosophy at Jagiellonian University, Cracow, 1911; medicine in Munich, 1912, and Zurich, 1915; philosophy, 1915, and history and literature, 1916, University of Berne. Contributor to various periodicals, particularly the Paris-based Polish émigré magazine Kultura, from 1918, and the London émigré weekly Wiadomości Literackie (Literary news), from 1929; correspondent for the Polish press in Paris, Geneva, and Berlin following World War I. Diplomatic courier, Ministry of Foreign Affairs, 1919; volunteer in the Polish-Bolshevik war, 1920; worked for the Polish Chamber of Council, 1926. Taught at the National Institute of Theater Art, Warsaw, 1935–39. Left Poland for Switzerland, 1939; lived in Berne, 1940–69. Published Notatnik niespiesznego przechodnia (Notes of a leisurely passerby), a series of essays in Kultura, from 1954. Used the pseudonym Pawet Hostowiec. Died in Berne, 4 October 1969.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Pielgrzym, 1924

Pan Jowialski i jego spadkobiercy, 1931

Dziennik podróży do Austrii i Niemiec, 1946

La Terre Bernoise, 1954

Eseje dla Kassandry, 1961; “Essay for Cassandra” and “The Smugglers’ Library” translated by Jaroslaw Anders, in Four Decades of Polish Essays, edited by Jan Kott, 1990

Od Berdyczowa do Rzymu, 1971

Listy z ziemi bernenskiej, 1974

Eseje, edited by Wojciech Karpiński, 1984

Szkice Literackie, vol. 1: Chimera jako zwierzę pociągowe; vol. 2: Klimat życia i klimat literatury, edited by Jerzy Timoszewicz, 1988

Listy do Jerzego Giedroycia, edited by Andrzej Stanisław Kowalczyk, 1991

W dolinie Dniestrzu i inne eseje ukraińskie; Listy o Ukrainie, edited by Andrzej Stanisław Kowalczyk, 1993

Other writings: memoirs.

Further Reading

Czapski, J., “Przy Sybillach-królowych,” Kultura 11 (1961)

Czapski, J., “Jerzy Stempowski,” Kultura 12 (1969)

Herling-Grudziński, Gustaw, “Wyjście z milczenia,” Kultura 11 (1961)

Jeleński, K.A., “Paweł Hostowiec czyli o wysiłku wyobraźni,” Kultura 11 (1961)

Kowalczyk, A.S., “Podróż do Europy: Dzienniki Jerzego Stempowskiego,” Znak 11–12 (1986)

- Kowalczyk, A.S., "Wobec kryzysu Europy: Powojenna eseistyka Jerzego Stempowskiego," Pamiętnik Literacki 2 (1987)
- Miciński, Bolesław, Pisma: Eseje, artykuły, listy, edited by Anna Micińska, Cracow: Znak, 1970
- Miłosz, Czesław, "Proza," Kultura 11 (1961)
- Stempowski, Stanisław, Pamiętniki, 1870–1914, Wrocław: Wydawnictwo Polskiej Akademii Nauk, 1953
- Terlecki, Tymon, "Pan Jerzy," Kultura 12 (1969)
- Terlecki, Tymon, Rzeczy teatralne, Warsaw: Państwowe Wydawnictwo Naukowe, 1984
- Timoszewicz, Jerzy, "Wstęp do 'teatru masowej konsumpcji' Stempowskiego," Dialog 9 (1981)
- Timoszewicz, Jerzy, "'Pamiętnik Teatralny'...jest w czasach Piasta i Rzepichy": Teatr w listach Jerzego Stempowskiego, Wrocław, 1989
- Tomkowski, Jan, Jerzy Stempowski, Warsaw: Interim, 1991
- Weintraub, W., "Klasyk polskiej eseistyki," Tygodnik Powszechny 33 (1984)
- Wyka, M., "Esej jako autobiografia: O Jerzym Stempowskim," Pismo 4 (1983)
- Zieliński, J., "Tragik w czapeczce," Odra 7–8 (1985)

Stephen, Leslie

British, 1832–1904

Leslie Stephen may be unique in having been represented in two important fictional works—Meredith's The Egoist (1879), in which he appears as the walker and rationalist Vernon Whitford, and his daughter Virginia Woolf's To the Lighthouse (1927), where he is the patriarchal philosopher, Mr. Ramsay. (He is also celebrated in a memorial sonnet by his friend Thomas Hardy.) These two accounts take us toward the man of Victorian rectitude and energy, whose views can seem advanced in 1879 and antiquated in 1927. Reading Stephen's numerous essays today we can find good grounds for both judgments.

Stephen's mental horizons were formed by his reading in philosophy, mostly in the 18th-century tradition that culminated in utilitarianism and the thought of John Stuart Mill. This, allied with Darwinism, destroyed the muscular Evangelical Christianity which had enabled Stephen to take orders and become a Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, where he had established close bonds with his students by encouraging athletic activities, especially rowing and walking. When, having resigned his Fellowship, he moved to London in 1864 with the aim of making a living by writing, he first edited the Alpine Journal. His first book of essays, The Playground of Europe (1871), consists of accounts of Alpine ascents.

The kind of play represented by walking and climbing was a serious matter (well discussed in Anne D. Wallace's Walking, Literature, and English Culture, 1993). In a later essay, "In Praise of Walking" (1902.), Stephen links walking to thinking: "The true walker is one...to whom the muscular effort of the legs is subsidiary to the 'cerebration' stimulated by the effort; to the quiet musings and imaginings which arrive most spontaneously as he walks, and generate the intellectual harmony which is the natural accompaniment to the monotonous tramps of his feet.” This is a typical Stephen sentence: ponderous, thoughtful, grounded in experience—its rhythm that which Virginia Woolf famously ascribed to “the masculine sentence” in A Room of One’s Own (1929). Stephen certainly sought “intellectual harmony,” and found it in the British philosophical tradition of empiricism already mentioned, to which his major books are devoted.

His essays deal with similar subject matter, from Essays on Freethinking and Plainspeaking (1873) onward. The very title invokes a characteristic attitude, that of a man—one of his favorite adjectives is “manly”—who knows his own mind and will let us know too. He was an important contributor to the free-thought movement of the late 19th century. “Poisonous Opinions” from An Agnostic’s Apology (1893) puts the matter succinctly, within its historical view of the development of religion—“A vigorous religion is a superstition which has enslaved a philosophy” (Stephen is capable of the memorable aphorism)—and its distant hope for a condition in which “philosophy might be the ally instead of the slave of religion.” Meanwhile, however, in Christian England, it was to secular philosophy that Stephen gave his forceful allegiance. His many lectures to London ethical societies are collected in the two volumes of Social Rights and Duties (1896).

However, Stephen was not a philosopher, but rather what we would now call a historian of ideas, of a moralizing kind characteristic of his age. He read widely in English literature, and more of his essays concern imaginative writers than philosophers proper. What Stephen is always interested in is lines of thought, especially relating to ethics. The several volumes of Hours in a Library (1874–79) and Studies of a Biographer (1898–1902) display his range, going back to John Donne and Sir Thomas Browne but focusing most often on the 18th and early 19th centuries, and typically concerned with “Carlyle’s Ethics” in the former and “Pope as a Moralist” and “Wordsworth’s Ethics” in the latter. On all occasions Stephen attempts to be fair-minded, setting each writer’s work in a historical context, carefully surveying it, and trying accurately to portray its particular qualities to see how valuable these might be to a reader looking for sources of enlightenment and moral guidance. He makes no distinction between a writer and his (or occasionally her) work. He is never flippant, seldom amusing, but always sensible. His strength and limitations are well suggested by the terms of his praise of Joseph Butler: “an honest and brave man—honest enough to admit the existence of doubts, and brave enough not to be paralysed by their existence.” Honesty and courage are Stephen’s admirable but inflexible moral and intellectual ideals. This cast of mind served him well in his numerous contributions (378 in all, amounting to some thousand pages) to the Dictionary of National Biography, of which he was the first editor; in these he developed the capacity to provide summarizing accounts of his chosen subjects, relating personality to achievement with consistent clarity and confident authority.

To set Stephen’s essays by the side of his daughter’s, with their engaging vivacity and flexibility, is an illuminating way of approaching the relationship of Victorianism to Modernism.

PETER FAULKNER

Biography

Born 28 November 1831 in London. Studied at Eton College, Berkshire; private tutors, from 1848; King's College, London; Trinity College, Cambridge, 1851–54, B.A., 1854. Fellow, Trinity College, 1854–64. Visited the United States, 1863, meeting and becoming friends with James Russell Lowell and Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr.; visited again in 1868 and 1890. Moved to London, 1864. Married Minny Thackeray, 1867 (died, 1875): one daughter. Editor, Alpine Journal, 1868–72, and Cornhill Magazine, 1871–82; contributor to many journals and periodicals, including the Saturday Review, Pall Mall Gazette, Nation (New York), Fraser's Magazine, and Fortnightly Review. Married Julia Duckworth, 1878 (died, 1895): two daughters, including the writer Virginia Woolf and the artist Vanessa Bell, two sons, and three stepchildren. Editor (and contributor of 378 entries), Dictionary of National Biography, 1882–90: toward the end of the project suffered from nervous exhaustion. President, London Library, 1892. Elected member, British Academy, 1902. Knighted, 1902. Awards: honorary degrees from four universities. Died in London, 22 February 1904.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Sketches from Cambridge, by a Don, 1865

The Playground of Europe (Alpine essays), 1871; revised edition, 1894; edited by H.E.G.Tyndale, 1936

Essays on Freethinking and Plainspeaking, 1873

Hours in a Library, 3 vols., 1874–79; enlarged edition, 3 vols., 1892

An Agnostic's Apology, and Other Essays, 1893

Social Rights and Duties (lectures), 2 vols., 1896

Studies of a Biographer, 4 vols., 1898–1902

Men, Books and Mountains: Essays, edited by S.O.A.Ullmann, 1956

Selected Writings in British Intellectual History: Leslie Stephen, edited by Noël Annan, 1979

Other writings: History of English Thought in the Eighteenth Century (1876), biographies of British literary figures and other works on literature, and memoirs.

Bibliography

Fenwick, Gillian, Leslie Stephen's Life in Letters: A Bibliographical Study, Aldershot: Scolar Press, and Brookfield, Vermont: Ashgate, 1993

Further Reading

Annan, Noël, Leslie Stephen: His Thought and Character in Relation to His Time,

- London: MacGibbon and Kee, 1951; revised edition, as Leslie Stephen: The Godless Victorian, London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, and New York: Random House, 1984
- Bicknell, John W., "Leslie Stephen," in Victorian Prose Writers After 1867, edited by William B. Thesing, Dictionary of Literary Biography, vol. 57, Detroit: Gale Research, 1987
- Grosskurth, Phyllis, Leslie Stephen, London: Longman Green, 1968
- Hyman, Virginia, "Late Victorian and Early Modern: Continuities in the Criticism of Leslie Stephen and Virginia Woolf," English Literature in Transition 23, no. 3 (1980): 144–54
- Leavis, Q.D., "Leslie Stephen: Cambridge Critic," in A Selection from "Scrutiny", vol. 1, edited by F.R. Leavis, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1968:22–31
- Maitland, Frederick William, The Life and Letters of Leslie Stephen, Bristol: Thoemmes, 1991 (original edition, 1906)
- Maurer, Oscar, Jr., "Leslie Stephen and the Cornhill Magazine," University of Texas Studies in English 32 (1953):67–95
- Orel, Harold, "Leslie Stephen," in Victorian Literary Critics, London: Macmillan, 1984
- Schmidt, Barbara Ann, "In the Shadow of Thackeray: Leslie Stephen as the Editor of the Cornhill Magazine," in Innovators and Preachers: The Role of the Editor in Victorian England, edited by Joel Wiener, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1985: 77–96
- Zink, David, Leslie Stephen, New York: Twayne, 1972

Stevenson, Robert Louis

British, 1850–1894

During his 20 years as a writer Robert Louis Stevenson turned his hand to nearly every possible genre: novel, short story, drama, poems for children and adults, history, biography and essays. Fiction and essays form the bulk of his work, and they are almost evenly balanced. Furthermore, Stevenson's essays and fiction share each other's conspicuous characteristics. The essays are filled with narrative and with fictive images of military action and adventure; the stories are marked by passages of sententious meditation.

Essays came first, with Stevenson using the form as a self-imposed apprenticeship in which he taught himself to write "as men learn to whittle" ("A College Magazine," 1887), deliberately modeling his own structure and style on essayists of the past such as Lamb and Hazlitt. Stevenson's first three collections were travel books, an especially attractive form for the beginning writer, since travel provides a ready-made structure, while leaving many opportunities for digression. These essays are gracefully written and sound much alike, the work of a writer learning how to say things without yet having much to say. Stevenson's main task in these early essays was to invent his own character, which he presents as a sympathetic, mildly bohemian onlooker who invites but resists involvement in the affairs that he observes.

After these travel books, Stevenson published three collections of mixed essays during the next decade: Virginibus Puerisque (1881), Familiar Studies of Men and Books (1882), and Memories and Portraits (1887). Several essays in Virginibus Puerisque, written while Stevenson was in his twenties, purvey solemn nonsense about marriage and old age. But in others written at the same time, notably “AEs Triplex” (first pub. 1878), he is both graceful and convincing on the need to face life with courage. His own ill health, which had already brought him to the brink of death several times, enabled him to write with real power on a subject that could easily become trite and sentimental. “Walking Tours” (first pub. 1876) generalizes the themes of the earlier travel books and helped to establish a new cultural role, that of the young man tramping the roads of Europe by himself—but never too far from a friendly inn—meditating as he goes on life and the surrounding scenery. “Walking Tours” is the precursor of the many essays and poems written on this subject by a host of British and American authors from the 1880s to World War I.

The essays in Familiar Studies and Memories and Portraits coincide with Stevenson’s development as a writer of fiction. In addition to the shared characteristics mentioned above, some of these essays also create characters who prefigure types that Stevenson would explore more fully in his stories. The two essays on Robert Burns and François Villon (both in Familiar Studies) are excellent examples. Stevenson castigates Burns as a drunkard and womanizer, but at the same time he sees him as a tragic figure, constantly striving to act responsibly even though he was beaten down by overwhelming flaws. He is like the reluctant wrongdoers of “Markheim” and Kidnapped (1886), perhaps even a bit like Dr. Jekyll. Villon fascinated Stevenson as a charming but utterly ruthless villain. He later published two short stories in which Villon figures as a character, but one can also see in Stevenson’s version of Villon preliminary sketches of Long John Silver and the Master of Ballantrae.

Even more interesting cross-connections between Stevenson as an essayist and as a writer of fiction are to be found in “A Gossip on Romance” (1882) and “A Humble Remonstrance” (1884), both in Memories and Portraits. Most critical writing about Victorian fiction concentrates upon the Jamesian view that fiction is a kind of history, that its important dimension is the temporal, and that its value depends upon the intensity of the author’s impressions of life. Stevenson insists that fiction imitates speech, not life, and that romances differ from novels because they depend upon place and incident. Their important dimension is the spatial. “A Humble Remonstrance” was actually addressed to Henry James himself, but despite this disagreement—or even because of it—the two writers became close personal friends.

Many other essays in these books as well as in Across the Plains (1892.) are almost secular sermons. They express a moral code that might be described as “quixotic stoicism,” emphasizing scrupulous honesty (especially in money matters), endurance of misfortune without complaint, but also grand, heroic gestures in the face of fate.

Stevenson’s essays are written in highly wrought prose marked by a precise, even precious vocabulary and carefully controlled cadences. Sometimes, it must be admitted, he strikes attitudes. It is important to recognize that for Stevenson style—even flamboyant style—was a moral quality. Partly this is a matter of financial probity, insuring that the author gives honest value for money received. But there is also in his writing a firm belief that grand, heroic gestures can be performed in words as well as in deeds.

In 1888 Stevenson began several years of travel in the South Pacific, where he lived for the last six years of his life. In the South Seas (1896), the last of his travel books, was originally a series of newsletters recounting his voyages. In early books Stevenson had often given the impression of provoking whimsical incidents so as to have something to write about. Here there was no need to do so: exotic sights and bizarre events surrounded him. In these essays, however, Stevenson resisted all temptations to florid or precious writing. The style is lean and muscular throughout—the same style Stevenson was developing for his last novels, The Ebb-Tide (1894) and Weir of Hermiston (1896).

Special mention must be made of “Father Damien: An Open Letter to the Reverend Dr. Hyde of Honolulu,” published in 1890. The previous year Stevenson had visited the leper colony founded by Father Damien, a Belgian missionary in Hawaii, and had been greatly moved by the heroism of Damien and his followers. A year later Stevenson chanced to read a letter in a religious newspaper brutally criticizing the late Father Damien. Immediately he leaped to Damien’s defense in a letter which is a masterpiece of warm-hearted but cool-headed invective. For once Stevenson had found a topic that required the highest pitch of his rhetorical skills. Indeed, he later wondered if he had been too harsh, but fortunately he never revised this open letter; it remains one of the most effective diatribes in English literature.

During the 20 years after his death in 1894, Stevenson’s reputation as an essayist was caught up in the vogue for sentimental whimsy that marked British and American literary taste at the turn of the century. In the 1920s and 1930s taste changed; Stevenson suffered from the reaction against sentimentality, and his reputation plunged. However, later generations have reconsidered Stevenson’s writing, and it is now possible to see his essays as the work of a professional craftsman who could rise above his own desire to be charming. At their best, the essays manifest the twin virtues of beautiful prose and a generous heart.

PETER HINCHCLIFFE

Biography

Robert Louis Balfour Stevenson. Born 13 November 1850 in Edinburgh. In bad health throughout his life, particularly with hemorrhaging lungs and possibly tuberculosis. Studied at the University of Edinburgh, 1867–72; studied law in the office of Skene Edwards and Gordon, Edinburgh: admitted to the Scottish bar, 1875. Lived mainly in France, 1875–79, the United States, 1879–80 and 1887–88, Scotland, 1881–82, various places in Britain, France, and Switzerland, 1882–84, and Bournemouth, 1884–87. Contributor, Cornhill Magazine, London, 1876–82. Married Fanny Osbourne, 1880: two stepchildren. Sailed to the South Pacific islands, 1888; settled at Vailima, Samoa, 1890. Died (of a stroke) at Vailima, 3 December 1894.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

- An Inland Voyage*, 1878; edited by Wilbur L. Cross, with Travels with a Donkey, 1924, and Trevor Royle (with The Silverado Squatters), 1984
Edinburgh: Picturesque Notes, 1879
Travels with a Donkey in the Cévennes, 1879; edited by Wilbur L. Cross, with An Inland Voyage, 1924, and Trevor Royle (with The Silverado Squatters), 1984
Virginibus Puerisque and Other Papers, 1881
Familiar Studies of Men and Books, 1882
The Silverado Squatters: Sketches from a Californian Mountain, 1883; edited by Trevor Royle, with An Inland Voyage and Travels with a Donkey, 1984
Memories and Portraits, 1887
Across the Plains, with Other Memories and Essays, edited by Sidney Colvin, 1892
The Amateur Emigrant from the Clyde to Sandy Hook, 1895
In the South Seas, 1896
Essays and Criticism, 1903
Essays of Travel, 1905
Essays in the Art of Writing, 1905
The Pentland Essays (selections), 1913
Selected Essays, edited by H.G.Rawlinson, 1923
Essays, edited by Malcolm Elwin, 1950
The Mind of Robert Louis Stevenson: Selected Essays, Letters, and Prayers edited by Roger Ricklefs, 1963
From Scotland to Silverado; Comprising The Amateur Emigrant, The Silverado Squatters and Four Essays on California, edited by James D.Hart, 1966
The Lantern Bearers and Other Essays, edited by Jeremy Treglown, 1988
The Scottish Stories and Essays, edited by Kenneth Gelder, 1989
Travels with a Donkey in the Cévennes, and Selected Travel Writings, edited by Emma Letley, 1992

Other writings: many short stories and novels (including Treasure Island, 1883; The Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, 1886; Kidnapped 1886), plays, poetry (including A Child's Garden of Verses, 1885), books on history and travel, and correspondence (collected in Letters, edited by Bradford A.Booth and Ernest Mehew, 1994–[in progress]).

Collected works editions: The Works (Edinburgh Edition), edited by Sidney Colvin, 28 vols., 1894–98; Vailima Edition, edited by Lloyd Osbourne and Fanny van de Grift Stevenson, 26 vols., 1922–23; Tusitala Edition, 35 vols., 1924; South Seas Edition, 32 vols., 1925.

Bibliographies

Bethke, Frederick J., Three Victorian Travel Writers: An Annotated Bibliography of Criticism on Mrs. Frances Milton Trollope, Samuel Butler, and Robert Louis Stevenson, Boston: Hall, 1977

- McKay, George L., The Stevenson Library: Catalogue of a Collection of Writings by and About Robert Louis Stevenson, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 6 vols., 1951–64
- Prideaux, W.F., A Bibliography of the Works of Robert Louis Stevenson, revised by F.V.Livingston, London: Hollings, 1918
- Swearingen, Roger G., The Prose Writings of Robert Louis Stevenson: A Guide, London: Macmillan, and Hamden, Connecticut: Archon, 1980

Further Reading

- Aldington, Richard, Portrait of a Rebel: The Life and Work of Robert Louis Stevenson, London: Evans, 1957
- Balfour, Graham, The Life of Robert Louis Stevenson, London: Methuen, and New York: Scribner, 2 vols., 1901
- Bell, Ian, Robert Louis Stevenson: Dreams of Exile, London: Headline, 1993
- Calder, Jenni, R.L.S.: A Life Study, London: Hamilton, 1980
- Calder, Jenni, editor, The Robert Louis Stevenson Companion, Edinburgh: Harris, 1980
- Calder, Jenni, editor, Stevenson and Victorian Scotland, Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1981
- Chesterton, G.K., Robert Louis Stevenson, London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1927; New York: Dodd Mead, 1928
- Daiches, David, Robert Louis Stevenson, Norfolk, Connecticut: New Directions, 1947
- Eigner, Edwin M., Robert Louis Stevenson and Romantic Tradition, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1966
- Furnas, J.C., Voyage to Windward: The Life of Stevenson, New York: Sloane, 1951; London: Faber, 1952
- Greene, Graham, "From Feathers to Iron," in his The Lost Childhood and Other Essays, London: Eyre and Spottiswoode, 1951; New York: Viking, 1952
- Hammond, J.R., A Robert Louis Stevenson Cotnpanion: A Guide to the Novels, Essays and Short Stories, London: Macmillan, 1984
- McLynn, Frank, Robert Louis Stevenson, London: Hutchinson, 1993
- Maixner, Paul, editor, Robert Louis Stevenson: The Critical Heritage, London and Boston: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1981
- Noble, Andrew, editor, Robert Louis Stevenson, London: Vision, and Totowa, New Jersey: Barnes and Noble, 1983
- Rankin, Nicholas, Dead Man's Chest: Travels After Robert Louis Stevenson, London: Faber, 1987
- Riedel, F.C., "A Classical Rhetorical Analysis of Some Elements of Stevenson's Essay Style," Style 3 (1968):182–99
- Smith, Janet Adam, editor, Henry James and Robert Louis Stevenson: A Record of Friendship and Criticism, London: Hart Davis, 1948; Westport, Connecticut: Hyperion Press, 1979
- Swinnerton, Frank, R.L. Stevenson: A Critical Study, London: Secker and Warburg, 1914; New York: Kennerley, 1915

Strachey, Lytton

British, 1880–1932.

A prolific essayist, Lytton Strachey first gained widespread fame and notoriety as the iconoclastic author of Eminent Victorians (1918), four miniature biographies of Cardinal Manning, Florence Nightingale, Thomas Arnold, and General Charles Gordon. Previously portrayed in the standard “two fat volumes” of Victorian biography which Strachey abhorred as inartistic and disorganized hagiographies at best, these four icons of the Catholic Church, medical humanitarianism, educational and moral reform, and military adventure respectively were brilliantly and wittily exposed by Strachey as all too human, obsessive, and dysfunctional, the wonder lying not in their perfection but in the fact that, given their imperfections, they had affected their era so markedly and achieved so much.

Strachey’s contemporary audience, for the most part, was ready to relish a work that, in the words of Richard Altick (1995), “turned an entire past society into a laughing stock.” Disillusioned by the horrors of World War I, profoundly mistrustful of the establishment, and desperately seeking some psychologically understandable rationale for recent events, many of Strachey’s readers welcomed the opportunity these essays offered to reject and ridicule the late Victorian institutions that could be viewed as leading to the war to which Strachey was a conscientious objector. Although works by such earlier writers as George Bernard Shaw, H.G.Wells, G.K. Chesterton, and Max Beerbohm had already presented critical views of the Victorians, Strachey’s detractors tend to blame his work for spawning scores of later “popularized” or “jazzage biographies,” those overfictionalized and underresearched essays and book-length lives written by hacks, would-be wits, and professional de-bunkers. Such imitators damaged his reputation and fostered an image still current in some minds today of Strachey as a careless and superficial cynic.

Even most of Strachey’s detractors, however, agree that his essays are eminently readable, while one of his latest and most able defenders, Barry Spurr (1995), points out that relatively recent scholarly treatments of Strachey’s subjects tend intentionally or not to endorse Strachey’s conclusions and to confirm the breadth and depth of his knowledge—for example, in Strachey’s treatment of Cardinal Manning and John Henry Newman in Eminent Victorians. Moreover, Strachey’s paradoxical and arresting pronouncements such as that near the opening of the preface to Eminent Victorians—“ignorance is the first requisite of the historian”—may well imply an ironic and sophisticated consciousness of the psychological complexities of his subjects, of the ambiguities and inadequacies of language and reason, and of the impossibility, in many instances, of attaining an absolute or finite conception of truth. Certainly these three concerns remain central for writers and scholars today. While Strachey stressed the importance of stringent selectivity and brevity in his biographical and historical essays, these ideals are certainly not those currently in vogue for scholarly biographers, as Michael Holroyd's excellent two-volume biography (1967–68) of Strachey himself demonstrates. But Strachey's emphasis on careful scholarship, discriminating treatment and organization, and an elegant, engaging style are still the hallmarks of the best modern biographies.

A leading figure of the Cambridge Apostles and subsequently of the Bloomsbury Group, Strachey also demonstrated his exceptional skills as a literary critic and prose stylist in the host of essays and reviews he contributed during his early career to the Spectator, the Independent Review, New Quarterly, Athenaeum, and the Edinburgh Review as well as in his first book, Landmarks in French Literature (1912). Here Strachey's high estimation of such writers as Pope, Gibbon, Voltaire, and Racine is clear. Thus the early key influences on his prose are Augustan and Victorian. His voice conveys the polished aristocratic authority of an elite; but his perspective is that of the homosexual, oppressed and suppressed, by turns indirect, hostile, melancholic, and often ironic. Strachey evolves an idiom that Spurr dubs "Camp Mandarin"—a witty parody of an elite mode, used to undermine the conventional views of the mandarins through incongruity and exaggeration. He uses a variety of rhetorical techniques, such as alliteration, triplets, Latinate vocabulary, and biblical allusion, in this way: Florence Nightingale "seems hardly to distinguish between the Deity and the Drains" (Eminent Victorians); the "holiness of the Middle Ages embodied itself in prayer, asceticism, and dirt" ("Lady Mary Wortley Montagu," 1907); Dr. North is described as "meticulous in the true sense of the word" ("The Life, Illness and Death of Dr. North," 1927); Carlyle as prophet cannot rival the reputation of Isaiah and Jeremiah who, unlike Carlyle, "have had the extraordinary good fortune to be translated into English by a committee of Elizabethan bishops" ("Carlyle," 1928).

Later longer works by Strachey like Queen Victoria (1921) and Elizabeth and Essex (1928) continue to demonstrate the vivid novelistic qualities and psychological interest in character of his earlier essays, but some of his best work is in his collections of critical essays, many of which are characterized by the quality and artistry that Strachey, a pleasing and anxious being himself, recognized and so admired in John Aubrey's Brief Lives (1669–96): "the pure essentials—a vivid image, on a page or two, without explanations, transitions, commentaries, or padding. This is what Aubrey gives us; this, and one thing more—a sense of the pleasing, anxious being who, with his odd old alchemy, has transmuted a few handfuls of orts and relics into golden life" ("John Aubrey," Portraits in Miniature, 1931).

ANNE SKABARNICKI

Biography

Born 1 March 1880 in Clapham, south London. Studied at Abbotsholm School, Derbyshire, 1893; Leamington College, until 1897; Liverpool University College, 1897–99; Trinity College, Cambridge, 1899–1903, B.A. in history, 1903. Met Thoby Stephen, Clive Bell, and Leonard Woolf at Cambridge, the latter two becoming, with Strachey, part of the Bloomsbury Group, along with Virginia Woolf, E.M.Forster, painters Vanessa Bell and Duncan Grant, economist John Maynard Keynes, art critic Roger Fry, and others. Conscientious objector during World War I. Met the painter Dora Carrington, 1915: lived with her on and off in a mainly platonic relationship in Tidmarsh, Berkshire, from 1917, and at Ham Spray house, Berkshire, from 1924; they were joined by Ralph Partridge, who married Carrington, 1919. Died (of cancer of the stomach) at Ham Spray house, 21 January 1932.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Eminent Victorians, 1918

Books and Characters: French and English, 1922.

Pope: The Leslie Stephen Lecture for 1925, 1925

Portraits in Miniature and Other Essays, 1931

Characters and Commentaries, 1933

Literary Essays (part of the Uniform Edition of works), 1943

Biographical Essays (part of the Uniform Edition of works), 1943

Spectatorial Essays, 1964

The Really Interesting Question and Other Papers, edited by Paul Levy, 1972

The Shorter Strachey, edited by Michael Holroyd, 1980

Other writings: Landmarks in French Literature (1912.), a biography of Queen Victoria (1921), a study of Queen Elizabeth I and the Earl of Essex (1928), a play, and a collection of poetry.

Collected works edition: Uniform Edition, 6 vols., 1949.

Bibliography

Edmonds, Michael, Lytton Strachey: A Bibliography, New York: Garland, 1981

Further Reading

Altick, Richard, "Eminent Victorianism," American Scholar 64 (Winter 1995):81–89

Beerbohm, Max, Lytton Strachey, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, and New York: Knopf, 1943

Ferns, John, Lytton Strachey, Boston: Twayne, 1988

Holroyd, Michael, Lytton Strachey: A Critical Biography, London: Heinemann, 2 vols., 1967–68; New York: Holt Rinehart, 1968; revised edition, as Lytton Strachey: A Biography, London: Penguin, 1971

Holroyd, Michael, Lytton Strachey: The New Biography, London: Chatto and Windus, 1994; New York: Farrar Straus Giroux, 1995

Kallich, Martin, The Psychological Milieu of Lytton Strachey, New York: Bookman Associates, 1961

Merle, Gabriel, Lytton Strachey (1880–1932): Biographie et critique d'un critique et biographe, Paris: Champion, 2 vols., 1980

Sanders, C.R., Lytton Strachey: His Mind and Art, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale

University Press, 1957

Scott-James, R.A., Lytton Strachey, London: Longman, 1955

Spurr, Barry, A Literary-Critical Analysis of the Complete Prose Works of Lytton Strachey (1880–1932): A Re-Assessment of His Achievement and Career, Lewiston, New York, and Lampeter, Dyfed: Mellen Press, 1995

Srinivasa Iyengar, K.R., Lytton Strachey: A Critical Study, London: Chatto and Windus, 1939

Yu, Margaret M.S., Two Masters of Irony: Annotations on Three Essays by Oscar Wilde and Lytton Strachey, Folcroft, Pennsylvania: Folcroft, 1974 (original edition, 1957)

Su Shi

Chinese, 1037–1101

Su Shi continued the efforts of his patron, Ouyang Xiu, in advocating guwen (ancient prose) in the Song era (960–1279). His own practice of guwen essay writing made him the leading stylist of his time. He was thus perceived by later generations as one of the eight guwen masters of the Tang and Song periods, along with Han Yu, Liu Zongyuan, Ouyang Xiu, his father Su Xun, brother Su Zhe, and two other Song essayists Wang Anshi and Zeng Gong.

Like Han Yu and Ouyang Xiu, Su Shi emphasized the connection between literature and the Tao. Unlike them, however, Su Shi's understanding of the Tao turned away from his predecessors' focus on the Confucian Tao and more or less followed the tradition that Tao is what things rely upon to be themselves, and myriad patterns are attested to (Guo Shaoyu, 1957). As Peter Bol (1992.) points out, "The first line of the Tao te ching, 'the tao that can be spoken of is not the constant tao,' seems to be in the back of Su's mind throughout, although he never cites it." For Su Shi, the Tao encompasses many things, including both historical categories of human affairs and objects perceived by human beings, and can be "brought on" only through close studies of them ("Ri yu" [On finding an analogy for the sun]). Literature, then, provided the best way to transport the Tao to other people by making things "comprehensible" in words, which can discriminate shapes, colors, tastes, sounds, and movements. By doing so, literature introduces particular cases of human practice for the reader to intuit—rather than define—the meaning, or the Tao, embodied in everything. Understandably, the literati should strive to acquire knowledge and polish their literary and artistic skills in order to grasp the subtleties of things as if "binding the wind and catching the shadow" ("Yu Xie Minshi tuiguan shu" [Letter to Judge Xie Minshi]).

Su himself provides the best example in using literature and art to reflect the fundamental principles underlying the phenomenal world. As a result, his accomplishments mark the peak of almost every field of Song intellectual life: Confucian, Taoist, and Buddhist scholarship, poetry, calligraphy, painting, and essay writing. The huge body of his essays—over 3000 pieces—covers every possible subgenre, varying from political disquisitions to historical comments, literary and art reviews, philosophical essays, travelogues, biographies, epitaphs, character sketches, botanical and zoological articles, medical and pharmacological notes, and even cookery entries. Taken together they reflect Su's effort to understand the world by various means and his eagerness to share his findings with his audience.

Two important features characterize Su Shi's style. First, a philosophical touch often flavors his essays, resulting from his tireless pursuit of the Tao. He even ushers reasoning into his travelogues, generally a descriptive and sentimental genre, to abstract epistemological or moral truth from his observation of natural scenery. For instance, "Shizhong shan ji" ("Stone Bells Mountain") recounts a moonlit boat outing he conducted in order to find out the origin of the name "Stone Bells." The account of the search is accompanied by a vivid description of various sounds echoing among the grotesquely shaped rocks. This surreal presentation of an audiovisual symphony finally leads to a rational conclusion—the importance of achieving knowledge through investigation and sharing that knowledge accurately.

Secondly, Su's essays contain such unrestrained vitality that they burst any conscious boundaries and flow along their own natural tracks. As he himself puts it: "My writing is like ten thousand barrels of spring water, gushing from the ground, choosing no specific outlet. On level ground, it floods and covers thousands of miles in a day without the least effort. Turning and twisting with the mountains and rocks, it takes its forms from whatever it encounters, unpredictably. All that can be foretold is that it always goes where it should go, and it always stops where it cannot but stop" ("Zi ping wen" [Criticism of my own essays]). This tendency, again, comes from his understanding of literature's function of communicating the Tao. Since each thing in the world follows its own course, literature should not yield to any single rule, but instead conform to what it is intended to reflect, just as water "takes its forms from whatever it encounters."

Su Shi's sincerity toward the truth in life and the world, however, set him at odds with contemporary trends, whether political or scholastic. Although he attained his jinshi degree—the highest in the civil service examination system—at the age of 20 and thus gained the attention of the emperor, he never really remained within the center of political power. All his life he was in continual exile and demotion, often through accusations fabricated by his enemies upon intentional misreading of his literary works. Despite these dismal experiences, Su manifested "a transcendental outlook that rose above momentary human sorrow" (Chang Kang-i Sun, in The Indiana Companion to Traditional Chinese Literature, 1986), best expressed in his two-rhyme prose (fu) entitled "Chibi fu" ("The Red Cliff"). Linking the vicissitudes of human life and history with the natural rhythms of change—the progression of the seasons, the waxing and waning of the moon, the flowing of the water—as illustriously described in these two masterpieces, Su Shi merged transient human life with the perpetual process of nature. Thus he transcended mundane trivialities and found serenity in dissolving himself into nature's fluid eternity.

Among a great range of previous writers who had influenced him, Su Shi drew the most inspiration from the Taoist philosopher Zhuang Zi (c. 369–c. 286 BCE). In addition to his assimilation of Zhuang Zi's philosophical axioms, Su Shi also emulated his great capability of accurately expressing his meanings with words. As his brother Su Zhe recollected: "...then he [Su Shi] read the Zhuang Zi. He said with a sigh, 'Previously, when I perceived something of what was within me, my mouth was unable to put it into words. Now I have seen the Zhuang Zi and grasped my own mind” (“Wangxiong Zizhan duanming muzhi ming” [Epitaph for my late elder brother Zizhan]; Bol).

Already a model essayist for his contemporaries during his lifetime, Su Shi’s influence grew even stronger after his death. His style directly affected the civil service examination system in the Southern Song period (1127–1279). A common saying of the time proclaimed that “If one is familiar with Su Shi’s essays, he will eat mutton (he will be able to pass the civil examinations and will thereupon live a wealthy life); if not, he can only eat vegetable soup (he will not be able to pass the civil examinations and hence will live poorly)” (Cheng and Wu, 1991). His reputation reached its zenith in the Ming period (1368–1644), when the Tang-Song School essayists canonized his works and Ming literati in general regarded him as the most celebrated of all men of letters. The wealth of folktales and jokes he had incorporated in his own essays also found their way to the public. His fascinating personality, his great achievements in art and literature, and his benevolent governing made him a legendary hero in popular culture, which in turn increased his literary glamor. Su Shi has attracted one of the largest audiences in Chinese literary history.

NANXIU QIAN

Biography

Courtesy name Su Zizhan; studio name Su Dongpo. Born 8 January 1037 in Meishan, Sichuan province. Married Wang Fu, 1054 (died, 1065). Passed jinshi (civil service) exams, 1057, and decree exams, 1061. Notary, Fenxiang, 1062–64. Married Wang Runzhi, 1068 (died, 1093). Vice prefect, Hangzhou, 1071–73, and prefect, Mizhou, 1074–76, and Xuzhou, 1077–79. Arrested for slandering the emperor and court, 1079, and exiled to Huangzhou, 1080–84; prefect, Dengzhou, 1085; Hanglin academician, 1086–88 and 1091; prefect, Hangzhou, 1089–90, Yingzhou and Yangzhou, 1091–92, and Dengzhou, 1093. Exiled again, to Huizhou, 1094–97, and Hainan Island, 1097–1100, then pardoned. Also a calligrapher and painter. Died in Changzhou, 28 July 1101.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Selections from the Works of Su Tung-p’o, translated by Cyril Drummond Le Gros Clark, 1931

The Prose-Poetry of Su Tung-p’o, translated by Cyril Drummond Le Gros Clark, 1935

Jingjin Dongpo wenji shilüe (Annotated selection of prose), edited by Lang Ye, 1979

Su Shi wenji (Collected essays), edited by Kong Fangli, 6 vols., 1986

Translations of essays in: Chinese Classical Prose: The Eight Masters of the T’ang-Sung Period, edited and translated by Shi Shun Liu, 1979:232–85; Inscribed Landscapes: Travel Writing from Imperial China, translated by Richard E. Strassberg, 1994:185–94

Other writings: poetry.

Collected works editions: Su Dongpo ci, edited by Cao Shuming, 1968; Su Shi shiji, edited by Kong Fanli, 1982.

Further Reading

- Bol, Peter, "This Culture of Ours": Intellectual Transitions in T'ang and Sung China, Stanford, California: Stanford University Press, 1992
- Chen, Yu-shih, Images and Ideas in Chinese Classical Prose: Studies of Four Masters, Stanford, California: Stanford University Press, 1988
- Cheng Qianfan and Wu Xinlei, Liang Song wenxue shi (The literary history of the Northern Song and the Southern Song), Shanghai: Shanghai guji chubanshe, 1991
- Dongpo yanjiu luncong* (Studies of Su Dongpo), Chengdu: Sichuan wenyi, 1986
- Egan, Ronald C., Word, Image, and Deed in the Life of Su Shi, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Council on East Asian Studies and Harvard-Yenching Institute, 1994
- Fuller, Michael, The Road to East Slope: The Development of Su Shi's Poetic Voice, Stanford, California: Stanford University Press, 1990
- Grant, Beata, Mount Lu Revisited: Buddhism in the Life and Writings of Su Shih, Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1994
- Guo Shaoyu, Zhongguo wenxue piping shi (History of Chinese literary criticism), Shanghai: Xin wenyi chubanshe, 1957
- Hatch, George C., "Su Shih," in Sung Biographies, vol. 3, edited by Herbert Franke, Wiesbaden: Steiner, 1976:900-68
- Lin, Yu-tang, The Gay Genius: The Life and Times of Su Tungpo, New York: Day, 1947; London: Heinemann, 1948
- Liu, James J.Y., Chinese Theories of Literature, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1975
- Liu Naichang, editor, Su Shi wenxue lunji (Collected studies on Su Shi's writings), Jinan: Qilu shushe, 1982
- Liu Xizai, Yigai (A theoretical summary of art), Shanghai: Shanghai guji chubanshe, 1978
- Ma Jigao, Song-Ming lixue yu wenxue (Neo-Confucianism and literature in the Song and Ming periods), Changsha: Hunan shifan daxue chubanshe, 1989
- March, Andrew L., Landscape in the Thought of Su Shih (dissertation), Seattle: University of Washington, 1964
- Su Zhe, "Wangxiong Zizhan duanming muzhi ming" (Epitaph for my late elder brother Zizhan), in Su Zhe ji, Nuancheng houji, no. 22, Beijing: Zhonghua shuju, 1990: 1117-28
- Yu Xinli, Su Dongpo de wenxue lilun (The literary theories of Su Dongpo), Taipei: Xuesheng shuju, 1981
- Zeng Zaozhuang, Su Shi pingzhuan (Critical biography of Su Shi), Chengdu: Sichuan renmin chubanshe, 1981

Sur

Argentine periodical, 1931–1980

Modeled on the examples of two renowned European cultural magazines, the Nouvelle Revue Française (New French review) and the Revista de Occidente (Western review), the journal Sur (South) has been a decisive factor in 20th-century Argentine intellectual history, enjoying an unusually long publishing life of over 40 years. Rather than a manifesto or a formal declaration of principles, the first issue in Summer 1931 opened with a letter to the American writer Waldo Frank from Victoria Ocampo, founder and financier of the publication. This letter, in the form of a personal recollection of the many conversations between the two writers about the need to publish a new, American journal, defines its purpose in rather vague terms: to study the problems that are essentially linked to America without ignoring Europe. Two years later, issue no. 8 ends with a brief note, a “Notícula,” complementing this idea. It states that the journal is original, not an imitation of any other Argentine magazine, and that it will strive to include writings by talented young people who are prepared to explore new areas of thinking and who display an authentic consciousness of the spiritual misery of contemporary times. To fulfill these self-imposed requirements, the journal provided translations of significant contemporary works originally written in French or English, essays devoted to analyzing the relationship of the intellectual to society, and innumerable articles and notes whose goal was to familiarize the readership with current trends in a cosmopolitan form of high culture.

There is no general agreement on what factors should be taken into account to establish the different stages of the history of Sur. Nevertheless, it is helpful to combine the incorporation of new figures who became decisive in the development of the journal with the impact of major external events. During the earliest period (1931–38), Ocampo’s literary preferences and opinions predominated. This explains the proliferation of the essay over poetry and fiction, and the use of an undefined notion of “taste” as the measure of literary value. The second period began with the designation of José Bianco as editor-in-chief, whose presence would affect Sur’s editorial practice by giving more space to creative writing. Although Bianco continued his activity until 1961, a third period opened in 1948 with the acceptance of a younger generation of contributors, which included Julio Cortázar, Enrique Pezzoni, and the controversial Héctor Alberto Murena. The final period of the magazine corresponds to the 1960s, when changes in socioeconomic conditions and in the intellectual field, both in Argentina and in Latin America, seriously challenged the vitality of a deeply liberal cultural project.

The essay was the dominant form in the 1930s and, for both European contributors such as Aldous Huxley and Jacques Maritain, and local writers, the prevailing subject was the answer of intellectuals to the different crises of the period. The Sur group conceived the role of intellectuals in the social context as shapers of ideas, but without committing themselves to any particular ideology. Thus they are responsible for working in the abstract domain of ideas, in a “third position” that allows them to reflect on reality without getting involved in it.

Although the magazine was founded as a nonpolitical enterprise, changes in the international and local situation forced the members to define their position, frequently against the interests and desires of the Argentine government and society at large. The journal did not involve itself in any form of concrete political action. However, it never concealed its points of view, in particular when events raised moral questions. For instance, facing the Spanish Civil War, the initial reaction was somewhat ambivalent but, after the execution of the poet Federico García Lorca, the magazine openly supported the cause of the Republicans. Similarly, at the beginning of World War II, Sur published a declaration entitled “Nuestra actitud” (September 1939; Our attitude) which sided with the Allies. As for national issues, the magazine expressed an internationalist and mainly liberal orientation against the prevailing Catholic nationalism of the 1930s and a sustained oppositional criticism vis-à-vis the populist presidencies of Juan Domingo Peron (1946–55).

The list of contributors who published in Sur throughout its history is certainly impressive, including almost all the significant names in Argentine culture up to the mid-1950s. Enrique Anderson Imbert, Adolfo Bioy Casares, Bernardo Canal Feijoo, Carlos Alberto Erro, Eduardo Mallea, Ezequiel Martínez Estrada, Ernesto Sabato, and Juan José Sebreli are only a few of the renowned signatures to be found in the pages of the journal. Nevertheless, its two major figures are Victoria Ocampo, with her continuous ambition to preserve a secure space for high culture, and Jorge Luis Borges, the first member of the original Sur group to receive international recognition and who went on to become a leading figure in contemporary literature.

Memorable special issues included “La guerra” (October 1939; The war), “La guerra en América” (December 1941; The war in America), “La paz” (July 1945; Peace), “Cuaderno San Martín dedicado a los derechos del hombre” (1950; San Martín notebook devoted to human rights), and “Por la reconstrucción nacional” (November-December 1955; In favor of national reconstruction). Sur also published several homage issues: Domingo Faustino Sarmiento (1938), Paul Valéry (1945), Pedro Henríquez Ureña (1946), Mahatma Gandhi (1948), George Bernard Shaw and André Gide (1951), Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz (1951), Rainer Maria Rilke (1953), José Ortega y Gasset (1956), and William Shakespeare (1964).

Sur was the publication in Argentina most vilified by its detractors, and most praised by its supporters. It remains a perfect example of the ideological tensions of Argentine cultural history. Those who believe that its pages were merely manifestations of the cultural project of an enlightened minority who lived completely cut off from the general history of the country are countered by hundreds of pages filled with the reactions of those associated with Sur to questions of Argentina’s social reality. Those who consider that there is nothing for Argentine culture to produce after Sur must accept the abundant example of those who never had access to its pages.

The death in 1979 of Victoria Ocampo, the slow break-up of her team of talented collaborators, along with the profound changes that took place among Argentine intellectuals beginning in the mid-1950s are factors that determined the disappearance of this prestigious and influential review in 1980.

Further Reading

- Bastos, María Luisa, "Escrituras ajenas, expresión propia: Sur y los Testimonios de Victoria Ocampo," Revista Iberoamericana 110–11 (1980): 123–37
- King, John, Sur: A Study of the Argentine Literary Journal and Its Role in the Development of a Culture, 1931–1970, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1986
- Lafleur, Héctor, Sergio Provenzano, and Fernando Alonso, Las revistas literarias argentinas (1893–1967), Buenos Aires: Centro Editor de America Latina, 2nd edition, 1968
- Matamoro, Blas, Genio y figura de Victoria Ocampo, Buenos Aires: Eudeba, 1986: 201–308
- Méndez, Jesús, "The Origins of Sur, Argentina's Elite Cultural Review," Revista Interamericana de Bibliografía 31, no. 1 (1981): 3–15
- Romano, Eduardo, "Julio Cortázar frente a Borges y el grupo de la revista Sur," Cuadernos Hispanoamericanos 364–66 (1980): 106–38
- Zuleta, Emilia de, "Letras españolas en la revista Sur," Revista de Archivos, Bibliotecas y Museos 80, no. 1(1977): 113–45

Susman, Margarete

German, 1872–1966

Margarete Susman was one of the first women writers in Germany resolute and powerful enough to enter what was in her time still considered the exclusive grounds of male competence: philosophy, theology, and cultural criticism. While even progressive movements like critical theory seldom encouraged women writers except in auxiliary positions, and the role of women in existential and phenomenological schools of thought came at the cost of being typecast in subservient roles, Susman, who lived much of her life in Switzerland, succeeded in what for a short time was a uniquely liberal climate to establish herself as a distinct voice.

A student and close friend of Georg Simmel, she followed him in recognizing even in the least important object "its relation to the truly human" and its importance for what she called "the great themes, that is, the being of the soul, life, death, time, eternity, transcendence, and immanence" ("Erinnerungen an Simmel" [1958; Reminiscences of Simmel]). Simmel's playful attitude to the deepest problems of existence liberated and inspired Susman, and her younger friends and fellow students Bernhard Groethuysen, Martin Buber, and Ernst Bloch, to rely in a more assured way on their own capacity for subjective intuition. Mentor, friend, and philosophical support, Simmel changed with his own "marginal" writing the philosophical climate and ascribed to the essay its own theoretical dignity.

While Susman had published in 1901 a volume of poetry which she soon withdrew, and a second one in 1907, her career as a writer did not really begin until 1907 when she became a regular contributor to the Frankfurter Zeitung (The Frankfurt news), run by Heinrich Simon. Her first essay, "Judentum und Kultur" (1907; Judaism and culture), a book review, announces in its title the two main themes she would pursue throughout her writing.

While Simmel provided the intellectual backing for the kind of essayistic approach Susman would embark on, she developed her own distinctive style. Replacing Simmel's rapid, associative, and suggestive thinking with a contemplative, introspective mode, her essays as well as her book-length studies reflect a thinking that self-consciously rests in itself. Designed as appreciative interpretations, her essays observe, listen, and strive to find sense in, or rather make sense of, the abundance of historical figures, and social, political, and intellectual trends and events that shape her time. Tracing the Gestalt or mental images of individuals and intellectual-historical constellations, Susman presents interpretative sketches that provide a framework to express her concern with culture as well as reflect on the individual's creativity and the role of self-determination in history.

Her essay "Vom Sinn unserer Zeit" (1931, revised 1965; On the meaning of our time) is typical in determining the stand her writings take. There she notes "that [the human] is the only being known to us that searches for the meaning of its life." The fact that, as she claims, no other historical period has been further away from an answer to that question marks the searching yet firmly grounded perspective of her essays. While a definite answer of who and what we are may be undiscoverable, the recognition that we are always in search of it reminds us of the value of self-examination and self-judgment, as encouraged by the reflective character of the essay.

Spanning the full range of the cultural history of humanity, Susman's essays link the diversity of their topics to the central quest for the meaning and determination of existence. Questions of religion, history, and cultural imagination receive their specific urgency from this core concern, and give the essays their philosophical stringency and cohesion. This is achieved, however, at the expense of concrete specificity. Abstract and lofty, Susman's essays occupy the problematic space between the material and the metaphysical, the factual and the ideal. In a unique fashion, her writing takes on the mediation between these extremes in the seemingly free realm of pure thought. It performs a critical move that navigates the discursive deadlock of contemporary philosophy.

With Das Buch Hiob und das Schicksal des jüdischen Volkes (The Book of Job and the destiny of the Jewish people) Susman presents her most ambitious essay, a pioneering contribution to Jewish reconstruction in the wake of Auschwitz. Published in 1946 and revised in 1948, and addressing the challenge of the foundation of the State of Israel, this essay examines the single most haunting challenge of modern times: the systematic extermination of the Jewish people in the midst of modern civilization. It is in the format of an essay, a search for answers to the unanswerable, that Susman envisions a possibility of engaging with the past. For, she argues, it is only by way of responding in the present and future that we are able to produce—retrospectively and without fatally rationalizing the irrational—a "sense" of the past. Through reconnecting with the message of biblical Judaism, Susman suggests, Jewish life after Auschwitz receives its meaning, for it is the encounter with the biblical that makes it possible to confront convincingly the modern.

Gestalten und Kreise (1954; Figures and circles) is Susman's final collection of essays on key figures in intellectual history, including seminal studies on Moses Mendelssohn, Goethe, Kafka, and Franz Rosenzweig. Contemplative and often meditative, these essays bring to a formal conclusion her attempt to comprehend the great themes by way of careful and empathic interpretations of individuals in their specificity.

WILLI GOETSCHEL

Biography

Born 14 October 1872 in Hamburg. Studied at a school in Zurich; Arts Academy, Dusseldorf; studied in Paris, Munich, 1898–1900, and Berlin, c. 1901, where she studied under Georg Simmel. Married Eduard von Bendemann, 1906 (divorced, 1928): one son. Book critic and literary contributor, Frankfurter Zeitung, 1907–33. Moved to Zurich, 1933. Joined the socialist-religious circle of the theologian Leonhard Ragaz. Government restricted her political writings, so she published some work in newspapers and magazines under the pseudonym “Reiner.” Awards: City of Zurich Prize, 1944; Swiss Literary Association Prize, 1954; Swiss-Jewish Communal Association Prize, 1955; honorary degree from the University of Berlin. Died in Zurich, 16 January 1966.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Frauen der Romantik, 1929

Das Buch Hiob und das Schicksal des jüdischen Volkes, 1946; revised edition, 1948

Gestalten und Kreise, 1954

Vom Geheimnis der Freiheit: Gesammelte Aufsätze, 1914–1964, edited by Manfred Schlösser, 1965

Das Nah- und Fernsein des Fremden: Essays und Briefe, edited by Ingeborg Nordmann, 1992

Other writings: six volumes of poetry, literary criticism, works on the philosophy of religion, particularly concerning Jewish questions, and memoirs (1966).

Further Reading

Für Margarete Susman: Auf gespaltenem Pfad, Darmstadt: Erato, 1964

Goetschel, Willi, “Margarete Susman,” in Helvetische Steckbriefe 47 Schriftsteller aus der deutschen Schweiz seit 1800, edited by Zürcher Seminar für Literaturkritik and Werner Weber, Zurich: Artemis, 1981:247–53

Goldschmidt, Hermann Levin, Preface to Das Buch Hiob by Susman, Frankfurt-on-Main: Jüdischer Verlag, 1996

Nordmann, Ingeborg, “Nachdenken an der Schwelle von Literatur und Theorie: Essayistinnen im 20. Jahrhundert,” in Deutsche Literatur von Frauen, vol. 2, edited by Gisela Brinker-Gabler, Munich: Beck, 1988:364–79

Swift, Jonathan

Irish, 1667–1745

Jonathan Swift's essays are public writings by a public man and intended for public effect. They are the work of someone deeply involved in the life of his time, reflecting his immersion in politics, the Church, and Ireland. Because much of Swift's writing in all of these areas is so closely related to the events of his day, most of it is now read only by specialists, but several of his essays—primarily those in which he does not speak in his own voice but creates a distinct persona to present his often bleak views—transcend the occasions that prompted them and retain a lasting interest.

Although Swift's essays concern a wide variety of subjects, certain norms and beliefs underlie all of them. He was a firm believer in the via media, the "middle way" between political and religious extremes, and in the necessity of employing common sense in one's approach to highly divisive issues. Those who adopted an extreme view of church or state were subject to Swift's most slashing satire, for, as he wrote to his friend John Arbuthnot, "I could never let people run mad without telling and warning them sufficiently."

Perhaps the least read of all Swift's writings are the political essays and pamphlets, which were written for a specific purpose. When Swift shifted his allegiance from the Whigs to the Tories in 1710 he found that "their great difficulty lay in the Want of some good Pen to keep up the Spirit raised in the People, to assert the Principles, and justify the Proceedings of the new Ministers." Of the several pamphlets and 33 essays Swift contributed to the Examiner, most can be reduced to the theme that Tories are preferable to Whigs. Swift's only political writing of current interest is his The Conduct of the Allies (1711), and that not for its political message but because in this pamphlet he began to use an assumed character, in this case a supposedly impartial narrator who objectively presents "facts" concerning the disgraceful behavior of England's allies during the War of the Spanish Succession, facts intended to induce the English public to accept the peace the Tories desired. Swift does not employ satire and irony in this work, but he does lie quite successfully, so successfully indeed that according to G.M.Trevelyan Swift did more in this pamphlet "to settle the immediate fate of parties and of nations than did ever any other literary man in the annals of England."

Much of Swift's religious writing is also little read today, but his "Sentiments of a Church of England Man" (1708) is an essential statement of Swift's political and religious principles, primarily that the great evil to be avoided is arbitrary power; the supreme power must be invested in the whole people, and those who wish to "preserve the Constitution entire in Church and State" will avoid extreme Whiggery for the sake of the Church and extreme Toryism for the sake of the State. The ideas presented are those of a typical Swift narrator, a man who wishes to do his country service by "unbiasing his mind as much as possible, and thus endeavouring to moderate between the rival powers." A further attack on religious extremism is conveyed in "The Mechanical Operation of the Spirit" (1704), an example of what Ricardo Quintano (1936) has termed "three-dimensional irony." In two-dimensional irony what is said is directly opposite to what is meant; in the three-dimensional irony of "The Mechanical Operation" the narrator arrives at a perfectly sound conclusion, but the initial premise and all the reasoning resulting from it are completely wrong. The narrator analyzes religious enthusiasm, described as "a lifting up of the soul or its faculties above matter," by describing the three traditional ways of "ejaculating the soul": inspiration, from above; possession, from below; and the natural process of strong conjunctions or passion. To these methods the narrator now adds a fourth, "purely an effect of artifice and mechanic operation," the selfinduced trance in which all religious belief and practice becomes a matter of distilled vapors. "The Mechanical Operation of the Spirit" and the "Argument Against Abolishing Christianity" (1708), in which the narrator argues for the preservation of the Christian religion not as a religious experience but as a social necessity, are two of Swift's best satires, illustrating both the effectiveness and dangers of the form. Readers aware of the nature of satire can easily discern the serious religious thought underlying both, but Swift always believed, no doubt correctly, that a misreading of such works led to the charges of irreligion that plagued him throughout his life.

Satire was perhaps a less dangerous weapon when employed in the service of Ireland, and Swift's Irish writings were so strong that they made him the unlikeliest of Irish patriotic heroes. Having clearly outlined the problems confronting Ireland in his Short View of Ireland in 1727, to no effect whatever, Swift returned to these problems in A Modest Proposal of 1729, an essay often considered the best sustained satire in the English language, demonstrating Swift's satiric technique at its best. In form the modest proposal is a formal Aristotelian argument, but used for perverted purposes. The persona who makes this proposal may be Swift's best use of the imagined narrator, who presents himself as a man of reason and good will with a great love for his country. The narrator proceeds modestly, methodically, and objectively to suggest that Irish poverty can be ameliorated by the sale of infants for food, remarking that "a very knowing American" of his acquaintance has assured him that "a young healthy child well nursed is at a year old a most delicious, nourishing, and wholesome food, whether stewed, roasted, baked, or boiled." With relentless and horrifying logic the narrator calmly outlines the many benefits of his scheme, all the while protesting that cruelty "hath always been with me the strongest objection against any project, how well soever intended." Throughout the essay the narrator's economic scheme reduces humans to the level of beasts, the way, Swift implies, that the Irish are actually treated by their landlords and by the English. In a country where aged and diseased poor people "are every day dying and rotting by cold and famine, and filth and vermin, as fast as can be reasonably expected" and in which young laborers are "now in almost as hopeful a condition" because they cannot find work and in any case are too weak from starvation to do any, why not make a metaphor literal: if the English and absentee landlords continue to devour the Irish people, why not their children as well?

The true horror of A Modest Proposal lies in the bland understatement with which it is presented, a narrative pose sustained until the very end of the essay when Swift's savage indignation blasts forth as the narrator, responding to possible objections, urges his opponents to "first ask the parents of these mortals whether they would not at this day think it a great happiness to have been sold for food at a year old in this manner I prescribe, and thereby have avoided such a perpetual scene of misfortunes as they have since gone through by the oppression of landlords, the impossibility of paying rent without money or trade, the want of common sustenance, with neither house nor clothes to cover them from the inclemencies of the weather, and the most inevitable prospect of entailing the like or greater miseries upon their breed forever.”

Perhaps the most astonishing aspect of this performance is that A Modest Proposal, in common with a few of Swift’s other works, notably the fourth book of Gulliver’s Travels (1726), retains its power to upset, disturb, anger, and shock contemporary readers. Swift would surely have been pleased that as recently as 1984 Peter O’Toole’s reading of A Modest Proposal at the reopening of the Gaiety Theatre in Dublin was greeted with cries of “disgusting” and “offensive,” followed by the departure of several members of the audience.

Such controversy has always been associated with Swift. During the late 18th century and throughout the 19th he was frequently regarded as a monster in both his personal and literary lives. The 20th century has responded more favorably to him; today his reputation has probably never been higher, partly because of the dedicated work of recent scholars who have added greatly to our understanding of Swift’s satiric methods and underlying seriousness of purpose. Another, more visceral reason for Swift’s greater popularity has surely been the horrors of the 20th century itself. Satires that describe religion as a social rather than spiritual activity, that warn of the dangers of religious and political extremism, and above all that ironically advocate the methodical destruction of large numbers of humans for the economic prosperity of the state, may have been written in the 18th century, but speak directly to our own.

JOHN H. ROGERS

See also Satiric Essay

Biography

Born 30 November 1667 in Dublin. Studied at Kilkenny Grammar School, 1674–82; Trinity College, Dublin, 1681–89, B.A., 1686, M.A., 1692. Secretary to Sir William Temple at Moor Park, Farnham, Surrey, 1689–95 and 1696–99; ordained in the Church of Ireland (Anglican), Dublin, 1695; vicar of Kilroot, 1695–96, and Laracor, from 1700; prebendary, St. Patrick’s Cathedral, Dublin, 1701; emissary for the Irish clergy in London, 1707–09. Contributor of the “Bickerstaff Papers,” 1708–09, and to the Tatler; editor, the Examiner, 1710–11. Renounced the Whigs and joined the Tories when they came to power, 1710. Cofounder, the Scriblerus Club, 1713–14. Returned to Ireland, 1714. Dean, St. Patrick’s Cathedral, 1713–42. Married Esther (Stella) Johnson, c. 1716 (died, 1718). Visited London, 1726 and 1727. Awards: honorary degree from University of Dublin. Died in Dublin, 19 October 1745.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

(selection; many pamphlets and letters individually published)

Esquire Bickerstaff's Most Strange and Wonderful Predictions for the Year 1708, 1708

The Accomplishment of the First of Mr. Bickerstaff's Predictions, 1708

Bickerstaff redivivus; or, Predictions for the Year 1709, 1709

A Vindication of Isaac Bickerstaff Esq. Against What Is Objected to Him by Mr. Partridge, 1709

The Examiner, nos. 13–45, 2 November 1710–14 June 1711; in Swift vs. Mainwaring: "The Examiner" and "The Medley", edited by Frank H. Ellis, 1985

A Modest Proposal for Preventing the Children of Poor People from Being a Burthen to Their Parents or the Country, and for Making Them Beneficial to the Publick, 1729; edited by Charles Beaumont, 1969

Prose Works, edited by Herbert Davis and others, 14 vols., 1939–68

The Writings of Jonathan Swift (selection), edited by Robert A. Greenberg and William Bowman Piper, 1973

Swift's Irish Pamphlets, edited by Joseph McMinn, 1991

The Intelligencer, with Thomas Sheridan, edited by James Woolley, 1992

A Modest Proposal and Other Satires, 1995

Other writings: the satires A Tale of a Tub (1704) and Gulliver's Travels (1726), poetry, many works on politics, and correspondence (collected in The Correspondence, edited by Harold Williams, 5 vols., 1963–65).

Collected works editions: The Works, edited by Thomas Sheridan, 17 vols., 1784, revised edition edited by John Nichols, 24 vols., 1812; Works, edited by Sir Walter Scott, 19 vols., 1814.

Bibliographies

Landa, Louis A., and J.E. Tobin, Jonathan Swift: A List of Critical Studies Published from 1895 to 1945, New York: Octagon, 1974 (original edition, 1945)

Rodino, Richard H., Swift Studies, 1965–1980: An Annotated Bibliography, New York: Garland, 1984

Stathis, James J., A Bibliography of Swift Studies, 1945–1965, Nashville: Vanderbilt University Press, 1967

Teerink, Herman, A Bibliography of Writings of Jonathan Swift, The Hague: Nijhoff, 1937; revised edition, edited by Arthur H. Scouten, Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1963

Further Reading

Bullitt, John M., Jonathan Swift and the Anatomy of Satire, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1953

Craik, Henry, The Life of Jonathan Swift, London: Murray, 1882

- Davis, Herbert, Jonathan Swift: Essays on His Satire and Other Studies, New York: Oxford University Press, 1964
- Downie, J.A., Jonathan Swift: Political Writer, London and Boston: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1984
- Ehrenpreis, Irvin, Swift: The Man, His Works, and the Age, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 3 vols., 1961–83
- Ewald, William Bragg, Jr., The Masks of Jonathan Swift, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, and Oxford: Blackwell, 1954
- Ferguson, Oliver W., Swift and Ireland, Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1962
- Landa, Louis, Swift and the Church of Ireland, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1954
- Nokes, David, Jonathan Swift, a Hypocrite Reversed: A Critical Biography, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1985
- Price, Martin, Swift's Rhetorical Art: A Study in Structure and Meaning, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1953
- Quintano, Ricardo, The Mind and Art of Jonathan Swift, London: Oxford University Press, 1936
- Quintano, Ricardo, Swift: An Introduction, London: Oxford University Press, 1955
- Rosenheim, Edward, Swift and the Satirist's Art, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1963
- Watkins, W.B.C., Perilous Balance: The Tragic Genius of Swift, Johnson, and Sterne, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1939
- Williams, Kathleen, Jonathan Swift and the Age of Compromise, Lawrence: University of Kansas Press, 1958; London: Constable, 1959

This page intentionally left blank.

T

Taine, Hippolyte

French, 1828–1893

Born a century later, Taine would have been a university professor, though given the extent of his interests—philosophy, psychology, literature, art, sociology, history—it is hard to know in which discipline: “Theory,” perhaps, or “Cultural Studies.” He was a brilliant student at the École Normale Supérieure, taught philosophy for a year at a collège, and wrote a doctoral thesis on La Fontaine. But his anti-clericalism, his hostility to the dominant spiritualiste school of French philosophy, his adherence to the views of Spinoza, and his interest in Hegel made him anathema to the university establishment. At the age of 24 he took the decision to become an outlaw (he uses the English word): he would leave the university and live from his pen as a journalist and essayist.

He began with review articles for the Revue de l’Instruction Publique (Review of public education), on French writers—classical (La Bruyère) or contemporary (Michelet). Soon he was writing for the more prestigious Revue des Deux Mondes (Review of two worlds) and the Journal des Débats (Journal of debates). All of his books were made up from articles first published in these journals or in the lighter Vie Parisienne (Parisian life), so that, while he gave the specific title Essais to the three volumes of collected articles (and to the monographs on La Fontaine and Livy), there is a sense in which all his work is that of an essayist.

His Histoire de la littérature anglaise (1863–64; History of English Literature), for example, began life as essays on particular authors (first Macaulay, then Dickens, Chaucer, Shakespeare, Bunyan, Thackeray, Milton, and others). In the History, the essays are considerably revised and become chapters, ordered chronologically. For the collection Taine writes his famous introduction, claiming that literature is the best source for the historian, and gives the book unity by treating English literature as a case study demonstrating his claim. Even in his major work, Les Origines de la France contemporaine (1875–93; The Origins of Contemporary France), he often proceeds by set-piece portraits such as those on the Jacobins or Napoleon Bonaparte.

Those essays that were not organized into works like the History of English Literature or Les Philosophes classiques du XIXe siècle (1857, 1868; Classical philosophers of the 19th century) were collected under the title (borrowed from Macaulay) of Essais de critique et d’histoire (Critical and historical essays). The first of these collections appeared in 1858 with a preface describing and defending his “scientific” theory of criticism. Most of the essays in these three volumes (Essais; Nouveaux essais, 1865; Derniers essais, 1894) are devoted to one author. A typical Taine essay attempts to explain an individual in terms of one dominant theme, or faculté maîtresse, which structures the life and the work. It also places the subject within a social and historical context (derived, he says, from the individual's race, milieu, and moment). Taine is a structuralist avant la lettre, with the structuralist's tendency to downplay randomness, contradiction, and flux. His essays are brilliant demonstrations: one idea is developed, sometimes overdeveloped, and everything hangs together—in the life and in the work—in the essay. The early article on La Bruyère is a good example: in portraying him Taine uses the discrepancy between his social status and the aristocratic milieu in which he lived, to explain his acerbity.

But there are two levels to Taine: one is this structuralist emphasis on system, evident in the prefaces and the unifying “key” he provides for each subject. The other is his own deeply felt and lived experience of contradiction—his Romanticism at odds with his positivism. The great pleasure of reading Taine's essays comes from reading between (or above) the lines, of glimpsing the subjective behind the “scientific” objectivity, the conflicts and dilemmas behind the claims of unity. Taine was a highly emotional man who disliked displaying his emotions directly in public writing. And yet his essays are full of discreet personal “confessions”—either clear statements of fundamental preference (“I prefer De Musset to Tennyson”) or statements about his subject which are in fact statements about himself. The essay on Balzac (1858) is certainly a brilliant and influential account of a controversial contemporary, but it is also a depiction of Taine's own experience of stress and financial struggle as a writer and of his own divided feelings about modernity. It would not be an exaggeration to say that Taine writes about different authors in order to explore different aspects of his own experience; and his experience is of conflict and tension rather than of resolution.

This restrained self-disclosure is most affecting in the last essays, which are deeply felt meditations on how posterity remembers the achievements of a lifetime. They are a kind of testament about death and the inevitability of failure. At this period, Taine is of the age when funerals begin—of his father-in-law, old friends such as Édouard de Suckau and Anatole Prévost-Paradol—above all of his mother (his father had died when Taine was 13). The theme is Ubi sunt?—What is left of those who lived, struggled, and died? For the vast majority the answer is, he says, nothing save a name on a tombstone. Even writers leave little more. These late essays are elegiac obituaries of minor figures: Louis de Loménie, the historian whom he succeeded at the French Academy; Marcelin (Émile Planat), his school friend and editor of the Vie Parisienne; Frantz Woepke the orientalist, another friend; Ernest Bertin, editor of the Débats; George Sand; Sainte-Beuve himself, who claimed to have left a portrait of himself in 50 volumes of essays devoted to others.

Of Marcelin Taine writes that the 25 volumes of his Vie Parisienne “only show the lesser part of his thoughts; this is the fate of most men; very few fulfill their nature completely.” Will Marcelin be remembered? The newspaper, together with a book of essays, “is all that remains of him together with his memory in the minds of four or five friends who will not live long. Woepke, who most deserved to live, was the first to die. We walk close behind them on the path which vanished beneath their feet. It is collapsing beneath us; each day we sink deeper and we are already up to our knees in the same earth which covers them.”

When he writes these essays Taine is, along with Ernest Renan, the most famous intellectual in France, but he knows that writers who are not creative artists have their modest afterlife only in encyclopedias. And he is resigned to that fate.

COLIN EVANS

Biography

Hippolyte Adolphe Taine. Born 21 April 1828 in Vouziers, the Ardennes. Studied at the Collège Bourbon, Paris, 1841–48, baccalaureat, 1848; École Normale Supérieure, Paris, 1848–51, doctorate in letters, 1853. Taught at a collège in Nevers and a lycée in Poitiers, 1851–52, then private tutor. Contributor to various periodicals, from 1850s, including the Revue de l'Instruction Publique, Revue des Deux Mondes, and Journal des Débats. Suffered often from fatigue, from 1857. Admissions examiner in history and German, Military Academy of Saint-Cyr, 1863–66; professor of aesthetics and art history, École des Beaux-Arts, Paris, 1864–84. Married Thérèse Denuelle, 1868: one daughter and one son. Lectured at Oxford University, 1871. Elected to the French Academy, 1878. Awards: French Academy Prize, for essay, 1855; honorary degree from Oxford University. Member, Legion of Honor, 1866. Died in Paris, 5 March 1893.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Essai sur les Fables de La Fontaine, 1853; as La Fontaine et ses fables, 1861

Essai sur Tite-Live, 1856

Les Philosophes français du XIXe siècle, 1857; as Les Philosophes classiques du XIXe siècle, 1868

Essais de critique et d'histoire, 1858

Histoire de la littérature anglaise, 4 vols., 1863–64; definitive edition, 5 vols., 1872; as

History of English Literature, translated by Henri Van Laun, 2 vols., 1871

Philosophie de l'art, 1865; as Lectures on Art, translated by John Durand, 2 vols., 1875

Nouveaux essais de critique et d'histoire, 1865; one essay as Balzac: A Critical Study, translated by Lorenzo O'Rourke, 1906

Notes sur Paris: Vie et opinions de M. Frédéric-Thomas Graindorge, 1867; as Notes on Paris, translated by J.A. Stevens, 1875

Notes sur l'Angleterre, 1872; as Notes on England, translated by W. Fraser Rae, 1872, and Edward Hyams, 1957

Derniers essais de critique et d'histoire, 1894

Other writings: Les Origines de la France contemporaine (6 vols., 1875–93; The Origins of Contemporary France), works on the history of art, travel books on the Pyrenees and Italy, studies on John Stuart Mill, Charles Dickens, and Thomas Carlyle, and volumes of correspondence.

Bibliographies

- Giraud, Victor, Bibliographie critique de Taine, Paris: Hachette, 1902
 Smith, H., "The Taine Centennial: Comment and Bibliography," MLN 44 (1929):437–45
 Thieme, Hugo P., "The Development of Taine Criticism Since 1893," MLN 17 (1902):71–82, 140–53

Further Reading

- Charlton, D.G., Positivist Thought in France During the Second Empire, 1852–1870, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1959
 Evans, Colin, Taine: Essai de biographie intérieure, Paris: Nizet, 1975: especially 173–308
 Evans, Colin, "Taine and His Fate," Nineteenth-Century French Studies 6, nos. 1–2 (Fall-Winter 1977–78):118–28
 Léger, François, Monsieur Taine, Paris: Critérium, 1993
 Nordmann, Jean-Thomas, Taine et la critique scientifique, Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1992
 Weinstein, Leo, Hippolyte Taine, New York: Twayne, 1972

The Tatler

British periodical, 1709–1711

The Tatler was a collaborative effort: the authorial mask of Isaac Bickerstaff was a satiric invention of Jonathan Swift's, whose pseudonymous pamphlet Predictions for the Year 1708 pilloried the astrologer John Partridge. In the last issue, no. 271 of 2 January 1711, Joseph Addison's role is acknowledged, although his anonymity is preserved: "The Hand that has assisted me in those noble Discourses upon the Immortality of the Soul, the glorious Prospects of another Life, and the most sublime Idea's of Religion and Virtue, is a Person too fondly my Friend ever to own them." The editor credits his friend with providing "the finest Strokes of Wit and Humour in all Mr. Bickerstaff's Lucubrations." But the design and execution of the Tatler are principally the work of Richard Steele, as he himself reveals in the same number.

Steele had been a successful comic playwright, experience that served him well in his role of drama critic and theatrical commentator in the Tatler. He had also served as editor of the London Gazette, and so had prepared himself for the rigors of producing a thrice-weekly newspaper. Although the Tatler is now revered as a literary magazine and as a prototype both for the single-author, pseudonymously published journals to follow (the Spectator and the Rambler being probably the most famous examples) and for the magazine miscellanies such as the Gentleman's that held a dominant place in the popular press for most of the 18th century, Steele initially conceived of the Tatler as a newspaper, in competition with the Gazette, the Daily Courant, and Post Boy. As such, it reported, under the heading “St. James’s Coffee-house,” on foreign and domestic news, as well as fulfilling its stated purpose “to expose the false Arts of Life, to pull off the Disguises of Cunning, Vanity, and Affectation, and to recommend a general Simplicity in our Dress, our Discourse, and our Behaviour.”

The Tatler essays are an invaluable record of the geography, politics, manners, and artistic achievement of early 18th-century England. Collectively, they offer a sort of walking tour of London, highlighted by visits to Westminster Abbey, the Tower, St. Paul’s Cathedral, Bethlehem Hospital, and the Old Bailey. In its function as an almanac, the paper records notable calendar events and the weather, and comments on events of local notoriety such as the State Lottery of 1710, which “turned a Tax into a Diversion.”

As an instrument of social reform, the paper advocated moderation: avoidance of extremes in custom and fashion, and adherence to reason and benevolence. The “Censor” takes on an unholy parade of “drunkards,” gamblers, rakes, atheists, pugilists, swearers, and those who unjustifiably wear the mantle of “men of wit.” For the lovelorn, the paper serves as a sort of marriage counselor preaching the virtues of patience and domestic harmony and avoidance of libertinism. For its more erudite readers, the paper comments on the virtues of classical learning, holding up Homer, Virgil, Horace, and Cicero for special praise and commending modern authors such as Shakespeare and Milton for their good taste.

For his first number of 12 April 1709, Steele as “Isaac Bickerstaff, Esq.” announced the organizational plan for the journal. He would be a sort of domestic correspondent, sorting into various categories material that issued from founts of news and gossip in London. For verisimilitude, he used the names of actual coffeehouses and other places of social congregation. Under the heading “White’s Chocolate-house” would appear all matter concerning “Gallantry, Pleasure, and Entertainment.” These entries tended to be personality sketches—some of them “characters” in the 17th-century sense, some of them thinly veiled, recognizable figures. The anecdotes ostensibly illustrated some moral point. The entry for the first number is a character of a “very pretty Gentleman” who has been smitten by the sight of a young Lady passing by in a coach—and who thenceforth lets his passions “maul” him. No. 21 for 28 May 1709 provides contrasting characters of a “Man of Conversation” and his pale imitation, the “Pretty Fellow.” No. 25 for 7 June 1709 takes on one of Steele’s favorite targets for his satirical moralizing, the “fatal folly” of duelling.

Will’s Coffee-house would serve as the forum for commentary on the subject of poetry. This feature also provides theater historians with invaluable information on the staging and performances of contemporary plays such as Jonson’s Volpone and The Alchemist, Wycherley’s The Country-Wife, Dryden’s All for Love, Farquhar’s The Recruiting Officer, and Centlivre’s The Busie Body. The first number reviews a production of Congreve’s Love for Love, a benefit performance for Thomas Betterton, who was nearing the end of his life and whom Steele esteemed as the preeminent British actor of his era. The review applauds the “all-star” cast of Mrs. Barry, Mrs. Bracegirdle, and Mr. Dogget, all veteran players. From the columns under this heading comes a wealth of critical commentary on contemporary performers, dramatic authors, audiences, the plays themselves, and the general state of British theater.

Miscellaneous material appeared under the heading "From my own apartment." No. 1 carries on Swift's joke about Mr. Partridge, whose death is reannounced: "I therefore give all Men fair Warning to mend their Manners, for I shall from Time to Time print Bills of Mortality; and I beg the Pardon of all such who shall be named therein, if they who are good for Nothing shall find themselves in the Number of the Deceased." No. 167 for 4 May 1710 offers a memorial tribute to Betterton. Bickerstaff has particular praise for Betterton's Othello: "The wonderful Agony which he appeared in, when he examined the Circumstance of the Handkerchief in Othello; the Mixture of Love that intruded upon his Mind upon the innocent Answers Desdemona makes, betrayed in his Gesture such a Variety and Vicissitude of Passions, as would admonish a Man to be afraid of his own Heart."

Clearly, the places of origin revealed in the headings appealed directly to a coffeehouse readership. In its advertisement for the first issue, the Tatler specifies its intended audience. The paper is "principally intended for the Use of Politick Persons, who are so publick-spirited as to neglect their own Affairs to look into Transactions of State." But the paper also quickly signals its moralizing intent by satirizing its coffeehouse constituency, much as it would castigate all manner of vice and folly: "Now these Gentlemen, for the most Part, being Persons of strong Zeal and weak Intellects, It is both a Charitable and Necessary Work to offer something, whereby such worthy and well-affected Members of the Commonwealth may be instructed, after their Reading, WHAT TO THINK." The editor also promises material designed for the "Fair Sex, in Honour of whom I have invented the Title of this Paper."

No. 229 for 26 September 1710 hints at the extraordinary popular reception of the Tatler, which drew the praise and condemnation of "The Town" as well as a slew of imitators: "Should I lay down my Paper, What a Famine would there be among the Hawkers, Printers, Booksellers, and Authors?... I have been annotated, retattled, examined, and condoled" by admirers, critics, and plagiarists. Clearly the tone, organization, and subject matter left a lasting impression, exemplified by borrowings in virtually all of the Tatler's journalistic offspring.

In No. 162, at the end of the first year of publication, Bickerstaff assigns himself the title "Censor of Great Britain." In so doing he defined what has become known as "Augustan" satire: "making frequent Reviews of the People," looking "into the Manners of the People," and "punishing Offences according to the Quality of the Offender." The Tatler's moral assignment was to chastise folly and to punish vice, a censorious function associated with the Scriblerians and early 18th-century satire in general.

Early 18th-century writing was frequently collaborative and normally anonymous or pseudonymous. Attribution problems facing those attempting to sort out who contributed which essays to the Tatler are similar to those facing students of virtually any writing of this period. Typically, there is a lack of reliable evidence to determine confidently which essays are Steele's, Addison's, or other contributors'. About 200 of the 271 issues have been ascribed to Steele. Controversy remains over whether to accept Thomas Tickell's record of Addison's contributions in the first collected edition of Addison's works (1721), although Tickell was said to have asked Steele to identify them.

Twentieth-century critics have largely followed the judgment of late 18th-century writers who found in Addison and the Spectator the apotheosis of wit and morality and who deemed the Tatler a decidedly inferior forebear. The Tatler, as its name suggests, was certainly more topical in content and chatty in style than the Spectator, seldom reaching the latter's philosophical complexity. Yet, in part because of its topicality and diversity in voice and subject, the Tatler provides literary historians access to the period probably unmatched by any other single source.

RICHARD C.TAYLOR

See also Periodical Essay

Editions

The Tatler, nos. 1–271, 12 April 1709–2 January 1711; edited by Donald F.Bond, 3 vols., 1987

The Lucubrations of Isaac Bickerstaff, Esq., edited by John Nichols, 6 vols., 1786

Further Reading

Bond, Richmond P., The Tatler: The Making of a Literary Journal, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1971

Winton, Calhoun, Captain Steele: The Early Career of Richard Steele, Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1964

Temple, Sir William

English, 1628–1699

Sir William Temple's career as an essayist began in his early twenties while he was on the continent after leaving Cambridge without completing his degree. During his years as a political figure and as a retired diplomat at his magnificent estates at Sheen and Moor Park, Temple continued to work in the essay form, producing works on a wide variety of topics.

The early essays, written and left untitled before 1652, were printed for the first time in 1930 by G.C.Moore Smith (The Early Essays and Romances) and were given titles in 1940 by Homer Woodbridge (Sir William Temple: The Man and His Work). Their titles are indicative of their content: "Of the Inconstancy and Variety of Our Judgements," "Of Reverie and Idle Fancy," "Of Fortune and Content," "Of Envy and Jealousy," "Of Stained Honor," and "That Virtue Is Not the Mean of Vices."

For the next 20 years or so, while he was occupied with political affairs such as the negotiation of the Triple Alliance and the marriage of William of Orange to Mary Stuart, he seems to have neglected the essay. But in 1673 he began publishing essays, some of which ran to book length, starting with Observations upon the United Provinces of the Netherlands. In 1680 appeared the first part of his Miscellanea, which contained “A Survey of the Constitutions and Interests of the Empire, Sweden, Denmark, Spain, Holland, France, and Flanders,” “Upon the Original and Nature of Government,” “Upon the Advancement of Trade in Ireland,” “Upon the Conjunction of Affairs in October 1673,” “Upon the Excesses of Grief,” and “Upon the Cure of the Gout by Moxa.” The second part of the Miscellanea (published in 1690 and augmented in 1692) contained “Upon the Gardens of Epicurus,” “Of Poetry,” “Of Heroic Virtue,” and “An Essay upon the Ancient and Modern Learning.” The remainder of his essays appeared in Miscellanea, The Third Part, edited by Jonathan Swift (who served as Temple’s secretary for the last ten years of his life) and published in 1701 after Temple’s death in 1699; it included “Of Popular Discontents,” “Of Health and Long Life,” and “Some Thoughts upon Reviewing the Essay of Ancient and Modern Learning.”

Several scholars have noted the influence of Montaigne on both the style and content of the early essays in their openness, ardor, and personal tone. The essays also anticipate political, literary, and philosophical ideas found in his more mature works, as well as his distrust of modern learning, later manifested in the famous essay on ancient and modern learning. The ideas found in the early essays were to be refined and polished by Temple’s travel, reading, and experience over the next several decades.

In his essays on politics Temple demonstrates his belief that people are more or less the same in all times and places except for those differences brought about by climate. In the major essay “Upon the Original and Nature of Government,” he holds to the idea that the origin of government is to be found in the family; thus he subscribes to the patriarchal theory of government’s beginnings as it emerged in the Old Testament, Plato, Aristotle, Jean Bodin, and Sir Robert Filmer. In the essay on the Netherlands Temple reveals his deep respect for the Dutch and their civilization. The “Survey” reflects his interest in diverse European cultures and his analysis of the dangers posed to peace by Louis XVI. In essays on Ireland Temple discusses the difficult relationship between England and Ireland and proposes remedies that might ease the deplorable conditions in the latter nation. In “Of Popular Discontents” Temple identifies and analyzes the causes of political unrest, believing that these will never disappear until “all Men are wise, good, and easily contented.”

His essays on culture are better known. “Upon the Gardens of Epicurus” discusses Epicureanism and its appeal to the philosophical mind, traces the history of gardens from Eden to Rome and northern Europe, and shows how they enable people to “enjoy the Ease and Freedom of a private Scene, where a Man may go his own Way and his own Pace, in the common Paths or Circles of Life.” The essays “Of Health and Long Life” and “Upon the Cure of the Gout by Moxa” illustrate Temple’s distrust of science and his belief that good health is essential to “Tranquility of Mind, and Indolence of Body.” “Of Poetry” deals with the origin and history of poetry, the nature of poetic inspiration, style, versification, folklore, and the relationship of poetry to prose, romance, and satire. It is one of the more important critical documents of 17th-century England.

Temple’s most famous essay is “An Essay upon the Ancient and Modern Learning,” which embroiled him in the Ancients/Moderns controversy that had originated on the continent. Basically Temple took the side of the Ancients, dismissing the accomplishments of the Moderns in almost all areas. “Some Thoughts upon Reviewing the Essay of Ancient and Modern Learning” amplifies some of the points made in the earlier essay.

Temple’s overriding philosophy in the essays seems to be embodied in two famous quotations: “When all is done, Human Life is, at the greatest, and the best but like a froward Child, that must be play’d with and humour’d a little to keep it quiet till it falls asleep, and then the Care is over” (“Of Poetry”); and that everything that people pursue for happiness “are baubles, besides old wood to burn, old wine to drink, old friends to converse with, and old books to read” (“An Essay upon the Ancient and Modern Learning”).

Temple’s influence and reputation as a stylist emerged in the early 18th century when Swift, Pope, John Hughes, and Leonard Welsted held him in high esteem. Swift, for example, said that Temple “has advanced our English Tongue, to as great a perfection as it can well bear.” Later, Samuel Johnson was to praise Temple as “the first writer who gave cadence to English prose.”

ROBERT C.STEENSMA

Biography

Born 25 April 1628 in Blackfriars, London. Studied at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, left 1648. Traveled on the continent for four years. Married Dorothy Osborne 1654 (died, 1695): nine children (only two survived childhood, and they died before their father). Member of the Irish Parliament for Carlow, 1661; moved to England, 1663; served the Crown on various diplomatic missions in Europe, including effecting the Triple Alliance between England, Holland, and Sweden, 1668; awarded a baronetcy, 1666. Retired to his estate at Sheen, 1668–74. Visited The Hague: formalized peace between England and the Netherlands, 1674, and arranged the marriage between William of Orange and Mary Stuart, 1677. Retired again to his estate at Moor Park, near Farnham, Surrey, 1680. Died at Moor Park, 27 January 1699.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Observations upon the United Provinces of the Netherlands, 1673; edited by George N.Clark, 1932, reprinted 1972

Miscellanea, 2 vols., 1680–90; vol. 3 edited by Jonathan Swift, 1701

Essays, edited by J.A.Nicklin, 1903

Upon the Garden of Epicurus, with Other 17th-century Garden Essays, edited by A.F.Sieveking, 1908

Essays on Ancient and Modern Learning and on Poetry, edited by J.E.Spingarn, 1909, and Martin Kämper (in English and German), 1995

The Early Essays and Romances, edited by G.C.Moore Smith, 1930

Three Essays, edited by F.J.Fielden, 1939

Five Miscellaneous Essays, edited by Samuel Holt Monk, 1963

Other writings: poetry, romances, An Introduction to the History of England (1695), and correspondence.

Collected works edition: The Works, 2 vols., 1720.

Further Reading

Allen, R.J., "Swift's Earliest Political Tract and Temple's Essays," Harvard Studies 19 (1937)

Kirk, Clara Marburg, Sir William Temple: A Seventeenth-century "Libertin", New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, and London: Oxford University Press, 1932

Steensma, Robert C., Sir William Temple, New York: Twayne, 1970

Woodbridge, Homer E., Sir William Temple: The Man and His Work, New York: Modern Language Association, and London: Oxford University Press, 1940

Der Teutsche Merkur

German periodical, 1773–1810

Der Teutsche Merkur (The German Mercury) was an 18th-century German periodical, founded in 1773 and principally edited by Christoph Martin Wieland; it was renamed Der neue Teutsche Merkur during the period of the French Revolution. Usually issued in monthly numbers, the TM was one of the longest-lived (38 years) and most influential journals of the age. Its founder—who established the periodical in loose imitation of the Mercure de France just a few months after settling in Weimar—anticipated that it would serve a twofold purpose: as an educational medium for his melioristic classical-humanistic ideas and as a source of income that would support him and his family independent of patrons. A secondary, though not insignificant, desire was that such a public forum might aid in spreading the editor's fame as a poet and novelist. Significantly, Wieland was to shift the emphasis away from his French model's concern with the theater to ideas and opinions of a broader nature (John A. McCarthy, 1979), especially to contemporary cultural, social, and political affairs.

As both owner and chief editor of the TM, Wieland regarded the entrepreneurial aspect of his role "as if I were an honest weaver or cobbler supporting myself and my family upon the fruits of my handiwork" (A.W. Kurtz, 1956). One of Wieland's critics, Claude Miquet (1990), makes a convincing case, however, that both entrepreneur and Enlightenment were united in the person of the editor and that the commercial aspect of Wieland's enterprise was far from being its most important. In any event, various prefaces and addresses to subscribers during the first few years of the journal's life clearly reveal Wieland's assumption of an audience whose attention and favor must be carefully courted, if his principal goals of instruction and stimulation to thought were to be achieved. In the preface to the first number (January 1773), for example, he avers that only articles of a superior character would be allowed entry, although he also intends to include trifles: “Trivialities, too, can be interesting, and good taste and the heart can often profit more from such than from a heavyhanded seriousness... Nonetheless, these articles will for the most part be appropriate for the intellect of those who think or for the heart of those who feel.”

The novice publisher had great hopes for his venture and wished to reach as large a portion of the reading public as possible, rather than to concentrate on the interests and tastes of a small, elite group. Early on he tried to capitalize on the new-found German patriotism generated by the young Storm and Stress poets, and to make a transregional, integrative appeal to those speakers of German either outside of or otherwise indifferent to the old Reich (S.-A. Jørgensen and others, 1994). Also consonant with this attempt to gain a larger readership was the accommodation he made in 1777 to subscribers who had complained about the recent removal of a feature entitled “Logogryphen und Ratsel” (Logogriphs and puzzles): he conceded that he had been too long prejudiced against such slight divertissements and announced his intention of restoring the feature. A year later he renewed his pledge to spare his readers “dry treatises” and, rather, to provide “essays that will nourish the mind and incite to thought.”

Generally, Wieland aimed for his journal to combine a classical-humanist spirit with matters of interest to the German reading public; the principal means of realizing his goals were the cultivation of “social intercourse and critical insight” (Jørgensen). Moreover, and in contrast to other famous periodicals of the age, such as Schiller’s Die Horen (The muses) and the Schlegel brothers’ Athenäum, the project was by no means intended to embody any specific literary, philosophical, or cultural program (Friedrich Sengle, 1949). Repeatedly, in the early years, Wieland asseverated that his publication would be successful—in both an entrepreneurial and a more spiritual sense—only insofar as it retained the interest of the average reader. Success, he believed, could best be attained through a nonpartisan, serious, and assiduous search for truth in which the writer and his reader would be firmly and equally allied. Not the least ingredient in this formula for success was the editor’s intention to engage only the best German thinkers as contributors.

Several of Wieland’s critics have concluded that in the end the TM was not a school for high-minded idealists, and that it hardly met the high hopes of some of those early enthusiasts who greeted its first appearance as a possible counter to the Allgemeine Deutsche Bibliothek (Universal German library), published by the hide-bound and widely resented German Enlightenment philosopher Friedrich Nicolai (cf. Moses Mendelssohn). Nonetheless, the journal enjoyed an unprecedented success upon first appearance. An initial run of 2500 had to be augmented by a second printing, and even though the next year saw subscriptions drop to 2000, this figure was unparalleled for the time. Ten years after its inception, the number of subscribers had fallen by another 500 or so, with a steady decline thereafter to 800 by 1798. Not until the Romantic age, however, when Wieland redirected his editorial interests, did the TM come to an irreversible end (Sengle).

In spite of the journal’s popular success in the early years, many among the German intelligentsia of the late 18th century were sorely disappointed by the TM’s lack of commitment to criticism, one of the two or three most significant areas of interest during the period. Wieland’s failure to persevere with criticism—despite the promises to his initial subscribers—is explained by some of his later commentators as stemming from faintheartedness in the face of a possible public withdrawal of support for the journal, not least from his disinclination to assume the role of critic in the first place. Compounding this lack of full dedication was the editor's often annoying practice of deleting or otherwise altering material from his contributors that he thought either harshly critical, offensive, or beyond the competence of his subscribers. While this practice was inconsonant with the originally announced intention to include a section entitled "Umständliche Beurteilung neuer Bücher" (Detailed criticism of new books), the journal did sometimes offer true and decisive literary criticism in the late 1770s, especially during Johann Heinrich "Mephistopheles" Merck's tenure as coeditor. Moreover, while it is perhaps a moot point whether Kant's revolutionary epistemology and writings on aesthetics would have found extensive commentary in the TM without the spur of K.L.Reinhold, Wieland's son-in-law and Kant enthusiast, there is little doubt on the editor's part that philosophical contributions which might tax the patience of the general audience had to be handled with circumspection. Prudence was also exercised with contributions in the areas of political philosophy, including those from prominent statesmen of the time—and for essentially the same reason: the disinclination to publish something that might be construed as unfair partisanship. This policy of noncommittal neutrality was to change, at times drastically, during the era of the French Revolution. Even so, articles on such subjects as art history and musicology, Shakespeare, theoretical physics and chemistry, archaeology, and orientalism found good representation in the journal (Thomas Starnes, 1994).

Wieland's interest in the French Revolution was prepared long beforehand by his general preoccupation with matters French. Indeed, as Sengle has pointed out, Wieland propagandized throughout the history of the TM for France as the best model for the Germans to follow in their efforts to achieve a higher civilization. The French, he argued, simply had the most modern and most exemplary of those European cultures that were based on classical antiquity. In fact, he enthusiastically opened the pages of his journal to French affairs in the decade of the 1780s, publishing, for example, a series of essays on French women writers, and several articles on balloon flight in France (especially by the brothers Montgolfier). During the 1790s the TM stood out among the periodicals of the age in placing the French Revolution center stage in reports and observations. Moreover, Wieland's journal offered the most percipient and intelligible commentary among popular and widely-read German periodicals. Indeed, Wieland's own contributions on the questions raging around that event—e.g. democracy vs. monarchy; how the Germans should react to the Revolution; what would be its upshot—constitute by far the most important and interesting matter in the TM during the 1790s. They were also among Wieland's own most forthright and lasting contributions to the essay genre: for example, his acceptance of only one part (fraternité) of the Revolutionary triadic slogan, and his famous Napoleon prophecy (McCarthy, 1979). However, he eventually felt himself incapable of comprehending the events sweeping over his old European order, and finally turned away from French affairs to devote himself to the translation of works from classical antiquity, and with that the establishment, in 1796, of another journal, the Attisches Museum (Attic museum).

Though Hans Wahl (1914)—as Sengle maintains—has made a sincere effort to show that the TM was a well-integrated whole during most of its existence, the journal was, nonetheless, not “the development of a program of a living idea, and displayed rather a constantly changing relationship between the publisher and his age.” In tracing its history, Sengle notes that the first three years were relatively balanced, with the editor even attempting to fulfill his responsibility as critic, though ironically and with stiff resistance to the clamorous demands and challenges of the Storm and Stress poets. In the second half of the 1770s, the journal was stamped primarily by Merck’s literary criticism, Wieland’s essayistic ruminations on the nature of art, and the inclusion (usually in serial form) of his own poetry and literary works such as the romance tale Oberon (1780). The 1780s witnessed something of an ebb tide, with criticism giving way to all manner of popular subjects (e.g. divination, magnetism, travelogues, magic); this preoccupation is countered only somewhat by Johann Gottfried Herder’s brief appearance as contributor in 1781–82. Beginning c. 1783, in his fifties, Wieland fell into a profound resignation concerning both his literary career generally and the fortunes of the TM specifically. As noted, the French Revolution revived him. In the second half of the 1790s, however, he began more and more to leave the direction of his journalistic enterprise to others, notably F.J.Bertuch, a Weimar publisher and writer, and K.A.Böttiger, antiquarian director of the Weimar Gymnasium and later head of the Dresden Museum. One of the most notable contributions during the final years of the periodical was Wieland’s essay on euthanasia (1805). The journal appeared for the last time in 1810.

Ultimately the TM’s importance inheres essentially in its longevity as a vehicle for the spread of popular culture, for the many important essays that Wieland himself contributed, and for its list of supporting contributors and coeditors (among them Goethe and Schiller, Herder, the Schlegel brothers, Reinhold, Ludwig Gleim, Merck, and Novalis). Goethe noted in 1825, long after the journal’s demise, that “all the upper classes owe their style and taste to Wieland” (McCarthy, 1979). While the journal began in large part as a commercial enterprise, it provided a valuable service for the general reading public in German-speaking lands in bringing that public to a greater awareness of the world outside the limited perspective of strictly German experience. Perhaps more important than any particular contribution made by the editor himself was the pervasive spirit of curiosity, openness, and toleration which he consistently and fervently tried to inculcate in his audience. Always dominant in his mind as editor and writer was the need to spur his readers to intelligent thought and discussion. In opening his journal to virtually all areas of popular interest, and even frequently—in spite of his misapprehensions as an entrepreneur—to controversial political questions and philosophical subjects, he most of all strove to educate his fellow Germans to a citizenship as true Europeans.

ROBERT V.SMYTHE

Further Reading

- Jørgensen, S.-A., H.Jaumann, John A.McCarthy, and H.Thomé, Christoph Martin Wieland: Epoche, Werk, Wirkung, Munich: Beck, 1994
- Kurtz, A.W., C.M.Wieland and the “Teutscher Merkur” (dissertation), College Park: University of Maryland, 1956

- McCarthy, John A., Christoph Martin Wieland, Boston: Twayne, 1979
- McCarthy, John A., "The Poet as Journalist and Essayist: Chr. M. Wieland, Part One—A Descriptive Account," Jahrbuch für internationale Germanistik 12, no. 1 (1980):104–38
- Miquet, Claude, C.M. Wieland: Directeur du "Mercure Allemand", 1773–89, Berne and New York: Lang, 1990
- Schulze, Volker, "Der Teutsche Merkur (1773–1810)," in Deutsche Zeitschriften des 17. bis 20. Jahrhunderts, edited by Heinz-Dietrich Fischer, Pullach: Dokumentation, 1973
- Sengle, Friedrich, Wieland, Stuttgart: Metzler, 1949
- Starnes, Thomas C., Der Teutsche Merkur: Ein Repertorium, Sigmaringen: Thorbecke, 1994
- Wahl, Hans, Geschichte des Teutschen Merkur, Berlin: Mayer & Müller, 1914
- Wieland, Christoph Martin, Wieland's Werke, edited by Heinrich Düntzer, Berlin: Hempel, 1879

Thackeray, William Makepeace

British, 1811–1863

William Makepeace Thackeray's career as an essayist spanned 30 years and can be divided into two eras: early (1833–47) and late (1860–63), with an interval (1847–60) in which his novels (beginning with Vanity Fair), took precedence. George Saintsbury (1931), one of the few commentators who gives as much space to Thackeray's essays as to his novels, rates his last collection, Roundabout Papers (1863), as one of the best of the 19th century. Exactly which is Thackeray's first publication has never been definitively determined. Leaving Cambridge without graduating and the law without articling, he had fallen into casual journalism as a means of supporting his apprenticeship to the fine arts in Paris during the mid-1830s. Ultimately it was his essayistic loiterings with "the Fraserians" that brought him a living. In Fraser's Magazine, the most high-spirited magazine of the day, he published his first famous satiric series, The Yellowplush Correspondence (1837–38). Yellowplush's purlieus are those of fashionable Regency London below-stairs, rather like Vanity Fair misspelled. This is not the poverty of Dickens' London slums but rather the straits of those who, like Defoe's heroes, fall in and out of credit. Fraser's, with its abusive and boisterous severity, was the special vehicle of this satiric voice. Leslie Stephen in the Dictionary of National Biography bemoans this "practice common to the literary class of the time," known as "personality." The 1830s "personality" dates much of Thackeray's first decade as a writer, and because of this rowdy element, his writing from this time is not what later readers think of as the familiar essay along the lines of Addison and Steele.

Thackeray reprinted some of this 1830s journalism as two volumes of Comic Tales and Sketches "edited and illustrated by Michael Angelo Titmarsh" (1841). He used the same pseudonym for the tourist narrator of The Paris Sketch Book (1840). What is confusing is that "Titmarsh" becomes the voice for both Thackeray's essays and fiction. He is the author of The Second Funeral of Napoleon (1841) and The Chronicle of the Drum (1841), The Irish Sketch-Book (1843), Notes of a Journey from Cornhill to Grand Cairo (1846), and two longer narratives, Mrs. Perkins's Ball (1847) and Our Street (1848). Thackeray used other pseudonyms as well—Ikey Solomons, Our Fat Contributor, Jeames de la Pluche—and in these narratives, satire emerges as much from the burlesque voices of the characters as from the stories they tell. This is what makes it difficult to say sometimes what genre Thackeray is working in. Eventually Titmarsh was to step aside, and Thackeray and his “Pen and Pencil Sketches of English Society” finally took center stage in Vanity Fair (1847–48), with this and the novel Pendennis (1849–50) representing the apogee of Thackeray’s journalistic career. The Book of Snobs, first published in Punch as “The Snobs of England, by One of Themselves” (1846–47)—with its “University Snobs,” “Dining-out Snobs,” and snobs of the literary, military, clerical, and aristocratic kinds—was but a prelude to his sketches of English society in Vanity Fair. After Vanity Fair, the fiction work The History of Samuel Titmarsh and the Great Hoggarty Diamond (1849) is advertised as being by “W.M.Thackeray, Author of ‘Pendennis,’ ‘Vanity Fair,’ &c.” Thus the pseudonym of the journalist is used alongside the real-life identity of the author—which is finally seen to be that of the novelist.

The English Humourists of the Eighteenth Century (1853) follows naturally from the novel Henry Esmond (1852). Standing alone, the lectures from the English Humourists series are more satisfactory as essays than the Titmarsh spoofs, which require the context of the pages of the Fraser’s club of the 1830s to achieve their effect. The parodies, too, in Punch’s Prize Novelists (1853) of Ainsworth, Disraeli, Bulwer, and others lose their point when detached from the 1840s.

Thackeray is calculated to have written 380 pieces for Punch alone during the years between 1842 and 1851. However, in the early 1860s, his name is most associated with the Cornhill Magazine, of which he was the first editor; its covers were the same yellow as his novels. His lecture series The Four Georges was first printed in a periodical format in the Cornhill (July–October 1860) as “Sketches of Manners, Morals, Court, and Town Life,” then as a book later that year. Meanwhile, in between the novels The Newcomes (1853–55) and The Virginians (1858–59), his publishers put together four volumes of Miscellanies: Prose and Verse (1855–57). After The Four Georges, the next and final collection of Thackeray’s papers in his lifetime was Roundabout Papers (1863), a reprint of his essays from the Cornhill. Leslie Stephen’s characterization of the Cornhill essays may stand as a description of Thackeray’s essay writing at its best: “They are models of the essay which, without aiming at profundity, gives the charm of playful and tender conversation of a great writer.” As an essayist for the six-shilling magazine market of the 1830s, Thackeray acted out the role of the fashionable young Regency buck; presiding over the editorship of a new-style shilling magazine in the 1860s, he protected his readers’ domestic sensibilities from those Regency adventures with the watchful eye of the Victorian paterfamilias.

KATHRYN CHITTICK

Biography

Born 18 July 1811 in Calcutta. Sent to England, 1817. Studied at the Charterhouse, London, 1822–28; Trinity College, Cambridge, 1829–30; studied law at Middle Temple, London, 1831–32. Traveled in Europe and visited Goethe in Weimar, 1831–32. Owner and editor, National Standard, London, 1833–34. Lived in Paris, and studied painting, 1834–37. Married Isabella Gethin Shawe, 1836 (declared insane, 1840, and confined from 1842): three daughters (one died in infancy). Paris correspondent for London Constitutional, 1836–37; contributor to many magazines and newspapers, including the Times and Fraser's Magazine, from 1837, and Punch, 1842–54; reviewer for the Morning Chronicle, mid– 1840s. Lecturer on English humorists and on Hanoverian monarchs, in Britain and the United States, 1851–57. Editor, Cornhill Magazine, London, 1859–62. Died in Kensington, London, 24 December 1863.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

The Yellowplush Correspondence, 1838

An Essay on the Genius of George Cruikshank, 1840

The Paris Sketch Book, 2 vols., 1840

Comic Tales and Sketches, 2 vols., 1841

The Irish Sketch-Book, 2 vols., 1843

Notes of a Journey from Cornhill to Grand Cairo, 1846

The Book of Snobs, 1848; complete edition, 1852; edited by John Sutherland, 1978

Miscellanies: Prose and Verse, 2 vols., 1849–51

Punch's Prize Novelists, The Fat Contributor, and Travels in London, 1853

The English Humourists of the Eighteenth Century: A Series of Lectures, 1853; revised edition, 1853

Miscellanies: Prose and Verse, 4 vols., 1855–57

The Four Georges: Sketches of Manners, Morals, Court, and Town Life, 1860

Roundabout Papers, 1863

Early and Late Papers, edited by J.T.Fields, 1867

The Orphan of Pimlico and Other Sketches, Fragments and Drawings, 1876

Loose Sketches, An Eastern Adventure, 1894

The Hitherto Unidentified Contributions to Punch, edited by M.H. Spielmann, 1899

Writings in the National Standard and the Constitutional, edited by Walter Thomas Spencer, 1899

Stray Papers: Being Stories, Reviews, Verses, and Sketches 1821–47 [sic: should be 1829], edited by Lewis Melville, 1901

The New Sketch Book, Being Essays from the Foreign Quarterly Review, edited by R.S.Garnett, 1906

Contributions to the Morning Chronicle, edited by Gordon N.Ray, 1955

Drawn from Life: The Journalism, edited by Margaret Forster, 1984

Other writings: many novels (including Vanity Fair, 1847–48; Pendennis, 1849–50; Henry Esmond, 1852; Barry Lyndon, 1852–53; The Newcomes, 1853–55; The Virginians, 1858–59), books of drawings, and correspondence.

Collected works editions: The Oxford Thackeray, edited by George Saintsbury, 17 vols., 1908; Works, edited by Peter L.Shillingsburg, 1989–(in progress).

Bibliographies

- Flamm, Dudley, Thackeray's Critics: An Annotated Bibliography of British and American Criticism, 1836–1901, Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1967
- Goldfarb, Sheldon, Thackeray: An Annotated Bibliography, 1976–1987, New York: Garland, 1989
- Olmsted, John C., Thackeray and His Twentieth-century Critics: An Annotated Bibliography, 1900–1975, New York: Garland, 1977

Further Reading

- Eddy, Spencer L., The Founding of the Cornhill Magazine, Muncie, Indiana: Ball State University Press, 1970
- Ferris, Ina, William Makepeace Thackeray, Boston: Twayne, 1983
- Harden, Edgar F., "The Writing and Publication of Thackeray's English Humourists," Papers of the Bibliographical Society of America 76, no. 7 (1982):197–207
- Kiely, Robert, "Victorian Harlequin: The Function of Humor in Thackeray's Critical and Miscellaneous Prose," in William Makepeace Thackeray: Critical Views, edited by Harold Bloom, New York: Chelsea House, 1987
- Monsarrat, Ann, An Uneasy Victorian: Thackeray the Man, 1811–1863, London: Cassell, 1980
- Oram, Richard W., "'Just a little turn of the circle': Time, Memory, and Repetition in Thackeray's Roundabout Papers," in William Makepeace Thackeray: Critical Views, edited by Harold Bloom, New York: Chelsea House, 1987
- Pantuckova, Lidmila, W.M.Thackeray as a Critic of Literature, Brno: Purkyne University Press, 1972
- Ray, Gordon N., Thackeray, London: Oxford University Press, and New York: McGraw Hill, 2 vols., 1955–58
- Saintsbury, George, A Consideration of Thackeray, New York: Russell and Russell, 1968 (original edition, 1931)
- Segel, Elizabeth, "Thackeray's Journalism: Apprenticeship for Writer and Reader," Victorian Newsletter 57 (Spring 1980):23–27

Thibaudet, Albert

French, 1874–1936

When Albert Thibaudet died in 1936, he left unfinished his most important work, the Histoire de la littérature française de 1789 à nos jours (French Literature from 1795 to Our Era), posthumously published in the year of his death. It was innovative in treating authors strictly according to generations rather than slotting them into genres or movements. Thibaudet's agrégation was in geography, and his initial training continued to color his later literary criticism, which was to remain dependent on an awareness, unusual for his time, of the way in which imaginative literature and literary criticism were rooted in the place, date, and circumstances of their composition. Thibaudet taught at a number of lycées before becoming professor of French literature at Geneva. Most of his essays and reviews, subsequently gathered as Réflexions on literature, on the novel, and on literary criticism, were first published in the Nouvelle Revue Française (New French review).

Thibaudet first became prominent with La Poésie de Stéphane Mallarmé (1912). This book was followed by one on Flaubert in 1912, which is still regarded as a standard work; Thibaudet went on to publish essays on Valéry, Fromentin, Amiel, Verlaine, and Rimbaud in 1923 and 1924, and a book on Stendhal in 1931. In the context of his contribution to the essay form, his most important work is the set of six lectures delivered in 1922, at the Theatre du Vieux-Colombier, subsequently published separately in a series of journals before being collected into a single volume and published in 1930 as Physiologie de la critique (Physiology of criticism). They are an important landmark in the development of the essay not only on account of their own form, but also for what they say about the nature of the critical essay.

Formally, Thibaudet's critical essays pick up where those of Sainte-Beuve left off, developing Sainte-Beuve's journalistic impressionism by adding academic structure and rigor. Thibaudet regarded la critique, by which he means literary criticism as a genre produced by a body of professional specialists, as a 19th-century creation which he assumed had not yet, in 1922, reached the peaks of which it was capable. Thibaudet felt that the literary-critical essay was a genre gestated by the post-revolutionary emergence in France of a properly professional academic body no longer nurtured and subsequently controlled by the church. Its inaugurators had been the generation of professors around 1830, François Guizot, Victor Cousin, and Abel-François Villemain, abetted by the newly emergent body of professional journalists, whose precursors and models had been the 18th-century writers Voltaire and Diderot in their roles as pamphleteers. Academic criticism was exemplified for Thibaudet by Désiré Nisard, director of the École Normale Supérieure from 1857 to 1867, while the journalistic literary-critical essay had originally been developed by Sainte-Beuve, only subsequently adopted as the object of an academic cult.

The literary-critical essay for Thibaudet was necessarily historical, "cutting a section in a slice of duration," and could be bred only from the interaction of opposing coexistent attitudes. At least in Thibaudet's mind, the dual academic and journalistic parentage of literary criticism made the essay its appropriate form. His own criticism is at its best when expressed in essay form, partly because the chronological dimension which he considers essential forces the critic to limit the content of a piece to precisely defined individual points if criticism is not to degenerate into survey.

Thibaudet's individual essays on criticism are limited to a single point of view often applied to more than one author or critic and invariably contextualized historically. They do not eschew harshness toward such predecessors as Émile Faguet, Jules Lemaître, and Ferdinand Brunetière, but are often deeply perceptive in their understanding of great authors, like Montaigne, and frequently cogent in the analysis of such complex matters as the nature of historical criticism and the inevitability of changes in evolving attitudes toward the past. Nonetheless, they are kept conversational in tone.

Thibaudet himself draws attention to his tone, sometimes flagrant in its irony. He also makes it plain by employing a register of language which is sometimes provocatively colloquial. His model is Montaigne, whose Essais he notes are the work of someone who, having early lost “the only friend with whom he could really converse”—referring to Montaigne’s close friendship with Étienne de La Boétie—had to write about “everything and nothing, and above all about himself” to free himself from the tensions imposed by his environment and his way of life. From Montaigne’s one-sided conversation, with the reader as interlocutor, derived an early example of what Thibaudet regarded as model criticism. It is true that Essais does not mean “essays,” but something like experiments or attempts. However, there is in Thibaudet’s mind an equation, apparent in the text of the Physiologie de la critique, between criticism, the essay genre, and a conversational tone. Thibaudet’s contribution to the literary-critical essay is precisely to insist on its conversational tone and sinuosity of approach on the model of Montaigne, as it cuts and labels its historical section through the troughs as well as the peaks of literature.

ANTHONY LEVI

Biography

Born 1 April 1874 in Tournus, Burgundy. Studied at the Lycée Henri IV, Paris, where he was taught by Henri Bergson, agrégation in history and geography; University of Dijon, licence in philosophy, 1894. Traveled to Greece, 1902–03. Taught French at the Universities of York and Uppsala; chair in French literature, University of Geneva, 1924–36. Contributor, Nouvelle Revue Française, 1911–36. Died in Geneva, 16 April 1936.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Le Liseur des romans, 1925

Physiologie de la critique, 1930

Réflexions sur le roman, 1938

Réflexions sur la littérature, 2 vols., 1938–40

Réflexions sur la critique, 1939

Other writings: a book on Bergsonism (1923), Histoire de la littérature française de 1789 à nos jours (1936; French Literature from 1795 to Our Era), works on Montaigne, Mallarmé, Flaubert, Valéry, Stendhal, and other writers, and a sociological study of French intellectuals. Also edited editions of works by Flaubert and Montaigne.

Further Reading

Davies, John C, L'Œuvre critique d'Albert Thibaudet, Geneva: Droz, and Lille: Giard, 1955

Devaud, Marcel, Albert Thibaudet: Critique de la poésie et des poètes, Fribourg: Éditions

Universitaires, 1967

Glauser, Alfred, Albert Thibaudet et la critique créatrice, Paris: Boivin, 1952

Nouvelle Revue Française issue on Thibaudet (July 1936)

O'Neill, James, The Critical Ideas of Albert Thibaudet (dissertation), Ann Arbor: University of Michigan, 1942.

Thomas, Lewis

American, 1913–1993

Lewis Thomas, biologist and physician, won a literary reputation with The Lives of a Cell: Notes of a Biology Watcher, a collection of essays which received the National Book Award in 1974. He followed this with five more essay collections, The Medusa and the Snail (1979), Late Night Thoughts on Listening to Mahler's Ninth Symphony (1983), The Youngest Science: Notes of a Medicine-Watcher (1983), Et Cetera, Et Cetera: Notes of a Word-Watcher (1990), and The Fragile Spedes (1992). His essays began appearing monthly in the New England Journal of Medicine in 1971, each with an allotted length of about 1000 words. It was at the suggestion of Joyce Carol Oates that he first collected and published some of these in one volume. His essays subsequently came out in the New York Review of Books and other journals and magazines.

Thomas' essays are the musings of a medical expert at ease. Shrewd and technical on the one hand, graceful and humanistic on the other, they read like a busman's holiday: at the end of the day's work, the scientist relaxes in his den and reflects—not as a professional, but as an ordinary citizen. Each essay relies on his special knowledge of biology and the medical profession, and ranges philosophically—now whimsically, now critically, sometimes grimly—over issues confronting an educated person in the second half of the 20th century. The human need for society, the fragility and the resiliency of life, the bomb, the abuse of drugs, the healthcare system, personal identity, national defense, the possibility of life on other planets, and dying—these are among the many issues he explores. His optimism is seasoned in his essays by a Yankee practicality. He criticizes defense spending and offers down-to-earth reasons for funding pure research. He excoriates the notion of acceptable losses in a nuclear war and soberly counts the social and personal costs of heroin addiction.

Underlying all these issues, Thomas' major theme is the unity of life. Individuality is an affectation or an illusion: human beings are not so much individuals as collections of autonomous life forms and, on a larger scale, participants in a huge life mass—unplanned, perhaps, but nevertheless orderly. Thomas' wonder at the natural world echoes that of Loren Eiseley.

Thomas' style is readable and charming. He brings to his craft a love of language and a gift for artfully reducing formidable technical concepts to everyday conversation. He can substitute a common expression for a technical term with such a touch of the poetic that the new expression not only translates, but domesticates. In "On Societies as Organisms" (1971), for example, he explains that a few termites together behave randomly, but a larger number coordinate their efforts: “As more join in, they seem to reach a critical mass, a quorum ...” To describe the isolation of single cells before they reach this critical mass, he again makes the arcane familiar: “At first they are single amebocytes swimming around, eating bacteria, aloof from each other, untouched, voting straight Republican.” The folksy reference activates a whole neighborhood of recognizable images, allowing the reader to feel at home and at ease with a technical concept.

Literary allusions dot his essays. In “Vibes” (1972), questioning how a life form attains a unique identity, he punctuates a chemical analysis with a droll allusion to Shakespeare: “any set of atoms, if arranged in precisely the same configuration, by whatever chemical name, might smell as sweet.” Such allusions soften the edges of Thomas’ expertise. In a longer passage, too, Thomas may introduce an exotic term and gradually make it not only understandable, but as homely as one’s own backyard. This is the lead paragraph of “A Fear of Pheromones” (1972):

What are we going to do if it turns out that we have pheromones? What on earth would we be doing with such things? With the richness of speech, and all our new devices for communication, why would we want to release odors into the air to convey information about anything? We can send notes, telephone, whisper cryptic invitations, announce the giving of parties, even bounce words off the moon and make them carom around the planets. Why a gas, or droplets of moisture made to be deposited on fence posts?

This merging of the technical with the commonplace is typical of Thomas’ witty, urbane style and emblematic of his vision of universal harmony.

A lover not only of words, but also of music, Thomas makes one of his most charming assertions, again uniting the worlds of the scientific and the humane, in “Ceti” (1972), when he considers what message humankind might best broadcast into outer space to identify ourselves to possible other life forms: “I would vote for Bach, all of Bach, streamed out into space, over and over again. We would be bragging, of course, but it is surely excusable for us to put the best possible face on at the beginning of such an acquaintance.”

Thomas’ style often recalls that of Montaigne, whom he cites along with 17th-century literary lights. Like theirs, his writing is aphoristic (“Language is what childhood is for”) and, despite his scientific and political sophistication, he always sounds like an amateur, a curious mind flying by the seat of its pants.

WILLIAM ZEIGER

See also Medical Essay; Science Essay

Biography

Born 25 November 1913 in Flushing, New York. Studied at Princeton University, New Jersey, B.S., 1933; Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, M.D., 1937. Intern, 1937–39, and fellow, 1941–42, Boston City Hospital; resident in neurology, Neurological Institute, New York, 1939–41. Married Beryl Dawson, 1941: three daughters. Served in the U.S. Naval Reserve, 1941–46. Visiting investigator, Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research, 1942–46; taught pediatrics, medicine, and/or pathology at Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, 1946–48, Tulane University, New Orleans, 1948–50, University of Minnesota, Minneapolis, 1950–54, New York University, 1954–69, Yale University, New Haven, Connecticut, 1969–73, and Cornell School of Medicine, New York, 1973–93; president and chief executive officer, 1973–80, and chancellor, 1980–83, Memorial Sloan-Kettering Cancer Center, New York. Also worked at or attached to various hospitals. Contributor to many journals and magazines, including Science, Saturday Review of Science, and Nature; columnist of “Notes of a Biology Watcher” in the New England Journal of Medicine, from 1971. Member, American Academy and Institute of Arts and Letters, 1984. Awards: many, including the National Book Award, for The Lives of a Cell, 1974; Modern Medicine Distinguished Achievement Award, 1975; American Academy and Institute of Arts and Letters Award, 1980; American Book Award, for Medusa and the Snail, 1981; Association of American Physicians Kober Medal, 1983; American Association of Pathologists Gold Headed Cane Award, 1988; Albert Lasker Public Service Award, 1989; New York Academy of Science John Stearns Award for Lifetime Achievement, 1991; honorary degrees from eight universities and colleges. Died (of Waldenström’s Disease) in New York, 3 December 1993.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

The Lives of a Cell: Notes of a Biology Watcher, 1974

The Medusa and the Snail: More Notes of a Biology Watcher, 1979

Late Night Thoughts on Listening to Mahler’s Ninth Symphony, 1983

The Youngest Science: Notes of a Medicine-Watcher, 1983

The Wonderful Mistake: Notes of a Biology Watcher (includes The Lives of a Cell and The Medusa and the Snail), 1988

Et Cetera, Et Cetera: Notes of a Word-Watcher, 1990

A Long Line of Cells: Collected Essays, 1990

The Fragile Species, 1992

Further Reading

Gould, Stephen Jay, “Calling Dr. Thomas,” in his An Urchin in the Storm: Essays About Books and Ideas, New York: Norton, and London: Penguin, 1987

Medawar, Peter, The Threat and the Glory: Reflections on Science and Scientists, edited by David Pyke, Oxford: Oxford University Press, and New York: HarperCollins, 1990

Nemerov, Howard, “Lewis Thomas, Montaigne, and Human Happiness,” in his New and Selected Essays, Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1985

Oates, Joyce Carol, “Beyond Common Sense,” New York Times Book Review, 26 May 1974:8–9

Rosenblatt, Roger, “Lewis Thomas,” New York Times Magazine, 21 November 1993:50–53

Shiring, Joan, “Recommended: Lewis Thomas,” English Journal (December 1984):55–

Zinsser, William, editor, Inventing the Truth: The Art and Craft of Memoir. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, revised, enlarged edition, 1995 (original edition, 1987)

Thoreau, Henry David

American, 1817–1862

Henry David Thoreau, best known to modern readers for Walden (1854), was better known to his contemporaries as a political activist and naturalist whose essays were often outgrowths of his public lectures. Modern readers have the advantage of access to his journals, which also shed light on his development as an essayist. The journals, in a wooden box made by Thoreau, are stored in the J.Pierpont Morgan Library, and reveal the seeds of all of his published essays.

The essay was Thoreau's primary genre. Even Walden and A Week on the Concord and Merrimack Rivers (1849) include separately composed essays inserted within the narrative. His posthumously published The Maine Woods (1864) and Cape Cod (1865) are likewise essays stitched together to form book-length studies. His early training as an essayist began at Harvard in the rhetoric classes of Edward Tyrrel Channing. Twenty-three essays and the text of six speeches submitted to Channing survive, ranging in subject from the joys of wandering in the woods to an attempt at defining moral excellence, subjects that would continue to interest Thoreau.

Three general subjects provide the focus for most of Thoreau's essays: a scientifically precise examination of nature; the relationship between government and individual citizens; and the joy of traveling, particularly by foot or canoe. There are occasional forays into other areas, such as his appreciative examination of "Thomas Carlyle and His Works" (1847), or his matrimonial advice to his friend H.G.O.Blake in "Love" (1865) and "Chastity and Sensuality" (1865). But nature, individual freedom and responsibility, and the joy of perambulation remain his focal points. In the longer works, Thoreau often addresses all three.

Nature provided the subject for his first published essay, "Natural History of Massachusetts" (1842), ostensibly a book review of a study of the flora and fauna of the state. Only the last five paragraphs of the essay actually deal with the study under review, the rest of the essay being Thoreau's own observations. He includes poetry, describes the Merrimack River, and discusses the best technique for spear-fishing, among other diverse subjects, concluding that the study he is reviewing lacks detail and accuracy.

Thoreau's fascination with his natural surroundings is reflected in many of his essays dealing primarily with other subjects. Toward the end of his life he returned to examining the woods and wildlife around Concord. "The Succession of Forest Trees" (1860) explains why an oak forest grows up whenever a pine forest is cut down, and that a pine forest will return when the hardwoods are cut. His theories, based on his own observations while wandering around Concord, and contradicting theories of the time, would be proven correct by researchers nearly a century later. He rhapsodizes about the colors of Fall foliage in “Autumnal Tints” (1862), the variations found in “Wild Apples” (1862), and the tranquillity found in “Night and Moonlight” (1863), the last essay left unrevised for publication when Thoreau died. “Autumnal Tints” began as art work. Thoreau intended to trace a leaf from various hardwoods growing around Concord. He would then paint each tracery with the tints he observed in the Fall. Discovering the process to be slow and tedious, he decided to paint the leaves with words.

Thoreau was also noted by his contemporaries for his speeches and essays concerning the relationship between an individual and the demands of government. The Mexican War and the institution of slavery precipitated “Resistance to Civil Government” (1849), often reprinted with the title “Civil Disobedience.” The war ended before the publication of the essay, but Thoreau left in the references to imperialism because, for him, they represent a type of misgoverning that calls for resistance. He recommends disobeying unjust laws, and then drawing attention to the injustice by accepting the punishment. Honest citizens, seeing someone punished unjustly, would then be motivated to change the laws. Thoreau’s concept of passive resistance to injustice later inspired Mahatma Gandhi and Martin Luther King, Jr. among other activists.

The issue of slavery precipitated other essays as well. Thoreau argues in “Slavery in Massachusetts” (1854) that local abolitionists were misguided when they condemned slavery in the South while living in and paying taxes to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts where the Fugitive Slave Act was being enforced, returning escaped slaves to their owners. Most controversial, though, are his three essays supporting and defending John Brown’s raid on the armory at Harper’s Ferry in an attempt to provide arms and impetus for a slave rebellion. No uprising occurred, and the fighting led to the deaths not only of several of Brown’s followers, but also of U.S. Marines and innocent civilians, including a free Negro living in the town. Many readers have pointed out that Thoreau’s defense of Brown appears to contradict his earlier advocacy of passive resistance. Thoreau apparently felt no contradiction, arguing that separating slaves from slaveholders through force was a form of self-defense for people unable to protect themselves. In “A Plea for Captain John Brown” (1860), delivered as a speech three times before publication, Thoreau defends Brown as a man living by principle rather than by public opinion. Brown’s unyielding commitment to a personal ideal is apparently the trait that motivated Thoreau’s admiration. He continues that much of the harsh public reaction was the result of hypocritical coverage by the newspapers, which called for an end to slavery but then objected to direct means of achieving that end. The essays “Martyrdom of John Brown” (1860) and “The Last Days of John Brown” (1860) were also aimed at swaying public opinion, the latter essay primarily a eulogy following Brown’s execution.

Thoreau’s final essay, “Life Without Principle” (1863), published posthumously, returns to a less immediate but more enduring vision of how individuals must resist conformity, rejecting conventional wisdom in order to search for truth. He warns that working for money alone will never bring happiness, and advocates following pursuits that are selfimproving, using the gold rushes in California and Australia to illustrate the mindless pursuit of wealth. He attacks his contemporaries’ fascination with news and gossip, suggesting that this compulsion masks an inner vacuum. Thoreau argues that taking an interest in one’s own life eliminates the need to live vicariously through gossip. His attempt to separate himself from society and find “higher laws” through self-awareness is recounted in Walden, and his final essay quietly demands that others follow this example.

A third area that drew Thoreau's attention was leisure traveling. For him, travel and sightseeing were synonymous, the goal generally much less significant than the path. His essays "A Walk to Wachusett" (1843), "A Winter Walk" (1843), and "Walking" (1862.) all deal with his favorite means of locomotion and his favorite area, the countryside around Concord. Carefully observed natural details fill the essays. In "Walking" Thoreau notes that thinking about anything other than your immediate surroundings as you walk defeats the purpose of the exercise, adding that a minimum of four hours walking was a daily requirement for his physical and emotional health.

Thoreau's posthumous longer works describing his travels resulted from editors tying several essays together. The Maine Woods, Cape Cod, and A Yankee in Canada (1866) were compiled in this manner. The first two sections of The Maine Woods were published earlier, "Ktaadn and the Maine Woods" in Union Magazine (1848), and "Chesuncook" in the Atlantic Monthly (1858). He was revising "The Allegash and the East Branch" when he died. The three essays describe three separate camping trips into the Maine woods, noting how this area was changing as the woods were cut to provide farmland. Sophia Thoreau, his sister, and Ellery Channing, a close friend, made the decision to combine the two previously published essays with the unfinished essay as a single volume. They made the same decision concerning three related essays dealing with three separate visits to Cape Cod. The first three of the five essays that make up A Yankee in Canada were published in Putnam's Magazine in 1853. When the editor, George William Curtis, changed parts of the essays without Thoreau's consent, the author refused to provide the final two essays.

The travel essays and nature essays combine prose and poetry. Thoreau often quoted Shakespeare, Milton, Wordsworth, and other English poets, but more often, the poetry was Thoreau's own. The political writing, polemical in tone and intent, only occasionally includes verse. Allusions to other works, including Hindu writings and works by his fellow transcendentalists, are frequent. Latin phrases and quotations are generally followed by Thoreau's translation.

In "Walking" Thoreau attempts to explain the derivation of "sauntering," suggesting that the word comes either from beggars claiming they needed alms to go to the Holy Land, Sainte Terre, or from sans terre, people who wandered because they were without land. In any case, sauntering is an apt description for the organization of most of Thoreau's essays. Occasionally he attempts to impose an order on his thoughts. In "A Winter Walk" he divides the essay into sections corresponding to the different parts of the day on which the walk occurred. The second halves of "Wild Apples" and "Autumnal Tints" are divided by types of trees, but no true pattern is imposed throughout these essays. Thoreau liked to allow his thoughts to saunter, and his pen followed behind, recording, adjusting, and adding commentary. This style is a reflection of his journal, where the primary pattern is simply chronological; he recorded his thoughts as they came to him, each thought provoked by an earlier experience or expression, and leading into whichever new direction seemed, at the moment, to be promising. His essays were carefully, and often significantly revised, but this meandering organization usually remained.

In “Thomas Carlyle and His Works” (1847) Thoreau laments that too many readers treat Carlyle’s thoughts with such seriousness that they miss his humor. The same might be said for Thoreau’s readers, though the Concord writer’s style is more accessible. With the exception of the John Brown essays, Thoreau’s wry sense of humor permeates his writing, through the use of wordplay, understatement, and mild ironies. In Cape Cod, for example, he notes that stages, in order to cross the sand, had tires five inches wide: “The more tired the wheels, the less tired the horses.” Thoreau describes in The Maine Woods attempting to discover if moose shed their antlers annually. The only antlers he found, though, had “a head attached to them, and I knew they did not shed their heads more than once in their lives.” In “The Succession of Forest Trees” he notes that he has trespassed on his neighbors’ property so regularly that he could often tell them shortcuts across their property unknown to them. In A Yankee in Canada, he points out that the only thing he brought back from Canada was a cold.

Finally, his writing often relies on hyperbole. When he writes in “Resistance to Civil Government” that “any man more right than his neighbors constitutes a majority of one already,” he uses extremes to provoke thought and reaction. His journals as well as his published essays exploit this technique frequently, though as he grew older he tended more toward description and less toward dialectic.

Thoreau found the essay to be the most compatible genre for his thoughts. Even Walden, ostensibly a book-length study of a year living in the woods, contains within it several set pieces from Thoreau’s journals on subjects such as “Reading” and “The Pond in Winter.” A Week on the Concord and Merrimack Rivers has a well-known essay on friendship inserted in the description of the canoe trip. Thoreau preferred to record and test his ideas in his journal, and then carefully develop and revise them. A short form such as an essay allowed him to focus more directly, seeing his entire work through a narrower lens. Longer works could always be created by combining several shorter works. Thoreau often found poetry a compatible genre for the same reasons, but his talents were more suited to essays. Among 19th-century American essayists, only Emerson has received comparable attention. Thoreau’s published essays, combined with his multivolume journals, show a rich and detailed understanding of nature, a commitment to individual freedom and independence of thought, an optimistic evaluation of human nature, and a clarity of expression few writers can approach.

TIMOTHY J. EVANS

Biography

Born David Henry Thoreau, 12 July 1817 in Concord, Massachusetts. Studied at Concord Academy, 1828–33; Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1833–35 and 1836–37, graduated 1837. Teacher in Canton, Massachusetts, 1835–36, and at Center School, 1837 (resigned after two weeks). Contracted tuberculosis, 1835, suffering from recurring bouts throughout his life. Worked in his father’s pencil factory, 1837–38, 1844, and 1849–50. Ran Concord Academy and taught there, 1838–41; curator, 1838–43, and regular lecturer, from 1848, Concord Lyceum. Contributor, the Dial, 1840–44. Lived with Ralph Waldo Emerson, 1841–43, and with Emerson’s family, 1847; tutor to William Emerson's sons, Staten Island, New York, 1843. Lived in a cabin at Walden Pond, near Concord, 1845–47. Jailed for refusing to pay poll tax (in protest against slavery), 1846. Land surveyor, from 1848. Died in Concord, 6 May 1862.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

A Week on the Concord and Merrimack Rivers, 1849; edited by Walter Harding, 1963
 "Resistance to Civil Government," in Aesthetic Papers (journal), 1849; as "Civil Disobedience," in A Yankee in Canada, 1866; edited by Walter Harding, 1967, William Rossi, 1983, revised edition, as Resistance to Civil Government, 1992
Walden; or, Life in the Woods, 1854; edited by Walter Harding, 1968, Philip Van Doren Stern, 1970, William Rossi, 1983, revised edition, 1992, and Christopher Bigsby, 1995
Excursions, edited by Ralph Waldo Emerson, 1863
The Maine Woods, edited by Sophia E. Thoreau and William Ellery Channing, 1864; edited by Dudley C. Lunt, 1950
Cape Cod, edited by Sophia E. Thoreau and William Ellery Channing, 1865; edited by Thea Wheelright, 1971
A Yankee in Canada, with Anti-Slavery and Reform Papers, edited by Sophia E. Thoreau and William Ellery Channing, 1866
Walden, and Other Writings, edited by Joseph Wood Krutch, 1962
The Portable Thoreau, edited by Carl Bode, 1964
Thoreau's Vision: The Major Essays, edited by Charles R. Anderson, 1973
Civil Disobedience, and Other Essays, 1993
Political Writings, edited by Nancy L. Rosenblum, 1996
 Other writings: journals, poetry, and correspondence.
 Collected works editions: Complete Works (Concord Edition), edited by H.G.O. Blake, 5 vols., 1929; Writings (Princeton Edition), edited by William L. Howarth, 7 vols., 1971–93 (in progress).

