The most original and gifted of the “pure” essayists are Alain (pseudonym of Emile-Auguste Chartier, 1868–1951) and Roland Barthes (1915–80). Journalist and lycée philosophy professor, Alain produced, over a period of some 30 years (1903–36), more than 5000 uniformly brief prose pieces which he called “propos,” meaning “propositions” presented for our reflection; “proposals,” plans, or designs for living more wisely; and simply, “words.” As Jean Miquel puts it (Les Propos d’Alain, 1967), Alain “tried his hand at everything” (a Montaignean trait); hence the contents are amazing in their variety. The impulse for a given propos was usually less an idea than, as in the essays of Montaigne or Marivaux, a chance circumstance or occurrence, often an observed concrete phenomenon of the humblest everyday kind, out of which an idea would grow.

Some propos are veiled or stylized selfportraits, while others (again one thinks of Montaigne's reflections on the writing of essays) are thoughts on the art of the propos, or, more broadly, on the creative process itself. Each propos can be read independently of the others, yet one leads to another, and certain themes recur: Alain recognized this last feature by grouping and publishing some of them that possessed a common theme (e.g. Propos sur le bonheur [1925–28; Alain on Happiness]). Form and style depended greatly on improvisation and the author's desire to espouse what he called "thought in action" or the process of thought (another affinity with Montaigne and Marivaux). Yet the constraints within which he worked, those cruel deadlines and severe limitations of length, worked miraculously to bring out the craftsman in him, for he is one of the most impeccable and artistic of French prose stylists. Not always the clearest, however: his elliptical style, with its unexpected juxtapositions of thought and absence of transitions, is often deliberately "obscure," so as to challenge the reader's alertness and intelligence. "Many of the propos" observes Sterling Madsen (in an unpublished dissertation, Duke University, 1975), "are so structured as to defy immediate interpretation." The propos have been variously compared to the act of breathing, mental gymnastics, choreography ("the dance of thoughts," is Alain's phrase), the fugue, and a proposition, but not a proof, in geometry (Madsen). Many propos are small prose poems or poetic rêveries.

Although he owed much to Montaigne, La Bruyère, Montesquieu, and Bayle, Alain was also very conscious of his originality as an essayist. As much as he detested Sainte-Beuve, his own journalistic feat of producing essays at frequent, regular intervals, on command, without serious sacrifice of quality, is equaled only by the author of the Lundis. His conviction that the essay was a creative art also links him with Sainte-Beuve. Much of his writing remains timelessly relevant, since he succeeded in uncovering general principles beneath the particulars of contemporary issues he treated; or, as he put it, "My destiny was to become a journalist raising the newspaper column to the level of metaphysics."

Like Alain, Barthes was a journalist-critic writing for the most part sur commande and an academic, though at a higher level than Alain's in the educational system, at the Collège de France, where he held the chair in semiology (the science of signs) created especially for him. This broad field took him well beyond the study of language and literature into writing about the language of fashion, film, theater, photography, painting, music, and other subjects. His questioning of the "establishment" was more radical than Alain's, since it challenged the very assumptions about reality embodied in the ideologies of today's power structures, the very claims of language and literature to have some privileged access to truth undistorted by ideology. A unique feature of his essays was his ability to absorb in succession the values of various "schools" of thought—Marxism, semiology, anthropology, psychoanalysis—abandoning each in turn, not because of any "dilettantism" but because of his belief that none offered a definitive guide and out of his horror of becoming an "authority," "expert," or "true believer" (Montaigne underwent similar changes of position and for similar reasons). Giving unity to this amazing diversity of subjects, as Susan Sontag (1982) has observed, there is a central subject: writing itself and its relation to "the theory of his own mind." A hedonistic quest for pleasure in what he reads, a spirit of playfulness (reminiscent of Renan), sometimes of joy, are attractively balanced by a sense of responsibility that links his work with the kind of ethical inquiry associated with the long line of French moralistes.

Barthes published a number of book-length essays, such as his first book, Le Degré zéro de l'écriture (1953; Writing Degree Zero), challenging the theory of Jean-Paul Sartre of literature as social commitment, in the name of a purer kind of writing (l'écriture) freed from the dictates of the "institution of literature." Other long essays are his book on the semiology of fashion, Système de la mode (1967; The Fashion System), and the controversial essay on Japanese culture as a system of "pure signs," L'Empire des signes (1970; Empire of Signs). But Barthes had the natural-born essayist's "resistance to long forms" (Sontag); he is more at home in his short essays, which Sontag divides into two main types: the "straight essay" conceived in more or less linear, logical fashion (reviews, articles, etc.) and the later, more personal and original essays in which a "splintering of form" occurred, leading him to the essay as discontinuous fragment. Examples of the first type are his Essais critiques (1964; Critical Essays) and their sequels amounting to five volumes in all (1964–73) and Mythologies (1957; Mythologies), brief pieces resembling Alain's propos in form and, in content, both La Bruyère's Characters (he admired this author and emulated him as an "essayist of customs"—"un essayiste d'usages") and Marivaux's Spectateur Français. Although Barthes claimed in an interview not to have read Montaigne, Réda Bensmaïa (1986) has pursued a number of parallels in their use of the essay as "reflective text." In the brilliant and highly amusing Mythologies, originally published as monthly feature articles for the Lettres Nouvelles (New letters), Barthes the "mythographer" demythifies stereotypes of popular culture and everyday life, from ads for detergents to "people in the news." His boldest experimentation in the essay form, shading off into the essay "deconstructing" itself, or the "anti-essay," is found in Roland Barthes par Roland Barthes (1975; Roland Barthes) and Fragments d'un discours amoureux (1977; A Lover's Discourse: Fragments). The first, commissioned for the series Écrivains de toujours, in which a critic usually writes about a "classic" author or prestigious contemporary one, set the remarkable precedent of having a living author write about himself. Barthes' little volume uses the quasi-fictional pronoun il (he) as much as the personal je (I) and breaks the mold of rhetorical structure by chopping up the subject matter into small paragraphs (called "biographemes" and compared to family snapshots), arranged, in a further bold stroke, in the deliberately arbitrary alphabetical order. Barthes returns to this device of the fragmentary, discontinuous, alphabetically arranged "order" in A Lover's Discourse.

Among poets and novelists whose essays are more or less integrated into their total work, several deserve brief mention, while five should be highlighted for their greater originality or the way in which they recast the essay in a radically new role: Paul Valéry, Henry de Montherlant, Albert Camus, Maurice Blanchot (1907–), and Michel Butor.

For the first group, the essay tends to be an appendage to their poetry or fiction rather than an essential part of their total work. André Gide (1869–1951), cited by Thibaudet as an example of the pervasive presence of "essayism" in 20th-century literature, left fine critical essays such as Prétextes (1903–13; Pretexts: Reflections on Literature and Morality), but they have been overshadowed by his famous Journal. Valéry Larbaud (1881–1957), explorer of American, English, and Spanish literatures and translator of Samuel Butler and James Joyce, best known for his creation of the fictional poet "Barnabooth," deserves remembering also for his delightful travel sketches, such as Aux couleurs de Rome (1938; The colors of Rome), which blend essay and short story. Primarily novelists, François Mauriac (1885–1970) and Georges Bernanos (1888–1948) gave new life to the journalistic (often polemical) essay: the first in his Bloc-Notes (1958–71; Writing pads), the second in such works as his La Grande Peur des bien-pensants (1931; The great fear of conformist thinkers). The versatile Jean Cocteau (1889–1963), who excelled in almost every genre (including film), left a delightful book of essays whose format evokes Montaigne and the English essayists, although the title, La Difficulté d'être (1947; The Difficulty of Being), was inspired by Fontenelle. The “philosopher of eroticism,” Georges Bataille (1897–1962), in his novels and essays, ponders the meaning of sex, self-violation, societal transgression, and death with such violence of both content and style that Jean-Paul Sartre (1905–80) coined a new term to describe this form of the essay, in his critique of Bataille’s L’Expérience intérieure (1943; Inner Experience): the “martyred essay” (“essai martyre”). The essays in Sartre’s own 10-volume collection, Situations (1947–76), are less interesting for their form than for his literary criticism and reflections on the nature and function of literature. Le Deuxième Sexe (1949; The Second Sex), in the tradition of the long essay form, is an important contribution of Simone de Beauvoir (1908–86), who Toril Moi informs us (Simone de Beauvoir: The Making of an Intellectual Woman, 1994) preferred autobiography and fiction to essay writing.

Paul Valéry’s (1871–1945) prolific essay output consists of two basic types of essay: those of the “official writer,” written on commission—prefaces, speeches, lectures—and published under the collective title of Variété (1924–44; Variety), and those, culminating in his massive, largely posthumously published Cahiers (1957–61; Notebooks), in which the essay is splintered into fragmentary form. Although he considered the first type to be a kind of “forced labor,” he was not unhappy to find that chance circumstances, confronting him with a totally strange and unexpected subject, stimulated his mind. Out of necessity he simply made a virtue. The essays in Variety cover literary, philosophical, and “quasi-political” subjects, as well as poetic and aesthetic theory, education, and brief “memoirs of a poet.” A central theme underlies all Valéry’s writings: his lifelong inquiry (cf. Montaigne before him and Barthes after him) into the nature of his own mind, in order better to understand the human mind itself and to formulate what he called “the theory of oneself.” He anticipated Barthes and the “deconstructionists” by questioning the claim to truth and authenticity of the “literary work,” making exception only for poetry. His Cahiers, unprecedented in their deliberate apology for and practice of discontinuous, fragmentary form (only Nietzsche in philosophy had gone so far), are conceived as “anti-works, anti-finished products” (des contre-œuvres, des contre-fini), rejecting all claim to systematizing or totalization of knowledge, all claim to meaningful closure. Although few of these fragments resemble Montaigne’s essays, it was Montaigne’s term “essai” in its original meaning that he used in order to describe his lifelong habit of rising each day before daybreak to record “for myself only” these “attempts” (“essais”) at defining his thought. In style, his self-described “methodical breaking up of language’s ready-made forms and word-associations” echoes Montaigne’s attack on Ciceronian rhetoric.

The essay collections of Albert Camus (1913–60) and Henry de Montherlant (1896–1972) share many common elements: they both bring a lyrical quality to their finest essays, which possess a beauty of their own as well as serving to throw light on their fictional and dramatic works; both practice a blending of genres which lends essayistic features to their fiction and narrative elements to their essays; both sought to preserve a sense of dignity, nobility, even heroism in a world fast losing such a sense; compared with the boldly experimental, subversive Blanchot, Barthes, and Butor, their essays appear traditional in form and even somewhat archaic. In other ways they diverge sharply from each other. Montherlant was a minor aristocrat, aloof, self-absorbed, anarchical in outlook, reveling (like Gide) in his contradictions, which he called “alternances” and rarely sought to resolve. Steeped like Montaigne in the Roman classics, especially Seneca, as well as in the classical idea of the essay as a search for the art of living wisely, and happy to emulate the sensuous, amply developed Romantic prose of Chateaubriand, he prided himself on his irrelevance to contemporary values and concerns. The theme of the self, in fact the cult of the self which he had learned from Maurice Barrès (1862–1923), permeates his essays, which constitute a long dialogue with himself whose ultimate aim is to construct a poetic, mythic self-image, often with little correspondence to the actual facts of his life. An unrelenting nihilist, he wrote, in his essay collection Service inutile (1935; Useless service), “Only the idea of myself keeps me afloat on the seas of nothingness.” This tragic perspective, enriched by a wealth of reflections on many subjects, gives to Service inutile and to other fine collections of essays such as Aux fontaines du désir (1921–27; At the fountains of desire) and Le Solstice de juin (1941; June solstice) a unique beauty and power.

Camus, by contrast, clung to the ideal of social commitment in the name of humanism and justice. Much of his essay work consists of polemical articles first written for the significantly named newspaper, Combat (1944–47) and subsequently published in book form as Actuelles (1950–58; Current issues). As a political essayist he is a worthy successor of Renan and Prévost-Paradol. However, these “essays in rational form” couched in “the language of action” (his own description) he did not consider true “essays.” He reserved this purer designation for the three collections of semi-autobiographical, lyrico-narrative pieces entitled L’Envers et l’endroit (1937; The wrong side and the right side), Noces (1939; Nuptials), and L’Été (1954; Summer), inspired by his revered philosophy professor, Jean Grenier (1898–1971), and by the example of Grenier’s fine essay work, Les Îles (1933; The islands). (Camus named Grenier along with Montherlant and André Malraux as the modern writers who had most influenced him.) Unlike Montherlant, Camus had serious scruples about dwelling on himself as essay subject matter: for one thing, he expressed doubt that “any man has ever dared depict himself as he really is”; for another, he preferred what he called “objective” subjects. Finally, unlike Montherlant, he also excelled in the long form of the essay, his best work in this field probably being Le Mythe de Sisyphe (1942; The Myth of Sisyphus).

The novelist-essayists Blanchot and Butor are best understood in the context of the essay’s evolution in its relationship to the “postmodern” radical questioning of the whole concept of literary genres and of the privileged status accorded to the language of “literature.” Lafond has shown the venerable precedents of this movement in the 16th- and 17th-century defense of fragmentary and discontinuous literary forms (maxim, aphorism, essay). “The fragment,” noted Cioran, “is doubtless a disappointing genre, but the only honest one.” The philosopher Jacques Derrida (1930–) argued that “all writing is aphoristic” and that “the fragment is not a failed literary form but the very form of everything that is written.” He based this view on his claim as a semiotician that the meaning of a given unit in discourse is impossible to determine without indefinite deferral (what he called différance). Similarly, Barthes, in his essay on Butor, wrote: “The discontinuous is the fundamental status of all communication: there are no communicative signs that are not discrete [i.e. separate from all other units].” Derrida also questioned the concept of “genre” as a “principle imposing order,” that is, arbitrary order, and allowing “transgressions” only within its prescribed limits. The philosopher Édouard Morot-Sir (in an article in The French Essay, 1982) considers the essay as the ultimate “anti-genre,” perfectly expressive of contemporary “agnosticism, subjectivism, and nominalism [i.e. the belief that the names of things correspond to no metaphysical reality beyond themselves].” The essay as “anti-essay,” subversive of its own traditional forms, is but one variation among several in the 20th-century revolt against genres: the “anti-novel,” the “antitheater,” the “anti-painting,” etc.

Blanchot’s early essays in literary criticism, such as the collection Faux pas (1943; False steps), were relatively “straight” in manner, before he moved to the essay as “l’écriture fragmentaire” (“fragmentary writing”), a term he invented, and to the “anti-book” or “livre écartelé” (literally “drawn and quartered”) or “élaté” (“shattered,” “exploded”). His work, then, whether in fiction or criticism, became a “defense et illustration,” an apology for and practice of fragmentary and discontinuous forms. His sources were many: the “negative theology” of the great medieval theologian, Meister Eckhart (language can meaningfully make only negative statements about the nature of God); Mallarmé’s goal of “giving a purer meaning to the words of the tribe” and his reflections on the nature of language and of the “Book”; Nietzsche’s defense of the fragment; and Valéry’s concept of the “antibook.” Drawing on these precursors, together with his contemporaries, the philosophers Michel Foucault (1926–84) and Derrida, he probed the nature of language as the essential clue to the nature of being itself. Faced with the act of writing, he asked such questions as: “Who is speaking?” and “In what sense is there truly an author?” His striving to find a “language beyond language,” a “language outside itself,” and his resistance to the book as completion, closure, totality are reflected in such essay collections as L’Entretien infini (1969; The endless dialogue), L’Attente, l’oubli (1962; Waiting, forgetfulness), and Le Pas au-delà (1973; The step/not beyond). In these texts he practices what he called “plural speech,” using multiple typefaces (narrative fragments in italics juxtaposed with bold-face type for essay fragments), creating the effect of a dialogue between the different voices, creating also the illusion of an author who is “absent” (or, as he preferred to call it, “neuter”). The distinction between genres, in fact any claim that the concept of genre has meaning at all, has practically disappeared in such works.

Some of these essayistic features are also found in the work of Blanchot’s younger contemporary, Michel Butor (1926–). A natural-born experimenter and versatile (perhaps too versatile) polygraph, moving from one artistic experiment to another in a kind of frenzy, he was a pioneer in the nouveau roman (new novel) before abandoning the novel for what he calls “postnovelistic texts,” assimilating what he had learned of the novel into the writing of essays. In reality he was indifferent to the traditional distinction between genres and, even more significantly, to the longstanding assumption that works of “criticism” (i.e. essays) were somehow inferior to works of “invention” (novels, poems, plays). His model here was Baudelaire, on whom he wrote a critical study, Histoire extraordinaire: Essai sur un rêve de Baudelaire (1961; Histoire Extraordinaire: Essay on a Dream of Baudelaire's). His massive five-volume series of essays on literature, Répertoires (1960–82; Repertoires) and, in four volumes, his essays on art, Illustrations (1964–76), are less original in form than such texts as Mobile (1962), described as a “kaleidoscopic presentation of travel notes, lyrical outcries, dialogues, work timetables, and quotations” (Vercier and Lecarme). For Butor himself it was akin to a musical score, calling upon the reader’s collaboration to turn it into a composition; others compare it to “serialist music.” Central to Butor’s essays as well as his novels are his reflections on space, both “literary” and geographical space, and on reading, or, more exactly, on what it means to be a reader. This latter theme suggests a close affinity with Montaigne, which he in fact demonstrated in his Essais sur “Les Essais” (1968; Essays on the Essays), on the subject of La Boétie’s role in the Essais. He called himself, in a phrase that Montaigne would have enjoyed, a “monstrous reader.” In his reading of works of the past, again not unlike Montaigne, he sought to uncover in them their “power of subversion” (Georges Raillard, Butor, 1968).

5. Conclusion

Germaine Bree (1978) has written: “The French essay made such a brilliant stage entrance with Montaigne that it seems at one stroke to have reached a level of perfection designed to discourage successors.” She adds: “It was in England rather than in France that the essay won a rightful place among accepted literary genres.” As a title in the singular for a longish, tentative, and modest inquiry into a large subject, the essai took hold in France; but as a short form, for two centuries it assumed other names and guises, as though to distance itself from Montaigne. It became the invisible or nonexistent genre, unrecognized by critics and historians of letters. It was categorized—and often dismissed—as an English literary type. Rare were the French essayists such as Marivaux or Montégut willing to emulate their English counterparts. In one of his letters Flaubert hints at something deep in the French psyche that both admired the “superb parts” of English writing and distrusted its “defective composition” and “lack of plan.” Sainte-Beuve, introducing his famous article, “What Is a Classic?” (Causeries du lundi, 1850), indulges for once in a more informal manner of writing, “of the sort that our neighbors, the English, modestly call an ‘essay’ and have developed into a genre.” Brunetière makes no mention of the essay in his L’Évolution des genres, except, in the volume on criticism, to dismiss the English critics as “mere essayists.” A German anthologist of French moralist writings, G.R.Hocke, affirmed in 1938: “There is no French essay.” Fraser documents further evidence of this strange situation, citing French dictionaries and encyclopedias.

Gradually in our own century, however, thanks to the efforts of Chadbourne, Brée, Fraser, and others, awareness has increased that l’essai is much more than a vague amorphous term for “nonfiction” or “the prose of ideas” and that it deserves attention for its specific nature as a distinct literary genre, however elusive its nature may be. Among long-established, prestigious genres such as fiction, poetry, and drama, its very marginality and its freedom from the constraints of literary conventions have given it the advantage of being a uniquely flexible and adaptable instrument; so adaptable, in fact, that it is “protéiforme” (Brée), able like the Greek god Proteus to change its form at will; capable of assimilating features of the poem, the short story, or the dialogue; capable even, in the hands of a Blanchot, a Barthes, or a Butor, of subverting itself, dissolving into fragments and becoming the “anti-essay.”

The paradox is that the long absence in France of critical awareness of the essay as genre has coexisted with an extraordinarily rich production of essays and “essay-relatives,” almost without hiatus, from Michel de Montaigne to Michel Butor and beyond. Amidst the changing guises, certain more or less constant features of the essayist’s art recur: the invitation to the reader to enter into the author’s confidence and share in his or her dialogue with the self; the freedom of form sometimes called “artful disorder”; the effect of “thought-in-process” as distinct from the finished product of thought leading to conclusion and closure; reflections that are less premeditated than stimulated by chance, rooted in circumstance, using any subject as pretext. These features, which obviously derive from Montaigne, are hardly exclusive to the French essay. What may be its specific cachet is at least fourfold: a restrained, indirect manner of self-portraiture; a strong link with the moraliste literary tradition (not all moralistes are essayists but most essayists are moralistes); a greater willingness (certainly than the English essayists), especially since postmodernism, to use the essay as a tool for theoretical, often highly abstract speculations on the profoundest philosophical questions. As for the fourth feature, it has been beautifully summed up by Sontag apropos of Barthes’ essays. The French essay, she writes, provides merely one great “variation on the project of self-examination—the noblest project of French literature,” a project “inaugurated by Montaigne: the self as vocation, life as a reading of the self [with] the self as the locus of all possibilities.”

RICHARD M. CHADBOURNE

Anthologies

The Age of Enlightenment: An Anthology of Eighteenth Century French Literature, edited by Otis Fellows and Norman Torrey, New York: Appleton Century Crofts, 1971 (original edition, 1942)

Anthologie des essayistes français contemporains, Paris: Kra, 1929

Choix d’essais du vingtième siècle, edited by Germaine Brée and Philip Solomon, Waltham, Toronto, and London: Blaisdell, 1969

The Continental Model: Selected French Critical Essays of the Seventeenth Century, edited by Scott Elledge and Donald Schier, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, revised edition, 1970 (original edition, 1960)

Découverte de l’essai, edited by Susan Lawall, Christian Garaud, and Mireille Azibert, New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1975

Essays of French, German and Italian Essayists, New York: Colonial Press, and London: Co-operative Publication Society, 1900

Further Reading

- Bensmaïa, Réda, The Barthes Effect: The Essay as Reflective Text, Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1987 (original French edition, 1986)
- Boase, Alan, The Fortunes of Montaigne: A History of the Essays in France, 1580–1669, New York: Octagon, 1970 (original edition, 1935)
- Brée, Germaine, Twentieth-Century French Literature, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1983 (original French edition, 1978)
- Burke, Peter, Montaigne, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1981; New York: Hill and Wang, 1982
- Chadbourne, Richard, Ernest Renan as an Essayist, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1957
- Chadbourne, Richard, "Prévost-Paradol, Political Essayist," French Review 30 (1957):350–57
- Chadbourne, Richard, "The Essay World of Emile Montégut," PMLA 76 (1961):98–120
- Chadbourne, Richard, "Criticism as Creation in Sainte-Beuve," L'Esprit Créateur 14 (1974):44–54
- Chadbourne, Richard, Charles-Augustin Sainte-Beuve, Boston: Twayne, 1977
- Chadbourne, Richard, "A Puzzling Literary Genre: Comparative Views of the Essay," Comparative Literature Studies 20 (1983):133–53
- Champigny, Robert, Pour une esthétique de l'essai, Paris: Minard, 1967
- Croll, Morris, "Attic Prose: Lipsius, Montaigne, Bacon," in his Style, Rhetoric, and Rhythm: Essays, edited by J. Max Patrick and others, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1966
- Dréano, Maturin, La Renommée de Montaigne en France au XVIIIe siècle, 1677–1802, Angers: l'Ouest, 1952
- Fowlie, Wallace, "The Essay," in his A Guide to Contemporary French Literature: From Valéry to Sartre, New York: Meridian, 1957
- Frame, Donald, Montaigne's Essais: A Study, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice Hall, 1969
- Fraser, Theodore, The French Essay, Boston: Twayne, 1986 The French Essay, Columbia: University of South Carolina Department of Foreign Languages and Literatures, 1982
- Good, Graham, "Montaigne, the Growth of Experience," in his The Observing Self: Rediscovering the Essay, London and New York: Routledge, 1988:26–42
- Henry, Patrick, Montaigne in Dialogue, Saratoga, California: Anma Libri, 1987
- Hope, Quentin, Saint-Evremond, the Honnête Homme as Critic, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1962
- Lafond, Jean, editor, Les Formes brèves de la prose et le discours discontinu (XVIe-XVIIIe siècles), Paris: Vrin, 1984
- Queneau, Raymond, editor, Histoire des littératures, vol. 3, Paris: La Pléiade 1958
- Routh, H.V., "The Origins of the Essay Compared in English and French Literatures," Modern Language Review 15 (1920):18–40, 143–51
- Sontag, Susan, "Writing Itself: On Roland Barthes," The New Yorker, 26 April 1982:122–41
- Terrasse, Jean, Rhétorique de l'essai littéraire, Montreal: University of Quebec Press, 1977

- Thibaudet, Albert, Histoire de la littérature française de 1789 à nos jours, Paris: Stock, 1936; as French Literature from 1795 to Our Era, translated by Charles Lam Markmann, New York: Funk and Wagnall, 1968
- Vercier, Bruno, and Jacques Lecarme, La Littérature française depuis 1968, Paris: Bordas, 1982

Freud, Sigmund

Austrian, 1856–1939

Psychoanalytic theory, whether in Sigmund Freud's original version or in the reconstruction of it by French thinkers since the 1950s, has become an inescapable feature of Western intellectual culture in the 20th century. Controversy has undeniably helped to keep it at the focus of public attention, but there are also two factors inherent in Freud's writings which have contributed to maintaining that interest. One is the intellectual appeal (in a scientific age) of an integrative theory of mind and human creativity; the other is Freud's skill as a presenter of his own insights. For, as his supporters and critics alike have acknowledged, he could write very attractive German prose.

It is not clear that Freud ever followed a particular literary model in his writing, although he did admit to a special affinity with Lessing (the "father of modern German literature"). However, his works abound with quotations from literary authors—from Goethe and Heine, E.T.A.Hoffmann and Georg Christoph Lichtenberg, and the Austrian dramatists Franz Grillparzer and Johann Nestroy, as well as Shakespeare, Sophocles, and Virgil—and it is likely that such reading helped him to develop his ease of expression as well as providing him with corroboration for some of his key psychological insights. In his technical papers, as in his public lectures and his well-known brochures (on jokes, on religion, on the psychopathology of everyday life), he used an idiom which was readily intelligible to any educated German speaker. That lucidity largely survives in the English Standard Edition of his works, even if some of the central concepts which Freud expressed in simple and familiar German terms have been rendered into an artificial medicalese ("ego," "id," "parapraxis"). Freud's own Vorlesungen zur Einführung in die Psychoanalyse (1916; Introductory Lectures on PsychoAnalysis) remain the most readable introduction to his system of thought.

Freud seems to have avoided the term "essay" when describing his own works, and in the early stages of his career, at least, this may have been in order to avoid the impression that his argument was in any way imprecise. In the Standard Edition there are just two works that are so described—the Drei Abhandlungen zur Sexualtheorie (1905; Three Essays on the Theory of Sexuality) and Der Mann Moses und die monotheistische Religion (1939; Moses and Monotheism)—and even here the German word that Freud preferred was Abhandlung, which is suggestive rather of "treatise" or "discourse." The distinguishing features of his writing are nevertheless recognizably the techniques of a skilled essayist, regardless of whether as readers we accept them as convincing or reject them as fanciful and beguiling. His case studies, for example, invariably provide an exposition of the patient's personal situation which is at once vivid and painstakingly constructed, as well as containing moments of calculated surprise when particularly revealing information is disclosed. (Freud himself likened these studies to novellas.) Die Traumdeutung (1900; The Interpretation of Dreams), notwithstanding its character as a scholarly dissertation, makes for lively reading because of the way that empirical experience, whether clinical or personal, is extensively described in illustration of its central propositions. And precisely when he is developing his most speculative arguments, in his cultural and metapsychological writings of the 1920s and 1930s, Freud is usually careful to anticipate likely objections on the part of the reader, and to be frank about the incomplete or insecure nature of the supporting evidence for his views.

The intellectual basis for Freud's mature writings can be found in the works he published between 1900 and 1905. That basis is the notion of an "economy" of libidinal energies at work in the unconscious mind, energies with which each of us is born and which require to be "discharged," but which become disposed in particular ways under the influence of external conditioning factors as we grow from infancy to adulthood. His central thesis in The Interpretation of Dreams, for example, is that every dream is an expression of wish-fulfillment, but that the wish is made manifest only in disguised forms because the original impulse from which it derived is being prevented from entering consciousness. It is a model of the mind which enabled Freud to suggest that there is a universal system of psychic mechanisms at work in the production of neuroses, dreams, and creative acts, as well as the commonplace aberrations of everyday life. It allowed him to develop a taxonomy of personality types related to the phases of physiological and psychological development in early childhood. And it permitted him to argue in the Three Essays on the Theory of Sexuality that all forms of sexual behavior, including bestiality, fetishism, and homosexuality, share a common source—a bold and liberalizing argument in the circumstances of 1905, when "deviant" sexuality tended to be automatically attributed to genetic disorders or "degeneracy." The mechanism which confines the determining impulse to the unconscious Freud calls "repression." His explanation for it centers on the "Oedipus complex," the notion that the growing male child, on his progress to adulthood, must pass through a phase in which he perceives his father as a threatening rival for the affections of his mother. Freud sees the internalization of the father's authority (as a power which is simultaneously terrible and admirable) as the means by which the individual acquires a sense of social restraint, a conscience; he later gives it the name "superego."

Freud's gift for imaginative intellectual constructions is most clearly apparent in Totem und Tabu (1913; Totem and Taboo), where he draws on the writings of Darwin and of contemporary anthropologists in order to make connections between the characteristic mental patterns of neuroses and those of "primitive" cultures. That same internalization of paternal authority which determines compulsive behavior, he now argues, also governs the incest taboo and the worship of totem animals in animistic societies. On the basis of this parallel he develops his famous scenario for the origin of social morality and monotheistic religion in the killing of the "primal father" by a band of young males previously excluded from sexual enjoyment of the females of the tribe: their act of parricide eliminates the physical presence of the dominant male, but his authority lives on in their subsequent codification of sexual behavior and in the notion of a “father in heaven.” It is a scenario which Freud expressly characterizes as an intellectual scandal and a “just-so story,” but it provides the foundation for his discussion of the seemingly ineradicable antipathy of human beings toward their own cultural institutions in Das Unbehagen in der Kultur (1930; Civilization and Its Discontents) as well as for his later essays on the psychological origins of religion in general and of Judaism in particular, Die Zukunft einer Illusion (1927; The Future of an Illusion) and Moses and Monotheism.

Freud is at his least persuasive in Jenseits des Lustprinzips (1920; Beyond the Pleasure Principle), the text in which he sought to adjust his conception of the unconscious mind to clinical evidence arising from World War I. The recurrent nightmares of shell-shocked soldiers could not be accommodated within his earlier theory of wish-fulfillment, and in order to account for them Freud suggests that alongside the “erotic” drives of the libido there is a set of conservative drives in the mind which aims at the reduction of displeasure. He calls the second set the “death instinct” because he claims that, left to itself, it would ultimately aim to restore the organism to an inanimate state; and he attributes the phenomena of sexual violence and sadism to the “death instinct” because, he says, it defies reason to attribute them to “Eros.” It may be possible to see in these arguments an expression of Freud’s temperamental pessimism, which is similarly apparent both in his later comments on society and culture and in his public exchange of letters with Albert Einstein in 1932. on the question of why societies go to war. But they can equally be seen as an illogical attempt to conserve the integrity of his psychological theory in the face of an empirical challenge.

Freud’s theories have come under attack for a variety of reasons. He has been accused of selecting, and even suppressing, evidence in order to maintain the plausibility of the arguments he favors. He has been criticized as manifestly one-sided in his concentration on sexual energy as a determinant of human activity, and in the way he bases his account of culture exclusively on the psychology of the male. The very conception of his therapeutic regime has been attacked as oversystematized and authoritarian, entailing as it does the notion that a patient’s “resistance” may be interpreted as confirmation of the accuracy of the diagnosis. Most damaging of all for Freud’s psychological views, the principle of energy discharge on which he initially based his thinking has been shown since his time to be neither adequate nor accurate for a proper understanding of the nervous system.

What Freud’s writings do offer is (in Wittgenstein’s phrase) a “powerful mythology,” a body of arguments which uses the analytical language of scientific rationalism to express a conception of human identity determined by irrational impulses, by desires and anxieties. His works have retained their provocative vigor because of the skepticism they bring to bear on the comfortable notion that thinking is a wholly rational activity.

DAVID MIDGLEY

Biography

Sigmund Solomon Freud. Born 6 May 1856 in Freiburg, Moravia. Brought up in Vienna. Studied medicine at the University of Vienna, 1873–79, M.D., 1881; neurology with J.M.Charcot in Paris, and H.Bernstein in Nancy, 1885–86. Worked at the Physiological Institute of Vienna, 1876–82, Brücke Institute, Vienna, 1881–82, and the General Hospital, Vienna, 1882–85; lectured at the University of Vienna, 1885. Private practice in Vienna, 1886–1938. Married Martha Bernays, 1886: six children. Cofounder, Zeitschrift für Psychoanalyse und Imago, and the Jahrbuch der Psychoanalyse (Yearbook of psychoanalysis); editor, Intago journal, from 1912. Left Vienna to escape the Nazi regime, 1938, and lived in London, setting up a private practice. Awards: Goethe Prize, 1930; honorary degree from Clark University. Corresponding member, Royal Society, London, 1936; also member of many psychiatric and psychoanalytical societies and associations. Died (of cancer) in London, 23 September 1939.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Die Traumdeutung, 1900; as The Interpretation of Dreams, translated by Abraham A.Brill, 1913, and James Strachey, 1955

Drei Abhandlungen zur Sexualtheorie, 1905; as Three Contributions to the Sexual Theory, translated by Abraham A.Brill, 1910; as Three Essays on the Theory of Sexuality, translated by James Strachey, 1949

Über Psychoanalyse: Fünf Vorlesungen, 1910; as Five Lectures on Psycho-Analysis, edited and translated by James Strachey, 1957

Totem und Tabu: Über einige Übereinstimmungen im Seelenleben der Wilden und der Neurotiker, 1913; as Totem and Taboo: Resemblances Between the Psychic Lives of Savages and Neurotics, translated by Abraham A.Brill, 1918; as Totem and Taboo: Some Points of Agreement Between the Mental Lives of Savages and Neurotics, translated by James Strachey, 1950

Vorlesungen zur Einführung in die Psychoanalyse, 3 vols., 1916; as A General Introduction to Psychoanalysis, translated by Joan Riviere, 1920; as Introductory Lectures on Psycho-Analysis, translated by James Strachey, 1963

Das Unheimliche, 1919

Jenseits des Lustprinzips, 1920; as Beyond the Pleasure Principle, translated by C.J.M.Hubback, 1922, and James Strachey, 1950

Die Zukunft einer Illusion., 1927; as The Future of an Illusion, translated by W.D.Robson-Scott, 1928, and James Strachey, 1962

Das Unbehagen in der Kultur, 1930; as Civilization and Its Discontents, translated by Joan Riviere, 1930, and James Strachey, 1967

Neue Folge der Vorlesungen zur Einführung in die Psychoanalyse, 1933; as New Introductory Lectures on Psycho-Analysis, translated by W.J.H.Sprott, 1933, and James Strachey, 1964

Der Mann Moses und die monotheistische Religion, 1939; as Moses and Monotheism, translated by Katherine Jones, 1939, and James Strachey, 1974

The Freud Reader, edited by Peter Gay, 1989

Psychological Writings and Letters, edited by Sander L.Gilman, 1995

Other writings: many works on psychology and psychoanalysis, case studies of patients, diaries, and correspondence.

Collected works editions: Gesammelte Werke, 17 vols., 1940–52; The Standard Edition of the Complete Psychological Works of Sigmund Freud, general editor James Strachey, 24 vols., 1953–74; Studienausgabe, edited by Alexander Mitscherlich, Angela Richards, and James Strachey, 10 vols., 1969–89.

Bibliography

Grinstein, Alexander, Sigmund Freud's Writings: A Comprehensive Bibliography, New York: International Universities Press, 1977

Further Reading

Borch-Jacobsen, Mikkel, The Freudian Subject, Stanford, California: Stanford University Press, 1988; Basingstoke: Macmillan, 1989 (original French edition, 1982)

Bouveresse, Jacques, Wittgenstein Reads Freud: The Myth of the Unconscious, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1995 (original French edition, 1991)

Clark, Ronald W., Freud: The Man and the Cause, London: Cape, and New York: Random House, 1980

Forrester, John, Language and the Origin of Psychoanalysis, London: Macmillan, 1980

Fromm, Erich, "Freud's Theory of Aggressiveness and Destructiveness," in his The Anatomy of Human Destructiveness, New York: Holt Rinehart and Winston, 1973; London: Cape, 1974

Gay, Peter, Freud: A Life for Our Time, New York: Norton, and London: Dent, 1988

Jones, Ernest, Sigmund Freud: Life and Work, London: Hogarth Press, and New York: Basic Books, 3 vols., 1953–57

Kitcher, Patricia, Freud's Dream: A Complete Interdisciplinary Science of Mind, Cambridge, Massachusetts: MIT Press, 1992

Kline, Paul, Fact and Fantasy in Freudian Theory, 2nd (expanded) edition, London and New York: Methuen, 1981 (original edition, 1972)

Mahony, Patrick, Freud as a Writer, 2nd (expanded) edition, New Haven, Connecticut and London: Yale University Press, 1987

Marcus, Steven, Freud and the Culture of Psychoanalysis, London and Boston: Allen and Unwin, 1984

Masson, Jeffrey Moussaieff, Freud: The Assault on Truth: Freud's Suppression of the Seduction Theory, New York: Farrar Straus Giroux, and London: Faber, 1984

Meisel, Perry, editor, Freud: A Collection of Critical Essays, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice Hall, 1981

Ricoeur, Paul, Freud and Philosophy: An Essay on Interpretation, New Haven, Connecticut and London: Yale University Press, 1970 (original French edition, 1965)

Rieff, Philip, Freud: The Mind of the Moralizer, New York: Viking Press, 1959; London: Gollancz, 1960

Schönau, Walter, Sigmund Freuds Prosa: Literarische Elemente seines Stils, Stuttgart: Metzler, 1968

Storr, Anthony, Freud, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1989

Sulloway, Frank, Freud: Biologist of the Mind, New York: Basic Books, and London: Deutsch, 1979

Wallace, Edwin R. IV, Freud and Anthropology: A History and Reappraisal, New York: International Universities Press, 1983

Webster, Richard, Why Freud Was Wrong: Sin, Science and Psychoanalysis, London: HarperCollins, and New York: Basic Books, 1995

Wollheim, Richard, Freud, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1990 (original edition, 1971)

Wollheim, Richard, and James Hopkins, editors, Philosophical Essays on Freud, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1982

Freyre, Gilberto

Brazilian, 1900–1987

Gilberto Freyre is considered one of the major figures in Brazilian thought. His essays exemplify rigorous scientific training combined with a keen artistic sensitivity to provide the reader with a glimpse of Brazilian society, particularly that of the northeast region. Freyre's life and work spanned most of the 20th century; he witnessed at first-hand many of the changes that took place in his native country—revolution, dictatorship (benevolent and repressive), Modernism, political apathy, political diversification, and democracy. Throughout this turbulent century, Freyre was a methodical observer of society, and most of his insights were new and controversial, although many have come to be seen as part of the “national lore.”

In 1926 he wrote the Manifesto regionalista de 1926 (pub. 1952; Regionalist manifesto), in direct opposition to the ideals proposed during the Week of Modern Art (1922) that marked the beginning of Brazilian Modernism. The Manifesto develops two interrelated themes: the defense of the region as a unit of national organization and the conservation of regional and traditional values in Brazil in general and in the northeast region in particular.

As a scientist, Freyre followed the path established by Euclides da Cunha concerning miscegenation in the formation of the “Brazilian race.” Freyre, however, was more methodical and scientific in his writings. His greatest work, Casagrande e senzala (1933; Masters and Slaves), earned him international acclaim as the most solid interpretation of interracial relations to that date. The publication of Masters and Slaves marked the beginning of rigorous science essay production in Brazil. Critics have named this book as the first to separate scientific essays from purely academic and critical essays. Although other writers had already begun to study and write essays with sociocultural content, Freyre has rightfully earned recognition as the “Father of Brazilian Sociology.”

The relationship between “masters” and “slaves” is the basic premise of all of Freyre's theories. Indeed, he paved the way for many of the current ideas concerning modern cultural studies and postcolonial observations. Only through understanding the nature of oppression—whatever its source—can one comprehend one's culture. Similarly, only through “reading” the oppressor's text—the text of the master—can one begin to understand one's own text. Freyre applied his own thesis in his interpretation of Brazilian society. Unlike many essayists who describe Brazil in terms of what happens in the main population centers—São Paulo and Rio de Janeiro—Freyre studies the “periphery” of Brazilian society, including his native northeast and the northern region of Brazil. Both regions represent the “slaves” within a society, with many internal and external “masters.” Indeed, he criticizes the Brazilian elite, who habitually adopted customs they judged to be modern, emphasizing the “foreign” (French) over the “national” (Brazilian).

Freyre’s discourse is sober and precise. He uses a limited vocabulary characterized by only the most necessary scientific terminology. Like Graciliano Ramos, he limits the use of adjectives, providing the reader with a discourse that mirrors the dry conditions of the society and culture he describes. While not subscribing to the racist views founded on European positivism, Freyre is conservative in his views, particularly those that deal with women’s roles. His much-studied “masters and slaves” thesis falls short of including women as oppressed beings within a patriarchal society. Women’s roles, according to Freyre, are limited to those of wives and mothers. Indeed, his most emphatic (and, one should add, least scientific) view is that the best and only books women ought to read are cookbooks, particularly those that have been in the family for a long time; this, Freyre believes, will preserve the moral fiber of the family.

Freyre’s essays influenced not only scientific writing in Brazil, but also the development of the northeastern regionalist novel. Such writers as José Lins do Rego, Rachel de Queiroz, and Jorge Amado have all mirrored in their novels the social context and the language found in Gilberto Freyre.

CARMEN CHAVES TESSER

Biography

Gilberto de Mello Freyre. Born 15 March 1900 in Recife, Pernambuco. Studied at the American Colégio Gilreath, Recife, until 1917; Baylor University, Waco, Texas, 1918–21, B.A., 1921; Columbia University, New York, 1921–22, M.A. in anthropology, 1922. Traveled in Europe, 1922–23. Private secretary to the Governor of Pernambuco, Recife, 1927–30. Editor, A Província, Recife, 1928–30. Taught sociology at the Escola Normal, Recife, 1928–30. Exiled to Portugal, then traveled to Africa, 1930. Professor of sociology, University of São Paulo, 1935–38; visiting professor at various universities in Brazil, Europe, and the United States. Married Maria Magdalena Guedes Pereira, 1941: one daughter and one son. Representative of Pernambuco, National Assembly, 1946, and in the House of Deputies, 1947–50. Brazilian Ambassador to the United Nations General Assembly, 1949, 1964. Supervisor, Northeast Brazil Social and Educational Research Center, Recife, 1957–87. Director, Diogene and Cahiers Internationaux de Sociologie (International notebooks of sociology). Awards: several, including the Felipe d’Oliveira Award, 1934; Machado de Assis Prize, 1963; José Vasconcelos Gold Medal (Mexico), 1974; Moinho Santista Prize, 1974; honorary degrees from five universities. Member, São Paulo Academy of Letters, 1961, Brazilian Academy of Letters, 1962, and American Academy of Arts and Sciences. Knight Commander, Order of the British Empire (KBE), 1971. Commander, Legion of Honor (France), 1986. Died in Recife, 18 July 1987.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

- Casa-grande e senzala: Formação de família brasileira sob o regime de economia patriarcal*, 1933; as Masters and Slaves, translated by Samuel Putnam, 1946
- Artigos de jornal*, 1935; revised, enlarged edition, as Retalhos de jornais velhos, 1964
- Sobrados e mucambos*, 1936; as The Mansions and the Shanties, translated by Harriet de Onís, 1963
- Região e tradição*, 1941
- Na Bahia em 1943*, 1944
- Perfil de Euclides e outros perfis*, 1944
- Brazil: An Interpretation* (lectures), 1945; revised, enlarged edition, as New World in the Tropics: The Culture of Modern Brazil, 1959
- Manifesto regionalista de 1926*, 1952
- Um brasileiro em terras portuguesas*, 1952
- Problemas brasileiros de antropologia*, 1959
- Ordem e progresso*, 1959; as Order and Progress: Brazil from Monarchy to Republic, edited and translated by Rod W.Horton, 1970
- O Luso e o trópico*, 1961
- Vida, forma e côr*, 1962
- 6 conferências em busca de um leitor*, 1965
- Seleção para jovens*, edited by Maria Elisa Dias Collier, 1971
- A condição humana e outras temas*, 1972
- Além do apenas moderno: Sugestões em torno de possíveis futuros do hotnen, em geral, e do homen brasileiro, em particular*, 1973
- The Gilberto Freyre Reader*, translated by Barbara Shelby, 1974
- O brasileiro entre os outros hispanos: Afinidades, contrastes, e possíveis futuros nas suas inter-relações*, 1975
- A presença do açúcar na formação brasileira*, 1975
- Alhos e bugalhos: Ensaio sobre temas contraditórios*, 1978
- Préfacios desgarrados*, edited by Edson Nery de Fonseca, 2 vols., 1978
- Tempo de aprendiz* (articles 1918–26), edited by José Antônio Gonsalves de Mello, 2 vols., 1979
- Pessoas, coisas e animais: Ensaio*, edited by Edson Nery de Fonseca, 1981
- Other writings: two novels, poetry, a cookbook, and many books on Brazilian history and culture.

Bibliography

- Foster, David William, and Walter Rela, in Brazilian Literature: A Research Bibliography, New York: Garland, 1990

Further Reading

- Arroyo, Jossianna, "El cuerpo del esclavo y la narrativa de la nación en Casa-Grande e senzala de Gilberto Freyre," Lucero 4 (1993):31–42
- Gilberto Freyre: Sua ciência, sua filosofia, sua arte*, Rio de Janeiro: Olympio, 1962
- Oliven, Ruben, Tradition Matters: Gaúcho Diversity in Brazil, New York: Columbia University Press, 1996
- Sanchez-Eppler, Benigo, "Telling Anthropology: Zora Neale Hurston and Gilberto Freyre Disciplined in Their Field-Home-Work," American Literary History 4 (1992):464–88

Frisch, Max

Swiss, 1911–1991

Max Frisch's reputation as one of this century's foremost authors of German literature is based mainly on a number of formidable novels, plays, and literary diaries. His importance as a prodigious essayist is known only in the German-speaking world since the vast majority of his essays have never been translated. Indeed, it could be stated that the essay as a literary genre is at the core of Frisch's work. Beginning in the early 1930s, when he wrote book reviews and short stories as a young student at the University of Zurich, a splendid array of essays extends over a period of some 60 years, ending with Frisch's last publication, "Schweiz ohne Armee?" (1989; Switzerland without an army?), an essay in dialogue form which was dedicated "with gratitude to Denis Diderot and Ulrich Bräker," two essayists of the Enlightenment tradition, which he considered the last great utopia of humankind. The subject of this last essay may explain at least partially why Frisch's essays have remained mostly unappreciated outside Switzerland: they deal to a great extent with Swiss matters, be they political or cultural. In fact, to understand the weight of Frisch's essays within his literary oeuvre, one has to recognize the central role the essay as a genre has always played in Switzerland's literary tradition, from Rousseau, Johann Heinrich Pestalozzi, Jeremias Gotthelf, and Gottfried Keller in the past to Carl Spitteler, Carl Burckhardt, C.-F. Ramuz, Max Rychner, Paul Nizon, and Adolf Muschg and Peter von Matt in more recent times. The literary essay is a typical art form in that country of four major cultures whose common denominator rests on political rather than cultural similarities and which is thus dependent on short and well-formulated essays as a means of intercultural and intertextual communication.

Yet to call Frisch simply an essayist on Swiss matters would do injustice to his oeuvre, whose quality, range, and depth make him one of the few world-class authors Switzerland has produced. From a biographical point of view, Frisch's literary works coincide with some of the major events of the 20th century. As a writer, he was in personal contact with some of the most significant cultural and political personalities of his age. Frisch's essays on contemporaries include those on his fellow writers, colleagues and friends Albin Zollinger, Thomas Mann, Bertolt Brecht, Friedrich Dürrenmatt, Peter Suhrkamp, Teo Otto, Kurt Hirschfeld, Günter Grass, Andrei D. Sakharov, Ludwig Hohl, Varlin (i.e. Willi Guggenheim), and Gottfried Honegger. Many experiences and encounters that are of interest to a greater public have entered his essays or appear in essay form in Frisch's literary diaries. (His friendship with Brecht comes to mind, or his lunch in the White House with Henry Kissinger, or a trip to China as a companion of Helmut Schmidt.)

Essays play a central role in Frisch's life as a literary diary by reflecting the writer's love for the open-ended sketch and his distrust of timeless perfection. As with the literary diary, Frisch's numerous essays provide the reader with structure and guidance through his own prolific literary work. Frisch is not an easy guide, no Baedeker for superficial readers. He makes demands that are perhaps too difficult for many who want to ignore his haunting, inescapable questions. Frisch set standards for literary thought and linguistic elegance. Since Franz Kafka, Robert Musil, and Thomas Mann, German literature has known no writer who handled the German language with equal precision. "Everything that is completed ceases to be the home of our spirit," he states at the end of his essay "Das erste Haus" (1942; The first house), reminding the reader of Frisch's early training as an architect.

Frisch's reflections, his intellectual analyses, his remarkable insights into the spiritual development of his epoch are nowhere more apparent than in the over 200 known essays that appear listed in his Gesammelte Werke in zeitlicher Folge (1976–86; Collected works in chronological order). His didactic intentions are quite obvious. He considered himself to belong to the tradition of the age of reason, which he eventually came to judge as a failed endeavor.

His lifelong battle against premature reconciliation, against any kind of ideology or compromise, made him a formidable opponent of all establishments, whether conservative, socialist, or postmodern. He taught the daring adventure of ongoing utopian thought. Frisch had many opponents among those compatriots who, as he said in his speech on the occasion of the awarding of the Schiller Prize, "have only an Establishment, complete with flag, posing as Heimat—and owned by the military to boot" ("Die Schweiz als Heimat" [1974; "Switzerland as Heimat"].)

Of Frisch's essays, those about politics were the most heated and passionate, those about literature the most memorable. Over the years he gradually gave up the somewhat apodictic style of his earlier writings and developed a new form of essayistic prose, the so-called "Fragebogen" (questionnaire), consisting of a list of mostly unanswerable questions regarding the human condition. With his precise questions he challenged the reader into recognizing the frailty of the world he lived in and the false assumptions on which the human condition has been built, as in his caustic but humane query at the beginning of his last "Fragebogen 1987": "Are you sure you are really interested in the preservation of the human race, once you and all the people you know are no longer living?"

ROLF KIESER

Biography

Max Rudolf Frisch. Born 15 May 1911 in Zurich. Studied at the Kantonale Realgymnasium, Zurich, 1924–30; University of Zurich, 1930–33; Zurich Technische Hochschule, 1936–41, diploma in architecture, 1941. Freelance journalist, from 1933. Served in the Swiss army, 1939–45. Married Gertrud Anna Constance von Meyenburg, 1942, (divorced, 1959): two daughters and one son. Practicing architect in Zurich, 1942–55. Traveled in Europe throughout the late 1940s; visited the United States and Mexico, 1951–52; lived in Rome, 1960–65, then moved back to Switzerland. Married Marianne Öllers, 1968 (later divorced). Awards: several, including Raabe Prize, 1954; Büchner Prize, 1958; Zurich Prize, 1958; Veillon Prize, 1958; Jerusalem Prize, 1965; Schiller Prize (Baden-Württemberg), 1965; Schiller Prize (Switzerland), 1974; Neustadt International Prize, 1986; Heine Prize, 1989; honorary degrees from five universities and colleges. Died in Zurich, 4 April 1991.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Tagebuch mit Marion, 1947

Tagebuch 1946–1949, 1950; as Sketchbook 1946–1949, translated by Geoffrey Skelton, 1977

Ausgewählte Prosa, 1961; enlarged edition, 1965

Tagebuch 1966–1971, 1972; as Sketchbook 1966–1971, translated by Geoffrey Skelton, 1974

Forderungen des Tages: Porträts, Skizzen, Reden 1943–1982, 1983

Novels, Plays, Essays, edited by Rolf Kieser, 1989

Other writings: several novels (including Stiller [I'm Not Stiller], 1954; Homo Faber, 1957) and II plays (including Biedermann und die Brandstifter [The Fire Raisers], 1958; Andorra, 1961).

Collected works edition: Gesammelte Werke in zeitlicher Folge, edited by Hans Mayer, 7 vols., 1976–86.

Bibliographies

Gerlach, Rainer, "Bibliographie," Text+Kritik issue on Frisch, 47–48 (1983):114–49
 Wilbert-Collins, Elly, in A Bibliography of Four Contemporary German-Swiss Authors: Friedrich Dürrenmatt, Max Frisch, Robert Walser, Albin Zollinger, Berne: Francke, 1967:33–52

Further Reading

Bodine, Jay F., "Frisch's Little White Lies: Self-Discovery and Engagement Through

- Skepsis of Language and Perspective,” in Perspectives on Max Frisch, edited by Gerhard F.Probst and Jay F.Bodine, Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1982.
- Cook, Mary E., “‘Countries of the mind’: Max Frisch’s Narrative Technique,” Modern Language Review 65 (1970):820–28
- Pender, Malcolm, Max Frisch: His Work and Its Swiss Background, Stuttgart: Heinz, 1979
- Petersen, Jürgen H., Max Frisch, Stuttgart: Metzler, 1978
- Schmitz, Walter, Max Frisch: Das Werk (1931–1961), Berne: Lang, 1985
- Schmitz, Walter, Max Frisch: Das Spätwerk (1962–1982), Tübingen: Francke, 1985
- Schuchmann, Manfred E., Der Autor als Zeitgenosse: Gesellschaftliche Aspekte in Max Frischs Werk, Berne: Lang, 1979
- Stephan, Alexander, Max Frisch, Munich: Beck, 1983
- Weisstein, Ulrich, Max Frisch, New York: Twayne, 1967
- Werner, Markus, Bilder des Endgültigen, Entwürfe des Möglichen: Zum Werk von Max Frisch, Berne: Lang, 1975

Frye, Northrop

Canadian, 1912–1991

Almost all of Northrop Frye’s writings are essays in the broad sense of the word. He termed his first book, Fearful Symmetry (1947), an “extended critical essay in the Swinburne tradition.” Anatomy of Criticism (1957) is subtitled “Four Essays.” Most of his earlier short pieces are reviews, and most of his mature writings began as public lectures; but in all of these the essential features of the essay prevail. His recurrent concern is the relation of his immediate subject to the conception of literature collectively as a meaningful whole, unified by an organizing mythology and by recurrent patterns of imagery and narrative. Roughly half of his books are groupings of essays on a common author or theme; most of the others are collected reprints from his 350-odd journal articles.

Frye’s essays return repeatedly to several favored topics: critical studies of Blake, Shakespeare, Milton, Yeats, T.S.Eliot, and Stevens; educational themes, such as examination of the purpose of studying literature, a theory of education based on the conception of the primacy of the Bible and of Greek mythology in the teaching of Western literature, and the nature and function of the university; social themes, especially the function of the study of literature as educating the imagination and thus as the quintessential tool for understanding and survival in society.

Frye’s audience is almost invariably a university audience, but a relatively unspecialized one. Frye was an instinctive teacher, and even his studies of Shakespeare or Milton are designed to appeal to the not entirely converted. The blind spots and the mental blocks of the specialist and the reluctant freshman assume equal importance. Prefiguring new historicism in a sense, his assumption is constantly that the cultural highbrow, the common reader, and the barely literate unwittingly have more in common than divides them; and central to his conception of literature is the assumption that the texts of imaginative literature, from the classics to pulp romance and soap opera, are similarly informed by a common body of mythological structures. This logically required his reaction, strongly polemical in its context of the trends of the time, against the prevailing conception of criticism as evaluation.

For Frye the intellectually honest may change their opinions but not their principles or their informing mythological constructs, hence the possibility of treating the structure of their thought and imagery as a consistent unit. His studies of literary figures thus tend to deal primarily with the relation of the part to the whole, on an assumption, like Milton's, that the life of the poet is itself a poem.

Seminal to Frye's thought is the poetry of William Blake, the subject of Fearful Symmetry. A deep instinctive revulsion to the mechanistic elements of British empirical thought, and to the industrialized tyranny it spawned, led Blake to focus on the relevance and importance of the arts and on the centrality of human creativity, themes that Frye made his own. Human essence and existence are those of an imagination that constructs a world in its own image, a world of gardens and cities and communities and domesticated animals. The artist is thus the quintessential human, in possession of a creativity that transcends the individual; for Blake this larger personality, in which the human and the divine are the same thing, is that of Jesus. Frye's nonconformist (and sometimes destructively conservative) childhood Protestantism, to which he seems to have felt both commitment and revulsion, made Blake's exuberant optimism of spirit, and his triumphant transcendence over some of the deadlier elements of the same traditions, the breath of fresh air that enabled Frye to resolve the tensions of his own background and to find his characteristic stance and voice.

Frye claims that the genesis of his thought moved from Blake, who worked out the principles of literary symbolism and biblical typology for himself, and on to Renaissance figures like Spenser, who took them from the critical theories of his age. (Frye's first graduate teaching was on Spenser, and the Spenser essay in Fables of Identity [1963] is apparently the epitome of an unwritten second book.) Anatomy of Criticism takes from this nexus the conviction that the Western world possesses a consistent and unified mythology, encyclopedic in range, from which its literature and thought are descended or "displaced." The Anatomy's project is a trial grammar or taxonomy of this integrated conception of literature. A polarization, conceived of as embedded in the structure of the imagination, and derived largely through Blake from the Bible, conceives the projection of a world of desire in comedy and romance and of anxiety in tragedy and irony or satire. Widely admired, but frequently seen as overly schematic, the Anatomy's premises per se have not gained general acceptance. It nevertheless stands as one of the most quoted books of the postwar period.

In contrast, Frye's work on Shakespearean comedy, culminating in A Natural Perspective (1965), is now widely accepted. Its central themes are: first, comedy's highly conventionalized nature as a function of its descent from oral culture, folklore, and myth; second, its movement from an initial "blocking" world of rigid law and parental and social repression, through a phase of complications and release in the context of a natural world that is variously exotic, innocent, green, magic, and dream-related, to a renewed and reconfigured social world characterized by self-knowledge, marriage, and the passage of authority between the generations; finally, its vision, grounded in desire, of a union of the human imagination with a benevolent natural order, with the result that a deeper human identity is found and society is renewed on a higher level of existence.

A student and admirer of Canadian poet E.J.Pratt, Frye took an early and enduring interest in Canadian writing. This manifested itself in numerous early reviews, especially in Canadian Forum, which he edited for some years, and, through the 1950s, in a survey of the year's poetry, written annually for the University of Toronto Quarterly's "Letters in Canada" issues. His view of Canadian literature, which he conceived of as being at a stage somewhat analogous to that of Old English, features some similarities of bleakness in what he calls a "garrison complex" and in its sense of nature as powerfully alien.

The Great Code (1982) and Words with Power (1990), based on the conception of the unity of the Bible's imagery and narrative, are both a late climax to Frye's career and a working out of themes he was already at work on in his Blake book. In the former, recuperating typological reading, which was much out of fashion when he first turned to it, Frye sees the Bible as a series of seven phases of revelation, all recreations of one another. A structuring of metaphor, polarized between desire and anxiety, projects recurrent bodies of apocalyptic and demonic imagery respectively. Recurrent mythology constitutes narrative as a series of deliverances, from the escape out of Egypt to the inheritance of the Kingdom. The language of the Bible, a language of love, is seen to transcend all that divides, and to find a final antitype in the reader's mind. Words with Power considers the determinative and authorizing relation of the Bible to Western literature and argues the principle that its language of myth and metaphor provide the context and pattern for all literary creation and for all thought.

RICHARD SCHELL

Biography

Herman Northrop Frye. Born in Sherbrooke, Quebec, 14 July 1912. Studied at Aberdeen High School, Moncton, graduated, 1928; Victoria College, University of Toronto, 1929–33, B.A. in philosophy and English, 1933; theology at Emmanuel College, Toronto, 1933–36 (spent Summer 1934 as a student preacher near Shaunavon, Saskatchewan), ordained into the ministry of the United Church of Canada, 1936; Merton College, Oxford, 1936–39, B.A. in English, 1939, M.A., 1943. Married Helen Kemp, 1937 (died, 1986). Lecturer, from 1937, professor of English, from 1948, chair of department, from 1952, and principal, 1959, Victoria College; University Professor of English, University of Toronto, from 1967; chancellor, Victoria University, Toronto, from 1978. Editor, Canadian Forum, 1948–52; supervisory editor, Uses of Imagination textbook series, Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, New York. Elected to the Royal Society of Canada, 1951. Married Elizabeth Brown, 1988. Awards: Lorne Pierce Medal, 1958; Pierre Chauveau Medal, 1970; Molson Prize, 1971; Royal Bank of Canada Award, 1978; Canada Council Medal, 1978; Governor-General's Award, 1987; dozens of honorary degrees from universities worldwide, particularly Canadian. Companion, Order of Canada, 1972. Died (of a heart attack) in Toronto, 22 January 1991.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Fearful Symmetry: A Study of William Blake, 1947

Anatomy of Criticism: Four Essays, 1957

The Educated Imagination, 1963

Fables of Identity: Studies in Poetic Mythology, 1963

T.S.Eliot, 1963

The Well-Tempered Critic, 1963

A Natural Perspective: The Development of Shakespearean Comedy and Romance, 1965

The Return of Eden: Five Essays on Milton's Epics, 1965; as Five Essays on Milton's Epics, 1966

Floes of Time: Studies in Shakespearean Tragedy, 1967

The Modern Century, 1967

A Study of English Romanticism, 1968

The Stubborn Structure: Essays on Criticism and Society, 1970

The Bush Garden: Essays on the Canadian Imagination, 1971

The Critical Path: An Essay on the Social Context of Literary Criticism, 1971

The Secular Scripture: A Study of the Structure of Romance, 1976

Spiritus Mundi: Essays on Literature, Myth, and Society, 1976

Northrop Frye on Culture and Literature: A Collection of Review Essays, edited by Robert D.Denham, 1978

Creation and Recreation, 1980

Divisions on a Ground: Essays on Canadian Culture, edited by James Polk, 1981

The Great Code: The Bible and Literature, 1982

The Myth of Deliverance: Reflections on Shakespeare's Problem Comedies, 1983

Northrop Frye on Shakespeare, edited by Robert Sandler, 1986

On Education, 1988

Myth and Metaphor: Selected Essays, 1974–1988, edited by Robert D.Denham, 1990

Reading the World: Selected Writings, 1935–1976, edited by Robert D.Denham, 1990

Words with Power: Being a Second Study of the Bible and Literature, 1990

The Double Vision: Language and Meaning in Religion, 1991

The Eternal Act of Creation: Essays, 1979–1990, edited by Robert D.Denham, 1993

Collected works edition: Collected Works, edited by Robert D. Denham, 1996–(in progress).

Bibliography

Denham, Robert D., Northrop Frye: An Annotated Bibliography of Primary and Secondary Sources, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1987

Further Reading

Ayre, John, Northrop Frye: A Biography, Toronto: Random House, 1989

Hamilton, A.C., Northrop Frye: Anatomy of His Criticism, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1990

Hart, Jonathan, Northrop Frye: The Theoretical Imagination, London and New York: Routledge, 1994

Lee, Alvin A., and Robert D. Denham, editors, The Legacy of Northrop Frye, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1994

Fuentes, Carlos

Mexican, 1928–

Carlos Fuentes is one of Latin America's greatest writers, remarkable as both a fiction writer and an intellectual. An enthusiastic participant in conferences and international forums, he has given countless interviews in which he talks about his life, literary ideas, world view, books, obsessions, and desires. He is cosmopolitan, sophisticated, and vigorous, as well as an assiduous inquirer and intense creator. Author of numerous essays, he also writes novels and stories, chronicles, articles, reviews, literary criticism, translations, plays, and movie scripts. Although he has published a dozen books of essays, many others are scattered in publications throughout the world. Of his writings his nonfiction prose is the least studied, but it is of enormous influence in political, literary, and cultural discussions.

Fuentes began his career as a critic when, along with Emmanuel Carballo and Octavio Paz, he founded the review Revista Mexicana de Literatura (Mexican review of literature) in 1954. He undertook this endeavor, he explains in an interview with Jonathan Tittler in 1980, "with the express purpose of combatting the narrowness of literary chauvinism, of opening our windows to the world, and particularly to the rest of Latin America." Paris: La revolución de mayo (1968; Paris: the May revolution), his first nonfiction published as a brief book, best defined as a political chronicle, became famous and widely read among students and leftwing intellectuals. His first book of essays, La nueva novela hispanoamericana (1969; The new Hispanic American novel), in which he reflects on the new Latin American narrative, is one of his best-known works, and frequently considered the theoretical exposition of his own fiction. Fuentes writes about literature, especially the novel, constantly and extensively, but he also writes on political, social, and economic subjects, as well as history, culture, and life in Latin America. His essays are not limited to explicating his own writings: they are also part of the vast project that characterizes his creative effort. As in the novel, in the essay he seeks to formulate the many complex and interacting sides of history and culture, in which writing is conceived as a boundless verbal exploration arriving at knowledge only through the imagination.

Two books center on his own country: Tiempo mexicano (1971; Mexican time), and Nuevo tiempo mexicano (1994; New Mexican time). However, although Mexico is his main concern, Fuentes characteristically extends his perspective to all of Latin America, elaborating an intricate and expansive understanding of its many manifestations, often counterpointing its past and present and conjoining its Indian and Spanish inheritance. A good example of this is the long essay, El espejo enterrado (1992; The Buried Mirror), where Fuentes explores the 500 years of what he considers the life of the American continent torn between dream and reality, between the precious cultural inheritance ranging from the stones of Chichén Itzá and Machu Picchu to modern Indian influences, from the baroque of colonial times to contemporary literature, and the failure and crisis of its political and economic systems.

The variegation in Fuentes' fictional prose also appears in his essays. He constantly rereads and rewrites his own tradition, dismantling old schemes in literary, historical, political, and ethnic fields. For Fuentes, there is a silence hidden behind the sterile rhetoric in Latin American literature that overshadows the vitality of language and creation, and of the history and identity of Latin America. In his work, this becomes an assertion of the American universalism expressed in an intense confluence of speeches and cultures, incessantly revolving in multiple shadings. His essay prose is not only lucid, dense, and subjugating, but also precise, erudite, and polemical. It follows a linearity in the development of thought, drawing together disparate elements and unfolding a multiple perspective with which he rejects the pretense of totality and sufficiency of closed systems.

Much of the innovation of his essays lies in their aesthetic texture. Fuentes writes in a characteristically autobiographical and anecdotal voice, but unlike the familiar essay, his themes are of an elevated nature. There is a constant essaying self, with attenuated variations (it almost disappears in La nueva novela hispanoamericana), which becomes an axis from which the tensions of his discourse are displaced and unfolded. Fuentes' essays exhibit a breadth and depth of knowledge and assume an intelligent readership not willing to be guided by formulas. Fuentes does not accept the restrictions of genre; rather he favors their intermixture. He flouts univocal views and Cartesian continuity, claiming instead the plurality and convergence of language as a cognitive process which is able to grasp a reality that is multiform and plural. In this sense, language becomes one of his main themes (José Carlos González Boixo, 1988).

In his essays, Fuentes accumulates cultural information, displaying a vigorous process of comparisons, interactions, pronouncements, remarks, convergences, and divergences. Counterpoints abound: "Desire in the western world decreases in inverse proportion to the increasing number of objects capable of satisfying it" (Tiempo mexicano); evocations: "Whoever has been in the city of Buenos Aires knows that the most fantastic flight of Borges was born in a backyard ..." (La nueva novela hispanoamericana); counterpositions: "History is not an uninterrupted development, but a winding, spiral movement..." (Valiente mundo nuevo [1990; Brave new world]).

Fuentes often freely combines serious, highly sophisticated language with humor and slang, as well as familiar and colloquial language. He sometimes mixes tragic and comic modes or interweaves high and popular culture. His tone may be refined but can quickly become visceral and ardent. Stylistically, Fuentes leads the reader along many tangents, resulting not in aimless thought but in an intensification of the vision he offers. For him this enriching use of language compensates for the many centuries of silence in Spanish American literature.

Polemical, courageous, and outspoken (politically he defines himself as center-left), Fuentes has become a controversial writer. Nevertheless, he is admired and highly respected, for he has given expression to deep Latin American feelings, defending their justice and freedom, and maintaining a characteristically critical attitude against oppressive political schemes throughout Latin America and the rest of the world. In his essays he is essentially critical, but also maintains what he calls the horizon of literature—that is, memory and desire as imagination in our own time, so that we can witness both the past and the future.

BLANCA M.GARCÍA MONSIVAIS

Biography

Born 11 November 1928 in Panama City. Parents were Mexican; he later became a Mexican citizen. Lived in the United States, Chile, and Argentina, then returned to Mexico at age 16. Studied at the Colegio Frances Morelos; National Autonomous University of Mexico, Mexico City, LL.B., 1948; Institut des Hautes Études Internationales, Geneva. Member, then secretary of the Mexican delegation, International Labor Organization, Geneva, 1950–52; assistant chief of press section, Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Mexico City, 1954; press secretary, United Nations Information Center, Mexico City, 1954. Editor, Revista Mexicana de Literatura, 1954–58, El Espectador (The spectator), 1959–61, Siempre (Always), from 1960, and Política, from 1960. Secretary, then assistant director of the Cultural Department, National Autonomous University of Mexico, 1955–56. Head of Department of Cultural Relations, Ministry of Foreign Affairs, 1957–59. Married Rita Macedo, 1959 (divorced, 1966): one daughter; married Sylvia Lemus, 1973: one son and one daughter. Mexican ambassador to France, 1974–77. Fellow or visiting lecturer/professor at various American and British universities, 1974–87; taught at the University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia, 1978–83, and Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, from 1984. Awards: many, including Villaurrutia Prize, 1975; Gallegos Prize (Venezuela), 1977; Reyes Prize, 1979; Mexican National Award for Literature, 1984; Cervantes Prize, 1987; Darío Prize, 1988; New Order of Cultural Independence (Nicaragua), 1988; Prince of Asturias Prize (Spain), 1994; Grinzane Cavouch International Prize (Italy), 1994; National Order of Merit (France), 1997; honorary degrees from eight universities.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

París: La revolución de mayo, 1968

El mundo de José Luis Cuevas, 1969

La nueva novela hispanoamericana, 1969

Casa con dos puertas, 1970

Tiempo mexicano, 1971

Cervantes, o, La crítica de la lectura, 1976; as Don Quixote; or, The Critique of Reading, translated anonymously, 1976

Myself with Others: Selected Essays, 1988

Valiente mundo nuevo, 1990

El espejo enterrado, 1992; as The Buried Mirror: Reflections on Spain and the New World, 1992

Geografía de la novela, 1993

Tres discursos para dos aldeas, 1993

Nuevo tiempo mexicano, 1994

Por un progreso incluyente, 1997

Other writings: 14 novels (including La región más transparente [Where the Air Is Clear], 1958; Las buenas conciencias [The Good Conscience], 1959; La muerte de Artemio Cruz [The Death of Artemio Cruz], 1962.; Aura, 1962; Cambio de piel [A Change of Skin], 1967; Terra nostra, 1975; La cabeza de la hidra [The Hydra Head], 1978; Una familia lejana [Distant Relations], 1980; Gringo viejo [The Old Gringo], 1985; Cristóbal nonato [Christopher Unborn], 1987; La campaña [The Campaign], 1990), eight collections of short stories, three plays, and books on Latin America.

Collected works edition: Obras completas, 3 vols., 1974—(in progress).

Bibliographies

Dunn, Sandra L., "Carlos Fuentes: A Bibliography," Review of Contemporary Fiction 8 (1988)

Foster, David William, in Mexican Literature: A Bibliography of Secondary Sources, Metuchen, New Jersey: Scarecrow Press, 1992

Jackson, Richard L., "Hacia una bibliografía de y sobre Carlos Fuentes," Revista Iberoamericana 31, no. 60 (July-December 1965):297–301

Reeve, Richard, "An Annotated Bibliography on Carlos Fuentes, 1949–1969," Hispania 53, no. 4 (1970):595–652

Further Reading

Anthropos issue on Fuentes, 91 (December 1988)

Benítez, Fernando, Prologue to Obras completas by Fuentes, vol. 1, Mexico City: Aguilar, 1974:9–76

Blanco Aguinaga, Carlos, "Sobre la idea de la novela en Carlos Fuentes," Cuadernos Políticos 23 (1974):73–108

Boschi, Liliana Befumo, and Elisa Calabrese, Nostalgia del futuro en la obra de Carlos Fuentes, Buenos Aires: García Cambeiro, 1974

Brody, Robert, and Charles Rossman, editors, Carlos Fuentes: A Critical View, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1982

Brushwood, John S., The Spanish American Novel: A Twentieth Century Survey, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1975

Durán, Gloria, The Archetypes of Carlos Fuentes: From Witch to Androgyne, Hamden, Connecticut: Archon, 1980 (original Spanish edition, 1976)

Durán, Manuel, "Carlos Fuentes," Tríptico Mexicano (September 1973):51–133

Faris, Wendy D., Carlos Fuentes, New York: Ungar, 1983
García Gutiérrez, Georgina, Los disfraces: La obra mestiza de Carlos Fuentes, Mexico City: El Colegio de México, 1981

Giacoman, Helmy F., editor, Homenaje a Carlos Fuentes: Variaciones interpretativas en

torno a su obra, New York: Las Américas, 1974

González, Alfonso, Carlos Fuentes: Life, Work, and Criticism, Fredericton, New Brunswick: York, 1987

González Boixo, José Carlos, "La obra ensayística de Carlos Fuentes," Anthropos 91 (December 1988):7–10

Guzman, Daniel de, Carlos Fuentes, New York: Twayne, 1972

Harss, Luis, and Barbara Dohmann, "Carlos Fuentes o la nueva herejía," in Harss' Into the Mainstream, New York: Harper and Row, 1967

Hernández, Ana María de López, editor, Interpretaciones a la obra de Carlos Fuentes: Un gigante de las letras hispanoamericanas, Madrid: Beramar, 1990

Levy, Isaac Jack, and Juan Loveluck, editors, Actas: Simposio Carlos Fuentes, Columbia: University of South Carolina, 1980

Monsiváis, Carlos, "Notas sobre la cultura mexicana en el siglo XX," in Historia general de México, vol. 2, Mexico City: Colegio de Mexico, 1977:303–476

Paz, Octavio, "La máscara y la transparencia," Prologue to Cuerpos y ofrendas: Antología by Fuentes, Madrid: Alianza, 1972

Poniatowska, Elena, !Ay vida, no me mereces! Carlos Fuentes, Rosario Castellanos, Juan Rulfo, la literatura de la onda, Mexico City: Mortiz, 1985

Tittler, Jonathan, interview with Fuentes in Diacritics (September 1980)

Vernier, Martha Elena, "Escritura lateral: Ensayos de Carlos Fuentes," in La obra de Carlos Fuentes: Una visión múltiple, edited by Ana María Lopez de Hernandez, Madrid: Pliegos, 1988

World Literature Today issue on Fuentes, 57, no. 4 (1983)

Zúñiga, Dulce Ma., Intertextos: Calvino, Borges, Fuentes, Guadalajara: University of Guadalajara, 1989

Fuller, Margaret

American, 1810–1850

Margaret Fuller's short-lived career as an essayist did not prevent her from making a clear literary mark in several important areas. She wrote major works in areas including (but not limited to) feminist thought, travel essays, literary criticism, social activism, and Italian politics. Her essays began with reflective, literary pieces directed to an elite audience of contemporaries, including transcendentalists such as Ralph Waldo Emerson and Nathaniel Hawthorne, when she was editor and writer for the Dial. Later she became a reporter for the New York Tribune. As firsthand witness to the social ills of her day, she sought to move her public audience to action on social issues. Woman in the Nineteenth Century, developed from an earlier essay written and published in the Dial, is the work for which she is best remembered today. Her reputation among feminist scholars is well known, but her essays on literary, social, and political issues are enjoying renewed interest. They illustrate Fuller's prophetic insight into issues that still challenge citizens today.

Fuller's initial literary publications resulted in her editing the transcendentalist journal the Dial. With Emerson's encouragement she assumed the task, believing she would be free of major financial responsibilities. She saw the editorship as an opportunity: "I will try to say what I mean in print one day," she wrote in 1840. However, when writers who had promised works failed to deliver them in a timely fashion, Fuller pressed herself into essay writing. In the first issue, she set forth "Essay on Critics" (1840); she followed with "Lives of Great Composers" (1841), "Goethe" (1841; one of her favorite philosophers), and "The Great Lawsuit: Man versus Men: Woman versus Women" (1843). The latter work became the catalyst of her larger, better-known essay, Woman in the Nineteenth Century (1845). In "Lawsuit," Fuller formed her argumentative format using the Muse and Minerva to represent the two sides of the radical duality that exists in each man and woman. With the support of Horace Greeley, who began the New York Tribune (1841) in order to elevate the masses, Fuller expanded her initial essay into a book-length manuscript that Bell Gale Chevigny (1994) says gave "psychological integrity and a new attention to the claims of society and politics."

When Woman was published, Fuller was on a journey to the Great Lakes, where she gained valuable experiences beyond those of transcendental New England. She wrote about these experiences in a book of essays outlining the natural beauty of the area. Summer on the Lakes in 1843 (1844) initially gave evidence of Fuller's romantic view of the plight of Native Americans. Later, however, she spent time with the Indians at Mackinaw Island and began to feel differently, writing that she understood the "soul" of their race. She further expressed this sensitivity in her subsequent social essays for the Tribune by addressing the plight of immigrants who faced ethnic, religious, racial, and economic discrimination. Among her most famous essays are those such as "The Irish Character" (1845), in which she exposes the common expression, "No Irish need apply." She gained her knowledge firsthand as she visited homes, workplaces, schools, prisons, and insane asylums. She provided eloquent defenses for equality of women's education and fought the evils of capital punishment. She became a champion of the poor, the blind, the insane, and social outcasts, including prostitutes who were often viewed as social inferiors or ruined women. She tackled the issue of slavery in seven pieces, most notably her "Narrative of Frederick Douglass" (1845); she argued that everyone should read Douglass to understand how the human mind is "stifled in bondage."

Social issues did not prevent Fuller from maintaining her interest in literary criticism. Papers on Literature and Art (1846) provided her with new popularity in America and abroad. Here Fuller combined a number of her Tribune reviews on writers such as Nathaniel Hawthorne, Charles Brockden Brown, and Henry Wadsworth Longfellow with an original essay on the state of American literature. She also wrote "Modern British Poets" (1846), in which she assessed writers such as Byron, Keats, Coleridge, and Wordsworth. She completed a favorable review of Elizabeth Barrett's poems (1845), expressing her "cordial admiration" of the work.

In August 1846, Fuller became one of the first American correspondents to cover the European scene. Accompanied by philanthropist Marcus Spring and his family, Fuller visited England, France, and Italy. While she was encouraged by the roles of English women in theater and publishing, she was appalled by their general poverty and poor education. She outlined her views in "On Travel in England and Scotland" (1846-47). In France, she met and became a defender of the writer George Sand.

Because of her earlier meeting with the Italian patriot Giuseppe Mazzini in London,

Fuller, captivated by the cause of Italian liberty, left the Springs in Venice. Remaining in Italy, she took up the patriots' cause by visiting the wounded soldiers and forming alliances with patriots such as the Marchesa Costanza Arconati, a noblewoman who introduced Fuller to important literary and political figures. Fuller's disillusionment with Pius IX resulted in an anti-Catholic turn in her Tribune writings (1849); this proved to be personally costly. She led with essays such as "On Austrian Rule and the Need for Revolution" (1847) and followed with "On the Pope's Flight and the Condition of Women" (1848).

Unable to have her History of Italy published in England, Fuller determined to return home to regain her reputation, which had been sullied by rumors of her romance with an Italian nobleman and the birth of their son. Unfortunately, Fuller, the Italian nobleman, and their son died in a shipwreck off the coast of Fire Island, New York. Her manuscript of History of Italy was never recovered.

ADELAIDE P.AMORE

Biography

Sarah Margaret Fuller, Marchesa d'Ossoli. Born 23 May 1810 in Cambridge, Massachusetts. Studied privately, tutored by her father. Taught at Bronson Alcott's Temple School, 1836, and Hiram Fuller's Greene Street School, two years. Involved with transcendentalism, 1836–44: editor and major contributor, the Dial, 1840–44. Organized the Boston Conversationalists, which ran weekly "Conversations" for women, 1839–44. Traveled in the Midwest, 1843–44. Moved to New York, 1844: journalist for the New York Tribune, 1844–46, and sent articles from abroad, from 1846. Traveled to Europe, 1846, and settled in Italy. Liaison with Giovanni Angelo Ossoli (possibly married, 1848): one son. Forced to leave Rome, then Italy, after the fall of Rome to the French. Died (in a shipwreck off Fire Island, New York), 19 July 1850.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Summer on the Lakes in 1843, 1844; facsimile reprint, 1972

Woman in the Nineteenth Century, 1845; in Woman in the 19th Century, and Kindred Papers Relating to the Sphere, Condition, and Duties of Woman, edited by Arthur B.Fuller, 1855

Papers on Literature and Art, 1846; as Literature and Art, 1852; enlarged edition, as Art, Literature, and Drama, edited by Arthur B.Fuller, 1860

At Home and Abroad; or, Things and Thought in America and Europe, edited by Arthur B.Fuller, 1856

Life Without and Life Within; or, Reviews, Narratives, Essays, and Poems, edited by Arthur B.Fuller, 1859

Writings (selection), edited by Mason Wade, 1941

Margaret Fuller, American Romantic: A Selection from Her Writings and Correspondence, edited by Perry Miller, 1963

- The Educated Woman in America: Selected Writings of Catherine Beecher, Margaret Fuller, and M. Carey Thomas*, edited by Barbara M. Cross, 1965
- Essays on American Life and Letters*, edited by Joel Myerson, 1978
- "These Sad But Glorious Days": Dispatches from Europe, 1846–1850*, edited by Larry J. Reynolds and Susan Belasco Smith, 1991
- The Essential Margaret Fuller*, edited by Jeffrey Steele, 1992
- The Portable Margaret Fuller*, edited by Mary Kelley, 1994
- Woman in the Nineteenth Century and Other Writings*, edited by Donna Dickenson, 1994
- Margaret Fuller's New York Journalism: A Biographical Essay and Key Writings*, edited by Catherine C. Mitchell, 1995

Bibliographies

- Myerson, Joel, Margaret Fuller: An Annotated Secondary Bibliography, New York: Burt Franklin, 1977
- Myerson, Joel, Margaret Fuller: A Descriptive Bibliography, Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1978

Further Reading

- Allen, Margaret Vanderhaar, The Achievement of Margaret Fuller, University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1979
- Brown, Arthur W., Margaret Fuller, New York: Twayne, 1964
- Chevigny, Bell Gale, editor, The Woman and the Myth: Margaret Fuller's Life and Writings, Boston: Northeastern University Press, revised edition, 1994
- Myerson, Joel, editor, Critical Essays on Margaret Fuller, Boston: Hall, 1980
- Watson, David, Margaret Fuller, an American Romantic, Oxford: Berg, 1988

This page intentionally left blank.

G

Ganivet, Ángel

Spanish, 1865–1898

Ángel Ganivet's suicide at the age of 32 brought to an abrupt close the development of an innovative writer and thinker. Although necessarily limited in number, his publications had a significant impact on his contemporaries and on the development of the essay in Spain. His writings challenge the established generic borders in keeping with turn-of-the-century experimentation with limits and traditional definitions. He combines the essay and the epistolary form in Cartas finlandesas (1898; Letters from Finland) and in the posthumous El porvenir de España (1912; The future of Spain), and takes the hybrid form of travel essay and social commentary in a second posthumous work, Hombres del norte (1905; Men from the north). Ganivet writes from the stance of an outsider, analyzing Spain from his diplomatic residences in Finland and Belgium and critiquing European culture from his vantage point as a Spaniard with ties to Africa and Latin America. In his bestknown essay, Idearium español (1897; Spain: An Interpretation), Ganivet breaks with the prevailing rationalist, scientific perspective to analyze the history and future of Spain by means of a new multivoiced, contradictory, and subjective discourse.

Spain: An Interpretation and Ganivet's other essays incorporate a multitude of competing voices and discourses that represent the tensions marking Spain and the rest of the world in the transition from traditional to modern society. His texts introduce terms and arguments drawn from 19th-century debates over Catholicism, positivism, imperialism, and rationalism and interweave them in a complex discursive play that undermines and redefines tradition while suggesting new forms of thinking and writing. The text speaker in Spain: An Interpretation appropriates a positivist, determinist characterization of nations according to their geographic identification as island, peninsula, or continent, but then deconstructs the stability of these classifications by pointing out that Spain, a peninsula, has erroneously adopted behaviors appropriate to an island nation. In a similar vein, the speaker continuously invokes history and the 19th-century notion of historical determinism, only to subvert it by suggesting that Spain's past was an error, a deviation from its true nature. The present does not mirror the past or develop naturally from it, but rather confronts it as an alien other.

Ganivet's texts display a disjunctive vision of history, as a process marked by violent shifts and discontinuity. This view coincides with a repudiation of rationalism and the adoption of a style that eschews a logical development of ideas and a clear exposition of thought. Ganivet's essays privilege a nonlinear exposition, with no clear declaration of purpose and constant changes in topic without prior explanation. The various sections of Idearium español have no titles and no clear section or subsection divisions. The narrator repeatedly verbalizes a lack of concern with consistency and logic and expresses a preference for "ideas redondas" (round ideas) over "ideas picudas" (sharp, pointed ideas). The latter are defined as categorical, with no contradictions and no shading, and consequently lead to conflict and disagreement, while round ideas allow for the fusion of opposites and welcome paradoxical overlappings and irregularities, creating possibilities for love and union. The acceptance and even cultivation of contradiction produces texts that defy definition and force the reader to suspend judgment and adopt an open and flexible position.

Attempts to define a clearly delineated ideological posture in Ganivet's essays fail in the face of a purposeful irrationalism and consistent shifts in position. For some readers, the repudiation of positivism, capitalism, and Kantian pure reason reflects the failure of the Enlightenment to take root in Spain and leads to an antirational stance bordering on fascism. However, Ganivet's redefinitions of history and his insistent rejection of a logic that justifies injustice and of a capitalism that promotes war can also be read as an answer to the crisis of modernity that continues to find voice in contemporary thought. Furthermore, his unrelenting attack on imperialism and respect for different cultures and values anticipate late 20th-century views. During the height of the Cuban struggle to win independence from Spain and during the years when European imperialist dominance over Africa and Asia were viewed as proof of Western superiority over the rest of the world, Ganivet's writings proposed new, nonimperialist forms of leadership. Idearium español argues that the greatness of a nation does not depend on territorial extension, and calls on Spain to initiate a new postcolonial order that is without precedent in world history. The text speaker makes use of nationalistic discourse in order to combat it, calling on national pride but toward a new end.

The essays of Ángel Ganivet offer new modalities of thinking and writing. His texts evade clear categorization in keeping with his rejection of 19th-century rationalist and scientific discourse and thought. The organization of ideas follows a circular pattern, with the reintroduction of previously mentioned ideas, but with significant (albeit subtle) variations. Through a complex interweaving of inherited discourse and modern variations, Ganivet's essays seek to rewrite the past and create new forms of cultural coexistence.

MARY LEE BRETZ

Biography

Born 13 December 1865 in Granada. Studied at the Institute of Granada, 1880–85; University of Granada, degrees in the arts, 1888, and law, 1890; University of Madrid, Ph.D. in philosophy, 1890. Liaison with Amelia Roldán Llanos, from 1892: one daughter (died in infancy) and one son. Vice consul in Antwerp, 1891–96; consul in Helsinki, 1896–98, and Riga, Latvia, 1898. Died (suicide by drowning) near Riga, 29 November 1898.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Granada la bella, 1896; edited by Antonio Gallego y Burín, 1954

Idearium español, 1897; edited by E.Inman Fox, 1990; as Spain: An Interpretation, translated by J.R.Carey, 1946

Cartas finlandesas, edited by Nicolás M.López, 1898

Libro de Granada (includes poetry), 1899

Hombres del norte, 1905

El porvenir de España (open newspaper letters), with Miguel de Unamuno, 1912

Other writings: two novels, a verse play, and correspondence.

Collected works editions: Obras completas, 10 vols., 1923–30; edited by Melchor Fernández Almagro, 2 vols., 1943.

Bibliography

Gallego Morell, Antonio, Estudios y textos ganivetianos, Madrid: Consejo Superior de Investigaciones Científicas, 1971:183–214

Further Reading

Baquero Goyanes, Mariano, Temas, formas y tonos literarios, Madrid: Prensa Española, 1972

Fernández Almagro, Melchor, Vida y obra de Ángel Ganivet, Valencia: Sempere, 1925

Gallego Morell, Antonio, Ángel Ganivet, el excéntrico del 98, Granada: Albaicín, 1965

Ginsberg, Judith, Ángel Ganivet, London: Tamesis, 1985

Herrero, Javier, Ángel Ganivet, un iluminado, Madrid: Gredos, 1966

Olmedo Moreno, Miguel, El pensamiento de Ganivet., Madrid: Revista de Occidente, 1965

Ramsden, Herbert, Ángel Ganivet's "Idearium español": A Critical Study, Manchester: University of Manchester Press, 1967

Ramsden, Herbert, The 1898 Movement in Spain: Towards a Reinterpretation, with Special Reference to "En torno al casticismo" and "Idearium español", Manchester: University of Manchester Press, and Totowa, New Jersey: Rowman and Littlefield, 1974

Gass, William H.

American, 1924–

William H. Gass is a philosopher and fiction writer as well as an essayist. In the preface to his first collection of essays, Fiction and the Figures of Life (1970), he acknowledged that in his essays “we observe an author trying to be both philosopher and critic by striving to be neither,” but that “in another sense” his essays are “the work of a novelist insufficiently off duty.” These several roles affect Gass’ essays, which always display both the rigorous abstract thinking of a philosopher and the richly figurative language of a novelist. They also determine his subject matter. Even his most personal essays—“Memory of a Master” (1970), “On Talking to Oneself” (1979), “On Reading to Oneself” (1984), for example—eventually come around to discussions of his theories of fiction and his philosophy of language.

Gass’ dual career as both fiction writer and essayist was launched when the editors of Accent devoted an issue to his work in 1958 in which they published examples of his fiction (“The Triumph of Israbestis Tott,” “Mrs. Mean”) as well as an essay on Henry James (“The High Brutality of Good Intentions”). In the 40 years since, his essays have appeared regularly in literary quarterlies such as Salmagundi and New American Review and reviews such as the New York Review of Books and the New York Times Book Review. The audience he finds in these periodicals is both well read and highly educated, learning that undoubtedly helps them as they encounter Gass’ sometimes dense, and always metaphoric and allusive prose.

Gass has long been labeled a “writers’ writer.” This is in part because he is a generous writer of blurbs for younger writers, a teacher of literature and writing as well as philosophy (since 1969, as David May Distinguished University Professor at Washington University in St. Louis), a performer of his own work on the reading circuit, and a writer of introductions to new editions or collections of fiction by friends such as Stanley Elkin and John Hawkes. Principally, however, he has earned the title because other writers admire his work and his uncompromising devotion to literary language, especially rhetorical persuasiveness and individual style. His essays are, as Robert Kiely put it in the New York Times Book Review (1971), “in the best tradition of eloquence, wit and passion ... a defense of ‘poesy’ in a time of need.”

Literature, Gass argues, finds itself in this time of need because it has allowed itself to be reduced to a commodity, to look for the quick sell and the bestseller. The threat to literary accomplishment, he says, comes mainly from those books that “trade in slogan and clichés, fads and whims, the slippery and easy, the smart and latest” (“A Letter to the Editor,” 1969). His countermove has been to argue for and practice a most uncompromising aestheticism. Surrounding every work of art, he says, is only “empty space and silence” (“The Concept of Character in Fiction,” 1970). His first novel, Omensetter’s Luck (1966), “was written,” he said, “to not have readers, while still deserving them” (“A Letter to the Editor”). His second, The Tunnel (1995), took him 30 years to complete.

This kind of deliberate and hermetic perfectionism would seem to be at odds with the contingencies of the essay, which, if not always engaged, is usually solicitous of its audience, occasioned by an event or issue, and, at least apparently, a kind of rendering of the mind's rambles. Gass is not unaware of this contradiction nor of how it has worked itself out in his own career, which has seen him published perhaps more widely as an essayist than as a fiction writer. On the occasional nature of the essayist's work, he has remarked that "it is embarrassing to recall that most of Paul Valéry's prose pieces were replies to invitations and requests" (preface to Fiction and the Figures of Life); in addition to his many review essays, Gass' own prose pieces have been prompted by centennials ("Proust at 100," 1971), retirements ("The Ontology of the Sentence, or How to Make a World of Words," 1977), conference and symposium invitations ("Tropes of the Text," 1983; "'And'," 1984), new editions ("Gertrude Stein and the Geography of the Sentence," 1973), and university commencement exercises ("On Reading to Oneself," 1979; "On Talking to Oneself," 1984).

Gass' most extended examination of the tension inherent in the essay, the pull the essayist and the essay feel between occasion and permanence, journalism and literature, subject and self, and audience and author, appears in a long essay he wrote on Ralph Waldo Emerson ("Emerson and the Essay," 1982). "Emerson is himself a man of occasions," says Gass, and proceeds to examine the lecture tours from which Emerson's essays emerged, "the talks" that he "gathers up in books." As he writes of Emerson "essaying to be," of Emerson's "sacred fear of the superfluous," of the essay sparring with its "opposite," that "awful object, 'the article,'" we hear Gass rehearsing again his own familiar concerns. The essay rises above the article, becomes literature and ceases to be journalism because it manifests the mind at work, tells the story of the imagination imagining, "an activity—the process, the working, the wondering." An article "represents itself as the latest cleverness." It is "footnoted and useful and certain," but it is doubtful that it "has ever contained anything of lasting value." The essay, on the other hand, is "unhurried," born of digression, allusion, and "the narrative disclosure of a thought." The essay is the site where Emerson "is giving definition to his Being."

Finally, ironically, the recognition comes for Gass that the essay's energy and its unity exist within, not apart from, the relationship between author and audience as they examine together the central concern that occasioned both the writing and the reading of the essay. He is, like Emerson, always a Platonist in search of a lasting form in a cheap and ephemeral world, and in the end he admits that "the unity of each essay is a unity achieved by the speaker for his audience as well as for himself, a kind of reassociation of his sensibility and theirs; so from its initiating center the mind moves out in widening rings the way it does in Emerson's first great essay, 'Circles,' where the sentences surround their subject, and metaphors of form control the flow of feeling." He described this mutuality more concretely and with a bit more irony early on in the essay on Emerson: "And what is the occasion for my writing, or your reading, other than some suggestion from a friend, a few fine books sent in the mail, an invitation to speak, an idle riffle through a few sheets of a stale review, the name Emerson, an essay, an open hour."

NED STUCKEY-FRENCH

Biography

William Howard Gass. Born 30 July 1924 in Fargo, North Dakota. Studied at Kenyon College, Gambier, Ohio, 1942–43, 1946–47, A.B., 1947; Ohio Wesleyan University, Delaware, Ohio, 1943; ensign in the U.S.Navy, 1943–46; studied at Cornell University, Ithaca, New York, 1947–50, Ph.D., 1954. Married Mary Pat O’Kelly, 1952 (later divorced): two sons and one daughter. Taught philosophy at the College of Wooster, Ohio, 1950–54, Purdue University, West Lafayette, Indiana, 1954–69, and the University of Illinois, Urbana, 1958–59 (visiting); David May Distinguished University Professor in the Humanities, Washington University, St. Louis, from 1969. Married Mary Alice Henderson, 1969: two daughters. Contributor to various journals and magazines, including Salmagundi, the New Republic, TriQuarterly, and the New York Review of Books. Awards: Longview Foundation Award, 1969; American Academy Award, 1975, and Award of Merit Medal, 1979; National Book Critics Circle Award, for criticism, 1986; honorary degrees from three universities and colleges. Member, American Academy, 1983.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Fiction and the Figures of Life, 1970

On Being Blue: A Philosophical Inquiry, 1976

The World Within the Word, 1978

Habitations of the Word, 1985

Finding a Form, 1996

Other writings: two novels (Omensetter’s Luck, 1966; The Tunnel, 1995), short stories, and criticism.

Bibliography

Saltzman, Arthur M., “A William H.Gass Checklist,” Review of Contemporary Fiction 11, no. 3 (Fall 1991):150–58

Further Reading

Boyers, Robert, “Real Readers and Theoretical Critics,” in his After the Avant-Garde: Essays on Art and Culture, University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1988:81–90

Bruss, Elizabeth W., Beautiful Theories: The Spectacle of Discourse in Contemporary Criticism, Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1982:135–202

Dyck, Reginald, “William Gass: A ‘Purified Modernist’ in a Postmodern World,” Review of Contemporary Fiction II, no. 3 (Fall 1991):124–30

- Eckford-Prossor, M., "Shattering Genre/Creating Self: William H. Gass's On Being Blue" Style 23 (Summer 1989):280–99
- French, Ned, "Against the Grain: Theory and Practice in the Work of William H. Gass," Iowa Review 7 (Winter 1976): 96–106
- Gilman, Richard, "William H. Gass," in his The Confusion of Realtns, New York: Random House, 1969:69–81
- Guttenplan, Donald, "The Wor(l)ds of William Gass," Granta 1 (1979):147–60
- Hassan, Ihab, "Wars of Desire, Politics of the Word," Salmagundi 55 (Winter 1982):110–18
- Hix, Harvey, "Morte d' Author: An Autopsy," Iowa Review 17 (Winter 1987):131–50
- Holloway, Watson L., William Gass, Boston: Twayne, 1990
- Rosenfeld, Alvin H., "The Virtuoso and the Gravity of History," Salmagundi 55 (Winter 1982):103–09
- Saltzman, Arthur M., The Fiction of William H. Gass: The Consolation of Language, Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1986
- Schneider, Richard J., "Rejecting the Stone: William Gass and Emerson Transcendence," Review of Contemporary Fiction 11, no. 3 (Fall 1991):115–23
- Stevick, Philip, "William Gass and the Real World," Review of Contemporary Fiction II, no. 3 (Fall 1991):71–77

The Georgia Review

American journal, 1947–

The Georgia Review has been concerned with the essay and the essayistic since its foundation in 1947. The magazine was conceived primarily as a regional journal—Georgian in subject, author, or implication—by its originating editor, John D. Wade, a contributor to the distinctly Southern, 1930 Agrarian manifesto I'll Take My Stand. In his introductory editorial in Spring 1947, Wade explained that the Georgia Review's brand of regionalism would be fairly conservative, "avoid[ing] the obscene and blasphemous, the trivial, the Tobacco Road sort of thing, and an undue emphasis upon race matters." Either despite or because of his definition of regionalism, some readers and potential contributors protested at this emphasis, and by his second editorial in the Summer issue of the same year, Wade had to clarify that "any composition that arises from sullen earth and speaks with catholicity would be precisely what the Review is looking for," assuming that in such an essay there would be some, no matter how remote, connection to Georgia. Although many of the subsequent articles were distinctly academic, they were often affected by the personal essayistic tone associated with regional writing.

In the Review's 20th-anniversary issue (Winter 1966), editor William Wallace Davidson (1957–68) and former editor John Olin Eidson (1951–57) looked back proudly on the magazine's history as a distinctly regional voice. This voice would continue under editor James Colvert (1968–72) and acting editor Edward Krickel (1972–74), although the journal abandoned its traditional "Confederate gray" cover in 1969 and the regionalism of the journal was becoming more difficult to define.

The tenor of the magazine changed in 1974 when John T. Irwin became editor. Irwin's emphasis on contemporary theory reunited the academic essay with its Baconian roots, showcasing the "open-ended" works of such renowned literary and philosophical theorists as Jacques Derrida, J.Hillis Miller, Harold Bloom, Geoffrey Hartman, Edward W. Said, Wolfgang Iser, Paul de Man, and Michael Riffaterre. In 1982., Eugene K.Garber of the Literary Magazine Review noted that, while the Georgia Review had formerly been respected but staid, its incarnation under Irwin's editorship was an altogether different journal: "Out of the improbable larva of conservative southern regionalism developed the sometimes gorgeous chrysalis of structuralist/deconstructionist criticism and avant garde fiction."

The Review underwent yet another dramatic transformation in 1978, when Stanley Lindberg assumed the editorship, a position he still holds. Lindberg created for the magazine "a new format—one intended to make our contents as inviting visually as they are intellectually." His first cover featured French painter André Derain's previously unreproduced 1938 Landscape with Huntsman and Bathers in a glossy, colorful packaging, an aesthetic change that has now become one of the journal's trademarks. The graphic portfolios begun under Irwin have grown to include beautifully reproduced paintings and photographs, thus enveloping the pictorial within the margins of the essayistic. In 1986–87, Fred Chappell surveyed the journal for Literary Magazine Review and concluded that "The Georgia Review is physically the most attractive and intellectually the most adventurous of [current Southern literary quarterlies]; at the present time it outshines every comparable periodical in the United States."

The Georgia Review also publishes poetry, fiction (for which it is frequently a finalist in the National Magazine Award in Fiction, winning the prize in 1986), and book reviews, but remains most noted for its essays, which range topically from philosophy, music, and art to history, psychology, film and literary criticism, frequently transgressing traditional disciplinary lines. Lindberg has emphasized the familiar, thesis-driven essay over more narrowly focused scholarly articles and in doing so has greatly expanded the magazine's reading public, which has grown from fewer than 2000 subscribers in the late 1970s to more than 6000.

In recent years, contributors have included Malcolm Cowley, N.Scott Momaday, O.B.Hardison, Jr., Eudora Welty, Sally Fitzgerald, Rita Dove, Richard Howard, Henry Louis Gates, Jr., Scott Russell Sanders, Joyce Carol Oates, Ernest J.Gaines, Michael Dorris, and 1995 Nobel Laureate Seamus Heaney. The Review has also maintained its commitment to publishing new and sometimes nonprofessional writers, "willing to take the risk," as Davidson commented in Fall 1957, "remember[ing] that Chaucer and Rabelais were not professional writers, that Matthew Arnold was an inspector of schools, that A.E.Housman was a professor of Latin, that Virgil was a farmer, that William Morris was a manufacturer and decorator, that Anthony Trollope was a post office official, that Wallace Stevens was an insurance executive."

Recent special issues have included "Women and the Arts" (Spring/Summer 1990), a double issue of over 300 pages; "Focus on Nature Writing" (Spring 1993); "The Nobel Laureates of Literature" (Spring 1995), a collection of Nobel Laureate Acceptance Speeches and Lectures; and "Contemporary Literature of the American South" (Spring 1996), this last representing in some ways the best of both the new Georgia Review and the old.

KAREN A. KEELY

German Essay

1. Status of Research

Scholars are not in agreement on when the art of the essay in German actually began. Most argue that the genre—which generally runs in length anywhere from one page to about 50, although ideally it is easily read at one sitting—is relatively new and has a spotty tradition. Literary scholarship neglected the essay as a genre until the mid-20th century. The first edition of the Reallexikon der deutschen Literaturgeschichte (1925; Lexicon of German literary history) devoted a scant 40 lines to the essay. Despite efforts by Emil Dovifat in Berlin, who encouraged work on the genre and penned a brief entry on it for the Handbuch der Zeitungswissenschaft (1940; Handbook for the study of newspapers), and Max Bense's seminal essay, "Über den Essay und seine Prosa" (1947; On the essay and its prose), scholarly interest in the essay did not intensify until after 1950.

When the second edition of the Reallexikon appeared in 1958, Fritz Martini replaced the original entry on the essay with a more substantial, first attempt at sketching its history. Important studies by Peter M. Schon, Klaus Günter Just, Bruno Berger, Dieter Bachmann, Ludwig Rohner, Gerhard Haas, and Heinrich Küntzel all appeared between 1954 and 1969. Furthermore, under the direction of Richard Samuel, the Jahrbuch für internationale Germanistik (Yearbook for international Germanics) sponsored a critical series on the German essay in the late 1970s and early 1980s. Nevertheless, in scholarly circles the essay continues to exist in the shadows of the canonical genres. This critical disinterest in the history and practice of essay writing in Germany seems to be singular within the national literatures. Even leading practitioners of the art during its classical era from Gotthold Ephraim Lessing to Wilhelm Dilthey did not use the designation "essay" for their essayistic writings or see themselves as essayists.

Most historical treatments of the genre date its origins from c. 1750 as the result of importations from France and England. However, some trace its beginnings to sermons, broadsides, and treatises dating from the time of Martin Luther (1483–1546). Regardless of where one stands on the issue, all agree that essayistic writing in Austria, Germany, and Switzerland is part and parcel of a European tradition with roots in Michel de Montaigne (1533–92) and Francis Bacon (1561–1626), but also in Nicholas Breton's Characters upon Essays, Moral and Divine (1615), Izaak Walton's The Compleat Angler (1653), Blaise Pascal's Pensées (1670), Jean de La Bruyère's Caractères (1688; Characters), and Pierre Bayle's Pensées diverses (1683; Miscellaneous Reflections) and Dictionnaire historique et critique (1697; An Historical and Critical Dictionary). Most also agree that the devastating effects of the Thirty Years' War (1618–48) and the religious dogmatism of the era greatly inhibited the development of the inquisitive literary form for most of the 17th century in the German territories. Religious conservatism in Catholic Austria delayed its practice and flowering there until the second half of the 18th century in the wake of the Enlightenment. After approximately 1750 there were so many border crossings regarding essay writing in Austria, Germany, and Switzerland that it is not very feasible to differentiate strictly among three traditions of the German essay. (The German Democratic Republic [1949–89] could be seen as a fourth.) Thus they will be considered as one tradition concerning the essay.

In general, the essay has experienced intermittent periods of flowering in the German-speaking countries. These periods coincide with significant paradigmatic shifts such as the onset of humanism and the Reformation in the 15th and 16th centuries, the rise of Enlightenment ideals beginning around 1700, the radical rethinking of social intercourse in the wake of the French Revolution at the end of the 18th century, and the philosophic and scientific convulsions around 1900 prompted by Friedrich Nietzsche's radical break with systemic philosophy, Sigmund Freud's psychoanalytical method, Max Planck's theory of quantum physics, and Albert Einstein's relativity theory. Sweeping reassessments after 1945 pursuant to the shattering of long-held traditions and values and the advent of the atomic age continued the sense of displacement. Particularly conducive to essay writing are thus those periods marked by shifts in epistemic attitudes, scientific breakthroughs, and a general sense of decline, captured in such works as Oswald Spengler's Der Untergang des Abendlandes (1911; The Decline of the West)—which Thomas Mann, in reference to its essayistic nature, characterized as an “intellectual novel,” “a border crossing between science and art.”

The specific function of the essay mode is to insure continuing, independent debate on the value of cultural and intellectual heritage. It forces us to come to terms with a given, contemporary situation by placing it in a broader context. It seeks to articulate conceptual transformations by marking out essential tensions as well as past influences on current forces of change, and to project possible trajectories into the future. The essay is a refined means of coming to terms intellectually with the conflict inherent in the alternation between expansion and contraction. That is why the essay flourishes in times of crisis and change.

The most striking leitmotif in the history of the essay is Montaigne's famous inscription “Que sçais-je?,” which has been variously interpreted by emphasizing each word independently: “What [can] I know?,” “What do I know?,” and “What do I know?” The playful ambiguity is entirely appropriate for the literary form whose Spielcharakter is often cited as a distinguishing trait. It might explain why a telltale sign of the essay is its sparkle and magic at the intersection of science and poetry, and clarify why essayism is frequently identified with the dialectics of the Enlightenment. That dialectic is further marked by what one critic has called the “principle of holistic rhythm” (Klaus Weissenberger, 1985): it is a constituent part of the essay's tendency to involve the reader in an interactive process of reading in the search for shared truth. The designation “essayism” in the German tradition refers to this dialectic and does not necessarily connote flaccid journalism as some have argued (Gerhard Haas, 1969).

The following survey traces the main contours of the genre within the productive tensions between scientific precision and free-spirited association. Of course, the term essay was not always applied consistently, so that other designations for the mode of writing gathered under the rubric of the “essay” must be borne in mind, especially prior to the second half of the 19th century. The actual term, “essay,” did not enter common usage until Herman Grimm introduced it in 1859. To be sure, the term was cited in titles and texts from 1750, but remained indistinct as a concept and genre until Friedrich Schlegel began to muse upon it around 1800. Before Grimm succeeded in promulgating the loan word in the 19th century, essay writing appeared most commonly under the guise of the Abhandlung (treatise), Bemühung (endeavor), Brief (letter), Denkwürdigkeiten (memoirs), Einfälle (inspirations), Fragment, Gespräch (conversation), Gedanken (thoughts), Meinungen (opinions), Predigt (sermon), Probe (sample), Rede (oration), Versuch (attempt), Vorrede (preface), Vortrag (lecture), and Wäldchen (literally copse of trees=fragment). In contrast to the early English and French traditions which emanated from the coffeehouse, the salon, and the art of private conversation, the early German tradition of the essay emanated from the halls of academe, the pulpit, and the scholar’s study.

2. The 16th and 17th Centuries: From Humanism to Baroque

Humanists, Reformists, and Counter-Reformists alike from Johannes von Saaz (i.e. Tepl, c. 1350–c. 1411), Johannes Reuchlin (1455–1522), Martin Luther (1483–1546), Ulrich Zwingli (1484–1531), Ulrich von Hutten (1488–1523), Hans Sachs (1494–1576), and Thomas Murner (c. 1475–1537) created distant cousins of later essays with their epistles, dialogues, broadsides, and political pamphlets. Examples of these writings are the dialogic Ackermann aus Böhmen (c. 1400; The plowman of Bohemia), Reuchlin’s satiric and witty Epistolae obscurorum virorum (1515; Letters of Obscure Men; penned together with Crotus Rubeanus and von Hutten), von Hutten’s politically charged dialogues, Gesprächbüchlein (1521; Little book of conversations), and Sachs’ propagandistic set of disputations, Dialoge (1524; Dialogues). While not essays in the narrower sense, they deserve mention here because of their success in spreading the art of ancient and medieval rhetoric to increasingly nonacademic audiences, encouraging them to weigh new possibilities in times of change.

Luther’s popular Tischreden (table talks), sermons, letters, and pamphlets come closer to the essayistic mode with their personal appeals to the reader, engaging tone, and middle style (i.e. neither overly erudite nor crassly popular). Taken together they constitute “fragments of a major confession” (as Goethe described his own literary oeuvre) but are simultaneously commentaries on his age. The goal of his German writings (and translation of the Bible into contemporary German) was to establish his mother tongue as an equal alongside Greek, Hebrew, and Latin. Of special note are his call to the German nobility to break with Rome, “An den christlichen Adel deutscher Nation” (1520; An epistle to the Christian nobility of the German nation), his discourse on the nature of free will, “Von der Freiheit eines Christenmenschen” (1520; On the freedom of Christians), and his thoughts on the art of translation, “Sendbrief vom Dolmetschen” (1530; Epistle on translation). While polemicizing is foreign to the essay mode, Luther’s masterful use of the vernacular had a lasting impact on all subsequent writers. For that reason alone he deserves a place in the history of the essay.

Topics such as fashion, friendship, marriage, the education of children, the relationship between faith and reason, practical philosophy, and social responsibilities, so favored by humanists and church reformers alike, were also often treated by later clerics and academics in pamphlets and sermons. Here one thinks of Georg Philipp Harsdörffer's (1607–58) conversation lexicon for women, Frauenzimmer-Gesprächspiele (1641–49; Garrulous games for women), the immensely popular albeit repetitive satires of Abraham a Sancta Clara (1644–1709) such as Judas, der Ertz-Schelm (1686–95; Judas, chief rogue), the cultural critiques of Gottfried Wilhelm Leibniz, and the university lectures of Christian Thomasius.

While it must be borne in mind that the particular aesthetic of the essay cannot be derived merely from the criteria of earlier prose forms, we should be careful not to underestimate the influence of the practiced orator from Luther to Gellert on the making of the genre. Nor need we denigrate the genre because it is not pure-bred, as is the wont in German scholarship. To be sure, it can be descriptive like the narrative, intense like the drama, and magical like the lyric poem, but the essay nonetheless has its own special aesthetic derived from the “narrative” stance of the author. The key traits are conciseness of form, personal tone, active reader involvement, a dramatic inner movement, and richly nuanced perspectives. Above all, the literary essay exists on the frontier between poetry and prose (Bense, 1947) and occupies a small, significant space between pure literature and strict science (K.G. Just, 1954). It is the marketplace of intellectual exchange, cloaked in pathos and rhetoric, but also embellished with playful irony. Georg Lukács revives Friedrich Schlegel's term “intellektuelles Gedicht” (intellectual poem) to describe its ambivalent nature. Yet the varying types of bond between author and reader result in different kinds of essays which can be more or less conceptual, more or less culturally critical, biographical, literary, graphic, or ironic (John A. McCarthy, 1989).

These characteristics are evident, at least in part, in essay writing in the late 17th century. Examples are Christian Thomasius' (1655–1728) book reviews on the art of the novel in his journal, Monats-Gespräche (1687–88; Monthly conversations), his inaugural lecture at the University of Leipzig on the proper imitation of the French, “Discours Welcher Gestalt man denen Frantzosen in gemeinem Leben und Wandel nachahmen solle?” (1687; Discourse on the manner for imitating the French in everyday life), and his lectures on practical philosophy, “Kurtzer Entwurff der politischen Klugheit” (1710; A brief sketch of political wisdom). Each represents a step toward involving ever broader segments of the educated public in matters of practical philosophy. They have earned Thomasius acclaim as the inaugurator of the Enlightenment and of a new, enlightened reading public in the first half of the 18th century. Those efforts came to full fruition with his successors at the University of Leipzig, Christian Wolff (1679–1754), Johann Christoph Gottsched (1700–66), and Christian Fürchtegott Gellert (1715–69), but are also readily evident in the journalistic writing of Christian Garve (1742–98) and Johann Jakob Engel (1741–1802).

The length, moderate tone, and gallant style of Thomasius' 1687 lecture on the proper cultural imitation of the French clearly mark it as being in the camp of the chatty Montaigne rather than that of the sober and pithy Bacon. Its topic—the art of living—is a distinctive feature of the essay regardless of the tone adopted. With a surprisingly light, lively, and ironic touch, Thomasius addresses important cultural questions of the day by detailing the areas of life affected by the mania of imitating anything French: fashion, cuisine, household goods, language, customs, even sodomy and syphilis. The shift in focus from the usual cultural phenomena to questions of morality and personal health is brilliant in its surprise effect on the audience. The importance of rhetorical strategies is everywhere manifest. Thomasius makes liberal use of rhetorical questions, personal appeals, graphic language, allusions to historical events, evocation of authority figures, metaphors, similes, tropes, prolepses, and litotes, thus establishing a pattern for all later essayists.

In arguing for equal opportunities for women in higher education, he uses the metaphor of the writing tablet to illustrate the resilience of the human mind. The more a writing tablet has been used, the less distinct are the new letters because the old ones leave residual traces. New tablets absorb the chalk more readily because their pores are not cluttered with the dust of past scribbles. In other words, Thomasius argues persuasively that women can learn more easily because they have not been corrupted by the old academic ways he wishes to replace with a stress on critical reflection, clarity of organization, sound judgment, and lively presentation. Style and content are a harbinger of essayistic production in the 18th century (e.g. Gellert, Pitschel, Lessing, Wieland, Garve, Forster). Perhaps not coincidentally, Isaac Newton published his momentous Principia, which shaped our view of the cosmos until the late 19th century, in the same year Thomasius proposed his new way of thinking.

Even though Thomasius draws upon the humanistic traditions of the 16th and 17th centuries, it would nonetheless be inaccurate to claim solely endemic roots for the essay. Thomasius openly admits his indebtedness to the Spanish gallant and skeptic Baltasar Gracián, the French moralists (Bouhours, Malebranche, Scudéry, Bayle), and ancient thinkers (Lucian, Epictetus). The rhetorical and gallant traditions were obviously influential for both him and the subsequent development of the essay right into the late 20th century.

Leibniz's (1646–1716) importance for the European Enlightenment is well documented. Less well known is his contribution to the early art of the essay, as with his epistle "Ermahnung an die Teutschen, ihren Verstand und Sprache besser zu üben" (wr. 1683, pub. 1846; A call to the Germans to make better use of their reason and mother tongue) and its companion piece, "Unvorgreifliche Gedanken" (wr. c. 1709, pub. 1727; Provisional conjectures). They have been identified as representing a clear break with the stylistic concepts of the ornate baroque era. The first is a culturally critical essay in which Leibniz calls upon his countrymen to make refined use of German in order to compete better with the French, English, and Italians. Leibniz appeals to the patriotism of his readers by painting a positive picture of the Holy Roman Empire with its wealth distributed throughout the social classes. Nowhere are natural resources more abundant, the nobility more competent, the city republics more prosperous, or personal freedom more prevalent. Everything points to a rosy future and the realization of a perfect utopian state. All that is lacking is the individual will to be happy and content.

In the second part of the article, Leibniz shifts perspective to reveal the negative side of those same conditions and accomplishments. In the forefront of his examination is the German language, which provides the basis for cultural and national identity. Like Thomasius, Leibniz criticizes the cultural backwardness of his countrymen, the stilted and obtuse quality of German writing, the lack of decent translations, the thoughtless imitation of foreign models, and the lack of genuine understanding. The world of German writing is depicted as uninspired and lifeless, having been neglected by scholars who slavishly follow the Latin model and government officials who prefer French for diplomacy. The German vernacular must be cultivated, he argues, in order for Germany to realize its full potential.

Leibniz's progressive piece can perhaps be aligned with the more formal tone of the Baconian essay. His place among early essayists is, however, not surprising given his general role in promulgating a dramatic shift from mere geometry to a dynamic philosophy of nature, from mere mechanism to vitalistic organism. Such an intellectual stance clearly favors an essayistic mode of writing. In any event, Leibniz's treatise partakes of the provocative, avant-garde tendencies of the essay and clearly reveals the characteristic hybrid nature of scientific tract and artistic tour de force. His writing is gauged to lead the reader on a dynamic journey of encirclements of an appealingly elusive solution.

The views expressed by Leibniz (and Thomasius) around 1700 resonate throughout the history of the essay. Christoph Martin Wieland's critique of the German scholar in the essay collection Sympathien (1756; Sympathies), which is heavily indebted to the Earl of Shaftesbury, picks up the theme, as do Kant's lectures of the 1760s, Schiller's inaugural lecture at Jena on "Was heist und zu welchem Ende studiert man Universalgeschichte?" (1789; "What Is Universal History and to What End Does One Study It?"), a veritable rhetorical masterpiece worthy of Cicero, Adam Müller's masterful "Vom Gespräch" (1816; On conversation), and Arthur Schopenhauer's wittily incisive caricature "Über die Universitätsphilosophie" (1851; On the practice of philosophy at the university). The new mode of writing introduced by Leibniz and Thomasius bore much fruit even beyond Schopenhauer. The topic of their essays is echoed in such 20th-century classics as Josef Hofmiller's "Was ist deutsch?" (1927; What is German?), Werner Weber's musings on what it means to be Swiss in "Mut zum Erziehen" (1965; Courage to educate), Theodor W. Adorno's radio essay on intellectual maturity, "Erziehung zur Mündigkeit" (1969; Education for maturity), Walter Jens' reflections on the personal and cultural locus of identity in "Nachdenken über Heimat" (1984; Reflections on the meanings of homeland), and Hans Mayer's "Rede über das eigene Land: Deutschland" (1985; Speech on our nation: Germany) or "Der Rede wert: Bemerkungen über die Beredsamkeit und die Deutschen" (1987; Worthy of mention: comments on rhetoric and the Germans). Obviously, Thomasius and Leibniz cast long shadows in the annals of the essay.

3. The 18th Century: Enlightenment; Storm and Stress; Classicism (1730–1805)

Noteworthy from the early development of the essay onward is the confluence of the essayistic mode with the desire to secularize knowledge and broaden the reading public through appeals to rhetoric and the gallant mode. The 18th century saw such a sharp rise in the number of periodicals and published titles that contemporary observers spoke of a “print revolution,” “reader revolution,” an “age of critique,” an “age of journalism,” and the “age of pedagogy.” All this activity had a marked impact on essayistic writing, whether this took the form of individual essays, parts of a collection, or interludes in novels. While there are important differences in the various schools of literary thought which came to the fore in the course of the 18th century, those differences were later downplayed; the emphasis in essay writing centered on epistemological issues and sought to transcend schools of thought.

Johann Christoph Gottsched (1700–66), Johann Jakob Bodmer (1698–1783), and Johann Jakob Breitinger (1701–76) were very influential in communicating the ideas of Leibniz and Thomasius, as filtered through the writings of Leipzig philosopher Christian Wolff, to a large, nonacademic audience in the first decades of the century. They did this through their moral weeklies modeled on Addison’s and Steele’s *Tatler (1709–11), Spectator (1711–12; 1714), and Guardian (1713). Other important models for the critical stance of these writings were Bayle’s Dictionnaire historique et critique (1697; An Historical and Critical Dictionary) and Bernard de Fontenelle’s popular Dialogues des Morts (1683; Dialogues from the Dead). Gottsched translated and edited the latter, while his wife and collaborator, Luise Adelgunde Victoria Kulmus (1713–62), contributed influential translations from the moral weeklies and of French plays.

Bodmer and Breitinger published their progressive Die Discourse der Mahlern (1721–23; Discourses of painters) in Zurich, while Gottsched produced Die vernünftigen Tadlerinnen (1725–27; The reasonable critics, a misunderstanding of “tatter”) and Der Biedermann (1727–29; The man of honor) in Leipzig. The patrician Barthold Hinrich Brockes also published a moral weekly in Hamburg under the title Der Patriot (1724–26). These weeklies, aimed at improving human nature, were frequently reprinted and contained many articles important to the genesis of the essay as well as for disseminating practical philosophy and aesthetics. Representative is, for example, the “19th Discourse” (1721) penned by Bodmer on the role of the imagination in poetic works. The influential topic was later treated in greater detail by both Bodmer and Breitinger in “Von dem Einfluss und Gebrauche der Einbildungs-Krafft” (1727; On the influence and use of the imagination). Gottsched also contributed essay-like articles to his weeklies such as “Furcht und Hoffnung” (1728; Fear and hope), a characteristically enlightened examination of virtue as the art of countering the paralysis of anxiety with liberating hope.

The longevity of the moral weekly format in Germany is attested by such later endeavors as Der Gesellige (1748–50; Sociable man), Der Mensch (1751–56; Humankind), Der Redliche (1751; The sincere person), and Der nordische Aufseher (1757; The Nordic guardian). They give witness to the extraordinary increase in publishing activity in the Age of Enlightenment. These moral weeklies were instrumental in spreading practical philosophy, moral values, and a fondness for instructive yet entertaining reading. Friedrich Gottlieb Klopstock (1724–1803) published pieces on literary practice and theory in Der nordische Aufseher such as “Von der Sprache der Poesie” (1757; On the language of poetry) and “Gedanken über die Natur der Poesie” (1757; Thoughts on the nature of poetry).

Shortly before mid-century, the moral weeklies began to give way to a new breed of journal, one more centrally interested in literary, cultural, and aesthetic matters.

Gottsched led the way with his Beyträge zur critischen Historie der deutschen Sprache, Poesie und Beredsamkeit (1732–44; Contributions to a critical history of the German language, literature, and rhetoric) and Der Büchersaal der schönen Wissenschaften und freyen Künste (1742–50; Library of the humanities and fine arts). While the former emphasized questions of literary history and taste, the latter covered all areas of scholarly interest with an emphasis on philosophy and the natural sciences. Gottsched's student, Johann Joachim Schwabe (1714–84), edited Die Belustigungen des Verstandes und Witzes (1741–45; Entertainments of mind and wit) and other former disciples published the Neue Beiträge zum Vergnügen des Verstandes und Witzes (1744–57; New contributions...). The central significance of Die Belustigungen for the development of belletristic prose in the early century is still not fully appreciated. The list of contributors to the periodical reads like a Who's Who of the literary world in Northern Germany in the 1740s. Johann Elias Schlegel's (1719–49) seminal critique of dramatic technique in Shakespeare and Andreas Gryphius ("Vergleichung Shakespeares und Andreas Gryphs," 1741) appeared here, as did the accomplished essays of Theodor Lebrecht Pitschel (1716–43).

It was the 18th century that discovered Montaigne directly again. Johann Daniel Titius (i.e. Tietz) published the first German translation of the Essais as Michaels Herrn von Montaigne Versuche in 1753, and Lessing's friend Johann Joachim Christoph Bode provided a second translation of the complete opus in seven volumes (1793–97). Although Bode's translation appeared at century's end, he was already hard at work on it during the years of close contact with Lessing in Hamburg (1767–70). Moreover, Gottsched had cited Montaigne as a model for his journalistic writings around 1720 and Christian Ludwig Liscow acknowledges the impact of Montaigne's style and attitude on his satirical Vortrefflichkeit und Notwendigkeit der elenden Scribenten (1734; The excellence and necessity of miserable scribblers).

To be sure, Montaigne's broad, direct influence was not really felt until late in the 19th century. By contrast, the work of the Scottish Enlighteners Adam Ferguson and Francis Hutcheson and the Third Earl of Shaftesbury (especially his Characteristics, 1711) did have a broad and lasting impact throughout the 18th century. In any event, the period from the third quarter of the 18th century to the early 20th century (i.e. 1770–1930; from Lessing, Herder, and Wieland to Wilhelm Dilthey, Georg Simmel, and Josef Hofmiller) is customarily referred to as the classical period of the German essay.

A hallmark of Enlightenment anthropology, already evident in the moral weeklies, is the focus on the individual as either man reflecting or man acting. Reflective man was prone to examine his relationship to society and the universe in a new light. When the emphasis is cosmological or cultural, the tone of essayism is more detached and philosophical. When the social or personal context is foregrounded, the tone becomes more immediate and vibrant. This attitude is reflected in new literary journals which sprang up everywhere from Berlin to Vienna in the second half of the century. The most important for chronicling the history of the journalistic essay are the Briefe die neueste Literatur betreffend (1758–61; Letters on contemporary literature); Friedrich Nicolai's Bibliothek der schönen Wissenschaften und schönen Künste (1757–65; Library of the humanities and fine arts) and the Allgemeine deutsche Bibliothek (1765–1806; Universal German library); the Austrian statesman Josef von Sonnenfels' Der Mann ohne Vorurteil (1765–75; Man without prejudice); Herder's Über die neuere deutsche Literatur (1767; On contemporary German literature) and Kritische Wälder (1769; Critical forests); Johann Heinrich Merck and Johann Georg Schlosser's Frankfurter Gelehrte Anzeigen (1772–90; Frankfurt scholarly announcements); Wieland's Der (neue) Deutsche Merkur (1773–1810; The [new] German Mercury); Heinrich Christian Boie and Christian Conrad Wilhelm von Dohm's (Neues) Deutsches Museum (1776–91; The [new] German museum); Christian Friedrich Daniel Schubart's Teutsche Chronik (1774–77; German chronicle); Schiller's Thalia (1785–87, 1792–95) and Die Horen (1795–97; The muses); Johann Jakob Engel's Philosoph für die Welt (1775–77; A philosopher for the world); Sophie La Roche's Pomona (1783–84); Marianne Ehrmann's progressive monthly Amaliens Erholungsstunden (1790–92; Amalien's leisure hours); Goethe's Die Propyläen (1798–1800); Leopold Friedrich Günter von Goeckingk's Journal von und für Deutschland (1795–1805; Journal of and for Germany); and Friedrich Justin Bertuch's Journal des Luxus und der Moden (1786–1827; Journal of luxury and fashion). Additionally, "Musenalmanache" (poetic almanacs) of all sorts sprang up in the 1770s and remained popular into the 19th century. They were edited by quality writers like Goeckingk, Schiller, Wieland, and Johann Heinrich Voss. The list of periodicals is merely representative of the great diversity.

The editors were themselves frequent contributors of letters, memoirs, travel descriptions, critiques, and reviews to their own journals. Most, as Schiller said of himself, wrote as "Weltbürger" (citizens of the world) and not as citizens of a particular state. Their preferred topics were historical, philosophical, and aesthetic. The publicistic work of Sophie La Roche (1731–1807) and Marianne Ehrmann (1735–95), two of the first women writers to make money from their writing careers, has yet to be examined from the point of view of the essay.

Gotthold Ephraim Lessing (1729–81), a chief representative of the Enlightenment, began his journalistic career by writing for Die Berlinische privilegierte Zeitung (1749–55; The privileged Berliner newspaper), coedited the Briefe die neueste Literatur betreffend with Friedrich Nicolai and Moses Mendelssohn, and published his own Hamburgische Dramaturgie (1767–69; Hamburg dramaturgy) as well as a series of essays and treatises on primarily theological topics, Wolfenbütteler Beiträge zur Geschichte und Literatur (1773–77; Wolfenbüttel contributions to literature and history). The essays contributed to these journals are the more formal kind like his philological study, Wie die Alten den Tod gebildet (1769; How the Ancients Represented Death) or "Von der Duldung der Deisten" (1774; On tolerance of deists), although the distinction is not always strict, as we know from his famous invective against Gottsched in the "17th Literary Letter." While Lessing cannot be said to have penned consciously self-contained essays in the manner of Wieland, Sturz, Goethe, or Georg Forster, nevertheless his prose is praised as exemplary for its combination of intellectual substance and stylistically light touch.

His series of five dialogues on political liberalism, Ernst und Falk (1778–79; Ernst and Falk), is a case in point. Because of its pristine clarity and deft engagement of the reader, this work can be considered a literary jewel. While emphasizing what is essential, each of the dialogues seeks to expose the falseness of a commercialized and politicized Freemasonry movement. The true aim of the Freemasons according to Lessing is the refinement of humanity itself, not personal or public gain. The presentation of the argument is a prime example of the essay as the act of thinking aloud. A later classic example of this attitude is Heinrich von Kleist's (1771–1811) seminal essay, “Über die allmähliche Verfertigung der Gedanken beim Reden” (1807–08; “On the Gradual Fabrication of Thoughts While Speaking”). This movement is brought out by the topos of the leisurely walk, which has been identified as a major mark of the essayistic attitude.

Lessing guides the reader through the maze of his meandering thoughts by posting metaphoric signs. At the crucial point of Falk's argument regarding the genuine deeds of the Freemasons, he interrupts his thought to chase after a butterfly. This gives Ernst time to ponder the paradox of good deeds whose purpose is to make good deeds superfluous. He goes off to a nearby tree to observe an ant colony busily pursuing its individual and collective tasks. With these two images the first discourse comes to an end. The attentive reader suspects that the butterfly is a symbol of truth which flutters about, now distant, now near, but always just out of reach. The anthill, on the other hand, symbolizes organized activity for the collective good. In the second dialogue the beehive is used further to elucidate this thought: when each member of society is capable of self-regulation, then government will not be superfluous; each individual will do what is necessary for the whole to function, for each will recognize the personal good in the commonweal. This truly democratic revolution of the spirit is dependent, however, upon genuine communication among individuals. It must be grounded on trust and attentiveness to others. Ethnic, religious, and social distances between individuals must be minimized. While humankind has not yet reached the goal, Ernst and Falk conclude, the path is clear. These dialogues are exemplary of literature's role as intellectual stimulus.

The mastery of the rhetorical arsenal and the genuine openness to truth-seeking evident in Ernst and Falk and Lessing's numerous other essays explain the lavish praise heaped on him by Friedrich Schlegel, Johann Gottfried Herder, and Moses Mendelssohn, who admired his combinatory wit and intellectual gymnastics. While the distinction of being the father of the German essay, as Karl Hillebrand has contended, is not necessarily true, Lessing's articles and fragments are unmistakably sparkling “fermenta cognitionis” (fermentations of his thinking), the term Lessing himself used to characterize his manner of writing and a mode which has become synonymous with essayistic writing in German because of its ability to prompt reflection and counteract rigor mortis of the spirit.

Johann Gottfried Herder, an essayist in his own right, remarked of Lessing's style that it is that “of a writer who does not simply present a finished product but rather displays the writing and thought processes themselves as they occur. Each twist and turn provides a stimulus for further reflection; each thought is presented, analyzed, dissected and then reconstructed.” Herder's summary judgment describes Lessing's style in classical pithiness as “a progressive poem with interludes and episodes, always on the move, always chipping away, caught in forward progress, wrapped up in the process of becoming.” What Herder espies here is recognized by Lessing himself in his own commentaries on the nexus of writing style and epistemological underpinnings. Commonly cited passages are drawn from Lessing's masterpiece, Eine Duplik (1778; A response) and from his Sogenannte Briefe an verschiedene Gottesgelehrte (So-called letters to various theologians) published posthumously. They make clear the significance of his philosophical probing for the tentativeness of the essayistic attitude. His statement that his letters are really “one-sided dialogues” is striking because it claims they are aimed at an absent interlocutor, that is, the reader, who is enjoined to participate in the exploration of ideas. Moreover, Lessing points out the absence of a logical order which allows for the lightness of touch in the treatment of issues. That open, searching manner is manifest in the late piece, Die Erziehung des Menschengeschlechts (1780; The Education of the Human Race).

The essayistic writing of Christoph Martin Wieland (1733–1810) during the course of the second half of the century is a mirror of the evolution and varied textures of the genre itself. Most of his essays first appeared in the pages of his journal, Der Teutsche Merkur. One of the chief features of his early prose is the carefully orchestrated pattern of argumentation which is clearly indebted to rhetorical technique. The “principle of holistic rhythm” is readily evident even in the early work, such as Sympathien (1756; Sympathies), a collection of loosely joined and frequently rhapsodic letters on the necessity of self-knowledge for proper education. With surprising adroitness the novice writer alternates long retarding cadences with abrupt, almost staccato-like phrasing, regulating the rhythm by means of questions, curt factual statements, and effective repetition of words and formulations.

Beginning in the 1760s Wieland’s essays already reveal a mature style. They range from interpolations in his novels such as “Der Anti-Platonismus in Nuce” in Agathon (1766; Anti-Platonism in a nutshell) to journalistic pieces in the Teutscher Merkur such as “Was ist Wahrheit?” (1776; “What Is Truth?”), “Über die ältesten Zeitkürzungsspiele” (1781; On the oldest pastimes), “Für und Wider” (1793; Pro and contra), and “Euthanasia” (1805). They cover the full range of essayistic topics: the nature of truth, the dangers of self-deception, leisure activities, human conflict, and death. Wieland is fittingly celebrated as an early classic essayist.

Immanuel Kant (1724–1804) contributed essays as well, especially in his precritical years. Here one thinks of Versuch über den Optimismus (1759; Essay on optimism) and Träume eines Geistersehers (1766; Dreams of a Spirit-Seer), which have been described as lively, fresh, and witty in their use of language. The impetus for this style might well lie in the English model, for Kant was an avid reader of English literature during the 1750s and 1760s. In Der Essay: Form und Geschichte (1964) Bruno Berger clearly accords Kant the status of essayist. Still, the essay with the greatest impact is his famous examination of the nature of Enlightenment in “Beantwortung der Frage: Was ist Aufklärung” (1784; “What Is Enlightenment?”), which, as well as his “Idee zu einer allgemeinen Geschichte in weltbürgerlicher Sicht” (1784; “Idea for a Universal History with Cosmopolitan Intent”), reverberated well into the 20th century, inviting reactions from writers such as Theodor W. Adorno, Max Horkheimer, Jean Amery, Michel Foucault, and Jürgen Habermas. Via an arsenal of rhetorical techniques Kant leads us deep into the labyrinth of his thinking without our having suspected how demanding the reasoning really is. The impression of ease in moving from one idea to the next is conveyed largely by the judicious use of images, all related to the need to walk and to move about freely. But we are not dealing here with the topos of the leisurely walk which is the mark of the Montaignean essay; on the contrary, this is a guided tour exploring the possible routes to self-direction in all things. Kant expresses his complicated ideas in an admixture of philosophical rigor and poetic imagination.

Moses Mendelssohn (1729–86), a friend of Lessing and the Berlin publisher Friedrich Nicolai, collaborated with them in writing the important critique of contemporary 18th-century literature and aesthetics, Briefe die neueste Literatur betreffend. In his Briefe über die Empfindungen (1755; Letters on sentiment) and the dialogues Phädon, oder über die Unsterblichkeit der Seele (1767; Phædon; or, The Death of Socrates), the influence of Shaftesbury and the neo-Platonists is obvious. The preferred epistolary form frequently reveals the essentially essayistic quality of these contributions. His response to the burning question of his day on the nature of Enlightenment, “Über die Frage: Was heisst aufklären?” (1784; “On the Question: What Is Enlightenment?”), is, like most of his essayistic endeavors, a good example of the conceptual essay.

Johann Gottfried Herder (1744–1803) was a central figure in the literary life of the second half of the 18th century. He wore many hats well, as preacher, innovative cultural historian, and early semiotician. His Über die neuere deutsche Literatur (1767; On contemporary German literature) immediately established him as an innovative and critical thinker with the spark and sparkle of an accomplished orator. In fact, he saw himself in those years as an interpreter and rhapsodist whose sole intent was to instigate a revolution of the national spirit by adopting an anti-intellectual stance.

Perhaps the single most important collection of essays, not just as a manifesto of the Sturm und Drang (Storm and Stress) movement (1767–84), but for German literature in general and the essay in particular, is Von deutscher Art und Kunst: Einige fliegende Blätter (1773; On German art: some hastily scribbled notes), edited by Herder. In addition to seminal essays by Goethe and Paolo Frisi on Gothic architecture and Justus Möser on German history, it also contains two energetic essays by Herder, one on Ossian and another on Shakespeare. Not just Herder’s but all five essays are significant documents on the German search for national and cultural identity. The volume exemplifies the culturally critical essay. After his move to Weimar in 1776, Herder contributed essays on von Hutten, Reuchlin, Johann Joachim Winckelmann, and Lessing to the Teutscher Merkur. Later writings such as the influential Ideen zur Philosophie der Geschichte der Menschheit (1784–91; Reflections on the Philosophy of the History of Humankind) and Briefe zu Beförderung der Menschheit (1793–97; Letters for the advancement of humankind) contain any number of essayistic subsections of high quality.

Johann Wolfgang von Goethe (1749–1832) was a prolific essay writer from his youth through his last years. Drawing upon the advances through the evolution of German as a literary language in the wake of Thomasius and Gellert, Goethe’s essays mirror the full spectrum from conceptual essay to biographical treatise, graphic description, and cultural critique. In addition to the piece on the Strasbourg cathedral (1773) mentioned earlier, there are the tributes to Shakespeare (“Zum Shakespeares-Tag” [1771; “Shakespeare’s Day”]; “Shakespeare und kein Ende” [1813–16; “Shakespeare Without End”]), the geological study, “Über den Granit” (1784; “On Granite”), his critiques of contemporary German literature, “Literarischer Sanculottismus” (1795; The literary left), and the introduction to his journal Die Propyläen (1798), his assessment of Winckelmann’s significance for the 18th century (1805). A key feature of Goethe’s essayistic style is his tendency to draw close to his central idea and then pull back again. By using telling metaphors and changing perspectives, he succeeds in drawing the reader into a process of gradual discovery. Just as drama comes to life only when performed on stage, the written text lives only through the active participation of the reader's power of imagination. Goethe's stylistic modus operandi corresponds to the highest goal to which human beings can aspire according to the anthropological views of the 18th century: the enhanced awareness of our own sentiments and thoughts. Goethe discerns this consciousness-raising in "natural" phenomena from Shakespeare's art to rock formations and classical aesthetic theory. The title of his later essay, "Shakespeare Without End," alludes to this never-ending process of consciousness-raising through the encounter with the texts of man and nature.

Friedrich von Schiller (1759–1805) contributed numerous compositions to the essay genre, starting with his school oration of 1779 on the nature of virtue and continuing through his discussion of the use of the Greek chorus in tragedy which prefaces his drama Die Braut von Messina (1803; The Bride of Messina). Interspersed are seminal essays with far-reaching influence such as his Mannheim lecture on the value of a national theater, "Was kann eine gute stehende Bühne eigentlich wirken?" (1785; "What Can a Good Standing Theater Actually Accomplish?"), the rhapsodic philosophical letters "Philosophische Briefe" (1786), the critical review of Gottfried August Bürger's poetry ("Bürgers Gedichte," 1791) in which Schiller begins to sketch his classical aesthetics, the programmatic and exemplary "Über Anmut und Würde" (1793; "On Grace and Dignity"), and the pace-setting Über naive und sentimentalische Dichtung (1795–96; On Simple and Sentimental Poetry). In these works we find to varying degrees the influence of Klopstock (rhapsodic tone), Goethe (intellectual energy), Leibniz (theodicy, monads), Ferguson (moral sentiment), Lessing (tolerance, perfectibility), and Kant (philosophical rigor). Although Schiller sees himself as a preceptor, he operates like the classical essayist on the belief that no single individual has sole claim to truth. Truth lies neither here nor there, but rather both here and there. The reader is led both to understand the point and to feel it. Schiller never theorized about the essay like Friedrich Schlegel, but he did share a common understanding with Schlegel about the need to galvanize author and reader.

Other important essays from this period include "Vom Tode fürs Vaterland" (1761; On dying for one's country) and "Vom Verdienste" (1765; On merit) by Thomas Abbt (1738–66) and "Anmerkungen über das Theater" (1774; Notes on the theater) by Jakob Michael Reinhold Lenz (1751–92), for they were frequently cited by contemporaries and others to reflect upon the meaning of patriotism and the role of theater in national life. Helferich Peter Sturz's (1736–79) epistles, fragments, dialogues, and anecdotes were penned between 1768 and 1779 on topics ranging from Klopstock to hypochondria, umbrellas, lawyers, and Duke von Bernstorff, and give evidence of Sturz's stature as a classical essayist. Other essays include Adolf von Knigge's (1752–96) "Meine eigene Apologie" (1784; My own apology), Georg Christoph Lichtenberg's (1742–99) publications in the Göttinger Musenalmanach (Göttinger poetic almanac) and in his Sudelbücher, Emilie von Berlepsch's (1749–1818) essay on marriage and the rights of women published in the Teutscher Merkur in 1791, "Über einige zum Glück der Ehe nothwendige Eigenschaften und Grundsätze" (On some character traits and principles indispensable to a happy marriage) and Christian Garve's (1742–98) timely compositions on style, "Über die Popularität des Stils" (1793; On popular discourse) and "Über die prosaische Schreibart" (1798; On prose style). Sophie La Roche's Swiss diary (1787) and Schreibetisch (1799; Writing desk) contain essay-like commentaries which round out the picture. They give ample evidence of the popularity of essay writing by century's end.

4. The 19th Century: From Romanticism to Fin de siècle and a New Awakening (1798–1905)

Endings and beginnings in literary and cultural history are rarely tidy. The opening of a "modern" world view often clashes with a sense of closure at the end of a century. Thus the history of the essay around 1800—as it was around 1700 and was again to be around 1900—is marked by feelings of both fin de siècle and "Aufbruch" (new awakening). It is the oft-cited phenomenon of the "Gleichzeitigkeit des Ungleichzeitigen" (synchronism of the nonsimultaneous). The current chronological cutoffs are set by two eventful occurrences: the appearance of the Athenäum (1798) and Einstein's theory of relativity (1905). The classical age of the essay (from Herder to Wilhelm Dilthey, i.e. 1770–1930) coincides at the front end with the emergence of "modern" Romantic criticism with its emphasis on discovery, exploration, and rediscovery of the origins of language and of the relationship between nature and mind, and at the back end with the rise of Modernism (1880–1930). The final decade of the 19th century with its own explorations and rediscovery was clearly marked by a Modernist thrust. The essay form thrives in such a climate.

4.1. Romanticism (1798–1835)

The arch-Romanticist Friedrich Schlegel (1772–1829) is considered the first genuine theoretician of essayism and the true founder of hermeneutics. Drawing upon the hybrid and dialogic quality of essayistic writing evident since Lessing and Garve, he theorizes the central relationship between author and reader as a "mutual galvanism." Moreover, he argues that the essay is "a kind of experimental philosophy" which must be "rhetorical," "ironic," and "tactical" in method; "the essay is to be written the way we think, write." The mode of writing, Schlegel concludes, "should bring about movement, it should combat intellectual arthritis and promote nimbleness." In general, Schlegel sees the dominant intellectual tendency of the new era to be one of deconstructing rigid systems, what he calls the "essayification" of all disciplines. This stands in contrast to the critical age of Kant and his successors Johann Gottlieb Fichte (1762–1814) and Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel (1770–1831), who came to dominate the 19th century. Yet, by radicalizing Kant's questioning attitude, Schlegel acts as a bridge from the Enlightenment to Romanticism and from Romanticism to the turn of the century.

This "new" modus operandi is everywhere evident in the ground-breaking journal Athenäum (1798–1800) published by Friedrich and his brother, August Wilhelm (1767–1845). Kleist's Die Berliner Abendblätter (1810–11; The Berlin evening news) and the early years of Johann Friedrich Cotta's Morgenblatt für gebildete Stände (1807–65; Morning news for the educated classes) were the most important periodicals for the Romantic movement. Important for the continuing conflation of political life (as prefigured in Berliner Abendblätter) and literary quality (as emphasized in the Athenäum) were such periodicals as Isis (1817–48), Zeitung für die elegante Welt (1801–59; Newspaper for the elegant world), Theodor Mundt's Wissenschaft und Kunst (1835; Science and art), and Karl Gutkow's Telegraph für Deutschland (1835–42; Telegraph for Germany). Wolfgang Menzel edited Das literarische Blatt (1825–49; Literary news) as a supplement to Cotta's Morgenblatt. Also noteworthy is Europa edited by August Lewald from 1835 to 1846.

The Schlegel brothers, Dorothea Veit (1763–1839), Karoline Michaelis, and Friedrich von Hardenberg (i.e. Novalis, 1772–1801) published numerous pieces in the Romantic journals. Notable among them are Novalis' aphoristic "Blütenstaub" (1798; "Pollen") and the essay "Die Christenheit oder Europa" (wr. 1799, partially pub. 1826; "Christianity or Europe"). Friedrich Schlegel's essays "Über die Philosophie" (1800; "On Philosophy"), "Das Gespräch über die Poesie" (1800; "Dialogue on Poetry"), and the genial lectures Geschichte der alten und neuen Literatur (1812; Lectures on the History of Literature, Ancient and Modern) elucidate ideas on the role of myth, irony, and philosophy in prose, establishing him as a world-class essayist and theorist. His brother August Wilhelm gave form and substance to the lightning-quick ideas of his younger brother, popularizing them in his lectures such as Über dramatische Kunst und Literatur (1808; Dramatic Art and Literature).

Essayism as an ironic attitude is exemplified especially well in Friedrich Schlegel's "Über die Unverständlichkeit" (1800; "On Unintelligibility"), which appeared in response to criticism of an unintelligible style in the Athenäum. Schlegel makes a virtue out of a vice by arguing that irony is at the heart of the journal, for it points to the never-ending conflict between the infinite and the finite and underscores the impossibility of complete understanding. The essay, then, operates on the principle of hermeneutic indeterminacy. Essayistic compositions are written as if they were casual letters or private conversations on a moral topic in neither a strict philosophical nor a purely refined poetic style.

In this context we can also recall Schlegel's praise of Georg Forster's (1754–94) style in his famous essay on the nature scientist, writer, and revolutionary. That style throbs with life because of the simultaneous appeal to the mind, the imagination, and the emotions. The effect of this broad appeal to the lower as well as higher human faculties is what has become known as genuine popularity. Schlegel's characterization of Forster's prose is valid about his own writing as well: it stimulates reflection by refining our sensitivity and broadening our perspectives.

Heinrich von Kleist (1777–1811) and Adam Müller (1779–1829) are two other superb essayists associated with the Romantic school. The former experienced an epistemological crisis which left deep marks on his literary production; the latter is especially noted for his political role. Kleist created enduring essays with his theoretically important Über das Marionettentheater (1810; On Puppet Shows) and the epistemologically seminal "Über die allmähliche Verfertigung der Gedanken beim Reden" (wr. c. 1805–06; "On the Gradual Fabrication of Thoughts While Speaking"). In the first he argues for "a more natural coordination of the center of gravity" of each being or thing, for he values “balance, agility, and ease” above all else. In the second essay Kleist speaks of the need to think one’s way through a problem and find the solution via the process. Reflection occurs only after the act; thus the act must be foregrounded in any theoretical consideration. The call for “agitation of the mind” in order to reactivate the ideas that we have already had clearly marks the essayistic mode as “intellectual midwifery” and echoes Schlegel’s views on the essay.

Müller’s “Vom Gespräch” (1816; On conversation) is actually a commentary on the theory and practice of essayistic writing as its own mode of writing. His topic is the trust between interlocutors prerequisite to understanding. Without mutual respect genuine communication cannot occur. The “galvanism of author and reader” cited by Schlegel is here presented as the synergy of discussants. Moreover, Müller echoes the call for bon goût sounded around 1700 by praising the natural light touch and sense of good taste evident in French discourse as being the “pulse beat of the nation.” He exhorts his compatriots to emulate the model.

Others who must be included in the history of the essay are the women writers Karoline von Günderrode (1780–1806), Bettina von Arnim (1785–1859), Elisa von der Recke (1756–1831), and Karoline Pichler (1769–1843), as well as such canonical writers as Jean Paul Friedrich Richter (1763–1825), Ludwig Tieck (1773–1853), Friedrich Hölderlin (1770–1843), and Joseph Görres (1776–1848). Finally, we should recall Wilhelm von Humboldt (1767–1835), the Prussian Minister of Culture and Education and founder of the University of Berlin, his brother and natural scientist Alexander von Humboldt (1769–1859), and the philosophers Friedrich Schleiermacher (1768–1834), Johann Gottlieb Fichte (1762–1814); Friedrich Wilhelm Schelling (1775–1854), and Gotthilf Heinrich Schubert (1780–1860), who all deserve mention as well in the history of the essay during the Romantic period.

4.2. From Realism to Fin de siècle and a New Awakening

Arthur Schopenhauer (1788–1860) shares with the Romantics a rebellious spirit. He too is widely acclaimed as a consummate practitioner of the essay, earning the title of the “German Montaigne” (endowed by Karl Hillebrand) and serving as the expressed inspiration of Thomas Mann’s own essay style. In fact, Schopenhauer appears to be a writer’s writer, for in addition to the comments by Hillebrand and Mann, Franz Kafka judged Schopenhauer to be a veritable “Sprachkünstler” (language artist) who should be read for that talent alone. Jorge Luis Borges claimed he learned German just so that he could read Schopenhauer in the original, even apologizing for putting the philosopher ahead of Goethe and Heine. The main portion of Schopenhauer’s Parerga und Paralipomena (1851; Parerga and Paralipomena) is comprised of aphorisms on the art of living. They have proved to be the most popular of his publications, for his manner of philosophizing was coincident with his ironic and lively style of writing. Philosophy is presented here in an accessible fashion and in stark contrast to the German idealism so widespread at the universities in the 19th century (Schelling, Fichte, Hegel). Above all Schopenhauer sought to stimulate with his thoughts on diverse subjects further reflection on the part of his readers so that they might draw their own conclusions based on their own critical faculties. That is the main reason why he referred to professors of philosophy in the wake of Schelling, Fichte, and Hegel as “corrupters of the mind” (“Kopfverderber”). No wonder that Nietzsche found in him a kindred spirit.

Herman Grimm (1828–1901) published his first set of II essays in Hannover in 1859; the book bore the simple title Essays, was dedicated to Ralph Waldo Emerson, and was an immediate success. In 1865 a second set of ten essays followed under the title Neue Essays über Kunst und Literatur (New essays on art and literature). It opened with a homage to Emerson, and the entire collection pays tribute to the impact the American had on Grimm. Indeed the 1830s and 1840s proved to be a fertile period of incubation for the genre: Lamb, Hunt, Hazlitt, Landor, De Quincey, Carlyle, Macaulay, Thackeray, Thoreau, and Margaret Fuller as well as Emerson penned many of their classical essays then. Grimm refers to that impact in such pieces as “Emerson” (1865), “Friedrich der Grosse und Macaulay” (1874; Frederick the Great and Macaulay), and “Goethe und Carlyle” (1865). The 1850s and 1860s subsequently saw the birth of the genuine, selfconsciously conceived and practiced essay mode.

In another essay collection from the year 1890, Grimm included a lengthy preface in which he detailed the history and distinguishing characteristics of the literary genre of the essay. In his introductory comments to his Fragmente (1900–02) he concedes that he perhaps has created a legacy of some import for subsequent generations of writers by cultivating the essay form. To be sure, his latter essays include reviews and articles with a more polemical tone such as “Deutscher Unterricht auf deutschen Gymnasien” (1890; German instruction in the German schools), “Wert und Wirkung der Kunstkritik” (1890; Value and impact of art criticism), and “Goethe im Dienste unserer Zeit” (1890; Goethe for our times) (Ludwig Rohner, 1966). But Emerson is given due credit for having introduced into the mainstream the loan word “essay,” using it interchangeably with the native German Aufsatz. Nevertheless, the Preussische Jahrbücher found it necessary in 1857 to encourage the use of the term “essay” to designate what was already common practice.

If Herman Grimm captures the spirit of the positivistic 19th century, Friedrich Nietzsche (1844–1900) points to a thorough revamping of conceptions. His influence on generations of writers has been profound. As the first radically (post)modern thinker in Germany, Nietzsche found aphoristic and essayistic writing to be the most appropriate vehicle of expression for his philosophy of the future. Many of the entries in the aphoristically styled works of the 1870s and 1880s, Menschliches, Allzumenschliches (1878–80; Human, All Too Human), Also sprach Zarathustra (1883–85; Thus Spoke Zarathustra), Jenseits von Gut und Böse (1886; Beyond Good and Evil), and Die fröhliche Wissenschaft (1882; The Gay Science), contain fine examples of the essay. Earlier pieces on the birth of tragedy, the advantages and disadvantages of the use of history, David Strauss as writer, Schopenhauer as educator, and Wagner in Bayreuth, which appeared in his culturally critical Unzeitgemässe Betrachtungen (1873–76; Untimely Meditations), are veritable masterpieces of the genre whose trademark is experimental playfulness. His thought experiments are most aptly expressed in aphoristic form, which just considered to contain the essence of the essayist’s attitude and thus labeled them “essay extracts.”

Many other 19th-century essayists are worthy of note, but only a small selection can be mentioned here. At the beginning of Book III of his Die romantische Schule (1836; The Romantic School), Heinrich Heine (1797–1856) remarked that “The history of literature is as difficult to describe as natural history. In both cases one sticks to particularly dominant phenomena. Yet just as a small glass of water can contain an entire world of wondrous creatures which demonstrate the greatness of God just no less than the largest beasts, so too can the smallest poetic almanac contain innumerable miniature poets who appear just as interesting to the researcher as the largest elephants of literature.” Any number of the many collections and journals mentioned here are like the Musenalmanach cited by Heine. The following partial list is designed to communicate a sense of that richness: Heine’s Die Harzreise (1826; The Harz Journey) and Die romantische Schule; Ästhetische Feldzüge (1834; Aesthetic campaigns) by Ludolf Wienbarg (1802–72); “Das politische Gespräch” (1836; “A Dialogue on Politics”) and Über die Epochen der neueren Geschichte (wr. 1854, pub. 1888; On the epochs of modern history) by Leopold von Ranke (1795–1886); Wanderungen durch den Mark Brandenburg (1862–82; Excursions through Mark Brandenburg) by Theodor Fontane (1819–98); Weltgeschichtliche Betrachtungen (1905; Reflections on History) by Jacob Christoph Burckhardt (1818–97); “Die deutsche Ideologie” (wr. 1845–46; The German Ideology) by Karl Marx (1818–83) and Friedrich Engels (1820–95); and Zeiten, Völker und Menschen (1874–85; Time, people, and men) by Karl Hillebrand (1829–84).

Then there are the Austrians Ferdinand Kürnberger (1821–79), Otto Gildemeister (1823–1902), Ludwig Bamberger (1823–99), Sigmund Freud (1856–1939), and Franz Xavier Kraus (1840–1901). These writers published their works in journals as well as in individual collections. Few of them, however, are known first and foremost as essayists.

5. The 20th Century (1900–94): From Modernism to Postwall

Given the essay’s function as a means of exploring conflict in times of change, it is no surprise that the 20th century, with its repeated psychological, scientific, and political crises, has experienced a burgeoning of the essayistic style. The Austrian critic Hans Hahnle noted in 1956 that literary production is no longer centered on the epic, the lyric, or the drama as it was earlier, not even on the novel as in the 19th century; today, he averred, it is centered on the essay (Rohner). Writers of diverse backgrounds mirror these essential tensions, which reemerged around 1900 with the Modernist movement and have continued throughout the entire century. After having long stood in the shadow of the essay as practiced in America, England, France, and Spain, the German essay moved to the forefront with a flurry of activity in the early decades of the 20th century and again immediately after World War II. Its strength has continued since then. The constellation of events and talent evident in the axis Lessing-Herder-Wieland-Goethe-Schlegel repeats itself in the constellation of Hofmannsthal-Borchardt-Kassner-Heinrich Mann-Benn and again in the configuration Jens-Mayer-Werner Weber-Weizsäcker-Wolf.

5.1. Fin de Siècle and Modernism (1890–1930)

Together with his friend Rudolf Borchardt, Hugo von Hofmannsthal (1874–1929) represents the beginning of another high point in the unity of the lyric, dramatic, epic, and the essayistic. Hofmannsthal led the way with his sensitive treatments of Swinburne (1893), D'Annunzio (1894), and the poems of Stefan George (1896) as cosmopolitan phenomena. The aestheticizing thrust of these essays underscores the dallying pleasure of nuance while simultaneously prompting sublimation of the momentary pleasure. The result is a conflation of poetry and life, as Hofmannsthal entitles one of his essays ("Poesie und Leben," 1896). Nevertheless, the most influential of his essays was surely his fictive epistle, "Brief des Lord Chandos" (1901; Letter to Lord Chandos), directed to the father of the English essay, Francis Bacon, in which Hofmannsthal expresses his crisis of creative inspiration. The introductions to collected works frequently assume the shape and feel of the essay, as for example the prefaces to 1001 Nacht (1908) and Balzac (1908). Die Briefe des Zurückgekehrten (1908; Letters of those who have returned), "Maria Theresia" (1917), "Rede auf Grillparzer" (1922; Speech on Grillparzer), and finally "Das Schrifttum als geistiger Raum der Nation" (1927; The written word as the spiritual space of nationhood) document respectively his eye for sharp cultural criticism, an appreciation of Austrian heritage, and his personal commitment to a "conservative revolution" (as he called it). Taken as a whole, Hofmannsthal's opus is a fine example of the reworking of a cosmopolitan cultural legacy to respond to the personal and intellectual crises of the day.

Rudolf Borchardt's (1877–1945) style is the counterpart to that of his friend: it is loud, sometimes irritating, even militant. An opportunity to compare and contrast offers itself readily since Borchardt also penned essays on Swinburne (1909) and George (1909). His own attitude toward and deep sense of affinity with Hofmannsthal can be gleaned from his "Rede über Hofmannsthal" (1902), "Die neue Poesie und die alte Menschheit" (1912; New poetry and traditional humanity), and "Schöpferische Restauration" (1927; Creative restoration). In his posthumously published essay on Edna St. Vincent Millay, "Die Entdeckung Amerikas" (c. 1925; The discovery of America), Borchardt was one of the first great German essayists to point out the importance of American lyrical poetry.

Rudolf Kassner (1873–1959), a great essayist of the day, is little remembered today. That is due perhaps to the fact that he wrote exclusively essays, and, as noted, the essay form has stirred little interest among German scholars. Nevertheless, Kassner's essayistic production can be considered the counterpart to the early lyrics of George and Rilke. What fascinated Kassner was the relationship between the Platonic idea and the physical body. Favorite topics, therefore, are compelling beauty and transparency of the inner essence. In his first publication, "Die Mystik, die Künstler und das Leben" (1900; The mystic, the artist, and life), Kassner renders the master prose writer as the necessary counterpart to the creative poet. Shelley, Keats, Blake, Rossetti, and Swinburne are his models. This nuance-rich aestheticism of the turn of the century ultimately gives way to a growing concentration on the external form. The tension between antique and Christian views of man is rendered in "Von den Elementen menschlicher Grösse" (1911; On the elements of human grandeur), while physiognomy begins to dominate in the 1920s as in "Grundlagen der Physiognomik" (1921; Fundamentals of physiognomy) and "Das physiognomische Weltbild" (1930; Physiognomical world view). During the fascist years Kassner turned his attention to travel, reminiscences, and the role of the imagination. Following the war, he returned to politically sensitive issues in his interpretation of the age of the atom bomb in “Transfiguration” (1946) and the role of Christ in mediating the tensions between the age of Plato and the age of the Iron Curtain in “Die Geburt Jesu” (1951; The birth of Christ). Kassner was active to the end, and his intellectual agility is manifest in his “Das inwendige Reich” (1953; The inner empire), “Der Zauberer” (1955; The magician), and “Der goldene Drachen” (1957; The golden dragon). In all of these works the intellectual anxiety and aesthetic sensibilities of the first half of the 20th century from fin de siècle to the atom bomb are captured, mirrored, and transfigured.

The many influential essays of Walter Benjamin (1892–1940), penned between 1925 and 1935, capture this sense of diversity as well: “Die Aufgabe des Übersetzers” (1923; The translator’s task), “Goethes Wahlverwandtschaften” (1924–25; Goethe’s Elective Affinities), “Karl Kraus” (1931), “Der Autor als Produzent” (wr. 1934; The author as producer), and “Das Kunstwerk im Zeitalter seiner technischen Reproduzierbarkeit” (1936; “The Work of Art in the Age of Reproduction”). While each has a different thematic focus and there is a clear shift from his early idealism to his later Marxist stance, the growing emphasis on the political and ethical responsibilities of the writer goes hand in hand with the calling of the classical essayist to be responsive to the human condition. To be sure, “Karl Kraus” is considered to be the closest in form and style to the classical form of the essay, but then thematic and excursive qualities of the genre always resonate with one another as if in pre-established harmony. Benjamin summed up this tendency of the age in his Einbahnstrasse (1928; One-way street), where he remarks that refined prose has three dimensions: a musical one which structures the piece rhythmically, an architectonic one which provides the external structure, and a “textile” one which provides the verbal fabric and particular texture of the text (Dieter Bachmann, 1969). His “artwork essay” is one of the most important contributions to the sociology of art in the 20th century and is worthy of detailed analysis.

5.2. From Exile to Postwall (1945–94)

The essayistic style was not favored by the National Socialists, who came to power in 1933. They rejected the essay precisely because of its open, critical stance, something German exile writers of course valued all the more. The editorial reactions of Die neue Rundschau (1890–; The new review) and Die Deutsche Rundschau (1874–45, 1950–; The German review) reveal the two major forms of resistance during the Fascist regime. While the former employed cloaking devices in order to conceal its criticism of the Nazis, the latter under the direction of Rudolf Pechel was unmistakably critical of the regime. Two collections of essays from the pages of these journals underscore the point. In his collection, Der goldene Schnitt: Grosse Essayisten der Neuen Rundschau 1890–1960 (1960; The golden harvest), Christoph Schwerin includes not a single essay from the period 1933–44, explaining that the journal became a secret center of anti-National Socialist thought, but that National Socialist terminology had to be adopted in order to conceal its real purpose. By contrast, Pechel penned an introduction, “Schicksale und politische Aufgabe einer deutschen Zeitschrift” (Fate and political mission of a German journal) to his collection, Deutsche Rundschau: Acht Jahrzehnte deutschen Geisteslebens (1961; German review: eight decades of German intellectual life) in which he explains how he used the journal as a weapon against the Ministry of Propaganda and the Gestapo. He consciously sought to unmask the Nazi regime by employing the techniques of Montesquieu, Swift, and Confucius (Rohner). But following World War II the essay again came into its own, rising to prominence in such publications as Merkur (1947–; Mercury), Sinn und Form (1949–; Meaning and form), Frankfurter Hefte (Frankfurt journal), Der Monat (The month), and Kursbuch (Timetable), as well as again in the Deutsche Rundschau and Neue Rundschau. Newspapers such as the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung (Frankfurt general newspaper) and the Süddeutsche Zeitung (South German newspaper) are frequent sites of essayistic rather than merely feuilletonistic writing.

The positivism and specialization already evident in the Baconian branch of the European essay and in the 19th-century German one have come to mark the scientific attitudes of the 20th. In order to communicate the particular knowledge of a narrow specialty to the public at large, recourse was taken to essay writing. Examples of this move are provided by Sigmund Freud, Carl Jung (1875–1961), Werner Heisenberg (1901–76), Hans Blumenberg (1920–96), Carl Friedrich von Weizsäcker, and Max Planck (1858–1947). A by-product of this movement has been the importation of the mentality of precise measurements essential to science into the quintessentially ambiguous realm of art. Consequently, some critics fear the progressive disintegration of the essay (Karl August Horst, 1962.) and note a significant shift from the classical essay of the 18th and 19th centuries with its goal of instigating a critical dialogue to a desire simply to win the reader over to the author's point of view. The positing of a specific ideological or dogmatic truth threatens to displace the characteristic encirclements of possible, probable truths. Thus it is imperative that the reader pay close attention to the modus operandi. More important than a particular style is the essential attitude reflected in the use of language.

Other critics sense a decline in the appropriateness of the classical essay of the 18th and 19th centuries as a model for writing in the 20th century because it seemed little more than a form of masquerade and prevarication (Hermann Kähler, 1982). Hugo von Hofmannsthal's Chandos letter and Hermann Hesse's "Die Brüder Karamasoff oder der Untergang Europas" (1919; The brothers Karamasov and the decline of Europe) or "Zarathustras Wiederkehr" (1919; Zarathustra's return), and Ricarda Huch's "Entpersönlichung" (1921; Depersonalization) capture this feeling—paradoxically—in essay form. While the sense of decenteredness recurs after 1945, it does not stem the flow of essays. Weizsäcker, Walter Jens (1923–), and Christa Wolf demonstrate that such fears of dissolution are exaggerated.

Gerhard Haas identifies three general categories of essayists in the 20th century which, however, are not free of overlap. The first group includes those whose point of departure is belles-lettres itself: Alfred Andersch (1914–80), Ingeborg Bachmann (1926–73), Hermann Bahr, Gottfried Benn, Ernst Bertram, Heinrich Böll (1917–85), Rudolf Borchardt, Bertholt Brecht (1898–1956), Hermann Broch, Elias Canetti, Alfred Döblin (1878–1937), Friedrich Dürrenmatt (1921–90), Hans Magnus Enzensberger, Max Frisch, Günter Grass (1927–), Hermann Hesse (1877–1962), Hugo von Hofmannsthal, Ernst Jünger (1895–), Oskar Loerke (1884–1941), Heinrich and Thomas Mann, Robert Musil, Rudolf Alexander Schröder (1878–1962), Peter Turrini (1944–), Robert Walser, Christa Wolf, and Stefan Zweig (1881–1942), among many others. The second group comprises essayists who come from the other disciplines, for example: Theodor W. Adorno, Max Bense (1910–90), Ernst Bloch (1885–1977), Jacob Christoph Burckhardt, Ernst Robert Curtius (1886–1956), Sigmund Freud, Romano Guardini (1885–1968), Friedrich Heer (1916–83), Eric Heller (1911–), Ricarda Huch, Walter Jens, Rudolf Kassner, Max Kommerrell (1902–44), Georg Lukács (1885–1971), Hans Mayer, Alexander Mitscherlich (1908–82), Rudolf Pannwitz (1881–1969), Georg Simmel, Karl Vossler, and Carl Friedrich von Weizsäcker. Finally, a third group draws its members largely from the press and media: Peter Bamm (1897–1975), Walter Benjamin, Hans Hennecke (1897–1977), Theodor Heuss (1884–1963), Josef Hofmiller, Curt Hohoff (1913–), Hans Egon Holthusen, Siegfried Kracauer, Karl Kraus (1874–1936), Marcel Reich-Ranicki (1920–), Max Rychner, Arno Schmidt (1914–79), Dolf Sternberger (1907–), Günter Wallraff (1942–), and Werner Weber. As extensive as this list is, it is still woefully incomplete.

The 20th century has seen a veritable flood of essayistic writing which makes it prohibitive to go into any detail here. Yet it is useful to cite certain influential editions and even individual essays worthy of closer consideration. Among the telling collections are Bildung (1900; Education) and Inventur (1912; Inventory) by Hermann Bahr (1863–1934), whose titles represent essential attitudes toward stock-taking at the turn of the century. Robert Walser (1878–1956) followed with Aufsätze (1913; Essays), Georg Simmel (1858–1918) with Fragmente und Aufsätze (1923; Fragments and essays), Rudolf Kassner with Essays (1923), and Josef Hofmiller (1872–1933) with his Über den Umgang mit Büchern (1927; On intimacy with books). Heinrich Mann (1871–1950), even more noteworthy than his brother Thomas as an essayist, produced a whole series of essay collections over a 20-year span: e.g. Macht und Mensch (1919; Power and people), Geist und Tat (1931; Spirit and deed), and Mut (1939; Courage). Thomas Mann (1875–1955) had a broad impact with his literary critiques, “Goethe und Tolstoi” (1925; “Goethe and Tolstoy”), “Goethe als Repräsentant des bürgerlichen Zeitalters” (1932; “Goethe as Representative of the Bourgeois Age”), and “Leiden und Grösse Richard Wagners” (1933; “Sufferings and Greatness of Richard Wagner”) as well as numerous other essays. Siegfried Kracauer’s (1889–1966) Weimar essays Das Ornament der Masse (1936; The Mass Ornament) captures the mood of those years, while the autobiographical “Doppelleben” (1950; Double life) of Gottfried Benn (1886–1956) reflects the tension between the individual as self-directive and the self as an insignificant test case in a large laboratory experiment.

Blätter aus dem Brotsack (1940; Pages from the food pouch) by Max Frisch (1911–91) and Welt im Wort (1949; World in the word) by Max Rychner (1897–1965) are commentaries on the war years. “Der unbehauste Mensch” (1951; Homeless man), Ja and Nein (1954; Yes and no), and Das Schöne und das Wahre (1958; The beautiful and the true) by Hans Egon Holthusen (1913–) capture the sense of marginalization and ambivalence toward the past and one’s own disenfranchisement caused by the war. Rychner picked up on these themes in Zwischen Mitte und Rand (1964; Between center and margin). The socially and culturally critical essays in Theodor W. Adorno’s (1903–69) Prismen (1955; Prisms) proved to be highly influential, as was his edition of Benjamin’s critical writings, Schriften I und II (1955). The same is true of Holzwege (1950; Woodpaths) by Martin Heidegger (1889–1976), although Bruno Berger (1964) is reluctant to label them essays. Elias Canetti's (1905–94) Masse und Macht (1960; Crowds and Power) and Die Welt im Kopf (1962; The world in your head), Werner Weber's well-received Tagebuch eines Lesers (1965; Diary of a reader), and Christa Wolf's Lesen und Schreiben (1972; Reading and writing) evince the continuing appeal of the essay in the in the second half of the century.

Individual essays of note are Das hilflose Europa (1922; Helpless Europe) by Robert Musil (1880–1942), “Der Zerfall der Werte” (1932; “The Disintegration of Values”) and “Das System der Welt-Bewältigung” (System of world control) by Hermann Broch (1886–1951), “Bildung als Konsumgut” (1962; Culture as consumer ware) by Hans Magnus Enzensberger (1929–), Adorno's “Zeitlose Mode” (Timeless fashion), Kracauer's “Über Erfolgsbücher und ihr Publikum” (On bestsellers and their public), Max Weber's (1864–1920) “Wissenschaft als Beruf” (1919; Science as profession), “Stein” (Stone) by Ricarda Huch (1864–1947), and Holthusen's “Der unbehauste Mensch.” Each is exemplary in style and form. Many of those written before the war were rediscovered as a way of dealing indirectly with the dark era of fascism. Huch's piece is a rare example of political essay in German. Kracauer's topology of filmic motifs and his sociological critique in “Die kleinen Ladenmädchen gehen ins Kino” (1927; The little shop girls go to the movies) are still fresh and incisive today because of their emphasis on the impact of the entertainment industry. Films reinforce bourgeois values through their choice of characterization. Film imitates life, but life also imitates film, for the young women model their own actions on the film characters.

The above-named essays also reveal a tendency in the 20th-century essay toward the more formal treatise with clear external signposts of the internal structure. This is also true of Walter Benjamin, whose influence on postwar writing has been considerable in the wake of the posthumous publication of his works in the 1950s. His “Der Autor als Produzent” (1934; The author as producer) and artwork-essay have been frequently consulted by writers and scholars alike. Completely different but equally significant for the history of the essay are his treatments of Baudelaire (1939) with its emphasis on the urban life of the flâneur and the celebration of Franz Kafka (1934) as the quintessential “homeless” intellectual adrift in the flow of time.

“Brecht und die Humanität” (1964; Brecht and humanity) by Hans Mayer (1907–) is a rhetorical tour de force with a strong essayistic slant toward the favored method of the combinatorial principle. Mayer begins his oration significantly with the statement: “Brecht and humanitas: a questionable combination.” Yet it can serve to underscore the continuous fascination with politics (Brecht) and humanistic values (humanitas) which lies at the center of the essay. Mayer is known for his mesmerizing ability to speak freely on writers and their literature, their forms and traditions, and their realized or unrealized political responsibilities. In a secular age of reason, he plays the kind of role that Luther, Zwingli, and Abraham a Sancta Clara played in the age of faith when the preacher was teacher, entertainer, and pastor all rolled into one. The rhetorical tradition continues despite obvious transformations in world view.

K.G. Just pointed out in “Der Essay” (1954), his pioneering article on the essay, that future inquiries into the history and practice of the essay would need to look explicitly at the influence on the genre emanating from scientific circles and not focus merely on the literary practice. While it is evident from the essayistic output of the Göttinger physicist Georg Christoph Lichtenberg (1742–99), the geological studies of Goethe, and the objective essays of Alexander von Humboldt that the natural sciences have always been part and parcel of the essayistic tradition, developments since 1945 have dissolved the distinction between scientific prose and the literary essay even further. Aesthetic production in all the genres has displayed a strong tendency to experiment, thus drawing closer to the stance of science and technology. Two essayists—Wolf and Weizsäcker—exemplify these border crossings between science and poetry which are at the core of essayistic writing.

Few natural scientists have shown themselves to be more accomplished essayists than the physicist, philosopher, and statesman, Carl Friedrich von Weizsäcker (1912–). A veritable uomo universale like Francis Bacon, Weizsäcker has contributed frequently and substantially to the genre. Of special interest in this context is the work pursuant to the transformation of his world view during the 1950s, when he began to formulate his philosophy of nature in search of a unity of nature, science, religion, and human existence. His studies of Kant, Descartes, the scholastics, Aristotle and Plato, and frequent talks with Heidegger convinced him of the dominant role that a skeptical attitude plays in gaining knowledge. Philosophy is, in fact, learning how to ask ever more questions. Of course the methodology was not unknown to him as an atomic physicist interested in spin theory and the splitting of the atom. He has held a chair in physics (Berlin) and in philosophy (Hamburg). These experiences found expression on the lecture circuit. The chief thematic foci of his essays and speeches are human consciousness, social structures, economic conditions, ecology, the concept of nation, political responsibility, and personal morality.

Christa Wolf (1929–) is an essayist in the manner of Montaigne as well as a noted novelist. Her light touch is deceiving in that her prose sentences consistently pierce the external shell of convention to stir inner movement. Her essays fly easily, breathe naturally, and animate relentlessly. This is especially true of such pieces as “Tabula Rasa” (1968) in which she invokes a universe of self-knowledge and experience resultant of her reading since childhood and concludes that without books, she could not be what she has become. “One of the greatest adventures we can have in life,” she contends, is “to compare, examine, define our limits and gradually learn to see ourselves, to measure ourselves against the most well-defined figures of all time.” Without books all that is impossible.

Extraordinary as an essay crossing disciplinary boundaries is the speech Wolf delivered in Bremen in 1977 entitled “Ein Satz” (1978; “A Sentence”). An intent look at the simple relationships subject-verb-object quickly reveals cracks and fissures running throughout the apparently monolithic façade. Sentences rarely match the human behavior, the internal conditions of the reader or listener. We hear and understand what we already know and accept. Prejudgment interferes, therefore, with the ability to judge what another is saying. This stance harks back to Thomasius and to Lessing and Wieland’s exhortations to hear clearly, read closely, and think critically for oneself in order to escape the controlling mechanisms of tradition and customs.

In “Gedächtnis und Gedenken: Über Fred Wander” (1972; “Commemorative Medallions”) Wolf deals with memory, identifying the essential tension between systole and diastole which defines human existence. Here the principle of expansion is translated into the language of imagination with its freedom to play with the open possibilities while the principle of contraction is rendered in the language of trite tradition and hardening habit. Her comment on the function of epic prose in the battle against intellectual arthritis applies equally to essayistic writing with its insistence on resistance: "Epic prose should be a genre which aims to penetrate [the] individual, the prose reader, along trails which have not yet been blazed. It must get through to his innermost core, the nucleus where the personality is formed and made solid... This region is accessible to the voice of another human being; prose can reach it; language can touch it and open it up—not to take control of it, but to free psychic energies whose power is comparable to those locked in the atom." As is true for essayists of any era, we must have the courage to investigate, to explore, to experiment. This Wolf does in "Abschied von Phantomen—Zur Sache: Deutschland" (1994; "Parting from Phantoms: The Business of Germany") in which she reviews—not all too kindly—the first five years after the fall of the wall and the reunification of East and West Germany. It is a far-ranging and incisive expose which draws upon history, literature, travels to America, ethnic and cultural diversity in easy and tantalizing ways. As is the wont with classical essayists, she keeps the reader guessing where she is headed as she moves toward her goal in a seemingly associative manner. Her real topic is forgetfulness, oblivion, "the loss of reality." That aligns her with writers of the 1950s troubled by memories of the recent past. Wolf's refrain-like question "Where am I headed?" keeps the reader focused until she concludes with an image of a commonly prepared and shared meal by all Germans whether from the West or from the East.

The kind of prose Weizsäcker and Wolf offer in these pieces is truly essayistic; it is hazardous to writer and reader alike, for it is capable of altering and moving. It is supposed to alter and move. Wolf strikes a chord resonant with one sounded by the American essayist, Harold Brodkey, who deemed reading (not just consuming) to be a most dangerous game. Unfortunately, Wolf suspected that prose writers in the 1970s and 1980s had not yet arrived at the stage of science which, of course, is wholly dependent on curiosity and experimentation and without which there could be no further movement.

6. Conclusion: Maps

The German essay is like a map of middle Europe: it reveals geographical diversity and fecundity. The essays are like so many signposts; the essayists are the guides. Individual essays, essay collections, essayistic interludes in novels, even the personalities of the essayists themselves are like the hills and valleys, pastures and meadows, lakes, rivers, and streams, the towns and urban centers. All contribute a particular flavor to the terrain and give it its special character. A traveler therein can become acquainted with many different towns and landscapes. The essayist functions as a collector and transmitter of the spirit of an age—not in the sense of an objective mirror which merely reflects images but in the sense of an amplifier and filter of human thoughts and emotions. Distinguishing fine nuances, rearranging them in creative and productive ways, the essayist captures the invigorating essence of the all-toomundane in the cultural, sociological, and philosophical matrix of the human community and sends it back out into the relational system to energize the whole with new life. Such is the function of the essay as mediator between spirit and deed, between science and poetry, from Thomasius to Christa Wolf. It dazzles with its sparkle and animates with its delicate balancing act.

JOHN A.McCARTHY

Further Reading

- Bachmann, Dieter, Essay und Essayismus: Benjamin—Broch—Kassner—H.Mann—Musil—Rychner, Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1969
- Bohm, Arnd, "Artful Reproduction: Benjamin's Appropriation of Adolf Behne's 'Das reproduktive Zeitalter' in the KunstwerkEssay," Germanic Review 68, no. 4 (1994):146–55
- Burgard, Peter J., Idioms of Uncertainty: Goethe and the Essay, University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1992
- Ginsberg, Robert, editor, The Philosopher as Writer: The Eighteenth Century, Selinsgrove, Pennsylvania: Susquehanna University Press, 1987
- Haas, Gerhard, Studien zur Form des Essays und zu seinen Vorformen im Roman, Tübingen: Niemeyer, 1966
- Haas, Gerhard, Essay, Stuttgart: Metzler, 1969
- Horst, Karl August, Kritischer Führer durch die deutsche Literatur der Gegenwart: Roman, Lyrik, Essay, Munich: Nymphenburger, 1962
- Just, K.G., "Der Essay," in Deutsche Philologie im Aufriss, vol. 2, edited by Wolfgang Stammer, Berlin: Schmidt, 1954: cols. 1897–1948
- Kähler, Hermann, Von Hofmannsthal bis Benjamin: Ein Streifzug durch die Essayistik der zwanziger Jahre, Berlin and Weimar: Aufbau, 1982
- Küntzel, Heinrich, Essay und Aufklärung: Zum Ursprung einer originellen deutschen Prosa im 18. Jahrhundert, Munich: Fink, 1969
- McCarthy, John A., Crossing Boundaries: A Theory and History of Essay Writing in German, 1680–1815, Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1989
- Midgley, David R., "'Das hilflose Europa': Eine Aufforderung, die politischen Essays von Robert Musil neu zu lesen," German Quarterly 67, no. 1 (1994):16–26
- Mittmann, Elizabeth, "Christa Wolf's Signature in and on the Essay: Woman, Science, and Authority," in The Politics of the Essay: Feminist Perspectives, edited by Ruth Ellen Boetcher Joeres and Elizabeth Mittmann, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1993: 95–112
- Morchen, Helmut, "Nebensachen: Zu den Essays westdeutscher Autoren," in Deutsche Gegenwartsliteratur: Ausgangspositionen und aktuelle Entwicklungen, edited by Manfred Durzak, Stuttgart: Reclam, 1981:359–73
- Nordmann, Ingeborg, "Nachdenken an der Schwelle von Literatur und Theorie: Essayistinnen im 20. Jahrhundert," in Deutsche Literatur von Frauen: 19. und 20. Jahrhundert, edited by Gisela Brinker-Gabler, Munich: Beck, 1988:364–79
- Rohner, Ludwig, Der deutsche Essay: Materialien zur Geschichte und Ästhetik einer literarischen Gattung, Neuwied and Berlin: Luchterhand, 1966
- Schmidt, James, editor, What Is Enlightenment? Eighteenth-Century Answers and Twentieth-Century Questions, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1996
- van der Laan, James, The German Essay of the Eighteenth Century: An Ecology

(dissertation), Ann Arbor: University of Michigan, 1984

Weissenberger, Klaus, "Essay," in Prosa Kunst ohne Erzählen: Die Gattungen der nichtfiktionalen Kunstprosa, edited by Weissenberger, Tübingen: Niemeyer, 1985:105–24

Wohlleben, Joachim, Goethe als Journalist und Essayist, Frankfurt-on-Main and Berne: Lang, 1981

Gershenzon, Mikhail

Russian, 1869–1925

While for many writers the essay was a sideline interest, for Mikhail Gershenzon it was his first, enduring, and primary love. Although he wrote over ten books and hundreds of articles, reviews, and essays in his 30-year career as a Russian historian, critic, and philosopher, the essay served as the fundamental form from which all his work germinated. His most important contributions to Russian literature are in themselves exemplary treatments of the essay genre. For example, in the domain of political thought, Gershenzon contributed a key essay to Vekhi (1909; Landmarks), that "scandalous," antirevolutionary volume which transformed the Russian political landscape. As a literary scholar, he wrote the famous essay, "Mudrost' Pushkina" (1917; Pushkin's wisdom), which clearly stated the Modernist attitudes toward Russia's greatest poet. As a philosopher, Gershenzon published a group of philosophical essays in the 1920s in which he described his vision of a "natural" life that should replace the hateful, unfree "world of culture."

Gershenzon's most innovative use of the essay, however, belongs to his work as an historian. His major historical books and biographies—Istoriia molodoi Rossii (1908; The history of young Russia), Istoricbeskie zapiski (1910; Historical sketches), and Obrazy prosh logo (1912; Images of the past)—re actually simply collections of essays which were first published in journals. With the essay form, he portrayed the Russian thinkers of the 19th century, whom he depicted as seekers of a better world. To make his inimitable portraits, he needed to develop an original view of history. Criticizing historians who saw the past as a debate over ideas, systems, and ideologies, Gershenzon held that living individuals are the subject of history. The task of historical investigation, therefore, must be to understand people. Since the human psyche is composed of far more than ideas, he claimed, the historian must be concerned with the unconscious aspects of the individual: feeling, instinct, and the drive for spiritual perfection. Among all three, Gershenzon believed the last—the religious need of the individual for unity with all other things—was the most important. This view helped him conceive of an original model for the depiction of the individual in culture. Instead of lauding the external accomplishments of individuals, Gershenzon trumpeted "internal," spiritual achievements. By internal achievement, he meant the capacity of some individuals for joining personal will to the spiritual, "divine will" of the cosmos.

Concretely, Gershenzon transformed into heroes those individuals who lived life organically, without reflection. He selected those Russian thinkers who, he felt, embodied the desire to escape logical reason and wished to embrace a religious world view. In his biographical essay on the philosopher Petr Chaadaev, he shows the thinker eagerly imbibing the ecumenical ideal of Catholicism as an alternative to the sectarian division of the Christian churches. In his essays on the Stankevich Circle, Russian intellectuals of the 1830s, he concentrates on their expressed desire for spiritual unity through revealing the hidden beauty in the world of ideas. Similarly, he admires Russia's first revolutionaries, the Decembrists, since they lived an "organic" life based on European ideas of service, pride, friendship, and loyalty.

Gershenson's use of the essay form came from his education as a student in the Department of History and Philology at Moscow University. Loaded down with classes covering enormous bodies of knowledge, the students were periodically required to produce essay-length papers on specialized themes. From these habitual assignments, the students developed an ability succinctly to organize, analyze, and relate voluminous amounts of material. Gershenson's earliest published works in the 1890s, on ancient Greek history, were in fact term papers. His first articles on Russian literature and history closely resemble those university projects in form and style, and it would not be an exaggeration to say that the essay form he mastered at university was the same one he employed throughout his life.

He chose to continue using the essay form for several reasons. As a Jew, he was unable to get an academic appointment in tsarist Russia, and earned his livelihood from publications in the monthly "thick" journals, which contained several sections, including one for literary studies. The essay's size was perfect for such a venue. Additionally, the essay form was elastic, permitting him to employ a lively, conversational prose style with which he could portray heroes' psychological and emotional dimensions. He also included "novelistic" techniques, such as the drawing out of the plot to create suspense, transmission of fictionalized conversations, and the insertion of epilogues.

There were other reasons for his choice of genre as well. Gershenson used the essay form because it offered narrative possibilities lacking in academic prose and objective biography. He exploited the essay's potential as a source for moral exhortation. Gershenson often aimed to educate or edify the reader with a direct address. In Istoriia molodoi Rossii, for example, he writes, "And why are the advanced individuals of our time doomed to spiritual solitude and each one, while involved in the same activity, nevertheless stands alone?" The point of these asides, quite unusual in conventional historical writing, is to force readers to evaluate their own lives in comparison with the supposedly morally superior and heroic lives of the intellectuals of an earlier time.

Gershenson's historical essays enjoyed great popularity in the first two decades of the 20th century. In recognition of his refined style he was lauded as a master of the historical portrait. For his approach to biography he was called the "Russian Carlyle." His books won him national awards and were bestsellers, appearing in second and even third editions. These portraits of national heroes depicted by an engaged and sympathetic author found favor among a readership which was gradually becoming more and more interested in the religious achievements of the Russian national tradition.

In his other activities as a literary scholar, journalist, and philosopher, Gershenson also used the essay effectively. As the author of over a hundred book reviews, he played an important role in chronicling Russian literary life between 1900 and 1920. In his journalistic writing between 1910 and 1916, he employed a critical narrative in which he judged the cumulative effect on society of phenomena as diverse in content as literature, poetry, religious life, law, military affairs, foreign policy, and anti-Semitism. As a philosopher, Gershenzon especially employed the essay, since he was not interested in a systematic, logical analysis of his ideas, preferring instead to describe his idyllic vision of a future world in unconventional ways, through allegory, epigrams, and dialogue. Gershenzon was not, however, an innovator in these genres. He merely applied the narrative devices and ideological perspectives worked out in his far more original historical writings.

BRIAN HOROWITZ

Biography

Mikhail Osipovich Gershenzon. Born 13 July 1869 in Kishinev. Studied in Germany for two years; studied history, philosophy, and political science at Moscow University, 1889–94, graduated 1894. Scholar, author, and lecturer, Moscow, 1894–1925: unable to obtain an official academic position because he was Jewish. Literary reviewer, Nauchnoe Slovoe (Scientific word), 1903–05, and Vestnik Evropy (Herald of Europe), 1907–08; literary editor, Kriticheskoe Obozrenie (Critical review), 1907–09. Common-law relationship with Mariia Gol'denveizer, from 1904 (Jews and Orthodox Christians were unable to marry legally): one daughter and one son. During the Civil War worked in various sections of the People's Commissariat of Education. First chair, Moscow Writers' Union, 1918, and the All-Russian Writers' Union, 1920–11; head of the literary section, Moscow Academy of Artistic Sciences, 1922–25. Died (of heart failure) in Moscow, 19 February 1925.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Istoriia molodoi Rossii, 1908

Istoricheskie zapiski, 1910

Obrazy prosh logo, 1912

Troistvennyi obraz sovershenstva (The triple image of perfection) (treatise), 1918

Mechta i mysl' I.S.Turgeneva (I.S.Turgenev's dream and idea), 1919

Videnie poeta (The poet's vision), 1920

Mudrost' Pushkina (The wisdom of Pushkin) (collection), 1921

Perepiska iz dvukh uglov, with Viacheslav Ivanov, 1921; as "Corner-to-Corner

Correspondence," translated by Gertrude Vakar, in Russian Intellectual History: An Anthology, edited by Marc Raeff, 1966:372–401; as Correspondence Across a Room, translated by Lisa Sergio 1984

Stat'i o Pushkine (Articles about Pushkin), 1926

Other writings: books on the 19th-century Moscow intelligentsia, philosophy, and religion, and correspondence. Also organized and edited Vekhi essay anthology (1909; Landmarks).

Bibliography

Berman, Iakov Z., M.O.Gershenson: Bibliografiia, Odessa: Odespoligraf, 1928

Further Reading

- Florovsky, George, "Michael Gerschensohn," Slavonic Review 14 (1926):315–31
- Grossman, Leonid, "Gershenson-pisatel'," in Stat'i o Pushkine by Gershenson, Chicago: Russian Language Specialties, 1968:iii–xiv (original edition, 1926)
- Horowitz, Brian, "M.O.Gershenson and the Perception of a Leader in Russia's Silver-Age Culture," Wiener Slavistischer Almanach 29 (1992):45–73
- Horowitz, Brian, "Ot Vekh' k russkoi revoliutsii: Dva filosafo N.A. Berdiaev i M.O.Gershenson," Vestnik Russkogo Studencheskogo Khristianskogo Dvizheniia 166 (1992):89–132
- Horowitz, Brian, "A Jewish-Christian Rift in Twentieth-Century Russian Philosophy: N.A.Berdiaev and M.O.Gershenson," Russian Review 53, no. 4 (October 1994):497–514
- Horowitz, Brian, "From the Annals of the Literary Life of Russia's Silver Age: The Tempestuous Relationship of S.A.Vengerov and M.O.Gershenson," Wiener Slavistischer Almanach 35 (1995): 77–95
- Horowitz, Brian, The Myth of A.S.Pushkin in Russia's Silver Age: M.O.Gershenson, Pushkinist, Evanston, Illinois: Northwestern University Press, 1996
- Kotrelev, N.V., and E.B.Rashkovskii, "M.O.Gershenson," in Russkie pisateli: Biobibliograficheskii slovar', vol. 1, edited by P. A.Nikolaeva, Moscow: Prosveshchenie, 1990:555–57
- Levin, Arthur, The Life and Work of Mikhail Osipovich Gershenson (1869–1925): A Study in the History of the Russian Silver Age (dissertation), Berkeley: University of California, 1968
- Levin, Arthur, "M.O.Gershenson's 'Revolutionary' Poem," Études Slaves et Est-Européenes 15 (1970):69–75
- Levin, Arthur, "The Making of a Russian Scholar: The Apprenticeship of M.O.Gershenson," California Slavic Studies 7 (1973): 99–120
- Levin, Arthur, "Andrey Bely, M.O.Gershenson, and Vekhi: A Rejoinder to N.Valentinov," in Andrey Bely: A Critical Review, edited by Gerald Janaček, Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1978:169–80
- Poggioli, Renato, "A Correspondence from Opposite Corners," in his The Phoenix and the Spider: A Book of Essays About Some Russian Writers and Their View of the Self, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1957:208–28
- Praskurina, Vera, "M.O.Gershenson—Istorik kul'tury," in Griboedovskaia Moskva by Gershenson, Moscow: Moskovskii Rabochii, 1989:3–26
- Praskurina, Vera, "Viacheslav Ivanov i Mikhail Gershenson: Na puti k Perepiske iz dvukh uglov," Cahiers du Monde Russe 35, nos. 1–2 (1994):377–92
- Shestov, Lev, "O vechnoi knige: Pamiati o Gershenszone," Sovremennye Zapiski 24 (1925):237–45

Gide, André

French, 1869–1951

If we ignore the early satirical parables and symbolist fiction, the lyrical pieces, pamphlets, travel diaries, political and social tracts, and the major works of fiction, we are left chiefly with the lengthy major insertions in the diaries as André Gide's personal contribution to the essay genre. The distinction between what can be accounted a true essay and what cannot is blurred, but it seems reasonable to regard Voyage au Congo, Le Retour du Tchad, and Carnets de route (1927–28; all translated in Travels in the Congo) as belonging to Gide's Journal proper, leaving Si le grain ne meurt (1920–21; If It Die...), Souvenirs de la cour d'assises (1914; Recollections of the Assize Court), Feuillets d'automne (1949; Autumn Leaves), Et nunc manet in te (1947; The Secret Drama of My Life), and Ainsi soit-il; ou, Les Jeux sont faits (1952; So Be It; or, The Chips Are Down), as extended personal reflections which belong to the essay genre rather than forming part of the diary itself. There are other less personal essays, like those devoted to individuals—Wilde, Dostoevskii, Conrad, Montaigne, Émile Verhaeren, Jacques Rivière, Henri Michaux, and Paul Valéry—and those contained in Prétextes (1903; Pretexts), Nouveaux prétextes (1911; New pretexts), Incidences (1924), Préfaces (1948), and Rencontres (1948; Encounters), but their literary interest, although great, does not consist chiefly in the contribution they make to Gide's development of the essay form. At times, they slide off into polished pieces of journalism.

Gide was an uneven writer, intensely self-conscious and obsessed by a need for self-analysis, but he never wrote without a cultivated sophistication drawing on an unusually wide culture and, at least after about 1900, a generally fastidious taste. He was not only well read, but might easily have become a professional musician. His high level of mental awareness made it difficult for him to resist the temptation to write multilayered prose with disparate but distinct levels of meaning, bristling with allusions to people and events not all of which any single reader was expected to understand, and exhibiting masterly control of innuendo. The Journal itself (kept between 1889 and 1949) contains exquisitely subtle insights, although the cleverness is sometimes too forced for the genre and the literary judgments are not always assured. The Journal may not as a whole be Gide's final masterpiece, a status sometimes claimed for it.

That accolade should probably be reserved for the fastidiously precise work of self-analysis, If It Die..., written as the result of a spiritual crisis. Gide had published his imaginative exploration of homosexual and hedonist values in L'Immoraliste (1902; The Immoralist) and of rigid spiritual asceticism in La Porte étroite (1909; Strait Is the Gate), implicitly rejecting both sets of values, and completing the triptych with the multiple-ironied and vastly amusing send-up of almost everything, but especially devout Catholicism and militant atheism, in Les Caves du Vatican (1914; The Vatican Cellars). When World War I broke out in 1914, Gide, already in his mid-forties, worked for the Red Cross, from which he retired in 1916 to garden at his small estate at Cuverville. It was there that he underwent his spiritual crisis, which he writes about specifically in Numquid et tu...? (1922,), kept in diary form between 1916 and 1919. It is a reflective meditation born of remorse and despair, and contains a further rejection of the confident Catholicism to which Claudel had been trying to convert him for almost a score of years. It includes an interpretation of the Christian ideal subsuming Gide's individualism into an ethic of abnegation, itself seen as the supreme happiness.

The Cuverville crisis was partly caused by the discovery by Gide's wife of a letter to him from Henri Ghéon, recently converted to Catholicism, alluding to the interest in adolescent Arab males which Gide and Ghéon had once shared. It was at this time also that Gide began the spiritual autobiography, If It Die..., also partly the product of the serious attraction felt for him by Elisabeth Van Ryselberghe, who was to bear him a daughter in 1923. The essay is much longer than the earlier works of fiction, but its form is not immediately clear. Most of the details Gide gives about his early childhood, and the places and events it involved, must have been discoverable from family sources, but not the exact verbal exchanges that Gide records. The difficulty lies in assessing the degree of fictionalization in what appears to be, but cannot be, straightforward recall. Such recall must involve some re-creation of the past, with conscious or unconscious falsification. Gide himself writes at the beginning of the work, "I know the injustice I am doing myself in recounting this [early recollection] and what is going to follow, I foresee the use that will be made of it against me. But my account has no raison d'être other than truthfulness. Let us suppose that I am writing in penitence." The French admits of two renderings, depending on whether raison d'être is used as a single phrase. Gide might be saying that there is no reason to be other than truthful (which might not itself be the case), or, if raison d'être is taken as a phrase, that telling the truth was his whole motive. Again "let us suppose" is only an invitation to the reader to share an assumption, while "penitence" can be taken as indicating anything from a desire to make amends for a social impropriety to performing formally ecclesiastical penance for sin. Gide is extremely skillful at creating his ambiguities.

It is left to the reader to guess whether Gide has revealed, or even knows, his true motive in writing, and how far his account may have been colored by his motive. The hedonist principles adopted by Michel in The Immoralist are taken to the point at which they are clearly unacceptable, as is the self-deluding asceticism of Alissa in Strait Is the Gate. To what degree is If It Die..., which ends with the death of Gide's mother and his own engagement to his cousin Madeleine, affected by a desire to shock, or by exaggerated or even insincere depths of self-abasement? From time to time, to reinforce the impression that he is striving after absolute, and therefore impartial accuracy, Gide reminds the reader how his memory must have been playing tricks, for instance in a passage recounting a dance, marked off from the surrounding narrative by its sudden switch into the present tense, which cannot have taken place as he remembered it, when his grandmother was still alive, because he was not yet four when she died. Occasionally Gide breaks off to address the reader directly, or as if musing to himself. He learned his art from Flaubert, and was always the supreme stylist, in perfect control of every nuance of irony.

It is easy to become lost in admiration at Gide's sheer virtuosity, the subtlety and power of the self-analysis, and the meticulous selectivity exercised in the choice of telling detail. The narrative of If It Die... is held together principally by its meticulous and penetrating implied comment. Gide once turned down the earliest section of Proust's À la recherche du temps perdu (1913–27; Remembrance of Things Past) for the Nouvelle Revue Française (New French review); he seems here to be mimicking Proust's style.

The most important of the nonpersonal essays are probably those contained in Pretextes of 1903 and Nouveaux Prétextes of 1911, although both these works contain pieces that are primarily conférences, that is, delivered before an audience, often on a topic dictated by the occasion, and of interest as essays chiefly for the way Gide deals with the intractable problem of writing at the same time for oral delivery and for subsequent publication, a feat which, however continually attempted, is seldom successfully brought off. Gide simply published what was designed to be given as an address, with short sentences, pithy paragraphs, and no obvious logical connection between paragraphs, dealing wholesale with imaginary objections to his argument. There are strong indications that the published text served only as a written basis for the partly extemporized address based on it.

The literary form of the conférences is really the causerie, and in Pretextes they merge into the dozen Lettres à Angèle (Letters to Angela), written as letters in a conversational tone—short digressive pieces on books which Gide published in the symbolist Revue Blanche (White review) in 1901, not really formal enough to be called essays. Pretextes ends with three obituary pieces of personal reminiscence, full of anecdotes, snatches of conversation, and Gide's whole repertoire of semi-colons, dashes, question marks, exclamation points, and dots to indicate incomplete thoughts and conversational style. Nouveaux Prétextes contains further conférences, diary snatches, letters, book reviews, and reminiscences. These are essentially civilized conversation pieces, bedside books rather than formal essays.

It is perhaps again stretching the meaning of the term essay too far in a different direction to include as part of Gide's contribution to the form Souvenirs de la cour d'assises (1914; Recollections of the Assize Court), a powerful social comment in the form of an account of Gide's experience as a member of an assize jury, drawing on notes he took and rendering word for word snatches of exchange between the judge and the accused. "I believed," he writes, "that a simple account of the cases that we had been called on to judge would be more eloquent than any criticism." The real importance of this brief work lies in the deftness with which the social comment is made to emerge the more powerfully for being totally implicit in the narration of what happened and what was said.

ANTHONY LEVI

Biography

André Paul Guillaume Gide. Born 22 November 1869 in Paris. Studied at the École Alsacienne, 1887; École Henri IV, baccalauréat, 1889. Traveled at various times to North Africa, Italy, Germany, and Switzerland. Married his cousin Madeleine Rondeaux, 1895 (died, 1938). Mayor of La Roque-Baignard, Normandy, 1896–1900. Cofounder, Nouvelle Revue Française, 1908. Liaison with Marc Allégret, from 1916. Had one daughter with Elisabeth Van Rysselberghe, 1923. Traveled to Congo and Chad, 1925–26, and Egypt and Greece, 1939; lived in North Africa, 1942–45. Awards: Nobel Prize for Literature, 1947; honorary degree from Oxford University. Honorary Member, American Academy, 1950. Died (of pulmonary congestion) in Paris, 19 February 1951.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

- Prétextes*, 1903; enlarged edition, 1913; selection in Pretexts: Reflections on Literature and Morality, edited by Justin O'Brien, translated by O'Brien, Angelo P. Berbocci, Jeffrey J. Carre, and Blanche A. Price, 1959
- Nouveaux prétextes*, 1911; selection in Pretexts: Reflections on Literature and Morality, edited by Justin O'Brien, translated by O'Brien, Angelo P. Berbocci, Jeffrey J. Carre, and Blanche A. Price, 1959
- Souvenirs de la cour d'assises*, 1914; as Recollections of the Assize Court, translated by Philip A. Wilkins, 1941
- Si le grain ne meurt*, 2 vols., 1920–21; as If It Die..., translated by Dorothy Bussy, 1935
- Incidences*, 1924; selection in Pretexts: Reflections on Literature and Morality, edited by Justin O'Brien, translated by O'Brien, Angelo P. Berbocci, Jeffrey J. Carre, and Blanche A. Price, 1959
- Essai sur Montaigne*, 1929; as Montaigne: An Essay in Two Parts, translated by Stephen H. Guest and Trevor E. Blewitt, 1929; translated by Dorothy Bussy, in The Living Thoughts of Montaigne, 1939
- Et nunc manet in te*, 1947; as The Secret Drama of My Life, translated by Keen Wallis, 1951; as Madeleine, translated by Justin O'Brien, 1952
- Préfaces*, 1948
- Rencontres*, 1948
- Feuillets d'automne*, 1949; as Autumn Leaves, translated by Elsie Pell, 1950
- Ainsi soit-il; ou, Les Jeux sont faits*, 1952; as So Be It; or, The Chips Are Down, translated by Justin O'Brien, 1960
- Other writings: many novels (including L'Immoraliste [The Immoralist], 1902; La Porte étroite [Strait Is the Gate], 1909; Les Caves du Vatican [The Vatican Cellars], 1914; La Symphonie pastorale [The Pastoral Symphony], 1919; Les Faux-Monnayeurs [The Counterfeiters], 1926), several plays, autobiography, travel writing, journals, and many volumes of correspondence.
- Collected works editions: Œuvres complètes, edited by Louis Martin-Chauffier, 15 vols., 1932–39; also separate (Pléiade editions, 1951–58).

Bibliographies

- Brosman, Catharine Savage, An Annotated Bibliography of Criticism on André Gide 1973–1988, New York: Garland, 1990
- Martin, Claude, Bibliographie chronologique des livres consacrés à André Gide (1918–1986), Lyon: Centre d'Études Gidiennes, 1987
- Naville, Arnold, Bibliographie des écrits de Gide, Paris: Guy Le Prat, 1949; supplement, 1953

Further Reading

- Brée, Germaine, André Gide, New Brunswick, New Jersey: Rutgers University Press, 1963
- Martin, Claude, Gide, Paris: Seuil, 1995
- Schnyder, Peter, Pré-textes: André Gide et la tentation de la critique, Paris: Intertextes, 1988

Giliarovskii, Vladimir

Russian, 1853–1935

Although Vladimir Giliarovskii wrote one of the most famous books in the Russian language, Moskva i moskvichi (1926; Moscow and the Muscovites), he is conspicuous by his absence from most standard histories of Russian literature published in the West. This may well be because most of his prose work falls on the boundary between the short story and the journalistic sketch (ocherk), a genre much used in 19th-century Russia, notably by Giliarovskii's friend the populist writer Gleb Uspenskii. Giliarovskii himself made a clear distinction between the two: "Reporting trained me to give only the filtered truth, to discern the essence of the matter immediately and to write about it briefly. The pictorial and psychological material which remained within me I used for belles-lettres and poetry." However, the distinction is not so clearcut. Common to both his fiction and his sketches is a strong autobiographical element. As he says in his preface to Liudi teatra (1941; Theater people): "I simply take people, events, pictures, as I remember them, and serve them up in wholly inviolable form, without any sauces or garnishments." Whether he is describing a dramatic event—the fire at the Morozov factory in Orekhovo-Zuevo, the disastrous crush on Khodynka field during the coronation of Nicholas II in 1896, or a catastrophic train crash at Kukuevka—or whether he is describing a personality, famous or humble, it is always from direct personal experience. He was known as the "king of reporters" and went to extraordinary lengths to get his story firsthand.

The enduring popularity of Moskva i moskvichi can be ascribed at least partly to nostalgia. Though the book appeared in Soviet times, it recorded the Moscow of the turn of the century. When that Moscow began to disappear as Stalin ruthlessly reshaped the topography of the city, the popularity of both the aged Giliarovskii and his book increased. It is a book about places rather than people: 22 of the 31 sketches have topographical names, some specific ("Sukharevka," "Lubianka"), others more general, such as "Bani" (Bathhouses) or "Traktiry" (Taverns). The colorful characters who inhabit Giliarovskii's landscape, ranging from a man who gave his wife a crocodile as a wedding present to a man who sold pastries filled with cockroaches, are all viewed externally with no attempt at psychological investigation. The places described by Giliarovskii are those which the respectable middle-class readership of the journals for which he wrote would never have visited: low taverns, brothels, doss houses, disreputable markets, and thieves' dens. In one sketch, "Tainy Neglinki" (Secrets of the Neglinka) the author even explores the Neglinka River, which flows under the city and was its main sewer.

The sketches have something in common with Maksim Gor'kii's stories Po Rusi (1928; Through Russia), but Giliarovskii's descriptions are never those of a dispassionate observer. Rather they are marked by a zest, a sense of involvement, a sense of compassion for the myriad of Muscovites who passed their lives in drudgery and humiliation, a sense of enjoyment, and above all, a fearless directness, stemming from his famously intrepid approach to life, which other writers do not match. His prose reads as if meant to be read out loud. Indeed in the preface to Liudi teatra, he refers to his readers as "listeners" with whom he conducts "intimate chats." This gives his work a theatrical quality, no doubt derived from Giliarovskii's own experiences as a provincial actor, his friendship with, among others, Anton Chekhov and the actress Maria Ermolova, and his lifelong fascination with the theater. His theatricality includes a strong whiff of the melodramatic, with sketches bearing such lurid titles as "Iama" (The pit), and references to places known as "Dom uzhasov" (The house of horrors) and "Ad" (Hell).

Giliarovskii is quite capable of what would now probably be described as "tabloid journalism." When, for example, in "Dva kruzha" (Two clubs) he concentrates on the more picturesque aspects of Moscow club life, he admits that he did not "describe in detail their useful social and educational activity...because our readers find more interesting that side of life which, even while the clubs existed, was shrouded in secrecy, which concealed the true source of the wealth on which the 'social activity' of these clubs was based." Yet, for all their lurid and sometimes barely credible detail—a centenarian actor who drank 20 glasses of vodka a day, a waiter whose ability to pocket tips destined for a common pool made his name a byword for the practice—Giliarovskii's eyewitness testimony establishes the veracity of these stories.

Giliarovskii repeated the formula so successful in Moskva i moskvichi in two of the three books he wrote during the last decade of his life (both of which were published posthumously), Liudi teatra and Gazetnaia Moskva (1960; Newspaper Moscow). In a preface to Moskva i moskvichi, written in 1956 and much reprinted, Konstantin Paustovskii, with great perception, discerns Giliarovskii's position on the boundary between journalism and the great Russian tradition of belles-lettres, describing "Uncle Giliai" as "one of those people without whom literature cannot exist." Unfortunately, while Russian literature has found a worldwide audience through translations, Giliarovskii has been wrongly considered so archetypally Russian that no English translation of his work has been attempted.

MICHAEL PURSGLOVE

Biography

Vladimir Alekseevich Giliarovskii. Born 8 December 1853 in Vologda province. Studied at Vologda gymnasium; Junkers' School, Moscow. Traveled around Russia, 1871–81, working variously in factories, as a firefighter, barge hauler, and actor: published occasional articles on his experiences, from 1873; volunteer in the Russo-Turkish War, 1877–78. Moved to Moscow, 1881; journalist, contributing to various newspapers and journals, including Russkaia Gazeta (Russian gazette), Sovremennye Izvestiia (Contemporary news), Budil'nik (Alarm clock), Moskovskii Listok (Moscow broadsheet), Oskolki (Splinters), Russkie Vedomosti (Russian news), and Kur'er (The courier). Married M.I.Murzina, 1884. Died in Moscow, 1 October 1935.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Trushchobnye liudi (People of the slums), 1887 (censored); reprinted 1927

Moskva i moskvichi, 1926; edited by N.V.Giliarovskii, 1955; edition with introduction by Konstantin Paustovskii, 1968

Moi skitaniia (My wanderings), 1928

Zapiski moskvicha (Muscovite sketches), 1931

Druz'ia i vstrechi (Friends and encounters), 1934

Liudi teatra, 1941

Gazetnaia Moskva, 1960

Rasskazy i ocherki (Essays and sketches), 1988

Other writings: poetry and short stories.

Collected works editions: Sochineniia, 4 vols., 1967, and 2 vols., 1994.

Further Reading

Esin, B.I., Reportazhi V.A.Giliarovskogo, Moscow: Izd-vo Moskovskogo Universiteta, 1985

Ginzburg, Lidiia

Russian, 1902–1990

Though largely unknown in the West and for the time being somewhat neglected in her disordered homeland, Lidiia Ginzburg is regarded by those familiar with her many writings as a brilliant student of modern European literature and as one of its leading 20th-century Russian practitioners. Her efforts as a historian, critic, and theorist are a masterful investigation of the still vital energies of the past and a penetrating analysis of the nature of verbal art. In compelling and original ways they address such diverse yet connected topics as the evolution of poetic diction and the shaping of the lyric hero in Russian poetry of the early 19th and early 20th centuries (the so-called Golden and Silver Ages); the epochal redefinition of the self in Russian epistolary prose in the third and fourth decades of the 19th century; changing conceptions of individual personality and the rendering of literary character in the 18th- and 19th-century European memoir and autobiography; the larger theoretical issue of the reciprocal relation between literary images of identity and the dominant personality types of an age; and the complex assumptions, methods, and cognitive insights of the 19th-century psychological novel and its predecessors and heirs.

In this wide-ranging discussion and in her handling of a variety of related topics, Ginzburg gives always incisive and sometimes classic treatment to an impressive array of major Russian and European literary figures, including the memoirist Saint-Simon and the autobiographers Jean-Jacques Rousseau and Aleksandr Herzen, the critic, polemicist, and letter writer Vissarion Belinskii, the novelists Gustave Flaubert, Lev Tolstoi, and Marcel Proust, and the poets Aleksandr Pushkin, Mikhail Lermontov, Fedor Tiutchev, Aleksandr Blok, Innokentii Annenskii, and Osip Mandel'shtam, as well as to a host of lesser, but historically still significant memoirists, novelists, and poets of the 18th, 19th, and 20th centuries—an achievement of extraordinary learning and broad conceptual reach.

Comparable to Ginzburg's learned legacy in importance if not in scale, and originating from the same impulse to engage evolving historical reality within the structures of literary language and form, are her zapisi (notebooks), memoirs, and quasi-autobiographical narratives—what she called her “documentary” prose. This work is an aesthetic achievement of very high order and an indispensable contemplation of the changing moral and intellectual climate of virtually the entire Soviet period, inasmuch as Ginzburg came of age shortly after the 1917 Revolution and died roughly a year before the Soviet Union's ultimate collapse. The sheer longevity of her career, culminating in her ninth and arguably most productive decade, is itself notable: it means she was able to witness and then at some remove address the full span of Soviet life from its tumultuous beginnings through its years of repression, war, and fitful relaxation to its oddly feeble end. Her experience of the Russian 20th century with its terrible suffering as well as its enormous courage is deeply representative. But her transformation of that experience in her scholarly and creative writing stands forth as an individual accomplishment of surpassing integrity, stamina, and will.

Of the documentary genres practiced by Ginzburg, perhaps the most arresting is the esse, a form somewhat belied in her case by the usual cognate translation of “essay,” since the English term suggests something rather more discursive than is appropriate. As may be seen from her principal literary publication, the compendium Chelovek za pis'mennym stolom (1989; A person at the writing table), with its decade-by-decade arrangement of memoiristic, philosophical, and literary-critical material taken from the notebooks she began in 1925 while a student in Leningrad and kept on a regular basis till the very end of her life, her esse is closer to the pensée or meditation than it is to the more relaxed, digressive form that emerged with Montaigne and that typifies the essay not only in English-speaking countries but also in Russia—Herzen's S togo berega (1847–50; From the Other Shore), for example, or the literaryphilosophical studies of Konstantin Leont'ev and Vasilii Rozanov. Ginzburg's esse is highly compact, even laconic, but like the more leisurely essays of her compatriots, it is often frankly theoretical in the kinds of themes it is willing to entertain. It also reveals, in its more personal moments, an interesting affinity to the biographical sketch, the sharp delineation of individual personality stemming from the French neoclassical portrait and caractère, genres that she had taken up in O psikhologicheskoi proze (1971, revised 1977; On Psychological Prose) and that had in their day influenced those of her Russian predecessors to whom she not coincidentally gave much of her scholarly attention—the poet Petr Viazemskii, an edition of whose Staraiia zapisnaia knizhka (1813–78; Old notebook) she had published in 1929, and Herzen, on whose vast Byloe i dumy (1852–68; My Past and Thoughts) she had written a monograph in 1957. Thus, the Ginzburg esse is sometimes devoted to portraits of Russian literary luminaries, of such people as the Formalist critics Iurii Tynianov, Boris Eikhenbaum, and Viktor Shklovskii and the poets Anna Akhmatova and Vladimir Maiakovskii, to name but a few from the earlier period of Ginzburg’s long life.

Ginzburg’s style in her esse and in the longer pieces she wrote on social and political themes—in particular her influential examinations of the intelligentsia’s ambiguous role in Russian revolutionary culture and of the all-pervading moral temper of Stalinism, “Eshche raz o starom i novom (Pokolenie na povorote)” (1986; Once more on the old and the new [a generation at the turning point]) and “I zaodno s pravoporiadkom...” (1988; At one with the prevailing order...)—as well as in her fictional and memoiristic writing, is pithy, even aphoristic, with a rich, sometimes scholarly lexicon deployed with great precision, and a powerful analytical bent tempered by a dry sense of humor happily disinclined to leave any shibboleth unturned.

