

Encyclopedia of the Essay

Edited by Tracy Chevalier

Also available as a printed book see title verso for ISBN details

Encyclopedia of THE ESSAY

Encyclopedia of THE ESSAY

Editor

TRACY CHEVALIER

FITZROY DEARBORN PUBLISHERS
LONDON AND CHICAGO

Copyright © 1997 by
FITZROY DEARBORN PUBLISHERS

All rights reserved including the right of reproduction in whole or in part in any form. For information write to:

FITZROY DEARBORN PUBLISHERS
70 East Walton Street
Chicago, Illinois 60611
USA

or

11 Rathbone Place
London W1P 1DE
England

British Library Cataloguing in Publication Data

Encyclopedia of the essay

1. Essays—Encyclopedias 2. Essays—History and criticism—Encyclopedias
I. Chevalier, Tracy, 1962–
809.4'003

ISBN 0-203-30368-7 Master e-book ISBN

ISBN 1-884964-30-3 (Print Edition)

Library of Congress Cataloging in Publication Data is available.

First published in the USA and UK 1997

This edition published in the Taylor & Francis e-Library, 2006.

“To purchase your own copy of this or any of Taylor & Francis or Routledge’s collection of thousands of eBooks please go to www.eBookstore.tandf.co.uk.”

Cover illustration: from the title page of Essayes by Sir William Cornwallis, the Younger; 1632 printing

CONTENTS

	page
Editor's Note	vii
Advisers and Contributors	ix
List of Entries	xvii
Preface by Graham Good	xxx
Encyclopedia of the Essay	1
Title Index	1947
General Index	2054
Notes on Advisers and Contributors	2122

EDITOR'S NOTE

The entries in this book were chosen primarily by the advisory board (listed on page ix), with advice from contributors when appropriate. Choosing what is to go in reference books is notoriously difficult. There are the subjects that must obviously have entries, and those that must obviously not. In between lies a vast block of those for which an argument can be made for or against. This is where the problems lie, and I expect our choices will inevitably raise a few quibbles.

Some gaps reflect the nature of the essay and essay scholarship rather than ignorance. There are markedly fewer entries on women, for instance, because historically women's opinions have not been encouraged, certainly not in written form. Moreover, when women did write they usually chose genres that made them money; the essay has not been known for being lucrative. In the 20th century women at last gained both leisure time and an authoritative voice; that change is reflected here in the greater number of entries on contemporary women writers. Nor does every country have a survey, even when there are several entries on individuals. Italian essay writing, for example, dates from Machiavelli, but there has never yet been any consideration of the Italian essay as a whole.

While the majority of the entries are biographical, in a handful of cases when an author's oeuvre is not sufficiently essayistic to warrant an entry and yet he has written a significant individual essay, that essay has its own entry: e.g. John Locke's An Essay Concerning Human Understanding or Alexander Pope's An Essay on Criticism.

The Essays and Related Prose lists at the end of biographical entries are selective rather than comprehensive, listing the most important essay works; the date following the title is of first publication, followed sometimes by a modern edition. Also listed are available selections and compilations. Further reading lists have as a rule been suggested by contributors.

Names and phrases in bold throughout the text indicate topics with their own entries.

Individual essays mentioned in the text are followed by the date of first publication, either in periodical or book form, though occasionally the date written and the date published are both listed if they are far enough apart to be noteworthy.

I would like to thank the advisory board for their spirited advice which helped me launch the project, and the contributors for their enthusiasm which kept me going through the endless days and nights of it. In particular, I am grateful for the help of Melba Cuddy-Keene, who wrote the first entry (on Virginia Woolf) and showed us all the way.

Thanks go to Mark Hawkins-Dady, Susan Mackervoy, Tracey Mais, and Carol Jones for their work on various parts of the book; also to Jonathan Drori for explaining the mysteries of the computer, e-mail, and the Internet, as well as for putting up with piles of manuscript in a corner of our flat for three years. Thanks too to Lesley Henderson, long-time partner in reference crime, who could be relied on for both sound editorial advice and a good line on the sometimes absurd nature of our work.

Thanks, finally, to my editor Daniel Kirkpatrick, who taught me how to make reference books in the first place; he paid me his highest compliment by leaving me alone for two years to get on with it, and then came along and quietly corrected my many and varied mistakes, making it a better book.

It has been a pleasure rather than a trial to work on this volume. Every time I go into a bookstore and see a newly appointed Essay section I am more certain that the appearance of Encyclopedia of the Essay reflects a growing interest. It's nice to feel relevant.

TRACY CHEVALIER

ADVISERS

Chris Anderson
Robert Atwan
Alexander J. Butrym
Richard M. Chadbourne
Anna Lisa Crone
Peter G. Earle
Graham Good
R. Lane Kauffmann
Phillip Lopate
John A. McCarthy
Janet Pérez
Elizabeth Perkins
D. E. Pollard

CONTRIBUTORS

Stephen M. Adams
Onésimo T. Almeida
Daniel Altamiranda
Nora M. Alter
Harry Amana
Adelaide P. Amore
Andrew J. Angyal
Janet Baker
Jacqueline Bardolph
Maurine H. Beasley
Gino Bedani
Michael Beddow
Ronald J. Black
Charles Blinderman
Ed Block, Jr.
Alfredo Bonadeo
Vittoria Borsò
Maura Brady
Mary Lee Bretz
Stephen W. Brown
Martine Watson Brownley
Siobhan Craft Brownson
Michael Bruce

Ralph W.Buechler
John J.Burke, Jr.
William Bush
Robert Carballo
Geoffrey Carnall
Federico A.Chachagua
Richard M.Chadbourne
Linda H.Chance
David W.Chapman
Kathryn Chittick
Albrecht Classen
Edith W.Clowes
William Connor
Thomas L.Cooksey
Kevin L.Cope
Aurelian Crăiuțu
Anna Lisa Crone
Christine Crow
Melba Cuddy-Keane
Dalia Daniel
David Darby
Sarah B.Daugherty
Pamela Davidson
David R.Davies
Duane H.Davis
Charles de Paolo
Augustinus P.Dierick
Marion Doebeling
Diane Dowdey
Joseph Duemer
Klay Dyer
Wilton Eckley
Ronald Egan
Hans Eichner
Stanisław Eile
Antonio Elorza
John Elsworth
Rainer Emig
Sandra A.Engel
Steven Epley
Colin Evans
Timothy J.Evans
Lydia Fakundiny
Jennifer Farrar
Peter Faulkner

Robert K.Faulkner
John Ferns
John Fletcher
I.P.Foote
Richard D.Fulton
Steven H.Gale
Blanca M.García Monsivais
Michael D.Garval
Daniel D.Gilfillan
Kathleen M.Glenn
Willi Goetschel
Miguel Gomes
José Luis Gómez-Martínez
Vivian Greene-Gantzberg
Benoît Grevisse
Carlos M.Gutiérrez
John H.Haddox
Garry L.Hagberg
Nicholas Hammond
William E.Harkins
Mark Harman
Thomas S.Harrington
Jane Gary Harris
Dale E.Haskell
Donald M.Hassler
Mark Hawkins-Dady
Heather Henderson
Paul Hendon
Laurie Hergenhan
Harry Heseltine
Douglas Hesse
Astrid Heyer
Peter Hinchcliffe
Darrell Hinchcliffe
Petr Holman
John R.Holmes
Jiří Holý
Brian Horowitz
Bernard Howells
Alina C.Hunt
Maura Ives
Gregory S.Jackson
Zbigniew Janowski
Gloria Godfrey Jones
Jep C.Jonson