Bibliographies

Borst, Raymond R., Henry David Thoreau: A Descriptive Bibliography, Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1982
 Boswell, Jeanetta, and Sarah Crouch, Thoreau and the Critics: A Checklist of Criticism 1900–1978, Metuchen, New Jersey: Scarecrow Press, 1981
 Harding, Walter, and Jean Cameron Advena, editors, A Bibliography of the Thoreau Society Bulletin Bibliographies, 1941–1969: A Cumulation and Index, Troy, New York: Whitston, 1971
 Howarth, William L., The Literary Manuscripts of Henry David Thoreau, Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1974
 Scharnhorst, Gary, Henry David Thoreau: An Annotated Bibliography of Comment and Criticism Before 1900, New York: Garland, 1992

Further Reading

- Borst, Raymond R., editor, Thoreau Log: A Documentary Life of Henry David Thoreau, 1817–1862, New York: Macmillan, 1992
- Buell, Lawrence, The Environmental Imagination: Thoreau, Nature Writing, and the Formation of American Culture, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1995
- Canby, Henry S., Thoreau, Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1939
- Harding, Walter, The Days of Henry Thoreau: A Biography, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1992 (original edition, 1965)
- Harding, Walter, “Adventures in the Thoreau Trade,” American Scholar 61 (Spring 1992): 277–89
- Harding, Walter, and Michael Meyer, The New Thoreau Handbook, New York: New York University Press, 1980
- Krutch, Joseph Wood, Henry David Thoreau, New York: Dell, 1965 (original edition, 1948)
- Leary, Lewis, “Henry David Thoreau,” in Eight American Authors, edited by James Woodress, New York: Norton, 1971
- Matthiessen, F.O., American Renaissance: Art and Expression in the Age of Emerson and Whitman, London: Oxford University Press, 1968 (original edition, 1941)
- Meyers, Michael, Several More Lives to Live: Thoreau’s Political Reputation in America, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood, 1977
- Myerson, Joel, editor, Emerson and Thoreau: The Contemporary Reviews, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1992,
- Richardson, Robert D., Jr., Henry Thoreau: A Life of the Mind, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1986
- Salt, Henry S., The Life of Henry David Thoreau, Fontwell: Centaur, 1993 (original edition, 1890)
- Sattelmeyer, Robert, Thoreau’s Reading: A Study in Intellectual History with Bibliographical Catalogue, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1988
- Sayre, Robert F., Thoreau and the American Indians, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1977
- Schofield, Edmund A., and Robert C. Baron, Thoreau’s World and Ours: A Natural Legacy, Golden, Colorado: North American Press, 1993
- Shanley, J. Lyndon, The Making of Walden, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1957

Thurber, James

American, 1894–1961

James Thurber experimented in many types of writing during his career. His journalistic contributions to the New Yorker magazine, where almost all of his best work first appeared, include several pieces concerning eccentric places and individuals of New York City for the magazine’s “Talk of the Town” section and “Where Are They Now,” a series of pieces concerning once famous individuals now little known and emphasizing the ironic contrast between great early fame and later and lengthy anonymity. In both series Thurber provides the new and odd perspective on seemingly familiar events, places, and persons that marks most of his major work. Thurber also contributed numerous essays on dogs, including such memorable sketches as "Memorial" (1942) and "Snapshot of a Dog" (1935) that offer admirable examples of how to achieve sentiment while avoiding sentimentality. Thurber's most important contributions to the essay, however, were a certain character and a certain style. Although neither was completely original with Thurber, he popularized them and became their most influential employer.

Thurber's best-known character is the Little Man beset by insignificant but impenetrable obstacles, a character introduced into American humor by Robert Benchley. Several of Thurber's early pieces, such as "The Gentleman Is Cold" (1935), in which Thurber is defeated by an overcoat which does not fit and has lost its buttons, and "My Memories of D.H.Lawrence" (1936), in which the person at the railroad station Thurber assumes to be Lawrence turns out to be George R.Hopkins, owner of a paper factory in Fitchburg, Massachusetts, are pure Benchley, whose self-mockery is more successful than Thurber's. Thurber's real success in and distinctive contribution to this area of humor derives from his attention to the Little Man's inner life, an inner life which adds the dimension of wild fantasy.

The most famous example of this flight into fantasy is the short story "The Secret Life of Walter Mitty" (1942.), but Thurber employs the same kind of figure in his Personal essays. In many essays some optical or auditory signal precipitates headlong flights into the fantastic, into what John Updike termed "the enchantment of misapprehension." Thurber, almost completely blind, wrote that "The kingdom of the partly blind is a little like Oz, a little like Wonderland... Anything you can think of, and a lot you would never think of, can happen there." In such a world, described in "The Admiral at the Wheel" (1936), common objects "blur into fantasy" as Thurber, without his glasses, sees such remarkable sights as "a gay old lady with a gray parasol walk right through the side of a truck," and an electronic welder is transformed into "a radiant fool setting off sky-rockets by day."

The other major confusion in Thurber's world is that of language, as strange remarks lead him to even stranger imaginings. When his maid Margaret has trouble with the "doomshaped" part of his refrigerator, Thurber wonders if he is still in the real world. When another maid, Della, announces "They are here with the Reeves," the ensuing conversation reaches such a level of insanity that "only Lewis Carroll could have understood her completely." When the handyman Barney Haller announces "Dis morning bime by... I go hunt grotches in de voods," Thurber finds that "If you are susceptible to such things, it is not difficult to visualize grotches. They fluttered into my mind: ugly little creatures, about the size of whippoorwills, only covered with blood and honey and the scrapings of church bells" ("The Black Magic of Barney Haller," 1935). Language thus leads Thurber into a linguistically anarchic wonderland where communication falters and fantasy begins.

Perhaps the best summation of Thurber's approach is "A Ride with Olympy" (1942), his description of a drive down a mountain road in France. The situation is at once terrifying and farcical. As they proceed down the steep road the American writer tries to explain, in very bad French, the essentials of the automobile to a Russian boat specialist whose French is equally lacking. Both the ride and the conversation spin wildly out of control so that “whereas we had been one remove from reality to begin with, we were now two, or perhaps three, removes.”

Three removes from reality is the location of most of Thurber’s best work, which appeared roughly from the mid-1920s through the beginning of World War II. Thurber’s postwar essays, written for a world he no longer understood and thoroughly detested, too often become mere wordplay or unrefined and virulent objections to contemporary life. These later essays, together with the passage of time, have seriously damaged the reputation of a writer who during his life was generally considered the greatest American humorist since Mark Twain. Also damaging were his overuse of the remarks of black maids and the deep misogyny underlying Thurber’s obsessive theme of the war between men and women, which badly date some of his work.

What seems unlikely to date are Thurber’s use of fantasy and his style. Developed under the tutelage of E.B. White and Harold Ross, editor of the New Yorker, Thurber’s style is the deceptively simple prose of a journalist of genius. Its lightness, clarity, and understatement make his writing endlessly flexible, able to encompass a vast array of subjects and emotions, often far from humorous ones. His ability to imbue almost any situation, from the ridiculous to the tragic, with humor make Thurber, in Adam Gopnik’s (1994) phrase, the “light stylist of the heavy heart.”

JOHN H. ROGERS

See also Humorous Essay

Biography

James Grover Thurber. Born 8 December 1894 in Columbus, Ohio. Studied at Ohio State University, Columbus, 1913–14 and 1915–18. Code clerk, American Embassy, Paris, 1918–20; reporter, the Columbus Dispatch, 1920–24, Chicago Tribune (Paris edition), 1925–26, and New York Evening Post, 1926–27. Married Althea Adams, 1922 (divorced, 1935): one daughter. Wrote for the New Yorker, from 1927. Married Helen Wismer, 1935. Awards: several, including the Library Association Prize, for children’s picture book, 1943; Laughing Lions of Columbia University Award for Humor, 1949; American Library Association Liberty and Justice Award, 1957; Antoinette Perry Special Award, 1960; honorary degrees from three universities. Died (of pneumonia) in New York, 2 November 1961.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

The Owl in the Attic and Other Perplexities, 1931

The Seal in the Bedroom and Other Predicaments, 1932

My Life and Hard Times, 1933

The Middle-Aged Man on the Flying Trapeze: A Collection of Short Pieces, 1935

Let Your Mind Alone! and Other More or Less Inspirational Pieces, 1937

My World—and Welcome to It, 1942

The Thurber Carnival, 1945

The Beast in Me, and Other Animals: A New Collection of Pieces and Drawing About Human Beings and Less Alarming Creatures, 1948

The Thurber Album: A New Collection of Pieces About People, 1952

Thurber Country: A New Collection of Pieces About Males and Females, Mainly of Our Own Species, 1953

Alarms and Diversions, 1957

Lanterns and Lances, 1961

Credos and Curios, 1962

Vintage Thurber, 2 vols., 1963

Other writings: the satire Is Sex Necessary?, with E.B.White (1929), books for children, books of drawings, fables, two plays, a memoir about New Yorker editor Harold Ross (The Years with Ross, 1959), and correspondence.

Bibliographies

Bowden, Edwin T., James Thurber: A Bibliography, Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1968

Toombs, Sarah Eleanora, James Thurber: An Annotated Bibliography of Criticism, New York: Garland, 1987

Further Reading

Bernstein, Burton, Thurber: A Biography, New York: Dodd Mead, and London: Gollancz, 1975

Black, Stephen A., James Thurber: His Masquerades, The Hague and Paris: Mouton, 1970

Fensch, Thomas, editor, Conversations with James Thurber, Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1989

Gale, Steven H., "Thurber of The New Yorker," Studies in American Humor 3, no. 1 (Spring 1984):11–23

Gopnik, Adam, "The Great Deflator," New Yorker, 27 June–4 July 1994:168–76

Grauer, Nell A., Remember Laughter: A Life of James Thurber, Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1994

Holmes, Charles S., The Clocks of Columbus: The Literary Career of James Thurber, New York: Atheneum, 1972; London: Secker and Warburg, 1973

Holmes, Charles S., editor, Thurber: A Collection of Critical Essays, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice Hall, 1974

Kenny, Catherine M., Thurber's Art of Confusion, Hamden, Connecticut: Archon, 1984

Kinney, Harrison, James Thurber: His Life and Times, New York: Holt, 1995

Long, Robert Emmet, James Thurber, New York: Continuum, 1988

Morsberger, Robert, James Thurber, New York: Twayne, 1964

Tobias, Richard C., The Art of James Thurber, Athens: Ohio University Press, 1969

Tierno Galván, Enrique

Spanish, 1918–1986

In the preface to Sobre la novela picaresca y otros escritos (1974; On the picaresque novel and other writings) Tierno Galván lists three major obstacles to his intellectual development during the early years of the Franco regime: scholasticism, existentialism, and the influence of the Generation of 1898. Against such formidable heritage, Tierno's essays form a stark contrast to the principal intellectual currents of post-Civil War Spain and constitute a rejection of the Spanish and European humanistic traditions. The author repeatedly and systematically impugns the hallowed categories of personalism, subjectivism, and mental or inner life (intimismo), in the name of a thorough and absolute secularization of society based on the principles of utility, efficiency, and material well-being. Indeed, while his distinguished contemporaries Xavier Zubiri, Pedro Laín Entralgo, and Julián Marías were involved in such issues as transcendence, the essence of Spain, or the philosophy of José Ortega y Gasset, Tierno was reading the works of Spinoza, Gottlob Frege, and Wittgenstein, whose Tractatus logico-philosophicus he translated into Spanish. An early interest in neopositivism soon led Tierno to embrace a Marxist view of society, which during the 1960s he cloaked in the presumably neutral language of neopositivist sociology. With the publication of Razón mecánica y razón dialéctica (1969; Mechanical reason and dialectical reason), an openly Marxist agenda informs his essays and political activities, first as opposition figure representing the Social Democratic Party of Spain, and eventually as mayor of Madrid. The author often stated that his intellectual mission was to educate the Spanish people's social intelligence. The first step toward this goal consists in destroying the assumptions of Western humanism, which include metaphysics and subjectivism: "I believe that subjectivism (intimidad) is the greatest obstacle to material and spiritual happiness... By subjectivism I mean the psychic space from which we oppose the world" (La realidad como resultado [1957; Reality as result]).

Tierno's style and temper may be traced to the essays of Francis Bacon. Although separated in time and space, both writers share a distinct method and program for the reform of philosophy. Like the father of the English essay, Tierno too criticizes the erroneous and misleading habits of mind that obstruct the aims of genuine science. Both share a distaste for metaphysics, favor demonstration over invention, and lament the intellectual's inadaptability to the world. The Englishman's stylistic influence is particularly evident. Tierno appropriates Bacon's observation in The Advancement of Learning that "The aphorism cannot be made but of the pith and heart of the sciences." Inspired by Wittgenstein's Tractatus Tierno penned his first major work in the form of some 200 aphorisms with the title La realidad como resultado—a trenchant critique of metaphysics and an apology for the verification principle.

Tierno's aphoristic style stands out against the often prolix, digressive, and anecdotal essays of his contemporaries. Essentially, the aphorism is for Tierno an epistemological tool of maximum intellectual rigor, economy, and precision. Thinking through aphorisms involves a series of independent, spaced enunciations that convey truth in a compact, atomized form. Distrustful of systematic demonstrations on a grand scale, the author finds the aphorism especially suitable to the fragmentary view of knowledge and the simultaneity of experience that characterize modernity.

The author's essays may be divided into both formal and informal categories. The formal works, marked generally by an aphoristic style, reflect Tierno's commitment to the neopositivist and Marxist principles of sociological analysis (e.g. La realidad como resultado; Conocimiento y ciencias sociales [1966; Knowledge and the social sciences]). The informal essays, in line with the moralist tradition of the early Marx and Nietzsche, show a critical consciousness directed toward the transformation of the social order within the framework of a revolutionary ideology. To accomplish his political and ethical aims Tierno favors the rhetorical strategy of dissociation. This consists of a series of shocking antitheses, often oxymoronic, designed to disrupt the associations inherited from humanist and personalist modes of thought. Thus, one finds expressions such as "the trivial is destiny" (Desde el espectáculo a la trivialización [1961; From spectacle to trivial]); "philosophy should be a vulgar discipline" (Acotaciones a la historia de la cultura occidental en la edad moderna [1964; Marginal notes on the history of modern Western culture]); "the scientific control of human relations will lead to happiness"; "The world is not the dwelling place of man" (Diderot como pretexto [1965; Diderot as a pretext]). This last statement speaks of the author's concern for "the destiny of the species" rather than that of the individual or the person.

Following Wittgenstein, Tierno believes that whereof one cannot speak one should remain silent; he nevertheless accepts the existence of the mysterious and assigns literature and the arts the task of expressing the ineffable, provided that such expression is confined to the finite and the mundane. In ¿Qué es ser agnóstico? (1975; What is an agnostic?) he writes in the hope that "a new type of man will appear, for whom nothing finite will be alien." In this brave new world humankind will have abjured transcendence. Free from the dualisms and scissions imposed by the humanist tradition, individuals will be reconciled with their species: "No agnostic can be an end in himself, but only as part of the world as the objective expression of the species." Installed in a finite world as its home, humanity will live in "serenity without resignation."

The forceful, vital, iconoclastic style of Tierno's essays surprised Spanish intellectuals of the Franco era, most of whom had ignored or severely marginalized the currents of logical positivism and Marxism. By eschewing the rhetorical habits of his contemporaries—exordium, digression, personal anecdote, metaphoric transposition—Tierno's terse, economic style will be remembered as the antipode to the essayistic tradition of Unamuno and Ortega y Gasset.

THOMAS MERMALL

Biography

Born 8 February 1918 in Madrid. Fought with the Republican forces, and cofounder of the Socialist Party of the Interior (later the Popular Socialist Party), during the Spanish Civil War. Studied for law degree, 1942, and doctorate in law, 1945. Married Encarnación Pérez Relaño: one son. Professor of political science at the Universities of Murcia, 1948–53, and Salamanca, 1953–65, then dismissed: reinstated after Franco's death, 1976; visiting professor at various universities in the United States. Acquitted on charges of trying to overthrow Franco, 1961. Defense lawyer for political defendants, late 1960s–early 1970s. Elected president of the Social Democratic Party of Spain, 1978. Elected mayor of Madrid, 1979–86. Died (of cancer) in Madrid, 20 January 1986.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

La realidad como resultado, 1957

Desde el espectáculo a la trivialización, 1961

Tradición y modernismo (lectures), 1962

Acotaciones a la historia de la cultura occidental en la edad moderna, 1964

Humanismo y sociedad, 1964

Diderot como pretexto, 1965

Conocimiento y dencias sociales, 1966

Razón mecánica y razón dialéctica, 1969

Escritos, 1950–1960, 1971

La rebelión juvenil y el problema en la universidad, 1972

Sobre la novela picaresca y otros escritos, 1974

¿Qué es ser agnóstico?, 1975

Idealismo y pragmatismo en el siglo XIX español, 1977

Bandos del Alcalde, 1986

Other writings: works on Spanish philosophy and literature.

Further Reading

Díaz, Elías, Pensamiento español en la era de Franco: 1939–1973, Madrid: Tecnos, 1983

Marichal, Juan, El nuevo pensamiento político español, Mexico City: Finisterre, 1966

Mermall, Thomas, The Rhetoric of Humanism: Spanish Culture After Ortega y Gasset, New York: Bilingual Press, 1976:85–107

Sistema: Revista de ciencias sociales issue on Tierno Galván, 71–72 (June 1986), particularly articles by Elías Díaz and Raúl Morodo

Times Literary Supplement

British periodical, 1902–

Originally a weekly section of the Times newspaper, the Times Literary Supplement has gradually become one of the most popular and respected critical voices in the English-reading world. Its prototype, a penny periodical called the Literary Times, appeared in 1863 and ran for 11 numbers from 14 March to 23 May. Later, in 1897, as the Times found it hard to review a satisfying number of books, a new and entirely separate journal, Literature, was created. It lasted only four and a half years, barely managing to take the pressure off the daily newspaper. Eventually, the first issue of the TLS appeared on 17 January 1902 and was presented as an occasional supplement when Parliament was sitting and political news took up most of the newspaper's pages. It would "appear as often as may be necessary in order to keep abreast with the more important publications of the day."

The first issue consisted of eight pages. Mostly devoted to literary reviews, it also contained pieces on science, art, drama, music, and chess, as well as separate listings of forthcoming and recently published books. Soon after the creation of the supplement, its first editor, Sir James Thursfield (1902.), was replaced by Bruce Richmond (1902–38), who during his long tenure gave the TLS many of its distinctive traits and helped it evolve from its initially uncertain state. Although Parliament adjourned for Whitsuntide on 16 May 1902, the supplement went on and, over the years, it grew steadily in size, becoming a separate publication on 12 March 1914. Richmond favored anonymity of reviewers, which was to remain one of the peculiar and most debated traits of the TLS, and he attracted authoritative contributors, often assigning them specific fields and topics. In its early days, the periodical owed much of its steady success and reputation to Richmond's choice of reviewers, including Arthur Clutton-Brock, A.T. QuillerCouch, and Andrew Lang, and foremost literary figures such as Henry Rider Haggard, Henry James, Edith Wharton, George Gissing, and Austin Dobson. Publication was not interrupted by the outbreak of World War I in 1914. On the contrary, during wartime, the TLS grew in length and gave more prominence to some of its distinctive features: the presence of original poetry, the letters to the editor, and a more extensive book list at the back.

In the 1920s the TLS became established as an authoritative critical organ, also thanks to the new reviewers contacted by Richmond. Virginia Woolf had first been invited to write a piece in 1905 and became a regular contributor from 1908 onward. Between then and her death in 1941 she wrote more than 220 articles, many of which were reprinted in her later collections of essays such as Granite and Rainbow (1958). At about the same time, Richmond contacted T.S.Eliot, securing him as the reviewer for studies of Renaissance drama and 17th-century poetry from 1919 to 1935. Many of Eliot's famous essays originally appeared as lead-reviews in the TLS, such as "Ben Jonson" (13 November 1919), "Andrew Marvell" (31 March 1921), and "The Metaphysical Poets" (20 October 1921). Other famous contributors from this period include Herbert Read, Richard Aldington, George Trevelyan, Edmund Blunden, and John Middleton Murry.

In 1922, possibly considering the profits of the TLS too small, Lord Northcliffe, the owner of the Times, decided that the number for 13 April would be the last. However, the periodical continued to appear regularly, for this order had not reached all the departments concerned, while in August the same year Lord Northcliffe became ill and died. Nonetheless, publication was temporarily interrupted during the general strike of 1926, with another minor interruption occurring during the great freeze-up of Winter 1947. By the time Bruce Richmond retired in 1938, the TLS had reached its own specific identity. From its uncertain beginnings it had grown into a highly respected, weekly journal of criticism, devoted to the discussion of books of different subjects, although literature still prevailed, and also including shorter reviews, critical essays, a section of letters, and extensive book listings. Richmond was replaced by David L. Murray (1938–45) who started a largely unsuccessful campaign of modernization in order to increase the readership. The front page was given up to an illustration and the long essay was moved to the middle. After some internal troubles, Murray left, his place being taken by Stanley Morison (1945–48), who threw out many of the new features and reinstated the long front-page essay. Morison's editorship marked a new increase in circulation figures, a development partly the result of the paper-rationing policy adopted during World War II: whereas many daily newspapers abandoned their pages on book reviews because of paper shortage, the TLS remained the only medium providing an adequate coverage of books in this period.

In 1948 Morison was replaced by Alan Pryce-Jones (1948–59), whose task would be to guide the paper through the extended postwar period. In particular, he introduced new contributors such as Anthony Powell, who became fiction editor, and increased the presence of original poetry, while also starting the practice of special issues on a selected topic. His editorship was followed by those of Arthur Crook (1959–74) and John Gross (1974–81). On 7 June 1974 the practice of anonymous reviewing was abolished. Between December 1978 and November 1979 the TLS stopped publication during the one-year closure of Times Newspapers and, after the acquisition of the group by Rupert Murdoch's News International plc in 1981, the paper's archives became open to the public.

In recent times, during the editorships of Jeremy Treglown (1982–90) and Ferdinand Mount (1991–), publishing goals have varied little from those of Richmond's days. The TLS continues to aim at a broad audience of well-informed, general readers whose numbers have swelled, especially in the United States. From its beginnings the TLS has covered books about art and architecture, literature both in English and in foreign languages, literary criticism and theory, music, history and anthropology, politics, women's studies, economics, and reference books. Recent changes in editorial policy include more frequent coverage of politics and the arts and an increase in the number of long essays. At present the TLS reviews around 2000 books and the listings include some 6000 titles a year, thus remaining unique in its attempt to cover the whole publishing waterfront. Other important prerogatives include the fact that it is a weekly publication, whereas its most respectable competitors, the New York Review of Books and the London Review of Books, appear slightly less than fortnightly and mainly concentrate on modern literature and political issues. Circulation figures of the TLS have always oscillated between 20,000 and 45,000, settling halfway between these extremes in the mid-1980s.

As a "journal of record," the TLS has influenced other literary journals, most notably T.S. Eliot's Criterion and, more recently, the New Review, Quarto, and the London Review of Books. Despite its authority, it has attracted criticism mainly aimed at its policy of anonymity and its failure to review important texts such as D.H. Lawrence's The Rainbow in 1916 and James Joyce's Ulysses in 1922. Over the years, the TLS has also been accused of anti-Americanism, of upholding liberal-humanist tenets based on "civilized judgment" and "civilized man," and of repressing freedoms of sexual behavior and expression. Nonetheless, the history of the TLS has been largely characterized by independence of opinion, and its pages have hosted a varied spectrum of critical and political voices. The success and authority enjoyed by the TLS result from its meeting comprehensively the demands of the critic, the scholar, and the general reader, and as such it holds a special place among reviewing periodicals in the English-speaking world.

DIEGO SAGLIA

Further Reading

- Bateson, F.W., "Organs of Critical Opinion: IV. The Times Literary Supplement," Essays in Criticism 7 (1957):349–62
- Bradshaw, David, "Lonely Royalists: T.S.Eliot and Sir Robert Filmer," Review of English Studies 46 (1995):375–79
- Eliot, T.S., "Bruce Lyttelton Richmond," Times Literary Supplement, 13 January 1961:17
- Graham, Walter, English Literary Periodicals, New York: Nelson, 1930
- Grigg, John, The History of the Times, vol. 6: The Thomson Years, 1966–1981, London: Times Books, 1994
- Gross, John, "Naming Names," Times Literary Supplement, 7 June 1974:610
- Gross, John, "The TLS and the Modern Movement," in The Modern Movement: A TLS Companion, edited by Gross, London: Harvill, and Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1992: xi–xxiii
- Kirkpatrick, B.J., "Virginia Woolf: Unrecorded Times Literary Supplement Reviews," Modern Fiction Studies 38 (1992): 279–301
- McDonald, Iverach, The History of the Times, vol. 5, London: Times Books, 1984
- "The Times Literary Supplement: A Record of Its Beginnings," Times Literary Supplement, 18 January 1952:33–39
- Treglown, Jeremy, "Literary History and the Lit. Supp.," Yearbook of English Studies 16 (1986):132–49
- Wood, Adolf, "A Paper and Its Editors," Times Literary Supplement, 17 January 1992:14–15
- Yearbook of English Studies* literary periodicals issue, edited by C. J.Rawson, 16 (1986)

Tolstoi, Lev

Russian, 1828–1910

Lev Tolstoi was one of the world's greatest novelists; he was also perhaps the world's leading exponent of literary realism. In his total oeuvre essays do not bulk large; no critic of his work would put him forward as primarily a practitioner of the essay. Nor, had one explained to Tolstoi what literary critics mean by the term "essay," would he likely have acknowledged that certain of his shorter works are essays; indeed, he would probably have said that the essay (at least of the belletristic variety) was an effete luxury, and that there was no need in literature for a literary genre of that sort.

Most of Tolstói's slim production of essays belong to his final, post-conversion period, and are concerned with religion or art. Following his conversion to his own form of Christianity in the 1880s, Tolstói altered almost completely his manner of writing. Formerly his style had shown an exemplary realism, with a striving to give descriptive detail and to supply as consistent a narrative point of view as possible. His later manner, in both fiction and nonfiction, is simpler and more direct, a sermon-like style notable for its total authority, such that it is virtually impossible to doubt the author even when he utters patent absurdities. Tolstói the objective chronicler has metamorphosed into Tolstói the single-minded preacher. The new style is almost free from rhetoric, quite beautiful, without excessive lyricism, but with a note of stern command that cannot escape our notice.

Prominent among Tolstói's "essays" is his celebrated confession Ispoved' (1884; A Confession). Though it is worthy, in both content and form, to rank with the famous examples of the genre by St. Augustine (cf. Confessions) or Rousseau, it also fits well into the essay form: though recounted in the first person, it is obviously about Everyman; though it contains many narrative elements, these are softened, generalized, and permeated with a lyric introspection. Thus, although Tolstói did not choose to write essays as such, we may at least call him an essayist manqué.

Tolstói's Confession is an outpouring of his celebrated religious conversion, which is usually dated as taking place in 1881 and 1882, though its roots may be found far earlier, for instance in Levin's doubts and his impulse toward suicide described in the closing pages of Tolstói's novel Anna Karenina (1875–77). Despite its simplified but refined style, there can be little doubt that Tolstói's Confession is close to the events of his life; we must wonder if there were not an attempt on Tolstói's part to "live literature" as well as to "reflect life in literature." Tolstói had always sought to bring life and literature together, as Boris Eikhenbaum tried to show (1922): in his early period of literary realism Tolstói used the techniques of realism mentioned above; in his final period he dropped or constrained the customary techniques of fiction, unifying and compressing the authorial voice to give it the closest tie to life.

Tolstói's Confession, like those of St. Augustine or Rousseau, tells the story of his life, but life perceived almost solely as a quest for salvation. Wherever he searches, Tolstói's quest is frustrated, and he is dogged by anxiety and a compulsive urge to suicide. Only when he abandons that in which he seems to excel—money, noble rank, knowledge, literary fame, science—can he dispel his fear and set out on the true path. Finally, he confirms his insights by studying the life of the peasantry around him—the peasants who seem deficient only in what he himself has excelled in.

If Tolstói had written only this single essay, one that has some claim, indeed, to be his masterpiece, he would be celebrated as an essayist. However, besides his Confession, he also wrote a handful of shorter essays on questions of religion and morality.

Tolstói created what was for him a new style, which could be applied to meditations on moral and spiritual concerns. Just as the fiction Tolstói wrote after his conversion—Smert' Ivana Ilyicha (1886; The Death of Ivan Ilyich) or Khoziain i rabotnik (1895; Master and Man)—is itself full of essay-like passages concerned with man's quest for salvation, so Tolstói's nonfictional style also changed. Paradoxically, he himself criticized his earlier masterpieces as worthless in that they seemed to be trying to teach when he had nothing to teach. But now that he had, he began to teach with a vengeance.

Tolstoi likewise employed this new style in a handful of essays on art, a subject almost as important to him as religion, since art, he supposed, might either lead man to salvation or tempt him to perdition. The major and most famous of these, Chto takoe iskusstvo? (1898; What Is Art?), is too polemical to be called an essay, but an earlier attempt to deal with the question, “Ob iskusstve” (1889; “On Art”), is certainly an essay in that it largely eschews forceful persuasion for reflection. Tolstoi tells us that he came to his subject because of the importance generally conceded to art and artistic interpretation by so many people; thus he does not begin with a view of art’s unimportance and powerlessness in daily life, a perhaps more common starting point. He also perceives fully the ambiguity and ambivalence of art: motivated by the best of reasons, works of art can in fact do great harm by representing as true a false way of life.

It is tempting to ask why Tolstoi did not write more essays. In spite of all the power and authority of a story like The Death of Ivan Ilyich, which some have even called Tolstoi’s masterpiece, the essay form may strike us as equally or more appropriate to the character of his ideas after his conversion. The essay remained closer and more faithful to those ideas; it did not compromise them with characters or objects drawn from our external world. It remained purer; this purity and the consistency it fostered could well have been attractive to the author as well as the reader.

WILLIAM E.HARKINS

Biography

Lev (Leo) Nikolaevich Tolstoi. Born 9 September 1828 at lasnaia Poliana family estate, near Tula. Studied privately with tutors; studied Eastern languages, then law, Kazan University, 1844–47. Inherited estate, 1847, and lived there (with extended periods of absence) throughout his life. Served in the Russian Army, 1852–56. Lived in St. Petersburg, from 1856, frequenting literary circles and meeting leading writers and critics. Traveled abroad, 1857 and 1860–61. Studied European educational systems, established a school on his estate for the children of his serfs, 1859–62, wrote and published lasnaia Poliana journal outlining his theories on education, 1862–63, and wrote and compiled materials for a complete elementary education course: published it as the primer Azbuka, 1872, revised as Novaia azbuka, 1875, and widely used thereafter in Russian schools. Married Sof’ia Andreevna Bers, 1862:13 children (nine survived to adulthood); also had a son by one of the peasants on his estate. Suffered increasingly from depression and suicidal thoughts, until his conversion to his own version of Christianity, early 1880s; most of his subsequent writings concerned religious themes and were banned or censored. Excommunicated from the Russian Orthodox Church, 1901. Died (of pneumonia and resulting heart failure) at Astapovo railway station, 20 November 1910.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

- Isproved'*, 1884; edited by A.D.P.Briggs, 1994; as A Confession, translated anonymously, 1885, and by Jane Kentish, in A Confession and Other Religious Writings, 1987
- V chem moia vera*, 1884; as My Religion, translated by Huntington Smith, 1885; as What I Believe, translated by Constantine Popoff, 1885
- In Pursuit of Happiness*, translated by Aline Delano, 1887
- O zhizni*, 1888; as Life, translated by Isabel F.Hapgood, 1888; as On Life, translated by Mabel and Agnes Cook, 1902
- Tsarstvo Bozhie vnutri vas*, 2 vols., 1893–94; as The Kingdom of God Is Within You, translated by Constance Garnett, 2 vols., 1894
- Chto takoe iskusstvo?*, 1898; as What Is Art?, translated by Charles Johnston, 1898, and Aylmer Maude, 1930
- Tak chto zhe nam delat'?*, 1902; as What to Do?, translated by Isabel F.Hapgood, 1887; uncensored edition, 1888
- Essays and Letters*, translated by Aylmer Maude, 1903
- Ne mogu molchat'*, 1908; translated as "I Cannot Be Silent," in I Cannot Be Silent: Selection from Tolstoy's Non-Fiction, edited by W.Gareth Jones, 1989
- On Life and Essays on Religion*, translated by Aylmer Maude, 1934
- The Kingdom of God, and Peace Essays*, translated by Aylmer Maude, 1936
- Recollections and Essays*, translated by Aylmer Maude, 1937
- Essays from Tula*, translated by Evgeny Lamport, 1948
- Why Do Men Stupefy Themselves?, and Other Writings*, translated by Aylmer Maude, 1975
- Tolstoy on Education: Tolstoy's Educational Writings, 1861–62*, edited by Alan Pinch and Michael Armstrong, translated by Pinch, 1982
- The Lion and the Honeycomb: The Religious Writings*, edited by A. N.Wilson, translated by Robert Chandler, 1987
- Writings on Civil Disobedience and Non-Violence*, translated by Aylmer Maude and Ronald Sampson, 1988
- The Gospel According to Tolstoy*, translated by David Patterson, 1992
- Other writings: many novels (including Voyna i mir [War and Peace], 1863–69; Anna Karenina, 1875–77; Smert' Ivana Ilyicha [The Death of Ivan Ilyich], 1886), plays, stories, and works on religious issues.
- Collected works editions: Polnoe sobranie sochinenii, edited by V. Chertkov and others, 90 vols., 1928–58; Oxford Centenary Edition, edited by Aylmer Maude, translated by Aylmer and Louise Maude, 21 vols., 1928–37; Sobranie sochinenii, edited by S.A.Makashina, 12 vols., 1980–87.

Bibliographies

- Egan, David R., and Melinda A.Egan, Leo Tolstoy: An Annotated Bibliography of English Language Sources to 1978, Metuchen, New Jersey: Scarecrow Press, 1979
- Sheliapina, N.G., and others, Bibliografiya literaturny o L.N. Tolstom, Moscow: Isd-vo

Vses. knizhnoi palaty, vol. 1, 1960; Moscow: Kniga, vols. 2–5, 1965–90

Further Reading

- Christian, R.F., Tolstoy: A Critical Introduction, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1969
- Eikhenbaum, Boris, The Young Tolstois, Ann Arbor, Michigan: Ardis, 1972 (original Russian edition, 1922)
- Gustafson, Richard F., Leo Tolstoy, Resident and Stranger: A Study in Fiction and Theology, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1986
- Lavrin, Janko, Tolstoy: An Approach, London: Methuen, 1944; New York: Macmillan, 1946
- Maude, Aylmer, The Life of Tolstoy, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1987 (original edition, 1908–10)
- Simmons, E.J., Leo Tolstoy, Boston: Little Brown, 1946; London: Lehmann, 1949
- Steiner, George, Tolstoy or Dostoevsky: An Essay in the Old Criticism, London: Faber, 1980; Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1985 (original edition, 1959)
- Troyat, Henri, Tolstoy, New York: Harmony, and Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1980 (original French edition, 1965)

Topical Essay

The topical essay is generally one written in response to a newsworthy event, and hence has within it the ephemerality of daily journalism. What distinguishes it from regular journalism is often its attention to prose style, and just as often its search for wisdom within the facts of the event being written about. Often the news event is the pretext for the essay rather than the true or ultimate topic of engagement.

The term “topical essay” is not commonly used. More often, essays of this type have been termed “periodical essays” or, since the 1960s, “literary journalism.” Newspaper and magazine columns frequently fall into this category as well. No matter the name, though, the 20th century has seen a surge of essays written in response to world events well outside the writers’ lives. With the coming of World War I, the formerly popular and dominant familiar essay came under attack as too genteel, too irresponsible, too lacking in the insight and wisdom that a contemporary readership craved and even needed to help it make sense of an increasingly chaotic world. Agnes Repplier, in her 1918 essay “The American Essay in Wartime,” argued that the “leisure and reflection” that had long been key to the personality of the essay was no longer justifiable. “To write essays in these flaming years,” she claimed, “one must have a greater power of detachment than had Montaigne or Lamb.”

Yet, the roots of the topical essay are in the 18th century, in English newspapers which routinely combined current news with sharp political commentary. In the early 1700s, there were upwards of 18 newspapers being published in London— including Daniel Defoe's A Review of the Affairs of France (1704–13), which combined news, political moderation, wit, and social comment, and helped mold the audience for the more famous series of topical essays in Joseph Addison's and Richard Steele's *Tatler (1709–11) and Spectator (1711–12, 1714). Steele referred to himself and Addison as “weekly Historians,” and their essays won broad acclaim for their vivid depictions of the social life of the period. They were criticized as being trivial (by Jonathan Swift, for example), but both men, seeking to bring “philosophy out of the Closets and Libraries, Schools and Colleges,” believed that to sell their papers they had to base their “lucubrations” on areas of current interest. Many critics today, however, argue that the political, social, and religious topics in Addison and Steele's essays are outdated only in matters of style, and that the insights offered in them pushed them well beyond the limited life of ephemeral journalism. Numerous imitations sprang up after Addison and Steele, including, most famously, Samuel Johnson's *Rambler (1750–52) and Idler (1758–60).

In the 19th century Ivan Turgenev's “Kazn' Tropmana” (1870; “The Execution of Tropmann”) was a forerunner of literary journalism; the writer implicated himself in the barbarity as a semi-willing voyeur of the public guillotining. (George Orwell made the same sort of portrayal in “A Hanging” [1931] and “Shooting an Elephant” [1936]—both essays intended to criticize British imperialism.) Other 19th-century literary journalists include Mark Twain and Stephen Crane. In the 20th century the form became defined by pieces such as Ernest Hemingway's reporting on bullfighting, Joseph Mitchell's portraits of characters from the Bowery and the Fulton Fish Market in Manhattan, A.J. Liebling's essays on boxing, and James Agee's *Let Us Now Praise Famous Men (1941). Many of these writers chose as their subjects what may have seemed at the time common and ordinary—not at all topical. Yet their essays often captured the feel of their times in ways that more autobiographical or Personal essays rarely did. Much of John Steinbeck's writing in the late 1930s, for instance, was devoted to reports on the Dust Bowl migrants, which would “break the story hard enough so that food and drugs can get moving...” His literary journalism was a tool for his advocacy.

When the New Journalism became popular in the early 1960s (the term “New Journalism” later gave way to “literary journalism”), it was led by profiles for the commercial magazines. Gay Talese's “Frank Sinatra Has a Cold” (1962), perhaps one of the most durable of those pieces, illustrates how a reporter uses scenes and dialogue and evocative description to teach readers not only about the essay's nominal subject—Sinatra—but also, in this case, about the world of entertainment in the 1950s and 1960s, as well as about the uses and abuses of charisma, money, and power. Talese, like many other New Journalists of that decade, wrote in the third person, in order to signify that, though his presence is on every page, he is not the subject of his essay.

Norman Mailer's The Armies of the Night (1968), which tells of an antiwar march on the Pentagon in 1967, focuses on the nominal event in a larger cultural context as “a paradigm of the twentieth century.” Mailer, who took part in the protest, makes his own character dominant, as a way of arguing that the historian/topical essayist must become a novelist who invents the meaning of the event in an act of self-definition.

The dreamlike nature of American reality in the 1960s also led Hunter S. Thompson, in reports such as Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas (1971), to describe a culture in which the real has become saturated with the fantastic, a culture in which the American Dream has become the hedonistic pursuit of “the now.” Joan Didion described her 1968 volume of reportage, Slouching Towards Bethlehem, as a confrontation with the “evidence of atomization, the proof that things fall apart,” and as an attempt “to come to terms with [the] disorder” of the 1960s in America and, more specifically, in California. Many such writers—Didion, Mailer, Thompson, Tom Wolfe—have continued to be essayists with their fingers on the topical, as in Didion’s After Henry: Sentimental Journeys (1992), written in response to the rape and murder of a jogger in New York City’s Central Park and the subsequent media coverage.

Topical essayists are often by necessity travel essayists, with the writer going in search of the story. Hence poet and journalist James Fenton put himself in Saigon (“The Fall of Saigon,” 1985); foreign correspondent John Simpson wrote from China (“Tiananmen Square,” 1989); Didion traveled to El Salvador and brought back a harrowing account of the troubles occurring there (Salvador, 1983).

It has also often been the ambition of newspaper columnists to be topical essayists—writers who can address current events factually but in a way that captures the essay’s traditional depth of reflection and personality. Perhaps all columnists can trace their roots and influences back to Addison and Steele. In America, writers such as Benjamin Franklin contributed to this tradition—Franklin, for instance, with his columns written under the pen name Silence Dogood. Thomas Paine gave the discordant American colonies a unifying voice, filling Pennsylvania Magazine with topical pieces in which his radical temper was evident in his attacks on imperial misrule. Eightyfive essays written by Alexander Hamilton, James Madison, and John Jay, originating as columns in New York newspapers and coming to be called The Federalist, defended the drafting of the U.S. Constitution in 1787–88; perhaps no more influential collection of newspaper articles has appeared. William Lloyd Garrison, editor of the abolitionist weekly the Liberator, was one of the best-known columnists arguing the antislavery cause in the 1830s to 1860s. In a more social vein, Fanny Fern, the first female American columnist, wrote satirical columns on literary, political, and social issues.

In 20th-century America, H.L.Mencken, who often commented upon current social and political issues, led the way as an influential topical essayist. E.B.White had great popularity with his “One Man’s Meat” column in Harper’s magazine—a column in which he often responded to war reports from Europe. Walter Lippmann, who described writing columns as “a puzzled man making notes...drawing sketches in the sand, which the sea will wash away,” worked within that ephemerality to become one of the most influential columnists. More recently, columnists who have the required feeling for facts and technical agility, but who have also imbued their writings with enough essayistic qualities to give them greater permanence than the usual run of daily journalism, include Russell Baker, Molly Ivins, Ellen Goodman, and Anna Quindlen.

DAN ROCHE

Anthologies

The Best of Granta Reportage, London: Granta/Penguin, and New York: Viking Penguin, 1994

Literary Journalism: A New Collection of the Best American Nonfiction, edited by Norman Sims, New York: Ballantine, 1995

Pundits, Poets, and Wits: An Omnibus of American Newspaper Columnists, edited by Karl E. Meyer, New York: Oxford University Press, 1990

Further Reading

[See also Further Reading in the entry on New Journalism]

Sims, Norman, The Literary Journalists, New York: Ballantine, 1984

Sims, Norman, editor, Literary Journalism in the Twentieth Century, New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1990

Torres Villarreal, Diego de

Spanish, c. 1694–1770

In the canon of 18th-century Spanish literature, the works of Diego de Torres Villarreal represent the antithesis of Enlightenment reason and a model of the baroque with all its linguistic intricacies. Torres Villarreal realizes this endeavor by blending humor, common sense, and personal observation into a series of works that reveal the attitude of the commoner. Unlike many of his contemporaries, who relied on encyclopedic didacticism, this author allows the foibles and frailties of human nature to be the catalysts for his commentary. As Russell Sebold (1963) suggests, Torres Villarreal was “one of the most humane spirits and because of this the most tormented there is among the Catholic writers of Spain.”

The two works that reflect clearly the disposition of Torres Villarreal and his essay style are Visiones y visitas con Francisco de Quevedo (1727–28; Visions and visits with Francisco de Quevedo) and Vida, ascendencia, nacimiento, crianza y aventuras (1743–58; Life, lineage, birth, upbringing, and adventures; translated as The Remarkable Life of Don Diego). Speaking of the author, Ivy McClelland (1976) observes that “...his witness to mass-minded suspicion and incomprehension is of supreme value to historians attempting to examine the reason for any country’s resistance to scientific common sense; for it is the lesser scholars—such as Torres—who represent the ordinary state of mind of the ordinary man and make history three-dimensional. Torres is as stimulatingly alive as Feijóo. But he lived his life on the reverse side of eighteenth-century Enlightenment.” These works offer the reader two significant viewpoints regarding Torres Villarreal’s attitude toward his own person and toward society at large.

The prologue to Visiones y visitas provides an excellent example of how the worlds of the author and the reader come together. First, Torres Villarreal treats his reader as a friend by using the familiar tú form of address. Under the guise of friendship and familiarity, readers are bombarded with a series of twisted, bombastic remarks. Each comment is carefully couched in humor as if to lull them and dull the senses. However, lying just below the surface Torres Villarroel subtly suggests that his discourse will bite and tear at the very fabric of his readers' moral, intellectual, and physical reality. More important, Torres Villarroel insinuates that his perspective, which is conveyed through this series of "dreams," will prove beneficial to his readers. Thus, he warns that anyone determined to read the work should also be willing to reflect on what is said. The author asks only that readers willingly suspend all prejudice and by so doing find wholesome doctrine that will protect them from the vices of the times. Immediately following this invitation, Torres Villarroel states that some readers lack the depth and ability to understand his writings. He greatly fears his readers because too often they approach his work with "evil intentions," "only grasp at trivialities," and "censure" the style and the tone of his writing without understanding the message. Furthermore, he chastises them for their intellectual indiscretion. He warns that if they wish to "nibble away" at his writing, they must first learn to speak and write correctly. However, if the reading public relies only on what they have learned at the knees of their mothers or wet nurses, they should stay clear of the author's "dreams," or they might get burned.

From the playful tone of the discourses the reader might assume that Torres Villarroel's primary purpose is to amuse. However, beneath the playful façade there is a harsh and direct criticism of society. To accomplish his task, Torres Villarroel relies on the power and subtlety of satire. With this rhetorical device in hand he corrupts the sanctity of long-held traditions and subverts the newly adopted methodologies of the Enlightenment. Whether intentionally or not, Torres Villarroel espouses the need for introspection and self-criticism. The examination of oneself appears to be an integral part of both Visiones y visitas and Remarkable Life. More important, the introspection the author recommends to his reader is equally applicable to himself.

Torres Villarroel's Remarkable Life is a parody of confessional works by religious figures such as St. Augustine and Santa Teresa. In this work he relies heavily on the frequent reference to his own unworthiness and ignorance. Like Cervantes, who often imbued his foolish characters with sagelike wisdom, Torres ridicules his own persona in order to speak more clearly the truths he sees being ignored by society. Interestingly, he opens the prologue to Remarkable Life with both a critique of the confessional autobiography and a self-defense: "You will say (as if I were listening), as soon as you take in your hand this paper, that in Torres there is no virtue, humility nor amusement to write his life, rather the pure impudence, the strong roguery and the insolent philosophy of a rascal who has made a living making fun of himself and enjoys teasing and creating an uproar among the people of the world. And I will say that you are right, like I am a Christian." Here the reader notes that there is no denial of Torres Villarroel's motivation for writing, only an affirmation. From the outset of the work, Torres Villarroel takes control of the reader and dictates how the work is to be interpreted. It can be assumed that he does this with the intention of distracting the reader away from the harsh criticisms he scatters throughout the work.

Torres Villarroel represents an important cog in the literary mechanism of Spanish Enlightenment. McClelland states clearly, "When Feijóo, the empiric scholar, and Torres, the dilettante, confronted each other in battle they exteriorized their epoch's conflicts of misunderstanding that affected the speed of change." More important, Torres Villarroel rediscovered the power of the word and used it to reveal the conflict of his internal and external worlds.

ALVIN F.SHERMAN, JR.

Biography

Baptized 18 June 1694 in Salamanca. Traveled and worked variously in Spain and Portugal, 1713–15. Took minor orders, 1715, then abandoned clerical career, though later ordained, 1745. Studied at the University of Salamanca, 1718–20. Began publishing almanacs (Almanaques y Proviósticos) under the name “El Gran Piscator Salmantino,” 1720s. Chair of mathematics, University of Salamanca, 1726–32 and 1734–51; banished for involvement in a criminal case, 1732–34, then obtained royal pardon. Died in Salamanca, 19 June 1770.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Visiones y visitas con Francisco de Quevedo, 3 vols., 1727–28; edited by Russell P.Sebold, 1966

La barca de Aqueronte, 1731; edited by Guy Mercadier, 1969

Los desahuciados del mundo, 3 vols., 1736–37; edited by Manuel María Pérez, 1979

Vida, ascendencia, nacimiento, crianza y aventuras, 6 vols., 1743–58; edited by Federico de Onís, 1912, Guy Mercadier, 1972, and Dámaso Chicharro, 1980; as The Remarkable Life of Don Diego, translated by W.C.Atkinson, 1958

Other writings: almanacs, works about mathematics, poetry, and plays.

Collected works edition: Obras completas, 15 vols., 1794–99.

Further Reading

Aguilar Pinal, Francisco, “Pronósticos de Torres Villarroel en México y Perú,” in Homenaje a Noel Salomon: Ilustración española e independencia de América, edited by Alberto Gil Novales, Barcelona: University of Barcelona, 1979:345–53

Ettinghausen, Henry, “Torres Villarroel’s Self-Portrait: The Mask Behind the Mask,” Bulletin of Hispanic Studies 55 (1978): 321–28

Fernández Cifuentes, Luis, “Autobiography and Print: The Negotiation of Authorship in Eighteenth-century Spain,” Journal of Interdisciplinary Literary Studies 5, no. 1 (1993):3–21

Ilie, Paul, “Grotesque Portraits in Torres Villarroel,” Bulletin of Hispanic Studies 45 (1968):16–37

Ilie, Paul, “Franklin and Villarroel: Social Consciousness in Two Autobiographies,” Eighteenth-century Studies 7 (1974):321–42

Ilie, Paul, “Dream Cognition and the Spanish Enlightenment: Judging Torres Villarroel,” Modern Language Notes 101, no. 2 (1986):270–97

Kahiluoto Rudat, Eva M., “Imagination and Popular Humor in Torres Villarroel’s Visiones y Visitas,” in Pen and Puke: Spanish Literature of the Eighteenth Century,

- edited by Monroe Z. Hafter, Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Department of Romance Languages, 1992:73–86
- McClelland, I.L., Diego de Torres Villarroel, Boston: Twayne, 1976
- Marichal, Juan, “Torres Villarroel: Autobiografía burguesa al hispánico modo,” Papels de Son Armadans 36 (1965):297–306
- Mercadier, Guy, “¿Cuándo nació Diego Torres de Villarroel?,” Insula 18, no. 197 (1963):14
- Peset Reig, Mariano, and José L. Peset Reig, “Un buen negocio de Torres Villarroel,” Cuadernos Hispanoamericanos 279 (1973): 514–36
- Sebold, Russell P., “Mixtificación y estructura picarescas en la Vida de Torres Villarroel,” Insula 18, no. 204 (1963):7, 12
- Varela, Antonio, “Narration and Theme in Vida of Diego de Torres Villarroel,” American Hispanist 4, nos. 34–35 (1979):5–7
- Zavala, Iris M., “Utopía y astrología en la literatura popular del setecientos: Los almanques de Torres Villarroel,” Nueva Revista de Filología Hispánica 33, no. 1 (1984):196–212
- Zavala, Iris M., Lecturas y lectores del discurso narrativo dieciochesco, Amsterdam: Rodopi, 1987

Tract

A tract has come to be distinguished from its cognate tractate because of its brevity, its religious, moral, and/or political character, its hortatory, often highly emotional style—calculated to win converts rather than to stimulate discussion or analysis—and its suitability for widespread distribution. The American Tract Society (ATS) in 1824 proclaimed that “a plain didactic essay on a religious subject may be read by a Christian with much pleasure,” but warned that those for whom tracts are designed “will fall asleep over it. There must be something to allure the listless to read, and this can only be done by blending entertainment with instruction.” Copying the style, if not the content, of increasingly popular novels, romances, and adventure stories, tract writers employed brisk pacing, sprightly dialogue, and narrative situations that the reader, imagined as lower-class and poorly educated, either would be likely to face or might fantasize about facing. Thanks to this formula, coupled with modern printing and distribution techniques, the ATS has estimated that from 1800 to 1825 100 million copies of tracts were published worldwide, with titles such as “Stop That Thought,” “The Blaspheming Sailor Reclaimed,” and “Twenty-Two Reasons for Not Being a Roman Catholic.”

While Evangelicals strove to convey a simple creed to a mass audience, a group of Anglo-Catholic reformers led by John Henry Newman employed tracts differently. Although these members of the so-called Oxford Movement became known as Tractarians because of their Tracts for the Times (1833–41), only Newman wrote tracts in the narrow sense, possibly because he was an avid reader of them. The others, including John Keble and Edward Pusey, instead wrote learned treatises. In any case, what the Tractarians sought was a “middle way” in the Church of England between the extremes of Protestantism and Catholicism. In the last and most famous of the series, Tract 90, Newman tried to remove all obstacles blocking the recognition that Anglican teaching was apostolic and Catholic in nature. The tract was censored by the Church, and Newman became a Roman Catholic a few years later.

Somewhat paradoxically, given the response to Tract 90 and the virulent anti-Catholicism of the evangelical tracts, the Catholic Homilies (wr. c. 985–95) of Abbot Ælfric are perhaps the earliest specimens of the genre in English literature. Ælfric used these vernacular homilies both to embolden the English, who were facing renewed onslaughts from the Vikings, and to educate those in the clergy who did not know Latin well enough to understand basic Christian theology. John Wycliffe greatly influenced medieval theology with tracts known as the Summa de ente (wr. c. 1370; Treatise on being), which challenged the dominant philosophical nominalism of the 14th century. Religion and politics merged in the tracts of Martin Luther, including De captivitate Babylonica (The Babylonian captivity of the Church) and An den Christlichen Adel deutscher Nation (An address to the Christian nobility of the German nation), both of 1520, the latter of which alleged wickedness and corruption in the Catholic Church and proposed reforms in Church and nation. Other 16th-century writers who tackled theological and political issues in tracts include Sir Thomas More, John Fisher, and William Tyndale. The anonymous author or authors who took the name “Martin Marprelate” wrote a rollicking series of tracts (1588–89), which have been called the best prose satires of the Elizabethan age; such noted writers as John Lyly and Thomas Nashe responded with tracts attacking Marprelate’s rough handling of England’s bishops. Tracts poured from the press during the English Civil War and subsequent Commonwealth era (1642–60). Bookseller George Thomason collected some 23,000 items, mostly tracts, which are now bound and housed at the British Library. One of the most prolific tract writers was John Milton, whose Of Reformation Touching Church Discipline in England (1641), among others, attacked the English bishops. Milton’s early tracts shed considerable light on his later, more famous writings, as is the case with Jonathan Swift in the early 18th century.

In the last decade of the 18th century, as England began to be flooded with revolutionary pamphlets such as Thomas Paine’s Rights of Man (1791–92) as well as penny pamphlets and ballads, socialite-turned-evangelical writer Hannah More was asked by the Bishop of London to undertake countermeasures. “To teach the poor to read, without providing them with safe books,” she wrote at the time, “has always appeared to me an improper measure.” She began contributing to, and overseeing, the Cheap Repository of Moral and Religious Tracts (1795–98). Two million copies of these thrice-monthly tracts were distributed in the first year, largely among the poor and needy by wealthy people who purchased subscriptions. Contributors besides More included Henry Thornton, John Newton, and William Mason. The tracts have been derided as banal and stuffed with mindless reactionary politics, but careful study by Susan Pedersen (1986) has shown that most of the tracts attack general evils, from drunkenness to slavery, and “defy a simple political explanation.”

Largely because of the project’s success, the London Religious Tract Society was formed in 1799, and one year later the first organized distribution of tracts began in America. Over time, employees of the American Tract Society began going from house to house furnishing tracts to anyone unable to buy them. This activity and related practices quickly spread around the world. David Sonenschein (1982) calculated that there were 4000 tracts in circulation from 43 known tract publishers, with total printings well into the billions. Despite this success, and the fact that Hannah More as much as anyone else made the written word accessible to new readers, the reputation of the tract has undergone serious erosion since her time. For instance, while 19th-century tracts promoted such commendable causes as the abolition of slavery, in the 20th century the genre is often associated with intolerance and bigotry, as in the outpourings of such racist groups as the Citizens' Councils during the American Civil Rights movement. At its best, though, as A.G.Newell wrote (1966), the tract "elevated a species of ephemeral journalism into a genuine kind of creative literature."

STEVEN EPLEY

See also Religious Essay

Anthologies

The Marprelate Tracts 1588, 1589, edited by William Pierce, London: Clarke, 1911
Tracts on Liberty of Conscience and Persecution, 1614–1661, New York: Franklin, 1966 (original edition, 1846)

Further Reading

The American Tract Society Documents, 1824–1925, New York: Arno Press, 1972
 Brown, Ford K., Fathers of the Victorians: The Age of Wilberforce, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1961
 Carlson, Leland H., "Martin Marprelate: His Identity and His Satire," in English Satire: Papers Read at a Clark Library Seminar, January 15, 1972, edited by Leland and Ronald Paulson, Los Angeles: William Andrews Clark Memorial Library, 1972:1–53
 Cook, Richard I., Jonathan Swift as a Tory Pamphleteer, Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1967
 Ffinch, Michael, Cardinal Newman: The Second Spring, San Francisco: Ignatius Press, and London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1991
 Jay, Elisabeth, editor, The Evangelical and Oxford Movements, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1983
 Lindholt, Paul J., "The Significance of the Colonial Promotion Tract," in Early American Literature and Culture: Essays Honoring Harrison T. Meserole, edited by K.Z. Derounian Stodola, Newark: University of Delaware Press, 1992
 Myers, Mitzi, "Hannah More's Tracts for the Times: Social Fiction and Female Ideology," in Fetter'd or Free? British Women Novelists, 1670–1815, edited by Mary Anne Schofield and Cecilia Macheski, Athens: Ohio University Press, 1986:264–84
 Newell, A.G., "Early Evangelical Fiction," Evangelical Quarterly 38 (1966):3–21
 Nord, David Paul, The Evangelical Origins of Mass Media in America, 1815–1835, Columbia, South Carolina: Association for Education in Journalism and Mass Communications, 1984
 Nord, David Paul, "Systematic Benevolence: Religious Publishing and the Marketplace

- in Early Nineteenth-century America,” in Communication and Change in American Religious History, edited by Leonard I. Sweet, Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1993:239–69
- Pedersen, Susan, “Hannah More Meets Simple Simon: Tracts, Chapbooks, and Popular Culture in Late Eighteenth-century England,” Journal of British Studies 25 (1986):84–113
- Poole, Kristen, “Saints Alive! Falstaff, Martin Marprelate, and the Staging of Puritanism,” Shakespeare Quarterly 46 (1995): 47–75
- Sales, Roger, English Literature in History, 1780–1830: Pastoral and Politics, London: Hutchinson, 1983: especially Chapter 1, “The Propaganda of the Victors”
- Sonenschein, David, “Sharing the Good News: The Evangelical Tract,” Journal of American Culture 5 (1982):107–21
- Spinney, G.H., “Cheap Repository Tracts: Hazard and Marshall Edition,” Library 20 (1939):295–340

Travel Essay

The nature of travel, often prolonged and unpredictable, is perhaps at odds with the concision of the essay form. Traveling lends itself to fragmentary modes—letters, notebooks, journals—which somehow swell to fill long books. Observations on manners, morals, and monuments; autobiographical and anecdotal digressions; the flow of narrative incident, reminiscence, and analysis—all seem to require leisurely and expansive treatment.

None of the earliest travel writers appears to have written in a form that could safely be called an essay. Herodotus produced a History of the Persian Wars, and Pausanias wrote a guidebook for second-century Roman travelers in Greece. The Venetian Marco Polo recounted his travels to China, and the medieval Berber, Ibn Battuta, told of visiting most of the known world. Explorers of the 15th and 16th centuries, including Christopher Columbus, Amerigo Vespucci, Bernal Diaz del Castillo, and Sir Walter Raleigh kept journals and wrote letters describing the marvels they encountered. But none of them, it seems, wrote travel essays.

Montaigne's famous essay, “Des cannibales” (1580; “Of Cannibals”), does not narrate his own travels, but reflects on the customs of different cultures, and the relative nature of barbarism: “each man calls barbarism whatever is not his own practice.” (Montaigne also kept a Journal de Voyage en Italie which was not published until 1774.) Francis Bacon's essay “Of Travel” (1625) advises young men what to see, and recommends keeping a diary. In 1763 Richard Hurd published “On the Uses of Foreign Travel,” a dialogue concerning the value of travel.

In the 18th century nearly every major writer tried his hand at writing a travel book—Defoe, Fielding, Smollett, Sterne, Johnson, Boswell, Goethe—but well-known travel essays are in short supply. In 1792 William Gilpin published his Three Essays: On Picturesque Beauty; On Picturesque Travel; and on Sketching Landscape. One might argue that the letters of Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, written in Turkey from 1716 to 1718, should count as travel essays. Wife of the British ambassador to Turkey, Lady Mary sent home hundreds of polished and witty letters, each a mini-essay about some aspect of Turkish life. Her trenchant observations on the contrasting merits of Turkish and British society place her among the most celebrated travel writers.

The great essayist William Hazlitt wrote “On Going a Journey” (1822), which extols the pleasures of traveling alone: “the soul of a journey is liberty.” In 1826 he published a series of essays, Notes of a Journey Through France and Italy; though he calls travel a splendid dream, he concludes that “our affections must settle at home.”

The Victorians’ appetite for travel books has probably never been equaled, but they tended to devour multi-volume tomes rather than succinct essays. Richard Burton alone produced 43 volumes of travel, and none of the era’s classics—Frances Trollope’s Domestic Manners of the Americans (1832), Alexander Kinglake’s Eöthen, or, Traces of Travel Brought Home from the East (1844), Charles Doughty’s Travels in Arabia Deserta (1888), and Mary Kingsley’s Travels in West Africa (1897)—is short. If the definition of the essay can be stretched once again to include letters, Isabella Bird’s bestknown work, A Lady’s Life in the Rocky Mountains (1879), recounts in a series of lively vignettes her adventures in the American West.

Leslie Stephen’s delightful mountaineering essays in The Playground of Europe (1871) were originally written for the Alpine Journal. Robert Louis Stevenson’s Essays of Travel were collected in 1905, yet he is better known for his charming account of Travels with a Donkey in the Cévennes (1879). Rudyard Kipling wrote Letters of Travel (1892–1913) (1920), a series of newspaper articles describing his visits to North America, Japan, and Egypt; later he published Brazilian Sketches (1927) and Souvenirs of France (1933).

Although the most popular 19th-century American travel writer, Mark Twain, wrote mainly long, humorous travel books—Innocents Abroad (1869), Roughing It (1872), A Tramp Abroad (1880)—other American authors produced admirable travel essays. Ralph Waldo Emerson visited England twice, in 1833 and 1847, and later published English Traits (1856) on topics such as manners, character, the aristocracy, and universities. For most travelers, personal experience forms the basis of their narratives, but Emerson preferred analysis to autobiography. His essays are prone to sweeping generalizations: “the one thing the English value is pluck.”

Unlike Emerson, who claimed to travel unwillingly, Henry James was an inveterate and passionate traveler. He published several volumes of travel essays: Transatlantic Sketches (1875), Portraits of Places (1883), and A Little Tour in France (1884, revised 1900); some travel essays reappeared in English Hours (1905) and Italian Hours (1909). James was familiar with Europe from childhood, and fascinated by the contrast between the Old World and the New. Like many of his novels, his travel sketches take Europe as both location and theme. He brought a wide culture to his travels, yet his purpose was not to instruct: “I write these lines with the full consciousness of having no information whatever to offer.” Instead he offered reminiscences and impressions, discriminating observations and sophisticated judgments, all in an urbane, cosmopolitan style.

D.H. Lawrence wrote a series of essays about his long stay in Italy, published in 1916 as Twilight in Italy. A restless traveler in search of a home, Lawrence lived in over a dozen countries and produced several more travel books, including Sea and Sardinia (1921), Mornings in Mexico (1927), and Etruscan Places (1932). Other important figures in 20th-century English travel are Evelyn Waugh, Graham Greene, Peter Fleming, Robert Byron, Freya Stark, Eric Newby, Patrick Leigh Fermor, Dervla Murphy, Jonathan Raban, and Bruce Chatwin. The best-known contemporary English travel essayist is Jan Morris, author of numerous collections including Places (1972), Travels (1976), Journeys (1984), and Among the Cities (1985).

Shiva Naipaul's Beyond the Dragon's Mouth: Stories and Pieces (1984) contains a number of his travel essays about England, India, Africa, and the Caribbean. V.S. Naipaul's travel writing includes an essay on the Ivory Coast, "The Crocodiles of Yamoussoukro," originally published in the New Yorker and reprinted in Finding the Center (1984).

In the United States, postwar travel essays are varied. James Baldwin's "Stranger in the Village" (1953) recounts his experience as the first black man to appear in a Swiss village. The New Yorker frequently publishes travel essays: those by Berton Roueche were collected under the title Sea to Shining Sea: People, Travel Places (1985), while a selection of Calvin Trillin's humorous essays came out in 1989 as Travels with Alice. Paul Theroux has made the persona of the grouchy rail traveler instantly recognizable; The Great Railway Bazaar (1975) was the first of many satiric travel books, and Theroux's travel essays appear in a wide variety of publications. Tim Cahill writes irreverent adventure travel articles for Outside and other magazines; two collections of his essays are Jaguars Ripped My Flesh: Adventure Is a Risky Business (1987) and A Wolverine Is Eating My Leg (1989).

Although the self-contained formal essay may not be best adapted to encompass the sprawling variety and multitudinousness of travel, the genre continues to flourish, often disguised as letters, sketches, impressions, portraits, or dispatches. Currently, travel essays of one sort or another appear in a wide range of newspapers and magazines; occasional issues of Granta are devoted to travel writing by contemporary authors.

HEATHER HENDERSON

Anthologies

A Book of Travellers' Tales, edited by Eric Newby, London: Collins, 1985; New York: Viking, 1986

Ladies on the Loose: Women Travellers of the 18th and 19th Centuries, edited by Leo Hamalian, New York: Dodd Mead, 1981

The Norton Book of Travel, edited by Paul Fussell, New York: Norton, 1987

The Spirit of Place: An Anthology of Travel Writings, edited by Michael Venter, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1992

A Taste for Travel: An Anthology, edited by John Julius Norwich, London: Macmillan, 1985; New York: Knopf, 1987

Travel Literature Through the Ages: An Anthology, edited by Percy G. Adams, New York: Garland, 1988

Further Reading

- Adams, Percy G., Travel Literature and the Evolution of the Novel, Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1983
- Batten, Charles L., Jr., Pleasurable Instruction: Form and Convention in Eighteenth-century Travel Literature, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1978
- Brown, Sharon Rogers, American Travel Narratives as a Literary Genre from 1542 to 1832: The Art of a Perpetual Journey, Lampeter, Dyfed, and Lewiston, New York: Mellen Press, 1993
- Caesar, Terry, Forgiving the Boundaries: Home as Abroad in American Travel Writing, Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1995
- Campbell, Mary B., The Witness and the Other World: Exotic European Travel Writing 400–1600, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1988
- Cocker, Mark, Loneliness and Time: British Travel Writing in the Twentieth Century, London: Secker and Warburg, and New York: Pantheon, 1992,
- Curley, Thomas M., Samuel Johnson and the Age of Travel, Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1976
- Foster, Shirley, Across New Worlds: Nineteenth-century Women Travellers and Their Writings, New York and London: Harvester Wheatsheaf, 1990
- Frawley, Maria H., A Wider Range: Travel Writing by Women in Victorian England, Rutherford, New Jersey: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1994
- Fussell, Paul, Abroad: British Literary Travelling Between the Wars, New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1980
- Kowalewski, Michael, editor, Tetnperamental Journeys: Essays on the Modern Literature of Travel, Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1992.
- Lawrence, Karen R., Penelope Voyages: Women and Travel in the British Literary Tradition, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1994
- Middleton, Dorothy, Victorian Lady Travelers, New York: Dutton, and London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1965
- Munter, Robert, and Clyde L.Grose, Englishmen Abroad: Being an Account of Their Travels in the Seventeenth Century, Lampeter, Dyfed and Lewiston, New York: Mellen Press, 1986
- Porter, Dennis, Haunted Journeys: Desire and Transgression in European Travel Writing, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1991
- Pratt, Mary Louise, Imperial Eyes: Travel Writing and Transculturation, London: Routledge, 1992
- Russell, Mary, The Blessings of a Good Thick Skirt: Women Travellers and Their World, London: Collins, 1988
- Stowe, William W., Going Abroad: European Travel in Nineteenth– Century American Culture, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1994

Treatise

Conventionally scientific, historical, or philosophical in theme, the treatise (from the Latin tractatus) is a text of variable length (sometimes of book length), which treats some particular topic by way of a formal, methodical exposition. As a description, account, or report of some topic under investigation, its literary effect today is secondary to its seriousness of purpose; but an earlier tradition also held the treatise to be a story, tale, or narrative, as in the stories of Chaucer's Canterbury Tales.

Once the major literary medium of scholasticism, the treatise is a nonfictional literary text that shares a border with the formal essay, and may thus be best understood by way of a comparison with the general essay form. The latter is an expository text organized into relatively short prose, readable in one sitting, and articulating the author's perception through an associative and open-ended synthesis of rigorous method and imaginative literature. The treatise, on the other hand, is a literary text in which the author typically retreats behind the methodological principles of logic and rationalism, of the syllogism and systematic objectivity. Continuous control and verification of results and conclusions are the goal in the discourse of a treatise. Critical approach, rigorous methodology, and a high degree of specialization, expertise, and seriousness—as evident in the avoidance of chance, subjectivity, and imaginative play—all characterize the treatise and distinguish it from the essay.

The innovation in a treatise's subject is generally not marked by its style, which restricts itself to reporting, describing, and deducing. In contrast, the originality of an essay, particularly the informal, occasional, or familiar essay, often proceeds from its form, structure, style, and tone, even though the essay may contain no new factual truths. Not only does the treatise proceed logically from steadfast premises, but the conventional treatise presents its truths as accomplished facts, as logical conclusions. It aims for completeness, remains with the matter at hand, and follows singlemindedly its explicit purpose, often to the point of pedantry.

The treatise reports or treats results obtained empirically or deductively. Neither aesthetic nor rhetorical principles of style contribute to its value; in fact, they may detract from it. Often, elaboration of form has been viewed with a good deal of suspicion as artistry attained at the expense of objectivity, rigor, precision, and scientific truth. Indeed, it could be said that when sophisticated and varied form and style occupy a prominent position in matters of structure, the text has changed from being a treatise to being an essay. Moreover, the closed, systematically ordered communication between writer and reader is monologic in a treatise, and does not involve the reader as a partner or respondent in its discourse. And the truths a treatise implies must exist beyond all doubt for both the writer and the reader: doubtful observations must be excluded from the treatise's realm.

Clearly, the methodological and rhetorical disparities between treatise and essay are a reflection of differences in the readership of these two literary forms. While the treatise instructs the specialized reader in scientific “truth,” the essay persuades and entertains, by way of congenial conversation, the general reader of general interests.

RALPH W. BUECHLER

Further Reading

- Burnett, Mark Thornton, “Masters and Servants in Moral and Religious Treatises, c. 1580–c. 1642.,” in The Arts, Literature, and Society, edited by Arthur Marwick, London and New York: Routledge, 1990
- Dubrow, Heather, Genre, London: Methuen, 1982
- Feyerabend, Paul, Against Method: Outline of an Anarchistic Theory of Knowledge, London and New York: Verso, 3rd edition, 1993 (original edition, 1975)
- Kruse, Joseph, “Traktat,” in Reallexikon der deutschen Literaturgeschichte, vol. 4, edited by Klaus Kanzog and Achim Masser, Berlin: de Gruyter, 1981
- Lewalski, Barbara Kiefer, editor, Renaissance Genres: Essays on Theory, History and Interpretation, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1986

Trilling, Lionel

American, 1905–1975

Though he wrote at least one masterful short story, a timely and respected novel, and books on two major authors, Lionel Trilling may be strongest in the essay form. His strong sense of “self” is suited to the compact and intense first-person expression of the essay. His first-person point of view is characteristically plural for the reasons he self-consciously outlines in the preface to his third collection, Beyond Culture (1965), and the compactness of his essays often embraces extensive complexity. Nevertheless, the short form geared to strong statements about modern culture, rather than strict literary criticism or theory, is Trilling’s hallmark. Further, despite his embracing the trendy Freudian thought of mid-century and his frequent evoking of the vaunted liberalism of New York intellectuals (the jeremiahs of our time), Trilling as essayist and cultural critic is strangely anachronistic. He is best at his version of Matthew Arnold’s moves toward general ideas of humanness. He is even reminiscent of a moralist like the Samuel Johnson whose mentors had advised “first get general principles.” Hence Trilling is often dismissed both by more practical liberals and by more incisive critics of modern literature as old-fashioned and even stuffy. But his several dozen strong essays remain in print as a voice for the old human values of opposition and struggle.

Learning again from Arnold and maybe even from Dr. Johnson himself, Trilling consciously analyzes his own high seriousness of both intent and rhetoric when he talks about his use of “we” in the short prefatory essay to his third collection. He gently wants to nudge what he calls “the temper of our age” toward the serious contemplation of selfhood and value. Similarly, in the important preface to his first collection The Liberal Imagination (1950), which won him immediate fame as a cultural critic, Trilling defines the nature of and the reasons for another key characteristic of his style—his continual folding back on himself with qualification and complexity. He points out that one role for the liberal thinker is to simplify issues in order to move toward progress; but it is that move to simplification and system that he continually opposes. His essays as a whole, as well as the separate parts of essays, demonstrate the reality for Trilling of variety and complexity and of the heroic benefits derived from oppositions, even within the self, so that in the end any first-person plural consensus becomes buried in time and complexity. In other words, Trilling's old-fashioned commitment to broad human values, with a full awareness of how complex those might be, places him in constant opposition to the practical movements of his own time.

One of Trilling's heroes of selfhood is the poet John Keats, but his essay on Keats that heads his second collection, The Opposing Self (1955), is not about the poetry but rather the letters. Similarly, his exciting early essay on Wordsworth's "Intimations of Immortality," which has helped many with the ode over the years, strangely is not much about the poetry itself but rather about ideas. Trilling admitted that he preferred the 19th-century novel, in which social ideas are more important than the language experimentation of Modernist novels; this preference is more evidence of his commitment to a general humanism.

Finally, then, there is an abstractness and, perhaps, an honest and self-conscious anachronism at the heart of Trilling's work with the essay. He is at odds with himself. If he were primarily known for his fiction, or even as a crafty poet (and Trilling is capable of very crafty writing), he might seem more concrete and fixed to his readers. Instead Trilling achieved fame in the essay by acknowledging the essay almost as a secondary form. He qualifies and opposes himself at the same time that he insists on our need to commit to society and to literature. Thus, somewhere between the poignancy of a personal essayist such as Lamb and the practicality of a new thinker such as Freud, Trilling's several collections of essays waver as the cultural criticism of a qualified and qualifying man. For him this civility is part of being a gentleman. He was indeed a gentle man.

DONALD M.HASSLER

Biography

Born 4 July 1905 in New York. Studied at Columbia University, New York, 1921–26, B.A., 1925, M.A., 1926, Ph.D., 1938. Worked for the Menorah Journal, New York, 1923–31; taught at the University of Wisconsin, Madison, 1926–27, Hunter College, New York, 1928–34, and Columbia University, 1932–75; visiting professor or Fellow, Oxford University, 1964–65, Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1969–70, and All Souls College, Oxford, 1972–73. Married Diana Rubin (i.e. the writer Diana Trilling), 1929; one son. Member of the editorial board, Kenyon Review and Partisan Review. Awards: Mark Van Doren Award; Thomas Jefferson Award; Brandeis University Creative Arts Award; honorary degrees from eight universities. Member, American Academy of Arts and Sciences, 1951. Died in New York, 5 November 1975.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

The Liberal Imagination: Essays on Literature and Society, 1950

The Opposing Self: Nine Essays in Criticism, 1955

A Gathering of Fugitives, 1956

Beyond Culture: Essays on Literature and Learning, 1965

Sincerity and Authenticity (lectures), 1972

The Last Decade: Essays and Reviews, edited by Diana Trilling, 1979

Prefaces to the Experience of Literature, 1979

Speaking of Literature and Society, edited by Diana Trilling, 1980

Other writings: the novel The Middle of the Journey (1947), short stories, and books on Matthew Arnold and E.M.Forster.

Collected works edition: Works (Uniform Edition), edited by Diana Trilling, 12 vols., 1978–80.

Bibliographies

Barnaby, Marianne Gilbert, "Lionel Trilling: A Bibliography, 1926–1972," Bulletin of Bibliography (January–March 1974): 37–44

Leitch, Thomas M., Lionel Trilling: An Annotated Bibliography, New York: Garland, 1993

Further Reading

Anderson, Quentin, Stephen Donadio, and Steven Marcus, editors, Art, Politics, and Will: Essays in Honor of Lionel Trilling, New York: Basic Books, 1977

Boyers, Robert, Lionel Trilling: Negative Capability and the Wisdom of Avoidance, Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1977

Chace, William M., Lionel Trilling: Criticism and Politics, Stanford, California: Stanford University Press, 1980

French, Philip, Three Honest Men: Edmund Wilson, F.R.Leavis, Lionel Trilling: A Critical Mosaic, Manchester: Carcanet, 1980

Krupnick, Mark, Lionel Trilling and the Fate of Cultural Criticism, Evanston, Illinois: Northwestern University Press, 1986

Scott, Nathan A., Jr., Three American Moralists: Mailer, Bellow, Trilling, Notre Dame, Indiana: University of Notre Dame Press, 1973

Shoben, Edward Joseph, Jr., Lionel Trilling, New York: Ungar, 1981

Tanner, Stephen L., Lionel Trilling, Boston: Twayne, 1988

Trilling, Diana, The Beginning of the Journey, New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1993

Trottier, Pierre

French Canadian, 1925–

First known as a poet with Le Combat contre Tristan (1951; The fight against Tristan), Pierre Trottier is a writer of memory, roots, erudition, and culture, no less than a man of professional travels and life in old foreign cities (Moscow, Jakarta, Paris, Lima). His poems from Russia are obsessed with exile, strangeness, origins, identity, and differentiation. Les Belles au bois dormant (1960; The beauties in the sleeping woods) are not fairytales but a gallery of women and men (widow, virgin, private soldier, rebel with or without a cause) of all conditions. Sainte-Mémoire (1972,; Saint Memory) is a collection of returns and reconsiderations: to Oedipus, Don Quixote, Canadian winter, the concept of zero as scratch or as starting point. Time must not only be (re)collected, but corrected; his apparent simplicity, legibility, is a catch.

The 17 short essays of Mon Babel (1963; My Babel) deal with lost paradises and new horizons throughout Greek, French, and English classics. Trottier tries to translate, to adapt his Canadian or North American situation in space and time. He connects ideas as he opposes and links landscapes, seasons, ages, sexes. He contrasts cold, clear, sunny Canadian winters with wet, cloudy, dull European winters. He looks at the white plains with the eyes of a nonfigurative painter, Paul-Émile Borduas, chief of the Automatistes group and author of Refus global (1948; Global refusal), an influential manifesto against the Dark Ages (“la grande Noirceur”) of conservatism, clericalism, and academicism.

Un pays baroque (1979; A baroque country) is lively, tortuous, witty, and moving. From the scholastic, self-styled “Status questionis” to an open conclusion called “Ephphata,” it contains 13 assorted essays, sketches, monologues, comedies, parodies, and morality plays, with a blithe mix of Latin, Greek, Aramaic, Amerindian titles, proverbs, and slogans. Canada is seen as a paradoxical country on account of its geophysics, geopolitics, history, and no-story; it is a railway, a seaway, a highway a mari usque ad mare (from sea to sea) along the border of the United States.

Trottier’s most recent collection of essays, Ma dame à la licorne (1988; My lady of the unicorn), is his most autobiographical, full of dreams, readings, and encounters. “Nostalgia taught me curiosity,” he says. This book is a celebration of woman as mother of life, myth, language, and art. Before being born in (and from) a country, every man comes from (and in) a woman.

Trottier’s wor(l)d trip is a love trip among Latin and Russian etymologies, encompassing Jivago, Malenkov, Molotov, but most of all doucha (soul) and doukh (spirit). Trottier’s essays are also, often, pieces of poetry in prose.

LAURENT MAILHOT

Biography

Born 21 March 1925 in Montreal. Studied at the Jesuit Collèges de Sainte-Marie and Jean-de-Brébeuf, B.A., 1942; Law School of the University of Montreal, law degree, 1945. Secretary to the Chamber of Commerce, Montreal; joined the Department of External Affairs, Ottawa, 1949: diplomatic posts in Moscow, 1951–54 and 1970–73, Jakarta, 1956–57, London, 1954–61, and Paris, 1964–68. Married Barbara Theis, 1952: two daughters and one son. Associated with the Center for International Affairs, Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts; Ambassador to Peru, 1973–76; diplomatic adviser to the Governor-General of Canada, 1976–79; Ambassador to UNESCO, 1969–84. Awards: David Prize, 1963; Society of Men of Letters Prize, for poetry, 1964. Member, Royal Society of Canada, 1978.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Mon Babel, 1963

Un pays baroque, 1979

Ma dame à la licorne, 1988

Other writings: many collections of poems, collected in SainteMemoire (1972) and En valles closes: Poèmes 1951–1986 (1989).

Bibliography

Hamel, Réginald, John Hare, and Paul Wyczynski, Dictionnaire des auteurs de langue française en Amérique du Nord, Montreal: Fides, 1989:1308–09

Further Reading

Archambault, Gilles, “Mow Babel, de Pierre Trottier,” in Livres et auteurs canadiens 1963, Montreal: Jurmonville, 1964: 87–89

Dorais, Fernand, “Mon Babel, essai de Pierre Trottier,” in Dictionnaire des œuvres littéraires du Québec, vol. 4, edited by Maurice Lemire, Montreal: Fides, 1984:584–85

Grandpré, Pierre de, “Mon Babel, de Pierre Trottier,” in his Dix Ans de vie littéraire au Canada français, Montreal: Beauchemin, 1966:234–41

Marcotte, Gilles, “Diplomate, essayiste et poete: Pierre Trottier...” Québec (October 1964):92–95

Morency, Jean, “Un pays baroque, essai de Pierre Trottier,” in Dictionnaire des œuvres littéraires du Québec, vol. 6, edited by Maurice Lemire, Montreal: Fides, 1994: 864–65

Pavelich, Joan, Pierre Trottier, poète et essayiste (M.A. dissertation), Montreal: University of Montreal, 1979

Vachon, Georges-André, "Pour une morale du risque," Québec (October 1964):126–17

Tsvetaeva, Marina

Russian, 1892–1941

Marina Tsvetaeva's prose has always been to some extent the naughty stepchild of her poetry. Even after she had gained recognition as a world-class poet, a distinction dating from 1960, if not before, her prose continued to be regarded as "painfully pretentious and obscure" (D.S.Mirsky, A History of Russian Literature, 1960). Despite the hostile critical reception, she produced a sizable body of prose covering a wide range of nonfictional genres. Among these, perhaps the best known are her autobiographical sketches, especially her masterful trilogy "Dom u Starogo Pimena" (1933; "The House at Old Pimen"), "Mat' i muzyka" (1935; "My Mother and Music"), and "Moi Pushkin" (1937; "My Pushkin"), but they also include memoirs, travel sketches, diaries, and prose portraits of her famous contemporaries in the Silver Age of Russian literature, such as Maximilian Voloshin ("Zhivoe o zhivom" [1933; "A Living Word About a Living Man"]), Andrei Belyi ("Plennyi dukh" [1934; "A Captive Spirit"]), and Valerii Briusov ("Geroi truda" [1925; A hero of labor]). They appear as genres more familiar to Western readers (the book review and the feuilleton), as well as some brilliant and highly idiosyncratic forays into literary history and criticism: an appreciation of her beloved contemporary Pasternak ("Svetovoi liven'" [1922; "A Downpour of Light"]), a comparison of Pasternak and Maiakovskii ("Epos i lirika sovremennoi rossii" [1932; "Epic and Lyric in Contemporary Russia"]), and theoretical essays ("Iskusstvo pri svete sovesti" [1932; "Art in the Light of Conscience"], "Poet i vremia" [1932; "The Poet and Time"], and "Poety s istoriei i poety bez istorii" [1934; "Poets with a History and Poets Without a History"]).

Tsvetaeva's prose covers nearly the entire span of her creative career. As J. Marin King's ground-breaking translations (published in A Captive Spirit, 1980) indicate, it can be divided into three periods with some overlap. The first period extends from 1917 to 1921 and contains predominantly diaries and prose sketches culled from her experiences in the Russian Revolutions of 1917 and the Civil War. The second (1922 to 1932) is devoted to essays on poets and writers, the nature of creativity, and the ethics of writing. The third period extends from 1934 to 1937. During this period myth and memory merged to produce the most memorable of the prose portraits as well as the landmark autobiographical sketches. As King also indicates, the thematic and chronological continuity among the autobiographical sketches suggests that Tsvetaeva viewed them not independently but as chapters of an autobiography.

Undoubtedly the main reason why Tsvetaeva's prose did not initially receive the recognition it deserved is its extreme difficulty. Hers is a powerful prose that delights in flexing its muscles. In its terseness it resembles a form of personal shorthand. Transitions are replaced by dashes linking unrelated, even antithetical ideas. Paragraphs are reduced to a single sentence, and sentences to a single word. The reduction of the text to its smallest structural unit is a deliberate Tsvetaevan strategy. For her, the word is not an empty signifier but a repository of sound, and sound generates meaning. This is demonstrated by her favorite technique of taking a single word and from it deriving an entire chain of auditory and thematic associations. Unfortunately, these chains of association are often so personal that they leave the uninitiated reader bewildered.

The question of Tsvetaeva's relationship to her reader has received much critical attention because it was unique, even in the age of formal experimentation in which she wrote. Although a great admirer of Montaigne and Sainte-Beuve, she has neither their discursive style nor their critical distance. Instead she adopts an uncompromising attitude toward her reader, keeping up a rapid-fire barrage of indicatives, interrogatives, direct address, and interpolated asides representing either her own "alternate" voice or the reader's assumed reply. From this, both Joseph Brodsky (1986) and Angela Livingstone (introduction to Tsvetaeva's Art in the Light of Consciousness, 1992) conclude that her style is dialogic, while King emphasizes that it has the sound and rhythm of a live human voice. This too is a deliberate strategy on Tsvetaeva's part. She provokes the reader into joining her in the spirit of "cocreation": "...what is reading if not deciphering, interpreting, drawing out something secret, something behind the lines, beyond the limits of words. (Not to mention the difficulties of syntax!) Reading is—above all—co-creating" ("Poet o kritik" [1926; "The Poet on the Critic"]).

No less unique is the structure of her essays, which strikes us by its lack of inductive argument. She typically begins by stating a paradox. She then develops one branch of the paradox as far as possible. Returning to her point of origin, she develops the opposite branch until she reaches a point where the two meet, like a pair of clasped arms. In the process, she consistently elevates the level of argument until she reaches a conclusion, most often couched in the form of an aphorism. Tsvetaeva was addicted to aphorisms, and hers are particularly rewarding: "Every poet is essentially an émigré...émigré from the Kingdom of Heaven and from the earthly paradise of nature ... An émigré from immortality in time, a non-returner to his own heaven" ("The Poet and Time").

Tsvetaeva wrote the bulk of her prose in emigration and published in various Russian émigré periodicals based in Prague, Berlin, and Paris: Volia Rossii (Russia's will), Chisla (Dates), Poslednie Novosti (The latest news), Sovremennye Zapiski (Contemporary annals), to name but a few. The process was far from smooth: her longer essays were subjected to brutal editorial cuts, and two projected book-length collections, the one of her Civil War diaries, the other of her critical essays, never materialized for lack of a publisher. Ironically, it was her prose that ultimately shaped her fate in emigration. Her scathing attack of 1926 on the Russian émigré literary establishment, "The Poet on the Critic," caused an outraged community to ostracize her, thus depriving her of an audience. Only since the 1980s has her stature as a brilliant memoirist and profound essayist been conclusively established.

Laura D. Weeks

Biography

Marina Ivanovna Tsvetaeva. Born 26 September 1892 in Moscow. Studied at schools in Switzerland and Germany, and at the Sorbonne, Paris. Married Sergei Efron, 1912 (executed, 1939): two daughters (one starved to death) and one son. Trapped in Moscow for five years after the 1917 Revolution; left Russia, 1922, for Berlin, Prague, and finally Paris, 1925; returned to Russia, 1939, but officially ostracized and unable to publish. Died (suicide by hanging) in Elabuga, 31 August 1941.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Proza, 1953

Izbrannaiia proza v dvukh tomakh, 1917–1937, 2 vols., 1979

A Captive Spirit: Selected Prose, translated by J. Marin King, 1980

Proza, edited by A.A. Saakiantz, 1989

Ob iskusstve (On art), 1991

Gde otstypaetsia liubov' (Where love renounces), 1991

Art in the Light of Conscience: Eight Essays on Poetry, translated by Angela Livingstone, 1992.

Other writings: ten volumes of poetry and much correspondence.

Collected works editions: Stikhotvoreniia i poemy v piati tomakh, edited by Alexander Sumerkin and Viktoria Schweitzer, 5 vols., 1980–90; Sobranie sochinenii, 7 vols., 1994–95.

Bibliography

Gladkova, Tatiana, and Lev Mnukhin, Bibliographie des œuvres de Marina Tsvetaeva, Paris: Institut d'Études Slaves, 1982

Further Reading

Baer, Joachim T., "Three Variations on the Theme 'Moi Pushkin': Briusov, Akhmatova, Tsvetaeva," Transactions of the Association of Russian-American Scholars in the U.S.A. 20 (1987): 163–83

Brodsky, Joseph, "A Poet and Prose," in his Less than One: Selected Essays, New York: Farrar Straus Giroux, and London: Viking, 1986

Chester, Pamela, "Engaging Sexual Demons in Marina Tsvetaeva's 'Devil': The Body and the Genesis of the Woman Poet," Slavic Review 53, no. 4 (1994)

Feiler, Lily, Marina Tsvetaeva: The Double Beat of Heaven and Hell, Durham, North Carolina: Duke University Press, 1994

Feinstein, Elaine, A Captive Lion: The Life of Marina Tsvetaeva, London: Hutchinson, and New York: Dutton, 1987

Forrester, Sibelan, "Marina Tsvetaeva as Literary Critic and Critic of Literary Critics," in Russian Writers on Russian Writers, edited by Faith Wigzell and Robin Aizelwood, Oxford: Berg, 1994

Gifford, Henry, "Joseph Brodsky on Marina Tsvetaeva," in Russian Writers on Russian

- Writers, edited by Faith Wigzell and Robin Aizelwood, Oxford: Berg, 1994
- Karlinsky, Simon, Marina Tsvetaeva: The Woman, Her World and Her Poetry, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1985
- Knapp, Liza, "Tsvetaeva's Two Goncharovas," in Cultural Mythologies of Russian Modernism: From the Golden Age to the Silver Age, edited by Boris Gasparov, Robert P. Hughes, and Irina Paperno, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1992
- Korkina, Elena, "'Pushkin i Pugachev': Liricheskoe rassledovanie Mariny Tsvetaevoi," in Marina Tsvetaeva: One Hundred Years: Papers from the Tsvetaeva Centenary Symposium, edited by Viktoria Schweitzer and others, Berkeley, California: Berkeley Slavic Specialties, 1994
- Kroth, Anya M., "The Poet and Time in Marina Tsvetaeva's Philosophical Essays," in Russian Literature and American Critics: In Honor of Deming B. Brown, edited by Kenneth N. Brostrom, Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Department of Slavic Languages and Literatures, 1984
- Lossky, Véronique, Marina Tsvetaeva: Un Itinéraire poétique, Paris: Solin, 1987
- Mnatsakanova, Elizaveta, "O roli detskogo vospominaniia v psikhologii khudozhestvennogo tvorchestva: Na primere prozy Mariny Tsvetaevoi i dvukh otryvok iz romana F.M. Dostoevskogo 'Brat'ia Karamazovy'," Wiener Slawistischer Almanach 19 (1982):325–49
- Schweitzer, Viktoria, Tsvetaeva, edited and annotated by Angela Livingstone, London: Harvill Press, 1992; New York: Farrar Straus Giroux, 1993
- Smith, Alexandra, "The Cnidus Myth and Tsvetaeva's Interpretation of Pushkin's Love for N. Goncharova," Essays in Poetics 14, no. 2 (1989):83–102
- Taubman, Jane A., A Life Through Poetry: Marina Tsvetaeva's Lyric Diary, Columbus, Ohio: Slavica, 1989

Turgenev, Ivan

Russian, 1818–1883

Apollon Grigor'ev, a 19th-century Russian critic, complained that Ivan Turgenev set no straight course and consequently was "subject to all winds, the stirrings of a breeze" and its gossamer waftings. What was a shortcoming for Grigor'ev is serendipity for the modern reader, for without a manifest ideology and program Turgenev became the sensitive eye and ear of his era. He was attuned to the most subtle changes in societal temperature and weather. Though only two of his 28 volumes of works and letters are composed of essays and other articles, these range in subject from the psychic life of a dog ("Pegaz" [1871; Pegasus]), to coverage and analysis of the Franco-Prussian War, to an appreciation of the ruins of the temple of Zeus discovered in Pergamon in 1878. Turgenev produced travel articles, reviews of literature, music, and art, cultural commentary, ethnographic sketches, reportage, reminiscences of famous friends, and obituaries, as well as a currently archaic form, the prepared speech for significant occasions—an oral essay. In a highly politicized time in Russian history the above appeared in diverse magazines and newspapers such as the Russkii Vestnik (Russian courier), Vestnik Evropy (Courier of Europe), Sovremennik (The contemporary), Novoe

Vremia (New times), Spb Vedomosti (St. Petersburg news), Nedelia (The week), Moskovskii Vestnik (Moscow courier), and even the Zhurnal Okhoty i Konnozavodstva (Hunter's and horseman's journal).

Turgenev saw himself as living during an era of transition in Russian culture and history (Vospominanie ob A.A. Ivanove [1861; "Reminiscences of Ivanov"]). For him Russia was a powerful nation but in an embryonic state of unformed corporate institutions and unattended tensions. He was at once very Russian and an exemplar of a European-wide high culture. Turgenev was fluent in Russian, French, and German, knew English and Italian, and read in the classical languages. So proficient was he in French that he could differentiate between the dialects of Provence and Gascony. He was well versed in the principal European traditions of literary criticism and the serious essay of social and political commentary, citing numerous French practitioners of the craft and especially valuing Gotthold Ephraim Lessing in German and Thomas Babington Macaulay in English. He was an astute critic of the arts, knowledgeable in technique, historical significance, and effect. In many respects he prefigures his younger contemporary, Walter Pater. With such scope Turgenev naturally eschewed the utilitarian notion of a writer being driven by a particular agenda or by the projection of his own ideas into his art ("Po povodu Otsov i detei" [1869; "On Fathers and Sons"]).

Turgenev's first true essay, "Les i step'" (1849; "The Forest and the Steppe")—published first in Sovremennik and then as an appendage to his Zapiski okhotnika (1852; A Sportsman's Sketches)—began a tradition of reflections on the significance of human life and its meaning. It deals specifically with immutable nature, the transience of the manifest, and the obscurity of the transcendent. This theme casts a constant shadow over his dominant idealism. Like most intellectuals of the time Turgenev believed in universal progress, both material and spiritual, thus revealing his Hegelian inheritance and the fruits of his philosophical studies in Berlin. Literature (and literary criticism) to him was the royal road to understanding culture and the self. Turgenev held this belief perhaps more fervently than either Dostoevskii or Tolstoi, who themselves embraced alternative systems as well. Art for Turgenev was not so much for entertainment as it was for the education of sensibility, although there is some dissonance between his views of literature as keeper of civic consciousness (the 1860s) and intimate salon literature (1830s and 1840s), as exemplified in "Literaturnyi vecher u P.A.Pletneva" (1869; "A Literary Evening at Pletnev's"). Scrupulously dispassionate and evenhanded in his reminiscences, he praises both Timofei Granovskii and Nikolai Stankevich for their accomplishments, though he adores the first and is cool toward the second. In "Vospominaniia o Belinskom" (1869; "Reminiscences on Belinskii") he praises love of country while discrediting chauvinism and self-styled defenders of the motherland. In another essay Turgenev reveals a subtle psychological sense that sees the notorious Jean Baptiste Tropmann ("Kazn' Tropmana" [1870; "The Execution of Tropmann"]) on the morning of his execution as giving a bravura "stage performance" to the assembled distinguished witnesses and thus keeping himself from disintegrating into hysterics. After the beheading none of the company feels that an act of justice has taken place.

Of the greats, Turgenev esteems Pushkin (e.g. his speech at the dedication of the monument to Pushkin in 1881, a major event in the history of Russian culture), Shakespeare (a speech at the celebration in 1864 of the 300th anniversary of Shakespeare's birth), and Gogol' ("Gogol'," 1869), with a caveat for his retrogressive piety. Authenticity, enlightenment, freedom, and courage are the traits he values in the artist and the citizen. He praises Pushkin's classical sense of measure and harmony but sees it as devalued by his contemporaries.

Turgenev lived in the post-Christian world of the intelligentsia but with the residual gift of having the Enlightenment and Christian ethics as sources of his values. He professed an aesthetic humanism which was an anachronism to many of his contemporaries. He believed that the engagement with art took the self into a meta-reality where choices, explorations, and seductions had no external constraining consequences. The self is thereby liberated from its linear public life and becomes free to make radical choices, run risks, assume alien identities, and spar with powerful opponents. It returns from this world aware of styles and choices which are normally closed to it. Thus exploring the ambiguity and multiplicity of meaning in art makes us intellectually agile, physically elegant, and spiritually tolerant.

GEORGE S. PAHOMOV

Biography

Born 9 November 1818 in Orel. Studied at Moscow University, 1833–34; University of St. Petersburg, 1834–37; University of Berlin, 1838–41; completed his master's exam in St. Petersburg, 1842. Civil servant, Ministry of the Interior, 1843–45. Intimate friendship with Pauline Garcia-Viardot, traveling to France with her and her husband, 1845–46 and 1847–50. Had a daughter by one of his serfs. Arrested and confined to his estate for writing a commemorative article on Gogol's death, 1852–53. Left Russia to live in Western Europe, 1856, first in Baden-Baden, then Paris with the Viardots, 1871–83. Doctor of Civil Laws: Oxford University, 1879. Died in Bougival, near Paris, 3 September 1883.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Literaturnye i zhiteiskie vospominaniia, 1874; revised edition, 1880; as Literary Reminiscences and Autobiographical Fragments, translated by David Magarshack, 1958

Other writings: many novels (including Zapiski okhotnika [A Sportsman's Sketches], 1852; Rudin, 1856; Dvorianskoe gnezdo [A Nest of the Gentry], 1859; Nakanune [On the Eve], 1860; Ottsy i deti [Fathers and Sons], 1862), novellas (including Pervaia liubov' [First Love], 1860), stories, plays (including Mesiats v derevne [A Month in the Country], 1869), poetry, and correspondence.

Collected works editions: Polnoe sobranie sochinenii i pisem, 28 vols., 1960–68; Polnoe sobranie sochinenii i pisem, edited by M.P. Alekseev, 30 vols., 1978.

Bibliographies

- Waddington, Patrick, A Bibliography of Writings by and About Turgenev Published in Great Britain up to 1900, Wellington, New Zealand: Victoria University of Wellington Department of Russian, 1985
- Yachnin, Rissa, and David H. Stam, Turgenev in English: A Checklist of Works by and About Him, New York: New York Public Library, 1962
- Zekulin, Nicholas G., Turgenev: A Bibliography of Books, 1843–1982 by and About Ivan Turgenev, Calgary, Alberta: Calgary University Press, 1985

Further Reading

- Costlow, Jane T., Worlds Within Worlds: The Novels of Ivan Turgenev, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1990
- Freeborn, Richard, Turgenev: The Novelist's Novelist, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1978 (original edition, 1960)
- Gifford, H., "Turgenev," in Nineteenth-century Russian Literature: Studies of Ten Russian Writers, edited by J.L.I. Fennell, Berkeley: University of California Press, and London: Faber, 1973
- Granjard, Henri, Ivan Tourguenev et les courants politiques et sociaux de son temps, Paris: Institut d'études Slaves, 1954
- Hellgren, Ludmilla, Dialogue in Turgenev's Novels: Speech Introductory Devices, Stockholm: Almqvist & Wiksell, 1980
- Jackson, R.L., "The Root and the Flower: Dostoevsky and Turgenev: A Comparative Esthetic," Yale Review (Winter 1974): 228–50
- Jackson, R.L., "The Turgenev Question," Sewanee Review 93 (1985): 300–09
- Kagan-Kans, Eva, Hamlet and Don-Quixote: Turgenev's Ambivalent Vision, The Hague: Mouton, 1975
- Ledkovsky, Marina, The Other Turgenev: From Romanticism to Symbolism, Würzburg: Jal, 1973
- Lednicki, Waclaw, Bits of Table Talk on Pushkin, Mickiewicz, Goethe, Turgenev and Sienkiewicz, The Hague: Nijhoff, 1956
- Peterson, Dale E., The Clement Vision: Poetic Realism in Turgenev and James, Port Washington, New York: Kennikat Press, 1975
- Ripp, Victor, Turgenev's Russia: From "Notes of a Hunter" to "Fathers and Sons", Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1980
- Schapiro, Leonard, Turgenev: His Life and Times, Oxford: Oxford University Press, and New York: Random House, 1978
- Seeley, Frank Friedeberg, Turgenev: A Reading of His Fiction, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991
- Waddington, Patrick, Turgenev and England, London: Macmillan, 1980; New York: New York University Press, 1981
- Waddington, Patrick, Ivan Turgenev and Britain, Oxford: Berg, 1995
- Walicki, A., "Turgenev and Schopenhauer," Oxford Slavonic Papers 10 (1962): 1–17
- Wilson, Edmund, Introduction to Literary Reminiscences and Autobiographical Fragments by Turgenev, New York: Farrar Straus and Cudahy, 1958; London: Faber, 1959

Twain, Mark

American, 1835–1910

Mark Twain produced a considerable number of essays during his long writing career. But since he frequently combined fictional and nonfictional elements in his short works, Twain's writing, as his editors have often noted, cannot always be easily classified according to traditional literary categories such as the short story or essay, making it difficult at times precisely to determine his output within a specific genre. His versatility as an essayist is shown by the broad range of essay forms he mastered: travel letters, sketches, articles, memoirs, literary and art criticism, social and political commentary, and philosophical treatises. Writing on an astonishing variety of topics, ranging from such trivial matters as curing a cold or riding a bicycle to the major cultural and social issues of his time, Twain attracted a large and diverse audience. His essays appeared in various newspapers and in magazines with a wide readership, including the Galaxy and Harper's, as well as in the more prestigious and literary publications such as the Atlantic Monthly and the North American Review.

Twain's immense skill as a humorist greatly contributed to his popular appeal and became a hallmark of his writing style, which is also distinguished by his innovative use of narrative and rhetorical devices and an ability to render with accuracy and clarity the physical and emotional texture of places and events. His "Sandwich Islands" letters (1873), for example, vividly describe the exotic life and customs of the Hawaiians while humorously exposing the ways the missionaries and the American government have corrupted their idyllic existence. Annexation is necessary, Twain ironically declares, so that "we can afflict them with our wise and beneficent government." In "Queen Victoria's Jubilee" (1897), Twain presents a detailed portrait of another world—the pomp and pageantry of an English royal procession. He varies the narrative structure of this essay by incorporating the device of an imaginary account, told by a "spiritual correspondent," of the procession celebrating Henry V's victory at Agincourt in 1415 to reflect upon England's material progress and growth as a world power in the 19th century.

Writing on diverse social and political issues in his polemical essays, Twain used his talent as a satirist artfully to reveal and attack various forms of hypocrisy, injustice, and oppression. Though his views are not always consistent, he is recognized today as an important social commentator and reformist. Particularly effective in these essays is the way in which Twain creates satiric irony by his skillful control of point of view. Narrating "The Czar's Soliloquy" (1905) and "King Leopold's Soliloquy" (1905) in the form of a dramatic monologue, Twain condemns the political evils caused by despotism by having the rulers ironically reveal their crimes while attempting to defend themselves. This device works especially well in the latter essay in which Leopold's exploitation of the Congo, which included the murder, mutilation, and enslavement of millions of Congolese, is forcefully documented in the reports he reads. Oblivious to the truth this material contains, Leopold develops ridiculous and self-serving arguments to refute the charges against him.

One of the most important ways Twain uses point of view to create satire in his essays, and one which has received considerable critical attention, is the development of fictional narrators to express views that are in opposition to his own. The speaker in “Disgraceful Persecution of a Boy” (1870), whom John Gerber (1962) identifies as an example of the “Moralist” in his seven categories of masks Twain assumes, describes how society and its institutions condition its members to accept and perpetuate injustices against the Chinese; yet he ironically fails to recognize that racism and the evils it causes are wrong. Believing, instead, that a boy who was arrested on his way to Sunday school for stoning a Chinaman was doing the “high and holy thing” society taught him, the speaker is outraged because the boy is being unjustly punished for doing his “duty.”

Although Twain continued to use elements of the comic tradition he learned from the Southwest humorists during his early years as a journalist (e.g. burlesque, exaggeration, and narrative poses), his later polemical and philosophical essays have more affinity with the invective style of Swift and Voltaire. Speaking in his own voice rather than using a persona in “To the Person Sitting in Darkness” (1901), Twain produced his finest satire of imperialism by masterfully interweaving numerous rhetorical devices into the pattern of his argument: metaphors, puns, allusions, symbolism, irony, and understatement. Using the metaphor of the “Blessings-of-Civilization Trust” to represent the Western governments and the Christian missionaries, he develops a lengthy discussion of how their exploitation of the Chinese, South Africans, and Filipinos has become so blatant that the people in darkness are beginning to see “more light than...was profitable for us.” With Swiftian irony, Twain presents his modest proposal to solve this problem by recommending that Trust return to the former practice of concealing its true motives under the guise of offering the people the “blessings of civilization” so it “can resume Business at the old stand.”

Firmly committed to the principles of realism in his own writing, Twain also used them when judging the literary merit of other authors. In a skillfully developed and humorous essay, Twain presents a devastating attack on James Fenimore Cooper’s Leatherstocking novels (despite his failure to appreciate the conventions of romantic fiction) for their lack of verisimilitude in characterization, plot action, and dialogue, and for Cooper’s verbose and inaccurate style (“Fenimore Cooper’s Literary Offences,” 1895). In contrast, he praises William Dean Howells’ “sustained” achievement as a great stylist; and in his insightful analysis of nonfiction passages written by his fellow realist, Twain reveals the qualities he sought in his own prose: “clearness, compression, verbal exactness, and unforced and seemingly unconscious felicity of phrasing” (“William Dean Howells,” 1906). In addition, Twain exhibits his ability to marshal evidence, uncover faulty reasoning and logic, and expose pretentious and dishonest writing in his carefully crafted essay attacking Edward Dowden’s biography of Percy Bysshe Shelley (“In Defense of Harriet Shelley,” 1894).

Although Twain has long been recognized as a major literary artist, his essays have not been given as much critical attention as those written by other important 19th-century American novelists such as Henry James and William Dean Howells. This is due in part to the topical nature of some of his writing and the difficulty at times of classifying his short fictional and nonfictional works. However, the literary importance of his essays, particularly the later ones, continues to be re-evaluated (e.g. William Macnaughton, 1979). Furthermore, the work being done by the Mark Twain Project in publishing the definitive editions of Twain's writing should greatly contribute to the reassessment of his accomplishments in all genres—including the essay.

RONALD J.BLACK

See also Satiric Essay

Biography

Born Samuel Langhorne Clemens, 30 November 1835 in Florida, Missouri. Moved to Hannibal, Missouri, 1839. Printer's apprentice and typesetter for Hannibal newspapers, 1847–50, and worked on the Hannibal Journal, 1850–52; printer and typesetter in St. Louis, New York, and Philadelphia, for the Keokuk Saturday Post, Iowa, 1853–56, and in Cincinnati, 1857. Apprentice river pilot on the Mississippi, 1857–58, and pilot, 1859–60; secretary to his brother in Nevada, and worked as a goldminer, 1861. Staff member, Virginia City Territorial Enterprise, Nevada, 1862–64; wrote for newspapers in San Francisco and Sacramento, 1864–69. Visited the Sandwich Islands, 1866, and France, Italy, and Palestine, 1867. Editor, Buffalo Express, 1869–71. Married Olivia Langdon, 1870 (died, 1904): one son and three daughters. Moved to Hartford, Connecticut, and became associated with Charles L. Webster Publishing Company, 1884; invested in the Paige typesetter and went bankrupt, 1894. Lived mainly in Europe, 1896–1900, New York, 1900–07, and Redding, Connecticut, 1907–10. Awards: honorary degrees from three universities. Member, American Academy of Arts and Letters, 1904. Died in Redding, 21 April 1910.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

A Curious Dream and Other Sketches, 1872

Sketches, 1874

Sketches, New and Old, 1875

Punch, Brothers, Punch! and Other Sketches, 1878

How to Tell a Story and Other Essays, 1897; revised edition, 1900

The Man That Corrupted Hadleyburg and Other Stories and Essays, 1900

My Début as a Literary Person, with Other Essays and Stories, 1903

Speeches, edited by F.A. Nast, 1910, and Albert Bigelow Paine, 1923

What Is Man? and Other Essays, 1917

Travels with Mr. Brown, Being Heretofore Uncollected Sketches Written for the San Francisco Alta California in 1866 and 1867, edited by Franklin Walker and G. Ezra Dane, 1940

Traveling with the Innocents Abroad: Mark Twain's Original Reports from Europe and the Holy Land, edited by Daniel Morley McKeithan, 1958

Life as I Find It: Essays, Sketches, Tales, and Other Material, edited by Charles Neider, 1961

The Complete Essays, edited by Charles Neider, 1963

Collected Tales, Sketches, Speeches, and Essays (Library of America), edited by Lewis J. Budd, 2 vols., 1992

Tales, Speeches, Essays, and Sketches, edited by Tom Quirk, 1994

Selected Writings of an American Skeptic, edited by Victor Doyno, 1995

Other writings: 15 novels (including The Adventures of Tom Sawyer, 1876; The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn, 1884; A Connecticut Yankee at King Arthur's Court, 1889), short stories, and many volumes of travel writing.

Collected works editions: The Writings (Definitive Edition), edited by Albert Bigelow Paine, 37 vols., 1922–25; Works (Iowa-California Edition), edited by John C. Gerber and others, 8 vols., 1972–93 (in progress).

Bibliographies

Johnson, Merle, A Bibliography of the Works of Mark Twain, New York: Harper, revised edition, 1935 (original edition, 1910)

McBride, William M., Mark Twain: A Bibliography of the Collections of the Mark Twain Memorial and the Stowe-Day Foundation, Hartford, Connecticut: McBride/Publisher, 1984

Rodney, Robert H., editor, Twain International: A Bibliography and Interpretation of His Worldwide Popularity, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1982

Tenney, Thomas Asa, Mark Twain: A Reference Guide, Boston: Hall, 1977

Further Reading

Baetzhold, Howard G., "Samuel Langhorne Clemens," in American Literary Critics and Scholars, 1850–1880, edited by John W. Rathbun and Monica M. Grecu, Dictionary of Literary Biography vol. 64, Detroit: Gale Research, 1988:34–47

Bellamy, Gladys Carmen, Mark Twain as a Literary Artist, Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1950

Budd, Louis J., Mark Twain: Social Philosopher, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1962

Ferguson, De Lancey, Mark Twain: Man and Legend, Indianapolis: Bobbs Merrill, 1943

Foner, Philip, Mark Twain: Social Critic, New York: International Publishers, 1958

Gerber, John C., "Mark Twain's Use of the Comic Pose," PMLA 77 (June 1962):297–304

Gibson, William M., The Art of Mark Twain, New York: Oxford University Press, 1976

Krause, Sydney J., Mark Twain as Critic, Baltimore: John Hopkins University Press, 1967

Macnaughton, William R., Mark Twain's Last Years as a Writer, Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1979

Neider, Charles, Mark Twain, New York: Horizon Press, 1967

Tynan, Kenneth

British, 1927–1980

The popular image of Kenneth Tynan has been one of a cultural and social provocateur, a reputation stemming from his various gestures on behalf of the sexual revolution of the 1960s, notably the erotic revue he devised with others, Oh! Calcutta! (1969). Of far greater significance, though, was his contribution to British theater as the most respected and influential of postwar theater critics, and as the first literary manager of Britain's National Theatre, working under Laurence Olivier. Underlying all of these activities was the fundamental skill which he deployed in all his areas of interest—his ability to write strikingly expressive prose. This was underpinned by his sheer love of language, a passion ingrained at an early age—in 1944, the precocious 16-year-old described himself as a “soft old word fancier,” advising a close friend to “worry about words; they are the only consistent elements in your life. as remy de gourmont [sic] said, ‘ideas are well enough until you are twenty; after that only words will do.’”

Tynan's early letters and articles for school and university magazines reveal an omnivorous intelligence using an eclectic array of verbal means—from puns and clerihews to French quotations and Latin tags—to recount his personal experiences, to elaborate his constantly changing views on literature and the world, and, most tellingly, to document keenly his avid theater-going. These early writings show him constantly searching for the precise phrase both to represent his state of mind as spectator and to bring alive the material characteristics of performances.

His student notes and writings resulted in his first book of theatrical observations, He That Plays the King (1950), published when he was 23. He became a fulltime theater critic, after coming down from Oxford, until the early 1960s. His prose of that period consists largely of short pieces of around 1000 words—perhaps too short to be normally considered as essays. Yet Tynan developed a style of rich compression, which probed and scraped away the generalized impressions typical of so much writing in the genre, to achieve a muscular directness and concreteness of evocation. Cumulatively, the reviews also constitute a larger exploration of the nature of performance per se and an affirmation of Tynan's belief in the importance of theater in the overall cultural fabric. (The appropriation of Hazlitt's title A View of the English Stage for his 1975 compilation of reviews—perhaps an act of both audacity and deference—suggests their essayistic ambition.) It could be said that these individual pieces are essay-like in their depth of examination and in their grounding of the writer's subjective view in persuasive terms of debate. In reviews of actors, comics, and other performers, his prose displays a kind of filmic rhythm, swooping in for close-ups before drawing away to restore balance and an overarching perspective. This is evident even in an early review, of Olivier as Shakespeare's Richard III (1944), where Tynan homes in on the voice—“slick, taunting, and curiously casual; nearly impersonal, ‘smooth as sleekstone’, patting and pushing each line into place. Occasionally he lets out a gurgling, avuncular cackle, a goodhumoured snarl: and then we see the over-riding mephitic good humour of the man”—before panning out to consider the overall interpretation as exemplifying “Blake’s conception of active, energetic evil,” with analogies to Sidney’s elegiacs and Gor’kii’s Lower Depths.

Tynan’s writing grew more versatile as his theatrical experience deepened. While the wit, use of apposite phrase, and crystalline precision of description remained constant, his style grew in flexibility, and his responses—in accordance with his gradual assumption of idealist/socialist ideas about the perfectibility of humankind—were increasingly adumbrated by a greater sense of social and political concern, reflected particularly in his admiration for Bertolt Brecht. Stylistically, he could resort both to playful pastiche (as in his affectionate Runyonesque review of the musical Guys and Dolls, 1952.) and to pointed parody (in his “Slamm’s Last Knock,” 1958, a mock-Beckettian two-hander bemoaning the increasingly fatalistic ennui of Beckett’s characters), while also making bold and confident claims for works he championed. Welcoming Beckett’s Waiting for Godot (1955), he stated that “it forced me to re-examine the rules which have hitherto governed the drama; and having done so, to pronounce them not elastic enough”; and he eulogized John Osborne’s Look Back in Anger (1956) for presenting “post-war youth as it really is,” famously concluding: “I doubt if I could love anyone who did not wish to see Look Back in Anger. It is the best young play of its decade.”

On taking up his post at the National Theatre, Tynan gave up regular theater reviewing. His writings thenceforward were of a more occasional, but more varied, nature. In the athletic metaphor he used on several occasions, the short-distance “sprinting” of the reviews increasingly came to be replaced by the “middle-distance” running of essay-features. The subdivisions of his collection Tynan Right and Left (1967)—“Theatre,” “Cinema,” “People,” “Places,” and “Comments and Causeries”—usefully summarize the fields of all his longer writing. Earlier pieces tend to be commentaries on theatrical subjects—overviews of the careers of actors, writers, and directors, considerations of theater styles (e.g. “Prose and the Playwright,” “The Lost Art of Bad Drama,” 1954), and unashamedly partisan interventions in larger cultural debates, such as lobbying for the establishment of a National Theatre (“The National Theatre: A Speech to the Royal Society of Arts,” 1964) and the removal of theater censorship (“The Royal Smut-Hound,” 1965). These articles appeared in a variety of publications, including the Harper’s Bazaar, the Observer, the New Yorker, Playboy, and Holiday.

The form of essay in which Tynan came to specialize, however, was the profile-essay—the portrait of an outstanding individual who was either an epitome of his or her type or, very often, considered by Tynan to be sui generis. The earlier of these were more obviously logical extensions of his theatrical and cinematic experiences, allowing him to synthesize instances of performance into larger characterizations of an individual’s style and significance, while also supplying biographical and anecdotal sidelights. But the profile-essay especially allowed him to take the notion he elaborated of “high definition performance”—“supreme professional polish, hard-edged technical skill...the hypnotic saving grace of high and low art alike, the common denominator that unites tragedy, ballroom dancing, conversation and cricket”—and apply it to a wide range of people, taking in other expressive artists (writers, matadors, jazz musicians, film directors, television personalities), pursuing the attributes of the performative in both an individual’s public and private lives.

Of all the publications to which Tynan contributed profiles, none was more important to him than the New Yorker, the magazine which the teenage Tynan revered in provincial Birmingham as representing the peak of American urbanity and sophistication, and whose style under its editor Harold Ross he lauded in 1951 as “pungent and artless, innocently sly, superbly explicit: what one would call low-falutin’.” Collaborating now with William Shawn, Ross’ successor, Tynan spent much of his last years writing his longest profiles for the New Yorker. The magazine’s image and scope of interest was, in some quarters, then deemed somewhat conservative (essays such as Tynan’s 1966 “Meditations on Basic Baroque,” on the erotic history of the female bottom, understandably appeared elsewhere—despite its references to James Joyce, François Villon, Henry Vaughan, and Edmund Burke!). More importantly, however, Tynan shared the New Yorker’s high sense of writerly discipline, admiring its punctiliousness enough to spend hours in discussion with the editor and his staff over phraseology.

In the preface to Show People (1980)—the collection of his final, longer New Yorker profiles—Tynan offered a context for his writing, and, in characteristically witty vein, an explicit defense of the essay form: “Many critics maintain that the essay is an inferior form... Out of the window—if these experts are right—goes Montaigne. To the bonfire with William Hazlitt, closely followed by Max Beerbohm, SainteBeuve and John Aubrey...and into the garbage goes Samuel Johnson’s Lives of the Poets, perhaps the finest book of profileessays ever written... Any theory that regards works like these as second-class...is transparently dotty.”

While not comparing himself to all the “masters” he cited, he felt he might “go a couple of rounds” with Charles Lamb. The pieces that follow—on writer Tom Stoppard, actor Ralph Richardson, television star Johnny Carson, silent-film actress Louise Brooks, and comedian Mel Brooks—tackle high and low culture with equal verve, in each case mapping out the contours of a distinctive terrain. Tynan’s profiles vary in tone and orientation—here, for example, the Louise Brooks piece is a kind of homage to a forgotten star and personal idol, the Mel Brooks piece delves into the relationship of comedy, fear, and ambition, and the Stoppard article is an extended musing on writing, style, and political commitment. But, while all include many examples of “vintage” Tynan, in his reportage of personal encounters (performances, dinner parties, interviews, letters), such elements are subtly worked into a widening and deepening perspective. A profile often begins obliquely, by virtue of apparently unrelated anecdotes or random information; then essential biographical information is lightly introduced, and thereafter the portrait is built up incrementally, as a shape and thesis emerge. The profile is rounded out by quotations from others on the subject and the deployment of a battery of cultural references. The most marked contrast with the shorter writings is the cooler, analytical quality that emerges in a more measured pace; the sprinting, dazzling prose is calmed by direct, yet always elegantly written, exposition and by pertinent, well-grounded comment.

At Tynan’s funeral, Tom Stoppard summarized the potency of Tynan’s writing as resting in “his paragraphs—paragraphs were the units of his prose, not sentences,” written to “outlast the witness.” While this quality contributes to the exceptional eloquence of his theater reviews, nowhere is the comment more apposite than in regard to the later profile-essays. It is ultimately in this sense of creating a permanence for the ephemeral through the written word, so that the prose fascinates even when its subject may be only dimly familiar to the reader, that Tynan lays claim to a place in the history of the modern essay.

MARK HAWKINS-DADY

Biography

Kenneth Peacock Tynan. Born 2 April 1927 in Birmingham. Studied at King Edward's School, Birmingham, 1938–45; Magdalen College, Oxford, 1945–48, B.A. in English, 1948. Director, Lichfield repertory theater company, 1949; director, 1950, and actor, 1951, London. Married Elaine Brimberg Dundy, 1951 (divorced, 1964); one daughter. Drama critic for the Spectator, 1951–52, the Evening Standard, 1952–53, and the Daily Sketch, 1953–54; drama critic, 1954–58 and 1960–63, and film critic, 1964–66, the Observer; script editor, Ealing Films, London, 1956–58; drama critic, 1958–60, and feature writer, 1976–80, the New Yorker; editor, Tempo television arts program, 1961–62; literary manager, 1963–69, and literary consultant, 1969–73, National Theatre of Britain, London. Married Kathleen Halton, 1967: one daughter and one son. Moved to California for health reasons, 1976. Died (of emphysema) in Santa Monica, California, 26 July 1980.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

He That Plays the King: A View of the Theatre, 1950

Persona Grata, 1953

Curtains: Selections from the Drama, Criticism and Related Writings, 1961; as Tynan on Theatre, 1964

Tynan Right and Left, 1967

A View of the English Stage, 1944–63, 1975

The Sound of Two Hands Clapping, 1975

Show People: Profiles in Entertainment, 1980

Profiles, edited by Kathleen Tynan and Ernie Eban, 1989

Other writings: books on Alec Guinness (1953) and bull fighting (1955), radio plays, theater adaptations, and correspondence. Also collaborated on the revue Oh! Calcutta! (1969).

Further Reading

Kihn, Patricia Lenehan, Kenneth Tynan and the Renaissance of Post-War British Drama (dissertation), Detroit: Wayne State University, 1986

Tynan, Kathleen, The Life of Kenneth Tynan, London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, and New York: Morrow, 1987

This page intentionally left blank.

U

Unamuno, Miguel de

Spanish, 1864–1936

Unamuno is, along with José Ortega y Gasset, one of the most prolific, versatile, and original minds in modern European literature, and Spain's most eminent thinker. Patriarch of the so-called Generation of 1898, he achieved eminence as novelist, poet, philosopher, and dramatist. The sheer volume and thematic diversity of his essayistic output—over seven hefty volumes—is staggering. Unamuno engaged every major discipline in the human sciences (especially the fields of philosophy, religion, history, linguistics, literary criticism, and politics), and practiced a variety of the types and subgenres of the essay among them the treatise, autobiography, diary, letter, meditation, speech, dialogue, aphorism, travel essay, and confession. A classical philologist by training (he was professor of Greek and became rector of the University of Salamanca), Unamuno was equally well-versed in Catholic and Protestant theology, and 19th-century scientific theories and philosophical systems.

Studies of Unamuno continue unabated, with each generation of scholars finding new dimensions to his personality and work. Religious, existential, and linguistic orientations of past decades have been steadily enriched in recent years with deconstructive and rhetorical studies, Jungian analysis, and gender perspectives. Along with the traditional image of Unamuno as an intellectual gadfly who challenged the conventional religious beliefs and practices of his day, there has emerged a picture of him as a Modernist with a keen insight into the nature and function of language as both the instrument and the subject of philosophical inquiry. Although a lapsed Catholic and crypto-atheist, Unamuno was unwilling to abandon theological inquiry or the comforts of religious belief, and made the unremitting struggle between reason and faith and a hunger for immortality the cornerstone of his thought and the subject for his best known book-length essays. These are principally Del sentimiento trágico de la vida (1912; The Tragic Sense of Life), Cómo se hace una novela (1927; How a novel is made), and La agonía del cristianismo (1925, 1931; The Agony of Christianity).

Unamuno's career as essayist began in 1886 under the spell of positivism, leading him to embrace briefly the aims of Marxist socialism (1894–97). During these early years he contributed to the socialist press of his native Bilbao commentaries and exhortations on momentous political and economic issues of the day. He gradually evolved into a liberal and by 1917 became openly anti-Marxist; yet even during his brief commitment to scientific socialism Unamuno looked upon Marxism more as a moral and humanitarian ideal compatible with Christian values than as an economic theory or blueprint for violent revolution. A disenchantment with the utopian ideals of science and the narrow logic of positivism, exacerbated by a wrenching religious crisis in 1897, broke Unamuno's trust in social engineering and in the ability of the great rationalist philosophical systems to address and satisfy humankind's deepest longings.

Influenced by Kierkegaard and liberal Protestantism, Unamuno's essays probe deeply and dramatically into the meaning and possibility of being Christian in a secular age. But unlike Kierkegaard, Unamuno renounced any ultimate metaphysical security and exploited the tensions and contradictions inherent in a modern religious sensibility. Although at times he would defend the simple, genuine, untutored faith of Everyman, more often than not he was bent on sowing doubt. Thus critics have long accepted both the contemplative, reflective Unamuno in search of harmony and peace, exemplified by En torno al casticismo (1895; On authentic tradition), and a passionate, paradoxical Unamuno determined to shake public apathy and undermine intellectual complacency and dogmatism. This temper is typified by Vida de don Quijote y Sancho (1905; The Life of Don Quixote and Sancho) and "Sobre la europeización (Arbitrariedades)" (1906; On becoming Europeans). Although it is risky to categorize Unamuno ideologically, his essays are, as a rule, rhetorical strategies devised to challenge the commonplaces of his day, provoke readers into a state of uncertainty, and encourage self-scrutiny. A Christian existentialist beset by disbelief, he urged that individuals create, in the crucible of doubt, the meaning and purpose of their lives and induced them, in line with his paradoxical and "tragic sense of life," to wager on personal immortality without renouncing rational inquiry.

Unamuno confronts his reader directly and openly, appealing to the concerns of the concrete "man of flesh and bone" and not just to scholars and intellectuals. The tone of his essays is familiar and engaging, but often aggressive and abrasive. He does not, however, apologize for any breach of decorum, but admits candidly that he is not a pleasant fellow ("A mis lectores" [1909; To my readers]): it is better to be disliked and admired for boldness and honesty than liked for toeing the line of conventional thought. Indeed, the author acknowledges that he may shout and rant and even offend, but this may be the only way, he believes, to "wake up the sleeper." A strident individualism and personalism, given to gesture and histrionics, characterize Unamuno's persona. He is not content, like Montaigne, to be the multifaceted subject of his book, but in addition orchestrates a dramatic interplay of conflicting and contradictory selves in tones both shrill and grave, dispensing indignation, scorn, reverence and irreverence, prophecy, advice, or simply engagement in intellectual games and wordplay. And yet, very often, Unamuno's essays are a model of reasonableness and common sense—a term un congenial to his thought. Thus, on the one hand, he can belittle Cervantes as a poor devil, unaware of the significance of his own creation, condemn the French for their joie de vivre, or rail in mawkish self-pity against the dictator Primo de Rivera for offenses to his person more imaginary than real. On the other hand, his articles written during the Spanish Republic (1931–36) are eminently sensible, balanced, and fair, revealing a liberal who welcomed and supported the secular legislation of the new government, yet wished to preserve some traditional religious values that he saw threatened by extremists.

Unamuno never failed to extend his personal drama to a preoccupation with the historical and spiritual destiny of Spain. This patriotic concern ranges from earnest and informed criticism of social injustices based on economic exploitation to a total indifference to such issues in the name of spiritual values; in this vein he would extol the dignity of an idealized Spanish peasantry as a counter-example to European materialism (“La vida es sueño” [1898; Life is a dream]).

Unamuno’s evolution as an essayist may be illustrated by attention to a few representative works. It is instructive to begin with En torno al casticismo, which appeared in 1895 as a series of five essays in La España Moderna (Modern Spain) and in book form in 1902. It reflects the author’s faith in the idea of progress and the redeeming power of science. Influenced by such diverse sources as Hegel, Spencer, Darwin, and the Spanish mystic Fray Luis de León, Unamuno argues mainly by analogy and dialectic for unity and harmony within diversity in the historical development of Spanish identity. This is to be achieved by a reconciliation of perennial opposites such as personal/collective, temporal/eternal, Spain/Europe. The most important of these dualities is history/intra-history; that is, the tension between the transitory, superficial dimension of Spanish life and the deep and lasting values of the people. Unamuno elaborates the dynamics of these concepts with analogies derived from biological and geological metaphors.

After the religious crisis of 1897, Unamuno lost faith in the explanatory power of science and the great rationalist systems and under the influence of Kierkegaard began to explore the domain of inwardness. At this point one finds a significant turn in Unamuno’s style, mainly the displacement of analogy by the extensive use of paradox. Whereas analogy reflected the author’s will to harmonize opposites, and dialectic promoted a reconciliation of local and universal themes, paradox reveals a mind bent on dissociation and contradiction. Pithy oxymorons and extravagant puns, conceits and etymological games serve to dramatize the author’s existential anguish and to frustrate in the reader the process of expected associations. Perhaps the most widely used and effective trope in the agonistic Unamuno is the chiasmus, in which a phrase is repeated in reverse order and the relations between the same or similar words yield a wide range of semantic possibilities. Typical chiasmic paradoxes in Unamuno are: “I seek peace in war and war in peace”; “The word hypocrite designates in Greek an actor... But if a hypocrite is an actor the actor, surely, is no hypocrite”; “Just as our death is an unbirthing, so our birth is an undying.”

The transition from rationalism to voluntarism, from analogy to existential paradox is evident in “Sobre la europeización.” Here, for example, the terms of the opposition Spain/Europe, which in En torno al casticismo were harmoniously interdependent, are now polarized with their respective values redefined and ultimately reversed. The “European” cultural categories of logic, science, progress, and the celebration of life are rejected in the name of arbitrariness, passion, and the wisdom derived from the Spanish people’s meditation on death. As if to mock his own previous penchant for harmonious analogies, Unamuno now writes in neat chiasmic equations: “Wisdom is to science what death is to life or, if you will, wisdom is to death what science is to life.”

In The Life of Don Quixote and Sancho Unamuno fuses Nietzschean voluntarism with traditional Spanish cultural values. In this passionate dissection of Cervantes’ masterpiece the heroic and tragic knight assumes the virtues of Christ, becoming an outcast who in his loneliness and will to create new spiritual values is defeated by a world of philistines and materialists. Unamuno's text is, in the words of Martin Nozick (1982), "a tapestry of ingenious paradoxes, diatribes, poetic prose, and arbitrary conclusions drawn from the best-known episodes of the original." Some of these qualities are evident in the first sentence of the work: "You ask me, my good friend, if I know of a way to unchain a delirium, a vertigo, any kind of madness upon these poor, peaceful, orderly masses who are born, eat, sleep, reproduce and die."

Perhaps the most original of Unamuno's essayistic endeavors is Cómo se hace una novela, a hybrid of autobiography, essay, and fiction. Written in the confessional mode, with tones of an anguished exile, the narrative voice is consubstantial with the self-reflective author, who occasionally splits off into his double as a character in a fictional autobiography. The dualistic themes of history/fiction, authenticity/role playing, life/art dominate this work, in which fictional techniques are subordinated to the essay. Finally, The Agony of Christianity, also written in exile, intensifies the religious tenor of The Tragic Sense of Life with biblical parables and paradoxes, "tragic plays on words" from St. Paul and Pascal, and especially with an allegory of the death of God, sustained by the erotic language of mysticism. Unamuno emphasizes here the inherent contradictions of Christianity, its fate in a highly secularized culture which he predicts will absorb and bastardize faith and ultimately put an end to the "agony" of Christianity.

In his heroic search for truth Unamuno despairs, oscillates, wavers between the rational and the affective without relinquishing either reason or faith. His best-known essays alternately affirm and negate contraries in perpetual tension. His "rhetoric of existence," to use Allen Lacy's (1967) apt expression, engages the great topics of modern philosophical discourse, creating truth from doubt and doubt from truth.