JUDSON ROSENGRANT

Biography

Lidiia Iakovlevna Ginzburg. Born 5 March 1902 in Odessa. Studied at a secondary school in Odessa, graduated 1920; State Institute for the History of the Arts (GIII), Leningrad, studying under Iurii Tynianov, Boris Eikhenbaum, Viktor Zhirmunskii, Boris Tomashevskii, and Viktor Vinogradov, 1922–26; Leningrad State University, candidate degree, 1940; Institute of Russian Literature, doctoral degree, 1959. Taught history of Russian literature at GIII, 1916–30, and in the rabfaky (workers’ faculties) at the Civil Aeronautics Academy and the Post-Secondary School of the Labor Movement, 1931–34; lectured on Russian literature for the Leningrad Municipal and Regional Public Lecture Service and the Section for Artistic Propaganda of the Leningrad branch of the Soviet Writers’ Union, 1930–40; taught history of Russian literature and Russian aesthetic doctrine at the All-Russian Academy of Arts, Leningrad, 1944–46, and at the Karelo-Finnish University, Petrozavodsk, 1947–50; taught monograph courses as a part-time instructor at Leningrad State University, 1948–50. Editor in the literature and drama section of Leningrad Radio during World War II and the Leningrad blockade, receiving two awards for valor; freelance editor responsible for numerous scholarly and academic editions of Russian classical authors, 1929–90. Awards: State Prize for Literature, 1988. Died in Leningrad, 15 July 1990.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

O starom i novom: Stat'i i ocherki (On the old and the new: articles and essays), 1982

Literatura v poiskakh real'nosti: Stat'i, esse, zametki (Literature in search of reality: articles, essays, notes), 1987

Chelovek za pis'mennym stolom: Esse, iz vospominanii, chetyre povestvovaniia, 1989

Pretvorenie opyta (The transubstantiation of experience), edited by Nikolai Kononov, 1991

Other writings: Tvorcheskii put' Lermontova (Lermontov's creative path), 1940; 'Byloe i dumy' Gertsena (Herzen's My Past and Thoughts), 1957; O lirike (On Lyric Poetry, edited and translated by Judson Rosengrant, forthcoming), 1964, revised 1974; O psikhologicheskoi proze (On Psychological Prose, edited and translated by Judson Rosengrant, 1991), 1971, revised 1977; O literaturnom geroe (On the literary hero), 1979; Blockade Diary, translated by Alan Myers, 1995.

Bibliography

Rosengrant, Judson, "L. Ia. Ginzburg: An International Chronological Bibliography of Primary and Secondary Works," Russian Review 54, no. 4 (October 1995):587–600

Further Reading

Bibler, V.S., "Lidiia Iakovlevna Ginzburg i sud'by russkoi intelligentsii," ARKhE: Kul'turo-Logicheskii Ezhegodnik 1 (1993): 422–27

Bitov, Andrei, "Prorvat' krug," Novyi Mir 12 (December 1986): 245–51

Frank, Joseph, "Subversive Activities," New York Review of Books, 1 December 1994:44–48

Grekova, I., "Proza uchenogo," Oktiabr' 2 (February 1985): 203–05

Grekova, I., "Samoosuzhdenie i samoopravdanie," Oktiabr' 4 (April 1989):200–02

Harris, Jane Gary, editor, "Lidiia Iakovlevna Ginzburg: In Memoriam," Canadian-American Slavic Studies 28, nos. 2–3 (Summer-Fall 1994):125–285

Mikhailov, E., editor, "Tsel'nost': O tvorchestve L.Ia. Ginzburg," Literaturnoe Obozrenie 10 (October 1989):78–86

Pratt, Sarah, editor, "Lidiia Ginzburg's Contribution to Literary Criticism," Canadian-American Slavic Studies 19, no. 2 (Summer 1985):119–99

Ginzburg, Natalia

Italian, 1916–1991

Natalia Ginzburg is known primarily as a novelist but was also a significant essayist, publishing three collections: Le piccole virtù (1962; The Little Virtues), Mai devi domandarmi (1970; Never Must You Ask Me), and Vita immaginaria (1974; Imaginary life). She was the fifth of five children of Giuseppe Levi, a Jewish professor of anatomy who was idiosyncratic and domineering at home, and Lidia Tanzi, a non-practicing Catholic and protective figure for Natalia well into maturity. In her autobiography, Lessico familiare (1963; Family Sayings), Ginzburg writes of the early years of her family through the war, ending with the death of Cesar Pavese, a close friend of both Natalia and Leone Ginzburg, her first husband, an anti-fascist activist who himself was tortured and executed in 1944. The autobiography is strangely unemotional at times, focusing on portraits of friends and families, many of whom are quirky, distracted, literary, and politically committed.

In 1950 Natalia Ginzburg married Gabriele Baldini, a professor of English first at the University of Trieste, then the University of Rome. Ginzburg's relationship with Baldini is the subject of one of her most anthologized essays, "Lui e io" (1962; "He and I"), a deceptively complex treatment of two people who seem to have little in common. Ginzburg begins "He and I" with a statement of utter polarity: "He always feels hot, I always feel cold." Her self-imposed challenge is to move beyond simple opposition to a complex and textured relational polarity. The essay works through subtle shifts of tone and point of view, and through the invocation of both the generic, clear in the title, and the more personal details: "I know the price of that dinner service—it was £16, but he says £12. And it is the same with the picture of King Lear that is in our dining room, and which he also bought in the Portobello Road (and then cleaned with onions and potatoes); now he says he paid a certain sum for it, but I remember that it was much more than that." One feels, at times, that Baldini is a charming brute, narcissistic, and the writer is longsuffering. There is an unmistakable edge of bitterness at times, balanced by a self-knowledge that is far from self-flattering: "And so—more than ever—I feel I do everything inadequately or mistakenly. But if I once find out that he has made a mistake I tell him so over and over again until he is exasperated. I can be very annoying at times."

As with all of Ginzburg's essays, a kind of lyrical stoicism dominates—expressed both tonally and formally through flattened tone, repetition, and the use of theme and variation to taxonomic ends—and ends up emphasizing the effort of the writer to see the world clearly and to envision the past unsentimentally: "It is not given to us to choose whether we are happy or unhappy. But we must choose not to be demonically unhappy" ("Silenzio" [1951; "Silence"]), or: "There is no peace for the son of man. The foxes and the wolves have their holes, but the son of man hath not where to lay his head. Our generation is a generation of men. It is not a generation of foxes and wolves. Each of us would dearly like to rest his head somewhere, to have a little warm, dry nest. But there is no peace for the son of man” (“Il figlio dell’uomo” [1946; “The Son of Man”]). An early essay, “Inverno in Abruzzo” (1944; “Winter in the Abruzzi”), clarifies the effect of the war, specifically the loss of Leone Ginzburg, on Natalia Ginzburg’s essay voice: “Our dreams are never realized and as soon as we see them betrayed we realize that the intensest joys of our life have nothing to do with reality. No sooner do we see them betrayed than we are consumed with regret for the time when they glowed within us... My husband died in Rome, in the prison of Regina Coeli, a few months after we left the Abruzzi.”

Many of Ginzburg’s essays are melancholic; there is a constant reiteration of diminished possibilities, and a profound, but frequently implicit, sense of loss. Her spare style, however, with its bursts of the lyrical or the cantankerous, still attempts to penetrate the mysteries of love, work, friendship, and place. Ginzburg’s “Il mio mestiere” (1949; “My Vocation”) is one of the most unsentimental and successful essays on the writing life written in the 20th century: “It is a vocation which also feeds on terrible things, it swallows the best and worst in our lives and our evil feelings flow in its blood just as much as our benevolent feelings. It feeds itself, and grows within us.” This essay also contains Ginzburg’s well-known self-estimation: “I prefer to think that no one has ever been like me, however small, however much a mosquito or a flea of a writer I might be.”

Ginzburg’s essay “I rapporti umani” (1953; “Human Relationships”) is reminiscent of Virginia Woolf in its imaginative re-creation of the development of relational psychology from girlhood to maturity. It contains one of her most heartfelt pleas for compassionate intersubjectivity: “All our life we have only known how to be masters and servants: but in that secret moment of perfect equilibrium, we have realized that there is no real authority or servitude on the earth. And so it is that now as we turn to that secret moment we look at others to see whether they have lived through an identical moment ... It is the highest moment in the life of a human being, and it is necessary that we stand with others whose eyes are fixed on the highest moment of their destiny.”

“Le piccole virtù” (1960; “The Little Virtues”) is Ginzburg’s best-known essay in English. It is similar to Montaigne’s “De l’institution des enfants” (1580; “Of the Education of Children”) both in subject and classical style (formal rhetoric, antitheses, parallel structures), as the opening sentence makes abundantly clear: “As far as the education of children is concerned I think they should be taught not the little virtues but the great ones. Not thrift but generosity and an indifference to money; not caution but courage and a contempt for danger...” The possibility of instruction and harmony between parent and child is precarious, but also more authentically possible in the postwar generation: “And so we have no authority; we have no weapons. Authority in us would be a hypocrisy and a sham. We are too aware of our own weakness, too melancholy and insecure...” There are important feminist implications in Ginzburg’s passionate plea for the necessity of vocation for the whole person, and thus the whole parent. As sharply as in any of her works, Ginzburg shows in “The Little Virtues” both her formality and reserve and the quietly radical ability to challenge convention that places her squarely and importantly in the 20th-century essay tradition, drawing on the essay’s old fathers and new mothers: “And what is a human being’s vocation but the highest expression of his love of life? And so we must wait, next to him, while his vocation awakens and takes shape. His behavior can be like that of a mole, or of a lizard that holds itself still and pretends to be dead but in reality it has detected the insect that is its prey and is watching its movements, and then suddenly springs forward.”

DAVID LAZAR

Biography

Born Natalia Levi, 14 July 1916 in Palermo, Sicily. Family moved to Turin, 1919. Studied at the University of Turin, 1935. Married Leone Ginzburg, 1938 (killed by Nazis, 1944): three children. Exiled to Pizzoli, Abruzzo region, 1940–43, then returned to Rome after the fall of Mussolini, 1943; went into hiding in Rome and Florence, 1944, then returned to Rome after Allied Liberation. Worked for Einaudi publishers, Rome, 1944, and Turin, 1945–49. Married Gabriele Baldini, 1950 (died, 1969). Moved to Rome, 1952. Lived in London, 1959–61. Elected to parliament as independent left-wing deputy, 1983. Awards: Tempo Prize, 1947; Veillon Prize, 1952; Viareggio Prize, 1957; Chianciano Prize, 1961; Strega Prize, 1963; Marzotto Prize, for play, 1965; Bargutta Prize, 1983. Died (of cancer) in Rome, 8 October 1991.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Le piccole virtù, 1962; as The Little Virtues, translated by Dick Davis, 1985

Mai devi domandarmi, 1970; as Never Must You Ask Me, translated by Isabel Quigly, 1973

Vita immaginaria, 1974

Other writings: many novels and novellas (including La strada che va in città [The Road to the City], 1941; È stato così [The Dry Heart], 1947; Tutti i nostri ieri [All Our Yesterdays], 1952; La madre [The Mother], 1957; Valentino., 1957; Le voci della sera [Voices in the Evening], 1961; Caro Michele [Dear Michael], 1973; Borghesia, 1977; Famiglia [Family], 1977; La famiglia Manzoni [The Manzoni Family], 1983; La città e la casa [The City and the House], 1984), several plays, and the autobiography Lessico familiare (Family Sayings), 1963.

Collected works edition: Opere (Mondadori Edition), edited by Cesare Garboli, 2 vols., 1986–87.

Bibliography

Giffuni, Cathé, “A Bibliography of the Writings of Natalia Ginzburg,” Bulletin of Bibliography 50, no. 2 (June 1993): 139–44

Further Reading

Bullock, Allan, Natalia Ginzburg: Human Relationships in a Changing World, New York and Oxford: Berg, 1991

Cappetti, Carla, "Natalia Ginzburg," in European Writers, New York: Scribner, 1991

Janmart, Anne, "Lettres féminines en Italie: Natalia Ginzburg," Revue Générale 8–9 (August–September 1982):53–63

Godwin, William

British, 1756–1836

William Godwin's essays form a cohesive, if small, body of work. By his own admission, their author "scarcely in any instance contributed a page to any periodical miscellany" (Thoughts on Man), most of the essays appearing in three separate volumes: The Enquirer (1797), Thoughts on Man (1831), and a posthumous, rather cranky collection of religious essays usually designated as Essays (1873). The rest serve as prefaces to the novels, the most notable being that to Caleb Williams (1794), in which the organic process of creation, as distinct from a priori rules of composition, is carefully traced by the novelist from a psychological perspective that anticipates the organicist critiques written by Romantic poets and essayists in the following decades. Even so, like so much else he wrote, Godwin's essays are largely footnotes—of amplification and qualification, and eventually of contradiction—to the work for which he was best known, the classic tract of philosophic anarchism, An Enquiry Concerning Political Justice (1793).

It is no coincidence that Godwin's first and most notable collection, The Enquirer: Reflections on Education, Manners, and Literature, should allude in its title to that earlier politicophilosophical tract. Each work treats human nature and the constitution of society—both as they are and as they might be. The difference is that the later enquiry foregrounds the enquirer—or at least holds out the promise of a more humane, personalized mode of enquiring. In his preface, Godwin pointedly distinguishes the method of Political Justice, which proceeds synthetically from fundamental principles, from The Enquirer's method, which involves "an incessant recurrence to experiment and actual observation"—for "the intellectual eye of man, perhaps, is formed rather for the inspection of minute and near, than of immense and distant objects." In addition to an empirical bent, moreover, the essayist exhibits an immediacy of address arising from "a passion for colloquial discussion." Even the rational systematizer of Political Justice observes that "there is a vivacity, and, if he may be permitted to say it, a richness, in the hints struck out in conversation, that are with difficulty attained in any other method."

That said, the reader of The Enquirer must contend with an authorial diffidence that suggests that "colloquial discussion" did not come easily to Godwin. A glance at the table of contents reveals the topics named in the book's subtitle (Education, Manners, and Literature) arranged in a systematic schema not unlike that of a volume of moral philosophy. The form taken by most of the essays—"Of Choice in Reading," "Of Riches and Poverty"—suggests a Baconian provenance that the essays themselves have preserved virtually intact. Like Francis Bacon, Godwin treats conventional topics from the perspective of a rather neutral persona. Indeed, the Enquirer behind these essays, to the extent that he has any tangible presence, is a very generalized figure with none of the idiosyncrasies or genial egoism of a Montaigne. More often than not, Godwin favors the editorial “we” (“We are accustomed to suppose something mysterious and supernatural in the case of men of genius” [“Of the Sources of Genius”]) or the proverbial “he” (“He that has not been accustomed to refine upon words, and discriminate their shades of meaning, will think and reason after a very inaccurate and slovenly manner” [“Of the Study of the Classics”]). The “I” of these essays, where it appears, is the hypothetical “I” of philosophical demonstration (“Again; I desire to excite a given individual to the acquisition of knowledge. The only possible method in which I can excite a sensitive being to the performance of a voluntary action, is by the exhibition of motive” [“Of the Communication of Knowledge”]). Like Bacon, too, Godwin favors an expository style that generally resolves itself aphoristically—“The true object of education, like that of every other moral process, is the generation of happiness” (“Of Awakening the Mind”)—though it lacks Bacon’s witty asstringency.

Godwin treats his subjects in general terms, favoring the hypothetical example over the personal anecdote. When he considers the inevitable gains and losses attendant on aging in his Enquirer essay, “Of the Happiness of Youth,” there is no hint of the elegiac regret we would expect from Charles Lamb’s Elia. On the other hand, Godwin’s psychological nominalism, his preoccupation with the minute particulars of character, allows for idiosyncrasy and infirmity in the human constitution—finally exhibiting Elia’s tolerance, if not his poignancy. In the same way, a pedestrian style does not imply pedestrian observations in essays like “Of Choice in Reading,” which addresses simplistic moral attacks on literature. In this essay Godwin distinguishes between the “moral” of a work, which is explicitly formulated, and its actual “tendency,” which is not. Moreover, “the selection of the one, and the character of the other, will in great degree depend upon the previous state of mind of the reader.” His conclusion, that the influence of literature is a joint product of complexity in text and reader alike, indicates a critical sophistication lacking in his conventional observations on literature in the Enquirer’s final section.

Separated from The Enquirer by more than 30 years, Thoughts on Man registers, if only nominally, the Romantic transformation of the essay effected by writers like Charles Lamb, William Hazlitt, and Thomas De Quincey. While it would be absurd to speak of a confessional impulse anywhere in this volume, some of the essays do betray a tendency toward autobiography—the emergence of an authentic “I.” Essays like “Of Youth and Age” are premised on the subjective grounds of knowledge: “The philosophy of the wisest man that ever existed, is mainly derived from the act of introspection. We look into our own bosoms, observe attentively every thing that passes there, anatomise our motives, trace step by step the operations of thought, and diligently remark the effects of external impulses upon our feelings and conduct” (“Of Youth and Age”). This is the route followed by Romantic introspectivists in the essays and poetry of earlier decades. If the author of Political Justice had proceeded from the assumption that humanity could change itself and society by a rational act of will, the sadder but wiser essayist in Thoughts on Man yields questions of intellectual doctrine to the vagaries of character and circumstance.

JAMES MULVIHILL

Biography

Born 3 March 1756 in Wisbech, Cambridgeshire. Studied at Robert Akers' school, Hindolveston, 1764–67, 1771–72; Rev. Samuel Newton's school, Norwich, 1767–71; Hoxton Academy, near London, 1773–78. Minister at Ware, Hertfordshire, Stowmarket, Suffolk, and Beaconsfield, Buckinghamshire, 1778–83. Moved to London, 1783. Contributor, English Review, from 1783, and New Annual Register, 1784–91. Married Mary Wollstonecraft, 1797 (died, 1797): one daughter (the writer Mary Shelley) and one stepdaughter. Married Mary Jane Clairmont, 1801: one son (died, 1832), one stepson, and one stepdaughter. Publisher and writer of the Juvenile Library, 1805–25, when it went bankrupt. Yeoman usher of the Exchequer, 1833–36. Died in London, 7 April 1836.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Sketches of History in Six Sermons, 1784

The Enquirer: Reflections on Education, Manners, and Literature, 1797

Essay on Sepulchres, 1809

Thoughts on Man, His Nature, Productions, and Discoveries, 1831

Essays Never Before Published, edited by C.Kegan Paul, 1873

Uncollected Writings, 1785–1822, 1968

The Anarchist Writings, edited by Peter Marshall, 1986

Other writings: the philosophical study An Enquiry Concerning Political Justice (1793), nine novels (Italian Letters, 1783; Imogen, 1784; Damon and Delia, 1784; Caleb Williams, 1794; St. Leon, 1799; Fleetwood, 1805; Mandeville, 1817; Cloudesley, 1830; Deloraine, 1833), two plays, many books on history, and a biography of Chaucer.

Collected works edition: Collected Novels and Memoirs, 8 vols., 1992., and Political and Philosophical Writings, 7 vols., 1993, general editor Mark Philp.

Bibliography

Pollin, Burton R., Godwin Criticism: A Synoptic Bibliography, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1967

Further Reading

Locke, Don, A Fantasy of Reason: The Life and Thought of William Godwin, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1980

Marshall, Peter H., William Godwin, New Haven, Connecticut and London: Yale University Press, 1984

Woodcock, George, William Godwin: A Biographical Study, Montreal: Black Rose, 1989

Goethe, Johann Wolfgang von

German, 1749–1832

Poet, playwright, novelist, aphorist, government official, and natural scientist: all apply to the polymath and essayist Johann Wolfgang von Goethe. Goethe's essayistic production spans his long and prolific life as a writer. A reflection of a multifaceted career, his essays display an astounding range, versatility, and interdisciplinarity. Like many of his other achievements, his work as essayist is preeminent, masterful, and exemplary. He was, moreover, a leading proponent of the form, albeit avant la lettre, as the German language and literature of the time did not yet have a single or specific label for the genre. Even so, his essays can be readily identified or classified as such according to subsequent definitions of the term.

While it is difficult to characterize something as protean and undefinable as the essay and equally difficult to distinguish among different types of essay, Goethe's might be said to fall loosely into biographical, historical, critical, personal, general expository, and scientific categories. The subjects of his essays vary immensely and mirror his wide-ranging talents and activities. He accordingly penned essays on such topics as architecture, sculpture, painting, literature, aesthetics, the scientific (or experimental) method, botany, osteology, geology, and morphology. Though some of his prose expositions on literary and aesthetic themes have received considerable scholarly attention, his science essays remain mostly unappreciated and unfamiliar to many readers.

Goethe's essays provide a showcase for his mastery of prose style. Many have long been prized as models of German prose writing, among them "Zum Shakespeares Tag" (1771; "For Shakespeare: A Tribute"), "Von deutscher Baukunst" (1772; "On German Architecture"), "Über den Granit" (1781, 1784; "On Granite"), and "Winckelmann" (1805), to name only a few. His essayistic writing flows with a seeming effortlessness, natural grace, and elegance. The metaphor Friedrich Schlegel chose to describe Goethe's Wilhelm Meister (1795–96) likewise typifies Goethe's essayistic prose; it is a metaphor Goethe himself borrowed from Solomon's Proverbs (25:11): "a word aptly spoken is like apples of gold in settings of silver." In other words, his essays reflect a concern for the well-wrought phrase, for excellence in manner of expression. Characterized by clarity and facility as well as economy, they exemplify a form of simple eloquence. Neither too casual nor too erudite, they typically occupy a space somewhere between the so-called formal and familiar essays. Samuel Johnson's description of Addison's essayistic style in The Lives of the English Poets (1781)—"familiar but not coarse, and elegant but not ostentatious"—could easily apply to Goethe's as well.

Goethe's essayistic writing is a rich, eclectic, and expert blend of styles, voices, modes, and forms. Mood and tone vary greatly depending on topic, authorial intent, even Goethe's stage of life, and so convey in one instance the exuberance of youth and in another the equanimity of greater maturity. "On German Architecture," for example, has a decidedly rhapsodic tenor, while “Myrons Kuh” (1818; “Myron’s Cow”) shows more detachment. Similarly, the contentious and polemical “Literarischer Sansculottismus” (1795; “Literary Sansculottism”) differs markedly from the amiable and genial “SanktRochus-Fest zu Bingen” (1814; “The St. Rochus Festival in Bingen”). In addition (and such variations notwithstanding), Goethe’s essays characteristically manifest a didactic tendency which is defined by the complementary action of prodesse et delectare, by the reciprocation of instruction and entertainment, or as the 18th century would express it, of nützen und ergötzen.

Associative, combinative, and collective as well as asystematic, inexhaustive, and undogmatic, Goethe’s essays display the same plasticity and state of flux he admired and described in his essayistic tribute to Christoph Martin Wieland, “Zu brüderlichem Andenken Wielands. 1813” (“In Brotherly Remembrance of Wieland, 1813”). As employed by Goethe, the essay investigates the relation of balance to imbalance, the interplay of similarity and dissimilarity, even the possibility of harmony in disharmony. Moreover, his essays embody the tension between the static and dynamic (Dauer im Wechsel) and between levitas and gravitas (Scherz und Ernst), those concepts so fundamental to Goethe’s way of thinking and writing.

Goethe takes full advantage of the essayistic potential for metalinguistic collage. In his service, the essay fulfills its promise as a generic hybrid, as a genre of genres, as an amalgam of lyric, dramatic, epic, and whatever other kinds of writing one could imagine or care to include. If one word could describe Goethe’s essayistic prose, it might well be experimental—and in every sense of the word. As their various structures and contours illustrate, Goethe’s essays explore the vast possibilities of short expository prose. “Ruysdael als Dichter” (1816; “Ruysdael as Poet”), for example, has no internal division to speak of, while “Das römische Karneval” (1789; “The Roman Carnival”) consists of numerous subsections, each with its own heading. By turns monologic and dialogic, assertive and tentative, analytic and synthetic, Goethe’s essays represent a literary space where not only style and content, but also form and function converge.

Essayistic may well describe Goethe’s prose writing in general. Indeed, an essayistic style informs much if not all of his literary production. Consider, for example, the essayistic properties of his epistolary novel Die Leiden des jungen Werthers (1774; The Sufferings of Young Werther), his autobiography Dichtung und Wahrheit (1811–13; Poetry and truth, translated as Memoirs of Goethe), his travel narrative Italienische Reise (wr. 1817; Travels in Italy), the stylistically complex and varied Wilhelm Meisters Wanderjahre (1821; Wilhelm Meister’s Travels), or his study in optics Zur Farbenlehre (1810; Theory of Colours). The essay is in a sense epitomic of Goethe, as it embraces and displays his literary style, scientific method, and way of thinking all at once.

Although never explicitly formulated, Goethe’s notion of the essay coincides with his concept of the scientific method, and both mirror his general way of thinking and working per se. This correspondence is most clearly expressed in his essay on the experiment (or assay)—“Der Versuch als Vermittler von Objekt und Subjekt” (1792; “The Experiment/Essay as Mediator Between Object and Subject”). There he gives an account of his scientific modus operandi, which implicitly and concurrently describes his essayistic modus scribendi. Like his concept of experimentation, Goethe’s essayistic prose attempts to take into account the many and varied particularities of a given topic, issue, or phenomenon. In the essay, he collects several different perspectives and perceptions which when taken together offer a generalized impression of the subject under consideration. His essayistic compositions in effect extrapolate wholeness from particularity, completeness from fragmentariness, generality from speciality (and perhaps vice versa as well). At the same time, such extrapolation always remains a mere approximation, since the essay never fully comprehends every aspect of the topic in question.

As plied by Goethe, the essay encircles its subject by collecting a number of various impressions, perspectives, perceptions, experiences, and observations, for example in “Der Sammler und die Seinigen” (1799; “The Collector and His Circle”). In doing so, the essay constructs and yields a composite, approximating a unified whole or, to borrow a concept from Max Weber, an ideal type. Goethe’s essays reflect the same fundamentally morphological, typological, or synthetic thinking as that which distinguishes his science. His essayistic writing illustrates an attempt to obtain a synthesis of multiple, isolated, and disconnected experiences. With the essay, Goethe generates a unified construct in approximation of an otherwise elusive and inaccessible whole. As such a construct, one which comprises a number of fragmentary and limited points of view, the essay in a sense performs the same function as Goethe’s concept of the Urphänomen, the protoor pure phenomenon he posits, but which is actually nowhere present or attainable in empirical reality (e.g. “Erfahrung und Wissenschaft” [1798; “Experience and Science”]). While Goethe’s essays admit to the fragmented and fragmentary nature of his knowledge and perceptions, they simultaneously attempt to overcome such limitations with what might be called a holistic response to the all but insurmountable discrepancies and often unrelated singularities of which our experience of reality consists. A comment in his autobiography Dichtung und Wahrheit illustrates the holistic propensity that also informs his essayism: “only humankind taken all together is the true human being.” Like his science of morphology, Goethe’s essayistic method of thinking and writing bridges the gaps between objective and subjective realities as well as between incomprehensible, inconceivable totalities and multiple, even irreconcilable particularities.

Along with Montaigne, whom he had read extensively, Goethe could also have declared “je suis moy-mesmes la matière de mon livre,” for like the great French essayist, he too was himself the subject or substance of his essays. Goethe’s famous reference in his autobiography to his literary creations as fragments of a great confession (“Bruchstücke einer grossen Konfession”) bears witness as well to such an understanding of writing as self-study and self-disclosure, an activity to which the essay particularly lends itself.

Even though Goethe always wrote both about and for himself, he certainly had another audience in mind. The conversational and dialogic quality of his essays in effect implies and requires a reader. Goethe thus enlists and enables the active participation of his reader; he engages and includes the reader as interlocutor. His essays invite cooperation and the opportunity to share in his deliberations, to think along with him, to enter into the process of thought itself, and to be a partner in both reflection and invention. Goethe “the creative writer” desired and posited a “creative reader,” one who as Emerson wrote “must be an inventor to read well” (“American Scholar,” 1837). In this way, Goethe’s reader becomes not only a rebut also a co-producer of the essayistic text.

Besides the implied individual reader, Goethe's essays assume and address the cosmopolitan, intellectual community at large. Whether about Laocoön or the intermaxillary bone, his essays are not written for a few scholarly specialists, but for any educated, informed, knowledgeable reader, all peers in the republic of letters, citizens of literary society in general. As practiced by Goethe, the essay created and afforded a "virtual" literary salon, a communal space for a meeting of the minds. Goethe's essays represent a place where author and reader come together not only to explore the coincidence of art and science, but also to experience the intersection and interaction of thinking, reading, and writing.

JAMES M. VAN DER LAAN

Biography

Born 28 August 1749 in Frankfurt-on-Main. Studied law at the University of Leipzig, 1765–68, and drawing with Adam Öser; became ill, 1768, and convalesced in Frankfurt-on-Main; studied at the University of Strasbourg, 1770–71, law degree, 1771. Practiced law in Frankfurt-on-Main, 1771–72, and Wetzlar, 1772. Invited to court of Weimar by Duke Karl August of Saxony-Weimar, 1775: entered civil service at ducal court, 1776, appointed Privy Counsel, 1779, and held various governmental posts and carried out diverse administrative duties, directing economic, political, social, and cultural affairs of state; ennobled, 1782. Visited Italy, 1786–88. Liaison with Christiane Vulpius, from 1788, marrying her, 1806 (died, 1816): one son. First met Friedrich von Schiller, 1788. Director of the court theaters, 1791–1817. Accompanied Duke Karl August on a military campaign in France, 1792. Editor of various yearbooks and magazines, including Xenien (with Schiller), 1796–97, Die Propyläen (with J.H.Meyer), 1798–1800, Kunst und Altertum, 1816–32, and Zur Naturwissenschaft, 1817–24. Chancellor of the University of Jena. Died in Weimar, 22 March 1832.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Essays on Art, translated by Samuel Gray Ward, 1845

Briefe und Aufsätze von Goethe, aus den Jahren 1766 bis 1786, edited by A.Schöll, 1846

Italianische Reise, Aufsätze und Aussprüche über bildende Kunst, edited by C.Schuchardt, 2 vols., 1862–63

Aufsätze zur Kultur-, Theater- und Literatur-Geschichte: Maximen, Reflexionen, 2 vols., 1913–14

Literary Essays, edited by J.E.Spingarn, 1921

Botanical Writings, translated by Bertha Mueller, 1952

Schriften zur Literatur, 7 vols., 1970–82

Goethe on Art, edited and translated by John Gage, 1980

Essays on Art and Literature (vol. 3 of the Suhrkamp Collected Works), edited by John

Gearey, translated by Ellen von Nardroff and Ernest H.von Nardroff, 1986

Maximen und Reflexionen (in English), edited and translated by R. H.Stephenson, 1986

Scientific Studies (vol. 12 of the Suhrkamp Collected Works), edited and translated by Douglas Miller, 1988

Other writings: four novels (Die Leiden des jungen Werthers [The Sufferings of Young Werther], 1774; Wilhelm Meisters Lehrjahre [Wilhelm Meister's Apprenticeship], 1795–96; Die Wahlverwandtschaften [Elective Affinities], 1809; Wilhelm Meisters Wanderjahre [Wilhelm Meister's Travels], 1821), many plays (including Götz von Berlichingen mit der eisernen Hand [Goetz of Berlichingen with the Iron Hand], 1773; Faust I and II, 1808, 1832), poetry, travel sketches, scientific works, and autobiographical accounts.

Collected works editions: Werke (Weimar Edition), 143 vols., 1887–1919; Werke (Hamburg Edition), edited by Erich Trunz and others, 14 vols., 1948–64; Gedenkausgabe der Werke, Briefe und Gespräche, edited by Ernst Beutler, 27 vols., 1948–71; Collected Works (Suhrkamp Edition), edited by Victor Lange and others, translated by Michael Hamburger and others, 12 vols., 1983–89; Sämtliche Werke (Munich Edition), edited by Karl Richter and others, 1986–(in progress).

Bibliographies

“Goethe-Bibliographie,” Goethe: Jahrbuch der Goethe Gesellschaft, beginning with 14/15 (1952/53); as Goethe-Jahrbuch, since 1972

Hermann, Helmut G., Goethe-Bibliographie, Stuttgart: Reclam, 1991

Pyritz, Hans, Goethe-Bibliographie, Heidelberg: Winter, 2 vols., 1965

Further Reading

Bennett, Benjamin, “Werther and Montaigne,” Goethe Yearbook 3 (1986):1–20

Blackall, Eric A., The Emergence of German as a Literary Language, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1978

Bouillier, Victor, “Montaigne et Goethe,” Revue de Littérature Comparée 5 (1925):572–93

Burgard, Peter J., “Adorno, Goethe, and the Politics of the Essay,” Deutsche Vierteljahrsschrift für Literaturwissenschaft und Geistesgeschichte 66 (1992):160–91

Burgard, Peter J., Idioms of Uncertainty: Goethe and the Essay, University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1992

Damann, Günter, “Goethes ‘Unterhaltungen deutscher Ausgewanderten’ als Essay über die Gattung der Prosaerzählung im 18. Jahrhundert,” in Der deutsche Roman der Spätaufklärung: Fiktion und Wirklichkeit, edited by Harro Zimmermann, Heidelberg: Winter, 1990:1–24

Dell’Orto, Vincent, “Audience and the Tradition of the German Essay in the Eighteenth Century,” Germanic Review 50 (1975): 111–25

Eibl, Karl, “...mehr als Prometheus...’: Anmerkung zu Goethes ‘Baukunst’-Aufsatz,” Jahrbuch der Deutschen Schillergesellschaft 25 (1981):238–48

Fink, Karl J., and Max L.Baeumer, editors, Goethe as a Critic of Literature, Lanham, Maryland: University Press of America, 1984

Haenelt, Karin, Studien zu Goethes literarischer Kritik: Ihre Voraussetzungen und

Möglichkeiten, Frankfurt-on-Main: Lang, 1985

Krebs, Franz Joseph, "Goethes Aufsatz 'Von deutscher Baukunst' und Valerys Leonardo-Essay: Zwei Begegnungen mit dem Genius," Französisch-Heute (September 1983):151–61

Küntzel, Heinrich, Essay und Aufklärung: Zum Ursprung einer originellen deutschen Prosa im 18. Jahrhundert, Munich: Fink, 1969

McCarthy, John A., Crossing Boundaries: A Theory and History of Essay Writing in German, 1680–1815, Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1989

van der Laan, James M., "The German Essay of the Eighteenth Century: Mirror of Its Age," Lessing Yearbook 18 (1986): 179–96

van der Laan, James M., "Of Goethe, Essays, and Experiments," Deutsche Vierteljahrsschrift für Literaturwissenschaft und Geistesgeschichte 64 (1990):45–53

Wohlleben, Joachim, Goethe als Journalist und Essayist, Frankfurt-on-Main and Berne: Lang, 1981

Goldsmith, Oliver

Irish, 1730–1774

Oliver Goldsmith is best known for his comedy She Stoops to Conquer (1773), which is still regularly staged, for the novel The Vicar of Wakefield (1766), and for his poem The Deserted Village (1770). However, for a period roughly coinciding with the Seven Years' War—Goldsmith began reviewing books in 1757 and largely withdrew from essay writing after 1763—he distinguished himself as a Tory critic, a guardian of English paternal authority; as a social satirist, assuming an outsider's stance; and, for better or worse, as one of the most commented-upon figures in the Johnson circle.

Goldsmith's "apprenticeship" to Samuel Johnson began after "Doctor Minor" published two influential books of essays, An Enquiry into the Present State of Polite Learning in Europe (1759) and The Citizen of the World (1762). Goldsmith reviewed books for Ralph Griffiths' Monthly Review and for its rival the Critical Review, edited by Tobias Smollett. He published his own single-author periodical, the Bee (1759), and was among the most prolific "daily historians" for the newspapers and magazines of the High Georgian era.

Goldsmith entered the field of professional authorship as a sort of intern for Griffiths. In this capacity, he reviewed some of the principal publications of the late 1750s, including works by Smollett, Edmund Burke, David Hume, and Thomas Gray. The opportunity further afforded him the chance to develop several of the authorial personae that would serve him as an essayist in the years to come: the scourge of the romance writer, the British patriot, the English gentleman, the upholder of taste and morality. Decrying the exploding popular fascination with the novel, he followed the Tory line in declaring the genre morally bankrupt and aesthetically offensive. In 1759, jumping to the rival Critical Review, he continued his reviewing work while beginning a productive association with Smollett, with whom he also collaborated on the British Magazine a year later.

At a time when single-author periodicals were becoming outmoded, Goldsmith attempted the Bee (1759), which he saw as carrying on the tradition of Addison and Johnson. In one of its most celebrated essays, “A Resverie,” more commonly called the “Fame Machine,” the author imagines himself riding in a coach toward literary immortality. The procession he joins includes Addison, Swift, Pope, Steele, Congreve, and Colley Cibber. In the later edition of his essays that the author himself compiled, Essays by Mr. Goldsmith (1765, revised 1766), Goldsmith appears fairly convinced of his own eventual fame, though the anonymity of his early work makes identifying his entire canon nearly impossible. Although the Bee demonstrated his remarkable range and stylistic panache, it suffered a meager reception and quick demise.

In 1760 Goldsmith began another productive association: with the bookseller John Newbery who, with Smollett, founded the British Magazine. In addition to essays on manners and morals, Goldsmith used the magazine to experiment with short fiction, moral tales that anticipated in tone and theme his Vicar of Wakefield. But it was in another Newbery periodical, the Public Ledger, that Goldsmith would reach the pinnacle of his achievement as an essayist. His “Chinese Letters,” published on average ten times per month, appeared first as lead columns in Newbery’s newspaper, and later were collected as The Citizen of the World. His fictional persona Lien Chi Altangi comments on the vulgarity of the British press, the hypocrisy of English society, and the peculiarity of English fashion. The work gives form to the authorial voice for which he has become best known: the genial and wise humorist, aloof from the ubiquitous foibles of his era.

Hester Thrale-Piozzi and James Boswell depict Goldsmith as a social misfit, or as an errant pupil corrected by his master, Johnson. No doubt he suffered for his being Irish, and so a target for stereotypical characterization. His being an “outsider” in London may have also contributed to the failure of his medical practice and led him to construct the fictionalized “English gentleman” and “Chinese visitor,” aghast at England’s literary, social, and political customs.

Throughout his essays Goldsmith carefully crafts a reputation for being apolitical, above the partisan fray. Yet he provides important political commentary on the coronation of George III in his Chinese Letter of 5 November 1760 and offers support for the new king’s political housecleaning. He frequently voiced his opposition to the Pitt ministry in its execution of the Seven Years’ War, and he remained suspicious of the sort of “liberty” advanced by John Wilkes and his allies in the early 1760s. Goldsmith’s importance as an advocate of political, religious, and social orthodoxy has long been underestimated.

For six years, Goldsmith was among the most prolific contributors to London’s newspapers and magazines, appealing to a coffeehouse readership and engaging in what was arguably the most prominent form of public discourse of that period. His adaptability to his readership and to the changing modes of essay writing, as well as his remarkable stamina and productivity, assure his position as one of the most prominent essayists of the period.

RICHARD C. TAYLOR

Biography

Born 10 November 1730 (possibly 1728 or 1731) in Pallas, near Ballymahon, County Longford. Studied at schools in Athlone, 1739–41, and Edgeworthstown, Longford, 1741–44; Trinity College, Dublin, 1745–49, B.A., 1750; medicine at the University of Edinburgh, 1752–53, and University of Leiden, 1754; failed the examination at the College of Surgeons, 1758. Traveled on the continent, 1755–56. Moved to London; briefly a physician in Southwark; usher, Dr. Milner's classical academy, Peckham, 1756, 1758. Contributor to various journals, including the Monthly Review, Critical Review, and British Magazine, 1757–60; editor, the Bee, 1759, and the Lady's Magazine, 1761; contributor of the "Chinese Letters" to the Public Ledger, 1760–61; editor, Compendium of Biography, 7 vols., 1762; founder member of Samuel Johnson's literary Club, 1764. Died (possibly of a kidney infection) in London, 4 April 1774.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

An Enquiry into the Present State of Polite Learning in Europe, 1759

The Bee, nos. 1–8, 6 October–24 November 1759; in 1 vol., as The Bee: Being Essays on the Most Interesting Subjects, 1759

The Citizen of the World; or, Letters from a Chinese Philosopher Residing in London to His Friends in the East, 2 vols., 1762

Essays by Mr. Goldsmith, 1765; revised edition, 1766

Selected Writings, edited by John Lucas, 1988

Other writings: four plays (including She Stoops to Conquer, 1773), the novel The Vicar of Wakefield (1766), poetry, and books on history.

Collected works edition: Collected Works (Clarendon Edition), edited by Arthur Friedman, 5 vols., 1966.

Bibliographies

Scott, Temple, Oliver Goldsmith Bibliographically and Biographically Considered, New York: Bowling Green Press, 1928

Woods, Samuel H., Oliver Goldsmith: A Reference Guide, Boston: Hall, 1982

Further Reading

Hopkins, Robert H., The True Genius of Oliver Goldsmith, Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press, 1969

Quintana, Ricardo, Oliver Goldsmith: A Georgian Study, New York: Macmillan, 1967; London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1969

Spector, Robert D., English Literary Periodicals and the Climate of Opinion During the

Seven Years' War, The Hague: Mouton, 1966

Taylor, Richard C., Goldsmith as Journalist, Rutherford, New Jersey: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1993

Wardle, Ralph M., Oliver Goldsmith, Lawrence: University of Kansas Press, and London: Constable, 1957

Gombrowicz, Witold

Polish, 1904–1969

Witold Gombrowicz—a man of contradictions, a writer-provocateur, and an eccentric intellectual—was as idiosyncratic an essayist as he was a novelist and a playwright. His formally and stylistically diversified essays range from a mock interview (“Byłem pierwszym strukturalistą” [1967; I was the first structuralist]), through a series of autobiographical radio talks, initially prepared for Radio Free Europe and published posthumously in 1977 as Wspomnienia polskie (Memories of Poland) and Wędrowki po Argentynie (Wandering in Argentina), to a highly original “Przewodnik po filozofii w sześć godzin i kwadrans” (1971; Guide through philosophy in six hours and a quarter), a collection of thoughts on Schopenhauer, Hegel, Husserl, Sartre, Heidegger, and Marx. To fight sickness and boredom, the bedridden Gombrowicz delivered them as lectures to his wife and a friend.

A four-volume Dziennik (1957–69; Diary) is probably Gombrowicz’s most important achievement. Carefully structured for publication in the Parisian monthly Kultura, and later polished for book form, the Diary is no less a work of fiction than Gombrowicz’s novels. It combines autobiographical entries with pure fiction, essays (“Przeciwko poetom” [“Against Poets”] and “Sienkiewicz” crown its first volume) and essayistic fragments with commentaries on his own works, literary criticism with personal and intellectual polemics.

The Diary opens with symptomatic words: “Monday/Me. /Tuesday/Me./Wednesday/Me./Thursday/Me.” This unmistakable provocation reveals the core of Gombrowicz’s artistic and philosophical position. The writer scrutinizes himself as both a human being and an artist. Consequently, Gombrowicz’s most original work concerns man and art. His interests are anthropocentric and existential; his focus is on an individual life—his own; his attitude is to transcend every position he takes; his purpose is to decipher the mechanisms governing one’s relation to others (the main concern is authenticity), to reality and how we communicate with it.

The writer views man as both a producer and a product of form, which he defines as “all modes of our self-expression such as language, ideas, gestures, decisions, deeds...” Being born in human interaction, form makes every manifestation of individuality, including artistic expression of uniqueness, irreversibly artificial. Form also dominates human perception and understanding of reality, and creates important oppositions: between our sense of self and the roles we play, between our thinking and being, between our form and the form of others, and finally between our consciousness and the world. Gombrowicz believes that the essence of culture is a dialectical relationship between man and form; the purpose of artistic creation is to enter reality by penetrating and manipulating the realm of form.

Since art is a social phenomenon, its perception is governed by social rituals and conventions, and in the case of literature by the authority of critics. Therefore it is never authentic and rarely accurate. No one reads the works everyone claims to admire, Gombrowicz alleges in "Against Poets." Poets write for other poets, remain isolated in their hierarchical milieu, and are oblivious to the important tensions in the world. He disapproves of cultural institutions and claims that museums, literary conventions and awards, academic conferences, and the coteries of critics are deadly for art and boring for their participants. Institutionalized, ritualized, and abundant, with no clear criteria for the evaluation of its merits, art exists for its own sake and loses touch with reality. This is its gravest sin, Gombrowicz maintains, for whom writing was a form of living and the most important way of saying something meaningful about the reality in which he lived.

That is not to say that art should be subjected to ideological, intellectual, or literary tenets. Despite his respect for and partial affiliation with existentialism, Gombrowicz attacks writers who use literature to propagate the doctrine. His own polemic with existentialism (as well as with Marxism and Catholicism) is part of the most captivating fragments in his writings. Gombrowicz criticizes the nouveau roman and the apocalyptic cries of his contemporaries with equal intensity. As a Polish writer, he also recognizes the restrictions of the national mission of literature. In "Sienkiewicz" he reproaches Polish literature and culture for being invariably immersed in virtuous mythologies and naive self-adoration, for isolating itself and for ignoring the most important contemporary philosophical and aesthetic problems. On the other hand, Gombrowicz uses his stylized identity of "a simple country bumpkin, just a Pole," to confront the West and win his artistic sovereignty from and superiority over its manifested avantgarde sophistication. Gombrowicz does not spare Paris, this mecca of modern thought, literature, and philosophy, sneering at it as ruthlessly as he does at provincial Poland.

For a writer who declares himself to be "a form in motion," Gombrowicz's most important task is to execute a strategically designed attitude to himself and his readers. "Writing is nothing more than a battle that the artist wages with others for his own prominence," Gombrowicz declares in his Diary. Through laughter, jokes, and outright buffoonery, through parodies of genres and styles, and through serious intellectual contemplation, he creates a dynamic artistic personality for himself, a personality based on permanent ambivalence and transformation. If a struggle with form is the main theme of Gombrowicz's works, then the main strategy in this struggle, as Jerzy Jarzębski has superbly shown in his book, Gra w Gombrowicza (1982; Playing Gombrowicz), is the game—a well-planned series of maneuvers that enables the writer to find a necessary distance from form and to impose the desired image of himself on his readers.

Sometimes Gombrowicz is aggressive, often unfair and petty in his artistic and intellectual battles "for his own prominence," but so long as he manages to escape final classification, he is always ready to pay the highest price for his choices—the price of dismissal, ridicule, and hostility. His contradictions, oppositions, and paralogsms, his style of direct but rarely didactic persuasion, his provocations and maneuvers, his seriousness and unmatched understanding of pain make him one of the most original Polish writers and thinkers.

TAMARA TROJANOWSKA

Biography

Born 4 August 1904 in Maloszyce. Studied at Warsaw University, 1922–27, law degree, 1927; studied philosophy and economics at the Institut des Hautes Études Internationales, Paris, 1927. Law clerk briefly, Warsaw. Wrote for Warsaw newspapers, from 1933. Visited Argentina, 1939, and stayed there once war had broken out. Wrote for Buenos Aires newspapers, from 1940; secretary, Polish Bank, Buenos Aires, 1947–53. Left Argentina, 1963, living in Berlin, 1963–64, and Vence, France, 1964–69. Married Marie-Rita Labrosse, 1969. Awards: Kultura Prize, 1961; International Literary Prize, 1967. Died in Vence, 25 July 1969.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Dziennik, 3 vols., 1957–66; vol. 4 of fragments, in Dzieła, 1969; as Diary, edited by Jan Kott, translated by Lillian Vallee, 3 vols., 1988–93

Przewodnik po filozofii w sześć godzin i kwadrans, 1971

Wspomnienia polskie; Wędrowki po Argentynie, 1977

Gombrowicz filozof, edited by Francesco M. Cataluccio and Jerzy Illg, 1991

Aforyzmy, refleksje, myśli i sentencje, edited by Joachim Glensk, 1994

Other writings: five novels (Ferdynand, 1937; Trans-Atlantyk, 1953; Pornografia, 1960; Kosmos, 1965; Opętani [Possessed], 1973), short stories, and four plays (Slub [The Marriage], 1953; Iwona, księżniczka Burgunda [Princess Ivona], 1957; Operetka [Operetta], 1966; Historia [unfinished], 1975).

Collected works editions: Dzieła zebrane, II vols., 1969–77; Dzieła, 15 vols., 1986–(in progress).

Further Reading

Barilli, R., “Sartre et Camus, juges dans le journal,” in Gombrowicz, edited by Constantin Jeleński and Dominique de Roux, Paris: L’Herne, 1971

Błoński, Jan, Forma, śmiech i rzeczy ostateczne, Cracow: Znák, 1994:141–79, 215–51, 259–77

Bujnowski, Józef, Esej, szkic literacki i krytyka artystyczna w literaturze polskiej na obczyźnie 1940–1960, London: Związek Pisarzy Polskich, 1964

Dedieu, Jean-Claude, Witold Gombrowicz, Paris: Marval, 1993

Jarzębski, Jerzy, Gra w Gombrowicza, Warsaw: Państwowy Instytut Wydawniczy, 1982:59–139

Karpiński, Wojciech, “Gombrowiczowska przestrzeń,” Współczesność 20 (1969)

Kott, Jan, Introduction to Four Decades of Polish Essays, edited by Kott, Evanston, Illinois: Northwestern University Press, 1990

Łapiński, Zdzisław, editor, Gombrowicz i krytycy, Cracow: Wydawnictwo Literackie, 1984

Łapiński, Zdzisław, Ja Ferdynand: Gombrowicza świat interakcji, Lublin: Katolickiego Uniwersytetu Lubelskiego, 1985

Łęgiński, Michał, Modernizm Witolda Gombrowicza: Wybrane zagadnienia, Stockholm: Almqvist & Wiksell, 1996

Malic, Zdravko, "Felietony literackie Witolda Gombrowicza," Pamiętnik Literacki 4 (1973):251–61

Progudis, Lakis, Un écrivain malgré la critique: Essai sur l'œuvre de Witold Gombrowicz, Paris: Gallimard, 1989

Thompson, Ewa M., Witold Gombrowicz, Boston: Twayne, 1979

Volle, Jacques, Gombrowicz, bourreau, martyr, Paris: Bourgois, 1972

González, José Luis

Dominican/Mexican, 1926–

José Luis González's cultural, sociological, and historical essays of national interpretation are some of the most provocative and ambitious works written in and on a Latin American country. They can be understood only within the context of Puerto Rico's concerns about national identity, being an ELA (Spanish acronym for Free Associated State), with but not within the United States.

González's first essay, Literatura y sociedad en Puerto Rico (1976; Literature and society in Puerto Rico), set up, under the aegis of socioliterary methods and using Marxist thought, the history of Puerto Rican literature from the age of Spanish conquerors until the first decades of the 20th century. His El país de cuatro pisos y otros ensayos (1980; The Four-Storeyed Country and Other Essays) can be considered a continuation, in a broad sense, of Literatura. The book, and the well-known title essay in particular, is an outstanding attempt to interpret the reality of contemporary Puerto Rico. González suggests that the role of the Creole bourgeoisie, as reflected clearly in texts, was suddenly and hopelessly frustrated because of the American intervention in 1898, and therefore disabled as a driving force of national identity. The polemical condition of the essay, as assumed by the author, is centered in literary sociology and points to the colonial condition of the island, economically attached to the United States.

The fundamental role played by the exile is a key theme in González's essays. As he points out in "El escritor en el exilio" (The writer in exile), "in certain circumstances exile can prove a very effective form of service to one's country." That is, it seems, what he means to say in "The Four-Storeyed Country," which answers, in a Socratic manner, the question of how Puerto Rican culture has been affected by American colonial presence. González looks for a response using Marxist theories on national identities, whose roots can be found in Engels' assertion that "nation is a cultural fact," or in Italian Marxist theorist Antonio Gramsci's concept of "national popular culture," as well as in dialectic dialogues with former intellectuals and activists of the national consciousness such as Eugenio María de Hostos or Pedro Albizu Campos.

National consciousness, according to González, has never been possible because of the “four storeys” that make up the Puerto Rican national edifice: 1) native “taínos,” African slaves and Spanish conquerors; 2) immigrants of the first decades of the 19th century (Spanish American political refugees, Corsicans, Majorcans, Catalonians, Irish, English, Dutch, and French); 3) the American intervention in 1898; and 4) late American capitalism and Puerto Rican populism of the 1940s. González concludes that, generally speaking, the impact of the American presence can only be negative for the ruling class, whereas for the remaining social classes it has implied modernization.

The criticism González’s theories have received is centered, mostly, on three points: 1) the treatment given to Pedro Albizu, a former Puerto Rican independence leader, as a simplistic personification of pro-Spanish conservatism; 2) the misuse of Marxist methodology, such as the use of culture in terms of social classes, making a distinction between “culture of the masses” and “culture of the elite”; and 3) the biased racial division of two Puerto Rican nations, in economic as well as cultural terms, influenced by the surrounding Latin American examples of two-nation theories, based on the gap between native population and white conquerors or immigrants.

Nueva visita al cuatro piso (1987; New visit to the fourth storey) is not only a kind of continuation of “The Four-Storeyed Country,” but also an explanation of the lack of class consciousness of Puerto Rican proletarians.

CARLOS M.GUTIÉRREZ

Biography

Born 8 March 1926 in Santo Domingo, Dominican Republic. Raised and educated in Puerto Rico. Writer, from 1943. Exiled to Mexico, 1950s: became a Mexican citizen. Professor of literature, National Autonomous University of Mexico, Coyoacán, and University of Guanajuato. Cofounder, Puerto Rican Communist Party. Awards: Villaurrutia Prize, 1978.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Literatura y sociedad en Puerto Rico, 1976

El país de cuatro pisos y otros ensayos, 1980; as The Four-Storeyed Country and Other Essays, translated by Gerald Guinness, 1990

Nueva visita al cuatro piso, 1987

Historia de vecinos y otras historias, 1993

Other writings: several collections of short stories, the novel Balada de otro tiempo (1978; Ballad of Another Time), and memoirs.

Bibliographies

- Foster, David William, editor, Puerto Rican Literature: A Bibliography of Secondary Sources, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1982:118–20
- Ruscadella Bercedóniz, Isabel, “Bibliografía de José Luis González,” Texto Crítico 12, (1979):115–27

Further Reading

- Díaz Quiñones, Arcadio, Conversación con José Luis González, Río Piedras: Huracán, 1976
- Flores, Juan, “The Puerto Rico That José Luis González Built: Comments on Cultural History,” Latin American Perspectives 3 (Summer 1984):173–84
- Flores-Caraballo, Eliut D., “Class-Bound Reductionism vs. the Multidetermination of National Cultures: An Essay on Puerto Rican National Consciousness,” Studies in Latin American Popular Culture 10 (1991):25–58
- Méndez, José Luis, Para una sociología de la literatura puertorriqueña, Havana: Casa de las Américas, 1982
- Rodríguez de Laguna, Asela, Notes on Puerto Rican Literature: Images and Identities: An Introduction, New Brunswick, New Jersey: Rutgers University Press, 1987
- Rodríguez de Laguna, Asela, editor, Images and Identities: The Puerto Rican in Two World Contexts, New Brunswick, New Jersey: Transaction Books, 1987

Gordimer, Nadine

South African, 1923–

A native of South Africa, Nadine Gordimer began her writing career as the white Nationalist Party assumed power in Pretoria, and she has taken as her primary subject the personal lives of those who have lived under the weight or off the fat of racist politics. Each of Gordimer’s 11 novels, several collections of short fiction, and four volumes of essays deals with relations between the races, but she did not begin writing in order to express her abhorrence of apartheid. In an early autobiographical essay, “A Bolter and the Invincible Summer” (1963), Gordimer remembers her simple delight at producing rhythm and rhyme for a patriotic school assignment. She began to publish in newspapers as an adolescent and, though young and essentially self-taught, found that writing required her to “chip” away at “ready-made concepts” and make her “own sense of the world.” Consequently, as she explains, “...the ‘problems’ of my country did not set me writing; on the contrary, it was learning to write that sent me falling, falling through the surface of ‘the South African way of life’.”

The importance of Gordimer’s essays lies not in innovations of form (as in her novels

The Conservationist, 1974; Burger's Daughter, 1979; July's People, 1981), nor in prose so precise, details so telling that the narrative itself gives off a poetic intensity (as in her finest short fiction, particularly stories in A Soldier's Embrace, 1980), for Gordimer is not among the great essayists of her day. What commands our attention in her nonfiction is her continued effort to fulfill Chekhov's demand "to describe a situation so truthfully... that the reader can no longer evade it" ("The Essential Gesture," 1985). No reader of Gordimer's essays can avoid seeing what it has meant to this white, middle-class woman to go "home to quiet streets ... and secure shelter" while in the black township just eight miles from her home "children no longer go to school, fathers and sons disappear into police vans or lie shot in the dark streets, social gatherings are around coffins and social intercourse is confined to mourning" ("Letter from Johannesburg, 1985").

A central subject of the essays is writing as the means of discovering and recovering what is concealed by political force and the unconscious extension of such force into everyday habit: "The expression in art of what really exists beneath the surface is part of the transformation of a society. What is written, painted, sung, cannot remain ignored" ("That Other World That Was the World," 1995). Grown more radical with age and increased exposure to lives crushed under and set against racist rule, Gordimer allies herself with writers who know, with Proust, that they must "not be afraid to go too far, for the truth lies beyond" (Writing and Being, 1995). Like Naguib Mahfouz, Chinua Achebe, and Amos Oz (to whom she devotes a trilogy of essays, originally delivered in 1994 as Harvard lectures), Gordimer goes too far: "Too far for the accepted norms of loyalty to the regimes, the societies, the mores, the politics of the countries whose earth, nevertheless, they feel between bare toes, flesh of the flesh" ("Zaabalawi: The Concealed Side," 1995).

From the start, Gordimer's audience has been largely overseas, in Britain and America; not only has her work been banned several times in her own country (at one point occasioning a book she wrote with others, What Happened to Burger's Daughter; or, How South African Censorship Works, 1980), but she writes as a "minority within a minority... A white; a dissident white; a white writer," as she puts it in her most important essay, "Living in the Interregnum" (1983). To that audience, far from Africa, an audience mostly white with tastes toward "literature" rather than "popular fiction," she has seemed its best interpreter of the machinations of apartheid's white minority rule. Many of her essays were written expressly for overseas publications, and hers is the voice of the teacher explaining—with wonder as well as repugnance—events as they unfold in her homeland.

The publication of The Black Interpreters: Notes on African Writing (1973) allowed Gordimer to use her significant status as an interpreter of South African affairs to introduce her overseas audience to little-known works by black writers. She has continued to write about African authors, and though her criticism lacks the rare genius of her fiction, it creates a community-in-print of gifted writers buried beneath—or confined to the edges of—the canon.

The subtitle of Gordimer's 1988 essay collection, The Essential Gesture, summarizes her interests: "writing, politics, and places," foregrounding the work of putting words down, the effort of "getting it all straight" (as a character describes storytelling in Jump and Other Stories, 1991). Several essays analyze the "tension" that "makes a writer": the “tension between standing apart and being fully involved” (“Selecting My Stories,” 1975), or, as it is framed in a later essay, the strain between commitment to one’s art and responsibility to one’s society (“The Essential Gesture”).

For Gordimer, politics is never abstract theory, but always an account of the force of power in people’s lives, including, in her essays, both profiles of the powerful (Albert Luthuli, Nelson Mandela, white communist Bram Fischer) and guarded glimpses into the writer’s own well-protected privacy. In Gordimer’s essays about places, she explores Africa itself, at times in prose as beautiful as any she has written. Seen through her eyes, Abidjan in the Ivory Coast “verges knee-deep in delicate lilies like just-struck match flames” (“Merci Dieu, It Changes,” 1971); out of the night noise of the Congo’s banks she hears the cry of the tree hyrax, “Greek and immortal in its desperate passion, gathering up echoes from all the private wailing walls of the human soul” (“The Congo River,” 1961).

Introducing her 1975 Selected Stories, Gordimer argues “that in a certain sense a writer is ‘selected’ by his subject— his subject being the consciousness of his own era.” Nadine Gordimer’s essays stand alongside her novels and stories as keen, clear testimony to her willingness to bring “the writer’s questioning concentration” (from “That Other World That Was the World”) to bear on the passions and politics that have defined her time and place.

JILL PIGGOTT

Biography

Born in Springs, Transvaal, 20 November 1923. Educated at home between ages 11–16; studied at the University of the Witwatersrand, Johannesburg. Married G.Gavron, 1949; married Reinhold Cassirer, 1954: one son, one daughter, and one stepdaughter. Visiting lecturer at various American institutes and universities, 1961–71; presenter, Frontiers television series, 1990. Awards: many, including the James Tait Black Memorial Prize, 1972; Booker Prize, 1974; Grand Aigle d’Or Prize (France), 1975; Commonwealth Award, 1981; Malaparte Prize (Italy), 1985; Nelly Sachs Prize (Germany), 1985; Royal Society of Literature Benson Medal, 1990; Nobel Prize for Literature, 1991; honorary degrees from ten universities and institutes.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

African Literature (lectures), 1972

The Black Interpreters: Notes on African Writing, 1973

The Essential Gesture: Writing, Politics, and Places, edited by Stephen Clingman, 1988

Writing and Being (Charles Eliot Norton lectures), 1995

Other writings: II novels (The Lying Days, 1953; A World of Strangers, 1958; Occasion for Loving, 1963; The Late Bourgeois World, 1966; A Guest of Honour, 1970; The Conservationist, 1974; Burger’s Daughter, 1979; July’s People, 1981; A Sport of Nature, 1987; My Son’s Story, 1990; None to Accompany Me, 1994) and eight collections of short stories.

Bibliography

Driver, Dorothy, and others, Nadine Gordimer: A Bibliography of Primary and Secondary Sources, Grahamstown, South Africa: National English Literary Museum, 1993; London: Zell, 1994

Further Reading

Berthoud, Jacques, "Writing Under Apartheid," Current Writing: Text and Reception in South Africa 1, no. 1 (October 1989): 77–87

Ettin, Andrew V., Betrayals of the Body Politic: The Literary Commitments of Nadine Gordimer, Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1993

Head, Dominic, Nadine Gordimer, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1994

Smith, Rowland, editor, Critical Essays on Nadine Gordimer, Boston: Hall, 1990

Subbarao, C., "The Writer's Conscience: A Reading of Nadine Gordimer's The Essential Gesture," in Indian Response to African Writing, New Delhi: Prestige, 1993:113–18

Wagner, Kathrin, Rereading Nadine Gordimer, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1994

Gor'kii, Maksim

Russian, 1868–1936

Maksim Gor'kii's essays reveal a range and variety at least as great as that of his fictional writing; indeed, at times it is not easy to keep the two apart. In a letter of 1930 he remarked that many of his own works combined the ocherk (sketch or essay) form with that of the story. Thus some of his most notable collections of the 1910s and early 1920s hover between the two genres: his Russkie skazki (1911–17; Russian tales) are satirical pieces on Russia's political and cultural life in the years following the uprisings of 1905; the quasi-fictional form often provides only the thinnest of disguises for the individuals and occurrences on which they are based. Similarly, his Zametki iz dnevnika (1924; Fragments from My Diary) deals with actual events and at least ostensibly with actual people, though some of the depictions are sufficiently bizarre that Gor'kii would seem to have invented certain details. These highly fragmentary pieces in turn are closely related to his autobiographical writings, most notably his famous trilogy: Detstvo (1913; My Childhood), V liudiakh (1914–16; My Apprenticeship), and Moi universitety (1923; My Universities). Here, too, while the writing seems increasingly factual as Gor'kii moves from his childhood years into early adulthood, he appears to have included some fictional elements to enhance his narrative. As with Fragments from My Diary, it is Gor'kii's eye for the striking detail that makes particular scenes or individuals memorable; the trilogy, though, is also distinguished by his ability to take portions of his life's experiences and from them create a powerful effect by focusing on a handful of key themes.

Some of Gor'kii's outstanding memoirs, while clearly works of nonfiction, reveal a literary flair that has led critics to discuss them alongside his belletristic productions. Perhaps his greatest accomplishment in this mode is "Leo Tolstoi" (1919). Typically, the work is something of a miscellany, in this case combining a series of brief notes written nearly two decades earlier, when the two writers were both spending time in the Crimea due to ill health, and a long letter originally composed after Tolstoi's death in 1910. The initial impression is that Gor'kii pulled together random jottings and then filled out his essay with an old letter; only upon a careful reading (or rereading) does it become clear that the choice and ordering of the often startling observations and quotations create one of the most revealing biographical sketches of Tolstoi ever written. Gor'kii occasionally wrote about political figures (most notably, Lenin) and various individuals from his past, but the most remarkable of his memoirs tend to be devoted to writers, such as "Leonid Andreev" (1919) and "Anton Chekhov" (1904, 1923). Typically, at least part of the essay is composed under the immediate influence of the subject's death, and rather than attempt a full biography, Gor'kii relies heavily on a series of anecdotes, many based on his own contacts with the individual, to provide illuminating insights that finally coalesce into a coherent and effective portrayal.

Thus the satirical writings, the autobiographical sketches, and the memoirs devoted to prominent individuals are all distinguished by a purposefully fragmentary method of writing that tends to highlight the individual description or anecdote, often to the detriment of conventional notions as to what would constitute a well-made work. The autobiographical trilogy and a few of the memoirs maintain at least a chronological coherence and a sense of structure; however, in, for instance, the Tolstoi memoir and especially Fragments from My Diary Gor'kii challenges the reader to create meaning from the natural disjointedness of real life.

Not all of Gor'kii's essays contain so strong a literary flair, not even those pieces devoted specifically to questions of writing. "Besedy o remesle" (1930–31; "Chats on Craftsmanship") uses autobiographical examples in a relatively straightforward manner to show other writers how actual experience can be translated into literature. A similar manner pervades his purely political writing. An example is his "Zametki o meshchanstve" (1905; "Notes on the Bourgeois Mentality"), one of his earliest major articles, where he accuses the bourgeoisie of, among many other things, a limited outlook, total self-absorption, a determination to maintain the status quo, and a concern only with its own comfort and well-being. He is if anything even harsher in his judgment of the peasant class; "O russkom krest'ianstve" (1922; "On the Russian Peasantry") expresses virulent dislike toward a class that he sees as resistant to the new revolutionary order. His strong political commitment to bolshevism appears as well in "Gorod Zheltogo d'iavola" (1906; "City of the Yellow Devil"), written under the influence of his hostile reception in New York and containing a scathing denunciation of American capitalism (in a manner far more one-sided than the actual personal opinions he expressed in his correspondence at the time). After the revolution the capitalist world represents for him an amalgam of social ills and anti-Soviet hostility. For instance, in his “S kem vy, ‘mastery kul’tury’” (1932; “Whose Side Are You On, ‘Masters of Culture’”), Gor’kii remains opposed to capitalist bourgeois culture but has much nicer things to say about Russian peasants, or at least about those who have come to accept the Communist Party’s edicts encouraging collectivization and outlawing private ownership of the land.

However, around the time of the revolution itself Gor’kii expressed many doubts about the direction it was taking. These were eloquently expressed in his columns appearing in the newspaper Novaia Zhizn’ (New life) from Spring 1917 until Summer 1918 and subsequently published under the title of their rubric, Nesvoevremennye mysli (Untimely Thoughts). He mistrusts the Bolsheviks’ desire (and rush) for power, their shrill propaganda, and most of all the violence they are committing in their efforts to consolidate their rule.

Underlying most of Gor’kii’s essays is a strong humanistic thrust. He opposes those who, no matter how loyal they may be to an abstract ideal, are too harsh in their judgment of people. His disagreement with Dostoevskii’s attitude toward individuals led to the bitter attack in “O Karamazovshchine” (1913; “On Karamazovism”), on the staging of a play based on Dostoevskii’s great novel. His early opposition to the Bolsheviks, like that to the bourgeoisie in general, is based on a sense that they commit too much violence against their fellow men and also that they are in some way inimical to culture, which Gor’kii sees as the main path by which humanity can progress. That Gor’kii himself, in other essays, ended up supporting those who committed the very sins he attacked elsewhere, remains one of the paradoxes, and tragedies, of his career.

BARRY P.SCHERR

Biography

Born Aleksei Maksimovich Peshkov, 28 March 1868 in Nizhnii Novgorod. Lost his parents early and worked in various odd jobs, from age II; self-taught. Attempted suicide, 1887; wandered through southern Russia, 1888–89, 1891–92. Published his first story in Kavkaz newspaper, Tbilisi, 1892; wrote for various periodicals in the Volga region, from 1892. Married Ekaterina Pavlovna Volzhina, 1896 (later separated): one son and one daughter. Arrested and briefly imprisoned for revolutionary activities, 1898, 1901. Literary editor, Zhizn’ (Life), from 1899; editor, Znanie publishing house, St. Petersburg, from 1900; became involved in a secret printing press, and temporarily exiled to Arzamas, central Russia, 1902. Elected to the Russian Academy, 1902, but election declared invalid by the government: several members of the Academy resigned in protest. Joined the Bolshevik Party, 1905, and supported the 1905 Revolution. Traveled to the United States, 1906; lived on the island of Capri, 1906–13, then returned to Russia. Founding editor, Letopis’ (Chronicles), 1915–17, and Novaia Zhizn’, 1917–18; helped to launch a series of world classics by Vsemirnaia literatura (World literature) publishing house. Left Russia, 1921, and spent three years at various German and Czech spas; editor, Dialogue, Berlin, 1923–25, and in Sorrento, 1924–33. Visited Russia, from 1928, and settled there, 1933; assumed various editorial posts in Russia, from 1930. Participated in the All-Union Congress of Soviet Writers, 1934. Awards: Order of Lenin, 1932. Died (in suspicious circumstances) near Moscow, 18 June 1936.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Nesvoevremennye mysli, 1917–18; edited by Herman Ermolaev, 1971; as Untimely

Thoughts, translated by Herman Ermolaev, 1968

Revoliutsiia i kultura (Revolution and culture), 1918

O russkom krest'ianstve, 1922; as On the Russian Peasantry, translated anonymously, 1976

Zametki iz dnevnika, 1924; as Fragments from My Diary, translated anonymously, 1924, and by Moura Budberg, 1972, revised edition, 1975

O literature, 1933; revised edition, 1935, 1955; as On Literature: Selected Articles, translated by Julius Katzer and Ivy Litvinova, 1960

Reminiscences of Tolstoy, Cbekhov and Andreyev, translated by Katherine Mansfield, S.S.Kotelianski, Virginia Woolf, and Leonard Woolf, 1934

Articles and Pamphlets, 1951

The City of the Yellow Devil: Pamphlets, Articles and Letters About America, translated anonymously, 1972

Literary Portraits (vol. 9 of Collected Works), 1982

On Literature (vol. 10 of Collected Works), 1982

Other writings: many novels (including Foma Gordeev, 1899; Mat' [Mother], 1906; Zhizn' Matveia Kozhemiakina [The Life of Matvei Kozhemyakin], 1910–11; Delo Artamonovykh [The Artamonov Business], 1925; Zhizn' Klima Samgina, 1925–36), short stories (including Russkie skazki, 1911–17), plays, three volumes of autobiography (1913–23), and letters.

Collected works editions: Sobranie sochinenii, 25 vols., 2nd edition, 1933–34; Sobranie sochinenii, 30 vols., 1949–56; Polnoe sobranie sochinenii (includes Khudozhestvennaia literatura, 25 vols., 1968–76, and Varianty k kbudozhestvennym proizvedeniiam, 10 vols., 1974–82), 1968–(in progress); Collected Works, 10 vols., 1978–82.

Bibliographies

Clowes, Edith, Maxim Gorky: A Reference Guide, Boston: Hall, 1987

Terry, Garth M., Maxim Gorky in English: A Bibliography, 1868–1986, Nottingham: Astra Press, 1986

Further Reading

Barratt, Andrew, "Maksim Gorky's Autobiographical Trilogy: The Lure of Myth and the Power of Fact," AUMLA 80 (November 1993):57–79

Bialik, Boris, Gor'kii—Literaturnyi kritik, Moscow: GIKhL, 1960

Borras, F.M., Maxim Gorky the Writer: An Interpretation, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1967

- Clowes, Edith W., "Gorky, Nietzsche and God-Building," in Fifty Years On: Gorky and His Time, edited by Nicholas Luker, Nottingham: Astra Press, 1987
- Hare, Richard, Maxim Gorky: Romantic Realist and Conservative Revolutionary, London: Oxford University Press, 1962
- Jackson, Robert L., "Gor'kij's Polemic with Dostoevskij," Russian Literature 24 (1988):503–16
- Muchnic, Helen, "Gorky from Chaliapin to Lenin," in her Russian Writers: Notes and Essays, New York: Random House, 1971
- Ovcharenko, A.I., Publitsistika M.Gor'kogo, Moscow: Sovetskii pisatel', 2nd edition, 1965
- Pel't, Vladimir Danilovich, M.Gor'kii—zhurnalist (1928–1936), Moscow: Moskovskii universitet, 1968
- Pritchett, V.S., "The Young Gorky," in his The Living Novel, New York: Random House, revised edition, 1964 (original edition, 1946)
- Rougle, Charles, Three Russians Consider America: America in the Works of Maksim Gor'kij, Aleksandr Blok, and Vladimir Majakovskij, Stockholm: Almqvist & Wiksell, 1976
- Scherr, Barry P., Maxim Gorky, Boston: Twayne, 1988
- Scherr, Barry P., "Gorky's Skazki: Structure and Genre," in The Short Story in Russia, 1900–1917, edited by Nicholas Luker, Nottingham: Astra Press, 1991
- Spiridonova, L., M. Gor'kii: Dialog s istoriei, Moscow: Nasledie, 1994
- Steinberg, Mark D., Introduction to Untimely Thoughts by Gor'kii, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1995
- Todd, William Mills, III, "Gor'kij's Essay on the Peasantry: Framing the Mirror," Russian Literature 24 (1988):555–68
- Weil, Irwin, Gorky: His Literary Development and Influence on Soviet Intellectual Life, New York: Random House, 1966
- Wolfe, Bertram D., The Bridge and the Abyss: The Troubled Friendship of Maxim Gorky and V.I.Lenin, New York: Praeger, and London: Pall Mall Press, 1967
- Yedlin, Tova, "The Political Career of Maxim Gorky, 1884–1921," in Russian and Eastern European History, edited by R.C. Elwood, Berkeley, California: Berkeley Slavic Specialties, 1984
- Zhak, L.P., Ot zamysla k voploshcheniiu: V tvorcheskoi masterskoi M.Gor'kogo, Moscow: Sovetskii Pisatel', 2nd edition, 1983

Gould, Stephen Jay

American, 1941–

One of the most significant contemporary science essayists is Stephen Jay Gould, recognized for his mastery of prose and for the importance of his primary topic, evolutionary biology, in an era when it is under increasing attack from those outside the scientific community. Gould, a professor of zoology, geology, and the history of science at Harvard University, has won many awards for both his scientific and his writing accomplishments. His column, "This View of Life," which has appeared in Natural History since 1973, was honored by winning the National Magazine Award for essays and criticism in 1980. His books have also won the American Book Award for science, the National Book Award, and the National Book Critics Circle Award. His essays have been widely anthologized.

Gould is a prolific writer, appealing to a wide variety of audiences. In addition to professional scientists and people with an avowed interest in science, he has also regularly contributed essays to the New York Review of Books. In all of these venues, Gould attempts to explain and address the intellectual concerns of evolutionary biology. In an interview he asserts that “there is no reason to dilute the intellectual content at all” to accommodate his audience. His essays continue and expand the tradition of popular science exemplified by 19th-century scientists such as Asa Gray and T.H.Huxley. In fact, Gould has asserted that the tradition he is working in goes back to St. Francis of Assisi’s works on animal and bird life. His essays make frequent use of literary allusions, quoting from such diverse sources as Dr. Seuss, the Bible, Gilbert and Sullivan, Shakespeare, and Alexander Pope. He frequently begins his essays with literary and cultural comparisons to draw the reader into the important scientific information he wants to impart. Some of his essays are distinctly personal, revealing the immediate circumstances of their development. Similar to Montaigne’s Essais, Gould’s writings try out ideas and thoughts, revealing a human voice speaking of human concerns.

The overarching theme of all his writing is evolution. Many of his essays are explicitly persuasive in explaining and defending the theory of evolution as one founded on factual evidence of variation which “must be random, or at least not preferentially inclined toward adaptation” as he writes in the prologue to his first collection, Ever Since Darwin (1977). Gould’s belief in, and his arguing for, this view of evolution influences other themes and rhetorical strategies in his essays. One of his principal themes, supporting his view of evolution, is his definition of science, which he sees as a part of human culture; according to Gould scientists are as influenced by their personalities, personal histories, and cultural biases as they are by the objective truth of the scientific method. As he wrote in The Mismeasure of Man (1981):

Science, since people must do it, is a socially embedded activity. It progresses by hunch, vision, and intuition. Much of its change through time does not record a closer approach to absolute truth, but the alteration of cultural contexts that influence it so strongly. Facts are not pure and unsullied bits of information; culture also influences what we see and how we see it. Theories, moreover, are not inexorable inductions from facts. The most creative theories are often imaginative visions imposed upon facts; the source of imagination is also strongly cultural.

This definition of science summarizes the important characteristics of Gould’s view of science, which is rooted both in the traditional scientific method with its idea of factual reality, testable hypotheses, and enduring truths, and in the evidence of historical and cultural influences on science as presented by historians and sociologists of science. Gould’s definition of science structures the choice of topics of most of his essays.

Many of his essays focusing on individual scientists allow him to accentuate the human activity of science and its idiosyncratic nature. Essays on scientific figures—such as Charles Darwin, from “Darwin’s Delay” (1973) to “Spin Doctoring Darwin” (1995); Sigmund Freud, “Freudian Slips” (1987); “The Passion of Antoine Lavoisier” (1989); and Pierre-Simon Laplace and Georges Buffon, “The Celestial Mechanic and the Earthly Naturalist” (1994)—show how scientists arrive at their conclusions and are influenced by the culture in which they live. He also introduces readers to obscure scientists, such as William Whiston, Isaac Newton’s successor as Lucasian Professor of Mathematics at Cambridge, in “The Godfather of Disaster” (1987), or Emmanuel Mendes da Costa, “the only Jewish naturalist of note in eighteenth century Britain” in “The Anatomy Lesson” (1995). He also argues that theories which have been dismissed as unscientific were often based on the best science available at the time, as in “Crazy Old Randolph Kirkpatrick” (1979) or “Kropotkin Was No Crackpot” (1988).

By using these scientists to show that the development of science, often seen as linearly progressing toward perfection, is influenced by random events, dependent on historical development, Gould implicitly asserts the correctness of evolutionary theory. Science, as in life, is constrained by its history, tied to the general cultural progression, quirks of fate, individual peculiarities, and historical biases. Gould also reveals in his essays their own origins, thus linking his definition of science with his production of essays, both of which reveal the same traits of evolutionary and historical change.

DIANE DOWDEY

Biography

Born 10 September 1941 in New York City. Studied at Antioch College, Yellow Springs, Ohio, A.B. in geology, 1963; Columbia University, New York, Ph.D., 1967. Married Deborah Lee, 1965: two sons. Geology instructor, Antioch College, 1966; taught geology and zoology at Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, from 1967: currently Alexander Agassiz Professor of Zoology, from 1982; also assistant curator, 1967–71, associate curator, 1971–73, and curator of invertebrate paleontology, from 1973, Harvard Museum of Comparative Zoology. Lecturer at various universities and institutions around the world. Associate editor, Evolution, 1970–72; member of the editorial board, Systematic Zoology, 1970–72, Paleobiology, 1974–76, American Naturalist, 1977–80, and Science, from 1986; columnist of “This View of Life,” Natural History, from 1973; contributor to many other journals. President, American Society of Naturalists, 1979–80, and the Paleontological Society, 1985–86; vice president, 1975, and president, 1990, Society for the Study of Evolution. Member of the advisory board, Nova television series, from 1980. Member, American Association for the Advancement of Science, and the American Academy of Arts and Sciences. Awards: many, including National Magazine Award, for essays, 1980; American Book award, for The Panda’s Thumb, 1981; National Book Critics Circle Award, 1981, and American Book Award, 1982, both for The Mismeasure of Man; MacArthur Foundation Fellowship, 1981–86; Phi Beta Kappa Book Award, for Hen’s Teeth and Horse’s Toes, 1984, and for Wonderful Life, 1990; Sarah Josepha Hale Medal, 1986; Vursell Award, 1987; Rhône-Poulenc Prize, for Wonderful Life, 1991; honorary degrees from over 30 universities and colleges.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Ever Since Darwin: Reflections in Natural History, 1977

The Panda's Thumb: More Reflections in Natural History, 1980

Hen's Teeth and Horse's Toes: Further Reflections in Natural History, 1983

The Flamingo's Smile: Reflections in Natural History, 1985

An Urchin in the Storm: Essays About Books and Ideas, 1987

Time's Arrow, Time's Cycle: Myth and Metaphor in the Discovery of Geological Time (lectures), 1987

Bully for Brontosaurus: Reflections in Natural History, 1991

Eight Little Piggies: Reflections in Natural History, 1993

Dinosaur in a Haystack: Reflections in Natural History, 1995

Other writings: The Mismeasure of Man (1981), concerning the development of IQ testing, and Wonderful Life: The Burgess Shale and the Nature of History (1989).

Further Reading

Asante, Molefi Kete, "Locating a Text: Implications of Afrocentric Theory," in Language and Literature in the African American Imagination, edited by Carol Aisha Blackshire-Belay, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1992

Becker, John E., "A Concealed Totality: Science and Poetry in the Essays of Stephen Jay Gould," Soundings: An Interdisciplinary Journal 74, nos. 3–4 (Fall-Winter 1991):559–79

Kaufer, David S., and Cheryl Geisler, "A Scheme for Representing Written Argument," Journal of Advanced Composition II, no. 1 (Winter 1991):107–22

McRae, Murdo William, "Stephen Jay Gould and the Contingent Nature of History," CLIO: A Journal of Literature, History, and the Philosophy of History 22, no. 3 (Spring 1993):239–50

Masur, Louis P., "Stephen Jay Gould's Vision of History," in The Literature of Science: Perspectives on Popular Scientific Writings, edited by Murdo William McCrae, Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1993

Morrell, Roy, "What Happened to the Dinosaurs?," Thomas Hardy Journal 8, no. 1 (February 1992):37–40

Selzer, Jack, editor, Understanding Scientific Prose, Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1993

Winterowd, W. Ross, "Rediscovering the Essay," Journal of Advanced Composition 8, nos. 1–2 (1988):146–57

Gourmont, Remy de

French, 1858–1915

Aptly described by Richard Aldington as “one of France’s most able and industrious journeymen of letters,” Remy de Gourmont enjoyed considerable popularity and esteem both in France and in English-speaking countries during his lifetime. Today he is no doubt best remembered for his crucial role in founding the highly influential Mercure de France in January 1890, and for his influence on such writers as T.S.Eliot, Ezra Pound, and John Middleton Murry. A prolific writer who worked in many genres, he made his greatest contribution in the area of the essay, writing on a broad range of topics, from literature and art to science and philosophy.

For Gourmont, the subject matter was far from being the most important aspect either of creative or of critical writing: like Charles Baudelaire before him, he believed that criticism should be impassioned and personal, and unlike such contemporaries as Hippolyte Taine, he was convinced that critical writing was valuable for itself, as a means of expression comparable to more traditional vehicles. As he remarks in La Culture des idées (1900; “The Culture of Ideas”), “the craft of writing is a craft, but style is not a science.” All human expression, for him, from literature and art to philosophy and science, depends, like intelligence itself, on the senses. A man for whom the external world clearly existed and whose physical drives were all the stronger for being frequently suppressed, Gourmont used his wide-ranging interests and his polymath curiosity and knowledge to create a vision of culture where the high value placed on the aesthetic, far from being effete, is always at least on the verge of being erotic. As a literary critic he was eager not to offer judgments, but rather to note his impressions as he read. Above all he focused on style, convinced, as he maintains in the fifth series of Promenades littéraires (1913; Literary promenades), that “the criticism of style would suffice as literary criticism; it contains all the others.”

His Le Livre des masques (1896–98; The Book of Masks), which is one of the first studies to define and delimit symbolism as a school, enters into the imagination of the writers he discusses, reveals the physical and intellectual pleasures of reading and writing, and encapsulates them in heightened visual images. The Belgian poet Émile Verhaeren, for instance, is presented in the following, highly characteristic, terms: “This poet lives in an old Italian palace, on whose walls emblems and words are inscribed. He dreams, passing from room to room, and toward evening he goes down the marble staircase and wanders into the gardens, which are paved like courtyards, and there he dreams his life amidst the pools and fountains, while black swans nervously protect their nests and a peacock, as solitary as a king, seems beautifully to imbibe the dying pride of a golden dusk.”

If Gourmont possessed the art of the complex and appropriate image, he also knew how to turn a pungent aphorism: “You have to kill many loves to arrive at love,” “Hope is a great hindrance,” “One never goes to bed with anyone but oneself,” “University degrees were invented in order to people France with persons looking as if they had studied.” Such aphorisms are frequently imbued with skepticism, especially in his Physique de l’amour (1903; The Natural Philosophy of Love), which presents a purely materialistic and Darwinian view of existence, but he also reveals a healthy refusal to take himself (or anyone else) too seriously. Thus, in Promenades littéraires he asserts: “Genius is almost always accompanied by a strong propensity to play.”

Among his finest essays are those included in the Lettres à l’Amazonne (1914; Letters to the Amazon), written for Natalie Clifford Barney. The easy intimacy between writer and reader, the polished but informal style, and the culturally sophisticated frame of reference suggest the extent to which Montaigne has inspired Gourmont’s concept of the essay, and evoke the image of a somewhat avuncular conversationalist taking delight in forging a smoothly articulate response to whatever topic his listener suggests to him. It is this openness to the best in human thought and creation, this conviction that “the intellectual domain is a limitless landscape and not a series of little gardens enclosed in walls of suspicion and disdain” (Esthétique de la langue française [1899; The aesthetics of the French language]) that is most appealing in Gourmont’s writing, but it is also fraught with a certain danger, the temptation of multiple possibilities rather than the determination to focus on and deepen specific areas. Crippled, like many of his time, by the prevalent misogyny, Gourmont’s writing has aged most in the area of human relationships. On literature, style, and culture he is better for the broad view than the particular.

One last aphorism can serve both to sum up Gourmont’s gifts and to account for his fall from favor: “Posterity is like a schoolchild condemned to learn by heart a hundred lines of verse. He remembers ten, and stammers a few syllables of the rest. The ten lines are fame; the rest is literary history.”

ROSEMARY LLOYD

Biography

Remy Marie Charles de Gourmont. Born 4 April 1858 in Bazochesau-Houlme. Studied at a lycée in Coutances, 1868–76; law at the University of Caen, 1876–79. Assistant librarian, Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris, 1881–91: dismissed for article critical of government policy toward Germany. Contributor to many periodicals, from early 1880s. Liaison with Berthe de Courrière, 1887–90. Cofounder, coeditor, and major contributor, Mercur de France (Mercury of France), from 1890. Facially disfigured by skin disease, 1891, resulting in seclusion and an identity crisis. Cofounder, L’Ymagier, 1894–96, and La Revue des Idées (The review of ideas), 1904. Died (of a stroke) in Paris, 27 September 1915.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Le Latin mystique, 1892; reprinted 1981

- L'Idéalisme*, 1893
La Poésie populaire, 1896
Le Livre des masques: Portraits symbolistes, 2 vols., 1896–98; as The Book of Masks, translated by Jack Lewis, 1921
Esthétique de la langue française, 1899
La Culture des idées, 1900; as “The Culture of Ideas,” translated by William A. Bradley, in Decadence, and Other Essays on the Culture of Ideas, 1921
Le Problème du style, 1902
Le Chemin de velours, 1902
Physique de l'amour: Essai sur l'instinct sexuel, 1903; as The Natural Philosophy of Love, translated by Ezra Pound, 1922
Épilogues: Réflexions sur la vie, 6 vols., 1903–13
Promenades littéraires, 7 vols., 1904–27
Promenades philosophiques, 3 vols., 1905–09; selection as Philosophic Nights in Paris, translated by Isaac Goldberg, 1920
Dante, Béatrice, et la poésie amoureuse, 1908
Le Chat de misère: Idées et images, 1912
Lettres d'un satyre, 1913
Lettres à l'Amazone, 1914; as Letters to the Amazon, translated by Richard Aldington, 1931
La Belgique littéraire, 1915
Pendant l'orage, 1915
La Petite Ville; Paysages, 1916
Dans la tourmente, 1916
Pendant la guerre: Lettres pour l'Argentine, 1917
Les Idées du jour, 2 vols., 1917–18
Monsieur Croquant, 1918
Trois Légendes du Moyen Âge, 1919
Les Pas sur le sable, 1919
Huit aphorismes, 1920
Le Livret de l'imagier, 1920
Pensées inédites, 1920
La Patience de Griseledis, 1920
Petits crayons, 1921
Decadence, and Other Essays on the Culture of Ideas, translated by William A. Bradley, 1921
Le Puits de la vérité, 1922
Le Vase magique, 1923
Dernières pensées inédites, 1924
Dissociations, 1925
Nouvelles dissociations, 1925
Les Femmes et le langage, 1925
La Fin de l'art, 1925
Deux poètes de la nature: Bryant et Emerson, 1925
Le Joujou, et trois autres essais, 1926
Lettres intimes à l'Amazone, 1927
Selections, edited and translated by Richard Aldington, 2 vols., 1928
Selected Writings, edited and translated by Glenn S. Burne, 1966
Le Joujou patriotisme; La Fête nationale, edited by Jean-Pierre Rioux, 1967

Other writings: six novels (including Sixtine [Very Woman], 1890; Un cœur virginal [A Virgin Heart], 1907), tales, poetry, five plays, and correspondence.

Collected works edition: Œuvres, 6 vols., 1925–32.

Bibliography

Gourmont, Jean de, and Robert D. Donne, Bibliographie des œuvres de Remy de Gourmont, Paris: Leclerc, 1922

Further Reading

Aldington, Richard, Remy de Gourmont: A Modern Man of Letters, Seattle: University of Washington Chapbook, 1928

Burne, Glenn S., Remy de Gourmont, Literary Critic (dissertation), Seattle: University of Washington, 1956

Burne, Glenn S., Remy de Gourmont: His Ideas and Influence in England and America, Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1963

Gosse, Edmund, Aspects and Impressions, London and New York: Cassell, 1922:203–23

Powys, John Cowper, Essays on De Gourmont and Byron, Girard, Kansas: Haldeman-Julius, 1923; reprinted in Suspended Judgments: Essays on Books and Sensations, Norwood, Pennsylvania: Norwood, 1977

Sieburth, Richard, Instigations: Ezra Pound and Remy de Gourmont, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1978

Gracián, Baltasar

Spanish, 1601–1658

The work of this Spanish baroque moralist exemplifies the unresolvable tension between Christian values, on the one hand, and the practical philosophy geared at earthly success, on the other. A Jesuit theologian, Baltasar Gracián's unquestioned Catholicism contrasts with his elitist attitude of one who professes that most human beings are condemned to stupidity and intellectual mediocrity. The purity of his religious faith is not directly questionable; he even published a beautiful manual of preparatory prayers for Holy Communion (El comulgatorio, 1655); however, it is significant that almost all of Gracián's work was published under pseudonyms outside the official circles of the Jesuits. His superiors noted certain excessively "mundane" elements in his maxims, which caused him continual problems in his religious career and led to repeated disciplinary measures.

Gracián influenced La Rochefoucauld and, especially, Schopenhauer, who considered El criticón one of the best books ever written. The Spanish Academy has always considered Góngora, Calderón, and Quevedo to be literary figures superior to Gracián; the latter, however, has remained, alongside Cervantes, the most frequently translated author of the Spanish Golden Age.

Apart from the above-mentioned brief collection of prayers, Gracián wrote six books, of which the first three—El héroe (1637; The Hero), El político D.Fernando el Católico (1640; The politician Ferdinand the Catholic), and El discreto (1646; The discreet man, translated as The Compleat Gentleman)—continue the Renaissance tradition of Castiglione, and to a lesser degree, of Machiavelli. In these, he charts a characterological map of the ideal man. The fundamental difference between these heroes and Castiglione's in Il cortegiano lies in the distinction we find between the Renaissance and the world of the baroque era. The themes and ethos of the baroque are the same as those of the Renaissance, displaying similar references to classical heroes and authors and to the same Arcadian ideals, but the pathos has radically changed: although Reason and Nature remain as inspiring entelechies, the human condition is no longer perceived in the same way. In this period of religious crises, wars, and economic decadence the world had become a battlefield of ambitions and moral misery where one had to survive amid constant attacks of envy and general vulgarity. More than ever, the discreet man must be judicious, individualistic, astute, and outstanding in letters, arms, and politics. For Gracián, this ideal image of the politician is incarnate in King Ferdinand the Catholic, who demonstrates characteristics of valor and prudence, all the while surrounding himself with the best company.

In The Compleat Gentleman, the profile of the perfect man is drawn with greater precision. The book's structure demonstrates a varied discourse based on allegories, maxims, dialogues, and commentaries; it is comprised of 25 chapters, each one dedicated to a different quality. Gracián's pessimism is intensified here and the importance of astuteness is underscored, which gradually becomes the most significant element of his later work. The discreet man is one who at any moment can read the minds of others and remain in control, all the while covering those errors which are inevitable in the human condition. Gracián also values the wise man who knows to retreat in time.

Agudeza y arte de ingenio (1642, 1648; The Mind's Wit and Art) is Gracián's most stylistically difficult work. In it he attempts to take the cultivated reader by surprise and force him to navigate through plays on words, apparent antitheses, and twisted metaphors. Basically, the text is a system of principles in the form of aphorisms and allegories, whose fundamental premises are repeated in his following book, which is much easier to read. The Oráculo manual y arte de prudencia (1648; The Oracle, a Manual of the Art of Discretion), Gracián's most successful book outside of Spain, consists of 300 philosophical maxims which comprise a practical message on worldly triumph, followed by an explanatory commentary.

But Gracián's most ambitious and extensive book is El criticón (1651–57; The Critick). The title of the book does not refer to he who criticizes a great deal (which would be the accepted use of the word in modern Spanish), but rather to he who knows how to analyze or critique society. Here the ideal man, Critilo, with whom the author clearly identifies, teaches his spiritual son and disciple, Andrenio (an archetype of the common man), the secrets of life by means of a series of novelistic episodes. The world, as Calderón had already perceived it, is depicted as a great theater in which most of the actors are motivated exclusively by egoistic impulses. Once again, the value of this work lies in the philosophical digressions made by Critilo, who repeatedly advises Andrenio not to allow himself to be swayed by appearances, since great value is to be found in virtue and in the ability to survive the moral misery of one's contemporaries without being contaminated by it. The Critick demonstrates, like none of Gracián's other works, the contradiction inherent in the coexistence of the virtues of honesty and authenticity with astuteness and worldly wisdom.

In Gracián, the long European nonreligious moralist tradition (Cicero, Seneca, Guevara, Castiglione) converges with the baroque preference for the laconic and the stylistically hermetic. But the most interesting aspect of this work, from the point of view of intellectual history, is that it represents a milestone in the textual construction of the modern "I." Pessimism combines with emphasis on individual success and points to an intensification of the secularization process in which the individual self becomes independent of the social and religious constraints of the Old Regime. This process will be dramatically accelerated with the Enlightenment and later with Romanticism. This may be a slightly exaggerated claim, but it is significant that in the early 20th century Gracián was deemed the "Spanish Nietzsche."

PEDRO MARIA MUÑOZ

Biography

Baltasar Gracián y Morales. Born 8 January 1601 in Belmonte, near Calatayud. Lived with and taught by his priest uncle in Toledo during childhood; studied at a Jesuit school in Saragossa, 1616–19; novice with the Jesuits, Tarragona, at age 18; studied philosophy at the College of Calatayud, 1621–13; studied theology in Saragossa, 1623–27. Ordained as a priest, 1627, and took solemn vows, 1635. Taught philosophy and theology at several Jesuit schools in Aragon, the University of Gandía, 1633–36, and the Colegio de Huesca, from 1636, where he befriended the rich patron of letters, Vincencio Juan de Lastanosa, who financed the publication of his most important books. Had problems with censorship for most of his publications (disciplined twice), which embittered him and left him with enemies. Attempted unsuccessfully to leave the Jesuits and become a monk. Died in Tarragona, 6 December 1658.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

- El héroe*, 1637; corrected edition, 1639; edited by Adolphe Coster, 1911; as The Heroe, translated by John Skeffington, 1652; as The Hero, translated anonymously, 1726
El político D.Fernando el Católico, 1640; edited by E.Correa Calderón, 1961
Arte de ingenio, 1642; revised edition, as Agudeza y arte de ingenio, 1648; edited by E.Correa Calderón, 2 vols., 1969; as The Mind's Wit and Art, translated by Leonard H.Chambers, 1962
El discreto, 1646; edited by Miguel Romera-Navarro and Jorge M. Furt, 1960, and Arturo del Hoyo, 1963; as The Compleat Gentleman, or a Description of the Several Qualifications, Both Natural and Acquired, That Are Necessary to Form a Great Man, translated by T.Saldkeld, 1730

Oráculo manual y arte de prudencia, 1648; edited by Miguel Romera-Navarro, 1954, E.Correa Calderón, 1968, Benito Pelegrin, 1983, and Emilio Blanco, 1995; as The Art of Worldly Wisdom, translated by Joseph Jacobs, 1892, Martin Fischer, 1934, Otto Eisenschmil, 1947, and Christopher Maurer, 1993; as The Oracle, a Manual of the Art of Discretion, translated by L. B.Walton, 1953; also translated under other titles by John Savage, 1702, and Lawrence C.Lockley, 1967; selection as Practical Wisdom for Perilous Times: Selected Maxims, edited and adapted by J. Leonard Kaye, 1992

El criticón (allegorical novel with essayistic qualities), 3 vols., 1651–57; edited by Miguel Romera-Navarro, 1938, Antonio Prieto, 2 vols., 1970, and E. Correa Calderón, 1971; as The Critick, translated by Paul Rychaut, 1681

Tratados políticos, edited by Gabriel Juliá Andreu, 1941

The Best of Gracián, translated by Thomas C.Corvan, 1964

Other writings: the collection of prayers El comulgatorio (1655).

Collected works editions: Obras completas, edited by E.Correa Calderón, 1944, Arturo del Hoyo, 1960, Miguel Batllori and Ceferino Peralta, 1969– (in progress), and Emilio Blanco, 2 vols., 1993.

Further Reading

Anceschi, Luciano, La poética di Gracián in Europa, Naples: Istituto Suor Orsola Bernincasa, 1989

Ayala, Jorge M., Gracián: Vida, estilo, y reflexión, Madrid: Cincel, 1987

Batllori, Miguel, Gracián y el barroco, Rome: Storia e Letteratura, 1958

Bell, Aubrey FitzGerald, Baltasar Gracián, London: Oxford University Press, 1921

Bouillier, Victor, Baltasar Gracián et Nietzsche, Paris: Champion, 1926

Chiappini, Julio O., Borges y Baltasar Gracián, Rosario, Argentina: Zeus, 1994

Correa Calderón, Evaristo, Baltasar Gracián: Su vida y su obra, Madrid: Biblioteca Románica Hispania, 1961

Ferrari, Angel, Fernando el Católico en Baltasar Gracián, Madrid: Espasa-Calpe, 1945

Foster, Virginia R., Baltasar Gracián, Boston: Twayne, 1975

Haftner, Monroe Z., Gracián and Perfection: Spanish Moralists of the Seventeenth Century, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1966

Hidalgo-Serna, Emilio, Das ingeniose Denken bei Baltasar Gracián: Der "concepto" und seine logische Funktion, Munich: Fink, 1985

Kassier, Theodore L., The Truth Disguised: Allegorical Structure and Technique in Gracián's "Criticón", London: Tamesis, 1976

Krabbenhoft, Kenneth, El precio de la cortesía: Retórica e innovación en Quevedo y Gracián, Salamanca: University of Salamanca, 1994

Krauss, Werner, Gracians Lebenslehre, Frankfurt-on-Main: Klostermann, 1947

Patella, Giuseppe, Gracián o della perfezione, Rome: Studium, 1993

Pelegrín, Benito, Le Fil perdu du "Criticón" de Baltasar Gracián, objectif Port Royal: Allégorie et composition "conceptiste", Aix-en-Provence: University of Provence, 1984

Pelegrín, Benito, Éthique et esthétique du Baroque: L'Espace jésuitique de Baltasar Gracián, Arles: Actes Sud, 1985

Werle, Peter, "El héroe": Zur Ethik des Baltasar Gracián, Tübingen: Narr, 1992

Gramsci, Antonio

Italian, 1891–1937

For their range, perceptiveness, and originality Gramsci's writings on politics and society have had a considerable influence on 20th-century thought. His early production, mainly articles of both a theoretical and an unashamedly propagandistic nature for the socialist daily Avanti! (Forward!) (1916–20) and for L'Ordine Nuovo (1919–24; The new order), were written in the heat of intense political involvement and were largely concerned with supporting workers' rights and advocating revolutionary action on the Soviet model. Later collected in five volumes, they constitute a stirring record of political activism at a time of turmoil and precariousness in Italy as well as a fascinating sociohistorical document of the period.

When Gramsci's activity as a political leader (he was cofounder of the Italian Communist Party in 1921) led to his confinement in fascist prisons for the last ten years of his life (1926–37), he continued to write, committing to paper, mainly in the form of notes and short essays, his reflections on and analyses of an extraordinarily broad spread of topics: from literature through ethics to history and practical politics. The 32 Quaderni del carcere (Prison Notebooks), smuggled out of Italy after Gramsci's death and organized for publication in six volumes after World War II, reflect among much else the thinker's concern to reevaluate 19th- and early 20th-century literary, moral, and political thought, especially that found in the Italian tradition of Francesco De Sanctis, Antonio Labriola, and Benedetto Croce but also in influential foreign figures such as Hegel, Marx, and Georges Sorel. Even if, by the very nature of these writings, their vision is fragmentary and incomplete, they are nevertheless marked by a vastness of design and, for the most part, by a style of exemplary clarity and vigor.

His move away from Crocean "idealism" had begun early and, despite the continued admiration for and echoes of Croce to be found in the Prison Notebooks, the latter are seen by most commentators, whether favorable or otherwise to Gramsci's ideas, as offering an essentially materialist analysis of history and socioeconomic structures and constituting a Marxist sociology of a new and original kind, interpretations of which have informed left-wing discussion in the cultural and political fields up to this day, both in Italy and abroad. The outstanding features of this new sociology are twofold: the positing of the lack of a "national-popular" tradition in Italy compared to other nations as the key to the kind of aulic, court-based cultural (especially literary) development that has characterized the country over the centuries; and the reassessment of the concept of and opportunity for political revolution in the West. In particular, following the failure of the Left in Italy, Gramsci comes to see revolution as essentially a longterm prospect depending on the particular traditions and conditions that exist in each individual country and needing above all as its prerequisite the gradual building of hegemony (his name for ideological domination or penetration) in all the institutions of society by those intellectuals with revolutionary ideas. Only when this task is complete, and ideological unity between intellectuals and masses (“historic bloc” is the term Gramsci uses for this) has been achieved, does the time become ripe for successful revolutionary political action. For Gramsci this is the process that has informed history; new ruling classes have succeeded in establishing a new social order only when they have had effective ideologists to make their ideas permeate the institutions of civil society.

Close analysis of Gramsci’s discussion of hegemony, however, and in particular of his concept of the nature of revolution and future society, suggests that his thought continues to be marked both by much of the coercive element of his Leninist political background and by the idealism of his early intellectual formation. While now finding the Soviet model inapplicable to the more advanced societies of the West, whose histories have led them along different and varying paths, he still seems to conceive of revolution as the coercive taking of power by one minority class from another even if in different circumstances from those experienced by Lenin in Russia. This is far from a universally agreed view, however, and many find enough in Gramscian hegemony to see it as an essentially democratic concept based on mass consciousness and understanding and, as in Gino Bedani’s (1979) words, “a sophisticated and flexible account of social causation.”

Today, despite the collapse of Leninism and Soviet power in the East and the apparent inability of radical intellectuals to spread revolutionary hegemony in the West, Gramsci’s ideas, through their depth and richness, continue to exercise considerable fascination among cultural and political commentators and to generate as much debate and controversy as they have since his writings first became widely known and circulated. One senses that they will continue, at the hands of critics from a wide variety of disciplines, to be the object of exaggerated praise, unfair vilification, and everything in between.

HOWARD MOSS

Biography

Born 22 January 1891 in Ales, Sardinia. Suffered from rickets and spinal injury as a child, leaving him physically deformed. Studied at the University of Turin, 1911–15. Married Julka Schucht, 1922: two sons. Founder, editor, or contributor to several journals and newspapers, including Il Grido del Popolo (The shout of the people), from 1915, Avanti!, 1916–20, La Città Futura (The future city), 1917, Il Club di Vita Morale (The club of moral life), 1917, L’Ordine Nuovo, 1919–14, and L’Unità (Unity), 1922. Active with the Socialist Party, from 1917; founder member, 1921, and party secretary, 1924, Italian Communist Party; elected deputy in Veneto constituency and participated in parliamentary secession to Aventine, 1924. Arrested because of political opposition and imprisoned, 1926–37: suffered from arteriosclerosis, Potts disease, and pulmonary tuberculosis, and transferred from prison to a private clinic in Formia, 1933, and to Quisisana Clinic, Rome, 1935; mass of observations, essays, and studies written while in prison later collected as Quaderni del carcere. Awards: Viareggio Prize for Literature, 1947. Died (of a cerebral hemorrhage) in Rome, 27 April 1937.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

- Lettere dal carcere*, 1947; revised edition, edited by Sergio Caprioglio and Elsa Fubini, 1965; as Letters from Prison, edited by Frank Rosengarten, translated by Ray Rosenthal, 2 vols., 1994; selections as Letters from Prison, edited and translated by Lynne Lawner, 1973, and Prison Letters, translated by Hamish Henderson, 1988
- Quaderni del carcere*, 6 vols., 1948–51; Istituto Gramsci Edition edited by Valentino Gerratana, 4 vols., 1975; Part as Prison Notebooks, vol. 1 (1929–33), edited by Joseph A. Buttigieg, translated by Buttigieg and Antonio Callari, 1992; various selections as The Open Marxism of Antonio Gramsci, translated by Carl Marzani, 1957, The Modern Prince and Other Writings, translated by Louis Marks, 1957, Selections from the Prison Notebooks, translated by Quintin Hoare and Geoffrey Nowell Smith, 1971, and Further Selections from the Prison Notebooks, edited and translated by Derek Boothman, 1995
- History, Philosophy and Culture in the Young Gramsci*, edited by Peter Cavalcanti and Paul Piccone, 1975
- Selections from Political Writings*, edited by Quintin Hoare, translated by Hoare and John Mathews, 2 vols., 1977–78
- Cronache Torinesi (1913–17)* (articles), edited by Sergio Caprioglio, 1980
- La Città Futura (1917–18)* (articles), edited by Sergio Caprioglio, 1982
- Il Nostro Marx (1918–19)* (articles), edited by Sergio Caprioglio, 1984
- Selections from Cultural Writings*, edited by David Forgacs and Geoffrey Nowell Smith, translated by William Boelhower, 1985
- L'Ordine Nuovo (1919–20)*, edited by Valentino Gerratana and Antonio A. Santucci, 1987
- A Gramsci Reader: Selected Writings, 1916–1935* (various translators), edited by David Forgacs, 1988
- Lettere, 1908–1926*, edited by Antonio A. Santucci, 1992
- Pre-Prison Writings*, edited by Richard Bellamy, translated by Virginia Cox, 1994
- Collected works edition: Opere, 12 vols., 1947–71.

Bibliographies

- Cammett, John M., Bibliografia gramsciana, 1922–1988, Rome: Riuniti, 1991
- Nordquist, Joan, Antonio Gramsci, Santa Cruz, California: Reference and Research Services, 1987

Further Reading

- Bates, Thomas Richard, "Gramsci and the Theory of Hegemony," Journal of the History of Ideas 36 (1975):351–66
- Bedani, Gino, "The Long-Term Strategy in Gramsci's Prison Notebooks," Quinquarème 2 (1979):204–22
- Bellamy, Richard, and Darrow Schechter, Gramsci and the Italian State, Manchester: Manchester University Press, and New York: St. Martin's Press, 1993

- Bobbio, Norberto, "Gramsci and the Concept of Civil Society," in Gramsci and Marxist Theory, edited by Chantal Mouffe, London and Boston: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1979
- Cammett, John M., Antonio Gramsci and the Origins of Italian Communism, Stanford, California: Stanford University Press, 1967
- Davidson, Alastair, Antonio Gramsci: Towards an Intellectual Biography, London: Merlin, and Atlantic Highlands, New Jersey: Humanities Press, 1977
- Dombroski, Robert S., Antonio Gramsci, Boston: Twayne, 1989
- Faenza, Liliana, Tra Croce e Gramsci: Una concordia discors, Rimini: Guaraldi, 1992
- Gruppi, Luciano, Il concetto di egemonia in Gramsci, Rome: Riuniti-Istituto Gramsci, 1972
- Harman, Chris, Gramsci Versus Reformism, London: Bookmarks, 1983
- Hoffman, John, The Gramscian Challenge: Coercion and Consent in Marxist Political Theory, Oxford and New York: Blackwell, 1984
- Holub, Renate, Antonio Gramsci: Beyond Marxism and Postmodernism, London and New York: Routledge, 1992
- Jocteau, Gian Carlo, Leggere Gramsci: Una guida alle interpretazioni, Milan: Feltrinelli, 1975
- Joll, James, Gramsci, New York: Viking Press, 1977; London: Penguin, 1978
- Maier, Bruno, and Paolo Semama, Antonio Gramsci, Florence: Le Monnier, 1975
- Moss, Howard K., "Gramsci and the Idea of Human Nature," Italian Quarterly 31, nos. 119–20 (1990):7–19
- Paladini Musitelli, Marina, Introduzione a Gramsci, Bari: Laterza, 1996
- Ransome, Paul, Antonio Gramsci: A New Introduction, Hemel Hempstead and New York: Harvester Wheatsheaf, 1992
- Scruton, Roger, "Thinkers of the Left: Antonio Gramsci," Salisbury Review 6 (1984):19–22; also in his Thinkers of the New Left, Harlow, Essex: Longman, 1985
- Simon, Roger, Gramsci's Political Thought: An Introduction, London: Lawrence and Wishart, 1982
- Williams, Gwyn A., "Gramsci's Concept of Egemonia," Journal of the History of Ideas 21 (1960):586–99

Grass, Günter

German, 1927–

The essayistic work of Günter Grass has so far received less critical attention than his novels, early plays, poetry, or graphic art. Yet the 1987 edition of his collected works includes a volume of 138 selected essays, speeches, and commentaries written over 30 years. A decade later, about 50 more essays and speeches can be added to this number.

In marked contrast to his early novelistic style, often described as baroque as it winds its way through lists of objects and grotesque juxtapositions into the surreal, Grass' voice as essayist exhibits restraint, lucidity, and sober rationality. Rather than indulging in baroque playfulness or rhetoric, Grass develops balanced arguments based on facts embedded in historical context, and on values of openness, honesty, equality, and democracy.

Most of Grass' essays written after 1963 were first conceived and delivered as speeches or published as "open letters," addressing political and cultural occasions and including tributes and eulogies. During the election years 1965, 1969, and 1972 Grass delivered hundreds of speeches for Willy Brandt's Social Democrat party. His political speeches clearly address a broad public, speaking to the concerns of both the older and younger generations, working people, trade unions, pensioners, students, and teachers. Indeed, with his campaign speeches of the 1960s and beyond, Grass sets a unique example for German writers. Emphasizing his political work as that of a citizen shouldering his public responsibility, Grass enters into dialogue with his audiences with the purpose of raising reasonable doubt. Exemplary campaign speeches appear in four collections from 1968 to 1984. The English collection Speak Out! (1969) comprises examples up to 1968; On Writing and Politics (1985) selects speeches up to 1983.

Grass has also written essays on writers and writing, examples appearing in Aufsätze zur Literatur (1980; Essays on literature) and in the recent Die Deutschen und ihre Dichter (1995; The Germans and their writers), which attempts to collect his essays focusing on literary figures from the historical and the contemporary scene, including writers from world literature. One name recurring in Grass' essays but missing from this collection is Montaigne, whom Grass designates as "Frühaufklärer" (forerunner of the age of reason).

The grouping of Grass' essays into the categories of "Writing" and "Politics" seems obvious enough, but finer thematic distinctions apply. For example, essays written in connection with the author's travels on four continents could, if collected, shed more light on his concerns with third-world and international affairs. Another persistent topic of Grass' speeches at German and international meetings is the writer's role in society and politics.

Grass' essays referring to the mutual elucidation of the arts deserve separate attention. Having trained in sculpture and graphic arts, he frequently draws inspiration from graphic sources in art history. Three essays in particular illustrate the author's affinity with some of his models in the arts. His first essay, "Die Ballerina" (1956; "The Ballerina"), is a discourse on an old print in the style of the commedia dell'arte, which portrays the confrontation between a poet and a ballerina who appears late at night poised on the writer's table. (Grass had married the Swiss ballet student Anna Schwarz in 1954.) By dwelling on the strict regime and discipline of the classical ballet dancer and on the asceticism her art requires, Grass presents her as inspiration and muse to the writer. Just as all ballet expressions require intense control of natural movement, the art of the poet cannot be "natural." An allusion to Heinrich von Kleist's essay Über das Marionettentheater (1810; On Puppet Shows) places Grass' first essay in a demanding aesthetic context. Suggesting that the ballerina and (Kleist's) marionette might enter into a marriage, this essay aspires to a perfection for art and the artisan which transcends the human condition.

Grass' address on the Dürer anniversary of 1971, "Vom Stillstand im Fortschritt" (On stasis in progress), draws inspiration from Dürer's engraving Melancholia I. He pictures the mysterious allegorical figure in a variety of roles in contemporary society: placed at a conveyor belt, she "sits wingless and as though sexless" for eight hours a day. Her utopian side is “Touristica,” as the same ancient deity presides over both Melancholia and Utopia. Melancholy is also embodied in the lonesome suburban wife, and as socialist woman she holds hammer and sickle instead of the compass. Expressing Western overabundance, supply without demand, she sits on a deep freezer, a can opener in her hand. In a corresponding attitude she may refuse food, aspiring to a utopia of stern discipline. Grass attempts to demonstrate that Dürer’s melancholy is a social reality rather than a suspicious eccentricity.

In the essay “Der Traum der Vernunft” (The dream of reason), addressing a 1984 conference at the Berlin Academy of Art, Grass refers to Goya’s etching in aquatint with the inscription El sueño de la razón produce monstruos (The sleep of reason brings forth monsters). Identifying sueño as both sleep and dream, he points out that all ideologies are dreams of reason or terrifying utopian visions. Does this mean, he asks, that reason must never sleep, permit us no mystery, no flights of the imagination including the bat, owl, and lynx of Goya’s etching? In this and other essays of the 1980s, Grass questions humankind’s future: “Die Vernichtung der Menschheit hat begonnen” (The destruction of humankind has begun) he claimed at the reception of the Feltrinelli Prize in 1982. Grass was so demoralized by this vision that he stopped writing fiction for four years.

During and after the changes of 1989–91 in Germany, Grass opposed in 13 essays and speeches the hasty German reunification without appropriate changes in the constitution. Pleading for a more carefully reasoned procedure, Grass suggested a federation of the two states rather than an emotional unification, which would amount in effect to a takeover by the West of a formerly independent state. In November 1992 he dedicated a public address about the decline of political culture in the united Germany to the Turkish victims of Mölln. In a 1994 speech accepting a prize from the Bavarian Academy of Art, Grass seemed to anticipate the critical uproar that would follow the 1995 publication of his novel Ein weites Feld (A wide field). “Über das Sekundäre aus primärer Sicht” (On the secondary from a primary perspective) presents a skeptical evaluation of the emphasis on secondary concerns in contemporary culture and politics.

As the selected examples show, Grass the essayist tends to be underrated in relation to Grass the popular novelist, who continues to be the main focus of critical attention. More than mere political or theoretical footnotes to his main oeuvre, Grass’ essays constitute a complex genre in their own right. With their formal qualities and varied content, these essays still await critical discovery.

SIGRID MAYER

Biography

Günter Wilhelm Grass. Born 16 October 1927 in Danzig (now Gdańsk, Poland). Studied at the Volksschule and Gymnasium, Danzig; Academy of Art, Düsseldorf, 1948–52; State Academy of Fine Arts, Berlin, 1953–55; also trained as a stone mason and sculptor. Prisoner of war during World War II. Married Anna Margareta Schwarz, 1954 (divorced, 1978): one daughter and three sons. Held various jobs; speechwriter for Willy Brandt when he was Mayor of West Berlin. Coeditor, L, from 1976, and Verlag L ‘80 publishers, from 1980. Married Ute Grunert, 1979. Awards: many, including Gruppe 47 Prize, 1958; Critics' Prize (Germany), 1960; Foreign Book Prize (France), 1962; Büchner Prize, 1965; Fontane Prize, 1968; Heuss Prize, 1969; Mondello Prize (Palermo), 1977; Carl von Ossiersky Medal, 1977; Viareggio-Versilia Prize, 1978; Majakowski Medal, 1978; Feltrinelli Prize, 1982; Leonhard Frank Ring, 1988; honorary degrees from three colleges and universities. Member, 1963, and President, 1983–86 (resigned), Berlin Academy of Art.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Über das Selbstverständliche: Reden, Aufsätze, Offene Briefe, Kommentare, 1968; revised and enlarged edition, as Über das Selbstverständliche: Politische Schriften, 1969; as Speak Out! Speeches, Open Letters, Commentaries, translated by Ralph Manheim and others, 1969

Dokumente zur politischen Wirkung, edited by Heinz Ludwig Arnold and Franz Josef Görtz, 1971

Der Bürger und seine Stimme: Reden-Aufsätze-Kommentare, 1974

Denkzettel: Politische Reden und Aufsätze, 1965–76, 1978

Aufsätze zur Literatur, 1980

Widerstand lernen: Politische Gegenreden, 1980–1983, 1984

On Writing and Politics, 1967–1983, translated by Ralph Manheim, 1985

Deutscher Lastenausgleich: Wider das dumpfe Einheitsgebot: Reden und Gespräche, 1990

Ein Schnäppchen namens DDR, letzte Reden vorm Glockengeläut, 1990

Gegen die verstreichende Zeit: Reden, Aufsätze und Gespräche, 1989–1991, 1991

Cat and Mouse and Other Writings, edited by A. Leslie Willson (includes "The Ballerina," translated by Willson, and speeches), 1994

Die Deutschen und ihre Dichter, edited by Daniela Hermes, 1995

Other writings: many novels (including Die Blechtrommel [The Tin Drum], 1959; Katz und Maus [Cat and Mouse], 1961; Hundejahre [Dog Years], 1963; Aus dem Tagebuch einer Schnecke [From the Diary of a Snail], 1972; Der Butt [The Flounder], 1977; Das Treffen in Telgte [The Meeting at Telgte], 1979; Kopfgeburten; oder die Deutschen sterben aus [Headbirths; or, The Germans Are Dying Out], 1980; Die Rätin [The Rat], 1986; Unkenrufe [The Call of the Toad], 1992.; Ein weites Feld, 1995), eight plays, poetry, books on politics, and many collections of drawings and graphics.

Collected works edition: Werkausgabe, edited by Volker Neuhaus, 10 vols., 1987.

Bibliographies

Everett, George A., A Select Bibliography of Günter Grass (From 1956 to 1973), New York: Franklin, 1974

Görtz, Franz Josef, "Kommentierte Auswahl-Bibliographie," Text+ Kritik 1/1a (1978):175–99

Görtz, Franz Josef, "Bibliographie," in Günter Grass: Auskunft für Leser, edited by Görtz, Darmstadt and Neuwied: Luchterhand, 1984:297–310

O'Neill, Patrick, Günter Grass: A Bibliography, 1955–1975, Toronto:University of Toronto Press, 1976

Further Reading

- Arnold, Heinz Ludwig, editor, Text+Kritik issue on Grass, 1/1a (1978)
- Ascherson, Neal, "Raw Nerves" (review of Speak Out! by Grass), New York Review of Books, 20 November 1969:16–21
- Brady, Philip, Timothy McFarland, and John L. White, editors, Günter Grass' "Der Butt": Sexual Politics and the Male Myth of History, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1990
- Casanova, Nicole, Günter Grass: Atelier des métamorphoses, Paris: Belfond, 1979
- Görtz, Franz Josef, editor, Günter Grass: Auskunft für Leser, Darmstadt and Neuwied: Luchterhand, 1984
- Hayman, Ronald, Günter Grass, London and New York: Methuen, 1985
- Hollington, Michael, Günter Grass: The Writer in a Pluralist Society, London and New York: Marion Boyars, 1980
- Labrousse, Gerd, and Dick Van Stekelenburg, editors, Günter Grass: Ein Europäischer Autor?, Amsterdam and Atlanta: Rodopi, 1992
- Lawson, Richard H., Günter Grass, New York: Ungar, 1985
- Leonhard, Irene, Günter Grass, New York: Barnes and Noble, 1974
- Mason, Ann L., The Skeptical Muse: A Study of Günter Grass' Conception of the Artist, Berne: Lang, 1974
- Mews, Siegfried, editor, "The Fisherman and His Wife": Günter Grass' "The Flounder" in Critical Perspective, New York: AMS Press, 1983
- Miles, Keith, Günter Grass, London: Vision Press, and New York: Barnes and Noble, 1975
- O'Neill, Patrick, editor, Critical Essays on Günter Grass, Boston: Hall, 1987
- Osterle, Heinz D., "An Orwellian Decade? Günter Grass Between Despair and Hope (with a Campaign Speech of 1983)," German Studies Review 8, no. 3 (October 1985):481–507
- Reddick, John, The "Danzig Trilogy" of Günter Grass, London: Secker and Warburg, and New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1975
- Tank, Kurt Lothar, Günter Grass, New York: Ungar, 1969 (original German edition, 1965)
- Updike, John, "Snail on the Stump," New Yorker, 15 October 1973:182–85
- Vormweg, Heinrich, Günter Grass mit Selbstzeugnissen und Bilddokumenten, Reinbek: Rowohlt, 1986
- Willson, Leslie A., editor, A Günter Grass Symposium, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1971

Green, Dorothy

Australian, 1915–1991

Dorothy Green was an intense speaker and writer. This quality arose from a strong

Christian faith which assured her that human life has meaning and that all human beings deserve a justice their rulers deny them. Her insistent belief that ordinary people “are still better than their culture” supported her optimism that they will eventually realize the minimum demand of justice—that none should go hungry in a world with technology already supplying commodities beyond any demand—and her anger at the system that devotes this technology to greed and aggression and at the individuals who choose to use their intellect to serve this system.

Green, who in her earlier years was better known by her birth name as the poet Dorothy Auchterlonie, began her writing career while a student at the University of Sydney where, as editor of the journal Hermes, she published an editorial essay, “People, Politics, and ‘Poetry’” (1938). The separate words in the title identify the issues that were to remain central to her concerns throughout her life, and their juxtaposition explains her moral passion. Poetry, and literature in general, were, for Green, a means of identifying and clarifying human relationships, and her criticism is merciless in its condemnation of pretension in content and falsity in form. Hence in 1944, writing about the “Ern Malley” hoax (in which editor Max Harris mistook as real some spoof poetry written by two well-known Australian poets and published it in the avant-garde journal Angry Penguins) Green recognized the intellectual arrogance—which prevented Harris attending to either the opinions of others or the rhythms of the words presented to him—that led to his humiliation. More than a quarter of a century later, she was equally perspicacious in her identification of the flight from reason of many of the counterrevolutionary poets collected in Thomas Shapcott’s 1969 anthology Australian Poetry Now, and later of the way the commodification of literature in Colleen McCullough’s The Thorn Birds (1977) degrades the capacity for human feeling. Yet her feeling for the positive forces of life, which gave impetus to her condemnations of the shoddy, also enabled her to find virtue in works that she knew were deeply flawed. So, her review of Germaine Greer’s book on women painters, The Obstacle Race (1979), condemns the polemic that separates women as victims from men as oppressors, yet finds in the book reason to hope that women may lead the way toward William Morris’ ideal of a world where art is “a necessity of human life, common to the whole people.”

The greater number of Green’s essays were reviews, which take the form, when she is dealing with writers she admired, of a penetrating scrutiny of the work in question and a passionate engagement with readers to convince them of the importance of recognizing its truth. She shared with Judith Wright the belief that the core of morality was to be found in the wholeness of humans and nature, and that evil was what defaced or deformed either. She shared with Martin Boyd, to whose writing she brought discriminating praise, the belief that the custodians of this value were artists and aristocrats, for whom the world was to be enjoyed and praised, not exploited for material gain or delivered to the dealers of death. The religion that supported these beliefs, although formally orthodox, was in no way narrowly sectarian. She accepted the many paths to God, including the Buddhism of Robert Gray’s poetry as much as the secular humanism of Christina Stead. Yet she was intolerant of the easy acceptance of any universal ideal that denied difference and division, particularly the notions that all is permitted in a fallen world, or that humans do not have to wrestle with the divisions brought about by this fall.

The search for a wholeness that would transcend division without denying it accounts for Green's interest in the biologist, anthropologist, and novelist Grant Watson, whose letters she edited and whose work she discussed in an important essay, "The Daimon and the Fringe-Dweller" (1971). In analyzing Watson's work, Green reveals her own understanding of the mysteries of existence. The English-born Watson spent only two years in Australia, but the relations between its people and its landscape provided the theme for six of his ten novels. The fringe-dwellers of the essay's title are those who move out from civilization to pursue their demons to the true center, the land where nature communicates through the senses an understanding of life that moves beyond the merely human. This understanding, which Green likens to Hindu and Chinese thought and to the way of being of the Aborigines, brings the spiritual, the biological, and the cultural into harmony. Green contrasts it with the exploitative modes of Western rationalism, which subjugate both women and the land to the masculine drive to dominate and possess. In this desire Green locates the divisions between individuals and nations alike.

Green's distrust of isolated intellectualism did not, however, mean any elevation of feeling over thought, or any romantic illusions about the innate wisdom of untutored sensibility. As she says in her essay (originally a lecture) "The Place of Literature in Society" (1986), the illiterate could exist happily only in societies where there was no pressure of population on resources. In the contemporary world, bondage to nature means misery, and the absence of public discourse means bondage to those who control the economic forces. Literature, "humanity thinking aloud," is the "great continuous discussion throughout the ages and across the world" that provides the insights into the human condition which alone can offer us the hope of freedom.

In her essay on A.G.Stephens, Green remarks that he fails the final test of a critic—the ability to develop his particular insights into a continuous argument. Green herself passes this test triumphantly. Her moral concerns are consistent from her earliest work, but develop as her understanding of the complexity of the human predicament develops to take account of the social origins of individualism, of the divisions of the self, and of the persistent and pernicious effects of power and greed. At the same time, the content of her essays provides an analysis of the developing responses of Australian writers to their environment. Her essays on A.H.Davis and Louis Stone identify the precise nature of their Australian experience, while those on Patrick White demonstrate how he uses this experience to contribute to world literature. All of this is accomplished with wit and a breadth of knowledge that places the immediate in the context of the universal, represented by the touchstones of Shakespeare, Milton, George Eliot, and Tolstoi.

Green will probably be remembered mainly as a poet and critic, but her essays are integral to her work, and contain the craftsmanship, the sharp-eyed insight into human nature and human folly, and the passionate concern for our relation to ourselves and to nature, that marks all of her writing.

JOHN MCLAREN

Biography

Born Dorothy Auchterlonie, 28 May 1915 in Sunderland, County Durham, England. Studied at the University of Sydney, B.A., 1938, M.A., 1940. Worked as a broadcaster, journalist, and news editor, Australian Broadcasting Corporation, 1942–49. Married H.M. Green, 1944 (died, 1962): one daughter and one son. Teacher and coprincipal at a girls' school, Warwick, Queensland, 1955–60; lecturer in English, Monash University, Melbourne, 1960–63, Australian National University, Canberra, 1964–72, and the Royal Military College, Duntroon, 1976–80. Awards: James Cook University Literary Award, 1973; Barbara Ramsden Award, for Ulysses Bound, 1973; honorary degree from the University of New South Wales. Medal, Order of Australia, 1984, and Officer, Order of Australia, 1988. Died in Canberra, 21 February 1991.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

The Music of Love: Critical Essays on Literature and Life, 1984

The Writer, the Reader and the Critic in a Monoculture (lectures), 1986; enlarged edition, as Writer, Reader, Critic, 1990

Other writings: poetry (as Dorothy Auchterlonie) and the critical study Ulysses Bound (1973). Also revised her husband H.M. Green's History of Australian Literature (1985).

Further Reading

Dowse, Sara, "In the Nature of a Prophet: Sara Dowse Profiles Dorothy Green," Australian Society 9, no. 2 (1990):18–21

Southerly issue on Green, 50, no. 3 (1990), particularly "The Work of Dorothy Green" by Elizabeth Perkins: 279–93

Greene, Graham

British, 1904–1991

Although he failed to win the Nobel Prize for Literature despite his great achievement with over two dozen novels, four collections of short stories, four volumes of travel writing, and eight plays, Graham Greene nevertheless also made his mark in the essay genre with several volumes: British Dramatists (1942), The Lost Childhood and Other Essays (1951), Collected Essays (1969), The Pleasure-Dome (1972), and Reflections (1990). His essays were published in a wide variety of British periodicals, including the New Statesman, the Spectator, Night and Day, the Listener, the Observer, and the Sunday

Times.

Greene's serious work as an essayist (he had written some film criticism as an undergraduate at Oxford) began in 1935 with movie reviews for the Spectator, to which he contributed over 400 reviews in the next four and a half years. In these reviews (over 300 of them published in The Pleasure-Dome, and a selection more recently in Mornings in the Dark, 1993) Greene analyzed most of the major films of the time—Anthony Adverse, Beau Geste, Crime and Punishment, Goodbye Mr. Chips, Intermezzo, Trail of the Lonesome Pine, for example—and the work of major actors, actresses, and directors from Frank Capra, Katharine Hepburn, and Laurence Olivier to Laurel and Hardy, the Marx Brothers, and W.C.Fields. In one instance, his review (in Night and Day, October 1937) gave him a great deal of legal trouble when he libeled Shirley Temple and her performance in Wee Willie Winkle; the subsequent suit forced him to flee to Mexico for a time.

As Norman Sherry (1989), his biographer, has written, “Greene’s long fascination with the cinema aroused in him extremes of emotional response and a deeply critical attitude toward films, their makers, and those who appeared in them.” He found a good deal wrong with the films of the 1930s because of their sensationalism in publicity and their falseness to life. All too often, he felt, film failed because it did not fulfill that which should be its object: “the translation of thought back into images.”

British Dramatists is an essay of 48 pages written at sea in December 1941, while Greene was on his way to Africa to serve as a spy for the British Secret Service. In the essay he finds the genesis of British drama in the ritual of the Roman Catholic Church, surveys the theater from the mystery plays down to Noël Coward and Somerset Maugham, and suggests that the theater casts its spell because “the ritual is there—the magic.” His comments on Shakespeare are particularly striking for their insights into the playwright’s verbal power.

Greene’s best work as an essayist is found in Collected Essays, which contains 75 essays written and published over a period of three decades, 39 of them having previously been published in The Lost Childhood and Other Essays. Greene wrote in his note to Collected Essays that in making his selections for the volume, “I have made it a principle to include nothing of which I can say that, if I were writing today, I would write in a different sense. The principle applies as much to my hatreds as to my loves... A man should be judged by his enmities as well as by his friendships.”

The collected essays cover a wide range of topics from the influence of childhood reading to his wartime experiences in Sierra Leone to literature and writers. Among the many writers he deals with are Fielding, Stern, Dickens, Henry James, Ford Madox Ford, G.K.Chesterton, François Mauriac, Edgar Wallace, Beatrix Potter, Anthony à Wood, John Evelyn, Charles Churchill, Francis Parkman, Simone Weil, and George Moore.

Reflections, a final collection of essays selected by Judith Adamson, ranges in time from 1923 (“Impressions of Dublin”) to 1988 (“Out of the Dustbin”) and covers a wide range of topics: criticism, the Russian-Finnish War, the papacy, IndoChina, Catholicism, Adlai Stevenson, secondhand bookstores, Chile, Jorge Luis Borges, Cuba, and Papa Doc Duvalier. Like his other essays, these pieces are lively, highly personal, often controversial, and stylistically polished. Many had their genesis in Greene’s travels as a journalist and later served as quarries for his novels. As Adamson says in her introduction, they let us “see what reality looked like before it was transformed into a unique vision of the world.”

Perhaps Greene’s most enduring essays are those concerning literature. In his brilliant essays on Henry James, for example, Greene’s admiration of James and the influence of James on Greene’s fiction are obvious. In “Henry James: The Private Universe” (1936), “Henry James: The Religious Aspect” (1933), “The Plays of Henry James” (1950), and “The Lesson of the Master” (1951), he praises the writer for his treatment of the struggle between good and evil, his deft handling of point of view and style, and his poetic imagination. His essays on Dickens, Fielding, Sterne, Mauriac, Chesterton, Ford, and Moore are also significant contributions to the history of the criticism of fiction.

Greene’s essays will never overshadow the distinguished achievement of his fiction, but they will continue to reveal a great deal about the workings of the mind of one of the most important British novelists of the 20th century.

ROBERT C. STEENSMA

Biography

Born 2 October 1904 in Berkhamsted, Hertfordshire. Studied at Balliol College, Oxford, B.A., 1925. Joined the Roman Catholic Church, 1926. Subeditor, the Times, London, 1926–30. Married Vivien Dayrell-Browning (later separated), 1927: one son and one daughter. Fiction editor, 1932–35, film critic, 1937–40, and literary editor, 1940–41, the Spectator, London. Worked as a spy for the British Secret Service during World War II. Director, Eyre and Spottiswoode publishers, London, 1944–48, and Bodley Head publishers, London, 1958–68. Contributor to many journals and magazines, including Life, New Republic, Saturday Evening Post, Esquire, Atlantic Monthly, and the London Mercury. Traveled widely. Lived in Antibes, on the French Riviera, from 1966. Awards: many, including the Hawthornden prize, 1941; James Tait Black Memorial Prize, 1949; Thomas More Medal, 1973; Dos Passos Prize, 1980; Jerusalem Prize, 1981; honorary degrees from four universities. Honorary Fellow, Balliol College, 1963; Honorary Citizen, Anacapri, 1978; Companion of Honor, 1966; Chevalier, Legion of Honor (France), 1967; Grand Cross, Order of Balboa (Panama), 1983; Commandant, Order of Arts and Letters (France), 1984; Companion of Literature, Royal Society of Literature, 1984; Order of Merit, 1986. Died in Geneva, 3 April 1991.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

British Dramatists, 1942

The Lost Childhood and Other Essays, 1951

Essais catholiques, part translated into French by Marcelle Sibon, 1953

Collected Essays, 1969

The Pleasure-Dome: The Collected Film Criticism, 1935–1940, edited by John Russell Taylor, 1972; as Greene on Film: Collected Film Criticism, 1935–1940, 1972

Reflections, 1923–1988, edited by Judith Adamson, 1990

Mornings in the Dark: The Graham Greene Film Reader, edited by David Parkinson, 1993; as The Graham Greene Film Reader: Reviews, Essays, Interviews, and Film Stories, 1994

Other writings: 28 novels (including Brighton Rock, 1938; The Power and the Glory, 1940; The Heart of the Matter, 1948; The Third Man, 1950; The End of the Affair, 1951; The Quiet American, 1955; Our Man in Havana, 1958; The Comedians, 1966; Travels with My Aunt, 1969; The Honorary Consul, 1973; Monsignor Quixote, 1982), four volumes of short stories, eight plays, travel books, autobiography, and books for children.

Collected works edition: Graham Greene: The Collected Edition, 1970– (in progress).

Bibliographies

Cassis, A.F., Graham Greene: An Annotated Bibliography of Criticism, Metuchen, New Jersey: Scarecrow Press, 1981

Vann, J.D., Graham Greene: A Checklist of Criticism, Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 1970

Wobbe, R.A., Graham Greene: A Bibliography and Guide to Research, New York: Garland, 1979

Further Reading

Davis, Elizabeth, Graham Greene: The Artist as Critic, Fredericton, New Brunswick: York Press, 1984

De Vitis, A.A., Graham Greene, Boston: Twayne, revised edition, 1986

Shelden, Michael, Graham Greene: The Enemy Within, New York: Random House, and London: Heinemann, 1994

Sherry, Norman, The Life of Graham Greene, New York: Viking, and London: Cape, 2 vols., 1989–94 (in progress)

Stratford, Philip, Faith and Fiction: Creative Process in Greene and Mauriac, Notre Dame, Indiana: University of Notre Dame Press, 1964: Chapter 5

Die Grenzboten

German journal, 1841–1922

The weekly journal Die Grenzboten (Dispatches from the border) was published between 1841 and 1922. During the period between 1848 and 1857 it was edited primarily by Julian Schmidt and Gustav Freytag. Little has been written about this period of GB, though it deserves attention since the journal figured prominently in formulating the aesthetic and cultural characteristics of German literature and art. Although the post-1857 period of the journal was increasingly aligned with the right, during Schmidt and Freytag's tenure GB reflects its editors' moderate liberalism. Further, GB addressed the formative political events of the time—from the failed Frankfurt Revolution of 1848 to the end of the reign of Prussian King Friedrich Wilhelm IV in 1857. Discussions of literature and culture in the Leipzig periodical were characterized by the editors' desire to forge a common German cultural heritage, a necessity, they believed, if a politically united German state was to be formed.

GB was directed toward educated, middle-class citizens, a group whose numbers steadily increased in the 19th century. Circulation during this period was about 1000 (Joachim Kirchner, 1962). As the subtitle of the journal—"Zeitschrift für Politik und Literatur"—suggests, politics and literature were central concerns. Essays and articles on political and historical issues were the primary forms of writing in GB. Discussions of aesthetics and reviews of specific literary works accounted for the journal's literary component, although occasionally original literature appeared. Particularly in the first two years of Schmidt and Freytag's joint editorship, each approximately 40-page issue was devoted to essays concerning Prussia's and Austria's relationship to the eastern border states, the hegemony of Prussia, and the stirrings of the southern German states. Articles condemned both the more radical German parties which led the Revolution in March 1848 and the threat to individual liberties posed by the right.

Forces of the Prussian government ended the Frankfurt Assembly's attempts to demilitarize Prussia and limit the power of the nobility; supporters of the Assembly throughout the country were suppressed and even executed. Nonetheless, the re-establishment of the pre-1848 order was generally welcomed by GB. On the first page of the January 1849 issue of GB the editors condemned the "chaos" of the revolution and welcomed the imposition of order and the hope it offered of a unified Germany. Schmidt and Freytag supported a loosely (politically) unified Germany under the leadership of Prussia.

Beginning in 1849 and 1850, the editors devoted a significant portion of each issue to literature, and, to a lesser extent, the plastic arts and music. Freytag, who was himself a novelist, is best known for his contributions to conceptions of German drama. Essays in GB concerning dramatic form reflect his rule-based aesthetic and desire for sharply drawn unities, heroism, strong characters, and emphasis on plot development. However, it was Schmidt, the writer of the five-volume Geschichte der deutschen Literatur von Leibniz bis auf unsere Zeit (1886–96; History of German literature from Leibniz to the present), who was most responsible for the periodical's attempt to delineate and create a national German culture in order to reinforce the development of political unity.

The editors' political and aesthetic emphases led to the focus on works of historical literature; discussions of the role of museums, dictionaries, and fairytale collections; and increasing interest in "Volkskunde" or folklore. Romanticism and the works of writers such as E.T.A. Hoffmann and Ludwig Tieck were criticized as dangerously subjective and fantastic. Even Heinrich von Kleist, Georg Büchner, and Friedrich Hölderlin were censured for their attempts to portray madness, a state, Schmidt wrote in a review of Büchner's oeuvre in 1851, that cannot and should not be portrayed through literature. Writers viewed favorably in GB include Jeremias Gotthelf and Adalbert Stifter, authors of novellas concerned with village life and local customs, and Otto Ludwig, whose dramas exemplified the editors' desire for an aesthetic of "poetic realism."

The editors of GB viewed themselves as supporting the democratic ideals and rationalism of the Enlightenment. Frequent articles on the press and censorship reflected the editors' belief in the need for a free press, and liberal conception of the rights of the individual. Featured essays represent an extraordinarily wide field, from articles on the role of the press in Austria to slavery and politics in the United States. In 1854 GB included essays on Prussia's relationship to the Netherlands, Richard Wagner's opera Lohengrin, and the construction of Das Neue Museum in Berlin. Frequent essays under the heading "Zur orientalischen Frage" (On the question of the East) focused on Austria's clash with many of the states within its empire. Articles concerning Austria, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Poland, and Turkey were written by various, often unidentified, correspondents. Ignaz Kuranda, the founder of GB in 1841, was responsible for GB's focus on Belgium in the first years of the journal; Schmidt and Freytag shifted the emphasis to Prussia and the eastern border states.

Formulation of cultural and national identities becomes more pronounced in the later years of Schmidt and Freytag's tenure. Goethe and Schiller were especially lionized and sections entitled "Kulturbilder" (cultural images) and "Bilder aus der deutschen Vergangenheit" (images from the German past) were inaugurated, addressing everything from the book trade in Leipzig to the piety of 16th-century German mercenaries. Literature of ancient Greece and Rome as well as essays concerning the politics and culture of both were advanced as exemplary models from which Germans could learn.

CHRISTOPHER P. MCCLINTICK

Further Reading

- Elster, Hanns Martin, "Die Grenzboten: Zeitschrift für Politik, Literatur und Kunst," in Hundert Jahre Verlag F.W.Grunow, 1818–1919, Leipzig, 1919:59–74
- Grunow, Johannes, "Fünzig Jahre!," Grenzboten 40, no. 4 (1891)
- Kirchner, Joachim, Das deutsche Zeitschriftenwesen, seine Geschichte und seine Probleme, vol. 2, Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz, 1962:137–38
- Leppla, Rupprecht, "Julian Schmidt (1818–1886)," Gustav-FreytagBlätter 13, no. 27 (1968):11–14

Grimm, Herman

German, 1828–1901

Herman Friedrich Grimm was the second son of Wilhelm, the younger of the famous Grimm Brothers. He grew up in a world of profuse learning, which comprised both the traditional "philological" disciplines and the sciences of the naturalist, and which valued exacting rigor as much as the inventiveness of the poetic imagination. He was introduced early in life to prominent public figures whose patriotism expressed itself in a commitment to civic welfare and to the ideals of constitutional liberalism. Grimm's education under the guidance of a private tutor, Leopold von Ranke, was free of coercion. Subsequent studies at the reform Universities of Berlin and Bonn seem to have destined him for a career in law and diplomacy. He chose literature instead, but became increasingly frustrated when his poems and plays (conventional historical dramas and social comedies) and a three-volume “conversational novel” Unüberwindliche Mächte (1867; Unvanquishable powers) proved to be less than successful. His solution to this dilemma was an extended trip in 1857 to the venues of Italian classical and Renaissance culture, from which he returned with an abiding interest in art history. He also brought back enough material for a biography of Michelangelo, the factual and intuitive description of how a great genius lived as a dominating force “in the history and culture of his time, the efflorescence of art in Florence and Rome.” It both exemplified a new vision of the artist as a heroic creator of his age, and developed a new style of making that artist comprehensible to an appreciative posterity—that of the artistic essay.

It is not quite accurate historically to credit Grimm with introducing the term “essay” into the German literary vocabulary and to single him out as the first major practitioner of this new “short” form of nonfictional prose. In this respect Novalis and Friedrich Schlegel had preceded him by some 60 years. But he created a new style of essay writing, and he was the person most instrumental in gaining popular acceptance for a genre that, in contrast to the erudite study, the academic disquisition, or the empirical analysis, could capture a different spirit of inquiry and incorporate a changing attitude toward learning, insight, and information. Acknowledging his debt to the inspirational example of Ralph Waldo Emerson, to whom he had dedicated his first collection of II Essays (1859) “with cordial admiration,” he states retrospectively in 1890 that “the real essay nowadays has to deal with something generally understandable and do so quickly, fluently, and as a sequence of individually focused insights,” which have emerged from many-sided investigations “as suggestive samplings rather than in their all-inclusive completeness.” Each particular essay, as one chapter in the accumulating variety of the ideal book, is also like “a summarizing preface to an unwritten book.” Grimm’s style of controlled improvisation—open, associative, digressing, and without firm conclusions—made him an influential mediator in the cultural sphere of his generation. It is a way of writing that is altogether consonant with the aestheticism that dominated the world view of Germany’s upper bourgeoisie in the era of Bismarck. This philosophy of culture, and indeed this perception of life as culture, cherished the great art of the past as representative of a higher realm of timeless values—separate from everyday existence, grandiosely independent of sociopolitical pressures, immune from forces outside their own compass. The freedom this art exemplifies is freedom from pragmatic obligations, especially from those of party politics. Against the partiality of arguments advanced in favor of special interests, the retreat into art led to an almost abstract idealism. An aesthetic orientation of this kind complemented an optimistic faith in progress with stability, in the preservation of privileges and hierarchies, in the benevolent but firm execution of power. It did not encourage the development of a modern political will or create opportunities for the exercise of civil rights. Instead, it reserved the realm of liberating enterprise to the free play of artistic creativity and its congenial contemplation. Thus the masterworks of the visual arts and literature incorporate the eternal verities that a secularized consciousness no longer found in religious truth. Such works are valuable in their own right and exist for no other but their own sake, devoid of alien purpose and ultimately inexplicable. The “new” essay is their perfect messenger: as literary art it is there for the sake of literature and art. It is a product of the empathic inspiration.

For Grimm all of this meant an obligation to preserve the cultural heritage of classicist humanism that he found personified, so far as the German people’s “national creative imagination” is concerned, in Goethe. More even than his three other “ideal figures”—Homer, Raphael, and Michelangelo—he used the Weimar Olympian to illustrate how genius works as a historical force. He returned to Goethe at all stages of his life, in a large variety of essays and most notably in the 25 lectures he gave in 1874–75 (published as Goethe in 1876–77) as the first professor of aesthetics and modern art history at a German university, that of Berlin. It is both the rich life of the exceptional individual and his widely productive impact on his age and on posterity that inspired Grimm’s admiring, even worshipful, and indeed mythicizing attitude. His style of presentation, committed though it is to making complicated vital processes understandable, does not sacrifice subtlety. On the contrary, his lectures are crafted so carefully as to be spoken essays. Grimm assimilated the characteristic features of Goethe’s own language as an expression of continuity through legitimate stewardship. His emphatic concern is with an everdeveloping life and with the time upon which it has left its imprint; therefore he pays scant attention to the analysis of specific works or characters or to the creative transformation by which life is changed into art.

Rather, Grimm seeks to re-create the ambience of openminded sociability and cosmopolitan liberality that he knows to be an ideal construct, even as he imbues it with a discreet personal flavor. In other words, it is his own experiences and insights that bridge historical distances and societal differences. They also stimulate an interchange between the things to be apprehended and the reader’s own subjectivity through which they are being refracted. This approach runs counter to the spirit of the Critical and Historical Essays (1843) of Thomas Babington Macaulay. Grimm expressed admiration for them, to be sure, but he criticized their author for letting his material (rather than his opinions of it) direct and dominate the discussion. Thus Grimm’s affinity is more with Matthew Arnold and Emerson. The latter especially he praised as a contemplative observer who “sees in every thing the direct line that connects it with the center of life” (1861, in the essay on Emerson that is included in Neue Essays of 1865).

Grimm published his essays discriminately in the leading conservative periodicals—Menzel’s Literaturblatt (Literary page), Vossische Zeitung (Voss’ newspaper), Haym’s Preussische Jahrbücher (Prussian yearbooks), Julius Rodenberg’s Deutsche Rundschau (German review)—or as introductions to books he liked. He then collected his work with almost predictable regularity and, from 1874, in an unchanging format. That year his Neue Essays über Kunst und Literatur (1865; New essays on art and literature) appeared in an augmented edition of some 500 pages under the title of Fünfzehn Essays (Fifteen essays). Three more collections (1875, 1882, 1890) of 15 essays followed, and finally three volumes of Fragmente (1900 and 1902). Each single book is so arranged as to form a variegated entity of complementary segments and is in turn expanded in the manner of concentric circles by its subsequent companion pieces. When taken all together, they form what Klaus Günther Just (in Von der Gründerzeit bis zur Gegenwart, 1973) has called an “essayistic cosmos in miniature.”

The collection of 1874 can serve as a typical example of how one part of this harmonious order was put together. Its table of contents lists essays on Voltaire, Frederick the Great and Macaulay, Goethe in Italy, Schiller and Goethe, Goethe and his Elective Affinities, Goethe and Suleika (i.e. his beloved Marianne von Willemer, who had befriended Grimm late in life), Goethe and Luise Seidler, Heinrich von Kleist's burial place, Lord Byron and Leigh Hunt, Alexander von Humboldt, Schleiermacher (a review of Dilthey's unfinished book), Herr von Varnhagen's diaries, (the literary historian) Georg Gervinus, Dante and the latest struggles in Italy, Ralph Waldo Emerson. Grimm presents these personages as topics in the manner of a Socratic conversation in which he himself slips into many roles and tries out any number of perspectives feigning objections, comparing, introducing private recollections, quoting with approval and reserve, embellishing his thoughts with metaphorical flourishes and imagined confessions, shifting from sensual immediacy to theoretical reasoning and interpretive summary. Always, however, he comes back to his personal opinions, sometimes casually, later on more sententiously and with the phrases of conventional wisdom.

Grimm abhorred the pedantry of historicist positivism which defined the professional ethic of his academic colleagues. But his own epigonic conservatism and his lack of interest in the living arts of his time had become a serious liability by the 1880s. More and more he wrote necrologies and commemorative appreciations (including reflections on statues and tombs), conceding that he had run out of worthy subjects and finding it difficult to enter into any current debate with his earlier enthusiastic devotion. Time had overtaken him—but not forever. During the 1940s he was rediscovered by those educated burghers who sought refuge from barbarism once again in the refined consolations of their classicist heritage.

MICHAEL WINKLER

Biography

Born 6 January 1828 in Kassel. Tutored privately by Leopold von Ranke; studied law and philology at the Universities of Berlin and Bonn. Married Gisela von Arnim, 1870. Professor of the history of modern art, University of Berlin, from 1873. Awards: honorary degree from Harvard University. Died in Berlin, 16 June 1901.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Essays, 1859

Die Venus von Milo; Rafael und Michel Angelo, 1864; first essay as The Venus of Milo, translated by Alice M.Hawes, 1868

Neue Essays über Kunst und Literatur, 1865; enlarged edition, as Fünfzehn Essays: Erste Folge, 1874

Zehn ausgewählte Essays zur Einführung in das Studium der neueren Kunst, 1871; revised edition, 1883

Fünfzehn Essays: Neue Folge, 1875

Goethe, 2 vols., 1876–77; edited by Wilhelm Hansen, 1948; as Das Leben Goethes, edited by Reinhard Buchwald, 1939; as The Life and Times of Goethe, translated by Sarah Holland Adams, 1880

Fünfzehn Essays: Dritte Folge, 1882

Essays on Literature, translated by Sarah Holland Adams, 1885; as Literature, 1886

Fünfzehn Essays: Vierte Folge: Aus den letzten fünf Jahren, 1890

Beiträge zur deutschen Culturgeschichte, 1897

Fragmente, 3 vols., 1900–02

Aufsätze zur Kunst, edited by Reinhold Steig, 1915

Aufsätze zur Literatur, edited by Reinhold Steig, 1915

Deutsche Künstler: Sieben Essays, edited by Reinhold Buchwald, 1942

Essays, edited by Rolf Welz, 1964

Other writings: plays, poetry, a novel, biographies of Michelangelo (1860–63) and Raphael (1886), and correspondence (including with Ralph Waldo Emerson).

Further Reading

Berger, Bruno, Der Essay: Form und Geschichte, Berne: Francke, 1964

Haas, Gerhard, Essay, Stuttgart: Metzler, 1969

Hiebel, Friedrich, “Ralph Waldo Emerson und Herman Grimm,” in his Biographik und Essayistik: Zur Geschichte der schönen Wissenschaften, Berne and Munich: Francke, 1970:97–120

Jenkel, Gertrud, Herman Grimm als Essayist (dissertation), Hamburg: University of Hamburg, 1948

Rohner, Ludwig, Der deutsche Essay: Materialien zur Geschichte und Ästhetik einer literarischen Gattung, Neuwied and Berlin: Luchterhand, 1966

Strasser, René, Herman Grimm: Zum Problem des Klassizismus, Zurich: Atlantis, 1972

Groulx, Lionel

French Canadian, 1878–1967

A pioneer in many fields—historian, professor, lecturer, orator, preacher, storyteller, novelist, journalist, polemicist, essayist—Father (l'Abbé), later Canon, Lionel Groulx was the most influential, controversial French Canadian intellectual in the first half, if not two-thirds, of the 20th century. As Susan Trofimenkoff explains (1973), “He developed François-Xavier Garneau’s view of the Conquest as a disaster and his idea of history as a struggle by examining the post-Conquest period.” Thirty years after his death, books and articles are still published about his conception of State, Church, history, language and culture, and politics. Was he a racist because he wrote the novel L'Appel de la race (1922; The Iron Wedge)? Was he a Quebec separatist or a French Canadian nationalist? A democrat, monarchist, or fascist? Everyone knows his or her own particular Groulx, whose name has been given to a mountain, a subway station, streets, colleges, and other institutions. He had a large audience (of both friends and opponents); his folk sketches and souvenirs of “old days, old ways,” Les Rapailages (1916; Haycocks), was a bestseller.

There is no doubt that he was a conservative, traditional, right-wing citizen and historian. But he was also a dynamic, youthful, imaginative man and writer, and above all, a freelance scholar, a free-spoken lecturer, an independent priest, and a committed man of action. Groulx was never a pure theoretician or researcher, but a well-documented erudite and popularizer of knowledge. Beginning with his first book, Une croisade d'adolescents (1912; A crusade of adolescents), he launched generations of young people on moral, spiritual, political, and patriotic crusades. Among his best-known disciples are Jean Drapeau, Montreal's longtime mayor, and André Laurendeau, Bloc Populaire's leader, Le Devoir (The duty) editor, and royal commissioner (on bilingualism and biculturalism in Canada, 1962).

A few of Groulx's students or readers became respected scholars. Michel Brunet, Guy Frégault, and Maurice Séguin built with and without their master a modern and complete history department at the University of Montreal. They were laymen, more scientific, methodical, and critical than Groulx. His devotion to religion, language, and culture is balanced by their interest in economics and social classes. This so-called Montreal School (in opposition to quiet Quebec City as well as to Ottawa or Toronto) was more radical and systematic than Groulx in political and national matters. If Groulx is the ancestor, this trio is the triple grandfather of the new nationalism that aims at Quebec sovereignty in or out of Canadian Federation.

Contrary to his reluctant followers, Groulx is more a generalist than a specialist (of modern French Canadian history). If not a true novelist—L'Appel de la race and Au Cap Blomidon (1932; At Cape Blomidon) are more propaganda than fiction—he is a vivid raconteur, a picturesque sketcher when he evokes old-timers, draws children, grandmothers, farmers, and craftsmen as well as explorers, missionaries, pioneers, and heroes. For him, time is closely knit to both individual and collective memory. The past is neither driver nor owner (men are not slaves); the past is not God, but one of His prophets. It is from this perspective that one should read Chez nos ancêtres (1920; Among our ancestors) and other ethnological essays, Notre maître, le passé (1924–44; Our master, the past) and other collections of portraits and edifying examples, La Découverte du Canada (1934; The discovery of Canada) and other epic poems in prose. Lionel Groulx himself is now passé, a part of history rather than an historian, but he is still living (in a kind of purgatory) as an essayist.

LAURENT MAILHOT

Biography

Lionel Adolphe Groulx. Born 13 January 1878 in Vaudreuil, Quebec. Studied classics at the seminary of Sainte-Thérèse-de-Blainville; theology in Montreal and Rome, D.Th., 1908; philosophy, literature, and history at the University of Fribourg, Switzerland, 1908–09. Ordained priest, 1903. Taught humanities at the Collège de Valleyfield, 1901–06, 1909–15; first chair in Canadian history, University of Montreal, 1915–49. Elected to the Royal Society of Canada, 1918. Lecturer or visiting professor at the Sorbonne and the Institut Catholique, Paris, and at schools in Lyons and Lille, 1931. Founding editor, L'Action Française, 1920–28; founder, the Institute of the History of French America, 1946, and editor of its journal Revue d'Histoire de l'Amérique Française, 1948–67; contributor to Le Devoir and L'Action Nationale. Awards: French Academy Prize, 1931; Tyrrell Medal, 1948; Duvernay Prize, 1952, Léo-Parizeau Medal, 1963; honorary degrees from four universities. Died in Montreal, 23 May 1967.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Une croisade d'adolescents, 1912

Les Rapailages (vieilles choses, vieilles gens), 1916

La Naissance d'une race, 1919

Chez nos ancêtres, 1920

Notre maître, le passé, 3 vols., 1924–44

Le Français au Canada, 1932

La Découverte du Canada: Jacques Cartier, 1934

Orientations, 1935

Directives, 1937

Pourquoi nous sommes divisés: Une réponse du chanoine Lionel Groulx, 1943; as Why We Are Divided: A Reply from Canon Lionel Groulx, translated by Gordon O.Rothney, 1943

L'Indépendance du Canada, 1949

Constantes de vie, 1967

Lionel Groulx (selections), edited by Benoît Lacroix, 1967

Abbé Groulx: Variations on a Nationalist Theme, edited by Susan Trofimenkoff, translated by Joanne L'Heureux, 1973

Other writings: two novels (L'Appel de la race [The Iron Wedge], 1922; Au Cap Blomidon, 1932), four volumes of Mémoires, several volumes of diaries, speeches, lectures, portraits, biographies, and letters, and important historical studies (including Nos luttes constitutionnelles, 1915–16; La Confédération canadienne, 1918; La Naissance d'une race, 1919; Lendemain de conquête, 1920; Vers l'émancipation, 1921; Histoire du Canada français depuis la découverte, 4 vols., 1950–52; Notre grande aventure: L'Empire français en Amérique du Nord, (1535–1760), 1958).

Bibliographies

Hamel, Reginald, John Hare, and Paul Wyczynski, Dictionnaire des auteurs de langue française en Amérique du Nord, Montreal: Fides, 1989

Lemire, Maurice, editor, Dictionnaire des œuvres littéraires du Québec, Montreal: Fides, 6 vols., 1978–94

Further Reading

- L'Action Nationale* issue on Groulx, 57, no. 10 (June 1968): 929–1115
- Asselin, Olivar, L'Œuvre de l'abbé Groulx, Montreal: Bibliothèque de l'Action Française, 1923
- Delisle, Esther, Le Traître et le Juif, Montreal: l'Étincelle, 1992
- Éthier-Blais, Jean, Le Siècle de l'abbé Groulx, Montreal: Leméac, 1993
- Filion, Maurice, editor, Hommage à Lionel Groulx, Montreal: Leméac, 1978
- Frégault, Guy, Lionel Groulx tel qu'en lui-même, Montreal: Leméac, 1978
- Gaboury, Jean-Pierre, Le Nationalisme de Lionel Groulx: Aspects idéologiques, Ottawa: Éditions de l'Université d'Ottawa, 1970
- Ricard, François, "Lionel Groulx/Action française/État français," Voix et Images 9 (1975):11–33
- Trofimenkoff, Susan, Introduction to Abbé Groulx: Variations on a Nationalist Theme by Groulx, edited and translated by Joanne L'Heureux and Trofimenkoff, Vancouver, Calgary, Toronto, and Montreal: Copp Clark, 1973
- Voix et Images* issue on Groulx, 19 (Autumn 1993)

Guicciardini, Francesco

Italian, 1483–1540

Francesco Guicciardini's fame rests on his statesmanship and his historical-political writings, namely the Storia fiorentina (The History of Florence), Dialogo del reggimento di Firenze (Dialogue on the Government of Florence), Ricordi politici e civili (Political and civil memoirs; translated as Maxims and Reflections), Considerazioni intorno ai Discorsi del Machiavelli (Considerations on Machiavelli's Discourses), and his masterpiece, Storia d'Italia (The History of Italy). His works also include many orations, discourses, memoirs, reports, and letters dealing with those problems of internal and foreign policy that he faced as an ambassador, political adviser, military leader, and governor in the service of the Florentine Republic, the Medici, and Popes Leo X, Adrian VI, and Clement VII. But the publication of Guicciardini's personal and political correspondence, of which 13 volumes have so far appeared, is still to be completed. The importance of Guicciardini's works lies in the fact that their author was the protagonist or observer of the events represented in their pages, and that he was personally acquainted with many figures peopling his narrative. His opinions are today still the most valuable commentary on a crucial period of Italian political history.

None of Guicciardini's works was published in his lifetime. Not until 1561, 21 years after his death, was The History of Italy published in Florence by one of his nephews. The first edition comprised only the first 16 books of the work; the next four were published separately in Venice in 1564. However, three centuries passed before the remainder of Guicciardini's works were published by Giuseppe Canestrini in ten volumes under the title of Opere inedite (1857–67; Unpublished works). After this edition, other minor works were discovered, the most important of which is the Cose fiorentine (Florentine affairs), published in 1945. The History of Italy met with success abroad shortly after the first Italian edition. In 1579 in London there appeared the first English translation by G.Fenton dedicated to Queen Elizabeth; two more editions were printed in 1599 and 1618; the last, and most remarkable, was by Sidney Alexander in 1969. By the end of the 16th century the History was also translated into French, Latin, Spanish, German, and Flemish.

Guicciardini was an aristocrat by birth and a lawyer by training, and his ambition was aided by a cold, lucid intelligence. He entered public life in 1512, when he was appointed ambassador to the court of Ferdinand the Catholic of Spain, where he resided for two years. When he organized the antiimperial League of Cognac and the military operations of the pontifical forces in 1526, Guicciardini became one of the important players in a crucial stage of Renaissance Italian history.

His writing was informed by the ideals of Florentine independence, freedom of Italy from foreign domination, opposition to both democratic extremism and tyrannical danger, and self-interest, the famous “particulare,” which made Guicciardini a man hard to like and drove forward his career at the expense of his principles. The History of Florence (wr. 1508–09) covers his city’s history from 1378 to 1509 and is distinguished by characteristics rare in a youthful work: a careful search for both facts and causation, mature and objective judgment, and a sharp depiction of historical characters. From the Dialogue on the Government of Florence (wr. 1525) emerges Guicciardini’s vision of the government of Florence based on the rule by the “ottimati,” the wise and reputable men, dictated by the author’s experience.

Maxims and Reflections is recognized as one of the outstanding documents of a time in crisis and transition and, like The History of Italy, has been translated into many languages. It is made up of two series of maxims and aphorisms, written between 1512 and 1528 and collected by Guicciardini in 1530, after the authorities of the last Florentine Republican had banished him from Florence. They distill the essence of his experience as a statesman in a realistic and disenchanted spirit, and offer an exceptional insight into the working of the minds and hearts of men in private life, politics, and society.

The Considerazioni intorno ai Discorsi del Machiavelli, also written during his banishment from Florence, reveals the author’s distinctive intellectual traits. Unlike his fellow citizen and sometime friend Niccolò Machiavelli, Guicciardini had no patience for theory. Machiavelli liked to move from general theory to the particular, Guicciardini from the particular to the general. He adhered to an empiricism that clipped the flight of the speculation that marks out Machiavelli’s writings, and refused to take examples from antiquity as models for contemporary behavior and action. Guicciardini taught that the living experience is everything and warned against using models of ancient historiography, especially Roman history, as standards of judgment and guides for making decisions and taking actions.

The pragmatism and the lesson of experience that pervade the Considerazioni are worked into the maze of events and figures that people The History of Italy, which covers the period from the death of Lorenzo il Magnifico in 1492 to that of Pope Clement VII in 1534. Discarding the method used by the humanists, Guicciardini achieved a breakthrough in the writing of history. The humanists' method neglected or used only a few primary sources, aiming instead at literary eloquence and elegance and at inspiring readers with the "correct" standards of thought and action. Guicciardini, an anti-rhetorician if ever there was one, wrote the history of a whole geographical unit, following the thread of many events, using all available histories and archival documents (including those of the Florentine Republic, which he brought home). Unlike humanistic history, which dealt with only one city or region of Italy, Guicciardini's History brings to life the entire world of the peninsula in its complexity and, through the repercussions of its politics abroad, also that of other countries. He dictated excerpts from documents to his scribe in chronological order, then fused and reshaped the material, placing in the margins his agreement or disagreement and adding information of his own and of others. His narration shows that moral virtues have nothing to do with political success or failure, but rather with the protagonists' response to the events that touch them and with the interactions of their passions. Individuals who act out of passion, prejudice, blindness, and insight are the sole agents of historical change. Guicciardini's method has produced the classic portrait of a country in decline, illustrating how the rulers of the Italian states had gradually been deprived of all control over their own destinies.

Over-elaborate, dense, bulging with facts and details, here and there weighed down by long winding sentences and paragraphs often presenting an historical and conceptual horizon too wide to maintain comfortably, The History of Italy has lost the appeal it exerted on earlier generations of readers and critics. But it is only in this work that one is able to contemplate the complex structure of the Italian Renaissance and to find both the abundance of blood that coursed through the veins of its public life and the heart that regulated it: for the past four centuries the History has been ransacked as the chief source of Renaissance history and politics. The work offers unparalleled interpretations of events and figures; placed in ample perspectives and drawn with the broad and precise brushstrokes of a masterly hand, they have become historiographical icons: portraits of sickly but warlike Charles VIII, ambitious but bungling Emperor Maximilian, Pope Clement VII and his tortured personality; the state of Italy at the death of Lorenzo the Magnificent; the discovery of America, the invention and use of guns and gunpowder, the appearance of syphilis, the threat posed by the Turks and Luther to Christendom; the picture of gory battles and the role of bravery and cowardice; the stunning corruption of Pope Borgia, the source of the Christian church's temporal power, the sack of Rome, and the siege of Florence. The breadth and depth of representation and interpretation explains why, immediately after the History appeared in print, it was elevated to the rank of a masterpiece equal to the great works of ancient historiography.

ALFREDO BONADEO

Biography

Born 6 March 1483 in Florence. Studied civil law in Florence, Ferrara, and Padua, from 1498, doctorate, 1505. Married Maria Salviati secretly, 1507, publicly, 1508. Ambassador to Spain, 1512–14; replaced his father as one of the Seventeen Reformers, 1514; appointed one of the Eight of Ward, and of the Signoria, 1514; appointed consistorial advocate by Pope Leo X, 1515; named governor of Modena by Leo X, 1516, and of Reggio, 1517; became close friends with Machiavelli, 1521; appointed commissary general of the papal army against the French, 1521; named president of Romagna by Pope Clement VII, 1524; appointed lieutenant general of the papal army in the League of Cognac, 1526; banished from Florence, 1530; appointed governor of Bologna by Clement VII, 1531; returned to Florence, 1534; political advisor to Duke Alessandro de' Medici, 1534–37; retired after Alessandro's assassination and the rise of Cosimo de' Medici, 1537. Died in Florence, 22 May 1540.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

- Storia d'Italia*, 20 vols., 1561–64; edited by Silvana Seidel Menchi, 3 vols., 1971, Emanuella Scarano, 1981, and Ettore Mazzoli, 1988; as The History of Italy, translated by G.Fenton, 1579, Austin Parke Goddard, 10 vols., 1753–56, edited by John R. Hale, translated by Cecil Grayson, 1966, and edited and translated by Sidney Alexander, 1969
- Considerazioni intorno ai Discorsi del Machiavelli*, in Opere inedite, vol. 1, edited by Giuseppe Canestrini, 1857
- Ricordi politici e civili*, in Opere inedite, vol. 1, edited by Giuseppe Canestrini, 1857, Roberto Palmarocchi, 1931, Raffaele Spongano, 1951, Ettore Barelli, 1977, Sergio Marconi, 1983, Tommaso Bavaro, 1990, Tommaso Albarini, 1991, and Emanuella Scarano, 1991; as Counsels and Reflections, translated by Ninian Hill Thomson, 1890; as Maxims and Reflections, translated by Mario Domandi, 1965; selection as The Maxims, translated by Emma Martin, 1845
- Dialogo del reggimento di Firenze*, in Opere inedite, vol. 2, edited by Giuseppe Canestrini, 1858, Roberto Palmarocchi, 1932, and Emanuella Scarano, 1970; as Dialogue on the Government of Florence, edited and translated by Alison Brown, 1994
- Storia fiorentina*, in Opere inedite, vol. 2, edited by Giuseppe Canestrini, 1858, Roberto Palmarocchi, 1931, and Emanuella Scarano, 1991; as The History of Florence, translated by Cecil Grayson, 1965, and Mario Domandi, 1970
- Cose fiorentine*, edited by Roberto Ridolfi, 1945
- Selected Writings*, edited by Cecil Grayson, translated by Margaret Grayson, 1965
- Other writings: family memoirs and correspondence. Collected works editions: Opere inedite, edited by Giuseppe Canestrini, 10 vols., 1857–67; Opere, edited by Vittorio de Caprariis, 1953, and Emanuella Scarano, 1970.

Bibliography

Guicciardini, Paolo, Contributo alla bibliografia di Francesco Guicciardini, Florence: Giuntina, 1946; supplements, 1948, 1950

Further Reading

- Annali d'Italianistica* issue on Guicciardini, 2 (1984)
- Bonadeo, Alfredo, "Guicciardini on War and Conquest," Il Pensiero Politico 14 (1981):214–42
- Bondanella, Peter E., Francesco Guicciardini, Boston: Twayne, 1976
- Cochrane, Eric, Historians and Historiography in the Italian Renaissance, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1981: 295–305
- De Sanctis, Francesco, "L'uomo del Guicciardini," in his Saggi critici, vol. 3, edited by Luigi Russo, Bari: Laterza, 1963
- Francesco Guicciardini 1483–1983: Nel V centenario della nascita*, Florence: Olschki, 1984
- Gilbert, Felix, Machiavelli and Guicciardini: Politics and History in Sixteenth-Century Florence, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1965
- Luciani, Vincent, Francesco Guicciardini and His European Reputation, New York: Otto, 1936
- Palmarocchi, Roberto, Studi guicciardiniani, Florence: Macrí, 1947
- Phillips, Mark, Francesco Guicciardini: The Historian's Craft, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1977
- Ridolfi, Roberto, The Life of Francesco Guicciardini, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1967; New York: Knopf, 1968
- Treves, Paio, Il realismo di Francesco Guicciardini, Florence: La Nuova Italia, 1931

This page intentionally left blank.

H

Haig-Brown, Roderick

Canadian, 1908–1976

Roderick Haig-Brown approached writing from two perspectives—as a professional and as a literary artist. The former often took precedence, and much of his writing was motivated, in part at least, by the necessity of making a living. He turned out government-sponsored reports, instructional guides, and popular histories for young readers as circumstances and the market demanded, and the greater part of what he wrote, though interesting and entertaining, is of little literary interest. Coupled with the fact that he did his most serious writing in the neglected genre of the informal essay, the amount and variety of his commercial writing has tended to obscure Haig-Brown's literary achievement, and he has received far less attention from critics of Canadian literature than the quality of his essays and his international reputation warrant.

Another barrier to recognition is a common misconception of Haig-Brown as a local, special-interest writer, narrowly concerned with sport fishing in British Columbia. While he lived most of his adult life in the small Vancouver Island community of Campbell River, where he settled after emigrating from England as a young man, Haig-Brown was anything but provincial in his outlook. He served as a judge for over 30 years, was an officer in the Canadian Army during World War II, and later, in addition to becoming Chancellor of the University of Victoria, played leading roles in various private and governmental organizations concerned with sports, parks, and the environment. He was also an avid reader and book collector and knowledgeable about many subjects beyond fishing. Particularly in the 1960s and 1970s, these commitments limited his literary output, but they also allowed him to write with authority on a wide variety of topics and added greatly to the intellectual scope of the essays on fishing and nature, which often digress into discussions of literature, history, sociology, and the human qualities fishing develops.

Notwithstanding his professional nonfiction writing, Haig-Brown discovered his talent as an informal essayist relatively late. Early in his career he concentrated his creative energy mainly on fiction, but partly because of the instructional bent that would later serve him well in his essays, he achieved better results with his animal stories and outdoor adventure fiction for young readers than with his novels for adults. A River Never Sleeps (1946), his first collection of informal essays, did not appear until 15 years after his first book, and although it can be seen in retrospect to represent a breakthrough in approach and style, he continued to concentrate on fiction throughout the 1940s. Partly, it may be supposed, because he believed publishers considered the form “dead as hieroglyphics” (“Writer’s Notebook: Influences,” 1953), it was not until the early 1950s that Haig-Brown devoted himself mainly to writing essays. A writer’s “real importance,” he observed at this time, “is in the sum of experience that he can share through his writing and in the quality of what he shares... provided always that he has the art and skill to transmute them into new meaning” (“Writer’s Notebook: Influences”). The experiences that he knew best were, of course, his own; the form that allowed him to express the deeper meaning he considered essential to quality in writing was the informal, personal essay.

The best of Haig-Brown’s informal essays appear in six collections: A River Never Sleeps, Measure of the Year (1950), which is more concerned with his family life, his hobbies, and his experience as a local magistrate than with fishing, and the fishing tetralogy for which he is best known. In Fisherman’s Spring (1951), Haig-Brown explores the deep significance fishing holds for him personally. Fisherman’s Winter (1954) grows out of a fishing trip to Argentina and Chile and is on the whole a more factual book than Spring. Fisherman’s Summer (1959) shows Haig-Brown’s growing concern with conservation, while Fisherman’s Fall (1964), in its fascination with game fish themselves, particularly salmon, and their underwater environment, extends this concern. All six collections demonstrate his ability to combine complex, original imagery, which is particularly effective in capturing action, with accurate, minutely observed details. They also benefit from a style so clear and fluent that it makes underestimating the complexity of the ideas being expressed all too easy. These books are not simply collections of previously published essays, but carefully structured, thematically unified works in themselves. In the essays of these six books at least, Haig-Brown was able to put aside sales expectations to write as a conscious artist, aware of his position as an inheritor of the British tradition of reflective rural writing, especially the fishing strain begun by Izaak Walton (with The Compleat Angler, 1653) and Charles Cotton.

Although he savored its challenge, excitement, and fun as much as anyone, Haig-Brown regarded fishing as a thinking person’s sport, and in writing his fishing essays he made thinking people his primary audience. Though fishermen made up a sizable portion of his actual audience, those fishermen who were content to pursue their sport without reflecting on what it had to offer beyond pleasant recreation remained secondary. Technique, tackle, and the size of the catch were far less important to Haig-Brown than the insight to be had from a sport that was “more than a sport,” a sport that offered an “intimate exploration of a part of the world hidden from the eyes and minds of ordinary people...a way of thinking and doing, a way of reviving the mind and body ...” (“The Art of Fishing,” 1951). Through the process of writing his essays, Haig-Brown’s exploration of fishing and the world of fish became an exploration of self as well, and as central to his achievement as the narrative and descriptive excellence, for which he is more often praised, is his success in articulating the psychological, philosophical, and spiritual significance fishing and nature held for him.

WILLIAM CONNOR

See also Nature Essay

Biography

Roderick Langmere Haig-Brown. Born 21 February 1908 in Lancing, Sussex, England. Studied at Charterhouse, Godalming, Surrey. Emigrated to the United States, 1926, then to Canada, 1927. Worked as a logger, trapper, fisherman, and guide in Washington state and British Columbia, 1926–29. Married Ann Elmore, 1934: one son and three daughters. Major in the Canadian Army, 1939–45. Provincial magistrate and judge, Campbell River Children's and Family Court, British Columbia, 1942–75. Chancellor, University of Victoria, British Columbia, 1970–73. Also a frequent television broadcaster. Awards: Canadian Library Association Book of the Year Medal, 1947, 1964; Governor General's Citation, 1948; Crandell Conservation Trophy, 1955; Vicky Metcalf Award, for children's book, 1966; honorary degree from the University of British Columbia. Died in Campbell River, British Columbia, 9 October 1976.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

A River Never Sleeps, 1946

Measure of the Year, 1950

Fisherman's Spring, 1951

Fisherman's Winter, 1954

Fisherman's Summer, 1959

Fisherman's Fall, 1964

The Master and His Fish: From the World of Roderick Haig-Brown, edited by Valerie Haig-Brown, 1981

Writings and Reflections: From the World of Roderick Haig-Brown, edited by Valerie Haig-Brown, 1982

Other writings: three novels (Pool and Rapid, 1932; Timber, 1942; On the Highest Hill, 1949), a collection of short stories, ten books for children, and books about fishing.

Further Reading

Keith, W.J., "Roderick Haig-Brown," Canadian Literature 71 (Winter 1976):7–20

Robertson, Anthony, Above Tide: Reflections on Roderick Haig Brown, Madeira Park, British Columbia: Harbour, 1984

Hamm, Peter

German, 1937–

German poet Peter Hamm plays a major role as an essayist in Germany's literary life today. However, he is neither as recognized, nor as prolific, as his older colleague Hans Magnus Enzensberger. Though Hamm's essayistic writings are rare, they are nevertheless unique in the way they treat their subjects. Using an intimate, plain, yet lucid style, Hamm conveys the sense that he knows personally all the authors he is writing about, even if they are removed in time (like Goethe) or in place (like the Portuguese poet Fernando Pessoa). Of course, Hamm does know many contemporary writers personally, and his portraits of them are intriguing accounts of their lives and works. But even if he has not met an author face to face, he takes his readers on a haunting trip into the intellectual and emotional worlds of those he is portraying. Since it is always the lives of his subjects that most interest Hamm—he once wrote that he does not have faith in people who claim to be interested only in an author's work—his approach is decidedly nonacademic and as such never claims objectivity or bothers itself with the latest theories. Instead, Hamm leaves enough space for readers to draw their own conclusions from the careful, almost caressing way in which he presents biographical details intertwined with the writings of both wellknown and lesser-known writers.

Hamm's personalized yet critical method is best described by looking at one of his essays, a speech on Ingeborg Bachmann. Besides meeting her several times throughout his life, he also directed a film portrait on her. In "Rede zum 60. Geburtstag von Ingeborg Bachmann" (1986; Speech on the 60th anniversary of Ingeborg Bachmann's birth), Hamm asks himself and his audience: "What is it that I needed from Ingeborg Bachmann?" By confronting the audience with such a simple, seemingly naive, and egocentric question, Hamm invites us to ask that same question about the woman who had then already been dead for 13 years. This invitation to communal self-reflection creates an immediate bond between the listener/reader and Bachmann, the subject. At the same time, however, Hamm warns us that when we think we are close to really understanding an author, it is usually the reflection of our own self that we are projecting onto the perceived Other. Thus, ultimately, Hamm never answers his opening question. Instead, he takes his audience on a journey to Søren Kierkegaard, Franz Kafka, E.M.Cioran, and T.S.Eliot, comparing their responses to literature with his own feelings as a 16-year-old boy when reading the first lines of the celebrated poet. He goes on to describe some of his personal encounters with Bachmann, which he illuminates by references to lines of her poetry. The outcome is a description of her life and writings as the journey of a holy martyr, finally raising the question: What is it that I need from Ingeborg Bachmann?

René Wellek's insight, that the combination of poet and critic in one person is not always successful, is certainly justified in many cases. For Peter Hamm, the opposite is true. His essays never lack a critical perspective. This can perhaps be explained by his participation in Gruppe 47, the major literary movement of postwar Germany. The experience of being exposed to the critique of friends and colleagues—as a poet—at the meetings of the Gruppe, while at the same time developing his own critical method further, sharpened his literary instinct at a young age. Writing for the two major periodicals in German intellectual life, Die Zeit (The age) and Der Spiegel (The mirror), Hamm has often been among the first to respond in public to new and upcoming contemporaries, such as Peter Handke, Thomas Bernhard, or Martin Walser. Because of his role as a poet-critic, he is also concerned with the aims and purposes of literary criticism. He wrote about the self-image of the critic in the late 1960s and mediated a selection of different critics' reflections on their profession by editing the volume Kritik—von wem/für wen/wie: Eine Selbstdarstellung deutscher Kritiker (1968; Criticism—by whom/for whom/how: a self-representation of German critics).

In his essayistic writings, Hamm is mainly influenced by French philosophical thought, more specifically by Blaise Pascal, Paul Valéry, and above all Simone Weil. Her exploration of the loss of religion and faith in modern times is a recurring theme for Hamm, inspiring many of his essays. Because of a difficult childhood during World War II and its aftermath, Hamm turned even as a teenager to non-German cultures and avant-garde movements. He soon developed a fundamental knowledge of other European cultures, editing and translating collections of Swedish and Czechoslovakian poetry, as well as poems by Artur Lundkvist and Jesse Thoor. Hamm's ambivalent feelings toward the German tradition are best characterized by the title of his collected essays: Der Wille zur Ohnmacht (1992; The will to powerlessness), a play on Nietzsche's Der Wille zur Macht (1901; The Will to Power), reflecting his critical, yet modest and personalized reexamination of traditionally accepted authorities.

AGNES C.MÜLLER

Biography

Born 27 February 1937 in Munich. Studied at Catholic boarding schools in Baden-Württemberg: left school at age 14. Worked for a time at a small publishing house; music, cultural, and literary critic, Bayerischer Rundfunk radio station, Munich, from 1960. Film director and producer: subjects included Ingeborg Bachmann, Heinrich Böll, Hanns Eisler, Hans Werner Henze, Alfred Brendel. Has one daughter.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Der Wille zur Ohnmacht, 1992

Deutschland—du mein Traum: Ein Familienleben in einer menschenverachtenden Diktatur, 1994

Other writings: poetry. Also edited and translated anthologies of German, Swedish, and Czech poetry.

Harper's

American magazine, 1850–

Harper's New Monthly Magazine appeared on the American scene in June 1850, the creation of four Harper brothers—James, John, Joseph Wesley, and Fletcher—who had been in the book publishing business since 1817. The magazine was, at first, largely an advertising vehicle for the firm's book publication, though the Harper brothers declared in the first issue their intention to bring “within the reach of the great mass of the American people, an immense amount of useful and entertaining reading matter,” most of which was otherwise inaccessible to these potential readers. The magazine was designed to be eclectic, a compendium of materials found in other periodicals. And because the Harper brothers—especially Fletcher, who was the real animating force behind the magazine—believed that Americans were not completely ready for a purely nationalistic fare, it was also an early goal of the magazine to present English fiction (especially serialized novels) and articles to an American audience for whom writers such as Ralph Waldo Emerson, James Russell Lowell, Oliver Wendell Holmes, and John Whittier were too highbrow. (In 1857, this group of Yankee humanists would help found the Atlantic Monthly.) Such presentations were easy to accomplish, since international copyright laws had not yet been created and American publishers could pirate all the writings they wanted from English books and periodicals. Within six months of its birth, Harper's, under the editorship of Henry J. Raymond, had a circulation of 50,000.

While Fletcher Harper and the early editors (Raymond and Alfred H. Guernsey) relied heavily on English writings, they were also quick to recognize, at a time when most American magazines focused on localism, the possibilities of a national publication. It took only a few years for Harper's not only to find for itself a greater purpose than advertising, but also to transform itself into a magazine with something approaching a national audience. Neither as highbrow as the Atlantic, nor as newsy and up-to-the-minute as Harper's Weekly, which Fletcher Harper added in 1857, it was a general family magazine aimed at a large common denominator of American readership. Among its nonfiction, it carried battle sketches from the Civil War, as well as travel essays about trips to the Western frontier by prominent writers such as Horace Greeley and John Muir.

Henry Mills Alden assumed the editorship in 1869, and after Fletcher Harper died a few years later Alden was chiefly responsible for the growing dignity, distinction, maturity, and range of the magazine during the later years of the 19th century. Alden would remain editor for 50 years, until 1919. Under his guidance and within the growing genteel tradition of middleand upper-class American culture, Harper's steered away from mass popularity and became a select magazine for respectable and well-to-do gentlefolk of nice tastes. It was, in fact, preeminent in the golden age of the old-fashioned family magazine, rivaled only by the younger Century and the still younger Scribner's—with the Atlantic Monthly as a somewhat more austere competitor.

In the 1890s and the early 1900s, new magazines began to appear which pinpointed the middle class, or the average 20th-century Americans—unintellectual and half-educated, but wide awake, confident, and ready to spend their money freely. Many of the new magazines of that time were sensational, vulgar, and venal. But they were such financial successes that they were eventually able to buy the best authors away from Harper's, Scribner's, and Century.

In 1925, Harper's was saved by a daring move by the editor Thomas Bucklin Wells (1919–31). Wells realized it was no longer practical to appeal to a class or group that was supposed to combine wealth, discrimination, and literary taste. Too many people now had enough money to buy nationally advertised products, and they were mostly satisfied with the journalistic fare provided by the mass-circulation magazines. So he aimed at a somewhat different though overlapping public—thoughtful and discriminating people, of whatever income bracket, who appreciated fine quality, felt a deep sense of responsibility for the national well-being, and possessed genuine intellectual curiosity. He pulled the illustrations out of Harper's, put it in a plain brick-orange cover, and went in for a new program focused upon human, energetic, and often controversial articles on the burning issues of the day.

Wells was pointing the magazine not so much toward well-to-do gentlefolk as toward readers who combined brains and taste with a more-than-superficial concern with public affairs. Such was also the direction followed by editors Lee Foster Hartman (1931–41) and Frederick L. Allen (1941–60). In 1955, Allen said that Harper's deliberately edited for a minority of educated (though not necessarily formally educated), responsible, intelligent people. In defense of the magazine's relatively small circulation compared to slicker publications, Allen said, "The ignition system is a very small part of an automobile."

Harper's has been an important outlet for essays since its inception. From 1870 to 1920 its important essayists included Henry James (many of his travel pieces appeared in the magazine), Mark Twain, William Dean Howells, and Brander Matthews. E.B. White, one of the most influential personal essayists of the 20th century, contributed a monthly column called "One Man's Meat" from 1938 to 1943. He was living on a farm in Maine and, from that quiet, rural vantage point, turned a discerning and often humorous eye on a world plunging into war.

Harper's editors from Alden to John Fischer (1960–67) to Lewis Lapham (1976–81, and 1983–) have long insisted that the magazine is "a journal which traffics in ideas," a description borne out in many of its essays about art, politics, and science: Faulkner on segregation in 1956; E.M. Forster's "Art for Art's Sake" in 1949; Russell Lynes' famous "Highbrow, Lowbrow, Middlebrow" in 1949; Secretary of War Henry L. Stimson's important 1947 piece, "The Decision to Use the Atomic Bomb"; Vicki Hearne's 1991 "What's Wrong with Animal Rights?"; Gerald Early's 1992 "Their Malcolm, My Problem." At the same time, Harper's—especially under the influence of Lapham—has long insisted on a novelistic approach to journalism, in which the writer's function "is to describe and tell a story, not shove an idea down people's throats." The late 1960s and early 1970s saw Harper's, under the editorship of Willie Morris (1967–71), become a primary outlet for the New Journalism, including writers such as Truman Capote, Norman Mailer, Joan Didion, and Tom Wolfe.

Columns have long been an outlet for essayists, and Harper's' "The Easy Chair" (now called, for Lewis Lapham's essays, "Notebook") is the oldest column in American journalism. Produced over the years by barely more than half a dozen writers, it has served, in the words of "Easy Chair" contributor John Fischer, "as a lens with a reasonably fixed focus on American life." Though originally intended to be "an agreeable and entertaining collection of literary miscellany," it soon became, and has remained, a place for political and cultural critique, often argumentative in tone and provoking significant controversy.

Like the New Yorker, though without the extensive influence on the tone of casual American writing, Harper's has a long tradition of publishing humorous essays. Besides Twain and White, humorists such as James Thurber, Stephen Leacock, Roald Dahl, Leo Rosten, and Jean Kerr have appeared in the magazine.

A major overhaul of the magazine in 1983, the fifth of its existence, refined its treatment of essays. Led by Lapham, Harper's set out to become, in Lapham's words, "an interpretive rather than an investigative instrument." In contrast to the mass media which Lapham saw as necessarily superficial and lacking in any individual voice or story, Harper's strengthened its traditional bias in favor of the essay and short story. Wanting to build even further on Harper's' place as the oldest of America's monthly magazines, Lapham said that "if the American experience is about people embarked on the trials of discovery, then both the essay and the short story present themselves as the most useful of the available literary forms—brief and experimental, convenient to the arts of improvisation, easily adapted to different tones of voice or modes of feeling, quickly changed into a confession, a treatise, or a traveler's tale." Harper's grasped more firmly onto the essay to counterbalance the less speculative forms of expository prose which it continued to publish. In the mid-1990s, perhaps its most typical essayists are those who range widely over intellectual terrain, incorporating personal stories with incisive ruminations on the defining issues of the times—essayists such as Barry Lopez, Cynthia Ozick, Joyce Carol Oates, and Stanley Elkin.

Because of financial straits, before 1992 Harper's limited itself to printing essays (as well as stories) of no more than seven or eight pages. In 1992, however, with the 1983 overhaul deemed a success (circulation was up to 202,000, from 140,000 in 1983), the magazine instituted a four-times-a-year section called "Folio," in which it began to publish essays and stories of substantial length. As an objective sign of its recent high stature in American literary nonfiction writing, Harper's has had more of its essays chosen for inclusion in the annual Best American Essays series (begun in 1986) than any other magazine.

DAN ROCHE

Anthologies

- Gentlemen, Scholars and Scoundrels: A Treasury of the Best of Harper's Magazine from 1850 to the Present*, edited by Horace Knowles, New York: Harper, 1959
Harper Essays, edited by Henry Seidel Canby, New York: Harper, 1927
Humor from Harper's, edited by John Fischer and Lucy Donaldson, New York: Harper, 1961

Six in the Easy Chair, edited by John Fischer, Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1973

Further Reading

- Baldwin, Neil, "Lewis Lapham," Publishers Weekly, 5 February 1988:75–76
 Dowgray, John Gray Laird, Jr., A History of Harper's Literary Magazines, 1850–1900 (dissertation), Madison: University of Wisconsin, 1956
 Lapham, Lewis, "Notes on a Newer Journalism," Harper's, January 1984:10–12
 Lapham, Lewis, "In the American Grain," Harper's, February 1984: 6–10
 Lapham, Lewis, "Happy Anniversary," Harper's, March 1987: 10–11
 Lapham, Lewis, "New Directions," Harper's, October 1992:6–9
 Morris, Willie, New York Days, Boston: Little Brown, 1993

Havel, Václav

Czech, 1936–

Václav Havel is best known as a playwright and politician, but his essays have always been an important part of his oeuvre. His essayistic work can be divided into three periods. During the 1950s and 1960s, he dwelt primarily on problems of theater and literature. During the 1970s and 1980s, he turned increasingly to problems of cultural policy, politics, and human existence. The latest period, during his presidency of his country since 1989, reflects an obvious turn toward public affairs.

From the end of the 1950s Havel concentrated on theater, including commentaries on his own plays. These essays and reflections were published in journals such as Divadlo (Theater), Host do Domu (Guest at home), and Literární Noviny (Literary news), and collected in Josef Čapek (1963). Other essays from this period were devoted to critical analysis of culture and thought. He dealt with politics only sporadically, e.g. in "Na téma opozice" (1968; "On the Theme of an Opposition"), directed against the monopoly on government enjoyed by the Communist Party. Unlike Milan Kundera and other Czech writers, Havel had no illusions concerning the humane nature of communism or the possibility of democratization.

In these early articles the typical features of Havel's style and perspective on the world are already evident. He carried on the tradition of democratic and liberal thought, as established and represented in Czech culture by Karel Havlíček, Tomáš G.Masaryk, the Čapek brothers, and Ferdinand Peroutka. As in his plays, Havel's style is factual, accurate, and ironic.

A new period began in the 1970s, not only in Havel's work, but in Czechoslovakian culture as a whole. After the defeat of the "revival" in 1968, many outstanding writers were forbidden to publish their works or to take part in public life. At this time Havel became a leading figure in the organization of underground culture, establishing movements such as samizdat publishing, in which works were privately produced and secretly circulated. (Because of such activity Havel was hounded by the police and imprisoned several times.) He began to take more interest in political, cultural, and existential questions. In the open “Dopis Dr. Gustávu Husákovi” (1975; “Letter to Dr. Gustáv Husák”), the Czech president at the time, Havel disclosed the deep moral and spiritual crisis present in Czechoslovakian society, the “order without life” he considered an inseparable part of the more general crisis of human identity. In the famous, much quoted Moc bezmocných (1978; “The Power of the Powerless”), written after the foundation of the Charter 77 human rights group, he analyzed the phenomenon of dissent. Opposed to “living a lie” by colluding with totalitarian ideology, dissidents stress “living in truth.” At the same time, Havel denounced the egotism of the current technical and consumer civilization of Western society. He developed these ideas in other essays such as Politika a svědomí (1984; “Politics and Conscience”), “Anatomie jedné zdrženlivosti” (1985; “Anatomy of a Reticence”), and “Příběh a totálita” (1987; “Stories and Totalitarianism”), revealing himself to be a modern intellectual whose skepticism is counterbalanced by his belief in transcendental spiritual values. Belief for Havel means “hope as the state of the spirit, not as the state of the world.” He considered the moral revival of the individual more important than change in the social order.

Havel formulated many ideas in the letters he wrote from prison to his wife Olga between 1979 to 1982, and published in Dopisy Olze (1983; Letters to Olga). Often taking the form of essays on philosophy, theater, and other subjects, they differ from Havel’s other work from the 1970s and 1980s in not being able to deal directly with politics (the letters had to pass through censorship) and hence being more general and oblique considerations of issues.

As the leader of his country since November 1989, Havel has not surprisingly shifted the focus of his writing to problems of public life and politics. His recent essays are less comprehensive than those of the 1970s and 1980s; more and more take the form of speeches. Even in those, however, he preserves his ability to analyze things precisely, his irony and self-irony, and the ideas he has developed in earlier works. In a speech delivered to the United States Congress in February 1990, Havel said: “...we are greatly influenced by a malignant and entirely selfish impression that man is the top of all creatures and hence can do anything he wants.” The salvation of the contemporary world he sees in the turn toward “human heart, human consideration, human humility, and human responsibility.” His essays—whether in samizdat publications, as letters from prison, or as presidential speeches—have consistently reflected this humanitarian perspective.

JÍŘÍ HOLÝ

Biography

Born 5 October 1936 in Prague. Laboratory technician, 1951–55. Studied at a technical college, 1955–57, and the Academy of Arts, Prague, 1961–66. Military service in the Czechoslovak Army, 1957–59. Worked at the ABC Theater, Prague, 1959–60, and the Divadlo na Zábřadlí (Theater on the bannister), Prague, 1960–68. Married Olga Šplíchalová (died, 1996), 1964. Passport confiscated because writings considered subversive, 1969; imprisoned for various charges of subversion or behavior opposed to the government, 1977, 1978–79, 1979–83, 1989. Cofounder, Charter 77 human rights group, 1977, and the Committee for the Defense of the Unjustly Prosecuted (VONS), 1978; member of the editorial board, and regular contributor, Lidové Noviny (The people's news) samizdat newspaper, 1987–89. Cofounder and leader, Občanské Fórum (Civic forum) political party, 1989. President of the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic, 1989–91, and of the Czech Republic, since 1993. Married Dagmar Veskrnova, 1997. Awards: many, including Obie Award, 1968, 1970; Austrian State Prize, 1969; Prix Plaisir du Théâtre, 1981; Palach Prize, 1981; Erasmus Prize, 1986; Olof Palme Prize, 1989; UNESCO Bolívar Prize, 1990; Friedrich-Ebert Foundation Political Book of the Year Award, 1990; Malaparte Prize, 1990; Legion of Honor Grand Cross, 1990; Charlemagne Prize, 1991; Sonning Prize, 1991; Averell Harriman Democracy Award, 1991; B'nai B'rith Prize, 1991; Freedom Award, 1991; Raoul Wallenberg Human Rights Award, 1991; Leonhard-FrankRing, 1992; Indira Gandhi Prize, 1993; European Cultural Society Award, 1993; Order of the White Eagle (Poland), 1993; Golden Honorary Order of Freedom (Slovenia), 1993; honorary degrees from over a dozen universities.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Josef Čapek: Dramatik a jevištní výtvarník, with Věra Ptáčková, 1963

Protokoly, 1966

Moc bezmocných, 1978; as “The Power of the Powerless,” in The Power of the Powerless: Citizens Against the State in Central Eastern Europe, edited by John Keane, 1985

Dopisy Olze (letters to his wife from prison), 1983; as Letters to Olga, June 1979 to September 1982, translated by Paul Wilson, 1988

Výzva k transcenci, 1984

O lidskou identitu: Úvahy, fejetony, protesty, polemiky, prohlášení a rozhovory z let, 1969–1979, edited by Vilem Prečan and Alexander Tomsy, 1984

Politika a svědomí, 1984; as “Politics and Conscience,” translated by Erazim Kohák and Roger Scruton, in Living in Truth, edited by Jan Vladislav, 1986

Living in Truth (also includes essays by other writers addressed to Havel), edited by Jan Vladislav, 1986

Do různých stran: Eseje a články z let 1983–1989, edited by Vilem Prečan, 1989

Profevy: Leden-červen 1990 (speeches), edited by Vilem Prečan, 1990

Open Letters: Selected Prose 1965–1990, edited by Paul Wilson, 1991

Letní přemítání, 1991; as Summer Meditations: On Politics, Morality and Civility in a Time of Transition, translated by Paul Wilson, 1992

Vážení občane (speeches), 1992

Čtyři eseje, 1993

Other writings: many plays (including Zahradní slavnost [The Garden Party], 1963; Vyrozumění [The Memorandum], 1965; Ztížená možnost soustředění [The Increased Difficulty of Concentration], 1968; Audience, 1975; Vernisáž [A Private View], 1975; Žebrácká opera [The Beggar's Opera], 1976; Protest, 1978; Chyba [The Mistake], 1983; Largo desolato, 1985; Pokoušení [Temptation], 1986; Asanace [Redevelopment], 1987), and correspondence.

Bibliography

Hoznauer, Miloslav, Václav Havel: Bibliografická příručka, Prague: Comenium, 1991

Further Reading

- Candole, James de, "Václav Havel as a Conservative Thinker," Salisbury Review (December 1988)
- Cobb, Kelton, "Ernst Troeltsch and Václav Havel on the Ethical Promise of Historical Failure," Journal of Religious Ethics 22 (Spring 1994):53–74
- Farrell, Thomas B., "Practicing the Arts of Rhetoric: Tradition and Invention," Philosophy and Rhetoric 24, no. 3 (1991):183–212
- Gibian, George, "Havel's Letters from Prison," Cross Currents 3 (1984):87–119
- Goetz-Stankiewicz, Marketa, "Variations of Temptation: Václav Havel's Politics of Language," Modern Drama 33 (March 1990): 92–105
- Hejdánek, Ladislav, "Variace a reflexe na téma vězeňských dopisů Václava Havla," Listy 20, no. 6 (1990):6–19
- Königsmark, Václav, "Havlovy dramatické eseje," Přítomnost 1, no. 6 (1990):26–27
- Kriseová, Eda, Václav Havel, New York: St. Martin's Press, 1993 (original Czech edition, 1991)
- Matustik, Martin J., Postnational Identity: Critical Theory and Existential Philosophy in Habermas, Kierkegaard, and Havel, New York: Guilford Press, 1993
- Pithart, Peter, "Intellectuals in Politics: Double Dissent in the Past, Double Disappointment Today," Social Research 60 (Winter 1993):751–61
- Prochazka, Martin, "Prisoner's Predicament: Public Privacy in Havel's Letters to Olga," Representations 43 (Summer 1993): 126–54
- Rezek, Petr, Filosofie a politika kyče, Prague: Institut pro Středoevropskou Kulturu a Politiku, 1991
- Satterwhite, James, "Marxist Critique and Czechoslovak Reform," in The Road to Disillusion: From Critical Marxism to PostCommunism in Eastern Europe, edited by Raymond Taras, Armonk, New York: Sharpe, 1992:115–34
- Tucker, Aviezer, "Václav Havel's Heideggerianism," Telos (Fall 1990):63–78

Hazlitt, William

British, 1778–1830

The history of essays on the essay—with Bacon, Addison and Steele, and Montaigne among those cited as Founding Fathers—reveals the genre's amazing diversity and the consequent difficulty of formulating any kind of completely satisfactory definition. In A Glossary of Literary Terms (1981), M.H.Abrams sets down interesting guidelines to facilitate discussion. He defines it generally as “any brief composition in prose that undertakes to discuss a matter, express a point of view, or persuade us to accept a thesis on any subject whatever.” He is quick to distinguish the personal or familiar essay in which the author assumes “a tone of intimacy with his audience” and is “concerned with everyday things,” writing in “a relaxed, self-revelatory, and often whimsical fashion,” from the formal essay in which the writer takes on the role of “authority, or at least as highly knowledgeable, and expounds the subject in an orderly way.” Whether writing informally or formally, William Hazlitt is a master in both.

Walter Jackson Bate (1970), an important critic in the 20th-century revival of Hazlitt studies, catches a key dimension of the essayist’s attractiveness in his engaging comment that “There is an appearance of hastiness in almost everything Hazlitt wrote, as though the printer’s boy were at the door awaiting the sheets as they came from his pen.” Yet this “appearance,” while the clear result of the sheer busy-ness of Hazlitt’s life and career as essayist, critic, reviewer, biographer, and social and political commentator, can as easily and justly be associated with his own favorite quality, gusto: the lively, immediate mode of his expression, the quickness of his mind, the range of his ideas, the forceful commitment to the cause of freedom in almost every area of human activity.

Jacob Zeitlin (1913), one of the earliest of the modern commentators on Hazlitt, finds a “triple ancestry” for the essayist: Montaigne’s “original observation of humanity,” Rousseau’s “high-strung susceptibility to emotions, sentiments, and ideas,” and La Rochefoucauld’s “cynicism.” Hazlitt is consistently cited in histories of the essay as part of a great tradition, and indeed he does conform to certain general norms associated with the genre wherever it is discussed, but he also pushes the boundaries beyond what many would regard as its defining limits, standing back to play the role of psychologist, lecturer, and teacher of both canonical and noncanonical classics.

Hazlitt’s career as reviewer began as early as 1813 when he was appointed drama critic for the Morning Chronicle. In 1814 he began writing art and drama criticism for the Champion as well as for the Edinburgh Review and Leigh Hunt’s Examiner. His career continued with his celebrated “Round Table” essays and theatrical criticism for the Examiner, which he published as The Round Table (1817), and in 1817 he became drama critic for the Times. The 1820s saw more “Table Talks” for London Magazine and the publication of two volumes of Table-Talk (1821–22). He contributed to Hunt’s radical journal the Liberal in 1823, and from 1828 to 1830 he was associated with the weekly Atlas and again as drama critic with the Examiner. So prodigious was his essay writing of all kinds—there are thousands of items in his oeuvre—that any elaborate system of classification fails.

Hazlitt’s lengthy but influential An Essay on the Principles of Human Action (1805) advances his favorite subject, “the natural disinterestedness of the human mind,” a subject that greatly influenced Keats’ ideas on Negative Capability. Essays such as “On Genius and Originality” (1814), “On Reason and Imagination” (1826), “On Poetry in General” (1818), “On Imitation” (1816), “On the Character of Rousseau” (1816), and “On Shakespeare and Milton” (1818) represent the barest sample of his work as critic/essayist; there are also hundreds of reviews of almost every kind of artistic performance as well as a large number of biographical sketches.

But he may be best remembered for the short familiar essays on a remarkable variety of topics: “On Consistency of Opinion” (1821), “The Character of Country People” (1819), “On the Feeling of Immortality in Youth” (1827), “On Reading New Books” (1827), “On Going a Journey” (182,2), “On the Pleasure of Painting” (1820). There is also his tour de force account of “The Fight” (1822) of 10 December 182,1 between Tom Hickman the Gas-man and Bill Neate.

It is his own term “gusto” that best captures the approach in Hazlitt’s essays. The way he musters language and imagery to catch the difficult-to-describe subject, the verve and energy of the speaking voice, the power of entering into a subject, and the range of artistic allusion even now gives the essays the ring of truth. Stanley Chase (1924) describes the overall approach as classic impressionism, “the interpretation of works of art by reference to the emotions which they excite in the individual breast.” Herschel Baker (1962) sees the essays as seldom following a “linear pattern,” tracing “not the sharp contour of points in ordered exposition but the undulating sequence of his moods.” His range of literary allusion or quotation is remarkable—from the Bible to the Book of Common Prayer, from Chaucer, Spenser, and Milton to Shakespeare, from Sterne’s Tristram Shandy to Scott’s Waverley, from Dryden’s The Hind and the Panther to Gray’s Ode on a Distant Prospect of Eton College, to Young’s Night-Thoughts, to Cowper’s The Task, to Wordsworth’s Tintern Abbey.

The personal is almost always his strongest suit. As John Nabholz says in his introduction to Hazlitt’s Selected Essays (1970), “his style transmits the voice of a man passionately involved with his experience and communicating that involvement through all the devices of sound and structure.” “One of the pleasantest things in the world,” Hazlitt writes in “On Going a Journey,” “is going a journey; but I like to go by myself. I can enjoy society in a room; but out of doors, nature is company enough for me... The soul of a journey is liberty; perfect liberty to think, feel, do just as one pleases.” Or, with his lifelong trust in feeling as guide to action, he describes himself as “one of those who do not think that mankind are exactly governed by reason or a cool calculation of consequences” (“The Main Chance,” 1828).

In “The Fight” Hazlitt draws his audience into the ring with his vivid sportswriter-like journalism. “Reader,” he writes at the beginning, “have you ever seen a fight? If not, you have a pleasure to come, at least if it is a fight like that between the Gas-Man and Bill Neate... In the first round every one thought it was all over. After making play a short time, the Gas-man flew at his adversary like a tiger, struck five blows in as many seconds, three first, and then following him as he staggered back, two more, right and left, and down he fell, a mighty ruin.”

Hazlitt’s keen interest in the psychological reveals itself not only in An Essay on the Principles of Human Action, but throughout his more formal essays and essay-reviews of literature, painting, and other arts. For him “Poetry is the language of the imagination and the passions” (“On Poetry in General”). He expects the same gusto from the work of art that he brings to his own experience: “power or passion defining any object.” The color in Titian’s painting has this power: “Not only do his heads seem to think—his bodies seem to feel.” So do Michelangelo’s forms, which “everywhere obtrude the sense of power upon the eye” (“On Gusto,” 1816). The power of Milton’s mind can be found almost everywhere in his work: “The fervour of his imagination melts down and renders malleable, as in a furnace, the most contradictory materials” (“On Shakespeare and Milton"). The pleasure of tragic poetry is not an anomaly of the imagination, "but has its source in the common love of strong excitement" ("On Poetry in General"). It is the sympathetic quality of the imagination—its power to enter into the reality beyond the self—which attracts Hazlitt most. Imagination "is an associating principle, and has an instinctive perception when a thing belongs to a system, or is only an exception to it" ("On Reason and Imagination"). And genius, far from self-centeredness or display, "is, for the most part, some strong quality in the mind answering to and bringing out some new and striking quality in nature" ("On Genius and Common Sense," 1821).

Chaucer, Spenser, Milton, as well as Wordsworth, Coleridge, and his Romantic contemporaries, loom large in Hazlitt's lecture-essays. But Shakespeare conquers all; he is "the least of an egotist it was possible to be." "The striking peculiarity" of his mind and genius "was its generic quality, its power of communication with all other minds...and had no peculiar bias, or exclusive excellence more than another. He was just like any other man, but that he was like all other men" ("On Shakespeare and Milton").

Hazlitt's splendid "A Farewell to Essay Writing" (1828) combines all the elements of the successful essay, and specifically his own special qualities. The intensely personal tone, the engaging style, the keen sensitivity to persons and places, the wide range of literary reference—these and indeed more mark his farewell. "Food, warmth, sleep, and a book; these are all at present I ask—the ultima thule of my wandering desires." A walk in nature is a vital necessity in his life. Sipping his morning tea, he loves to watch "the clouds sailing from the west." Metaphor quickly becomes his mode: "We walk through life, as through a narrow path, with a thin curtain drawn around it; behind it are ranged rich portraits, airy harps are strung." But we must "lift aside the veil" to see the beauty and play the music. Memory recalls another time and place 18 years earlier, which in turn evokes a memory of the Theodore-Honora story in Boccaccio's Decameron when the lovers return from Hell. Hazlitt resolves to return home, take up Dryden's translation, and "drawing my chair to the fire, and holding a small print close to my eyes, launch into the full tide of Dryden's couplets (a stream of sound)."

At his best—and as a somewhat overburdened journalist and reviewer he often falls short—William Hazlitt is the master essayist of the English Romantic period, a writer who inherits one tradition and sets a high standard for a new one. He is an essayist with the rare gift of capturing the vitality of his own experience of life and art and of making his readers richer for sharing that experience.

JOHN L. MAHONEY

Biography

Born 10 April 1778 in Maidstone, Kent. Family moved to Ireland, 1780, the United States, 1783–87, then to Wem, Shropshire, from 1787. Studied privately; Hackney Theological College, London, 1793–94; studied painting with his brother in Paris, 1802–03. Associated with Coleridge, Lamb, Godwin, and Wordsworth. Lived in Wem and London, 1805–08, Winterslow, near Salisbury, 1808–11, returning to London, 1812. Married Sarah Stoddart, 1808 (divorced, 1822): one son (two others died in infancy). Parliamentary reporter, 1812–13, and dramatic critic, 1813–14, Morning Chronicle, and for the Times, 1817, and the Examiner, 1828–30; contributor to various other journals and newspapers, including the Edinburgh Review, the Champion, the Liberal, London Magazine, Atlas, and the New Monthly. Arrested for debt, 1823. Married Isabella Bridgewater, 1824 (separated, 1827). Traveled in France and Italy, 1824–25. Died (of stomach cancer) in London, 18 September 1830.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

An Essay on the Principles of Human Action, Being an Argument in Favour of the Natural Disinterestedness of the Human Mind, 1805

Free Thoughts on Public Affairs; or, Advice to a Patriot, 1806

A Reply to the Essay on Population by Malthus, in a Series of Letters, 1807

The Round Table: A Collection of Essays on Literature, Men, and Manners, with Leigh Hunt, 2 vols., 1817; facsimile reprint, 1991

Characters of Shakespeare's Plays, 1817

A View of the English Stage; or, A Series of Dramatic Criticisms, 1818

Lectures on the English Poets, 1818

Lectures on the English Comic Writers, 1819; edited by A. Johnson, 1965

Political Essays, with Sketches of Public Characters, 1819

Lectures, Chiefly on the Dramatic Literature of the Age of Elizabeth, 1820

Table-Talk; or, Original Essays, 2 vols., 1821–22

Characteristics, in the Manner of Rochefoucault's Maxims, 1823

Sketches of the Principal Picture Galleries in England with a Criticism on "Marriage à la Mode", 1824

The Spirit of the Age; or, Contemporary Portraits, 1825; edited by E.D. Mackerness, 1969

Notes of a Journey Through France and Italy, 1826

The Plain Speaker: Opinions on Books, Men, and Things, 2 vols., 1826

Literary Remains, 2 vols., 1836

Sketches and Essays, edited by William Hazlitt, Jr., 1839; as Men and Manners, 1852

Criticisms on Art and Sketches of the Picture Galleries of England, edited by William Hazlitt, Jr., 2 vols., 1843–44; as Essays on the Fine Arts, 1873

Winterslow: Essays and Characters Written There, edited by William Hazlitt, Jr., 1850

New Writings, edited by P.P. Howe, 2 vols., 1925–27

Selected Essays, edited by Geoffrey Keynes, 1930

Hazlitt on Theatre, edited by William Archer and Robert Lowe, 1957

Selected Writings, edited by Ronald Blythe, 1970

Selected Essays, edited by John R. Nabholz, 1970

Selected Writings, edited by Jon Cook, 1991

Other writings: a four-volume life of Napoleon (1828–30), an autobiographical account of a doomed love affair, Liber Amoris (1823), an English grammar book, and correspondence (collected in The Letters, edited by Herschel Moreland Sikes, 1978).

Collected works edition: Complete Works (Centenary Edition) edited by P.P. Howe, 21 vols., 1930–34.

Bibliographies

- Houck, James A., William Hazlitt: A Reference Guide, Boston: Hall, 1977
 Keynes, Geoffrey, Bibliography of William Hazlitt, Godalming, Surrey: St. Paul's Bibliographies, revised edition, 1981 (original edition, 1931)

Further Reading

- Albrecht, W.P., Hazlitt and the Creative Imagination, Lawrence: University of Kansas Press, 1965 (original edition, 1953)
 Baker, Herschel, William Hazlitt, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1962
 Bate, Walter Jackson, "William Hazlitt," in Criticism: The Major Texts, New York: Harcourt Brace, 1970
 Bromwich, David, Hazlitt: The Mind of a Critic, New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1983
 Bullitt, John M., "Hazlitt and the Romantic Conception of the Imagination," Philological Quarterly 24 (1945):343–61
 Chase, Stanley P., "Hazlitt as a Critic of Art," PMLA 39 (1924): 179–202
 Good, Graham, "Hazlitt: Ventures of the Self," in his The Observing Self: Rediscovering the Essay, London and New York: Routledge, 1988:71–89
 Ireland, Alexander, William Hazlitt, Essayist and Critic: Selections from His Writings with a Memoir, Biographical and Critical, London and New York: Warne, 1889
 Kinnaird, John, William Hazlitt: Critic of Power, New York: Columbia University Press, 1978
 Mahoney, John L., The Logic of Passion: The Literary Criticism of William Hazlitt, New York: Fordham University Press, revised edition, 1981
 Nabholz, John R., editor, "My Reader My Fellow-Labourer": A Study of English Romantic Prose, Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1986
 O'Hara, J.D., "Hazlitt and the Function of Imagination," PMLA 81 (1956):552–62
 Park, Roy, Hazlitt and the Spirit of the Age: Abstraction and Critical Theory, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1971
 Schneider, Elisabeth, The Aesthetics of William Hazlitt: A Study of the Philosophical Basis of His Criticism, Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1933
 Zeitlin, Jacob, Hazlitt on English Literature: An Introduction to the Appreciation of Literature, New York: Oxford University Press, 1913

Heiberg, Gunnar

Norwegian, 1857–1929

Although recognized primarily as Norway's greatest dramatist of his generation—best known for his satires and his two plays with erotic themes, Balkonen (1894; The Balcony) and Kjærlighetens tragedie (1904; The Tragedy of Love)—Gunnar Heiberg also enjoyed a reputation as one of his country's established essayists. Beginning in 1879, at around the time he wrote his first play, Tante Ulrikke (Aunt Ulrikke), Heiberg worked for various newspapers in Norway and elsewhere in Europe. Living outside of Norway for some of his life and hence commanding a European perspective, he wrote frequently on topics involving theater—e.g. in Ibsen og Bjørnson på scenen (1918; Ibsen and Bjørnson on stage) and in Norsk teater (1920; Norwegian theater)—but also on Norwegian politics and the current debate on art. He wrote with a sense of urgency and clarity.

Heiberg's primary essay collection, Pariserbreve (1900; Letters from Paris), includes portraits of authors, travel descriptions, and political journalism surrounding the Dreyfus affair. Another volume resulting from his residence in France, Franske visitter (1919; Flying visits), contains portraits of that country's literary personalities. Examples of his essays on aesthetics can be found in the collections Set og hørt (1917; Seen and heard) and Salt og sukker (1924; Salt and sugar).

Heiberg contributed to the development of the impressionistic essay, which portrayed the personalities of national writers. This subgenre of the essay made possible the interpretation of works based on the temperaments of their authors. Heiberg's portrait of the patriotic Norwegian critic and poet Henrik Wergeland (1808–45), for example, is among the most inspiring Norwegian portraits.

In his essays, Heiberg speaks to man's inner strength. His descriptions are detailed studies in which he often suggests his personal engagement or observation. It has been said that Heiberg's "artikler," as they are called, afford a veritable view of his life and character. He abhorred the lack of personal conviction and personality he sometimes observed in individuals, addressing this condition with skepticism on the one hand and wit on the other. In the public sphere, he raised humanistic concerns above politics.

Along with Nils Kjær, Heiberg is noted for his stylistic mastery of the essay. The many nuances and associations of language in his work reflect the attitude with which he approached the multifarious sides of human experience. As James McFarlane (1993) describes Heiberg's tone and content: "Acerbic, bitingly satirical, wickedly sarcastic when his indignation took command, he was at the same time possessed of a vision of love and passion and a faith in the potential for good in the individual which inform all that he wrote."