Linda A.Julian
Arpad Kadarkay
Andrzej Karcz
William H.Katra
R.Lane Kauffmann
Karen A.Keely
John Pavel Kehlen
Arnold Keller
Gary Kelly
Malcolm Kelsall
Ian Ker
Sonia I.Ketchian
Rolf Kieser
George L.Kline
Gerhard P.Knapp
Wulf Koepke
Michael S.Koppisch
Krzysztof Kozłowski
Allen J.Kuharski
James M.Kuist
Edward T.Larkin
David Lazar
Anthony Levi
Marc Lits
Donald W.Livingston
Rosemary Lloyd
Jennifer Lonergan
Luis Lorenzo-Rivero
Barbara Lounsberry
Steven Lynn
John A.McCarthy
Christopher P.McClintick
Brian McCrea
Margery Palmer McCulloch
Josephine McDonagh
Richard D.McGhee
Alan T.McKenzie
Susan Mackervoy
John McLaren
James Maharg
John L.Mahoney
Laurent Mailhot
Gilles Marcotte
Christine Masuy
Beverly J.Matiko

Sigrid Mayer
Laurence W.Mazzeno
Benoît Melançon
Thomas Mermall
David Midgley
Călin-Andrei Mihăilescu
Anthony Miller
Stephen Miller
P.M.Mitchell
Katia Mitova-Janowski
Gerald Monsman
Howard Moss
Vanna Motta
Agnes C.Müller
James Mulvihill
Pedro Maria Muñoz
Isobel Murray
Michael D.Murray
Brian Musgrove
Eunice Doman Myers
William F.Naufftus
Virgil Nemoianu
Catherine O'Neil
Charles L.O'Neill
Barbara Mary Onslow
José Miguel Oviedo
George S.Pahomov
Pamela Park
Paul Nicholas Pavich
Ann Pearson
Ted-Larry Pebworth
Janet Pérez
Elizabeth Perkins
Jill Piggott
Mary Ellen Pitts
D.E.Pollard
John H.R.Polt
Richard Polt
Valentina Polukhina
Jonathan F.S.Post
John T.Price
Suzanne R.Pucci
Michael Pursglove
Nanxiu Qian
Patricia Rae

Harold Raley
Nigel Rapport
Velma Bourgeois Richmond
Daniel E.Ritchie
William Roberts
Ian Ross Robertson
Daniel Robinson
Dan Roche
John H.Rogers
Lourdes Rojas
Judson Rosengrant
Jan Peter F.van Rosevelt
Noel Rowe
Joaquín Roy
Pilar G.Sáenz
Diego Saglia
Ciro A.Sandoval-B.
Verónica Saunero-Ward
Lilia Savova
Richard Schell
Barry P.Scherr
Karen Schiff
Eric Schwab
Richard Sheldon
Alvin F.Sherman, Jr.
James R.Simmons, Jr.
Anne Skabarnicki
David A.Sloane
Christopher Smith
Vivian Smith
Robert V.Smythe
Alvin Snider
María Soledad Carrasco
Steven P.Sondrup
Clara Speer
Barry Spurr
George J.Stack
David Staines
Robert C.Steensma
Patricia Owen Steiner
Ralph Stewart
Staci L.Stone
Richard E.Strassberg
Ned Stuckey-French
David Suchoff

Imre Szeman
Richard C.Taylor
Rodney Taylor
Carmen Chaves Tesser
Gillian Thomas
Matthew Titolo
Richard C.Tobias
Tamara Trojanowska
Brian Turner
Pierre L.Ullman
Nicasio Urbina
Antonio Urrello
Andrius Valevičius
James M.van der Laan
Camille Villafañe
Charlotte Zoë Walker
Harry Walsh
George Wasserman
Laura D.Weeks
Paul L.Wenske
Theresa Werner
Alan G.H.West
Terry Whalen
Kathleen M.Wheeler
Keith Wilson
Michael Winkler
Allen G.Wood
Servanne Woodward
Linda Mills Woolsey
Jerald Zaslove
William Zeiger
Robert Zweig

LIST OF ENTRIES

Chinua Achebe
Joseph Addison
Theodor W. Adorno
The Adventurer
James Agee
Die Akzente
Alain
Josefa Amar y Borbón
American Essay
The American Scholar
The Anatomy of Melancholy
Alfred Andersch
Aphorism
Apothegm
Germán Arciniegas
Hannah Arendt
Areopagitica
Matthew Arnold
Athenäum
The Atlantic Monthly
W.H. Auden
Australian Essay
Autobiographical Essay
Francisco Ayala
Manuel Azaña
Azorín
Francis Bacon
James Baldwin
Jean-Louis Guez de Balzac
Stanisław Barańczak
Roland Barthes
Georges Bataille
Charles Baudelaire
Pierre Bayle
Simone de Beauvoir
Max Beerbohm
Vissarion Belinskii
André Belleau

Andrés Bello
Hilaire Belloc
Andrei Belyi
Robert Benchley
Julien Benda
Frans G.Bengtsson
Walter Benjamin
Gottfried Benn
Max Bense
A.C.Benson
Georges Bernanos
Wendell Berry
Biography and the Essay
Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine
Aleksandr Blok
Rudolf Borchardt
Jorge Luis Borges
Paul Bourget
Boy-Żeleński
Jacques Brault
Otokar Březina
British Essay
Joseph Brodsky
E.K.Brown
Sir Thomas Browne
Ferdinand Brunetière
Stanisław Brzozowski
Vincent Buckley
Arthur Buies
Bulgarian Essay
Jacob Christoph Burckhardt
Edmund Burke
Kenneth Burke
John Burroughs
Hubert Butler
Michel Butor
José Cadalso
George Călinescu
Italo Calvino
Albert Camus
Canadian Essay (English)
Canadian Essay (French)
Antônio Cândido
Elias Canetti
Karel Čapek

Luis Cardoza y Aragón
Thomas Carlyle
Bliss Carman
Rosario Castellanos
Américo Castro
Carlo Cattaneo
Rosa Chacel
Chapter
Character Sketch
Characters
Chateaubriand
Nikolai Chernyshevskii
Earl of Chesterfield
G.K.Chesterton
Chinese Essay
Cicero
E.M.Cioran
Marcus Clarke
Classical Influences
Samuel Taylor Coleridge
The Compleat Angler
The Confessions
Cyril Connolly
Sir William Cornwallis, the Younger
Critical Essay
Benedetto Croce
Cuadernos Americanos
Euclides da Cunha
Ernst Robert Curtius
Olof von Dalin
Rubén Darío
Charles Darwin
Robertson Davies
The Defence of Poesy
Daniel Defoe
Thomas De Quincey
Bernard De Voto
Dialogue
Charles Dickens
Denis Diderot
Joan Didion
Annie Dillard
Discourse on Method
John Donne
Fedor Dostoevskii

Frederick Douglass
W.E.B. Du Bois
Charles Du Bos
Friedrich Dürrenmatt
Umberto Eco
Maria Edgeworth
The Edinburgh Review
John Eglinton
Loren Eiseley
Vilhelm Ekelund
George Eliot
T.S.Eliot
Ralph Waldo Emerson
Encyclopedias and the Essay
Hans Magnus Enzensberger
Erasmus
El Espectador
An Essay Concerning Human Understanding
Essay Film
An Essay of Dramatic Poesy
An Essay on Comedy
An Essay on Criticism
An Essay on Man
An Essay on the Principle of Population
The Examiner
Die Fackel
Familiar Essay
Benito Jerónimo Feijóo y Montenegro
Vergílio Ferreira
Ludwig Feuerbach
Feuilleton
Johann Gottlieb Fichte
Henry Fielding
M.F.K.Fisher
Bernard de Fontenelle
E.M.Forster
Georg Forster
Benjamin Franklin
Paulo Freire
French Essay
Sigmund Freud
Gilberto Freyre
Max Frisch
Northrop Frye
Carlos Fuentes