THOMAS MERMALL

Biography

Miguel de Unamuno y Jugo. Born 29 September 1864 in Bilbao. Studied at the Colegio de San Nicolás and the Instituto Vizacaíno, Bilbao, 1875–80; philosophy at the University of Madrid, 1880–84, Ph.D., 1884. Private tutor in Bilbao, 1884–91. Married Concepcion [Concha] Lizárraga Ecénarro (died, 1934), 1891: ten children. Professor of Greek, 1891–1924, rector, 1900–14 (dismissed) and 1934–36, and professor of the history of the Spanish language, 1930–34, University of Salamanca. Exiled to the Canary Islands for publicly criticizing the dictatorship of Primo de Rivera, 1924; lived in Paris, 19x4, and Hendaye, 1925–30; returned to Spain, 1930. Placed under house arrest for criticism of Franco government, 1936. Awards: Cross of the Order of Alfonso XII, 1905; honorary degrees from two European universities. Died in Salamanca, 31 December 1936.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Tres ensayos, 1900

En torno al casticismo, 1902

De mi país, 1903

Vida de don Quijote y Sancho, 1905; as The Life of Don Quixote and Sancho, translated by Homer P.Earle, 1927; as Our Lord Don Quixote, translated by Anthony Kerrigan, 1967

Mi religión y otros ensayos breves, 1910; as Perplexities and Paradoxes, translated by Stuart Gross, 1945

Soliloquios y conversaciones, 1911

Por tierras de Portugal y de España (travel articles), 1911; edited by Manuel García Blanco, 1972

Contra esto y aquello, 1912

El porvenir de España, with Ángel Ganivet, 1912

Del sentimiento trágico de la vida en los hombres y en los pueblos, 1912; as The Tragic Sense of Life in Men and in Peoples, translated by J.E.Crawford Flitch, 1921

Ensayos, 7 vols., 1916–18; revised edition, 2 vols., 1942; part as Essays and Soliloquies, translated by J.E.Crawford Flitch, 1925

Andanzas y visiones españolas (travel articles), 1922

L'Agonie du christianisme, 1925; as La agonía del cristianismo, 1931; as The Agony of Christianity, translated by Pierre Loving, 1928, Kurt F.Reinhardt, 1960, and Anthony Kerrigan, in The Agony of Christianity and Essays on Faith, 1974

Cómo se hace una novela, 1927; edited by Paul R.Olson, 1977

Dos artículos y dos discursos, 1930; edited by David Robertson, 1986

Ensayos y sentencias (selection), edited by Wilfred A.Beardsley, 1932

Cuenca ibérica, 1943

Paisajes del Alma, 1944

La enormidad de España, 1945

Algunas consideraciones sobre la literatura hispano-americana, 1947

Visiones y comentarios, 1949

De esto y de aquello, 4 vols., 1950–54

España y los españoles, edited by Manuel García Blanco, 1955

Inquietudes y meditaciones, 1957

Mi vida y otros recuerdos personales, 2 vols., 1959

Pensamiento político, edited by Elias Díaz, 1965

La vida literaria, 1967

El gaucho Martín Fierro, 1967

La agonía del cristianismo, Mi religión, y otros ensayos, 1967

Desde el mirador de la guerra, edited by Louis Urrutia, 1970

The Agony of Christianity and Essays on Faith, edited by Anthony Kerrigan and Martin Nozick, translated by Kerrigan, 1974

Escritos socialistas: Artículos inéditos sobre el socialismo, 1894–1922, edited by Pedro Ribas, 1976

Artículos olvidados sobre España y la primera guerra mundial, edited by Christopher Cobb, 1976

En torno a las artes: Del teatro, el cine, las bellas artes, la política y las letras, 1976
Crónica política española (1915–1923), edited by Vicente González Martín, 1977
República española y España republicana (1931–1936), edited by Vicente González Martín, 1979

Artículos y discursos sobre Canarias, edited by Francisco Navarro Artilles, 1980

Ensueño de una patria: Periodismo republicano, 1931–36, edited by Victor Ouimette, 1984

El resentimiento trágico de la vida: Notas sobre la revolución y guerra civil españolas, 1991

Artículos en “La nación” de Buenos Aires, 1919–1924, edited by Luis Urrutia Salaverri, 1994

Other writings: several novels (including Paz en la guerra [Peace in War], 1897; Niebla [Mist], 1914; Abel Sánchez, 1917; San Manuel Bueno, 1933), poetry, plays, and theological works.

Collected works edition: Obras completas, edited by Manuel García Blanco, 16 vols., 1951–58.

Bibliographies

Fernández, Pelayo H., Bibliografía crítica de Unamuno 1888–1975, Madrid: Porrúa, 1976

Valdés, Mario James, and María Elena de Valdés, An Unamuno Source Book: A Catalogue of Readings and Acquisitions, with an Introductory Essay on Unamuno’s Dialectical Enquiry, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1973

Further Reading

Blanco Aguinaga, Carlos, El Unamuno contemplativo, Mexico: Nueva Revista de Filología Hispánica, 1959

Butt, J.W., “Unamuno’s Idea of Intrahistoria: Its Origins and Significance,” in Studies in Spanish Literature and Art Presented to Helen F. Grant, edited by Nigel Glendinning, London: Tamesis, 1972:13–24

Cerezo-Galán, Pedro, Las máscaras de lo trágico: Filosofía y tragedia en Miguel de Unamuno, Madrid: Trotta, 1996

Ferrater Mora, José, Unamuno, a Philosophy of Tragedy, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1962(Spanish edition, 1957)

Franz, Thomas, The Word in the World: Unamuno’s Tragic Sense of Language, Athens, Ohio: Strathmore, 1987

Ilie, Paul, Unamuno: An Existential View of Self and Society, Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1967

Jurkevich, Gayana, The Elusive Self: Archetypal Approaches to the Novels of Miguel de Unamuno, Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1991

Lacy, Allen, Miguel de Unamuno: The Rhetoric of Existence, The Hague: Mouton, 1967

La Rubia-Prado, Francisco, Alegorías de la voluntad: Pensamiento orgánico, retórica y deconstrucción en la obra de Miguel de Unamuno, Madrid: Libertarias/Prodhufi, 1996

Marías, Julián, Miguel de Unamuno, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University

Press, 1966 (Spanish edition, 1943)

Marichal, Juan, Teoría e historia del ensayismo hispánico, Madrid: Alianza, 1984:

Chapter on Unamuno

Mermall, Thomas, "The Chiasmus: Unamuno's Master Trope," PMLA 105 (1990):245–55

Navajas, Gonzalo, Miguel de Unamuno: Bipolaridad y síntesis ficcional, Barcelona: PPU, 1988

Nozick, Martin, Miguel de Unamuno, New York: Twayne, 1971

Nozick, Martin, Miguel de Unatnuno: The Agony of Belief, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1982

Olson, Paul, "Unamuno's Lacquered Boxes: Cómo se hace una novela and the Ontology of Writing," Revista Hispdnica Moderna 36 (1970–71):186–99

Orringer, Nelson R., Unamuno y los protestantes liberales (1912): Sobre las fuentes de "Del sentimiento trágico de la vida", Madrid: Gredos, 1985

Regalado García, Antonio, El siervo y el señor: La dialéctica agónica de Miguel de Unatnuno, Madrid: Gredos, 1968

Updike, John

American, 1932–

Though noted primarily for his novels, John Updike has made a significant contribution to American letters through his work as an essayist. Beginning with his appointment to the staff of the New Yorker magazine after returning from graduate studies in England in 1955, Updike has written speculative pieces on American society, book reviews on works by his countrymen and writers from around the world, reminiscences, travelogues, parodies, and criticism of literature and art. The bulk of his work has appeared originally in the New Yorker and other popular or highbrow American magazines such as the Saturday Evening Post, New Republic, Harper's, and the American Scholar. During the 1980s and 1990s he has contributed introductions and commentaries to anthologies and reprints of important works by other writers. In the five collections issued between 1965 and 1991, he expands his published materials to include several speeches given before local and national forums. Taken in toto, these nonfiction pieces provide a surprisingly useful gloss on the literary vision of one of America's most prolific and successful fiction writers of the 20th century.

Clearly the majority of Updike's nonfiction has been occasional, prompted by an invitation to contribute to a publication or for a special event. His reviews of contemporary literature run into the hundreds, and he considers the opportunity to produce reviews and essays an important corollary to his work as a novelist and short-story writer. "One accepts editorial invitations," he remarks in the preface to Odd Jobs (1991), "in the hopes of learning something, or of extracting from within some unsuspected wisdom. For writing educates the writer as it goes along." How one uses the education gained through such writing is, Updike admits with wry self-deprecation, another matter: "My purpose in reading has ever secretly been not to come and judge but to come and steal.” Certainly these literary exercises have benefited Updike in his novels, but his erudition shows also in the wide range of tasks he has undertaken with facility. Among the writers whose works he has reviewed are Americans Philip Roth, Saul Bellow, Annie Dillard, Kurt Vonnegut, Donald Barthelme, Joyce Carol Oates, and William Least Heat Moon; British writers Iris Murdoch, Cyril Connolly, and Margaret Drabble; Europeans Robert Pinget, Michel Tournier, Raymond Queneau, Umberto Eco, Milan Kundera, Yuri Trifonov, Evgenii Evtushenko, and Elena Bonner; Latin Americans Gabriel García Márquez, Mario Vargas Llosa, and Isabel Allende. Regardless of the author he reviews, Updike speaks with authority, making pertinent connections to other works by his subject and others. Throughout his career as a literary journalist, Updike follows the maxim set down by T.S.Eliot in “Tradition and the Individual Talent” (1919), that a new work should be measured against the body of literature it joins and which it changes by its appearance. In doing so, not only does he display his knowledge, but—more importantly—he reveals much of his own literary credo. In writing about his contemporaries Updike makes a clear case for his own literary values: accuracy in presenting one’s subject, felicity in style, precision in describing both external circumstance and inner feelings, and a deep understanding of and sympathy for the flawed creatures who make up the human race, regardless of national allegiance or ethnic origin.

In his less formal pieces, Updike often strikes the pose of the gentle satirist, poking fun at American life and customs; nor does he exempt himself from criticism. Whether writing about baseball, postal envelopes, or an imaginary visit to the planet Minerva, he is able to capture people, places, and events with a clarity of vision that brings them to life for readers. Even in pieces which seem to have no great moral, political, or sociological import, Updike takes great pains to see that readers share the experience about which he has chosen to write. While there may be no great lessons to impart, readers are nevertheless heartened—even delighted—to have an opportunity to find before them a little bit of the American scene, with all its foibles and idiosyncracies.

Although his subjects vary widely, Updike writes with a consistent voice throughout all his nonfiction. Seldom does he become too effusive in his praise, and even less seldom does he stoop to mean-spirited castigation. He does not begrudge others their fame or financial success. He recognizes, even celebrates, the ordinary life he sees around him. He is remarkably forgiving of mistakes by others, and he frequently asks readers to recognize and forgive his own misapprehensions, perceived or real. The “I” of Updike’s essays is genuine, direct, and sympathetic—in the original sense of the word: capable of entering into a fellow-feeling with his subjects, whatever their profession.

LAURENCE W.MAZZENO

Biography

John Hoyer Updike. Born 18 March 1932 in Shillington, Pennsylvania. Studied at Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, A.B. (summa cum laude), 1954; Knox Fellow, Ruskin School of Drawing and Fine Arts, Oxford, 1954–55. Married Mary Pennington, 1953 (marriage later dissolved): two daughters and two sons. Staff reporter, 1955–57, and frequent contributor, the New Yorker. Married Martha Bernhard, 1977. Awards: many, including the National Book Award, 1964; Foreign Book Prize (France), 1966; MacDowell Medal, 1981; Pulitzer Prize, 1982, 1991; American Book Award, 1982; National Book Critics Circle Award, for fiction, 1982, 1990, and for Hugging the Shore, 1984; Union League Club Abraham Lincoln Award, 1982; National Arts Club Medal of Honor, 1984; National Medal of the Arts, 1989. Member, American Academy and Institute of Arts and Letters, 1976.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Assorted Prose, 1965

Picked-Up Pieces, 1975

Hugging the Shore: Essays and Criticism, 1983

Just Looking: Essays on Art, 1989

Odd Jobs: Essays and Criticism, 1991

Other writings: 17 novels (The Poorhouse Fair, 1959; four Rabbit novels, 1960–90; The Centaur, 1963; Of the Farm, 1965; Couples, 1968; A Month of Sundays, 1975; Marry Me, 1976; The Coup, 1978; The Witches of Eastwick, 1984; Roger's Version, 1986; S., 1988; Metnories of the Ford Administration, 1992; Brazil, 1994; In the Beauty of the Lilies, 1996), many collections of short stories and poetry, two plays, and the memoir Self-Consciousness (1987).

Bibliography

De Bellis, Jack, John Updike: A Bibliography, 1967–1993, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1994

Further Reading

Bloom, Harold, editor, John Updike, New York: Chelsea House, 1987

Burchard, Rachael C., John Updike: Yea Sayings, Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1971

Detweiler, Robert, John Updike, Boston: Twayne, revised edition, 1984

Donoghue, Denis, "The Zeal of a Man of Letters," New York Times Book Review, 18 September 1983:1, 30–31

Greiner, Donald J., The Other John Updike: Poems, Short Stories, Prose, Play, Athens: Ohio University Press, 1981

Hamilton, Alice, and Kenneth Hamilton, The Elements of John Updike, Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1970

Hunt, George W., John Updike and the Three Great Secret Things: Sex, Religion, and Art, Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans, 1980

Kenner, Hugh, "Jobs Well Done: Odd Jobs," National Review, 17 February 1992:52–54

Macnaughton, William R., editor, Critical Essays on John Updike, Boston: Hall, 1982

- Newman, Judie, John Updike, London: Macmillan, and New York: St. Martin's Press, 1988
- Riggan, William, "Shallow Drafts: John Updike's Hugging the Shore," World Literature Today 58 (Summer 1984): 380–83
- Schwartz, Sanford, "Top of the Class," New York Review of Books, 24 November 1983:26–30, 35
- Simon, John, "Plying a Periplus," New Republic, 21 November 1983:34–37
- Trevor, William, "Discourse Most Eloquent Musing: Odd Jobs" Spectator, 8 February 1992:29–30
- Wolcott, James, "The Price of Finesse," Harper's 267 (September 1983):63–66

This page intentionally left blank.

V

Vaculík, Ludvík

Czech, 1926–

Ludvík Vaculík came to literature as a member of the Czech Communist Party and Party journalist; he belonged to that wing of the Party which worked in the late 1960s for democratic reform. His second novel, Sekyra (1966; The Axe), is an extremely personal account of his disillusionment as a Party journalist with the socialist order.

Vaculík took part in the Czechoslovak struggle for democracy and independence from the grasp of Soviet power; he composed the major manifesto of the liberation movement, “Dva tisíce slov” (1968; Two thousand words). But the invasion of Czechoslovakia by Soviet forces in August 1968 brought his exclusion from the Party and, though he was not arrested at the time, he was deprived of his opportunity to publish, as either a journalist or a writer of fiction. Still, all literary avenues were not closed to him, since a substantial literature of samizdat had grown up in Czechoslovakia, with typewriters and carbon paper used to produce works of literature at home, without censorship. Vaculík soon placed himself at the head of this effort, known in Czechoslovakia under the name of the largest group of these home-produced publications as Petlice (“the padlock”). He also published abroad, which remained technically legal in Czechoslovakia. Morčata (in German, 1971, in Czech, 1973; The Guinea Pigs), his third novel, is a surreal, Kafkaesque fantasy of man’s calculated inhumanity to defenseless pets, an obvious allegory of totalitarian dictatorship.

In spite of the fact that Vaculík possessed outlets for publication, he had no income and no way of dealing with the repressive Czechoslovak regime, which eventually did imprison him for several months. His earlier work suggested that journalism was the answer: why not revive a traditional Czech form of free journalistic expression? And, since even in samizdat writings he was hardly free to express everything he wished, why not employ the traditional Czech literary techniques of irony and understatement to make his points by indirection?

Vaculík proceeded to revive the traditional Czech feuilleton, a form cultivated with success by Jan Neruda and Karel Čapek. The Czech feuilleton is a kind of newspaper column, which can be more or less journalistic in style and manner, or more or less literary. At times it approaches the essay in its length, preoccupation with style and stylistic devices, and introspective manner. Vaculík’s feuilletons are probably less essay-like than certain of Karel Čapek’s, but their use of irony and understatement and their introspection fully entitle us to call them essays.

Vaculík sought literary action, for effectively he was leading a political crusade. He organized a network of Petlice correspondents who exchanged home-produced feuilletons, editing them in collections that could be circulated at home or sent abroad for publication.

He produced his own feuilletons in cycles of roughly 12 per year. Beginning in 1976, he began each annual cycle with a piece called “Jaro je tady” (Spring is here), presumably a reference to the “Prague Spring,” the name by which the Czech struggle for liberation that took place in Spring 1968 was known. Similarly, each annual cycle includes a piece on “August” (srpen), the monthly anniversary of the Soviet invasion which crushed Czech liberties in 1968. The “Spring” pieces do contain the lyricism about nature we might expect, as well as an appeal to a paganesque mythology of creative growth and strength. However, in neither case is there a sense of commemoration of a political movement or of the anniversaries of the events they mark.

The use of devices such as irony or understatement is so traditional in Czech literature that positive meanings, expected and called for in other patriotic and democratic literature, are fully present and comprehensible, despite the absence of literal statements. The “Spring” pieces at once recall the Prague Spring to the attentive Czech reader. Moreover, understated irony makes possible the inversion of other value systems: the feuilleton “Šálek kávy při výslechu” (1977; “A Cup of Coffee with My Interrogator”) shows the secret police interrogator treating the author with the utmost kindness and consideration, while the author replies with the greatest tact and delicacy; these inversions actually serve to suggest the real brutality of the moment depicted.

The “narrative” or “story” type of this feuilleton is less common for Vaculík than a “lyric” type more typical of the essay. This has already been illustrated in the cycle of “Spring” feuilletons. Others are lyric meditations, e.g. “Poznámky o statečnosti” (1978; On heroism), which reflects on whether one would have the heroism to go to prison for personal beliefs. This problem is posed as purely hypothetical, though it must have been very real for its author. Another lyric meditation, despite minimal “story” elements, is “Feuilleton o 1. Máji 1975” (1975; The first of May), which takes its start from Neruda’s similarly named feuilleton, hailing the emerging triumph of the working class, but ending bathetically with the all-powerful communist president Husak attempting to speak over a broken loudspeaker that perversely remains silent.

Vaculík’s feuilletons lost some of their urgency and significance after December 1989, when the Czechs and Slovaks asserted their independence. Still, the new Republic was dogged by many political and social problems; throughout these he has continued to produce his feuilletons at the same pace. He has thus revived for his people a leading Czech literary genre, one full of understatement and irony, a genre that has lasted well into the time of the re-creation of a new young democratic republic.

WILLIAM E.HARKINS

Biography

Born 23 July 1926 in Brumov, Moravia. Studied at the Commerce Academy for International Business, 1944–46; High School for Social and Political Sciences, Prague, 1946–51, B.S., 1951. Worked in a Bata shoe factory, Zlin and Zurc, 1941–43; teacher, until 1949, and tutor, 1950–51. Member of the Communist Party, 1946–68: expelled. Married Marie Komárková, 1949: three sons. Editor, Rudé Pravo publishers, 1953–57, Beseda Venkovské Rodiny (Native rural journal) 1957–59, Literární Noviny (Literary journal), 1966–69, and Literární Listy (Literary papers), 1968–69; worked for Czechoslovak Radio, Prague, 1959–66; organizer of Edice Petlice (Padlock editions) samizdat publishing. Arrested and imprisoned for giving an interview to the BBC, 1973. Awards: Československý Spisovatel (publishers) Award, 1967; George Orwell Prize, 1976.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Milí spolužáci! Vybor písemných prací, 1939–1979, 2 vols., 1986

A Cup of Coffee with My Interrogator: The Prague Chronicles, translated by George Theiner, 1987

Jaro je tady: Fejetony z let, 1981–1987, 1988

Srpnový rok: Fejetony z roku 1988, 1989

Stará dáma se baví, 1990

Jak se dela chalpec, 1993

Other writings: four novels (Rušný dům, 1963; Sekyra [The Axe], 1966; Morčata [The Guinea Pigs], in German, 1971, in Czech, 1973; Český snář, 1980).

Further Reading

Harkins, William E., “The New Czechoslovak Feuilleton—A Literary Genre Revived,” Urbandus Review 1, no. 2 (Spring 1978): 50–57

Liehm, Antonin J., The Politics of Culture, New York: Grove Press, 1968:181–201

Liehm, Antonin J., “Ludvík Vaculík and His Novel The Axe,” in Czech Literature Since 1956: A Symposium, edited by William E. Harkins and Paul I. Trensky, New York: Bohemica, 1980: 91–102

Vadeboncoeur, Pierre

French Canadian, 1920–

In 1960, the first year of what has been called the Quiet Revolution in Quebec, Pierre Vadeboncoeur published an epoch-making essay entitled “La Ligne du risque” (The path of risk) in Écrits du Canada Français (Writings from French Canada). In it Vadeboncoeur pleaded for a renewal, or rather a transformation of the spiritual tradition of French Canada, following in the footsteps of the painter Paul-Émile Borduas. The latter had published in 1948 a manifesto called Refus global (Global refusal). Influenced by surrealism, this seminal document raged against the religious and nationalist narrowness of Quebec thought. “Borduas,” wrote Vadeboncoeur, “was the first to break radically. He broke totally. He did not break in order to break; he did it to be alone and without witness before truth. Our spiritual history begins with him.”

In the 1960s, Vadeboncoeur worked for the Confédération des Syndicats Nationaux (Confederation of National Trade Unions), and in the collection La Ligne du risque (1963) launched a vigorous attack against American unionism, which had become a part of the capitalist system instead of a revolutionary force. Thus, in this first book, we find two major aspects of the author’s thought: an emphasis on spiritual values, and a dedication to social reform. A third aspect was to emerge a few years later, in 1970, with the publication of an autobiographical narrative, Un amour libre (A free love), in which Vadeboncoeur describes the relationship between father and son and reflects on love and private life. Running through these two books is the common theme of freedom. Spiritual life, social combat, art, and love are all paths to freedom, and one can not be separated from the others.

In the years that followed, Vadeboncoeur’s main preoccupation became political, that of promoting the independence of Quebec. At the beginning of the 1950s, he had been one of the founders of the magazine Cité Libre (Free city), along with his friends Pierre Elliott Trudeau and Gérard Pelletier, who were later to become, respectively, Prime Minister and Minister in the federal government. As the years passed by, Vadeboncoeur became more and more estranged from them, and found that his ideal of freedom could not be attained if the people of Quebec remained in the Canadian Confederation. He became a polemicist, lashing out at the federal system, the domination of the English language, and the subservience of so many French Canadians—including some of his former friends—to what he considered a certain form of colonialism perpetrated by the Anglophone power structure.

Then, in 1978, a major change occurred in Vadeboncoeur’s career. With the publication of a long essay entitled Les Deux Royaumes (The two realms), he broke with his polemical brochures, and went back, beyond the magazine La Ligne du Risque, to the very first essays he had published in the 1940s in La Nouvelle Relève (The new awakening). He took leave from his union duties, deciding to devote all his time and efforts to writing. “There are two realms,” he wrote, “the one irreducible to the other; and the first human truth consists in knowing that fact... I have always known that, more or less consciously. That knowledge had been obscured by the occupations of life, until I came to suffer more and more from our epoch’s raw existentialism.” Recognizing the coexistence of these two realms—the social and the spiritual—Vadeboncoeur opted decisively for the second, at about the same time as did, in France, the “nouveaux philosophes,” Bernard-Henri Lévy, Philippe Nemo, and others. This meeting of minds is not, of course, without historical significance.

Vadeboncoeur has not changed his intense, terse style, reminiscent sometimes of the best prose works of Charles Péguy. If anything, his style has become purer in the books that followed, in which he wrote mainly, if not exclusively, about art—whether his own daughter’s drawings or the Centre Pompidou in Paris (a splendid essay)—and love, that kind of human but almost mystical love that is strengthened by absence. Vadeboncoeur was a powerful essayist; he has become a prosateur: a prose writer in the strongest sense of the word, an artist of prose writing, one among very few.

GILLES MARCOTTE

Biography

Born 28 July 1920 in Strathmore, near Montreal. Studied at the Collèges Jean-de-Brébeuf and Sainte-Marie, 1938–40; law at the University of Montreal, licence, 1943. Civil servant, journalist, and translator, 1943–50; legal adviser to the Confederation of National Trade Unions, 1950–75. Full-time writer, from 1975; contributor ovarious journals, including Cité Libre, Liberté, Situation, Maintenant (Now), and Parti Pris (We affirm). Awards: Liberté Prize, 1970; Duvernay Prize, 1971; David Prize, 1976; City of Montreal Grand Prize for Literature, for Les Deux Royaumes, 1978; France-Quebec Prize, for Trois Essais sur l'insignifiance, 1984; Canada-Suisse Prize, for L'Absence, 1987; Canada-Communauté Frangaise de Belgique Prize, 1994.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

La Ligne du risque, 1963

L'Autorité du peuple, 1965

Lettres et colères, 1969

La Dernière Heure et la première, 1970

Un amour libre, 1970

Indépendances, 1972

Un génocide en douce: Écrits polémiques, 1976

Chaque jour, l'indépendance, 1978

Les Deux Royaumes, 1978

To Be or Not to Be, That Is the Question (text in French), 1980

Trois essais sur l'insignifiance, 1983

L'Absence: Essai à la deuxième personne, 1985

Essais inactuels, 1987

Essai sur une pensée heureuse, 1989

Le Bonheur excessif, 1992.

Gouverner ou disparaître, 1993

Dix-sept tableaux d'enfant: Étude d'une métamorphose, 1994

Further Reading

Arbour, Rose Marie, "Vadeboncoeur et le féminisme," Possibles 8, no. 1 (1983):181–89
 Beaudoin, Réjean, editor, Un homme libre: Pierre Vadeboncoeur, Montreal: Leméac, 1974

Beaulieu, Victor-Lévy, "Pour saluer Pierre Vadeboncoeur," Liberté 12, no. 4 (July–August 1970):3–11

- Dumont, François, "L'Essai littéraire québécois des années quatrevingt: La Collection 'Papiers collés'," Recherches Sociographiques 33, no. 2. (1991):323–35
- Leloup, Béatrice, Les Images dominantes dans les essais de P. Vadeboncoeur, Montreal: McGill University, 1981
- Liberté* issue on Vadeboncoeur, 21, no. 6 (November–December 1979)
- Mailhot, Laurent, "D'un amour libre à un pays libéré, ou de l'autorité de l'enfant à celle du peuple," in his Ouvrir le livre, Montreal: L'Hexagone, 1992:195–204 (article originally published 1972.)
- Melançon, Benoît, "La Fiction de l'Amérique dans l'essai contemporain: Pierre Vadeboncoeur et Jean Larose," Études Françaises 26, no. 2. (Autumn 1990):31–39
- Przychodzen, Janusz, "L'Essai québécois contemporain: L'Être spéculaire," La Licorne 27 (1993):205–18
- Roy, Paul-Émile, Pierre Vadeboncoeur: Un homme attentif, Montreal: Méridien, 1995
- Vachon, Stéphane, "Problématique d'une nouvelle forme: L'Essai Pamphlet au Québec," Itinéraires et Contacts de Culture 6 (1985):47–57
- Vigneault, Robert, "Pierre Vadeboncoeur: L'Énonciation dans le discours de l'essai," in L'Écriture de l'essai, Montreal: L'Hexagone, 1994:133–59 (article originally published 1982)
- Vigneault, Robert, "Pierre Vadeboncoeur: La Promotion littéraire du dualisme," in L'Écriture de l'essai, Montreal: L'Hexagone, 1994: 110–33 (article originally published 1985)

Valéry, Paul

French, 1871–1945

Form, for Paul Valéry, was of central importance. Many of the intricately crafted poems in his collection Charmes (1922; Magic spells) not only richly demonstrate this critical preference but, as his many quips against the cult of Romantic "inspiration" tirelessly remind us, make formal qualities more meaningful than so-called content itself—the structure of the tides as opposed to the mere foam of events on the surface of the sea. Of the many verbal genres that occupied him throughout his long writing life, from poem, prose poem, drama, or mock Socratic dialogue on the one hand, to aphorism or fragmentary analysis on the other, where stands the essay in this self-imposed hierarchy of intellectual worth?

In Valéry's own eyes, seemingly low on the list, however prolific an essayist he was to become. He tended to associate it with a conventional, rhetorically-led expression—as loose, by virtue of its discursive prose fabric, as mere walking to dancing, its very ease of comprehensibility a cause for suspicion (this the heritage of the symbolist cult of suggestive difficulty led by his friend and mentor, Stéphane Mallarmé). He valued instead, next to the polished voice of a poem with its power to integrate the different "speeds" of mental discovery, the brief but concentrated jottings of his private notebooks, the Cahiers (wr. 1894–1945), written at dawn before the more public commitments of the day.

Devoted for the most part to influential writers and thinkers—Descartes, Pascal, Goethe, Bergson, Nietzsche, Mallarmé—and often stemming from his eminent position at the French Academy, many of the essays of the several volumes of Variété (Variety) were occasioned by circumstance, even their scope and subject matter imposed. So much in demand did Valéry become, in fact, for everything from literary preface to inaugural discourse, that he referred to himself wearily in a letter to André Gide as the “Bossuet of the Third Republic.” First published as a collection by the Nouvelle Revue Française (New French review) in 1924 and subsequently extended in four further volumes (1929–44) under the subject groupings of literary, philosophical, quasi-political, aesthetic, educational, and poetic (chronological grouping was considered by Valéry to be no more than systematic disorder), the essays of Variété nonetheless develop, for all their “varied” range of interests, the single, personal interest at the heart of his thinking: the functioning of the human mind, not the least our capacity for a kind of mental gymnastics or unifying self-awareness brought to bear on sensibility and even consciousness itself. Introduction à la méthode de Léonard de Vinci (1919; Introduction to the Method of Leonardo da Vinci), where a specific genius, the Renaissance “polymath” Leonardo, is characteristically used to typify a principle of the creative imagination, is but one example of such an interest in human possibility; or, again, “Crise de l’esprit” (1919; “The Spiritual Crisis”), where the same theme of a “fiduciary” partnership between knowledge and individual freedom is extended to a prophetic examination of international relations, including the possible decline of the West through an excess of rationality. “We civilizations now know that we are mortal” is the famous first sentence of this open letter first published in English in the Athenaeum, or, in a companion piece, “I wrote the other day that peace is the war which admits in its process acts of love and creation.”

From analysis of the revelatory mental processes involved in poetic composition, to the conditions of the modern world which make wars as predictable as avoidable, there is not one subject on which Valéry does not bring to bear his uniquely subversive method of assumed naivety (a “Robinson Crusoe” approach, as he called this favored method of banning all untested, secondhand knowledge from his empirical island), and, indeed, his peculiar clarification or “surgical cleansing” of a problem by attending first to its possible origin in words (“le nettoyage de la situation verbale”). The phrase itself, memorable like the walking/dancing analogy for its characteristic blend of precision and suggestion, can be found in the paradoxically well-crafted “Poésie et pensée abstraite” (1939 [the Zahrahoff lecture at Oxford University; “Poetry and Abstract Thought”). It was one of many essays to become, to the post-symbolist generation and far beyond Valéry’s death in 1945, a source of almost biblical pronouncement on fundamental principles of aesthetic criticism (music, painting, and sculpture as much as literature) or—with his usual reflexive curiosity toward the trinity of mind, body, and world which, contrary to so much metaphysical thinking, he saw as the source, limit, and goal of all things human—on the hidden role of language in civilization and thought.

Here the reader may feel that, far from intellectual elitism, a sustained impatience with unnecessary detail informs Valéry’s notorious scorn for the would-be exhaustive or “encyclopedic” form of essay or lecture (that same impatience with a “naturalistic” aesthetic of accumulated detail which underlies his in some ways misguided attack on the novel as a true literary form). Wary of metaphysics and philosophical systems, and relegating the political to the realm of myth and dream, these and many of the pieces in parallel collections such as Maîtres et amis (1927; Masters and friends), Regards sur le monde actuel (1931, 1945; Reflections on the World Today), Souvenirs poétiques (1947; Poetic memories), or Vues (1948; Views) radiate a boldly simple wisdom capable of empowering the general reader with the virtues and rewards of the analytic: a ceaselessly vigilant, single-minded “voice” in which protest and a sense of renewed potentiality combine.

To return, then, to the creative tension between public and private, subject and object, unitary and fragmentary, undoubtedly present at the heart of Valéry’s extended prose writing: much of his reluctant later fulfillment as essayist is derived, it would seem, from the fertile surprise of “finding himself involved in an unaccustomed order of thought...”—in other words, from the challenge posed by the public dimension itself. At a far remove from the cult of pure potentiality symbolized by his fictitious monster of the intellect, Monsieur Teste, the externalizing commitment of the essay could be said to produce at its best a wonderfully agile balance of specific and general, enabling him to expand the intense but cryptic perceptions of the notebooks and even to breach, Leonardlike in the process, the falsely watertight divisions of Science and Art. However ostensibly alien to the tradition of personal confession (what more boring than to read the essays of Montaigne, he complains in the Cahiers), the essays frequently begin with some lively, personal anecdote concerning his reading (his notorious love-hate relationship with the 17th-century Christian apologist Pascal, for instance) and, at the risk of a certain unrepentant monotony of focus, take delight in rediscovering the “natural flow of thought” temporarily disrupted by the initial demand. There is in the poet something of the potter’s art of accommodating the unexpected, he suggests in the early piece, “Au sujet d’Adonis” (1921; “Adonis”), to be used as the preface to an admired edition of La Fontaine’s fables, where the goals of pleasure and instruction combine.

With its focus on a “poetics” of mental life, the essay might be seen, finally, as an empathetic mode of discourse particularly suited to Valéry’s ability to remain detached from his subject while reidentified through generality itself. This is exemplified in, for instance, “Fragment d’un Descartes” (192,5; “Sketch for a Portrait of Descartes”—note yet another defiantly non-definitive title) where, moving as usual from personal anecdote to general perception, he conveys the excitement of Descartes’ first encounter with the seed of intellectual possibility to determine the rest of his life, if not the development of the whole of Western thought: a moment of crisis and mathematical insight we cannot but link with Valéry’s own formative crisis in 1892, the famous night of the storm when he felt himself divided in two, observer and observed, and decided to devote himself to the analysis of affectivity rather than its passive experience. Far from weakening objectivity, such passionate involvement in universality cannot but appear to strengthen the power of his argument: a disarmingly persuasive polemic full of grace, wit, and humor, if not without its moments of perversely “anti-literary” obstinacy (the notorious essay on Proust, for example, where he denies having read his great novel at all).

Valéry dedicated his reflections on the modern world to “those who adhere to no system or political party and who, therefore, are still at liberty to question what is in doubt and [a typically probing twist to the incipient cliché] not free to deny what is beyond question.” In valuing the freedom to question the most cherished conviction (religious, political, or otherwise), and in exploiting the implicit dialogue with his reader as a means of questioning the role of received ideas in his own thought, he characteristically revivifies the primary sense of the term “essay” as the French essayer—“to attempt,” or, in this case, to struggle against the damaging closure of a form of metaphysical thinking parasitic on language alone. In my ignorance lies my strength—the Cartesian “cogito” turned on its head? We are back, moreover, to the theme of formal difficulty (Leonardo’s “hostinato rigore”). It is in this sustained devotion to the pursuit of the shadow at the heart of light that Valéry, essayist and attempter of the impossible (for how can thought itself not betray the fluid, he seems to asks through the very form of the essay), might be said to reveal the Modernism underlying his classical achievement, but also, no less valuably, to vindicate the values of critical lucidity and stylistic balance kept alive by a limpid use of French prose still largely unrivaled to this day.

CHRISTINE CROW

Biography

Ambroise Paul Toussaint Jules Valéry. Born 30 October 1871 in Cette (now Sete). Studied at a lycée in Montpellier, 1887–88, baccalauréat, 1888; University of Montpellier, 1888–92., law degree, 1891. Military service, 1889–90. Worked in the War Office, 1897–1900; private secretary to Édouard Lebey, director of the Agence Havas press association, Paris, 1900–22. Married Jeannie Gobillard, 1900: two sons and one daughter. Coeditor, Commerce literary review, 19 24–32. Elected to the French Academy, 1925. Administrator, Centre Universitaire Méditerranéen, Nice, from 1933; chair of poetics, Collège de France, Paris, 1937–45. Awards: honorary degree from Oxford University. Chevalier, 1923, Officer, 1926, and Commander, 1931, Legion of Honor. Died in Paris, 20 July 1945.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

- Introduction à la methode de Léonard de Vinci*, 1919; as Introduction to the Method of Leonardo da Vinci, translated by Thomas McGreevy, 1929
- Fragments sur Mallartné*, 1924
- Variété* 1–5, 5 vols., 1924–44; first 2 vols., as Variety, translated by Malcolm Cowley and William Aspenwall Bradley, 1927–38
- Études et fragments sur le rêve*, 1925
- Essai sur Stendhal*, 1927
- Maîtres et amis*, 1927
- Poésie: Essais sur la poétique et le poète*, 1928
- Divers essais sur Léonard de Vinci*, 1931
- Regards sur le monde actuel*, 1931; revised, enlarged edition, 1945; as Reflections on the World Today, translated by Francis Scarfe, 1948
- Calepin d'un poète: Essais sur la poétique et le poète*, 1933

Discours aux chirurgiens, 1938

Tel quel (fragments from notebooks), 2 vols., 1941–43

Mauvaises pensées et autres, 1942

Souvenirs poétiques, 1947

Vues, 1948

Écrits divers sur Stéphane Mallarmé, 1950

Cahiers, 29 vols., 1957–61; Pléiade Edition edited by Judith Robinson, 2 vols., 1973–74;

Cahiers, 1894–1914, edited by Nicole Celeyrette-Pietri and Judith Robinson-Valéry, 5 vols., 1987–94 (in progress)

An Anthology (includes essays, poetry, and dialogues), edited by James R. Lawler, 1977

Other writings: poetry, three plays, and correspondence.

Collected works editions: Collected Works, edited by Jackson Mathews, 15 vols., 1957–75; Œuvres (Pléiade Edition), edited by Jean Hytier, 2 vols., 1975–77.

Bibliographies

Davis, Ronald, and Raoul Simonson, Bibliographie des œuvres de Paul Valéry, 1895–1925, Paris: Plaisir de Bibliophile, 1926

Karaiskis, Georges, and François Chapon, Bibliographie des œuvres de Paul Valéry, Paris: Blaziot, 1976

Further Reading

Austin, Lloyd James, “The Genius of Paul Valéry,” in Wingspread Lectures in the Humanities, Racine, Wisconsin: Johnson Foundation, 1966

Benoist, Pierre-François, Les Essais de Paul Valéry, vers et prose, Paris: Pensée Moderne, 1964

Bowie, Malcolm, Alison Fairlie, and Alison Finch, editors, Baudelaire, Mallarmé, Valéry: New Essays in Honour of Lloyd Austin, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1982

Crow, Christine, Paul Valéry: Consciousness and Nature, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1972

Crow, Christine, Paul Valéry and Maxwell’s Demon: Natural Order and Human Possibility, Hull: University of Hull, 1972

Crow, Christine, Paul Valéry and the Poetry of Voice, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1982

Franklin, Ursula, The Rhetoric of Valéry’s Prose “Aubades”, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1979

Gifford, Paul, Valéry, Charmes, Glasgow: Glasgow University Press, 1995

Grubbs, Henry A., Paul Valéry, New York: Twayne, 1968

Ince, W.N., The Poetic Theory of Paul Valéry: Inspiration and Technique, Leicester: Leicester University Press, 1961

Ince, W.N., Paul Valéry: Poetry and Abstract Thought (an inaugural lecture delivered at the University of Southampton, 24 May 1973), Southampton: University of Southampton, 1973

Lawler, James, The Poet as Analyst: Essays on Paul Valéry, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1974

Mackay, Agnes, The Universal Self: A Study of Paul Valéry, Glasgow: Maclellan, 2nd edition, 1980 (original edition, 1961)

Nash, Suzanne, Paul Valéry's "Album de vers anciens": A Past Transfigured, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1983

Pickering, Robert, Paul Valéry, poète en prose, Paris: Lettres Modernes, 1983

Robinson, Judith, "Dreaming and the Analysis of Consciousness in Valéry's Cahiers," French Studies 16, no. 2 (April 1962): 101–13

Scarfe, Francis, The Art of Paul Valéry: A Study in Dramatic Monologue, London: Heinemann, 1954

Stimpson, Brian, Paul Valéry and Music, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984

Suckling, Norman, Paul Valéry and the Civilized Mind, London: Oxford University Press, 1954

Virtanen, Reino, L'Imagerie scientifique de Paul Valéry, Paris: Vrin, 1975

Whiting, Charles, Paul Valéry, London: Athlone Press, 1978

Varchi, Benedetto

Italian, 1503–1565

Varchi's writing encompasses, in true Renaissance fashion, a wide variety of genres and forms, both fictional and nonfictional: lyric and pastoral poetry, comic theater, translations from Latin and Greek texts, literary commentary and editing, artistic theory, commemorative oration, dialogue, philology, and history. His major work, the Storia fiorentina (wr. 1547, pub. 1721; Florentine history), was commissioned by his patron, Cosimo de' Medici, ruler of Florence. Its 16 short books take the form of a series of essays commenting on the period from 1527 to 1538. They have been judged harshly by some for their praise of Cosimo and his family, said to be dictated by the writer's position as a Medici courtier and dependent. Varchi's admiration for his benefactor, however, can also be seen as an expression of the general esteem in which Cosimo was held by 16th-century humanists for his wide culture, his patronage of the arts, and his undoubted and muchprized quality of virtù (energy). Whatever the case, the Storia is a work of conscientious and systematic research demonstrating that concern of Renaissance historians, first found in Petrarch and illustrated later in contemporaries of Varchi such as Machiavelli and Guicciardini, not merely to trust received views or accept what previous historians had written, but to use and check evidence from a full range of sources: histories, chronicles, private memoirs, official documents, and, in Varchi's case, personal knowledge and experience of facts and individuals. But while from this angle the Storia bears favorable comparison with the work of Varchi's more illustrious contemporaries, and is indeed itself a useful historical source book, it lacks the theoretical framework, the evaluative vigor and the wider European or at least pan-Italian dimension to be found in the writing of, say, Machiavelli. Yet this makes it more of an "open" work, engaging more with the reader than other similar works of the period. Its alternations between, on the one hand, well-marshaled fact and analysis and, on the other, accumulations of events and opinions which seem to tumble out without order, hierarchy, or stylistic unity make it a hybrid more typical of earlier Renaissance historiography. At the same time—and this too raises questions in the mind of the reader—it can tend toward the mere emdition or chronicle characteristic of later Counter-Reformation writers such as Vincenzo Borghini or Scipione Ammirato.

In these historical essays Varchi is something of a transition figure between Renaissance and Counter-Reformation, and indeed a marked hostility to certain aspects of the spirit of the Counter-Reformation is to be found in the aversion to clerical involvement in politics very forcefully expressed in the Storia. In contrast, his essay work on artistic theory shows that in this area he had to a large extent completed the transition from the Platonist eclecticism characteristic of Renaissance artistic thought to the more rigid Aristotelian conventions of the new era, which divided learning into the two distinct categories of art and science and further insisted on the division of art into discrete forms and genres, each governed by its own rules and proprieties. His Due lezioni (1549; Two lectures), initially delivered to the Accademia Fiorentina in 1546, consist of a pedestrian analysis of a Michelangelo sonnet followed by a somewhat sterile discussion on which of the two artistic forms, painting and sculpture, holds primacy over the other, leading Baxter Hathaway (1962) to describe Varchi as “one of the more timid and unoriginal of the Aristotelians.” His Orazione funerale...nell'essequie di Michelangelo Buonarroti (1564; Funeral oration for Michelangelo) is, in its expression, equally illustrative of the rhetorical excess which characterized the Counter-Reformation, the oration form being, as Peter M. Brown (1974) puts it, “thoroughly decadent, the plaything of erudition and of the pedestrian rhetoric of the letterato.” However, it would be wrong to see his Aristotelianism, of which he was, in Umberto Pirotti's words, “a clear and elegant popularizer,” as entirely formal and monolithic, since, as his collected lectures on philosophy and aesthetics published in 1590 (Lezioni) show, his theorizing raises significant contradictions between intellect and religious dogma, even if, like most of his contemporaries, he then leaves them serenely unresolved.

The vogue for rhetoric also found expression in the linguistic disputes that raged in 16th-century Italy, in particular the famous questione della lingua (“language question”), in which Varchi was a significant figure. His essay in dialogue form about written Italian, L'Ercolano (wr. 1565, pub. 1570; The dialogue of Ercolano), is his best-known work and, perhaps because of the more practical nature of the issue, shows greater originality of thought and insight than his writings on artistic theory. He steers a middle course between the two main theories current at the time: the one championed by Pietro Bembo which maintained that the “correct” language to be cultivated by writers was the archaic literary tongue of 14th-century Florence found in Dante, Petrarch, and Boccaccio; and the other, supported by such figures as Claudio Tolomei and Annibal Caro, which argued that “correct” Italian was that currently used in Florence for spoken purposes. The Ercolano, while providing a comprehensive survey of the whole question, shows great admiration for Bembo and his views, which as the century wore on were finally to prevail. But at the same time Varchi is concerned to reconcile Bembo's prescriptions with a perceived need for making modern usage play a part in the language of literary composition. In this attempt to apply the linguistic lesson of the old writers to the contemporary idiom, Varchi is taking up the theme much present in his artistic theory of the relationship between art (in this case the 14th-century language) and nature (practical modern usage). The claim he lays in this work to systematic analysis of the topic and the evidence relating to it is not, however, fulfilled. He does present an impressive wealth of exemplification, but it is not always appropriately ordered, and the effectiveness of his arguments is not infrequently diminished by digressions and obvious factual errors. Yet it cannot be denied that this is somewhat counterbalanced by his vigor of argument in support of convictions which are manifestly deeply held and which, in the light of modern knowledge about language, can sometimes be seen to be both perceptive and prophetic.

HOWARD MOSS

Biography

Born 1503 in Florence. Studied jurisprudence in Pisa, from 1521; qualified as notary, but main interest was in literature and humanist studies; learned Greek with Pietro Vettori and translated many Latin and Greek authors; taught himself Provençal and translated a Provençal grammar into Italian. Banished from Florence for supporting the Republicans, 1530, and went into exile with the Strozzi family to escape Medici rule. Traveled widely in Italy, including to Bologna, Padua, and Venice. Recalled to Florence, 1543, by Cosimo I de' Medici, who appointed him state historiographer; received into the Florentine Academy, 1543, and consul, from 1553; changeable relationship with his patrons the Medici, falling in and out of favor several times; finally became one of Cosimo's leading acolytes and was commissioned by him to write a recent history of Florence and to compose orations. Died in 1565.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Due lezioni, 1549

Orazione funerale...nell'essequie di Michelangelo Buonarroti, 1564

L'Ercolano (dialogue), 1570; edited by Maurizio Vitale, 1979

Lezioni, 1590

Lezione su Dante e prose varie, 1590; edited by Giuseppe Aiazzi and Lelio Arbib, 2 vols., 1841

Storia fiorentina, 1721; edited by Gaetano Milanese, 3 vols., 1857–58

Other writings: poetry and a play. Also translated many classical works.

Collected works edition: Opere, 2 vols., 1834; Opere, edited by Antonio Racheli, 2 vols., 1858–59.

Further Reading

Bonora, Ettore, "Il purismo fiorentino e la nuova filologia," in Storia della letteratura italiana, vol. 4, edited by Emilio Cecchi and Natalino Sapegno, Milan: Garzanti,

1966:607–26

Brown, Peter M., Lionardo Salviati: A Critical Biography, London: Oxford University Press, 1974: especially 80–93

Hathaway, Baxter, The Age of Criticism: The Late Renaissance in Italy, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1962.

Izzo, Herbert J., “The Linguistic Philosophy of Benedetto Varchi, Sixteenth-century Florentine Humanist,” Language Sciences 40 (1976):1–7

Manacorda, Guido, Benedetto Varchi: L’uomo, il poeta, il critico, Rome: Polla, 1976 (original edition 1903)

Montevocchi, Alessandro, Storici di Firenze: Studi su Nardi, Nerli, e Varchi, Bologna: Patron, 1989

Papuli, Giovanni, Benedetto Varchi: Logica e poesia, Manduria: Lacaita, 1970

Pirotti, Umberto, “Benedetto Varchi e la questione della lingua,” Convivium 28 (1960):257–342.

Pirotti, Umberto, “Aristotelian Philosophy and the Popularization of Learning: Benedetto Varchi and Renaissance Aristotelianism,” in The Late Italian Renaissance, 1525–1630, edited by Eric Cochrane, London: Macmillan, and New York: Harper and Row, 1970:168–208

Pirotti, Umberto, Benedetto Varchi e la cultura del suo tempo, Florence: Olschki, 1971

Quiviger, Francis, “Benedetto Varchi and the Visual Arts,” Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institutes 50 (1987):219–24

Rossi, Sergio, “Varchi, Michelangelo e la disputa sul ‘Primato’ delle arti,” in his Dalle botteghe alle accademie: Realtà sociale e teorie artistiche a Firenze dal XIV al XVI secolo, Milan: Feltrinelli, 1980:89–122

Vitale, Maurizio, Introduction to L’Ercolano by Varchi, Milan: Cisalpino-Goliardica, 1979 (reprint of 1804 Milan edition)

Vitale, Maurizio, La questione della lingua, Palermo: Palumbo, 1984:90–94 (original edition 1960)

Ward, Michael T., “Benedetto Varchi as Etymologist,” Historiographia Linguistica 16 (1989):235–56

Ward, Michael T., “Benedetto Varchi and the Social Dimensions of Language,” Italica 68 (1991): 176–94

Weinberg, Bernard, A History of Literary Criticism in the Italian Renaissance, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1961

Vasconcelos, José

Mexican, 1882–1959

Activist philosopher, political figure (once a candidate for the Mexican presidency), and educational administrator (among other things, secretary of public education in his native land for four years), José Vasconcelos was also a prolific essayist, producing dozens of books and numerous uncollected essays which appeared in diverse periodicals.

If it can be said that Parmenides was being-intoxicated and that Spinoza was God-intoxicated, it can just as well be said that Vasconcelos was unity-intoxicated, possessed by a desire to achieve a comprehension of the whole of reality—not by abstracting generalities from individual differences, but by seeking what he termed a “synthesis of the heterogeneous,” wherein all aspects of reality would be unified while still remaining diverse. As a result it can be difficult to understand or appreciate single essays in isolation. Vasconcelos’ words are often like notes, his essays like musical passages, even at times like whole movements of a symphony, and are more meaningful considered together than by themselves.

Among the many works he penned were four volumes of autobiography; a number of aesthetics-centered works, the most important of which were El monismo estético (1918; Aesthetic monism), Tratado de metafísica (1929; Treatise on metaphysics), Ética (1932; Ethics), Estética (1935; Aesthetics), and Lógica organica (1945; Organic logic); several collections of essays on sociopolitical topics, including La raza cósmica (1925; The cosmic race), Indología (1927; Indianology—Vasconcelos’ term), and Bolivarismo y Monroísmo (1934; Bolivarism and Monroism); and a collection of highly original essays on educational theory and practice entitled De Robinsón a Odiseo (1935; From Robinson [Crusoe] to Odysseus).

Vasconcelos affirmed that the major achievements of his homeland were in the realm of the arts—poetry, music, painting, sculpture, and architecture. Hence when he concentrated on aesthetics in his philosophy he felt he was reflecting a dominant feature of Mexican life. Further, he was, in the traditional Spanish phrase, un hombre de carne y hueso (a man of flesh and bone), a philosopher who sought truth as the fruit of a total experience—sensory, intellectual, volitional, emotional; he sought the “whole” truth as a “whole” person, and this total experience is aesthetic. In Tratado de metafísica Vasconcelos used the example of a gardener who, amidst the splendor of a rose garden, sets himself to counting the bushes. However, as soon as he does so the most profound and stirring aspects of the place are shattered. As with the rose garden, so too is the philosophical conception of the universe of a person whose vision is narrowed to the realm of the mathematical.

Even in his ethics, Vasconcelos’ approach was aesthetic. He pointed out that to create a work of beauty the artist gives a special form to some matter, such as the arrangement of sounds in a symphony or of shapes and colors in a painting. Our human acts and the events and circumstances of our lives are a kind of matter to which we can give a form. Thus in Ética Vasconcelos wrote that in a heroic action or a saintly work, ethics and aesthetics become one, with the hero or the saint creating a life of beauty.

The task of achieving a system of unity-with-diversity in his aesthetic philosophy was also the principal problem in Vasconcelos’ social and political thought—in both domestic concerns within Mexico (as in La raza cósmica and especially in Indología, where he discussed questions concerning human unity and racial and cultural diversity) and international (especially inter-American) issues (as in Bolivarismo and Monroísmo, where he sought the integration of the diverse nations of Latin America in an exemplary union).

To project his comprehensive view of reality Vasconcelos employed a “poetic” method of exposition. He explained that the poet, as an artist, recognizes the essential role of the emotions in the cognitive process and is precisely the artist who employs a discursive language by means of which this process can be elaborated and explicated. Thus Vasconcelos remarked in his Ética that a philosopher must be “a poet with a system,” pointing out that the insights of the poet are necessary in order to grasp reality; the philosopher organizes such insights in the writing of essays.

While his essays are often attractive and stimulating, Vasconcelos’ scholarship can be suspect (with, for example, slight care taken about properly identifying his sources). Moreover, a number of his poetic passages are at times decidedly obscure; the reader may glimpse poetic insights without being able to discover the philosopher’s system. However, such objections concerned Vasconcelos little since he saw himself as an inventor, a creative essayist, and not as a pedantic philosopher.

José Vasconcelos was a complex, passionate figure who, despite his academic weaknesses, is one of the major philosopher-essayists of modern Latin America.

JOHN H.HADDOX

Biography

Born 28 February 1882 in Oaxaca. Studied in the United States; law at the Escuela Nacional de Jurisprudencia, Mexico City, graduated 1905. Married Serafina Miranda (later died), 1909: one son and one daughter. Cofounder, Ateneo de la Juventud (Atheneum of youth), Mexico City, 1909–14. Official post in the Progressive Constitutional Party; official representative for Francisco Madero in Washington, D.C., 1910–11; arrested and briefly imprisoned after Madero’s assassination, 1913. Traveled in Peru and the United States, 1915–20. Rector, National Autonomous University of Mexico, Mexico City, 1920–21. Secretary of public education, 1920–24; unsuccessful candidate for Governor of the State of Oaxaca, 1924. Traveled in Europe, from 1925, and taught at various universities in the U.S. Unsuccessful candidate for President of Mexico, 1929. Traveled in Central America, Europe, and the U.S. for ten years; returned to Mexico, 1938. Director, National Library and the Library of Mexico. Founding member, El Colegio de México. Married Esperanza Cruz, 1942: one son. Died (of a heart attack) in Mexico City, 30 June 1959.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

El monismo estético, 1918

Divagaciones literarias, 1919

Estudios indostánicos, 1920

Artículos: Libros que leo sentado y libros que leo de pié, 1920

Ideario de acción, 1924

La raza cósmica, 1925

Aspects of Mexican Civilization (lectures), with Manuel Gamio, 1926

Indología, 1927

Tratado de metafísica, 1929

Pesimismo alegre, 1931

Ética, 1932

- Bolivarismo y Monroísmo: Temas iberoamericanos*, 1934
Hispanoamérica frente a los nacionalistas agresivos de Europa y Norteamérica
 (lectures), 1934
De Robinsón a Odiseo: Pedagogía estructuralista, 1935
Estética, 1935
Qué es el comunismo, 1936
Qué es la revolución, 1937
El realismo científico (lectures), 1943
El viento de Bagdad: Cuentos y ensayos, 1945
Lógica organica, 1945
Discursos, 1920–1950, 1950
Temas contemporáneos, 1955
En el ocaso de mi vida, 1957
Cartas políticas, edited by Alfonso Taracena, 1959
Letanías del atardecer, 1959
Pesimismo heroico, 1964
Antología de textos sobre educación, edited by Alicia Molina, 1981
- Other writings: three plays, works on Mexican history, sociology, and education, biographies of important Mexicans, and the autobiographical series Ulises criollo (1935–39; A Mexican Ulysses).
- Collected works edition: Obras completas, 4 vols., 1957–61.

Bibliography

- Foster, David William, “A Checklist of Criticism on José Vasconcelos,” Los Ensayistas 14–15 (1983):177–212

Further Reading

- Basave Fernández del Valle, Agustín, La filosofía de José Vasconcelos, Madrid: Cultura Hispánica, 1958
- Cárdenas Noriega, Joaquín, José Vasconcelos, 1882–1982: Educador, político y profeta, Mexico City: Océano, 1982
- De Beer, Gabriella, José Vasconcelos, and His World, New York: Las Américas, 1966
- Fernández MacGregor, Genaro, Vasconcelos, Mexico City: Ediciones de la Secretaría de Educación Pública, 1942
- Giordano, Jaime A., “Notas sobre Vasconcelos y el ensayo hispanoamericano del siglo veinte,” Hispanic Review 41 (1973): 541–54
- Haddox, John, Vasconcelos of Mexico, Philosopher and Prophet, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1967
- Robb, James Willis, “José Vasconcelos y Alfonso Reyes: Anverso y reverso de una medalla,” Los Ensayistas 16–17 (1984):55–65
- Taracena, Alfonso, José Vasconcelos, Mexico City: Porrúa, 1982

Vidal, Gore

American, 1915–

Although Gore Vidal distinguished himself first as a novelist, he has become one of America's most prolific essayists, perhaps because the essay allows him to pursue most easily what he admits is his "only serious interest" as a writer: "the subversion of a society that bores and appals me." Toward this goal, he has produced work that has been collected in n volumes, the first, Rocking the Boat, appearing in 1962, the latest, United States, in 1992. While the majority of the essays originally appeared in journals, magazines, and newspapers such as the New York Review of Books, the Nation, and the Reporter, Vidal's opinions also found voice in less predictable forums like Zero and Architectural Digest.

As the titles of the journals in which Vidal's essays appeared might indicate, he writes about literature, issues of national interest, and the people he has known. In fact, in United States, which draws from essays published during the preceding 40 years, Vidal separates the essays into three categories: "State of the Art," "State of the Nation," and "State of Being." As these groupings indicate, Vidal regards himself as a critic of literature, government, and society.

Critics of his work generally agree that Vidal's essays about literature represent him at his best, even though the majority of these essays are not weighty: arguing, for example, the influence of films on modern fiction or denouncing academic novels. They are, however, usually bright, witty, and filled with pithy metaphors. He accuses John O'Hara of detailing his characters' spending habits "with the zest of an Internal Revenue man examining deductions for entertainment" and Henry James of "giving us monsters on a grand scale" in his late fiction. Evaluating Herman Wouk, Vidal quotes a passage and concludes, "This is not at all bad, except as prose." When he approves of a writer or a work, his appraisals ring with wit and insight. His disapproval, characterized frequently as "bitchy," stings with biting satire.

Satire is, indeed, his preferred mode. More negative than positive in his evaluation of the "state of the nation," Vidal attacks government regulations, bureaucracy, and "the Bank," specifically Chase Manhattan Bank; but he explains that this shorthand also refers to all those who have "ownership of the United States." This group includes Democrats, Republicans, and the press. In a manner that critics often classify as superficial and frequently vindictive, Vidal condemns the policies and/or personal behavior of most 20th-century presidents, characterizing Harry Truman as "the president who did us the most harm" and Jack Kennedy as sexually selfish—"not much interested in giving pleasure to his partner." Although surely liberal in his sentiments, Vidal proposes reforms which most people, liberal or otherwise, might have difficulty endorsing, either for their naivety or for their inhumanity. Supporting the legalization of illegal drugs and substances, he justifies his position on the bases that legalization would remove the Mafia from the drug picture and that if people want to kill themselves, the government should not try to stop them. After the Reagan election, Vidal called for a coalition of “faggots,” Jews, and blacks since the do-gooders wished to place all of them “in the same gas chambers.” Richard Brookhiser’s hostile review of United States in the New Criterion (September 1993) dismisses these political essays, saying, “When Vidal exerts himself, he rises to the average.”

His essays on “State of Being” accommodate work that does not fit neatly into the other two categories. Pieces such as “On Flying” (1985), which recalls Vidal’s first experience with an airplane at the age of four and moves to a lesson on the history of flight and famous aviators; “Tarzan Revisited” (1963), which summarizes the Tarzan story with the purpose of exploring human fascination with and personal dreams of adventure; and several essays which might serve as a travel guide for the uninitiated—“Nasser’s Egypt” (1963), “Mongolia!” (1983), and “At Home on a Roman Street” (1985)—are included in this section. Like most of Vidal’s essays, these pieces incorporate not only his personal views but also references to people, places, and experiences from his own life.

Vidal’s family provides him with a wealth of material. His maternal grandfather was Thomas Pryor Gore, one of the first two senators from Oklahoma. He was related to Jackie Kennedy through one of his mother’s marriages. Even though Vidal admits in Palimpsest, his 1995 book-length memoir, that “I had never wanted to meet most of the people that I had met and the fact that I never got to know most of them took dedication and steadfastness on my part,” he claims an acquaintance with a large number of political and literary figures in his essays. Being a novelist, essayist, screenwriter, and playwright and having also run for Congress twice, Vidal met and worked with prominent people in politics, the entertainment industry, and literary circles. He freely uses these connections in his essays, frequently sharing anecdotes from his personal and working relationships with the famous and infamous. In fact, we might classify his style as conspiratorial name-dropping. Readers learn of the business dealings and the sexual, drinking, and personal habits of the notorious; family skeletons emerge from the closets. John F. Kennedy, Henry James, Tennessee Williams, F. Scott Fitzgerald, Theodore Roosevelt, Anais Nin, and many others become human in the most negative sense with Vidal’s revelations. While these anecdotes personalize and invigorate Vidal’s views, they also frequently trivialize them. As Robert Kiernan (1982) observes, “the essays are more interesting for their quips, their anecdotes, and their satirical exaggerations than for the spine of essayistic logic that these bend to their will. The essays...are a banquet of canapes. They may leave one hungry...but the canapes are so tasty withal that more conventional fare seems unflavored.” While Vidal accuses some authors and reviewers of “book chat,” he himself may be guilty of “people chat.” However, Vidal without the conspiratorial revelations would hardly be Vidal.

GLORIA GODFREY JONES

Biography

Eugene Luther Gore Vidal, Jr. Born 3 October 1925 in West Point, New York. Studied at Los Alamos School, New Mexico, 1939–40; Phillips Exeter Academy, New Hampshire, 1940–43. Warrant officer in the U.S. Army, 1943–46. Editor, E.P.Dutton publishers, New York, 1946. Lived in Antigua, Guatemala, 1947–49. Member of the advisory board, Partisan Review, 1960–71. Democratic-Liberal candidate for Congress, New York, 1960; member, President’s Advisory Committee on the Arts, 1961–63. Lived in Italy, 1967–76. Co-chair, New Party, 1968–71. Awards: Mystery Writers of America Award, for television play, 1954; Cannes Film Critics Award, for screenplay, 1964; National Book Critics Circle Award, for criticism, 1983; National Book Award, for United States, 1993.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Rocking the Boat, 1962

Sex, Death, and Money, 1968

Reflections upon a Sinking Ship, 1969

Homage to Daniel Shays: Collected Essays, 1952–1972, 1972; as Collected Essays, 1952–1972, 1974; as On Our Own Now, 1976

Matters of Fact and of Fiction: Essays, 1973–1976, 1977

Sex Is Politics and Vice Versa, 1979

The Second American Revolution and Other Essays, 1976–1982, 1982; as Pink Triangle and Yellow Star, and Other Essays, 1982

Armageddon? Essays, 1983–1987, 1987

At Home: Essays, 1982–1988, 1988

A View from the Diners Club: Essays, 1987–1991, 1991

Screening History (lectures), 1992

United States: Essays, 1951–1991, 1992.

Other writings: 23 novels (including The City and the Pillar, 1949; Washington, D.C., 1967; Myra Breckinridge, 1968; 1876, 1976; Lincoln, 1984), three crime novels as Edgar Box, a collection of short stories, many plays, television plays, and screenplays, and the memoir Palimpsest (1995).

Bibliography

Stanton, Robert J., Gore Vidal: A Primary and Secondary Bibliography, Boston: Hall, and London: Prior, 1978

Further Reading

Abbott, Sean, “Book Sales, Prizes, Tenure, and Riotous Times at Bread Loaf: An Interview with Gore Vidal,” At Random 12 (Fall 1995):43–45

Auchincloss, Louis, The Style’s the Man: Reflections on Proust, Fitzgerald, Wharton, Vidal and Others, New York: Scribner, 1994

Baker, Susan, Gore Vidal: A Critical Companion., Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1997

Brookhiser, Richard, "State of the Essay?," New Criterion 12, no. 1 (September 1993):80–83

Dick, Bernard F., The Apostate Angel: A Critical Study of Gore Vidal, New York: Random House, 1974

Kiernan, Robert F., Gore Vidal, New York: Ungar, 1982

Macaulay, Stephen, Gore Vidal, or, A Vision from a Particular Position, Rockford: Rockford Institute, 1982

White, Ray Lewis, Gore Vidal, New York: Twayne, 1968

Voltaire

French, 1694–1778 When it was suggested to President de Gaulle that Jean-Paul Sartre should be sent to prison, he answered, "One does not send Voltaire to the Bastille." Voltaire is now remembered as a national conscience for human rights. De Gaulle's gesture may have been generous, but it was also cautious: in 1726 Voltaire became a cumbersome prisoner visited by such a flow of admirers that the worried authorities found it preferable to free him promptly (Jean Orieux, 1978).

Voltaire enjoyed European fame early in life. His official reputation was built on poetry and tragedies (now forgotten); his influential essays were regularly condemned as seditious, and they caused him numerous imprisonments and exiles. Voltaire published them in Switzerland and in the Low Countries whenever he expected scandals. Anonymous authorship, denied authorship, and pretense of collective authorship were some of his protective strategies. Eventually Voltaire always returned to Paris, where he finally became a member of the French Academy (in 1746), while his tragedies gave him introductions at the French court. He could have become a minister, had he not been cultivating his humorous pamphlets and essays. He also visited Frederick II of Prussia, and his entire library was purchased by Catherine II of Russia.

At the time of his 1726 stay at the Bastille, Voltaire was deemed the successor of Racine and enjoyed a budding courtier career. This imprisonment was a humiliating experience caused by France's rigid stratification of society according to ranks of birth. When released, Voltaire was banished to England (1726–28), where he wrote his first essays in English: the Essay upon Epic Poetry and Essay upon the Civil Wars in France, published in 1727, when he began composing the Letters Concerning the English Nation (1733). In the latter, it is apparent that he perceived fewer barriers between occupations in England, where statesmen, religious leaders, writers, and scientists could be found in the same family and treated with equal respect. Indeed, one man could freely combine such functions, as William Penn and Francis Bacon had. Voltaire believed that individuals ought to cultivate all their talents, and reacted against divides of caste and specialization. For this reason, he later objected to d'Alembert's Encyclopédie in which many specialists (including himself) had juxtaposed ideas. He preferred Pierre Bayle's Dictionnaire historique et critique (1697; An Historical and Critical Dictionary), richer in its interdisciplinary insight because it issued from one mind. In his essays, Voltaire explored all branches of knowledge, and mobilized all his resources and erudition to the evaluation of human accomplishments, measured independently from national prejudice.

In addressing the English public, Voltaire adopted the stance of the ingenuous visitor judging the country according to the baffling standards of France, standards far more arbitrary, foolish, and immoral than what England had to offer. England was not free of foibles either, and English readers reflected on the historical foundations of their sociopolitical structure with Voltaire. The English Letters became a British bestseller. The Lettres philosophiques (1734) was not merely their translation. Voltaire abandoned his playful tone but retained his humor, refusing to adopt Pascalian pessimism. French readers were meant to discover a society far more advanced than theirs in the domain of personal liberties. In France, the book was considered to be “a bomb against the Ancien Regime” (Gustave Lanson, 1966).

In the Lettres, Voltaire used both countries to give a sense of relativity to the living conditions in each regime, suggesting that ideas molded lifestyles. English political stewardship favored commerce, which benefited each citizen as well as the country’s economic health. England’s humanitarian mission was apparent in its free circulation of merchandise, and of medical and scientific knowledge. Bacon, Newton (whom Voltaire translated), and Locke, who sometimes “dares affirm, but also to doubt,” are the founders of experimental science which deduces from the objective world instead of fitting it into a conceptual mold. Voltaire’s enthusiasm for English literature (Shakespeare, Swift, Pope) echoed the admiration he felt for Milton in his Essay upon Epic Poetry, and it paralleled the relationship of experimental science to nature: the poetical genius of England resembles a strong, uneven tree which would perish under strict geometrical pruning, just as a French geometrical hierarchy would kill the prosperity and strength produced by England’s free societal system. From then on, the Voltairean essay may be understood as an attack against erroneous or limiting thoughts.

In the 12th letter, Voltaire introduced a concept of history which he developed in his most important essay, the Essai sur l’histoire générale et sur les mœurs et l’esprit des nations (1756, 1761–63; Essay on the Manner and Spirit of Nations, and on the Principal Occurrences in History), begun in June 1741 as history lessons for Madame du Châtelet. Early versions were shared among Voltaire’s friends, and one was published in 1753 without Voltaire’s approval. The Essay constitutes the first modern comparative history of civilizations, including Asia, and a history of the human mind. Instead of repeating the succession of kings and battles tied to legendary incidents, Voltaire means to discover a given society through its ideas, domestic life, arts, and monetary systems. In the events he presents, he seeks the contrast between causes and effects, rather than their relationships. He does not write to defend a thesis: the part on America contains opposing information; Chapter 39 includes a paragraph of questions to which Voltaire finds no satisfying answer; Chapter 51 concludes that “A reasonable mind, while reading history, is almost strictly busy refuting it.” Louis Trénard (1979) estimates that after the Essay, history was no longer a compilation, a hagiography, or a moralizing enterprise—doubt and inconclusiveness became permissible. As the king’s historiographer, Voltaire came to realize that documents are evaluated according to our best judgment, which remains relative, being reduced to our analysis of probabilities and bound by the literary category of verisimilitude. This is also the truth which the Voltairean essay seeks to explore. Like the essayist, the historian sorts through information without necessarily finding definite answers. Another innovative aspect of Voltairean history is that the chivalric hero is rejected for the “good administrator” who protects liberties in order for society to prosper. This is also his self-appointed role as essayist and his ideal for the “philosopher-king.”

One of these important liberties is religious tolerance. Voltaire expressed great sympathy for tolerant England in the first eight Lettres philosophiques, reiterated in the Essay on the Manner and Spirit of Nations. The Dictionnaire philosophique (The Philosophical Dictionary), published in Paris in 1764, was immediately condemned there, in Geneva, and in Amsterdam, and was burned in the bonfire that consumed the young Chevalier de la Barre, tortured and condemned to death because he had neglected to take off his hat while passing a bridge where a sacred statue was exposed. Voltaire denied authorship of the Dictionary while secretly augmenting the volume until 1769. His suspicion of systematic (potentially dogmatic) thinking led him to give in to the new fashion of alphabetized works: the Dictionary (called La Raison par alphabet [Reason by the alphabet] in the 1769 edition) does not display dissertations, explanations, or argumentations. His pieces are short, incisive, polemical; they are parodies, tales, meditations. In a letter of 1760, Voltaire defined it as a “dictionary of ideas,” as an intimate piece where he would consign his thoughts about this world and the next one. Yet (even in his memoirs) Voltaire never fell into the “ridicule of talking to oneself about oneself.” He wrote to promote tolerance, to dispel mistakes, “to act.” To that end, he limits the pages of his “portable” Dictionary. He compares the Dictionary to the Bible, which would have produced fewer converts, Voltaire argues, had it been multivolumed. Made to instruct and distract, the Dictionary may be opened anywhere and read out of sequence. Voltaire eventually introduced it as a dialogical book: it is “more useful” when “the readers produce the other half.” The allusive and brief nature of his articles encouraged readers to participate in their message. The mood of the articles (mostly anti-clerical) alternates between false compliance with established norms, indignation, laughter, and ridicule, all aimed at provoking a contagious or opposing reaction.

The nine volumes of the Questions sur l'Encyclopédie (1770–72; Questions about the Encyclopedia) are the longest piece of writing by Voltaire, written and dictated when he was old and sick. The articles vary in length from a hundred words to over 50 pages. The Questions is a summation of Voltairean thought, including an important section on religion and religious history from the Dictionary and formerly in the Lettres. Voltaire adds more literary appreciations, and gathers many fragments and hitherto independent pieces on natural and political sciences, legal systems, and commerce. According to Ulla Kölving, editor of the most recent collected works edition begun in 1983, Voltaire is more of a relativist than ever and finds no certainty but in the existence of God, “master of the Universe.”

When compared to Montaigne and Pascal, Voltaire appears more optimistic about humanity and the progress of knowledge. His essays are never composed in a frame of solitude and isolation. Montaigne writes as a recluse in his square tower, and Pascal rejects society in his longing expectation for God’s kingdom, while the suggestive Voltairean essay addresses the reason and emotions of his readers, who are called upon to shape humanity’s happier destiny. Voltaire never becomes moralizing or misanthropic:

his arguments and indignation always express a faith in humanity and in the possibility of earthly contentment. In the article "Genesis" of his Dictionary, Voltaire rejects the notion of a lost golden age or Paradise: he claims that if Adam was cultivating the "garden of delights" before he was condemned to cultivate his "fields," gardener simply became farmer and his new task does not seem that much worse, nor that bad. Adam dutifully tends his piece of land, as did Voltaire, the happy Candide and Zadig.

SERVANNE WOODWARD

Biography

Born François Marie Arouet, either 21 February (as Voltaire contended) or 21 November (according to baptismal record of 22 November) 1694 in Paris. Studied at the Collège Louis-le-Grand, Paris, 1704–11; studied law, 1711–13. Secretary to the French ambassador in Holland, 1713; articulated to a lawyer, 1714. Arrested and exiled from Paris for five months, 1716, and imprisoned in the Bastille, 1717–18 (after which he used the name Voltaire), for satiric writings, and 1726, for quarrel with the Chevalier de Rohan-Chabot; lived in England, 1726–29; lived at the Chateau de Cirey with Madame du Châtelet, 1734–36 and 1737–40 (took refuge in Holland, 1736–37). Ambassador-spy in Prussia, 1740, Brussels, 1742–43, and at the court of King Stanislas, Lunéville, 1748; historiographer to Louis XV, 1745–50; elected to the French Academy, 1746; courtier with Frederick II of Prussia, Berlin, 1750–53; lived in Colmar, 1753–54, Geneva, 1754–55, Les Délices, near Geneva, 1755–59, and at Ferney, 1759–78; visited Paris and received a triumphant welcome, 1778. Member, Royal Society (London), Royal Society of Edinburgh, 1745, and Academy of St. Petersburg, 1746. Died in Paris, 30 May 1778.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Essay upon Epic Poetry, 1727; as L'Essai sur la poésie épique, 1765; as Essay on Epic Poetry: A Study and an Edition, edited by Florence D.White, 1915, reprinted 1970; part as Essay on Milton, edited by Desmond Flower, 1954

Essay upon the Civil Wars in France, translated anonymously, 1727; as Essai sur les guerres civiles de France, 1729

Letters Concerning the English Nation, translated by John Lockman, 1733; as Lettres écrites de Londres sur les Anglais, and as Lettres philosophiques, 1734; edited by Gustave Lanson and A.-M.Rousseau, 2 vols., 1964, and Frédéric Deloffre, 1986; as Letters on England, translated by Leonard Tancock, 1980; edited (in English) by Nicholas Cronk, 1994

Essai sur la nature du feu, 1739

Essai sur l'histoire générale et sur les mœurs et l'esprit des nations, 7 vols., 1756, revised edition, 8 vols., 1761–63; as Essai sur les mœurs et l'esprit des nations et sur les principaux faits de l'histoire depuis Charlemagne jusqu'à Louis XIII, edited by René Pomeau, 2 vols., 1963; as The General History and State of Europe, translated by Sir Timothy Waldo, 1754; as An Essay on Universal History, translated by Mr. Nugent, 1759, revised 1782; as Essay on the Manner and Spirit of Nations, and on the

- Principal Occurrences in History*, translated anonymously, 1780
- Traité sur la tolérance*, 1763; edited by René Pomeau, 1989; as A Treatise on Toleration, translated by David William, 1779; in A Treatise on Toleration and Other Essays, translated by Joseph McCabe, 1994
- Dictionnaire philosophique portatif*, 1764; revised edition, 1765 (and later editions): revisions include La Raison par alphabet, 2 vols., 1769, and Questions sur l'Encyclopédie, 9 vols., 1770–72; edited by Julien Benda and Raymond Naves, 1961, and Béatrice Didier, 1994; as The Philosophical Dictionary for the Pocket, translated anonymously, 1765; as Philosophical Dictionary, translated by H.I. Woolf, 1945, Peter Gay, 2 vols., 1962, and Theodore Besterman, 1971
- Essai historique et critique sur les dissensions des Églises de Pologne*, 1767
- Voltaire and the Enlightenment* (selection), translated by Norman L. Torrey, 1931
- Selections*, edited by George R. Havens, revised edition, 1969
- Voltaire on Religion* (selection), edited and translated by Kenneth W. Applegate, 1974
- Selections* (various translators), edited by Paul Edwards, 1989
- A Treatise on Toleration and Other Essays*, translated by Joseph McCabe, 1994
- Political Writings* (various translators), edited by David Williams, 1994
- Dictionnaire de la pensée de Voltaire par lui-même*, edited by André Versaille, 1994
- Other writings: several works of fiction (including the novellas Zadig, 1748, and Candide, 1759), plays, poetry, and philosophical works.
- Collected works editions: Œuvres complètes (Kehl Edition), 70 vols., 1784–89, and on CD-ROM (Chadwyck-Healey); Œuvres complètes, edited by L. Moland, 52 vols., 1877–85; Complete Works (in French), edited by Theodore Besterman and others, 135 vols., 1968–1977; Complete Works/Œuvres complètes, edited by Ulla Kölving, 35 vols., 1983–94 (in progress; 84 vols. projected).

Bibliographies

- Barr, Mary Margaret H., A Century of Voltaire Study: A Bibliography of Writings on Voltaire, 1825–1925, New York: Institute of French Studies, 1929; supplements in Modern Language Notes (1933, 1941)
- Barr, Mary Margaret H., and Frederick A. Spear, Quarante Années d'études voltairiennes: Bibliographie analytique des livres et articles sur Voltaire, 1926–1965, Paris: Colin, 1968
- Bengesco, Georges, Voltaire: Bibliographie de ses œuvres, Paris: Rouveyre & Blond, vol. 1, and Perrin, vols. 2–4, 1882–90; index by Jean Malcolm, Geneva: Institut et Musée Voltaire, 1953
- Candaux, Jean Daniel, “Voltaire: biographie, bibliographie et éditions critiques,” Revue d'Histoire Littéraire de la France 79 (1979): 296–319
- Vercruyssen, Jérôme, “Additions à la bibliographie de Voltaire, 1825–1965,” Revue d'Histoire Littéraire de la France 71 (1971): 676–83

Further Reading

- Aldridge, A. Owen, “Problems in Writing: The Life of Voltaire,” Biography: An Interdisciplinary Quarterly 1, no. 1 (1978): 5–22

- Besterman, Theodore, Voltaire, London: Longman, and New York: Harcourt Brace and World, 1969
- Brumfitt, John-Henry, "Voltaire Historian and the Royal Mistress," in Voltaire, the Enlightenment and the Comic Mode: Essays in Honor of Jean Sarrailh, edited by Maxine G. Cutler, New York: Lang, 1990:11–26
- Ferenczi, Laszlo, "Voltaire: Le Critique historiographe," Acta Literaria Academiae Scientiarum Hungaricae 16 (1974): 140–51
- Ferenczi, Laszlo, "Le Discours de Bossuet et l'Essai de Voltaire," in Les Lumières en Hongrie, en Europe centrale et en Europe orientale, edited by Béla Köpeczi, Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1984:187–91
- Lanson, Gustave, Voltaire, New York: Wiley, 1966
- Lavallée, Louis, "De Voltaire à Mandrou: Études et controverses autour du Siècle de Louis XIV," Canadian Journal of History/Annales Canadiennes d'Histoire 12 (1977):19–49
- Madeleine, L.-H., "L'Essai sur les mœurs et l'esprit des nations: Une histoire de la monnaie?," in Mélanges Pomeau, Oxford: Voltaire Foundation, vol. 2, 1987:577–92
- Monch, Walter, "Voltaire et sa conception de l'histoire: Grandeur et insuffisance," Travaux de Linguistique et de Littérature 17, no. 2 (1979):47–58
- O'Meara, Maureen F., "Towards a Typology of Historical Discourse: The Case of Voltaire," MLN 93 (1978):938–62
- Orieux, Jean, Voltaire ou la royauté de l'esprit, Paris: Flammarion, 1978
- Penke, Olga, "Reflexions sur l'histoire: Deux histoires universelles des Lumières françaises et leurs interprétations hongroises," Studies on Voltaire and the Eighteenth Century 264 (1989): 993–96
- Pomeau, René, editor, Voltaire en son temps, Oxford: Voltaire Foundation, 5 vols., 1985–94
- Renwick, John, Voltaire et Morangés 1772–1773, ou Les Lumières l'ont échappé belle, Oxford: Voltaire Foundation, 1982
- Richter, Peyton, Voltaire, Boston: Twayne, 1980
- Riviere, M.-S., "Voltaire's Use of Larrey and Limiers in Le Siècle de Louis XIV: History as a Science, an Art, and a Philosophy," Forum for Modern Languages Studies 25, no. 1 (1989):34–53
- Roger, Jacques, Les Sciences de la vie dans la pensée française du XVIIIe siècle, Paris: Colin, 1963
- Trénard, Louis, "La Place de Voltaire dans l'historiographie française," Kwartalnik Historii Nauki i Techniki 24 (1979): 509–22
- Vignery, Robert J., "Voltaire as Economic Historian," Arizona Quarterly 31 (1975):165–78
- Wade, Ira O., The Intellectual Development of Voltaire, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1969
- Walters, Robert L., "Chemistry at Cirey," Studies on Voltaire and the Eighteenth Century 58 (1967):1807–27
- Williams, David, "Voltaire's 'true essay' on Epic Poetry," Modern Language Review 88, no. 1 (January 1993):46–57

W

Walker, Alice

American, 1944–

Alice Walker has published two collections of her prose, In Search of Our Mothers' Gardens (1983) and Living by the Word (1988). Together they form a rich compendium of speeches, book and movie reviews, travelogues, memoirs and journal entries, letters, historical reflections, and essays proper. Many pieces are reprinted from the feminist monthly magazine Ms., where Walker was a contributing editor beginning in 1974. Others originally appeared in publications ranging from Black Scholar to the Socialist Review.

Walker is best known for her work as a novelist. Her 1982 novel The Color Purple won the Pulitzer Prize and an American Book Award, and was made into a movie by Steven Spielberg. It also sparked a series of public controversies, some of which she recounts in her essays. Though her nonfiction prose collections have been less well known in the mass market, a few individual essays are commonly anthologized, notably "Beauty: When the Other Dancer Is the Self" (1983), "In Search of Our Mothers' Gardens" (1974), and "Am I Blue?" (1986). These selections epitomize themes that pervade her essays: identity, self-esteem, connection to one's ethnic and artistic roots, the health of the soul in all living beings, and the interconnection of oppressions.

Walker investigates these themes while writing about a variety of social concerns, and the anthologies reveal her political development. Starting with her first published essay ("The Civil Rights Movement: What Good Was It?," 1967), she takes up her pen in support of civil rights and black pride, using personal memories to support her philosophies. One lecture, "Oppressed Hair Puts a Ceiling on the Brain" (1987), discusses Walker's realization that letting her hair grow out naturally would be a crucial step in her political and spiritual development. Her narratives are not exclusively self-referential; she uses other writers' ideas to augment her rhetoric. For example, "In Search of Our Mothers' Gardens" argues that if black women want to be writers, they need rooms of their own as Virginia Woolf prescribed.

In her early essays, Walker often uncritically invokes white writers while calling for a black feminist politics based in essentialism—the idea that blacks can relate to oppression because they are black. In later writings, her perspective becomes more courageous, complicated, and internally consistent: Walker explores her own mixed ethnicity and encourages all people to explore their own complex genealogies. Many essays reflect on the position of blacks in the historically charged American South, where she herself grew up. Walker has continued to write about race in essays published after these anthologies; in 1994 the Monthly Review printed a 1992. speech called “The Story of Why I Am Here: or, A Woman Connects Oppressions.”

The strategy of connecting oppressions gains weight as Walker’s philosophy develops. She ties race to gender by coining the now famous term “womanist,” its primary definition being “A black feminist or feminist of color” (and its most pithy summation being “Womanist is to feminist as purple is to lavender”). From her concerns with racism and feminism in her early work, she works toward an understanding of Native Americans, homosexual freedom, respect for the poor and for the oppressed citizens of other nations. An all-encompassing spirituality motivates her related efforts to save the trees, animals, and the earth. Oppression in any form, she implies, is of importance to anyone who is capable of concern.

Walker experiments with different rhetorical techniques to make social issues into compelling reading. She often juxtaposes quotations from many writers in quick succession, which allows her to give voice to many perspectives. Quotations from her own journals appear alongside excerpts from newspapers, student essays, or poetry, with selected words italicized for editorial emphasis.

Walker also makes political points in the process of telling a story. For instance, her essay about journeying with her mother to look at Flannery O’Connor’s childhood home, only a few miles from her own childhood home in Eatonton, Georgia, is a wry, wise reflection on how race and class can influence a writer’s financial and critical success (“Beyond the Peacock: The Reconstruction of Flannery O’Connor,” 1972). The chronicle of a trip to China examines social dynamics in mental “snaps” that form a verbal photo album (“A Thousand Words: A Writer’s Pictures of China,” 1985).

The conversational, loosely connected tone of these essays is that of a storyteller recounting favorite tales. Walker sometimes even recycles the same event in more than one essay, shaping the details to fit the occasion. The storytelling metaphor reflects Walker’s veneration for Zora Neale Hurston, an early 20th-century black novelist, folklorist, and anthropologist whose accounts of southern black storytelling gave Walker the confidence to write from her own experiences of growing up black in the South. In her loving essays about Hurston, Walker honors her ancestors through writing, also showing how artistic expression itself is part of her legacy from black southern women.

Perhaps because she is writing for social change, Walker’s essays are generally—and sometimes disingenuously—optimistic. Ending with an uplifting resolution is one way to register hope for the future, and to activate others to work toward a better world. Her optimism also reads as a pleasant ramble through the author’s mind, but her good-humored attitude about any experience can ring false, especially when it obscures political realities of the situation at hand.

Just as Walker’s individual essays generally end optimistically, her anthologies build toward a holistic sense of connection. At the end of In Search of Our Mothers’ Gardens, Walker focuses on a sense of wholeness that she finds in herself through her relationship with her daughter. With a child to tend and love, Walker feels connected to a lineage of women. At the end of Living by the Word, she communes with trees, whose fate she sees as being tied to the future of all living beings on the earth. It is fitting that her essay anthologies culminate in a garden, a search for which has inspired her to write, and the love of which now motivates her to continue fighting for justice.

KAREN SCHIFF

Biography

Alice Malsenior Walker. Born 9 February 1944 in Eatonton, Georgia. Studied at Spelman College, Atlanta, 1961–63; Sarah Lawrence College, Bronxville, New York, 1963–65, B.A., 1965. Voter registration and Head Start program worker, Mississippi, and with the New York City Department of Welfare, mid–1960s. Married Melvyn R. Leventhal, 1967 (divorced, 1976): one daughter. Taught at Jackson State College, Mississippi, 1968–69, Tougaloo College, Mississippi, 1970–71, Wellesley College, Massachusetts, 1972–73, University of Massachusetts, Boston, 1972–73, and Yale University, New Haven, Connecticut, after 1977; Distinguished Writer, University of California, Berkeley, Spring 1982; Fannie Hurst Professor, Brandeis University, Waltham, Massachusetts, Fall 1982. Contributing editor, Ms. magazine, from 1974. Cofounder and publisher, Wild Trees Press, Navarro, California, 1984–88. Awards: several grants and fellowships; American Scholar Prize, for essay, 1967; Lillian Smith Award, for poetry, 1973; American Academy Rosenthal Award, 1974; American Book Award, 1983; Pulitzer Prize, 1983; O. Henry Award, 1986; Langston Hughes Award, 1989; California Governor’s Arts Award, 1994; honorary degrees from two universities.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

In Search of Our Mothers’ Gardens: Womanist Prose, 1983

Living by the Word: Selected Writings 1973–1987, 1988

The Same River Twice: Honoring the Difficult: A Meditation on Life, Spirit, Art, and the Making of the Film, “The Color Purple,” Ten Years Later, 1996

Anything We Love Can Be Saved, 1997

Other writings: five novels (The Third Life of Grange Copeland, 1970; Meridian, 1976; The Color Purple, 1982; The Temple of My Familiar, 1989; Possessing the Secret of Joy, 1992), two collections of short stories (In Love and Trouble, 1973; You Can’t Keep a Good Woman Down, 1981), poetry (including Once, 1968; Revolutionary Petunias and Other Poems, 1973; Horses Make a Landscape Look More Beautiful, 1984; Her Blue Body Everything We Know, 1991), and books for children.

Bibliographies

Banks, Erma Davis, and Keith Byerman, Alice Walker: An Annotated Bibliography, 1968–1986, New York: Garland, 1989

Kirschner, Susan, “Alice Walker’s Nonfictional Prose: A Checklist, 1966–1984,” Black American Literature Forum 18, no. 4 (Winter 1984):162–63

Pratt, Louis H., and Darnell D. Pratt, Alice Malsenior Walker: An Annotated Bibliography 1968–1986, Westport, Connecticut: Meckler, 1988

Further Reading

- Allan, Tuzyline Jita, "A Voice of One's Own: Implications of Impersonality in the Essays of Virginia Woolf and Alice Walker," in The Politics of the Essay: Feminist Perspectives, edited by Ruth-Ellen Joeres and Elizabeth Mittman, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1993:131–47
- Bloom, Harold, editor, Alice Walker, New York: Chelsea House, 1989
- Carter, Nancy Corson, "Claiming the Bittersweet Matrix: Alice Walker, Sandra Cisneros, and Adrienne Rich," Critique 35, no. 4 (1994):195–204
- Fernald, Anne, "A Room, a Child, a Mind of One's Own: Virginia Woolf, Alice Walker and Feminist Personal Criticism," in Virginia Woolf: Emerging Perspectives, edited by Mark Hussey and Vara Neverow, New York: Pace University Press, 1994:245–51
- Gates, Henry Louis, Jr., and K.A. Appiah, editors, Alice Walker: Critical Perspectives Past and Present, New York: Amistad, 1993
- Grimes, Dorothy, "Womanism," in Global Perspectives on Teaching Literature: Shared Visions and Distinctive Visions, edited by Sandra Ward Lott, Maureen S.G. Hawkins, and Norman McMillan, Urbana, Illinois: National Council of Teachers of English, 1993:65–75
- Wincell, Donna Hasty, Alice Walker, New York: Twayne, 1992

Weber, Max

German, 1864–1920

Max Weber is remembered as a founding father of sociology, as a major contributor to our sense of what distinguishes modern societies from earlier human cultures, and as a political theorist whose analysis of bureaucracies in particular remains fundamental to discussion of the functioning of modern states. But it is unlikely that he was thought of in his own lifetime as an exemplary stylist. What distinguished him from his contemporaries as a writer on human affairs was precisely his insistence that the rhetoric of persuasion should not be allowed to interfere with a clear sense of investigative method; for that reason he acquired a reputation for stylistic asceticism. His keen sense of methodology was related in turn to the interdisciplinary nature of sociological inquiry in his day, as well as to his awareness of the provisional nature of the assumptions on which the inquiries of the human sciences are inescapably based. It is this combination of features—the sense that Weber was working in the interstices between formal disciplines and his self-consciousness about proceeding on provisional terms—that makes it appropriate to regard him in retrospect as an important contributor to the genre of the essay. Indeed it was as "collected essays" on social and economic history, on the sociology of religion, and on the methodology of the humanities, that his best-known works have come down to us.

Weber studied law and economics, and did his early research on medieval business organizations and on the agrarian economy of ancient Rome. He was also active in liberal politics at various times of his life, and his mature writings present the reader with an oft-noted paradox: he was a man of action who nevertheless insisted that political value judgments should be excluded from academic writing, and he was an assiduous scholar who nevertheless expressed firmly-held convictions in his works. The origins of the paradox can again be found in the circumstances of his time. The methodological essays which Weber began to publish when he became one of the principal editors of the journal Archiv für Sozialwissenschaft und Sozialpolitik (Archive for social science and social policy) in 1903 show him to be fighting a battle on two fronts. On the one hand he was opposing those who believed it was possible for scholarship to be conducted from a position of “ethical neutrality” (which they tended to equate with their own world view); on the other hand he was opposing those who believed that it was possible for each academic subject to determine its own set of normative values from within its subject area. When he formulated his famous proposition that academic inquiry should be “value-free,” it was in order to draw a clear distinction between the specific tasks of investigation which an academic discipline can perform and the necessarily diverse perspectives which individual members of society, with their various cultural backgrounds and personal motives, bring to the evaluation of the results of empirical research.

For Weber it was axiomatic that there could be no absolute “objectivity” in the study of human societies because the nature of the analysis involved was dependent upon the material selected for investigation and on the perceptions of the investigator. The discipline of sociology, he argued, needed to proceed by a method of self-critique which moved from the initial construction of analytical concepts, through the expansion of horizons by empirical research, to the refinement and reformulation of theoretical premises. The form of explanation for human behavior that the sociologist was seeking to arrive at was concerned not only with a sense of the determining forces at work in the society in question, but much more with the effort to understand empathically the meaning that human beings attached to their actions in the historical circumstances of that society.

Weber’s most famous work, Die protestantische Ethik und der Geist des Kapitalismus (1904, revised 1920–21; The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism), has been subject to some misunderstanding in the Anglo-Saxon world, either because it is too readily assumed that Weber is working within a German idealist tradition and looking to explain material phenomena in terms of the agency of a spirit, or because he is interpreted (e.g. by translator Talcott Parsons) as conceiving of an attitude of Protestant asceticism as a necessary precondition for “modernization” processes in general. In reality Weber was seeking to describe the distinctive ethical principles by which leading capitalist figures of the post-Reformation period organized their lives and their trading opportunities, and the role these principles had played in shaping “the cosmos of the modern economic order” as it had established itself in Western Europe and North America. (In the original 1904 version of the text, incidentally, Weber’s scrupulousness on this point led him to put inverted commas around the word “spirit” in his title.) At the same time it is clear that what motivated his investigation of this theme was a strong personal sense that the moral demands of what a previous age had conceived as a “calling” had subsequently become manifest in the technical and economic conditions of an industrial age, and in doing so had imposed social constraints on the lives of those who came after.

By the standards of later scholarship, the range and scope of Weber’s projects no doubt appear exceedingly ambitious (the process of increasing specialization which he described as an irreversible feature of modern knowledge has continued relentlessly since his day). But his essays retain the vigor of a pioneering interdisciplinary inquiry conducted with a keen sense of methodological rigor. As he extended his inquiries into the social dimensions of the world’s major religions, he used his findings in one area to illuminate and qualify his view of another. Whether he was describing the emergence of the conditions of “modernity” for the European society of his own day, the economic organization of Mediterranean societies in antiquity, or the implications of oriental religions for social behavior and the economic role of individuals, Weber was using the flexibility of the essay form to express his differentiated sense of how the interaction between mentality and practice affected the specific circumstances of historical developments.

DAVID MIDGLEY

Biography

Born 21 April 1864 in Erfurt, Thuringia. Studied at the Universities of Heidelberg, 1882–83, Strasbourg, 1883–84, Berlin, 1884–85 and 1886–89, Ph.D., 1889, and Göttingen, 1885–86; called to the bar in Berlin. University lecturer in law, University of Berlin, 1892–94. Married Marianne Schnitger, 1893. Professor of economics, University of Freiburg, 1894–96, University of Heidelberg, 1896–1903, and University of Munich, 1919–20. Suffered a nervous breakdown, 1898, and unable to work until 1902. Coeditor, Archiv für Sozialwissenschaft und Sozialpolitik, from 1903; editor, Grundriss der Sozialökonomik (Outline of social economics), from 1907; cofounder, German Society for Sociology, 1910. Died (of pneumonia) in Munich, 14 June 1920.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Gesammelte Aufsätze zur Religionssoziologie, 3 vols., 1920–21; parts as: The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism, translated by Talcott Parsons, 1930; The Religion of China: Confucianism and Taoism, edited and translated by Hans H. Gerth, 1951, abridged version, as Confucianism and Taoism, translated by M. Alter and J. Hunter, 1984; The Religion of India: The Sociology of Hinduism and Buddhism, edited and translated by Gerth and Don Martindale, 1958; On Ancient Judaism, edited and translated by Gerth and Ned Polsky, 1949, and as Ancient Judaism, translated by Gerth and Martindale, 1952

Gesammelte politische Schriften, 1921; enlarged edition, edited by Johannes Winckelmann, 1958

- Gesammelte Aufsätze zur Wissenschaftslehre*, 1922; enlarged edition, edited by Johannes Winckelmann, 1951
- Gesammelte Aufsätze zur Sozial- und Wirtschaftsgeschichte*, 1924; as The Agrarian Sociology of Ancient Civilizations, translated by R.I.Frank, 1976
- Gesammelte Aufsätze zur Soziologie und Sozialpolitik*, 1924
- Essays in Sociology*, edited and translated by Hans H.Gerth and C. Wright Mills, 1946
- Schriften zur theoretischen Soziologie, zur Soziologie der Politik und Verfassung*, edited by Max Graf zu Solms, 1947
- Aus den Schriften zur Religionssoziologie*, edited by Max Graf zu Solms, 1948
- The Methodology of the Social Sciences*, edited and translated by Edward A.Shils and Henry A.Finch, 1949
- Soziologie, weltgeschichtliche Analysen, Politik*, edited by Johannes Winckelmann, 1955; revised, enlarged edition, 1960
- Selections*, edited by S.M.Miller, 1963
- Staat; Gesellschaft; Wirtschaft*, edited by Ludwig Heieck, 1966
- Selections in Translation*, edited by W.G.Runciman, translated by E.Matthews, 1978
- Political Writings*, edited by Peter Lassman and Ronald Speirs, 1994
- Other writings: works on sociology and economics (including Wirtschaft und Gesellschaft [Economy and Society], 1922), and correspondence.
- Collected works edition: Gesamtausgabe, edited by Horst Baier and others, 1984—(in progress; 33 vols. projected).

Bibliographies

- Murvar, Vatro, Max Weber Today—An Introduction to a Living Legacy: Selected Bibliography, Brookfield: University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee Max Weber Colloquia and Symposia, 1983
- Riesebrodt, Martin, in Prospekt der Max Weber-Gesamtausgabe, Tübingen: Mohr, 1981
- Seyfarth, Constans, and Gert Schmidt, Max Weber Bibliographie: Eine Dokumentation der Sekundärliteratur, Stuttgart: Enke, 1977

Further Reading

- Beetham, David, Max Weber and the Theory of Modern Politics, Cambridge: Polity Press, 1985 (original edition, 1974)
- Butts, S., "Parsons' Interpretation of Weber: A Methodological Analysis," Sociological Analysis and Theory 7 (1977):227–41
- Cohen, J., L.E.Hazelrigg, and W.Pope, "De-Parsonizing Weber: A Critique of Parsons' Interpretation of Weber's Sociology," American Sociological Review 40 (1975):229–40
- Eldridge, J.E.T., "Introductory Essay: Max Weber—Some Comments, Problems and Continuities," in The Interpretation of Social Reality by Weber, London: Michael Joseph, 1970; New York: Scribner, 1971
- Green, Bryan S., Literary Methods and Sociological Theory: Case Studies of Simmel and Weber, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1988
- Hennis, Wolfgang, Max Weber: Essays in Reconstruction, London: Allen and Unwin, 1988

Kasler, Dirk, Max Weber: An Introduction to His Life and Work, Cambridge: Polity Press, 1988 (original German edition, 1979)

Kaye, H.L., "Rationalisation as Sublimation: On the Cultural Analyses of Weber and Freud," Theory, Culture and Society 9, no. 4 (1992):45–74

Lepenies, Wolf, Between Literature and Science: The Rise of Sociology, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988 (original German edition, 1985)

Lichtblau, Klaus, and Johannes Weiss, Introduction to Die Protestantische Ethik und der "Geist" des Kapitalismus by Weber, Bodenheim: Athenäum/Hain/Hanstein, 1993

Mitzman, Arthur, The Iron Cage: A Historical Interpretation of Max Weber, New York: Knopf, 1970

Mommsen, Wolfgang J., Max Weber and German Politics, 1890–1920, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1984; Cambridge: Polity Press, 1992 (original German edition, 1956)

Mommsen, Wolfgang J., The Political and Social Theory of Max Weber, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, and Cambridge: Polity Press, 1989

Tribe, Keith, editor, Reading Weber, London and New York: Routledge, 1989

Turner, Bryan S., Max Weber: From History to Modernity, London and New York: Routledge, 1992

Wagner, Gerhard, and Heinz Zipprian, editors, Max Webers Wissenschaftslehre: Interpretation und Kritik, Frankfurt: Suhrkamp, 1994

The Week

Canadian periodical, 1883–1896

Issued from the Toronto offices of C.Blackett Robinson on 6 December 1883, the first weekly number of the Week included a masthead announcing it as an independent "Canadian Journal of Politics, Society, and Literature" and a prospectus promising to "endeavor faithfully to summarize the intellectual, social and political movements of the day." Edited in its inaugural year by Canadian writer and critic Charles G.D. Roberts, The Week established itself as one of the most successful and influential periodicals published in Victorian Canada. Taking seriously the terms of its mission statement, it accepted contributions of varying intellectual rigor and quality from writers representing a broad spectrum of taste and political opinion. Although many contributions may be considered essays in only the most general sense, they marked the first appearance of many feature and shorter articles which were later collected as "essays" and which continue to be cited as important early examples of Canadian essay writing.

The Week gained much of its formative energy from the presence and pen of Goldwin Smith, a one-time Regius Professor of History at Oxford who emigrated in 1871. Already well known as a political commentator to audiences on both sides of the Atlantic, he was also known to Canadian readers through his involvement in establishing two other popular journals: the Canadian Monthly and National Review (1872–78) and the Bystander (1880–83, 1889–90). A prolific and sharp-tongued writer whose contributions often appeared under the familiar and somewhat ironic journalistic pseudonym “A Bystander,” Smith was anything but a chance spectator of world affairs. In terms of international affairs, he used his regular “Current Events and Opinions” columns to comment on such controversial issues as Irish Home Rule (he was against it), the prohibitionist movement (which he equated with “compulsory teetotalism”), and the emancipation of women (of which he was intolerant). Closer to home, Smith wrote passionately on many of the early questions of nationhood, including immigration policies, coeducation at Canadian universities, government grants for railway construction, and the proposed changes to the international copyright laws.

Two other essayists who figured prominently in the pages of the Week had close personal, political, and professional ties with Smith: Graeme Mercer Adam and Theodore Arnold Haultain had been involved in Smith’s other publishing ventures and shared many of his ideas; Haultain, in fact, went on to become Smith’s private secretary and literary executor. Whereas Smith wrote primarily about political and social issues, Adam and Haultain turned their pens to topics of a cultural and literary nature. If diversity and the ideal of nonpartisanship were founding principles of the Week, cosmopolitanism was the order of the day in cultural commentaries. Dedicated to the wholesome edification of their literate, largely middle-class readership and to “stimulating our national sentiment, guarding our national morality, and strengthening our national growth,” writers in the Week set out to cultivate a distinctly Old World standard of literary and cultural criticism. Accordingly, laudatory essays on such “model” writers and thinkers as Matthew Arnold, George Eliot, and Sir Walter Scott become commonplace, providing readers with a guide to the best that was being thought and said in the world as well as a kind of Old World datum against which to judge their burgeoning national literature. Indeed, this sense of broad moral purpose underpinned the contents and the tone of The Week. As Brandon Conron (1965) suggests: “Though differing widely in interests and style, the writers of these pieces had one quality in common; the assumption, whether tacit or expressed, that their work had literary value, even when their purposes were dictated by politics or religion, and their methods by the editorial, the feature article, or the regular column.”

Although Smith’s input and critical standards had a lasting influence on the periodical’s own standards, his contributions decreased in number and regularity after its first few years. The Week continued to flourish, attracting a coterie of important writers from throughout central Canada, including William Dawson LeSueur, who wrote on a variety of cultural and scientific topics; William Douw Lighthall, who contributed to a series of “Views of Canadian Literature” (1894); Archibald MacMechan, whose contributions are perhaps closest to the formal essay; and Roberts, who continued to contribute following his tenure as editor. The latter’s “Notes on Some of the Younger American Poets” (1884), a harsh denunciation of experimentalist poetry in general and Walt Whitman in particular, set the tone for subsequent discussions of contemporary poetry.

Another important contribution of the Week to the development of the essay in Canada was its role as a forum for a number of important Canadian women writers. Among these were Agnes Maule Machar, a moderate social reformer who wrote under the pseudonym “Fidelis,” who contributed literary review essays as well as nature sketches (“Our Woods in Spring,” 1886) and essays on issues of particular import to women, including education (“The Higher Education of Women,” 1889) and the National Council of Women of Canada; Susie Frances Harrison (“Seranus”), who sought to promote Canada and Canadian culture in her essays and regular music column in the 1880s; and Agnes Ethelwyn Wetherald, whose four-part series on “Some Canadian Literary Women” (1888) is of particular interest to modern scholars.

Of the women who found an outlet for their writing in the Week, it is Sara Jeannette Duncan who has been called the periodical’s “liveliest and most urbane writer” (Claude Bissell, 1950). Besides offering her opinions on such diverse subjects as the ubiquitous issue of “International Copyright” (1886) and contemporary tastes in fiction (“Literary Pabulum,” 1887), Duncan wrote regular reviews and commentaries on all aspects of culture and society, including art and Canadian literature. Structured most commonly as causeries and gathered under such varied titles as “Saunterings,” “Afternoon Tea,” and “Ottawa Letter,” her contributions are impressive for their breadth and variety. An articulate crusader against what she saw as the potentially stultifying conservatism and provincialism of her readers, Duncan was, in retrospect, an especially important bellwether of the future of literary and cultural criticism in Canada.

When the Week ceased publication in November 1896, Canada lost a publication that had played a seminal role in shaping the country’s intellectual and literary environment.

KLAY DYER

Further Reading

Bentley, D.M.R., A Checklist of Literary Materials in “The Week” (Toronto, 1883–1896), Ottawa: Golden Dog Press, 1978

Bissell, Claude T., “Literary Taste in Central Canada During the Late Nineteenth Century,” in Twentieth Century Essays on Confederation Literature, edited by Lorraine McMullen, Ottawa: Tecumseh Press, 1976 (article originally published, 1950)

Conron, Brandon, “Essays 1880–1920,” in Literary History of Canada: Canadian Literature in English, 2nd edition, edited by Carl F. Klinck and others, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1976:354–60 (original edition, 1965)

Weil, Simone

French, 1909–1943

As she lay dying from tuberculosis and self-imposed starvation, Simone Weil continued to write. During those last months, she pointed to Shakespeare’s fools as models for the writer, declaring that only the dispossessed are truly free to speak the truth. Her writing is grounded in her own pursuit of a voluntary poverty, isolation, and exile that would free her to speak this fool’s truth. Many readers have pondered whether these impassioned, lucid, and critical essays are the work of a holy fool or just a plain fool. She has been seen as a saint, a madwoman, a failure, a genius. Yet even her detractors grant her a place as an important political and religious writer, although she published only a handful of essays during her lifetime.

For Weil, writing was resistance and the essay was a means of action. Her essays and journals read like a series of letters from the front, in which a creative, tough-minded, passionate, philosophically trained mind bears witness to the horrors of exploitation, unemployment, and war. Her productivity is astonishing—16 volumes in a posthumous collected edition edited by André A. Devaux and Florence de Lussy. For the most part this work is fragmentary, unfinished, unrevised—a series of sketches. Yet her style is often powerful when it reflects the sort of “nakedness” Weil admired—a resistance to ideology, ornament, and rationalizations.

Her work falls into two phases, separated by a period of transition in which disillusionment with human ability gives way to faith in a hidden God. Essays and journals of the first period, from 1931 to 1936, explore the problems of her era from a revolutionary-political vantage point, while the writings of 1938 to 1943 are permeated by the religious reflection engendered by her “waiting for God.” Both the political and religious writings are characterized by unconventional challenges to economic, social, and spiritual ideologies and institutions.

Believing that idolatry—a clinging to a particular dogma—is a chief danger of intellectual life, Weil adopts the stance of outsider, speaking with the voice of the loyal adversary and often employing paradox and dialectic. Her prose, particularly in the last decade, enacts her ideals of attention (attention) and waiting (attente) by remaining grounded in experience and resisting closure.

Weil’s plain and often aphoristic style reflects the influence of her teacher, the French philosopher Emile Auguste Chartier, better known by his pen name Alain. He trained his students to think critically by assigning them topoi, take-home essay examinations. These essays developed Weil’s preference for short, straightforward, precise prose forms and schooled her in an inductive method. For Weil, induction came to mean contact with real situations—visiting a mine before writing about miners, harvesting grapes before writing about agricultural workers. Weil’s early essays, published in Alain’s Libre Propos (Free propos [remarks]), clearly reflect his anarchistic and pacifistic influence. But Alain’s brilliant pupil soon began to demonstrate intellectual independence, embracing activism and criticizing democratic liberalism, Marxism, and totalitarianism with equal vigor.

As a teacher at a girls’ school, Weil practiced voluntary poverty and devoted her spare time to political activism, basing her work for the Tribune Républicaine on her experiences in the teacher’s union, among the unemployed, and with mine workers. This resulted in a growing critique of Marx’s lack of awareness of working conditions and of the impact of technology. In Simone Weil: An Introduction to Her Thought (1982), John Hellman suggests that after the apprenticeship writing of these years, Weil found the traditional political essay too narrow in scope.

Weil’s insistence on writing anchored in experience gave power to her political thought despite her failure—or deliberate refusal—to systematize. For the next two decades Weil’s writing forms a sort of ongoing journal of a mind evolving in response to historical reality—strikes, war, the resistance movement, the rise of Hitler. As events unfold, the essays and journal entries provide an impassioned eyewitness account.

Writing in L’Express (1951), Camus called her “the only great spirit of our time.” A philosopher by training and a political activist by choice, she also became a major spiritual writer. Essays growing out of a 1932 visit to Germany demonstrate Weil's willingness to report what she saw—even when it ran counter to leftist expectations. But Weil's 1934 Réflexions sur les causes de la liberté et de l'oppression sociale (pub. posthumously 1980; Reflections concerning the causes of liberty and social oppression) shows more clearly the strength of her moralist stance. Despite its oversimplifications, undeveloped sketches, and preaching tone, Camus praised this essay, comparing Weil to Marx.

The 1934–36 journals of Weil's experiences of factory work and of the Spanish Civil War form a turning point, as romanticized views of worker solidarity and heroism give way to disillusionment, particularly as she witnesses disorder, incompetence, and brutality in Spain. These journals confirm her declaration in the 1934 Réflexions: "From human beings, no help can be expected."

Yet the journals, letters, and essays of the late 1930s and early 1940s record an experience of help from another quarter. Simone Weil had not sought for God, but seeking truth, felt that God came to her. In Simone Weil: A Modern Pilgrimage (1987) Robert Coles suggests that Weil's 1942 "Spiritual Autobiography," is, like Augustine's Confessions, "a performance for God." While Weil shares Augustine's apologetic bent and sense of being God-directed, the differences between the two are instructive. While Augustine weaves a highly ornamented, architectural, epic narrative, Weil's spiritual autobiography is stripped down, focused, and couched in the form of a letter to a friend. While Augustine narrates a journey from opposition and exile to acceptance and homecoming, Weil's apologia is the story of one who loves God but remains in exile. Seeking to embody "a truly incarnated Christianity," she rejects membership in a Church whose anathema sit aligns it with totalitarian forces threatening to engulf her world. In Weil's narrative, a procession of fishermen's wives in Portugal shows the young woman who has "received forever the mark of the slave" as a factory worker the nature of Christianity as "preeminently the religion of slaves." Her later experiences at Assisi and Solesmes, along with George Herbert's "Love" and the patenoster, re-create a pattern common to mystic spiritual autobiography—a sense of an overpowering reality at once hidden, intimate, and beautiful, ordering the cosmos, and reordering the self. Like Augustine, Weil's pursuit of truth results in rejecting ideologies and embracing God. "Christ," she says in the "Autobiography," "likes us to prefer truth to him because, before being Christ, he is truth. If one turns aside from him to go toward the truth, one will not go far before falling into his arms."

As her faith dawned, Weil studied Greek poetry and Gregorian music, writing about Antigone for a plant newspaper and finding in The Iliad a metaphor for a world obsessed with power. With the collapse of France in 1940, she wrote for the Resistance, contributing to Les Cahiers du Sud (Notebooks from the south) and scribbling schemes for parachuting nurses to the front. The daughter of agnostic, assimilated Jews, Weil vehemently denied her Jewishness and refused to confront the plight of the Jews, focusing instead on workers and on colonial oppression. Yet in Simone Weil: An Introduction (1994) Heinz Abosch suggests that her mature writing reflects elements of her Jewish heritage in her insistence on connecting thought and action, her mysticism, her prophetic social stance, and her focus on God's unity and hiddenness.

L'Enracinement (1949; The Need for Roots), written as she was dying in England in 1943, embodies Weil's characteristic merging of political, moral, and theological reflections on the problems of her time. Drafted as a plan for France's future, it is a series of essays linked by the metaphor of rootedness as she examines the "needs of the soul" and calls for a social order grounded in a "spiritual core" of physical labor. In The Need for Roots the polarities of Weil's thought are evident as she veers between the moralist's authoritarian need for order and the individual's anarchistic thirst for freedom, wrestling to speak a Fool's holy and unvarnished truth.

LINDA MILLS WOOLSEY

See also Autobiographical Essay; Religious Essay

Biography

Born 3 February 1909 in Paris. Studied at the Lycée Fénelon, 1920–24, and Lycée Victor Duruy, Paris, 1924–25, baccalauréat, 1925; Lycée Henri IV (where she was taught by Alain), Paris, 1925–28; École Normale Supérieure, Paris, 1928–31, agrégation in philosophy, 1931. Suffered from violent headaches, from 1930. Taught philosophy in various schools in Le Puy, Auxerre, Roanne, Bourges, and Saint-Quentin, 1931–38; factory worker for Renault, Alsthom, and Carnaud, 1934–35. Volunteer with the Republicans in the Spanish Civil War, 1936. Converted from Judaism to Christianity, 1938. Lived with her parents in Paris, Vichy, and Marseilles, 1939–42. Contributor, Les Cahiers du Sud, 1940. Fled from Nazi occupation to the United States, then England, 1942; worked for the Ministry of the Interior in De Gaulle's Free French movement, 1943. Died (of tuberculosis and self-neglect) in Ashford, Kent, 24 August 1943.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

La Pesanteur et la grâce (Gustave Thibon's selection from the Marseilles Notebooks), 1947; as Gravity and Grace, translated by Arthur Wills, 1952, and Emma Craufurd, 1952

L'Enradnement: Prélude à une déclaration des devoirs envers l'être humain, 1949; as The Need for Roots, translated by Arthur Wills, 1952

Attente de Dieu (letters and articles), 1950; as Waiting for God, translated by Emma Craufurd, 1951

La Connaissance surnaturelle (notebooks), 1950; translated by Richard Rees in First and Last Notebooks, 1970

Cahiers, 3 vols., 1951–56; enlarged edition, 1970; as The Notebooks of Simone Weil, translated by Arthur Wills, 2 vols., 1956

Intuitions préchrétiennes (writings on Greek philosophy), 1951; as Intimations of Christianity Among the Ancient Greeks, translated by Elisabeth Chase Geissbuhler, 1957

La Condition ouvrière (factory journal and articles), 1951; part translated by Richard Rees, in Seventy Letters, 1965

Lettre à un religieux, 1951; as Letter to a Priest, translated by Arthur Wills, 1954

- La Source grecque*, 1953; part translated by Elisabeth Chase Geissbuhler, in Intimations of Christianity Among the Ancient Greeks, 1957, and by Richard Rees in On Science, Necessity and the Love of God, 1968
- Oppression et liberté*, edited by Albert Camus, 1955; as Oppression and Liberty, translated by Arthur Wills and John Petrie, 1958
- The Iliad; or, The Poem of Force* (pamphlet), translated by Mary McCarthy, 1956
- Écrits de Londres et dernières lettres*, 1957; part translated by Richard Rees, in Selected Essays, 1962
- Leçons de philosophie*, 1959; as Lectures on Philosophy, translated by Hugh Price, 1978
- Écrits historiques et politiques* (short articles), 1960
- Pensées sans ordre concernant l'amour de Dieu* (articles), 1962; part translated by Richard Rees, in Seventy Letters, 1965
- Selected Essays*, 1934–43, translated by Richard Rees, 1962
- Seventy Letters*, translated by Richard Rees, 1965
- Sur la science* (letters and articles), 1966; part translated by Richard Rees, in On Science, Necessity and the Love of God, 1968
- On Science, Necessity and the Love of God*, translated by Richard Rees, 1968
- First and Last Notebooks*, translated by Richard Rees, 1970
- The Simone Weil Reader*, edited by George A. Panichas, 1977
- Réflexions sur les causes de la liberté et de l'oppression sociale*, 1980
- An Anthology*, edited by Siân Miles, 1986
- Formative Writings*, 1929–41, edited and translated by Dorothy T. McFarland and Wilhemina van Ness, 1987
- Other writings: philosophical and mystical works.
- Collected works edition: Œuvres complètes (Pléiade Edition), general editors André A. Devaux and Florence de Lussy, 5 vols., 1988–94 (in progress; 16 vols. projected).

Bibliography

- Little, Janet Patricia, Simone Weil: A Bibliography, London: Grant and Cutler, 1973; supplement, 1979

Further Reading

- Abosch, Heinz, Simone Weil: An Introduction, New York: Pennbridge, 1994
- Allen, Diogenes, Three Outsiders: Pascal, Kierkegaard, and Simone Weil, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Cowley, 1983
- Cabaud, Jacques, Simone Weil: A Fellowship in Love, New York: Channel Press, 1964
- Coles, Robert, Simone Weil: A Modern Pilgrimage, Reading, Massachusetts: Addison Wesley, 1987
- Hardwick, Elizabeth, "Simone Weil," in Bartleby in Manhattan, and Other Essays, New York: Random House, 1983
- Hellman, John, Simone Weil: An Introduction to Her Thought, Waterloo, Ontario: Wilfrid Laurier University Press, 1982; Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1984
- Lichtheim, George, "Simone Weil," in his Collected Essays, New York: Viking, 1973
- McFarland, Dorothy T., Simone Weil, New York: Ungar, 1983

- Milosz Czesław "The Importance of Simone Weil," in his Emperor of the Earth: Modes of Eccentric Vision, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1977
- Murdoch, Iris, "On 'God' and 'Good'," in Revisions: Changing Perspectives in Moral Philosophy, edited by Stanley Hauerwas and Aiasdair MacIntyre, Notre Dame, Indiana: University of Notre Dame Press, 1983
- Petrement, Simone, Simone Weil: A Life, New York: Schocken, 1988 (original French edition, 1973)
- Rees, Richard, Simone Weil: A Sketch for a Portrait, Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, and London: Oxford University Press, 1966
- Sontag, Susan, "Simone Weil," in her Against Interpretation, and Other Essays, New York: Anchor, 1990 (original edition, 1966)
- Springstead, Eric, Affliction and the Love of God: The Spirituality of Simone Weil, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Cowley, 1986
- White, George Abbott, editor, Simone Weil: Interpretations of a Life, Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1981

Die weissen Blätter

German periodical, 1913–1920

The literary review Die weissen Blätter (The white pages) was one of the three prominent journals of the expressionist movement. This periodical introduced itself as the "voice of the younger generation," whose purpose was to be engaged with all areas of contemporary life. In its relatively short history it published many of the essential texts of German Modernism, including all genres of belles-lettres as well as general essays on political and cultural issues. The last pages of each number were interspersed with advertisements and contained a section of news items, topical notes, commentaries, and polemics. The visual arts played only a minor role (represented largely by Ludwig Meidner's portrait drawings) and disappeared altogether in 1917. The emphasis throughout was on literary quality rather than on experimental novelty. On principle, Die weissen Blätter encouraged the interplay of various progressive influences, and did not allow any one personality or avantgarde theory to dominate its program. Its editors were averse to any form of militancy. They also rejected the kind of idiosyncratic diversity that made their principal competitors, Franz Pfemfert's Die Aktion (The action) and Herwarth Walden's Der Sturm (The storm), more provocative and aggressive, but in the end also more doctrinaire.

The intellectual sponsors of Die weissen Blätter did have a specific agenda, however. They saw their new publication as a direct challenge to the well-established monthly forum of S. Fischer Verlag, Die neue Rundschau (The new review), which reflected the literary tastes and cultural preferences of the liberal and moderately conservative bourgeoisie. Their model was the Nouvelle Revue Française (New French review). Financial independence and solid honoraria were guaranteed by the generosity of Erik Ernst Schwabach, a wealthy student of German literature in Berlin, who is listed as the periodical's first official publisher. Otto Flake served as his literary adviser but was soon replaced by the more experienced Viennese littérateur Franz Blei. In January 1914 the publisher Kurt Wolff took charge as manager of both the journal and an affiliated book publishing venture, Verlag der Weissen Bücher, in Leipzig. After members of this staff were called up for military service in the war, their friend René Schickele, an accomplished man of letters from a small town in Alsace, became the new editor-in-chief.

In September 1915 patriotic groups in Berlin falsely accused Schickele of espionage for France and the Office of War Censorship in Munich tried to have the police investigate his activities. He emigrated to Switzerland, where he made preparations to move the journal to Zurich. For the time between April 1916 and July 1917, he found a new publisher in the firm of Rascher & Cie., who had offices in Zurich and Leipzig. This prevented direct interference by the German authorities and saved, for example, the important antiwar issue of May 1916 from confiscation. But the threat of expulsion from a neutral country made further precautions necessary: in July 1918 the editorial office was moved to Berne-Bümpliz and Schickele assumed sole personal responsibility for the next six issues of volume 5 (1918). He did have the support, however, of both the cultural attaché at the German Embassy, Harry Graf Kessler, and the wealthy art critic and dealer Paul Cassirer, who published the journal during its final two years in Berlin, after June 1920 also serving as its editorial director.

Die weissen Blätter was usually published on the 15th of every month. Sold at a reasonable price, the first issues, in octavo, had between 98 and 120 pages, plus 16 (and proportionately more) pages, numbered separately, of advertisements and commentary. This more-than-respectable size, and the initial circulation of some 3000 copies, were steadily reduced during the war years until, in 1918, they had shrunk to about one third of the original. Henceforth, the inclusion of longer works of literature was inadvisable, and political debates as well as cultural critiques had to be limited severely.

Though the very name of these “white pages” signaled an editorial policy of unbiased openness, even of a self-conscious innocence in politicis, this aversion to providing a platform for sectarian propaganda did not imply, even before the war, a complete withdrawal from agitation on behalf of specific programs. On the whole, however, the review remained remarkably consistent in its emphasis on literature. It espoused at first a vague and idealistic “socialism without functionaries” (in contributions by such diverse writers as Eduard Bernstein, Ernst Bloch, Martin Buber, Georges Duhamel, Rosa Luxemburg, Carlo Mierendorff, and Anna Siemsen), with Schickele editorially advocating “a government formed by the majority of comrades who have learned to live physically and mentally without using coercion, without applying force” (January 1919). Aside from a dutiful commitment to democracy (for example, “Die Pflicht zur Demokratie” [November 1916; The duty to support democracy]) and to a rejuvenated humanism (discussed in issues from April 1916 until July 1917), a Christian federalism appeared to promise the best hope for Europe’s future.

Lead articles as early as 1913 speak out in favor of pacifism, which more and more became Schickele’s credo. He also, and immediately, supported the aims of an organization of intellectuals, Clarté: Internationale de la Pensée (Clarity: international thought) which Henri Barbusse and his friends had founded in May 1919; he published their statutes (December 1919) and principles (“Leitsätze von Clarté”; Guiding principles of Clarté) in March 1920, but distanced himself from their communist sympathies.

Three essay highlights in the journal may be singled out: first, Heinrich Mann's reaction against his brother Thomas Mann's war euphoria in his treatise "Zola" (November 1915), a plea for the truth of the mind (Geist) as superior to the rights of the state and a celebration of the democratic artist as the true politician; second, Schickele's "Der Mensch im Kampf" (Man's struggle), his first editorial (April 1916), a condemnation of the intellectuals' betrayal of political morality and a call for European unity in the fight for new fatherlands; and finally, his "Revolution, Bolschewismus und das Ideal" (December 1918; Revolution, bolshevism, and the ideal), a defense of utopian idealism and an appeal for moral change ("Menschenverwandlung") in the face of revolutionary violence.

"Die Verwandlung" ("The Metamorphosis") is also the title of the most famous piece of fiction published in Die weissen Blätter (February 1915), i.e. Kafka's story. Other prominent contributions include Gottfried Benn's scene "Ithaka" (March 1914), Hasenclever's play Der Sohn (April–June 1914; The son), the dramatization of a father-son conflict, and Heinrich Mann's Madame Legros (March 1916). Novellas by Sternheim, Edschmid, and Leonhard Frank exemplify the best of prose fiction; Franz Werfel and J.R.Becher are the lyrical poets most frequently represented. Max Brod's Tycho Brahes Weg zu Gott (Tycho Brahe's Road to God), serialized between January and June 1915, tried to undo what damage the journal's reputation for literary integrity had suffered when it accepted Gustav Meyrink's tale of fantasy horror, Der Golem (December 1913–August 1914), which became an international bestseller.

Die weissen Blätter published with principled imagination and often under difficult conditions, but it did not survive the immediate postwar years. Its demise can be blamed on the political and social uncertainties of that time and on the need of expressionist writers to find new directions. But it was the impact of inflation, most of all, and the collapse of the literary market that made it impossible to sustain an independent literary journal of high quality.

MICHAEL WINKLER

Further Reading

- Göbel, Wolfram, "Der Kurt Wolff Verlag 1913–1930; mit einer Bibliographie des Kurt Wolff Verlages und der ihm angeschlossenen Unternehmen," Archiv für Geschichte des Buchwesens 15 (1976):521–962, and 16 (1977):1299–1456
- Haase, Horst, Die Antikriegsliteratur in der Zeitschrift "Die weissen Blätter" (dissertation), Berlin: Humboldt University, 1956
- Hellack, Georg, "René Schickele und die Weissen Blätter: Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte expressionistischer Zeitschriften," Publizistik 8 (1963):250–57
- Raabe, Paul, Die Zeitschriften und Sammlungen des literarischen Expressionismus, Stuttgart: Metzler, 1964
- Raabe, Paul, editor, Index Expressionismus: Bibliographie der Beiträge in den Zeitschriften und Jahrbüchern des literarischen Expressionismus, 1910–1925, vol. 13, Nendeln, Liechtenstein: Kraus-Thomson, 1972: cols. 1976–2058

West, Rebecca

British, 1892–1983

One of Rebecca West's first essays as a young columnist for the suffragist weekly the Freewoman was a spirited attack on Mrs. Humphry Ward, then a bulwark of the literary establishment. While Mary Ward might seem to modern readers an easy target, in 1912 such an attack required considerable daring. The essay was one of the first to be written under her pseudonym—an impulsive borrowing from Ibsen's Rosmersholm. In many respects both the irreverence toward an established icon and the nom de plume she selected typify the essay writing stance she adopted at the outset of her career. While West never lost what her last literary editor described as her "unmistakable pounce," the objects of her scorn shifted as she herself became transformed into an establishment figure who by the end of her career occupied a cultural position not unlike that enjoyed by Mrs. Humphry Ward before World War I.

In her early essays in the Freewoman, and later in the socialist newspaper the Clarion, she developed a style which was to be the hallmark of her essays throughout her career. She plainly took enormous pleasure in using her pithy and epigrammatic style to skewer her political opponents with devastating dismissals. Sir William Anson, for example, was, "an anti-feminist too uninteresting to be really dangerous," while Mrs. Humphry Ward's assertion that a laborer could easily feed a family of five on 18 shillings a week represented that novelist's "one real flash of imagination." Recognizing the demands of newspaper journalism, she made sure that an arresting opening sentence began each essay. She was somewhat frustrated by the narrow topicality required by partisan political journalism, but despite this, several essays from this period stand out as being of lasting significance and value. Her 1913 essay on the suffragist Emily Davidson, who had endured numerous imprisonments and forcible feeding and been killed when she threw herself in front of the king's horse at the Derby, remains one of the most eloquent essays of moral outrage produced in English. While the essays in the Freewoman and the Clarion provide an outstanding record of the struggle for women's suffrage, West's finest essay on the period is "A Reed of Steel," her 1933 essay on Emmeline Pankhurst.

During the 1920s, after publishing two novels and a critical study of Henry James, West turned her attention to literary criticism with a book of more ambitious literary essays, The Strange Necessity (1928). In her essay on Joyce's Ulysses, West clearly sees herself as an admirer and defender of Joyce, paying what is intended as a tribute to the structure of that novel by organizing her essay around a day spent in Paris, paralleling the single day in Dublin which bounds Joyce's novel. But West's reading of the novel seems superficial. The essay strives for profundity, but merely stumbles through mazes of inverted sentences and subordinate clauses. The essay on Lawrence is stronger because she returns to her strong suit of biographical rather than textual criticism.

West's awkwardness with Ulysses, despite her avowed admiration, marks an unease with the avant-garde which was increasingly to shape her aesthetic judgments. In "Kafka and the Mystery of Bureaucracy" (1957) she dismissed Metamorphosis as "another absurd avant-garde story," yet in the essay as a whole she develops a sophisticated and complex investigation of Kafka's relationship with bureaucracy. In a 1964 BBC interview West said, "What I chiefly want to do when I write is to contemplate character... This is an inborn tendency in me." While the comment might seem to bear more directly on her work as a novelist, it underlines her strength as an essayist. Whether in her literary or political essays she writes with a surer hand in delineating character than in dealing with abstractions.

West's skill as a novelist merges with her growing preoccupation with the nature of evil in her essays reporting on trials. Her essay, "Greenhouse with Cyclamens I" (1955), on the closing sessions of the Nuremberg trials, attempts not only to convey some impression of the Nazi leaders facing sentencing but also to make a broader statement about life in postwar Germany and even the German character. Despite its rhetorical flourishes, the essay falters in fulfilling its ambitious intent partly because of the inadequacy of the overarching "greenhouse" metaphor and partly because, in trying to convey the sense of evil exuded by the Nazis, West falls back on facile suggestions of sexual perversity, so that Goering is "like a madam in a brothel," Streicher, "a dirty old man of the sort that gives trouble in parks," and so on. During the postwar years West was intensely preoccupied with the theme of political betrayal and wrote about nearly every major trial concerning the Official Secrets Act. Her essays on the treason trial of William Joyce ("Lord Haw-Haw"), whose wartime broadcasts from Germany had been intended to undermine British morale, were first published in the New Yorker and later appeared in her best-known book The Meaning of Treason (1947).

West's writing had become widely known in the United States during World War II principally through her essays in Harper's on everyday life under wartime conditions. American journals such as the New Yorker gave her the opportunity to develop a subject without severe length restrictions. Her political views were also increasingly in step with the anticommunist fervor that gripped postwar America. In 1947 Time magazine put her on the cover and described her as "one of the greatest of living journalists." She even defended the McCarthy hearings in a series of four essays called "The Facts Behind the Witch Trials" for the Sunday Times in Spring 1954 in which she claimed, "It would be a strange Government indeed that felt no curiosity when faced with such intimations of disorder."

Although West was aptly described by Kenneth Tynan in 1954 as "the best journalist alive," and although she had a voracious appetite for documentary evidence, the hand that shapes West's reportage is always that of a novelist whose sense of character, of drama, of moral tensions takes precedence over mere fact.

GILLIAN THOMAS

Biography

Born Cicily Isabel Fairfield, 21 December 1892 in London. Grew up in London and Edinburgh. Studied at George Watson's Ladies' College, Edinburgh; Royal Academy of Dramatic Art, London, 1909–10. Briefly an actress, 1911, with a role in Ibsen's

Rosmersholm, from which she adopted the name Rebecca West. Liaison with the writer H.G.Wells, 1913–23: one son. Contributor to various journals and newspapers, from 1912, including the Freewoman, New Freewoman (later the Egoist), Clarion, New Statesman and Nation, New Republic, New York Herald-Tribune, Time and Tide, New Yorker, and Harper's. Married Henry Maxwell Andrews, 1930 (died, 1968). Lived in Buckinghamshire, 1930–68, and London, 1968–83. Talks supervisor, BBC, London, during World War II; Terry Foundation Lecturer, Yale University, New Haven, Connecticut, 1956. Awards: Royal Society of Literature Benson Medal, 1966; honorary degrees from two universities; Member, Order of St. Sava (Yugoslavia), 1937; Fellow, 1947, and Companion of Literature, 1968, Royal Society of Literature; Chevalier, Legion of Honor (France), 1957; Honorary Member, American Academy of Arts and Letters, 1972; Commander, Order of the British Empire (CBE), 1949; Dame Commander, Order of the British Empire (DBE), 1959. Died in London, 15 March 1983.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

The Strange Necessity: Essays and Reviews, 1928

Ending in Earnest: A Literary Log, 1931

The Meaning of Treason, 1947; revised edition, 1952; second revised edition, as The New Meaning of Treason, 1964

A Train of Powder, 1955

The Court and the Castle (Yale Terry lectures), 1957

The Young Rebecca: Writings of Rebecca West, 1911–1917, edited by Jane Marcus, 1982

Other writings: eight novels (The Return of the Soldier, 1918; The Judge, 1922; Harriet Hume, 1929; The Thinking Reed, 1936; The Fountain Overflows, 1956; The Birds Fall Down, 1966; This Real Night, 1984; Sunflower, 1986), novellas, short stories, biographies of St. Augustine and Henry James, Black Lamb and Grey Falcon (1941), a book about Yugoslavia and Europe in the 1930s, and 1900 (1982), a social history of that year.

Bibliographies

Hutchinson, George, A Preliminary List of the Writings of Rebecca West, 1912–1951,

Folcroft, Pennsylvania: Folcroft, 1973 (original edition, 1957)

Packer, Joan, Rebecca West: An Annotated Bibliography, New York: Garland, 1991

Further Reading

Deakin, Motley F., Rebecca West, Boston: Twayne, 1980

Glendinning, Victoria, Rebecca West: A Life, London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, and New York: Knopf, 1987

Marcus, Jane, "A Speaking Sphinx," Tulsa Studies in Women's Literature 2, no. 2 (1983):151–54

Seeley, Tracy, "Woolf and Rebecca West's Fiction Essays," Virginia Woolf Miscellany 39 (1992):6-7

Wolfe, Peter, Rebecca West, Artist and Thinker, Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1971

White, E.B.

American, 1899-1985

Widely regarded as one of America's finest essayists, E.B. White is often credited with restoring the informal essay to a place of respect. While he also wrote children's books, poetry, editorials, a famous style manual, and some well-received short fiction, White's position in American literature is secured by the charming personal essays he published in the New Yorker and Harper's magazine from the 1920s through the 1960s. In collections of essays such as One Man's Meat (1942), The Second Tree from the Corner (1954), The Points of My Compass (1962), and Essays of E.B. White (1977), White demonstrates what many critics consider America's most engaging 20th-century essay style in the personal or Montaignean tradition.