VIVIAN GREENE-GANTZBERG

Biography

Gunnar Edvard Rode Heiberg. Born 18 November 1857 in Christiania (now Oslo). Studied law at the University of Christiania, 1874–75. Traveled to Italy, where he met Ibsen, 1878–79. Wrote his first play, Tante Ulrikke (Aunt Ulrikke), 1879; published 1883, produced 1901. Worked as a journalist in Norway and abroad, from 1879, including for the Verdens Gang (World progress) newspaper, Oslo. Artistic director, National Theater, Bergen, 1884–88. Married Didi Tollefson, 1885 (divorced, 1896); also married a second time. Lived abroad, especially in Paris; returned to Oslo, 1902. Died in Oslo, 22 February 1929.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Pariserbreve, 1900

Set og hørt, 1917

Ibsen og Bjørnson på scenen, 1918

Franske visitter, 1919

Norsk teater, 1920

1905, 1923

Salt og sukker, 1924

Hugg og stikk: Artikler i utvalg, edited by Einar Skavlan, 1951

Artikler om mange ting, 1972

Artikler om teater og dramatikk, edited by Hans Heiberg, 1972

Other writings: several plays (including Tante Ulrikke [1883; Aunt Ulrikke]; Kong Midas, 1890; Balkonen [1894; The Balcony]; Kjærlighetens tragedie [1904; The Tragedy of Love]; Jeg vil væ mit land, 1912; Paradesengen, 1913) and poetry.

Further Reading

Beyer, Edvard, Norsk Litteratur Historie, Oslo: Aschehoug, 1952: 349–53

McFarlane, James, “Norwegian Literature, 1860–1910,” in A History of Norwegian Literature, edited by Harald S.Naess, Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1993:167–71

Skavlan, Einar, Gunnar Heiberg, Oslo: Aschehoug, 1950:299–336

Heidegger, Martin

German, 1889–1976

The greater part of Martin Heidegger’s writings consists of lecture courses delivered during his years of teaching, but he also employed a number of other genres: treatise, dialogue, essay. Many of his essays were first delivered orally before reaching a broad audience through publication. These pieces include some of the most dramatic and provocative of his works. While they cannot serve as complete guides to his thought, they are highly successful as stimulants which serve to indicate that a certain topic is, as the Heideggerian expression has it, “worthy of questioning.”

Heidegger’s first influential essay was his inaugural lecture, “Was ist Metaphysik?” (1929; “What Is Metaphysics?”)—a piece that is cited by almost all existentialists thereafter—but it was in the postwar period that the essay became his primary form of expression. His essays treat a broad range of topics: truth, art, theology, the poetry of Hölderlin, the nature of language, critiques of traditional philosophy. They also explore several subgenres. Many are exegetical essays, focused on the elucidation of a brief philosophical or poetic text. Others, such as “Brief über den Humanismus” (1947; “Letter on Humanism”) and “Zur Seinsfrage” (1956; “The Question of Being”) are epistolary essays, open letters to Jean Beaufret (and indirectly to Jean-Paul Sartre) and to Ernst Jünger, respectively.

Heidegger often begins, ends, or titles his essays with questions. An initial question is soon transformed into a surprising or enigmatic position, such as the assertion that “the essence of technology is by no means anything technological,” in “Die Frage nach der Technik” (1954; “The Question Concerning Technology”). This process of transformation continues in carefully crafted but bold steps, leading to a conclusion that frequently faces the audience with a riddle. The classic example here is the final line of “What Is Metaphysics?”: “Why are there beings at all, and why not rather nothing?”

Heidegger’s purpose is not to answer these questions, but to raise them—to make the problems they express come alive for his audience. An essay by Heidegger is not a linear argument directed toward proving a thesis; it is a path, sometimes a circuitous one, on which we are meant to learn the art of thinking. Heidegger titles one of his collections of essays Holzwege, or “woodpaths.” In German, to be on a Holzweg means to be lost, or on a wild goose chase; but for Heidegger, striking out on woodpaths, even if they are dead ends, is the only way to get to know the woods. The statements we encounter on these paths must always be read in the context of the movement of the essay as a whole; readers must develop an ear for the provisional and even ironic tone in which Heidegger writes many of his sentences, for he is likely to challenge the assumptions on which these assertions rest when he takes the next step in his thought.

Heidegger shows a gift for apothegms: “language is the house of being” (“Letter on Humanism”), “questioning is the piety of thought” (“The Question Concerning Technology”). He prefers a spare, concentrated style that loads each crucial word with many meanings by drawing on its phonetic and etymological resonances with other words in the essay. These resonances often prove quite difficult or impossible to translate, as when Heidegger writes in “Der Weg zur Sprache” (1959; “The Way to Language”), “Das Ereignis ereignet in seinem Er-äugen...” (roughly, “the event appropriates in its envisaging...”). This is poetic prose that depends on a gradual accumulation of sounds and senses. Heidegger both respects the history of language and is willing to experiment boldly with words and typography in order to allow this history to point us toward being itself, or the overall significance of things. He also makes demands of a different sort on his readers: he assumes that they are thoroughly familiar with the history of philosophy, so that they will understand a quotation in Greek from Aristotle or a passing reference to Hegel.

Political questions are often in the background of Heidegger’s postwar essays, and many contemporary critics focus on this dimension of the texts. Heidegger is given to the trope of claiming that what ultimately matters is not some concrete fact of pressing urgency (the atom bomb, the housing crisis, poverty) but its basis or analogue in the “history of being”—which he himself is in the best position to interpret. The most notorious example is found in “Die Gefahr” (wr. 1949; Danger), where Heidegger claims that mechanized agriculture is “essentially the same” as death camps, for both are rooted in a technological understanding of being. One may surmise that these claims served as a reassurance for postwar German audiences seeking to transcend the all-too-troubling facts of their recent past, and as an apologia for Heidegger's own choices during the Nazi period.

Heidegger's style lends itself to imitation, as is proved by the work of many commentators and followers. Jacques Derrida's essays take many Heideggerian mannerisms to an extreme (for example, Derrida has often adopted the practice of crossing out words in a text—a technique used by Heidegger in "The Question of Being"). Others, such as Anglo-American analytic philosophers, have denounced Heideggerian phrases such as "the nothing nothings" (das Nichts selbst nichtet) as absurdities. The latter phrase, in particular, which stems from "What Is Metaphysics?," was asserted by Rudolf Carnap to be strictly meaningless in his influential essay "Überwindung der Metaphysik durch logische Analyse der Sprache" (1932; "The Elimination of Metaphysics Through Logical Analysis of Language"). Today, however, when Carnap's own "logical positivism" has long fallen out of fashion, and in a period which is more tolerant of linguistic experimentation, Heidegger's essays find a wide audience in the English-speaking world.

RICHARD POLT

Biography

Born 26 April 1889 in Messkirch. Studied at gymnasia in Konstanz and Freiburg, 1903–09; the University of Freiburg, 1909–13, Ph.D., 1913. Military service, 1915–18. Lecturer, 1915–23, and assistant to Edmund Husserl, 1920–23, University of Freiburg. Married Elfride Petri, 1917: two sons and one daughter. Associate professor of philosophy, University of Marburg, 1923–28; professor of philosophy, 1928–51, chancellor, 1933–34 (resigned), and professor emeritus, 1951–57, University of Freiburg. Banned from teaching by occupation forces, 1945–50. Member, Academy of Fine Arts, Berlin; Bavarian Academy of Fine Arts. Died in Freiburg, 26 May 1976.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Existence and Being, edited by Werner Brock, translated by Douglas Scott, R.F.C.Hull, and Alan Crick, 1949

Holzwege, 1950

Vorträge und Aufsätze, 3 vols., 1954

Was heisst Denken? (lectures), 1954; as What Is Called Thinking?, translated by Fred D.Wieck and J.Glenn Gray, 1968

Was ist das—die Philosophie, 1956; as What Is Philosophy?, translated by Jean T.Wilde and William Kluback, 1958

Zur Seinsfrage, 1956; as The Question of Being, translated by Jean T.Wilde and William Kluback, 1958

Identität und Differenz, 1957; as Identity and Difference, translated by Kurt F.Leidecker, 1960, and Joan Stambaugh, 1969

Unterwegs zur Sprache, 1959; as On the Way to Language, translated by Joan Stambaugh and Peter D.Hertz, 1971
Gelassenheit, 1959; as Discourse on Thinking, translated by John M.Anderson and E.Hans Freund, 1966
Wegmarken, 1967
Zur Sache des Denkens, 1969; as On Time and Being, translated by Joan Stambaugh, 1972
Poetry, Language, Thought, translated by Albert Hofstadter, 1971
Early Greek Thinking, translated by David Farrell Krell and Frank Capuzzi, 1975
The Piety of Thinking, translated by James G.Hart and John C. Maraldo, 1976
The Question Concerning Technology and Other Essays, translated by William Lovitt, 1977
Basic Writings (various translators), edited by David Farrell Krell, 1977; revised, enlarged edition, 1993
 Other writings: many philosophical works.
 Collected works edition: Gesamtausgabe, 48 vols., 1975–94 (in progress; 100 vols. projected).

Bibliographies

Guignon, Charles B., editor, The Cambridge Companion to Heidegger, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1993:358–80
 Nordquist, Joan, Martin Heidegger: A Bibliography, Santa Cruz, California: Reference and Research Service, 1990
 Sass, Hans-Martin, Heidegger-Bibliographie, Meisenheim-on-Glan: Hain, 1968
 Sass, Hans-Martin, and others, Materialien zu einer HeideggerBibliographie, Meisenheim-on-Glan: Hain, 1975
 Sass, Hans-Martin, Martin Heidegger: Bibliography and Glossary, Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green State University Philosophy Documentation Center, 1982

Further Reading

Anderson, John M., Introduction to Discourse on Thinking by Heidegger, New York: Harper and Row, 1966
 Bailiff, John, "Truth and Power: Martin Heidegger, The Essence of Truth,' and The Self-Assertion of the German University'," Man and World 20 (August 1987):327–36
 Biemel, Walter, "On the Composition and Unity of Holzwege," in Continental Philosophy in America, edited by Hugh J.Silverman, John Sallis, and Thomas M.Seebohm, Pittsburgh: Duquesne University Press, 1983
 Caputo, John D., Demythologizing Heidegger, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1993
 Dauenhauer, Bernard P., "Heidegger, the Spokesman for the Dweller," Southern Journal of Philosophy 15 (Summer 1977): 189–99
 Fritsche, Johannes, "On Brinks and Bridges in Heidegger," Graduate Faculty Philosophy Journal 18, no. 1 (1995):111–86
 Hofstadter, Albert, Introduction to Poetry, Language, Thought by Heidegger, New York:

Harper and Row, 1971

Kockelmans, Joseph J., "Heidegger on Theology," Southwestern Journal of Philosophy 4 (Fall 1973):85–108

Krell, David Farrell, "Schlag der Liebe, Schlag des Todes: On a Theme in Heidegger and Trakl," Research in Phenomenology 7 (1977):238–58

Lovitt, William, Introduction to The Question Concerning Technology and Other Essays by Heidegger, New York and London: Harper and Row, 1977

Maly, Kenneth, "Toward 'Ereignis'," Research in Phenomenology 3 (1973):63–93

Sheehan, Thomas J., "Getting to the Topic: The New Edition of Wegmarken," in Radical Phenomenology: Essays in Honor of Martin Heidegger, edited by John Sallis, Atlantic Highlands, New Jersey: Humanities Press, 1978

Singh, R.Raj, "Heidegger and the World-Yielding Role of Language," Journal of Value Inquiry 27 (April 1993):203–14

Spanos, William V., editor, Martin Heidegger and the Question of Literature: Towards a Postmodern Literary Hermeneutics, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1979

Henríquez Ureña, Pedro

Dominican, 1884–1946

The versatile work of the philosopher, humanist, and literary critic Pedro Henríquez Ureña placed him at the center of Latin American intellectual life at the turn of the century. His production offers a wide range of interests, from books and articles on literature and linguistics—the latter usually published in magazines and newspapers—to essays on Latin American culture, history, and philosophy.

His essays focus mostly on a central theme: the idea of searching for what he calls "Our America." Henríquez Ureña is heir to the literary tradition of thinkers such as Simón Bolívar, José Martí, Andrés Bello, Eugenio María de Hostos, and José Enrique Rodó, and his writings explore Spanish America's past intellectual history in an attempt to understand its present. His work's unifying thread is his insistence on defining what he calls the spirit of "Our America," which he considers indispensable if Latin Americans are to articulate their own identity and forge their own future. Although the search for identity is not a new theme in 20th-century Latin American thought, Henríquez Ureña's vision of creating an identity that projects itself onto the future, and that aims to reconcile Spanish America's various cultural traditions, is a new preoccupation among Latin American essayists of his time.

From his Ensayos críticos (1905; Critical essays), and his Literary Currents in Spanish America (1945) to his Seis ensayos en busca de nuestra expresión (1928; Six essays in search of our expression), Henríquez Ureña is concerned with the fundamental theme of defining a culture and an identity that are unique to Spanish America while at the same time granting each nation a solid platform from which to engage with and contribute to the universal dialogue.

Rather than advocating a return to Spain or relying only on autochthonous traditions to explain Latin American reality, as most of his 19th-century predecessors and some of his contemporaries had done, Henríquez Ureña's essays look for a genuine expression by digging into Latin America's recent past. In order to be authentic, that expression needed to incorporate the European intellectual legacy with Indian and black contributions. His essays denounce as reductionist the tendencies of some Latin American elites to identify themselves only with their European background; at the same time the author criticizes the romanticized vision of those who would like to see themselves exclusively as descendants of Indian and black cultures. For Henríquez Ureña, the true expression of Spanish America's identity must necessarily emerge from the amalgam of all cultural elements, native and imported, that Latin Americans live with in their societies and express in their literature. He searches in the past for the roots of problems that are responsible for the lack of social integration in Latin American societies. The crisis of modern civilization has left Spanish America without a solid spiritual foundation from which to nourish itself. Neither the European nor the indigenous traditions alone can offer the answer to "Our America"'s future, according to Henríquez Ureña.

In many of his lectures and essays, Henríquez Ureña proposes a vision of his America as a world that embraces difference as the welcome diversity of humankind, and combines those nuances to form a rich and harmonious unity with a plurality of voices. This vision of "Our America"—a term that he borrows from José Martí—is to be developed with the participation of all members of society: young and old, rich and poor, working together for the goal of a better world based on unity and social justice. This utopian world, which he discusses in "La utopía de América" (1925; The utopia of America), is built on the premise that the cultural history of Latin America is rooted in a bed of crisis from which nations need to design the unity of a "Magna patria"—their own motherland. The ideals of sustained cooperation, faith, justice, and hope are imbedded in the construction of this utopia, where the work of all will guarantee a prosperous future for Our America.

The need for Spanish America to find a place among the nations of the world is a corollary to this effort of self-definition. For Henríquez Ureña, Spanish America's search for itself will justify its own history in the future, and will create a model society from which the rest of the world will be able to learn a true sense of justice and liberty.

Most critics agree that Henríquez Ureña's essays share a series of stylistic traits—such as a clear sense of measure, a comfortable sobriety, and a powerful directness—that stand in sharp contrast to the luscious verbosity of some of his 19th-century predecessors. Henríquez Ureña was a philologist by training, and his command of language exhibits the elegant rigor of the academic blended with the freshness of approach of the creative writer. Cintio Vitier praises Henríquez Ureña's "intellectual prose," and Alberto Zum Felde calls him "one of the greatest Latin American literary essayists," while Juan Jacobo Lara alludes to the "dispassionate objectivity in his essays," which have served as a great source of inspiration to generations of Latin Americans.

In his quest for a genuine American expression, Henríquez Ureña unearths the ideas of his Latin American forefathers, and like them he becomes an apostle and model for later generations of thinkers such as Leopoldo Zea, Edmundo O'Gorman, Octavio Paz, Mariano Picón-Salas, and Carlos Fuentes.

LOURDES ROJAS

Biography

Born 29 June 1884 in Santo Domingo, Dominican Republic. Studied at a high school in Santo Domingo, graduated 1901; Columbia University, New York, 1902; moved to Cuba, 1904, and Mexico, 1906; studied law in Mexico, law degree, 1914; University of Minnesota, Minneapolis, M.A., 1917, Ph.D., 1918. Taught at the University of Minnesota, until 1921, and the National Autonomous University of Mexico, from 1921. Married, 1923. Moved to Argentina, 1924. Professor, Colegio Nacional, La Plata, until 1930; taught at the University of Buenos Aires, Instituto del Profesorado, the Colegio Libre de Estudios Superiores, and other institutions in Buenos Aires and La Plata, from 1930. General superintendent of education, Dominican Republic, 1931–33. Charles Eliot Norton Professor, Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1940–41. Contributor to many newspapers and journals, including the Revista de Filología Hispánica (Review of Hispanic philology). Director of One Hundred Master Works series for Editorial Losada publishers, Buenos Aires. Died in La Plata, Argentina, 11 May 1946.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Ensayos críticos, 1905

Horas de estudio, 1910

El nacimiento de Dionisos: Ensayo de tragedia antigua, 1916

En la orilla: Mi España, 1922

Seis ensayos en busca de nuestra expresión, 1928

Plenitud de España: Estudios de historia de la cultura, 1940; enlarged edition, 1945

Literary Currents in Spanish America (Charles Eliot Norton lectures), 1945

Plenitud de America: Ensayos escogidos, edited by Javier Fernández, 1952

Obra crítica, edited by Emma Susana Sperati Piñero, 1960

Selección de ensayos, edited by José Rodríguez Feo, 1965; as Ensayos, 1973

Universidad y educación, 1969

Desde Washington, edited by Minerva Salado, 1975

Observaciones sobre el español en América y otros estudios filológicos, edited by Juan Carlos Ghiano, 1976

La utopía de América (selected essays), edited by Ángel Rama and Rafael Gutiérrez Giradot, 1978

Pedro Henríquez Ureña, del ensayo crítico a la historia literaria (selection), edited by Javier Lasarte Valcárcel, 1991

Other writings: short stories for adults and children, and a book on Spanish American culture (1947). Also edited collections of Argentine literature and Spanish poetry.

Collected works edition: Obras completas, edited by Juan Jacobo de Lara, 10 vols., 1976–80.

Bibliographies

- Carilla, Emilio, "Pedro Henríquez Ureña: Bibliografía comentada," Inter-American Review of Bibliography 27, no. 3 (1977):227–39
- Speralti Piñero, Emma Susana, "Cronobibliografía de don Pedro Henríquez Ureña," in Obra crítica by Henríquez Ureña, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1960:751–96

Further Reading

- Alvarez, Soledad, "Sobre el americanismo de Pedro Henríquez Ureña," Casa de las Américas 21, no. 126 (1981):63–77
- De Lara, Juan Jacobo, Pedro Henríquez Ureña: Su vida y su obra, Santo Domingo: UNPHU, 1975
- Gutiérrez Girardot, Rafael, "La historiografía literaria de Pedro Henríquez Ureña: Promesa y desafío," Casa de las Américas 24, no. 144 (1984):3–14
- Henríquez Ureña, Max, "Hermano y maestro (recuerdo de infancia y juventud)," in Pedro Henríquez Ureña: Antología, Ciudad Trujillo: Dominicana, 1950:xxi-xxii
- Jiménes-Grullón, J.I., Pedro Henríquez Ureña: Realidad y mito, y otros ensayos, Santo Domingo: Dominicana, 1969
- Leal, Luis, "Pedro Henríquez Ureña en Mexico," Revista Iberoamericana 21, nos. 41–42 (1956):19–133
- Lizaso, Felix, "Pedro Henríquez Ureña y sus precencias en Cuba," Revista Iberoamericana 21, nos. 41–42 (1956)
- Piña Conteras, Guillermo, "El universo familiar en la formación intelectual de Pedro Henríquez Ureña," Cuadernos de Poética 8, no. 2 (September-December 1994):51–91
- Reyes, Alfonso, "Evocación de Pedro Henríquez Ureña," in his Obras completas, vol. 12, Mexico: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1960:163–64
- Rodríguez Demorizi, Emilio, Dominicanidad de Pedro Henríquez Ureña, Ciudad Trujillo: University of Santo Domingo, 1947
- Roggrano, Alfredo A., Pedro Henríquez Ureña en los Estados Unidos, Mexico City: National Autonomous University of Mexico, 1961
- Sábato, Ernesto, "Significado de Pedro Henríquez Ureña," La Torre 14, no. 54 (September-December 1966):75–91
- Zum Felde, Alberto, Índice crítico de la literatura hispanoamericana: El ensayo y la crítica, Mexico City: Guarenia, 1954

Herbert, Zbigniew

Polish, 1924–

Zbigniew Herbert is an author not particularly well known for his essays; his poetry is what has earned him a reputation as one of the best contemporary writers now living in Poland. Yet his two modest collections of essays, inspired by his travels to France, Italy, and Holland—Barbarzyńca w ogrodzie (1962.; Barbarian in the Garden) and Martwa natura z wędzidłem (1991; Still Life with a Bridle: Essays and Apocryphas)—secure Herbert a place among the world’s most distinguished essayists. His modest output as an essayist is supplemented by his early and lesser-known attempts at prose writing. Herbert started his career in the late 1940s and early 1950s by publishing articles, feuilletons, and reviews of books, theater, painting, and photography. He wrote for such periodicals as Dziś i Jutro (Today and tomorrow), Słowo Powszechne (Universal word), Przegląd Powszechny (Universal review), Tygodnik Powszechny (Universal weekly), and Twórczość (Creation). Herbert’s contributions to these periodicals—along with his publications in the Paris-based Polish journals Kultura (Culture) and Zeszyty Literackie (Literary notebooks)—may indicate the kind of audience to which he addresses his essays: his readers are highly select and belong to the intellectual and literary elite. During the communist period in Poland, they also represented the unyielding and politically independent circles who confronted the authorities.

What truly defines Herbert’s select and intellectual audience is the very nature of his essays, which are sophisticated and witty, thoughtful and artistic. For the most part they represent the type of essay known as the travel essay, but not in its “pure” form: they also contain elements of the philosophical and historical essay as well as those of the critical article aiming to explain an historical event or interpret a work of art. Critics have noticed that these essays, like Herbert’s other writings, are permeated with the spirit of humanism.

One of the main traits of Herbert’s essays is their polemical character—myths, widespread beliefs, and commonly accepted opinions are often questioned, scrutinized, and revised. Herbert reveals the falsity of conventional assumptions and the fragility of established truths. His deliberations on an issue from the history of art—one of his favorite topics—almost always constitute a dispute against the “learned” judgments of savants, the immovable “wisdom” of tradition, and widely shared popular knowledge. Thus, in an essay on Gothic cathedrals, after the blunt statement, “One should finally dispose of the myth of the cathedral builders’ anonymity” (“Kamień z katedry” [1962; “A Stone from the Cathedral”]), Herbert proceeds to revise the idea. Similarly, after realizing the boldness of his questioning on other occasions, he decides, “One must blaspheme against the authors of handbooks—the Orvieto frescoes are much more impressive than Michelangelo’s frescoes in the Sistine Chapel” (“Il Duomo” [1962; “Orvieto’s Duomo”]), or, “I realize I am allowing myself to write blasphemies, because ‘Swearing of the Peace Treaty in Muenster,’ according to general opinion, is a masterpiece... I think only that this is not Terborch’s best painting ...” (“Gerard Terborch: Dyskretny urok mieszczaństwa” [1991; “Gerard Terborch: The Discreet Charm of the Bourgeoisie”]). However, in his revisionary approach to a subject, Herbert does not pretend to be omniscient. He himself hesitates, asks questions, weighs his own words, and declares that sometimes his statements may also be simply speculations. By such deliberation Herbert not only demonstrates the limitations of human knowledge about the past and the present; he also attempts, through questioning and examining, to indicate that some understanding of historical and current events is possible. Revision of myths, beliefs, and opinions helps remove mendacities gathered like patina on works of history and art. Karl Dedecius (1975), who detects the same feature in Herbert's poetry, rightly notices that Herbert, with the same purpose in mind, travels like a "barbarian" through the "garden" of European culture and tradition. He sets out to the mythical places he has always heard of and explores them himself to uncover hidden truths and to gain authentic knowledge.

The polemical character of Herbert's essays is also revealed in the selection of his subjects. His travel essays are indeed, as the author says, a confrontation of "monuments, books, and paintings with the real sky, the real sea, and the real land" ("Delta," 1989). But when he writes about Dutch art and landscape, about French or Italian Gothic cathedrals and the shape of the terrain, and about Doric temples and the sunlight, or even when he relates the course of a 16th-century battle as recorded in a Dutch chronicle, Herbert's interest does not lie in what is obvious, typical, and expected from the choice of such a subject. Instead he searches for and describes things which are either unknown or unnoticed, as well as things traditionally considered insignificant and not worth mentioning. A famous painting as the theme of an essay serves as an inspiration for a commentary on the material conditions of painters of a given epoch ("Cena sztuki" [1991; "The Price of Art"]); the subject of a Gothic cathedral brings about a detailed account of a church construction technique in the Middle Ages ("A Stone from the Cathedral"). Critics have noticed that Herbert is interested in defeated civilizations and defeated individuals, in nations that failed and in peoples whose "tribulations and defeats left no trace and had no career in history." Herbert's selection of the subject allows him to make good use of irony, his favorite literary device. He comments frequently on history in a familiar tone of voice, and from the convenient distance of a contemporary observer.

The polemic, as one of the main traits of Herbert's essays, obviously determines his style. But this polemic is discreet; questioning, arguing, and proposing new answers are not dominant characteristics of Herbert's style. Other stylistic elements are more conspicuous. Herbert's vocabulary is simple but representative of poetic prose. Polished, subtle, and ingenious metaphors are common; especially captivating are the metaphors used in descriptions of works of art: in the Greek column "under the weight of the architrave a branchy capital is swollen from an effort" ("U Dorów" [1962; "Among the Dorians"]).

The specific artistic qualities of the two collections of essays may point to Herbert's affinities with such masters of the essay as Paul Valéry and T.S.Eliot, and place him among the best of the 20th-century Polish essayists, such as Jerzy Stempowski, Mieczysław Jastrun, and Czesław Miłosz. It is surprising that Herbert's fine essays have so far attracted little attention from critics; the fact that he is famous for his outstanding poetry cannot explain this neglect.

ANDRZEJ KARCZ

Biography

Born 29 October 1924 in Lvov. Studied at the Academy of Economics, Cracow, M.A. in economics, 1947; Nicholas Copernicus University of Toruń, M.A. in law, 1949; University of Warsaw, M.A. in philosophy, 1950; also studied briefly at Jagiellonian University and the Academy of Fine Arts, Cracow. Worked for Twórczość literary monthly, 1955–65; coeditor, Poezja (Poetry), 1965–68. Married Katarzyna Dziejuszycska, 1968. Taught at California State College, Los Angeles, 1970–71, and University of Gdańsk, 1972. Awards: several, including the Nikolaus Lenau Prize (Austria), 1965; Herder Prize, 1973; Knight's Cross, Order of Polonia Restituta, 1974; Petrarch Prize, 1979; Jerusalem Prize, 1991; Ingersoll Prize, 1995.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Barbarzyńca w ogrodzie, 1962; as Barbarian in the Garden, translated by Michael March and Jarosław Anders, 1985

Still Life with a Bridle: Essays and Apocryphas, translated by John and Bogdana Carpenter, 1991; as Martwa natura z wędzidłem, 1993

Other writings: many collections of poetry (including Pan Cogito [Mr. Cogito], 1974; Raport z oblężonego miasta [Report from the Besieged City and Other Poems], 1983, and several Selected Poems), and several plays.

Further Reading

Dedecius, Karl, "Anbau der Philosophie: Zbigniew Herbert auf der Suche nach Selbstgewissheit," in his Polnische Prophile, Frankfurt-on-Main: Suhrkamp, 1975

Dybciak, Krzysztof, "W poszukiwaniu istoty i utraconych wartości," in his Gry i katastrofy, Warsaw: Biblioteka Więzi, 1980

Kijowski, Andrzej, "Pielgrzym," Twórczość 5 (1963):57–60

Kijowski, Andrzej, "Outcast of Obvious Forms," Polish Perspectives 2 (1966):34–41

Kott, Jan, Introduction to Four Decades of Polish Essays, edited by Kott, Evanston, Illinois: Northwestern University Press, 1990

Kwiatkowski, Jerzy, "Symbol trwałości," Życie Literackie 9 (1963)

Herder, Johann Gottfried

German, 1744–1803

Johann Gottfried Herder lived in an age of momentous change and enormous creativity in German culture. He was a student of Immanuel Kant, a dialogue partner of Gotthold Ephraim Lessing, and a mentor and friend of Johann Wolfgang von Goethe. Therefore, Herder is often mentioned in conjunction with others rather than for his own sake. His image is still distorted, as he is labeled a "pre-Romantic" and anti-Enlightenment thinker, whereas he tried to combine both trends. He is not remembered for one towering achievement, but for the many seeds he sowed in different disciplines such as aesthetics, literary criticism and history, philosophy of history, language theory, anthropology, psychology, and education. He was a theologian by profession, and worked as a high official in the Lutheran church. He was a renowned preacher, and contributed new ideas to Bible studies and the education of Lutheran ministers. Herder was also a singularly gifted translator and adapter of poetry from many languages and cultures. He is best remembered for his seminal anthology of folksongs from many cultures and ages, originally called Volkslieder (1778–79) but later renamed Stimmen der Völker in Liedern (Voices of the peoples in songs). This anthology and Herder's concept of folk poetry had a tremendous impact on the Romantic search for national identity, above all in Eastern and Southeastern Europe.

Herder believed in the power of the spoken word, as he practiced it in his sermons. He considered the written text a poor substitute for direct speech and enriched it with features from oral language. He considered poetry the original and most powerful form of human communication, and interspersed his prose with poems or poetic quotations. He preferred informal and communicative genres, such as dialogues, letters, and speeches. The style of his early works is effusive and intense, but even his more measured later prose remains emotional and personal, full of dashes, exclamation points, and rhetorical questions.

Herder was a universalist and had grand and ambitious projects. He considered his texts mere preliminaries for the real work, and liked to use titles such as “ideas,” “fragments,” “contributions,” and “thoughts on...” Recent Scholarship has defined his style and approach as “essayistic” (e.g. John A. McCarthy, 1989; James van der Laan, 1990). Even Herder's magnum opus, Ideen zur Philosophie der Geschichte der Menschheit (1785–91; Ideas for a Philosophy of the History of Man), is unfinished and fragmentary in many of its sections.

In Herder's Germany, the word “essay” had not yet entered the vocabulary; instead, other words were used, such as Versuch, Aufsatz, and Abhandlung, the latter dangerously close to academic writing. However, the short form of prose for an educated general audience, neither too academic and ponderous nor too flippantly superficial, and also not tied to religious observances, was in demand, especially for the emerging periodical press. It was meant for a public with no patience for complex language and deep thoughts. Such pieces could be read aloud and discussed in social circles, and applied to real-life situations. Herder was a popular author for these circles and contributed biographical essays, book reviews, essays on literature and the arts, and essays about philosophical and religious questions. Such essays, first published in journals, were usually republished in collections of poetry and prose, notably six installments of Zerstreute Blätter (1785–97; Scattered leaves). In the last decade of his life, Herder wrote short prose texts for collections, such as Briefe zur Beförderung der Humanität (1793–97; Letters for the advancement of humanity) and Adrastea (1801–04).

Herder was and is still faulted for his “unacademic” style, yet he showed perseverance in one academic genre of his age, the so-called prize essays for Academies of Science. He won prizes from the Prussian and Bavarian Academies, first with his Abhandlung über den Ursprung der Sprache (1772; Essay on the Origin of Language), but he did not win a prize with the important psychological treatise Vom Erkennen und Empfinden der menschlichen Seele (1778; On the cognition and sensation of the human soul), although he wrote three versions and submitted the essay twice. Most of Herder's prize essays held controversial positions, but the judges' major objection was their nonacademic style.

Herder is not known for really outstanding individual essays, except the treatise on the origin of language, but some deserve special mention, not least because of their impact—for instance, his two essays in Von deutscher Art und Kunst (1773; On German art), a volume edited by Herder that also contains texts by Goethe, Justus Möser, and Paoli Frisi. “Shakespear” is an enthusiastic defense of Shakespeare’s form of the drama against classical norms, comparing Shakespeare to Sophocles. Despite its title, “Auszug aus einem Briefwechsel über Ossian und die Lieder alter Völker” (Extract from a correspondence about Ossian and the songs of ancient peoples) deals primarily with folksongs, and only secondarily with the problem of whether MacPherson’s Ossian was genuine Gaelic folk poetry, and how his texts should be translated.

Zerstreute Blätter reprinted major pieces from previous years, and included numerous noteworthy essays. To mention two theme essays: “Nemesis: Ein lehrendes Sinnbild” (Nemesis: a didactic symbol) traces the Greek goddess and concept of Nemesis as the balance of justice in history and human affairs and reintroduces it as a key concept. “Tithon und Aurora” (1792) discusses aging and rejuvenation as well as radical changes such as revolutions, introducing the idea of evolution. The volumes also include biographical essays, such as the eulogy on Gotthold Ephraim Lessing, written after his unexpected death. “Über ein morgenländisches Drama” (1792; On an Oriental play) is a book review of the German translation of the Indian play Sakontala by Kalidasa, a translation by Georg Forster from the English. Sakontala is seen as a valid example of a non-Aristotelian drama, and as a demonstration of the significance of non-Western art. Herder wrote many book review essays, the most influential being the review of Heinrich Wilhelm von Gerstenberg’s tragedy Ugolino in the Allgemeine Deutsche Bibliothek (General German library) of 1770, considered a model of sympathetic understanding.

The Briefe zur Beförderung der Humanität offer significant texts on key concepts, such as “Humanität” and “Geist der Zeit” (spirit of the age). Other collections contain Herder’s influential reflections on ideas such as the immortality of the soul, palingenesis, and reincarnation. Both Adrastea and the Briefe end in sections condemning colonialism and the European domination and exploitation of the globe.

Since Herder’s shorter texts were much more popular than his larger works, they were often anthologized, together with extracts from his major books. His impact was considerable though not always acknowledged, since he had committed the grave sin in his last years of opposing the critical philosophy of Kant and the classical poetics of Goethe and Schiller. Still, his call for an openness to all cultures and his validation of national identity and folk poetry made him a revered figure for many movements of national liberation. Postmodernism is discovering the essayistic and forward-looking features of his texts, and has a new sensibility for his idiom fusing prose and poetry.

WULF KOEPKE

Biography

Born 25 August 1744 in Mohrungen (now Morag), East Prussia. Studied theology, literature, and philosophy under Immanuel Kant at the University of Königsberg, 1762–

64. Teacher at the Cathedral School, Riga, 1764–69; preached in several churches in Riga. Traveled in France, and traveling companion to Prince Wilhelm of Holstein, 1769–70; stayed in Strasbourg for eye operation and met and became friends with Goethe, 1770. Pastor, consistorial councillor, and superintendent to the petty court of SchaumburgLippe, Bückeberg, 1771–76. Married Caroline Flachsland, 1773: six children. Consistorial councillor, general superintendent, and court preacher, Weimar, 1776–1803. Elected external member, Prussian Academy of Science, 1787. Traveled to Italy, 1788–89. Awards: Prussian Academy of Sciences Prize, for essay, 1772, 1775, and 1780 (Berlin), 1778 and 1779 (Munich). Died in Weimar, 18 December 1803.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Haben wir noch jetzt das Publikum und Vaterland der Alten?, 1765

Über die neuere Deutsche Litteratur: Fragmente, 3 vols., 1767; parts in Selected Early Works 1764–1767, translated by Ernest A. Menze and Karl Menges, 1992

Abhandlung über den Ursprung der Sprache, 1772; edited by Wolfgang Pross, 1978; as Treatise upon the Origin of Language, translated anonymously, 1827; as Essay on the Origin of Language, translated by John H. Moran and Alexander Gode, 1966

Von deutscher Art und Kunst: Einige fliegende Blätter, with Goethe, Justus Möser, and Paoli Frisi, 1773; edited by Hans Dietrich Irmscher, 1968

Auch eine Philosophie der Geschichte zur Bildung der Menschheit, 1774; edited by Hans Georg Gadamer, 1967; as Yet Another Philosophy of History for the Education of Humanity, translated by Eva Herzfeld, 1968

Älteste Urkunde des Menschengeschlechts, 2 vols., 1774–76

Ursachen des gesunkenen Geschmacks bei den verschiedenen Völkern, da er geblühet, 1775

Vom Erkennen und Empfinden der menschlichen Seele, 1778

Briefe, das Studium der Theologie betreffend, 2 vols., 1780–81

Vom Geist der ebräischen Poesie, 2 vols., 1782–83; as The Spirit of Hebrew Poetry, translated by James D. Marsh, 1833, reprinted 1971

Ideen zur Philosophie der Geschichte der Menschheit, 4 vols., 1785–91; as Outlines of a Philosophy of the History of Man, translated by T. Churchill, 1800, reprinted 1966; abridged edition, as Ideas for a Philosophy of the History of Man, edited by Frank E. Manuel, 1968

Zerstreute Blätter, 6 vols., 1785–97

Gott: Einige Gespräche, 1787; revised edition, 1800; as God: Some Conversations, translated by Frederick H. Burkhardt, 1940

Briefe zur Beförderung der Humanität, 10 collections, 1793–97

Adrastea, 6 vols., 1801–04

Johann Gottfried Herder on Social and Political Culture, edited and translated by F.M. Barnard, 1969

Selected Early Works, 1764–1767: Addresses, Essays, and Drafts; Fragments on Recent German Literature, edited and translated by Ernest A. Menze and Karl Menges, 1992

Against Pure Reason: Writings on Religion, Language, and History, edited and translated by Marcia Bunge, 1993

Vom Geist des Christentums: Aus den "Christlichen Schriften" (1793–1798), edited by

Herbert von Hintzenstern, 1994

On World History: Johann Gottfried Herder: An Anthology, edited by Hans Adler and Ernest A. Menze, translated by Menze and Michael Palma, 1997

Other writings: works on philosophy (including Metakritik against Kant's critical philosophy, 1799), aesthetics (Kritische Wällder, 3 vols., 1769), theology, and history, and correspondence. Also compiled a collection of European-language folksongs (1778–79).

Collected works editions: Sämtliche Werke, edited by Bernhard Suphan and others, 33 vols., 1877–1913, reprinted 1994; Werke, edited by Wolfgang Pross, 3 vols., 1984–88; Werke, 10 vols., 1985 (in progress); Ausgewählte Werke in Einzelausgaben, edited by Regine Otto and others, 1985– (in progress).

Bibliographies

Günther, Gottfried, Albina A. Volgina, and Siegfried Seifert, HerderBibliographie, Berlin and Weimar: Aufbau, 1978

Irmscher, Hans Dietrich, and Emil Adler, Der handschriftliche Nachlass Johann Gottfried Herders, Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz, 1979

Kuhles, Doris, Herder-Bibliographie 1977–1992, Stuttgart: Metzler, 1994

Further Reading

Barnard, F.M., Herder's Social and Political Thought: From Enlightenment to Nationalism, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1965

Barnard, F.M., Self-Direction and Political Legitimacy: Rousseau and Herder, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1988

Berlin, Isaiah, Vico and Herder: Two Studies on the History of Ideas, London: Hogarth Press, and New York: Viking Press, 1976

Clark, Robert T., Herder: His Life and Thought, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1955

Fink, Karl J., "Tithonism: Herder's Concept of Literary Revival," in Johann Gottfried Herder: Language, History, and the Enlightenment, edited by Wulf Koepke, Columbia, South Carolina: Camden House, 1990:196–208

Haym, Rudolf, Herder nach seinem Leben und seinen Werken dargestellt, Berlin: Weidmann, 2 vols., 1877–85

Irmscher, Hans Dietrich, "Grundzüge der Hermeneutik Herders," in Bückerburger Gespräche über Johann Gottfried Herder 1971, edited by Johann Gottfried Maltusch, Bückeberg: Grimme, 1973: 17–57

Irmscher, Hans Dietrich, "Herder über das Verhältnis des Autors zum Publikum," in Bückerburger Gespräche über Johann Gottfried Herder 1975, edited by Johann Gottfried Maltusch, Rinteln: Bösendahl, 1976:17–57

Irmscher, Hans Dietrich, "Beobachtungen zur Funktion der Analogie im Denken Herders," Deutsche Vierteljahrsschrift für Literaturwissenschaft und Geistesgeschichte 55 (1981):64–97

Koepke, Wulf, "Herders Totengespräch mit Lessing," in Aufnahme—Weitergabe: Literarische Impulse um Lessing und Goethe, edited by John A. McCarthy and Albert

- A.Kipa, Hamburg: Buske, 1982:125–42.
- Koepke, Wulf, “Herder’s Craft of Communication,” in The Philosopher as Writer: The Eighteenth Century, edited by Robert Ginsberg, Selinsgrove, Pennsylvania: Susquehanna University Press, and London: Associated University Presses, 1987:94–121
- Koepke, Wulf, Johann Gottfried Herder, Boston: Twayne, 1987
- Koepke, Wulf, “Herders Zerstreute Blätter und die Struktur der Sammlung,” Herder Yearbook 1 (1992):98–117
- La Vopa, Anthony J., “Herder’s Publikum: Language, Print, and Sociability in Eighteenth-Century Germany,” Eighteenth-Century Studies 29 (1995):5–24
- Liebel-Weckowicz, Helen, “Herder’s Place in the Development of Ideas on Human Genesis and Evolution,” Eighteenth-Century Life 9 (1984):62–82
- McCarthy, John A., Crossing Boundaries: A Theory and History of Essay Writing in German, 1680–1815, Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1989
- Möser, Walter, “Herder’s System of Metaphors in the Ideen,” in Johann Gottfried Herder: Innovator Through the Ages, edited by Wulf Koepke, Bonn: Bouvier, 1982:102–24
- Nisbet, H.B., Herder and the Philosophy and History of Science, Cambridge: Modern Humanities Research Association, 1970
- Norton, Robert E., Herder’s Aesthetics and the European Enlightenment, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1991
- van der Laan, James M., “Herder’s Essayistic Style,” in Johann Gottfried Herder: Language, History, and the Enlightenment, edited by Wulf Koepke, Columbia, South Carolina: Camden House, 1990:108–23

Herling-Grudziński, Gustaw

Polish, 1919–

Gustaw Herling-Grudziński writes about fundamental things that determine the human condition: good and evil, love and hate, the yearnings and limitations of existence. The material for his reflections are significant examples from literature, history, art, and contemporary social and political life. The essay, with its formal flexibility, seems the best genre for both his unrestrained thinking and his eloquent style. The voice of Herling-Grudziński the essayist can be heard even in some of his short stories and in his famous novel A World Apart (1951; Inny świat), a retelling of his own experiences and observations in the Soviet labor camp Ertsevo, where he spent almost two years (1940–42). Conversely, Herling-Grudziński’s eminent talent for storytelling is the moving force behind some of his essays. His affinity for mixed literary forms led to the unique Dziennik pisany nocą (Journal Written at Night), composed of essays, short stories, book reviews, and comments on political and cultural events and published in the Polish émigré monthly Kultura in Paris from the 1971 onward, and in six separate volumes so far.

After World War II Herling-Grudziński lived and published in Rome and London. From 1948 to 1952 he was a contributor to the London-based Polish weekly Wiadomości

Literackie (Literary news). In 1955 he settled in Naples, and has since been a regular contributor to Kultura and the Italian monthly Tempo Presente. Although a polyglot, Herling-Grudziński writes mainly in Polish and addresses himself to Polish-speaking readers. During the 1980s Herling-Grudziński was one of the most popular émigré authors in Poland, a moral authority in the Polish effort to abolish the communist system. Beginning in 1988 his books were officially published in his native country, and he has gained the reputation of being a brilliant and original Polish essayist.

Herling-Grudziński is a real “devourer and masticator of books,” as Jerzy Paszek (1992) describes him. He has published insightful essays on the works of Kafka, Camus, Dostoevskii, Pasternak, Bulgakov, Solzhenitsyn, Isaac Babel’, Simone Weil, Joseph Conrad, Graham Greene, and Giuseppe Tomasi di Lampedusa. To highlight the uniqueness of each author, Herling-Grudziński often compares the approaches of two or more authors to the same question. In “Dwie świętości” (1949; Two sanctities), which is devoted to everyday human heroism (a favorite theme), he contrasts Graham Greene’s appreciation for Catholic sanctity with Camus’ recognition of laic sanctity: “Between the theological abstraction, which commands us to suffer in silence for reward in heaven, and the humanist abstraction, which commands us to die and kill in the name of utopia’s mirage, there is and will always be room for the laic sanctity, which commands us to fight against despair for one reason only: to relieve human suffering.” In “Sąd ostateczny” (1957; Last judgment), an essay on “the adventures of the soul in its quest for grace,” the kinship and the polemics between Kafka’s and Camus’ novels—seen as ethical and metaphysical treatises—are traced. Through a comparison between Joseph Conrad’s Under Western Eyes and Dostoevskii’s Crime and Punishment (“W oczach Conrada” [1957; In Conrad’s eyes]), Herling-Grudziński elaborates on the secrets of the persuasive power of fiction. He is a profound reader and interpreter of Solzhenitsyn’s “polyphonic” novels (“Jegor i Iwan Denisowicz” [1963; Egor and Ivan Denisovich]; “Realizm rosyjski” [1968; Russian realism]; “Godzina prawdy” [1968; The hour of truth]) and Boris Pasternak’s poems and Doctor Zhivago (“Zwyciestwo Borysa Pasternaka” [1957; Boris Pasternak’s victory]; “Wielka Ksiązka” [1958; A great book]). Herling-Grudziński’s critical commentaries on contemporary Polish literature have been highly influential in creating the modern Polish literary sensibility.

Herling-Grudziński’s essays on painting display a similar humanistic interpretive approach. His reflections on the famous works of Correggio, Caravaggio, Rembrandt, Vermeer, and Ribera reveal his intuitive perception of particular pictures as well as his expertise in this field. Animated by Herling-Grudziński’s imagination, the artists’ personalities loom large behind the paintings discussed.

A characteristic of Herling-Grudziński’s essays is the depiction of the individual at a dramatic moment of history as a way of particularizing the human condition. The author’s own experience of the turning points of 20th-century history has given his observations worldly wisdom and understanding. Whether he writes on the plague in Naples in 1656 (“Dżuma w Neapolu” [1990; The plague in Naples]) or on the martial law in Poland, whether on the idea of revolution (“Wiek rewolucji” [1952; The age of revolution]) or on the Holocaust (“Demon naszych czasów” [1963; The demon of our time, a brilliant essay on Hannah Arendt’s Eichmann in Jerusalem), Herling-Grudziński is always concerned with the eternal problem of good and evil and the individual’s responsibility in choosing between them.

Riddles of the past fascinate Herling-Grudziński. A few of his masterpieces are accounts of his own investigations into an object, a story, or a figure from the past (“Srebrna szkatułka” [1994; The silver casket]; “Monolog o martwej mniszce” [1991; A monologue about the dead nun]; “Dżuma w Neapolu”). The essay “Siedem śmierci Maksyma Gorkiego” (1954; The seven deaths of Maksim Gor’kii) is exemplary of Herling-Grudziński’s special interest in the history of communist Russia and in the totalitarian mechanisms of falsifying reality, a phenomenon he closely analyzes in A World Apart.

Suspicious of generalizations, Herling-Grudziński has developed a sharp sense of the importance of the concrete. By exploring the fate of the individual he unearths truths about human hope and despair, about the moral dimension of human life. In his ethical judgments, however, Herling-Grudziński is not a moralist; the hierarchy of moral values that he has adopted from the “laic saint,” along with his civil courage, have earned him devoted readers, who belong to different social and professional groups but share the belief that literature, art, and culture as a whole unavoidably reflect the human condition and are, therefore, a source of knowledge about humankind.

KATIA MITOVA-JANOWSKI

Biography

Born 20 May 1919 in Kielce. Studied Polish literature at the University of Warsaw, 1937–39; editor, Orka na Ugorze (Plowing the fallow field) weekly. Following the 1939 September campaign at the beginning of World War II, he organized the anti-Nazi underground group PLAN and the newspaper Biuletyn Polski (Polish bulletin), 1939–40; deported to a Soviet labor camp near Archangelsk, 1940; released, 1942, and joined the Polish forces fighting on the side of the Allies against the Germans in Italy. Literary editor, Orzeł Biały (White eagle), 1945–47; frequent contributor to the Paris-based Polish émigré monthly Kultura, from 1947, and associated with the group of Polish émigré writers based around it, including Czesław Miłosz, Witold Gombrowicz, Józef Czapski, Jerzy Stempowski, Konstanty A. Jeleński, and Marek Hłasko. Lived in London and worked for the émigré weekly Wiadomości Literackie, 1948–52. Moved to Naples, 1955; contributor to the Italian monthly Tempo Presente. Visited Poland, 1991. Awards: honorary degree from the University of Poznań.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Zywi i umarli, 1945

Drugie przyjście oraz inne opowiadania, 1963; as “The Second Coming,” translated by Ronald Strom, in The Island: Three Tales, 1967

Upiory rewolucji, 1969

Dziennik pisany nocą, 6 vols., 1973–93; part as Volcano and Miracle: A Selection of Fiction and Nonfiction from the Journal Written at Night, translated by Ronald Strom,

1996

Godzina Cieni, Eseje, edited by Zdzisław Kudelski, 1991*Wyjścia z milczenia*, 1993*Sześć medalionów i srebrna szkatułka*, 1994

Other writings: the autobiographical novel A World Apart (1951; pub. in Polish as Inny świat, 1955), short stories (some translated in The Island, 1990), and literary criticism.

Collected works edition: Pisma zebrane, 1994– (in progress).

Further Reading

Kandulski, Henryk, "O Herlingu-Grudzińskim," Arka 18 (1987): 30–3

Kudelski, Zdzisław, Pielgrzym Świętokrzyski: Szkice o Herlingu-Grudzińskim, Lublin: Fis, 1991

Nycz, Ryszard, "Zamknięty odprysk świata," Teksty Drugie 1–2 (1991):35–46

Paszek, Jerzy, Gustaw Herling-Grudziński, Katowice: Śląsk, 1992

Pomian, Krzysztof, "Herling-Grudziński: Emigracja heroiczna," Kultura 12 (1981):82–86

Przybylski, Ryszard Kazimierz, Być i pisać: O prozie Gustava Herlinga-Grudzińskiego, Poznań: Wydawnictwo A5, 1991

Wysłouch, Seweryna, and Ryszard Przybylski, editors, Etos i artyzm: Rzecz o Herlingu-Grudzińskim, Poznań: Wydawnictwo A5, 1991

Herzen, Aleksandr

Russian, 1812–1870

Aleksandr Herzen was to the modern Russian essay what Aleksandr Pushkin was to verbal art: he created standards of language and genre that later essayists could not ignore and would use as points of departure. Claimed as their direct forebear by radical leftists and Westernizers, Herzen also exerted a considerable influence upon intellectuals of all stripes. Beginning in the mid-1830s, Herzen wrote a large number of articles, editorials, reviews, and open letters. His most famous essays were written in cycles. His first major works, the cycles Diletantizm v nauke (1842–43; Dilettantism in science) and Pis'ma ob izuchenii prirody (1845–46; Letters on the study of nature), were published in Russia in the journal Otechestvennye Zapiski (Fatherland notes). Herzen took his family into exile in Europe in January 1847, deciding to remain abroad as long as Russia was oppressed with censorship and serfdom. Real social change, he argued, was happening in France, far away from the stagnant regime of Tsar Nicholas I. In his first two years in Europe during and after the turmoil of 1848, Herzen wrote perhaps his greatest single essayistic cycle, S togo berega (first pub. in German, 1850, in Russian, 1855; From the Other Shore).

Disillusioned with the results of the revolution, Herzen turned his essayistic efforts to acquainting European intellectuals with the political and social conditions of Russian life.

His writing no longer took the form of essay cycles, but rather of separate articles. The essay Le Peuple russe et le socialisme (1851; The Russian People and Socialism), an open letter to the French historian Jules Michelet, is among the best examples of this writing. Most importantly, Herzen saw his chief purpose in acting as a free, uncensored voice speaking to educated Russians about taboo political and social issues. In 1853 Herzen opened his Free Russian Press in London. Separate numbers of his almanac, Poliarnaia Zvezda (1855–69; The polar star), and his newspaper, Kolokol (1857–67; The bell), were smuggled across the border, where they were read avidly and in tight secrecy, so that by 1862, when the ban on Herzen's name was officially lifted, thousands of readers were at least acquainted with his ideas.

Herzen's "moral education" was strongly founded on a youthful love for the German Sturm und Drang movement and its most prominent writers, Schiller and Goethe, and a later affinity for German idealist philosophy, particularly that of F. W.J.von Schelling. In Schiller's writings he found a high valuation of friendship that went beyond the individuals involved to a devotion to the betterment of society, nation, indeed, all humanity. From both Schiller and Schelling he adopted a belief in the power of the conscious, knowing self to form the surrounding environment. In these early responses to literature and philosophy can be found that generosity of spirit that would distinguish his greatest essays. The concept of socialism first became known to Herzen in 1834 when he read the French utopian socialist, Henri Saint-Simon. It was in Hegel that, in the 1840s, Herzen found what he called "the algebra of revolution." Although he developed political beliefs considerably more radical than those of most of his generation, he always held onto a faith in the private and public responsibility of the individual self and was always skeptical of social utopias, philosophical systems, and political theories abstracted from life experience.

Herzen's essay style combines breadth of spirit and passion with a sharp satirical wit normally associated with Gogol'. The goal of his essays was, as he put it, "to convince by making a strong impression." Thus, the force of his argument rested frequently on a few striking points rather than on pedantic adumbration of facts. In Herzen's time most major philosophical essays were written in French or German. If they were written in Russian, they tended to be so narrowly scholastic as to be unreadable by all but a narrow clique of academics. Herzen had the following to say about the generation of students of the late 1830s who were devoted to the study of German philosophy: "Our young philosophers ruined not only their native language but their understanding. Their attitude toward reality became scholastic and literary... Everything really direct, every simple feeling was reduced to an abstract category, and as a result became emptied of life—a pale, algebraic shadow." The great contribution of Herzen's early career was to make philosophical inquiry accessible to educated Russian readers and to use it to build a new practice of public discourse in the Russian language. His greatest works, From the Other Shore and his autobiography, Byloe i dumy (wr. 1852–68, pub. 1855–69; My Past and Thoughts), are both brilliant performances of this new discourse.

The discussion of philosophy in Russian is directly linked in all Herzen's writings to the creation of a new kind of public self. Herzen grew up in the 1820s when the chief model of social selfhood was the honnête homme, a kind of social chameleon who could adapt harmoniously to any circle in high society. Modeled in part on Goethe, Herzen's public self was broadly educated and conversant in a variety of contemporary scientific, literary, and, by inference, social-political developments. Aesthetically and scientifically educated people, Herzen suggested, are in a position to be socially responsible, not just to adapt to but to exert an influence upon their social environment. In his first major cycle, Diletantizm v nauke, Herzen made the point as clearly as the oppressive times allowed: "...from the temple of science [read also: philosophy] humanity will issue forth with proud uplifted brow inspired by consciousness toward the creation of the kingdom of heaven." Herzen's interest in philosophy and science was always directed away from the thin air of pure theory and toward engagement with "reality," experience, and action.

The targets of Herzen's early invective (for example, in "Moskvitianin'o kopernike" [1843; "The Muscovite" on Copernicus]) were conservative circles in educated Russian society based around such journals as Moskvitianin (The Muscovite) and their sycophantic concept of "nationalism" which aped that proclaimed by the court. He also made fun of their incompetence in matters of science and thought. In Diletantizm v nauke he wittily undermined a prevalent attitude of political quietism and argued for an outlet for scientific knowledge in the real world. Pis'ma ob izuchenii prirody argued against scholastic scientific inquiry and created a positive image of the well-rounded thinker, naturalist, and artist. From the Other Shore was addressed to issues of broad European interest. Here Herzen stood against the abstract ideals and systems of the radical elite—this time, Hegelian historical teleology. He argued instead that human history is really an outgrowth of natural chaos. Disillusioned with the French revolutionary experience, in his post-1848 writings Herzen found a new model for the realization of socialism, the Russian peasant and the peasant mir or commune. This new populism was expressed in the open letter to Michelet.

The motto of Kolokol was a quotation from Schiller: "I call to the living." Herzen announced the strongly political program of exposing every injustice and corrupt act to the light of the media: "The Bell [Kolokol] will resound with whatever touches it—the absurd decree, or the senseless persecution of Old Believers, grandees' thievery or the ignorance of the Senate. The comic and the criminal, the malicious and the crude—all will play to the sound of The Bell." Here for the first time in Russian history was a consistent, long-term assault on the internal politics of the tsarist regime. It is not by chance that Herzen became known as a "second government."

Herzen acted as a bridge between the 1840s generation of idealistically minded "superfluous men," and the radical utilitarians—Nikolai Chernyshevskii and others—of the 1860s; his achievements were strongly admired by Russia's Marxists. Nonetheless, it is essential to remember his considerable impact on writers and thinkers of other orientations, for example, Dostoevskii, whose dramatic, philosophical dialogues owe much to the thinker, Tolstoi and Pasternak, whose views of history were strongly influenced by Herzen, and the Marxist-turned-Idealist philosopher, Semion Frank.

EDITH W. CLOWES

Biography

Aleksandr Ivanovich Herzen. Born 25 March 1812 in Moscow. Studied physics and mathematics at Moscow University, 1829–33, degree, 1833. Joined a group of students to debate progressive ideas: arrested with other members and charged with “dangerous free-thinking,” 1834: exiled as a government clerk in Perm’, 1835, Viatka, 1835–37, and Vladimir, 1837–39. Married Natal’ia Zakhar’ina (died, 1852), 1838: eight children (only one son and two daughters survived infancy). Clerk, Ministry of Internal Affairs, Moscow, 1839, and St. Petersburg, 1840. Exiled again to Novgorod on the grounds of spreading baseless rumors, 1841, but permitted to return to live in Moscow, 1842. Wrote a series of essays on philosophy and the natural sciences using the name Iskander, 1842–47. Moved to Europe, 1847, living in Paris, 1847–49, then Switzerland and Nice, 1849–52. His mother and son killed in shipwreck, 1851, and his wife died after an affair with the German poet Georg Herwegh, 1852. Lived in London, 1852–64, where he was joined by Nikolai Ogar’ev, with whose wife he had an affair; coeditor, with Ogar’ev, of émigré publications throughout the 1850s and 1860s; founder, Free Russian Press, 1853, Poliarnaia Zvezda, 1855–69, and Kolokol, 1857–67. Lived mainly in Switzerland, 1865–69. Died in Paris, 11 January 1870.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Diletantizm v nauke, 1842–43

Pis'ma ob izuchenii prirody, 1845–46

Vom anderen Ufer, 1850; as S togo berega, 1855; as From the Other Shore, translated by Moura Budberg, 1956

Le Peuple russe et le socialisme: Lettre à Monsieur J.Michelet, 1855; as Russkii narod i sotsializm, 1858; as The Russian People and Their Socialism: A Letter to M.J.Michelet, translated by V. Linton, 1855; as The Russian People and Socialism: An Open Letter to Jules Michelet, translated by Richard Wollheim, 1956

Byloe i dumy, in Poliarnaia zvezda, 1855–69; as My Exile in Siberia, translated by M.Meizenburg, 2 vols., 1855; as The Memoirs of Alexander Herzen, translated by J.D.Duff, 1923; as My Past and Thoughts, translated by Constance Garnett, 6 vols., 1924–27, and abridged in 1 vol., 1968, revised by Humphrey Higgins, 1982; part as Ends and Beginnings, edited by Alice Kelly, 1985; part as Childhood, Youth and Exile, translated by J. D.Duff, 1979

“Kontsy i nachala” (Ends and beginnings), in Kolokol (The bell), 1862–63; also in Esche raz: Sbornik statei Iskandera (Once again), 1866

Pis'ma k staromu tovarischchu: Sbornik posmertnykh statei Aleksandra Ivanovicha Gertsena (Letters to the old comrade), 1867–69

Eshche raz Bazarov (Bazarov once more), 1869

Sbornik posmertnykh statei (Posthumous essays), 1870

“Kolokol”: Izbrannye stat'i A.I.Gertsena, 1857–1869 (The bell: selected articles 1857–1869), 1887

Izbrannye filosofskie proizvedeniia (Selected philosophical prose works), 1946

Selected Philosophical Works, translated by Leo Navrozov, 1956

Za piat' let (1855–1860) (In the course of five years), 1960

A.I.Gertsen o literature (Herzen on literature), 1962

Estetika, kritika, problemy kul'tury (Aesthetics, criticism, cultural problems), 1987

Pis'ma iz Frantsii i Italii, as Letters from France and Italy, 1847–1851, edited and translated by Judith E. Zimmerman, 1995

Other writings: several novels (including Kto vinovat? [Who Is to Blame], 1845–46) and short stories.

Complete works edition: Sobranie sochinenii, 30 vols., 1954–66.

Bibliographies

A.I. Herzen: Materialy k bibliografii, Leningrad, 2 vols., 1970

Gillel'son, M.I., E.N. Dryzhakova, and M.K. Perkal', A.I. Herzen seminarii, Moscow, 1965

Further Reading

Acton, Edward, Alexander Herzen and the Role of the Intellectual Revolutionary, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1979

Babaev, E.G., "A.I. Gertsen i 'metafizicheskii iazyk'," Russkaia Rech' 2 (1987):30–35

Berlin, Isaiah, "Herzen and Bakunin on Individual Liberty," in his Russian Thinkers, edited by Henry Hardy, London: Hogarth Press, and New York: Viking Press, 1978:82–113

Berlin, Isaiah, "A Remarkable Decade: IV. Alexander Herzen," in his Russian Thinkers, edited by Henry Hardy, London: Hogarth Press, and New York: Viking Press, 1978:186–209

Carr, Edward Hallett, The Romantic Exiles: A Nineteenth-Century Portrait Gallery, Boston: Beacon Press, 1961; Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1968 (original edition, 1933)

Dryzhakova, E.N., "Dostoevskii i Gertsen: U istokov romana 'Besy'," in Dostoevskii: Stat'i i materialy, vol. 1, Leningrad: Nauka, 1974:219–38

Elizavetina, G.G., "A. I. Gertsen i spory slavianofilov s zapadnikami," Izvestiia Akademii Nauk (Seriia literatury i iazyka) 33 (1974):75–79

Elsberg, Iakov E., Gertsen: zhizhn' i tvorchestvo, Moscow: Goslitizdat, 1956 (original edition, 1948)

Gromova, L.P. "A.I. Gertsen o russkoi zhurnalistike 1940-kh godov," Vestnik leningradskogo universiteta: Filologiia 1 (January 1988):33–40

Iaroslavtsev, Ia. A., "A.I. Gertsen v legal'noi pechati perioda pervoi revoliutsionnoi situatsii," Russkaia Literatura 2 (1989):200–07

Kelly, Aileen, "Irony and Utopia in Herzen and Dostoevsky: From the Other Shore and Diary of a Writer," Russian Review 50, no. 4 (1991):397–416

Koslovskii, L.S., Gertsen—publitsist, St. Petersburg: Energiia, 1914

Lanskii, L.P., "'Prototip' gertsenovskogo stilia," Russkaia Rech' 3 (1978):33–35

Letopis' zhizni i tvorchestva A.I. Gertsena: 1812–1870, edited by B.F. Egorov and others, Moscow, 1974

Lishchiner, S.D., "Gertsen i russkaia 'intellektual'naia proza,'" Voprosy Literatury 20, no. 4 (1976):172–95

Malia, Martin, Alexander Herzen and the Birth of Russian Socialism, 1812–1855, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, and London: Oxford University Press, 1961

- Partridge, Monica, "Alexander Herzen and the English Philosophers, Francis Bacon and Thomas Hobbes," Zeitschrift für Slawistik 35, no. 1 (1990):35–47
- Perlina, Nina, "Vozdeistvie gertsenovskogo zhurnalizma na arkhitektoniku i polifonicheskoe stroenie 'Dnevnik pisatel'ia' Dostoevskogo," Dostoevsky Studies 5 (1984):141–55
- Polianina, T.V. "Poetika zaglavii v publitsistike A.I.Gertsena: Kolokol," Voprosy Russkoi Literatury 1 (1981):73–80
- Putinsev, V.A., Gertsen; pisatel', Moscow: Izdatel'stvo Akademii Nauk, 1963
- Shostak, M.I., "Vpechatlivaia—ubezhdat' Zametki o stile Gertsenapublitsista," Russkaia Rech' 5 (1975):43–49
- Skliarevskii, G.I., "A.I.Gertsen o russkom literaturnom iazyke," Russkaia Rech' 1 (1970):17–20
- Sukhomlin, E.G., "Zhanrovoe svoeobrazie pamfletov A.I. Gertsena," Voprosy Russkoi Literatury 2 (1973):68–73
- Sukhomlin, E.G., "U istokov russkogo fel'etona: O fel'etonakh A.I. Gertsen 1840-kh godov," Voprosy Russkoi Literatury 1 (1975): 57–63
- Vomperskii, V.P., "K 125-letiiu so dnia vykhoda Kolokola: 'Zovu zhivykh'," Russkaia Rech' 4 (1982):3–8

Historical Essay

Historiography in some form exists in the annals of the earliest civilizations; more than 20,000 clay tablets survive recording names and events from the Assyrian dynasty of Ashurbanipal, for example, and accounts from Egyptian, Babylonian, and Chinese dynastic archives are equally ancient. The modern reader, however, would find such early work difficult to identify as historical writing because of its lack of critical perspective and the absence of any genuine narrative. Indeed, until the philosophical and stylistic innovations of the essay had established literary dominance in Enlightenment Europe, few works of history were anything but eulogies, monuments, medals, or chronicles—representations of the past lacking analytical self-consciousness. Empiricism and its medium, the essay, are the true inventors of what we would recognize as historiography.

Among ancient writers, however, are two prominent exceptions to this generalization: the Greeks Herodotus and Thucydides, both of whom undertook their histories with "theses" in mind. Herodotus endeavored to show how the Greeks had withstood the Persian invasions, while Thucydides examined the causes of the Peloponnesian Wars which eventually involved all of the Greek states in internecine conflicts. It is Herodotus who first uses the word "historia," meaning inquiry, and who demands of the historian a position of skepticism toward his sources. Thucydides goes further in his acknowledgment of the essentially political nature of history and in his statement that he "always tested the accuracy of a report by the strictest standards." Both Herodotus and Thucydides are remarkable for their sense of what Virginia Hunter (1982) calls "historical space," a recognition that history required a methodology to shape it and that it was a rhetorical mode subject to techniques of analysis and persuasion. Oratory is both a model and a component of historiography for both Greeks, but especially for Thucydides. What survives of Roman history continues this tradition. Varro was remarkable for distinguishing history from antiquarianism and wrote an influential work of each kind, respectively his study of the first Triumvirate, the Trikaranos, and his exploration of the ancient origins of Rome, the Antiquitates rerum humanarum et divinarum (Human and divine antiquities). Livy and Tacitus are the two other most influential of the Roman historians: the former for his monumental history of Rome from its beginnings, Ab urbe condita (History of Rome), published in installments and running to 142 books; the latter for his Historiae, covering the period from the reign of Galba to that of Domitian, and his Annales concerning the Julian emperors from the time of Augustus.

Subsequent European historiography until the 18th century is much inferior to these classical examples and more like the recording of history in other world cultures. Such works are more accurately described as chronicles than histories and lack the element of synthesis and the critical perspective that distinguished classical history. In China, the first historical records of this sort were the Shi chi, dating from 85 BCE, which established a tradition that is mostly unbroken into the 20th century and is best described as bureaucratic and archival. Arabic historical writing originated with the legal records of Muslim theologians, had its zenith during the 14th century in the work of Ibn Khaldun, and was very like the Christian tradition of that time in its obsession with recording the growth of the faith and the lives of exemplary holy men. Bede's Historia ecclesiastica gentis Anglorum (c. 732; Ecclesiastical History of the English People), with its narratives of miracles and saints, is typical of medieval work of this kind in Europe, the first instance of which were the chronicles of Eusebius, called the Historia ecclesiastica (312–24 CE; Ecclesiastical History). None of these traditions is critical of its sources and all are chauvinistic in their biases toward their own cultural imperatives. There is no concept of anachronism in such writing, best witnessed in the inconsistencies of the monumental Anglo-Saxon Chronicles written between the 9th and 12th centuries. Only the work of the Bavarian Otto, Bishop of Freising in his Chronica (1146) and his Gesta Friderici I imperatoris (1158; The Deeds of Frederick Barbarossa) shows any sense of a philosophy of history that is analytical and attempts to examine events within their chronological and political contexts.

However, with the rise of secular city states during the Renaissance, historians saw themselves as more than chroniclers, a trend that began with Italian humanists like Leonardo Bruni, who wrote the Historiae Florentini populi (History of the Florentine people). Flavio Biondo was the most important of the humanist historians, and two of his works established new standards for accuracy in source and concern with rhetorical purpose: Historiarum ab inclinatione Romanorum imperii decades (1483; The Decades) and Roma instaurata (1444–46; Rome restored). Still, the true invention of history as a modern discipline belongs to the European Enlightenment.

The 18th century saw the development of two kinds of historical writing, the work of the “érudits” and the “philosophes,” the former more or less antiquarians who emphasized documentation and research and the latter, theorists and interpreters who came to prevail during the century. Voltaire in his entry on “Histoire” in the Encyclopédie would emphasize the philosophical utility of history as a means of enlightening humanity by exposing the barbarity of the past. He eschewed detail in favor of opinion. On the opposite side as regards methodology were the English and Scottish historians for whom detail was crucial if opinion and theory were to be validated. Of these, Edward Gibbon and William Robertson are the most influential. David Hume in his essay “Of the Study of History” (1741) describes it as the narrative of human progress whose primary objective is moral by implication because it undertakes to delineate the rise and fall of civilizations by recounting “the virtues which contributed to their greatness and the vices which drew on their ruin.” Indeed, the Enlightenment notion of progress, that improvement defined the historic curve of all civilizations, combined with the cultural domination of the scientific method after the 17th century, shaped the best historical writing in the period. The essay became the vehicle for historiography in the early 18th-century work of such writers as the Italian Ludovico Muratori, the French Maurist scholars, and especially Pierre Bayle in his Dictionnaire historique et critique (1697; An Historical and Critical Dictionary).

The mid- to late 18th-century publications of accomplished essayists like Montesquieu (L'Esprit des lois [1748; The Spirit of Laws]), Voltaire (Le Siècle de Louis XIV [1751; The Age of Louis XIV]), d'Alembert (“Discours préliminaire,” Encyclopédie, 1751), David Hume (History of England, 1756–62), William Robertson (History of Charles V, 1769), Adam Smith (The Wealth of Nations, 1776), Gilbert Stuart (The History of Scotland, 1782), and Edward Gibbon (Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, 1776–88) focused the writing of history both upon the perception of the individual as interpreter of his own history and upon the struggle of the individual within historic time as the primary subject of such writing. But it was the idea of history as much as the practice that obsessed 18th-century historians. Here the influence of the scientific method and the Enlightenment concern for applied learning were especially apparent in work like Giambattista Vico's Scienza nuova (1725; The New Science) and Voltaire's Essai sur l'histoire générale et sur les mœurs et l'esprit des nations (1756, 1761–63; Essay on the Manner and Spirit of Nations, and on the Principal Occurrences in History). Both men saw history as a mature discipline of learning which drew on all aspects of human culture from the arts through the sciences to provide theories of civilization. Immanuel Kant took this concept further in his “Idee zu einer allgemeinen Geschichte in weltbürgerlicher Absicht” (1784; “Idea for a Universal History with a Cosmopolitan Purpose”), where he argued that the knowledge of history would provide the basis for a just and universal society. This universalism had its opponents in Johann Winckelmann, who emphasized the unique unity of historic epochs, and Johann Gottfried von Herder, who presented a pluralistic model of world history in Ideen zur Philosophie der Geschichte der Menschheit (1785–91; Ideas for a Philosophy of the History of Man).

The Enlightenment development with the most impact on the 19th century was the professionalization of the study of history, especially in its establishment as an academic discipline at the University of Göttingen, with the first seminars and learned journal (1734–37). As the academic practice of history grew, so too did specialization, and after Darwin's On the Origin of Species (1859), the scientific bias in historiography became nearly absolute. At the same time, national archives became crucial to serious historians; Jules Michelet wrote his work on medieval France entirely from archival sources, while the British Public Record Office opened government archives to the public in 1838. The Napoleonic Wars created a public appetite for contemporary history, at first satisfied by newspapers and magazines which proliferated at this time and eventually resulting in popular histories like Macaulay's History of England (1848–61). Still, professional history became the preserve of the academic by the 20th century, as we see in the appearance of journals like the Revue Historique (Historical review) in France in 1876 and the founding of modern historiography by Henry Baxter Adams at Johns Hopkins University in Baltimore (1876), from where he also established the American Historical Association (1884) and launched the American Historical Review in 1895.

Historiography has continued to reflect the two primary traits it derived from the influence of the Enlightenment essayists: a scientific bias and an emphasis on critical scrutiny. Biases peculiar to the 20th century have made their mark, from economics in the work of Charles A. Beard (Economic Interpretation of the American Constitution, 1913) to the anthropological perspectives of Walter Burkert (Homo Necans, 1983). But it is the growth of journalism and the international press that may have had the most significant impact on how European culture looks at history. Certainly, the essay as a format for exploring and critiquing the historic moment dominates the newspaper and magazine; and popular periodical publications like Time magazine and more specialist magazines like The Economist present an experiential view of history through their presentation and analysis of the news in a culturally definitive way. Journalism in the late 20th century has helped to define history as a living encounter that changes almost daily and reflects the dynamism and uncertainty of modern society. In many ways, journalism is the ultimate expression of Voltaire's sense of historiography as an interpretive dialogue, not a compendium of factual detail. Its emphasis is upon history as an experience in the organic, unstable present. Thus the journalist becomes both an "eye witness" to history and its adjudicator, the document and the interpreter at once.

STEPHEN W. BROWN

Further Reading

- Braudel, Fernand, On History, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1980 (original French edition, 1969)
- Burke, Peter, Sociology and History, London and Boston: Allen and Unwin, 1980
- Carey, John, editor, Eyewitness to History, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1987
- Froude, J.A., Historical Essays, New York: Alden, 1886
- Gooch, G.P., Historical Surveys and Portraits, New York: Barnes and Noble, and London: Longman, 1966
- Halévy, Daniel, Essai sur l'accélération de l'histoire, Paris: Îles d'Or, 1943
- Hunter, Virginia, Past and Process in Herodotus and Thucydides, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1982
- Robinson, James Harvey, The New History: Essays Illustrating the Modern Historical Outlook, New York: Free Press, 1965 (original edition, 1912)

Hoagland, Edward

American, 1932–

Edward Hoagland sees the writer's job as "to swim upstream," to "unearth ideas that have been laid aside, reaffirm the unfashionable" ("Bicentennial Palaver," 1982). It is his job, certainly: he writes about subjects ranging from turtles ("The Courage of Turtles," 1985) to tiger-trainer Gunther Gebel-Williams ("Tiger Bright," 1970), from a county fair ("Americana, Etc.," 1985), to New York City ("The Problem of the Golden Rule," 1985). Hoagland writes about the disappearing wilderness, of trains and of tugboats. He writes of bear tracks, boxers, and carousels—and of his own marital infidelities and peccadilloes.

Regardless of his subject, for Hoagland the essay is a performance, something of a celebration, yet also "like the human voice talking" ("What I Think, What I Am," 1982). In his essays Hoagland notes that he stutters and characterizes himself as being in "vocal handcuffs" ("The Threshold and the Jolt of Pain," 1985); "I strangle," he notes in "The Problem of the Golden Rule" (1985). The man speaks only with difficulty.

In the tradition of Montaigne, Hoagland's essays are replete with multiplicity and variation; they proceed associatively. Often they are arranged around two contrasting subjects: men and women, the city and the country, lions and tigers, solitude and company. These seemingly opposing but complementary points of departure provide him with a framework within which he can digress—tacking contrapuntally, moving laterally and tangentially. His essays end with varying degrees of closure, often via metaphor and story, sometimes with the effect of Hoagland ending the essay ex machina. He has accurately declared himself "a rhapsodist" ("Walking the Dead Diamond River," 1970), and his essays evince a certain enthusiasm, an inclusive spirit, and a sheer joy in language.

A significant manifestation of this joy are his metaphors: "Turtles are birds with the governor turned low" ("The Courage of Turtles"), or Hoagland's analogy noting that tigers "smell like rye bread smeared with Roquefort cheese" ("Tiger Bright"). He speaks in multiples, as in "wolf pups make a frothy ribbon of sound like fat bubbling, a shiny, witchy, fluttering yapping" ("Howling Back at the Wolves," 1983). The metaphors suggest the variety within his subject: "Turtles cough, burp, whistle, grunt and hiss, and pronounce social judgments" ("The Courage of Turtles"). Often he includes a paragraph-long list as a means to suggest multiplicity. He improvises with language, noting that when the temperature drops, mud is "architected into shape" ("Walking the Dead Diamond River"); mountain lions play a "game of noses-andpaws" ("Hailing the Elusory Mountain Lion," 1970).

Hoagland has characterized the essayist as being "like an infielder in baseball. He performs a lot, making the pretty throw to first" ("On Being Between Books," 1982). This essayist is not the writer who hits home runs, who scores points, but one who essays on occasion. The performer, the "artful 'I'" of the essay can be a "chameleon" ("What I Think, What I Am”). In an interview Hoagland has noted that essays are “more the province of middle-aged writers” who are “cannier, less truthful” (Robert Smith, 1982). Trust the essay, not the essayist. It may well be that Hoagland would like the essayist to be kin to what he sees as the ideal politician, who “should not be many things to different people but many things within himself” (“Bicentennial Palaver,” 1976).

Hoagland’s abundance does not reduce well or easily; nor is it intended to. In “What I Think, What I Am” he notes that essays “don’t usually boil down to a summary” and contrasts the essay with the story, which plays upon the reader’s empathy. An essay is a matter of “mind speaking to mind” and while lurking in the essay is “a point which is its real center,” that point “couldn’t be uttered in fewer words than the essayist has used” (“What I Think, What I Am”). Hoagland locates the essay “hang[ing] somewhere on a line between two sturdy poles: this is what I think and this is what I am.” His observations on the style of the essay apply to his own: it “has a’nap’ to it, a combination of personality and originality and energetic loose ends that stand up like the nap on a piece of wool and can’t be brushed flat.” Hoagland describes the essay in metaphors: “Essays belong to the animal kingdom, with a surface that generates sparks, like a coat of fur” (“What I Think, What I Am”). It is a live and lively genre.

For Hoagland the essay is an armchair genre but one that makes demands upon the reader. He assumes a literate reader, his essays being addressed “to an educated, perhaps middleclass reader, with certain presuppositions, a frame of reference, even a civility that is shared” (“What I Think, What I Am”). Following the movement of the essayist’s mind does not make for easy reading; Hoagland says reading “is like swimming described in the Greek epics” (“Books, Movies, the News,” 1985) in which Odysseus had to contend with a variety of oceanic conditions. So too does the reader with Hoagland’s essays, contending with his range of subjects, metaphors, lists, stories, wordplay, and celebration of his private quirks and foibles. Although he cannot otherwise speak with ease, Edward Hoagland’s essays manifest a celebration of the possibilities of language.

SANDRA A. ENGEL

See also Nature Essay

Biography

Edward Morley Hoagland. Born 21 December 1932 in New York City. Studied at Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1950–54, A.B., 1954. Served in the U.S. Army, 1955–57. Married Amy Ferrara, 1960 (divorced, 1964). Taught at various American colleges and universities, including the New School for Social Research, New York, Rutgers University, New Brunswick, New Jersey, City University of New York, Columbia University, New York, Bennington College, Vermont, Brown University, Providence, Rhode Island, and the University of California, Davis, 1963–91. Married Marion Magid, 1968 (died, 1993): one daughter. Editorial writer, the New York Times, 1979–89; contributor to various other newspapers, journals, and magazines, including the Atlantic Monthly, Village Voice, New England Review, Sports Illustrated, New Yorker, Esquire, and Transatlantic Review. General editor, Penguin Nature Library, from 1985. Awards: many, including several fellowships; Longview Foundation Award, 1961;

O. Henry Award, 1971; National Book Critics Circle Award, 1979; Vursell Award, 1981; New York Public Library Literary Lion Award, 1988; National Magazine Award, 1989. Member, American Academy and Institute of Arts and Letters, 1982.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

The Courage of Turtles: Fifteen Essays About Compassion, Pain, and Love, 1971

Walking the Dead Diamond River, 1973

The Moose on the Wall: Field Notes from the Vermont Wilderness, 1974

Red Wolves and Black Bears, 1976

The Edward Hoagland Reader, edited by Geoffrey Wolff, 1979

The Tugman's Passage, 1982

The Courage of Turtles, 1985

Heart's Desire: The Best of Edward Hoagland, 1988

Balancing Acts, 1992

Other writings: four novels (Cat Man, 1956; The Circle Home, 1960; The Peacock's Tail, 1965; Seven Rivers West, 1987), a collection of short stories (The Final Fate of the Alligators, 1992), and two travel books (African Calliope, 1979; Notes from the Century Before: A Journal from British Columbia, 1982).

Further Reading

Engel, Sandra, Yourself a Little Change: Reading Edward Hoagland (dissertation), Iowa City: University of Iowa, 1992

Smith, Robert, "From Harvard to the Big Top and Beyond," Book World, 28 February 1982:6-7

Strenski, Ellen, "Foreign Correspondent in the Wild Kingdom: The Essays of Edward Hoagland," Commonweal 4 (August 1978): 500-03

Tropp, Sandra Fehl, "Edward Hoagland," in her Shaping Tradition: Art and Diversity in the Essay, Fort Worth, Texas: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich College Publishers, 1992:548-51

Wolff, Geoffrey, Introduction to The Edward Hoagland Reader, New York: Vintage, 1979: ix-xxx

Hofmannsthal, Hugo von

Austrian, 1874-1929

Although Hugo von Hofmannsthal showed a distinct preference for particular genres during various parts of his career, his commitment to the essay began early in his life and lasted until his death. His earliest essays, published in 1891 when he was just 17, appeared in periodicals under the pen name “Loris,” the title chosen for the first publication in book form of his early essays. When he died in July 1929, he had not only already published several essays that year but was also considering plans for a collection of his late essays, which, however, never came to fruition. These nearly 40 years witnessed considerable change, growth, and development as well as an extremely varied and flexible use of the genre.

His earliest essays emerged from the tradition of cultural journalism that flourished during the late 19th and early 20th centuries throughout Europe. Hofmannsthal certainly never thought of himself as a journalist in a narrow sense of the word, and went to great lengths to distinguish himself from those who practiced that profession. He argued that a certain vulgarity had been introduced into German journalism by Heinrich Heine and subsequent authors who had fallen under his influence. Although Hofmannsthal’s essays on literature, theater, music, art, travel, and general cultural developments were published for the most part in Viennese periodicals, he saw them as having an enduring quality that derived from his ability to use a contemporary cultural event as a point of departure for formulating a general principle or gaining a universal insight. If his essays are to be associated with journalism in any way, Hofmannsthal would certainly have argued that they were the basis for a new journalistic style rising above the abysmal level then current. Among the contemporaries discussed are D’Annunzio, Ibsen, Swinburne, and Pater. He also records his impressions during a tour through the south of France and comments frequently on contemporary painting. The style of these essays is relatively informal and has something of a conversational tone. They are never chatty or casual but seem addressed to a congenial conversation partner who is widely read and has a cultivated sensitivity to aesthetic nuance.

The mode in which Hofmannsthal’s essays address their audience is extremely varied. While most are straightforward discursive presentations, others, following a long tradition extending back to Plato, speak out of imaginary situations such as conversations or letters. Perhaps the most important conversation is “Gespräch zu Gedichten” (1903; “Conversation on Poetry”), which discusses several poems by Stefan George, a contemporary poet with whom Hofmannsthal had a highly ambiguous relationship. Through the comments the two characters make about the poems, Hofmannsthal reveals his concept of the nature and challenge of poetry. Even more important than the conversations, however, are the imaginary letters; in fact the essay simply entitled “Ein Brief” (1902.; “A Letter”) is one of Hofmannsthal’s most widely discussed and broadly influential works. It claims to be a letter written by the young Philipp Lord Chandos to Francis Bacon. In the most general of terms, the letter deals with the nature of language and of symbolic representation. Many have seen this letter as an expression of Hofmannsthal’s deeply skeptical attitude toward the expressive power of language and his response to the uniquely Viennese crisis of confidence in language as seen particularly in the works of his contemporaries Fritz Mauthner and Ludwig Wittgenstein. Most informed recent criticism, however, has not been so willing to read the essay in such narrowly biographical terms but stresses rather its fictionality. Editors of Hofmannsthal’s works have been far from consistent in their generic understanding of these conversations and letters: some have been published along with more conventional examples of the essay, while others have been classified as a genre in their own right, though collected in the same volume as indisputably fictional narratives.

World War I had a profound effect on Hofmannsthal's essays. During and immediately following the war, he often turned to broadly patriotic themes and strove to differentiate what was distinctly Austrian from what was German or, more precisely, Prussian. He wrote eloquently and with a deep sense of personal conviction on themes taken from Austrian history and on Austria's literary and cultural heritage. These essays—"Die Bejahung Österreichs" (1914; The affirmation of Austria), "Grillparzers politisches Vermächtnis" (1915; Grillparzer's political legacy), "Österreich im Spiegel seiner Dichtung" (1916; Austria in the mirror of her literature), and "Die Öster-reichische Idee" (1917; The Austrian idea), for example—are neither shrill nor aggressively polemical but rather nostalgic and, perhaps, somewhat conservative.

Just as Hofmannsthal saw his collaboration with the composer Richard Strauss and the director Max Reinhardt as the fusion of drama, theater, and music, he saw Austria as the place where the Germanic, Romance, and Slavic worlds met and experienced, if not a fusion, at least a richly productive interpenetration. During the last decade of his life, the idea of an inclusive Europe that extends across political as well as temporal boundaries became a motif of much of his thinking and manifested itself in his essays in a variety of ways. Some deal specifically with a common European spiritual and intellectual heritage: "Blick auf den geistigen Zustand Europas" (1922; A look at the intellectual condition of Europe), for example; others, when addressing specific figures, events, or ideas, draw on them in terms of their most broadly encompassing significance and their value for Western culture generally.

Hofmannsthal's influence on the essay as a genre is not to be found so much by seeking subsequent writers who drew on his example but rather in his extremely supple and pliant use of the genre. Situating it at the juncture of cultural reportage, fictional narration, visionary meditation, cultural critique, synthesizing analysis, congenial conversation, and edifying homily, he extended the horizon of the genre within the specific context of German literary history in ways that invite exploration.

STEVEN P.SONDRUP

Biography

Born 1 February 1874 in Vienna. Studied at Akademisches Gymnasium, Vienna, 1884–92; studied law, 1892–94, and Romantic philology, 1895–97, University of Vienna. Served with the 6th Dragoon Regiment in Göding, 1894–95. Married Gertrud Schlesinger, 1901: one daughter and two sons. Collaborated with Richard Strauss on operas, from 1909; editor, Österreichische Bibliothek, 1915–17; cofounder, with Max Reinhardt, Salzburg Festival, 1919. Died (of a stroke) in Rodaun, Austria, 15 July 1929.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Studie über die Entwicklung des Dichters Victor Hugo (dissertation), 1901; as Victor

Hugo, 1904; as Versuch über Victor Hugo, 1925
Unterhaltungen über literarische Gegenstände, 1904
Die prosaischen Schriften gesammelt, 5 vols., 1907; revised edition, 3 vols., 1917
Reden und Aufsätze, 1921
Buch der Freunde (aphorisms), 2 vols., 1922–29; part translated in Selected Prose, 1952
Frühste Prosastücke, 1926
Loris: Die Prosa des jungen Hofmannsthals, 1931
Die Berührung der Sphären, 1931
Festspiele in Salzburg, 1938
Selected Writings, vol. 1: Selected Prose (includes fiction), translated by Mary Hottinger and Tania and James Stern, 1952
Reitergeschichte: Erzählungen und Aufsätze, 1953
Selected Essays (in German), edited by Mary E. Gilbert, 1955
Österreichische Aufsätze und Reden, edited by Ludwig F. Jedlicka, 1956
Natur und Erkenntnis, 1957

Other writings: many plays (including Der Schwierige [The Difficult Man], 1921; Der Turm [The Tower], 1925), libretti (including Der Rosenkavalier, 1911), poetry, fiction, and many volumes of correspondence.

Collected works editions: Sämtliche Werke, edited by Heinz Otto Burger, Rudolf Hirsch, and others, 31 vols., 1975–94 (in progress); Gesammelte Werke, edited by Bernd Schoeller, 10 vols., 1979–80.

Bibliographies

Koch, Hans-Albrecht, and Uta Koch, Hugo von Hofmannsthal Bibliographie, 1964–1976, Freiburg: Hugo von Hofmannsthal-Gesellschaft, 1976
 Köttelwesch, Clemens, “Hofmannsthal Bibliographie,” Hofmannsthal Blätter 23–24 (1980), and 39 (1989)
 Weber, Horst, Hugo von Hofmannsthal: Bibliographie des Schrifttums, 1892–1963, Berlin: de Gruyter, 1966
 Weber, Horst, Hugo von Hofmannsthal: Bibliographie: Werke, Briefe, Gespräche, Übersetzungen, Vertonungen, Berlin and New York: de Gruyter, 1972

Further Reading

Exner, Richard, “Probleme der Methodik und der Komposition in den Essays von Thomas Mann und Hugo von Hofmannsthal,” German Quarterly (1957):145–57
 Exner, Richard, “Zur Essayistik Hugo von Hofmannsthals,” Schweizer Monatshefte 42, no. 2 (1962):239–313
 Gerke, Ernst-Otto, Der Essay als Kunstform bei Hugo von Hofmannsthal, Lübeck: Matthiesen, 1970
 Gilbert, Mary E., “Hofmannsthal’s Essays 1900–1908: A Poet in Transition,” in Hofmannsthal: Studies in Commemoration, edited by F. Norman, London: University of London Institute of Germanic Studies, 1963:29–52
 Kähler, Hermann, Von Hofmannsthal bis Benjamin: Ein Streifzug durch die Essayistik der zwanziger Jahre, Berlin: Aufbau, 1982

Lengauer, Hubert, “Hofmannsthals journalistische Anfänge und das Feuilleton des späten 19. Jahrhundert,” in Hofmannsthal und das Theater: Die Vorträge des Hofmannsthal Symposium Wien 1979, edited by Wolfram Mauser, Vienna: Halosar, 1981:125–40

Holberg, Ludvig

Danish, 1684–1754

Ludvig Holberg is the father of modern Scandinavian literature. Best known abroad as a writer of comedies, he was also a master in various other fields. He served, for example, as professor of history at the University of Copenhagen and wrote several historical works. Some of his works—including his autobiography—he wrote in Latin; most, however, were written in Danish, the language of Denmark and Norway. Holberg himself had been born in Bergen, Norway, and can be claimed as both a Danish and a Norwegian writer, a figure of whom both countries today are proud. Holberg was also an essayist, although his essays were written relatively late in life. The volume entitled Moralske Tanker (Moral Reflections) dates from 1744; the five volumes of Epistler (Epistles), containing 540 items in all, began appearing in 1748, with the final volume posthumously published in 1754.

Holberg traveled widely as a young man, spending two years in England (mainly in Oxford), and visiting the Netherlands and France twice, as well as Germany and Italy. Curiously, Holberg’s stay in England at the beginning of the 18th century, the very time when periodicals were blossoming there, did not lead to a discernible interest on his part in English authors of the day. On the other hand, he found a major source of inspiration in French writers, particularly Jean de Clerc, whose work appeared in the Netherlands, where he lived in exile and where Holberg once called upon him.

The Moral Reflections, Holberg’s volume of 63 essays, is more philosophical and serious than most of the essays making up the “epistles” of his second, five-volume collection. Indeed, because of the Moral Reflections Holberg has been called a modern Cicero. The earlier essays also have a clear connection with those of Montaigne and Bacon. A champion of moderation and reason, Holberg was the chief Scandinavian moralist and rationalist of his time. The Moral Reflections present no cohesive system of thought, however, though they are in many ways both theological and philosophical, suggesting the work of Gottfried Wilhelm von Leibniz and Leibniz’s foremost disciple Christian Wolff. Many of the essays recall those by English writers of the moral weeklies, treating subjects such as virtue, decorum, reform, the best way to take criticism, and why similar deeds may be judged differently. Holberg’s humor is present in these earlier essays, but subdued when compared with the humor in some of his other works, for example his Nicolai Klimii iter subterraneum (1741; A Journey by Nicholas Klimius to the World Under Ground), which strongly resembles Jonathan Swift’s Gulliver’s Travels. Even the style of the Moral Reflections suggests British essays of the same or an earlier era. For example, the essay on studies begins, “Studies can be divided into the necessary, the useful, and the harmful”—an echo of Bacon’s essay on books.

Holberg was writing the Moral Reflections for a learned and fairly limited audience in Denmark and Norway; he often quoted in Latin and Greek, and prefaced each essay with a Latin quotation. (In contrast, the later Epistles appealed to a much broader audience and, by virtue of their number, necessarily dealt with many more and different subjects.) An example of Holberg's style, wit, and attitude can be found in the following quotation from the end of the essay dealing with the arrogance of the ignorant: "I for my part would not wish to live in a country where there are no fools; a fool has the same effect in a republic as fermentation in the human stomach. The fool is like a sal volatile, which causes movement of the blood and juices; indeed, he can be compared with a hurricane which, although it may from time to time destroy houses and trees, at the same time purifies the air and prevents sicknesses which are born of too much quietude."

While the Moral Reflections express Holberg's personal philosophy and beliefs, the later Epistles deal with subjects of a non-philosophical nature. In them Holberg is as ever a spokesman for moderation and tolerance, championing what he calls the middle path. The individual epistles are, on the whole, much shorter than the philosophical essays in Moral Reflections. Nominally they are in the form of letters to an unknown person, a device which allowed Holberg to range considerably from the topic at hand and to insert quotations whenever it suited him. F.J.Billeskov Jansen (1938–39) demonstrates that Holberg wrote his essays using Pierre Bayle's Dictionnaire historique et critique (1697; An Historical and Critical Dictionary) as a source of continuing inspiration: the sequence of essays in the Epistles corresponds to some extent to the sequence of articles in Bayle's dictionary, and Holberg invokes Bayle frequently in the text of the essays. In Epistle 34, for example, he states that one can profit much from Bayle's works and in particular escape the taste for the trivial with which most academics are infected. He goes on to say that no author known to him, old or new, "has written with greater pithiness and penetration and no publication has appeared which in regard to zeal, accuracy, variety of material, thorough criticism and gallant style can be compared with his critical dictionary." There are also many references to classical writers, French writers of an earlier era, and contemporary phenomena, as for example the discussion dealing with Julien Offray de La Mettrie's L'Homme-machine, a book of materialistic philosophy which had been published anonymously in Leiden in 1748. Works by La Mettrie had been publicly burned in The Hague in 1745, but he had the protection of King Frederick the Great of Prussia. Holberg's attitude is evidence of his liberal thought and openness to new and different ideas, without, however, raising his voice against Protestantism or the Establishment in general.

Several of the epistles are concerned with drama, specifically with Holberg's own comedies, the foreign criticism of them, and the unwillingness of the French to accept Holberg on a plane with Molière. As a dramatist Holberg identifies with Plautus and Molière but has little positive to say of contemporary writers of comedy.

Holberg's essays clearly demonstrate that he wrote as a result of studying other writers, and how dependent he was on them for his thoughts. The Epistles may be designated as essays evolved from his reading, his reflections, and his efforts at synthesis. On the whole they do not develop a single argument; rather they are reactive, responding to other works and to the issues of the day. Like essays in the moral weeklies of England and elsewhere, Holberg's essays are easy, pleasant reading, and it is as easy to disagree as to agree with what he writes.

P.M.MITCHELL

Biography

Born 3 December 1684 in Bergen, Norway. Studied theology at the University of Copenhagen, 1702–04. Visited the Netherlands, 1704–05, 1714–16, and 1725–26, Germany, 1705–06 and 1708–09, and England (mostly Oxford), 1706–08. Fellow, Borch's College, Copenhagen, 1709–14; professor of metaphysics, 1718–20, of Latin literature (and secretary of the university), 1720–30, of history, from 1730, and rector, 1735–36, and university bursar, 1737–51, University of Copenhagen. Wrote for Montaigne's troupe at the Lille Grønnegade Theatre, Copenhagen, 1722–28; stopped writing plays during the ban on theatrical activity by Christian VI, 1730–46; made a baron, 1747; unofficial adviser and writer, Kongelige Teater, Copenhagen, 1748. Died in Copenhagen, 28 January 1754.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Moralske Tanker, 1744; edited by F.J.Billeskov Jansen, 1943; as Moral Reflections, with Epistles, edited and translated by P.M. Mitchell, 1991

Epistler, 5 vols., 1748–54; edited by F.J.Billeskov Jansen, 5 vols., 1944–54; in part as Selected Essays, edited and translated by P. M. Mitchell, 1955, and as Epistles, with Moral Reflections, edited and translated by Mitchell, 1991

Essays, edited by Kjell Heggelund, 1977

Other writings: 32 plays (including Den politiske kandestøber [The Political Tinker], 1722; Jeppe på Bjerget [Jeppe of the Hill], 1722; Jean de France, 1722; Den vægelsindede [The Weathercock], 1722; Erasmus Montanus, 1723; Henrik og Pernille [Henry and Pernilla], 1724; Maskarade [Masquerade], 1724; Jacob von Thyboe, 1725; Den Stundesløse [The Fussy Man], 1726; De usynlige [The Masked Ladies], 1731), the novel Nicolai Klimii iter subterraneum (1741; A Journey by Nicholas Klimius to the World Under Ground), the mock epic poem Peder Paars (1719–20), many books on history, and an autobiography.

Bibliography

Ehrencron-Müller, Holger, Bibliografi over Holbergs skrifter, Copenhagen: Aschehoug, 3 vols., 1933–35

Further Reading

Billeskov Jansen, F.J., Holberg som epigrammatiker og essayist, Copenhagen:

Munksgaard, 2 vols., 1938–39

Billeskov Jansen, F.J., Ludvig Holberg, New York: Twayne, 1974

Billeskov Jansen, F.J., A Guide to the Writings of Ludvig Holberg and to His Manor-House Tersløsegaard, Dianalund: Holbergske Stiftelse Tersløsegaard, 1979

Bredsdorff, Thomas, “Holberg: A Scandinavian Slant on the European Enlightenment,” Scandinavian Canadian Studies/Études Scandinaves au Canada 4 (1991):115–22

Greene-Gantzberg, Vivian, “Holberg and German-Speaking Europe,” in Holberg, a European Writer: A Study in Influence and Reception, edited by Sven Rossel, Amsterdam: Rodopi, 1994: 67–103

Haarberg, Jon, “Essayet: Holberg, Montaigne og ‘de gamle’,” Edda 1 (1987):73–83

Naess, Harald, “Holberg and the Age of Enlightenment,” in A History of Norwegian Literature, edited by Naess, Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1993:53–81

Holmes, Oliver Wendell

American, 1809–1894

“Montaigne and Bacon under one hat” was how the American poet John Greenleaf Whittier described Oliver Wendell Holmes, the Boston physician-poet who created a new form for the essay with his popular Autocrat of the Breakfast-Table essays. Holmes’ literary achievement is especially noteworthy in that literature was a sideline, a diversion from his full-time work as a Harvard University medical professor. Holmes defined the term Boston “Brahmin” and, in 1857, gave the name the Atlantic (now known as the Atlantic Monthly) to the new monthly American magazine which would showcase his work. His impressive body of essays—which includes groundbreaking, highly readable medical essays, Civil War essays, and tributes to his famous contemporaries, as well as the Breakfast-Table essays—coincides with and expresses the golden age of Boston and provides a window on 19th-century American thought. In addition, Holmes’ artful incorporation of poetry and narrative into the familiar essay marks him as an important figure in the development of literary nonfiction.

Holmes’ first fame as an essayist came through the medical essays written on his return from Paris, where he studied medicine from 1833 to 1835. There he had breakfasted regularly at the café once frequented by Voltaire, Rousseau, and Fontenelle. In 1836 and 1837, Holmes won three of the four 50-dollar Boylston Prizes for his essays “Facts and Traditions Respecting the Existence of Indigenous Intermittent Fever in New England,” “The Nature and Treatment of Neuralgia,” and “The Utility and Importance of Direct Exploration in Medical Practice.”

One hundred years after the publication of his controversial 1842 essay “The Contagiousness of Puerperal Fever,” in which he presented overwhelming evidence that doctors often infected pregnant women with the fatal disease, an article in the Bulletin of the Medical Library Association called this essay “the most important contribution made in America to the advancement of medicine.” Such essays, as well as “Currents and Counter-Currents in Medical Science” (1860), the most popular and quoted of all Holmes’ medical writings, exhibit thorough research, lively language and thought, and even occasional humor.

Holmes devoted himself to medical rather than to political and social reform. One national issue which aroused him, however, was the secession of the Southern states, which he decried in such essays as “Bread and the Newspaper” (1861), “The Inevitable Trial” (1863), and “My Hunt After The Captain” (1862), which described his search for his son and namesake, Captain Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., who was wounded three times during the Civil War.

Holmes knew all the leading men and women of his time. His “tributes” to Emerson (1882, 1885, 1889), Longfellow (1882), and Richard Henry Dana (1882) reveal his friendship and admiration. His “Remarks on the Death of Washington Irving” (1859) and Atlantic article on Nathaniel Hawthorne (1864) have greater interest as they recount Holmes’ medical observations of the last days of Irving and Hawthorne’s lives.

In 1857, the poet and essayist James Russell Lowell was invited to edit a new monthly literary magazine. He made a condition of his editorship that Holmes be the first contributor engaged—a surprising insistence given that the 48-year-old Holmes was known then only as a lyceum speaker and as the author of controversial medical essays and the popular poem “Old Ironsides” (1830). Holmes repaid Lowell’s confidence by naming the magazine the Atlantic and beginning The Autocrat of the Breakfast-Table in its first number. The Autocrat was an immediate triumph. Indeed, in England its success surpassed any American work since Washington Irving’s Sketch Book (1819–20).

The popularity of his Breakfast-Table essays caused Holmes to begin a publishing pattern he would follow to the end of his days: publishing monthly installments of his work in the Atlantic, which were then collected and published as a book in November in time for Christmas sales. Succeeding the “Autocrat” in January 1859 was The Professor at the Breakfast-Table, to be followed by The Poet at the Breakfast-Table in January 1872, and Over the Teacups in 1888. In the Breakfast-Table series Holmes created a form of the essay perfectly suited to his personality and vision. Holmes was a brilliant conversationalist, and the boarding house breakfasttable “setting” provided him a homey forum for his sharp observations and engaging “talk.” In a masterful stroke he embodied the three facets of his identity (professor, poet, and “autocrat”) as three separate characters in the essays. Thus in The Autocrat he could allow his “friend, the Professor” to express his most radical ideas, or could present the latest offerings of his “friend, the Poet.” “How briskly his writing moves along,” Virginia Woolf exclaimed in a 1909 centenary tribute to Holmes, and indeed Holmes employed his poetry (including his most famous poem, “The Chambered Nautilus”) for both emphasis and variety in his essays. He created other breakfasttable companions as foils for his pronouncements: the Divinity School Student for discussions of dogma, the “young man named John” as the voice of dissent, the School Mistress for expressions of sentiment.

Holmes recognized that his readers liked stories as well as poems and wise and witty observations; he therefore also wove narrative threads into the essays. The Autocrat of the Breakfast-Table ends with the marriage of the Autocrat and School Mistress; The Professor at the Breakfast-Table with the illness and death of Little Boston, the isolated cripple. At the close of The Poet at the Breakfast-Table the Landlady gives up the boarding house, bringing the breakfast-table meetings to an end.

The Breakfast-Table essays display Holmes’ gifts as an essayist. He writes in The Autocrat of “the infinite ocean of similitudes and analogies that rolls through the universe,” and readers even today find Holmes’ similes and metaphors engaging. His famous assertion that human beings possess one-, two-, or three-story intellects still stimulates thought. His lifelong faith in science and contempt for Calvinism’s stress on human depravity is revealed in this characteristically vivid simile: “If for the Fall of man science comes to substitute the RISE of man, sir, it means the utter disintegration of all the spiritual pessimisms which have been like a spasm in the heart and a cramp in the intellect of men for so many centuries” (The Poet at the Breakfast-Table).

Holmes drew his figures from every imaginable source—the natural, social, commercial, historical, anatomical, nautical, pugilistical, and even “newspaporial” worlds. His use of simple, concrete figures helped him wed the classical universality and 18th-century rationalism of his idol Samuel Johnson with 19th-century Romantic subjectivity. Since Holmes believed his own subjective thoughts and feelings (as a wellbalanced, rational individual) were shared by all people, the more subjective he was, the more universal he became. “And so I am not afraid to talk very freely with you, my precious reader or listener. You too, Beloved, were born somewhere ... Your hand is upon mine, then, as I guide my pen. Your heart frames the responses to the litany of my remembrance” (The Poet at the Breakfast-Table).

Dr. Johnson ranked highest in Holmes’ pantheon, but he admired and saw his own strengths in fellow physician-writer Sir Thomas Browne (“With a Prelude on Nightcaps, and Comments on an Old Writer,” 1883). Of his own countrymen, Holmes admired Washington Irving; certainly kinship can be found between Holmes’ Autocrat and Irving’s earlier Diedrich Knickerbocker and Geoffrey Crayon. Irving’s essays may have shown Holmes that the public warmed to a personal tone, a winning persona, genial humor, and a rich but easy prose style.

In turn, Holmes influenced essayists who followed him, most notably Lewis Thomas, the Holmes of the 20th century. Thomas paid regular tribute to Holmes in his popular medical essays. Like Holmes, he created a genial persona who expressed optimistic humanism in his essays—and even many of Holmes’ specific views.

Holmes was not without his limitations, however. Focused as he was on science and believing in evolutionary progress, he was not a champion of abolition, Brook Farm, transcendentalism, or other political, social, and philosophical movements of his time. More surprising, he failed to note the profound ethnic and religious changes that were transforming his own Boston during his lifetime. Holmes was concerned instead with the simple, universal emotions related to home and family affections, romantic love, friendship, aging, and the expansion of the human mind. He is unsurpassed at expressing ordinary ideas in ways that stimulate thought. Wherever the conversational essayist is evoked, Holmes’ name must be mentioned, and he demonstrates that the essay can be highly congenial to poetry and fiction.

BARBARA LOUNSBERRY

Biography

Born 29 August 1809 in Cambridge, Massachusetts. Studied at Phillips Academy, Andover, Massachusetts, 1824–25; Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, B.A., 1829; Dane Law School, Cambridge, 1829–30; studied medicine at Tremont Medical School, Boston, 1830–33, in Paris, 1833–35, and at Harvard Medical School, M.D., 1836. Practiced medicine in Boston, from 1838. Professor of anatomy, Dartmouth Medical College, Hanover, New Hampshire, 1838–40. Married Amelia Lee Jackson (died, 1888), 1840: two sons (one the judge Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr.) and one daughter. Lyceum lecturer, 1841–57; Parkman Professor of Anatomy, Harvard Medical School, 1847–82, then emeritus. Contributor of the “Breakfast-Table” essay series, the Atlantic, from 1857. Awards: Boylston Prize, for medical essays, 1836, 1837; honorary degrees from three universities. Died in Boston, 7 October 1894.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Boylston Prize Dissertations for 1836 and 1837, 1838

Homoeopathy and Its Kindred Delusions (lectures), 1842

The Autocrat of the Breakfast-Table, 1858

The Professor at the Breakfast-Table, 1860

Currents and Counter-Currents in Medical Science, with Other Addresses and Essays, 1861

Soundings from the Atlantic, 1864

The Poet at the Breakfast-Table, 1872

Medical Essays 1842–1882, 1883

Pages from an Old Volume of Life: A Collection of Essays, 1857–1881, 1883

Our Hundred Days in Europe, 1887

Over the Teacups, 1890

Oliver Wendell Holmes (selection), edited by S.I.Hayakawa and Howard Mumford Jones, 1939

The Autocrat’s Miscellanies, edited by Albert Mordell, 1959

Other writings: three novels (Elsie Venner, 1861; The Guardian Angel, 1867; A Moral Antipathy, 1885), five volumes of poetry, and biographies of John Lothrop Motley (1879) and Ralph Waldo Emerson (1885).

Collected works edition: Works (Standard Library Edition), 15 vols., 1891–96.

Bibliographies

Currier, Thomas Franklin, and Eleanor M.Tilton, A Bibliography of Oliver Wendell Holmes, New York: New York University Press, 1953

Menikoff, Barry, “Oliver Wendell Holmes,” in Fifteen American Authors Before 1900: Bibliographical Essays on Research and Criticism, edited by Earl N.Harbert and Robert A.Rees, Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1984

Tilton, Eleanor M., and Sidney Ives, A Descriptive Catalogue of the Oliver Wendell Holmes Collection, Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 1993

Further Reading

- “Centenary Study of Holmes,” Edinburgh Review 211 (April 1910): 414–34
- The Critic* issue on Holmes, 30 August 1884
- Crothers, Samuel McChord, Oliver Wendell Holmes: The Autocrat and His Fellow-Boarders, Folcroft, Pennsylvania: Folcroft, 1973 (original edition, 1909)
- Cullingworth, C.J., “Oliver Wendell Holmes and the Contagiousness of Puerperal Fever,” British Medical Journal 2 (1905):1161–67
- Eccles, F.R., “Oliver Wendell Holmes, Physician and Man of Letters,” Canadian Lancet 37 (1906):1002–11
- Ferguson, J.DeLancey, “The Unfamiliar Autocrat,” Colophon 1 (February 1936):388–96
- Gougeon, Len, “Holmes’s Emerson and the Conservative Critique of Realism,” South Atlantic Review 59 (January 1994):107–15
- Green, R.F., “Oliver Wendell Holmes: His Writings and Philosophy,” Proceedings of the Literary and Philosophical Society 35 (1880–81):215–47
- Grenander, M.E., “Doctors and Humanists: Transactional Analysis and Two Views of Man,” Journal of American Culture 3 (Fall 1980):470–79
- Howe, M.A. De Wolfe, Holmes of the Breakfast-Table, London and New York: Oxford University Press, 1939
- Hughes, J.L., “Oliver Wendell Holmes,” Canadian Magazine 60 (February 1913):334–40
- Jennings, W.B., “Oliver Wendell Holmes: A Centenary Memoir of the Physician,” Medical Review of Reviews 15 (1909):107–14
- Linn, H.W., “Holmes as Humorist,” University of Chicago Magazine 2 (November 1909):16–13
- Merrill, W.S., “The Centenary of the Autocrat,” Catholic World 134 (February 1932):581–86
- Morse, John Torrey, Jr., Life and Letters of Oliver Wendell Holmes, Boston: Houghton Mifflin, and London: Sampson Low, 2 vols., 1896
- Pritchard, J.P., “The Autocrat and Horace,” Classical Weekly, 16 May 1932:217–23
- Selbie, R.H., “Holmes,” Manchester Quarterly 20 (1901):232–58
- Small, Miriam Rossiter, Oliver Wendell Holmes, New York: Twayne, 1962
- Stephen, Leslie, Studies of a Biographer, vol. 2, London: Duckworth, 1931; New York: B.Franklin, 1973 (original edition, 1901)
- Tilton, Eleanor M., Amiable Autocrat: A Biography of Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes, New York: Henry Schuman, 1947
- Woolf, Virginia, “Oliver Wendell Holmes,” in her Granite and Rainbow, London: Hogarth Press, and New York: Harcourt Brace, 1958:232–40

Hope, A.D.

Australian, 1907–

A.D.Hope is best known as an internationally recognized poet whose poetry has a strong, almost neoclassical sense of form and precision of language. However, some critics find his prose style more flexible, persuasive, and charming, and although his prose collections are all on literary topics, he has a well-earned reputation as a critical essayist. Hope centers his prose writing on a traditional defense of poetry in a contemporary context. As a reviewer, his uncompromising, often caustic criticism has given rise to more than one literary contretemps, the most famous being his criticism of Patrick White's The Tree of Man as self-consciously provincial and the prose style as "pretentious and illiterate verbal sludge," although in general the review had some praise for the novel. Published under the title "The Bunyip Stages a Comeback" in the Sydney Morning Herald (16 June 1956), the review is said to have initiated White's lasting contempt of most Australian academics, and his satiric portrait (with allusions to Hope) of the academic Professor Sword in the play Night on Bald Mountain (1962). Hope republished the review in Native Companions (1974), repeating a belief unshaken by the realities of the modern novel that "The novelist needs a plain style, a clear easy stride, a good open texture of language to carry him to the end of his path."

Hope's essays take a generally prescriptive but well-reasoned stance on literary issues, including subject matter, genre, and the motives for writing; the influence of T.S.Eliot is often apparent. A typical essay from The Cave and the Spring (1965), a collection of essays on poetry, is "The Discursive Mode: Reflections on the Ecology of Poetry" (revised for The New Cratylus [1979] as "Ecology"), in which Hope draws analogies between natural and human ecology and finds that "The evil and incoherence and folly in society are also connected." This essay advocates the "middle form of poetry," the discursive mode, which does not depend, like most of the admired poetry of today, on a profusion of startling images, but on the plain resources of ordinary English used with inimitable aptness and animated by meter and rhythm. In "The Activists" (1965) Hope deplores what he calls "activism in literature" which "requires the writer to write in such a way that he promotes something" and tells him that "he has a duty to society beyond the duty of merely being a good writer." He defends the great satirists in prose and poetry, whose work is great "precisely because they are great as satires. And to say that they are satires is to say that they have a social purpose." Nevertheless, Hope's criticism also reveals a strong sympathy with the ideals of Romanticism, especially those implicit in the work of Keats, for example, and he frequently expounds the vatic and celebratory roles of poetry.

The most notable contributions to Australian letters made by Hope's essays are their style and their persistent advocacy of balance and control in literature and criticism, including the poetic use of rhythm, rhyme, and traditional forms. Graceful, fluent, authoritative, clear, and balanced, his essays use the minimum of critical jargon. Even when Hope's ideas seem insupportable, the prose makes them worth reading. Several essays remain a record of a good critic's errors, as in the attack on T.S.Eliot's prosody and poetic style in "Free Verse: A Post-Mortem" (1965). In the mid-century, when Australian literature found its place in university curricula, Hope maintained a vigilance against critical tendencies to approach Australian writing with less than rigorous standards, and he deplored motives of patriotism in the encouragement of local writers. He also warned against constructing canons of Australian literature that "prize those elements in Australian writing which were distinctively Australian and...underestimate anything which was not."

Hope had no patience with the self-consciously Australian school of Jindyworobak poets in the 1930s and 1940s, whose attempts to find primal ties with the country and its indigenous people seemed to him too strained or fictitious; he described them as “the Boy Scout School of Poetry,” with “the same boyish enthusiasm for playing at being primitive.” Later he acknowledged that he always had “an uneasy feeling that I had missed something important in what they were trying to say.”

In the 1950s Hope was well known on ABC radio as Anthony Inkwell, giving advice to aspiring young writers in the long-running children’s series The Argonauts. He also appeared as a regular reviewer and participant on many other series, on television as well as radio. Chance Encounters (1992), published in Hope’s 85th year, is a comfortable collection of personal reminiscence and anecdotes which demonstrate his prose style at its most relaxed and graceful, the essays forming a brief account of his life, work, travels, and meetings in Australia and abroad with literary and other famous figures.

ELIZABETH PERKINS

Biography

Alec Derwent Hope. Born 21 July 1907 in Cooma, New South Wales. Studied at the University of Sydney, 1925–28, B.A., 1928; University College, Oxford University, 1928–30, B.A., 1931; Sydney Teachers’ College, 1932. Teacher and vocational psychologist, Commonwealth Public Service, New South Wales, 1932–36. Married Penelope Robinson (died, 1988), 1937: one daughter (died) and two sons. Taught English at Sydney Teachers’ College, 1937–44, University of Melbourne, 1945–50, Canberra University College (now Australian National University), 1951–68 (then emeritus), and Sweet Briar College, Virginia, 1970–71 (visiting). Founding member, Australian Academy of the Humanities; president, Australian Society of Authors, 1966–67; deputy chair, Australia Council for the Arts Literary Board, 1973–74. Awards: several, including the Grace Leven Prize, 1956; Britannica-Australia Award, 1965; Volkswagen Award, 1965; Myer Award, 1967; Australian Literature Society Award, 1968; Poetry magazine Levinson Prize, 1968; Ingram Merrill Foundation Award, 1969; Robert Frost Award, 1976; honorary degrees from four universities; Officer, Order of the British Empire (OBE), 1972; Companion, Order of Australia, 1981.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

The Structure of Verse and Prose, 1943

Australian Literature, 1950–1962, 1963

The Cave and the Spring: Essays on Poetry, 1965

The Literary Influence of Academies, 1970

Henry Kendall: A Dialogue with the Past, 1971

Native Companions: Essays and Comments on Australian Literature, 1936–1966, 1974

The Pack of Autolycus, 1978

The New Cratylus: Notes on the Craft of Poetry, 1979

Poetry and the Art of Archery, 1980
Directions in Australian Poetry, 1984
Chance Encounters, 1992

Other writings: 12 collections of poetry, a study of Dunbar's The Tua Mariit Wemen and the Wedo (A Midsummer Eve's Dream, 1970), a study of the poet Judith Wright (1975), and the play Ladies from the Sea (1987).

Bibliographies

Hergenhan, Laurie, and Martin Duwell, editors, The ALS Guide to Australian Writers: A Bibliography 1963–1990, St. Lucia: University of Queensland Press, 1992
 Hooton, Joy, A.D.Hope, Melbourne: Oxford University Press, 1979
 O'Brien, Patricia, A.D.Hope: A Bibliography, Adelaide: Libraries Board of Southern Australia, 1968
Phoenix Review issue on Hope includes bibliography (Winter 1987)

Further Reading

Hart, Kevin, A.D.Hope, Melbourne: Oxford University Press, 1991
 Kramer, Leonie, A.D.Hope, Melbourne: Oxford University Press, 1979
Phoenix Review issue on Hope (Winter 1987)

Hostos, Eugenio María de

Puerto Rican, 1839–1903

Although Eugenio María de Hostos began his literary career as a novelist and also wrote short stories and poetry, his prestige as a philosopher and writer is primarily due to his extensive work as an essayist. His essays are a form of combat and action. For Hostos, the essayist is the “guardian of civilization” (Moral social [1888; Social morality]). As an artist, he pursues in his essays the expression of beauty, but also understands that “beauty is only that which is good.” His essays are written in nimble prose, often with the intimate tone of an autobiographical text, but his style is always refined, even in the most private passages of his diary. His essays more closely approximate the Modernist renewal than the rhetorical prose of his age. He is direct and clear in the development of his ideas; however, he expresses them in a reflective manner and, in doing so, seeks to incite thought, to raise consciousness in order to free the human being, and in turn to advance the progress of humankind. Hostos is above all a moralist.

Influenced by the Krausist movement (Spanish followers of the German philosopher Karl Christian Friedrich Krause) and positivism, his writings are impregnated with faith in the progress of humanity. His inductive-rationalist method, radical in a period in which the scholastic system dominated the Hispanic world, made Hostos both an intellectual and a man of action. Puerto Rican by birth and educated in Spain, Hostos is a citizen of the Americas: he resided and taught in the United States, Colombia, Peru, Chile, Argentina, Brazil, Venezuela, and Santo Domingo. In his complete works, the collection of essays comes from 113 different magazines in various countries, which span the Americas and Spain, and among which seven were founded by Hostos. Two of the magazines that he founded in Santo Domingo, Las Tres Antillas (The three Antilles) and Los Antillanos (The Antillean people), had such notorious repercussions with their philosophy of independence that the Spanish government pressured the Dominican Republic into prohibiting them.

His political and social concern is part of his vision of an integral humanism that likewise demands a personal commitment: “No man is stronger than the man who fulfills his duty” (“En que se fundan los deberes sociales” [1888; On what social duties are founded]). Therefore, when his efforts failed before the revolutionary Spain of 1869, Hostos writes in his diary: “I cannot continue here...without renouncing my conscience and my dignity and my principles” (30 May 1869). In America, his fight for the political independence of the Antilles (Cuba and Puerto Rico) formulates itself as an imperative for human progress. He presents America as a symbol of the future where “three mother races, the native, the conquistador and the African,” are in the process of achieving “the fusion of races into one civilization”; in this way, he speaks to us about an Antillean federation, a federation of Latin American nations as a preliminary step toward “the union of all nations” (“El día de America” [1883; America’s day]). Politically speaking, he sees independence in the federation, and fights for the abolition of slavery as an initial step to the recovery of human dignity: “For me, the cholo [the mestizo—person of mixed blood] is not a man, he is not a type nor the example of the race; he is all of this and, in addition, a social question of future.” With the cultural perspective by which this term is enriched, Hostos affirms that “America will owe its future to the fusion of races...the mestizo is the hope of progress” (“El cholo,” 1870).

As Hostos had to confront in Spain the “liberal” intellectuals, who were denying the colonies the rights for which they were fighting, in America, particularly in the Dominican Republic, his teaching methods and ideas regarding the liberation of the individual led him to a confrontation with the hierarchy of the Catholic Church. Hostos, influenced by Krausist ideology in Spain, was promoting an interior religion in which the principles of the conscience would dominate and prepare “the transition from the traditional religions to the religions of Reason” (Moral social). In New York he also had to confront the greed of personal interests dividing Cuban and Puerto Rican patriots and degrading the ideals for which he was fighting.

But Hostos’ place in history does not arise from his political activities or controversies. He was above all an educator who fought for cultural awareness, for an education dedicated to recuperating human dignity—a quality disregarded at that time in Latin America. In this concern he was multifarious; but there are two aspects, which, because of their present importance at the end of the 20th century, exemplify the significance of his thought: his struggle against racial discrimination and the relegation of women. In both cases, he believes that transcendence can be attained through educational reform directed toward the integral liberation of the human being. With regard to women, his position is equally strong. Hostos believes that prejudice and the abandonment of women's education impede the progress of humanity: "Vegetation, not life; fatal development, not free development; instinct, not reason; a bundle of irritable nerves, not directed faculties; woman has been made into this by the errors that burden her, social traditions, both intellectual and moral, that crush her" ("La educación científica de la mujer" [1873; The scientific education of woman]).

Hostos, indeed, belongs to a generation of 19th-century essayists (José Martí, Manuel González Prada, and Justo Sierra, among others) who charted the vision of Latin American thought and initiated the formulation of its discourse.

JOSÉ LUIS GÓMEZ-MARTÍNEZ

Biography

Born 11 January 1839 in Río Cañas, Mayagüez, Puerto Rico. Educated in Spain, from 1852; Central University of Madrid, law degree, c. 1860; admitted to the Spanish bar. Became active in Spanish politics, 1850s and 1860s. Immigrated to the United States, 1869; joined the Cuban Revolutionary Junta of pro-independence Cuban exiles in New York, and edited their magazine, La Revolución, c. 1869–70. Traveled to South America to promote Cuban and Puerto Rican independence and educational modernization, 1870–74; taught at various schools and universities throughout Latin America. Returned to New York, 1874–77. Founder of several magazines, including Las Tres Antillas and Los Antillanos, 1875. Promoted education in Venezuela, 1877–80. Founder and dean, Santo Domingo Normal School, and inspector general of public instruction, Santo Domingo, Dominican Republic, 1880–88; headmaster, Miguel Luis Amunátegui secondary school, Santiago, c. 1888–90; worked in education, Santo Domingo, 1900–03. Had one son. Died in Santo Domingo, 11 August 1903.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Hamlet, 1873; as "An Essay on Hamlet," translated anonymously, in Eugenio María de Hostos, Promoter of Pan Americanism, 1953

Lecdones de derecho constitucional (lectures), 1887

Moral social, 1888; edited by Manuel Maldonado-Denis, with Tratado de sociología, 1982.

Tratado de sociología (treatise), 1904; edited by Manuel Maldonado-Denis, with Moral social, 1982.

Meditando, 1909

Romeo y Julieta, edited by Manuel Negrón Nogueras, 1939

Hostos, hispanoamericanista (includes essays by Hostos and critical essays on him), edited by Eugenio Carlos de Hostos, 1952; as Eugenio María de Hostos, Promoter of Pan Americanism, 1953

Ensayos inéditos, edited by Emilio Godínez Sosa, 1987

Obra literaria selecta, edited by Julio César López, 1988

Other writings: novels, plays, poetry, and children's stories.

Collected works editions: Obras completas, 20 vols., 1939, and 8 vols., 1988–92, (in progress).

Bibliographies

- Foster, David William, editor, Puerto Rican Literature: A Bibliography of Secondary Sources, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1982:124–43
- Hostos, Adolfo de, Indice hemero-bibliográfico de Eugenio María de Hostos, 1863–1940, San Juan: Comisión pro Celebración del Centenario del i de Hostos, 1940

Further Reading

- Álvarez, Ernesto, La invasión pacífica: Estudios sobre Manuel Zeno Gandía y Eugenio María de Hostos, San Juan: Asomante, 1988
- Araya, Juan Gabriel, “Hostos en Chile: 1872–1873,” Hostos Para Hoy: Anuario Hostosiano 1, no. 1 (1988):53–65
- Babín, María Teresa, “El pensamiento de Hostos (1839–1903),” Revista del Instituto de Cultura Puertorriqueña 59 (1973):17–22
- Bosch, Juan, Hostos, el sembrador, Río Piedras: Huracán, 1976
- Carreras, Carlos N., Hostos: Apóstol de la libertad, San Juan: Cordillera, 1971
- Cores Trasmonte, Baldomero, “La teoría y la acción en la obra de Hostos,” Atenea 4, nos. 1–2 (1984):133–66
- Ferrer Canales, José, Martí y Hostos, Río Piedras: University of Puerto Rico, Instituto de Estudios Hostosianos, 1990
- Freire de Matos, Isabel, Eugenio María de Hostos para la juventud, Mayagüez: Comité del Sesquicentenario de Eugenio María de Hostos, 1990
- Gutiérrez Laboy, Roberto, Hostos y su filosofía moral: Acercamiento a Moral Social, Lajas, Puerto Rico: Sociedad Histórica de Lajas, 1992
- Lugo Guernelli, Adelaida, Eugenio María de Hostos: Ensayista y crítico literario, San Juan: Instituto de Cultura Puertorriqueña, 1970
- Maldonado-Denis, Manuel, Hostos, America la lucha por la libertad, Mexico City: Siglo Veintiuno, 1980
- Maldonado-Denis, Manuel, Eugenio María de Hostos, sociólogo y maestro, Río Piedras: Antillana, 1981
- Maldonado-Denis, Manuel, Eugenio María de Hostos y el pensamiento social iberoamericano, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1992
- Mora, Gabriela, Hostos intimista: Introducción a su diario, San Juan: Instituto de Cultura Puertorriqueña, 1976
- Mora, Gabriela, “Hostos feminista: Ensayos sobre la educación de la mujer,” Revista de Estudios Hispánicos 24, no. 2 (1990): 143–60
- Pascual Morán, Anaida, Hostos: Precursor de la educación por la paz, Guaynabo, Puerto Rico: Soñador, 1989
- Pedreira, Antonio S., Hostos, ciudadano de America, Río Piedras: Edil, 1976 (original edition, 1931)
- Pimentel, Miguel A., Hostos y el positivismo en Santo Domingo (filosofía y política), Santo Domingo: Autonomous University of Santo Domingo, 1981

Rivera Nieves, Irma N., El terna de la mujer en el pensamiento social de Eugenio María de Hostos, Río Piedras: University of Puerto Rico, Instituto de Estudios Hostosianos, 1992

Rojas Osorio, Carlos, Hostos, apreciación filosófica, Humacao, Puerto Rico: Colegio Universitario de Humacao, 1988

Howe, Irving

American, 1920–1993

Irving Howe's essays made him one of America's foremost radical cultural and literary critics in the post-World War II and Cold War generations. Though a member of the group that his essay of 1969 helped define as "The New York Intellectuals," the anti-Stalinist writers and critics who emerged around the Partisan Review in the late 1940s, Howe used the essay to criticize their larger move toward neoconservatism. His landmark essay of 1954, "This Age of Conformity," which attacked the Cold War complacency and complicity of American intellectuals, and Lionel Trilling in particular, with American power, stands today as one of the defining essays of the 1950s; it also marked Howe's conflicted refusal to give up his socialist Jewish background, and appeared simultaneously with his cofounding of the democratic socialist journal Dissent in that year. Howe's political pieces were often fiercely polemical, directed against perceived authoritarianism on the left almost as often as against the right, whom he was capable of joining on issues such as preserving the literary canon, and critically eviscerating, as in his 1986 essay, "Reaganism: The Spirit of the Times." Howe's essays on Yiddish literature and his substantial translations were also cultural landmarks. The historical essays of World of Our Fathers (1976), which evoked and bid farewell to the Yiddish culture of New York's lower East Side, produced his only bestseller. But the double-edged and even conservative nostalgia of his essays on Jewish culture never led him into the ranks of Jewish neoconservatives; instead, he joined Michael Harrington's Democratic Socialist Organizing Committee in the 1980s. Howe's essays appeared in Dissent, Partisan Review, Commentary, the New York Times, the Nation, and other venues, defining the terrain on which battles over high and mass culture, postmodernism, McCarthyism, relations between blacks and Jews, Israel, American Jewish identity, the New Left, and many other issues would be fought. His essays were often major cultural interventions, identifying the fault lines that would shape American cultural criticism in the postwar period.

Born Irving Horenstein, Howe began writing essays in the late 1930s for journals of the Trotskyist movement such as Labor Action, under pseudonyms which included R. Fahan, R.F.Fangston, and Theodore Dryden. He achieved a larger audience when his essays helped to define the particular genre of essay for which the New York Intellectuals became famous. Described by Howe himself as a kind of essayistic attempt at "brilliance," the essay Howe pioneered often yoked high and low culture together, while defending a Modernist aesthetic critical of mass society against the political reduction of literary autonomy that had occurred during the leftist period of the 1930s. The New York Intellectuals' essayistic style Howe helped create was erudite, but decidedly nonacademic, even when Howe became a faculty member at Brandeis University in the 1950s. The brash intelligence displayed, sometimes seen as "rudeness" by Howe's contemporaries with their genteel ethos, highlighted the critic's personality at times as much as did the subject. As Howe himself suggested in his autobiography, A Margin of Hope (1982), this style was influenced by the immigrant Jewish milieu in which he and many of the New York Intellectuals were formed. This assimilationist form of the essay allowed a new group of writers, faced with their status as cultural outsiders to the American scene, eventually to lay claim to being the United States' first "Europeanized," cosmopolitan group of urban intellectuals.

To achieve such a cosmopolitan style, while retaining his socialist and Jewish commitments, Howe's essays and their choice of subjects often walked a fine line. "The essay," Howe wrote, "required a margin of impersonality, or a showing forth of personality through indirection." This tension between polemical display and aesthetic reserve, and even ethnic withdrawal, often produced essays which defined and sometimes exemplified problems dividing American culture as a whole. One of Howe's last essays, in his posthumously published collection A Critic's Notebook (1994), lamented the postmodern proliferation of reading publics as the loss of the concept of the "common reader." The talent Howe credited to T.S.Eliot was one he himself possessed: "he had an enviable capacity for raising the shapeless concerns of his readers to the level of explicit issues." At times, Howe's commitment to such public purpose produced results which were indistinguishable from the Cold War liberalism and neoconservatism he decried. In his denunciations of the New Left, his writingoff of Kate Millett's Sexual Politics, his attack on Philip Roth's novel Portnoy's Complaint, or his siding with cultural conservatives on "The Value of the Canon" (1991), the pressures of sustaining the socialist identity of Jewish leftists through the Cold War and beyond led Howe to excoriate positions his political and cultural sympathies otherwise might have embraced. On the other hand, the critical debate Howe engaged in with Ralph Ellison over Howe's attempt to define the African American novel, "Black Boys and Native Sons" (1963) stands as a crucial document of American literature, and as a powerful articulation of tensions surrounding the expression of cultural difference in postwar America. On such contentious subjects, Howe often wrote more measured essays, such as "Universities and Intellectuals" (1964), which predicted the contesting of politics in the university during the culture wars of the early 1990s.

Howe's essayistic achievement ranged from "Mass Society and Postmodern Fiction" (1963), which provided one of the first, if hostile, definitions of postmodernism, to "The Culture of Modernism," a kind of manifesto for his generation, to belletristic appreciations of writers as diverse as W.E.B.Du Bois, Isaak Babel', George Orwell, Ignazio Silone, Theodore Dreiser, Lev Tolstoi, Laurence Sterne, and Virginia Woolf, to critiques of the behavior of intellectuals during the Red Scare, to the fate of socialism in America. Howe's importance as an essayist is represented by the scope of this work, almost all of which displayed an uncanny, eloquent ability to lay bare the tensions subtending the postwar American "consensus." Like the writing of Julien Benda, Howe's essays raise fundamental questions about the responsibility of intellectuals in modern and postmodern society. They remain crucial documents, and often the unconscious subtexts, for postmodern discussions of liberalism, radical politics, ethnic identity, and cultural criticism in the United States.

DAVID SUCHOFF

Biography

Born Irving Horenstein, II June 1920 in the East Bronx, New York. Socialist from the age of 14. Studied at the City College of New York, B.Sc., 1940; Brooklyn College, 1940–41. Served in the U.S. Army, 1942–45. Married Arien Hausknecht: one daughter and one son; later married Ilana Wiener. Contributor to various journals, including the Nation, Partisan Review, and Commentary. Cofounder and editor, Dissent, 1954–93. Taught English at Brandeis University, Waltham, Massachusetts, 1953–61, Stanford University, California, 1961–63, and Hunter College, City University of New York, 1963–86. Awards: several, including the Bollingen Award, 1959–60; National Institute of Arts and Letters Award, 1960; Jewish Heritage Award, 1975; Brandeis University Creative Arts Award, 1975–76; National Book Award, for World of Our Fathers, 1977. Died (of cardiovascular disease following a stroke) in New York, 5 May 1993.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Politics and the Novel, 1957

A World More Attractive: A View of Modern Literature and Politics, 1963

Steady Work: Essays in the Politics of Democratic Radicalism, 1953–1966, 1966

Decline of the New, 1970

The Critical Point: On Literature and Culture, 1973

World of Our Fathers, 1976; as The Immigrant Jews of New York, 1881 to the Present, 1976

Celebrations and Attacks: Thirty Years of Literary and Cultural Commentary, 1979

The American Newness: Culture and Politics in the Age of Emerson (lectures), 1986

Selected Writings, 1950 to 1990, 1990

A Critic's Notebook, edited by Nicholas Howe, 1994

Other writings: the autobiography A Margin of Hope (1982), and books on American literature, literary criticism, and politics. Also edited many editions of works by major American writers, and works on socialism.

Further Reading

Bloom, Alexander, Prodigal Sons: The New York Intellectuals and Their World, New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1986

Cain, William, "An Interview with Irving Howe," American Literary History 1 (Fall 1989): 554–64

Cooney, Terry A., The Rise of the New York Intellectuals: Partisan Review and Its

Circle, Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1986

Isserman, Maurice, “If I had a hammer”: The Death of the Old Left and the Birth of the New Left, New York: Basic Books, 1987:79–118

Jumonville, Neil, Critical Crossings: The New York Intellectuals in Postwar America, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1991

Krupnick, Mark, “Irving Howe,” in Modern American Critics Since 1955, edited by Gregory S. Jay, Dictionary of American Literary Biography, vol. 67, Detroit: Gale Research, 1988:167–75

Pinsker, Sanford, “Lost Causes/Marginal Hopes: The Cultural Elegies of Irving Howe,” Virginia Quarterly Review 65 (Spring 1989): 215–30

“Remembering Irving Howe,” Dissent (Fall 1993):515–49

Wald, Alan M., “Portrait: Irving Howe,” in The New York Intellectuals: The Rise of the Anti-Stalinist Left from the 1930s to the 1980s, Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1987: 311–21

Howe, Joseph

Canadian, 1804–1873

Journalist, politician, civil servant, and noted public speaker, Joseph Howe is sometimes considered the first Canadian essayist of note, with his speeches and formal orations designated and collected as essays during and since his own time. Although his work appeared in a variety of forms, including pamphlets and collections, his reputation was established primarily through his prodigious output of editorials, public letters, and transcribed speeches which appeared regularly in a number of prominent contemporary newspapers, including the Halifax Morning Chronicle and the New York Albion. The most important of these journalistic associations, though, was with the Novascotian, which Howe edited for many years and which was quickly established as the most influential newspaper in the province.

Writing in a self-assured tone that critics past and present have suggested borders on egotism, Howe appears to the modern reader as a grandiloquent stylist. Prone, at times, to moments of excessive decoration, flights of rhetorical exuberance, and forced literary allusion, he also apparently had a strong sense of his audience, for his essays were often “looked to as stylistic models” by his contemporaries (Brandon Conron, 1965). It is not as a prose stylist that modern critics commonly remember Howe, however, but rather as a writer whose essays remain centered firmly on the social and political issues that kept him in the public’s eye throughout his life: the drive for universal access to nonsectarian public education; wariness of direct taxation and excessive governmental intervention in private lives; battles for freedom of speech and of the press; advocacy of railway construction; and arguments for reciprocity with the United States. Two issues in particular define both Howe’s public life and his essays: his ongoing fight for responsible government, and later in his life his passionate opposition to Canadian Confederation.

On the first count, Howe was a proponent of open, liberal politics. In essence a conservative reformer who respected the values of the emerging middle class, he saw partisan politics as the bane of Nova Scotia's future, a static system that bound people to party loyalties which could put them in opposition to their conscience. To Howe, governing was never a singularly partisan activity. As he reflected in a personal letter: "Parties form and reform, fuse and divide in all free Countries as opinions change, and new issues and exigencies arise" (1869). More important, the party-dominated system was rife with what Howe saw as systemic neglect, misconduct, and corruption on the part of the province's political elite.

During his two tenures as editor of the Novascotian (1827–40; 1844–46), Howe saw his editorial "chair," as he called it, become the rallying point for Nova Scotia's Reform party. It was a position he accepted gladly. As he announced in his "Opening Editorial" upon return to the paper following a stint in public office: "When one sits in it, however hard the work, they are answerable for nobody's sins or follies or shortcomings but their own; in dignity it may be somewhat less elevated, but it is second to none in...real substantial power ...to influence the daily thought, to touch the hearts, to enter the dwellings of tens of thousands like an old familiar friend, and inform, excite, and guide them; power, not without its legitimate checks—for, when abused, it ceases to be power" (1844).

To his readers Howe was an old familiar "friend," and one who always wrote, first and foremost, as a native son. A dedicated promoter of the intellectual and cultural progress of the province, he developed a popular and well-known series of travel sketches known in the aggregate as his "Rambles." There are, in fact, two distinct sets of essays comprising these travels: a series of "Western Rambles," which appeared in the Novascotian between 23 July and 9 October 1828, and the "Eastern Rambles," which appeared in the paper between 17 December 1829 and 19 October 1831. Both sets are organized as the descriptions and meditations of an inquiring traveler who sets out from the provincial capital to explore and study the natural and social history of the regions and towns of Nova Scotia. These are familiar essays, full of direct appeals to the "gentle reader," passages of sentimental meditation upon rural life and the "philosophy of nature," and moral instruction. Often, Howe tries to invoke a sense of the history that had shaped the "youthful" Nova Scotia: "Had I the happy faculty of Scott, and could evoke from the green sward the forms which once, in bravery and pride, trod where they now are lying, I could paint for the gentle traveller's eye many a singular and striking scene, and carry him away from the present, to behold the deeds and partake of the spirit of the past" (October 1828).

Although modern critics generally see Howe's "rambles" as the least political of his writings, politics and social issues are never far below the surface. Especially prominent are examples of the ubiquitous "hobgoblins" of "disaffection and bad government" (25 February 1830), the distinctions of religion which continue to divide local communities, and reflections on the sorry state of transitional economies. One of Howe's favored strategies in these essays is to reflect on how social policies and practices have shaped the lives of various "characters" he meets on the road, including the exemplary "Ploughman" (28 August 1828) and "a Village Doctor" (11 September 1828).

This dedication to the well-being of Nova Scotia also informed Howe's well-documented stance against Confederation during the 1860s. The more interesting of these antiConfederation tracts include an insightful series of anonymous "Botheration letters" (The Morning Chronicle, 1865) detailing his view of the constitutional structure of post-Confederation Canada, and two pamphlets from 1866: "Confederation Considered in Relation to the Empire" and "The Organization of the Empire." Serious in tone, intricately detailed, and articulating a controlled defense of Nova Scotia's interests, these essays stand apart from those Howe produced in the months and years that followed royal assent of the British North America (BNA) Act, which are the most deeply personal of Howe's writings. A lifelong anglophile who openly celebrated Nova Scotia's links to Britain, "that great country from which we have all sprung, to which we owe allegiance" ("Speech on Elective Councils," 1837), Howe was bitterly disappointed and disillusioned with both the British public and the British political process following Confederation. As he admits publicly in the first of a series of five letters "To the Editor of The Morning Chronicle" following the British government's rejection of a brief anti-confederate agitation for repeal of the BNA Act, the experiences of the 1860s left their mark: "with deep sorrow, and a sense of humiliation not easily described, I [am] compelled to acknowledge that I had cherished a delusion" (1868).

An especially succinct summary of Howe's lifelong commitment to his ideals and native province comes in a widely printed public letter "To the People of Canada" (1867): "The page of my public life of which I shall ever be most justly proud is that whereon is unfolded the earnestness and sincerity with which, against fearful odds, I defended the independence of my native Province, and endeavored to protect her people from insult and spoliation."

KLAY DYER

Biography

Born 13 December 1804 in Halifax, Nova Scotia. Little formal schooling. Apprenticed to family printing and newspaper business, from age 13. Cofounding editor, the Acadian, 1817; editor and major contributor, the Novascotian, 1827–40, 1844–46. Married Catherine McNab, 1828; ten children. Elected to the Nova Scotia legislative assembly, 1836; premier, 1860–63; led opposition forces in the Confederation debate of the mid-1860s; elected as an Opposition candidate, 1867, but accepted that opposition to Confederation was futile, 1869; appointed secretary of state for the provinces, 1869–73; appointed lieutenant-governor of Nova Scotia, April 1873. Died in Halifax, 1 June 1873.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

The Speeches and Public Letters of the Hon. Joseph Howe, edited by William Annand, 2 vols., 1858; revised edition, edited by Joseph Andrew Chisholm, 2 vols., 1909

Poems and Essays, 1874; edited by M.G.Parks, 1973

The Heart of Howe: Selections from the Letters and Speeches, edited by D.C.Harvey, 1939

Joseph Howe: Voice of Nova Scotia, edited by J.Murray Beck, 1964

Western and Eastern Rambles: Travel Sketches of Nova Scotia, edited by M.G.Parks, 1973

Other writings: poetry, addresses, pamphlets, and correspondence.

Further Reading

- Beck, J.Murray, Joseph Howe, Kingston and Montreal: McGillQueen's University Press, 2 vols., 1982–83
- Conron, Brandon, "Essays 1880–1920," in Literary History of Canada: Canadian Literature in English, edited by Carl F.Klinck and others, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1976:354–60 (original edition, 1965)
- Grant, George M., "The Late Hon. Joseph Howe," Canadian Monthly and National Review 7, no. 5 (May 1875):377–87; 7, no. 6 (June 1875):497–508; 8, no. 1 (July 1875):20–25; 8, no. 2 (August 1875):115–22
- Hunt, Wayne A., editor, The Proceedings of the Joseph Howe Symposium, Sackville, New Brunswick: Mount Allison University Centre for Canadian Studies, 1984
- Parks, M.G., Introduction to Poems and Essays by Howe, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1973:vii–xxxii
- Parks, M.G., Introduction to Western and Eastern Rambles: Travel Sketches of Nova Scotia by Howe, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1973:3–44
- Roy, James A., Joseph Howe: A Study in Achievement and Frustration, Toronto: Macmillan, 1935

Howells, William Dean

American, 1837–1920

As a realist, William Dean Howells is more easily caricatured than accurately portrayed. Detractors since H.L.Mencken have misrepresented him as a defender of respectability and the "smiling aspects of life" ("The Editor's Study," September 1886), while scholarly critics (notably Michael Bell and Daniel Borus) have commented on his lack of theoretical rigor. But the publication of his Selected Literary Criticism (1993) in the Selected Edition of his works may prompt a better understanding of Howells as an essayist in the literal sense of the word: a writer who tested competing values without pretending to reconcile them. Though he promoted a distinctively American literature, he was an early champion of internationalism and multiculturalism; and though he fought the "realism war," he acknowledged the actual heterogeneity of modern fiction, welcoming writers who defied categorization. "True criticism," he wrote, "...is the function and the natural habit of every intelligent and candid mind" ("Literary Criticism," 1866)—yet honest readers should be troubled by "the inadequacy of criticism" every time they examine a new book (review of Literature and Its Professors, 1867). While such modesty prevented Howells from developing a consistent theory, it enabled him to appreciate the texts we still regard as canonical. This virtue was crucial in an age when writers were misunderstood by one another as well as by an increasingly diverse public.

Venetian Life (1866), a collection of essays written by Howells during his service as American consul, was his first major literary success. Reviewed favorably by James Russell Lowell, it gained the young Ohioan admission to the charmed circle of the New England Brahmins, and later the prestigious editorship of the Atlantic Monthly. But these sketches convey the democratic outlook that distinguished Howells from his privileged elders. “Thank God that the good old times are gone and going!” he exclaims after visiting the Jewish ghetto.

His reviews of literature were also progressive—ethically serious but devoid of Arnoldian snobbishness. He applauded such regionalist writers as Sarah Orne Jewett, Edward Eggleston, Bret Harte, and E.W. Howe, and he was equally friendly to Europeans who supplied an antidote to American provincialism. Two companion essays, both published in 1882, demonstrate Howells’ gift for accepting rival geniuses on their own terms. “Mark Twain” praises Twain for his humor and directness, while “Henry James, Jr.” defends James’ “analytic tendency” and his subtle appeal to a more elite audience. Unfortunately for Howells, the latter piece offended British reviewers because of its casual disparagement of Dickens and Thackeray (“We could not suffer the confidential attitude of the latter now, nor the mannerism of the former”). Yet Howells was far less dogmatic than the critics who accused him of trying to establish a “new school.”

In 1885 Howells was invited by Henry Alden, the editor of Harper’s Monthly, to replace the usual book reviews with a column treating “any subject of current literary interest.” These “Editor’s Study” essays, some of which were excerpted in Criticism and Fiction (1891), were his strongest attempt to promote a realist aesthetic. Using a genial tone and witty metaphors, he needled the sentimentalists—those who preferred a painted model of an ideal grasshopper, “made up of wire and cardboard,” to the actual commonplace thing. As for his positive standards—“the simple, the natural, and the honest”—they were sufficiently flexible to accommodate a literature still in its nascence (“The Editor’s Study,” December 1887). But he could not personally effect all the developments he sought. The radical views of his favorite author, Tolstoi, undermined his own attempts to locate self-evident values; and he was forced to admit the disparity between Russian fiction and the modest efforts of his American compatriots. His final essay (March 1892) portrays the Editor leaving his Study while his successors puzzle over his “collection of moral bric-à-brac.”

Despite this valediction, Howells remained an active commentator on literature and culture. Such essays as “Are We a Plutocracy?” (1894) record his growing concern for social and economic equality, while his literary reviews (which welcome Stephen Crane, Charlotte Perkins Gilman, Frank Norris, and Thomas Hardy, among others) testify to his refusal to succumb to “Sclerosis of the Tastes” (Imaginary Interviews, 1910). But the pieces of most enduring interest are the reminiscences in Literary Friends and Acquaintance (1900) and My Mark Twain (1910). Here we find the details that enrich our understanding of American literary history: Lowell’s habit of saying “Remember the dinner-bell” whenever the conversation turned unduly transcendental; Emerson’s condescending dismissal of Poe as “the jingle-man”; Mark Twain’s disastrous speech at the Whittier birthday dinner. Howells may once have regarded Boston as the “holy land,” but he had a keen sense of the Brahmins’ jealousies and foibles.

On Howells’ 75th birthday, Henry James conceded that “the critical intelligence” had not done justice to his friend. And yet, James added, “the more it shall be moved by the analytic and historic spirit, the more indispensable, the more a vessel of light, will you be found” (“A Letter to Mr. Howells,” 1912). Howells’ essays are of lasting value to students of his era not simply an “age of realism,” but one whose complexities and contradictions foreshadow those of our own culture.

SARAH B. DAUGHERTY

Biography

Born 1 March 1837 in Martin’s Ferry, Ohio. Studied at schools in Hamilton and Dayton, Ohio; educated mostly at home. Composer, Ohio State Journal, Columbus, 1851–60; wrote for the Jefferson Gazette, Ohio, from 1852, Cincinnati Gazette, 1857–58, 1866, Cleveland Herald, 1858, Boston Advertiser, 1863–65, the Nation, New York, 1865–66, and Literature, 1898–99. U.S. Consul, Venice, 1861–65. Married Elinor Gertrude Mead, 1862. (died, 1910): two daughters (one died) and one son. Assistant editor, 1866–71, and editor-in-chief, 1871–81, Atlantic Monthly, Boston. Lectured at Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1869–71. Columnist of “Editor’s Study,” 1885–91, and 1900–10, and “The Editor’s Easy Chair,” 1895–98, Harper’s Monthly; coeditor, Cosmopolitan, New York, 1891. Lifelong friend of Mark Twain (i.e. Samuel Clemens) and Henry James. Awards: National Institute of Arts and Letters Gold Medal, 1915; honorary degrees from five universities. Honorary Fellow, Royal Society of Literature, 1901; president, American Academy, 1908–10. Died in New York, 11 May 1910.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Venetian Life, 1866; enlarged edition, 1872

Modern Italian Poets: Essays and Versions, 1887; as The Three Greatest Italian Poets of the Nineteenth Century, 1983; as Contemporary Italian Poets, 2 vols., 1987

Criticism and Fiction, 1891

My Literary Passions, 1895

Impressions and Experiences, 1896

Literary Friends and Acquaintance: A Personal Retrospect of American Authorship, 1900

Literature and Life: Studies, 1902

London Films, 1905

Certain Delightful English Towns (travel sketches), 1906

Roman Holidays and Others (travel sketches), 1908

Seven English Cities (travel sketches), 1909

Imaginary Interviews, 1910

My Mark Twain: Reminiscences and Criticisms, 1910; edited by Marilyn Austin Baldwin, 1967, and David F. Hiatt and Edwin H. Cady, 1968

Prefaces to Contemporaries (1882–1920), edited by George Arms, William M. Gibson, and Frederic C. Marston, Jr., 1957

Criticism and Fiction, and Other Essays, edited by Clara Marburg Kirk and Rudolf Kirk, 1959

Discovery of a Genius: William Dean Howells and Henry James (articles about James), edited by Albert Mordell, 1961

Tuscan Cities, 1967

W.D.Howells as Critic, edited by Edwin H.Cady, 1973

Editor's Study: A Comprehensive Edition of W.D. Howells' Column [in Harper's], edited by James W.Simpson, 1983

The Early Prose Writings, edited by Thomas Wortham, 1990

A Realist in the American Theatre: Selected Drama Criticism, edited by Brenda Murphy, 1992

Other writings: many novels (including The Undiscovered Country, 1880; A Modern Instance, 1882; The Rise of Silas Lapham, 1885; Indian Summer, 1886; A Hazard of New Fortunes, 1889), plays, poetry, travel writing, a biography of Abraham Lincoln, and literary criticism.

Collected works edition: A Selected Edition, edited by Edwin H. Cady, Ronald Gottesman, Don L.Cook, and David Nordloh, 25 vols., 1968–93 (in progress).

Bibliographies

Brenni, Vito J., William Dean Howells: A Bibliography, Metuchen, New Jersey: Scarecrow Press, 1973

Eichelberger, Clayton L., Published Comment on William Dean Howells Through 1920: A Research Bibliography, Boston: Hall, 1976

Gibson, William M., and George Arms, A Bibliography of William Dean Howells, New York: New York Public Library, 1948

Further Reading

Arms, George, "Howells' English Travel Books: Problems in Technique," PMLA 82 (March 1967):104–16

Bassett, John E., "'A heart of ideality in my realism': Howells's Early Criticism," Papers on Language and Literature 25 (Winter 1989):67–82

Bell, Michael Davitt, The Problem of American Realism: Studies in the Cultural History of a Literary Idea, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1993

Borus, Daniel H., Writing Realism: Howells, James, and Norris in the Mass Market, Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1989

Cady, Edwin H., editor, W.D.Howells as Critic, London and Boston: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1982

Carrington, George C., "Howells and the Dramatic Essay," American Literary Realism 17 (Spring 1984):44–66

Daugherty, Sarah B., "Howells Reviews James: The Transcendence of Realism," American Literary Realism 18 (Spring-Autumn 1985):147–67

Dean, James L., Howells' Travels Toward Art, Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press, 1970

Demoor, Marysa, "Andrew Lang Versus W.D.Howells: A LateVictorian Literary Duel," Journal of American Studies 21 (December 1987):416–22

- Hough, Robert L., The Quiet Rebel: William Dean Howells as Social Commentator, Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1959
- Jacobson, Marcia, "The Mask of Fiction: William Dean Howells's Experiments in Autobiography," Biography 10 (Winter 1987): 55–67
- Jacobson, Marcia, "Howells' Literary Friends and Acquaintance: An Autobiography Through Others," American Literary Realism 27 (Fall 1994):59–73
- James, Henry, "A Letter to Mr. Howells," North American Review 195 (April 1912):558–62
- Kirk, Clara Marburg, W.D.Howells and Art in His Time, New Brunswick: Rutgers University Press, 1965
- Matthews, Brander, "Mr. Howells as a Critic," Forum 32 (January 1902):629–38
- Miller, Elise, "The Feminization of American Realist Theory," American Literary Realism 23 (Fall 1990):20–41
- Stull, William L., "The Battle of the Century: W.D.Howells, 'Henry James, Jr.' and the English," American Literary Realism 11 (Autumn 1979):249–64
- Tuttleton, James W., "William Dean Howells and the Practice of Criticism," New Criterion 10 (June 1992):28–37
- Woodress, James L., Howells and Italy, Durham, North Carolina: Duke University Press, 1952
- Woodress, James L., "Howells in the Nineties: Social Critic for All Seasons," American Literary Realism 23 (Spring 1993):18–26

Huch, Ricarda

German, 1864–1947

Ricarda Huch is a paradox in the history of the essay. Few of her individual works can be called "essays." Moreover, she was opposed to the prevailing attitude of "essayism" or "feuilletonism," and tried to write in a manner and form that could not be confused with the dominant modes of essay writing. Her distaste for the essay genre derives mainly from the German/Austrian understanding of that term around the turn of the century rather than from an opposition against the essay as such. Yet her texts exhibit a significant number of characteristics of the essay. She wrote for a general educated audience, and cultivated a combination of narrative and reflexive elements, with a mixture of general and personal ideas, and an appeal to both reason and emotion. Above all, the individual chapters of her larger works tend to be independent, self-contained units.

Huch belonged to the first generation of educated and professionally independent women in German society. She fought hard for her independence: in order to qualify for university studies, she had to leave Germany for Switzerland, where she graduated with a Ph.D. in modern history from the University of Zurich in 1892. She declined careers as teacher and researcher and became a freelance writer, producing poetry, novels (historical novels among them), historical works, literary criticism, and books on religion and philosophy. She was a person of rare integrity and courage, following her own path despite the obstacles; in 1933, for example, she resigned from the prestigious membership of the Prussian Academy of the Arts rather than collaborate with the Nazis. A pillar of the oppositional “Bekennende Kirche” (Confessional Church) within the Lutheran Church, she was treated in 1945 with reverence by the Soviet administration, the Allied military, and the German public.

There are four types of essay to be found within the context of her works: the biographical essay, the historical essay, the geographical essay, and the essay of ideas. Whereas her earlier works consist mainly of poetry and very personal, if not autobiographical novels, later texts combine personal empathy with objective fact. Huch’s foremost preoccupation was with people and their relationships. All her works contain numerous biographical sketches; she also wrote major factual or fictional biographies. Her intense interest in the Italian Risorgimento of the 19th century led to novels on Garibaldi (1906–07) and Federigo Confalonieri (1910). She wrote a biography of the Freiherr vom und zum Stein (1925). Rather surprising, given her conservative views, is her positive biography Michael Bakunin und die Anarchie (1923; Mikhail Bakunin and anarchy). What attracted her to Bakunin’s anarchism was his concept of a self-reliant “organic” community as opposed to artificial modern society. These works can be regarded as expansions of biographical essays.

Huch’s personalism is apparent in her extensive historical work. She diagnosed “Entpersönlichung” (depersonalization) as a major illness of the age, publishing a book with that title (1921). She was fascinated by creative personalities, as shown in her writings on literary figures, and especially in her early, successful book on Romanticism, Die Romantik (1899, 1902). Its individual chapters can be read as essays on the leading personalities, ideas, and developments of German Romanticism. Huch’s personalized view of history is also evident in Alte und neue Götter (1930; Old and new gods), her account of the 1848 Revolution in Germany.

The most essay-like writing can be seen in Huch’s geographical tableau of old German cities, Im alten Reich: Lebensbilder deutscher Städte (1927–34; In the old empire: images of the life of German cities). Her descriptions of the structure of these old cities, important buildings, and conspicuous events and personalities stress the individuality of urban organisms as well as the communal spirit they generated. Huch’s social ideal of the self-governing community based on personal involvement and solidarity is portrayed in living pictures of many different individual entities. In the entry on her native city of Brunswick, understandably one of the most thorough articles, there is an easy transition from such portraits combining history and geography to Huch’s autobiographical sketches describing the people and the places most important to her. She had to feel part of the land, the history, and its people wherever she lived.

Huch combined a fervent Lutheran faith with a Goethean organic view of history and community. For all her belief in tradition, the importance of the home country, and family values, she accepted change as inevitable and valued individuality above all else. Her religious and philosophical books try to convey this holistic view of the human being and of human life and history. The most essay-like sections can be found in her book on Martin Luther’s faith (Luthers Glaube, 1916), written during World War I. The book is presented in the form of letters to a skeptical friend, and step by step she tries to counter the arguments of modern skepticism, unfolding Luther’s stature as a great man of faith rather than his skills as a founder of a new church.

The last statement of her beliefs bears the Goethean title Urphänomene (1946; Archetypal phenomena), archetypes of the visible forms in nature. This refers to the belief in the organic order of the world, the benign dynamics of life, and the ultimate victory of living forces over annihilation. While nature can be grasped only in individual phenomena, the gaze should always be directed to the essence and the whole. Thus, each of Huch's statements and writings is meant to convey one aspect of a larger world view. She never tired of narrating and describing, always with an eye toward the meaning of life.

It may be this very integrity of her world view and her personal life that makes Huch a stranger in our world. Today she elicits polite and distant respect, and does not seem relevant to our problems. But it could be her essay-like features that will make some of her writings accessible again.

WULF KOEPKE

Biography

Ricarda Octavia Huch. Born 18 July 1864 in Brunswick. Studied at the University of Zurich, Ph.D. in history, 1892. Archivist, Zentralbibliothek, Zurich, 1891–94; teacher in Zurich, 1894–96. Married Ermanno Ceconi, 1898 (divorced, 1906): one daughter. Married her cousin Richard Huch, 1907 (divorced, 1911). Lived at various times in Bremen, Vienna, Trieste, Munich, Berlin, Berne, Heidelberg, Freiburg, and Jena. Member, Prussian Academy of the Arts, 1927, resigned in protest at the Nazi regime's expulsion of various writers, 1933. Awards: Goethe Prize, 1931. Died in Kronberg, 17 November 1947.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Die Romantik: Blütezeit der Romantik; Ausbreitung und Verfall der Romantik, 2 vols., 1899–1902

Das Risorgimento (treatise), 1908; as Menschen und Schicksale aus dem Risorgimento, 1925

Luthers Glaube: Briefe an einen Freund, 1916

Entpersönlichung, 1921

Im alten Reich: Lebensbilder deutscher Städte, 3 vols., 1927–34

Urphänomene, 1946

Gesammelte Schriften: Essays, Reden, autobiographische Aufzeichnungen (includes essays, speeches, and autobiography), 1964

Other writings: several novels (including Erinnerungen von Ludolf Ursleu dem Jüngeren [Eros Invincible], 1893; Aus der Triumphgasse, 1902; Vita somnium breve, 1903; Das Leben des Grafen Federigo Confalonieri, 1910; Der Fall Deruga [The Deruga Trial], 1917), short stories, poetry, plays, works on history and religion, and correspondence.

Collected works edition: Gesammelte Werke, edited by Wilhelm Emrich, 11 vols., 1966–74.

Further Reading

- Baum, Marie, Leuchtende Spur: Das Leben Ricarda Huchs, Tübingen: Wunderlich, 1950
 Baumgarten, Helene, Ricarda Huch: Von ihrem Leben und Schaffen, Weimar: Böhlau, 1964
 Flandreau, Audrey, Ricarda Huch's Weltanschauung as Expressed in Her Philosophical Works and in Her Novels (dissertation), Chicago: University of Chicago, 1948
 Gottlieb, Elfriede, Ricarda Huch: Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der deutschen Epik, Leipzig and Berlin: Teubner, 1914
 Hertling, Gunter H., Wandlung der Werte im dichterischen Werk der Ricarda Huch, Bonn: Bouvier, 1966
 Hoppe, Else, Ricarda Huch, Stuttgart: Riederer, 1951 (original edition, 1936)
 Mutzner, Paula, Die Schweiz im Werke Ricarda Huchs, Berne: Haupt, 1935
 Walzel, Oskar, Ricarda Huch: Ein Wort über Kunst des Erzählens, Leipzig: Insel, 1916

Hume, David

British, 1711–1776

To appreciate David Hume as an essayist, he must be understood as a philosopher, for it was to better communicate his reconstruction of philosophy that he turned to the essay. Philosophy, as traditionally conceived, has its source in pure reason independent of pre-reflective custom and tradition. But Hume argued that the notion of pure reason is incoherent and that the true source of belief and conduct is custom. Reason, properly conceived, is a matter of methodizing and correcting the prejudices and customs of common life. The “true philosopher” is not a spectator of common life but a loyal and critical participant in it. This radical reform of philosophy was presented in Hume’s first published work, A Treatise of Human Nature (1739–40), written in his twenties. This was a systematic and abstruse work designed for a philosophical audience, which, in Hume’s time, it failed to impress. But even during its preparation, Hume was writing essays. Essays, Moral and Political appeared in 1741, with a second volume in 1742. Hume worked on essays throughout his career until his death in 1776, when he arranged for the posthumous publication of Essays, Moral, Political, and Literary (1777). Overall he published 49 essays. Of these, 27 appeared in the first two volumes. Over the years Hume dropped eight and added others, publishing 11 editions of essays. They were warmly received in Britain, America, and on the continent, where they went through numerous translations in French, German, and Italian.

It was through the essay that Hume’s philosophy was made known to his contemporaries. And it was as a writer of essays that he first signed his name, the Treatise of Human Nature having been published anonymously and later publicly rejected by Hume as a “juvenile” work, embarrassing not because of its matter but for its form. Even the other main sources of Hume’s philosophy, An Enquiry Concerning Human Understanding (1758) and An Enquiry Concerning the Principles of Morals (1751) should be viewed as eclectic extended essays or as collections of essays. In fact the former, in its first version, was published as Philosophical Essays Concerning Human Understanding (1748). No other philosopher of Hume’s range, depth, and stature has endeavored to philosophize through the essay form. It is also remarkable that Hume is the only great philosopher who is also a great historian. His monumental History of Great Britain went through over 100 posthumous editions. That Hume was both essayist and historian is explained by his reconstruction of philosophy.

The “true philosopher” is a rooted participant in common life. To think critically about this order one must develop a connoisseur’s knowledge of the habits, prejudices, and traditions of common life. The connoisseur is a master of the particular, which requires a knowledge of history. The philosopher seeks the universal meaning of the particular, but the true philosopher knows that the universal is revealed through a metaphor made by the imagination and not merely by a concept. The universal, so conceived, is best exhibited in the form of conversation in common life. In “Of Essay-Writing” (1742), Hume explains why the essay is the proper medium of “true philosophy.” He distinguishes between two worlds: that of conversation and that of learning. The essayist is an “Ambassador from the Dominion of Learning to those of Conversation.” In the past, learning was “shut up in Colleges and Cells,” and “Philosophy went to Wrack by this moaping recluse Method of Study, and became as Chimerical in her Conclusions as she was unintelligible in her Stile and Manner of Delivery.” Philosophy is a maker of universals, but these are rooted in metaphorical identities framed in pre-reflective common life. “The Materials of this Commerce must chiefly be furnish’d by Conversation and common Life: The manufacturing of them alone belongs to Learning.” For Hume, the essay was an extension of the philosophical societies that had flourished in Edinburgh from the late 17th century and had a more serious purpose in “learning” than the French salons. He hoped to extend the conversation of these societies, through the essay form, to a more general audience that included women, whom he identified as “the Sovereigns of the Empire of Conversation.”

Few philosophers have experimented with so many different literary forms in order to find the proper voice for philosophy. Hume wrote systematic treatises, essays, dialogues, narratives, and eclectic combinations of these forms. The essays also exhibit considerable experimentation. Some of the early ones from Essays, Moral and Political address serious themes to the ladies in a gallant and playful idiom, e.g. “Of the Study of History,” “Of Love and Marriage,” “Of Essay-Writing.” Allegory appears in “Of Avarice,” “Of Impudence and Modesty,” and “Of the Middle Station of Life.” Parable is to be found in “Of Moral Prejudices.”

Some essays are to be read as a set. “The Epicurean,” “The Stoic,” “The Platonist,” and “The Sceptic” (from Essays, Moral and Political, vol. 2) together explore the question of what constitutes human happiness. The first three are speeches of wisdom and employ the familiar “Thee” and “Thou.” The “Sceptic” is not itself a speech about happiness so much as a reflection of the meaning of the question and speaks in the voice of “I” and “We.” But this voice is not necessarily Hume’s, for the author appears in footnotes to query the skeptic. In this way, the essays become orations on the good life addressed to the author and reader. In most of the essays, Hume speaks as the maker of universals, giving the complete speech on the topic at hand. All the essays are rich in references to classical authors as sources of wisdom and as evidence for historical theses in a debate between the Ancients and the Moderns that runs throughout the essays. Though Hume held that classical moral philosophy is superior to the modern, he insisted that modern moral, political, and economic practice is superior to the ancient. In “Of Eloquence” (1742), he argued that eloquence is the only art in which the Moderns have not surpassed the Ancients, and he urges revival of the art.

Over half the essays are attempts to gain a connoisseur’s understanding of the vices and virtues of modern political institutions and practices. Hume explores with great subtlety the often strange and contingent origin of the modern practices of liberty, how good is interwoven with evil, and how some good drives out other good. “Of Some Remarkable Customs” (1752) demonstrates how political traditions are ingenious, reconciling opposites that political theory had declared to be impossible. But political theorizing, though limited, can provide insight into the dialectical ferment of practice. In “Idea of a Perfect Commonwealth” (1752), Hume finds intimated in modern politics a new and superior form of political association, namely, an extensive republic, thereby subverting the traditional wisdom that republics can exist only in a small territory. This essay, entering the political conversation of common life in America, influenced, among others, James Madison, who argued in the “Tenth Federalist” that, despite the vast territory of America, the states could and should unify into a republic. This is one of many episodes in which Hume’s philosophical essays effected a fruitful commerce between the world of conversation and the world of learning.

DONALD W. LIVINGSTON

Biography

Born 26 April 1711 in Edinburgh. Studied at the University of Edinburgh, 1723–25 (?); studied law and philosophy privately; worked briefly for a merchant in Bristol, then studied in France, 1734–37. Lived in London, 1737–39, 1740–44, and on Ninewells family estate, eastern Scotland, 1739–40, 1744–45. Tutor to George, Marquess of Annandale, 1745–46; secretary to General James St. Clair, 1746–47, and accompanied him to Port l’Orient, 1747, and to Vienna and Turin, 1748. Lived in Edinburgh, 1751–63 (except for a year in London, 1758–59); librarian to the Faculty of Advocates, Edinburgh, 1752–57. Personal secretary to the Ambassador of the British Embassy in Paris, 1763–66; undersecretary of state for the Northern Department, 1767–68. Returned to live in Edinburgh, 1769–76. Died in Edinburgh, 25 August 1776.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Essays, Moral and Political, 2 vols., 1741–42; enlarged edition, 1748; in Essays and

- Treatises on Several Subjects*, vol. 1, 1753; as Essays, Moral, Political, and Literary, in revised edition of Essays and Treatises on Several Subjects, vol. 1, 1758, and in its definitive edition, 1777; edited by Thomas Hill Green and Thomas Hodge Grose, 2 vols., 1875, and Eugene F. Miller, 1987
- Philosophical Essays Concerning Human Understanding*, 1748, reprinted 1986; revised edition, 1750; in Essays and Treatises on Several Subjects, vol. 2, 1756; as An Enquiry Concerning Human Understanding, in revised edition of Essays and Treatises on Several Subjects, vol. 2, 1758, and in its definitive edition, 1777; edited by L.A. Selby-Bigge, 1902 (revised by P.H. Nidditch, 1975), Charles W. Hendel, 1955, Antony Flew, 1962, Ernest Campbell Mossner, 1963, and Eric Steinberg, 1993
- An Enquiry Concerning the Principles of Morals*, 1751; in Essays and Treatises on Several Subjects, vol. 3, 1753, and in its definitive edition, 1777; edited by Charles W. Hendel, 1957
- Political Discourses*, 1752; in Essays and Treatises on Several Subjects, vol. 4, 1754, and in its definitive edition, 1777
- Essays and Treatises on Several Subjects*, 4 vols., 1753–56; several subsequent revised editions, 1758–70; definitive edition, 1777; edited by L.A. Selby-Bigge, 1894; as The Philosophical Works, edited by Thomas Hill Green and Thomas Hodge Grose, 4 vols., 1886, reprinted 1992
- Four Dissertations*, 1757
- Two Essays*, 1777; as Essays on Suicide, and the Immortality of the Soul, 1783
- Dialogues Concerning Natural Religion*, 1779; edited by Norman Kemp Smith, 1935, Henry D. Aiken, 1948, Stanley Tweyman, 1991, and in Principal Writings on Religion, edited by J.C.A. Gaskin, 1993
- Political Essays*, edited by Charles W. Hendel, 1953
- Of the Standard of Taste, and Other Essays*, edited by John W. Lenz, 1965
- Writings on Religion*, edited by Antony Flew, 1992
- Selected Essays*, edited by Stephen Copley and Andrew Edgar, 1993
- Political Writings*, edited by Stuart D. Warner and Donald W. Livingston, 1994
- Political Essays*, edited by Knud Haakonssen, 1994
- Other writings: the philosophical work A Treatise of Human Nature (1739–40), the multi-volume History of Great Britain, other works on politics and history, and correspondence.

Bibliographies

- Hall, Roland, Fifty Years of Hume Scholarship: A Bibliographical Guide, Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1978; supplements in the November issues of Hume Studies, 1977–
- Jessop, T.E., A Bibliography of David Hume and of Scottish Philosophy from Francis Hutcheson to Lord Balfour, New York: Garland, 1983 (original edition, 1938)
- Todd, William B., “David Hume, a Preliminary Bibliography,” in Hume and the Enlightenment: Essays Presented to Ernest Campbell Mossner, edited by Todd, Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, and Austin: University of Texas Humanities Research Center, 1974

Further Reading

- Bongie, Laurence L., David Hume, Prophet of the CounterRevolution, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1965
- Box, M.A., The Suasive Art of David Hume, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1990
- Capaldi, Nicholas, Hume's Place in Moral Philosophy, New York: Lang, 1989
- Forbes, Duncan, Hume's Philosophical Politics, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1975
- Gaskin, J.C.A., Hume's Philosophy of Religion, London: Macmillan, and Atlantic Highlands, New Jersey: Humanities Press, 1988 (original edition, 1978)
- Jones, Peter, Hume's Sentiments, Their Ciceronian and French Context, Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1982
- Livingston, Donald W., Hume's Philosophy of Common Life, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1984
- Miller, David, Philosophy and Ideology in Hume's Political Thought, Oxford: Clarendon Press, and New York: Oxford University Press, 1981
- Norton, David Fate, David Hume, Common-Sense Moralist, Sceptical Metaphysician, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1982
- Penelhum, Terence, Hutne, London: Macmillan, and New York: St. Martin's Press, 1975
- Siebert, Donald T., The Moral Animus of David Hutne, Newark: University of Delaware Press, 1990

Humorous Essay

Before the early 18th century the term “humor” referred to any one of four chief liquids in the human body, the proportion of which was thought to determine an individual’s character. Only in the 18th century did the term come to refer to a type of writing meant to evoke laughter. The older meaning of the word persisted in the sense that this type of writing focused on human characteristics, personalities, foibles, and eccentricities, as opposed to witty writing, which relied on mental quickness, keen intellectual perceptions, and wordplay.

As a genre the essay has tended more toward the humorous than the witty. Even before there was a such a term, the humorous essay existed. For instance, in “Des cannibales” (1580; “Of Cannibals”), Montaigne shows cannibals from the New World to be more “civilized” than Europeans. The cannibals are shocked by the cruelty of the Portuguese invaders and amazed that young Charles IX’s hefty Swiss guardsmen “should submit to obey a child.” Tongue in cheek, Montaigne admits grudging respect for these noble savages, but then concludes, “All of this is not too bad—but what’s the use? They don’t wear breeches.”

Within the essay tradition Montaigne’s anecdotal humor was offset from the start by Bacon’s more serious, instructive, and epigrammatic approach. If humor is broader, slower, and more open, while wit is more incisive, rapid, and neat, then the tradition of the humorous essay can be traced to Montaigne and the witty essay to Bacon. During the 17th century, La Rochefoucauld explored a sort of middle ground. His maxims were aphoristic and instructive in the manner of Bacon, but retained Montaigne's skepticism and ironic self-deprecation.

The 17th century was also marked by the rise of the character sketch as a kind of humorous essay. This development grew out of the 1592 publication of a Latin translation of Theophrastus (c. 371–c. 287 BCE), whose Characters offered a model for exploring the eccentricities of the individual. These essays sometimes pretended to be a letter from a neighboring place bringing news about those who lived there. Bishop Joseph Hall, Sir Thomas Overbury, Thomas Dekker, Thomas Harman, John Earle, Thomas Fuller, and Laura Spencer Portor all published collections in which they characterized such types as the bumpkin, the glutton, the busybody, and the hypocritical nonconformist. Ben Jonson's epigrams also presented types as social or moral models. The character was also popular in France where La Bruyère created more individualized subjects in his essays.

During the 18th century, the character evolved into the periodical essay, which was brief, gossipy, and topical. Richard Steele developed this type of humorous essay in his Tatler (1709–11) and joined with Joseph Addison to refine it in the Spectator (1711–12, 1714). Samuel Johnson's Rambler (1750–52) and Idler (1758–60) followed, as did variations by Jonathan Swift, Alexander Pope, the Earl of Chesterfield (Philip Dormer Stanhope), Horace Walpole, Oliver Goldsmith, and George Colman and Bonnell Thornton. Henry Fielding folded similar kinds of essays into his novel Tom Jones (1749). The periodical essayists were also popular in America, spawning imitators such as John Trumbull, Joseph Dennie, Charles Brockden Brown, and William Wirt.

The humor of the periodical essayists appealed to a new, urban, middle-class readership. By satirizing fashions, marriage, coffeehouse conversation, and pastimes such as duelling and card-playing, the periodical essayists sought to reform the manners, morals, and tastes of their readers. The border between fiction and nonfiction was permeable for the periodical essayists, who regularly invented characters, "correspondents," and clubs in their essays. Addison and Steele targeted women's fashions and their alleged flightiness and duplicity, charges that Maria Edgeworth answered in her sly Letters for Literary Ladies (1795).

The turn into the 19th century saw the emergence of the Romantic movement with its emphasis on individualism, sensibility, and radical politics. These concerns, along with the more leisurely deadlines and extra space provided in new literary magazines such as Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine and the London Magazine, led to the development of a more sentimental, autobiographical, and urbane kind of humorous essay. Charles Lamb's persona in his Elia essays (1823, 1828) was apparently not unlike the genial self that he showed his friends and that helped him through his melancholy life. Lamb's light, whimsical, intimate, somewhat antique style was aspired to by English essayists for a century after his death. William Hazlitt, the other great master of the period, had a bit more edge, writing humorously about such topics as "On the Pleasure of Hating" (1826) and "On the Disadvantages of Intellectual Superiority" (1821).

In America, Washington Irving added length and sentiment to the Addisonian essay in his Sketch Book (1819–20). Sara Payson Willis Parton, who published under the name Fanny Fern, was a professional journalist for more than 20 years. Best known for her sentimental Fern Leaves from Fanny's Portfolio (1853), she also had a wicked wit with which she punctured masculine pomposity. But it was Irving's lighter brand of irony and nostalgic musing that most influenced genteel American essayists such as Charles Dudley Warner and Donald Grant Mitchell, who dominated the second half of the 19th century. Agnes Repplier and Katherine Fuller Gerould kept the genteel or "light" essay alive well into the 1930s with their apt allusions and dry wits.

In England, the essay grew increasingly formal, decorous, and critical until the very end of the 19th century. Oscar Wilde, the sharpest fin-de-siècle wit, only occasionally wrote essays, but Max Beerbohm's perfect parodies, G.K.Chesterton's puns and conversational style, Robert Louis Stevenson's whimsical imagination, and E.V.Lucas' single-handed resurrection of Lambian geniality brought humor back to the English essay. The problem was that these writers were sometimes so discreet in their choice of subject matter and so light in their treatment of it that their essays became almost parodies of the form. The titles of Hilaire Belloc's collections demonstrate an awareness of this problem: On Nothing, On Everything, On Anything, On Something (1908–11), and, finally, just On (1923).

It was during this period that the humorous essay moved from the literary quarterlies back to the newspapers and magazines. Oswald Barron, writing as "The Londoner" in the Evening News, produced a light essay—at once sensible, readable, and witty—every day for two decades. Robert Lynd accomplished a similar feat, writing weekly about everything from football to eggs as "Y. Y." of the New Statesman until his death in 1949.

It was not until the 20th century that the United States developed its own type of the humorous essay. The rustics and cracker-barrel philosophers of 19th-century America, from Sut Lovingood to Artemus Ward to Mr. Dooley, were fictional characters whose humor was mainly dialect humor. Even reallife figures such as Davy Crockett, Mike Fink, and Jim Bridger were turned into tall tales. Mark Twain used the essay form to pillory James Fenimore Cooper, but was himself primarily a fiction writer, as the title of perhaps his best-known essay, "How to Tell a Story" (1895), indicates.

The first few decades of the 20th century in the United States have been called by some "the age of Mencken." From the Baltimore Evening Sun H.L.Mencken's iconoclastic, often cynical, always American voice sounded daily. Mencken skewered puritanism, sentimentality, boosterism, pedantry, and other traits of the "booboisie."

The explosion in the number of newspapers and a desire on the part of readers to be "in the know" also led to the rise of a group who called themselves "colymnists." Several of these urban humorists frequented the famous Round Table at the Algonquin Hotel in New York. Competition forced each to pursue his own angle. Franklin Pierce Adams collected oneliners and humorous verse from readers, and wrote mock Pepsysian diaries about New York goings-on; R.C.Holliday, Alexander Woollcott, and Christopher Morley displayed bookish and acerbic wits; and Don Marquis used a fictional cockroach to poke fun at the times. But it was Robert Benchley and Heywood Broun who most successfully re-created themselves as characters in their columns. Their version of the "little man"—a kind of bewildered, middle-class American guy doing his best in a fast-paced modern world—was developed and refined by James Thurber and E.B.White in the New Yorker. The beset “little man” has survived as Garrison Keillor’s sentimental Midwesterner and Dave Barry’s suburban father.

The “little man” has bumbled through the 20th century, but his female counterpart has not. The decline of gentility meant that women essayists no longer needed to worry quite so much about being decorous. As Victorian proprieties eroded, female essayists could be more unabashed. Virginia Woolf and Dorothy Parker wrote wickedly funny essays—though this activity did not allow them to escape all the restrictions on their gender in their societies. Parker, in particular, should be regarded as a 20th-century woman, not a 19th-century lady. Woolf was cleverer than most men, Parker was quicker, and both were funnier. Among contemporary female practitioners of the humorous essay, some, such as Nora Ephron, Molly Ivins, and Fran Lebowitz, find their subjects in the (still) masculine public sphere, while others, such as Jean Kerr, Shirley Jackson, Peg Bracken, and Erma Bombeck, focus on domestic life; but all feel free to be both clever and incisive.

In the United States, black and Jewish writers of humorous essays have, like women, long recognized that in a society of inequalities and prejudices, people laugh at different things. Thus, their essays tend to revolve around issues of sameness and difference. As Langston Hughes put it in the preface to his Book of Negro Humor (1966), “Humor is laughing at what you haven’t got when you ought to have it. Of course, you laugh by proxy. You’re really laughing at the other guy’s lacks, not your own.” He then adds that the joke may be “on you but hits the other fellow first—before it boomerangs.” This doubleness in ethnic humor has meant that the African American or Jewish humorous essay often relies on dialect—be it Yiddish or the “signifyin’” codes of black speech. The best of these essays are not strictly in-jokes, however, and can be appreciated by many outside the particular ethnic group. Such doubleness has also meant that black and Jewish essayists often turn their humor back on the pretensions of their own group. Thus there is no real self-hatred in, for instance, Hughes’ uncompromising look at the black middle class in “The Negro Artist and the Racial Mountain” (1926), Zora Neale Hurston’s “How It Feels to Be Colored Me” (1928) (which opens with the line “I am colored but I offer nothing in the way of extenuating circumstances except the fact that I am the only Negro in the United States whose grandfather on the mother’s side was not an Indian chief”), or even Woody Allen’s exposure of his own neuroses and insecurities.

On the basis of a long view of the history of the humorous essay, one could, if reducing the form to its essentials, say that while it can be aphoristic, quick, and witty, it more often harks back to the 17th-century character’s slower, fuller descriptions of eccentricities and foibles—sometimes another’s, sometimes the essayist’s, but usually both.

NED STUCKEY-FRENCH

Anthologies

Humour in English Literature: A Chronological Anthology, edited by Reginald Horace Blyth, Folcroft, Pennsylvania: Folcroft, 1970

A Subtreasury of American Humor, edited by E.B. White and Katharine S. White, New York: Coward McCann, 1941

Further Reading

- Blair, Walter, and Hamlin Hill, America's Humor: From Poor Richard to Doonesbury, New York: Oxford University Press, 1978
- Bruère, Martha Bensley, and Mary Ritter Beard, Laughing Their Way: Women's Humor in America, New York: Macmillan, 1934
- Clark, William Bradford, and W.Craig Turner, editors, Critical Essays on American Humor, Boston: Hall, 1984
- Eleanore, Sister Mary, The Literary Essay in English, Boston: Ginn, 1923
- Gale, Stephen H., editor, Encyclopedia of American Humorists, New York: Garland, 1988
- Inge, Thomas M., editor, The Frontier Humorists: Critical Views, Hamden, Connecticut: Archon, 1975
- Little, Judy, Comedy and the Woman Writer: Woolf, Spark and Feminism, Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1983
- Morris, Linda A., Women Vernacular Humorists in Nineteenth-Century America: Ann Stephens, Francis Whitcher, and Marietta Holley, New York: Garland, 1988
- Morris, Linda A., editor, American Women Humorists: Critical Essays, New York: Garland, 1994
- Rourke, Constance, American Humor: A Study of the National Character, New York: Harcourt Brace, 1931
- Tave, Stuart M., The Amiable Humorist: A Study in the Comic Theory and Criticism of the Eighteenth and Early Nineteenth Centuries, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1960
- Thackeray, William Makepeace, The English Humourists of the Eighteenth Century: A Series of Lectures, London: Smith Elder, 1853
- Trachtenberg, Stanley, editor, Dictionary of Literary Biography: American Humorists, 1800–1950, Detroit: Gale Research, 2 vols., 1982
- Walker, Nancy A., A Very Serious Thing: Women's Humor and American Culture, Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1988
- Ward, A.C., Twentieth-Century Literature: 1901–1950, London: Methuen, 1956
- White, E.B., Preface to A Subtreasury of American Humor, edited by E.B.White and Katharine S.White, New York: Coward McCann, 1941
- Yates, Norris Wilson, The American Humorist: Conscience of the Twentieth Century, Ames: Iowa State University Press, 1964

Hunt, Leigh

British, 1784–1859

Leigh Hunt wrote essays on a wide variety of subjects and in a number of styles. This eclecticism and versatility have established his reputation as an important figure in the Romantic period.

Beginning in 1801, Hunt wrote essays and theatrical criticism for a number of journals, one of which was his brother John's News. In collaboration with his brother, Leigh began the weekly political journal, the Examiner, in 1808. Concurrent with the Examiner was the short-lived Reflector (1810–11), a quarterly magazine devoted to literary topics, noteworthy for the familiar essays "A Day by the Fire" and "The Feast of the Poets." Legal trouble befell Hunt in 1813, when his unrestrained criticism of government corruption, ineptitude, and foreign policy provoked the charge of seditious libel, for which he was found guilty, fined, and incarcerated for two years.

Despite this experience, the best of Hunt's work was yet to come. Familiar essays such as "Getting up on Cold Mornings" and "A 'Now': Descriptive of a Hot Day" appeared in the weekly Indicator (1819–21). While in Italy in 1822, Hunt planned a joint periodical venture with Byron and Shelley. After Shelley's death, however, the Liberal produced only four numbers (1822–23), ceasing once an embittered Byron left Hunt, who remained in Genoa, destitute. By 1828, Hunt was, once again, writing high-quality essays for the Companion, these contributions consisting largely of theatrical criticism and occasional essays in the manner of the Indicator. Among his later outlets were the Tatler (1830–32), Leigh Hunt's London Journal (1834–35), and Leigh Hunt's Journal: A Miscellany for the Cultivation of the Memorable, the Progressive, and the Beautiful (1850–51).

One of Hunt's greatest innovations in the genre was his version of the Theophrastan character, a sketch in which the definition of a human weakness introduces a list of actions typical of such a person. An example of this motif can be found in "On Washerwomen" (1816). Hunt, whose knowledge of the fine arts was impressive, begins by describing "direct picture-making" as a means of sketching both men and things. Like a great painter who captures the intensity of a scene through color, position, and shade, or like a great composer whose overture conveys the substance of a symphony, the essayist must approach his task with incisiveness, perspicuity, and power. The "detached portrait," the form of which Chaucer and Steele had done much to develop, was, for Hunt, precisely such an intense scene or overture. From this theoretical preamble, he turns, not without tongue in cheek, to washerwomen. In a Wordsworthian spirit, Hunt makes his purpose clear: to celebrate the pleasures derived from contemplating "any set of one's fellow creatures and their humours, when our knowledge has acquired humility enough to look at them steadily." This topical versatility—the ability to treat theoretical material in an imaginative context—is a distinguishing feature of Hunt's talent.

A further example of Hunt's proclivity for literary innovation in the essay is "A 'Now': Descriptive of a Hot Day" (1820). In this piece, the speaker focuses on a sequence of detached scenes of rural and urban persons, things, and familiar activities. Here, mundane or commonplace subject matter is used in a highly imaginative way: the sequencing of portraits is unified spatially through the mind of the ubiquitous speaker; and the simultaneity of experience is linguistically evoked by the repetition of the adverb "Now" at the head of each sentence. "A 'Now'" demonstrates Hunt's intention of using the essay as a testing ground for his theory of detached portraiture.

Hunt underscores his idea of the amplitude of great poetry in "What Is Poetry?," the introductory essay to his larger work, Imagination and Fancy (1844). Defining poetry synoptically as an utterance of a passion for truth, beauty, and power, he signals his departure from neoclassical norms, stating that any subject can be legitimately considered for poetry. Thus, the means of poetry can be "whatever the universe contains"; rather than striving for a didactic or moral message, poetry should seek to convey “pleasure and exaltation.” Hunt’s conjectures on the creative faculties—on imagination and fancy—clearly owe much to Wordsworth, Coleridge, Hazlitt, and Keats; in fact, Hunt seems to have had Coleridge’s Biographia Literaria in mind in his enumeration of the kinds and degrees of imagination. His sevenfold paradigm treats figurative language (the dynamics of metaphor) and emphasizes the great importance of the imagination, in all its phases, “as a constituent part of the highest poetic faculty.” “What Is Poetry?” epitomizes Hunt’s theoretical interests and incisive style.

Perhaps nowhere else are Hunt’s critical intelligence and virtuosity with the genre exhibited more impressively than in his famous review of John Keats’ first volume of poetry (1816). As a preamble to his evaluation of Keats’ work, Hunt describes neoclassical poetry as being bereft of imagination, of intense feeling, and of sentiment and variety. Even the greatest of the 18th-century poets—Gray, Thomson, Akenside, and Collins—allegedly practiced an imitative and artificial style. Whereas the 18th-century poets were reputedly alienated from feeling and concrete reality, the Lake poets, though not above criticism themselves, were the first to revive true taste for nature, with Wordsworth epitomizing this tendency. Keats, too, is emphatically a poet of the new age, for he pursues new poetry for its own sake. Hunt’s review is typically balanced, precise, and even-tempered. He begins by enumerating two faults of Keats’ poetry (one of which is to overdo rhymes intentionally), but then turns to the obvious “Beauties” of his work. Three prominent aspects of Keats’ verse are his “fine ear,” the felicitous workings of his imagination and fancy, and “an intense feeling of external beauty in its most natural and least expressible simplicity.” Besides evidencing Hunt’s support of Romantic literature, the review reflects his tactical ability, within a relatively finite space, to focus on and to interrelate a variety of topics (literary theory and history), as well to employ effectively several rhetorical strategies (comparison and exemplification).

Among his numerous essays on the theater, that on the reopening of the Covent Garden Theatre (1809) evidences Hunt’s concern for his fellow man and for social equity. No dilettante, he could not detach the arts either from the living reality they imitated or from the society which they were supposed to entertain. Specifically, he castigates the hypocritical management of Covent Garden for raising ticket prices to cater to the aristocracy and probably to defray the costs of the opulent furnishings and decor. Calculating to serve only “the higher orders,” the management, whom Hunt calls “tradesmen,” have, in a sense, subverted the nobility of the theater, not to mention having precipitated riots. This piece, like many others, depicts Hunt as a humane, penetrating, and conscientious critic.

CHARLES DE PAOLO

Biography

James Henry Leigh Hunt. Born 19 October 1784 in Southgate, Middlesex. Studied at Christ’s Hospital school, London, 1791–99. Served with the St. James regiment, 1803. Legal clerk, 1803–05; worked for the War Office, 1805–08. Married Marianne Kent, 1809 (died, 1857): seven children (one son died). Contributor throughout his career to many journals and periodicals, including the Traveller, 1804, the News, 1805–07, the Statesman, 1806, the Times, 1807, New Monthly Magazine, 1825–26 and occasionally until 1850, Atlas, 1828–30, True Sun and Weekly True Sun, 1833–34, the Spectator, 1858–59, and the Morning Chronicle; editor of many journals, including the Examiner: A Sunday Paper, 1808–21 (also contributor until 1825), the Reflector, 1810–11, the Indicator, 1819–21, Literary Pocket-Book; or, Companion for the Lover of Nature and Art, 1819–23, the Companion, 1828, Chat of the Week, 1830, the Tatler: A Daily Journal of Literature and the Stage, 1830–32, Leigh Hunt's London Journal, 1834–35, the Monthly Repository, 1837–38, and Leigh Hunt's Journal, 1850–51. Convicted and jailed for libeling the prince regent, 1813–15 (continued to edit the Examiner while in prison). Lived in Italy (arrived a week before Percy Bysshe Shelley's drowning), 1822–25: established the Liberal with Shelley, editing it with Byron after Shelley's death, 1822–23. Granted Civil List pension, 1847. Died in Putney, south London, 28 August 1859.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Critical Essays on the Performers of the London Theatres, 1807

The Examiner (periodical), 3 January 1808–26 February 1821

The Reflector (periodical), nos. 1–4, 1 January 1811–23 March 1812; in 2 vols., 1812

The Round Table: A Collection of Essays on Literature, Men, and Manners, with William Hazlitt, 2 vols., 1817; facsimile reprint, 1991

The Indicator (periodical), nos. 1–76, 13 October 1819–21 March 1821; in 2 vols., 1820–21

The Chat of the Week (periodical), nos. 1–13, 5 June–28 August 1830

The Seer; or, Commonplaces Refreshed, 2 vols., 1840

Essays: The Indicator, The Seer, 1841

Imagination and Fancy, with an Essay in Answer to the Question What Is Poetry?, 1844

Men, Women, and Books: A Selection of Sketches, Essays and Critical Memoirs, 2 vols., 1847

A Jar of Honey from Mount Hybla, 1848

The Town: Its Memorable Characters and Events, 2 vols., 1848

Table-Talk, 1851

Essays and Miscellanies (from the Indicator and the Companion), 1851

The Old Court Suburb; or, Memorials of Kensington, Regal, Critical, and Anecdotal, 2 vols., 1855; enlarged edition, 1855

A Tale for a Chimney Corner and Other Essays, edited by Edmund Ollier, 1869

A Day by the Fire; and Other Papers Hitherto Uncollected, edited by Joseph Edward Babson, 1870

Essays and Poems, edited by R. Bromley Johnson, 2 vols., 1891

Dramatic Essays, edited by William Archer and R.W. Lowe, 1894

Prefaces by Leigh Hunt, Mainly to His Periodicals, edited by R. Brimley Johnson, 1927

Dramatic Criticism, Literary Criticism, and Political and Occasional Essays, edited by Lawrence H. Houtchens and Carolyn W. Houtchens, 3 vols., 1949–62

Selected Writings, edited by David Jesson-Dibley, 1990

Other writings: poetry, a novel, two plays, a book on Byron (1828), books on London, a three-volume autobiography (1850), and correspondence. Collected works edition: Works, 7 vols., 1870–89.

Bibliographies

- Lulofs, Timothy J., and Hans Ostrom, Leigh Hunt: A Reference Guide, Boston: Hall, 1985
 Waltman, John L., and Gerald G. McDavid, Leigh Hunt: A Comprehensive Bibliography, New York: Garland, 1985

Further Reading

- Blainey, Ann, Immortal Boy: A Portrait of Leigh Hunt, New York: St. Martin's Press, and London: Croom Helm, 1985
 Blunden, Edmund, Leigh Hunt: A Biography, Hamden, Connecticut: Archon, 1970 (original edition, 1930)
 Cheney, David R., "Leigh Hunt, Essayist," Books at Iowa 40 (April 1984):31–40
 Grigely, Joseph C., "Leigh Hunt and the Examiner Review of Keats's Poems, 1817," Keats-Shelley Journal 33 (1984):30–37
 Kendall, Kenneth E., Leigh Hunt's Reflector, The Hague: Mouton, 1971
 Marshall, William H., Byron, Shelley, Hunt, and the Liberal, Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1960
 Smith, David Q., "Genius and Common Sense: The Romantics and Leigh Hunt," Books at Iowa 40 (April 1984):41–57
 Thompson, James R., Leigh Hunt, Boston: Twayne, 1977

Huxley, Aldous

British, 1894–1963

Aldous Huxley was born into a well-to-do upper-middle-class family, which brought him a rich scientific and humanistic intellectual heritage. He was the grandson of T.H.Huxley, one of the best-known British scientists, and on his mother's side was related to Matthew Arnold, the great British humanist. His father was a biographer, editor, and poet, and his elder brother, Julian, was a challenging writer and well-known biologist. These facts, plus several irreversible events that marked his early life, placed him in an ambiguous relationship to both science and literature; they also set his remarkably inquisitive mind on an unflinching search for ultimate truth, both objective and metaphysical, wherever it could be found. Given this background, and despite his success as both novelist and essayist at a very early age (in his late twenties and early thirties), Huxley at first experienced enormous frustration at not being a scientist. He later acknowledged, however, that at this time in history, especially in the aftermath of ill-fated events including World War II, being a Michael Faraday would have been more difficult than being a Shakespeare.

Huxley chose the essay as the definitive and preferred vehicle for expressing his ideas, especially after 1936 (a crucial turning point in his life when he decided to abandon pure fictional writing), for several reasons. First, the novel, despite the freedom of viewpoints it could allow the writer, was not the genre that best portrayed reality as intellectuals saw it, but only as they thought and believed it to be. Thus, for Huxley, intellectuals who wrote novels could not reflect real human attitudes. Second, Huxley saw in the essay a means to liberate himself from the restraints of form and style of an established canon, and a door through which he could pass freely among literary, technical, and scientific worlds. He openly stated that his most cherished endeavor as a writer was the achievement of the perfect fusion of the novel and the essay. This statement echoes the general perception that Huxley was an essayist who happened to write novels. It also affirms that this genre, which the Mexican humanist and essayist Alfonso Reyes classified as a form of “ancillary literature” as opposed to “pure literature,” and which he also called “the centaur of genres” (half literature and half science), fits Huxley’s pretext for bringing together his objective and subjective views about both the natural and human worlds. The essay allowed him to uncover this fusion of worlds, as well as to display his enormous knowledge and natural wit.

This hybrid form serves as a means for exploring what he called Proper Studies (1927), namely those dealing with the human being. This series of essays addresses some of his most puzzling themes, ideas that constantly resurfaced in his early attempts at writing poetry, short histories, and drama, through his travelogues, novels, and social and critical essays on painting, art, architecture, ecology, and mysticism. As a 20th-century writer, he was especially concerned with the education of the human being as an “amphibian” (one capable of living in different environments), an epithet he applied to himself.

Huxley’s concerns about the power of science and technology mainly reflect on the damage they could eventually inflict on humans and nature. This view would lead him to swing repeatedly between dystopian and utopian conceptions for the society of his day, especially following World War II, conceptions that motivated his will to synthesize both philosophical and cultural views around the well-being of humanity. This can be gathered, for instance, from his collection of essays in Ends and Means (1937), his philosophical work The Perennial Philosophy (1944), his last and only utopian novel Island (1962), and his posthumous essayistic piece Literature and Science (1963). From reading these works, it is understandable that he should consider himself a Pyrrhonist (skeptical philosopher) and why his entire production can be equally considered biographical, a natural feature of the essay, and one that accounts for the confessional tone of the author.

Huxley’s skepticism may also explain why he caused so much controversy as poet, novelist, and essayist among a wide audience that came to perceive him as an extremely intelligent satirist, ironist, and cold-minded thinker. Surprisingly, these latter features were especially pleasing to his younger admirers, who came to see him as an enlightened leader. These same characteristics, however, would disappoint those same fans when they realized Huxley had abandoned his fictional writing in favor of essayistic didacticism rather than break ground in literary and critical circles.

As a writer, Huxley emphasized both the spirituality and the intellectuality of human life through his rationalistic amalgamation of science, philosophy, and art. The concept of “perennial philosophy” (as an ethical, universal system) appealed to him, especially as a system underlying all the goodness of the world in its natural manifestation (The Doors of Perception, 1954).

As a seeker of ultimate reality, he realized that problems arise when abstract language is used to intellectualize about the modern super-specialized and industrialized world. Father Joseph of Gray Eminence (1941), principal adviser to Cardinal Richelieu, is for Huxley the example that best illustrates the effects of such intellectualization and abstract language. Huxley’s disillusionment with abstract progress led him finally to seek after mysticism, as he gradually abandoned the belief that one can find salvation by blindly accepting the norms of a highly complex, technological society.

CIRO A.SANDOVAL-B.

Biography

Born 26 July 1894 in Godalming, Surrey. Grandson of the scientist T.H.Huxley. Studied at Eton Coliege, Berkshire, 1908–13; Balliol College, Oxford, 1913–15, B.A. in English, 1916. Worked for the War Office, London, 1917; taught at Eton College, 1918. Married Maria Nys, 1919 (died, 1955): one son. Member of the editorial staff, the Athenaeum, London, 1919–20; drama critic, Westminster Gazette, 1920–21; assistant at the Chelsea Book Club; worked for Condé Nast Publications, 1922. Lived in Italy, 1923–30, France, 1931–36, and California, from 1937; wrote screenplays for film studios. Experimented with hallucinogenic drugs, 1950s. Married Laura Archera, 1956. Awards: American Academy Award, 1959; Companion of Literature, Royal Society of Literature, 1962. Died in Los Angeles, 22 November 1963.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

On the Margin: Notes and Essays, 1923

Along the Road: Notes and Essays of a Tourist, 1925

Essays New and Old, 1926

Proper Studies, 1927

Do What You Will: Essays, 1929

Holy Face, and Other Essays, 1929

Music at Night, and Other Essays, 1931

The Olive Tree and Other Essays, 1936

Stories, Essays, and Poems, 1937

Ends and Means: An Enquiry into the Nature of Ideals and into the Methods Employed for Their Realization, 1937

Themes and Variations, 1950

Adonis and the Alphabet, and Other Essays, 1956; as Tomorrow and Tomorrow and

Tomorrow, and Other Essays, 1956

Collected Essays, 1959

On Art and Artists, edited by Morris Philipson, 1960

Selected Essays, edited by Harold Raymond, 1961

Literature and Science, 1963

Huxley and God, edited by Jacqueline Hazard Bridgeman, 1992

Hearst Essays, edited by James Sexton, 1994

Between the Wars: Essays and Letters, edited by David Bradshaw, 1994

The Hidden Huxley: Contempt and Compassion for the Masses, edited by David Bradshaw, 1994

Other writings: II novels (Crome Yellow, 1921; Antic Hay, 1923; Those Barren Leaves, 1925; Point Counter Point, 1928; Brave New World, 1932; Eyeless in Gaza, 1936; After Many a Summer Dies the Swan, 1939; Time Must Have a Stop, 1944; Ape and Essence, 1948; The Genius and the Goddess, 1955; Island, 1962) short story collections, several plays and screenplays, travel writing, poetry, works on philosophy, and The Doors of Perception (1954), a book about his drug experiences.

Collected works edition: Collected Works, 1948– (in progress).

Bibliographies

Bass, Eben E., Aldous Huxley: An Annotated Bibliography of Criticism, New York: Garland, 1981

Eschelbach, Claire John, and Joyce Lee Shober, Aldous Huxley: A Bibliography 1916–1959, Berkeley: University of California Press, and Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1961; supplements by Thomas D. Clareson and Carolyn S. Andrews, in Extrapolation 6 (December 1964):2–21, and by Dennis D. Davis, in Bulletin of Bibliography 31 (April-June 1974):67–70

Further Reading

Atkins, John, Aldous Huxley: A Literary Study, New York: Orion Press, and London: Calder and Boyars, revised edition, 1967

Firchow, Peter, Aldous Huxley: Satirist and Novelist, Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1972

Holmes, Charles M., Aldous Huxley and the Way to Reality, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1970

Thody, Philip, Huxley: A Biographical Introduction, New York: Scribner, 1973

Watt, Donald, Aldous Huxley: The Critical Heritage, London and Boston: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1975

Watts, Harold H., Aldous Huxley, New York: Twayne, 1969

Huxley, T.H.

British, 1825–1895

T.H.Huxley wrote 220 science essays and over 100 “fugitive pieces,” popular essays devoted to promoting science as the instrument for revealing truths biological and geological, educational and political, ethnical and ethical. His audience ranged from working men to Royal Institution amateurs to professional peers in the Royal Society, of which he was president between 1883 and 1885. Huxley’s scientific essays exhibit his meticulous prose style, achieved by both a keen understanding of the physiological or physiographic process being analyzed and the employment of specialized terms.

In the preface to Discourses Biological and Geological (1894), Huxley extols prose for “lay sermons” that replaces “scholastic pedantry” with clear expression. He alludes to John Wesley’s cunning in popularizing the sacred: “he did not see why the Devil should be left in possession of the best tunes.” These tunes are sometimes played in his scientific memoirs, for example in his savage review of a new edition of a bad book, the appearance of which “has much the effect that the inconvenient pertinacity of Banquo had upon Macbeth. ‘Time was, that when the brains were out, the man would die.’ So time was, that when a book had been shown to be a mass of pretentious nonsense, it, too, quietly sunk into its proper limbo” (“Vestiges of the Natural History of Creation, Tenth Edition,” 1854).

The fundamental feature of Huxley’s prose style is his philosophical perspective: “unity in diversity,” aligning stork and the snake it swallows; beetle and bee; monkey and man; the hut and the pantheon; and agnosticism (“agnostic” is his invention), reason, science, and decent behavior. In “On Science and Art in Relation to Education” (1882), he aligned the pleasure derived from Bach’s fugues with the pleasure of unifying diverse data in morphology. In his laboratory, he would select a common animal as an item stimulating generalization, moving from the specific to the general: from the entrance hall crayfish to the mansion Invertebrata. He would also shift deliberately from the known to the unknown, from a piece of chalk held in his hand to strata held by the earth below. “On a Piece of Chalk,” delivered to Norwich working men in 1868, exemplifies his technique as popular lecturer, beginning with the concrete here and now and cruising strange seas of thought to transport his audience to the ancient sea bottom. The conclusion envisages burning chalk that shines like the sun, its luminous rays metamorphosing into a “fervent” and often-reprinted essay.

Huxley’s “On the Physical Basis of Life” (1869) tracks down vital activities to the collaboration of carbon, hydrogen, nitrogen, and oxygen. This reduction of people to protoplasm was sufficiently subversive to send the Fortnightly Review, the journal in which it appeared, into seven editions, a record last accomplished by Jonathan Swift. It also excited a dozen jeremiads. The essay provides fine strata for investigation of Huxley’s prose style: specificity of reference to biological, chemical, and geological data; imaginative and informative analogy and metaphor; an aesthetic precision of diction; allusions, e.g. to Schoolmen, Dante, Balzac, Jacob's ladder; a tone often tinged with humor if not tainted with sarcasm; and references to himself, a voice that over the decades presented him to his auditors and readers as a friendly guide.

Opening with a revelation of protoplasm as the cohering substance of all life, Huxley directs us to picture to ourselves "the great Finner whale, hugest of beasts that live, or have lived, disporting his eighty or ninety feet of bone, muscle and blubber, with easy roll, among waves in which the stoutest ship that ever left dockyard would flounder hopelessly, and contrast him with the invisible animalcules—mere gelatinous specks, multitudes of which could, in fact, dance upon the point of a needle with the same ease as the angels of the Schoolmen could, in imagination." If he, Huxley, were to sup upon lobster, the crustacean would metamorphose into humanity; and were Huxley to drown, the crustacean would "return the compliment" and convert the lecturer into lobster. A noteworthy product of the human molecular machine is the physiological event called thought. Automatism dooms people to nightmares: the eclipse of tradition "threatens to drown their souls; the tightening grasp of law impedes their freedom; they are alarmed lest man's moral nature be debased by the increase of his wisdom."

Another feature of Huxley's prose style is the architectonic. His essays are usually so well organized, with such comforting guiding transitions, that they have been taken as models for undergraduate (as well as scholarly) writing—for example, in his "A Liberal Education" (1868), with its famous personification of Nature as a grand master playing a lethal chess game with us pawns. He did not always find his compatriots skillful at architectonics; he felt the Origin of Species was "An intellectual pemmican—a mass of facts crushed and pounded into shape, rather than held together by the ordinary medium of an obvious logical bond." German scientists are "magnificently laborious and accurate. But most of them have no notion of style, and seem to compose their books with a pitchfork."

Huxley was famous, or infamous, as a polemicist. Scores of his essays display his pugilistic talent, for example, Lectures on Evolution (pub. 1882), delivered in New York City in 1876, which earned him extensive reports in the New York Times and the ignoble label "Huxley Eikonoklastes" elsewhere. His most impressive polemical bouts (1885–95) were his description of Genesis as an inaccurate account of global and vital dynamics, and his attack on Messianic exorcism (the Gadarene swine episode) as an accurate account of demonology at work.

For good literary creation, Huxley focused on the importance of being earnestly stirred by the subject, of being clear and avoiding "that pestilent cosmetic, rhetoric" (which sometimes adorns his prose), and of meticulous revising. The work of good writers is characterized by "clear and vivid conceptions" embodied in "language exactly adapted to convey them to other minds"; they possess "that purely artistic sense of rhythm and proportion which [enable] them to add grace to force, and, while loyal to truth, make exactness subservient to beauty" ("Good Writing: A Gift or an Art?," 1890). Other essayists influenced by him as naturalistic writer and agnostic mentor were Thomas Hardy, H.G.Wells, H.L.Mencken, Clarence Darrow, and his grandsons Julian and Aldous Huxley.

CHARLES BLINDERMAN

Biography

Thomas Henry Huxley. Born 4 May 1825 in Ealing, west London. Studied at Ealing School, 1833–35; Charing Cross Hospital, London, 1842–45; University of London, medical degree, 1845. Assistant surgeon on HMS Rattlesnake, which surveyed the passage between the Great Barrier Reef and the Australian coast, 1846–50. Lecturer in natural history, Royal School of Mines (later the Royal College of Science), from 1854. Married Henrietta Heathorn, 1855: seven children (two others died), including Leonard Huxley, father of Julian and Aldous Huxley. Naturalist to the geological survey of the English coast, from 1855. Science columnist, Westminster Review and Saturday Review. President, Ethnological Society, 1868–70, Geological Society, 1869–70, and the Royal Society, 1883–85. Held many other positions, including: Croonian Lecturer, Royal Society; Fullerian Lecturer, Royal Institution; Hunterian Professor, Royal College of Surgeons; Governor of Eton College, of University College, London, and of Owen College, Manchester; and Rector, University of Aberdeen. Retired from all official appointments, 1885. Privy Councillor, 1892. Awards: Copley Medal; Darwin Medal; honorary degrees from nine universities. Died (of influenza and bronchitis) in Eastbourne, 29 June 1895.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

- On Our Knowledge of the Causes of the Phenomena of Organic Nature* (lectures), 1862
Evidence as to Man's Place in Nature, 1863
On the Origin of Species; or, The Causes of the Phenomena of Organic Nature (lectures), 1863
Lectures on the Elements of Comparative Anatomy, 1864
Lay Sermons, Addresses and Reviews, 1870
Essays Selected from Lay Sermons, 1871
Critiques and Addresses, 1873
American Addresses, with a Lecture in the Study of Biology, 1877
Science and Culture, and Other Essays, 1881
Lectures on Evolution, 1882
Animal Automatism, and Other Essays, 1884
Technical Education, and Other Essays, 1885
Essays upon Some Controverted Questions, 1892
Evolution and Ethics, 1893; edited by James Paradis and George C. Williams, 1989
Collected Essays, 9 vols., 1893–94; reprinted 1968
 1. Method and Results, 1893
 2. Darwiniana, 1893
 3. Science and Education, 1893
 4. Science and Hebrew Tradition, 1893
 5. Science and Christian Tradition, 1893
 6. Hume, with Helps to the Study of Berkeley, 1894

7. Man's Place in Nature, and Other Anthropological Essays, 1894

8. Discourses Biological and Geological, 1894

9. Evolution and Ethics, and Other Essays, 1894

The Scientific Memoirs, edited by Michael Foster and E.Ray Lankester, 5 vols., 1898–1903

Autobiography and Selected Essays, edited by Ada L.F.Snell, 1903, Sarah E.Simons, 1910, E.H.Kemper McComb, 1910, and Brander Matthews, 1919

Essays on Science and Education, edited by Ada L.F.Snell, 1909

Selected Essays and Addresses, edited by Philo Melvyn Buck, Jr., 1910

Selections from the Essays, edited by Alburey Castell, 1948

The Essence of T.H.Huxley: Selections from His Writings, edited by Cyril Bibby, 1967

T.H.Huxley on Education, edited by Cyril Bibby, 1971

Other writings: a book about the Rattlesnake voyage (1859), and textbooks and manuals on biology, zoology, anatomy, and other natural sciences.

Bibliographies

Dawson, Warren R., The Huxley Papers: A Descriptive Catalogue of the Correspondence, Manuscripts, and Miscellaneous Papers of the Rt. Hon. T.H.Huxley, London: Macmillan, for the Imperial College of Science and Technology, 1946

Pingree, Jeanne, T.H.Huxley: A List of His Scientific Notebooks, Drawings and Other Papers, Preserved in the College Library, London: Imperial College of Science and Technology, 1968

Further Reading

Bibby, Cyril, "Huxley: Prince of Controversialists," Twentieth Century 161 (1957):268–77

Blinderman, Charles, "Semantic Aspects of T.H.Huxley's Literary Style," Journal of Communication 12 (1962.): 171–78

Blinderman, Charles, "T.H.Huxley's Theory of Aesthetics: Unity in Diversity," Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism 21 (1962): 49–55

Blinderman, Charles, "Huxley, Pater, and Protoplasm," Journal of the History of Ideas 3 (1982):477–86

Block, Ed., Jr., "T.H.Huxley's Rhetoric and the Popularization of Victorian Scientific Ideas, 1854–1874," Victorian Studies 29 (Spring 1986):363–86

Desmond, Adrian, Huxley: The Devil's Disciple, London: Michael Joseph, and New York: Viking, 1994

Gardner, Joseph H., "A Huxley Essay as 'Poem,'" Victorian Studies 14 (1970):177–91

Houghton Walter E., "The Rhetoric of T.H.Huxley," University of Toronto Quarterly 18 (1949):159–75

Hutton, Richard, "Professor Huxley's Hidden Chess Player," Spectator 41 (11 January 1868):41–42.

Huxley, Aldous, "T.H.Huxley as a Literary Man," in his The Olive Tree and Other Essays, London: Chatto and Windus, 1936; New York: Harper and Row, 1937

Jensen, J.Vernon, Thomas Henry Huxley: Communicating for Science, Newark:

University of Delaware Press, 1991

Lightman, Bernard, The Origins of Agnosticism: Victorian Unbelief and the Limits of Knowledge, Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1987

McCartney, Jesse F., "The Pedagogical Style of T.H.Huxley in 'On the Physiological Basis of Life'," Southern Quarterly 14 (1976): 97–107

Paradis, James G., T.H.Huxley: Man's Place in Nature, Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1978

Routh, James, "Huxley as a Literary Man," The Century Magazine 63 (1902):392–98

Watt, Donald, "Soul-Facts: Humour and Figure in T.H.Huxley," Prose Studies 1 (1978):30–40

Zappen, James P., "Scientific Rhetoric in the Nineteenth and Early Twentieth Centuries: Herbert Spencer, Thomas H.Huxley and John Dewey," in Textual Dynamics of the Professions: Historical and Contemporary Studies of Writing in Professional Communities, edited by Charles Bazerman and James Paradis, Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1991

I

The Idler

by Samuel Johnson; British periodical series, 1758–1760

Samuel Johnson's Idler papers appeared originally as the leading articles in the newspaper the Universal Chronicle on consecutive Saturdays from 15 April 1758 to 5 April 1760. The series began in the second number of the newspaper, Johnson having provided anonymously a general essay in the first number to introduce the new serial (in which he was a shareholder). Though he wrote the periodical essays as Mr. Idler, this body of writing was easily recognized and widely enjoyed as his work, and it was the single feature of the newspaper in which it appeared that kept that enterprise alive. When Johnson ended the periodical essays with the 104th number, the newspaper itself stopped publication.

The Idler was Johnson's third substantial periodical-essay project in the decade of the 1750s. He was a major contributor to Hawkesworth's Adventurer in the middle of the decade, and he produced the highly successful Rambler essays from 1750 to 1752. It is thought that he undertook the Idler project as a diversion from the editorial work on Shakespeare's plays which began to preoccupy him at the end of the decade, much as he had devised the Rambler project to provide himself some relief from his labor on the Dictionary earlier. Mr. Idler's essays were not, however, simply a continuation, after some years, of Mr. Rambler's. Less deeply analytical, less learned in reference than most of Johnson's previous work in the essay form, the Idler papers are as a whole the most accessible pieces of Johnsonian discourse for "the common reader"—a part of his audience of which Johnson was characteristically solicitous.