Margaret Fuller
Ángel Ganivet
William H. Gass
The Georgia Review
German Essay
Mikhail Gershenzon
André Gide
Vladimir Giliarovskii
Lidiia Ginzburg
Natalia Ginzburg
William Godwin
Johann Wolfgang von Goethe
Oliver Goldsmith
Witold Gombrowicz
José Luis González
Nadine Gordimer
Maksim Gor'kii
Stephen Jay Gould
Remy de Gourmont
Baltasar Gracián
Antonio Gramsci
Günter Grass
Dorothy Green
Graham Greene
Die Grenzboten
Herman Grimm
Lionel Groulx
Francesco Guicciardini
Roderick Haig-Brown
Peter Hamm
Harper's
Václav Havel
William Hazlitt
Gunnar Heiberg
Martin Heidegger
Pedro Henríquez Ureña
Zbigniew Herbert
Johann Gottfried Herder
Gustaw Herling-Grudziński
Aleksandr Herzen
Historical Essay
Edward Hoagland
Hugo von Hofmannsthal
Ludvig Holberg
Oliver Wendell Holmes

A.D.Hope
Eugenio María de Hostos
Irving Howe
Joseph Howe
William Dean Howells
Ricarda Huch
David Hume
Humorous Essay
Leigh Hunt
Aldous Huxley
T.H.Huxley
The Idler
Washington Irving
Viacheslav Ivanov
Henry James
William James Japanese Essay
Richard Jefferies
Samuel Johnson
Journal
Journal des Débats
Journalism and the Essay
Gaspar Melchor de Jovellanos
Ernst Jünger
Kamo no Chōmei
Immanuel Kant
Kenkō
Nils Kjær
Heinrich von Kleist
Leszek Kołakowski
Jan Kott
Joseph Wood Krutch
Jean de La Bruyère
Charles Lamb
Per Lange
La Rochefoucauld
Jean Larose
Mariano José de Larra
D.H.Lawrence
Stephen Leacock
Jean Le Moyne
Konstantin Leont'ev
Giacomo Leopardi
Aldo Leopold
Gotthold Ephraim Lessing

Letter
Primo Levi
C.S.Lewis
Liang Yuchun
Liberté
A.J.Liebling
Lima la horrible
Literary Theory and the Essay
Liu Zongyuan
Barry Lopez
Eduardo Lourenço
Lu Xun
Georg Lukács
Peter McArthur
Thomas Babington Macaulay
Mary McCarthy
Niccolò Machiavelli
Hugh MacLennan
Archibald MacMechan
Andrew Macphail
John McPhee
Salvador de Madariaga
Ramiro de Maeztu
Norman Mailer
Stéphane Mallarmé
Eduardo Mallea
Osip Mandel'shtam
Heinrich Mann
Thomas Mann
Julián Marías
José Carlos Mariátegui
Marivaux
Georgi Markov
José Martí
Carmen Martín Gaité
Harriet Martineau
Ezequiel Martínez Estrada
Karl Marx
Henri Massis
Maxim
Giuseppe Mazzini
Medical Essay
Meditation
Meditations
H.L.Mencken

Moses Mendelssohn
Marcelino Menéndez y Pelayo
Thomas Merton
Alice Meynell
John Stuart Mill
Czesław Miłosz
Mary Russell Mitford
N.Scott Momaday
Carlos Monsiváis
Michel de Montaigne
Eugenio Montale
Juan Montalvo
Henry de Montherlant
Moral Essay
Christopher Morley
William Morris
Edwin Muir
John Muir
Lewis Mumford
Walter Murdoch
Robert Musil
Chavdar Mutafov
Thomas Nashe
Nature Essay
Die neue Rundschau
New Journalism
The New Yorker
John Henry Newman
Ngugi wa Thiong'o
Friedrich Nietzsche
Nouvelle Revue Française
Novalis
Nikolai Novikov
Victoria Ocampo
Alexandru Odobescu
Margaret Oliphant
On the Sublime
Eugenio d'Ors
José Ortega y Gasset
George Orwell
Fernand Ouellette
Ouyang Xiu
Cynthia Ozick
Thomas Paine
Nettie Palmer

Vance Palmer
Jacob Paludan
Pamphlet
Emilia Pardo Bazán
Partisan Review
Blaise Pascal
Walter Pater
Octavio Paz
Charles Péguy
Pensée
S.J.Perelman
Ramón Pérez de Ayala
Periodical Essay Periodicals
Personal Essay
Philosophical Essay
The Physiology of Taste
Mariano Picón-Salas
Plato
Plutarch
The Poetic Art
Polemical Essay
Polish Essay
Portuguese Essay
Ezra Pound
Preface
J.B.Priestley
V.S.Pritchett
Propaganda
Aleksandr Pushkin
The Quarterly Review
The Rambler
Leopold von Ranke
Herbert Read
Religious Essay
Ernest Renan
Reportage
Agnes Repplier
Rêverie
Review
A Review of the Affairs of France
Revista de Occidente
Revue des Deux Mondes
Kenneth Rexroth
Alfonso Reyes

Adrienne Rich
Mordecai Richler
José Enrique Rodó
Jean-Jacques Rousseau
Vasilii Rozanov
John Ruskin
Russian Essay
Ernesto Sabato
Oliver Sacks
Charles-Augustin Sainte-Beuve
Saint-Évremond
Saltykov-Shchedrin
Scott Russell Sanders
George Santayana
Domingo Faustino Sarmiento
Jean-Paul Sartre
Satire
Satiric Essay
Scandinavian Essay
Friedrich von Schiller
Friedrich Schlegel
Arthur Schopenhauer
Rudolf Alexander Schröder
Science Essay
Sei Shōnagon
Richard Selzer
Seneca
Sermon
Michel Serrès
Madame de Sévigné
Earl of Shaftesbury
George Bernard Shaw
Percy Bysshe Shelley
Lev Shestov
Viktor Shklovskii
Georg Simmel
Andrei Siniavskii
Pencho Slaveikov
Sociological Essay
El Sol
Vladimir Soloukhin
Vladimir Solov'ev
Knud Sønnerby
Susan Sontag
Villy Sørensen

Robert Southey
Sovremennik
Wole Soyinka
Spanish Essay
Spanish American Essay
The Spectator (1711–12, 1714)
The Spectator (1828–)
Madame de Staël
Richard Steele
Wallace Stegner
N.Steinhardt
Jerzy Stempowski
Leslie Stephen
Robert Louis Stevenson
Lytton Strachey
Su Shi
Sur
Margarete Susman
Jonathan Swift
Hippolyte Taine
The Tatler
Sir William Temple
Der Teutsche Merkur
William Makepeace Thackeray
Albert Thibaudet
Lewis Thomas
Henry David Thoreau
James Thurber
Enrique Tierno Galván
Times Literary Supplement
Lev Tolstoi
Topical Essay
Diego de Torres Villarroel Tract
Travel Essay Treatise
Lionel Trilling
Pierre Trottier
Marina Tsvetaeva
Ivan Turgenev
Mark Twain
Kenneth Tynan
Miguel de Unamuno
John Updike
Ludvík Vaculík