Among critics, White is frequently identified as this century's most exemplary personal essayist. He is most frequently commended for the music and architecture of his paragraphs, the subtle rhythm and pace of his sentences, and the elegant yet colloquial diction of his comfortable yet intense essaying voice. The terms commonly used to describe White's essay persona are "modest," "sincere," "gentle," and "precise." His highly esteemed prose style makes him a great favorite among anthologizers of essay texts for college English composition courses. Among his most frequently anthologized essays are "The Ring of Time" (1956), "Death of a Pig" (1948), "Once More to the Lake" (1941), and his tribute to Thoreau, "A Slight Sound at Evening" (1954).

While some find fault with his tendency to adopt the voice of the entertainer who, takes a homey and self-deprecating stance in addressing commonplace subjects, most reviewers find White to be a serious, even passionate advocate of social causes ranging from civil rights to ecology. Warren Beck and Eudora Welty, among others, defend White as a strong individualist, an intellectually and morally rigorous writer who does not trivialize or avoid dark and divisive issues.

White began writing poetry and short fiction as a boy in Mount Vernon, New York, winning three literary prizes and being published in St. Nicholas Magazine before his 15th year. From 1917 to 1921 he studied at Cornell University, where he developed his journalistic skills as editor of the Cornell Daily Sun. White earned a degree in English, studying literature and writing, most notably under the direction of Professor Will Strunk, whose "little book" of precepts about writing White would, in 1959, revise and expand into The Elements of Style. This manual has achieved enormous popularity for its succinct and bold advice for writers, being continuously in print over three decades, used in college courses and as a stylistic bible by a generation of freelance writers.

After leaving Cornell, White embarked on brief, unrewarding careers as a newspaper reporter for United Press syndicate and the Seattle Times. He would later write several engaging essays about this “unrooted period” of his life, most notably “Years of Wonder” (1961), dealing with his naive wandering in Alaska, and “Farewell, My Lovely” (1936), a celebration of the eccentricities of the Model T Ford which White and a friend drove across the continent the year after graduation.

Returning to New York City in 1923, White took a job for which he was temperamentally ill-suited, working for an advertising agency while submitting humorous sketches and poetry to newspapers. Fortuitously for White, just at the time he determined to make his living as a writer of essays and short humor pieces, a new magazine appeared under the editorship of Harold Ross and his assistant, Katherine Sergeant Angell. Impressed with several light sketches or “casuals” which White submitted, Ross offered White a job as staff writer for the New Yorker. White, who would marry Katherine upon her divorce in 1929, established a literary home for himself at the New Yorker, making his mark on that urbane and witty magazine while writing for it in several capacities for most of the next 50 years.

At the New Yorker White resisted the discipline of the traditional desk job, cherishing his personal freedom and avoiding normal office hours while cultivating many literary friendships. Among the writers with whom White and his wife developed social and professional relationships at the New Yorker were Dorothy Parker, Robert Benchley, Alexander Woollcott, and Stephen Leacock. Most notably, White collaborated with his sometime office mate James Thurber, whose cartooning talents were discovered by White as he retrieved doodles and scribbles from the wastebasket they shared. White collaborated with Thurber on Is Sex Necessary? (1929), a parody on contemporary sex advice books. Together White and Thurber established the clever, bemused editorial tone for which the New Yorker is known. They also pioneered such magazine subgenres as “Notes and Comments” and the “newsbreak,” filling in small portions of white space between the magazine’s articles with brief, logically and typographically flawed excerpts from other publications, to which White and Thurber would add comic oneliners. White published two collections of these: Ho-Hum: Newsbreaks from the New Yorker (1931) and Another Ho-Hum (1932).

At various times through the 1930s, White wrote essays, notes and comments, light verse, cartoon captions, and editorial columns for the New Yorker, as well as short comic sketches which he called “preposterous parables.” A collection of sketches was published in 1938 under the title Quo Vadimus? Ever self-deprecating and irregular in his work habits, White referred to his position at the New Yorker as that of “office boy deluxe.” When offered the editorship of the competing Saturday Review in 1936, he declined the position.

Although he had been making his living as a magazine prose writer, White felt a strong attraction to poetry. Most of his poetic output is, however, considered by critics to be light verse. He published his first volume of poems, The Lady Is Cold, in 1929, and followed it with another volume, The Fox of Peapack and Other Poems, in 1938. Following his poetic muse and suffering from a nervous condition, White resigned from his job at the New Yorker in 1937 to devote himself to a long, serious, autobiographical poem which never materialized. White would later use some material from this failed poem in his essay “Zoo Revisited” (1954).

Having moved from New York to a saltwater farm in Maine, White lived as an amateur farmer while writing a monthly column for Harper's. These collected essays, featuring White's rural experiences, were published in 1942. as One Man's Meat. Critics hailed this as White's best book to date, characterizing him as a 20th-century approximation of Montaigne and Thoreau. Later that year, Ross coaxed White back into working for the New Yorker, asking him to focus on patriotic wartime themes. Sent to cover the San Francisco Conference that led to the foundation of the United Nations, White became an enthusiastic editorial supporter of postwar internationalism, publishing an idealistic collection of essays devoted to world government under the title The Wild Flag (1946).

Throughout White's career, he celebrated two seemingly contradictory themes: human interdependence and an almost Thoreauvian commitment to individualism. His is a lyrical prose voice, both moderate and insistent, with a clearly moral foundation in American principles of liberty and justice. The personal ethics which pervade the essays become evident in the published Letters of E.B. White (1976). These letters reveal, among other telling autobiographical details, that White refused a guaranteed offer of $20,000 from the Book of the Month Club for The Second Tree from the Corner because he could not tolerate a six months' delay in publication of what he considered to be timely and topical essays.

White, sometimes dismissed as a writer of children's books (including the classics Stuart Little [1945] and Charlotte's Web [1952]), magazine humor pieces, and unprepossessing familiar essays, has earned a wide and affectionate following. Employing such comic devices as parody, colloquial dialogue, personification of animals, and understatement, White built an enduring reputation as a serious and humane essayist who succeeded with humor and good grace.

DALE E.HASKELL

Biography

Elwyn Brooks White. Born 11 July 1899 in Mount Vernon, New York. Studied at Cornell University, Ithaca, New York (editor, Cornell Daily Sun, 1920–21), 1917–21, A.B., 1921. Private in the U.S. army, 1918. Reporter, Seattle Times, 1922–23; advertising copywriter, Frank Seaman Inc. and Newmark Inc., New York, 1914–25; contributing editor, New Yorker, 1926–37 and from 1943. Married Katharine Sergeant Angell, 1929 (died, 1977): one son and two stepchildren. Columnist of "One Man's Meat," Harper's, 1938–43. Awards: several, including Page One Award for Literature, for The Second Tree from the Corner, 1954; American Academy Gold Medal, for essays, 1960; Presidential Medal of Freedom, 1963; American Library Association Wilder Award, for children's book, 1970; National Medal for Literature, 1971; Pulitzer Special Citation, 1978; honorary degrees from seven American colleges and universities. Member, American Academy. Died in North Brooklin, Maine, 1 October 1985.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Every Day Is Saturday, 1934

Quo Vadimus? or, The Case for the Bicycle (sketches), 1938

One Man's Meat, 1942

World Government and Peace: Selected Notes and Comment 1943–1945, 1945

The Wild Flag: Editorials from the New Yorker on Federal World Government and Other Matters, 1946

Here Is New York, 1949

The Second Tree from the Corner (includes poetry), 1954

The Points of My Compass: Letters from the East, the West, the North, the South, 1962,

An E.B. White Reader, edited by William W. Watt and Robert W. Bradford, 1966

Essays of E.B. White, 1977

Writings from the New Yorker, 1927–1976, edited by Rebecca M. Dale, 1990

Other writings: the satire Is Sex Necessary?, with James Thurber (1929), the handbook of style The Elements of Style, with William Strunk, Jr. (1959), three novels for children (Stuart Little, 1945; Charlotte's Web, 1952; The Trumpet of the Swan, 1970), two collections of poetry, and correspondence (collected in Letters of E. B. White, edited by Dorothy Lubrano Guth, 1976).

Bibliographies

Anderson, A.J., E.B. White: A Bibliography, Metuchen, New Jersey: Scarecrow Press, 1978

Hall, Katherine R., E.B. White: A Bibliographic Catalogue of Printed Materials in the Department of Rare Books, Cornell University Library, New York: Garland, 1979

Further Reading

Beck, Warren, "E.B. White," College English 7 (April 1946): 367–73

Dennis, Nigel, "Smilin' Through," New York Review of Books, 27 October 1977:42–43

Elledge, Scott, E.B. White: A Biography, New York: Norton, 1984

Epstein, Joseph, "E.B. White, Dark and Lite," Commentary 81 (April 1986):48–56

Fuller, J.W., Prose Style in the Essays of E.B. White (dissertation), Seattle: University of Washington, 1959

Grant, Thomas, "The Sparrow on the Ledge: E.B. White in New York," Studies in American Hutnor 3 (Spring 1984):23–33

Haskell, Dale E., The Rhetoric of the Familiar Essay: E.B. White and Personal Discourse (dissertation), Fort Worth: Texas Christian University, 1983

Heldreth, Leonard G., "The Pattern of Life Indelible': E.B. White's 'Once More to the Lake'," CEA Critic 45 (November 1985): 31–34

Howarth, William, "E.B. White at the New Yorker," Sewanee Review 93 (Fall 1985):574–83

- Platizky, Roger S., "'Once More to the Lake': A Mythic Interpretation," College Literature 15 (Spring 1988):171–79
- Plimpton, George, and Frank H.Crowther, "The Art of the Essay I: E.B.White," Paris Review 48 (Fall 1969):65–88
- Quigley, Michael, "The Germ of Common Cause": History, Rhetoric, and Ideology in the Essays of E.B.White (dissertation), Eugene: University of Oregon, 1989
- Root, Robert L., Jr., editor, Critical Essays on E.B.White, New York: Hall, and Oxford: Maxwell Macmillan International, 1994
- Sampson, Edward, E.B.White, New York: Twayne, 1974
- Schott, Webster, "E.B.White Forever," New Republic, 24 November 1962:23–24
- Smith, Kenneth Alan, Contesting Discourses in the Essays of Virginia Woolf, James Baldwin, Joan Didion, and E.B.White (dissertation), Iowa City: University of Iowa, 1993
- Tanner, Stephen L, "E.B.White and the Theory of Humor," Humor: International Journal of Humor Research 2 (1989): 43–53
- Thurber, James. "E.B.W.," Saturday Review of Literature, 15 October 1938:1+
- Updike, John, "Remarks on the Occasion of E.B.White Receiving the 1971 National Medal for Literature," in his Picked-Up Pieces, New York: Knopf, 1975; London: Deutsch, 1976: 434–47
- Weales, Gerald, "The Designs of E.B.White," New York Times Book Review, 24 May 1970:2+
- Welty, Eudora, "Dateless Virtues," New York Times Book Review, 25 September 1977:43+

Wieland, Christoph Martin

German, 1733–1813

While Christoph Martin Wieland is best known to the nonGerman world for his novels, romances, and didactic tales in verse, he was also among the first and most prominent of those writers, such as Gotthold Ephraim Lessing, Johann Gottfried Herder, and Georg Forster, who inaugurated the German essay in the 18th century. This distinction can be ascribed in part to Wieland's ownership and direction of the longest-lived journal of the age, the Teutscher Merkur (The German Mercury), but also, more fundamentally, to his own creativity and enterprise as an essayist.

By his nature, background, and experience Wieland was eminently suited for his role as one of Germany's first essayists. As has been well observed of him as a stylist, he possessed many of those qualities that most essayists in the European literatures seem to share: a sociable manner of expression, a habit of directly engaging the reader in a common enterprise, the wish both to make himself understandable and to incite the reader to independent thought (Fritz Martini, 1967). Certain other predispositions and habits of mind further equip him exceptionally for the role of essayist: a humane relativism, an openness to all sources of knowledge and truth, and a sincere willingness to give a fair hearing to views different from his own. For most of his career Wieland ardently held to a melioristic outlook; in so doing he became, along with Lessing and Moses Mendelssohn, one of the most important literary representatives of the German Enlightenment.

There was hardly a question agitating his era that did not find expression in Wieland's essayistic writings, and specific essay topics extend over a wide reach: Graecomania, Shakespeare, Rousseau, balloon flight, the plan for an academy, patriotism, the French Revolution, cosmopolitanism, animal magnetism, the Enlightenment, Sturm und Drang (Storm and stress) aesthetics, ethics, political philosophy, everyday life. The great variety of his output can best be schematized under the broad divisions of cultural, political, philosophical, religious, and literary, with the first two categories preponderant. Three fairly distinct periods in Wieland's career as essayist evolved: early (1750–63), middle (1764–87), and late (1788–1813).

Wieland's essayistic writings up to 1755 are pervaded by pietism and exuberant idealism, usually finding expression in the form of categorical assertiveness; accordingly, a sermonizing and rather imperious attitude toward the reader is the dominant tone. Additionally, there is an occasional Anacreontic ornamentation, especially in those pieces cast in verse. Though there are only four or five essays in the earliest and extremely pietistic years, it is nonetheless significant that these works constitute much of Wieland's entire literary productivity during that period. "Timoklea: Ein Gespräch iiber scheinbare und wahre Schonheit" (1755; Timoklea: a conversation on apparent and genuine beauty) and its companion piece, "Theages; oder Unterredung von Schonheit und Liebe" (1758; Theages; or conversation on beauty and love), are the two principal achievements in these early years.

As early as his 21st year a marked change occurs in the form, temper, and content of Wieland's work. The shift begins after his departure from his patron, the critic and aesthete Johann Jakob Bodmer, is furthered by his friendship with the poet J.G.Zimmermann and a reading of the Earl of Shaftesbury, and becomes virtually complete under the influence of the Francophile Count Friedrich Stadion. The middle years of Wieland's career (1764–87), then, witness both the maturity of his thought on philosophical, political, historical, and literary subjects and the full development of his skills as an essayist. Especially with his founding of the Teutscher Merkur in 1773, he had available a medium for expressing his confrontation with new developments in political and cultural affairs.

During the middle period he wrote over 50 essays. Among the most notable of those pieces on philosophical or religious topics are "Was ist Wahrheit?" (1778; "What Is Truth?"); "Über den Hang, an Magie und Geistererscheinungen zu glauben" (1781; On the inclination to believe in ghostly apparitions); "Antworten und Gegenfragen auf die Zweifel und Anfragen eines vorgeblichen Weltbürgers" (1783; Answers and counterquestions to the doubts and inquiries of a would-be cosmopolite); "Über religiöse Toleranz" (1783; On religious tolerance); and "Über den freien Gebrauch der Vernunft in Glaubenssachen" (1788; On the free use of reason in religious matters). "What Is Truth?," written five years after Kant's sanguine observations in "Was ist Aufklärung?" (1773; "What Is Enlightenment?"), is probably the most frequently reprinted of all of Wieland's essays. Though the work is not demonstrably an intentional counter to Kant's piece, Wieland confidently and persuasively states his case on the subject of humankind's future with an optimism as cautious and diffident as that of his famous contemporary. A considerable portion of the middle years is also devoted to the relationship between religious and political matters, perhaps best represented by "Gedanken über eine alte Aufschrift" (1772; Thoughts on an old inscription), one of the most persuasive and well-crafted pieces of the entire period.

Wieland wrote approximately a dozen essays of a political nature during these 20-odd years, the best of which are "Das gottliche Recht der Obrigkeit" (1777; The divine right of kings); "Über die Rechte und Pflichten der Schriftsteller" (1785; On the rights and duties of authors), one of his most vigorous essays, dealing with the freedom of the press; and "Eine Lustreise ins Elysium" (1787; A pleasure trip to Elysium). "Das gottliche Recht der Obrigkeit," which outdoes even Hobbes in its advocacy of the ancient political principle, unsurprisingly provoked the wrathful distaste of many of Wieland's more progressive and optimistic contemporaries and evidently cost the Merkur no few subscribers. Much of this opposition failed to recognize Wieland's perception of a fine line between unworkable idealism and brutal realism. Throughout his career, Wieland preferred a practical and skeptical empiricism that grants hope to the possibility of reform and progress (John A. McCarthy [in Jørgensen], 1994). His interest in historical topics was impelled for the most part by a search for historical parallels with his own age: the lessons of the past, he assumed, are often relevant to the problems of the present and can thus serve as a guide for the future.

Wieland consistently held an adamant conviction that belleslettres constituted the most effective means for advancing the humanistic ideals of the European Enlightenment. He frequently addressed in a direct and sustained way questions concerning the nature and essence of literature—especially such theories as were current in the period between the baroque and Romantic periods (McCarthy [in Jørgensen], 1994). Most of the more important of his essays on these matters are contained in a series of articles written in the 1770s and early 1780s, among others: "Der Eifer, unserer Dichtkunst einen National-Charakter zu geben" (1773; The enthusiasm for giving a national character to our literature); "Wenn sie fortfahren, die Teutschen des 18. Jahrhunderts für Enkel Tuiskons anzusehen" (1773; If they continue to regard the Germans of the 18th century as descendants of Tuiskon); "Der Geist Shakespears" (1773; The Shakespearean spirit); "Über das Schauspiel Götz von Berlichingen mit der eisernen Hand" (1773; On the drama Götz von Berlichingen); "Unterredungen zwischen W und dem Pfarrer zu " (1775; Conversations between W and the Pastor of ); "Gedanken über die Ideale der Alten" (1777; Thoughts on the ideals of the Ancients); Briefe an einen jungen Dichter (1782–84; Letters to a young poet) (McCarthy [in Jørgensen], 1994).

While it can be reasonably asserted that Wieland's writings on literary and cultural themes deserve as firm a place in the literary history of the 18th century as those of Johann Joachim Winckelmann, Lessing, and Schiller (McCarthy [in Jørgensen], 1994), in his role as reviewer during the 1770s and 1780s he revealed his weakest side. In fact, there exists only a handful among the dozens of reviews in these two decades that can qualify as essays, the piece on Goethe's Götz von Berlichingen being the most notable. Tone and general style are, at best, straightforward, at worst, lackluster. The relatively unimportant contributions that Wieland brought to his role of reviewer had more to do with his wishes, as editor of the Merkur, to avoid harsh or otherwise imperious judgments, whether his own or those of his many contributors. At the same time this policy served the ultimate purpose of establishing and maintaining a good tone in his journal. Moreover, severe criticism would almost necessarily imply an inconsistency with Wieland's constant and avowed aspiration to entertain multiple perspectives (McCarthy [in Jørgensen], 1994).

Essayistic writings in the late period (1788–1813) are with few exceptions devoted to topics connected with the Revolution in France. The form in which Wieland expresses his thoughts on these topics is generally dialogic, while the tone is principally apprehensive and monitory. The most noteworthy of these serious writings are “Das Geheimnis des KosmopolitenOrdens” (1788; The secret of the order of cosmopolites); “Über deutschen Patriotismus” (1793; On German patriotism); Neue Göttergespräche (1791; New dialogues of the gods, translated as Dialogues of the Gods); “Für und Wider” (1793; Pro and contra); and “Betrachtungen über die gegenwärtige Lage des Vaterlandes” (1793; Observations on the present condition of the homeland). Fritz Martini regards this last essay as a unique masterpiece of Wieland's dialectic thought. The 13th dialogue of the Dialogues of the Gods deserves particular comment for its expression of Wieland's general attitude toward the French Revolution, its employment of a favorite form—the dialogue—and its surprising use of historical parallelism. While the latter is a favorite device throughout his career, it is used here with striking variation: the past (represented by various rulers and divinities) is conjured to comment upon and judge the present; human history is hailed before the bar of transhistorical reason, as it were, and forced to testify against itself. “Gespräche unter vier Augen” (1793; Tête-à-têtes), a culmination of several earlier works advancing the thesis that rule by the stronger, however unpalatable as a political principle, is nonetheless a historically established fact (McCarthy, 1979), was Wieland's last major essay on the Revolution.

Most of the common methods of setting forth an argument, such as inductive or deductive reasoning, precatory appeals, the invocation of authority, and the presupposition of reader agreement (ad hominem and ad populum), are found in abundance throughout the middle and late periods of Wieland's career in essay writing. Two types of argumentation, however—the dialectic and the rhetorical question—are both his preferred and his most accomplished devices.

As has often been remarked, Wieland was hardly akin to the more militant spirit of a Lessing or Herder; thus he only occasionally advances an adamantly polemical viewpoint. The desire, indeed the felt necessity, to shun severe criticism was part of his pacific nature, and he generally opted for a nonconfrontational and neutral ambiguity over harsh judgment. Such an attitude easily led, of course, to the charge—unfair, but leveled by contemporaries and later critics alike—that he was a trimmer and waverer. Wieland himself was clearly aware of and explicitly acknowledged his vulnerability on this count. In any event, his tone and temper in expressing his ideas, whether affirmative, negative, or indecisive, can be bitter, witty, dour, lighthearted, indignant, ironic, wry, resigned. Regardless of his stylistic disposition in a given work, however, he is consistently lucid and eminently readable. As one of the true founders of the German essay, he continues—almost two centuries after his death—both to reward careful and reflective study and to entertain and educate the casual reader.

ROBERT V. SMYTHE

Biography

Born 5 September 1733 in Oberholzheim, near Biberach. Studied privately with Johann Wilhelm Baumer, 1748–49; enrolled at the University of Erfurt, 1749–50. Engaged to his cousin Sophie Gutermann (i.e. the novelist Sophie von La Roche), 1750 (broken off, 1753, but remained friends throughout his life). Began a course in jurisprudence, University of Tübingen, 1750, but wrote poetry rather than studying law. Lived as guest of the scholar Johann Jakob Bodmer, Zurich, 1752–54; tutor in Zurich and Berne, 1754–60. Engaged to Julie Bondeli, 1759 (broken off). Senator and acting town clerk, Biberach, 1760. Married Dorothea von Hillenbrand, 1765 (died, 1801): eight daughters and four sons (two other children died in infancy). Appointed privy councillor of Mainz, 1769, and of Saxony, 1772. Professor of philosophy, University of Erfurt, 1769–72; tutor to the sons of Dowager Duchess Anna Amalia of Sachsen-Weimar, 1772–74. Cofounder and editor, Der Teutsche Merkur (later Der neue Teutsche Merkur), 1773–96. Became lifelong friends with Goethe, from 1775. Elected to the Prussian Academy of Science, 1787. Founder, Attisches Museum (Attic museum), 1796. Lived on the Ossmannstedt country estate, near Weimar, 1797–1803, then returned to Weimar. Awards: Legion of Merit (France), 1808; Cross of Saint Anna (Russia), 1808. Died in Weimar, 20 January 1813.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Symphathien, 1756

Sammlung prosaischer Schriften, 2 vols., 1764

Beyträge zur Geheimen Geschichte des menschlichen Verstandes und Herzens (includes fiction), 1770

Prosaische Schriften, 2 vols., 1771–72; revised edition, 2 vols., 1785

Dialogues, translated anonymously, 1775

Neue Göttergespräche, 1791; part as Dialogues of the Gods, translated by William Taylor, 1795

Meine Antworten: Aufsätze über die Französische Revolution 1789–1793, edited by Fritz Martini, 1983

Politische Schriften: Insbesondere zur Französischen Revolution, 3 vols., 1988

Other writings: several novels (including Die Geschichte des Agathon [The History of Agathon], 1766–67), poetry (including the verse romance Oberon, 1780), and correspondence. Also translated works by Shakespeare, Horace, Lucian, and Cicero.

Collected works editions: Sämtliche Werke, edited by Heinrich Duntzer, 40 vols., 1867–79; Gesammelte Schriften (Berlin Academy of Science Edition), edited by Bernard Seuffert and others, 1909–(in progress; 100 vols. projected); Werke, edited by Fritz Martini and Hans Werner Seiffert, 5 vols., 1964–68; Werke, edited by GonthierLouis Fink and others, 1986–(in progress).

Bibliographies

- Ottensbacher, Viia, "Wieland-Bibliographie, 1983–1988," WielandStudien, vol. 1, Sigmaringen: Thorbecke, 1991
- Steinberger, Julius, Bibliographie der Wieland-Übersetzungen, Göttingen: Selbstverlag, 1930
- Günther, Gottfried, and Heidi Zeilinger, Wieland-Bibliographie, Berlin and Weimar: Aufbau, 1983

Further Reading

- Ermatinger, Emil, Die Weltanschauung des jungen Wieland, Frauenfeld: Huber, 1907
- Fink, Gonthier-Louis, "Wieland et la Révolution française," Revue d'Allemagne (Homnpage à Robert Minder) 5 (1973):497–522
- Haas, Gerhard, Essay, Stuttgart: Metzler, 1969
- Jørgensen, S.-A., H.Jaumann, John A.McCarthy, and H.Thomé, Christoph Martin Wieland: Epoche, Werk, Wirkung, Munich: Beck, 1994
- Just, Klaus Günther, "Essay," in Deutsche Philologie im Aufriss, vol. 1, edited by W.Stammmler, Berlin: Schmidt, 1966: columns 1897–1948
- McCarthy, John A., "Wieland as Essayist," Lessing Yearbook 8 (1976):125–39
- McCarthy, John A., Christoph Martin Wieland, Boston: Twayne, 1979
- McCarthy, John A., "The Poet as Journalist and Essayist: Chr. M. Wieland, Part One—A Descriptive Account," Jahrbuch für internationale Germanistik 12, no. 1 (1980):104–38
- McCarthy, John A., "The Poet as Essayist II," Jahrbuch für internationale Germanistik (1981):74–137
- Martini, Fritz, "C.M.Wieland und das 18. Jahrhundert," in Festschrift Paul Kluckhohn und Hermann Schneider, Tübingen: Möhr, 1948
- Martini, Fritz, "Nachwort" to Werke by Wieland, vol. 3, Munich: Hanser, 1967
- Meesen, H.J., "Wielands Briefe an einen jungen Dichter," Monatshefte 47 (1955):193–208
- Meyer, Verena, C.M.Wieland und die geschichtliche Welt, Zurich: Buchdruckerei Akeret, 1944
- Rehder, Helmut, "Die Anfänge des deutschen Essays," Deutsche Vierteljahrsschrift für Literaturwissenschaft und Geistesgeschichte 40 (1966):25–42
- Rohner, Ludwig, Der deutsche Essay: Materialien zur Geschichte und Ästhetik einer literarischen Gattung, Neuwied and Berlin: Luchterhand, 1966
- Schulze, Volker, "Der Teutsche Merkur (1773–1810)," in Deutsche Zeitschriften des 17. bis 20. Jahrhunderts, edited by HeinzDietrich Fischer, Pullach: Dokumentation, 1973
- Seiffert, Hans W., "Die Idee der Aufklärung bei Christoph Martin Wieland," Wissenschaftliche Annalen 2 (1953):678–89
- Sengle, Friedrich, Wieland, Stuttgart: Metzler, 1949
- Stamm, Israel S., "Wieland and Sceptical Rationalism," Germanic Review 33 (1958):15–29
- Starnes, Thomas C., Der Teutsche Merkur: Ein Repertorium, Sigmaringen: Thorbecke, 1994

Tietze, Wilhelm, "Wieland der Mensch und der Schriftsteller," Die Literatur 43 (1940–41):275–79

Vogt, Oskar, "'Der goldene Spiegel' und Wielands politische Ansichten," Forschungen zur neueren Literaturgeschichte 26 (1904): 1–101

Wahl, Hans, Geschichte des Teutschen Merkur, Berlin: Mayer & Müller, 1914

Weyergraf, Bernd, Der skeptische Bürger: Wielands Schriften zur Französischen Revolution, Stuttgart: Metzler, 1972

Wilde, Oscar

Irish, 1854–1900

If Oscar Wilde had written nothing but essays and dialogues, he would be well known for them now. But until recently, his plays, his novel The Picture of Dorian Gray (1891), and above all the myth of his life have overshadowed his essays. His important contemporaries were more clear-sighted: Pater ("A Novel by Mr. Oscar Wilde," 1891) described Wilde as carrying on, "more perhaps than any other writer, the brilliant critical work of Matthew Arnold." Yeats ("Oscar Wilde's Last Book," 1891) drew attention to the literary aspect of Wilde's work: "Intentions hides within its immense paradox some of the most subtle literary criticism we are likely to see for many a long day."

Wilde by no means confined his nonfictional work to a traditional essay form: he enjoyed stretching the notional limits of genres, typically presenting his theory of Shakespeare's sonnets as a short story in "The Picture of Mr. W.H." (1889) or condensing a whole theory of art into a series of epigrams as "A Preface to Dorian Gray" (1891). He also harked back to older forms, and some of his most striking essays followed Plato, Sidney, or Dryden by adopting the dialogue form with a new, almost postmodern self-consciousness.

His first notable essay is "L'Envoi," an introduction to a volume of poems by his friend Rennell Rodd, the American publication of which he orchestrated in 1882. "L'Envoi" is effectively a manifesto for "the modern romantic school," a clear commitment to art for art's sake, a deliberate departure from Ruskin's teaching, always essentially moral, in favor of a purely aesthetic ideal. This is the young Wilde's first call for "personality and perfection," his open commitment to "Greek things," his first notable dismissal of the Victorian ideals of sincerity and constancy. It is full of Paterian echoes, although Pater is nowhere mentioned; arguably by this time Wilde had wholeheartedly made some of Pater's ideas his own, and was assembling his own rich brew of the masters who were to be lasting influences, such as Ralph Waldo Emerson, apostle of individualism, and Théophile Gautier, precursor of art for art's sake.

Before the theatrical success which seemed to mark the end of his financial problems, Wilde was a hard-working literary man, writing articles and book reviews; many of these anonymous and apparently ephemeral publications deserve to be valued as literary essays. Richard Ellmann published a selection of them along with the better-known essays and dialogues in The Artist as Critic: Critical Writings of Oscar Wilde (1969).

Outstanding among these is “A Chinese Sage,” in which Wilde encounters Chuang Tzu, a Chinese Taoist philosopher of the fourth century BCE, and in him recognizes a contemporary and a fellow thinker. Chuang Tzu also preached inaction, contemplation, and the uselessness of all useful things. Wilde welcomes this paradoxical and subversive critic of wealth, moralizing, and good intentions, this proponent of “the ideal of self-culture and self-development”; this master joined Wilde’s amalgam of inspirations, with a lasting influence on his thought. But when considering his major essays and dialogues, it is pointless to look for masters: Wilde is in his own literary element, inventive, creative, witty, and invariably speaking in what is now his own voice.

His two major literary-theoretical works are the poised and witty dialogues “The Decay of Lying” (1889) and “The Critic as Artist” (1890). Neither has yet received full critical treatment, though they have been annotated in detail in The Oxford Authors Oscar Wilde (1989). The protagonists of “The Decay of Lying” are two fashionable young men, the leader Vivian being exceptionally well read and happy to display esoteric learning. The success of the dialogues is in their selfconsciousness: here, Vivian forecasts “a new Renaissance of Art,” and reads out and discusses a paper he is writing. He goes on to “prove” that Art never expresses anything but itself, that all bad art comes from returning to Life and Nature, and that “Life imitates Art far more than Art imitates Life.” In “The Critic as Artist,” Gilbert convinces a doomed Ernest that Criticism is the superior part of creation, and that the critic must not be fair, rational, and sincere, but possessed of “a temperament exquisitely susceptible to beauty.” Gilbert praises the possibilities of the dialogue form, in which, as the luckless Ernest points out, a critic “can invent an imaginary antagonist, and convert him when he chooses by some absurdly sophistical argument.”

The Soul of Man Under Socialism (1891) is a more traditional essay on wider themes, dealing with notions of power and authority, anarchy and individualism, and “the great actual Individualism latent and potential in mankind generally.” Here Wilde takes an airily optimistic view of the road to the socialist future and, while writing fraternally of the teachings of Christ, rejects the ideal of self-sacrifice and pain in favor of joy as the door to perfection.

There is a major change of direction in Wilde’s writing in 1897, stemming from his reaction to his prison experiences and mainly involving his closer acquaintance with the realities of pain. When he was at last allowed pen and paper in H.M. Prison, Reading, after more than 19 months of deprivation, solitary confinement, and hard labor, Wilde had become inclined to take opposite views on the potential of humankind toward perfection. De Profundis (1905), written while he was in prison, is many things: it can be read as dramatic monologue, autobiography, elegy, love letter, and of course as essay. It was first published when Robert Ross extracted what seemed to him to be appropriate passages for publication, and it is clear that Wilde saw it as destined at least in parts for a wider audience than its addressee, Lord Alfred Douglas. Among other things, it enacts the essay he contemplates here, on Christ “as the precursor of the Romantic movement in life.”

Arguably his two most powerful late essays are those which share the tone and passion of The Ballad of Reading Gaol (1898)—the two long letters he wrote to the Daily Chronicle (1897, 1898), which were printed under the titles “The Case of Warder Martin,

Some Cruelties of Prison Life” and “Don’t Read This if You Want to Be Happy Today.” The optimum audience for these letters, as for the Ballad, was the widest possible readership, united only in the collective recognition of cruelty and of guilt.

ISOBEL MURRAY

Biography

Oscar Fingal O’Flahertie Wills Wilde. Born 16 October 1854 in Dublin. Studied at Portora Royal School, Enniskillen, County Fermanagh, 1864–71; Trinity College, Dublin, 1871–74; Magdalen College, Oxford, where he was taught by Walter Pater and John Ruskin, 1874–78, B.A., 1878. Moved to London, 1878; art reviewer, 1881; lectured in the United States and Canada, 1882.; lived in Paris, 1883; lectured in Britain, 1883–84. Married Constance Lloyd, 1884 (separated, 1893; died, 1898): two sons. Regular contributor, Pall Mall Gazette and the Dramatic Review, mid-1880s; editor, Woman’s World, London, 1887–89. Sued the Marquess of Queensberry for slander, 1895, but evidence at the trial revealed his relationship with Queensberry’s son, Lord Alfred Douglas, and he was prosecuted for offenses to minors: sentenced to two years’ hard labor in Wandsworth prison, London, then Reading Gaol, 1895–97. On release lived under the name Sebastian Melmoth in Berneval, near Dieppe, then in Paris. Allowed into the Roman Catholic Church on his deathbed. Died (of cerebral meningitis) in Paris, 30 November 1900.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Intentions, 1891

“The Soul of Man Under Socialism,” in Fortnightly Review, 1891; in book form, as The Soul of Man, 1895; as The Soul of Man Under Socialism, 1912.

De Profundis, expurgated edition, edited by Robert Ross, 1905; revised edition, 1909; suppressed portion published, 1913; published in full in The Letters, edited by Rupert Hart-Davis, 1962; edited by Peter Forster, 1991

The Portable Oscar Wilde, edited by Richard Aldington, 1946; revised edition, edited by Aldington and Stanley Weintraub, 1981

Essays, edited by Hesketh Pearson, 1950

Selected Essays and Poems, 1954; as De Profundis and Other Writings, 1973

Literary Criticism, edited by Stanley Weintraub, 1968

The Artist as Critic: Critical Writings, edited by Richard Ellmann, 1969

Oxford Notebooks: A Portrait of Mind in the Making, edited by Philip E. Smith II and Michael S. Helfand, 1989

The Oxford Authors Oscar Wilde (selections), edited by Isobel Murray, 1989

The Soul of Man, and Prison Writings, edited by Isobel Murray, 1990

Aristotle at Afternoon Tea: The Uncollected Oscar Wilde, edited by John Wyse Jackson, 1991

Other writings: eight plays (including Lady Windermere’s Fan, 1892; Salomé, 1893; A Woman of No Importance, 1893; An Ideal Husband, 1895; The Importance of Being Earnest, 1895), the novel The Picture of Dorian Gray (1891), fairytales, and poetry.

Complete works editions: Works, edited by Robert Ross, 4 vols., 1908–10; Complete Works, edited by Vyvyan Holland, 1948, reprinted 1989; Works, edited by Merlin Holland, 3 vols., 1993.

Bibliographies

Fletcher, Ian, and John Stokes, "Oscar Wilde," in Anglo-Irish Literature: A Review of Research, edited by Richard J. Finneran, New York: Modern Language Association of America, 1976

Fletcher, Ian, and John Stokes, "Oscar Wilde," in Recent Research on Anglo-Irish Writers, edited by Richard J. Finneran, New York: Modern Language Association of America, 1983

Mason, Stuart, A Bibliography of Oscar Wilde, London: Laurie, 1914

Mikhail, E.H., Oscar Wilde: An Annotated Bibliography of Criticism, London: Macmillan, and Totowa, New Jersey: Rowman and Littlefield, 1978

Further Reading

Bashford, Bruce, "Oscar Wilde as Theorist: The Case of De Profundis," English Literature in Transition 28, no. 4 (1985): 395–406

Beckson, Karl, editor, Oscar Wilde: The Critical Heritage, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, and New York: Barnes and Noble, 1970

Beckson, Karl, London in the 1890s: A Cultural History, New York: Norton, 1992

Dyson, A.E., "Oscar Wilde: Irony of a Socialist Aesthete," in his The Crazy Fabric: Essays in Irony, London: Macmillan, and New York: St. Martin's Press, 1965

Ellmann, Richard, Oscar Wilde, London: Hamilton, 1987; New York: Knopf, 1988

Kohl, Norbert, Oscar Wilde: The Works of a Conformist Rebel, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1989

Murray, Isobel, "Oscar Wilde's Absorption of 'Influences': The Case History of Chuang Tzu," Durham University Journal 64, no. 1 (1971): 1–13

Murray, Isobel, "Oscar Wilde and Individualism: Contexts for The Soul of man," Durham University Journal 83, no. 2 (1991): 195–207

Sandulescu, C. George, editor, Rediscovering Oscar Wilde, Gerrards Cross, Buckinghamshire: Smythe, 1993

Schiff, Hilda, "Nature and Art in Oscar Wilde's 'The Decay of Lying,'" Essays and Studies (1965): 83–102

Shewan, Rodney, Oscar Wilde: Art and Egotism, London: Macmillan, and New York: Barnes and Noble, 1977

Small, Ian, Oscar Wilde Revalued: An Essay on New Materials and Methods of Research, Greensboro, North Carolina: ELT Press, 1993

Thomas, J.D., "The Intentional Strategy in Oscar Wilde's Dialogues," English Literature in Transition 12, no. 1 (1969): 11–20

Wilson, Edmund

American, 1895–1972

During his long career as a man of letters, Edmund Wilson produced hundreds of individual essays and several dozen published volumes of nonfiction prose. His broad interests included the Dead Sea Scrolls, the privations of Kentucky coalminers during the Depression, Iroquois and Zuni tribal culture, the development of the Soviet Union, and almost all aspects of European and American literature in the 19th century and the first half of the 20th. His work varies in length from brief book reviews to long scholarly books like Patriotic Gore (1962), his 800-page study of the literature of the American Civil War.

While his reportage, travel writing, and posthumously published diaries and notebooks have all been widely read and reviewed, his most prolific and important work is surely his literary criticism. This criticism was consistently and unfashionably a discussion “of literature in relation to life and of life in relation to history” (“Re-examining Dr. Johnson,” 1944), foregrounding biographical, moral, political, and historical contexts at a time when academic literary scholarship was largely dominated by New Critical formalism.

Since he never found academic employment congenial, Wilson earned his living as a journalist, beginning with a brief period on the staff of Vanity Fair in 1920. He placed significant work in the Dial, the Nation, Atlantic Monthly, and Partisan Review, but three other periodicals published the bulk of his work. From 1921 to 1941 he was associated with the New Republic, which published parts of To the Finland Station (1940), his literary history of the European Left from Michelet to Lenin; many of the long literary essays later collected in The Triple Thinkers (1938) and The Wound and the Bow (1941); and most of the book reviews that make up The Shores of Light (1952). In 1943 he joined the New Yorker, where he first published most of the book reviews later collected in Classics and Commercials (1950), The Bit Between My Teeth (1965), and the posthumous The Devils and Canon Barham (1973). It was also in the New Yorker that he initially published much of Europe Without Baedeker (1947), his postwar tour of England, Italy, and Greece, The Scrolls from the Dead Sea (1955), and Apologies to the Iroquois (1960). In the last years of his life, he lent his prestige to the fledgling New York Review of Books, publishing there nine essays, including “The Fruits of the MLA” (1968), his influential indictment of American academic literary scholarship.

In his 1943 essay, “Thoughts on Being Bibliographed,” Wilson outlined the circuitous way his work developed. He first sought reporting assignments or books to review on subjects that interested him, then combined these short articles into longer essays, and finally grouped essays for publication as books. His “preliminary sketches” are, he says, “tentative,” and after being “exposed to criticism and correction,” may be “contradicted by my final conclusions.” His bibliographers are further tested by his habit of republishing revised, expanded, or recombined versions of his books whenever possible, sometimes with significantly revised titles, sometimes not. Given their complex publishing histories, Wilson's books and essays sometimes seem too loosely structured, but his individual sentences and paragraphs are much more carefully worked out. The generally unsympathetic chapter on Wilson in Stanley Edgar Hyman's The Armed Vision (1948) concedes his ability "to work the most recondite material into simple and comprehensible English." His prose style shows an old-fashioned fondness for Latinate diction and formal sentence structure coupled with forceful declarative statements. He hated jargon and imprecision, avoiding them himself and attacking them in other authors, as in "A Postscript to Fowler: Current Cliches and Solecisms" (1963). His style has often been described as conversational, but the conversation is dominated by one highly opinionated voice; Wilson's several attempts at dialogue (e.g. "The Delegate from Great Neck," 1924) resulted in one character virtually smothering the other.

Though perhaps a rather domineering conversationalist, Wilson had a strong sense of what his reader needed to know and what that reader might find interesting. Indeed his major complaint about academic literary critics was their impoverished sense of audience: at best, they wrote for small groups of fellow specialists, at worst, simply to create scholarly credentials with no readers in mind whatsoever. Wilson, on the other hand, worked hard to make his considerable erudition accessible and interesting to the broad audience that read the New Yorker. While he was an accomplished linguist, who taught himself Hebrew, Russian, and Hungarian after learning several less exotic languages, he almost always translates quotations into English. He is also quite happy to provide plot summaries of books he is discussing whenever he thinks they might be helpful. So, for example, in "Dickens: The Two Scrooges" (1941), he summarizes Little Dorrit but not A Christmas Carol. He also quotes at length from his sources, in part at least to convey their style and flavor; this habit grew with time, and quotations in Patriotic Gore can be ten pages long.

In addition to his very different sense of audience, Wilson was separated from most academic critics of his time by his emphasis on biographical and historical context and his corresponding failure to focus on textual analysis. Discussing Axel's Castle (1931), Wilson's study of literary Modernism and its roots in symbolism, Delmore Schwartz (1942) complains that when Wilson comes to the "technical working, the craftsmanship and the unique forms," of literary works, he becomes "impatient and hurried," so Axel's Castle "is not a book for writers."

Instead of form, Wilson looked at what led the author to produce the work and what the work has to say to us. He was very broadly a psychological critic: for example, the essays in The Wound and the Bow, drawing their theme from Sophocles' play about the wounded archer Philoctetes, show how psychological wounds are inseparable from the achievements of writers like Kipling, Dickens, and Hemingway. His criticism is also historical, both because he re-creates for his readers the historical environments of the writers he discusses and because he seeks origins and traces developments. To the Finland Station, for example, seeks the origin of modern socialism in the bourgeois French Revolution, and Patriotic Gore shows, among other things, the evolution of New England Puritanism from the Calvinist orthodoxy of Harriet Beecher Stowe's father to the agnosticism of Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr. He was also a rhetorical critic since the literature he studied included memoirs, diaries, speeches, letters, and histories at a time when most critics defined literature more narrowly as fiction, poetry, and drama. Implicit or explicit in all Wilson's criticism is a moral message for his reader, as in the conclusion to Axel's Castle, where we are warned against literary Modernism's tendency to retreat from the problems of society.

While Wilson himself always addressed society's problems, his messages sometimes split between progressive and reactionary elements. In the 1920s he championed literary Modernism, and in the next decade he was a sympathetic student of Marx and Lenin. By the early 1960s he was attacking the U.S. government's role in the Cold War, and he was an early opponent of the war in Vietnam. He often seemed at war with his own past: a descendant of Cotton Mather but consistently hostile to the Christian religion; a patrician WASP but also a rabid Anglophobe. Yet he never seemed at home in the 20th century either. He hated typewriters, radios, televisions, and movies; he never learned to drive an automobile. In 1956 he proclaimed, "I have lately been coming to feel that, as an American, I am more or less in the eighteenth century—or at any rate, not much later than the early nineteenth" (A Piece of My Mind, 1956). He had never had much sympathy for American popular culture and by the 1950s had lost interest in the younger writers; his later essays frequently lament the fact that some useful volume has gone out of print. The last book he published during his lifetime was Upstate (1971), a series of elegiac meditations by a country gentleman who has retreated to his ancestral home in Talcottville, New York. For Alfred Kazin, who knew him well, Wilson was "the great anachronism."

The biographical emphasis in his writing has led to predictable comparisons with Plutarch and Sainte-Beuve, but Wilson himself pointed to his discovery as a schoolboy of Hippolyte Taine as the origin of his method ("A Modest Self-Tribute," 1952). He acknowledged a certain debt to both Marx and Freud in the development of his approach ("The Historical Interpretation of Literature," 1940), but he followed them in only a very general way. His broad humanism has suggested parallels with Matthew Arnold, and he expressed admiration for Henry James and George Saintsbury. Another essayist he admired and resembled is Samuel Johnson. They reached nearly opposite conclusions on political and religious questions, but they were both guided by vigorous, skeptical common sense, both hated cant, and both delivered their opinions with great confidence and in clear but formal language. They both wrote on the lives of the poets and defined literature broadly to give full weight to nonfictional prose. Wilson's focus on biography and history and his interest in nonfictional prose often made his criticism look old-fashioned during his lifetime, but today his work seems far more current than that of the New Critics. He still gets very modest attention in the universities, but the new interest in context and rhetorical analysis may well lead to a revival of interest in his impressive body of work.

WILLIAM F. NAUFFTUS

Biography

Born 8 May 1895 in Red Bank, New Jersey. Studied at Princeton University, New Jersey (member of the editorial staff, 1913–15, and managing editor, 1915–16, Nassau Literary Magazine), 1912–16, A.B., 1916. Reporter, New York Evening Sun, 1916–17. Served in the U.S. army, 1917–19. Contributed to or edited Vanity Fair, New York, 1920–13, New Republic, 1921–41, and New Yorker, 1943–48, and frequently thereafter. Married 1) Mary Blair, 1923 (divorced, 1928): one daughter; 2) Margaret Canby, 1930 (died, 1932); 3) Mary McCarthy, 1938 (divorced, 1946): one son; 4) Elena Thornton, 1946: one daughter. Awards: several, including the American Academy Gold Medal, for nonfiction, 1955; Presidential Medal of Freedom, 1963; MacDowell Medal, 1964; Emerson-Thoreau Medal, 1966; National Medal for Literature, 1966. Died in Talcottville, New York, 12 June 1972.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Axel's Castle: A Study in the Imaginative Literature of 1870–1930, 1931

The American Jitters: A Year of the Slump, 1932; as Devil Take the Hindmost, 1932; enlarged edition, as The American Earthquake: A Documentary of the Twenties and Thirties, 1958

Travels in Two Democracies, 1936

The Triple Thinkers: Ten Essays on Literature, 1938; enlarged edition, as The Triple Thinkers: Twelve Essays on Literary Subjects, 1948

To the Finland Station: A Study in the Writing and Acting of History, 1940

The Wound and the Bow: Seven Studies in Literature, 1941

The Boys in the Back Room: Notes on California Novelists, 1941

Europe Without Baedeker: Sketches Among the Ruins of Italy, Greece, and England, 1947

Classics and Commercials: A Literary Chronicle of the Forties, 1950

The Shores of Light: A Literary Chronicle of the Twenties and Thirties, 1952

Eight Essays, 1954

The Scrolls from the Dead Sea, 1955; revised edition, as The Dead Sea Scrolls, 1947–1969, 1969; enlarged edition, as Israel and the Dead Sea Scrolls, 1978

A Literary Chronicle, 1920–1950, 1956

Red, Black, Blond and Olive: Studies in Four Civilizations, 1956

A Piece of My Mind: Reflections at Sixty, 1956

Apologies to the Iroquois, 1960

Patriotic Gore: Studies in the Literature of the American Civil War, 1962

The Cold War and the Income Tax: A Protest, 1963

O Canada: An American's Notes on Canadian Culture, 1965

The Bit Between My Teeth: A Literary Chronicle of 1950–1965, 1965

A Prelude: Landscapes, Characters, and Conversations from the Earlier Years of My Life, 1967

Upstate: Records and Recollections of Northern New York, 1971

A Window on Russia, 1972

The Devils and Canon Barham: Ten Essays on Poets, Novelists, and Monsters, 1973

Letters on Literature and Politics, 1912–1972, edited by Elena Wilson, 1977

The Nabokov-Wilson Letters, 1940–1971, edited by Simon Karlinsky, 1979

The Portable Edmund Wilson, edited by Lewis M. Dabney, 1983 From the Uncollected Edmund Wilson, edited by Janet Groth and David Castronovo, 1995

Other writings: the novel I Thought of Daisy (1929), the short stories Memoirs of Hecate County (1946), plays, poetry, and notebooks and diaries (collected in five books, four edited by Leon Edel, 1975–86, the last by Lewis M. Dabney, 1993). Also edited The Shock of Recognition: The Development of Literature in the United States Recorded by the Men Who Made It (1943).

Bibliography

Ramsey, Richard David, Edmund Wilson: A Bibliography, New York: Lewis, 1971

Further Reading

- Aaron, Daniel, Introduction to Letters on Literature and Politics, 1912–1972 by Wilson, edited by Elena Wilson, New York: Farrar Straus Giroux, 1977: xv–xxix
- Castronovo, David, Edmund Wilson, New York: Ungar, 1984
- Dabney, Lewis M., “Edmund Wilson and The Sixties,” in The Sixties by Wilson, New York: Farrar Straus Giroux, 1993: xxi–lxvii
- Edel, Leon, “A Portrait of Edmund Wilson,” in The Twenties by Wilson, New York: Farrar Straus Giroux, and London: Macmillan, 1975: xvii–xlvi
- Epstein, Joseph, “Bye-Bye, Bunny,” Hudson Review 47, no. 2 (Summer 1994): 235–48
- Frank, Charles P., Edmund Wilson, New York: Twayne, 1970
- Groth, Janet, Edmund Wilson: A Critic for Our Time, Athens: Ohio University Press, 1989
- Hyman, Stanley Edgar, “Edmund Wilson and Translation in Criticism,” in his The Armed Vision: A Study in the Methods of Modern Literary Criticism, New York: Knopf, 1948: 19–48 (this chapter was deleted from later editions)
- Levin, Harry, “Edmund Wilson: The Last American Man of Letters,” Times Literary Supplement, 11 October 1974: 1128–30
- Meyers, Jeffrey, Edmund Wilson: A Biography, Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1995
- Paul, Sherman, Edmund Wilson: A Study of Literary Vocation in Our Time, Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1965
- Schwartz, Delmore, “The Writing of Edmund Wilson,” Accent 2 (Spring 1942): 177–86
- Wain, John, editor, Edmund Wilson: The Man and His Work, New York: New York University Press, 1978; as An Edmund Wilson Celebration, Oxford: Phaidon, 1978

Wolf, Christa

German, 1929–

The famous “German-German literary debate” (deutschdeutscher Literaturstreit) on the political function of literature was sparked in the Summer of 1990 following the publication of Christa Wolf’s Was bleibt (What remains). The mere fact that a short narrative by a single—though established—author could provoke such a widespread debate involving a substantial number of German intellectuals is a sign of Wolf's importance. The question arose as to whether and to what degree Wolf had supported the East German government and, as a consequence, whether or not her writings should be taken seriously. The debate was an indication of how intellectuals on both sides of the iron curtain found themselves disoriented in the face of German reunification and the termination of the Cold War. Even today, many of these uncertainties remain unresolved, and Wolf continues to symbolize those controversial questions that reach beyond the ethical and aesthetic dimensions of literature and seek instead to find a new direction and orientation in a world where the idea of political utopia has fallen into disrepute. Though Wolf has often been accused of aligning herself with the restrictive socialist government of the GDR, her essayistic writings do contain critical elements which stretched the limits imposed by the censors.

In her early collection of essays, Lesen und Schreiben (1972; The Reader and the Writer), Wolf, a trained Germanist, reflects on the role of literature. The introductory essay, "Lesen und Schreiben" (1968; "Reading and Writing"), explains that the prose genre is in particular danger of becoming obsolete in an ever-changing world filled with scientific innovation, where it is increasingly difficult to reserve time and space for dreams and fantasies, vital for the development of the individual in society. She concludes that the task of the author as individual creator is to support and facilitate the tradition of human interaction by writing prose: "Prose can expand the limits of what we know about ourselves. It keeps alive in us the memory of a future which we cannot disown, on pain of destruction." This memory of a future is what has made Wolf's essayistic writings relevant for political as well as literary debates to this day, well beyond the restrictive label of "GDR literature."

In her detailed essay on the almost forgotten Romanticist, Karoline von Giinderode (1978), Wolf describes Romanticism as a movement of change that reached "a new way of looking at things" by overcoming "dry rationalism." Wolf thus goes beyond describing the problems of a female author in a time of uncertainty and turmoil. "Giinderode's generation, like all who live in transitional periods, had to create new patterns which later generations would use as models, stencils, warnings, slogans, in literature as in life." Wolf identifies with many of the ideas of German Romanticism and considers herself as one of those later generations who would use the patterns developed by the Romantics. Her narrative Kein Ort, Nirgends (1979; No Place on Earth) investigates the lives of Romantic writers including Giinderode and sets up a clear parallel to her own time. This work is a critique of the Enlightenment that deviated from the traditional Marxist-Leninist interpretation of intellectual history. In contrast to the Marxist critique of Romanticism, evident for instance in much of Georg Lukács' writings, Wolf does not consider Romanticism to be an escapist movement leading to irrationalism, decadence, and fascism. Rather, she echoes the disappointment in the "totalitarian" nature of the Enlightenment, as suggested in 1947 by Max Horkheimer and Theodor W. Adorno in their Dialektik der Aufklärung (1947; Dialectic of Enlightenment), though with a different outcome. Wolf describes the writings and the early death of Giinderode—an icon for other Romantics—as a result of the repressive society she had to endure. In light of the expatriation of East German poet Wolf Biermann in 1976 by the GDR government, which Wolf perceived as a serious crisis for the role of the artist in the GDR, her depiction of Giinderode can be seen as Wolf's self-censored but critical assessment of contemporary GDR society.

Wolf's essays also include treatments of various authors from different times, such as Schiller, Georg Buchner, Thomas Mann, Max Frisch, and Anna Seghers, as well as numerous lectures on her own experiences as an author, and even one on psychosomatic medicine. The recent Nazi Germany past, which Wolf experienced as a child, is embedded in many of her essays. When writing on other authors, she is generally more interested in the personal side of their writings, their emotions, and the nuances to be found between the lines, rather than in an abstract interpretation of their works. This approach is reflected in the style of her essays, a unique mixture of contemplation, linguistic force, self-confidence, and questioning, and distinguishes her from other essayists of her time.

Wolf often responds to questions others have posed or are likely to pose, perpetuating a dialogue with society. The most significant example of this tendency can be found in the essays accompanying her successful novel Kassandra (1983; Cassandrd). Despite the somewhat misleading subtitle of the German edition, "Poetik-Vorlesungen" (Lectures on poetics), which suggests normative instructions on writing, Wolf wants her readers to witness the process of reflexive thought that led her to the creation of an aesthetic entity. By allowing the reader to participate in such an intimate process, Wolf retains the Marxist desire to reduce the alienation between art and recipient, as well as between individual and society. It is this keen interest in the individual readers themselves that marks Wolf as an outstanding critic and essayist of this century.

AGNES C.MULLER

Biography

Born 18 March 1929 in Landsberg an der Warthe, Germany (now Gorzow, Poland). Secretary to mayor of Gammelin, 1945–46. Studied at the Universities of Jena and Leipzig, 1949–53, diploma, 1953. Member of the Communist Party, 1949–89 (resigned). Married Gerhard Wolf, 1951: two daughters. Technical assistant, East German Writers' Union, 1953–59; editor, Neue deutsche Literatur, 1958–59; reader for Mitteldeutscher Verlag publishers, Halle, 1959–62, and Verlag Neues Leben, Berlin; resident writer in a freight car manufacturing company, 1959–62; candidate member of central committee, SED, 1963–67. Awards: several, including Heinrich Mann Prize, 1963; National Prize, 1964; Raabe Prize, 1972; Fontane Prize, 1972; Büchner Prize, for essays, 1980; Schiller Prize, 1983. Member, Academy of Arts, Berlin.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Lesen und Schreiben: Aufsätze und Betrachtungen, 1972; as The Reader and the Writer, translated by Joan Becker, 1977

Fortgesetzter Versuch: Aufsätze, Gespräche, Essays, 1979

Lesen und Schreiben: Neue Sammlung, 1980

Voraussetzungen einer Erzählung: Cassandra (includes the novel Cassandra and four lectures on the novel), 1983; as Cassandra: A Novel, and Four Essays, translated by Jan van Heurck, 1984

Die Dimension des Autors: Essays und Aufsätze, Reden und Gespräche, 1959–1985, 2 vols., 1986; part as The Fourth Dimension: Interviews with Christa Wolf, translated by Hilary Pilkington, 1988

The Author's Dimension: Selected Essays, edited by Alexander Stephan, translated by Jan van Heurck, 1993

Auf dem Weg nach Tabou: Texte 1990–1994, 1994

Other writings: seven novels (Nachdenken über Christa T. [The Quest for Christa T.], 1968; Kindheitsmuster [A Model Childhood], 1976; Kein Ort, Nirgends [No Place on Earth], 1979; Kassandra [Cassandra], 1983; Störfall: Nachrichten eines Tages [Accident: A Day's News], 1987; Sommerstück, 1989; Medea, 1996), novellas, and short stories.

Bibliography

Geist, Rosemarie, and Maritta Rost, "Auswahlbibliographie," in Christa Wolf: Ein Arbeitsbuch: Studien-Dokumente-Bibliographie, edited by Angela Drescher, Frankfurt-on-Main: Luchterhand, 1989:415–536

Further Reading

Fries, Marilyn Sibley, editor, Responses to Christa Wolf, Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1989

Kuhn, Anna K., editor, Christa Wolf's Utopian Vision: From Marxism to Feminism, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988

Love, Myra N., Christa Wolf: Literature and the Conscience of History, New York: Lang, 1991

Smith, Colin E., Tradition, Art and Society: Christa Wolf's Prose, Essen: Die Blaue Eule, 1987

Wolfe, Tom

American, 1930–

Tom Wolfe's essays are as flamboyant as his dress. His signature white suits, stepped collar vests, and spats reveal his homage to—and gentle tweaking of—the English Victorian man-of-letters tradition he has elaborated; yet his high-speed, highly exclamatory, exuberantly punctuated writing style marks him all-American and late 20th century. Wolfe is best known as a chronicler of American popular culture, which he renders in a sophisticated essay-and-reportage form he has christened "the New Journalism.” Today he is increasingly recognized, not only as one of America’s leading prose stylists, but as a social critic (and satirist), although he demurs at the latter label.

From the beginning of his newspaper and magazine article writing career, Wolfe’s range has been impressive. He wrote hundreds of traditional feature articles for the Springfield (Massachusetts) Union (1956–59), Washington Post (1959–62), and New York Herald Tribune (1961–66) before a 1963 assignment to cover the California custom car culture for Esquire magazine led to “There Goes (Varoom! Varoom!) That Kandy-Kolored Tangerine-Flake Streamline Baby,” Wolfe’s breakthrough article in his dazzlingly punctuated kinetic style. Since then, he has written profiles of cultural heroes, portraits of cultural lifestyles, travel essays (such as “Las Vegas (What?) Las Vegas (Can’t Hear You! Too Noisy) Las Vegas!!!!,” 1964), and political satire. Wolfe is best understood as a cultural critic. He has made a career of challenging establishment views, of being the bad boy of arts and letters. His early assault on the New Yorker and its venerable former editor, William Shawn, in the 1965 articles “Tiny Mummies” and “Lost in the Whichy Thicket,” occasioned spirited defenses of that magazine. His attacks on the worlds of art and architecture in two book-length essays, The Painted Word (1975) and From Bauhaus to Our House (1981), have stirred similar debates. A wicked phrasemaker, Wolfe has seen his terms “radical chic” and “the right stuff” become part of the cultural landscape, as has his name for the 1970s, “the me decade.” Like Max Beerbohm, Wolfe illustrates many of his essays and has published an entire collection of satirical drawings entitled In Our Time (1980).

Although holding a doctoral degree in American studies from Yale University, Wolfe has eschewed academic writing for the wider, general audience which reads newspapers and popular magazines. This audience has made him a bestselling writer. He was a contributing editor to New York magazine through 1976 and remains to this day a contributing editor to the men’s magazine Esquire. Indeed this graduate of (then) allmale Washington and Lee University in Virginia is most at home celebrating masculine heroes.

The components of Wolfe’s distinctive writing style can be traced to his reading. He borrowed several narrative techniques and his dynamic punctuation from a group of early 20th-century Soviet writers (Evgenii Zamiatin, Boris Pilniak, and the Serapion Brothers), whom he read in translation at Yale. In We (1924), the novel upon which George Orwell based 1984, Zamiatin often breaks off thoughts with a dash in midsentence and uses many exclamation points. This style attempts to imitate the human mind, which operates, not in elegant sentences, but in fragmentary, often emotional, fits and starts. Wolfe’s kinetic style should be seen as his attempt to imitate sensory and cognitive processes—and to decrease the distance between author, reader, and subject. Through frenetic fragments and picturesque punctuation he tries to give readers a vicarious sense of the experience he is re-creating, be it the rush of psychedelic drugs (The Electric Kool-Aid Acid Test, 1968), or supersonic space travel (The Right Stuff, 1979). This highly sensory style matches best with highly sensory subjects.

Wolfe joined these narrative techniques with others gleaned from fellow New York journalists in the early 1960s. His 1973 anthology The New Journalism, which argues that the New Journalism “can no longer be ignored in an artistic sense,” identifies four traits which characterize the form: scene-by-scene construction; dialogue in full; third-person point of view; and the detailing of status life. Wolfe acknowledges that he learned to write scenes from Gay Talese and dialogue from Jimmy Breslin. His penchant for what he calls “status detail” can be traced to Honoré de Balzac, who enjoyed dropping the names of furniture into his novels. Social status and social humiliation are prominent themes in Wolfe’s writings; his brilliant capturing of details of dress and decor allows him to pinpoint his subjects precisely in the social strata.

Wolfe’s most original stylistic trait, however, is his extension of Henry James’ notions of point of view. Wolfe acknowledges that he tries to create his scenes from a triple perspective: the subject’s point of view, that of other people watching, and his own. His technical virtuosity in shifting among these conflicting perspectives, often from sentence to sentence, adds to the postmodern zest of his writing. No essayist switches point of view more rapidly than Wolfe. However, this rapidfire multiple perspective carries with it certain risks. It tends to frustrate readers seeking to isolate Wolfe’s own view of his subjects. Wolfe relishes this confusion. As John Hellmann (1981) has noted, Wolfe’s “insistent choices of hyperbolic, kinetic, or baroque words and phrases make his descriptions as much an assault as a representation... These stylistic traits work like those of the cubists to break up the reader’s usual modes of perception.”

Wolfe does, however, possess a social vision. He was raised in the Presbyterian Church, and uniting all his work is his lament for waning Protestant morality (The Right [eous] Stuff), and his implicit call for its renewal. Wolfe’s inspired transformation of that oldest of American literary forms, the Puritan sermon, into Menippean satire represents an intelligent man’s recognition of the unpopularity of his old-fangled, Calvinistic views were he to express them forthrightly in his own voice in the traditional forms of the formal or familiar essay. Let the bonfire of vanities burn, Wolfe cries instead, for he is an American jeremiah in camouflage, both criticizing vice and encouraging American expansion and revolution toward grace.

BARBARA LOUNSBERRY

Biography

Thomas Kennerly Wolfe, Jr. Born 2 March 1930 in Richmond, Virginia. Studied at Washington and Lee University, Lexington, Virginia, A.B. (cum laude), 1951; Yale University, New Haven, Connecticut, Ph.D., 1957. Wrote for the Springfield Union, Massachusetts, 1956–59, Washington Post, 1959–62, New York Herald Tribune, 1962–66, and New York World Journal Tribune, 1966–67; contributing artist, Harper’s, 1978–81. Married Sheila Berger, 1978: one daughter and one son. Awards: several, including the American Book Award, 1980; National Book Critics Circle Award, 1980; Columbia/Columbus Award, for journalism, 1980; John Dos Passos Award, 1984; President Award, 1993; honorary degrees from 11 universities.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

The Kandy-Kolored Tangerine-Flake Streamline Baby, 1965

The Pump House Gang, 1968; as The Mid-Atlantic Man and Other New Breeds in England and America, 1969

The Electric Kool-Aid Acid Test, 1968

Radical Chic & Mau-Mauing the Flak Catchers, 1970

The Painted Word, 1975

Mauve Gloves and Madmen, Clutter and Vine, and Other Stories, 1976

The Right Stuff, 1979

From Bauhaus to Our House, 1981

The Purple Decades: A Reader, 1982

Other writings: the novel The Bonfire of the Vanities (1987) and the collection of drawings In Our Time (1980). Also edited the anthology The New Journalism (1973).

Further Reading

Anderson, Chris, "Tom Wolfe: Pushing the Outside of the Envelope," in his Style as Argument: Contemporary American Nonfiction, Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1987: 8–47

Cohen, Ed, "Tom Wolfe and the Truth Monitors: A Historical Fable," Clio 16 (Fall 1986): 1–11

Dundy, Elaine, "Tom Wolfe... But Exactly, Yes!," Vogue, 15 April 1966:124, 152–55

Gilder, Joshua, "Creators on Creating: Tom Wolfe," Saturday Review, April 1981:40, 42–44

Hellmann, John, "Reporting the Fabulous: Representation and Response in the Work of Tom Wolfe," in his Fables of Fact: The New Journalism as New Fiction, Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1981:101–25

Hollowell, John, "Life in Edge City: Wolfe's New Journalism," in his Fact & Fiction: The New Journalism and the Nonfiction Novel, Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1977: 126–46

Kallan, Richard A., "Tom Wolfe," in A Sourcebook of American Literary Journalism: Representative Writers in an Emerging Genre, edited by Thomas B. Connery, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1992

Lounsbury, Barbara, "Tom Wolfe's Negative Vision," South Dakota Review 20 (Summer 1982):15–31

Lounsbury, Barbara, "Tom Wolfe's American Jeremiad," in her The Art of Fact: Contemporary Artists of Nonfiction, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1990:37–64

Macdonald, Dwight, "Parajournalism, or Tom Wolfe and His Magic Writing Machine," New York Review of Books, 26 August 1965: 3–5

Macdonald, Dwight, "Parajournalism II: Wolfe and The New Yorker," New York Review of Books, 3 February 1966:18–24

Sheed, Wilfrid, "A Fun-House Mirror," New York Times Book Review, 3 December 1972:2, 10

Stull, James N., "The Cultural Gamesmanship of Tom Wolfe," Journal of American Culture 14 (Fall 1991):25–30

Weber, Ronald, "Subjective Reality and Saturation Reporting," in his The Literature of Fact: Literary Nonfiction in American Writing, Athens: Ohio University Press, 1980:89–110

Zavarzadeh, Mas'ud, "The Contingent Donnée: The Testimonial Nonfiction Novel," in his The Mythopoeic Reality: The Postwar American Nonfiction Novel, Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1976:131–53

Wollstonecraft, Mary

British, 1759–1797

Author prior to 1790 only of a conventional work in the conduct book genre and a semi-confessional novel, Wollstonecraft's practice as a reviewer for the Analytical Review prepared her entry into the male arena of political debate with A Vindication of the Rights of Men (1790), one of the earliest replies to Edmund Burke's Reflections on the Revolution in France (1790). This polemical essay, largely a personal attack on Burke despite its claim to offer a reasoned critique (and thus succumbing to the same emotionalism and rhetorical excess it condemns in his text), is of interest mainly in so far as it anticipates the sociopolitical analysis of the more famous A Vindication of the Rights of Woman (1792) that followed.

Addressing herself to middle-class women as those most susceptible to reformation, Wollstonecraft sets out in the Rights of Woman to inspire a "revolution in female manners" and to attack justifications of women's subordinate status whether biblically derived or in the more insidious contemporary form of a Rousseauvian eroticized idealization of feminine submissiveness. Wollstonecraft bases her defense of women's rights on the claim that women like men were created free moral agents endowed with reason. Their inferiority and subordinate status are neither natural nor divinely ordained but a product of social conditioning. While conceding that women in their present state are inferior to men—indeed, reduced to "a state of degradation"—Wollstonecraft blames it on a misconceived education that prepares girls to become the objects of male desire rather than independent rational beings fit for their vital moral and social role as mothers. Rational education is therefore the primary and most urgently needed right she claims for women. (Her more radical claims—the rights to political representation and economic independence through work outside the home—are buried in the final chapters.) In condemning the infantilization of middle-class and aristocratic women and in adumbrating the vices produced by dependence, miseducation, and the overdevelopment of sensibility at the expense of reason, Wollstonecraft does not herself entirely avoid the misogyny she is attempting to combat. Her anger is directed as much at women (whom she condemns for colluding in their own oppression) as at their oppressors. Her stress on maternal duty combined with her attack on romantic love (informed by an awareness of its role in disguising women's subordinate status) lead her, as modern critics have noted, to deny women's sexual needs. While attempting to free women from the influence of writers like Rousseau who have made them "objects of pity," Wollstonecraft offers as sternly puritanical a message as any conduct book.

Digressive, repetitive, and rambling in organization, the Rights of Woman is not always easy reading. At its best it has an urgent energy and incisiveness, but it often declines into sermon or harangue. However, despite its undeniable flaws and limitations, it remains a work of major significance as the first feminist manifesto, far ahead of its time in its political and psychological insights and its call for the moral, intellectual, and economic autonomy of women.

While her two-year stay in France led to An Historical and Moral View of the Origin and Progress of the French Revolution (1794), a defense of the Revolution despite the excesses of the Terror, it was a Scandinavian journey that inspired the work which, after the Rights of Woman, is Wollstonecraft's best claim to interest the modern reader: Letters Written During a Short Residence in Sweden, Norway, and Denmark (1796). Often characterized as an odd mix of genres, combining elements of the tour, the epistolary novel, and the confession, it is precisely through its elision of generic boundaries that A Short Residence has survived. Presented in the guise of letters to an unnamed but clearly faithless lover (Gilbert Imlay, whose legal interests Wollstonecraft was representing in a Norwegian court case), the book is a series of essays in miniature, linked by the journey narrative and moving easily from the experiences of the day to the larger concerns that preoccupy the writer. Permitting the combination of social analysis and subjective response, moral reflection and personal revelation, inviting the associative and the spontaneous as principles of composition, the travel genre and epistolary form gave free play to Wollstonecraft's talents and interests, liberating her from the constraints of the masculine political discourse she had sought with only partial success to emulate in her polemical writings. The situation of deserted mother and infant daughter caught the sympathy of contemporary readers while coloring both Wollstonecraft's observation of Scandinavian society and her descriptions of the Northern landscape. It was this latter aspect, as well as the novelty of an account of a region hitherto unexplored in the travel literature of the period, that captivated William Godwin, William Wordsworth, and Robert Southey and influenced Samuel Taylor Coleridge's "Kubla Khan" (wr. 1797, pub. 1816). While often couched in the conventional language of the sublime, at its best Wollstonecraft's attempt to convey the "romantic" character of the landscape blends observation and introspection in a manner that anticipates the Romantic exploration of self and nature.

A Short Residence was in some sense her personal vindication, not only in its self-justifying declarations of virtuous love and maternal duty as she tries to come to terms with her situation as cast-off mistress and single mother, but in its selfportrait of a woman who can ask "men's questions" while revealing a mother's tenderness, who has eschewed the conditioned frailty of her sex (so vigorously denounced in the Rights of Woman) and its concomitant need for protection, while retaining a feminine sensibility and refinement. That this independence has not freed her from emotional need becomes increasingly evident in the final letters and the abrupt and desperate ending.

Despite the recognition she achieved with these two works, Wollstonecraft's untimely death in childbirth and the subsequent publication of Godwin's ill-judged revelations of her life effectively curtailed any influence she might have had upon her contemporaries as writer or analyst. But the re-examination of her work in recent decades has not only established her as a significant figure in her time, it has also contributed importantly to new ways of viewing that era.

ANN PEARSON

Biography

Born 27 April 1759 in London. Lived in Beverley, Yorkshire, 1768–73, London, 1774–75 and 1777, and Laugharne, Wales, 1776. Paid companion, Bath, 1778–80; ran, with her sisters and a friend, a school in Islington, then Newington Green, London, 1784–86; governess in Mitchelstown, County Cork, 1786–87. Translator and reader for the radical publisher Joseph Johnson, and reviewer and editorial assistant for his journal the Analytical Review, London, 1787–92 and 1797. Lived in France, reporting on the French Revolution, 1792–95. Liaison with Gilbert Imlay, 1793–95: one daughter. Traveled in Scandinavia, 1795, then returned to England. Married William Godwin, 1797: one daughter (the writer Mary Shelley). Died (of septicemia after childbirth) in London, 10 September 1797.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

A Vindication of the Rights of Men, 1790; revised edition, 1790; facsimile reprint, 1960; edited by Sylvana Tomaselli, with A Vindication of the Rights of Woman, 1995

A Vindication of the Rights of Woman, 1792; revised edition, 1792; edited by Charles W. Hageman, Jr., 1967, Gina Luria, 1974, Miriam Brody Kramnick, 1975, Carol H. Poston, 1975, Ulrich H. Hardt, 1982, Mary Warnock, with The Subjection of Women by John Stuart Mill, 1986, Ashley Tauchert, 1995, and Sylvana Tomaselli, with A Vindication of the Rights of Men, 1995

Letters Written During a Short Residence in Sweden, Norway, and Denmark, 1796; edited by Carol H. Poston, 1976; as A Short Residence in Sweden, Norway, and Denmark, edited by Richard Holmes, 1987

Other writings: two novels, the polemical work Thoughts on the Education of Daughters (1787), a book about the French Revolution (1794), and correspondence.

Collected works edition: Works, edited by Janet Todd and Marilyn Butler, 7 vols., 1989.

Bibliography

Todd, Janet, Mary Wollstonecraft: An Annotated Bibliography, New York: Garland, 1976

Further Reading

- Alexander, Meena, Women in Romanticism: Mary Wollstonecraft, Dorothy Wordsworth and Mary Shelley, Basingstoke: Macmillan, and Savage, Maryland: Barnes and Noble, 1989
- Conger, Syndy McMillen, Mary Wollstonecraft and the Language of Sensibility, Rutherford, New Jersey: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1994
- Cox, Stephen, "Sensibility as Argument," in Sensibility in Transformation: Creative Resistance to Sentiment from the Augustans to the Romantics, edited by Syndy McMillen Conger, Rutherford, New Jersey: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1990
- Finke, Laurie A., "A Philosophic Wanton: Language and Authority in Wollstonecraft's A Vindication of the Rights of Woman," in The Philosopher as Writer: The Eighteenth Century, edited by Robert Ginsberg, Selinsgrove, Pennsylvania: Susquehanna University Press, 1987
- Ellison, Julie, "Redoubled Feeling: Politics, Sentiment, and the Sublime in Williams and Wollstonecraft," Studies in Eighteenth-Century Culture 20 (1990):197-215
- Ferguson, Moira, and Janet Todd, Mary Wollstonecraft, Boston: Twayne, 1984
- Guralnick, E.S., "Rhetorical Strategy in Mary Wollstonecraft's A Vindication of the Rights of Woman," Humanities Association Review 30, no. 3 (1989):174-85
- Jones, Vivien, "Women Writing Revolution: Narratives of History and Sexuality in Wollstonecraft and Williams," in Beyond Romanticism: New Approaches to Texts and Contexts 1780-1832, edited by Stephen Copley and John Whale, London and New York: Routledge, 1992
- Kaplan, Cora, "Pandora's Box: Subjectivity, Class, and Sexuality in Socialist Feminist Criticism," in Making a Difference: Feminist Literary Criticism, edited by Gayle Green and Coppelia Kahn, London and New York: Methuen, 1985
- Kelly, Gary, Revolutionary Feminism: The Mind and Career of Mary Wollstonecraft, London: Macmillan, and New York: St. Martin's Press, 1992
- Moore, Jane, "Plagiarism with a Difference: Subjectivity in 'Kubla Khan' and Letters Written During a Short Residence in Sweden, Norway, and Denmark," in Beyond Romanticism: New Approaches to Texts and Contexts 1780-1832, edited by Stephen Copley and John Whale, London and New York: Routledge, 1992
- Myers, Mitzi, "Mary Wollstonecraft's Letters Written...in Sweden: Toward Romantic Autobiography," Studies in Eighteenth-century Culture 8 (1979):165-85
- Parks, George B., "The Turn to the Romantic in the Travel Literature of the Eighteenth Century," Modern Language Quarterly 25 (1964):22-33
- Poovey, Mary, The Proper Lady and the Woman Writer: Ideology as Style in the Works of Mary Wollstonecraft, Mary Shelley, and Jane Austen, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1984
- Wilson, Anna, "Mary Wollstonecraft and the Search for the Radical Woman," Genders 6 (1989):88-101
- Yaeger, Patricia, Honey-Mad Women: Emancipatory Strategies in Women's Writing, New York: Columbia University Press, 1988

Woolf, Virginia

British, 1882–1941

Virginia Woolf's output as an essayist was prodigious: in addition to two lengthy feminist monographs, she produced over 500 pamphlets, articles, reviews, and notices. The breadth and variety of her essays are likewise impressive, expanding well beyond the literary review-essay to encompass travel essays, autobiography, art reviews (on drama, painting, film, and photography), and commentaries on aspects of culture and society—even extending to cookery. The new critical attention being given to Woolf's essays and the increasing tendency to read them in relation to one another (stimulated both by Andrew McNeillie's publication of the complete essays and by a general resurgence of interest in nonfictional forms) is contributing to the ongoing revision of earlier constructions of Woolf as a Modernist confined to subjective reality and aesthetic form. While evidencing Woolf's abiding interest in the issues of writing, reading, and publication, the essays reveal an approach that is firmly grounded in a recognition of social, material, and historical contexts.

Woolf's career as an essayist was established primarily in the Times Literary Supplement and consolidated through the two volumes of The Common Reader published by the Hogarth Press in 1925 and 1932. While contributing as well to periodicals aimed at a more select and literary audience such as T.S.Eliot's Criterion—Woolf also published in more popular journals such as Vogue and the Atlantic Monthly, and in the feminist weeklies Woman's Leader and the Common Cause and Time and Tide. The diverse audience she thus addressed has an important bearing on Woolf's style as an essayist; as she herself wrote, writer and reader are bound together in a collaborative and symbiotic relation: “twins indeed, one dying if the other dies, one flourishing if the other flourishes” (“The Patron and the Crocus,” 1924). The reader in her text is well read and literate but not necessarily of the educated or privileged class; if the letters she received from individual readers are indicative of her general audience, she was read not only by members of the male establishment but by students, aspiring writers, housewives (particularly wives of academics), school teachers, and members of the working class (including at least one bus conductor).

Addressing herself to such a large “patronage,” Woolf separates herself from the increasingly professionalized character of English studies and reaches beyond the male upper-class literati. Nevertheless, she expects a high intellectual level in her readership. Her French remains untranslated; she assumes a broad cultural and historical knowledge and a familiarity with the texts she discusses. However, such assumptions of knowledge are unlikely to block an understanding of her essays; meanings are contextually lucid and the presumed familiarity with the subject simply allows her to leap immediately to a level of provocative ideas which can serve as either foreword or afterword to a reading of the text.

Woolf's self-identification as a “common reader” and her assumption of an informed but nonspecialist audience are reflected in connections between her style and that of the familiar essay. Her vocabulary, while extensive, is never obscure or uncommon: the essay, she writes, is the form of literature “which least calls for the use of long words” (“The Modern Essay,” 1922). Her reader is directly addressed, in a conversational tone: “Let us watch Miss Frend trotting along the Strand with her father” (“Lives of the Obscure,” 1924). Her ideas develop frequently through narrative and metaphor: Defoe presents us with “a plain earthenware pot” (“Robinson Crusoe,” 1926); Addison, with “pure silver” (“Addison,” 1919). Mrs. Carlyle’s letters emit a “crooning domestic sound like the purring of a kitten or the humming of a tea-kettle” (“Geraldine and Jane,” 1929). Unlike the formalist critic, Woolf rarely quotes from her reading; furthermore, when she does provide quotations, it is to present the text in its own voice, rather than to pursue detailed textual analysis.

These stylistic elements help to produce the normal speaking voice of the familiar essay, as opposed to the authoritative voice of the formal essay. This personal voice enables an approach, like that of the familiar essay, that is speculative and open-ended rather than definitive and conclusive. But Woolf’s characteristic handling of multiple viewpoints is complex and challenging, figured in skillful ironies and subtle shifts in discourse and in voice. She does not employ the direct confrontation of argument but instead leads the reader to “inhabit” differing points of view. The resemblance of this style to the discourse of the “proper lady” has led some critics to dismiss the seriousness of the essays, citing Woolf’s own reservations about the “Victorian game of manners” (“A Sketch of the Past,” wr. 1939–40, pub. 1976). Recent readings, however, tend to emphasize the dialogic nature of Woolf’s style and its subversive and revisionary effect. Instead of adopting a stable point of view, the essays enact a continual questioning of opinion, in a manner which Woolf once referred to as her “turn & turn about method” (Diary II, 13 June 1923). By emphasizing such rhetorical twists, critics now propose that Woolf foregrounds the ideological assumptions that underlie any construction of “knowledge.” She is thus seen to be as concerned with the process of interpreting as she is with interpretations. Her Modernism is still linked to subjectivity; the difference is that instead of identifying Woolf with an ahistorical and aestheticized approach to reality, most critics now see her as engaged with the social and political implications of attitudes and beliefs. As a woman, she is seen to use her perspective as an outsider to critique the assumptions underlying the dominant patriarchal ideologies of her time; in a broader sense, she can be seen to situate all views in terms of their historical, national, or gendered contexts.

Given Woolf’s foregrounding of the problematic nature of knowledge, it is not surprising that the essayist with whom she appears to be aligned most sympathetically is Montaigne. Woolf celebrates his multiplicity, his contradictoriness, his provisionality, his inconclusiveness; adopting his own travel metaphor, she describes his focus on the process of his thinking in a way that could describe her own essays: “the journey is everything” (“Montaigne,” 1924). But whereas Woolf is drawn to Montaigne’s self-positioning and self-questioning, encapsulated in his question “Que scais-je?,” her style is informed as well by her interest in more overtly dramatized forms, from the Platonic dialogues (“Art and Life,” 1909; “On Not Knowing Greek,” 1925), to Walter Landor’s Imaginary Conversations (“Landor in Little,” 1919), or George Moore’s reconstructed conversations with Mr. Gosse or Mr. Balderston (“Winged Phrases,” 1919). Noting, however, that these dialogues are often, in effect, situated within the one voice, Woolf herself sought a more oppositional and contestatory form and experimented in dramatizing strongly divergent points of view (“Mr. Conrad: A Conversation,” 1923). While ultimately rejecting fictionalized debates because too much of the essay had to be devoted to the creation of characters, she nevertheless frames her essays around oppositional views, often installing the dominant or conventional view and then proceeding, through a dialogic process, to position and examine it. Again recalling Montaigne, these shifts produce a structure of rambling circularity as opposed to the logical linearity of the dominant Western rhetorical mode.

But while Woolf’s style has much in common with the familiar essay, her essays do not fit easily into any category. It may be best to regard them as a hybrid form, as befitting a writer who did not herself believe in discrete genres. On the one hand, her style is informed by the “great tradition” of canonical prose writers, with affinities to such writers as Johnson, Hazlitt, Lamb, De Quincey, and Pater, in addition to Montaigne. On the other hand, Woolf’s essays are equally consanguineous with the alternative tradition of diaries, letters, and memoirs which women had used to record their thoughts.

There is another interesting “split” in her writing that is perhaps even more significant. While her commitment to a common readership and her rejection of an authoritative voice link her essays in style and approach to the familiar essay and forms of everyday writing, the literary issues that she addresses connect her essays in content with the academic professional article beginning to emerge. Her discussions of specific writers are framed by larger academic questions about the significance of tradition, the standards used to interpret and evaluate it, and the assumptions encoded in these standards. She addresses problems concerning the inclusion or exclusion of non-canonical works, the effect on a writer of outer circumstances, and the relation between writer and audience. But though Woolf’s approach to these issues is as compelling as Eliot’s, her manner of writing was overshadowed by Eliot’s impersonal and doctrinal discourse, which came to exert a strong formative influence on the academic article in English studies. Thus in the years after her death, despite the attention she herself devoted to lost or forgotten works of literature, her own essays suffered the fate of being marginalized themselves.

The situation at the end of the century has substantially reversed, and Woolf’s essays tend to attract more attention now than Eliot’s. In this light, it is salutary to recall the strongly positive reception of Woolf’s essays by her contemporaries, many of whom considered them to be her finest work. Reviewers praised her combination of “historical sense” with “wideness of sympathy,” of “keen analysis” with a “synthesizing humanity,” of “the science of criticism” with “the insight of the novelist.” All of these comments testify to Woolf’s ability to integrate the intellectual and the personal, but it was Olive Heseltine in the Daily News (4 August 1925) who most evocatively captured this strength: in an appropriately Woolfian image, Heseltine summed up The Common Reader as “a marriage of true minds consummated between a wood nymph and a don.”

MELBA CUDDY-KEANE

Biography

Daughter of the writer Leslie Stephen. Born 25 January 1882. in London. No formal education; studied privately. Lived in Bloomsbury, London, 1904–15 and 1924–39, Richmond, Surrey, 1915–24, and maintained Monks House, Rodmell, near Lewes, Sussex, 1919–41. Published some 500 essays in periodicals and collections, beginning 1905. Associated with a group later known as the Bloomsbury Group, which included writers E.M.Forster and Lytton Strachey, painters Vanessa Bell (her sister) and Duncan Grant, economist John Maynard Keynes, art critic Roger Fry, and others. Married the writer Leonard Woolf, 1912. Founder, with Leonard Woolf, Hogarth Press, Richmond, Surrey, later London, from 1917. Awards: Femina-Vie Heureuse Prize, 1928. Subject to mental breakdowns throughout her life. Died (suicide by drowning) in Rodmell, 28 March 1941.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

The Common Reader, 1925; edited by Andrew McNeillie, 1984

A Room of One's Own, 1929

The Common Reader, second series, 1932; U.S. publication as The Second Common Reader, 1932; edited by Andrew McNeillie, 1986

Three Guineas, 1938

The Death of the Moth and Other Essays, 1942

The Moment and Other Essays, 1947

The Captain's Death Bed and Other Essays, 1950

Granite and Rainbow, 1958

Contemporary Writers, edited by Jean Guiguet, 1965

Collected Essays, edited by Leonard Woolf, 4 vols., 1966–67

Moments of Being: Unpublished Autobiographical Writings, edited by Jeanne Schulkind, 1976

Books and Portraits: Some Further Selections from the Literary and Biographical Writings, edited by Mary Lyon, 1977

Women and Writing, edited by Michèle Barrett, 1979

The Essays, edited by Andrew McNeillie, 4 vols., 1986–94 (in progress)

A Woman's Essays: Selected Essays, vol. 1, edited by Rachel Bowlby, 1992

The Crowded Dance of Modern Life: Selected Essays, vol. 2, edited by Rachel Bowlby, 1993

Other writings: nine novels (The Voyage Out, 1915, revised edition, 1920; Night and Day, 1919; Jacob's Room, 1922; Mrs. Dalloway, 1925; To the Lighthouse, 1927; Orlando, 1928; The Waves, 1931; The Years, 1937; Between the Acts, 1941), short stories, a biography of Roger Fry, six volumes of correspondence, five volumes of diaries, and journals. Also translated Dostoevskii and Tolstoi.

Bibliographies

- Kirkpatrick, Brownlee Jean, A Bibliography of Virginia Woolf, London: Hart-Davis, 1957; revised edition, 1967; 2nd revised edition, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1980; 3rd revised edition, forthcoming
- McNeillie, Andrew, An Annotated Critical Bibliography of Virginia Woolf, Totowa, New Jersey: Barnes and Noble, 1983
- Majumdar, Robin, Virginia Woolf: An Annotated Bibliography of Criticism, 1915–1974, New York: Garland, 1976
- Rice, Thomas Jackson, Virginia Woolf: A Guide to Research, New York: Garland, 1984

Further Reading

- Bishop, Edward, "The Essays: The Subversive Process of Metaphor," in his Virginia Woolf, London: Macmillan, 1991: 67–78
- Brewster, Dorothy, "The Uncommon Reader as Critic," in her Virginia Woolf, New York: New York University Press, 1962; London: Allen and Unwin, 1963
- Caughie, Pamela, "Virginia Woolf as Critic," in her Virginia Woolf and Postmodernism: Literature in Quest and Question of Itself, Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1991:169–93
- Cuddy-Keane, Melba, "The Rhetoric of Feminist Conversation: Virginia Woolf and the Trope of the Twist," in Ambiguous Discourse: Feminist Narratology and British Women Writers, edited by Kathy Mezei, Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1996:137–61
- Delord, J., "Virginia Woolf's Critical Essays," Revue des Langues Vivantes 29 (1963)
- Dusinberre, Julie, "Virginia Woolf and Montaigne," Textual Practice 5 (1991):219–41
- Fernald, Anne, "A Room of One's Own, Personal Criticism, and the Essay," Twentieth Century Literature 40 (Summer 1994): 165–89
- Goldman, Mark, Virginia Woolf as a Literary Critic, The Hague: Mouton, 1976
- Good, Graham, "Virginia Woolf: Angles of Vision," in his The Observing Self: Rediscovering the Essay, London: Routledge, 1988:112–34
- Johnson, Georgia, "The Whole Achievement in Virginia Woolf's The Common Reader," in Essays on the Essay: Redefining the Genre, edited by Alexander J. Butrym, Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1989
- Kronenberger, Louis, "Virginia Woolf as Critic," in The Republic of Letters: Essays on Various Writers, New York: Knopf, 1955
- Meisel, Perry, The Absent Father: Virginia Woolf and Walter Pater, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1980
- Pacey, Desmond, "Virginia Woolf as a Literary Critic," University of Toronto Quarterly 18 (April 1948):234–44
- Richter, Harvena, "Hunting the Moth: Virginia Woolf and the Creative Imagination," in Virginia Woolf: Revaluation and Continuity, edited by Ralph Freedman, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1980
- Rosenberg, Beth Carole, Virginia Woolf and Samuel Johnson: Common Readers, New York: St. Martin's Press, 1995
- Sharma, Vijay L., Virginia Woolf as Literary Critic: A Revaluation, New Delhi: Arnold-

Heinemann, 1977

Steele, Elizabeth, Virginia Woolfs Literary Sources and Allusions: A Guide to the Essays, New York: Garland, 1983

Steele, Elizabeth, Virginia Woolfs Rediscovered Essays: Sources and Allusions, New York: Garland, 1987

Wellek, René, "Virginia Woolf as Critic," Southern Review 13 (1977):419–37

Wright, Judith

Australian, 1915–

Judith Wright has long been recognized as an outstanding modern Australian poet; she can also be claimed as the leading woman of letters of her time. Her work as an essayist is a major contribution to the understanding of Australian culture.

Wright's first full-length collection, Preoccupations in Australian Poetry (1965), is devoted to the main figures in Australian poetry from colonial times to the 1950s, with most attention focused on Charles Harpur, Henry Kendall, Adam Lindsay Gordon, Barcroft Boake, Christopher Brennan, Hugh McCrae, John Shaw Neilson, Kenneth Slessor, R.D. FitzGerald, James McAuley, and A.D.Hope. There had been earlier survey histories and articles on Australian poetry, but no poet before Wright had turned to the Australian theme with such intense commitment. She was the first modern poet to write with passionate engagement about the colonial poets; she stimulated a whole new generation to look in depth at the work of Harpur and Neilson and to reread and write Australia afresh.

Preoccupations sprang out of her acute consciousness of what she called "Australia's double aspect." In these essays she was moved to explore ways in which "a society of transplanted Europeans in a new country started to make their separate contribution in the world." She examines the ways in which Australian poets coped with the problems facing them in their time and place, in relation to both their own country and its emergence into nationhood, and the main stream of Western thought and writing. She shows, for instance, how Charles Harpur was influenced by Wordsworth, what Kendall owed to Harpur, and the growth and meaning of the bush in Australian writing. Her opinions are subtle, forceful, and pointed: "Kendall...is not the 'first Australian poet'...but the poet of his own desperate struggle and final self mastery"; O'Dowd "gives no hint of possessing a pair of eyes." She notes in McCrae "an inability to grow beyond his own youth"; and of poets before Brennan, "their Australianism was inescapable, a straitjacket." Each essay is full of sharp particular judgments and probing insights.

Wright explores two impulses in early Australian writing and experience. One sees Australia as a place of exile, remote from the old world and the source countries from which Australians have come; the other sees it as a land of opportunity for the development of a radically new kind of society. No other book on Australian poetry has covered so much so fully in so concentrated a space. Wright believes that "the true function of art and culture is to interpret us to ourselves, and to relate us to the country and the society in which we live.” Since Preoccupations was published, much more scholarly work has appeared on all the poets dealt with, and a whole new generation of poets of the quality and variety of Les Murray, Geoffrey Lehmann, and Kevin Hart has emerged, but it is not the kind of book that can be superseded.

As a leading poet and intellectual, Wright was frequently asked to lecture, and in 1975 she collected her addresses and speeches in Because I Was Invited. She returns again and again to the poets who have most engaged her—Harpur, Brennan, and Neilson—but ranges widely from Australian poetry after Pearl Harbor to the voices of Aboriginal poets. There are also essays on the teaching of poetry in which Wright criticizes universities and schools for their failure or inability to introduce students to the pleasures of the poetic text.

Wright believes the poet should be concerned with national and social problems. Her urgent commitment to questions of ecology and conservation and the questions of Aboriginal Australia and the need for a land treaty have been the focus of her most recent concerns. New ways of reading the past and a fuller understanding of Aboriginal Australia are important aspects of present-day culture: Judith Wright's essays have been at the forefront of its development.

VIVIAN SMITH

Biography

Judith Arundell Wright. Born 31 May 1915 in Armidale, New South Wales. Studied at Sydney University, from 1934. Traveled in Britain and Europe, 1937–38. Secretary and clerk, 1938–44; university statistician, University of Queensland, St. Lucia, 1944–48. Married J.P. McKinney (died, 1966): one daughter. Commonwealth Literary Fund Lecturer, Australia, 1949 and 1962; Honors Tutor in English, University of Queensland, 1967. Began fight to conserve the Great Barrier Reef, 1967, and continued conservation campaign work. Member, Australia Council, 1973–74. Awards: several fellowships; Grace Leven Prize, 1950, 1972; Australia-Britannica Award, 1964; Robert Frost Memorial Award, 1977; Australian World Prize, 1984; Queen's Medal for Poetry, 1992; honorary degrees from seven universities.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Charles Harpur, 1963

Preoccupations in Australian Poetry, 1965

Henry Lawson, 1967

Because I Was Invited, 1975

The Coral Battleground, 1977

The Cry for the Dead, 1981

We Call for a Treaty, 1985

Born of the Conquerors: Selected Essays, 1991

Going on Talking, 1992

Other writings: many collections of poetry, a collection of short stories, and books for children.

Bibliography

Walker, Shirley, Judith Wright, Melbourne: Oxford University Press, 1981

Further Reading

Strauss, Jennifer, Judith Wright, Melbourne: Oxford University Press, 1995

Thomson, A.K., editor, Critical Essays on Judith Wright, Brisbane: Jacaranda, 1968

Walker, Shirley, Flame and Shadow: A Study of Judith Wright's Poetry, St. Lucia: University of Queensland Press, 1991

This page intentionally left blank.

Y

Yeats, William Butler

Irish, 1865–1939

William Butler Yeats, though best known for his poems and plays, composed a significant body of essays and reviews illuminating his own work by applying his views concerning appropriate literary content and style to the work of other writers. His reviews cover half a century, beginning with a review of “The Poetry of Sir Samuel Ferguson” (1886) and concluding with one of “Poems: by Margot Ruddock with Prefatory Notes on the Author” (1936). They promoted Irish nationalism, the development of an Irish national theater, and the use of Irish folklore to develop a new and vigorous symbolism, among other subjects.

The essays primarily offer an expanded discussion of the attitudes found in his reviews, particularly the relationship Yeats felt existed between the supernatural or occult and literary symbolism. His essay “Magic” (1901) describes his participation in seances, and his belief that he could send and receive images telepathically. This ability, he felt, existed because all people are linked through the supernatural. He had briefly described a seance in “Invoking the Irish Fairies” (1892) to suggest that folklore was not just imaginative, but reflective of a storyteller’s connection to the occult. In “Symbolism in Painting” (1898) and the companion essay “The Symbolism of Poetry” (1900), he uses Jungian concepts of archetypes to explain why great poets and painters use symbols that have nearly universal effectiveness. He states in “The Philosophy of Shelley’s Poetry” (1900) that any writer sensitive to the supernatural will share “the sudden conviction that our little memories are but a part of some great Memory that renews the world and men’s thoughts age after age, and that our thoughts are not, as we suppose, the deep, but a little foam upon the deep.” The connection between artist and audience that makes symbolism resonate is explained, to Yeats, by our common link to the supernatural, not by genetics or other scientifically explainable means.

Yeats therefore preferred the Romantics and the symbolist writers to the Victorians, arguing in “The Symbolism of Poetry” that Tennyson was hobbled by “brooding over scientific opinion.” The Romantics, with their emphasis on nature for inspiration, were more sensitive to the occult forces that Yeats associated with forests, lakes, and other natural settings. He particularly admired Shelley and Blake, the latter as much for his painting as for his poetry. Shelley is a central example in “The Symbolism of Poetry,” as well as the focus of “The Philosophy of Shelley’s Poetry” and “Prometheus Unbound” (1932). Blake is examined in detail in “William Blake and the Imagination” (1897) and “William Blake and His Illustrations to The Divine Comedy” (1924). Blake also provides frequent illustrations for Yeats in many of his shorter reviews. Yeats credits both poets with forming their own mythology, and, as poet-philosophers, using this myth to explain matters gained through intuition, not taught through science. In “William Blake and the Imagination” he describes Blake as “a man crying out for a mythology, and trying to make one because he could not find one to his hand.” Yeats, of course, would also create his own mythology to provide a context for his symbols.

Among his contemporaries, Yeats most admired the symbolists and the Irish writers who were attempting to use Irish folklore to provide texture to their narrative poems. In “The Celtic Element in Literature” (1902) he associates folklore with an appreciation of nature. He argues that people close to nature are always aware of the supernatural, whereas people who rely on science and technology and live huddled in cities have lost their awareness of the occult. He credits the works of Standish O’Grady with first showing him how Irish folklore was a rich vein for inspiration. He describes in “A General Introduction for My Work” (1937) first discovering O’Grady’s work as a teenager. Yeats attempted to provide greater visibility for Irish writers in a series of four articles in the Bookman on Irish National Literature (July–October 1895). The essay “Poetry and Tradition” (1907), written on the occasion of the death of John O’Leary, is the most complete explanation of Yeats’ belief that he, and others, could reform Irish poetry by “keep[ing] unbroken the thread up to [Henry] Grattan which John O’Leary had put into our hands...” Grattan, as one of the founders of the Irish Parliament, represented the Irish nationalism that Yeats promoted as a source for inspiration.

The theater also fascinated Yeats. He argues in “The Theatre” (1899) that dramatic writers needed to use small, intimate theaters, and write plays for small, intellectually discriminating audiences. Such plays would not be successful in larger settings, but could build a loyal audience. In the same year he helped begin the Irish Literary Theatre, and became connected with the Abbey Theatre in 1904. Many of his review articles dealt with programs at the Abbey.

In his essays and reviews, Yeats’ style is direct and robust. In “The Symbolism of Poetry” Yeats notes that we have little record of what Shakespeare discussed when talking with other writers and actors, but that they must have talked about drama. Writing, for Yeats, was an all-consuming passion, leaving no other suitable topics for discussion. His essays, therefore, tend to be polemical as he weaves his interests in art, poetry, drama, Irish nationalism, and the occult into interconnected patterns. For Yeats, an awareness of the supernatural was necessary for producing great works of literature, and such literature develops the national pride he promoted. He uses quotations extensively in his discussions; in many cases more than half the text of an essay is quoted examples. Yeats wrote in “The Symbolism of Poetry” that great writers “have had some philosophy, some criticism of their art; and it has often been this philosophy, or this criticism, that has evoked their most startling inspiration...” For readers interested in the inspiration of Yeats’ poems and plays, his essays are a valuable resource.

TIMOTHY J.EVANS

Biography

Born 13 June 1865 in Sandymount, County Dublin. Studied at Godolphin School, Hammersmith, London, 1875–80; Erasmus Smith School, Dublin, 1880–83;

Metropolitan School of Art, Dublin, 1884–86; Royal Hibernian Academy School, 1886. Lived mainly in London, from 1887, spending part of each year in Ireland, 1890–1921. Cofounder of the Rhymers' Club, London, 1891, and member of the Yellow Book group; helped found the Irish Literary Society, London, 1891, and the National Literary Society, Dublin, 1892. Met Lady Gregory, 1896, and thereafter spent many of his summer holidays at her home in Sligo. Cofounder, with Lady Gregory, Edward Martyn, and George Moore, Irish Literary Theatre, 1899 (the Irish National Theatre Society at the Abbey Theatre, Dublin, from 1904); director of the Abbey Theatre, 1905–39. Editor, Beltaine, 1899–1900, Samhain, 1901–08, and the Arrow, 1906–09. Lectured in the United States, 1903–04, 1913, 1919–20, and 1932. Married Georgiana Hyde-Lees, 1917: one daughter and one son. Lived in Oxford, 1920–21, and Ireland, mainly Dublin, from 1922. Senator of the Irish Free State, 1922–28. Awards: Nobel Prize for Literature, 1923; honorary degrees from four universities. Died in Cap Martin, France, 28 January 1939.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Discoveries: A Volume of Essays, 1907

Poetry and Ireland: Essays, with Lionel Johnson, 1908

Essays (Collected Works 4), 1924

Essays 1931 to 1936, 1937

On the Boiler (essays and poetry), 1939

Essays and Introductions, 1961

Uncollected Prose, edited by John P. Frayne and Colton Johnson, 2 vols., 1970–76

Prefaces and Introductions: Uncollected Prefaces and Introductions by Yeats to Works by Other Authors and to Anthologies Edited by Yeats, edited by William H. O'Donnell, 1988

Vision Papers, edited by George Mills Harper and Mary Jane Harper, 3 vols., 1992

Writings on Irish Folklore, Legend and Myth, edited by Robert Welch, 1993

Later Essays (vol. 5 of The Collected Works), edited by William H. O'Donnell and Elizabeth Bergmann Loizeaux, 1994

Other writings: poetry, many plays, and correspondence (collected in The Collected Letters, edited by John Kelly and Eric Domville, 3 vols., 1986–94 [in progress]).

Collected works edition: The Collected Works, edited by Richard J. Finneran and George Mills Harper, 8 vols., 1989–94 (in progress).

Bibliographies

Jochum, K.P.S., W.B. Yeats: A Classified Bibliography of Criticism, Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1990 (original edition, 1978)

Wade, Allan, A Bibliography of the Writings of Yeats, London: Hart-Davis, 1951; revised edition by Russell K. Alspach, 1968

Further Reading

Ellmann, Richard, Yeats: The Man and the Masks, New York: Norton, 1978; Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1979 (original edition, 1948)

- Ellmann, Richard, The Identity of Yeats, New York: Oxford University Press, and London: Faber, 1964 (original edition, 1954)
- Finneran, Richard J., editor, Critical Essays on W.B. Yeats, Boston: Hall, 1986
- Gwynn, Stephen L., editor, Scattering Branches, New York and London: Macmillan, 1940; as William Butler Yeats: Essays in Tribute, Port Washington, New York: Kennikat Press, 1965
- Hall, James, and Martin Steinmann, editors, The Permanence of Yeats, New York: Macmillan, 1950
- Henn, Thomas R., The Lonely Tower: Studies in the Poetry of W. B. Yeats, London and New York: Methuen, 1979 (original edition, 1950)
- Hone, Joseph M., W.B. Yeats, 1865–1939, London and New York: Macmillan, 1962 (original edition, 1942)
- Jeffares, A. Norman, W.B. Yeats: Man and Poet, New York: St. Martin's Press, 1996 (original edition, 1949)
- Jeffares, A. Norman, A Commentary on the Collected Plays of W. B. Yeats, Stanford, California: Stanford University Press, and London: Macmillan, 1975
- Jeffares, A. Norman, A New Commentary on the Poems of W.B. Yeats, Stanford, California: Stanford University Press, and London: Macmillan, 1984
- Marcus, Phillip L., Yeats and the Beginning of the Irish Renaissance, Syracuse, New York: Syracuse University Press, 1987 (original edition, 1970)
- O'Neill, Charles, "The Essay as Aesthetic Ritual: W.B. Yeats and Ideas of Good and Evil," in Essays on the Essay: Redefining the Genre, edited by Alexander J. Butrym, Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1989
- Skelton, Robin, and Ann Saddlemeyer, editors, The World of W.B. Yeats: Essays in Perspective, Dublin: Dolmen Press, and Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1965
- Tuohy, Frank, Yeats, London and New York: Macmillan, 1976
- Whitaker, Thomas R., Swan and Shadow: Yeats's Dialogue with History, Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America Press, 1989 (original edition, 1964)

Yuan Hongdao

Chinese, 1568–1610

Yuan Hongdao, who with his brothers founded the Gongan school of writers (Gongan being their native home) at the end of the 16th century, and enjoyed considerable fame—touched with notoriety—in his lifetime, was restored to prominence in the early 1930s by modern prose writers who were seeking a native ancestry for their compositions, their sights having previously been set on foreign genres such as essays, sketches, and belles-lettres. To them Yuan Hongdao both advocated and exemplified individualism and contemporaneity in a culture that was basically conformist and backward-looking. He is still well represented in recent anthologies of classical prose.

Yuan Hongdao was an effective communicator, playing his part in propagating the school's philosophy of xingling (native sensibility). This derived from the doctrine of tongxin (the childlike mind) of their mentor, Li Zhi (1527–1602), which advocated remaining naive and unspoilt, looking on the world with fresh eyes, unclouded by convention or tradition, and exploring one's own interests; expression would thus be freed from the trammels of conventional rhetoric and habitual rhythms. As the school all agreed, they lived in their own times, so should write for their own times, and let the dead bury the dead. But Yuan Hongdao's great personal contribution to the development of Chinese prose was not in originality of thought but in translating an attitude to life and literature into practices that clearly worked and that others could learn from, through pouring new wine into old bottles (biographical and scenic sketches), and extending the range of subjects that could be written about entertainingly (e.g. vulgar pursuits, riffraff).

Youji (travelogues, scenic descriptions) bulk largest in Yuan's prose, reflecting his joy in traveling. From the great variety of these compositions it is possible to see the virtue of the Gongan school approach to literature. The writings are all inspirational and unexpected. Yuan may give a full description of the scene that met the travelers' eyes (Chinese scholars usually made these outings in a group), but equally the interest may be in a story that is attached to the place, or what happened to the party, or may simply focus on a joke someone made. In other words, the shaping force is subjectivism: whatever took his fancy, whatever made the deepest impression, is what went down on paper, regardless of any plan or overview.

To take a standard scene description as an example of his work, "Manjing youji" (An excursion to the Brimful Well) records a visit to a famously big well about a mile outside the walled city of Beijing, made in 1599 when Yuan had a post in the capital. The long view of the distant hills, the middle view of the surrounding fields and dykes, and the close-ups of the well itself are not given in any ordered way, but by abrupt switching, and are described either by elaborate similes or in highly condensed four-character phrases. The soft contours of the hills are likened to a woman's high coiffure, freshly combed into place; the shine on the surface of the well, from which the "skin" of ice has just melted, is compared to the "cold glint" that shoots from a silver mirror when its box is opened. Compactness is achieved by exploiting the grammatical flexibility of Chinese words, mostly by using nouns as verbs: so fellow trippers are classed as "spring-and-tea-ists" (those who drink tea made with spring water), "goblet-and-song-ers" (those who quaff wine and sing), and "red-attire-and-hack-ers" (colorfully dressed women riding docile horses). This kind of freshness of conception and fluidity of language betokens a true liberation from convention, a release of the brakes on the mind.

More celebrated and much more exuberant is Yuan's "Hu Qiu ji" (1596; Tiger Hill), which describes the droves of people streaming out of the city of Suzhou on the night of the MidAutumn Festival to enjoy the full moon from Tiger Hill. Syntactically isolated strings of words are used like splashes of color to convey the carnival atmosphere, and to plunge the writer from his normal elevation into the mêlée. The high point is the amateur singing competition, in which contestants are eliminated until "one man alone takes the stage, and there is a deathly hush. His voice is like a thin strand of hair. It cuts through the air and pierces the clouds. A single syllable is drawn out for nearly a quarter of an hour. Birds are arrested in flight, and strong men break down in tears."

It is, however, typical of Yuan Hongdao to undercut his own lyricism, as in "Tian Chi" (1596; The pool of heaven) when, after waxing enthusiastic about the beauties of nature, he asks his pageboy, "Isn't that fine?" and the pageboy answers, "I'm dog tired, what's fine about it?" This kind of deflation is not calculated to startle the reader, but inherent in his dedication to truthfulness to experience, and his complete openmindedness about what should go into a composition. It is in that spirit that he writes entertainingly about ant fights and spider fights, beggars and drunkards, dreams and uncanny happenings. Openmindedness also allowed him to rate folk songs above refined poetry and popular novels above the classics.

But if he was dedicated to truthfulness, it was the truthfulness of the moment. Where Yuan gains in inspiration, he loses in lack of reflection. In other ways, too, he displayed the vices of his virtues: wittiness spills over into facetiousness, freedom into license. Convention is, after all, a useful restraint. If the conventions of accepted standards are rejected, there normally remains the restraining influence of (conventional) unseen readers; but Yuan Hongdao wrote, besides for his own pleasure, for a small coterie of like-minded people; there were no readers “out there” to take into account. However, genius always exacts a price, and we read Yuan with great enjoyment for what he was, with few regrets about what he was not.

D.E.POLLARD

Biography

Style (assumed on reaching manhood) “Zhonglang.” Born 1568 in Gongan. Passed the juren (provincial) exams, 1588, and the jinshi (civil service) exams, 1592. Held government offices sporadically (retiring frequently), including as a magistrate, Wu district (Suzhou), 1595–96, secretary, Ministry of Rites, 1600 and from 1606, positions with the Ministry of Personnel, 1608, vice director, then director, Bureau of Evaluations, 1608–09, and chief examiner of the juren exams, Shanxi, 1609. Cofounder, with his brothers, Putao she (Grape society), Chongguo Temple, Beijing, 1598. Lived in a religious community, Gongan, 1600. Died in Shashi, Hubei Province, 22 October 1610.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

The Pilgrim of the Clouds: Poems and Essays by Yuan Hung-tao and His Brothers, translated by Jonathan Chaves, 1978

Translations of essays in Inscribed Landscapes: Travel Writing from Imperial China, translated by Richard E. Strassberg, 1994: 305–12

Other writings: poetry, a historical romance, a play adaptation, and diaries.

Collected works edition: Yuan Zhonglang quan ji, 1629, reprinted 1976.

Further Reading

Hong Mingshui, Yuan Hung-tao and the Late Ming Literary and Intellectual Movement (dissertation), Madison: University of Wisconsin, 1974

Pollard, D.E., Appendix on the Gongan School, in his A Chinese Look at Literature: The Literary Values of Chou Tso-jen in Relation to the Tradition, London: Hurst, 1973:158–66

Yang Depen, Yuan Zhonglang ji wenxue si xiang (The literary thought of Yuan Hongdao), Taipei, 1976

Z

Zambrano, María

Spanish, 1904–1991

María Zambrano wrote little other than essays, whether books or journalistic articles. Despite the rarity of Spanish women essayists and philosophers, Zambrano decided early that her life's role was as a thinker, and she chose as her vehicle the philosophical essay. She left more than 200 articles and 28 books, especially impressive considering the gender and culture barriers she faced in pre-Civil War Spain and postwar exile in Cuba, Mexico, and Puerto Rico. Republican affiliations and exile combined with gender and her essentially esoteric work to keep Zambrano relatively unknown during the Franco dictatorship; until the final years, exiles' works and most critical studies on them were prohibited by Spanish censors. Nevertheless, when Zambrano finally returned to Spain in 1984, conditions had changed radically. In 1981 she received the Prince of Asturias national literary prize, and significant official and critical recognition continued throughout her remaining life; she became the first woman and first philosopher to receive the Cervantes Prize, ten million pesetas awarded by the Association of Spanish Language Academies, constituting the most significant recognition available to writers in the Spanish-speaking world. Honoring a lifetime's intellectual accomplishments, the Cervantes Prize distinguishes "conspicuous contributions to enriching the Spanish cultural patrimony."

Zambrano's selection surprised many: she had written no bestsellers and was little known to general readers, having besides her essays only some poems and a rather essayistic text—memoir or novelized autobiography—Delirio y destino (wr. mid-1950s, pub. 1989; Delirium and destiny), set during 1929 and 1930, the intellectually stimulating days of Spanish vanguardism when Zambrano was deciding her own future. Despite Bildungsroman traits, reflecting Zambrano's youthful philosophical training and her relationship with her teacher, leading Spanish philosopher José Ortega y Gasset, this lyric discourse combines history, memoir, philosophy, and literature. Delirio y destino, like Los intelectuales en el drama de España (1937; Intellectuals in Spain's drama [i.e. the Civil War]), depicts the rich cultural ambience of the famed Generation of 1927—poets García Lorca, Vicente Aleixandre, Rafael Alberti—and Zambrano's friendships with others: Luis Cernuda, Miguel Hernández, Rosa Chacel, and various disciples of Ortega.

Zambrano's earliest essay volume, Nuevo liberalismo (1930; New liberalism), builds upon work by her father, the idealistic socialist pedagogue Blas Zambrano, an enduring influence, and figures among her most political writing. Simultaneously she worked on her doctoral dissertation treating individual salvation in Spinoza, and began publishing commentaries on Ortega's works. Zambrano's apprenticeship teaching of metaphysics prefigures another constant theme, differentiating her thought from Ortega's. Zambrano's incipient philosophy appears in "Hacia un saber del alma" (1937; Toward a knowledge of the soul), expanded and published separately in 1950. Her early connotations of soul approximate spirit or human subjectivity, and are without the mystical-religious aspects that later appeared. Early influences of Scheler give way to Heidegger. Bergson influenced Zambrano's concepts of time, the historical, intuition, and her essentially lyric, personal, philosophical style. Heidegger contributed to her rejection of philosophical rationalism and scientific reason, to her notions of being-in-the-world, "dwelling," letting things speak, and her fusion of style and thinking as she diverged from Ortega. Philosopher-poet Antonio Machado anticipates her vision of poetry as philosophy or vice versa: Zambrano's Filosofía y poesía (1939; Philosophy and poetry) and Pensamiento y poesía en la vida española (1939; Thought and poetry in Spanish life) explain the poetic initiation of the philosopher via an intuition of "poetic reason." Rhetoric aside, Zambrano's "reason" resembles no prior rationalism but rather revelation connected to desire.

Zambrano's youthful verse appeared in major periodicals and she wrote on contemporary poets, anticipating her theoretical explorations of poetry's relation to epistemological epiphanies. This concept, plus her mystic metaphysics and pervasively lyric discourse, significantly influenced contemporary poets. Zambrano had a long academic career and was affiliated with major universities in South and Central America and Europe. Her philosophical/literary-critical exegeses included La España de Galdós (1959; Galdós' Spain), El freudismo, testimonio del hombre actual (1940; Freudianism: testimony to contemporary man), and El pensamiento vivo de Séneca (1944; Seneca's living thought). Her wartime works attest to her suffering over the war in Europe: Isla de Puerto Rico (Nostalgia y esperanza de un mundo mejor) (1940; Puerto Rico, nostalgia and hope of a better world) and La agonía de Europa (1945; Europe's agony).

Among Zambrano's longest works, El hombre y lo divino (1955; Man and divinity) uses poetic reason to elucidate religious experience, studying the meaning of gods, the sacred, sacrifice, and human attitudes toward the unknown future. Her concept of destiny, within contemporary existential parameters, resembles Ortega's "plenitude," later becoming nearly synonymous with vocation. Zambrano once commented that the title of El hombre y lo divino would aptly suit her complete work, a prescient observation vis-à-vis later texts.

Dreams become prominent in Zambrano's thought in the mid-1950s. "Los sueños y el tiempo" (1958; Dreams and time), further elaborated in El sueño creador (1965; Creative dreaming), and considers time's role in human life, viewing dream-time and dreaming as near atemporal passivity, revelatory of time's origination. Zambrano's dream-theory synthesizes relationships between dreams and the creative word, tragedy, religion, poetry, philosophy, and the novel, appearing also in Los sueños y el tiempo (1992; Dreams and time) and España, sueño y verdad (1965; Spain, dream and truth), whose ostensible topics are predominantly literary, revealing intertextual debts to Calderón's vision of life as a dream, waking as death. Claros del bosque (1977; Clearings in the forest), whose title alludes to the wood near Lake Leman where Zambrano once lived, treats being, presence and reality, concealment and revelation, all united by ontological concerns and the concept of passive epiphany. Other pivotal ideas involve the word (logos) and dawn. De la aurora (1986; Concerning dawn) presents the logos as an inevitable point of departure. Zambrano concentrates on the subjective, within a mystical or gnostic tradition, privileging intuition and advocating the reform of understanding via awareness of the irrational and intuitive, things neither objective nor intelligible in abstract reason. Man constitutes an enigma, something to be deciphered or realized (vocation), resembling existential notions of man as project.

Zambrano's career demonstrates the fallacy of considering woman and philosopher inherently contradictory, but her relative obscurity until the decade before her death did not encourage translations or critical works. Zambrano's major prizes during the 1980s have spurred recent critical attention, mostly in Spanish, but translations have begun and she will be better known in the next century than in her own.

JANET PÉREZ

Biography

Born 25 April 1904 in Vélez-Málaga. Studied philosophy under Ortega y Gasset and Xavier Zubiri at the University of Madrid, 1914–28, Ph.D., 1928. Taught in Madrid, 1930–36; wrote for the Revista de Occidente, Cruz y Raya (Cross and line), and Hora de España (Hour of Spain). Married Aifonso Rodríguez Aldave, 1936 (separated, 1948): one daughter (died, 1972). Lived in Chile, 1936–37; on return to Spain worked actively on behalf of the Republic. Exiled from Spain, 1939; taught at the Universities of Havana, 1940–43, and Puerto Rico, 1943–46; lived in Paris, 1946–49, Havana, 1949–53, Rome, 1953–64, France, 1964–80, and Geneva, 1980–84; returned to Spain, 1984. Awards: Prince of Asturias Prize, 1981; Cervantes Prize, 1988; honorary degree from the University of Málaga. Died in Madrid, 1991.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Nuevo liberalismo, 1930

Los intelectuales en el drama de España, 1937; enlarged edition, 1977

Filosofía y poesía, 1939

Pensamiento y poesía en la vida española, 1939

El freudismo, testimonio del hombre actual, 1940

Isla de Puerto Rico (Nostalgia y esperanza de un mundo mejor), 1940

El pensamiento vivo de Séneca, 1944

La agonía de Europa, 1945

Hacia un saber sobre el alma, 1950

El hombre y lo divino, 1955

Persona y democracia: La historia sacrificial, 1958

- La España de Galdós*, 1959; enlarged editions, 1982, 1989
El sueño creador: Los sueños, el soñar y la creación por la palabra, 1965
España, sueño y verdad, 1965; enlarged edition, 1982
La tumba de Antígona, 1967
Claros del bosque, 1977
El nacimiento: Dos escritos autobiográficos, 1981
Andaluía, sueño y realidad, 1984
Senderos, 1986
De la aurora, 1986
Notas de un método, 1989
Algunos lugares de la pintura, edited by Amalia Iglesias, 1989
Antología temática y crítica, edited by Jesús Moreno Sanz, 1989
Los bienaventurados, 1990
Los sueños y el tiempo, 1992
La razón en la sombra, edited by Jesús Moreno Sanz, 1993
 Other writings: poetry and the memoir Delirio y destino (1989).

Bibliography

“Bibliografía de y sobre María Zambrano,” Anthropos 70–71 (1987):82–93

Further Reading

- Abellán, José Luis, “María Zambrano: La ‘razón poética’ en marcha,” in Filosofía española en América (1936–1966), Madrid: Guadarrama, 1967:169–89
 Aranguren, J.L., “La palabra de María Zambrano,” Cuadernos Hispanoamericanos 413 (1984):21–23
 Azcoaga, Enrique, “María Zambrano y lo poético,” Cuadernos Hispanoamericanos 413 (1984):159–72
 Donahue, Darcy, “National History as Autobiography: María Zambrano’s Delirio y destino,” Monographic Review 9 (1993): 116–24
 Janés, Clara, “La palabra poética de María Zambrano,” Cuadernos Hispanoamericanos 413 (1984):183–87
 Laffranque, Marie, “De la guerre à l’exil: María Zambrano et le Sénégisme des années 40,” in Femmes-philosophes en Espagne et en Amérique Latine, Paris: Centre National de la Recherche Scientifique, 1989:27–55
 López Castro, Armando, “El pensar poético de María Zambrano,” Cuadernos Hispanoamericanos 413 (1984):75–79
 Muñoz Victoria, Fernando, “Sueño y creación,” Anthropos 70–71 (1987):119
 Muñoz Victoria, Fernando, editor, María Zambrano o la metafísica recuperada, Vélez-jálaga: Delegación de Cultura del Ayuntamiento, 1982
 Ortega Muñoz, J.F., “La crisis de Europa en el pensamiento de María Zambrano,” Religión y Cultura 25, no. 108 (1979): 41–69
 Pérez, Janet, “‘Circunstancia,’ Reason and Metaphysics: Context and Unity in the Thought of María Zambrano,” in Public Forums/Private Views: Spanish Women Writers and the Essay, edited by Kathleen M. Glenn and Mercedes Mazquiarán de

Rodríguez, forthcoming

Rof Carballo, Juan, "María Zambrano," Cuadernos Hispanoamericanos 413 (1984):24–31

Salinero Portero, José, "María Zambrano en algunas revistas hispanoamericanas entre 1938 y 1964," Cuadernos Hispanoamericanos 413 (1984):134–58

Savater, Fernando, "Angustia y secreto: El diálogo entre filosofía y poesía en la reflexión de María Zambrano," Cuadernos del Norte 8 (1981):10–13

Subirats, Eduardo, "Intermedio sobre filosofía y poesía," Anthropos 70–71 (1987):94–99

Valente, José Angel, "María Zambrano y 'El sueño creador'," Insula 238 (1966):1, 10

Zea, Leopoldo

Mexican, 1912–

Among the practitioners of the essay of Latin American cultural identity, Leopoldo Zea emerges as one of the outstanding figures of the 20th century. From his seminal essay, "En torno a la filosofía americana" (1942; On American philosophy), until now, his work exemplifies and marks the stages that Latin American thought has followed, from attempts to recuperate cultural patrimony to the articulation, beginning in the 1960s, of a discourse of liberation. Because of the geographic distribution of his essays, their content, and, above all, the repercussion and influence of his ideas, Zea is a continental essayist. A prolific writer, author of dozens of books of essays, he stands out equally as a leader of the Latin Americanist movement and as an untiring motivator and organizer of meetings of intellectuals in various Latin American countries. His essays are difficult to classify; they pertain to what came to be called in the 1980s "cultural studies." His concerns, however, have remained constant: they are reflections on the problem of identity and on the structures that govern the unavoidable interculturality of Latin American peoples. Thus, the context of his work is Latin America, but his national vocation (Mexico) and his regional vocation (Latin America) develop within a Western cultural context and within an explicit search for the liberation of the human being.

Zea became known as an essayist in the early 1940s, principally through two continentally recognized Mexican magazines: Cuadernos Americanos (American notebooks) and Filosofía y Letras (Philosophy and letters). In the first, which stands out for the aesthetic quality of its essays, he brings forward his most influential ideas; for the second, which is more specialized, he was acclaimed by the academic community for his profound thinking. However, both magazines reveal one of the distinctive attributes of his style: the depth of the theme must not affect the clarity of the exposition. Zea writes for an educated public, but he does so without the technical vocabulary of the specialist. His first major book, El positivismo en México (1943; Positivism in Mexico), is an early example of his affiliation with what we now refer to as cultural studies; it is an interdisciplinary work written with the depth of the specialist, with the stylistic concern of the artist, and above all, with the reflective spirit of the essayist who essentially initiates a dialogue. Zea questions and deconstructs logocentric assumptions, especially those that have attempted to impose European perspectives, which in Latin America seemed to perpetuate a situation of cultural colonization.

Zea's work first emerges in dialogue with that of Ortega y Gasset and afterwards with that of Heidegger and Hegel; but the roots of his ideas really lie in the Latin American essay tradition of Simón Bolívar, Andrés Bello, Juan Alberdi, and, most of all, José Martí, all of whom form an intimate part of his intellectual context. Even though we cannot speak of stages, in the sense of ruptures, in Zea's essayistic production, we can trace in his works the same process that has governed Latin American thought during the second half of the 20th century. Zea subscribes to José Martí's assertion that "Barricades of ideas are worth more than barricades of stone" ("Nuestra América" [1891; "Our America"]). For this reason, in his first essays, such as Positivism in Mexico and Dos etapas del pensamiento en Hispanoamérica (1949; The Latin-American Mind), Zea concerns himself with the recovery of the Latin American intellectual legacy. He discovers the dimensions of Latin America's colonial reality and initiates a process of deconstruction of the diverse colonial structures through the essays later collected in seminal works such as Conciencia y posibilidad del mexicano (1952; Consciousness and possibility for the Mexican), América como conciencia (1953; America as consciousness), Latinoamérica y el mundo (1960; Latin America and the World).

The political, economic, and cultural globalization of the 1960s instigated his reflection on the structures of intercultural dialogue that seem to stratify relations among men: according to Zea, the terms "first and third world," "developed and underdeveloped" nations, "center and periphery" have resulted in a division among human beings as "men and pseudo-men." In these cultural structures, Zea recognizes renovated forms of colonialism that he is committed to denouncing. He published during these years reflections that would later give rise to the formulation of a liberation ideology, expressed in works such as La filosofía americana como filosofía sin más (1969; The American philosophy as philosophy), La esencia de lo americano (1971; The essence of the American), Dependencia y liberación en la cultura latinoamericana (1974; Dependence and liberation in Latin American culture), and Dialéctica de la conciencia americana (1976; Dialectic of the American consciousness). This period coincided with intense Latin American cultural movements: hence the impact of Latin American fiction and the opening it created by reintegrating European writing to its regional context and giving rise in the Western world to the writings of other regions—Africa and Asia—which until then had remained marginalized. During the same period there was a resurgence of liberation theology as a philosophy that focuses the mission of religious institutions on regional necessities. In this context, Zea's essays, collected in books such as Discurso desde la marginación y la barbarie (1988; Discourse on marginalization and barbarism) and Filosofar a la altura del hombre (1993; To philosophize at the height of man), question the assumed universality of European philosophical thought in order to deconstruct it. Zea finds that "to know oneself equal by being distinct is, precisely, the essence of the social relation between individuals and nations...[which] permits human beings, or nations, to recognize themselves in another as a fellow human being and thus as an equal."

JOSÉ LUIS GÓMEZ-MARTÍNEZ

Biography

Leopoldo Zea Aguilar. Born 30 June 1912. in Mexico City. Studied at the National Autonomous University of Mexico, Mexico City, Ph.D., 1944. Associated with Tierra Nueva (New earth), 1940–42. Taught philosophy at the Escuela Nacional Preparatoria, Mexico City, 1942–47, the National Autonomous University of Mexico, Villa Obregon, 1944–76 (then emeritus professor), and El Colegio de México, from 1946. Married Elena Prado Vertiz, 1943 (divorced, 1977): four daughters and two sons. Head of department of intellectual cooperation and university studies, Secretary of Public Education, 1953–54; secretary of permanent commission, UNESCO, Consejo Consultivo, 1953–54; director of cultural relations, and special deputy and plenipotentiary, Secretary of Exterior Relations, 1960–66. Lectured at many universities and government institutions throughout the world. Contributor to various journals. Editor of México y lo mexicano series of essays. Married Elena Rodríguez Ozán, 1982. Editor, Cuadernos Americanos, from 1987. Awards: many, including the Justo Sierra Prize, 1944; National Arts and Sciences Prize, 1980; Gran Cruz de Alfonso X el Sabio (Spain), 1984; honorary degrees from several universities; Commander, Legion of Honor (France).

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

El positivismo en México, 1943; as Positivism in Mexico, translated by Josephine H.Schulte, 1974

Apogeo y decadencia del positivismo en México, 1944

En torno a una filosofía americana, 1945

Ensayos sobre filosofía en la historia, 1948

Dos etapas del pensamiento en Hispanoamérica: Del romanticismo al positivismo, 1949; as The Latin-American Mind, translated by James H.Abbott and Lowell Dunham, 1963

Conciencia y posibilidad del mexicano, 1952

La filosofía como compromiso, y otros ensayos, 1952; edited by Liliana Weinberg de Magis and Mario Magallón, 1991

América como conciencia, 1953

El Occidente y la conciencia de México, 1953; as Mexican Consciousness and Its Role in the West, edited by Amy A.Oliver, translated by Michelle B.Butler and Michael A.Ervin, 1993

La conciencia del hombre en la filosofía: Introducción a la filosofía, 1953

La filosofía en México, 2 vols., 1955

América en la conciencia de Europa, 1955

Esquema para una historia de las ideas en Iberoamérica, 1956

Del liberalismo a la revolución en la educación mexicana, 1956

Las ideas en Iberoamérica en el siglo XIX, 1957

América en la historia, 1957; as The Role of the Americas in History, translated by Sonja Karsen, 1992

La cultura y el hombre de nuestros días, 1959

Latinoamérica y el mundo, 1960; as Latin America and the World, translated by Frances

K.Hendricks and Beatrice Berler, 1969

Dos ensayos: Del liberalismo a la revolución en la educación mexicana; Problema cultural de América Latina, 1960

Antología del pensamiento social y político de América Latina, 1964

El pensamiento latinoamericano, 1965

Latinoamérica en la formación de nuestro tiempo, 1965

La filosofía americana como filosofía sin más, 1969

Latinoamérica: Emancipación y neocolonialismo, 1971

La esenda de lo americano, 1971

Dependencia y liberación en la cultura latinoamericana, 1974

Dialéctica de la conciencia americana, 1976

Filosofía y cultura latinoamericanas, 1976

Latinoamérica: Tercer mundo, 1977

Filosofía de la historia americana, 1978

Simón Bolívar, 1980

Latinoamérica en la encrujada de la historia, 1981

Sentido de la difusión cultural latinoamericana, 1981

Latinoamérica, un nuevo humanismo, 1982

Discurso desde la marginación y la barbarie, 1988

Descubrimiento e identidad latinoamericana, 1990

Regreso de las carabelas, 1993

Filosofar a la altura del hombre, 1993

Also edited many anthologies on Mexican culture and Latin American thought.

Further Reading

Cerutti Guldberg, Horacio, "La polémica entre Salazar Bondy y Leopoldo Zea," in his Filosofía de la liberación latinoamericana, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1983:161–68

Fornet-Betancourt, Raúl, editor, Für Leopoldo Zea, Para Leopoldo Zea, Aachen: Augustinus-Buchhandlung, 1992,

Gómez-Martínez, José Luis, "La crítica ante la obra de Leopoldo Zea," Anthropos 89 (1988):36–47

Gómez-Martínez, José Luis, Pensamiento de la liberación, Madrid: EGE, 1995

Gracia, Jorge J.E., "Zea y la liberación latinoamericana," in América Latina, historia y destino: Homenaje a Leopoldo Zea, vol. 2, Mexico City: National Autonomous University of Mexico, 1992:95–106

Guadarrama González, Pablo, "Urdimbres del pensamiento de Leopoldo Zea frente a la marginación y la barbarie," Cuadernos Americanos 36 (1992):51–64

Hale, Charles A., "Sustancia y método en el pensamiento de Leopoldo Zea," Historia Mexicana 20, no. 2 (October–December 1970):285–304

Kourím, Zdeněk, "La obra de Leopoldo Zea: Los últimos 25 años," in Filosofar a la altura del hombre by Zea, Mexico City: National Autonomous University of Mexico, 1993:31–71

Lipp, Solomon, Leopoldo Zea: From "Mexicanidad" to a Philosophy of History, Waterloo, Ontario: Wilfrid Laurier University Press, 1980

Lizcano, Francisco, Leopoldo Zea: Una filosofía de la historia, Madrid: Cultura Hispánica, 1986

- López Díaz, Pedro, Una filosofía para la libertad: La filosofía de Leopoldo Zea, Mexico City: Costa-Amic, 1989
- Medin, Tzvi, Leopoldo Zea: Ideología y filosofía de América Latina, Mexico City: National Autonomous University of Mexico, 1992
- Mues de Schrenk, Laura, "El problema de nuestra identidad en el pensamiento de Leopoldo Zea," in América Latina, historia y destino: Homenaje a Leopoldo Zea, vol. 2, Mexico City: National Autonomous University of Mexico, 1992:247–56
- Nogueira Dobarro, Ángel, and others, "Leopoldo Zea: Filosofía de la historia latinoamericana como compromiso," Anthropos 89 (1988):1–64
- Oliver, Amy, "Values in Modern Mexican Thought," Journal of Value Inquiry 27 (1993):215–30
- Rippy, Merrill, "Theory of History: Twelve Mexicans," Americas 17, no. 3 (January 1961):223–39
- Roig, Arturo Andrés, "La filosofía de la historia mexicana," in his Teoría y crítica del pensamiento latinoamericano, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1981:186–97
- Sauerwald, Gregor, "Leopoldo Zea und die Philosophie der Befreiung," in América Latina, historia y destino: Homenaje a Leopoldo Zea, vol. 2, Mexico City: National Autonomous University of Mexico, 1992:341–54
- Schutte, Ofelia, "The Master-Slave Dialectic in Latin America: The Social Criticism of Zea, Freire, and Roig," The Owl of Minerva 22 (1990):5–18
- Schutte, Ofelia, "The Humanity of Mestizaje and the Search for Freedom: Zea, Roig, and Miró Quesada on Consciousness," in her Cultural Identity and Social Liberation in Latin American Thought, Albany: State University of New York Press, 1993:109–39
- Weinberg de Magis, Liliana, "Leopoldo Zea: América como sentido," in América Latina, historia y destino: Homenaje a Leopoldo Zea, vol. 2, Mexico City: National Autonomous University of Mexico, 1992:415–526

Zhang Dai

Chinese, 1597–1689

Zhang Dai is one of the quintessential voices of the literati culture of the late Ming dynasty. A master of the "prose miniature" (xiaopin wen), he was one of a number of iconoclastic writers who espoused the values of individualism in opposition to various modes of literary orthodoxy based on imitation of past models and a narrow Confucian moralism. This movement in prose and poetry arose in the latter half of the 16th century with such spokesmen as the three Yuan brothers, especially Yuan Hongdao (1568–1610), Li Zhi (1527–1602), Tang Xianzu (1550–1617), Zhong Xing (1574–1624), and Xu Wei (1521–93). Rejecting the official culture of their time, they argued for personal authenticity and uniqueness in expression and also promoted a wider sense of literature which included popular forms such as the novel and drama. In a culture where literature is usually read in connection with the facts of the author's life, Zhang Dai's writings are especially autobiographical and reflect the growth of self-consciousness characteristic of the progressive writers of the 17th century. The works for which he is best remembered were all written after the fall of the Ming dynasty in 1644, a catastrophic event which left him destitute in middle age and deprived of his privileged status as the talented scion of an old, established family of high officials. Despite the conservative shift in taste under the new Manchu rulers, Zhang Dai's writings continued to espouse the individualism of the late Ming. They preserve the details of a lost, antebellum era of taste and pleasure while articulating a coherent aesthetics which has had continuous appeal for Chinese intellectuals.