For Mr. Idler, Johnson adopted a prose style far less complex and latinate than had been his practice in previous periodical writing. Consider, for instance, the opening sentence of the Rambler essays: "The difficulty of the first address on any new occasion, is felt by every man in his transactions with the world, and confessed by the settled and regular forms of salutation which necessity has introduced into all languages." Compare this with the sentence inaugurating the Idler: "Those who attempt periodical essays seem to be often stopped in the beginning, by the difficulty of finding a proper title." Almost at random throughout the Idler, one finds a Johnson who is charmingly straightforward and matter-of-fact: "But such is the constitution of the world, that much of life must be spent in the same manner by the wise and the ignorant, the exalted and the low... We are all naked till we are dressed, and hungry till we are fed; and the general's triumph, and sage's disputation, end, like the humble labors of the smith or plowman, in a dinner or in sleep" (Idler no. 51).

Compared with the Rambler essays, those in the Idler series may seem to cover a less diverse range. This is in part a function of sheer numbers, since there are twice as many papers in the earlier series. Some readers may also feel that there are fewer brilliant moments among the Idlers—no critical papers, for instance, which can match Johnson's earlier essays on the pastoral mode or on Miltonic versification. Still, the two-part character sketch of the absurd fashionable critic Dick Minim (nos. 60 and 61) is a brilliant critical sally, and in the character mode Minim is joined in the Idler by a host of other sharply etched persons: Jack Whirler (no. 19), Will Marvel (nos. 49 and 50), Ned Druget (nos. 16 and 18), and Dick Shifter (no. 71), to name only four. These characters sketched by Mr. Idler or his correspondents are joined by some equally well-conceived fictitious letter writers on subjects no one else could write about so appropriately: Betty Broom (nos. 26 and 29), Sukey Savecharges (no. 54), Robin Spritely (nos. 78 and 83), Sophia Heedfull (no. 98), Tom Toy (no. 39), and a number of other worthies. Mr. Idler certainly did not lack his brilliant moments.

Although a dozen Idlers were, according to the standard modern edition, written by Johnson's acquaintances (including Sir Joshua Reynolds and Thomas Warton), Johnson himself wrote all the rest, allowing us to explore the breadth and perceptiveness of his interesting mind. We expect, perhaps, to find him writing about biography (no. 84) or the English language (no. 63). His commentary on practices in the serial press—on advertising (no. 40) or the corruption of news reportage (nos. 7 and 30)—is interesting in view of its original context. Although his handling of certain issues, such as charitable giving (no. 4) or imprisonment for debt (nos. 22 and 38), is rather serious, he was obviously amusing himself quite often: in the essay (no. 5), for instance, in which he suggests the creation of a female army to accompany male regiments which deplete the social world when wars must be fought. Mr. Idler moved easily from contemplating why weather is so often a topic of conversation among the English (no. 11), to discussing the custom of publishing notices of marriage (nos. 12 and 28), then on to essays on the critical reception of new actors and writers (no. 25), on punch and its effects (no. 34), on the wearing of bracelets as fashion statements by various types of people (no. 39). Reading his essay on the loss of loved ones (no. 41) and realizing that his mother had just died brings us unusually close to this eminent man. In general, of course, we are quite content to pretend, with Dr. Johnson, that he is Mr. Idler and to let him talk in this style. Such talk is pleasant, and unlike the Boswellian version of his utterances (brilliant and dramatic as that version is), his own discourse in the Idler essays seems to come quite naturally from the streets and shops and public places he inhabited in busy 18th-century London.

JAMES M. KUIST

Editions

The Idler, in the Universal Chronicle, or Weekly Gazette, 15 April 1758–5 April 1760; in 2 vols., 1761; in The Works of Samuel Johnson (Yale Edition) vol. 2: "The Idler" and

“The Adventurer”, edited by Walter Jackson Bate, John M. Bullitt, and L.F. Powell, 1963; selections in Essays from the Rambler, Adventurer, and Idler, edited by Walter Jackson Bate, 1968

Further Reading

- Bate, Walter Jackson, Samuel Johnson, New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1977; London: Chatto and Windus, 1978
- Kenney, W., “Addison, Johnson and the ‘Energetic Style,’” Studia Neophilologica 33 (1961):103–14
- Krutch, Joseph Wood, Samuel Johnson, New York: Holt, 1944; London: Cassell, 1948
- McCrea, Brian, “Style or Styles: The Problem of Johnson’s Prose,” Style 14 (Summer 1980):201–15
- Wain, John, Samuel Johnson, London: Macmillan, 1974; New York: Viking, 1975
- Wimsatt, W.K., The Prose Style of Samuel Johnson, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, and London: Oxford University Press, 1941
- Woodruff, J.F., “Johnson’s ‘Idler’ and the Anatomy of Idleness,” English Studies in Canada 6 (1980):22–38

Irving, Washington

American, 1783–1859

Washington Irving is best known as the creator of “Rip van Winkle,” a fact that may say as much about the relative status of stories and essays in the hierarchy of genres as it does about Irving’s formative contribution to American literature’s preoccupation with fables of identity. Irving was, indeed, one of the creators of the modern short story and, beyond that, of a distinctly American literary imagination; but in his time, both in the New World and the Old, he was widely celebrated not only as an engaging purveyor of fictitious and historical tales (often transplanted and adapted from other national traditions) but also as America’s answer to the stylish periodical essayists of 18th-century England.

The book in which Irving’s most famous story appears is predominantly a collection of essays, or—in the metaphor of its title, The Sketch Book of Geoffrey Crayon, Gent.—sketches. These range from personal report (“The Voyage”) and sentimental narrative (“The Broken Heart”) to imaginative literary excursion (“A Royal Poet”), fanciful dream vision (“The Art of Bookmaking”), conciliatory polemic (“English Writers on America”), impassioned historical revisionism (“Philip of Pokanoket”), and warmly engaged social portraiture (the Christmas sketches). When the Sketch Book was issued (1819–20), to a transatlantic acclaim never quite matched by his later works, Irving was best known as the writer behind “Diedrich Knickerbocker’s” History of New York (1809), a masterpiece of Rabelaisian humor some chapters of which stand as self-contained ironic, even satiric, essays. At age 19, following essayists such as Benjamin Franklin, Joseph Dennie, and Philip Freneau in their use of fictional masks shaping Addison's Spectator to an American mold, Irving had penned epistolary essays under the name "Jonathan Oldstyle" (1802–03), a theater-haunting bachelor much exercised about the "degeneracy of the present times." Soon thereafter, under a whole array of whimsical bachelor masks, Irving collaborated on the rambunctiously parodic essay periodical Salmagundi (1807–08). With the Sketch Book appeared his most durable and prolific persona, "Geoffrey Crayon," the professional writer as traveling sketch artist and perpetual "stranger in the land" ("The Voyage") also associated with several later medleys of short prose. These works contain (among various fictions, framing pieces, and narrative links) the greater part of Irving's essays and include, besides the Sketch Book: Bracebridge Hall (1822); The Alhambra (1832); The Crayon Miscellany (1835), incorporating A Tour on the Prairies and Abbotsford and Newstead Abbey; and Chronicles of Wolfert's Roost (1855), which, although it dropped the name, was composed of "Crayon" pieces from the late 1830s and early 1840s.

Like his earlier authorial personae, the fiction of "Geoffrey Crayon, Gent." functions as an announcement that these works are not occasions for the fullness and complexity of Washington Irving's own thoughts and feelings as a person. But the English resonance of the name is more than a pseudonymous screen for an American writer (the first to support himself by his pen) who, all of his life, despite unprecedented popular and critical success, doubted the value of his work and especially his capacity for sustained production (although he wrote, among other work, a five-volume biography of George Washington). The itinerant Crayon is both the controlling metaphor of an often interrupted literary enterprise and a shifting locus of accommodation with the project of authorship as such. As the man of "vagrant imagination" "sketching" whatever his "sauntering gaze" takes to its fancy, he is the New World's early 19th-century version of the continental traveler making drawings and notes for the entertainment of his friends back home. No cultural program, however, directs this sightseer's idiosyncratic eye, only the whimsy impelling him to "bye places," to "cottages...and obscure ruins" rather than to the standard tourist attractions. This earliest literary figure of the American abroad—a man of taste and sensibility, a voracious reader of wide sympathies, a worldly voyager limited only by the innocence of one who has not grown up in an old culture—Geoffrey Crayon is the keen-eyed Addisonian looker-on without his moral agenda, the Citizen of the World sans philosophic portfolio, the Rambler as creature of "roving passion" and "idle humor" ("The Author's Account of Himself"). A self-described loiterer in sundry locales of reverie and romance, he specializes in evoking vanished and vanishing pasts of old Europe—the urban and rural landscapes of England (Sketch Book and Bracebridge), the fabled haunts of Moorish Spain (Alhambra), the erstwhile Parisian hotel and the paradisiacal Dutch village (Wolfert's Roost). Seventeen years later, back on his own continent but still a "stranger," he rides the frontier in A Tour on the Prairies, discovering a literary Wild West that becomes the fount of picturesque enterprises, characters, and settings for the emergence of a national literature.

Washington Irving as Geoffrey Crayon is, most characteristically, the highly responsive observer fascinated by the great range of human life, from Granada, London, Paris, and the Scottish border country to the riverside Creole villages of Louisiana and the old Pawnee hunting grounds of Oklahoma. At times vibrantly present in his work, he more habitually recedes to the point of self-erasure, not a locus of introspection but a fluid sensibility—bemused, melancholy, shrewd, sentimental, ironical, romantic—embodied in a supplely adapted style. In the hands of this sojourning artist persona the Irvingesque essay as sketch—by definition preliminary and contingent—flows easily from scene painting and character study to fanciful elaboration; achieves unity not so much by way of thematic shaping as by focus on persons, places, or moods; prefers forays into the evocative domains of narration and description rather than reflection and analysis (except as irony or burlesque); enacts a potpourri of self-conscious techniques for rendering the immediate effects of experience rather than its profundities. Something resembling it may be found in parts of the Spectator, and much later, among the short nonfiction works of writers such as Dickens, Hawthorne, or Mark Twain, or, in modern times, Joan Didion.

Generically volatile, by turns eclectic and experimental, as varied and variable as the mundane, culturally inflected textures of life itself, Washington Irving's artfully staged essay of immediate response is to be sharply distinguished from its near contemporary Emersonian counterpart, in which nature becomes the deep of meaning to be plumbed. As far removed from the Montaignean essai of ruminative self-portraiture as from the elegant moral and political counsels of Bacon, Irving's essay as sketch adumbrates a journalistic practice to come, where the surface of experience is taken to be what is most natural, most worth portraying, and most appealing to a broadly literate audience. What may engage the postmodern reader as generic transgression is, in its historical context, an exploration of short prose forms by a literary pioneer whose work itself outlined their possibilities and thereby contributed materially to a new literature in the making.

LYDIA FAKUNDINY

Biography

Born 3 April 1783 in New York City. Studied law in the offices of Henry Masterton, 1798, Brockholst Livingston, 1801, and Josiah Ogden Hoffman, 1802; admitted to New York bar, 1806, and practiced occasionally. Contributor, including "The Letters of Jonathan Oldstyle, Gentleman," Morning Chronicle, 1802–03. Traveled in Europe, 1804–06. Coeditor, Salmagundi, 1807–08. Engaged to Martha Hoffman (died, 1809). Partner with his brothers in the family hardware business, New York and Liverpool, England, 1810, and representative of the business in England until it collapsed, 1815–18. Military aide to New York Governor Tompkins in U.S. Army during the War of 1812. Editor, Analectic magazine, Philadelphia and New York, 1812–14. Lived in Dresden, 1822–23, London, 1824, and Paris, 1825; worked for the U.S. Embassy, Madrid, 1826–29, and secretary to the U.S. Embassy, London, 1829–32; returned to New York, then toured the southern and western United States, 1832. Lived at Sunnyside manor house, Tarrytown-on-Hudson, New York, 1836–42. U.S. Ambassador to Spain, 1842–45, then returned to Tarrytown. President, Astor Library (later New York Public Library), 1848–59. Awards: Royal Society of Literature Medal, 1830; honorary degrees from three universities. Corresponding member, Royal Academy of History (Spain), 1829. Died in Tarrytown, 28 November 1859.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Salmagundi; or, The Whim-Whams and Opinions of Launcelot Longstaff, Esq. & Others, 2 vols., 1807–08; revised editions, 1814, 1824

A History of New York from the Beginning of the World to the End of the Dutch Dynasty, 2 vols., 1809; revised editions, 1812, 1848

The Sketch Book of Geoffrey Crayon, Gent., 7 vols., 1819–20

Bracebridge Hall; or, The Humorists, a Medley by Geoffrey Crayon, Gent., 2 vols., 1822

Letters of Jonathan Oldstyle, Gent., 1824

The Alhambra, 2 vols., 1832

A Tour on the Prairies, 1835

Abbotsford and Newstead Abbey, 1835

The Crayon Miscellany (includes A Tour on the Prairies and Abbotsford and Newstead Abbey), 3 vols., 1835

Essays and Sketches, 1837

Chronicles of Wolfert's Roost and Other Papers, 1855

Other writings: tales, histories, and biographies (Tales of a Traveller by Geoffrey Crayon, 1824; The Life and Voyages of Christopher Columbus, 1828; A Chronicle of the Conquest of Granada, 1829; Voyages and Discoveries of the Companions of Columbus, 1831; Astoria, or Anecdotes of an Enterprise Beyond the Rocky Mountains, 1836; The Adventures of Captain Bonneville, 1837; Oliver Goldsmith: A Biography, 1840, revised 1849; Biography and Poetical Remains of the Late Margaret Miller Davidson, 1841; Mahomet and His Successors, 1850; Life of George Washington, 1855–59), five volumes of journals and notebooks, four volumes of correspondence, and miscellaneous writings.

Collected works editions: Works (Author's Revised Edition), 15 vols., 1848–51; Complete Works (Twayne Edition), general editors Henry A. Pochmann, Herbert L. Kleinfeld, and Richard Dilworth Rust, 30 vols., 1969–89.

Bibliographies

Bowden, Edwin T., Washington Irving: Bibliography (vol. 30 of the Complete Works), Boston: Twayne, 1989

Springer, Haskell, Washington Irving: A Reference Guide, Boston: Hall, 1976

Further Reading

Aderman, Ralph M., Critical Essays on Washington Irving, Boston: Hall, 1990

Antelyes, Peter, Tales of Adventurous Enterprises: Washington Irving and the Poetics of the Western Experience, New York: Columbia University Press, 1990

Hedges, William L., Washington Irving: An American Study, 1802–1832, Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1965

Irving, Pierre M., The Life and Letters of Washington Irving, Detroit: Gale Research, 4 vols., 1967 (original edition, 1862–64)

- Kasson, Joy S., Artistic Voyagers: Europe and the American Imagination in the Works of Irving, Allston, Cole, Cooper, and Hawthorne, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1982
- McFarland, Philip, Sojourners, New York: Atheneum, 1979
- Roth, Martin, Comedy and America: The Lost World of Washington Irving, Port Washington, New York: Kennikat, 1976
- Rubin-Dorsky, Jeffrey, Adrift in the Old World: The Psychological Pilgrimage of Washington Irving, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1988
- Seed, D., "The Art of Literary Tourism: An Approach to Washington Irving's Sketch Book," Ariel 14, no. 2 (1977):67–82
- Tuttleton, James W., editor, Washington Irving: The Critical Reaction, New York: AMS Press, 1993
- Wagenknecht, Edward, Washington Irving: Moderation Displayed, New York: Oxford University Press, 1962
- Williams, Stanley T., The Life of Washington Irving, New York and London: Oxford University Press, 2 vols., 1935

Ivanov, Viacheslav

Russian, 1866–1949

Viacheslav Ivanov was a major poet, philosopher of culture, critic, and translator, who played an important role in literary history as the leading theoretician of the Russian symbolist movement. Using dense, highly suggestive polyphonic prose, Ivanov in his critical essays and philosophical essays expanded the metaphysical school of criticism begun by Vladimir Solov'ev. Although he always regarded his essays as an elaboration or elucidation of intuitions first communicated in his poetry, his prose works were in fact the primary channel through which his ideas about art and religion made their impact on European as well as Russian culture. The frequently cited description of Ivanov as a true "European Russian" reflects the wide erudition displayed in his essays, resting on a deep scholarly knowledge of ancient Greek and Latin, and on a close familiarity with the languages and cultures of Russia, Germany, Italy, France, and England.

Before emigration Ivanov published numerous essays and reviews in leading Russian journals; many of these were collected in the three volumes of his essays which appeared in Russia (1909, 1916, 1917). His essays on Dostoevskii dating from the same period were later published in book form in a German translation in 1932. and in English in 1952. From 1926 he was a less frequent but nevertheless substantial contributor to European journals (German, Swiss, French, and Italian), and to Russian émigré journals from 1936; most of these later essays were reprinted in his Sobranie sochinenii (Collected works).

In terms of subject matter, his essays can be divided into five main groups, reflecting the gradual development of his interests and preoccupations over the years. Although Ivanov's essays on the religion of Dionysus (1904, 1905) originated in his years of research as a scholar of classical antiquity, the philosophical, religious, and cultural issues they raise go far beyond the boundaries of academic discourse, preparing the ground for his later work by setting out his views on the relationship between pagan antiquity and Christianity, and more generally between mystical experience, religion, and myth.

The early essays on aesthetics, poetry, and drama, first published in symbolist journals and later collected in Po zvezdam (1909; By the stars) and Borozdy i mezhi (1916; Furrows and boundaries), are concerned with establishing an aesthetic platform for the movement of religious symbolism, either by drawing up a tradition of literary precedents (ranging from Dante and Goethe to Tiutchev and Solov'ev), or by elaborating a theory of symbolist art, based on the difference between "great art" and "intimate art," between "realist" and "idealist" symbolism. This distinction depends on whether the artist's vision is regarded as mirroring the macrocosm of the universal order, and therefore as having particular ontological significance, or as a purely private and solipsistic illusion.

Ivanov's critical essays on individual writers contribute to the same endeavor. They usually provide a highly original, stimulating reading of a classical, European, or Russian author in the light of symbolist aesthetics. Russian writers are frequently related to the classical tradition (Dostoevskii's novels are shown to be structured according to the principles of Greek tragedy, Gogol's The Government Inspector is linked to the drama of Aristophanes and the choral principle in Greek tragedy), Pushkin and Lermontov are discussed in relation to their intuition of spiritual truths, and Petrarch, Schiller, Goethe, Novalis, and Byron are interpreted through the prism of the symbolist world view.

A more limited number of essays deal with aspects of Russian national identity. An early essay of this type, "O russkoi idee" (1908; On the Russian idea), later became well known in Europe through its translation into German in 1930. Ivanov's interest in this theme reached a peak at the time of World War I and the Russian Revolution, resulting in a number of articles on Russia's historical destiny, relation to Europe, and religious mission in the light of current events. Several of these essays were collected in Rodnoe i vselenskoe (1917; Matters native and universal).

After the Revolution Ivanov's essays display an increasing concern with the fate of culture in the modern world and with its relation to the Christian tradition of humanism. He cultivated the genre of the letter as a form of essay in Perepiska iz dvukh uglov (1921; Correspondence Across a Room) with Mikhail Gershenzon, in his letter to Charles Du Bos with its detailed exposition of the reasons for his conversion to Catholicism (1930), and in his letter to Alessandro Pellegrini on his view of culture as a form of "docta pietas" (1934).

One of the most salient paradoxes of the symbolist movement was the gulf between its obscure, esoteric content and its professed ideal, the revival of a universal art form which would express the national soul and convey a vital message to the people. Despite these claims, the contemporary audience of Ivanov and his fellow symbolists Aleksandr Blok and Andrei Belyi remained confined to a small group of like-minded poets, critics, and disciples. Outside this circle, responses to their work mostly emanated from socially oriented critics and were largely negative.

Although Ivanov's output as an essayist was not enormous, it was nevertheless extremely influential. The breadth and depth of his essays, as well as his role as the major theoretician of religious symbolism, had a great impact on the beliefs and poetics of the next generation of post-symbolist poets, particularly on the Acmeists and Futurists. Writers (such as Osip Mandel'shtam) who did not accept all the philosophical and religious premises of Ivanov's world view nevertheless often retained in their prose works some of its stylistic characteristics (a multi-strand argument developed through a highly allusive use of image, metaphor, and myth, woven together into a polyphonic chorus), or returned to engage in debate with it in their later lyrics (Nikolai Gumilev, Anna Akhmatova, Marina Tsvetaeva).

While poets were flexible in their ability to absorb elements of Ivanov's system selectively, philosophers of a religious orientation (such as Nikolai Berdiaev and Lev Shestov) became increasingly impatient with his all-encompassing syncretism and attempted combination of religious and cultural values. According to one critic, Ivanov tried to reconcile too many different roles; to poets he appeared a prophet, to philosophers an artist, and to orthodox believers, a priest without God and without a church.

Ivanov's reputation as an essayist has undergone many fluctuations in the course of the 20th century. In Europe, his fame has rested almost exclusively on his essays, which have attracted the attention of prominent intellectuals such as Martin Buber, Ernst Robert Curtius, Gabriel Marcel, Du Bos, and Pellegrini. In Soviet Russia, he was marginalized for many decades, in part because of political circumstances, but also because his critics could not or would not recognize his view of culture as memory as the foundation of his distinctive voice. His legacy, transmitted through thinkers as varied as Mikhail Bakhtin, Lev Loseff, and Sergei Averintsev, has attracted a marked resurgence of critical interest since the mid-1980s.

PAMELA DAVIDSON

Biography

Born 16 February 1866 in Moscow. Studied at the First Moscow Gymnasium, graduated 1884; history and classical philology, Moscow University, 1884–86; University of Berlin, 1886–91. Married Dar'ia Mikhailovna Dmitrievskaia, 1886 (divorced, 1896): one daughter. Lived in Europe, including Berlin, Paris, Rome, and Geneva, from 1886. Married Lidiia Dmitrievna Zinov'eva (pseudonym: Zinov'eva-Annibal), 1899 (died, 1907): two daughters and three stepchildren. Returned to Russia, 1905: lived in St. Petersburg, hosting the literary salon at Bashnia (Tower); founder, Ory publishing house, and the Poetic Academy. Lived in Switzerland, France, and Italy, 1912–13, and Moscow, 1913–20. Married his stepdaughter Vera Shvarsalon (died, 1920), 1913: one son. Professor of classical philology, University of Baku, 1920–24. Emigrated to Italy, 1924, converting to Catholicism, 1926; lived in Rome, 1924–26, 1934–49, and in Pavia, 1926–34, lecturing and teaching in both cities. Died in Rome, 16 July 1949.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Po zvezdam: Stat'i i aforiztny, 1909

Borozdy i mezhi: Opyty esteticheskie i kriticheskie, 1916

Rodnoe i vselenskoe: Stat'i (1914–1916), 1917

Perepiska iz dvukh uglov, with Mikhail Gershenzon, 1921; as “A Corner-to-Corner Correspondence,” translated by Gertrude Vakar, in Russian Intellectual History: An Anthology, edited by Marc Raeff, 1966:372–401; as Correspondence Across a Room, translated by Lisa Sergio, 1984

Dostojevskij: Tragödie—Mythos—Mystik, 1932; as Freedom and the Tragic Life: A Study in Dostoevsky, edited by S.Konovalov, translated by Norman Cameron, 1952

Esse, stat'i, perevody (Essays, articles, translations), 1985

Predchuvstviia i predvestiia: Sbornik (Premonitions and portents: a collection), edited by S.V.Stakhorskii, 1991

Lik i lichiny Rossii: Estetika i literaturnaia teoriia (The face and masks of Russia: aesthetics and literary theory), edited by S. Averintsev, 1995

Other writings: eight books of poetry (Kormchie zvezdy: Kniga liriki, 1903; Prozrachnost': Vtoraia kniga liriki, 1904; Eros, 1907; Cor Ardens, 2 vols., 1911–12; Nezhnaia taina: Lepta, 1912; Mladenchestvo, 1918; Chelovek, 1939; Svet vechernii, 1962), two plays (“Tantal,” 1905; Prometei: Tragediia, 1919), and two books on classical antiquity (De societibus vectigalium publicorum populi romani, 1910; Dionis i pradiionisiistvo, 1923). Also translated Aeschylus, Alcaeus, Sappho, Bacchylides, Pindar, Dante, Petrarch, Michelangelo Buonarroti, Leopardi, Byron, Baudelaire, and Novalis.

Collected works edition: Sobranie sochinenii, edited by D.V.Ivanov and O.Deschartes, 4 vols., 1971–87 (in progress; 6 vols. projected).

Bibliography

Davidson, Pamela, Viacheslav Ivanov: A Reference Guide, New York: Simon and Schuster Macmillan-Hall, 1996

Further Reading

Belyi, Andrei, Sirin uchenogo varvarstva: Po povodu knigi V. Ivanova “Rodnoe i vselenskoe”, Berlin: Skify, 1922

Il Convegno issue on Ivanov, 8–12 (1933–34)

Davidson, Pamela, The Poetic Imagination of Vyacheslav Ivanov: A Russian Symbolist's Perception of Dante, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989

Egorov, B.F., “Viach. Ivanov i russkie slavianofily,” Russkii tekst 1 (1993):43–57

Jackson, Robert Louis, and Lowry Nelson, Jr., editors, Vyacheslav Ivanov: Poet, Critic, and Philosopher, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale Center for International and Area Studies, 1986

Un maître de sagesse au XXe siècle: Vjačeslav Ivanov et son temps, Cahiers du Monde

Russe 35, nos. 1–2 (1994)

Malcovati, Fausto, Vjačeslav Ivanov: Estetica i filosofia, Florence: La Nuova Italia, 1983

Malcovati, Fausto, editor, Cultura e memoria: Atti del terzo Simposio Internazionale dedicato a Vjačeslav Ivanov, Florence: La Nuova Italia, 2 vols., 1988

Potthoff, Wilfried, editor, Vjačeslav Ivanov: Russischer Dichter—Europäischer Kulturphilosoph, Heidelberg: Winter, 1993

Pyman, Avril, A History of Russian Symbolism, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1994

Shestov, Lev, “Viacheslav Velikolepnyi: K kharakteristike russkogo upadochnichestva,” Ruskaia mysl’ 10 (1916):80–110

Stammler, Heinrich A., “Belyj’s Conflict with Vjačeslav Ivanov over War and Revolution,” Slavic and East European Journal 18, no. 3 (1974):259–70

Tschöpl, Carin, Vjačeslav Ivanov: Dichtung und Dichtungstheorie, Munich: Sagner, 1968

Venclova, Tomas, “Viacheslav Ivanov and the Crisis of Russian Symbolism,” in Issues in Russian Literature Before 1917, edited by J.Douglas Clayton, Columbus, Ohio: Slavica, 1989

Viacheslav Ivanov: Materialy i publikatsii, edited by N.V.Kotrelev, Novoe literaturnoe obozrenie 10 (1994)

Wachtel, Michael, Russian Symbolism and Literary Tradition: Goethe, Novalis, and the Poetics of Vyacheslav Ivanov, Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1995

Wachtel, Michael, editor, Dichtung und Briefwechsel aus dem deutschsprachigen Nachlass, Mainz: Liber Verlag Mainz, 1995

West, James, Russian Symbolism: A Study of Vyacheslav Ivanov and the Russian Symbolist Aesthetic, London: Methuen, 1970

This page intentionally left blank.

J

James, Henry

American/British, 1843–1916

For several decades Henry James' essays have been collected and studied by scholarly connoisseurs, and are now attracting the wider audience for which they were intended. The Library of America Editions of his literary criticism (1984) and his travel writings (1993) have rescued many pieces from the obscurity of earlier anthologies and periodicals. Further, the recent attention paid to his works of cultural criticism notably The American Scene (1907) and Italian Hours (1909)—has enhanced his status as an observer of national types and the play of differences. Cognizant of the power of richly textured language, James was equally aware of the limits of his own mastery. Even his most polemical efforts (e.g. "The Question of Our Speech," 1905) are characterized by their self-conscious use of the first person. And his prefaces to his fiction, once read as a formalist manifesto, are best appreciated as personal essays tinged with uncertainty as well as fond reminiscence.

Ironically, the young critic was far more dogmatic than the seasoned writer known to his disciples as "cher maître." British and American novels, he complained in his early reviews, were dull and formless; French fiction was "intolerably unclean" (review of Goncourt's La Fille Elisa, 1877); the mass public consisted of "jolly barbarians of taste who read ...only for what they call the 'story'" ("Marian Rooke," 1865). His occasional reviews of drama and art exhibitions likewise reflect the brashness of an aspiring elitist whose model was Matthew Arnold, and whose sense of cultural mission was fostered by the journals to which he contributed: the Atlantic Monthly, the Galaxy, the Nation, and the North American Review.

However, James' critical judgments became more flexible, especially following his expatriation from the United States in 1875. Writing to Thomas S. Perry, he had expressed his hope for "a vast intellectual fusion and synthesis of the various National tendencies of the world" (20 September 1867); yet, as he admitted in "Paris Revisited" (1878), an "uncomfortable consequence" of being a cosmopolitan was "seeing many lands and feeling at home in none." Reviewers of his French Poets and Novelists (1878) were struck by the inconclusiveness of such pieces as the essay on Balzac, criticized for being "morally and intellectually so superficial" but lauded for his "incomparable power."

Eventually James focused on the subjects he found personally compelling. In a letter he told his British publisher, Frederick Macmillan, that the title of Partial Portraits

(1888)—his most important collection of essays on other writers—contains a pun, suggesting “both that the picture is not down to the feet, as it were, and that the appreciation is favourable” (21 March 1888). Balancing sympathy with judgment, he paid tribute to his elders (Emerson, George Eliot, Turgenev) while also considering younger contemporaries (Alphonse Daudet, Guy de Maupassant) whose “cases” he found instructive. Appropriately, the volume concludes with “The Art of Fiction” (1884), which is less a defense of realism than a paean to the artist’s mind: “Experience is never limited, and it is never complete; it is an immense sensibility, a kind of huge spiderweb of the finest silken threads suspended in the chamber of consciousness, and catching every airborne particle in its tissue.” As Mark Spilka (1973) has noted, James was aware of his growing distance from his audience, but he opened the way for himself and other writers to create a new audience of “uncommon readers.” And as William Veeder (1985) has observed, James became more generous—especially to such “unclean” authors as Zola—when he replaced “the rigidity of a priori propositions with the suppleness of metaphor.”

This style is the hallmark of James’ prefaces to the New York edition of his novels and tales (1907–09). Whereas detractors were bemused by his late manner, admirers sought to abstract theories from his richly metaphorical prose. A disciple, Percy Lubbock, expounded the principle of “showing, not telling” in The Craft of Fiction (1921); and R.P.Blackmur, who collected the prefaces in The Art of the Novel (1934), presented them as “an essay in general criticism.” But contemporary readers have noticed James’ disclaimers of formalist mastery: his confessions to lapses of memory as he tells “the story of [his] story,” his statement that the novel appears “more true to its character as it strains or tends to burst, with a latent extravagance, its mould,” and his admission that there were “more of the shining silver fish afloat in the deep sea of [his] endeavour than the net of widest casting could pretend to gather in.” Here as in his later travel writings, the “restless analyst” creates a first-person narrative which undermines definitive interpretation.

“Is There a Life After Death?” (1910), James’ most philosophical essay, affirms his desire for ongoing process rather than closure. Despite the apparent finality of death, he refuses to regard the question as settled because—“speaking for myself only and keeping to the facts of my experience—it is above all as an artist that I appreciate this beautiful and enjoyable independence of thought” which “refers me to realizations I am condemned as yet but to dream of... I reach beyond the laboratory-brain.” For James and his many followers, uncertainty itself becomes the basis of a humanistic tradition. And his advice to aspiring authors—“Oh, do something from your point of view” (“Letter to the Deerfield Summer School,” 1889)—echoes through today’s classrooms and writing workshops.

SARAH B.DAUGHERTY

Biography

Born 15 April 1843 in New York City. Brother of the philosopher William James. Studied at the Richard Pulling Jenks School, New York; traveled in Europe with his family during youth, studying with tutors in Geneva, London, Paris, Boulogne, and Bonn, 1855–60; lived with family in Newport, Rhode Island, 1860–62. Studied at Harvard Law School, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1862–63. Contributor to the Nation and the Atlantic Monthly, 1866–69 (art critic, 1871–72). Traveled in Europe, 1869–70, then returned to Cambridge. Lived in Europe, 1872–74, and Cambridge, 1875. Moved to Paris, 1875; contributor to New York Tribune, Paris, 1875–76; lived in England for the rest of his life, first in London, from 1876, then in Rye, Sussex, from 1896; traveled in the United States, 1904–05. Became a British citizen, 1915. Awards: honorary degrees from Harvard and Oxford Universities; Order of Merit, 1916. Died in Rye, 28 February 1916.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

- Transatlantic Sketches*, 1875; revised edition, as Foreign Parts, 1883
French Poets and Novelists, 1878; revised edition, 1883; edited by Leon Edel, 1964
Portraits of Places, 1883
A Little Tour in France, 1884; revised edition, 1900
Partial Portraits, 1888
Essays in London and Elsewhere, 1893
English Hours, 1905; edited by Alma Louise Lowe, 1960
The American Scene, 1907; edited by Leon Edel, 1968, and John F. Sears, 1994
Views and Reviews, 1908
Italian Hours, 1909; edited by John Auchard, 1992
Notes on Novelists with Some Other Notes, 1914
Within the Rim and Other Essays 1914–1915, 1919
The Art of the Novel: Critical Prefaces, edited by R.P.Blackmur, 1934
The Scenic Art: Notes on Acting and the Drama, 1872–1901, edited by Allan Wade, 1948
The Art of Fiction and Other Essays, edited by Morris Roberts, 1948
The Painter's Eye: Notes and Essays on the Pictorial Arts, edited by John L.Sweeney, 1956
The American Essays, edited by Leon Edel, 1956
The Future of the Novel: Essays on the Art of the Novel, edited by Leon Edel, 1956; as The House of Fiction: Essays on the Novel, 1957
Parisian Sketches: Letters to the New York Tribune, edited by Leon Edel and Ilse Dusoir Lind, 1957
Literary Reviews and Essays on American, English, and French Literature, edited by Albert Mordell, 1957
The Art of Travel: Scenes and Journeys in America, England, France and Italy, edited by Morton Dauwen Zabel, 1958
French Writers and American Women: Essays, edited by Peter Buitenhuis, 1960
Selected Literary Criticism, edited by Morris Schapira, 1963
Literary Criticism (Library of America Edition), edited by Leon Edel and Mark Wilson, 2 vols., 1984
The Art of Criticism: Henry James on the Theory and Practice of Fiction, edited by William Veeder and Susan M.Griffin, 1986
The Critical Muse: Selected Literary Criticism, edited by Roger Gard, 1987
Collected Travel Writing (Library of America Edition), 2 vols., 1993
Traveling in Italy with Henry James, edited by Fred Kaplan, 1994

Other writings: many novels (including The Europeans, 1878; Washington Square, 1881; The Portrait of a Lady, 1881; The Bostonians, 1886; What Maisie Knew, 1897; The Sacred Fount, 1901; The Wings of the Dove, 1902; The Ambassadors, 1903; The Golden Bowl, 1904), novellas (including Daisy Miller, 1878; The Aspern Papers, 1888; The Spoils of Poynton, 1897; The Turn of the Screw, 1898), short stories, several plays, correspondence, and works on travel, literature, and art.

Collected works edition: The Novels and Tales (New York Edition; includes the prefaces), 24 vols., 1907–09.

Bibliographies

- Bradbury, Nicola, An Annotated Critical Bibliography of Henry James, Brighton: Harvester, 1987
- Budd, John, Henry James: A Bibliography of Criticism, 1975–1981, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1983
- Edel, Leon, Dan H. Laurence, and James Rambeau, A Bibliography of Henry James, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1982
- McColgan, Kristin Pruitt, Henry James, 1917–1959: A Reference Guide, Boston: Hall, and London: Prior, 1979
- Ricks, Beatrice, Henry James: A Bibliography of Secondary Works, Metuchen, New Jersey: Scarecrow Press, 1975
- Scura, Dorothy McInnis, Henry James, 1960–1974: A Reference Guide, Boston: Hall, and London: Prior, 1979
- Taylor, Linda J., Henry James, 1866–1916: A Reference Guide, Boston: Hall, 1982

Further Reading

- Auchard, John, Introduction to Italian Hours by James, edited by Auchard, University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1992; London: Penguin, 1995
- Blackmur, R.P., Introduction to The Art of the Novel: Critical Prefaces by James, New York: Scribner, 1934
- Daugherty, Sarah B., The Literary Criticism of Henry James, Athens: Ohio University Press, 1981
- Fogel, Daniel Mark, editor, A Companion to Henry James Studies, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1993
- Gervais, David, “Deciphering America: The American Scene,” Cambridge Quarterly 18 (1989):349–62
- Good, Graham, “Henry James: Patterns of Art and Life,” in his The Observing Self: Rediscovering the Essay, London and New York: Routledge, 1988:90–111
- Griffin, Susan M., The Historical Eye: The Texture of the Visual in Late James, Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1991
- Jones, Vivien, James the Critic, London: Macmillan, 1984; New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1985
- Leitch, Thomas M., “The Editor as Hero: Henry James and the New York Edition,” Henry James Review 3 (1981–82):24–32
- Lubbock, Percy, The Craft of Fiction, London: Cape, and New York: Scribner, 1921

- MacDonald, Bonney, Henry James' Italian Hours: Revelatory and Resistant Impressions, Ann Arbor, Michigan: UMI Research Press, 1990
- Maini, Darshan Singh, "Henry James: The Writer as Critic," Henry James Review 8 (Spring 1987):189–99
- Miller, James E., Jr., editor, Theory of Fiction: Henry James, Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1972
- Roberts, Morris, Henry James's Criticism, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1929
- Rowe, John Carlos, The Theoretical Dimensions of Henry James, Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1984; London: Methuen, 1985
- Schwarz, Daniel R., The Humanistic Heritage: Critical Theories of the English Novel from James to Hillis Miller, Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, and London: Macmillan, 1986
- Spilka, Mark, "Henry James and Walter Besant: 'The Art of Fiction' Controversy," Novel 6 (Winter 1973):100–19
- Veeder, William, "Image as Argument: Henry James and the Style of Criticism," Henry James Review 6 (Spring 1985):171–81
- Wellek, René, "Henry James's Literary Theory and Criticism," American Literature 30 (November 1958):293–321

James, William

American, 1841–1910

William James' most significant contributions to the literature of the essay were examples of "public philosophy" in the tradition of Emerson: informal exercises bringing academic insights to bear on public problems. While his major book-length studies—The Principles of Psychology (1890), The Varieties of Religious Experience (1902), and Pragmatism (1907)—outlined his understanding of the fundamentals of empirical psychology, the phenomenology of religion, and the philosophical method of "pragmatism," the essays (with the notable exception of those collected in The Meaning of Truth [1907] and the posthumously published Essays in Radical Empiricism [1912]) were more concerned with popularizing his ideas than with perfecting them. James himself wondered late in his life whether the energy he had devoted to public education had been at the expense of a fully developed system of thought, complaining that it had been a "tragedy" that he, having had a "bridge" begun, had "stopped in the middle of an arch" (Letters of William James). His sense of his legacy was remarkably prescient: while his thought has had a lasting influence on American literary culture and public discourse, it has proven vulnerable to attack by professional psychologists and analytic philosophers.

The most influential of James' popular essays translate his central psychological and philosophical tenets into practical advice for day-to-day living. Inspirational pieces like "The Will to Believe" (1896), "Is Life Worth Living?" (1895), "The Gospel of Relaxation" (1899), and "On a Certain Blindness in Human Beings" (1899) offer advice for coping with personal problems like depression and enervation, advice consistently mindful of a general public where religious faith and temperamental optimism have gone out of fashion. "The Will to Believe" is a précis of the central argument of The Varieties of Religious Experience: "a defense of our right to adopt a believing attitude in religious matters, in spite of the fact that our merely logical intellect may not have been coerced." Its Pascalian argument turns on the example of a man lost in a snowstorm, his very survival depending on a leap of faith, a dilemma that (along with James' solution) echoes throughout modern literature (most famously in Robert Frost's poem "The Road Not Taken"). The essay "Is Life Worth Living?" presents a series of arguments against suicide, judiciously organized to appeal first to the religious believer and then to the atheist. Its evenhandedness reflects a policy central to Jamesian pragmatism: a commitment to respecting "tender-minded" and "tough-minded" temperaments equally.

James offers more practical advice for overcoming depression in "The Gospel of Relaxation," drawing from a theory of emotion developed with the Danish thinker Carl G. Lange and fully explicated in The Principles of Psychology. Since emotions have a physiological basis, it argues, the cure for depression rests in cultivating the physical signs of good cheer: the "sovereign voluntary path to cheerfulness" is "to sit up cheerfully, to look round cheerfully, and to act as if cheerfulness were already there." In its persuasive arguments about the spiritual benefits of relaxation and "muscular vigor"—arguments repeated by motivational figures from John Dewey and Malcolm X to Norman Vincent Peale—the essay is a milestone in the history of self-help literature.

The essay "On a Certain Blindness in Human Beings," finally, is vitally important for offsetting an impression the other essays give: that James encourages the fulfillment of *self*interest, regardless of its consequences for others. In language stripped of specific political reference, but designed to challenge the imperialistic policies of the McKinley administration (1897–1901), it emphasizes the importance of checking optimistic hypotheses and self-fulfilling prophecies through consultation with the other people whose lives they will affect. Whatever our own hopes for self-improvement, it counsels, we must "tolerate, respect, and indulge those whom we see harmless, interested and happy in their own ways, however unintelligible these may be to us."

James' style as an essayist reflects both his commitment to popular education and the essentials of the "pragmatic" approach to truth-making. In "Remarks on the Occasion of the Centenary of William James" (1942), James' son, Henry James III, recalled his father's contempt for "style that makes an affectation of learning and therewith desiccates and often obscures the thought": a contempt whose positive side was an educator's love of blunt statements, homely examples, and familiar forms of address. Other aspects of James' style directly reflect Pragmatism's correlation of "truths" with "hypotheses," provisional theories whose capacity to "satisfy" is subject to an ongoing empirical test. One is his frequent use of qualifying words and phrases: "if," "as if," "suppose." Another is his habit of recounting testimonies and anecdotes: the best data available, from a pragmatist's point of view, for verifying, or testing the efficacy of, propositions. Still another is his frequent use of prolepsis, or the anticipation of counterarguments: not for its usual rhetorical purpose of defeating such arguments, but for the pragmatist's purpose of incorporating them into his developing "truth." Finally, his open-minded and practically oriented philosophy is reflected in his tendency to rely upon analogy and metaphor in place of more logical forms of argumentation. As James summarizes pragmatism's sense of things in "The Will to Believe," its only criteria for admitting a proposition into consideration are that it not be "impossible," and that it be possible to "bring analogies to bear in its behalf."

Despite the survival of James' incitements to positive thinking in American popular culture, recent critical work has raised questions about the applicability of his advice across race, class, and gender lines. His suggestions, in particular, that happiness and success can be attained through the cultivation of "relaxation" and "muscular vigor," have inspired the claim that his solutions were better suited to resolving the tedium vitae of the privileged young men of Harvard than the tougher problems faced by women, minorities, or the poor. Jarring claims like the one that "sufferings and hardships do not, as a rule, abate the love of life" ("Is Life Worth Living?"), or that "the strength of the British Empire lies in the strength of character of the individual Englishman, taken all alone by himself" ("The Gospel of Relaxation"), suggest that James was not immune to the kind of "blindness" he warned against. But if his faith in the transformative power of optimism underestimated certain social problems, his openmindedness toward religious faith and his conception of truth-making as a consultative process have been formative examples for some social activists. In contemporary America, Cornel West, the self-described Christian-Marxist champion of African American rights, and "public philosopher" in his own right, has cited James' work both as inspiration and as example.

PATRICIA RAE

See also Philosophical Essay

Biography

Born 11 January 1842 in New York City. Brother of the writer Henry James. Traveled with his family in Europe, studying there, 1857–60; studied art with William Morris Hunt, Newport, Rhode Island, 1860–61; Lawrence Scientific School, Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1861–63, and Harvard Medical School, M.D., 1869. Accompanied the Thayer Expedition to Brazil, 1865–66; traveled and studied in Germany, 1867–68. Taught physiology, philosophy, and psychology at Harvard University, 1872–1907, then emeritus. Married Alice Howe Gibbens, 1878: four sons and one daughter. Gifford Lecturer, University of Edinburgh, 1899–1901, lecturer, Lowell Institute, Boston, 1906, and Hibbert Lecturer, Manchester College, Oxford, 1908. Awards: honorary degrees from seven universities. Died in Chocorua, New Hampshire, 26 August 1910.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

The Will to Believe, and Other Essays in Popular Philosophy, 1897

Talks to Teachers on Psychology, and to Students on Some of Life's Ideals, 1899

The Varieties of Religious Experience (Gifford lectures), 1902

Pragmatism, a New Name for Some Old Ways of Thinking: Popular Lectures on Philosophy, 1907

The Meaning of Truth: A Sequel to "Pragmatism", 1907

A Pluralistic Universe (Hibbert lectures), 1909

Memories and Studies, 1911

Essays in Radical Empiricism, edited by Ralph Barton Perry, 1912

Selected Papers on Philosophy, edited by C.M.Bakewell, 1917

Collected Essays and Reviews, edited by Ralph Barton Perry, 1920

Essays on Faith and Morals, edited by Ralph Barton Perry, 1943

Essays in Pragmatism, edited by Alburey Castell, 1948

The Moral Equivalent of War, and Other Essays, and Selections from Some Problems of Philosophy, edited by John K.Roth, 1971

The Essential Writings, edited by Bruce W.Wilshire, 1971 A William James Reader, edited by Gay Wilson Allen, 1972 Selected Writings, edited by G.H.Bird, 1995

Other writings: philosophical works and much correspondence.

Collected works edition: Works (Harvard Edition), edited by Frederick H.Burkhardt, Fredson Bowers, and Ignas K.Skrupskelis, 1975– (in progress).

Bibliography

Skrupskelis, Ignas K., William James: A Reference Guide, Boston: Hall, 1977

Further Reading

Cotkin, George, William James, Public Philosopher, Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1990

Heddendorf, David, "Filling Out the What: William James, Josiah Royce and Metaphor," American Transcendental Quarterly 2 (1988):125–38

Lentricchia, Frank, Ariel and the Police: Michel Foucault, William James, Wallace Stevens, Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1988

Myers, Gerald E., William James: His Life and Thought., New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1986

Perry, Ralph Barton, The Thought and Character of William James, Boston: Little Brown, 2 vols., 1935

Posnock, Ross, The Trial of Curiosity: Henry James, William James, and the Challenge of Modernity, New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1991

Seigfried, Charlene Haddock, William James' Radical Reconstruction of Philosophy, Albany: State University of New York Press, 1990

Wernham, James C.S., James' Will-to-Believe Doctrine: A Heretical View, Kingston, Ontario: McGill-Queen's University Press, 1987

West, Cornel, The American Evasion of Philosophy: A Genealogy of Pragmatism, Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1989

Japanese Essay

The type of prose held by many to be most characteristically Japanese is called (among other things) zuihitsu or essei. That the first term is a transliteration of a Chinese designation and the second derives from the West is a telling paradox, for Japan owes the existence of its literary tradition to China, and many of the assumptions that govern its modern genre framework to Europe. Accounts of this mode—or modes, necessarily—often dwell on whether and how the Japanese achievement may be successful or unique. It is a debate that constitutes much of the writing itself, second only to the question of what zuihitsu, which literally means “following the brush,” is as a genre.

Just as they imported Chinese graphs to facilitate writing, so the Japanese accepted China’s distinctions between formal genres, such as poetry, history, or argument, and informal modes, including fiction and personal reflections. Literate Japanese men were expected to write in Chinese, and the work of one of them, Yoshishige no Yasutane’s (c. 931–1002) Chiteiki (982.; Record of the pond pavilion), a record of his pavilion and reclusive life, is recognized as an early landscape essay. It is more common, however, to list as the first essay in Japan Makura no sōshi (The Pillow Book) of Sei Shōnagon (c. 965–?), one of the brilliant literary women who wrote narrative fiction and memoirs of a psychological subtlety not rivaled in Europe until the development of the novel. However, The Pillow Book’s heyday was not the height of the essay: that came with the maturation of hybrid Sino-Japanese language in medieval times. Hybridization is seen in syntactic parallelism and translation-equivalent phrases, as well as the high proportion of Chinese compound words. This blend of Chinese terseness with Japanese agglutination animates the famous opening meditation on the constantly metamorphosing nature of all things in Kamo no Chōmei’s (1155?–1216) Hōjōki (c. 1212; An Account of My Hut). Today literary historians do not always treat An Account of My Hut as a zuihitsu, preferring his Shiki monogatari (Tales of the four seasons); An Account of My Hut is stylistically quite different from both The Pillow Book and Tsurezuregusa (wr. c. 1319 to as late as 1350; Essays in Idleness) by Kenkō (c. 1283–c. 1352), the third member of what became established at the end of the last century as a triumvirate. Essays in Idleness uses the hybrid style, and also harks back to The Pillow Book, often imitating its vernacular, whose purity was identified with the feminine. Although important essays centered on single themes exist, the definition canonized from the 18th century de-emphasized them in favor of the fragmentary, seemingly random work that claims to have no purpose.

The first piece actually to use the word zuihitsu in its title, the Tōsai zuihitsu (Tōsai’s miscellany) of Ichijō Kaneyoshi (also known as Kanera) (1402–81), was not of this random type, being instead a collection of topically arranged anecdotes. Such compendia are usual for the Chinese suibi, which gave the name to the Japanese genre (although in China the designation biji or “records of the brush” is more common). In Korea, where they were also written in classical Chinese, the term chapki (miscellaneous record) is preferred to indicate literary miscellanies that may combine autobiographical narration with other jottings. Throughout East Asia, “idleness” was held to be the key characteristic from which these writings emerged.

In a more Japanese vein is an admonitory work by Kanera, Sayo no nezame (1477; Awake in the night), which explains political leadership and literary studies to a woman who was virtually a shōgun (generalissimo) during the civil wars that tore apart the capital. It is an opinionated but elliptical work of criticism; only its audience is atypical. Other medieval writers whose works are treasured include Shinkei (1406–75), a linked verse poet. Notes on his flight from the wars and contemplation of aesthetics are interwoven in Hitorigoto (1468; Solitary ramblings) and Oinokurigoto (1471–75; Old man’s prattle). Both internal commentary and the titles of Japanese essays are frequently self-denigrating and inwardlooking, claiming to be mere distractions or comforts to the author, yet the reader is also consoled by the unexpected intimacy.

Still other works, particularly much Buddhist writing, broadly qualify as representative Japanese essays. Shōbōgenzō zuimonki (1235–38; Record of Things Heard from the Treasury of the Eye of the True Teaching), the collected teachings of Zen master Dōgen (1200–53), Ichigon hōdan (Plain Words on the Pure Land Way), aphoristic statements by monks and recluses, and even Zeami’s (1363?–1443?) celebrated treatises on the Nō theater share similarities in organization and thought with more strictly lyric endeavors. Oral teaching was a central practice of the literati, and when written, records of talks on poetry and similar subjects took on the form of discursive essays.

Medieval essays can be quite short. Both brevity and the tendency toward a fragmented, incomplete treatment of topics have been linked to the literate elite’s difficulty in absorbing new and confusing trends as their world dissolved. The later emergence of the 17-syllable haiku poem reminds us that brevity is considered a virtue in Japan; indeed, many essays are divided into passages of haiku-like length. Skepticism toward the verbal permeates some religious thinking, as in the Zen sects. Nonetheless, extensive volumes of criticism, transcribed interviews, for example the Zen priest Musō Soseki’s (1275–1351) Muchū mondōshū (1344; Dialogues in dream) and rambling discourses satisfy an equally fierce desire for verbosity.

The passion for words and knowledge yielded thousands of essays in the early modern period, many of them still unpublished. In the 1600s, Essays in Idleness and The Pillow Book enjoyed revivals, accustoming Japanese readers to desultory vignettes—often with a touch of didacticism—as a mode of essay, typified by Sano Shōeki’s (1610–91) Nigiwaigusa (1682; Musings on prosperity), a dilettante merchant’s musings. The youthful Yanagisawa Kien (1704–58) lovingly recalled life in the pleasure district of Yoshiwara in his celebrated Hitorine (1725; Sleeping alone). Lyrical essays may also be found in the genre known as haibun, light prose sketches combined with haiku poetry, such as Yokoi Yayū’s (1702–83) Uzuragoromo (1727–79; Patchwork cloak). Matsuo Bashō’s (1644–94) Genjūan no ki (1690; Prose Poem on the Unreal Dwelling), a meditation along the lines of An Account of My Hut, demonstrates the profundity attainable in a brief, allusive space.

At the same time, interest in Chinese models reached a new pitch. Lengthy productions like Muro Kyūsō’s (1658–1734) Sundai zatsuwa (1732; Miscellaneous talks by Sundai, selections translated as A Japanese Philosopher, and Other Papers upon the Chinese Philosophy in Japan), arranged under the Five Confucian Virtues, and Amano Sadakage's (1663–1733) Shiojiri (1697–1733; Salt mounds) remain fascinating troves. Partly from interest in the past, partly from thirst for novelty—strange tales were common—the intelligentsia was responsible for circulating such works. Ogyū Sorai's (1666–1728) Narubeshi (1736; It should be), consisting of over 400 segments on language use, spurred a flurry of rebuttals. With the emergence of kokugaku, or national learning scholars, who unearthed texts of the Japanese past as an antidote to what they held were the crippling effects of China, Japanese zuihitsu were compared favorably to the Chinese. Motoori Norinaga's (1730–1801) Tamakatsuma (1793–1812; The beautiful basket) contains 1005 segments reflecting his research and controversial ideas. His disciple Ishihara Masaakira (1760–1821)—whose Nennen zuihitsu (1801–05; Jotting year by year) defines the genre as a gathering of all that is seen and heard, of varying quality but honest intent, and defends Motoori's use of it—was self-conscious about the native legacy and the virtues of its casualness. Matsudaira Sadanobu's (1758–1829) Kagetsu sōshi (1818; Book of moon and flowers) is a late example of the impact of The Pillow Book even on a conservative interested in promoting Confucian principles.

In the late 18th and early 19th centuries, zuihitsu publication hit its first peak, in which authors of all stripes compiled useful information. Santō Kyōden's (1761–1816) Kottōshō (1813; Collection of curios) is one encyclopedic example. Many works described the sights and sounds of ordinary life, as in Miyako no teburi (1808; Customs of the capital), the innkeeper Ishikawa Masamochi's (1753–1830) elegant chronicle of Edo, the old name for Tokyo. Suzuki Bokushi (1770–1842) detailed the seasons of the countryside in Hokuetsu seppu (1837; Snow Country Tales). A major work that bridges Japan's encounter with the West is Ryūkyō shinshi (1860, 1874; The new record of Yanagibashi), Narushima Ryūhoku's (1837–84) document of the Yanagibashi pleasure quarter, written in a playful, ironical, Japanized Chinese.

Along with the momentous impact of Western fiction, forms of the essay flourished from the last quarter of the 19th century. A plethora of journalists arose to write for the many newly founded magazines and newspapers. Accounts of his travels to the West by Fukuzawa Yukichi (1834–1901) were bestsellers, while his Gakumon no susume (1872; An Encouragement of Learning) was indispensable to the modernization of Japan. Essays were the vehicle for introducing such unprecedented concepts as romantic love, the theme of Kitamura Tōkoku's (1868–94) “Ensei shika to josei” (1892.; The world-weary poet and woman). Hiratsuka Raichō's (1886–1971) manifesto Genshi josei wa taiyō de atta (In the beginning woman was the sun)—printed in the inaugural 1911 issue of Seitō (Bluestockings), a journal to promote women's creativity—rocked society. The poet and critic Yosano Akiko (1878–1942) published collections of essays on social questions as often as twice a year, and debated with Raichō over the protection of motherhood. Arguments and debates about the nature of argumentation evolved, with the allowance for following one's brush acting as a kind of reassurance.

Writers known for forging new forms of literature appropriate to the modern experience continued to extend the zuihitsu inheritance. Masaoka Shiki (1867–1902), notorious for proposing that traditional verse forms were doomed, linked zuihitsu to the possibilities for improving Japanese literature and creating a new colloquial written language closer to speech. His Fudemakase (1884–92; Leaving it to the brush) and Gyōga manroku (wr. 1901–02; Stray notes while lying on my back), the latter published posthumously after his death from tuberculosis, were widely read. Shiki introduced the concept of shasei (copying from life) into the modern literary scene. Shimazaki Tōson (1872–1943), identified with the so-called “Inovel” form that draws part of its inspiration from personal essay conventions, practiced this mode of creative literary observation in his Chikumagawa no suketchi (1911–12; Chikuma River Sketches). Natsume Sōseki (1867–1916), a renowned and versatile novelist, wrote both literary criticism drawn from his two-year stay in London and the highly regarded occasional piece Garasudo no uchi (1915; Within My Glass Doors). Dōba mango (1919), critical remarks by Saitō Mokichi (1882–1953), the chief modern tanka poet, drew the acclaim of Akutagawa Ryūnosuke (1892–1927), whose own Shuju no kotoba (1923–25; Fool’s words) is a masterpiece of the aphorism.

The Taishō period (1912–26), when Japan experimented with democracy and cosmopolitanism, heralded a boom in zuihitsu. In 1923, Kikuchi Kan (1888–1948) founded Bungei shunjū (Literary spring and autumn), which to this day publishes numerous essays, while a journal entitled Zuihitsu began after the Tokyo earthquake. Terada Torahiko (1878–1935), a physicist who wrote under the sobriquet Fuyuhiko, is credited with formulating the first original style—frank, expansive, and “scientific”—for the modern essay. Established themes mold the work of Nagai Kafū (1879–1959), chronicler of old Tokyo and its commodified women. His Ame shōshō (1918; Quiet Rain) is reminiscent of heritage accounts (altered by time in America, France, and the gay quarters), and his miscellanies from “Dyspepsia House” (Danchōtei) were as copious as any earlier author’s scribbles. Irony and style mark the accomplishments of career essayists such as Uchida Roan (1868–1929). Taikutsu tokuhon (1915–26; Boredom reader) is Satō Haruo’s (1892–1964) splendid contribution to the heritage of desultory writings, in which humor is rarely far from the surface.

The mid-1930s brought another wave of zuihitsu popularity, in the midst of which many questioned the randomness and superficiality of Japanese essayism, including those such as Nakano Shigeharu (1902–79), poet and Marxist revolutionary, whom literary history lauds for his trenchant critique of the culture. The desire to guard the “real Japan” defined literature in some of its best and worst moments, but ultimately did not impede the writing of significant works or the delineation of the crisis of modernity. In 1933, Tanizaki Jun’ichirō’s (1886–1965) In’ei raisan (In Praise of Shadows) exulted in a fading past of dark beauty. That same year, Yanagita Kunio’s (1875–1962) Tōno monogatari (1910; The Legends of Tōno), the first of many ethnographic accounts modeled on zuihitsu, was “discovered” and Japanese folklore studies blossomed. Hagiwara Sakutarō (1886–1942), poet and essayist, found in Yasuda Yojūrō’s (1910–81) Nihon no hashi (1936; Japanese bridges) a transcendent aestheticization of bridges read by many as a call to battle, the first work of Japanese literature with the requisite intellect to be called an essay. Yasuda’s name has been expunged from lists of important essayists, perhaps due to his sympathy with the Japanese war effort.

One essayist who drew acclaim in the 1930s, Kobayashi Hideo (1902–83), remains a pillar of Japanese literature. Kawabata Yasunari (1899–1972), himself a perceptive judge, praised Kobayashi in 1931 as the first modern literary critic. “Influential” hardly describes the path of his career up to the classics Mujō to iu koto (1946; On impermanence) or Kangaeru hinto (1964; Hints for thinking). After him, the value of Japanese criticism was no longer in doubt.

A chief problem posed by “zuihitsu booms” was whether any distinct essay form existed in Japan. As Hagiwara lamented, all novelists write zuihitsu as well. Since there is often little formal difference between the novel as practiced by many Japanese and the essay, commentators raise the question whether the short pieces by Shiga Naoya (1883–1971), “deity of the novel,” would not be better termed zuihitsu. Even the decadent author Dazai Osamu (1909–48), who considered zuihitsu—his travel essay Tsugaru (1944), for example—to be different from fiction may, in the judgment of others, have written his masterpieces in the genre. Japanese critics confound the issue further by applying this caveat which seems appropriate to confessional fiction—zuihitsu tell the naked truth about an author. This points to a fundamental and perhaps counter-intuitive contrast. Where the I-novel is based on presumptions of necessary sincerity, zuihitsu are more distanced, more opinion than experience. Rather than creating an interiorized portrait that frequently drives the reader away with its blunt crudity, or flaunts marks of intimacy that imply the reader is being made privy to a vast private world (the Inovel mode), zuihitsu build an image of a personality one would like to sit down with for a long chat. In fact, the zuihitsu is that long chat—by the brazier in winter, in a cotton robe sipping astringent tea in summer, according to practitioner and theorist Kuriyagawa Hakuson (1880–1923)—artlessly orchestrated for the maximum comfort of the guest, but with the host all the while complaining that he or she is unprepared and failing miserably as a companion. The author, in other words, claims not to be exposing anything, and waves the reader away with social gambits that make the audience all the more willing to listen. Thus, paradoxically the I-novel author’s strategies of self-exposure lead to a fundamental posturing that hides as much as it reveals, while the zuihitsu author’s postures of nonchalance and disinterest leave the reader feeling he or she has uncovered the author’s core.

Zuihitsu today retain overwhelming popularity, and are often hailed as congenial to the Japanese world view. Women maintain their presence, with Kōda Aya (1904–90), daughter of Kōda Rohan (1867–1947), whose own essays were much loved, observing her father’s death (Shūen [1947; Last moments]) and the domestic world. Epoch-defining works continue to be written. Sakaguchi Ango (1906–55) shocked postwar Japan out of its nostalgia by undercutting the received meanings of culture and authority with his Darakuron (1946; On decadence). Taiyō to tetsu (1965; Sun and Steel), Yukio Mishima’s (1925–70) statement of literary and political ideals, would later be understood in the context of his ritual suicide. The most significant essays of the postwar period, Nobel prize winner Ōe Kenzaburō’s (1935–) Hiroshima nōto (1965; Hiroshima Notes), mark his transition from spokesman for the young generation to the atomic bomb-aware and ill-appreciated conscience of a contemporary Japan he faults as irresponsible. At the end of the millennium, the essay endures as the form through which writers seek consolation and identification of what is irreducibly Japanese in their world.

LINDA H.CHANCE

Anthologies

- Anthology of Japanese Literature: From the Earliest Era to the MidNineteenth Century*, edited by Donald Keene, New York: Grove Press, and London: Allen and Unwin, 1955; revised edition, Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1968
- Classical Japanese Prose: An Anthology*, edited by Helen Craig McCullough, Stanford, California: Stanford University Press, 1990

Further Reading

- Ariga, Chieko, "Dephallicizing Women in Ryukyo Shinshi: A Critique of Gender Ideology in Japanese Literature," Journal of Asian Studies 51 (August 1992):565–86
- Beichman, Janine, Masaoka Shiki, Boston: Twayne, 1982
- Fowler, Edward, The Rhetoric of Confession: Shishōsetsu in Early Twentieth-Century Japanese Fiction, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1988
- Hare, Thomas Blenman, "Reading Kamo no Chōmei," Harvard Journal of Asiatic Studies 49 (June 1989):173–228
- Ivy, Marilyn, "Ghastly Insufficiencies: Tōno monogatari and the Origins of Nativist Ethnology," in her Discourses of the Vanishing: Modernity, Phantasm, Japan, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1995:66–97
- Karatani, Kōjin, Origins of Modern Japanese Literature, Durham, North Carolina: Duke University Press, 1993
- Keene, Donald, World Within Walls: Japanese Literature of the PreModern Era, 1600–1867, New York: Grove Press, and London: Secker and Warburg, 1976
- Keene, Donald, Dawn to the West: Japanese Literature of the Modern Era, vol. 2: Poetry, Drama, Criticism, New York: Holt Rinehart Winston, 1984
- Keene, Donald, Seeds in the Heart: Japanese Literature from Earliest Times to the Late Sixteenth Century, New York: Holt, 1993
- Koschmann, J. Victor, Ōiwa Keibō, and Yamashita Shinji, editors, International Perspectives on Yanagita Kunio and Japanese Folklore Studies, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University ChinaJapan Program, 1985
- LaFleur, William R., "Inns and Hermitages: The Structure of Impermanence," in his The Karma of Words: Buddhism and the Literary Arts in Medieval Japan, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1983:60–79
- Ninomiya, Masayuki, La Pensée de Kobayashi Hideo: Un intellectuel japonais au tournant de l'histoire, Geneva: Droz, 1995
- Rodd, Laurel Rasplia, "Yosano Akiko and the Taishō Debate over the 'New Woman'," in Recreating Japanese Women, 1600–1945, edited by Gail Lee Bernstein, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1991:175–98
- Silverberg, Miriam, Changing Song: The Marxist Manifestos of Nakano Shigeharu, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1990
- Tansman, Alan, "Bridges to Nowhere: Yasuda Yojūrō's Language of Violence and Desire," Harvard Journal of Asiatic Studies 56, no. 1 (June 1996):35–75
- Treat, John Whittier, "Ōe Kenzaburō: Humanism and Hiroshima," in his Writing Ground Zero: Japanese Literature and the Atomic Bomb, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1995:229–58

Wolfe, Alan, Suicidal Narrative in Modern Japan: The Case of Dazai Osamu, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1990

Jefferies, Richard

British, 1848–1887

Richard Jefferies, in the almost 500 published essays and articles he is known to have written, discusses topics as various as sculpture, powered flight, the intelligence of fish, the etymology of dialect, shipping on the Thames, bathing at Brighton, and the dehumanizing effect of London streets. Nevertheless, it is the rural world, in all its aspects, with which Jefferies is mainly concerned.

Jefferies targeted more than one audience in a career which began in journalism. The articles he wrote for the Live Stock Journal in the late 1870s, such as “America and the Meat Market” (1877) and “Haymaking by Artificial Heat” (1878), were obviously intended for agriculturalists, and have largely been forgotten. The essays he wrote for publications such as the Globe, the Pall Mall Gazette, and the Graphic, however, were suited to a more general urban or suburban audience to whom the countryside offered an actual or imaginative escape. These essays, ranging from descriptive accounts of rural rambles to excursions into natural mysticism, from reactionary dismissals of farm workers’ appeals for improvements in their lot, have been an influence on writers such as Kenneth Grahame, Edward Thomas, W.H.Hudson, and Henry Williamson.

His formal education over by his 15th year, Jefferies makes few demands on his reader in terms of historical or cultural knowledge. Although he might mention the sculptor/engraver Benvenuto Cellini’s Autobiography (“A Defence of Sport,” 1883), his allusions are usually to culturally familiar places such as the Louvre (“The Bathing Season,” 1884) or to wellknown figures like Ruskin (“Outside London,” 1885).

Nature permeates Jefferies’ writing, and even, in a sense, influences the structure and style of his work. Often using, in his descriptive pieces, a narrator who situates himself in, or adjacent to, the landscape he is describing, Jefferies steers the essay on what seems to be a perfectly natural progress as the narrator relates what he sees to the reader, and then muses upon it. Although an essay may therefore seem to be somewhat rambling, the effect is deliberate; John Fowles has said in his 1987 introduction to Jefferies’ Round About a Great Estate (1880) that his “prose is like nature itself.” In pieces such as “January in the Sussex Woods” (1884), this device enables Jefferies to achieve a natural closure; the last paragraph, beginning with “the gloom of the short January evening ... settling down fast,” ends with “the wood is silent, and it is suddenly night.” As the day closes, so does the essay.

Jefferies was aware of the limitations of language; in “Wild Flowers” (1885), he compares the difficulty he found in rendering visual impressions in words to that encountered by early photographers in their efforts to “fix the scene upon the plate.” He wrote “I can see [the images], but how shall I fix them for you? By no process can that be accomplished.” Nevertheless, it is a limitation he overcame better than most. To Jefferies"..."the beauty of English woodland and country is in its detail" ("An English Deer-Park," 1888), and it is through a careful and intricate layering of detail that Jefferies attempts to convey his perceptions, be they of beauty or otherwise. This detail could be applied to the broad expanse of a rural scene, or to the particularity of a flower. In "Notes on Landscape-Painting" (1882), a beam of sunshine briefly penetrates a cloudy sky and sweeps across an autumnal scene of men and women threshing wheat. In the almost epiphanic "second of its presence" the shaft of light renders the ordinary extraordinary, brilliantly illuminating farmworkers, threshing machine, horse and straw. Then "...it is gone, and lights up the backs of the sheep yonder as it runs up the hill swifter than a hare." Elsewhere in the essay his attention turns from panoramic scenes to a single buttercup; describing the effect of scraping off the outer "enamel" of a petal, he compares the pollen on his fingers to "dust...from the wing of a butterfly."

His observations of the intricacies within the spatial immensity of Nature, the sense of collapsed time he felt when contemplating the Iron Age earthworks visible in the Wiltshire landscape, and his awe at the temporal infinity of the universe, led him toward a natural mysticism, expressed at length in his spiritual autobiography, The Story of My Heart (1883), but apparent in much of his later writing. In his essay "The Pageant of Summer" (1883) he wrote that the "exceeding beauty of the earth, in her splendour of life, yields a new thought with every petal," and he expressed his hope that eventually Nature itself would "become, as it were, interwoven into man's existence."

Jefferies' mysticism did not blind him to the more pragmatic aspects of rural life, however. In "Notes on Landscape Painting" he states his belief that the countryside absorbs innovation, so that what once seemed dramatically new soon becomes "a part of the life of the country." Eventually "the old and the new...shade and blend together." Elsewhere, in Round About a Great Estate he states "my sympathies are with the light of the future." This acceptance of, and belief in, gradual change as natural to rural life is evident also in much of his social commentary. While Jefferies' philosophy was always somewhat class-biased, distrustful of organized labor, and opposed to rapid change, he was able to view the disadvantaged with some compassion, often documenting the hardship and drudgery of laboring life in the form of vignettes; the eponymous and dull-witted protagonist of "John Smith's Shanty" (1874) is imprisoned for domestic assault, but the narrator comments on the need for an improvement in education and gradual change of the "whole social system." In "One of the New Voters" (1885), characteristically emphasizing that he is "describing the realities of rural life," Jefferies notes that behind "the beautiful aspects" of a golden wheat field is "the reality of human labour—hours upon hours of heat and strain."

This social analysis in Jefferies' essays, as opposed to some of his more philosophical work, has assured him, if not a place in history, then at least some space in history texts. Historians of Victorian rural England, such as Howard Newby and Pamela Horn, have often used Jefferies as a source. He remains relegated to the margins of the canon, however, and a literary reappraisal of Jefferies awaits "the light of the future."

ALAN G.H.WEST

See also Nature Essay

Biography

John Richard Jefferies. Born 6 November 1848 at Coate Farm, near Swindon, Wiltshire. Studied until age 15 at schools in Sydenham, Kent, and Swindon. Lived in Swindon, 1866–77, Surbiton, Surrey, 1877–81, and Sussex, 1882–87. Reporter, North Wilts Herald and Wilts and Gloucestershire Standard, 1866–70; contributor to various journals, from 1873, including Fraser's Magazine, Fortnightly Review, New Quarterly Magazine, New Monthly Magazine, the World, Live Stock Journal, the Pall Mall Gazette, and the Standard. Married Jessie Badon, 1874; three children. Had four operations for tubercular fistula, 1882. Died (of chronic fibroid phthisis) in Goring, Sussex, 14 August 1887.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

The Gamekeeper at Home: Sketches of Natural History and Rural Life, 1878

The Amateur Poacher, 1879

Wild Life in a Southern County, 1879; as An English Village, 1903

Round About a Great Estate, 1880

Hodge and His Masters, 2 vols., 1880

Nature near London, 1883

The Life of the Fields, 1884

Red Deer, 1884

The Open Air, 1885

Field and Hedgerow, Being the Last Essays, edited by Jessie Jefferies, 1889

The Toilers of the Field, 1892

Nature and Eternity, with Other Uncollected Papers, 1902

The hills and the Vale, 1909

Beauty Is Immortal (“Felise of the Dewy Morn”) with Some Hitherto Uncollected Essays and Manuscripts, edited by Samuel J. Looker, 1948

The Essential Richard Jefferies, edited by Malcolm Elwin, 1948

The Old House at Coate, and Other Hitherto Unprinted Essays, edited by Samuel J. Looker, 1948

Chronicles of the Hedges, and Other Essays, edited by Samuel J. Looker, 1948

Field and Farm: Essays Now First Collected, edited by Samuel J. Looker, 1957

Landscape and Labour: Essays and Letters, edited by John Pearson, 1979

Landscape with Figures: An Anthology of Richard Jefferies' Prose, edited by Richard Mabey, 1983

Other writings: nine novels, the autobiography The Story of My Heart (1883), and nature diaries.

Collected works edition: Works, edited by C. Henry Warren, 6 vols., 1948–49.

Bibliography

Miller, George, and Hugoe Matthews, Richard Jefferies: A Bibliographical Study,

Aldershot, Hampshire: Scolar Press, and Brookfield, Vermont: Ashgate, 1993

Further Reading

- Blench, J.W., "The Influence of Richard Jefferies upon Henry Williamson," Durham University Journal 69 (1986):79–89; (1987):327–47
- Ebbatson, Roger, "Richard Jefferies," in Lawrence and the Nature Tradition: A Theme in English Fiction 1859–1914, Brighton: Harvester, 1980:127–64
- Fowles, John, Introduction to Round About a Great Estate by Jefferies, Bradford-on-Avon: Ex Libris, 1987:9–14
- Keith, W.J., Richard Jefferies: A Critical Study, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1965
- Keith, W.J., The Rural Tradition: A Study of the Non-Fiction Prose Writers of the English Countryside, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1974
- Leavis, Q.D., "Lives and Works of Richard Jefferies," Scrutiny 6 (1938):435–46
- Looker, Samuel J., and Crichton Porteous, Richard Jefferies, Man of the Fields: A Biography and Letters, London: Baker, 1965
- Mabey, Richard, Introduction to Landscape with Figures by Jefferies, edited by Mabey, Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1983:7–24
- Manning, Edna, Richard Jefferies: A Modern Appraisal, Windsor: Goldscheider, 1984
- Matthews, Hugoe, and Phyllis Treitel, The Forward Life of Richard Jefferies: A Chronological Study, Oxford: Petton Books, 1994
- Pearson, John, Introduction to Landscape and Labour by Jefferies, edited by Pearson, Bradford-on-Avon: Moonraker, 1979:7–18
- Richard Jefferies Society Journal*, 1992–
- Rossabi, Andrew, Introduction to Hodge and His Masters by Jefferies, London: Quartet, 1979:vi–xxiii
- Taylor, Brian, Richard Jefferies, Boston: Twayne, 1982
- Thomas, Edward, Richard Jefferies: His Life and Work, London: Hutchinson, and Boston: Little Brown, 1909
- Williams, Merryn, Thomas Hardy and Rural England, London: Macmillan, and New York: Columbia University Press, 1972
- Williams, Raymond, The Country and the City, New York: Oxford University Press, 1973; London: Hogarth Press, 1985:191–96
- Wilson, Keith, "Richard Jefferies," in Modern British Essayists: First Series, edited by Robert Beum, Dictionary of Literary Biography, vol. 98, Detroit: Gale Research, 1990:191–104

Johnson, Samuel

British, 1709–1784

What did Samuel Johnson think of the essay? His great Dictionary of 1755, a landmark in human achievement, has this to say regarding "essay" as a noun:

1. Attempt; endeavour.

Fruitless our hopes, though pious our essays;

Your's to preserve a friend, and mine to praise. Smith.

2. A loose sally of the mind; an irregular indigested piece; not a regular and orderly composition.

My essays, of all my other works, have been most current. Bac.

Yet modestly he does his work survey,

And calls his finish'd poem an essay. Poem to Roscommon.

3. A trial; an experiment.

He wrote this but as an essay, or taste of my virtue. Shak.

Repetitions wear us into a liking of what possibly, in the first essay, displeased us. Locke.

4. First taste of any thing; first experiment.

Translating the first of Homer's Iliads, I intended as an essay to the whole work. Dryden's Fables, Preface.

Within a culture that values success (over endeavor), regularity and method (over loose sallies), accomplishment (over trials), and the final (over the initial), the essay would appear always to be an inferior genre, at least as it is depicted in these definitions. The second definition in particular distinguishes the essay from more finished kinds of writing, and the illustration indicates how a writer might depreciate another kind of work by calling it an essay.

At the same time, however, Johnson's definitions and illustrations also suggest the elusive nature of what an essay is: almost any piece of writing would fit the parameters of the first and third definitions, as an "attempt" or "experiment." The second definition, to be sure, does seem to be the most restrictive, and its first illustration alludes to a tradition of "irregular indigested" pieces by citing Bacon, who followed the generally acknowledged inventor of the essay, Montaigne. But Bacon's comment points to the particular power of his essays, their currency; and the second illustration undermines any confident focusing of the term by employing a quotation in which the essay referred to is actually a poem, which may remind us of the disparate works Johnson would have known as "essays": Dryden's Essay of Dramatic Poesy (1668; a dialogue), Locke's Essay Concerning Human Understanding (1694; an extended philosophical speculation), Pope's poetic Essay on Man (1733–34) or Essay on Criticism (1711).

Johnson's own career also undermines any sense that the essay is a lowly or indeterminate genre. Prior to the Rambler, which ran from 1750 to 1752, Johnson was a promising but rather minor figure. Among his publications could be counted two long poems, London (1738) and The Vanity of Human Wishes (1749); some reviews and brief biographies; the "Plan" (1747) for the Dictionary; and a mediocre (at best) play, Irene (1749). After the Rambler's 208 biweekly essays had appeared (almost entirely by Johnson), he was a major figure. In 1752 Charlotte Lennox was not alone in determining that "the Author of the Rambler" was "the greatest Genius in the present Age," as she puts it in the penultimate chapter of The Female Quixote. Johnson was, for the rest of his life, "the Rambler" (sometimes even "Ramblin' Sam"). The famous Nollekens bust of Johnson has written on its base, "RAMBLER."

In the 1750s, in addition to his Dictionary and the philosophical tale of Rasselas (1759), Johnson published in two other essay series, the Idler (1758–60) and the Adventurer (1752–54). By 1764, the Biographia Dramatica, reflecting a widespread sentiment, could refer to Johnson as “no less the glory of the present age and nation, than he will be the admiration of all succeeding ones.” Johnson garnered this praise, repeated again and again by his contemporaries, before his great edition of Shakespeare’s plays (1765), Journey to the Western Islands (1775), or The Lives of the Poets (1779–81). Johnson’s massive reputation, in other words, was substantially the result of his work as an essayist. And the Rambler, as Arthur Murphy, Johnson’s early biographer puts it, was his “great work” (Boulton, 1971).

Johnson’s celebrity when he died, late in 1784, was indeed phenomenal. He reportedly had remarked to Boswell a few years earlier, “I believe there is hardly a day in which there is not something about me in the newspapers,” and Helen McGuffie’s patient search of the London and Edinburgh newspapers (1749–84) revealed (in Samuel Johnson in the British Press, 1749–1784, 1976) that Johnson “was closer to the truth than he may have realized.” The press apparently tracked his every move and scrutinized his health; when there were no sightings or symptoms to report, they made things up, recycled anecdotes, quoted excerpts from his works, or focused on someone somehow related to Johnson (Richard Russell for instance, who was the subject of some 20 newspaper articles from 4 October to 13 November 1784: he had left money in his will to Johnson and then changed his mind [McGuffie]).

This sort of interest in Johnson as super-celebrity can only partly be explained by reference to his works. One must look as well to their reception; as Johnson put it: “It is advantageous to an author, that his book should be attacked as well as praised. Fame is a shuttlecock. If it be struck only at one end of the room, it will soon fall to the ground. To keep it up, it must be struck at both ends” (Journey to the Western Islands). Johnson’s works certainly were struck passionately at both ends, during his lifetime and afterwards. As Vicesimus Knox put it in 1788: “Few men could stand so fiery a trial as he has done. His gold has been put into the furnace, and really, considering the violence of the fire, and the frequent repetition of the process, the quantity of dross and alloy is inconsiderable” (Boulton).

The critical purification of Johnson’s essays focused primarily on the Rambler’s style and tone (its pious intentions could hardly be questioned). Johnson’s readers naturally compared this series, and every other essay series, to Addison’s and Steele’s Spectator (1711–12, 1714). Arthur Murphy’s assessment is fairly representative of late 18th-century views: “Addison lends grace and ornament to truth; Johnson gives it force and energy. Addison makes virtue amiable; Johnson represents it as an awful duty. Addison insinuates himself with an air of modesty; Johnson commands like a dictator” (Boulton, 1971). While the Spectator was spectacularly popular, the Rambler “increased in fame as in age,” as Boswell put it. Some readers, however, never came to terms with Johnson’s distinctive style: Horace Walpole, for instance, thought Johnson’s manner “so encumbered, so void of ear & harmony, & consequently so harsh and unpliant that I know no modern Writer whose works could be read aloud with so little satisfaction” (Boulton).

Such a view of Johnson as a pedantic and pompous writer came to dominate the 19th century, so much so that Macaulay—writing in his famous 1831 review of Croker’s edition of Boswell’s Life of Johnson (1791)—could say that the “characteristic faults of his style are so familiar to all our readers, and have been so often burlesqued, that it is almost superfluous to point them out” (Boulton). But at the same time that Johnson’s writings were being dismissed, his conversation and his character (some Johnsonians would prefer to say “caricature”), particularly as presented by Boswell, were being affectionately embraced: “When he talked,” Macaulay asserted, “he clothed his wit and his sense in forcible and natural expressions.”

The modern appreciation of Johnson the writer has been developed by many people. George Birkbeck Hill specifically set out in the 1880s to eradicate Macaulay’s Johnson, which had influenced generations of readers in schoolbook anthologies. Hill’s editions of Boswell, Johnson’s letters, The Lives of the Poets, and other works helped spark a return to the texts themselves. Walter Raleigh’s Six Essays on Johnson in 1910, and T.S.Eliot’s essay on Johnson as critic and poet in 1930, are particularly influential examples of early efforts to take Johnson seriously as a writer. In 1924 in Johnson the Essayist, O.F.Christie asserted what was becoming a commonplace—that Johnson’s essays, which contain his real opinions, are being neglected, while his conversations are being read. Christie attempted to see Johnson’s essays “as a consistent and coherent whole,” and praised their imagery and “spiritual insight.” In 1919 D.N.Smith poked a hole in Boswell’s notion that Johnson’s essays were not revised, and Curtis Bradford in 1939 established that the fourth edition was Johnson’s final revision.

In the 1940s and 1950s interest in Johnson the essayist heightened. In 1941, for instance, W.K.Wimsatt examined the carefully crafted Prose Style of Samuel Johnson, looking closely at the use of parallelism, antithesis, diction, and other qualities; and in 1948, Wimsatt studied Johnson’s distinctive use of scientific imagery and diction in Philosophic Words. In 1944 Joseph Wood Krutch produced the first modern biography of Johnson, which is notable for the careful analysis it provides of Johnson’s own works, including his essays. Arthur Sherbo, Edward Bloom, A.T.Elder, and others deepened appreciation for Johnson’s accomplishment as an essayist, as well as his influence on the essay tradition. With a simple yet important bit of basic research, R.M.Wiles showed in 1968 that the circulation of the Rambler essays, in reprints and excerpts, was much greater than Johnson knew.

In the 1970s and 1980s, a series of studies examined Johnson’s rhetoric. In a particularly important essay, Leopold Damrosch in 1973 saw Johnson “dismantling” commonplaces in an effort “to make us stop parroting the precepts of moralists and start thinking for ourselves.” Damrosch thus suggested that the experience of Johnson’s essays is at least as important as the content, and subsequent scholarship tends to focus on defining the nature of that experience. James Boyd White, in When Words Lose Their Meaning (1984), offered a particularly revealing description of the typical Johnsonian essay’s unfolding: the beginnings of Johnson’s essays typically start “where the reader actually is, surrounded by truisms and clichés, in a condition of uncertainty or doubt, perhaps of essential thoughtlessness, from which he may be moved to a new position of clarity and truth”; yet White also noted that Johnson’s conclusions are “open-ended” and “structurally tentative,” conclusive only within the context of the particular essay. Johnson is thus engaged in teaching his reader how to think.

The insights of Damrosch and White seem to apply primarily to those essays Johnson called “professedly serious,” and it is worth noting the wide variety of writing actually contained in the Rambler, Idler, and Adventurer: literary criticism and theory (the essays on Milton are especially interesting), Oriental tales, epistolary short fiction, allegories, and dream visions. Steven Lynn in Samuel Johnson After Deconstruction (1992.) describes the reader’s experience of the Rambler as a sequential series, noting (among other things) how Johnson reshapes the reader’s sense of the Spectator’s priority, how the movement of various essays anticipates and surpasses deconstruction, and how the careful patterning of the various essays brings the reader again and again to the brink of religious faith—thus carrying out the pious intention Johnson declared at the series’ outset.

For the modern reader, Johnson’s essays are likely to seem rigorous, intense, and strikingly eloquent. They generally demand the reader’s active attention, but even the most rigorous essays are not without a subtle humor. And the stories of Dick Minim (a lousy critic), Dick Linger (a sluggish soul), Tom Tempest and Jack Sneaker (political fanatics), and many other characters are both amusing and instructive. Johnson deals generally with “known truths,” moral insights that the reader is already quite familiar with, but has perhaps stopped acting upon, or applying, or questioning. The movement of his essays as well as the style serve to enliven the reader’s attention.

As Donald Greene (1989) has pointed out, the idea of “Johnson’s prose style,” as if he had only one, is mistaken. In his published essays, however, Johnson does tend toward quite poetic effects of balance, parallelism, alliteration, and imagery. The notion that Johnson’s prose is verbose or padded, a widespread idea in the 19th century, is easily negated by anyone who reads him without prejudice. Here for instance are the first two sentences of the Rambler:

The difficulty of the first address on any new occasion, is felt by every man in his transactions with the world, and confessed by the settled and regular forms of salutation which necessity has introduced into all languages. Judgment was wearied with the perplexity of being forced upon choice, where there was no motive to preference; and it was found convenient that some easy method of introduction should be established, which, if it wanted the allurements of novelty, might enjoy the security of prescription.

The first sentence efficiently sets up the problem—how does one open a channel of communication?—and looks at two aspects of it: on the one hand, the discomfort every individual experiences with first meetings, and on the other hand, the cultural consequences of this perception, namely the institution of various conventions to smooth over this difficulty. This sentence may appear, at first glance, wordy: it does have eight prepositional phrases. The reader who attempts to shorten it without loss or alteration of meaning will quickly discover, however, the efficiency of Johnson’s prose. The second sentence suggests a miniature allegory in which the figure of “Judgment” deliberates (like Rasselas and many other Johnsonian characters) over the choice of introduction, and finally decides arbitrarily. The sentence’s final construction reflects this balance, as “the allurements of novelty” is traded for “the security of prescription.”

This kind of rich texture is easy to parody but very difficult to imitate. Although Johnson's essays have been very influential (even Macaulay's prose strategies often derive from Johnson), his voice remains quite distinctive.

STEVEN LYNN

Biography

Born 18 September 1709 in Lichfield, Staffordshire. Studied at Lichfield Grammar School and Stourbridge School, to age 16; Pembroke College, Oxford, 1728–29. Contributor to Gentleman's Magazine, 1734–44. Married Elizabeth (Tettie) Porter, 1735 (died, 1752). Ran a school in Edial, Staffordshire, 1735–37; moved to London, 1737. Reported on debates in Parliament, 1740–44; worked on his Dictionary, 1746–55; formed the Ivy Lane Club, 1749; writer and editor of the Rambler, 1750–52; major contributor, the Adventurer, 1753–54; arrested for debt, 1756: released after Samuel Richardson loaned him the money; contributor, the Literary Magazine, 1756–58, and the "Idler" papers for the Universal Chronicle, 1758–60. Granted crown pension, 1762. Cofounder of the Literary Club, 1764. Traveled with James Boswell to Scotland, 1773, and with Hester and Henry Thrale to Wales, 1774, and Paris, 1775. Formed the Essex Head Club, 1783. Awards: honorary degrees from Oxford University and Trinity College, Dublin. Died in London, 13 December 1784.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

The Rambler, 208 nos., 20 March 1750–14 March 1752; in 6 vols., 1752; selections in Essays from the Rambler, Adventurer, and Idler, edited by Walter Jackson Bate, 1968

The Adventurer, with others, 140 nos., 7 November 1752–9 March 1754; in 2 vols., 1753–54; selections in Essays from the Rambler, Adventurer, and Idler, edited by Walter Jackson Bate, 1968

The Idler papers, in the Universal Chronicle, or Weekly Gazette, 15 April 1758–5 April 1760; in 2 vols., 1761; selections in Essays from the Rambler, Adventurer, and Idler, edited by Walter Jackson Bate, 1968

Prefaces, Biographical and Critical, to the Works of the English Poets, 10 vols., 1779–81; as The Lives of the English Poets, 1781; revised edition, 1783; edited by George Birkbeck Hill, 3 vols., 1905; selection edited by J.P.Hardy, 1972

Essays from the Rambler, Adventurer, and Idler, edited by Walter Jackson Bate, 1968
Literary Criticism, edited by R.D.Stock, 1974

Selected Poetry and Prose, edited by Frank Brady and W.K. Wimsatt, 1977

Samuel Johnson on Literature, edited by Marlies K.Danziger, 1979

Samuel Johnson on Shakespeare, edited by H.R.Woudhuysen, 1989

Other writings: the two-volume Dictionary of the English Language (1755), poetry, the moral tale Rasselas (1759), the verse-tragedy Irene (1749), the travelogue Journey to the Western Islands (1775), letters (collected in The Letters, edited by Bruce Redford, 5 vols., 1992–94), biographies, and autobiography. Also edited an edition of Shakespeare's plays (1765).

Collected works edition: Works (Yale Edition), edited by Allen T. Hazen and others, 13 vols., 1958–90 (in progress).

Bibliographies

- Clifford, James L., and Donald Greene, Samuel Johnson: A Survey and Bibliography of Critical Studies, Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1970
- Courtney, William Prideaux, and David Nichol Smith, A Bibliography of Samuel Johnson, with a supplement by R.W. Chapman and Allen T. Hazen, New Castle, Delaware: Oak Knoll Books and M. Goldberg, 1984 (original edition, 1915; supplement, 1938)
- Greene, Donald, and John A. Vance, A Bibliography of Johnsonian Studies 1970–1985, Victoria, British Columbia: University of Victoria English Literary Studies, 1987

Further Reading

- Bate, Walter Jackson, Samuel Johnson, New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, and London: Chatto and Windus, 1977
- Boulton, James T., editor, Johnson: The Critical Heritage, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, and New York: Barnes and Noble, 1971
- Bullough, Geoffrey, "Johnson the Essayist," New Rambler 16 (1968):16–33
- Damrosch, Leopold, "Johnson's Manner of Proceeding in the Rambler," ELH 40 (1973):70–89
- Fussell, Paul, Samuel Johnson and the Life of Writing, New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1971
- Good, Graham, "Johnson: The Correction of Error," in his The Observing Self: Rediscovering the Essay, London and New York: Routledge, 1988:55–71
- Greene, Donald, Samuel Johnson, Boston: Twayne, revised edition, 1989
- Koper, Peter, "Samuel Johnson's Rhetorical Stance in The Rambler" Style 12. (1978):23–34
- Lynn, Steven, Samuel Johnson After Deconstruction: Rhetoric and "The Rambler", Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1992
- O'Flaherty, Patrick, "Towards an Understanding of Johnson's Rambler" SEL 18 (1978):523–36
- Rewa, Michael, "Aspects of Rhetoric in Johnson's 'Professedly Serious' Rambler Essays," Quarterly Journal of Speech 56 (1970): 75–84
- Schwartz, Richard, "Johnson's 'Mr. Rambler' and the Periodical Tradition," Genre 7 (1974):196–204
- Trowbridge, Hoyt, "The Language of Reasoned Rhetoric in The Rambler," in Greene Centennial Essays: Essays Presented to Donald Greene, edited by Paul Korshin and Robert Allen, Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1984
- White, James Boyd, When Words Lose Their Meaning: Constitutions and Reconstructions of Language, Character, and Community, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1984
- Wimsatt, W.K., The Prose Style of Samuel Johnson, Hamden, Connecticut: Archon, 1972 (original edition, 1941)

Journal

The terms “journal” and “diary” are often used interchangeably to describe an account of an individual’s experience written at regular intervals. Sometimes the term “diary” suggests a daily record. The term “journal” may be used to describe an ongoing record that is less regular or more elaborate than a diary, or that covers a limited period of time, but which still retains a chronological arrangement. Both the diary and the journal employ a personal perspective, even when recording historical events or scenes of travel, as the journal writer sets down what he or she is able to observe. The journal is a highly flexible form, with few rules about subject matter or narrative style, or even, for that matter, about the frequency or length of entries.

The entry, which is the basic unit of the journal, is often, but not always, given a date. Entries may follow a range of patterns, but the most common is a simple sequential recounting of the events of a particular day. Another common pattern is more like a meditative essay in miniature, which reveals the writer’s inner response to what is happening at the time. While a central convention of the journal is that entries are made daily in the midst of, or shortly after, the experience, many well-known diarists, including Samuel Pepys and Dorothy Wordsworth, often wrote retrospectively, sometimes using notes made close to the time of the experience. Even when they did so, they used the dated-entry form to create the impression of regularity and immediacy.

This convention of appearing to record immediate experience makes the journal form appear casual and linear. Coupled with the ostensibly private purposes of most journals, this leads to a common notion of the journal as a naive, frank, and sincere form, although some journals are actually complex in design, developing dialectic or symbolic patterns through entries that question or echo what has gone before. Novelists have sometimes capitalized on the journal’s appearance of sincerity and immediacy by giving their stories the shape of a journal. Two notable instances are Daniel Defoe’s A Journal of the Plague Year (1722) and André Gide’s La Symphonie pastorale (1919; The Pastoral Symphony).

Like an essay, a journal may enact a sort of imagined conversation in the form of a dialogue with one’s later or earlier self, an extended epistle to a real or imagined friend, or a confession addressed to God. In The Observing Self: Rediscovering the Essay (1988), Graham Good suggests that the essay, as the “book of the self,” bears a likeness to the journal because both forms continue Montaigne’s practice of paying attention to one’s individual experience and recording it in ways that mirror its fluidity and contradictions. But, Good points out, the essayist focuses on a series of topics even when dealing with them over time, while the journal writer concentrates on the chronological unfolding of experience.

In Private Chronicles: A Study of English Diaries (1974), Robert A. Fothergill lists four types of journals: the journal of travel, the public journal or eye-witness record of historic events, the journal of conscience, and the journal of personal memoranda, noting that the great journals often combine elements of several categories. Within these broad categories more specialized forms arise, such as the religious diary or prayer journal as a variety of the journal of conscience, and the journal of erotic adventures as a specialized form of personal memoranda.

Although there have probably been journals as long as there have been literate people with an interest in recording the facts of experience, the words “diary” and “journal” first began to be used in their modern senses in the 16th century. In addition to offering accounts of travel and military experience, during the 17th and 18th centuries journals focused on selfimprovement, as the journal-keeper scrutinized his or her life in light of a personal, religious, or cultural ideal. Most of these journals were not made public during the lives of their writers; some were not published until the 19th and 20th centuries. By the middle of the 18th century, however, increasing interest in reading about private lives paved the way for the wider appearance of the journal as a published form. From that time on, journal writing has been characterized by a tension between reticence and the need to please readers. Isaac D’Israeli’s “Some Observations on Diaries, Self-Biography and Self-Characters” (1796) presents a common justification for publishing private journals—that their truthfulness makes them useful to readers. But Samuel Johnson, writing in the Idler (no. 84), argued that private accounts must be kept private to preserve the writer’s integrity. Some 19th-century reviewers of published journals feared that the popularity of such works would create a plague of self-absorption and idle curiosity. Still, the rise of the Romantic sensibility focused on the development of the individual, and the publication of important diaries, such as those by 17th-century diarists John Evelyn (1818) and Samuel Pepys (1825), added to a growing consciousness of the journal as a literary form. In some ways, Samuel Pepys is to the diary what Montaigne is to the essay, for his balance of interior and public comment, variety of subject matter, and the apparent simplicity of accounting become models for the journal. For Enlightenment rationalists, keeping a journal was an element of an ordered life, while for dissenting Christians in England and on the continent, the journal was a means of assessing one’s progress in sanctity. The Journal of John Wesley (wr. 1725–91) set the stage for increasing interest in using the journal as a spiritual discipline. Toward the end of the 18th century the pleasure of recollection and the treasuring of memories became an important part of journal writing, and the quest to understand the unfolding self tended to replace moral self-scrutiny. The 19th century also saw the rise of the journal that recorded the life and creative processes of the artist and, in the wake of psychoanalysis, 20th-century journals often frame their accounts of self-discovery in psychological, symbolic, and therapeutic terms.

In the 20th century, the publication of complete or nearly complete unexpurgated editions of journals from the past has spurred much critical thinking about literary genres, the canon, and the complexities of self-representation. James Boswell’s Journals (wr. 1763–78) reveal the conflicts of the private man behind the biographer. Dorothy Wordsworth’s Alfoxden Journals (wr. 1798) and Grasmere Journals (wr. 1800–03), with their self-effacing but engaging pictures of ordinary life, have raised questions about the literary status of private writing and the manner in which journals, letters, and private memoirs can shed light on women as writers. Benjamin Robert Haydon’s Diary (wr. 1808–46; pub. originally as The Life of Benjamin Robert Haydon: Autobiography and Journals, 1853) transforms the rhetoric of emotion, removing it from a religious context.

Instead of writing about emotions, he writes emotionally, making it fashionable to dramatize the self as a creature of sensibility. The collaborative Journal kept by the brothers Edmond and Jules Goncourt from 1851 to 1870, and continued by Edmond until 1895, exemplifies the journal as a chronicle of an intellectual and artistic milieu. By the 20th century Anaïs Nin could make the keeping of a journal central to her life's work; her Journals, which began to appear in 1966, raises the journal of self-exploration to new levels of aesthetic and psychological awareness.

LINDA MILLS WOOLSEY

Anthologies

- The Book of American Diaries*, edited by Randall M. Miller and Linda Patterson Miller, New York: Avon, 1995
- A Day at a Time: The Diary Literature of American Women from 1764 to the Present*, edited by Margo Culley, New York: Feminist Press of the City University of New York, 1985
- English Diaries of the XVIth, XVIIth, and XVIIIth Centuries*, edited by James Aitken, Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1941
- English Family Life: An Anthology from Diaries*, edited by Ralph Houlbrooke, Oxford and New York: Blackwell, 1988
- The Faber Book of Diaries*, edited by Simon Brett, London and Boston: Faber, 1987
- Leaves in the Storm: A Book of Diaries*, edited by Stefan Schimanski and Henry Tree, London: Drummond, 1947
- Private Pages: Diaries of American Women, 1830s–1970s*, edited by Penelope Franklin, New York: Ballantine, 1986

Bibliographies

- Arksey, Laura, Nancy Pries, and Marcia Reed, editors, American Diaries: An Annotated Bibliography of Published American Diaries and Journals, Detroit: Gale Research, 2 vols., 1983–87
- Cline, Cheryl, Women's Diaries, Journals, and Letters: An Annotated Bibliography, New York: Garland, 1989
- Goodfriend, Joyce D., Published Diaries and Letters of American Women: An Annotated Bibliography, Boston: Hall, 1987
- Guide and Index to Women's Diaries: A Readex Microfilm Collection*, New Canaan, Connecticut: Readex, 1984– (in progress)
- Havlice, Patricia Pate, And So to Bed: A Bibliography of Diaries Published in English, Metuchen, New Jersey: Scarecrow Press, 1987
- Matthews, William, editor, British Diaries: An Annotated Bibliography of British Diaries Written Between 1442 and 1942, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1950

Further Reading

- Blodgett, Harriet, Centuries of Female Days: English Women's Private Diaries, New

- Brunswick, New Jersey: Rutgers University Press, 1988
- Fothergill, Robert A., Private Chronicles: A Study of English Diaries, London and New York: Oxford University Press, 1974
- Girard, Alain, Le Journal intime, Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1963
- Good, Graham, The Observing Self: Rediscovering the Essay, London and New York: Routledge, 1988
- Hocke, Gustav René, Das Europäische Tagebuch, Wiesbaden: Limes, 1963
- Hoffman, William J., Life Writing: A Guide to Family Journals and Personal Memoirs, New York: St. Martin's Press, 1982
- Kagle, Steven E., American Diary Literature, 1620–1799, Boston: Twayne, 1979
- Kagle, Steven E., Early Nineteenth-Century American Diary Literature, Boston: Twayne, 1986
- Kagle, Steven E., Late Nineteenth-Century American Diary Literature, Boston: Twayne, 1988
- Mallon, Thomas, A Book of One's Own: People and Their Diaries, New York: Ticknor and Fields, 1984
- Matthews, William, "The Diary as Literature," in The Diary of Samuel Pepys: Volume 1, edited by Robert Latham and Matthews, Berkeley: University of California Press, and London: Bell, 1970
- Nin, Anaïs, The Novel of the Future, New York: Macmillan, 1968
- Nussbaum, Felicity, The Autobiographical Subject: Gender and Ideology in Eighteenth-Century England, Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, revised edition, 1995 (original edition, 1989)
- O'Brien, Kate, English Diaries and Journals (Britain in Pictures series), London: Collins, 1943
- Ponsonby, Arthur, English Diaries: A Review of English Diaries from the Sixteenth to the Twentieth Century, London: Methuen, 1923
- Ponsonby, Arthur, More English Diaries: Further Reviews of Diaries from the Sixteenth to the Nineteenth Centuries, London: Methuen, 1927
- Ponsonby, Arthur, Scottish and Irish Diaries from the Sixteenth to the Nineteenth Centuries, London: Methuen, 1927
- Ponsonby, Arthur, Samuel Pepys, London: Macmillan, 1928; New York: League of America, 1929
- Ponsonby, Arthur, British Diarists, London: Benn, 1930
- Spalding, Philip Anthony, Self Harvest: A Study of Diaries and the Diarist, London: Independent Press, 1949
- Willy, Margaret, English Diarists: Evelyn and Pepys, London: Longman, 1963
- Willy, Margaret, Three Women Diarists: Celia Fiennes, Dorothy Wordsworth, Katherine Mansfield, London: Longman, 1964

Journal des Débats

French journal, 1789–1939

The Journal des Débats, Politiques et Littéraires (Journal of political and literary debates) was founded in 1789 to cover the proceedings of the National Assembly. Its name was changed to the Journal de l'Empire by Napoleon, appearing under that title through 31 March 1814, the date of the capitulation of Paris. Five days later, on 6 April, Napoleon abdicated, the Bourbon monarchy was restored in France, and the "first empire" was over. The new newspaper, using its original name and authorized by an official decree, was owned by a small group of individuals. Success was phenomenal, as the paper quickly achieved 23,000 subscribers, against 6300 for its nearest rival, La Gazette de France.

The paper's immediate demand for complete freedom of the press led speedily to the appointment of a police commissar for each newspaper. The Débats, as it soon came to be known popularly, was itself liberal-conservative, adopting the political views of Benjamin Constant, anti-Romantic in the arts, and conservative economically. Constant bravely published an outright and now famous attack on Napoleon in the Débats on 19 March 1815 during the welcoming phase of the hundred days. The paper consistently attacked the abuse of power and, on the collapse of the group surrounding the philosopher and economist Saint-Simon, welcomed refugees from his followers, successors to the old "ideologist" camp of materialistic social reformers with broad international interests. From 1833 to 1835 it published Michel Chevalier's "Lettres de l'Amérique du Nord" (Letters from North America), and on 10 May 1852 published a famous article by him against protectionism and in favor of free trade. The Débats was friendly to the English in 1857 and hostile to the Jesuits. Later on, its views were to become clearly anti-clerical.

After the sea change in French newspaper history brought about in 1836 by the simultaneous launch of Armand Dutacq's Le Siècle (The century) and Émile de Girardin's La Presse at half the ordinary subscription price, the conservatively presented Débats, with its conventional four pages of double columns, had to make concessions. Alongside the political speeches, reports of court occasions, and book and theater reviews, some column inches began to be devoted to faits divers like accidents and particularly important crimes. It also began to publish the immensely popular serial fiction which newspapers were carrying at the bottom of their front pages. The Débats was lucky enough to contract Eugène Sue, whose unbelievably successful, but at the time largely unwritten, Les Mystères de Paris (The mysteries of Paris) ran from June 1842 to October 1843, doubling the circulation from 5000 to 10,000. The office staff at the Débats had to help devise incidents to keep the plot going, as well as cliffhangers at the end of each episode, when Sue's inspiration flagged. The paper went on to publish George Sand, notably François le Champi (1848). The upmarket style and solidly bourgeois readership, of which about two-thirds came from outside Paris, enabled it to achieve an advertising revenue as high as that of Le Constitutionnel (The constitutional), which had more than double the circulation.

While the Débats was never primarily a forum for the publication of essays, Hippolyte Taine published in its pages many pieces which we would now call essays. The ex-prime minister and educational reformer François-Pierre-Guillaume Guizot also published complimentary pieces about Taine in the paper in 1857. The intellectual and cultural orientation of the paper was epitomized in its long association with both Taine and Ernest Renan, who published a collection of his essays which had first appeared in the Débats, and who once wrote in its pages, "What is needed at the moment is an intellectual and spiritual elite.”

While the newspaper was eventually a champion of fiction—contracting Balzac to write two novels for it, serializing Alexandre Dumas and Joseph-Arthur de Gobineau—it contributed above all to the steady development of the essay as a vehicle for reviewing and discussing cultural pursuits, particularly those touching on literature and the performing arts, reflecting the way in which during the 19th century the development of literacy diminished cultural dependency on drama.

The influence of the Débats remained higher than is suggested by the bare circulation figures, down to 7000 by 1880. In 1884 it took over Le Parlement (The parliament) and in 1894 began publishing morning and evening editions, retaining a staid, conservative style until World War II, when it was closed permanently.

ANTHONY LEVI

Further Reading

- Jakoby, Ruth, Das Feuilleton des “Journal des Débats” von 1814 bis 1830, ein Beitrag zur Literaturdiskussion der Restauration, Tübingen: Narr, 1988
- Mège, Francisque, Les Fondateurs du “Journal des Débats” en 1789, Paris: Faure, 1865
- Nettement, Alfred, Histoire politique, anecdotique et littéraire, du “Journal des Débats”, Paris: Echo de France, 2 vols., 1838
- Pereire, Alfred, Le “Journal des Débats” politiques et littéraires, 1814–1914, Paris: Champion, 1914

Journalism and the Essay

The relationship between the history of journalism and the evolution of the essay has intrigued theorists who venture into interdisciplinary research. For some writers, to work as journalist has been characterized either as beneficial or as a detrimental violation of literary purity. Whatever the theorists’ opinions, the list of authors who practiced journalism as a profession or as a major outlet for their literary production is lengthy and includes British writers such as Defoe, Swift, Darwin, Dickens, and Thackeray; the Americans Twain, Hemingway, and Steinbeck; the French Voltaire, Zola, Gide, Malraux, and Camus; the Spaniards Larra, Ortega y Gasset, Baroja, Unamuno, and Azorín; and the Latin Americans Sarmiento, Montalvo, Martí, Martínez Estrada, Arciniegas, García Márquez, and Vargas Llosa.

Two facts are important for textual and sociological analyses of these two genres. First, newspapers and magazines have been frequent vehicles for what history and the theory of literature consider to be essays. Rarely published in book form, many have been reprinted only in anthologies published solely for educational purposes, to give examples of the literary genre called essay. In other words, from an historical point of view, the history of the contemporary essay cannot be studied separately from the history of journalism.

Second, the textual nature of journalism in general, especially of some of its variations, reveals numerous parallels with the features outlined by critics either for the essay in general or for some of its modern transfigurations.

Ironically, both writing trades have transgressed from their declared faithful origins and goals in order to survive. In doing so, they have taken on distinctive features that had apparently belonged exclusively to the other: the essay has incorporated clarity and economy of means, while journalism has absorbed subjective literary views and techniques. In journalism, the faculties of notation, sensation, and memory take precedence over imagination and reason. In the case where the literary energy of the essay is latent, the reverse occurs. Never appearing in pure forms, these modes combine according to the personal style and inclinations of writers, columnists, investigative reporters, and editorial writers.

Whether recognized as a separate literary genre or not, the essay has benefited from its comparative treatment with canonical counterparts. The most crucial marker for differentiating the essay from the novel, short story, drama, or poetry is that only the author is to blame for the message. The essay is without the mask of narrator, characters, actors, or even the protected introspective aspect of poetry. More than the facts, argument, or thesis of the essay, it is the manner in which essayists present their materials that makes the difference in getting the reader's attention. By persuasion and, at the same time, the revelation of a human, personal side, the author aims at sharing a point of view.

In contrast, journalism developed from an initial period dominated by ideological leanings into another obsessed with objectivity. The questions "who, what, where, when" took precedence over the "how" and the "why." The golden, heroic era of informative journalism culminated in the crafting of the perfect lead-in, the initial concept, couched in a sentence or two, that would grab readers' attention and make them read on. In this antiseptic environment writers became correspondents and were glorified by the stardom supplied by the byline. However, they were subjected to deadlines and style directives prescribed by wire services and desk editors, necessitating the discipline of polishing their prose, a surgical operation necessary to attract the attention of readers who were increasingly distracted by other media developments in film, radio, and television.

Journalism then entered a more sophisticated stage. While still imbued with the clarity of language, it was further enriched by what was called in-depth reporting, which later developed into an investigative style, with an attitude toward the subject that crossed the line into the realm of interpretative journalism. While as old as literature itself, this New Journalism shattered the myth of the separation between essay and journalism.

These freestyle ruptures with the past were accompanied in the American tradition and its imitators in Europe and Latin America by two other branches of journalism. The first was made up of editorials and commentaries in the form of columns, which were fully recognized as members of the family. The second played the role of fillers, different forms of features and entertainment pieces, comics, and games, which were relegated to the supplement pages or Sunday magazines. While the editorial kept alive the flame of authoritarian, ideological journalism, the columns experienced the slow surge of a more sober, economical, specialized style practiced by pundits who stuck to the norms and limitations of their expected topics.

However, in other cultural traditions, especially in Southern Europe and Latin America, the more anarchical writers, encouraged by a freer style and anchored to the literary and political essay, enriched journalism with subgenres such as reportage and the Spanish crónica. In both cases, the pressures of limited space and the competition resulting from other media forms began to erode the freedom previously enjoyed.

Finally, this experimentation in journalism exercised an influence on the textual revolution that took place all over the world. In the past, the insertion of poetic language and dialogue had an impact on other forms of literature, such as the novel and the essay. In more recent times, techniques such as the lead-in, the economy of words, and the experience of the New Journalism have had an impact not only on the essays produced by writers, but also on their own narrative fiction.

JOAQUÍN ROY

Anthologies

The Best of the Rest: Non-Syndicated Newspaper Columnists Select Their Best Work, edited by Sam G.Riley, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1993
The Literary Journalists, edited by Norman Sims, New York: Ballantine, 1984

Further Reading

Botts, Jack, The Language of News: A Journalist's Pocket Reference, Ames: Iowa State University Press, 1994
 Cray, Ed, American Datelines, New York: Facts on File, 1990
 Roy, Joaquín, "Periodismo y ensayo," El Ensayo Hispánico (1984): 63–80
 Sims, Norman, editor, Literary Journalism in the Twentieth Century, New York: Oxford University Press, 1990
 Warren, Carl Nelson, Modern News Reporting, New York: Harper, 1951
 Weber, Ronald, Hemingway's Art of Non-Fiction, New York: St. Martin's Press, 1990

Jovellanos, Gaspar Melchor de

Spanish, 1744–1811

In Gaspar Melchor de Jovellanos' time, the word ensayo did not yet denote a literary genre; but among Jovellanos' extant works are dozens, on a great range of subjects, in essayistic genres, primarily reports, addresses, treatises, and letters, frequently products of the author's activities as magistrate or as member of one of the quasi-public learned societies. Some occupy a few pages, while a handful are of book length.

Many of these essays concern economic problems, including trade, transportation, industry, labor, and, more generally, economic development. Jovellanos' most famous work (and his only essay available in English), is the book-length Informe ...en el expediente de ley agraria (1795; Memoir on the Advancement of Agriculture and on Agrarian Laws), which analyzes obstacles to agricultural development: the physical (inadequate roads, canals, etc.), the intellectual (ignorance of science and technology), and the legal, the most serious and most interesting—laws restricting the free play of self-interest and concentrating land ownership in a few great families and the Church. In describing and attacking these laws, Jovellanos makes a forceful argument for economic liberty.

Another major work, the Memoria en defensa de la Junta Central (1811; Defense of the Central Committee), deals with the constitutional crisis brought about by the Spanish insurrection against the Bonapartes. In it Jovellanos attempts to balance his monarchical sentiments with his love of political liberty.

Several essays, including the unfinished book-length Memoria sobre educación pública (wr. 1802; Treatise on public education), express Jovellanos' belief that education is the source of individual and national prosperity and must be universal and modern, stressing natural sciences and modern languages, including the students' native language—in other words, something quite different from the traditional, classically-oriented education Jovellanos had himself received.

Also of book length are the complex of descriptive and historical essays on the major buildings of Palma de Mallorca and the surrounding countryside (wr. c. 1805–08), and the Memoria para el arreglo de la policía de los espectáculos y diversiones públicas, y sobre su origen en España (wr. 1790, pub. 1812; Essay on reform of the policy on spectacles and public entertainments, and on their origin in Spain), interesting for Spanish social history and for its enlightened policy proposals.

Jovellanos' letters to Antonio Ponz (wr. 1789), intended for publication, study the geography, agriculture, arts, and customs of his native Asturias. His Elogio de Carlos III (1789; Eulogy of Charles III) reveals how a leading partisan of the Enlightenment viewed Spanish history.

Many of Jovellanos' essays were published posthumously by admirers and scholars; but others were printed in his lifetime by the organization that received them, and Jovellanos himself published the Memoria en defensa de la Junta Central, his self-defense before public opinion. The essays often aim at two publics: the immediate addressee (government, an academy or economic society, those attending a ceremony), and, for the principal writings, a potential further readership which, limited by illiteracy and poverty, consisted chiefly of men of the middle and upper classes and of the clergy, and, within these groups, of the enlightened elite that exercised political power. Many of Jovellanos' essays are thus attempts to influence the thinking and, ultimately, the policies of the leaders of state and society. In some works Jovellanos speaks for himself; in others the formal speaking subject is the body in whose name he addresses a superior entity.

Jovellanos writes a pure and elegant prose, managing to treat even specialized and technical subjects in clear and precise language accessible to an educated public, without archaisms, neologisms, or technical jargon. His skilled effort produces an appearance of effortlessness, and the attentive reader easily discerns the neat and sometimes explicit order of development. This generally rational expository style does not exclude irony, pathos, outbursts of indignation at injustice, and animated, sometimes lyrical evocations of a heroic past or an idyllic future; but whatever his tone, Jovellanos' language is a means to the end of communication, never an end in itself.

Jovellanos' essays frequently reflect the breadth of his interests and information and his ability to view problems in several dimensions: historical, political, legal, ethical, aesthetic, and simply human. Thus the Memoir on the Advancement of Agriculture, the Espectáculos y diversiones públicas, and a report on a proposed welfare fund for the nobility (wr. 1784) explain historical background and consider the social, political, and moral consequences of reform; the descriptions of the architecture of Palma lead to imaginative re-creations of medieval scenes.

Although Jovellanos often touches on theoretical questions, he generally does so tangentially: as a rule, his essays are not disinterested theoretical speculations, but responses to specific problems or circumstances. Sharing a practical purpose in the service of the ideals of the Enlightenment, they reflect their author's faith in the possibility of progress—material, intellectual, and moral—through freedom and reason.

Though Jovellanos was a poet and dramatist, his literary reputation and his broader significance for his contemporaries and posterity rest largely on the high quality of his prose and the clarity of his thought on topics hotly debated in modern Spain: the birth of constitutional government, of economic liberalism, and of modern capitalism; the status of the Catholic Church; the nature and control of education. For nearly two centuries, Spaniards of widely divergent political persuasions have attempted to use Jovellanos' essays to support their causes. These efforts have sometimes led to anachronistic interpretations of a writer best understood as embodying the complex movement of the Enlightenment.

JOHN H.R.POLT

Biography

Baltasar Gaspar Melchor María de Jovellanos. Born 5 January 1744 in Gijón. Studied canon law at the University of Ávila, licence, 1763, and the College of San Ildefonso, University of Alcalá, degree, 1764. Appointed criminal magistrate, Seville, 1768, to the Seville magistrature, 1774, to the magistrature of Madrid, 1778–80, and to the Council of Military Orders, from 1780. Elected to the Royal Spanish Academy, 1783. Banished to Asturias for defending a friend accused of corruption, 1790–97, and commissioned to study roads and mines. Founder, Royal Asturian Institute, 1794. Minister of justice, 1797–98. Exiled again to Asturias and imprisoned on Majorca, 1801–08. Joined the Central Committee, the ruling council of the Spanish provisional government, traveling with it to Seville and Cádiz, 1808–10. Died (of pneumonia) in Puerto de Vega, Asturias, 27 November 1811.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Elogio de Carlos III, 1789

Informe...en el expediente de ley agraria, 1795; as Memoir on the Advancement of Agriculture and on Agrarian Laws, translated anonymously, in A View of Spain, vol. 4, by Alexandre de Laborde, 1809:111–315

Memoria en defensa de la Junta Central, 1811; edited by José Miguel Caso González, 1992

Memoria para el arreglo de la policía de los espectáculos y diversiones públicas, y sobre su origen en España, 1812

Carta histórico-artística sobre el edificio de la Lonja de Mallorca, 1812

Memorias históricas sobre el Castillo de Bellver en la isla de Mallorca, 1813

Cartas del viaje de Asturias (Cartas a Ponz), edited by José Miguel Caso González, 1981

Other writings: poetry, plays, diaries, and correspondence.

Collected works editions: Colección de varias obras en prosa y verso, edited by Ramón María Cañedo, 7 vols., 1830–32; Obras publicadas e inéditas, edited by Cándido Nocedal and Miguel Artola, 5 vols., 1858–1956; Obras completas, edited by José Miguel Caso González, 6 vols., 1984–94 (in progress).

Bibliographies

Rick, Lilian L., Bibliografía crítica de Jovellanos (1901–1976), Oviedo: University of Oviedo, 1977

Somoza de Montsoriú, Julio, Inventario de un jovellanista, Madrid: Sucesores de Rivadeneyra, 1901

Further Reading

Caso González, José Miguel, Vida y obra de Jovellanos, Gijón: Caja de Asturias and El Comercio, 2 vols., 1993

Ceán Bermúdez, Juan Agustín, Memorias para la vida del Excmo. Señor D. Gaspar Melchor de Jovellanos, y noticias analíticas de sus obras, Madrid: Fuentenebro, 1814

Del Río, Ángel, “Jovellanos,” in Historia general de las literaturas hispánicas, vol. 4, pt. 1, edited by Guillermo Díaz-Plaja, Barcelona: Barna, 1956

Galino Carrillo, María Ángeles, Tres hombres y un problema: Feijóo, Sarmiento y Jovellanos ante la educación moderna, Madrid: CSIC, 1953

Helman, Edith, Trasmundo de Goya, Madrid: Revista de Occidente, 1963

Ilie, Paul, “Picturesque Beauty in Spain and England: Aesthetic Rapports Between Jovellanos and Gilpin,” Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism 19 (1960):167–74

Polt, John H.R., Jovellanos and His English Sources: Economic, Philosophical, and Political Writings, Philadelphia: Transactions of the American Philosophical Society, 1964

Polt, John H.R., “Jovellanos y la educación,” in El P. Feijoo y su siglo, Oviedo: Cuadernos de la Cátedra Feijoo, 1966:315–38

Polt, John H.R., Gaspar Melchor de Jovellanos, New York: Twayne, 1971

Varela, Javier, Jovellanos, Madrid: Alianza, 1988

Jünger, Ernst

German, 1895–

Severe rigidity and anti-Modernism are characteristics often attributed to Ernst Jünger's writing (by friends and foes alike, indeed sometimes by the author himself). However, the opposite is true: few writers of our century have shown an equal passion for understanding modernity and exploring its inner workings. At the same time, Jünger's writing is permeated by the spirit of the essay, with its continuous revisions and open options. Little of his enormous body of work (written over no less than 80 years) can escape the label of essay, even though much of it appeared under the form of the novel, short story, or diary.

Throughout his career Jünger's favorite vehicle has remained the collection of fragments in which short narrative episodes, aphorisms (or longer reflexions), reproductions of dreams, philosophical comments, presentations of readings, natural descriptions, and other forms elbow one another and constitute a kind of subtle counterpoint. Jünger's preferred position has most often been that of the cool and dispassionate outsider, always capable of describing objectively things small and large, as well as placing the ideal values of the spirit above the incidents of sociohistorical process.

To maintain this stance Jünger resorted to two main strategies. The first was to place in his hierarchy of values attention, precision, and the relentless gaze above other values such as compassion or outrage. The second was to give preferential treatment to the symptom as a central part of existence; several times in his works Jünger argues that it is only through a thorough and accurate grasp of the surface that we can reach the core of any phenomenon. He also sometimes describes this attention to surface and symptoms as the "stereoscopic gaze." To some extent this brings Jünger close to his contemporaries Theodor W.Adorno, and particularly Walter Benjamin, despite vast ideological differences.

Jünger liked to make himself the object of observation. He did so in war diaries when he tried to gain self-detachment and note human reactions under circumstances of extreme violence and danger, as well as during his extensive experiments with a variety of hallucinogenic drugs, chemical as well as natural. Even more frequent was his habit of jotting down and describing in great detail his oneiric experiences. In this sense Jünger's passion for entomological (and sometimes botanical) pursuits is easy to understand. The orderly and wellstructured world of insects and other small beings can be grasped in both its individuality and its wholeness, and treated with benevolent neutrality.

Jünger ran into intense hostility when he tried to apply the same kind of noncommittal attention to the historical and social world: he was accused of coldness and inhuman indifference, if not of encouraging violence and suffering. This is vastly exaggerated. It is more apposite to say that Jünger was trying to place human history inside the framework of natural and cosmic history—a tradition that goes back to the 17th and 18th centuries. He described himself not as an anarchist, but as an "anarch," one who strives to preserve by all means his autonomy of thought and his independence in the face of historical trends and the consensus of majorities.

Jünger's essay style was schooled on Lichtenberg, Schopenhauer, and Nietzsche, but even more on the tradition of the French 17th- and 18th-century "moralistes." He prefers cutting, oracular statements, surprising metaphorical associations, and indulging in breviloquence: his essays seem to progress by successively stepping from stone to stone in a stream, avoiding explanation and continuity. Readers are expected to ponder and unravel the meanings and connotations of an enigmatic or metaphorical laconic statement, encouraged by Jünger's limpid and exact use of language, glittering in carefully devised multiple facets.

Jünger uses the essay in a highly personal way. For him it is the best vehicle for making judgments on the ways of the world, as well as a means of preserving the dignity of personal human independence in the face of sweeping and all-encompassing statistical tides. The essay is seen as a way of circling around a timeless pattern of reality, and is thus also a channel of communication with transcendence. In an environment that appears post-religious or uncertain about the divine, the essay can play with the mythical at the interface of immanence and transcendence without committing itself to any specific religious structure. Similarly, the orders of tradition and the centrifugal impulses of the individual seem to find a chance for cohabitation primarily in the essay. It is owing to these thoughtful propositions, rather than by any ideological inclination, that Jünger came to appeal to his diverse readership.

VIRGIL NEMOIANU

Biography

Born 29 March 1895 in Heidelberg. Grew up in Hannover, where he studied at school, 1901–13. Joined the French Foreign Legion briefly, 1913. Volunteer with the German army during World War I, serving on the Western Front, 1914–18: granted the Pour le Mérite order for bravery, September 1918. Officer in the Reichswehr, 1919–23. Studied biology in Leipzig and Naples, 1923–26, and eventually became a well-known entomologist: a number of insect species bear his name. Married Gretha von Jeinsen, 1925 (died, 1960): two sons (one died). Contributor to radical right-wing journals, including Standarte (Standard), Arminius, Widerstand (Resistance), Die Kommenden (Future generations), and Der Vormarsch (The advance), 1925–31; freelance writer, from 1927. Lived in Berlin, from 1927, Goslar, 1933–36, Überlingen, 1936–39, Kirchhorst, 1939–48, Ravensburg, 1948–50, and Wiflingen, from 1950. Turned down offer to head the Nazi Writers' Union, 1933. Captain during World War II: dishonorably discharged for participation in anti-Nazi activities, 1944. Banned from publishing his work, 1945–49. Traveled extensively in the 1950s and 1960s. Coeditor, Antaios journal, 1959–71. Married Liselotte Lohrer, 1962. Awards: several, including the Immermann Prize, 1964; Humboldt Society Gold Medal, 1981; Goethe Prize, 1982; honorary degree from the University of Bilbao. Great Order of Merit (Federal Republic of Germany), 1959.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Der Kampf als inneres Erlebnis, 1922; revised edition, 1926

Das abenteuerliche Herz: Aufzeichnungen bei Tag und Nacht, 1929; revised edition, 1938

Der Arbeiter: Herrschaft und Gestalt, 1932

Blätter und Steine, 1934

Geheimnisse der Sprache: Zwei Essays, 1934

Der Friede, 1945; as The Peace, translated by Stuart O.Hood, 1948

Über die Linie, 1950

Der Waldgang, 1951

Der gordische Knoten, 1953

Das Sanduhrbuch, 1954

An der Zeitmauer, 1959

Der Weltstaat: Organismus und Organisation, 1960

Sgraffiti, 1960

Typus; Name; Gestalt, 1963

Grenzgänge, 1966

Subtile Jagden, 1967

Ad Hoc, 1970

Annäherungen: Drogen und Rausch, 1970

Sinn und Bedeutung: Ein Figurenspiel, 1971

Zahlen und Götter; Philemon und Baucis: Zwei Essays, 1974

Flugträume (selections), 1983

Autor und Autorschaft, 1984

Die Schere, 1990

Other writings: several novels and long short stories (including Das Wäldchen 125 [Copse 125], 1925; Afrikanische Spiele, 1936; Auf den Marmorklippen [On the Marble Cliffs], 1939 (published unofficially); Heliopolis, 1949; Gläserne Bienen [The Glass Bees], 1957; Die Zwillie, 1973; Eumeswil, 1977; Aladins Problem [Aladdin's Problem], 1983; Eine gefährliche Begegnung, 1985), diaries, and works on politics, travel, and scientific inquiries.

Collected works editions: Werke, 10 vols., 1960–65; Sämtliche Werke, 18 vols., 1978–83.

Bibliographies

Coudres, Hans Peter des, and Horst Mühleisen, Bibliographie der Werke Ernst Jüngers, Stuttgart: Klett, 1970; revised edition, 1985

Paetel, Karl O., Ernst Jünger: Eine Bibliographie, Stuttgart: Klett, 1953

Further Reading

- Bohrer, Karl-Heinz, Die Ästhetik des Schreckens, Munich and Vienna: Hanser, 1978
- Bullock, Marcus Paul, The Violent Eye: Ernst Jünger's Visions and Revisions on the European Right, Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1992
- Kaempfer, Wolfgang, Ernst Jünger, Stuttgart: Metzler, 1981
- Koslowski, Peter, Der Mythos der Moderne: Die dichterische Philosophie Ernst Jüngers, Munich: Fink, 1991
- Loose, Gerhard, Ernst Jünger, New York: Twayne, 1974
- Meyer, Martin, Ernst Jünger, Munich: Hanser, 1990
- Schwarz, Hans Peter, Der konservative Anarchist: Politik und Zeitkritik Ernst Jüngers, Freiburg: Herder, 1962

K

Kamo no Chōmei

Japanese, 1155?–1216

As one of the three great essayists in the tradition of classical Japanese literature, Kamo no Chōmei occupies a median in style, sensibility, and time between the other two exemplars of the zuihitsu genre—the Makura no sōshi (Pillow Book) of Sei Shōnagon and the Tsurezuregusa (Essays in Idleness) of Kenkō. In sentiment lying somewhere between the aristocratic delicacy of the former and the rapid delight in life found in the latter, the Hōjōki (1212.; An Account of My Hut) is both simple and complex, a unique mingling of style and wit in the tradition of Japanese prose. Yet during his lifetime Chōmei held greater renown for two other works that reflect not only his wide literary skill and interest, but the two primary influences on his prose—classical poetry and a deep Buddhist piety—which permeate the whole of his principal and most prized work.

Mumyōshō (1210?; A treatise with no name) is a subtle and joyous work, representing the culmination of Chōmei's many years spent among the poetic circles of the Imperial Court. Both a study of late Heian poetics and a personal—even chatty—recollection of personalities, places, and poem-banquets, this earlier work is in many respects a look backwards to the bright, elegant world of Shōnagon and the classical era of Japanese prose. Chōmei's skill as a poet is quite obvious—although clearly not the equal of his contemporaries Teika and Shunzei; his love of old diction and fresh images is evident in his surviving poems, and it is this mingling of old and new that becomes most manifest in the prose of An Account of My Hut. Another work written in parallel with An Account of My Hut, the Hosshinshū (12.14?; Collected tales of awakened faith), an unorthodox collection of Buddhist tales of religious enlightenment, is pervaded with Chōmei's own reflections of his faith. While the work should not be considered a standard Japanese essay as such, nor even typical of the compilations of his day, the masterful touches of the author are unmistakable: quick, almost fluid phrasing, a keen eye for details interior and exterior, and a passionate resignation lurking behind every sentence.

Chōmei's reputation as an essayist, however, is due to the high substance and style of An Account of My Hut, a collocation best expressed in the single word mujō (impermanence). Just as the famous opening line bursts into syntactic flow—"The river's flow never ends, its waters never stay the same; bubbles appear and vanish, floating among the pools, never resting: just so our world of men and their dwellings"—the supple strength of his words serves as a wellspring for the entire work, a prolonged meditation on the ceaseless flux between the human and natural worlds. Writing in seclusion, in a hermit's small grass hut far from the political and aristocratic intrigues of the capital, Chōmei strives for a distinct degree of separation from the "floating world" of the court; his wariness at the uncertainty of human affairs is echoed in the loose, almost unconnected structure of the work and the pessimistic tone of his observations. In the miniature world of his hermitage, true pleasure emerges only from observation of the transience of nature or from the joys of aesthetic creation: playing at his harp or pondering over a line of verse. This disdain for the practical aspects of life—and the essay—is central to Chōmei's world; neither art, word, nor nature is for the sake of instruction or the transmission of absolute truth. The phrased rapids of An Account of My Hut wander through relative mountains and valleys of human experience, only to vanish into an endless, all-encompassing ocean of silence and shadow. His view of human fate is not mere pessimism: he seeks the tranquil promise of the contemplative life and the slow pursuit of artistic and spiritual perfection. At the essay's end, Chōmei sets aside his brush—but only for a moment, for his verbal peregrinations, fixed in ink, have made him into an immortal member of the Japanese canon.

Apart from the poetic currents of his day, there are two distinct influences on Chōmei's work: the prose of his Japanese predecessor Sei Shōnagon, and the semi-versified essays of the Chinese fu genre. The former, writing more than 200 years before Chōmei, endows him in no small part with her gift for wry observation and short, elegant phrases; his debt becomes particularly clear in his austere, uncluttered language, especially when compared with his contemporaries. From the Chinese literati such as Su Shi he absorbs both the loose structures and the poetic fancies of the fu, a literary form prone to limpid language and evanescent sensations. With these two disparate traditions of the essay before him, Chōmei fuses them to create a new style for the Japanese essayist: personal yet detached, intimate in emotion yet oblique in thought. His legacy to the essayists that follow is immense; Kenkō, among many others, is unimaginable without the lasting force of Chōmei's observations of the transient world made permanent in a liquid tangle of tears and ink.

JOHN PAVEL KEHLEN

Biography

Born in 1155? Brought up in Kyoto; had a classical education. Played the lute and wrote poetry for the court; involved with poetry circles connected to the Emperor Go-Toba (who held the throne, 1183–98); invited to be a Fellow of the Bureau of Poetry, 1201. Took Buddhist orders and retired from court to a hermitage on Mt. Ohara, near Kyoto; later moved to Mt. Hino, where he lived in his "ten-foot square hut." Died in 1216.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Hōjōki, edited by Miki Sumito, 1976, and Satake Akihiro and Kubota Jun, 1989; as Notes from a Ten Feet Square Hut, translated by F. Victor Dickins, 1907; as The Ten Foot Square Hut, translated by A. L. Sadler, 1928; as The Hō-jō-ki: Private Papers of Kamo-no-Chōmei, of the Ten Foot Square Hut, translated by Itakura Junji, 1935; as An Account of My Hut, translated by Donald Keene, in Anthology of Japanese Literature: From the Earliest Era to the Mid-Nineteenth Century, 1955; as Notebook of a Ten Square Rush-Mat Sized World, translated by Thomas Rowe and Anthony Kerrigan, 1979; as Hōjōki, Visions of a Torn World, translated by Moriguchi Yasuhiko and David Jenkins, 1996

Hosshinshū, edited by Miki Sumito, 1976; as The Hosshinshū, partially translated by Marian Ury (dissertation), 1965

Mumyōshō, edited by Yanase Kazuo, 1980, and Takahashi Kazuhiko, 1987

Other writings: poetry.

Collected works edition: Kamo no Chōmei zenshu, edited by Yanase Kazuo, 2 vols., 1940.

Further Reading

Hare, Thomas Blenman, “Reading Kamo no Chōmei,” Harvard Journal of Asiatic Studies 49 (June 1989):173–228

Katō, H., “The Mumyōshō of Kamo no Chōmei and Its Significance in Japanese Literature,” Monumenta Nipponica 23, nos. 3–4 (1968):321–430

LaFleur, William R., “Inns and Hermitages: The Structure of Impermanence,” in his The Karma of Words: Buddhism and the Literary Arts in Medieval Japan, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1983:60–79

Kant, Immanuel

German, 1724–1804

Immanuel Kant’s essays played a decisive role in defining the philosophical and political meaning of “enlightenment.” Indeed Kant developed the critical-philosophical essay as the very site where the process of “enlightenment” occurs. Prior to the Kritik der reinen Vernunft (1781; Critique of Pure Reason)—i.e. in his “pre-critical” period—Kant was known in Germany primarily for his writings on natural science, metaphysics, and psychology. His early essays—which he frequently titled Versuch (“essay,” “attempt,” “experiment”)—examine questions of both physics and metaphysics with one purpose: the attempt to redefine the method and presumptions of theoretical science. Kant strove to revolutionize philosophy the way Newton had revolutionized natural science. In the brevity and openness of the essay form he found a literary means to challenge the dogmatic method and stale language of scholasticism.

Whether discussing proofs of God, mathematical negation, or mental derangement, Kant’s early essays aim less at exhaustive demonstration than at providing “just small beginnings, which is how it goes if one wants to open up new perspectives—that may, however, bring about important consequences.” Although their scholarly nature limits his audience primarily to his peers, Kant’s essays address themselves to readers who have “a universal perspective,” and he never hesitates to deride “scholarly nonsense” when it impedes free philosophical inquiry (Versuch, den Begriff der negativen Grössen in die Weltweisheit einzuführen [1763; “Attempt to Introduce the Concept of Negative Magnitudes into Philosophy”]). Kant’s popular literary aspirations are also evident when he hopes his results will prove “just as charming as they are instructive” (Beobachtungen über das Gefühl des Schönen und Erhabenen [1764; Observations on the Feeling of the Beautiful and the Sublime]).

Stylistically the pre-critical essays take their cue not only from the scholastic precision of Leibniz and Wolff but also from Montaigne’s erudite versatility and Rousseau’s incisive moral fervor. Kant cautions against the seductive style of French authors but admires the “Swiss” Rousseau. Likewise he draws upon the ironic wit of English writers—Swift, Sterne, and Samuel Butler—not as an end in itself but as a means of provoking understanding. Irony thus takes on an epistemological function. In the stylistically most accomplished and theoretically most daring essay of this period, Träume eines Geistersehers, erläutert durch Träume der Metaphysik (1766; Dreams of a Spirit-Seer, Elucidated Through Dreams of Metaphysics), Kant explores the related subjects of spiritualism and metaphysics with an irony so pervasive that it turns on the essay itself, and he predicts of his reader: “the bulk of it he will not understand, parts of it he will not believe, and as for the rest—he will dismiss it with scornful laughter.” Yet this ironic laughter, for Kant, is the beginning of critical thinking.

Kant uses the essay form to experiment with literary-philosophical modes of reflection that question the theoretical presuppositions of knowledge itself. This method comes to fruition in the revolutionary achievement of the first Critique (1781). Despite its seemingly monolithic, “architectonic” structure, the work can be read in terms of essayistic style: but now it is the process of thinking itself that must be understood—in other words “criticized”—as a series of “attempts” to transcend its own limitations. When knowledge can be grounded only through such a self-critical articulation of its possibility, the medium of thinking essentially becomes this form of “critique.” As the site where the transcendental turn is first inscribed as such, the essay is thus transformed into the privileged vehicle for Kant’s “transcendental style” (Willi Goetschel, 1994).

The essays of Kant’s “critical” period—published in the 1780s and 1790s—combine the self-conscious irony of his early writing with the tools of rational self-criticism developed in the Critiques. In their application of a critical method grounded in “pure” reason these essays achieve a tone of profound self-assurance and even idealistic conviction. At times this also leads to a presumptive sort of rigor that can be extremely demanding to the reader unfamiliar with the Critiques. Thus while Schopenhauer praises Kant’s “brilliant dryness,” Nietzsche is unforgiving of his “bulky pedantry”—an opinion that has endured, perhaps unfairly, into the present.

Even after developing the critical method Kant continues to exploit the formal possibilities of the essay as a means of examining implications that lead beyond scientific truth. His titles indicate genre experiments: a useful but unprovable “idea” of universal history whose goal is a “cosmopolitan” republic; a “conjectural” interpretation of Genesis as an allegory of rational freedom; and a “sketch” of the “articles” of right that could lead to “perpetual peace.” His unflinching concern in these essays is the rationality of moral judgment and the teleological necessity of human freedom in history. The inherently provisional, inventive quality of essayistic expression for Kant mirrors the dialectical potential of the “idea” itself: as a mode of thinking—and writing—that only posits knowledge theoretically insofar as it enacts it practically.

Kant’s mature essays seek to establish and delimit a public sphere of free discourse, an intellectual “culture” that will contribute inevitably to the progress of enlightenment. The concept of public dialogue becomes the intrinsic principle in his understanding of the essay form. Thus in pieces like “Was ist Aufklärung?” (1784; “What Is Enlightenment?”) and “Was heisst: Sich im Denken orientieren?” (1786; “What Does It Mean: To Orient One’s Self in Thinking?”), Kant does not simply provide answers. Rather, these essays are interventions that seek to formulate the very possibility of a discourse in which such questions can occur: “But how much and how accurately would we think if we did not think, so to speak, in community with others to whom we communicate our thoughts and who communicate their thoughts to us!” For Kant, the essay is not merely a privileged forum for philosophical reflection on questions of political and moral progress; it is, in fact, the objective form of that progress.

ERIC SCHWAB

Biography

Born 22 April 1724 in Königsberg. Studied at the Collegium Fredericianum for eight years; physics and mathematics at the University of Königsberg, 1740–47. Private tutor; adjunct assistant professor, from 1755, and chair of logic and philosophy, from 1770, University of Königsberg. Also worked as assistant librarian in the royal castle. Lived alone and kept to a strict routine, which included an hour-long daily walk after lunch. Awards: Royal Academy of Science (Berlin) Award, 1754. Died in Königsberg, 12, February 1804.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Gedanken von der wahren Schätzung der lebendigen Kräfte und Beurtheilung der Beweise, deren sich Leibnitz und andere Mechaniker in dieser Streitsache bedient haben, nebst einigen vorhergehenden Betrachtungen, welche die Kraft der Körper überhaupt betreffen, 1747

Allgemeine Naturgeschichte und Theorie des Himmels, oder Versuch von der Verfassung und dem mechanischen Ursprunge des ganzen Weltgebäudes, nach Newton’schen Grundsätzen abgehandelt, 1755; as Universal Natural History and Theory of the Heavens, translated by William Hastie, 1969, and Stanley L.Jaki, 1981

Principiorum primorum cognitionis metaphysicae nova delucidatio, 1755; as “A New Exposition of the First Principles of Metaphysical Knowledge,” translated by John A.Reuscher, in Latin Writings, edited by Lewis White Beck, 1986

Versuch einiger Betrachtungen über den Optimismus, 1759

- Gedanken bei dem frühzeitigen Ableben des Herrn Johann Friedrich von Funck, in einem Sendschreiben an seine Mutter*, 1760
- Die falsche Spitzfindigkeit der vier syllogistischen Figuren erwiesen*, 1762; as “On the Mistaken Subtlety of the Four Syllogistic Figures,” translated by Thomas K. Abbott, in his Kant’s Introduction to Logic, 1885
- Der einzig mögliche Beweisgrund zu einer Demonstration des Daseins Gottes*, 1762; as The Only Possible Ground for a Demonstration of the Existence of God, translated by G.B. Kerferd and D.W. Walford, 1968
- Versuch, den Begriff der negativen Grössen in die Weltweisheit einzuführen*, 1763
- Beobachtungen über das Gefühl des Schönen und Erhabenen*, 1764; as Observations on the Feeling of the Beautiful and the Sublime, translated by John T. Goldthwait, 1960
- Träume eines Geistersehers, erläutert durch Träume der Metaphysik*, 1766; as Dreams of a Spirit-Seer, Elucidated Through Dreams of Metaphysics, translated by Emanuel P. Goerwitz, 1900
- De mundi sensibilis atque intelligibilis forma et principiis*, 1770; as “On the Form and Principles of the Sensible and the Intelligible World,” translated by John Handyside, revised by Lewis White Beck, in Latin Writings, 1986
- Kritik der reinen Vernunft*, 1781; revised edition, 1787; as Critique of Pure Reason, translated by J.M.D. Meiklejohn, 1855, and Norman Kemp Smith, 1929
- Prolegomena zu einer jeden künftigen Metaphysik, die als Wissenschaft wird auftreten können*, 1783; as Prolegomena to Every Future Metaphysic, translated by John Richardson, 1819; as Prolegomena to Any Future Metaphysic, translated by Lewis White Beck, 1950; as Prolegomena to Any Future Metaphysics That Will Be Able to Present Itself as a Science, translated by P. G. Lucas, 1953
- Grundlegung zur Metaphysik der Sitten*, 1785; revised edition, 1786; as The Moral Law, and as Groundwork of the Metaphysics of Morals, translated by H.J. Paton, 1948
- Metaphysische Anfangsgründe der Naturwissenschaft*, 1786; as Metaphysical Foundations of Natural Science, translated by James Ellington, 1970
- Kritik der praktischen Vernunft*, 1788; as Critique of Practical Reason, translated by Lewis White Beck, in Critique of Practical Reason and Other Writings in Moral Philosophy, 1949
- Kritik der Urteilskraft*, 1790; as Critique of Judgement, translated by John Henry Bernard, 1891; revised edition, 1914; as Critique of Aesthetic Judgement, translated by James C. Meredith, 1911, and Critique of Teleological Judgement, 1928, and together as Critique of Judgement, 1957; as Critique of Judgment, translated by Werner S. Pluhar, 1987
- Die Religion innerhalb der Grenzen der blossen Vernunft*, 1793; as Religion Within the Limits of Reason Alone, translated by Theodore M. Greene and Hoyt H. Hudson, 1934; revised edition by John R. Silber, 1960
- Zum ewigen Frieden: Ein philosophischer Entwurf*, 1795; enlarged edition, 1796; as Perpetual Peace, translated by Lewis White Beck, 1957
- Die Metaphysik der Sitten*, 2 vols., 1797; part of vol. 1 as The Metaphysical Elements of Justice, translated by J. Ladd, 1965; vol. 2 as The Doctrine of Virtue, translated by M.J. Gregor, 1964, and as The Metaphysical Principles of Virtue, translated by J. Ellington, 1964
- Der Streit der Fakultäten in drey Abschnitten*, 1798; part as “The Contest of the Faculties,” translated by H.B. Nisbet, in Political Writings, 1970
- Anthropologie in pragmatischer Hinsicht*, 1798; as Anthropology from a Pragmatic Point of View, translated by M.J. Gregor, 1974

- Essays and Treatises on Moral, Political, and Various Philosophical Subjects*, translated by John Richardson, 2 vols., 1798; reprinted, 1993
- Logik: Ein Handbuch zu Vorlesungen*, edited by G.B.Jäsche, 1800; as Kant's Logic, translated by R.S.Hartman and W.Schwartz, 1974
- Critique of Practical Reason and Other Writings in Moral Philosophy*, translated by Lewis White Beck, 1949
- Kant on History*, translated by Lewis White Beck, 1963
- Political Writings*, edited by Hans Reiss, translated by H.B.Nisbet, 1970
- Was ist Aufklärung? Aufsätze zur Geschichte und Philosophie*, edited by Jürgen Zehbe, 1975
- Perpetual Peace, and Other Essays on Politics, History, and Morals*, translated by Ted Humphrey, 1983
- Latin Writings* (various translators), edited by Lewis White Beck, 1986
- Raising the Tone in Philosophy: Late Essays by Immanuel Kant, Transformative Critique by Jacques Derrida*, edited and translated by Peter Fenves, 1993
- Collected works editions: Gesammelte Schriften (Prussian Academy of Sciences Edition), 23 vols., 1902–55; The Cambridge Edition of the Works, general editors Paul Guyer and Allen W.Wood, 1992– (in progress; 14 vols. projected).

Bibliographies

- Adickes, Erich, German Kantian Bibliography, Würzburg: Liebing, 1967 (original edition, 1896)
- Gabel, Gernot U., Immanuel Kant: Eine Bibliographie der Dissertationen aus den deutschsprachigen Ländern, 1900–1975, Hamburg: Gemini, 1980
- Walker, Ralph C.S., A Selective Bibliography on Kant, Oxford: Oxford University Sub-Faculty of Philosophy, 2nd edition, 1978 (original edition, 1975)

Further Reading

- Cassirer, Ernst, Rousseau, Kant, Goethe, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1970 (original edition, 1945)
- Galay, Jean-Louis, Philosophie et invention textuelle: Essai sur la poétique d'un texte kantien, Paris: Klincksieck, 1977
- Goetschel, Willi, Constituting Critique: Kant's Writing as Critical Praxis, Durham, North Carolina: Duke University Press, 1994
- McCarthy, John A., "The Philosopher as Essayist: Leibniz and Kant," in The Philosopher as Writer: The Eighteenth Century, edited by Robert Ginsberg, Selinsgrove, Pennsylvania: Susquehanna University Press, 1987:48–74
- Reiss, Hans, Introduction and Postscript to Political Writings by Kant, edited by Reiss, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991 (original edition, 1970)

Kenkō

Japanese, c. 1283–c. 1352.

Asked to identify the foremost essay in the Japanese tradition, most educated Japanese are likely to recite the opening line of Tsurezuregusa (wr. c. 1319 to as late as 1350; Essays in Idleness). This work by Kenkō, a recluse and poet, has been exploited by pedagogues since the late 16th century. The subject of diverse commentaries thereafter, it was, in the 17th century, first punctuated and divided into a preface and 243 sections, some as short as one sentence, the longest no more than a half dozen pages in modern editions. Essays in Idleness was evidently not circuiated during its author's lifetime. This and the anomalous organization of the text were accounted for by the apocryphal story that the servant of a warrior-poet found the segments pasted to the walls of Kenkō's hermitage after his death. The putative location at Yoshida also gave rise to the misnomer "Yoshida Kenkō."

The work's popularity has perhaps been enhanced less by the stern tone in passages exhorting us to practice the Buddhist Way and more by such figures as the volatile high priest, sketched in his rapid progress from being nicknamed after his nettle tree, then after the stump left when he cut down the tree in anger, and finally by the hole left when he dug up the stump. As literacy and printing spread in the 1600s, Kenkō became one of the best-known authors, portrayed as a sage by some, accepted in spite of his inconsistencies by the more practical, and converted into a wag in stage plays and satires, while his work spawned numerous imitations with similar titles.

Like Sei Shōnagon, whose Makura no sōshi (The Pillow Book) he read and imitated in part, Kenkō was a low-ranking member of the aristocracy. His early readership, chiefly poetpriests like himself, appreciated most his fusion of the Buddhist understanding of impermanence with aesthetic appreciation. Kenkō responded to unstable times as no lyric writer before him had, not simply lamenting but acknowledging changes in the world. He shared the classical prejudice that the court at Kyoto was the sum of what was desirable in life, but was curious about the ways of the less cultured East, which he had visited. In Essays in Idleness, Kenkō deplores the insinuation of soldiers into a ritual at the imperial palace, yet approves of a ferocious warrior for declaring that people who do not have children cannot understand human pathos.

Kenkō's essay style incorporates subtle reframings of multiple genres, including narrative (monogatari), memoir, journal, poetic criticism, aphorism, Buddhist homily, admonition, court manual, and oral anecdote (setsuwa). Examples of the last include the crowd which pursues a woman reputed to be a demon and collapses into fistfights when the search proves fruitless; a father who will not give his daughter in marriage because she eats only chestnuts; a priest who is so singleminded that he cannot distinguish the word "horse's leg" from a Buddhist spell. Yet such anecdotes do not furnish platitudinous morals, for Kenkō's interpretative comments are often oblique or nonexistent. Moving freely from topic to topic, Kenkō dares us to accept his words (he is skeptical of much worldly talk), and defies us to form stable conclusions.

The opening line or preface tells of sitting in front of an inkstone all day long, giving in to tedium (tsurezure, the source of much vernacular prose), and scribbling trifles that occur to him until he senses absurdity. Such an apology is typical of medieval writers, who deny their overt authority in order to pull readers into closer engagement with the text. A reader of Essays in Idleness must supply logical links and otherwise enter into active dialogue with a reticent yet highly rhetorical Kenkō, who both plays upon and disappoints ordinary reactions. Even his most dogmatic passages advising swift renunciation of the world anticipate the reader's responses, while ignoring their incompatibility with his intermittent bursts of celebration of everyday life.

Kenkō is often compared to Castiglione or Montaigne. Kenkō's "good person" is one who "glances sidelong" at things, avoiding directness, a courtly but also contemplative stance. Unlike Montaigne, self-exposure is not his aim (however much it is achieved); he prefers to serve as an ironic foil to tales of self-mastery. Repeatedly hailing the role of experts, and deriding the human tendency toward waste, he relates how he once impressed a crowd at a racetrack by pointing out their similarity to a priest precariously dozing in a tree above them. Surely everyone needs to awaken to the futility of such things as equestrian entertainment, he exclaims. The chastened crowd ushers Kenkō to the front row.

The unsettling effect of his juxtapositions and incompleteness is the purpose of the essays. It is in his capturing of the aesthetic virtues of impermanence, next to karma the most influential Buddhist concept for the Japanese, that Kenkō made his prime contribution. The moon is gorgeous, but most valuable when clouds intervene to remind us how short our time is, or when we are shut inside and can only imagine its perfection. He leans heavily on the tradition of viewing the aesthetic object as he leads us through the gardens of beautiful young men and sensitive ladies, but never with full disclosure of anything except the fact that these paragons are now just memories.

Kenkō was a significant poet in his day, but historically he is remembered as a prose master. Each section is written in an appropriate style, whether an agglutinative, lyric Japanese in imitation of women's classics, a terse rendition of Taoist mysteries, crisp notes redolent of Chinese Confucian attitudes, or a hybrid Sino-Japanese for Buddhist thoughts. A professional in court ceremony, he frequently includes matters of custom or untangles teachings on culturally momentous points. His strong desire to preserve aristocratic culture in the face of a belief that change is inevitable is one of many contradictions animating the text.

Although many picture Kenkō as the worldly bonze (poetpriest) dispensing advice in a unified "guidebook of life," Essays in Idleness is on another level a guide to the instability and insubstantiality of life, a plea not to form and impose the self on the world (or the text) but to contemplate the fact that all forms are nugatory phantoms. As he quotes a man the world laughed at, "If you love life, you should love death." The essay lives by dying one word at a time.

LINDA H.CHANCE

Biography

Cognomen Yoshida; also known as Yoshida Kaneyoshi. Born Urabe Kaneyoshi, c. 1283 in Kyoto. Served in the Kyoto court as a youth. Entered the lay Buddhist priesthood as early as 1313, and thereafter attempted to live a life of refined detachment. Traveled widely, eventually settling in the Narabigaoka suburb of Kyoto. Died possibly in Iga province, c. 1352.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Tsurezuregusa, edited by Yasuraoka Koosaku, 2 vols., 1967–68, and Kubota Jun, in Hōjōki, Tsurezuregusa, 1989; as Meditations of a Recluse, translated by G.B.Sansom, 1911, and C.E.Eby (bilingual edition), 1934; as Idle Thoughts of a Recluse, translated by T.Wakameda, 1914; as The Miscellany of a Japanese Priest, translated by William N.Porter, 1914; as The Harvest of Leisure, translated by Ryukichi Kurata, 1931; as Essays in Idleness, translated by Donald Keene, 1967, and Steven D.Carter, in Classical Japanese Prose: An Anthology, edited by Helen Craig McCullough, 1990
Other writings: poetry.

Further Reading

- Carter, Steven D., Introduction to Waiting for the Wind: Thirty-Six Poets of Japan's Late Medieval Age, edited by Carter, New York: Columbia University Press, 1989
- Chance, Linda H., Formless in Form: Kenkō, Tsurezuregusa, and the Rhetoric of Japanese Fragmentary Prose, Stanford, California: Stanford University Press, 1997
- Chance, Linda H., "Constructing the Classic: Tsurezuregusa in Tokugawa Readings," Journal of the American Oriental Society 117, no. 1 (1997)
- Ishigami Iagolnitzer, Mitchiko, "L'Homme devant la vie et la mort selon Kenkō et Montaigne: Essai de philosophie comparée," Bulletin de la Société des Amis de Montaigne 21–22 (1985): 43–53
- Keene, Donald, "Japanese Aesthetics," Philosophy East and West 19, no. 3 (July 1969):293–306
- Keene, Donald, "Kenkō: Essays in Idleness (Tsurezuregusa)," in Approaches to the Asian Classics, edited by William Theodore de Bary and Irene Bloom, New York: Columbia University Press, 1990:310–19
- Marra, Michele, "Semi-Recluses (tonseisha) and Impermanence (mujō): Kamo no Chōmei and Urabe Kenkō," Japanese Journal of Religious Studies 11, no. 4 (December 1984):313–50
- Marra, Michele, "The Ideal Court: Kenkō's Search for Meaning," in his The Aesthetics of Discontent: Politics and Reclusion in Medieval Japanese Literature, Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1991:127–52
- Thornton, Naoko Fuwa, The Birth of the Essay: A Comparative Study of Michel de Montaigne and Yoshida Kenkō (dissertation), Bloomington: Indiana University, 1973

Kjær, Nils

Norwegian, 1870–1924

Popularly known as “the golden pen,” Nils Kjær referred to the essays of Ludvig Holberg to describe the character of his favorite genre, and used the same word, “epistler” (epistles), as Holberg had some 150 years earlier. He began his writing career as an essayist and developed into one of Norway’s leading social critics. His writing includes travel sketches, literary portraits, and criticism, as well as descriptions of nature, especially along the south coast of Norway. As an essayist, Kjær demonstrated fluidity in style and content. While on the one hand he cultivated an elegant literary style, on the other he developed a polemical and controversial mode of expression. Despite his European bent, he intimated ongoing national concerns in his essays.

Kjær’s lasting impression as an essayist is his contribution “Den litterære kritik” (Literary criticism) to the Norwegian journal Tidssignaler (Signs of the time) in 1895, in which he convincingly argued that the critical essay was on the verge of superseding the novel as an art form. The paucity of ideas in modern literature could, he felt, now be corrected. Kjær attributed part of the emerging importance of the critical essay to its role as an expression of popular philosophy and its encouragement of reflection on the part of the sensitive reader.

Another reason Kjær gave for the essay’s new position in Norwegian cultural history was the increasing sophistication of the reading public. He pointed out that the need for entertainment was being replaced by the desire for intellectual stimulation. At the same time, Kjær observed how criticism assumed the responsibility of elucidating literary works as objects of art rather than of science. As a result, the new essayists of Norway should concern themselves more with the intensity of personalities than with scientific accuracy.

Intuitively European in spirit, Kjær was preoccupied with French authors. His first collection of essays was, in fact, entitled Essays: Fremmede Forfatteren (1895; Essays: foreign authors). In the collection, Kjær sketched the lives of the Swedish humanist Viktor Rydberg, Blaise Pascal, Dante, and Edgar Allan Poe. While some of the pieces recall literary reviews, others present broad studies of literary lives. In the case of Poe, in particular, Kjær evinced his ability to transform literary criticism from mere descriptive accounts to portraits of personality and character, doing so by allying himself with the reader and at the same time by employing equal amounts of irony and passion.

A Norwegian reader would be attuned to Kjær’s emphasis on the correspondence of nature and national character in his essays. His depictions of the Norwegian people sketch the conditions under which they live and the spirit of the times. A critic of his age as well as a stylist, Kjær evolved into an essayist with high cultural values, but with a sometimes overpowering sense of pessimism and, later, increasingly reactionary views. Alongside his warm descriptions of the Norwegian landscape emerged polemics concerning modern culture. His conviction that technological progress signified the regression of humanity colored his deep concern for the humanitarian ideal and cultural values.

VIVIAN GREENE-GANTZBERG

Biography

Born 11 November 1870 in Holmestrand. Traveled a great deal in France and Italy. Died in Oslo, 9 February 1924.

Selected Writings

Essay and Related Prose

Essays: Fremmede forfatteren, 1895

Bøger og Billeder, 1898

I forbigaaende, 1903

Smaa epistler, 1908

Nye epistler, 1912

Svundne somre, 1920

Siste epistler, 1924

Brekkestø breve og andre epistler, 1955

Other writings: four plays (Regnskabets dag, 1902; Mimosas hjemkomst 1907; Det lykkelige valg, 1913; For træ er der haab, 1917) and short stories.

Collected works edition: Samlede skrifter, 5 vols., 1921–22.

Further Reading

Beyer, Edvard, Norsk Litteratur Historie, Oslo: Aschehoug, 1952: 367–69

Madsen, Mads, En stilkritisk studie af Nils Kjærs naturepistler (dissertation), Oslo: University of Oslo, 1967

Noreng, Harald, Nils Kjær: Fra radikal til reaksjoncer, Oslo: Gyldendal Norsk, 1949

Kleist, Heinrich von

German, 1777–1811

Although better known as a playwright and author of novellas, Kleist wrote a small number of essays that reveal his unique cast of mind. These essays, which are often ransacked by critics mistakenly seeking keys to Kleist's other works, are seldom explored as contributions to the art of the essay. Kleist also penned terse anecdotes, admired by Kafka, which make the reader ponder issues similar to those raised by his essays. What gives Kleist's essays their characteristic texture is the tension between his rationalistic quest for order and his intuitive grasp of the uncertainties of the human psyche. They disclose a mind caught uneasily between a hand-me-down faith in reason derived from 18th-century philosophy, Romantic notions about the importance of inner life, and a very modern sense of the inherently paradoxical nature of man's lot.

Kleist's first essay, "Aufsatz, den sichern Weg des Glücks zu finden" (Essay on the sure way of finding happiness), a juvenile piece of writing full of clichés culled from second-rate 18th-century thinkers, was probably written in 1799. His mature essays, anecdotes, theatrical reviews, and articles were written primarily for the Berliner Abendblätter (Berlin evening news), one of the first German dailies, which Kleist set up with the political economist Adam Müller in October 1810. Although the newspaper owed its short-lived success to the crime reports supplied by the Berlin chief of police, the occasional contributions by Kleist captivated discerning contemporaries such as the Brothers Grimm. However, after Kleist was obliged to close the newspaper in March 1811, these writings fell into oblivion until the surge of interest in his life and work in the early decades of this century.

The most famous—and most misunderstood—of Kleist's essays is Über das Marionettentheater (1810; On Puppet Shows). A number of critics have concocted systems of thought on the basis of the philosophical, aesthetic, and theological allusions scattered throughout this seminal essay. Some commentators construe the essay as a treatise on Romantic aesthetics, others as an exposition of a triadic philosophical scheme said to underlie all of Kleist's plays and novellas. Such attempts, however, ignore the tentative quality of the essay, which is modeled after a Platonic dialogue.

The essay features a dialogue between the first person narrator and a puppet master about the elegance of puppets, who have only one "center of gravity," and the clumsiness of humans, whose capacity for reflection destroys their ability to move and act naturally. What concerns Kleist about the Fall of Man is not so much sin as the loss of the primeval grace still possessed by unthinking animals. Unlike the Romantics, however, with whom he is sometimes wrongly conflated, Kleist is not tempted by past idylls. What he envisages instead is an open-ended quest for the harmony lost when man was expelled from Eden: "But Paradise is locked and bolted and the Cherub is behind us. We must make a journey around the world to see if a back door has perhaps been left open." Kleist's doubts about the possibility of ever attaining that goal, suggested by that characteristic word "perhaps," links him to later, more radical skeptics such as Kafka and Camus.

In other ways, too, Kleist points forwards rather than backwards. In a mere handful of essays he anticipates the insights of modern psychologists, philosophers, and linguists. In "Über die allmähliche Verfertigung der Gedanken beim Reden" (wr. c. 1805–06; "On the Gradual Fabrication of Thoughts While Speaking"), he reverses traditional notions about language by arguing that speech often creates thought rather than vice versa. He emphasizes the largely unconscious process by which we arrive at insights: "it is not we who 'know'; it is rather a certain condition of ourselves that 'knows'." Here he anticipates Freud's exploration of different levels of consciousness. Moreover, Kleist, who covertly alludes to the political and cultural objectives of the Berliner Abendblätter in a piece called "Gebet des Zoroaster" (1810; "Prayer of Zarathustra"), no doubt influenced Nietzsche's choice of a mouthpiece in Also sprach Zarathustra (1883–85; Thus Spoke Zarathustra).

The distinctiveness of Kleist's essays stems from his ability to write with the rigor of a scientist and the imagination of a poet. In one of his aphorisms Kleist states that most people think either in terms of metaphors or in terms of formulas. He himself was capable of both modes of thought. His style reflects the tension in himself between rationalism and intuition. In the essay on fabricating thought, and elsewhere, he shows a particular fondness for metaphors and analogies drawn from mechanics and physics: "Speech is not a fetter, then, like a drag chain on the wheel of the mind, but a second wheel running parallel to it on the same axle." Yet he also has a poet's flair for apt detail: "Perhaps, after all, it was only the twitch of an upper lip, or the ambiguous fingering of a wrist frill, that precipitated the overthrow of the old order in France." Kleist's sense of humor is evident in the whimsical essay, "Nützliche Erfindungen: Entwurf einer Bombenpost" (1810; "Useful Inventions: Project for a Cannonball Postal System") and in "Allerneuester Erziehungsplan" (1810; "The Very Latest Educational Scheme"), in which he advocates the establishment of a School for Vice.

Although Kleist's own writing is noted for its formal rigor, in his essays on aesthetic themes he advocates unrestrained subjectivity. Two essays in epistolary guise, "Brief eines jungen Dichters an einen Maler" (1810; "Letter from a Young Writer to a Young Painter") and "Brief eines Malers an seinen Sohn" (1810; "A Painter's Letter to His Son"), suggest that the arts are merely a vehicle for self-expression: "The objective, after all, is not to become someone else, but to be yourself: through color and design to render your very self, that most personal and inner part of you, visible." In "Brief eines Dichters an einen anderen" (1811; "Letter from One Poet to Another"), written in the year of his suicide, Kleist is even more extreme in his rejection of literary form: "...if I could reach into my heart, take hold of my thoughts, and with my bare hands lay them without further embellishment in your own, then, I confess, the innermost desire of my soul would be fulfilled." Although this letter-writing poet is not necessarily Kleist himself, it is difficult not to read such passages in existential terms as the final testament of a writer who, like Arthur Rimbaud and Robert Walser, turned away from literature and chose what Kafka, in a letter to his fiancée Felice Bauer in September 1913, described as the "right way out."

MARK HARMAN

Biography

Bernd Heinrich Wilhelm von Kleist. Born 18 October 1777 in Frankfurt-on-Oder, Brandenburg. Suffered many nervous breakdowns throughout his life. Served in the Prussian army, 1792–99, taking part in the siege of Mainz, 1793. Studied law at the University of Frankfurt, 1799–1800. Traveled in Germany, Switzerland, and France, 1800–04; civil servant, Königsberg, 1805–06; cofounder, with Adam Müller, and editor, Phöbus, Dresden, 1808–09, and Berliner Abendblätter, 1810–11; attempted unsuccessfully to publish the newspaper Germania, Prague, 1809. Died (suicide by gunshot) at Lake Wannsee, near Potsdam, 21 November 1811.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Über das Marionettentheater: Aufsätze und Anekdoten, edited by Helmut Sembdner, 1935; revised edition, 1980; title essay edited by Wilhelm Neufeld, 1962, and Helmut Sembdner (including essays on the text), 1967; title essay as On a Theatre of Marionettes, translated by G. Wilford, 1989; as On Puppet Shows, translated by David Paisley, 1991

An Abyss Deep Enough: Letters of Heinrich von Kleist with a Selection of Essays and Anecdotes, edited and translated by Philip B. Miller, 1982

Other writings: seven plays (Die Familie Schroffenstein [The Feud of the Schroffensteins], 1803; Amphitryon, 1807; Der zerbrochene Krug [The Broken Pitcher], 1808; Penthesilea, 1808; Das Käthchen von Heilbronn [Kate of Heilbronn], 1810; Prinz Friedrich von Homburg [The Prince of Homburg], 1821; Die Hermannsschlacht, 1839), short stories (including “The Marquise of O.” and Michael Kohlhaas [1810]), and correspondence.

Collected works editions: Werke, edited by Erich Schmidt and others, 5 vols., 1904–05, revised edition, 7 vols., 1936–38; Sämtliche Werke und Briefe, edited by Helmut Sembdner, 2 vols., 1961, revised edition, 1984; Sämtliche Werke, edited by Roland Reuss and Peter Staengle, 2 vols., 1988–92 (in progress).

Bibliography

Sembdner, Helmut, Kleist-Bibliographie, 1803–1862, Stuttgart: Eggert, 1966

Further Reading

Blöcker, Günter, Heinrich von Kleist oder Das absolute Ich, Frankfurt-on-Main: Fischer, 1977

Dyer, Denys, The Stories of Kleist: A Critical Study, London: Duckworth, 1977

Ellis, John M., Heinrich von Kleist: Studies in the Character and Meaning of His Writings, Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1979

Gearey, John, Heinrich von Kleist: A Study in Tragedy and Anxiety, Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1968

Hamburger, Michael, “Heinrich von Kleist,” in his Reason and Energy: Studies in German Literature, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, and New York: Grove Press, 1957:107–44; as Contraries: Studies in German Literature, New York: Dutton, 1971:101–39

Harman, Mark, “An Echo of Kafka in Kleist,” in Heinrich von Kleist Studies, edited by Alexej Ugrinsky, New York: AMS Press, and Berlin: Schmidt, 1980:169–75

Helbling, Robert E., The Major Works of Heinrich von Kleist, New York: New Directions, 1975

Hohoff, Curt, Heinrich von Kleist (in English), Bonn and Bad Godesberg: Inter Nationes, 1977 (original German edition, 1958)

- Ide, Heinz, Der junge Kleist, Würzburg: Holzner, 1961
- Kurock, Wolfgang, "Heinrich von Kleist und die Marionette," in Heinrich von Kleist Studies, edited by Alexej Ugrinsky, New York: AMS Press, and Berlin: Schmidt, 1980:103–08
- Nicolai, Ralf, "Schwerpunkt Kleist: Motive des Marionettentheaters im 20. Jahrhundert," in Heinrich von Kleist Studies, edited by Alexej Ugrinsky, New York: AMS Press, and Berlin: Schmidt, 1980:127–35
- Reed, T.J., "The 'Goethezeit' and Its Aftermath," in Germany: A Companion to German Studies, edited by Malcolm Pasley, London: Methuen, 1972:493–553
- Sembdner, Helmut, editor, Kleists Aufsatz "Über das Marionettentheater": Studien und Interpretationen, Berlin: Jahresgabe der Heinrich-von-Kleist-Gesellschaft, 1967
- Silz, Walter, Heinrich von Kleist: Studies in His Works and Literary Character, Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1961

Kołodkowski, Leszek

Polish, 1927–

Leszek Kołodkowski is as well known for his essays (for which he received the European Prize for the Essay in 1980) as he is for his strictly philosophical works. He launched his spectacular career as an essayist with the publication in 1959 of the influential essay "Kapłan i błazen" ("The Priest and the Jester"), which gained him the reputation as the most brilliant Marxist philosopher in Poland. In this essay Kołodkowski formulates a dichotomy between the Priest, the guardian of tradition and accepted absolutes, and the skeptical Jester who "doubts all that appears self-evident." The philosophy of the Priest, Kołodkowski argues, represented incurable and "unbearable traits of senility." Despite the attractiveness and force with which Kołodkowski presents the Jester, the metaphor, as one of his critics observed (Ryszard Legutko, "Podzwonne dla błazna" [Requiem for the jester], in his Bez gniewu i uprzedzenia [1989; Without anger and prejudice]), is based on the confusion of individual temperament—such as intellectual vitality, irony, and paradox—with an intellectual world view. The inadequacy of the metaphor can be seen when it is applied to Pascal, the thinker to whom Kołodkowski devoted an essay and made frequent allusions in that period. The irony and humor harnessed by Pascal in his Lettres provinciales (1656–57; The Provincial Letters) to mock the lax morality of the Jesuit Fathers would seem to place Pascal with the Jesters; yet in fact Pascal's humor serves to defend an austere Jansenist morality and Catholicism, which, according to Kołodkowski's categorization, puts Pascal in the camp of the defenders of absolutes.

Although the dichotomy between the Priest and the Jester could, with the greatest of difficulties, become a key to the interpretation of the history of philosophy, the Jester's philosophy of the mistrust for absolutes turned out to have considerable practical consequences. The Jester's philosophy served the former Marxists, including Kołodkowski himself—who was called in the 1960s "the most intelligent man in the world"—as a form of immunization against ideological traps into which they had fallen, when, in the early 1950s, they committed themselves to Marxism.

From today's perspective the "The Priest and the Jester" bears strong traces of the sociopolitical situation in which it was written; yet it is pivotal for Kołakowski's philosophical methodology. A considerable part of the essay concerns the theological underpinnings of contemporary philosophy. "Philosophy has never freed itself from its theological heritage," Kołakowski writes at the outset of the essay, "which means that theological questions were merely clumsy formulations of essential enigmas that still hold us in thrall... theology has never been more than a projection of anthropology onto non-human reality." Thus:

...the problem of theodicy in its modern version is that of the "wisdom" of history... Theodicy is, therefore, a method of transforming facts into values... eschatology is an attempt to find absolute justification for our life outside its limits, to establish a reality that makes all other reality meaningful and comprehensible... The most important of these questions is the problem of nature and grace...this question concerns determinism and responsibility... All these questions involve the relationship between man and the absolute... Revelation is simply the absolute in the order of cognition, a collection of positive and unquestionable data, our means of communicating with the absolute...secular revelation was the Cartesian cogito...nostalgia for revelation lives on in the heart of philosophy.

All these points have been elaborated by Kołakowski in his books, many of which are written in an essayistic form: Obecność mitu (1972; The Presence of Myth), Husserl and the Search for Certitude (1975), Religion: If There Is No God (1982), and Metaphysical Horror (1988).

After his expulsion from Warsaw University and his arrival in the West in 1968, Kołakowski became a frequent contributor to the English Encounter and other European and American journals such as Survey, Commentary, Partisan Review, Commentaire, and Merkur. In 1982 ANEKS, the London-based Polish émigré publishing house, published the collection of his essays, Czy diabeł może być zbawiony i 27 innych kazań (Can the devil be saved and 27 other sermons), written mostly in English, French, and German. Similar collections appeared in French and English.

In 1990 Kołakowski published Modernity on Endless Trial, for which he received the Laing Award from the University of Chicago Press for the best book of the year. Unlike Kołakowski's essays written during his Marxist period—Kultura i fetysze (1967; Culture and fetishes, translated as Toward a Marxist Humanism and as Marxism and Beyond) and A Leszek Kołakowski Reader (1971)—these essays are, as Kołakowski aptly called them, "semi-philosophical sermons." The early mistrust of the Jester against the absolutes is no longer present in his later works, and the dichotomy between the Jester and the Priest is replaced by the opposition between the philosophers who seek a cognitive Absolute and those who apply "skeptical medicine" to the ever-present attempt in European thought to find the absolute "foundation of all foundations." As Kołakowski persuasively argues, "The search for the ultimate foundation is as much an unremovable part of European culture as is the denial of the legitimacy of this search" (Metaphysical Horror). For the most part, Kołakowski's attention is focused on the state of Christianity and Catholicism (frequent themes in his writings), the relationship between religious thought and philosophy, modernity, and ideologies. Whether the object of our analysis is philosophy, Christianity, Marxism, or liberalism, we unfailingly come across the same utopian tendency in human thinking: the belief of philosophers in attaining absolute certitude, man's search for a perfect social order, and the theocratic tendencies within Christianity. All of these express the same belief that there is a perfect solution to all human problems. Yet there are no perfect solutions; the solution to one problem always gives rise to others. There are only dilemmas with which we need to learn how to live. Kołakowski believes that "moderation in consistency" is the best way to counter this utopian thinking, which always leads to the perversion of the ideal and in the social realm finds but one solution: totalitarian temptation, exemplified in the 20th century by the rise of Marxist and Nazi states. While the specter of Marxism, the greatest utopia of the 20th century, as Kołakowski called it in his monumental work Główne nurty marksizmu (1976; Main Currents of Marxism), is behind us, cultural relativism, characteristic of the life of contemporary Western democratic liberal societies, undermines the very belief in the existence of moral and epistemological "absolutes" on which European culture has always been based.

ZBIGNIEW JANOWSKI

Biography

Born 23 October 1927 in Radom. Studied at the University of Łódź, 1945–50, Ph.D., 1953. Member of the Polish Workers' Party, 1945. Staff member, Po Prostu (In plain words), 1955. After the so-called "October thaw," 1956, became one of the leading voices for the democratization of life in Poland. Professor of modern philosophy, University of Warsaw: 1959–68: expelled after giving a speech at the Warsaw Chapter of the Union of Polish Writers. Delivered a famous speech at at the 10th anniversary of the "Polish October," 1966: expelled from the Polish United Workers' Party. Left Poland, November 1968; no references to his works could be made in Poland, 1968–89. Professor of philosophy, McGill University, Montreal, 1968, and University of California, Berkeley, 1969; senior research fellow, All Souls College, Oxford, 1970–95; visiting professor, Yale University, New Haven, Connecticut, 1975; professor, Committee on Social Thought and the Department of Philosophy, University of Chicago, 1980–95. Awards: several, including the German Booksellers Peace Prize, 1977; Erasmus Prize, 1980; Veillon Foundation European Prize for the Essay, 1980; Jefferson Award, 1986; MacArthur Award, 1982; University of Chicago Laing Award, 1990; Tocqueville Prize, 1994.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Der Mensch ohne Alternative, 1960

- Kultura i fetysze*, 1967; as Toward a Marxist Humanism: Essays on the Left Today, and as Marxism and Beyond, translated by Jane Zielonko Peel, 1968
- Traktat über die Sterblichkeit der Vernunft: Philosophische Essays*, 1967
- A Leszek Kołakowski Reader*, TriQuarterly 22 (1971)
- Obecność mitu*, 1972; as The Presence of Myth, 1989
- Husserl and the Search for Certitude*, 1975
- Czy diabeł może być zbawiony i 27 innych kazań*, 1982
- Religion: If There Is No God*, 1982
- Le Village introuvable*, 1986
- Metaphysical Horror*, 1988
- Pochwała niekonsekwencji: Pisma rozproszone z lat, 1955–1968*, 3 vols., edited by Zbigniew Menzel, 1989
- Cywilizacja na ławie oskarżonych*, edited by Paweł Kłoczowski, 1990
- Modernity on Endless Trial*, 1990
- God Owes Us Nothing: A Brief Remark on Pascal's Religion and on the Spirit of Jansenism*, 1995
- Other writings: one-act plays, short stories, and works on Marxism (including Główne nurty marksizmu [1976; Main Currents of Marxism]), philosophy, and religion.

Bibliography

- Kline, George L., "Selective Bibliography," TriQuarterly 22 (1971): 239–50

Further Reading

- Davis, Charles, and John C. Robertson, Jr., "Religion: If There Is No God," Religious Studies Review 2 (1985):145–51
- Karpiński, Wojciech, "Leszek Kołakowski: A Portrait," in European Liberty: Four Essays on the Occasion of the 25th Anniversary of the Erasmus Prize Foundation, The Hague: Nijhoff, 1983
- Kline, George L., "Beyond Revisionism: Leszek Kołakowski's Recent Philosophical Development," TriQuarterly 22 (1971):13–47
- Król, Marcin, "Leszek Kołakowski: Le Philosophe et la religion," Esprit (October 1985):63–81
- Lenz, Siegfried, Gesprache mit Manes Sperber und Leszek Kołakowski, Munich: Deutscher Taschenbuch, 1982
- Schwan, Gesine, Leszek Kołakowski: Eine marxistische Philosophie der Freiheit nach Marx, Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1971
- Schwan, Gesine, "The Philosophical Resistance of Leszek Kołakowski," Humanities: National Endowment for the Humanities: Leszek Kołakowski, the 1986 Jefferson Lecturer 7, no. 2 (1986):10–16

Kott, Jan

Polish, 1914–

Jan Kott's writing has encompassed a variety of genres—poetry, a series of translations of French literature into Polish, and the 1990 autobiography Przyczynek do biografii (Still Alive)—but his reputation is primarily based on essays related to the theater. Kott's theatrical essays have in turn embraced various forms and perspectives over the course of his career, ranging from performance reviews, to critical investigations into theater history, to visionary or speculative essays on the contemporary performance of classical drama. It is for the last of these that Kott is most renowned, particularly for the essays contained in Szkice o Szekspirze (1961, revised and enlarged, 1965; Shakespeare Our Contemporary) and The Eating of the Gods (1973).

The impact of Kott's essays on 20th-century theater practice was unprecedented and remains unique. Rather than merely research or critically respond to the performances of the plays he considered, Kott instead tacitly wrote from the perspective of a contemporary theatrical director or production dramaturge preparing a staging of the text. While his style of writing in early works such as Shakespeare Our Contemporary was energetic and designed to be accessible to a general audience, it had its most profound impact in professional theater circles in the 1960s and 1970s—particularly among those involved with experimental or alternative theater. On this score, the influence of Kott's writing could be compared to that of the earlier theoretical writings of Bertolt Brecht and Antonin Artaud. Among the directors most deeply influenced by Kott's essays in Shakespeare Our Contemporary were Peter Brook and Peter Hall in England, Ariane Mnouchkine in France, Giorgio Strehler in Italy, and Andrzej Wajda and Konrad Swinarski in Poland.

The popular style of Shakespeare Our Contemporary made it one of the most widely read and translated books by any contemporary Polish writer; the book has long been required reading in England's secondary schools as well as in American college and university theater programs. Kott's essays on Shakespeare were published and translated into various languages before he had any direct experience with theatrical production or even a reading knowledge of English. As a result of the success of Shakespeare Our Contemporary, Kott received his first opportunities to study and teach in the English-speaking world as well as his first invitations to work as director or dramaturge on various productions in Western Europe and the United States. In 1969, he was granted political asylum in the U.S. after being denounced by the Polish Communist Party as a result of the turmoil in Poland following the so-called “events of March 1968”—which included an anti-Semitic campaign instigated by Stalinist elements in the Party.

Kott's personal and political biography are inseparably linked to the content of his essays. He was a child of the secularized urban Jewish bourgeoisie in interwar Poland and was fully assimilated into Polish language and culture. In the wake of the fall of Poland following the combined Nazi and Soviet invasions of the country in 1939, Kott joined the tiny and embattled Polish communist underground movement, a choice that initially secured his position in the postwar Polish communist cultural establishment. He won the Polish State Prize in Literature and Literary Studies twice (in 1951 and 1955), only to resign from the Communist Party in 1957 in protest against the excesses of its Stalinist elements. In 1964, he cosigned “The Letter of the Thirty-Four” protesting against censorship in Poland, and left the country the next year to write and teach abroad.

Shakespeare Our Contemporary was a landmark in the Marxist humanist school of cultural criticism that emerged in the wake of Stalinism in Poland, Czechoslovakia, and elsewhere, with its emphasis on the dramatic play of historical forces and realpolitik. The book presented Shakespeare’s history plays, for example, as a variety of Brechtian Lehrstücke, or “learning plays,” on the dialectics of political history. In other regards, however, the book went beyond Marxism, with one of Kott’s most famous essays connecting King Lear with Samuel Beckett’s Endgame. Kott’s anti-sentimental reading of Shakespeare’s comedies in the book emphasized their brutality and eroticism, particularly in A Midsummer Night’s Dream, in a manner that owed little to Marx but proved immensely popular with young British and Western European directors at the time. Peter Brook’s landmark production of the play at the Royal Shakespeare Company in 1970 was one of several productions that acknowledged the influence of Kott’s essay “Titania and the Ass’s Head,” and is now regarded as a turning point in the production history of the play in Great Britain.

Kott’s writing changed markedly after his emigration from Poland. Marx receded as an influence; in his stead emerged a complex hybrid of archetypal mythology and the carnivalesque theories of Mikhail Bakhtin. The essay “Orestes, Electra, Hamlet,” found in The Eating of the Gods, displays Kott’s archetypal approach at its best, using the characters and scenarios of The Oresteia and Hamlet to highlight each other. The essays in The Bottom Translation (1987) marked the height of Kott’s work under Bakhtin’s influence. The book’s title essay (devoted to A Midsummer Night’s Dream) is primarily a study in the aesthetic and transcendent reconciliation of opposites, a quite different principle indeed from Marx’s dialectical materialism.

Kott’s influence on the “director’s theater” that emerged in Europe and America in the 1960s and 1970s came full circle in several late essays devoted to the work of experimental directors such as Jerzy Grotowski, Tadeusz Kantor, and Peter Brook. His late writings in the collections The Memory of the Body (1992) and Nowy Jonasz i inne szkice (1994; The new Jonas and other sketches) and his autobiographical book Still Alive leave the Marxist and Bakhtinian theoretical armatures of his early and middle periods behind. Instead they freely move between autobiography, reflections on the theater, and philosophical meditations on literature, nature, and Kott’s growing sense of his own mortality as a result of a series of strokes, heart attacks, and related medical crises. In spite of his declining health, Kott has taken an avid interest in Poland’s cultural and political life since the fall of the Berlin Wall, after many years of being denied access to the country as a result of his public protests against the declaration of Martial Law in 1981. He remains a vital and vocal presence in Polish émigré circles in the U.S. and Western Europe.

ALLEN J. KUHARSKI

Biography

Born 27 October 1914 in Warsaw. Studied at the University of Warsaw, law degree, 1936; the Sorbonne, Paris, 1938–39; University of Łódź, Ph.D., 1947. Married Lidia Steinhaus, 1939: one daughter and one son. Served in the Polish Army, defending Warsaw, September 1939; member of the Polish resistance movement, 1941–45. Member of the Polish Communist Party, 1943–57: resigned. Professor of romance languages, University of Wrocław, 1949–52; professor of Polish literature, University of Warsaw, 1952–69: dismissed. Cosigned a public letter protesting against Polish censorship, 1964. Visiting professor of Polish literature and drama, Yale University, New Haven, Connecticut, 1966–67 and 1978–79, and of drama, Catholic University of Louvain, 1968. Sought political asylum in the United States, 1969. Professor of drama and Germanic and Slavic languages and literatures, 1969–73, and of comparative literature and English, 1973–83, State University of New York, Stony Brook; visiting professor of drama, Hebrew University. Became an American citizen, 1979. Awards: Polish State Prize in Literature, 1951, 1955; Herder Award, 1964; Guggenheim Fellowship, 1972–73; Alfred Jurzykowski Award, 1976.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Mitologia i realizm, 1946

Po prostu, 1946

O społecznym awansie, 1947

O "Lalce" Bolesława Prusa, 1948

Szkoła klasyków, 1949; revised, enlarged edition, 1955

Trwale wartości literatury polskiego Oświecenia, 1951

Wiktor Hugo: Pisarz walczący, 1952

Jak wam się podoba: Spotkanie pierwsze (theater reviews), 2 vols., 1955–57

Postęp i głupstwo, 2 vols., 1956

Szkice o Szekspirze, 1961; revised, enlarged edition, as Szekspir współczesny, 1965; as

Shakespeare Our Contemporary, translated by Bolesław Taborski, 1964

Aloes, dzienniki i male szkice, 1966

Theatre Notebook, 1947–1967, translated by Bolesław Taborski, 1968

The Eating of the Gods: An Interpretation of Greek Tragedy, translated by Bolesław

Taborski and Edward J. Czerwiński, 1973

The Theater of Essence and Other Essays, 1984

Kamienny potok, 1986; enlarged edition, 1991

The Bottom Translation: Marlowe and Shakespeare and the Carnival Tradition, translated by Daniela Międzyrzecka and Lillian Vallee, 1987

Przyczynek do biografii, 1990; as Still Alive: An Autobiographical Essay, translated by

Jadwiga Kosicka, 1994

The Memory of the Body: Essays on Theater and Death, translated by Jadwiga Kosicka, 1992,

The Gender of Rosalind, translated by Jadwiga Kosicka and Mark Rosenzweig, 1992; as Plec Rozolindy: Interpretacje Marlowe, Szekspir, Webster, Büchner, Gautier, 1992.

Nowe Jonasz i inne szkice, 1994

Other writings: poetry. Also translated many writers from the French, including Molière, Jean-Paul Sartre, and Eugène Ionesco.

Bibliography

Vasco, Gerhard, and Hélène Volat-Shapiro, The Publications of Jan Kott, Stony Brook: State University of New York, 1979

Further Reading

- Barker, Clive, and Simon Trussler, editors, "Jan Kott: An Eightieth Birthday Celebration," New Theater Quarterly 10, no. 40 (1994)
- Brockett, Oscar G., and Robert Findlay, Century of Innovation: A History of European and American Theater and Drama Since the Late Nineteenth Century, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice Hall, 1973
- Brustein, Robert, "Jan Kott, Super Dramaturge," in his Who Needs Theater: Dramatic Opinions, New York: Atlantic Monthly Press, 1987; London: Faber, 1989
- Elsom, John, "Is Shakespeare Still Our Contemporary?," Contemporary Review 249, no. 1451 (1986):315–19
- Guczalska, Beata, "Jan Kott: Pisarz i krytyk," Dialog 33, no. 5 (1988):123–35
- Guczalska, Beata, "Shakespeare Jana Kotta," Dialog 33, no. 6 (1988):125–37
- Houliston, Victor, "Shakespeare Not Our Contemporary," Shakespeare in South Africa 3 (1989):67–77
- Kennedy, Dennis, editor, Foreign Shakespeare: Contemporary Performance, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993
- Krajewska-Wieczorek, Anna, "Still Contemporary: A Conversation with Jan Kott," Yale/Theater 25, no. 3 (1995):85–89
- Krzemiński, Adam, "Opowieści Jana Kotta," Dialog 36, no. 1 (1991):86–91
- Kuharski, Allen, "Beyond Criticism: The Theatrical Poetics of Jan Kott," San Francisco Review of Books 13, no. 1 (1988):29–30
- Kuharski, Allen, "Identity and Improvisation: Backstage in the Theater of Jan Kott," Yale/Theater 25, no. 3 (1995):80–84
- Lichtenstein, Leonie, "Is Shakespeare Still Our Contemporary?," Shakespeare in South Africa 3 (1989):78–86
- Miłosz, Czesław, The History of Polish Literature, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1983 (original edition, 1969)
- Pieczara, Marek, "Kott współczesny," Dialog 36, no. 1 (1991): 100–05
- Selbourne, David, The Making of "A Midsummer Night's Dream", London: Methuen, 1982

Krutch, Joseph Wood

American, 1893–1970

Joseph Wood Krutch was a consummate practitioner of both the formal and informal essay. He published over 750 essays in both scholarly and popular journals between 1920 and 1970. The theater reviews and occasional columns which he wrote during that 50-year period bring the total number of his publications to well over 1000. Most of the 28 books he authored are collections of essays on a wide variety of topics ranging from 17th-century comedy to the geography of Baja California. While the main focus of his writing during the 1920s and 1930s was on literature and society, during the 1950s and 1960s he also became one of America's foremost nature essayists.

Krutch's life as a professional writer commenced in 1920 when he began to publish his essays in several important journals and reviews including Smart Set, the Saturday Review of Literature, and the Nation. Krutch's tone was skeptical, often cynical, but also always refined and cultivated, much like that of Montaigne and Addison and Steele. His sophisticated readers appreciated his clarity, reasonableness, and eloquence, as well as his courage in boldly addressing some of the most controversial issues of his day: the banality of modern art, the attack on the individual by various psychological and Marxist schools of thought, the joyless existence of many Americans. Krutch's scholarly, carefully crafted essays in cultural studies brought him to the attention of America's intelligentsia. At the same time he was quickly recognized as one of the most erudite and perceptive drama critics in New York. He was applauded for both his intellectual acumen and his ability to see beyond the latest theatrical fad. Krutch's opinion was so respected that even Eugene O'Neill, one of America's leading playwrights, requested his advice.

One of his most important early critical works, The Modern Temper, was completed in 1929. The essays making up this volume focus on the collapse of the belief in traditional humanistic values, especially free will, caused by social engineering, the influence of the mass media, and technocracy. Krutch characterizes the mood of the 20th century as pessimistic and alienated. His concluding statement seems to sum up the general mood of Western civilization: "Ours is a lost cause and there is no place for us in the natural universe, but we are not, for all that, sorry to be human. We should rather die as men than live as animals." While hailed as one of America's foremost intellectuals, Krutch was nevertheless uneasy with his own negativity and began to search for answers outside the Modernist paradigm.

Over the next four decades Krutch's writing style evolved with his new interests and an appeal to a more diverse audience. In the 1940s he published biographies of both Samuel Johnson and Henry David Thoreau, two writers who symbolized a spectrum of stylistic virtues to him: Johnson's polish, wit, and urbane insights on English life; Thoreau's humor, enthusiasm, and rhapsodic commentary on the American wilderness. During this same period Krutch had begun to enjoy writing the familiar essay so much that in an article entitled "No Essays, Please!" (1951) he even bemoaned the fact that the audience for this literary form was dwindling. He attributed this loss of interest to the upsurge in writing which was supposed to be spare, succinct, and objective—the language of the reporter. Such writing was meant to negate the individual’s voice, to “exist in an impersonal realm.” In marked contrast to this tendency toward the depersonalization of writing, many of Krutch’s essays took on an intimate tone and began to focus not just on society and art but also on his increasing fascination with the world of nature.

The publication of his first collection of nature essays, The Twelve Seasons (1949), marked a turning point for him. Near the end of his life Krutch reflected on his mood when he began this phase of his writing career: “All of my books had been both serious and rather more solemn than I would have liked them to be. I wanted something lighter and more definitely in the manner of the now generally despised ‘familiar essay’.” The Twelve Seasons was successful enough that Krutch followed up with the publication of his reflections on a year spent in the arid environment of southern Arizona, The Desert Year (1952). This work was lauded as a perceptive analysis of life in the Southwest, a 20th-century version of Thoreau’s Walden. Krutch’s reputation as a disciple of Thoreau grew as he continued to expand his areas of expertise. He began to submit articles to popular journals such as Audubon Magazine, House and Garden, and Desert Magazine as well as continuing to contribute to the more academic journals such as the American Scholar, the Atlantic Monthly, Commentary, Harper’s, and Theater Arts.

The range of Krutch’s interests was astonishing. While he wrote formal essays about such literary luminaries as Shakespeare, Congreve, Eugene O’Neill, Tolstoi, Twain, Shaw, Oscar Wilde, and André Gide, he felt equally comfortable writing familiar essays about the Grand Canyon, coyotes, bats, desert frogs, and cacti. In his autobiography, More Lives Than One (1962), Krutch mused: “I probably know more about plants than any other drama critic and more about the theater than any botanist.”

During the first half of the 20th century Krutch’s academic essays on selfhood, freedom, and individuality were central to the theoretical debates about the humanistic tradition and the nature of civilization itself. Today much of this writing is seen as having value primarily to those interested in the evolution of Modernism. On the other hand, the growth of the environmental movement in America has fostered a renewed interest in Krutch’s informal but discerning writing about the relationship of humanity to the larger community of nature. Krutch believed that the best nature essays were based on “the question of the moral consequences” of our actions (The Best of Two Worlds, 1953). Ethical concern and stylistic grace made Joseph Wood Krutch one of the most important critical voices of the 20th century.

PAUL NICHOLAS PAVICH

Biography

Born 25 November 1893 in Knoxville, Tennessee. Studied at the University of Tennessee, Knoxville, 1911–15, B.A., 1915; Columbia University, New York, M.A. in English, 1916, Ph.D., 1923. Served in the U.S. Army medical corps, 1917–18. Associate professor, Brooklyn Polytechnic Institute, 1920–23. Married Marcelle Leguia, 1923.

Drama critic, 1924–32 and 1937–52, regular contributor, until the 1930s, associate editor, 1924–32, and member of the editorial board, 1932–37, the Nation. Taught part-time at Vassar College, Poughkeepsie, New York, 1924–25, Columbia University, 1925–31, and the New School for Social Research, New York, 1932–35; professor of English, Columbia University, 1937–52. Moved to Tucson, Arizona, 1952. Awards: several, including the Burroughs Medal, for nature writing, 1954; National Book Award, for The Measure of Man, 1955; Rockefeller Institute Ettinger Award, for science writing, 1964; Emerson-Thoreau Medal, 1967; honorary degrees from four universities; member, American Academy of Arts and Letters, and American Academy of Arts and Sciences. Died in Tucson, 22 May 1970.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

The Modern Temper: A Study and a Confession, 1929

Five Masters, 1930

Experience and Art, 1932

Was Europe a Success?, 1934

The Twelve Seasons, 1949

The Desert Year, 1952

The Best of Two Worlds, 1953

“Modernism” in Modern Drama: A Definition and an Estimate (lectures), 1953

The Measure of Man, 1954

The Voice of the Desert: A Naturalist’s Interpretation, 1955

The Great Chain of Life, 1956

Grand Canyon: Today and All Its Yesterdays, 1958

Human Nature and Human Condition, 1959

The Forgotten Peninsula: A Naturalist in Baja California, 1961

If You Don’t Mind My Saying So...Essays on Man and Nature, 1964

And Even if You Do: Essays on Man, Manners, and Machines, 1967

The Best Nature Writing, 1969

A Krutch Omnibus: Forty Years of Social and Literary Criticism, 1970

Other writings: the autobiography More Lives Than One (1962), studies of Edgar Allan Poe (1926), Samuel Johnson (1944), and Thoreau (1948), and works on literature, social criticism, and nature.

Bibliography

Lehman, Anthony L., “Joseph Wood Krutch: A Selected Annotated Bibliography of Primary Sources,” Bulletin of Bibliography 41 (June 1984):74–80

Further Reading

Abbey, Edward, “On Nature, the Modern Temper and the Southwest: An Interview with

- Joseph Wood Krutch," Sage 2 (1968):13–21
- Dubos, Rene, "The Despairing Optimist," American Scholar 40 (1971):16–20
- Gorman, John, "Joseph Wood Krutch: A Cactus Walden," Journal of the Society for the Study of Multi-Ethnic Literature of the United States 7 (Winter 1984):93–101
- Kilgo, James, "Krutch's Sonoran Pastoral: The Aesthetic Integrity of The Desert Year," Southwestern American Literature 7 (1981): 9–21
- Limerick, Patricia Nelson, Desert Passages, Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press, 1985:127–48
- McClintock, James, Nature's Kindred Spirits: Aldo Leopold, Joseph Wood Krutch, Edward Abbey, Annie Dillard, Gary Snyder, Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1994
- Margolis, John D., Joseph Wood Krutch: A Writer's Life, Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1980
- Pavich, Paul N., Joseph Wood Krutch, Boise, Idaho: Boise State University, 1989
- Powell, Lawrence Clark, "Southwest Classics Reread: Joseph Wood Krutch's The Desert Year," Westways (June 1971):14–16, 66–67
- Rowley, Robert, "Joseph Wood Krutch: The Forgotten Voice of the Desert," American Scholar 64 (1995):438–43
- Slater, Peter Gregg, "The Negative Secularism of the Modern Temper," American Quarterly 33 (1981):185–205
- Van Lann, Thomas F., "The Death-of-Tragedy Myth," Journal of Dramatic Theory and Criticism 5 (1991):5–31
- Wild, Peter, Pioneer Conservationists of Western America, Missoula, Montana: Mountain Press, 1979:131–39
- Wild, Peter, "Ash Heap for Bright Ruderals: Joseph Wood Krutch's The Modern Temper" North Dakota Quarterly (Fall 1989): 14–22

This page intentionally left blank.

L

La Bruyère, Jean de

French, 1645–1696

The story is told about La Bruyère that he often visited Étienne Michallet, who would eventually become his publisher, and enjoyed playing with the book dealer's young daughter. On the day he offered Michallet the manuscript of Les Caractères ou mœurs de ce siècle (The Characters, or the Manners of the Age), La Bruyère, uncertain of the book's chances for success, proposed that any profits from the work become the dowry of Michallet's daughter. Since her dowry was substantial, the story may well be true. The author who emerges from the pages of the Characters, however, is anything but a carefree, resilient man given to spontaneous gestures of liberality. On the contrary, La Bruyère is a sharp, at times bitter observer of the foibles of humankind. His trenchant prose cuts to the core—often unpleasant—of issues and personalities. In its acuity of perception, attention to detail, and insistence on stylistic perfection, La Bruyère's work reflects, above all, the author's devotion to writing.

La Bruyère is best known for his Characters, first published in 1688 together with his translation of the Characters of Theophrastus (wr. c. 319 BCE). The translation of Theophrastus is based primarily upon the Latin translation by Isaac Casaubon (1592 and 1599), although La Bruyère clearly knew Greek and consulted the original text. In 1693, La Bruyère was elected to membership of the French Academy. The Discours (Discourse) he delivered on the day of his reception was immediately attacked, and he had it reprinted in the eighth edition of his Characters, this time with a preface in which he defends himself. Aside from some letters, most of them to Louis II de Bourbon, Prince de Condé about his grandson, for whom La Bruyère had been appointed tutor, the author's only other published work is the Dialogues sur le quiétisme (Dialogues on Quietism). Here La Bruyère sides with his friend and supporter the Bishop of Meaux, Jacques-Bénigne Bossuet, against the Quietists, a small sect of religious mystics who believed in the total abandonment of the human will in the contemplation of God's presence. The nine dialogues were published posthumously in 1698, but carry a 1699 publication date. Ellies du Pin, their editor, appears to have written the last two dialogues and undoubtedly altered the others. This work is not an important literary achievement. La Bruyère is, finally, a writer whose greatness rests on one text—the Characters.

That work was far more popular than either its author or its publisher had foreseen. During La Bruyère's lifetime, eight successive editions appeared, and in the course of their publication, the work more than doubled in size. Taking his society and its inhabitants as raw material, La Bruyère set out, as he says in the preface of the Characters, to “paint mankind in general.” He was simply giving back to the public what it had given him. This he did in a series of aphorisms, remarks, descriptive passages, and portraits, organized into 16 chapters whose titles cover a wide diversity of subjects, among them the works of the mind, women, the heart, the court, the town, the sovereign, humankind, the pulpit, and freethinkers. La Bruyère claimed that the individual fragments of each chapter had “a certain gradual connection,” but this seems to be more self-justification than the enunciation of a principle to which he consciously adhered as he wrote.

The most memorable and controversial passages in the Characters are the portraits of imaginary individuals. These are drawn with brilliant stylistic finesse and are recognized as models of literary portraiture. Some of the best known of these character studies are those of Ménippe, who has no thoughts of his own but merely repeats the sentiments of others; the hopelessly absent-minded Ménalque; the hyper-hypocritical Onuphre, based on Molière’s Tartuffe; and the couple Giton and Phédon, whose physical beings correspond exactly to their financial circumstances of extraordinary wealth in the one case and abject penury in the other.

From shortly after the first appearance of the Characters, clefs (keys) claiming to identify the imaginary characters began to be published. However, La Bruyère maintained that he did not, in creating each portrait, take specific people as his subjects. The real interest of the Characters has little to do with whom La Bruyère may have had in mind in any particular passage. In the preface to his speech before the French Academy, he asserts that “every writer is a painter, and every excellent writer an excellent painter.” He later defends his Characters as being precisely what he had said they would be: a portrayal of “mankind in general.”

La Bruyère’s portrait of humankind as it develops through the editions of the Characters has a paradoxical quality. As one of the major moralistes of 17th-century French literature, La Bruyère, like his counterparts La Rochefoucauld and Pascal, is a keen observer of human beings. What he observes, however, does not always correspond perfectly with what this orthodox Catholic monarchist believes; and therein lies something of the fascination that his work holds for readers today. On the one hand, La Bruyère thinks it possible to penetrate beyond the surface of human existence to uncover a fixed reality, the essence of a human being. On the other, he wonders, “...how shall I fix this restless, giddy, and irascible man... I depict him as devout...and he is already a freethinker.” Whence La Bruyère’s definition of a devout person as “one who under an atheistical king, would be an atheist.” In the end, La Bruyère admits, “Such a man’s inmost feelings can really not be described...he is not exactly what he thinks he is himself or what he appears to be.”

La Bruyère is one of the few major writers of 17th-century France to evince compassion for those on the lowest rungs of the social ladder. A committed monarchist convinced of the necessity of a social hierarchy, he believed, nonetheless, that the king should behave as a shepherd concerned for the wellbeing of his flock. A famous passage in the Characters evokes the plight of France’s peasants, reduced to the state of animals and unable to reap the benefits of the crops they have sown. Given the choice between belonging to the society of a nobility that does little good and is capable of great evil and that of the common people, La Bruyère declares firmly that “I should select, without hesitation, being a plebeian.”

What the Characters portray is not always an attractive sight, but each of the work’s perfectly crafted passages reveals an author who attempts to lay bare the truth. The drama of the text lies in the disparity at times apparent between what it reveals and what its author had imagined he would discover.

MICHAEL S.KOPPISCH

See also Character Sketch

Biography

Born probably August 1645 (baptized 17 August 1645) in Paris. Studied law in Orléans, licence in law, 1665; admitted to the bar, Paris, 1665. Bought office as king’s counsellor and financial treasurer, Caen, 1673 (sold, 1686); tutor to his sister’s daughters, from 1674; tutor, 1684–87, then secretary and librarian to Duke Louis II de Bourbon. Elected to the French Academy, 1693. Died (of apoplexy) in Versailles, 10–11 May 1696.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Les Caractères de Théophraste traduits du grec, avec Les Caractères ou mœurs de ce siècle, 1688; several substantially revised and enlarged editions, 1689–96; edited by R.Garapon, 1962, and J. P.Kaminker, 2 vols., 1966; as The Characters, or the Manners of the Age (various translators), 1699; translated by Henri van Laun, 1885 (reprinted 1992), Helen Stott, 1890, and Jean Stewart, 1970; selections translated by Elizabeth Lee, 1903

Other writings: dialogues, a discourse, and correspondence.

Collected works editions: Œuvres complètes, edited by Gustave Servois, 4 vols., 1865–82, revised edition, 1922; Œuvres complètes (Pléiade Edition), edited by Julien Benda, 1951.

Further Reading

Brody, Jules, Du style à la pensée: Trois études sur Les Caractères de La Bruyère, Lexington, Kentucky: French Forum, 1980

Delft, Louis van, La Bruyère moraliste, Geneva: Droz, 1971

Garapon, Robert, Les Caractères de La Bruyère, La Bruyère au travail, Paris: Société d’Édition d’Enseignement Supérieur, 1978

Gray, Floyd, La Bruyère, amateur de Caractères, Paris: Nizet, 1986

Jasinski, René, Deux accès à La Bruyère, Paris: Minard, 1971

Kirsch, Doris, La Bruyère ou le style cruel, Montreal: Presses de l’Université de Montréal, 1977

Knox, Edward C., Jean de La Bruyère, New York: Twayne, 1973

- Koppisch, Michael S., The Dissolution of Character: Changing Perspectives in La Bruyère's Caractères, Lexington, Kentucky: French Forum, 1981
- Michaut, Gustave, La Bruyère, Paris: Boivin, 1936
- Mourgues, Odette de, Two French Moralists: La Rochefoucauld and La Bruyère, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1978
- Richard, Pierre, La Bruyère et ses Caractères, Paris: Nizet, 1965
- Soler, Patrice, Jean de La Bruyère, Les Caractères, Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1994
- Stegmann, André, Les Caractères de La Bruyère, Paris: Larousse, 1972

Lamb, Charles

British, 1775–1834

Charles Lamb worked as a clerk for a mercantile firm from the age of 17 until he retired at 50. A writer by avocation, he published poetry, a novel, two plays, critical essays, stories for children (with his sister Mary), and familiar essays. His critical essays earned respect, and Tales from Shakespeare (1807), a collection of plot sketches for children, remains popular. The familiar essays, however, are the works on which his literary reputation rests. These essays began to appear in 1820, most of them in the London Magazine. Lamb later collected them in three volumes: two series of Elia (1823, 1828) and The Last Essays of Elia (1833). Selections were regularly anthologized for more than a century after Lamb's death, and the collection continues to receive critical attention.

Lamb helped shape the English essay. Before the Romantic period, the essay was defined by the work of Addison and Steele—familiar in tone, social and didactic in purpose. In the hands of Lamb and his contemporaries, the essay became familiar not only in tone but also in purpose. Rather than posing as models of a social class, Lamb and writers like William Hazlitt and Thomas De Quincey appeared personally in their own texts and declared their personal opinions. The personality of the writer merged with the substance of the essay. Lamb stands apart even from his contemporaries, however, in foregrounding the writer's personality, for two reasons. First, in Lamb's essays, the personality of the writer nudges the thesis off stage. Writing in the persona of Elia, a charming, curious, and talkative London bachelor, Lamb reminisces, describes a scene or a character, proposes one opinion only to replace it with another—often all of these in a single essay—never seriously advancing a thesis. One effect is that the reader, after “conversing” with Elia, is so well entertained as not to notice, or mind, the absence of a point. Elia's personal charm is the whole essay. Another effect of the essays' taking no strong stands, however, is that Elia's personality is elusive. A feeling of intimacy combines with a sense of never knowing where the essays rest intellectually. For these reasons, in Lamb's hands the English essay becomes not a vehicle for ideas, but a plaything, a divertissement.

The familiar tone of his essays comes partly from a conversational flow of words—

Lamb took great pains revising his texts in order to achieve the effect of conversational ease—and partly from a choice of the most commonplace subjects. The subjects of the essays suit the tone. Lamb—or Elia—does not try to figure out life, any more than he tries to explain himself personally. Delighting in the diversion of the moment, he chats ardently on ordinary topics. He recalls the adventure of a walk in town, portrays an odd character, or describes a familiar place. The most typical essays, and the most beloved, take up an array of homely, familiar themes, evident in a sampling of titles: “Mrs. Battle’s Opinions on Whist” (1821), “The South-Sea House” (1820), “A Chapter on Ears” (1821), “Grace Before Meat” (1821), “Witches, and Other Night Fears” (1821), “The Praise of Chimney-Sweepers” (1822), “A Dissertation upon Roast Pig” (1822), “The Tombs in the Abbey” (1823), and so on.

Lamb’s familiar tone was directed to a familiar audience—educated Londoners whom he knew personally. Although a stammer kept Lamb from pursuing a university education (which prepared one for the pulpit), he was gifted and well read enough to mingle with the intellectual elite. His stammer did not prevent him from attaining a reputation as a stimulating conversationalist. A sociable, kindly person, fond of jokes and puns, Lamb liked company. His eclectic social gatherings included well-known Romantics, and literature and art were frequent topics of conversation. Close to Coleridge, Hazlitt, Southey, and Wordsworth, Lamb also socialized with De Quincey, Hunt, and Keats, among others. In 1820 the founding of the London Magazine provided a public showcase for the wit of such social gatherings, and coincidentally guided Lamb to the medium best suited for his literary talents. Old friends and new literary comrades met in the London’s pages—and at monthly dinners—creating a milieu of fellow writers and readers who labored to impress and surpass each other, who stimulated and informed each other, and whose habitual acquaintance gave support and encouragement. It is this circle—and, by extension, the educated people of London in the 1820s—for whom Lamb primarily wrote.

Besides Elia’s playfulness and familiar tone, several other features distinguish Lamb’s style. His puckish humor moved him often to mix fact with fiction, historical accuracy with imagination. His love for the literature of previous centuries seasoned his essays with old-fashioned expressions and allusions to Shakespeare, Milton, and the prose writers Sir Thomas Browne, Robert Burton, and Thomas Fuller; even at the moment they were published, Lamb’s essays had an archaic flavor because of his taste for literature over a century old. He also possessed what he called an “antithetical manner,” which led him to entertain contrary viewpoints with equanimity. Finally, he was sentimental, sometimes to the point of sentimentality. Each of these idiosyncrasies contributes in its own way to the elusiveness of the essays, and together they have caused some critics to call them “quaint”; yet Lamb’s ability to make his own idiosyncrasies the subject of artful reflection helped create the familiar or personal essay.

No single passage can illustrate all of Lamb’s qualities, but perhaps a few citations can give a sense of his style. In Lamb’s most anthologized essay, “A Dissertation upon Roast Pig,” Elia professes to have found an ancient Chinese manuscript that describes the discovery of this delicacy. The alleged document tells how a father and son are tried for arson after they repeatedly burn down their house—the only way they know of roasting pigs, which are trapped inside. The two are acquitted, however, when the jury discover how delicious the evidence is:

The judge, who was a shrewd fellow, winked at the manifest iniquity of the decision; and when the court was dismissed, went privily and bought up all the pigs that could be had for love or money. In a few days his lordship's town-house was observed to be on fire. The thing took wing, and now there was nothing to be seen but fires in every direction. Fuel and pigs grew enormously dear all over the district. The insurance-offices one and all shut up shop. People built slighter and slighter every day, until it was feared that the very science of architecture would in no long time be lost to the world. Thus this custom of firing houses continued, till in process of time, says my manuscript, a sage arose, like our Locke, who made a discovery that the flesh of swine, or indeed of any other animal, might be cooked...without the necessity of consuming a whole house to dress it.

Here broad burlesque extends beyond its initial success and transforms itself gradually into finer humor. The series of quips, each topping the one before, recalls the playfulness of the talk that Lamb so enjoyed at social gatherings. This passage also presents fanciful material as if it were true, mocking Lamb's own antiquarian bent by treating the "manuscript" with scholarly respect.

Lamb's more sentimental, less detached nature appears and reappears alongside his humor. While these two qualities often complement and mitigate each other, occasionally sentiment waxes into reverie. In "Old China" (1823), for example, Elia's cousin and living companion Bridget (modeled on Lamb's sister Mary) reminisces longingly on earlier days. Life was better when they were poor, she says, because they appreciated so much more the purchases for which they had to scrimp and save:

Do you remember the brown suit, which you made to hang upon you, till all your friends cried shame upon you, it grew so threadbare—and all because of that folio Beaumont and Fletcher, which you dragged home late at night from Barker's in Covent Garden? Do you remember how we eyed it for weeks before we could make up our minds to the purchase, and had not come to a determination till it was near ten o'clock of the Saturday night, when you set off from Islington, fearing you should be too late—and when the old bookseller with some grumbling opened his shop, and by the twinkling taper (for he was setting bedwards) lighted out the relic from his dusty treasures—and when you lugged it home, wishing it were twice as cumbersome—and when you presented it to me—and when we were exploring the perfectness of it...and while I was repairing some of the loose leaves with paste, which your impatience would not suffer to be left till day-break—was there no pleasure in being a poor man?

Even in this sentimental passage, however, Lamb the craftsman does not let the essay rest on nostalgia alone. After Elia hears Bridget out, he returns a gentle rebuttal, "It is true we were happier when we were poorer, but we were also younger, my cousin..." Neither Elia nor Bridget can be said to "win" their hearthside debate—Elia gets the last word, but Bridget holds the floor longer. The essay concludes in a sort of suspension or synthesis, embracing the best of both arguments. Several of Lamb's essays exhibit this "antithetical manner." "Dissertation upon Roast Pig," for example, mentioned above, emphasizes the tenderness of the suckling to the point of making it an object of pity and even a symbol of Christ-like suffering. Yet the lightness of Lamb's touch avoids a collision between sympathy and appetite.

The elusiveness created by this and other devices of Lamb's style is a focus of much criticism of the essays, both negative and positive. Critics question whether Elia is Lamb, and what the essays reveal of the author's real thoughts. Many similarities between Elia and Lamb invite further comparison; and remarkable circumstances of Lamb's life make scrutiny of his essays more intense. As a young man Lamb lived with his sister Mary (ten years older than Lamb), their father and invalid mother and an aunt. When he was 21, Lamb returned home from work to find that Mary, in a fit of madness, had killed their mother with a knife. Lamb mastered the situation at that moment, kept his poise throughout the aftermath, and from then on devoted his life to his sister, caring for her personally rather than allowing her to be confined to an asylum. Lamb himself had spent six weeks in an asylum at the age of 20. He was known in adulthood as a bit of an eccentric, incurably informal in social situations, and possessed of high tolerance for unpopular opinions.

These circumstances of Lamb's life affect critics differently. One extreme of opinion regards him as a saint, not only for the essays' constant good spirits, but also for the image of Lamb smiling in the face of disaster, sacrificing himself for Mary. The other extreme regrets that the essays lack any direct reference to his mother, his sister, or his love life, and sees Lamb as a coward for refusing to grapple intellectually with life's difficulties.

Most contemporary criticism praised the prose as the work of a person whose benignity shines through it. The essays were loved for the sake of the author, and their literary merits were described in general terms. This brand of criticism continued for about a hundred years. New Criticism tended to see Lamb's essays in a negative light. In the 1960s, however, close readings of Elia began to appear which recognized artistic achievement in the essays and attempted to account for it.

This recent criticism has interpreted Lamb's elusiveness as subtlety. Perhaps the most comprehensive view sees the essays as foils for the overly serious mind. Robert Frank (1976) suggests that Lamb felt one could not write seriously to his contemporaries because they were already too serious—stuck in moral positions and incapable of suspending judgment. Lamb took as his task, then, to teach the reader to give up judging; to open the reader's mind by calling all ideas into question. Given a reader who is opinionated, a writer seeks to deflect, to dissolve, to disqualify serious debate in an attempt to achieve level ground. This may be the sober strategy behind Elia's elusiveness. Or Lamb may simply be expressing his own inclination to dwell (Zen-like?) in the moment.

WILLIAM ZEIGER

Biography

Born 10 February 1775 in London. Studied at Christ's Hospital, London, 1782–89, where he met Samuel Taylor Coleridge. Clerk for the merchant Joseph Paice, 1790–91, in the examiner's office of the South Sea Company, 1791–91, and in the accountant's office of the East India Company, 1792–1825: retired with pension. Had a nervous breakdown and spent six weeks in an asylum, 1795–96; suffered from melancholia throughout the rest of his life; guardian from 1796 of his sister Mary, who suffered from mental illness and periodically had to be confined. Associated with Coleridge, Robert Southey, and William Hazlitt, and William and Dorothy Wordsworth. Wrote Elia essays for the London Magazine, 1820–25; also contributed to other journals. Lived in Enfield, Middlesex, 1827–32, and Edmonton, Middlesex, 1833–34. Died (of erysipelas) in Edmonton, 27 December 1834.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Elia: Essays Which Have Appeared Under That Signature in the London Magazine, 1823; Second Series, 1828; both series, 2 vols., 1835; edited by W. Macdonald, 2 vols., 1929, Malcolm Elwin, with The Last Essays of Elia, 1952, and Jonathan Bate, with The Last Essays of Elia, 1987

The Last Essays of Elia, 1833; edited by Malcolm Elwin, with Elia, 1952, and Jonathan Bate, with Elia, 1987

Charles Lamb and Elia, edited by J.E. Morpurgo, 1948

The Portable Lamb, edited by John Masson Brown, 1949

A Lamb Selection: Letters and Essays, edited by F.B. Pinion, 1965

Lamb as Critic, edited by Roy Park, 1980

Selected Prose, edited by Adam Phillips, 1985

Other writings: the Tales from Shakespeare with his sister Mary (2 vols., 1807), the novel Rosamund Gray (1798), two plays, poetry, tales and poetry for children, and several volumes of correspondence.