Pierre Vadeboncoeur
Paul Valéry
Benedetto Varchi
José Vasconcelos
Gore Vidal
Voltaire
Alice Walker
Max Weber
The Week
Simone Weil
Die weissen Blätter
Rebecca West
E.B.White
Christoph Martin Wieland
Oscar Wilde
Edmund Wilson
Christa Wolf
Tom Wolfe
Mary Wollstonecraft
Virginia Woolf
Judith Wright
William Butler Yeats
Yuan Hongdao
María Zambrano
Leopoldo Zea
Zhang Dai
Zhou Zuoren
Xavier Zubiri

PREFACE

An encyclopedia of the essay sounds at first like a paradoxical enterprise: how can the essay's elusive multiplicity of forms and themes be contained within the systematic scope of an encyclopedia? The essay is often characterized by its spontaneity, its unpredictability, its very lack of system. Yet precisely these qualities have made it the little noticed (though much practiced) of the literary genres, and hence the most in need of some kind of comprehensive guide. Of course there can be no complete mapping of such a diverse literary form: to define all of its varieties and enumerate all its practitioners would take a much larger volume than this. Nevertheless, the Encyclopedia of the Essay does bring together the essential information for exploring this protean form of writing, and each entry has a section of suggestions for further reading.

The Encyclopedia does not apply a rigid, exclusive definition of what is or is not an essay, nor does it aim at exhaustive cataloguing of every author who has ever written an essay. Rather, it provides several types of entry as ways to access the vast and heterogeneous field of essayistic writing: 1) generic—considerations of different types of essay (moral essay, travel essay, autobiographical essay, for example) and different adjacent forms (aphorism, chapter, feuilleton, sermon, and so on); 2) national—entries on the major national traditions (French, British, Japanese, for example); 3) individual—entries on those writers who have produced a significant body of work in the genre. In addition, there is consideration of 4) the significance of periodicals in creating a market for essay writing, and entries on particularly important journals, along with 5) a few entries on especially significant single essays. Those interested in the theory of the essay are referred to the entries on Lukács, Adorno, and Bense—curiously, in view of the fact that the European essay first established itself in France and England, the theorists of the genre have come mainly from the Germanic cultural sphere. The four main categories of entry—formal, national, individual, and periodical—give four different routes into the territory of essayistic literature.

Despite the huge variety of its forms, there are certain features which recur often enough to give the word “essay” a specific though not rigid meaning. Generally it is used of nonfictional prose texts of between one and about 50 pages, though in some cases book-length works are also called essays. The term also frequently connotes a certain quality of approach to a topic, variously characterized as provisional and exploratory, rather than systematic and definitive. The essay can be contrasted with the academic article, which is usually a contribution to a recognized discipline and to a collaborative inquiry, previous inquiries being taken account of by means of quotations and footnotes. The essay tends to be personal rather than collaborative in its approach, and usually lacks this kind of scholarly apparatus. The essayist's authority is not based on formal credentials or academic expertise, but on his or her personality as reflected in the style of writing. Persuasiveness is based on distinctiveness of style rather than on the use of an accepted professional or technical vocabulary. The essay typically eschews specialized jargon and is addressed to the “general reader” in a friendly, informal tone. It also avoids the application of pre-established methodology to particular cases, but rather works from the particular toward the general, and even then is not concerned to produce conclusions applicable to other cases. Its concerns are personal and particular, more than professional and systematic.

Nevertheless, the essay can flourish around the margins of academic disciplines or at their origins. A topic that initially forms the subject matter of essays can later be treated within a discipline. For example, many of Freud’s short texts are classics of essayistic inquiry, even though Freud considered them contributions to a systematic science of psychoanalysis, despite their literary references and style. Within the European context, the modern essay originated at the same time as modern science, in the late 16th century, and shares many characteristics with it, chiefly the stress on empirical investigation rather than on established authorities such as Aristotle. Bacon, the founder of the English essay, was also the first writer to lay out a program for what we now call science. Yet as science became collectively organized it tended to become less essayistic. The essay stayed on the margins of science, as a vehicle either for unorthodox speculations or for communicating some of science’s results to a non-specialist audience, as in the writings of Stephen Jay Gould and others. Another example of an essayistic topic being institutionalized is Cultural Studies. Essayists like Robert Louis Stevenson and George Orwell wrote about “penny dreadful” comics, dirty postcards, and pulp fiction long before these topics were taken up in the academy and made into the matter of research within a new discipline.

Literary theory is another interesting case. Informal speculative essays like T.S.Eliot’s “Tradition and the Individual Talent” or Walter Benjamin’s “The Work of Art in the Age of Mechanical Reproduction” can acquire almost canonical status within academic theory, even though they were produced outside that context. Roland Barthes wrote highly theoretical works, but also quite personal, semi-autobiographical essays. Current literary theory seems partly in tune with the essay in the common stress on the provisional, unfixed nature of meaning, yet out of sympathy with the essayistic assumptions of a distinctive, autonomous personality and a concretely rendered reality.

The essay can provide a home for academics wanting a broader context and a wider audience for their work. Some who begin their writing within a disciplinary framework later move outside it into essayistic inquiry. Philosophy provides several examples. Heidegger moved from systematic philosophy to short poetic meditations and essays on poets like Hölderlin, Bann, and Rilke. Nietzsche forsook academia altogether and devised his own form of essayistic philosophy-writing which has paradoxically become influential in academia once again (though in literature rather than philosophy departments). Although academics can also be essayists, many essayists have been independent writers, without academic affiliations.

Besides its ambivalent relations with institutional discourses, the essay is also usually perceived as marginal to other literary genres. Just as the essay is considered to be “not quite” science or philosophy or theory, it is also “not quite” art. At least, it is not perceived “great” art, since it is a seemingly “minor” form. Many, perhaps most, essayists have made their reputations in other genres. The example of Montaigne, who founded the essay form and wrote in it almost exclusively, was not followed often. Essayists are commonly also poets, philosophers, theorists, and so on, though usually this statement is put the other way round: poets and the others are also essayists. This way of stating the matter reflects the ancillary or secondary status of the essay as the least prestigious of the literary forms. T.S.Eliot's essays have had as much influence as his poetry, yet they have had much less attention as literary works in their own right. Virginia Woolf's essays are at least as important as her fiction, yet they are still often used as a quarry for insights into the fiction. Orwell's essays are of higher literary quality than many of his novels, yet the prestige of the fictional form means that they are relatively neglected.

There are, however, signs that this critical neglect is ending, in the publication of works such as my own book The Observing Self: Rediscovering the Essay (London and New York: Routledge, 1988) and Claire de Obaldia's The Essayistic Spirit: Literature, Modern Criticism, and the Essay (Oxford: Clarendon Press, and New York: Oxford University Press, 1995), as well as a number of shorter studies listed in the bibliographical entries. This renewal of critical interest coincides with the continuing flourishing of the genre itself. The number of current or recent essayists included in this encyclopedia testifies to the vitality of the form, which has seen as rich a harvest in the 20th century as in any of the preceding ones. Many of the most famous Modernist authors, like T.S. Eliot, D.H.Lawrence, Aldous Huxley, Virginia Woolf, Thomas Mann, Paul Valéry, and W.H.Auden have left outstanding collections of essays, while among contemporaries, Susan Sontag, Joan Didion, Barry Lopez, or Stephen Jay Gould could be cited among many others as skilled practitioners of the art. Moreover, the success of recent anthologies such as John Gross' The Oxford Book of Essays (Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1991), Phillip Lopate's The Art of the Personal Essay (New York: Doubleday, 1994), and Robert Atwan's The Best American Essays series (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1986-) indicates that there is an appetite among the general public for essays.