Zhang Dai's prose writings, only a small portion of which have been preserved, can be divided into three groups—historical writing, miscellaneous works, and reminiscences—as well as into those written before the fall of the Ming and those written afterwards. Zhang's historical writings are in the form of biographies with expository essays introducing each category of people. Zhang considered these works his most formal, and as his public legacy which was originally intended to influence current political opinion and, later, to pass judgment on the age. The earliest of his historical works was Gujin yilie zhuan (1628; Biographies of righteous martyrs past and present), which contains more than 400 exemplary biographies of righteous heroes and scholars who resisted political oppression, from the Zhou down through the Ming dynasties. It was written during a particularly turbulent period to oppose eunuch factions at court who instituted purges of reformist scholars. It reveals Zhang's talent for incisive, rounded portraits, which would reappear later in many of his reminiscences.

His major historical work took four decades to complete and was written in two parts. Part 1 of Shigui shu (1655; A history in a stone casket), begun in 1628, made use of over 400 sources, many from his family archives, to compile a history of the Ming from the Hongwu through the Tianqi reigns (1368–1627). Part 2, known as Shigui shu houji (A continuation of a history in a stone casket), was begun in the early Kangxi era when Zhang was asked to aid in the compilation of the official history of the Ming dynasty. This enabled him to gain access to new archival material about the last reign and the loyalist regimes. It continues the story down through the Chongzhen era (1628–44) and the loyalist regimes of the Southern Ming, which continued briefly to resist the Manchus. Also organized according to the grouped biography format, its topics include politics, economics, culture, and military, ethnic, and foreign affairs.

Zhang's miscellaneous works include a wide range of formats such as prefaces, afterwards, letters, encomia, essays, travel writing, biographies, and epitaphs—including his own, which he prematurely composed at the age of 68. Most of those that survive are preserved in Langhuan shiwenji (Collected poetry and prose from the Langhuan garden), first printed in 1877. They not only reveal his aesthetic opinions, family background, and self-views, but also indicate his extensive social relations with many of the outstanding scholars of the time. Two collections of reminiscences, Xihu xunmeng (1671; In search of my dreams of West Lake) and Taoan mengyi (c. 1685; Dream-like memories from the studio of contentment), remain the basis of Zhang's later literary fame. Xihu xunmeng contains 72 pieces organized as a more formal record of famous places around West Lake in Hangzhou, a glittering cultural center he first visited as a child of six and had not seen in 28 years. Among the sites recalled were many destroyed in the Manchu conquest, including his own estate. First printed in the Kangxi era (1662–1722), it is the only one of his works included by the orthodox bibliographers of the Manchu Qing dynasty in the official Siku quanshu (1773–82; The complete collection of the four libraries). Taoan mengyi, first printed during the Qianlong era (1736–95), is an entertaining miscellany of 123 prose miniatures reminiscing about people, places, objects, customs, and the pleasures of the first half of Zhang's life before the fall of the Ming. Each piece averages only about several hundred ideographs and manages to encapsulate a curious facet of a vanished world as witnessed by an independent and, occasionally, irreverent eye.

Zhang Dai's espousal of individualism was founded on a view of literature as a vehicle for expressing the unique character of the writer. In his reminiscences, this was principally articulated through his choice of subject matter, aesthetic judgments, and linguistic style. Among his best-known pieces are portraits of artisans and performers, a group of low social status outside the canon of traditional biography, whose members he exalted as icons of authenticity and genius. The illiterate storyteller Liu Jingting, for example, who briefly gained influence at the court of the ill-fated Nanjing Restoration of the Ming in 1645, is recalled as a masterful teller of tales whose consummate artistry was in stark contrast to his ugly appearance. In his travel pieces, Zhang often focused on tangential aspects of a place outside the conventional decorum of representation such as the prostitutes of Yangzhou, the matchmakers at West Lake, or the extravagant inns at the pilgrimage site of Mount Tai. A connoisseur of a wide range of arts and pleasures, he admired the obsessive pursuit of artistic ideals, advocating the cultivation of taste as the path to self-realization while frequently deriding the vulgarity of conventional standards of beauty. In another well-known piece about viewing the summer moon at West Lake, Zhang created a typology of society based on the manners and self-consciousness of different groups of holiday tourists, particularly lampooning those who never look at the moon but only at others enviously looking at them. After visiting the garden of the merchant Yu Wu and praising its ingenuity, Zhang dismissed the excessive piling up of expensive rocks at a more famous garden and remarked that it would have been better to design the latter around two odd-shaped rocks which had been discarded.

Zhang's own aesthetics emerge as a highly personal kind of sophistication which appreciated the finest in both elite and popular culture. He found particular value in the marginal, the genuine, the marvelous experience, and in the unique perception. Like most Chinese literati, his ideals contain moral implications, and he managed to convey a broad, ethical awareness while eschewing Confucian didacticism. His reminiscences have the appearance of random sketches intended to reproduce a sense of the spontaneous experiences of a former life well lived, an arrangement that has been termed "cherished disorder" (Stephen Owen, 1986). This autobiographical self embraced the contradictions of the world, the passions aroused by memory, and the despair of his old age. Though occasionally tinged with nostalgia, these pieces are thoroughly realistic in their focus on concrete detail and recapture a world rich in the unexpectedly fascinating, often deflating the serious with humor. His linguistic style in his most characteristic pieces is eclectic and peppered with novelty, especially in Taoan mengyi. For example, he exploited archaic features of classical Chinese in dialogue, such as using nouns as verbs, and liked to combine the repetitive rhythms of colloquial oral storytelling with lofty diction. Zhang valued above all evocativeness. His terse but suggestive description, choppy syntax, and telling observations sought to achieve a mode of literary essentialism which could preserve for eternity his own qualities of animation, curiosity, intelligence, and broadmindedness.

RICHARD E. STRASSBERG

Biography

Courtesy name Zongzi and, later, Shigong; studio name Taoan. Born 1597 in Shanyin (now Shaoxing), Zhejiang province. Descended from a prominent family of officials and scholars. As a youth traveled extensively with his father and uncles, meeting many of the leading writers and artists of the late Ming period and gaining attention as a prodigy. Failed the jinshi (civil service) exams several times, and renounced a public career; wrote historical works in an effort to revive the faltering Ming dynasty. After the Manchu invasion and fall of the Ming, 1644, briefly joined the ill-fated regime of the Ming pretender Prince Lu, 1645, but soon resigned and went into hiding for two months when the Manchu forces conquered Shaoxing. Lost his property in the civil war and lived in reduced circumstances for the rest of his life as a reclusive Ming loyalist. Refused to support the new Qing dynasty and devoted himself to completing his history of the Ming. Died near Shaoxing in 1689.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

(Most of Zhang Dai's works were not printed and have not survived. Below are listed the principal surviving works and collections.)

Gujin yilie zhuan (Biographies of righteous martyrs), 1628

Shigui shu, 1655

Xihu xunmeng, 1671; edited by Sun Jiasui, 1984

Taoan mengyi, c. 1685; edited by Zhou Xianqing, 1985

Langhuan shiwenji, 1877; edited by Xia Xianchun, 1991

Shigui shu houji (A continuation of a history in a stone casket), 1959

Sishu yu (Encounters in reading the Four Books), 1985

Yehangchuan (Night-time sailing), edited by Liu Yaoen, 1987

Translations of essays in: The Columbia Anthology of Traditional Chinese Literature, edited by Victor Mair, New York: Columbia University Press, 1994:594–98; Inscribed Landscapes: Travel Writing from Imperial China, translated by Richard E. Strassberg, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1994:335–51

Other writings: poetry and memoirs.

Further Reading

A Ying, "Langhuan wenji" (On collected prose from the Langhuan garden), in his Haishi ji (Collected mirages), Shanghai: Beixin shuju, 1936:155–69

Nienhauser, William H., Jr., "Chang Tai," in The Indiana Companion to Traditional Chinese Literature, edited by Nienhauser, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1986:220–21

Owen, Stephen, Remembrances: The Experience of the Past in Classical Chinese Literature, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1986:134–41

Xia Xianchun, Mingmo qicai—Zhang Dai lun (On Zhang Dai, a genius of the late Ming), Shanghai: Shanghai shehuikexueyuan chubanshe, 1989

Zhang Dihua, “Zhang Dai,” in Zhongguo dabaiké quanshu: zhongguo wenxue (The Chinese encyclopedia: Chinese literature), vol. 2., Beijing and Shanghai: Zhongguo dabaiké quanshu chubanshe, 1986:1231

Zhou Zuoren

Chinese, 1885–1967

Zhou Zuoren owed his prominence in the New Literature movement, which took off around 1919, to his education in “Western learning” under the patronage of the imperial government. Like his brother Lu Xun, he had spent long years in Japan as a student, where he had been among the few in the Chinese contingent to interest himself seriously in Western culture and literature. Wedded to Western humanism, and equipped with a knowledge of English as well as easy access to Japanese scholarship (which was the first to channel knowledge of Western trends to the Orient), his was a voice that his compatriots, especially the younger ones, wanted to hear. In literature he above all championed the cause of the essay, as a vehicle for sane and civilizing discourse.

Zhou’s first important pronouncement on the essay, however, emphasized the aesthetic aspect, in order to point out that the essay could stand as an art form alongside poetry and fiction, rather than being simply a medium for controversy, although at that stage he was no stranger to controversy himself. In “Mei wen” (1922; Belles-lettres) Zhou looked to Western paragons, especially English essayists, whose work was an extension of their personality. He commended in particular their “genuineness,” a quality sadly lacking in contemporary Chinese compositions. “Genuineness” was to remain for Zhou a sine qua non; however, from roughly 1930 onward his attention was focused almost exclusively on the compositions of his own Chinese tradition known as xiaopin wen (“little form” compositions), a free form that the educated elite had used down the ages to express their private thoughts and feelings and record their own experiences, released from the obligation to speak “on behalf of the sages.” For most of Chinese history this kind of essay had been regarded only as a diversion, at certain times as the authentic voice of literature. Yuan Hongdao and Zhang Dai represented the latter standpoint, and Zhou was responsible in no small measure for their revival. But whether English or Chinese, and whatever label it was given, the true essay excluded service to any cause; to be written by individuals for individuals, it displayed man in all his humors and diversity, but since it put a premium on “naturalness” and “sincerity,” in this diversity there was community: it was the ideal medium for a “literature of humanity.” This did not mean, of course, that the essay was limited to discussing man and his works: it extended to the world of creation in which man found himself.

Zhou Zuoren published over two dozen books of essays, naturally not all of the same kind. From initially applying “scientific common sense” (derived largely from Western sociology, psychology, and anthropology) to issues of the day and his own country’s habits and practices, he tended more and more toward bookishness and isolation, having persuaded himself that literature was “useless” and that any attempt to prove otherwise would only cause pointless “vexation of spirit”—as well as court danger. Perhaps unwittingly, Zhou described what was to become his typical manner as an essayist as early as 1923, when he distinguished two types of writer produced by his home province of Zhejiang: the one magisterial, trenchant in judgment, pungent in expression (which fits Lu Xun), the other mild and gentlemanly, easy and unaffected, given to mixing the amusing and the serious (which fits himself).

The essay “Shuili de dongxi” (1930; Things in the water) fairly represents the image projected by Zhou in mid-career. Its subject is the superstition in his home district of many waterways concerning “river ghosts,” spirits of the drowned who seek release for themselves by drowning others, who will become their substitutes. Unlike the common run of ghosts, these are rather attractive in appearance: they take the form of “little people” who may be seen playing in groups on the river banks, until they are disturbed, when they “plop” into the water like frogs. Zhou thinks these river ghosts may have something in common with the “river lads” (kappa) of Japanese superstition, a kind of demon who also pulls people under water. Up to this point he has treated the subject as an amusing curiosity, an item of folklore personalized by reference to his own childhood recollections, and told with many apologies for imprecision and disclaimers of authority. But finally he feels he has to draw a moral, like the essayists of old, and explains that his real interest is not in the ghosts but in their connection with the mundane world of the people who believe in such things, which he hopes Chinese sociologists will investigate. This is indeed a “gentlemanly” essay. It apologizes for trespassing on the reader’s attention, is elaborately unassuming, and exhibits unprofessional vagueness (as illustrated by the title). By fitting into the Chinese tradition of scholarly “notes” on regional customs, and using wholly Chinese language structures (as opposed to the Europeanized Chinese already in vogue), it disguises the fact that in presentation it is more like the quizzical type of English essay popular in the early 20th century than any xiaopin wen.

But if “Shuili de dongxi” was the kind of essay most readers of the time associated with Zhou Zuoren, it was not one of his best. His finest essays combine a similar sort of relaxed humor with deep sadness, most often over the cruelty of ignorance, whether directed against the self or others. In another essay on a related theme, “Gui de shengzhang” (1934; The aging of ghosts), he collects from written sources a number of contradictory anecdotes on the question of whether or not ghosts continue to age in the spirit world, culminating in long excerpts from the diary of a gentleman who corresponded via a planchette with members of his family who died, until even those spirits departed and left him more alone than ever. This transition from the mildly amusing to the equally ridiculous but profoundly affecting shows Zhou Zuoren in his true colors, all mannerisms shed. Despite his evident superiority to his matter, he evinces no trace of condescension: honest foolishness is treated with polite respect; pain is shared. No admiration is demanded from his reader, with whom he shares his knowledge and thoughts on equal terms, and enters into a closer relationship and talks of more serious things as the “conversation” progresses. Fortunately for the reader, Zhou always has things to say that we never knew before, so farreaching was his curiosity and learning; hence, even when his style becomes excessively dry, as it did in the 1940s, reading him remains a real education.

D.E.POLLARD

Biography

Also wrote under the names Zhitang and Yaotang. Younger brother of the essayist Lu Xun. Born 16 January 1885 in Shaoxing, Zhejiang province. Studied at the Jiangnan Naval Academy, Nanking, 1901; studied in Japan, 1906–11. Married Habuto Nobuko, 1909 (died, 1962): one son and two daughters (one died in youth). Returned to Zhejiang province, 1911, and worked in the educational service, teaching English in Shaoxing; professor of literature, from 1917, and dean of the department of Japanese literature, from 1931, Peking University. Contributor to various journals, including Xin qingnian (New youth), from 1918, Xiaoshuo yuebao (Short story monthly), from 1921, Yuzhou feng (The cosmic wind), Lunyu (Analects), from 1932, and Renjian shi (This human world); founding member, Wenxue yanjiu hui (Literary association), 1921, and Yusi magazine, 1924. One of the leaders in the May Fourth movement for intellectual reform. Collaborated with the Japanese invaders during the Sino-Japanese war (1937–45): commissioner of education, North China, 1940–43; after the war tried for collaboration by the Chinese government and imprisoned, 1945–49, then pardoned. Lived in Beijing for the rest of his life. Died in Beijing in 1967.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

- Ziji de yuandi* (One's own garden), 1923; enlarged edition, 1928
- Yutian de shu* (A rainy day book), 1925
- Yishu yu shenghuo* (Art and life), 1926
- Tan long ji* (Speaking of dragons), 1927
- Tan hu ji* (Speaking of tigers), 2 vols., 1928
- Yong ri ji* (Passing the time), 1929
- Kanyun ji* (Gazing at the clouds), 1932
- Ku yu zhai xu bawen* (Prefaces and postscripts from the Driving Rain Studio), 1934
- Ye du chao* (Notes from night reading), 1934
- Ku cha suibi* (Bitter tea essays), 1935
- Ku zhu za ji* (Bitter bambo jottings), 1936
- Feng yu tan* (Wind and rain), 1936
- Gua dou ji* (Melons and beans), 1937
- Bingzhu tan* (Talks by candlelight), 1940
- Yaotang yulu* (Jottings by Yaotang), 1941
- Yao wei ji* (Bitter taste), 1942
- Shufang yijiao* (A corner of the library), 1944
- Bingzhu hou tan* (More talks by candlelight), 1944
- Yaotang zawen* (Random essays of Yaotang), 1944

Ku kou gan kou (Bitter and sweet), 1944

Lichun yiqian (Before spring), 1945

Guoqu de gongzuo (Past work), 1959

Zhitang yiyou wenbian (Zhitang's writings during 1945), 1961

Zhitang huixiang lu (Zhitang's memoirs), 1970

Translations of essays in: Renditions 26 (1986), and in The Columbia Anthology of Modern Chinese Literature, edited by Joseph S.M.Lau and Howard Goldblatt, 1995:601–15

Other writings: poems, a textbook on the history of European literature (1918), a book on the sources of modern Chinese literature (1932), works on his brother Lu Xun, and correspondence.

Further Reading

Pollard, D.E., "Chou Tso-jen and Cultivating One's Garden," Asia Major 11, no. 2 (1965):180–98

Pollard, D.E., A Chinese Look at Literature: The Literary Values of Chou Tso-fen in Relation to the Tradition, London: Hurst, 1973

Qian Liqun, Zhou Zuoren zhuan (A life of Zhou Zuoren), Beijing: Shiyu wenyi chubanshe, 1990

Wolff, Ernst, Chou Tso-jen, New York: Twayne, 1971

Zhang Tierong, Zhou Zuoren pingyi (A balanced view of Zhou Zuoren), Tianjin: Tianjin renmin chubanshe, 1996

Zubiri, Xavier

Spanish, 1898–1983

Xavier Zubiri's lofty reputation in the Spanish-speaking world, and among Catholic philosophical circles elsewhere, is based primarily on his skill as an essayist—and on his personal presence as a teacher, at least for those who were fortunate enough to attend the courses he taught both as a university professor and as a private citizen. Zubiri's most important essays are contained in a single volume, Naturaleza, historia, Dios (1944; Nature, History, God). As Zubiri explains in his introduction to the English translation of the book, these essays belong to only one period of his intellectual development. In this period, Zubiri is concerned especially with the question of what philosophy has been and should be. His later thought is based on an understanding of philosophy as metaphysics, that is, an investigation of the fundamental principles of real beings as such and of the human relation to reality; this period culminates in the treatise Sobre la esencia (1962; On Essence) and his trilogy of works on intelligence (1980–83). Zubiri's essays, then, are especially suited to provoke reflection on the nature of the philosophical enterprise itself. They succeed thanks to his integration of diverse philosophical and scientific traditions and his conjunction of an accessible style with wide-ranging knowledge and profound reflection.

Zubiri's ideas and style display an unusually felicitous combination of the Catholic metaphysical tradition with a respect for the existential context of metaphysical thought. On the one hand, he is thoroughly grounded in medieval philosophy and its ancient sources; on the other hand, his sensitivity to philosophy as an enterprise carried out by human beings in specific personal and historical circumstances is reminiscent of Heidegger or Ortega y Gasset, both of whom were Zubiri's teachers. The concluding words of "Sócrates y la sabiduría griega" (1940; "Socrates and the Greek Idea of Wisdom") elegantly express this harmony between historical and philosophical understanding: "The history of philosophy is not culture or philosophic erudition. It is finding oneself with other philosophers in the things about which one philosophizes." A number of Zubiri's essays are deft, economical portraits of great philosophers which focus on these thinkers' concepts of philosophy itself (in addition to the essays in Nature, History, God, see Cinco lecciones de filosofía [1963; Five lessons in philosophy]).

Zubiri brings a fresh approach to time-honored philosophical topics, as in his influential treatment of the problem of God under the rubric of religación, or our essential tie to the source of our own existence. Zubiri also breathes new life into a traditional theme when, in "Nuestra situación intelectual" (1942; "Our Intellectual Situation"), he considers the timehonored, even time-worn scholastic concept of truth as "an agreement of thought with things." In Zubiri's hands, this concept becomes an occasion for diagnosing the contemporary intellectual malaise—the "profoundly paradoxical situation" in which, as he claims at the outset of the essay, scientists find themselves today. Zubiri explores the concept of "agreement" systematically but never drily, and closes with phrases worthy of the best existentialist manifestos: "But if, by a supreme effort, man is able to fall back upon himself, he will sense the ultimate questions of existence pass by his unfathomable depth like umbrae silentes [silent shadows]."

Zubiri's essays manifest a wide range of knowledge acquired in his studies with the outstanding philosophers, physicists, mathematicians, biologists, and linguists of his day. However, he is particularly wary of confusing philosophy with "a brilliant 'apprenticeship' of books or a splendid course of grand lectures"—that is, a mere display of encyclopedic erudition ("Our Intellectual Situation"). The scientific and historical facts Zubiri cites are always in the service of a philosophical problem. Thus, although his essays can accurately be described as dense, theirs is a rich rather than a ponderous density. Rather than arguing at length for a narrow thesis, Zubiri covers a great deal of ground by attacking the fundamental questions and bringing out their relationships. No words go to waste in his essays, but many topics are touched on only briefly, with a reluctant parenthetical note that the problem cannot be addressed adequately at this point. This style makes his writings suggestive and stimulating.

The richness of Zubiri's essays does not prevent them from being accessible to beginners. For instance, "¿Qué es saber?" (1935; "What Is Knowledge?") begins with a humble example: "Suppose that we are shown a cup of wine." Zubiri's pedagogical experience is illustrated in this essay and others by the skill with which he introduces readers to successively deeper levels of the problem, using phrases such as "here new difficulties arise" and "neither is this sufficient." His style is also enlivened by well-turned phrases: "science is not a simple addition of truths which man possesses, but rather the unfolding of an understanding possessed by truth" ("Our Intellectual Situation").

It is Zubiri's ability to make philosophical questions come alive, and to use his learning to sharpen rather than to blunt the force of these questions, that accounts for the distinctive power of his essays.

RICHARD POLT

Biography

Xavier Zubiri Apalátegui. Born 4 December 1898 in San Sebastián. Studied under Ortega y Gasset at the University of Madrid, Ph.D. in philosophy, 1921; University of Louvain; Gregorian University, Rome, Ph.D. in theology, 1920; studied independently in Europe, including under Husserl and Heidegger, 1928–31; other teachers included the mathematician Zermelo, the physicists Erwin Schrödinger and Louis de Broglie, and the philologist Jaeger. Chair of the history of philosophy, University of Madrid, 1926–36; taught at the Catholic Institute and the Sorbonne, Paris, 1936–39; chair of the history of philosophy, University of Barcelona, 1940–42; taught privately in Barcelona and Madrid, from 1945. Died in Madrid, 21 December 1983.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Ensayo de una teoría fenomenológica de juicio (doctoral thesis), 1923

Naturaleza, historia, Dios, 1944; as Nature, History, God, translated by Thomas

B.Fowler, Jr., 1981

Sobre la esencia, 1961; as On Essence, translated by A.Robert Caponigri, 1980

Cinco lecciones de filosofía, 1963

Inteligenda sentiente, 1980

Siete ensayos de antropología filosófica, 1982

Inteligencia y logos, 1982

Inteligencia y razón, 1983

Other writings: works on philosophy and religion.

Further Reading

Caponigri, A.Robert, Introduction to On Essence by Zubiri, translated by Caponigri, Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America Press, 1980

Ferrater Mora, José, "The Philosophy of Xavier Zubiri," in European Philosophy Today, edited by George L.Kline, Chicago: Quadrangle, 1965

Homenaje a Xavier Zubiri, Madrid: Moneda y Crédito, 2 vols., 1970

Ramírez, C., The Personalist Metaphysics of Xavier Zubiri (dissertation), Washington, D.C.: Georgetown University, 1969

Rovaletti, Maria Lucrecia, editor, Hombre y realidad: Homenaje a Xavier Zubiri (1898–1983), Buenos Aires: University of Buenos Aires Press, 1985

Wilhelmsen, Frederick D., The Metaphysics of Love, New York: Sheed and Ward, 1962

INDEXES

TITLE INDEX

This index lists all the titles in the Essays and Related Prose sections of the entries on individual writers. The name in parentheses directs the reader to the appropriate entry, where fuller information is given. The date given is that of first publication; revised titles and English-language translations are listed, with their dates.

- A brasileiro entre os outros hispanos (Freyre), 1975
- A campo traviesa (Reyes), 1960
- A condição humana e outras temas (Freyre), 1972
- À contre-courant (Massis), 1958
- A educação pela noite (Cândido), 1987
- A Europa desen cantada (Lourenço), 1994
- A.G.Stephens (Vance Palmer), 1941
- A la orilla del río de los sucesos (Madariaga), 1975
- À margem da história (Cunha), 1909
- A Propos of Lady Chatterley's Lover (Lawrence), 1930
- A través del espejo (Monsiváis), 1994
- Aaret rundt (Paludan), 1929
- Abälard und Heloise (Feuerbach), 1834
- Abbotsford and Newstead Abbey (Irving), 1835
- ABC of Color (Du Bois), 1964
- ABC of Reading (Pound), 1934
- Abenteuerliche Herz (Jünger), 1929
- Abhandlung über den Ursprung der Sprache (Herder), 1772
- Abhandlung über die Evidenz in metaphysischen Wissenschaften (Mendelssohn), 1764
- Abhandlung von der Unkörperlichkeit der menschlichen Seele (Mendelssohn), 1785
- Abhandlungen über das Kommerz zwischen Seele und Körper (Mendelssohn), 1788
- Abinger Harvest (E.M.Forster), 1936
- Abolition of Man (Lewis), 1943
- Absence (Vadeboncoeur), 1985
- Absence of Myth (Bataille), 1994
- Abyss Deep Enough (Kleist), 1982
- Ação cultural para a liberdade (Freire), 1976
- Accepting the Universe (Burroughs), 1920
- Accomplishment of the First of Mr. Bickerstaff's Predictions (Swift), 1708
- Account of My Hut (Kamo no Chōmei), 1955
- Accursed Share (Bataille), 1988
- Ach Europa! (Enzensberger), 1987
- Achtung, Europa! (Thomas Mann), 1938
- Achtzehnte Brumaire des Louis-Bonaparte (Marx), 1869
- Acotaciones a la historia de la cultura occidental en la edad moderna (Tierno Galván), 1964

- Acres and Pains (Perelman), 1947
 Across the Plains (Stevenson), 1892
 Actes retrouvés (Oullette), 1970
 Actuelles (Camus), 1950
 Ad Hoc (Jünger), 1970
 Adages (Erasmus), 1539
 Adagia (Erasmus), 1500
 Adalékok az esztétika történetéhez (Lukács), 1953
 Addresses to the German Nation (Fichte), 1914
 Adel des Geistes (Thomas Mann), 1945
 Adieux (Beauvoir), 1984
 Adonis and the Alphabet (Aldous Huxley), 1956
 Adrastea (Herder), 1801
 Adventurer (Johnson), 1752
 Advertisements for Myself (Mailer), 1959
 Aesthetic as Science of Expression and General Linguistic (Croce), 1909
 Aesthetic as the Science of Expression and of the Linguistic in General (Croce), 1992
 Aesthetic Relation of Art to Reality (Chernyshevskii), 1953
 Aesthetic Theory (Adorno), 1984
 Affable Stranger (McArthur), 1920
 Afiny i Ierusalim (Shestov), 1951
 Aforisme reflectii (Călinescu), 1984
 African Literature (Gordimer), 1972
 Afrika zhdet menia (Belyi), 1984
 After Henry (Didion), 1992
 After 1903—What? (Benchley), 1938
 After Strange Gods (T.S.Eliot), 1934
 Aftermath (Belloc), 1903
 Afternoons in Utopia (Leacock), 1932
 Against Interpretation (Sontag), 1966
 Against Pure Reason (Herder), 1993
 Against Racism (Du Bois), 1985
 Against the Current (Leont'ev), 1969
 Age of Reason (Paine), 1794
 Agenda (Azorín), 1959
 Agitations (Shaw), 1985
 Agnostic's Apology (Stephen), 1893
 Agonía de Europa (Zambrano), 1945
 Agonía del cristianismo (Unamuno), 1931
 Agonie du christianisme (Unamuno), 1925
 Agony of Christianity (Unamuno), 1928
 Agony of Flies (Canetti), 1994
 Agrarian Sociology of Ancient Civilizations (Weber), 1976
 Agua pasada (Martín Gaité), 1993
 Agudeza y arte de ingenio (Gracián), 1648
 Aids and Its Metaphors (Sontag), 1989
 Aids to Reflection in the Formation of a Manly Character (Coleridge), 1825
 Ainsi soit-il (Gide), 1952

- Al margen de estos clásicos (Marías), 1966
 Al margen de los clásicos (Azorín), 1915
 Al pie de la Torre Eiffel (Pardo Bazán), 1889
 Al yunque (Reyes), 1960
 Alarms and Discursions (Chesterton), 1910
 Alarms and Diversions (Thurber), 1957
 Albergo Empedocle (E.M.Forster), 1971
 Album de vers et de prose (Mallarmé), 1887
 Além do apenas moderno (Freyre), 1973
 Alemanes en la conquista de América (Arciniegas), 1941
 Aleph borgiano (Borges), 1987
 Alessandro Manzoni (Croce), 1930
 Alfonso XIII (Darío), 1921
 Algunas consideraciones sobre la literatura hispano-americana (Unamuno), 1947
 Algunos lugares de la pintura (Zambrano), 1989
 Alhambra (Irving), 1832
 Alhos e bugalhos (Freyre), 1978
 All About Ourselves (Priestley), 1956
 All England Listened (Priestley), 1968
 All I Survey (Chesterton), 1933
 All Is Grist (Chesterton), 1931
 All Said and Done (Beauvoir), 1974
 All Things Are Possible (Shestov), 1920
 All Things Considered (Chesterton), 1908
 Alle vergeudeete Verehrung (Canetti), 1970
 Allemagne d'hier et d'après-demain (Massis), 1949
 Allgemeine Naturgeschichte und Theorie des Himmels (Kant), 1755
 Alma castellana (Azorín), 1900
 Alma national (Mariátegui), 1950
 Almond for a Parrot (Nashe), 1590
 Aloes (Kott), 1966
 Along the Road (Benson), 1913
 Along the Road (Aldous Huxley), 1925
 Alphabet for Gourmets (Fisher), 1949
 Also sprach Zarathustra (Nietzsche), 1883
 Alternating Current (Paz), 1973
 Alternative Society (Rexroth), 1970
 Altes und Neues (Thomas Mann), 1953
 Älteste Urkunde des Menschengeschlechts (Herder), 1774
 Altrui mestiere (Levi), 1985
 Amateur Emigrant from the Clyde to Sandy Hook (Stevenson), 1895
 Amateur Poacher (Jefferies), 1879
 América como conciencia (Zea), 1953
 America Day by Day (Beauvoir), 1952
 América en Europa (Arciniegas), 1975
 América en la conciencia de Europa (Zea), 1955
 América en la historia (Zea), 1957
 América es otra cosa (Arciniegas), 1992

- America in Europe (Arciniegas), 1986
 America in the Fifties and Sixties (Marías), 1972
 América Ladina (Arciniegas), 1993
 América mágica (Arciniegas), 1959
 América nuestra (Rodó), 1977
 América, tierra firma (Arciniegas), 1937
 American Addresses (T.H.Huxley), 1877
 American Crisis (Paine), 1776
 American Earthquake (Wilson), 1958
 American Essays (Henry James), 1956
 American Jitters (Wilson), 1932
 American Newness (Irving Howe), 1986
 American Notes for General Circulation (Dickens), 1842
 American Places (Stegner), 1981
 American Poetry in the Twentieth Century (Rexroth), 1971
 American Scene (Henry James), 1907
 American West as Living Space (Stegner), 1987
 Americans (Madariaga), 1930
 Americans and Others (Replier), 1912
 Amérique au jour le jour (Beauvoir), 1948
 Amistades y recuerdos (Pérez de Ayala), 1961
 Amor perdido (Monsiváis), 1977
 Amour du pauvre (Larose), 1991
 Amour libre (Vadeboncoeur), 1970
 Amurgal Gândurilor (Cioran), 1940
 Amusements of the People (Dickens), 1997
 An der Zeitmauer (Jünger), 1959
 Análisis de los Estados Unidos (Marías), 1968
 Anarchist Writings (Godwin), 1986
 Anarchy and Order (Read), 1954
 Anarchy or Hierarchy (Madariaga), 1937
 Anarquía y jerarquía (Madariaga), 1935
 Anarquistas literarios (Azorín), 1895
 Anathemas and Admirations (Cioran), 1991
 Anatomy of Absurdity (Nashe), 1589
 Anatomy of Criticism (Frye), 1957
 Ancient Judaism (Weber), 1952
 Ancorajes (Reyes), 1951
 And Even if You Do (Krutch), 1967
 And Even Now (Beerbohm), 1920
 Andalucía (Zambrano), 1984
 Andando y pensando (Azorín), 1929
 Andanzas y visiones españolas (Unamuno), 1922
 Andere Prozess (Canetti), 1969
 Andra Ijuset (Ekelund), 1935
 André Malraux (Ferreira), 1963
 Aneddoti di varia letteratura (Croce), 1942
 Aneddoti e profili sette centeschi (Croce), 1914

- Angels (Serrès), 1995
 Angelus novus (Benjamin), 1966
 Anglicismes et canadianismes (Buies), 1888
 Anglické listy (Čapek), 1924
 Anglo-Irish Essays (Eglinton), 1917
 Animal Automatism (T.H.Huxley), 1884
 Animal Faith and Spiritual Life (Santayana), 1967
 Annäherungen (Jünger), 1970
 Anonymity (E.M.Forster), 1925
 Another Turn of the Crank (Berry), 1995
 Another Way to Be (Castellanos), 1990
 Ansichten vom Niederrhein, von Brabant, Flandern, Holland, England und (Georg Forster), 1791
 Answers (Murdoch), 1953
 Ante Azorín (Pérez de Ayala), 1964
 Anthropological Principle in Philosophy (Chernyshevskii), 1953
 Anthropologie in pragmatischer Hinsicht (Kant), 1798
 Anthropologist on Mars (Sacks), 1995
 Anthropology from a Pragmatic Point of View (Kant), 1974
 Antichrist (Nietzsche), 1895
 Antigua retórica (Reyes), 1942
 Antik ideal (Ekelund), 1909
 Anton Tchekhov (Shestov), 1916
 Antropología metafísica (Marías), 1970
 Antropologicheskii printsip v filosofii (Chernyshevskii), 1860
 Anweisung zum seeligen Leben (Fichte), 1806
 Anything We Love Can Be Saved (Walker), 1997
 Apariencia desnuda (Paz), 1973
 Apes and Angels (Priestley), 1928
 Aphorismen zur Lebensweisheit (Schopenhauer), 1886
 Apocalypse of Our Times (Rozanov), 1927
 Apocalypse Postponed (Eco), 1994
 Apofeoz bespochvennosti (Shestov), 1905
 Apogeo y decadencia del positivismo en México (Zea), 1944
 Apokalipsis nashego vremeni (Rozanov), 1917
 Apolo y Coatlicue (Cardoza y Aragón), 1944
 Apologia (Plato)
 Apologías y rechazos (Sabato), 1979
 Apologie de M.le Prince de Marcillac (La Rochefoucauld), 1649
 Apologies to the Iroquois (Wilson), 1960
 Apophthegmes (Erasmus), 1531
 Apostillas y divagaciones (Pérez de Ayala), 1976
 Apostle and the Wild Ducks (Chesterton), 1975
 Appeal from the New, to the Old Whigs (Edmund Burke), 1791
 Appellation an das Publikum über die durch ein Kurf. sächs (Fichte), 1799
 Appreciations (Pater), 1889
 Approximations (Du Bos), 1922
 Apuntas de memoria (Azaña), 1990
 Aquellos días (Reyes), 1938

- Aquí y ahora (Marías), 1954
 Arabeski (Beiyi), 1911
 Aratra Pentelici (Ruskin), 1872
 Arbeiter (Jünger), 1932
 Arcadian Adventures with the Idle Rich (Leacock), 1914
 Architecture as a Home for Man (Mumford), 1975
 Arco y la lira (Paz), 1956
 Arctic Dreams (Lopez), 1986
 Äreräddning för Campeadoren (Bengtsson), 1986
 Ariadne Florentina (Ruskin), 1873
 Ariel (Rodó), 1900
 Ariosto, Shakespeare, and Corneille (Croce), 1920
 Ariosto, Shakespeare e Corneille (Croce), 1920
 Aristotle at Afternoon Tea (Wilde), 1991
 Armageddon? (Vidal), 1987
 Armies of the Night (Mailer), 1968
 Arnold as Dramatic Critic (Arnold), 1903
 Around Home (McArthur), 1925
 Around Theatres (Beerbohm), 1924
 Arrows of the Chace (Ruskin), 1880
 Art and Alienation (Read), 1967
 Art and Ardor (Ozick), 1983
 Art and Society (Read), 1936
 Art and Technics (Mumford), 1952
 Art, Dialogue and Outrage (Soyinka), 1993
 Art et la vie (Montherlant), 1947
 Art in Paris (Baudelaire), 1965
 Art in the Light of Conscience (Tsvetaeva), 1992
 Art, Literature, and Drama (Fuller), 1860
 Art Now (Read), 1933
 Art of Controversy (Schopenhauer), 1896
 Art of Criticism (Henry James), 1986
 Art of Eating (Fisher), 1954
 Art of Fiction (Henry James), 1948
 Art of Literature (Schopenhauer), 1890
 Art of Pleasing (Chesterfield), 1783
 Art of the Dramatist (Priestley), 1957
 Art of the Novel (Henry James), 1934
 Art of Travel (Henry James), 1958
 Art of Worldly Wisdom (Gracián), 1892
 Art romantique (Baudelaire), 1869
 Arte de entreguerras (d'Ors), 1946
 Arte de ingenio (Gracián), 1642
 Arte tempo (Ferreira), 1988
 Artículos anarquistas (Azorín), 1992
 Artículos de costumbres (Larra), 1874
 Artículos de crítica literaria y artística (Larra), 1923
 Artículos olvidados sobre España (Unamuno), 1976

- Artículos políticos y sociales (Larra), 1927
 Artículos y discursos sobre Canarias (Unamuno), 1980
 Artificial Paradise (Baudelaire), 1971
 Artigos de jornal (Freyre), 1935
 Artist as Critic (Wilde), 1969
 Artistik und Engagement (Bense) 1970
 Arts et les dieux (Alain), 1958
 Arts in Renewal (Mumford), 1951
 As I Was Saying (Chesterton), 1936
 As They Were (Fisher), 1982
 Ascent to Truth (Merton), 1951
 Aspects of Mexican Civilization (Vasconcelos), 1926
 Aspects of the Novel (E.M.Forster), 1927
 Assays (Rexroth), 1961
 Assembling California (McPhee), 1993
 Assorted Prose (Updike), 1965
 Ästhetische Theorie (Adorno), 1970
 At Home (Vidal), 1988
 At Home and Abroad (Fuller), 1856
 At Home and Abroad (Pritchett), 1989
 At Large (Benson), 1908
 At the Sign of the Lion (Belloc), 1916
 Athens and Jerusalem (Shestov), 1966
 Atlas (Serrès), 1994
 Attempt at a Critique of All Revelation (Fichte), 1978
 Attente de Dieu (Weil), 1950
 Atticism, humanism (Ekelund), 1943
 Attiskt i fågelperspektiv (Ekelund), 1919
 Attitudes Toward History (Kenneth Burke), 1937
 Au service de l'ordre (Bourget), 1929
 Auch eine Philosophie der Geschichte zur Bildung der Menschheit (Herder), 1774
 Auf dem Weg nach Tabou (Wolf), 1994
 Aufgaben der Zeit gegenüber der Literatur (Borchardt), 1929
 Aufsätze über jüdische Gebete und festfeier aus archivalischen Akten (Mendelssohn), 1791
 Aufsätze zur Gesellschaftstheorie und Methodologie (Adorno), 1970
 Aufsätze zur Kultur-, Theater- und Literatur-Geschichte (Goethe), 1913
 Aufsätze zur Literatur (Grass), 1980
 Aufsätze zur Literatur des 20. Jahrhunderts (Adorno), 1973
 Aufstand des Geistes (Bense), 1935
 Augenspiel (Canetti), 1985
 Auguste Comte (Serrès), 1975
 Aus den Schriften zur Religionssoziologie (Weber), 1948
 Aus einem römischen Winter (Andersch), 1966
 Ausdruckswelt (Benn), 1949
 Aussichten (Benjamin), 1977
 Aussichten auf den Bürgerkrieg (Enzensberger), 1993
 Australian Literature (Hope), 1963
 Author's Dimension (Wolf), 1993

- Authority, Liberty and Function in the Light of War (Maeztu), 1916
 Auto da fé (Montale), 1966
 Autobiografía (Ocampo), 1979
 Autobiography (Franklin), 1791
 Autobiography (Mill), 1873
 Autocrat of the Breakfast-Table (Holmes), 1858
 Autocrat's Miscellanies (Holmes), 1959
 Autor und Autorschaft (Jünger), 1984
 Autorité du peuple (Vadeboncoeur), 1965
 Autumn Leaves (Gide), 1950
 Aux fontaines du désir (Montherlant), 1927
 Avant-Postes (Massis), 1928
 Avec Balzac (Alain), 1937
 Aventure sémiologique (Barthes), 1985
 Aveux et anathèmes (Cioran), 1987
 Avowals and Denials (Chesterton), 1934
 Avril (Belloc), 1904
 Awakenings (Sacks), 1973
 Axel's Castle (Wilson), 1931
- Baby, It's Cold Inside (Perelman), 1970
 Back from Exile (Cicero), 1991
 Back Where I Came From (Liebling), 1938
 Båge och lyra (Ekelund), 1912
 Balancing Acts (Hoagland), 1992
 Balconinny (Priestley), 1929
 Balzac (Taine), 1906
 Balzac, Stendhal, Zola (Lukács), 1945
 Bandos del Alcalde (Tierno Galván), 1986
 Barbarian in the Garden (Herbert), 1985
 Barbarism of Berlin (Chesterton), 1914
 Barbarzyńca w ogrodzie (Herbert), 1962
 Barca de Aqueronte (Torres Villarroel), 1731
 Bards and Saints (Eglinton), 1906
 Barrel of a Pen (Ngugi), 1983
 Barrès et nous (Massis), 1962
 Basic Verities (Péguy), 1943
 Basin and Range (McPhee), 1981
 Basis of Morality (Schopenhauer), 1903
 Bathtub Hoax (Mencken), 1958
 Beast in Me (Thurber), 1948
 Beauties of Christianity (Chateaubriand), 1813
 Beauty Is Immortal (Jefferies), 1948
 Because I Was Invited (Wright), 1975
 Bedside Manner (Benchley), 1952
 Bedstvie s golubiami (Soloukhin), 1984
 Bee (Goldsmith), 1759
 Beginning with My Streets (Miłosz), 1991

- Behavior of Titans (Merton), 1961
 Behind the Beyond (Leacock), 1913
 Beiden Grundprobleme der Ethik (Schopenhauer), 1841
 Beitrag zur Berichtigung der Urtheile des Publikums über die französische Revolution (Fichte), 1793
 Beiträge zur deutschen Culturgeschichte (Grimm), 1897
 Bekenntnis zum Übernationalen (Heinrich Mann), 1933
 Belford Regis (Mitford), 1835
 Belgique littéraire (Gourmont), 1915
 Belphégor (Benda), 1918
 Bemühungen (Thomas Mann), 1925
 Benchley at the Theatre (Benchley), 1985
 Benchley Beside Himself (Benchley), 1943
 Benchley Lost and Found (Benchley), 1970
 Benchley—or Else! (Benchley), 1947
 Benchley Roundup (Benchley), 1954
 Benjamin über Kafka (Benjamin), 1981
 Beobachtungen über das Gefühl des Schönen und Erhabenen (Kant), 1764
 Bergsonisme (Benda), 1912
 Berliner Chronik (Benjamin), 1970
 Bernard O'Dowd (Nettie Palmer), 1954
 Berührung der Sphären (Hofmannsthal), 1931
 Best of Two Worlds (Krutch), 1953
 Bestimmung des Menschen (Fichte), 1800
 Betrachtungen eines Unpolitischen (Thomas Mann), 1918
 Betrayal of the Intellectuals (Benda), 1955
 Between Meals (Liebling), 1962
 Between Past and Future (Arendt), 1961
 Between the Wars (Aldous Huxley), 1994
 Beyond Culture (Trilling), 1965
 Beyond Good and Evil (Nietzsche), 1909
 Beyond Personality (Lewis), 1944
 Beyond the Pleasure Principle (Freud), 1922
 Beyträge zur Geheimen Geschichte des menschlichen Verstandes und Herzens (Wieland), 1770
 Biblioteca personal (Borges), 1988
 Bickerstaff redivivus (Swift), 1709
 Bienaventurados (Zambrano), 1990
 Billets de Sirius (Benda), 1925
 Bingzhu hou tan (Zhou Zuoren), 1944
 Bingzhu tan (Zhou Zuoren), 1940
 Biografía de la filosofía (Marías), 1954
 Biografía del Caribe (Arciniegas), 1945
 Biographia Literaria (Coleridge), 1817
 Biographical and Historical Sketches (Macaulay), 1857
 Biographical Sketches (Martineau), 1869
 Biography of Philosophy (Marías), 1984
 Bird in the Bush (Rexroth), 1959
 Birds and Bees (Burroughs), 1887

- Birds and Poets (Burroughs), 1887
 Birth of Reason (Santayana), 1968
 Birth of Tragedy (Nietzsche), 1909
 Bit Between My Teeth (Wilson), 1965
 Bite on the Bullet (Perelman), 1957
 Blå glimt (Sønderby), 1964
 Black Folk, Then and Now (Du Bois), 1939
 Black Interpreters (Gordimer), 1973
 Black Reconstruction in America (Du Bois), 1935
 Blagonamerennye rechi (Saltykov-Shchedrin), 1872
 Blätter und Steine (Jünger), 1934
 Blindheit des Kunstwerks (Andersch), 1965
 Blood, Bread, and Poetry (Rich), 1986
 Blue Flashes (Sønderby), 1966
 Blütenstaub (Novalis), 1798
 Böcker och vandrigar (Ekelund), 1910
 Bøger og Billeder (Kjær), 1898
 Bøger, poeter og stilister (Paludan), 1954
 Bolívar (Rodó), 1914
 Bolivarismo y Monroísmo (Vasconcelos), 1934
 Bol'shoe Shakmatovo (Soloukhin), 1979
 Bonheur excessif (Vadeboncoeur), 1992
 Book of Masks (Gourmont), 1921
 Book of Prefaces (Mencken), 1917
 Book of Snobs (Thackeray), 1848
 Book of Ultima Thule (MacMechan), 1927
 Books and Characters (Strachey), 1922
 Books and Men (Replier), 1888
 Books and Portraits (Woolf), 1977
 Books in General (Pritchett), 1953
 Borges, el judaísmo e Israel (Borges), 1988
 Born of the Conquerors (Wright), 1991
 Borozdy i mezhi (Ivanov), 1916
 Bosquejo de Europa (Madariaga), 1951
 Bottom Translation (Kott), 1987
 Bow and the Lyre (Paz), 1973
 Boylston Prize Dissertations for 1836 and 1837 (Holmes), 1838
 Boys in the Back Room (Wilson), 1941
 Bracebridge Hall (Irving), 1822
 Brasil y su cultura (Reyes), 1944
 Brasileiro em terras portuguesas (Freyre), 1952
 Brazil (Freyre), 1945
 Brązownicy (Boy-Żeleński), 1930
 Bread in the Wilderness (Merton), 1953
 Breath of Life (Burroughs), 1915
 Breathing Under Water (Barańczak), 1990
 Brekkestø breve (Kjær), 1955
 Breve teoría de la traducción (Ayala), 1956

- Brevedad de la vida en nuestra poesía lírica (Maeztu), 1935
 Bréviaire des vaincus (Cioran), 1993
 Breviario di estetica (Croce), 1913
 Breviary of Aesthetic (Croce), 1915
 Brief Diversions (Priestley), 1922
 Briefe, antiquarischen Inhalts (Lessing), 1768
 Briefe, das Studium der Theologie betreffend (Herder), 1780
 Briefe über die ästhetische Erziehung des Menschen (Schiller), 1795
 Briefe über die Empfindungen (Mendelssohn), 1755
 Briefe zur Beförderung der Humanität (Herder), 1793
 Brigada ligeira (Cândido), 1945
 Brigada ligeira (Cândido), 1992
 British Dramatists (Greene), 1942
 Broadcast Talks (Lewis), 1942
 Broadsides (Richler), 1990
 Brown Decades (Mumford), 1931
 Brücke und Tür (Simmel), 1957
 Bruissement de la langue (Barthes), 1984
 Brutus (Cicero)
 Buch der Freunde (Hofmannsthal), 1922
 Buch Hiob und das Schicksal des jüdischen Volkes (Susman), 1946
 Büchertagebuch (Curtius), 1960
 Buen militar a la violeta (Cadalso), 1790
 Bullfight (Mailer), 1967
 Bully for Brontosaurus (Gould), 1991
 Bunch of Herbs (Burroughs), 1896
 Burden of Our Time (Arendt), 1951
 Bürger und seine Stimme (Grass), 1974
 Buried Mirror (Fuentes), 1992
 Burlas veras (Reyes), 1957
 Buscando el camino (Picón-Salas), 1920
 Buscapiés (Azorín), 1894
 Bush Garden (Frye), 1971
 Búsqueda de interlocutor (Martín Gaité), 1973
 Búsqueda del comienzo (Paz), 1974
 Busy-Body Papers (Franklin), 1728
 Butterfly of Dinard (Montale), 1970
 Byloe i dumy (Herzen), 1855
 Byron and the Need of Fatality (Du Bos), 1932
 Byron et le besoin de la fatalité (Du Bos), 1929
- Cabeza de Castilla (Azorín), 1950
 Cabeza de Goliat (Martínez Estrada), 1940
 Cabinet du Philosophe (Marivaux), 1734
 Caesarian Orations (Cicero), 1965
 Caesarian Speeches (Cicero), 1933
 Cahiers (Valéry), 1957
 Cahiers (Weil), 1951

- Cahiers d'un clerc (Benda), 1949
 Cahiers de la Quinzaine (Péguy), 1900
 Calderón y su teatro (Menéndez y Pelayo), 1881
 Calendario (Reyes), 1924
 Calepin d'un poète (Valéry), 1933
 Camera Lucida (Barthes), 1981
 Camino de Paros (Rodó), 1918
 Camões (Lourenço), 1994
 Campus et dies (Ekelund), 1963
 Cannibals and Christians (Mailer), 1966
 Canto do signo (Lourenço), 1994
 Cape Cod (Thoreau), 1865
 Capítulos de literatura española (Reyes), 1939
 Capítulos que se le olvidaron a Cervantes (Montalvo), 1895
 Captain's Death Bed (Woolf), 1950
 Captive Mind (Miłosz), 1953
 Captive Spirit (Tsvetaeva), 1980
 Caractères (La Bruyère),
 Carattere della filosofia moderna (Croce), 1941
 Caravana pasa (Darío), 1902
 Carlos Mérida (Cardoza y Aragón), 1927
 Carnets (Montherlant), 1957
 Carnival of Buncombe (Mencken), 1956
 Carta ao futuro (Ferreira), 1958
 Carta histórico-artística sobre el edificio de la Lonja de Mallorca (Jovellanos), 1812
 Cartas a Guine-Bissau (Freire), 1977
 Cartas del viaje de Asturias (Jovellanos), 1981
 Cartas eruditas y curiosas (Feijóo y Montenegro), 1742
 Cartas finlandesas (Ganivet), 1898
 Cartas marruecas (Cadalso), 1793
 Cartas políticas (Vasconcelos), 1959
 Cartea amăgirilor (Cioran), 1936
 Cartea împărtășirii (Steinhardt), 1995
 Cartones de Madrid (Reyes), 1917
 Casa con dos puertas (Fuentes), 1970
 Casa-grande e senzala (Freyre), 1933
 Case for Christianity (Lewis), 1943
 Caso Sábado (Sabato), 1956
 Cassandra (Wolf), 1984
 Castilla (Azorín), 1912
 Cat and Mouse (Grass), 1994
 Catholic Sermons (Newman), 1957
 Catilinarías (Montalvo), 1880
 Causeries du lundi (Sainte-Beuve), 1851
 Cave and the Spring (Hope), 1965
 Cazador (Reyes), 1921
 Celebrations and Attacks (Irving Howe), 1979
 Celia Montalván (Monsiváis), 1983

- Cent un Propos (Alain), 1908
 Cérémonie des adieux (Beauvoir), 1982
 Ceres Runaway (Meynell), 1909
 Certain Delightful English Towns (Howells), 1906
 Cervantes (Fuentes), 1976
 Cervantes clave española (Marías), 1900
 Cervantes y Quevedo (Ayala), 1974
 Cesta na sever (Čapek), 1936
 Chambre claire (Barthes), 1980
 Champion (Fielding), 1739
 Chance Encounters (Hope), 1992
 Chant funèbre pour les morts de Verdun (Montherlant), 1924
 Chapters and Speeches on the Irish Land Question (Mill), 1870
 Chapters on Socialism (Mill), 1989
 Chaque jour, l'indépendance (Vadeboncoeur), 1978
 Character and Opinion in the United States (Santayana), 1920
 Characteristicks of Men, Manners, Opinions, Times (Shaftesbury), 1711
 Characteristics, in the Manner of Rochefoucault's Maxims (Hazlitt), 1823
 Characteristics of the Present Age (Fichte), 1847
 Characters (La Bruyère),
 Characters and Commentaries (Strachey), 1933
 Characters of Eminent Personages of His Own Time (Chesterfield), 1777 Characters of Shakespeare's Plays (Hazlitt), 1817
 Charivari (Azorín),
 Charles Baudelaire (Benjamin), 1969
 Charles Dickens (Chesteron), 1906
 Charles Harpur (Wright), 1963
 Charmides (Plato)
 Chartism (Carlyle), 1839
 Chat de misère (Gourmont), 1912
 Chat of the Week (Hunt), 1830
 Chefs (Massis), 1939
 Chekhov (Shestov), 1966
 Chelovek za pis'mennym stolom (Lidiia Ginzburg), 1989
 Chemin de la Croix-des-Ames (Bernanos), 1943
 Chemin de velours (Gourmont), 1902
 Chemin faisant (Brault), 1975
 Chernye doski (Soloukhin), 1966
 Chez nos ancêtres (Groulx), 1920
 Chicago (Liebling), 1950
 Chicken Inspector no. 23 (Perelman), 1966
 Child and the Book (Morley), 1929
 Childhood (Meynell), 1913
 Childhood, Youth and Exile (Herzen), 1979
 Children (Meynell), 1897
 Children of Drancy (Butler), 1988
 Children of the Mire (Paz), 1974
 Chimera jako zwieżę pociągowe (Stempowski), 1988

- China (De Quincey), 1857
 Chinese Written Character as a Medium for Poetry (Pound), 1936
 Chips off the Old Benchley (Benchley), 1949
 Chirrión de los políticos (Azorín), 1923
 Chitaia Lenina (Soloukhin), 1989
 Chit-Chat (Steele), 1716
 Choice of Days (Mencken), 1980
 Christenheit, oder Europa (Novalis), 1826
 Christian Behaviour (Lewis), 1943
 Christian Humanism and the Reformation (Erasmus), 1965
 Christian Manual (Erasmus), 1752
 Christian Reflections (Lewis), 1967
 Christian Reunion (Lewis), 1990
 Christianity or Europe (Novalis), 1960
 Christopher Morley's Briefcase (Morley), 1936
 Christ's Tears over Jerusalem (Nashe), 1593
 Chronicles of the Hedges (Jefferies), 1948
 Chronicles of Wolfert's Roost (Irving), 1855
 Chroniques (Buies), 1873
 Chroniques (Camus), 1950
 Chroniques algériennes (Camus), 1958
 Chroniques canadiennes (Buies), 1884
 Chroniques parisiennes (Sainte-Beuve), 1876
 Chteniia o Bogochelechestve (Solov'ev), 1877
 Chto takoe iskusstvo? (Tolstoi), 1898
 Chto takoe sotsialisticheski realizm (Siniavskii), 1959
 Chulkov i Levshin (Shklovskii), 1933
 Chunlao ji (Liang Yuchun), 1930
 Church of the Fathers (Newman), 1840
 Chute dans le temps (Cioran), 1964
 Ciceronianus (Erasmus), 1900
 Ciencia española (Menéndez y Pelayo), 1879
 Cierva (Azorín), 1910
 Cinco lecciones de filosofía (Zubiri), 1963
 Cinco minutos de silencio (d'Ors), 1925
 Cine (Ayala), 1966
 Cine y el momento (Azorín), 1953
 Cinq Lettres sur Ernest Renan (Brunetière), 1904
 Cinq Sens (Serrès), 1985
 Círculos concéntricos (Cardoza y Aragón), 1967
 Cîteva ore la Snagov (Odobescu), 1862
 Citizen of the World (Goldsmith), 1762
 Citoyen contre les pouvoirs (Alain), 1926
 Città Futura (Gramsci), 1982
 City Development (Mumford), 1945
 City in History (Mumford), 1961
 City of the Yellow Devil (Gor'kii), 1972
 Civil Disobedience (Thoreau), 1866

- Civil War (Enzensberger), 1994
 Civilisation Without Delusion (Clarke), 1880
 Civilización y barbarie (Sarmiento), 1845
 Civilization and Its Discontents (Freud), 1930
 Civilization of France (Curtius), 1932
 Claros del bosque (Zambrano), 1977
 Clásicos y modernos (Azorín), 1913
 Classics and Commercials (Wilson), 1950
 Classics Revisited (Rexroth), 1968
 Claude Lévi-Strauss (Paz), 1967
 Claves políticos (Sabato), 1971
 Climate of Monastic Prayer (Merton), 1969
 Coat of Many Colours (Read), 1945
 Cold War and the Income Tax (Wilson), 1963
 College Days (Leacock), 1923
 Collège de sociologie (Bataille), 1979
 College of Sociology (Bataille), 1988
 Collezione di sabbia (Calvino), 1984
 Colloquia familiaria (Erasmus), 1516
 Colloquies (Erasmus), 1671
 Colonial City (Clarke), 1972
 Colour of Life (Meynell), 1896
 Come to Think of It (Chesterton), 1930
 Comic Tales and Sketches (Thackeray), 1841
 Coming into the Country (McPhee), 1977
 Coming of Age (Beauvoir), 1972
 Commencements (Oullette), 1992
 Comment Émile Zola composait ses romans (Massis), 1906
 Commentaire philosophique sur ces paroles de Jésus-Christ (Bayle), 1686
 Commentaires (Du Bos), 1946
 Commentary on These Words of the Gospel Luke XIV.23 (Bayle), 1708
 Common Man (Chesterton), 1950
 Common Reader (Woolf), 1925, 1932
 Common Sense (Paine), 1776
 Common-Place Book (Southey), 1849
 Communalism (Rexroth), 1974
 Communist Manifesto (Marx), 1971
 Cómo se hace una novela (Unamuno), 1927
 Complaint of Peace (Erasmus), 1559
 Complet Gentleman (Gracian), 1730
 Complete English Tradesman (Defoe), 1725
 Complexo de Marx (Lourenço), 1979
 Comprensión de Venezuela (Picón-Salas), 1949
 Compromises (Replier), 1904
 Comtesse de Noailles et le climat du génie (Du Bos), 1949
 Con América nace la nueva historia (Arciniegas), 1990
 Con bandera de Francia (Azorín), 1950
 Con permiso de los cervantistas (Azorín), 1948

- Concerning the Concept of Wissenschaftslehre (Fichte), 1988
 Concetto della storia nelle sue relazioni col concetto dell'arte (Croce), 1896
 Conciencia del hombre en la filosofía (Zea), 1953
 Conciencia y posibilidad del mexicano (Zea), 1952
 Concordia animi (Ekelund), 1942
 Condemned Playground (Connolly), 1945
 Condition of Man (Mumford), 1944
 Condition ouvrière (Weil), 1951
 Conduct of Life (Croce), 1924
 Conduct of Life (Emerson), 1860
 Conduct of Life (Mumford), 1951
 Conférence de l'Odéon (Brunetière), 1896
 Confesión (Chacel), 1970
 Confession (Tolstoi), 1885
 Confessions of a Knife (Selzer), 1979
 Confessions of an English Opium Eater (De Quincey), 1822
 Confessions of an Inquiring Spirit (Coleridge), 1840
 Conflict (Simmel), 1955
 Conflict in Modern Culture (Simmel), 1968
 Confrontaciones (Ayala), 1972
 Confucianism and Taoism (Weber), 1984
 Conjunciones y disyunciones (Paz), 1969
 Conjunctions and Disjunctions (Paz), 1974
 Connaissance surnaturelle (Weil), 1950
 Conocimiento y ciencias sociales (Tierno Galván), 1966
 Conocimiento y expresión de la Argentina (Mallea), 1935
 Conscience of Words (Canetti), 1979
 Consider the Oyster (Fisher), 1941
 Consideración de Cataluña (Marías), 1966
 Considerations on Representative Government (Mill), 1861
 Considerations on the Government of Poland (Rousseau), 1747
 Considérations sur le gouvernement de la Pologne (Rousseau), 1782
 Considerazioni intorno ai Discorsi del Machiavelli (Guicciardini), 1857
 Considerazioni sul problema morale del tempo nostro (Croce), 1945
 Constantes de vie (Groulx), 1967
 Conta-corrente (Ferreira), 1980, 1993
 Contemplation in a World of Action (Merton), 1971
 Contemplative Prayer (Merton), 1969
 Contemporary Italian Poets (Howells), 1987
 Contemporary Writers (Woolf), 1965
 Contest of the Faculties (Kant), 1970
 Continente de siete colores (Arciniegas), 1965
 Continuation des Pensées diverses (Bayle), 1705
 Continuous Harmony (Berry), 1972
 Contra el poder (Ayala), 1992
 Contra esto y aquello (Unamuno), 1912
 Contrary Experience (Read), 1963
 Contrastes e confrontos (Cunha), 1907

- Contrat naturel (Serrés), 1990
 Control of Nature (McPhee), 1989
 Convergence (Le Moyne), 1966
 Convergences (Le Moyne), 1961
 Convergences (Paz), 1987
 Conversation About Dante (Mandel'shtam), 1979
 Conversation with a Cat (Belloc), 1931
 Conversation with an Angel (Belloc), 1928
 Conversations on the Plurality of Worlds (Fontenelle), 1715
 Conversazioni critiche (Croce), 1918
 Convulsión política y social de nuestro tiempo (Sabato), 1969
 Coral Battleground (Wright), 1977
 Corner-to-Corner Correspondence (Gershenzon; Ivanov), 1966
 Correspondence Across a Room (Gershenzon; Ivanov), 1984
 Corriente alterna (Paz), 1967
 Cosas en su sitio (Paz), 1971
 Cose fiorentine (Guicciardini), 1945
 Cosmopolita (Montalvo), 1894
 Costume di casa (Eco), 1973
 Counsels and Maxims (Schopenhauer), 1890
 Counsels and Reflections (Guicciardini), 1890
 Counter-Currents (Replier), 1916
 Counter-Statement (Kenneth Burke), 1931
 Courage of Turtles (Hoagland), 1971
 Course of Lectures on Modern History (Schlegel), 1849
 Court and the Castle (West), 1957
 Covent-Garden Journal (Fielding), 1752
 Cratylus (Plato)
 Crayon Miscellany (Irving), 1835
 Crazy like a Fox (Perelman), 1944
 Creation and Recreation (Frye), 1980
 Credos and Curios (Thurber), 1962
 Crépuscule des pensées (Cioran), 1991
 Crépuscule des vieux (Bernanos), 1956
 Crise du rationalisme (Benda), 1949
 Crisis actual de la enseñanza (Ayala), 1958
 Crisis del humanismo (Maeztu), 1920
 Crisis of Civilization (Belloc), 1937
 Crisis Writings (Du Bois), 1972
 Crisis, cambio, tradición (Picón-Salas), 1955
 Critias (Plato)
 Critic and Society (Soyinka), 1982
 Critica e la storia della arti figurative (Croce), 1934
 Crítica en la edad ateniense (Reyes), 1941
 Critică la persoana întâi (Steinhardt), 1983
 Critică literară en España (Azorín), 1893
 Critical and Historical Essays (Macaulay), 1843
 Critical and Miscellaneous Essays (Macaulay), 1841

- Critical Essays (Barthes), 1972
 Critical Essays on the Performers of the London Theatres (Hunt), 1807
 Critical Muse (Henry James), 1987
 Critical Path (Frye), 1971
 Critical Point (Irving Howe), 1973
 Criticism and Fiction (Howells), 1891
 Criticism and Truth (Barthes), 1987
 Criticisms on Art (Hazlitt), 1843
 Critick (Gracián), 1681
 Criticon (Gracián), 1651
 Critique d'art (Baudelaire), 1992
 Critique et vérité (Barthes), 1966
 Critique générale de l'Histoire du calvinisme du P.Maimbourg (Bayle), 1682
 Critique littéraire (Saint-Évremond), 1921
 Critique musicale (Baudelaire), 1992
 Critique of Aesthetic Judgement (Kant), 1911
 Critique of Judgement (Kant), 1892
 Critique of Practical Reason (Kant), 1949
 Critique of Pure Reason (Kant), 1855
 Critique of Teleological Judgement (Kant), 1928
 Critiques et portraits littéraires (Sainte-Beuve), 1832
 Crito (Plato)
 Crofter and the Laird (McPhee), 1970
 Croire aux âmes (Montherlant), 1944
 Croisade d'adolescents (Groulx), 1912
 Cronache Torinesi (Gramsci), 1980
 Crónica política española (Unamuno), 1977
 Crónicas londinenses (Pérez de Ayala), 1958
 Cronici literare și recenzii (Călinescu), 1991
 Cronicile optimistului (Călinescu), 1964
 Cross Country (MacLennan), 1949
 Crossing Open Ground (Lopez), 1988
 Crowded Dance of Modern Life (Woolf), 1993
 Crowds and Power (Canetti), 1962
 Crown of Wild Olive (Ruskin), 1866
 Cry for the Dead (Wright), 1981
 Crystal Clear Report to the General Public Concerning the Actual Essence of the Newest Philosophy (Fichte), 1987
 Čtyři eseje (Havel), 1993
 Cuadernos de un estudiante americano (Arciniegas), 1994
 Cuadrante del pampero (Martínez Estrada), 1956
 Cuadrivio (Paz), 1965
 Cuando ya esté tranquilo (d'Ors), 1930
 40 (Martínez Estrada), 1957
 Cuarenta días en la exposición (Pardo Bazán), 1901
 Cuenca ibérica (Unamuno), 1943
 Cuento de nunca acabar (Martín Gaité), 1983
 Cuestión palpitante (Pardo Bazán), 1883

Cuestiones estéticas (Reyes), 1911
 Cuestiones gongorinas (Reyes), 1927
 Cultura e vita morale (Croce), 1914
 Cultura en la encrucijada nacional (Sabato), 1973
 Cultura y el hombre de nuestros días (Zea), 1959
 Cultural History of Spanish America (Picón-Salas), 1962
 Culture (Pound), 1938
 Culture and Anarchy (Arnold), 1869
 Culture des idées (Gourmont), 1900
 Culture Industry (Adorno), 1991
 Culture of Cities (Mumford), 1938
 Culture of Ideas (Gourmont), 1921
 Cup of Coffee with My Interrogator (Vaculík), 1987
 Curiosità storiche (Croce), 1919
 Curiosités esthétiques (Baudelaire), 1868
 Curious Dream (Twain), 1872
 Currents and Counter-Currents in Medical Science (Holmes), 1861
 Curtains (Tynan), 1961
 Curve of Binding Energy (McPhee), 1974
 Cutting Green Hay (Buckley), 1983
 Cywilizacja na tawie oskarżonych (Kołakowski), 1990
 Czy diabeł może być zbawiony (Kołakowski), 1982
 Czytelnik ubezwłasnowolniony (Barańczak), 1983

Da fenomenologia a Sartre (Ferreira), 1962
 Dalla periferia dell'Impero (Eco), 1976
 Dandenongs (Nettie Palmer), 1952
 D'André Gide à Marcel Proust (Massis), 1948
 Danish Harbours (Sønderby), 1966
 Danmarks kortet (Sønderby), 1970
 Dans la tourmente (Gourmont), 1916
 Danske havne (Sønderby), 1969
 Dante, Béatrice, et la poésie amoureuse (Gourmont), 1908
 Darkwater (Du Bois), 1920
 Daruind vei dobindi (Steinhardt), 1992
 Darwin and the Mysterious Mr. X (Eiseley), 1979
 Darwiniana (T.H.Huxley), 1893
 David Strauss (Nietzsche), 1873
 Dawn Ginsbergh's Revenge (Perelman), 1929
 Dawn of Day (Nietzsche), 1903
 Day by the Fire (Hunt), 1870
 Daybreak (Nietzsche), 1982
 De amicitia (Cicero)
 De beneficiis (Seneca)
 De clementia (Seneca)
 De divinatione (Cicero)
 De domo sua (Cicero)
 De duplici copia verborum ac rerum (Erasmus), 1512

- De este mundo y el otro (Ayala), 1963
 De esto y de aquello (Unamuno), 1950
 De finibus (Cicero)
 De Francesca a Beatrice (Ocampo), 1921
 De Galdós a Lorca (Madariaga), 1960
 De Granada a Castelar (Azorín), 1922
 De inventione (Cicero)
 De la antigüedad a la edad media (Reyes), 1954
 De la aurora (Zambrano), 1986
 De la Conquista a la Independencia (Picón-Salas), 1944
 De la educación popular (Sarmiento), 1849
 De la littérature considérée dans ses rapports avec les institutions sociales (Staël), 1800
 De l'Allemagne (Staël), 1810
 De långhåriga merovingerna (Bengtsson), 1933
 De legibus (Cicero)
 De libero arbitro (Erasmus), 1524
 De l'inconvénient d'être né (Cioran), 1973
 De l'influence des passions sur le bonheur des individus et des nations (Staël), 1796
 De l'origine des fables (Fontenelle), 1724
 De mi país (Unamuno), 1903
 De mi tierra (Pardo Bazán), 1888
 De mundi sensibilis atque intelligibilis forma et principiis (Kant), 1770
 De natura deorum (Cicero)
 De officiis (Cicero)
 De oratore (Cicero)
 De Profundis (Wilde), 1905
 De providentia (Seneca)
 De qué se rió el licenciado (Monsiváis), 1984
 De ratione studii (Erasmus), 1512
 De re publica (Cicero)
 De Robinsón a Odiseo (Vasconcelos), 1935
 De senectute (Cicero)
 De siglo a siglo (Pardo Bazán), 1902
 De viva voz (Reyes), 1949
 Dead Sea Scrolls (Wilson), 1969
 Dear Boy (Chesterfield), 1989
 Death and Sensuality (Bataille), 1962
 Death of Socrates (Plato), 1948
 Death of the Moth (Woolf), 1942
 Débats (Massis), 1934
 Decadence (Gourmont), 1921
 December Vision (Dickens), 1986
 Decline of English Murder (Orwell), 1965
 Decline of the New (Irving Howe), 1970
 Decolonising the Mind (Ngugi), 1986
 Découverte de la Russie (Massis), 1944
 Découverte du Canada (Groulx), 1934
 Defence of Nonsense (Chesterton), 1911

- Defendant (Chesterton), 1901
 Defensa de la Hispanidad (Maeztu), 1934
 Defensa del Marxismo (Mariátegui), 1934
 Défense de l'Occident (Massis), 1927
 Degré zéro de l'écriture (Barthes), 1953
 Dehumanization of Art (Ortega y Gasset), 1948
 Del barroco (d'Ors), 1945
 Del liberalismo a la revolución en la educación mexicana (Zea), 1956
 Del sentimiento trágico de la vida (Unamuno), 1912
 Delight (Priestley), 1949
 Deltoid Pumpkin Seed (McPhee), 1973
 Demitificación de la concientización (Freire), 1975
 Demokratiet og kunsten (Sørensen), 1989
 Denzettel (Grass), 1978
 Dependencia e independencia en la historia hispanoamericana (Picón-Salas), 1952
 Dependencia y liberación en la cultura latinoamericana (Zea), 1974
 Depuis Novalis (Oullette), 1973
 Derecho social en la constitución de la República española (Ayala), 1932
 Derechos de la persona individual para una sociedad de masas (Ayala), 1953
 Dernière Heure et la première (Vadeboncoeur), 1970
 Dernières pensées inédites (Gourmont), 1924
 Derniers essais de critique et d'histoire (Taine), 1894
 Derniers portraits littéraires (Sainte-Beuve), 1852
 Desahuciados del mundo (Torres Villarroel), 1736
 Descartes und die Folgen (Bense), 1955
 Descent of Man (Darwin), 1871
 Descubrimiento e identidad latinoamericana (Zea), 1990
 Desde el amanecer (Chacel), 1972
 Desde el espectáculo a la trivialización (Tierno Galván), 1961
 Desde el mirador de la guerra (Unamuno), 1970
 Desde la ventana (Martín Gaité), 1987
 Desde Washington (Henríquez Ureña), 1975
 Desert Notes (Lopez), 1976
 Desert Year (Krutch), 1952
 Desespero humanista de Miguel Torga (Lourenço), 1955
 Deshumanización del arte (Ortega y Gasset), 1925
 Deslinde (Reyes), 1944
 Destination of Man (Fichte), 1846
 Destruction of Reason (Lukács), 1980
 Détachement (Serrés), 1983
 Detachment (Serrés), 1989
 Deucalion (Ruskin), 1875
 Deutsche Hörer! (Thomas Mann), 1942
 Deutsche Ideologie (Marx), 1932
 Deutsche Künstler (Grimm), 1942
 Deutsche Literatur in der Entscheidung (Andersch), 1948
 Deutsche Literatur in zwei Jahrhunderten (Lukács), 1964
 Deutsche Realisten des 19. Jahrhunderts (Lukács), 1951

- Deutschen und ihre Dichter (Grass), 1995
 Deutscher Geist in Gefahr (Curtius), 1932
 Deutscher Lastenausgleich (Grass), 1990
 Deutschland, Deutschland unter anderm (Enzensberger), 1967
 Deutschland—du mein Traum (Hamm), 1994
 Deux poètes de la nature (Gourmont), 1925
 Deux Royaumes (Vadeboncoeur), 1978
 Deuxième Sexe (Beauvoir), 1949
 Devil Finds Work (Baldwin), 1976
 Devil Take the Hindmost (Wilson), 1932
 Devils and Canon Barham (Wilson), 1973
 Devotions upon Emergent Occasions (Donne), 1624
 Dialectic of Enlightenment (Adorno), 1972
 Dialéctica de la conciencia americana (Zea), 1976
 Dialektik der Aufklärung (Adorno), 1947
 Dialogi (Seneca)
 Dialogo del reggimento di Firenze (Guicciardini), 1858
 Dialogue avec André Gide (Du Bos), 1929
 Dialogue Between Julius the Second Genius and Saint Peter (Erasmus), 1534
 Dialogue on Poetry (Schlegel), 1968
 Dialogue on the Government of Florence (Guicciardini), 1994
 Dialogues à Byzance (Benda), 1900
 Dialogues Concerning Natural Religion (Hume), 1779
 Dialogues des morts (Fontenelle), 1683
 Dialogues et fragments philosophiques (Renan), 1876
 Dialogues from the Dead (Fontenelle), 1708
 Dialogues in Limbo (Santayana), 1925
 Dialogues of the Gods (Wieland), 1795
 Dialogues philosophiques (Renan), 1992
 Dialogus Ciceronianus (Erasmus), 1528
 Diario de un peatón (Arciniegas), 1936
 Diario minimo (Eco), 1963
 Diary (Gombrowicz), 1988
 Diary of a Writer (Dostoevskii), 1949
 Diary of My Times (Bernanos), 1938
 Diary of Samuel Marchbanks (Davies), 1947
 Diary of the Voyage of the Beagle (Darwin), 1933
 Días de guardar (Monsiváis), 1970
 Dickens, Dali and Others (Orwell), 1946
 Dictionary, Historical and Critical (Bayle), 1734
 Dictionnaire critique (Bataille), 1993
 Dictionnaire historique et critique (Bayle), 1697
 Dictionnaire philosophique portatif (Voltaire), 1764
 Diderot como pretexto (Tierno Galván), 1965
 Diderots Schatten (Enzensberger), 1994
 Dieser Friede (Thomas Mann), 1938
 Dieser Krieg (Thomas Mann), 1940
 Dieux (Alain), 1934

- Diferencias y semejanzas entre los países de América Latina (Martínez Estrada), 1962
 Digression sur les anciens et les modernes (Fontenelle), 1688
 Digtene og dæmoner (Sørensen), 1959
 Diktatur der Vernunft (Heinrich Mann), 1993
 Diletantizm v nauke (Herzen), 1842
 Dimension des Auteurs (Wolf), 1986
 Dinosaur in a Haystack (Gould), 1995
 Directions in Australian Poetry (Hope), 1984
 Directives (Groulx), 1937
 Disarmament (Madariaga), 1929
 Discorsi di varia filosofia (Croce), 1945
 Discorsi sulla prima deca di Tito Livio (Machiavelli), 1531
 Discorso di un italiano intorno alla poesia romantica (Leopardi), 1906
 Discours à la nation européenne (Benda), 1933
 Discours académiques (Brunetière), 1901
 Discours aux chirurgiens (Valéry), 1938
 Discours de combat (Brunetière), 1900
 Discours et conférences (Renan), 1887
 Discours sur la religion (Pascal), 1992
 Discours sur l'économie politique (Rousseau), 1758
 Discours sur les sciences et les arts (Rousseau), 1750
 Discours sur l'origine et les fondements de l'inégalité parmi les hommes (Rousseau), 1755
 Discourse of the Plurality of Worlds (Fontenelle), 1687
 Discourse on Political Economy (Rousseau), 1978
 Discourse on the Arts and Sciences (Rousseau), 1752
 Discourse on the Freedom of the Will (Erasmus), 1961
 Discourse on the Origin of Inequality (Rousseau), 1952
 Discourse on Thinking (Heidegger), 1966
 Discourses (Machiavelli), 1950
 Discourses Addressed to Mixed Congregations (Newman), 1849
 Discourses Biological and Geological (T.H.Huxley), 1894
 Discourses in America (Arnold), 1885
 Discourses on the Scope and Nature of University Education (Newman), 1852
 Discourses upon on the First Decade of T.Livius (Machiavelli), 1636
 Discoveries (Yeats), 1907
 Discovery of a Genius (Howells), 1961
 Discovery of New Worlds (Fontenelle), 1688
 Discreto (Gracián), 1646
 Discurso desde la marginación y la barbarie (Zea), 1988
 Discurso e a cidade (Cândido), 1993
 Discurso en defensa del talento de las mugeres (Amar y Borbón), 1786
 Discurso sobre la educación física y moral de las mugeres (Amar y Borbón), 1790
 Discursos en campo abierto (Azaña), 1936
 Discursos internacionales (Madariaga), 1934
 Discursos parlamentarios (Azaña), 1992
 Discursos populares (Sarmiento), 1927
 Discursos por Virgilio (Reyes), 1931
 Discusión (Borges), 1932

- Disputed Questions (Merton), 1960
Dissertations and Discussions, Political, Philosophical, and Historical (Mill), 1859
Dissociations (Gourmont), 1925
Divagaciones literarias (Pérez de Ayala), 1958
Divagaciones literarias (Vasconcelos), 1919
Divagations (Mallarmé), 1897
Divers essais sur Léonard de Vinci (Valéry), 1931
Divisions on a Ground (Frye), 1982
Dix ans après (Massis), 1932
Dix-sept tableaux d'enfant (Vadeboncoeur), 1994
Djamila Boupacha (Beauvoir), 1962
Dnevnik (Shklovskii), 1939
Dnevnik Pisatelia (Dostoevskii), 1873
Do mundo original (Ferreira), 1957
Do různých stran (Havel), 1989
Do What You Will (Aldous Huxley), 1929
Doble experiencia política (Ayala), 1944
Dobro v uchenii Gr. Tolstogo i Nietzsche filosofii i propoved' (Shestov), 1900
Doctor (Southey), 1834
Dr. Rönne (Benn), 1950
Doctrine of Virtue (Kant), 1964
Documents (Bataille), 1968
Dokumente zur politischen Wirkung (Grass), 1971
Dokumenty (Březina), 1991
Dominations and Powers (Santayana), 1951
Domingos en Hyde Park (Ocampo), 1936
Don Juan Valera (Azaña), 1926
Don Quijote, Don Juan y la Celestina (Maeztu), 1926
Don Quijote o el amor (Maeztu), 1964
Don Quixote (Fuentes), 1976
Don Quixote (Madariaga), 1934
Dopisy Olze (Havel), 1983
Dos etapas del pensamiento en Hispanoamérica (Zea), 1949
Dos Luises (Azorín), 1921
Dos o tres mundos (Reyes), 1944
Dostoevskii i Nietzsche (Shestov), 1903
Dostoevsky and Nietzsche (Shestov), 1969
Dostoevsky and the Legend of the Grand Inquisitor (Rozanov), 1972
Dostoevsky, Tolstoy and Nietzsche (Shestov), 1969
Dostojevskij (Ivanov), 1932
Double Flame (Paz), 1996
Double Vision (Frye), 1991
Doveri dell'uomo (Mazzini), 1860
Drama Observed (Shaw), 1993
Dramatic Essays (Hunt), 1894
Dramatic Opinions and Essays (Shaw), 1906
Drame de Marcel Proust (Massis), 1937
Drawn and Quartered (Cioran), 1983

- Drawn from Life (Thackeray), 1984
 Dream Department (Perelman), 1943
 Dream of Scipio (Cicero), 1967
 Dreamers of the Absolute (Enzensberger), 1988
 Dreams of a Spirit-Seer (Kant), 1900
 Drei Abhandlungen zur Sexualtheorie (Freud), 1905
 Drei Hörmodelle (Benjamin), 1971
 Drei Studien zu Hegel (Adorno), 1966
 Drevo (Soloukhin), 1991
 Drowned and the Saved (Levi), 1988
 Drugie przyjsście oraz inne opowiadania (Herling-Grudziński), 1963
 Druz'ia i vstrechi (Giliarovskii), 1934
 Dry Pickwick (Leacock), 1932
 Du contrat social (Rousseau), 1762
 Du spirituel dans l'ordre littéraire (Du Bos), 1967
 Due lezioni (Varchi), 1549
 Dukhovye osnovy zhizni (Solov'ev), 1884
 Dúna letteratura europea (Mazzini), 1991
 Duplik (Lessing), 1778
 Dusk of Dawn (Du Bois), 1940
 Duties of Man (Mazzini), 1862
 Dyer's Hand (Auden), 1962
 Dyrenes maskerade (Lange), 1969
 Dziennik (Gombrowicz), 1957
 Dziennik pisany nocą (Herling-Grudziński), 1973
 Dziennik podróży do Austrii i Niemiec (Stempowski), 1946
- Eagle's Nest (Ruskin), 1872
 Earl of Louisiana (Liebling), 1961
 Early Greek Thinking (Heidegger), 1975
 Early Worm (Benchley), 1927
 Eastward Ha! (Perelman), 1977
 Easy Chair (De Voto), 1955
 Eating of the Gods (Kott), 1973
 Écartèlement (Cioran), 1979
 Ecce homo (Nietzsche), 1908
 Écrire en notre temps (Oullette), 1979
 Écrits de Londres (Weil), 1957
 Écrits divers sur Stéphane Mallarmé (Valéry), 1950
 Écrits sur le livre (Mallarmé), 1985
 Edinburgh (Stevenson), 1879
 Editor's Study (Howells), 1983
 Educação como prática da liberdade (Freire), 1967
 Educación comun (Sarmiento), 1855
 Educated Imagination (Frye), 1963
 Educated Woman in America (Fuller), 1965
 Education for Critical Consciousness (Freire), 1973
 Education of a Christian Prince (Erasmus), 1936

- Education of Black People (Du Bois), 1973
 Education of the Human Race (Lessing), 1858
 Education, the Practice of Freedom (Freire), 1976
 Education Through Art (Read), 1943
 Efémero cine (Azorín), 1955
 Egotism in German Philosophy (Santayana), 1916
 Eichmann in Jerusalem (Arendt), 1963
 Eiffel Tower (Barthes), 1979
 Eight Decades (Repplier), 1937
 Eight Little Piggies (Gould), 1993
 Eighteenth Brumaire of Louis Bonaparte (Marx), 1898
 Einbahnstrasse (Benjamin), 1928
 Eingriffe (Adorno), 1963
 Einige Vorlesungen über die Bestimmung des Gelehrten (Fichte), 1794
 Einige Zeichnungen (Andersch), 1977
 Einleitung in die Musiksoziologie (Adorno), 1962
 Einzelheiten (Enzensberger), 1962
 Einzig mögliche Beweisgrund zu einer Demonstration des Daseins Gottes (Kant), 1762
 Eisenshtein (Shklovskii), 1973
 Ejercicios de castellano (Azorín), 1960
 Elastic Retort (Rexroth), 1973
 Electric Kool-Aid Acid Test (Wolfe), 1968
 Elementi di politica (Croce), 1925
 Éléments de philosophie (Alain), 1941
 Éléments de sémiologie (Barthes), 1965
 Éléments d'une doctrine radicale (Alain), 1925
 Elements of Semiology (Barthes), 1967
 Elia (Lamb), 1823
 Elizabethan Dramatists (T.S.Eliot), 1963
 Elizabethan Essays (T.S.Eliot), 1934
 Éloge de la philosophie en langue française (Serrés), 1995
 Éloges des Académiciens (Fontenelle), 1731
 Éloges historiques (Fontenelle), 1709
 Elogio de Carlos III (Jovellanos), 1789
 Elpidi (Ekelund), 1939
 Eminent Victorians (Strachey), 1918
 Emperor of the Earth (Miłosz), 1977
 Empire des signes (Barthes), 1970
 Empire of Signs (Barthes), 1983
 En Cuba (Martínez Estrada), 1963
 En el ocase de mi vida (Vasconcelos), 1957
 En el país de los rascacielos y las zanahorias (Arciniegas), 1945
 En el poder y en la Oposición (Azaña), 1934
 En forme de trajet (Oullette), 1996
 En la orilla (Henríquez Ureña), 1922
 En lisant Balzac (Alain), 1935
 En lisant Dickens (Alain), 1945
 En marge de "Jugements" (Massis), 1927

- En medio del camino de la vida (Arciniegas), 1949
 En torno a Galileo (Ortega y Gasset), 1956
 En torno a Kafka (Martínez Estrada), 1967
 En torno a las artes (Unamuno), 1976
 En torno a una filosofía americana (Zea), 1945
 En torno al casticismo (Unamuno), 1902
 En vísperas de la tragedia (Maeztu), 1941
 Enchiridion (Erasmus), 1963
 Enchiridion militis Christiani (Erasmus), 1503
 Encomium moriae (Erasmus), 1511
 Encounters with the Archdruid (McPhee), 1971
 Ending in Earnest (West), 1931
 Ends and Beginnings (Herzen), 1985
 Ends and Means (Aldous Huxley), 1937
 Enemies of Promise (Connolly), 1938
 Energiia zabluzhdeniia (Shklovskii), 1981
 Enfants humiliés (Bernanos), 1949
 England and Ireland (Mill), 1868
 England, Your England (Orwell), 1953
 English Comic Characters (Priestley), 1925
 English Hours (Henry James), 1905
 English Humour (Priestley), 1976
 English Humourists of the Eighteenth Century (Thackeray), 1853
 English Literature in the Sixteenth Century (Lewis), 1944
 English People (Orwell), 1947
 English Portraits (Sainte-Beuve), 1875
 English Prose Style (Read), 1928
 English Traits (Emerson), 1856
 English Village (Jefferies), 1903
 Englishman (Steele), 1713
 Englishmen, Frenchmen, Spaniards (Madariaga), 1928
 Enormidad de España (Unamuno), 1945
 Enquirer (Godwin), 1797
 Enquiry Concerning Human Understanding (Hume), 1758
 Enquiry Concerning the Principles of Morals (Hume), 1751
 Enquiry into the Causes of the Late Increase of Robbers (Fielding), 1988
 Enquiry into the Present State of Polite Learning in Europe (Goldsmith), 1759
 Enracinement (Weil), 1949
 Ensammes stämningar (Ekelund), 1984
 Ensayo de historiología (Castro), 1950
 Ensayo de una teoría fenomenológica de juicio (Zubiri), 1923
 Ensayo sobre la libertad (Ayala), 1945
 Ensayos anglo-españoles (Madariaga), 1922
 Ensayos críticos (Henríquez Ureña), 1905
 Ensayos de convivencia (Marías), 1955
 Ensayos de crítica filosófica (Menéndez y Pelayo), 1892
 Ensayos de sociología política (Ayala), 1952
 Ensayos de teoría (Marías), 1954

- Ensayos sobre arte y literatura (Martí), 1972
 Ensayos sobre filosofía en la historia (Zea), 1948
 Ensayos sobre la "Generación del 98" (Ortega y Gasset), 1981
 Ensayos sobre Valera (Azaña), 1971
 Ensimismamiento y alteración (Ortega y Gasset), 1939
 Ensueño de una patria (Unamuno), 1984
 Entpersönlichung (Huch), 1921
 Entrada libre (Monsiváis), 1987
 Entre España y Francia (Azorín), 1917
 Entre la libertad y el miedo (Arciniegas), 1952
 Entre libros (Reyes), 1948
 Entretiens (Balzac), 1657
 Entretiens chez le sculpteur (Alain), 1937
 Entretiens sur la pluralité des mondes (Fontenelle), 1686
 Envers et l'endroit (Camus), 1937
 Épilogues (Gourmont), 1903
 Epistler (Holberg), 1748
 Epistles (Erasmus), 1901
 Epistles (Holberg), 1991
 Epistles (Seneca), 1786
 Epistulae ad Atticum (Cicero)
 Epistulae ad familiares (Cicero)
 Epistulae ad Quintum frateum et M.Brutum (Cicero)
 Epistulae morales (Seneca)
 Équinoxe de septembre (Montherlant), 1938
 Ercolano (Varchi), 1570
 Érotisme (Bataille), 1957
 Erste und zweite Einleitung in die Wissenschaftslehre (Fichte), 1797
 Eruditos a la violeta (Cadalso), 1772
 Erxin ji (Lu Xun), 1932
 Eryi ji (Lu Xun), 1928
 Erziehung des Menschengeschlechts (Lessing), 1780
 Es gibt kein fremdes Leid (Andersch), 1981
 Escale în timp și spațiu (Steinhardt), 1987
 Escape (Benson), 1915
 Escape from the Anthill (Butler), 1985
 Escena contemporánea (Mariátegui), 1925
 Escenas de pudor y liviandad (Monsiváis), 1988
 Escritor apresenta-se (Ferreira), 1981
 Escritor en la sociedad de masas (Ayala), 1956
 Escritor y el cine (Ayala), 1975
 Escritor y su imagen (Ayala), 1975
 Escritor y sus fantasmas (Sabato), 1963
 Eseje dla Kassandry (Stempowski), 1961
 Eseje i studia o literaturze (Brzozowski), 1990
 Eseje z poústalosti (Březina), 1967
 Esencia de lo americano (Zea), 1971
 Eshche raz Bazarov (Herzen), 1869

- Espaço do invisível (Ferreira), 1965
 España (Ayala), 1982
 España (Azorín), 1909
 España (Madariaga), 1931
 España, a la fecha (Ayala), 1965
 España contemporánea (Darío), 1901
 España de Galdós (Zambrano), 1959
 España en su historia (Castro), 1948
 España sagrada (Montherlant), 1951
 España, sueño y verdad (Zambrano), 1965
 España y Europa (Maeztu), 1947
 España y la cultura germánica (Ayala), 1968
 España y los españoles (Unamuno), 1955
 Espectador (Montalvo), 1886
 Espectador (Ortega y Gasset), 1916
 Espejo de la arquitectura (d'Ors), 1944
 Espejo enterrado (Fuentes), 1992
 Espelho imaginário (Lourenço), 1981
 Esprit de la nouvelle Sorbonne (Massis), 1911
 Esquema para una historia de las ideas en Iberoamérica (Zea), 1956
 Esquire Bickerstaff's Most Strange and Wonderful Predictions for the Year 1708 (Swift), 1708
 Esquisse d'une histoire des Français (Benda), 1932
 Esquisses de l'homme (Alain), 1927
 Essai d'un discours cohérent sur les rapports de Dieu et du monde (Benda), 1931
 Essai historique et critique sur les dissensions des Églises de Pologne (Voltaire), 1767
 Essai historique, politique, et moral (Chateaubriand), 1797
 Essai sur la littérature anglaise (Chateaubriand), 1836
 Essai sur la nature du feu (Voltaire), 1739
 Essai sur la poésie épique (Voltaire), 1765
 Essai sur le mérite et la vertu (Diderot), 1745
 Essai sur les Fables de La Fontaine (Taine), 1853
 Essai sur les fictions (Staël), 1796
 Essai sur les guerres civiles de France (Voltaire), 1729
 Essai sur les règnes de Claude et de Néron (Diderot), 1782
 Essai sur l'histoire générale et sur les mœurs et l'esprit des nations (Voltaire), 1756
 Essai sur l'origine des langues (Rousseau), 1781
 Essai sur Montaigne (Gide), 1929
 Essai sur Sénèque (Diderot), 1778
 Essai sur Stendhal (Valéry), 1927
 Essai sur Tite-Live (Taine), 1856
 Essai sur une conception catholique du judaïsme (Steinhardt), 1935
 Essai sur une pensée heureuse (Vadeboncoeur), 1989
 Essais (Montaigne), 1580
 Essais catholiques (Greene), 1953
 Essais critiques (Barthes), 1964
 Essais de critique et d'histoire (Taine), 1858
 Essais de morale et de critique (Renan), 1859
 Essais de psychologie contemporaine (Bourget), 1883

- Essais dramatiques (Staël), 1821
 Essais et témoignages (Bernanos), 1949
 Essais inactuels (Vadeboncoeur), 1987
 Essais sur la littérature contemporaine (Brunetière), 1892
 Essais sur la peinture (Diderot), 1795
 Essais sur le roman (Butor), 1969
 Essais sur "Les Essais" (Butor), 1968
 Essais sur les modernes (Butor), 1964
 Essay at Removing National Prejudices (Defoe), 1706
 Essay for Cassandra (Stempowski), 1990
 Essay in Aid of a Grammar of Assent (Newman), 1870
 Essay in Defense of Women's Talent (Amar y Borbón), 1976
 Essay on Blindness (Diderot), 1750
 Essay on Epic Poetry (Voltaire), 1915
 Essay on Hamlet (Hostos), 1953
 Essay on Irish Bulls (Edgeworth), 1802
 Essay on Milton (Voltaire), 1954
 Essay on Sepulchres (Godwin), 1809
 Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine (Newman), 1845
 Essay on the Freedom of the Will (Schopenhauer), 1960
 Essay on the Genius of George Cruikshank (Thackeray), 1840
 Essay on the History and Reality of Apparitions (Defoe), 1727
 Essay on the Late Storm (Defoe), 1704
 Essay on the Learning, Genius, and Abilities, of the Fair-Sex (Feijóo y Montenegro), 1774
 Essay on the Manner and Spirit of Nations (Voltaire), 1780
 Essay on the Nature of Contemporary England (Belloc), 1937
 Essay on the Origin of Language (Herder), 1966
 Essay on the Principles of Human Action (Hazlitt), 1805
 Essay on the Restoration of Property (Belloc), 1936
 Essay on the South Sea Trade (Defoe), 1712
 Essay on the Treaty of Commerce with France (Defoe), 1713
 Essay on Universal History (Voltaire), 1759
 Essay on Woman (Feijóo y Montenegro), 1770
 Essay upon Epic Poetry (Voltaire), 1727
 Essay upon Projects (Defoe), 1697
 Essay upon Publick Credit (Defoe), 1710
 Essay upon the Civil Wars in France (Voltaire), 1727
 Essayes (Bacon), 1597
 Essayes (Cornwallis), 1600
 Essayes in Divinity (Donne), 1651
 Essayes or Counsels, Civill and Morall (Bacon), 1625
 Essays (Kjær), 1895
 Essays (Montaigne), 1603
 Essays Ancient and Modern (T.S.Eliot), 1936
 Essays and Treatises on Moral, Political, and Various Philosophical Subjects (Kant), 1798
 Essays and Treatises on Several Subjects (Hume), 1753
 Essays Critical and Historical (Newman), 1872
 Essays: First Series (Emerson), 1841

- Essays from the Parerga and Paralipomena (Schopenhauer), 1951
 Essays from Tula (Tolstoi), 1948
 Essays in Aesthetics (Sartre), 1963
 Essays in Criticism (Arnold), 1865
 Essays in Existentialism (Sartre), 1967
 Essays in Fallacy (Macphail), 1910
 Essays in French Literature (Brunetière), 1898
 Essays in Idleness (Kenkō), 1967
 Essays in Idleness (Replier), 1893
 Essays in London and Elsewhere (Henry James), 1893
 Essays in Miniature (Replier), 1892
 Essays in Poetry, Mainly Australian (Buckley), 1957
 Essays in Politics (Macphail), 1909
 Essays in Pragmatism (William James), 1948
 Essays in Puritanism (Macphail), 1905
 Essays in Radical Empiricism (William James), 1912
 Essays in Russian Literature (Leont'ev), 1968
 Essays in Sociology (Weber), 1946
 Essays in the Art of Writing (Stevenson), 1905
 Essays in Understanding (Arendt), 1994
 Essays, Moral and Political (Hume), 1741
 Essays, Moral and Political (Southey), 1832
 Essays, Moral, Political, and Literary (Hume), 1758
 Essays New and Old (Aldous Huxley), 1926
 Essays of a Catholic (Belloc), 1931
 Essays of a Catholic Layman in England (Belloc), 1931
 Essays of Today and Yesterday (Meynell), 1926
 Essays of To-day and Yesterday (Priestley), 1926
 Essays on American Life and Letters (Fuller), 1978
 Essays on Ancient and Modern Learning and on Poetry (Temple), 1995
 Essays on Art (Goethe), 1845
 Essays on Elizabethan Drama (T.S.Eliot), 1956
 Essays on European Literature (Curtius), 1973
 Essays on Faith and Morals (William James), 1943
 Essays on Freethinking and Plainspeaking (Stephen), 1873
 Essays on His Own Times (Coleridge), 1850
 Essays on Interpretation in Social Science (Simmel), 1980
 Essays on Literature (Grimm), 1885
 Essays on Literature and Literary Criticism (Croce), 1990
 Essays on Literature and Society (Edwin Muir), 1949
 Essays on Marx and Russia (Croce), 1966
 Essays on Men and Women (Sainte-Beuve), 1890
 Essays on Mexican Art (Paz), 1993
 Essays on Practical Education (Edgeworth), 1811
 Essays on Professional Education (Edgeworth), 1809
 Essays on Realism (Lukács), 1980
 Essays on Science and Education (T.H.Huxley), 1909
 Essays on Some Unsettled Questions of Political Economy (Mill), 1844

- Essays on Suicide (Hume), 1783
 Essays on the Fine Arts (Hazlitt), 1873
 Essays on the Gogol Period of Russian Literature (Chernyshevskii), 1953
 Essays on Thomas Mann (Lukács), 1964
 Essays, Second Series (Emerson), 1844
 Essays über Realismus (Lukács), 1948
 Essays upon Several Projects (Defoe), 1702
 Essays upon Some Controverted Questions (T.H.Huxley), 1892
 Essays with a Purpose (Madariaga), 1954
 Essence of Aesthetic (Croce), 1921
 Essence of Faith According to Luther (Feuerbach), 1967
 Essence of Laughter (Baudelaire), 1956
 Essential Communism (Read), 1935
 Essential Gesture (Gordimer), 1988
 Estados Unidos en escorzo (Marías), 1956
 Estate of Poetry (Edwin Muir), 1962
 Este pueblo de América (Arciniegas), 1945
 Estética (Vasconcelos), 1935
 Estetica come scienza dell'espressione e linguistica generale (Croce), 1902
 Esteticheskie otnosheniia iskusstva k deistvitel'nosti (Chernyshevskii), 1855
 Estetika, kritika, problemy kul'tury (Herzen), 1987
 Esthétique de la langue française (Gourmont), 1899
 Estructura narrativa (Ayala), 1984
 Estructura social (Marías), 1958
 Estudiante de la mesa redonda (Arciniegas), 1932
 Estudios de crítica literaria (Menéndez y Pelayo), 1884
 Estudios helénicos (Reyes), 1957
 Estudios indostánicos (Vasconcelos), 1920
 Estudios sobre el teatro de Lope de Vega (Menéndez y Pelayo), 1919
 Estudios sobre escritores montañeses (Menéndez y Pelayo), 1877
 Esztétikai kultúra (Lukács), 1913
 Et Cetera, Et Cetera (Thomas), 1990
 Et nunc manet in te (Gide), 1947
 Été (Camus), 1954
 Eternal Act of Creation (Frye), 1993
 Eternità e storicità della filosofia (Croce), 1930
 Ethics of Ambiguity (Beauvoir), 1948
 Ethics of the Dust (Ruskin), 1866
 Ética (Vasconcelos), 1932
 Etica e politica (Croce), 1931
 Etruscan Places (Lawrence), 1932
 Étude sur Descartes (Alain), 1928
 Études critiques sur l'histoire de la littérature française (Brunetière), 1880
 Études d'histoire religieuse (Renan), 1857
 Études et fragments sur le rêve (Valéry), 1925
 Études et portraits (Bourget), 1888
 Études ou discours historiques sur la chute de l'empire romain (Chateaubriand), 1831
 Etyka i poetyka (Barańczak), 1979

- Europa-América (Picón-Salas), 1947
 Europäische Literatur und lateinisches Mittelalter (Curtius), 1948
 Europe en question (Massis), 1958
 Europe, Europe (Enzensberger), 1989
 Europe Without Baedeker (Wilson), 1947
 European Literature and the Latin Middle Ages (Curtius), 1953
 European Literature in the Nineteenth Century (Croce), 1924
 Euthydemus (Plato)
 Euthyphro (Plato)
 Evasión de los intelectuales (Ayala), 1963
 Evening Colonnade (Connolly), 1973
 Ever Since Darwin (Gould), 1977
 Everlasting Man (Chesterton), 1925
 Every Day Is Saturday (White), 1934
 Evidence as to Man's Place in Nature (T.H.Huxley), 1863
 Evidence of Things Not Seen (Baldwin), 1985
 Evolución de la crítica (Azorín), 1899
 Evolution and Ethics (T.H.Huxley), 1893
 Evolution and Natural Selection (Darwin), 1959
 Évolution des genres dans l'histoire de la littérature (Brunetière), 1890
 Examiner (Hunt), 1808
 Examiner (Swift), 1711
 Excursions (Thoreau), 1863
 Executioner's Song (Mailer), 1979
 Exercices d'admiration (Cioran), 1986
 Exhortaciones (Martínez Estrada), 1957
 Existence and Being (Heidegger), 1949
 Existential Errands (Mailer), 1972
 Existentialisme et la sagesse des nations (Beauvoir), 1948
 Existentialisme ou marxisme? (Lukács), 1948
 Experience and Art (Krutch), 1932
 Expérience intérieure (Bataille), 1943
 Experiencia e invención (Ayala), 1960
 Experiencia literaria (Reyes), 1942
 Extraordinary Woman (Staël), 1987

 Fables of Identity (Frye), 1963
 Fábulas y ciudades (Pérez de Ayala), 1961
 Facetter (Paludan), 1947
 Fackel im Ohr (Canetti), 1980
 Facts of Consciousness (Fichte), 1871
 Facundo (Sarmiento), 1868
 Faith and Prejudice (Newman), 1956
 Faith and Violence (Merton), 1968
 Faith as Unfolded by Many Prophets (Martineau), 1832
 Faith in Fakes (Eco), 1986
 Faith of Graffiti (Mailer), 1974
 Fall into Time (Cioran), 1970

- Fallen Leaves, Bundle One (Rozanov), 1929
 Falsche Spitzfindigkeit der vier syllogistischen Figuren erwiesen (Kant), 1762
 Fame & Folly (Ozick), 1996
 Famiglia di patrioti (Croce), 1919
 Familiar Fields (McArthur), 1925
 Familiar Studies of Men and Books (Stevenson), 1882
 Fantasia of the Unconscious (Lawrence), 1922
 Fantasías y devaneos (Azorín), 1920
 Far and Near (Burroughs), 1904
 Farfalla di Dinard (Montale), 1956
 Fascismo nunca existiu (Lourenço), 1976
 Fascismo sudamericano (Mariátegui), 1975
 Fashion System (Barthes), 1985
 Fazit der Perspektiven (Benn), 1930
 Fearful Symmetry (Frye), 1947
 Feast of Stephen (Leacock), 1970
 Fel'etony sorokovykh godov (Dostoevskii), 1930
 Femmes et le langage (Gourmont), 1925
 Fen (Lu Xun), 1927
 Feng yu tan (Zhou Zuoren), 1936
 Feodor Jansens jeramiader (Paludan), 1927
 Fernando Pessoa revisitado (Lourenço), 1973
 Fernando, rei de Nossa Baviera (Lourenço), 1986
 Fern-Seed and Elephants (Lewis), 1975
 Festsspiele in Salzburg (Hofmannsthal), 1938
 Feuilles détachées (Renan), 1892
 Feuilletts d'automne (Gide), 1949
 Feux et signaux de brume, Zola (Serrès), 1975
 Ficção e confissão (Cândido), 1956
 Fiction and the Figures of Life (Gass), 1970
 Field and Farm (Jefferies), 1957
 Field and Hedgerow (Jefferies), 1889
 Field and Study (Burroughs), 1919
 Fiery Brook (Feuerbach), 1972
 Fígaro (Larra), 1835
 Fight (Mailer), 1975
 Figures in Modern Literature (Priestley), 1924
 Filosofar a la altura del hombre (Zea), 1993
 Filosofía americana como filosofía sin más (Zea), 1969
 Filosofía como compromiso (Zea), 1952
 Filosofía de la historia americana (Zea), 1978
 Filosofía del entendimiento (Bello), 1881
 Filosofia della pratica (Croce), 1909
 Filosofia di Giambattista Vico (Croce), 1911
 Filosofia e storiografia (Croce), 1949
 Filosofía en México (Zea), 1955
 Filosofia, poesia, storia (Croce), 1951
 Filosofía y cultura latinoamericanas (Zea), 1976

- Filosofía y poesía (Zambrano), 1939
 Fin de l'art (Gourmont), 1925
 Fin de l'éternel (Benda), 1927
 Finding a Form (Gass), 1996
 Findings and Keepings (Mumford), 1975
 Fire Next Time (Baldwin), 1963
 Fire on the Moon (Mailer), 1971
 Fireside Sphinx (Repplier), 1901
 Firmament of Time (Eiseley), 1960
 First and Last (Belloc), 1911
 First and Second Things (Lewis), 1985
 Fisherman's Fall (Haig-Brown), 1964
 Fisherman's Spring (Haig-Brown), 1951
 Fisherman's Summer (Haig-Brown), 1959
 Fisherman's Winter (Haig-Brown), 1954
 Five Essays on Milton's Epics (Frye), 1966
 Five Lectures on Psycho-Analysis (Freud), 1957
 Five Masters (Krutch), 1930
 Flamingo's Smile (Gould), 1985
 Flèche du sud (Montherlant), 1937
 Fliegende Robert (Enzensberger), 1989
 Fliegenpein (Canetti), 1992
 Flirt z Melpomeną (Boy-Żeleński), 1920
 Florentine Historie (Machiavelli), 1595
 Florentine Histories (Machiavelli), 1845
 Flugträume (Jünger), 1983
 Folk som sjöng (Bengtsson), 1955
 Fools of Time (Frye), 1967
 For Freedom of Imagination (Siniavskii), 1971
 For Lancelot Andrewes (T.S.Eliot), 1928
 För nöjes skull (Bengtsson), 1947
 Forays and Rebuttals (De Voto), 1936
 Forbigaaende (Kjær), 1903
 Force and Freedom (Burckhardt), 1943
 Force de l'âge (Beauvoir), 1960
 Force des choses (Beauvoir), 1963
 Force of Circumstance (Beauvoir), 1965
 Forderung des Tages (Thomas Mann), 1930
 Forderungen des Tages (Frisch), 1983
 Foreign Parts (Henry James), 1883
 Forewords and Afterwords (Auden), 1973
 Forgotten Peninsula (Krutch), 1961
 Formación y proceso de la literatura venezolana (Picón-Salas), 1940
 Formas y las visiones (Picón-Salas), 1984
 Forme del contenuto (Eco), 1971
 Forms of Things Unknown (Read), 1960
 Fors Clavigera (Ruskin), 1871
 Forsvundne somme (Sønderby), 1946

- Fortgesetzter Versuch (Wolf), 1979
 Foundations of Natural Law According to the Principles of the Theory of Science (Fichte), 1955
 Foundations of the Entire Science of Knowledge (Fichte), 1970
 Foundations of the Origin of Species (Darwin), 1909
 Foundations of Theoretical Philosophy (Solov'ev), 1965
 Four Georges (Thackeray), 1860
 Four Loves (Lewis), 1960
 Four-Storeyed Country (González), 1990
 Fourteen Years (Nettie Palmer), 1948
 Fourth Dimension (Wolf), 1988
 Fragile Species (Thomas), 1992
 Fragmente (Grimm), 1900
 Fragmente (Novalis), 1947(?)
 Fragments d'un discours amoureux (Barthes), 1977
 Fragments from My Diary (Gor'kii), 1924
 Fragments sur Mallarmé (Valéry), 1924
 Fragmenty (Březina), 1989
 Frammenti di etica (Croce), 1922
 Français au Canada (Groulx), 1932
 Français, si vous saviez (Bernanos), 1961
 France byzantine (Benda), 1945
 France contre les robots (Bernanos), 1944
 Francis Bacon and the Modern Dilemma (Eiseley), 1962
 François Mauriac et le problème du romancier catholique (Du Bos), 1933
 Frank Wilmot (Vance Palmer), 1942
 Franske visitter (Heiberg), 1919
 Französische Kultur (Curtius), 1930
 Französischer Geist im neuen Europa (Curtius), 1925
 Französischer Geist im zwanzigsten Jahrhundert (Curtius), 1925
 Frauen der Romantik (Susman), 1929
 Free Thoughts on Public Affairs (Hazlitt), 1806
 Freedom and the Tragic Life (Ivanov), 1952
 Free-Holder (Addison), 1715
 Fremad til nutiden (Paludan), 1953
 French Poets and Novelists (Henry James), 1878
 French Writers and American Women (Henry James), 1960
 Frente a la República (Maeztu), 1956
 Fresh Fields (Burroughs), 1884
 Freud, Goethe, Wagner (Thomas Mann), 1937
 Freudismo (Zambrano), 1940
 Freundschaft (Heinrich Mann), 1905
 Frie vilje (Sørensen), 1992
 Friede (Jünger), 1945
 Friedrich Schiller (Dürrenmatt), 1960
 Friedrich und die grosse Koalition (Thomas Mann), 1915
 Friend (Coleridge), 1809
 Friendly Acres (McArthur), 1927
 Friendship's Garland (Arnold), 1871

- Friendship of Art (Carman), 1904
 Fröhliche Wissenschaft (Nietzsche), 1882
 From a College Window (Benson), 1906
 From Bauhaus to Our House (Wolfe), 1981
 From Bed to Worse (Benchley), 1934
 From Scotland to Silverado (Stevenson), 1966
 From the Ground Up (Mumford), 1956
 From the Other Shore (Herzen), 1956
 Frühe Prosa und Reden (Benn), 1950
 Fugitive from Utopia (Barańczak), 1987
 Fünfzehn Essays (Grimm), 1874, 1875, 1882, 1890
 Funny Pieces (Leacock), 1936
 Fuori di casa (Montale), 1969
 Further Foolishness (Leacock), 1916
 Future Australian Race (Clarke), 1877
 Future of an Illusion (Freud), 1928
 Future of the Novel (Henry James), 1956
- G.K.'s Weekly (Chesterton), 1986
 Galdós en su tiempo (Ayala), 1978
 Gamburgskii schet (Shklovskii), 1928
 Gamekeeper at Home (Jefferies), 1878
 Garden of Folly (Leacock), 1924
 Gardener's Year (Čapek), 1931
 Gastronomical Me (Fisher), 1943
 Gathering of Fugitives (Trilling), 1956
 Gaucho Martín Fierro (Unamuno), 1967
 Gay Science (Nietzsche), 1974
 Gazetnaia Moskva (Giliarovskii), 1960
 Gde otstypaetsia liubov' (Tsvetaeva), 1991
 Geburt der Tragödie (Nietzsche), 1872
 Gedanken bei dem frühzeitigen Ableben des Herrn Johann Friedrich von Funck (Kant), 1760
 Gedanken über Tod und Unsterblichkeit (Feuerbach), 1830
 Gedanken von der wahren Schätzung der lebendigen Kräfte und Beurtheilung der Beweise (Kant), 1747
 Gedankenfuge (Dürrenmatt), 1992
 Gegen die verstreichende Zeit (Grass), 1991
 Geheimherz der Uhr (Canetti), 1987
 Geheimnisse der Sprache (Jünger), 1934
 Geist der Mathematik (Bense), 1939
 Geist und Tat (Heinrich Mann), 1931
 Geistige Lage (Heinrich Mann), 1932
 Gelassenheit (Heidegger), 1959
 Gender of Rosalind (Kott), 1992
 Genealogy of Morals (Nietzsche), 1897
 General Dictionary, Historical and Critical (Bayle), 1734
 General History and State of Europe (Voltaire), 1754
 General Introduction to Psychoanalysis (Freud), 1920

- Generally Speaking (Chesterton), 1928
 Generations (Marías), 1970
 Género epistolar (Monsiváis), 1991
 Genèse (Serrès), 1982
 Genesis (Serrès), 1995
 Génie du christianisme (Chateaubriand), 1802
 Genius and Lust (Mailer), 1976
 Genius of Christianity (Chateaubriand), 1802
 Genius of Spain (Madariaga), 1923
 Génocide en douce (Vadeboncoeur), 1976
 Gensyn med havet (Sønderby), 1957
 Genteel Tradition (Santayana), 1967
 Genteel Tradition at Bay (Santayana), 1931
 Geo Bogza (Steinhardt), 1980
 Geografía de la novela (Fuentes), 1993
 Geometría moral (Montalvo), 1902
 George Meredith and English Comedy (Pritchett), 1970
 Gerausch in der Strasse (Bense), 1960
 Gerettete Zunge (Canetti), 1977
 German Ideology (Marx), 1964
 German Mind (Santayana), 1968
 German Realists in the Nineteenth Century (Lukács), 1993
 Gesammelte Aufsätze zur Religionssoziologie (Weber), 1920
 Gesammelte Aufsätze zur romanischen Philologie (Curtius), 1960
 Gesammelte Aufsätze zur Sozial- und Wirtschaftsgeschichte (Weber), 1924
 Gesammelte Aufsätze zur Soziologie und Sozialpolitik (Weber), 1924
 Gesammelte Aufsätze zur Wissenschaftslehre (Weber), 1922
 Geschichte der alten und neuen Literatur (Schlegel), 1812
 Geschichte und Klassenbewusstsein (Lukács), 1923
 Geschichte und Politik (Ranke), 1942
 Geschlossene Handelstaat (Fichte), 1800
 Gespaltene Zukunft (Canetti), 1972
 Gespräch über die Poesie (Schlegel), 1800
 Gestalt (Jünger), 1963
 Gestalten und Kreise (Susman), 1954
 Gewissen der Worte (Canetti), 1975
 Gift of Black Folk (Du Bois), 1924
 Gift of Good Land (Berry), 1981
 Gilceava înjeptului cu lumea (Călinescu), 1973
 Giosuè Carducci (Croce), 1920
 Giovanni Pascoli (Croce), 1920
 Giving Good Weight (McPhee), 1979
 Glæde over Danmark (Paludan), 1958
 Glass Walking-Stick (Chesterton), 1955
 Glauben und Liebe (Novalis), 1798
 Glosari (d'Ors), 1907
 Glossolaliia (Belyi), 1922
 Glosy wóród nocy (Brzozowski), 1912

- God (Herder), 1940
 God and the Bible (Arnold), 1875
 God and the People (Mazzini), 1891
 God in the Dock (Lewis), 1970
 God, Man and the Church (Solov'ev), 1938
 God Owes Us Nothing (Kołakowski), 1995
 Gods (Alain), 1974
 Godzina Cieni (Herling-Grudziński), 1991
 Goethe (Croce), 1919
 Goethe (Du Bos), 1949
 Goethe (Grimm), 1876
 Goethe and His Age (Lukács), 1968
 Goethe desde dentro (Ortega y Gasset), 1932
 Goethe és kora (Lukács), 1946
 Goethes Laufbahn als Schriftsteller (Thomas Mann), 1982
 Goethes Wahlverwandtschaften (Benjamin), 1964
 Going on Talking (Wright), 1992
 Golden Day (Mumford), 1926
 Golos iz khora (Siniavskii), 1973
 Good in the Teaching of Tolstoy and Nietzsche (Shestov), 1969
 Gordische Knoten (Jünger), 1953
 Gorgias (Plato)
 Gospoda Tashkenttsy (Saltykov-Shchedrin), 1869
 Gott (Herder), 1787
 Götzen-Dämmerung (Nietzsche), 1889
 Gouverner ou disparaître (Vadeboncoeur), 1993
 Grablegung des alten Deutschland (Lukács), 1967
 Grammar of Motives (Kenneth Burke), 1945
 Granada la bella (Ganivet), 1896
 Grand Canyon (Krutch), 1958
 Grande Épreuve des démocraties (Benda), 1945
 Grande Peur des bien-pensants (Bernanos), 1931
 Grandeur et misère de Benjamin Constant (Du Bos), 1946
 Grandmother and Wolfe Tone (Butler), 1990
 Grands Cimetières sous la lune (Bernanos), 1938
 Granite and Rainbow (Woolf), 1958
 Grass Roots of Art (Read), 1947
 Gravity and Grace (Weil), 1952
 Great Betrayal (Benda), 1928
 Great Chain of Life (Krutch), 1956
 Great Code (Frye), 1982
 Great Comic Book Heroes (Richler), 1978
 Great Contest of Faith and Reason (Bayle), 1963
 Greek Studies (Pater), 1895
 Greene on Film (Greene), 1972
 Grenzgänge (Jünger), 1966
 Griechen und Römer (Schlegei), 1797
 Griechische Kulturgeschichte (Burckhardt), 1898

- Grønlandsk sommer (Sønderby), 1941
 Groundwork of the Metaphysic of Morals (Kant), 1948
 Grundlage der gesammten Wissenschaftslehre (Fichte), 1794
 Grundlage des Naturrechts nach Prinzipien der Wissenschaftslehre (Fichte), 1796
 Grundlegung zur Metaphysik der Sitten (Kant), 1785
 Grundriss des Eigentümlichen der Wissenschaftslehre (Fichte), 1795
 Grundsätze der Philosophie der Zukunft (Feuerbach), 1843
 Grundzüge des gegenwärtigen Zeitalters (Fichte), 1806
 Gua dou ji (Zhou Zuoren), 1937
 Guardian (Addison), 1713
 Guardian (Steele), 1713
 Guatemala (Martí), 1878
 Guatemala con una piedra adentro (Cardoza y Aragón), 1983
 Guatemala, las líneas de su mano (Cardóza y Aragon), 1955
 Gubernskie ocherki (Saltykov-Shchedrin), 1856
 Guerra desde Londres (Madariaga), 1918
 Guerre de trente ans (Massis), 1940
 Guía del lector del "Quijote" (Madariaga), 1926
 Guide to Aesthetics (Croce), 1965
 Guide to Kulchur (Pound), 1938
 Gujin yilie zhuan (Zhang Dai), 1628
 Gusto de México (Picón-Salas), 1952
 Gyldne middelvej og andre debatindlaeg fra 70'erne (Sørensen), 1978
- Haben wir noch jetzt das Publikum und Vaterland der Alten? (Herder), 1765
 Habitations of the Word (Gass), 1985
 Hacia otra España (Maeztu), 1899
 Hacia un saber sobre el alma (Zambrano), 1950
 Hamburg Dramaturgy (Lessing), 1962
 Hamburgische Dramaturgie (Lessing), 1767
 Hamlet (Hostos), 1873
 Hammer of the Gods (Nietzsche), 1996
 Han gik ture (Paludan), 1949
 Handbook of the Militant Christian (Erasmus), 1962
 Handful of Authors (Chesterton), 1953
 Handlungen und Abhandlungen (Borchardt), 1928
 Hanoi (McCarthy), 1968
 Happy Days (Mencken), 1940
 Happy Half-Century (Replier), 1908
 Harlan Hubbard (Berry), 1990
 Harvest of Leisure (Kenkō), 1931
 Hass (Heinrich Mann), 1933
 Have with You to Saffron-Walden (Nashe), 1596
 Hawthorn (Sønderby), 1966
 He That Plays the King (Tynan), 1950
 Headmaster (McPhee), 1966
 Hearst Essays (Aldous Huxley), 1994
 Heart of Howe (Joseph Howe), 1939

- Heart's Desire (Hoagland), 1988
 Hearts of Controversy (Meynell), 1917
 Heathen Days (Mencken), 1943
 Hegel (Adorno), 1993
 Heirs of General Practice (McPhee), 1984
 Henry Bourne Higgins (Nettie Palmer), 1931
 Henry Handel Richardson (Nettie Palmer), 1950
 Henry Kendal (Hope), 1971
 Henry Lawson (Wright), 1967
 Henry Moore, Sculptor (Read), 1934
 Hen's Teeth and Horse's Toes (Gould), 1983
 Heraldos de la verdad (Martínez Estrada), 1958
 Here Are My Lectures and Stories (Leacock), 1937
 Here Is New York (White), 1949
 Herman Melville (Mumford), 1929
 Hermann, encadenado (Pérez de Ayala), 1917
 Hermano Quiroga (Martínez Estrada), 1957
 Hermaphrodite (Serrés), 1987
 Hermes (Serrés), 1968
 Hero (Gracián), 1726
 Héroe (Gracián), 1637
 Heterodoxia (Lourenço), 1949
 Heterodoxia (Sabato), 1953
 Hidalgos (Azorín), 1900
 Hidden History (Březina)
 Hidden Wound (Berry), 1970
 Highway and the City (Mumford), 1963
 Hijos del limo (Paz), 1974
 Hilflose Europa (Musil), 1961
 Hills and the Sea (Belloc), 1906
 Hills and the Vale (Jefferies), 1909
 Hippias major (Plato)
 Hippias minor (Plato)
 Hispanoamérica (Marías), 1984
 Hispanoamérica frente a los nacionalismos agresivos (Vasconcelos), 1934
 Hispano-América, posición crítica (Picón- Salas), 1931
 Hispano-moresque (Montherlant), 1929
 Histoire de la littérature anglaise (Taine), 1863
 Histoire de mes pensées (Alain), 1936
 Histoire des oracles (Fontenelle), 1687
 Histoire et utopie (Cioran), 1960
 Histoire extraordinaire (Butor), 1961
 Historia de la eternidad (Borges), 1936
 Historia de la libertad (Ayala), 1942
 Historia de los heterodoxos españoles (Menéndez y Pelayo), 1880
 Historia de una pasión argentina (Mallea), 1937
 Historia de vecinos (González), 1993
 Historical and Critical Dictionary (Bayle), 1710

- Historical Characters (Oliphant), 1894
 Historical Materialism and the Economics of Karl Marx (Croce), 1914
 Historical Novel (Lukács), 1962
 Historical Reason (Ortega y Gasset), 1984
 Historical Sketches (Newman), 1872
 Historical Sketches of Notable Persons and Events (Carlyle), 1898
 Historical Sketches of the Reign of George II (Oliphant), 1869
 Historical Sketches of the Reign of Queen Anne (Oliphant), 1894
 Historische Fragmente (Burckhardt), 1929
 History (Croce), 1921
 History and Class Consciousness (Lukács), 1971
 History and Utopia (Cioran), 1987
 History as a System (Ortega y Gasset), 1946
 History as the Story of Liberty (Croce), 1941
 History of an Argentine Passion (Mallea), 1983
 History of an Autumn (Morley), 1938
 History of English Literature (Taine), 1871
 History of Europe in the Nineteenth Century (Croce), 1933
 History of Florence (Guicciardini), 1965
 History of Florence (Machiavelli), 1675
 History of Greek Culture (Burckhardt), 1963
 History of Italy (Croce), 1929
 History of Italy (Guicciardini), 1579
 History of New York (Irving), 1809
 History of Oracles (Fontenelle), 1699
 History of Romanian Literature (Călinescu), 1989
 History of Sex (Beauvoir), 1961
 History of the Kingdom of Naples (Croce), 1970
 Histrionismo y representación (Ayala), 1944
 Hodge and His Masters (Jefferies), 1880
 Hohe Breitengrade (Andersch), 1969
 Hohenzollerns in America (Leacock), 1919
 Hōjōki (Kamo no Chōmei), 1976
 Holy Face (Aldous Huxley), 1929
 Holzwege (Heidegger), 1950
 Homage to Daniel Shays (Vidal), 1972,
 Homage to John Dryden (T. S. Eliot), 192.4
 Hombre y la gente (Ortega y Gasset), 1957
 Hombre y lo divino (Zambrano), 1955
 Hombres de América (Rodó), 1899
 Hombres del norte (Ganivet), 1905
 Hombres en su siglo (Paz), 1984
 Hombres y engranajes (Sabatoj), 1951
 Home Economics (Berry), 1987
 Home Sweet Home (Richler), 1984
 Homecoming (Ngugi), 1972
 Homilia por la cultura (Reyes), 1935
 Homme révolté (Camus), 1951

- Homoeopathy and Its Kindred Delusions (Holmes), 1842.
 Honest Rainmaker (Liebling), 1953
 Honneur de servir (Massis), 1937
 Honorable Reader (Merton), 1989
 Honour and Advantage of Agriculture (Feijóo y Montenegro), 1764
 Hopes and Fears for Art (Morris), 1882.
 Hopes and Impediments (Achebe), 1988
 Hora de España (Azorín)1924
 Hora de la pluma (Azorín), 1987
 Hora y deshora (Picón-Salas), 1963
 Horas de Burgos (Reyes), 1932
 Horas de estudio (Henríquez Ureña), 1910
 Hosshinshū (Kamo no Chōmei), 1976
 Hours in a Library (Stephen), 1874
 House of Fiction (Henry James), 1957
 Household Education (Martineau), 1849
 Household Words (Dickens), 1850
 How to Cook a Wolf (Fisher), 1942.
 How to Tell a Story (Twain), 1897
 How to Travel with a Salmon (Eco), 1994
 Huabian wenxue (Lu Xun), 1936
 Huagai ji (Lu Xun), 1926
 Hudba pramenů (Březina), 1903
 Hugg og stikk (Heiberg), 1951
 Hugging the Shore (Updike), 1983
 Huit aphorismes (Gourmont), 1920
 Human, All Too Human (Nietzsche), 1908
 Human Condition (Arendt), 1958
 Human Nature and Human Condition (Krutch), 1959
 Human Prospect (Mumford), 1955
 Human Province (Canetti), 1978
 Humanismo y sociedad (Tierno Galván), 1964
 Humanist in the Bath tub (McCarthy), 1964
 Humanités (Alain), 1946
 Hume, with Helps to the Study of Berkeley (T.H.Huxley), 1894
 Humor i prawo (Brzozowski), 1988
 Hunting Tigers Under Glass (Richler), 1968
 Husserl and the Search for Certitude (Kolakowski), 1975
 Hverken—eller (Sørensen), 1961
 Hvidtjørnen (Sønderby), 1950
 Hydriotaphia (Browne), 1658
 Hymns to the Night (Novalis), 1960
- I Cannot Be Silent (Tolstoi), 1989
 I for One (Priestley), 1923
 I Had a Dog and a Cat (Čapek), 1940
 Ibsen og Bjørnson på scenen (Heiberg), 1918
 Idea de principio en Leibniz (Ortega y Gasset), 1958

- Idea of a Christian Society (T.S.Eliot), 1939
 Idea of a University (Newman), 1873
 Idea of Christ in the Gospels (Santayana), 1946
 Idea of History (Castro), 1977
 Idea of Principle in Leibnitz (Ortega y Gasset), 1971
 Ideal Book (Morris), 1982
 Idealisme (Gourmont), 1893
 Idealismo y pragmatismo en el siglo XIX español (Tierno Galván), 1977
 Ideario (Rodó), 1941
 Ideario (Sarmiento), 1943
 Ideario de acción (Vasconcelos), 192,4
 Idearium español (Ganivet), 1897
 Ideas and Places (Connolly), 1953
 Ideas and the Novel (McCarthy), 1980
 Ideas en Iberoamérica en el siglo XIX (Zea), 1957
 Ideas for a Philosophy of the History of Man (Herder), 1968
 Ideas y las formas (d'Ors), 1928
 Idée russe (Solov'ev), 1888
 Ideen zur Philosophie der Geschichte der Menschheit (Herder), 1785
 Idées du jour (Gourmont), 1917
 Idées et les âges (Alain), 1927
 Idées restent (Massis), 1941
 Identität und Differenz (Heidegger), 1957
 Identity and Difference (Heidegger), 1960
 Idioma de los argentinos (Borges), 1928
 Idle Thoughts of a Recluse (Kenkō), 1914
 Idler (Johnson), 1758
 Idler and His Works (Santayana), 1957
 Idol and the Octopus (Mailer), 1968
 If It Die (Gide), 1935
 If This Is a Man (Levi), 1960
 If You Don't Mind My Saying So (Krutch), 1964
 Ignoble Savages (Picón-Salas), 1965
 Iliad (Weil), 1956
 Illness as Metaphor (Sontag), 1978
 Ill-Tempered Clavichord (Perelman), 1952
 Illuminationen (Benjamin), 1961
 Illuminations (Benjamin), 1968
 Illusions et réalités juives (Steinhardt), 1936
 Illustrations (Butor), 1964
 Im alten Reich (Huch), 1927
 Image, Music, Text (Barthes), 1977
 Imagen de España (Ayala), 1986
 Imagen de la vida humana (Marías), 1955
 Imaginary Interviews (Howells), 1910
 Imaginary Portraits (Pater), 1887
 Imagination and Fancy (Hunt), 1844
 Immense Journey (Eiseley), 1957

- Immigrant Jews of New York (Irving Howe), 1976
 Impact (Pound), 1960
 Impresii asupra literaturii spaniole (Călinescu), 1946
 Impressions and Experiences (Howells), 1896
 Impressions of Theophrastus Such (George Eliot), 1879
 Impromptus (Adorno), 1968
 Improvisations sur Flaubert (Butor), 1984
 Improvisations sur Henri Michaux (Butor), 1985
 Improvisations sur Michel Butor (Butor), 1993
 Improvisations sur Rimbaud (Butor), 1989
 In Catalinam (Cicero)
 In Defence of Shelley (Read), 1936
 In Defense of Women (Mencken), 1918
 In genul tinerilor (Steinhardt), 1934
 In Job's Balances (Shestov), 1932
 In Limestone Country (Sanders), 1985
 In/Mediaciones (Paz), 1979
 In My Good Books (Pritchett), 1942
 In Nature's Heart (John Muir), 1991
 In Pastures Green (McArthur), 1915
 In Pisonem (Cicero)
 In Praise of Newspapers (Čapek), 1951
 In Pursuit of Happiness (Tolstoi), 1887
 In Pursuit of Laughter (Replier), 1936
 In Search of Our Mothers' Gardens (Walker), 1983
 In Search of Wagner (Adorno), 1981
 In silvis cum libro (Ekelund), 1957
 In Suspect Terrain (McPhee), 1983
 In the Dozy Hours (Replier), 1894
 In the Highlands and Islands (McPhee), 1986
 In the South Seas (Stevenson), 1896
 In Vatinium (Cicero)
 Inaugural Lecture, Collège de France (Barthes), 1982
 Incertitudini literare (Steinhardt), 1980
 Incidences (Gide), 1924
 Incidents (Barthes), 1987
 Incomparable Max (Beerbohm), 1962
 Indagación del cinema (Ayala), 1929
 Indagini su Hegel (Croce), 1952
 Indépendance du Canada (Groulx), 1949
 Indépendances (Vadeboncoeur), 1972
 Indicator (Hunt), 1819
 Indigent Philosophe (Marivaux), 1727
 Individuelle Gesetz (Simmel), 1968
 Individuum und die Freiheit (Simmel), 1984
 Indología (Vasconcelos), 1927
 Indoor Studies (Burroughs), 1889
 Influence of Literature upon Society (Staël), 1812