Collected works editions: The Works of Charles Lamb and Mary Lamb, edited by E.V. Lucas, 7 vols., 1903–05; Works (Oxford Edition), edited by Thomas Hutchinson, 2 vols., 1908.

Bibliographies

Barnett, George L., and Stuart M. Tave, "Charles Lamb," in The English Romantic Poets and Essayists: A Review of Research and Criticism, edited by Carolyn Washburn Houtchens and Lawrence Huston Houtchens, New York: New York University Press, and London: University of London Press, revised edition, 1966:37–74

Livingston, Luther S., A Bibliography of the First Editions in Book Form of the Writings of Charles and Mary Lamb, New York: De Vinne Press, 1903

Thomson, J.C, Bibliography of the Writings of Charles and Mary Lamb, Hull: Tutin, 1908

Further Reading

- Barnett, George L., Charles Lamb: The Evolution of Elia, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1964
- Barnett, George L., Charles Lamb, Boston: Twayne, 1976
- Brier, Peter A., "Dramatic Characterization in the Essays of Charles Lamb," Coronto 8 (1973):3–24
- Cecil, David, A Portrait of Charles Lamb, London: Constable, and New York: Scribner, 1983
- Flesch, William, "'Friendly and Judicious' Reading: Affect and Irony in the Works of Charles Lamb," Studies in Romanticism 23 (Summer 1984):163–81
- Frank, Robert, Don't Call Me Gentle Charles! An Essay on Lamb's Essays of Elia, Corvallis: Oregon State University Press, 1976
- Greene, Graham, "Lamb's Testimonials," Spectator no. 5518 (30 March 1935):512–13
- Haven, Richard, "The Romantic Art of Charles Lamb," English Literary History 30 (June 1963):137–46
- Jessup, Bernard, "The Mind of Elia," Journal of the History of Ideas 25 (1954):246–59
- Monsman, Gerald, "Charles Lamb's Art of Autobiography," English Literary History 50 (Fall 1983):541–57
- More, Paul Elmer, Shelburne Essays, 2nd series, New York: Putnam, 1905
- Morley, F.V., Lamb Before Elia, Folcroft, Pennsylvania: Folcroft, 1973 (original edition, 1932)
- Mulcahey, Daniel J., "Charles Lamb: The Antithetical Manner and the Two Planes," Studies in English Literature, 1500–1900 3 (Autumn 1963):517–74
- Nabholtz, John R., "Elia and the Transformed Reader," in "My Reader My Fellow-Labourer": A Study of English Romantic Prose, edited by Nabholtz, Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1986
- Parker, Mark, "Ideology and Editing: The Political Context of the Elia Essays," Studies in Romanticism 30 (Fall 1991):473–94
- Pater, Walter, Appreciations, Evanston, Illinois: Northwestern University Press, 1987 (original edition, 1889)
- Randel, Fred V., The World of Elia: Charles Lamb's Essayistic Romanticism, Port Washington, New York: Kennikat, 1975
- Reiman, Donald H., "The Thematic Unity in Charles Lamb's Familiar Essays," Journal of English and Germanic Philology 64 (July 1965):470–78
- Schoenfield, Mark, "Voices Together: Lamb, Hazlitt, and the London," Studies in Romanticism 29 (Summer 1990):257–72
- Thompson, Denys, "Our Debt to Lamb," in Determinations, edited by F.R.Leavis, New York: Haskell House, 1970 (original edition, 1934)

Lange, Per

Danish, 1901–1991

The dualistic tenor of Per Lange's essays emerged from philosophical views already crystallized at the time of his debut in 1926. His collection of lyrics entitled Kaos og stjærnen (Chaos and the star) alluded to the Nietzschean sentence expressed in Also sprach Zarathustra (1883–85; Thus Spoke Zarathustra): "Man must still have chaos, to give birth to a dancing star." In both his poetry and his essays, the failure to overcome the chaos coincides with the image of the insatiable, lonesome wanderer. Particularly as an essayist, Lange assumed the voice of the traveler and the skeptic. As a philosophical aesthete and intellectual aristocrat, he gave expression to man's unrest and the division between the realizations of life and art. His aesthetic program recognized the duality of Apollonian and Dionysian styles of life.

Between Lange's career as a poet, in which he produced only three collections of lyrics, and his career as an essayist lie more than 20 years. His essay collections span the years from 1953 (Spejlinger [Reflections]) to 1982 (Udvalgte essays [Selected essays]). Some have recognized him as Denmark's most accomplished essayist. Part of that recognition can be ascribed to his defining the essay for modern Danish readers. With "Om essayets kunst" (1964; On the art of the essay), he reaffirmed the foundation of the essay and placed its home outside academia. The essay, he wrote, requires a "natural tête-à-tête" between author and reader. Essentially, the essay is nothing more than an expression of a personal whim disguised in artistic form. The essayist allows his public to enjoy the same expression.

Lange insisted that the essay is short; via Polonius, he reminded his reader that "brevity is the soul of wit." The shortness of the essay not only allows the reader a sense of freedom (he does not feel bound to the opinions of the author), but also encourages trust between the essayist and the reader. The essay should appear learned, but, as Lange explained, if there are holes in one's thinking, the essayist should view the world through those holes. His insistence that the essayist should not appear better versed than his readers was central to his writing. The essayist, according to Lange, "must make his reader his equal and create a sense of trust and he must never raise his voice to the extent that he might be perceived as wanting to convince."

The distinguishing feature of the modern essay is its ability to let the reader feel that he is alone with the author. In this regard, Lange recalled the English essayist Charles Lamb's notion of a "conversation with the reader." The sense of intimacy which emerges through such "conversations" gives way to the personal essay, for which Lange again looked to Lamb for inspiration.

In his essays Lange was not driven by the dictates of tendentious literature. He was, rather, an impressionable but discreet wanderer. The spectrum of his themes was broad; he wrote, on the one hand, on the lives of authors, composers, and artists, and, on the other, on God and death. Stylistically, Lange was indebted to Montaigne's essays and to La Rochefoucauld's moral maxims and reflective epigrams. He also drew inspiration from the English models Addison and Steele. In both his personal essays and his portraits Lange was a master of humor and irony.

VIVIAN GREENE-GANTZBERG

Biography

Son of the literary critic Sven Lange. Born 30 August 1901 in Hørsholm, near Copenhagen. Studied at Copenhagen University, from 1919. Lived in Austria, 1923, and Italy, 1926–27; visited Italy and Greece, 1958. Worked as a reader for Gyldendal publishers for many years. Contributor to Tilskueren (The spectator). Died in 1991.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Spejlinger: Essays, 1953

Ved musikkens tærskel og andre essays, 1957

Samtale med et æsel, 1961

Om krig og krigsmænd, og andre essays, 1966

Dyrenes maskerade og andre essayer, 1969

Udvalgte essays, 1982

Other writings: three volumes of poetry. Also translated from the French, English, and Swedish.

Bibliography

Dansk Skønlitterært Forfatterlexikon: 1900–1950, vol. 2, Copenhagen: Grønholdt Pedersen, 1960:174–75

Further Reading

Andersen, Harry, “Per Lange og hans essays,” Nordisk Tidskrift för Vetenskap, Konst och Industri 51 (1975):23–41

Frederiksen, Emil, in Danske digtere i det 20. aarhundrede, vol. 1, edited by Ernst Frandsen and Niels Kaas Johansen, Copenhagen: Gyldendal, 1951

Nielsen, Hans-Jørgen, “Formernes fastholdelse: Otto Gelsted, Tom Kristensen, Paul al Cour og Per Lange,” in Tilbageblik på 30'erne, vol. 2, edited by Hans Hertel, Copenhagen: Vendelkær, 1967:889–97

Sandersen, Vibeke, Essayet—oprøret og tradition, Copenhagen: Gyldendal, 1975:33–47

Thomsen, Ejnar, Digteren og Kaldet, Copenhagen: Gyldendal, 1957

La Rochefoucauld

French, 1613–1680

François VI, Duc de La Rochefoucauld, is best known for the Maximes, a work whose last title during the author's lifetime was Réflexions; ou, Sentences et maximes morales. The manuscripts of these mostly brief aphorisms were circulated in 1663 among a select group of guests of his friend, the Marquise de Sablé. The manuscript was leaked, and published first in a pirate edition dated 1664, almost certainly without La Rochefoucauld's complicity, in the interest of advancing the rigorous spirituality associated with the Augustinian theology of Jansenism and the monastery of Port-Royal. La Rochefoucauld immediately published an authentic edition late in 1664 (but dated 1665) and then, chiefly by dropping the prefatory discourse and the long initial maxim on "amourpropre," distanced himself from the Augustinian interpretation of his moral vision in a second edition of 1666.

La Rochefoucauld was also the author of other related works. They included an Apologie of 1649, disdainful of the chief minister, Mazarin; Mémoires, possibly begun before 1656 and again intended for circulation only among a select group of friends, but published without La Rochefoucauld's connivance in Belgium in 1662; and a series of 19 Réflexions diverses, of the greatest interest in the present context on account of the light they shed on the development of the essay genre in France.

Montaigne's Essais, first published in 1580, had been a series of often intimate disquisitions containing much moral and historical speculation. The chapters of his book, although not intended to be essays in the modern sense, are regarded as early examples of the essay. Between Montaigne and La Rochefoucauld the genre had developed in France, emerging from formal letters, often intended for publication, on subjects of interest to the cultivated classes, and from short treatises, sometimes written as polemic, often speculative, and occasionally appearing as prefaces to books. In La Rochefoucauld's Réflexions, the moral essay and historical essay can be seen for the first time to have clear links with another important genre emerging in mid-17th-century France: the portrait.

The portrait as a literary genre had begun in France in the mid-1650s, largely with the immensely popular novels of Madeleine de Scudéry, whose Clélie (1660–62) had included often idealized but recognizable portraits of members of the new salon society emerging after the mid-century civil wars known as the Fronde. Fifty-seven of the newly fashionable portraits were collected by two well-known literary figures, Jean-Regnaud de Segrais and Pierre-Daniel Huet, for a sumptuously bound collection published as Divers Portraits in 1659 by Mme. de Montpensier, "la grande Mademoiselle," niece of Louis XIII, who wrote 16 of them herself. The enterprising bookseller-publishers Claude Barbin and Charles Sercy then published as many portraits as they could lay their hands on, printing over 500 in the 1659 Recueil de portraits et éloges en vers et en prose (Collection of portraits and eulogies in verse and in prose), including some taken from the Divers Portraits.

La Rochefoucauld's first "essay" was probably the subtle self-portrait of 1658 included in Mme. de Montpensier's volume. He was to write other portraits, notably of the Cardinal de Retz, as well as of Mme. de Montespan, Richelieu, and the Comte d'Harcourt, but these were published only as an appendix to the Réflexions diverses, some at least of which were true essays, however closely related in subject matter and viewpoint to the briefer Maximes. Seven of the Réflexions diverses were first published in 1731, the other 12 not until 1863. La Rochefoucauld is known to have revised them toward the end of his life, but the dates of earlier drafts remain uncertain. They are much longer than the Maximes and some are nearer to the Mémoires in style, but it is not impossible that the famous maxim on "amour-propre," already an essay in all but name, was first conceived as a portrait of a moral state or motive personalized by La Rochefoucauld. It was certainly first published in the third part of Sercy's Recueil de pièces en prose very late in 1659, and was preceded by a letter addressed to a lady and signed by "L'Amour-propre," as by a male whom the addressee had rejected. It was suppressed as too open to a Jansenist interpretation after the first authentic edition of the Maximes, which began with it, but may well provide an early and striking example of the way in which the portrait evolved into the essay in France in the 1650s.

The 19 Réflexions diverses differ too widely from one another to form a coherent whole. Three, including the long 19th with its attached portraits, are devoted rather in the manner of Montaigne to the consideration of the peculiarities of history. Another four are virtuoso exercises on common themes, "the sea and love," "the relationship between human beings and animals," "the origin of sicknesses," and "coquettes and old men." Half a dozen concern social behavior and taste, while only four—"the uncertainty of jealousy," "the difference of minds," "inconstancy," and "retirement"—are clearly related to the maxims in focus and penetration by their psychological analyses.

La Rochefoucauld's essays are nonetheless marked by the same perceptiveness, wit, and restrained cynicism as are apparent in the Maximes. Sometimes the Réflexions are harsher, emphasizing pride rather than self-interest as a principal human motive, and invariably uncovering beneath a surface of social lustre reasons for the inevitability of inconstancy, insincerity, and hypocrisy. Underlying them is always an ideal of moral attitudes, social behavior, and a hierarchical division of personal qualities which reflect the instincts of a cultivated French social elite on the whole opposed to the increasing power wielded by the non-aristocratic but wealthy and educated bourgeois classes. La Rochefoucauld's cultivated tastes, his fastidiousness, and his psychological acumen keep him above anything so vulgar as snobbery. The foundation of his lasting power as a writer lies not in any implied defense of outdated moral qualities and social attitudes, but in the penetration and analytical skill for which he found the ideal vehicle in the short forms of essay and maxim. By developing the game of intelligent and sensitive society portraiture into a new literary genre, he also brought new life to the essay form in France.

ANTHONY LEVI

Biography

François VI, le Prince de Marcillac, Duc de La Rochefoucauld. Born 15 September 1613 in Paris. Married Andrée de Vivonne, 1628 (died, 1670): eight children. Maître de camp, 1629; served in Italy, the Netherlands, 1635–36, Rocroi, 1643, and Gravelines, 1644, and severely wounded at the Battle of Mardick, 1646. Imprisoned briefly by Richelieu for conspiracy against the court, 1637, then banished to Verteuil for two years. Liaison with the Duchesse de Longueville, from 1646. Participated in the Fronde (rebellions against the ministry of Cardinal Mazarin in the reign of Louis XIV), 1648–52: almost blinded in fighting in Paris, 1652; fled to Luxembourg, then allowed back to France and lived in Verteuil, 1653; allowed to live in Paris, 1656. Lived in retirement among a small intellectual circle, including Mmes. de Sablé, de Sévigné and de Lafayette. Took part in Louis XIV's Dutch campaign, 1667–68. Suffered from gout, from 1669. Died in Paris, 17 March 1680.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Apologie de M. le Prince de Marcillac, 1649

Mémoires, 1662; edited by Gabriel de La Rochefoucauld, 1925; as The Memoirs, translated anonymously, 1684

Sentences et maximes de morale, 1664 (Dutch pirated edition); as Réflexions; ou, Sentences et maximes morales, 1665 (actually 1664); revised and enlarged editions, 1666, 1671, 1675, 1676, 1678 (definitive edition), and 1693; as Maximes, edited by Robert L.Cru, 1927, Henry A.Grubbs, 1929, Frederick C.Green, 1945, Roland Barthes, 1961, Jean Starobinski, 1964, Dominique Secretan, 1967, and Jacques Truchet (Classiques Garnier), 1967; as Maxims, translated by Aphra Behn, 1685, A.S.Bolton, 1884, F.C.Stevens, 1939, Constantine FitzGibbon, 1957, Louis Kronenberger, 1959, and Leonard W.Tancock, 1959

Réflexions diverses, in Œuvres, vol. 1, edited by D.L.Gilbert and others, 1868; edited (with Maximes) by Henry A.Grubbs, 1929, S.de Sacy, 1965, Jacques Truchet (Classiques Garnier), 1967, and Dominique Secretan, 1967

Other writings: the autobiography Portrait de La Rochefoucauld par lui-même (1659) and journals.

Collected works editions: Œuvres, edited by D.L.Gilbert and others, 4 vols., 1868–93; Œuvres complètes (Pléiade Edition), edited by Louis Martin-Chauffier, revised by Jean Marchand, 1964.

Bibliography

Marchand, Jean, Bibliographie générale raisonnée de La Rochefoucauld, Paris: Giraud-Badin, 1948

Further Reading

- Baker, Susan Read, Collaboration et originalité chez La Rochefoucauld, Gainesville: University Presses of Florida, 1980
- Bishop, Morris, The Life and Adventures of La Rochefoucauld, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1951
- Clark, Henry C., La Rochefoucauld and the Language of Unmasking in Seventeenth-Century France, Geneva: Droz, 1994
- Hippeau, Louis, Essai sur la morale de La Rochefoucauld, Paris: Nizet, 1978
- Hodgson, Richard G., Falsehood Disguised: Unmasking the Truth in La Rochefoucauld, West Lafayette, Indiana: Purdue University Press, 1995
- Lafond, Jean, La Rochefoucauld, Augustinisme et littérature, Paris: Klincksieck, 1977
- Lewis, Philip E., La Rochefoucauld: The Art of Abstraction, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1977
- Magne, Emile, Le Vrai Visage de La Rochefoucauld, Paris: Ollendorff, 1923
- Moore, W.G., La Rochefoucauld: His Mind and Art, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1969
- Mourgues, Odette de, Two French Moralists: La Rochefoucauld and La Bruyère, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1978
- Rosso, Corrado, Procès à La Rochefoucauld et à la maxime, Pisa: Goliardica, 1986
- Thweat, Vivien, La Rochefoucauld and the Seventeenth-Century Concept of the Self, Geneva: Droz, 1980
- Watts, Derek, La Rochefoucauld, Maximes et réflexions diverses, Glasgow: University of Glasgow French and German Publications, 1993
- Zeller, Mary F., New Aspects of Style in the Maxims of La Rochefoucauld, Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America Press, 1954

Larose, Jean

French Canadian, 1948–

Jean Larose is many things to many people. For some, his statements about Quebec's political status within the Canadian Federation amount to sheer provocation. Others accuse him of elitism, because he has pointed out the shortcomings of the contemporary educational system, and is said to disdain mass media culture. A few nationalists reprove him for his use of European philosophy and literature. Still others think of him as one of the most important voices in the field of the Québécois essay. Despite these controversies, all would agree that, with four books in print, Larose has shown himself to be someone to be reckoned with in today's intellectual debate in French Canada.

Le Mythe de Nelligan (1981; The myth of Nelligan), Larose's first book, is closer to traditional literary criticism than the other three. The poems of Émile Nelligan serve as a starting point for the author's investigation of the origins—both of the poet and, by extension, of the nation. Born to a French Canadian mother and an Irish father, and confined to an asylum for most of his adult life, Nelligan was the sort of literary figure that lends itself easily to myth, and Larose uses that myth to scrutinize Quebec family ties from an anthropological and psychoanalytical point of view. In using a pastiche of the Marquis de Sade's epigraph to La Philosophie dans le boudoir (1795; Philosophy in the Bedroom) as the epigraph to his own book, Larose underscores the link between generations and between Europe and North America: "The son will prescribe the reading of this book to his father." Just as the complexity of family symbolic structures lies at the core of Larose's thought, so does the intricate web linking Quebec to France.

If Le Mythe de Nelligan was praised within literary circles, it did not get the media attention La Petite Noirceur (1987) was to receive six years later. Soon after it appeared, this collection of essays was nominated for the 1987 Governor-General's Award (which it subsequently won)—a prize given under the aegis of a federal government agency—and polemics raged. "Anti-Canada book up for national prize," read one headline. Most of the uproar came from a literal reading of the book's final chapter, "'Si tu reviens au Canada...': Lettre à une amie" ('If you come back to Canada...': letter to a friend). Here, in a letter to a fictional friend living in New York, Larose advises against coming back to the native country. His statements about Canada as a whole were designed to be provocative: "Leaving is the writer's last recourse against Canada."

The debate surrounding that essay diverted attention from the main issues in La Petite Noirceur, namely the relationship between culture and nationalism in Quebec. Larose's position was already clear from the title he gave his book: his petite noirceur (small darkness) refers to Quebec's grande noirceur (big darkness), the period that preceded the so-called Révolution Tranquille (Quiet Revolution) of the early 1960s. It is commonly accepted that the Quiet Revolution brought French Canada from being a closed and culturally retarded society into an open, modern nation. Not so, says Larose, who shows that the attitudes and misconceptions that precluded Quebec from producing any sustained culture for such a long time have remained the same up to this day. The author uses Lacanian theory—in a broad sense—to demonstrate how Quebec has not managed to move from imaginary modes of conscience to symbolic ones, how images matter more than the ways in which they are organized into symbols. Cultural mimesis is not culture, according to Larose.

L'Amour du pauvre (1991; Love of the poor) did not stir the same emotion throughout Canada as Larose's previous collection, although it raised many of the same issues from a slightly different perspective. What he had first called petite noirceur had transformed itself into pauvreté (poverty). Larose traces that poverty in a number of works of art, from movies to poems, as well as in the realm of teaching (the essays on that subject are the most controversial of the book). His general diagnosis remains that which he exposed in La Petite Noirceur: Quebec's intellectual poverty derives from its refusal to admit the distance between object and subject. The familiarity that prevails in Quebec's culture prevents its intellectuals from becoming part of "humanist modernity" in its fullest sense. This situation will not change until Quebec's intellectuals realize that, in order to liberate oneself, one has to fight against a "maître" (master).

La Souveraineté rampante (1994; Cringing sovereignty) is more explicitly political than Larose's previous works. This short pamphlet groups four texts that deal with the sovereignist movement's pusillanimity, and the cultural prejudices of a few of Larose's opponents. These essays are united by one theme, the resentment of Quebec nationalists toward their perceived colonizers. As a counterpoint to this resentment, Larose promotes a view of independence that is not based on traditional nationalist values, but on “vraie souveraineté” (true sovereignty) or “souveraineté souveraine” (sovereign sovereignty)—on a sovereignty that imposes itself shamelessly but in a positive rather than negative sense. For Larose, one has to be at the same time “québécois, américain et universel” (Québécois, American, and universal). Literature, argues the author here as in his other essays, should be at the forefront of that new political stance.

The essayist’s description of his own writing posture in that book is worth quoting, for it characterizes his style in all of his books: “Thus I could not keep my reflections to myself. Some will find them arrogant or rash, especially as they are not without my usual dose of exaggeration, but this gives me the opportunity to find a more universal truth than that which is limited to reasonable and profitable discourse...” In a nutshell Larose gives his concept of the essay. Reason is important to prose writing, but it cannot bring full light to any given subject all by itself. It needs to be mixed with exaggeration, as long as this is intentional. When Larose states that his motto is “juger raide” (judge tough) or that he wishes to “se dresser contre” (rise against), he never loses sight of his writing persona, that of a free intellectual promoting the radical use of language.

BENOÎT MELANÇON

Biography

Born in 1948 in Valleyfield, Quebec. Studied at the University of Paris VIII-Vincennes, Ph.D., 1979. Professor of French studies, University of Montreal, since 1979. Contributor to various journals, including Liberté, Québec Studies, La Revue Belge de Cinéma (The Belgian review of cinema), La Deriva delle Francofonie, Québec Français, and Le Devoir. For many years created radio programs for the French network of Société Radio-Canada. Awards: GovernorGeneral’s Award, for nonfiction, 1987; Victor-Barbeau Prize, for nonfiction, 1992.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Le Mythe de Nelligan, 1981

La Petite Noirceur, 1987

L’Amour du pauvre, 1991

La Souveraineté rampante, 1994

Further Reading

Dumont, François, “La Littérature comme point de vue: Trois essayistes québécois contemporains: André Belleau, Jean Larose et François Ricard,” Itinéraires et Contacts de Culture 18–19 (1995):89–96

Lévesque, Claude, Le Proche et le lointain, Montreal: VLB, 1994

- Melançon, Benoît, "La Fiction de l'Amérique dans l'essai contemporain: Pierre Vadeboncoeur et Jean Larose," Études Françaises 26, no. 2 (Autumn 1990):31–39
- Milot, Pierre, "La Division institutionnelle du travail intellectuel," in Pourquoi je n'écris pas d'essais postmodernes, Montreal: Liber, 1994:11–28
- Montreuil, Sophie, Le Travail du recueil, Montreal: University of Montreal Department of French Studies, 1996
- Pelletier, Jacques, Les Habits neufs de la droite culturelle: Les Néo-Conservateurs et la nostalgie de la culture d'ancien régime, Montreal: VLB, 1994

Larra, Mariano José de

Spanish, 1809–1837

Mariano José de Larra's output as an essayist was prodigious, and he gained from his essays a reputation as the first great modern Spanish writer. In addition to a novel, three original dramas, seven play translations, and several poems, he produced over 270 articles in only nine years. The depth and variety of his essays are likewise impressive, encompassing political, social, cultural, literary, and other issues, and provoking diverse and even antagonistic opinions. During the past 35 years his essays have received tremendous attention, which is evidence of their prominence in Hispanic and global literatures.

Larra's career as an essayist began when he founded El Duende Satírico del Día (The satiric spirit of the day) in February 1828. It was closed by the government for its social and political satires on 31 December 1828, after publishing only eight articles. He wrote no more articles until August 1832, when he founded El Pobrecito Hablador (The poor little tattler), where he established himself as a satirist. He solidified his career in La Revista Española (The Spanish review) from November 1832 to 1835. He also wrote simultaneously for other periodicals and weeklies such as El Correo de las Damas (The ladies' post), El Observador (The observer), and others, until he committed suicide in 1837. He never published his essays under his real name, using several pen names until he settled on Fígaro in 1833.

The articles published in El Duende Satírico del Día are insignificant—Larra even excluded them from his first collection published in 1835. These first articles suffered from many of the deficiencies characteristic of Spanish literature of that time, inherited from the previous century, such as excessive use of Latin words and gross abuse of gallicisms, quotations, and epigraphs, as well as the rigid neoclassical norms. Later essays, however, better illustrate the degree of development and civilization of contemporary Spanish society. Larra had the most lucid Spanish mind of his time, leading his contemporaries by several decades. This gave his articles a modern feel, and for that reason he still is in many ways a relevant author as well as perhaps the most outstanding figure of Spanish Romanticism.

Larra's life coincided with a monumental national crisis. During this period Spain suffered the atrocities and devastation of Napoleon's war. Then, upon King Ferdinand VII's return from exile in France, he rejected the newly drafted Constitution, ruled with an iron fist, had hundreds of liberals executed, and forced thousands into exile in France and England. He even had universities closed and opened instead a bullfighting school. At his death in September 1833, the Carlist Civil War engulfed the country. During Larra's life Spain never enjoyed a truly constitutional government such as various European countries had at that time. His desire, then, was to change Spain into a modern progressive nation, as he wrote in "Dos liberales, o lo que es entenderse: Segundo artículo" (1834; Two liberals, or understanding each other: second article): "This [Spain] does not go forward, and only a continuous opposition may save us. Target them, therefore, Mr. Figaro, and reform them with your satires."

For Larra, Spain was a grotesque deformation of Europe in which the Spanish people were subject to the will of a parasitic aristocracy and an avaricious clergy. His goal was to achieve social justice, and as late as August 1835 he believed that Spain soon would liberate itself from such horrible oppression. He wrote in "Conventos españoles: Tesoros artísticos" (Spanish convents: artistic treasures) that Spain "is at the critical moment of the transition, transition which could be more abrupt the more it has been desired and delayed." Thus Larra became perhaps the most authentic revolutionary of the entire Spanish 19th century, as some critics have stated. Less than a year later, however, he had lost all hope of reform in Spain. Although in Larra's opinion Europe had achieved a greater degree of political liberty than Spain, it still was not fully democratic either. He wrote in "Cuasi: Pesadilla política" (1835; Almost: political nightmare): "[there is] an almost eternal struggle in Europe between two principles: kings and people"—a struggle between the monarchies' desire to preserve their absolute power and the people's wish to establish democracy.

Larra's readers had an important bearing on his style, since he believed that writer and reader were bound together in a collective effort. This explains the dialogic nature of most of his essays, at times addressing his reader directly in a conversational tone. Although he addressed a large and diverse patronage, he assumed a high intellectual level in his readership. He left untranslated his quotations in Latin, French, English, and other languages, but the meanings are contextually lucid. Critics consider that he was the writer of his time who contributed most to the modernization of Spanish literary language and style. He was a precursor to the 20th-century Spanish essayists and philosophers Miguel de Unamuno and José Ortega y Gasset, although Larra's essays are less philosophical.

Larra's vocabulary, while extensive, is never obscure. It contains many neologisms and his ideas develop frequently through images and metaphors. His handling of viewpoints is complex and challenging, resorting to skillful ironies, distortion, and mirror techniques to outwit the strict censorship. His essays demand that today's reader be well-versed in Spanish culture and history of that time fully to comprehend his subtleties; they also require knowledge of Spanish, for the ironies and hidden meanings in his writings make translation difficult. Critics connect Larra's essays with the clandestine press of the end of the Spanish 18th century, especially with the writings of León de Arroyal, José Marchena, and Juan Bautista Picornell, as well as with Francisco de Quevedo and Francisco de Goya. He also had affinities to such British writers as Addison, Steele, and Swift, or the French Étienne de Jouy, Louis Sébastien Mercier, Restif de la Bretonne, and others. But Larra's essays, particularly after the death of Ferdinand VII in September 1833, capture the nature of the changes taking place in Spanish society.

As a critic Larra censured all that was an obstacle for the reform of Spain according to his progressive ideology. As a refined satirist, however, his attacks were never directed at a named person, but rather at deplorable acts. Since he takes issue with certain women's shortcomings, some shortsighted critics have accused him of misogyny, but on the contrary, he was a strong supporter of women's liberation, directly opposing the misogyny of others, for example in the review of "Todo por mi padre, escándalo en tres actos" (1837; Everything for my father, scandal in three acts): "It is commonly said that women are vulnerable 15 minutes a day. It would be useful to know when this occurs... we respect them too much to pay attention to such vulgarities." He blamed men's control of Spanish society and the lack of women's education for the denial of their rights and the abuses they suffered.

Larra's essays, despite their thematic diversity, constitute a work of great unity of objectives and techniques. Spain and the problems of the Spanish people are the common thread in his essays. Sadly, seeing such a depressing situation in his country, Larra lost his hope and the will to fight any longer for his ideals, as he wrote in "El día de difuntos de 1836: Fígaro en el cementerio" (1836; All-Souls' Day 1836: Fígaro in the cemetery): "My heart is but another sepulcher... Here lies hope!" Three months and II days later he committed suicide, an act he had already committed in his mind.

LUIS LORENZO-RIVERO

Biography

Mariano José de Larra y Sánchez de Castro. Used the pseudonyms Fígaro, El Duende, El Pobrecito Hablador, and others. Born 24 March 1809 in Madrid. Father collaborated with Napoleon, and family forced to flee to France, 1813; lived six months in Bordeaux; studied in Paris; family returned to Spain, 1818. Studied at the Escuelas Pías de San Antón; Colegio Imperial de la Compañía de Jesús, Madrid, 1823–14; studied philosophy in Valladolid, 1824–25, and in Madrid, 1825–26. Founder, El Duende Satírico del Día, 1828, and El Pobrecito Hablador, 1832–33; drama critic, La Revista Española, 1832–35; columnist, El Observador, Revista Mensajero (Messenger review), and El Correo de las Damas, 1833–35, and El Español, El Mundo (The world), and El Redactor General (The general editor), all 1836. Married Josefina Wetoret y Martínez [Pepita Martínez], 1829 (separated, 1834): one son and two daughters. Intimate liaison with Dolores Armijo, which ended when she decided to return to her husband; he shot himself that night. Died (suicide by gunshot) in Madrid, 13 February 1837.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Fígaro: Colección de artículos dramáticos, literarios, políticos y de costumbres, 5 vols., 1835–37; edited by Alejandro Pérez Vidal, 1989

Colección de artículos: Artículos dramáticos, literarios, políticos y de costumbres, publicados en varios periódicos de España (as Fígaro), 1844

- Artículos de costumbres*, 2 vols., 1874–75; edited by José R.Lomba y Pedraja, 3 vols., 1923–27; selections edited by Rubén Benítez, 1987, and Luis F.Díaz Larios, 1989
- Postfíguro: Artículos no coleccionados*, 2 vols., 1918
- Artículos de crítica literaria y artística*, edited by José R.Lomba y Pedraja, 1923
- Artículos políticos y sociales*, edited by José R.Lomba y Pedraja, 1927
- Los mejores artículos*, edited by Alberto de Segovia, 1930
- Selected Essays*, edited by Caroline B.Bourland, 1932
- Artículos completos*, edited by Melchor de Almagro San Martín, 1944
- Artículos varios*, edited by E.Correa Calderón, 1976
- Escritos sobre teatro*, edited by José Monleón, 1976
- Antología*, edited by Armando L.Salinas, 1977
- Artículos sociales, políticos y de crítica literaria*, edited by Juan Cano Ballesta, 1982
- Las palabras: Artículos y ensayos*, edited by José Luis Varela, 1982
- Artículos*, edited by Enrique Rubio, 1984

Other writings: three plays, a historical novel, and poetry.

Collected works edition: Obras, edited by Carlos Seco Serrano, in Biblioteca de autores españoles, 127–30, 4 vols., 1960.

Further Reading

- Aymes, Jean-René, “Las interpretaciones de la obra de Mariano José de Larra (1837–1978),” in Evocaciones del romanticismo hispánico, edited by John R.Rosenberg, Madrid: Porrúa, 1988
- Azorín, Rivas y Larra, in his Obras completas, vol. 3, Madrid: Aguilar, 1961
- Escobar, José, “‘El Pobrecito Hablador,’ de Larra, y su intención satírica,” Papeles de Son Armadans 64 (1972):5–44
- Escobar, José, Los orígenes de la obra de Larra, Madrid: Prensa Española, 1973
- Fabra Barreiro, Gustavo, “El pensamiento vivo de Larra,” Revista de Occidente 50 (1967):129–52
- Hendrix, William, “An Early Nineteenth Century Essayist,” Texas Review 4 (1918–19):238–44
- Ile, Paul, “Larra’s Nightmare,” Revista Hispánica Moderna 38 (1974–75):153–61
- Kirkpatrick, Susan, Larra: El laberinto inextricable de un romántico liberal, Madrid: Gredos, 1977
- Kirkpatrick, Susan, “Spanish Romanticism and the Liberal Project: The Crisis of M.J.de Larra,” Studies in Romanticism 16 (1977): 451–71
- Kirkpatrick, Susan, “Larra and the Spanish ‘mal du siècle,’” in Evocaciones del romanticismo hispánico, edited by John R. Rosenberg, Madrid: Porrúa, 1988
- Lorenzo-Rivero, Luis, Larra y Sarmiento: Paralelismos históricos y literarios, Madrid: Guadarrama, 1968
- Lorenzo-Rivero, Luis, Estudios literarios sobre Mariano José de Larra, Madrid: Porrúa, 1986
- Lorenzo-Rivero, Luis, Larra: Técnicas y perspectivas, Madrid: Porrúa, 1988
- McGuire, Elizabeth, A Study of the Writings of D.Mariano José de Larra, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1918
- Martín, Gregorio C., “Larra: Los artículos del miedo,” in Evocaciones del romanticismo hispánico, edited by John R. Rosenberg, Madrid: Porrúa, 1988
- Ruiz Otín, Doris, Política y sociedad en el vocabulario de Larra, Madrid: Centro de

Estudios Constitucionales, 1983

Rumeau, A., "Une copie manuscrite d'œuvres inédites de Larra: 1836," Hispanic Review 4 (1936):111–23

Tarr, F.Courtney, "More Light on Larra," Hispanic Review 4 (1936):89–110

Tarr, F.Courtney, "Larra's 'El duende satírico del día,'" in Mariano José de Larra, edited by Rubén Benítez, Madrid: Taurus, 1979

Ullman, Pierre L., Mariano José de Larra and Spanish Political Rhetoric, Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1971

Varela, José Luis, Larra y España, Madrid: Espasa-Calpe, 1983

Latin American Essay

see Spanish American Essay

Lawrence, D.H.

British, 1885–1930

D.H.Lawrence is one of the most important and prolific Modernist essayists. Lawrence wrote on an eclectic range of topics: aesthetics, botany, culture, education, literature, pornography, psychoanalysis, religion, sexuality, travel, and trousers. He even wrote an unconventional school textbook for Oxford University Press: Movements in European History (1921) was commissioned as a series of informal short essays, "vivid sketches of movements and people." His numerous prefaces, introductions, and book reviews clearly demonstrate his critical and commercial versatility.

In England, Lawrence's essay work appeared principally in the English Review and, later, the Adelphi magazine; in America, the Dial was his chief publishing outlet. The Dial's editorial interest in primitive art and culture was particularly germane to Lawrence's preoccupations. From 1912 Lawrence lived by his pen, and his feel for the popular journalistic market found expression in his essays for mass-circulation newspapers such as the Evening News and Sunday Dispatch. In these articles, the neglected side of Lawrence as an adaptable, professional wordsmith is evident.

In many ways, Lawrence's career starts and finishes with the essay. His earliest completed prose work, "Art and the Individual" (1908), originally delivered as a discussion paper, and his last full-scale text Apocalypse (1931), a death-bed commentary on the symbology of the Book of Revelations, are indicative of Lawrence's notorious tendency to preach. He adopted argumentative tactics as a distinctive stylistic means of redefining complacent literary forms. No area of Lawrence's writing is without the stamp of essayism. His novels habitually halt in mid-narrative, delivering polemics on marriage, politics, or cultural malaise; his letters are frequently self-contained essays or fragmentary drafts for essay projects; his later poetry is often direct commentary rather than traditional verse, indebted both to Pascal's Pensées and Nietzsche's use of the aphorism as guerrilla mini-essay.

As social critic, Lawrence dwells on the impact of technological change and the ways in which that change restructures "organic community," affecting consciousness and altering the sense of the physical human self. He observes how the crises of modernity reverberate in the most intimate corners of personal relationships, especially the sexual. Anticipating Michel Foucault, Lawrence regarded sex and power as vital codependants. He also believed that Western Christian culture was in decline, making way for the reemergence of ancient, esoteric knowledges which would put the human body and spirit back into a "true relation" with the cosmos.

That "true relation" was formulated and developed in a number of key essays, beginning with "Study of Thomas Hardy" (1914), a "philosophicalish" work of literary criticism combined with reflections on sexual morality and the universal principle of conflicting dualities, adopted from Heraclitus. Reacting to the outbreak of World War I Lawrence wrote: "What colossal idiocy, this war. Out of sheer rage I've begun my book about Thomas Hardy. It will be about anything but Thomas Hardy I am afraid." Lawrence's comments on his Hardy study establish two important features of his essay work. First, Lawrence always regarded the essay as historically engaged with momentous events; immediacy and combativeness color his style. He sometimes writes with the urgency of a Victorian sage—Carlyle, Ruskin, or Arnold—and his rhetoric is inflected by the prophetic language of a jeremiad. Second, Lawrence delineates his proclivity to argue laterally and vertically at the same time. A Lawrentian essay on any subject can suddenly become decentered; different knowledges multiply in the margins, unexpected propositions begin to circulate beneath the surface of the text. A good deal of Lawrence's essay work is characterized by the dissolution of discursive boundaries.

"The Crown" (1915, revised 1925) continued the Hardy investigation, and in related essays like "The Reality of Peace" (1917), "Democracy" (1919), and "Education of the People" (1920) Lawrence reconceived the essay as a form of intervention, a directive for the social implementation of his ideas. Many of his essays in the period between 1915 and 1925 are handicapped by inconsistent terminology and abstraction, as well as a tonal shift to condescension and authoritarianism. Lawrence may have written them as a trigger for political action, literally, but their didactic overdetermination makes them somewhat remote from readerly sympathies.

After 1919, Lawrence lived more or less permanently outside England, distanced geographically and ideologically from the centers of literary production and uncertain of his audience. His two psychoanalytic pamphlets, for example, are important lay responses to Freud; but Psychoanalysis and the Unconscious (1921) and Fantasia of the Unconscious (1922) also suggest Lawrence's embittered abdication of a public speaking position. The foreword to Fantasia unmasks Lawrence the coterie-essayist, assuming the role of explorer in difficult intellectual terrain, dismissive of the common reader who cannot follow: "I don't intend my books for the generality of readers. I count it a mistake of our mistaken democracy that every man who can read print is allowed to believe that he can read all that is printed." The foreword further avers that his speculative essays, "pollyanalytics," are "inferences made afterwards" from the "pure passionate experience" of his holistic creative moments. This is misleading, obscuring the extent to which Lawrence used the essay form to gloss his own oeuvre, to deploy the mythology of late Romanticism in imposing a false coherence upon the diversity of his writing. Lawrence needed the essay to explain himself and, indeed, to map his future moves.

In his literary criticism, Lawrence is consistently concerned with deconstructing the authority of the Logos. The essays collected as Studies in Classic American Literature (1923) were pioneering readings of mainstream American authors, critically observing the unstable, dialogic nature of the literary text that forever slips away from an author's conscious intentions. The Studies is prefaced with Lawrence's famous injunction: "Never trust the artist. Trust the tale. The proper function of a critic is to save the tale from the artist who created it." Lawrence's critical essays unseal subtexts which themselves are provisional to other proliferating knowledges. The reading process is complicated by the unstable subjectivity of the critic: for Lawrence, critical engagement with a text is always interactive, involving the simultaneous unraveling of the Word and a performance of the critic's deferred, divided self.

Lawrence wrote four book-length travel studies—Twilight in Italy (1916), Sea and Sardinia (1921), Mornings in Mexico (1927), and Etruscan Places (1932)—and several occasional sketches; they are major contributions to an essay form which had a special significance between the wars. The travel essays were aimed at a general reader, encouraging Lawrence to give material, experiential form to his beliefs within an established genre that was historically conditioned by the notion of "pleasurable instruction" and a demand for "the real." Travel writing allowed Lawrence to resolve the formal problems of essayism. Thematically, his fetishizations of the primitive, the organic, the agrarian, and "the spirit of place" are plausibly contextualized in narratives of crosscultural encounter. Structurally, the journey narrative, with defined points of departure and terminus, modulated Lawrence's lateral and vertical intellectual tendencies with a degree of accessible linearity. Tonally, Lawrence's oscillation between language registers—from the prophetic to the conversational, the waspish to the confessional—appears as a mobile response to changing psychic geographies. Lawrence could alternately represent himself as a popular interlocutor or a deracinated Arnoldian cultural remnant; as traveling, tale-telling essayist he indulged in both at once.

BRIAN MUSGROVE

Biography

David Herbert Lawrence. Born 11 September 1885 in Eastwood, Nottinghamshire. Studied at Nottingham High School, 1898–1901; University College, Nottingham (now University of Nottingham), 1906–08, teacher's certificate, 1908. Taught at Davidson Road School, Croydon, Surrey, 1908–12. Eloped with Frieda von Richthofen Weekley, 1912, and married, 1914. Lived in Germany, Italy, and Switzerland, 1912–14, then in England, 1914–19. Prosecuted for obscenity for the novel The Rainbow, 1915. Contributor to various journals and newspapers, including Adelphi, the Dial, the English Review, the Evening News, and the Sunday Dispatch; founder, with Katherine Mansfield and John Middleton Murry, Signature magazine, 1916. Lived in Italy, 1919–22, the United States and Mexico, 1922–23, England, France, and Germany, 1924, New Mexico and Mexico, 1924–25, Italy, 1925–28, and France, 1928–30. Died (of tuberculosis) in Vence, southern France, 2 March 1930.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Twilight in Italy, 1916

Sea and Sardinia, 1921

Movements in European History (as Lawrence H. Davidson), 1921

Psychoanalysis and the Unconscious (pamphlet), 1921

Fantasia of the Unconscious (pamphlet), 1922

Studies in Classic American Literature, 1923

Reflections on the Death of a Porcupine and Other Essays, 1925

Mornings in Mexico, 1927

Pornography and Obscenity (pamphlet), 1929

My Skirmish with Jolly Roger, 1929; revised version as A Propos of Lady Chatterley's Lover, 1930

Assorted Articles, 1930

Etruscan Places, 1932

Phoenix: The Posthumous Papers, edited by Edward D. McDonald, 1936

Selected Essays, 1950

Phoenix II: Uncollected, Unpublished, and Other Prose Works, edited by Warren Roberts and Harry T. Moore, 1968

Selected Poetry and Non-Fictional Prose, edited by John Lucas, 1990

Other writings: several novels (including Sons and Lovers, 1913; The Rainbow, 1915; Women in Love, 1920; Lady Chatterley's Lover, 1928), short stories, a novella, poetry, plays, letters, and travel writing.

Collected works edition: Works (Cambridge Edition), general editors James T. Boulton and Warren Roberts, 1980– (in progress).

Bibliographies

Cowan, James C., D.H. Lawrence: An Annotated Bibliography of Writings About Him, De Kalb: Northern Illinois University Press, 2 vols., 1982–85

Philips, Jill M., D.H. Lawrence: A Review of the Biographies and Literary Criticism, New York: Gordon Press, 1978

Roberts, Warren, A Bibliography of D.H. Lawrence, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, revised edition, 1982 (original edition, 1963)

Stoll, John E., D.H. Lawrence: A Bibliography, Troy, New York: Whitston, 1977

Further Reading

Andrews, W.T., "D.H. Lawrence's Favourite Jargon," Notes and Queries 13 (1966):97–98

- Balbert, Peter, D.H.Lawrence and the Phallic Imagination: Essays on Sexual Identity and Feminist Misreading, Basingstoke: Macmillan, and New York: St. Martin's Press, 1989
- Black, Michael, D.H.Lawrence: The Early Philosophical Works, Basingstoke: Macmillan, 1991; New York: Cambridge University Press, 1992
- Edwards, Duane, "'Inferences made afterwards': Lawrence and the Essay," in Essays on the Essay: Redefining the Genre, edited by Alexander J. Butrym, Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1989
- Eggert, Paul, "Lawrence and the Futurists: The Breakthrough in His Art," Meridian 1 (1983):21–32
- Ellis, David, "Reading Lawrence: The Case of Sea and Sardinia," D. H.Lawrence Review 10 (1977):52–63
- Ellis, David, "Lawrence and the Biological Psyche," in D.H. Lawrence: Centenary Essays, edited by Mara Kalnins, Bristol: Bristol Classical Press, 1986
- Ellis, David, and Howard Mills, D.H.Lawrence's Non-Fiction: Art, Thought and Genre, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1988
- Foster, Richard, "Criticism as Rage: D.H.Lawrence," in A D.H. Lawrence Miscellany, edited by Harry T. Moore, Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1959
- Gutierrez, Donald, "D.H.Lawrence's Golden Age," D.H. Lawrence Review 9 (1976):377–408
- Herzinger, Kim A., D.H.Lawrence in His Time, 1908–1915, Lewisburg, Pennsylvania: Bucknell University Press, 1982
- Holderness, Graham, D.H.Lawrence: History, Ideology, and Fiction, Dublin: Gill and Macmillan, and Atlantic Highlands, New Jersey: Humanities Press, 1982
- Joost, Nicholas, and Alvin Sullivan, D.H.Lawrence and the Dial, Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1970
- Meyers, Jeffrey, editor, D.H.Lawrence and Tradition, London: Athlone Press, and Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1985
- Musgrove, B.M., D.H.Lawrence's Travel Books (dissertation), Cambridge: University of Cambridge, 1988
- Schneider, Daniel J., D.H.Lawrence: The Artist as Psychologist, Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1984
- Schneider, Daniel J., The Consciousness of D.H.Lawrence: An Intellectual Biography, Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1986
- Simpson, Hilary, D.H.Lawrence and Feminism, De Kalb: Northern Illinois University Press, and London: Croom Helm, 1982
- Williams, Raymond, "D.H.Lawrence," in his Culture and Society, 1780–1950, London: Chatto and Windus, and New York: Columbia University Press, 1958
- Worthen, John, D.H.Lawrence: A Literary Life, London: Macmillan, and New York: St. Martin's Press, 1989

Leacock, Stephen

Canadian, 1869–1944

A prolific and popular writer whose essays and books continue to garner readers both at home and abroad, Stephen Leacock was a man comfortable in many worlds. An economist who studied under Thorstein Veblen at the University of Chicago, a dedicated university professor, and an internationally renowned public speaker, he wrote virtually uncountable essays on a wide range of eclectic topics from educational theory to contemporary politics. As Peter McArthur suggested as early as 1923 when Leacock had more than two decades of writing still ahead of him, any attempt to summarize this immense body of work “is an exhilarating, but somewhat bewildering task.” It is a mission that sweeps a reader from discussions of Western culture’s shortsighted enthusiasm for the false gods of technology (“Radio: A New Form of Trouble,” 1923), to explanations of “practical political economy,” to lighthearted looks at current trends in film and literature.

Leacock is best remembered, though, as a humorist, a writer for whom the study and practice of humor was “in the grain of [his] intelligence” (Robertson Davies, 1970); this was a man, after all, who proclaimed in the autobiographical preface to his Sunshine Sketches of a Little Town (1912) that he “would sooner have written Alice in Wonderland than the whole Encyclopaedia Britannica.” The essence of humor, which Leacock believed was captured most eloquently in such a work as Dickens’ Pickwick Papers, is “that it must be without harm or malice, nor should it convey even incidentally any real picture of sorrow or suffering or death.” The basis of humor lies, he maintained, “in the deeper contrasts offered by life itself,” most notably “the strange incongruity between our aspirations and our achievement” (“Humour as I See It,” 1916). Humor was a kind of consolation for the world, helping to reconcile us individually and collectively to things as they are in contrast to things as they might be. Indeed, both these definitions figure prominently in the Leacock oeuvre, proof not only of his willingness to accord humor status as “the highest product of our civilization” (“Humour as I See It”) but also of his propensity for self-plagiarism.

It is important to note that Leacock rarely locates the source of this comfort in the contemporary world. His essays, both humorous and serious, are often backward-looking, engaging various strategies in order to illuminate what he considered the positive aspects of vanished or vanishing sensibilities: “It is perhaps conceivable that literature has arisen in the past mainly on the basis of the inequalities, the sufferings and the misery of the common lot that has led humanity to seek in the concepts of the imagination the happiness that seemed denied by the stern environment of reality. Thus perhaps American civilisation with its public school and the dead level of its elementary instruction, with its simple code of republicanism and its ignorance of the glamour and mystery of monarchy, with its bread and work for all and its universal hope of the betterment of personal fortune, contains in itself an atmosphere in which the flower of literature cannot live” (“Literature and Education in America,” 1909).

Despite this proclivity to find solace in remembered times, Leacock was not a nostalgist. He understood progress as inevitable, and he proved an astute social historian and critic whose sense of where Canada was headed during a period of rapid social change and sudden economic development is frequently understated in critical writing about him. For him, the past represented a kind of vantage point from which he could peruse the modern world while remaining firmly grounded in what critics have called his Tory humanist belief in “the middle way,” in the benefits of reconciliation over confrontation, and in the values of the golden mean. His views on many subjects, as Gerald Lynch (1988) observes, “represent an attempt to balance the rights of the individual and the needs of the social organism, to temper the extremes of liberalism and socialism.” Emerging from this dialectic was a respect for the stability of an ordered community and traditional institutions, a belief in the benefits of human and political diversity, and a deep concern for human rights and social justice. At times, his writing in these areas hints at an essential uncertainty and unwillingness to commit to a single line of thought; more often, though, Leacock writes with assurance and optimism, comfortable with the knowledge “that no opinion is altogether right, no purpose altogether laudable, and no calamity altogether deplorable” (“A Rehabilitation of Charles II,” 1906).

One issue to which Leacock returned regularly in his legion of articles on history, economics, and political science was the question of “the Empire.” To him, Anglo-American imperialism was never irreconcilable with his own sense of nationalism but was a complementary “recognition of a wider citizenship” (The Unsolved Riddle, 1920). It was the nurturing of this broader sense of cosmopolitan responsibility that Leacock believed would effectively counterbalance the growing preoccupation with self-interest and the regressive “creed and cult of self-development” (“The Devil and the Deep Sea,” 1910) that he saw as threatening the stability of the modern world.

Although today’s reader may find Leacock leaning at times toward the politically conservative, most obviously in his dismissive attitudes toward early feminist concerns and socialism (the latter of which he often equates with utopianism), it is his irony, wit, and optimism that endure and continue to endear him to readers.

DAVID STAINES

Biography

Stephen Butler Leacock. Born 30 December 1869 in Swanmore, Hampshire, England. Family moved to Canada, 1876. Studied at Upper Canada College, Toronto, 1881–87; University of Toronto, 1887–91, B.A. in modern languages, 1891; University of Chicago, 1899–1903, Ph.D. in political economy, 1903. Taught at Upper Canada College, 1889–99, and the University of Chicago, 1899–1903. Married Beatrix Hamilton, 1900 (died, 1925): one son. Lecturer, 1903–06, associate professor, 1906–08, William Dow Professor of Political Science and Economics, 1908–36, then emeritus, McGill University, Montreal. Elected to the Royal Society of Canada, 1919. Charter member, Canadian Authors Association, 1921. Awards: Lorne Pierce Medal, 1937; Governor-General’s Award, for nonfiction, 1937; honorary degrees from three colleges and universities. Died in Toronto, 28 March 1944.

Selected Writings

Essays and Sketches (partly fictional)

Literary Lapses: A Book of Sketches, 1910

- Sunshine Sketches of a Little Town*, 1912
Behind the Beyond, and Other Contributions to Human Knowledge, 1913
Arcadian Adventures with the Idle Rich, 1914
Moonbeams from the Larger Lunacy, 1915
Further Foolishness: Sketches and Satires on the Follies of the Day, 1916
Essays and Literary Studies, 1916
The Hohenzollerns in America, with the Bolsheviks in Berlin and Other Impossibilities, 1919
The Unsolved Riddle, 1920
My Discovery of England, 1922
Over the Footlights, 1923
College Days, 1923
The Garden of Folly, 1924
Winnowed Wisdom, a New Book of Humour, 1926
Short Circuits, 1928
The Iron Man and the Tin Woman, with Other Such Futurities, 1929
Laugh with Leacock (selection), 1930
The Leacock Book, edited by Ben Travers, 1930
Wet Wit and Dry Humour, 1931
Afternoons in Utopia: Tales of the New Time, 1932
The Dry Pickwick and Other Incongruities, 1932
The Perfect Salesman, edited by E.V.Knox, 1934
Funny Pieces: A Book of Random Sketches, 1936
Here Are My Lectures and Stories, 1937 Model Memoirs and Other Sketches from Simple to Serious, 1938
Too Much College; or, Education Eating Up Life, with Kindred Essays in Education and Humour, 1939
Laugh Parade, 1940
My Remarkable Uncle and Other Sketches, 1942
Last Leaves, 1945
The Leacock Roundabout (selection), 1945
The Bodley Head Leacock, edited by J.B.Priestley, 1957; as The Best of Leacock, 1958
Feast of Stephen, edited by Robertson Davies, 1970; revised edition, 1990
The Social Criticism, edited by Alan Bowker, 1973
The Penguin Stephen Leacock, edited by Robertson Davies, 1981
My Financial Career and Other Follies, edited by David Staines, 1993
- Other writings: satirical novels and parodies, a college textbook on political science, books on humor and politics, biographies of Charles Dickens and Mark Twain, history books, and an unfinished autobiography (The Boy I Left Behind Me, 1946).

Bibliography

- Lomer, G.R., Stephen Leacock: A Check-List and Index of His Writings, Ottawa: National Library, 1954

Further Reading

- Bowker, Alan, Introduction to The Social Criticism by Leacock, edited by Bowker, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1996 (original edition, 1973)
- Bush, Douglas, "Stephen Leacock," in The Canadian Imagination: Dimensions of a Literary Culture, edited by David Staines, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1977
- Cameron, Donald, Faces of Leacock: An Appreciation, Toronto: Ryerson Press, 1967
- Cook, Ramsay, "Stephen Leacock and the Age of Plutocracy, 1903–1921," in Character and Circumstance, edited by John S. Moir, Toronto: Macmillan, 1970
- Curry, Ralph L., Stephen Leacock: Humorist and Humanist, Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1959
- Davies, Robertson, Stephen Leacock, Toronto: McClelland and Stewart, 1970
- Legate, David M., Stephen Leacock: A Biography, Toronto and Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1970
- Lynch, Gerald, Stephen Leacock: Hutnour and Humanity, Kingston and Montreal: McGill-Queen's University Press, 1988
- McArthur, Peter, Stephen Leacock, Norwood, Pennsylvania: Norwood, 1976 (original edition, 1923)
- Moritz, Albert, and Theresa Moritz, Leacock: A Biography, Toronto: Stoddart, 1985
- Pacey, Desmond, "Leacock as Satirist," Queen's Quarterly 58 (1951):208–19
- Staines, David, editor, Stephen Leacock: A Reappraisal, Ottawa: University of Ottawa Press, 1986
- Taylor, Charles, Radical Tories: The Conservative Tradition in Canada, Toronto: Anansi, 1982

Le Moyne, Jean

French Canadian, 1913–1996

Jean Le Moyne published only one book in his lifetime, but this book is a milestone in the history of the essay in Quebec. Since it appeared in 1961, Convergences has won numerous prizes, and was reprinted regularly as well as translated into English in 1966. The essays and articles Le Moyne collected and organized thematically were written between 1941 and 1961, and their subject matter ranges from the author's father to friendship, from science to dreams, from the oppressive clericalist climate in Quebec to the place of women in its culture. A few of these texts—especially the biblical exegeses of the book's fourth section—have lost most of their appeal, but Convergences remains to this day an object of intense interest and some dispute among critics (Jean-Marcel Paquette, Jacques Pelletier, Pierre Nepveu) and fellow essayists (Jacques Ferron, André Belleau, Jean Bouthillette, Jean Larose).

Le Moyne's most widely discussed essay deals with the work of his friend, the poet Saint-Denis Garneau (1912–43). Le Moyne was part of Garneau's inner circle of friends—which included Robert Charbonneau, Claude Hurtubise, Robert Élie, and Paul Beaulieu—and participated in the publication of Garneau's Poésies complètes (1949; Complete poetical works), his Journal (1954), and a selection of his Lettres à ses amis (1967; Letters to his friends). The opening lines of Le Moyne's essay entitled "Saint-Denys Garneau, témoin de son temps" (1960; Saint-Denys Garneau, witness to his time) set the tone for what follows: "I cannot speak of Saint-Denys Garneau without anger. For he has been killed." In reality, no one murdered Garneau, but, for Le Moyne, French Canada was guilty of causing the poet's premature death. If Garneau did not produce the oeuvre that was expected from him, it was, according to Le Moyne, because French Canada forced upon the poet an unbearable sense of guilt in an atmosphere of spiritual poverty. The essay appeared during what was to be known as Quebec's Quiet Revolution, where it struck a responsive chord in the intellectual upheaval taking place.

Other texts in Convergences are of equal importance. In response to a traditional obsession on the part of Quebec's clergy and elite with their province's "spiritual" mission in an essentially "materialistic" North America, Le Moyne tackled what he called "notre différenciation nord-américaine" (our North American differentiation), most notably in "Henry James et Les Ambassadeurs" (1951; Henry James and The Ambassadors). Challenging the fear of everything American that characterized Quebec's high culture for years, Le Moyne compares Henry James to F.Scott Fitzgerald, and chooses the former as the model of a universal writer who, while being ever conscious of an emerging North American civilization, never forgets his European roots. For Le Moyne, the process of the adaptation of European populations to North American places and cultures is the American "devenir" (coming of age); it is an ever-changing duality, an "American ambivalence" which only James managed to master. In the perception of this cultural process lies true grandeur.

Of the 28 texts collected in Convergences, seven deal with music, mostly classical; most of these bear the same title: "Rencontre de..." (Encounter with...). Le Moyne "encounters" Schubert, Wagner, Beethoven, Mozart, and Bach (whose Art of the Fugue he ranks first among all forms of human creation), and Negro spirituals. Le Moyne was not a musicologist, but he loved music and wanted to locate it within the larger context of spirituality; his encounters are testimonies to a revelation. The "theological perspective" which Le Moyne says is at the core of Convergences is linked to the physical pleasure of music: "If Christ does indeed include everything, how are we to pray outside of our physical bodies and cut off from the rest of the universe?" Paradoxically, humor is not absent from such serious reflections: "No instrument has given me as much pleasure as the organ. Except the steam locomotive."

Le Moyne's book gave him a distinct reputation in Quebec letters. Unlike many of his contemporaries, he (along with Gilles Leclerc, Jean Bouthillette, and Pierre Vadeboncoeur) wrote nothing but essays. His robust prose is heavily tainted with a metaphysical vocabulary rarely found in the essays of those who followed him. But it is above all his iconoclastic views that made him so compelling at the time his essays were published, and that make him the subject of continued dispute. At a time when most intellectuals lined up on the side of the Quebec sovereignist movement, Le Moyne staunchly opposed nationalism. At a time of intense attacks on every form of institutionalized religion, he was a profoundly religious man, and wrote at length on spiritual matters (his frequent attacks on the dualism of the flesh and spirit were particularly vituperous). Fond as he was of French literature (Bloy, Bernanos, Teilhard de Chardin, Jouhandeau, Jarry), Le Moyne did not circumscribe his artistic interests to the French-speaking world. Not only did he comment on books by James and Fitzgerald, music by African Americans, and movies by the Marx Brothers (he praises their “radical anarchy”), but he went so far as to claim, in 1956, that he never felt at home within the culture of his native French province. At a time when many felt proud of their Americanness—their so-called “américanité”—he reminded them of their European cultural past and wondered if it was possible to express the reality of North America in the French language. For these reasons, Jean Le Moyne remains widely discussed and controversial among the essayists of contemporary Quebec.

BENOÎT MELANÇON

Biography

Born 17 February 1913 in Montreal. Studied at the Collège SainteMarie, Montreal, B.A., 1933; began to go deaf; self-educated thereafter. Cofounder, La Relève (The relief), from 1934 (La Nouvelle Relève, from 1941); journalist, La Presse, 1941–41; city editor and literary critic, Le Canada, 1941–44; managing editor, La Revue Moderne (The modern review), 1953–59; also contributor to other journals, including Cité Libre (Free city) and Écrits du Canada Français (Writings from French Canada). Writer and researcher for the National Film Board, 1959–69. Special assistant and senior adviser to Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau, 1969–78. Married Suzanne Rivard, 1970. Named to the Canadian Senate, 1981–88. Awards: Governor-General’s Award, 1961; France-Canada Prize, 1961; Province of Quebec Concours Littéraires, 1967; Molson Prize, 1968. Officer, Order of Canada, 1981. Died in Ottawa, 1 April 1996.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Convergences, 1961; slightly different version, as Convergence: Essays from Quebec, translated by Philip Stratford, 1966

Other writings: edited works by the poet Saint-Denys Garneau.

Further Reading

La Bossière, Camille R., “Of Unity and Equivocation: Jean Le Moyne’s Convergences,” Essays on Canadian Writing 15 (Summer 1979):51–68

Nepveu, Pierre, “Le Poème québécois de l’Amérique,” Études Françaises 16, no. 2 (Autumn 1990): 9–19

Pelletier, Jacques, “Jean Le Moyne: Les Pièges de l’idéalisme,” in L’Essai et la prose d’idées au Québec, Montreal: Fides, 1985: 697–710

Pelletier, Jacques, “Jean Le Moyne, témoin essentiel: Une relecture des Convergences,”

Voix et Images 54 (Spring 1993):563–78

Pelletier, Mario, “Convergences trente ans après,” Écrits du Canada Français 78 (1993):163–73

Simon, Sherry, “Le Discours du Juif au Québec en 1948: Jean Le Moynes, Gabrielle Roy,” Québec Studies 15 (Fall 1992–Winter 1993):77–86

Leont’ev, Konstantin

Russian, 1831–1891

In his first two decades of literary activity (1854–76) Konstantin Leont’ev wrote mostly short stories and novels. His talent was recognized by Turgenev, who helped him with money, advice, and constructive criticism. Over the next two decades (roughly 1871–91) he produced a torrent of brilliant, provocative, and disturbing essays. In his final years he expressed some of his deepest insights in personal letters.

Two of Leont’ev’s central ideas—the priority of aesthetic over moral values and the benign effect of social conflict on cultural creativity—were expressed by the character Mil’keev in the novel V svoem kraiu (1864; Back home): “A single century-old magnificent tree is worth more than twenty faceless men; and I will not cut it down in order to be able to buy medicine [to treat] the peasants’ cholera!” It was doubtless the French Romantics who taught Leont’ev to view social violence as culturally creative. “Which is better,” Mil’keev asks rhetorically, “the bloody, but spiritually and culturally luxuriant Renaissance or the tame, prosperous, moderate existence of contemporary... Switzerland?”

Leont’ev was quite prepared to replace moral criteria by aesthetic criteria for judging societies, cultures, and religions. “What is useful to all of them,” he wrote, “we do not know and shall never know. What is beautiful, elegant, and lofty in them—it is high time we found out!” (“Srednii Evropeets kak ideal i orudie vseirnogo razrusheniia” [1871–84; The average European as an ideal and instrument of universal destruction]). Like Nietzsche, with whom he has often been compared, Leont’ev celebrated the “poetry of war,” regarding security, comfort, and tranquillity as destructive of cultural vitality and creativity. But his characteristic stress was on the “aesthetics” or “poetry” of social and historical life, in contrast to Nietzsche’s stress on the aesthetics of high culture. Leont’ev died before Nietzsche became known in Russia; but he would doubtless have consigned him to the despised “bookish, paper world” (knizhnyi i bumazhnyi mir) of universities and editorial offices.

In ancient Greece and Rome, as in medieval Europe and the present Ottoman Empire—in which he served for a decade as a Russian diplomat—Leont’ev saw vibrant diversity, held within cultural and sociopolitical bounds by the “despotism of an inner idea.” But in Western Europe’s present, and especially in its projected future, he saw only a dreary, prosaic conformity. He was outraged by the thought “that Moses went up to Sinai, the Greeks built their elegant acropolises, the Romans waged their Punic Wars, the handsome genius Alexander, in a plumed helmet, crossed the Granicus and fought at Arbela; that the apostles preached, martyrs suffered, poets sang, painters painted, and knights shone in the tourneys, only in order that the French, German, or Russian bourgeois, in his ugly and comical clothing, should sit complacently...on the ruins of all this past greatness" ("Pis'ma o vostochnykh delakh" [1882–83; Letters on Eastern affairs]).

Leont'ev's theoretical explanation of the decline of 19th-century European culture was based on a triadic schema of historical development borrowed from Nikolai Danilevskii. Historical cultures, like living beings, develop from a stage of "initial simplicity" to one of "flourishing complexity" and then sink, through a process of "leveling interfusion," to decay and death. Europe, which had achieved its flourishing complexity in the high Middle Ages, was already far advanced in the terminal process of leveling interfusion. It is not clear how seriously Leont'ev took this schema. But it is quite clear that it fed his "philosophical hatred" (as he himself called it) of the egalitarian, secularizing, democratizing, and standardizing tendencies of his time.

The "poetry of life," as Leont'ev saw it, could not be maintained, "without the mysticism and shaping beauty of religion, without the magnificence and threatening power of the state, without a resplendent and firmly established aristocracy" ("Plody natsional'nykh dvizhenii na Pravoslavnom vostoke" [1888–89; The fruits of national movements in the Orthodox East]). Despite Leont'ev's significant points of contact with Nietzsche, there are two key theoretical differences. The first is Leont'ev's attachment to religion and the churches (chiefly Russian Orthodoxy, but also Islam and Roman Catholicism). The second is Nietzsche's repudiation of Good Samaritanism in the name of "instrumental cruelty" toward the weak and uncreative. Leont'ev, in contrast, defended Good Samaritanism, urging compassion "for the nearest...the person encountered ...—charity toward the living and real human being whose tears we can see, whose sighs and groans we hear, whose hand we can actually clasp, like a brother's, in this present hour" ("Nashi novye khristiane, II" [1880; Our new Christians, II]). This stands in sharpest contrast to what in 1883 Nietzsche celebrated as Fernsten-Liebe, "love of the high culture of the remote historical future," as he rejected Nächstenliebe ("love of neighbor") and urged Nächsten-Flucht ("flight from one's neighbor"). Leont'ev was explicit in condemning the "feverish preoccupation" with the earthly welfare of future generations on the part of both socialists and utilitarians. Although Nietzsche was indeed feverishly preoccupied with the remote historical future, he joined Leont'ev in scorning the socialist and utilitarian concern for the "earthly welfare" of future generations. What he preached was concern for the cultural creativity of a handful of future Übermenschen (supermen)—quite a different matter.

Leont'ev introduced what might be called a Nietzschean corrective or corollary into his Good Samaritanism, insisting that Christian agape should not be one-sidedly "democratic"; it should be directed not only toward suffering workers or wounded soldiers (of whom he had direct experience during the Crimean War), but also toward the "high and mighty"—such as defeated generals or noblemen abused by the mob.

In his own time and after, Leont'ev's ideas were "heard but not heeded, read but not understood." It is only in our century, and especially in the past half-dozen years (and mostly in Russia) that this deep and original, if sometimes idiosyncratic thinker has been treated with full and deserved seriousness.

Biography

Konstantin Nikolaevich Leont'ev. Born 25 January 1831 in Kudinovo. Studied medicine at Moscow University. Served as a military surgeon in the Crimean War, 1853–56. Began publishing fiction, 1854. Married Elizaveta Pavlovna Politova, 1861. Served as a diplomat at the Russian consulate on Crete and in the Balkans, 1863–73; suffered from dysentery or cholera, 1871, then made a religious vow and lived for a year on Mt. Athos, Greece. Returned to Russia, 1874; spent much time at the Optina Pustyn monastery; censor in Moscow, 1880–87; took monastic vows and entered the Trinity Monastery, near Moscow, 1891. Died at the Trinity Monastery, 24 November 1891.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Vostok, Rossiia i Slavianstvo (The East, Russia, and Slavdom), 2 vols., 1885–86

Essays in Russian Literature: The Conservative View: Leontiev, Rozanov, Shestov, translated by Spencer E. Roberts, 1968: 225–356

Against the Current: Selections from the Novels, Essays, Notes, and Letters of Konstantin Leontiev, edited by George Ivask, translated by George Reavey, 1969

Zapiski otshel'nika (Notes of a recluse), edited by V. Kochetkov, 1992

Tsvetushchaia slozhnost': Izbrannye stat'i (Flourishing complexity: selected articles), edited by I. Simonova, 1992

Izbrannoe (Selected writings), edited by I. N. Smirnov, 1993

Izbrannye pis'ma, 1854–1891 (Selected letters, 1854–1891), edited by D. V. Solov'ev, 1993

Other writings: several novels (including Podlipki, 1861; V svoem kraiu, 1864; Iz zhizni khristian v Turtsii [From the life of Christians in Turkey], 3 vols., 1876; Egipetskii golub' [The Egyptian Dove], 1881), short stories, and works on literary criticism, including studies of Lev Tolstoi and Ivan Turgenev.

Collected works edition: Sobranie sochinenii, 9 vols., 1912–14.

Further Reading

Auden, W.H., "A Russian Aesthete," in his Forewords and Afterwords, edited by Edward Mendelson, New York: Viking Press and London: Faber, 1973:274–82 (article originally published 1970)

Berdiaev, Nikolai, Konstantin Leont'ev, Orono, Maine: Academic International, 1968 (original Russian edition, 1926; first English translation, 1940)

Dolgov, K.M., Voskhozhdenie na Afon: Zhizn' ii mirosozertsanie Konstantina Leont'eva (The ascent of Mt. Athos: Konstantin Leont'ev's life and world view), Moscow: Luch, 1995

Ivask, Iuri, Konstantin Leont'ev: Zhizn' i tvorchestvo (Konstantin Leont'ev: life and work), Berne: Lang, 1974

K.N.Leont'ev: Pro et contra: Lichnost' i tvorchestvo Konstantina Leont'eva v otsenke russkikh myslitelei i issledovatelei, 1891–1917 (K.N.Leont'ev: pro et contra:

Konstantin Leont'ev's personality and work as appraised by Russian thinkers and scholars, 1891–1917), edited by Aleksei Kozyrev and Aleksandr Korol'kov, St. Petersburg: Izd-vo Russkogo Khristianskogo Gumanitarnogo In-ta, 1995

Kline, George L., Religious and Anti-Religious Thought in Russia, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1968:35–54

Kologriwof, Iwan von, Von Hellas zum Mönchtum: Leben und Denken Konstantin Leontiew's, 1831–1891, Regensburg: Gregorius Verlag, 1948

Korol'kov, Aleksandr, Prorochestva Konstantina Leont'eva (The prophecies of Konstantin Leont'ev), St. Petersburg: Izd-vo S.Peterburgskogo Universiteta, 1991

Lukashevich, Stephen, Konstantin Leontev [sic] (1831–1891): A Study in Russian "Heroic Vitalism", New York: Pageant Press, 1967

Masaryk, Thomas G., The Spirit of Russia: Studies in History, Literature, and Philosophy, vol. 2, London: Allen and Unwin, and New York: Macmillan, 1955:207–20 (original German edition, 1913; first English translation, 1919)

Poliakov, Leonid, "The Conservatism of Konstantin Leontiev in Present-Day Russia: An Example of 'Encouraging Pessimism'," Russian Studies in Philosophy 35, no. 2 (Fall 1996):51–60

Yanov, Aleksandr, "Tragediia velikogo myslitelia" (The tragedy of a great thinker), Voprosy filosofii 1 (1992):61–88

Zenkovsky, V.V., A History of Russian Philosophy, vol. 1, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, and New York: Columbia University Press, 1953:434–53 (original Russian edition, 1948)

Leopardi, Giacomo

Italian, 1798–1837

Giacomo Leopardi forms with Ugo Foscolo and Alessandro Manzoni the great triumvirate of Italian Romanticism. His poetry, as well as his prose, shares with them a concern for Italian nationalism, the formative role of history, the problem of belief, and the tensions between past and present, humankind and nature. But where Foscolo and Manzoni played an active public role, Leopardi lived an interior life, recording and creating himself in the act of writing. This is most evident in his contributions to the essay. Aside from some early journeyman pieces, including a learned compendium on astronomy, a huge body of letters, and the essays Saggio sopra gli errori popolari degli antichi (wr. 1815, pub. 1846; Essay on the popular mistakes of the Ancients) and Discorso di un italiano intorno alla poesia romantica (wr. 1818, pub. 1906; Address by an Italian on Romantic poetry), Leopardi's most important prose writing falls into three groups: the Zibaldone, the Pensieri, and Operette morali.

The Zibaldone, literally "hodge-podge" or "commonplace book," was a sort of running diary in which Leopardi made notes and recorded his thoughts on philosophy, language, religion, science, art, politics, and history while he read and thought in his father's library. The idea came from a mentor who suggested that everyone with literary pretensions should keep a “written chaos” out of which orderly work might emerge. In a deeper sense, it became for Leopardi a dialogue with himself, what his biographer Iris Origo terms “a record of human solitude.” Kept between July 1817 and December 1832, the manuscript of the Zibaldone fills 4526 pages with entries ranging from brief fragments and notes to fully developed essays. In these he brings together a vast learning with profound meditation to develop theories of art and poetry that are comparable to and even superior to those of Goethe, Wordsworth, and Coleridge in their appreciation of literature. The Zibaldone was not published until 1898–1900, and so exercised no direct influence on Leopardi’s contemporaries. In retrospect, however, it offers a rich intellectual gloss on his poems and the Operette morali, as well as an important body of thought in and of itself.

During the last years of his life in Naples, Leopardi began to work on his Pensieri (Thoughts), preparing III entries. About two-thirds of these were derived from the Zibaldone. While the latter ranges over a wide variety of topics, the Pensieri, patterned after the Maximes (1665–78) of the French moralist La Rochefoucauld, is a melancholy examination of human character and behavior. But like Pascal’s Pensées (1670), also a prototype in theme and form, the Pensieri remained the fragments of a book that he could never finally bring together. They appeared only posthumously, in the 1845 edition of his collected works.

The Operette morali (Moral Tales) was the only major work of prose that Leopardi published in his lifetime. The 20 essays and dialogues that comprise the first edition (1827) were composed in a period of intense creativity from January to December 1824, running from “Storia del genere umano” (“The History of the Human Race”) to “Dialogo di Timandro e di Eleandro” (“Dialogue Between Timander and Eleander”). The second edition (1834) included two more; the final, complete edition, with 24 essays, did not appear until 1845, eight years after Leopardi’s death.

While ostensibly an imitation of the dialogues of the Greek satirist Lucian, Moral Tales represents a deeply personal exploration of human destiny and disillusion. The underlying spirit is that of Ecclesiastes as the dialogues weigh the various sides of human aspiration, only to find illusion and vanity. Aside from a favorable notice by Alessandro Manzoni, whose I promessi sposi (The Betrothed) was published in the same year, Moral Tales was largely ignored by a reading public uncomfortable with Leopardi’s materialism, pessimism, and skepticism. Nominated for the prestigious prize of the Accademia della Crusca, it was rejected in favor of a mediocre history of Italy. Only later would it receive admirers as varied as the German philosopher Arthur Schopenhauer and the Spanish writer Miguel de Unamuno.

Leopardi conceived Moral Tales as a single unified work, rejecting offers to have individual essays published separately in periodicals. Despite that, it brings together a diverse range of styles, subject matter, and forms, playing with various combinations of narrative and dialogue. “Dialogo della Terra e della Luna” (“Dialogue Between the Earth and the Moon”), for instance, a comic dialogue looking at the indifference of nature, follows the conventions of a literary dialogue akin to those of Lucian. “Dialogo della Natura e di un Islandese” (“Dialogue Between Nature and an Icelander”) treats the same theme, but with greater pathos and irony. “The History of the Human Race” and “Proposta di premi fatta dall’Accademia dei Sillografi” (“Announcement of Prizes by the Academy of Syllographs”) take the form of conventional essays, even if their subject matter is not conventional. On the other hand, “Il Parini, ovvero della gloria” (“Parini’s Discourse on Glory”) and “Detti memorabili di Filippo Ottonieri” (“Memorable Sayings of Filippo Ottonieri”) develop the frame of an essay in which lengthy passages are quoted. In fact, all of the voices appearing in Moral Tales are deeply personal and often autobiographical. In this, Leopardi anticipates the pseudonymous technique used by the Danish philosopher Søren Kierkegaard. The use of the dialogue, as well as the pseudonyms and multiple perspectives, allowed Leopardi to explore his own complex and conflicted views on the tension between aesthetic enthusiasm and philosophical pessimism, and between a desire to believe and an inability to do so. Moral Tales, like all of Leopardi’s prose, is marked by a blend of Romantic passion and classical clarity that makes him one of the masters of the 19th-century essay.

THOMAS L. COOKSEY

Biography

Born 29 June 1798 in Recanati. Suffered scoliosis as a child, and ophthalmia as an adult. Studied privately with tutors. Lived in Rome, 1822–23, Milan, 1825, Bologna, 1825–26, Florence, 1826, 1830–33, and Naples, 1833–36. Wrote for Fortunato Stella publishers, Milan, 1825–28. Became a count on the death of his father. Died in Naples, 14 June 1837.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

- Operette morali*, 1827; revised editions, 1834, 1845; edited by Saverio Orlando, 1976, Cesare Galimberti, 1978, Ottavio Besomi, 1979, Paolo Ruffilli, 1982, Edoardo Sanguineti, 1982, Giorgio Ficara, 1988, and Pietro Pelosi, 1990; as Essays and Dialogues, translated by Charles Edwards, 1882; as Essays, Dialogues and Thoughts, translated by Patrick Maxwell, 1893, and James Thomson, 1905; as Operette Morali, Essays and Dialogues, edited and translated by Giovanni Cecchetti, 1982; as Moral Tales, translated by Patrick Creagh, 1983
- Pensieri*, in Opere, vol. 1, edited by Antonio Ranieri, 1845, Cesare Galimberti, 1982, and Mario Fubini, 1988; edited and translated by W.S. Di Piero (bilingual edition), 1981
- Saggio sopra gli errori popolari degli antichi*, in Opere, vol. 4, edited by Prospero Viani, 1846
- Zibaldone*, 7 vols., 1898–1900; edited by Anna Maria Moroni, 2 vols., 1972, Emilio Peruzzi (facsimile edition), 10 vols., 1989–94, and Giuseppe Pacella, 3 vols., 1991; selection as Zibaldone, translated by Martha King and Daniela Bini, 1992
- Discorso di un italiano intorno alla poesia romantica*, 1906; edited by Ettore Mazzali, 1957, and Ottavio Besomi, 1988
- Selected Prose and Poetry*, edited and translated by Iris Origo and John Heath-Stubbs, 1966
- Poems and Prose*, edited by Angel Flores (bilingual edition), 1966

Other writings: poetry (collected and published in the Canti, 1831), a history of astronomy (wr. 1813, pub. 1878–80), and correspondence.

Collected works editions: Opere, general editor Antonio Ranieri, 6 vols., 1845–49; Tutte le opere (Mondadori Edition), edited by Francesco Flora, 5 vols., 1968–73; Poesie e prose (Mondadori Edition), edited by Rolando Damiani and Mario Andrea Rigoni, 2 vols., 1987–88.

Bibliographies

Bibliografia analitica leopardiana, Florence: Olschki, 2 vols., 1963–73

Carini, Ermanno, Bibliografia analitica leopardiana (1971–1980), Florence: Olschki, 1986

Giordano, Emilio, Il labirinto leopardiano: Bibliografia, 1976–1983, con una breve appendice, 1984–1985, Naples: Edizioni Scientifiche Italiane, 1986

Mazzatinti, G., and M.Menghini, Bibliografia leopardiana, Florence: Olschki, 3 vols., 1931–53

Further Reading

Barricelli, Gian Piero, Giacomo Leopardi, Boston: Twayne, 1986

Bini, Daniela, A Fragrance from the Desert: Poetry and Philosophy in Giacomo Leopardi, Saratoga, California: Anma Libri, 1983

Caesar, Michael, "Leopardi's Operette morali and the Resources of Dialogue," Italian Studies 43 (1988):21–40

Dotti, Ugo, "La missione dell'ironia in Giacomo Leopardi," Belfagor 39 (July 1984):377–96

Getto, Giovanni, Saggi leopardiani, Florence: Vallecchi, 1966

Koffler, Richard, "Kant, Leopardi, and Gorgon Truth," Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism 30 (Fall 1971):27–33

Negri, Antonio, "Between Infinity and Community: Notes on Materialism in Spinoza and Leopardi," Studia Spinozana 5 (1989):151–76

Origo, Iris, Leopardi: A Study in Solitude, London: Hamilton, 1953

Perella, Nicholas James, Night and the Sublime in Giacomo Leopardi, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1970

Ragione, Regini, "Ragione architettonica delle Operette morali," Rassegna della Letteratura Italiana 85 (September-December 1981):501–10

Singh, G., Leopardi and the Theory of Poetry, Lexington: University of Kentucky Press, 1964

Leopold, Aldo

American, 1886–1948

A major figure in the environmentalist movement, Aldo Leopold anticipated by a generation the need to recognize the interdependence of humankind and its natural environment. Leopold studied at Yale but felt limited by the laboratory; for him, research was best carried out in the environment, where both flora and fauna worked together. For many years, he worked for the U.S. Forest Service, studying erosion and preservation of the environment. He published more than 350 articles, but his quest was for an understanding that would bring together the natural world and the human being. He is remembered as the originator of the term “land ethic,” a naturalist, a hunter, and a member of the Ecological Society of America, the American Forestry Association, and the Audubon Society.

Leopold’s best-known books were both published posthumously. A Sand County Almanac was written as observations throughout the year at his sand farm in Wisconsin and prepared for publication by his son after Leopold died in 1948; Round River, a second collection of essays, was published by his son in 1953. The gentle, musing quality of Leopold’s essays and verbal sketches, as well as his carefully detailed observations of the unusual, the beautiful, or the wonderful in ordinary birds, fish, deer, flowers, trees, and sunrises appealed to a wide audience. Leopold has been widely read as a natural historian and for his concept of the “land ethic,” which treats the land as a “community” and emphasizes the symbiosis of all things, animate and inanimate. In the foreword to A Sand County Almanac, Leopold explains his attempt to bring together the ecological notion of community, the need to love and respect land, and the cultural insights that land can give. In blending these three concepts, he goes beyond ecology into the ethical principle of love and respect for land and into the land as a repository for human history. Indeed, his cultural insights are among the most memorable in his work; he writes, for example, on the impact on human culture of diverting streams or eliminating the fires essential to the prairie as an ecosystem. Leopold calls for a reexamination of “unnatural” things with an eye to “things natural, wild, and free.”

Leopold’s major themes include not only the interdependence of all nature, but his own and, potentially, humankind’s joy in participating in the ecosystem: working on the land (making a well-filed shovel “sing”), arising at 3:30 a.m. to catalogue the territorial chants of assorted birds, following the flight of migrating geese. He contextualizes his essays by noting that in the century since Darwin published Origin of Species, we should have had time to develop a sense of kinship with other life forms and an awareness that we are merely partners in the voyage of evolution.

Leopold’s style is simple, laced with poetic images such as that of a tiny spring flower that is “only a postscript to hope.” He is sometimes whimsically ironic, as when he writes of the “alphabetical conservationists” who work for the U.S. government but often lack a holistic view of nature and humankind, or of an educated woman, “banded [like the birds he banded to track] by Phi Beta Kappa,” who had never heard the geese overhead. Leopold speculates that education seems to suggest “awareness” of material objects that are worth far less. He is poetic when he traces an atom through a cycle—outside time—from breaking off a rock to passing into the bodies of animals, into a river, and finally into the sea, where it remains trapped for thousands of years.

The essay most representative of Leopold’s style and his ethic is “The Round River,” the title essay of the second collection. Drawing on the legend of Paul Bunyan, who was said to have discovered a circular river that flowed into itself, Leopold takes the notion and applies it to what he calls the “biota,” the circle of ongoing and constantly modifying life in which each species plays a role. Understanding this circuit, he argues, requires thinking that runs “perpendicular” to Darwin’s stream of evolution, looking at the whole rather than the individual species. Continuing the metaphor, he defines conservation in terms of learning to navigate the biotic stream. Declaring that the acknowledgment of land as organism is the major discovery of 20th-century science, he argues that we must learn to keep every part rather than to be profligate in destroying streams, prairies, creatures, species. By tracing the history of a German mountain and its greater fertility on one slope, he exemplifies the human lack of awareness of the effects of farming, cutting, trenching, diverting waterways, and otherwise tinkering with the earth as organism. Stability and diversity are interlocked, he contends, and we have neglected the small “cogs and wheels” in the larger whole. But not only do we need greater public awareness of the interweaving of individual and whole; we need to “refine” our “taste in natural objects.” Whereas fertility and diversity should be the keys to conservation, public debates link economics and biology and omit other considerations.

The essay ends with a whimsical analogy based on a bird dog that, in the absence of pheasants, hunted meadowlarks. Conservationists, Leopold writes, are like the bird dog: after failing to convince landowners to practice forest conservation, wildlife management, and fire control, they decided that a bureau could take care of the problem. Bureaucracy, he concludes, is the meadowlark that helps us forget that we really wanted a pheasant. For Leopold, ethics must be added to economic and biological considerations. If we try to understand the cycle of the round river and to develop a land ethic, we may eventually achieve conservation.

Long before such awareness became fashionable, Aldo Leopold encouraged development of an ethic of environmental management, an awareness of the interrelationship of all things. To accomplish his ends, he used whimsical humor and irony, imaginary journeys of atoms, tales of animals on his sand farm, and hunting lore. He has been compared with Henry David Thoreau and John Muir, but Leopold’s writings are unique: they speak of the need of one species for another, of animate life valuing the inanimate in landscape, of going beyond Darwin to a holistic view that incorporates human respect for the environment that produced us.

MARY ELLEN PITTS

See also Nature Essay

Biography

Rand Aldo Leopold. Born 11 January 1886 in Burlington, Iowa. Studied at the Sheffield Scientific School, Yale University, New Haven, Connecticut, B.S., 1908; Yale School of Forestry, Master of Forestry, 1909. U.S. Forest Service assistant, Apache National Forest, Arizona Territory, 1909–11; worked in various capacities as a forester at Carson National Forest, New Mexico, 1911–24. Married Estella Bergeve, 1914: three sons and two daughters. Secretary, Albuquerque Chamber of Commerce, 1918–19; associate director, Forest Products Laboratory, Madison, Wisconsin, 1924–28; game consultant, Sporting Arms and Ammunition Manufacturers Institute, 1928–31; professor of wildlife management, University of Wisconsin, 1933–48. Contributor to various journals, including the Journal of Forestry and the Wisconsin Agriculturalist and Farmer. President, American Wildlife Society, 1939, and Ecological Society of America, 1947; founding member, and vice president, 1945–48, Wilderness Society. Awards: Permanent Wild Life Protection Fund Medal, 1917; Outdoor Life Medal; John Burroughs Medal, 1977. Died (of a heart attack while fighting a grass fire) in Wisconsin, 21 April 1948.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

A Sand County Almanac, and Sketches from Here and There, 1949

Round River: From the Journals of Aldo Leopold, edited by Luna B. Leopold, 1953

Aldo Leopold's Wilderness: Selected Early Writings, edited by David E. Brown and Neil B. Carmony, 1990; as Aldo Leopold's Southwest, 1995

The River of the Mother of God and Other Essays, edited by Susan L. Flader and J. Baird Callicott, 1991

Other writings: a book on game management (1933), and game surveys of various regions.

Further Reading

Callicott, J. Baird, editor, A Companion to A Sand County Almanac: Interpretive and Critical Essays, Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1987

Flader, Susan L., Thinking like a Mountain: Aldo Leopold and the Evolution of an Ecological Attitude Toward Deer, Wolves, and Forests, Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1994 (original edition, 1974)

Lobiecki, Marybeth, Of Things Natural, Wild, and Free: A Story About Aldo Leopold, Minneapolis: Carolrhoda Books, 1993

McClintock, James, Nature's Kindred Spirits: Aldo Leopold, Joseph Wood Krutch, Edward Abbey, Annie Dillard, Gary Snyder, Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1994

Meine, Curt, Aldo Leopold: His Life and Work, Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1988

- Paul, Sherman, "The Husbandry of the Wild," in Essays on the Essay: Redefining the Genre, edited by Alexander J. Butrym, Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1989
- Potter, Van Rensselaer, Global Bioethics: Building on the Leopold Legacy, East Lansing: Michigan State University Press, 1988
- Sayre, Robert F., "Aldo Leopold's Sentimentalism: 'A Refined Taste in Natural Objects,'" North Dakota Quarterly 58, no. 1 (1991): 112–25
- Scheese, Don, "'Something more than wood': Aldo Leopold and the Language of Landscape," North Dakota Quarterly 58, no. 1 (1990): 72–89

Lessing, Gotthold Ephraim

German, 1729–1781

With Lessing German prose reached a new level of point and power. Nietzsche praised Lessing's unique gusto and precision that gave his prose new verve; Karl Jaspers described it as "philosophy in action." While his writings contain few pieces that fit the definition of the essay in the strict sense, the search for an essayistic, experimental, and tentative truth informs virtually all of Lessing's productions. The exposure and ridiculing of prejudices is already the task of the first plays like Der Freigeist (1753; The Freethinker), Die Juden (1749; The Jews), and Der Misogyn (1767; The Woman-Hater). Lessing's insistent critical alertness produces a new, striking, razorsharp style. Brief, pointed, uncompromising, yet flexible in his attacks, Lessing combines elegance, transparency, acuity, and logical stringency. His polemical tone reflects not simply a sublimated form of aggression but also the self-imposed imperative of honesty and veracity. The unrelenting rigor Lessing conjures in his writings not only means to challenge and often ridicule his opponents but, more importantly, aims to stake a claim for a public sphere which, in mid-18th-century Germany, was only just emerging.

Inspired by Pierre Bayle's Dictionnaire historique et critique (1697; An Historical and Critical Dictionary), Lessing wrote a series of Rettungen (rescues), a particular type of essay that attempts to redeem falsely accused or misrepresented authors fallen from grace because of their unpopular or supposedly dangerous opinions. There he reissues the warning against siding too precociously with what seems to be the truth without careful examination first. He stresses that even when the truth seems to be found, error still plays a crucial role in its discovery: "There is no use for the simile that one need not care about the wrong ways once the right one is known. For one does not get to know the former through the latter but the latter through the former" ("Rettung des Cardanus" [1754; Rescue of Cardanus]). When truth wins, he insists, no individual side has prevailed; rather it is a victory for all, for truth is never won just for oneself: "The losing party does not lose anything but its errors, and can thus partake at any moment in the victory of the other."

The concern with developing an open, liberal, and freespirted public space runs through all of Lessing's dramatic, literary, and philosophical works. A prolific journalist, critic, playwright, pamphleteer, reviewer, and editor, Lessing envisaged a free republic of letters. The ambition to become Germany's first economically successful freelance writer inspired him early on to emerge as a distinct critical voice. In addition to a steady stream of reviews and critiques, he experimented with new forms in which critics could express their concerns. In journals like Critische Nachrichten aus dem Reiche der Gelehrsamkeit (Critical news from the realm of scholarship), Berlinische privilegierte Zeitung (Berlin privileged newspaper), Das Neueste aus dem Reiche des Witzes (News from the realm of wit)—for which he also often served as editor Lessing advocates the acknowledgment of the public as an independent, self-regulatory power. His friendship with Friedrich Nicolai, an energetic publisher and promoter of the Berlin Enlightenment, and the philosopher Moses Mendelssohn, led to a close and intensive collaboration resulting in the creation of the first impartial and independent review of modern German letters, Briefe die neueste Literatur betreffend (Letters on contemporary literature). Provocative and witty, the Briefe initiate a dialogue between its authors and the public as a way of establishing a shared aesthetic and critical understanding of the nature of drama, poetry, and literature at large.

Against the “ut pictura poesis” (painting is like poetry) convention, the collection of essays Laokoon; oder, Über die Grenzen der Malerei und Poesie (1766; Laocoon; or, The Limits of Poetry and Painting) develops in a systematic fashion, marked by digressions and excursions into philology and conjecture, the intrinsic difference between painting and poetry. While painting is limited to representations of spatial ideas, poetry's limits and strengths consist in staging temporal representations, i.e. actions and processes. Unable to depict temporal difference, representations of an event like that which the Laocoon statue presents do not depict a process, but its “most pregnant moment.” On the other hand, spatial representations in literature are subject to transformation into the consecutive order of a progressing narrative.

In a series of fictitious letters, conversations, and in the running commentary Lessing fashioned for the Hamburg theater in his Hamburgische Dramaturgie (1767–68; Hamburg Dramaturgy), he critiques plays and their productions, poetry, translations, and other publications. Lessing's critiques play a crucial role in preparing the stage for the essay as the proper medium in which to argue for and eventually establish standards of taste and judgment. Indeed, such standards emerge, if not via the public exchange, then at least by way of the ongoing dialogue between Lessing and his friends, especially Mendelssohn. The consequence of this dialogue is nothing less than the transformation of the conditions of the truthfinding process. The criteria for truth now appear as something that can be conceived only as an ongoing exchange, which itself can be delimited solely in and through the public.

As a persistent philosopher of the Enlightenment, Lessing breaks ground for the freedom of investigation that formulates its own rules. Repealing the traditional restrictions of competence, he insists that every truth without exception must be exposed to discussion and dispute in the public sphere: “It may very well be the case that no dispute has ever settled the truth; but in every dispute truth has gained. Dispute has nourished the spirit of examination...” (Wie die Alten den Tod gebildet [1769; How the Ancients represented death]). Truth, therefore, is no longer an entity that can securely be arrived at once and for all. Rather it becomes an ideal toward which we can only strive, which we can approach more or less but never possess. In his pitiless exchange with the reform theologian Reverend Goeze, Lessing sums this up in an image: “It is not the truth that a human being possesses but the sincere effort in getting to truth that makes a human being... Possession makes one at rest, inert, proud—If God were to hold in his right hand all the truth and in his left the unique ever-active spur for truth, although with the corollary to err forever, asking me to choose, I would humbly take his left and say: ‘Father give! for the pure truth is for you alone!’” (Eine Duplik [1778; Counterresponse]).

If the truth-finding process is to remain open-ended, a result only of a dialogical procedure, then this must also be reflected in the method in which the truth-finding process is enacted. As a consequence, many of Lessing’s writings are presented as thought experiments. They do not arrive at definitive results but rather open up more questions. They cause the reader to address the problems anew. They emphasize the paradoxical and unresolvable features of historical truths, and the difficulties posed by a thorough application of logic.

Conceived as exercises and experiments, Lessing’s essays aim at revising conventional history. In contrast to a Voltairean mode, Lessing’s interventions do not pretend to reflect the truth; rather they call for a reevaluation of the entire epistemological situation. By turning answers into questions, and assumptions into problems, Lessing exposes prejudices and assertions as unproven conjectures devoid of reasonable grounds.

The work-in-progress quality of Lessing’s prose, its unfinished, open-ended, investigative character makes it difficult to answer the question of which literary genre, precisely, these writings belong to. At times scholarly, historical, theological, and polemical, they form a new kind of essay. As much as they derive their force from polemical dispute, they also aim to be more than just a victorious attack against the enemy. For these essays redefine the framework wherein arguments are supposed to take place in such a way that the truth-finding process itself is transformed into a critical enterprise. Thus it is precisely the “polemical” character in Lessing’s essays that frees them from the implicit, yet harmful polemics inherent in the dogmatic practice of scholastic philosophy. What presents itself as erudite and scholarly is unmasked by Lessing as the petty politics of lazy pretensions.

Some of the theological writings do take the form of theses, as was common in both Reformation and scholastic disputations. But it is not just Luther and his contemporaries whom Lessing may have followed in this: Bacon’s scientific aphorisms may have been another literary model. In Lessing the strands of vigorous Reformation and logically rigorous scientific thought combine to form a new way of reasoning. His thesislength paragraphs sketch out the skeleton of an argument that remains strictly objective and yet also projects essayistic qualities. Exemplary of this kind of essay is Die Erziehung des Menschengeschlechts (1780; The Education of the Human Race). Conceived as a thought experiment, this piece does not advance theses for disputation; rather it suggests a rethinking of the fundamental assumptions of religion and of the course of history.

Hermäa (wr. 1763), a project abandoned by the young Lessing, shows the author as a flâneur avant la lettre, one who undertakes excursions and digressions that depart from the deductive reasoning of a limited rationalism. Favoring the accidental, Lessing makes chance the legitimate guide for traveling the road to knowledge. By validating chance, he emancipates curiosity from the grip of dogmatic rationalism. Freed from conventions and customs, method is replaced by spontaneity and the sense for contingency is cultivated.

“Hermäa”—that which belongs to Hermes as the god of the roads, of traveling, mediation, but also of interpretation—were stone piles placed along highways dedicated to Hermes, the patron of travelers. Noting that Hermes is the god of both the roads and chance, Lessing’s Hermäa are an implicit commentary on the contingent character of methods, literally the “meta-ways.” His preface to Hermäa recalls Montaigne’s programmatic opening pronouncement in his Essais, transposing it to a German Enlightenment setting. Montaigne’s preoccupation with himself—or his “self” as the central and only meaningful concern—is now displaced by the author’s wandering mind, which promises rich returns from its intellectual adventures: “Imagine a human being with infinite curiosity and without the inclination for a certain discipline. Unable to give his mind a firm direction, he will wander through all fields of knowledge, admire everything, desire to recognize everything, and become disgusted with everything. If he is not without genius, he will notice a great deal, but get to the bottom of little.”

Lessing’s practice of writing presents a paradoxical project of controversy, dispute, and dialogical experimentation. How intimately Lessing experiences the connection of the thoughtprocess to his writing is expressed in a paradox in “Über eine zeitige Aufgabe” (1776; On a timely task): “What a pity I cannot think without the pen in my hand! What a pity! I only think for my own instruction. If my thoughts satisfy me, I tear the paper apart. If they don’t, I have it printed.”

WILLI GOETSCHEL

Biography

Born 23 January 1729 in Kamenz, Saxony (then part of the Holy Roman Empire). Studied theology and medicine at the University of Leipzig, 1746–48; University of Wittenberg, 1748 and 1751–52, masters degree in theology, 1752. Editor, with Christlob Mylius, Beiträge zur Historie und Aufnahme des Theaters, 1750; review editor, Berlinische privilegierte Zeitung; editor, Theatralische Bibliothek, 1754–58, Briefe die neueste Literatur betreffend, 1759–65, and Das Neueste aus dem Reiche des Witzes. Secretary to General Bogislaw von Tauentzien, Breslau, 1760–65. Theater critic for the National Theater in Hamburg, 1767–68. Librarian for the Duke of Brunswick, Wolfenbüttel, 1770–81. Member, Academy of Mannheim, 1776. Married Eva König, 1776 (died, 1778): one son (died in infancy). Died in Brunswick, 15 February 1781.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Laokoon; oder, Über die Grenzen der Malerei und Poesie, 1766; edited by Dorothy Reich, 1965; as Laocoon; or, The Limits of Poetry and Painting, translated by William Ross, 1836, E.C. Beasley, 1853, Robert Phillimore, 1874, Ellen Frothingham, 1874, W.B.Rönnfeldt, 1895, and Edward Allen McCormick, 1962

Hamburgische Dramaturgie, 2 vols., 1767–68; edited by Georg Zimmerman, 1879(?), Charles Harris, 1901, Julius Petersen, 1916, Hans Kaufmann, 1953(?), and Otto Mann, 1958; as Hamburg Dramaturgy, translated anonymously, 1962

Briefe, antiquarischen Inhalts, 2 vols., 1768

Eine Duplik, 1778

Die Erziehung des Menschengeschlechts, 1780; edited by Louis Ferdinand Helbig, 1980; as The Education of the Human Race, translated by F.W.Robertson, 1858, and Henry Chadwick, in Theological Writings, 1956

Theological Writings, translated by Henry Chadwick, 1956

Unvergängliche Prosa: Die philosophischen, theologischen und esoterischen Schriften, edited by Konrad Dietzfelbinger, 1981

Other writings: several plays (including Minna von Barnhelm, 1767; Emilia Galotti, 1772; Nathan der Weise [Nathan the Wise], 1779), fables, and correspondence.

Collected works editions: Werke, edited by Julius Petersen and Waldemar von Olshausen, 25 vols., 1925, supplement, 5 vols., 1929–35; Werke, edited by H.G.Göpfert and others, 8 vols., 1970–79; Werke und Briefe, edited by Wilfried Barner and others, 1985– (in progress).

Bibliographies

Bauer, Gerhard, and Sibylle Bauer, Gotthold Ephraim Lessing, Darmstadt:

Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1968; revised edition, 1986

Kuhles, Doris, Lessing-Bibliographie, 1971–1985, Berlin: Aufbau, 1988

Seifert, Siegfried, Lessing-Bibliographie, Berlin and Weimar: Aufbau, 1973

Further Reading

Blackall, Eric A., The Emergence of German as a Literary Language, 1700–1775, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1978 (original edition, 1959)

Dilthey, Wilhelm, “Lessing,” in Poetry and Experience, edited by Rudolf A.Makkreel and Frithjof Rodi, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1985

Goetschel, Willi, “Negotiating Truth: On Nathan’s Business,” Lessing Yearbook 28 (1997)

Heftrich, Eckhard, Lessings Aufklärung, Frankfurt-on-Main: Klostermann, 1978

Jaspers, Karl, “Lessing,” in his Die grossen Philosophen: Nachlass, vol.1, edited by Hans Saner, Munich: Piper, 1981:346–415, and vol. 2:726–63

McCarthy, John A., Crossing Boundaries: A Theory and History of Essay Writing in German, 1680–1815, Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1989

Pikulik, Lothar, “Lessing als Vorläufer des frühromantischen Fragmentarismus,” in Wolfram Mausser und Günter Sasse, Tübingen: Niemeyer, 1993:428–35

Letter

Although evidence for the existence of epistles can be found from earliest antiquity, the letter, as a rhetorical vehicle used for essay writing, developed from the Athenian oratory of Isocrates, from whom we have nine surviving letters as discourses, and flourished during the Hellenistic age. Epicurus embedded much of his philosophy in letter form. Thus by the time of St. Paul the elegant Hellenistic figures were firmly a part of the epistolary tradition, though some church historians such as Adolf Deissmann (Paulus [1911; St. Paul: A Study in Social and Religious History]) have argued strongly that the Pauline epistles are unliterary “conversations” intended only for a limited community. Among the Romans, however, the epistolary essay clearly became a literary type of the highest order. Cicero used the letter for some of the prose on political and ethical topics that most clearly exemplifies his periodic style. Many of the stoic treatises of Seneca, such as the Ad Marciam de consolatione (wr. c. 43 CE; To Marcia on consolation), were cast in epistolary form, while the letter in verse form also became popular with the elegant Romans. The Ars poetica (wr. c. 12–8 BCE; The Poetic Art) of Horace was actually his epistle to the Pisos, and the work of Ovid also included verse epistles.

Long letters on serious topics saw their next great flowering near the end of the Middle Ages. In fact, late Victorian and modern scholars have rediscovered and delighted in the epistolary form and in the way it took on increased importance as a vehicle for political, literary, and even scientific ideas. In the preface to his late lectures on the Life and Letters of Erasmus (1895), the great Victorian scholar J.A. Froude wrote, “The best description of the state of Europe in the age immediately preceding the Reformation will be found in the correspondence of Erasmus.” In England, Sir Thomas More was using the letter for similar purposes. Following the founding of the Royal Society, a century and a half later, the standard method for expressing new and elaborate ideas was in “letters” for publication in the transactions of the Society, a practice that continues to this day. (A typical example is the communication on “a case of squinting,” dated 10 March 1777, sent to the Royal Society by Erasmus Darwin, the grandfather of Charles Darwin, and clearly named after the great Erasmus.)

The letter as an elaborate literary form itself, and not just as a vehicle for ideas, enjoyed a major resurgence with the neoclassicism of the late Renaissance and Enlightenment. Alexander Pope rejuvenated the verse epistle of Horace, so that his An Essay on Man (1733–34) is set as an epistle to Henry St. John, Lord Bolingbroke. At the same time Voltaire published his Letters Concerning the English Nation, which are also known as “philosophic” letters because of their highly essayistic quality. Similarly, Charles de Montesquieu and Oliver Goldsmith made use of the long letter in prose to convey their ideas on culture, and in the course of so doing produced literature of a high quality. The form was widespread throughout the 18th and early 19th centuries, ranging from the Earl of Chesterfield’s Letters to His Son (wr. 1737 onward; pub. 1774) through a number of letter-essays by Edmund Burke, to Thomas Malthus on the “poor laws,” to de Crèvecoeur’s Letters from an American Farmer (1782), to Sydney Smith’s Peter Plymley Letters (1807) on religion and the Church.

The complex interface between the personal letter and that crafted as literature, which troubled scholars looking as far back as the Pauline epistles, took on an additional dimension with the epistolary novel, which evolved in the late Renaissance and continues to the present. Prime examples are the works of Samuel Richardson. He wrote (and printed himself) a how-to handbook on writing the personal letter (Letters Written to and for Particular Friends, 1741), much of which was realized in his seminal novel Pamela (1740–41). A century later, Anthony Trollope incorporated letters elaborately into many of his 47 novels, constituting one variation on the epistolary form in fiction; and Trollope, who worked for the British postal service, also illustrates how important the long personal letter became in the Victorian age. In the 20th century, Saul Bellow and John Barth are two American writers who have made complex use of the letter in literature. Barth's Letters (1979) is not only fiction but also essay in the most florid sense. Thus, in the last two centuries the distinction between the personal letter and more public forms of literary expression has become blurred almost beyond recognition. Some of the greatest writers have had their personal letters published as major works, often regarded as discussions of literature. An early example would be the letters of John Keats, which were originally personal, but which now appear in collections of essays on literary theory. Thus the ancient form continues to have an intriguing ambiguity of purpose and a vigorous potentiality in relation to the essay form.

DONALD M.HASSLER

Anthologies

- The Faber Book of Letters*, edited by Felix Pryor, London: Faber, 1988; Boston: Faber, 1989
- The Letter Book: Selected, with an Introduction on the History and Art of Letter Writing*, edited by George Saintsbury, London: Bell, 1922
- Love Letters: An Anthology*, edited by Antonia Fraser, London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1976; New York: Knopf, 1977
- Love Letters: An Anthology from the British Isles, 975–1944*, edited by James Turner, London: Cassell, 1970
- Love Letters: An Anthology of Passion*, edited by Michelle Lovric, New York: Marlowe, 1994
- The Oxford Book of Letters*, edited by Frank Kermode and Anita Kermode, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1995
- The Personal Art: An Anthology of English Letters*, edited by Philip Wayne, London and New York: Longman Green, 1949
- Postman's Horn: An Anthology of the Letters of Later Seventeenth-Century England*, edited by Arthur Bryant, New York and London: Longman Green, 1936; revised edition, London: Home and Van Thal, 1946
- Treasury of the World's Great Letters, from Ancient Days to Our Own Time*, edited by Max Lincoln Schuster, New York: Simon and Schuster, 1940

Further Reading

- Almeida, Teresa Sousa de, "Pour une théorie de la lettre au dix-huitième siècle," Studies on Voltaire and the Eighteenth Century 304 (1992):863–66
- Altman, Janet Gurkin, Epistolarity: Approaches to a Form, Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1982
- Altman, Janet Gurkin, "Epistolary Conduct: The Evolution of the Letter Manual in France in the Eighteenth Century," Studies on Voltaire and the Eighteenth Century 304

(1992):866–69

Altman, Janet Gurkin, “Teaching the ‘People’ to Write: The Formation of a Popular Civic Identity in the French Letter Manual,” Studies in Eighteenth-Century Culture 22 (1992): 147–80

Cherawatak, Karen, and Ulrike Withaus, editors, Dear Sister: Medieval Women and the Epistolary Genre, Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1993

Classen, Albrecht, “Female Epistolary Literature from Antiquity to the Present: An Introduction,” Studia Neophilologica 60, no. 1 (1988):3–13

Drew, Elizabeth, The Literature of Gossip: Nine English Letter Writers, New York: Norton, 1964

Exler, Francis Xavier J., The Form of the Ancient Greek Letter: A Study in Greek Epistolography (dissertation), Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1923

Fantazzi, Charles, “The Evolution of Erasmus’ Epistolary Style,” Renaissance and Reformation/Renaissance et Réforme 13, no. 3 (1989):263–88

Grassi, Marie Claire, “L’Art épistolaire français: XVIIIe et XIXe siècles,” in Pour une histoire des traités de savoir-vivre en Europe, edited by Alain Montandon, Clermont Ferrand: Faculté des Lettres et Sciences Humaines de Clermont Ferrand, 1994

Henderson, Judith Rice, “Erasmus on the Art of Letter Writing,” in Renaissance Eloquence: Studies in the Theory and Practice of Renaissance Rhetoric, edited by James J. Murphy, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1983

Howland, John W., The Letter Form and the French Enlightenment: The Epistolary Paradox, New York: Lang, 1991

Perelman, Les, “The Medieval Art of Letter Writing: Rhetoric as Institutional Expression of the Professions,” in Textual Dynamics of the Professions: Historical and Contemporary Studies of Writing in Professional Communities, edited by Charles Bazerman and James Paradis, Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1991

Redford, Bruce, “The converse of the pen’: Letter Writing in the Age of Johnson,” Yale University Library Gazette 59, nos. 1–2 (1984):49–96

Robertson, Jean L., The Art of Letter Writing: An Essay on the Handbooks Published in England During the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries, Liverpool: Liverpool University Press, 1942,

Saliba, Jaimee R., “Regulating the I-You: Gender, Dialogue, and the Epistolary Text,” Papers on French Seventeenth-Century Literature 21, no. 40 (1994):177–85

Levi, Primo

Italian, 1919–1987

“It is not at all an idle matter trying to define what a human being is.” So Primo Levi writes in L’atruì mestiere (1985; Other People’s Trades). The larger and more intimate implications of this occupation form the basis for most of Levi’s work.

Levi began his writing life as an essayist with Se questo è un uomo (1947; If This Is a Man), frequently described as a memoir, but really a series of linked essays describing his experience as a prisoner of Auschwitz during World War II, and analyzing a set of moral questions that arose from the unmediated culpability of his German captors and the Darwinian survival strategies of the inmates. Prior to his capture with the anti-fascist resistance in the Turin hills, Levi was beginning a career as a chemist. He tells us he had no literary pretensions before his experience at Auschwitz, though clearly he was well-educated and highly literate. The essay “Il canto di Ulisse” (“The Canto of Ulysses”) in If This Is a Man is a virtual collage of literary allusion in which Levi displays—as he elsewhere discusses—the fact that the accoutrements of civilization, which were a burden and disadvantage in the Lagers (concentration camps), also occasionally helped to remind him of his continuing existence as a human being: “As if I also was hearing it for the first time: like the blast of a trumpet, like the voice of God. For a moment I forget who I am and where I am.” “The Canto of Ulysses” is a tour de force, a major 20th-century essay, in its combination of the halting pain of first-person reminiscence, strategic quotation, fragmentary arrangement, and subtle attention to the interconnection of linguistic, literary, and moral considerations.

Levi frequently presents himself as a “witness” whose training in the sciences aids the scrupulous objectivity of his testimony. Indeed, a rigorous sense of logic and attention to detail runs through all of his work. Formally, this is perhaps most clear in Il sistema periodico (1975; The Periodic Table), a sequence of essays and stories organized by the elements, which have metaphorical or actual meaning in each piece. “Cerio” (“Cereum”), for example, ostensibly describes Levi and his friend Alberto’s construction of lighter flints out of rods of cereum, an activity which purchased Levi two months of life in the Lager’s black market. But as usual with Levi, the description of life in the camp is the largest subject within which complex subtextual material swirls. He begins “Cereum” with a sense of memory’s mutability: “At a distance of thirty years I find it difficult to reconstruct the sort of human being that corresponded, in November 1944, to my name or, better, to my number: 174517,” and proceeds to write a version of the friendship essay about the moral integrity of Alberto, ending darkly, even absurdly with the knowledge that Alberto’s death was perversely bartered back in Italy: “Alberto did not return, and not a trace remains of him; after the end of the war a man from his town, half visionary and half crook, lived for a number of years on the money he made telling his mother false consolatory tales about him.”

Levi committed suicide in 1987, his post-Holocaust battles for meaning and testimony exhausted by his sense that the Holocaust was already diminishing into a contextually compromised historicism. The last work he completed before death was the essay collection I sommersi e i salvati (1986; The Drowned and the Saved—also the title of the middle, literally central essay of If This Is a Man), which unifies the thematic complexities that marked his work from the beginning. In the earlier essay, Levi ponders the conundrums that inform all his work: how we are served by memory, and whether “it is necessary or good to retain any memory of this [the Lager’s] exceptional human state”; the meaning of “two particularly well-differentiated categories among men—the saved and the drowned,” and how these categories both can and cannot elucidate moral meaning outside of the concentration camp; the limits and possibilities of language for distorting and salvaging experience beyond ordinary limits. Here, as elsewhere, there is extraordinary tension in Levi’s work between the logical, rational, supposedly “objective” though morally essential processes of preserving memories of the camp, and the taxonomic (Levi is always fond of taxonomies) subjectivity he creates: Schepschel, Alfred L., Elias Lindzin, and Henri are the “saved” for whom Levi cannot conceal a deep distaste, despite his insistence on the moral qualification of evaluating the behavior of the victimized, broken men. And poignantly, Levi, too, is one of the “saved” for whom, as one moves through the essays, intellectual lucidity takes on the violence of a nightmare, a kind of hyperrationality which both undermines itself and threatens madness. His allusions to Dante’s Inferno, therefore, seem horrifyingly appropriate in the summoning of pain both of and beyond this world. How does one understand a world in which “The worst survived, that is, the fittest; the best all died” (“La vergogna” [“Shame”])? Perhaps this is possible through a sometimes pathetically small sense that the victory of man’s darkest impulses was incomplete. Certainly, Levi’s consolations are never theological. He rejects any spiritually redemptive reading of the Holocaust since this tends to proffer a moral reading of survival. In a stunning moment at the end of “Ottobre 1944” in If This Is a Man, Levi reacts to Kuhn’s prayer of thanks for not having been selected for the gas chamber and crematorium: “If I was God, I would spit at Kuhn’s prayer.” Hell can never be the best of all possible worlds.

In The Drowned and the Saved, Levi makes one last attempt to clarify his life’s writing, and the essays in the collection reflect 40 years of refined and reconsidered humanistic assays into the experience of the Holocaust, the “concentrationary reality,” as Levi calls it in “La zona grigia” (“The Gray Zone”). In The Drowned and the Saved Levi affirms his belief in the historical uniqueness of the Holocaust, while not completely separating or elevating it above subsequent horrors in Cambodia or South Africa. There are dangers in denying both the experience of history and the history of personal experience. Levi warns us that “Willingly or not we come to terms with power, forgetting that we are all in the ghetto, that the ghetto is walled in, that outside the ghetto reign the lords of death, and that close by the train is waiting.” Levi is a furious cautionary whose sense of urgency poses a sometimes faint glimmer of hope balancing against jeremiadic despair. If, for Levi, our language can only grope to contain and explain horror, the essay is an important site for linguistic exploration, encompassing individual memory, cultural and historical testimony, formal, aesthetic, and moral possibility.

While the Holocaust was Levi’s central and informing subject, he also wrote essays that venture lyrically into the natural world and childhood (“Tornare a scuola” [1985; “Going Back to School”], “Le più liete creature del mondo” [1985; “The Most Joyful Creatures in the World”]), “Il fondaco del nonno” [1985; “Grandfather’s Store”]), literary essays (“François Rabelais” [1985], “Scrivere un romanzo” [1985; “On Writing a Novel”], “Tradurre Kafka” [1983; “Translating Kafka”], “Dello scrivere oscuro” [1985; “On Obscure Writing”]), and the more general familiar essay (“Contro il dottore” [1985; “Against Pain”], “Bisogno di paura” [1985; “The Need for Fear”], “Del pettegolezzo” [1986; “About Gossip”]).

At their best, Levi’s essays contain a philosophical intensity that might be compared to Walter Benjamin, but with a scientist’s eye and a more singular, if complicated, sense of purpose.

DAVID LAZAR

Biography

Born 31 July 1919 in Turin. Studied at the University of Turin, degree in chemistry, 1941. Took part in the Italian Resistance during World War II, but was captured and held in Fossoli, then at Auschwitz concentration camp, 1944–45; returned to Italy, 1945. Industrial chemist, SIVA, Turin, 1945–47. Married Lucia Morpurgo, 1947: one son and one daughter. Contributor, La Stampa (The Press). Awards: Campiello Prize, 1963, 1982; Bagutta Prize, 1967; Prato Prize, 1975; Strega Prize, 1979; Viareggio Prize, 1982; Kenneth B. Smilen Award, 1985. Died (suicide) in Turin, 11 April 1987.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Se questo è un uomo, 1947; as If This Is a Man, 1960, and as Survival in Auschwitz: The Nazi Assault on Humanity, 1961, translated by Stuart Woolf

Il sistema periodico, 1975; as The Periodic Table, translated by Raymond Rosenthal, 1984

L'altrui mestiere, 1985; as Other People's Trades, translated by Raymond Rosenthal, 1989

Racconti e saggi, 1986; as The Mirror Maker: Stories and Essays, translated by Raymond Rosenthal, 1989

I sommersi e i salvati, 1986; as The Drowned and the Saved, translated by Raymond Rosenthal, 1988

Other writings: collections of stories (including La chiave a stella [The Monkey Wrench], 1978; Lilít e altri racconti [Moments of Reprieve], 1981), the narrative Se non ora, quando? (1982; If Not Now, When?), and poetry.

Collected works edition: Opere, 3 vols., 1987–90.

Bibliography

Giffuni, Cathe, "An English Bibliography of the Writings of Primo Levi," Bulletin of Bibliography 50, no. 3 (1993):213–21

Further Reading

Birkerts, Sven, An Artificial Wilderness: Essays on 20th-Century Literature, New York: Morrow, 1987

Böll, Heinrich, "Primo Levi and Saul Friedlander: Portrayals of Self and History," Connecticut Review 13, no. 1 (Spring 1991): 41–49

Camon, Ferdinando, Conversations with Primo Levi, Marlboro, Vermont: Marlboro Press, 1989

De Luca, Vania, Tra Giobbe e i buchi veri: Le radici ebraiche dell'opera di Primo Levi,

Naples: Istituto Grafico Editoriale Italiano, 1991

Eberstadt, F., "Reading Primo Levi," Commentary (October 1985)

Epstein, Adam, "Primo Levi and the Language of Atrocity," Bulletin of the Society for Italian Studies: A Journal for Teachers of Italian in Higher Education 20 (1987):31–38

Gilliland, Gail, "Self and Other: Christa Wolf's Patterns of Childhood and Primo Levi's Se questo è un uomo as Dialogic Texts," Comparative Literature Studies 29, no. 2 (1992): 183–209

Lowin, J., "Primo Levi's Unorthodox Judaism," Jewish Book Annual 45 (1987–88)

Patruno, Nicholas, Understanding Primo Levi, Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1995

Risk, Mirna, "Razionalità e coscienza etica di Primo Levi," Italian Studies 34 (1979):122–31

Rudolf, Anthony, At an Uncertain Hour: Primo Levi's War Against Oblivion, London: Menard Press, 1990

Sodi, Risa, "The Memory of Justice: Primo Levi and Auschwitz," Holocaust and Genocide Studies 4, no. 1 (1989): 89–104

Sodi, Risa, A Dante of Our Time: Primo Levi and Auschwitz, New York: Lang, 1990

Sodi, Risa, "Primo Levi," in Jewish Profiles: Great Jewish Personalities and Institutions of the Twentieth Century, edited by Murray Polner, Northvale, New Jersey: Aronson, 1991

Styron, William, "Why Primo Levi Need Not Have Died," New York Times, 19 December 1988

Tesio, Giovanni, "Primo Levi," Rassegna di Varia Umanità 34 (1979):657–76

Vincenti, Fiora, Invito alla lettura di Primo Levi, Milan: Mursia, 1973

Lewis, C.S.

British, 1898–1963

C.S.Lewis was the author of dozens of books in many different genres—literary criticism, children's stories, adult fantasies and novels, poetry, Christian apologetics (as allegory, autobiography, and broadcast). Probably best known as the creator of Narnia, a series of children's fantasy books, he is also one of the abler writers of the essay in the 20th century. Moreover, the distinctive Lewis style is consistent in occasional talks, apologetics, and literary criticism so that his work stands out among others' academic efforts.

Lewis' reputation as an essayist was made as a Christian apologist. During the Blitz of World War II he made four series of BBC broadcasts, from August 1941 to 1944. These radio talks, each ten minutes long, were intended to explain Christianity to the ordinary person; hence the qualities of the essay—conversational, simple, vivid, informative—were crucial and mask the breadth of references to learning. Already known for an allegorical tale, The Pilgrim's Regress (1933), The Problem of Pain (1940), and The Screwtape Letters (1942), originally published in the Manchester Guardian, Lewis in his radio talks presented the fundamentals of belief in a way especially suited to the time and audience. Response was enthusiastic, and Lewis became a popular figure, in both Britain and the United States. Almost immediately he published three volumes: Broadcast Talks (1942; also as The Case for Christianity), Christian Behaviour: A Further Series of Broadcast Talks (1943), and Beyond Personality: The Christian Idea of God (1944). A revised and enlarged edition appeared as Mere Christianity (1952), and continuing sales and testimonials of readers indicate its ongoing influence.

Lewis' style as an essayist, as well as a thinker, is clear in this work. Notable are the logical putting of a case and easy conversational quality. In the preface to Mere Christianity Lewis observes a distinction between talk and essay, explaining that he had expanded the contractions and recast sentences where he had voiced italics, "but without altering, I hope, the 'popular' and 'familiar' tone which I had all along intended." The "voice" of Lewis is consistent—direct and personable, with a clear argument presented with conviction combined with an evolving awareness of human limitation as his Christianity was more deeply experienced. The clear, and declared, antecedent for C.S.Lewis as an essayist is G.K.Chesterton, the great Edwardian essayist and Roman Catholic apologist. Lewis explains in Surprised by Joy (1955), a spiritual autobiography, that he first read Chesterton while in hospital recovering from wounds in World War I, when he was an aggressive atheist. Agreement about ideas was not the issue, but rather enjoyment, especially for "the humor which is not in any way separable from the argument but is rather (as Aristotle would say) the 'bloom' on dialectic itself." "[S]trange as it may seem," Lewis continued, "I liked him for his goodness." Further reading led to a conviction that "Chesterton had more sense than all the other moderns put together." Such crisp judgment is typical of Lewis, whose conviction about the rightness of his own point of view annoys many—as does Chesterton's. The two also share a delight in polemical argument, classical training, an extraordinary range of reading, and a relish of the good life, especially male company and friendship, and of many particularities of sense experience described with pleasure.

Lewis' essays combine a relentless Aristotelian logic—perhaps best deployed in The Abolition of Man (1943), ostensibly a reflection on education—with a use of metaphor that ranges from simple comparison to vision, carrying the argument more surely than logic would. He usually begins with something very ordinary, a little parable, like the quarrel in the opening of Mere Christianity, and then shows that the common experience has a universal basis; in this way he moves from particulars to moral absolutes. Analogy is a key technique in making abstract thought concrete, and often the analogy develops over several pages to produce the effect of proof. Association of ideas, not syllogism, determines the flow of a Lewis essay, which often includes fascinating and memorable digressions. Such strategies mask Lewis' Western habit of an either/or argument which fosters his extremes. Defenders of these limitations note that Lewis is competing against clever skeptics; opponents fault him for glibness and superficiality.

The Four Loves (1960) originated as radio talks in America. This late effort includes six chapters: "Introduction," "Likings and Loves for the Sub-Human," "Affection," "Friendship," "Eros," "Charity." As always there are clear definitions, often setting one view against another, and vivid parables; there is also a greater intensity of personal feeling and understanding, reflecting Lewis' late, brief marriage. The second chapter includes a long logical, systematic, and balanced consideration which could be considered a separate essay. As always, Lewis combines relaxed conversation with a careful progression of points to reach a conclusion stated with great conviction, having been presented with countless ordinary details and many references to literature and theology, and to Western culture.

A volume of Selected Literary Essays (1969) shows Lewis as the scholar who wrote about William Morris, Jane Austen, Rudyard Kipling, and Sir Walter Scott, as well as verse forms and medieval and Renaissance authors and texts; such writing made him famous as a literary critic and historian in several notable books. Written between 1932 and 1962, the essays reveal both the range of Lewis' knowledge and the consistency of his personal interests and style. The scholarly essays contain footnotes and less familiar references, but the manner closely resembles that of the broadcast essays—personal, conversational, excited by argument, assured. Lewis called his own selected collection of his essays They Asked for a Paper (1962), a title that suggests his response to challenges and reflects how much he sustained “an atmosphere of hopeful debate,” a characteristic of the Edwardian intellectual life of his childhood, while presenting himself as an anachronism who admired and loved the Middle Ages and Renaissance (which he saw as less antithetical than usually argued) and believed as a Christian in an age when few shared his values.

At the end of the 20th century Lewis' ideas require yet more vigor to convince a jaded audience, but the legacy of the essays is an alternate way of thinking embodied in the style as well as the statements.

VELMA BOURGEOIS RICHMOND

Biography

Clive Staples Lewis. Born 29 November 1898 in Belfast. Studied at Cherbourg School, Malvern, Worcestershire, 1911–13; Malvern College, 1913–14; privately, in Great Bookham, Surrey, 1914–17; University College, Oxford (Chancellor's English Essay Prize, 1921), 1917, 1919–23, B.A., 1921. Served as first lieutenant in the Somerset Light Infantry, 1917–19. Philosophy tutor and lecturer in English, University College, Oxford, 1924, and fellow and tutor in English, Magdalen College, Oxford, 1925–54; professor of medieval and Renaissance English, Cambridge University, 1954–63. Married Joy Davidman Gresham, 1956 (died, 1960); two stepsons. Awards: Gollancz Prize, 1937; Library Association Carnegie Medal, for The Chronicles of Narnia, 1957; honorary degrees from five universities; Honorary Fellow, Magdalen College, Oxford, 1955, University College, Oxford, 1958, and Magdalene College, Cambridge, 1963; Fellow, Royal Society of Literature, 1948, and British Academy, 1955. Died in Oxford, 22 November 1963.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Rehabilitations and Other Essays, 1939

- The Personal Heresy*, with E.M.W.Tillyard, 1939
Broadcast Talks, 1942; as The Case for Christianity, 1943
Christian Behaviour: A Further Series of Broadcast Talks, 1943
The Abolition of Man; or, Reflections on Education (lectures), 1943
English Literature in the Sixteenth Century (Clark lectures at Trinity College, Cambridge), 1944
Beyond Personality: The Christian Idea of God, 1944
Transposition, and Other Addresses, 1949; as The Weight of Glory, and Other Addresses, 1949
Mere Christianity, 1952
The Four Loves, 1960
The World's Last Night, and Other Essays, 1960
Studies in Words, 1960
They Asked for a Paper, 1962
Of Other Worlds: Essays and Stories, edited by Walter Hooper, 1966
Studies in Medieval and Renaissance Literature, edited by Walter Hooper, 1967
Christian Reflections, edited by Walter Hooper, 1967
A Mind Awake: An Anthology of C.S.Lewis, edited by Clyde S. Kilby, 1968
Selected Literary Essays, edited by Walter Hooper, 1969
God in the Dock: Essays on Theology and Ethics, edited by Walter Hooper, 1970; as Undeceptions: Essays on Theology and Ethics, 1971
Fern-Seed and Elephants and Other Essays on Christianity, edited by Walter Hooper, 1975
On Stories and Other Essays on Literature, edited by Walter Hooper, 1982
First and Second Things: Essays on Theology and Ethics, edited by Walter Hooper, 1985
Present Concerns, edited by Walter Hooper, 1986
Timeless at Heart: Essays on Theology, edited by Walter Hooper, 1987
The Essential C.S.Lewis, edited by Lyle W.Dorsett, 1988 Christian Reunion and Other Essays, 1990
- Other writings: the fiction series for children The Chronicles of Narnia (1950–56), an adult science-fiction trilogy (1938–45), the fables The Screwtape Letters (1942) and The Great Divorce (1945), poetry, works on literary history (including The Allegory of Love, 1936; The Discarded Image, 1964) and religion, autobiography (including The Pilgrim's Regress, 1933; Surprised by Joy, 1955; A Grief Observed, 1961), diaries, and correspondence.

Bibliographies

- Christopher, Joe R., and Joan K.Ostling, C.S.Lewis: An Annotated Checklist of Writings About Him and His Works, Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 1975
 Hooper, Walter, "A Bibliography of the Writings of C.S.Lewis," in Light on C.S.Lewis, edited by Jocelyn Gibb, London: Bles, 1965; New York: Harcourt Brace and World, 1966:117–60

Further Reading

- Carpenter, Humphrey, The Inklings: C.S.Lewis, J.R.R.Tolkien, Charles Williams, and Their Friends, London: Allen and Unwin, 1978; Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1979
- Christopher, Joe R., C.S.Lewis, Boston: Twayne, 1987
- Gibb, Jocelyn, editor, Light on C.S.Lewis, London: Bles, 1965; New York: Harcourt Brace and World, 1966
- Hannay, Margaret Patterson, C.S.Lewis, New York: Ungar, 1981
- Schakel, Peter J., and Charles A.Huttar, editors, Word and Story in C.S.Lewis, Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1991
- Walsh, Chad, C.S.Lewis: Apostle to the Sceptics, New York: Macmillan, 1949
- Walsh, Chad, The Literary Legacy of C.S.Lewis, New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, and London: Sheldon Press, 1979

Liang Yuchun

Chinese, 1906–1932

Liang Yuchun was given the nickname of “the Chinese Elia,” but it would be more fitting to call him the Chinese “Citizen of the World.” Though he never set foot outside China in his short lifetime, he was more universalist, at least in his authorial persona, than any other writer of his age; that is to say, his interest was in humanity, not in his countrymen, except in that they were human too. To encounter his essays for the first time is to experience nothing less than shock at the ease with which he transcended national barriers and communed with the best of humanity in other lands. He felt he needed to, to stay human himself.

Born in 1906 in Fujian province, Liang died of scarlet fever less than four years after graduating from Peking University with a degree in English. His country thereby lost a rare intelligence, a sensitive and generous soul, and the most fluent writer of baihua (the vernacular language) in the whole of the Republican period (1912–49). Those qualities are first-rate qualifications for an essayist, and indeed his work was immediately recognized as something special, but the fact that he produced only two volumes of essays (one posthumous) inevitably contributed to his subsequent relative neglect, which was compounded by the rapid politicization of Chinese literature: he was a “citizen of the world” before his country was ready for him. However, his essays have been reprinted in Taiwan since the 1970s and in the People’s Republic since the 1980s.

By his own confession, Liang was addicted to the English essay. He read the world’s great novels with enjoyment, but once read they rested peacefully on his bookshelf, without being subjected to further “violent perturbation” at his hands. Montaigne and the whole succession of English essayists were, in contrast, his constant companions. While still an undergraduate he completed Yingguo xiaopinwen xuan (A selection of English essays, preface dated 1928), an annotated translation, with matching English text, of ten examples from Joseph Addison to Robert Lynd. He also wrote, in 1928, a startlingly perceptive appraisal of Charles Lamb, whom he regarded as the greatest of English essayists—hence the “Chinese Elia” tag. More volumes of English essays followed, as well as translations of English poetry and novels (including Moll Flanders). His own essays were published under the titles Chunlao ji (1930; Spring wine) and Lei yu xiao (1934; Tears and laughter).

From Liang’s comments on the essayists selected for his anthologies it can be seen that he valued goodness in the author and acute and penetrating observation of life in his work. He found that the English essay told the truth, got behind appearances, and did battle with falsity and hypocrisy. In his own writing he followed suit. He also wrote on subjects popular with English essayists (“vagabonds,” for example), though in his own way. If in style his work resembles that of any English essayist, it is Hazlitt’s rather than Lamb’s: his words stream out seemingly under their own power, healthy, expressive words of the mother tongue. Like Hazlitt, too, he was given to standing conventional assumptions on their head: tears are preferable to laughter, the philosophy of death is more interesting than the philosophy of life, jovial people are not funny, and so on. On the other hand, he could also write in the droll style of the English “silver age,” as on the pleasures of staying in bed.

To give a brief example of his work, “Mao gou” (“Cats and Dogs”) is half droll, half serious. After saying how afraid he is of both animals, he associates them with the cities he knows:

Shanghai is a dog. When you stand on the Bund and close your eyes, you may well visualize a vicious dog stretched out before you. Dogs represent the seamy side of reality. The darkness of reality in Shanghai makes you jumpy, as if there really is a mad dog at your heels. Peking, however, is a cat. It represents the fallen soul. Peking has a mustiness about it which makes people lax, not wanting to think or do anything, just content to stay put and muddle through life. It is as if a big cat has stamped a black mark on every soul, condemning them for eternity.

Other authors have expressed similar feelings, but none so imaginatively.

In sharp contrast with the healthiness of Liang’s language is the morbidity of his thoughts. Looking up from the bottom of the heap, first as a student, then as a lowly lecturer, it is understandable that he should have been depressed by the pretense and pretentiousness of what he saw, but his pessimism was far more basic than that. In “Yige ‘xinlike’ de weixiao” (A cynic’s smile) he points out, “to see through people’s masks is common enough, but what is the good, when you discover that compared to their masks people’s true visages are so boring, so dull, so little fun?”—and that is just for starters. Given this dim view of existence, we find that unlike his beloved Charles Lamb, the wise, kindly light leading his readers through the dark vale, Liang offers only the analogy of “a spark between the darkness before and the darkness after” to describe our universe. The great and glorious compensation is that when he blows upon that spark it burns with as pure a flame as one could hope to find in any literature.

D.E.POLLARD

Biography

Born in 1906 in Minhou, Fujian province. Studied English literature at Peking University, 1924–28. Began publishing essays in liberal and left-wing magazines, from 1926. Lecturer in English (specializing in Francis Bacon and Charles Lamb), Jinan University, Shanghai, 1928. Returned to Beijing to work as a librarian, 1929. Possibly married, with one child. Died (of scarlet fever) in Beijing in 1932.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Chunlao ji 1930

Lei yu xiao, 1934

Liang Yuchun sanwen ji (Liang Yuchun's collected prose), edited by Qin Xianci, 1979

Translation of essays in: Renditions 43 (1995):124–32; The Columbia Anthology of Modern Chinese Literature, edited by Joseph S.M.Lau and Howard Goldblatt, 1995:647–50

Other writings: translated from the English, including the anthology of English essays Yingguo xiaopinwen xuan (1928) and works by Daniel Defoe, Thomas Hardy, Joseph Conrad, and Nathaniel Hawthorne.

Further Reading

Qin Xianci, editor, Liang Yuchun sanwen ji (Liang Yuchun's collected prose), Taipei: Hongfan Bookstore, 1979 (contains essays on Liang by his contemporaries)

Liberté

French Canadian periodical, 1959–

For a long time newspapers were the only publishers in Canada. Poems, stories, shorter pieces, even novels appeared between news, reportage, advertisements, essays, and columns. The first literary movement in Quebec promoting post-Romanticism, nationalism, religious sensibility, folklore, and biographies published two cultural periodicals: Les Soirées Canadiennes (1861; Canadian evenings) and Le Foyer Canadien (1863; The Canadian hearth). Similar to them was Le Terroir (1909; The soil), founded by members of the École Littéraire de Montréal (Literary school of Montreal). On the opposite side was Le Nigog (1918), Modernist, open-minded, artistic, Parisian. Several years later, Les Idées (1935; The ideas), with its book reviews and classical criticism, was overtaken by the young, left-wing, Catholic, personalist La Relève (1934; The relief) and La Nouvelle Relève (1941; The new relief).

No journal or magazine is connected with the two important postwar literary or artistic groups: the Automatistes, whose leader was painter Paul-Émile Borduas, author of the manifesto Refus global (1948; Global refusal), and l'Hexagone, a cooperative workshop of young French-Canadian poets who would soon become the first true Quebecois writers, propelled by Gaston Miron, who began publishing poetry in 1953. During this time, the most influential journals among students and intellectuals were Cité Libre (Free city), founded in 1951 by Canada's future Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau and other lawyers, newspapermen, or trade unionists, and Amérique Française (French America), founded in 1941 as a wide laboratory of creative writing.

Liberté (Liberty) was founded in 1959 by Radio-Canada and National Film Board producers Hubert Aquin, André Belleau, Jacques Godbout, Fernand Ouellette, and editor JeanGuy Pilon, who were or would soon be poets, novelists, and essayists. This new generation is highly representative of the so-called Quiet Revolution in the Province of Quebec. All friends, they were well-educated, cultured, modern readers, travelers, and members of the media. Liberté was neither school nor convent, but tavern, club, café.

Politically Liberté is centrally placed between the liberal, federalist, new Catholic Cité Libre and the separatist, socialist, atheistic, secular Parti Pris (1963–68; We affirm). Liberté's contributors are freelance journalists more interested in arts, literature, and communications than in economics, Marxism, and other ideologies. They prefer their own fancy to intellectual vogue. They are acquainted with the wider world—Paris, New York, Algeria, Israel, Brazil, and so on—but they live, think, and write in Montreal. Open to the world through several issues, articles, and translations, Liberté is not an openair theater—it has a basement, walls as well as doors and windows.

Writers on the staff include poets (Ouellette, Pilon) and novelists (Aquin, Godbout); all of them are essayists. Until 1969, no one was a professor or scholar. Andre Belleau would be the first, followed in the 1970s by young graduates from European (French) universities such as François Ricard and François Hébert, who became editors of Liberté after the long reign of Pilon and before that of Marie-Andree Lamontagne, the current editor.

Liberté published issues about language, cinema, television, history, politics, and philosophy from a free, inventive, literary point of view. Jokes, paradoxes, parodies, and polemics are preferred to seriousness and heavy erudition. Professional critics and writers act as well-informed amateurs: Gilles Marcotte on music, Pierre Vadeboncoeur on painting, Jacques Brault on everyday life in town and country. Liberté has become a center, a laboratory for chronicles, essays, and essayisme in theory and practice.

Most of the best collections of essays produced by publishers HMH, l'Hexagone, and Boreal were first columns or articles in Liberté: for instance, Fernand Ouellette's Les Actes retrouvés (1970; Rediscovered acts) and Écrire en notre temps (1979; Writing in our time); and Andre Belleau's posthumous Surprendre les voix (1986; To catch the voices), in which he brings together fiction and essays. The younger generation—La Génération lyrique (1992) according to François Ricard's title, a multibiography or general description of anonymous baby-boomers, is represented by Ricard himself (La Littérature contre elle-même [1985; Literature against itself]) and sharp, controversial Jean Larose's La Petite Noirceur (1987; The small darkness) and L'Amour du pauvre (1991; Love of the poor). Both Ricard and Larose read and write about society and social discourse, as well as reading and writing novels. This is the spirit of Liberté.

LAURENT MAILHOT

Further Reading

- Beaulieu, André, and Jean Hamelin, La Presse québécoise, des origines à nos jours, Quebec City: Presses de l'Université Laval, 10 vols., 1973–90
- Bélanger, André-J., Ruptures et constantes: Quatre Idéologies du Québec en éclatement: La Relève, la JEC, Cité Libre, Parti Pris, Montreal: HMH, 1977
- Le Devoir* issue on Liberté's 25th anniversary, 5 November 1983
- Ducrocq-Poirier, Madeleine, editor, La Revue Liberté: Actes du colloque organisé par le Centre International d'Études Francophone de l'Université de Paris IV-Sorbonne et le Centre de Coopération Interuniversitaire Franco-Québécoise, Montreal: L'Hexagone, 1990
- Écrits du Canada Français* issue on journals, 67 (1989)
- Fortin, Andrée, Passage de la modernité: Les Intellectuels québécois et leurs revues, Quebec City: Presses de l'Université de Laval, 1993
- Gauvin, Lise, "Parti Pris" littéraire, Montreal: Presses de l'Université de Montréal, 1975
- Gauvin, Lise, "Les Revues littéraires québécoises de l'université à la contre-culture," Études Françaises 11, no. 2 (1975):161–83
- Mailhot, Laurent, "L'Action de Liberté," in his Ouvrir le livre, Montreal: L'Hexagone, 1992
- Major, Robert, "Parti Pris": Idéologies et littérature, Montreal: HMH, 1979
- Revue d'Histoire Littéraire du Québec et du Canada Français* issue on journals, 6 (1983)
- 30 Ans de "Liberté": Index des noms (1959–1989)*, Montreal: University of Montreal Department of French Studies, 1990

Liebling, A.J.

American, 1904–1963

When critic and journalist A.J.Liebling died in 1963, a colleague at the New Yorker surveyed the heap of books and papers piled on and around Liebling's desk and concluded that they perfectly represented his eclectic interests in both life and writing. There was the Annual Report of the New-York Historical Society, the American Racing Manual, the collected works of Albert Camus, a guide to making beer, a travelogue on Tunisia, three volumes on boxing, and a month's issues of the Las Vegas Sun. Indeed, Liebling's interests and his writing ranged widely in a 28-year career at the New Yorker which established his reputation as a gifted and unique writer and reporter. His essays are regarded as a model for the wave of so-called New Journalists who came after him.

Liebling's quirky writing interests reflected a quirky personality and a varied career in journalism. Son of a New York furrier, he was raised on the Upper West Side and attended Dartmouth College, where he was expelled for skipping chapel. After finishing Columbia University's journalism program, he hired a bearded Norwegian to picket the New York World with a sign that read, "Hire Joe Liebling." (The World didn't.) His brief stint at the New York Times ended when the sports editor fired him for repeatedly listing "Ignoto," Italian for unknown, as referee in New York-area basketball games. He briefly studied ancient history at the Sorbonne in Paris, where he developed a love for the city, a ripe appetite, and a taste for haute cuisine.

Back in the United States, Liebling found work first at the Providence Journal and Evening Bulletin. "I oozed prose over every aspect of Rhode Island life," he recalled. Later, in four years at the New York World-Telegram in the early 1930s, he honed his skills at writing feature articles, penning more than a thousand. In 1935 he began work at the New Yorker as one of the stable of editor Harold Ross' young writers. At the magazine, his home for the rest of his life, he considered himself and colleagues such as Alva Johnston, Meyer Berger, and Joseph Mitchell part of the New Yorker's second generation of stylists.

Liebling's irreverent writing and thorough reporting, especially his gift for capturing New York's life in prose, quickly impressed Ross. Liebling loved the city and spent hours wandering its streets. He was fascinated with slang, what he called the "side-street New York language" of the city's backstreets, and he had a talent for re-creating it. In scores of colorful essays, he chronicled the rich and varied New York scene: Izzy Yereshesky's Cigar Store, the opening of a new nightclub by Hymie the Tumbler, overly superstitious Italians, and down-and-out prizefighters. His New York stories were collected in Back Where I Came From (1938), The Telephone Booth Indian (1942), and The Honest Rainmaker: The Life and Times of Colonel John R. Stingo (1953).

His slangy, often funny first-person essays were noted for their exaggerated metaphors and unlikely allusions, which sometimes taxed a reader's knowledge of ancient history, one of Liebling's favorite subjects. A Liebling account of a Sugar Ray Robinson fight might include, as the New York Times once noted, "a delicate embroidery on a theme suggested by a medieval Arabian historian to whom he was partial." Tom Wolfe once described Liebling as a writer's writer with a following that was almost cultish.

Liebling wrote hundreds of articles for the New Yorker. "As time went on, he wrote with greater and greater elegance, and the journalism he was ostensibly doing somehow turned into the kind of writing that endures," wrote a New Yorker correspondent in an unsigned obituary (11 January 1964). His friend St. Clair McKelway said Liebling's writing—opinionated and stylish yet based on solid reporting—was part of "a new art form in American journalism" pioneered at the magazine (New York Herald Tribune, 2,9 December 1963). Liebling wrote and rewrote his pieces to perfection, and his confidence in his writing was legendary. He was said to present his finished work to the New Yorker's editors with all the natural selfassurance of a child presenting crayon drawings to adoring parents. "Damn it," a competitor once said, "if I had just one per cent of Joe's self-confidence I'd have written 'War and Peace' by this time."

Liebling's New Yorker work included a stint as war correspondent. His trip home on a Norwegian tanker was chronicled in "Westbound Tanker," one of his best-known wartime pieces. He also covered the London Blitz for the New Yorker and followed the First Infantry Division in its invasions of North Africa and northern France. He was present at the liberation of Paris, the only city that rivaled New York in his affections. France valued his war reporting and in 1952 awarded him the cross of the Legion of Honor.

After the war, Liebling took over the New Yorker's "Wayward Press" column, a forum for newspaper criticism that had been started by Robert Benchley in 1927 and published sporadically afterward. Liebling delighted in assailing reporters and newspapers for their foibles, reserving his harshest words for publishers. "As an observer from outside, I take a grave view of the plight of the press," Liebling wrote. "It is the weak slat under the bed of democracy." Liebling's press criticism, widely read and often quoted in trade journals of American newspapers, made him the best-known press critic of his generation. His press columns were collected in The Wayward Pressman (1947), Mink and Red Herring (1949), and The Press (1961).

DAVID R.DAVIES

Biography

Abbott Joseph Liebling. Born 18 October 1904 in New York. Studied at Dartmouth College, Hanover, New Hampshire, 1920–23; Columbia University School for Journalism, New York, B.Litt., 1925; medieval studies at the Sorbonne, Paris, 1926–27. Sports writer, New York Times, 1925–26; staff writer, Providence Journal and Evening Bulletin, 1926–30, New York World, 1930–31, and the New York World-Telegram, 1931–35. Married Anne Beatrice McGinn, 1934 (divorced, 1949). Staff writer, 1935–63, war correspondent in France, England, and North Africa, 1939–44, and columnist of "Wayward Press," 1946–63, the New Yorker. Married Lucille Hill Sectorsky, 1949 (divorced, 1959). Chevalier, Legion of Honor (France), 1952. Married the writer Jean Stafford, 1959. Died (of complications from viral pneumonia) in New York, 28 December 1963.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Back Where I Came From, 1938

The Telephone Booth Indian, 1942

The Road Back to Paris, 1944

The Wayward Pressman, 1947

Mink and Red Herring: The Wayward Pressman's Casebook, 1949

Chicago: The Second City, 1950

The Honest Rainmaker: The Life and Times of Colonel John R. Stingo, 1953

The Sweet Science: A Ringside View of Boxing, 1956

Normandy Revisited, 1958

The Earl of Louisiana, 1961

The Press, 1961; revised edition, 1964

Between Meals: An Appetite for Paris, 1962

The Jollity Building, 1962

The Most of A.J.Liebling, edited by William Cole, 1963; as The Best of A.J.Liebling, 1965

Molly, and Other War Pieces, 1964

A Neutral Corner: Boxing Essays, edited by Fred Warner and James Barbour, 1990

Liebling at the New Yorker: Uncollected Essays, edited by James Barbour and Fred Warner, 1994

Further Reading

Core, George, "Stretching the Limits of the Essay," in Essays on the Essay: Redefining the Genre, edited by Alexander J. Butrym, Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1989:207–20

Midura, Edmund M., A.J.Liebling: The Wayward Pressman as Critic, Lexington, Kentucky: Association for Education in Journalism, 1974

Sokolov, Raymond, The Wayward Reporter: The Life of A.J. Liebling, New York: Harper and Row, 1980

Toll, Seymour, "Liebling in Paris," Sewanee Review 93, no. 4 (Fall 1985):554–73

Lima la horrible

by Sebastián Salazar Bondy, 1964

Lima la horrible (1964; Lima the horrible) represents the epitome of Sebastián Salazar Bondy's literary and journalistic career. During his short but productive life, Salazar Bondy (1924–65) focused on two concerns: the literary activity and development of Peru, and its political and social situation. Lima la horrible is an essay in book form, consisting of 11 chapters. It belongs to a wave of essays with the objective of defining the ethos of a nation and its peoples through introspective analysis. Psychoanalysis provided the apparatus with which Spanish American essayists scrutinized their continent, though most limited themselves to one country in their analysis. Only two well-known essays focused on cities: Salazar Bondy's Lima la horrible and Ezequiel Martínez Estrada's La cabeza de Goliath (1940; The head of Goliath). These essays attempt to define the idiosyncrasy of Lima and Buenos Aires, both nonrepresentative capitals of their respective countries.

Within the Peruvian ambit, Lima la horrible belongs to a minority left-oriented movement whose most distinctive figure, José Carlos Mariátegui, was the founder of the Peruvian Socialist Party (1895–1930). After its publication, Lima la horrible was used by the leftist factions to awaken a social consciousness in Peru. It represents the harshest criticism ever undertaken against the Peruvian oligarchy. Salazar Bondy dissects, step by step, each facet of what he designates the Limean deceit, denouncing the ideology underlying the pyramidal system wherein the poor are throttled and the rich swell.

According to Salazar Bondy, Lima has successfully perpetuated the historical period in which, as the capital of a viceroyalty, it took delight in its exquisite luxuries, realized by the exploitation and ostracism of the native Peruvians. The aristocracy of yesterday (“hawkers who would buy titles”) has become today’s oligarchy. The caste that holds the economic and political reins of power in Peru has adopted and imposed as a national ideology a chimera that Salazar Bondy calls “Colonial Arcadia,” in order to preserve its hegemony, denying a voice to both Indian and mestizo in the historical dialogue. Consequently, the Limean lacks authenticity. Salazar Bondy believes that, based on the invention of an archetype, Lima has fabricated a system of values and traditions that constitutes the Limean identity or criollismo. The criollo is an amalgam of appearances: he is so enmeshed in this act of representation that his true being has been all but lost.

If Lima’s apogee was the vice-royal period, it successfully survives as a nostalgic reproduction, still overlooking the abysmal difference between the privileged and the indigent, the incongruity between myth and reality. Salazar Bondy demythologizes famous Limean figures such as Ricardo Palma, Saint Rosa de Lima, and Saint Martin de Porres. Ricardo Palma, a renowned realistic writer, was the author, perhaps unintentionally, of the colonial chimera. By fusing fiction and history, Palma created the literary apparatus that asserts yesterday’s glory and denies the present. As to the inherited image of the saints, it has been adulterated and transformed. The embellishment of their iconography is repeated in the Limean folklore as an affirmation of the beauty and luxury of a period, and not as an anomaly of the times, which would be what the two saints truly denote.

Another Peruvian source of pride Salazar Bondy deconstructs is the Cuzco School of Painting, the most famous in colonial times. According to the author, this school represents another mode used by the Spaniards to impose their own reality onto the Indians, in order to erase their native identity. If what was native and telluric formed part of a painting, it appeared to replace the European icons that signified evil. The psychological consequences were devastating. The identity crisis caused by this imposition is still reflected in two Peruvian expressions: perricholista and huachafo. Both embody the obsession with Otherness. The former refers to the lowermiddle-class individual who foolishly assumes a disguise in real life in imitation of the upper class, rendering himself ridiculous and the target of endless derision. The latter defines the person who sells his mind and soul as an answer to the imperative desire to belong to the aristocracy. The difference between the two expressions is that the huachafo is too low in the social hierarchy ever to become an aristocrat, while the perricholista can become one if he pays the price.

A third figure from the Colonial Arcadia that Salazar Bondy analyzes is the tapada, or the mysterious colonial lady (she hides behind a shawl, exposing only one eye), the ironic pillar of a conservative society. She is repressed and almost illiterate, and her role in society was to be beautiful. She lived behind the shadow of a most desirable husband, rich and influential, vicariously enjoying his power. Salazar Bondy argues that the modern Limean woman has kept this role despite her education, mundane manners, and profession. Her goal has remained to achieve a marriage of convenience. This woman has not come to be an independent and emancipated individual because the chains from the past have not been broken; her situation represents another remnant of the colonial chimera.

Salazar Bondy begins and ends his essay by emphasizing the dramatic disjunction of Peru. The exploitation of and discrimination against ethnic groups, the growing belt of pauperization strangling Lima, make unbearable the prolongation of the Colonial Arcadia. The vote against the past, which Mariategui would once have cast, becomes Salazar Bondy's. The antithesis of the Arcadia belongs to the youth who can and should initiate a dialogue between the present and its true reality.

VERÓNICA SAUNERO-WARD

Edition

Lima la horrible, 1964

Further Reading

Fox, Lucia, "Sebastián Salazar Bondy y las facetas de la tradición y cambio," in her Ensayos hispano-americanos, Caracas, 1966: 73–81

Fox, Lucia, El rostro de la patria en la literatura peruana, Buenos Aires: Continente, 1970:31–37

Puccini, D., "Un libro escrito con rabia Lima la horrible," Unión 4, no. 4 (1965):167–69

Tauro, Alberto, editor, Enciclopedia ilustrada del Perú, Lima: PEISA, 1987:1861

Vargas Llosa, Mario, "Elogio de Sebastián Salazar Bondy," Letras 74–75 (1965):187–89

Vargas Llosa, Mario, "Un mito, un libro y una casta Lima la horrible" Revista de la Universidad de Mexico 19–12 (1965): 12–13

Vargas Llosa, Mario, "Sebastián Salazar Bondy y la vocación del escritor en el Perú," Revista Peruana de Cultura 7–8 (1966): 25–54

Literary Theory and the Essay

Since so many of the precepts of contemporary literary theory bear an uncanny resemblance to the rhetorical and discursive conventions of the essay genre, it is surprising that criticism has failed to note, much less explain, such virtual mimicry. After all, both literary theory and the essay in the present day dismantle logical, temporal, and causal order, reject narrative closure, and posit the mediation of subjectivity as a constituent element of intellectual inquiry. Not only because of their closely aligned discursive and theoretical structures, but also because they both arise in the same period, the essay and modern literary theory naturally bear the signs of mutual influence. To determine, however, whether literary theory influenced the essay more or the essay literary theory would suppress the complex aesthetic, social, and economic entanglements between them. If we instead attempt to analyze this mutual development from the late 16th century to the present day as an ongoing series of responses to the transformation of aristocratic society into bourgeois culture, the rise of print capital and the subsequent growth of literacy and the public sphere, the birth of literary (and later theoretical) coteries, and finally the professionalization of literary theory in the university, we come to discover that literary theory and the essay are bound as much to each other as they are individually to the academy's intellectual and cultural production.

Because of the interdisciplinary force of postmodern and present-day literary theory, and because much of what we consider literary theory today evolves directly out of debates within theology, philosophy, and natural science, most often articulated and advanced in the essay, it is necessary to define literary theory for the purposes of this study in the broadest possible terms. Certainly both literary theorists and scholars of the essay have reached far back into the past to reclaim their heritage from writers and from among genres that predate the named existence of either of these relative latecomers to the literary marketplace.

The most obvious generic overlap between the essay and literary theory is the representation of the self in writing. Although such discursive representation is most comprehensively realized in autobiography, it has long been represented in Western philosophy by metaphors of writing. If for Montaigne the essay was an attempt to capture thought in the very process of formation, we must view his Essais (1580, 1588) as an early blueprint of cognition and subjectivity commensurate with the skeptical empiricism of early modernity. Such discursive models of cognition predate Montaigne: Aristotle, for example, had envisaged the mind as a wax tablet, upon which empirical experience was imprinted. But Montaigne's model of subjectivity, like those that followed, was a writerly attempt to counter the threat that rationality posed for lived experience and the emotional realm of identity. Locke and Hume represented cognition as a tabula rasa, a blank sheet that stores an infinite number of sense impressions, while for Noam Chomsky the mind is like a block of veined marble, capable of preserving only a finite number of shapes. With his analogy of a "mystic writing pad," or palimpsest, Freud introduced a double level of consciousness, such that the writing pad's surface records an infinite number of impressions which, when lost to the surface (consciousness), are yet retained as trace impressions on the opaque under (unconscious) layer.

That the essay has not only been the vehicle of publication for these cognitive blueprints, but has also imitated their shapes, suggests the profound versatility of this genre: with the malleability of wax, the essay expands its discursive borders to encompass new forms of knowledge; like the tabula rasa, the essay can either begin anew, or, paradoxically, to use Theodor W. Adorno's vivid metaphor, it can "reflect the childlike freedom that catches fire, without scruple, on what others have already done" ("Der Essay als Form" [1958; "The Essay as Form"]). In the case of Chomsky's marble, the essay by discursive shape-shifting takes the isomorphic form of that which it represents; finally, like the mystic writing pad, it can register meaning on more than one level, positing a complex model of human subjectivity. As these representations of the mind as metaphors of writing suggest, any attempt to formulate modern subjectivity in—or as—an act of writing will push the generic boundaries of writing itself to new limits.

If the essay maps the contours of writer in the process of thinking, as Adorno argues in "The Essay as Form," then the free and associative nature of its form has taught subsequent generations free thinking, liberating each generation from the received wisdom of its predecessors. It was hardly by chance, then, that the essay emerged in the Renaissance, the term itself announcing the rebirth of classical learning in theory, but proving its demise in practice. For Bacon's method of science, grounded in experience rather than argument, undermined the tautologous system of Aristotle and the scholastics, irretrievably damaging the logic of syllogism. The new cosmology of Copernicus, Kepler, Galileo, and Newton, by denying the authority of Aristotle and renouncing Ptolemy's geocentric cosmos, made a decisive break with the dominion of classical authority. The Newtonian and Cartesian advancement in physics outstripped Pythagorean mathematics. And, finally, a prose revolution inaugurated by Erasmus and Rabelais, and brought to fruition by Montaigne, Bacon, Hobbes, and subsequent generations of philosopher essayists, eradicated the artificial symmetry of Ciceronian language, undermining, as it did so, the whole intricate structure of the correspondent universe.

In sum, the empirical sciences colluded with the essay to undermine the Renaissance world picture, positing in its stead a secular, materialist world view. We might trace in the skeptical empiricism of this new philosophy the antecedents to the postmodern theoretical essay, whose tendency toward authorial self-disclosure, anti-systematic thinking, and an insurgence against received tradition suggests that modern criticism, although claiming to reinvent itself with every generation, is just another variation of an old form. John Donne's poem An Anatomy of the World (1611)—depicting the Renaissance's anxiety that the age of new philosophy and exploration was tantamount to a postmortem dissection of the world—is often cited as an epigraph to modernity: “And new philosophy calls all in doubt.../And freely men confess that this world's spent .../’Tis all in pieces, all coherence gone.”

Donne's lament for lost order echoes a refrain of high Modernism central to postmodern inquiry. Here are the fragments of T.S.Eliot's Wasteland (1922), the signal Modernist allegory of the dangers of skepticism unrestrained. The unfixed nature of Donne's world, momentarily sliding between two philosophical cosmologies, would re-emerge as Matthew Arnold's bleak summary of Victorian modernity: “one world dead/The other powerless to be born.” Roland Barthes' point that the “writerly” and self-conscious textuality of the essay reflects a pre-mapped (pre-rational) world bears a striking, almost uncanny, resemblance to the self-awareness of Donne's prescient narrator at the brink of a new world: “It is ourselves writing, before the infinite play of the world...is traversed, intersected, stopped, plasticized by some singular system (Ideology, Genus, Criticism).” Barthes is, in part, alluding to the simultaneous birth of a new kind of subjectivity and the essay in the early modern period—both predicated upon the modern self-consciousness and intellectual anxiety produced in a time of disorder and cultural dissent. Such an argument is supported by Adorno's claim that the essay provides a glimpse of the potential for cognitive freedom before the fall of language into the reified grammar of instrumental reason. What Donne, the early Modernist Arnold, and the late Modernist Eliot would mourn, postmodern critics following the lead of Barthes and Adorno would eulogize. In short, what Barthes here celebrates as the pleasures of open-ended textuality is precisely the form and substance of the essay.

The expansion of the bourgeois public sphere in the 18th century, enabled by imperial affluence, was accompanied by an increase in leisure time, a boom in print culture, the birth of literary and philosophical societies, and the legislation of civic institutions, such as libraries and museums. Central to the development of intellectual culture and the advent of professional art criticism was the appearance of coffeehouses throughout Europe. Among London's literati, for example, Dryden's circle gathered at Will's—"the Wits' Coffee House," from which Richard Steele dated his literary articles in the Tatler—Joseph Addison presided over his "Little Senate" at Button's, and Marvell's and Pepys' circle frequented the Rota coffeehouse. These urban literary circles shaped the critical essay in the modern sense: from coffeehouse culture the essay borrowed the capricious rhythm of free thinking, the capacious and associative quality of conversation, the intrigue of eavesdropping, the intimacy and scandal of gossip, the delight of a chance encounter, and often the abruptness of a meeting postponed. At the center of one of the most influential coteries of the 19th century, the Transcendentalists' Club, Ralph Waldo Emerson would write in "Ecstasy and Eloquence" that the essay was the form in which "everything is admissible, philosophy, ethics, divinity, criticism, poetry, humor, fun, mimicry, anecdotes, jokes, ventriloquism," all the discursive practices of the "most liberal conversation."

During the 19th century, competing cultural ideologies and technological developments colluded in the birth of the modern critical essay, the most prominent forum for theoretical inquiry for the last two centuries. The Adams-powered platen press in the 1830s and the Wharfedale cylinder press of the 1860s revolutionized print culture. The ability to mass-produce printed material rapidly, cheaply, and more efficiently presaged a rise in the private press in both Britain and the United States. If Edward Cave could boast in 1741 that his Gentleman's Magazine, whose subscribers Samuel Johnson numbered at 10,000, was "read as far as the English language extends and ...reprinted from several presses in Great Britain, Ireland and the Plantations," then the new portability of the private press a century later would do much to extend—this time by discursive rather than political imperialism—the former geographical boundaries of the English language. Moreover, by allowing writers greater artistic control over their work, the private press created a market that demanded increasingly innovative and specialized forms of written discourse, especially within the essay genre, as epitomized by the experimental writing of Emerson and his circle.

If mass production created a more widely informed reading public, and if academic institutions and a mid-century trend toward metropolitan libraries provided repositories for literature in regions with limited access to book markets, such changes were to be at odds with the growth of specialized knowledge and the increasing privatization of society following the major revolutions of the late 18th century. While a boom in print culture was establishing large international markets, the private press in league with a rise in philanthropic and philosophical societies was busy creating small, discrete, often regional, markets that would further compartmentalize knowledge and encourage cultural heterogeneity. In terms of specialized markets, Frederick Douglass' private press and anti-slavery newspaper, North Star, exemplify the entrepreneurial and "agitprop" spirit of a new age of belles-lettres in the U.S. A former slave and a tireless anti-slavery advocate, Douglass was one of the most prolific American essayists of the 19th century. More significant to the development of the critical language and recurring rhetorical patterns within coteries, however, is the way in which the various abolitionist campaigns, like those of Douglass' circle, collaborated with other coteries, such as the emerging transatlantic women's movement. These political coteries joined forces via the private press with reciprocal—often transatlantic—organizations to deploy genre-specific tropes and rhetorical structures endemic to their own partisan literature in a way similar to how philosophical and literary coteries engineered and exchanged increasingly insular lines of critical thought and private discourse. Such discourse would culminate in the modern theoretical essay, a subgenre rooted in a breakdown of “democratic” consensus and one which heralded the further departmentalization of knowledge.

The emergence of transcendentalism in 1836 was integral to this process, comprised as it was of many of the 19th century's most distinguished critical essayists: Amos Bronson Alcott, Cyrus Bartol, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Margaret Fuller, Theodore Parker, and Henry David Thoreau. It is hardly by chance that the transcendentalists, like the constituents in the various coteries of social reform, influenced and were in turn influenced by British intellectuals such as Matthew Arnold, Charles Darwin, George Eliot, Francis Jeffrey, and Thomas De Quincey. Although sustained by continental philosophy, transcendentalism was America's first home-grown intellectual movement, one initiating seminal forms of social, religious, political, and literary criticism. Much of the transcendentalists' specialized philosophical inquiry evolved in private correspondence, personal journals, and what Emerson called “liberal conversations.” As a theoretical enterprise that merged in the critical essays of the Transcendentalists' Club, it anticipated the academic and artistic coteries of America's “lost generation,” including T.S.Eliot, Ezra Pound, and Gertrude Stein, their elder contemporaries in the Bloomsbury Group, and the Modernist movements in whose circles these artists and critics moved. In the critical essay, inquiry sought a form commensurate with its philosophical and theoretical concerns. Nineteenth-century critical essayists worried about religion in a secular utilitarian society, played out the Hegelian obsession over the condition of the natural soul, and theorized the crisis of selfhood—or the human “prison of glass,” as Emerson called it—in industrial modernity.

Through the Dial (1840–44), the transcendentalist magazine launched by Emerson and Margaret Fuller, and through a host of other journals, the transcendentalists helped to introduce the German idealism of Goethe, Kant, and Schiller into American and British intellectual life, paving the way for a bold philosophical transformation of the American university, one which would shape pedagogy on both sides of the Atlantic well into the 20th century. But these journals were not like the popular periodicals of the 18th century: their specialization and increasingly philosophical rhetoric distinguished them from the comparatively gentle moralizing and general accessibility of Daniel Defoe's A Review of the Affairs of France (1704–13), Steele's Tatler (1709–11), Addison's and Steele's Spectator (1711–12, 1714), or even Johnson's Rambler (1750–52) and Idler (1758–60). Whereas the literary criticism of Samuel Taylor Coleridge and William Hazlitt, in league with the emerging museum and art gallery of their day, attempted to make every amateur a critic by institutionalizing aesthetic taste, the criticism of the next generation would become less accessible by its convoluted turn toward the ironies of Romantic self-expansiveness, such as the “flux of moods,” as Emerson wrote in “Experience” (1844), that renders impossible the very notion of personal “identity.” Played out in approaches to literature, the critical essay, in a single generation, prescribed its audience more narrowly.

At least one influential essayist offered a thinly veiled justification of the necessary complexity of literary criticism in an argument that praised and defended the convoluted prose of authorial genius. In 1826 William Ellery Channing published his influential essay, widely acclaimed among the London literati, on Milton's prose, arguing that "to be universally intelligible is not the highest merit. A great mind cannot, without injurious constraint, shrink itself to the grasp of common passive readers," but instead must write for the "gifted reader." In any event, the die was cast: the 19th century would professionalize and institutionalize both criticism and the critic. By the first quarter of the next century, art criticism was relegated to the university, making the critical essay the coin of the realm, just as it made Van Wyck Brooks, T.S.Eliot, Lewis Mumford, Ezra Pound, and Gertrude Stein the penultimate generation of the great freelance scholar. Hardly representative of a generation, such renowned essayists as Irving Howe, Edmund Wilson, and Alfred Kazin brought the tradition of freelance scholars to an end.

We can trace in the essay's continued proliferation and dispersion into highly specialized academic subgenres, the late 19th-century departmentalization of the university into—and the displacement of classical education by—the nascent disciplines of the human sciences and modern humanities, such as anthropology, sociology, psychology, English literature, and history. The pioneers of such new academic disciplines knew that the institutional authority and autonomy to which they aspired were predicated upon the semblance of scientific precision. Nowhere was the need for legitimation more keenly felt than in the humanities, long stigmatized by the early-century educational reform of the Benthamites, who demanded a more practical alliance between industry and higher education. The university was now running on borrowed time. In response to legislative pressure for utilitarian reform in academia, the faculty of Yale University had in 1828 issued a landmark defense of higher education, which, reprinted in Silliman's American Journal of Science, was widely circulated in the U.S. and abroad, and managed to stave off managerial and curricular reform until after the Civil War. Even as late as 1874, Charles Eliot Norton, one of the few surviving Brahminical academics who lived to see utility and morality again become the focus of popular education reform two generations later, wrote to Thomas Carlyle that "Fine Arts" could "show the political, moral, and social conditions which have determined the forms of the Arts, and...quicken...the youth of a land barren of visible memorials of former times, the sense of connection with the past and gratitude for the effort and labours of other nations and former generations." Rather than justifying the utility of literature, however, the emerging English departments, following the lead of the university as a whole, turned to the German model of higher education. In what was almost an open act of defiance against utilitarianism, English departments took refuge behind German idealism, especially the idealism of Kant as it was threaded through Coleridge, Carlyle, and the transcendentalists. Shaped by Arnold's Culture and Anarchy (1869) and emblemized in the title of the first chapter, "Sweetness and Light," this new aesthetic philosophy managed to hold the vocational model of education at bay for almost half a century, until the growth of industry and the consequent Taylorization of social institutions in the aftermath of World War I compelled pragmatic reform in the university. (Frederick Taylor's The Principles of Scientific Management [1911] promoted a system for increasing industrial output by rationalizing the production process.)

If, however, English departments had justified their work to society at large, they had yet to establish credibility or a niche within the new university. In an attempt to compete with the sciences, English programs developed increasingly formalist methods of analysis, drawing upon the structuralist work of pioneering anthropologists, linguists, and psychologists, such as Freud, Saussure, Jakobson, Lévi-Strauss, and Peirce. Armed with the interdisciplinary breadth of formalism, English departments strengthened their position in the new university by colonizing adjacent disciplines, incorporating the embryonic programs of linguistics, comparative literature, journalism, speech, theater and dramatics, and technical and business writing. These disciplines would leave their mark upon literary theory and upon the essay as it was transformed and deployed as the material sign of authority within the academy. Its synthetic nature, mutability, and lack of a philosophical basis suggest the mutual influence of literary theory and the essay on the shape of modern critical inquiry. Moreover, from this perspective, Adorno's characterization of the critical essay as a genre that "swallows up the theories that are close by" not only becomes a telling commentary on the insatiable appetite of literary theory and the imperial tendencies of modern literary studies, but also accounts for George Ripley's bitter indictment of the 19th-century university for having deprived the "common mind" of all avenues of critical discourse. By the early part of this century, a group known as the "Young Americans," led by Lewis Mumford, were fighting an academic trend that had further distanced the critical essay from its democratic roots.

As the inchoate disciplines, subsumed by larger departments, began their struggle for individual autonomy, their authority was purchased in more rigorously specialized academic journals. Thus the struggle for academic legitimation and the interdepartmental skirmishes over disciplinary boundaries brought with them an increase in specialized, professional scholarly journals. Professionalization created communities of specialized readers, encouraging critics to produce the abstract conceptual languages that would culminate in contemporary literary theory. In broader terms, we return to T.S.Eliot's observation of a parallel development among the artistic communities both in and outside the academy, lamenting that the breakdown of aristocratic culture resulted in the critic or artist having to "talk to a coterie or to soliloquize." As academic and critical discourse specialized, it was the elasticity of the essay form that enabled the subsequent rise of arcane and idiosyncratic theory. Out of the university setting arose such seminal periodicals as English Literary History, Philological Quarterly, PMLA, and Modern Language Review, and from the artist colonies appeared such independent avant-garde and Modernist journals as Wyndham Lewis' Blast (London), the Dial (New York), Herwarth Walden's Der Sturm (Berlin), Pound's Egoist (London), Maiakovskii's futurist LEF (Russia), the Nouvelle Revue Française (New French review; Paris), Poetry (Chicago), Ma (Today; Budapest), the Vorticist, and the Imagist (London). If the new aesthetics proclaimed in these Modernist journals rejected the old traditions as exhausted and inadequate to the new conditions of modern urban life, they also enjoined critics to explore the formal properties of the discourses and media with which artists worked. Extensive self-scrutiny rapidly became the order of the day. Modernist theoretical experiments pressed the limits of language and representation, forcing the postmodern critical essay to dissolve the self in a play of signification.

If a new sense of chronic crisis, phenomenal challenges to fundamental beliefs, and its corollary threat to regulated selfhood and evolutionary destiny—and if new scientific ideologies that either undermined spiritual life or nourished its antithesis in unprecedented waves of millenarian anxiety—had given birth to the essay in the 16th century, then the heightened repetition of these pervasive themes at the turn of the 20th century would finally bring the critical essay to maturity as the engine of politically engaged theoretical inquiry. Eliot’s complaint about coteries registers an acceleration in competing and overlapping discourses aimed at serving different sociopolitical ends—even when the ends were one, the means were vigorously contested. Borrowing unevenly from their philosophical predecessors and from each other, these coteries shaped their new manifestoes in the critical essay, establishing it as the forum par excellence for theory’s political intervention in this century. As higher education in Britain and the U.S. transformed from college to university in keeping with the Germanic model of education, it was assailed not only by the political and cultural reforms of the day, but also by intellectual dissenters from within and without. Critical of ivory tower “despots” and the “loyalty oaths” that bred elitism in the academy, the controversial intellectuals of the day nourished hopes of an alliance between university-level education and the populist insurgency in national politics.

The problem was locating middle ground. The “Young Americans,” voicing the concerns of the young generation’s liberal constituency, were repulsed by the lurid form of Arnoldian idealism that promoted the academy’s political indifference on the one side, and the equally repugnant industrial materialism of Taylorization on the other. It was John Dewey, the most influential American philosopher of his generation, who first envisaged a union between Arnoldian aesthetics and industrial utilitarianism vis-à-vis “pragmatism,” the new intellectual and humanist attitude that shaped his educational philosophy and national education reform through the first half of the century. Dewey and William James had transformed the pragmatism of their Harvard mentor C.S. Peirce, expanding it from the grammar of logic into an optimistic and progressive intellectual vision that traced its inspiration directly back to the Emersonian wellspring. Among the intellectuals, the fact that pragmatism had been authored by academics suggested hope for an easy alliance with university concerns. Its national appeal, however, lay in its ability to unite the bifurcated social attitudes that set industrial progress at odds with humanist (if sometimes motivated by noblesse oblige) concerns. Not only did Dewey’s pragmatism pay homage to laissez-faire capitalism by the sense of everyday utility that the word itself conveyed, but just as importantly, it also played to the young liberal reformer’s New England meliorism ultimately grounded in a Protestant felix culpa.

Because the Young Americans’ own agenda was of a piece with Dewey’s unified social vision, Emerson, not surprisingly, was to answer for both. Encouraged by Arnold’s faith in the redemptive nature of art, the Young Americans, including Van Wyck Brooks, Randolph Bourne, and Waldo Frank, turned back to transcendentalism for answers to the spiritual and cultural crisis of modernity. Perceiving in the trend to departmentalize academic disciplines and institutionalize aesthetic criticism the increasing stratification of democratic culture, especially in the large urban centers, the Young Americans bitterly criticized the academy with the transcendentalist sentiment and missionary zeal of George Ripley, who had, 75 years earlier, warned Harvard theologian Andrews Norton that “the Sword of the Spirit is not wielded after the tactics of the university.” Borrowing from their forebears the rhetoric of a jeremiad that indicted the university for withholding spiritual knowledge from “the common mind,” as Ripley had put it, only to place it “into the keeping of scholars,” the Young Americans bitterly charged the academy with having erected an intellectual aristocracy to manage the production, accumulation, and distribution of knowledge, a flagrant violation of the democratic spirit of popular education.

Oddly, Mumford’s circle seemed impervious to the irony that transcendentalism was itself complicit in making possible the university’s philosophical monasticism. Now the Romantic idealism deployed by Ripley’s circle to counter the institutionalizing forces of bureaucratic capitalism and technology was in the service of the very institution against which Ripley had railed. We are again reminded of the academy’s consummate strategy for survival: it would incorporate the theories of its adversaries. As Lionel Trilling would observe, the quintessential 20th-century example of this lay in the university’s absorption of the critical energies of avant-garde Modernism. After all, an aesthetic movement whose agenda was to force the intellectual or academic to the brink of what Trilling, in Sincerity and Authenticity (1972), described as the “abyss” of Western Civilization had instead become a footbridge across the chasm of its hypocrisy and cultural relativism. In a final turn of irony, one taking us as far back as Donne’s cosmic rift, this same abyss would become the “mise en abîme” of Derridean deconstruction, a grand rupture to be opened up and celebrated as a site of postmodern tourism.

Such highly specialized discourse continued to drive a wedge between academic theorists and the wider reading public, the original consumers of the essay. This trend has only intensified in the postmodern age. Postwar European and American journals, such as Tel Quel (As is), Les Temps Modernes (Modern times), and Critique became the forum for critical thinking, and generated theoretical languages that by their esoteric nature often prescribed their audiences still more narrowly. The academy’s rapid consumption and production of these languages, especially since the 1960s, was purchased at the price of greater isolation even from the educated reading public, just as the theoretical essay moves farther and farther from its bourgeois roots in the 18th-century public sphere and from its contemporary counterpart, the opinion essay of popular culture and mass media. This trend has pitted traditional academic humanists, the likes of William J. Bennett, Allan Bloom, Harold Bloom, Roger Kimball, Camille Paglia, Page Smith, and D’nesh D’Souza against the vanguard of cultural theory, a coalition comprised of, among others, poststructuralists, feminists, and Marxists. Thus, the last generation continues the feud of its predecessors, a feud grounded in the cultural pessimism of Arnold and Eliot, and one which restages in every generation the crisis of culture in a democratic society.

While pivotal as the form and forum for such debates, the essay is yet more intricately and deeply imbricated in the material foundation of the university. Although registering profound philosophical, ethical, and moral issues, the publications engendered in this feud—both by their production of institutional authority and by the print culture they generate—are the trusses undergirding the economic fabric of the academy. Moreover, few scholars or critics would deny the status of their reputation (based on publication) as a commodity in the academic marketplace or, on a larger scale, the value of an institution’s reputation as the sum of all the individual reputations of its combined faculty. (As postmodern theorist Jacques Derrida's proclivity for economic metaphors suggests, theoretical scholarship has long been complicit with a bourgeois emphasis on investment—in this instance, on an institution's positive name-recognition and thus its ability to draw renowned scholars, whose publications become the capital in the next economic cycle.) If, however, as its etymology implies, criticism (and thus the essay) is generated in times of crisis, then there is something almost disingenuous in these generational debates. For, however high the theoretical stakes, we cannot forget that the crisis (the perennial "crisis in the humanities" staged in part for the benefit of an incredulous public) also re-enacts the literary discipline's struggle for professional legitimation. Perhaps not so disingenuous as caught between extremities, the literary academic must reconcile the social pressure to serve a utilitarian end in the tradition of Bentham and Taylor and the Arnoldian mandate to remain aloof from all forms of commercial or sectarian engagement. By failing to address the essay as a material component of academic life, scholars of the essay have failed to account for the genre's role in shaping institutional priorities, in, for instance, what many English literature scholars consider the emphasis on theory at the expense of literature in critical models subsequent to New Criticism.

In the eyes of intellectual liberals everywhere, the university had become just another example of the conglomerate trusts endemic to the late 19th and early 20th centuries, monopolies which undermined the democratic principles of intellectual exchange, competition, and fair play. For Mumford's circle and other like-minded liberals, the university had usurped the place of the large urban centers, whose heterogeneous terrain of wealth and poverty, of middle-class communities and perimeter slums, offered hope for a renewal of the self. This urban vitality was advanced in the essay on the levels of both form and function: while the essay served as a medium for the distribution of the social plan, the actual form of the essay came mimetically to illustrate the architectural design of the city and the new forms of human experience. Mumford, like John Henry Newman, in his influential essay "What Is a University?" (1873), saw the large urban center as a socially and culturally diverse campus, because, as Newman put it, "the newspapers, magazines, reviews, journals...the publishing trade, the libraries, museums, and academies, the learned and scientific societies, necessarily invest it with the functions of a University." Unlike Newman's, however, Mumford's vision was actualized in the practical and political blueprint of his life. If Mumford's attention to urban experience and the contingency of knowledge recalls the skeptical flâneur of the 18th-century periodical essay, and its reemergence in the essays of Modernism, it is an atavism that surfaces again in the tone and tenor of postmodern critique.

The transformation of the critical essay and its efficacy as a force of intervention in the 20th century can never be fully appreciated, however, apart from an understanding of subject position in relation to political agency in the essay. Most philosophers and Modernist artists played up the age's Faustian parallels. The rapid advance of industry and technology, and the late 19th-century shift from agrarian markets to urban economies, nurtured a nagging worry that if mechanized repetition and assembly-line uniformity were the fruits of new knowledge and greater progress, then selfhood and individuality were the Mephistophelian price exacted by the bargain. The intelligentsia represented the modern alienation from self and society with an increasing yet alternating sense of urgency and pessimism. As with every moment of crisis and social upheaval since the advent of modernity, the self was the primary site of ambivalence and anxiety for the critic. Not surprisingly, the counter-offensive against what was perceived as the dehumanizing forces of modernity was most effectively staged in the critical essay as it began to explore the linguistic constitution of subjectivity. Nowhere was this more vividly exemplified than in the reformist essays of Mumford, Brooks, and Bourne. The Young Americans, along with other intellectual radicals of their day, hoped to reintegrate the creative, irrational self in utilitarian society. Mumford's interdisciplinary scholarship foregrounded the "insurgent" subjectivity of the critical voice as a strategy for overcoming what Eliot called the "dissociation of sensibility," the schism between the rational and emotional self that is the essence of modern subjectivity. Inspired by Whitman's democratic poetics of the self and Patrick Geddes' "organic sociology," an anti-systemic movement in the sciences that yoked Nietzsche's autobiographical critic with the intuition of Romanticism, Mumford's pungent essays against the assumed prestige and unquestioned authority of institutional criticism would, ironically, eventually foster the very academic-theoretical authority he so patently criticized: from Barthes' intensely autobiographical literary criticism to the Nietzschean rhetoric of poststructuralism, these postmodern projects, by their shared concerns with transcendentalism, would make apparent theory's atavistic tendency to treat recurring themes, especially the problem of finding an appropriate prose form for representing subjective experience.

By the 20th century, after the full flowering of science and technology, "periodical" would take on a new significance. The critical essay would now become periodical in its reproduction of reality as fragment. Simultaneous to the segregation of knowledge into university departments, the essay would similarly compartmentalize social experience, slicing everyday experience into clinical frames. In part, the program of the urban progressives was informed by the movement of naturalism and realism in art and literature at the turn of the century. Early on, under the guiding influence of William Dean Howells, whose authority emanated from his influential position as editor of the Atlantic Monthly (1871–81) and later as resident critic for Harper's (1886–92), American realism confronted what was perceived as the dangerous tendencies for a kind of national denial of social decay, as evidenced by the demand among a genteel audience for idealism or the clamor among the popular for romance. Realism in the essay took as its primary duty the presentation of moral and material poverty in society. If realism, by its close scrutiny of "pieces" of reality, could expose the hidden workings of power and thus demystify social hierarchies, it could also reify or "naturalize" these same social barriers (such as race, class, or gender) by the semblance of scientific legitimacy.

Measured against the background of fears about the loss of the self in a mechanized world, later realist essayists such as Upton Sinclair, Sinclair Lewis, Mark Twain, and W.E.B. Du Bois revised the moral realism of Howells into a politically engaged aesthetic. For instance, Du Bois formulated and propagated a new ideology of racial assertiveness whose contentious tone in the essay recalled the powerful jeremiad essays of Douglass, Martin Delaney, and James Redpath from the preceding century. As a humanitarian enterprise, Howells' early realism had flirted with a kind of Pelagianism popularized by the late 19th-century Social Gospel Movement, especially evident in his essays of the early 1890s; but under his aegis—until late in his career—realism had generally remained aloof from direct social engagement. Rather, it relied upon an aesthetics of observation, avoiding any emotionalism or social appeals that might be construed as partaking of the sentimental tradition, just then resurfacing and merging with a strain of realism in the form of early muckraking literature. As such, Howells' realism 'at the end of the last century bears a striking resemblance to the objective, clinical evaluations of Michel Foucault, whose scrupulously amoral historiography in the latter part of this century has been criticized for the sterility of its observation, evacuated as it is of subjective mediation. If Howells' realism had transformed the essay for a time from what George S. Hellman in his article "Later Essayists" (1933) called the "story essay" ("wherein the narrative element runs its gentle course over a bed of personal reflections and descriptive comment of individual flavour") to a prose style absent of any persona—a theory of detached observation—then the next generation of essayists would split the difference, advancing realism by fashioning and inserting an authorial persona that foregrounded what Mumford called "insurgent subjectivity." Such a revision would achieve its brilliant apotheosis in the autobiographical stand-point theories of the 1970s, and the politically engaged New Historicism in the American academy and Cultural Materialism in the British, and finally the confessional essayistic criticism that has emerged on both continents in the 1990s.

GREGORY S. JACKSON

Further Reading

- Arnold, Matthew, Culture and Anarchy, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1990; New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1994 (original edition, 1869)
- Banta, Martha, Taylored Lives: Narrative Productions in the Age of Taylor, Veblen, and Ford, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1993
- Doody, Margaret Anne, The Daring Muse: Augustan Poetry Reconsidered, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1985
- Eliot, T.S., The Use of Poetry and the Use of Criticism, London: Faber, 1980 (original edition, 1933)
- Geertz, Clifford, The Interpretation of Cultures, New York: Basic Books, 1973
- Good, Graham, "The Essay and Criticism," in his The Observing Self: Rediscovering the Essay, London and New York: Routledge, 1988:176–86
- Goodwin, James, Autobiography: The Self Made Text, New York: Twayne, 1993
- Harrison, Thomas, Essayism: Conrad, Musil, and Pirandello, Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1992
- Jones, Richard Foster, The Seventeenth Century: Studies in the History of English Thought and Literature from Bacon to Pope, Stanford, California: Stanford University Press, 1951
- Lukács, Georg, The Theory of the Novel: A Historico-Philosophical Essay on the Forms of Great Epic Literature, Cambridge, Massachusetts: MIT Press, and London: Merlin Press, 1971 (original German edition, 1920)
- McCarthy, John A., Crossing Boundaries: A Theory and History of Essay Writing in German, 1680–1815, Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1989
- McKeon, Michael, The Origins of the English Novel, 1600–1740, Baltimore: Johns

Hopkins University Press, 1987

McMurtry, Jo, English Language, English Literature: The Creation of an Academic Discipline, Hamden, Connecticut: Archon, 1985

Obaldia, Claire de, The Essayistic Spirit: Literature, Modern Criticism, and the Essay, Oxford: Clarendon Press, and New York: Oxford University Press, 1995

Shuger, Debora, Habits of Thought in the English Renaissance: Religion, Politics, and the Dominant Culture, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1990

Sundquist, Eric J., To Wake the Nations: Race in the Making of American Literature, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1993

Taylor, Charles, Sources of the Self: The Making of Modern Identity, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1989

Liu Zongyuan

Chinese, 773–819

Liu Zongyuan achieved his reputation as a master essayist mainly because of his accomplishments in guwen (ancient prose). In its literary sense, guwen refers primarily to the prose style of the Confucian classics as well as to literary models dating from the Chinese antiquity to the Han era (206 BCE–220 CE). This style resurfaced in the eighth century as an intentional break with the parallel style which had dominated prose writing since the Six Dynasties period (420–589). Liu and his colleague Han Yu (768–824) fully developed the guwen style in the late eighth and early ninth centuries, and the two were in turn recognized by later generations as the two great Tang period (618–907) guwen stylists.

Liu shared with Han a similar literary-intellectual approach to guwen. Han saw the writing of guwen as both a literary practice and an effort to reflect values, “specifically the values that had guided the sages, the shengren zhi tao (the way of the sage) as they could be inferred from the textual tradition” (Peter Bol, 1992). Liu, too, considered that “wen, or literature, should illuminate the Tao” (“Da Wei Zhongli lun shidao shu” [Letter to Wei Zhongli on the Tao of being a teacher]). Unlike Han Yu, however, who restricted himself to the establishment and continuation of the system of the Confucian Tao, Liu Zongyuan’s Tao can be best depicted as eclectic, incorporating the various intellectual values of his time such as Confucianism, Taoism, Buddhism, and legalism. In other words, Liu’s Tao does not restate any specific doctrine but denotes in general the profound significance and multiple functions of literature, and even the sophisticated literary techniques with which literature should communicate. Following this consideration, Liu maintained that “literature has two Tao: 1) to phrase praise and blame based on the tradition of [documentary] compilation and interpretation; and 2) to convey allegorical or metaphorical expressions based on the tradition of [poetic] analogy and inspiration.” This two-Tao theory formulated Liu’s standards of essay writing, with the first Tao emphasizing the didactic and righteous content and flawless reasoning of an essay, and the second Tao emphasizing fluent, beautiful, and subtle rhetoric (“Yang Pingshi wenji houxu” [Postscript to the collected works of Yang Pingshi (Ling)]).

Liu Zongyuan's achievement in essay writing—over 500 pieces—was stimulated by his life experience. Like his fellow Tang literary figures, Liu considered his role primarily as a servant of the state. As Charles Hartman (1973) explains, “Only the agony and distress of a ruined or frustrated official career, as in the case of Liu [Zongyuan], could drive the [Tang] intelligentsia into serious literary pursuits.” Liu's participation in an abortive political reform in 805 cost him his political career in the court. He was exiled as a marshal to Yongzhou, a southern prefectural seat a thousand miles south of the capital. A decade later, he was reassigned as a prefect to Liuzhou, a place even more remote, and eventually died there in 819. Liu's ten years in exile at Yongzhou contributed the most important part of his essay writing, which demonstrates “the range and the profundity of feelings that a traditional Chinese intellectual was able to attain in adverse circumstances” (Chen Yu-shih, 1988).

The most renowned among Liu's essays composed at Yongzhou are the nine “records of excursions” (youji). Liu's own despondency colored his view of the wild and luxuriant country landscapes with melancholy. Hence a grand metaphor pervades the entire group of essays, that of “spots of natural beauty isolated and neglected by their creator representing a good man who has been isolated and neglected by his friends and monarch” (William H. Nienhauser, 1973). Isolated in this barbarian place, Liu felt that he and the Yongzhou landscapes “would not once be able to dispose of their talents in the change of a hundred or even a thousand years” (“Xiao shicheng shan ji” [Record of the Mountain of Little Rock citadel]). The common destiny Liu shared with this landscape endeared him to nature and enabled him to find comfort and pleasure in nature's serenity. In his loneliness, he felt that only nature could touch his senses and communicate with his spirit. With this body of work Liu established youji as a subgenre and gained himself a position as a major stylist in Chinese literary history.

Another essay subgenre Liu Zongyuan developed at Yongzhou was the fable. Before Liu, the fable had often appeared merely as an illustrative part of Chinese philosophical writings; Liu was probably the first writer to treat it as a separate and viable literary genre. The 11 fables he composed at Yongzhou are mainly animal stories allegorized into moral or social criticism, often with philosophical dimensions. Among them the most famous are the San jie (Three cautionary fables), including “Linjiang zhi mi” (The deer of Linjiang), “Qian zhi lu” (The donkey of Guizhou), and “Yong mou shi zhi shu” (The rats of a certain family at Yongzhou), in which Liu satirizes three types of morally inferior people represented respectively by these animals. Their tragic endings also signify “the ultimate dominance of nature over human bias and the futility of man's desire to control his own fate” (Chen Yu-shih).

Liu's exile involved him with local people and sensitized him to their suffering. As a result, his biographical sketches break the conventional formula of recording only gentlemen's deeds and instead focus principally on the lives of ordinary people. His historical narratives often protest against social evils and corrupt government, as exemplified in three of his most-read biographies. “Bushe zhe shuo” (The snake catcher's lesson) relates the story of a man named Jiang whose family for three generations had accepted snake catching as an occupation in lieu of paying land tax. Both Jiang's grandfather and father were killed by poisonous snakes and Jiang himself only narrowly escapes death. When offered the opportunity to change his assignment back to tax-paying, however, Jiang is reduced to tears, saying “The misfortunes that come with this job are never so grievous as the misfortune that restoration of my taxes would be.” “Guo Tuotuo zhuan” (The biography of Camel Guo) uses Guo’s arboricultural skills as an allegory, arguing that governing people is like planting trees: “One has to follow their Heaven-bestowed characteristics and let their nature develop.” Based on this Taoist principle, Liu criticizes rulers’ intervention in people’s lives. “Tong Ou Ji zhuan” (The biography of child Ou Ji) praises a courageous 11-year-old boy who alone thrashes two kidnappers. The story exposes the evil social phenomenon of abducting young children and selling them into slavery. Liu’s biographical works also include over a dozen epitaphs of women, among them poor local young girls from the Yongzhou area.

Liu Zongyuan molded his guwen style by drawing upon a great range of earlier writings and writers. He transcended the boundaries of different genres and intellectual schools; hence it is difficult to align him with any specific precursor. The vitality of the Guliang Commentary (of the Spring and Autumn Annals), the eloquence of the Confucian masters Mencius (c. 372–289 BCE) and Xun Zi (c. 313–238 BCE), the boundless imaginations in the Taoist classics Lao Zi and Zhuang Zi, the sentiments of Qu Yuan’s (343–c. 278 BCE) grand poem Li sao (Encountering sorrow), and the purity of Sima Qian’s (145–86 BCE) Shi ji (Records of the grand historian), all exerted great influence on his essays. Moreover, his political disquisitions absorbed the rigorous reasoning of Han Fei Zi’s (?–233 BCE) legalistic works, and his records of excursions inherited the vivid descriptions and fresh rhetoric of Li Taoyuan’s (?–527 CE) Shui jing zhu (Commentary on the classic of waters). Consequently, Liu’s essays are full of changes in structure and meaning; as the Qing critic Liu Xizai (1978) comments: “Liu’s compositions are like strange cliffs and peaks unfolding incessantly.”

Many of Liu Zongyuan’s friends regretted that he could never realize his political ambition. However, his colleague Han Yu considered the issue differently, contending that, had Liu Zongyuan not been in exile for so long, he would not have striven to compose literary works great enough to edify later generations. Indeed, any admirer of Liu Zongyuan would not exchange his literary achievements for any possible political achievements, even as a prime minister.

NANXIU QIAN

Biography

Courtesy name Zihou; also known as Liu Liuzhou. Born in 773; birthplace unknown (possibly Changan). Grew up in Changan; moved to Ezhou, 783, where his father was a judge. Studied privately, at a local family school, and possibly at the Imperial University. Passed the jinshi (civil service) exams, 793. Traveled in Binzhou, 793–95, then returned to Changan. Married Miss Yang, 796 (died, 798). Passed boxue hong ci exam, 798. Editor at the Jixian tian academy, from 798. Rectifier of characters, from 799; district defender to the magistrate of the Lantian district, c. 802–03; investigating censor, Changan, 803; vice bureau director, Ministry of Rites, 805. Participated in the abortive Wang Shuwen coup, 805; banished to Yongzhou as a marshal, 806–15; prefect, Liuzhou, 815–19. Died (probably of cholera) in Liuzhou, 28 November 819.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

- Translations of essays in: Chinese Classical Prose: The Eight Masters of the T'ang-Sung Period, edited and translated by Shi Shun Liu, 1979:103–31; Inscribed Landscapes: Travel Writing from Imperial China, translated by Richard E. Strassberg, 1994: 141–49
- Other writings: poetry.
- Collected works editions: Liu Hedong ji, 2 vols., 1974; Liu Zongyuan ji, edited by Wu Wenji, 4 vols., 1979.

Further Reading

- Bol, Peter, "This Culture of Ours": Intellectual Transitions in T'ang and Sung China, Stanford, California: Stanford University Press, 1992
- Chen Jo-shui, Liu Tsung-yüan and Intellectual Change in T'ang China, 773–819, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1992
- Chen Yu-shih, Images and Ideas in Chinese Classical Prose: Studies of Four Masters, Stanford, California: Stanford University Press, 1988
- Duan Xingmin, Liu Zihou yuyan wenxue tanwei (Research into Liu Zongyuan's allegorical writings), Taipei: Wenjin chuban she, 1978
- Gentzler, Jennings Mason, A Literary Biography of Liu Tsung-yüan, 773–819 (dissertation), New York: Columbia University, 1966
- Gu Yisheng, Liu Zongyuan, Shanghai: Zhonghua shuju, 1961
- Hartman, Charles, "Alieniloquium: Liu Tsung-yüan's Other Voice," Chinese Literature: Essays, Articles, and Reviews 4, no. 1 (January 1982):13–74
- Huang Yunmei, Han Yu, Liu Zongyuan wenxue pingjia (A critical evaluation of the literary works of Han Yu and Liu Zongyuan), Jinan: Shangdon renmin chuban she, 1957
- Liu Xizai, Yigai (A theoretical summary of art), Shanghai: Shanghai guji chuban she, 1978
- Luo Liantian, Liu Zongyuan shiji xinian ji ziliao leibian (A chronological biography of Liu Zongyuan's life together with a classified compendium of reference materials), Taipei: Guoli bianyi guan zhonghua congshu bianshen weiyuan hui, 1981
- Nienhauser, William H., Jr., Charles Hartman, and others, Liu Tsung-yüan, New York: Twayne, 1973
- Shi Ziyu, Liu Zongyuan nianpu (A chronology of Liu Zongyuan's life and works), Wuhan: Hubei renmin chuban she, 1958
- Shimizu Shigeru, "Ryu soogen no seikatsu taiken to so no sansuiki" (Liu Zongyuan's life experience and his records of excursions in nature), Chuugoku bungaku hoo 2 (April 1955): 45–74
- Spring, Madeline Kay, A Stylistic Study of Tang Guwen: The Rhetoric of Han Yu and Liu Zongyuan (dissertation), Seattle: University of Washington, 1983
- Sun Changwu, Liu Zongyuan zhuanlun (A biographical account of Liu Zongyuan's life and works), Beijing: Zhonghua shuju, 1982
- Wu Wenzhi, Gudian wenxue yanjiu ziliao: Liu Zongyuan juan (Materials for research on classical literature: volume on Liu Zongyuan), Beijing: Zhonghua shuju, 1964

Zhang Shizhao, Liu wen zhiyao (Essentials of Liu Zongyuan's writings), Beijing: Zhonghua shuju, 1974

Lopez, Barry

American, 1945–

With publication of the lyrical Arctic Dreams: Imagination and Desire in a Northern Landscape (1986) and his highly praised essay collection Crossing Open Ground (1988), Barry Lopez became a leading voice among writers who employ the art of the nature essay to express their concern for an endangered environment. His spare, clean, descriptive writing reveals an impressive understanding of natural history as he probes the often troublesome but necessary relationship between people and the real and mystical landscapes of nature. His topics reveal a scholar's grasp of the terminology of ornithology, mythology, marine biology, and anthropology as well as a gifted storyteller's knack for uncovering the wild longings of the human soul. In a review in the Washington Post (5 May 1988), T.H. Watkins writes that Lopez's essays validate his position "as one of the most fully involved and supremely articulate chroniclers of the land."

Lopez's popularity has increased commensurate with heightened public attention to potential hazards posed to oceans, wildlife, and forested lands by technology, urban sprawl and population growth. His individual appeal as a writer is also secured by the accessibility of his narrative style and personally involved approach to writing. His essays are widely published in such consumer-oriented journals as Smithsonian, Harper's, Outside, Aperture, and National Geographic, and in such scholarly publications as the Georgia Review, Chouteau Review, Science, and Orion Nature Quarterly. His essays have been included in anthologies, among them On Nature (1987), This Incomperable Land: A Book of American Nature Writing (1989), Wild Africa (1993), Major Modern Essayists (1994), and American Nature Writing (1994 and 1995).

Lopez is an activist who endeavors to appeal to a general audience, writing from his own experience as a traveler and adventurer in a form characteristic of Henry David Thoreau and contemporary nature essayist Edward Hoagland. A running theme in Lopez's essays is the influence of the "exterior landscape" of nature, with its intricate relationship between what is discernible and what is ineffable, on the pattern of speculations, intuitions, and thoughts that take place in the "interior landscape" of the mind. In "Landscape and Narrative" (1984), Lopez explains that through narration, the storyteller "draws on relationships in the exterior landscape and projects them onto the interior landscape" to create a harmony "between the two landscapes" using all the storyteller's craft of syntax, mood, and figures of speech.

Lopez seeks through his attention to descriptive detail and his own participation to evoke epiphanies that foster a feeling of intimacy with the land and reveal a sense of place. "I am up to my waist in a basin of cool, acid-clear water," he writes in "Gone Back into the Earth" (1981). In "A Reflection on White Geese" (1982), there is the impression of a man of extreme patience writing about his own habitat, rather than as a visitor merely passing through on his way to somewhere else. "I sat there for three hours, studying the birds' landings and takeoffs, how they behaved toward each other on the water... I am always struck anew in these moments, in observing such detail, by the way in which an animal slowly reveals itself." His use of metaphor and simile borrows from the attributes of the nature he writes about. In "Trying the Land" (1979), he writes, "We come downslope as graceless as boulders." Rather than using straightforward argument, he prefers to allow his truths to reveal themselves as if naturally encountered, as a child might wonder, in finding a piece of a raccoon's jaw in an alder thicket, how the animal had lived and died. In "Children in the Woods" (1982), Lopez writes that "everything found at the edge of one's senses" ultimately reveals how all things fit together to build an assurance of belonging.

Whether writing about ancient stone intaglios, explaining the reason behind the howling of wolves, or describing the snap and crack of an ice floe, Lopez expends considerable scholarly research and makes good use of his expert sources, which include botanists, biologists, naturalists, artists, and musicians. But he chooses to reveal the world of nature through the experience and eyes of his experts, rather than to rely solely on their academic expertise. In "A Presentation of Whales" (1980), a disturbing essay about the consternation that accompanies civilization's inability to cope with the enormity of natural processes, in this case the death of beached whales, the reader views through the eyes of a young biologist the horror of 41 rotting whales stretched for 500 yards nose to fluke. The young man sits on a dune awestruck and saddened but with the "rush of exhilaration, because there was so much information to be gathered." The seemingly incongruous blending of the mundane with the exotic sharpens the moments of illumination in Lopez's essays and creates for his readers new points from which to view the landscape.

But while there is a gentle, almost spiritually rambling tone to many of Lopez's essays, he can be confrontational and political, as he is in his extended essay The Rediscovery of North America (1990), which chides the incursion of Europeans into the New World to abuse the land, the people, and the diverse cultures. Still, he returns to the theme that nature, like art, offers the healing power of imagination: "We will always be rewarded if we give the land credit for more than we imagine, and if we imagine it as being more complex even than language." The thought reflects Lopez's view of literature in America. In an interview with Paul Pinterich of the Portland Oregonian (20 October 1994), Lopez, who lives in a cabin on the western slope of the Cascade Mountains near Eugene, Oregon, said he believes that many modern writers have been overly concerned with "interiors of the writer's mind. There is an utter disregard for the reader's imagination. Wherever our society is going, it will require an expansion of imagination."

PAUL L. WENSKE

Biography

Barry Holstun Lopez. Born 6 January 1945 in Port Chester, New York. Studied at the University of Notre Dame, Indiana, A.B., 1966, M.A. in teaching, 1968; University of Oregon, 1968–69. Married Sandra Landers, 1967. Full-time writer, from 1970. Associate at the Gannett Foundation, Columbia University, New York, from 1985; visiting writer or professor at various American universities, from 1985. Contributor to many journals and magazines; contributing editor, North American Review, from 1977, and Harper's, 1981–82, and from 1984. Awards: many, including the John Burroughs Medal and Christopher Medal, both for Of Wolves and Men, 1979; National Book Award and Christopher Medal, both for Arctic Dreams, 1986; Pacific Northwest Booksellers Award, for Arctic Dreams, 1987, and for fiction, 1995; Francis Fuller Victor Award, for Arctic Dreams, 1987; American Academy and Institute of Arts and Letters Award in Literature, 1987; Lannan Foundation Award, 1990; Governor's Award for Arts, 1990; honorary degrees from two universities.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Desert Notes: Reflections in the Eye of a Raven, 1976

Arctic Dreams: Imagination and Desire in a Northern Landscape, 1986

Crossing Open Ground, 1988

The Rediscovery of North America, 1990

Other writings: fictional narratives, retellings of Native American tales, short stories, and a book about wolves (Of Wolves and Men, 1978).

Further Reading

Aton, Jim, "An Interview with Barry Lopez," Western American Literature 21, no. 1 (May 1986):3–17

Bonetti, Kay, "An Interview with Barry Lopez," Missouri Review 11, no. 3 (1988):59–77

Coles, Romand, "Ecotones and Environmental Ethics: Adorno and Lopez," in The Nature of Things: Language, Politics, and the Environment, edited by Jane Bennett and William Chaloupka, Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1993:226–49

Lueders, Edward, editor, Writing Natural History: Dialogues with Authors, Salt Lake City: University of Utah Press, 1989

O'Connell, Nicholas, At the Field's End: Interviews with Twenty Pacific Northwest Writers, Seattle: Madrona, 1987

Paul, Sherman, Hewing to Experience: Essays and Reviews on Recent American Poetry and Poetics, Iowa City: University of Iowa Press, 1989

Ross, Daniel W., "Barry Lopez's Arctic Dreams: Looking into a New Heart of Darkness," CEA Critic 54, no.1 (Fall 1991):78–86

Wild, Peter, Barry Lopez, Boise, Idaho: Boise State University Press, 1984

Lourenço, Eduardo

Portuguese, 1923–

Eduardo Lourenço is the quintessential Portuguese essayist, in the best tradition of the Iberian essay, somewhat reminiscent of elements of José Ortega y Gasset and Miguel de Unamuno. He was still in his twenties when he published a remarkable book of essays that would become a reference point both in his life and in the history of Portuguese intellectual life. Heterodoxia I (1949) reveals a heterodoxical mind balanced between the two forces pulling at Portuguese intellectuals, then and for the next four decades—Marxism and Catholicism. Lourenço carved out a space in which to build his own cohesive and powerful world view. Phenomenology and existentialism became the other two pillars of his edifice.

Lourenço's style possesses a distinct brilliance, whether he is in dialogue with the great European minds of his time or rethinking the key topics of Portuguese cultural history. His essays have graced a wide variety of publications, and his books are basically collections of essays organized thematically. Poesia e metafísica (1983; Poetry and metaphysics) collects pieces on the greatest Portuguese poets—Camões, Antero, and Pessoa, the last receiving special attention in seminal essays, some of them now standard. Another collection, Ocasionais (1984; Occasionals), gathers earlier essays whose unity lies not in the theme but in the style and mental attitude of their author. His topics in this volume range from Sade to Lorca, and from Gilberto Freyre's luso-tropicalismo to "Europe and Death."

Portugal and the path of Portuguese cultural history in relation to the rest of Europe (almost an obsession in Iberian essay writing for the last two centuries) has been one of Lourenço's major concerns. His bestseller O labirinto da saudade: Psicanálise mítica do destino português (1978; The labyrinth of saudade: mythical psychoanalysis of Portuguese fate) went through various editions throughout the 1980s. Its themes were dealt with from a more theoretical perspective in Nós e a Europa, ou as duas razões (1988; We and Europe, or the two reasons), for which Lourenço received the Charles Veillon European Essay Prize in 1988.

In the interview that opens a special issue of the journal Prelo dedicated to the study of his work, Lourenço explains the formative boundaries of his thought in the Portugal of the 1940s: "Of no little importance was the fact that I lived in a country and in a cultural atmosphere in which vital attitudes and spiritual or ideological choices were conditioned by the hegemonic presence of Catholicism, the creed, the ideology, almost the state religion and, even more important, the ancestral practice of the Nation. Out of that background, and as a kind of anti-church, emerged what one could grossly call Marxism, less important, there and then, as a political reality than as a sign of opposition to, and rejection of the official cultural discourse."

Explaining his turn from mainstream philosophy, in an interview entitled "As confissões de um místico sem fé" (The confessions of a mystic without faith) Lourenço says: "...it is true that my resistance to the philosophical temptation to engage in an absolute discourse found a basis in what is usually referred to as 'existentialism.' In the last analysis, it was the figure of Philosophy itself that at a given moment appeared to me suspect. Almost at the same time, my discovery of Pessoa and Kierkegaard took me in the same direction, one exemplifying the illusion of consciousness as 'consciousness of itself' existing ontologically; the other, the incommensurability of personal existence vis-à-vis any type of existence. In either case, the end of philosophy" (Prelo, 1984).

In the same interview, Lourenço explains the importance of literature in his life and thought: "...my disillusionment with philosophy...does not mean that I have encountered in literature the truth that in philosophy was denied to me. I encountered only a reality more in agreement with the general sentiment I look for in life and in the world, something which imposes itself precisely because in it (I speak of great literature) life manifests in terms of paradoxical (poetic) splendor the nature of our relationship with reality, which is fictional."

To the question of how Lourenço sees himself, since some literary critics consider him to be metaphysical, and some metaphysicians consider him to be literary, he replies: "I would like to deserve the always undeserved epithet of 'metaphysician' in the two senses the pseudo-Baptists attribute to it. Unfortunately, this is not the case. As a more adequate label, I accept that of literato, if that means love or passion for the written word (imaginário). However, the absence of idolatry in regard to that same imaginário perhaps will make me unjust with myself... I never desired, nor do I desire, any kind of status. The most I could accept is, vaguely, 'essayist,' if one considers form, and 'mystic without faith,' if one considers content" (Prelo, 1984).

The status of Lourenço among Portuguese intellectuals is unparalleled. His writings combine a wide range of qualities—from an encyclopedic familiarity with Western philosophy and intellectual history, literature and art, to a unique knowledge and understanding of Portuguese cultural history, as well as a passionate involvement in contemporary Portuguese and world wide political events. His youthful, contagious spirit contrasts with a controlled, tragic sense of life written in the vivid yet sage prose of a born writer and poet.

ONÉSIMO T. ALMEIDA

Biography

Born 23 May 1923 in São Pedro do Rio Seco. Studied at a military college, Lisbon; history and philosophy at the University of Coimbra, graduated 1946. Philosophy assistant, University of Coimbra, 1947–53; lecturer in Portuguese literature and culture, Universities of Hamburg, Heidelberg, and Montpellier, 1954–58; professor of philosophy, University of Bahia, Brazil, 1958–59; lecturer and associate professor, University of Nice, 1965–88; cultural attaché to the Portuguese Embassy, Rome, 1990; visiting professor, Brown University, Providence, Rhode Island, 1995. Married Annie Solomon: one son. Awards: Veillon European Essay Prize, 1988; Camões Prize; Ordem de Santiago de Espada; honorary degrees from two universities.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Heterodoxia, 2 vols., 1949–67

O desespero humanista de Miguel Torga e o das novas gerações, 1955

Sentido e forma da poesia neo-realista, 1968

Fernando Pessoa revisitado: Leitura estruturante do drama em gente, 1973

Tempo e poesia, 1974

Os militares e o poder, 1975

Situação africana e consciência nacional, 1976

O fascismo nunca existiu, 1976

O labirinto da saudade: Psicanálise mítica do destino português, 1978

O complexo de Marx, ou, O fim do desafio português, 1979

O espelho imaginário, 1981

Poesia e metafísica: Camões, Antero, Pessoa, 1983

Ocasionais I, 1950–1965, 1984

Fernando, rei de Nossa Baviera, 1986

Nós e a Europa, ou as duas razões, 1988

O canto do signo, existência e literatura (1957–1993), 1994

Camões, 1525–1580, with Vasco Graça Moura, 1994

A Europa desen cantada, para uma mitologia europeia, 1994

Further Reading

“Eduardo Lourenço, o ensaísta criador,” special section of Jornal de Letras, Artes e Ideias 16 (1996)

Gil, José, and Fernando Catroga, O ensaísmo trágico de Eduardo Lourenço, Lisbon: Relógio de Água, 1996

Guimarães, Fernando, “Eduardo Lourenço: Entre a filosofia e a poesia,” Colóquio-Letras 80 (July 1984):86–90

Letras & Letras issue on Lourenço, 3, no. 27 (March 1990)

“Lourenço, Eduardo,” in Logos: Enciclopédia Luso-Brasileira de filosofia, vol. 3, Lisbon and São Paulo: Verbo, 1991

“Lourenço, Eduardo,” in Dicionário do Estado Novo, Lisbon: Círculo dos Leitores, 1996

Prelo: Revista da Imprensa Nacional-Casa da Moeda issue on Lourenço (May 1984)

Simões, João Gaspar, Crítica V—Críticos e ensaístas contemporâneos (1942–1979),

Lisbon: Imprensa Nacional-Casa de Moeda, 1983

Lu Xun

Chinese, 1881–1936

It was Lu Xun who introduced the best-known description of the familiar essay to China when he published a translation of the Japanese scholar Kuriyagawa Hakuson's Chule xiangya zhi ta (Out from the ivory tower) in 1925. Using Western sources, this work pictured the essay as a transcription of a good conversation around a winter fire among friends, in an atmosphere of slippered ease. Ironically, Lu Xun's own reputation as an essayist was of the opposite kind: that of a warlike, biting, often deadly polemicist.

Lu Xun had all the qualifications to be a good polemicist. On the personal level, he easily imagined himself slighted or traduced, and bore long grudges; he had a brilliant mind and, never having had a job which kept him busy, had devoted many years to reading Chinese history and literature, and through Japanese (he was a student in Japan from 1902, to 1909) to learning about the foreign experience, which gave him a superior stock of allusions and analogies. Moreover, under the imperial regime he had learned how to plan a composition and to use rhetorical devices. That he was able to mock and abuse the authorities without being arrested he owed to the relatively civilized regime in Beijing up to 1926, and subsequently to the protection of the International Settlement in Shanghai, which he moved to in 1927, as well as latterly to his nationwide fame.

The May Fourth movement (1919) was a kind of revolution against the "feudal" culture which the 1911 revolution had not seriously disturbed. As one of its pioneers, Lu Xun won his spurs as an essayist by laying into the establishment, and there was much in the conduct of national life to keep him embattled thereafter. When he joined the United Front around 1930 he committed himself to fight the Nationalist (Kuomintang) government until the end of his days. A great deal of his polemical work dealt of course with current affairs and needs lengthy footnotes for present-day readers, but his habit of relating current ills to perennial complaints and deeprooted vices makes these writings appreciable without knowledge of the detail. Since China at that time was at the mercy of the colonial powers, especially Japan, the story that events told was one of weakness and subservience. This situation Lu Xun summed up in memorable words. Perhaps his most famous dictum was that China had only known two phases in its history: the one when its people were happy being slaves, the other when they were unhappy because they could not be slaves.

Lu Xun became known as dedicated to "hot abuse" and "cold sarcasm," but what raised his polemical essays above those of his contemporaries, aside from his powerful intellect, was his way of marshaling his words like troops on a battlefield, now feinting an attack, now feigning weakness, now holding, now retreating, finally springing a trap, all very much as the ancient manuals on the art of war recommended. The repetition of key phrases, with some variations (like Mark Antony's "an honourable man"), was one of his standbys, but patterns were rarely repeated. General characteristics of opponents were often subsumed in animal behavior (e.g. Pekinese dogs, packhounds, wasps), a trick he borrowed from traditional satirical parables. His most flexible and reliable resource, however, was a more or less total command of the Chinese language, classical and modern: the ability to mix and switch registers was used very effectively to mock and shock. There is no doubt that as a polemicist Lu Xun was world class.

Though the greater part of Lu Xun's many volumes of miscellaneous essays were littérature engagée, he also displayed other sides. When in the mid-1920s he went through his dark night of the soul, the experience resulted in a collection of prose poems entitled Ye cao (1927; Wild Grass), which some regard as his finest work while others denigrate it as derivative. The tone seems to have been set by Nietzsche's Also sprach Zarathustra (1883–85; Thus Spoke Zarathustra), to which Lu Xun was very attracted in early adulthood. Stark and barren landscapes, symbolic figures and images, and strange encounters and cryptic speeches dominate the collection.