The Encyclopedia reflects the geographical and historical concentration of the essay form in the Euro-American world from Montaigne to the present. But the classical antecedents of the form in Greece and Rome are also noted in several entries, and the global dimension of the form is also amply represented. The Japanese and Chinese essay each receive an entry, contrasting the prose forms which predate Montaigne with the later Western-influenced types of essay. In the 20th century the list of individual authors treated includes African, Australian, Asian, as well as European and North and South American writers. The range of locations of contributors to the Encyclopedia also reflects the breadth of interest in the form. The essay has become truly global as the preconditions for it become more widespread: a sufficient number of suitable periodicals, a regime which tolerates criticism, an informed general readership, and writers who cultivate a distinctive, individual view of culture.

At heart, the essay is the voice of the individual. Wherever that is heard and heeded, the essay will flourish. Orwell in the 1940s pessimistically foresaw the perishing of the essay (and other forms of realistic prose, such as the novel) in the coming age of totalitarianism. The success of his own essays, particularly "Politics and the English Language," in the postwar period disproved his prediction, at least temporarily. This Encyclopedia, besides providing a guide to the enormous richness of the essay's past and present, is also a good augury for its continuing vitality in the future.

GRAHAM GOOD

A

Achebe, Chinua

Nigerian, 1930–

Chinua Achebe is the first major African novelist to be widely read and recognized both inside and outside Africa, and is also renowned for his role as the founding editor of the African Writers series published by Heinemann. His career as an essayist is limited to two collections of essays, Morning Yet on Creation Day (1975) and Hopes and Impediments (1988), as well as The Trouble with Nigeria (1983), a long essay which diagnoses the reasons for the political stagnation of post-colonial Nigeria. However, the influence and importance of his essays have far exceeded their actual number. They have been instrumental in establishing the critical and theoretical issues with which other African writers such as Ngugi wa Thiong'o, Wole Soyinka, and the bolekaja critics (Chinweizu and Madubuike) have had to grapple, and along with the work of the Frantz Fanon are among the earliest examples of the type of critical writing that has come to be known as “postcolonial” criticism.

Achebe’s essays are mainly conversational in nature, written for lectures that he has been invited to give in response to specific questions and situations. In the essays in Morning Yet on Creation Day and Hopes and Impediments (which reproduces five essays from the earlier collection), he articulates three characteristic concerns in his self-appointed role as spokesperson for the African novel. In essays such as “Colonialist Criticism” (1974), he is critical of the failure of European critics to understand African literature on its own terms. In their demand that African fiction be concerned with issues and themes that are “universal,” Achebe sees European critics as perpetuating a colonialist attitude which views “the African writer as a somewhat unfinished European who with patient guidance will grow up one day and write like every other European.” For Achebe, evidence of the autonomy and uniqueness of African literature from its European counterpart can be seen, for example, in the very different role that the African writer must have toward his or her society. In “The Novelist as Teacher” (1965), he attacks the notion that the African writer should adopt the Western Modernist pose of the angst-ridden writer living on the fringes of society. The African novelist has an obligation to educate, to “help society regain belief in itself and put away the complexes of the years of denigration and self-abasement.” Achebe is aware this might mean that “...perhaps what I write is applied art as distinct from pure. But who cares? Art is important, but so is education of the kind I have in mind.” The Igbo ceremony of mbari, a festival of images in which every member of the society participates, provides him with an example of artistic production in which “there is no rigid tension between makers of culture and its consumers. Art belongs to all and is a ‘function’ of society” (Morning).

More controversially, Achebe has defended the use of English and other European languages in the production of African fiction against those critics who suggest that authentic African experience can only be represented in an African language. On the one hand, this is because for Achebe, English—being “a language spoken by Africans on African soil” (Morning)—is an African language. As he suggests in “The African Writer and the English Language” (1964), English (as well as French and Arabic) also makes it possible for there to be national literatures in Africa which cut across the enormous linguistic differences present within each nation. Although he feels that the English language can express his experiences as an African, it is important to recognize that “it will have to be a new English, still in full communion with its ancestral home but altered to suit its African surroundings” (Morning)—a point which critics of Achebe’s stance have often failed to understand.

One of Achebe’s most famous and important essays—an essay which he has described as his “standard-bearer” (Hopes)—is “An Image of Africa: Racism in Conrad’s Heart of Darkness” (1975). While admitting that Conrad is “undoubtedly one of the great stylists of modern fiction,” Achebe draws attention to the fact that he is nevertheless “a thoroughgoing racist.” In Achebe’s opinion, Western critics have praised Conrad’s novella while never addressing the racism at its core; Conrad depicts Africa as incomprehensible, frenzied, dark, grotesque, and dangerous, and Africans as ugly, inarticulate, inhuman, and savage. Achebe criticizes this failure, and effectively deals with a range of rejoinders which might be used to “save” Conrad from being labeled a racist. For example, while it may be possible ‘to see these attitudes as those of Conrad’s character Marlow, Achebe claims that Conrad “neglects to hint, clearly and adequately, at an alternative form of reference by which we may judge the actions and opinions of his characters.” While it is now common for literary critics to approach fictional works through a consideration of issues such as race, Achebe’s criticism of Conrad is an early and influential example of the shift of literary criticism toward a more explicit treatment of the broader politics of fiction.

Since the publication of Hopes, Achebe has produced little in the way of either essays or fiction. As the founding editor of Okike: A Nigerian Journal of New Writing (begun 1971; subtitle later changed from Nigerian to African), he has nevertheless continued to play a prominent role in providing a forum for literary and critical writing in Africa. The main thrust of his critical writing has remained the same throughout his career: “What I am saying really boils down to a simple plea for the African novel. Don’t fence me in” (Morning).

IMRE SZEMAN

Biography

Born Albert Chinualumogu, 16 November 1930 in Ogidi. Studied at Government College, Umuahia, 1944–47; University College, Ibadan, 1948–53, B.A. (London), 1953.

Worked in various positions for the Nigerian Broadcasting Corporation in Lagos and Enugu, 1954–66. Married Christiana Chinwe Okoli, 1961: two sons and two daughters. Founding editor, Heinemann African Writers series, 1962–72, and director, Heinemann Educational Books (Nigeria), and Nwankwo-Ifejika (later Nwamife) publishers, Enugu, from 1970; chair, Citadel Books, Enugu, 1967. Senior research fellow, 1967–73, and professor of English, 1973–81, now emeritus, University of Nigeria, Nsukka; also visiting professor or lecturer at various American universities, 1972–90. Served on diplomatic missions for Biafra during the Nigerian Civil War, 1967–69. Founding editor, Okike: An African Journal of New Writing, from 1971; founder and publisher, Uwa Ndi Igbo: A Bilingual Journal of Igbo Life and Arts, from 1984. Pro-chancellor and chair of the council, Anambra State University of Technology, Enugu, 1986–88. Awards: many, including the Margaret Wrong Memorial Prize, 1959; Nigerian National Trophy, 1960; New Statesman Jock Campbell Award, 1965; Commonwealth Poetry Prize, 1973; Nigerian National Merit Award, 1979; Commonwealth Foundation Award, 1984; honorary degrees from 16 universities. Member, Order of the Federal Republic of Nigeria, 1979; Honorary Member, American Academy of Arts and Letters, 1982.; Fellow, Royal Society of Literature, 1983.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Morning Yet on Creation Day, 1975

The Trouble with Nigeria, 1983

Hopes and Impediments: Selected Essays, 1965–1987, 1988

Other writings: five novels (Things Fall Apart, 1958; No Longer at Ease, 1960; Arrow of God, 1964; A Man of the People, 1966; Anthills of the Savannah, 1987), two collections of short stories, a collection of poetry, and books for children.