- Informe...en el expediente de ley agraria (Jovellanos), 1795
 Inland Voyage (Stevenson), 1878
 Inner Experience (Bataille), 1988
 Innocent Eye (Read), 1933
 Inquietudes y meditaciones (Unamuno), 1957
 Inquiry Concerning Virtue in Two Discourses (Shaftesbury), 1699
 Inquisiciones (Borges), 1925
 Însemnări și polemice (Călinescu), 1988
 Inside Benchley (Benchley), 1942
 Inside the Monster (Martí), 1975
 Inside the Whale (Orwell), 1940
 Instigations (Pound), 1920
 Institutio principis Christiani (Erasmus), 1516
 Integración social en América (Ayala), 1958
 Intelectual y su mundo (Marías), 1956
 Intelectuales en el drama de España (Zambrano), 1937
 Inteligencia sentiente (Zubiri), 1980
 Inteligencia y logos (Zubiri), 1982
 Inteligencia y razón (Zubiri), 1983
 Intelligencer (Swift), 1992
 Intentions (Wilde), 1891
 Internal Revenue (Morley), 1933
 Interpretation and Overinterpretation (Eco), 1992
 Interpretation of Dreams (Freud), 1913
 Interpretations and Forecasts (Mumford), 1973
 Interpretations of Poetry and Religion (Santayana), 1900
 Interpreter of Nature (Diderot), 1937
 Intimate Portraits (Vance Palmer), 1969
 Intimate Things (Čapek), 1935
 Intimations of Christianity Among the Ancient Greeks (Weil), 1957
 Între viațâși cărți (Steinhardt), 1976
 Introducción a las ciencias sociales (Ayala), 1952
 Introduction à la méthode de Léonard de Vinci (Valéry), 1919
 Introduction to the Method of Leonardo da Vinci (Valéry), 1929
 Introduction to the Sociology of Music (Adorno), 1976
 Introductions East and West (Merton), 1981
 Introductory Lectures on Psycho-Analysis (Freud), 1963
 Intuición de Chile (Picón-Salas), 1935
 Intuitions préchrétiennes (Weil), 1951
 Invariantes históricos en el "Facundo" (Martínez Estrada), 1947
 Invención del "Quijote" (Ayala), 1950
 Invencion del Quijote (Azaña), 1934
 Inventory (Butor), 1968
 Invisible Pyramid (Eiseley), 1970
 Invitación a la vida heroica (Mariátegui), 1989
 Invocação ao meu corpo (Ferreira), 1969
 Inward Ho! (Morley), 1923
 Ion (Plato)

- Irish Essays (Arnold), 1882
 Irish Literary Portraits (Eglinton), 1935
 Irish Sketch-Book (Thackeray), 1843
 Irodalom és demokrácia (Lukács), 1947
 Iron Man and the Tin Woman (Leacock), 1929
 Ironia i harmonia (Barańczak), 1973
 Ironing Board (Morley), 1949
 Ishi Means Man (Merton), 1976
 Iskaniia i razmyshleniia (Dostoevskii), 1983
 Isla de Puerto Rico (Zambrano), 1940
 Ispoved' (Tolstoi), 1884
 Israel and the Dead Sea Scrolls (Wilson), 1978
 Istoria literaturii române de la origini pînă în prezent (Călinescu), 1941
 Istoricheskie povesti i rasskazy (Shklovskii), 1958
 Istoricheskie zapiski (Gershenzon), 1910
 Istorie fiorentine (Machiavelli), 1532
 Istoriia molodoi Rossii (Gershenzon), 1908
 Italian Hours (Henry James), 1909
 Ital'ianskie vpechatleniia (Rozanov), 1909
 Italienische Reise (Goethe), 1862
 Italské listy (Čapek), 1923
 Itinerario (Paz), 1993
 Itinerio (Sabato), 1969
 Iz vostochnykh motivov (Rozanov), 1916
- Jacobite's Journal (Fielding), 1747
 Jak se dela chalpec (Vaculík), 1993
 Jak wam się podoba (Kott), 1955
 Jar of Honey from Mount Hybla (Hunt), 1848
 Jardín botánico (d'Ors), 1940
 Jaro je tady (Vaculík), 1988
 Jeanne d'Arc (Alain), 1925
 Jeanne, relapse et sainte (Bernanos), 1934
 Jenseits des Lustprinzips (Freud), 1920
 Jenseits von Gut und Böse (Nietzsche), 1886
 Jerusalem (Mendelssohn), 1783
 Jeunes Gens d'aujourd'hui (Massis), 1913
 Język poetycki Mirona Białoszewskiego (Barańczak), 1974
 John Dryden (T.S.Eliot), 1932
 Jollity Building (Liebling), 1962
 José Guadalupe Posada (Cardoza y Aragón), 1964
 Josef Čapek (Havel), 1963
 Joujou (Gourmont), 1926
 Joujou patriotisme (Gourmont), 1967
 Journal dénoué (Oullette), 1974
 Journal of Researches (Darwin), 1839
 Journey to Tai-Me (Momaday), 1967
 Jouvences sur Jules Verne (Serrès), 1974

- Jovellanos (Ayala), 1945
 Joy for Ever (Ruskin), 1880
 Joyful Wisdom (Nietzsche), 1910
 Joyous Gard (Benson), 1913
 Judgements on History and Historians (Burckhardt), 1958
 Jugements (Massis), 1923
 Juicios sumarios (Castellanos), 1966
 Julien Benda and the New Humanism (Read), 1930
 Julius Exclusus (Erasmus), 1517
 Junge Hegel (Lukács), 1948
 Junta de sombras (Reyes), 1949
 Jurnalul fericii (Steinhardt), 1991
 Just Looking (Updike), 1989
 Justification of the Good (Solov'ev), 1918
 Juvenilia (Donne), 1633
- Kafka's Other Trial (Canetti), 1974
 Kalendář (Čapek), 1940
 Kameshki na ladoni (Soloukhin), 1977
 Kamienny potok (Kott), 1986
 Kampf als inneres Erlebnis (Jünger), 1922
 Kandy-Kolored Tangerine-Flake Streamline Baby (Wolfe), 1965
 Kant (Simmel), 1904
 Kant, Hegel, Dilthey (Ortega y Gasset), 1958
 Kanyun ji (Zhou Zuoren), 1932
 Kapitan Fedotov (Shklovskii), 1936
 Karl Marx und Friedrich Engels als Literaturhistoriker (Lukács), 1948
 Cassandra (Wolf), 1983
 Keep It Crisp (Perelman), 1946
 Kerrines II (Cicero)
 Khod konia (Shklovskii), 1923
 Kierkegaard (Adorno), 1933
 Kierkegaard and the Existential Philosophy (Shestov), 1969
 Kierkegaard i eksistentsialnaia filosofii (Shestov), 1939
 King of the Hill (Mailer), 1971
 Kingdom of God Is Within You (Tolstoi), 1894
 Kinship of Nature (Carman), 1903
 Klangfiguren (Adorno), 1959
 Klimat życia i klimat literatury (Stempowski), 1988
 Kogato chasovnitsite sa spreli (Markov), 1991
 Kogda nachal'stvo ushlo (Rozanov), 1910
 Kolokol (Herzen), 1887
 Kontsy i nachala (Herzen), 1862
 Kontyenty (Miłosz), 1958
 Koshelek (Novikov), 1774
 Kosmopolis der Wissenschaft (Curtius), 1989
 Krakonošova zahrada (Čapek), 1918
 Kratkaia no dostovernaia povest' o dvorianine Bolotove (Shklovskii), 1930

Krieg und die deutsche Selbsteinkehr (Borchardt), 1915
 Krieg und die geistigen Entscheidungen (Simmel), 1917
 Kritik (Adorno), 1971
 Kritik der praktischen Vernunft (Kant), 1788
 Kritik der reinen Vernunft (Kant), 1781
 Kritik der Urteilskraft (Kant), 1790
 Kritika slov (Čapek), 1920
 Kritikai realizmus (Lukács), 1952
 Kritische Essays zur europäischen Literatur (Curtius), 1950
 Książki najgorsze (Barańczak), 1981
 Ku cha suibi (Zhou Zuoren), 1935
 Ku kou gan kou (Zhou Zuoren), 1944
 Ku yu zhai xu bawen (Zhou Zuoren), 1934
 Ku zhu za ji (Zhou Zuoren), 1936
 Kultura i fetysze (Kolakowski), 1967
 Kultura i życie (Brzozowski), 1907
 Kunst der Betrachtung (Burckhardt), 1984
 Kunst und Macht (Benn), 1934
 Kunst und objektive Wahrheit (Lukács), 1977
 Kunstwerke der belgischen Städte (Burckhardt), 1842

Laberinto de la soledad (Paz), 1950
 Labirinto da saudade (Lourenço), 1978
 Labyrinth (Dürrenmatt), 1990
 Labyrinth of Solitude (Paz), 1961
 Laches (Plato)
 Lacrimi si sfîni (Cioran), 1937
 Laelius (Cicero)
 La Fontaine et ses fables (Taine), 1861
 Lamp of Beauty (Ruskin), 1959
 Land of Ulro (Miłosz), 1984
 Landeveje og tankeveje (Paludan), 1963
 Landscape and Labour (Jefferies), 1979
 Landscape with Figures (Jefferies), 1983
 Langhuan shiwenji (Zhang Dai), 1877
 Language as Symbolic Action (Kenneth Burke), 1966
 Lantern Bearers (Stevenson), 1988
 Lanterne (Buies), 1884
 Lanterns and Lances (Thurber), 1961
 Laocoon (Lessing), 1836
 Laokoon (Lessing), 1766
 Larmes d'Éros (Bataille), 1961
 Larmes et des saints (Cioran), 1986
 Lascaux (Bataille), 1955
 Last Decade (Trilling), 1979
 Last Essays of Elia (Lamb), 1833
 Last Essays on Church and Religion (Arnold), 1877
 Last Harvest (Burroughs), 1922

- Last House (Fisher), 1995
 Last Laugh (Perelman), 1981
 Last Leaves (Leacock), 1945
 Last Theatres (Beerbohm), 1970
 Lasting Impressions (Pritchett), 1990
 Late Night Thoughts on Listening to Mahler's Ninth Symphony (Thomas), 1983
 Latin America (Arciniegas), 1966
 Latin America and the World (Zea), 1969
 Latin mystique (Gourmont), 1892
 Latin-American Mind (Zea), 1963
 Latinoamérica (Arciniegas), 1967
 Latinoamérica (Zea), 1971
 Latinoamérica en la encrucijada de la historia (Zea), 1981
 Latinoamérica en la formación de nuestro tiempo (Zea), 1965
 Latinoamérica, un nuevo humanismo (Zea), 1982
 Latinoamérica y el mundo (Zea), 1960
 Latitudes (Edwin Muir), 1924
 Latter-Day Pamphlets (Carlyle), 1850
 Laugh Parade (Leacock), 1940
 Laws (Plato), 1921
 Lay Sermon (Coleridge), 1817
 Lay Sermons (T.H.Huxley), 1870
 Lazarillo (Ayala), 1971
 Leaf and Tendril (Burroughs), 1908
 Leaves of the Tree (Benson), 1911
 Leben der Mathematiker (Bense), 1944
 Leben Goethes (Grimm), 1939
 Lebensanschauung (Simmel), 1918
 Lecciones de derecho constitucional (Hostos), 1887
 Lecciones de libertad (Montalvo), 1958
 Leçon inaugurale au Collège de France (Barthes), 1978
 Leçons de philosophie (Weil), 1959
 Lector in fabula (Eco), 1979
 Lectura es secreto (Chacel), 1989
 Lecturas españolas (Azorín), 1912
 Lectures and Essays on University Subjects (Newman), 1859
 Lectures, Chiefly on the Dramatic Literature of the Age of Elizabeth (Hazlitt), 1820
 Lectures on Architecture and Painting (Ruskin), 1854
 Lectures on Art (Morris), 1882
 Lectures on Art (Ruskin), 1870
 Lectures on Art (Taine), 1875
 Lectures on Certain Difficulties Felt by Anglicans (Newman), 1850
 Lectures on Divine Humanity (Solov'ev), 1995
 Lectures on Evolution (T.H.Huxley), 1882
 Lectures on Godmanhood (Solov'ev), 1948
 Lectures on Justification (Newman), 1838
 Lectures on Kant's Political Philosophy (Arendt), 1982
 Lectures on Landscape (Ruskin), 1897

- Lectures on Philosophy (Weil), 1978
 Lectures on the Elements of Comparative Anatomy (T.H.Huxley), 1864
 Lectures on the English Comic Writers (Hazlitt), 1819
 Lectures on the English Poets (Hazlitt), 1818
 Lectures on the Essence of Religion (Feuerbach), 1967
 Lectures on the History of Literature, Ancient and Modern (Schlegel), 1818
 Lectures on the Present Position of Catholics in England (Newman), 1851
 Lectures on the Prophetical Office of the Church (Newman), 1837
 Leer y escribir (Martínez Estrada), 1969
 Lefnadsstämning (Ekelund), 1925
 Legend of the Nineties (Vance Palmer), 1954
 Legenda Młodej Polski (Brzozowski), 1910
 Legenda o velikom inkvizitore F.M.Dostoevskogo (Rozanov), 1891
 Légende des anges (Serrès), 1993
 Lei yu xiao (Liang Yuchun), 1934
 Leiden und Grösse der Meister (Thomas Mann), 1935
 Lélek és a formák (Lukács), 1910
 Lendemain, c'est vous! (Bernanos), 1969
 Lengua, enseñanza y literatura (Castro), 1924
 Lenguaje de Buenos Aires (Borges), 1963
 Lenten Stufe (Nashe), 1599
 Leopoldo Lugones (Martínez Estrada), 1968
 Lesen und Schreiben (Wolf), 1972
 Less than One (Brodsky), 1986
 Let Us Now Praise Famous Men (Agee), 1941
 Let Your Mind Alone! (Thurber), 1937
 Letanías del atardecer (Vasconcelos), 1959
 Letní přemítání (Havel), 1991
 Letras de la Nueva Españ (Reyes), 1948
 Letter Concerning Enthusiasm (Shaftesbury), 1708
 Letter of Moses Mendelssohn, to Deacon Lavater (Mendelssohn), 1821
 Letter to a Member of the National Assembly (Edmund Burke), 1791
 Letter to a Priest (Weil), 1954
 Letter to a Returning Serviceman (Priestley), 1945
 Letter to a Young Painter (Read), 1962
 Letter to Madan Blanchard (E.M.Forster), 1931
 Letter to M.d'Alembert (Rousseau), 1759
 Letter to the Duke of Norfolk (Newman), 1875
 Letter to the Rev. E.B.Pusey, D.D. (Newman), 1866
 Letter upon the Blind (Diderot), 1857
 Letteratura della nuova Italia (Croce), 1914
 Letteratura e critica della letteratura contemporanea in Italia (Croce), 1908
 Letteratura italiana del Settecento (Croce), 1949
 Lettere con gli scritti di Montale su Svevo (Montale), 1966
 Lettere dal carcere (Gramsci), 1947
 Letters (Seneca), 1917
 Letters and Social Aims (Emerson), 1876
 Letters Concerning the English Nation (Voltaire), 1733

- Letters for Literary Ladies (Edgeworth), 1795
 Letters from a Chinese Philosopher (Goldsmith), 1762
 Letters from a Stoic (Seneca), 1969
 Letters from England (Čapek), 1925
 Letters from England (Southey), 1807
 Letters from France and Italy (Herzen), 1995
 Letters from Holland (Čapek), 1933
 Letters from Ireland (Martineau), 1853
 Letters from Italy (Čapek), 1929
 Letters from Prison (Gramsci), 1994
 Letters from Spain (Čapek), 1932
 Letters of an Old Playgoer (Arnold), 1919
 Letters of Askance (Morley), 1939
 Letters of Gallantry (Fontenelle), 1715
 Letters of Jonathan Oldstyle, Gent. (Irving), 1824
 Letters on England (Voltaire), 1980
 Letters on Geology (Darwin), 1835
 Letters on Mesmerism (Martineau), 1845
 Letters on the Laws of Man's Nature and Development (Martineau), 1851
 Letters to a Young Doctor (Selzer), 1982
 Letters to Atticus (Cicero), 1961
 Letters to Cristina (Freire), 1996
 Letters to His Godson and Successor (Chesterfield), 1890
 Letters to His Son (Chesterfield), 1973
 Letters to His Son Philip Stanhope (Chesterfield), 1774
 Letters to Lucilius (Seneca), 1932
 Letters to Olga (Havel), 1988
 Letters to the Amazon (Gourmont), 1931
 Letters Written During a Journey in Spain (Southey), 1808
 Letters Written During a Short Residence in Spain and Portugal (Southey), 1797
 Letters Written During a Short Residence in Sweden, Norway, and Denmark (Wollstonecraft), 1796
 Lettre à d'Alembert sur les spectacles (Rousseau), 1758
 Lettre à un religieux (Weil), 1951
 Lettre aux Anglais (Bernanos), 1942
 Lettre sur la comète (Bayle), 1682.
 Lettre sur les aveugles (Diderot), 1749
 Lettre sur les sourds et muets (Diderot), 1751
 Lettres (Balzac), 1624
 Lettres (Sévigné), 1725
 Lettres à l'Amazone (Gourmont), 1914
 Lettres à Mélisande (Benda), 1925
 Lettres à M.Conrart (Balzac), 1659
 Lettres contenant une aventure (Marivaux), 1719
 Lettres diverses (Balzac), 1657
 Lettres d'un satyre (Gourmont), 1913
 Lettres écrites de la montagne (Rousseau), 1764
 Lettres écrites de Londres sur les Anglais (Voltaire), 1734

- Lettres et colères (Vadeboncoeur), 1969
 Lettres familières à M.Chapelain (Balzac), 1656
 Lettres galantes du Chevalier d'Her (Fontenelle), 1687
 Lettres inedites à J.Chapelain (Balzac), 1873
 Lettres intimes à l' Amazone (Gourmont), 1927
 Lettres philosophiques (Voltaire), 1734
 Lettres provinciales (Pascal), 1656
 Lettres sur le Canada (Buies), 1864
 Lettres sur les habitants de Paris (Marivaux), 1717
 Lettres sur les ouvrages et le caractère de Jean-Jacques Rousseau (Staël), 1788
 Letture di poeti e riflessioni sulla teoria e la critica della poesia (Croce), 1950
 Levels of the Game (McPhee), 1969
 Lezione su Dante (Varchi), 1590
 Lezioni americane (Calvino), 1988
 Lezioni (Varchi), 1590
 Liberal Imagination (Trilling), 1950
 Liberalismo y socialismo (Maeztu), 1984
 Liberté, pour quoi faire? (Bernanos), 1953
 Libro de Granada (Ganivet), 1899
 Libro de las misiones (Ortega y Gasset), 1940
 Libro de Ruth (Pérez de Ayala), 1928
 Lichun yiqian (Zhou Zuoren), 1945
 Life (Tolstoi), 1888
 Life and Holiness (Merton), 1963
 Life and Times of Frederick Douglass (Douglass), 1881
 Life and Times of Goethe (Grimm), 1880
 Life as I Find It (Twain), 1961
 Life in the Argentine Republic (Sarmiento), 1868
 Life in the Sick-Room (Martineau), 1844
 Life of a Little College (MacMechan), 1914
 Life of Don Quixote and Sancho (Unamuno), 1927
 Life of the Fields (Jefferies), 1884
 Life of the Mind (Arendt), 1978
 Life Without and Life Within (Fuller), 1859
 Light of Day (Burroughs), 1900
 Ligne du risque (Vadeboncoeur), 1963
 Lik i lichiny Rossii (Ivanov), 1995
 Lingua (Erasmus), 1525
 Lion and the Honeycomb (Tolstoi), 1987
 Lion and the Unicorn (Orwell), 1941
 Liquidación de la monarquía parlamentaria (Maeztu), 1957
 Lirismo en la poesía francesa (Pardo Bazán), 1926
 Liseur des romans (Thibaudet), 1925
 Listen, Germany! (Thomas Mann), 1943
 Listen to the Mocking Bird (Perelman), 1949
 Listy do Jerzego Giedroycia (Stempowski), 1991
 Listy o Ukrainie (Stempowski), 1933
 Listy z ziemi bernenińskiej (Stempowski), 1974

- Literarische Nachlass (Musil), 1992
 Literary Aphorisms (Schlegel), 1968
 Literary Chronicle (Wilson), 1956
 Literary Currents in Spanish America (Henríquez Ureña), 1945
 Literary Fallacy (De Voto), 1944
 Literary Friends and Acquaintance (Howells), 1900
 Literary Influence of Academies (Hope), 1970
 Literary Lapses (Leacock), 1910
 Literary Remains (Hazlitt), 1836
 Literary Values (Burroughs), 1902
 Literatura (Azorín), 1896
 Literatura e sociedade (Cândido), 1965
 Literatura i kinematograf (Shklovskii), 1923
 Literatura nouă (Călinescu), 1972
 Literatura v poiskakh real'nosti (Lidiia Ginzburg), 1987
 Literatura y generaciones (Marías), 1975
 Literatura y sociedad en Puerto Rico (González), 1976
 Literature (Grimm), 1886
 Literature and Art (Fuller), 1852
 Literature and Dogma (Arnold), 1873
 Literature and Evil (Bataille), 1973
 Literature and Life (Howells), 1902
 Literature and Science (Aldous Huxley), 1963
 Literature Machine (Calvino), 1987
 Literaturnie izgnanniki (Rozanov), 1913
 Literaturnye i zhiteiskie vospominaniia (Turgenev), 1874
 Literaturnye ocherki (Rozanov), 1899
 Litteraert selskab (Paludan), 1956
 Litteratörer och militärer (Bengtsson), 1929
 Littérature et le mal (Bataille), 1957
 Little Essays (Santayana), 1920
 Little Tour in France (Henry James), 1884
 Little Virtues (Natalia Ginzburg), 1985
 Liudi lunnogo sveta (Rozanov), 1911
 Liudi teatra (Giliarovskii), 1941
 Lives (Plutarch), 1579
 Lives of a Cell (Thomas), 1974
 Lives of the English Poets (Johnson), 1781
 Lives of the French, Italian and German Philosophers (Fontenelle), 1717
 Living Bread (Merton), 1956
 Living by the Word (Walker), 1988
 Living in Truth (Havel), 1986
 Living Novel (Pritchett), 1946
 Livre des leurres (Cioran), 1992
 Livre des masques (Gourmont), 1896
 Livret de l'imagier (Gourmont), 1920
 Locusts and Wild Honey (Burroughs), 1879
 Logic (Kant), 1974

- Logic as the Science of the Pure Concept (Croce), 1917
 Logica come scienza del concetto puro (Croce), 1905
 Lógica organica (Vasconcelos), 1945
 Logik (Kant), 1800
 London Films (Howells), 1905
 London Impressions (Meynell), 1898
 London Music in 1888–89 (Shaw), 1937
 Long Line of Cells (Thomas), 1990
 Long March (Beauvoir), 1958
 Long Patrol (Mailer), 1971
 Long-Legged House (Berry), 1969
 Longue Marche (Beauvoir), 1957
 Look Who's Talking! (Perelman), 1940
 Looking for a Ship (McPhee), 1990
 Loose Leaves (Murdoch), 1910
 Loose Sketches (Thackeray), 1894
 Lope en silueta (Azorín), 1935
 Loris (Hofmannsthal), 1931
 Lost Childhood (Greene), 1951
 Louis Esson and the Australian Theatre (Vance Palmer), 1948
 Love and Living (Merton), 1979
 Love Conquers All (Benchley), 1922
 Love Customs in 18TH-Century Spain (Martín Gaité), 1991
 Lover (Steele), 1714
 Lover's Discourse (Barthes), 1978
 Love's Meinie (Ruskin), 1873
 Lucid Intervals (Murdoch), 1936
 Lucinde (Schlegel), 1971
 Lucubrations of Isaac Bickerstaff, Esq. (Steele), 1786
 Ludzie żywi (Boy-Żeleński), 1929
 Lug zelenyi (Belyi), 1910
 Lunacy and Letters (Chesterton), 1958
 Luso e o trópico (Freyre), 1961
 Luthers Glaube (Huch), 1916
 Lyra och Hades (Ekelund), 1930
 Lysis (Plato)
- Ma Dame à la licorne (Trottier), 1988
 Macht und Mensch (Heinrich Mann), 1919
 Macht und Überleben (Canetti), 1972
 Madeleine (Gide), 1951
 Madrid (Azorín), 1941
 Madrid-Guía sentimental (Azorín), 1918
 Mai devi domandarmi (Natalia Ginzburg), 1970
 Maiakovskii and His Circle (Shklovskii), 1972
 Maine Woods (Thoreau), 1864
 Mainly on the Air (Beerbohm), 1957
 Mâitres et amis (Valéry), 1927

- Make It New (Pound), 1934
 Making of Personality (Carman), 1908
 Makura no sōshi (Sei Shōnagon)
 Malevich (Cardoza y Aragón), 1983
 Mallarmé entre nosotros (Reyes), 1938
 Malos salvajes (Picón-Salas), 1962
 Man and Crisis (Ortega y Gasset), 1958
 Man and People (Ortega y Gasset), 1957
 Man and Time (Priestley), 1964
 Man of Letters (Pritchett), 1985
 Man That Corrupted Hadleyburg (Twain), 1900
 Man the Technician (Ortega y Gasset), 1961
 Man, Time, and Prophecy (Eiseley), 1966
 Man Who Mistook His Wife for a Hat (Sacks), 1985
 Man Who Saw Through Time (Eiseley), 1973
 Man Without Qualities (Musil), 1953
 Manifest der Kommunistischen Partei (Marx), 1848
 Manifesto of the Communist Party (Marx), 1888
 Manifesto regionalista de 1926 (Freyre), 1952
 Mann Moses und die monotheistische Religion (Freud), 1939
 Mann ohne Eigenschaften (Musil), 1930
 Man's Place in Nature (T.H.Huxley), 1894
 Mansions and the Shanties (Freyre), 1963
 Manual of the Christian Knight (Erasmus), 1533
 Mar y sus pescaditos (Castellanos), 1975
 Marcel Duchamp (Paz), 1968
 Marchands de sommeil (Alain), 1919
 Marginalia (Reyes), 1952
 María Izquierdo (Monsiváis), 1986
 Marilyn (Mailer), 1975
 Marko Polo (Shklovskii), 1936
 Mars (Alain), 1921
 Marsyas (Čapek), 1931
 Martí, revolucionario (Martínez Estrada), 1967
 Martwa natura z wędzidłem (Herbert), 1993
 Marxism and Human Liberation (Lukács), 1973
 Mary, the Mother of Jesus (Meynell), 1923
 Más divagaciones literarias (Pérez de Ayala), 1960
 Máscaras (Pérez de Ayala), 1917
 Mask of State (McCarthy), 1974
 Masse und Macht (Canetti), 1960
 Master and His Fish (Haig-Brown), 1981
 Masters and Slaves (Freyre), 1946
 Masterstvo Gogolia (Belyi), 1934
 Mater'ial i stil' v romane L'va Tolstogo Voina i mir (Shklovskii), 1928
 Materialismo storico ed economia marxistica (Croce), 1900
 Matters of Fact and of Fiction (Vidal), 1977
 Matvei Komarov (Shklovskii), 1929

- Mauvais Démiurge (Cioran), 1969
 Mauvaises pensées et autres (Valéry), 1942
 Mauve Gloves and Madmen, Clutter and Vine (Wolfe), 1976
 Maximes (La Rochefoucauld), 1664
 Maxims (La Rochefoucauld), 1685
 Maxims and Reflections (Guicciardini), 1965
 May-Day (Emerson), 1867
 Meaning of Love (Solov'ev), 1945
 Meaning of Treason (West), 1947
 Meaning of Truth (William James), 1907
 Measure of Man (Krutch), 1954
 Measure of the Year (Haig-Brown), 1950
 Mechta i mysl' I.S.Turgeneva (Gershenzon), 1919
 Medallones (Reyes), 1951
 Medical Essays (Holmes), 1883
 Medina (McCarthy), 1972
 Medio mundo entre un zapato (Arciniegas), 1969
 Mediocrity and Delusion (Enzensberger), 1992
 Meditación de la técnica (Ortega y Gasset), 1957
 Meditación del pueblo joven (Ortega y Gasset), 1958
 Meditación en la costa (Mallea), 1939
 Meditaciones del Quijote (Ortega y Gasset), 1914
 Meditaciones sobre la literatura y el arte (Ortega y Gasset), 1987
 Meditando (Hostos), 1909
 Meditations of a Recluse (Kenkō), 1911
 Meditations on Quixote (Ortega y Gasset), 1961
 Medizinische Schriften (Benn), 1965
 Medusa and the Snail (Thomas), 1979
 Meine Antworten (Wieland), 1983
 Meister der Sprache (Schröder), 1953
 Měl jsem psa a kočku (Čapek), 1939
 Mélanges de politique (Chateaubriand), 1816
 Mélanges d'histoire et de voyages (Renan), 1878
 Memoir on the Advancement of Agriculture and on Agrarian Laws (Jovellanos), 1809
 Mémoires (La Rochefoucauld), 1662
 Mémoires d'outre-tombe (Chateaubriand), 1849
 Mémoires d'une jeune fille rangée (Beauvoir), 1958
 Memoirs (Chateaubriand), 1848
 Memoirs (La Rochefoucauld), 1684
 Memoirs of a Dutiful Daughter (Beauvoir), 1959
 Memoria en defensa de la Junta Central (Jovellanos), 1811
 Memoria, narrativa y poética de las presencias (Chacel), 1988
 Memoria para el arreglo de la policía de los espectáculos y diversiones públicas (Jovellanos), 1812
 Memorias de cocina y bodega (Reyes), 1953
 Memorias de un federalista (Madariaga), 1967
 Memorias históricas sobre el Castillo de Bellver en la isla de Mallorca (Jovellanos), 1813
 Memorias inmemoriales (Azorín), 1946
 Memorias íntimas (Azaña), 1938

- Memorias políticas y de guerras (Azaña), 1976
 Memories and Friends (Benson), 1924
 Memories and Portraits (Stevenson), 1887
 Memories and Studies (William James), 1911
 Memories of a Catholic Girlhood (McCarthy), 1957
 Memory Ireland (Buckley), 1985
 Memory of the Body (Kott), 1992
 Men and Manners (Hazlitt), 1852
 Men and Saints (Péguy), 1947
 Men, Books and Mountains (Stephen), 1956
 Men in Dark Times (Arendt), 1968
 Men, Women, and Books (Hunt), 1847
 Menexenus (Plato)
 Meno (Plato)
 Mensch ohne Alternative (Kołakowski), 1960
 Menschen und Schicksale aus dem Risorgimento (Huch), 1925
 Menschliches, Allzumenschliches (Nietzsche), 1878
 Mercurial eclesiástica (Montalvo), 1884
 Mere Christianity (Lewis), 1952
 Merry Heart (Davies), 1997
 Messages à distance (Serrès), 1995
 Mesto khristianstva v istorii (Rozanov), 1890
 Metafizyczna pauza (Miłosz), 1989
 Metaphor & Memory (Ozick), 1989
 Metaphysical Anthropology (Marías), 1971
 Metaphysical Elements of Justice (Kant), 1965
 Metaphysical Foundations of Natural Science (Kant), 1970
 Metaphysical Horror (Kołakowski), 1988
 Metaphysical Principles of Virtue (Kant), 1964
 Metaphysik der Sitten (Kant), 1797
 Metaphysische Anfangsgründe der Naturwissenschaft (Kant), 1786
 Method and Results (T.H.Huxley), 1893
 Method of Study (Erasmus), 1978
 Methodology of the Social Sciences (Weber), 1949
 Método histórico de las generaciones (Marías), 1949
 Metron (Ekelund), 1918
 Mexican Art Today (Cardoza y Aragón), 1966
 Mexican Consciousness and Its Role in the West (Zea), 1993
 México (Cardoza y Aragón), 1964
 México (Paz), 1969
 Mexico in a Nutshell (Reyes), 1964
 Mezhdv dvukh revoliutsii (Belyi), 1934
 Mi experiencia cubana (Martínez Estrada), 1965
 Mi religión (Unamuno), 1910
 Mi respuesta (Madariaga), 1982
 Mi romería (Pardo Bazán), 1888
 Mi vida (Unamuno), 1959
 Miami (Didion), 1987

- Miami and the Siege of Chicago (Mailer), 1968
 Michelet (Barthes), 1987
 Michelet par lui-même (Barthes), 1954
 Mid-Atlantic Man (Wolfe), 1969
 Middle-Aged Man on the Flying Trapeze (Thurber), 1935
 Miguel Angel Asturias (Cardoza y Aragón), 1991
 Miguel de Unamuno (Marías), 1943
 Mihai Eminescu (Călinescu), 1978
 1941 (Picón-Salas), 1940
 Mil y un velorios (Monsiváis), 1993
 Milí spolužáci! (Vaculík), 1986
 Militares e o poder (Lourenço), 1975
 Mince Pie (Morley), 1919
 Mind Awake (Lewis), 1968
 Mind on Fire (Pascal), 1989
 Mind's Wit and Art (Gracián), 1962
 Minerve (Alain), 1939
 Minima Moralia (Adorno), 1951
 Minin i Pozharskii (Shklovskii), 1940
 Mink and Red Herring (Liebling), 1949
 Minority Report (De Voto), 1940
 Mirador de Próspero (Rodó), 1913
 Mirror Maker (Levi), 1989
 Mirror of Art (Baudelaire), 1955
 Mirror of Nature (Davies), 1983
 Miscellanea (Temple), 1680
 Miscellaneous Reflections Occasioned by the Comet (Bayle), 1708
 Miscellany of a Japanese Priest (Kenkō), 1914
 Miscellany of Men (Chesterton), 1912
 Misère de la philosophie (Marx), 1847
 Misión de la universidad (Ortega y Gasset), 1930
 Misión del bibliotecario (Ortega y Gasset), 1961
 Misreadings (Eco), 1993
 Mission of the Librarian (Ortega y Gasset), 1961
 Mission of the University (Ortega y Gasset), 1944
 Mitmacher (Dürrenmatt), 1976
 Mitologia i realizm (Kott), 1946
 Mittelmass und Wahn (Enzensberger), 1988
 Mobile (Butor), 1962
 Moc bezmocných (Havel), 1978
 Mocedades (Ortega y Gasset), 1973
 Model Memoirs (Leacock), 1938
 Modern Australian Literature (Nettie Palmer), 1924
 Modern Century (Frye), 1967
 Modern Italian Poets (Howells), 1887
 Modern Painters (Ruskin), 1843
 Modern Prince (Gramsci), 1957
 Modern Temper (Krutch), 1929

- Modern Theme (Ortega y Gasset), 1933
 Moderne Ich (Benn), 1920
 Modernism in Modern Drama (Krutch), 1953
 Modernismo (Darío), 1989
 Modernity on Endless Trial (Kołakowski), 1990
 Modest Proposal (Swift), 1729
 Modos de vivir (Marías), 1964
 Moi skitaniia (Giliarovskii), 1928
 Molly (Liebling), 1964
 Molnii iskusstva (Blok), 1909
 Moment (Woolf), 1947
 Moments (Priestley), 1966
 Moments musicaux (Adorno), 1964
 Moments of Being (Woolf), 1976
 Mon Babel (Trottier), 1963
 Mon premier Testament (Benda), 1910
 Monastic Journey (Merton), 1977
 Monday Chats (Sainte-Beuve), 1877
 Monismo estético (Vasconcelos), 1918
 Monks Pond (Merton), 1989
 Monologul polifonic (Steinhardt), 1991
 Monsieur Croquant (Gourmont), 1918
 Monster Lecture on Justice and Law (Dürrenmatt), 1982
 Monstervortrag über Gerechtigkeit und Recht (Dürrenmatt), 1969
 Montaigne (Carlyle), 1897
 Montaigne (Gide), 1939
 Monterrey (Reyes), 1980
 Moonbeams from the Larger Lunacy (Leacock), 1915
 Moose on the Wall (Hoagland), 1974
 Moral Equivalent of War (William James), 1971
 Moral Law (Kant), 1948
 Moral Reflections (Holberg), 1991
 Moral social (Hostos), 1888
 Moral Tales (Leopardi), 1983
 Moralia (Plutarch)
 Morals (Plutarch), 1684
 Morals (Seneca), 1678
 Moralske Tanker (Holberg), 1744
 Moratín esbozo por Cándido (Azorín), 1893
 More (Beerbohm), 1899
 More Classics Revisited (Rexroth), 1989
 More Theatres (Beerbohm), 1969
 Moreover (Murdoch), 1932
 Morgenröthe (Nietzsche), 1881
 Morgenstunden (Mendelssohn), 1785
 Mørkeblåt og sort (Paludan), 1965
 Mormon Country (Stegner), 1942
 Morning Yet on Creation Day (Achebe), 1975

- Mornings in Florence (Ruskin), 1876
 Mornings in Mexico (Lawrence), 1927
 Mornings in the Dark (Greene), 1993
 Mors et vita (Montherlant), 1932
 Mort très douce (Beauvoir), 1964
 Mortal Lessons (Selzer), 1976
 Moscow Diary (Benjamin), 1985
 Moses and Monotheism (Freud), 1939
 Moskauer Tagebuch (Benjamin), 1980
 Moskva i moskvichi (Giliarovskii), 1926
 Motives of Proteus (Rodó), 1928
 Motivos de Proteo (Rodó), 1909
 Mountains of California (John Muir), 1894
 Movements in European History (Lawrence), 1921
 Moving the Centre (Ngugi), 1993
 Mudrost' Pushkina (Gershenzon), 1921
 Muerte y transfiguración de Martín Fierro (Martínez Estrada), 1948
 Mujer española (Pardo Bazán), 1976
 Mujer que sabe latín (Castellanos), 1973
 Mujeres españolas (Madariaga), 1972
 Mumyōshō (Kamo no Chōmei), 1980
 Mundo cambio en América (Arciniegas), 1993
 Mundo de José Luis Cuevas (Fuentes), 1969
 Mundo de los sueños (Darío), 1917
 Mundo maravilloso de Guillermo Enrique Hudson (Martínez Estrada), 1951
 Munera Pulveris (Ruskin), 1872
 Murder Trials (Cicero), 1975
 Music at Night (Aldous Huxley), 1931
 Music in London (Shaw), 1931
 Music of Love (Green), 1984
 Musikalischen Monographien (Adorno), 1971
 Must We Burn de Sade? (Beauvoir), 1953
 Mut (Heinrich Mann), 1939
 My Bondage and My Freedom (Douglass), 1855
 My Début as a Literary Person (Twain), 1903
 My Discovery of England (Leacock), 1922
 My Exile in Siberia (Herzen), 1855
 My Financial Career (Leacock), 1993
 My Heart Laid Bare (Baudelaire), 1950
 My Life and Hard Times (Thurber), 1933
 My Literary Passions (Howells), 1895
 My Mark Twain (Howells), 1910
 My 100 Answers (Murdoch), 1960
 My Past and Thoughts (Herzen), 1924
 My Philosophy (Croce), 1949
 My Religion (Tolstoi), 1885
 My Remarkable Uncle (Leacock), 1942
 My Skirmish with Jolly Roger (Lawrence), 1929

- My Ten Years in a Quandary and How They Grew (Benchley), 1936
 My World—and Welcome to It (Thurber), 1942
 Myself with Others (Fuentes), 1988
 Mysli vrasplokh (Siniavskii), 1966
 Mystics and Zen Masters (Merton), 1967
 Myth and Metaphor (Frye), 1990
 Myth, Literature and the African World (Soyinka), 1976
 Myth Makers (Pritchett), 1979
 Myth of Deliverance (Frye), 1983
 Myth of Sisyphus (Camus), 1955
 Mythe de Nelligan (Larose), 1981
 Mythe de Sisyphe (Camus), 1942
 Mythologies (Barthes), 1957
- Na Bahia em 1943 (Freyre), 1944
 Na perevale (Belyi), 1918
 Na rubezhe dvukh stoletii (Belyi), 1930
 Na vesakh lova (Shestov), 1929
 Nach dem Nihilismus (Benn), 1932
 Nachala i kontsii (Shestov), 1908
 Nachalo veka (Belyi), 1933
 Nachlese (Thomas Mann), 1956
 Nachträge aus Hampstead (Canetti), 1994
 Nacimiento (Zambrano), 1981
 Nacimiento de Dionisos (Henríquez Ureña), 1916
 Nagy orosz realisták (Lukács), 1952
 Nah- und Fernsein des Fremden (Susman), 1992
 Naissance de la physique dans le texte de Lucrèce (Serrès), 1977
 Naissance d'une race (Groulx), 1919
 Name (Jünger), 1963
 Names (Momaday), 1976
 Nanqiang beidiao ji (Lu Xun), 1934
 Narrative of the Life of Frederick Douglass (Douglass), 1845
 National Portraits (Vance Palmer), 1940
 Native Companions (Hope), 1974
 Native Realm (Miłosz), 1968
 Natur und Erkenntnis (Hofmannsthal), 1957
 Natural Contract (Serrès), 1995
 Natural Perspective (Frye), 1965
 Natural Philosophy of Love (Gourmont), 1922
 Natural Questions (Seneca), 1971
 Naturales quaestiones (Seneca)
 Naturaleza, historia, Dios (Zubiri), 1944
 Nature (Emerson), 1836
 Nature (Mill), 1874
 Nature and Eternity (Jefferies), 1902
 Nature, History, God (Zubiri), 1981
 Nature near Home (Burroughs), 1919

- Nature near London (Jefferies), 1883
 Nature of Literature (Read), 1956
 Nature of the Second Sex (Beauvoir), 1963
 Ne mogu molchat' (Tolstoi), 1908
 Necessity of Atheism (Shelley), 1993
 Need for Roots (Weil), 1952
 Negative Dialectics (Adorno), 1973
 Negative Dialektik (Adorno), 1966
 Nel nostro tempo (Montale), 1972
 Nenapissanye rasskazy (Soloukhin), 1985
 Nervenpunkte der Neuen Musik (Adorno), 1969
 Nesvoevremennye mysli (Gor'kii), 1917
 Neue Essays über Kunst und Literatur (Grimm), 1865
 Neue Folge der Vorlesungen zur Einführung in die Psychoanalyse (Freud), 1933
 Neue Göttergespräche (Wieland), 1791
 Neue Staat und die Intellektuellen (Benn), 1933
 Neue Studien (Thomas Mann), 1948
 Neuer Scheiterhaufen für alte Ketzer (Andersch), 1979
 Neuskutečny dialog (Čapek), 1978
 Neutral Corner (Liebling), 1990
 Never Must You Ask Me (Natalia Ginzburg), 1973
 New Cratylus (Hope), 1979
 New Critical Essays (Barthes), 1980
 New Exposition of the First Principles of Metaphysical Knowledge (Kant), 1986
 New Gods (Cioran), 1974
 New Introductory Lectures on Psycho- Analysis (Freud), 1933
 New Man (Merton), 1961
 New Meaning of Treason (West), 1964
 New Seeds of Contemplation (Merton), 1962
 New World in the Tropics (Freyre), 1959
 Newspaper Days (Mencken), 1941
 Nieco mitologii (Boy-Żeleński), 1935
 Nietzsche (Martínez Estrada), 1947
 Nietzsche contra Wagner (Nietzsche), 1889
 Niefni i zadufani (Barańczak), 1971
 Night Country (Eiseley), 1971
 1905 (Heiberg), 1923
 No Man Is an Island (Merton), 1955
 No Name in the Street (Baldwin), 1972
 No Poems (Benchley), 1932
 Nobel Lecture (Miłosz), 1981
 Nobody Knows My Name (Baldwin), 1961
 Noces (Camus), 1939
 Noise of Time (Mandel'shtam), 1986
 Nonviolent Alternative (Merton), 1980
 Norden, Süden, rechts und links (Andersch), 1972
 Nordiskt (Ekelund), 1914
 Normandy Revisited (Liebling), 1958

- Norsk teater (Heiberg), 1920
 Norte y sur (Reyes), 1944
 Nós e a Europa (Lourenço), 1988
 Nostro Marx (Gramsci), 1984
 Notas de un método (Zambrano), 1989
 Notas de un novelista (Mallea), 1954
 Notas sociales (Azorín), 1895
 Note de călătorie (Odobescu), 1981
 Notebook of a Ten Square Rush-Mat Sized World (Kamo no Chōmei), 1979
 Notebooks (Weil), 1956
 Noten zur Literatur (Adorno), 1958
 Notes and Lectures upon Shakespeare (Coleridge), 1849
 Notes from a Ten Feet Square Hut (Kamo no Chōmei), 1907
 Notes of a Journey from Cornhill to Grand Cairo (Thackeray), 1846
 Notes of a Journey Through France and Italy (Hazlitt), 1826
 Notes of a Native Son (Baldwin), 1955
 Notes on an Endangered Species (Richler), 1974
 Notes on England (Taine), 1872
 Notes on Novelists (Henry James), 1914
 Notes on Paris (Taine), 1875
 Notes on the Novel (Ortega y Gasset), 1948
 Notes sur l'Angleterre (Taine), 1872
 Notes sur Mérimée (Du Bos), 1920
 Notes sur mon théâtre (Montherlant), 1950
 Notes sur Paris (Taine), 1867
 Notes to Literature (Adorno), 1991
 Notes Towards the Definition of Culture (T.S.Eliot), 1948
 Notre maître, le passé (Groulx), 1924
 Notre Rabelais (Belleau), 1990
 Nous autres Français (Bernanos), 1939
 Nouveaux dialogues des morts (Fontenelle), 1683
 Nouveaux essais critiques (Barthes), 1972
 Nouveaux essais de critique et d'histoire (Taine), 1865
 Nouveaux essais sur la littérature contemporaine (Brunetière), 1895
 Nouveaux lundis (Sainte-Beuve), 1863
 Nouveaux pastels (Bourget), 1891
 Nouveaux prétextes (Gide), 1911
 Nouvelles dissociations (Gourmont), 1925
 Nouvelles études d'histoire religieuse (Renan), 1884
 Nouvelles pages de critique et de doctrine (Bourget), 1922
 Nouvelles questions de critique (Brunetière), 1890
 Novela (Ayala), 1974
 Novela de Pepita Jiménez (Azaña), 1927
 Novela nueva (Rodó), 1897
 Nowe Jonasz (Kott), 1994
 Nowe studia z literatury francuskiej (Boy-Żeleński), 1922
 Nube y el reloj (Cardoza y Aragón), 1940
 Nuestra América (Martí), 1974

- Nuestro Séneca (Pérez de Ayala), 1966
 Nueva imagen del Caribe (Arciniegas), 1970
 Nueva novela hispanoamericana (Fuentes), 1969
 Nueva visita al cuatro piso (González), 1987
 Nueve ensayos dantescos (Borges), 1982
 Nuevo catecismo para indios remisos (Monsiváis), 1982
 Nuevo diario de Noé (Arciniegas), 1969
 Nuevo glosario (d'Ors), 1921
 Nuevo liberalismo (Zambrano), 1930
 Nuevo Mundo (Cardoza y Aragón), 1960
 Nuevo tiempo mexicano (Fuentes), 1994
 Nuevo tradicionalismo y la revolución social (Maeztu), 1959
 Nuevos ensayos de filosofía (Marías), 1968
 Nunca más (Sabato), 1985
 Nuove curiosità storiche (Croce), 1922
 Nuovi saggi di estetica (Croce), 1920
 Nuovi saggi sul Goethe (Croce), 1934
 Nuovi saggi sulla letteratura italiana del seicento (Croce), 1931
 Nya vakten (Ekelund), 1953
 Nye epistler (Kjær), 1912
- O Canada (Wilson), 1965
 O "Lalce" Bolesława Prusa (Kott), 1948
 O lidech (Čapek), 1940
 O lidskou identitu (Havel), 1984
 O literature (Gor'kii), 1933
 O literaturze niemoralnej (Boy-Żeleński), 1990
 O Maiakovskom (Shklovskii), 1940
 O masterakh starinnykh (Shklovskii), 1951
 O nejbližších věcech (Čapek), 1925
 O poezii (Mandel'shtam), 1928
 O ponimanii (Rozanov), 1886
 O russkoi literature (Dostoevskii), 1987
 O russkom krest'ianstve (Gor'kii), 1922
 Ô saisons, ô châteaux (Brault), 1991
 O smysle poznaniia (Belyi), 1922
 O społecznym awansie (Kott), 1947
 O starom i novom (Lidiia Ginzburg), 1982
 O teorii prozy (Shklovskii), 1925
 O věcech obecných (Čapek), 1932
 O zhizni (Tolstoi), 1888
 Oasis de los clásicos (Azorín), 1951
 Ob iskusstve (Dostoevskii), 1973
 Ob iskusstve (Tsvetaeva), 1991
 Obecnošćmitu (Kořakowski), 1972
 Obiter Scripta (Santayana), 1936
 Oboniatel'noe i osiazatel'noe otnoshenie evreev k krovi (Rozanov), 1914
 Obrázky z Holandska (Čapek), 1932

- Obrazy prosh logo (Gershenson), 1912
 Observaciones sobre el español en América (Henríquez Ureña), 1976
 Observador literário (Cândido), 1959
 Observations on the Feeling of the Beautiful and the Sublime (Kant), 1960
 Observations upon the United Provinces of the Netherlands (Temple), 1673
 Obvie et l'obtus (Barthes), 1982
 Ocalone w tłumaczeniu (Barańczak), 1992
 Ocionais (Lourenço), 1984
 Occasional Discourse on the Nigger Question (Carlyle), 1853
 Occident et son destin (Massis), 1956
 Occidente y la conciencia de México (Zea), 1953
 Ocherki gogolevskogo perioda russkoi literatury (Chernyshevskii), 1855
 Od Berdyczowa do Rzymu (Stempowski), 1971
 Odd Jobs (Updike), 1991
 Odná iz obitelei tsarstva tenei (Belyi), 1924
 Œuvr es mesléés (Saint-Évremond), 1668
 Of a Fire on the Moon (Mailer), 1971
 Of All Things (Benchley), 1921
 Of Other Worlds (Lewis), 1966
 Of the Advantage and Disadvantage of History for Life (Nietzsche), 1980
 Of the Social Contract (Rousseau), 1984
 Of the Standard of Taste (Hume), 1965
 Of Women and Their Elegance (Mailer), 1980
 Ofeira (Belyi), 1921
 Off the Deep End (Morley), 1928
 Öffentliche Leben (Heinrich Mann), 1932
 Öffentlicher Brief an einen sowjetischen Schriftsteller (Andersch), 1977
 Office and Work of Universities (Newman), 1856
 Oficio del pensamiento (Marías), 1958
 Ogro filantrópico (Paz), 1979
 Ogród nauk (Miłosz), 1979
 Ogród wśród skorpionów (Miłosz), 1962
 Oh Canada! Oh Québec! (Richler), 1992
 Ohne Leitbild (Adorno), 1967
 Ojo/Voz (Cardoza y Aragón), 1988
 Okolo tserkovnykh sten (Rozanov), 1906
 Old Age (Beauvoir), 1972
 Old Court Suburb (Hunt), 1855
 Old House at Coate (Jefferies), 1948
 Olive Tree (Aldous Huxley), 1936
 Olympiques (Montherlant), 1924
 Om krig og krigsmænd (Lange), 1966
 Omniana (Coleridge; Southey), 1812
 On (Belloc), 1923
 On a Theatre of Marionettes (Kleist), 1989
 On Ancient Judaism (Weber), 1949
 On Anything (Belloc), 1910
 On Art and Artists (Aldous Huxley), 1960

- On Art and Literature (Martí), 1987
- On Being Blue (Gass), 1976
- On Benefits (Seneca), 1887
- On Canadian Poetry (Brown), 1943
- On Clemency (Seneca), 1899
- On Copia (Erasmus), 1978
- On Copia of Words and Ideas (Erasmus), 1963
- On Divination (Cicero), 1950
- On Duties (Cicero), 1950
- On Education (Frye), 1988
- On Education (Martí), 1979
- On Essence (Zubiri), 1980
- On Everything (Belloc), 1909
- On Friendship (Cicero), 1897
- On Government (Cicero), 1993
- On Government, Politics and Society (Edmund Burke), 1975
- On Grief and Reason (Brodsky), 1995
- On Hamlet (Madariaga), 1948
- On Heroes, Hero-Worship, and the Heroic in History (Carlyle), 1841
- On Human Nature (Schopenhauer), 1897
- On Individuality and Social Forms (Simmel), 1971
- On Liberty (Mill), 1859
- On Lies, Secrets, and Silence (Rich), 1979
- On Life (Tolstoi), 1902
- On Literature (Gor'kii), 1960
- On Literature and Society (Cândido), 1995
- On Nietzsche (Bataille), 1992
- On Nothing and Kindred Subjects (Belloc), 1908
- On Old Age (Cicero), 1967
- On Our Knowledge of the Causes of the Phenomena of Organic Nature (T.H.Huxley), 1862
- On Our Own Now (Vidal), 1976
- On Photography (Sontag), 1977
- On Poetry and Poets (T.S.Eliot), 1957
- On Poets and Others (Paz), 1986
- On Politics (Mencken), 1960
- On Politics and Society (Mill), 1976
- On Puppet Shows (Kleist), 1991
- On Racine (Barthes), 1964
- On Revolution (Arendt), 1963
- On Science, Necessity and the Love of God (Weil), 1968
- On Simple and Sentimental Poetry (Schiller), 1875
- On Socialist Realism (Siniavskii), 1961
- On Something (Belloc), 1910
- On Stories (Lewis), 1982
- On the Aesthetic Education of Man (Schiller), 1954
- On the Aim and Method of Education (Erasmus), 1904
- On the Basis of Morality (Schopenhauer), 1965
- On the Boiler (Yeats), 1939

- On the Commonwealth (Cicero), 1929
 On the Constitution of the Church and State (Coleridge), 1830
 On the Contrary (McCarthy), 1961
 On the Form and Principles of the Sensible and the Intelligible World (Kant), 1986
 On the Fourfold Root of the Principle of Sufficient Reason (Schopenhauer), 1889
 On the Genealogy of Morals (Nietzsche), 1967
 On the Good Life (Cicero), 1971
 On the Heights of Despair (Cioran), 1992
 On the Language and Philosophy of the Indians (Schlegel), 1849
 On the Margin (Aldous Huxley), 1923
 On the Mistaken Subtlety of the Four Syllogistic Figures (Kant), 1885
 On the Naive and Sentimental in Literature (Schiller), 1981
 On the Nature of the Gods (Cicero), 1972
 On the Nature of the Scholar (Fichte), 1845
 On the Old Road (Ruskin), 1885
 On the Origin of Language (Rousseau), 1966
 On the Origin of Species (T.H.Huxley), 1863
 On the Origin of Species by Natural Selection (Darvin), 1859
 On the Russian Peasantry (Gor'kii), 1976
 On the Social Contract (Rousseau), 1978
 On the Spirit and Letter in Philosophy (Fichte), 1984
 On the Study of Celtic Literature (Arnold), 1867
 On the Way to Language (Heidegger), 1971
 On the Will in Nature (Schopenhauer), 1889
 On Time and Being (Heidegger), 1972
 On Translating Homer (Arnold), 1861
 On Violence (Arendt), 1970
 On Vision (Schopenhauer), 1974
 On Women's Rights (Douglass), 1976
 On World History (Herder), 1997
 On Writing and Politics (Grass), 1985
 One Earth, Four or Five Worlds (Paz), 1985
 One Half of Robertson Davies (Davies), 1977
 One Man's Meat (White), 1942
 One Minute Please (Benchley), 1945
 One Thing and Another (Belloc), 1955
 One Way to Spell Man (Stegner), 1982
 One-Man Manifesto (Read), 1994
 One-Way Street (Benjamin), 1979
 Only Possible Ground for a Demonstration of the Existence of God (Kant), 1968
 Onze Chapitres sur Platon (Alain), 1928
 Opavshie list'ia (Rozanov), 1913
 Open Air (Jefferies), 1885
 Open House (Priestley), 1927
 Open Letters (Havel), 1991
 Open Sore of a Continent (Soyinka), 1996
 Open Work (Eco), 1989
 Opening the Bible (Merton), 1970

- Opera aperta (Eco), 1962
 Opera lui Mihai Eminescu (Călinescu), 1934
 Operette morali (Leopardi), 1827
 Oppenheimer (Ayala), 1942
 Opposing Self (Trilling), 1955
 Oppression and Liberty (Weil), 1958
 Oppression et liberté (Weil), 1955
 Opravdanie dobra (Solov'ev), 1897
 Opus epistolarum (Erasmus), 1906
 Opuscula (Erasmus), 1933
 Oracle, a Manual of the Art of Discretion (Gracián), 1953
 Oráculo manual y arte de prudencia (Gracián), 1648
 Oranges (McPhee), 1967
 Orazione funerale (Varchi), 1564
 Ordem e progresso (Freyre), 1959
 Order and Progress (Freyre), 1970
 Order of the Day (Thomas Mann), 1942
 Ordine Nuovo (Gramsci), 1987
 Orientamenti (Croce), 1934
 Orientations (Groulx), 1935
 Origines de la géométrie (Serrès), 1993
 Origins of Totalitarianism (Arendt), 1951
 Orozco (Cardoza y Aragón), 1959
 Orphan of Pimlico (Thackeray), 1876
 Orthodoxy (Chesterton), 1908
 Osnovy teoreticheskoi filosofii (Solov'ev), 1897
 Oswald's Tale (Mailer), 1995
 Other Inquisitions (Borges), 1964
 Other Mexico (Paz), 1972
 Other People's Trades (Levi), 1989
 Other Voice (Paz), 1991
 Otra voz (Paz), 1990
 Otras inquisiciones (Borges), 1952
 Otro rostro del peronismo (Sabato), 1956
 Our America (Martí), 1979
 Our Hundred Days in Europe (Holmes), 1887
 Our Lord Don Quixote (Unamuno), 1967
 Our National Parks (John Muir), 1901
 Our Theatre in the Nineties (Shaw), 1931
 Our Village (Mitford), 1824
 Outcries and Asides (Priestley), 1974
 Outline of the Distinctive Character of the Wissenschaftslehre (Fichte), 1988
 Outlines of a Philosophy of the History of Man (Herder), 1800
 Ouvertures (Oullette), 1988
 Over the Footlights (Leacock), 1923
 Over the Long High Wall (Priestley), 1972
 Over the Teacups (Holmes), 1890
 Owl in the Attic (Thurber), 1931

- Oxford Notebooks (Wilde), 1989
 Oxford University Sermons (Newman), 1843
- På hafsstranden (Ekelund), 1922
 Pack of Autolycus (Hope), 1978
 Pages (Mallarmé), 1891
 Pages de critique et de doctrine (Bourget), 1912
 Pages from an Old Volume of Life (Holmes), 1883
 Pagine sulla guerra (Croce), 1928
 Pagini regăsite (Odobescu), 1965
 Painted Word (Wolfe), 1975
 Painter's Eye (Henry James), 1956
 Painter of Modern Life (Baudelaire), 1964
 País de cuatro pisos (González), 1980
 País del futuro (Pérez de Ayala), 1959
 Paisaje de España visto por los españoles (Azorín), 1917
 Paisajes del Alma (Unamuno), 1944
 Paix dans la guerre (Montherlant), 1941
 Palabra en la onda (d'Ors), 1950
 Palabras y letras (Ayala), 1983
 Palaver (Enzensberger), 1974
 Pan Jowialski i jego spadkobiercy (Stempowski), 1931
 Panda's Thumb (Gould), 1980
 Panorama de las literaturas (Martínez Estrada), 1946
 Panorama de los Estados Unidos (Martínez Estrada), 1985
 Papers from Lilliput (Priestley), 1922
 Papers of Samuel Marchbanks (Davies), 1985
 Papers on Literature and Art (Fuller), 1846
 Para una revisión de las letras argentinas (Martínez Estrada), 1967
 Parábolas (Rodó), 1935
 Paradis artificiels (Baudelaire), 1860
 Paradise of Bombs (Sanders), 1987
 Paradoxes, Problems, Essayes (Donne), 1652
 Paraíso perdido (Cunha), 1976
 Parasite (Serrès), 1980
 Parerga and Paralipomena (Schopenhauer), 1974
 Parerga und Paralipomena (Schopenhauer), 1851
 París (Azorín), 1945
 París (Fuentes), 1968
 Paris bombardeado (Azorín), 1919
 Paris Sketch Book (Thackeray), 1840
 Pariserbrevve (Heiberg), 1900
 Parisian Sketches (Henry James), 1957
 Parisiana (Darío), 1907
 Parlor, Bedlam, and Bath (Perelman), 1930
 Parmenides (Plato)
 Parochial Sermons (Newman), 1834
 Part maudite (Bataille), 1949

Partial Portraits (Henry James), 1888
 Particular Pleasures (Priestley), 1975
 Pas sur le sable (Gourmont), 1919
 Pasado (Azorín), 1955
 Pasado inmediato (Reyes), 1941
 Pasado y porvenir para el hombre actual (Ortega y Gasset), 1974
 Passagenwerk (Benjamin), 1989
 Passion for Peace (Merton), 1995
 Passioner emellan (Ekelund), 1927
 Past and Present (Carlyle), 1843
 Past Masters (Thomas Mann), 1933
 Pastels (Bourget), 1889
 Pastels of Men (Bourget), 1891
 Path to Rome (Belloc), 1902
 Patience de Griseledis (Gourmont), 1920
 Patriotic Gore (Wilson), 1962
 Pavannes and Divagations (Pound), 1958
 Pavannes and Divisions (Pound), 1918
 Pays baroque (Trottier), 1979
 Pe culmile disperării (Cioran), 1934
 Peace (Jünger), 1948
 Pebbles from a Brook (Eglinton), 1901
 Pedagogy in Process (Freire), 1978
 Pedagogy of Hope (Freire), 1994
 Pedagogy of the Oppressed (Freire), 1970
 Peep into the Past (Beerbohm), 1972
 Peintre de la vie moderne (Baudelaire), 1863
 Pendant l'orage (Gourmont), 1915
 Pendant la guerre (Gourmont), 1917
 Pensamiento latinoamericano (Zea), 1965
 Pensamiento político (Unamuno), 1965
 Pensamiento vivo de Saavedra Fajardo (Ayala), 1941
 Pensamiento vivo de Seneca (Zambrano), 1944
 Pensamiento y poesía en la vida española (Zambrano), 1939
 Pensar (Ferreira), 1992
 Pensée de Maurice Barrès (Massis), 1909
 Pensées (Pascal), 1670
 Pensées diverses sur la comète (Bayle), 1683
 Pensées inédites (Gourmont), 1920
 Pensées philosophiques (Diderot), 1746
 Pensées sans ordre concernant l'amour de Dieu (Weil), 1962
 Pensées sur différents sujets (Marivaux), 1719
 Pensées sur l'interprétation de la nature (Diderot), 1753
 Pensieri (Leopardi), 1845
 Pensiero politico e politica attuale (Croce), 1945
 Pentland Essays (Stevenson), 1913
 Penultimate Words (Shestov), 1916
 People of the Moonlight (Rozanov), 1978

- Pepacton (Burroughs), 1881
 Pequeños ensayos (Pérez de Ayala), 1963
 Peras del olmo (Paz), 1957
 Perché leggere i classici (Calvino), 1991
 Peregrinaciones (Darío), 1901
 Perelman's Home Companion (Perelman), 1955
 Perepiska iz dvukh uglov (Gershenson; Ivanov), 1921
 Perfect Salesman (Leacock), 1934
 Perfil de Euclides (Freyre), 1944
 Perfiles (Cardoza y Aragón), 1964
 Periodic Table (Levi), 1984
 Peripatetic Philosopher (Clarke), 1869
 Permanence and Change (Kenneth Burke), 1935
 Perpetual Peace (Kant), 1957
 Perplexities and Paradoxes (Unamuno), 1945
 Persona Grata (Tynan), 1953
 Persona y democracia (Zambrano), 1958
 Personal Art (Davies), 1961
 Personal Heresy (Lewis), 1939
 Personas, obras, cosas (Ortega y Gasset), 1916
 Perspectives by Incongruity (Kenneth Burke), 1964
 Pesanteur et la grâce (Weil), 1947
 Pesimismo alegre (Vasconcelos), 1931
 Pesimismo heroico (Vasconcelos), 1964
 Pessoa, coisas e animais (Freyre), 1981
 Pestrye pis'ma (Saltykov-Shchedrin), 1884
 Petite Infante de Castille (Montherlant), 1929
 Petite Noirceur (Larose), 1987
 Petite Ville (Gourmont), 1916
 Petites chroniques pour 1877 (Buies), 1878
 Petits crayons (Gourmont), 1921
 Peuple russe et le socialisme (Herzen), 1855
 Phädon (Mendelssohn), 1767
 Phaedo (Plato)
 Phædon (Mendelssohn), 1789
 Phaedrus (Plato)
 Pharos and Pharillon (E.M.Forster), 1923
 Philadelphia (Replier), 1898
 Philanthropic Ogre (Paz), 1985
 Philebus (Plato)
 Philemon und Baucis (Jünger), 1974
 Philippics (Cicero)
 Philosophes classiques du XIXe siècle (Taine), 1868
 Philosophes français du XIXe siècle (Taine), 1857
 Philosophic Nights in Paris (Gourmont), 1920
 Philosophical Commentary (Bayle), 1987
 Philosophical Dialogues and Fragments (Renan), 1883
 Philosophical Dictionary (Voltaire), 1945

- Philosophical Dictionary for the Pocket (Voltaire), 1765
 Philosophical Enquiry into the Origin of Our Ideas of the Sublime and Beautiful (Edmund Burke), 1757
 Philosophical Essays Concerning Human Understanding (Hume), 1748
 Philosophie de l'art (Taine), 1865
 Philosophie der Geschichte (Schlegel), 1829
 Philosophie des Lebens (Schlegel), 1828
 Philosophie im tragischen Zeitalter der Griechen (Nietzsche), 1873
 Philosophie pathétique (Benda), 1913
 Philosophische Fragmente (Adorno), 1944
 Philosophische Gespräche (Mendelssohn), 1755
 Philosophische Kultur (Simmel), 1911
 Philosophische Schriften (Mendelssohn), 1761
 Philosophische Vorlesungen (Schlegel), 1830
 Philosophy as Dramatic Theory (Marías), 1971
 Philosophy in the Tragic Age of the Greeks (Nietzsche), 1962
 Philosophy of Giambattista Vico (Croce), 1964
 Philosophy of History (Schlegel), 1835
 Philosophy of Language (Schlegel), 1847
 Philosophy of Life (Schlegel), 1847
 Philosophy of Literary Form (Kenneth Burke), 1941
 Philosophy of Modern Art (Read), 1952
 Philosophy of the Practical (Croce), 1931
 Philosophy of the Understanding (Bello), 1984
 Philosophy, Poetry, History (Croce), 1966
 Phoenix (Lawrence), 1936, 1968
 Physical Order and Moral Liberty (Santayana), 1969
 Physiologie de la critique (Thibaudet), 1930
 Physique de l'amour (Gourmont), 1903
 Piat' chelovek znakomykh (Shklovskii), 1927
 Piccole virtù (Natalia Ginzburg), 1962
 Picked-Up Pieces (Updike), 1975
 Pictures from Italy (Dickens), 1846
 Piece of My Mind (Wilson), 1956
 Pieces and Pontifications (Mailer), 1982
 Pieces of the Frame (McPhee), 1975
 Pielgrzym (Stempowski), 1924
 Pierce Penilesse (Nashe), 1592
 Pietra sopra (Calvino), 1980
 Piety of Thinking (Heidegger), 1976
 Pilgrim at Tinker Creek (Dillard), 1974
 Pilgrim of the Clouds (Yuan Hongdao), 1978
 Pillow Book (Sei Shōnagon), 1967
 Pine Barrens (McPhee), 1968
 Pink Triangle and Yellow Star (Vidal), 1982
 Pipefuls (Morley), 1920
 Pis'ma iz russkogo muzeia (Soloukhin), 1966
 Pis'ma k staromu tovarischchu (Herzen), 1867

- Pis'ma k teten'ke (Saltykov-Shchedrin), 1881
 Pis'ma o provintsii (Saltykov-Shchedrin), 1868
 Pis'ma ob izuchenii prirody (Herzen), 1845
 Pláce de la Concorde Suisse (McPhee), 1984
 Places (Belloc), 1941
 Plain Sermons (Newman), 1843
 Plain Speaker (Hazlitt), 1826
 Plaisir du texte (Barthes), 1973
 Plakatwelt (Bense), 1952
 Plato and Platonism (Pater), 1893
 Play of the Eyes (Canetti), 1986
 Playground of Europe (Stephen), 1871
 Plays and Players (Shaw), 1952
 Plea for Liberty (Bernanos), 1945
 Pleasure of the Text (Barthes), 1975
 Pleasure-Dome (Greene), 1972
 Plebeian (Steele), 1719
 Plec Rozolindy (Kott), 1992
 Plenitud de América (Henríquez Ureña), 1952
 Plenitud de España (Henríquez Ureña), 1940
 Plotless Prose (Shklovskii), 1982
 Pluck and Luck (Benchley), 1925
 Plum Pudding (Morley), 1921
 Plumas del fénix (Ayala), 1989
 Plumas y palabras (Azaña), 1930
 Pluralistic Universe (William James), 1909
 Plurality of Worlds (Fontenelle), 1695
 Plus salis- (Ekelund), 1945
 Po prostu (Kott), 1946
 Po zvezdam (Ivanov), 1909
 Pochwała niekonsekwencji (Kołakowski), 1989
 Podenshchina (Shklovskii), 1930
 Poderío de la novela (Mallea), 1965
 Poesia (Croce), 1936
 Poesia antica e moderna (Croce), 1941
 Poesía de la circunstancia (Chacel), 1958
 Poesia di Dante (Croce), 1921
 Poesia e metafísica (Lourenço), 1983
 Poesia e non poesia (Croce), 1923
 Poesia non esiste (Montale), 1971
 Poesia "popolare" e poesia d'arte (Croce), 1933
 Poésie populaire (Gourmont), 1896
 Poet at the Breakfast-Table (Holmes), 1872
 Poet in Our Time (Montale), 1972
 Poetas épicos cristianos (Pardo Bazán), 1894
 Poeti e scrittori del pieno e del tardo Rinascimento (Croce), 1945
 Poetry and Anarchism (Read), 1938
 Poetry and Ireland (Yeats), 1908

Poetry and Literature (Croce), 1981
 Poetry and Morality (Buckley), 1959
 Poetry and the Art of Archery (Hope), 1980
 Poetry and the Sacred (Buckley), 1968
 Poetry, Language, Thought (Heidegger), 1971
 Poetry of Dante (Croce), 1922
 Poetry of Life (Carman), 1905
 Poeziia slova (Belyi), 1922
 Points of Friction (Replier), 1920
 Points of My Compass (White), 1962
 Points of View (Replier), 1891
 Poiski optimizma (Shklovskii), 1931
 Polgár nyomában (Lukács), 1947
 Polgári filozófia válsága (Lukács), 1947
 Polite Essays (Pound), 1937
 Política (Azaña), 1932
 Política y toros (Pérez de Ayala), 1918
 Political Crumbs (Enzensberger), 1990
 Political Discourses (Hume), 1752
 Political Economy of Art (Ruskin), 1857
 Political Parties and Elections in the United States (Martí), 1989
 Political Philosophy (Edmund Burke), 1987
 Political Reflections (Chateaubriand), 1814
 Político (Azorín), 1908
 Político D.Fernando el Católico (Gracián), 1640
 Políticos (Ayala), 1944
 Politics and Conscience (Havel), 1986
 Politics and Morals (Croce), 1945
 Politics and the Novel (Irving Howe), 1957
 Politics of Education (Freire), 1985
 Politics of the Unpolitical (Read), 1944
 Politicus (Plato)
 Politik und Verbrechen (Enzensberger), 1964
 Politika a svědomí (Havel), 1984
 Politique (Alain), 1952
 Politische Brosamen (Enzensberger), 1982
 Pollen (Novalis), 1982
 Pompadours (Saltykov-Shchedrin), 1985
 Pompadury i pompadurshi (Saltykov-Shchedrin), 1985
 Pope (Strachey), 1925
 Pope Shut out of Heaven Gates (Erasmus), 1673
 Por la Europa católica (Pardo Bazán), 1902
 Por mi madre bohemios (Monsiváis), 1993
 Por tierras de Portugal y de España (Unamuno), 1911
 Por un progreso incluyente (Fuentes), 1997
 Pornography and Obscenity (Lawrence), 1929
 Porter of Bagdad (MacMechan), 1901
 Portrait of a Man Standing (Madariaga), 1968

Portrait of Europe (Madariaga), 1952
 Portrait of Picasso as a Young Man (Mailer), 1995
 Portrait of the Artist as a Bad Character (Ozick), 1996
 Portraits contemporains (Sainte-Beuve), 1846
 Portraits de femmes (Sainte-Beuve), 1844
 Portraits in Miniature (Strachey), 1931
 Portraits littéraires (Sainte-Beuve), 1844
 Portraits of Celebrated Women (Sainte-Beuve), 1868
 Portraits of Men (Sainte-Beuve), 1891
 Portraits of Places (Henry James), 1883
 Portraits of the Eighteenth Century (Sainte-Beuve), 1904
 Portraits of the Seventeenth Century (Sainte-Beuve), 1905
 Porvenir de España (Ganivet), 1912
 Porvenir de España (Unamuno), 1912
 Posdata (Azorín), 1959
 Poseshchenie Zvanki (Soloukhin), 1975
 Position of America (Reyes), 1950
 Positivism in Mexico (Zea), 1974
 Positivismo en México (Zea), 1943
 Poslednie dni imperatorskoi vlasti (Blok), 1921
 Possession de soi-même (Montherlant), 1938
 Postdata (Paz), 1970
 Postę i głupstwo (Kott), 1956
 Postfígaro (Larra), 1918
 Postscripts (Priestley), 1940
 Poszukiwania (Miłosz), 1985
 Potestas Clavium (Shestov), 1968
 Pour une morale de l'ambiguïté (Beauvoir), 1947
 Pour une vierge noire (Montherlant), 1930
 Pourquoi nous sommes divisés (Groulx), 1943
 Poussière du chemin (Brault), 1989
 Poverty of Philosophy (Marx), 1900
 Povest' o khudozhnike Fedotove (Shklovskii), 1955
 Powder of Sympathy (Morley), 1923
 Power and Meaning of Love (Merton), 1976
 Power of the Powerless (Havel), 1985
 Practical Education (Edgeworth), 1798
 Practical Politics (Shaw), 1976
 Practical Wisdom for Perilous Times (Gracián), 1992
 Pragmatism (William James), 1907
 Praise of Folly (Erasmus), 1549
 Pratique de la joie avant la mort (Bataille), 1967
 Précis de décomposition (Cioran), 1949
 Précision (Benda), 1937
 Precision and Soul (Musil), 1990
 Predchuvstviia i predvestiia (Ivanov), 1991
 Prédestinés (Bernanos), 1983
 Préfaces (Gide), 1948

- Prefaces, Biographical and Critical, to the Works of the English Poets (Johnson), 1779
 Prefaces to Contemporaries (Howells), 1957
 Prefaces to the Experience of Literature (Trilling), 1979
 Prefaces Without Books (Morley), 1970
 Prejudices (Mencken), 1919
 Préliminaires à l'esthétique (Alain), 1939
 Préliminaires à la mythologie (Alain), 1932
 Prelude (Wilson), 1967
 Premières Lettres (Balzac), 1933
 Premiers lundis (Sainte-Beuve), 1874
 Preoccupations in Australian Poetry (Wright), 1965
 Presença do açúcar na formação brasileira (Freyre), 1975
 Presence of Myth (Kołakowski), 1989
 Present Concerns (Lewis), 1986
 Presente y porvenir de Hispanoamérica (Madariaga), 1959
 Presidential Papers (Mailer), 1963
 Presidio político en Cuba (Martí), 1871
 Press (Liebling), 1961
 Prétextes (Gide), 1903
 Pretexts (Gide), 1959
 Pretvorenje opyta (Lidii Ginzburg), 1991
 Previous Convictions (Connolly), 1963
 Pri svete dnia (Soloukhin), 1992
 Price of the Ticket (Baldwin), 1985
 Primal Vision (Benn), 1960
 Prime alla Scala (Montale), 1981
 Prime of Life (Beauvoir), 1962
 Primejdia mărturisirii (Steinhardt), 1993
 Prin alții spre sine (Steinhardt), 1988
 Prince (Machiavelli), 1640
 Principados y potestades (Monsiváis), 1968
 Principe (Machiavelli), 1532
 Principii de estetică (Călinescu), 1939
 Principiorum primorum cognitionis metaphysicae nova delucidatio (Kant), 1755
 Principios de derecho de gentes (Bello), 1832
 Principios de derecho internacional (Bello), 1844
 Principios y finales de la novela (Pérez de Ayala), 1958
 Principles of Political Economy (Mill), 1848
 Principles of the Philosophy of the Future (Feuerbach), 1966
 Priroda i istoriia (Rozanov), 1900
 Prismen (Adorno), 1955
 Prisms (Adorno), 1967
 Prison Letters (Gramsci), 1988
 Prison Notebooks (Gramsci), 1992
 Prisoner of Sex (Mailer), 1971
 Privilèges (Beauvoir), 1955
 Priznaki vremeni (Saltykov-Shchedrin), 1863
 Pro and Contra Wagner (Thomas Mann), 1985

Pro M.Caelio (Cicero)
 Problema del liberalismo (Ayala), 1941
 Problemas brasileiros de antropologia (Freyre), 1959
 Problemas de la traducción (Ayala), 1965
 Probleme der Geschichtsphilosophie (Simmel), 1905
 Problème du style (Gourmont), 1902
 Problemi di estetica e contributi alla storia dell'estetica italiana (Croce), 1910
 Problems of the Philosophy of History (Simmel), 1977
 Problems of the Theatre (Dürrenmatt), 1964
 Professor at the Breakfast-Table (Holmes), 1860
 Profiles (Tynan), 1989
 Progulki s Pushkinym (Siniavskii), 1975
 Projevy (Havel), 1990
 Prolegomena to Any Future Metaphysic (Kant), 1950
 Prolegomena to Every Future Metaphysic (Kant), 1819
 Prolegomena zu einer jeden künftigen Metaphysik (Kant), 1783
 Prólogos con un prólogo de prólogos (Borges), 1975
 Promenades littéraires (Gourmont), 1904
 Promenades philosophiques (Gourmont), 1905
 Proper Studies (Aldous Huxley), 1927
 Propos series (Alain), from 1906
 Proserpina (Ruskin), 1875
 Protagoras (Plato)
 Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism (Weber), 1930
 Protokoly (Havel), 1966
 Providence (Seneca), 1900
 Provincial Letters (Pascal), 1744
 Provinz des Menschen (Canetti), 1973
 Prvotiny (Březina), 1933
 Prywatne obowiązki (Miłosz), 1972
 Przed i po (Barańczak), 1988
 Przewodnik po filozofii w sześćgodzin i kwadrans (Gombrowicz), 1971
 Przyczynek do biografii (Kott), 1990
 Pseudo-cynegeticos (Odobescu), 1875
 Pseudodoxia Epidemica (Browne), 1646
 Psychoanalysis and the Unconscious (Lawrence), 1921
 Ptolemäer und Mauretanier (Bense), 1950
 Pueblecito (Azorín), 1916
 Pueblo de Guatemala (Cardoza y Aragón), 1954
 Pueblos (Azorín), 1905
 Puertas al campo (Paz), 1966
 Puits de la vérité (Gourmont), 1922
 Puits de Pyrrhon (Massis), 1907
 Pump House Gang (Wolfe), 1968
 Punch, Brothers, Punch! (Twain), 1878
 Punch's Prize Novelists (Thackeray), 1853
 Purple Decade (Wolfe), 1982
 Puschkin-Gorki (Lukács), 1952

- Pustomelia (Novikov), 1770
 Pyrrhus et Cinéas (Beauvoir), 1944

 Quaderni del carcere (Gramsci), 1948
 Quasi una fantasia (Adorno), 1963
 Quatre-vingt-un Chapitres sur l'esprit et les passions (Alain), 1915
 Qué es el comunismo (Vasconcelos), 1936
 ¿Qué es esto? (Martínez Estrada), 1956
 ¿Qué es filosofía? (Ortega y Gasset), 1958
 Qué es la revolución (Vasconcelos), 1937
 ¿Qué es ser agnóstico? (Tierno Galván), 1975
 ¿Qué haremos con la historia? (Arciniegas), 1940
 Que vendrá (Rodó), 1897
 Queen of the Air (Ruskin), 1869
 Quelques témoignages (Bourget), 1928
 Question Concerning Technology (Heidegger), 1977
 Question of Being (Heidegger), 1958
 Questions contemporaines (Renan), 1868
 Questions de critique (Brunetière), 1889
 Questions sur l'Encyclopédie (Voltaire), 1770
 Quince presencias (Reyes), 1955
 Quintero (Azorín), 1925
 Quintessence of Ibsenism (Shaw), 1891
 Quo Vadimus? (White), 1938

 Racine y Molière (Azorín), 1924
 Radical Chic & Mau-Mauing the Flak Catchers (Wolfe), 1970
 Radiografía de la pampa (Martínez Estrada), 1933
 Raids and Reconstructions (Enzensberger), 1976
 Raising the Tone in Philosophy (Kant), 1993
 Raison par alphabet (Voltaire), 1769
 Rambler (Johnson), 1750
 Rambles and Reflections (Benson), 1926
 Ransom of Russian Art (McPhee), 1994
 Rapailages (Groulx), 1916
 Rapport d'Uriel (Benda), 1943
 Raros (Darío), 1896
 Rasstavanie s idolom (Soloukhin), 1991
 Rationalismus und Sensibilität (Bense), 1956
 Raza cósmica (Vasconcelos), 1925
 Razgovor o Dante (Mandel'shtam), 1967
 Razón del mundo (Ayala), 1944
 Razón en la sombra (Zambrano), 1993
 Razón mecanica y razón dialéctica (Tierno Galván), 1969
 Razvertyvanie priema (Shklovskii), 1921
 Reader (Steele), 1714
 Reader and the Writer (Wolf), 1977
 Reading and Writing (Davies), 1993

- Reading the World (Frye), 1990
 Realidad como resultado (Tierno Galván), 1957
 Realidad histórica de España (Castro), 1954
 Realidad y ensueño (Ayala), 1963
 Realidad y fantasía en Balzac (Martínez Estrada), 1964
 Realismo científico (Vasconcelos), 1943
 Realist in the American Theatre (Howells), 1992
 Realität der Literatur (Bense), 1971
 Realizmus problémái (Lukács), 1948
 Really Interesting Question (Strachey), 1972
 Reason and Romanticism (Read), 1926
 Rebañaduras (Chacel), 1986
 Rebel (Camus), 1953
 Rebelión de las masas (Ortega y Gasset), 1930
 Rebelión juvenil y el problema en la universidad (Tierno Galván), 1972
 Rebellion in the Backlands (Cunha), 1944
 Recollections of a Literary Life (Mitford), 1852
 Recollections of the Assize Court (Gide), 1941
 Recollections of the Lakes and the Lake Poets (De Quincey), 1862
 Recortes (Cándido), 1993
 Recuerdos de provincia (Sarmiento), 1843
 Red, Black, Blond and Olive (Wilson), 1956
 Red Cow and Her Friends (McArthur), 1919
 Red Deer (Jefferies), 1884
 Red Wolves and Black Bears (Hoagland), 1976
 Rede am Grabe Eberhard von Bodenhausens (Borchardt), 1918
 Rede über Hofmannsthal (Borchardt), 1905
 Rede und Antwort (Thomas Mann), 1922
 Reden an die deutsche Nation (Fichte), 1808
 Redención de las provincias y de la decencia nacional (Ortega y Gasset), 1931
 Rediscovery of North America (Lopez), 1990
 Reel Benchley (Benchley), 1950
 Refeng (Lu Xun), 1925
 Reflections (Benjamin), 1978
 Reflections of a Nonpolitical Man (Thomas Mann), 1983
 Reflections on History (Burckhardt), 1943
 Reflections on Suicide (Staël), 1813
 Reflections on the Death of a Porcupine (Lawrence), 1925
 Reflections on the Revolution in France (Edmund Burke), 1790
 Reflections on the World Today (Valéry), 1948
 Reflections upon a Sinking Ship (Vidal), 1969
 Reflector (Hunt), 1811
 Reflexiones sobre la estructura narrativa (Ayala), 1970
 Réflexions (La Rochefoucauld), 1665
 Réflexions diverses (La Rochefoucauld), 1868
 Réflexions politiques (Chateaubriand), 1814
 Réflexions sur la critique (Thibaudet), 1939
 Réflexions sur la littérature (Thibaudet), 1938

- Réflexions sur la paix (Staël), 1795
 Réflexions sur l'art du roman (Massis), 1927
 Réflexions sur le procès de la reine (Staël), 1793
 Réflexions sur le roman (Thibaudet), 1938
 Réflexions sur le suicide (Staël), 1813
 Réflexions sur les causes de la liberté et de l'oppression sociale (Weil), 1980
 Réflexions sur quelques-uns de mes contemporains (Baudelaire), 1861
 Reform in Florence (Machiavelli), 1946
 Réforme intellectuelle et morale (Renan), 1871
 Reformer (Edmund Burke), 1748
 Regards sur le monde actuel (Valéry), 1931
 Regenerador (Montalvo), 1928
 Região e tradição (Freyre), 1941
 Regreso de las carabelas (Zea), 1993
 Regreso de tres mundos (Picón-Salas), 1959
 Rehabilitations (Lewis), 1939
 Reitergeschichte (Hofmannsthal), 1953
 Relève du matin (Montherlant), 1920
 Religiia i kul'tura (Rozanov), 1899
 Religio Journalistici (Morley), 1924
 Religio Medici (Browne), 1642
 Religion (Kolakowski), 1982
 Religion (Schopenhauer), 1899
 Religion innerhalb der Grenzen der blossen Vernunft (Kant), 1793
 Religion of China (Weber), 1951
 Religion of India (Weber), 1958
 Religion Within the Limits of Reason Alone (Kant), 1934
 Remarkable Life of Don Diego (Torres Villarroel), 1958
 Reminiscences of Tolstoy, Chekhov and Andreyev (Gor'kii), 1934
 Renaissance (Pater), 1877
 Rencontres (Gide), 1948
 Répertoire (Butor), 1960
 Reply to the Essay on Population by Malthus (Hazlitt), 1807
 Réponse aux questions d'un provincial (Bayle), 1703
 Representative Men (Emerson), 1850
 Republic (Plato)
 República española ante la revolución cubana (Martí), 1873
 República española y España republicana (Unamuno), 1979
 Res Publica (Cicero), 1974
 Rescued Essays (Carlyle), 1892
 Resentimiento trágico de la vida (Unamuno), 1991
 Resistance to Civil Government (Thoreau), 1849
 Resistance, Rebellion, and Death (Camus), 1961
 Responses and Evaluations (Brown), 1977
 Responsibility of Forms (Barthes), 1985
 Restoration of Property (Belloc), 1936
 Resurrection of the Word (Shklovskii), 1973
 Retalhos de jornais velhos (Freyre), 1964

- Retórica del periodismo y otras retóricas (Ayala), 1985
 Retrato de un hombre de pie (Madariaga), 1964
 Retratos reales e imaginarios (Reyes), 1920
 Retur til barndommen (Paludan), 1951
 Return of Eden (Frye), 1965
 Revelatiile durerii (Cioran), 1991
 Rêveries du promeneur solitaire (Rousseau), 1782
 Reveries of a Solitary...(Rousseau), 1927
 Reveries of the Solitary Walker (Rousseau), 1783
 Revés de la historia (Arciniegas), 1980
 Review of the Affairs of France (Defoe), 1938
 Revoliutsiia i kul'tura (Belyi), 1917
 Revoliutsiia i kultura (Gor'kii), 1918
 Revolt in the Backlands (Cunha), 1947
 Revolt of the Masses (Ortega y Gasset), 1932
 Revolución guatemalteca (Cardoza y Aragón), 1955
 Rhetoric of Motives (Kenneth Burke), 1950
 Rhetoric of Religion (Kenneth Burke), 1961
 Rhythm in the Novel (Brown), 1950
 Rhythm of Life (Meynell), 1893
 Richard Wagner in Bayreuth (Nietzsche), 1876
 Ricordi politici e civili (Guicciardini), 1857
 Right Stuff (Wolfe), 1979
 Rights of Man (Paine), 1791
 Rising from the Plains (McPhee), 1986
 Rising Gorge (Perelman), 1961
 Risorgimento (Huch), 1908
 Ritm kak dialektika i "Mednyi vsadnik" (Belyi), 1929
 Rituales del caos (Monsiváis), 1995
 Rivas y Larra (Azorín), 1916
 River Never Sleeps (Haig-Brown), 1946
 River of the Mother of God (Leopold), 1991
 River View (Burroughs), 1981
 Riverby (Burroughs), 1894
 Rivers of Canada (MacLennan), 1974
 Road Back to Paris (Liebling), 1944
 Road to Equality (Shaw), 1971
 Road to Miltown (Perelman), 1957
 Robert et Elizabeth Browning (Du Bos), 1982
 Robotización del hombre (Sabato), 1981
 Rocking the Boat (Vidal), 1962
 Rodnoe i vselenskoe (Ivanov), 1917
 Rodzinna Europa (Miłosz), 1959
 R0gringe (Paludan), 1959
 Rok myśliwego (Miłosz), 1990
 Roland Barthes par Roland Barthes (Barthes), 1975
 Role of the Americas in History (Zea), 1992
 Role of the Reader (Eco), 1979

- Rollenspiele (Dirrenmatt), 1986
 Romain Rolland contre la France (Massis), 1915
 Roman Holidays and Others (Howells), 1908
 Romancier fictif (Belleau), 1980
 Romanse cieniów (Boy-Zelehski), 1987
 Romantik (Huch), 1899
 Romany Stain (Morley), 1926
 Rome (Serrés), 1983
 Romeo y Julieta (Hostos), 1939
 Room of One's Own (Woolf), 1929
 Roomful of Hovings (McPhee), 1968
 Roots of Political Philosophy (Plato), 1987
 Rossiia i intelligentsiia (Blok), 1919
 Rostros del cine mexicano (Monsiváis), 1993
 Round About a Great Estate (Jefferies), 1880
 Round River (Leopold), 1953
 Round Table (Hazlitt), 1817
 Round Table (Hunt), 1817
 Roundabout Papers (Thackeray), 1863
 Rozanov (Shklovskii), 1921
 Rudol'f Shteiner i Gete v mirovozzrenii sovremennosti (Belyi), 1917
 Rufino Tamayo (Cardoza y Aragón), 1934
 Rules for Preserving Health (Feijóo y Montenegro), 1800(?)
 Russia and the Universal Church (Solov'ev), 1948
 Russian People and Socialism (Herzen), 1956
 Russian People and Their Socialism (Herzen), 1855
 Russie et l'église universelle (Solov'ev), 1889
 Russische Realismus in der Weltliteratur (Lukács), 1949
 Russkii narod i sotsializm (Herzen), 1858
 Rustle of Language (Barthes), 1986
 Ruta de don Quijote (Azorin), 1905
- S liricheskikh pozitsii (Soloukhin), 1965
 S togo berega (Herzen), 1855
 S/Z (Barthes), 1970
 Sacred Wood (T.S.Eliot), 1920
 Sade, Fourier, Loyola (Barthes), 1971
 Safety Pins (Morley), 1925
 Saggi di economia rurale (Cattaneo), 1939
 Saggi sulla letteratura italiana del Seicento (Croce), 1911
 Saggio sopra gli errori popolari degli antichi (Leopardi), 1846
 Saggio sullo Hegel (Croce), 1913
 Sagt i korthed (Paludan), 1954
 St. Francis of Assisi (Chesterton), 1923
 St. George and the Godfather (Mailer), 1972
 St. Paul and Protestantism (Arnold), 1870
 St. Thomas Aquinas (Chesterton), 1933
 Saisons de l'esprit (Alain), 1937

- Sak och sken (Ekelund), 1922
 Salazar face à face (Massis), 1961
 Sällskap för en eremit (Bengtsson), 1938
 Salmagundi (Irving), 1807
 Salon de 1845 (Baudelaire), 1845
 Salon de 1846 (Baudelaire), 1846
 Salons (Diderot), 1957
 Salt og sukker (Heiberg), 1924
 Saltet och Helichrysus (Ekelund), 1956
 Salvador (Didion), 1983
 Same River Twice (Walker), 1996
 Samtale med et æsel (Lange), 1961
 Samuel Marchbanks' Almanack (Davies), 1967
 San Anselmo y el insensato (Marías), 1944
 Sanctity Will Out (Bernanos), 1947
 Sand County Almanac (Leopold), 1949
 Sanduhrbuch (Jünger), 1954
 Sanity of Art (Shaw), 1908
 Santa Teresa (Castro), 1929
 Sanxian ji (Lu Xun), 1932
 Sarmiento (Martínez Estrada), 1946
 Satires and Bagatelles (Franklin), 1937
 Satiry v proze (Saltykov-Shchedrin), 1859
 Saturday Mornings (Murdoch), 1931
 Saturnal (Chacel), 1972
 Satze aus Amerika (Dürrenmatt), 1970
 Sayal y la púrpura (Mallea), 1941
 Scandale de la vérité (Bernanos), 1939
 Scenic Art (Henry James), 1948
 Schere (Jünger), 1990
 Schicksalswende (Lukács), 1948
 Schimbarea la faţă a României (Cioran), 1936
 Schnäppchen namens DDR (Grass), 1990
 Schoolmaster (Benson), 1902
 Schopenhauer als Erzieher (Nietzsche), 1874
 Schopenhauer as Educator (Nietzsche), 1965
 Schreiben an den Herrn Diaconus Lavater zu Zürich (Mendelssohn), 1770
 Schriften zur Literatursoziologie (Lukács), 1961
 Schriften zur theoretischen Soziologie (Weber), 1947
 Schulpädagogik (Simmel), 1922
 Science and Christian Tradition (T.H.Huxley), 1893
 Science and Culture (T.H.Huxley), 1881
 Science and Education (T.H.Huxley), 1893
 Science and Hebrew Tradition (T. H. Huxley), 1893
 Science and the Unexpected Universe (Eiseley), 1966
 Science of Ethics as Based on the Science of Knowledge (Fichte), 1897
 Science of Knowledge (Fichte), 1868
 Science of Rights (Fichte), 1869

- Scotchman's Return (MacLennan), 1960
 Scotsman's Return (MacLennan), 1961
 Screening History (Vidal), 1992
 Scrieri despre artă (Călinescu), 1968
 Scriitori străini (Călinescu), 1967
 Scrolls from the Dead Sea (Wilson), 1955
 Se questo è un uomo (Levi), 1947
 Sea and Sardinia (Lawrence), 1921
 Seal in the Bedroom (Thurber), 1932
 Searching for Icons in Russia (Soloukhin), 1971
 Seasons of Celebration (Merton), 1965
 Sechs Essays (Arendt), 1948
 Second American Revolution (Vidal), 1982
 Second Coming (Herling-Grudziński), 1967
 Second Common Reader (Woolf), 1932
 Second Life of Art (Montale), 1982
 Second Light (Ekelund), 1986
 Second Person Singular (Meynell), 1921
 Second Sex (Beauvoir), 1953
 Second Tree from the Corner (White), 1954
 Secondo diario minimo (Eco), 1992
 Secret Drama of My Life (Gide), 1951
 Secret Dream (Priestley), 1946
 Secret Heart of the Clock (Canetti), 1989
 Secrets of the Invisible World Disclosed (Defoe), 1728
 Secrets of the Universe (Sanders), 1991
 Secular Scripture (Frye), 1976
 Seeds of Contemplation (Merton), 1949
 Seeds of Destruction (Merton), 1964
 Seele und die Formen (Lukács), 1911
 Seer (Hunt), 1840
 6 conferências em busca de um leitor (Freyre), 1965
 Seis ensayos en busca de nuestra expresión (Henríquez Ureña), 1928
 Seleta para jovens (Freyre), 1971
 Self and the Other (Ortega y Gasset), 1952
 Self-Reliance (Emerson), 1993
 Semeinyi vopros v Rossii (Rozanov), 1901
 Semiotic Challenge (Barthes), 1988
 Semiotics and the Philosophy of Language (Eco), 1984
 Senderos (Zambrano), 1986
 Sense of Glory (Read), 1929
 Sense of Where You Are (McPhee), 1965
 Senses and the Soul (Emerson), 1884
 Sensus Communis (Shaftesbury), 1709
 Sentences et maximes de morale (La Rochefoucauld), 1664
 Sentido de la difusión cultural latinoamericana (Zea), 1981
 Sentido e forma da poesia neo-realista (Loureço), 1968
 Sentiments de Critias (Benda), 1917

- Sentiments, passions, et signes (Alain), 1926
 Sermons, Bearing on Subjects of the Day (Newman), 1843
 Sermons, Chiefly on the Theory of Religious Belief (Newman), 1843
 Sermons for the Festivals (Newman), 1904
 Sermons Preached on Various Occasions (Newman), 1857
 Sertoos (Cunha), 1902
 Serve It Forth (Fisher), 1937
 Service inutile (Montherlant), 1935
 Sesame and Lilies (Ruskin), 1865
 Set og h0rt (Heiberg), 1917
 Seven English Cities (Howells), 1909
 Seven Interpretative Essays on Peruvian Reality (Mariátegui), 1971
 Seven Lamps of Architecture (Ruskin), 1849
 Seven Nights (Borges), 1984
 Seven Rivers of Canada (MacLennan), 1961
 Seventeenth Degree (McCarthy), 1974
 Several Essays Relating to Academies (Defoe), 1700
 Sex, Death, and Money (Vidal), 1968
 Sex, Economy, Freedom & Community (Berry), 1993
 Sex Is Politics and Vice Versa (Vidal), 1979
 Sgraffiti (Jünger), 1960
 Shakespeare and Hawaii (Morley), 1933
 Shakespeare i ego kritik Brandes (Shestov), 1898
 Shakespeare Our Contemporary (Kott), 1964
 Shandygaff (Morley), 1918
 Sharp Eyes (Burroughs), 1886
 Sharp Lookout (Burroughs), 1987
 Shelley and Calderón (Madariaga), 1920
 Shigui shu (Zhang Dai), 1658
 Shigui shu houji (Zhang Dai), 1959
 Shooting an Elephant (Orwell), 1950
 Shooting Niagara (Carlyle), 1867
 Shores of Light (Wilson), 1952
 Short Circuits (Leacock), 1928
 Short History of Decay (Cioran), 1975
 Short Residence in Sweden, Norway, and Denmark (Wollstonecraft), 1987
 Short Talks with the Dead (Belloc), 1926
 Shortest Way with the Dissenters (Defoe), 1927
 Shovelling Trouble (Richler), 1972
 Show People (Tynan), 1980
 Shufang yijiao (Zhou Zuoren), 1944
 Si le grain ne meurt (Gide), 1920
 Sidelights on New London and Newer York (Chesterton), 1932
 Sieben Jahre (Heinrich Mann), 1929
 Siége de PAlcazar (Massis), 1939
 Siete ensayos de antropología filosófica (Zubiri), 1982
 Siete ensayos de interpretación de la realidad peruana (Mariátegui), 1928
 Siete noches (Borges), 1980

- Siete tratados (Montalvo), 1882
 Sights and Spectacles (McCarthy), 1956
 Signo y el garabato (Paz), 1973
 Signos en rotación (Paz), 1965
 Signs and Seasons (Burroughs), 1886
 Signs of Change (Morris), 1888
 Silence Dogood Papers (Franklin), 1721
 Silence of the Sea (Belloc), 1940
 Silent China (Lu Xun), 1973
 Silent Life (Merton), 1957
 Silverado Squatters (Stevenson), 1883
 Silversköldarna (Bengtsson), 1931
 Simón Bolívar (Zea), 1980
 Simpatías y diferencias (Reyes), 1921
 Simvolizm (Belyi), 1910
 Sincerity and Authenticity (Trilling), 1972
 Sinn dieser Emigration (Heinrich Mann), 1934
 Sinn und Bedeutung (Jünger), 1971
 Sir Thomas More (Southey), 1829
 Siren and the Seashells (Paz), 1976
 Sirin uchenogo varvarstva (Belyi), 1922
 Sirtes (Reyes), 1949
 Sishu yu (Zhang Dai), 1985
 Siste epistler (Kjær), 1924
 Sistema periodico (Levi), 1975
 Sister Age (Fisher), 1984
 Situação africana e consciência nacional (Lourenço), 1976
 Situations (Sartre), 1947
 Six Memos for the Next Millennium (Calvino), 1988
 Six Walks in the Fictional Woods (Eco), 1994
 Sixteen Self Sketches (Shaw), 1949
 Sketch Book of Geoffrey Crayon, Gent. (Irving), 1819
 Sketches by Boz (Dickens), 1836
 Sketches from Cambridge (Stephen), 1865
 Sketches, New and Old (Twain), 1875
 Sketches of History in Six Sermons (Godwin), 1784
 Sketches of the Principal Picture Galleries in England (Hazlitt), 1824
 Skoltal (Ekelund), 1961
 Skribenter på yderposte (Paludan), 1949
 Skrivebord og stjernehimmel (Paludan), 1972
 Skryté dějiny (Březina), 1970
 Slouching Towards Bethlehem (Didion), 1968
 Slovo i kul'tura (Mandel'shtam), 1987
 Slovo zhivoe i mertvoe (Soloukhin), 1976
 Słówka (Boy-Zeleński), 1913
 Smaa apropos'er (Paludan), 1943
 Smaa epistler (Kjær), 1908
 Smart Set Criticism (Mencken), 1968

Smugglers' Library (Stempowski), 1990
 Smysl liubvi (Solov'ev), 1892
 So Be It (Gide), 1960
 Sobrados e mucambos (Freyre), 1936
 Sobre Hispanoamérica (Marías), 1973
 Sobre la accion cultural (Freire), 1969
 Sobre la esencia (Zubiri), 1962
 Sobre la novela picaresca (Tierno Galván), 1974
 Sobre la razón histórica (Ortega y Gasset), 1979
 Sobre o humorismo de Eça de Queirós (Ferreira), 1943
 Social Contract (Rousseau), 1913
 Social Rights and Duties (Stephen), 1896
 Socialism (Mill), 1879
 Socialist Diary (Morris), 1985
 Socialist Platform (Morris), 1888
 Society and Solitude (Emerson), 1870
 Sociología criminal (Azorín), 1899
 Sociology of Georg Simmel (Simmel), 1950
 Socratic Dialogues (Plato), 1953
 Søgende aander (Paludan), 1943
 Soledad sonora (Ocampo), 1950
 Soledades (Azorín), 1898
 Solenoe ozero (Soloukhin), 1994
 Soliloquies in England (Santayana), 1922
 Soliloquios y conversaciones (Unamuno), 1911
 Solitaria (Rozanov), 1927
 Sollers, écrivain (Barthes), 1979
 Sollers, Writer (Barthes), 1987
 Solstice de juin (Montherlant), 1941
 Som on intet var haendt (Paludan), 1938
 Sombras de obras (Paz), 1983
 Some Honorable Men (Mailer), 1976
 Some Impressions of Oxford (Bourget), 1901
 Some Lectures Concerning the Scholar's Vocation (Fichte), 1987
 Some Lessons in Metaphysics (Ortega y Gasset), 1970
 Some Turns of Thought in Modern Philosophy (Santayana), 1933
 Somewhat to Reade from Them That List (Nashe), 1591
 Somme athéologique (Bataille), 1954
 Sommersi e i salvati (Levi), 1986
 Somnium Scipionis (Cicero)
 Sonnenklarer Bericht an das grössere Publikum (Fichte), 1801
 Sophist (Plato)
 Sor Juana (Paz), 1988
 Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz (Paz), 1982
 Soul and Form (Lukács), 1974
 Soul of Man (Wilde), 1895
 Soul of Man Under Socialism (Wilde), 1891
 Souls of Black Folk (Du Bois), 1903

- Sound of Mountain Water (Stegner), 1969
 Sound of Two Hands Clapping (Tynan), 1975
 Soundings from the Atlantic (Holmes), 1864
 Source grecque (Weil), 1953
 South in Architecture (Mumford), 1941
 South of Yosemite (John Muir), 1988
 Souvenirs de la cour d'assises (Gide), 1914
 Souvenirs poétiques (Valéry), 1947
 Souveraineté rampante (Larose), 1994
 Soviet Civilization (Siniavskii), 1990
 Sozertsanie chuda (Soloukhin), 1984
 Soziologie (Simmel), 1908
 Soziologie, weltgeschichtliche Analysen, Politik (Weber), 1955
 Spain (Ganivet), 1946
 Spain (Madariaga), 1930
 Spaniards (Castro), 1971
 Spår och tecken (Ekelund), 1930
 Speak Out! (Grass), 1969
 Speaking of Literature and Society (Trilling), 1980
 Speaking Personally (Murdoch), 1930
 Spectateur Français (Marivaux), 1721
 Spectator (Addison), 1711
 Spectator (Steele), 1711
 Spectatorial Essays (Strachey), 1964
 Speculation and Revelation (Shestov), 1982
 Spejlinger (Lange), 1953
 Spice of Life (Chesterton), 1964
 Spirit of Hebrew Poetry (Herder), 1833
 Spirit of Music (Blok), 1943
 Spirit of Place (Meynell), 1899
 Spirit of Romance (Pound), 1910
 Spirit of the Age (Hazlitt), 1825
 Spiritual Direction and Meditation (Merton), 1960
 Spiritus Mundi (Frye), 1976
 Spur of the Moment (Murdoch), 1939
 Sredi khudozhnikov (Rozanov), 1914
 Srpnový rok (Vaculík), 1989
 Standing by Words (Berry), 1983
 Standing on Earth (Berry), 1991
 Star Thrower (Eiseley), 1978
 Stará dáma se baví (Vaculík), 1990
 Staroe i novoe (Shklovskii), 1966
 Stars Come Down to Earth (Adorno), 1994
 State of Latin America (Arciniegas), 1952
 Statesman (Plato), 1925
 Statesman's Manual (Coleridge), 1816
 Stat'i o Pushkine (Gershenzon), 1926
 Statues (Serrés), 1987

- Staying Put (Sanders), 1993
 Steadfast (Murdoch), 1941
 Steady Work (Irving Howe), 1966
 Steep Trails (John Muir), 1918
 Stendhal (Alain), 1935
 Sterne's Tristram Shandy and the Theory of the Novel (Shklovskii), 1981
 Stichworte (Adorno), 1969
 Sticks and Stones (Mumford), 1924
 Still Alive (Kott), 1994
 Still Life with a Bridle (Herbert), 1991
 Stimmen von Marrakesch (Canetti), 1967
 Stoffe (Dürrenmatt), 1981
 Stones of Venice (Ruskin), 1851
 Storia come pensiero e come azione (Croce), 1938
 Storia del Regno di Napoli (Croce), 1925
 Storia della storiografia italiana nel secolo decimonono (Croce), 1921
 Storia dell'estetica per saggi (Croce), 1942
 Storia dell'età barocca in Italia (Croce), 1929
 Storia d'Europa nel secolo decimonono (Croce), 1932
 Storia d'Italia (Guicciardini), 1561
 Storia d'Italia dal 1871 al 1915 (Croce), 1928
 Storia fiorentina (Guicciardini), 1858
 Storia fiorentina (Varchi), 1721
 Storie e leggende napoletane (Croce), 1919
 Strange Necessity (West), 1928
 Strange News (Nashe), 1592
 Strategie im Literaturkampf (Benjamin), 1974
 Stray Essays and Controversial Points (Newman), 1890
 Streamlines (Morley), 1936
 Streit der Fakultäten in drey Abschnitten (Kant), 1798
 Strictly from Hunger (Perelman), 1937
 Strolls with Pushkin (Siniavskii), 1993
 Structure of Society (Marías), 1987
 Structure of Spanish History (Castro), 1954
 Structure of the Novel (Edwin Muir), 1928
 Structure of Verse and Prose (Hope), 1943
 Stubborn Structure (Frye), 1970
 Studia i szkice z literatury francuskiej (Boy-Zeleński), 1920
 Studie über die Entwicklung des Dichters Victor Hugo (Hofmannsthal), 1901
 Studies in Classic American Literature (Lawrence), 1923
 Studies in European Realism (Lukács), 1950
 Studies in Medieval and Renaissance Literature (Lewis), 1967
 Studies in Pessimism (Schopenhauer), 1890
 Studies in Poetics (Călinescu), 1972
 Studies in Religious History (Renan), 1886
 Studies in the History of the Renaissance (Pater), 1873
 Studies in the Sierra (John Muir), 1950
 Studies in Words (Lewis), 1960

- Studies of a Biographer (Stephen), 1898
 Studies of Religious History (Renan), 1864
 Studii și cercetări de istorie literară (Călinescu), 1966
 Studii și comunicări (Călinescu), 1966
 Studii și conferințe Horățiu, Tasso, Cervantes, Tolstoi, Cehov (Călinescu), 1956
 Study of English Romanticism (Frye), 1968
 Styles of Radical Will (Sontag), 1969
 Subjection of Women (Mill), 1869
 Sub-Prefect Should Have Held His Tongue (Butler), 1990
 Subtile Jagden (Jünger), 1967
 Such, Such Were the Joys (Orwell), 1953
 Sueño creador (Zambrano), 1965
 Suenos y el tiempo (Zambrano), 1992
 Sugli specchi (Eco), 1985
 Suicida (Reyes), 1917
 Suite a Mars (Alain), 1939
 Sulla poesia (Montale), 1976
 Suma de Venezuela (Picon-Salas), 1966
 Sumerki prosveshcheniia (Roazanov), 1893
 Summer Meditations (Havel), 1992
 Summer on the Lakes in 1843 (Fuller), 1844
 Summit of the Years (Burroughs), 1913
 Sunshine Sketches of a Little Town (Leacock), 1912
 Suplemento al Los eruditos a la violeta (Cadalso), 1772
 Sur la science (Weil), 1966
 Sur la Toscane (Bourget), 1929
 Sur le succes du Bergsonisme (Benda), 1914
 Sur les cimes du desespoir (Cioran), 1990
 Sur les femmes (Montherlant), 1942
 Sur Nietzsche (Bataille), 1945
 Sur Racine (Barthes), 1963
 Suramerica (Picon-Salas), 1953
 Surprendre les voix (Belleau), 1986
 Survival in Auschwitz (Levi), 1961
 Survival of the Bark Canoe (McPhee), 1975
 Suspiria de Profundis (De Quincey), 1871
 Svundne somre (Kjaer), 1920
 Swanska Argus (Dalin), 1732
 Sweet Science (Liebling), 1956
 Sweetest Jesus and the Bitter Fruits of the World (Roazanov), 1978
 Swiadectwo poezji (Milosz), 1983
 Swiss Family Perelman (Perelman), 1952
 Syllogismes de Pamertume (Cioran), 1952
 Sympathien (Wieland), 1756
 Symposium (Plato)
 System der Sittenlehre nach den Principien der Wissenschaftslehren (Fichte), 1798
 System of Logic (Mill), 1843
 Systeme de la mode (Barthes), 1967

- Systeme des beaux-arts (Alain), 1920
 Szekspir wspotczesny (Kott), 1965
 Szesc medalionow i srebrna szkatulka (Herling-Grudziriski), 1994
 Szikra (Lukacs), 1952
 Szkice o literaturze francuskiej (Boy- Zelenski), 1956
 Szkice o Szekspirze (Kott), 1961
 Szkola klasykow (Kott), 1949
 Szukanie ojczyzny (Milosz), 1992
- T.S.Eliot (Frye), 1963
 Tabla rasa (Perez de Ayala), 1963
 Table of Contents (McPhee), 1985
 TableTalk (Coleridge), 1835
 Table Talk of Samuel Marchbanks (Davies), 1949
 Table-Talk (Hazlitt), 1821
 Table-Talk (Hunt), 1851
 Tablica z Macondo (Baranczak), 1990
 Tactics and Ethics (Lukacs), 1972
 Tagebuch mit Marion (Frisch), 1947
 Tagore en las barrancas de San Isidro (Ocampo), 1961
 Tak chto zhe nam delat'? (Tolstoi), 1902
 Taking the World in for Repairs (Selzer), 1986
 Taktika és ethika (Lukács), 1919
 Tale Bearers (Pritchett), 1980
 Tale for a Chimney Corner (Hunt), 1869
 Talking (Priestley), 1926
 Talking It Over (Nettie Palmer), 1932
 Talks to Teachers on Psychology (William James), 1899
 Tamaño de mi esperanza (Borges), 1926
 Tamworth Reading Room (Newman), 1841
 Tan hu ji (Zhou Zuoren), 1928
 Tan long ji (Zhou Zuoren), 1927
 Tango (Sabato), 1963
 Tankar i gröngräset (Bengtsson), 1953
 Tanker og bagtanker (Paludan), 1937
 Taoan mengyi (Zhang Dai), c. 1685
 Tatler (Addison), 1709
 Tatler (Steele), 1709
 Tchinovnicks (Saltykov-Shchedrin), 1861
 Teaching a Stone to Talk (Dillard), 1982
 Tears of Eros (Bataille), 1989
 Teatro crítico universal (Feijóo y Montenegro), 1725
 Teatro de signos/Transparencias (Paz), 1974
 Technical Education (T.H.Huxley), 1885
 Technics and Civilization (Mumford), 1934
 Technische Existenz (Bense), 1949
 Tecnología y libertad (Ayala), 1959
 Tekhnika pisatel'skogo remesla (Shklovskii), 1927

- Tel quel (Valéry), 1941
 Telephone Booth Indian (Liebling), 1942
 Tema de nuestro tiempo (Ortega y Gasset), 1923
 Temas contemporáneos (Vasconcelos), 1955
 Tempo de aprendiz (Freyre), 1979
 Tempo e poesia (Lourenço), 1974
 Temporal and Eternal (Péguy), 1958
 Temptation to Exist (Cioran), 1968
 Ten Foot Square Hut (Kamo no Chōmei), 1928
 Tentation d'exister (Cioran), 1956
 Tentativas y orientaciones (Reyes), 1944
 Tenth Muse (Read), 1957
 Teoría de Andalucía (Ortega y Gasset), 1942
 Teoría de los estilos (d'Ors), 1944
 Teoria e storia della storiografia (Croce), 1917
 Teoriia isoricheskogo progressa i upadok (Rožanov), 1892
 Terceras de ABC (Pérez de Ayala), 1976
 Teresa la Santa (Castro), 1972
 Teresina, etc. (Cândido), 1980
 Terre Bernoise (Stempowski), 1954
 Terrors of the Night (Nashe), 1594
 Tertulia de Madrid (Reyes), 1949
 Tese e antítese (Cândido), 1964
 Testimonios (Ocampo), 1935
 Tetiva (Shklovskii), 1970
 Texte social-politice (Călinescu), 1971
 Textes sous une occupation (Montherlant), 1953
 Textos Cautivos (Borges), 1986
 That Old Gang o' Mine (Perelman), 1984
 Thatsachen des Bewusstseyns (Fichte), 1817
 Theaetetus (Plato)
 Theater (Musil), 1965
 Theater of Essence (Kott), 1984
 Theater-Schriften und Reden (Dürrenmatt), 1966
 Theaterprobleme (Dürrenmatt), 1955
 Theatre (Steele), 1720
 Theatre Chronicles (McCarthy), 1963
 Theism (Mill), 1874
 Themes and Variations (Aldous Huxley), 1950
 Themes et discussions (Massis), 1958
 Theorie des Romans (Lukács), 1920
 Theory and History of Historiography (Croce), 1921
 Theory and Practice of History (Ranke), 1973
 Theory, Culture, and Politics (Lukacs), 1989
 Theory of Prose (Shklovskii), 1990
 Theory of the Novel (Lukács), 1971
 These Sad But Glorious Days (Fuller), 1991
 They Asked for a Paper (Lewis), 1962

- Thing (Chesterton), 1929
 Thirty and Three (MacLennan), 1954
 This and That and the Other (Belloc), 1912
 This Past Must Address Its Present (Soyinka), 1986
 This Peace (Thomas Mann), 1938
 This War (Thomas Mann), 1940
 This Year in Jerusalem (Richler), 1994
 Thought Unaware (Siniavskii), 1965
 Thoughts in Solitude (Merton), 1958
 Thoughts in the Wilderness (Priestley), 1957
 Thoughts on Art and Style (Diderot), 1893
 Thoughts on Death and Immortality (Feuerbach), 1980
 Thoughts on Man, His Nature, Productions, and Discoveries (Godwin), 1831
 Thoughts on Parliamentary Reform (Mill), 1859
 Thoughts on the Prospect of a Regicide Peace (Edmund Burke), 1796
 Thousand-Mile Walk to the Gulf (John Muir), 1916
 Thread of Gold (Benson), 1905
 Three Contributions to the Sexual Theory (Freud), 1910
 Three Essays on the Theory of Sexuality (Freud), 1949
 Three Greatest Italian Poets of the Nineteenth Century (Howells), 1983
 Three Guineas (Woolf), 1938
 Three Hours in the Prado Museum (d'Ors), 1954
 Three Memorials on French Affairs (Edmund Burke), 1797
 Three Persons (Macphail), 1929
 Three Philosophical Poets (Santayana), 1910
 Thus Spoke Zarathustra (Nietzsche), 1896
 Tiempo mexicano (Fuentes), 1971
 Tiempo nublado (Paz), 1983
 Tiempo que ni vuelve ni tropieza (Marías), 1964
 Tiempo y yo (Ayala), 1992
 Tierra de belleza convulsiva (Cardoza y Aragón), 1991
 Tierras solares (Darío), 1904
 Tiers-instruit (Serrés), 1991
 Timaeus (Plato)
 Time and Change (Burroughs), 1912
 Time and Tide, by Weare and Tyne (Ruskin), 1867
 Time to Gather Stones (Soloukhin), 1993
 Timeless at Heart (Lewis), 1987
 Times and Tendencies (Replier), 1931
 Time's Arrow, Time's Cycle (Gould), 1987
 Tiomnii lik (Rozanov), 1911
 Títulos (Chacel), 1981
 To Be or Not to Be (Vadeboncoeur), 1980
 To Be Read at Dusk (Dickens), 1898
 To Be Taken with Salt (McArthur), 1903
 To Criticize the Critic (T.S.Eliot), 1965
 To Hell with Culture (Read), 1941
 To the Finland Station (Wilson), 1940

- To Think of Tea! (Repplier), 1932
 Todo al vuelo (Darío), 1912
 Toilers of the Field (Jefferies), 1892
 Tolko veroi—Sola fide (Shestov), 1966
 Tomorrow and Tomorrow and Tomorrow, (Aldous Huxley), 1956
 Tongue Set Free (Canetti), 1979
 Too Many People (Priestley), 1928
 Too Much College (Leacock), 1939
 Torch in My Ear (Canetti), 1982
 Torre de Babel (Cardoza y Aragón), 1930
 Tortenelmi regeny (Lukács), 1947
 Totem and Taboo (Freud), 1918
 Totem und Tabu (Freud), 1913
 Tour Eiffel (Barthes), 1964
 Tour on the Prairies (Irving), 1835
 Tour Thro' the Whole Island of Great Britain (Defoe), 1724
 Tous feux éteints (Montherlant), 1975
 Toute compte fait (Beauvoir), 1972
 Toward a Marxist Humanism (Kotakowski), 1968
 Town (Hunt), 1848
 Town-Talk (Steele), 1715
 Trabajos y los días (Reyes), 1944
 Tracts for the Times (Newman), 1833
 Tracts Theological and Ecclesiastical (Newman), 1874
 Tradicion (d'Ors), 1939
 Tradicion intelectual argentina (Rodó), 1939
 Tradicion y modernismo (Tierno Galván), 1962
 Tradition of Freedom (Bernanos), 1950
 Traducción (Paz), 1971
 Tragediia tvorchestva (Belyi), 1911
 Tragic Sense of Life in Men and in Peoples (Unamuno), 1921
 Trahison des clerics (Benda), 1927
 Trails of Wonder (John Muir), 1972
 Train of Powder (West), 1955
 Traite sur la tolerance (Voltaire), 1763
 Traktat über die Sterblichkeit der Vernunft (Kolakowski), 1967
 Transatlantic Sketches (Henry James), 1875
 Transition (Edwin Muir), 1926
 Transparencias de Colombia (Arciniegas), 1973
 Transposition (Lewis), 1949
 Trasuntos de España (Azorín), 1938
 Tratado de metafísica (Vasconcelos), 1929
 Tratado de sociología (Ayala), 1947
 Tratado de sociología (Hostos), 1904
 Tratados políticos (Gracián), 1941
 Traumdeutung (Freud), 1900
 Traume eines Geistersehers (Kant), 1766
 Traveling with the Innocents Abroad (Twain), 1958

- Travels (Sarmiento), 1963
 Travels in Alaska (John Muir), 1917
 Travels in Hyperreality (Eco), 1986
 Travels in Philadelphia (Morley), 1920
 Travels in the North (Čapek), 1939
 Travels in the United States in 1847 (Sarmiento), 1868
 Travels in Two Democracies (Wilson), 1936
 Travels with a Donkey in the Cévennes (Stevenson), 1879
 Travels with Mr. Brown (Twain), 1940
 Travesías (Mallea), 1961
 Trayectoria de Goethe (Reyes), 1954
 Trazos de historia literaria (Reyes), 1951
 Treason of the Intellectuals (Benda), 1928
 Treasurer's Report (Benchley), 1930
 Treatise on Ancient and Modern Literature (Staël), 1803
 Treatise on the Influence of the Passions upon the Happiness of Individuals and Nations (Staël), 1798
 Treatise on the Social Compact (Rousseau), 1764
 Treatise on Toleration (Voltaire), 1779
 Treatise upon the Origin of Language (Herder), 1827
 Treizième César (Montherlant), 1970
 Tremendous Trifles (Chesterton), 1909
 Tren de ondas (Reyes), 1932
 Trentadue variazioni (Montale), 1973
 Tres aproximaciones a la literatura de nuestro tiempo (Sabato), 1968
 Tres discursos para dos aldeas (Fuentes), 1993
 Tres horas en el Museo del Prado (d'Ors), 1923
 338171 T.E. (Ocampo), 1942
 Tret'ia okhota (Soloukhin), 1968
 Tri razgovora o voine, progresse, i konste istorii (Solov'ev), 1900
 Tributo a Inglaterra (Pérez de Ayala), 1963
 Triple Thinkers (Wilson), 1938
 Tríptico (Ortega y Gasset), 1927
 Tristram Shendi Sterna i teoriia romana (Shklovskii), 1921
 Trois essais sur l'insignifiance (Vadeboncoeur), 1983
 Trois Légendes du Moyen Âge (Gourmont), 1919
 Troisième Olympique (Montherlant), 1929
 Troistvennyi obraz sovershenstva (Gershenson), 1918
 Trouble with Being Born (Cioran), 1976
 Trouble with Nigeria (Achebe), 1983
 True Patriot (Fielding), 1745
 True Solitude (Merton), 1969
 True Voice of Feeling (Read), 1953
 Trushchobnye liudi (Giliarovskii), 1887
 Truten' (Novikov), 1769
 Truth of the Imagination (Edwin Muir), 1988
 Truth That Killed (Markov), 1983
 Trwałe wartości literatury polskiego Oświecenia (Kott), 1951

- Tsarstvo Bozhie vnutri vas (Tolstoi), 1893
 Tsurezuregusa (Kenkō)
 Tsvetushchaia slozhnost (Leont'ev), 1992
 Tugman's Passage (Hoagland), 1982
 Tumba de Antígona (Zambrano), 1967
 Turmbau (Dürrenmatt), 1990
 Tuscan Cities (Howells), 1967
 Tusculan Disputations (Cicero), 1927
 Tusculanae disputationes (Cicero)
 Twelve Seasons (Krutch), 1949
 Twelve Types (Chesterton), 1902
 20,000 Leagues Under the Sea (Benchley), 1928
 Twilight in Italy (Lawrence), 1916
 Twilight of the Idols (Nietzsche), 1896
 Two Cheers for Democracy (E.M.Forster), 1951
 Two Essays on Scripture Miracles and on Ecclesiastical (Newman), 1870
 Two Essays on the Remnant (Eglinton), 1894
 Two Laughters (Murdoch), 1934
 Two Paths (Ruskin), 1859
 Typus (Jünger), 1963
 Tyska utsikter (Ekelund), 1913
- Über das Fundament der Moral (Schopenhauer), 1841
 Über das Marionettentheater (Kleist), 1935
 Über das Sehn und die Farben (Schopenhauer), 1816
 Über das Selbstverständliche (Grass), 1968
 Über das Wesen des Gelehrten (Fichte), 1806
 Über den Begriff der Wissenschaftslehre (Fichte), 1794
 Über den Dichter und das Dichterische (Borchardt), 1924
 Über den Geist und Buchstab in der Philosophie (Fichte), 1794
 Über den Willen in der Natur (Schopenhauer), 1836
 Über deutsche Literatur (Thomas Mann), 1968
 Über die Beziehung der Staatskunst auf das Glück der Menschheit (Georg Forster), 1966
 Über die Epochen der neueren Geschichte (Ranke), 1888
 Über die Freiheit des menschlichen Willens (Schopenhauer), 1841
 Über die Liebe zum Menschen (Schröder), 1966
 Über die Linie (Jünger), 1950
 Über die neuere Deutsche Litteratur (Herder), 1767
 Über die neuere Geschichte (Schlegel), 1811
 Über die Sprache und Weisheit der Indier (Schlegel), 1808
 Über die vierfache Wurzel des Satzes vom zureichenden Grunde (Schopenhauer), 1813
 Über Literatur (Benjamin), 1969
 Über naive und sentimentalische Dichtung (Schiller), 1795
 Über patriotische Erziehung (Fichte), 1960
 Über Psychoanalyse (Freud), 1910
 Über Walter Benjamin (Adorno), 1970
 Ubezshische Monrepo (Saltykov-Shchedrin), 1878
 Uciekinier z utopii (Barańczak), 1984

- Udachi i porazheniia Maksima Gor'kogo (Shklovskii), 1926
 Uden mål—og med (Sørensen), 1973
 Uedinennoe (Rozanov), 1912
 Új magyar kultúráért (Lukács), 1948
 Última Tule (Reyes), 1942
 Últimos movitos de Proteo (Rodó), 1932
 Ulysse (Călinescu), 1967
 Umgang mit Philosophen (Bense), 1947
 Umozrenie i oktrovenie (Shestov), 1964
 Unas lecciones de metafísica (Ortega y Gasset), 1966
 Unbehagen in der Kultur (Freud), 1930
 Unbekannte Aufsätze...aus Paris, Rom und Mailand (Burckhardt), 1922
 Uncollected Egyptian Essays (E.M.Forster), 1988
 Uncommercial Traveller (Dickens), 1860
 Undeceptions (Lewis), 1971
 Under Dispute (Replier), 1924
 Under the Apple-Trees (Burroughs), 1916
 Under the Maples (Burroughs), 1921
 Under the Sign of Saturn (Sontag), 1980
 Understanding Brecht (Benjamin), 1973
 Unfashionable Observations (Nietzsche), 1995
 Unforeseen Wilderness (Berry), 1971
 Unfortunate Traveller (Nashe), 1972
 Ungehorsam der Ideen (Bense), 1965
 Unguarded Thoughts (Siniavskii), 1972
 Unheimliche (Freud), 1919
 United States (Vidal), 1992
 Unity of Religion (Mill), 1874
 Universal Natural History and Theory of the Heavens (Kant), 1969
 Universidad colombiana (Arciniegas), 1932
 Universidad, política y pueblo (Reyes), 1967
 Universidad y educación (Henríquez Ureña), 1969
 University Sketches (Newman), 1902
 Universul poeziei (Călinescu), 1971
 Universum der Zeichen (Bense), 1983
 Unmodern Observations (Nietzsche), 1909
 Uno y el universo (Sabato), 1945
 Unsettling of America (Berry), 1977
 Unsolved Riddle (Leacock), 1920
 Unterhaltungen über literarische Gegenstände (Hofmannsthal), 1904
 Unterwegs zur Sprache (Heidegger), 1959
 Untimely Meditations (Nietzsche), 1983
 Untimely Thoughts (Gor'kii), 1968
 Unto This Last (Ruskin), 1862
 Unzeitgemässe Betrachtungen (Nietzsche), 1873
 Uomini e cose della vecchia Italia (Croce), 1927
 Upiory rewolucji (Herling-Grudziński), 1969
 Upon the Aesthetic Culture of Man (Schiller), 1845

- Upon the Garden of Epicurus (Temple), 1908
 Upstate (Wilson), 1971
 Urban Prospect (Mumford), 1968
 Urchin in the Storm (Gould), 1987
 Urn-Burial (Browne), 1658
 Urphänomene (Huch), 1946
 Ursachen des gesunkenen Geschmacks bei den verschiedenen Völkern (Herder), 1775
 Use and Abuse of History (Nietzsche), 1949
 Use of Poetry and the Use of Criticism (T.S.Eliot), 1933
 Uses of Diversity (Chesterton), 1920
 Uses of Literature (Calvino), 1986
 Uso de la palabra (Castellanos), 1974
 Usos amorosos de la postguerra española (Martín Gaité), 1987
 Usos amorosos del dieciocho en España (Martín Gaité), 1972
 Utilitarianism (Mill), 1863
 Utopía de América (Henríquez Ureña), 1978
 Utopia of Usurers (Chesterton), 1917
- V chem moia vera (Tolstoi), 1884
 V mire neiasnogo i nereshennogo (Rozanov), 1901
 V srede umerennosti i akkuratnosti (Saltykov-Shchedrin), 1874
 V teni Gogolia (Siniavskii), 1975
 Va jouer avec cette poussière (Montherlant), 1966
 Val D'Arno (Ruskin), 1874
 Valda sidor (Ekelund), 1933
 Valencia (Azorín), 1941
 Valera en Italia (Azaña), 1929
 Valera en Rusia (Azaña), 1926
 Valéry face à ses idoles (Cioran), 1970
 Valiente mundo nuevo (Fuentes), 1990
 Valle de Josafat (d'Ors), 1921
 Valores literarios (Azorín), 1913
 Values for Survival (Mumford), 1946
 Varia (Replier), 1897
 Varied Types (Belloc), 1903
 Varied Types (Chesterton), 1903
 Variété (Valéry), 1924
 Variétés littéraires (Brunetière), 1904
 Varieties of Religious Experience (William James), 1902
 Variety of Things (Beerbohm), 1928
 Vase magique (Gourmont), 1923
 Väst-östligt (Ekelund), 1925
 Vážení občane (Havel), 1992
 Ved musikkens taerskel (Lange), 1957
 Velada en Benicarló (Azaña), 1939
 Velikie kanunii (Shestov), 1910
 Venetian Life (Howells), 1866
 Venus of Milo (Grimm), 1868

- Venus von Milo (Grimm), 1864
 Verano en Mallorca (Azorín), 1952
 Verborgene Tradition (Arendt), 1976
 Verdadero cuento del Tío Sam (Martínez Estrada), 1963
 Veri similia (Ekelund), 1915
 Verona (Ruskin), 1894
 Versuch, den Begriff der negativen Grössen in die Weltweisheit einzuführen (Kant), 1763
 Versuch einer Kritik aller Offenbarung (Fichte), 1792
 Versuch einiger Betrachtungen über den Optimismus (Kant), 1759
 Versuch über Schiller (Thomas Mann), 1955
 Versuch über Victor Hugo (Hofmannsthal), 1925
 Versuch über Wagner (Adorno), 1952
 Versuche über Brecht (Benjamin), 1966
 Verteidigung der Kultur (Heinrich Mann), 1971
 Very Easy Death (Beauvoir), 1966
 Veter s Kavkaza (Belyi), 1928
 Veter stranstvii (Soloukhin), 1960
 Viaje a Nicaragua (Darío), 1909
 Viaje entretenido al país del ocio (Pérez de Ayala), 1975
 Viajero y una de sus sombras (Ocampo), 1951
 Viajes en Europa, África y América (Sarmiento), 1849
 Victor Hugo (Hofmannsthal), 1904
 Victorian Age of Literature (Chesterton), 1913
 Vida, ascendencia, nacimiento, crianza y aventuras (Torres Villarroel), 1743
 Vida blanca (Mallea), 1960
 Vida de don Quijote y Sancho (Unamuno), 1905
 Vida de Rubén Darío escrita por él mismo (Darío), 1915
 Vida literaria (Unamuno), 1967
 Vida nueva (Rodó), 1897, 1899, 1900
 Vida, forma e côr (Freyre), 1962
 Videnie poeta (Gershenzon), 1920
 Vie d'Ernest Psichari (Massis), 1916
 Vieillesse (Beauvoir), 1970
 Viejos y Nuevos Mundos (Picón-Salas), 1983
 Viento de Bagdad (Vasconcelos), 1945
 Vietnam (McCarthy), 1967
 View from the Diners Club (Vidal), 1991
 View of the English Stage (Hazlitt), 1818
 View of the English Stage (Tynan), 1975
 Views and Reviews (Henry James), 1908
 Vigil in Benicarló (Azaña), 1982
 Vigiles de l'esprit (Alain), 1942
 Villa (Borchardt), 1908
 Village introuvable (Kotakowski), 1986
 Vindication of Isaac Bickerstaff Esq. (Swift), 1709
 Vindication of Natural Society (Edmund Burke), 1756
 Vindication of the Rights of Men (Wollstonecraft), 1790
 Vindication of the Rights of Woman (Wollstonecraft), 1792

- Vindiciae Ecclesiae Anglicanae (Southey), 1826
 Vinegar Puss (Perelman), 1975
 Vingt et un Propos (Alain), 1915
 Vingt Leçons sur les beaux-arts (Alain), 1931
 Virginia Woolf en su diario (Ocampo), 1954
 Virginibus Puerisque (Stevenson), 1881
 Visages des idées (Massis), 1958
 Visión de Anáhuac (Reyes), 1917
 Vision of Anahuac (Reyes), 1950
 Vision Papers (Yeats), 1992
 Visiones y comentarios (Unamuno), 1949
 Visiones y visitas con Francisco de Quevedo (Torres Villarroel), 1727
 Visions from San Francisco Bay (Milosz), 1982
 Visions of Excess (Bataille), 1985
 Visite au musicien (Alain), 1927
 Visperas de España (Reyes), 1937
 Visto y no visto (Marías), 1970
 Vita immaginaria (Natalia Ginzburg), 1974
 Vitae parallelae (Plutarch)
 Vite di avventure, di fede e di passione (Croce), 1936
 Vladimirske Proselki (Soloukhin), 1958
 Vlast' kliuchei (Shestov), 1923
 Vocation of Man (Fichte), 1848
 Vocation of the Scholar (Fichte), 1847
 Vocation spirituelle de la France (Bernanos), 1975
 Voice from the Attic (Davies), 1960
 Voice from the Chorus (Siniavskii), 1976
 Voice of the Desert (Krutch), 1955
 Voices of Marrakesh (Canetti), 1978
 Volcano and Miracle (Herling-Grudziński), 1996
 Volkssagenforschung (Ranke), 1935
 Volshebnaia palochka (Soloukhin), 1983
 Vom anderen Ufer (Herzen), 1850
 Vom Erkennen und Empfinden der menschlichen Seele (Herder), 1778
 Vom Geheimnis der Freiheit (Susman), 1965
 Vom Geist der ebräischen Poesie (Herder), 1782
 Vom Geist des Christentums (Herder), 1994
 Vom Nutzen und Nachteil der Historie für das Leben (Nietzsche), 1874
 Vom Wesen der Moderne (Simmel), 1990
 Vom Wesen deutscher Denker (Bense), 1938
 Von deutscher Art und Kunst (Herder), 1773
 Voraussetzungen einer Erzählung (Wolf), 1983
 Vorlesung zur Einleitung in die Erkenntnistheorie (Adorno), 1973
 Vorlesung zur Einleitung in die Soziologie hielt (Adorno), 1973
 Vorlesungen über des Wesen der Religion (Feuerbach), 1851
 Vorlesungen zur Ästhetik (Adorno), 1973
 Vorlesungen zur Einführung in die Psychoanalyse (Freud), 1916
 Voskreshenie slova (Shklovskii), 1914

- Vospominaniia ob A.A.Bloke (Belyi), 1922
 Vostok, Rossiia i Slaviansstvo (Leont'ev), 1885
 Voyage Round the World (Georg Forster), 1777
 Voyageur solitaire est un diable (Montherlant), 1945
 Vremia sobirat' kamni (Soloukhin), 1966
 Vstrechi (Shklovskii),
 Vues (Valéry), 1948
 Vylet do Španěl (Čapek), 1930
 Výzva k transcendenci (Havel), 1984
- W doline Dniestru (Stempowski), 1993
 Wagner und unsere Zeit (Thomas Mann), 1963
 Waiting for God (Weil), 1951
 Wake-Robin (Burroughs), 1871
 Walden (Thoreau), 1854
 Waldgang (Jünger), 1951
 Walk in Rural Russia (Soloukhin), 1966
 Walk to an Ant Hill (Bengtsson), 1950
 Walking the Dead Diamond River (Hoagland), 1973
 Wanderungen im Norden (Andersch), 1962
 War, Progress, and the End of History (Solov'ev), 1915
 Wares of Autolycus (Meynell), 1965
 Was Europe a Success? (Krutch), 1934
 Was heisst Denken? (Heidegger), 1954
 Was ist Aufklärung? (Kant), 1975
 Was ist das—die Philosophie (Heidegger), 1956
 Watching My Name Go By (Mailer), 1975
 Watchman (Coleridge), 1796
 Watermark (Brodsky), 1992
 Way to Rainy Mountain (Momaday), 1969
 Way Towards the Blessed Life (Fichte), 1849
 Ways of Nature (Burroughs), 1905
 Wayward Pressman (Liebling), 1947
 We Call for a Treaty (Wright), 1985
 We Moderns (Edwin Muir), 1918
 Web of Group Affiliations (Simmel), 1955
 Wędrowki po Argentynie (Gombrowicz), 1977
 Week on the Concord and Merrimack Rivers (Thoreau), 1849
 Wegmarken (Heidegger), 1967
 Wei ziyou shu (Lu Xun), 1933
 Weight of Glory (Lewis), 1949
 Weinhaus Wolf (Benn), 1967
 Weisheit aus der Geschichte (Burckhardt), 1968
 Well and the Shallows (Chesterton), 1935
 Well-Tempered Critic (Davies), 1981
 Well-Tempered Critic (Frye), 1963
 Weltgeschichtliche Betrachtungen (Burckhardt), 1905
 Weltgeschichtliches Lesebuch (Ranke), 1957

- Weltstaat (Jünger), 1960
 Wesen des Glaubens im Sinne Luthers (Feuerbach), 1844
 Western and Eastern Rambles (Joseph Howe), 1973
 Westward Ha! (Perelman), 1948
 Wet Wit and Dry Humour (Leacock), 1931
 What Are People For? (Berry), 1990
 What Henry James Knew (Ozick), 1993
 What I Believe (E.M.Forster), 1939
 What I Believe (Tolstoi), 1885
 What Is Art? (Tolstoi), 1898
 What Is Called Thinking? (Heidegger), 1968
 What Is Contemplation? (Merton), 1948
 What Is Found There (Rich), 1993
 What Is Literature? (Du Bos), 1940
 What Is Literature? (Sartre), 1988
 What Is Living and What Is Dead of the Philosophy of Hegel (Croce), 1915
 What Is Man? (Twain), 1917
 What Is Philosophy? (Heidegger), 1958
 What Is Philosophy? (Ortega y Gasset), 1960
 What Is Religion? (Clarke), 1895
 What to Do? (Tolstoi), 1887
 Where the Bluebird Sings to the Lemonade Springs (Stegner), 1992
 White Album (Didion), 1979
 Why Do Men Stupefy Themselves? (Tolstoi), 1975
 Why We Are Divided (Groulx), 1943
 Widerstand lernen (Grass), 1984
 Widzenia nad Zatoką San Francisco (Miłosz), 1969
 Wiktor Hugo (Kott), 1952
 Wild Flag (White), 1946
 Wild Life in a Southern County (Jefferies), 1879
 Wild Planet (Murdoch), 1934
 Wilderness Essays (John Muir), 1980
 Will in Nature (Schopenhauer), 1877
 Will to Believe (William James), 1897
 Will to Power (Nietzsche), 1909
 Wille zur Macht (Nietzsche), 1901
 Wille zur Ohnmacht (Hamm), 1992
 William Hazlitt (Priestley), 1960
 Wimbledon (McPhee), 1972
 Window on Russia (Wilson), 1972
 Winds of Doctrine (Santayana), 1913
 Winnowed Wisdom (Leacock), 1926
 Winter Notes on Summer Impressions (Dostoevskii), 1954
 Winter Sunshine (Burroughs), 1875
 Winterslow (Hazlitt), 1850
 Wisdom of Life (Schopenhauer), 1890
 Wit of a Duck (Burroughs), 1913
 With Bold Knife and Fork (Fisher), 1969

- With Eye and Ear (Rexroth), 1970
 Within the Rim (Henry James), 1919
 Witness of Poetry (Miłosz), 1983
 Wolf Willow (Stegner), 1962
 Woman in the Nineteenth Century (Fuller), 1845
 Woman's Essays (Woolf), 1992
 Women and Writing (Woolf), 1979
 Wonderful Mistake (Thomas), 1988
 Words with Power (Frye), 1990
 Wordsworth (Read), 1930
 Working Novelist (Pritchett), 1965
 Works of Max Beerbohm (Beerbohm), 1896
 World Government and Peace (White), 1945
 World More Attractive (Irving Howe), 1963
 World of Our Fathers (Irving Howe), 1976
 World of Romance (Morris), 1906
 World Outside the Window (Rexroth), 1987
 World Within the Word (Gass), 1978
 World's Last Night (Lewis), 1960
 Wortmasken (Canetti), 1995
 Wound and the Bow (Wilson), 1941
 Writer and Critic (Lukács), 1971
 Writer in the Catastrophe of Our Time (Sabato), 1990
 Writer, Reader, Critic (Green), 1990
 Writer, the Reader and the Critic in a Monoculture (Green), 1986
 Writer's Diary (Dostoevskii), 1949
 Writers in Politics (Ngugi), 1981
 Writing and Being (Gordimer), 1995
 Writing Degree Zero (Barthes), 1967
 Writing from the Center (Sanders), 1995
 Writing on the Wall (McCarthy), 1970
 Writings on Civil Disobedience and Non-Violence (Tolstoi), 1988
 Writings on Irish Folklore (Yeats), 1993
 Writings on Shakespeare (Coleridge), 1959
 Writings on Theatre and Drama (Dürrenmatt), 1976
 Wspomnienia polskie (Gombrowicz), 1977
 Wyjścia z milczenia (Herling-Grudziński), 1993
- X-Ray of the Pampa (Martínez Estrada), 1971
 Xavier Villaurrutia en persona y en obra (Paz), 1978
 Xihu xunmeng (Zhang Dai), 1671
- Y a-t-il un intellectuel dans la salle? (Belleau), 1984
 Yankee in Canada (Thoreau), 1866
 Yao wei ji (Zhou Zuoren), 1942
 Yaotang yulu (Zhou Zuoren), 1941
 Ye du chao (Zhou Zuoren), 1934
 Year of the Hunter (Miłosz), 1994

- Yehangchuan (Zhang Dai), 1987
 Yellowplush Correspondence (Thackeray), 1838
 Yet Again (Beerbohm), 1909
 Yet Another Philosophy of History for the Education of Humanity (Herder), 1968
 Yishu yu shenghuo (Zhou Zuoren), 1926
 Yong ri ji (Zhou Zuoren), 1929
 Yosemite (John Muir), 1912
 Yosemite and Beyond (John Muir), 1980
 Young Hegel (Lukács), 1975
 Youngest Science (Thomas), 1983
 Yutian de shu (Zhou Zuoren), 1925
- Za i protiv (Shklovskii), 1957
 Za piat' let (Herzen), 1960
 Za rubezhom (Saltykov-Shchedrin), 1880
 Za shest' desiat let (Shklovskii), 1985
 Za sorok let (Shklovskii), 1965
 Zaczynając od moich ulic (Miłosz), 1985
 Zadochni reportazhi za Bulgaria (Markov), 1990
 Zahlen und Götter (Jünger), 1974
 Zahradníkuv rok (Čapek), 1929
 Zametki iz dnevnika (Gor'kii), 1924
 Zametki o proze Pushkina (Shklovskii), 1937
 Zametki o proze russkikh klassikov (Shklovskii), 1953
 Zapiski moskvicha (Giliarovskii), 1931
 Zapiski otshel'nika (Leont'ev), 1992
 Zaufać nieufności (Barańczak), 1993
 Zehn ausgewählte Essays zur Einführung in das Studium der neueren Kunst (Grimm), 1871
 Zeitalter wird besichtigt (Heinrich Mann), 1945
 Zeitbilder und Charakteristiken (Ranke), 1918
 Zemli razvedchik (Shklovskii), 1969
 Zen and the Birds of Appetite (Merton), 1968
 Zerstörung der Vernunft (Lukács), 1954
 Zerstreute Blätter (Herder), 1785
 Zhao hua xi shi (Lu Xun), 1928
 Zhili-byli (Shklovskii), 1964
 Zhivopisets (Novikov), 1772
 Zhizn' khudozhnika Fedotova (Shklovskii), 1936
 Zhun fengyue tan (Lu Xun), 1934
 Zibaldone (Leopardi), 1898
 Ziemia Ulro (Miłosz), 1977
 Ziji de yuandi (Zhou Zuoren), 1923
 Zimnie zametki o letnikh vpechatleniiakh (Dostoevskii), 1863
 Zmysły-zmysły (Boy-Żeleński), 1932
 Zniewolony umysł (Miłosz), 1953
 Zukunft einer Illusion (Freud), 1927
 Zum ewigen Frieden (Kant), 1795
 Zur Beurteilung ihrer Rechtmässigkeit (Fichte), 1793

Zur Genealogie der Moral (Nietzsche), 1887

Zur Kritik der Gewalt (Benjamin), 1965

Zur Philosophie der Kunst (Simmel), 1922

Zur Sache des Denkens (Heidegger), 1969

Zur Seinsfrage (Heidegger), 1956

Zurückforderung der Denkfreiheit von den Fürsten Europas (Fichte), 1793

Zusammenhänge (Dürrenmatt), 1976

Żywi i umarli (Herling-Grudziński), 1945

GENERAL INDEX

Page numbers in bold indicate subjects with their own entries.