More accessible are the backward-looking essays of Zhao hua xi shi (1928; Morning blossoms picked at eventide), which affectionately recall the background of his early life, and the more ruminative essays scattered throughout his collections, which are not without wit and humor. Though Lu Xun dissociated himself from the deliberate humor of the magazines that Lin Yutang was responsible for in the 1930s, he had a fund of wit which he used facetiously as well as cuttingly, as can be deduced merely from the title “You Zhongguo nüren de jiao tuiding Zhongguo ren de fei zhongyong, you youci tuiding Kong fuzi you weibing” (1933; To reach the conclusion from women’s feet that Chinese people do not follow the golden mean, and thence further to conclude that Confucius suffered from his stomach). Humor of a generous kind can also be found in his work, though he was reluctant to admit it. A case in point is “A Jin” (1935), which takes its title from the name of the feisty woman servant who came to live and work opposite. Lu Xun was ideologically inclined to take the side of the working class, and had often written compassionately of the fate of weak and helpless females, but A Jin did not conform to type. He had to learn to give the house where she worked a wide berth, as she was in the habit of tossing things over her balcony, and the nights, when he did most of his writing, were disturbed by her lovers who came calling. Before she moved away he was forced to confess ruefully that this A Jin had made him revise beliefs he had cherished for the better part of his lifetime. The essay is one long complaint, but it is an index of its humanity that the reader feels that the author did not really regret his encounter.

Given that no one who writes as extensively as Lu Xun did can maintain consistent quality, the fact that so many of his essays bespeak a mind fully engaged to give of its considerable best makes it hard to dispute the claim common in his homeland that Lu Xun was 20th-century China’s best essayist.

D.E.POLLARD

Biography

Born Zhou Shuren, 25 September 1881 in Shaoxing, Zhejiang province. Older brother of Zhou Zuoren. Studied at the Jiangnan Naval Academy, Nanjing, 1898–99; School of Mining and Railways, Nanjing, 1900–02; Japanese language at Kobun College, Japan, 1902–04; medicine at Sendai Medical School, Japan, 1904–06; continued private studies in Japan, 1906–09. Married Zhu An, 1906 (arranged by his mother; probably never consummated). Taught in Hangzhou, 1909–10, and Shaoxing, 1910–11. Worked at the Ministry of Education, Beijing, 1912–26. Contributor to various journals, including Xin qingnian (New youth), from 1918. Lecturer in Chinese literature, Peking University, 1920–26, Beijing Women’s Normal College, from 1923, Xiamen (Amoy) University, 1926, and Sun Yatsen University, Canton, 1927: resigned in protest at Jiang Kaishek’s seizure of power. Lived in the International Settlement, Shanghai, from 1927. Founder, Yusi (Thread of conversation), 1924, and Mangyuan (The wilderness), 1925; cofounder, Zhaohua she (Dawn blossoms press), 1928; editor, Benliu (The torrent), 1928, and Yiwen (Translation), 1934. Founding member, League of LeftWing Writers, 1930, China Freedom League, 1930, and member, League for the Defense of Civic Rights, 1933. Died in Shanghai, 19 October 1936.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Refeng (Hot air), 1925

Huagai ji (Unlucky star), 2 vols., 1926–27

Fen (The grave), 1927

Zhao hua xi shi, 1928

Eryi ji (And that's that), 1928

Erxin ji (Two hearts), 1932

Sanxian ji (Three leisures), 1932

Wei ziyou shu (False freedom), 1933

Nanqiang beidiao ji (Mixed accents), 1934

Zhun fengyue tan (Pseudo-frivolous talk), 1934

Huabian wenxue (Fringed literature), 1936

Qiejieting zawen (Essays of Qiejieting), 3 vols., 1936

Selected Works, translated by Yang Xianyi and Gladys Yang, 4 vols., 1956–60

Silent China: Selected Writings, edited and translated by Gladys Yang, 1973

Translations of essays in: The Columbia Anthology of Modern Chinese Literature, edited by Joseph S.M.Lau and Howard Goldblatt, 1995:587–600, and in Renditions 26 (1986):125–31, and 31 (1989):140–47

Other writings: the volume of prose poetry Ye cao (1927; Wild Grass), many short stories, a history of Chinese fiction, classical poetry, and correspondence. Also translated works from the German and Japanese.

Collected works editions: Lu Xun xiansheng quanji, 20 vols., 1938, revised edition, 1973, and supplements edited by Tang Tao, 2 vols., 1942–52; Lu Xun quanji, 10 vols., 1956–58; Lu Xun quanji, 16 vols., 1991.

Further Reading

Castro, Angela, Three Early Essays of Lu Hsiün (M.Phil. dissertation), London: University of London, 1968

Lee, Leo Ou-fan, Voices from the Iron House: A Study of Lu Xun, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1987:89–129

Pollard, David E., “Lu Xun’s Zawen” in Lu Xun and His Legacy, edited by Leo Ou-fan Lee, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1985:54–89

Lukács, Georg

Hungarian, 1885–1971

Georg Lukács was, first and foremost, an essayist. His career as an essayist was established primarily in the Nyugat (The west) and Huszadik Század (The 20th century), the two leading journals of radical intellectuals in fin-de-siècle Budapest. Lukács' essayist period of 1908 to 1911 yielded A lélek és a formák (1910; Soul and Form) and established his European reputation. The object of these essays is Lukács himself: engaging, ingenious, elusive, a virtuoso in flirting with roles—an ascetic, Faust, or Silenic-featured Socrates. Inspired by Lukács' tragic love affair with Irma Seidler, his immortal beloved, Soul and Form revolves around life, art, Eros, and philosophy—the compass points of the soul. In his essays, he appears a worthy disciple of Montaigne, Kierkegaard, and Nietzsche. In Montaigne, man's life—the random personal life as a whole—became problematic in the modern sense. Whereas Montaigne never transposed the problematic into the realm of the tragic, Lukács, caught between Eros and knowledge, celebrates the fatal, tragic solitude of Socratic souls, who, despite Eros, remain “servants and fanatics of their own development.”

On a more intimate level, the essays in Soul and Form contain Kierkegaard's attitude of fascinated terror toward Eros. To Lukács, the object of Eros was not so much seduction or consummation as it was experimentation. In Socratic fashion, he approached Eros for the conquest of spirit rather than the conquest of the flesh. He faced the seductive possibilities of both Nietzsche, who claimed that none of the great philosophers—Plato, Spinoza, Kant, Schopenhauer—was married because marriage is an obstacle to fulfillment, and Goethe, whose love, as Lukács never failed to point out, gave birth to his spiritual drama Iphigenie auf Tauris (1802; Iphigenia in Tauris).

Not surprisingly, Lukács' essay “Über Sehnsucht und Form” (1911; “On Longing and Form”), reflecting on Plato's Eros, Dante's great love, Don Quixote, and the scorned heroes of Flaubert, caught Thomas Mann's attention. In Der Tod in Venedig (1912; Death in Venice), Mann disputed Lukács' notion that “Socrates transformed his longing into a philosophy whose peak was eternally unattainable, the highest goal of all human longing: intellectual contemplation... In life [however], longing has to remain love: that is its happiness and its tragedy.”

It may sound paradoxical that the essay, despite Lukács' renown as a Marxist system builder, remained his representative genre. In his essay on Kierkegaard, Lukács declared, “There is no system in life. In life there is only the separate and individual, the concrete. To exist is to be different.” Influenced by Kierkegaard, Lukács the essayist disputed Hegel's claim that only art, religion, and philosophy reveal the absolute. In his famed triad, art-religion-philosophy, where art expresses the same “content” as religion and philosophy, but in a different “form,” Hegel accords no recognition to the essay as a genre. By contrast, Lukács elevates the essay to an art form, designed to capture the absolute or permanent in the transitory, fugitive, and contingent, and distinguish it from the icy, final perfection of philosophy. Dissenting from Hegel, Lukács believes that the essay, as an art form, mediates between art and philosophy. The essayist, he said, poses questions: what is life, what is man, what is destiny? But questions are simply posed, not answered—the essayist does not supply “solutions” like the answers of science or, at purer heights, those of philosophy.

Like Montaigne, Lukács the essayist adapts his lofty intellect to the everyday detail of life, emphasizing it with ironic modesty. He sees the same irony, though in different form, in every text by every great essayist. In Plato, the greatest essayist in Lukács’ definition, philosophy is underlined by the irony of the realities of life. According to Lukács, the life of Socrates, whose profound philosophical thoughts are interrupted by humor and irony, typifies the essay form. The essayist, modeled on Socrates, is preeminently a critic who, sent to proclaim and bring to light ideals and values, must judge every phenomenon by the scale of his own values. The essayist’s right to create his judgment values from within himself, while offering no clear-cut answers, leads to Lukács’ exalted claim: “The essay is a court, but (unlike in the legal system) it is not the verdict that is important, that sets the standards and creates precedent, but the process of examining and judging.”

It is not surprising that some of Lukács’ seminal essays, notably that on Laurence Sterne in Soul and Form, and “A lelki szegénységről” (1911; “On Poverty of Spirit”), are written in the form of Socratic dialogues. This approach presented problems when Lukács decided to pursue an academic career at Heidelberg. His friend and mentor, Max Weber, addressing the question whether Lukács was really an essayist and not a systematic thinker, was forthright: “I must be frank with you. A very good friend of yours, Emil Lask, is of the opinion that as a born essayist you will not be content with a systematic work, and that hence you should not habilitate [i.e. become qualified as a university lecturer]. The essayist is not one hair less of a disciplined systemizer, perhaps on the contrary. But he does not belong to the university, and he writes his work for his own salvation.”

Lask’s characterization of Lukács as a born essayist proved prophetic. His academic hopes dashed at Heidelberg, Lukács ultimately sought his own salvation in Budapest by joining the Hungarian Communist Party in 1918. His leap of faith stunned his friends, above all Weber. In his famous lectures entitled “Wissenschaft als Beruf” (1917; “Science as a Vocation”) and “Politik als Beruf” (1919; “The Vocation of Politics”), delivered in Munich in January 1919, Weber took issue with Lukács who, he claimed, in turning Marxist failed to distinguish between the “ethic of responsibility” and the “ethic of ultimate ends.”

What is instructive in the relationship of Weber and Lukács is that, despite their political differences, both remained essayists at heart. As one leading commentator of Weber put it, “If we regard the essay as the art-form suited to the twentieth century, then Weber is immediately placed alongside authors such as Georg Simmel, Robert Musil, and Georg Lukács, among others. They all shared the attempt to ‘mediate,’ to build bridges, and thereby open up new pathways” (Dirk Käsler, Max Weber, 1988).

Even as a Marxist, Lukács continued to write essays; in many ways, his Marxism constitutes the keynote of his character as a thinker. Thomas Mann, having read Soul and Form, observed that we have a particular right to “knowledge which we ourselves helped to create merely by our own existence.” Lukács’ own troubled existence in the hellish world of Stalin’s Russia found relief, if not escape, in the essay. As Mann so perceptively put it, in response to Lukács’ essays on Goethe’s works in Goethe és kora (1946; Goethe and His Age), and on Mann’s own intellectual and artistic development in A polgár nyomában: A hetvenéves Thomas Mann (1947; Essays on Thomas Mann), “This Communist [Lukács] who is deeply concerned with the ‘bourgeois heritage,’ and who can write fascinatingly and intelligently about Raabe, Keller, or Fontane, had earlier discussed me with intelligence and respect.”

During the Great Purges in Russia, where he had lived for many years, Lukács wrote essays on the tradition of the novel as exemplified in the works of Balzac, Stendhal, Tolstoi, Zola, and Gor’kii. These essays, written in the 1930s, appeared in Essays über Realismus (1948; Studies in European Realism and Essays on Realism), a landmark in 20th-century literary criticism. Whether Lukács writes on Balzac or Tolstoi, invariably he writes as an essayist from the perspective of a philosophical system. In his literary essays, he displays little of the subtlety and plasticity of Thomas Mann or Virginia Woolf. On the other hand, few modern critics can match Lukács’ intellectual passion and philosophical vision for the literary tradition of European realism which he so admired and championed. Not unlike Samuel Taylor Coleridge, T.S.Eliot, or Edmund Wilson, intent on creating a new literary taste in conformity with their own artistic ideals, Lukács not only carried the torch for European realism, but became the uncompromising custodian or conscience of literary tradition. It is not without irony that Lukács—whose Marxist literary essays are steeped in German philosophy and metaphysics consisting of vocabulary and arguments the Anglo-Saxon literary world finds alien—accepted Eliot’s dictum in “Tradition and the Individual Talent” (1919) that the poet and artist must transform the past in the light of the present.

In his greatest pre-Marxist essay, Die Theorie des Romans (1920; The Theory of the Novel), Lukács delineated the relationship between prose fiction and social reality, between the novel and time treated as a concrete historical medium. Lukács’ historical-philosophical essay, formulating a new conception of time in the novel based on the Bergsonian concept of durée—the duration and expanse of time which the novel covers, dividing men into generations and integrating their actions in an historical-social context—also illustrates the formidable challenge Lukács the essayist presents to his English or American readers. The problems are twofold. For one thing, Lukács is rooted in the classics, especially Aristotle, his heritage is central European, and, reflecting his Jewish background, he approaches literature and writers from a universal, humanistic perspective, disregarding national, linguistic, and cultural boundaries. Moreover, there are Lukács’ own convictions and tenor of thought, as well as his style of writing, which is complex, uncompromising, abstract, and displays little sensitivity or feeling for language and poetry. His profound intellect and erudition, which prefers the enunciated style, full of gravity and depth, conveys finality and authority. Though Lukács’ range of interest is immense, his essays are grounded in the conviction that criticism and philosophical discourse must establish a distance from belles-lettres, that an essayist who, like Nietzsche, turns his essays into a dazzling artistic performance betrays his vocation.

ARPAD KADARKAY

Biography

György Szegedy von Lukács. Born 13 April 1885 in Budapest. Studied at the University of Budapest, Ph.D., 1906; studied privately with Heinrich Rickert in Heidelberg, 1912–15. Joined the Hungarian Communist Party, 1918. Married Gertrud Bortstieber, 1919. Commissar of Public Education, 1919: exiled from Hungary as a result. Associated with the Marx-Engels-Lenin Institute, Moscow, 1919–30; researcher, Institute of Philosophy, Soviet Academy of Sciences, Moscow, 1933–44. Returned to Hungary, 1945. Professor of aesthetics and cultural philosophy, University of Budapest, 1945–56. Minister of Culture, 1956. Awards: Kossuth Prize, 1955; Goethe Prize, 1970. Died in Budapest, 4 June 1971.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose (Lukács wrote in Hungarian and German; most works were published in both languages, but only first published edition listed here, regardless of its language)

A lélek és a formák (Kisérletek), 1910; enlarged edition, as Die Seele und die Formen, 1911; as Soul and Form, translated by Anna Bostock, 1974

Eztétikai kultúra, 1913

Taktika és ethika, 1919; as “Tactics and Ethics,” in Political Writings, 1919–1929, translated by Michael McColgan, 1972

Die Theorie des Romans: Ein geschichtsphilosophischer Versuch über die Formen der grossen Epik, 1920; as The Theory of the Novel: A Historico-Philosophical Essay on the Form of Great Epic Literature, translated by Anna Bostock, 1971

Geschichte und Klassenbewusstsein: Studien über marxistische Dialektik, 1923; as History and Class Consciousness: Studies in Marxist Dialectics, translated by Rodney Livingstone, 1971

Balzac, Stendhal, Zola, 1945; part in Studies in European Realism, translated by Edith Bone, 1950, and in Essays on Realism, translated by David Fernbach, 1980

Goethe és kora, 1946; as Goethe and His Age, translated by Robert Anchor, 1968

Irodalom és demokrácia, 1947

A polgári filozófia válsága, 1947

A polgár nyomában: A hetvenéves Thomas Mann, 1947; as Essays on Thomas Mann, translated by Stanley Mitchell, 1964

A történelmi regény, 1947; as The Historical Novel, translated by Hannah and Stanley Mitchell, 1962

Schicksalswende, Beiträge zu einer deutschen Ideologie, 1948

Existentialisme ou marxisme?, 1948

A realizmus problémái, 1948

Új magyar kultúráért, 1948

Karl Marx und Friedrich Engels als Literaturhistoriker, 1948

Der junge Hegel: Über die Beziehungen von Dialektik und Ökonomie, 1948; as The Young Hegel: Studies in the Relations Between Dialectics and Economics, translated by Rodney Livingstone, 1975

- Essays über Realismus*, 1948; part in Studies in European Realism: A Sociological Survey of the Writings of Balzac, Stendhal, Zola, Tolstoy, Gorki, and Others, translated by Edith Bone, 1950, and in Essays on Realism, edited by Rodney Livingstone, translated by David Fernbach, 1980
- Der russische Realismus in der Weltliteratur*, 1949; enlarged edition, 1952; part in Studies in European Realism: A Sociological Survey of the Writings of Balzac, Stendhal, Zola, Tolstoy, Gorki, and Others, translated by Edith Bone, 1950, and in Essays on Realism, edited by Rodney Livingstone, translated by David Fernbach, 1980
- Deutsche Realisten des 19. Jahrhunderts*, 1951; as German Realists in the Nineteenth Century, edited by Rodney Livingstone, translated by Jeremy Gaines and Paul Keast, 1993
- Puschkin-Gorki (Zwei Essays)*, 1952
- Nagy orosz realista; Kritikai realizmus; Szikra*, 1952,
- Adalékok az esztétika történetéhez*, 1953
- Die Zerstörung der Vernunft*, 1954; as The Destruction of Reason, translated by Peter Palmer, 1980
- Schriften zur Literatursoziologie*, edited by Peter Ludz, 1961
- Deutsche Literatur in zwei Jahrhunderten*, 1964
- Die Grablegung des alten Deutschland: Essays zur deutschen Literatur des 19. Jahrhunderts*, 1967
- Writer and Critic, and Other Essays*, edited and translated by Arthur D.Kahn, 1971
- Political Writings, 1919–1929: The Question of Parliamentarianism and Other Essays*, edited by Rodney Livingstone, translated by Michael McColgan, 1971; as Tactics and Ethics: Political Essays, 1919–1929, 1975
- Marxism and Human Liberation: Essays on History, Culture, and Revolution*, edited by E.San Juan, 1973
- Politische Aufsätze*, 1975
- Kunst und objektive Wahrheit: Essays zur Literaturtheorie und Geschichte*, 1977
- Theory, Culture, and Politics*, edited by Judith Marcus and Zoltan Tarr, 1989
- The Lukács Reader*, edited by Arpad Kadarkay, 1995
- Collected works edition: Werke, 15 vols., 1961– (in progress).

Bibliography

- Hartmann, Jürgen, in Festschrift zum achtzigsten Geburtstag von Georg Lukács, edited by Frank Benseler, Neuwied and Berlin: Luchterhand, 1965:615–96

Further Reading

- Bernstein, J.M., The Philosophy of the Novel: Lukács, Marxism and the Dialectics of Form, Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, and Brighton: Harvester, 1984
- Congdon, Lee, The Young Lukács, Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1983
- Eagleton, Terry, The Ideology of the Aesthetic, Oxford: Blackwell, 1990
- Feenberg, Andrew, Lukács, Marx and the Sources of Critical Theory, Totowa, New Jersey: Rowman and Littlefield, and Oxford: Robertson, 1981
- Jameson, Frederic, Marxism and Form: Twentieth-Century Dialectical Theories of

Literature, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1971

Kadarkay, Arpad, Georg Lukács: Life, Thought, and Politics, Oxford and Cambridge, Massachusetts: Blackwell, 1991

MacIntyre, Alasdair, Against the Self-Images of the Age: Essays on Ideology and Philosophy, London: Duckworth, and New York: Schocken, 1971

Steiner, George, George Steiner: A Reader, New York: Oxford University Press, and Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1984

Wellek, René, Four Critics: Croce, Valéry, Lukács, and Ingarden, Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1981

This page intentionally left blank.

M

McArthur, Peter

Canadian, 1866–1924

A prolific and popular writer whose oeuvre includes works of biography, biocriticism, fiction, and poetry, Peter McArthur is remembered most commonly as a humorist and for what he called his “country stuff”: bucolic sketches closer to causeries than to formal essays. Although he published in such popular journals as the Atlantic Monthly, Forum, Punch, the New York Sun, and his own short-lived periodical, Ourselves: A Magazine for Cheerful Canadians (1910–12), his reputation was established primarily through his long association with two Canadian publications: the Toronto Globe, where his twiceweekly column appeared from 1909 to 1924, and the Farmer’s Advocate, to which he contributed less regularly from 1910 to 1922. Indeed, his most popular books—In Pastures Green (1915), The Red Cow and Her Friends (1919), The Affable Stranger (1920), and Around Home (1925)—are compilations of these Globe and Advocate columns, arranged with some minor revisions by McArthur himself. (Two later and less popular compilations, Familiar Fields [1925] and Friendly Acres [1927], were arranged with editorial input from McArthur’s son.)

Attracted to an idealistic and somewhat simplistic vision of Canada’s rural past, McArthur was a dedicated promoter of agrarianism and the national myth of the heroic pioneer. His essays are casual and contemplative, structured as the first-person reflections of a contented farmer-philosopher and organized according to patterns drawn from farm life and from the natural world: a day on the farm, observations of seasonal changes in landscape, or the escapades of a familiar coterie of farm animals. Here McArthur celebrates rural living, idealizing the farm as “a place of peace, a place of refuge and a home” far removed from a modern world ravaged by the excesses of urbanization and industrialization, a deepening sense of personal alienation, rampant materialism, and social cleavage.

Never drawn to what he called “the cosmical moods” of a poet like Whitman or the natural theology of Wordsworth, McArthur constructs his philosophy on a kind of Bergsonian vitalism, a stance which, he believed, allowed him “to keep [his] feet on the earth—in good Canadian mud—even when indulging the wildest flights of imagination.” An early Canadian proponent of the “back to the land” movement, a philosophical stance that leads to comparisons with such writers as William Cobbett and McArthur’s own favorite, Henry David Thoreau, McArthur has a love of the land that is reinforced at every turn by pragmatism. Not only could a return to the farm ease the emotional and spiritual encumbrances of modern life, but it was also an efficacious means of guaranteeing all healthy workers a degree of annual selfsubsistence.

On the other hand, McArthur is not one to suggest that all was sweetness and light on his farm; indeed, he frequently sharpens the homespun wisdoms of his farmer-philosopher to a satiric edge. But where such contemporaries as Mark Twain and Stephen Leacock are polished and witty commentators on the spirit of the day (or lack thereof), McArthur is often only unpleasant, his attacks heavyhanded. Moreover, his tendency on such occasions is to abandon the broad base of humanist concerns that characterizes his more successful pieces in order to focus instead on an increasingly familiar set of targets: a centralized banking system and a Bank Act which he saw as a threat to the economic stability of rural communities; the obscurantism of politicians and popular media; the ubiquitous “Big Interests” of commerce and industry; the human and economic costs of war; and the depopulation of farms and threat of an urban imperialism that drew future generations of farmers to lives of quiet desperation in city factories.

Of these so-called social essays, those collected in The Affable Stranger provide the most mature and thorough summary of McArthur’s views. Organized around the trip of the titular “affable stranger,” a man “willing to engage in conversation with any one who is willing to talk,” they provide McArthur the opportunity to examine the various groups and ideologies struggling to gain or regain relevance following World War I, particularly those influencing Canadian-American relations. An ardent, yet tolerant and critical nationalist who some contemporary readers saw as excessively left-wing in his politics, McArthur remained wary of the “wild new politics” of communism, which he saw as impractical (“Prince Kropotkin’s Cow”), and socialism, which he called the politics of “the Lotos-Eaters” (“Back to the Primitive”). At the same time he is fearful that any “nation that has been roused to a sense of power by the war will act swiftly and intolerantly without discriminating sufficiently between those who would reform society and those who would wreck it” (“The Elusive Insult”). His overall message in these essays is clear, albeit wishful: by wakening the dormant pioneer spirit of home-building and cooperation, humankind could successfully skirt the multitudinous hazards in its path.

Whether McArthur is recounting the farm escapades of Socrates the ram or railing against what he perceived to be the jingoism of American filmmakers (“Registering Reform,” 1920), his style in almost all his essays is personal. Avoiding for the most part any hint of parochialism, his writing is marked by a genial, self-deprecating humor and reliance on what he purports to be firsthand knowledge and common sense. With an acknowledged “weakness for quotations” and allusion that assumes a literate and well-read audience, he also relies heavily and not so subtly on works of Poe, Shakespeare, Tennyson, Thoreau, various Romantic poets, and the Bible as “an easy way to get out of hammering out phrases and sentences to express ideas” (“Quotations,” 1920). His writing, in this sense, becomes an odd, and at times mismatched, palimpsest of vernacular, historical, biblical, and cultural references which in the aggregate suggest that simplicity, even when associated with the peace and idealism of rural life, is neither simple nor without literary or artistic merit.

To the modern reader, McArthur’s style, though never egregious, appears as his greatest weakness. Burdened by excessive and misplaced colloquialisms, faulty grammar, and meandering paragraphs, individual pieces often lapse into what Brandon Conron (1965) suggests is “sheer carelessness which cannot even be excused as ‘homely charmt.’” Despite these limitations as a stylist, McArthur remains an important contributor to the development of the essay in fin-de-siècle Canada. Part light humorist, part rural nostalgist, and part populist farm advocate, McArthur was, in retrospect, always a sympathetic and articulate interpreter of Canada and the Canadian spirit at the beginning of a new century.

KLAY DYER

Biography

Born 10 March 1866 in Ekfrid Township, near Glencoe, Ontario. Studied at Strathroy Model School, teacher’s certificate, 1887; taught for six months, then studied at the University of Toronto, 1888–89. Reporter, Toronto Mail, 1889–90; freelance journalist, New York, 1890–95, where he met Bliss Carman and the writer and critic Charles G.D.Roberts; editor, Truth, 1895–97. Married Mabel Waters, 1895: four sons and one daughter. Lived in England, 1902–04, writing for Punch and other journals and newspapers. Moved back to New York and briefly opened an advertising agency, 1904. Returned to Ekfrid family farm, 1909. Wrote for the Toronto Globe, 1909–24, and the Farmer’s Advocate, 1910–22; editor, Ourselves farm magazine, 1910–12. Died in London, Ontario, 28 October 1924.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

To Be Taken with Salt: Being an Essay on Teaching One’s Grandmother to Suck Eggs, 1903

In Pastures Green, 1915

The Red Cow and Her Friends, 1919

The Affable Stranger, 1920

Around Home, 1925

Familiar Fields, 1925

Friendly Acres, 1927

The Best of Peter McArthur, edited by Alec Lucas, 1967

Other writings: poetry, fiction, a study of Stephen Leacock (1923), and a biography of Sir Wilfrid Laurier (1919).

Further Reading

Conron, Brandon, “Essays 1880–1920,” in Literary History of Canada: Canadian Literature in English, edited by Carl F.Klinck and others, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1976:354–60 (original edition, 1965)

- Deacon, William Arthur, Peter McArthur, Toronto: Ryerson Press, 1923
- Lucas, Alec, Introduction to The Best of Peter McArthur, Toronto: Clarke Irwin, 1967
- Lucas, Alec, Peter McArthur, Boston: Twayne, 1975
- McNally, David, "Peter McArthur and Canadian Nationalism," Ontario History 64, no. 1 (1972):1–10
- Watt, F.W., "Peter McArthur and the Agrarian Myth," Queen's Quarterly 67, no. 2 (1960):245–57
- Wells, Kenneth, Introduction to In Pastures Green by McArthur, Toronto: Dent, 1948

Macaulay, Thomas Babington

British, 1800–1859

Thomas Babington Macaulay wrote histories, polemics, book reviews, and government reports rather than essays on subjects such as friendship or his own position in the world. Although his prose has distinct marks of a personality, he never exploits his emotions as a subject. He was a Whig politician, a Member of Parliament, active in the government of India, and a proponent of reform, but Macaulay engaged his issues by the requirement of a book review or an editor's assignment. As an historian, he is admired for his lively and interesting prose, but his underlying agenda enraged subsequent historians. As Jane Millgate (1973) notes, Whig historians "derive their historical patterns from the last item in a sequence of events" and trace the line backward, "disregarding all occurrences which that line does not intersect." Even his poetry—his book of verse was immensely popular, often reprinted and quoted—advocates his causes: a more open society dependent on commercial interests in England, a progressive view of English history, and faith in the English constitution.

Macaulay is sometimes called the first Victorian because he tames early 19th-century enthusiasm for the sublime, the mystic, and the distant by his practical sense of what ordinary humans can fathom. We live, with his essayist's voice, in the best of possible worlds, solidly in the middle way between fanatics of the left (the Puritans) and of the right (High Tories, Anglo-Catholics, and admirers of the Middle Ages). He probably wrote to an imagined audience composed, first, of his two beloved sisters. We overhear a conversation from an older brother, reaching and directing our thought in the best possible way. He expects his readers to catch allusions to Spenser, Dante, and Milton. Macaulay is always at our elbow with gentle nudges and not-so-innocent pushes. Courteously, he allows others in the room to listen. His prose, his focus, his sureness restore order in distracted minds. Gently he introduces good causes like votes for women, the rights of the Irish, the place of poetry. The voice is never shrill and always accommodating. His judgments are clear, assured, and firm. Macaulay aimed to attract novel readers and general readers high and low. How can this happy breed be but cheerful in the hands of a narrative voice that describes how "the long struggle between our sovereigns and their Parliaments... bound up together the rights of the people and the title of the reigning dynasty"? He speaks to an American audience when he notes that the “British colonies rapidly became far mightier and wealthier than the realms which Cortes and Pizarro” added to Spain. Macaulay joyfully reels off the epic names and places of Celt, Saxon, and Norman until, presumably, we arrive at the First Reform Bill in 1832, when all is perfected.

Macaulay’s judgments are distinct even in anonymous essays he wrote for the Edinburgh Review. Of Scottish ancestry himself, Macaulay disliked James Boswell but admired his biography of Samuel Johnson. His essay on Milton sent his readers to learning Italian so they could evaluate his comparison of the Protestant Milton to the Catholic Dante. His five biographical essays for the eighth edition of the Encyclopaedia Britannica (1854–59) define the form. Although an advocate of progress, he believed poetry and religion were best written and revealed in primitive times. He sought a literary tradition in opposition to the court or aristocratic literary history; his own time, manners, and truths seemed a triumph to him and to his audience.

Macaulay’s essay style, on the surface, resembles his 18th-century predecessors. His sentences balance clause against clause, and phrase against phrase. He is fond of alliteration and witty lists: the austere Puritans thought it a “sin to hang garlands on a Maypole, to drink a friend’s health, to fly a hawk, to hunt a stag, to play at chess, to wear lovelocks, to put starch into a ruff, to touch the virginals, to read the Fairy Queen.” He is aphoristic, epigrammatic, and effortless. His play of wit is that of a serious person who causes laughter by his sure sense of conclusion. He mastered the art of the outrageous paradox, marveling that the boorish Boswell wrote the life of the hero Dr. Johnson. Macaulay’s imagination could not see that Boswell created a fiction to dramatize his portrait of Johnson.

To his contemporaries Macaulay seemed arrogant, his firmness immature. He had a boy’s joy and delight in exposing fallacies and follies, coupled with adult indignation. Nonetheless, like all good essayists, he is a good companion. William Makepeace Thackeray noted that Macaulay had, and revealed, a “brilliant intellect” with an “amazing variety and extent of learning” that produced essays “which all may so easily read.” That ease is both the bane and the charm of Macaulay as essayist.

RICHARD C. TOBIAS

Biography

Born 25 October 1800 at Rothley Temple, Leicestershire. Studied at Aspenden Hall, Hertfordshire, 1814–18; Trinity College, Cambridge, 1818–22, B.A., 1822; Lincoln’s Inn, London, admitted to the bar, 1826. Contributor, Knight’s Quarterly, 1823, and the Edinburgh Review, 1825–44. Fellow of Trinity College, 1824–31. Commissioner of bankruptcy, 1828–30; Whig Member of Parliament for Calne, Wiltshire, 1830–32, Leeds, 1832–34, and Edinburgh, 1839–47 and 1852–56; commissioner, Board of Control, 1832–34; legal adviser to the Supreme Council of the East India Company, Calcutta, 1834–38; secretary of war in Melbourne’s cabinet, 1839–41; paymaster-general in Russell’s cabinet, 1846–47. Rector, University of Glasgow, 1849. Made Baron Macaulay of Rothley, 1857. Awards: Prussian Order of Merit, 1853; honorary degree from Oxford University. Died in London, 28 December 1859.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Critical and Miscellaneous Essays, 5 vols., 1841–44; revised editions, 4 vols., 1857, 7 vols., 1859–61

Critical and Historical Essays Contributed to the Edinburgh Review, 3 vols., 1843; selections edited by Hugh Trevor-Roper, 1965

Speeches, 2 vols., 1853

Selections from Essays and Speeches, 2 vols., 1856

Biographical and Historical Sketches, 1857

The Miscellaneous Writings, 2 vols., 1860

Biographies by Lord Macaulay Contributed to the Encyclopaedia Britannica, 1863

Selected Writings, edited by John Clive and Thomas Pinney, 1972

The Letters, edited by Thomas Pinney, 6 vols., 1974–81; part as Selected Letters, edited by Pinney, 1982

Other writings: poetry (Lays of Ancient Rome, 1842) and The History of England from the Accession of James II (5 vols., 1848–61).

Collected works editions: Works (Albany Edition), 12 vols., 1898, reprinted 1980; Works, edited by Thomas F. Henderson, 9 vols., 1905–07.

Bibliographies

Pinney, Thomas, in The Letters of Thomas Babington Macaulay, vol. 6, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1981:289–302

Potter, George Reuben, in Macaulay, London: Longman, 1959

Further Reading

Bryant, Arthur, Macaulay, London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, and Lanham, Maryland: Barnes and Noble, 1979 (original edition, 1932)

Clive, John, Macaulay: The Shaping of the Historian, New York: Knopf, 1973

Clive, John, and Thomas Pinney, Introduction to Selected Writings by Macaulay, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1972

Clive, John, and Thomas Pinney, "Macaulay," in Victorian Prose: A Guide to Research, edited by David De Laura, New York: Modern Language Association of America, 1973:29–30

Crosby, Christina, The Ends of History: Victorians and "the Woman Question", London and New York: Routledge, 1991

Edwards, Owen Dudley, Macaulay, London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, and New York: St. Martin's Press, 1988

Fisher, H.A.L., "The Whig Historians," in Pages from the Past, Freeport, New York. Books for Libraries, 1969:40–92 (original edition, 1939)

Fraser, G.S., "Macaulay's Style as an Essayist," Review of English Literature 1, no. 4 (1960):9–19

- Geyl, Pieter, "Macaulay in His Essays," in his Debates with Historians, Gröningen: Wolters, 1955:19–34
- Hamburger, Joseph, Macaulay and the Whig Tradition., Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1976
- Levine, George, The Boundaries of Fiction: Carlyle, Macaulay, Newman, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1968
- Madden, William A., "Macaulay's Style," in The Art of Victorian Prose, edited by Madden and George Levine, New York: Oxford University Press, 1968:127–53
- Millgate, Jane, Macaulay, London and Boston: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1973
- Svaglic, Martin J., "Classical Rhetoric and Victorian Prose," in The Art of Victorian Prose, edited by George Levine and William A.Madden, New York: Oxford University Press, 1968: 268–88
- Trevelyan, G.O., The Life and Letters of Lord Macaulay, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 2 vols., 1978 (original edition, 1876)
- Weber, Ronald, "Singer and Seer: Macaulay on the Historian as Poet," Papers on Language and Literature 3 (1967):110–19

McCarthy, Mary

American, 1912–1989

Mary McCarthy was a preeminent American literary figure for some 40 years. Well known for her biting, satiric novels and criticism, McCarthy, who moved within the circles of leading left-wing writers and intellectuals in the United States and Europe, can best be understood as an exceptional essayist. In terms of tone, style, and personal opinion, her numerous articles published in periodicals fit well within the essay form. Moreover, as one biographer, Doris Grumbach (1967), puts it, "McCarthy's fiction is very close to the spirit of the essay."

McCarthy began writing caustic book reviews for the Nation and the New Republic and ferocious theatrical criticism for the Partisan Review in the 1930s. She established a reputation for memorable glibness, writing of Tennessee Williams' A Streetcar Named Desire that "his work reeks of literary ambition as the apartment [in which the play is set] reeks of cheap perfume." McCarthy shifted to fiction at the insistence of Edmund Wilson, an influential critic who was the second of her four husbands. Her work overall offers a brilliant but somewhat unconventional and occasionally malicious look at American culture as seen through the eyes of the intellectual set with which she was identified. With cool intelligence and humor infused by a firm conviction of her own honesty and morality, she chronicles her personal involvement in and reaction to key social and political issues of her era, including sexual emancipation, communism, civic liberty, academic conformity, nuclear weapons, Vietnam, and Watergate. In a display of her depth of her knowledge, however, two of McCarthy's outstanding books lie in the field of cultural history (Venice Observed, 1956; The Stones of Florence, 1959).

Often drawn from autobiographical sources, many of the themes she developed in seven novels (published 1942–79) and various short stories were initially sketched in magazine articles. For example, McCarthy's most popular work, the bestselling novel The Group (1963), describes in scathing, sexually explicit detail the lives of eight graduates of Vassar College, where she obtained her bachelor's degree in 1933. Intended to be a partial parody, it portrays the women, thought to be thinly disguised versions of herself and her classmates, as they embrace or oppose ideas of political and social progress fashionable among intellectuals in the 1930s and 1940s. To a degree it draws on material presented in "The Vassar Girl" (1951), first published in Holiday and included in her most significant essay collection, On the Contrary: Articles of Belief, 1946–1961 (1961). In "The Vassar Girl," McCarthy makes witty reference to scenes from her own anguished, orphaned childhood in Seattle and Minneapolis, which were later elaborated upon in her painful autobiography, Memories of a Catholic Girlhood (1957), itself mainly a collection of articles that appeared from 1946 to 1955 in the New Yorker. Some critics called it her finest book. Along with two successive volumes of autobiography—How I Grew (1987) and Intellectual Memoirs (1992)—as well as fictional heroines who seemed much like herself, Memories served to mythologize her own life.

On the Contrary offers an overview of McCarthy's wide range of interests as an essayist. Divided into three sections, "Politics and the Social Scene," "Woman," and "Literature and the Arts," it displays her ability to dissect subjects ranging from comments in the United States on the assassination of Mahatma Gandhi to the work of contemporary playwrights and novelists. In one of her most provocative essays, "America the Beautiful: The Humanist in the Bathtub," originally published in 1947 in Commentary, she writes that the American experience rests on "a pseudo-equality, that is, in standardization, in an equality of things rather than of persons. The inalienable rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness appear, in practice, to have become the inalienable right to a bathtub, a flush toilet, and a can of Spam." Nevertheless, as Carol Brightman (1992) points out, McCarthy did not simply echo the prevailing left-wing view that capitalism had turned Americans into a nation of soulless consumers. Instead, she summed up in her epigrammatic style the conservative argument that consumerism represented an unobtainable dream of social equality: "We are a nation of twenty million bathrooms, with a humanist in every tub." In another essay, "The Fact in Fiction," based on lectures given in Europe in 1960, McCarthy argues that modern novelists, including herself, have become cut off from "common sense in terms of broad experience" and that, consequently, novels are dividing into component parts, the essay based on facts on the one hand, and the fictional tale on the other, instead of integrating the imagination with details of actual life.

As a writer, McCarthy was influenced by the classical education she had received in a convent school and an Episcopalian seminary in the state of Washington as well as at Vassar. To her Catholic upbringing she attributed her love of Latin, once commenting, "Writing with a Latinate turn, compressed, analytic, and yet having a certain extravagance or oratorical flourish sounded in my ears like a natural, spoken language" (Current Biography, 1969). At her death, the critic Elizabeth Hardwick was quoted as calling McCarthy's voice both "urbane and puritanical, an original and often daunting mixture" (Time, 6 November 1989).

MAURINE H. BEASLEY

Biography

Mary Therese McCarthy. Born 21 June 1912 in Seattle, Washington. Studied at the Annie Wright Seminary, Tacoma, Washington; Vassar College, Poughkeepsie, New York, A.B., 1933 (Phi Beta Kappa). Married Harold Johnsrud, 1933 (divorced, 1936). Book reviewer, the Nation and the New Republic; editor, Covici Friede publishers, New York, 1936–37; editor, 1937–38, and drama critic, 1938–62, Partisan Review. Married the writer Edmund Wilson, 1938 (divorced, 1946): one son. Taught or lectured at Bard College, Annandale-on-Hudson, New York, 1945–46 and 1986, Sarah Lawrence College, Bronxville, New York, 1948, University College, London, 1980, and Vassar College, 1982. Contributor to many journals and newspapers, including the New York Review of Books, the Observer, and the Sunday Times. Married Bowden Broadwater, 1946 (divorced, 1961), and James Raymond West, 1961. Lived in Paris and in Castine, Maine. Subject of a defamation suit by the writer Lillian Hellman: suit dropped after Hellman's death, 1984. Awards: three grants and fellowships; Edward MacDowell Medal, 1984; National Medal of Literature, 1984; First Rochester Literary Award, 1985; honorary degrees from six universities. Member, American Academy, National Institute of Arts and Letters. Died (of cancer) in New York, 25 October 1989.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Sights and Spectacles, 1937–1956, 1956; enlarged edition, as Sights and Spectacles:

Theatre Chronicles, 1937–1958, 1959; enlarged edition, as Theatre Chronicles, 1937–1962, 1963

Memories of a Catholic Girlhood (autobiography), 1957

On the Contrary: Articles of Belief, 1946–1961, 1961

The Humanist in the Bathtub, 1964

Vietnam, 1967

Hanoi, 1968

The Writing on the Wall and Other Literary Essays, 1970

Medina, 1972

The Seventeenth Degree (includes Vietnam, Hanoi, and Medina), 1974

The Mask of State: Watergate Portraits, 1974

Ideas and the Novel, 1980

Occasional Prose, 1985

Other writings: seven novels (The Company She Keeps, 1942; The Oasis, 1949; The Groves of Academe, 1952; A Charmed Life, 1955; The Group, 1963; Birds of America, 1971; Cannibals and Missionaries, 1979), short stories, two further volumes of autobiography (How I Grew, 1987; Intellectual Memoirs, 1992), and books of travel and cultural history.

Bibliographies

- Bennett, Joy, and Gabriella Hochmann, Mary McCarthy: An Annotated Bibliography, New York: Garland, 1992
- Goldman, Sherli, Mary McCarthy: A Bibliography, New York: Harcourt Brace and World, 1968

Further Reading

- Brightman, Carol, Writing Dangerously: Mary McCarthy and Her World, New York: Clarkson Potter, 1992; London: Lime Tree, 1993
- Gelderman, Carol, Mary McCarthy: A Life, New York: St. Martin's Press, 1988; London: Sidgwick and Jackson, 1989
- Grumbach, Doris, The Company She Kept: A Revealing Portrait of Mary McCarthy, New York: Coward McCann, 1967; as The Company She Kept: A Study of Mary McCarthy, London: Bodley Head, 1967

Machiavelli, Niccoló

Italian, 1469–1527

Machiavelli's prolific and diverse output (poetry, novella, epigram, dialogue, letters, translation from Latin, biography, history, chronicle, political theory) typifies the activity of a Renaissance scholar steeped in knowledge of humanist classical culture. Unlike many humanists of his time, however, most of Machiavelli's writing has a political slant to it, with even literary works such as his famous play La mandragola (1518; The Mandrake) being susceptible to political interpretation.

Works in essay form—such as “Discorso sopra le cose di Pisa” (wr. 1499; “Discourse on Pisa”), “Del modo di trattare i popoli della Valdichiana ribellati” (wr. 1502; “On the Method of Dealing with the Rebellious Peoples of Valdichiana”), “Ritratti delle cose di Francia” (wr. 1512; “Description of French Affairs”), and Istorie fiorentine (wr. 1520, pub. 1532; The History of Florence)—though often more descriptive than evaluative, contain echoes of many of the precepts on history and politics to be found in his major political essays, Il principe (wr. 1513, pub. 1532; The Prince) and I discorsi (wr. 1517, pub. 1531; The Discourses). These precepts include his views on the need to learn from former historical eras and events, his attribution of Italy's contemporary social and political problems to the temporal power of the Papacy, and his aversion to the use of mercenary soldiers to fight on behalf of a ruler or a state. The fuller development of such notions in those major works has helped to make Machiavelli one of the key figures in the history of world social and political thought, though little weight was given to this area of his work by his contemporaries. Even when his political writings became more widely known in the second half of the 16th century, they were considered more dangerous than helpful, being placed on the Church Index of officially banned books in 1564 and attracting much odium for at least three centuries.

The 26 chapters of The Prince fall into the well-established Renaissance genre of the advice manual on how to rule, addressed to a prince by his humanist courtier. What distinguishes Machiavelli's manual from other such works, however, is the originality of the political principles it advances and its dual focus, which offers not only a general theoretical perspective but also contemporary practical advice. In order to illustrate the conclusions he has reached, Machiavelli draws upon examples from both ancient and more recent history and also taps into his own experience in government as a Florentine political administrator and diplomat beginning in 1498. In his prescriptions on statecraft, his first priority is the creation and maintenance of a strong independent state. The essential tool for the achievement of this is the practice of what he terms virtù. But far from requiring "virtue" in the conventional moral sense, Machiavelli's virtù does not demand that a ruler behave morally, but rather that he demonstrate political ability wherever this may lead in terms of actions—that he show, in Quentin Skinner's (1981) euphemistic formulation, "moral flexibility." Nor is Machiavelli afraid to enunciate the potentially dark consequences which the discovery of virtù carries with it. Its practitioner, he insists, must be cold and calculating, and not allow himself to be beset by moral scruples, feelings of guilt, or concern for abstractions such as right or justice. What must remain central is not any ethical sense but the capacity to govern successfully. As the great 19th-century writer Alessandro Manzoni explained: "Machiavelli did not want injustice...he wanted what was useful, and he wanted it either with justice or with injustice." In this, The Prince, far from advocating any new political system or technique of government, was actually reflecting many of the ideas and practices already (and still) existing in political life, but its originality was in the attempt to arrange them clearly and unashamedly into a system and to bind them together in a conceptual framework.

Not that the writer's vision manages to be without internal contradictions. What emerges, for example, from Machiavelli's analysis in Chapter 8 of the actions of Agathocles, ruler of ancient Syracuse, is a description of horrifically immoral actions, which, though they seem to correspond to the writer's prescription for virtù, are emphatically denied such status. Indeed, some critics, like John Parkin (in Niccolò Machiavelli's "The Prince": New Interdisciplinary Essays, 1995), would argue that the work is informed by subliminal dialogue and the reader must proceed by "teasing out the contradictions and oppositions which function in his text." But even if we do not go this far, The Prince cannot be said to have the rigor of modern analytic political thought. It is not, as Maureen Ramsay (in Niccolò Machiavelli's "The Prince": New Interdisciplinary Essays, 1995) points out, "systematic or intellectually coherent enough" to be called political science and, like Machiavelli's other treatise works, offers ample scope for contemplation or disagreement on the part of the reader, thereby making it a fitting precursor to an essay genre that had yet to be seriously developed.

Machiavelli's other major essay, the much longer Discourses, has been seen by some as constituting something of a contradiction in the writer's thought. While The Prince upholds the need for strong dictatorial rule, The Discourses openly expresses support for republican government with active participation by a wider group of citizens. The apparent contradiction may be reconcilable in terms of a chronology whereby once a strong state is established by strong personal leadership, a wider, though equally strong, form of government may usefully follow at a later date. Whatever the case, the preimperial Roman Republic clearly arises from The Discourses as Machiavelli's favored political model.

What both works manifestly share is the appeal, whether in an absolute ruler or in republican leaders, to virtú and an insistence that human beings—selfish and prone to evil in Machiavelli's view—must be taken and governed as they are, not as we would like them to be. While throughout his writing Machiavelli explicitly rejects the doctrines and institutions of the established Church, he is also arguing, perhaps paradoxically, for one of Catholicism's central tenets—original sin albeit from an empirical and secular perspective.

Machiavelli's style can be said to match the functionality of his message. It is characterized by a stark lexical economy and a conciseness of syntax in which concepts are compared and juxtaposed in formulations that can almost seem mathematical in their precision and their exclusion of embellishment. For all this the style, especially in The Prince, is not over-dry. It can even be vigorous and dramatic, eager and animated, and demonstrate the writer's gift for the vivid focusing image—e.g. the prince as a lion and a fox combined; fortune as a great river in flood, stoppable, however, by defensive human action informed by virtú.

Neither the attempts by modern scholars to view Machiavelli as a harbinger of democratic thought nor the popular concept of the man as the incarnation of evil reflect a balanced view of his writing. While it is true that what he wrote does not lend itself to a single monolithic interpretation, at the same time its significance cannot be stretched beyond all reasonable bounds, and we must above all take careful account of the times and their social and mental limitations. To do otherwise is not to shed light on the writer's thought but simply to misunderstand both the man and the historical context in which he operated.

HOWARD MOSS

Biography

Niccoló di Bernardo dei Machiavelli. Born 3 May 1469 in Florence. May have been involved in overthrowing the Savonarolist government, 1498; appointed head of the new government's Second Chancery, 1498, and secretary of an agency concerned with warfare and diplomacy, 1498–1511, visiting Cesare Borgia, 1502, Rome, 1503 and 1506, France, 1504 and 1510, and Germany, 1507–08; helped to set up a standing army, which reconquered Pisa, 1509. Medici family returned to power, 1512, ending the Florentine Republic; Machiavelli suspected of plotting against the Medici, and jailed and exiled to Sant'Andrea in Percussina, where he spent his remaining years and produced his major writings. Partly reconciled with the Medici in 1519 and given various duties, including writing a history of Florence. Hoped for a new government post when the Medici were deposed in 1527, but distrusted by the new republican government for previous association with the Medici. Died in Florence, 21 June 1527.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

- I discorsi sulla prima deca di Tito Livio*, 1531; edited by Corrado Vivanti, 1983, and Giorgio Inglese, 1984; as The Discourses upon on the First Decade of T.Livius, translated by Edward Dacres, 1636 (translation edited by Bernard Crick, 1971), Ninian Hill Thomson, 1883, and Allan H.Gilbert, 1946; as The Discourses, translated by Leslie J.Walker, 2 vols., 1950 (translation revised by Brian Richardson, edited by Bernard Crick, 1970)
- Istorie florentine*, 1532; as The Florentine Historie, translated by Thomas Bedingfield, 1595, M.K., 1674, and W.K.Mariott, 1909; as The History of Florence, translated by Henry Nevile, 1675, and Ninian Hill Thomson, 2 vols., 1906; as The Florentine Histories, translated by C.Edwards Lester, 1845; as Reform in Florence, translated by Allan Gilbert, 1946; as Florentine Histories, translated by Laura F.Banfield and Harvey C. Mansfield, Jr., 1988
- Il principe*, 1532; edited by Luigi Firpo, 1961, Brian Richardson, 1979, and Piero Melograni, 1991; as The Prince, translated by Edward Dacres, 1640; many subsequent translations, including by Allan H.Gilbert, 1946, Peter Rodd, 1954, George Bull, 1961, Daniel Donno, 1966, Robert A.Adams, 1977 (revised 1992), Harvey Claflin Mansfield, 1985, Russell Price, 1988, and David Wootton, 1995
- The Historical, Political and Diplomatic Writings* (includes The History of Florence; The Prince; Discourse on Livy; Thoughts of a Statesman; Missions; miscellaneous papers), translated by Christian E.Detmold, 4 vols., 1882
- The Living Thoughts of Machiavelli* (includes Discourses on Livy; The Prince; Private Letters), edited by Count Carlo Sforza, translated by Sforza and Arthur Livingston, 1940
- The Portable Machiavelli*, edited and translated by Peter E. Bondanella and Mark Musa, 1979
- The Prince and Other Political Writings*, edited and translated by Bruce Penman, 1981
- Selected Political Writings*, edited and translated by David Wootton, 1994
- Other writings: the story Novella di Belfagor arcidiavolo (1545; The Marriage of Belphegor), three plays, a biography of Castruccio Castracani, and correspondence. Collected works editions: Opere, edited by Sergio Bertelli and others, 4 vols., 1968–89; The Chief Works and Others, translated by Allan H.Gilbert, 3 vols., 1965, reprinted 1989.

Bibliographies

- Bertelli, Sergio, and Piero Innocenti, Bibliografia machiavelliana, Verona: Valdonega, 1979
- Fiore, Silvia Ruffo, Niccoló Machiavelli: An Annotated Bibliography of Modern Criticism and Scholarship, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1990

Further Reading

- Anglo, Sydney, Machiavelli: A Dissection, London: Gollancz, 1969; New York: Harcourt Brace and World, 1970
- Borsellino, Nino, Niccoló Machiavelli, Rome: Laterza, 1973
- Chabod, Federico, Machiavelli and the Renaissance, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1958
- Colish, Marcia L., "The Idea of Liberty in Machiavelli," Journal of the History of Ideas 32 (1971):323–50
- Coyle, Martin, editor, Niccoló Machiavelli's "The Prince": New Interdisciplinary Essays, Manchester: Manchester University Press, and New York: St. Martin's Press, 1995
- Fleischer, Martin, Machiavelli and the Nature of Political Thought, New York: Atheneum, 1972; London: Croom Helm, 1973
- Gilbert, Felix, "The Humanist Conception of the Prince and The Prince of Machiavelli," Journal of Modern History 11 (1939): 449–83
- Grazia, Sebastian de, Machiavelli in Hell, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, and London: Harvester Wheatsheaf, 1989
- Hale, J.R., Machiavelli and Renaissance Italy, New York: Macmillan, 1960; London: English Universities Press, 1966
- Harriman, Robert, "Composing Modernity in Machiavelli's Prince," Journal of the History of Ideas 50 (1989):3–29
- Montano, Rocco, Machiavelli: Valore e limiti, Florence: Sansoni, 1974
- Parel, Anthony, editor, The Political Calculus: Essays on Machiavelli's Philosophy, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1972
- Pocock, J.G.A., The Machiavellian Moment: Florentine Political Thought and the Atlantic Republican Tradition, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1975
- Price, Russell, "The Senses of 'Virtú' in Machiavelli," European Studies Review 3 (1973):315–45
- Sasso, Gennaro, Niccoló Machiavelli: Storia del suo pensiero politico, Bologna: Il Mulino, 1980
- Skinner, Quentin, Machiavelli, Oxford: Oxford University Press, and New York: Hill and Wang, 1981
- Viroli, Maurizio, "Machiavelli and the Republican Idea of Politics," in Machiavelli and Republicanism, edited by Gisela Bock, Quentin Skinner, and Maurizio Viroli, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1990:143–71
- Whitfield, J.H., Machiavelli, Oxford: Blackwell, 1947; New York: Russell and Russell, 1965
- Wood, Neal, "Machiavelli's Concept of 'Virtú' Reconsidered," Political Studies 15 (1967):159–72

MacLennan, Hugh

Canadian, 1907–1990

Hugh MacLennan discovered his talent as an essayist relatively late in his writing career, and initially his motives for developing this talent were more financial than artistic. When the success of the novel Two Solitudes (1945) encouraged him to give up teaching and live by writing alone, it also made him a recognized authority on Canadian culture and where Canada stood in relation to Europe and the United States. Magazine editors were interested in having him express more directly the ideas behind his novels, and, needing money to supplement his income from fiction, MacLennan obliged. It was only gradually, however, that he came to see himself as an essayist, and even after he had won two Governor-General's Awards for nonfiction and developed a deep attachment to the essay form, he continued to think of himself as a novelist first.

MacLennan's idea of essay writing as a pleasant but relatively insignificant sideline, however reasonable in view of contemporary tastes, went against his natural abilities. Writing novels was always a struggle involving extensive drafting, rewriting, and editing; in contrast, writing essays came naturally to him so that, after a little practice, he was able to complete a good essay in only a couple of days. Also, the instructional bent which sometimes made MacLennan's novels seem too plainly dedicated to illustrating ideas for modern tastes proved an asset in his essays, where he excelled at explaining complex subjects lucidly and memorably. While his novels are of central importance in the development of modern Canadian literature, none is without significant flaws; more than a few of his essays, on the other hand, are excellent by any standard.

Although the three essay collections that MacLennan played a part in editing contain less than a quarter of the 400 or so essays he wrote, they serve well to represent both his development as a familiar essayist and his growing affection for the form. Cross Country (1949) shows MacLennan experimenting with a variety of approaches. Several of the ten essays are analytical, fairly formal interpretations of Canadian and American society. MacLennan referred to them as "think pieces" in his introduction to the 1972 reissue of the book and attributed "their solemn, outdated style" to editorial expectations early in the Cold War. Although he exaggerates their stylistic faults, pieces like "The Canadian Character" and "On Discovering Who We Are" are long and, having originally been written as interpretive journalism rather than essays as such, designed to appeal mainly to the intellect. On the other hand, they are also timely, original, perceptive, and on the whole very readable. MacLennan's vocabulary, while extensive, is never obscure or any less accessible than his subjects require; his allusions and references are typically made understandable in context to the average educated reader. A few of the essays in Cross Country point to MacLennan's handling of the familiar essay later on. "An Orange from Portugal" and "Portrait of a City," which draw on memories of his youth in Halifax, are more subjective, emotional, and evocative than the analytical pieces, and "The Tyranny of the Sunday Suit" foreshadows the perceptive humor and more relaxed style of his later essays.

MacLennan's second collection, Thirty and Three (1954), shows him becoming much more comfortable with the familiar essay. His introduction explains that, in middle age, he has come to see the short essay as a form particularly suited to his temperament and has begun to value essays as a way of dealing with "all manner of things that fascinate and delight" which he could not fit into his novels. His subjects—favorite places, sports, small-town manners, public figures, essential qualities of humor—reflect the wide range of his enthusiasms and, taken together, the essays also afford as much insight into postwar Canadian experience as any of his novels. Most of the essays in Thirty and Three were published originally as regular monthly contributions to the Montrealer magazine, and they benefit from MacLennan's surer sense of audience. Writing for a local audience also required less background and interpretation and allowed him to get to the ideas he really wanted to express more directly than had been the case earlier. The tone is typically conversational, and writing in the first person has become MacLennan's usual practice. The narrative and descriptive skills he had developed through writing fiction are used to good advantage throughout the collection. Even when dealing with topics of public concern, like Prime Minister MacKenzie King—"neurotic son of a neurotic mother, full of quirks and strangeness, cautious as a turtle yet quick with intuition as any second-sighted Celt...saved only from caricature by the fact that he happened to be a political genius" ("The Ghost That Haunts Us")—his views are more subjective and his style more lively than in Cross Country.

Most of the essays in Scotchman's Return (1960) were written during the mid- to late 1950s, a difficult but productive period in MacLennan's life during which his first wife's long illness finally ended in death. How deeply the loss affected him can be seen in his novel The Watch That Ends the Night (1959), but the emotional toll is much less apparent in his essays. Many are about education and literature, suggesting how important a part of his life his work with students at McGill University had become. By this time, writing essays had progressed from being primarily a way of making money to becoming a labor of love. His introduction refers to the essay as "the friendliest form of writing" and explains that "a desire for friendship" has made him "an addict of the form." Scotchman's Return includes some essays on lighter subjects—"let nobody pity them [the Scots] or wonder why they eat as they do. They prefer this diet because it gives them the pleasure of being miserable" ("By Their Foods...")—and MacLennan's quiet sense of humor is at work throughout, but the collection, on the whole, is more serious in tone than the one that preceded it. Significantly, the necessity of accepting things as they are is a recurring idea. We cannot "escape ourselves forever," he remarks in the opening essay ("Scotchman's Return"); "I am a prisoner of my own life," he concludes in the last ("Fifty Grand"). This mood of resignation contrasts with the characteristic impatience in MacLennan's earlier essays, but pervasive though it is, it is essentially positive—a mature acceptance of his own limitations and the inevitable faults of any human society rather than a sense of defeat. The best of these essays, the title piece and a series on Oxford University, are reflective, evocative, and nostalgic.

In addition to these three collections, MacLennan produced several nonfiction books with sections resembling essays. Of these, Seven Rivers of Canada (1961), which, much revised, formed the basis of The Rivers of Canada (1974), is by far the best. What began as travel writing—a magazine assignment to explore and write about major Canadian rivers—became much more to MacLennan. The geographical explorations provide starting points for reflections on the history and culture of the regions through which the rivers flow, as well as on their significance to the nation as a whole. In addition to being informative in a factual sense, the essays in Rivers are also deeply personal and bring together MacLennan's mature ideas about Canada. Particularly successful in its integration of narrative and descriptive illustration and abstract thinking, Rivers is arguably MacLennan's best nonfiction book.

MacLennan was dedicated to living fully, to seeing, experiencing, and understanding as much as he could, and, in his writing, to passing on what he had learned. An athlete, a perceptive critic of literature and other arts, a classical historian, and an astute observer of cultural, political, and economic changes in his times, he was able to write about an impressive variety of subjects with authority and original insight. Though he showed more compassion for the masses than confidence in their collective judgment, he wrote with a keen sense of social responsibility and reached out to inform as wide an audience as he could. His recurring concern with identity—individual, regional, and national—grew out of his conviction that a writer had to come to terms with his cultural roots, but his personal exploration of the subject had wider implications in that it played a central role in shaping national self-perception. MacLennan's essays will continue to be read, partly because many are excellent examples of the genre and partly also for the valuable insight they provide into Canadian consciousness as it evolved in the middle years of this century.

WILLIAM CONNOR

Biography

John Hugh MacLennan. Born in Glace Bay, Nova Scotia, 20 March 1907. Studied at Dalhousie University, Halifax, B.A., 1928; Rhodes scholar at Oriel College, Oxford, B.A., M.A., 1932; Princeton University, New Jersey, Ph.D., 1935. Taught Latin and history at Lower Canada College, Montreal, 1935–45. Married Dorothy Duncan, 1936 (died, 1957). Journalist and broadcaster, from 1945. Associate professor, 1951–67, professor of English, 1967–79, then professor emeritus, McGill University, Montreal. Elected to the Royal Society of Canada, 1953. Married Frances Walker, 1959. Awards: many, including the Governor-General's Award, for fiction, 1945, 1948, 1959, and for nonfiction, 1949, 1954; Royal Society of Canada Gold Medal, 1951; Lorne Pierce Medal, 1952; Molson Prize, 1966; Royal Bank of Canada Award, 1967, 1984; honorary degrees from 17 Canadian universities. Companion, Order of Canada, 1967. Died in Montreal, 7 November 1990.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose
Cross Country, 1949

Thirty and Three, 1954

Scotchman's Return and Other Essays, 1960; as Scotsman's Return and Other Essays, 1961

Seven Rivers of Canada, 1961; revised edition, as The Rivers of Canada, 1974

The Other Side of Hugh MacLennan: Selected Essays Old and New, edited by Elspeth Cameron, 1978

Other writings: seven novels (Barometer Rising, 1941; Two Solitudes, 1945; The Precipice, 1948; Each Man's Son, 1951; The Watch That Ends the Night, 1959; Return of the Sphinx, 1967; Voices in Time, 1980).

Bibliography

Cameron, Elspeth, in The Annotated Bibliography of Canada's Major Authors, vol. 1, edited by Robert Lecker and Jack David, Downsview, Ontario: ECW Press, 1981

Further Reading

Buitenhuis, Peter, Hugh MacLennan, Toronto: Forum House, 1969

Cameron, Elspeth, Editor's Introduction to The Other Side of Hugh MacLennan: Selected Essays Old and New, Toronto: Macmillan, 1978

Cameron, Elspeth, Hugh MacLennan: A Writer's Life, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1981

Keith, W.J., "Novelist or Essayist? Hugh MacLennan and The Watch That Ends the Night," in Hugh MacLennan: 1982, edited by Elspeth Cameron, Toronto: University College Canadian Studies Programme, 1981

Lucas, Alec, Hugh MacLennan, Toronto: MacClelland and Stewart, 1970

MacLulich, T.D., Hugh MacLennan, Boston: Twayne, 1983

Morley, Patricia A., The Immoral Moralists: Hugh MacLennan and Leonard Cohen, Toronto: Clarke Irwin, 1972

Ryerson, Stanley B., "Hugh MacLennan's View of Social Class and Nationhood," in Hugh MacLennan: 1982, edited by Elspeth Cameron, Toronto: University College Canadian Studies Programme, 1982

Woodcock, George, Hugh MacLennan, Toronto: Copp Clark, 1969

MacMechan, Archibald

Canadian, 1861–1933

In his own day, Archibald MacMechan's place in Canadian letters rested largely on his various forms of essay writing; combined with his works of criticism, his essays constitute his main legacy to Canadian literary history. Lorne Pierce (Unexplored Fields of Canadian Literature, 1932), for instance, cites MacMechan as notable among Canadian essayists: "W. H. Blake, Sir Andrew Macphail and MacMechan...come nearest to the real essays...the easy inconsequence, grace, charm, sophistication and personal intimacy of the letter are all found in the essay, which may be defined as an epistle to the world of kindred spirits at large... The successful essay is a touchstone of urbanity, and only comes after long standing in the oak. Good talk sparkles and has a rich bouquet; the essay is that." Charles G.D.Roberts wrote in a letter (6 April 1929) to MacMechan: "I consider you our best essayist,—perhaps the best Canadian master of English prose."

MacMechan's essays are collected in three volumes: The Porter of Bagdad and Other Fantasies (1901), The Life of a Little College (1914), and The Book of Ultima Thule (1927). His essays have more in common with those of Montaigne or Lamb than with Bacon or Arnold: he wrote of Arnold's essays that "their length, their bellicosity, and their didacticism are against them. They are separate campaigns, battles, skirmishes, single combats, episodes in his life-long warfare against Philistines" (Montreal Standard, 28 June 1908). His own are characterized by a sense of leisure, nostalgia, and attention to homely details; often he adopts a gentle, humble persona: "the dreamer," "the summer boarder," "Grizzlebeard" are examples. The essay form was congenial in enabling him to combine scholarly accuracy with a personal, often dreamy style, the overall effect of which is an easy familiarity. The Porter of Bagdad essays are imitative of the later 19th-century English neo-Romanticism and Pre-Raphaelite style in their idealization of subject matter and their archaic diction. In this collection his characteristically undefined, nonspecific references to a favorite bit of landscape are the germ of what later becomes his very specific and articulate celebration of the province of Nova Scotia, his "Ultima Thule."

MacMechan's next collection, The Life of a Little College, and Other Papers, is concerned mainly with matters pertinent to academia—for example, "Tennyson as Artist," "Virgil," and MacMechan's best-known scholarly and critical essay, "The Best Sea-Story Ever Written," on Moby-Dick, originally published in 1899 and antedating general critical recognition by over two decades. This essay is notable for its attempt to identify the novel's "Americanization" (a lifelong preoccupation with MacMechan) and as a catalyst for his own Headwaters of Canadian Literature (1924). Here too is the germ of his affinity with matters pertaining to seafaring. (He privately noted that his collection of Maritime tales, There Go the Ships [1928], would be the work for which he would be longest remembered.)

The Book of Ultima Thule brings together essays written and published over the previous 27 years. As the title suggests, the collection is thematically centered: Nova Scotia is the basis for the literary landscape "Ultima Thule." Each essay explores a facet of an often idealized provincial scene. Possibly MacMechan is indebted to Joseph Howe for the idea of a remote, ideal place: Howe referred to Nova Scotia as "Little Paradise." "Dolcefar," MacMechan's coined name for Halifax in this collection, implies both sweetness and distance. The essays fall into two main categories: one focuses on Halifax and its landmarks, combining descriptive writing and historical fact; the other, characteristic of The Porter of Bagdad, has a fanciful quality and a speaker who is ostensibly a passive spectator writing reflectively of his surroundings. For the general reader, The Book of Ultima Thule provides an introduction to Nova Scotia's culture as perceived by a sensitive, articulate writer during the first quarter of the 20th century. Throughout there is a freshness of perception; possessing an outsider's eye (he reiterates the fact that he is a native of Ontario), MacMechan was keenly responsive to a way of life he saw vanishing in the province and was perhaps more apt to evaluate his surroundings than were its natives. His classical training, urbanity, and felicity of expression lift these essays out of mere regionalism.

JANET BAKER

Biography

Archibald McKellar MacMechan. Born 21 June 1862 in Berlin (now Kitchener), Ontario. Studied at Hamilton College Institute; University of Toronto, B.A., 1884; Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, Ph.D., 1889. Married Edith May Cowan, 1889: three daughters. George Munro Professor of English Language and Literature, Dalhousie University, Halifax, 1889–1933. Book critic, Montreal Standard, 1907–33; coeditor, University Magazine, 1907–19. Elected to the Royal Society of Canada, 1926. Awards: Lorne Pierce Medal, 1931; honorary degree from the University of Toronto. Died in Halifax, 7 August 1933.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

The Porter of Bagdad and Other Fantasies, 1901

The Life of a Little College, and Other Papers, 1914

The Book of Ultima Thule, 1927

Other writings: the Canadian literary history Headwaters of Canadian Literature (1924), four books of provincial history (Sagas of the Sea, 1923; Old Province Tales, 1924; There Go the Ships, 1928; Red Snow on Grand Pré, 1931), and a posthumous book of poetry. Also edited editions of works by Thomas Carlyle, Tennyson, and others.

Further Reading

Conron, Brandon, "Essays 1880–1920," in Literary History of Canada: Canadian Literature in English, vol. 1, edited by Carl F. Klinck and others, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2nd edition, 1976 (original edition, 1965):354–60

McBrine, R.W., "Archibald MacMechan, Canadian Essayist," Dalhousie Review 50 (1950):23–33

Shortt, S.E.D., "Archibald MacMechan: Romantic Idealist," in his The Search for an Ideal: Six Canadian Intellectuals and Their Convictions in an Age of Transition, 1890–1930, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1976

Macphail, Andrew

Canadian, 1864–1938

A consummate stylist, Andrew Macphail first demonstrated unusual writing talent in 1891 when, as a graduating medical student at McGill University, he won an essay contest on vivisection sponsored by the American Humane Education Society, open to the English-speaking world, and juried by Harvard University medical professors. After further medical study in London, Macphail settled into the practice and teaching of medicine in Montreal. It was only after the death of his wife in 1902 that the balance of his commitments began to shift toward writing. In the next year he became editor of the Montreal Medical Journal, and in 1911 he became founding editor of the Canadian Medical Association Journal. The subject of his inaugural editorial in the national periodical was style in medical writing.

It was as an essayist that Macphail emerged as a Canadian literary figure. In 1905 he published Essays in Puritanism, a collection of studies on such figures as John Wesley and Margaret Fuller, whom he interpreted as representing or reacting against the faith. This book established Macphail's position as a serious writer; however, it also lacked unity, consisting of individual sketches originally delivered to a group of writers and painters in Montreal, the Pen and Pencil Club.

Four years later Essays in Politics was published. Focusing on Canada's role within the British Empire, Macphail emphasized the common ground of Canada and Great Britain, the growing maturity of Canada, and the need for it to assume more responsibility in such matters as imperial defense. "We cannot share in the glory of the Empire unless we share in its danger and, to put it bluntly, in the expense of it." He was unequivocally on the side of imperial federation, and against autonomy, in the public debate over Canada's future. With increasing trenchancy, he also criticized the advance of industry at the expense of agriculture, a trend he identified with materialism. The book was favorably noticed in Britain, and the Canadian Prime Minister, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, wrote to Macphail that he had read it "through & through."

In 1910 Macphail published Essays in Fallacy, consisting of critiques of modern trends in education, theology, and gender relations. His perspective was strongly traditionalist, and reflected his deep distrust of industrial civilization. He excoriated the phenomenon of "the American woman," by which he meant a social type not confined to the United States and not including most female Americans. This was woman removed from her "natural" role within the family, and the root cause of the removal was industrialization, which had taken outside the family the domestic tasks in which woman's nature would find fulfillment. In education, he condemned utilitarian values and emphasis on job training, which he attributed to the influence of industry and the acquiescence of educators. By also focusing on the alleged atrophy of craftsmanship and artistry which resulted from the confusion of education with training, and upon the potential in the modern process for dehumanization, his essay revealed the positive vision which lay behind his social criticism. His conservative social views increasingly occupied an equal position with his imperialism as a basis for his reputation and influence.

World War I had a major impact on Macphail, and initially he hoped that the war would cleanse and simplify modern civilization. Although almost blind in one eye, and about to turn 50, he insisted on enlisting for service at the front; he would eventually write the official history of the Canadian medical services during the conflict. His final collection of essays, Three Persons (1929), consisted of critical studies of Sir Henry Hughes Wilson, Edward Mandell House, and T.E. Lawrence, all three having emerged into public prominence during the course of the war. The book's distinctiveness lay in Macphail's method: in each case his only sources were the published reminiscences of the subject. There were enormous variations in tone as the three memoirists received radically different treatment.

Within Canadian letters, and for the genre of the essay in Canada, Macphail was important, as well, for his work as editor of the University Magazine, a quarterly he published out of his Montreal home, starting in 1907, the year he was appointed first professor of the history of medicine at McGill. His magazine addressed the educated reader, but it clearly reached beyond the small corps of academic professionals in Canada, for circulation approached 6000 at its peak; in Canada this was an unprecedented number for a quality quarterly and has not been matched since. The magazine provided such essayists as Maurice Hutton, Archibald MacMechan, Stephen Leacock, and Macphail himself with a forum. Macphail published 43 pieces in it, and all but one of his ten essays in Essays in Politics had originally appeared there. As an editor, he insisted on paying for submissions (usually 25 dollars), a policy MacMechan later described as "revolutionary." Macphail's absence during the war caused a decline in quality and circulation, which he was unable to reverse in 1919–20, and he discontinued the magazine.

Macphail was an exceptionally versatile author, who wrote in an authoritative tone on almost everything from aesthetics to science. The range of his writing made him the leading Canadian example of the "man of letters," who is distinguished from other members of the intelligentsia by his breadth and lack of an exclusive specialization. He attacked overspecialization even in medicine, which he identified particularly with American influences. In 1927 he published an essay titled "American Methods in Medical Education"; never fearing controversy, he had delivered it first to an American medical body. Although he experimented with many other genres, he never forsook the essay and, in his lifetime, it was as an essayist that he was best known. In 1932 he remarked to Lord Beaverbrook that "the essay form...is my trade." His epigrammatic style, idiosyncratic perspectives, and ironic wit were especially well adapted to it. The function of his essays, in his view, was to make for "more correct...thought."

IAN ROSS ROBERTSON

Biography

John Andrew McPhail; spelled his surname Macphail, from c. 1893. Born 24 November 1864 in Orwell, Prince Edward Island. Studied locally and at Prince of Wales College, Charlottetown, P.E.I.; taught for three years, then studied at McGill University, Montreal, B.A., 1888, M.D., 1891. Married Georgina Nightingale Burland, 1893 (died, 1902). Professor of medicine, University of Bishop's College, Montreal, 1893–1905; also practiced medicine for ten years; professor of the history of medicine, McGill University, 1907–37. Editor, Montreal Medical Journal, from 1903: merged it with another medical periodical and founded the Canadian Medical Association Journal, 1911; founding editor, the University Magazine, 1907–20. Served in the Canadian Army Medical Corps, 1915–19: made a Major. Knighted, 1918. Spent summers at family home in Orwell, where he conducted agricultural experiments. Died (after heart attacks) in Montreal, 23 September 1938.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Essays in Puritanism, 1905

Essays in Politics, 1909

Essays in Fallacy, 1910

Three Persons, 1929

Other writings: a novel, poetry, the official history of the Canadian medical services in World War I, a work on the Bible in Scotland, and The Master's Wife (1939), a semi-autobiographical memoir of Prince Edward Island in his youth. Also translated Maria Chapdelaine: A Romance of French Canada by Louis Hémon (1921).

Bibliography

Robertson, Ian Ross, Sir Andrew Macphail as a Social Critic (dissertation), Toronto: University of Toronto, 1974:368–83

Further Reading

Edgar, O.P., "Sir Andrew Macphail," Queen's Quarterly 54 (Spring 1947):8–22

Leacock, Stephen, "Andrew Macphail," Queen's Quarterly 45 (Winter 1938):445–52

Robertson, Ian Ross, Sir Andrew Macphail as a Social Critic (dissertation), Toronto: University of Toronto, 1974

Robertson, Ian Ross, "Andrew Macphail: A Holistic Approach," Canadian Literature 107 (Winter 1985):179–86

Shortt, S.E.D., "Essayist, Editor, and Physician: The Career of Sir Andrew Macphail," Canadian Literature 96 (Spring 1983):49–58

McPhee, John

American, 1931–

John McPhee is one of America's finest practitioners of literary nonfiction and, more specifically, of literary journalism. He became a staff writer for the New Yorker in the mid-1960s, shortly after it accepted his profile of Princeton basketball sensation Bill Bradley, and has been associated with the magazine ever since. Almost all of his published work—almost two dozen books, including four collections of shorter essays—has first appeared there. This association tells us much about McPhee's appeal: the New Yorker readership has traditionally come to the magazine not for the latest news or timely political opinion but for tasteful fiction and leisurely paced, highly literate feature articles. In McPhee they find the expositor par excellence, a deft handler of facts able to satisfy the educated nonspecialist's thirst for information on a wide range of topics: nature, education, geology, technology, nuclear physics, sports, art. His prose, however, is not simply a vehicle that efficiently delivers facts. As much as his expository precision, it is his strong sense of narrative and his eye for descriptive detail that make his essays engaging and his intense curiosity about his topics infectious.

Early profiles such as A Sense of Where You Are (1965), The Headmaster (1966), "A Roomful of Hovings" (1967), "A Forager" (1968), and "Twynam of Wimbledon" (1968) exemplify McPhee's attitudes and interests. The subjects of these essays—with the exception of the first, about Bradley—are not widely recognized, nor are they in any conventional sense heroes. But they are sympathetic figures, men whom McPhee openly admires, not only because they do work he considers worthwhile but because they are enthusiastically committed to what they do. Frank Boyden, the tireless headmaster of Deerfield Academy in Massachusetts, seems one part educator and three parts salesman, propagandist, and petty tyrant, yet even his shortcomings are treated with such fondness that McPhee's admiration for the man and his work evokes our own. By its end, we recognize in the essay a kind of modest, humanly balanced illustration of the great man theory. Rather than the great, though, McPhee's tastes more commonly tend toward the good; as his brief portrait of Robert Twynam shows, he can admire a groomer of grass as much as he does a groomer of young men. With an understated humor that lightens its tone but never disparages its subject, "Twynam of Wimbledon" makes the groundskeeper of the world's premier tennis tournament seem the consummate professional, scarcely noticed but nonetheless steadfast in his efforts to preserve Centre Court from invading bastard grasses, uncooperative weather, and, worst of all, toe-dragging tennis stars.

This sympathetic interest in people and their pursuits also shapes many of McPhee's longer essays, in which the central figures serve as topical experts and, at times, as moral touchstones. In The Curve of Binding Energy (1974), the ostensible topic is nuclear weapons, but the force of the book derives from McPhee's portrait of Theodore Taylor, the physicist who flunked out of graduate school only to become, almost accidentally, the designer of some of the world's most potent bombs. A tissue of persuasive argument, characteristically implicit, emerges through the subtle connections between narration and exposition, as the author weaves lucid explanations of nuclear physics together with amusing, sometimes disturbing vignettes of Taylor's past to suggest that pure science is as unpredictable as life, its results often uncontrollable. Perhaps more than any of McPhee's books, The Curve of Binding Energy seems intended to move as well as inform readers. It makes complex processes such as nuclear fusion, nuclear fission, and weapon design more accessible to the layperson, but also more alarming, by exposing the glib confidence with which scientists and government officials talk about controlling the awesome power of the atom.

Whether or not it is used suavisly, exposition of the sort found in The Curve of Binding Energy is one of the most striking features in McPhee's prose. In essay after essay, he brings vividly before our eyes a wide range of technological processes and gizmos: the coloring of oranges in a packing house; the patient construction of a bark canoe; the "intricate rhomboids" of an experimental airship; the "rock jetties, articulated concrete mattress revetments, and other heavy defenses" used to shackle a growing river. Nature, too, is imaged sharply by McPhee's expository craft. In his four books on geology, Basin and Range (1981), In Suspect Terrain (1983), Rising from the Plains (1986), and Assembling California (1993), great geological formations and transformations are made clear to the mind's eye, often by metaphors that capture their most prominent features; they are "a rippled potato chip," a "snowball splatted against glass," "pieces cut from a wheel of cheese," or "Hershey's Kisses on a tray."

Many of McPhee's essays investigate environmental issues. In Coming into the Country (1977), the main focus is on Alaska's battles between developers and wilderness preservationists; in The Control of Nature (1989), on human attempts to contain water, lava, and mudslides; and in Encounters with the Archdruid (1971), on the radical environmentalist David Brower, President of the Sierra Club in the 1960s and 1970s. In each of these, the author's moderate stance on volatile issues is, again, suggested rather than argued. In the last, McPhee also makes greater use of himself as an actor in the drama he describes. Hiking and rafting through Colorado with a geologist, a government bureaucrat, and archdruid Brower, he serves as the facilitator for lively debate about wilderness and preservation. McPhee rarely talks about himself in Encounters, but we are always aware of his presence—as are his subjects, who often seem animated by his insatiable interest in their work.

In this use of himself as actor in his own nonfiction dramas, McPhee reveals his kinship with New Journalism. His quiet public profile and endearing ethos are very different from those of Tom Wolfe, Norman Mailer, or George Plimpton, but McPhee's reportage does draw on similar techniques. His choice of topics, for example, suggests a New Journalistic reluctance to grab the headlines, to go instead for the untold or behind-the-scenes story. Moreover, like other New Journalists, who scorn the idea of conducting a quick interview and then retreating to a desk, McPhee spends a long time with his subjects, hiking or boating with them, sometimes living with them before he essays to write their story. And for all his precision with facts and concern for accuracy, McPhee makes no pretense of keeping his journalistic distance; clearly, he selects topics for which he feels great affinity, and he openly demonstrates his affection for the people he profiles. It is this stance, at once leaning toward his subjects yet unbiased about the facts, that raises McPhee's journalism above the level of craft. Craft makes his reportage lucid; his sympathetic, trustworthy ethos turns reportage into nonfictive art.

BRIAN TURNER

Biography

John Angus McPhee. Born 8 March 1931 in Princeton, New Jersey. Studied at Princeton University, A.B., 1953; Magdalene College, Cambridge, 1953–54. Writer for Robert Montgomery Presents television show, 1955–56. Married Pryde Brown, 1957 (later divorced): four daughters. Associate editor, Time magazine, 1957–64; staff writer, the New Yorker, from 1964. Married Yoland Whitman, 1972: two stepsons and two stepdaughters. Ferris Professor of Journalism, Princeton University, from 1975. Awards: many, including the American Academy and Institute of Arts and Letters Award in Literature, 1977; Woodrow Wilson Award, 1982; John Wesley Powell Award, 1988; John Burroughs Medal, 1990; Walton Sullivan Award, 1993; honorary degrees from seven universities and colleges. Member, American Academy of Arts and Letters.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

A Sense of Where You Are: A Profile of William Warren Bradley, 1965

The Headmaster: Frank L. Boyden, of Deerfield, 1966

Oranges, 1967

A Roomful of Hovings and Other Profiles, 1968

The Pine Barrens, 1968

Levels of the Game, 1969

The Crofter and the Laird, 1970

Encounters with the Archdruid, 1971

Wimbledon: A Celebration, 1972

The Deltoid Pumpkin Seed, 1973

The Curve of Binding Energy, 1974

Pieces of the Frame, 1975

The Survival of the Bark Canoe, 1975

The John McPhee Reader, edited by William Howarth, 1976

Coming into the Country, 1977

Giving Good Weight, 1979

Basin and Range, 1981

In Suspect Terrain, 1983

Heirs of General Practice, 1984

La Place de la Concorde Suisse (in English), 1984

Table of Contents, 1985

In the Highlands and Islands, 1986

Rising from the Plains, 1986

The Control of Nature, 1989

Looking for a Ship, 1990

Assembling California, 1993

The Ransom of Russian Art, 1994

The Second John McPhee Reader, edited by Patricia Strachan and David Remnick, 1996

Further Reading

Core, George, "The Eloquence of Fact," Virginia Quarterly Review 54 (1978):733–41

Espey, David, "The Wilds of New Jersey: John McPhee as Travel Writer," in Temperamental Journeys: Essays on the Modern Literature of Travel, edited by Michael Kowalewski, Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1992:164–75

Giddens, Elizabeth, "An Epistemic Case Study: Identification and Attitude Change in John McPhee's Coming into the Country," Rhetoric Review 11 (1993):378–99

Howarth, William, Introduction to The John McPhee Reader, edited by Howarth, New York: Farrar Straus Giroux, 1976

Lounsbury, Barbara, "John McPhee's Levels of the Earth," in her The Art of Fact: Contemporary Artists of Nonfiction, New York: Greenwood Press, 1990:65–106

Roundy, Jack, "Crafting Fact: Formal Devices in the Prose of John McPhee," in Literary Nonfiction: Theory, Criticism, Pedagogy, edited by Chris Anderson, Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1989:70–92

Schuster, Charles, "Mikhail Bakhtin as Rhetorical Theorist," College English 47 (1985):594–607

Smith, Kathy, "John McPhee Balances the Act," in Literary Journalism in the Twentieth Century, edited by Norman Sims, New York: Oxford University Press, 1990:206–27

Terrie, Philip G., "River of Paradox: John McPhee's 'The Encircled River'," Western American Literature 23 (1988):3–15

Turner, Brian, "Giving Good Reasons: Environmental Appeals in the Nonfiction of John McPhee," Rhetoric Review 13 (1994): 164–82

Vipond, Douglas, and Russell A.Hunt, "The Strange Case of Queen-Post Truss: John McPhee on Writing and Reading," College Composition and Communication 42 (1991):200–10

Madariaga, Salvador de

Spanish, 1886–1978

Salvador de Madariaga can be considered a truly international European. Educated in Spain and France, he traveled extensively and lived in England for long periods of his life; he had assignments and held positions in Spain, England, France, and Switzerland; he wrote essays in their original form in Spanish, English, and French. After graduating from the School of Mines in Paris and briefly working at his profession in Madrid, he dedicated the rest of his life to the exercise of his intellectual interests, including journalism, as well as several years as a world public servant (the League of Nations), as a Spanish civil servant for the Spanish Republic (Ambassador in Washington and Paris), and as congressman and cabinet minister of justice and education. Because of his pacifist convictions he left Spain during the Civil War in order to work on a possible reconciliation between the contenders; he made a further attempt to broker a rapprochement between victors and vanquished in 1962. With the victory of General Franco in 1939, Madariaga established his residence in England, where he continued his intellectual work. He returned only briefly to Spain in 1976 after Franco's death. In sum, his life, his work, even the languages in which the ideas of this multifaceted personality were expressed in print bear the seal of European internationality.

Madariaga wrote essays for the most part, but he also wrote novels, drama, and poetry. He is mainly known for his essays of literary interpretation, as well as those analyzing Spanish culture, history, politics, and biography. His literary interest is apparent in Shelley and Calderón (1920), The Genius of Spain (1923), Guía del lector del "Quijote" (1926; Don Quixote: An Introductory Essay in Psychology), De Galdós a Lorca (1960; From Galdós to Lorca)—primarily the product of his years as professor of Spanish literature in Oxford, where he was a Fellow at Exeter College between 1928 and 1931. After the Spanish Civil War he returned to live in Oxford, where he pursued his intellectual interests.

The political essays are a corollary to Madariaga's work in public service. Disarmament (1929) is a consequence of his participation in the League of Nations, first as a member of the Press Division, later as head of the Disarmament Section. His interventions in Spanish politics and as a public servant of the Spanish government are compiled in Discursos internacionales (1934; International speeches). His ruminations on liberal democracy are part of Anarquía y jerarquía (1935; Anarchy or Hierarchy), where he admonishes both left and right that hierarchy is the very architecture of the state and must be saved. He distinguishes between liberty and democracy, the latter being defined as a set of practices that can be revised and adjusted.

However, Madariaga is best known internationally for his work interpreting Spanish culture, addressed to Spaniards as well as non-Spaniards. Beginning in 1930, he published Spain: A Modern History (1930), and went on to write a trilogy of biographies on Columbus, Cortés, and Bolívar. These were complemented by The Rise of the Spanish American Empire (1947) and The Fall of the Spanish American Empire (1947), where Madariaga elaborates a controversial explanation of why that empire fell. His theory of the emancipation of the Spanish kingdom in America is based on two principles. The first, of a biological nature, originates in the integration of Spaniards with the native population, resulting in a land that conquers its conquerors when the Creole stops feeling Spanish and begins to feel American. The second principle, of a legal nature, considers that Spanish America was a kingdom rather than a set of colonies. Therefore when the Spanish crown fell in Bayonne in 1808 during the Napoleonic wars, the kingdoms in America were left without a king. Had they promulgated Ferdinand VII as king, only then could they have remained a kingdom.

One of his most widely known essays, Englishmen, Frenchmen, Spaniards (1928), was inspired by Madariaga watching the English and French sort out their differences while he served as the disarmament chief in the League of Nations. He characterizes the English as people of action, the French as people of thought, and the Spanish as people of passion, with Miguel de Unamuno as the model for his assertion. His linguistic versatility (he was trilingual), which manifested itself in all of his work, can perhaps be observed most vividly in this instance. According to Madariaga the original text was written directly in English in the first part, in French for two chapters, and the rest in Spanish. By the same token, Madariaga states in his memoirs his preference for writing historical works in English because he felt he could exercise more discipline in his writing and be more objective.

Madariaga's essay discourse is more expository than argumentative, but as is proper in the nature of the essay, in trying to illuminate the reader there is an implied desire to promote acceptance or appreciation of the presented viewpoint. His essays originate in observation and intuitive knowledge, which provide the grounds for interpretation of the observed (as in Englishmen, Frenchmen, Spaniards). They also draw on personal experience (e.g. the political essays) or on reflection as well as documentation, with various degrees of objectivity and opinion in interpreting sources. Intuition plays an important part in some essays, with a degree of imagination that reveals intuitive finesse.

As an essayist Madariaga did not produce treatises or learned articles with critical apparatus. His essays are discourses in the true sense of the word. Being a generalist with a broad cultural and intellectual knowledge, he did not address a specialized readership or follow a specific methodology. His texts mirror the contemporary reader's world. He aimed to promote understanding among men, in an engaging form, expressed in flowing language but based on solid information, honest and acute observation, and intuition. His essays are knowledgeable, earnest, persuasive, written with skill and subtlety, and inspired by a spirit of controversy.

Madariaga was respected for his spirit of tolerance and conciliation. It has been said justly that he was a true universalist at home in the international society of world culture.

PILAR G.SAENZ

Biography

Salvador Madariaga y Rojo. Born 23 July 1886 in La Coruña, Galicia. Studied at the Collège Chaptal, Paris, until 1906; École Polytechnique, Paris, 1906–08; École Supérieure des Mines, Paris, until 1911. Worked on railroads in Spain, 1911–16. Married Constance Helen Margaret Archibald, 1911 (died, 1970): two daughters. Staff member, the London Times, 1916–21. Staff member, 1921, head of Disarmament Section, 1922–27, and Spanish delegate, 1931–36, League of Nations, Geneva. Chair of Spanish literature, Oxford University, 1927–31, and from 1939. Spanish Ambassador to the United States, 1931, and France, 1932–34; minister of education, 1934, then minister of justice. Moved to England during the Spanish Civil War and lived there for most of his life. Married Emilie Szekely Rauman, 1970. Elected to the Royal Spanish Academy (received, 1976). Returned to visit Spain after Franco's death, 1976. Awards: Ere Nouvelle Prize; Europa Prize, 1963; Goethe Prize, 1967; honorary degrees from seven universities; Orders of Merit from several countries; Grand Cross, Legion of Honor (France); Knight Grand Cross of Order of the Republic (Spain). Died in Locarno, Switzerland, 14 December 1978.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

- La guerra desde Londres* (Times articles), 1918
Shelley and Calderon, and Other Essays on English and Spanish Poetry, 1920; as Ensayos anglo-españoles, 1922
The Genius of Spain, and Other Essays on Spanish Contemporary Literature, 1923
Guia del lector del "Quijote": Ensayo psicologico sobre el Quijote, 1926; as Don Quixote: An Introductory Essay in Psychology, 1934; revised edition, 1961
Englishmen, Frenchmen, Spaniards: An Essay in Comparative Psychology, 1928 Disarmament, 1929
Americans, 1930
Spain: A Modern History, 1930; as España: Ensayo de historia contemporánea, 1931; revised edition, 1934
Discursos internacionales, 1934
Anarquía y jerarquía, 1935; as Anarchy or Hierarchy, 1937
On Hamlet, 1948
Bosquejo de Europa, 1951; as Portrait of Europe, 1952
Essays with a Purpose, 1954
Presente y porvenir de Hispanoamérica, y otros ensayos, 1959
De Galdos a Lorca, 1960
Retrato de un hombre de pie, 1964; as Portrait of a Man Standing, 1968
Memorias de un federalista, 1967
Mujeres españolas, 1972
Obras escogidas: Ensayos, 1972
A la orilla del río de los sucesos (selected essays), 1975
Mi respuesta: Artículos publicados en la revista "Ibérica" (1954–1970), edited by Victoria Kent, 1982

Other writings: many novels, poetry, plays, biographies of Christopher Columbus (1940), Hernán Cortés (1941), and Simón Bolívar (1951), works on the Spanish American empire, and memoirs.

Further Reading

- Bénitez, Rubén, "Madariaga e Hispanoamérica," in Studies in Honor of José Rubia Barcia, edited by Roberta Johnson and Paul C. Smith, Lincoln: Nebraska Society of Spanish and Spanish American Studies, 1982:27–38
 Caminals Gost, Rose, Salvador de Madariaga and National Character (dissertation), Barcelona: University of Barcelona, 1986
 Carvalho, Joaquina de Montezuma, "¿Habrà sido Cristóbal Colón un mitómano?," Norte 364 (1991):23–27
 Cifo Gonzalez, Manuel, "El tema de Cervantes en Ortega y Gasset: Meditaciones contrastadas con las de Américo Castro, Salvador de Madariaga, Ramiro de Maeztu y Azórin," Cuadernos Hispanoamericanos 403–05 (January-March 1984):308–16
 Cuenca Toribio, Jose M., "Madariaga, historiador de la contemporaneidad," Cuadernos Hispanoamericanos 429 (1986): 141–46

- Fawcett, Michael Leon, Salvador de Madariaga: The Essays (dissertation), Los Angeles: University of California, 1979
- Sacks, Norman, "The Man Who Entered Through the Window: The Memoirs of Salvador de Madariaga," Hispania 59 (1976): 942–51
- Sacks, Norman, "Salvador de Madariaga and George Orwell: Parallels and Contrasts," in Estudios in Honor of Rodolfo OrozSantiago, edited by Marino Pizarro Pizarro, Santiago: University of Chile, 1985:285–97
- Sacks, Norman, "Salvador de Madariaga's Interest in Language," in East Meets West: Homage to Edgar C. Knottlyton, edited by Roger L.Hadlich and J.D.Ellsworth, Honolulu: University of Hawaii, 1988:246–66
- Torre, Guillermo de, "Rumbo literario de Salvador de Madariaga," Revista de Occidente 17 (1967):368–69

Maeztu, Ramiro de

Spanish, 1874–1936

The life, work, and death of Ramiro de Maeztu, a member of the Generation of '98, are emblematic of the Spanish tragedy of the 1930s and of the European political radicalism of the decades between the two World Wars. Albeit author of a collection of romantic poems, a novel, and a play, Maeztu is best remembered in the history of Spanish literature for his journalistic essays, of which there are several thousand. His four most important books are comprised mainly of selections from his sociological essays and literary essays.

The political and literary ideas of his works of maturity, as well as the circumstances of his death—at the hands of leftwing militants in 1936—rendered Maeztu a source of inspiration and propaganda for the official ideology of the Franco regime. He is best known in the English-speaking world, however, for his book Authority, Liberty and Function in the Light of War (1916), published in London and mentioned in the Encyclopaedia Britannica in the section devoted to Guild Socialism, together with Bertrand Russell and G.D.H.Cole.

A passionate speaker and polemicist, Maeztu published Hacia otra España (Toward a new Spain) in 1899, one year following the country's loss of its last colonies, Cuba and the Philippines. Most of the essays in the book discuss this disaster and present an analysis—in part lucid, in part impressionistic—of the causes of the loss. This work is representative of Maeztu as a member of the Generation of '98, whose proponents (Unamuno, Baroja, Azorín, Machado), shared the regenerationist and existential impulses which caused the Spanish defeat (by the United States) in 1898. In Hacia otra España he accuses the nation's intelligentsia, and in particular the media, of insensitivity to the national crisis; according to Maeztu the press not only ignored Spain's spiritual misery, but also contributed to its decadence through its excessive attention to bullfights, comedies, gossip, and all kinds of banality. Maeztu concentrates on regenerationist themes, arguing against the old aristocratic distaste for commerce and manual labor, and defending a capitalist creation of wealth followed by socialist distribution. His social critique, as we can see, lies more in the diagnosis of problems than in their solutions.

In 1905 Maeztu moved to London as a press correspondent interested in the union ideas then in vogue. This interest led to his second collection of essays, the above-mentioned Authority, Liberty and Function, which later appeared in Spanish as La crisis del humanismo. The book became an ideological bridge between his regenerationist phase and his final period of borderline fascism. In it he depicts the spiritual crisis of the Spanish writer who experienced an intensification of his Catholicism. From a nearly theocratic point of view, Maeztu analyzes the historical evolution of Renaissance humanism which, in his opinion, erroneously assumed man to be the “measure of all things” and thereby established the basis of the bureaucratic state. Such a state legitimizes its existence by means of a false premise: the naive idea that men are capable of accomplishing the best for themselves, without consideration of their “fallen” moral condition. Modern bureaucracy tends to feed itself and perpetuate the abuse of power delegated by the people. To fight the corruption of the radically secular, capitalist, or Marxist state, he proposes the creation of a system based on trade unions, which follows its own independent and professional hierarchies. Professional excellence would be—as in the Middle Ages—rewarded by means of an autonomous and hierarchical structure, rendering unnecessary any governmental mediation. Here Maeztu contributes to the sustaining ideology of Spanish fascism, both the most militant and idealist of the pre-Civil War era and the “National Catholicism” of the Franco dictatorship.

Of his third and most politically active phase which followed his return to Spain in 1919, two books are significant: Don Quijote, Don Juan y la Celestina (1926) and Defensa de la Hispanidad (1934; In defense of Hispanism). In the first, he claimed that Don Quixote represents the ideal of love, Don Juan the ideal of power, and the Celestina that of wisdom. But none of the three figures can be deemed complete because they lack what the other two have. Although Don Quixote is the most moral of the three, his love is ineffective because of his lack of wisdom and power. In Defensa de la Hispanidad, Maeztu’s most original and mature work, he makes the claim that the moral and economic collapse of the Western powers and the Soviet Union following World War I clearly implicate the peoples of Hispanic language and culture as the moral reserve of the West. Spain’s historical task thus consists of an acceptance of this type of “manifest destiny” and a resumption of its role as bearer of Christianity and civilization to both the decadent capitalist world and the brutal communist dictatorships.

Ramiro de Maeztu is indispensable to our understanding of the peculiarities of Iberian fascism, in both its nonracist character and its Catholic underpinnings. On the other hand, Maeztu’s thought contains elements characteristic of AngloSaxon culture (efficiency, work ethic), which are the result both of his family background (his mother was English) and of his residency in England and his visits to the U.S.

PEDRO MARIA MUÑOZ

Biography

Ramiro de Maeztu y Whitney. Born 4 May 1874 in Vitoria. Lived briefly in Paris, 1890–91, then joined his father in Cuba as administrator on his family’s plantation. Upon death of his father, 1895, he returned to Spain (Bilbao) to live with his mother. Wrote for El Parvenir Vascongado (The Basque future), Bilbao, then moved to Madrid, 1897, and wrote for various newspapers and journals. Member of the Generation of 1898. Foreign correspondent in London, 1905–19, reporting from the Allied Front during World War I. Married Alice Mabel Hill, 1916: one son. Returned to Spain, 1919. Columnist, El Sol, from 1919. Became increasingly involved in activities of the extreme right. Ambassador to Argentina, 1927–30. Founder, Acción Española (Spanish action) fascist journal. Elected representative to Spanish Parliament, 1934. Elected to the Spanish Royal Academy, 1935. Refused to take advantage of connections and flee Spain at the onset of Civil War; jailed by Republican militia. Executed 29 October 1936.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Hacia otra España, 1899

Authority, Liberty and Function in the Light of War, 1916; revised edition, as La crisis del humanismo, 1920

Don Quijote, Don Juan y la Celestina: Ensayos en simpatía, 1926

Defensa de la Hispanidad, 1934

La brevedad de la vida en nuestra poesía lírica, 1935

En vísperas de la tragedia, 1941

España y Europa, 1947

Ensayos, 1948

Frente a la República (articles published in ABC, 1931–36), edited by Gonzalo Fernández de la Mora, 1956

Liquidación de la monarquía parlamentaria, 1957

El nuevo tradicionalismo y la revolución social, 1959

Don Quijote o el amor: Ensayos en simpatía, 1964

Artículos periodísticos, 1975

Artículos desconocidos, 1897–1904, edited by E. Inman Fox, 1977

Liberalismo y socialismo: Textos fabianos, 1909–1911, 1984

Other writings: a novel, a play, poetry, and an autobiography.

Collected works edition: Obras completas, edited by Vicente Marrero, 1974.

Further Reading

Bancroft, Robert, “América en la obra de Ramiro de Maeztu,” Revista Hispánica Moderna 13 (1947):236–49

Díaz-Plaja, Guillermo, Modernismo frente a Noventa y ocho, Madrid: Espasa-Calpe, 2nd edition, 1966

Fox, E. Inman, “Ramiro de Maeztu y los intelectuales,” Revista de Occidente 51 (1957):369–77

Gómez Martínez, José Luis, “Ramiro de Maeztu, el hombre y su ideal,” Abside 38 (1974):196–201

González Cuevas, Pedro Carlos, “Ramiro de Maeztu frente a la segunda república,”

Historia 16 (1987):19–26

Lida, Clara, "Literatura anarquista y anarquismo literario," Nueva Revista de Filología Hispánica 19 (1970):360–81

Marrero Suarez, Vicente, Maeztu, Madrid: Rialp, 1955

Marrero Suarez, Vicente, "Maeztu y el socialismo español," Razón y Fe 6 (1986):277–90

Nozick, Martin, "An Examination of Ramiro de Maeztu," PMLA 69, no. 4 (pt. 1) (1954):719–40

Rocamora, Pedro, "Ramiro de Maeztu y la generación del '98," Arbor 341 (1974):7–22

Santervás, Rafael, "Maeztu y Ortega: Dos formas de Regeneracionismo: El poder y la ciencia," Revista de Occidente 96 (1989):80–102

Sisto, David, "A Note on the Philosophy of Ramiro de Maeztu," Hispania 41 (1958):457–59

Sobejano, Gonzalo, Nietzsche en España, Madrid: Gredos, 1967

Tellechea, J. Ignacio, and Laureano Robles, "Tres cartas de Maeztu a Miguel de Unamuno," Cuadernos Salamantinos de Filosofía 17 (1990):559–91

Mailer, Norman

American, 1923–

Seer, savager, and sage describes Norman Mailer, the American writer who has expanded the boundaries of every nonfiction form he has assayed—including the essay. Mailer has published seven essay collections and won Pulitzer Prizes for two of his 15 book-length narrative essays (The Armies of the Night: History as a Novel, the Novel as History, 1968; The Executioner's Song, 1979). In truth, he has written more (and more innovative) nonfiction than fiction. More than any other American writer, Mailer has dared to place himself at the center of American political and cultural life and report back his observations. These have taken the form of lengthy and ambitious hybrid works which merge the travel essay and political essay (Miami and the Siege of Chicago, 1968; St. George and the Godfather, 1972; Oswald's Tale, 1995), the travel essay and the science essay (Of a Fire on the Moon, 1971), the travel essay and the sports essay (King of the Hill, 1971; The Fight, 1975), the cultural polemic and the literary review (Advertisements for Myself, 1959; The Prisoner of Sex, 1971; Genius and Lust: A Journey Through the Major Writings of Henry Miller, 1976), and the artist biography (Marilyn: A Novel Biography, 1973; Of Women and Their Elegance, 1980; Portrait of Picasso as a Young Man: An Interpretive Biography, 1995).

The novelist Norman Mailer began to find his voice as an essayist in the mid-1950s as an angry anti-establishment prophet of hip. As the self-proclaimed General Marijuana, he cofounded and named the Village Voice, one of the earliest underground American newspapers, in 1955, and proceeded to write a series of provocative essays that uncannily foreshadowed the 1960s. His controversial 1957 essay "The White Negro" predicted that "A time of violence, new hysteria, confusion and rebellion [would]...replace the time of conformity." His equally famous Esquire essay "Superman Comes to the Supermarket," written on the eve of the 1960 presidential election, is often credited with helping John F.Kennedy defeat Richard Nixon. Mailer's was one of the first voices against the Vietnam War, and his Pulitzer Prize-winning account of his arrest during a 1967 protest march on the Pentagon, The Armies of the Night, established forever the inescapable subjectivity of journalism and history—indeed of all nonfiction forms.

Because of this widely celebrated volume, Mailer is usually listed among the 1960s New Journalists. "I think if I started any aspect of the New Journalism—and I did," Mailer observed in 1980, "it was an enormously personalized journalism where the character of the narrator was one of the elements not only in telling the story, but in the way the reader would assess the experience." A related contribution is Mailer's innovative treatment of himself as a third-person "character" in his works, a technique he admits to borrowing from The Education of Henry Adams (1907). In The Armies of the Night Mailer depicts himself at various times as The Novelist, The Historian, The Participant, Mailer, and even as The Beast. In later works he is Aquarius (Of a Fire on the Moon, St. George and the Godfather), The Prize Winner, The Prisoner (The Prisoner of Sex), and Nommo, spirit of words (The Fight).

A gifted stylist, Mailer has been called a quick-change artist for his ability to alter his style to meet new artistic or intellectual goals. The Executioner's Song, Mailer's 1979 Pulitzer Prize-winning account of the macabre life and death of Utah murderer Gary Gilmore, confounded and delighted readers, not only because of Mailer's conspicuous absence as a character in the work and his equally uncharacteristic use of simple, even homespun metaphors, but because of his use of substitutionary narration, whereby he narrated the story in the accents and diction of his story's personae. Mailer has written on the Democratic and Republican presidential conventions since 1960; most recently he narrated part of his essay on the 1996 convention in a clipped imitation of the interior voice and diction of Republican presidential candidate Robert Dole: "Dole. Didn't sound like prosperity. More like a grim tomorrow. So Dole could see it. Had to bet the farm. His time had come. Bet the farm."

Mailer has always sought to address the national conscience, and so has published his essays in popular and men's magazines such as Esquire, Playboy, and (most recently) John F. Kennedy, Jr.'s George, as well as more intellectual journals like Dissent, Commentary, and the New York Review of Books. He is a Hegelian, and often will structure his works to pose a synthesis of warring oppositions ("The White Negro," 1957; Cannibals and Christians, 1966; The Idol and the Octopus: Political Writings on the Kennedy and Johnson Administrations, 1968; St. George and the Godfather, Genius and Lust). Within these works, he employs metaphors as probes of his subject and as a tool for enhancing intimacy with his readers as well as stimulating mental and social activity. Indeed, it is the forced intimacy of the metaphoric transaction that often causes disproportionate reactions to Mailer's essays—reactions usually of supreme admiration or distaste. Metaphor is coercive. One fails to make the (metaphoric) trip, or avoids intimate understanding, only if one fails to comprehend the metaphor. Because many of Mailer's metaphors are elaborate trips designed to stimulate or activate the reader, they naturally irritate those who do not wish to move—or be moved. On occasion, Mailer will compound this creative tension by verbally savaging his readers. He began his first Village Voice column in 1955 by stating: "That many of you are frustrated in your ambitions, and undernourished in your pleasures, only makes you more venomous." In his second column, he admonishes: "If you are not in the mood to think, or if you have no interest in thinking, then let us ignore each other until the next column. And if you do go on from here, please have the courtesy to concentrate."

Readers alienated by Mailer's verbal assaults often have difficulty recognizing that his most profound wish as a writer is to bring life, to animate both individual bodies and the "body politic" into greater being. He is thus more socially conscious than is often credited. Mailer's own literary life is a model of the regeneration he seeks for others and for the American nation as a whole. He has described James T. Farrell's Studs Lonigan (1934) as "the best single literary experience" of his life, for Studs' working-class and lower-middle-class background were similar to his own. "Suddenly I realized you could write about your life," Mailer told the Paris Review in 1964. In terms of ideas, Mailer says he has gained more from Karl Marx than from anyone else he has read. Marx, Mailer stresses, "has something to say in every phrase."

Mailer followed Ernest Hemingway in creating a public persona, and his early bullfight essays can be seen as direct competition with "Papa." The Hemingway influence culminates in Mailer's volume The Fight, his artful reprise of Hemingway's Death in the Afternoon in which Mailer achieves renewed literary life for both Hemingway and himself through Muhammad Ali. Mailer's work also shows the influence of Walt Whitman (Advertisements for Myself) and Henry Miller. In addition, The Executioner's Song can be read as Mailer's Moby-Dick, with Gary Gilmore the white whale ultimately eluding all social institutions and both Western and Eastern voices.

Today a grey sage in his seventies, Mailer retains his intuitive, synthesizing daring. "Everything in society from the largest social institution to those private intimate personal moments, and the deepest mystical moments such as the onset of death, might all be seen in their connections if one had the courage to begin," he has observed. "You can never understand a writer until you find his private little vanity and mine has always been that I will frustrate expectations. People think they've found a way of dismissing me, but, like the mad butler—I'll be back serving the meal."

BARBARA LOUNSBERRY

Biography

Norman Kingsley Mailer. Born 31 January 1923 in Long Branch, New Jersey. Studied at Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1939–43, S.B. (cum laude) in aeronautical engineering, 1943; the Sorbonne, Paris, 1947. Married Beatrice Silverman, 1944 (divorced, 1951): one daughter. Sergeant in the United States Army, 1944–46. Married Adèle Morales, 1954 (divorced, 1961): two daughters. Contributing editor, Dissent, 1954; cofounder, 1955, and columnist, 1956, Village Voice; columnist of "Big Bite," Esquire, 1962–63, and of "Responses and Reactions," Commentary, 1962–63. Married Lady Jeanne Campbell, 1962 (divorced, 1963): one daughter; married Beverly Bentley, 1963 (divorced, 1979): two sons. Arrested for anti-war protest at the Pentagon, October 1967. Member of the Executive Board, 1968–73, and President, 1985–86, PEN American Center; ran unsuccessfully for Mayor of New York City, 1969. Married Carol Stevens, 1980 (divorced, 1980); married Barbara Norris Church, 1980: three children.

Awards: National Book Award, for nonfiction, 1969; Pulitzer Prize, for nonfiction, 1969, 1980; MacDowell Medal, 1973; National Arts Club Medal, 1976; Emerson-Thoreau Medal, 1989; honorary degree from Rutgers University. Member, American Academy, 1985.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Advertisements for Myself, 1959

The Presidential Papers, 1963

Cannibals and Christians, 1966

The Bullfight, 1967

The Idol and the Octopus: Political Writings on the Kennedy and Johnson Administrations, 1968

The Armies of the Night: History as a Novel, the Novel as History, 1968

Miami and the Siege of Chicago: An Informal History of the Republican and Democratic Conventions of 1968, 1968

Of a Fire on the Moon, 1971; as A Fire on the Moon, 1971

King of the Hill: On the Fight of the Century, 1971

The Prisoner of Sex, 1971

The Long Patrol: 25 Years of Writing, edited by Robert F. Lucid, 1971

St. George and the Godfather, 1972

Existential Errands, 1972; in The Essential Mailer, 1982

Marilyn: A Novel Biography, 1973; enlarged edition, 1975

The Faith of Graffiti, 1974; as Watching My Name Go By, 1975

The Fight, 1975

Some Honorable Men: Political Conventions 1960–1972, 1976

Genius and Lust: A Journey Through the Major Writings of Henry Miller, 1976

The Executioner's Song: A True Life Novel, 1979

Of Women and Their Elegance, 1980

The Essential Mailer, 1982

Pieces and Pontifications, 1982

Oswald's Tale: An American Mystery, 1995

Portrait of Picasso as a Young Man: An Interpretive Biography, 1995

Other writings: ten novels (The Naked and the Dead, 1948; Barbary Shore, 1951; The Deer Park, 1955; An American Dream, 1965; Why Are We in Vietnam?, 1967; A Transit to Narcissus, 1978; Ancient Evenings, 1983; Tough Guys Don't Dance, 1984; Harlot's Ghost, 1991; The Gospel According to the Son, 1997), short stories, poetry, screenplays, and a play.

Bibliography

Adams, Laura, Norman Mailer: A Comprehensive Bibliography, Metuchen, New Jersey: Scarecrow Press, 1974

Further Reading

- Adams, Laura, Existential Battles: The Growth of Norman Mailer, Athens: Ohio University Press, 1976
- Adams, Laura, editor, Will the Real Norman Mailer Please Stand Up, Port Washington, New York: Kennikat Press, 1974
- Anderson, Chris, "Norman Mailer: The Record of a War," in his Style as Argument: Contemporary American Nonfiction, Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1987:82–132
- Begiebing, Robert J., Acts of Regeneration: Allegory and Archetype in the Works of Norman Mailer, Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1980
- Bloom, Harold, editor, Norman Mailer: Modern Critical Views, New York: Chelsea House, 1986
- Braudy, Leo, editor, Norman Mailer: A Collection of Critical Essays, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice Hall, 1972
- Bufithis, Philip H., Norman Mailer, New York: Ungar, 1978
- Ehrlich, Robert, Norman Mailer: The Radical as Hipster, Metuchen, New Jersey: Scarecrow Press, 1978
- Flaherty, Joe, Managing Mailer, New York: Coward McCann, and London: Michael Joseph, 1970
- Foster, Richard, Norman Mailer, Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1968
- Hellmann, John, "Journalism as Nonfiction: Norman Mailer's Strategy for Mimesis and Interpretation," in his Fables of Fact: The New Journalism as New Fiction, Athens: Ohio University Press, 1980:35–65
- Hollowell, John, "Mailer's Vision: History as a Novel, the Novel as History," in his Fact and Fiction: The New Journalism and the Nonfiction Novel, Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1977:87–125
- Lennon, J. Michael, editor, Critical Essays on Norman Mailer, Boston: Hall, 1986
- Lounsbury, Barbara, "Norman Mailer's Ages of Man," in her The Art of Fact: Contemporary Artists of Nonfiction, New York: Greenwood Press, 1990
- Lucid, Robert F., editor, Norman Mailer: The Man and His Work, Boston: Little Brown, 1971
- Manso, Peter, editor, Mailer: His Life and Times, New York: Simon and Schuster, 1985
- Merrill, Robert, Norman Mailer Revisited, Boston: Twayne, 1992
- Mills, Hilary, Mailer: A Biography, New York: Empire, 1982
- Radford, Jean, Norman Mailer: A Critical Study, New York: Barnes and Noble, 1975
- Stone, Albert E., "Factual Fictions: Experiments in Autobiography by Norman Mailer, Frank Conroy, Lillian Hellman," in his Autobiographical Occasions and Original Acts: Versions of American Identity from Henry Adams to Nate Shaw, Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1982:265–324
- Wenke, Joseph, Mailer's America, Hanover, New Hampshire: University Press of New England, 1987

Mallarmé, Stéphane

French, 1842–1898

In all his writing, prose or poetry, Stéphane Mallarmé is concerned less with what he terms the wonder of transposing a fact of nature than with extracting from it “the pure notion,” so that whether his subject is theater or music, ballet or literature, he sets his reader the task of reading creatively, one that parallels the writer’s need to penetrate the enigmas posed by social and natural phenomena. Originally published in a wide array of periodicals, from the American Chap-Book to the Revue Wagnérienne (Wagnerian review), from La Plume (The pen) to what he termed “the inimitable” National Observer, Mallarmé’s essays subsequently appeared in volumes with such self-deprecating titles as Divagations (Ramblings), Pages, or, simply, Prose. The modesty of these titles is typical of him: while his essays are based on the unflinching premise of the supremacy of poetry and the value of the mind, they do not pontificate or condescend, but invite the reader to enter into a creative partnership, an intellectual debate. His jewel-like, often fragmentary, formulations are witty and suggestive rather than explicit and pedagogic, and the initial stimulus—a mime or a book, for instance—usually appears only briefly, transformed into the springboard for a far more wide-ranging meditation on art and thought.

Two pieces written in the 1860s reveal the revolutionary nature of his early aesthetic thinking and point forward to convictions he was to formulate more cryptically in later years. In “Hérésies artistiques—L’Art pour tous” (1862; Artistic heresies—art for all), the young poet argues that “all that is sacred and wishes to remain so envelops itself in mystery.” Poetry alone is forced to use a language open to all, printed in the characters used by newspapers and political polemics rather than locked away behind the golden padlocks of old missals or the “inviolable hieroglyphs of papyrus rolls.” Mallarmé’s argument here moves poetry away from the didactic and sacerdotal role certain 19th-century poets had given it and toward the hermetic and the ludic that marks the Modernist concept of art.

His “Symphonie littéraire” (1865; Literary symphony) is a triptych, in which he responds to the work of three seminal poets of the time, Baudelaire, Théophile Gautier, and Théodore de Banville, not in the analytical mode of most contemporary critics but with the kind of passionate attempt to re-create each poet’s imaginary vision that also marks the best of Baudelaire’s literary criticism. Thus, for Baudelaire he imagines a landscape stripped of all vegetation except a few trees, “whose painful bark is an interweaving of exposed nerves: their visible growth is constantly accompanied, despite the strange immobility of the air, by a heart-rending complaint, like that of violins, which, when it reaches the end of each branch, trembles in musical leaves.”

The same desire to enter into the intellectual and imaginary world of his subject marks the numerous pen portraits he wrote to celebrate contemporary poets, artists, and musicians. Typical of these is his evocation of his close friend, the novelist and playwright Auguste Villiers de l’Isle Adam. In this essay—which begins, famously, with the haunting sentence, “A man accustomed to dream comes here to speak of another, who is dead”—Mallarmé characteristically maintains a careful balance between the evocation of the individual, the author of Axël (1886) and L'Ève future (1886; Tomorrow's Eve) whose great desire, Mallarmé surmises, was to “reign,” and his study of the writer as representative. Posing the question “Do we know what it means to write?” he offers an elliptical answer which allows the rest of his study of Villiers to be seen as an expanded response to the same challenge: “An ancient and very vague but jealous practice, whose meaning lies in the heart’s mysteries.” James McNeill Whistler, too, is at once presented as the archetypal painter, “the enchanter of a work of mystery, as tightly closed as perfection itself, which the mob would pass by without even feeling hostility toward it,” and summed up in terms that brilliantly recall that arrogant, difficult, and highly gifted man: “a Dragon, battling, exulting, precious and worldly.”

That oscillation between the apparent and the broader subject of an essay is also very much present in “Crayonné au théâtre” (1887; Scribbled in the theater) and in “Variations sur un sujet” (1895; Variations on a subject). Hamlet, for instance, is both Shakespeare’s character and the “juvenile shadow of us all, thus embodying a myth.” The ballerina is not “a woman who dances, for these combined reasons that she is not a woman but a metaphor resuming one of the elementary aspects of our form, dagger, chalice, flower, etc. and that she does not dance, suggesting, with a bodily writing, through the miracle of leaps and bounds, what in prose would take paragraphs of dialogue or description: she is a poem set free from all the paraphernalia needed by a scribe.”

Best known, no doubt, among Mallarmé’s essays are those written in response partly to the upsurge in popularity of Wagner’s concept of art, and partly to the fashion for free verse. Initially given as lectures in Oxford and Cambridge, “La Musique et les lettres” (1894; Music and letters), together with its companion pieces, “Crise de vers” (1897; Crisis of poetry) and “Quant au livre” (1897; Concerning the book), has come to be regarded as a seminal text in the development of aesthetic thinking. Among the most challenging of his prose pieces, these meditations on the function of art contain some of Mallarmé’s finest, if most elliptical, formulations on the function of the symbol, the role of personal experience, and the play of language. Since, Mallarmé argues, the poet is condemned to pursue black on white even when describing the luminosity of the stars against their black background, the reader is constantly invited to take the “dark lace” that art offers and make of it, from his or her own experience, vast networks containing a treasure trove of images. In order to illuminate truth, Mallarmé implies, one must put the lamp aside and work in darkness. That too is the task of the reader who embarks on Mallarmé’s essays. While they can occasionally be precious in both senses of the word, they are above all challenging, stimulating, and endlessly rewarding.

ROSEMARY LLOYD

Biography

Born Étienne Mallarmé, 18 March 1842 in Paris. Studied at the Lycée Impérial, Sens, 1856–60, baccalauréat, 1860. Traveled to London, 1862–63. Married Marie Christina Gerhard, 1863: one son (died, 1879) and one daughter. Taught English in Tournon, 1863–66, Besançon, 1866–67, Avignon, 1867–70, Lycée Fontanes, Paris, 1871–74, Lycée Janson-de-Sailly, Paris, 1884–85, and Collège Rollin, Paris, 1885–93. Editor and contributor, La Dernière Mode (The last style), 1874–75. Elected to the French Academy, 1883. Liaison with Méry Laurent, late 1880s. Died (as a result of choking) at Valvins, 9 September 1898.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Album de vers et de prose, 1887

Pages, 1891

Vers et prose, 1893

Divagations, 1897; edited by E.M.Souffrin, 1949

Selected Prose Poems, Essays and Letters, translated by Bradford Cook, 1956

Écrits sur le livre (selections), 1985

Other writings: several volumes of poetry (including L'Après-midi d'un faune [Afternoon of a Faun], 1876) and correspondence.

Collected works editions: Œuvres complètes (Pléiade Edition), edited by Henri Mondor and G.Jean-Aubry, 1945; Œuvres complètes, edited by Carl Paul Barbier and Charles Gordon Millan, vol. 1, 1983 (in progress; 3 vols. projected).

Bibliography

Morris, D.Hampton, Stéphane Mallarmé, Twentieth-Century Criticism (1901–1971) and (1972–1979), University: University of Mississippi Romance Monographs, 2. vols., 1977–89

Further Reading

Austin, Lloyd James, Poetic Principles and Practice, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1987

Balakian, Anna, The Symbolist Movement: A Critical Appraisal, New York: New York University Press, 1977

Bersani, Leo, The Death of Stéphane Mallarmé, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1982

Cohn, Robert Greer, Mallarmé's "Divagations": A Guide and Commentary, New York: Lang, 1990

Fowlie, Wallace, Mallarmé, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1953

Kravis, Judy, The Prose of Mallarmé: The Evolution of a Literary Language, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1976

Lawler, James, The Language of French Symbolism, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1969

Lloyd, Rosemary, Mallarmé: Poésies, London: Grant and Cutler, 1984

Marchal, Bertrand, La Religion de Mallarmé: Poésie, mythologie, et religion, Paris:

Corti, 1988

Marvick, Louis Wirth, Mallarmé and the Sublime, Albany: State University of New York Press, 1986

Michaud, Guy, Mallarmé, Paris: Hatier, 1971

Millan, Gordon, The Throw of the Dice: The Life of Stéphane Mallarmé, London: Secker and Warburg, and New York: Farrar Straus Giroux, 1994

Paxton, Norman, The Development of Mallarmé's Prose Style, Geneva: Droz, 1968

St. Aubyn, Frederic Chase, Stéphane Mallarmé, Boston: Twayne, revised edition, 1989

Mallea, Eduardo

Argentine, 1903–1982

Although Eduardo Mallea is better known today by the general reading public as a novelist and short-story writer, the impact his essays had among Argentine readers in the 1930s and 1940s was extensive. His Historia de una pasión argentina (1937; History of an Argentine Passion), which became a bestseller soon after publication, received enthusiastic commentaries by the most promising writers of the period, like Horacio Rega Molina and Leopoldo Marechal, as well as laudatory reviews from well-known intellectuals, especially from the liberal sector of Argentine letters, such as Bernardo Canal Feijóo, José Bianco, and Luis Emilio Soto.

The history of Latin American essays shows, throughout the works of its major figures—Andrés Bello, Domingo Faustino Sarmiento, José Martí, José Enrique Rodó, José Carlos Mariátegui, and José Vasconcelos, to mention only a few—a constant intellectual effort to achieve a satisfactory formulation of what it means to be Latin American and a self-explanatory definition of the specificity of the New World (americanidad). Mallea's writings fit naturally into this broader tradition since the unity of his thinking comes from a permanent preoccupation with defining the essence of Argentina and leading his compatriots to a true understanding of argentinidad, a term coined by Ricardo Rojas in works like La restauración nacionalista (1909; Nationalist restoration), Blasón de plata (1912; Argentine blazon), La argentinidad (1916; Argentineness), and Eurindia (1924).

While other Latin American essayists dealt with regional issues such as the situation of the native population, the problem of colonial heritage, or the consequences of economic imperialism, Mallea approached the issue in less sociohistorical terms. In Conocimiento y expresión de la Argentina (Knowledge and expression of Argentina), the text of a lecture the author read in Italy in 1934 and that was published the following year under the imprint of the Argentine journal Sur (South), Mallea sustains the theory that, to be able to express themselves, Latin Americans need first to develop a form of self-consciousness that takes into account the particularities of their human condition. According to his description, Argentina is characterized by the presence of an immense plain and a small population. The blend of both factors results in the taciturn and melancholic mood that is usually attributed to Argentines. Although the necessary search for self-knowledge is thought to be less an individual quest and more a process in which all Argentines should be involved, only the members of an intellectual elite are really committed to attaining such a consciousness.

Mallea further developed these ideas in his next and most renowned essay, History of an Argentine Passion, a booklength text where autobiographical and narrative elements intertwine to advance the writer's insights about national identity. According to Mallea, during the first decades of the century Argentina went through a process of denaturalization, in which the people moved further and further away from the ideals of the founders of the country. The symptom of this "degeneracy" or "weakening" of true Argentine values is the lack of moral, historic, intellectual, and even human conscience that Mallea notices among the majority of his contemporaries. The reason for these changes is to be found in the blending of the traditional inhabitants and the most recent wave of immigrants, who introduced a different set of values, thus substituting authentic life with a representation of life, a superficially satisfactory existence oriented toward appearance and lacking in spirituality. As a consequence, there exist two Argentinas cohabiting the same space: one visible, which stands for unfounded values (artificiality, materialism, and shallowness), and another one, invisible, which preserves the genuine spirit of the country, its authentic though submerged ideals. Mallea believes that some members of the younger generation, such as himself, are deeply concerned with the present situation and are striving to recuperate the two main traits of Argentineness: its sense of giving and its devotion to freedom.

The essays contained in Meditación en la costa (1939; Meditation by the seaside), El sayal y la púrpura (1941; The sackcloth and the purple), and La vida blanca (wr. 1942, pub. 1960; The white life) are closely related to the same search for Argentina's true identity. The first, in the form of an introspective monologue, leads the essayist to the conclusion that Argentina, in its own process of national formation, was responding to European societal deformation which had been spreading for decades. Although recognizing the importance of economic prosperity, the writer reaffirms the idea that the key to a valid humanity is rooted in the nature and inner structure of the people.

In El sayal y la púrpura Mallea brings together several essays previously published in the journals Sur and Realidad (Reality). He analyzes different aspects of the contemporary situation: the widespread sensation of emptiness and failure that affects the world, the crisis of rationalism and the advent of existentialism, and the militant role of intellectuals who are supposed to assume responsibility for the destiny of humankind. Under these circumstances, it is time for America to rise up and share with the rest of the world its essential characteristics: simplicity, spontaneity, and humanity.

The metaphor of the title of La vida blanca is meant to express a colorless life, one of pretending rather than being. This essay implies a different approach to Mallea's obsessive topic. The author takes stock of his former confidence in the spiritual qualities of the new Argentine generation, and comes to realize the futility of those expectations.

Belonging to an intellectualizing generation, Mallea developed a personal style that combines a rhetoric occasionally saturated with emotional overtones and a metaphorical and florid expression. At his best, Mallea is able to pursue his ontological quest in an exalted and deeply poetical style, but often his writing becomes wordy and overloaded with synonymous circumlocutions.

As an example of the work of a liberal intellectual, concerned with the definition of national identity and the condition of humankind in the modern world, Mallea's essays served as a literary model for an entire generation of Argentine writers. Historical distance, changes in interest and in the definition of social, historical, and ethical problems, and the radicalization of Argentine intellectuals have left his production on the margins of present concerns. Nevertheless, his writings continue to constitute a valuable document for the understanding of a major phase in Latin American cultural development.

DANIEL ALTAMIRANDA

Biography

Born 14 August 1903 in Bahía Blanca, Argentina. Studied law at the University of Buenos Aires. Cofounder, Revista de América (American review), 1921; contributed to several other journals, including Sur, from 1934; staff member, from 1928, and editor of literary supplement, 1931–35, La Nación. Traveled to Europe, 1928, 1934. Married Helena Muniz Larreta, 1944. UNESCO delegate for Argentina, Paris, 1955–58, and New Delhi, 1956. Argentine Ambassador to France, 1955–58. Elected to the Argentine Academy of Letters, 1960. Awards: many, including First National Prize of Letters, 1945; Argentine Association of Writers Grand Prize of Honor, 1946; Grand National Prize of the Arts, 1970. Died in Buenos Aires, 12 November 1982.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Conocimiento y expresión de la Argentina, 1935

Historia de una pasión argentina, 1937; as History of an Argentine Passion, translated by

Myron I.Lichtblau, 1983

Meditación en la costa, 1939

El sayal y la púrpura, 1941

Notas de un novelista, 1954

La vida blanca, 1960

Las travesías, 2 vols., 1961–62

Poderío de la novela, 1965

Other writings: 10 novels (including La bahía de silencio [The Bay of Silence], 1940; Todo verdor perecerá [All Green Shall Perish], 1941), six collections of short stories, and two plays.

Collected works editions: Obras completas, 2 vols., 1961–65, and 1986– (in progress).

Further Reading

Earle, Peter G., and Robert G.Mead, Historia del ensayo hispanoamericano, Mexico City: Andrea, 1973

- Lewald, H. Ernest, Eduardo Mallea, Boston: Twayne, 1977
- Pintor Genaro, Mercedes, Eduardo Mallea, novelista, Río Piedras: University of Puerto Rico, 1976
- Polt, John H.R., The Writings of Eduardo Mallea, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1959
- Rivelli, Carmen, Eduardo Mallea: La continuidad temática de su obra, New York: Las Américas, 1969
- Stabb, Martin S., In Quest of Identity: Patterns in the Spanish American Essay of Ideas, 1890–1960, Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1967
- Topete, José Manuel, “Eduardo Mallea y el laberinto de la agonía: Historia de una pasión argentina,” Revista Iberoamericana 20, no. 39 (1955):117–51
- Villordo, Oscar Hermes, Genio y figura de Eduardo Mallea, Buenos Aires: Eudeba, 1973

Mandel’shtam, Osip

Russian, 1891–1938

Chronologically and thematically, Osip Mandel’shtam’s essays reflect the three distinctive phases in his brief but intense life as a major poet and seminal figure in 20th-century Russian cultural life: the youthful prerevolutionary years as a student and Acmeist poet; the soul-searching and gradual turning away from verse to prose during the 1920s; and the mature years of the Stalinist 1930s as a time of spiritual renewal and rebellion, mental and physical hardship, arrest and exile, as well as his most complex and powerful essays and two-thirds of his verse. His output as both poet and essayist was slim, the result of artistic, personal, and political restrictions. Stylistically, two modes of expression dominate the essays: the dense metaphorical style evocative of the problematics of poetry and culture, and focused on “the word” (logos) as the condensed verbal manifestation of cultural continuity, and the polemical rhetoric invoked to assess and attack the state of contemporary arts, culture, and the literary establishment.

Mandel’shtam’s career as an essayist began while a student of Romance languages and philosophy in Heidelberg. In 1910, his first essay, “François Villon,” identified his mentors, Villon and Verlaine, with an “astronomical miracle” and epochal “mission” analogous to his own inchoate Acmeism. Praising their revolt against “artificial, hothouse poetry,” he defined poetry’s function as the actualization of the human experience in all its precision, vitality, and complexity, and juxtaposed the poet’s capacity “to wield precise details” against the “suggestive hints” of the symbolists. Poetic craft, he claimed, made “the passing moment...endure the pressure of centuries.”

“François Villon” appeared along with his fellow Acmeists’ prose and verse manifestos in 1913 in Nicolai Gumilev’s Acmeist organ, Apollon (Apollo). Another essay, “Utro Akmeizma” (1913; “Morning of Acmeism”), emphasized semantic consciousness as the ultimate “reality,” employed mathematical and architectural metaphors to “restrain” the “immense emotional excitement associated with works of art,” and underscored both the historicity and continuity of art’s highest forms, the “acme” of human creativity. The poet’s synthesis of the common cultural experience into dynamic verbal forms, he asserted, reveals monuments of the past as impulses and vehicles of awe and surprise, concrete reminders of the “blessed legacy” of world culture conjoining the artists and monuments of all time.

“O sobesednike” (1913; “On the Addressee”) presents Mandel’shtam’s theory that a genuine poem is a letter to a future “providential addressee,” while the prose essay engages the contemporary reader directly in a conscious interpretation of the world in motion: “the prose writer is compelled to stand ‘higher’ than...society, since instruction is the central nerve of prose...” Analytical skepticism is emphasized as a function of both logic and rhetoric.

Essays on the problematics of Russian culture begin with “Zametki o Shen’e” (1915; “Remarks on Chenier”) and “Peter Chaadaev” (1915). The Russian philosopher’s journey to the West and his independent decision to return home is reinterpreted as a paradigm of moral commitment for future Russian thinkers and writers. His vibrant self-image of the “raznochinets-author” (the raznochintsi were 19th-century Russian intellectuals who were not of noble origin) grows out of Chaadaev’s ideal of his “sacred obligation” to express Russia’s legacy of moral freedom.

If the early essays focus on the basic aesthetic and cultural vision of Acmeism, the poetics of cultural continuity and memory, and the expression of poetic freedom, those of the early 1920s raise the central question of the poet’s relationship to the new Soviet age: the complexity of allegiance to the Revolution without sacrificing moral conscience and humanistic values. For example, “Slovo i kul’tura” (1921; “Word and Culture”) seeks to redefine the role of culture in the new Soviet State, emphasizing its dependence on the “sacred power of the word.” “Culture has become the church” and “cultural values ornament the State, endowing it with color, form, and if you will, gender.” “O prirode slova” (1922; “On the Nature of the Word”), a paean to the Russian language, endeavors to synthesize the basic tenets of Acmeism with a broader, more metaphysically-oriented aesthetic vision, simultaneously broadening the role of civic and moral obligation. “Buria i natisk” (1923; “Storm and Stress”) seeks to redefine the relationship between the culture of the recent past and the present, symbolism and futurism, by “knitting together the spines of two poetic systems, two poetic epochs.”

Mandel’shtam is at his finest when his logic is discursive and indirect, his ideas correlated through rich and striking images rather than predetermined by patterns of logical subordination. A powerful interpretive design challenging the reader to rethink conventional concepts and prescribed paths grows out of his active engagement in the critical discourse of his argument and the seductive literariness of metaphor. For example, “Humanizm i sovremennost’” (1923; “Humanism and the Present”) offers a conception of the ideal society, a new “social Gothic,” which turns out to have the same structure as an ideal building or poem. An optimistic view of the Revolution is implicit in this ideal: just as the stone or the word must maintain and fulfill its individual creative self, so it must be a part of a collective “we,” a social architecture, to best realize its potential. However, this vision of harmony is preceded by a prophetic warning: a contrasting cruel and formidable vision of inhumanity in human society, a recollection of epochs when individual life was crushed by the social architecture and treated as insignificant: “Assyrian prisoners swarm like baby chicks under the feet of an enormous king...”

Mandel'shtam's Jewish thematics, which first emerge in the essays in 1926 ("Mikhoels," "Kiev"), are further developed in the 1930s in association with the image of the outsider, the "raznochinets-writer." Mikhoels, the spirit of Judaism, is described as "All the power of Judaism, all the rhythm of abstract ideas in dance...whose single motive is compassion for the earth—all this extends into the trembling of the hands, the vibration of the thinking fingers, animated like articulated speech."

The essays of the 1930s dramatically transform the view of the poet's place in society. Nadezhda Mandel'shtam, the poet's widow, credited his unpublishable jeremiad, "Chetvertaia proza" (wr. 1919–30; "Fourth Prose"), with returning the poet to health, reconfirming his faith in his creative powers, reasserting his demands for intellectual freedom, and paving the way for the verse of the Voronezhskie tetradi (wr. 1930–37; Voronezh notebooks) and the prose of "Puteshestvie v Armeniiu" (wr. 1930–32.; "Journey to Armenia") and Razgovor o Dante (wr. 1933; "Conversation About Dante"). "Fourth Prose" gave new force to the self-image of the outsider and outcast as the voice of moral and spiritual freedom. The Jewish pathos and "compassion for the earth" is superimposed on the image of the "raznochinets-writer" and his ideal of moral freedom as "sacred obligation." Envisioning himself carrying his "Jewish staff" to Armenia, "the younger sister of the Jewish nation," as Chaadaev carried his staff to Rome, Mandel'shtam invokes the Mosaic law "Thou shalt not kill!" as his fundamental moral and aesthetic principle, excoriating and exorcising the entire literary establishment as the forces of death and destruction.

His last published essay, "Journey to Armenia," a philosophical travelogue, is simultaneously a hymn to the gift of life and language, the struggle against death, and the grace of spiritual resurrection. Armenia is his metaphor for Mediterranean or world culture and cultural memory.

"Conversation About Dante," Mandel'shtam's unique and intimate tribute to his Florentine mentor as the "first internal raznochinets," culminates his career as an essayist. It is his supreme apologia for poetic freedom and challenge to the establishment. Unpublishable until the mid-1960s, it reiterates and reformulates the poetics of cultural memory and cultural synchrony. Dense metaphors synthesizing physiological and philological essences reinvigorate his style, demonstrating precisely how the poet is "a master of the instruments of poetry" and how an impulse in the mind of the creative artist is realized as living verbal expression.

JANE GARY HARRIS

Biography

Osip Emil'evich Mandel'shtam. Born 15 January 1891 in Warsaw; moved to St. Petersburg as an infant. Studied at the Tenishev Commercial School, St. Petersburg, 1899–1907; studied in Paris, 1907–08; University of Heidelberg, 1909–10; attended meetings of Viacheslav Ivanov's Bashnia (Tower) group and the St. Petersburg Society of Philosophy; enrolled at the University of St. Petersburg; never graduated. First poems published, 1910; joined the Guild of Poets, 1911. Married Nadezhda Iakovlevna Khazina, 1922. Translated Petrarch, Henri Barbier, Jules Romains, Old French literature, and other works. Traveled to Georgia and Armenia, April–November 1930. Moved to Moscow, December 1930. Lived in Koktebel', Summer 1933. Arrested twice: first for writing a poem critical of Stalin, May 1934: sentence of hard labor commuted to exile in Cherdyn and later Voronezh, ending 1937; second arrest for "counterrevolutionary activities," May 1938: sentenced to five years in a labor camp. Died in a transit camp at Vtoraia rechka, near Vladivostock, 27 December 1938 (official date on certificate).

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

O poezii (On poetry), 1918

Prose, edited and translated by Clarence Brown, 1965; revised editions, 1967, and as The Noise of Time and Other Prose Pieces, 1986

Razgovor o Dante, edited by A.A.Morozov, 1967; as "Conversation About Dante," translated by Jane Gary Harris, in The Complete Critical Prose and Letters, 1979

Selected Essays, edited and translated by Sidney Monas, 1977

The Complete Critical Prose and Letters, edited by Jane Gary Harris, translated by Harris and Constance Link, 1979; as The Collected Critical Prose and Letters, 1991

Slovo i kul'tura: O poezii; Razgovor o Dante; Stat'i, retsenzii (Word and culture; On poetry; Conversation about Dante; articles, reviews) edited by S.Vasilenko, lu. Freidin, and P.Nerler, 1987

Stikhotvoreniia; Perevody; Ocherki; Stat'i (Poetry; translations; essays; articles), 1990

Chevertaia proza; Ocherki, sbornik (Fourth prose; essays; notebook), 1991

Other writings: several collections of poetry and five notebooks of poems unpublished during his lifetime.

Collected works editions: Sobranie sochinenii, edited by Gleb Struve and Boris Filippov, 1955, and in 4 vols., 1967–81; vol. 1 revised, 1967; vol. 2 revised, 1971; Sochineniia, edited by P.M.Nerler, 2 vols., 1990; Sobranie sochinenii, 4 vols., 1993–94.

Further Reading

Brown, Clarence, Osip Mandelstam, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1973

Cavanagh, Clare, Osip Mandelstam and the Modernist Creation of Tradition, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1995

Freidin, Gregory, A Coat of Many Colors: Osip Mandelstam and His Mythologies of Self-Presentation, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1987

Harris, Jane Gary, Osip Mandelstam, Boston: Twayne, 1988

Levin, lu. I., "Zametki k Razgovor o Dante O.Mandel'shtama," International Journal of Linguistics and Poetics 15 (1972.)

Mandel'shtam, Nadezhda, Hope Against Hope: A Memoir, New York: Atheneum, 1970; London: Harvill Press, 1971

Mandel'shtam, Nadezhda, Hope Abandoned, New York: Atheneum, and London: Harvill Press, 1974

Mandel'shtam, Nadezhda, Kniga tret'ia, Paris: YMCA Press, 1987

O.E.Mandel'shtam, "I ty, Moskva, sestra moia, legka..." Stikhi, proza, vospominaniia, materialy k biografii: Venok Mandel'shtamu, Moscow: Moskovskii Rabochii, 1990

- Osip Mandel'shtam: K 100-letiiu so dnia rozhdeniia: Poetika i tekstologii: Materialy nauchnoi konferentsii 27–29 dekabria 1991 g.*, Moscow: Gnosis, 1992
- Poilak, Nancy, Mandelstam the Reader, Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1995
- Ronen, Omry, An Approach to Mandelstam, Jerusalem: Magnes Press, 1983
- Ronen, Omry, "O 'russkom golose' Osipa Mandel'shtama," in Tynianovskii sbornik: Piatye Tynianovskie chteniia, Riga: Zinatne, 1994
- Shtempel', N.E., "Mandel'shtam v Voronezhe," Novyi Mir 10 (1987): 207–34
- Slovo i sud'ba: Osip Mandel'shtam: Issledovaniia i materialy*, edited by P.Nerler and others, Moscow: Nauka, 1991
- Stoletie Mandel'shtama: Materialy simpoziuma: Mandel'shtam Centenary Conference (SEES, London 1991)*, edited by Robin Aizlewood and Diana Myers, Tenafly, New Jersey: Hermitage Press, 1994
- Zhizn' i tvorchestvo O.E.Mandel'shtama*, edited by O.G. Lasunskii and others, Voronezh: Izd. Voronezhskogo Universiteta, 1990

Mann, Heinrich

German, 1871–1950

Like his more famous younger brother Thomas Mann, Heinrich Mann all his life accompanied his creative writing with the writing of essays. But unlike Thomas, Heinrich divided his interests roughly equally between literary-cultural essays and essays in which not only is a political viewpoint presented, but politics becomes the central theme. While Thomas remained firmly planted in the Germanic world, and found his materials primarily in the traditions of Weimar classicism (Goethe, Schiller), Romanticism, and the 19th century, Heinrich Mann's interests were cosmopolitan, oriented toward Western Europe, and especially toward France as the greatest exponent of Enlightenment and the liberal, later also socialist tradition. It is essential to understand this background when considering much of his essay output.

A second, even more crucial precondition for understanding these writings is an acquaintance with German history. Mann was an astute observer of sociopolitical as well as cultural and intellectual developments, a fearless polemicist, and a tireless activist. Over the span of his career, he moved from moderately conservative middle-class opinions to a strong commitment to democracy and various forms of socialism, even communism.

None of this is evident, however, in Mann's earliest essays, written between 1897 and 1904, though the pieces concerned with literature already show a preference for French writers. The 33 articles Mann wrote for the journal Das zwanzigste Jahrhundert (The 20th century) are surprisingly conservative and anti-Semitic, voiced in language closer to later Nazi polemics than to socialist humanism.

It is in the period between 1904 and the outbreak of World War I that a profound change in perspective in Mann's writing can be observed. Mann's transition to a strongly republican viewpoint is inspired partly, beginning in 1905, by his reading of Rousseau.

In Eine Freundschaft: Gustave Flaubert und George Sand (1905; A friendship: Gustave Flaubert and George Sand) Mann begins his critique of bourgeois society, and initiates his series of positive examples of socially and morally engaged writers. “Französischer Geist” (1910; The spirit of France; later called “Goethe-Voltaire”) draws a contrast between an Enlightenment France and a regressive Germany, a distinction that will become a constant in his essays. In “Geist und Tat” (1911; Spirit and action), a first high point in his essay oeuvre, Mann compares the dynamism, engagement, and moral standpoint of French literature represented by Voltaire, Rousseau, and Zola with the unpolitical, powerless, regressive literature of Germany exemplified by Nietzsche, Goethe, Hofmannsthal, Rilke, and George. The essay had an immediate impact on the expressionists, at the time the most important group of progressive young writers, who read “Geist und Tat” as a call to arms against the prevalent ivory-tower mentality and politically compromised position of most writers. Mann became the most influential voice for a socially and politically engaged literature.

The outbreak of World War I confirmed what Mann had been warning against; the enthusiasm with which many people greeted the war in fact led to his most polemical writings about German culture in general, and the role of its writers in particular. It inspired Mann to write yet another defense of French over German values, “Zola” (1915), considered by many critics to be the most powerful of his essays. Using the earlier French period as a foil for present-day German conditions, Mann also indirectly attacks the exploitative attitudes of capitalists and industrialists which have led to the war. The essay caused a temporary rupture between the brothers Mann, since Thomas, who had written in defense of the war, felt personally attacked. Ultimately more important in this quarrel was the debate about the definition of the role of the modern writer; Thomas’ denigrating term “Zivilisationsliterat” (cultural journalist) applied to his brother was soon worn as a badge of honor by Heinrich.

The ambivalent end of the war and the revolution of 1918 by necessity dictated that Heinrich would continue writing about political events. In a series of essays, collected in 1919 as Macht und Mensch (Power and the individual), Mann came out in defense of the fledgling Weimar Republic, in favor of socialism, and against what could soon be seen as restorative forces. Essays such as “Kaiserreich und Republik” (1919; Empire and republic) provide an analysis of the vanished empire in the light of idealist-utopian goals incorporated in the new constitution. Mann pleads for an end to class distinctions and capitalism, unfortunately making clear that he does not understand the complexities of the political situation; when it finally dawns on him that the restoration has already begun, his skepticism and despair become tangible in his essays. Thus, in the collection Diktatur der Vernunft (1923; The dictatorship of reason), Mann refers to the radicalism of both left and right (“Tragische Jugend” [1922; Tragic youth]), and rehearses the glaring contradictions of capitalism, the loss of freedom of the individual, and the fatal loss of faith in the possibility of democracy. Mann floats the idea of a “front of the people” against the forces of capitalism, and in an open letter to President Stresemann pleads for a “dictatorship of reason.” Increasingly skeptical about conditions within Germany, he begins, partly inspired by his friendship with Felix Bertaux, to see in the cooperation between France and Germany the core of a new United States of Europe, the last possibility for peace and progress.

This period is characterized by a great variety in types of essayistic writings, from articles on major French authors such as Hugo, France, and Stendhal in the collection Geist und Tat: Franzosen 1780–1930 (1931; Spirit and action: Frenchmen 1780–1930) to a large number of pieces for the newspaper La Depeche de Toulouse (The Toulouse daily). Other political as well as cultural essays of this period were collected in Sieben Jahre (1929; Seven years), Die geistige Lage (1932; The intellectual situation), and Das öffentliche Leben (1932; Public life). In this period Mann became increasingly interested in popular culture as a counterweight to the elitist tendencies he observed around him.

Such considerations were of course overshadowed shortly by the growing power of National Socialism, which in 1933 led to his exile, first in France, then in the United States. Essays concerned with the struggles against fascism, written between 1932 and 1940, such as “Rüstung” (1932; Armament), “Die deutsche Entscheidung” (1932; The German decision), and “Hitler ist nicht Deutschland” (1932; Hitler is not Germany), appeared mostly in exile journals, but especially in Klaus Mann’s Die Sammlung (The collection), published in Amsterdam. Perhaps the most important collection from this period, Der Hass (1933; Hatred), sets out to show how the cultivation of hatred as perpetrated by the Nazis must inevitably lead to the demise of civilization. Mann does not merely write polemical attacks on his enemies, however, but looks already beyond this phase in German history, and toward spiritual renewal.

Like many others, Mann was preoccupied by the question of guilt after World War II, writing about it in essays such as “Deutsche Schuld und Unschuld” (1943; German guilt or innocence), “Über Schuld und Erziehung” (1944; About guilt and education), and “Über den Widerstand” (1945; About the Resistance). “Lehren der deutsche Geschichte” (1949; Lessons of German history) and “Verfassung und reale Demokratie” (1947; Constitution and true democracy) reveal Mann’s concern about the future of Germany. He was still involved with these questions when he debated a possible return to Germany: he was inclined to make East Germany his home, but his death on 12 March 1950 made a decision irrelevant.

Mann brought to the essay form some interesting personal elements. In his early essays, novelistic techniques are employed to enliven and dramatize the content; a typical example is the “Zola” essay. On other occasions his tone is factual, understated, even cool. The intellectual can always be felt, especially where an analysis of social or political dimensions is involved. On the other hand, he is never without passion where his convictions are concerned, and he often employs various forms of satire, from gentle to biting—as he does in his novels and novellas—to make his point. In collections such as Der Hass he excels at the quickly drawn portrait (in this case of prominent Nazis), whereas a distinctive rhetorical tone becomes audible in those essays which present arguments closest to his heart: those defending the ideals of the Enlightenment against all forms of obscurantism. Mann’s range of writing is wide, the style always lively. The greatest impediment to its becoming more widely known is most likely its constant recourse to contemporary events and personalities not necessarily familiar to contemporary English-speaking readers.

AUGUSTINUS P.DIERICK

Biography

Luiz Heinrich Mann. Brother of the writer Thomas Mann. Born 27 March 1871 in Liibeck. Studied at a private preparatory school, Liibeck, until 1889; worked for a bookseller in Dresden, 1889–91, and a publisher in Berlin, 1891–92. Contracted tuberculosis and stayed in a sanatorium in Switzerland. Moved to Munich, 1894. Editor, Das zwanzigste Jahrhundert, 1894. Lived in France and Italy, 1895–96. Married Marie (Mimi) Kanová, 1914 (divorced, 1930): one daughter. Lecturer and journalist during the 1920s. Chair, Volksverband für Filmkunst, Berlin, 1928; president of literary section, Prussian Academy of the Arts, 1931–33 (dismissed). Fled to France to escape the Nazi regime, 1933, and deprived of German citizenship; became a Czech citizen, 1936. Married Nelly Kroeger, 1939 (committed suicide, 1944). Moved to the United States, living in Los Angeles, 1940–49; writer, Warner Brothers film studios, Hollywood, 1940–41. Appointed president of the Academy of Arts, German Democratic Republic, Berlin, 1949. Awards: German Democratic Republic National Prize, 1949. Died (of a heart attack) in Santa Monica, 12 March 1950.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Eine Freundschaft: Gustave Flaubert und George Sand, 1905

Macht und Mensch, 1919

Diktatur der Vernunft: Reden und Aufsätze, 1923

Sieben Jahre: Chronik der Gedanken und Vorgänge, 1929

Geist und Tat: Franzosen, 1780–1930, 1931

Die geistige Lage, 1932

Das öffentliche Leben, 1932.

Das Bekenntnis zum Übernationalen, 1933

Der Hass: Deutsche Zeitgeschichte, 1933

Der Sinn dieser Emigration, 1934

Mut, 1939

Ein Zeitalter wird besichtigt, 1945

Politische Essays, edited by Hans Magnus Enzensberger, 1968

Verteidigung der Kultur: Antifaschistische Streitschriften und Essays, 1971

Other writings: many novels (including Professor Unrat [The Blue Angel], 1905; Der Untertan [The Patriot], 1918), plays, and correspondence.

Collected works editions: Gesammelte Werke, edited by Alfred Kantorowicz and Sigrid Anger, 18 vols., 1965–88 (in progress); Gesammelte Werke, 4 vols., 1969–71.

Bibliographies

Birr, Ewald, Heinrich Mann, Berlin: Stadtbibliothek, 1971

Zenker, Edith, Heinrich-Mann-Bibliographie: Werke, Berlin and Weimar: Aufbau, 1967

Further Reading

- Banuls, Andrè, Heinrich Mann: Le Poète et la politique, Paris: Klincksieck, 1966
- Bornebusch, Herbert, "Schreiben für die Republik: Zu Heinrich Manns Essay 'Kaiserreich und Republik'," Neophilologus 65 (1981)
- Ebersbach, Volker, Heinrich Mann: Leben, Werk, Wirken, Frankfurt-on-Main: Roderberg, 1978
- Exner, Richard, "Die Essayistik Heinrich Manns: Autor und Thematik," Symposium 13, no. 2 (1959)
- Gockel, Heinz, "Heinrich Mann: Das Engagement des Essayisten," in Heinrich Mann: Sein Werk in der Weimarer Republik, edited by Helmut Koopmann and Peter-Paul Schneider, Frankfurt-on-Main: Klostermann, 1983
- Haupt, Jürgen, "Zur Wirkungsgeschichte des Zivilisationsliteraten: Heinrich Mann und der Expressionismus," Neue deutsche Hefte 24 (1977)
- Kammnitzer, Heinz, "Essays im Exil," Neue deutsche Literatur 8, no. 3 (1960)
- Kantorowicz, Alfred, "'Zola'-Essay—'Betrachtungen eines Unpolitischen': Die paradigmatische Auseinandersetzung zwischen Heinrich und Thomas Mann," Geschichte in Wissenschaft und Unterricht n, no. 5 (1960)
- Morchen, Helmut, Schriftsteller in der Massengesellschaft: Zur politischen Essayistik und Publizistik Heinrich und Thomas Manns, Kurt Tucholskys und Ernst Jiingers während der zwanziger Jahre, Stuttgart: Metzler, 1973
- Müller, Joachim, "Die kulturpolitische Position des Essayisten Heinrich Mann," Wissenschaftliche Zeitschrift der Friedrich-Schiller-Universität Jena: Gesellschafts- und sprachwissenschaftliche Reihe 23 (1974)
- Roberts, Davis, "Heinrich Mann and the Essay," Jahrbuch für internationale Germanistik 8 (1976)
- Vanhelleputte, Michel, "L'Essai de Heinrich Mann sur Zola," Revue des Langues Vivantes 29 (1963)
- Wittig, Roland, Die Versuchung der Macht: Essayistik und Publizistik Heinrich Manns im französischen Exil, Frankfurt-on-Main: Lang, 1976
- Wolff, Rudolf, editor, Heinrich Mann: Werk und Wirkung, Bonn: Bouvier, 1984
- Wolff, Rudolf, editor, Heinrich Mann: Das essayistische Werk, Bonn: Bouvier, 1986

Mann, Thomas

German, 1875–1955

Thomas Mann was a prolific essayist, but hardly a great one. Given the prominence which discursive characters and narrators enjoy in his fiction, it is not surprising that throughout his long creative life he published essays in propria persona, sometimes on his own initiative, more often in response to invitations and commissions. These writings have never won the degree of recognition achieved by his imaginative works, for two main reasons.

The first is the prodigious self-centeredness of his imagination and intellect. Mann had an astonishingly limited set of basic preoccupations, rooted in his personal experience as a pathologically insecure, crypto-homosexual artist, hopelessly enamored of the professional solidity, social forms, and material comforts of the haute bourgeoisie. In his novels and stories, historical and social materials that had initially attracted him as allegorical vehicles for his idiosyncratic interests gained a density and momentum of their own as he wove them into narrative. The movement of his creative imagination was expansive: though the initial impetus always came from that narrow range of intimate concerns, the finished fictions engaged him, and have continued to engage readers across the globe, in worlds much broader and richer than his private preoccupations. When Mann took up the pen as an essayist, however, the movement tended to be in the opposite direction. He might indeed start with a subject at some remove from his private concerns; but inexorably, and sometimes with almost embarrassing swiftness, he managed to ignore or slough off all aspects of his theme which were not amenable to being used, or misused, as vehicles for his egregious lifelong fascination with his own problematic identity.

The second impediment to achievement as an essayist is embedded in the German cultural tradition itself. As a result of complex social and political pressures, German intellectual discourse since the Enlightenment has been marked by a cult of earnestness, which starved it of two of the chief nutrients on which the essay form thrived elsewhere: urbane wit and evenly matched polemic. Perhaps the most revealing of all Mann's essays is one he labored at during the first decade of the century, but never managed to finish, for which his working title was Geist und Kunst. Kunst, of course, means "art"; but the first word (meant here to be the antithesis of Kunst) revealingly resists simple translation. In English, Geist means "spirit" or "mind" or "wit"; in French it is, apparently more straightforwardly, esprit. But where for a French essayist, displaying esprit unproblematically involves showing both penetration and agility of mind, a German writer with too light a touch has scant chance of being taken seriously. Mann's working notes for the Geist und Kunst project show him wrestling uncomfortably and, as always, self-consciously, with the notion that any intellectual dimension in a writer, whether visible in wit, analysis, or simple discursiveness, jeopardizes true artistic achievement. The writer who is in thrall to Geist, according to one strand in Mann's tangled drafts, is condemned to be a mere Schriftsteller, a scribbler who is doubtless entertaining to the trivial-minded, but who is debarred from the depths of intuitive insight and heights of national acclaim which belong to the Kunstler unviolated by Geist. Mann was unusual in his time and place, not for entertaining this line of thought, but for being uneasy enough about it to be unable to carry his essay through to completion. For most of Mann's German contemporaries, writing that even gestured toward the ambience of French cultural urbanity belonged in a compartment signaled as suspiciously alien by the adoption of the word feuilleton to label it; and when Hermann Hesse, in Das Glasperlenspiel (1943; The Glass Bead Game), sought for a term to epitomize the alleged intellectual and moral triviality of 20th-century European culture, he chose "das feuilletonistische Zeitalter," the Age of the Feuilleton or, as we might not too audaciously gloss it, the Era of the Essay.

The other distinctive dimension of the essay in other European countries and in America, its role in shaping opinion and policy through polemical exchange, was also impeded by distinctively German factors. There have been essay writers of great polemical gusto and talent in the German tradition: among others, Lessing, Heine, Nietzsche, and (in Austria) Karl Kraus; but they were unable to foster a genuine polemical tradition, partly because they lacked opponents able to engage with them on their own level, but more seriously because there was no real culture of public argument to give such exchanges a significant context. Until after World War II, the notion that open debate on issues of central importance between opposing parties united in a common wish to advance the public good is a sign of political health was alien to most Germans. What passed for polemic was more often malicious denunciation designed to have the opponent silenced by the powers that be; and responses to polemical attacks frequently took the form, not of telling counter-arguments, but of effusive and self-pitying indignation. Such writings justly perish with their immediate occasions.

A preponderance of indignation over argument is unfortunately all too visible in the complex of essays which Mann wrote in response to World War I, above all in the rambling Betrachtungen eines Unpolitischen (1918; Reflections of a Nonpolitical Man), where he belabors the contrast between Germanic “culture” and the decadent, commercial, technocratic “civilization” of the Western Allies. Even after Mann’s dramatic renunciation of reactionary politics, first proclaimed in “Von deutscher Republik” (1922; “The German Republic”), his political writings in defense of democracy and what he calls “humanity” are generally heavily laden with bien pensant rhetoric and rather short on clarity of analysis or subtlety of argument (which is not to belittle the singular importance of his public stand against Hitler as a political phenomenon in its own right, quite independent of the literary quality of the writings that expressed it). He wrote lengthy pieces on his intellectual and artistic mentors: Schopenhauer—“Schopenhauer” (1938); Wagner—“Leiden und Grosse Richard Wagners” (1933; “Sufferings and Greatness of Richard Wagner”); and above all Nietzsche—“Nietzsches Philosophie im Lichte unserer Erfahrung” (1947; “Nietzsche’s Philosophy in the Light of Recent History”); and in his later years he liked to bring a simplified version of the ideas of Freud to bear upon his main concerns—“Die Stellung Freuds in der modernen Geistesgeschichte” (1929; “Freud’s Position in the History of Modern Thought”), “Freud und die Zukunft” (1936; “Freud and the Future”). His sustained attempts to live out what he called an imitatio Goethe were also partly conducted through a series of essays reinterpreting Goethe’s life in Mann’s own image—“Goethe und Tolstoi” (1925; “Goethe and Tolstoy”), “Goethes Laufbahn als Schriftsteller” (1932; “Goethe’s Career as a Man of Letters”), “Goethe und die Demokratie” (1949; “Goethe and Democracy”). Sadly, there is little in these writings that could be unreservedly recommended to someone seeking enlightenment about their ostensible subject matter. They provide ample insights into how Mann’s imagination worked, but they do so largely because they fail to meet broader expectations about what essays with titles like these should offer.

MICHAEL BEDDOW

Biography

Paul Thomas Mann. Brother of the writer Heinrich Mann. Born 6 June 1875 in Liibeck. Studied at a gymnasium in Liibeck, 1899–94. Worked for an insurance company, Munich, 1894–95; military service, 1898–99. Married Katja Pringsheim, 1905: three daughters and three sons. Forced into exile by the Nazi regime, 1933, living in Switzerland, 1933–38; deprived of German citizenship, 1936; lived in Princeton, New Jersey, 1938–40, Santa Monica, California, 1940–51, and Kilchberg, Switzerland, 1952–55; became an American citizen, 1944. Awards: Bauernfeld Prize, 1904; Nobel Prize for Literature, 1929; Goethe Prize, 1949; Feltrinelli Prize, 1952; honorary degrees from many American and European universities. Died in Zurich, 12 August 1955.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Friedrich und die grosse Koalition, 1915

Betrachtungen eines Unpolitischen, 1918; as Reflections of a Nonpolitical Man, translated by Walter D. Morris, 1983

Rede und Antwort: Gesammelte Abhandlungen und kleine Aufsätze, 1922

Bemühungen: Neue Folge der Gesammelten Abhandlungen und kleinen Aufsätze, 1925
Three Essays, translated by H.T.Lowe-Porter, 1929

Die Forderung des Tages: Reden und Aufsätze aus den Jahren, 1925–1929, 1930

Past Masters and Other Papers, translated by H.T.Lowe-Porter, 1933

Leiden und Grösse der Meister: Neue Aufsätze, 1935

Freud, Goethe, Wagner, translated by H.T.Lowe-Porter and Rita Matthias-Reil, 1937

Achtung, Europa! Aufsätze zur Zeit, 1938

Dieser Friede, 1938; as This Peace, translated by H.T.Lowe-Porter, 1938

Dieser Krieg, 1940; as This War, translated by Eric Sutton, 1940

Deutsche Hörer! 25 Radiosendungen nach Deutschland (radio broadcasts), 1942; as Listen, Germany! 25 Radio Messages to the German People over the BBC, 1943; enlarged edition, as Deutsche Hörer! 55 Radiosendungen nach Deutschland, 1945

Order of the Day: Political Essays and Speeches of Two Decades, translated by H.T.Lowe-Porter, Agnes E. Meyer, and Eric Sutton, 1942

Adel des Geistes: Sechzehn Versuche zum Problem der Humanität, 1945; enlarged edition, 1956

Essays of Three Decades, translated by H.T.Lowe-Porter, 1947

Neue Studien, 1948

The Thomas Mann Reader, edited by Joseph Warner Angell, 1950

Altes und Neues: Kleine Prosa aus fünf Jahrzehnten, 1953; revised edition, 1956

Versuch über Schiller, 1955

Nachlese: Prosa 1951–1955, 1956

Last Essays, translated by Richard and Clara Winston, Tania and James Stern, and H.T.Lowe-Porter, 1959

Addresses Delivered at the Library of Congress, 1942–1949, 1963

Wagner und unsere Zeit: Aufsätze, Betrachtungen, Briefe (collected writings on Wagner), edited by Erika Mann, 1963; as Pro and Contra Wagner, translated by Allan Blunden, 1985

Das essayistische Werk, edited by Hans Biirgin, 8 vols., 1968

Über deutsche Literatur: Ausgewählte Essays, Reden und Briefe, edited by Gerhard Steiner, 1968

Goethes Laufbahn als Schriftsteller: Zwölf Essays und Reden zu Goethe, 1982

Essays (in German), edited by Hermann Kurzke and Stefan Stachorski, 5 vols., 1993–(in progress)

Other writings: many novels (including Buddenbrooks, 1900; Der Zauberberg [The Magic Mountain], 1924; the Joseph tetralogy, 1933–43; Doktor Faustus, 1947; Bekenntnisse des Hochstaplers Felix Krull [Confessions of Felix Krull, Confidence Man], 1954), novellas (including Der Tod in Venedig [Death in Venice], 1912), diaries, and many volumes of correspondence.

Collected works editions: Gesammelte Werke, 14 vols., 1974; Gesammelte Werke, edited by Peter de Mendelssohn, 13 vols., 1980–90.

Bibliographies

Bürgin, Hans, Das Werk Thomas Manns: Eine Bibliographie, Frankfurt-on-Main: Fischer, 1959

Jonas, Klaus Werner, Fifty Years of Thomas Mann Studies, Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1955

Jonas, Klaus Werner, and Ilse B. Jonas, Thomas Mann Studies, vol. 2, Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1967

Matter, Harry, Die Literatur über Thomas Mann: Eine Bibliographie 1898–1969, 2 vols., Berlin: Aufbau, 1972

Wenzel, Georg, Thomas Manns Briefwerk: Bibliographie gedruckter Briefe aus den Jahren, 1889–1955, Berlin: Akademie, 1969

Further Reading

Exner, Richard, “Zur Essayistik Thomas Manns,” Germanisch-Romanische Monatsschrift 43 (1962):51–78

Koelb, Clayton, editor, Thomas Mann’s “Goethe und Tolstoi”: Notes and Sources, Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1984

Lehnert, Herbert, Nihilismus der Menschenfreundlichkeit: Thomas Manns “Wandlung” und sein Essay “Goethe und Tolstoi”, Frankfurt-on-Main: Klostermann, 1991

Prater, Donald, Thomas Mann: A Life, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1995

Pütz, Peter, editor, Thomas Mann und die Tradition, Frankfurt-on-Main: Athenäum, 1971

Siefken, Hinrich, Thomas Mann: Goethe—“Ideal der Deutschheit”: Wiederholte Spiegelungen 1983–1949, Munich: Fink, 1981

Siefken, Hinrich, “Der Essayist Thomas Mann,” in Text+Kritik: Sonderband Thomas Mann, Munich: Edition Text+Kritik, 1982: 132–47

Reed, Terence J., Thomas Mann: The Use of Tradition, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1974

Marías, Julian

Spanish, 1914–

Spanish essayist and philosopher Julian Marias came of intellectual age in Madrid in a cultural and literary milieu dominated by the philosophical menu and style of José Ortega y Gasset and his school and modulated by the literary canon of the Generation of 1898. He inherited from the former the theoretical premise that the efficacy of truth remains inseparable from aesthetic form and appeal; in the latter he found transtheoretical confirmation of this doctrine, especially in such writers as the novelist and essayist Azorin and the poet Antonio Machado.

Marías describes an essential dimension of this literary doctrine as “page quality,” which he understands not only as sustained stylistic creativity at the most localized and mundane level of discourse, but also as a strict aversion to any form of literary cliché or consensus. At its best this brave reliance on personal resources and the unexploited beauty of ordinary language rises to classic stylistic levels, as in the case of Ortega, Azorin, and Marías himself. Yet even in the flawed prose of the novelist Pío Baroja, Marias finds in the “incorruptible depths” of his personality a radical sincerity which he believes to be the true assurance of abiding literary relevance.

Within this same stylistic and doctrinal canon Marías himself writes with enormous power and apparent ease. Already an established philosophical author by 1951 when a relaxation of governmental censorship allowed him to begin a collateral career as a journalistic essayist, Marías soon gained a large and loyal following in such publications as ABC, El País (The country), Blanco y Negro (White and black), and, subsequently, Buenos Aires’ La Nación. Although the majority of his journalistic articles remain uncollected, scores of his longer philosophical essays appear in such works as Aquí y ahora (1954; Here and now), Ensayos de convivencia (1955; Essays of coexistence), El ofido del pensamiento (1958; Essays of thought), El tiempo que ni vuelve ni tropieza (1964; Time which neither returns nor stumbles), Al margen de estos clásicos (1966; In the margin of these classics), Nuevos ensayos de filosofía (1968; New philosophical essays), and Hispanoamérica (1984). The excellence of his writing has been abundantly recognized with the award of both Spanish and international prizes.

Following the stylistic traditions of the master Spanish essayists, particularly Ortega, whose craft was shaped in the journalistic mold, Marías goes immediately to the heart of a problem and once centered on his theme pursues it with remarkable linguistic economy and grace, successfully blending modern popular themes and metaphors with vast classical erudition. Refreshingly free of postmodernist cant and exhibitionist pedantry, his style has been described by Lafuente Ferrari as “diamond-like” in its clarity and flawless brilliance.

Marías’ essay style and doctrine converge in what he calls “narrative reason,” that is, the notion that insofar as authentic ideas arise from and attach to human life, they also partake of its dynamic movement and internal illumination. Thus a narrative, plot-like quality characterizes his writings. Thematic movement, descriptive imagery, conceptual development, and ultimate human consequence pass before the reader in taut, dialectical sequence. Marías makes no concessions to extraneous abstractions and pomposities, much less to professional jargon and insider language, although he peppers his writings with fascinating aperçus. Deeply convinced of the seriousness of his topic and his methods, he does not slip into the defensive and self-indulgent introspection common to more timid essayists. His stylistic pace is too swift for him to second-guess himself. And yet for all this seriousness of purpose its register is broad enough to accommodate moments of humor, indignation, compassion, and, not infrequently, a fine sense of irony. His essays tend to evoke either enthusiasm or hostility, but almost never, it seems, indifference.

Although the essays of Marías presuppose the seamlessly articulated metaphysical foundation of human life as the “radical reality,” each stands free and comprehensible on its own merits. Indispensable references to the underlying doctrinal base are couched in the language of common sense and contemporary experience. The result is a clear view into the depths of modern philosophical discourse and a cordial invitation to the general reader to join in the intellectual enterprise. For unlike those writers who claim universality but speak to no one in particular, Marías remains obedient to an abiding Spanish instinct by addressing real people in actual time and circumstances. Consequently few things that matter to this age have escaped his notice. With vigorous, crystalline language he has treated human problems and potentialities under such general rubrics as philosophy, ethics, sociology, historiography, technology, literary criticism, art, cinema, politics, and religion.

Perhaps Salvador de Madariaga best sums up Marías’ stylistic qualities, which, as Buffon insisted, are also the man: “In him thought comes to light with such graceful ease that it seems that he is saying nothing new, yet everything is new and felicitous.” As heir and defender of the Generation of 1898 and its successors, Marías takes his place in an illustrious line of philosophers, novelists, poets, and essayists who through their profound and eloquent commentary on the human condition have transformed the Spanish language into a polished instrument of contemporary discourse.

HAROLD RALEY

Biography

Julián Marías Aguilera. Born 17 June 1914 in Valladolid. Studied philosophy under Ortega y Gasset at the University of Madrid, degree in philosophy, 1936, Ph.D., 1951. Served in the Republican forces during the Spanish Civil War. Professor of philosophy, Aula Nueva, Madrid, 1940–48. Married Dolores Franco, 1941 (died, 1977): five sons (one died). Founder, with Ortega y Gasset, Instituto de Humanidades (Institute of the humanities), Madrid, 1948. Traveled widely, from 1951, in Europe and to the United States, Canada, and South America. Lectured in Spain and Latin America, and taught or lectured at various universities in the U.S. Director, Seminario de Estudios de Humanidades (Seminary for studies in the humanities), Madrid, 1960–70. Founder, Cuenta y Razón (Account and reason), magazine of the Fundación de Estudios Sociológicos (Foundation for sociological studies). Elected to the Royal Spanish Academy, 1964. Member of Spanish Parliament, 1977–78. Professor of Spanish philosophy, University of Distance Learning, 1980–84. Awards: several, including John F. Kennedy Prize, 1964; Juan Palomo Prize, 1971; Gulbenkian Essay Award, 1972; Ramón Godó Lallana Prize, 1975–76; León Felipe Prize, 1979; Grand Cross (Argentina); honorary degrees from four universities; officer, Legion of Honor (France).

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Miguel de Unamuno, 1943; as Miguel de Unamuno, translated by Frances M. López-Morillas, 1966

San Anselmo y el insensato y otros estudios de filosofía, 1944

El método histórico de las generaciones, 1949; as Generations: A Historical Method, translated by Harold C. Raley, 1970

Aquí y ahora, 1954

Ensayos de teoría, 1954

Biografía de la filosofía, 1954; as A Biography of Philosophy, translated by Harold C. Raley, 1984

Ensayos de convivencia, 1955

La imagen de la vida humana, 1955; enlarged edition, 1971

Los Estados Unidos en escorzo, 1956; selections as Modos de vivir: Un observador español en los Estados Unidos, edited by Edward R. Mulvihill and Roberto G. Sanchez, 1964; in America in the Fifties and Sixties: Julidn Marías on the United States, edited by Michael Aaron Rockland, translated by Blanche De Puy and Harold C. Raley, 1972

El intelectual y su mundo, 1956

La estructura social: Teoría y método, 1958; as The Structure of Society, translated by Harold C. Raley, 1987

El oficio del pensamiento, 1958

El tiempo que ni vuelve ni tropieza, 1964

Al margen de estos clásicos, 1966

Consideración de Cataluña (articles), 1966

Nuevos ensayos de filosofía, 1968

Análisis de los Estados Unidos, 1968; in America in the Fifties and Sixties: Julidn Marías on the United States, edited by Michael Aaron Rockland, translated by Blanche De Puy and Harold C. Raley, 1972

Antropología metafísica: La estructura empírica de la vida humana, 1970; as Metaphysical Anthropology: The Empirical Structure of Human Life, translated by Frances M. López-Morillas, 1971

Visto y no visto: Crónicas de cine (cinema reviews), 2 vols., 1970

Philosophy as Dramatic Theory, translated by James Parsons, 1971

Sobre Hispanoamérica, 1973; revised edition, as Hispanoamérica, 1984

Literatura y generaciones, 1975

Cervantes clave española, 1990

Other writings: many works on philosophy.

Collected works edition: Obras completas, 10 vols., 1958–82 (incomplete).

Further Reading

- Abellán, José Luis, “De cultura y filosofía española (II): Julián Marías y Manuel Granell,” Insula 287 (1970):10
- Carpintero Capell, Heliodoro, Cinco aventuras españolas: Aranguren, Ayala, Ferrater, Laín, Marías, Madrid: Revista de Occidente, 1968
- Donoso, Antón, Julián Marías, Boston: Twayne, 1982
- Guy, Alain, “Julián Marías,” in his Les Philosophes espagnols d’hier et d’aujourd’hui: Époques et auteurs, Toulouse: Privat, 1956: 330–39
- Henares Martínez, Domingo, Hombre y sociedad en Julián Marías, Albacete: Diputación de Albacete, 1991
- Homenaje a Julián Marías*, Madrid: Espasa-Calpe, 1984
- Raley, Harold, Responsible Vision: The Philosophy of Julián Marías, Clear Creek, Indiana: Arnerican Hispanist, 1980
- Sarmiento, Edward, “The Mind of Julián Marías,” Tablet 197 (30 June 1951):515–17
- Soler Planas, Juan, El pensamiento de Julián Marías, Madrid: Revista de Occidente, 1973
- Vilar, Sergio, “Julián Marías and the Intelligentsia in Spain,” Books Abroad 37 (1963):252–60

Mariátegui, José Carlos

Peruvian, 1894–1930

As both his biography and his bibliography reveal, José Carlos Mariátegui is a genuine product of his time, and now considered one of the most original thinkers of the modern era. Mariátegui represents both branches (political and cultural) of the bifurcated Peruvian thought of the time and historical circumstances in which he lived and worked. He took an active part in the intellectual atmosphere that was shaping the Republic of Peru socially, politically, and culturally. At the national level, both political and cultural spheres meet in Mariátegui’s special interest in indigenous, economic, and literary issues, a convergence masterfully portrayed by means of the essay, the genre for which he is best known. This is clear from reading his most celebrated work, Siete ensayos de interpretación de la realidad peruana (1928; Seven Interpretative Essays on Peruvian Reality), a text which has undergone more than 50 editions and several translations. In this corpus of seven essays, Mariátegui confronts the most important aspects of the Peruvian reality of his time, unearthing the past, unraveling the present, and composing a view of the future, all through his most original assessment of Marxist theory. The titles of these seven essays illustrate his particular perspective: “Esquema de la evolución económica” (“Outline of the Economic Evolution”), “El problema del indio” (“The Problem of the Indian”), “El problema de la tierra” (“The Problem of the Land”), “El proceso de la instrucción pública” (“Public Education”), “El factor religioso” (“The Religious Factor”), “Regionalismo y centralismo” (“Regionalism and Centralism”), and “El proceso de la literatura” (“Literature on Trial”).

Mariátegui’s visionary and active involvement in Peruvian economic, political, and cultural matters—as national and international columnist, and as founder of Amauta, one of Latin America’s most prestigious critical forums—won him the reputation of being the first Marxist thinker of Latin America, as well as one of the most original interpreters of Marxist methodology, particularly as concerns possibilities for a more accurate portrayal of both Peruvian and other Latin American national realities. In this respect, he ranks with other outstanding intellectuals, such as Antonio Gramsci and Georg Lukács.

Mariátegui’s original view of Marxism reflects the influence of the deep religious, mystical, and poetic insights characteristic of the first part of his life, a period mostly spent in poverty and solitary seclusion due to his weak constitution. These insights surface in his view of Marxism as a social revolutionary praxis that cannot rest solely on invariably applied, objective, and scientific precepts, as was originally envisaged by the orthodox line of Soviet Marxism. Mariátegui realized that the application of such a social theory cannot be detached from the particular historical, social, economic, geographical, and cultural circumstances of a given nation. Thus, upon his return from forced exile in Europe in 1923, he came to understand that a “religious factor,” discovered within the popular masses, was part and parcel of “popular” behavior, as exhibited, for example, in such religious events as the Catholic procession. Mariátegui foresaw that if the masses could be imbued with the same mystical, mythical, and unifying fervor as that observed in these public acts, they could equally adopt such fervency in their pursuit of cultural and economic liberation from the feudal system that prevailed after their conquest and colonization by the Spanish crown.

Mariátegui’s attempt to understand and portray Peruvian history and culture through the Marxist screen leads him to envision an indigenous socialism more in accordance with Peruvian historical circumstances, which he rightly perceived as being different from those of either Soviet and European countries, or even from those of other Latin American societies. For instance, he incisively points out that four-fifths of Peru’s population consists of indigenous groups who contribute significantly to the Peruvian economy. Despite this indisputable fact, the indigenous population was not considered politically as a national group. Rather, the Peruvian nation had been viewed as made up mainly of white and Creole descendants of the conquering ruling class. Mariátegui rightly concluded that Peru was indeed constituted by several layered and separately coexisting sociocultural groups. One of these groups was the “modern feudalistic” Creole bourgeoisie, which subsisted mainly on trade with its European counterpart.

Mariátegui pondered the means of re-creating a modern “Tahuantinsuyo” (Peru) and concluded that it could only be accomplished by resorting to the imagination. This is the leading thrust of his famous seven essays, which deal not so much with economic problems as with those of culture, religion, and literature. Not surprisingly, Mariátegui even thought that in order better to portray Peruvian reality, it had to be re-created in the form of a novel—literature, he believed, is a key tool for the elucidation of the social and political reality of a nation. Nevertheless, torn between literary, ideological, and political conceptions, Mariátegui elected the essay as the form that provided him with the space to merge these keen and multifaceted visions.

Finally, Mariátegui's legacy lies in his recognition that Peruvian historical circumstances, more than academic or orthodox theory, demanded the allure of a myth that could initiate the transformation into a socialist society based on the collective and cultural constructs of historical Peru. In this regard, his visions echo those of the Spanish poet Antonio Machado in his realization that the path of a nation is not traced beforehand, but rather must be found within the nation itself. This is tantamount to a utopian project that must be undertaken by the peasantry and working class of Peru together, for, as Mariátegui believed, without them there could be neither vindication nor liberation. This process of re-creation demanded Mariátegui's evolving a language capable of reflecting the new Peru he envisioned. This he endeavors to do by further elaboration of key terms and concepts such as feudalism, peasant socialism, civilization, and revolution as the process of liberation and struggle that must be undertaken by living immersed in a disarticulated society.

Mariátegui's literary conception and essayistic style are understandable given the autodidactic education and journalistic practice that placed him amid everyday sociopolitical and cultural Peruvian reality. From them he derives his free and influential style, divested of academic pretension and affectation. Mariátegui's originality allows us to label him, paraphrasing the Mexican essayist and Nobel Laureate Octavio Paz, "one of our true [Latin American] writers."

CIRO A.SANDOVAL-B.

Biography

Born 14 June 1894 in Moquegua, Peru. Copy boy at age 15, and journalist, from age 18, La Prensa (The press) newspaper, Lima; contributor to various journals, including Varietades (Varieties) and Mundial (Universal); journalist, El tiempo (The times) newspaper, 1918–19; cofounder, Nuestra Época (Our epoch), 1918, and La Razon (Reason), 1919. Traveled to Europe, 1919–23. Married Anna Chiappe, 1921: one son. Returned to Lima, 1923. Lecturer, Gonzalez Prada People's University, and editor of its Claridad (Clarity), from 1923. Became ill partly as a result of overwork, and had leg amputated, 1923. Cofounder of Minerva publishing house, 1925, Amauta left-wing journal, 1926–30, and Labor newspaper, 1928–29. Cofounder, Peruvian Socialist Party, 1928, and Peruvian General Federation of Workers, 1929. Died in Lima, 16 April 1930.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

La escena contemporánea, 1925

Siete ensayos de interpretación de la realidad peruana, 1928; edited by Elizabeth Garrels, 1979; as Seven Interpretative Essays on Peruvian Reality, translated by Marjory Urquidi, 1971

Defensa del Marxismo, la emoción de nuestro tiempo, y otros temas, 1934

El alma nacional y otras estadones del hombre de hoy, 1950

Ensayos escogidos, edited by Anibal Quijano, 1956, and Augusto Salazar Bondy, 1971

Crítica literaria, 1969

Fascismo sudamericano: Los intelectuales y la revolución y otros artículos inéditos (1923–1924), 1975

Páginas literarias, edited by Edmundo Cornejo U., 1978

Invitación a la vida heroica (selection), edited by Alberto Flores Galindo and Ricardo Portocarrero Grados, 1989

Textos básicos (selection), edited by Anibal Quijano, 1991

Other writings: political works, poetry, and two historical plays.

Collected works edition: Ediciones populares de las obras completas, 20 vols., 1959–70.

Further Reading

Aricó, José, editor, Mariátegui y los orígenes del marxismo latinoamericano, Mexico City: Siglo Veintiuno, 1978

Becker, Marc, Mariátegui and Latin American Marxist Theory, Athens: Ohio University Center for International Studies, 1993

Belaúnde, Víctor Andrés, “En torno a los Siete ensayos de José Carlos Mariátegui,” La Realidad Nacional (1980):1–152

Flores Galindo, Alberto, La agonía de Mariátegui, Lima: Descó, 1980

Melis, Antonio, Albert Dessau, and Manfred Kossok, Mariátegui: Tres estudios, Lima: Amauta, 1971

Paz, Octavio, “A Literature of Convergences,” in Convergences: Essays on Art and Literature, San Diego: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, and London: Bloomsbury, 1987

Quijano, Aníbal, Reencuentro y debate: Una introducción a Mariátegui, Lima: Mosca Azul, 1981

Skirius, John, editor, El ensayo hispanoamericano del siglo XX, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1981

Stabb, Martin S., “The New Humanism and the Left,” in his In Quest of Identity: Patterns in the Spanish American Essay of Ideas, 1890–1960, Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1967:102–45

Tord, Luis Enrique, El indio en los ensayistas peruanos, 1848–1948, Lima: Unidas, 1978

Marivaux

French, 1688–1763

Marivaux built his early reputation on novels parodying classical forms and a mock epic in verse. In 1717, at age 30, he began publishing a series of articles in Le Nouveau Mercure de France (The new Mercury of France) entitled Lettres sur les habitants de Paris (Letters on the inhabitants of Paris), inspired by Charles Dufresny’s Amusements sérieux et comiques d’un Siamois (1699; Amusements Serious and Comical) and to a lesser extent by La Bruyère’s Caractères (1688; Characters). Interesting for their portrayal of various aspects of Parisian life, they are even more so for his thoughts on the form he is adopting and for the way in which these reflections foreshadow the mature aesthetic of the essay he will put into practice in his essay masterpiece, Le Spectateur Français (The French spectator). Calling himself a “Théophraste moderne” (a modern Theophrastus) he declares the following traits to be essential to his manner of writing: a great number and variety of subjects; a mixture of the grave and the lighthearted; an ordering of subject matter that depends heavily on chance—for example, beginning with a subject that happens to be at hand, continuing more or less haphazardly, and concluding at whatever point he pleases; a free rein given to his nature as un esprit libertin, that is, one who hates constraint and prefers to follow his fancy and his natural bent; and finally, the freedom to please himself, since he has “no other object in mind than myself.”

An important additional feature emerges from his philosophical reflections, Pensées sur différents sujets (Thoughts on different subjects), published two years later (1719) in the same periodical. This is his concept of “nature’s sublime” as opposed to “man’s sublime,” a distinction with far-reaching implications for all Marivaux’s work, theater and novel as well as essay. He compares the ordering of the various parts of a work to “an indivisible fabric...whose manner of taking shape we do not know, which is produced in us but not by us.” Finished, polished, consciously controlled thought may be sacrificed in this kind of writing, but it is in the interests of something more valuable: thought-in-process, “thought taking shape under our very eyes,” as the great Marivaux scholar, Frédéric Deloffre (1967), describes it. Of all the affinities Marivaux has with Montaigne (some of which are obvious from the traits listed earlier), this power to create the impression of thought-in-themaking is probably the deepest.

From 1721 to 1724 Marivaux published a kind of “oneman periodical journal” in 25 issues or feuilles, each about ten pages long in the modern Garnier editions (1969, 1988), to which he gave the title Le Spectateur Français, honoring Addison’s and Steele’s Spectator, available in French translation since 1714. (The individual essays bear no titles.) His imitation of the Spectator is very free in nature; he uses the work as a springboard for innovation. What he seems to have valued most in the pioneer English essay work was its freedom of form, which encouraged him in his revolt against the hierarchy of genres inherited from 17th-century French classicism and in his propensity to literary experimentation. Once again, as in Le Nouveau Mercure, the element of chance plays a key role in composition. In the first feuille we find this striking self-description of his manner: “I know not how to invent, all I know is how to catch by surprise thoughts that chance causes to arise in me.” The effect of le naturel continues to be faithfully sought by Marivaux, as when he aims to give a portrait truly resembling himself which is at the same time “a portrait of the human mind in its natural form” (a distinct echo of Montaigne). Clarifying a point that remained a bit puzzling in his Lettres sur les habitants de Paris—his relationship with his reader—he affirms on the one hand his intention of writing only for himself and on the other hand his need to engage his reader in a kind of dialogue. Giovanni Bonaccorso (1973) has shown how he provokes the reader, anticipates criticisms, answers critics whose objections to this or that point of his he has heard in salons and cafés—an approach that will also be characteristic of his two great novels, La Vie de Marianne (1731–42; The Life of Marianne) and Le Paysan parvenu (1734–35; The Upstart Peasant).

Abundant variety of matter and apparent randomness of form continue to be dominant features. There is much less sequentiality between issues than in the Spectator, Marivaux's trademark being the sudden interruption and change of subject. The many stories included in the feuilles (Montaigne also was fond of incorporating stories in his essays) are often unresolved or simply unfinished, the better, Marivaux argued, to stimulate the reader to reflect about them. The loose structures, full of fortuitous, unforeseen elements and discontinuities, suggest another important link between Marivaux's essays and his fiction. Whatever the source of his delight in such freedom of form—whether it was his fondness for “the surprises of improvisation” (Jean Rousset, 1962), his view of inconstancy in love (Robert Mauzi, 1960), or simply the coquettish play of author with reader (Felicia Sturzer, 1982; Henri Coulet and Michel Gilot, 1973)—this attitude lies at the heart of his essayist's art, and may be summed up in his remark, “Follow me, dear Reader. To tell the truth, I am not sure where I am going, but the pleasure lies in the journey itself.”

In 1727 Marivaux produced his most unconventional and daring work, another “one-man journal,” L'Indigent Philosophe, in which he uses as alter ego a pauper philosopher, or “philosopher bum,” as Edward Greene (1961) has called him. The work was indeed so bold, in both form and content, that it first appeared anonymously. The seven feuilles comprising it constitute a much more unified and continuous whole than Le Spectateur Français. Presented by the author as a type of “Mémoires,” the work reads, in fact, much like the “memoir-novels” of The Life of Marianne and The Upstart Peasant, except for its much smaller size. But its essayistic qualities are undeniable, as is the influence of Montaigne, greater here than in any of Marivaux's other works. Addison had spoken of the “wildness” of which the essay form was capable (“On Method in Discourse,” Spectator no. 476). In L'Indigent Philosophe Marivaux goes beyond anything Addison might have imagined. In his foreword to the work he describes it as “an essay of what could be done by writing haphazardly whatever might strike the imagination.”

A final one-man journal from Marivaux's pen, Le Cabinet du Philosophe (1734), consisting of n feuilles, adds little that is new to his concept or practice of the essay. He himself called it “detached pieces, fragments of thought on a great variety of subjects.” It is hardly comparable in brilliance to its predecessors, and Greene is probably correct in surmising that Marivaux used the work as a receptacle for leftovers, miscellaneous notes, and the like.

Marivaux ranks among the greatest French and world essayists thanks to the highly personal kind of artful disorder (in reality a new kind of order) that he brought to the essay form as well as the variety and depth of his observations on human society and human nature. He is best known, perhaps, for his insights into the complexities of love, or for what one of his contemporary admirers called “the metaphysics of the heart.” His genre, more precisely, is the feuille périodique or essai journalistique, short prose pieces best read in sequence, since they are not fully independent or autonomous and are not part of any “collections of essays” (the latter, in any case, being a more modern phenomenon). His achievement as an essayist, especially in affirming what he called his “libertinage d'idées” (following his fancy, more or less at random), was one of the fruits (the others being his fictional and theatrical creations) of his rebellion against the French classical aesthetics of the anciens. In the quarrel of Ancients and Moderns raging in his time he was a modern of the extreme avant-garde, challenging unceasingly, as Oscar Haac (1973) has pointed out, the “accepted mold” of literary theory and practice. His innovations embraced linguistic details such as vocabulary and syntax as well as larger forms, and the “disorder” of a sentence or paragraph in a given essay often presents a microcosm of the essay as a whole.

Marivaux’s reputation as an essayist has been slow in establishing itself. The recognition of his genius in this field has more or less coincided with another important discovery: namely, that his total work forms an organic whole made up of three levels or zones of artistic inquiry, closely related and often intersecting, which correspond to the three genres—essay, fiction, theater—in which he excelled. Thus unlike Montaigne, the full-time essayist, or Sainte-Beuve, the essayist out of failure to succeed as poet and novelist, or many writers whose essays were a sideline, Marivaux incorporates the essay into the very heart of his literary enterprise, the exploration of human existence in all its mystery.

RICHARD M.CHADBOURNE

Biography

Pierre Carlet de Chamblain de Marivaux. Born Pierre Carlet, 4 February 1688 in Paris. Family moved to Riom in central France, 1699. Studied at the Faculty of Law, Paris, 1710–13 (moved permanently to Paris in 1712), law degree, 1721. Began writing plays, 1712; first used the name Marivaux c. 1712.; name first published in full, 1716; published and/or produced over 30 comedies during his life. Married Colombe Bollogne, 1717 (died, probably 1723): one daughter. Took up journalism, from 1717, writing sketches for Le Nouveau Mercure de France; published the periodicals Le Spectateur Français, 1721–24, L’Indigent Philosophe, 1727, and Le Cabinet du Philosophe, 1734. Frequented salons, including those of Mesdames de Lambert, de Tencin, Geoffrin, and du Deffand. Lived with Mademoiselle de Jean, from 1744. Elected member, 1743, chancellor, 1750, and director, 1759, French Academy. Died in Paris, 12 February 1763.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Lettres sur les habitants de Paris, in Le Nouveau Mercure de France, September 1717–August 1718

Pensées sur différents sujets, in Le Nouveau Mercure de France, April 1719

Lettres contenant une aventure, in Le Nouveau Mercure de France, December 1719–April 1720

Le Spectateur Français, 25 issues, July 1721–September 1724

L’Indigent Philosophe, 7 issues, 1727

Le Cabinet du Philosophe, 11 issues, January–April 1734

Journaux et osuvres diverses (Garnier Edition), edited by Frédéric Deloffre and Michel Gilot, 1969; revised edition, 1988

Other writings: over 30 comedies and one tragedy, journalism, and fiction (including two memoir-novels, La Vie de Marianne [The Life of Marianne], 11 vols., 1731–42; Le Paysan parvenu [The Upstart Peasant], 5 vols., 1734–35).

Collected works edition: Œuvres complètes, 12 vols, 1781.

Further Reading

Arland, Marcel, Marivaux, Paris: Gallimard, 1950

Badir, Magdy, and Vivien Bosley, editors, Le Triomphe de Marivaux: A Colloquium Commemorating the Tricentenary of the Birth of Marivaux, 1688–1988, Edmonton: University of Alberta Department of Romance Languages, 1989

Baldwin, Edward, "Marivaux's Place in the Development of Character Portrayal," PMLA 27 (1912):168–87

Bonaccorso, Giovanni, "Le Dialogue de Marivaux avec ses lecteurs," Cahiers de l'Association Internationale des Études Françaises 25 (1973):209–23

Chadbourne, Richard, "Marivaux's 'Libertinage d'Idees' in Le Spectateur Français," in Man and Nature/L'Homme et la Nature, edited by Nicholas Hudson and Rosena Davison, Edmonton: Canadian Society for Eighteenth-Century Studies, vol. 8, 1989

Chadbourne, Richard, "Discovering Marivaux the Essayist, or 'How many writers are there in Marivaux?'," in Le Triomphe de Marivaux, edited by Magdy Badir and Vivien Bosley, Edmonton: University of Alberta Department of Romance Languages, 1989

Coulet, Henri, and Michel Gilot, Marivaux, un humanisme expérimental, Paris: Larousse, 1973

Dédeyan, Charles, "Marivaux à l'école d'Addison et de Steele," Annales de l'Université de Paris 25 (1955):5–17

Deloffre, Frédéric, "Etat présent des études sur Marivaux," L'Information Littéraire 16 (1964):191–99

Deloffre, Frédéric, Marivaux et le marivaudage, une preciosité nouvelle, Paris: Colin, 1967

Ehrard, Jean, "Marivaux ou les chemins de la liberté," in his Le XVIIIe Siècle, I: 1720–1750, Paris: Arthaud, 1974

Gelobter, Hanna, "Le Spectateur" von Pierre Marivaux und die englischen moralischen Wochenschriften, Limburg: Limburger Vereinsdruckerei, 1936

Gilot, Michel, Les Journaux de Marivaux: Itinéraire moral et accomplissement esthétique, Paris: Champion, 2 vols., 1975

Greene, Edward, "Marivaux's Philosophical Bum," L'Esprit Createur 1 (1961):190–95

Greene, Edward, Marivaux, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1965

Haac, Oscar A., Marivaux, New York: Twayne, 1973

Jacobée, Pierre, La Persuasion de la charité: Thèmes, formes et structures dans les "Journaux et œuvres diverses de Marivaux", Amsterdam: Rodopi, 1976

Lagrange, Henri, Marivaux et sa fortune littéraire, Bordeaux: Ducros, 1970

Matucci, Mario, in L'opera narrativa di Marivaux, Naples: Pironti, 1962

Mauzi, Robert, "Le Mouvement et la vie de l'âme," in his L'Idée du bonheur dans la littérature et la pensée françaises au XVIIIe siècle, Paris: Colin, 1960

Poulet, Georges, "Marivaux," in his Études sur le temps humain, II: La Distance intérieure, Paris: Plon, 1952

Rousset, Jean, "Marivaux ou la structure du double registre," in his Forme et signification: Essais sur les structures littéraires de Corneille à Claudel, Paris: Corti, 1962.

Roy, Claude, Lire Marivaux, Neuchâtel: La Baconnière, and Paris: Le Seuil, 1947

Sturzer, Felicia, "Exclusion and Coquetterie: First-Person Narrative in Marivaux's 'L'Indigent philosophe'," French Review 54 (1982): 471–77

Markov, Georgi

Bulgarian, 192,9–1978

Georgi Markov began his career as a novelist, playwright, short story and screenplay writer, and literary critic. He was eventually drawn to nonliterary types of essays, such as social and political pamphlets, documentary articles, and reviews, partly by circumstance, partly because of his acute sense of social injustice. The publication of his first novel Muzhe (1962; Men) made him an instant literary star and Communist Party favorite. His later novels and plays, some of which were banned from publication—e.g. Velikiat pokriv (The great roof) and Pokushitelite (The assassins)—marked him, however, as a social iconoclast and political outcast. This alienation led him to defect to England, where he joined the Bulgarian section of the BBC World Service, and also wrote for the German radio station Deutsche Welle (German wave) and broadcast over Radio Free Europe. In these broadcasts he was harshly critical of the communist system. An accomplished literary critic who focused on the Bulgarian National Revival period (a century of growing national awareness between 1762, and 1878), he set out to write both personal essays and social and political commentaries. Following the tradition of his impressive literary predecessors and famous essayists Khristo Botev, Liuben Karavelov, and Pencho Slaveikov, he wrote powerful, heartfelt pamphlets in which he released years of pent-up thoughts and emotions.

Markov's output as a literary critic includes major studies of the Bulgarian poets Dimcho Debelianov and Geo Milev—Dimcho Debelianov: Literaturen ocherk (1962; Dimcho Debelianov: a literary sketch), Geo Milev: Izbrani proizvedenia (1971; Geo Milev: selected works). Both are extensive biographical and literary studies, at once illustrating the predominant form of literary essay of the socialist realism period and representing a significant departure from it. Both were issued by the finest publishers of literary criticism in Bulgaria, Bulgarski Pisatel' (Bulgarian writer) and the Institut za Bulgarska Literatura (Institute for Bulgarian literature at the Bulgarian Academy of Sciences) and exemplify the canon of literary criticism at its best. Markov follows the established model for literary essays of that period, demonstrating how history molds the individual, but he does not stop there. Contrary to some trends in literary criticism of the socialistrealism period, he does not present literary figures as solely the product of their social or historical medium. He does not deny the importance of individual sensibility or damn it as a literary flaw. He retains his professional integrity and moral dignity, treating the more personal side of literary works with understanding and respect. Moreover, he does not ascribe to these writers political aspirations and communist ideals they did not necessarily embrace. His greatest accomplishment in the literary essay remains his adherence to the truth in a society where personal and public history were rewritten to conform to the communist dogma.

Markov's nonliterary essays carry his professional honesty and civil candor to heights unimaginable to most of his contemporaries. In Zadochni reportazhi za Bulgaria (wr. in exile, pub. 1990; Broadcasts about Bulgaria), known in the West as The Truth That Killed (1983), and Kogato chasovnitsite sa spreli: Novi zadochni reportazhi za Bulgaria (wr. in exile, pub. 1991; New broadcasts about Bulgaria), he comes across as a captive sentenced to 40 years of silence who has finally broken loose and regained his right to speak. He confesses it is his "privilege and duty" to tell the world the truth about Bulgaria, that it is a "sovereign republic without sovereignty, a popular democracy without democracy, a country leading a lifeless social existence, numbed by heavyhanded police methods, a country having a faceless literature and crippled art." The two volumes comprise 167 short broadcast essays and include poignant political pamphlets, critical essays, historical surveys, humorous stories, sociological studies, brief portrait sketches, memoirs, and literary anecdotes. They are expressions which pour out the feelings and thoughts of a suffocated author. Form is unimportant, for form, metaphors, symbols, and allegories have come to signify to Markov the communist regime's weapons of deception. He felt it his duty to tell the truth without the usual literary embellishments or Party jargon, simple and unadorned.

In essays in The Truth That Killed—"Partia i rabota" ("The Party and Work"), "Biografia na vlasta" ("A Biography of the Regime"), "Nie te napravihme pisatel" ("We Made You into a Writer"), "Sreshti s Todor Zhivkov" ("Meetings with Todor Zhivkov")—Markov talks about those who parade as genuine believers in the communist utopia. These people humiliate and deprive others of all human rights, surround themselves with sycophants, and are incompetent, cynical, and hypocritical. They demoralize the people and ruin the country's economy. Filled with the sense of their divine invincibility, they go through life following the lifestyle of the world's most corrupt form of ruling autocracy. In essays such as "Porazheniata na kulta" (1984; "The Ravages of the Personality Cult"), "Tsenzurna dialektika" (1984; "The Dialectic of Censorship"), "Zad fasadata na osmi mart" (1990; Behind the facade of Mother's Day), "Prostitutsiata" (1990; Prostitution), "Sled kulturnata revoliutsia" (1990; After the cultural revolution), "Zashto horata kradat" (1990; Why people steal), and "Zhenite na Varshava" (1990; The women of Warsaw), Markov analyzes phenomena such as the paranoid fear of the "enemy," the personality cult, the all-pervasive atmosphere of suspiciousness and apathy, Party patriotism, the system's reliance on self-censorship and informers, the disintegration of family relations and the exploitation of modern woman, the cheating of the country and the robbing of its people. He also depicts ordinary rank-and-file Bulgarians, who have survived hundreds of years of internal and external domination thanks to their common sense, down-to-earth realism, and ability to see through their rulers' hidden agendas. They have also miraculously retained a healing sense of humor, as expressed in essays like "Kiro i drugite" (1984; "Kiro and the Others"), "Da se prezhivee niakak" (1984; "To Endure Somehow"), and "Spasitelniat smiah" (1984; "The Saving Grace of Laughter").

Markov developed a theory of the perversion of language similar to that of George Orwell. He wrote to express his thoughts rather than demonstrate his commitment to the Party. He used words in their original meanings to tell the story of a people subjected to an unprecedented brainwashing through the use of an official "antilanguage," a highly developed and formal language of clichés adopted to misinform and distort the truth. Markov brought the Bulgarian language back to life, restoring its colorful vitality from the deadly kingdom of “black and white.” Once again a voice, kindred to the well-known Bulgarian literary and public figures of the National Revival period, uttered the unthinkable “the king is naked,” toppling from the communist Olympus all fake claims to freedom, independence, equality, and prosperity, as well as the Party’s claim to absolute superiority and historical supremacy over all other forms of government. Markov went much further than the legendary tale: he actually explained in his essays that the king is not only naked, but also ugly and mean.

If Georgi Markov were Russian or Czech, he might be known as one of the best essayists from Eastern Europe. As it is, if he is known at all, it is because he was assassinated with a poisoned umbrella as an exile in London. This fact in itself is a testament to the power and importance of his writing for those who knew it and feared it. Bulgaria’s Alistair Cooke and Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn broadcast his “letters from Bulgaria” in order to disclose the moral perversity of the politics of hate instilled by the communist aparatchniks in Bulgaria. Like Cooke, he reached the hearts and minds of millions of Bulgarians to tell them revealing stories about their country and their rulers. Like Solzhenitsyn, he had to suffer the consequences of his intelligence and moral integrity. And unlike anyone else, he had to pay for his essays with his life.

LILIA SAVOVA

Biography

Georgi Ivanov Markov. Born in 1929 in Sofia. Studied at the Polytechnic, Sofia, 1947–51, qualified as a chemical engineer. Imprisoned for political beliefs, 1950–51. Worked in a metallurgy factory, 1952–59, and as a chemical engineer. Began writing novels and plays. Elected to the Bulgarian Writers’ Union, 1962. Left for Italy after one performance (a preview) of his play The Man Who Was Me, June 1969; moved to England, 1971. Worked for the Bulgarian section of the BBC World Service, broadcasting a weekly column about British cultural life, and for Radio Free Europe, from 1975, and Deutsche Welle. Married Annabel Dilke (third marriage): one daughter. Awards: Bulgarian Literary Prize, for Muzhe^ Edinburgh Festival Award, 1974. Died (after being stabbed with a poisoned umbrella, probably by the Bulgarian secret police) in London, 11 September 1978.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

The Truth That Killed, translated by Liliana Brisby, 1983; as Zadochni reportazhi za Bulgaria, 2 vols., 1990

Kogato chasovnitsite sa spreli: Novi zadochni reportazhi za Bulgaria, 1991

Other writings: three novels (including Muzhe, 1961), a thriller with David Phillips (The Right Honourable Chimp, 1978), plays, and works on Bulgarian literature.

Further Reading

- Moser, Charles A., "Georgi Markov in the 1960s," Slavonic and East European Review 67, no. 3 (July 1989):353–77
- Smolyantisky, Solomon, "For the 70th [sic] Birthday of Georgi Markov: Probing Life," Soviet Literature 4, no. 397 (1981):163–70
- Todorov, Kalin, and Vladimir Bereanu, Koi ubi Georgi Markov, Sofia: Sibiiia, 1991

Martí, José

Cuban, 1853–1895

José Martí's essays reveal a sense of urgency and precariousness appropriate to his brief life. In effect, the main body of his prose—of which some works are still being discovered—was journalistic in nature, targeted for quick publication in newspapers and magazines, although his essays consistently show a higher degree of regard for aesthetic values than typical journalistic work. The remainder—in fact, a large number—is dispersed among numerous letters, personal diaries and notes, other unpublished texts, and in patriotic speeches which were often improvised, then lost forever. In all his essays, regardless of the topic, Martí always reaffirms his anticolonialist, popular, and antiracist beliefs concerning the inherent equality of all human beings notwithstanding their physical differences. As one of his reflections exemplifies in "Mi raza" (1893; My race): "No man has any special right because he belongs to any specific race; just by saying the word man, we have already said all the rights." This statement can no doubt be directly linked with the Christian notion of the value of life; however, Martí's concept of morality does not disclose a religious affiliation; it is constructed of and integrates religious icons, ethics, and historical and social elements.

Martí consolidated his essay activities during the last 15 years of his life in New York (1880–95); starting in 1881 he sent regular contributions to important Spanish American newspapers such as La Opinión Nacional (Caracas) and La Nacion (Buenos Aires). The excellent "Cartas de Nueva York" (Letters from New York)—his account of the American society of that period—is an example of this important work.

When Martí began his career, Spanish prose was lifeless and exhausted. Conscious of and concerned about the sense of beauty and with a fundamental fidelity to his perception of reality, Martí interpreted the essay as a literary genre that favors human causes, often patriotic and nationalistic. Thus, beginning in 1882, and even before the great masters of Spanish American Modernism, his essays display a new style, which ultimately translated into a profound revival of the literary prose of every Spanish-speaking nation. His essays of the early 1880s are free of superfluous baroque traits and anachronistic Romanticism; his prose is direct and agile, rich in content, endowed with power and color, as he defines the character of the ephemeral Revista Venezolana (1881; Venezuelan journal):

“Simplicity as a condition is recommended, but this does not imply the exclusion of an elegant touch.”

Martí's essays cannot be studied as a unified whole since plurality defines his style; there is a constant variation of styles appropriate to circumstances of the writing and to the audience. Thus, in the 1890s political and social influences led to a return to the long and complicated paragraph, and to the verbal exuberance that prevailed in his patriotic speeches to the exiled Cuban community of Tampa, Florida.

Martí's most emotionally expressive essays are about Cuba, its urgent need for freedom and its future problems, which he predicts with some accuracy. Beyond Cuba, as a greater nation, lies Spanish America; facing this region is North America, a source of anxiety and fear. As his devotion to the fight for his country's independence from Spain evolved, Martí identified in his most fundamental essay, Nuestra América (1891; “Our America”), the difference in structure and culture between the two Americas.

From a literary and ideological perspective, Martí can never be considered a subordinate or a mimic, dazzled by the splendor of European and North American culture. It is true that his essays display those intuitive, lyrical, and reflexive freedoms that, since the publication of the Essais by Michel de Montaigne in 1580, identify the essay as a legitimate and independent literary genre. But it is also true that the Spanish American essay assumes a specificity that is rooted in its themes and its pragmatic character. This in turn means that Spanish American essayists focus almost exclusively on the most immediate and pressing problems faced by their societies, as is exemplified by both Martí's writings and his life. The concrete achievement of his essays lies in the originality with which he is able to merge the aesthetic function with sociopolitical concerns in favor of the liberation of his country and “los pobres de la tierra” (the poor of the earth). His essays, although enriched with expressive literary artifacts, do not originate from literature, but from life.

FEDERICO A.CHACHAGUA

Biography

Born 28 January 1853 in Havana. Studied at the Instituto de Havana, 1866–69; University of Madrid, 1873; University of Saragossa, degree in law, 1873, degree in philosophy and letters, 1874. Worked on the underground periodicals El Diablo Cojuelo (The lame devil) and La Patria Libre (The free native land), and arrested for subversion, 1869: sentenced to six years' hard labor, but instead exiled to Spain, 1871; moved to Mexico, 1875. Contributor, Revista Universal (Universal review), 1875–76, and cofounder, Alarcon Society, both in Mexico City. Married Carmen Zayas Bazan, 1876: one son. Taught language and philosophy in Guatemala, 1876–77. Returned to Cuba: worked in a law office, and taught literature at the Liceo de Guanabaco; arrested on suspicion of anti-government activity, and deported again to Spain, 1879. Traveled to the United States, and based in New York, 1880–95; journalist or foreign correspondent for various papers, including the New York Sun, c. 1880, El Partido Liberal (Mexico; The liberal party), La Opinión Nacional (Venezuela), from 1881, La Nacion (Argentina), from 1881, La Republica (Honduras), from 1886, El Economista Americano (New York;

The American economist), 1887, and La Opinión Pública (Uruguay), from 1889. Traveled to Venezuela and founded the Revista Venezolana, Caracas, 1881. Translator, Appleton publishers, New York, from 1882. Contributing editor, La América (New York), from 1883. Consul for Uruguay, New York, 1887–91. North American representative, Free Press Association of Argentina, from 1888. Founding editor, La Edad de Oro (The age of gold) children's magazine, 1889. Spanish teacher, Central High School, New York, 1890. Consul for Argentina and Paraguay, 1890–91, and Paraguay, from 1890. Founder, Liga de Instrucción (League of education), Tampa, Florida, 1891. In his last years deepened his involvement in Cuban revolutionary politics: cofounder, Cuban Revolutionary Party and the Patria (Native land) revolutionary journal, 1892; helped to organize the invasion of Cuba, 1895; named Major General of the Army of Liberation of Cuba. Killed in action, 19 May 1895.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

El presidio político en Cuba, 1871

La república española ante la revolución cubana, 1873

Guatemala, 1878

Artículos desconocidos (1883–84), 1930

The America of José Martí: Selected Writings, translated by Juan de Onís, 1953

Obras escogidas, edited by Rafael Esténger, 1953

Páginas de José Martí, edited by Fryda Schulz de Mantovani, 1963

Martí on the U.S.A., edited and translated by Luis A. Baralt, 1966

Martí, edited by Roberto Fernández Retamar, 1970

Sus mejores páginas, edited by Raimundo Lazo, 1970

Escritos desconocidos, edited by Carlos Ripoll, 1971

Ensayos sobre arte y literatura, edited by Roberto Fernández Retamar, 1972

Nuestra América, edited by Roberto Fernández Retamar, 1974, and Hugo Achugar, 1977

Inside the Monster: Writings on the United States and American Imperialism, edited by Philip S. Foner, translated by Foner, Elinor Randall, and others, 1975

Prosa escogida, edited by José Olivio Jiménez, 1975

Discursos selectos, 1977

On Education: Artides on Educational Theory and Pedagogy, and Writings for Children from the "Age of Gold", edited by Philip S. Foner, translated by Elinor Randall, 1979

Our America: Writings on Latin America and the Struggle for Cuban Independence, edited by Philip S. Foner, translated by Elinor Randall, 1979

On Art and Literature: Critical Writings, edited by Philip S. Foner, translated by Elinor Randall, 1982

Ideario, edited by Cintia Vitier and Fina García Marruz, 1987

Political Parties and Elections in the United States, edited by Philip S. Foner, translated by Elinor Randall, 1989

Ensayos y crónicas, edited by José Olivio Jiménez, 1995

Other writings: poetry, the novel Amistad funesta (1885), a play, stories for children, political works, and correspondence.

Collected works editions: Obras completas, edited by Gonzalo de Quesada y Miranda, 74 vols., 1936–53; Obras completas (Editorial de Ciencia Sociales edition), 27 vols., 1954; Obras completas (Nacional de Cuba edition), 27 vols., 1963–66.

Bibliographies

- Blanch y Blanco, Celestino, Bibliografía martiana (1954–63), Havana: Biblioteca Nacional, Departamento Colección Cubana, 1965
- González, Manuel Pedro, Fuentes para el estudio de José Martí: Ensayo de bibliografía clasificada, Havana: Publicaciones del Ministerio de Educación, 1950
- Peraza Sarausa, Fermín, Bibliografía martiana (1853–1953), Havana: Comisión Nacional de Actos y Ediciones del Centenario, 1954
- Ripoll, Carlos, Índice universal de la obra de José Martí, New York: Torres, 1971
- Ripoll, Carlos, Archivo José Martí: Repertorio Crítico; Medio siglo de estudios martianos, New York: Torres, 1971

Further Reading

- Cárdenas, Eliana, “José Martí y la identidad latinoamericana,” Plural: Revista Cultural de Excelsior 11, no. 5 (1981):16–14
- Fernandez Retamar, Roberto, Introducción a José Martí, Havana: Casa de las Americas, 1978
- Schulman, Iván A., editor, Nuevos asedios al modernismo, Madrid: Taurus, 1987
- Schulman, Iván A., Relecturas martianas: Narración y nación, Amsterdam: Rodopi, 1994
- Terrazas Basante, Marcela, “Nuestra América y la otra América,” Cuadernos Americanos 21 (May-June 1991):137–43
- Urrello, Antonio, Verosimilitud y estrategia textual en el ensayo hispanoamericano, Mexico City: Premiá, 1986

Martín Gaité, Carmen

Spanish, 1915–

Literary criticism, history, translations, adaptations of plays, television scripts, novels, short stories, poetry, and a one-act play: the literary forms Carmen Martín Gaité has cultivated attest to the range of her work. She is prone to blur the boundaries among these different forms, and her essays contain narrative, dramatic, and lyrical elements. The elasticity of the essay genre makes it a particularly suitable vehicle for Martín Gaité’s blending of historical, literary, and linguistic interests. Her writing revolves around a core of abiding preoccupations: problems of communication in life and in literature, the complexity of emotional attachments, and the relationship between past and present. The single most important concern is the search for an interlocutor, or “La búsqueda de interlocutor,” as she entitled a 1966 essay. In it she emphasized the primacy of our need for interlocation, arguing that both speech and writing originate in the desire to break out of our solitude and find an audience for our words. Speaker and writer alike seek to establish and maintain contact with a receptive listener or reader; the writer enjoys the advantage of being able to invent that ideal figure. Given the significance that interlocation holds for Martín Gaité, who is a brilliant and seductive conversationalist, it is no surprise that communication and accessibility are major goals of her essays.

Basic to the familiar essay is a relationship of intimacy between writer and reader, the former seeming to speak directly to the latter. Martín Gaité’s writing frequently resembles speech. The voice heard is that of an intelligent, educated, cultured woman who was 11 when the Spanish Civil War broke out and who lived through the dreariness and repression of the postwar era. Many of her readers also have direct knowledge of that period, and shared experience constitutes a special bond between them and the writer. In Usos amorosos de la postguerra española (1987; Love and courtship customs in postwar Spain), which was awarded the Anagrama Essay Prize, Martín Gaité’s recollections are complemented by extensive research, the result being a personal and carefully documented history that presents in essayistic form material previously elaborated in her novels. Quotations from publications of the time hold up to ridicule the restrictive ideology expressed by the more retrograde elements of society, and irony and humor underscore the absurdity of their moral strictures. Martín Gaité’s gift for satire is evident in thumbnail sketches of Franco’s wife and of Pilar Primo de Rivera, sister of the founder of the Falange and head of its Sección Femenina. Descriptions of the feminine ideal promulgated by the latter, courtship rituals, cinematic fare, and fashions make for a vivid and often poignant picture of what it was like to grow up female in the Spain of the 1940s.