Bibliography

Okpu, B.M., Chinua Achebe: A Bibliography, Lagos: Libriservice, 1984

Further Reading

Carroll, David, Chinua Achebe: Novelist, Poet, Critic, Basingstoke: Macmillan, 1990 (original edition, 1980)

Gikandi, Simon, Reading Chinua Achebe: Language and Ideology in Fiction, Portsmouth, New Hampshire: Heinemann, and London: Currey, 1991

Innes, C.L., Chinua Achebe: A Critical Study, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1990

Innes, C.L., and Bernth Lindfors, editors, Critical Perspectives on Chinua Achebe, Washington, D.C.: Three Continents Press, 1978; London: Heinemann Educational, 1979

- JanMohammed, Abdul R., Manichean Aesthetics: The Politics of Literature in Colonial Africa, Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1988 (original edition, 1983)
- Killam, G.D., The Writings of Chinua Achebe, London: Heinemann Educational, 1977 (original edition, as The Novels of Chinua Achebe, 1969)
- Moses, Michael Valdez, The Novel and the Globalization of Culture, New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1995
- Ngugi wa Thiong'o, "Chinua Achebe: A Man of the People," in his Homecoming: Essays on African and Caribbean Literature, Culture and Politics, London: Heinemann, 1972
- Ojinmah, Umelo, Chinua Achebe: New Perspectives, Ibadan: Spectrum, 1991
- Peterson, Kirsten Holt, and Anna Rutherford, editors, Chinua Achebe: A Celebration, Portsmouth, New Hampshire: Heinemann International, 1991
- Ugah, Ada, In the Beginning: Chinua Achebe at Work, Ibadan: Heinemann Educational, 1990
- Wanjala, Chris L., editor, Standpoints on African Literature: A Critical Anthology, Nairobi: East African Literature Bureau, 1973
- Wren, Robert, Achebe's World: The Historical and Cultural Context of the Novels of Chinua Achebe, Washington, D.C.: Three Continents Press, 1980; Harlow: Longman, 1981

Addison, Joseph

English, 1672–1719

Joseph Addison's major reputation as a moralist, stylist, and critic in the 18th and 19th centuries was based primarily on his essays for the Spectator (1711–12), a daily periodical he edited in conjunction with Richard Steele. After a short intermission the journal was revived in 1714 under Addison's control. The Spectator was a development from Steele's Tatler (1709–11) and led on to the Guardian (1713), both of which Addison wrote for. It was considered exemplary in both style and morality by 18th-century critics such as Samuel Johnson and Hugh Blair. In the 19th century Thomas Babington Macaulay (in "Life and Writings of Addison," 1843) was to praise Addison's cumulative essays for the journal as "perhaps the finest...both serious and playful, in the English language." There were many imitations, notably Johnson's Idler (1758–60) and Rambler (1750–52), John Hawkesworth's Adventurer (1752–54), and Robert Dodsley and Edward Moore's World (1753–56), as well as continental Spectators in French, German, Italian, and other languages.

Addison was not a professional journalist and his venture into essay writing was in some respects "time out" from the more serious aspects of his career. He had begun as an academic, spending 12 years at Oxford, where he became a Fellow of Magdalen College. He had then entered the service of the Whig party, achieving high office as secretary to the Earl of Wharton, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. It was his loss of office with the fall of the Whigs in 1710 that provided him with the leisure for sustained periodical journalism, which he quit on resuming his political career after the death of Queen Anne. His last venture into essay writing was with the Freeholder (1715–16), the title of which is indicative of the Whig association of political freedom with men of independent property. It is Addison's immersion both in the world of academic learning and in the work of the politicized civil service which gives particular experiential weight to his essays. But, although written at a time of bitter partisan controversy in politics and religion, the essays endeavor to be nonpartisan in expression. Their success, in this respect, is indicative of Addison's major historical role in establishing the parameters and discourse of a generally acceptable "polite" culture in the 18th century.

That polite culture was centered upon "the club," both in the real world (where Addison was a member of a Whig literary group, the Kit-Cats) and in the fictional world of "Mr. Spectator." As the first numbers of the Spectator indicate, it purports to be the record of a small club of representative gentlemen, including Sir Roger de Coverley (an old-fashioned country squire), Sir Andrew Freeport (a man representative of the trading interest), Captain Sentry (the military), Will Honeycomb (a man about town and a wit), and "a clergyman, a very philosophic man, of general learning, great sanctity of life, and the most exact breeding." The Saturday Spectators are a form of lay sermon by Addison (earning him the sobriquet "parson in a tie-wig"), and major influences in the promulgation of Anglican rationalism. Mr. Spectator himself claimed to write the papers of the club and is a peculiarly neutral figure, being a man of learning who has traveled widely, frequents London as an observer, but keeps free from political and religious strife.

The creation of a club of characters was an important element in providing variety in the journal and establishing the modes of discourse which united a wide-ranging body of contributors. Individual columnists were invited to assume an appropriate persona, with that of the Addisonian Spectator as normative. This was a new mode of organization of the journal as miscellany, as represented by the earlier Tatler and the subsequent Guardian. It has its roots in Horace's satires and epistles (rather than in the formal model of the Senecan philosophical essay) and in the Socratic and Ciceronian symposium. Diverse points of view are put in friendly exchange. The Horatian statement nullius addictus iurare in verba magistri (it is not my habit to swear by the words of any master) had been recently adopted as the motto for the Royal Society, and this skeptical empiricism (rather than dogmatic enthusiasm) was the sign of polite society. To the classical examples should be added Montaigne's equally skeptical essays and those of the weary, worldly-wise Epicurean, Sir William Temple.

These formal models carry an ideological implication. Even in summary it is apparent that this is a masculine society and the readership was being shaped from male norms. Within the club itself certain members are privileged over others. Sir Andrew Freeport represents all that is best in developing commercial society, whereas Sir Roger, although a delightful comic eccentric, signifies an out-of-date, small-world squirearchy (and thus votes Tory). In morality, the clergyman is normative, whereas Will Honeycomb carries with him certain aspects of "Restoration" society whose libertinage had been corrected or purged by societies for the reformation of manners. Likewise, in matters of taste, a correct canon of literature is representative of proper thinking. Addison was a major influence in establishing Paradise Lost as an English classic (Milton being purged of his republican and regicide views expressed elsewhere).

The enormous success of Addison in shaping polite society seems to have been achieved by his ability to present his substantial learning in an accessible manner and to clarify complex arguments. This is done with good-humored wit, in an easy tone, and always from a moral viewpoint. He claimed, "I have brought Philosophy out of Closets and Libraries, Schools and Colleges, to dwell in Clubs and Assemblies, at Tea-Tables, and in Coffee-Houses" (Spectator no. 10). He is thus a popularizer who found (and made) a public eager to learn but alienated by pedantry, obscurity, and vicious partisan controversy.

Certain groups of essays provide (in easy "sound-bites," as it were) both the most accessible, and the most advanced, treatment of current topics. In literature the series on "The Pleasures of the Imagination" (nos. 411–21) constitutes an important source for the development of Romantic theory and sensibility emerging from Lockean psychology, establishing key terms such as "fancy" and "beauty" (as well as "imagination" itself) and distinguishing between primary natural sources and those to be found in literature. Addison's social agenda is always prominent: "A Man of a Polite Imagination is let into a great many Pleasures, that the Vulgar are not capable of receiving. He can converse with a Picture, and find an agreeable Companion in a Statue. He meets with a secret Refreshment in a Description, and often feels a greater Satisfaction in the Prospect of Fields and Meadows, than another does in the Possession" (no. 411).