- Abbey, Edward, 22, 88
Abbt, Thomas, 329
Achebe, Chinua, 1–2, 351, 601, 791
Ackerman, Diane, 755
Acton, John (Lord Acton), 694
Adam, Graeme Mercer, 886
Adamovich, Georgii, 723
Adams, Alice, 598
Adams, Franklin P., 19, 412, 597
Adams, John, 14
Adams, Matthew, 14
Addison, Joseph, 2–4, 7, 14, 15, 23, 104, 111, 168, 169, 194, 203, 206, 211, 216, 258, 268, 274, 283, 297, 325, 345, 348, 411, 420, 453, 458, 461, 465, 483, 488, 489, 532, 576, 578, 584, 608, 650, 652, 653, 656, 665, 679, 685, 701, 743, 804–07, 810, 830, 835, 848, 906
Adorno, Theodor W., 4–7, 9, 25, 79, 205, 220, 255, 263, 325, 328, 333, 334, 441, 488, 490, 656, 657, 734, 778, 779, 901
The Adventurer, 2, 7–8, 216, 419, 434, 650, 654
Ælfric, 760
Agassiz, Louis, 755
Agee, James, 8–9, 848
Aichinger, Gerhard, 595
Ailly, Nicolas d', 545, 646
Ainsa, Fernando, 198
Ainsworth, William Harrison, 836
Aitmatov, Chingiz, 814
Akenside, Mark, 414
Akerman, Chantal, 264
Akhmatova, Anna, 114, 341, 423, 723, 775
Akins, Zoë, 553
Aksenov, Vasilii, 723
Akutagawa Ryūnosuke, 430
Die Akzente, 9–10
Alain, 10–12, 76, 302, 303, 544, 888
Alas, Leopoldo, 796
Alberdi, Juan Bautista, 799, 917
Alberti, Rafael, 702, 915
Albizu Campos, Pedro, 350
Alcott, Amos Bronson, 17, 489

- Aldanov, Mark, 723
 Alden, Henry Mills, 375, 406
 Aldington, Richard, 845
 Aldrich, Thomas Bailey, 37
 Alecsandri, Vasile, 138, 612
 Aleichem, Sholem, 628
 Aleixandre, Vicente, 702, 915
 Alembert, Jean le Rond d', 393
 Alezhkovskii, Iuzh, 723
 Alfonso the Learned, king, 793
 Ali, Muhammad, 519
 Allard-Lacerte, Rolande, 149
 Allen, Frederick L., 376
 Allen, Woody, 413
 Allende, Isabel, 868
 Almqvist, Carl Jonas Love, 746
 Alonso, Dámaso, 702
 Altenberg, Peter, 273
 Althusius, Johannes, 712
 Álvarez, Augustín, 800
 Amano Sadakage, 429
 Amar y Borbón, Josefa, 12–13, 793
The American Scholar, 23–24, 232, 454, 868
 Amery, Jean, 328
 Amiel, Henri-Frédéric, 98, 837
 Amis, Martin, 275
 Ammirato, Scipione, 876
The Anatomy of Melancholy, 24–25, 90, 104
 Andersch, Alfred, 25–26, 83, 333
 Anderson, Don, 41
 Anderson, John, 40
 Anderson, Sherwood, 598, 632, 702
 Andrewes, Lancelot, 249, 691, 760
 Angell, Katherine Sergeant, 893
 Angenot, Marc, 150
 Annenskii, Innokentii, 341
 Anninskii, Lev, 723
 Antonioni, Michelangelo, 814
 Antunes, Manuel, 669, 670
 aphorism, 25, 26–27, 35, 38, 50, 58, 100, 103, 127, 129, 138, 167, 169, 180, 187, 246, 270, 273, 279, 430, 441, 446, 449, 457, 467, 545, 552, 558, 580, 587, 603, 618, 633, 646, 658, 714, 749, 775, 816, 844, 857, 865
 Apollinaire, Guillaume, 100
 Apostles, biblical, as authors, 89
 apothegm, 26, 27–28, 139
 Aquin, Hubert, 149, 484
 Aquinas, Thomas, 76, 206, 712, 769
 Aragon, Louis, 191, 606

- Aranguren, José Luis, 796
 Araquistáin, Luis, 780
 Arcand, Bernard, 149
 Archambault, Gilles, 149
 Archer, William, 766
 Arciniegas, Germán, 28–30, 439, 803
 Arconati, Costanza, 316
 Arendt, Hannah, 23, 30–32, 389, 638
Areopagitica, 32–33, 209, 561, 634, 678, 691
 Arguedas, Alcides, 800, 802
 Ariosto, Ludovico, 140
 Aristophanes, 422, 678, 741
 Aristotle, 168, 185, 193, 205, 210, 268, 334, 488, 500, 548, 616, 663, 673, 760, 832
 Arland, Marcel, 606
 Armstrong, Neil, 696
 Arnauld, Antoine, 639
 Arnim, Bettina von, 330
 Arnold, Matthew, 33–35, 108, 115, 166, 194, 250, 267, 367, 415, 425, 467, 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 511, 559, 561, 576, 580, 684, 688, 695, 729, 761, 777, 807, 854, 887, 900
 Aron, Raymond, 76, 739
 Arroyal, León, 465
 Artaud, Antonin, 452
 Arteaga, Esteban de, 794
 Asselin, Olivar, 148
 Astete, Gaspar, 793
 Astruc, Alexandre, 262
 Asturias, Miguel Ángel, 155
Athenäum, 35–36, 194, 607, 657, 700, 750, 834
 Atkins, J.B., 808
The Atlantic Monthly, 17, 36–37, 51, 110, 111, 214, 224, 230, 288, 425, 454, 492, 503, 553, 577, 581, 652, 655, 697, 755, 840, 859, 899, 906
 Atterbom, P.D.A., 745, 746
 Atterbury, Francis, 271
 Atwood, Margaret, 147
 Aub, Max, 702
 Aubrey, John, 90, 820, 862
 Auden, W.H., 37–39, 110, 113, 114, 133, 191, 285, 288
 Audubon, John James, 16, 734
 Augustine, St., 164, 189–90, 226, 690, 760, 846, 850, 888
 Aurélio, Diogo Pires, 670
 Aurelius, Marcus, 190, 550, 551–52
 Austen, Jane, 72, 482, 697
 Austin, Mary, 593
 autobiographical essay, 41–43, 87, 124, 655
 Averintsev, Sergei, 423
 Ayala, Francisco, 43–45, 702, 797
 Azaña, Manuel, 45–47, 781, 796
 Aznar, Manuel, 780, 781

Azorín, 47–48, 260, 439, 516, 529, 618, 796

Babel', Isaac, 389, 404

Bach, Johann Sebastian, 471

Bachelard, Gaston, 76

Bachmann, C. F., 278

Bachmann, Ingeborg, 333, 374

Bacon, Francis (1561–1626), 24, 26, 28, 49–51, 70, 89, 103, 127, 166, 169, 183, 184, 192, 205, 206, 211, 215, 220, 245, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 269, 295, 323, 344, 395, 397, 411, 421, 433, 477, 488, 511, 545, 563, 573, 576, 577, 591, 648, 656, 657, 668, 669, 685, 742, 745, 754, 759, 843, 852, 880

Bacon, Francis (1909–92), 191

Baez, Joan, 222

Baeza, Ricardo, 780

Bagaría, Luis, 780

Bagehot, Walter, 242, 694, 807

Bagriana, Elisaveta, 124

Bahr, Hermann, 333

Baillargeon, Pierre, 148, 149

Baillie, Joanna, 559

Bainville, Jacques, 544

Baker, Russell, 849

Bakhtin, Mikhail, 229, 423, 452

Bakunin, Mikhail, 408

Baldwin, James, 21, 51–54, 577, 598, 638, 656, 744, 853

Balmes, Jaime, 795

Balzac, Honoré, 6, 182, 200, 280, 425, 438, 500, 659, 829, 903

Balzac, Jean-Louis Guez de, 54–55, 296

Bamberger, Ludwig, 331

Bamm, Peter, 333

Ban Kōkei, 755

Banville, Théodore de, 520

Baquero, Eduardo Gómez de, 780

Barańczak, Stanisław, 55–57, 668

Barbeau, Victor, 148

Barbin, Claude, 462

Barbusse, Henri, 814, 890

Baretti, Giuseppe, 806

Barnett, Ferdinand L., 230

Barney, Natalie Clifford, 356

Baroja, Pío, 260, 439, 516, 529, 793, 796

Barrento, João, 670

Barrera, Gabino, 799

Barrés, Maurice, 77, 304, 543, 544, 694

Barron, Oswald, 412

Barry, Dave, 275, 421

Barth, John, 21, 479

Barth, Karl, 753, 761

- Barthelme, Donald, 868
 Barthes, Roland, 10, 39, 57–59, 297, 302, 303, 488, 658, 659, 778, 779
 Bartol, Cyrus, 489
 Barton, George Barton, 39
 Barton, Ralph, 597
 Bartram, William, 16
 Barzun, Jacques, 23
 Bashō, 429
 Bataille, Georges, 59–61, 304, 778
 Bathurst, Richard, 7
 Batiushkov, Evgenii, 719
 Batiushkov, Konstantin N., 719
 Baudelaire, Charles, 59, 61–62, 79, 98, 100, 134, 191, 234, 255, 299, 301, 334, 356, 520, 669
 Baum, L.Frank, 741
 Bautista Picornell, Juan, 465
 Bayle, Pierre, 62–64, 90, 254, 258, 287, 298, 323, 325, 393, 397, 476, 699, 880
 Baynton, Barbara, 631
 Bazin, René, 704
 Beard, Charles A., 393
 Beaufret, Jean, 382
 Beaulieu, Paul, 470
 Beaulieu, Victor-Lévy, 150
 Beaumarchais, 609
 Beauvoir, Simone de, 64–65, 86, 160, 165, 304, 739
 Becher, J.R., 890
 Beck, Warren, 892
 Beckett, Samuel, 5, 181, 452, 598, 862
 Beckford, William, 96
 Beddoes, Thomas Lovell, 187
 Bede, 89, 760
 Beecher, Lyman, 900
 Beerbohm, Max, 65–67, 110, 274, 275, 412, 656, 820, 862, 902
 Beethoven, Ludwig van, 471
 Béguin, Albert, 233
 Behrman, S.N., 598
 Belinskii, Vissarion, 67–68, 171, 228, 341, 720, 789, 790, 858
 Belleau, André, 68–70, 149, 150, 470, 484, 625
 Bello, Andrés, 70–71, 383, 521, 573, 659, 798, 917
 Belloc, Hilaire, 71–73, 110, 175, 274, 412, 577, 692
 Bellow, Saul, 23, 479, 627, 638, 868
 Belyi, Andrei, 73–74, 92, 422, 771, 782, 783, 856
 Bembo, Pietro, 876
 Benchley, Robert, 19, 20, 74–76, 412, 486, 597, 598, 647, 842, 893
 Benda, Julien, 76–78, 302, 404, 544, 665
 Bender, Hans, 9, 10
 Benedetti, Mario, 803
 Bengtsson, Frans G., 78, 746
 Benjamin, Walter, 6, 10, 42, 78–80, 83, 207, 332, 333, 334, 441, 480, 657, 785

- Benn, Gottfried, 80–83, 255, 333, 334, 890
 Bennett, William J., 491
 Bense, Max, 5, 6, 25, 83–84, 322, 333
 Benson, A.C., 84–85
 Benson, Sally, 598
 Bentham, Jeremy, 70, 258, 492, 560, 561, 716
 Berdiaev, Nikolai, 229, 423, 722, 769, 813
 Berenson, Bernard, 233
 Berger, Meyer, 485
 Bergman, Bernard A., 597
 Bergson, Henri, 77, 154, 165, 233, 234, 500, 503, 544, 583, 644, 669, 688, 873, 915
 Berkeley, George, 96, 261
 Bernanos, Georges, 85–87, 304, 471, 544
 Bernard of Clairvaux, 759
 Bernard, Jeffrey, 808
 Bernardes, Manuel, 668
 Bernhard, Thomas, 9, 375
 Bernhardt, Sarah, 721
 Bernstein, Eduard, 890
 Bernstein, Jeremy, 755
 Berry, Wendell, 87–89, 577, 692, 734
 Bersianik, Louky, 149
 Bertaux, Felix, 525
 Bertram, Ernst, 333
 Bertuch, Friedrich Justin, 327, 835
 Bestuzyhev-Marlinskii, Aleksandr, 719
 Betjeman, John, 191
 Betterton, Thomas, 831
 Białoszewski, Miron, 56
 Bianco, José, 521, 823
 Bierce, Ambrose, 632
 Biermann, Wolf, 901
 Bilbao, Francisco, 799 biography and the essay, 89–91
 Biondo, Flavio, 393
 Birch, Thomas, 90
 Bird, Isabella, 852
 Birnie, Richard, 39
 Birrell, Augustine, 274
 Bissonnette, Lise, 149
 Bitmoski, Hartmut, 264
 Blackwood, John, 91
 Blackwood, William, 91, 654, 807
Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine, 91–92, 107, 194, 212, 248, 613, 654
 Blain, Maurice, 149
 Blair, Hugh, 2
 Blake, William, 59, 121, 312, 557, 559, 563, 862, 911
 Blake, William Hume, 144, 511

- Blanc, Louis, 171
 Blanchot, Maurice, 181, 191, 304, 305
 Blanco Fombona, Rufino, 659, 801
 Blanco White, José María, 795
 Blei, Franz, 890
 Bloch, Ernst, 4, 333, 824, 890
 Blok, Aleksandr, 73, 92–94, 341, 422, 722, 723, 781, 782
 Blondel, Maurice, 76
 Bloom, Allan, 491
 Bloom, Harold, 322, 491
 Bloy, Léon, 86, 471, 813
 Blumenberg, Hans, 333
 Blunden, Edmund, 845
 Boake, Barcroft, 908
 Bobkowski, Andrzej, 667
 Boccaccio, Giovanni, 89, 380, 771
 Bode, Johann Joachim Christoph, 326
 Bodin, Jean, 832
 Bodley, Sir Thomas, 42
 Bodmer, Johann Jakob, 325, 895
 Böhl von Faber, Juan Nicolás, 795
 Boie, Heinrich Christian, 326
 Boileau, Nicolas, 203, 268, 729
 Bolingbroke, Henry St. John, 1st Viscount, 269, 478
 Bolívar, Simón, 383, 798, 917
 Böll, Heinrich, 333
 Bombeck, Erma, 275, 412
 Bonaventure, St., 759
 Bonhoeffer, Dietrich, 56
 Bonner, Elena, 868
 Böök, Frederik, 746
 Borchardt, Rudolf, 94–96, 332, 333, 753
 Borduas, Paul-Émile, 148, 484, 855, 872
 Borges, Jorge Luis, 96–97, 204, 330, 364, 540, 702, 705, 725, 823
 Borghini, Vincenzo, 876
 Bosch Gimpera, Pedro, 198
 Boswell, James, 72, 348, 437, 505, 634, 685, 686, 852
 Botev, Khristo, 534, 776
 Bouchard, Serge, 149
 Bouhours, Dominique, 325
 Bouquet, Joseph, 685
 Bourdeille, Pierre de, 89
 Bourget, Paul, 97–99, 118, 301, 695, 703, 704, 745
 Bourne, Randolph, 19, 491, 492, 583
 Bouthillette, Jean, 149, 470, 471
 Bowen, Elizabeth, 42, 191
 Boyce, Benjamin, 167
 Boyd, Martin, 363

- Boyle, Harry, 145
 Boy-Želeński, 99–100, 666
 Brackett, Peg, 412
 Bradford, William, 576
 Bradley, Bill, 513
 Brandes, Georg, 744, 746
 Brasillach, Robert, 544
 Brault, Jacques, 100–01, 148, 149, 484
 Brautigan, Richard, 10
 Brecht, Bertolt, 10, 57, 236, 255, 311, 333, 452, 679, 862
 Breitinger, Johann Jakob, 325
 Breitnall, Joseph, 14, 15
 Brennan, C.J., 40, 908
 Brereton, John le Gay, 40
 Breslin, Jimmy, 595, 903
 Breton, André, 59, 606
 Breton, Nicholas, 104, 323
 Březina, Otokar, 101–03
 Bridger, Jim, 412
 Brik, Osip, 770
 Brillat-Savarin, Jean-Anthelme, 658–59
 Brisson, Marcelle, 149
 Briusov, Valerii, 722, 856
 Broch, Hermann, 152, 333, 334, 787
 Brochu, André, 149
 Brockes, Barthold Hinrich, 326
 Brod, Max, 890
 Brodkey, Harold, 334
 Brodsky, Joseph, 56, 113–15, 723, 857
 Brogden, Joshua, 284
 Brontë, Charlotte, 683
 Brontë, Emily, 59, 611
 Brook, Peter, 452
 Brooke, Rupert, 577
 Brooks, Charles, 18
 Brooks, Louise, 862
 Brooks, Mel, 862
 Brooks, Van Wyck, 19, 489, 491, 492, 583
 Brossard, Nicole, 149
 Brougham, Henry, 242, 654, 683
 Broun, Heywood, 19, 412, 577, 647
 Brower, David, 514
 Brown, Charles Brockden, 316, 411, 654
 Brown, E.K., 115–16, 146
 Brown, John Mason, 275
 Brown, Tina, 598
 Browne, Sir Thomas, 24, 96, 104, 105, 116–18, 184, 245, 399, 459, 570, 576, 641, 691, 817
 Browning, Elizabeth Barrett, 539, 559

- Browning, Robert, 234, 547, 671
 Bruce, Harry, 147
 Brunetière, Ferdinand, 77, 118–19, 301, 703, 837
 Bruni, Leonardo, 393
 Bruno, Giordano, 640, 678
 Brunschvicg, Léon, 76
 Bryan, William Jennings, 553
 Brzozowski, Stanisław, 119–20, 563, 666, 668
 Buber, Martin, 423, 824, 890
 Buchan, John, 91
 Büchner, Georg, 152, 366, 901
 Buckley, Vincent, 41, 121–22
 Buckley, William F. Jr., 222
 Budé, Guillaume, 545
 Budgell, Eustace, 805
 Buechner, Frederick, 692
 Buffon, Georges, 206, 219, 355, 687
 Buies, Arthur, 122–23, 148
 Bukharin, Nikolai, 723
 Bulgakov, Mikhail, 389
 Bulgakov, Sergei, 722
 Bullrich, Silvina, 803
 Buloz, François, 703
 Bulwer Lytton, Edward, 836
 Bunge, Carlos Octavio, 800
 Bunyan, John, 72, 829
 Burckhardt, Carl, 311
 Burckhardt, Jacob Christoph, 81, 125–27, 201, 331, 333, 688
 Burke, Edmund, 23, 127–29, 187, 348, 479, 615, 629, 630, 678, 687, 862, 904
 Burke, Kenneth, 129–30
 Burkert, Walter, 393
 Burnet, Gilbert, 167
 Burns, Robert, 156, 157, 741, 818
 Burroughs, Edgar Rice, 879
 Burroughs, John, 17, 130–32, 245, 593
 Burton, Sir Richard, 852
 Burton, Robert, 24–25, 90, 103, 184, 245, 459
 Butler, Hubert, 112, 132–34
 Butler, Joseph, 817
 Butler, Nicholas Murray, 553
 Butler, Samuel (1612–80), 167, 169, 444
 Butler, Samuel (1835–1902), 304
 Butor, Michel, 134–135, 304, 305
 Byles, Mather, 14
 Byron, Lord (George Gordon), 316, 367, 413, 422, 546, 547, 551
 Byron, Robert, 853

- Caballero Calderón, Eduardo, 803
 Cabarrús, Francisco, 794
 Cadalso, José, 137–38, 794
 Cahill, Tim, 853
 Caillois, Roger, 59
 Calderón de la Barca, Pedro, 200, 515, 705, 916
 Caligula, 758
 Călinescu, George, 138–39
 Callas, Maria, 814
 Calvin, John, 678, 759, 794
 Calvino, Italo, 139–41
 Camba, Julio, 796
 Cambridge, Richard Owen, 650
 Camden, William, 167
 Camões, Luís de, 496
 Campbell, Ross, 40
 Campo Alange, Countess of, 165
 Camus, Albert, 42, 64, 141–43, 164, 191, 277, 302, 304, 305, 389, 439, 448, 485, 612, 692, 888
 Canal Feijóo, Bernardo, 521, 823
 Canalejas, Francisco, 795
 Canby, Henry Seidel, 19, 20
 Cândido, Antônio, 150–51
 Canetti, Elias, 151–53, 333, 334
 Čapek, Josef, 377
 Čapek, Karel, 153–54, 377, 871
 Capmany, Antonio de, 794
 Capote, Truman, 21, 376, 595, 596, 598
 Capra, Frank, 364
 Caragiale, Mateiu, 814
 Caravaggio, 389
 Carballo, Emmanuel, 314
 Cardoza y Aragón, Luis, 155–56, 802
 Carducci, Giosuè, 572
 Carême, Marie-Antonin, 659
 Carey, Mathew, 654
 Carleson, Carl, 203, 745
 Carleson, Edvard, 203, 745
 Carlyle, Jane, 906
 Carlyle, Thomas, 90, 107, 108, 156–58, 166, 194, 216, 232, 234, 242, 247, 267, 301, 331, 467, 490, 512, 546, 561, 573, 576, 691, 716, 746, 757, 777, 778, 817, 839, 840
 Carman, Bliss, 144, 158–59
 Caro, Annibal, 876
 Carr, Emily, 143
 Carrera Andrade, Jorge, 803
 Carriego, Evaristo, 95
 Carrión, Jorge, 802
 Carroll, Lewis, 741
 Carson, Johnny, 862

- Carson, Rachel, 22, 593, 598
 Cartagena, Alonso de, 794
 Carter, Elizabeth, 765
 Carvalho, Joaquim de, 669
 Casal, Julián J., 801
 Casares, Adolfo Bioy, 823
 Casaubon, Isaac, 169
 Casgrain, Henri Raymond, 148
 Caso, Alfonso, 198
 Caso, Antonio, 801
 Cassirer, Paul, 890
 Castelar, Emilio, 795
 Castellanos, Rosario, 159–61, 804
 Castiglione, Baldassare, 357, 446
 Castro, Américo, 161–63, 702, 780, 794, 795, 796
 Cather, Willa, 251
 Catherine of Siena, St., 690
 Catherine the Great, 718
 Cattaneo, Carlo, 163–64
 Caudwell, Christopher, 689
 Cavafy, C. P., 113, 114, 670
 Cave, Edward, 489, 650, 651, 653, 654, 655, 685
 Cavendish, George, 89
 Cavendish, Lady Margaret, 216
 Cela y Trullock, Camilo José
 Céline, Louis-Ferdinand, 665
 Cellini, Benvenuto, 432
 Centlivre, Susannah, 831
 Cerf, Bennett, 647
 Cernuda, Luis, 702, 915
 Cervantes, Miguel de, 161, 165, 166, 515, 619, 720, 771, 792, 814, 850
 Chaadaev, Petr, 336, 719
 Chacel, Rosa, 164–66, 702, 797, 915
 Chambers, Ephraim, 254, 255, 650
 Chambers, Robert, 213
 Chamfort, S.R.N., 26, 749
 Channing, William Ellery, 489
 Chaplin, Charlie, 771
 Chapman, John, 248, 539
 chapter, 166–67, 296, 457, 462, 482, 486, 507, 545, 641, 788, 829, 856
 Char, René, 100, 301
 Charbonneau, Robert, 470 character sketch, 103, 167–68, 169, 173, 203, 419, 576, 650, 652, 821
Characters, 167, 168–69, 296, 457, 576, 652
 Charles XII (of Sweden), 78
 Charlevoix, Pierre François Xavier, 147
 Charron, Pierre, 295
 Chateaubriand, 57, 170–71, 300, 301, 551, 640, 681, 713

- Chatwin, Bruce, 853
 Chaucer, Geoffrey, 379, 760, 829
 Checkley, John, 14
 Cheever, John, 598, 627
 Chekhov, Anton, 119, 721, 769, 771
 Chernyshevskii, Nikolai, 171–72, 229, 391, 714, 721, 789, 790
 Chesterfield, Earl of, 105, 172–74, 216, 411, 479, 650
 Chesterton, G.K., 37, 42, 72, 96, 106, 110, 174–76, 274, 364, 412, 481, 559, 576, 692, 813, 814, 820
 Chevalier, Michel, 438
 Child, Julia, 286
 Chinweizu, I, 791
 Chisholm, A.H., 40
 Chisholm, A.R., 41
 Chomsky, Noam, 488, 679
 Christine de Pizan, 166
 Chuang Tzu, 897
 Chulkov, Georgii, 722
 Churchill, Charles, 364
 Cibber, Colley, 283, 284
 Cicero, 24, 55, 89, 137, 172, 179–80, 190, 257, 272, 397, 478, 488, 569, 573, 661, 743, 753, 758, 760, 831, 896
 Cioran, E.M., 100, 139, 180–82, 302, 374, 785, 813
 Clarendon, Earl of (Edward Hyde), 167
 Clark, Greg, 145
 Clark, Walter Van Tilburg, 812
 Clarke, Marcus, 39, 182–83
 Clarkson, Thomas, 187 classical influences, 183–86
 Claudel, Paul, 233, 544
 Claudius, 758
 Cleaver, Eldridge, 21
 Clerc, Jean de, 397
 Clift, Charmian, 41
 Clinton, Hillary, 599
 Clutton-Brock, Arthur, 845
 Coates, Robert M., 598
 Cobbe, Francis Power, 807
 Cobbett, William, 503, 635, 654, 767
 Cocteau, Jean, 304, 544, 702
 Cofer, Judith Ortiz, 21
 Coimbra, Leonardo, 669
 Colby, Frank Moore, 19
 Cole, K.C., 755
 Coleridge, Samuel Taylor, 91, 96, 106, 129, 186–88, 213, 216, 245, 316, 379, 414, 459, 473, 489, 490, 500, 547, 548, 561, 689, 691, 699, 749, 788, 904
 Coleridge, Sara, 548
 Collins, Churton, 684

- Collins, William, 414
 Collodi, Carlo, 741
 Collum, Mary, 631
 Colman, George, the Elder, 411, 650
 Columbus, Christopher, 710, 852
 Colvert, James, 322
 Comenius, 184
 Comer, Cornelia, 37
 Commines, Philippe de, 168
 Commoner, Barry, 271
The Compleat Angler, 188–89
 Comte, Auguste, 799
 Condorcet, Marquis de, 90, 271
The Confessions, 164, 189–90, 226, 690, 846, 888
 Confucius, 152
 Congreve, William, 454
 Connelly, Marc, 597
 Connolly, Cyril, 111, 190–92, 288, 728, 868
 Conrad, Joseph, 1, 78, 91, 338, 389, 552, 577, 673, 702, 906
 Constable, John, 654
 Constant, Benjamin, 438
 Cook, James, 290
 Coolidge, Calvin, 553
 Cooper, James Fenimore, 681, 728, 860
 Copeau, Jacques, 605, 606
 Copernicus, Nicolas, 488, 678
 Copleston, Edward, 242
 Coppée, François, 704
 Corneille, Pierre, 287, 731, 763
 Cornish, C.J., 808
 Cornwallis, Sir William, the Younger, 104, 192–93, 576
 Correggio, 389
 Correia, Natália, 670
 Corso, Gregory, 10
 Cortázar, Julio, 803, 823
 Cosío Villegas, Daniel, 198
 Costa, Joaquín, 618
 Cotta, Johann Friedrich, 329
 Cotton, Charles, 188, 373
 Coulanges, Christophe de, 763
 Courbet, Gustave, 62
 Courier, Paul-Louis, 300
 Courtenay, Baudouin de, 770
 Courthope, W.J., 684
 Cousin, Victor, 693, 703, 837
 Cowley, Abraham, 42, 104, 245, 576
 Cowley, Malcolm, 322
 Cowper, William, 559

- Cramer, J.A., 744
 Crane, Stephen, 158, 407, 696, 848
 Cranmer, Thomas, 691
 Crémazie, Octave, 148
 Crèvecoeur, J.Hector St. John de, 16, 479
 Cristóvão, Fernando, 670 critical essay, 42, 107, 124, 193–95, 302, 422, 444, 447, 458, 467, 488, 584, 653, 718, 729, 778, 813, 820, 837, 845, 857
 Croce, Benedetto, 195–98, 359, 702
 Crockett, Davy, 412
 Croker, John Wilson, 683
 Croll, R.H., 40
 Cromer, Evelyn, 808
 Cronin, Bernard, 40
 Crook, Arthur, 845
 Crose, Jean de la, 652, 654, 655
 Crothers, Samuel McChord, 274
Cuadernos Americanos, 155, 198–99, 917
 Cueva, Mario de la, 198
 Cunha, Euclides da, 199–200, 309
 Curie, Marie, 165
 Curtis, George William, 18
 Curtius, Ernst Robert, 200–02, 233, 333, 423, 702
- Dahl, Roald, 376
 Dahlman, Friedrich Christoph, 686
 Dalchev, Atanas, 123
 Dale, Antonius van, 287
 Dalí, Salvador, 623
 Dalin, Olof von, 203–04, 743, 745
 Dana, Richard Henry, 398
 Danforth, Samuel, 691
 D'Annunzio, Gabriele, 77, 332, 395, 572
 Dante, 196, 200, 249, 367, 422, 448, 505, 524, 546, 667, 677, 678, 722, 723, 759
 Dantin, Louis, 148
 Darío, Rubén, 29, 204–05, 659, 710, 801
 Darrow, Clarence, 417
 Darwin, Charles, 90, 109, 118, 131, 205–08, 245, 271, 301, 308, 355, 393, 439, 475, 478, 489, 593, 635, 684, 752, 816, 866
 Darwin, Erasmus, 206, 478
 Daudet, Alphonse, 425, 814
 Daudet, Léon, 665
 Davidson, Emily, 891
 Davidson, William Wallace, 322
 Davies, Robertson, 143, 145, 208–09, 469
 Davis, Angela, 21
 Day, Clarence, 598
 Day, Thomas, 676

- Day Lewis, C., 191
 Dazai Osamu, 430
 Deacon, William Arthur, 146
The Defence of Poesy, 193, 209–10, 768
 Defoe, Daniel, 104, 210–12, 272, 436, 439, 489, 596, 650, 652, 653, 655, 700, 741, 742, 810, 835, 848, 852, 906
 de Gaulle, Charles, 86
 Dehmel, Richard, 594
 Dekker, Thomas, 169, 411, 634
 Delacroix, Eugène, 61 de la Mare, Walter, 37
 Delaney, Martin, 493
 Delsarte, François, 158
 Delvig, Baron, 719
 de Man, Paul, 322, 734
 Demosthenes, 183
 Dennie, Joseph, 15, 16, 411, 420
 Dennis, John, 193, 268
 De Quincey, Thomas, 42, 91, 96, 106, 107, 212–14, 245, 268, 331, 344, 458, 459, 489, 548, 674, 767, 907
 Derain, André, 322
 Derrida, Jacques, 305, 322, 382, 491, 673, 734
 Derzhavin, Gavriil Romanovich, 781
 De Sanctis, Francesco, 359
 Desbiens, Jean-Paul, 148
 Desbordes-Valmore, Marceline, 703
 Descartes, René, 76, 205, 206, 220, 225–27, 261, 262, 295, 334, 550, 551, 646, 657, 727, 769, 813, 873, 874
 Desjardins, Paul, 606
 DesRochers, Alfred, 148
 De Vere, Aubrey, 559
 De Voto, Bernard, 214–15, 275
 Dewey, John, 251, 427, 491, 795
 Diaghilev, Sergei, 73, 606 dialogue, 18, 89, 109, 151, 179, 215–17, 220, 233, 265, 287, 298, 433, 436, 448, 457, 507, 537, 545, 555, 561, 568, 618, 640, 646, 652, 656, 661, 663, 687, 690, 694, 698, 713, 783, 865, 875, 896, 899
 Díaz del Castillo, Bernal, 852
 Díaz de Mendoza, Carmen, 793
 Díaz-Plaja, Fernando, 797
 Díaz-Plaja, Guillermo, 797
 Díaz Rodríguez, Manuel, 659, 801
 Dickens, Charles, 6, 91, 109, 175, 182, 217–19, 364, 406, 421, 439, 469, 539, 622, 650, 673, 766, 771, 789, 813, 814, 829, 835, 899
 Dickinson, Emily, 158, 160
 Diderot, Denis, 61, 90, 100, 194, 200, 205, 219–22, 254, 258, 298, 299, 609, 653, 698, 728, 741, 765, 837
 Didion, Joan, 21, 222–24, 376, 421, 576, 595, 656, 848

- Dieckmann, Herbert, 233
 Díez de Medina, Fernando, 802
 Diktonius, Elmer, 247, 746
 Dillard, Annie, 22, 37, 224–25, 577, 594, 596, 692, 868
 Dilthey, Wilhelm, 161, 323, 367
 Dimitrova, Blaga, 124
Discourse on Method, 206, 220, 225–27, 263, 295, 550, 646
 Disraeli, Benjamin, 547, 683, 836
 Dobbs, Kildare, 143
 Döblin, Alfred, 333, 594
 Dobroliubov, Nikolai, 171, 229, 721, 790
 Dobson, Austin, 845
 Dodsley, Robert, 2
 Dōgen, 429
 Dohm, Christian Conrad Wilhelm von, 326
 Dole, Robert, 518
 Dolet, Étienne, 257, 545
 Dolmetsch, Arnold, 671
 Don Juan Manuel, 793
 Donne, John, 24, 42, 89, 104, 121, 169, 192, 215, 227–28, 250, 488, 491, 548, 652, 691, 760, 817
 Donoso, José, 42
 Donoso Cortés, Juan, 795
 Doré, Gustave, 182
 Dorfman, Ariel, 804
 Dorris, Michael, 322
 Dorst, Tancred, 9
 Dostoevskii, Fedor, 67, 86, 119, 228–30, 277, 338, 353, 389, 391, 422, 553, 563, 580, 647, 714, 721, 722, 769, 771, 781, 783, 789, 814, 815, 858, 907
 Doughty, Charles, 852
 Douglas, Lloyd, 214
 Douglass, Frederick, 20, 230–31, 316, 489, 493
 Douglass, William, 14
 Dove, Alfred, 686
 Dove, Rita, 322
 Dowden, Edward, 243
 Drabble, Margaret, 868
 Drapeau, Jean, 368
 Dreiser, Theodore, 404, 553
 Dreyfus, Alfred, 644
 Drieu la Rochelle, Pierre-Eugène, 606
 Drouin, Marcel, 605
 Drouot, Henri, 544
 Droysen, Gustav, 687
 Drumont, Édouard, 86, 665
 Druzhinin, Aleksandr, 171
 Dryden, John, 193, 211, 216, 250, 265–66, 268, 379, 380, 433, 488, 673, 897
 D'Souza, D'nesh, 491
 Du Bois, W.E.B., 20, 42, 231–33, 404, 492

- Du Bos, Charles, 233–35, 302, 422, 423, 694, 695
 Dubos, René, 23
 Dufresny, Charles Rivière, 298, 532
 Duhamel, Georges, 544, 890
 Dumas, Alexandre (père), 239, 280, 438, 659
 Dumas, Alexandre (fils), 98
 Dumont, Fernand, 148, 149
 Dumont, François, 150
 Duncan, Sara Jeannette, 144, 887
 Dunton, John, 255, 652
 Dupee, Fred, 637
 Durand, Luis, 803
 Durkheim, Emile, 773
 Dürrenmatt, Friedrich, 235–37, 311, 333
 Dutacq, Armand, 280, 438
 Duvalier, Papa Doc, 364
 Dyson, Freeman, 755
- Eadmer, 89
 Earle, John, 167, 169, 411
 Early, Gerald, 22, 376
 Eastlake, Lady, 683
 Eça de Queirós, José Maria de, 669
 Echeverría, Esteban, 798
 Eckhart (Meister), 305
 Eco, Umberto, 239–40, 868
 Edgeworth, Maria, 107, 133, 240–42, 412, 697
 Edgeworth, Richard Lovell, 239
The Edinburgh Review, 91, 107, 156, 187, 194, 242–43, 505, 539, 561, 654, 683, 700, 806, 820,
 Edman, Irwin, 23
 Edmond, James, 40
 Edschmid, Kasimir, 890
 Edwards, Jonathan, 576, 691
 Eggleston, Edward, 406
 Eglinton, John, 110, 243–44
 Ehrenburg, Il'ia, 723
 Ehrenstein, Albert, 273
 Ehrlich, Gretel, 22, 37, 593, 734
 Ehrmann, Marianne, 327
 Eichendorff, Joseph von, 6, 607
 Eidson, John Olin, 322
 Eikhenbaum, Boris, 341, 770
 Einhard, 89
 Einsiedel, Wolfgang von, 595
 Einstein, Albert, 37, 236, 308, 702, 755
 Eiseley, Loren, 22, 109, 224, 244–46, 754, 838
 Eisenstein, Sergei, 771
 Ekelund, Vilhelm, 246–47, 746

- Eliade, Mircea, 121, 181, 813, 814
 Élie, Robert, 470
 Eliot, George, 91, 109, 166, 247–49, 363, 425, 489, 539, 887
 Eliot, T.S., 20, 38, 110, 121, 174, 200, 217, 249–51, 265 301, 312, 356, 374, 386, 400, 434, 488, 489, 490, 500, 580, 583, 625, 637, 640, 670, 671, 672, 677, 688, 753, 759, 845, 868, 906, 907
 Elkin, Stanley, 21, 320, 376
 Eilis, Havelock, 214
 Ellison, Ralph, 23, 404
 Ellul, Jacques, 679
 Éluard, Paul, 191
 Emerson, Ralph Waldo, 17, 23, 36, 102, 129, 130, 232, 245, 247, 251–54, 301, 316, 321, 331, 346, 366, 367, 375, 398, 407, 421, 425, 427, 488, 489, 491, 553, 570, 576, 583, 603, 656, 657, 692, 694, 759, 778, 779, 841, 852, 897
 Emin, Fedor Aleksandrovich, 609
 Eminescu, Mihai, 138
 Émond, Ariane, 149
 Empedocles, 206, 548
 Empson, William, 250
 Enckell, Olof, 247
 Enckell, Rabbe, 746 encyclopedias and the essay, 254–55
 Enes, José, 670
 Engel, Johann Jakob, 324, 326
 Engels, Friedrich, 331, 542
 Enzensberger, Hans Magnus, 10, 255–56, 333, 334, 374
 Ephron, Nora, 275, 412
 Epictetus, 325, 551, 552, 640
 Epicurus, 478
 Epstein, Joseph, 23
 Erasmus, Desiderius, 161, 183, 184, 185, 226, 256–59, 295, 478, 488, 545, 678, 742, 759
 Erdmann, Johann Eduard, 278
 Erikson, Erik, 23
 Erofeev, Venedikt, 714
 Erofeev, Viktor, 723
 Erro, Carlos Alberto, 803, 823
 Erskine, John, 23
El Espectador, 259–60, 702
An Essay Concerning Human Understanding, 90, 104, 216, 260–62, 433 essay film, 262–65
An Essay of Dramatic Poesy, 193, 216, 265–66, 268, 433
An Essay on Comedy, 266–67
An Essay on Criticism, 267–69, 433, 616
An Essay on Man, 207, 269–70, 433, 478, 616
An Essay on the Principle of Population, 270–71
 Estang, Luc, 10
 Estienne, Henri, 657
 Estoile, Pierre de L', 295
 Éthier-Blais, Jean, 149

- Euripides, 741
 Eusebius, 392
 Evelyn, John, 364, 437
 Evtushenko, Evgenii, 868
The Examiner, 105, 242, 271–72, 683, 825
 Export, Valie, 264
 Eyre, Hal, 40
- Die Fackel*, 273–74, 280
 Fadiman, Clifton, 598
 Faguet, Émile, 695, 837
 Faithful, Emily, 807
 Falster, Christian, 743 familiar essay, 16, 33, 106, 143, 193, 274–75, 314, 453, 458, 480, 498, 509–537, 566, 612, 655, 673, 728, 745, 788, 835, 854, 893, 906
 Fanon, Frantz, 149, 601
 Farocki, Harun, 264
 Farquhar, George, 831
 Farrell, James T., 519
 Faulkner, William, 214, 376, 566, 632, 637, 702
 Feijóo y Montenegro, Benito Jerónimo, 275–77, 793, 849, 850
 Felltham, Owen, 576
 Fenollosa, Ernest, 671, 672
 Fenton, James, 848
 Ferguson, Adam, 326, 329
 Ferguson, Samuel, 911
 Fermor, Patrick Leigh, 853
 Fern, Fanny, 849
 Fernández de Lizardi, José Joaquín, 798
 Fernández de Moratín, Leandro, 794
 Fernández Retamar, Roberto, 198, 803
 Fernández y González, Francisco, 795
 Ferrater Mora, José, 796
 Ferré, Rosio, 804
 Ferreira, Vergílio, 277–78, 669, 670
 Ferrers, George, 89
 Ferrier, J.E., 213
 Ferron, Jacques, 148, 149, 470
 Fet, Afanasii, 783
 Feuerbach, Ludwig, 171, 248, 278–79
 Feugère, Baston, 257
feuilleton, 92, 153, 170, 228, 255, 279–81, 527, 703, 771, 815, 856, 871
 Fichte, Johann Gottlieb, 76, 281–83, 329, 330, 607
 Fiedler, Leslie A., 21, 638
 Field, Eugene, 19
 Field, Michael, 286
 Fielding, Henry, 105, 166, 283–85, 364, 411, 650, 676, 771, 852
 Fields, James T., 36

- Fields, W.C, 364
 Figner, N.N., 721
 Filimon, Nicolae, 612
 Filmer, Robert, 832
 Finch, Robert, 734
 Fink, Mike, 412
 Finn, Edmund, 39
 Finnbogason, Guðmundur, 746
 Fischer, Bram, 352
 Fischer, Gottfried Bermann, 594
 Fischer, John, 376
 Fischer, Samuel, 594
 Fisher, John, 244, 851
 Fisher, M.F.K., 132, 285–86, 659
 Fiske, Nathan, 15
 Fitzgerald, F.Scott, 20, 42, 223, 251, 470, 471, 553, 598, 647, 879
 FitzGerald, R.D., 908
 Fitzgerald, Robert, 9
 Fitzgerald, Sally, 322
 Flake, Otto, 890
 Flaubert, Gustave, 98, 129, 280, 341, 499, 525, 641, 642, 837
 Fleischmann, Raoul, 597
 Fleming, Peter, 853
 Florovsky, Georges, 723
 Fontaine, Nicolas, 640
 Fontane, Theodor, 331
 Fontenelle, Bernard de, 286–88, 298, 326, 398, 729
 Fonvizin, Denis, 609, 718
 Ford, Ford Madox, 364, 671, 679
 Forner, Juan Pablo, 794
 Forrest, Nathan Bedford, 78
 Forsberg, F.K., 281
 Forster, E.M., 43, 111, 288–90, 376, 576, 669, 679
 Forster, Georg, 290–92, 325, 327, 330, 387, 894
 Foscolo, Ugo, 473, 546, 547
 Foucault, Michel, 278, 305, 328, 467, 493, 813
 Fouquet, Nicolas, 763
 Fourier, Charles, 171
 Fournier, Jules, 148
 Fowler, Frank, 39
 Foxe, John, 89
 França, José Augusto, 670
 France, Anatole, 525, 544, 695, 704
 Francovich, Guillermo, 802
 Frank, Leonhard, 890
 Frank, Semion, 229, 391, 722
 Frank, Waldo, 198, 491, 583, 823
 Franklin, Benjamin, 14, 15, 49, 148, 292–93, 420, 576, 653, 654, 799, 806, 849

- Franklin, James, 14, 576
 Franklin, Miles, 631
 Frazer, J.G., 191
 Fredro, Aleksandr, 815
 Frege, Gottlob, 843
 Freire, Paulo, 293–94
 Freneau, Philip, 15, 420
 Fréron, Elie-Catherine, 298
 Freud, Sigmund, 5, 11, 38, 90, 164, 165, 191, 207, 307–09, 323, 331, 333, 355, 449, 467, 488, 490, 528, 548, 689, 748, 751, 755, 855, 900, 915
 Freyre, Gilberto, 309–10, 496
 Freytag, Gustav, 365
 Frisch, Max, 310–12, 333, 334, 901
 Frisi, Paolo, 328, 387
 Fromentin, Eugène, 837
 Frost, Robert, 113, 114, 251
 Frye, Northrop, 146, 312–13
 Fuentes, Carlos, 314–15, 384, 710, 802
 Fukuzawa Yukichi, 430
 Fulford, Robert, 146
 Fuller, Margaret, 17, 248, 316–17, 331, 489, 512
 Fuller, Thomas, 411, 459
 Fullerton, Mary, 40
 Furphy, Joseph, 632
- Gagnon, Ernest, 148, 149
 Gagnon, Lysiane, 149
 Gagnon, Madeleine, 149
 Gaines, Ernest J., 322
 Galbraith, John Kenneth, 23
 Galeano, Eduardo, 803
 Galen, 548
 Galiano, Antonio Alcal, 795
 Galileo, 206, 225, 488, 619, 651, 678
 Gallegos, Rómulo, 660
 Gallimard, Gaston, 86
 Galsworthy, John, 679, 814
 Gálvez, Manuel, 802
 Gandhi, Indira, 611
 Gandhi, Mahatma, 611, 623, 716, 823
 Ganivet, Ángel, 161, 319–20, 796
 Gaos, José, 198, 797
 Garborg, Arne, 745
 Garcia, Juan, 100
 García Calderón, Francisco, 800
 García Lorca, Federico, 496, 515, 702, 823, 915
 García Marquez, Gabriel, 439, 868
 García Moreno, Gabriel, 573, 799

- Garcilaso de la Vega, 696
 Gardner, Mr., 14
 Garneau, François Xavier, 148
 Garneau, René, 148
 Garneau, Saint-Denys, 100, 470
 Garnett, Constance, 647
 Garrison, William Lloyd, 230, 849
 Garve, Christian, 324, 325, 329
 Gass, William H., 21, 320–21
 Gassendi, Pierre, 730
 Gataker, Thomas, 551
 Gates, Henry Louis Jr., 22, 322
 Gaudier-Brzeska, Henri, 671
 Gautier, Théophile, 61, 301, 520, 897
 Gauvin, Lise, 150
 Gay, Peter, 23
 Geddes, Patrick, 492, 583
 Geer, Louis Gerhard de, 745
 Geertz, Clifford, 23
 Geijerstam, Gustav af, 746
 Gellert, C.F., 325
 Genet, Jean, 59
 Gentile, Giovanni, 195
 Geoffrey, Abbé, 280
 George, Sergiu Al., 813
 George, Stefan, 6, 95, 200, 246, 332, 395, 525
The Georgia Review, 322, 495, 733
 Gerould, Katharine Fullerton, 20, 412
 Gershenzon, Mikhail, 336–37, 422, 722, 723
 Gerstenberg, Heinrich Wilhelm von, 387
 Gervinus, Georg, 367, 686, 687
 Gesner, Andreas, 551
 Ghéon, Henri, 605
 Ghica, Ion, 138, 612
 Gibbon, Edward, 168, 258, 393, 559, 560, 820
 Gide, André, 76, 129, 200, 233, 302, 304, 338–39, 436, 439, 454, 544, 605, 606, 637, 823, 873
 Gifford, William, 683
 Gildemeister, Otto, 331, 686
 Gildon, Charles, 104
 Giliarovskii, Vladimir, 339–41
 Gill, Brendan, 598
 Gilliam, Terry, 264
 Gilliatt, Penelope, 598
 Gilman, Charlotte Perkins, 407
 Gilmore, Gary, 518
 Gilmore, Mary, 40, 631
 Giménez Caballero, Ernesto, 780
 Giner de los Rfos, Francisco, 618, 795

- Gingrich, Newt, 599
 Ginsberg, Allen, 563
 Ginzburg, Lidia, 341–42, 723
 Ginzburg, Natalia, 342–43
 Gippius, Zinaida, 93, 722
 Girardin, Émile de, 280, 438
 Giraudoux, Jean, 76
 Gissing, George, 845
 Giu Youguang, 177
 Gjørwell, Carl Christoffer, 745
 Gladstone, William Ewart, 683
 Glantz, Margo, 804
 Gleim, Ludwig, 835
 Gleitzman, Morris, 40
 Gobineau, Joseph-Arthur de, 438
 Godard, Jean-Luc, 264
 Godbout, Jacques, 149, 484
 Gödel, Kurt, 814
 Godinho, Vitorino Magalhães, 669
 Godmillo, Jill, 263
 Godwin, William, 270, 343–45, 679, 904
 Goeckingk, Leopold Friedrich Günter von, 327
 Goering, Hermann Wilhelm, 891
 Goethe, Johann Wolfgang von, 5, 35, 37, 66, 107, 129, 164, 234, 247, 282, 307, 316, 327, 328, 334, 345–47, 366, 367, 374, 386, 387, 390, 422, 473, 489, 499, 525, 528, 546, 547, 551, 555, 573, 580, 619, 620, 631, 705, 747, 749, 754, 776, 777, 824, 835, 852, 873, 896
 Gogol', Nikolai, 67, 68, 171, 422, 719, 720, 771, 789, 858
 Gold, Mike, 20
 Goldsmith, Oliver, 14, 105, 111, 218, 347–49, 411, 478, 650, 699, 794
 Golescu, Dinicu, 612
 Gombrowicz, Witold, 56, 349–50, 563, 667
 Gómez Carrillo, Enrique, 801
 Gómez de la Serna, Ramón, 702, 780, 796
 Goncharov, Ivan, 228, 789
 Goncourt, Edmond, 98, 219, 437
 Goncourt, Jules, 98, 219, 437
 Góngora y Argote, Luis de, 794
 Gónicki, Łukasz, 666
 González, José Luis, 350–51
 González Prada, Francisco, 800, 802
 González Prada, Manuel, 402
 González Serrano, Urbano, 795
 Goodman, Ellen, 849
 Goodman, Paul, 638
 Gorbachev, Mikhail, 236
 Gordimer, Nadine, 42, 351–52
 Gordon, Adam Lindsay, 182, 908
 Gorgias, 183

- Gor'kii, Maksim, 51, 352–54, 389, 500, 722, 774, 775, 862
 Görres, Joseph, 330
 Gosse, Edmund, 84, 807
 Gosson, Stephen, 209, 591, 768
 Gotthelf, Jeremias, 311, 366
 Gottsched, Johann Christoph, 324, 325
 Gould, Stephen Jay, 22, 109, 354–56, 755
 Gourmont, Remy de, 129, 301, 356–57
 Goya, Francisco de, 465
 Gracián, Baltasar, 325, 357–59 752, 794
 Grahame, Kenneth, 431
 Gramsci, Antonio, 350, 359–60, 530
 Granada, Fray Luis de, 794
 Grandbois, Alain, 100
 Grandmontaigne, Francisco, 780
 Granovskii, Timofei, 720, 858
 Grass, Günter, 9, 311, 333, 360–62
 Grattan, Henry, 911
 Graves, Robert, 191
 Gray, Asa, 755
 Gray, Robert, 363
 Gray, Thomas, 348, 379, 414
 Greeley, Horace, 316, 375
 Green, Dorothy, 40, 41, 362–64
 Greenberg, Clement, 637, 689
 Greene, Graham, 42, 112, 133, 364–65, 389, 612, 853
 Greene, H.Gordon, 145
 Greene, Melissa Fay, 596
 Greene, Robert, 591
 Gregory I, the Great, pope, 558, 760
 Gregory, Isabella Augusta, Lady, 631
 Grenier, Jean, 305
Die Grenzboten, 365–66
 Griffiths, Ralph, 347, 699
 Grignon, Claude-Henri, 148
 Grigor'ev, Apollon, 721, 858
 Grillparzer, Franz, 332, 396
 Grimm, Frédéric de, 298
 Grimm, Herman, 323, 331, 366–68, 686
 Grimod de la Reynière, Alexandre-Balthazar-Laurent, 659
 Groethuysen, Bernhard, 824
 Grossman, Vasilii, 113
 Grotius, Hugo, 712
 Grotowski, Jerzy, 452
 Groulx, Lionel, 148, 368–69
 Groussac, Paul, 710
 Grove, Frederick Philip, 145
 Gryphius, Andreas, 326

- Gardin, Émile de, 280
 Gardini, Romano, 333
 Guernsey, Alfred H., 375
 Guernsey, Raymond, 375
 Guerrazzi, Francesco, 546
 Guicciardini, Francesco, 192, 369–71, 876
 Guillén, Jorge, 702
 Guillén, Nicolás, 660
 Guimarães, Fernando, 670
 Güiraldes, Ricardo, 660
 Guizot, François-Pierre-Guillaume, 438, 837
 Gulabov, Konstantin, 123
 Gumilev, Nikolai, 423
 Gummere, Francis Barton, 577
 Günderröde, Karoline von, 330, 901
 Gundolf, Friedrich, 200
 Guthrie, A.B., 812
 Gutierrez Najera, Manuel, 800, 801
 Gutkow, Karl, 330
 Guys, Constantin, 62
 Gwynn, Stephen, 808
- Habermas, Jürgen, 328
 Häckel, Ernst Heinrich, 593
 Haeck, Philippe, 150
 Haggard, Henry Rider, 845
 Hagiwara Sakutarō, 430
 Haig-Brown, Roderick, 145, 373–74
 Haines, John, 734
 Hall, Edward, 167
 Hall, Joseph, 167, 169, 411, 576, 652
 Hall, Peter, 452
 Hamann, Johann Georg, 749
 Hamill, Pete, 21, 595
 Hamilton, Alexander, 16, 849
 Hamilton, Sir William, 213
 Hamm, Peter, 374–75
 Hamsun, Knut, 745
 Han Fei Zi, 494
 Han Yu, 177, 493, 626, 821
 Handke, Peter, 375
 Hansson, Ola, 746
 Haraszti, Miklós, 56
 Harding, Warren, 553
 Hardison, O.B. Jr., 322
 Hardwick, Elizabeth, 21
 Hardy, Oliver, 364
 Hardy, Thomas, 113, 114, 166, 407, 417, 467, 631

- Harig, Ludwig, 83
 Harley, Robert, 271, 810
 Harman, Thomas, 411
 Harmer, Wendy, 40
 Harper, Fletcher, 375
 Harper, James, 375
 Harper, John, 375
 Harper, Joseph Wesley, 375
Harper's, 18, 36, 51, 112, 115, 146, 214, 224, 244, 375–77, 454, 492, 495, 655, 697, 733, 849, 859, 868, 891, 892,
 Harpur, Charles, 908
 Harrington, Michael, 403
 Harris, J. Wilson, 807, 808
 Harris, Max, 41
 Harrison, Susie Frances, 887
 Harsdörffer, Georg Philipp, 324
 Harte, Bret, 406
 Hartman, Geoffrey, 322
 Hartman, Lee Foster, 376
 Hartmann, Eduard von, 751
 Harvey, Gabriel, 591
 Harvey, William, 794
 Haultain, Theodore Arnold, 144, 886
 Havel, Václav, 56, 236, 377–78
 Havlíček, Karel, 377
 Hawkes, John, 320
 Hawkesworth, John, 2, 7, 8, 105, 419, 650, 654, 758
 Hawking, Stephen, 755
 Hawthorne, Nathaniel, 36, 316, 398, 421
 Haya de la Torre, Raúl, 198
 Haydon, Benjamin Robert, 437
 Haywood, Eliza, 653
 Hazlitt, William, 16, 40, 42, 91, 106, 107, 111, 216, 232, 242, 245, 274, 331, 344, 378–81, 412, 414, 458, 483, 489, 559, 627, 656, 674, 683, 689, 759, 767, 788, 818, 852, 861, 862, 907
 Heaney, Seamus, 322
 Hearne, Vicki, 376
 Hearst, Patti, 222
 Heath, Michael, 808
 Hebert, François, 484
 Heer, Friedrich, 333
 Hegel, George Wilhelm Friedrich, 5, 59, 195, 278, 329, 349, 359, 499, 541, 689, 700, 769, 829, 866, 917
 Heiberg, Gunnar, 381, 745
 Heiberg, Ludvig, 744
 Heidegger, Martin, 4, 9, 30, 59, 165, 334, 349, 381–83, 618, 620, 739, 759, 915, 917, 922
 Heine, Heinrich, 6, 307, 331, 395, 527, 703, 776
 Heinsius, Daniel, 730
 Heisenberg, Werner, 333, 702, 814

- Heissenbütel, Helmut, 10, 83
 Heller, Eric, 333
 Hellmann, Lillian, 23
 Hello, Ernest, 101, 102
 Helvétius, Charles-Adrien, 298
 Hemingway, Ernest, 20, 214, 439, 519, 575, 594, 598, 632, 899
 Hennecke, Hans, 333
 Henríquez, Camilo, 798
 Henríquez Ureña, Pedro, 70, 383–85, 660, 801, 823
 Henryson, Robert, 581
 Hepburn, Katharine, 364
 Herbert, George, 888
 Herbert, Zbigniew, 56, 385–86, 668
 Herculano, Alexandre, 669
 Herder, Johann Gottfried, 34, 194, 326, 327, 328, 386–88, 393, 555, 687, 749, 765, 809, 834, 835, 894, 896
 Heredia, José-Maria de, 118
 Herling-Grudziński, Gustaw, 388–90, 667
 Hernández, Miguel, 915
 Herodotus, 89, 392, 852
 Herrick, Robert, 559
 Hersey, John, 598
 Hervás y Panduro, Lorenzo, 794
 Herzen, Aleksandr, 172, 228, 341, 390–92, 720, 789, 790
 Herzog, Werner, 264
 Heschel, Abraham Joshua, 692
 Hesiod, 203, 678
 Hesling, Bernard, 40
 Hesse, Hermann, 333, 527, 594, 607
 Heuss, Theodor, 333
 Heym, Georg, 10
 Higginson, Thomas Wentworth, 18, 36
 Hildegard of Bingen, 726
 Hillebrand, Karl, 331, 686
 Hippocrates, 26, 548
 Hiratsuka Raichō, 430
 Hirschfeld, Kurt, 311
 Hirshberg, Leonard, 553 historical essay, 123, 177, 392–94, 440, 462, 643, 667, 683, 746, 796
 Hitler, Adolf, 152
 Hiasko, Marek, 668
 Hoagland, Edward, 22, 106, 394–95, 495, 577, 582
 Hobbes, Thomas, 104, 185, 258, 488, 731
 Hochhuth, Rolf, 6
 Hocke, G.R., 306
 Hoffmann, E.T. A., 182, 307, 366
 Hofmannsthal, Hugo von, 95, 246, 332, 333, 395–96, 525, 594, 753
 Hofmiller, Josef, 325, 333

- Hofstadter, Richard, 637
Hogg, James, 91, 654
Hohl, Ludwig, 311
Hohoff, Curt, 333
Holberg, Ludvig, 396–98, 447, 743, 745, 787
Hölderlin, Friedrich, 6, 246, 281, 330, 366, 382, 580, 625
Holiday, Robert Cortes, 577
Höllerer, Walter, 9, 10
Holliday, Robert Cortes, 19, 412
Holmes, Oliver Wendell, 17, 23, 36, 251, 375, 398–400, 900
Holthusen, Hans Egon, 333, 334
Homer, 34, 615, 667, 704, 741, 753, 831
Honegger, Gottfried, 311
Hood, Hugh, 147
hooks, bell, 22
Hope, A.D., 41, 121, 400–01, 631, 908
Hopkins, Gerard Manley, 182
Hopkinson, Francis, 15
Horace, 172, 183, 200, 203, 210, 268, 269, 478, 551, 569, 616, 664–65, 678, 741, 753, 831
Horkheimer, Max, 4, 79, 328, 901
Hostos, Eugenio María de, 350, 383, 401–03, 800, 801
Hovey, Richard, 158
Howard, Richard, 322
Howard, Robert, 265
Howe, E.W., 406
Howe, Irving, 21, 403–04, 490
Howe, Joseph, 143, 404–06, 511
Howells, William Dean, 20, 214, 376, 406–08, 492, 860
Hoyt, Philip D., 597
Huch, Ricarda, 333, 334, 408–09
Hudson, W.H., 245, 431, 593
Huet, Pierre-Daniel, 462
Hughes, Howard, 222
Hughes, John, 833
Hughes, Langston, 20, 412
Hughes, Thomas, 807
Hugo, Victor, 61, 525, 547, 703, 718, 736, 743
Huizinga, Johann, 115, 702
Hulme, T.E., 688
Humboldt, Alexander von, 206, 291, 330, 334, 367
Hume, David, 23, 42, 105, 127, 168, 262, 348, 393, 409–11, 488, 555, 648, 691, 699, 719
Hume, Joseph, 807 humorous essay, 17, 411–13, 647, 853, 860
Huneker, James Gibbons, 552, 704
Hunt, John, 413
Hunt, Leigh, 16, 40, 91, 106, 218, 274, 331, 367, 379, 413–15, 459, 613, 683, 788, 807, 811
Hunt, Thornton, 807
Hurston, Zora Neale, 20, 42, 413, 883

- Hurtubise, Claude, 470
 Husak, Gustáv, 377
 Husserl, Edmund, 76, 349, 550, 551, 618, 739
 Hutcheson, Francis, 326
 Hutten, Ulrich von, 324
 Hutton, James, 206
 Hutton, Maurice, 512
 Hutton, Richard Holt, 807
 Huxley, Aldous, 112, 295, 415–16, 417, 570, 580, 631, 702, 823
 Huxley, Julian, 417
 Huxley, T.H., 33, 42, 109, 245, 354, 415, 416–18, 576, 755
 Huysmans, Joris-Karl, 191
 Hyman, Stanley Edgar, 21
- Iakubinskii, Lev, 770
 Iavorov, Peio, 777
 Ibn Battuta, 852
 Ibn Khaldun, 392
 Ibsen, Henrik, 395, 580, 631, 745, 765, 776
 Ichijō Kaneyoshi, 429
The Idler, 2, 105, 216, 274, 419–20, 434, 437, 489, 576, 650, 654, 848
 Ignatius of Loyola, 550
 Iliev, Atanas, 123
 Imaz, Eugenio, 198
 Imbert, Enrique Anderson, 823
 Inchbald, Elizabeth, 559
 Ingamells, Rex, 40
 Ingenieros, José, 800
 Ingersoll, Ralph, 598
 Ingrams, Richard, 808
 Ingres, Jean Auguste Dominique, 61
 Ionesco, Eugène, 181
 Irving, Henry, 766
 Irving, Peter, 16
 Irving, Washington, 15, 16, 18, 39, 42, 218, 398, 399, 412, 420–22
 Irwin, John T., 322
 Irzykowski, Karol, 666
 Iser, Wolfgang, 322
 Isherwood, Christopher, 288, 289
 Ishihara Masaakira, 429
 Ishikawa Masamochi, 430
 Isocrates, 32, 183, 478, 760
 Ivanov, Viacheslav, 73, 92, 422–23, 722, 723, 782, 783
 Ivanova, Natal'ia, 723
 Ivins, Molly, 412, 849
 Izgoev, Aleksandr, 722

- Jackson, George, 21
 Jackson, Shirley, 412, 598
 Jakobson, Roman, 490, 491
 James, Clive, 41
 James, Henry, 110, 194, 320, 364, 376, 406, 425–27, 470, 471, 553, 627, 628, 673, 679, 729, 766, 818, 845, 852, 860, 879, 891, 900, 903
 James, Henry III, 427
 James, John Stanley, 39
 James, William, 77, 251, 426, 427–28, 491, 692
 Jameson, Anna, 143
 Jandl, Ernst, 83
 Jansenius, Cornelius, 639
 Jarman, Derek, 264
 Jarnés, Benjamin, 702, 797
 Jarrell, Randall, 23
 Jarry, Alfred, 191
 Jasmin, Judith, 149
 Jaspers, Karl, 30, 31, 164, 476, 638
 Jastrun, Mieczyslaw, 386, 668
 Jaurès, Jean, 644
 Jay, John, 16, 849
 Jefferies, Richard, 107, 109, 245, 431–33,
 Jeffers, Robinson, 563
 Jeffrey, Francis, 242, 489, 654
 Jennings, Kate, 41
 Jens, Walter, 25, 325, 333
 Jensen, Johannes Vilhelm, 633, 785
 Jerome, St., 179, 759
 Jerome, Jerome K., 676
 Jesus Christ, 76, 89
 Jewett, Sarah Orne, 88, 406
 Jiménez, Juan Ramón, 46
 Joan of Arc, 793
 Johanson, Klara, 78
 John of Salisbury, 759
 John Paul II, 56
 Johnson, James Weldon, 231
 Johnson, Nunnally, 598
 Johnson, Robert Underwood, 18
 Johnson, Samuel, 2, 7, 15, 66, 89, 90, 105, 116, 127, 157, 168, 173, 186, 194, 211, 216, 250, 274, 345, 347, 348, 399, 411, 419–20, 433–36, 437, 453, 489, 505, 548, 559, 576, 634, 650, 653, 685, 699, 729, 754, 760, 806, 833, 848, 852, 854, 862, 899, 900, 907
 Johnson, Uwe, 10
 Johnston, Alva, 485
 Johnston, William, 90
 Jolley, Elizabeth, 741
 Jonson, Ben, 104, 167, 411, 831, 845
 Jonsson, Tor, 745

- Joubert, Joseph, 301
 Jouhandeau, Marcel, 471, 606, 814 journal, 17, 104, 147, 206, 233, 277, 299, 436–38, 446, 489, 582, 594, 631, 667, 708, 839, 883, 887, 907
Journal des Débats, 279, 300, 438, 693, 703, 829 journalism and the essay, 439–40
 Jouve, Pierre-Jean, 625
 Juvet, Louis, 606
 Jouy, Étienne de, 465
 Jouy, Victor, 795
 Jovellanos, Gaspar Melchor de, 440–41, 794
 Joyce, James, 110, 164, 191, 200, 243, 244, 304, 580, 631, 676, 688, 846, 862, 891
 Joyce, Stanislaus, 244
 Joyce, William, 891
 Juana Inés de la Cruz (Sor Juana), 160, 643, 823
 Juaréz, Benito, 800
 Julian(a) of Norwich, St., 690
 Jung, Carl Gustav, 81, 165, 201, 333, 702, 787, 911
 Jünger, Ernst, 25, 333, 382, 441–42, 815
 Justinian, 712
 Juvenal, 741
- Kael, Pauline, 598
 Kafka, Franz, 42, 57, 59, 79, 96, 152, 278, 311, 334, 374, 389, 448, 449, 580, 667, 824, 871, 890, 891
 Kalidasa, 387
 Kamo no Chōmei, 429, 443–44
 Kanera, see Ichijo Kaneyoshi
 Kant, Immanuel, 76, 119, 195, 212, 270, 281, 325, 328, 329, 334, 386, 387, 393, 444–46, 489, 490, 499, 541, 555, 667, 700, 703, 747, 749, 769, 773, 795, 834, 895
 Kantor, Tadeusz, 452
 Karamzin, Nikolai, 681, 718
 Karavelov, Liuben, 534
 Kasack, Hermann, 595
 Kassner, Rudolf, 332, 333, 657
 Katsarov, Konstantin, 124
 Kattan, Nai'm, 149
 Kaufman, George S., 597
 Kaufman, Irving, 597, 598
 Kawabata Yasunari, 430
 Kazandzhiev, Spiridon, 123
 Kazin, Alfred, 21, 490, 638, 900
 Keats, John, 96, 233, 234, 316, 379, 400, 414, 459, 479, 577, 683, 854
 Keble, John, 761, 851
 Keillor, Garrison, 37, 412
 Keller, Gottfried, 311
 Kendall, Henry, 908
 Kenkō, 429, 443, 446–47

- Kennan, George, 37
 Kennedy, John E., 879
 Kepler, Johann, 488
 Kerr, Alfred, 594
 Kerr, Jean, 376, 412
 Kessler, Harry Graf, 594, 890
 Key, Ellen, 746
 Keynes, John Maynard, 271
 Khadzhiiski, Ivan, 123
 Khilendarski, Paisii, 123
 Khlebnikov, Velimir, 714, 770
 Khodasevich, Vladislav, 73, 723
 Khomiakov, Aleksei, 720
 Kidder, Tracy, 596
 Kierkegaard, Søren, 30, 164, 165, 374, 474, 499, 625, 692, 750, 759, 776, 787, 865, 866
 Kikuchi Kan, 430
 Kimball, Roger, 491
 Kinck, Hans Ernst, 745
 King, Martin Luther Jr., 21, 37, 577
 King, William, 650
 Kinglake, Alexander, 852
 Kingsley, Mary, 852
 Kingston, Maxine Hong, 21
 Kinnaird, Douglas, 807
 Kipling, Rudyard, 77, 482, 623, 808, 852, 899
 Kippis, Andrew, 90
 Kireevskii, Ivan, 720
 Kirkwood, Julieta, 804
 Kistiakovskii, A., 722
 Kitamura Tōkoku, 430
 Kiukhel'beker, Vil'gelm, 719
 Kjær, Nils, 381, 447–4, 745
 Klawans, Harold, 549
 Kleist, Heinrich von, 327, 329, 330, 361, 366, 367, 448–50, 604
 Klopstock, Friedrich Gottlieb, 35, 326, 329
 Knigge, Adolf von, 329
 Knox, Ronald, 761
 Kobayashi Hideo, 430
 Kōda Aya, 431
 Kōda Rohan, 431
 Kogălniceanu, Mihail, 138, 612
 Kołakowski, Leszek, 450–51, 668
 Kolb, Annette, 594
 Kolmar, Gertrud, 10
 Kommerrell, Max, 333
 Konstantinov, Aleko, 123
 Korn, Karl, 595
 Koroudzhiev, Dimitar, 125

- Kott, Jan, 451–53, 668
 Kracauer, Siegfried, 333, 594
 Kraus, Franz Xavier, 331
 Kraus, Karl, 79, 152, 154, 273, 274, 280, 332, 333, 527
 Krause, Karl Christian Friedrich, 556, 795
 Krickel, Edward, 322
 Krim, Seymour, 21
 Kristensen, Tom, 633
 Kristeva, Julia, 134, 778, 779
 Krüger, Michael, 10
 Krustev, Krustyu, 123
 Krutch, Joseph Wood, 23, 434, 453–55, 755
 Krylov, Ivan, 719
 Kuhn, David, 598
 Kulmus, Luise Adelgunde Victoria, 326
 Kundera, Milan, 868
 Kunert, Günter, 9
 Kuranda, Ignaz, 366
 Kuriyagawa Hakuson, 431
 Kürnberger, Ferdinand, 331
 Kuzmin, Fedor, 723
- La Beaumelle, 90, 744
 La Boétie, Étienne de, 295, 568
 Labriola, Antonio, 359
 Labrunie, Gérard, 301
 La Bruyère, Jean de, 26, 168, 169, 203, 296, 303, 323, 411, 457–58, 532, 576, 814, 829
 Lacroix, Jean, 76
 Lafayette, Marie-Madeleine (Madame) de, 763
 Lafitau, Joseph François, 147
 La Fontaine, Jean de, 57, 763, 829, 874
 Laforgue, Jules, 100
 La Harpe, Jean-François de, 729
 Lahontan, Baron de, 147
 Lahr, John, 598
 Lafn Entralgo, Pedro, 161, 796, 843
 Lalonde, Michèle, 149
 Lamarck, Jean, 206
 Lamartine, Alphonse, 550, 551, 573, 703
 Lamb, Charles, 16, 40, 105, 106, 170, 212, 216, 218, 232, 245, 274, 331, 344, 412, 458–61, 461, 483, 511, 564, 578, 585, 613, 641, 650, 656, 674, 683, 697, 746, 767, 788, 818, 862, 907
 Lamennais, Felicité Robert de, 693
 La Mettrie, Julien Offray de, 397
 Lamming, George, 601
 Lamontagne, Marie-Andrée, 484
 La Mothe le Vayer, François, 296
 Lampedusa, Giuseppe Tomasi di, 389
 Lampman, Archibald, 115

- Lamy, Suzanne, 149
 Landivar, Rafael, 155
 Landor, Walter Savage, 331, 906
 Lane, John, 65
 Lang, Andrew, 91, 845
 Lange, Carl G., 427
 Lange, Per, 461–62, 744
 Langland, William, 591
 Lao Zi, 494
 Lapham, Lewis, 376
 Laplace, Pierre-Simon, 355
 Larbaud, Valery, 304
 Lardner, Ring, 598
 La Roche, Sophie, 327, 329
 La Rochefoucauld, 26, 99, 296, 357, 379, 411, 457, 461, 462–63, 473, 545, 752, 763
 Larose, Jean, 149, 150, 463–64, 470, 485
 Larra, Mariano José de, 47, 276, 439, 464–66, 795, 796
 Larrea, Juan, 198
 Las Casas, Bartolomé de, 696
 Lasker-Schüler, Else, 273
 Lasswell, Harold, 679
 Lastarria, Jose Victorino, 799
 Latimer, Hugh, 691
 Latini, Brunetto, 760
 Latour, Bruno, 762
 Laurel, Stan, 364
 Laurence, Margaret, 42, 147
 Laurendeau, André, 148, 368
 Lautréamont, Comte de, 815
 Lavoisier, Antoine, 355
 Law, William, 167, 691
 Lawrence, D.H., 38, 111, 466–68, 580, 612, 631, 676, 679, 689, 702, 714, 733, 846, 853, 891
 Lawrence, T.E., 611
 Leacock, Stephen, 143, 145, 376, 468–70, 503, 512, 893
 Least Heat-Moon, William, 596, 868
 Leavis, F.R., 194, 250, 675, 689
 Le Bon, Gustave, 800
 Lebowitz, Fran, 275, 412
 Leclerc, Gilles, 148, 471
 Leconte de Lisle, Charles-Marie, 98, 118
 Le Corbusier, 584
 Lee, Laurie, 191
 Le Fanu, Sheridan, 676
 Lefebvre, Henri, 77
 Leibniz, Gottfried Wilhelm, 324, 325, 329, 397, 444, 620, 769
 Leighton, Robert, 187
 Leiris, Michel, 59, 739
 Lem, Stanislaw, 668

- Le Maistre de Saci, Isaac, 640
 Lemaître, Georges Henri, 77
 Lemaître, Jules, 695, 837
 Le Moyne, Jean, 148, 149, 470–71
 L'Engle, Madeleine, 692
 Lenin, 172, 900
 Lennox, Charlotte, 434
 Lenz, Jakob Michael Reinhold, 329
 León, Fray Luis de, 794, 866
 Leonardo da Vinci, 253, 641, 875
 Leont'ev, Konstantin, 471–73
 Leopardi, Giacomo, 196, 247, 473–74, 572, 661
 Leopold, Aldo, 22, 245, 474–76, 593
 Lermontov, Mikhail, 67, 341, 422
 Le Roy Ladurie, Emmanuel, 76
 Leslie, Charles, 652
 Lessing, Gotthold Ephraim, 194, 307, 323, 325, 327, 329, 386, 387, 476–78 527, 554, 609, 700, 749, 809, 858, 894, 895, 896
 L'Estrange, Roger, 652
 Le Sueur, Meridel, 20
 LeSueur, William Dawson, 887 letter, 14, 54, 103, 148, 172, 176, 183, 189, 220, 282, 291, 292, 440, 457, 462, 467, 471, 473, 478–79, 507, 560, 567, 568, 594, 600, 615, 625, 639, 650, 656, 663, 664, 680, 697, 738, 747, 763, 765, 779, 806, 815, 855, 858, 859, 861, 865, , 874, 883, 887, 906, 919
 Levertin, Oscar, 746
 Lévesque, Claude, 150
 Levi, Primo, 479–81
 Lévi-Strauss, Claude, 263, 490
 Levick, M.B., 597
 Levy, Bernard-Henri, 868
 Lewald, August, 330
 Lewis, Alun, 191
 Lewis, C.S., 112, 481–83, 576, 692
 Lewis, Sinclair, 214, 491, 553, 814
 Lewis, Wyndham, 490, 678, 688, 689
 Li Shang-yin, 756
 Li Taoyuan, 494
 Li Zhi, 913, 919
 Liang Qichao, 178
 Liang Shiqiu, 178
 Liang Yuchun, 178, 483–84
Liberté, 68, 101, 148, 484–85, 625
 Lichtenberg, Georg Christoph, 307, 329, 334, 442, 752
 Liebling, A.J., 485–86, 598, 848
 Lighthall, William Douw, 887
 Likhachev, Dmitrii, 723
 Lima, Silvio, 669
Lima la horrible, 486–87, 803

- Lin Yutang, 178
 Lincoln, Abraham, 78, 230, 799
 Lindberg, Stanley, 322
 Lindqvist, Sven, 747
 Lippmann, Walter, 552, 849
 Lipsius, Justus, 184, 759
 Lisboa, Eugénio, 670
 Liscano, Juan, 660
 Liscow, Christian Ludwig, 326 literary theory and the essay, 487–93
 Liu Zongyuan, 177, 493–95, 626, 821
 Livshits, Benedikt, 723
 Livy, 392, 829
 Lloyd, Marie, 250
 Locke, Alain, 20
 Locke, David Ross, 17
 Locke, John, 90, 104, 185, 205, 216, 258, 260–62, 433, 488, 561, 563, 646, 712, 727, 880
 Lockhart, John Gibson, 91, 157, 194, 654, 683
 Lockridge, Ross, 52
 Loerke, Oskar, 333, 595
 Lomonosov, Mikhail, 718
 Long, Lois, 597, 598
 Longfellow, Henry Wadsworth, 18, 316, 398
 Longinus, 192, 268, 615–16
 Loos, Adolf, 273
 Lopate, Phillip, 22
 Lopes, Oscar, 669
 Lopes, Silvina Rodrigues, 670
 López de Ayala, Pero, 794
 Lopez, Barry, 22, 376, 495–96, 594, 734
 Lord, Catherine, 149
 Lorde, Audre, 21
 Lorenzo, Félix, 780
 Loret, Jean, 651
 Loseff, Lev, 423
 Loti, Pierre, 704
 Lotze, Rudolf Hermann, 76
 Lourenço, Eduardo, 277, 496–97, 669, 670
 Lowell, James Russell, 18, 36, 247, 375, 398, 406
 Lower, Lennie, 40
 Lu Xun, 178, 498–99, 920, 921
 Lubbock, Percy, 233
 Lucas, E.V., 274, 412
 Lucian, 257, 325
 Lucilius, 183, 743, 758
 Lucretius, 551, 677, 762
 Ludwig, Otto, 366
 Lukács, Georg, 5, 324, 333, 499–501, 530, 657, 675, 690, 779, 785, 901

- Lully, Raymond, 794
 Luna, Álvaro de, 793
 Lunacharskii, Anatolii, 723
 Lundkvist, Artur, 375
 Lurie, Morris, 41
 Lushington, E.L., 213
 Luther, Martin, 324, 408, 477, 678, 690, 851
 Luthuli, Albert, 352
 Luxemburg, Rosa, 165, 890
 Luzy Caballero, José de, 799
 Lyall, Alfred, 242
 Lyell, Charles, 206
 Lyly, John, 851
 Lynch, Bohun, 65
 Lynd, Robert, 412, 483
 Lynes, Russell, 376
 Lyon, Ferdinand, 83
- Mabie, Hamilton Wright, 18
 Mabile, Elizabeth, 65
 McArthur, Peter, 144, 469, 503–04
 Macaulay, Rose, 191
 Macaulay, Thomas Babington, 2, 107, 108, 242, 331, 367, 393, 434, 504–06, 687, 746, 758, 806, 811, 829, 858
 McAuley, James, 121, 908
 McCarthy, Joseph R., 637
 McCarthy, Mary, 21, 506–07, 598, 637, 638
 McChord, Samuel, 18
 McCrae, Hugh, 908
 MacDiarmid, Hugh, 580
 Macdonald, Donald Alister, 40
 Macdonald, Dwight, 637
 McGregor, Craig, 41
 Mach, Ernst, 587
 Machado, Antonio, 161, 516, 529, 531, 670, 795, 796, 915
 Machar, Agnes Maule, 887
 Machiavelli, Niccolò, 50, 192, 357, 369, 507–09, 742, 876
 MacKay, Ellin, 597
 Mackay, R.W., 248
 McKelway, St. Clair, 485, 597
 McKenney, Ruth, 598
 Mackenzie, Henry, 650
 MacLennan, Hugh, 145, 509–11
 McLuhan, Marshall, 814
 MacMechan, Archibald, 144, 511–12, 887
 Macmillan, Frederick, 425
 MacNeice, Louis, 288
 McNulty, John, 598

- Macphail, Andrew, 144, 511, 512–13
 McPhee, John, 22, 513–15, 594, 755
 Macpherson, James, 387
 MacPherson, Max, 147
 McQueen, Humphrey, 41
 Madariaga, Salvador de, 515–16, 529, 780, 797
 Madison, James, 6, 410, 849
 Madubuike, 1
 Maeterlinck, Maurice, 101, 102, 158
 Maeztu, Ramiro de, 259, 516–18 780, 796
 Maeztu y Whitney, Maria de, 793
 Magalhães, Isabel Allegro de, 670
 Magee, William Kirkpatrick, see Eglinton, John
 Maheu, Pierre, 149
 Mahfouz, Naguib, 351
 Maiakovskii, Vladimir, 255, 341, 490, 770, 775, 856
 Maikov, V.N., 609
 Mailer, Norman, 21, 376, 514, 518–20, 595, 596, 638, 848
 Mailhot, Laurent, 150
 Mainwaring, Arthur, 272
 Maiorescu, Titu, 139
 Mairs, Nancy, 22
 Maistre, Joseph de, 181
 Major, Jean-Louis, 149, 150
 Malamud, Bernard, 628
 Malcolm X, 427
 Malebranche, Nicolas, 62, 76, 300, 325, 694, 765
 Mallarmé, Stéphane, 76, 134, 181, 191, 233, 246, 302, 305, 520–21, 705, 873
 Mallea, Eduardo, 521–23, 540, 660, 702, 803, 823
 Maloney, Russell, 598
 Malraux, André, 86, 277, 278, 439, 575, 611
 Malthus, Thomas, 270–71, 479, 538
 Mañach Robato, Jorge, 802
 Manchester, William, 90
 Mandela, Nelson, 352
 Mandel'shtam, Nadezhda, 114, 524
 Mandel'shtam, Osip, 56, 113, 114, 341, 422, 523–25, 714, 715, 723
 Manet, Édouard, 60, 62
 Manley, Mary Delarivière, 271
 Mann, Heinrich, 81, 333, 525–27, 528, 890
 Mann, Klaus, 526
 Mann, Thomas, 6, 25, 42, 56, 80, 311, 323, 330, 333, 499, 500, 525, 527–29 594, 607, 631, 676, 702, 814, 890, 901
 Manning, Henry Edward, Cardinal, 820
 Manning, Robert, 37
 Manzoni, Alessandro, 196, 473, 507
 Marañón, Gregorio, 702, 780, 796
 Maráns y Síscar, Gregorio, 794

- Marat, Jean-Paul, 679
 Maravall, José Antonio, 797
 Marcel, Gabriel, 423
 Marcelin (Émile Planat), 830
 March, Joseph M., 597
 Marchena, José, 465
 Marcotte, Gilles, 149, 484
 Marcuse, Herbert, 165, 563
 Marechal, Leopoldo, 521
 Margaret of Navarre, 641
 Marías, Julián, 529–30, 796, 843
 Mariátegui, José Carlos, 486, 521, 530–32, 660, 802
 Marichal, Juan, 797
 Marinello, Juan, 802
 Marinho, José, 669
 Mario, Jessie White, 547
 Maritain, Jacques, 544, 823
 Marivaux, 297, 299, 303, 306, 532–34, 728
 Marker, Chris., 263, 264
 Markov, Georgi, 124, 534–35
 Marlborough, John Churchill, 1st Duke of, 272, 284, 810
 Marmontel, Jean-François, 809
 Marnham, Patrick, 808
 Márquez, Manuel, 198
 Marquis, Don, 19, 412, 577
 Martí, José, 29, 204, 383, 384, 402, 439, 521, 535–37, 540, 573, 710, 801, 802, 917
 Martial, 172
 Martin, James, 38
 Martín, Judith, 23
 Martín Gaité, Carmen, 537–38, 797
 Martineau, Harriet, 107, 538–40
 Martínez Bález, Manuel, 198
 Martínez Estrada, Ezequiel, 439, 486, 540–41, 803, 823
 Martínez Ruiz, José, 618
 Marvell, Andrew, 488, 845
 Marx, Karl, 5, 11, 77, 119, 207, 271, 278, 331, 349, 359, 519, 541–43, 557, 578, 666, 689, 737, 844, 865, 888, 900
 Marx Brothers, 364, 471
 Masaoka Shiki, 430
 Masaryk, Tomáš G., 377
 Mason, William, 851
 Massingham, H.W., 766
 Massis, Henri, 302, 543–45
 Masson, David, 90
 Matamoro, Blas, 804
 Mather, Cotton, 14, 576, 900
 Mather, Increase, 691
 Matsudaira Sadanobu, 429

- Matt, Peter von, 311
 Matthews, Brander, 376
 Matthiessen, Peter, 594
 Maupassant, Guy de, 425, 704
 Mauriac, François, 234, 304, 364, 606
 Maurois, André, 233
 Mauroy, Prosper, 703
 Maurras, Charles, 77, 86, 543, 544
 Mauss, Marcel, 778
 Mauthner, Fritz, 395
 maxim, 12, 26, 100, 169, 226, 268, 296, 461, 462, 545–46, 640, 646, 664, 868
 Mayer, Hans, 325, 333, 334
 Mayröcker, Friederike, 83
 Mazzini, Giuseppe, 316, 546–48
 Mead, Margaret, 23
 medical essay, 17, 548–50
 Medin, Tzvi, 198
 Medina, João, 670
 meditation, 14, 102, 107, 246, 291, 443, 550–51, 580, 592, 601, 658, 691, 713, 771, 829, 846, 865, 881
Meditations, 190, 550, 551–52
 Meidner, Ludwig, 890
 Mello, Francisco Manuel de, 668
 Mel'nikov, I.A., 721
 Melville, Herman, 224
 Memmi, Albert, 149
 Ménage, Gilles, 763
 Mencken, H.L., 19, 406, 412, 417, 552–54, 598, 632, 656, 679, 704, 759, 849
 Mendel, Gregor, 206
 Mendelssohn, Moses, 36, 327, 328, 476, 554–56, 700, 750, 824, 834, 894
 Menéndez y Pelayo, Marcelino, 556–57, 795
 Menzel, Wolfgang, 330
 Mercier, Louis Sébastien, 465
 Merck, Johann Heinrich, 326, 834, 835
 Méré, Antione Gombaud de, 296
 Meredith, George, 266–67, 547, 559, 585, 816
 Merezhkovskii, Dmitrii, 229, 722
 Mérimée, Prosper, 703
 Merleau-Ponty, Maurice, 64, 739
 Mersenne, Marin, 551
 Merton, Thomas, 557–59, 692
 Mesonero Romanos, Ramón de, 795
 Metternich, Prince Clemens, 541
 Mexia, Pedro, 294, 794
 Meynell, Alice, 111, 559–60
 Meyrink, Gustav, 890
 Michaelis, Karoline, 330
 Michaux, Henri, 100, 181, 338

- Michelangelo, 253, 379
 Michelet, Jules, 57, 390, 393, 829
 Michnik, Adam, 56, 668
 Miciński, Bolesław, 667, 815
 Mickiewicz, Adam, 99, 563, 776
 Mierendorff, Carlo, 890
 Mikhailovskii, Nikolai, 721
 Milev, Geo, 123
 Miliani, Domingo, 198
 Mill, John Stuart, 70, 108, 157, 166, 171, 539, 546, 550, 560–62, 576, 578, 679, 777, 778, 793, 816
 Millares, Augustin, 198
 Millay, Edna St. Vincent, 332
 Miller, Alice Duer, 597
 Miller, Henry, 519, 563
 Miller, J.Hillis, 322
 Millett, Kate, 404
 Mills, C.Wright, 638
 Miłosz, Czesław, 56, 386, 562–64, 667
 Miłosz, Oskar V.de L., 563
 Milton, John, 32–33, 34, 72, 78, 96, 184, 185, 209, 249, 250, 312, 363, 379, 505, 561, 609, 634, 653, 678, 686, 691, 829, 851
 Mingus, Charles, 704
 Minh-ha, Trinh T., 263
 Miquel, Antonio, 781
 Mirk, John, 760
 Miró, Gabriel, 780, 796
 Miró Quesada, Francisco, 198
 Miron, Gaston, 100, 484
 Mishima, Yukio, 42, 431
 Mistral, Gabriela, 160, 611, 660, 804
 Mitchell, Donald Grant, 18, 412
 Mitchell, Elyne, 40
 Mitchell, Joseph, 485
 Mitford, Mary Russell, 107, 564–65, 697
 Mitscherlich, Alexander, 333
 Mnouchkine, Ariane, 452
 Mochnacki, Maurycy, 666
 Molière, 397, 753, 763
 Momaday, N.Scott, 322, 565–66
 Mommsen, Theodor, 77, 686
 Monet-Chartrand, Simonne, 149
 Monsiváis, Carlos, 567–68, 804
 Montagu, Mary Wortley, 820, 852
 Montaigne, Michel de, 3, 8, 10, 17, 23, 24, 42, 49, 79, 91, 99, 103, 111, 116, 132, 134, 166, 179, 183, 184, 190, 192, 205, 211, 215, 226, 233, 234, 252, 253, 255, 256, 257, 269, 274, 294, 305, 323, 326, 338, 343, 344, 346, 379, 394, 397, 411, 433, 436, 444, 446, 453, 461, 462, 477, 483, 487, 488, 499, 511, 532, 536, 537, 545, 566, 568–71, 575, 576, 592, 640, 641, 648, 650, 652, 654, 655, 656, 657, 659, 660, 666, 669, 674, 678, 685, 694, 699, 710, 714, 718, 728, 729, 730, 737, 742, 743, 752,

- 754, 759, 762, 765, 787, 832, 837, 838, 852, 857, 862, 866, 874, 881, 893, 906
- Montale, Eugenio, 114, 571–73
- Montalvo, Juan, 439, 573–74, 799
- Montégut, Émile, 301, 306
- Montesquieu, Charles de Secondat, baron de, 194, 200, 219, 297, 298, 393, 478, 712, 794, 809
- Montgolfier, Jacques Étienne, 834
- Montgolfier, Joseph Michel, 834
- Montherlant, Henry de, 304, 574–76, 814
- Montpensier, Anne-Marie-Louise de, 462
- Moodie, Susanna, 143
- Moore, Edward, 2, 650
- Moore, George, 110, 243, 364, 906
- Moorhouse, Frank, 41
- Mora, José María Luis, 799
- moral essay, 14, 42, 462, 576–77, 743
- Moran, Benjamin, 807
- Morand, Paul, 606
- More, Hannah, 851
- More, Henry, 216
- More, Paul Elmer, 18
- More, Thomas, 89, 226, 478, 661, 678, 742, 759, 851
- Morgan, Charles, 233
- Morison, Stanley, 845
- Moritz, Karl Philipp, 555
- Morley, Christopher, 19, 412, 577–78
- Morley, John, 807
- Morot-Sir, Édouard, 305
- Morowitz, Harold J., 755
- Morris, Elisabeth Woodbridge, 18
- Morris, George L.K., 637
- Morris, Meaghan, 41
- Morris, William, 109, 363, 482, 578–80, 688, 766
- Morris, Wright, 598
- Morrison, Arthur, 676
- Morrison, John, 41
- Morrison, Toni, 21
- Möser, Justus, 328, 387
- Motoori Norinaga, 429
- Motteux, Peter, 651, 652, 654, 655
- Mount, Ferdinand, 845
- Moura, Vasco Graça, 670
- Mourão-Ferreira, David, 669
- Moynihan, Daniel P., 23
- Mozart, Wolfgang Amadeus, 471
- Muhammad, Elijah, 53
- Muir, Edwin, 580–81
- Muir, John, 17, 37, 245, 375, 475, 581–83 593, 594
- Müller, Adam, 325, 330, 448

- Mumford, Lewis, 489, 490, 492, 583–85, 598, 777, 778, 779
 Mundt, Theodor, 330
 Murasaki Shikibu, 704
 Muratori, Ludovico, 393
 Murdoch, Iris, 288, 868
 Murdoch, Rupert, 845
 Murdoch, Walter, 40, 585–86
 Murena, Héctor Alberto, 540, 803, 823
 Muret, Marc-Antoine, 184
 Murnau, F.W., 263
 Murner, Thomas, 324
 Muro Kyūsō, 429
 Murphy, Arthur, 434
 Murphy, Dervla, 853
 Murray, David L., 845
 Murray, John, 16, 654
 Murray, Judith Sargent, 16
 Murray, Les, 41
 Murry, John Middleton, 356, 845
 Muschg, Adolf, 311
 Muschg, Walter, 25
 Musil, Robert, 10, 80, 111, 311, 333, 334, 500, 586–88, 657
 Musō Soseki, 429
 Musset, Alfred de, 99, 300, 703, 829
 Mussolini, Benito, 61
 Mutafchiev, Petar, 123
 Mutafchieva, Vera, 125
 Mutafov, Chavdar, 123, 588–89
- Nabokov, Vladimir, 42, 638, 723
 Nagai Kafū, 430
 Naipaul, Shiva, 42, 853
 Naipaul, V.S., 602, 853
 Nakano Shigeharu, 430
 Napoleon, 170, 253
 Naranjo, Carmen, 804
 Narushima Ryūhoku, 430
 Nashe, Thomas, 591–93, 851
 Nasser, Gamal Abdel, 879
 Nathan, George Jean, 553
 Nathan, Robert, 632
 Natsume Sōseki, 430
 nature essay, 16, 87, 131, 453, 495, 593–94, 581, 840
 Negruzzi, Costache, 138, 612
 Neilson, John Shaw, 631, 908
 Nekrasov, Nikolai, 171, 228, 789, 790
 Nelligan, Émile, 100, 463
 Nelson, Richard, 734

- Nemésio, Vitorino, 669
 Nemo, Philippe, 868
 Nepveu, Pierre, 150, 470
 Nero, 758
 Neruda, Jan, 153
 Neruda, Pablo, 660, 744, 762, 871
 Nestroy, Johann, 307
Die neue Rundschau, 588, 594–95, 702, 890
 Neumann, Carl, 125
 Nevers, Edmond de, 148
 Neves, Nuno Teixeira, 670
 New Journalism, 9, 21, 439, 514, 518, 595–97, 696, 779, 848, 902
The New Yorker, 19, 20, 37, 75, 112, 194, 222, 275, 285, 485, 506, 513, 552, 583, 597–99, 646, 655, 842, 853, 862, 868, 891, 892, 899, 902,
 Newbery, John, 348
 Newby, Eric, 853
 Newman, John Henry, 108, 119, 179, 492, 576, 599–601, 692, 761, 820, 851
 Newton, Isaac, 76, 269, 488, 563, 727, 880
 Newton, John, 851
 Ngugi wa Thiong’o, 1, 601–02,
 Nicol, Eric, 145
 Nicolai, Friedrich, 326, 327, 328, 476, 555, 699, 834
 Nicole, Pierre, 296
 Nicolson, Harold, 289
 Nicolson, Marjorie Hope, 23
 Niebuhr, Barthold Georg, 212
 Nietzsche, Friedrich, 38, 59, 76, 81, 93, 102, 119, 125, 164, 246, 247, 251, 273, 279, 301, 305, 323, 331, 375, 442, 445, 449, 461, 467, 472, 476, 492, 498, 499, 525, 527, 528, 570, 580, 602–05, 616, 657, 666, 669, 678, 688, 689, 714, 722, 751, 759, 769, 773, 776, 777, 791, 844, 866, 873
 Nin, Anaïs, 437, 879
 Nin Frías, Carlos, 801
 Nizon, Paul, 311
 Nodier, Charles, 703
 Noica, Constantin, 813
 Norris, Frank, 407
 Norris, John, 652
 Northcliffe, Lord (A.C.W.Harmsworth), 845
 Norton, Andrews, 491
 Norton, Charles Eliot, 490
Nouvelle Revue Française, 77, 302, 490, 605–06, 702, 823, 837, 873, 890
 Nouwen, Henri J.M., 692
 Novalis, 35, 102, 281, 301, 330, 366, 422, 606–08, 625, 749, 835
 Novikov, Nikolai, 608–10, 718
 Nowlan, Alden, 147
 Noyes, Alfred, 91
 Nye, Naomi Shihab, 21

- Oakley, Barry, 40
 Oates, Joyce Carol, 322, 376, 838, 868
 Ocampo, Victoria, 611–12, 702, 725, 804, 823
 O'Connor, Flannery, 883
 Odobescu, Alexandru, 612–13
 O'Dowd, Bernard, 908
 Ōe Kenzaburō, 431
 O'Gorman, Edmundo, 384
 O'Gorman, Ned, 198
 O'Grady, Standish, 911
 Ogyū Sorai, 429
 O'Hara, John, 598, 879
 Olariaga, Luis, 780
 Oldenburg, Henry, 651
 Oldisworth, William, 271
 Oldys, William, 90
 O'Leary, John, 911
 Oliphant, Margaret, 91, 109, 613–15, 807
 Oliver, Amy, 198
 Oliver, Edith, 598
 Olivier, Laurence, 364, 861
On the Sublime, 268, 615–16
 Ondaatje, Michael, 655
 O'Neill, Eugene, 214, 453, 454, 553, 631, 702
 Ophüls, Marcel, 264
 Orage, A.R., 580, 688
 Oreamuno, Yolanda, 804
 Orrego, Antenor, 802
 Ors, Eugenio d', 45, 616–18, 796
 Ortega, Julio, 804
 Ortega y Gasset, José, 43, 45, 76, 161, 164, 200, 259, 260, 439, 465, 496, 529, 551, 611, 616, 618–22, 649, 702, 705, 780, 796, 823, 843, 844, 865, 915, 916, 917, 922
 Ortiz, Fernando, 802
 Ortiz, Óscar Rodríguez, 660
 Orwell, George, 42, 56, 103, 110, 111, 132, 141, 191, 300, 404, 534, 577, 622–24, 634, 637, 656, 679, 688, 696, 766, 848, 903
 Osborne, John, 862
 Ostwald, Friedrich Wilhelm, 77
 Otto, bishop of Freising, 392
 Otto, Teo, 311
 Ouellet, Pierre, 150
 Ouellette, Fernand, 149, 150, 484, 624–25
 Ouellette-Michalska, Madeleine, 149
 Ouyang Xiu, 177, 625–27, 821
 Overbury, Thomas, 104, 167, 169, 227, 411, 652
 Ovid, 165, 172, 478, 815
 Owen, Wilfred, 84
 Owen, William, 90

- Oxenstierna, Johan Thuresson, 745
 Oz, Amos, 351
 Ozick, Cynthia, 21, 376, 627–28
- Paalen, Wolfgang, 689
 Paeschke, Hans, 595
 Paglia, Camille, 491
 Paine, Thomas, 15, 16, 629–30, 635, 767, 849, 851
 Paleologu, Alexandru, 813
 Palgrave, Francis Turner, 684
 Palma, Ricardo, 486, 800
 Palmer, Nettie, 40, 630–32
 Palmer, Vance, 40, 631, 632–33
 Paludan, Jacob, 633–34, 744
 pamphlet, 14, 104, 169, 172, 185, 230, 278, 279, 299, 464, 467, 476, 539, 560, 573, 576, 578, 591, 629, 634–35, 639, 651, 665, 678, 685, 689, 691, 701, 742, 760, 765, 815, 825, 851, 880, 905
 Panaev, Ivan Ivanovich, 789
 Pankhurst, Emmeline, 891
 Pannwitz, Rudolf, 333
 Panter-Downes, Molly, 598
 Paquette, Jean-Marcel, 150, 470
 Parandowski, Jan, 667
 Pardo Bazán, Emilia, 635–37, 793, 795
 Paré, François, 150
 Parent, Étienne, 148
 Parker, Charlie, 704
 Parker, Dorothy, 412, 553, 597, 598, 647, 893
 Parker, Theodore, 489
 Parkman, Francis, 364
 Parra, Teresa de la, 804
Partisan Review, 21, 51, 113, 191, 450, 506, 622, 637–39, 786, 879, 899
 Parton, Sara Payson Willis, 412
 Pascal, Blaise, 76, 99, 184, 234, 296, 323, 375, 427, 448, 450, 457, 467, 473, 639–41, 645, 691, 693, 813, 866, 873, 874, 880, 881, 897, 907
 Pascal, Gilberte, 646
 Pasek, Jan Chryzostom, 666
 Pasternak, Boris, 389, 391, 558, 774, 856
 Pater, Walter, 109, 116, 129, 267, 395, 641–42, 695, 858, 897, 907
 Patmore, Coventry, 559
 Paul, St., 478, 758, 866
 Paulding, James Kirke, 16
 Paulhan, Jean, 606
 Pausanius, 852
 Pavel, Thomas, 150
 Pavese, Cesar, 140
 Payne, John, 7, 685
 Paz, Octavio, 314, 384, 531, 642–44, 762, 802
 Peacock, Thomas Love, 210, 676, 767, 768

- Peale, Norman Vincent, 427
 Pechel, Rudolf, 332
 Pedneault, H  l  ne, 149
 Pedreira, Antonio S., 802
 P  guy, Charles, 77, 86, 234, 544, 606, 644–45, 813, 814, 873
 Peirce, Charles Sanders, 490, 491
 Pelham, Henry, 284
 Pellegrini, Alessandro, 422, 423
 Pelletier, Albert, 148
 Pelletier, G  rard, 868
 Pelletier, Jacques, 470
 Penev, Boian, 123
 Penn, I.Garland, 230
 Penn, William, 880
pens  e, 220, 299, 545, 551, 580, 645–46
 Peppe, Carmine, 597
 Pepys, Samuel, 437, 488
 Percy, Walker, 692
 Pereira, Miguel Serras, 670
 Perelman, S.J., 75, 598, 646–48, 676, 743
 P  rez de Ayala, Ram  n, 45, 621, 648–50, 702, 780, 796
 P  rez de Guzm  n, Fern  n, 794
 P  rez Gald  s, Benito, 165, 515, 915
 Pericles, 573
 periodical essay, 254, 258, 419, 641, 650–51, 653, 683, 701, 804, 810 periodicals, 14, 295, 651–55, 656, 685
 Peroutka, Ferdinand, 377
 Perry, Bliss, 18
 personal essay, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 37, 43, 65, 117, 133, 148, 244, 245, 246, 292, 301, 425, 461, 534, 568, 578, 655–56, 671, 698, 699, 733, 744, 848, 855, 892
 Pessoa, Fernando, 496, 669
 Pestalozzi, Johann Heinrich, 311
 Petkanov, Konstantin, 123
 Petrarch, 179, 192, 257, 422, 876
 Petrowski, Nathalie, 149
 Pezzoni, 823
 Pfemfert, Franz, 273, 890
 Phillips, A.A., 40
 Phillips, Moses, 36
 Phillips, Richard, 168
 Phillips, William, 637, 638
 philosophical essay, 3, 14, 33, 88, 102, 264, 422, 425, 444, 500, 529, 555, 618, 656–58, 667, 694, 718, 735, 746, 751, 783, 793, 821, 860
The Physiology of Taste, 286, 658–59
 Pichler, Karoline, 330
 Pic  n-Salas, Mariano, 198, 384, 659–61, 803
 Pillat, Dinu, 813
 Pilniak, Boris, 903

- Pilon, Jean-Guy, 484
 Piłsudski, Józef, 815
 Pinget, Robert, 868
 Pirandello, Luigi, 702
 Pisarev, Dmitrii, 229, 721
 Pitschel, Theodor Lebrecht, 325, 326
 Planche, Gustave, 703
 Planck, Max, 333
 Plato, 30, 32, 35, 77, 89, 165, 183, 205, 210, 215, 253, 257, 265, 295, 334, 499, 500, 551, 555, 569, 570, 615, 616, 661–63, 663, 678, 694, 752, 765, 796, 832, 897
 Plautus, 203, 397
 Playfair, John, 206
 Pletnev, Piotr, 789
 Plimpton, George, 514, 595
 Pliny, the Younger, 55, 184, 300
 Plutarch, 89, 167, 183, 190, 215, 257, 294, 295, 551, 569, 570, 576, 663–64, 729, 900
 Podhoretz, Norman, 638
 Poe, Edgar Allan, 61, 102, 182, 245, 448, 553
The Poetic Art, 127, 210, 268, 478, 616, 664–65
 polemical essay, 20, 178, 255, 304, 498, 665–66, 674, 681, 722, 744, 860, 904
 Polevoi, Nikolai, 719
 Polivanov, Evgenii, 770
 Pollitt, Katha, 22
 Polo, Marco, 288, 696, 852
 Ponge, Francis, 83, 191
 Poniatowska, Elena, 804
 Pontoppidan, Henrik, 633
 Ponz, Antonio, 440, 795
 Pope, Alexander, 167, 207, 258, 267–70, 283, 411, 433, 478, 609, 616, 759, 817, 820, 833, 880
 Popov, Stefan, 124
 Popper, Leo, 779
 Portal, Magda, 804
 Portor, Laura Spencer, 411
 Potter, Beatrix, 364
 Poulet, Georges, 233
 Pound, Ezra, 20, 301, 356, 489, 490, 631, 637, 642, 671–72, 676, 688
 Powell, Anthony, 845
 Prado Coelho, Eduardo, 669, 670
 Prado Coelho, Jacinto do, 669
 Pratt, E.J., 115, 313
 Praunheim, Rosa von, 264
 preface, 90, 106, 124, 152, 174, 177, 194, 265, 304, 425, 446, 457, 462, 477, 481, 603, 612, 625, 672–73, 676, 687, 693, 729, 733, 739, 765, 812, 815, 820, 854, 862, 868, 873, 919
 Prévost, Abbé Antoine-François, 298
 Prévost-Paradol, Lucien-Anatole, 300
 Prichard, Katharine Susannah, 631
 Priestley, J.B., 103, 112, 275, 673–76
 Prieto, Guillermo, 801

- Primo de Rivera, Pilar, 537
 Prior, Matthew, 271
 Pritchett, V.S., 112, 676–77
 propaganda, 677–80
 Proudhon, P.-J., 171
 Proust, Marcel, 6, 57, 59, 76, 79, 200, 233, 288, 321, 339, 341, 544, 606, 611, 631, 716, 815, 874
 Pryce-Jones, Alan, 845
 Przesmycki, Zenon, 119
 Przychodzen, Janusz, 150
 Psichari, Ernest, 544
 Pufendorf, Samuel, 712
 Pulgar, Hernando del, 794
 Pusey, Edward, 600, 761, 851
 Pushkin, Aleksandr, 73, 92, 341, 422, 680–82, 719, 720, 722, 771, 775, 776, 777, 781, 789, 856, 858
 Pyrrhon of Elis, 215, 657
 Pythagoras, 488
- Qu Yuan, 494
 Quammen, David, 22, 594
The Quarterly Review, 91, 106, 107, 157, 194, 242, 654, 683–84, 700
 Quasimodo, Salvatore, 572
 Queiroz, Eça de, 277, 278
 Queneau, Raymond, 191, 868
 Quentel, Antero de, 669
 Quevedo, Francisco de, 161, 165, 465, 652, 743, 759, 794, 849
 Quiller-Couch, A.T., 845
 Quindlen, Anna, 849
 Quintilian, 184, 257, 758
 Quiroga, Horacio, 540
 Quiroga Santa Cruz, Marcelo, 803
- Raban, Jonathan, 853
 Rabelais, François, 69, 257, 488, 741
 Racine, Jean, 731, 753, 759, 763, 820
 Radishchev, Aleksandr, 718
 Radulescu, I.Heliade, 612
 Rafferty, Terrence, 598
 Rahv, Philip, 637
 Rainer, Yvonne, 264
 Rainov, Nikolai, 123
 Raleigh, Walter, 852
The Rambler, 2, 7, 15, 216, 274, 419, 433, 489, 576, 650, 652, 653, 654, 685–86, 760, 830, 848
 Ramón y Cajal, Santiago, 796
 Ramos, Graciliano, 309
 Ramos, Samuel, 198, 802
 Ramuz, C.-E., 311
 Rangel, Carlos, 710, 803

- Ranke, Leopold von, 331, 366, 686–88
 Ransom, John Crowe, 778
 Raphael, 719
 Rascoe, Burton, 19
 Rauschning, Hermann, 76
 Raymond, Henry J., 375
 Read, Herbert, 112, 688–90, 845
 Reagan, Ronald, 879
 Rebelo, Luís de Sousa, 670
 Recke, Elisa von der, 330
 Redpath, James, 493
 Reed, John, 637, 696
 Reeve, Henry, 242
 Rega Molina, Horacio, 521
 Régio, José, 669
 Reich-Ranicki, Marcel, 333
 Reinhardt, Max, 396
 Reinhold, K.L., 834, 835
 Rej, Mikolaj, 666
 religious essay, 625, 690–93
 Rematar, Roberto Fernández, 710
 Rembrandt, 389
 Remizov, Aleksei, 714, 775
 Renan, Ernest, 42, 98, 118, 300, 438, 544, 550, 693–95, 703, 710, 729, 830
 Renaudot, Théophraste, 651
 reportage, 439, 696–97, 858, 899
 Repplier, Agnes, 19, 20, 37, 275, 412, 697–98, 848
 Resnais, Alain, 263
 Restif de la Bretonne, Nicolas-Edme, 301, 465
 Reuchlin, Johannes, 323
rêverie, 299, 698–99, 713
 review, 18, 106, 171, 425, 448, 476, 583, 600, 618, 622, 631, 647, 652, 674, 680, 699–700, 747, 783, 808, 837, 845, 856, 858, 883, 895, 899, 905
A Revietf of the Affairs of France, 104, 210, 272, 489, 650, 653, 700–01, 848
 Revilla, Manuel de la, 795, 796
Revista de Occidente, 43, 164, 260, 618, 702–03, 823
Revue des Deux Mondes, 118, 300, 693, 703–04, 728, 829
 Rexroth, Kenneth, 689, 704–05
 Reyes, Alfonso, 155, 198, 415, 660, 702, 705–07, 797, 801
 Reymont, Władysław, 120
 Reynolds, Joshua, 419
 Reynolds, Quentin, 647
 Ribera, Jusepe de, 389
 Ricard, François, 149, 150, 484, 485
 Rich, Adrienne, 22, 707–08
 Richards, I.A., 38, 250
 Richardson, Henry Handel, 631
 Richardson, Henry Hobson, 583

- Richardson, Ralph, 862
 Richardson, Samuel, 479, 489
 Richler, Mordecai, 147, 708–10
 Richmond, Bruce, 845
 Richter, Hans Werner, 25
 Richter, Jean Paul Friedrich, 156, 330, 749
 Ridpath, George, 652
 Riffaterre, Michael, 322
 Riis, Jørgen, 744
 Rilke, Rainer Maria, 114, 164, 233, 525, 607, 625, 670, 744, 823
 Rimbaud, Arthur, 191, 449, 670, 739, 815, 815, 837
 Rintoul, Robert, 807
 Ríos, Fernando de los, 780
 Rioux, Marcel, 148
 Ripley, George, 490, 491
 Rivard, Yvon, 149, 150
 Rivarol, Antoine de, 301
 Rivera, Francisco, 660
 Rivera, José Eustasio, 660
 Rivière, Jacques, 338, 606
 Robbe-Grillet, Alain, 10, 57, 134, 725
 Robert of Basevorn, 760
 Roberts, Charles G.D., 144, 511, 886, 887
 Robertson, William, 393
 Robinson, C.Blackett, 886
 Rochefort, Henri, 665
 Rodó, José Enrique, 204, 383, 521, 710–11, 801, 802
 Rodríguez, Richard, 21
 Rodríguez, Simón, 659
 Rodríguez de la Cámara, Juan, 793
 Rodríguez de Magis, María Elena, 804
 Rof Carballo, Juan, 796
 Rojas, Ricardo, 802
 Rolland, Romain, 200, 544, 574
 Rolle, Richard, 550
 Romagnosi, Giandomenico, 163
 Romero, Francisco, 198
 Rommel, Erwin, 696
 Roosevelt, Franklin D., 553
 Roosevelt, Theodore, 879
 Root, John Wellborn, 583
 Roper, Abel, 652
 Roper, William, 89
 Rosa, António Ramos, 670
 Rosenberg, Harold, 21, 638
 Rosenzweig, Franz, 824
 Ross, Harold, 20, 485, 597, 598, 599, 842, 862, 893
 Ross, Julian Maclaren, 191

- Ross, Leonard, 598
 Ross, Robert, 898
 Rossetti, Christina, 559
 Rostand, Jean, 302
 Rosten, Leo, 376
 Roth, Henry, 132
 Roth, Philip, 404, 638, 868
 Rotteck, Karl von, 687
 Roueché, Berton, 853
 Rougemont, Denis de, 165
 Rousseau, Jean-Jacques, 42, 127, 164, 194, 219, 255, 258, 299, 301, 311, 341, 379, 398, 444, 525, 550, 551, 569, 583, 609, 698, 711–14, 718, 746, 759, 798, 809, 846, 894, 904
 Rowe, Richard, 39
 Royce, Josiah, 158
 Rozanov, Vasilii, 229, 714–16, 722, 769, 771, 775, 783
 Rubeanus, Crotus, 324
 Ruddock, Margot, 911
 Ruiz, Raul, 263
 Rumohr, Karl Friedrich von, 659
 Runeberg, Johan Ludwig, 746
 Ruskin, John, 108, 111, 166, 432, 467, 560, 578, 579, 583, 611, 654, 683, 716–17, 778, 897
 Russell, Bertrand, 37, 694, 702, 744
 Russell, George, 243
 Russell, John, 683
 Ruttman, Walter, 263
 Ruyters, André, 605
 Rychner, Max, 311, 333, 334
 Rydberg, Viktor, 448, 746
 Rydkvist, Johan Erik, 745
 Ryleev, Kondratii, 719
- Saaz, Johannes von, 323
 Sabato, Ernesto, 725–26, 823
 Sablé, Madeleine de Souvré, marquise de, 546, 646
 Sachs, Hans, 324
 Sacks, Oliver, 549, 726–28
 Sackville, Charles, 265
 Saco, José Antonio, 799
 Sade, Marquis de, 59, 496
 Said, Edward, 322
 St. John, Henry, 271
 Sainte-Beuve, Charles-Augustin, 118, 194, 219, 278, 296, 300, 306, 533, 570, 641, 693, 694, 703, 728–30, 745, 746, 830, 837, 857, 862, 900
 Saint-Évremond, 296, 297, 730–32
 Saint-Martin, Fernande, 149
 Saintsbury, George, 729, 900
 Saint-Simon, Henri, 390, 438
 Saint-Simon, Louis de Rouvroy, duc de, 341, 737, 763

- Saitō Mokichi, 430
 Sakaguchi Ango, 431
 Sakharov, Andrei D., 311
 Salazar Bondy, Sebastián, 486–87, 803
 Šalda, František Xaver, 101
 Salinas, Pedro, 797
 Salinger, J.D., 598
 Sallo, Denis de, 651, 699
 Sallust, 731
 Saltykov-Shchedrin, 732–33
 Samuels, Arthur, 597
 Sanches, Francisco, 668
 Sanches, Ribeiro, 668
 Sancta Clara, Abraham á, 324
 Sand, George, 280, 438, 525, 547, 703, 830
 Sandburg, Carl, 577
 Sanders, Helke, 264
 Sanders, Scott Russell, 22, 275, 322, 733–34
 Sandoz, Mari, 214
 Sandwell, B.K., 146
 Sanín Cano, Baldomero, 96, 801
 Sannazaro, Jacopo, 192
 Sano Shōeki, 429
 Sansom, William, 191
 Santa Cruz y Espejo, Javier Eugenio de, 798
 Santa María, Pablo de, 794
 Santayana, George, 19, 157, 577, 694, 695, 702, 735–36
 Santō Kyōden, 429
 Santos, Boaventura de Sousa, 670
 Sanz del Río, Julián, 795
 Saraiva, António José, 669, 670
 Sarmento, Jacob de Castro, 668
 Sarmiento, Domingo Faustino, 29, 439, 521, 573, 710, 736–38, 799, 823
 Sarpi, Paolo, 547
 Sarraute, Nathalie, 134, 785
 Sartre, Jean-Paul, 64, 86, 149, 191, 277, 278, 303, 304, 349, 382, 638, 665, 670, 725, 738–41, 813, 880
 satire, 741–42
 satiric essay, 3, 33, 183, 203, 257, 420, 545, 576, 591, 623, 634, 665, 693, 742–43, 756, 758, 760, 766, 793, 794, 795, 849, 879
 Satō Haruo, 430
 Sault, Richard, 652
 Savage, D.S., 637
 Savery, Henry, 39
 Sayers, Dorothy L., 692
 Scalich, Paul, 254
 Scaliger, Julius Caesar, 193
 Scarron, Paul, 301

- Scheler, Max, 200, 260, 608, 616, 702, 915
 Schelling, R. R., 275, 390
 Schelling, Friedrich Wilhelm, 330
 Scherchen, Hermann, 655
 Schickele, René, 890
 Schiller, Friedrich von, 185, 194, 236, 282, 327, 329, 366, 367, 387, 390, 422, 489, 525, 555, 689, 700, 747–49, 749, 834, 835, 895, 901
 Schlegel, August Wilhelm, 35, 170, 329, 330, 700, 749, 808, 834, 835
 Schlegel, Friedrich, 35, 36, 76, 170, 194, 200, 281, 301, 323, 324, 327, 329, 330, 366, 603, 657, 700, 749–50, 834, 835
 Schlegel, Johann Elias, 326, 345, 744
 Schleiermacher, Friedrich Daniel, 35, 330, 367
 Schlosser, Friedrich Christoph, 687
 Schlosser, Johann Georg, 326
 Schlumberger, Jean, 605
 Schmidt, Arno, 333
 Schmidt, Julian, 365
 Schopenhauer, Arthur, 73, 78, 96, 102, 118, 125, 181, 325, 330, 349, 357, 442, 444, 473, 499, 528, 603, 751–53, 776
 Schroder, Rudolf Alexander, 333, 753–54
 Schubart, Christian Friedrich Daniel, 326
 Schubert, Franz, 471
 Schubert, Gotthilf Heinrich, 330
 Schulz, Bruno, 56, 667
 Schumann, Robert, 655
 Schuster, Bernard, 655
 Schwabach, Erik Ernst, 890
 Schwabe, Johann Joachim, 326
 Schwartz, Delmore, 899
 science essay, 14, 206, 291, 754–55
 Scopes, John Thomas, 553
 Scott, Duncan Campbell, 115
 Scott, Walter, 72, 78, 482, 546, 654, 683, 728, 887
 Scudder, Horace Elisha, 37
 Scudéry, Madeleine de, 325, 462
 Seabra, José Augusto, 670
 Sebond, Raymond, 568
 Sebreli, Juan José, 823
 Sedgwick, Ellery, 37, 553
 Sedgwick, Henry Dwight, 37
 Sedley, Charles, 266
 Seghers, Anna, 901
 Segrais, Jean-Regnauld de, 462, 763
 Ségur-Dupeyron, 703
 Sei Shōnagon, 428, 443, 446, 755–57
 Seidler, Luise, 367
 Seixo, Maria Alzira, 670
 Selzer, Richard, 549, 757–58

- Semmler, Clement, 41
 Sena, Jorge de, 669, 670
 Sena, Mécia de, 670
 Senancour, Étienne Pivert de, 90, 699, 703
 Seneca, 24, 49, 55, 137, 179, 183, 184, 192, 220, 257, 269, 295, 296, 478, 551, 569, 576, 656, 743, 752, 758–59, 915
 Senghor, Léopold Sédar, 791
 Serapion Brothers, 771, 903
 Sercy, Charles, 462
 Sérgio, António, 669
 sermon, 14, 187, 189, 252, 576, 599, 602, 677, 753, 759–61, 795, 814, 904
 Serno-Solov'evich, Nikolai, 172
 Serrão, Joel, 669
 Serrés, Michel, 302, 761–63
 Seton, Ernest Thompson, 245
 Sévigné, Madame de, 296, 763–64
 Seward, Anna, 559
 Sextus Empiricus, 657
 Shaftesbury, Earl of, 105, 207, 216, 325, 326, 555, 764–65, 895
 Shakespeare, William, 37, 129, 253, 307, 312, 363, 379, 387, 452, 454, 609, 611, 704, 720, 722, 759, 771, 823, 829, 834, 858, 861, 880, 887, 894, 911
 Shang Qin, 178
 Shaw, George Bernard, 96, 110, 283, 454, 553, 623, 673, 696, 705, 765–67, 820, 823
 Shaw, Irwin, 598
 Shawn, William, 598, 862, 902
 Shcherbatov, Mikhail, 718
 Sheen, Fulton, 761
 Shelley, Percy Bysshe, 106, 210, 233, 413, 515, 559, 669, 679, 689, 749, 767–68, 860, 911
 Sherman, Stuart Pratt, 18, 19
 Sherwood, Margaret, 37
 Shestov, Lev, 229, 423, 714, 715, 722, 768–70
 Shevyrev, S.P., 681
 Shiga Naoya, 430
 Shimazaki Tōson, 430
 Shimer, William Allison, 23
 Shinkei, 429
 Shklovskii, Viktor, 341, 714, 723, 770–73
 Sholokhov, Mikhail, 771
 Shuman, Ik, 597
 Shunzei, 443
 Sidney, Philip, 193, 209–10, 768, 862, 897
 Siemens, Anna, 890
 Sienkiewicz, Henryk, 119, 120, 349
 Sierra, Justo, 402, 800
 Silko, Leslie Marmon, 21, 734
 Silone, Ignazio, 404
 Silva, Agostinho da, 670
 Silva Herzog, Jesús, 198

- Sima Guang, 626
 Sima Qian, 494
 Simard, Jean, 149
 Simmel, Georg, 233, 333, 500, 618, 657, 702, 773–74, 824
 Simon, Claude, 134
 Simpson, John, 848
 Simpson, O.J., 599
 Sinatra, Frank, 848
 Sinclair, May, 91
 Sinclair, Upton, 492, 553
 Siniavskii, Andrei, 714, 723, 774–76
 Siqueiros, David Alfaro, 155
 Sitwell, Osbert, 631
 Skelton, John, 591
 Sladen, Douglas, 39
 Slaveikov, Pencho, 123, 534, 776–77
 Slavov, Atanas, 124
 Slessor, Kenneth, 121, 908
 Smellie, William, 194, 205, 254, 255, 654
 Smith, Adam, 270, 393
 Smith, Alexander, 107, 109
 Smith, Goldwin, 144, 146, 886
 Smith, Page, 491
 Smith, Sydney, 242, 479, 654
 Smith, Thorne, 598
 Smollett, Tobias, 347, 348, 699, 852
 Sneedorff, Jens Schielderup, 744
 Snellman, Johan Vilhelm, 746
 Snyder, Gary, 121
 Sobieski, Jan, 666
 sociological essay, 516, 777–80
 Socrates, 30, 76, 89, 165, 500, 661, 741
 Södergran, Edith, 247
El Sol, 702, 780–81
 Solger, Karl, 749
 Soloukhin, Vladimir, 781–82,
 Solov'ev, Vladimir, 102, 422, 714, 721, 769, 782–84
 Solzhenitsyn, Aleksandr, 113, 389
 Somov, O.M., 719
 Sønnderby, Knud, 784–85
 Sonnenfels, Josef von, 326
 Sontag, Susan, 10, 21, 785–86
 Sophocles, 307, 704
 Sora, Mihai, 813
 Sorbière, Samuel, 265
 Sorel, Georges, 119, 359, 688
 Sørensen, Villy, 744, 786–88
 Soto, Gary, 21