A gendered perspective also informs Desde la ventana: Enfoque femenino de la literatura española (1987; From the window: feminine focus in Spanish literature). Martín Gaité’s reflections on the significance of the window shed light on her own writing. Windows, which allow us to see without being seen, have traditionally been observation points for Spanish women, shut in and away from the world. Martín Gaité ventures the opinion, based on her own experience and her analysis of texts by a number of women, that a literary vocation is often born while standing at a window and longing for liberation and the opportunity to speak one’s mind. Windows, she argues, impose a distinctive focus upon our perceptions and situate us in a concrete reality. Apropos of A Room of One’s Own, Martín Gaité calls attention to the immediacy of Virginia Woolf’s writing, the significance of details, the charm of the humor, and the absence of pedantry, all of which characterize the Spanish author’s writing and contrast with what she terms “the patriarchal methodology of learned men.”

Martín Gaité’s penchant for the unconventional and for transgressing generic boundaries is evident in El cuento de nunca acabar (1983; The never-ending tale), where literary theory is enlivened by personal anecdotes, conversational tone, and confidential manner. The subtitle Apuntes sobre la narración, el amor y la mentira (Notes on narration, love and lies) is reassuring in its suggestion that the book is not a learned treatise but a series of notes jotted down at odd moments. The inclusion of seven prologues hints at the leisurely pace of what is to follow and its digressive structure, but the jottings all bear upon the art of storytelling and are strategically positioned despite their seeming disorder. Like Montaigne, Martín Gaité conceives of the essay as a journey and persuades us that the ultimate destination is secondary to the pleasures encountered along the way. We, the readers, are cast in the role of traveling companions and conversational partners to whom she repeatedly stretches out her hand so as to make contact and invite us to engage in a dialogue with her. In the opening paragraph of El cuento de nunca acabar she compares the process of writing the book to embarking on a voyage along a river swollen by water from various tributaries (her previous works, other journeys, her first readings, youthful visions and desires) and fed by a subaqueous current (the conversations she has heard during her lifetime).

Phillip Lopate reminds us in The Art of the Personal Essay (1994) that the novel and the essay rose together and fed off each other as literary forms, and Martín Gaité relies on novelistic techniques in her essays, telling stories, incorporating dialogue, portraying characters, and painting scenes. The sense of her presence is strong, and yet the “I” that speaks in the essays, however much it may resemble that of the real-life author, draws upon her experiences, and invites identification of the writerly with the historical self, is in fact carefully constructed. The creation of a persona is one more strategy in the game of literature that Martín Gaité plays so well and with such relish. Although she is best known for her fiction, she is also a talented essayist, and this aspect of her writing is gaining increasing critical attention.

KATHLEEN M.GLENN

Biography

Born 8 December 1915 in Salamanca. Studied at the Feminine Institute of Salamanca; University of Salamanca, 1943–48, degree in romance philology, 1948; University of Madrid, doctorate, 1972. Married Rafael Sánchez Ferlosio, 1953 (divorced, 1987): one son and one daughter (both died). Writer-in-residence, University of Virginia, Charlottesville, 1982. Awards: Gijón Prize, 1954; Nadal Prize, 1957; National Prize for Literature, 1978; Anagrama Essay Prize, 1987; Booksellers’ Guild Golden Book Award, 1987; Prince of Asturias Prize, 1988; Castile and Leon Prize for Letters, 1991; National Prize for Spanish Letters, 1994.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Usos amorosos del dieciocho en España, 1972; as Love Customs in 18th-Century Spain, translated by Maria G.Tomsich, 1991

La búsqueda de interlocutor y otras búsquedas, 1973

El cuento de nunca acabar: Apuntes sobre la narración, el amor y la mentira, 1983

Usos amorosos de la postguerra española, 1987

Desde la ventana: Enfoque femenino de la literatura española, 1987

Agua pasada: Artículos, prólogos y discursos, 1993

Other writings: several novels (including El balneario, 1954; Entre visillos [Behind the Curtains], 1958; Ritmo lento, 1963; Retahílas, 1974; El cuarto de atrás [The Back Room], 1978; Nubosidad variable, 1992; La Reina de las Nieves, 1994), short fiction, and books for children.

Further Reading

- Bergmann, Emilie L., "Narrative Theory in the Mother Tongue: Carmen Martín Gaité's El cuento de nunca acabar" in Public Forums, Private Views: Spanish Women Writers and the Essay, forthcoming
- Brown, Joan Lipman, "Carmen Martín Gaité," in Spanish Women Writers: A Bio-Bibliographical Source Book, edited by Linda Gould Levine, Ellen Engelson Marson, and Gloria Feiman Waldman, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1993: 286–95
- El Saffar, Ruth, "Shaping the Chaos: Carmen Martín Gaité and the Never-Ending Tale," International Fiction Review 11, no. 1 (1984):25–30
- Gómez Pérez, Angel Javier, "Pasos en busca de esa soledad"(review of Usos amorosos del dieciocho en España), Nueva Estafeta 42 (May 1982):94–99
- Pérez, Janet, "Spanish Women Writers and the Essay," Siglo XX/20th Century 4 (1986–87):43–54
- Pope, Randolph D., Amy Kaminsky, Andrew Bush, and Ruth El Saffar, "El cuento de nunca acabar: A Critical Dialogue," Revista de Estudios Hispánicos 22 (1988):107–34
- Sullivan, Constance A., "The Boundary-Crossing Essays of Carmen Martín Gaité," in The Politics of the Essay, edited by Ruth-Ellen Boetcher Joeres and Elizabeth Mittman, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1993

Martineau, Harriet

British, 1802–1876

Harriet Martineau's first literary success was a series of fables promoting utilitarian views, Illustrations of Political Economy (1832–34). The notoriety they attracted, particularly the controversy attached to her Malthusian views on family limitation, foreshadowed the pattern of her relationship with the reading public which lasted throughout her career. Like the Illustrations of Political Economy, Martineau's essays are generally motivated by a desire to instruct the reader and call on narrative and anecdotal material to make their points.

Deaf from childhood, she found solace in reading so that, at an early age, she became "a political economist without knowing it, and, at the same time, a sort of walking Concordance of Milton and Shakespeare." Compelled by a fall in the family's finances to earn an income, Martineau rejected urgings to eke out a living by needlework and chose instead "female authorship." Her consciousness of how she was marginalized by her gender and by her deafness, combined with the need to make her writing appeal to the widest possible audience, shaped her writing throughout her career.

One of her most interesting early essays, "Letter to the Deaf" (1834), sets out to advise deaf readers on how best to manage their disability. Although the essay affects to be unconcerned with the reactions “of those who do not belong to our fraternity,” it implicitly encourages the hearing reader to take a more matter-of-fact approach to others’ deafness. She urges the deaf to be as independent as possible and develop an active social life. The essay was seized upon and reprinted as a booklet for deaf readers by various charitable organizations concerned with the welfare of the deaf.

In the seven years following her first literary success Martineau consolidated her reputation with two books on her American travels, and a major novel, Deerbrook (1839). She was forced into retirement from London literary life by five years of illness until her symptoms seemed miraculously relieved by hypnosis. Her illness and dramatic recovery resulted in two important publications. Life in the Sick-Room (1844), a collection of essays which, like “Letter to the Deaf,” was ostensibly addressed to “fellow-sufferers,” examined the psychological aspects of prolonged illness. Letters on Mesmerism (1845) were based on the record she had made of the treatments which had relieved her illness. Martineau submitted the six essays to the Athenaeum in order to counter some of the gossip that had arisen. She was horrified when the Athenaeum appended editorial notes that attempted to discredit mesmerism in general and Martineau’s experiences in particular. The war of words escalated when her brother-in-law, who had acted as her physician, published a pamphlet detailing the gynecological symptoms from which she had suffered and expressing skepticism about the cure. The episode illustrates not only Martineau’s intensely personal approach, but also her willingness to take the risk of finding herself in the midst of virulent controversy.

Throughout her career Martineau continued to write on various aspects of political economy and to provide commentary on the political questions of the day. Her economic views, arguing for laissez-faire conservatism, were formed by her background in a textile manufacturer’s family and endorsed by her early readings in political economy. This led her into conflict with Dickens, whose Household Words articles had been advocating better and safer factory conditions. Martineau weighed in on behalf of the manufacturers with a pamphlet, The Factory Controversy: A Warning Against Meddling Legislation (1855). John Chapman, in refusing the piece for publication in the Westminster Review, warned of her tendency to see factory owners as “a band of enlightened well-wishers.”

On almost every other issue Martineau was progressive as well as outspoken. Her chief opportunity to influence both politicians and the general public came when she began writing leader articles for the Daily News in 1852. During the 14 years she was associated with the paper she wrote over a thousand articles on topical political events as well as broader issues such as women’s rights and the abolition of slavery. She argued for better access to education for all, and for a less class-ridden education system since “our spirit of caste is quite broad enough without being extended into the kingdom of knowledge.” Her 1864 article on the Contagious Diseases Bill (legislation allowing the detention and medical examination of women in military towns on the grounds that they might be prostitutes) launched the campaign against the proposed laws. When the law was finally repealed in 1871, her editor at the Daily News suggested to her that she had “done more than anyone else...to defeat the plan of the military.” From the beginning of her tenure at the Daily News she had used her leaders to discuss women’s legal situation. For example, her columns drew attention to the routine police use of the term “wife-beating,” pointing out that the coining of the term indicated “the present prevalence of the ill usage of wives.”

Martineau’s essays are strikingly personal and direct. Even when writing obituary essays she is often refreshingly acerbic. In failing health and straitened circumstances at the end of her life, she was aided by Daily News staff who collected the obituary essays she had written on notable contemporaries. The resulting book was Biographical Sketches (1869), with its trenchant and vivid portraits of the many friends and foes she had so clearly observed throughout her remarkable career.

Martineau’s polemical positions antagonized a number of her contemporaries such as John Stuart Mill and Dickens, but others held her in high regard. Elizabeth Barrett Browning admired her “lucid and able style,” while George Eliot told one correspondent, “she is a trump—the only English woman that possesses thoroughly the art of writing.”

Although many of Martineau’s essays focus on the political and economic questions particular to her times, she remains one of the most accessible and appealing of 19th-century essayists. Despite the energy with which she promotes her opinions, she is disarmingly frank in her use of the essay as a means of exploration. As she noted at the outset of her career, “There is no education like authorship for ascertaining one’s knowledge and one’s ignorance.”

GILLIAN THOMAS

Biography

Born 12 June 1802 in Norwich. Studied privately and at the Reverend Pery’s school, Norwich, 1813–15. In poor health throughout her life, and began to go deaf at age 12. Supported herself, her mother, and an aunt, first with needlework, then with writing. Contributor to the Monthly Repository Unitarian journal, 1820s. Traveled in the United States, 1834–36. Ill, possibly from a uterine tumor, and went to live near her doctor brother-in-law in Tynemouth, Northumberland, 1839–44: tried mesmerism as a cure, writing about her experience. Moved to Clappersgate, near Ambleside, Westmorland, 1845, where she met William Wordsworth and Matthew Arnold. Traveled to Palestine and Egypt, 1846–47. Contributor to Household Words, late 1840s, the People’s Journal, the London Daily News, 1852–66, and Edinburgh Review, from 1859. Died in Clappersgate, 27 June 1876.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

The Faith as Unfolded by Many Prophets: An Essay Addressed to the Disciples of Mohammed, 1832

Life in the Sick-Room; or, Essays by an Invalid, 1844

Letters on Mesmerism, 1845

Household Education, 1849

Letters on the Laws of Man’s Nature and Development, with Henry George Atkinson, 1851

Letters from Ireland, 1853

Biographical Sketches, 1869; revised edition, 1876

Harriet Martineau in the London Daily News: Selected Contributions, 1852–1866, edited by Elisabeth Sanders Arbuckle, 1994

Other writings: fiction (including the novel Deerbrook, 1839), the didactic tales Illustrations of Political Economy (1832–34), four children's novels, books on a variety of subjects such as travel, politics, and history, and a three-volume autobiography (1877).

Bibliography

Rivlin, J.B., Harriet Martineau: A Bibliography of the Separately Printed Books, New York: New York Public Library, 1946

Further Reading

David, Deirdre, Intellectual Women and Victorian Patriarchy: Harriet Martineau, Elizabeth Barrett Browning, George Eliot, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, and London: Macmillan, 1987

Hoecker-Drysdale, Susan, Harriet Martineau: First Woman Sociologist, Oxford: Berg, 1992

Marks, Patricia, "Harriet Martineau: Fraser's Maid of [Dis] Honour," Victorian Periodicals Review 19 (1986):28–34

Myers, Mitzi, "Unmothered Daughter and Radical Reformer: Harriet Martineau's Career," in The Lost Tradition: Mothers and Daughters in Literature, edited by Cathy N. Davidson and E.M. Broner, New York: Ungar, 1980:70–80

Pichanick, Valerie Kossew, "An Abominable Submission: Harriet Martineau's Views on the Role and Place of Women," Women's Studies 5, no. 1 (1977):13–32.

Pichanick, Valerie Kossew, Harriet Martineau: The Woman and Her Work, 1802–76, Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1980

Thomas, Gillian, Harriet Martineau, Boston: Twayne, 1985

Webb, R.K., Harriet Martineau: A Radical Victorian, London: Heinemann, 1960

Martínez Estrada, Ezequiel

Argentine, 1895–1964

Ezequiel Martínez Estrada came to be the most important Argentine essayist of his generation, but could just as easily have become one of the country's leading poets. He received the active encouragement of Leopoldo Lugones, Argentina's leading modernista poet and a huge literary presence in the country, and subsequently won the Third National Prize for Literature for his poetry collection Nefelibel (1922). His motive for largely giving up poetry and opting for the essay as his definitive genre (he also wrote drama and short stories) can in great part be ascribed to his friendship with the reclusive

Uruguayan writer Horacio Quiroga (one of Spanish America's finest exponents of the short story), which Martínez Estrada himself described in detail in El hermano Quiroga (1957; Brother Quiroga). As a consequence of that relationship, Martínez Estrada began to "write with his right hand," saying that it was Quiroga who "extinguished in me the dying lamp of poetry that had illuminated the dark paths of my youth ... He swept from me the final remnants of a deficient, academic education and [my] ignorant, schoolboyish acceptance of the deceitful opinion of the critics..." Thus the essayist's encounter with Quiroga was an act of self-discovery and a confirmation that the "dark paths of his youth" in fact constituted a personality trait that was to last throughout his life.

In a literary career that comprised some 30 major essays, beginning in 1933 with Radiografía de la pampa (X-Ray of the Pampa), his most famous essay, and ending with his work on the 19th-century Cuban writer Jose Marti, he embarked upon a systematic demolition of Argentina's past and in particular what he saw as the shameful, collaborationist role of the country's writers and intellectuals in the creation and perpetuation of myths that traduced the real nature of Argentina's history and culture. This work, "the Bible of pessimism" as it came to be termed, set him apart from contemporaries such as Eduardo Mallea who, if sharing a sense of the polemical nature of the nation's cultural identity, formulated much less negative conclusions.

X-Ray of the Pampa offered an analysis of the region starting from the earliest colonial times, and ascribed the roots of cultural poverty and a deep spiritual malaise or "neurotic anguish" to the fruitless search for an El Dorado, to the failure to come to terms with the land, and to the development of a mixed Spanish-Indian society. That experience, according to Martínez Estrada, was to leave an indelible mark on the Argentine soul, and from it flowed the engendering of a false society, built as it was upon seriously flawed beginnings. The essay itself was not really an essai—neither the exposition of a reasoned hypothesis nor an implied dialogue with the reader—but rather a relentless deconstruction of Martínez Estrada's contemporary society that left little room for dissent.

The consequences of this position were twofold. First, so stark and unyielding was the essential message of X-Ray of the Pampa that the essayist found himself with few kindred spirits who were willing to share his analysis. Indeed he left few disciples, the most famous being H.A. Murena, whose principal essay El pecado original de América (1954; The Original Sin of America) reveals in its title the affinity with the master. Unlike, say, a Jorge Luis Borges, the greater part of Argentine youth of the day did not flock to Martínez Estrada's lectures and talks in search of direction and inspiration. This in turn led to the second consequence: the engendering in Martínez Estrada of a persecution complex, a conviction that publishers had ostracized him and shunned his work. He was in fact always ready to see himself as a biblical prophet (a modern-day Ezekiel) crying in the wilderness, as it were, of an Argentina that could not and would not heed his message. This conviction would remain with him and was a principal motive in his decision to seek temporary exile in Cuba in the early 1960s.

The irony of all this is that in the almost three decades from X-Ray of the Pampa to his departure for Cuba, Martínez Estrada went on to write (and publish) his best work in Argentina. These titles include Sarmiento (1946), Los invariantes históricos en el "Facundo" (1947; Historical invariables in the Facundo), Muerte y transfiguración de

Martín Fierro (1948; The death and transfiguration of Martin Fierro), and the largely overlooked Diferendas y semejanzas entre los países de la América Latina (1962; Differences and similarities between the countries of Latin America). His chief bibliographer, Carlos Adam, following the essayist's recommendations, organized his writings under "literary," "historico-sociological," and "polemical" headings; examples of each would be Realidad y fantasía en Balzac (1964; Reality and fantasy in Balzac), La cabeza de Goliath (1940; The head of Goliath), and Exhortaciones (1957; Exhortations) respectively. While the essayist's output supports these classifications, it could equally be argued that at least until 1960 (the year of his departure for Cuba) his writings essentially stemmed from the same basic world view, which was expressed in X-Ray of the Pampa (grouped under the "historico-sociological" essays) and would appear in different types of essays, as is the case with this quote from Para una revisión de las letras argentinas (1967; Contributions to a revision of Argentine literature), which would fall under the "literary" category: "Self-betrayal is the central and radical problem of our lives...the problem of our historical existence as a people, of a great nation having been misgoverned and impoverished yet with no awareness of the world in which it lives, nor of the peoples that coexist within it, nor of reality itself to which it hasn't yet resigned or adapted itself."

This message was to be repeated in various forms over the years, but Martínez Estrada could never persuade enough of his compatriots to accept it. He arrived in Cuba in 1960, at the invitation of the publishing house Casa de las Américas, an embittered expatriate. What no one counted on, including the essayist himself, was the effect the life and work of the legendary Cuban writer José Martí was to have upon him, lifting his spirits to heights of unusual optimism and self-confirmation, and causing him to write seven essays about Cuba and Martí. From this period are essays such as El verdadero cuento del Tío Sam (1963; The real story of Uncle Sam) and Martí, revolucionario (1967; Martí the revolutionary). Martínez Estrada was convinced that the latter, published posthumously, was the best work he had produced, a view not generally shared by critics, although there can be no doubt that his firsthand experience of Cuba between 1960 and 1962. (and visits to Mexico during the same period) in his view compensated to some degree for the tribulations and rejections he had perceived in earlier years in Argentina.

JAMES MAHARG

Biography

Born 14 September 1895 in San José de la Esquina, province of Santa Fe. Studied at the Colegio Avellaneda, Buenos Aires; largely self-taught. Worked for the General Post Office, Buenos Aires, 1915–46. Married Augustina Morriconi, 1921. Taught at the Colegio Nacional, University of La Plata, 1923–45. Traveled in Europe, 1927 and 1957, and Brazil, 1947. Founding member, and president, 1933–34 and 1942–46, National Society of Writers. Taught at the National University of the South, Bahía Blanca, from 1949. Suffered from a painful skin disease, a form of neurodermatitis, from 1952. Moved to Mexico, 1959, where he taught at the School of Political Science, National Autonomous University of Mexico. Lived in Cuba, 1960–62. Moved back to Bahia Blanca, 1962. Awards: five major Argentinian prizes, 1922–48; Casa de las Americas Prize, 1960. Died (of cancer) in Bahia Blanca, 3 November 1964.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Radiografía de la pampa, 1933; edited by Leo Pollmann, 1991; as X-Ray of the Pampa, translated by Alain Swietlicki, 1971

La cabeza de Goliat, 1940

Sarmiento, 1946

Panorama de las literaturas, 1946

Nietzsche, 1947

Los invariantes históricos en el “Facundo”, 1947

Muerte y transfiguración de Martín Fierro: Ensayo de interpretación de la vida argentina, 2 vols., 1948

El mundo maravilloso de Guillermo Enrique Hudson, 1951

Cuadrante del pampero, 1956

¿Qué es esto?, 1956

Exhortaciones, 1957

El hermano Quiroga, 1957

Las 40, 1957

Heraldos de la verdad: Montaigne-Balzac-Nietzsche, 1958

Diferencias y semejanzas entre los países de América Latina, 1962

El verdadero cuento del Tío Sam, 1963

En Cuba, y al servicio de la revolución cubana, 1963; as Mi experiencia cubana, 1965

Antología, 1964

Realidad y fantasía en Balzac, 1964

Martí, revolucionario, 1967

En torno a Kafka y otros ensayos, 1967

Para una revisión de las letras argentinas, edited by Enrique Espinoza, 1967

Leopoldo Lugones: Retrato sin retocar, 1968

Leer y escribir (selection), edited by Enrique Espinoza, 1969

Panorama de los Estados Unidos, edited by Joaquín Roy, 1985

Other writings: poetry, short stories, and plays.

Bibliography

Adam, Carlos, Bibliografía y documentos de Ezequiel Martínez Estrada, La Plata: National University of La Plata, 1968

Further Reading

Anderson Imbert, Enrique, “Kafka y Martínez Estrada,” Nueva Revista de Filología Hispánica 36, no. 1 (1988):467–76

Earle, Peter G., Prophet in the Wilderness: The Works of Ezequiel Martínez Estrada,

Austin: University of Texas Press, 1971

Earle, Peter G., "Las soledades de Martmez Estrada," Cuadernos Americanos 7, no. 42 (November-December 1993):148–56

Fernández Retamar, Roberto, "Desde el Martí de Ezequiel Martínez Estrada," Cuadernos Americanos 7, no. 42 (November-December 1993):131–47

Maharg, James, A Call to Authenticity: The Essays of Ezequiel Martínez Estrada, University, Mississippi: Romance Monographs, 1977

Stabb, Martin S., In Quest of Identity: Patterns in the Spanish American Essay of Ideas, 1890–1960, Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1967

Marx, Karl

German, 1818–1883

Intransigent, direct, mocking, and politically subversive, Marx ranks as one of the most powerful and distinctive voices Germany has produced. Its eloquence and conviction is the result of an activist approach to critique. Picking up where Kant and Hegel left off, Marx reformulates the theory-praxis problem in a revolutionary way. For him, change is no longer introduced by dogmatic assumptions; rather, it is through the critique of the old that the new becomes possible. Marx therefore calls for "the relentless critique of all that exists" (Rheinische Zeitung, 15 November 1844). This implies understanding oneself, i.e. the necessity of self-reflection (Selbstverstandigung). Critique requires first and foremost a capacity for self-criticism. The unique mission and opportunity of the press call for it to make such critique possible.

Starting as a journalist, Marx combined a theoretical outlook with political engagement. Conceived as critical analyses of the dynamics of social forces, his articles forge the political essay into a tool for class struggle. Subverting in Hegelian fashion the hold of particular interests by exposing their internal contradictions, the essays take on repression, whatever its disguise, and exercise a power that goes beyond the mere fireworks they engender. Instead of merely offering a critique of the opposition, the analytic rigor of his essays destroys the claims of those in power, revealing their falseness as pretense. Identifying the moment of truth in such falseness, Marx's critique of ideology exposes the darker sides of exploitation.

In the age of Metternich's political reaction, Marx's first articles take Prussian censorship and the press laws to task. As he points out, method rather than its result creates the truth which can thereby resist all attempts at extraneous determination. To ignore this means to fall victim to the contradictions to which the denial of the self-defining constitution of truth would lead. Critique alone—as self-constituting court—is able to restrict itself. The parliament that desires to control freedom of the press indicts itself. Similarly, Marx's account of the debates on the law against theft of wood returns the blame which some legislators hoped to lay on the oppressed masses to those legislators themselves. In the final analysis, he argues, it is such legislation that threatens to undermine the very idea itself of law and state. Exposing the abuse in parliament's debates at every stage, Marx turns the tables in ingenious reversal: “The wood-thief has filched wood from the forest-owner, but the forest-owner has used the thief to filch the state itself” (“Debatten über das Holzdiebstahlgsgesetz” [1842; “Debates on the Law on Thefts of Wood”]). Clearing up the ideological thicket, the literary strategy exposes the hypocritical character that lends exploitative fraud its friendly face.

Perhaps Marx’s most accomplished essay, “Zur Judenfrage” (1844; “On the Jewish Question”), performs a precarious balancing act which displays most strikingly both the strength and limits of high-strung dialectics. A literary pas de deux of materialist and idealist thought, this essay pushes the discourse on emancipation to its brink. Its sheer density renders it at once opaque and translucent, light and heavyhanded, radical and superficial. Charged with the dynamics of dialectics, its sparkle has at the same time a blinding effect. Like Marx’s other essays, it confronts readers with their own conceptual fixations. Argumentative irreducibility is enacted at the cost of the blind spot—Marx’s Jewish self-hatred—around which the essay circles.

In 1848 Marx became editor-in-chief of the Neue Rheinische Zeitung (New Rhenish newspaper), Germany’s mouthpiece for the 1848 Revolution. Marx saw his paper’s task of recording and commenting on the course of political change as intricately linked on the local and international scale and as reflecting the stage world history had reached. The paper lasted only until May 1849, when the 1848 Revolution was finally thwarted. More astonishing is the fact that the paper could be published at all. Looking back on this period, Friedrich Engels recalls the editorial practice that created the newspaper’s singular power to electrify the proletarian masses: “...thanks to the eight bayonet rifles and 250 shots of ammunition in the editor’s office, and the typesetters’ red Jacobin hats, our offices were known by the garrison’s officers as a fort, too, that was not easily to be taken by a simple coup de main.” As editor and journalist Marx himself more than once suffered the personal consequences of this struggle. As he described this experience: “... we were blessed at once with the advantages of feudal servitude, bureaucratic police protocol and the modern bourgeois legal brutality” (1849). Two months later, 19 May 1849, the last issue was printed in red ink.

With Engels Marx penned the Manifest der Kommunistischen Partei (1848; The Communist Manifesto), one of the single most influential texts written in the 19th century. Its manifesto style—clarity, brevity, and precision—carries the political essay to new heights. Its imagery has ever since informed and haunted the literary and political imagination. Designed to serve as the party’s official missive, it demonstrates the unavoidable necessity for revolution. Between the suggestive opening, “A spectre is haunting Europe—the spectre of Communism,” and the concluding call, “Working men of all countries, unite!” (the two single best-known lines in the manifesto), a forceful argument is launched arguing that the party is the only and irresistible agency capable of solving the world-historical mandate: to bring about the universal solution to oppression, the class-free society.

Four years later the 1851 December coup d’état by Louis Bonaparte marked an historical caesura that forced Marx to write his Der achtzehnte Brumaire des Louis-Bonaparte (1869; The Eighteenth Brumaire of Louis Bonaparte). To account for the surprising political backlash to the ideas in the wake of 1848, Marx resorts to the categories of tragedy and farce. Politics becomes a play whose farcical repetitions are ultimately free from historical ramifications. Yet where this theatrical staging sees only actors playing out their drama of politics, we find Marx attempting to solve the drama posed by his own theorizing. The model of tragedy/farce arrests history and reduces it to a loop. While Marx concedes the political its own sphere, the schedule of world history remains intact; enriched by breaks and interruptions, these farcical ruptures now corroborate what they seem to have jeopardized—the dignity of history. While Marx offers no argument to resolve this dilemma logically, the exposition of the essay provides the necessary space to act out what seems impossible to address otherwise.

While Marx continued his journalistic work as a sideline, the newspaper articles, which now solely served the purpose of a source of income, were toned down to the objective tone of technical reports. Zur Kritik der politischen Ökonomie (1859; A Contribution to the Critique of Political Economy) and Das Kapital (1867–95; Capital) are no longer essays but bring their project to completion. Informed by the praxis of critique, they retain some of the virtuoso dexterity that is the trademark of Marx's essays. Pointing beyond logical demonstration, the expository play in the later works is grounded in the evocative appeal to critical imagination.

WILLI GOETSCHEL

Biography

Karl Heinrich Marx. Born 5 May 1818 in Trier. Studied philosophy and law at the Universities of Bonn and Berlin, 1835–41; member of the “Doctorklub,” a group of students interested in philosophy. Editor-in-chief, Die Rheinische Zeitung, Cologne, 1842–43: suppressed by the censor. Married Jenny von Westphalen, 1843: one son (died in youth) and three daughters. Moved to Paris, 1843, where he became lifelong friends with Friedrich Engels; coeditor, Deutsch-Französische Jahrbücher (German-French yearbook), Paris, 1843; expelled for writing anti-Prussian essays, and moved to Brussels, 1845, where he and Engels joined the Communist League. Returned to Cologne, 1848; editor, Neue Rheinische Zeitung, Cologne, 1848–49. Expelled from Germany and lived in London, from 1849; journalist for various newspapers, including Neue Oderzeitung (Breslau), 1855, Sheffield and London Free Press, 1855–56, and the People's Paper and Wiener Presse (Vienna), 1861–62; European correspondent for the New York Daily Tribune (many of these articles were actually written by Engels). Head, General Council of the International Working Men's Association, 1864–76. Died in London, 14 March 1883.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose (most works cowritten with Friedrich Engels)

Misère de la philosophie: Réponse à la philosophie de la misère de M. Proudhon, 1847; facsimile edition edited by Kikujū Tanaka, 1982; as The Poverty of Philosophy, translated by Harry Quelch, 1900

Manifest der Kommunistischen Partei, 1848; authorized English translation as Manifesto of the Communist Party, edited by Engels, translated by Samuel Moore, 1888; subsequent editions as The Communist Manifesto, edited by Dirk J.Struik, 1971, Frederic L. Bender, 1988, and David McLellan, 1988

Der achtzehnte Brumaire des Louis-Bonaparte, 1869; as The Eighteenth Brumaire of Louis Bonaparte, translated by Daniel De Leon, 1898, and Eden and Cedar Paul, 1926
Selected Essays, translated by H.J.Stenning, 1926
 “Die deutsche Ideologie,” in Historisch-kritische Gesamtausgabe, Werke, Schriften, Briefe, vol. 5, edited by David Rjazanov and Vladimir Viktorovich Adoratskij, 1932; as The German Ideology, translated by S.Ryazanskaya, 1964
Basic Writings on Politics and Philosophy, edited by Lewis S.Feuer, 1959
Economic and Philosophic Manuscripts of 1844, translated by Martin Milligan, 1959; edited by Dirk J.Stuik, 1969
Early Writings, edited and translated by T.B.Bottomore, 1963
Essential Writings, edited by David Caute, 1967
Articles from the Neue Rheinische Zeitung, 1848–49, edited by Bernard Isaacs, translated by S.Ryazanskaya, 1972
The Marx-Engels Reader, edited by Robert C.Tucker, 1972; revised, enlarged edition, 1978
Essential Writings, edited by Frederic L.Bender, 1972
Political Writings, edited by David Fernbach, 3 vols., 1973
Selected Writings, edited by David McLellan, 1977
The Essential Marx: The Non-Economic Writings, a Selection, edited and translated by Saul K.Padover, 1979
The Collected Writings in “The New York Daily Tribune”, edited by A.Thomas Ferguson and Stephen J.O’Neil, 1980
The Portable Karl Marx, edited by Eugene Kamenka, 1983
Early Political Writings, edited and translated by Joseph O’Malley and Richard A.Davis, 1994
Later Political Writings, edited and translated by Terrell Carver, 1996
 Other writings: Das Kapital (1867–95; Capital), Zur Kritik der politischen Okonomie (1859; A Contribution to the Critique of Political Economy), and many other political works.
 Collected works editions: Karl Marx, Friedrich Engels: Werke, 43 vols., 1956–68; Collected Works, 47 vols., 1973–95 (in progress).

Bibliographies

Draper, Hal, The Marx-Engels Register: A Complete Bibliography of Marx and Engels’ Individual Writings, New York: Schocken, 1985
 Eubanks, Cecil L., Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels: An Analytical Bibliography, New York: Garland, 1984(original edition, 1977)
 Neubauer, Franz, Marx-Engels Bibliographie, Boppard: Boldt, 1979

Further Reading

Balibar, Etienne, The Philosophy of Marx, London and New York: Verso, 1995 (original French edition, 1993)

- Bove, Paul, "The Metaphysics of Textuality: Marx's Eighteenth Brumaire and Nietzsche's Use and Abuse of History," Dalhousie Review 64 (1984):401–22
- Kemple, Thomas M., Reading Marx Writing: Melodrama, the Market, and the "Grundrisse", Stanford, California: Stanford University Press, 1995
- McLellan, David, The Thought of Karl Marx: An Introduction, London: Papermac, 1980 (original edition, 1971)
- McLellan, David, Karl Marx: A Biography, London: Papermac, 1995(original edition, 1975)
- Mehlman, Jeffrey, Revolution and Repetition: Marx/Hugo/Balzac, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1977
- Said, Edward, "On Repetition," in his The World, the Text, and the Critic, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1983:111–25

Massis, Henri

French, 1886–1970

Eloquent witness of the political, literary, intellectual, and Catholic life in France during the first half of the 20th century, Henri Massis is often dismissed today as a Catholic apologist and a staunch defender of nationalism. Though dogmatic in his moral and literary views, he must nonetheless be regarded as one of the pioneers of the French essay as a contemporary genre.

While Theodore Fraser (1986) states that the modern French essayist can "...conduct systematic investigations, spin theories, or simply speculate upon a myriad of topics and issues ...," the Anthologie des essayistes français contemporains in 1929 defined the task of the essayist as being either to create, to bring out, or to clarify ideas that serve as directives to an epoch. As an influential figure in both the literary and the political world, Massis strove to do exactly that. In numerous essays he often defended the traditional cultural, patriotic, and Catholic values of France.

Massis began his prolific writing career during his Sorbonne days, publishing, in his early twenties, Comment Émile Zola composait ses romans (1906; How Émile Zola composed his novels), Le Puits de Pyrrhon (1907; Pyrrho's well), a philosophical "conte" which he dedicated to Anatole France, and La Pensée de Maurice Barrès (1909; The thought of Maurice Barres). This latter book was the first in which he took a political stand. Massis gained notoriety as early as 1911 when, collaborating with his friend Alfred de Tarde under the pseudonym of Agathon, they published a widely debated essay on the state of French university education, L'Esprit de la nouvelle Sorbonne (The spirit of the New Sorbonne). Denouncing the invasion of Germanic scientific methods into French university pedagogy, Massis warned against the renunciation of traditional liberal arts education. He feared "'a progressive debasement of general culture'...and the formation of a new kind of person: not the honnête homme of the Renaissance tradition but the esprit spectraliste" (Fraser). In 1913, the year in which Massis converted to Catholicism, he and de Tarde again published under the same pseudonym the results of their research on Les Jeunes Gens d'aujourd'hui (Young people of today). Among the youth, they detected an anti-intellectual tendency, a thirst for military action, a patriotic faith, an orientation toward Catholicism, and an anti-parliamentary attitude. The monarchist Charles Maurras and his growing Action Française movement welcomed their observation that there seemed to be a nationalist renaissance in France.

Following the war, in 1919, Massis published the manifesto "Pour un parti de l'intelligence" (In favor of intelligence), in which he called for the restoration of the French spirit, of the French state, and of the Catholic Church, as well as for the revival of intellectual life in France through a national and metaphysical awakening. However, Massis' postwar expectations for France and for a strong Catholic renewal were to be disappointed.

Although never a member of the Action Française, Massis did sympathize with this movement and became close to Maurras, whose nationalist and traditionalist values he shared. The founding of the Revue Universelle (Universal review) in 1920 by Maurras and Jacques Maritain proved a major event in the literary world. With Massis as editor, Jacques Bainville as director, and Jacques Maritain in charge of the philosophy section, the journal's stated mission was to rebuild the public spirit in France by means of the intellect, and by French thought to attempt a worldwide intellectual federation. With the journal as their vehicle, Massis and Maritain worked at instituting a Christian political philosophy, Maritain in making Thomism accessible to the French public through concepts and principles, Massis through criticism and literary applications.

In 1923, Massis' first volume of Jugements (Judgments) collected his essays on Ernest Renan, Anatole France, and Barres and was dedicated to Maritain ("This testimony of our common hope in the metaphysical restoration"). His second volume of Jugements, with essays on Andre Gide, Romain Rolland, Georges Duhamel, and Julien Benda, appeared a year later. Uncompromisingly, Massis uncovered what he perceived to be the moral and ideological flaws in their writings. It was, he said, time to keep law and order in literature ("faire la police des lettres"). Massis particularly anathemized Gide, A. France, Rolland, and Benda, not only for having discredited but also for having corrupted the French tradition. Massis demanded that Christian values be strictly and absolutely followed in all areas of life, which he saw threatened by the changing values in postwar France. His particular aversion to Gide and his determination to battle the writer's influence on young French readers in an era of spiritual crisis were manifested as early as 1914 in an article for L'Éclair (Lightning) when he denounced "Andre Gide's perversity." Viewing Gide's theory of the gratuitous act as a "violation of all morality," his prose took on a vitriolic flavor. Massis repeatedly espoused Claudel's assessment of Gide that "le mal, ça ne compose pas" (evil does not create), not hesitating, in 1921, even to label Gide as the devil. Another article in 1929 described the "Faillite d'André Gide" (André Gide's failure).

In contrast, Massis' analysis of Marcel Proust was more benevolent. In his essay on Le Drame de Marcel Proust (1937; The drama of Marcel Proust), Massis attempted to uncover Proust's soul. Unlike Gide, Massis stated, Proust's fictional world did not destroy the moral universe. D'André Gide à Marcel Proust (1948; From André Gide to Marcel Proust) comprises incisive essays on both writers.

Other than his literary criticism, Massis' political essays may be best known today, especially his treatise, Défense de l'Occident (The defense of the West), published by Jacques Maritain in Plon's distinguished "Roseau d'Or" collection in 1927. Massis' ongoing concern to restore France's Christian and missionary vocation is manifested in his warnings against technological progress and what he perceived as the pernicious influence of Bolshevism, Oriental mysticism, and even Germanism, all of which he viewed as hostile to the Romano-Christian culture of France. These constant themes were echoed in Massis' essay collection of 1934, Débats (Debates), in his manifesto "Pour la défense de l'Occident et la paix en Europe" (1935; For the defense of the West and peace in Europe), written as a defense of Italy's invasion of Ethiopia, as well as in La Guerre de trente ans (1940; The Thirty Years' War), a collection of essays dedicated to the Franco-German problems. His Découverte de la Russie (1944; The discovery of Russia) serves as a kind of supplement to Défense de l'Occident, and renews his warning against communist Russia and the danger of a potential union between Russia and a unified Germany. Postwar books such as L'Allemagne d'hier et d'après-demain (1949; Germany yesterday and the day after tomorrow), UOccident et son destin (1956; The West and its destiny), as well as L'Europe en question (1958; Europe at stake) are all expressions of his apprehension regarding France's future spiritual direction.

Massis was personally acquainted with writers such as Alain, Henri Bergson, Barres, Charles Péguy, Paul Claudel, France, Ernest Psichari, Henri Drouot, Maritain, Georges Bernanos, Maurras, Jean Cocteau, Robert Brasillach, to name but a few, and his recollections in Maurras et notre temps (1951; Maurras and our time) or in Au long d'une vie (1967; A lifetime) are of unique historical value regarding the evolution of literary and intellectual life in 20th-century France.

Massis employed the essay to defend Christian values, as well as France's Catholic mission and traditions. His output as literary critic, polemicist, and historian provoked heated debates in his time and had far-reaching influence. Massis did not indulge in posturing, and his style was never artificial. His writing was driven by deep personal convictions and ideals. These he tried to impress upon France's youth and intelligentsia in the hope that his country might lead Europe in a renewal of Catholic spirituality.

ASTRID HEYER

Biography

Born 21 March 1886 in Paris. Studied at the Lycees Condorcet and Henri IV (where he was taught by Alain), Paris; the Sorbonne, Paris. Married: one son. Military service, from 1905; also fought in World War I. Subeditor, L'Opinion, 1911–14. Converted to Catholicism, 1913. Editor, 1920–39, and director, 1939–44, La Revue Universelle; founder and editor, 1933 newspaper, 1929–34. Served under Vichy during World War II. Worked for Plon publishing house after the war. Elected to the French Academy, 1960. Award: French Academy Grand Prize for Literature, 1929. Died in Paris, 16 April 1970.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

- Comment Émile Zola composait ses romans*, 1906
Le Puits de Pyrrhon, 1907
La Pensée de Maurice Barrès, 1909
L'Esprit de la nouvelle Sorbonne, with Alfred de Tarde (jointly as Agathon), 1911
Les Jeunes Gens d'aujourd'hui, with Alfred de Tarde (jointly as Agathon), 1913
Rotnain Rolland contre la France, 1915
La Vie d'Ernest Psichari, 1916
Jugements, 2 vols., 1923–24; revised edition, 1929
En marge de "Jugements": Reflexions sur l'art du roman, 1927
Defense de l'Occident, 1927
Reflexions sur l'art du roman, 1927
Avant-Postes (chroniques d'un redressement), 1910–1914 (articles), 1928
Dix ans apres: Reflexions sur la litterature d'apres guerre, 1932
Debats, 1934
L'Honneur de servir, 1937
Le Drame de Marcel Proust, 1937
Chefs: Les Dictateurs et «o»s, 1939
Le Siege de l'Alcazar, with Robert Brasillach, 1939
La Guerre de trente ans, 1940
Les Idées restent, 1941
Découverte de la Russie, 1944
D'André Gide à Marcel Proust, 1948
L'Allemagne d'hier et d'après-demain, 1949
L'Occident et son destin, 1956
L'Europe en question., 1958
Visages des idées; À contre-courant; Thémes et discussions, 1958
Salazar face à face, 1961
Barrés et nous, 1962

Other writings: works on politics, religion, and literature, and memoirs.

Further Reading

- Archambault, Paul, Jeunes Maîtres, Paris: Bloud & Gay, 1926
 Bernanos, Georges, Correspondance inédite, 1904–1934: Combat pour la vérité, Paris: Plon, 1971
 Brasillach, Robert, Notre Avant-guerre, Paris: Plon, 1941
 Calvet, J., Le Renouveau catholique dans la littérature contemporaine, Paris: Lanore, 1927
 Christophe, Lucien, "Regards sur Henri Massis," Revue Générale Belge (May 1961): 17–41
 Clouard, Henri, Histoire de la littérature française: Du symbolisme à nos jours, de 1914 à 1940, Paris: Albin Michel, 2 vols., 1947–49
 Daudet, Léon, Écrivains et artistes, vol. 6, Paris: Capitoile, 1929

- Dubech, Lucien, Les Chefs de file de la jeune génération, Paris: Plon, 1925
- Fraser, Theodore, The French Essay, Boston: Twayne, 1986
- Griffiths, Richard, The Reactionary Revolution: The Catholic Revival in French Literature 1870–1914, New York: Ungar, 1965; London, Constable, 1966
- Henri Massis, études, témoignages, textes et documents inédits, biographie et bibliographie, Paris: Nouvelles Éditions Latines, 1961
- Itinéraires* issue on Massis, 49, (January 1961)
- Leitolf, Otto, “Die Gedankenwelt von Henri Massis,” Romanische Studien 53 (1940):1–118
- Maxence, Jean-Pierre, Histoire de dix ans, 1927–1937, Paris: Gallimard, 1939
- Poulet, Robert, Le Caléidoscope, Lausanne: L’Âge d’Homme, 1982
- Rebatet, Lucien, Les Décombres, Paris: Denoël, 1942
- Séché, Alphonse, Dans la mêlée littéraire (1900–1930), Paris: Malfère, 1935
- Thérive, André, Opinions littéraires, Paris: Bloud & Gay, 1925
- Toda, Michel, Henri Massis: Un témoin de la droite intellectuelle, Paris: La Table Ronde, 1987

Maxim

As a literary genre the maxim exists chiefly as an elaboration of the proverb, perhaps with some element of commentary, or as the reduction of the predominantly French genre of “reflection.” The only well-known work in whose title the term “maxim” occurs is La Rochefoucauld’s Réflexions; ou, Sentences et maximes morales (1665). There were other late 17th-century collections of aphorisms known as maximes, most notably those of La Rochefoucauld’s close friend, the hypochondriac and devout Madame de Souvré, Marquise de Sablé, which were published with the pensées of Nicolas d’Ailly, canon of Lisieux, in the Maximes et pensées diverses of 1678.

The origin of the term “maxim” is obscure, but it appears to derive from the technical 15th-century maxima propositio, the major premise of a syllogism in logic, generally stating a universally accepted axiom, such as “all dogs have four legs.” The maxima propositio was followed, in a syllogism, by a minor premise (“this animal is a dog”) and a conclusion (“therefore this animal has four legs”). Thus, the maxim acquired its connotations of meaning any aphoristically stated general truth. Its relation to the essay developed in the 16th century when authors such as Erasmus in his Adagia (1500; Adages), Montaigne in his Essais (1580, 1588), and a host of lesser-known writers in Latin and the major Western European vernaculars cited aphorisms or maxims in order to discuss or illustrate their meanings, applicability, aptness, or usefulness.

Erasmus constantly revised and augmented the Adages after the 1500 edition, which contained 818 proverbs with comments of a few lines on each, until the final total of over 4000 adages. Very often these are in the form of maxims, e.g. “Kings and fools are born, not made,” “For the lazy it’s always holiday,” or “War is sweet to those who do not know it.” In the 1515 edition Erasmus added, after every 500 adages, and under the guise of a commentary on the origin, meaning, and usefulness of some of them, long pieces of social satire, which today we would call essays.

The word “essay” did not, at this stage, denote a literary form, but meant “trial” or “test.” However, several 16th-century authors, including Guillaume Bude and fitienne Dolet, inspired by Erasmus’ success, interpolated sometimes lengthy passages of personal writing into what were ostensibly works of philological commentary. Montaigne’s first two volumes of Essais were often reflections on the truth of aphorisms, or illustrations of their appositeness. The chapters were presented as forms of self-portrait, each supposedly testing the author’s personal reaction to some statement about personal or social affairs, or dealing with some moral aspect of human nature. In fact, these chapters were really attempting something else: they were Montaigne’s share of a peculiarly intimate dialogue with his reader, with falsification of such element of self-portraiture as there was.

Montaigne’s essays, often bearing maxims as titles, cover such subjects as “The same end is reached by different means,” “Our emotions carry us beyond ourselves,” or “That our experience of what things are good and what are harmful depends on our opinion of them.” The first chapter to break out of the bounds of the original form into a more obvious kind of speculation is titled with the Platonist maxim, “To philosophize is to learn how to die.”

The development of the relationship between the maxim and the essay continued in the work of Francis Bacon, who borrowed the title of his 1597 Essayes from Montaigne, but whose work was rather a collection of “sentences” or maxims, with the subtitles Religious Meditations and Places of Perswasion and Disswasion. In 1612. Bacon increased the number of sentences from ten to 38, and in the 1625 edition to 58. They were also rewritten at greater length, thereby resembling more closely what we would now call essays.

After Bacon the maxim and the essay increasingly went their separate ways. A linking of the two did appear, however, in France in the work of La Rochefoucauld, the most famous of whose maximes was certainly the essay on amour-propre, first published in the third part of an anonymous Recueil in 1660. His manuscripts and the first edition of Réflexions contain items of much greater length than what we might now regard as appropriate in a maxim, and tend toward the essayistic. The work was first elaborated in the company of Madame de Sablé and her coterie, where the conversation was chiefly of moral matters, but also included health, devotion, and gastronomy. It is generally accepted that the manuscript tradition shows a progression from the maxims as recorded in the Liancourt manuscript, virtually at the moment of their discussion in Madame de Sablé’s circle, through the pirated Dutch edition (1664), to the authentic first edition of 1665. This presumed progression displays a movement of reduction, from extended paragraphs to epigrammatic maxims, thus presenting the maxim as a distillation of essay-type pieces (of a kind similar to La Rochefoucauld’s posthumously published Nouvelles Réflexions of 1693), rather than—as previously—a starting point for reflection.

From the late 17th century onward, the maxim continued its life as epigram or aphorism of moral prescription, leaving the essay to develop its various subforms. The two genres had come together splendidly in Erasmus, corresponded most closely in Montaigne and Bacon, and dissolved their relationship after the successive texts of La Rochefoucauld.

Further Reading

- Cavill, Paul, "Notes on Maxims in Old English Narrative," Notes and Queries 231, no. 2. (1986):145–48
- Chorney, Alexander Harry, The English Maxim to 1756 (dissertation), Los Angeles: University of California, 1963
- Clements, Pamela Jo, The Prose Maxim in Old English: Aelfric and Wulfstan (dissertation), Urbana: University of Illinois, 1984
- Ford, Barbara J., "The Evocative Power of the Maxim: La Rochefoucauld and Proust," Romance Notes 25, no. 2 (1984): 169–74
- Lafond, Jean, "Des Formes breves de la littérature morale aux XVIe et XVIIe siècles," in his Les Formes brèves de la prose et le discours discontinu, Paris: Vrin, 1984
- Lyons, John D., "Maxim and Narration in the Seventeenth Century," in Proceedings of the Xth Congress of the International Comparative Literature Association, edited by James J. Wilhelm and others, New York: Garland, 3 vols., 1985
- Nemer, Monique, "Les Intermittences de la vérité: Maxime, sentence ou aphorisme: Notes sur l'évolution d'un genre," Studi Francesi 26, no. 3 (1982):485–93
- Rigolot, François, "Montaigne's Maxims: From the Discourse of Other to the Expression of Self," L'Esprit Créateur 22, no. 3 (1982):8–18
- Rosso, Corrado, "Maximen und Regeln: Von den Evangelien bis zur Gegenwart (Methodische Überlegungen)," in Neuere Studien zur Aphoristik und Essayistik, edited by Giulia Cantarutti and Hans Schumacher, Frankfurt-on-Main: Lang, 1986
- Spackman, Barbara, "Machiavelli and Maxims," Yale French Studies 77 (1990):135–55

Mazzini, Giuseppe

Italian, 1805–1872

Giuseppe Mazzini, the leading Italian patriot, political theorist, and critic, was born in 1805, the son of Giacomo Mazzini, a physician and participant in the Ligurian Jacobin movement, and Maria Drago, a woman of strong Jansenist convictions who would exert an important influence on her son's work and ideas. Mazzini's literary talents developed early; in 1826, for instance, he submitted an article, "Saggio sul Dante Alighieri: 'Amor Patria'" ("Dante's Love of Country"), to the Antologia, considered the best Italian literary review of the time. The subject is significant, since Mazzini represented Dante as one of the earliest advocates of Italian unity; and although the article was at first rejected, it was later printed in that journal. In 1827 he received a degree in law and joined the Carbonari, continuing meanwhile to write articles on literary topics for publication in such journals as Francesco Guerrazzi's L'Indicatore Livornese (The Livornese indicator). A year later Mazzini assumed the editorship of a similar review, L'Indicatore Genovese (The Genoese indicator), in which several of his writings were published. One of his articles, on Sir

Walter Scott, caused the small newspaper to be investigated by the police, the strong censorship of the period equating enthusiastic Romanticism with political extremism. Mazzini was, of course, quite involved in revolutionary activity at this time, and in 1830 was arrested for conspiracy and imprisoned in the fortress of Savona. After a short time he was allowed to choose exile and went to Marseilles. There he founded Giovine Italia (Young Italy), an organization dedicated to the unification of Italy as a republic, with Rome as its capital. By 1832, Mazzini's revolutionary and nationalistic ideas were well known throughout Italy. He left France the following year and moved to Switzerland, where he founded Young Europe as a broad international counterpart to Young Italy. Its purpose was to build a union of European republican nation-states, all based on the principles of equality and brotherhood and to be achieved by Mazzini's central formula of "thought and action." Forced to leave Switzerland after a failed political uprising, he went into exile in England, where he remained until 1848.

Settling in London, Mazzini continued writing and produced several incisive literary analyses of Dante, Goethe, Foscolo, Byron, Carlyle, and the Romantic movement. He also served as a correspondent for two liberal continental journals, the Paris-based Le Monde (The world) and the Swiss Helvétie, in which he gave lengthy observations on the social and political conditions in England as well as his first impressions on the politics of the working classes. During this period of exile he also made his living writing for John Stuart Mill's London and Westminster Review, the Monthly Chronicle, the British and Foreign Review, Tait's Edinburgh Magazine, and the radical People's Journal. In that last periodical, in a series of six essays entitled "Thoughts upon Democracy in Europe," he traced the common utilitarian origins of various utopian movements of the time. When the revolutionary uprisings of 1848 erupted all over Europe, he returned to Italy where he experienced the attempt at insurrection in Milan and the establishment of the short-lived Roman Republic, serving as one of its governing triumvirs. Returning to England after the Republic's fall, Mazzini continued his prolific output of literary and political writings, which were aimed, in part, at building support and sympathy for the Italian cause among the British public. He also helped to organize unsuccessful uprisings in various parts of the Italian peninsula, but was opposed to the policy of those moderates who sought to tie Italy's unification to the Savoy monarchy.

In 1860 he published his major tome, Doveri dell'uomo (The Duties of Man), in which he outlined his main economic and social, as well as political, doctrines. In this work he urged the working classes in particular to abandon materialistic views such as Marxism and fulfill instead their obligations to God, the people, and the nation. In exile again in London from 1860 to 1868, Mazzini became a close friend of the poet A.C. Swinburne and the novelist George Meredith, both of whom used Mazzini and the central events of his life as themes in their works. Meredith's serialized Vittoria (1864–65) described Mazzini at the height of his Romantic revolutionary career, and Swinburne's panegyric "Ode to Mazzini" (1857) and "Super Flumina Babylonis" (1869) praised him as the prophet who inspires his people to gain independence. Mazzini was also the subject of Robert Browning's poem, "The Italian in England," and his influence on English letters is further evident in the works of several of his British followers, including his translator Jessie White Mario and his biographer Emilie Ashurst Venturi. He was the inspiration for at least two novels, Clara Hopgood (1896) by William Hale White, in which his dealings with the British Chartist movement are described, and Benjamin Disraeli's Lothair (1870), which emphasizes the political disappointments of Mazzini's later years as well as his early idealism. The last four years of Mazzini's life were spent in Italy where he founded a new journal, Roma del Popolo (The people's Rome), and a working men's association while continuing to write countless articles and political tracts.

While Mazzini is best known for his political activism, the critical writings themselves form an important contribution to Italian Romanticism. They serve, moreover, to demonstrate the close connection that often existed in 17th-century Italy between new literary styles and elements of social and political activity. In an early essay on Italian literature, for instance, Mazzini asserted that the character of Italian poetry reflected that country's failure to produce independent and vital political movements, and called for the creation of a new Italian literature with "social man in action" as its theme. Additionally, he attacked Italy's writers for their constant servile admiration of the powerful, their tragic separation of literature from Italian national life, and their imitation of foreign literary schools and styles.

The significant essay on Dante which Mazzini wrote during his early career, describing him as a forerunner of Italian unity, is an essentially political interpretation of the poet's work. But it is still the result of Mazzini's fresh reading of the poetry itself rather than of a scholarly analysis of Dante's annotators or, as he puts it, "rummaging through the archives of monasteries." The essay recalls an appeal made earlier by Ugo Foscolo for a new criticism of Italy's greatest literary figure. In his study of Goethe and Byron, Mazzini sees the two writers as contrasting figures, each representing divergent intellectual views. "Goethe better expresses lives; Byron life. The one is more vast; the other more deep." Mazzini himself described poetry as an endeavor which has a religious, popular, and visionary purpose and, while praising much of the new Romantic literature of his age, rejected Romanticism's cult of the individual and the idea of art as a mere imitator of nature, or the formula "Art for art's sake." For this reason too, he placed Byron "far above" Wordsworth and Coleridge, whom he called "contemplative poets only, living remote from action amid their mountains and lakes." His other incisive essays on the 16th-century Italian thinker Paolo Sarpi and on his own contemporaries, George Sand and Victor Hugo, are also written from this viewpoint. In a similar vein, he regarded historiography as having an essentially didactic purpose, the historian's role to be essentially that of "a prophet of a higher social end," quite in accord with his own guiding principle of "thought and action."

WILLIAM ROBERTS

Biography

Known as Joseph Mazzini while living in England. Born 22 June 1805 in Genoa. Studied privately; University of Genoa, from 1819, law degree, 1827. Editor, L'Indicatore Genovese, from 1828. Arrested and imprisoned for joining the Carbonari group of secret societies, 1830, and exiled to France, 1831, living in Marseilles; founder, Giovine Italia (Young Italy) political organization supporting Italian unification under republican form of government, 1831. Short liaison with Giuditta Sidoli: one child (died in infancy).

Moved to Switzerland, 1833; founder, Young Switzerland and Young Europe (counterparts to Giovine Italia); expelled from Switzerland and France, and lived in London, 1837–48, where he wrote for various periodicals and newspapers, and became friends with Thomas and Jane Carlyle. Returned to Italy, 1848, to witness revolts, and became triumvir of short-lived Roman Republic; returned to England after Republic's fall; helped to organize unsuccessful uprisings in Milan, 1853, and Genoa, 1857; lived in London, 1860–68; lived in Lugano, from 1868, and secretly in Pisa. Founder, Roma del Popolo, 1871. Died in Pisa, 10 March 1872.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Doveri dell'uomo, 1860; edited by Giuliana Limiti and Alda de Caprariis, 1972, Paolo Rossi, 1972, and Giovanni Spadolini, 1990; as The Duties of Man, translated by Emilie A. Venturi, 1862, and Ella Noyes, in The Duties of Man and Other Essays, 1907
Essays: Selected from the Writings, Literary, Political and Religious (various translators), edited by William Clarke, 1887
"God and the People" ... Being Selections from the Writings, edited by C.W. Stubbs, 1891
Essays, edited by Bolton King, translated by Thomas Okey, 1894
The Duties of Man and Other Essays, translated by Ella Noyes, Thomas Okey, and L. Martineau, 1907
Selected Writings, edited by N. Gangulee, 1945
Dúna letteratura europea e altri saggi, edited by Paolo Mario Sipala, 1991
 Other writings: correspondence.
 Collected works editions: Life and Writings of Joseph Mazzini, 6 vols., 1864–70; Scritti editi ed inediti (Edizione Nazionale), 94 vols., 1906–43; Opere, edited by Luigi Salvatorelli, 2 vols., 1938.

Bibliography

Coppa, Frank J., and William Roberts, Modern Italian History: An Annotated Bibliography, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1990

Further Reading

Barr, Stringfellow, Mazzini: Portrait of an Exile, New York: Holt, 1935
 Griffith, Gwilym O., Mazzini: Prophet of Modern Europe, New York: Fertig, 1970 (original edition, 1932)
 King, Bolton, The Life of Mazzini, London: Dent, and New York: Dutton, 1902
 Mack Smith, Denis, Mazzini, New Haven, Connecticut and London: Yale University Press, 1994
 Morelli, Emilia, L'Inghilterra di Mazzini, Rome: Istituto per la Storia del Risorgimento Italiano, 1965
 Roberts, William, Prophet in Exile: Joseph Mazzini in England, 1837–1868, New York:

Lang, 1989

Salvemini, Gaetano, Mazzini, London: Cape, 1956; Stanford, California: Stanford University Press, 1957

Silone, Ignazio, The Living Thoughts of Mazzini, London: Cassell, and New York: Longman, 1939

Medical Essay

The history of medical narratives stretches back to the earliest days of medicine itself, with two streams sometimes interwoven: the case history and the first-person narrative of illness. Case histories have always been part of medical practice, though observations have always been informed by theory—whether the humoral theory of ancient and medieval medicine, the germ theory of 19th- and 20th-century medicine, or the emphasis on hormones and subcellular processes in the medicine of the last quarter of the 20th century.

Hippocrates, the leading figure in classic Greek medicine, advocated treating the individual rather than the disease, and treating the whole body rather than a part of it. Yet the humors theory attributed to Empedocles was incorporated into Hippocratic writings and, continuing through Aristotle and Galen, became the shaping theory throughout the Middle Ages (when the main interest was in the afterlife, and little attention was given to the human body) and even beyond. In the 17th century a return to Hippocratic medicine brought renewed interest in observing and talking with patients and thus a revival of the case history. In the 18th century, organized records were stressed, with the goal of collecting and classifying data. Only in the late 18th century, as diagnosis began to depend less on theory and more on observation, was the patient's narrative considered essential to diagnosis. Significantly, this period was also one of a major flowering of prose, when the narrative of the novel became accepted as a literary form. Coincidentally, as narrative gained cultural authority, so did the physician. Observing patients and compiling case histories was part of the 18th-century physician's training, and recorded observation played a major role as clinical medicine and statistics evolved.

In the movement toward the clinic as a vehicle for teaching, Michel Foucault (in Naissance de la clinique [1963; The Birth of the Clinic]) perceived a shift in the very epistemology of medicine, a shift to seeing—observation—as the basis for knowing, with the accompanying recording of what was seen. If the focus of medicine in the 18th century, then, was classification, in the 19th century the case history became more elaborate. A standard case history format was codified by the end of the century; it included identifying data, chief complaint, history of the present illness (HPI), patient's history, review of bodily systems, family history, and social history. The HPI required writing in sentences—thus contributing to an overall sense of coherence. Still, illness was somehow separated from the patient—at least for purposes of analyzing, classifying, and prescribing treatment.

In recent years, Lawrence Weed's "SOAP" approach has adopted a four-part medical history: “Subjective” details (the patient’s history), “Objective” data (clinical observations, technological studies), “Assessments” (relying heavily on clinical observations and technical studies), and “Plans.” In Weed’s formula, personal history still retains the narrative element, but the language has become conventional as the structure has become prescribed, though the chief complaint is expected to be given in the patient’s own words. The 20th century has seen the case record moving from the patient’s history and the physical examination to reports of technical studies and imaging and then to intervention through technology. The contemporary case history has a seeming neutrality, even a lack of the humane—a lack that has spurred attempts to reinforce the history of the patient. However, as literary and linguistic theorists have demonstrated, no narrative is valuefree; the medical case history, like any other narrative, is subject to the privileging of the author’s voice and perspective.

Yet, even as the case history moved toward codification, the second stream of medical narrative continued, the tradition of personal accounts of illness. From medieval accounts of the massive spread of, and terrible suffering from, bubonic plague to John Donne’s and Izaak Walton’s 17th-century accounts of illness, and Samuel Johnson’s account in the 18th century of his paralytic stroke, this genre has held the interest of the reading public. From the late 18th century through the 19th, illness narratives and books of popular advice had wide appeal. Among the Romantics, Coleridge wrote of his poetic depression and physical pain, Thomas De Quincey described the pains and dreams associated with his use of opium, and Coleridge’s daughter Sara wrote of her own bouts of depression and confrontations with cancer. The Romantics wrote of Nature in grandiose terms as a sympathetic and protective force, though illness narratives such as Sara Coleridge’s seemed to struggle with such a concept in the presence of real suffering.

In the later 19th century a case history was often used as a warning, particularly against the dangers of excesses, as well as advice on the virtues of moderation. “Nervous” tribulations were frequently the subject of medical essays in this period, which was fascinated by electrical explanations of the nervous system. In the tradition of tracing “nervous” maladies, and in a quest for understanding the whole patient through reconstructing the life story, Sigmund Freud effectively created a new science rooted in narrative, and in the course of this brought the case history to perhaps its highest artistic state. In Freud’s hands, psychoanalysis was, indeed, more art than science as he led the patient (and the reader), in his terms, out of the forest and into the open space where all could be seen clearly as a whole, where dreams could be understood as, primarily, visual pastiches of experience. In his attempt to “decode” what the “dreamwork” had wrought, Freud took his readers through labyrinthine paths as he explored dreams in terms of the unconscious and of wish-fulfillments, and as he devised a whole new vocabulary for the workings of the unconscious: condensation, displacement, symbolic representation, and regression, for example. Freud’s memorable tales of Dora and the Wolf Man, of the burning child who appears in his father’s dream, and of his own young daughter’s dreams of strawberries have enriched the history of the medical narrative and set precedents for contemporary medical essays.

With the increasing emphasis on the technical and on clinical language, the physician has become distanced from the narrative that seeks to present the patient as a whole. In the last quarter of the 20th century, however, the non-technical medical essay has achieved an unprecedented popularity. As a genre, the contemporary medical essay goes beyond the case history to explore the physician's voice and perspective, the physician becoming a persona who makes observations of patients, of medicine, of the world as seen through his or her eyes. As the medical essay attempts to present the human side of medicine, it returns to medicine as an art, attempting to replace or supplement the cold anonymity of the professional medical narrative. A good example is the work of Lewis Thomas, who began writing brief informal essays for the New England Journal of Medicine in 1971; their popularity has led to several collections, beginning with the award-winning The Lives of a Cell: Notes of a Biology Watcher (1974). Thomas brings his perspective as a clinician and epidemiologist to both medical and nonmedical subjects—from subcellular particles to the earth itself, considered as a kind of cell. He brings humor to his essays as he writes about our fascination with killing germs (especially our own) with antiseptic sprays that are given miraculous attributes in television commercials. Subjects ranging from medical history to warts, and to the way in which cells in the embryo “switch on,” call forth Thomas' speculations and reveal his sense of wonder at life and its almost magical qualities.

The most sophisticated medical essays to emerge in the late 20th century often focus, as do many other literary and philosophical texts, on the role of language in conveying knowledge, emotion, and understanding. Thomas demonstrates his fascination with language, exploring the paradox that we can only consider language through language, using the brain to think about how the brain works. More literary and more seriously philosophical in his approach is Oliver Sacks, who also considers the role of language in medicine and attempts to break away from the fragmented, particularized approach to understanding as embodied in the Cartesian-Newtonian world view. This world view, accepted as modern medicine emerged, remains the basis for the analytical (and reductionist) breaking down of the medical condition into its component parts, isolating and treating the causative agent. Sacks has argued that medicine needs to turn to the everyday language—what he calls “metaphysical” language—that we use for things not measurable, and that modern medicine, ostensibly objective, and focusing on “subjects,” carries dangers in that the war metaphors and notions of disease as alien and evil are not questioned. Narrative and drama, Sacks contends, are paths that lead back to the concrete; he looks to a holistic language to encompass both the individual patient and a larger view of the natural environment.

Sacks explores a variety of human conditions for their uniqueness and their instructiveness about the human body. In Awakenings (1973, revised 1976, 1982., 1991) he writes of patients who were brought back from unconscious states by the drug L-dopa, tracing with insight and sympathy the seeming return to life of these patients and also the relapse into arrested consciousness that many later experienced. In The Man Who Mistook His Wife for a Hat (1985), Sacks explores the often bizarre behavior of otherwise normal human beings whose perception of their surroundings is altered by neurological deficiencies—as in the case of the title character, who could deal with the world through singing, but who confused his foot with his shoe and seemed to confuse his wife's head with his hat. In other books he explores migraines as perceived today and throughout history, the culture of the deaf whose linguistic abilities are richly manifested in the visual language of Sign, and his own loss of proprioceptive awareness of self after a broken leg.

Richard Selzer employs in his writing the grotesque and the shocking, often juxtaposed with scenes of striking tenderness, to bring the reader into the realm of the living, bleeding human body. From the grotesquerie of the gangrenous limb upon which the patient had drawn a smiling face to the tenderness of the surgeon who slipped back (because the child's mother wanted her to be beautiful in the afterlife) to repair the cleft lip of a patient who died unexpectedly from anesthesia, Selzer explores the human body in all its decrepitude and beauty. Yet beneath Selzer's descriptions of grotesques there is an almost metaphysical quest (though he declares that he has come to believe there is only the flesh), a quest for meaning in the body, for what he calls "The Exact Location of the Soul." In Selzer's texts there is also a quest for meaning in what he does: he takes the word "doctor" to its Latin root meaning "leading" or "teaching" as he explains that he writes because he wants "to become a doctor."

Less philosophical than Sacks, and less focused on the grotesque than Selzer, but consciously admitting an element of mystery into his clinical tales, is Harold Klawans, who speculates half in jest in Newton's Madness (1990) on the effect of diagnosis on illness, with a nagging doubt that disease undiagnosed may not really be disease. Like Sacks, Klawans explores the human side of neurological disorders (in Toscanini's Fumble [1989] as in his other books) and provides notes to the medical literature; like Thomas, he pursues the etymology of words; like Selzer, he approaches life as mysterium, as something to be admired and not reducible to a neutral language.

These last three writers are representative of a number who tackle the many aspects of the "human" side of medicine. In addition, the late 20th century has also seen a resurgence of the first-person narrative of an individual's encounter with illness, though the focus has now come to include the healthcare system. These narratives, or essays, though not structured in the manner of an essay written by a trained medical observer, have nevertheless contributed to a growing awareness of the importance of the medical essay and of its nature as a construct, rather than a straightforward presentation of objective fact. Although these "pathographies," as Anne H. Hawkins (1993) describes them, are often autobiographical, they may also be considered as indicative of the breadth in scope of the medical essay that has gained it such popularity in recent years.

MARY ELLEN PITTS

Anthologies

Surgical Case-Histories from the Past, edited by Harold Ellis, London and New York: Royal Society of Medicine Press, 1994

Tenements of Clay: An Anthology of Medical Biographical Essays, edited by Arnold Sorsby, London: Friedmann, 1974; New York: Scribner, 1975

Further Reading

Ackerknecht, Erwin H., A Short History of Medicine, Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, revised edition, 1982. (original edition, 1955)

- Baron, Richard, "Bridging Clinical Distance: An Empathic Rediscovery of the Known," Journal of Medicine and Philosophy 6, no. 1 (1981):5–23
- Brody, Howard, Stories of Sickness, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1987
- Charon, Rita, "To Render the Lives of Patients," Literature and Medicine 5 (1986):58–74
- Charon, Rita, "To Build a Case," Literature and Medicine 11, no. 1 (1992):115–32
- Engel, George L, "The Need for a New Medical Model: A Challenge for Biomedicine," Science 196 (1977):129–36
- Epstein, Julia, "Historiography, Diagnosis, and Poetics," Literature and Medicine 11, no. 1 (1992):23–44
- Hawkins, Anne Hunsaker, Reconstructing Illness: Studies in Pathography, West Lafayette, Indiana: Purdue University Press, 1993
- Hilfiker, David, Healing the Wounds: A Physician Looks at His Work, New York: Pantheon, 1985
- Hunter, Kathryn Montgomery, Doctors' Stories: The Narrative Structure of Medical Knowledge, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1991
- Mishler, Elliot G., The Discourse of Medicine: Dialectics of Medical Interviews, Norwood, New Jersey: Ablex, 1984
- Psaty, Bruce M., "Literature and Medicine as a Critical Discourse," Literature and Medicine 6 (1987):13–34
- Rocher, Gregory de, "The Renaissance Wound: The Discourse of Power in Sixteenth-Century Medicine," Romance Quarterly 38, no. 2 (1991):131–37

Meditation

Although today the literary genre of meditation is often supposed to be religious in origin, the term appears soon to have become the designation of a literary form in the late 14th-century secular context. As the written stimulus to a form of prayer, the term developed to indicate a more consciously reflective form of private spiritual activity than contemplation, and it then found conspicuous favor both as a speculative philosophical form, as in Descartes and later in Edmund Husserl, and as pre-Romantic and Romantic expressions of intimate personal feelings, as in Rousseau, who did not use the term to denote a genre, and Alphonse de Lamartine, who used the word in the title of his famous 1820 collection of poetry, Meditations poetiques.

Only subsequently was the word used of the work of stoic devotional reflections composed in solitude by the Roman ruler Marcus Aurelius (121–80 CE) during his military campaigns in the second century CE. His reflections, now known as the Meditations, are fragmentary jottings, often practical in tone, and possibly intended for the guidance of Aurelius' son, Commodus. They were highly prized, notably by John Stuart Mill and Ernest Renan, for the way in which they subordinate stoicism to a love of humanity; but, in spite of the considerations they contain about God, matter, cause, practical reason or conscience, and the governance of the universe, they do not add up to a coherent universal philosophy. The aim of life for Marcus Aurelius was not so much happiness as tranquillity, to be found by living in accordance with nature, understood as human nature. Human beings are social, and conformity to their nature means that they should cultivate what Christians came to regard as the “cardinal” virtues—wisdom, justice, fortitude, and prudence. It is probably on account of their moral content that the reflections came later to be called the Meditations.

Before Descartes, the meditation had become a genre in works of devotion. Meditations on the Passion are among the English works of the early 14th-century English hermit Richard Rolle. In the Spiritual Exercises of Ignatius of Loyola, 16th-century founder of the Jesuit order, the prayerful considerations of mysteries taken from the life of Jesus, as recounted in the Gospel narratives, were known first as contemplations and then, no doubt to distinguish this form of prayer from less discursive types of mental activity directed toward the cultivation of religious devotion, they came to be known as meditations. That term was certainly in use in the Jesuit order shortly after its bull of foundation, dated 1540, and the verb “to meditate” occurs in the Spiritual Exercises themselves, of which a primitive form must have existed in writing by the later 1520s.

Meditations, often in written form, very quickly became part of the devotional heritage of Western Christendom, contrasting with the Church’s official liturgical prayer, which was the chanting of the divine office, as well as with the contemplation described in the writings of some of the mystics. Discursive devotional meditations were published in huge quantities, and came to form the staple of interior prayer cultivated within the active orders of the Church, distinguished from the contemplative orders committed to the chanting of the divine office.

In post-Renaissance Europe the first significant use of the term “meditation” to denote a literary genre was by Descartes. He had conceived the project of writing what he called a “universal science” to elevate human nature to the highest perfection of which it was capable. Using the modish description “method,” at that date replacing the term “art of,” Descartes prefaced a small part of his planned undertaking with the important six-part Discours de la méthode (1937; Discourse on Method). He at first planned a philosophical system which he compared to a tree, with metaphysics as the roots, general physics and the physics of the animal and human kingdoms as the trunk, and mechanics, medicine, and ethics as the fruit. The metaphysics, already sketched in the fourth part of the Discourse, was elaborated in the six Latin meditations of 1641 demonstrating the existence of God and the immortality of the soul, the Meditationes de prima philosophia in qua dei existentia et animae immortalitas demonstratur (1641; Meditations on the first philosophy [metaphysics] in which the existence of God and the immortality of the soul are demonstrated). These, although supposed to have a practical bearing on the way life should be led, and intended finally to lead to an ethic, are overwhelmingly speculative rather than moral. They are increasingly concerned with the union in human beings of spiritual and bodily functions. Descartes’ friend and correspondent, Marin Mersenne, communicated Descartes’ meditations to other learned minds for comment, and Descartes’ replies to the objections to his arguments prompted further objections, and further responses. The debate, which also concerned such religious topics as the action of grace in the soul and the nature of religious faith, became increasingly technical and recondite.

As a poetic genre, the meditation established itself with Lamartine's 1820 Méditations poétiques, the first major western European verse collection with the word "meditation" in the title. The 113-page octavo containing 24 odes and elegies was an immediate and huge success. Later works to use the term were in prose, like Guillaume Apollinaire's Méditations esthétiques (1913; Aesthetic Meditations) and José Ortega y Gasset's Meditaciones del Quijote (1914; Meditations on Quixote), and were critical or philosophical.

Lamartine's volume struck a reverberating chord among a generation of educated young French people. It drew on the feelings exploited by Rousseau, Goethe, Chateaubriand, and Byron, emphasizing the grandeur and solitude of the individual, and parading in a reaction against the materialism of the Industrial Revolution the most intimate and inarticulate experience of the emotionally suppressed and bewildered. The imagery is always precise, the feelings nostalgic, vague, and associated with natural grandeur and personal sadness. The verse, in spite of its apparently nonchalant attitude to poetic technique, is in fact very careful, cultivating a musical fluidity, and giving the impression of nobility, loftiness, and a grandeur of spirit incompatible with anything petty, vulgar, or ungeneralized. In Lamartine, the meditation became the vehicle for the intense lyricism required by his immediate juniors.

Poetry, devotion, and philosophy have, then, all laid claim to the meditation as a subgenre, and the meditation did indeed become a form indigenous in all three realms. It has now, for some decades, been falling out of fashion as a serious literary form in all of them. Perhaps the most important 20th-century work with the term in the title, Husserl's Méditations cartésiennes (1931; Cartesian Meditations), takes up Descartes' usage of the word, using it in a deliberately archaic sense, and as a form in which to attack him. According to Husserl, Descartes' error was to situate the self in the "real world," whereas for Husserl the analysis of the self required a "phenomenological" reduction which excluded everything except mental intentionality. With Husserl the word "meditation" acquires an ironic sense.

ANTHONY LEVI

Further Reading

A great deal of the writing about meditative literature is devoted to poetry. The following items are a selection on prose.

Brumm, Ursula, "The Art of Puritan Meditation in New England," in Studies in New England Puritanism, edited by Winfried Herget, Frankfurt-on-Main: Lang, 1983

Lang, Berel, "Descartes and the Art of Meditation," Philosophy and Rhetoric 21, no. 1 (1988):19–37

Nash, Jerry C., "The Christian-Humanist Meditation on Man: Denisot, Montaigne, Rabelais, Ronsard, Sceve," Bibliothèque d'Humanisme et Renaissance 54, no. 2 (1992.):353–71

Radcliffe, David Hill, Meditations and Literary History, 1600–1750: Generic Mixture and Generic Change (dissertation on Donne, Walton, Cowley, Defoe), Charlottesville: University of Virginia, 1987

Meditations

by Marcus Aurelius, c. 170–80 CE

If the Roman emperor Marcus Aurelius (121–80 CE) was not the philosopher-king that Plato envisioned, he was one of the few rulers who was also a philosopher. Deeply imbued with the doctrines of the Second Sophistic, a revival of Greek culture and thought in the second century CE, he cultivated the Stoicism of Epictetus, focusing on piety toward divine providence, duty, and self-sufficiency. “Constantly think of the Universe as one living creature, embracing one being and one soul,” he admonished. “How it compasses all things with a single purpose, and how all things work together to cause all that comes to pass, and their wonderful web and texture.” At the same time he resisted Stoic materialism, considering the human mind (nous) as distinct from the body. For Marcus Aurelius it was this mind, derived from the divine, that gave humans their agency to choose and act, and therefore commanded their obedience to duty. Failure to follow reason was both immoral and impious. It was in his Meditations that he most fully expressed and more fundamentally lived his Stoic piety, representing what R.B.Rutherford (1989) calls “his complex and humane response to the austerity and bleakness of Stoicism.”

The exact nature and composition of the Meditations is not entirely certain. It was written in Greek, and internal evidence suggests that Marcus Aurelius worked on it during the last years of his life while on campaign along the marshlands of the Danube. The work was never “published,” and was presumably preserved among his papers after his death by his family or scribes. It seems to have been unknown to his early biographers and chroniclers, the first reference to it only appearing two centuries later in an oration by the Greek philosopher and rhetorician Themistius. It was first printed in 1559 in Zurich by Andreas Gesner with a Latin translation by William Xylander. Thomas Gataker published the standard edition in 1652.. Thereafter it has enjoyed a wide readership from poets to statesmen, appreciated both as an important document of the Later Stoa, and as a work of profound selfanalysis and private devotion.

The Meditations contains 12 books. While Book I offers a clear organization and unity, Books II–XII do not. Nor is it evident how Books II–XII are structurally related to Book I. Thus while the themes, language, and aphoristic style remain consistent throughout, there is little sense that Marcus Aurelius is developing an argument or advancing a thesis. Each book may therefore be read as an independent work; the books are linked with one another through their common method and concerns. At the same time, it seems more than a collection of random thoughts or pensées. While various elements of the Meditations find parallels and prototypes in classical authors such as Plato, Lucretius, Horace, Seneca, Epictetus, and Plutarch, it does not fall neatly into any one literary category. Book I develops an autobiographical portrait, though Marcus Aurelius presents himself indirectly through a series of memorials, expressing his gratitude to those who contributed to his success and to the formation of his character, from his grandfather and father, through his teachers, to the gods, who provided “good grandparents, good parents, a good sister, good masters, good intimates, kinfolk, friends, almost everything.”

Some later commentators complain that Books II–XII lack philosophical rigor or originality. This, however, misunderstands the nature of the project. Marcus Aurelius is not so much writing a philosophical or moral treatise as engaging in a philosophical or spiritual exercise. The aphorisms of these later books tend to present a theme and variations in which he explores man’s place in nature, the transience of his achievements, and human mortality. “All is ephemeral,” he writes, “both what remembers and what is remembered.” Given this condition, “What should be valued?” he asks—certainly not the clapping of hands or clicking tongues in approbation. Thus the rewards of glory amount to little. Extending the theme, he later adds, “Alexander the Great and his stable boy were leveled in death, for they were either taken up into the same life-giving principles of the Universe or were scattered without distinction into atoms.” If the transience of things human tempers the fruits of glory, it also mitigates life’s misfortunes. “Continually run over in mind men who were highly indignant at some event,” he says, “men who attained the greatest heights of fame or disaster or enmity or of any kind of fortune whatever. Then pause and think: ‘where is it all now?’ Smoke and ashes and a tale that is told, or not so much as a tale.” It is man’s fate to die and be forgotten; to agonize over the inevitable is pointless. Thus through this rigorous selfinterrogation, Marcus Aurelius confronts his pains and anxieties, teaching himself how to endure. By repeatedly examining human mortality from all its angles, weighing the implications of all possibilities, he is engaged in a process of spiritual care and therapy, a process described by Martha Nussbaum (1994) as important to Hellenistic ethics.

Philosophy for Marcus Aurelius is not an occupation so much as a preoccupation. If the Meditations does not represent an original contribution to Stoic doctrine, and if much of what it contains can be found in the writings of Epictetus and others, it remains nonetheless an eloquent reminder that the goal of philosophy is not merely to know the meaning of life, but to live it.

THOMAS L. COOKSEY

See also Classical Influences

Editions

Meditations, edited and translated by A.S.L. Farquharson (bilingual edition), 2, vols., 1944; translated by C.R. Haines (Loeb Edition), 1930, G.M.A. Grube and Maxwell Stanforth, 1964, and Roy Alan Lawes, 1984

Further Reading

Arnold, Matthew, “Marcus Aurelius,” in his Essays in Criticism: First Series, London: Macmillan, 1865; Boston: Ticknor, 1866

Birley, Anthony, Marcus Aurelius, London: Batsford, and New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1987 (original edition, 1966)

Brunt, P.A., “Marcus Aurelius in his Meditations,” Journal of Roman Studies 64

(1974):1–20

Farquharson, A.S.L., Marcus Aurelius: His Life and His World, Oxford: Oxford University Press, and New York: Salloch, 1951

Grant, Michael, The Antonines: The Roman Empire in Transition, London and New York: Routledge, 1994

Nussbaum, Martha C, The Therapy of Desire: Theory and Practice in Hellenistic Ethics, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1994

Rutherford, R.B., The Meditations of Marcus Aurelius: A Study, Oxford: Clarendon Press, and New York: Oxford University Press, 1989

Stanton, G.R., “The Cosmopolitan Ideas of Epictetus and Marcus Aurelius,” Phronesis 13 (1968):183–95

Stanton, G.R., “Marcus Aurelius, Emperor and Philosopher,” Historia 18 (1969):570–87

Mencken, H.L.

American, 1880–1956

The essays of H.L.Mencken were critical of all aspects of American culture and influenced American thought for over 50 years, setting the standard for satire in his day, especially during the 15-year period following World War I and just prior to the start of the Great Depression. Walter Lippmann referred to Mencken as “the most powerful influence upon his whole generation of American people.” As an essayist he reflected the same provocative and iconoclastic themes as in his work as a newspaper and magazine journalist, editor, author, and contributor to other works. By one estimate, he wrote nearly 3000 newspaper columns. Many of these began as literary criticism and were later advanced in essay form, appearing as part of his six-volume Prejudices series (1919–27). His essays are still widely read.

Mencken first gained recognition as a newspaperman at the Baltimore Sun, serving as editor, columnist, and political and war correspondent. He maintained his Baltimore residence throughout his life and, given many opportunities to relocate, argued: “The very richest man, in New York, is never quite sure that the house he lives in now will be his the next year ...the restlessness and unhappiness that go with it, make it almost impossible for anyone to accumulate the materials of a home” (“On Living in Baltimore,” 1926). The course of Mencken’s reporting career was cut short by a pro-German position he took during World War I, which proved an obstacle to his standing as a civil libertarian, a theme in many of his later essays. Mencken subsequently became author and columnist for “The Free Lance,” gaining acclaim as a humorist, iconoclast, and agnostic, attacking moralists of every stripe and self-styled censors, the “smuthounds.”

Two important early essays appeared first in the Baltimore Sun in 1917, in praise of critic James Gibbons Huneker and writer Joseph Conrad. Mencken became an agent of literary revolt during this period with essays contributed to a wide range of popular and select publications, thus reaching a large and diverse audience. These included conservative political journals, special interest periodicals, and high-brow publications. The Nation and the New Yorker printed his essays as well as Cosmopolitan and Reader’s Digest. Later the Yale Review published “American Language” (1936), which became a consistent favorite among American instructors of literature.

Mencken’s literary interests were stimulated by participation in a group calling itself the Saturday Night Club. This association spurred publication of his essays and short stories for popular magazines. Short Stories magazine was the principal outlet for his essays during this early period (1906–10), although others appeared in Redbook and Frank Leslie’s Popular Magazine. At Leslie’s, Mencken made the acquaintance of Ellery Sedgwick, an association that would create the stimulus for much of his prose nonfiction work. Shortly after Mencken returned to Baltimore from coverage of Berlin in 1917, Sedgwick asked him to write an article for the Atlantic Monthly, for a time after that Mencken devoted most of his energies to writing magazine articles.

Mencken coauthored two essays on medical issues with Baltimore physician Leonard Hirshberg which caught the attention of Theodore Dreiser, who invited a series on child care. Mencken declined the offer but submitted instead “The Slaughter of the Innocents” (1909), which he had ghost-written under Hirshberg’s name. Dreiser ran that piece as part of a series, then began to correspond with Mencken. This resulted in their meeting in New York in 1908 and the invitation to write humorous essays for the Bohemian magazine. Dreiser also recommended Mencken as book reviewer for the New York literary monthly, Smart Set, which is often recognized as the turning point in his writing career. In the “Magazine of Cleverness,” a subtitle Mencken despised, the new literary home offered a counterpoint to his own natural writing tendencies which emphasized a sense of the absurd and attacked the more ludicrous and bizarre aspects of American letters.

During the next decade at Smart Set Mencken estimated that he read 4000 books, reviewing major works by the likes of Upton Sinclair, Sinclair Lewis, Henry James, and even F.Scott Fitzgerald, whose first published story appeared in the magazine. As editor, Mencken published manuscripts by young American writers Zoë Akins, Eugene O’Neill, and Dorothy Parker. In this way he encouraged the growth of American literature and, at the same time, produced some of his best literary criticism, a calling he viewed as a combination of information and entertainment.

In 1914 Mencken assumed coeditorship of Smart Set, along with New York drama critic George Jean Nathan, later joining his partner in founding the American Mercury, giving him a sustained national readership. His work included In Defense of Women (1918), in which he attacked the institution of marriage, and “Treatise on Right and Wrong” (1934), for which he was widely assailed by critics. The “Days” trilogy constituting his autobiography was later published in the early 1940s from essays he had written for the New Yorker. Beginning with his childhood, or “Happy Days,” as he dubbed them, Mencken credited his disposition to his upbringing in Baltimore, a satisfying, secure, and protected environment.

For Mencken, nothing about American culture was sacred. He savaged public figures with his satire, but focused unmercifully as well on general elements of the society he referred to as “Boobus Americanus.” He often took the position that the average American had lost a love of liberty, become complacent and fainthearted, thereby inviting leadership by what he termed “cheer leaders, press agents, up-lifters.” In politics, literature, and religion—those enterprises, according to Mencken, inclined to dullness—he strongly asserted that each had reached unheard-of heights of stupidity in the United States. He expressed disgust for all manner of politicians, describing them as either master rogues or major bores. He likened Warren Harding's inaugural address to "dogs barking idiotically through endless nights." His classic, often-repeated line, upon hearing of the death of Calvin Coolidge, was "How can they be sure?" He referred to Franklin Roosevelt as "Franklin the First," or "Our Lord and Master," casting FDR alongside Woodrow Wilson and William Jennings Bryan as part of Mencken's "triumvirate of shame," labeling them respectively as "thief, liar and fool." His obituary of Bryan, "In Memoriam: WJB" (1926), evaluating the life work of the populist figure, written right after the Scopes-Monkey trial, stands as one of his famous and most frequently reprinted essays.

In his essay "On Being an American" (1922,), Mencken lambasted virtually every immigrant ethnic group, castigating them as "second rate Englishmen," uncivilized and out of touch with their own national culture. In "Sahara of the Bozart" (1917), an essay written originally for the New York Evening Mail, he targeted especially the southern U.S. for its post-Civil War lack of culture. He then published his longest essay entitled "Puritanism as a Literary Force" (1917), which critiqued major literary figures and the influence of the British. He questioned whether intellectual life would exist at all in the U.S. were it not for regular imports from abroad, with London identified as the principal clearing house for new ideas. In "Three American Immortals" (1919) he revisited the promise of major American literary figures, including Emerson, Whitman, and Poe.

Mencken also condemned the limited accomplishments of those to come later, American writers preoccupied with the desires of their fellow men as opposed to the great bulk of serious writing by Dostoevskii and Dreiser, for example, in which the hero's battle ends in defeat, often oblivion. He added that on those rare occasions in which American literary figures have shown signs of enterprise, they have usually reacted to a hostility toward their ideas by departing for alien shores. Mencken observed no earnest pursuit of aesthetic passion in intellectual work but merely uninspiring and self-conscious efforts on a par with English music and German painting. These concerns were lost, he said, on an uncritical American public. He used Shaw as an example, "a blue nose" passed off to America as an Irish patriot.

Mencken consistently mocked American education. He maintained that most American scholars would be entirely lost if they were unable to borrow from others, adding that their limited mental capacity made it impossible for them to take on difficult enterprises. As a result, academic institutions were suffering from attempts to Americanize their curriculum. In "Criticism of Criticism of Criticism" (1919) he compared a professor with a theory to a dog with fleas. His assault on the style of Thorstein Veblen, entitled "Professor Veblen" (1919), and his comic evaluation of Columbia University President Nicholas Murray Butler—"He is a member of the American Academy himself, elected as a wet to succeed Edgar Allan Poe" ("Want Ad," 1919)—continue to delight readers.

As to his own motivation, Mencken said: "...an author, like any other so-called artist, is a man in whom the normal vanity of all men is so vastly exaggerated that he feels the sheer impossibility to hold it in. His overpowering impulse is to gyrate before his fellow men, flapping his wings and emitting defiant yells" ("The Fringes of Lovely Letters," 1926). He followed his own counsel and wrote his "yells" in the form of personal reminiscent essays, which remain among his most popular works.

MICHAEL D.MURRAY

Biography

Henry Louis Mencken. Born 12 September 1880 in Baltimore, Maryland. Studied at the Baltimore Polytechnic Institute, 1892–96. Worked in his father’s cigar factory, 1896–99. Reporter or editor for several Baltimore papers, 1899–16; literary critic, 1908–23, and editor, with George Jean Nathan, 1914–23, Smart Set, New York; founder, with Nathan, Parisienne, Saucy Stories, and Black Mask pulp magazines, late 1910S, and American Mercury (also editor), 1923–33; war correspondent in Germany, 1916–18; literary adviser, Knopf publishers, New York, from 1917; columnist, New York Evening Mail, 1917–18, and of “The Free Lance,” Baltimore Sunpapers, 1919–41 and 1948; contributor, Chicago Tribune, 1924–28, New York American, 1934–35, and the Nation, 1931–32. Married Sara Powell Haardt, 1930 (died, 1935). Suffered a stroke which impaired his speech, 1949. Awards: American Academy Gold Medal, 1950. Died (of heart failure) in Baltimore, 29 January 1956.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

A Book of Prefaces, 1917

In Defense of Women, 1918

Prejudices, 6 vols., 1919–27; Prejudices: A Selection, edited by James T. Farrell, 1958

Happy Days: 1880–1892, 1940

Newspaper Days: 1899–1906, 1941

Heathen Days: 1890–1936, 1943

The Vintage Mencken, edited by Alistair Cooke, 1955

A Carnival of Buncombe, edited by Malcolm Moos, 1956; as On Politics, 1960

The Bathtub Hoax, and Other Blasts and Bravos from the Chicago Tribune, edited by Robert McHugh, 1958

Smart Set Criticism, edited by William H. Nolte, 1968

The Young Mencken: The Best of His Work, edited by Carl Bode, 1973

A Choice of Days (selection), edited by Edward L. Galligan, 1980

The Impossible Mencken: A Selection of His Best Newspaper Stories, edited by Marion Elizabeth Rodgers, 1991

Other writings: Ventures into Verse (1903), George Bernard Shaw (1905), The Philosophy of Friedrich Nietzsche (1908), The Artist: A Drama Without Words (1912), A Little Book in C Major (1916), Damn! A Book of Calumny (1918), The American Language (1919 and later revisions and supplements), memoirs (including Thirty-Five Years of Newspaper Work: A Memoir, edited by Fred Hobson, Vincent Fitzpatrick, and Bradford Jacobs, 1994), diaries, and correspondence.

Bibliographies

- Adler, Betty, and Jane Wilhelm, H.L.M.: The Mencken Bibliography, Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1961
- Adler, Betty, The Mencken Bibliography: A Ten-Year Supplement, 1962–1971, Baltimore: Enoch Pratt Free Library, 1971
- Bulsterbaum, Allison, H.L.Mencken: A Research Guide, New York: Garland, 1988
- Fitzpatrick, Vincent, HLM: The Mencken Bibliography, a Second Ten-Year Supplement, 1972–1981, Baltimore: Enoch Pratt Free Library, 1986
- Frey, Carroll, A Bibliography of the Writings of H.L.Mencken, Folcroft, Pennsylvania: Folcroft, 1969 (original edition, 1924)
- Porter, Bern, H.L.Mencken: A Bibliography, Pasadena, California: Geddes Press, 1957

Further Reading

- Angoff, Charles, H.L.Mencken: A Portrait from Memory, New York: Yoseloff, 1956
- Bode, Carl, Mencken, Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1969
- Boyd, Ernest, H.L.Mencken, New York: McBride, 1925
- Cooke, Alistair, “The Baltimore Fox: An Appraisal by a British Journalist of a Writer with an Inimitable Style,” Saturday Review, 10 September 1955; from Cooke’s Introduction to The Vintage Mencken, edited by Cooke, New York: Vintage, 1955
- Cooke, Alistair, “The Last Happy Days of H.L.Mencken,” Atlantic Monthly 197 (May 1956): 33–38
- Dorsey, John, editor, On Mencken, New York: Knopf, 1980
- Douglas, George H., H.L.Mencken: Critic of American Life, Hamden, Connecticut: Archon, 1978
- Downs, Robert B., “The Great Debunker,” in his Books That Changed America, New York: Macmillan, 1970
- Farrell, James T., “Dr. Mencken: Criticus Americanus,” in his Reflections at Fifty and Other Essays, New York: Vanguard Press, 1954; London: Spearman, 1956
- Goldberg, Isaac, The Man Mencken: A Biographical and Critical Survey, New York: Simon and Schuster, 1925
- Hecht, Ben, “About Mencken,” in his Letters from Bohemia, Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1964
- Kemler, Edgar, The Irreverent Mr. Mencken, Boston: Little Brown, 1950
- Kummer, Frederic Arnold, “Something Must Have Happened to Henry,” Bookman 65 (June 1927)
- Leary, Lewis, “H.L.Mencken: Changeless Critic in Changing Times,” in The Young Rebel in American Literature, edited by Carl Bode, London: Heinemann, 1959; New York: Praeger, 1960
- Manchester, William, Disturber of the Peace: The Life of H.L. Mencken, Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1986 (original edition, 1951)
- Mayfield, Sara, The Constant Circle: H.L.Mencken and His Friends, New York: Delacorte Press, 1968
- Nolte, William H., H.L.Mencken: Literary Critic, Middletown, Connecticut: Wesleyan University Press, 1966

- Rubin, Louis D., "H.L. Mencken of the Baltimore Sunpapers," Virginia Quarterly Review 71 (Spring 1995)
- Stenerson, Douglas C., H.L. Mencken: Iconoclast from Baltimore, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1971
- William, W.H.A., H.L. Mencken, Boston: Twayne, 1977
- Williams, Michael, "Mencken's Bible for Boobs," Commonweal, 2 April 1930

Mendelssohn, Moses

German, 1729–1786

Moses Mendelssohn plays a central role in the genesis of modern German literary criticism. Destined to become a rabbi and trained in Talmudic scholarship, Mendelssohn arrived as a young student in Berlin. Introduced to the arts and sciences, he soon became involved in the enlightened circles of Berlin's young literati. There he met Lessing, whose friendship became a lifelong inspiration. Forced to support himself and later his family, he began as a tutor, but was soon made manager and eventually partner of the silk factory of his students' father. Mendelssohn's extramural education, his autodidactic genius, and the conversational tone of intellectual life may all have contributed to the essayistic and refined fashion of his writing.

Defining his own discursive terrain, he began as author of Philosophische Gespräche (1755; Philosophical dialogues), Briefe über die Empfindungen (1755; Letters on sensations), and its sequel "Rhapsodie" (1761). These philosophical essays introduce a new, civil tone to metaphysics. Conceived as dialogues, they not only bring fresh air to the stuffy quarters of philosophy but are accessible to a larger public. Mendelssohn thus transformed philosophy into a concern shared by all which, therefore, must transcend the narrow confines of academia and address itself to the public. The prevailing view is to see Mendelssohn as nothing more than a representative of popular philosophy, occupied more with disseminating knowledge than with rethinking it. Yet such a view ignores the deeper implications the choice of the essay as a literary genre entails for philosophy itself. In staging philosophical arguments as dialogues, the discourse of philosophy changes its format, but also its priorities, interests, and concerns. Paradoxically, it seems that Mendelssohn was engaged in a philosophically more challenging enterprise when he chose to compose essays. Reformulating philosophical arguments in the form of dialogues was a matter of recontextualized philosophy, allowing the validity of its own presuppositions to be examined in an unassuming manner. The essay genre—Hume and Shaftesbury were his most prominent models—allowed Mendelssohn to engage in intellectual debate at the social and institutional margins without falling prey to the mechanisms of exclusion. It also provided the means to reformulate philosophy as a discourse outside the exclusive framework of Christian theology, in which the Leibniz-Wolffian school of philosophy of 18th-century Germany was still deeply imbedded.

With his innovative essay form Mendelssohn emerged as Germany's leading literary critic. As coeditor, consultant, and single most prolific contributor to the review journals his friend Friedrich Nicolai published—Bibliothek der schönen Wissenschaften und der freyen Künste (1757–59; Library of the humanities and the liberal arts), Briefe die neueste Literatur betreffend (1758–61; Letters on contemporary literature), and Allgemeine deutsche Bibliothek (1765–84; Universal German library)—he was instrumental in forging German literary criticism into a powerful participant in the public sphere. Departing from the practice of assessing literature, poetry, and drama according to preconceived standards, Mendelssohn's reviews acknowledged the poetics of each work within its own cultural and poetological setting, appreciating each on its own specific terms. According to Mendelssohn, the critic's task does not consist of applying fixed rules and standards so much as it consists of presenting, as a public advocate, each case to the public, which in turn is expected to serve as judge. As facilitator of this process, the literary critic's essays aim at transparency, attempting to trace the most subtle sensations, reflections, emotions, and feelings in experiencing literature and fine arts. In so doing the critic creates the necessary forum for discussing aesthetic experience. This makes it possible for the public to realize its task as the ultimate judge in art and literature.

Mendelssohn was one of the most sophisticated comparatists of the 18th century, thoroughly versed in biblical literature, Homer, Dante, Shakespeare, French and German literature, and equipped with a rare sensibility for aesthetic quality and philosophical reasoning; his reviews established the standards that served as frames of reference to aesthetic theorists like Kant, Herder, Goethe, Karl Philipp Moritz, and Schiller.

In Jerusalem, oder über religiöse Macht und Judentum (1783; Jerusalem, or, On Religious Power and Judaism), Mendelssohn presents the question of Jewish emancipation as a central issue for modern culture; the plea for equal rights and social acceptance are expressed in a style and rhetoric typical of Mendelssohn. These essayistic strengths make Jerusalem stand out from the literary landscape of its era as a uniquely powerful work.

The "German Socrates"—as Mendelssohn was called after the rewriting of Plato's Phädon (1767) brought him international fame—redefined the philosophical essay and the review as new forms in which conflicting interests could be expressed and the demand for aesthetic autonomy justified. Mendelssohn's writing was celebrated for its fluidity, precision, civility, and stylistic beauty, and it assumed paradigmatic importance for critics and poets alike. Mendelssohn's aesthetic theory introduced its themes in an aesthetically pleasing form: versatile enough both to respond to aesthetic expectations and to adhere to the discipline that informs the discourse of philosophy. Mendelssohn participated in the Enlightenment debate in the 1780s with a series of pieces addressing the role of Enlightenment. They are short and concise interventions, programmatic essays forcefully arguing for the collaborative search for truth and the best for society.

WILLI GOETSCHEL

Biography

Born 6 September 1729 in Dessau. Studied the Bible and the Talmud under Rabbi David Fränkel, following him to Berlin, 1743, and studying at his Talmud Academy. Private tutor, from 1750. Met and became friends with Lessing, 1753. Accountant, then assistant to a silk merchant, from 1754, and part owner of the factory on his death, from 1768. Founder, with Friedrich Nicolai, Bibliothek der schönen Wissenschaften und der freyen Künste, 1757, and with Nicolai and Lessing, Briefe die neueste Literatur betreffend, 1758. Married Fromet Gugenheim, 1762.: five children, one of whom was the father of Felix Mendelssohn (two others died). Awards: Prussian Academy Prize, 1763. Died in Berlin, 4 January 1786.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Briefe über die Empfindungen, 1755

Philosophische Gespräche, 1755

Philosophische Schriften, 1761; revised edition, 1771, 1777

Abhandlung über die Evidenz in metaphysischen Wissenschaften, 1764

Phädon, oder über die Unsterblichkeit der Seele, 1767; edited by Dominique Bourel, 1979; as Phädon; or, The Death of Socrates, translated by Charles Cullen, 1789

Schreiben an den Herrn Diaconus Lavater zu Zürich, 1770; as Letter of Moses Mendelssohn, to Deacon Lavater, translated by Frederick Henry Hedge, 1821, and in Memoirs of Moses Mendelssohn, 1825

Jerusalem, oder über religiöse Macht und Judentum, 1783; as Jerusalem: A Treatise on Ecclesiastical Authority and Judaism, translated by M.Samuels, 1838; as Jerusalem: A Treatise on Religious Power and Judaism, translated by Isaac Leeser, 1852; as Jerusalem, or, On Religious Power and Judaism, edited by Alexander Altmann, translated by Allan Arkush, 1983

Morgenstunden; oder, Vorlesungen über das Daseyn Gottes, 1785; edited by Dominique Bourel, 1979

Abhandlung von der Unkörperlichkeit der menschlichen Seele, 1785

Moses Mendelssohn an die Freunde Lessings, edited by Johann Jakob Engel, 1786

Abhandlungen über das Kommerz zwischen Seele und Körper, 1788

Kleine philosophische Schriften, 1789

Aufsätze über jüdische Gebete und festfeier aus archivalischen Akten, edited by L.E.Borowski, 1791

Jerusalem, and Other Jewish Writings, edited and translated by Alfred Jospe, 1969

Moses Mendelssohn: Selections from His Writings, edited and translated by Eva Jospe, 1975

Schriften über Religion und Aufklärung, edited by Martin Thom, 1989

Other writings: books on Judaism, and correspondence. Also translated Rousseau, and with others translated the Torah.

Collected works editions: Sämmtliche Werke, 12 vols., 1819–25; Gesammelte Schriften, edited by Ismar Elbogen, Julius Guttmann, Eugen Mittwoch, and others, 22 vols., 1974– (in progress).

Bibliographies

- Albrecht, Michael, "Moses Mendelssohn: Ein Forschungsbericht, 1965–1980," Deutsche Vierteljahrsschrift für Literaturwissenschaft 57 (March 1983): 64–159
- Meyer, Hermann M.Z., Moses Mendelssohn Bibliographie, Berlin: de Gruyter, 1965

Further Reading

- Albrecht, Michael, Eva J. Engel, and Norbert Hinske, editors, Moses Mendelssohn und die Kreise seiner Wirksamkeit, Tübingen: Niemeyer, 1994
- Altmann, Alexander, Moses Mendelssohn: A Biographical Study, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, and Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1973
- Altmann, Alexander, Die trostvolle Aufklärung: Studien zur Metaphysik und politischen Theorie Moses Mendelssohns, Stuttgart and Bad Cannstatt: Frommann-Holzboog, 1982
- Arkush, Allen, Moses Mendelssohn and the Enlightenment, Albany: State University of New York Press, 1994
- Engel, Eva J., "Moses Mendelssohn: His Importance as a Literary Critic," Lessing Yearbook supplement (1982): 259–73
- Goetschel, Willi, "Moses Mendelssohn und das Projekt der Aufklärung," Germanic Review 71 (1996): 163–75

Menéndez y Pelayo, Marcelino

Spanish, 1856–1912.

Marcelino Menéndez y Pelayo is the earliest Spanish historian of literature, culture, and ideas whose erudition and theories must still be taken into account by contemporary researchers. From an early age he demonstrated prodigious academic ability, studying with the most significant Spanish university professors of the time in Barcelona, Valladolid, and Madrid. This resulted in a Ph.D. in 1875 from the University of Madrid, governmental fellowships for research in Portugal, Italy, and France, and, following public competitive exams, in being named to the chair of literature at that university in the autumn of 1878.

Unfortunately Menéndez y Pelayo grew up and came to intellectual maturity in the years of civil war and fierce ideological and religious contention before, during, and after the period marked by the 1868 expulsion of the Bourbon monarchy from Spain and its 1875 restoration. Hence, while his first essays of the early 1870s were always notable for their learning, they also revealed a conservative but nationalistic Catholic ideology which represented to Menéndez y Pelayo the great tradition of what made Spain Spain; nonetheless, this course simultaneously estranged him from liberals (centered around the Krausists—followers of the German philosopher Karl Christian Friedrich Krause) and ultramontanists.

As was typical among intellectuals and writers in the Spain of the 1870s, Menéndez y Pelayo began publishing scholarly essays in such leading national and regional journals and magazines as La Ilustración Española y Americana (Spanish and American illustration), Revista Histórico-Latina (Latin-historical review), La España Católica (Catholic Spain), Revista Europea (European review), La Tertulia (The gathering), and Revista Cántabro-Asturiana (Cantabria-Asturias review).

Of Menéndez y Pelayo's great multi-volume projects, two especially were received in their time as products of the charged ideological rivalries. La ciencia española (1879, 1887–88; Spanish science), which became a three-volume work, always retained the imprint of its birth as a series of polemical letters published in Revista de España (Spanish review) in 1876. The essay-letters attacked the notion that the Spanish Inquisition and Monarchy destroyed the possibility of European-style science and progress in Spain. Moreover they introduced and analyzed physical scientists, philosophers, and medical researchers who were little remembered in the 19th century, but who flourished in Spain during the previous three centuries and deserved notice.

The second polemical work is the famous and frequently reprinted Historia de los heterodoxos españoles (1880–81, 1911–3 2.; History of Spanish heretics). It began as a series of interpretative biographical sketches during Menéndez y Pelayo's student days, but reached three volumes during its first publication and eventually extended to seven. In their final form the individual studies—which range from Roman times on the Iberian Peninsula to the middle of the 19th century—became integrated into a major, albeit partisan study of cults, schools, and individuals whose thought differed from that of orthodox Catholicism as established through Church Councils and papal pronouncements.

The publication in 23 volumes between 1982. and 1991 of letters written by Menéndez y Pelayo and to him from all parts of Europe and the Americas, and the 1982 conference and its proceedings, Menéndez y Pelayo: Hacia una nueva imagen (1983; Menéndez y Pelayo: toward a new image), gave a productive orientation to contemporary use and evaluation of the writer's work and place in Spanish culture and thought. The collection acknowledges his polemical and ideological dimensions, and hence emphasizes that considerable part of his work not limited by bias and partisanship.

STEPHEN MILLER

Biography

Born 3 November 1856 in Santander. Studied at the Universities of Barcelona, Valladolid, and Madrid, Ph.D., 1875, and at the major libraries in Portugal, France, and Italy. Professor of literary history, University of Madrid, 1878–98. Elected to the Royal Spanish Academy of the Language, 1881. Elected member, 1883, librarian, 1893–95, and director, 1910–12, Royal Spanish Academy of History. Director, National Library, Madrid, from 1898. Deputy to Spanish Parliament for Mallorca, 1884, and Saragossa, 1891, and senator representing the University of Oviedo, 1893–95, and the Royal Spanish Academy of the Language, 1899–1912. Died in Santander, 19 May 1912.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Estudios sobre escritores montañeses, 1877

La ciencia española, 1879; revised, enlarged edition, 3 vols., 1887–88

Historia de los heterodoxos españoles, 3 vols., 1880–81; revised, enlarged edition, 7 vols., 1911–32

Calderón y su teatro, 1881

Estudios de crítica literaria, 5 vols., 1884–1908

Ensayos de crítica filosófica, 1892

Estudios sobre el teatro de Lope de Vega, 6 vols., 1919–17

Other writings: works on classical and Spanish literature, aesthetics, history, and correspondence (collected in Epistolario, edited by Manuel Revuelta Sañudo, 23 vols., 1982–91). Also edited part of the edition of Lope de Vega's works (1890–1912).

Collected works edition: Obras completas (Edición Nacional), edited by Enrique Sánchez Reyes, 70 vols., 1940–57.

Bibliographies

Simón Díaz, José, Estudios sobre Menéndez y Pelayo, Madrid: Instituto de Estudios Madrileños, 1954

Simón Díaz, José, "Bibliografía de y sobre Menéndez y Pelayo, 1939–1955," Arbor: Revista General de Investigación y Cultura 34, nos. 117–18 (July–August 1956): 536–59

Further Reading

Artigas y Ferrando, Miguel, La vida y la obra de Menéndez y Pelayo, Saragossa: Heraldo de Aragón, 1939

Calzada Rodríguez, Luciano de la, La historia de España en Menéndez y Pelayo, Murcia: University of Murcia, 1957

Donoso, Armando, Menéndez y Pelayo y su obra, Santiago: University of Chile Press, 1913

Gili Gaya, Samuel, Sobre la "Historia de las ideas estéticas en España" de Menéndez y Pelayo, Santander: Sociedad Menéndez y Pelayo, 1956

Lázaro Carreter, Fernando, Menéndez y Pelayo: Su época y su obra literaria, Salamanca: Anaya, 2 vols., 1962

Revuelta Sañudo, Manuel, La biblioteca de Menéndez y Pelayo, Santander: Sociedad Menéndez y Pelayo, 1982

Revuelta Sañudo, Manuel, editor, Menéndez y Pelayo: Hacia una nueva imagen, Santander: Sociedad Menéndez y Pelayo, 1983

Sainz Rodríguez, Pedro, Menéndez y Pelayo, ese desconocido, Madrid: Fundación Universitaria Española, 1975

Santovena Setién, Antonio, Marcelino Menéndez y Pelayo: Revisión crítico-biográfica de un pensador católico, Santander: University of Cantabria, 1994

Merton, Thomas

American, 1915–1968

One of the most prolific American Catholic writers of the 20th century, Thomas Merton produced a supple, contemplative prose style that grew out of his contemplative life as a Cistercian monk. Or it could be said that the prose style preceded the lifestyle, for the nature of Merton's writing was established well before he became a priest and a monk. In an era when the American essay was becoming almost embarrassingly intimate, Merton's own prose, though it could be called "personal" in style, exhibited a personalism that de-emphasized the value of the self. Even his spiritual autobiography, The Seven Storey Mountain (1948), which by its nature must focus on himself, is not so much self-conscious as conscious that the self is an illusion. "Free by nature," begins the second sentence in the book, "in the image of God, I was nevertheless the prisoner of my own violence and my own selfishness, in the image of the world into which I was born." In all his writing, Merton's spirituality is inseparable from his style.

For readers, however, the connection between Merton's contemplative prayer and his writing must be heavily qualified. Merton thought of contemplation as the "cloud of unknowing" imagined by an anonymous 14th-century mystic, a prayer carefully devoid of images. Yet writing that is emptied of images is very dull, and almost invariably bad. Hence even the most transcendent and abstract spiritual experiences appear in Merton's prose in concrete images. The saint's radical freedom in God he expresses this way in Seeds of Contemplation (1949): "A door opens in the center of our being and we seem to fall through it into immense depths which, although they are infinite, are all accessible to us." Even the "cloud of unknowing" and "the dark night of the soul" are themselves images in writing, for all that they represent an imageless contemplation.

Merton's prose is capable of abstraction, of course, and he is capable of abstract thought. In a lengthy paragraph critiquing Marxism, which very quickly turns to a personal critique of Marx, Merton writes, in prose filled with generalities as vague as those of the worst Marxist rhetoric, about the terrible effects of Marx's "bourgeois and Jewish conscience" on the world. But just as the connections Merton makes are about to collapse into their own abstraction, he ends the paragraph with a picture that focuses as sharply on Marx as on the "effects" Merton has asserted: "Because Marx raged at himself and everyone else and wore out a path in his carpet walking up and down the room cursing his boils, there are now twenty million persons in Soviet forced labor camps" (The Monastic Journey, 1977). What had been abstract assertion is now realized in a verbal diptych.

Though his formal theological writings can be as involuted in thought and style as those of Thomas Aquinas, whom Merton revered, his attempts to popularize contemplative life, or to explain it to a lay audience, could be simple and aphoristic.

Thus, in attempting to counter a Manichaeian tendency in religion, the error of valuing only spirit and scorning material reality, Merton crossed Alexander Pope's "Everything that is, is right" with William Blake's "Everything that lives is holy" to say "Everything that is, is holy," a chapter title in Seeds of Contemplation. (Blake in fact was an important influence in Merton's thought and writing, and his "Proverbs of Hell" in The Marriage of Heaven and Hell [1793] may be a source of Merton's own aphoristic style.)

Merton's aphorisms, however, are not presented as proverbs, disembodied snippets of wisdom. They always arise naturally as incandescent condensations of the point he is moving toward in the paragraph. "The spiritual life is first of all a life" (Thoughts in Solitude, 1958). "All true love is a death and a resurrection in Christ" (Disputed Questions, 1960). "The devil believes in God but he has no God" (No Man Is an Island, 1955). "To see your hope is to abandon hope" (The New Man, 1961). "As long as we are in this world, our life in Christ remains hidden" (The Living Bread, 1956). "When a myth becomes a daydream it is judged, found wanting, and must be discarded" (Conjectures of a Guilty Bystander, 1966). Yet sentences like these differ from proverbs and folk sayings in that their meanings are not self-contained: they need to be unfolded in the sentences that surround them. By themselves they either make no sense or seem incomplete.

Though most of his prose tends toward the theological, Merton's essays touch on any number of subjects, primarily literary and art criticism (his early training was in art, his graduate studies in literature) and politics. Since his vocation as a writer preceded his vocation as a priest, and since he considered both to be literally calls from God, Merton maintained a keen interest in the role of literature and art in the culture of the 20th century. Thus an essentially religious book, Disputed Questions, begins with a 20,000-word chapter on the Russian novelist Boris Pasternak, with whom Merton had corresponded in the years just before Pasternak's death.

As well known for his poetry as his prose, Merton displays the poet's ear for prose rhythm. In a random passage in his journal Conjectures of a Guilty Bystander Merton attributes to Gregory the Great a break from the classical style in medieval Latin toward a rhythm that simplified medieval prose the way Gregorian chant simplified medieval music. There is no doubt that a little of Gregory's simplified prose rhythms also crept into Merton's writing, especially since he tells us that he spent a year of his novitiate reading Gregory's Moralia. One of the wonders of Merton's prose is that it sounds very contemporary while yet echoing in rhythm, diction, and, of course, doctrine, the great writers of Catholic antiquity.

JOHN R.HOLMES

Biography

Born 31 January 1915 in Prades, France. Brought to the United States, 1916; returned to France, 1925, then lived in England, from 1928, and back in the U.S., from 1934; became a U.S. citizen, 1951. Studied at Clare College, Cambridge, 1933–34; Columbia University, New York, 1935–38, B.A., 1938, M.A., 1939. Instructor in English, Columbia University, 1938–39, and St. Bonaventure University, New York, 1939–41. Cistercian monk at the Abbey of Our Lady of Gethsemani, near Bardstown, Kentucky, 1941–68: ordained priest, 1949, master of scholastics, 1951–55, master of novices, 1955–65, and lived as a hermit in the grounds of the monastery, 1965–68. Awards: Mariana Griswold Van Rensselaer Award, 1939; Catholic Literary Award, 1949; Catholic Writers Guild Golden Book Award, 1951; Columbia University Medal for Excellence, 1961; Pax Medal, 1963; honorary degree from one university. Died (accidentally electrocuted) in Bangkok, Thailand, 10 December 1968.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

What Is Contemplation?, 1948

Seeds of Contemplation, 1949; revised edition, as New Seeds of Contemplation, 1962

The Ascent to Truth, 1951

Bread in the Wilderness, 1953

No Man Is an Island, 1955

The Living Bread, 1956

The Silent Life, 1957

Thoughts in Solitude, 1958

Spiritual Direction and Meditation, 1960

Disputed Questions, 1960; selection as The Power and Meaning of Love, 1976

The Behavior of Titans, 1961

The New Man, 1961

A Thomas Merton Reader, edited by Thomas P. McDonnell, 1962

Life and Holiness, 1963

Seeds of Destruction, 1964

Seasons of Celebration, 1965

Mystics and Zen Masters, 1967

Zen and the Birds of Appetite, 1968

Faith and Violence: Christian Teaching and Christian Practice, 1968

The Climate of Monastic Prayer, 1969; as Contemplative Prayer, 1969

The True Solitude: Selections from the Writings, edited by Dean Walley, 1969

Opening the Bible, 1970; revised edition, 1983

Contemplation in a World of Action, 1971

Thomas Merton on Peace, 1971; revised edition, as The Nonviolent Alternative, edited by Gordon C. Zahn, 1980

Spiritual Direction and Meditation; and, What Is Contemplation?, 1975

Thomas Merton on Zen, 1976

Ishi Means Man: Essays on Native Americans, 1976

The Monastic Journey, edited by Patrick Hart, 1977

Love and Living, edited by Naomi Burton Stone and Patrick Hart, 1979

Thomas Merton on St. Bernard, 1980

Introductions East and West: The Foreign Prefaces, edited by Robert E. Daggy, 1981; revised, enlarged edition, as Honorable Reader: Reflections on My Work, edited by Daggy, 1989

The Literary Essays, edited by Patrick Hart, 1981

“Monks Pond”: Thomas Merton’s Little Magazine, edited by Robert E. Daggy, 1989

Thomas Merton, Spiritual Master: The Essential Writings, edited by Lawrence

S.Cunningham, 1992

Passion for Peace: The Social Essays, edited by William Shannon, 1995

Other writings: poetry, volumes of autobiography (including The Seven Storey Mountain, 1948; as Elected Silence, 1949), and several volumes of journals and correspondence.

Bibliographies

Breit, Marquita, Thomas Merton: A Bibliography, Metuchen, New Jersey: Scarecrow Press, 1974

Dell'Isola, Frank, Thomas Merton: A Bibliography, Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 1975

Further Reading

Bailey, Raymond, Thomas Merton on Mysticism, New York: Doubleday, 1975

Furlong, Monica, Merton, a Biography, New York: Harper and Row, 1980; London: SPCK, revised edition, 1995

Kramer, Victor A., "Thomas Merton's Published Journals: The Paradox of Writing as a Step Toward Contemplation," Studia Mystica 3 (1980):3–20

Kramer, Victor A., "Merton's Affirmation and the Affirmation of Merton: Writing About Silence," Review 4(1981):295–334

Kramer, Victor A., Thomas Merton, Boston: Twayne, 1984

Labrie, Ross, The Art of Thomas Merton, Fort Worth: Texas Christian University Press, 1979

McInerney, Dennis Q., Thomas Merton: The Man and His Work, Spencer, Massachusetts: Cistercian Publications, 1974

Twomey, Gerald, editor, Thomas Merton: Prophet in the Belly of a Paradox, New York: Paulist Press, 1978

Woodcock, George, Thomas Merton, Monk and Poet: A Critical Study, Vancouver: Douglas and McIntyre, Edinburgh: Canongate, and New York: Farrar Straus Giroux, 1978

Meynell, Alice

British, 1847–1922.

In 1919, Theodore Maynard wrote of Alice Meynell that "of all the prose writers of the Twentieth Century, she is the one most certain of immortality." Though we might question Maynard's prescience today, Meynell was widely regarded as one of the most important essayists of her day due to the remarkable quantity and quality of her essays. Although critical and scholarly commentary on Meynell has been sparse since her death, her essays are still insightful, elegant, and vivid, and cover a wide range of subjects from literary criticism to women's suffrage to English grammar to children. A disciplined Catholic spiritualism pervades her outlook, but it is not dogmatic or overbearing and not nearly so evident as it is in her more private poetry, for which she was also much admired. Her skills as a poet inform much of her prose writing in its precise diction, elaborate style, and figurative language, but also in its perception of life, particularly in the opening lines of "The Rhythm of Life" (1889), her impressive early essay on the regularity—what Meynell calls the "periodicity"—of human existence: "If life is not always poetical, it is at least metrical." Such an opening sentence shows Meynell's mastery of the lead, the attention-grabber necessary in journalism, and of the well-put, surprising, witty observation. Indeed, her essays are a unique blend of literary sophistication and journalistic observation and accessibility. From her early journalistic writing to the end of her career, Meynell considered herself a professional writer who demanded her own personal standards of excellence, and her essays bear the mark of an incisive cultural critic writing for and about the age in which she lived. In her insistence upon the important contribution of women in society, she is also, in the essay, Virginia Woolf's most immediate precursor.

Most of Meynell's essays first appeared in periodicals such as the Scots Observer, the Saturday Review, the Spectator, and particularly the Pall Mall Gazette, for which Meynell wrote a weekly column from 1893 to 1898. Her column, "The Wares of Autolycus," named after both the thief of Greek mythology and the endearing pedlar in Shakespeare's The Winter's Tale, "a snapper-up of unconsidered trifles," was intended initially for women readers of the Pall Mall Gazette, which was both a newspaper and literary review; but the column soon broadened in its appeal to include a larger family audience, and Meynell became recognized for writing insightful essays on children. Most of her important essays first appeared here, and the column's title, most likely provided by the editors, suggests that Meynell's purpose in the column was to reconsider the familiar and seemingly insignificant elements of everyday life. Her literary and aesthetic writing appealed to a well-read, sophisticated, but general audience; she wrote critical introductions to popular collections of poets such as Elizabeth Barrett Browning (1896, 1916), William Wordsworth (1903), Percy Bysshe Shelley (1903), Robert Herrick (1905), William Cowper (1905), Christina Rossetti (1906), William Blake (1911), and others. Interestingly, Meynell wrote commentaries on (at the time) less familiar women writers of the Romantic period, who are currently being reincorporated into the literary canon, such as Anna Seward and Joanna Baillie, in The Second Person Singular (1921), and Mary Wollstonecraft and Elizabeth Inchbald, published in the posthumous collection Essays of Today and Yesterday (1926). Throughout her career, Meynell revised and collected her essays for ten volumes published to much popular and critical acclaim. Several of these editions have been reprinted since her death. During her lifetime, she earned the admiration of other writers such as Francis Thompson, Coventry Patmore, George Meredith, G. K. Chesterton, and Aubrey De Vere, with whom she became close, often intimate, friends. Meynell clearly became part of the contemporary literati, but her writing, though polished and sophisticated, maintained the accessibility and relevance that made her column so widely read in the 1890s.

Meynell's essays on language bear the influence of Johnson, Hazlitt, and Arnold. They reveal a degree of linguistic analysis uncommon in popular journalism of the time but typical of her steadfast belief in the importance of grammar as a cornerstone of cultural stability. Her essay “Composure” (1891) is based on her belief that language itself is educative in the linguistic recognition of the disparity between the word and the thing it represents but teaches us to recognize this through the development of vocabulary: “Shall not the Thing more and more, as we compose ourselves to literature, assume the honour, the hesitation, the leisure, the reconciliation of the Word?” For Meynell, linguistic and semantic gulfs are not so much problems as they are essential aspects of learning. In “The Little Language” (1909), she writes of the felicitous character, intimacy, and locality of dialect, with characteristic metaphorical acuity: “Dialect is the elf rather than the genius of place, and a dwarfish master of the magic of local things.” “A Corrupt Following” (1921) blames Gibbon for the degradation of the English language during the 19th century in what Meynell sees as his influential but imprecise and ungrammatical stylistic vulgarity. In her much admired essay “The Second Person Singular” (1921), she finds in grammar the heritage of English culture and laments its recent decline, using contemporary usage of the pronoun “you” as an example of “the slovenliness of our civilization in the practice of the inflexions of grammar.” Meynell followed her own example in the fastidious precision and polish of her writing.

Meynell’s voice, however, does not lose its vitality in its precision. On the contrary, she considers life not in its random collisions and cacophonies but in its ordered continuities and in its wayfaring spirit. She sees life through a poetic prism of refracted light and color, as in the invasion of pastoral green in the urban landscape described in the opening passage of “Ceres Runaway” (1906) or in the corrective spectrum of “The Colour of Life” (1895), which she points out is not the color of blood—“Red is the colour of violence, or of life broken open, edited, and published”—but the color of the body, “the covered red,” in its various shades under the lamp of nature.

Meynell’s vitality and soulfulness are what attracted readers to her loving depictions of growing children, for instance, in “The Child of Tumult,” “The Child of Subsiding Tumult,” both from her third book of essays The Children (1897), “The Influential Child,” from Childhood (1913), and others inspired by her own son and, later, her grandchildren, which provided invaluable insight on the development and care of personalities before Maslow and Spock. The essays on childhood are central to all of Meynell’s prose work because childhood is the foundation of the human life explored in one way or another in all of the other essays. As she wrote in “The Illusion of Historic Time,” an essay on adult perception of contracted time, “Childhood is itself Antiquity—to every man his only Antiquity.”

DANIEL ROBINSON

Biography

Born Alice Christina Gertrude Thompson, 11 October 1847 in Barnes, southwest London. Studied with her father and tutors in England and Italy. Moved with family to the Isle of Wight, 1866. Converted to Roman Catholicism, 1868. Married Wilfrid Meynell, 1877: seven children (one other died in infancy). Contributor to many journals, including the Spectator, the Scots Observer, Edinburgh (later the National Observer, London), the Saturday Review, the Art Journal, and the Tablet; editor, with Wilfrid Meynell, the Pen, 1880, the Weekly Register, 1881–99, and Merry England, from 1883; weekly columnist of “The Wares of Autolycus,” 1893–98, and art critic, 1902–05, Pall Mall Gazette, London; lectured in the United States, 1901–02. Associated with other writers, including Coventry Patmore, George Meredith, and G. K. Chesterton. Moved to Greatham, Sussex, 1911. Elected Fellow, Royal Society of Literature, 1914. Died in London, 27 November 1922.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

The Rhythm of Life and Other Essays, 1893

The Colour of Life and Other Essays on Things Seen and Heard, 1896

The Children, 1897

London Impressions, 1898

The Spirit of Place and Other Essays, 1899

Ceres Runaway and Other Essays, 1909

Mary, the Mother of Jesus: An Essay, 1912; revised edition, 1923

Childhood, 1913

Essays, 1914

Hearts of Controversy, 1917

The Second Person Singular and Other Essays, 1921

Essays of Today and Yesterday (selected essays), 1926

Essays, edited by Francis Meynell, 1947

The Wares of Autolycus: Selected Literary Essays, edited by P.M. Fraser, 1965

Other writings: six collections of poetry, religious books, and biographies of William Holman Hunt and John Ruskin.

Bibliographies

Alice Meynell, 1847–1922: Catalogue of the Centenary Exhibition, London: National Book League, 1947

Connolly, Terence L., “Alice Meynell: A Short-Title List of Poetry, Essays, Miscellaneous Works, Anthologies, Translations, Editings and Introductions,” in Alice Meynell Centenary Tribute, 1847–1947, edited by Connolly, Boston: Humphries, 1948: 41–72.

Further Reading

Badeni, June, The Slender Tree: A Life of Alice Meynell, Padstow, Cornwall: Tabb House Press, 1981

Connolly, Terence L., editor, Alice Meynell Centenary Tribute, 1847–1947, Boston: Humphries, 1948

Maynard, Theodore, Carven from the Laurel Tree, Freeport, New York: Books for

Libraries Press, 1967 (original edition, 1918)

Meynell, Viola, Alice Meynell: A Memoir, London: Cape, and New York: Scribner, 1929

Moore, Virginia, Distinguished Women Writers, Port Washington, New York: Kennikat Press, 1968 (original edition, 1934)

Tuell, Anne Kimball, Mrs. Meynell and Her Literary Generation, St. Clair Shores, Michigan: Scholarly Press, 1970 (original edition, 1925)

Vogt, Elizabeth L., Honours of Mortality: The Career, Reputation and Achievement of Alice Meynell (dissertation), Lawrence: University of Kansas, 1989

Mill, John Stuart

British, 1806–1873

John Stuart Mill published many essays, some as articles in periodical journals, many collected and separately published, some as pamphlets, and others as monographs. His first publications were two letters in 1822. for an evening newspaper, the Traveller. His earliest writing was in an epistolary style, formal and argumentative, for a faceless audience of readers. However, his topics were not merely topical, since he sought to advance the liberal cause of free inquiry into any subject; he signed his earliest writings as “Wickliffe,” to associate himself with the continuing reformist spirit of John Wycliffe.

Mill sought to emulate the lucid, transparent style of classical 18th-century British authors, such as Jonathan Swift, Edward Gibbon, and the early Jeremy Bentham. His compositions were analytical, taking apart the elements of ideas suffering from loose and ill-defined usage, such as “Nature” (wr. 1854, pub. 1874). Mill’s intellectual heroes were authors of Greek history and philosophy, and it was from the model of classical Greek (which he began learning at the age of three) that he took his cue for precision of expression.

There has never been a want of readers for Mill’s writings, from his first audience to today. Whether his subject has been political reform or biography, logic or autobiography, he has had responsive and responsible readers. His most frequently chosen form of essay was the review article for periodicals, from the Westminster Review in 1823 to Fraser’s Magazine and the Fortnightly Review in the last decade of his life. Mill collected some of these articles as Dissertations and Discussions (1859), to which he added later essays for new editions in 1867 and again in 1875.

As a polemicist and practicing politician, Mill was an advocate for moderation in tone, even while promoting radical ideas of utilitarianism and agnostic materialism. Indeed, his tone and style both aimed for balance, to assuage skeptical readers whose prejudices he often took apart. He had a passion for the Socratic dialogue, cast in the Aristotelian form of a dissertation. To establish an intellectual dialectic within which he could pursue a common truth through the many-sidedness of experience, he would often set one argument against another, much as in a debate. Thus did he compose his two significant essays on the influences of Jeremy Bentham (1838) and Samuel Taylor Coleridge (1840), illustrating the complementary virtues of their seemingly different methods and philosophies: Bentham wanted to know the truth of things, Coleridge the meaning of them. These two great teachers brought together for Mill the logic of both induction and deduction. "They were the two great seminal minds of England in their age," he wrote.

Having learned from his father and Jeremy Bentham the power of syllogistic reasoning and deductive logic, Mill had to discover from another the way to truth by experience and induction. An important resource for this purpose was Alexis de Tocqueville's study Democracy in America, which Mill reviewed for the London and Westminster Review when it was translated into English in 1835 (vol. 1) and 1840 (vol. 2). As with other works which he admired, Mill quoted long passages from the volumes under review, and sought to present the case for the author's argument in both positive and negative lights. At a time when many English writers (such as Matthew Arnold) were pointing to America as a place of anarchy, Mill found in its political experiment a great laboratory for optimism. This was reinforced by the analysis Tocqueville made from his observations while living in America. Mill found in this work much of the evidence he sought for his belief that democracy required something more than an identifying of interests between the government and the governed, something more than "the greatest happiness for the greatest number," as Bentham had taught. A vital democracy needed a means for representing the interests of minority groups as well as those of the majority. Otherwise, America demonstrated through Tocqueville, individuals and minority groups would suffer from the tyranny of a majority exercising its authority as mere "public opinion." Mediocrity would then reign in a democratic state. These are faults, not of democracy, as Tocqueville would have it; instead, Mill says, they are the consequences of a triumphant commercial spirit in the progress of "civilization."

His major essay, by his own assessment, is the work On Liberty, which he wrote with the assistance of his wife, Harriet Taylor, and which he published in 1859, soon after her death. This was a long exposition of the value central to modern civilization, a value whose power was threatened by the very forces to which it gave birth. If democracy were indeed a result of majority rule, when sheer numbers would prevail, then democracy might annihilate the possibility for continuing intellectual progress. If truth were protean in experience and its meaning a function of its rich variety, then democracy might suffocate truth and choke life of its meaning. Following a great English tradition which includes John Locke's Letters on Toleration (1689–92) and John Milton's Areopagitica (1644), On Liberty analyzes and champions the idea of liberty as a condition for the meaning of life in every individual's experience of it. From liberty of thought to liberty of expression, there is a logical progression toward liberty of action, when individuality proceeds to its fullest realization. There is, however, no liberty where there is no tolerance for the liberty of others; liberty endures only so long as it extends to all. Mill entertains the possibility of social values prevailing over individual ones, but concludes that "the worth of a State, in the long run, is the worth of the individuals composing it."

The one individual about whom John Stuart Mill knew the most was himself; he composed an essay on his own mental development in the Autobiography, published posthumously by his stepdaughter in 1873. This work is a complex narrative which Mill wrote in three different stages of his life. The first draft he composed soon after his marriage in 1851, the second he revised over three years after his wife's death in 1858, and the last version he completed in 1869. Among the several notable features of this work are Mill's estimate of his father, his tribute to his wife, and his psychological selfanalysis. It is this last feature which has most consistently attracted reader interest, because it lies at the center of the book, as a crisis in the young man's mental life. Drawing upon his later reading of the English Romantic poets Wordsworth and Coleridge, as well as upon his friendship with and respect for Thomas Carlyle, Mill deftly dramatized the incidents of 1826, when he discovered an emptiness of spirit which he had to fill to become a whole human being. He realized that reasoning required feeling, that utility of means without an end to life would be meaningless. He found integrity in a balancing of individuality with circumstances, subjectivity with objectivity, analysis with synthesis.

While he was author of many other important essays, such as A System of Logic (1843), Principles of Political Economy (1848), and The Subjection of Women (1869), Mill remains best known for his essay On Liberty and his Autobiography. In all his writings, he labored for clarity of expression and never sought a rhetorical style of ornamentation or selfconscious display. Nevertheless, some distinctive characteristics of metaphor and imagery communicate forcefully, with aesthetic pleasure, the ideas carried by his style. For example, Coleridge and Bentham created movements of influence which were "two concentric circles which the shock given by them is spreading over the ocean of mind." Liberty of individuality lost to State interests would produce "a State which dwarfs its men" until it finds "that with small men no great thing can really be accomplished." Reading the works of 18th-century master writers, Mill "lost the jejuneness of my early compositions; the bones and cartilages began to clothe themselves with flesh, and the style became, at times, lively and almost light."

RICHARD D. McGHEE

Biography

Born 20 May 1806 in London. Studied privately with his father; studied law, 1822–23. Lived in southern France with the family of Jeremy Bentham's brother Samuel, 1820–21. Worked for the East India Company, London, 1823–58. Founding member, the Unitarian Society, 1823–26. Contributor to various journals, including the London and Westminster Review, the Edinburgh Review, and the Monthly Repository. Experienced a mental crisis, 1826. Met Harriet Hardy Taylor, 1831, carried on a platonic relationship with her until her husband's death (1849), and married, 1851 (she died, 1858). Lived in Avignon, France for part of each year, after 1858. Liberal Member of Parliament for Westminster, 1865–68. Rector, University of St. Andrews, Fife, 1866. Died in Avignon, 7 May 1873.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

A System of Logic, Ratiocinative and Inductive, 2 vols., 1843

Essays on Some Unsettled Questions of Political Economy, 1844

Principles of Political Economy, with Some of Their Applications to Social Philosophy, 2 vols., 1848; edited by W.J. Ashley, 1909, and Jonathan Riley, 1994

- Thoughts on Parliamentary Reform*, 1859; revised, enlarged edition, 1859
- On Liberty*, 1859; edited by R.R.McCallum, 1946, Gertrude Himmelfarb, 1981, Stefan Collini, with The Subjection of Women and Chapters on Socialism, 1989, and John Gray and G.W. Smith, 1991
- Dissertations and Discussions, Political, Philosophical, and Historical*, 4 vols., 1859–75
- Considerations on Representative Government*, 1861; in Three Essays, 1912.
- Utilitarianism*, 1863
- England and Ireland* (pamphlet), 1868
- The Subjection of Women*, 1869; edited by Stanton Coit, 1906, Mary Warnock, with A Vindication of the Rights of Woman by Mary Wollstonecraft, 1986, Susan Moller Okin, 1988, and Stefan Collini, with On Liberty and Chapters on Socialism, 1989
- Chapters and Speeches on the Irish Land Question*, 1870
- Autobiography*, 1873
- Nature, The Unity of Religion, and Theism: Three Essays on Religion*, 1874
- Socialism*, 1879; as Chapters on Socialism, edited by Stefan Collini, with On Liberty and The Subjection of Women, 1989, and Jonathan Riley, 1994
- Early Essays*, edited by J.W.M.Gibbs, 1897
- Mill on Bentham and Coleridge*, edited by F.R.Leavis, 1950
- Prefaces to Liberty: Selected Writings*, edited by Bernard Wishy, 1959
- Essays on Politics and Culture*, edited by Gertrude Himmelfarb, 1963
- Essays on Literature and Society*, edited by J.B.Schneewind, 1965
- Literary Essays*, edited by Edward Alexander, 1967
- Essays on Sex Equality*, with Harriet Taylor Mill, edited by Alice S. Rossi, 1970
- Essays on Poetry*, edited by F.Parvin Sharpless, 1976
- On Politics and Society*, edited by Geraint L.Williams, 1976
- Utilitarianism and Other Essays*, edited by Alan Ryan, 1987
- On Liberty and Other Essays*, edited by John Gray, 1991
- Other writings: works on philosophy, politics, and sociology, and correspondence.
- Collected works edition: Collected Works, edited by F.E.L. Priestley, F.E.Minecka, John M.Robson, and others, 33 vols., 1963–93.

Bibliographies

- Laine, Michael, Bibliography of Works on John Stuart Mill, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1982
- MacMinn, Ney, and others, Bibliography of the Published Writings of John Stuart Mill, Evanston, Illinois: Northwestern University, 1945

Further Reading

- Briggs, Asa, Victorian People: A Reassessment of Persons and Themes, 1851–67, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, revised edition, 1970
- Donagan, Alan, “Victorian Philosophical Prose: J.S.Mill and F.H. Bradley,” in The Art of Victorian Prose, edited by George Levine and William A.Madden, New York: Oxford University Press, 1968
- Halévy, Élie, The Growth of Philosophic Radicalism, London: Faber, 1928; Boston:

Beacon Press, 1955

Himmelfarb, Gertrude, On Liberty and Liberalism: The Case of John Stuart Mill, New York: Knopf, 1974

Himmelfarb, Gertrude, The De-Moralization of Society: From Victorian Virtues to Modern Values, New York: Knopf, 1995

Levi, William Albert, "The Value of Freedom: Mill's Liberty (1859–1959)," Ethics 70 (1959):37–46

Miłosz, Czesław

Polish/American, 1911–

For a writer who declares poetry to be his first vocation, Czesław Miłosz's essayistic output is remarkable. He is the author of about a dozen volumes of essays published after World War II both in Polish and in translation. Before the war, as a member of the poetic group Żagary (Brushwood), he was involved in heated literary debates carried in Vilnius and Warsaw periodicals. These articles—manifestos rather than essays—reveal the seeds of Miłosz's views on literature which the poet cultivates consistently in his later works: the condemnation of purely aesthetic and narcissistic trends in literature in the name of the metaphysical and ethical dimension of artistic creation; attacks on the formalism of the poetic avantgarde in the name of poetry which expresses the personality of a poet and his philosophy of the world; and criticism of socially committed poetry from a position of Christian personalism. In his juvenilia there are also traces of Miłosz's persisting distaste for any form of nationalism, anti-Semitism, and ideological indoctrination. These concerns gain particular importance in his analysis of certain aspects of the Polish cultural tradition in Rodzinna Europa (1959; Native Realm), the poet's autobiography, and of communism in Zniewolony umysł (1953; The Captive Mind).

Miłosz writes essayistic books rather than collections of essays. Most combine biographical memoirs, historical and literary analyses, poetic descriptions, poems and translations, notes and thoughts on literature, philosophy, and culture, as well as arresting portraits of other writers. This formal diversity illustrates Miłosz's lifelong search, in both his poetry and his prose, for more elastic forms than those existing in the literary canon. The search reflects not only his need for formal experimentation but most importantly his religious or metaphysical aspiration—the source of a fundamental tension in his works—to reach beyond the describable toward the essence of things. In his Nobel Prize lecture of 1980, Miłosz calls this aspiration "a quest for reality." It is also a quest for a harmonious solution to "the contradiction between being and action, or, on another level, a contradiction between art and solidarity with one's fellow men." The poet believes in the redemptive power of art and treats it as a "moral discipline" and a moral obligation in the world suffering from a metaphysical crisis and a loss of historical memory.

Miłosz's thoughts develop from personal digressions and fragments, which he anchors in individual and historical details drawn from centuries of cultural heritage. The scope of his intellectual reflection is enormous: from language and its use as a creative medium, through contemplation of the essence of poetry and the obligations of poets, to Hegelianism, Catholicism, and the nature of evil. In Ziemia Ulro (1977; The Land of Ulro), a book regarded as Miłosz's philosophical testament, he analyzes the hermetic, metaphysical systems of his intellectual mentors: William Blake (from whom Miłosz borrows the title of his book), Oskar V.de L.Miłosz, and Emanuel Swedenborg. He devotes many pages to the works of the Polish poet Adam Mickiewicz, and "the Romantic crisis of European culture" (so termed by Stanisław Brzozowski, another intellectual patron who is the subject of the booklength study, Człowiek wśród skorpionów [1962; Man among scorpions]). His thoughts on Fedor Dostoevskii and Simone Weil (expanded in Emperor of the Earth, 1977), on Witkacy (i.e. Stanisław Witkiewicz) and Witold Gombrowicz are part of a broader discourse on the history of ideas and religion (with a particular interest in Manichaeism, with which the poet admits particular fascination). In Widzenia nad Zatoką San Francisco (1969; Visions from San Francisco Bay), Miłosz's essays on contemporary American culture, including his polemics with Herbert Marcuse, Henry Miller, Robinson Jeffers, and Allen Ginsberg, are also a springboard for the reflections on his most important topic: the relationship between nature, history, art, and religion.

Miłosz's intellectual fascinations stem from his own preoccupation with the most important dilemmas of Western civilization: the irrevocable failure of secular humanism; the ontological disinheritance of mind described as "the mind torn between the certainty of man's insignificance in the immensity of a hostile universe, and an urge, born of wounded pride, to endow man with preeminence" (The Land of Ulro); and the dramatic and incurable split—initiated by "the three sinister figures: Bacon, Locke, Newton, the unholy trinity"—between the laws of science and the inner life of man.

The combination of autobiographical facts and reflections on the readings gives Miłosz's essays a highly personalized tone. He speaks in a multitude of voices: the Eastern European exile and the American professor, the Polish poet and the native of Lithuania, the historian of ideas, the Catholic, the skeptical intellectual, and the catastrophist. The dialogic character of his essays helps to paint a complex spiritual portrait of an author who tries to reconstruct his own intellectual, poetic, and ethical lineage. Fascinated by the essence of Being (he opens The Land of Ulro with symptomatic words: "Who was I? Who am I now, years later...?"), Miłosz examines his own life in its historical, political, cultural, and social contexts. He objectifies personal spiritual experiences to find the meaning of human existence and of history—his acknowledged obsession. In fact, he often searches for the essence of man in his historicity.

Miłosz, the interpreter of cultures, historical experiences, and ideas, does not write for a wide circle of readers. His essays are dense and intellectually demanding, requiring the reader to make a smooth leap from the description of a casual encounter or detail to the recognition of a general truth which takes contradictions and paradoxes into account. He employs an austere eloquence and a rigorous intellect in his lucid sallies and multilayered reflections. His prose develops through digressions and circumventing descriptions. However, the reader who is willing to meander through his thoughts finds in Miłosz's personal, philosophical, and interpretive essays a unique and profoundly spiritual insight into the “peculiar aspirations of humankind.”

TAMARA TROJANOWSKA

Biography

Born 30 June 1911 in Szetejnie, Lithuania. Studied at the University of Stefan Batory, Vilnius, M.Juris., 1934; studied in Paris, 1934–35. Cofounder, Żagary literary journal, 1931. Worked for Polish National Radio, 1936–39. Participated in clandestine cultural life during World War II. Worked for the Polish Diplomatic Service, Washington, D.C. and Paris, 1945–50. Defected to the West, 1951; lived in Paris, 1951–60, then moved to the United States. Taught Slavic languages and literatures, University of California, Berkeley, 1960–78, then emeritus. Became a U.S. citizen, 1970. Awards: many, including the European Literary Prize, 1953; Kister Award, 1967; Neustadt International Prize, 1978; Nobel Prize for Literature, 1980; National Medal of Arts, 1989; honorary degrees from five universities. Member, American Academy of Arts and Sciences, and American Institute of Arts and Letters.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Zniewolony umysł, 1953; as The Captive Mind, translated by Jane Zielonko, 1953

Kontynenty, 1958

Rodzinna Europa, 1959; as Native Realm: A Search for Self-Definition, translated by Catherine S. Leach, 1968

Ogród wśród skorpionów, 1962

Widzenia nad Zatoką San Francisco, 1969; as Visions from San Francisco Bay, translated by Richard Lourie, 1982.

Prywatne obowiazki, 1972.

Emperor of the Earth: Modes of Eccentric Vision, 1977

Ziemia Ulro, 1977; as The Land of Ulro, translated by Louis Iribarne, 1984

Ogród nauk, 1979

Nobel Lecture, 1981

Swiadcstwo poezji: Sześć wykładów o dotkliwosci naszego wieku, 1983; as The Witness of Poetry, 1983

Poszukiwania: Wybór publicystyki rozproszonej 1931–1983 (selected essays), 1985

Zaczynając od moich ulic, 1985; as Beginning with My Streets: Essays and Recollections, translated by Madeline G. Levine, 1991

Metafizyczna pauza, 1989

Rok myśliwego, 1990; as A Year of the Hunter, translated by Madeline G. Levine, 1994

Szukanie ojczyzny, 1992.

Other writings: many volumes of poetry (collected in translation in The Collected Poems 1931–1987, 1988) two novels (Zdobycie władzy [The Seizure of Power], 1955; Dolina Issy [The Issa Valley], 1955), and studies of writers and literature. Also translated poets from the Polish, and edited anthologies of poetry.

Collected works edition: Dziela zbiorowe, 6 vols., 1980–85 (in progress).

Bibliography

Volynska-Bogert, Rimma, and Wojciech Zalewski, Czesław Miłosz: An International Bibliography, 1930–1980, Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Department of Slavic Languages and Literatures, 1983

Further Reading

- Brodsky, Joseph, "Presentation of Czesław Miłosz to the Jury," World Literature Today 3 (1978)
- Bruno, Eva, "Czesław Miłosz: Barn av Europa och andra dikter Tolkning frou amerikanska," Artes 3 (1979)
- Coleman, Alexander, "The Still Point in Miłosz's Native Realm," World Literature Today 3 (1978)
- Contoski, Victor, "Czesław Miłosz and the Quest for Critical Perspective," Books Abroad 1 (1973): 35–41
- Czarnecka, Ewa, and Aleksander Fiut, Conversations with Czesław Miłosz, San Diego: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1987
- Czesław Miłosz: A Stockholm Conference, September 9–11, 1991*, edited by Nils Ake Nilsson, Stockholm: Almqvist & Wiksell International, 1992.
- Danilewicz-Zielińska, Maria, Szkice o literaturze emigracyjnej, Paris: Instytut Literacki, 1978: 192-212
- Fiut, Aleksander, Czesława Miłosza autoportret przekorny, Cracow: Wydawnictwo Literackie, 1988
- Gombrowicz, Witold, Diary, vol. 1, Evanston, Illinois: Northwestern University Press, 1988: 56–58
- Iribarne, Louis, "The Human Thing: Encomium for Czesław Miłosz," World Literature Today 3 (1978): 365–68
- Jeleski, Konstanty A., "Miłosz et Gombrowicz," La Discordance i (1978): 14–16
- Poznawanie Miłosza*, edited by Jerzy Kwiatkowski, Cracow: Wydawnictwo Literackie, 1985
- Scherer, Olga, "The Ulro Through San Francisco Bay," World Literature Today 3 (1978): 395–99
- Walicki, Andrzej, Zniewolony umysł po latach, Warsaw: Czytelnik, 1993

Mitford, Mary Russell

British, 1787–1855

Mary Russell Mitford's contribution to the genre of the essay was the "sketch" of rural life. Through it she created a vision of rural England that had enormous influence through the 19th century and up to the present. These essays were originally published serially in the early 1820s in a magazine for “ladies” and then collected in five volumes under the title Our Village (1824–32). Complete editions and selections were reprinted throughout the 19th and 20th centuries, often with deliberately quaint illustrations by well-known illustrators. This form of the essay continues to be almost ubiquitous throughout the English-speaking world, and beyond, as the “country life” column in newspapers and magazines.

The ideological and cultural influence of Our Village in its time and since was in creating an image of rural England as predominantly middle-class, virtually free of both the landed gentry and the rural laboring class who in fact formed most of rural society. Mitford also makes her rural England seem socially and culturally essential, central, and authentic in ways that urban England is not. This representation of rural life enabled Mitford to accomplish two important ideological and cultural tasks for her predominantly urban, middle-class readership. First, it contributed significantly to a broad movement to expropriate or redefine in middle-class terms the spaces historically dominated by the middle class’ social rivals—the landed gentry and the laboring classes. Second, it enabled generations of readers to ignore responsibility for the actual misery and injustice of both rural and urban life under agrarian and industrial capitalism.

Mitford’s form of the essay as rural sketch was a response to the cultural, social, and political conflicts of her time. There were movements among many local gentry and middle-class professionals in various parts of Britain and its colonies to celebrate domestic and local life. These movements were designed partly to resist the cultural, social, economic, and political hegemony of the metropolis. They were also designed to give cultural expression and validation to economic revolutions and accompanying cultural renaissances in the Midlands, East Anglia, and the North of Britain, and in Scotland, Ireland, and some overseas colonies. Mitford’s essaysketches were, however, written against the cultures and associated class interests of both the metropolis and the regions. Her semi-fictionalized village is clearly situated in the southern “home counties,” somewhere between the metropolis of London and its provincial or regional rivals. If the metropolis is identified with courtly aristocratic culture and vulgar middleclass commercialism and the provinces with pushing and pretentious middle-class enterprise, then “our village” is left to occupy a gentrified middle-class space.

It is also a feminine, or feminized space. “Our village” is a place of domestic and local action, relationships, and knowledges, which were conventionally gendered “feminine.” It is a politicized place, too. Celebration of the domestic and local, in literature and such newly popular amateur middle-class arts as watercolor and the graphic sketch, was designed to contrast with the public and political sphere. The latter was still represented as occupied by a decadent and incompetent ruling upper class and dangerously rebellious lower classes, as a scene of social, cultural, and political conflict inimical to “authentic” subjectivity and the “domestic affections.” In the aftermath of the French Revolution and similar upheavals elsewhere in Europe and its colonies, from Ireland to the West Indies, the domestic and local were increasingly represented as the nursery of authentic subjectivity and the domestic affections, and a refuge from the apparently unresolvable conflicts of the public sphere.

Mitford represents the feminine yet politicized middle-class world of “our village” through domestic settings, description of local topography, flora and fauna, characters, daily life, and community activities, and narratives of domestic and local relationships. She uses a pictorial form of representation, often invoking the analogy of the graphic sketch and framing her representations as if they were pictures. Like her contemporary essayist, Charles Lamb, she uses an insistently personal and even idiosyncratic narrative mode, conversational style, and intimate tone. Such writing would have been read at the time as feminine, despite the fact that the voice in Mitford's essays seems to be that of a man. Equally important is what is marginalized in her essays. The metropolis remains, somewhat menacingly, over the horizon. Rural economic and political protest, such as the Luddite violence of the 1810s, is virtually excluded. The historic hierarchical class relations and increasing class alienation of the revolutionary aftermath are minimalized, treated with light humor, or shown to be overcome by love, domestic affection, and community feeling. In short, "our village" is a fantasy, but Mitford authenticates it by treating it with techniques that would then have been considered realistic.

Mitford discloses two important sources for her invention of this rural England in the essay-sketch. The first of these is the Rev. Gilbert White's The Natural History and Antiquities of Selborne (1788), an anecdotal and personal description of the countryside and flora and fauna of his rural parish in Hampshire. Like Mitford's fictionalized village, White's Selborne is a space for the exercise of a particular kind of middle-class culture, though a masculine one—the local scientific, archaeological, and antiquarian researches of a man in one of the elite "learned professions." White's Selborne, like Mitford's village, is also virtually free of both the landed gentry and the rural poor. The other source named in Our Village is Jane Austen, represented by Mitford as a realistic portrayer of village life similar to herself. The publication history and influence of White's book and Austen's novels were similar to Mitford's essay-sketches. Together, Our Village, The Natural History and Antiquities of Selborne, and Austen's novels comprise the canonical texts of an embourgeoisement of rural England with considerable and continuing cultural and political influence, for better and for worse.

GARY KELLY

Biography

Born 16 December 1787 in Alresford, Hampshire. Family moved to Lyme Regis for a year, mid-1890s, then London; lived in Reading, Berkshire, 1797–1820. Won £20,000 in the lottery when she was ten. Studied at the Abbey School, London, 1798–1802. Lived in Three Mile Cross, Hampshire, 1820–51, and Swallowfield, Berkshire, 1851–55. Contributor to journals, from 1821. Friends with Elizabeth Barrett Browning. Granted Civil List pension, 1837. Died in Swallowfield, 9 (some sources say 10) January 1855.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Our Village: Sketches of Rural Character and Scenery, 5 vols., 1824–32; edited by John Squire, 1936, and Anne Scott-Thomas, 1987

Belford Regis; or, Sketches of a Country Town, 3 vols., 1835

Recollections of a Literary Life; or, Books, Places, and People, 3 vols., 1852; as Recollections and Selections from My Favourite Poets and Prose Writers, 1883

Other writings: poetry, plays, fiction, and many letters, including to Elizabeth Barrett Browning.

Bibliography

Hart, R.J., Mary Russell Mitford, 16 December 1787–9 January 1855: A Bibliography (dissertation), Chicago: American Library Association, 1981

Further Reading

Astin, Marjorie, Mary Rtissell Mitford: Her Circle and Her Books, London: Douglas, 1930

Coles, W.A., "Magazine and Other Contributions by Mary Russell Mitford and T.N.Talfourd," in Studies in Bibliography: Papers of the Bibliographical Society of the University of Virginia, Charlottesville: University of Virginia Bibliographical Society, 1959: 218–26

Croker, Thomas Crofton, My Village, Versus "Our Village", London: Fisher Fisher and Jackson, 1833

Horn, Pamela, "Alresford and Mary Russell Mitford," Hatcher Review 3, no. 22 (Autumn 1986): 86–94

Owen, J.C., "Utopia in Little: Mary Russell Mitford and Our Village," Studies in Short Fiction 5 (Spring 1968): 245–56

Pigrome, Stella, "Mary Russell Mitford," Charles Lamb Bulletin 66 (April 1989): 53–62

Roberts, W.J., Mary Russell Mitford: The Tragedy of a Blue Stocking, London: Melrose, 1913

Watson, Vera, Mary Russell Mitford, London: Evan, 1949

Momaday, N.Scott

American, 1934–

N.Scott Momaday is often recognized as the author of the Pulitzer Prize-winning novel, House Made of Dawn (1968). But since that initial novel, Momaday has gained increasing notoriety as one of America's most important essayists—a reputation that was established by the publication of The Way to Rainy Mountain (1969) and The Names: A Memoir (1976), the latter often being referred to as a Native American version of Alex Haley's Roots. Besides these autobiographical collections, Momaday has written numerous scholarly and journalistic pieces, and, during 1972 and 1973, produced 86 short essays on a variety of topics for Viva, Northern New Mexico's Sunday Magazine. It is, however, Momaday's exploration of his Kiowa Indian heritage and identity that have gained him the most critical and popular attention as an essayist.

The issues of subjectivity and identity explored in Momaday's work place him squarely in the postmodern essay tradition, but, as several scholars have observed, Momaday's racial heritage gives these personal and literary issues a cultural urgency. Although Momaday spent much of his childhood in American Indian communities—Kiowa, Navajo, and Jemez—the traditional religion and language of these cultures had mostly vanished due to a century-long campaign of violence, oppression, and assimilation waged by the U.S. government. Momaday thus had limited access to tribal traditions, even though his father was full-blooded Kiowa. Along with his mother, who was of Anglo-American descent, Momaday's father raised him in an educated, middle-class home environment protected from the often intense poverty and despair of reservation life. Still, his parents modeled a deep connection to American Indian culture, and taught Momaday the importance of maintaining his Kiowa identity in the face of its extinction. Much of Momaday's essay writing thus illustrates the difficult yet important process of resurrecting elements of a tribal heritage within a modern, individualistic sense of identity.

Momaday's treatment of nature and landscape in his essays also represents a unique blending of cultural perspectives. Like his Kiowa ancestors, Momaday sees his physical and spiritual existence as being deeply influenced by the "remembered earth," particularly the desert Southwest where he grew up and the Great Plains where the Kiowa tribe once flourished. Momaday's "native vision" of the natural world—his belief that it is made up not only of "objects and forms, but also of essences and ideals" ("A Vision Beyond Time and Place," 1971)—reveals the influence of the American transcendental tradition of nature writing. However, his physical journey through his home landscapes and his close observation of natural detail become particularly crucial given that so much of Kiowa material culture has vanished. Ultimately, in his essays, the landscape represents the most significant physical remnant of Kiowa culture to which he can attach his personal identity.

The issue of identity, for Momaday, is also an issue of language, and he has used his essay writing to create and sustain a persona that reflects both his Kiowa and Anglo-American heritage. His literary voice, while crafted in written English, often contains the oral, storytelling characteristics of the Kiowa tradition. In The Way to Rainy Mountain, for instance, Momaday divides each short essay into three distinct voices—each isolated into a separate paragraph and font—to articulate historical, mythical, and personal narratives. In this way Momaday emphasizes at once his personal connection to, and distance from, Kiowa legend and history. The essays in The Names, however, represent a more seamless weaving together of tribal history, ancestral legends, and personal recollections into a unified vision of self. He accomplishes this at the sentence level, slipping in and out of different tenses, using cyclical, dream-like imagery, and moving quickly from a Kiowa storytelling voice ("It happened so:") to an Anglo-American sense of personal history ("I was thirteen years old"). Examples like these from "My Horse and I" are found throughout this essayistic memoir, and together create a reading experience in which Anglo and Indian, past and present, dream and reality, landscape and imagination coalesce.

Momaday's emphasis on a kind of writing that is "very much like speaking aloud to an audience” links him not only to the Kiowa oral tradition, but also to the tradition of the familiar essay exemplified by such writers as Montaigne, Virginia Woolf, and E.B.White—all of whom used conversational language to create the sense of a personal presence in their essays. Momaday can also be seen as an important voice among modern Western American essay writers—including Wallace Stegner, Momaday’s teacher at Stanford—who have often emphasized the interconnectedness of self, language, and landscape. The influence of poet Yvor Winters, his tutor at Stanford, and novelist William Faulkner, whom he met while attending the University of Virginia, can also be discerned in Momaday’s use of lyrical language, disjunctive time-plots, and multiple voices in his nonfiction prose.

Just as important, however, is the influence of his Kiowa grandmother, and other American Indian voices, who first introduced him to the legends of tribal culture and the beauty of the native language. Critic Matthias Schubnell (1985) claims that the central value of Momaday’s writing resides in this ability to “bridge the gap between cultures and join literary and artistic traditions.” If so, much of the value of his essays can be traced to the complexity of the personal journey which has so often informed them—a pilgrimage which, as Momaday himself has said, contains “many journeys in the one.”

JOHN T.PRICE

Biography

Navarre Scott Momaday. Born 17 February 1934 in Lawton, Oklahoma. Studied at the Augusta Military Academy; University of New Mexico, Albuquerque, A.B., 1958; Stanford University, California (creative writing fellow, 1959), A.M., 1960, Ph.D., 1963. Married Gaye Mangold, 1959 (later divorced): three daughters. Taught English and comparative literature at the University of California, Santa Barbara, 1963–69, University of California, Berkeley, 1969–73, Stanford University, 1973–81 and from 1985, and University of Arizona, Tucson, 1981–85; visiting writer or teacher at various universities and institutions, 1970–85. Member of the Board of Trustees, Museum of the American Indian, New York, from 1978. Married Regina Heitzer, 1978 (later divorced): one daughter. Awards: many, including the Pulitzer Prize, for House Made of Dawn, 1969; American Academy Award, 1970; Mondello Prize (Italy), 1979; Western Literature Association Award, 1983; honorary degrees from nine universities.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

The Journey to Tai-Me, 1967; enlarged edition, as The Way to Rainy Mountain, 1969

The Names: A Memoir, 1976

Other writings: two novels (House Made of Dawn, 1968; The Ancient Child, 1989) and poetry.

Further Reading

- Ballasi, William, John F.Crawford, and Annie O.Eysturoy, editors, This Is About Vision: Interviews with Southwestern Writers, Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press, 1990
- Blaeser, Kimberly, "The Way to Rainy Mountain: Momaday's Work in Motion," in Narrative Chance: Postmodern Discourse on Native American Indian Literatures, edited by Gerald Vizenor, Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press, 1989: 39–54
- Bloodworth, William, "Neihardt, Momaday, and the Art of Indian Autobiography," in Where the West Begins: Essays on Middle Border and Siouland Writing, edited by Arthur R.Huseboe and William Geyer, Sioux Falls, South Dakota: Center for Western Studies Press, 1978:151–60
- Brumble, H.David, "The Way to Rainy Mountain and the Traditional Forms of American Indian Autobiography," in Approaches to Teaching Momaday's The Way to Rainy Mountain, edited by Kenneth M.Roemer, New York: Modern Language Association of America, 1988: 41–46
- Lincoln, Kenneth, "Word Senders: Black Elk and N.Scott Momaday," in his Native American Renaissance, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1983: 81–121
- Lincoln, Kenneth, "Tai-Me to Rainy Mountain: The Makings of American Indian Literature," American Indian Quarterly 10, no. 2 (Spring 1986): 101–17
- Martin, Calvin, editor, The American Indian and the Problem of History, New York: Oxford University Press, 1987
- Popovich, J.Frank, "Landscape, Tradition, and Identity in The Way to Rainy Mountain" Perspectives on Contemporary Literature 13 (1986): 13–19
- Prampolini, Gaetano, "'Many Journeys in the One': The Way to Rainy Mountain and N.Scott Momaday's Literary Work," in Native American Literatures, edited by Laura Coltelli, Pisa, Italy: SEU, 1994: 3–30
- Schubnell, Matthias, N.Scott Momaday: The Cultural and Literary Background, Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1985
- Strelke, Barbara, "N.Scott Momaday: Racial Memory and Individual Imagination," in Literature of the American Indians, edited by Abraham Chapman, New York: New American Library, and London: New English Library, 1975: 348–57
- Thompson, Craig B., Speaking of Identities: The Presentation of American Indian Experience (dissertation), San Diego: University of California, 1993
- Trimble, Martha Scott, N.Scott Momaday, Boise, Idaho: Boise State College, 1973
- Woodard, Charles L., Ancestral Voice: Conversations with N.Scott Momaday, Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1989

Monsiváis, Carlos

Mexican, 1938–

Carlos Monsiváis' contribution to Mexican cultural and intellectual life is truly outstanding. His numerous publications have appeared in newspapers as well as academic journals since the late 1960s. He is highly regarded as a polemicist, advocate, and thinker who has had a powerful influence on the present generation of Mexican artists. He has involved himself in almost every aspect of Mexican intellectual and artistic production: as a narrator, translator, radio director, and commentator, as well as a literary, film, and art critic.

However, it is his essays that are considered to be his most original and perceptive contribution to the critical study and analysis of Mexican society. His early book Días de guardar (1970; Days to keep) traces the beginning of the fateful events of the student rebellion on 2 October 1968, which would culminate in the tragic massacre of Tlatelolco. With irony and biting humor, Monsiváis places the calendar of Mexican national celebrations under a radically different and critical light.

In the essay Nuevo catecismo para indios remisos (1982; New catechism of remiss Indians), Monsiváis scrutinizes Catholic ethics and faith, especially devotion to the saints, and uncovers the ambivalence, contradictions, and hypocrisy of Mexico's Catholic Church, with its predominantly orthodox mentality. Through contrast, irony, and juxtaposition of catechistic texts and fragments of the saints' lives, Monsiváis reveals the self-negating practices of a church almost solely interested in fulfilling its temporal interests even at the expense of its most fundamental principles.

Amor perdido (1977; Lost love) is Monsiváis' most important and influential work. In this essay on Mexican history he displays valuable critical and analytical abilities, developing a language full of rich metaphor, penetrating humor, and sharp imagery. Armed with an impressive capacity to reveal a variety of ideological perspectives and events, he approaches the main sociohistorical material with a kaleidoscope of viewpoints drawn from documents and well-informed witnesses. In the process, he constantly challenges the "official version" of events and rewrites important segments of Mexican history and cultural life, with profound implications for its future.

Parading through the pages of Amor perdido are a number of "consecrated" historical characters and events of Mexican history, society, and culture. These characters include those belonging to the middle and upper-middle classes and those who have risen from the poorer strata of Mexican society. They have left their mark, negative and positive, on Mexican life, especially those who were present in the pages of "popular" contemporary chronicles. However, the individuals and events themselves take second place in the essay to the dynamics of their multiple interrelationships within the context of their times and values. Monsiváis' approach sends the reader in search of meaning as it is generated through the different layers of text, providing the possibility of alternative readings of the characters and events portrayed.

In Amor perdido multiple components of an important event are spatially and temporally collapsed into the present moment and the act of reading; in doing so the interpretation resists being anchored solely on a master narrative of events and characters and goes beyond to embrace new and revealing contexts. In reconstructing events Monsiváis uses cinematic techniques, including fragmentation, flashbacks, interior monologues, and image superimposition; as he explains, the text is aimed at "the operational center of memory...[the one that keeps] melted, dislocated, mixed images..."

The spatio-temporal collapse of historical events and figures enforces a multilateral or “vertical” reading rather than the unilateral or “horizontal” approach that uses chronology as a pointer. Thus, the historical event, the historical protagonist, president, union leader, cultural leader, and the “popular” movie idol are scrutinized from a variety of different and converging perspectives, and through the use of personal diaries, letters, declarations, manifestos, and interviews granted to the media. Other versions of characters come from witnesses (favorable and antagonistic), friends, relatives, coworkers, and lovers, and through evaluations made by critics or commentators. All of this information is enveloped in an agile language which presents a dynamic version of individuals and events so that myth, history, legend, criticism, and even rumor are allowed to play a role in a number of possible interpretations.

Monsiváis’ process establishes a new textual order by radically reassembling events, characters, and contexts and retrieving them from the “official” version. By isolating character and event from context, the official version was able to glorify or condemn those individuals or events from a prejudiced point of view. Monsiváis’ method allows the possibility of different interpretations by a reader who now has at his or her disposal a more complex and complete version of the historical and institutional circumstances.

Amor perdido ultimately sends the literary essay back to its most effective origins as a potent, amusing, fascinating, and forceful “chronicle,” powerfully written yet accessible to all. In this light, the essay is designed to inform, criticize, and reveal while simultaneously producing an enjoyable reading experience through the effective integration of narrative and film techniques. Essays such as Amor perdido are catalysts that have awakened popular interest in the important subjects and events raised within their pages.

Because of its breadth and innovative techniques, Amor perdido is to the essay what Gabriel García Márquez’s Cien años de soledad (1967; One Hundred Years of Solitude) has been to the narrative in terms of its exploration of the possibilities of communication, enjoyment of reading, and multiplicity of interpretation.

ANTONIO URRELLO

Biography

Born 4 May 1938 in Mexico City. Studied at the National Autonomous University of Mexico, Mexico City, 1955–60; Centro Mexicano de Escritores, 1962–63 and 1967–68; Center for International Studies, Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1965. Editor, Medio Siglo (Mid-century), 1956–58, and Estaciones (Stations), 1957–59; contributor to various Mexican newspapers and journals, including Sucesos, Futuro, Política, Proceso, Novedades, El Día, Excelsior, Uno Más Uno (One plus one), La Jornada (The journey), Siempre (Always), and Plural. Director of the program Voz Viva de Mexico (Living voice of Mexico), Radio Universidad, 1961–62. Taught at the University of Essex, Colchester, 1970–71, and the National Autonomous University of Mexico, from 1972. Awards: National Prize for Journalism, 1978, 1993; Jorge Cuesta Prize; Mazatlán Prize, 1989; Club de Periodistas Prize for Journalism, 1994; Villaurrutia Prize, 1995; honorary degrees from three universities.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Principados y potestades, 1968

Días de guardar, 1970

Amor perdido, 1977

Nuevo catecismo para indios remisos, 1982.

Celia Montalván (te brindas voluptuosa e impudente), 1983

De qué se rió el licenciado, 1984

María Izquierdo, 1986

Entrada libre: Crónicas de la sociedad que se organiza, 1987

Escenas de pudor y liviandad, 1988

El género epistolar: Un homenaje a manera de carta abierta, 1991

Rostros del cine mexicano, 1993

Por mi madre bohemios, 1993

Los mil y un velorios, 1993

A través del espejo: El cine mexicano y su público, 1994

Los rituales del caos, 1995

Other writings: works on Mexican art and culture, and an autobiography (1966). Also edited anthologies of Mexican prose and poetry, including La poesía mexicana del siglo XX (1966) and A ustedes les consta: Antología de la crónica en México (1979).

Further Reading

Cossio, María Eugenia, "El diálogo sin fin de Monsiváis," Hispanic Journal 5, no. 2 (Spring 1984): 137–43

Duncan, J. Ann, Voices, Visions, and a New Reality: Mexican Fiction Since 1970, Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1986: 31–33, 200, 220.

Ocampo de Gomez, Aurora Maura, and Ernesto Prado Velázquez, Diccionario de escritores mexicanos, Mexico City: National Autonomous University of Mexico, 1967: 235–36

Sefchovich, Sara, México: País de ideas, país de novelas, Mexico City: Grijalbo, 1987: 43–45, 245–47, 251–53

Urrello, Antonio, "Amor perdido: Inversión de la dicotomía y montaje de sus mecanismos," in his Verosimilitud y estrategia textual en el ensayo hispanoamericano, Mexico City: Premiá, 1986: 112–33

Montaigne, Michel de

French, 1533–1592

In 1571 at the age of 38 Michel de Montaigne, an aristocrat of the minor landed nobility, withdrew from public life to his château in southwestern France in order to devote his remaining years, in the company of the “Muses,” to a life of calm, freedom, and leisure, as well as respite from the civil wars of religion. Shortly thereafter he began writing what he called, by a somewhat strange name that was destined to have an immensely influential future, his Essais. Except for interruptions in order to travel and to serve as mayor of Bordeaux and as political negotiator, this project occupied him until his death 20 years later. The Essais consist of three books, published in 1580 (I and II), 1588 (III plus numerous additions to I and II), and posthumously in 1595. His literary apprenticeship had been slight: his only previous publication of any importance had been a translation into French of the Latin Book of Creatures or Natural Theology by the Spanish theologian Raymond Sebond, which would serve as the basis for his longest and least characteristic (though philosophically very important) essay, “Apologie de Raimond Sebond” (“Apology for Raymond Sebond”). Since his aim in writing the Essais was a highly personal one (“domestic and private” is how he describes the work in his foreword “Au lecteur” [“To the Reader”]), this was a type of writing—in fact it was one of the few types of writing—considered suitable for a “gentleman” (i.e. nobleman) of his day. Far from viewing himself as a literary artist, he wrote that he was “less a maker of books than of anything else” (“De la ressemblance des enfants aux pères” [“Of the Resemblance of Children to Fathers”]); his purpose was greater self-knowledge and knowledge of human nature in order to live more wisely.

His desire to write was also fired by the memory of his friendship with the late poet and political writer, Étienne de La Boétie. No longer able to converse or to correspond with his dearest friend, he felt the need to address his thoughts to others, to potential readers who might serve as surrogates for La Boétie. Thus the essay as he initially conceived it had something in it of both the letter to an ideal friend and the dialogue with an ideal friend, echoing two forms of discursive writing inherited from classical antiquity, two “forerunners” of the essay. This aspect goes a long way toward explaining the unique liveliness, the “irrepressible vivacity” (Virginia Woolf, 1925) of the Essais. But La Boétie left an even greater mark on the work: Book I not only contains the justly famous tribute to the deceased friend, “De l’amitié” (“Of Friendship”), but also is structured as a “literary tomb” for him, the individual essays being compared to “fantastic paintings” (grotesques) surrounding and adorning what he considered the true masterpiece, La Boétie’s sonnets, located at the exact center of Book I.

But why the title Essais, and what models, if any, did Montaigne draw upon? It is clear that he did not begin with the kind of long, personal essay characteristic of the later books, especially Book III. The great pioneer Montaigne scholar, Pierre Villey, in tracing Montaigne’s progress from the beginning “toward the personal essay,” revealed that he not so much began with the essay as grew into it. “Villey has shown that the form of the Essays stems from the collections of exempla, quotations, and aphorisms which were a very popular genre [that] helped to spread humanistic material” (Erich Auerbach, 1946). The evolution of his essays “epitomizes the general evolution of the form from the commonplace book [as these collections were known in England] to independent reflections” (Douglas Bush, English Literature in the Earlier Seventeenth Century, 1600–1660, 1945). Montaigne’s earliest essays are generally very short and thick enough with quotations from classical and other writers (without any indication of sources) for him to remark of them, in his inimitable earthy style, that they “smell a bit foreign” (“Sur des vers de Virgile” [“On Some Verses of Virgil”]). But he also asserted that despite these “borrowed incrustations” he “does not speak the mind of others except to speak [his] own mind better” (“De Pinstitution des enfants” [“Of the Education of Children”]). Patrick Henry (1987) has pointed out that readers today stand in relation to Montaigne as he stood in relation to his sources, challenged by him, as he was by them, to develop our own thought in reading him.

It is important to note also—and this has great bearing on the future of the essay—that Montaigne carries such learning with a grace, charm, and human appeal seldom found in works of specialized knowledge, and was very conscious of doing so. “Authors communicate with the people by some special extrinsic work [i.e. authoritative credentials]; I am the first to do so by my entire being, as Michel de Montaigne, not as a grammarian or a poet or a jurist” (“Du repentir” [“Of Repentance”]). He thus initiated, for the immediate future, “a worldly literature breaking with specialized learning, the literature of l’honnête homme [the cultivated gentleman]” (Hugo Friedrich, 1949), and for the long run, the destiny of the essay as a vehicle of humanistic learning.

No real models existed for Montaigne’s essays. There was for him no “anxiety of influence,” as Harold Bloom would call it. He was very conscious of being a pioneer: “It is the only book of its kind, a book with a wild and eccentric plan” (“De l’affection des pères aux enfants” [“Of the Affection of Fathers for Their Children”]). Montaigne himself includes among works encouraging him in the development of the essay: Horace’s verse Epistles, with their free-wheeling form; Plutarch’s Moral Essays, works “in which he forgets his theme, in which his subject is found only incidentally, quite smothered in foreign matter” (“De la vanité” [“Of Vanity”]—the reference is to “The Demon of Socrates”); Seneca’s Epistles, which were for Montaigne like Plutarch’s essays, “detached pieces that do not demand the obligation of long labor, of which I am incapable...For they have no continuity from one to the other” (“Des livres” [“Of Books”]); and Plato’s Dialogues, especially the Phaedrus, a “fantastic motley,” in which Plato lets himself be “tossed in the wind, or seem to be” (“Of Vanity”—italics added). An important “anti-model” or “anti-essay,” so to speak, was Cicero, with his boring “prefaces, definitions, partitions...logical and Aristotelian arrangements...[and] long-winded preparations” (“Of Books”).

Andreas Blinkenberg (in Mélanges de linguistique et de littérature romanes offerts à Mario Roques, 1950) claims that Montaigne may have chosen his unfamiliar title, Essais, because of its lack of precision. From the Low Latin essagium (cf. Italian saggio and Spanish ensayo), essai or coup d’essai originally meant the apprentice artisan’s work as distinct from the master’s. By extension it came to mean any “testing,” “trying out,” “trial,” or “probing.” For Montaigne what is involved is his own “self-testing,” the testing of his judgment, his mind, indeed of his whole being as it is pitted against various problems: “As for the natural faculties that are in me, of which this book is the essay...” (“Of the Education of Children”); or again, he calls his writing “the record of the essays of my life” (“De l’expérience” [“Of Experience”]). He appears not to have used the term in its later sense of a literary form or genre, in fact calling the divisions of his book not essais but chapitres (chapters) or contes (stories). His concept of the essay as a testing of one’s powers guaranteed that the subject matter of the essay would be without limitation, infinitely open-ended, the generator of “infinis essais” (“numberless essays”—“Considération sur Cicéron” [“A Consideration upon Cicero”]). The suitability of any subject to self-testing is also supported by his philosophical belief that all subjects are mysteriously related to one another: “Any topic is fertile for me. A fly will serve my purpose...for all subjects are linked with one another” (“On Some Verses of Virgil”).

We have touched on Montaigne’s relatively novel “dialogic” or “dialectical” relationship with his reader (explored further by Patrick Henry). An even more radical departure from literary tradition is his relationship with his own book. “I am myself the matter of my book” (“To the Reader”); “I study myself more than any other subject. That is my metaphysics and my physics” (“Of Experience”). He goes even further in stating that he and his book are one, using a theological term from the Nicene Creed: his book is “consubstantial with its author” (“Du démentir” [“Of Giving the Lie”]). He both shapes his book, by virtue of his art, and is shaped by it in his life and nature. But we must be careful not to oversimplify the complex meaning of the “self” for Montaigne. Far from portraying himself “entire and wholly naked,” his “respect for the public” (“To the Reader”), especially on the part of the gentleman that he was, placed limits on his candor. JeanJacques Rousseau wrote his Confessions (1782-89) in part to show the way beyond what he considered the disappointing reticences of the Essais. Montaigne’s example taught future essayists that the essay is not expected to be self-revelatory in the same manner as the intimate journal or the confession. In addition to his silences he often adopts “protective masks” to hide his most daring thoughts and indulges in “artful proceedings” and “subterfuges” concerning his innermost self (Jacob Zeitlin, Introduction to The Essays of Michel de Montaigne, 1934). As well, he acknowledges the inevitable amount of “adornment” that occurs in any self-portrait: “Painting myself for others, I have painted my inward self with colors clearer than my original ones” (“Of Giving the Lie”).

Furthermore, the self that one finds in his essays is never solipsistic or narcissistic but has been broadened to include many other “voices.” Dialogue occurs not only with his reader and with the authors he quotes but also with himself, in what Donald Frame (1969) calls “the constant inner dialogue of the self-portrayer.” How can this be otherwise, since Montaigne has said, “I presented myself to myself for argument and subject” (“Of the Affection of Fathers for Their Children”? The most famous of his assertions that his “self” was not to be narrowly construed is his oft-quoted statement, “Each man bears the entire form of man’s estate” (“Of Repentance”). In other words, his habit of self-observation qualified him for observing others and seeking knowledge of “man in general” (“On Books”), but to attain such knowledge is another matter. Underlying the Essais is his perception of reality as constant flux, perpetual motion: “I do not portray being, I portray passing” (“Of Repentance”). “The essay according to Montaigne,” writes Jean Starobinski (1982), is “the pursuit [of a self] that is by definition unattainable.” His use of the prepositions de (of) and sur (on) in so many of his titles arises less from respect for classical usage (Cicero, Seneca, et al.) or from modesty than from his conviction that no subject can be grasped in its totality: “For I do not see the whole of anything; nor do those who promise to show it to me” (“Of Experience”—italics added).

The critic’s attempt to describe the method and art of the Essais is helped immensely by the fact that this very subject lies at the heart of the book: “I write of myself and of my writings as of my other actions, because my theme turns in upon itself” (“Of Experience”). “The Essais are their own developed commentary” (Friedrich)—and, one should add, “their own best commentary.” The typical essayist’s habit of reflecting on his or her own art thus begins with Montaigne himself. Almost all his characteristic features of form and style flow logically from his desire to capture in writing that “marvellously vain, diverse, and undulating object that is the human being” (“Par divers moyens on arrive à pareille fin” [“By Diverse Means We Arrive at the Same End”]). A disorderly process at best, we might believe; but beneath the apparent disorder of the surface lies a new kind of order, a new kind of rhetoric which critics have come more and more to discover (Richard Sayce, Michel Baraz, Floyd Gray). “The very notion of order acquires a different sense in each truly original creation” (Baraz, 1961). For every passage of the essays calling attention to their formlessness there is a corresponding one inviting us to discover their hidden form. Citing Plato and Plutarch as precursors, Montaigne writes: “My ideas follow one another, but sometimes it is from a distance, and look at each other, but with a side-long glance” (“Of Experience”). And again: “It is the inattentive reader who loses my subject, not I” (“Of Experience”). Starobinski shows that “the form ‘essayed’ by Montaigne approximates as fully as possible the absence of form [l’informe].”

Emerson’s (1850) description of Montaigne’s style has become famous: he found it “wild and savoury as sweet fern” and added, “Cut these words and they would bleed; they are vascular and alive; they walk and run.” Montaigne’s finest translator, Donald Frame, has summed up the essential features of his style (in his translation of The Complete Essays, 1958): the “vivid bold images; the epigrammatic word play; the meandering, associative order, disdainful of logical connectives; the obscenity, which is a studied protest against man’s rejection of the body.” Montaigne’s style is both “familiar” and “poetic.” “The speech I love is a simple natural [naïf] speech, the same on paper as in the mouth...remote from affectation, irregular, disconnected and bold; each bit [chaque lopin] making a body in itself” (“Of the Education of Children”). Albert Thibaudet (1963) coined the term “lopinisme” to describe this style, arguing that it corresponded to a view of reality as fragmented and discontinuous. Humor is also an essential ingredient of this style, as it will be of the subsequent essay, especially of the English essay. This “humorous and familiar style” (“A Consideration upon Cicero”) was actually Montaigne’s very original adaptation into French of a literary mode going back to Seneca in Latin and to Plato in Greek, the so-called “Attic prose,” which fought traditional rhetoric with a new rhetoric and preferred “the forms that express the energy and labor of minds seeking the truth...to the forms that express a contented sense of the enjoyment and possession of it” (Morris Croll, 1966). As important as the familiar, conversational aspect of Montaigne’s style is its poetic quality, which will also leave its mark on future essayists, from Sir Thomas Browne to Emerson, Virginia Woolf and beyond. Plato’s Dialogues were his supreme example here; it is clear that he intended his own prose to be moved by a similar “demon” (operating often on a subconscious level): “I love the poetic gait, by leaps and gambols. It is an art, as Plato says, light, flighty, demonic” (“Of Vanity”). Perhaps the most striking of his poetic qualities is his extensive use of imagery, first singled out for praise by the great critic Sainte-Beuve, who called his style “a perpetual metaphor, constantly renewed,” and attempted, with varying degrees of success, to imitate it in his own essays. More recently, Thibaudet and his disciple Floyd Gray (1958) have conducted perceptive analyses of Montaigne's imagery.

Montaigne is the creator of the essay, of whom his numerous followers might say, as Haydn, speaking for the composers of his day, said of Handel, "He is the master of us all." He also, quite extraordinarily for the inventor of a literary form, remains its greatest exponent, which may explain why he is both imitable and inimitable. His successors learned from him: the inexhaustible potentiality of the self as subject, testing itself against an infinite variety of subjects; the role of chance in the selection of subjects; the use of the essay as "a literary device for saying almost everything about anything" (Aldous Huxley, 1958); the essay as vehicle for the process, rather than the end results, of thought: "For we are born to quest after truth; to possess it belongs to a greater power" ("De l'art de conférer" ["Of the Art of Discussion"]); and the replacement of logical thought by "free association artistically controlled" (Huxley). But there are also distinct limits to Montaigne's influence, including certain unique features of his Essais: the role of La Boétie in their genesis; the presence of three "strata" in the definitive text (the original plus additions), which enhance in a unique way the overall impression of artful disorder; the "façade titles" of many essays, designed to trick the censor into missing the hidden, heterodox, or otherwise subversive subject (Patrick Henry); and the special way in which quotations are absorbed into the text. His towering stature as a writer may also have intimidated imitators; does one "imitate" Shakespeare? His profound skepticism about the possibility of "fashioning a consistent and solid fabric" out of a person ("De l'inconstance de nos actions" ["Of the Inconsistency of Our Actions"]) is not shared by all essayists; but, together with his claim to portray not "being" but "passing...from day to day, from minute to minute," this view of human nature may have influenced such great modern novelists as Flaubert, Proust, Joyce, and Woolf (Sayce, Starobinski). But all, especially all essayists, would find it hard not to agree with Nietzsche's magnificent tribute: "That such a man has written adds to the pleasure of having lived on earth."

RICHARD M.CHADBOURNE

Biography

Michel Eyquem de Montaigne. Born 28 February 1533 at Château de Montaigne, near Bordeaux. Studied privately (spoke in Latin at home); Collège de Guyenne, Bordeaux, c. 1539–46; philosophy at the University of Bordeaux, from 1546; probably studied law, possibly in Toulouse or Paris. Councillor at the Cour des Aides, Périgueux, 1554, transferred to Bordeaux, 1557, where he became friends with Étienne de La Boétie (died, 1563). Married Françoise de la Chassaigne, 1565: one daughter (four others died in infancy). Inherited the domain of Montaigne upon father's death, 1568; resigned magistracy, 1570. Suffered from kidney stones, from 1578, and traveled to Switzerland, Germany, and Italy, 1580–81, staying at various spas. Mayor of Bordeaux, 1581–85. Friendship with Marie de Gournay, from 1588. Died (from kidney stones) at Château de Montaigne, 13 September 1592.

Essay Collections

Essais, 2 vols., 1580; revised, enlarged edition, 3 vols., 1588; edited by Marie de Gournay (definitive edition), 1595; facsimile of 1580 edition reprinted, 2 vols., 1976; facsimile of 1588 edition reprinted, 3 vols., 1987

Modern editions: (Municipal Edition) edited by Fortunat Strowski and others, 5 vols., 1906–33, Pierre Villey, 3 vols., 1930–31 (revised by V.-L.Saulnier, 2 vols., 1965), Jean Plattard, 6 vols., 1931–33 Maurice Rat, 3 vols., 1941, Pierre Michel, 3 vols., 1966, Alexandre Micha, 3 vols., 1969, and Claude Pinganaud, 1992.

Translations in English: as Essays, translated by John Florio, 1603 (reprinted 1965), Charles Cotton, 3 vols., 1685–86 (revised by William Carew Hazlitt, 1842, and Blanshard Bates, 1949), George B.Ives, 4 vols., 1925, E.J.Trechmann, 2 vols., 1927, Jacob Zeitlin, 3 vols., 1934–36, Donald M.Frame, 1958, and M.A.Screech, 1991.

Selections in French: edited by J.Carol Chapman and François J.-L. Mouret, 1978.

Selections in English: edited and translated by Donald M.Frame, 1943, also a bilingual edition edited and translated by Frame, 1963; translated by J.M.Cohen, 1958; edited by Walter Kaiser, translated by John Florio, 1964; edited and translated by M.A.Screech, 1993.

Other writings: diary of a journey to Switzerland, Germany, and Italy.

Collected works editions: Œuvres complètes, edited by Armand Armaingaud, 12 vols., 1924–41; Œuvres cotnplètes (Pléiade Edition), edited by Albert Thibaudet and Maurice Rat, 1962; The Complete Works, translated by Donald M.Frame, 1957.

Bibliographies

Henry, Patrick, “Bibliography of Works Cited,” in his Montaigne in Dialogue, Saratoga, California: Anma Libri, 1987

Sayce, Richard A., and David Maskell, A Descriptive Bibliography of Montaigne’s Essais, 1580–1700, London: Bibliographical Society/Modern Humanities Research Association, 1983

Strawn, Richard R., and Samuel F.Will, “Michel Eyquem de Montaigne,” in A Critical Bibliography of French Literature, vol. 2, edited by Alexander H.Schutz, Syracuse, New York: Syracuse University Press, 1956

Tannenbaum, Samuel A., Michel de Montaigne (A Concise Bibliography), New York: S.A.Tannenbaum, 1942

Further Reading

Auerbach, Erich, “L’Humaine Condition,” in his Mimesis: The Representation of Reality in Western Literature, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1953 (original German edition, 1946)

Baraz, Michel, “Sur la structure d’un essai de Montaigne,” Bibliothèque d’Humanisme et de Renaissance 23 (1961):265–81

- Boase, Alan M., The Fortunes of Montaigne: A History of the Essays in France, 1580–1669, London: Methuen, 1935; New York: Octagon, 1970
- Bowman, Frank, Montaigne: Essays, London: Edward Arnold, 1965
- Bulletin de la Société des Amis de Montaigne*, 1913–
- Burke, Peter, Montaigne, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1981
- Croll, Morris, “Attic Prose: Lipsius, Montaigne, Bacon,” in his Style, Rhetoric, and Rhythm: Essays, edited by J. Max Patrick and others, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1966
- Emerson, Ralph Waldo, “Montaigne; or the Skeptic,” in his Representative Men (Collected Works of Ralph Waldo Emerson, vol. 4), Cambridge, Massachusetts: Belknap Press of the Harvard University Press, 1987 (original edition, 1850)
- Frame, Donald, Montaigne in France, 1812–1852, New York: Octagon, 1970 (original edition, 1940)
- Frame, Donald M., Montaigne’s Discovery of Man: The Humanization of a Humanist, New York: Columbia University Press, 1955
- Frame, Donald M., Montaigne: A Biography, New York: Harcourt Brace and World, 1965
- Frame, Donald M., Montaigne’s Essais: A Study, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice Hall, 1969
- Friedrich, Hugo, Montaigne, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1991 (original German edition, 1949)
- Good, Graham, “Montaigne: The Growth of Experience,” in his The Observing Self: Rediscovering the Essay, London and New York: Routledge, 1988: 26–42
- Gray, Floyd, Le Style de Montaigne, Paris: Nizet, 1958
- Gray, Floyd, “The Unity of Montaigne in the Essais,” Modern Language Quarterly 22 (1961): 79–86
- Henry, Patrick, Montaigne in Dialogue, Saratoga, California: Anma Libri, 1987
- Huxley, Aldous, Preface to his Collected Essays, New York: Harper, 1958; London: Chatto and Windus, 1960
- Kellermann, Frederick, “Montaigne, Reader of Plato,” Comparative Literature 8 (1956): 307–22
- Pouilloux, Jean-Yves, Lire les Essais de Montaigne, Paris: Maspéro, 1969
- Sainte-Beuve, Charles-Augustin, in his Port-Royal, vol. i, Paris: Gallimard, 1952 (original edition, 1840)
- Sainte-Beuve, Charles-Augustin, “Montaigne,” in his Causeries du lundi, vol. 4, Paris: Garnier Freres, 1927 (article originally published 1851)
- Sayce, Richard, “L’Ordre des Essais de Montaigne,” Bibliothèque d’Humanisme et de Renaissance 8 (1946): 129–36
- Sayce, Richard A., The Essays of Montaigne: A Critical Exploration, London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1972
- Schon, Peter M., Vorformen des Essays in Antike und Humanismus, vol. 1, Wiesbaden: Mainzer Romantische Arbeiten, 1954
- Screech, M.A., Montaigne and Melancholy: The Wisdom of the Essays, London: Duckworth, 1983
- Starobinski, Jean, “Montaigne on Illusion: The Denunciation of Untruth,” Daedalus 108 (1979): 85–101
- Starobinski, Jean, Montaigne en mouvement, Paris: Gallimard, 1982; as Montaigne in Motion, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1985
- Telle, E.V., “A propos du mot ‘essai’ chez Montaigne,” Bibliothèque d’Humanisme et de

Renaissance 30 (1968): 225–47

Thibaudet, Albert, Montaigne, Paris: Gallimard, 1963

Villey, Pierre, Les Sources et l'évolution des Essais de Montaigne, Paris: Hachette, 2 vols., revised edition, 1933

Woolf, Virginia, "Montaigne," in her The Common Reader, First Series, edited by Andrew McNeillie, London: Hogarth Press, and New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1984 (original edition, 1925)

Montale, Eugenio

Italian, 1896–1981

When he received the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1975, Eugenio Montale saw his work as a poet rewarded. In the speech he gave in Stockholm—"È ancora possibile la poesia?" ("Is Poetry Still Possible?")—he made a point of reminding his audience that he was also a librarian, translator, literary and musical critic, and even unemployed after his publicly stated lack of belief in the fascist regime. Montale was first and foremost a free and independent man, even before being the most important Italian poet of the 20th century. The man and his work were both to be honored by the Republic of Italy when Montale was made a senator for life in 1967.

Ossi di seppia (1925; Cuttlefish Bones), Montale's first poetry collection, already revealed his metaphysical despair. Against the descriptive background of his native Liguria, between seascapes and arid landscapes, Montale explored both the seriousness and the absurdity of the world. He expressed himself entirely in negativity, denial, passivity, and ultraconservatism, using a new poetic language that came close to prose but deliberately stopped short by playing with sounds derived largely from his musical youth. We immediately see the clean break he made when faced with the rhetoric of D'Annunzio or Carducci on the one hand, and the futurists' experimentations of the period on the other. His contemporaries bracketed him with the negative poetry of Leopardi, or the esoteric tendencies of Ungaretti or Quasimodo. But as one collection followed another, the critics were to discover that Montale's poetry went beyond conventions. He, in turn, influenced a number of Italian poets after him.

At the same time as writing poetry, Montale early on embarked on a career as a journalist. In 1920 he began working for L'Azione (The action). Two years later he founded the short-lived magazine Primo Tempo (First time). In 1925, in the columns of L'Esame (The examination), he published "Omaggio a Italo Svevo" (Homage to Italo Svevo), after making a passionate discovery of that author, whom he was to meet the following year. Over more than 40 years, through essays, articles, or lectures, Montale was to wage an unceasing battle as a critic to give the novelist from Trieste a place in Italian literature. These various writings were brought together in Lettere con gli scritti di Montale su Svevo (1966; Letters and writings by Montale on Svevo).

In 1929, after a spell with the publisher Bemporad, Montale was appointed director of the scientific and literary body Viusseux, the famous Florentine cultural institute. He was dismissed from his post nine years later for refusing to join the fascist party. There then began a period of intense work for various magazines such as Solaria and Letteratura (Literature) that made clear their cultural opposition to the regime in power and advocated openness to international literature at a time when national self-sufficiency was recommended. In these and other magazines, Montale published short critical essays on poetry and prose (reprinted in Sulla poesia [1976; On poetry]).

At the end of the war, Montale began contributing to Il Corriere della Sera (The evening courier), writing for it for nearly 30 years. It was his column in the daily paper which made the poet known to the public. He was, of course, writing journalism in prose, but even so, the same autobiographical and stylistic background was visible here as in his poetry, though more clearly articulated, and occasionally softening tragedy and metaphysical agonizing with a degree of humor. Most of these pieces, critical or factual, were collected in La Farfalla di Dinard (1956, 1960; The Butterfly of Dinard) and Auto da fé (1966). Subtitled Cronache in due tempi (Chronicles in two times), this latter collection of pieces clearly demarcates the two stages of Montale's cultural and militant activity. In the immediate postwar years, he was questioning the relationship between fascism and literature, the moral value of art and its need to be independent, and the loneliness of the artist. In a later period, he placed art within a technological and industrial society, denouncing the boredom of mass art, artistic utilitarianism, and fashionable, commercialized art. Without undue bitterness, and denouncing sterile nostalgia, Montale grew uneasy about the role of art and the artist in a constantly changing world. Even in an earlier short essay ("Stile e tradizione" [1925; Style and tradition]) reprinted in the collection, Montale, while defining his idea of a poetic art, is already questioning the links between literature and society.

Other articles were collected in Nel nostro tempo (1972; Poet in Our Time) and Trentadue variazioni (1973; 32, variations). Prime alla Scala (1981) brings together Montale's writings about music. Fuori di casa (1969; Away from home), on the other hand, is a collection of various pieces written between 1946 and 1964, when he was abroad, mostly for Il Corriere della Sera. From these journeys in Europe, New York, and the Middle East, Montale brought back slices of life and ideas; the accounts of the real world sometimes provided material for poetry.

Not only in his poetic writings, but in his articles and essays as well, "Montale's poetic heart continued to beat beneath the lucid and ironic mask of ideological and cultural polemic, behind occasional dips into literary criticism" (Marco Forti, 1974).

CHRISTINE MASUY

Biography

Born 12 October 1896 in Genoa. Studied at schools in Genoa to age 14; studied opera singing under Ernesto Sivori. Infantry officer in the Italian army, 1917–19. Met Rusilla Tanzi (La Mosca), 1926, maintained close relationship for many years, and married, 1963 (La Mosca died, 1963). Founder, with others, Primo Tempo literary journal, Turin, 1922. Staff member, Bemporad publishers, Florence, 1927–28. Curator of book collection, Viusseux cultural institute, Florence, 1929–38. Worked or wrote for La Fiera Letteraria

(The literary fair), 1938–48, Il Mondo (The world), 1945–48, Il Corriere della Sera, 1948–73, and Corriere d'informazione (The information courier), 1955–67. Life member of the Italian Senate, from 1967. Awards: several, including Marzotto Prize, 1956; Feltrinelli Prize, 1962; Nobel Prize for Literature, 1975; honorary degrees from four universities. Died in Milan, 12 September 1981.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

La Farfalla di Dinard (autobiographical sketches), 1956; revised edition, 1960; as The

Butterfly of Dinard, translated by G.Singh, 1970

Auto da fé: Cronache in due tempi, 1966

Lettere con gli scritti di Montale su Svevo (includes letters), 1966

Fuori di casa, 1969

La poesia non esiste (cultural burlesques), 1971

Nel nostro tempo, edited by Riccardo Campa, 1972; as Poet in Our Time, translated by

Alastair Hamilton, 1972

Trentadue variazioni, 1973

Sulla poesia, edited by Giorgio Zampa, 1976

Selected Essays, edited and translated by G.Singh, 1978

Prime alla Scala, edited by Gianfranca Lavezzi, 1981

The Second Life of Art: Selected Essays, edited by Jonathan Galassi, 1982

Other writings: many collections of poetry.

Bibliography

Barile, Laura, Bibliografia montaliana, Milan: Mondadori, 1977

Further Reading

Almansi, Guido, Eugenio Montale: The Private Language of Poetry, Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1977

Avalle d'Arco, Silvio, Tre saggi su Montale, Turin: Einaudi, 1970

Barbuto, Antonio, Eugenio Montale, Rome: Edizioni dell'Ateneo, 1972

Becker, Jared, Eugenio Montale, Boston: Twayne, 1986

Cambon, Glauco, Eugenio Montale, New York: Columbia University Press, 1972

Cataldi, Pietro, Montale, Palermo: Palumbo, 1991

Contini, Gianfranco, Una lunga fedeltà: Scritti su Eugenio Montale, Turin: Einaudi, 1974

Forti, Marco, Montale, Milan: Mondadori, 1974

Luperini, Romano, Montale o l'identità negata, Naples: Liguori, 1984

Manacorda, Giuliano, Montale, Florence: La Nuova Italia, 1969

Marasco, Armida, editor, Per Eugenio Montale: Gli interventi nella stampa quotidiana, Galatina: Congedo, 1982

Martelli, Mario, Eugenio Montale: Introduzione e guida allo studio dell'opera montaliana: Storia e antologia della critica, Florence: Le Monnier, 1982

Nascimbeni, Giulio, Montale, Milan: Longanesi, 1969

Ramat, Silvio, Montale, Florence: Vallecchi, 1965

Ramat, Silvio, L'acacia ferita e altri saggi su Montale, Venice: Marsilio, 1986

Singh, G., Eugenio Montale: A Critical Study of His Poetry, Prose, and Criticism, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1973

Montalvo, Juan

Ecuadorian, 1832–1889

Juan Montalvo, like Domingo Faustino Sarmiento and José Martí, is one of the many 19th-century Latin American figures who made little distinction between literary and political activity. Born in a poor and backward country like Ecuador, Montalvo was obliged to be involved in the clamor of national public life, even though he really wanted to be a writer in the classical Spanish style. He attempted to establish this style in Capitulos que se le olvidaron a Cervantes (1895; Chapters that Cervantes forgot), his “imitation of an inimitable book”—a curious and early example of metafiction in a hybrid form of narrative and essay.

Montalvo’s spiritual background is fundamentally European; he spoke English, French, and Italian and spent several years in France, Italy, and Spain. He was a melancholy man, weighed down by depression; it is not surprising that in Europe he found comfort and an aesthetic orientation in Romanticism and the friendship of Alphonse de Lamartine and other European writers.

Nevertheless, despite his European connections Montalvo is remembered as the formidable adversary of Gabriel García Moreno, the ultraconservative Ecuadorian despot whose existence shaped Montalvo’s; the relationship is reminiscent of that between Sarmiento and the Argentine dictator Juan Manuel de Rosas. It was another of those rivalries that branded with fire the historical and intellectual process of the continent. When Montalvo returned to Ecuador in 1860, García Moreno had just taken power. Montalvo immediately wrote him an open letter that demonstrates his magnificent insolence, his splendid prose, and his great liberal zeal: “If at some time I resign myself to take part in our miserable affairs, you and any other whose political conduct is hostile to the liberties and rights of the people will find in me an enemy, and no ordinary one.” In 1866 he began publishing his magazine, El Cosmopolita (The cosmopolitan), in which many of his treatises and political pamphlets appeared. This magazine is the first of four—the others are El Regenerador (The regenerator), El Espectador (The spectator), and the series Las Catilinarias (in reference to Catiline, the powerful man attacked by Cicero in a famous work; Montalvo used the name to give his political denunciations a classical echo)—that may properly be considered among his works, as they were in large part the result of his sole personal efforts. They contain numerous essays that demonstrate the mastery of his style and his persistent preoccupations.

The mature phase of Montalvo’s career is characterized by political exile, travels in Europe, and prolific intellectual output, which produced major works such as Siete tratados (1882–83; Seven treatises) and Geometría moral (1902; Moral geometry), as well as the Capítulos mentioned above. Although his main theme as an essayist is politics, he also deals with culture, morality, and his personal life and tribulations. He was a vehement propagandist, with Olympian gestures and violent hatreds, distinguished by a sharp and vigorous tongue suffused with the best of Latin oratory and the Spanish classics. He knew how to lash out and he used his voice responsibly, as demonstrated by the ardent Catilinarias (which is not really a periodical, but a work published in installments) and the varied Siete tratados. The title of the latter book is as deceptive as that of Geometría moral. The first is a collection of reflections and meditations on various themes rather than a book that sets out a rigorous doctrine; the second, which contains some narrative efforts, is a type of discourse on love illustrated by great ancient and modern figures, from Pericles to Goethe.

As a political thinker Montalvo was not very original; rather, he moralized around common themes such as welfare, justice, education, honesty, and respect for the popular will. He was a passionate liberal whose radical anticlericalism was exacerbated by the strict Catholicism of García Moreno. He considered religion and dictatorship as almost indistinguishable, and in this way he contributed to the anticlerical tradition that developed in 19th-century Latin America. He firmly believed in individual heroism as a providential driving force of history, and the saints in his pantheon were Napoleon, Washington, and Bolívar. His way of confronting these themes and linking them with other digressions and confessions is closer to that of the English essayists (particularly Bacon and Carlyle) than any other Latin American writer apart from Andrés Bello. With his diverse interests, he is a model of the antithetic forms characteristic of Latin American Romanticism: subjectivity and social humanitarianism. However, he lacked a modern conception of history: for him it was only a source of famous examples to be imitated. Nor was he sensitive to the popular and local trends that other Spanish American prose writers were contributing to the written language: he was an innate purist.

But Montalvo had the essayist's essential attitude: the ability to react, almost spontaneously, to the constant challenge presented to him by the interweaving of his personal experience and the political world. The urgency of his task never prevented him from being a refined and delicate artist, even when he was hurling insults. He is one of the most elegant prose writers the Americas have produced; his skill with expressive forms, the memorable pithiness of his phrases, the visual sparkle and rhythmic persistence of his images, make him a precursor of the essay as it was to be cultivated by modernismo: an art form.

JOSÉ MIGUEL OVIEDO
translated by Richard Shaw

Biography

Born 13 April 1832 in Ambato, Ecuador. Studied in Quito, master's degree in philosophy, 1851. Secretary of the Ecuadorian legation, Paris, from 1857; returned to Ecuador because of illness, 1860. Editor, El Cosmopolita, 1866–69. Exiled for writings, 1869, and lived in Ipiales, Colombia, 1869–76. Editor, El Regenerador, 1876–78. Traveled again to Europe, 1879, living in Paris for one year before returning to Ipiales. Lived in Paris, 1881–89. Editor, El Espectador, 1886–88. Liaison with Augustine-Catherine Contoux: one son. Died (of pleurisy, probably suffering from tuberculosis) in Paris, 17 January 1889.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Las Catilnarias series, 1880–82; in 2 vols., 1925

Siete tratados, 2 vols., 1882–83; edited by José L. Abellán, 1977

Mercurial eclesiástica: Libro de las verdades, 1884

El Espectador (periodical), 3 vols., 1886–88; in 1 vol., 1927

El Cosmopolita (periodical), 1894; in 2 vols., 1923

Capítulos que se le olvidaron a Cervantes, 1895

Inéditos y artículos escogidos, 1897

Lecturas, edited by Juan de D. Uribe, 1898

Geometría moral, 1902

El Regenerador (periodical), 2 vols., 1928

Ensayos, narraciones y polémica, 1945

Lectones de libertad (selection), 1958

Cartas y lecturas, edited by Galo Martínez Acosta, 1964

Ensayos, 1975

Las Catilnarias, El Cosmopolita, El Regenerador (selection), edited by Benjamín Carrión, 1976

Selections from Juan Montalvo, translated by Frank MacDonald Spindler and Nancy Cook Brooks, 1984

Other writings: a play and short stories.

Collected works edition: Obras completas, 10 vols., 1969–70.

Bibliography

Naranjo, Plutarco, and Carlos Rolando, Juan Montalvo: Estudio bibliográfico, Quito: Casa de la Cultura Ecuatoriana, 2 vols., 1966

Further Reading

Actas del Colegio de Besançon issue on Montalvo (1976)

Agramonte, Roberto D., "Preámbulo a los Siete tratados de Montalvo," Círculo: Revista de Cultura 19 (1990): 39–46

Anderson Imbert, Enrique, El arte de la prosa en Juan Montalvo, Mexico City: El Colegio de México, 1948

Carrión, Benjamín, El pensamiento vivo de Montalvo, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1961

Coloquio internacional sobre Juan Montalvo (14–22 July 1988), Quito: Fundación Friedrich Naumann, 1989

- Crawford, W. Rex, A Century of Latin-American Thought, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1961: Chapter 6
- Miño, Reinaldo, Juan Montalvo, polémica y ensayo, Guayaquil, Ecuador: Claridad, 1990
- Naranjo, Plutarco, Ensayos sobre Montalvo, Quito: Casa de la Cultura Ecuatoriana, 1985
- Perez, Galo René, Un escritor entre la gloria y las borrascas: Vida de Juan Montalvo, Quito: Banco Central de Ecuador, 1990
- Roig, Arturo Andrés, El pensamiento social de Montalvo, Quito: Tercer Mundo, 1984
- Sacoto Salamea, Antonio, Juan Montalvo, el escritor y el estilista, Cuenca, Ecuador: Casa de la Cultura Ecuatoriana “Benjamin Carrión,” 2 vols., 1987
- Zaldumbide, Gonzalo, Montalvo y Rodó, New York: Instituto de Españas en los Estados Unidos, 1938

Montherlant, Henry de

French, 1896–1972.

Henry de Montherlant is best known as a playwright and novelist, one of the finest that 20th-century France has produced. Mirroring the themes of the major fictional and dramatic works, his essays, though couched in the same precise, formal French and like them mediated through a style characterized by sustained eloquence and austere elegance, are more in the nature of occasional writings.

They divide into two broad periods of production. The first category comprises the essays written in response to World War I, and the second group consists of writings inspired by the approach of, and subsequent responses to, the outbreak of World War II. In neither category, however, do we find essays which might be called “political,” either in a general way, or in the narrower sense of being devoted to the propagation of a particular program. Montherlant’s approach is always that of the aloof commentator, an attitude described in a famous 1915 essay by one of his mentors, Romain Rolland, as a stance “au-dessus de la mêlée” (above the hurly-burly).

Montherlant began his career as an essayist with La Relève du matin (The morning relief), completed in 1918 but not published until two years later. It consisted mainly of reflections on his schooldays at a single-sex Roman Catholic private collège or high school. As a result it was hailed as a Catholic work, but Montherlant was all his life an agnostic for whom (in the plays especially) Catholicism was a source of inspiration rather than a matter of personal belief. What Montherlant admired about his school was its cult of physical strength and of what, rather grandiloquently, he termed “virile brotherhood.”

The same theme recurs in Chant funèbre pour les morts de Verdun (1924; Dirge for the Verdun dead), consisting mainly of newspaper articles he wrote in his capacity as secretary of the fund to build an ossuary on the site of the Douaumont fortress, where so many soldiers fell in the defense of France during World War I. In this book, and in a companion volume Mors et vita (1932.; Death and life), he celebrated courage and self-sacrifice, seeking in the cult of sport in general and of competitive games in particular to recapture the atmosphere of exalted activity and virile comradeship that he had seen manifested in war.

Most critics agree that the lead article in Aux fontaines du désir (1927; At the fountains of desire), an essay entitled “Synchrétisme et alternance” (Syncretism and alternation), sums up Montherlant’s thinking and indeed the whole of his work in this genre. The absurdity which, in common with many French writers of his generation, he sees at the root of the human condition is for him a natural state of affairs, a fact of life, neither to be luxuriated in nor to be deplored. Humankind is at once capable of great evil and self-destruction (hence the necessity to build a charnel house at Douaumont in order to preserve the human remains exhumed from the battlefield) and of great courage and sacrifice (as demonstrated in the patriotic willingness, despite the enormous cost, to stand and fight at Verdun). Wisdom for Montherlant lies in accepting these extremes; a healthy balance must be struck between Angel and Beast, the empire of the senses and the world of the mind. Only mediocrity is to be eschewed at all costs. The writer must embrace all facets of human life and not stand on the sidelines as a mere observer: Montherlant was, after all, a near-contemporary of those soldier-writers par excellence, Ernest Hemingway and André Malraux. This period of Montherlant’s essay output closes with the publication of a collection of writings devoted mainly to the extensive travels he undertook between the wars, Un voyageur solitaire est un diable (A lone traveler is a devil), completed earlier but not published until 1945.

The second period opens with Service inutile (1935; Useless service), a more overtly political collection—with the reservation mentioned above—than the preceding books. This was followed by L’Équinoxe de septembre (1938; The September equinox), Le Solstice de juin (1941; The June solstice), and Textes sous une occupation (1953; Texts under an occupation). These essays got Montherlant into trouble after the war, since they were felt to have exalted the swastika and denigrated French defense efforts. Montherlant’s fastidious, ironic manner was partly to blame; after all, to argue, as he did, that purely out of self-respect one must serve a cause even though one knows it to be useless (“idealism requires service; realism exposes its pointlessness”), was hardly likely to endear him to the Resistance. As Lucille Becker (1970) explains, his actions cut him off from the mainspring of French life: “Montherlant’s generation had hailed him principally as a moralist, but the postwar generation, unable to accept his overwhelming pessimism and nihilism, turned to writers like André Malraux, Jean-Paul Sartre, and Albert Camus, who had been actively engaged in the struggle for freedom.” When young people threw in their lot with the Resistance, she says, Montherlant was conspicuous by his absence.

Like all French moralists since Montaigne, Montherlant used the essay to explore his own developing ideas, for instance his thinking on suicide, “the last act by which a man can show that he dominates life and is not dominated by it”; it therefore comes as no surprise that he carefully chose the moment of his own death, shooting himself when it was clear to him that he was going blind. He had first contemplated suicide in 1935, so it can hardly be considered an impulsive act on his part.

Montherlant’s philosophy, as expounded over the years in successive volumes of essays with striking consistency and continuity, can be summed up as follows. In a world where all is confusion and incoherence, and where nothing makes sense, human beings have no great task to perform but rather a single injunction to obey: that of extracting maximum physical pleasure from life. The instruments that enable humankind to do this are intelligence, lucidity, and a calm, unshakable agnosticism. Wisdom consists in annulling reasons for suffering. Since the world cannot be changed, it is we humans who must adapt to it: the intelligence contemplates the world and its occupants in order to plot a safer passage through it.

Far from being depressing, Montherlant's thought is marked by a kind of stoical cheerfulness. Not only did he foresee death at his own hand, he also anticipated, and was not perturbed by, the eventual eclipse of his writings. He knew that they were the product of a particular time (the early 20th century) and of a specific place (intellectual Paris). He did not flatter himself that they would survive in the same way as had the work of his admired Greeks and Romans. On the contrary, he endorsed Paul Valéry's sobering pronouncement: "nous autres civilisations, nous savons maintenant que nous sommes mortelles" (we civilizations now know that we are mortal).

JOHN FLETCHER

Biography

Henry Marie Joseph Millon de Montherlant. Born 21 April 1896 in Paris. Studied at the Collège Sainte-Croix, Neuilly-sur-Seine, 1910–12: expelled; baccalauréat in philosophy, 1913; law at the Institut Catholique, Paris, 1912–13; failed law examinations. Served in the French army, 1916–18: wounded; interpreter for the American forces, 1918–19. Worked to build ossuary at Douaumont, 1920–24. Traveled several times to North Africa, from 1926, and lived there, 1931–32. War correspondent with French infantry, 1939–40; war correspondent, Marianne weekly, c. 1941; worked for the Red Cross, 1942–45. Began gradually to go blind, from 1959. Elected to the French Academy, 1960. Awards: Northcliffe Prize (England), for novel, 1934; French Academy Grand Prize for Literature, for novel, 1934; Grand Prize for Colonial Literature (refused), 1934. Died (suicide by gunshot) in Paris, 21 September 1972.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

La Relève du matin, 1920; revised edition, 1933

Les Olympiques (includes essays, poems, and short stories on sports), 2 vols., 1924

Chant funèbre pour les morts de Verdun, 1924

Aux fontaines du désir, 1927

Troisième Olympique, 1929

La Petite Infante de Castille, 1929

Hispano-moresque, 1929

Pour une vierge noire, 1930

Mors et vita, 1932

Service inutile, 1935; revised edition, 1952

Flèche du sud, 1937

L'Équinoxe de septembre, 1938

La Possession de soi-même, 1938

Le Solstice de juin, 1941

La Paix dans la guerre, 1941

Sur les femmes, 1942

Croire aux âmes, 1944

Un voyageur solitaire est un diable, 1945

L'Art et la vie, 1947

Notes sur mon théâtre, 1950

España sagrada, 1951

Textes sous une occupation (1940–1944), 1953

Carnets (1930–1944), 1957

Selected Essays, edited by Peter Quennell, translated by John Weightman, 1960

Essais (Pléiade Edition), 1963

Discours de réception de M. Henry de Montherlant à l'Académie Française, 1963

Va jouer avec cette poussière: Carnets, 1958–1964, 1966

Le Treizième César, 1970

Tous feux éteints (carnets), 1975

Other writings: nine novels (including Les Célibataires [The Bachelors], 1934; Les Jeunes Filles [The Girls] tetralogy, 1936–39), many plays (including La Reine morte [Queen After Death], 1942.; Malatesta, 1946; Le Maître de Santiago [The Master of Santiago], 1947; Port-Royal, 1954), and several volumes of diaries.