The religious agenda is implicit in setting the long series of essays on Paradise Lost on Saturdays, the lay-sermon days (nos. 267–369), but the emphasis here is on the pleasure of a great Christian poem, amply represented by quotation and easily placed within the classical tradition: "I have therefore bestowed a Paper upon each Book, and endeavoured not only to prove that the Poem is beautiful in general, but to point out its particular Beauties, and to determine wherein they consist. I have endeavoured to show how some Passages are beautiful by being Sublime, others, by being Soft, others, by being Natural; which of them are recommended by the Passion, which by the Moral, which by the Sentiment, and which by the Expression" (no. 369).

But for many readers it has been Addison's and Steele's Sir Roger de Coverley who runs away with the text. In this respect he is a median figure between Shakespeare's Falstaff (who destabilizes the ideology of the History plays) and characters in the sentimental novel like Laurence Sterne's Uncle Toby in Tristram Shandy. His objection to anyone sleeping in church except himself (no. 112), his remedy for love in fox hunting (no. 115), or the account of his death by his servant, Edward Biscuit (no. 517), show both how much the essay here owes to drama, and how much it is involved with the development of the heteroglossia of the novel. Thus, Biscuit: "Upon his coming home, the first Complaint he made was, that he had lost his Roast-Beef Stomach, not being able to touch a Sirloin, which was served up according to Custom: and you know how he used to take great Delight in it. From that Time forward he grew worse and worse, but still kept a good Heart to the last."

Equally important for the development of the novel is Addison's critical banter on gender relations. "The Moral World, as consisting of Males and Females, is of a Mixt Nature, and filled with several Customs, Fashion and Ceremonies, which would have no place in it were there but One Sex. Had our Species no Females in it, Men would be quite different Creatures from what they are at present; their Endeavours to please the Opposite Sex, polishes and refines them out of those Manners which are most Natural to them...” (no. 433). This is a constant motif, but the account of Amazons and hermaphrodites which follows may now have acquired an unforeseen comedy. Paradoxically it is in the area in which his essays were particularly effective—the education of “the fair sex”—that Addison’s writing may have acquired a provocative edge which originally it eschewed.

MALCOLM KELSALL

Biography

Born 1 May 1672 in Milston, Wiltshire. Studied at Charterhouse, London, where he met Richard Steele, 1686–87; Queen’s College, Oxford, 1687–89; Magdalen College, Oxford, 1689–93, M.A., 1693. Fellow, Magdalen College, 1698–1711. Received a government pension, 1699, and traveled on the continent, 1699–1704. Moved to London, 1704; became a member of the Kit-Cat Club; served the Whig party, holding various appointed positions, 1704–10, including secretary to Lord Wharton, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, 1709–10; Member of Parliament for Lostwithiel, 1708–10, and Malmesbury, 1710–19. Contributor to Richard Steele’s Tatler, 1709–11, and the Guardian, 1713; editor of the Whig Examiner, 1710, the Spectator, with Steele, 1711–12, and alone, 1714, and the Freeholder, 1715–16. Secretary to the Earl of Sunderland, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, 1714–15; appointed commissioner for trade and the colonies, 1715. Married Charlotte, Dowager Countess of Warwick, 1716: one daughter. Secretary of state in the Sunderland cabinet, 1717–18. Died in London (as a result of a degenerative heart condition and dropsy), 17 June 1719.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

The Tatler (periodical), edited by Richard Steele, nos. 1–271, 12 April 1709–2 January 1711; edited by Donald F. Bond, 3 vols., 1987

The Spectator (periodical), written and edited with Richard Steele, nos. 1–555, 1 March 1711–6 December 1712; second series (written and edited by Addison alone), nos. 556–635, 18 June–20 December 1714; edited by Gregory Smith (Everyman Edition), 4 vols., 1907, reprinted 1979, and by Donald F. Bond (Clarendon Edition), 5 vols., 1965; selection, as Critical Essays from “The Spectator”, edited by Bond, 1970

The Guardian (periodical), with others, nos. 1–175, 12 March–1 October 1713; edited by John Calhoun Stephens, 1982

The Free-Holder; or, Political Essays, nos. 1–55, 23 December 1715–29 June 1716; as The Freeholder, edited by James Leheny, 1979

Selections from the Tatler and the Spectator, edited by Angus Ross, 1982

Other writings: poetry, three plays (including the tragedy Cato, 1713), travel writing (Retmarks on Italy, 1705), and correspondence (collected in The Letters of Joseph Addison, edited by Walter Graham, 1941).

Collected works edition: The Works of the Right Honourable Joseph Addison, edited by Thomas Tickell, 4 vols., 1721, revised edition, 6 vols., 1811.

Bibliography

Royal, Samuel J., "Joseph Addison (1672–1719): A Check List of Works and Major Scholarship," Bulletin of the New York Public Library (Winter 1974): 236–50

Further Reading

Bloom, Edward A., and Lillian D. Bloom, Addison's Sociable Animal: In the Market Place, on the Hustings, in the Pulpit, Providence, Rhode Island: Brown University Press, 1971

Bloom, Edward A., and Lillian D. Bloom, editors, Addison and Steele: The Critical Heritage, London: Routledge, 1980

Bloom, Edward A., Lillian D. Bloom, and Edmund Leites, editors, Educating the Audience: Addison, Steele, and Eighteenth-Century Culture, Los Angeles: University of California William Andrews Clark Memorial Library, 1984

Elioseff, Lee A., The Cultural Milieu of Addison's Literary Criticism, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1963

Humphreys, A.R., Steele, Addison, and Their Periodical Essays, London: Longman Green, 1959

Ketcham, Michael G., Transparent Designs: Reading, Performance, and Form in the Spectator Papers, Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1985

Nablow, Ralph A., The Addisonian Tradition in France: Passion and Objectivity and Social Observation, Rutherford, New Jersey: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1990

Rau, Fritz, Zur Verbreitung und Nachahmung des Tatler und Spectator, Heidelberg: Winter, 1980

Smithers, Peter, The Life of Addison, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1968 (original edition, 1954)

Adorno, Theodor W.

German, 1903–1969

Theodor W. Adorno, the son of a Jewish merchant and an Italian singer, became famous as a philosopher and aesthetic theorist, not only for his many essays on literature and art, but chiefly for the critical theory he developed together with Max Horkheimer at the Frankfurt Institute for Social Research. His most famous work, written with Horkheimer during the years of exile in America, is the Dialektik der Aufklärung (1947; Dialectic of Enlightenment), which tackles the question of how the horror of National Socialism could have happened in a highly civilized country. In answering this question Horkheimer and Adorno provide a general critique of the modern age and capitalism, which reaches far beyond the narrow historical context of World War II to examine how Enlightenment thought made way for positivist philosophy as a "myth" of reality. With the resulting disintegration of reality into isolated facts, Western rationalism reaches its limit. This terminal state of affairs has had a destructive effect on the Western world itself.