- Soto, Luis Emilio, 521
 Soulié, Frédéric, 280
 Southey, Robert, 106, 187, 459, 683, 788–89, 904
 Souvré, Madeleine de, see Sablé, marquise de
Sovremennik, 67, 73, 171, 732, 789–91, 858
 Soyinka, Wole, i, 601, 791–92
The Spectator (1711–12, 1714), 2, 7, 14, 104, 169, 173, 194, 203, 216, 218, 268, 274, 284, 297, 420, 434, 489, 532, 576, 608, 648, 650, 652, 653, 665, 685, 718, 743, 804–07, 810, 830
The Spectator (1828–), 107, 288, 559, 613, 807–08, 820
 Speed, John, 167
 Speer, Albert, 152
 Spencer, Herbert, 799, 866
 Spender, Stephen, 191, 288, 638, 689
 Spengler, Oswald, 161, 323, 616, 620
 Spenser, Edmund, 312, 379, 631
 Spinoza, Baruch, 34, 76, 96, 499, 607, 730, 759, 769, 829, 843
 Spitteler, Carl, 311
 Sprat, Thomas, 265
 Stadion, Friedrich, 895
 Staël, Madame de, 300, 749, 808–10
 Stafford, Jean, 598
 Stanhope, P. H., 683
 Stankevich, Nikolai, 720, 858
 Stark, Freya, 853
 Starobinski, Jean, 233
 Stead, Christina, 363, 631
 Steele, Richard, 2, 14, 23, 104, 168, 169, 194, 203, 206, 258, 274, 283, 297, 325, 411, 434, 453, 458, 461, 465, 488, 489, 532, 576, 578, 584, 608, 650, 652, 653, 656, 665, 679, 685, 701, 743, 804–07, 810–12, 830, 831, 835, 848
 Steele, Shelby, 22
 Stegner, Wallace, 42, 88, 566, 594, 812–13
 Stein, Gertrude, 83, 251, 321, 489
 Steinbeck, John, 439, 696, 813, 848
 Steinem, Gloria, 22
 Steiner, George, 598
 Steinhart, N., 813–15
 Stempowski, Jerzy, 42, 386, 667, 815–16
 Stendhal, 297, 300, 500, 525, 641, 796
 Stephen, Leslie, 90, 109, m, 116, 816–17, 835, 836, 852
 Stephens, A.G., 40, 363, 632
 Stephensen, P.R., 40
 Sterck van Ringelbergh, Joachim, 254
 Sterling, John, 157
 Sternberg, Dolf, 333
 Sterne, Laurence, 166, 364, 379, 404, 444, 500, 673, 760, 771, 788, 852
 Sternheim, Carl, 890
 Stevens, Wallace, 251, 312
 Stevenson, Adlai, 364

- Stevenson, Robert Louis, 43, 109, 274, 411, 817–19, 852
 Stewart, George R., 813
 Stifter, Adalbert, 366
 Stimson, Henry L., 376
 Stoianov, Zakhari, 123
 Stone, Oliver, 264
 Stoppard, Tom, 862
 Storni, Alfonsina, 804
 Stowe, Harriet Beecher, 36, 790
 Strachey, John St. Loe, 807, 808
 Strachey, Lytton, 90, 110, 116, 289, 298, 819–21
 Strauss, David Friedrich, 248, 603
 Strauss, Richard, 396
 Strehler, Giorgio, 452
 Streicher, Julius, 891
 Strindberg, August, 631, 746
 Strunk, William Jr., 598, 892
 Strunsky, Simeon, 19
 Struve, Petr, 714, 722
 Stuart, Gilbert, 194, 255, 393, 654
 Stuart, Jeb, 78
 Stubbes, Philip, 591
 Sturz, Helferich, 327, 329
 Su Shi, 177, 443, 626, 821–22
 Su Xun, 626, 821
 Su Zhe, 821
 Suarès, André, 76, 302
 Subercaseaux, Benjamin, 803
 Sucre, Guillermo, 660
 Sue, Eugène, 239, 280, 438
 Suetonius, 89, 90, 167
 Suhrkamp, Peter, 311, 594, 595
 Suleri, Sara, 42
 Sullivan, Frank, 598
 Sullivan, Louis, 583
 Sumarokov, Aleksandr, 718
Sur, 97, 521, 611, 725, 823–24
 Susman, Margarete, 824–25
 Sutherland, Alexander, 39
 Suzuki, David, 147
 Suzuki Bokushi, 430
 Svevo, Italo, 572
 Sviatopolk-Mirskii, Dmitrii, 723
 Swedenborg, Emanuel, 96, 563
 Swift, Jonathan, 14, 104, 211, 232, 271, 283, 300, 397, 411, 417, 439, 444, 465, 560, 609, 623, 634, 650, 679, 689, 741, 742, 760, 810, 825–27, 830, 832, 833, 848, 851, 860, 880
 Swinarski, Konrad, 452
 Swinburne, Algernon Charles, 66, 332, 395, 547, 807

- Sybel, Heinrich von, 687
 Synge, John Millington, 676
 Szyborska, Wistawa, 56
- Tacitus, 24, 167, 184, 192, 392, 731, 758, 815
 Taine, Hippolyte, 98, 118, 119, 194, 300, 356, 438, 644, 703, 745, 746, 829–30, 900
 Taiiorescu, Titu, 612
 Taki, 808
 Talese, Gay, 21, 595, 596, 709, 848, 903
 Tamayo, Franz, 802
 Tang Xianzu, 919
 Tanizaki Jun'ichirō, 430
 Tansley, A.G., 593
 Tarde, Alfred de, 543
 Tarkovskii, Andrei, 813
 Tasso, Torquato, 192
 Tate, Allen, 778
The Tatler, 2, 104, 169, 203, 216, 218, 284, 488, 489, 576, 608, 650, 652, 653, 685, 718, 743, 810, 826, 830–32
 Taylor, Bert Leston, 19
 Taylor, Frederick, 490, 492
 Taylor, G.A., 40
 Taylor, Harriet, 561
 Taylor, Jeremy, 105, 760
 Taylor, Theodore, 513
 Teika, 443
 Teilhard de Chardin, Pierre, 471, 692
 Teishi, Empress, 756
 Temple, Shirley, 364
 Temple, Sir William, 3, 576, 593, 826, 832–33
 Tennyson, Alfred, 829, 911
 Teplaikov, Viktor, 681
 Terada Torahiko, 430
 Terborch, Gerard, 385
 Teresa, of Ávila, St., 161, 793, 850
 Teresa de Mier, José Servando, 798
 Terrasse, Jean, 150
 Tertz, Abram, see Siniavskii
 Tessin, Carl Gustaf, 745
Der Deutsche Merkur, 280, 291, 750, 833–35, 894
 Thackeray, William Makepeace, 43, 109, 166, 331, 406, 439, 505, 585, 743, 829, 835–37
 Themistius, 551
 Theophrastus, 167, 168–69, 296, 299, 411, 457, 576, 652
 Théoret, France, 149
 Theroux, Paul, 853
 Thibaudet, Albert, 300, 302, 570, 729, 837–38
 Thierry, Augustin, 692
 Thomas, Dylan, 191

- Thomas, Lewis, 22, 109, 399, 549, 755, 838–39
- Thomasius, Christian, 324, 699
- Thomason, George, 634, 851
- Thompson, Francis, 559
- Thompson, Hunter S., 595, 596, 848
- Thomson, James, 414
- Thoor, Jesse, 375
- Thoreau, Henry David, 17, 36, 43, 78, 88, 116, 167, 224, 2.45, 292, 33i, 453, 475, 489, 495, 503, 576, 582, 583, 593, 656, 839–42, 892, 893
- Thornton, Bonnell, 7, 411, 650
- Thornton, Henry, 851
- Thrale-Piozzi, Hester, 348
- Thucydides, 89, 392, 815
- Thurber, James, 20, 37, 75, 376, 412, 598, 842–43, 893
- Thursfield, James, 845
- Tickell, Thomas, 805, 831
- Tieck, Ludwig, 330, 366, 749
- Tierno Galván, Enrique, 796, 843–44
- Tillich, Paul, 759
- Times Literary Supplement*, 111, 113, 191, 194, 239, 249, 288, 300, 674, 689, 700, 844–46, 906
- Tirso de Molina, 161
- Titian, 379
- Titius, Johann Daniel, 326
- Tiutchev, Fedor, 341, 422, 783, 789
- Tocqueville, Alexis de, 561, 679, 814
- Todorov, Petko, 777
- Tolomei, Claudio, 876
- Tolstoi, Aleksei, 781
- Tolstoi, Lev, 34, 42, 152, 171, 341, 353, 363, 391, 404, 407, 454, 500, 577, 689, 692, 704, 714, 721, 722, 769, 771, 776, 777, 781, 789, 790, 846–48, 858, 907
- Tomlinson, H.M., 577
- topical essay, 186, 848–49, 893
- Torquemada, Antonio de, 794
- Torres, Alexandre Pinheiro, 670
- Torres, Camilo, 798
- Torres, Carlos Arturo, 800, 801
- Torres Villarroel, Diego de, 849–50
- Tournier, Michel, 868
- Townsend, Meredith, 807
- Toynbee, A.J., 161, 201
- tract, 105, 185, 600, 677, 714, 721, 760, 850–52
- Trail, Catharine Parr, 143, 593
- travel essay, 42, 110, 123, 291, 301, 316, 430, 647, 840, 852–53, 865, 905
- treatise, 54, 92, 103, 138, 170, 171, 179, 183, 189, 209, 215, 257, 281, 291, 440, 462, 537, 544, 552, 573, 576, 584, 616, 618, 641, 658, 664, 677, 721, 718, 738, 744, 760, 853–54, 859, 865
- Tree, Herbert Beerbohm, 766
- Treglown, Jeremy, 845
- Treitschke, Heinrich von, 77, 686

- Treut, Monika, 264
 Trevelyan, George, 845
 Trifonov, Yuri, 868
 Trillin, Calvin, 598, 853
 Trilling, Diana, 638
 Trilling, Lionel, 9, 21, 194, 289, 403, 491, 638, 689, 854–55
 Tristan, Flora, 804
 Troeltsch, Ernst, 201
 Trollope, Anthony, 91, 479, 628
 Trollope, Frances, 852
 Trotskii, Leon, 714, 723
 Trottier, Pierre, 149, 855–56
 Trudeau, Pierre Elliott, 148, 149, 484, 872
 Truman, Harry, 879
 Trumbull, John, 15, 411
 Tsvetaeva, Marina, 114, 423, 856–58
 Tu Fu, 704
 Turgenev, Ivan, 67, 98, 171, 228, 425, 471, 720, 789, 790, 848, 858–59
 Turner, Henry Gyles, 39
 Turner, J.M. W., 716
 Turrini, Peter, 333
 Tutchin, John, 652
 Twain, Mark, 17, 18, 37, 88, 214, 376, 406, 421, 439, 454, 492, 503, 704, 741, 743, 842, 848, 852, 859–61
 Tynan, Kenneth, 112, 861–63, 892
 Tyndale, William, 72, 851
 Tynianov, Iurii, 341, 770
- Uchida Roan, 430
 Ugarte, Manuel, 800
 Unamuno, Miguel de, 47, 161, 165, 259, 439, 465, 473, 496, 515, 516, 618, 692, 705, 795, 796, 844, 865–67
 Underwood, Francis, 36
 Undset, Sigrid, 631
 Ungaretti, Giuseppe, 572, 670
 Updike, John, 627, 842, 868–69
 Uranga, Emilio, 802
 Urgoiti, Nicolás MarZa de, 780
 Uslar Pietri, Arturo, 660
 Uspenskii, Gleb, 340
- Vachon, Georges-André, 149
 Vaculík, Ludvík, 871–72
 Vadeboncoeur, Pierre, 148, 149, 471, 484, 872–73
 Valcárel, Luis E., 802
 Valdés, Alfonso, 794
 Valdés, Juan, 794
 Valera, Juan, 45, 795

- Valéry, Paul, 6, 11, 76, 96, 181, 191, 233, 255, 301, 304, 305, 321, 338, 375, 386, 575, 640, 669, 688, 823, 837, 873–75
- Vallières, Pierre, 149
- Van Doren, Carl, 19, 20
- Van Dyke, Henry, 18
- Varaigne, Victor, 280
- Varchi, Benedetto, 875–77
- Varèse, Edgard, 624
- Vargas Llosa, Mário, 199, 439, 803, 804, 868
- Varlin, 311
- Varona, Enrique José, 800
- Varro, 392
- Vasari, Giorgio, 89
- Vasconcelos, José, 521, 802, 877–78
- Vasilev, Iordan, 124
- Vasil'ev, Konstantin, 782
- Vasilev, Vladimir, 123
- Vaughan, Henry, 862
- Vazov, Ivan, 776
- Veblen, Thorstein, 468, 553
- Vega (Carpio), Lope de, 161
- Veintimilla, Ignacio de, 799
- Veit, Dorothea, 330
- Vela, Fernando, 781
- Velichkov, Georgi, 124
- Venevitinov, Dmitrii, 719
- Venturi, Emilie Ashurst, 547
- Vergil, Polydore, 167
- Verhaeren, Émiie, 338
- Verlaine, Paul, 100, 246, 523, 837
- Vermeer, 389
- Verney, Luís António, 668
- Véron, Louis, 703
- Vertov, Dziga, 263
- Vespucci, Amerigo, 696, 852
- Viazemskii, Petr A., 719
- Vico, Giambattista, 30, 163, 393, 616, 687, 809
- Vidal, Gore, 21, 878–80
- Vidocq, Eugéne François, 676
- Vieira, António, 668
- Vigneault, Robert, 150
- Vigny, Alfred, 703
- Villarroel, Diego de Torres, 794
- Villemain, Abel-François, 837
- Villey, Pierre, 257
- Villiers de Plsle Adam, Auguste, 520
- Villon, François, 301, 523, 723, 818, 862
- Vincenz, Stanistaw, 667

- Vinje, Asmund, 745
 Virgil, 307, 753, 815, 831
 Vittorini, Elio, 140
 Vivanco, Luis Felipe, 797
 Vives, Juan Luis, 794
 Vizcardo, Juan Pablo, 798
 Voinovich, Vladimir, 723
 Voloshin, Maximilian, 856
 Voltaire, 57, 63, 90, 98, 140, 148, 194, 258, 270, 287, 295, 297, 298, 367, 393, 398, 439, 477, 52–5, 608, 609, 640, 653, 712, 741, 806, 814, 820, 837, 860, 880–82
 Vonnegut, Kurt, 868
 Voronskii, Aleksandr, 723
 Voss, Johann Heinrich, 327
 Vossius, Isaak, 730
 Vossler, Karl, 161, 333
- Wade, John D., 322
 Wagner, Richard, 61, 93, 333, 471, 528, 594, 603, 751, 765
 Wajda, Andrzej, 452
 Wakefield, Dan, 21
 Wakefield, Edward Gibbon, 807
 Walcott, Derek, 114
 Walden, Herwarth, 273, 490, 890
 Wałęsa, Lech, 56
 Walker, Alice, 21, 42, 577, 883–84
 Walker, Stanley, 597
 Wallace, Alfred Russel, 206, 245
 Wallace, Edgar, 364
 Wallraff, Günter, 333
 Walpole, Horace, 411, 434, 650
 Walpole, Sir Robert, 283, 284
 Walser, Martin, 375
 Walser, Robert, 333, 449
 Walsh, William, 268
 Walton, Izaak, 89, 188–89, 373, 54⁸
 Wang Anshi, 626, 821
 Ward, Artemus, 17
 Ward, Mary Augusta (Mrs. Humphry Ward), 891
 Ward, Ned, 653
 Warner, Charles Dudley, 18, 412
 Warren, Robert Penn, 23, 778
 Warton, Joseph, 7
 Warton, Thomas, 419
 Washington, Booker T., 37, 232
 Wassermann, Jakob, 594
 Wat, Alexander, 56, 667
 Watson, Grant, 40, 363
 Watson, James D., 755

- Watts-Dunton, Theodore, 66
 Waugh, Auberon, 808
 Waugh, Evelyn, 853
 Wayne, John, 222
 Webbe, John, 654
 Weber, Karl Julius, 613
 Weber, Max, 31, 334, 346, 500, 773, 884–86
 Weber, Werner, 325, 333, 334
 Webster, John, 169, 652
 Webster, Noah, 654
 Wedekind, Frank, 6
 Wedgwood, Julia, 807
 Weed, Lawrence, 548
The Week, 144, 886–87
 Weeks, Edward, 37
 Weil, Simone, 86, 160, 302, 364, 375, 389, 563, 692, 761, 785, 813, 815, 887–89
 Weinberg, Gregorio, 198
 Weinberg, Liliana, 198
 Weismann, Gerald, 755
 Weiss, Peter, 10
Die weissen Blätter, 889–91
 Weizsäcker, Carl Friedrich von, 333, 334
 Welles, Orson, 264
 Wells, H.G., 191, 417, 623, 676, 679, 766, 820
 Wells, Ida B., 230
 Wells, Kenneth McNeill, 145
 Wells, Thomas Bucklin, 376
 Welsted, Leonard, 833
 Welty, Eudora, 42, 322, 892
 Wenders, Wim, 263, 264
 Werfel, Franz, 273, 890
 Wergeland, Henrik, 381, 745
 Wesley, John, 416, 437, 512, 761
 Wesley, Samuel, 652
 West, Cornel, 428
 West, Rebecca, 112, 598, 891–92
 West, Richard, 808
 Wetherald, Agnes Ethelwyn, 887
 Wharton, Edith, 233, 845
 Wharton, Thomas, 272
 Whipple, Edwin Percy, 18
 Whistler, James McNeill, 520, 654, 716
 White, E.B., 19, 20, 37, 75, 107, 275, 286, 376, 412, 566, 598, 656, 842, 849, 892–94
 White, Gilbert, 245, 565, 593, 754
 White, Patrick, 121, 400
 White, William Hale, 547
 Whitlock, Richard, 192
 Whitman, Walt, 17, 36, 96, 246, 251, 492, 519, 553, 577, 583, 671, 887

- Whittier, John Greenleaf, 375
 Whitworth, William, 37
 Wieland, Christoph Martin, 280, 325, 326, 327, 328, 345, 833, 894–97
 Wienburg, Ludolf, 331
 Wierzyński, Kazimierz, 668
 Wiesel, Elie, 692
 Wilberforce, Samuel, 684
 Wilde, Oscar, 66, 109, 194, 213, 267, 338, 412, 454, 641, 654, 667, 705, 759, 766, 897–99
 Wiley, Hugh, 597
 Wilkins, John, 95
 Williams, Raymond, 689
 Williams, Tennessee, 879
 Williams, Terry Tempest, 594, 734
 Williams, William Carlos, 20, 251, 255
 Williamson, Henry, 431
 Wilmot, Frank, 632
 Wilson, Edmund, 20, 64, 194, 490, 500, 506, 638, 677, 704, 729, 899–901
 Wilson, Edward O., 22
 Wilson, John, 91, 213, 654
 Wilson, Woodrow, 37, 553
 Winckelmann, Johann Joachim, 393, 749, 895
 Winters, Yvor, 566
 Wirt, William, 15, 16, 411
 Wister, Owen, 812
 Witkacy, see Witkiewicz
 Witkiewicz, Stanislaw, 563, 666, 667
 Wittgenstein, Ludwig, 261, 395, 670, 843
 Wittlin, Józef, 668
 Wodehouse, P.G., 623
 Woepke, Frantz, 830
 Wohmann, Gabriele, 9
 Wolf, Christa, 42, 333, 334, 901–02
 Wolfe, Tom, 21, 376, 485, 514, 595, 596, 848, 902–04
 Wolff, Christian, 324, 325, 397, 444
 Wolff, Kurt, 273, 274
 Wolff, Tobias, 42
 Wollstonecraft, Mary, 248, 559, 627, 646, 904–05
 Wood, Anthony á, 90, 364
 Woolf, Virginia, 42, 43, 104, 106, 107, 110, 111, 132, 157, 160, 165, 191, 222, 267, 289, 300, 343, 399, 404, 412, 500, 537, 559, 566, 568, 570, 580, 611, 656, 675, 676, 707, 779, 807, 816, 845, 883, 905–08
 Woollcott, Alexander, 20, 412, 597, 598, 893
 Wordsworth, Dorothy, 437
 Wordsworth, William, 34, 106, 212, 213, 242, 316, 379, 414, 459, 473, 547, 559, 561, 593, 673, 683, 689, 768, 788, 817, 855, 904, 908
 Wouk, Herman, 879
 Wrench, Evelyn, 808
 Wright, Frank Lloyd, 583

- Wright, Judith, 41, 121, 363, 908–09
 Wright, Richard, 20, 52
 Wulfstan, 760
 Wyatt, Sir Thomas, 121
 Wycherley, William, 831
 Wycliffe, John, 760, 851
 Wyka, Kazimierz, 120, 668
 Wyka, Marta, 667
 Wyspiański, Stanisław, 120
- Xenophon, 89, 696
 Xiao Si, 178
 Xirau, Joaquín, 198, 797
 Xu Wei, 919
 Xun Zi, 494
 Xylander, William, 551
- Yanagisawa Kien, 429
 Yanagita Kunio, 430
 Yasuda Yojurō, 430
 Yeats, W.B., 42, 110, 111, 121, 158, 191, 243, 244, 312, 577, 594, 623, 631, 671, 744, 897, 911–12
 Yokoi Yayū, 429
 Yosano Akiko, 430
 Yoshishige no Yasutane, 428
 Yourcenar, Marguerite, 233
 Yu Guangzhong, 178
 Yuan Hongdao, 178, 912–14, 919, 921
- Zagoskin, Mikhail, 719
 Zambrano, María, 702, 796, 915–17
 Zamiatin, Evgenii, 723, 903
 Zasulich, Vera, 172
 Zea, Leopoldo, 198, 384, 917–18
 Zeami, 429
 Zeleza, Paul, 655
 Zeng Gong, 821
 Zeromski, Stefan, 120
 Zhang Dai, 178, 919–20, 921
 Zhechev, Toncho, 124
 Zheng Yi, 626
 Zhong Xing, 919
 Zhou Zuoren, 178, 498, 920–22
 Zhuang Zi, 494, 822
 Zhukovskii, Vasilii, 719
 Zimmermann, J.G., 895
 Zinov'ev, Aleksandr, 723
 Zola, Émile, 118, 425, 439, 500, 525, 543, 636, 644, 665
 Zólkiewski, Stanisław, 666

Zollinger, Albin, 311
Zoshchenko, Mikhail, 723, 775
Zubiri, Xavier, 796, 843, 922–23
Zulueta, Luis de, 780
Zumeta, César, 800
Zweig, Stefan, 333
Zwicky, Fay. 41
Zwinger, Ann, 594
Zwingli, Ulrich, 324

NOTES ON ADVISERS AND CONTRIBUTORS

Adams, Stephen M. Assistant professor of English, Westfield State College, Massachusetts. Adviser, Honors College, University of Missouri, Columbia. Author of “Some Current Publications” in Restoration: Studies in English Literary Culture, 1660–1700. Essays: Daniel Defoe; The Examiner.

Almeida, Onésimo T. Professor and chair, Department of Portuguese and Brazilian Studies, Brown University, Providence, Rhode Island. Editor of Gávea-Brown, and member of the editorial board of Santa Barbara Portuguese Studies. Author of Mensagem—Uma tentativa de reinterpretação (1987), Açores, açorianos, açorianidade (1989), and of articles in Hispania, Bulletin of Hispanic Studies, ColóquioLetras, Ideologies and Literature, Europe, Revista Brasileira de Filosofia, Revista de Comunicação e Linguagens, CulturaHistória e Filosofia, and other journals. Editor of Lisbon in Manhattan by José Rodrigues Miguéis (1985). Essays: Vergílio Ferreira; Eduardo Lourenço; Portuguese Essay.

Altamiranda, Daniel. Assistant visiting professor, Arizona State University, Tempe. Author of articles in Romanistisches Jahrbuch, Incipit, and Paresedor & Diferentes. Editor of Basta callar by Pedro Calderón de la Barca (1995); coeditor of Literatura española: Una antología (1995). Essays: Eduardo Mallea; Sur.

Alter, Nora M. Assistant professor of German, film, and media studies, University of Florida, Gainesville. Author of Vietnam Protest Theatre: Staging the Television War in the US and Abroad, 1965–1979 (1996) and chapters in books and articles in journals on film, theater, and the essay film. Essay: Essay Film.

Amana, Harry. Associate professor, School of Journalism, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill. Author of articles in the Journalism Quarterly, CLIO Among the Media, and entries in History of the Mass Media in the United States: An Encyclopedia (1977) and American Magazine Journalists, Dictionary of Literary Biography. Essays: James Baldwin; Frederick Douglass.

Amore, Adelaide P. Professor of English and women’s studies and director of English secondary education, Southern Connecticut State University, New Haven. Editor of the book review section, Connecticut English Journal. Author of Models of Teaching English (1981), six articles in The Oxford Companion to Women’s Writing in the United States (1994), two articles in Reference Guide to English Literature (1991), four articles in the journal The Leaflet, and many columns on women’s issues from a feminist point of view for the New Haven Register. Editor of A Woman’s Inner World: Selected Poetry and Prose of Anne Bradstreet (1983) and Oroonoko by Aphra Behn (1987). Essays: Margaret Fuller; S.J.Perelman.

Anderson, Chris. Associate professor of English, Oregon State University, Corvallis. Author, editor, or coeditor of eight books, including Style as Argument: Contemporary American Nonfiction (1987), Literary Nonfiction (1989), Free/Style: A Direct Approach to Writing (1992), and a book of personal essays, Edge Effects: Notes from an Oregon Forest (1993).

Angyal, Andrew J. Professor of English, Elon College, North Carolina. Author of biographies of Loren Eiseley (1983), Lewis Thomas (1989), and Wendell Berry (1995), “Loren Eiseley’s Immense Journey: The Making of a Literary Naturalist” in The Literature of Science (1993), and articles in the CLA Journal, South Carolina Review, Christianity and Literature, Robert Frost Review, and Poe Studies. Essays: Wendell Berry; Loren Eiseley.

Atwan, Robert. Founder and series editor of The Best American Essays. Author of essays and reviews in many national publications, including the New York Times, Los Angeles Times, Atlantic Monthly, National Review, Kenyon Review, and Iowa Review, as well as articles on literature and psychology in Research Communications in Psychology and Psychiatry and Behavior, and critical essays in several published volumes. Editor or coeditor of many college textbooks in composition and literature, including The Harper American Literature (1987), Popular Writing in America (1974), Why We Write, Our Times, and The Writer’s Presence. American editor of Openings: Original Essays by Contemporary Soviet and American Writers (1990). Coeditor of two collections of poetry inspired by the Bible, Chapters into Verse (1993) and Divine Inspiration.

Baker, Janet. Associate professor of English, Saint Mary’s University, Halifax, Nova Scotia. Essay: Archibald MacMechan.

Bardolph, Jacqueline. Professor, University of Nice. Author of Ngugi wa Thiong’o, l’homme et l’œuvre (1991), “Language Is Courage (The Satanic Verses)” in Reading Rushdie: Perspectives on the Fiction of Salman Rushdie, edited by D. M. Fletcher (1994), and 60 articles in various journals, mainly on Nuruddin Farah, V.S. Naipaul, and East African literature. Editor of Short Fiction in the New Literatures in English (1990). Essay: Ngugi wa Thiong’o.

Beasley, Maurine H. Professor of journalism, University of Maryland, College Park. President of the Association for Education in Journalism and Mass Communication, 1993–94. Formerly staff writer, Washington Post. Corresponding editor of Journalism History. Author (with Sheila Gibbons) of Taking Their Place: A Documentary History of Women and Journalism (1993), Eleanor Roosevelt and the Media: A Public Quest for Self-Fulfillment (1987), and White House Press Conferences of Eleanor Roosevelt (1983). Essay: Mary McCarthy.

Bedani, Gino. Head of Italian Department and dean of Faculty of Arts and Social Sciences, University of Wales, Swansea. Italian editor of Romance Studies. Author of Vico Revisited: Orthodoxy, Naturalism and Science in the “Scienza Nuova” (1989), Politics and Ideology in the Italian Workers’ Movement (1995), and articles in Italian Studies, Quinquereme, and Lettera. Editor of and contributor to The Italian Lyric Tradition (1993). Essay: Benedetto Croce.

Beddow, Michael. Professor of German, University of Leeds. Author of Thomas Mann’s Doctor Faustus (1994). Essay: Thomas Mann.

Black, Ronald J. Professor of English, McKendree College, Lebanon, Illinois. Author of an entry on George Meredith in Victorian Prose Writers After 1867, Dictionary of Literary Biography vol. 57 (1987), and articles in the Literary Magazine Review, McKendree Review, American Comparative Literature Association Newsletter, and CEA

Critic. Essay: Mark Twain.

Blinderman, Charles. Professor of English and adjunct professor of biology, Clark University, Worcester, Massachusetts. Author of Biolexicon: A Guide to the Language of Biology (1990), The Piltown Inquest (1987), and articles in the Journal of Popular Culture, Journal of Church and State, Journal of the History of Ideas, and Perspectives in Biology and Medicine. Essay: T.H.Huxley.

Block, Ed, Jr. Associate professor of English, Marquette University, Milwaukee, Wisconsin. Associate editor, 1990–95, and editor, since 1995, Renascence. Author of Rituals of Dis-Integration: Romance and Madness in the Victorian Psychomythic Tale (1993), “Experience, Existence, and Mystery: Biblical Ideas of Justice in Postcolonial Fiction” in Postcolonial Literature and the Biblical Call for Justice, edited by Susan V.Gallagher (1993), and “Gadamer, Christian Tradition, and the Critic” in Renascence (1989). Editor of Critical Essays on John Henry Newman (1992). Essay: Thomas Carlyle.

Bonadeo, Alfredo. Professor emeritus of Italian, University of California, Santa Barbara. Member of the editorial board, Studi Italiani. Author of D’Annunzio and the Great War (1995) and “Guicciardini on War and Conquest” in Il Pensiero Politico 14 (1981). Essay: Francesco Guicciardini.

Borsò, Vittoria. Professor, Romanisches Seminar, Heinrich Heine University, Düsseldorf. Author of Metapher: Erfahrungs- und Erkenntnismittel: Die Wirklichkeitskonstitution im französischen Roman des XIX. Jahrhunderts (1985), Mexiko jenseits der Einsamkeit: Versuch einer interkulturellen Analyse (1994), and many articles in published volumes and journals. Essays: Michel Butor; Madame de Staël.

Brady, Maura. Former instructor and Ph.D. candidate in English literature, University of Iowa, Iowa City. Essay: James Agee.

Bretz, Mary Lee. Professor and chair of Spanish, Rutgers University, New Brunswick, New Jersey. Author of Voices, Silences and Echoes: A Theory of the Essay and the Critical Reception of Naturalism in Spain (1992), Concha Espina (1980), La evolución novelística de Pío Baroja (1979), and articles on 19th- and 20th-century Spanish literature in Anales de la Literatura Española Contemporánea, Hispanic Journal, Symposium, Revista Canadiense de Estudios Hispánicos, and other journals. Essays: Azorín; Ángel Ganivet; Emilia Pardo Bazán.

Brown, Stephen W. Professor of English and master of Champlain College, Trent University, Peterborough, Ontario. Author of a forthcoming biography of William Smellie, and many articles on 17th–20th-century literatures of England, Scotland, and Australia. Editor of a forthcoming collection of 18th-century Scottish essays on literary and scientific topics. Essays: The Adventurer; Biography and the Essay; Critical Essay; Encyclopedias and the Essay; Historical Essay; Periodicals; Satire; Satiric Essay.

Brownley, Martine Watson. Professor of English, Emory University, Atlanta. Author of Clarendon and the Rhetoric of Historical Form (1985). Editor of Two Dialogues by Clarendon (1984), Complete History of England by Tobias Smollett (forthcoming) and coeditor of Mothering the Mind (1984). Essay: Character Sketch.

Brownson, Siobhan Craft. Graduate student in English, University of South Carolina, Columbia. Essay: Cynthia Ozick.

Bruce, Michael. Lecturer, Goldsmiths College, University of London. British editor of the Scriblerian (Temple University, Pennsylvania), 1983–89. Author of articles in The Hanoverian Encyclopedia (1995) and European Bibliography of Resources in English Studies (1995). Essays: An Essay of Dramatic Poesy; An Essay on Criticism.

Buechler, Ralph W. Associate professor of German, University of Nevada, Las Vegas. Author of Science, Satire, and Wit: The Essays of Georg Christoph Lichtenberg (1990) and articles in German Quarterly, Monatshefte, Seminar, Selecta, and other journals. Essays: Aphorism; Hans Magnus Enzensberger; Georg Forster; Treatise.

Burke, John J., Jr. Professor of English and director of English honors, University of Alabama, Tuscaloosa. Author of Signs and Symbols in Chaucer's Poetry (1981), The Unknown Samuel Johnson (1983), Boswell's "Life of Johnson": New Questions, New Answers (1985), Fresh Reflections on Samuel Johnson (1987), New Light on Boswell (1992), and articles in CLIO, Studies in Eighteenth-Century Culture, Philological Quarterly, Studies in the Novel, South Atlantic Review, and the Age of Johnson. Essay: The Rambler.

Bush, William. Professor emeritus of French, University of Western Ontario, London. Member of the editorial advisory board, Twentieth-Century Literature. Author of Souffrance et expiation dans la pensée de Bernanos (1962), L'Angoisse du mystère: Essai sur Bernanos et M. Duine (1966), Genèse et structures d'Un mauvais rêve: Bernanos et "le cercle enchanté" (1982), George Bernanos (1969), Genèse et structures de Sous le soleil de Satan d'après la manuscrit Bodmer (1988). Editor of the critical editions of Sous le soleil de Satan by George Bernanos (1982) and Relation du martyre des seize Carmélites de Compiègne (1993) by Marie de l'Incarnation; editor of the Bernanos section of A Critical Bibliography of French Literature (1980). Essay: Georges Bernanos.

Butrym, Alexander J. Professor emeritus of English, Seton Hall University, South Orange, New Jersey. Editor of Essays on the Essay: Redefining the Genre, 1989.

Carballo, Robert. Associate professor of English and graduate coordinator, Millersville University, Pennsylvania. Author of articles in the Angelus, American Benedictine Review, Faith and Reason, Humanitas, Neohelicon: Acta Comparationis Litterarium. Essay: Matthew Arnold.

Carnall, Geoffrey. Honorary fellow (formerly reader in English literature), Department of English Literature, University of Edinburgh. Author of Robert Southey and His Age (1960) and The Mid-Eighteenth Century (vol. 8 of the Oxford History of English Literature), with John Butt (1979). Essays: The Edinburgh Review; The Quarterly Review.

Chachagua, Federico A. Ph.D. candidate in Latin American culture and literature, University of British Columbia, Vancouver. Author of articles in Alba de America and Confluencia. Essay: José Martí.

Chadbourne, Richard M. Professor emeritus of French, University of Calgary, Alberta. Author of Ernest Renan as an Essayist (1957), Ernest Renan (1968), Charles-Augustin SainteBeuve (1977), "A Puzzling Literary Genre: Comparative Views of the Essay" in Comparative Literature Studies (1983), and articles on various French essayists in Man and Nature, French Literature Series, and PMLA. Essays: French Essay; Marivaux; Michel de Montaigne; Ernest Renan; Charles-Augustin SainteBeuve.

Chance, Linda H. Associate professor of Japanese language and literature, University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia. Author of Formless in Form: Kenkō, Tsurezuregusa, and the Rhetoric of Japanese Fragmentary Prose (1997), and articles in Journal of the American Oriental Society and Journal of Comparative Literature and Aesthetics. Essays: Japanese Essay; Kenkō; Sei Shōnagan.

Chapman, David W. Associate professor of English, Samford University, Birmingham, Alabama. Editor of Alabama English, since 1992; consulting reader of English Journal, since 1992, College Composition and Communication, since 1990, and Journal of Advanced Composition, since 1990. Author of The Power of Writing, with Lynn Waller (1994, revised 1995) and articles in Rhetoric Review, Journal of Advanced Composition, and ADE Bulletin. Essays: Chapter; Moral Essay; George Orwell.

Chittick, Kathryn. Associate professor of English, Trent University, Peterborough, Ontario. Member of the editorial board of English Studies in Canada and the forthcoming Oxford University Press Dickens Companion. Author of The Critical Reception of Charles Dickens, 1833–1841 (1989), Dickens and the 1830s (1990), and articles in Nineteenth-Century Fiction and the Dickensian. Essay: William Makepeace Thackeray.

Classen, Albrecht. Professor of German studies, University of Arizona, Tucson. Editor of Tristania and Synopsis, coeditor of Mediaevistik, and member of the advisory board of Fifteenth Century Studies. Author of Zur Rezeption norditalienischer Kultur des Trecento im Werk Oswalds von Wolkenstein (1987), Utopie und Logos (1990), Autobiographische Lyrik des europäischen Spätmittelalters (1991), The German Volksbuch (1995), and about 120 articles in various journals. Editor of Eroticism and Love in the Middle Ages (1994), Das deutsche Mittelalter in seinen Dichtungen (1994), Canon and Canon Transgression (1993), Women as Protagonists and Poets in the German Middle Ages (1991), and Medieval German Literature (1989). Translator of works by Moriz von Craun (1992) and of Tristans als Mönch (1994). Essays: Jacob Christoph Burckhardt; Ernst Robert Curtius; Robert Musil.

Clowes, Edith W. Professor of Russian and comparative literature and director of the program in comparative literature, Purdue University, West Lafayette, Indiana. Author of Russian Experimental Fiction: Resisting Ideology After Utopia (1993), The Revolution of Moral Consciousness: Nietzsche in Russian Literature (1988), and articles in Slavic and East European Journal, Russian Literature, Russian Review, Critique, Modern Language Journal, and Soviet Studies. Editor of Doctor Zhivago: A Critical Companion (1995), Between Tsar and People: Educated Society and the Quest for Public Identity in Late Imperial Russia (1991), and Maxim Gorky: A Reference Guide (1987). Essays: Fedor Dostoevskii; Aleksandr Herzen.

Connor, William. Associate professor of English and associate dean of arts, University of Alberta, Edmonton. Author of Influential Writing (1995) and Harbrace College Workbook for Canadian Writers (1988, revised edition 1990), and articles in Canadian Literature, Studies in Canadian Literature, World Literature Written in English, and other journals. Contributing editor to The Harbrace Anthology of Literature (1993). Essays: Robert Benchley; Canadian Essay (English); Robertson Davies; Roderick Haig-Brown; Hugh MacLennan.

Cooksey, Thomas L. Associate professor of English and philosophy, Armstrong Atlantic State University, Savannah, Georgia. Author of “The Labyrinth in the Monad: Possible Worlds in Borges and Leibniz” in The Comparatist (1993), “The Central Man of the World: The Victorian Myth of Dante” in Studies in Medievalism (1992), six entries in Encyclopedia of Romanticism (1992), and three entries in Dictionary of Literary Biography vol. 110 (1991). Essays: Discourse on Method; Giacomo Leopardi; Meditations; Plato; Seneca.

Cope, Kevin L. Professor of English and comparative literature, Louisiana State University, Baton Rouge. Editor of the journal 1650–1850: Ideas, Aesthetics, and Inquiries in the Early Modern Era. Author of Criteria of Certainty (1990), Enlightening Allegory (1993), Compendious Conversations (1992), and over 70 articles on the British Restoration and 18th century. Essay: Dialogue.

Crăiutu, Aurelian. Ph.D. candidate, Department of Politics, Princeton University, New Jersey. Adviser to Humanitas publishing house, Bucharest. Author of an article in East European Constitutional Review (1995). Translator into Romanian of Cartesian Meditations by Edmund Husserl. Essay: N.Steinhardt.

Crone, Anna Lisa. Associate professor of Russian language and literature, University of Chicago. Member of the editorial board of Russian Language Journal. Author of Rozanov and the End of Literature (1978), New Studies in Russian Language and Literature (1986), and about 50 articles on many Russian authors. Russian author for World Book Encyclopedia. Essays: Vasilii Rozanov; Lev Shestov; Vladimir Solov'ev.

Crow, Christine. Honorary reader in French, University of St. Andrews, Scotland. Author of Paul Valéry, Consciousness and Nature (1972), Paul Valéry and Maxwell's Demon (1972), Paul Valéry and the Poetry of Voice (1982), Miss X or the Wolf Woman (1990), and articles in French Studies, Modern Languages Review, Forum for French Studies, Bulletin des Études Valéryennes, and Lines Review, as well as in Taking Reality by Surprise, edited by Susan Sellers (1991) and Tea and Leg-Irons: New Feminist Readings from Scotland, edited by Caroline Gonda (1992). Essay: Paul Valéry.

Cuddy-Keane, Melba. Associate professor of English and humanities and Northrop Frye Scholar, University of Toronto at Scarborough. President of the Virginia Woolf Society, 1994–96; member of the associate editorial board of Woolf Studies Annual, since 1994. Author of articles in Contemporary Literature, Cultural Critique, Journal of Modern Literature, PMLA, South Carolina Review, Studies in the Novel, Ambiguous Discourse, edited by Kathy Mezei (1996), Re: Reading, Re: Writing, Re: Teaching Virginia Woolf, edited by Eileen Barrett and Patricia Cramer (1995), Virginia Woolf: Texts and Contexts, edited by Eileen Barrett and Beth Rigel Daugherty (1996), and Encyclopedia of Contemporary Literary Theory, edited by Irene R.Makaryk (1993). Essay: Virginia Woolf.

Daniel, Dalia. Member of the Department of English/Rhetoric, Southern Methodist University, Dallas. Author of two volumes of poetry, Flowers of Being (1976) and Noia (1995), and articles in World Literature Today, Hebrew Studies, and Hebrew Abstracts. Essay: Hannah Arendt.

Darby, David. Assistant professor of German and comparative literature, University of Western Ontario, London. Inaugural editor of Arachné: An Interdisciplinary Journal of Language and Literature. Author of Structures of Disintegration: Narrative Strategies in Elias Canetti's Die Blendung (1992), and articles and reviews in Neophilologus, Modern Austrian Literature, Seminar, Textual Practice, Monatshefte, Études Littéraires, and Literary Research. Editor of a forthcoming anthology of critical essays on Elias Canetti.

Essay: Elias Canetti.

Daugherty, Sarah B. Professor of English, Wichita State University, Kansas. Member of the editorial board of the Henry James Review. Author of The Literary Criticism of Henry James (1981) and articles on Henry James and William Dean Howells in the Henry James Review, Harvard Library Bulletin, American Literary Realism, Dictionary of Literary Biography, and A Companion to Henry James Studies, edited by Daniel M. Fogel (1993). Essays: William Dean Howells; Henry James.

Davidson, Pamela. Lecturer, School of Slavonic and East European Studies, University of London. Member of the editorial board of Harwood Academic Publishers' Studies in Russian and European Literature series. Author of The Poetic Imagination of Vyacheslav Ivanov: A Russian Symbolist's Perception of Dante (1989), Viacheslav Ivanov: A Reference Guide to Literature (1996), and many articles on Ivanov in Oxford Slavonic Papers, Cahiers du Monde Russe, and various published volumes. Essay: Viacheslav Ivanov.

Davies, David R. Assistant professor of journalism, University of Southern Mississippi, Hattiesburg. Essay: A.J. Liebling.

Davis, Duane H. Assistant professor of philosophy, Ball State University, Muncie, Indiana. Author of articles in Merleau-Ponty Vivant, edited by Martin C. Dillon (1991), Journal of the British Society for Phenomenology, and Josephinum Journal of Theology. Editor of The Dehiscence of Responsibility: Merleau-Ponty's Later Thought and Its Practical Implications (1997). Essay: Simone de Beauvoir.

de Paolo, Charles. Professor of English, Manhattan City College, City University of New York. Author of Coleridge's Philosophy of Social Reform (1987) and articles in Encyclopedia of Time (1994) and in CLIO, Theoria, and other journals. Essays: Samuel Taylor Coleridge; Leigh Hunt.

Dierick, Augustinus P. Associate professor and chair, Department of German, University of Toronto. Associate editor of Canadian Journal of Netherlandic Studies. Author of German Expressionist Prose: Theory and Practice (1987), Gottfried Benn and His Critics: Major Interpretations (1992), and articles in Modern Austrian Literature, Neophilologus, Orbis Litterarum, Seminar, Germanic Review, and Mosaic. Essays: Gottfried Benn; Heinrich Mann.

Doebeling, Marion. Assistant professor of German and humanities, Reed College, Portland, Oregon. Author of Theodor Fontane im Gegenlicht (1996) and an article on Fontane in Germanic Review. Essay: Walter Benjamin.

Dowdey, Diane. Associate professor of English and director of composition, Sam Houston State University, Huntsville, Texas. Author of The Researching Reader (1990), Constructing Rhetorical Education (1992), and articles in the Journal of Technical Communication and Markham Review. Essays: Stephen Jay Gould; Science Essay.

Duemer, Joseph. Associate professor of humanities, Clarkson University, Potsdam, New York. Poetry editor of the Wallace Stevens Journal, and associate editor of the journal's poetry series. Author of the poetry collections Customs (1988) and Static (1995), the chapbooks Fool's Paradise (1980) and The Light of Common Day (1985), and poems in American Poetry Review, Iowa Review, Antioch Review, New England Review, Mid-American Review, and Poetry Northwest. Editor of Dog Music (1996). Essay: Ezra Pound.

Dyer, Klay. Ph.D. candidate, University of Ottawa. Author of the introduction to The Untempered Wind by Joanna Ellen Wood (1994), "Passing Time and Present Absence: Looking to the Future in In the Village of Viger" in Canadian Literature (1994), and reviews in the Journal of Canadian Poetry. Essays: Joseph Howe; Peter McArthur; The Week.

Earle, Peter G. Professor emeritus, University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia. Member of the editorial/advisory boards of Hispanic Review, Revista Hispánica Moderna, and formerly of Los Ensayistas and Latin American Literary Review. Author of Unamuno and English Literature (1960), Prophet in the Wilderness: The Works of Ezequiel Martínez Estrada (1971), Historia del ensayo hispanoamericano, with Robert G. Mead, Jr. (1973), Gabriel García Márquez (1981), and many articles in Hispanic Review, Insula, Cuadernos Americanos, Sur, Hispania, Ideas/Imágenes, the encyclopedia Latin American Writers (1989), and A History of Literature in the Caribbean vol. 1 (1994).

Eckley, Wilton. Professor of liberal arts, Colorado School of Mines, Golden. Author of The American Circus (1984), Herbert Hoover (1980), T.S. Stribling (1975), Harriette Arnow (1974), and Guide to e e cummings (1969), and some 40 articles and essays on literature and history in various journals. Essays: Benjamin Franklin; Plutarch.

Egan, Ronald. Professor of Chinese and chair, Program in East Asian Languages and Cultural Studies, University of California, Santa Barbara. Author of Word, Image, and Deed in the Life of Su Shi (1994), The Literary Works of Ou-yang Hsiu (1007–72) (1984), and several articles in the Harvard Journal of Asiatic Studies. Translator of a work by Ouyang Xiu in The Columbia Anthology of Traditional Chinese Literature, edited by Victor Mair (1994). Essay: Ouyang Xiu.

Eichner, Hans. Professor emeritus of German, University of Toronto. Member of the advisory board of Arbitrium, Zeitschrift für Germanistik, and other journals. Author of Thomas Mann: Eine Einführung in sein Werk (1953, revised 1961), Four Modern Authors: Mann—Rilke—Kafka—Brecht (1964), Friedrich Schlegel (1970), and Deutsche Literatur im klassisch-romantischen Zeitalter, 1. Teil (1990). Editor of Kritische Friedrich-Schlegel-Ausgabe, vols. 2–6, 16 (1961–81), "Romantic" and Its Cognates: The European History of a Word (1972.), Ausgewählte Schriften by Johann Georg Hamann (1994), and other volumes. Essay: Athenäum.

Eile, Stanistaw. Senior lecturer in Polish, School of Slavonic and East European Studies, University of London. Author of Modernist Trends in Twentieth-Century Polish Fiction (1996) and articles in New Literary History, Soviet Jewish Affairs, Revue des Études Slaves, and other journals. Essay: Stanisław Brzozowski.

Elorza, Antonio. Professor and chair, Department of the History of Ideas, Universidad Complutense, Madrid. Author of La razón y la sombra: Una lectura política de Ortega y Gasset (1984), La ideología liberal en la Ilustración española (1970), La modernización política de España (1989), and La religione política (1996). Essay: El Sol.

Elsworth, John. Professor of Russian studies, University of Manchester. Author of Andrey Bely (1972.), and Andrey Bely: A Critical Study of the Novels (1983). Essay: Andrei Belyi.

Emig, Rainer. Lecturer, School of English, University of Wales, Cardiff. Author of Modernism in Poetry: Motivations, Structures and Limits (1995). Essay: Cyril Connolly.

Engel, Sandra A. Head of the Humanities Department, Mohawk Valley Community College, Utica, New York. Author of articles in the Journal of Basic Writing, Negative Capability, English Journal, Moving Out, and the St. Petersburg Times. Essay: Edward Hoagland.

Epley, Steven. Assistant professor of English, Samford University, Birmingham, Alabama. Author of several book reviews in Envoi: A Review Journal of Medieval Literature. Essay: Tract.

Evans, Colin. Reader in French, University of Wales, Cardiff. Author of Taine: Essai de biographie intérieure (1975), Language People (1988), and English People (1993). Editor of Developing University English Teaching (1995). Essay: Hippolyte Taine.

Evans, Timothy J. Professor of English, Richard Bland College of the College of William and Mary, Petersburg, Virginia. Contributing bibliographer to CCCC Annual Annotated Bibliography of Composition and Rhetoric. Member of the board of editorial consultants, Victorian Institute Journal. Author of entries on Paul Theroux and Anthony Trollope in the Dictionary of Literary Biography (1979, 1987). Essays: Henry David Thoreau; William Butler Yeats.

Fakundiny, Lydia. Senior lecturer, Department of English, Cornell University, Ithaca, New York. Editor of The Art of the Essay (1991). Author of The Restorationist, Text One: A Collaborative Fiction by Jael B. Juba, with Joyce Elbrecht (1994). Editor of Discoveries, a journal of distinguished student writing from the Cornell writing program. Essays: Autobiographical Essay; Sir William Cornwallis the Younger; Washington Irving.

Farrar, Jennifer. Instructor in Spanish, Kennesaw State University, Georgia. Essay: Rosario Castellanos.

Faulkner, Peter. Reader, University of Exeter. Editor of the Journal of the William Morris Society, since 1987. Author of Modernism (1973), Angus Wilson: Mimic and Moralizer (1983), and Yeats (1987). Editor of Selected Poems of William Morris (1993). Essays: On the Sublime; Leslie Stephen.

Faulkner, Robert K. Professor of political science, Boston College. Member of the board of editors of Polity. Past president of the New England Political Science Association. Author of Francis Bacon and the Project of Progress (1993), Richard Hooker and the Politics of a Christian England (1981), The Jurisprudence of John Marshall (1968), chapters in The End of "Isms"? (1994), The Constitution and Justice (1989), Reason and Republicanism: Thomas Jefferson's Legacy of Liberty (1996), and articles in Political Studies, Interpretation, American Political Science Review, Polity, William and Mary Quarterly, and other journals. Essay: Francis Bacon.

Ferns, John. Professor of English, McMaster University, Hamilton, Ontario. Member of the editorial board of the Hopkins Quarterly. Author of A.J.M. Smith (1979) and Lytton Strachey (1988). Editor, with Brian Crick, of Studies in Literature and the Humanities by George Whalley (1985). Essay: E.K. Brown.

Fletcher, John. Professor of European literature, University of East Anglia, Norwich. General editor of Calder and Boyars publishers' Critical Appraisals Series, 1974–80. Author of The Novels of Samuel Beckett (1964), Claude Simon and Fiction Now (1975), Novel and Reader (1980), and Alain Robbe-Grillet (1983). Essays: Albert Camus; Henry de Montherlant.

Foote, I.P. Formerly university lecturer in Russian, Oxford University; emeritus fellow, Queen's College, Oxford. Joint editor of the Oxford Slavonic Papers, 1972–91, and the Slavonic and East European Review, 1980–90. Author of articles on Saltykov-Shchedrin in Forum for Modern Language Studies, Oxford Slavonic Papers, and Slavonic and East European Review. Editor of Selected Satirical Writings by Saltykov-Shchedrin (1977). Translator of works by Saltykov-Shchedrin, Lermontov, and Tolstoi. Essay: Saltykov-Shchedrin.

Fulton, Richard D. Dean of Faculty, Clark College, Vancouver, Washington. Editor of Victorian Periodicals Reviews. Author of Union List of Victorian Serials (1985) and many articles and reviews. Editor of A British Studies Sampler (1994) and the American Slavery issue of Nineteenth-Century Contexts. Essay: The Spectator.

Gale, Steven H. Endowed chair in the humanities, Kentucky State University, Frankfort. General editor of Garland Publishers' Garland Studies in Humor. Founder and series coeditor, Pinter Review. Author of books and bibliographies on Harold Pinter, S.J. Perelman, and David Mamet, and dozens of articles in books and journals. Editor of Encyclopedia of American Humorists (1988) and Encyclopedia of British Humorists (1995). Essay: The New Yorker.

García Monsivais, Blanca M. Professor, Universidad Autónoma Metropolitana, Iztapalapa, Mexico. Member of the editorial board of Signos and Acciones Textuales. Author of El ensayo mexicano en el siglo XX (1995) and articles in various journals. Essay: Carlos Fuentes.

Garval, Michael D. Assistant professor of French, North Carolina State University, Raleigh. Author of "Balzac's Archival Rival" in Nineteenth Century French Studies and "The Rise and Fall of the Literary Movement in PostRevolutionary France" in Selected Proceedings of the 1993 International Association of Word and Image Studies Conference. Essay: The Physiology of Taste.

Gilfillan, Daniel D. Ph.D. candidate, Department of Germanic Literature, University of Oregon, Eugene. Author of articles in Praxis and the German Quarterly. Essay: Alfred Andersch.

Glenn, Kathleen M. Professor of Romance languages, Wake Forest University, Winston-Salem, North Carolina. Coeditor of Anales de la Literatura Española Contemporánea; member of the editorial board of Letras Peninsulares, and of the advisory board of the Society of Spanish and Spanish-American Studies. Author of The Novelistic Technique of Azorín (1973), Azorín (1981), and articles in Anales de la Literatura Española Contemporánea, Revista de Estudios Hispánicos, Hispanófila, Romance Notes, Letras Peninsulares, Catalan Review, Monographic Review, Romance Languages Annual, and other journals. Essay: Carmen Martín Gaité.

Goetschel, Willi. Associate professor of German, Columbia University, New York. Author of Constituting Critique: Kant's Writing as Critical Praxis, translated by Eric Schwab (1994) and articles in the Germanic Review, Babylon, Telos, Weimarer Beiträge, and in various books. Editor of Perspektiven der Dialogik (1994) and Werke by Hermann Levin Goldschmidt (9 vols., 1993–). Essays: Gotthold Ephraim Lessing; Karl Marx; Moses Mendelssohn; Review; Georg Simmel; Margarete Susman.

Gomes, Miguel. Assistant professor, University of Connecticut, Storrs. Author of El peso de las palabras: Ensayos críticos (1990). Editor of Antología poética de Oswald de Andrade (1988) and the forthcoming Estética del modernismo and Estética hispanoamericana del siglo XIX. Essay: Mariano Picón-Salas.

Gómez-Martínez, José Luis. Research professor of Spanish, University of Georgia, Athens. Editor of Los Ensayistas and Anuario Bibliográfico; member of the editorial board of Concordia: Internationale Zeitschrift für Philosophie, Estudios

Interdisciplinarios de América Latina y el Caribe, South Atlantic Review, and Cuyo: Anuario de Historia de la Filosofía Argentina y Americana. Author of Américo Castro y el origen de los españoles (1975), Teoría del ensayo (1980), Bolivia: Un pueblo en busca de su identidad (1988), Ortega y Gasset y la formación de una conciencia iberoamericana (1996), and over 100 articles in various journals. Essays: Cuadernos Americanos; Eugenio María de Hostos; Leopoldo Zea.

Good, Graham. Professor of English, University of British Columbia, Vancouver. Author of The Observing Self: Rediscovering the Essay (1988).

Greene-Gantzberg, Vivian. Associate professor of Germanic languages, University of Maryland, College Park. Author of Herman Bang og det fremmede (1992) and "Ludvig Holberg and German-Speaking Europe," in Ludvig Holberg: A European Writer, edited by Sven Hakon Rossel (1994). Editor of Udenrigspolitisk journalistik by Herman Bang (1990). Essays: Gunnar Heiberg; Nils Kjær; Per Lange; Scandinavian Essay; Knud Sønderby; Villy Sørensen.

Grevisse, Benoît. Member of the Department of Communications, Catholic University of Louvain, Belgium. Essay: Polemical Essay.

Gutiérrez, Carlos M. Teaches at Arizona State University, Tempe. Author of Dejémonos de cuentos (1994) and "Bibliografía del cervantismo finisecular" in Estudios de Literatura (1995). Essay: José Luis González.

Haddox, John H. Professor of philosophy, University of Texas, El Paso. Member of the editorial board of the Southwestern Journal of Philosophy and the Texas Western Press. Author of Vasconcelos of Mexico: Philosopher and Prophet (1967), Antonio Caso: Philosopher of Mexico (1971), chapters in Religion in Latin American Life and Literature (1980), Integrated Studies (1982), Profit and Responsibility (1985), El APRA y lo ideología a la praxis (1989), and articles in 17 journals. Essays: Alfonso Reyes; George Santayana; José Vasconcelos.

Hagberg, Garry L. Associate professor of philosophy, Bard College, Annandale-on-Hudson, New York. Author of Art as Language: Wittgenstein, Meaning, and Aesthetic Theory (1995), Meaning and Interpretation: Wittgenstein, Henry James, and Literary Knowledge (1994), and articles in Philosophy, British Journal of Aesthetics, Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism, Philosophical Investigations, Journal of Aesthetic Education, Mind, Philosophy and Literature, and other journals in philosophy and aesthetics. Essay: An Essay Concerning Human Understanding.

Hammond, Nicholas. Fellow, Gonville and Caius College and lecturer in French, University of Cambridge. Author of Playing with Truth: Language and the Human Condition in Pascal's Pensées (1994) and several articles on 17th-century French literature. Coeditor of Dissertations contre Corneille by l'Abbé D'Aubignac (1995). Essays: Blaise Pascal; Madame de Sévigné.

Harkins, William E. Professor emeritus of Slavic languages, Columbia University, New York. Author of The Russian Folk Epos in Czech Literature (1951), A Modern Czech Grammar (1953), Karel Čapek (1962), and entries in the Dictionary of Russian Literature (1957). Editor of Anthology of Czech Literature (1953) and of American contributions to the Sixth International Congress of Slavists vol. 2 (1968). Essays: Karel Čapek; Lev Tolstoj; Ludvík Vačulik.

Harman, Mark. Visiting faculty, University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia. Author of articles in the Sewanee Review, Georgia Review, German Quarterly, and newspapers such as the Los Angeles Times, Boston Globe, and Irish Times. Editor of Robert Walser Rediscovered: Stories, Fairy-Tale Plays, and Critical Responses (1985). Translator of Soul of the Age: Selected Letters (1896-1962) by Hermann Hesse (1991). Essay: Heinrich von Kleist.

Harrington, Thomas S. Assistant professor of Spanish, Trinity College, Hartford, Connecticut. Author of The Pedagogy of Nationhood: Concepts of National Identity in the Iberian Peninsula, 1874–1925 (1994) and “Laying the Foundations for an Integrated and Multi-Polar Approach to the Study and Teaching of Peninsular Culture: Labanyi and Graham’s Spanish Cultural Studies: An Introduction” in Siglo XX/Twentieth Century 14, nos. 1–2 (1996). Essays: El Espectador; Revista de Occidente.

Harris, Jane Gary. Professor of Russian, University of Pittsburgh. Member of the editorial boards of Essays in Poetics, Slavic and East European Journal, and other journals. Author of Osip Mandelstam (1988) and Autobiographical Statements in 20th-century Russian Literature (1990). Editor and cotranslator of The Complete Critical Prose and Letters by Mandel’shtam, 1979 (as The Collected Critical Prose and Letters, 1991). Essay: Osip Mandel’shtam.

Haskell, Dale E. Associate professor of English, Southeast Missouri State University, Cape Girardeau. Director, Southeast Missouri Writing Project. Associate editor of Cape Rock. Author of articles in English Journal and Missouri English Bulletin, and poetry in Aethlon, Kentucky Poetry Review, Wisconsin Review, Rectangle, Cape Rock, and other journals. Essays: M.F.K.Fisher; E.B.White.

Hassler, Donald M. Professor of English, Kent State University, Ohio. Editor of Extrapolation, since 1990. Author of Erasmus Darwin (1974), Comic Tones in Science Fiction (1982), Patterns of the Fantastic (1983), Hal Clement (1982), Death and the Serpent (1985), and Isaac Asimov (1991). Editor of The Letters of Arthur Machen and Montgomery Evans (1993). Essays: Letter; Lionel Trilling.

Hawkins-Dady, Mark. Freelance editor and writer. Author of articles on drama and the performing arts in New Theatre Quarterly, John Osborne: A Casebook, edited by Patricia Denison (1997), and various reference books. Editor of the International Dictionary of Theatre vols. 1–2 (1992–94) and Reader’s Guide to Literature in English (1996). Essay: Kenneth Tynan.

Henderson, Heather. Associate professor of English, Mount Holyoke College, South Hadley, Massachusetts. Book review editor of the Dickens Quarterly, 1991–94; trustee of the Dickens Society, 1993–95. Author of The Victorian Self: Autobiography and Biblical Narrative (1989), “The Travel Writer and the Text” in Temperamental Journeys: Essays on the Modern Literature of Travel (1992), and articles in the African Literature Association Bulletin, Cynos, New Orleans Review, Victorians Institute Journal, Publishing History, and other journals. Coeditor of the Victorian section of the HarperCollins Anthology of British Literature (1997). Essay: Travel Essay.

Hendon, Paul. Lecturer, University of Exeter. Essay: W.H. Auden.

Hergenhan, Laurie. Professor of Australian literature, University of Queensland, Brisbane. Series editor of the University of Queensland Press Australian Authors series. Editor of Australian Literary Studies, since 1963. Author of Unnatural Lives: Studies in Australian Fiction About the Convicts (1983), No Casual Traveller: C.Hartley Grattan and Australia—U.S. Connections (1995), and numerous articles on English and particularly Australian literature in various journals. Editor of A Colonial City: High and Low Life: Selected Journalism by Marcus Clarke (1972), Penguin Literary History of Australia (1988), The ALS Guide to Australian Writers, with others (1993), and Changing Places: Australian Writers in Europe, 1960-1990, with Irmtraud Petersson (1994). Essay: Marcus Clarke.

Heseltine, Harry. Formerly rector and professor of English, Australian Defence Force Academy, University of New South Wales, Canberra. Author of The Uncertain Self: Essays in Literature and Criticism (1986), Annals of Australian Literature, with Joy Hooton (2nd edition 1992), and other books on Australian literature. Editor of The Penguin Book of Australian Verse (1972) and The Penguin Book of Australian Short Stories (1976). Essay: Australian Essay.

Hesse, Douglas. Professor of English, Illinois State University, Normal. Editor of WPA: Writing Program Administration. Author of chapters in Literary Nonfiction, edited by Chris Anderson (1989), Essays on the Essay: Redefining the Genre, edited by Alexander J. Butrym (1989), Narrative as Argument, Rebirth of Rhetoric (1992), Short Story Theory at a Crossroads (1989), Writing Theory and Critical Theory (1994), and articles in the Journal of Advanced Composition, Rhetoric Review, College Composition and Communication, and English Journal. Essay: British Essay.

Heyer, Astrid. Part-time faculty member, Department of French, University of Western Ontario, London. Author of articles on Georges Bernanos in the Chesterton Review, Revue des Lettres Modernes, Renascence, and of a chapter in A Critical Bibliography of French Literature: The Nineteenth Century, edited by David Baguley (1994). Translator of articles by William Bush, Kathryn Brush, and Wolfgang Kemp. Essay: Henri Massis.

Hinchcliffe, Peter. Associate professor, St. Jerome's College, University of Waterloo, Ontario. Fiction editor of the New Quarterly. Author of articles in the University of Toronto Quarterly, Journal of Canadian Fiction, English Studies in Canada, and Profiles in Canadian Literature. Essay: Robert Louis Stevenson.

Hinchcliffe, Darrell. Lecturer in literature, Staffordshire University, Stoke-on-Trent. Essay: Thomas Nashe.

Holman, Petr. Professor, Institute of Czech Literature, Academy of Sciences, Prague. Author of two books about Otokar Březina (1992, 1993). Editor of a collection of essays by Březina (1996) as well as other documents. Essay: Otokar Březina.

Holmes, John R. Associate professor of English, Franciscan University of Steubenville, Ohio. Author of articles in Early American Literature and Studia Mystica. Editor of the forthcoming Letters of Charles Brockden Brown. Essays: The Anatomy of Melancholy; Cicero; Thomas Merton; The Poetic Art.

Holý, Jiří. Scientific worker, Institute of Czech Literature, Academy of Sciences, Prague. Author of five books on Czech literature and writers. Essay: Václav Havel.

Horowitz, Brian. Assistant professor of Russian, University of Nebraska, Lincoln. Book review editor of Soviet Post-Soviet. Author of The Myth of Alexander Pushkin in Russia's Silver Age (1996) and articles on Mikhail Gershenzon and book reviews in various journals. Essays: Mikhail Gershenzon; Russian Essay.

Howells, Bernard. Lecturer in French, King's College, London. Author of articles in French Studies, Romanic Review, Revista di Letterature Moderne e Comparate, Études Baudelairiennes, and chapters in Écrire la peinture (1991) and Ideology and Religion (1989). Essay: Charles Baudelaire.

Hunt, Alina C. Lecturer, University of North Carolina, Greensboro. Author of "Toward an Unfinalizable Dialogue: Robert Musil's Essayism and Bakhtinian Dialogism" in College Literature (May 1995), "Robert Musil's Utopian Essayism: An Unresolvable Dialectics" in MIFLC Review (March 1995), and "Nineteenth-Century Utopian Visions and the Arcades of Paris" in Constructions (1990). Essay: Philosophical Essay.

Ives, Maura. Associate professor of English, Texas A&M University, College Station. Author of George Meredith's Essay on Comedy and Other New Quarterly Magazine Publications (1997), an entry on Meredith in the Encyclopedia of British Humorists, edited by Steven H. Gale (1995), and articles in Literature in the Marketplace (1995), Keeping the Victorian House (1995), and the journals Studies in Bibliography and Papers of the Bibliographical Society of America. Essay: An Essay on Comedy.

Jackson, Gregory S. Lecturer, Department of English, University of California, Los Angeles. Author of various articles on 18th- and 19th-century British and American literature and culture. Essays: Charles Darwin; Erasmus; Literary Theory and the Essay.

Janowski, Zbigniew. Ph.D. candidate, Committee on Social Thought, University of Chicago. Coeditor of the Philosophy Plus series for Pero Publishing House, Sofia, Bulgaria. Author of several book reviews and of articles in Kultura, Arka, and Panorama. Essays: Julien Benda; Boy-Żelenski; Leszek Kotakowski.

Jones, Gloria Godfrey. Assistant professor of English, Winthrop University, Rock Hill, South Carolina. Author of articles in the Explicator and CEA Critic, and in Language Variation in North America, edited by Wayne Glowka and Donald Lance (1993). Essay: Gore Vidal.

Jonson, Jep C. Graduate student in English, University of South Carolina, Columbia. Editorial assistant of Studies in Scottish Literature. Author of an entry on John Watson (Ian Maclaren) in the Dictionary of Literary Biography vol. 156 (1996) and an article on Robert Burns in Studies in Scottish Literature. Essay: John Eglinton.

Julian, Linda A. Associate professor of English and chair of the Department of English, Furman University, Greenville, South Carolina. Author of Strategies for Teaching Writing (4th edition, 1996), "The Impact of Icelandic Sagas on the Socialist Aesthetics of William Morris" in Pre-Raphaelite Art in Its European Context, edited by Susan Casteras and Alicia Faxon (1995), and entries on Mary Louisa Molesworth and G.S. Street in British Short Fiction Writers, 1880-1914, edited by William B. Thesing, Dictionary of Literary Biography vol. 135 (1994). Essays: Charles Dickens; William Morris.

Kadarkay, Arpad. Professor of political theory, University of Puget Sound, Tacoma, Washington. Author of George Lukács: Life, Thought and Politics (1991) and Human Rights in American and Russian Political Thought (1982.). Editor and translator of The Lukács Reader (1995). Essay: Georg Lukács.

Karcz, Andrzej. Ph.D. candidate, Department of Slavic languages and literature, and lecturer and language instructor in Russian and Polish, University of Chicago. Author of articles in the Polish Review and various Polish journals. Essay: Zbigniew Herbert.

Katra, William H. Faculty member, University of Wisconsin, Eau Claire. Author of “Contorno”: An Argentine Journal of Literature and Politics (1987), Sarmiento: Public Writer (Between 1839 and 1852) (1985), Sarmiento de frente y perfil (1993), and The Argentine Generation of 1837: Echeverría, Alberdi, Sarmiento, Mitre (1995). Essay: Domingo Faustino Sarmiento.

Kauffmann, R.Lane. Associate professor of Spanish and humanities, Rice University, Houston. Member of the editorial board of Transculture. Author of articles in Essays on the Essay: Redefining the Genre, edited by Alexander J. Butrym (1989), The Interpretation of Dialogue, edited by Tullio Maranhão (1990), and Divergendas y unidad: Perspectivas sobre la generación del 98 y Antonio Machado, edited by John P. Gabriele (1990), in various conference proceedings, and in the journals Diogenes, Diacritics, L'Esprit Créateur, Philological Quarterly, Telos, Inti: Revista de Literatura Hispánica, and the New Scholar. Essay: José Ortega y Gasset.

Keely, Karen A. Teaching fellow and Ph.D. candidate, Department of English, University of California, Los Angeles. Editorial assistant of Signs: Journal of Women in Culture and Society, 1990–91. Essays: The American Scholar; The Georgia Review.

Kehlen, John Pavel. Ph.D. candidate, Committee on Social Thought, University of Chicago; has also taught several courses on Japanese and Chinese literature. Essay: Kamo no Chomei.

Keller, Arnold. Associate professor and director of the writing program, University of Victoria, British Columbia. Member of the review board of McGill Journal of Education. Author of When Machines Teach (1987), English Simplified (latest edition 1995), and articles in McGill Journal of Education and Computers and Education. Essay: Mordecai Richler.

Kelly, Gary. Professor of English, Keele University, Staffordshire. Author of The English Jacobin Novel, 1780–1805 (1976), English Fiction of the Romantic Period, 1789–1830 (1989), Revolutionary Feminism: The Mind and Career of Mary Wollstonecraft (1991), and Women, Writing, and Revolution, 1790–1827 (1991). General editor, Longman's History of Women's Writing in English. Essay: Mary Russell Mitford.

Kelsall, Malcolm. Professor of English, University of Wales, Cardiff. Advisory editor of the Byron Journal. Author of Christopher Marlowe (1981), Congreve (1981), Studying Drama (1985), Byron's Politics (1987), and The Great Good Place: The Country House and English Literature (1992). Editor of Encyclopedia of Literature and Criticism (1990). Essay: Joseph Addison.

Ker, Ian. Tutor, Campion Hall, and member of the theology faculty, Oxford University; dean of graduate research, Maryvale Institute, Birmingham. Author of John Henry Newman: A Biography (1988) and The Achievement of John Henry Newman (1990). Editor of The Idea of a University by Newman (1976). Essay: John Henry Newman.

Ketchian, Sonia I. Research fellow, Harvard University Russian Research Center, Cambridge, Massachusetts. Author of The Poetry of Anna Akhmatova: A Conquest of Time and Space (1986) and The Poetic Craft of Bella Akhmadulina (1993). Editor of Anna Akhmatova, 1889–1989 (1993), Studies in Russian Literature in Honor of Vsevolod Setchkarev, with Julian W. Connolly (1986), and In the Shadow of the Fortress: The Genocide Remembered by Bertha Nakshian Ketchian (1988). Essay: Aleksandr Pushkin.

Kieser, Rolf. Professor, City University of New York. Author of Englands Appeasementpolitik und der Aufstieg des Dritten Reiches im Spiegel der britischen Presse (1933–1939) (1964), New Functional German, with Max Kirch (1967), Max Frisch: Das literarische Tagebuch (1975), Erzwungene Symbiose: Thomas Mann, Robert Musil, Georg Kaiser und Bertolt Brecht im Schweizer Exil (1984), Olga Plimacher-Hunerwadel: Eine vergessene Lenzburger Philosophin (1990), and Benjamin Franklin Wedekind: Biographie einer Jugend (1990). Editor of Novels, Plays, Essays by Max Frisch (1989). Essay: Max Frisch.

Kline, George L. Milton C.Nahm Professor Emeritus of Philosophy, Bryn Mawr College, Pennsylvania. Past president of the Hegel Society of America and the Metaphysical Society of America. Consulting editor of the Journal of the History of Ideas, Studies in East European Thought (formerly Studies in Soviet Thought), and Russian Studies in Philosophy (formerly Soviet Studies in Philosophy). Author of Spinoza in Soviet Philosophy (1952) and Religious and Anti-Religious Thought in Russia (1968). Coeditor of and contributor to Russian Philosophy (3 vols., 1965). Translator of A History of Russian Philosophy by V.V.Zenkovsky (2 vols., 1953) and Selected Poems by Joseph Brodsky (1973). Essay: Konstantin Leont'ev.

Knapp, Gerhard P. Professor of German and comparative literature, University of Utah, Salt Lake City. Member of the editorial board of Amsterdamer Beiträge zur neueren Germanistik, since 1993. Published extensively on 19th- and 20th-century German and comparative literature, philosophy, and sociology. Author and coauthor of 17 books, including The Art of Living: Erich Fromm's Life and Works (1989) and Friedrich Dürrenmatt (1993), and 60 articles and 118 reviews/critiques. Editor and coeditor of 12, anthologies and critical editions. Essay: Friedrich Dürrenmatt.

Koepke, Wulf. Formerly distinguished professor of German, Texas A&M University, College Station. Coeditor of Exilforschung and Herder Yearbook. President of the International J.G.Herder Society, 1985–90. Author of Erfolglosigkeit (1977), Lion Feuchtwanger (1983), Johann Gottfried Herder (1987), and Understanding Max Frisch (1990). Editor of J.G.Herder: Innovator Through the Ages (1984). Essays: Johann Gottfried Herder; Ricarda Huch.

Koppisch, Michael S. Professor of French and chair, Department of Romance and Classical Languages, Michigan State University, East Lansing. Member of the editorial advisory committee of Studies in Early Modern France. Author of The Dissolution of Character: Changing Perspectives in La Bruyère's Caracteres (1981) and articles in Seventeenth-Century French Literature. Coeditor of Approaches to Teaching Molière's Tartuffe and Other Plays (1995). Essay: Jean de La Bruyère.

Koziowski, Krzysztof. Ph.D.candidate, Zaktad Teatru i Filmu, Poznań, Poland. Author of article in Czytanie Herberta (1995). Essay: Jerzy Stempowski.

Kuharski, Allen J. Assistant professor of theater studies, Swarthmore College, Pennsylvania. Founding associate editor of Periphery: Journal of Polish Affairs, since 1994; performance review editor of Theatre Journal, since 1995. Author of articles in Themes in Drama, San Francisco Review of Books, Theatre Journal, Dialog, The Theatre in Poland/Le Théâtre en Pologne, 2B: Polish American Academic Quarterly, New Theatre Quarterly, Yale/Theater, and Periphery. Essay: Jan Kott.

Kuist, James M. Professor of English, University of Wisconsin, Milwaukee. Author of

The Nichols File of The Gentleman's Magazine (1982), The Works of John Nichols (1970), and articles in PMLA, Studies in Bibliography, and the South Atlantic Quarterly. Editor of Cursory Observations on the Poems Attributed to Rowley by Edmond Malone (1968). Essays: The Idler; Periodical Essay; A Review of the Affairs of France; Earl of Shaftesbury.

Larkin, Edward T. Associate professor of German, University of New Hampshire, Durham. Author of War in Goethe's Writings: Representation and Assessment (1992) and articles in Unterrichtspraxis, Michigan Germanic Studies, and the Dictionary of Literary Biography. Essay: Johann Gottlieb Fichte.

Lazar, David. Associate professor and director of creative writing, Ohio University, Athens. Associate editor of the Ohio Review. Author of articles in the Southwest Review, Denver Quarterly, Quarterly West, Seattle Review, Aperture, Mississippi Valley Review, and other journals. Editor of Conversations with M.E.K.Fisher (1992). Essays: Hubert Butler; Natalia Ginzburg; Primo Levi.

Levi, Anthony. Formerly Buchanan Professor of French Language and Literature, University of St. Andrews, Scotland. Author of the Guide to French Literature (2 vols., 1992–94) and several other books on French literature. Editor of Humanism in France at the End of the Middle Ages and in the Early Renaissance (1970) and critical editions of In Praise of Folly by Erasmus (1971) and Pensees and Other Writings by Pascal (1995). Essays: Ferdinand Brunetière; Feuilleton; Bernard de Fontenelle; André Gide; Journal des Débats; La Rochefoucauld; Maxim; Meditation; Nouvelle Revue Française; Charles Peguy; Pensée; Rêverie; Revue des Deux Mondes; Jean-Jacques Rousseau; Albert Thibaudet.

Lits, Marc. Professor, Department of Communication, University of Louvain, Belgium. Author of L'Essai (1994), Le Roi est mort: Emotion et médias (1994), La Peur, la mort et les médias (1993), Le Roman policier (1993), and Pour lire le roman policier (1989). Essays: Roland Barthes; E.M.Cioran; Umberto Eco.

Livingston, Donald W. Professor of philosophy, Emory University, Atlanta. Author of Hume's Philosophy of Common Life (1984). Editor of Liberty in Hume's History of England, with Nicholas Copredi (1990) and David Hume, Philosopher of Society, Politics, and History, with Marie Martin (1991). Essay: David Hume.

Lloyd, Rosemary. Professor of French, Indiana University, Bloomington. Author of Baudelaire et Hoffmann (1979), The Land of Lost Content (1992), and Closer and Closer Apart (1995). Editor of the Literary Criticism (1981), Letters (1986), and Prose Poems and La Fanfarlo (1991) by Charles Baudelaire, Poésies (1984) and Letters (1988) by Stéphane Mallarmé, Madame Bovary by Gustave Flaubert (1990), and Master Pipers by George Sand (1994). Essays: Remy de Gourmont; Stéphane Mallarmé.

Lonergan, Jennifer. Teacher of English language and literature. Author of six entries in the forthcoming Reference Guide to Russian Literature and three entries in the forthcoming Peoples of Evasion. Essay: Nikolai Chernyshevskii.

Lopate, Phillip. Adams Professor of English, Hofstra University, Hempstead, New York. Juror for the Pulitzer Prize, National Book Award, and Association of Writing Programs contest. Editor of The Art of the Personal Essay anthology (1994). Author of two volumes of essays, Bachelorhood (1981) and Against Joie de Vivre (1989), the memoir Being with Children (1975), two novels, Confessions of Summer (1979) and The Rug Merchant (1987), and the poetry collection The Daily Round (1976).

Lorenzo-Rivero, Luis. Professor of Spanish, Portuguese, and comparative literature, University of Utah, Salt Lake City. Author of Larra: Técnicas y perspectivas (1988), Estudios literarios sobre Mariano J.de Larra (1986), Larra: Lengua y estilo (1977), Estudios de literatura española moderna (1976), Larra y Sarmiento (1968), and various articles. Editor of Macías by Mariano José de Larra (1990). Essay: Mariano José de Larra.

Lounsberry, Barbara. Professor of English, University of Northern Iowa, Cedar Falls. Author of The Writer in You (1992) and The Art of Fact: Contemporary Artists of Nonfiction (1990). Editor of Writing Creative Nonfiction: The Literature of Reality, with Gay Talese (1995). Essays: Joan Didion; Oliver Wendell Holmes; Norman Mailer; New Journalism; Tom Wolfe.

Lynn, Steven. Professor and director of freshman English, University of South Carolina, Columbia. Author of Samuel Johnson After Deconstruction (1992), Texts and Contexts (1994), and articles in Eighteenth-century Studies, College English, and Age of Johnson. Essay: Samuel Johnson.

McCarthy, John A. Professor of German and comparative literature, Vanderbilt University, Nashville, Tennessee. Editorial board member and reader for the Lessing Yearbook, Goethe Yearbook of North America, Seminar, Studies in 18th-century Culture, Eighteenth-century Studies, German Quarterly, and Internationale Forschungen zur Allgemeinen & Vergleichenden Literaturwissenschaft. Author of Crossing Boundaries: A History and Theory of Essay Writing in Germany, 1680–1815 (1989), Christoph Martin Wieland: Epoche—Werk—Wirking, with others (1994), Christoph Martin Wieland (1979), “Wieland as Essayist” in Lessing Yearbook 8 (1976), “The Philosopher as Essayist: Leibniz and Kant” in The Philosopher as Writer, edited by R.Ginsburg (1987), “Reviewing Nation: The Review and the Concept of Nation” in The 18th-century German Book Review, edited by H.Rowland and K.J.Fink (1995), “Rewriting the Role of the Author: On the 18th Century as the Age of the Author” in Leipziger Jahrbuch für Geschichte des Buchwesens 5 (1995), and numerous other essays on German literature and comparative literature. Essays: German Essay; Friedrich Nietzsche.

McClintick, Christopher P. Teaches at Vanderbilt University, Nashville, Tennessee. Author of articles in Seminar, Michigan Germanic Studies, and the collection The Future of German Studies in North America. Essays: Die Akzente; Die Fackel; Die Grenzboten; Die neue Rundschau.

McCrea, Brian. Professor of English, University of Florida, Gainesville. Member of the editorial board of the South Atlantic Review. Author of Henry Fielding and the Politics of Mid-Eighteenth-century England (1981), Addison and Steele Are Dead: The English Department, Its Canon, and the Professionalization of Literary Criticism (1990), and College Writing (1985). Essays: Henry Fielding; Richard Steele.

McCulloch, Margery Palmer. Lecturer in Scottish literature, University of Glasgow. Author of The Novels of Neil M.Gunn: A Critical Study (1987), Edwin Muir: Poet, Critic and Novelist (1993), chapters in History of Scottish Literature (1987), Byron and Scotland (1989), Edwin Muir: Centenary Assessments (1990), Études Ecossoises (1992), and Scotland and the Slavs (1993), and articles in Studies in Scottish Literature, Scottish Literary Journal, English Review, Cencrastus, Chapman, Modern Language Review, Pen

- International, Studies in Hogg and His World*, and other journals. Editor of The Man Who Came Back: Essays and Short Stories by Neil M. Gunn (1991). Essay: Edwin Muir.
- McDonagh, Josephine. Lecturer in English, Birkbeck College, University of London. Author of De Quincey's Disciplines (1994). Coeditor of Political Gender: Texts and Contexts (1994). Essays: Thomas De Quincey; George Eliot.
- McGhee, Richard D. Dean, College of Arts and Sciences, Arkansas State University. Author of Guilty Pleasures: William Wordsworth's Poetry of Psychoanalysis (1993), John Wayne: Actor, Artist, Hero (1990), Henry Kirke White (1981), and Marriage, Duty and Desire in Victorian Poetry and Drama (1980). Essays: An Essay on the Principle of Population; John Stuart Mill.
- McKenzie, Alan T. Professor of English, Purdue University, West Lafayette, Indiana. Author of Certain, Lively Episodes: The Articulation of Passion in Augustan Prose (1990), Sent as a Gift: Eight Correspondences from the Eighteenth Century (1993), an entry on the Earl of Chesterfield in British Prose Writers, 1660–1800, Second Series, edited by Donald T. Siebert, Dictionary of Literary Biography vol. 104 (1991), and articles in Eighteenth-Century Studies, The Eighteenth Century: Theory and Interpretation, Georgia Review, Harvard Library Bulletin, and 1650–1850: Ideas, Aesthetics, and Inquiries in the Early Modern Era, among other places. Essays: Earl of Chesterfield; The Spectator.
- Mackervoy, Susan. Freelance writer and translator, London. Essay: Friedrich von Schiller.
- McLaren, John. Professor of humanities, Victoria University of Technology, Footscray, Australia. Editor of Overland literary magazine, since 1993, and Australian Book Review, 1978–86. Author of Writing in Hope and Fear (1996), New Pacific Literatures (1993), and Australian Literature: An Historical Introduction (1989). Essay: Dorothy Green.
- Maharg, James. Associate professor of Spanish and Portuguese, University of Illinois, Chicago. Author of A Call to Authenticity: The Essays of Ezequiel Martínez Estrada (1977), Los primeros modernistas (1983), José Ortega y Gasset (1992), and articles in Revista de Occidente, Cuadernos Hispanoamericanos, Luso-Brazilian Review, and Bulletin of Hispanic Studies. Essay: Ezequiel Martínez Estrada.
- Mahoney, John L. Thomas F. Rattigan Professor of English, Boston College. Author of The Logic of Passion: The Literary Criticism of William Hazlitt (1981), The Whole Internal Universe: Imitation and the New Defense of Poetry in British Criticism, 1660–1830 (1986), and articles in the Wordsworth Circle, European Romantic Review, and British Journal of Aesthetics. Coeditor of Coleridge, Keats, and the Imagination (1990). Essay: William Hazlitt.
- Mailhot, Laurent. Professor, Department of French studies, University of Montreal. Editor of Études Françaises, 1979–87; member of the editorial board of the Presses de l'Université de Montreal Bibliothèque du Nouveau Monde series. Author of La Littérature québécoise (1974), La Poésie québécoise des origines à nos jours, with P. Nepveu (1981), Ouvrir le livre (1992), and other books. Editor of Essais québécois, 1837–1983: Anthologie littéraire, with Benoit Melançon (1984). Essays: Canadian Essay (French); Lionel Groulx; Liberté; Pierre Trottier.
- Marcotte, Gilles. Formerly Professor, University of Montreal. Author of Une Littérature qui se fait (1962), Le Roman à l'imparfait (1976), La Prose de Rimbaud (1983), L'Amateur de musique (1992), and Littérature et drconstances (1989). Essays: Fernand Ouellette; Pierre Vadeboncoeur.

Masuy, Christine. Member of the Department of Communication, Catholic University of Louvain, Belgium. Essays: Italo Calvino; Eugenio Montale.

Matiko, Beverly J. Associate professor of English and communication, Andrews University, Berrien Springs, Michigan. Author of the entry on Pilgrim at Tinker Creek by Annie Dillard in MasterPlots II: Women's Literature (1995), and of forthcoming entries in Masterplots on The Chosen and My Name Is Asher Lev by Chaim Potok. Essay: Annie Dillard.

Mayer, Sigrid. Professor of German, University of Wyoming, Laramie. Author, with W.Eggers, Ernst Cassirer: An Annotated Bibliography (1988). Editor, with Anselm Dreher, of Drawings and Words, 1954–1977 (1983) and Etchings and Words, 1972–1982 (1985), both by Günter Grass. Essay: Günter Grass.

Mazzeno, Laurence W. President, Alvernia College, Reading, Pennsylvania. Managing editor, 1986–88, and editor, 1988–92, of Nineteenth-Century Prose, managing editor and book review editor of the Arnoldian, 1980–86; consulting editor of Masterplots (12 vols., 1996). Author of The British Novel, 1670–1832 (1997), Victorian Poetry (1995), The Victorian Novel (1989), and Herman Wouk (1994). Essay: John Updike.

Melançon, Benoît. Adjunct professor, University of Montreal. Member of the editorial board of Discours Social/Social Discourse. Author of Diderot épistolier (1996) and articles in Spirale, Jeu, Études Françaises, Littérales, and Voix et Images. Editor of Essais québécois, 1837–1983: Anthologie littéraire, with Laurent Mailhot (1984). Essays: André Belleau; Jacques Brault; Canadian Essay (French); Jean Larose; Jean Le Moyne.

Mermall, Thomas. Professor of Spanish, Brooklyn College and Graduate School, New York. Member of the editorial board of Los Ensayistas, 1978–88, and Journal of Interdisciplinary Studies, since 1994. Author of The Rhetoric of Humanism: Spanish Culture After Ortega (1975), Las alegorías del poder en Francisco Ayala (1984), and articles on Unamuno, Ortega y Gasset, Francisco Ayala, and other Spanish writers in Bulletin of Hispanic Studies, Hispanic Review, PMLA, Insula, Revista Canadianese de Estudios Hispánicos, and other journals. Essays: Enrique Tierno Galvan; Miguel de Unamuno.

Midgley, David. University lecturer in German, Cambridge University. Author of Arnold Zweig (1980) and articles on various German writers and intellectuals in German Life and Letters, German Quarterly, Oxford German Studies, Zeitschrift für deutsche Philologie, and Jahrbuch für internationale Germanistik. Editor of The German Novel in the Twentieth Century (1993). Essays: Sigmund Freud; Max Weber.

Mihăilescu, Călin-Andrei. Associate professor of comparative literature and Spanish, University of Western Ontario, London. Editor of “Recherche littéraire/Literary research” in the journal of the International Comparative Literature Association. Author of articles in Style, Texte, Comparatist, Euresis, Revista Canadiense de Estudios Hispánicos, and other journals. Editor of Fiction Updated: Theories of Fictionality, Narratology and Poetics (1996). Essay: George Calinescu.

Miller, Anthony. Senior lecturer in English, University of Sydney. Author of articles in the Sidney Newsletter, Studies in Philology, and English Literary Renaissance. Editor of editions of Shakespeare's Richard III (1989) and Julius Caesar (1995). Essays: The Defence of Poesy, An Essay on Man.

Miller, Stephen. Professor of Spanish and director of graduate studies in modern and classical languages, Texas A&M University, College Station. Member of the editorial board of Romance Quarterly and Antípodas. Author of El mundo de Galdós: Teoría, tradición y evolución del pensamiento socioliterario galdosiano (1983) and Del realismo/naturalismo al modernismo: Galdós, Zola, Revilla y Clarín (1870–1901) (1993). Coeditor of Critical Studies on Gonzalo Torrente Ballester (1988) and Critical Studies on Armando Palacio Valés (1993). Guest editor of Antipodas special issue: Three Hispanic Nobels: Camilo José Cela, Gabriel García Márquez, Octavio Paz (1992.). Essays: Marcelino Menéndez y Pelayo; Octavio Paz.

Mitchell, P.M. Adjunct professor of modern languages, Cornell University, Ithaca, New York. Author of A Bibliographical Guide to Danish Literature (1951), A History of Danish Literature (1957 and later revisions), Vilhelm Grønbech (1978), Daguerreotypes and Other Essays, with W.D.Paden (1979), Henrik Pontoppidan (1979), and many other books. Editor of Anthology of Danish Literature, with F.J.Billeskov Jansen (1972.) and of several volumes of the Ausgewählte Werke by Johann Christoph Gottsched (1975–95). Editor and translator of Selected Essays (1955) and Moral Reflections and Epistles (1991) by Ludvig Holberg. Essays: Frans G.Bengtsson; Olof von Dalin; Ludvig Holberg; Jacob Paludan; Scandinavian Essay.

Mitova-Janowski, Katia. Ph.D. candidate, Committee on Social Thought, University of Chicago. Editor-in-chief of Panorama Bulgarian quarterly magazine, 1990–94; editor of Puls Bulgarian literary and cultural weekly, 1987–90; coeditor of the Philosophy Plus series for Pero Publishing House, Sofia, Bulgaria. Author of a collection of poetry (1994), articles in Literaturna Misal, Plamak, Slavic Literatures in Bulgaria, and other journals, and prefaces to books by Polish writers. Translator of works by various Polish writers. Essays: Stanisław Barańczak; Bulgarian Essay; Gustaw Herling-Grudziński; Chavdar Mutafov; Polish Essay; Pencho Slaveikov.

Monsman, Gerald. Professor of English, University of Arizona, Tucson. Author of Pater's Portraits (1967), Walter Pater (1977), Walter Pater's Art of Autobiography (1980), Confessions of a Prosaic Dreamer (1984), Olive Schreiner's Fiction (1991), and two articles in Blackwood's Magazine. Editor of Gaston de Latour: The Revised Text by Walter Pater (1995). Essay: Walter Pater.

Moss, Howard. Lecturer in Italian, University of Wales, Swansea. Former editor of the Bulletin of the Society for Italian Studies and the Journal of the Association of Italian Studies. Author of articles in Italian Studies, Italica, Forum Italicum, Il Politico, Comparative Literature, Italian Quarterly, Rivista dell'Aipi, Italianist, and Bulletin of the Society for Italian Studies. Essays: Antonio Gramsci; Niccolò Machiavelli; Benedetto Varchi.

Motta, Vanna. Tutorial fellow in Italian, University of Wales, Cardiff. Essay: Carlo Cattaneo.

Miiller, Agnes C. Recent Ph.D. candidate, Vanderbilt University, Nashville, Tennessee. Author of articles in Chaotische Nachrichten and New German Review. Essays: Theodor W.Adorno; Max Bense; Peter Hamm; Christa Wolf.

Mulvihill, James. Associate professor of English, University of Alberta, Edmonton. Consultant on the Norton Readers. Author of Thomas Love Peacock (1987) and articles in Studies in Romanticism, SEL, Keats-Shelley Journal, Nineteenth Century Literature, and other journals. Essays: William Godwin; Percy Bysshe Shelley.

Muñoz, Pedro Maria. Assistant professor of Spanish literature, Winthrop University, Rock Hill, South Carolina. Author of Guía cultural del mundo hispánico (1992.) and articles and book reviews in Hispania, España Contemporánea, Letras Peninsulares, and other journals. Essays: Baltasar Gracián; Ramiro de Maeztu.

Murray, Isobel. Senior lecturer in English, University of Aberdeen. Author of many articles on Oscar Wilde; editor of critical editions of Wilde's The Picture of Dorian Gray (1976), Wilde's Complete Shorter Fiction (1979), The Oxford Authors Oscar Wilde (1989), and The Soul of Man, and Prison Writings (1990). Author of Ten Modern Scottish Novels, with Bob Tait (1984) and articles on Scottish writing. Essay: Oscar Wilde.

Murray, Michael D. Professor and chair, Department of Communication, University of Missouri, St. Louis. Member of the editorial advisory board of Journalism History and Communication Research Reports. Author of The Political Performers (1994) and Television in America (1997). Essay: H.L.Mencken.

Musgrove, Brian. Head, Department of Humanities, University of Southern Queensland, Toowoomba. Coeditor of Coppertales journal of rural arts. Author of Signifying Others (1992). Director of the documentary films D.H.Lawrence and the Culture Industry (1985) and Making Shakespeare (1988). Essay: D.H.Lawrence.

Myers, Eunice Doman. Associate professor of Spanish, Wichita State University, Kansas. Author of articles on Ramón Pérez de Ayala, Rosa Chacel, Manuel Ferrand, Ana María Matute, and other women writers in several books and in the journals Crítica Hispdnica, Perspective on Contemporary Literature, Hispanic Journal, Hispania, Letras Femenina, Monographic Review, and Letras Peninsulares. Coeditor of Continental, Latin-American and Francophone Women Writers (1987). Essay: Ramón Pérez de Ayala.

Naufftus, William F. Associate professor of English, Winthrop University, Rock Hill, South Carolina. Author of an entry on Thomas Babington Macaulay in Victorian Prose Writers Before 1867, edited by William B.Thesing, Dictionary of Literary Biography vol. 55 (1987). Editor of British Short Fiction Writers, 1880–1914: The Romantic Tradition, Dictionary of Literary Biography vol. 156 (1995). Essay: Edmund Wilson.

Nemoianu, Virgil. William J.Byron Distinguished Professor of Literature, Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C. Secretary general of the International Comparative Literature Association. Author of The Taming of Romanticism: European Literature and the Age of Biedermeier (1984), A Theory of the Secondary: Literature, Progress, and Reaction (1989), Micro-Harmony: The Growth and Uses of the Idyllic Model in Literature (1977), and articles in the Times Literary Supplement, PMLA, Modern Language Notes, Poetics Today, and other journals. Coeditor of Play, Literature, Religion (1992) and The Hospitable Canon (1991). Essays: Chateaubriand; Ernst Jünger; Alexandru Odobescu; Robert Southey.

O'Neil, Catherine. Postdoctoral student, University of Chicago. Essay: Sovremennik.

O'Neill, Charles L. Assistant professor, Division of the Humanities, St. Thomas Aquinas College, Sparkill, New York. Author of "Violence and the Sacred in Seamus Heaney's North" in the forthcoming Seamus Heaney: The Consciousness of the Artist, edited by Catherine Malloy, "Paul Muldoon's Madoz: A Mystery and the Romantic Poets" in Wordsworth Circle (1993), and "Haunting the Ordinary: Tess Gallagher and Irish Poetry" in Poetry Society of America (1993). Essays: Kenneth Burke; Kenneth Rexroth.

Onslow, Barbara Mary. Lecturer in English, University of Reading. Author of the second ten-year index of Victorian Periodicals Review, several articles including those on 19th-century British women writers, literature as journalism, and 19th-century prose and journalism in Reader's Guide to Literature in English (1996), and "Deceiving Images, Revealing Images: Portraits of Romance and Reality in Victorian Women's Writing" in Victorian Poetry (Autumn/Winter 1995). Essays: Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine; Margaret Oliphant.

Oviedo, José Miguel. Trustee professor, University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia. Author of Mario Vargas Llosa: La invención de una realidad (1970, revised 1977), Escrito al margen (1982, revised 1987), La niña de New York: Una revisión de la vida erótica de Jorge Martí (1989), Breve historia del ensayo hispanoamericano (1991), and "The Modern Essay in Spanish America" in The Cambridge History of Latin American Literature, Volume 2: The Twentieth Century, edited by Roberto González Echevarría and Enrique Pupo-Walker (1996). Editor of Antología crítica del cuento hispanoamericano (2 vols., 1989–92). Contributing editor to the Library of Congress Handbook of Latin American Studies. Essays: Jorge Luis Borges; Juan Montalvo.

Pahomov, George S. Professor of Russian language and literature, Bryn Mawr College, Pennsylvania. Editor and translator for Kingston Press; editor of Transactions. Author of In Earthbound Flight: Romanticism in Turgenev (1983) and numerous articles on writers such as Zhukovskii, Pushkin, Turgenev, Chekhov, Bunin, and Elagin in various journals. Editor and translator of Istoriia Rossii, vol. 4, by Vladimir Solov'ev (1996). Essay: Ivan Turgenev.

Park, Pamela. Associate professor of French, Idaho State University, Pocatello. Author of "Description and Evaluation of an Academic Year in a French Lycée, 1992–1993" in "Hands On" Language (1994) and "Imagination et ennui dans Lamie!" in Stendhal Club 118 (1988). Essay: Jean-Louis Guez de Balzac.

Pavich, Paul Nicholas. Professor of English, Fort Lewis College, Durango, Colorado. Author of Where the West Begins (1978), Joseph Wood Krutch (1989), and articles in Earthly Words: Essays on Contemporary American Nature and Environmental Writers (1994), Western American Literature, Southwestern American Literature, and Western Humanities Review. Editor, with Agnes Picotte, of Dakota Texts and Speaking of Indians by Ella Deloria (1979). Essay: Joseph Wood Krutch.

Pearson, Ann. Lecturer, University of British Columbia, Vancouver. Essay: Mary Wollstonecraft.

Pebworth, Ted-Larry. William E. Stirton Professor in the Humanities and professor of English, University of Michigan, Dearborn. Assistant editor of Seventeenth-Century Neivs. Author of 12 books and 76 articles on 17th- and 20th-century authors. Textual coeditor of The Variorum Edition of the Poetry of John Donne (8 vols., 1995–). Coeditor, The Wit of Seventeenth Century Poetry (1995). Essay: John Donne.

Perez, Janet. Horn Professor of Spanish and associate graduate dean, Texas Tech University, Lubbock. Editor of the Monographic Review/Review Monografica, since 1985; member of the editorial board of Letras Femeninas, Hispanófila, Anales de la Narrativa Española Contemporánea, Letras Peninsulares, Siglo XX/Twentieth Century, and other journals. Editor for Spain, Twayne World Authors Series. Author of The Major Themes of Existentialism in the Works of Ortega y Gasset (1970), Ana María Matute (1971), Miguel Delibes (1972), Novelistas femeninas de la postguerra española (1983), Gonzalo Torrente Ballester (1984), Women Writers of Contemporary Spain (1988), Modern and Contemporary Spanish Women Poets (1995), and 175 articles and chapters in books. Editor of Critical Studies on Gonzalo Torrente Ballester, with Stephen Miller (1988) and Dictionary of Literature of the Iberian Peninsula, with Maureen Ihrle (2 vols., 1993). Essays: Francisco Ayala; Rosa Chacel; Maria Zambrano.

Perkins, Elizabeth. Associate professor of English, James Cook University of North Queensland, Townsville. Founding editor of LINQ (Literature in North Queensland). Author of The Plays of Alma De Groen (1994). Editor of The Poetical Works (1984) and Stalwart the Bushranger with The Tragedy of Donohoe (1987) by Charles Harpur. Essays: A.D.Hope; Walter Murdoch.

Piggott, Jill. Ph.D. candidate, Drew University, Madison, New Jersey. Author of articles in The Female Tradition in Southern Literature, edited by Carol S.Manning (1993), American Transcendental Quarterly, and Southern Literary Journal. Essay: Nadine Gordimer.

Pitts, Mary Ellen. Professor and head, Department of English, Western Kentucky University, Bowling Green. Author of Toward a Dialogue of Understanding: Loren Eiseley and the Critique of Science (1995), "Reflective Scientists and the Critique of Mechanistic Metaphor" in The Literature of Science: Perspectives on Popular Scientific Writing, edited by M.William McRae (1993), and "Toward a Dialectic of the Open End: The Scientist as Writer and the Revolution Against Measurement" in Centennial Review 38, no. 1 (1994). Essays: Aldo Leopold; Medical Essay; Oliver Sacks.

Pollard, D.E. Professor of translation, Chinese University of Hong Kong. Editor of Renditions, since 1989. Author of A Chinese Look at Literature (1973) and coauthor Colloquial Chinese (1982). Coeditor of An Encyclopedia of Translation: Chinese-English, English-Chinese (1995). Essays: Chinese Essay; Liang Yuchun; Lu Xun; Yuan Hongdao; Zhou Zuoren.

Polt, John H.R. Professor emeritus of Spanish, University of California, Berkeley. Member of the editorial board of Dieciocho. Author of The Writings of Eduardo Mallea (1959), Jovellanos and His English Sources: Economic, Philosophical, and Political Writings (1964), Gaspar Melchor de Jovellanos (1971), and Batilo: Estudios sobre la evolución estilística de Meléndez Valdés (1987), and articles and reviews in Anales de Literatura Española, Hispanic Review, Dieciocho, Revista Iberoamericana, Studies in Eighteenth-Century Culture, and other journals. Essay: Gaspar Melchor de Jovellanos.

Polt, Richard. Assistant professor of philosophy, Xavier University, Cincinnati, Ohio. Author of articles in Auslegung, Journal of the British Society for Phenomenology, and the forthcoming Dictionary of Existentialism, edited by Haim Gordon. Essays: Ludwig Feuerbach; Martin Heidegger; JeanPaul Sartre; Xavier Zubiri.

Polukhina, Valentina. Professor of Russian literature, Keele University, Staffordshire. Author of Joseph Brodsky: A Poet for Our Time (1989), Brodsky Through the Eyes of His Contemporaries (1992), and The Dictionary of Brodsky's Tropes (1995). Editor of Brodsky's Poetics and Aesthetics (1990) and Brodsky's Genres (1995). Essay: Joseph Brodsky.

Post, Jonathan F.S. Professor of English, University of California, Los Angeles. Member of the editorial board of the Huntington Library Quarterly, since 1995. Author of Henry Vaughan: The Unfolding Vision (1982), Sir Thomas Browne (1987), and many articles and reviews in Renaissance Literature. Editor of George Herbert in the Nineties (1996). Essay: Sir Thomas Browne.

Price, John T. Graduate instructor, University of Iowa, Iowa City. Author of "Personal Connections to the Midwest" in The Updated Literary History of the American West (1996). Essay: N.Scott Momaday.

Pucci, Suzanne R. Associate professor of French, University of Kentucky, Lexington. Advisory editor of Eighteenth-Century Studies, since 1995. Author of Diderot and a Poetics of Science (1986), various chapters in books, and articles and reviews in journals. Editor of Diderot in the Wake of Modern Critical Thought, special issue of L'Esprit Créateur (1984). Essay: Denis Diderot.

Pursglove, Michael. Senior lecturer in Russian, University of Exeter. Author of The New Russia (1995) and D.V. Grigorovich: The Man Who Discovered Chekhov (1987). Editor of editions of Childhood (1993), Anton; The Peasant: Two Stories of Serfdom (1991), and Sebastopol Stories (1994) by Lev Tolstoi. Essay: Vladimir Giliarovskii.

Qian, Nanxiu. Assistant professor of Chinese literature, Rice University, Houston. Cotranslator from classical to modern Chinese of An Abridged Translation of the Shih-shuo hsün-yü (1989). Author of articles in T'ang Studies, Literary Review, and other journals. Coeditor of A Guide to Chinese Culture (1986). Essays: Liu Zongyuan; Su Shi.

Rae, Patricia. Assistant professor of English, Queen's University, Kingston, Ontario. Author of The Practical Muse: Pragmatism and Inspiration in Hulme, Pound, and Stevens (1996) and articles in Comparative Literature, ELH, Southern Review, and English Studies in Canada. Essay: William James.

Raley, Harold. Dean, College of Arts and Humanities, Houston Baptist University. Author of Oljose Ortega y Gasset: Philosopher of European Unity (1971), Responsible Vision: The Philosophy of Julian Mariás (1980), José Ortega y Gasset: A Bibliography of Secondary Sources, with Anton Donoso (1986), "Phenomenological Life: A New Look at the Philosophic Enterprise in Ortega y Gasset" in Analecta Husserliana (1989), and other studies. Essays: Manuel Azafia; Julian Mariás.

Rapport, Nigel. Professor in social anthropology, University of St. Andrews. Author of Talking Violence: An Anthropological Interpretation of Conversation in the City (1987), Diverse World Views in an English Village (1993), and The Prose and the Passion: Anthropology, Literature and the Writings of E. M. Forster (1994). Essay: E.M. Forster.

Richmond, Velma Bourgeois. Professor of English, Holy Names College, Oakland, California. Author of Muriel Spark (1985), Geoffrey Chaucer (1992.), The Popularity of Medieval Romance (1975), Laments for the Dead in Medieval Narrative (1965), The Legend of Guy of Warwick (1995), and many articles. Essays: Hilaire Belloc; The Confessions; C.S. Lewis; Sermon.

Ritchie, Daniel E. Professor of English, Bethel College, St. Paul, Minnesota. Author of Reconstructing Literature in an Ideological Age (1996), "Desire and Sympathy, Passion and Providence: The Moral Imaginations of Burke and Rousseau" in Burke and the French Revolution (1992), and "The Story of Robinson Crusoe and the Stories of Scripture” in Journey to the Celestial City (1995). Essay: Edmund Burke.

Roberts, William. Professor of history, Fairleigh Dickinson University, Rutherford, New Jersey. Member of the advisory panel for modern European history for the National Endowment for the Humanities. Author of Sicily: An Informal History (1992), Modern Italian History: An Annotated Bibliography (1990), and Prophet in Exile: Joseph Mazzini in England (1989). Essay: Giuseppe Mazzini.

Robertson, Ian Ross. Professor of history, University of Toronto at Scarborough. Author of The Tenant League of Prince Edward Island, 1864–1867: Leasehold Tenure in the New World (1996), chapters in The Atlantic Region to Confederation: A History and Canadian History: A Reader's Guide, Volume 1: Beginnings to Confederation, and articles in the Dictionary of Canadian Biography, Acadiensis, Canadian Literature, and The Island Magazine. Essay: Andrew Macphail.

Robinson, Daniel. Ph.D. candidate, University of South Carolina, Columbia. Author of “From ‘Mingled Measure’ to ‘Ecstatic Measures’: Mary Robinson’s Poetic Reading of ‘Kubla Khan’” in Wordsworth Circle (1995) and “Reviving the Sonnet: Women Romantic Poets and the Sonnet Claim” in European Romantic Review (1995). Essay: Alice Meynell.

Roche, Dan. Teacher of nonfiction writing, University of Central Arkansas, Conway. Author of Love's Labors: A Man's Memoir of Marriage and Remarriage (1996) and articles in the North American Review, Ohio Journal, and the Slate. Essays: American Essay; The Atlantic Monthly; Familiar Essay; Harper's; Topical Essay.

Rogers, John H. Professor of English, Vincennes University, Indiana. Author of entries on Thomas Love Peacock in British Romantic Poets, Horace Smith in British Romantic Novelists, William Maginn in British Romantic Prose Writers, and Sir John Hawkins in Eighteenth-Century Biographers. Associate editor of British Literary Characters: The Novel (vol. 2) and editor of British Short Fiction Writers, 1915–1945, Dictionary of Literary Biography (1996). Essays: Max Beerbohm; V.S. Pritchett; Jonathan Swift; James Thurber.

Rojas, Lourdes. Associate professor of Spanish and director of Africana and Latin American studies, Colgate University, Hamilton, New York. Author of La mujer, desmitificación y novela (1990), “La indagación desmitificadora en la poesía de Rosario Castellanos” in Revista/Review InterAmericana 12., no. 1 (1982), “At the Crossroads: Latinas’ Affirmation of Life in Getting Home Alive by Rosario Morales” in Breaking Boundaries: Latinas’ Writing and Critical Essays (1988), and “Intruders and Usurpers: Latin American Women Essayists” with N.Sternbach, in The Politics of the Essay: Feminist Perspectives, edited by Ruth Ellen Joeres and Elizabeth Mittman (1993). Essays: Andrés Bello; Pedro Henríquez Ureña.

Rosengrant, Judson. Independent scholar. Compiler of a bibliography on Lidia Ginzburg in Russian Review (1995). Editor and translator of On Psychological Prose (1991) and On Lyric Poetry (forthcoming) by Ginzburg. Author of several articles in Russian Review, Style, Slavic and East European Journal, Canadian-American Slavic Studies, and other journals. Editor and translator of works by Iurii Olesha, Fazil Iskander, and Edward Limonov. Essay: Lidia Ginzburg.

Rosevelt, Jan Peter F. van. Graduate teaching assistant, University of South Carolina, Columbia. Associate prose editor of Yemassee. Author of an entry on Michael Arlen in British Short Fiction Writers, 1915–1945, edited by John H. Rogers, Dictionary of Literary Biography (1996), and “Dining with The Ambassadors” in the Henry James Review 15, no. 3 (1994). Essay: J.B. Priestley.

Rowe, Noel. Lecturer in English, University of Sydney. Author of Modern Australian Poets (1994) and articles and poetry in Southerly, Voices, Pacifica, Meridian, Quadrant, Phoenix Review, and The Oxford Book of Australian Religious Poetry (1994). Essay: Vincent Buckley.

Roy, Joaquín. Professor of international studies and Latin American literature, University of Miami. Literary director of Letras de Oro, since 1986. Director of the Iberian Studies Institute, since 1986, and the European Community Research Institute, since 1990. Author of Julio Cortázar ante su sociedad (1974), Narrativa y crítica de Nuestra América (1978), Ezequiel Martínez Estrada, Panorama de los Estados Unidos (1985), ALA: Periodismo y literatura (1986), Camilo José Cela: Homage to a Nobel Prize (1991), and El pensamiento demócratacristiano (1993). Essays: Germán Arciniegas; Rubén Darío; Journalism and the Essay; Reportage; José Enrique Rodó.

Sáenz, Pilar G. Professor of Spanish, George Washington University, Washington, D.C. President of the Ibero-American Society for Eighteenth-century Studies. Author of Eugenio d’Ors: Su mundo de valores estéticos (1969), The Life and Works of Eugenio d’Ors (1983), contributions to Women Writers of Spain: An Annotated Bio-Bibliographical Guide (1986) and Dictionary of Literature of the Iberian Peninsula, edited by Janet Pérez and Maureen Ihrie (2 vols., 1993), and articles in Insula, Papeles de Son Armadans, Thesaurus, Hispanófila, Duquesne Hispanic Review, and Dieciocho. Essays: Americo Castro; Salvador de Madariaga; Eugenio d’Ors.

Saglia, Diego. Tutor, School of European Studies, University of Wales, Cardiff. Author of articles in the Byron Journal, Studies in the Novel, Textus: English Studies in Italy, and Byron and Spain: Itinerary in the Writing of Place (1996). Essay: Times Literary Supplement.

Sandoval-B., Ciro A. Assistant professor of Spanish and comparative studies, Michigan Technological University, Houghton. Author of “Michel Serrès’ Philosophy of the ‘Educated Third’: Hermesian Confluences Among the Humanities, Science, and Technology” in Philosophy Today (Summer 1995), “Rafael Catala: Un Hermes para la Cienciapoesía Latinoamericana” in Rafael Catala: Del Circulo cuadrado a la ciendapoesía: Hacia una nueva poetica latinoamericana, edited by Luis A. Jimenez (1994). Coeditor of Jose Maria Arguedas: A Comparative Reconsideration (1996). Essays: Aldous Huxley; José Carlos Mariátegui; Michel Serrès.

Saunero-Ward, Verónica. Part-time professor of Spanish and Italian, College of Santa Fe, New Mexico. Author of eight articles in the New Mexican, and articles in ALEPH and Bolivia Studies. Essays: Lima la horrible; Spanish American Essay.

Savova, Lilia. Professor of English, Indiana University of Pennsylvania. Author of English for the Eleventh Grade of the English Language Schools (1984), English for the Tenth Grade (1993), and English for the Eighth Grade of the National School for Andent Languages and Civilizations (1987). Essay: Georgi Markov.

Schell, Richard. Professor of English, Laurentian University, Sudbury, Ontario. Joint editor of the Yale Edition of The Shorter Poems of Edmund Spenser. Essays: Areopagitica; Northrop Frye.

Scherr, Barry P. Professor of Russian, Dartmouth College, Hanover, New Hampshire. Author of Russian Poetry: Meter, Rhythm, and Rhyme (1986), Maxim Gorky (1988), and articles in Slavic and East European Journal, International Journal of Slavic Linguistics and Poetics, Style, Slavic Review, Russian Language Journal, and Russian Literature. Coeditor of Russian Verse Theory (1989) and A Sense of Place: Tsarskoe Selo and Its Poets (1993). Essays: Maksim Gor'kii; Andrei Siniavskii.

Schiff, Karen. Ph.D. candidate in comparative literature and literary theory, University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia. Author of "Finding the Reader in The Waves: Bernard's Dinner Party" in Re: Reading, Re: Writing, Re: Teaching Virginia Woolf, edited by Eileen Barrett and Patricia Cramer (1995) and "Taking a Tangent on Saussure and Derrida: Conceptualizing Signification and Différence Through a Graph of the Tangent Function" in Constructions 8 (1993). Essays: Adrienne Rich; Alice Walker.

Schwab, Eric. Ph.D. candidate in German, Yale University, New Haven, Connecticut. Translator of Constituting Critique: Kant's Writing as Critical Praxis by Willi Goetschel (1994). Editor of an issue of ARTLies, 1994. Essay: Immanuel Kant.

Sheldon, Richard. Chair, Russian Department, Dartmouth College, Hanover, New Hampshire. Compiler of Viktor Shklovskii: An International Bibliography of Works by and About Him (1977). Author of "Shklovskii, Gor'kii and the Serapion Brothers" in Slavic and East European Journal 12., no. 1 (Spring 1968), "The Formalist Poetics of Viktor Shklovskii" in Russian Literature Tri-Quarterly 2 (Winter 1972), "Viktor Shklovskii and the Device of Ostensible Surrender" in Slavic Review 34, no. 1 (March 1975). Translator and editor of Shklovskii's A Sentimental Journey (1970), Zoo, or Letters Not About Love (1971), Third Factory (1977), and various articles. Essay: Viktor Shklovskii.

Sherman, Alvin E., Jr. Associate professor of Spanish and assistant dean of graduate studies and research, Idaho State University, Pocatello. Author of Mariano José de Larra: A Directory of Historical Personages (1992) and articles in Cntica Hispánica, Dieciocho, Anales de Literatura Española, Ojáncano, and Ariel. Essays: Benito Jerónimo Feijóo y Montenegro; Diego de Torres Villarroel.

Simmons, James R., Jr. Ph.D. candidate, University of South Carolina, Columbia. Author of entries in the Dictionary of Literary Biography, American National Biography, and Reference Guide to American Literature, and articles in English Language Notes, Brontë Society Transactions, the Dickensian, and Victorian Studies. Essay: G.K.Chesterton.

Skabarnicki, Anne. Associate professor of English, Royal Military College of Canada, Kingston, Ontario. Editor of the Carlyle Studies Annual, since 1992. Member of the editorial advisory board for the University of California Press' Selected Carlyle Project. Author of articles in the Carlyle Studies Annual, Nineteenth-Century Prose, and Scotia. Coeditor of a forthcoming volume of Carlyle's political and social essays. Essay: Lytton Strachey.

Sloane, David A. Associate professor of Russian, Tufts University, Medford, Massachusetts. Author of Aleksandr Blok and the Dynamics of the Lyric Cycle (1988) and articles in the Slavic and East European Journal, Russian Literature, Ulbands Review, Tolstoy Studies Journal, Harvard Ukrainian Studies, and in several conference proceedings, festschrifts, and other collections. Essay: Aleksandr Blok.

Smith, Christopher. Reader in French, School of Modern Languages, University of East Anglia, Norwich. Author of Jean Anouilh: Life, Work and Criticism (1985), Atalante, Bikinis and Calvados (1985), and many articles in journals. Editor of France et Grande Bretagne (1990) and Dramatic Works by Jean de la Taille (1972). Essays: Georges Bataille; Paul Bourget.

Smith, Vivian. Reader in English, University of Sydney. Widely published poet and critic. Author of Vance and Nettie Palmer (1975), The Poetry of Robert Lowell (1974), Selected Poems (1985), New Selected Poems (1995), and other works. Editor of the Letters of Vance and Nettie Palmer (1977) and Nettie Palmer: Her Private Journal Fourteen Years, Poems, Reviews and Literary Essays (1988). Essays: Nettie Palmer; Vance Palmer; Judith Wright.

Smythe, Robert V. Assistant professor of German, University of Memphis. Author of Mustersätze und Grammatik, with Chas. Long (textbook; 1975) and a review in the Lessing Jahrbuch (1994). Essays: Leopold von Ranke; Der Teutsche Merkur; Christoph Martin Wieland.

Snider, Alvin. Associate professor, University of Iowa, Iowa City. Author of Origin and Authority in Seventeenth-century England: Bacon, Milton, Butler (1994). Essays: Nature Essay; Pamphlet.

Soledad Carrasco, María. Professor emerita, Hunter College, City University of New York. Author of El moro de Granada en la Hteratura (1956), The Moorish Novel (1976), and El moro retador y el moro amigo (Estudios sobre fiestas y comedias de moros y cristianos) (1996). Essay: El Sol.

Sondrup, Steven P. Professor of comparative literature, Brigham Young University, Provo, Utah. Editor of Scandinavian Studies and the Bulletin of the International Comparative Literature Association. Author of "The Poetry of Ecstatic Vision" in Editb Södergran and Klagar Olson (1995), Vers Konkordanz zu Goethes Faust, Ersterund zweiter Teil (2, vols., 1986–89), The Poetry and Prose of Östen Sjöstrand (1988), and Hofmannsthal and the French Symbolist Tradition (1976). Essays: Vilhelm Ekelund; Hugo von Hofmannsthal.

Speer, Clara. Instructor, College of Santa Fe, New Mexico. Editorial assistant for the World Shakespeare Bibliography. Essays: Thomas Paine; Richard Selzer.

Spurr, Barry. Senior lecturer in English literature, University of Sydney. Author of The Word in the Desert (1995), The Poetry of Kenneth Slessor (1995), The Poetry of Wilfred Owen (1993), Literature and Spirituality (1993), The Poetry of Coleridge (1993), "Eliot and the Seventeenth Century" in Hellas, "Eliot's Longer Poems" in Sydney Studies in English, "Lytton Strachey's Essayist's Art" in Prose Studies, and many other books and articles. Essay: T.S.Eliot.

Stack, George J. Professor emeritus of philosophy, State University of New York, Brockport. Author of Berkeley's Analysis of Perception (1970), On Kierkegaard (1976), Kierkegaard's Existential Ethics (1977), Sartre's Philosophy of Social Existence (1978), Lange and Nietzsche (1983), Nietzsche and Emerson (1992,), Nietzsche: Man, Knowledge, Will to Power (1994), and 160 articles in various journals. Essays: Ralph Waldo Emerson; Arthur Schopenhauer.

Staines, David. Professor of English, University of Ottawa. General editor of the New Canadian Library; editor of Journal of Canadian Poetry. Author of Tennyson's Camelot:

The Idylls of the King and Its Medieval Sources (1982), Beyond the Provinces: Literary Canada at Century's End (1995). Editor of Stephen Leacock: A Reappraisal (1986) and Leacock's My Financial Career and Other Follies (1993). Translator of The Complete Romances of Chrétien de Troyes (1990). Essay: Stephen Leacock.

Steensma, Robert C. Professor of English, University of Utah, Salt Lake City. Author of Sir William Temple (1970), Dr. John Arbuthnot (1979), and articles in College English, US Naval Institute Proceedings, Naval War College Review, Western American Literature, Rocky Mountain Review, Shakespeare Newsletter, and other journals. Essays: The Compleat Angler; Bernard De Voto; Graham Greene; Christopher Morley; Wallace Stegner; Sir William Temple.

Steiner, Patricia Owen. Writer and translator, Ann Arbor, Michigan. Author of a forthcoming biography of Victoria Ocampo. Translator of The Banners of the Champions: An Anthology of Medieval Arabic Poetry from Andalusia and Beyond, with James Bellamy (1989), Don Segundo Sombra, with Ricardo Guiraldes (1995), and various articles from the Spanish. Essay: Victoria Ocampo.

Stewart, Ralph. Member of the English Department, Acadia University, Wolfville, Nova Scotia. Author of "Richard III, Josephine Tey, and Some Uses of Rhetoric" in Clues 12, no. 1 (1991), "Swift and the Authorship of Creighton's Memoirs" in Scottish Historical Review (1993), and entries on Bertrand Russell and John Lehmann in the Dictionary of Literary Biography vol. 100 (1990). Editor of A History of the Church of Scotland by James Kirkton (1993). Essay: George Bernard Shaw.

Stone, Staci L. Ph.D. candidate, University of South Carolina, Columbia. Assistant editor of Yemassee. Essay: Maria Edgeworth.

Strassberg, Richard E. Professor of Chinese, University of California, Los Angeles. Translator of Inscribed Landscapes: Travel Writing from Imperial China (1994). Essay: Zhang Dai.

Stuckey-French, Ned. Recent Ph.D. candidate in American literature, University of Iowa, Iowa City. Author of articles and reviews in the Harvard Advocate, Iowa Review, Modern Fiction Studies, Walt Whitman Encyclopedia, and Walking Magazine. Essays: American Essay; W.E.B. Du Bois; William H. Gass; Humorous Essay; Agnes Repplier; Scott Russell Sanders.

Suchoff, David. Associate professor of English, Colby College, Waterville, Maine. Author of Critical Theory and the Novel (1994). Cotranslator of The Imaginary Jew by Alain Finkielkraut (1994). Essay: Irving Howe.

Szeman, Imre. Graduate student, Literature Program, Duke University, Durham, North Carolina. Founding editor of Prosthesis: A Graduate Journal of Theory and Criticism. Author of the forthcoming "Spectral Spaces/The Time of Marx" in theory@buffalo, "Disappearing Nations: Atom Egoyan's Canada" in Constructing Nations, Constructing Selves, edited by Lynn Domina and Peter Naccarato (1997), "Heidegger's Neighbourhood and Philosophy's Landscape" in Re-Naming the Landscape, edited by Bruce Butterfield and Jurgen Kleist (1994), and "Tracing Lines of Flight: Masala and Multiculturalism" in Reverse Shot 1, no. 2 (May 1994). Essays: Chinua Achebe; Wole Soyinka.

Taylor, Richard C. Associate professor of English, East Carolina University, Greenville, North Carolina. Author of Goldsmith as Journalist (1993) and articles in Philological

Quarterly, Review of English Studies, Modern Philology, Studies in English Literature, Comparative Drama, English Language Notes, Review, and Concerns. Essays: Oliver Goldsmith; The Tatler.

Taylor, Rodney. Associate professor of German, Truman State University, Kirksville, Missouri. Author of Perspectives on Spinoza in Works by Schiller, Büchner, and C.F.Meyer: Five Essays (1995) and other books, and articles in the Michigan Germanic Studies, Deutsche Vierteljahrsschrift, Seminar, and other journals. Essay: Novalis.

Tesser, Carmen Chaves. Professor of Romance languages, University of Georgia, Athens. Member of the editorial board of The Eighteenth Century: A Current Bibliography, since 1993, and MIFLC Review, since 1992. Author (as Carmen C. McClendon) of Dissertations in Hispanic Languages and Literatures, 1967–76, with James R.Chatham (1981), the forthcoming Um modelo de discurso feminino: A obra de Lya Luft, and many articles (also as Carmen Chaves Tesser). Editor (as Carmen C.McClendon) of Brasil: Os últimos quarenta años (1985) and Brazil in the Eighties, with M.Elizabeth Ginway (1990). Editor (as Carmen Chaves Tesser) of The Forgotten Centuries: Europeans and Indians in the American South, 1513–1704, with Charles M.Hudson (1994). Translator of The Island of the Dead by Lya Luft, with Betty Jean Craige, (1986) and the forthcoming Tradition Matters: Modern Gaúcho Identity in Brazil by Ruben George Oliven. Essays: Josefa Amar y Borbón; José Cadalso; Antônio Cândido; Euclides da Cunha; Paulo Freire; Gilberto Freyre.

Thomas, Gillian. Professor of English, Saint Mary's University, Halifax, Nova Scotia. Author of Harriet Martineau (1985) and A Position to Command Respect: Women and the Eleventh Britannica (1992). Essays: Harriet Martineau; Rebecca West.

Titolo, Matthew. Ph.D. candidate in Victorian literature and critical theory, and teaching associate, University of California, Los Angeles. Author of articles on intellectual and cultural history, Victorian literature, the history of slavery, and critical theory. Essays: Classical Influences; Lewis Mumford; Sociological Essay.

Tobias, Richard C. Professor of English, University of Pittsburgh. Member of the editorial board of Victorian Poetry, Modern Language Studies, and Victorian Institute Journal. Author of Art of James Thurber (1969), T.E.Brown (1971), and Bibliographies of Studies of Victorian Literature, 1975–85 (1991). Essay: Thomas Babington Macaulay.

Trojanowska, Tamara. Assistant professor, Department of Slavic Languages and Literatures, University of Chicago. Coauthor of Quest for a New Theatre (1988) and author of articles in Canadian Slavonic Papers, Dialog, and other journals. Essays: Witold Gombrowicz; Czesław Miłosz.

Turner, Brian. Assistant professor of rhetorical criticism and composition, University of Winnipeg, Manitoba. Author of articles in Rhetoric Review, Journal of Teaching Writing, Teaching English in the Two-Year College, and Inkshed. Essays: John McPhee; John Muir.

Ullman, Pierre L. Professor emeritus of Spanish, University of Wisconsin, Milwaukee. Author of Mariano de Larra and Spanish Political Rhetoric (1971) and many articles on Spanish literature. Essay: Spanish Essay.

Urbina, Nicasio. Associate professor, Department of Spanish and Portuguese, Tulane University, New Orleans. Author of La significación del género: Estudio semiótico de las novelas y ensayos de Ernesto Sabato (1992), bibliographies of Sabato in Revista de Critica Literaria Latinoamericana 14, no. 27 (1988) and Hispania 73 (1990), La estructura de la novela nicaragüense: Análisis narratológico (1995), a collection of poetry (1995), a collection of short stories (1991), and many articles in journals. Essay: Ernesto Sabato.

Urrello, Antonio. Professor of Hispanic and Italian studies, University of British Columbia, Vancouver. Author of José María Arguedas (1974), Verostmilitud y estrategia textual en el ensayo hispanoamericano (1986), La poesía de Quebec (1994), and several articles in journals. Editor of One Hundred Years of Solitude: Critical Perspectives (1987). Essay: Carlos Monsiváis.

Valevičius, Andrius. Professor, Faculty of Theology, Ethics, and Philosophy, University of Sherbrooke, Quebec. Author of From the Other to the Totally Other: The Religious Philosophy of Emmanuel Levinas (1988), Lev Shestov and His Times: Encounters with Brandes, Tolstoy, Dostoevsky, Chekhov, Ibsen, Nietzsche and Husserl (1993), and “Le Sense de l’histoire dans la pensée russe” in Écrits du Canada Français 75 (1992). Essays: Vissarion Belinskii; Arthur Buies; Nikolai Novikov.

van der Laan, James M. Associate professor of German, Illinois State University, Normal. Coeditor of Transculture. Author of articles in the Germanic Review, Euphorion, Deutsche Vierteljahrsschrift, Seminar, History of European Ideas, Neophilologus, Lessing Yearbook, and Gutenberg Jahrbuch. Essay: Johann Wolfgang von Goethe.

Villafañe, Camille. Doctoral student, Arizona State University, Tempe. Essay: Luis Cardóza y Aragon.

Walker, Charlotte Zoë. Professor of English and women’s studies, State University of New York, Oneonta. Author of the novel Condor and Hummingbird (1987) and short stories in various journals and collections. Editor of Sharp Eyes: John Burroughs and American Nature Writing: A Collection of Essays (1997). Essay: John Burroughs.

Walsh, Harry. Associate professor of Russian, University of Houston. Author of articles in Religion and Literature, CLIO, Slavic and East European Journal, Slavonic and East European Review, Russian Language Journal, Comparative Literature Studies, and other journals. Essay: Vladimir Soloukhin.

Wasserman, George. Professor emeritus, Russell Sage College, Troy, New York. Author of Samuel Butler and the Earl of Rochester: A Reference Guide (1986), Roland Barthes (1981), Samuel “Hudibras” Butler (1976, revised 1989), John Dryden (1964), and articles in the Philological Quarterly, English Literary History, Studies in English Literature, Modern Language Quarterly, and other journals. Editor of Hudibras: The Second Part (1663) by Butler (1993). Essays: Characters; Preface.

Weeks, Laura D. Independent scholar. Formerly chair, Russian Department, Wheaton College, Norton, Massachusetts. Author of articles in the Slavic Review and Russian Review. Editor of Study Guide to The Master and Margarita (1996). Essay: Marina Tsvetaeva.

Wenske, Paul L. Assistant professor of journalism, William Allen White School of Journalism and Mass Communications, University of Kansas, Lawrence. Journalist writing for various papers, including the Daily Oklahoman, Kansas City Star and Times, Washington Post, Miami Herald, and Boston Globe, as well as the National Law Journal and Ingram’s Magazine. Essay: Barry Lopez.

Werner, Theresa. Freelance writer and editor, London. Essays: Personal Essay; Susan Sontag.

West, Alan G.H. Ph.D. candidate in English literature, University of Ottawa. Essay: Richard Jefferies.

Whalen, Terry. Professor of English, Saint Mary's University, Halifax, Nova Scotia. Author of Bliss Carman and His Works (1983), Charles G.D. Roberts and His Works (1989), Philip Larkin and English Poetry (1986), and articles on late 19th-century and 20th-century British, American, and Canadian authors in various journals. Editor of The Atlantic Anthology: Critical Essays (1985). Essay: Bliss Carman.

Wheeler, Kathleen M. University lecturer, Faculty of English, Cambridge University. Author of Explaining Deconstruction (1996), A Critical Guide to Twentieth-Century Women Novelists (1996), "Modernist" Women Writers and Narrative Art (1994), Romanticism, Pragmatism and Deconstruction (1993), Sources, Processes and Methods in Coleridge's Biographia Literaria (1980), The Creative Mind in Coleridge's Poetry (1981), and German Aesthetic and Literary Criticism: The Romantic Ironists and Goethe (1984). Essay: Friedrich Schlegel.

Wilson, Keith. Professor and chair, Department of English, University of Ottawa. Author of a wide range of books and articles on 19th- and 20th-century literature, including Thomas Hardy on Stage (1995). Editor of the forthcoming Penguin Modern Classics edition of Hardy's The Mayor of Casterbridge. Essay: A.C. Benson.

Winkler, Michael. Professor of German studies, Rice University, Houston. Author of Stefan George (1970), George Kreis (1972), Einakter und kleine Dramen des Jugendstils (1974), Deutsche Literatur im Exil, 1933–1945: Texte und Dokumente (1977), Phantastische Erzählungen der Jahrhundertwende (1982), Deutschsprachige Exilliteratur: Studien zu ihrer Bestimmung im Kontext der Epoche 1930 bis 1960 (1984), and Exilliteratur, 1933–1945 (1989). Essays: Rudolf Borchardt; Hermann Grimm; Rudolf Alexander Schröder; Die weissen Blätter.

Wood, Allen G. Associate professor of French, Purdue University, West Lafayette, Indiana. Editor for French of Purdue Studies in Romance Literature and the Purdue University Monographs in Romance Languages. Author of Literary Satire and Theory (1985) and over 20 articles on 17th-century French literature. Essays: Alain; Pierre Bayle; Saint-Évremond.

Woodward, Servanne. Assistant professor of French, University of Western Ontario, London. Author of Diderot and Rousseau's Contributions to Aesthetics (1991) and articles in Romance Languages Annual, Diderot Studies, Revue Marivaux, Diogenes, Essays in French Literature, Comparative Literature Studies, and other journals. Essays: Charles Du Bos; Voltaire.

Woolsey, Linda Mills. Professor of English, King College, Bristol, Tennessee. Author of entries on Jane Porter and Anna Maria Porter, Thomas De Quincey, the London Magazine, and Tait's Edinburgh Magazine in the Dictionary of Literary Biography, and articles in The Image of Crime, edited by Steven Kaplan and Will Wright (1991) and Tennessee Philological Bulletin. Essays: Journal; Religious Essay; Simone Weil.

Zaslove, Jerald. Professor of English and humanities, Simon Fraser University, Burnaby, British Columbia. Author of over 30 essays and monographs, including Jeff Wall (1990), contributions in the books Recharting the '30s (1996) and Herbert Read:

Centenary Reassessments, edited by David Goodway (1997), and articles in Telos, Public, Collapse, West Coast Review, Recovering Literature, Boston Journal of Education, and Open Letter. Essays: Partisan Review; Propaganda; Herbert Read.

Zeiger, William. Assistant professor of English, Slippery Rock University, Pennsylvania. Author of "The Exploratory Essay" in College English (1985), "Freedom of Imagination" in The Critical Writing Workshop, edited by Toni-Lee Capossela (1993), and "The Personal Essay and Egalitarian Rhetoric" in Literary Nonfiction, edited by Chris Anderson (1989). Essays: Apothegm; Charles Lamb; Lewis Thomas.

Zweig, Robert. Professor of English, Manhattan Community College, City University of New York. Author of entries on the dramatic unities, Victorian poetry, Victorian literary criticism, and poetry in The Encyclopedia of Time (1995), and "Death in Love: Rossetti and the Victorian Journey Back to Dante" in Sex and Death in Victorian Literature (1990). Essay: John Ruskin.