Further Reading

Becker, Lucille, Henry de Montherlant: A Critical Biography, Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1970

Cruikshank, John, Montherlant, Edinburgh: Oliver and Boyd, 1964

Johnson, Robert B., Henry de Montherlant, New York: Twayne, 1968

Moral Essay

The moral essay is one in which the author attempts to prescribe the attitudes and forms of behavior that will lead to a virtuous life and a just society. Narrowly defined, the moral essay speaks directly of issues of character—courage, compassion, loyalty, truthfulness, and so on. When Francis Bacon commends sagacity or Samuel Johnson derides indolence, we know we are in the presence of the moral essay. However, the moral essay may exhibit a less didactic tone, particularly in its more modern manifestations. Joan Didion insists, in her essay “Why I Write” (1976), that any act of writing always results in “an imposition of the writer’s sensibility on the reader’s most private space.” Thus, the moral essay can suggest appropriate attitudes and behavior by indirect means—including personal narrative—as well as through overt moralizing.

Precedents of the moral essay can be seen clearly in the prose of Plutarch and Seneca, particularly in the latter’s Epistles to Lucilius. The rediscovery of classical sources in the Renaissance led to a resurgent interest in moral deliberation that was not limited to theological study. Michel de Montaigne often draws on classical sources in writing his Essais (1580, 1588); however, he deviates from the pattern of the medieval leçon morale by subordinating the authority of the classical views to his own observations and experiences. Although Montaigne's opinions are sometimes strikingly unorthodox, the themes of many of his essays—cruelty, vanity, honesty, courage—certainly belong in the tradition of the moral essay.

The 17th century engendered more narrowly religious essays. Sir William Cornwallis the Younger (Essayes, 1600–01), Owen Felltham (Resolves, 1620), and Sir Thomas Browne (Religio Medici, 1642) all found the essay an ideal vehicle for moral and spiritual reflection. After the Restoration, the moral essay, as practiced by Abraham Cowley and Sir William Temple, returned to general reflections on life in the style of Montaigne. Another powerful influence on the tradition of the moral essay was the revival of the Theophrastan character sketch (modeled on his Characters), such as Joseph Hall's Characters of Vertues and Vices (1608). In France Jean de La Bruyère turned his Caractères (1688) into biting satire, attacking not so much the morals as the manners of the day.

The moral essay soon found a place in the popular gazettes that prospered during the 18th century. Richard Steele and Joseph Addison wrote serious essays on topics such as death, education, and loyalty for the Tatler and the Spectator. However, their principal contribution to the moral essay was in the tradition of La Bruyère's Caractères. Their use of wit and satire to expose the foibles of the vain, the indolent, and the incompetent had a lasting impact on popular essayists. In America, satiric essays modeled on those of Addison and Steele were popularized in James Franklin's New-England Courant and by his brother Benjamin Franklin in the Pennsylvania Gazette.

The latter half of the 18th century was perhaps the pinnacle for the moral essay. The desire of the rising middle class for social improvement resulted in a ready market for pamphlets, sermons, and moral treatises of every kind. The preeminent practitioner of this art was Samuel Johnson, who found in his Rambler and Idler essays an ideal form for his moral and philosophical inquiry. Although Johnson is not humorless in his essays, he evinces a formality of style and a high moral purpose in most of his work. His writing on diligence, prudence, piety, and simplicity retains the manner, if not the dogma, of earlier pietist writers.

The moral essay was taken up in the 19th century by the reformers in England, such as Thomas Carlyle, John Stuart Mill, Matthew Arnold, and T.H. Huxley. Although diverse in their opinions, all of these writers challenged the established order in some way: Carlyle was an outspoken critic of the philistinism of the commercial class; Mill was a leading voice for liberalism in both intellectual and political causes; Arnold championed the role of culture as the principal impetus toward moral action in society; and Huxley was the leading advocate of abandoning the classical model of education for one founded on science. Even those essayists whose social agenda was rather traditional, such as John Henry Newman, were writing in reaction to the tides of change around them.

In America, the moralist tradition of the Puritans—of William Bradford, Cotton Mather, Jonathan Edwards—was passed on to the transcendentalists. Ralph Waldo

Emerson's essays draw heavily on Christian notions of charity and service, but are infused with a reverence for nature and a belief in personal revelation (e.g. "The Oversoul," 1848). In one of the most influential moral essays of all time, Emerson's disciple Henry David Thoreau argues for the supremacy of individual conscience over legal authority in his essay on "Civil Disobedience" (1849).

The moralist tradition has been preserved in British letters in the 20th century by essayists such as G.K.Chesterton and C.S.Lewis, both of whom laid claim to specifically Christian morals. More broadly, essayists such as E.M.Forster and George Orwell appeal to a sense of good manners and fair play. It is difficult to name any major American essayist of the 20th century who could be considered a Johnsonian moralist. However, a moral vision clearly underpins most of the essayists working for social change, whether appealing for civil rights (James Baldwin, Martin Luther King, Jr., Alice Walker) or preservation of the environment (Wendell Berry, Annie Dillard, Edward Hoagland).

Some critics have seen the essay as a literary form in decline because of its close connection to Enlightenment ideals, which have increasingly come under question. How can the essay appeal to universal values when those shared values have seemingly disintegrated into cultural pluralism? The counterresponse is that the recognition of a pluralistic society has created an even greater need for an exploratory form of the essay that can lead to mutual understanding and cooperative social action. Thus, the contemporary moral essay is less likely to make dogmatic pronouncements based on unchanging doctrines, and more likely to attempt to construct a moral consensus through ongoing dialogue.

DAVID W.CHAPMAN

Further Reading

Bush, Douglas, English Literature in the Earlier Seventeenth Century, 1600–1660, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1962 (original edition, 1945)

Didion, Joan, "Why I Write," New York Times Book Review, 6 December 1976

Fort, Keith, "Form, Authority, and the Critical Essay," College English 32 (1971): 629–39

Lukács, Georg, "On the Nature and Form of the Essay," in his Soul and Form, Cambridge, Massachusetts: MIT Press, 1974 (original German edition, 1911)

O'Neill, John, "The Essay as a Moral Exercise: Montaigne," Renaissance and Reformation 9 (1985): 209–18

Quinby, Rowena Lee, The Moral-Aesthetic Essay in America (dissertation), West Lafayette, Indiana: Purdue University, 1984

Rucker, Mary, "The Literary Essay and the Modern Temper," Papers on Language and Literature 11 (1975): 317–35

Spellmeyer, Kurt, "Common Ground: The Essay in the Academy," College English 51 (1989): 262–76

Trimbur, John, "Essayist Literacy and the Rhetoric of Deproduction," Rhetoric Review 9 (1990): 72–86

Voitle, Robert, Samuel Johnson, the Moralist, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1961

Zeiger, William, "The Exploratory Essay: Enfranchising the Spirit of Inquiry in College Composition," College English 47 (1985): 454–66

Morley, Christopher

American, 1890–1957

Although he is known to many readers as the author of a successful novel (Kitty Foyle, 1939) and two minor fictional classics (Parnassus on Wheels, 1917; The Haunted Bookshop, 1919), and published 16 volumes of poetry between 1912, and 1955, Christopher Morley was perhaps best known in his own time to the American public as an essayist who produced 18 volumes of essays, many of them previously appearing in periodicals as varied in approach as the Atlantic Monthly, Coronet, the American Mercury, the Bookman, Commonweal, the Manchester Guardian, and the Saturday Review of Literature.

Because much of his career was spent as a journalist, almost all of his essays were written as columns for the magazines and newspapers by whom he was employed. In an effort to appeal to the wide audience of these periodicals, he wrote on a broad variety of topics. Some of his essays were written in part to advance the literary careers and publicize the works of close literary associates and friends such as Heywood Broun, Don Marquis, Robert Cortes Holiday, and H.M.Tomlinson. Others deal with modern writers whom Morley deeply respected: Hilaire Belloc, Joseph Conrad, Rupert Brooke, and George Santayana, among others. One of his best collections in which he deals with literature and its relationship to life is Inward Ho! (1923). In these pieces, which had originally appeared as columns in the New York Evening Post, he provides enlightened, sensitive, and sensible literary criticism on authors as diverse as Bacon, Keats, Tolstoi, Yeats, and Carl Sandburg. In one set of essays in Plum Pudding (1921), he writes about the ideal reader, Walt Whitman, the making of a poet, and a renowned professor of literature, Francis Barton Gummere.

All of his essays may well have been written for Morley's "Perfect Reader," whom he describes in an essay by the same title: "Oh, the Perfect Reader! There is not an illusion that he misses; in all those lovely printed words he sees the subtle secrets that a lesser soul would miss. He (bless his heart!) is not thinking how he himself would have written it; his clear, keen, outreaching mind is intent only to be one in spirit with the invisible and long-dead author...And as long as there are Perfect Readers, who read with passion, with glory, and then speed to tell their friends, there will always be, ever and anon, a Perfect Writer."

Morley's essays consequently tend to be quite personal, as he writes about people, places, and things he has known intimately, a quality which makes his writing still attractive. He writes easily about small events which might otherwise escape the attention of most observers but which take on added significance when treated by a perceptive writer with an engaging style.

In other essays Morley is fascinated with local Americana. In many pieces he describes locations with a great deal of fondness. In the Philadelphia area, for example, he lovingly treats many obscure and well-known places such as Dooner's Tavern, Independence Hall, Little Italy, and Walt Whitman's home in nearby Camden. He can write with equal poignance about New York City as he describes various places with which he has pleasant associations; Madison Square Garden, Vesey Street, St. Paul's Churchyard, McSorley's Saloon, and the New York subway take on a piquancy which makes even the commonplace seem special.

Morley also wrote travel essays in which he tells of his excursions in England, France, Canada, and the Caribbean, as well as his fascination with great ocean liners upon which he had voyaged. Often he makes associations between the places themselves and their literary and historical significance. As he wrote in "The Sense of Place" (The Ironing Board, 1949), "Only from that humble footing, companionship with things of sight and touch, can the mind rise to larger vantage. The Place may be anywhere and happens by chance...Any place is dear where a human mind rose above the joy and torture of the flesh and said its triumphant word."

Morley's essays are polished, sophisticated, and highly personal, much in the tradition of the personal essay of Addison and Steele and Lamb. While Morley and his work have been neglected by the reading public in the very late 20th century, they still admirably fulfill the classical requirement of pleasing both the mind and the heart.

ROBERT C. STEENSMA

Biography

Christopher Darlington Morley. Born 5 May 1890 in Haverford, Pennsylvania. Family moved to Baltimore, 1900. Studied at Haverford College, B.A., 1910; Rhodes scholar in modern history at New College, Oxford, 1910–13. Staff member, Doubleday Page and Co., from 1913. Married Helen Booth Fairchild, 1914: four children. Editor, Ladies' Home Journal, 1917; columnist, Philadelphia Evening Public Ledger, 1917; cofounder and columnist, the Saturday Review of Literature, 1924–41, and New York Evening Post, 1920–23; editorial board member, Book-of-the-Month Club, 1926–54. Suffered a stroke, 1951, which incapacitated him for the rest of his life. Died in Roslyn Heights, New York, 28 March 1957.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Shandygaff, 1918

Mince Pie: Adventures on the Sunny Side of Grub Street, 1919

Travels in Philadelphia, 1920

Pipefuls, 1920

Plum Pudding, 1921

The Powder of Sympathy, 1923

Inward Ho! 1923

Religio Journalistici, 1924

Forty-Four Essays, 1925

Safety Pins and Other Essays, 1925

The Romany Stain, 1926

Essays (selection), 1928

Off the Deep End, 1928

The Child and the Book, 1929

Internal Revenue, 1933

Shakespeare and Hawaii (lectures), 1933

Christopher Morley's Briefcase, 1936

Streamlines, 1936

History of an Autumn, 1938

Letters of Askance, 1939

Morley's Variety: A Selection from the Writings, edited by Louis Greenfield, 1944

The Ironing Board, 1949

Prefaces Without Books: Prefaces and Introductions to Thirty Books, edited by Herman Abromson, 1970

Other writings: eight novels (Parnassus on Wheels, 1917; The Haunted Bookshop, 1919; Where the Blue Begins, 1922; Thunder on the Left, 1925; Human Being, 1932; Kitty Foyle, 1939; Thorofare, 1942; The Man Who Made Friends with Himself, 1949), short stories, poetry, plays, and the autobiography John Mistletoe (1931). Also edited two editions of Bartlett's Familiar Quotations.

Bibliographies

Lee, Alfred P., A Bibliography of Christopher Morley, Garden City, New York: Doubleday Doran, 1935

Lyle, Guy R., and Henry Tatnall Brown, Jr., A Bibliography of Christopher Morley, Washington, D.C.: Scarecrow Press, 1952

Further Reading

Hughes, Babette, Christopher Morley, Seattle: University of Washington Chapbooks, 1927

Wallach, Mark I., and Jon Bracker, Christopher Morley, Boston: Twayne, 1976

Morris, William

British, 1834–1896

William Morris' essays comprise a small part of his prolific literary work; nevertheless, they are the most significant of his works in clarifying the essential relationship Morris perceived between art and society and between art and politics. Less well known in literary circles than his poetry, translations, and prose romances, Morris' essays profoundly influenced the socialist movement in England during his lifetime, and they have continued to raise important questions about the crassness of commercialism, the exploitation of nature, the destructive separation of the worker from the pleasure of creation, and the inevitability of social collapse given the current state of Western society. Many of John Ruskin's themes reappear in Morris' essays, which also owe much of their exhortative style to Ruskin. Both the subject matter and the style of Morris' essays were also greatly influenced by his translation of Icelandic sagas and his vision of medieval Icelandic culture as epitomizing the integration of art into society. The substance of Morris' essays also grew out of his reading of John Stuart Mill and Karl Marx.

Written between 1877 and 1894, Morris' essays, for the most part, were first delivered as lectures and then published in periodicals or as pamphlets; some were then reprinted in collections. Many of his essays and lectures were first published only in the 20th century. In addition, Morris wrote about 500 editorials and signed articles for Justice and Commonweal, a socialist newspaper he edited from 1884 to 1890.

Best known during his lifetime as author of the four-volume narrative poem The Earthly Paradise (1868–70), Morris turned to essays in the late 1870s when he began to involve himself in such political issues as the “Eastern Question,” the conflict between Russia and other nations over control of the Ottoman Empire, a conflict which threatened to involve Great Britain, an ally of Turkey, in war against Russia. This early political issue and Morris' indignation at the methods being used to restore ancient buildings stimulated him to begin writing essays, lectures, and newspaper articles. As he became more and more involved in the socialist movement in England, he turned almost exclusively to writing nonfiction prose. In his attacks on the methods of restoring medieval buildings, Morris echoes Ruskin's The Nature of Gothic (1853). In his essay “The Beauty of Life” (1880), Morris pays homage to Ruskin's “eloquence” and influence, and in a Ruskinesque vein, writes that “down to very recent days everything that the hand of man touched was more or less beautiful: so that in those days all people who made anything shared in art, as well as all people who used the things so made; that is, all people shared in art.” In this important essay, Morris identifies his cause as “the Democracy of Art, the ennobling of daily and common work,” and holds up the promise of an enlightened society in which art would be “made by the people and for the people, a joy to the maker and the user.” For Morris, the greatest art was also political, as he explains in “The Revival of Handicraft” (1888): “...it is impossible to exclude socio-political questions from the consideration of aesthetics.”

Morris' style, like Ruskin's, is often expostulatory, instructive, and zealous, punctuated with rhetorical questions and parallel phrasing. In “Art and the Beauty of the Earth” (1881), for example, Morris exhorts his audience to protect the beauty of the earth, following his exhortation with a rhetorical question: “...it is this reasonable share in the beauty of the earth that I claim as the right of every man who will earn it by due labour; a decent house with decent surroundings for every honest and industrious family; that is the claim which I make of you in the name of art. Is it such an exorbitant claim to make of civilization?” In some of his lectures clearly directed to a working-class audience, Morris uses fairly simple diction and organization, often showing the process through which he has puzzled ideas out, for example, in “Useful Work v. Useless Toil” (1884), where he states that:

...the first thing as to the work done in civilization and the easiest to notice is that it is portioned out very unequally amongst the different classes of society. First, there are people—not a few—who do no work, and make no pretence of doing any. Next, there are people and very many of them, who work fairly hard, though with abundant easements and holidays, claimed and allowed; and lastly there are people who work so hard that they may be said to do nothing else than work, and are accordingly called the “working classes”...

When Morris is writing for a well-educated class or specialists, as in “How We Live and How We Might Live” (1885) and “Whigs, Democrats and Socialists” (1886), his diction, sentence structure, and allusions correspond to the ability of his audience to understand. Some essays on the history and practice of particular arts, such as “On the Artistic Qualities of the Woodcut Books of Ulm and Augsburg in the Fifteenth Century” (1895), clearly challenge all but the most erudite readers. The socialist lectures appeal on a primary level to the largely uneducated audience Morris was addressing, and as such feature much repetition, second-person references, and simple organization; but on a secondary level, their allusions, especially to history and art, make them seem simultaneously intended for a more sophisticated readership.

Recently Morris’ essays have received more critical attention, part as the result of a critical revival in Morris studies which began in the 1970s and has accelerated steadily. The additional interest being paid to his essays also reflects the modern interest in nonfiction that has coincided with the rise of cultural studies. Early views of Morris as an escapist who sought refuge in an idealized medieval world have been reevaluated; what has emerged from this study is a recognition of Morris’ complexity as a writer who has much to say to the modern world.

LINDA A. JULIAN

Biography

Born 24 March 1834 in Walthamstow, Essex. Studied at Marlborough College, Wiltshire, 1848–51; privately, 1852–53; Exeter College, Oxford, 1853–55, B.A., 1856, M.A., 1875. Articled to G.E. Street’s architectural firm, Oxford and London, 1856. Founding editor, Oxford and Cambridge Magazine, 1856. Painter, 1857–62: friend of members of the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood, including Dante Gabriel Rossetti and Edward Burne-Jones; founder, with Rossetti, Burne-Jones, and others, Morris Marshall Faulkner & Co. design firm, London, 1861–74, later Morris & Co., 1874–96. Married Jane Burden, 1859: two daughters. Lived in Bexley, Kent, 1861–65, and in London, from 1865. Traveled in Iceland, 1871 and 1873. Examiner, South Kensington School of Art, later the Victoria and Albert Museum, London, 1876–96. Public lecturer on art, architecture, and socialism, 1877–96. Founder, Kelmscott Press, London, 1890–96. Treasurer, National Liberal League, 1879; member, Democratic Federation, 1883, then the Socialist League, from 1884: editor of its journal Commonweal, 1884–90, and League delegate to the International Socialist Working-Men’s Congress, Paris, 1889; founding member, Hammersmith Socialist Society, 1890. Died in Hammersmith, west London, 3 October 1896.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Hopes and Fears for Art: Five Lectures, 1882

Lectures on Art, 1882

Signs of Change: Seven Lectures, 1888

Socialist Platform (collected pamphlets), with others, 1888; revised edition, 1890

The World of Romance, Being Contributions to the Oxford and Cambridge Magazine, 1856, 1906

The Unpublished Lectures, edited by Eugene D. LeMire, 1969

The Ideal Book: Essays and Lectures on the Arts of the Book, edited by William S. Peterson, 1982

Political Writings, edited by A. L. Morton, 1984

Socialist Diary, edited by Florence Boos, 1985

Political Writings: Contributions to Justice and Commonweal, 1883–1890, edited by Nicholas Salmon, 1994

Other writings: poetry, fiction (including the two prose dream narratives A Dream of John Ball, 1888, and News from Nowhere, 1890), works on socialism, letters, and translations of Old Icelandic and Norse sagas.

Collected works edition: Collected Works, edited by May Morris, 24 vols., 1910–15; supplement, as William Morris: Artist, Writer, Socialist, edited by May Morris, 2 vols., 1936.

Bibliographies

Aho, Gary L., William Morris: A Reference Guide, Boston: Hall, 1985

Briggs, R. C. H., Handlist of the Public Addresses of William Morris, Dublin: Dolmen Press, 1961

Scott, Temple, A Bibliography of the Works of William Morris, London: Bell, 1897

Walsdorf, John J., William Morris in Private Press and Limited Editions: A Descriptive Bibliography of Books by and About Morris, 1891–1981, Phoenix, Arizona: Oryx, and London: Library Association, 1983

Further Reading

Faulkner, Peter, Against the Age: An Introduction to William Morris, London and Boston: Allen and Unwin, 1980

Gallasch, Linda, The Use of Compounds and Archaic Diction in the Works of William Morris, Berne: Lang, 1979

Harvey, Charles, and Jon Press, William Morris: Design and Enterprise in Victorian Britain, Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1991

Kocmanova, Jessie, "The Living Language of William Morris," Brno Studies in English

(9 1970): 17–34

Lewis, Peter, editor, William Morris: Aspects of the Man and His Work (proceedings of the 1977 conference on William Morris held at the Loughborough University of Technology), Loughborough: Loughborough Victorian Studies Group, 1978

MacCarthy, Fiona, William Morris: A Life for Our Time, London: Faber, 1994; New York: Knopf, 1995

Thompson, E.P., William Morris: Romantic to Revolutionary, London: Merlin Press, 1977; New York: Pantheon, 1978 (original edition, 1955)

Thompson, Paul, The Work of William Morris, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1991 (original edition, 1967)

Thompson, Paul, Why William Morris Matters Today: Human Creativity and the Future World Environment, London: William Morris Society, 1991

Muir, Edwin

British, 1887–1959

Edwin Muir is remembered primarily for his work as poet and as translator with his wife Willa of the novels of Franz Kafka. Muir first came to prominence, however, as essayist and reviewer for the New Age under the editorship of A.R. Orage in the second decade of the century. The success of We Moderns (1918), his collected short essays, or aphorisms, as he called them, won him a contract with the American Freeman magazine, which enabled him to leave Britain in 1921 for his first taste of Europe and of freedom as a writer. Although he began to write poetry during that European experience and increasingly saw poetry as his chosen métier, he continued to contribute essays to periodicals both literary and general, and alongside his work as translator of European fiction, it was as an essayist and reviewer that he made a modest living throughout his life. For Muir, books were a “starting-point for an enquiry into the human spirit,” as he expressed it in the essay “A Plea for Psychology in Literary Criticism” (1921). His literary and review essays were therefore never divorced from life, but became meditations on life, social and spiritual. The best of these essays have been collected in book form over the years, although several collections are now out of print. They deserve to be better known for the perspectives they provide on the culture of their times and for the insight they provide into Muir the poet.

The early We Moderns was written under the pseudonym “Edward Moore” and was later rejected by Muir for its Nietzschean assertiveness. Although he called the series “aphorisms,” many of the pieces are more akin to essays in miniature or expanded pensées. Muir’s talents were more suited to an expanded reflection or meditation than to the short, witty statement typical of the true aphoristic form. Yet even in this largely uncharacteristic collection, one can recognize the Muir of the later poetry and essays: in the concern with the Fall of Man and Original Sin and the effect of such a doctrine on human lives; in the meditations on realism in contemporary art and the consequent loss of the classical concern with what he saw as the essence of art, the “eternal problem.” As critic, Muir stands apart from the mainstream of criticism this century, rejecting the scientific move toward formal analysis and allying himself with the tradition of Renaissance humanism with its emphasis on the imagination and the moral purpose of art—to teach by delighting. He saw literature as having an emancipating role, such as he himself had experienced through his contact with the New Age, and his exemplars were the English and German Romantic poets and the late 19th-century critic and poet Matthew Arnold.

Muir's affinity with Europe and European writers was an early feature of his essay writing. His travels in the early 1920s took him to Prague and Dresden, and from there he sent to the Freeman "sketches" giving his responses to his new environment and short essays on European writers such as Dostoevskii, Ibsen, and Nietzsche. He was the first writer to introduce Hölderlin to an English-speaking public, his early essay "A Note on Friedrich Hölderlin" appearing in the Scottish Nation in September 1923. This was followed by further essays on the German poet in the 1930s, which were later collected in Essays on Literature and Society (1949, revised and enlarged 1965). His interest in Hölderlin was lifelong. Like Muir himself, Hölderlin "approached the mystery of time and eternity through the imagination...the mystery itself, not any particular manifestation of it, was his theme; and what he made out of it was a mythology," as Muir described it in the late essays. The Freeman essay "North and South" (1922) demonstrates his interest in Goethe and Heine and the preoccupation with Sehnsucht, longing for a lost land, which was to feature so prominently in his own First Poems (1925). These European essays were collected in Latitudes (1924).

In contrast to the European Latitudes, Muir's next essay collection, Transition (1926), focused on contemporary writers in England such as T.S.Eliot, Virginia Woolf, James Joyce, Aldous Huxley, and D.H.Lawrence. Although he was never happy with what he considered Lawrence's "nihilism" and at that point in time considered Eliot more interesting as critic than poet, Muir was remarkably acute in his contemporaneous perception of the significant writers of the period. His Transition essay on James Joyce was reproduced with variations in several periodicals of the time, including the Calendar of Modern Letters and the Nation, and was included in James Joyce: The Critical Heritage, edited by Robert H. Deming in 1970.

In the mid-1930s, family circumstances brought Muir back to Scotland; this period saw him engaging more fully in the contemporary debates about Scottish cultural identity. Although never as committed culturally to Scotland as the poet Hugh MacDiarmid (i.e. Christopher Murray Grieve), with whom he quarreled over the question of the viability of Scots as a literary language, Muir's Scottish essays and reviews of this period furthered an understanding of Scotland's social and cultural situation.

Muir's final and most mature collections of essays are Essays on Literature and Society and The Estate of Poetry, a series of meditations on poetry in the modern world given at Harvard University between 1955 and 1956 and published posthumously in 1962. He had spent the immediate post-1945 years in Prague as Director of the British Council and had witnessed both the brief movement of the Czechs toward freedom and self-determination after the defeat of the Nazis and the extinguishing of that freedom when the Communists took charge in 1948. Essays on Literature and Society, like his poetry collection The Labyrinth (1949), took its impulse from what he called in An Autobiography (1954) "the single, disunited world" of mid-20th-century Europe, which he contrasted in the essay “Robert Henryson” with the lost philosophical coherence of a past age of faith. These essays give voice to his belief in the imagination and in the need for imagination in a world increasingly dominated by technology and adherence to machine-like progress. This “artificial world which we have made of the world” and the changing relationship between poet and public are the themes of The Estate of Poetry, which takes a more pessimistic view of the capacity of poetry as we have known it to survive in the modern world. Yet Muir’s understanding that it is through the imagination that we can comprehend both art and society is itself a pointer to survival. His situation in an inclusive humanist tradition of criticism and art give his essays a new relevance at the end of the century in their recall of the poet from the periphery to the center of the human stage.

MARGERY PALMER MCCULLOCH

Biography

Born 15 May 1887 in Deerness, Mainland Island, Orkney. Studied at a school on Wyre, Orkney, and at Kirkwall Burgh Grammar School, Orkney. Family moved to Glasgow, 1901. Clerk for a shipbuilding firm, Glasgow, 1902–18. Lectured at the National Guild League, Glasgow, from 1916, and helped publish the Guildsman; wrote series of “We Moderns,” 1918, and staff member, New Age, London, 1919–21. Married Wilhelmina Anderson (i.e. the writer Willa Muir), 1919; one child. Moved to London, 1919; lived in Prague, 1921–22, then Dresden and Hellerau; traveled in Italy, returning to Britain, 1924; lived in the south of France, 1926–27, in southern England, 1927–35, and St. Andrews, Fife, 1935–40. Book reviewer, the Listener, 1933–45; coeditor, European Quarterly, 1934. Worked for the British Council in Edinburgh, 1941–45, Prague, 1945–48, and Rome, 1949–50. Warden, Newbattle Abbey College, Dalkeith, 1950–55; Charles Eliot Norton Professor of Poetry, Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1955–56; retired to Swaffham Prior, near Cambridge, U.K., 1956. Awards: Foyle Prize, 1950; Heinemann Award, 1953; Frederick Niven Literary Award, 1953; Russell Loines Award, 1957; Saltire Society Prize, 1957; German Academy Voss Prize, 1958; honorary degrees from five universities. Commander, Order of the British Empire (CBE), 1953; Fellow, Royal Society of Literature, 1953. Died in Swaffam Prior, 3 January 1959.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

We Moderns: Enigmas and Guesses (as Edward Moore), 1918; as Edwin Muir for the first U.S. edition, 1920

Latitudes, 1924

Transition: Essays on Contemporary Literature, 1926

The Structure of the Novel, 1928

Essays on Literature and Society, 1949; revised, enlarged edition, 1965

The Estate of Poetry (Norton lectures), 1962

Uncollected Scottish Criticism, edited by Andrew Noble, 1982

Selected Prose, edited by George Mackay Brown, 1987

The Truth of the Imagination: Some Uncollected Reviews and Essays, edited by P.H.Butter, 1988

Other writings: poetry, three novels, and an autobiography (1940, revised 1954). Also translated, with Willa Muir, many Germanlanguage writers, including works by Kafka.

Bibliographies

Mellown, Elgin W., Bibliography of the Writings of Edwin Muir, Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1964; revised edition, London: Vane, 1966; supplement,

Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, and London: Kaye and Ward, 1970

Mellown, Elgin W., and Peter C.Hoy, A Checklist of Writings About Edwin Muir, Troy, New York: Whitston, 1971

Further Reading

Akros issue on Muir, 6, no. 47 (August 1981)

Blackmur, R.P., "Edwin Muir: Between the Tiger's Paws," Kenyon Review 21, no. 2 (1959): 419–36

Butter, P.H., Edwin Muir: Man and Poet, Edinburgh: Oliver and Boyd, and New York: Barnes and Noble, 1966

Chapman issue on Muir, 9, no. 6 (Summer 1987)

Gardner, Helen, Edwin Muir, Cardiff: University of Wales Press, 1961

Gaskill, P.H., "Edwin Muir and Goethe," Proceedings of the English Goethe Society 48 (1978): 22–51

Gaskill, P.H., "Edwin Muir as Critic of Hölderlin," Forum for Modern Language Studies 14 (1978): 345–64

Gaskill, P.H., "Edwin Muir: The German Aspect," Lines Review 69 (June 1979): 14–20

Gaskill, P.H., "Edwin Muir in Hellerau," Scottish Literary Journal 11 (May 1984): 45–56

Hoffman, Daniel, Barbarous Knowledge: Myth in the Poetry of Yeats, Graves and Muir, New York: Oxford University Press, 1967

McCulloch, Margery, "Edwin Muir's Scottish Journey 1935–80," Scottish Review 17 (February 1980): 47–52

McCulloch, Margery, "Inter-War Criticism," in The History of Scottish Literature Volume 4: Twentieth Century, edited by Craig Cairns, Aberdeen: Aberdeen University Press, 1987: 119–32

McCulloch, Margery, Edwin Muir: Poet, Critic and Novelist, Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1993

MacLachlan, C.J.M., and D.S.Robb, editors, Edwin Muir: Centenary Assessments, Aberdeen: Association for Scottish Literary Studies, 1990

Marshall, George, In a Distant Isle: The Orkney Background of Edwin Muir, Edinburgh: Scottish Academic Press, 1987

Mellown, Elgin W., Edwin Muir, Boston: Twayne, 1979

Muir, Willa, Belonging: A Memoir, London: Hogarth Press, 1968

Raine, Kathleen, "Edwin Muir: An Appreciation," Texas Quarterly 4, no. 3 (Autumn 1961): 233–45

Robertson, Ritchie, "'Our Generation': Edwin Muir as Social Critic, 1920–22," Scottish Literary Journal 9, no. 2 (December 1982): 45–65

Robertson, Ritchie, "Edwin Muir as Critic of Kafka," Modern Language Review 79, no. 4 (July 1984): 638–52

Muir, John

American, 1838–1914

Mountaineer, traveler, naturalist, activist, and essayist, John Muir is perhaps more than any other single person the progenitor of modern American environmentalism. At a time when Americans were hungry for accounts of the wilderness, his nature essays offered the public affectionate firsthand descriptions of America's natural beauty and at the same time alerted them to the environmental threat of expanding urbanization. Shifts in public attitudes were not the only consequence of his paeans to nature. A series of essays in the Atlantic Monthly (later published as Our National Parks, 1901) is thought to have been the driving force behind the Congressional bill establishing the National Park system. Muir's writing also articulated, less as a theory than through intuitions based on years of close and disciplined observation, some of the ecological principles that would become fundamental to later environmentalists. But perhaps the greatest reason for Muir's appeal and continuing relevance is that his vision of nature as having value in and of itself offers a powerful, ethically responsible alternative to the still predominant view of nature as a consumer commodity. "No dogma taught by the present civilization," he argued in the early essay "Wild Wool" (1875; later included in Steep Trails, 1918), "seems to form so insuperable an obstacle in the way of a right understanding of the relations which culture sustains to wildness as that which regards the world as made especially for the uses of man."

Muir filled some 60 journals with the observations he made during years of hiking in and studying the wilderness. Drawing heavily on these, he wrote dozens of sketches and essays for local newspapers and for popular American magazines such as Century, Overland Monthly, and the Atlantic Monthly, many of which were later revised for inclusion in his books. In spite of this considerable output, Muir found writing very difficult. Recording observations in personal journals was one thing; reporting them to the public, quite another. When he had to address a broader audience, words came to him "slow as a glacier." The Mountains of California (1894), his first and possibly his best book, was published only when he was in his mid-fifties. His difficulties can to some extent be attributed to the rhetorical situation in which he, like many nature writers since, found himself. To evoke in the American public an active interest in nature, to take them out of their expanding cities and make them realize the need for limits on urban growth, Muir knew he had to revivify what Americans had come to take for granted; yet in using language to achieve this he risked drawing their attention to words rather than living things. The paradox of nature writing clearly frustrated him: "No amount of word-making will ever make a single soul to know these mountains," he complained. "One day's exposure to mountains is better than cartloads of books.”

The attempt both to inform and to move his readers was not always successful. In some essays, Muir’s sustained descriptions of nature may seem tedious to the modern sensibility, and his scientific reportage dry; in others, his attempts to convey his awe in the face of nature’s wonders seem somewhat inflated and altogether too dependent on eager intensifiers and superlatives. Seldom does his prose possess the balance, grace, and fluidity evident in the writing of that other great 19th-century American naturalist, Henry David Thoreau. Yet there are also many passages in which it does achieve an appealing simplicity, where Muir’s spare diction and syntax so effectively convey his joy in nature that they elicit our own. When the snow falls in the High Sierra, he writes in The Mountains of California, “The rough places are then made smooth, the death and decay of the year is covered gently and kindly, and the ground seems as clean as the sky.” Anthropomorphic descriptions in the same book suggest an affection for all things natural and exemplify Muir’s belief that everything has a life and purpose of its own. Great rocks “lean back in majestic repose” or “advance their brows in thoughtful attitudes...their feet set in pine-groves” and “bathed in floods of singing water”; as the glaciers retreat, pine-trees “march” up the “sun-warmed moraines” in “long, hopeful files.”

Along with his keen and affectionate eye for detail, Muir’s ethos is the source of power in his essays. He is a kind of sotto voce John the Baptist, his occasional anger at tourists and distaste for the “pathetic and silly” gardens of civilization always softened by the pleasure he takes in snow and rainstorms, rocks and rivers, sequoia trees and wild sheep. The American essayist Edward Hoagland has said of Muir, “At rock bottom, love was what he was about.” Yet he is also about joy, and about the heightened consciousness that encounters with nature can bring us. At times, the reader feels not only the extraordinary exuberance of the man but the deep bond he had with the American wilderness—as, for example, when he tells us, in My First Summer in the Sierra (1911), of shuffling along a three-inch rocky ledge high over the rushing Merced River, his mouth stuffed with bitter artemisia leaves “to prevent giddiness”; or when he recounts, in The Yosemite (1912), how he slowly ascended a mountain, sunk waist-deep in snow and almost “out of sight” in some places, only to find himself “riding an avalanche” down, his body “moderately embedded on the surface or at times a little below it.” Passages like these make Muir a nature writer still worth reading. At his best, he is like the grasshopper described in My First Summer in the Sierra: a “crisp electric spark of joy enlivening the massy sublimity of mountains like the laugh of a child.”

BRIAN TURNER

Biography

Born 21 April 1838 in Dunbar, Scotland. Moved with his family to the United States, 1849, settling in Wisconsin. Studied at the University of Wisconsin, until 1863. Walked from Indiana to New Mexico, 1867, to California, 1868, and into Yosemite Valley, where he remained six years. Married Louise Wanda Strentzel, 1880: two daughters. Learned horticulture from his father-in-law and ran a fruit ranch, Alhambra Valley, California, 1881–91. Campaigned to establish Yosemite National Park, 1890, and eventually became an acknowledged leader of the forest conservation movement in the U.S. Took President Theodore Roosevelt on a camping trip in Yosemite, 1903: as a result Roosevelt set aside 148 million acres of additional forest reserves. Awards: honorary degrees from four universities. Member, American Academy of Arts and Sciences. Died in Los Angeles, 24 December 1914.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

The Mountains of California, 1894; enlarged edition, 1911; edited by Robert C. Baron, 1988

Our National Parks, 1901; enlarged edition, 1909

The Yosemite, 1912

Articles by John Muir, Published in the Century Magazine, Atlantic Monthly, the Outlook, 1890 to 1912, 1916

A Thousand-Mile Walk to the Gulf, edited by William Frederic Badè, 1916

Travels in Alaska, 1917

Steep Trails, edited by William Frederic Badè, 1918

Studies in the Sierra, 1950; revised edition, edited by William E. Colby, 1960

The Wilderness of John Muir (selection), 1954

Trails of Wonder: Writings on Nature and Man, edited by Peter Seymour, 1972

Wilderness Essays, 1980

The Yosemite and Beyond: Writings from the Years 1863 to 1875, edited by Robert Engberg and Donald Wesling, 1980

Muir Among the Animals: The Wildlife Writings, edited by Lisa Mighetto, 1986

South of Yosemite: Selected Writings, edited by Frederic R. Gunsky, 1988

In Nature's Heart: The Wilderness Days, edited by James Randklev, 1991

Other writings: Stickeen (1909), the story of a dog, nature writing on glaciers and mountains, journals, and autobiographies (The Story of My Boyhood and Youth, 1913; My First Summer in the Sierra, 1911).

Collected works editions: Writings (Manuscript Edition), edited by William Frederic Badè, 10 vols., 1916–24; The Eight Wilderness Discovery Books, 1992.

Further Reading

Cohen, Michael P., The Pathless Way: John Muir and American Wilderness, Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1984

Elder, John C., "John Muir and the Literature of Wilderness," Massachusetts Review 22 (1981): 375–86

Fleck, Richard F., Henry Thoreau and John Muir Among the Indians, Hamden, Connecticut: Archon, 1985

Fox, Stephen, The American Conservation Movement: John Muir and His Legacy, Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1985

Hoagland, Edward, Foreword to Steep Trails by Muir, San Francisco: Sierra Club, 1994

Jones, Holway R., John Muir and the Sierra Club: The Battle for Yosemite, San Francisco: Sierra Club, 1965

Nash, Roderick, Wilderness and the American Mind, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1967

Oelschlaeger, Max, The Idea of Wilderness: From Prehistory to the Age of Ecology, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1991

Orovec, Christine, "John Muir, Yosemite, and the Sublime Response: A Study in the Rhetoric of Preservationism," Quarterly Journal of Speech 67 (1981): 245–58

Tallmidge, John, "John Muir and the Poetics of Natural Conversion," North Dakota Quarterly 59 (1991): 62–79

Turner, Frederick, Rediscovering America: John Muir in His Time and Ours, San Francisco: Sierra Club, 1985

Mumford, Lewis

American, 1895–1990

Lewis Mumford was born in 1895 to a lower-middle-class family in Queens, New York, and his career as a social critic and public intellectual spans the greater part of the 20th century. The largely self-educated Mumford wrote over 30 books of criticism, history, fiction, and autobiography—most of which are still in print—and more than a thousand essays and reviews. He contributed regular and often influential essays to the New Republic, the Dial, the Nation, the New Yorker, and many other journals. Despite his avocation as a freelance scholar with few university ties, Mumford's eclectic work helped inaugurate several academic disciplines and specialized fields, including the social history of technology, architectural and urban planning, and American studies. Drawing on anthropology, cultural and political history, sociology, literature, political economy, and philosophy, Mumford's work synthesizes older fields of intellectual inquiry into a coherent, "organic" whole. Mumford's essays shaped policy debates in public arenas as diverse as urban and regional planning, ecology, and nuclear disarmament; for these efforts he was awarded numerous honors, including the National Book Award, the National Medal for Literature, and the Smithsonian Institution's Hodgkins Gold Medal for groundbreaking, cross-disciplinary scholarship linking the sciences and the humanities.

Like the "Young American" critics Van Wyck Brooks, Waldo Frank, and Randolph Bourne with whom he is often associated, Mumford locates the modern crisis of individual identity at the crossroads of aesthetics and politics. Shaped by diverse traditions and individuals including Patrick Geddes, Henri Bergson, continental Lebensphilosophie, American pragmatism, and "insurgent" "American Scholars" such as Walt Whitman, Ralph Waldo Emerson, and Henry David Thoreau, Mumford's biologically grounded, vitalist sociology sought to reverse T.S.Eliot's modern "dissociation of sensibility" by joining the intellectually abstract to the physically palpable. Mumford harshly criticized the European Enlightenment that had both excluded the irrational and the sacred from cultural analysis and privileged the untrammelled development of technological rationality at the expense of craftsmanship and creativity.

With his Modernist contemporaries, Mumford exposed the enlightened rationalism of the Victorian age to a relentless moral critique, countering its confidence in objective science with a renewed emphasis on subjectively lived experience. Mumford deplored the one-sided development of the individual's capacities in capitalist modernity and argued passionately for an Emersonian reconstruction of the individual, investing the Rousseauvian essay of self-inventory with the republican virtue of a Roman moralist. Mumford's essayistic persona declaims a new American jeremiad, prophesying a renewal of cultural and social life merging the best aspects of premodern tradition—the individual's imbeddedness in regional communities and shared memory of a collective past—with the potential for material abundance offered by modern industrial society.

Mumford—following John Ruskin—posits architecture and city planning as the cultural practices that most prominently represent society's aspirations and spiritual essence. The “usable history” of American architectural and literary tradition provides a possible resource for renewal, for rooting social life in the “total situation” of its biological and cultural complexity rather than the merely “artful system of concepts” characteristic of academic criticism. The early ground-breaking essays on American culture—Sticks and Stones (1924), The Golden Day (1926), Herman Melville (1929), and The Brown Decades (1931)—identify in the “Golden Day” of the American literary and architectural renaissance a potentially redemptive link between the technological present and the organic past. “Towards Modern Architecture” (1922), an early and influential essay, lauds the early “Brown Decades” architecture of Henry Hobson Richardson, John Wellborn Root, and Louis Sullivan for clearing away “the truckloads of ornament and bric-a-brac” characteristic of Victorian aesthetics, thus preparing the way for Frank Lloyd Wright's exemplary Modernist innovations. For Mumford, Wright's architectural compositions—especially the early buildings which explored “the beauty of earth colors and natural finishes: the manifold possibilities of glass...the principles of horizontal composition”—would serve as aesthetic allegories of the potential for a Romantic reintegration of self and society.

Not unlike the Renaissance humanists who inspired him, Mumford reasons by analogy. His synoptic “Renewal of Life” series—Technics and Civilization (1934), The Culture of Cities (1938), The Condition of Man (1944), and The Conduct of Life (1951)—surveys the rise of the modern “megamachine”—the impersonal, bureaucratic structures of technological modernity characterized by “exactitude in measurement... abstract mechanical system...[and] compulsive regularity”—and the resulting diminution of the unpredictably vital elements in human life. Similarly, The City in History (1961) narrates the moral and cultural decline of the European city, praising the organic synthesis of medieval town planning and decrying the “enlightened” geometrical abstraction of the modern age: “There could be no sharper contrast between the two orders of thinking, the organic and the mechanical, than here: the first springs out of the total situation; the other simplifies the facts of life for the sake of an artful system of concepts, more dear to the mind than life itself.” By allowing us to glimpse the workings of an exemplary mind unfettered by artful systems, Mumford's version of the post-Romantic Modernist essay rhetorically suggests an escape from the structures of instrumental reason that trap the individual in a “megamachine” of his own devising. Inductive, intuitive, and sweeping in scope, Mumford's often treatise-length essays contribute to that signal Modernist tradition we might call the mythology of secular redemption.

A profound sense of personal loss animates Mumford's critical essays and scholarly essays. In a typical passage, Mumford writes that "the city I once knew so intimately has been wrecked; most of what remains will soon vanish; and therewith scattered fragments of my own life will disappear in the rubble that is carted away." Gone was the "brownstone" New York of his childhood and with it disappeared the "diagrammatic neatness" of old New York's tightly-knit "small town" social fabric, aesthetic harmony, and "moral stability." New York is for Mumford both a proper subject for essayistic reflection and itself a living essay. In "Yesterday's City of Tomorrow" (1962), striking the plangent moral and epistemological pose familiar to the essay genre since its inception, Mumford notes with sorrow that "the freedom of movement, the change of pace, the choice of alternative destinations, the spontaneous encounters, the range of social choices...in fact, the multifarious life of a city, have been traded away for expressway, parking space, and vertical circulation."

The lyrical, autobiographical quality that permeates Mumford's work suggests the debt his social criticism owes to the essay form itself. If the New York of Mumford's fondly remembered childhood presented itself as a spectacle "to gladden [his] eyes and beckon [his] legs to ramble"—the rhetoric of the urban flâneur familiar to the essay since Addison and Steele—contemporary city design encourages neither aesthetic reflection nor unrehearsed exploration. For Mumford, the uncritical celebration of technology culminating in the skyscraper, the empty architectural abstractions of Le Corbusier's Modernism, and the reliance on new forms of transportation such as the automobile to the exclusion of foot traffic, devalue individuals and local communities, who become merely idiosyncratic obstacles for the architects and planners of the modern city. To the same degree that old New York inspired enriching aesthetic experiences and lyrical, essayistic responses with its sporadic rhythms and spontaneous encounters, the bureaucratically regimented cities of the future would produce only anomic despair. Further, with the Cold War expansion of the military industrial complex and the rise of a new "Pentagon of power" (the "financial, industrial, scientific, military, and educational experts"), and the dropping of the atomic bomb on Hiroshima threatening the possibility of global apocalypse, Mumford cautiously qualified his earlier hopes for a potentially humane deployment of technology as he saw the worst tendencies in the culture of modern "technics" magnified.

Despite the general disillusionment of his later work, however, Mumford continued until the final moments of his life to struggle against the pessimism of his own intellect: "The renewal of life is the great theme of our age, not the further dominance...of the machine...In short, we must take things into our own hands...And in the end, proudly reversing Blake's dictum, we shall, I hope, be able to say: Art elevated, imagination affirmed, peace governs the nations."

MATTHEW TITOLO

Biography

Born 19 October 1895 in New York City. Studied at the City College of New York, 1912–17; Columbia University, New York, 1915–16; New School for Social Research, New York, 1919. Served in the U.S. army, 1918–19. Assistant editor, Fortnightly Dial, 1919. Married Sophia Wittenberg, 1921: one son (killed in action during World War II) and one daughter. Taught at the New School for Social Research, 1925, Dartmouth College, Hanover, New Hampshire, 1929–35, Columbia University, 1931–35, Stanford University, California, 1942–44, North Carolina State University, Raleigh, 1948–52, University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia, 1951–56 and 1959–61, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Cambridge, 1957–61 and 1973–75, University of California, Berkeley, 1961–62, and Wesleyan University, Middletown, Connecticut, 1962–64. Contributing editor, the New Republic, 1927–40; architectural critic and columnist of “Sky Line,” the New Yorker, 1931–63; also contributed to various other journals. Awards: many, including the National Book Award, for The City in History, 1962; Presidential Medal of Freedom, 1964; Emerson-Thoreau Medal, 1965; American Academy of Arts and Letters Gold Medal in Belles Lettres, 1971; Hodgkins Gold Medal, 1971; National Book Committee National Medal for Literature, 1972; Prix Mondial, 1976; honorary degrees from two universities. Died in Amenia, New York, 26 January 1990.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

- Sticks and Stones: A Study of American Architecture and Civilization*, 1924
The Golden Day: A Study of American Experience and Culture, 1926; as The Golden Day: A Study in American Literature and Culture, 1933
Herman Melville, 1929; revised edition, 1962
The Brown Decades: A Study of the Arts in America, 1865–1895, 1931
Technics and Civilization, 1934
The Culture of Cities, 1938
The South in Architecture, 1941
The Condition of Man, 1944
City Development: Studies in Disintegration and Renewal, 1945
Values for Survival: Essays, Addresses, and Letters in Politics and Education, 1946
The Conduct of Life, 1951
The Arts in Renewal, 1951
Art and Technics (lectures), 1951
The Human Prospect, edited by Harry T. Moore and Karl W. Deutsch, 1955
From the Ground Up: Observations on Contemporary Architecture, Housing, Highway Building, and Civic Design, 1956
The City in History, 1961
The Highway and the City, 1963
The Urban Prospect, 1968
Interpretations and Forecasts, 1922–1972: Studies in Literature, Biography, Technics, and Contemporary Society, 1973
Architecture as a Home for Man: Essays for “Architectural Record”, edited by Jeanne M. Davern, 1975
Findings and Keepings, 1914–1936, 1975
The Lewis Mumford Reader, edited by Donald L. Miller, 1986

Other writings: works on town planning, cities, and architecture.

Bibliography

Newman, Elmer S., Lewis Mumford: A Bibliography, 1914–1970, New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1971

Further Reading

Blake, Casey Nelson, Beloved Community: The Cultural Criticism of Randolph Bourne, Van Wyck Brooks, Waldo Frank and Lewis Mumford, Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1990

Carrithers, Gale H., Jr., Mumford, Tate, Eiseley: Watchers in the Night, Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1991

Hughes, Thomas P., American Genesis: A Century of Invention and Technological Enthusiasm, 1870–1970, New York: Viking, 1989

Hughes, Thomas P., and Agatha C. Hughes, Lewis Mumford: Public Intellectual, New York: Oxford University Press, 1990

Miller, Donald L., Lewis Mumford: A Life, New York: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1989

Miller, Donald L., editor, The Lewis Mumford Reader, Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1995 (original edition, 1986)

Murdoch, Walter

Australian, 1874–1970

Successive reprints of collections under new titles testify to the popularity of Walter Murdoch's essays, which are regarded as models of relaxed, lucid writing in which insight and thought are brought to a great variety of accessible but not mundane topics. Among the best known of his first essays, published in 1891 in the Melbourne journal the Australian Weekly, are "The Worst Hundred Books" and "Thackeray and Meredith." In the former he combined critical insight with dry humor to encourage the general reader to look at literary texts with new interest; in the latter he took up his lifetime mission to make European literature a familiar possession of middle-class Australians who might not have had a university education. The essay was to Murdoch in the nature of vocation; he wrote in the essay "On Doors": "I am one who believes that the essay, if not the highest form of literature, is the most difficult of all; that a good essay is harder to write than a good novel; that the great essayists are rarer than the great poets; that we are likely to see another Shakespeare sooner than another Montaigne."

Murdoch's style changed very little over the years, remaining witty, wry, and unselfconsciously urbane, and displaying on occasions a wonderful aptitude for parody. Aware that his early writing in newspapers and journals from the 1890s might look “dowdy and old-fashioned,” he nevertheless retained in all his work the same liberal, critical, and often skeptical stance based on a respect for broad humanist principles and essentially British values. Tempered by a shrewd wit that appealed to the educated Australian reader, Murdoch’s essays reflected a transitional stage in Australian intellectual life from a conscious appeal to English ideas and tastes to a more confident Australian outlook. Murdoch’s apparent failure to appreciate the directions and achievement perceptible in Australian writing from the 1930s led to criticism from some younger academics. Yet Murdoch espoused originality and “Australianism,” and looked kindly on the Jindyworobak poets who sought to replace the dependence of Australian poetry on European models with closer ties to Australian landscape and Aboriginal culture. As a critic of contemporary Australian writing, Murdoch said little of permanent interest, but his respect for reasoned ideas and the language in which they are expressed remain relevant.

The critic A.A. Phillips (Meanjin, 1969) saw Murdoch as a master of “the art of good-humored devastation.” Whether his subject was literary or related more generally to middleclass culture, he defended the habit of sober questioning and seeing things steadily and in perspective. His ability to steer a commonsense middle course in intellectual and moral questions should not be seen as mediocrity, a state which his writing and radio broadcasts persistently attacked. His attitude is summed up in the motto he wrote for himself: “Amid a world of sceptred sham/Be this my humble aim, at least;/To seem the sort of beast I am/And not some other sort of beast.”

Murdoch’s conversational, intimate engagement with the reader has been compared to that of Charles Lamb and usually renders palatable his tendency to unpretentious moralizing and admonishing. His best-known essays include “A Question Settled” (1931), “The Book and the Island” (1934), “The Pink Man’s Burden” (1936), and “The Art of Controversy” (1931). Murdoch’s essay “The Enemies of Literature” (1907), delivered as a presidential address to the Melbourne Literature Society, drew from the poet Bernard O’Dowd his famous credo, “Poetry Militant.”

Murdoch’s conservatism, however, was so mild that he seldom aroused controversy, and in “The Pink Man’s Burden” he describes the class who believes that there are two sides to every question and “to which I have the misfortune to belong; the mild people, the moderate people, whose colour is about half-way between the stainless white of the Tory and the vivid and flaming red of the Revolutionary; the pink people, in short.” Refusing to promulgate any point of view other than that there are many, Murdoch gave few answers but encouraged readers both to question and to find their own answers. When the questions raised in his essays touched on religion, Murdoch often found himself attacked by professional theologians, but his infinite courtesy in reply disarmed hostility. His essays are cultured but not cultivated, and learned without being academic. His writing is never anti-intellectual but implicitly and explicitly expresses faith in common sense and in the ability of average people to arrive at sound and hard decisions should they apply themselves to big questions.

Murdoch’s essays often drew on European literature and culture, but were recognized as expressions of Australian intellectual and social ideals. As the writer and critic Mary Durack wrote in 1969, Murdoch’s essays were part of “his fight for the use of clear and precise language, for the development of informed opinion, for tolerance and consideration towards his fellow men, and for the right of the individual to be himself within the framework of his own personality.”

ELIZABETH PERKINS

Biography

Walter Logie Forbes Murdoch. Uncle of the press baron Sir Keith Murdoch; great-uncle of the media tycoon Rupert Murdoch. Born 17 September 1874 in Pitsligo, Aberdeenshire, Scotland. Came to Australia at age ten. Studied logic and philosophy, University of Melbourne, B.A., 1895; M.A., 1897. Earliest essays appeared, under pseudonyms including Diogenes, Nick O'Teen, and Elzevir, in the Australian Weekly and the Argus and other journals and newspapers, from 1891. Tutor near Beaufort, Victoria, 1895; taught at Hamilton Academy, Victoria, 1896, and Warrnambool College, Victoria, 1901–03. Married Violet Catherine Hughston, 1897. Lecturer in English, University of Melbourne, from 1904. Founding editor, Trident, 1907–09. Foundation Chair of English, 1912–39, and chancellor, 1943–48, University of Western Australia. Companion, Order of British Empire (CBE), 1939. Knighted, 1964. Second university in Western Australia named after him. Died in South Perth, 30 July 1970.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Loose Leaves, 1910

Speaking Personally, 1930

Saturday Mornings, 1931

Moreover, 1932.

The Wild Planet, 1934

The Two Laughters, 1934

Lucid Intervals, 1936

Collected Essays, 1938

The Spur of the Moment, 1939

Steadfast: A Commentary, 1941

Selections, 1941

72 Essays: A Selection, 1947

Answers, 1953; as My 100 Answers, 1960

Selected Essays, 1956

Walter Murdoch and Alfred Deakin on Books and Men: Letters and Comments, 1900–1918, edited by John A. La Nauze and Elizabeth Nurser, 1974

Other writings: the collection of poetry Anne's Animals (1921), the history The Struggle for Freedom (1903), and a biography of Alfred Deakin (1923). Also edited The Oxford Book of Australasian Verse (1918).

Bibliographies

- Crag, G., "A Walter Murdoch Bibliography," Meanjin 9, no. 1 (1950)
 Hergenhan, Laurie, and Martin Duwell, editors, The ALS Guide to Australian Writers: A Bibliography, 1963–1990, St. Lucia: University of Queensland Press, 1992

Further Reading

- Durack, Mary, "Walter Murdoch: The Man in the Mirror," Meanjin (1969)
 Green, H.M., A History of Australian Literature, revised by Dorothy Green, Sydney: Angus and Robertson, 2 vols., 1984
 La Nauze, John A., Walter Murdoch: A Biographical Memoir, Carlton: Melbourne University Press, 1977

Musil, Robert

Austrian, 1880–1942

Robert Musil published many essays during his lifetime in which he dealt with contemporary issues concerning the visual arts, sciences, politics, religion, theater, motion pictures, literature, social and economic conditions of women, nationalism, and empiricism. He was also highly active as a theater and art critic, as his large output of reviews demonstrates. As a trained physicist and engineer, Musil dealt with a wide range of human issues by combining analytical with inspirational and mystical thinking, and thus challenged his contemporaries with radically different views about life. As an essayist Musil established himself as a central figure of European intellectual discourse, although with the rise of National Socialism and the barbarous culture of Nazi Germany in the 1930s and 1940s he was increasingly marginalized, and died, almost forgotten, at the height of World War II.

In his famous fragmentary novel Der Mann ohne Eigenschaften (1930–43; The Man Without Qualities) Musil explicitly outlines the meaning of the essay for the future of Western culture at large: the essay facilitates the study of any object from many different angles, without necessarily discussing it to its full extent; otherwise the object would be reduced to a label and thus lose its individual contours. Relativity plays a major role in Musil's thinking: a murderer, for example, could be either considered as such and tried by the courts, or seen as a national hero and celebrated. In Musil's eyes every human being is given an infinite number of possibilities for his or her life and can pursue a plurality of connections with other people and objects. The "unwritten poem" serves as a metaphor for the powerful impact of emotions, intuitions, and sensations on reality. Morality is a matter of definition and social circumstances, not an absolute value. Modern sciences (particularly psychology) indicate, as Musil emphasizes, the breaking up of traditional values, injecting into them a plethora of new meanings. The essayist is not a philosopher in the narrow sense of the word, but explores through narrative alternatives the framework and conditions of life.

As Musil suggests, the modern world has lost its sense of logic and order; only the essay can capture the essential thoughts and ideas in the inner life of a human being and give expression to the chaotic conditions of existence. Essayists assume a position between religion and science, between a poem and an intellectual argument, and between scholarship and literature. The essayist does not strive for truth as such, nor does he create fiction, but rather searches for a conviction and for the potentiality of his own being.

In The Man Without Qualities the crucial realization of what life's meaning might be occurs shortly before Book Two when Ulrich learns that his father has died. According to the narrator the modern world has lost the sense for the epic and its narrative continuum, whereas the lyric offers nothing but an illusionary refuge. Life can no longer be represented by either literary genre, instead appearing as a dimension of endless and forever intertwining threads, which form the basic elements of the essay.

Not surprisingly, Musil never managed to complete The Man Without Qualities, and exhausted himself in trying without much success to pull together the whole work, a huge collection of essays in itself. Musil's tragic error lay in not seeing that his expressly stated goal to conquer the world by "force of mind and spirit" was in stark contradiction to the idea of the essay as the primary foundation of the literary treatment of reality. Novelistic narration is still a major force in Musil's masterpiece, but both aphorisms and essayistic passages increasingly replace the traditional reliance on fictional elements. Its title indicates the extent to which the author has understood that the modern world can no longer be represented in illusionary fiction, but finds its appropriate expression in the paradox of the man without qualities.

Musil's farsightedness and modernity is documented not only in his essayistic novel, but also in his large number of essays. In fact, through his essays, which he had hoped to publish in a collection in 1926, he searches for the new man and a new society that will rise in the wake of the technological and scientific revolution in the first half of the 20th century. Musil had written only two technical articles and his doctoral dissertation on Ernst Mach when he joined the public debate about the relationship between sickness and art with the essay "Das Unanständige und Kranke in der Kunst" (1911; "The Obscene and Pathological in Art"). Here he takes the side of those people suppressed and persecuted by the authorities, particularly because his moral and intellectual relativism opened his eyes to alternative views.

Because of his thorough training as a scientist, his critical writing is strongly influenced by scientific discourse and pure rationality. In his essay "Das Geistliche, der Modernismus und die Metaphysis" (1912.; "The Religious Spirit, Modernism, and Metaphysics") Musil argues that modernity was simply the result of injecting religion with bourgeois reason, of discarding emotions, and of ignoring rationality as the prime goal of the modern world. He laments the loss of the soul which may be the corresponding element to ratio, and recommends exploring the spiritual life with the same tools scientists use to study the objective world.

Musil also examined the political structure and culture of the Austrian Empire with its artificially sustained aristocratic system and idealization of the monarchy. In his postwar essay “Buridans Österreicher” (1919; “Buridan’s Austria”) Musil observes Austria’s longstanding dilemma between forming a federation of nations in the Danube region (Balkan) or joining the German Reich. He maintains satirically that Austria was populated by 50 million intellectuals and 1000 working-class people, whereas the ratio was the opposite in Germany. In this and other essays he formulates many ideas which later were incorporated in The Man Without Qualities. The same applies to his studies on morality, pathology, mathematics, metaphysics, nationalism, poetry, and sciences.

The outstanding feature of all of Musil’s essays is their analytic precision and high level of rational penetration into a problem, be it the church, the state, modern literature, or a combination of any of these elements. Musil’s literary works such as his narratives (Die Verwirrungen des Zöglings Törless [1906; Young Törless], Drei Frauen [1924; Three women, translated as Five Women], Nachlass zu Lebzeiten [1936; Posthumous Papers of a Living Author]) and his dramatic texts (Die Schwärmer [1921; The Enthusiasts] and Vinzenz und die Freundin bedeutender Männer [1924; Vinzenz and the girlfriend of important men]) strongly reflect the essayist and mathematician in the writer who also attempts to understand the human soul, mystical experiences, love, and other areas of the irrational mind. Musil coined the phrases “ratioid” and “nicht-ratioid” for the opposition between these two dimensions of human epistemology. Consequently he also investigated the differences between “civilization” and “culture,” between nation and individual. But his main interest as an essayist was to discuss the course of world history, the future development of humankind, the revolution of science and morality, and the essence of history.

Musil’s style is that of both scientist and moralist. He despised the glorification of feelings without studying them with the rational eye of a mathematician. Hence he opted for the essay as the most important literary form in the 20th century because in it he could combine science and mysticism, or rationality and emotions. Whereas physics and the other natural sciences had forged ahead of their time, neither morality nor ethics, neither aesthetics nor spirituality had kept up with the transitions of the early 20th century. With his essays Musil attempted to inject the moral world with the same investigative and analytical tools as were employed in laboratories (“Politische Bekenntnisse eines jungen Mannes” [1913; Political confessions of a young man]). Whereas science had made the development of the modern world possible, the arts and literature had not progressed and were in strong need of reform. The essay, as a genre, was for Musil one feasible avenue toward this goal.

Simultaneously Musil was very interested in modern art forms and art media, as his essays on film (“Ansätze zu einer neuen Ästhetik” [1925; “Toward a New Aesthetic”), on the relationship between literature and psychology, and on individual avant-garde poets (“Zu Kerrs 60. Geburtstag” [1927; On Kerr’s 60th birthday]) indicate. He also treated the various literary genres, stylistic features, and themes in his essays, examined the situation of women in modern society (“Die Frau gestern und morgen” [1929; “Women Yesterday and Tomorrow”), but always searched for a combination of natural science (mathematics) with the world of emotions, or, put differently, scientific analysis with the essay.

Although Musil never gained broad acceptance as an essayist and social and ethical philosopher, his critical writing represents the avant-garde of modern literature and still awaits public recognition.

ALBRECHT CLASSEN

Biography

Robert Edler von Musil. Born 6 November 1880 in Klagenfurt, Austria. Studied engineering at the Technische Hochschule, Brno, 1898–1901; military service, 1901–02; assistant researcher at the Technische Hochschule, Stuttgart, 1902–03; studied philosophy, psychology, and mathematics at the University of Berlin, 1903–05, Ph.D., 1908. Contributor to various journals and newspapers throughout his life. Married Martha Marcovaldi, 1911. Librarian, Technische Hochschule, Vienna, 1911–14; editor, Die neue Rundschau (The new review), Berlin, 1914. Captain in the Austrian army, 1914–16; hospitalized, 1916, and editor of army newspaper, 1916–18. Head of the education office, 1918–19, and consultant, 1920–22, Defense Ministry; worked in the press section of the Office of Foreign Affairs, Vienna, 1919–20. Lived in Berlin, 1931–33, Vienna, 1933–38, and Zurich and Geneva, 1938–42. Awards: Kleist Prize, 1923; City of Vienna Prize, 1924. Died (of a stroke) in Geneva, 15 April 1942.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Der Mann ohne Eigenschaften (novel), 3 vols., 1930–43; as The Man Without Qualities, translated by Ernst Kaiser and Eithne Wilkins, 3 vols., 1953–60, and Sophie Wilkins, 2 vols., 1995

Tagebücher, Aphorismen, Essays und Reden (vol. 2 of Gesammelte Werke), edited by Adolf Frisé, 1955

Das hilflose Europa: Drei Essays, 1961

Theater: Kritisches und Theoretisches, edited by Marie-Louise Roth, 1965

Selected Writings, edited by Burton Pike, 1986

Precision and Soul: Essays and Addresses, edited and translated by Burton Pike and David S. Luft, 1990

Kleine Prosa, Aphorismen, Autobiographisches; Essays und Reden, Kritik (part of Gesammelte Werke), edited by Adolf Frisé, 1978

Der literarische Nachlass (CD-Rom), edited by Friedbert Aspetsberger, Karl Eibl, and Adolf Frisé, 1992

Other writings: another novel (Die Verwirrungen des Zöglings Törless [Young Törless], 1906), short stories (including Nachlass zu Lebzeiten [Posthumous Papers of a Living Author], 1936), novellas, two plays, and correspondence.

Collected works edition: Gesammelte Werke, edited by Adolf Frisé, 3 vols., 1952–57, revised edition, 2 vols., 1978.

Bibliographies

Arntzen, Helmut, Musil-Kommentar sämtlicher zu Lebzeiten erschienener Schriften

- ausser dem Roman “Der Mann ohne Eigenschaften”, Munich: Winkler, 1980:279–310
- Arntzen, Helmut, Musil-Kommentar zum Roman “Der Mann ohne Eigenschaften”, Munich: Winkler, 1982:450–80
- King, Lynda J., “Robert Musil Bibliography 1976/1977,” MusilForum 4 (1978): 104–16
- Mae, Michiko, “Robert-Musil-Bibliographie 1977–1980,” MusilForum 6 (1980): 239–58
- Mae, Michiko, “Robert Musil-Bibliographie: Ergänzungs bibliographie 1980–1983,” Musil-Forum 9 (1983): 183–220
- Rogowski, Christian, Distinguished Outsider: Robert Musil and His Critics, Columbia, South Carolina: Camden House, 1994
- Thöming, Jürgen C., Robert-Musil-Bibliographie, Bad Homburg: Gehlen, 1968

Further Reading

- Arntzen, Helmut, Satirischer Stil: Zur Satire Robert Musils im “Mann ohne Eigenschaften”, Bonn: Bouvier, 1970 (original edition, 1960)
- Corino, Karl, Robert Musil: Leben und Werk in Bildern und Texten, Reinbek: Rowohlt, 1988
- Dinklage, Karl, Elisabeth Albertson, and Karl Corino, editors, Robert Musil: Studien zu seinem Werk, Reinbek: Rowohlt, 1970
- Harrison, Thomas, Essayism: Conrad, Musil, and Pirandello, Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1992
- Hickman, Hannah, editor, Robert Musil and the Literary Landscape of His Time, Salford, Lancashire: University of Salford Department of Modern Languages, 1991
- Hochstätter, Dietrich, Sprache des Möglichen: Stilistischer Perspektivismus in Robert Musils “Der Mann ohne Eigenschaften”, Frankfurt-on-Main: Athenäum, 1972
- Kaiser, Gerhard R., Proust, Musil, Joyce: Zum Verhältnis von Literatur und Gesellschaft am Paradigma des Zitats, Frankfurt-on-Main: Athenäum, 1972
- Luft, David S., Robert Musil and the Crisis of European Culture, 1880–1942, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1980
- Payne, Philip, Robert Musil’s “The Man Without Qualities”: A Critical Study, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1988
- Pfeiffer, Peter C., Aphorismus und Romanstruktur: Zu Robert Musils “Der Mann ohne Eigenschaften”, Bonn: Bouvier, 1990
- Renier-Servranckx, Annie, Robert Musil, Bonn: Bouvier, 1972
- Roth, Marie-Louise, Robert Musil: Ethik und Ästhetik, Munich: List, 1972
- Venturelli, Aldo, “Die Kunst als fröhliche Wissenschaft: Zum Verhältnis Musils zu Nietzsche,” Nietzsche-Studien 9 (1980): 302–37
- Willemsen, Roger, Robert Musil: Vom intellektuellen Eros, Munich: Piper, 1985

Mutafov, Chavdar

Bulgarian, 1899–1954

Chavdar Mutafov is the first Bulgarian writer to conceptualize how 20th-century spirituality was transformed by the mechanization of human life. His vision of the new epoch in the development of European civilization is ambiguous, however. In his essays and public lectures on fine arts and dance and on the new-born arts of cinema, poster design, and caricature, he appreciates the economic plenitude and the inevitable changes imposed on European culture by mass production. At the same time, Mutafov's works of fiction suggest that he was very aware that this new phenomenon would have dangerous side effects on humanity.

Mutafov's pioneer position as an advocate of Modernism in interwar Bulgaria resulted to a great extent from the circumstances of his life. During his studies in Munich (engineering 1908–14, and architecture 1923–25) he was fascinated with the avant-garde. Afterwards, in Bulgaria, he combined his work as a professional architect and writer with a genuine and enduring interest in the implications of the impetuous development of technology.

Mutafov considered promoting avant-garde ideas among Bulgarian intellectuals and a mass audience as an important cultural mission. The numerous talks on modern art, cinema, music, and industrial design that he gave throughout the country honed his expository skills for his essays (published mainly in the popular interwar Bulgarian literary-cultural monthly Zlatorog [Goldenhorn]). Mutafov realized that, if his essays were to be read by a general audience, they had first and foremost to inform, and to persuade not by means of mere rhetoric, but by objective representation and analysis of factual data. Thus he usually begins by locating the topic in its natural Western European environment, and only then proceeds to discuss its Bulgarian analogues. "Peizazhut i nashite khudozhnitsi" (1920; Landscape painting and our painters) is schematically typical: Mutafov starts with general statements on the relation between the world of art and the real world, goes on to reflect on the function of the soul as a mediator between the two worlds, and finally presents the cultural phenomenon—landscape painting—as an expression of man's philosophical relation to existence, a kind of "metaphysics of art." Only after this setting is completed does he portray a few then popular Bulgarian painters and inquires into Bulgarian Modernist art as an organic part of European Modernism.

"Peizazhut i nashite khudozhnitsi" is also representative of Mutafov's holistic approach to whatever phenomenon of culture he analyzes, but "Liniyata v izobrazitelnoto izkustvo" (1920; Line in visual art) and "Plakatut" (1921; Poster) are exemplary in this respect. These essays are concerned with the phenomena Bulgarians were to become aware of much later. The former presents a brief history of visual art through the development of the symbolism of line; the latter is devoted to the idiosyncrasy of the perception of the poster as a kind of decorative art, a combination of the banal and the artful which becomes possible only in an urban environment. In both cases Mutafov is concerned with the unique new features of the objects under scrutiny, analyzing them comprehensively. Both essays reveal a writer who has mastered succinctness to perfection.

Compared to that of other Bulgarian essay writers, Mutafov's style seems strikingly objective and condensed, sometimes even elliptical, and by the same token dry and alien to the Bulgarian rhetorical tradition. Perhaps the only exception is his essay "Zeleniiaat kon" (1920; The green horse), a passionate manifesto and defense of expressionism and of what Kandinskii calls "inner necessity" in art.

During the 1920s Mutafov was one of the most interesting and ambiguous figures in Bulgarian cultural life. Although not always appreciated by his audience, which was in principle suspicious of the “anti-realistic” Western fashions, Mutafov managed to popularize his “ultramodern absurdities and eccentricities,” as his all-encompassing vision of the modern times was called by some homespun critics (Hiperion, 1928). Mutafov’s works of fiction—expressionistic short stories, grotesques, and “impressions,” and the “decorative novel” Diletant (1926; Dilettante)—greatly complicate this vision. They testify to his awareness of the dehumanizing side of mass production and disclose the limitations of Modernism in its search for entirely new artistic expression; consequently, they were even less understood by the public.

Mutafov might have been a leading figure among Bulgarian expressionists were it not for their central concern with social issues, which interested Mutafov only through the prism of the ultimate existential questions. Despite his pro-Western orientation, he did not become a leader of the pro-Western trend in Bulgarian cultural life either. While adherents of the West stated that Romantic subjectivism should set the vectors for the Europeanization of Bulgarian literature and art, Mutafov was convinced that the time for the objectification of the self had come. He remained a “dangerously premature pioneer in a sleepy culture,” as Dimitur Avramov summarized Mutafov’s position in Bulgarian intellectual life (“Podraniliat modernist” [1972.; The premature Modernist]).

Under communism the ideology of “socialist realism,” the only officially permitted critical approach, excluded Mutafov, along with other “ideologically incorrect writers,” from the group of published authors, as well as from the surveys and textbooks on Bulgarian literature and art. In fact, Mutafov was the only Bulgarian writer to be officially designated as an author with a fascist orientation (Rechnik na Bulgarskata literatura [1970; Dictionary of Bulgarian literature]), without any supporting evidence. In the 1990s the interest in Mutafov’s output has grown, and in 1993 a selection of his essays was published for the first time.

Even without taking into consideration Mutafov’s courage to publicize ideas from the urbane culture of Western Europe in a basically agrarian Bulgaria, his vision of modern spirituality impresses us with its integrity and potential. Mutafov realized that no matter how backward his native country was after World War I, its culture could not remain unaffected by the birth of technological civilization in Western Europe. In this respect he clearly differed from both those who maintained the idea of “unique native art” (rodno izkustvo) and those who believed that Bulgarian culture should be open only to the classical models of Western literature and art.

KATIA MITOVA-JANOWSKI

Biography

Born 19 September 1899 in Sevlievo. Studied civil engineering, 1908–14, and architecture, 1923–25, in Munich. Worked as a professional architect. Contributor to various journals, including Vežni (Libra), Zlatorog, and Demokratičeski pregled (Democratic review). Associated with the pro-West group Strelets (Archer), which included Konstantin Gulabov, Atanas Dalchev, Ivan Mirchev, and other poets and artists:

editor of its journals Iztok (East) and Strelets. Married Fani Popova-Mutafova. Under communism, unpublished and subject to censorship. Died in Sofia, 10 March 1954.

Selected Writings

Essays

Izbrano, 1993

Other writings: the novel Diletant (1926), short stories, and grotesques.

Further Reading

Avramov, Dimitur, "Podraniliat modernist" and "Buntât na ekspresionizma," in his Dialog mezhdu dve izkustva, Sofia: Bulgarski Pisatel, 1993

This page intentionally left blank.

N

Nashe, Thomas

English, 1567–1601

There is general consent about the qualities of Nashe's prose: one of the most original Elizabethan writers, he is a master of satire and polemic, capable of immense energy, invention, and reckless subversion. As an essayist he has perhaps been overshadowed by Francis Bacon and assigned the generically vague title of "pamphleteer." However, Nashe is an essayist in the etymological sense of the word: he attempts an argument or persuasive encounter with his readers. Above all his contribution to the essay is coextensive with his humanistic commitment to rhetoric as performance. The meaning of his work is to be found not in sober epigrams or sententiae but in the movement and vitality of the prose, in the display of his compositional skill.

Like his fellow University Wits Nashe generally wrote for a commercial market, demonstrating an unerring ability to combine a talent to entertain with an eye for fashion. In doing this his tone varies from scatological wit to moral censure. From his earliest work he betrays a debt to the complaint tradition of William Langland and John Skelton, but differs from contemporary moralists such as Philip Stubbes and Stephen Gosson by embracing the excesses of linguistic and literary invention. Robert Greene bestowed him with the title "young Juvenal" and Nashe himself declared that "of all the stiles I most affect and strive to imitate Aretines," a reference to the scandalous satire of Aretino, whose work was translated in the 1580s.

In The Anatomy of Absurdity (1589), he adopts a euphuistic style, but in later work he establishes a more distinctive literary texture. The turning point came when he was commissioned to provide a counterblast to the popular but subversive Marprelate pamphlets. In An Almond for a Parrot (1590) he found his métier, the controversial essay-pamphlet in which he could range freely and scurrilously through numerous topics, deploying his exuberant invention to the fullest. From this point onward his literary career was dominated by verbal skirmishing. Nashe appropriated Marprelate's "extemporall vein," his tactics of savage invective, direct address to the reader, the juxtaposition of serious arguments with anecdote, swift colloquial banter, moral fable, and gross hyperbole; he personalized this with learned allusions, a knowledge of popular ballads and prophecies as well as journalistic curiosity.

The great flyting with Gabriel Harvey, an argument inherited from Greene, allowed Nashe to deflate a living version of one of the types he wrote against elsewhere. Harvey, who practiced a well-known and hyperbolically overbearing conceit, was also an advocate of Ramist logic and occultism. Nashe attacked each of these positions in Strange News (1592) and Have with You to Saffron-Walden (1596). While Harvey wrote with a florid academicism espousing elegance and decorum, Nashe was forever his guttersnipe rival, adopting a low style replete with comic neologisms to counter Harvey's intellectual "inkhorn terms." Confident in his skills, Nashe uses the essay form as an arena for the settling of scores, transporting his readers through diversions of literary allusion, direct insult, and amplifications of gratuitous vulgarity. These are evident in his mock biography of Harvey and his warning that if he "take[s] truth's part...I will prove truth to be no truth, marching out of thy dung-voiding mouth." When Harvey complains that Nashe insulted his father's occupation of rope maker, Nashe replies that if he were so attacked he would "have proved it by syllogistry to be one of the seven liberal sciences." As ever, Nashe's concern is rhetorical power and the plenitude of wit.

In Pierce Penilless (1592), an improvisatory and comical complaint to the Devil, Nashe considers the vices of his time, mixing an admonitory vision of the seven deadly sins with a defense of the theater and satires on foreigners and the fashions of Londoners. The text is composed of an agitated profusion of images which relentlessly generate effects of movement and are never allowed to settle into tonal rigidity. There is little time for the establishment of a consistent viewpoint; for example, although the description of Dame Niggardize begins in the manner of a homiletic admonition, this is soon lost in a welter of specific detail, making it impossible to define the figure so simply.

Such rhetorical indulgence is exemplified in his masterpiece, Lenten Stufte (1599), an extended tour de force which takes the form of a rhapsodic mock encomium celebrating the town of Yarmouth and its staple product, the red herring or kipper. Commencing with a history of Yarmouth, blending contemporary observation with antiquarian detail, he moves on to a celebration of this humble fish, wresting it to the center of almost every conceivable enterprise. Extemporizing a series of anecdotes, including a comic rendition of Hero and Leander, Nashe elevates the kipper to heroic heights; demonstrating how it miraculously sustains the thriving population of Yarmouth in the midst of a barren environment, he presents it as a source of wealth, beauty, and adventure exceeding that of Helen since it "draweth more barques to Yarmouth Bay than her beauty did to Troy." The ostensible theme of this comic masterpiece, the red herring, is what it figuratively suggests: a false trail. Insofar as it has a motivation, Lenten Stufte affirms the power of invention to elicit vitality and profusion from a world of scarcity and poverty.

In other works Nashe reveals darker compulsions. His discourse on apparitions, The Terrors of the Night (1594), commences with rationalistic refutations of occultist views: "... there are no true apparitions," he argues. However, it soon lapses into fragmentary and doom-laden meditations on dreams and spirits. Nashe is also drawn to the corruptions of Elizabethan London in Christ's Tears over Jerusalem (1593) where he "disinherites" his wit and presents a morbid and obsessive meditation on apocalypse, fixated on the question, "What has immortalitie to do with this muck?" This catalogue of almost pathological descriptions of monstrous births, tortured criminals, plagues, and famines lacks Nashe's characteristic exuberance, but what remains is a compositional method based on analogy, since the images of the agonized body form a correlative to spiritual deformity. Although Nashe shortly returned to his verbal brawl with Harvey, this sense of decay and corruption is never entirely absent from his writing.

Nashe's scatological moralism and rhetorical prowess are clearly at odds with the Baconian plain style and the conception of the essay that were to dominate the 17th century. In his capacity to wander constructively and entertainingly Nashe suggests Montaigne's description of the essay as a "bundling up of so many different things." Although original and powerful, Nashe's influence on the essay is difficult to assess. Changes in taste combined with the ban imposed on printed satire in 1599 (following official disquiet over Nashe and Harvey's quarrel) meant that the qualities of Nashe's writing could not easily be reproduced. The virtues of his prose were inherited instead by the dramatists. The energy and invention of many theatrical characters, including Shakespeare's saturnalian Falstaff, bear more than a passing resemblance to the spirit of Tom Nashe.

DARRELL HINCHLIFFE

Biography

Born in 1567 in Lowestoft, Suffolk. Moved to Harling, Norfolk, 1573. Studied at St. John's College, Cambridge, 1582–88, B.A., 1586. Arrived in London, 1588, and became involved with a group of writers known as the University Wits, including Thomas Lodge, John Lyly, Thomas Watson, George Peele, Matthew Roydon, and Robert Greene; Greene appointed Nashe to write the preface for his Menaphon, 1589. Employed, along with other writers, by Archbishop Whitgift as a paid government propagandist to write retorts to the subversive but popular Puritan satirical Martin Marprelate tracts, 1589. Engaged in a continuing dispute with Richard and Gabriel Harvey, 1590s: suppressed by Archbishop Whitgift as part of his blanket ban on satire, 1599. Used a succession of patrons, including Lord Strange, Archbishop Whitgift, Robert Cotton, and Sir George Carey. Lived on the Isle of Wight to escape counter-attacks on his satirical writing, 1592/93–94; forced to flee London because of the satire The Isle of Dogs, written with Ben Jonson, 1597; returned to London by early 1599. Died in 1601.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

(Many anti-Marprelate writings were once attributed to Nashe, but authorship no longer certain)

Preface to Menaphon by Robert Greene, 1589

The Anatomy of Absurdity, 1589

An Almond for a Parrot, 1590; edited by J.Petheram, 1846 "Somewhat to Reade from Them That List," Preface to Astrophel and Stella by Sir Philip Sidney, 1591

Strange News, 1592.; facsimile reprint, 1969

Pierce Penilesse, His Supplication to the Devil, 1592.; facsimile reprint, 1969; edited by J.Payne Collier, 1842, reprinted 1966, and G.B.Harrison, 1966

Christ's Tears over Jerusalem, 1593; facsimile reprint, 1970

The Terrors of the Night; or, A Discourse of Apparitions, 1594

Have with You to Saffron-Walden, 1596; facsimile reprint, 1971; edited by J.P.Collier, 1870

Lenten Stuffe, 1599; facsimile reprint, 1971

Selected Writings, edited by Stanley Wells, 1964

The Unfortunate Traveller and Other Works, edited by J.B.Steane, 1972

Other writings: the fiction work The Unfortunate Traveller (1594), the poem "A Choice of Valentines," and the plays Summer's Last Will and Testament (1592), Dido, Queene of Carthage, with Christopher Marlowe (1594), and The Isle of Dogs, with Ben Jonson (1597).

Collected works edition: Works, edited by Ronald B.McKerrow, 5 vols., 1904–10, revised edition, edited by F.P.Wilson, 5 vols., 1958.

Bibliographies

Johnson, R.C., "Thomas Nashe 1941–1965," in Elizabethan Bibliographies Supplements 5, edited by Charles A.Pennel, London: Nether Press, 1968

Tannenbaum, Samuel A., Thomas Nashe: A Concise Bibliography, New York: Scholars' Facsimiles and Reprints, 1941

Further Reading

Anselmet, Raymond A., "Betwixt Jest and Earnest": Marprelate, Marvell, Swift and the Decorum of Religious Ridicule, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1979

Barber, C.L., "The May-Games of Martin Marprelate," in his Shakespeare's Festive Comedy, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1972 (original edition, 1959)

Crewe, Jonathan, Unredeemed Rhetoric: Thomas Nashe and the Scandal of Authorship, Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1982

Hibbard, G.R., Thomas Nashe: A Critical Introduction, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, and London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1962

Hutson, Linda, Thomas Nashe in Context, Oxford: Clarendon Press, and New York: Oxford University Press, 1989

Lewis, C.S., English Literature in the Sixteenth Century, Excluding Drama, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1973:410–16 (original edition, 1954)

McGinn, Donald J., "Nashe's Share in the Marprelate Controversy," PMLA 59 (1944): 952–84

McGinn, Donald J., "The Allegory of the 'Beare' and the 'Foxe' in Nashe's Pierce Pennilesse," PMLA 61 (1946): 431–53

McGinn, Donald J., "A Quip from Thomas Nashe," in Studies in the English Renaissance Drama, edited by Josephine Bennet, Oscar Cargill, and Vernon Hall, London: Peter Owen and Vision Press, and New York: New York University Press, 1959:172–88

Mackerness, E.D., "Christ's Teares and the Literature of Warning," English Studies 33 (1952): 251–54

McPherson, David C., "Aretino and the Harvey-Nashe Quarrel," PMLA 84 (1969): 1551–58

Nicholl, Charles, A Cup of News: The Life of Thomas Nashe, London and Boston:

Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1984

Perkins, David, "Issues and Motivations in the Harvey-Nashe Quarrel," Philological Quarterly 39 (1960): 224–30

Rhodes, Neil, Elizabethan Grotesque, London and Boston: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1980

Salyer, Sandford M., "Hall's Satires and the Harvey-Nashe Controversy," Studies in Philology 25 (1928): 149–70

Schafer, Jurgen, Documentation in the O.E.D.: Shakespeare and Nashe as Test Cases, Oxford: Clarendon Press, and New York: Oxford University Press, 1980

Steane, J.B., Introduction to The Unfortunate Traveller and Other Works by Nashe, edited by Steane, Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1972

Summersgill, Travis L., "The Influence of the Marprelate Controversy upon the Style of Thomas Nashe," Studies in Philology 48 (1951): 145–60

Thomas, Sidney, "New Light on the Nashe-Harvey Quarrel," Modern Language Notes 68 (1948): 481–83

Nature Essay

The nature essay is a heterogeneous form that draws on travel narrative, philosophy, landscape description, environmental reporting, outdoor and recreational writing, natural and local history, autobiography and diary, prose fiction, and other genres. Strict boundaries cannot be drawn around the nature essay, which undergoes constant metamorphosis as it migrates through various historical and cultural contexts. The form's aesthetic and literary dimensions are as variable as the rhetorical and political ends it can serve. Just as the word "nature" ranges in meaning to encompass many different ways of viewing and living in the world, the nature essay is not a monolithic tradition but a body of writings linked by a loose family resemblance.

Its history in English can be traced back at least as far as the 17th century to, for example, Sir William Temple's genteel reflections upon gardens, country life, and Epicurean philosophy in "Upon the Gardens of Epicurus" (1690). Temple connected classical philosophy to the pleasures of a specifically English rusticity, returning home, "after so much ramble into ancient times and remote places," to contemplate the excellence of English apples, peaches, and grapes.

Neither Gilbert White's The Natural History and Antiquities of Selborne (1788) nor The Grasmere Journals (wr. 1800–03) of Dorothy Wordsworth are, strictly speaking, books of essays: White made use of an epistolary structure, addressing his careful observations of the world around him to two other English naturalists, while Dorothy Wordsworth recorded notebook entries on the places and people of Grasmere valley. Both, however, provided models for later writers who sought to combine precise description of a specific locale with a carefully wrought, but seemingly spontaneous, prose style.

Most nature writing since the 19th century has explored, either directly or indirectly, the supposed rift between nature and culture. The assumptions that underlie this persistent dualism are often subverted, or at least subjected to fresh examination. Some critics see the nature essay as basically oppositional, a reaction to the rise of modern industrial society and mechanistic science. Many nature writers, however, take positions in harmony with modern scientific perspectives. Key concepts derived from science that have influenced nature writing include Ökologie (ecology), introduced by the German biologist Ernst Heinrich Hæckel in 1866, and “ecosystem” (an interdependent system of living organisms) coined by the British ecologist A.G.Tansley in 1935. The influence of Darwinian evolutionary biology has been enormous, and a complex intertextual relation exists between Darwin’s writings and those of W.H.Hudson, John Burroughs, and many others.

Although 19th and early 20th-century nature essayists often rejected scientific taxonomies and laboratory methods, the rise of a new natural history had an impact on thinking about nature. Canadian nature writing found an important early exponent in Catharine Parr Traill, whose botanical observations appeared in Studies of Plant Life in Canada; or, Gleanings from Forest, Lake and Plain (1885). Like other writers of the period, Traill filtered scientific writing through a late Romantic literary sensibility (plant ecology first emerged as a discipline at around this time). Closer to our own time, Aldo Leopold’s essayistic A Sand County Almanac (1949) advanced the idea of a “land ethic,” to promote the “integrity, beauty, and stability of the biotic community,” along with a conservation aesthetic, intended to heighten awareness “of the natural processes by which the land and the living things upon it have achieved their characteristic forms (evolution) and by which they maintain their existence (ecology).” Writers such as Leopold and Rachel Carson deploy (and, in some ways, revise) the authority of scientific discourses to support a position sometimes called “ecocentrism.”

The nature essay is often viewed as an essentially American genre, a tradition inspired by the 19th-century writers Henry David Thoreau, John Burroughs, and John Muir, as well as by the enormous diversity and beauty of the American landscape itself. Although it is occasionally stigmatized as “subliterary” or as a minor genre, a substantial body of criticism and analysis has nevertheless sprung up around the nature essay. It is of central importance for understanding the relation of the self to the land, and the particular spatial configurations that shape American experience. In general American nature writing tends to combine description of particular localities with personal narratives and passages of philosophical reflection. The problem of representing the self in relation to a nonhuman natural world has occupied many nature essayists. Questions of identity, solitude, and human subjectivity repeatedly surface in American writers from Mary Austin to Gretel Ehrlich.

The American nature essay rose to new prominence during the 19th century. Thoreau’s identification of nature with “absolute freedom and wildness, as contrasted with a freedom and culture merely civil” (“Walking,” 1862) set the tone for a good deal of later writing. His sense of the “wild” as a space located outside civilization, where civilization can nevertheless discover and somehow preserve itself resonates throughout American culture for the next 100 years and more. John Burroughs, who was famous in his own lifetime and the author of many books of nature essays, played a key role in bringing the Thoreauvian tradition into the 20th century. He embraced a poetics of nature writing that valued careful observation and the power of language to defamiliarize ordinary experience: "The writer's style, the quality of mind he brings," he wrote, "is the vase in which his commonplace impressions and incidents are made to appear so beautiful and significant" ("A Sharp Lookout," 1886). Through both his writings and his work as an activist, John Muir had a direct impact on the political climate of his day, becoming an important voice in the conservation movement. All three of these writers, it should be noted, were energetic walkers and hikers (one of Muir's books is titled A Thousand-Mile Walk to the Gulf, 1916), and their work has affinities with the literary excursion or "ramble."

Interest in the form has revived since the 1970s, and some observers claim that the nature essay, particularly in the United States, has entered a new golden age, linked to the growth of ecology movements and green politics. A very selective list of contemporary American nature essayists would include Annie Dillard, Barry Lopez, John McPhee, Peter Matthiessen, Wallace Stegner, David Quammen, Terry Tempest Williams, and Ann Zwinger.

ALVIN SNIDER

Anthologies

- American Nature Writing* series, edited by John A. Murray, San Francisco: Sierra Club Books, 3 vols., 1994–96 (and ongoing)
- Another Wilderness: New Outdoor Writing by Women* edited by Susan Fox Rogers, Seattle: Seal Press, 1994
- Great American Nature Writing*, edited by Joseph Wood Krutch, New York: William Sloane Associates, 1950
- The Norton Book of Nature Writing*, edited by Robert Finch and John Elder, New York: Norton, 1990
- A Republic of Rivers: Three Centuries of Nature Writing from Alaska and the Yukon*, edited by John A. Murray, New York: Oxford University Press, 1990
- This Incomperable Land: A Book of American Nature Writing*, edited by Thomas J. Lyon, Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1989
- Three Centuries of Nature Writing from Africa*, edited by John A. Murray, New York: Oxford University Press, 1993

Further Reading

- Bryant, Paul, "Nature Writing and the American Frontier," in The Frontier Experience and American Literature, edited by David Mogen, Mark Busby, and Bryant, College Station: Texas A & M University Press, 1989
- Buell, Lawrence, The Environmental Imagination: Thoreau, Nature Writing, and the Formation of American Culture, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1995
- Cason, Jacqueline Johnson, "Nature Writer as Storyteller: The Nature Essay as a Literary Genre," CEA Critic 54, no. 1 (1991): 12–18
- Farr, Moira, "The Death of Nature Writing," Brick 47 (1993): 16–27
- Fritzell, Peter A., Nature Writing and America: Essays upon a Cultural Type, Ames:

Iowa State University Press, 1990

Keith, W.J., The Rural Tradition: A Study of the Non-Fiction Prose Writers of the English Countryside, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1974; as The Rural Tradition: William Cobbett, Gilbert White and Other Non-Fiction Prose Writers of the English Countryside, Hassocks, Sussex: Harvester Press, 1975

Lyon, Thomas J., "The Nature Essay in the West" and "The Western Nature Essay Since 1970," both in A Literary History of the American West, edited by Max Westbrook and James H. Maguire, Fort Worth: Texas Christian University Press, 1987

Lyon, Thomas J., "Nature Writing as a Subversive Activity," North Dakota Quarterly 59, no. 2 (1991): 6–16

MacLulich, T.D., "Reading the Land: The Wilderness Tradition in Canadian Letters," Journal of Canadian Studies 20 (1985): 29–44

Manning, Peter J., "Reading and Writing Nature," Review 15 (1993): 175–96

Murray, John, and others, "The Rise of Nature Writing: America's Next Great Genre?" Manoa 4, no. 2 (1992): 73–96

Raglon, Rebecca, American Nature Writing in the Age of Ecology: Changing Perceptions, Changing Forms (dissertation), Kingston, Ontario: Queen's University, 1989

Raglon, Rebecca, "Voicing the World: Nature Writing as a Critique of the Scientific Method," Canadian Review of American Studies 22, no. 1 (1991): 23–32

Slovic, Scott, Seeking Awareness in American Nature Writing: Henry Thoreau, Annie Dillard, Edward Abbey, Wendell Berry, Barry Lopez, Salt Lake City: University of Utah Press, 1992

Die neue Rundschau

German periodical, 1890–1945, 1950–

The monthly literary journal Die neue Rundschau (The new review) has a remarkable place in German literary and cultural history, particularly during the period between 1933 and 1945. The Berlin journal was first published by Samuel Fischer in 1890 and thereafter by Fischer and his son-in-law, Gottfried Bermann Fischer, until 1936 when Bermann Fischer, who was Jewish, was forced into exile by the National Socialists; Peter Suhrkamp became responsible for the general operation of the NR and the Fischer publishing company at this time. Although Bermann Fischer established another publishing company in exile, Suhrkamp kept the Fischer name for the publishing company and the NR until the National Socialists forced him in 1942. to replace Fischer's name with his own.

The legacy of the NR was left to Suhrkamp, who had been made Editor-in-Chief in 1933 by Samuel Fischer. Suhrkamp remained remarkably true to the initial format of its founders, directing the NR to the same readership of intellectuals and artists with a similar mix of literature and criticism. Essays and critical commentary were crucial to the NR, and many issues included journal entries, letters, travelogues, and memoirs in addition to essays on politics and culture. In the earliest years of Fischer's journal, the Neue deutsche Rundschau, as the periodical was then called, was associated with naturalism and with the establishment of the Freie Bühne, analogous to the Theatre Libre in France. Fischer's journal included works by Richard Dehmel, Hermann Hesse, Hugo von Hofmannsthal, Thomas Mann, and Jakob Wassermann, as well as foreign writers such as Yeats and Hemingway. Suhrkamp continued to feature many of these writers even as the National Socialists blacklisted them and, in 1944, imprisoned Suhrkamp on charges of high treason. During the period of National Socialist control Suhrkamp published works by 122, blacklisted authors, a number that exceeded all other publishers in Germany from 1933 to 1945 (Dietrich Strothmann, 1960). The NR also published other "unerwünschte" (unwanted) writers, in National Socialist terminology, such as Alfred Döblin, Alfred Kerr, Harry Graf Kessler, Annette Kolb, and Siegfried Kracauer.

The NR provided one of the few forums (albeit limited) for Modernist literature in Nazi Germany. The NR was also one of only a few journals which dared comment critically upon the social and political conditions of the period. The journal featured discussions ranging from considerations of film and literary genres to Suhrkamp's musings on social conditions under the National Socialists. Thomas Mann's seminal essay on Richard Wagner and the implications of the composer's music for modern art appeared in the NR in 1933.

Although Suhrkamp continued to contribute works to the NR and to exert control over its operations through 1944, he was editor of the journal only until 1937. Subsequent editors included Wolfgang von Einsiedel, Karl Korn, Hans Paeschke, and Gerhard Aichinger. Suhrkamp's own contributions to the NR were among the most critical of life in Germany under the National Socialists. In 1942–43 his episodic works "Der Zuschauer" (The spectator) and "Tagebuch eines Zuschauers" (Journal of a spectator) detailed the dissolution of Germany. There were no editorials per se in the NR, though a section entitled "Anmerkungen" (Notes) at the end of the journal did sometimes include discussion of political conditions, in addition to remarks concerning new books and up-and-coming authors. Suhrkamp's and his editors' stance toward fascism, however, is best seen in works such as "Der Zuschauer," and the resolve to publish essays and works of fiction by "unacceptable" writers despite boycotts, censorship, and increasing surveillance by the authorities. Suhrkamp's clear-sighted assessment of conditions as well as his publication of Jewish writers under assumed names ultimately led to trumped-up charges of high treason. He was arrested in 1944 and imprisoned in the Sachsenhausen concentration camp. He was released by the authorities in 1945 but health problems contracted during his imprisonment, including a lung infection and a spinal injury, led to his death in 1959.

The high quality of the NR was also a result of efforts by Oskar Loerke and Hermann Kasack. Loerke had been a reader for Samuel Fischer since 1917; when Loerke died in 1941, Kasack became chief reader of the NR. Both men contributed essays and fiction to the journal and many of their works have figured greatly in the reestablishment of German literary studies after the war. After Suhrkamp's imprisonment, Kasack was placed in charge of the NR. Despite Suhrkamp's attempts to maintain the standards of the journal, and the expertise of his editorial staff, the economic situation and the National Socialists' programmatic policies of censorship and intimidation constrained the NR. The cost of paper led in 1939 to a reduced typeface, and by 1944 the periodical was forced to appear in quarterly rather than monthly issues. By 1940 issues of the NR contained works almost solely by German authors. There was also a dramatic change in the kind of material printed. Instead of works by Mann and Hesse, essays on Caesar, German military history, and the barbarism of the British became common. At this time, too, jingoistic advertisements, and even quotations from Hitler, appeared regularly in the journal. In an attempt to erase all signs of Jewish culture, National Socialist authorities demanded in 1942 that Fischer's name be removed as publisher.

By the end of the war the NR had been discontinued. Five years later, Bermann Fischer, who had returned to Germany, regained ownership of the NR and began publishing the journal in monthly issues. The journal continues to be published today, providing influential literary and cultural commentary. Although Suhrkamp was not associated with the NR after the war, he was the first to receive a license to publish in the British sector of Berlin under the Allies' elaborate licensing procedure, and his publishing house has become one of the most successful in the postwar period, even after his death.

CHRISTOPHER P. MCCLINTICK

Anthology

Der goldene Schnitt: Grosse Essayisten der Neuen Rundschau, 1890–1960, edited by Christoph Schwerin, Frankfurt: Fischer, 1960

Further Reading

- Kasack, Hermann, "Bild eines Verlegers," in his Mosaiksteine: Beiträge zu Literatur und Kunst, Frankfurt: Suhrkamp, 1956: 309–16
- Schwarz, Falk, "Literarisches Zeitgespräch im Dritten Reich: Dargestellt an der Zeitschrift Neue Rundschau" Borsenblatt für den Deutschen Buchhandel 51 (1971): 1409–1508
- Strothmann, Dietrich, Nationalsozialistische Literaturpolitik: Ein Beitrag zur Publizistik im Dritten Reich, Bonn: Bouvier, 1960
- Voit, Friedrich, Der Verleger Peter Suhrkamp und seine Autoren, Kronberg/Ts.: Scriptor, 1975

New Journalism

The term "New Journalism" is most often associated with the work of certain American literary journalists who came to prominence in the 1960s. The phrase, however, also recalls a style of 1960s cultural politics which challenged not merely traditional journalism, but also fiction and the essay genre.

Tom Wolfe, the most outspoken advocate of the form, credits New York writer Pete

Hamil with the first use of the term. In 1965, Hamil approached a New York editor with the idea of doing an article called “The New Journalism” about writers such as Gay Talese, who was writing exquisitely crafted feature articles for the New York Times and Esquire, and Jimmy Breslin, a colorful feature writer/columnist for the dying New York Herald Tribune. These writers were employing many devices of literature (scenes, dialogue, interior monologue, symbolic detail) in the service of nonfictional subjects. By the end of the decade a throng of both new and established writers had published popularly and critically acclaimed volumes in this form, including Wolfe (The Kandy-Kolored Tangerine-Flake Streamline Baby, 1965; The Electric Kool-Aid Acid Test, 1968; The Pump House Gang, 1968); Truman Capote (In Cold Blood, 1965); Hunter S. Thompson (The Hell’s Angels, 1966); George Plimpton (Paper Lion, 1966); Joan Didion (Slouching Towards Bethlehem, 1968); Norman Mailer (the Pulitzer Prize-winning The Armies of the Night: History as a Novel, the Novel as History, 1968; Miami and the Siege of Chicago, 1968); Talese (New York—A Serendipiter’s Journey, 1961; The Overreachers, 1963; The Bridge, 1965; The Kingdom and the Power, 1969); and Breslin (Can’t Anybody Here Play This Game?, 1963).

In his 1973 manifesto and anthology The New Journalism, Wolfe described the literary hierarchy in the 1960s. The lowest rungs, he claimed, were the domain of the “lumpenprole” journalists. Essayists or “men-of-letters” held middle status, and the novelist reigned as the most esteemed of all writers. The New Journalism challenged this hierarchy by collapsing it, by, in effect, bringing the techniques of all three forms together into one ambitious hybrid genre. “What interested me was not simply the discovery that it was possible to write accurate nonfiction with techniques usually associated with novels and short stories,” stated Wolfe. “It was the discovery that it was possible in non-fiction, in journalism, to use any literary device, from the traditional dialogisms of the essay to stream-of-consciousness, and to use many different kinds simultaneously, or within a relatively short space...to excite the reader both intellectually and emotionally.”

The New Journalism challenged the image of the essayist as “a literary gentleman with a seat in the grandstand” (Wolfe, 1973). Wolfe believed most nonfiction writers adopted this “century-old British” mindset without even recognizing it. New journalists dared essayists to come down from the grandstand and mingle with their subjects. They also called for more than “vivid description plus sentiment,” the forte of the familiar essayist. Instead they favored the kind of thorough reporting that made possible the re-creation of “scenes.” Implicit, too, was a call for expansion of the subject matter deemed worthy of the essayist’s attention. The unnoticed and ignored gained the spotlight along with the celebrated, as did a range of emerging cultural lifestyles—including the drug and rock-and-roll cultures.

Most stultifying of all to Wolfe and his colleagues, however, was the genteel voice of the polite essayist—a hushed voice “like a radio announcer at a tennis match.” The essay had room, they insisted, for the “hectoring narrator,” the narrator speaking in the voice and accents of his subjects, the narrator inhabiting many points of view—narrators, in short, engaged in “apostrophes, epithets, moans, cackles, anything” (Wolfe, 1973). Such stress on technical virtuosity represented a shift in emphasis from the traditional essay which often featured a didactic tone. “One of the greatest changes,” Wolfe noted, “has been a reversal of this attitude—so that the proof of one’s technical mastery as writer becomes paramount and the demonstration of moral points becomes secondary.”

The legacy of the New Journalism, therefore, is not insubstantial. The major New Journalists of the 1960s have continued publishing in the genre, making what began as a youth movement now the domain of venerated literary lions. David Eason (1990) has offered a helpful distinction between “realist” New Journalists such as Talese, Wolfe, and Capote, who believe “reality” can be discovered and revealed, and “Modernist” New Journalists like Mailer, Didion, and Thompson, who describe “what it feels like to live in a world where there is no consensus about a frame of reference to explain ‘what it all means’.” A second generation of such writers is also established, headed by “Modernists” Annie Dillard (Holy the Firm, 1977; Teaching a Stone to Talk, 1982.) and William Least Heat-Moon (The Blue Highways, 1982.; PrairieErth, 1991), and “realists” Tracy Kidder (The Soul of a New Machine, 1981; House, 1985; Among School Children, 1989; Old Friends, 1993) and Melissa Fay Greene (Praying for Sheetrock, 1991; The Temple Bombing, 1996). Their works today, however, are more likely to be categorized as literary or artful nonfiction than as New Journalism.

Wolfe’s efforts to define an identifiable school of writing have only partially succeeded. He has acknowledged that few of the writers he lauded in his manifesto wanted to be part of his “raggedy band”: Hunter Thompson insisted he was not a New Journalist but a “gonzo journalist,” a tongue-in-cheek term for his own patented mix of paranoia, black humor, and hyperbole; Talese said he was simply writing “stories with real names”; Capote called his In Cold Blood a “nonfiction novel”; and Mailer used the term “true life novel” for his 1979 Pulitzer Prize-winning The Executioner’s Song. By calling his hybrid form “New,” however, Wolfe spurred scholars to document what is now seen as a long tradition of literary journalism extending from Defoe through to the present.

This research now locates the New Journalism of the 1960s as one of the peaks of this long tradition. As a style of 1960s cultural politics, it forced journalists, essayists, and fiction writers to reexamine established views of subject matter, form, and authorial role. In collapsing the boundaries between journalism, fiction, and the essay it enlarged each of these forms and raised important questions regarding the ways in which experience is organized and recorded.

BARBARA LOUNSBERRY

Anthologies

The New Journalism, edited by Tom Wolfe and E.W. Johnson, New York: Harper and Row, 1973

New Journalism, edited by Marshall Fishwick, Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green University Popular Press, 1975

The New Journalism: A Historical Anthology, edited by Nicolaus Mills, New York: McGraw Hill, 1974

Further Reading

- Anderson, Chris, Style as Argument: Contemporary American Nonfiction, Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1987
- Connery, Thomas B., "Discovering a Literary Form," in A Sourcebook of American Literary Journalism: Representative Writers in an Emerging Genre, edited by Connery, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1992,
- Eason, David, "The New Journalism and the Image-World," in Literary Journalism in the Twentieth Century, edited by Norman Sims, New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1990
- Hellmann, John, Fables of Fact: The New Journalism as New Fiction, Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1981
- Hersey, John, "The Legend on the License," Yale Review 70 (Fall 1980): 1–15
- Hollowell, John, Fact & Fiction: The New Journalism and the Nonfiction Novel, Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1977
- Johnson, Michael L., The New Journalism: The Underground Press, the Artists of Nonfiction, and Changes in the Established Mode, Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1971
- Lounsbury, Barbara, The Art of Fact: Contemporary Artists of Nonfiction, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1990
- Macdonald, Dwight, "Parajournalism, or Tom Wolfe and His Magic Writing Machine," New York Review of Books, 26 August 1965: 3–5
- Murphy, James E., The New Journalism: A Critical Perspective, Lexington, Kentucky: Association for Education in Journalism, 1974
- Pauly, John J., "The Politics of the New Journalism," in Literary Journalism in the Twentieth Century, edited by Norman Sims, New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1990
- Sims, Norman, editor, The Literary Journalists, New York: Ballantine, 1984
- Talese, Gay, "Origins of a Nonfiction Writer," in The Literature of Reality, edited by Talese and Barbara Lounsbury, New York: HarperCollins, 1996
- Weber, Ronald, The Reporter as Artist: A Look at the New Journalism Controversy, New York: Hastings House, 1974
- Weber, Ronald, The Literature of Fact: Literary Nonfiction in American Writing, Athens: Ohio University Press, 1980
- Wolfe, Tom, The New Journalism, New York: Harper and Row, 1973 (includes an anthology, edited by Wolfe and E.W. Johnson)
- Zavarzadeh, Mas'ud, The Mythopoeic Reality: The Postwar American Nonfiction Novel, Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1976

The New Yorker

American magazine, 1925–

The New Yorker is one of America's longest running and most successful journals. The publication began as a humor magazine, and many readers still find the cartoons its most distinctive feature. However, the New Yorker's success is based on more than its cartoons; its success is attributable to Harold Ross, the founding editor of what became America's wittiest and most sophisticated magazine. After only three changes in editor-in-chief in its history, it generally retains this reputation, much of which is derived from the journal's high-quality essays.

Only Ross, who claimed "I'll hire anybody" and who early on proved that statement, would have hired Ross. His connection with the Thanatopsis Literary and Inside Straight Club (Alexander Woollcott, Franklin P. Adams, George S. Kaufman, Robert Benchley, and Dorothy Parker) led to his founding of the magazine. Through this group Ross met Raoul Fleischmann, a millionaire baker, who agreed to provide $150,000 for Ross' proposed journal.

The early months were almost fatal for the New Yorker. Fifteen thousand copies of the 21 February 1925 inaugural issue were sold, but by late April circulation had dropped to 8000, and by August it had fallen to 2700. Ross and Fleischmann declared the magazine defunct, then changed their minds. The budget was cut, Fleischmann supplied more money, and 60,000 dollars was allocated for advertising. Finally, though, it was Ellin MacKay's essay "Why We Go to Cabarets, A Post-Debutante Explains" in the first year's Thanksgiving issue which saved the magazine. MacKay created a Park Avenue audience with her essay about why young women from New York's high society went to nightclubs rather than contend with stag lines at private parties.

With minor variations, the New Yorker's format has remained constant. The first textual material, "Of All Things," contained the magazine's prospectus, followed by the "Talk of the Town" section. Other departments in the beginning were "Profile," "The Story of Manhattan-Kind," and "Behind the News." Lois Long created the "Tables for Two" and "On and Off the Avenue" columns. The nightclub gossip of the former and the good taste of the latter, a buying guide, attracted readers and provided the journal with stability.

After the premiere issue, "The Talk of the Town" was the first editorial content until "Goings on About Town" was moved to the front in December 1925. Beginning with this issue, the names of "Advisory Editors" (Ralph Barton, Marc Connelly, Irving Kaufman, Alice Duer Miller, Parker, and Woollcott, who was replaced by Hugh Wiley) were printed above the "Talk of the Town" title. The role of Ross' managing editor was filled by many men labeled "Jesuses" and "Geniuses": Joseph M. March, M. B. Levick, Arthur Samuels, Bernard A. Bergman, Stanley Walker, Ik Shuman, Philip D. Hoyt, and St. Clair McKelway.

Until 1969, no masthead or table of contents was included in the magazine. There is still no identification of the editor-in-chief or of fiction, nonfiction, or art editors, and even after a table of contents was added, contributors' names were not listed for years. In fact, one of the attractions of the New Yorker was the guessing game prompted by the printing of authors' names at the conclusions of their contributions. Readers either turned to the end of a piece to see who wrote it or tried to determine authorship from the topic and style. The placing of the writer's name at the end remained in force until quite recently, even when the information was eventually placed in the table of contents; the names now appear at the beginning of the articles.

Items in the table of contents fall into four categories: regular departments and various kinds of reporting (on politics, or theater, dance, film, music, art, and book reviews); personal experiences and reflections; works of fiction; and poems. Except for advertising, the first content in today's New Yorker is "Comment," followed by "In the Mail," "Goings on About Town" (a listing of events in New York City), review sections, other departments on an irregular basis, poetry, and "casuals," as Ross called the periodical's prose pieces.

The New Yorker's format reflects its editorial philosophy. No blurbs appear on the cover to grab a reader's attention (although this policy may be in the process of changing, with blurbs printed on a half-cover wrap for issues sold at newsstands and abroad). Little color has been used in the magazine, though more and more is being featured, mostly in advertisements. The black and white pages are clean and quiet, as is the prose, and there are no subheads, an approach devised by make-up editor Carmine Peppe.

Ross never catered to an audience. He contended that he would not edit his journal "for the old lady in Dubuque" because "An editor prints only what pleases him—if enough people like what he likes, he is a success." In the New Yorker's prospectus he declared that the magazine would "be a reflection in word and picture of metropolitan life. It will be human. Its general tenor will be one of gaiety, wit, and satire, but it will be more than a jester. It will not be...radical or highbrow. It will be...sophisticated...It will hate bunk...Its integrity will be above suspicion." In the editorial statement in the premiere issue, Ross said that the New Yorker would have "a serious purpose but...not [be]...too serious in executing it. It hopes...to keep up with events of the day." The magazine would "publish facts that it will have to go behind the scenes to get, but it will not deal in scandal for the sake of scandal."

The chief element in the New Yorker's success was Ross' editing: "Use the rapier, not the bludgeon," he advised. To help his writers hone their prose, he edited it meticulously; manuscripts were returned with lists of numbered comments that sometimes were as long as the manuscripts. Ross also established a special department to check every fact. Four-letter obscenities and sexual connotation were barred.

Ross had misgivings about his management abilities. To overcome this he was willing to hire almost anybody. Employees were brought in high on the editorial ladder, regardless of their experience. Most worked down to a more suitable level or left the magazine, but for 26 years Ross attracted and fostered the most important American humorists, who knew or found out how to make the magazine a success. He not only allowed his talented staff to perform, he forced them to reach their potential.

William Shawn served as editor-in-chief for 30 years, having replaced Ross in January 1952. Born Chon (he changed the spelling so readers would not think that he was Chinese), he had minimal journalistic experience when he joined the magazine as Ross' hand-picked successor, and he perpetuated the characteristics established by his predecessor. Both men developed writers under their tutelage, albeit in different ways. Whereas Ross was a stickler for details, the intellectually inquisitive Shawn was concerned with whether an author said what he intended to say. Shawn was also more politically oriented than Ross—it was he who convinced Ross to devote an entire issue to John Hersey's 30,000-word "Hiroshima" (1946), and during Vietnam and Watergate the New Yorker, particularly in "Notes and Comments," spoke out against immorality.

Humor diminished under Shawn, though he may not have been at fault. In the mid-1940s, Ross bemoaned the dwindling of humor and the increasing “grim stuff.” Times, taste, and authors change, and the world of World War II and after was not amenable to the happy-go-lucky humor of the early New Yorker. There is still humor, but entire humorous essays are rare. Indeed, the magazine has become increasingly political, and increasingly liberal.

The major categories of essays for which the journal is noted are the profiles (biographical portraits), personal reminiscences, and reviews of the arts. New Yorker casuals are characterized by humane, cultivated, erudite, sensitive qualities. The style is lyrical softness. Authors assume an unhurried, gentle, relaxed, urbane prose. If they sometimes appear dilettantish, they are not foppish, silly, or stupid; quiet as opposed to ranting, they are amused, yet wistful; they are romantic; they are wise but at times innocently foolish. Many of America’s important writers have contributed to the journal. The list contains a Who’s Who of American humorists in the mid-20th century: Benchley, S.N.Behrman, Sally Benson, Clarence Day, Ralph Ingersoll, Nunnally Johnson, Kaufman, Ring Lardner, Long, H.L.Mencken, Parker, S.J.Perelman, Leonard Ross, Thorne Smith, Jean Stafford, Frank Sullivan, James Thurber, E.B. White, Woolcott. Among the most famous pieces were Day’s “Life with Father” (1935) and Ruth McKenney’s “My Sister Eileen” (1936) series.

Additionally, many other distinguished authors’ works have appeared in the New Yorker: Sherwood Anderson, James Baldwin, Rachel Carson (The Silent Spring), John Cheever, Robert M.Coates, Clifton Fadiman, F.Scott Fitzgerald, Ernest Hemingway, Shirley Jackson (“The Lottery” caused a major brouhaha in 1948), A.J.Liebling, Mary McCarthy, John McNulty, Lewis Mumford, Irwin Shaw, Rebecca West, Edmund Wilson. Samuel Beckett’s Catastrophe was published in the New Yorker, as have been over 100 pieces each by Truman Capote, John O’Hara, and J.D.Salinger. The high quality continues with works by Wright Morris, Alice Adams, and Calvin Trillin. Regular contributors have included Brendan Gill, Penelope Gilliatt, and John Lahr (on drama), Pauline Kael and Terrence Rafferty (on film), Molly PanterDownes (“Letter from London”), Edith Oliver, and George Steiner.

Of all of the writers who have contributed to the New Yorker, three have made the biggest imprint and are most representative of the journal’s tone: White, Thurber, and Perelman. White, who joined the staff in 1926, may have had the greatest influence. He was responsible for much of the editing and helped Ross establish the style that until lately characterized the prose. Famed for his essays and children’s novels, he is renowned as well for his revised edition of William Strunk, Jr.’s The Elements of Style (1959). Possibly more important than White’s editorial skills were his “Talk of the Town” contributions, particularly “Notes and Comments,” for this section set the tone for the New Yorker’s content and approach. White’s “Notes and Comments,” Thurber says in The Years with Ross (1959), “left its firm and graceful imprint on American letters and... exerted its influence upon local, or even wider, affairs.” The format and the success of the “Talk of the Town” demonstrate how well Ross chose those who shared his vision and were equipped to execute it. In the 1924 prospectus, he stated, “There will be a personal mention column—a jotting down in the small-town newspaper style of the comings, goings and doings in the village of New York. This will contain some josh and some news value.” During White’s 11 years as department head, he provided what Ross wanted. The Ross-White tradition continued when Russell Maloney took over the “Talk of the Town” editorship in 1935. David Kuhn is the current “Talk of the Town” editor, yet even today the department retains much of the flavor introduced by White, that of a small-town newspaper reporting on events in a folksy way, implying writer/reader familiarity and a sharing of beliefs. Unfortunately, the editorial “we,” which used to be used throughout, has been replaced by an ego-centered “I,” an indication of a new philosophical approach.

Thurber’s impact on the New Yorker was immeasurable. He, too, joined the magazine in its formative period, in 1927, and as an active, long-time editorial staffer, he was a primary factor in determining the journal’s style. Most important, however, were his model 364 casuals and 307 drawings. “The Secret Life of Walter Mitty” (1939), a classic fantasy, became the most famous piece of fiction ever published in the New Yorker.

Perelman’s relationship with the New Yorker was different from that of White and Thurber. His contribution came in the form of his casuals. Between 1930 and 1979, Perelman contributed 278 casuals, and his writing came to define New Yorker humor. His style, drawing on American frontier humor and Yiddish theater, combined careful structuring, “lapidary prose,” a massive vocabulary, refined exuberance, and a sense of literalism about clichés filtered through a sense of parody in pieces described by White as having “a lead sentence... that was as hair-raising as the first big dip on a roller coaster.” Among Perelman’s more popular essays were his “Cloudland Revisited” series of 22 reminiscences (1948–53) which began with “Into Your Tent I’ll Creep.”

Like its writers, the New Yorker audience is urbane, intelligent, cosmopolitan, and affluent. With the editorial appointment of the British, former Vanity Fair editor Tina Brown in October 1992, however, a transformation occurred. In Brown’s new incarnation, the magazine’s contents and tone have shifted, as has its audience. When the New Yorker was established, the editorial and advertising departments were assigned physically separate offices; Ross did not want the advertising department to have any opportunity to influence the editorial department. He was particular about what products could be advertised in his journal as well. James Playsted Wood (1971) noted the New Yorker restrictions on advertising: “no exaggeration, superlatives, or innuendoes. It eschews feminine hygiene, bad breath, body odors, and patent medicines. It will picture nothing which is worn beneath a woman’s slip.” Comparing this policy with Brown’s four-letterword-sprinkled essays and lingerie ads is instructive in light of the magazine’s recently diminished reputation. However, possibly because of the large amount of publicity generated specifically about Brown’s editorial decisions, the New Yorker’s circulation jumped from 628,104 in June 1991 to its present level of 833,672. This has not occurred without sacrificing much of the traditional style and character which distinguished the journal—evident in the placement of the authors’ names, added color, increased advertising, less humor, and the nature of the articles. In 1994–95, timely pieces on topics such as O.J.Simpson, a pro-Hillary Clinton puff, and an attack on Newt Gingrich are representative of the Brown approach.

If longevity, circulation, and advertising revenue were insufficient to demonstrate the success and importance of the New Yorker, the journal has received serious attention from major periodicals, and books and chapters in books have been written about the magazine that the Bombay Times calls part of American social history and the Spectator labels “an important part not only of American culture but of Western culture generally.” The Saturday Review attributed the New Yorker’s success to Ross’ sense of perfection, the “number and variety of items in each issue,” and the “complexity of action” behind the magazine’s weekly publication (an outgrowth of Ross’ traits combined with a wide audience and broadening of subject matter). Ross’ love for accuracy produced attention to detail not usually found elsewhere. This instilled a feeling of good workmanship complemented and emphasized by the editorial care given to the writing style. The result was that for the majority of the 20th century, the New Yorker was the primary force in redefining the essay in America.

STEVEN H.GALE

Further Reading

- Blow, Richard, and Ari Posner, “Are You Completely Bald? Adventures in Fact Checking,” New Republic, 26 September 1988:23
- Brilliant, Richard, Portraiture, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, and London: Reaktion, 1991
- Cullather, James L., “Has the Laughter Died? Musings on the New Yorker’s Business Ethics Cartoons,” Business Horizons 26 (March-April 1983): 30–33
- Cullather, James L., “Musings II: Revisiting the New Yorker’s Business Ethics Cartoons,” Business Horizons 29 (May–June 1986): 23–17
- Gale, Steven H., “Thurber of The New Yorker,” Studies in American Humor issue on Thurber, 3, no. 1 (Spring 1984): 11–23
- Gale, Steven H., “The New Yorker,” in American Humor Magazines and Comic Periodicals, edited by David E.E.Sloane, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1987:179–91
- Gale, Steven H., “James Thurber,” in Popular World Fiction, 1900–Present, vol. 4, edited by Walton Beacham and Suzanne Niemeyer, Washington, D.C.: Beacham, 1987:1524–38
- Gale, Steven H., “James Thurber,” in American Short-Story Writers, 1910–1945, Second Series, edited by Bobby Ellen Kimbel, Dictionary of Literary Biography vol. 102, Detroit: Gale Research, 1991:319–34
- Gill, Brendan, Here at the New Yorker, New York: Random House, 1975
- Kramer, Dale, Ross and the New Yorker, Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1951
- McPhee, John, “The New Yorker Index 1992,” New Yorker, 22 February 1993:81–102
- Mott, Frank Luther, A History of American Magazines, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 5 vols., 1938–68
- The New Yorker Staff, “Remembering Mr. Shawn,” New Yorker, 28 December 1992/4 January 1993:134–45
- The New Yorker Twenty-Fifth Anniversary Album, 1925–1950*, New York: Harper and Row, 1951
- Peterson, Theodore, Magazines in the Twentieth Century, Urbana: University of Illinois Press, revised edition, 1964
- Thurber, James, The Years with Ross, Boston: Little Brown, 1959
- Wood, James Playsted, Magazines in the United States, New York: Ronald Press, 3rd edition, 1971

Newman, John Henry

British, 1801–1890

It is a curious paradox that, while John Henry Newman was essentially an “occasional” writer who wrote comparatively few books as such, nevertheless two of his most famous booklength works contain the word “essay” in their titles: An Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine (1845) and An Essay in Aid of a Grammar of Assent (1870). In fact, the Development of Christian Doctrine was never finished, so in that sense it remains an “essay” or attempt at a larger work; while the dry and abstract opening of the Grammar of Assent is so unlike Newman’s usual personal manner as to remind us that the intention to sit down to write a treatise was far from his normal method of proceeding. This can be seen by comparing it with his other chief philosophical work, the Oxford University Sermons (1843), where he adumbrates some of his most original ideas in the form of some brilliantly stimulating essays, albeit ostensibly sermons on Scripture texts. Indeed, the concluding sermon, “The Theory of Developments in Religious Doctrine,” which took an hour and a half to deliver, is based on simple and familiar words from the New Testament (“Mary kept all these things, and pondered them in her heart”), but is in fact a theological essay that is arguably a better and clearer exposition of his views than the full-length book which it anticipated.

It is hardly a cause for surprise that Newman never wrote, or even contemplated writing, a work of spirituality. Rather, it is to his sermons, preached for specific occasions and to specific congregations, that we must turn for the most concentrated expression of his thoughts on the spiritual life. As well as the more intellectual Oxford University Sermons, there were nine volumes of Anglican sermons published, as opposed to only two volumes for the Catholic period, when, except on more formal occasions, he preached extempore from notes rather than read from a prepared text as he had done as the Vicar of the University Church of St. Mary’s in Oxford. There, Sunday by Sunday, his eyes fixed on his manuscript, he had read out those expositions of the Scripture readings which made such a profound impression on those who heard him, although they were delivered without any attempt at oratorical effect: apart from the legendary low, musical voice and lengthy pregnant pauses, the effect came totally from the words. Again, the style was conversational rather than rhetorical as the preacher, on the one hand, drew out the thought of the Greek Fathers which had so influenced him but which sounded so unfamiliar a note in the context of Victorian Protestantism; and, on the other hand, seemed to look into the very souls of his hearers with his extraordinarily keen insight into the nature of fallen humanity.

The Oxford University Sermons remain Newman’s most seminal writings, where he not only sketched out some of his most important philosophical and theological ideas, but where he also, in the course of his explorations of the human mind, anticipated the essays and lectures that constitute The Idea of a University (1873), which is still the classic work on a liberal education, but which, far from being a systematic treatise, bears all the marks of its “occasional” genesis. The first part of the book consists of the Discourses on the Scope and Nature of University Education (1852), only half of which were actually delivered, that were commissioned by the church authorities to justify a Catholic university. The second part comprises the Lectures and Essays on University Subjects (1859), which Newman wrote in the course of establishing and presiding over the new Catholic University of Ireland. Nowhere better than in The Idea of a University do we see the force of Gerard Manley Hopkins’ comment that when Newman wrote, what he was essentially doing was to think aloud, so that his prose is really that of cultured conversation—and therefore, one might add, admirably fitted to the literary form of the essay.

Newman has been called the greatest controversialist in English literature—a point which relates not only to the “occasional” nature of so many of his writings but also to the fact that he is never more himself than when he is arguing and debating with real or imagined opponents. This enables him in his Lectures on Certain Difficulties Felt by Anglicans (1850) and even more in his Lectures on the Present Position of Catholics in England (1851) to display his considerable powers as a satirist, powers which had first flowered in print in the letters he had written as an Anglican to the Times on The Tamworth Reading Room (1841).

Again, when we look at his theological work, we can see why his brother Francis thought Newman could have been a formidable barrister, for in so many of his writings, which take the form of tracts, review articles, or lengthy letters intended for publication, he is either attacking or defending a thesis. Thus the three most important of his Catholic works are the article “On Consulting the Faithful in Matters of Doctrine” (1859), the Letter to the Rev. E.B.Pusey (1866) on Mariology, and the Letter to the Duke of Norfolk (1875) on papal infallibility. Similarly, in his Anglican period his two principal theological works were first delivered as Lectures on the Prophetical Office of the Church (1837) and as Lectures on Justification (1838) before they were published as books. His own contribution to the Oxford or Tractarian Movement had begun with some historical, polemical articles for the British Magazine on The Church of the Fathers (1840), which began appearing in October 1833, a month before the first of the Tracts for the Times, some of which Newman also wrote. His other more important Tractarian writings include: the essay “On the Introduction of Rationalistic Principles into Revealed Religion,” first published as Tract 73 (1835); “Holy Scripture in Its Relation to the Catholic Creed,” first given as lectures and then mostly published as Tract 85 (1838); and the article “Prospects of the Anglican Church,” originally “The State of Religious Parties” (1839).

Voluminous as Newman’s writings are, it is remarkable how few of the volumes were first written as full-length books. Instead, the vast majority consist of collections of articles, essays, lectures, letters, sermons, and tracts. It is indeed as though Newman required the stimulus of a particular occasion, a particular point of view to advocate or attack, or a particular opponent, before he could put pen to paper.

IAN KER

Biography

Born 21 February 1801 in London. Studied at Ealing School, London, 1808–16; Trinity College, Oxford, 1817–22, B.A., 1820. Fellow, Oriel College, Oxford, 1822–45. Ordained in the Anglican church, 1824; curate, St. Clement's, Oxford, 1824–26; vicar, St. Mary's, Oxford, 1828–43. Began the Oxford (Tractarian) Movement, with John Keble and E.B.Pusey, 1833; left it, 1842. Editor and contributor, Tracts for the Times, 1833–41; coeditor, A Library of the Fathers of the Holy Catholic Church series, from 1838. Joined the Roman Catholic Church, 1845; ordained priest, 1847. Established the Oratory of St. Philip Neri, Birmingham, 1848, and founded the attached boys' school. Rector, Catholic University of Ireland, Dublin, 1851–58. Editor, the Rambler Catholic journal, 1859. Made a Cardinal, 1879. Doctor of Divinity, Rome, 1850. Honorary Fellow, Trinity College, Oxford, 1878. Declared Venerable, 1991. Died in Birmingham, n August 1890.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Tracts for the Times, anonymously published by Newman and others, 1833–41

Parochial Sermons, 6 vols., 1834–42; edited by W.J.Copeland, 6 vols., 1868; vol. 2 as

Sermons for the Festivals, edited by Vernon Stanley, 1904

Lectures on the Prophetical Office of the Church, 1837

Lectures on Justification, 1838

The Church of the Fathers, 1840

The Tamworth Reading Room: Letters on an Address by Sir Robert Peel, 1841

Sermons, Bearing on Subjects of the Day, 1843; edited by W.J. Copeland, 1869

Sermons, Chiefly on the Theory of Religious Belief Preached Before the University of Oxford, 1843; enlarged edition, as Fifteen Sermons Preached Before the University of Oxford, Between A.D. 1826 and 1843, 1872

Plain Sermons by Contributors to Tracts for the Times, vol. 5, 1843; edited by W.J.Copeland, 2 vols., 1808

An Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine, 1845; edited by G.Wiegel, 1960

Discourses Addressed to Mixed Congregations, 1849

Lectures on Certain Difficulties Felt by Anglicans in Submitting to the Catholic Church, 1850; revised edition, 1857

Lectures on the Present Position of Catholics in England, 1851; edited by J.J.Daly, 1942

Discourses on the Scope and Nature of University Education, 1852; revised edition, 1859

The Office and Work of Universities, 1856; as University Sketches, edited by G.Sampson, 1902.; edited by Michael Tierney, 1964

Sermons Preached on Various Occasions, 1857

Lectures and Essays on University Subjects, 1859

Letter to the Rev. E.B.Pusey, D.D. on His Recent Eirenicon, 1866

An Essay in Aid of a Grammar of Assent, 1870; edited by Ian Ker, 1985

Miscellanies from the Oxford Sermons and Other Writings, 1870

Two Essays on Scripture Miracles and on Ecclesiastical, 1870

Essays Critical and Historical, 2 vols., 1872,

Historical Sketches, 3 vols., 1872–73

The Idea of a University (includes Discourses on the Scope and Nature of University Education and Lectures and Essays on University Subjects), 1873; edited by Ian Ker, 1976, and Frank M. Turner, 1996

Tracts Theological and Ecclesiastical, 1874

A Letter to the Duke of Norfolk on the Occasion of Mr. Gladstone's Recent Expostulations, 1875

Stray Essays and Controversial Points, 1890

Essays and Sketches, edited by C.F. Harrold, 1948

Sermons and Discourses, edited by C.F. Harrold, 2 vols., 1949

Faith and Prejudice and Other Unpublished Sermons, edited by C. S. Dessain, 1956; as Catholic Sermons, 1957

A Newman Companion to the Gospels: Sermons, edited by Armel J. Coupet, 1966

The Genius of John Henry Newman: Selections from His Writings, edited by Ian Ker, 1989

Sermons, 1824–1843, edited by Vincent Ferrer Blehl, 2 vols., 1991–93

Selected Sermons, edited by Ian Ker, 1994

Other writings: the autobiography Apologia Pro Vita Sua (1865), poetry, and over 30 volumes of correspondence.

Collected works edition: Works (Uniform Edition), 41 vols., 1908–18.

Bibliographies

Blehl, Vincent Ferrer, John Henry Newman: A Bibliographical Catalogue of His Writings, Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1978

Griffin, John R., John Henry Newman: A Bibliography of Secondary Sources, Front Royal, Virginia: Christendom Publications, 1980

Further Reading

Gilley, Sheridan, Newman and His Age, London: Darton Longman and Todd, 1990

Helmling, Steven, The Esoteric Comedies of Carlyle, Newman, and Yeats, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1988

Holloway, John, The Victorian Sage: Studies in Argument, London: Macmillan, 1953; New York: Norton, 1965

Houghton, Walter E., The Art of Newman's "Apologia", New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, and London: Oxford University Press, 1945

Ker, Ian, John Henry Newman: A Biography, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1988

Ker, Ian, The Achievement of John Henry Newman, London: Collins, and Notre Dame, Indiana: University of Notre Dame Press, 1990

Levine, George, The Boundaries of Fiction: Carlyle, Macaulay, Newman, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1968

Peterson, Linda H., Victorian Autobiography: The Tradition of Self-Interpretation, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1986: Chapter 4

Prickett, Stephen, Romanticism and Religion: The Tradition of Coleridge and

Wordsworth in the Victorian Church, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1976: Chapters 6 and 7

Tillotson, Geoffrey, and Kathleen Tillotson, Mid-Victorian Studies, London: Athlone Press, 1965

Ngugi wa Thiong'o

Kenyan, 1938–

Ngugi wa Thiong'o has always insisted that his essays should be read alongside his novels: "...they have been products of the same moods and touch on similar questions and problems" (Homecoming, 1972). They indeed accompany the works of fiction as they trace the history of men and ideas in East Africa, from the hopeful days of independence to the later questioning of ways of asserting a truly African culture. They also trace the evolution of a novelist who is also a professor of literature and an international literary and political figure, required to address meetings in many parts of the world. His five collections to date reflect the change in the function of Ngugi's essays as his public itself changes. Homecoming: Essays on African and Caribbean Literature, Culture, and Politics (1972) consists of texts written from a university perspective. The author analyses the works of Chinua Achebe, Wole Soyinka, and George Lamming, at the same time proposing to widen the curriculum. The relevance of literature in the cultural life and educational system of a newly independent country is foremost in his mind. Art has a function to fulfill; "The Writer in a Changing Society" is representative of this central preoccupation, echoing Achebe's famous line, "The novelist is a teacher."

Writers in Politics (1981) was written between 1970 and 1980, accompanying the publication of Petals of Blood (1977). The latter is a committed novel which is a fierce indictment of injustice in Kenyan society, yet the writer knows that the masses in whose name he intends to speak will not have access to his book in English. He reiterates the question: "...what is the relevance of literature to life?" but this time does not think that a change in school reading lists will be enough to solve problems. While the first collection is marked by the thinking of Frantz Fanon, Writers in Politics is more clearly Marxist, with references to other world literatures such as that of North Korea.

Two events radicalized his approach even further. First, in December 1977 he was detained for a year without charges after the production of a play in his original language Gikuyu was promptly banned by the regime; the experience is related in Detained (1981), both an autobiography and a meditation. Second, in 1982, an attempted coup took place in Nairobi: while order was restored, Ngugi was not allowed to return to his country and was forced to remain in exile. Barrel of a Pen: Resistance to Repression in Neo-Colonial Kenya (1983) is an angry account of the way opposition is quashed; parallels are drawn with the liberation struggles of the Mau Mau period. Recent events, with photographic documents about the banned play and detained students, figure prominently in the book, yet even when using these images of violent conflict, Ngugi still pursues his reflection on the part played by oral and written art in "National Identity and Imperialist Domination:

The Crisis of Culture in Africa Today.”

The book that follows is a meditation on the central problem of the choice between English or African languages for literature. By 1980 Ngugi had decided to write his fiction in Gikuyu. On this topic, Decolonising the Mind: The Politics of Language in African Literature (1986) collects essays which were mostly delivered as university lectures. The focus of the work is clear, and the debate is set at a consistently high level. This volume is an important contribution to the discussion of cultural assertion in the face of various types of domination.

The most recent volume, Moving the Centre: The Struggle for Cultural Freedoms (1993), gathers texts which for the most part were first spoken addresses at various occasions, often of a political nature. It covers no new ground in its attack on the hegemony of a new multinational order. Ngugi asks for action and cultural resistance: the title, a kind of retort to V.S. Naipaul's more inward-looking Finding the Centre (1984), proposes a shift away from the neo-colonial metropolis to a world where a plurality of centers would engage in a fruitful dialogue.

Many of these essays are historical landmarks, mapping the development and the assertion of an African world view. Ngugi is an intellectual novelist, a theoretician who with exacting honesty takes pains to analyze his position in an explicit, sometimes dogmatic corollary to his works of art. The essays clarify the issues, whereas the polyphonic novels allow room for debate, complexity, and contradiction. His essays are always extremely clear, even didactic, with logical developments and well-organized structures, often giving examples in the shape of parables. At his worst, and particularly in the last volume, Ngugi can give a reductive political sermon, often reiterating ideas expressed in other Marxist-inspired writings. At his best, however, he can summon all the resources of spoken rhetoric: he is a compelling speaker, and several essays are given life by rhythmic assertions and sarcastic questioning, a polemic mode that carries a great deal of energy. In many ways, once the political immediacy recedes, the texts with the most appeal are of two kinds: the pieces of literary criticism, which are among the best by an African writer, and the most personal moments, the “grains of sand” which, being intimate, reveal the vulnerable human being, the man whose love of life is the profound motivating source of so much didactic energy. “Matigari, and the Dreams of One East Africa,” an essay from Moving the Centre devoted to the identity of East Africa, has at its core a description of a fishing party in Dar es Salaam. The evocation of the tastes, the smells, the voices of Tanzania so close to inaccessible Kenya across the border contains the pleasures and the pain of the exile. Such passages display the best qualities of the fictional prose as well as the firm intellectual control of the essays. As such they are likely to endure beyond the time and place that occasioned them.

JACQUELINE BARDOLPH

Biography

Originally wrote as James T. Ngugi. Born 5 January 1938 in Kamiriithu, near Limuru, Kiambu District. Studied at Alliance High School, Gikuyu; Makerere University College, Kampala, Uganda, 1959–63, B.A., 1963; Leeds University, Yorkshire, 1964–67, B.A.,

1964. Married Nyambura, 1961: five sons and three daughters. Columnist of "As I See It," early 1960s, and reporter, 1964, Nairobi Daily Nation; editor, Zuka, Nairobi, 1965–70; lecturer in English, University College, Nairobi, 1967–69; fellow in creative writing, Makerere University, Kampala, 1969–70; visiting lecturer, Northwestern University, Evanston, Illinois, 1970–71; senior lecturer, associate professor, and chair of the Department of Literature, University of Nairobi, 1971–77. Imprisoned under the Public Security Act, 31 December 1977–12 December 1978. Was staying in London in 1982 when an attempted coup in Kenya made it impossible for him, a well-known opponent to the regime, to return to his country: lived for six years in London; taught at Yale University, New Haven, Connecticut, 1989–92, and New York University, from 1992; also gives lectures and talks in various universities and at conferences around the world. Awards: East African Literature Bureau Award, 1964.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Homecoming: Essays on African and Caribbean Literature, Culture, and Politics, 1972

Writers in Politics, 1981

Barrel of a Pen: Resistance to Repression in Neo-Colonial Kenya, 1983

Decolonising the Mind: The Politics of Language in African Literature, 1986

Moving the Centre: The Struggle for Cultural Freedoms, 1993

Other writings: four novels in English (Weep Not, Child, 1964; The River Between, 1965; A Grain of Wheat, 1967; Petals of Blood, 1977), short stories (Secret Lives, 1975), two novels originally in Gikuyu (Devil on the Cross, 1982; Matigari, 1989), the autobiographical Detained: A Writer's Prison Diary (1981), and several plays, alone or in collaboration.

Bibliography

Sicherman, Carol, Ngugi wa Thiong'o: A Bibliography of Primary and Secondary Sources, 1957–1987, London and New York: Zell, 1989

Further Reading

Cook, David, and Michael Okenimpke, Ngugi wa Thiong'o: An Exploration of His Writings, London: Heinemann, 1983

Sicherman, Carol, Ngugi wa Thiong'o, the Making of a Rebel: A Source Book in Kenyan Literature and Resistance, London and New York: Zell, 1990

Nietzsche, Friedrich

German, 1844–1900

Friedrich Nietzsche was perhaps the most influential writer at the end of the 19th century. He wrote in an innovative, fragmentary style for a small group of friends and like-minded “free spirits” who were not beholden to any ideology or afraid of looking into the abyss of the unknown and uncontrollable. He described himself as dynamite rather than as merely human and is best known for his re-evaluation of all values. The prophet Zarathustra’s self-description in Also sprach Zarathustra (1883–85; Thus Spoke Zarathustra) applies to the author himself: “I move about among mankind as among the fragments of the future, of that future which I envision. That is the object of my writing and striving: I write as poetry and bring together into a whole that which is fragment and enigma and horrible accident.” Some readers even make him responsible for the “death of God,” although he was only observing the general movement in the 19th century from traditional beliefs (myth) to a trust in science, commerce, and industry. His essayistic stance is dictated by resistance to those growing tendencies and by his desire for renewed vigor. The latter explains why his writing is largely subtitled a philosophy of/for the future.

Nietzsche’s writing can be divided roughly into three phases. The first corresponds to his development as a professor of classical philology in Basle. It consists of the influential essay Die Geburt der Tragodie (1872; The Birth of Tragedy) and the celebrated essay collection Unzeitgemässe Betrachtungen (1873–76; Untimely Meditations). The latter includes “David Strauss, der Bekenner und Schriftsteller” (1873; “David Strauss, the Confessor and the Writer”), “Vom Nutzen und Nachteil der Historie für das Leben” (1874; “On the Advantage and Disadvantage of History for Life”), “Schopenhauer als Erzieher” (1874; “Schopenhauer as Educator”), and “Richard Wagner in Bayreuth” (1876). His cultural criticism is directed against “theoretical man,” that is, against the scientific positivism and industrialization of the 19th century, in the manner of Ralph Waldo Emerson and Arthur Schopenhauer, whom he greatly admired. Optimism, democracy, and logic are for Nietzsche signs of declining vitality, while logical inconsistency is valued positively. With its nonscientific images and constructions, art appears as an instrument of resistance in his struggle against the myth-destroying rationalism of Socrates.

The second phase includes the collections Menschliches, Allzumenschliches (1878–80; Human, All Too Human), Morgenröthe (1881; Daybreak), and Die fröhliche Wissenschaft (1882.; The Gay Science) and represents the power of negation in preparing the ground for new possibilities. Nietzsche attempts here a new conception of science and a re-evaluation of the relationship between art and knowledge. Chemistry, the historicity of natural events which Nietzsche once considered as a disciplinary field, replaces the timeless world myth. The breaking down into elements displaces the sense of an organic whole. Nietzsche emerges here as the radical skeptic, psychologist, and analyst.

The third phase begins already with the end of The Gay Science with its scorn of numbers and calculation, continuing through Zarathustra, Jenseits von Gut und Böse (1886; Beyond Good and Evil), “Der Fall Wagner” (1888; “The Case of Wagner”), Gotzen-Dämmerung (1889; Twilight of the Idols), and Ecce homo (wr. 1888, pub. 1908), to the late essays Der Antichrist (1895; The Antichrist) and Nietzsche contra Wagner (1889). (Several volumes of posthumously published fragments, among them the so-called Der Wille zur Macht [1901; The Will to Power], were penned throughout his life and therefore do not necessarily belong to the late phase.) Everywhere is heard the call for a transvaluation of all values, Nietzsche’s great metaphysical essay. In this phase art is rehabilitated as the necessary counterweight to the devitalizing influence of knowledge: “Art is the great enabler of life, the great temptress to life, the great stimulant of life” (The Gay Science). In the third phase the love of lies and masks dominates because Nietzsche has recognized that life is impossible without falsification.

For Nietzsche art and intellectual inquiry thus went hand in hand. Despite his deep love of music, his own preferred art form was aphoristic and essayistic in nature. In the essay and late preface to his Birth of Tragedy, “Versuch einer Selbstkritik” (1886; “Essay in Self-Criticism”), he laments the fact that he was not bold enough in 1871 to adopt a new tone of discourse, one sparked by the language of poetry and free of the bonds of Kantian and Schopenhauerean categories. The regret is due to the fact that The Birth of Tragedy was his first attempt at seeing science through the eyes of the artist and art from the perspective of life itself. His entire opus is an attempt to read life, art, and science as if they were all texts open to interpretation. That attitude led to the “untimely meditations” dispersed throughout his opus: “Untimely,” as he explains in the essay “On the Advantage and Disadvantage of History,” because he argued that his age was marked by loss, frailty, and deficiency rather than strength and vigor.

Nietzsche’s writing is exemplary for the intimate, albeit uneasy nexus of philosophy and literature. A fundamental quality of his writing and thinking is the ever-present perspectivism, a point emphatically made in the essayistic preface to Beyond Good and Evil where he calls perspectivism “the fundamental condition of all life.” Since polyperspectivism lies at the center both of the quest for truth and of literariness, it is not surprising that Nietzsche is claimed as a model by continental philosophers and literary critics alike. Some even claim that literature holds the most promise for shedding light on some of the toughest epistemic problems.

Life for Nietzsche was literature, since the asceticism of his writings is both the motivation for and the result of perspectivism (Alexander Nehamas, 1985). The world is comprehended as if it were a text; in fact, Nietzsche viewed his own life as a text in the making. The only abstraction possible is that of perspectivism as the ruling principle of existence with its partial and fragmented views of things. All is only a series of shifting masks, of lies about the world and the self. The meaning of those partial views is constructed by the author and his reader in dynamic interplay, for the reader is not given a detailed road map of the author’s constructed text, just the principle of perspectivism. Nietzsche eschewed straight-line approaches and required the reader’s creative participation.

To do justice to Nietzsche as essayist, then, one must take his mode of writing fully into account. Behind that mode of writing is a philosophical attitude toward the world and the self. Essentially, it asks what can be said about the world, the self, and the future. Since Nietzsche considered human beings to be so many fragments of an unrealized future, his task as a writer and philosopher was to advance the organic unfolding of those fragmentary natures into full constructs. Philosophy always contains an element of autobiography, as do works of art. Ecce homo is an especially apt example of this alignment. Key is Nietzsche's self-conscious experimentation with genre mixing, of which the chief characteristics are fragmentation and hyperbole. The latter is variously guided as exaggeration, extravagance, errancy, and quest. Its underlying concern seems to be whether writing motivates thought or thought motivates writing. The hyperbole so favored by Nietzsche is a response to Socrates' preferred method of understatement (litotes). In any event, the reader is constrained to enact meaning and to "do" philosophy. The Romantic roots of this manner of thinking and writing are clear (cf. Friedrich Schlegel). All this questioning movement is related to the project of essayism. No wonder, then, that Nietzsche is widely acclaimed as a classical essayist. While his preferred genre is the aphorism, many of those so-called aphorisms are, in fact, essays.

In the long essay The Birth of Tragedy, Nietzsche early on formulates his essential stance and attitude toward truth, life, art, and ultimately writerliness. Fundamental is the tension between the natural Apollonian forces of harmony and ordering on the one hand and the Dionysian powers of intoxication and disruption on the other. Like Heinrich von Kleist before him, Nietzsche laments the loss of natural movement through the rise of self-consciousness. The dance metaphorically symbolizes the coordination of these dialectical forces and insures humankind's participation in a higher commonality with nature (cf. Human, All Too Human). In the essay "Über Wahrheit und Lüge im aussermoralischen Sinne" (1873; "On Truth and Lies in an Extra-Moral Sense") Nietzsche explicitly contends that humankind can live in a semblance of peace, security, and consistency only by losing its self-conscious sense of subjectivity as an "artistically creative subject." There is no causal relationship between subject and object, only an aesthetic one; that is, one of nuance and approximation, of "rough translation into a totally foreign tongue"—in other words, that of the dance. Thus one can never achieve the "right" perspective, for the right perspective is the one which is never present and ever-fleeting. Obviously this balancing act of shifting perspectives is the essence of life, art, and the act of writing. The dancing motif reflects the interpenetration of poetic creation and reflective moment to the point where they become indistinguishable.

Nietzsche's opus is rich with essayistic assessments of this relationship between science and poetry. A few examples will have to suffice. The Gay Science, Zarathustra, Beyond Good and Evil, Zur Genealogie der Moral (1887; A Genealogy of Morals), and Twilight of the Idols contain numerous essays in the garb of aphorisms. In The Gay Science we find, for instance, no. 357: "Zum alten Problem: 'was ist deutsch?'" ("On the Old Problem: What Is German?"); no. 366: "Angesichts eines gelehrten Buches" ("Encounter with a Scholarly Book"); no. 377: "Wir Heimatlosen" ("We Homeless People"); no. 381: "Zur Frage der Verständlichkeit" ("On Incomprehensibility"). In Zarathustra the chapters "Von der Erlösung" ("On Redemption"), "Vom Vorübergehen" ("On Passing By"), and "Vom Geist der Schwere" ("On the Spirit of Heaviness") are excellent examples of rhapsodic essays. Especially telling is Zarathustra's remark in "On the Spirit of Heaviness": "Ein Versuchen und Fragen war all mein Gehen.” The German is full of ironic playfulness and ambiguity, for “Versuchen” is an “attempting” or “essaying”; “Fragen” is the skeptical attitude of questioning toward all encounters on one’s travels through life; and the classic metaphor of the private, leisurely walk in essayistic writing is echoed in “mein Gehen.” Thus, the translation might read: “Attempting and questioning was my whole progression.”

This attitude is further mirrored in Beyond Good and Evil, in particular aphorisms nos. 44, 188, 203, 208, 224, and 230 with their numerous, tentative solutions, and invitation to think things through. They all have more in common with the style and tone of the essay than with the laconic aphorism. The themes, style, and length of the pieces cited are classically essayistic. The same holds true for the involvement of the reader in seemingly personal meditations upon weighty as well as seemingly trivial subjects.

Finally, in aphorism no. 381 of The Gay Science Nietzsche explains his “aphoristic” style once more as the most appropriate for the expression of his ideas. He believes namely that his writings are designed to stimulate and uplift the reader. His approach to profound problems, he states, is the way one approaches a cold bath: jump in quickly and get out quickly. The genuine attitude of the philosopher, Nietzsche adds, is that of a dancer: “The dance, namely, is his ideal, also his art, finally also his devoutness, his divine service.” Here he succinctly summarizes not only his own style of writing but also the essence of the essayistic attitude. Nietzsche viewed the relationship between scientific inquiry and art, philosophy, and life, in the manner of a true essayist.

JOHN A.McCARTHY

See also Philosophical Essay

Biography

Friedrich Wilhelm Nietzsche. Born 15 October 1844 in Röcken. Studied at Pforta School, 1858–64; philosophy and theology at the University of Bonn, 1864–65; University of Leipzig, 1865–67, Ph.D., 1869. Became friends with Richard Wagner, 1868. Chair of classical philology, University of Basle, 1869–79: retired because of ill health. Volunteer in the army medical service, 1867–68. Gave up Prussian citizenship, 1869, and remained stateless for the rest of his life. Traveled often to Sils Maria, Nice, and Italy, 1879–89. Suffered from mental illness for the last 11 years of his life. Died in Weimar, 25 August 1900.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Die Geburt der Tragödie aus dem Geiste der Musik, 1872; as Die Geburt der Tragödie; oder, Griechentum und Pessimismus, 1886; as The Birth of Tragedy, translated by William A.Haussmann, 1909, Francis Golffing, 1956, Walter Kaufmann, 1967, and Shaun Whiteside, 1993

Die Philosophie im tragischen Zeitalter der Griechen, 1873; as Philosophy in the Tragic Age of the Greeks, translated by Marianne Cowan, 1962

- Unzeitgemässe Betrachtungen*, 4 vols., 1873–76; as Unmodern Observations: Thoughts Out of Season, translated by Anthony M. Ludovici, 1909; as Untimely Meditations, translated by R.J. Hollingdale, 1983; as Unfashionable Observations, translated by Richard T.Gray, 1995
- David Strauss, der Bekenner und der Schriftsteller*, 1873
- Vom Nutzen und Nachteil der Historie für das Leben*, 1874; as The Use and Abuse of History, translated by Adrian Collins, 1949; as Of the Advantage and Disadvantage of History for Life, translated by Peter Preuss, 1980
- Schopenhauer als Erzieher*, 1874; as Schopenhauer as Educator, translated by James W.Hillesheim and Malcolm B.Simpson, 1965
- Richard Wagner in Bayreuth*, 1876
- Menschliches, Allzumenschliches: Ein Buch für freie Geister*, 3 vols., 1878–80; complete edition, 1886; as Human, All Too Human: A Book for Free Spirits, translated by Alexander Harvey, 1908, Helen Zimmern and Paul V.Cohn, 2. vols., 1909–11, Marion Faber and Stephen Lehmann, 1984, and R.J. Hollingdale, 1986
- Morgenrothe, Gedanken tiber die moralischen Vorurteile*, 1881; enlarged edition, 1887; as The Dawn of Day, translated by Johanna Volz, 1903, and J.M.Kennedy, 1974; as Daybreak: Thoughts on the Prejudices of Morality, translated by R.J. Hollingdale, 1982
- Die frohliche Wissenschaft*, 1882; enlarged edition, 1887; as The Joyful Wisdom, translated by Thomas Common, 1910; as The Gay Science, translated by Walter Kaufmann, 1974
- Also sprach Zarathustra: Ein Buch für Alle und Keinen*, 4 vols., 1883–85; revised edition, 1892; as Thus Spoke Zarathustra: A Book for All and None, translated by Alexander Tille, 1896, Thomas Common, 1898, Marianne Cowan, 1957, R.J. Hollingdale, 1961, and William Kaufmann, 1966
- Jenseits von Gut und Böse: Vorspiel einer Philosophie der Zukunft*, 1886; as Beyond Good and Evil: Prelude to the Philosophy of the Future, translated by Helen Zimmern, 1909, Marianne Cowan, 1955, William Kaufmann, 1966, and R.J.Hollingdale, 1973
- Zur Genealogie der Moral: Eine Streitschrift*, 1887; as A Genealogy of Morals, translated by William A.Haussmann, 1897, Horace B. Samuel, 1910, and Francis Golfing, 1956; as On the Genealogy of Morals, translated by William Kaufmann and R.J. Hollingdale, 1967, and Carole Diethel, 1994
- Götzen-Dämmerung; oder, Wie man mit dem Hammer philosophirt*, 1889; as Twilight of the Idols, translated by Thomas Common, 1896, Anthony M.Ludovici, 1911, and R.J.Hollingdale, 1968
- Der Antichrist: Fluch auf das Christenthum*, 1895; as The Antichrist, translated by Thomas Common, 1896, H.L. Mencken, 1920 (reprinted 1988), P.R.Stephenson, 1928, and R. J.Hollingdale, 1968
- Nietzsche contra Wagner: Aktenstücke eines Psychologen*, 1889; as Nietzsche contra Wagner, translated by Thomas Common, 1896
- Der Wille zur Macht*, edited by P.Gast and Elisabeth FörsterNietzsche, 1901; as The Will to Power, translated by Anthony M.Ludovici, 2 vols., 1909–10, and R.J.Hollingdale and Walter Kaufmann, 1968
- Ecce homo: Wie man wird—was man ist*, edited by Raoui Richter, 1908; as Ecce Homo: How One Becomes What One Is, translated by Anthony M.Ludovici, 1911, and R.J.Hollingdale, 1979
- The Portable Nietzsche*, edited by Walter Kaufmann, 1954
- Basic Writings*, edited by Walter Kaufmann, 1968

A Nietzsche Reader, edited by R.J.Hollingdale, 1977

Nietzsche Selections, edited by Richard Schacht, 1993

Hammer of the Gods: Selected Writings, edited and translated by Stephen Metcalf, 1996

Other writings: poetry, notebooks, and correspondence.

Collected works editions: Werke: Grossoktavausgabe, edited by the Nietzsche Archive, 15 vols., 1894–1904; The Complete Works, edited by Oscar Levy, various translators (as listed after individual works above), 18 vols., 1909–11; Sämtliche Werke: Kritische Studienausgabe, edited by Giorgio Colli and Mazzino Montinari, 15 vols., 1967–86; Complete Works (Stanford Edition), edited by Ernst Behler, 1994– (in progress).

Bibliography

Reichert, Herbert W., and Karl Schlechta, International Nietzsche Bibliography, Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, revised edition, 1968 (original edition), 1960

Further Reading

Allison, David B., editor, The New Nietzsche: Contemporary Styles of Interpretation, New York: Dell, 1977

Del Caro, Adrian, Nietzsche contra Nietzsche: Creativity and the Anti-Romantic, Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1989

De Man, Paul, "Rhetoric of Tropes (Nietzsche)," in his Allegories of Reading: Figural Language in Rousseau, Nietzsche, Rilke and Proust, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1979: 103–18

Derrida, Jacques, Spurs: Nietzsche's Styles, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1979 (original French edition), 1978

Fleischer, Margot, Der "Sinn der Erde" und die Entzauberung des Übermenschen: Eine Auseinandersetzung mit Nietzsche, Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1993

Heller, Erich, The Importance of Nietzsche: Ten Essays, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1988

Holub, Robert, Friedrich Nietzsche, New York: Twayne, and London: Prentice Hall International, 1995

Kofman, Sarah, Nietzsche and Metaphor, Stanford, California: Stanford University Press, and London: Athlone Press, 1993 (original French edition), 1972

Magnus, Bernd, Stanley Stewart, and Jean-Pierre Mileur, Nietzsche's Case: Philosophy as/Literature, New York and London: Routledge, 1993

Nehamas, Alexander, Nietzsche: Life as Literature, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1985

Pütz, Peter, "Nietzsche: Art and Intellectual Inquiry," in Nietzsche: Imagery and Thought: A Collection of Essays, edited by Malcolm Pasley, Berkeley: University of California Press, and London: Methuen, 1978: 1–32,

Solomon, Robert C., editor, Nietzsche: A Collection of Critical Essays, Notre Dame, Indiana: University of Notre Dame Press, 1980

Staten, Henry, Nietzsche's Voice, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1990

- Stern, J.P., "Nietzsche and the Idea of Metaphor," in Nietzsche: Imagery and Thought: A Collection of Essays, edited by Malcolm Pasley, Berkeley: University of California Press, and London: Methuen, 1978:65–81
- Williams, W.D., "Nietzsche's Masks," in Nietzsche: Imagery and Thought: A Collection of Essays, edited by Malcolm Pasley, Berkeley: University of California Press, and London: Methuen, 1978:82–103

Nouvelle Revue Française

French periodical, 1908–14, 1919–43, 1953–

The Nouvelle Revue Française (New French review) began publishing at the end of 1908, at first as a literary review, though its character changed radically as its editorial policy and contents became politicized in the 1930s. The dominating mind behind the foundation, the early aims, and the editorial policy of the NRF was that of Andre Gide, a leading member of the avant-garde who, like the painters surrounding Picasso at the same time, had in the early years of the 20th century turned away from the cultural movement we know as symbolism. The prepublication announcement of the NRF said that it aspired to be the review of the generation "which immediately followed symbolism." It was to take the position once held by the Mercure de France (Mercury of France) and the Natanson brothers' Revue Blanche (White review). Gide had published in the symbolist L'Ermitage (The hermitage) and in the Revue Blanche, and had been literary editor for the latter for six months. He had introduced his brother-in-law, Marcel Drouin, to both reviews, and had come to know his Belgian admirer André Ruyters and the writer Henri Ghéon. This quartet formed the core of the founding group of the Nouvelle Revue Française, soon enlarged to form a sextet with Jean Schlumberger and Jacques Copeau.

This group had practically taken over the Belgian periodical Antée when Gide's play Le Roi Candaule (King Candaules) failed after one performance in Berlin; at the same time, Antée nearly merged with the still symbolist La Phalange (The phalanx). The group, by now regarding itself as Gide's team, began planning its review, and the first number was published in November 1908. Gide objected to two of the articles and to the way his own "Notes" had been treated, wanting the review to reflect a corporate view, while some of the others preferred to make it a forum for debate. The editorial group split on the issue, broke up, and a new group, consisting only of Gide, Schlumberger, and Copeau, announced a second number for 1 February 1909. The series ran for 68 numbers until interrupted by World War I, a new series beginning with no. 69 on 1 June 1919.

The title of the new review was deliberately nationalistic, as the prevailing fashion demanded. Recently founded titles had included the daily version of L'Action Française (French action) and La Patrie Française (French homeland). Memories of the Franco-Prussian war were still vivid, and the Dreyfus affair, like the strong alliance of radical socialism with nationalism in Charles Péguy, testified to the strength of nationalist feeling in France. The price of the review was fixed sufficiently high to enable it to accommodate longer pieces. The chief editorial problems it faced concerned the difficulty of finding sufficiently brief texts of high literary quality, and Gide's meticulous perfectionism, leading to fastidiousness with proofs and frequently late submission of material. The first three numbers contained in three parts Gide's first undoubted masterpiece, La Porte étroite (Strait Is the Gate), perhaps best described as a novella. It was shot through with delicate inlays of irony and refined psychological nuance, with multiple references to the intricacies of intellectual debate in France during the century's first decade.

Schlumberger's essay "Considérations" in the first number tried hard to reconcile the intention not to let the review become the mouthpiece of a coterie with the desire to make it the product of the "strong unity of a group." The review was largely apolitical, but liberally pro-Dreyfus, while, like Péguy, remaining patriotic. Serious work inspired by Catholic conviction did not prevent the attempt to insulate aesthetic from moral values. The keynote was the liberal, civilized treatment of all serious literature, philosophy, and cultural attitudes, although the review has been criticized for not noticing what was occurring in the political world or in the world of the visual arts, and for not noticeably encouraging new nonliterary talent. It did indeed miss the revolution in painting occurring in Montmartre, the strong anti-symbolist reaction in all the arts, and the impact of Sergei Diaghilev on French culture. It was Le Figaro which published the futurist manifesto.

The NRF prospered, and founded its own in-house publishing company, largely to insure the availability of offprints. Issues quickly reached 185 pages, and the publishing house, at first known by the NRF initials, became in 1911 "Éditions Gallimard" when the review's publishing committee sold out to its publishing manager. The review adapted well to France's cultural life in the 1920s. It sponsored the Pontigny literary workshops of Paul Desjardins, and helped Copeau, who was training the great actor-producers Louis Jouvet and Charles Dullin at the Vieux-Colombier. After World War I Gide, still the guiding figure, began to hand over the review's direction to Jacques Riviere, and its writers came to include Louis Aragon, Andre Breton, Marcel Jouhandeau, François Mauriac, Paul Morand, and, briefly, Marcel Proust.

During the 1930s the major cultural constraint acting on French intellectuals was the apparent choice in Europe between fascism, as it had appeared in Hitler's Germany, Mussolini's Italy, and Franco's Spain, and the communism which took its inspiration from the Russian Revolution. The NRF, necessarily reflecting the need for France to choose between the conflicting ideologies which might pull the European economies out of their depression, gradually became more important for its famous chronicle of cultural events in France than for its prose writing. Jean Paulhan, director from 1935, nevertheless continued to find and publish work during that period from the best of France's available literary talent.

The NRF ceased publication in June 1940, the month in which Paris was taken by German troops. It was reopened under the editorship of the pro-Nazi Pierre-Eugène Drieu la Rochelle in November 1940, but drifted too far toward an admiration for Stalinist communism to please the occupying authorities, and was discontinued in June 1943. By that date few of its former authors were willing to be published in its pages, and Drieu la Rochelle, eventually to commit suicide, had become disillusioned by Hitler. However, in 1953 the NRF began publication once more, under the title La Nouvelle Nouvelle Revue

Française (the clumsy second Nouvelle was eventually dropped), edited by Paulhan and the journalist and critic Marcel Arland. Since then it has continued to attempt to maintain high standards and to serve as the barometer of French culture.

ANTHONY LEVI

Anthologies

L'Esprit NRF: 1908–1940 (selections), edited by Pierre Hebey, Paris: Gallimard, 1990
La Nouvelle Revue Française: Études et travaux, edited by Claude Martin, Lyons: University of Lyons II Center for Gide Studies, 9 vols., 1975– (in progress)

Further Reading

Angles, Auguste, André Gide et le premier groupe de la “Nouvelle Revue Française”, Paris: Gallimard, 3 vols., 1978–86
 Cabanis, José, Dieu et la “Nouvelle Revue Française”: 1909–1949, Paris: Gallimard, 1994
 Cornick, Martyn, Intellectuals in History: The “Nouvelle Revue Française” Under Jean Paulhan, 1925–1940, Amsterdam and Atlanta: Rodopi, 1995
 Hebey, Pierre, La NRF des années sombres: Juin 1940-juin 1941, des intellectuels à la dérive, Paris: Gallimard, 1992
 Lacouture, Jean, Une adolescence du siècle: Jacques Rivière et la “Nouvelle Revue Française”, Paris: Seuil, 1994
 Morino, Lina, La “Nouvelle Revue Française” dans l’histoire des lettres, Paris: Gallimard, 1939
 Naughton, Helen T., editor, The Critics of the “Nouvelle Revue Française”, L’Esprit Créatur special issue, 14 no. 2 (1974)

Novalis

German, 1772–1801

Georg Philipp Friedrich von Hardenberg, who adopted the pen name Novalis, is universally considered the prototypical German Romantic. The magical idealism he developed in his literary writings remains one of the enduringly great aesthetic accomplishments of the culture of German-speaking countries. Like his poetry and novels, the few essay-like writings composed by Novalis during his short life profoundly influenced German-speaking writers of the calibre of Joseph von Eichendorff, Rainer Maria Rilke, Hermann Hesse, and Thomas Mann, to name just a few. These works contain Novalis’ inchoate attempt to develop a speculative and aesthetic synthesis of reality, which his literary writings later brought to a higher level of fruition. He dreamed of achieving a “magical” unification of major dimensions of human existence, encompassing such realms as the marital, political, historical, and mystical. In his essays, Novalis envisages a pantheistic harmonization of these constellations that springs from his perception of the mythic power of poetry to evoke and illuminate the absolute Ego (Ich), which constitutes the ground of nature.

Novalis' first published prose work was a loose series of philosophical fragments entitled "Blütenstaub" (1798; "Pollen"). These fragments originally appeared in the Schlegel brothers' journal Athenäum. Each short piece in this collection is written in a prose style that synthesizes abstract philosophical insights with a richly layered poetic language. Novalis' intention in composing these speculative vignettes was not that of elaborating a systematic argument. It reflected, on the contrary, an attempt to provide poetic spirits—those endowed with the potential to discover a higher metaphysical vocation in life—with a series of hieroglyphic messages, whose symbolic content emanates from the transcendent realm of the Absolute Ego. This notion derives from Johann Gottlieb Fichte's Grundlage des gesamten Wissenschaftslehre (1794; The Science of Knowledge), a philosophical work that exerted a profound influence on Novalis' speculative thinking.

For Novalis, the soteriological purpose of the tiny essay fragments in "Pollen" lay in aiding higher spirits to discover "[den] Weg nach Innen": the esoteric spiritual path leading to the numinous, inner depths of the soul. In this sphere the soul enters into mystical communion with the true essence of nature: the universal Mind which constitutes the Being of the eternal universe. In opposition to Fichte's idealism, however, Novalis views this epiphany not as a rationalistic Amor intellectualis Dei, but as an eminently transcognitive intuition. Novalis affirms that in the ecstasis of this beatific contemplation, the human soul apprehends the fundamental ideality of nature's hypostatic essence. It thus becomes overwhelmed by a mystic yearning (Sehnsucht) to transform the external, material world: the tenebrous realm of the Fichtean Non-Ego (Nicht-Ich). Its spiritual vision causes the soul to endeavor to transfigure this dark, ultimately unreal sphere of sensually conditioned determinacy (Bestimmtheit) with the intelligible irrefulgence that radiates from its infinite ontological source. Thus, according to Novalis' reinterpretation of Fichtean metaphysics, their experience of the Fichtean Absolute Ego impels the chosen spirits who attain enlightenment ethically and poetically to strive to transfigure the external world, reinvesting the domain of the Nicht-Ich with the ideal presence of the Absolute.

Another series of essay fragments, entitled "Glaube und Liebe" (1798; Faith and love), contains Novalis' chiliastic reflections on politics. A dominant impetus of this work consists in the latter's utopian vision of the ideal monarch. For Novalis, monarchy represents an essential stage in the spiritual development of humanity toward a state of being in which each individual will embody the higher virtues of Platonic love and enlightened rationality. This universal spirituality is destined ultimately to supersede all forms of human government. Novalis embraces the notion that democracy reflects a higher theory of government than monarchy. However, he also expresses the belief that European humanity is not yet ethically prepared to assume the full freedom of individual selfdetermination prerequisite to realizing this higher order. Novalis avers that if the people are not given an education that promotes their appropriation of higher virtues, democratic government will inevitably degenerate into mobocracy. On this basis, present-day kings in Europe have an important ethical role to fulfill in terms of their ability to assume a status as avatars of pantheistic virtues, such as enlightened tolerance, Christ-like gentleness, and the Spinozan intellectual love of God. By providing such an example, rulers can evoke the higher moral and intellectual nature dormant in the hearts of their subjects. This will prepare humanity for a chiliastic age in which government will be rendered unnecessary, inasmuch as all human beings will live by the law of Christ. Hence, in Novalis' view, a king's power should not be based on military might or political force, but on his divine calling as a moral and spiritual guide for his subjects.

Novalis' most coherent essay bears the title "Die Christenheit, oder Europa" (wr. 1799, pub. 1826; "Christianity or Europe"). In this work, the poet articulates a theory of history whose culmination lies in a quasi-Hegelian realization of humanity's universal spiritual unity and peace. This represents a historical symphony divided into three major movements. The first resides in Novalis' vision of a utopian Middle Ages. Here European civilization basked in the spiritual light flowing from the Catholic religion. In this age, European humanity dwelt in a state of harmonious unity with God and the Church. According to Novalis' fairytale description of the medieval period, the Pope, like the rulers of Europe in general, represented a spiritual father of the people whose power was vouchsafed him by Christ. While the light of Christ reigned throughout Europe in the personage of the Pope, humanity remained in a state of universal peace. However, a necessary stage of humanity's historical development came in the form of a break-up of the ecclesiastical and political harmony that pervaded the Middle Ages.

The Reformation and Enlightenment periods of European history signified humanity's loss of the spiritual peace and security it had formerly enjoyed. One of the historical reasons for this loss lay in the preponderance, during the Middle Ages, of the communal spirit over that of the individual. This latter principle was rightfully posited and developed during the Reformation. This development proceeded, in particular, through Luther's insistence upon the unmediated personal communion between the individual believer and the lux vera of Christ. Like the Protestant Reformation, modern natural science, which flourished during the Enlightenment, enhanced the life of the individual in its endeavor to promote human happiness by transforming nature. However, the dangers inherent in these historical phases of humankind's development manifested themselves in the form of modern science's reduction of the spirit of the Bible to the letter of the text. This exegetical reductionism was complemented by the rationalist endeavors of science during the Enlightenment to dissect and mathematically analyze the living beauty of divine nature. This coldly analytical approach to the world sought to displace the pantheistic spirit of the universe with its mechanistic conception of nature. But the passionate aspirations of the French Revolution, which for Novalis marked the culmination of the Enlightenment as well as its end, paved the way for humanity to rid itself of the austere and spiritless rationality of the epoch of science, preparing it for a coming age. In this period humanity would once again worship the Holy Virgin and the saints in an epiphany of universal holiness and poetry. Indeed, Novalis predicts that, in this final age of history, an ecumenical Christianity will harmonize the earth's religions into a state of all-encompassing peace and mystic adoration of the transcendent Christ. In contrast to the Middle Ages, however, this millennial period—humankind's historical and spiritual apotheosis—will be characterized not only by the individual's harmony with the community of humanity in general, but also by the individual soul's unio mystica with the divine. In consonance with the Book of the Apocalypse, Novalis specifies that the capital of the universal society at the end of history will be Jerusalem.

While Novalis' essay on the ultimate meaning and purpose of history was neglected by his immediate contemporaries, it became viewed, not long after his death, as a manifesto of German Romanticism's utopian-religious idealism concerning the historical vocation of humanity. The essay also came to exemplify German Romanticism's fascination with Catholicism and the Middle Ages. Furthermore, it foreshadowed later attempts, such as those of Max Scheler in the 20th century, to develop a philosophical agenda intended to provide European humanity with a renewed vision of higher, platonistic values leading to the possibility of cultural and spiritual rebirth.

RODNEY TAYLOR

Biography

Born Georg Philipp Friedrich Leopold von Hardenberg, 2 May 1772. in Oberwiedstedt, Thuringia. Studied under Schiller at the University of Jena, 1790–91; University of Leipzig, 1791–93; University of Wittenberg, 1794; law degree, 1794; Mining Academy, Freiberg, 1797–99. Became friends with Friedrich Schlegel, Ludwig Tieck, and other early Romantics. Engaged to Sophie von Kühn, 1795 (died, 1797). Actuary for Kreisamtmann Just, Tennstedt, 1795–97; assistant in salt works, Weissenfels, 1796–97, 1799–1801; associated with Bergakademie, Freiberg, 1797–99. Engaged to Julie von Charpentier, 1798. Died (of tuberculosis) in Weissenfels, 25 March 1801.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

“Blütenstaub,” *Athenäum*1 (April 1798):70–106; selections as “Pollen,” translated by Alexander Gelley, in German Romantic Criticism, edited by A.Leslie Willson, 1982,

“Glauben und Liebe, oder der König und die Königin,” Jahrbücher der Preussischen Monarchie unter der Regierung von Friedrich Wilhelm III 2(July 1798):269–86

“Die Christenheit, oder Europa,” in Schriften, edited by Ludwig Tieck, 1826; as

“Christianity or Europe,” translated by Charles E.Passage, in Hymns to the Night and Other Selected Writings, 1960

Fragmente, edited by Otto Michel, 1947(?)

Hymns to the Night and Other Selected Writings (includes poetry and aphorisms), translated by Charles E.Passage, 1960

“Selected Aphorisms and Fragments,” translated by Alexander Gelley, in German Romantic Criticism, edited by A.Leslie Willson, 1982:62–83

Pollen and Fragments: Selected Poetry and Prose, translated by Arthur Versluis, 1989

Other writings: poetry (including Hymnen an die Nacht [Hymns to the Night], 1800) and the unfinished novel Heinrich von Ofterdingen.

Collected works editions: Schriften, edited by Friedrich Schlegel and Ludwig Tieck, 2 vols., 1802; Schriften, edited by Paul Kluckhohn and Richard Samuel, 5 vols., 1975, revised edition, edited by Samuel, Hans-Joachim Mähl, and Gerhard Schulz, 1977–88.

Bibliography

Samuel, Richard, Novalis: Der handschriftliche Nachlass des Dichters: Zur Geschichte des Nachlasses, Gerstenberg: Hildesheim, 1973

Further Reading

Hiebel, Friedrich, German Poet, European Thinker, Christian Mystic, Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1954

Neubauer, John, Novalis, Boston: Twayne, 1980

Von Molnár, Geza and Jochen Schulte-Sasse, Romantic Vision, Ethical Context: Novalis and Artistic Autonomy, Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1987

Novikov, Nikolai

Russian, 1744–1818

Military officer, commissioner under Catherine II for the drafting of a new code of law, journalist, literary critic, social critic, satirist, translator at the College of Foreign Affairs, publisher, an idealist with strong moral convictions, a good organizer and businessman, Freemason but staunchly Russian Orthodox, the Metropolitan of Moscow having said that he wished all Christians were like him: Nikolai Novikov was a complete man of the Enlightenment without being Voltairean. When Novikov began his writing and publishing activity in the late 1760s, satirical journals of the English type such as the Tatler and the Spectator of Addison and Steele were popular in Russia. Catherine the Great was herself the sponsor and regular contributor to one such journal called Vsiakaia Vsiachina (1769; Odds and ends); in response to this rather harmless publication, which limited its satirical attacks to the question of vice in general, Novikov launched Truten' (1769–70; The drone), a satirical review concerned with the realities of Russian life: the lack of education, the insufficiency of mere Church learning, the brutality of serfdom. It published editorials, letters to the editor, replies to “Granny” (the Empress), and articles under names such as those by Mr. Drone, the fictitious editor standing idly aloof from the affairs of the world, an editor “not altogether qualified for the business I have undertaken.” Then there was Mr. Perochinov (pencil sharpener), Pravoliubov (the lover of truth), who used to mock Madame Miscellany for not knowing Russian well (the Empress was of German origin), Chistoserdov (pure heart), and Mr. Nedoum (perplexed): “I do not know why the air here is so very different from that in England. There wise men go mad, while here, those without reason are thought intelligent.” After Truten' came other satirical reviews: Pustomelia (1770; The chatterbox, or tattler), Zhivopisets (1772– 73; The painter), and Koshelek (1774; The purse). In them Novikov trained the reader to appreciate the nuances of social behavior. Ideas and opinions were never served up plain: readers were not meant to be passive, but were drawn into a new relationship by being invited to participate in the journal's activities. However, these journals were also the beginning of social criticism in Russia and as a result were all suppressed.

Novikov also wrote serious works, establishing new traditions in Russia. In 1772, he published Opyt istoricheskogo slovaria o rossiiskikh pisateliakh (An essay at an historical dictionary of Russian writers), the first work of its kind in Russia, which did much to popularize writers of the day such as Denis Fonvizin, Fedor Aleksandrovich Emin, and V.N. Maikov. In another historical work, Drevniaia rossiiskaia biblioteka (1773–75; The ancient Russian library), Novikov tried to emphasize the greatness and civility of Russia's past in order to reply to the Russian and foreign (especially French) detractors of the Motherland, who saw it as a backward country: "It is useful to be acquainted with the customs, mores and way of life of other peoples in other times...it is shameful to look down on one's own fellow countrymen." Novikov was dissatisfied with the French influence on the Russian noble class and wrote "not everything here, thank God, has yet been contaminated by France."

In 1775 Novikov became a Freemason: "...I had no bearings nor any foundation on which I might build spiritual peace and so without prior deliberation I fell into the Freemasons." This marked the beginning of a religious phase in his writing. His review Utrennii Svet (1777–80; Morning light) carried none of the satire of the earlier reviews, but was moral and educational: "...hold up to individuals, many of them as fickle as butterflies, the mirror of truth, and guide them along the path from the superficial and corporal aspect of man to the very essence of his inner being."

In 1779 Novikov moved from St. Petersburg to Moscow, where he successfully ran the Moscow University Press. His office was a combination of publisher, hospital, and pharmaceutical laboratory, which treated the poor for free. In Moscow he also became more involved with the Freemasons and operated a secret Freemason press, the Tipograficheskoi Kompanii (Typographical company), eventually leading to his arrest and death sentence in 1792., which was later changed to 15 years' imprisonment. However, he was released in 1796 after the death of the Empress, with the order that he could not go back to writing or publishing.

Novikov was a great admirer of classical literature and did much to promote it in Russia. He also published many Western works by Shakespeare, Rousseau, Lessing, Diderot, Voltaire, Beaumarchais, Swift, Milton, Pope, and others. His later Moscow reviews, such as Moskovskoe Ezhemesiachnoe Izdanie (1781; Moscow monthly) and Vecherniaia Zaria (1782; Evening light), were a mixture of moral lessons and teaching on the immortality of the soul together with political, geographical, and historical matters.

Novikov's writing style was simple and straightforward, and not particularly original. The central ideas in his writings, apart from his satirical social criticism, were the harmony and beauty of creation, as well as the belief that each individual contains a spiritual light, but a light that has been obscured by evil deeds. Novikov also had a talent for popularizing ideas. He saw art as therapeutic and beneficial: "those sisters poetry and art do not hinder, but rather aid us in our internal development." He was the first writer in Russia to be concerned with the raising of children—“when the rearing of children has reached the acme of perfection, everything else will be made easy”—and began publishing a series of books for them. He helped to spread culture, learning, and a civic consciousness to the most remote regions of Russia. Through his essays and publications, Novikov helped to instruct an entire generation of Russian nobility.

ANDRIUS VALEVIČIUS

Biography

Nikolai Ivanovich Novikov. Born 8 May 1744 at TikhvinskoeAvdot'ino family estate, near Bronnitsii. Studied at the Moscow University gymnasium for the nobility, 1755–60. Served in the Izmailovskii Regiment, 1762–67; secretary with Catherine II's Legislative Commission for the drafting of a new code of laws, 1767–69. Editor and main contributor, Truten', 1769–70, Pustomelia, 1770, Zhivopisets, 1772–73, and Koshelek, 1774. Joined the Freemasons, and became an adherent of Rosicrucianism, 1775. Publisher, Sanktpeterburgskie Uchenie Vedomosti (St. Petersburg academic news), 1777, and Utrennii Svet, 1777–80; moved to Moscow, 1779, where he published several journals and newspapers, including the Moskovskie Vedomosti (Moscow morning news), 1779–89, Ekonomicheskii Magazin (The economic magazine), 1780–89, Moskovskoe Ezhemesiachnoe Izdanie, 1781, Vecherniaia Zaria, 1782, Gorodskaiia i Derevenskaia Biblioteka (Town and country library), 1782–86, Pokoyashchisia Trudoliubets (The diligent at rest), 1784–85, and Detskoe Chtenie Dlia Serdtsa i Razuma (Children's reading for heart and mind), 1785–89; publisher, Moscow University Press, 1779–89; founder, Tipograficheskoi Kompanii publishing house, 1784–91. Married Aleksandra legorovna Rimskaia-Korsakova (died, 1791), 1781: one son and one daughter. Arrested for supposedly publishing illegal works (a culmination of his fall from favor with Catherine II), 1792, and sentenced to 15 years' imprisonment; held in prison until the death of Catherine II, 1796: after his release not allowed to resume publishing or journalism; retired to his family estate. Died (of a stroke) at Tikhvinskoe-Avdot'ino family estate, 12 August 1818.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Truten', 1769–70; edited by P.A.Iefremov, 1865, and A.S. Suvorin, 1902

Pustomelia, 1770; edited by A.N.Afanas'ev, 1858

Zhivopisets, 1772–73; edited by P.A.Iefremov, 1864, and A.S. Suvorin, 1900

Koshelek, 1774; edited by A.N.Afanas'ev, 1858, and A.S. Suvorin, 1900

Satiricheskiie zhurnalii N.I.Novikova: Truten' 1769–1770; Pustomelia 1770; Zhivopisets 1772–1773; Koshelek 1774, edited by P.N.Berkov, 1951

Other writings: Opyt istoricheskogo slovaria o rossiiskikh pisateliakb (1772), the serial Drevniaia rossiiskaia biblioteka (1773–75), and satirical short stories (1782).

Collected works edition: Izbrannie sochineniia, edited by I.V. Malishev and L.B.Svetlov, 1961.

Bibliography

Stepanov, V.P., and Iu.V.Stennik, in Istoriia russkoi literaturi XVIII veka: Bibliograficheskii ukazatel', Leningrad, 1968: items 5686–6168

Further Reading

- Jones, W.Gareth, "Novikov's Naturalized Spectator," in The Eighteenth Century in Russia, edited by G.Garrard, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1973:149–65
- Jones, W.Gareth, Nikolay Novikov: Enlightener of Russia, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984
- Leonard, Gerald Irwin, Novikov, Shcherbatov, Radishchev: The Intellectual in the Age of Catherine the Great (dissertation), Binghamton: State University of New York, 1980
- McArthur, Gilbert H., The Novikov Circle in Moscow, 1779–1792 (dissertation), New York: University of Rochester, 1968
- McArthur, Gilbert H., "Freemasonry and Enlightenment in Russia: The Views of N.I.Novikov," Canadian-American Slavic Studies 14, no. 3 (1980):361–76
- Monnier, André, Un publiciste frondeur sous Catherine II: Nicolas Novikov, Paris: Institut d'Études Slaves, 1981
- Okenfuss, Max J., "The Novikov Problem: An English Perspective," in Great Britain and Russia in the Eighteenth Century: Contacts and Comparisons, edited by A.G.Cross, Newtonville, Massachusetts: Oriental Research Partners, 1979
- Webster, William Mark, Novikov, Freemasonry and the Russian Enlightenment (Master's dissertation), Montreal: McGill University, 1987
- Weinbaum, Alexandra, N.I.Novikov (1774–1818): An Interpretation of His Career and Ideas (dissertation), New York: Columbia University, 1975
- Zenkovsky, V.V., A History of Russian Philosophy, vol. 1, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1953

O

Ocampo, Victoria

Argentine, 1890–1979

Victoria Ocampo was educated at home in subjects considered suitable for the daughter of a wealthy, conservative family living in rigidly patriarchal Argentina. Though not expected to have a career, she read widely and traveled in Europe, becoming fluent in French, English, and Italian. Soon after an early, disastrous marriage, Ocampo rebelled against her circumscribed life by having a scandalous affair, leaving the church, and embarking on a life of intellectual independence.

While Argentina in the early 1900s was an inauspicious time and place for a woman to establish a writing career, she used her beauty, charm, and wealth, as well as a network of important friends, to found the literary journal Sur (South) in 1931, and, two years later, the publishing house Sur. Thereafter she was assured a place to publish her hundreds of essays. From the beginning she met opposition from the isolationist military government and the Catholic Church, each of which was at odds with her liberal, international intellectualism. In 1953 she was imprisoned for 26 days by the Peronist regime. This defining experience served as the backdrop for her “El hombre del látigo” (1957; “The Man with the Whip”).

Ocampo used essays as a way to clarify her life and beliefs, often as a vehicle to challenge male authority and to promote the cause of women. She approached topics with a personal style, using the familiar “you” to address a reader she expected to be active, a “common reader” who read for pleasure and was part of a well-informed, intellectual elite. Her essays are characterized by enthusiasm, intensity, frequent digressions, and occasional playfulness. They are often dialectic and reflective. Graphic metaphors, sarcasm, and a slightly ironic humor mark her work. For example, she characterized commentators on Dante as “that numerous and terrible band of guards... [who stand] armed with aggressive erudition on the threshold of each canto, brandishing their often contradictory interpretations like pitchforks...” (De Francesca a Beatrice [1921; From Francesca to Beatrice]).

Ocampo’s ten volumes of essays, Testimonios (1935–77; Testimonies), cover many subjects, among them people (Gandhi, T.E.Lawrence, Mussolini), books (by Shakespeare, Proust, Malraux), and films (The Bicycle Thief, Wuthering Heights, The Grapes of Wrath). Only a small fraction of her total output has been translated into English.

Her earliest essays (1920–33) challenged male authority in a variety of ways. She took on erudite male scholars in De Francesca a Beatrice. In “Babel” (1920), she took an iconoclastic look at the biblical story, suggesting that God had played “a dirty trick” on humankind by making possible multiple interpretations for any given word. She went on to question “equality,” as “a big word, swollen with emptiness, that we toss around a lot...” She chided Ruskin for his condescending tone and for not allowing the reader to think for himself (“Al margen de Ruskin” [1920; A note on Ruskin]). She took exception to Ortega y Gasset’s chauvinism and his portrayal of woman as man’s passive muse (“Contestación a un epílogo de Ortega y Gasset” [1928; Reply to an epilogue by Ortega y Gasset]). From the beginning, Ocampo pushed hard against the limits of what a woman, at that time and place, could articulate in an essay.

Her most important essays are on women, generally and specifically, whether real or fictional, from Emily Bronte, Gabriela Mistral, and Indira Gandhi to Lady Chatterley and Ma Joad. After Ocampo met Virginia Woolf in 1934 she became politically active in the struggle for women’s rights in Argentina and wrote as a declared feminist. Her essays stressed the need to improve women’s education (“La mujer, sus derechos y sus responsabilidades” [1936; “Woman, Her Rights and Her Responsibilities”]), she called on women to express themselves, especially in writing (“La mujer y su expresion” [1936; “Woman and Her Expression”]), and she took a liberal approach to many issues, among them divorce, abortion, prostitution, and illegitimacy.

Inspired and encouraged by Woolf’s books and by extensive correspondence with her, Ocampo wrote essays about Woolf from a fresh, intimate perspective (“Virginia Woolf en mi recuerdo” [1941; “Virginia Woolf in My Memory”]). She also wrote interpretations of Woolf’s works (Orlando, To The Lighthouse, A Room of One’s Own, A Writer’s Diary), which Sur had introduced to Latin American readers in Spanish translation.

While Ocampo fervently championed women’s rights, a tolerant, constructive understanding supported her feminism. She did not see men as the enemy, she regarded mothers as all-important in their work of molding their children, and she envisioned the ideal marriage as a partnership of equals based on love and mutual respect (“Pasado y presente de la mujer” [1966; “Woman’s Past and Present”]). But she was not blind to the problems of men or marriage, criticizing men for their love of war and their adherence to a double standard; she warned women that they should not try to live through either their children or their husbands.

Ocampo’s substantial contributions brought her honors from around the world, including an honorary degree from Harvard in 1967. Perhaps the greatest tribute was her admission in 1977 into the previously all-male Argentine Academy of Letters, an honor she had been consciously or unconsciously aiming toward all her life. As contemporary scholars begin to explore essays by Latin American women, an active interest has developed in Ocampo and her role as a feminist writer and a key figure in the intellectual history of Latin America.

PATRICIA OWEN STEINER

Biography

Victoria Ocampo de Estrada. Born 7 April 1890 in Buenos Aires. Studied privately with tutors and at the Sorbonne, Paris. Married at age 22 (later separated). Founder, Sur literary journal, from 1931, and Sur publishing house, from 1933. Manager, Teatro Colon, Buenos Aires, 1933. Cofounder, 1936, and president, 1936 and 1938, Argentine Union of Women. Imprisoned briefly for opposition to Perón regime, 1953. Elected to the Argentine Academy of Letters, 1977. Awards: Argentine Society of Writers Grand Prize of Honor, 1950; Alberti y Sarmiento Prize, 1967; honorary degree from Harvard University. Officer, Legion of Honor (France); Commander, Order of the British Empire (CBE). Died in San Isidro, Argentina, 27 January 1979.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

De Francesca a Beatrice a través de la Divina comedia, 1921

Testimonios, 10 vols., 1935–77; 4th vol. as Soledad sonora, 1950

Domingos en Hyde Park, 1936

338171 T.E., 1942; as 338171 T.E. (Lawrence of Arabia), translated by David Garnett, 1963

El viajero y una de sus sombras (Keyserling en mis tmemorias), 1951

Virginia Woolf en su diario, 1954

Tagore en las barrancas de San Isidro, 1961

Victoria Ocampo: Against the Wind and the Tide (also contains a critical study of Ocampo), translated by Doris Meyer, 1979

Autobiografía (includes El archipiélago; El imperio insular, La rama de Salzburgo; Viraje; Versailles-Keyserling, Paris-Drieu; Sur y Cia), 6 vols., 1979–84; selections edited by Francisco Ayala, 1991

Other writings: plays. Also translated works by William Faulkner, Graham Greene, D.H.Lawrence, Albert Camus, Colette, Dylan Thomas, and John Osborne.

Bibliographies

Adam, Carlos, "Bio-bibliografía de Victoria Ocampo," Sur 346 (1980):125–79

Foster, David William, "Bibliography of Writings by and About Victoria Ocampo, 1890–1979," Revista Interamericana de Bibliografía 30, no. 1 (1980):51–58

Further Reading

Greenberg, Janet Beth, The Divided Self: Forms of Autobiography in the Writing of Victoria Ocampo (dissertation), Berkeley: University of California, 1986

Guiñazú, Maria Cristina Arambel, "'Babel' and De Francesca a Beatrice: Two Founding

- Essays by Victoria Ocampo," in Reinterpreting the Spanish American Essay: Women Writers of the 19th and 20th Centuries, edited by Doris Meyer, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1995
- Meyer, Doris, Victoria Ocampo: Against the Wind and the Tide (also includes translations of essays), New York: Braziller, 1979
- Meyer, Doris, "Letters and Correspondence in the Essays of Victoria Ocampo," Revista 42, no. 2 (1992):233–40
- Meyer, Doris, "Victoria Ocampo, Argentine Identity, and the Landscape of Essay," Review: Latin American Literature and Arts 48 (Spring 1994):58–61
- Meyer, Doris, "Victoria Ocampo and Spiritual Energy," in A Dream of Light and Sbdow: Portraits of Latin American Women Writers, edited by Marjorie Agosín, Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press, 1995
- Meyer, Doris, "The Early (Feminist) Essays of Victoria Ocampo," Studies in 20th Century Literature 20 (1996):41–64
- Molloy, Sylvia, "The Theatrics of Reading: Body and Book in Victoria Ocampo," in her At Face Value: Autobiographical Writing in Spanish America, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1991
- Pratt, Mary Louise, "Don't Interrupt Me: The Gender Essay and Conversation and Counter canon," in Reinterpreting the Spanish American Essay: Women Writers of the 19th and 20th Centuries, edited by Doris Meyer, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1995
- Sarlo, Beatriz, "Decir y no decir: Erotismo y represion," in her Una modernidad periferica: Buenos Aires 1920 y 1930, Buenos Aires: Nueva Visión, 1988

Odobescu, Alexandru

Romanian, 1834–1895

It is difficult to say whether any Romanian writings before 1800 can be described as "essays," even though homiletic and aphoristic publications may display some essayistic features. However, soon after 1800 the conversational and familiar essay became very popular, often combined with other marginal, half-literary, or playful genres. Thus Dinicu Golescu (1770–1830) and Nicolae Filimon (1819–65) among others used the travelogue as a vehicle for moral and intellectual reflection. Vasile Alecsandri (1818–90) mixed semi-fantastic narrative with gentle irony upon the foibles of a transitional society, and his friends Ion Ghica (1867–97) and Costache Negruzzi (1808–68) used the epistolary form as their preferred mode for presenting social customs and moral and economic reflections under a literary guise. Essays of literary criticism in institutionalized forms began with I.Heliade Radulescu (1802–72) and, more clearly, with Titu Maiorescu (1840–1917). Even more frequent than these genres was the "physiognomy," portraits of social customs and character types subjectively captured; a leading practitioner of this genre was Mihail Kogălniceanu (1817–91). The choice of the essay as a preferred vehicle was largely due to its flexibility, which was convenient for the insecurities of writers in a fragile and peripheral society.

More than any of the above-mentioned contemporaries, Alexandru Odobescu inscribes himself in the Western modes of the essay. His chief work of this kind was Pseudokynegeticos, sau fals tratat de vinatoare (1875; Pseudokynegeticos, or a false treatise on hunting). Originally this work was intended as a preface to a genuine textbook guide to the craft of hunting (written by a friend), but it became too long and was consequently published separately. It is a charming, whimsical, and ironic mosaic of references to hunting in many literatures (classical and modern) and arts, but it also contains personal reminiscences, natural descriptions (one of them, particularly famous, evokes the charm of the plains of Southern Wallachia), and is interspersed with passages from folktales and folk poetry. Odobescu relied heavily on intertextuality and on the contrasting effects obtained by juxtaposing local Romanian materials with quotes from Greek and Latin, as well as French, German, and English authors. Etymologies that we might now call “deconstructive” are used as connective elements. The style is ornate and digressive, with mockpompous passages, yet it always manages to remain conversational, with intimate addresses to the friend whose work he was supposed to preface. The last chapter is left blank and bears the title “the reader’s favorite chapter.” Light sarcastic allusions to the social and cultural state of Romania appear as asides. The general message of the essay is the jovial and amiable praise of a quiet, contented life in the company of natural and literary beauty.

Odobescu’s manner is expressed equally well in Citeva ore la Snagov (1862; A few hours spent in Snagov). Snagov is a small village by a lake near Bucharest, at the time itself nothing more than a small and sleepy capital city. Odobescu is particularly interested in Snagov monastery, the eldest parts of which date from the 15th century. Humorously self-deprecating erudition, enchantment in the face of the surrounding landscape, and nostalgic historical evocation are combined with a barely noticeable narrative line. Odobescu skips nonchalantly from romanticized history to a consideration of the best way to dress and cook the tasty fish inhabiting the lake by the monastery.

In some ways Odobescu is a belated Romantic, resuming the manner of Charles Lamb, Leigh Hunt, or even Karl Julius Weber, in his search for the playful side of erudition and knowledge. From another point of view his writings are in line with those of his (particularly French) symbolist and aesthetic contemporaries, giving voice to a kind of impressionistic humanism linked to an elite readership of taste and education. Finally, it cannot be denied that, despite his essentially cosmopolitan orientation, Odobescu responded with some subtlety to the appeal of national glorification, whether in its historical past, in the exaltation of the Romanian landscape, or in the highlighting of traditional folk music and storytelling. He was effective and eloquent in promoting national values and images precisely because he did not avoid placing them in the light of cosmopolitan taste; it is also fair to add that he thus tacitly undermined the emerging rhetoric of localist chauvinism. Odobescu differs from other Romanian contemporaries precisely in having chosen the frivolous discourse of the conversational essay, in which all these threads are pleasingly woven together.

VIRGIL NEMOIANU

Biography

Son of general Ion Odobescu. Born in Bucharest, 23 June 1834. Studied at a lycée in Paris, baccalauréat, 1853; literature and archaeology at the University of Paris, graduated 1855. Married Sașa Prejbeanu, 1858: one daughter; often apart from his wife, and had affairs with other women. Cabinet minister for education, 1863; head clerk, Ministry of Foreign Affairs, 1865; prosecutor, Court of Appeal. Traveled in Switzerland and Italy, 1870, in connection with his discovery and description of the “Petroasa treasure,” a collection of objects made from precious metals, of Gothic origin, found on Romanian territory; also traveled to several other countries, including Denmark and Turkey. Opposed the tendency toward artificially latinizing the literary language. Elected to the Romanian Academy, 1870. Professor of archaeology, University of Bucharest, from 1874. Secretary of the Romanian legation, Paris, 1882,. Principal of a teacher-training institute, Bucharest; principal of the National Educational Institute, 1891. Died (suicide by morphine overdose) in Bucharest, 10 November 1895.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Cîteva ore la Snagov, 1862; edited by G.Pienescu, 1961

Pseudo-cynegeticos, sau fals tratat de vînatoare, 1875; edited by G. Pienescu, 1961

Pagini regăsite, edited by G.Șerban, 1965 Note de călătorie, edited by Corneliu Popescu, 1981

Other writings: short stories, several dozen scholarly articles, an anthology of folktales and one of folk poetry, and a history of archaeology (1877). Also translated both literary and scholarly works.

Collected works editions: Opere complete, 4 vols., 1906–19; Opere, edited by Tudor Vianu, 2 vols., 1955; Opere, 12 vols., 1965–92 (in progress).

Further Reading

Curticeanu, Doina, Odobescu, sau lectura formelor simbolice, Bucharest: Minerva, 1982

Manolescu, Nicolae, Introducere in opera lui Alexandru Odobescu, Bucharest: Minerva, 1976

Păcurariu, Dumitru, A.I.Odobescu, Bucharest: ESPLA, 1966

Pandele, Rodica, editor, Alexandru Odobescu: Antologie critica, Bucharest: Eminescu, 1976

Oliphant, Margaret

British, 1828–1897

Though better known as a novelist, Margaret Oliphant, one of the most prolific Victorian writers, was an influential critic and periodical essayist. Her articles appeared in a range of journals, including St. James's Gazette, Cornhill Magazine, Contemporary Review, Fraser's Magazine, and the Spectator.

However, it was her long association with Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine that afforded her the most powerful platform. Over a period of more than 40 years from June 1854 to almost the end of her life Oliphant was Blackwood's major literary reviewer, her critical output encompassing fiction, biography, history, religion, poetry, and works of reference. Less frequently she reviewed art exhibitions and the theater, while also publishing travel sketches, biographical essays, and social commentary. Her nonfiction books, particularly biographies and cultural histories, share some of the stylistic features of her periodical articles, but she did not seek to republish those essays in book form.

Oliphant's productivity affected both her work and her reputation. In her lifetime she was irritated by any praise of what after her death was characterized as her "marvellous industry," even though she herself described her position at Blackwood's as a "sort of general utility woman in the Magazine" (Annals of a Publishing House, vol. 3, 1898). She frequently had several pieces within one issue. Her descriptive sketches—sharpened by witty asides and her ability to conjure up an animated crowd scene, constantly switching perspective from the panoramic to the close-up—have a lively sense of ambience. Her work was usually produced at speed and is inevitably uneven in quality. At its best it offers perceptive judgments of literature and a sharply observed assessment of her society. A vein of irony enlivens her commentary and often renders problematic what are on the surface conformist opinions.

Though more radical in her sympathies than the Tory Blackwood's, Oliphant's working relationship with John Blackwood proved successful professionally and socially. Her readers were the educated, relatively conservative middle class, and she envisaged herself addressing a mainly masculine audience. Some critics argue that she adopted a male voice. Certainly she occasionally referred to herself as if to a man, and for one of her series of discursive commentaries ("The Old Saloon," January 1887–December 1892) took on a persona writing from the distinctly male space of Blackwood's original library; it should be noted, however, that she also wrote elsewhere under the sobriquet "A Dowager." In many of her essays the writer's sex is indeterminate. Blackwood's policy of anonymity suited her, and she strongly maintained the advantage of anonymity for critics since it liberated them from "embarrassing difficulties" when discussing the work of acquaintances ("The Rev. W. Lucas Collins," 1887).

Oliphant's voice can be at once self-deprecatory and authoritative. Admitting her judgment to be "uninstructed" she yet delivers it in the magisterial first-person plural—"Speaking as one of the unlearned, a heathen man and a publican, we yet shudder at ourselves when we say..." ("London in January," 1886). Her tone shifts between familiar alliance with the reader and formal discourse. Essays opening with an authoritative statement on the general then glide into the conversational or focus upon the particular. So a literary review ("Sensation Novels," 1862) is launched from the state of the nation: "Ten years ago the world in general had come to a singular crisis in its existence. The age was lost in self-admiration." Her review essays give scope for broad discussion of cultural trends, commonly covering works by diverse authors or an assessment of a writer's oeuvre, dealing with different branches of the arts, or, like "The Literature of the Last Fifty Years" (1887), offering a retrospective assessment.

It is unfortunate that Oliphant's critical capabilities are today often characterized by her negative view of Jude the Obscure ("The Anti-Marriage League," 1896). The distinctive, acerbic tone of her writing makes her an easy target for selective quotation, but as some scholars have recently urged, her views are more complex than such quotations suggest. Even where she regarded a subgenre as having a vitiating influence, as she did with both the sensational novel, whose Count Fosco and Magdalens "make the worse appear the better cause" ("Sensation Novels"), and the fiction of the "alarming revolution" following "the invasion of Jane Eyre," she praised genius where she found it. Wilkie Collins she rated highly and Jane Eyre she considered "one of the most remarkable works of modern times" ("Modern Novelists, Great and Small," 1855; see also "The Sisters Brontë," 1897).

Equally, her views on the Woman Question, which have been regarded as conservative, even antifeminist, cannot be accurately gauged from the antisuffrage remarks in the earlier essays ("Laws Concerning Women," 1856; "The Condition of Women," 1858; "The Great Unrepresented," 1866). Oliphant did not trust the power of the law to right women's wrongs, and maintained the importance and dignity of a mother's responsibilities; but she approved of education for women, and over the decades modified her opinions (e.g. "The Grievances of Women," 1880). In her review of the novel Ideala ("The Old Saloon," 1889) she referred sympathetically to "the singular and scarcely recognised revolution which has taken place in the position of women during the last generation."

Oliphant's commentaries on the visual arts emphasized a society which creates and consumes art as much as the art itself. The value of making art accessible to the people as a whole, the dangers of private patronage, the role of the gallery in national life, the relationship of art to commercial interests, and the effects of industrialization and social change, were constant themes (e.g. "Art in May," 1875; "The Royal Academy," 1876).

Oliphant's own art was produced, not in a quiet study, or cloistered library, but amid the reality of everyday domestic life. This sense of commonplace experience colored her theory of the arts. Thus her notion of the tragic was integrally linked to the idea of disillusionment in ordinary life. "Hamlet is the greatest instance of that disenchantment... about the bitterest pang of which the soul is capable" ("Hamlet," 1879).

Blackwood's effusive obituary tribute—"the most accomplished periodical writer of her day"—indicates Oliphant's contemporary influence in that genre, an influence which modern critics are now reassessing.

BARBARA MARY ONSLOW

Biography

Born Margaret Oliphant Wilson, 4 April 1828 in Wallyford, Midlothian. As a child lived in Lasswade, near Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Liverpool. No formal education. Published her first novel, 1849. Married Francis Wilson Oliphant (a cousin), 1852 (died, 1859): two daughters (one died in infancy, the other in youth) and four sons (two died in infancy, two in adulthood). Moved to London, 1852. Contributor to various journals, primarily Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine, from 1854. Traveled to Italy for her husband's health, 1859; moved to Edinburgh, 1860, Ealing, London, 1861, and Italy, Switzerland, and France, 1863–65; lived in Windsor, Berkshire, from 1865. From 1868 her brother Frank and his family became increasingly dependent on her financially. Traveled to Jerusalem, 1890. Moved to Wimbledon, south London, 1896. Died in Wimbledon, 25 June 1897.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose (Most of Oliphant's essays have not yet been published in book form.)

Historical Sketches of the Reign of George II, 2 vols., 1869

Historical Sketches of the Reign of Queen Anne, 1894; as Historical Characters, 1894

Other writings: many novels, biography, an autobiography, and a history of Blackwood's publishing house.

Bibliographies

Clarke, John Stock, Margaret Oliphant: A Bibliography, St. Lucia: University of Queensland Department of English, 1986

Houghton, Walter E., editor, The Wellesley Index to Victorian Periodicals 1824–1900, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 5 vols., 1966–89: "Bibliographies of Contributors" lists Oliphant's essays and criticism in those periodicals covered by the index

Further Reading

Colby, Robert A., and Vineta Colby, "Mrs. Oliphant's Scotland: The Romance of Reality," in Nineteenth-Century Scottish Fiction, edited by Ian Campbell, Manchester: Carcanet, and New York: Barnes and Noble, 1979:89–104

Colby, Vineta, and Robert A. Colby, The Equivocal Virtue: Mrs. Oliphant and the Victorian Literary Market Place, Hamden, Connecticut: Archon, 1966

Jay, Elisabeth, Mrs. Oliphant: "A Fiction to Herself": A Literary Life, Oxford: Clarendon Press, and New York: Oxford University Press, 1995

Kramer, Dale, "The Cry That Binds: Oliphant's Theory of Domestic Tragedy," in Margaret Oliphant: Critical Essays on a Gentle Subversive, edited by D.J. Trela,

Selinsgrove, Pennsylvania: Susquehanna University Press, 1995:147–64

Trela, D.J., “Two Margaret Oliphants Review George Eliot,” George Eliot—George Henry Lewes Studies (September 1993): 37–60

Trela, D.J., “Introduction: Discovering the Gentle Subversive,” in Margaret Oliphant: Critical Essays on a Gentle Subversive, edited by Trela, Selinsgrove, Pennsylvania: Susquehanna University Press, 1995:11–27

Williams, Merryn, Margaret Oliphant: A Critical Biography, Basingstoke: Macmillan, and New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1986

Williams, Merryn, “Feminist or Anti-Feminist? Oliphant and the Woman Question,” in Margaret Oliphant: Critical Essays on a Gentle Subversive, edited by D.J.Trela, Selinsgrove, Pennsylvania: Susquehanna University Press, 1995:165–80

On the Sublime

by “Longinus,” written probably c. 1st century CE

On the Sublime—to accept the usual English translation of υψος (hypsos)—must be taken on its own terms, as we know nothing for certain of its author, not even his (assuming a male) name. The earliest manuscript, which dates from 10th-century Paris, ascribes the work to “Dionysius or Longinus,” but internal evidence suggests that it was written in the 1st century CE, and there is no early evidence about the authorship. However, it became one of the most respected and discussed pieces of classical literary criticism, and, with its translation into English in the mid-17th century, helped to give at least temporary currency to a critical concept that eventually paved the way for Romanticism.

Its argument is presented in the lively form of a letter to a friend, Terentianus, on its topic, apparently in answer to an account recently published, and now lost, by one Cecilius. Longinus—to use the conventional if unsubstantiated name—sets out to correct this account, and does so in a cogent manner, with plenty of illustrations from his favorite authors, particularly Homer. The tone is relaxed, as that of a well-informed mind communicating with an equal.

Longinus begins by asserting his central assumption, taken to be shared by Terentianus, that “sublimity consists in a certain excellence and distinction in expression, and that it is from this source alone that the greatest poets and historians have acquired their preeminence and won for themselves an eternity of fame.” The emphasis is on the power of this “elevated language” to “entrance” rather than persuade its hearers, for Longinus has in mind an audience rather than a readership, and an audience for both poetry and oratory—his examples are taken from both areas with equal authority. This idea of the “entrancement” (or, in other translations, “transporting”) of the listeners is central to the whole argument, for it is asserted to be the power that raises the sublime beyond the qualities to be found in ordinary oratory or poetry. Longinus confronts the question that this might be expected to give rise to—is there an art of the sublime, and can one develop it in oneself?—and answers affirmatively: though nature provides the basic energies that carry the sublime, its exponent needs to know how to avoid errors which spoil the effect, such as frigidity, bombast, puerility, and emotionalism.

From this starting point, Longinus goes on to discuss his topic under five headings, giving a clear sense of a developing argument. The first two qualities are said to be largely innate: “the ability to form grand conceptions” is derived from “nobility of soul”; and “the stimulus of powerful and inspired emotion” comes only to those who train themselves to receive it, partly by “imitation and emulation of the great historians and poets of the past,” particularly Homer and Plato. The other qualities discussed are more technical. The third is “the proper formation of...figures of thought and figures of speech,” which are considered through a range of technical terms—adjuration, asyndeton, inversion, polyptoton, periphrasis—in a way that makes them all clear to the reader. The fourth source is “the creation of a noble diction,” considered in terms of language and imagery, although the section includes an interesting digression on the idea that genius is never flawless, while mediocrity may be. The final section concerns “the arrangement of the words in the due order,” and is particularly emphatic on the power of rhythm to “entrance” its hearers.

On the Sublime ends with a lively coda, in which Longinus speculates—rather in the spirit of our own postmodernist day—on why, with so many competent men in public life, there are so few “sublime and transcendent natures,” so that contemporary literature exhibits “a great and world-wide dearth.” One argument is that this is because of the destruction of Roman democracy in the replacement of the Republic by the Empire. Longinus’ view is rather that it is because of the domination of society by the love of money (“a disease that makes us petty-minded”) and the love of pleasure (“an utterly ignoble attribute”). This contributes to the overall liveliness of the piece, which reads less like academic literary criticism and more like the reflections of a highly intelligent and well-informed general reader (or listener).

The work breaks off with a promise to examine in more detail the importance of the emotions in literature, and especially the sublime. Although that discussion does not survive, there is enough in what does to have inspired much subsequent discussion, particularly in late 18th-century England, with Edmund Burke’s Philosophical Enquiry into...the Sublime and Beautiful (1757) as the best-known response. Critics seeking to find an explanation and justification of the power, as well as the sanity, of art found the term “sublime” helpful in their quest. There is a resurgence of interest in the idea today, expressed in books like Peter De Bolla’s The Discourse of the Sublime (1989), as criticism strives to answer the same questions about power in writing, now in a context in which the idea of the unconscious plays a significant part.

On the Sublime is usually described as a piece of literary criticism, or even (in the Oxford Companion to English Literature) as a treatise. The latter term is misleading, and literary criticism can be conducted in a variety of modes, including the poem, as Horace (e.g. Poetic Art) and Pope (e.g. Essay on Criticism, Essay on Man) show. While it may be appropriate to consider Aristotle’s Poetics a treatise, the informal tone and the personal address of On the Sublime reveal it to be a precursor of the essay, however much its central sections aspire to the rigors of categorization. The last section, with its sudden shift into consideration of contemporary cultural debates, as they would now be termed, is evidence that we are in the presence of a writer untrammelled by external considerations, with the essayist’s taste for the immediate and the personal.

See also Classical Influences

Editions

On the Sublime, edited by A.O.Prickard, 1906, revised edition, 1946, and D.A.Russell, 1964; translated by J.Hall, 1652; many subsequent translations, including by A.O.Prickard, 1906, W. H.Fyfe (Loeb Edition), in Demetrius on Style, 19x7, G.M.A. Gruber, 1957, D.A.Russell, 1965, and T.S.Dorsch, 1965

Further Reading

- Brody, Jules, Boileau and Longinus, Geneva: Droz, 1958
- Coleman, Dorothy, "Montaigne and Longinus," Bibliothèque d'Humanisme et Renaissance 47, no. 2 (1985): 405–13
- Costa, Gustavo, "Longinus's Treatise on the Sublime in the Age of Arcadia," Nouvelles de la République des Lettres 1 (1981): 65–86
- De Bolla, Peter, The Discourse of the Sublime: Readings in History, Aesthetics and the Subject, Oxford: Blackwell, 1989
- Guerlac, Suzanne, "Longinus and the Subject of the Sublime," New Literary History 16, no. 2 (Winter 1985): 275–97
- Hamashita, Masahiro, "Genealogy of the Aesthetics of the Sublime: To Addison and Shaftesbury," Kobe College Studies 38, no. 3 (March 1992): 102–27
- Henn, Thomas R., Longinus and English Criticism, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1934
- Logan, J.-L., "Montaigne et Longin: Une Nouvelle Hypothèse," Revue d'Histoire Littéraire de la France 83, no. 3 (1983): 355–70
- Macksey, Richard, "Longinus Reconsidered," MLN 108, no. 5 (December 1993): 913–34
- Monk, Samuel Holt, The Sublime: A Study of Critical Theories in XVIII-Century England, Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1960 (original edition, 1935)

d'Ors, Eugenio

Spanish, 1881–1954

Eugenio d'Ors, Catalan philosopher and essayist, was to a lesser extent a novelist and playwright. There are two distinct periods of his work, the first written in Catalan and identified with his native region of Catalonia, the second turned toward Castile and written in Spanish after his alienation from the Catalans.

The Catalan period of his life and work was of primary importance to the Catalan Renaixença (Renaissance), a time of great political and literary splendor in Catalonia. D'Ors' cultural and political activism began in 1898, when he first used the pen name

Xenius, and ended in 1920, when he broke with Puig i Cadafalch, then President of the Mancomunitat of Catalonia, where d'Ors had served as Secretary of Education.

Through the prestigious newspaper La Veu de Catalunya (The Voice of Catalonia) he began publishing his “glosses,” brief essays in which d'Ors gave his readers a probing and incisive series of “quotidian blows in favor of culture,” as José Ortega y Gasset would say. He reported on current news in the world of culture (philosophy, art, literature, politics) while also striving to extract the essential and profound within the framework of time as a lasting and flexible concept.

It is hard to classify the glosses strictly as essays, given their concise form prescribed by a daily press publication. They are a hybrid form between learned articles and general information, combining observation and invention, being more subjective than objective, more arbitrary than impartial, more literary than scholarly. They are expository rather than argumentative, with a felicitous intuition verging on the poetic.

The glosari were seminal in the development of d'Ors' ideology into a coherent system. For instance, d'Ors formed the notion of catalanidad (what it is to be Catalan) in a selection of glosses, which became the novel La ben plantada (1911; The woman of fine physique). In it the heroine Theresa personifies harmony, culture, tradition, and classicism—all virtues exalted by the cultural and political Catalonia of the early 1900s. Thus Theresa became a symbol of all that was considered the essence of being Catalan.