In this work, and in his second, pessimistically tinged philosophical work, the Negative Dialektik (1966; Negative Dialectics), Adorno stands in opposition to his more optimistic colleague Ernst Bloch, whose Das Prinzip Hoffnung (1953; The Principle of Hope) he dismissed as naive. In what is known as the positivism dispute, Adorno also accused conventional philosophy (Karl Popper and Martin Heidegger) of positing an object independent of the subject, when the object is in fact subjectively defined and equally arbitrary. This, according to Adorno, obscures the real interrelations between individual and society, subject and object, essence and appearance. He therefore calls for a fundamental redefinition of the evaluating subject in society and art. In consequence, the posthumously published Ästhetische Theorie (1970; Aesthetic Theory) refers mainly to the concept of art in the context of the modern age, a bias that is also apparent in the subjects of his many essays on art and literature produced from 1930 onward.

Both Adorno's style of philosophy and his critique of social systems, based on the theories of Hegel, Marx, and Freud, are shaped by his predominant dialectic mode of thought. In historical reality and therefore also in philosophical thought, Adorno sees contradictions that cannot be resolved. These contradictions also give art a dual character: on the one hand art is socially determined, yet on the other the work of art is autonomous and independent of the social conditions that produced it. According to Adorno, we should not seek to resolve this contradiction but rather should accept it as it is, using the work of art as a means to achieve knowledge. He therefore criticizes the rigid, dogmatic conception of realism in art (as represented by Georg Lukács and Marxist aesthetics), which assumes that art's only function is to reflect social injustices. On the other hand, Adorno declares himself in favor of an art of protest, an art that refuses to endorse existing social conditions. His essays give new form to the concept of the avant-garde. Especially in the period following World War II, after his return in 1949 from exile in America, Adorno produced some of his most important writings on art and literature, written in his distinctive dialectic-artistic style; these works can themselves be considered as avant-garde works of art.

An impressive example of Adorno's artistic style of writing is provided by the manifesto-like "Der Essay als Form" ("The Essay as Form"), first published in the Noten zur Literatur I (Notes to Literature) in 1958. Here, following his earlier theories, according to which the increasing power of science had led to the demythologization of the world and of thought, Adorno accords particular importance to the essay form, as it avoids both absolute concepts and strict definitions. According to Adorno, the essay as a genre comes close to being a form of art, operating in the sphere of unmediated thought, where the different logical stages have not yet been separated from one another. As Adorno notes at the beginning of his essay, the essay as a form has been accorded less recognition than it deserves, precisely because of its position halfway between art and the objectivizing sciences. Although the neglect of the essay form had also been lamented by Lukács, Adorno sees this neglect as the logical consequence of an overemphasis on the scientific method of discovering truth. In this work, Adorno describes the way the perceiving subject organizes concepts within the essay form by comparing it with the behavior of a traveler who finds himself in a foreign land with no formal education and has to view concepts in their experiential context in order to understand them. Formal philosophy, by contrast, gets out a grammar book and dictionary, losing sight of the broader context which is created by the essay. The essay, with its provocative, skeptical outlook, treats science and the concepts of formal philosophy “in a systematically unsystematic way.” Therefore, although the essay by definition cannot claim to achieve completeness or objective truth, it does succeed, through the very negation of these claims, in coming close to the truth of the matter. Thus the essay’s “art-like quality” consists in this “awareness of the non-identity of representation and object.” For Adorno this also means that the concepts used in the essay are related to theory, although the essay itself is not, as Lukács assumed, derived from theory. Adorno agrees with Max Bense that the essay is “the critical form par excellence” and therefore also a tool for the critique of ideology. It is precisely because the essay can also incorporate untruth, and because it includes its own negation, that it does not conform to rigid, hierarchical ideological schemes. This means, finally, that the essay is an anachronistic form, caught between an omnipotent science and the last remnants of a philosophy retreating into abstract realms.

This pessimistic but aesthetically productive analysis of the state of the essay form in the late 20th century seems to have inspired Adorno to produce many of his essays in the Notes on Literature. The title of this work in itself (which could equally be translated as “notes for literature”) indicates that Adorno accords poetic language a central significance, viewing literature in terms of musical composition. Most of the essays consider the role of language in society and in the modern age. In his essay “Zum Klassizismus von Goethes Iphigenie” (1974; On the classicism of Goethe’s Iphigenia), for example, Adorno recognizes the redemptive power of language as a medium of truth and appeasement in Goethe’s classical work. Language helps unravel the entanglement of barbarism and civilization. “Language becomes the representative of order and at the same time produces order from freedom, from subjectivity,” is Adorno’s verdict on Goethe’s treatment of the Iphigenia story. Here, Adorno turns against the traditional view that Goethe’s work “denied the power of negativity and fabricated a spurious harmony.” He quotes directly from the text to show that Orestes “by dint of his stark antithesis to the myth, threatens to fall victim to it.” In this way, according to Adorno, Goethe’s play prophesies the transition from Enlightenment to mythology. This farsighted and controversial critique of the Enlightenment through the interpretation of Goethe’s Iphigenia can succeed only because Adorno presents it in the form of the essay, which can incorporate antithetical elements and in which a dialectical method of argumentation can be deployed to the full.

The contradictions which, according to Adorno, arise from the fact that language simultaneously represents and creates order, are becoming ever more acute as the modern age progresses. Just as the possibility of order seems to be increasingly elusive, so the utopia of language is disappearing in the representation of this impossibility. For this reason, as Adorno describes in his essay on Beckett (“Versuch, das Endspiel zu verstehen” [1961; “Attempt to Understand Endgame”]), the language of modern art is now no more than a differential of silence. The failure of language, which Beckett expresses in a number of ways, is interpreted by Adorno as the crisis of an existential terror which is literally lost for words. Beckett's existentialism gives expression to the catastrophe of the modern age, by reducing the drama (Endgame) to silent gestures. The organized meaninglessness that characterizes Beckett's work is apparent in the fact that the play has neither beginning, end, nor dramatic progression in between. Instead the whole drama is composed using techniques of reversal and negation. For Adorno this is a dramatic depiction of the final stage in the historical disintegration of subjectivity. The suffering of the figures in the play, and that of the reader who recognizes this existential finality, become for Adorno the measure of human awareness.

The foundation for Adorno's detailed and reflective analyses of many other literary texts can be found in his view that the disinterested contemplation of art is the only honest form of historical contemplation. Eichendorff, Heine, Balzac, Valéry, Proust, Thomas Mann, Dickens, George, Hochhuth, and Wedekind are just a few examples of the many authors and subjects Adorno considered in his essays. In refusing to give itself over to superficial beauty, art—and especially the art and literature of the modern age—was taking the guilt of the world upon itself. Thus for Adorno the modern work of art takes the empty place of Christ, a view demonstrated with particular clarity in his essay on Hölderlin's poetry ("Parataxis," 1965). In this way art fulfills the task of depicting the negative aspects of the world as it is.

Adorno's dialectic procedure in the essayistic description of his objects brings him close to the methods of some of his colleagues from the Frankfurt School, especially Walter Benjamin. Adorno also quotes Max Bense with approval. However, a feature that is uniquely characteristic of Adorno as a philosopher and ideological critic is the inversion of all relations that had previously been viewed as static, a product of his "negative dialectic" mode of thought. In this way he turns away from conventional, formal philosophy on the one hand, while at the same time reworking its conclusions in his own artistic-essayistic style of thinking and writing. Even Adorno's famous doctrine that after Auschwitz no more poems could be written is no rigid dogmatism, but the point of departure for a process of reflection which really does view its object from all sides. For Adorno this process is a prerequisite, not only for the essay as a literary form, but also for his entire philosophical undertaking.

AGNES C.MÜLLER

translated by Susan Mackervoy

Biography

Theodor Wiesengrund Adorno. Born 11 September 1903 in Frankfurt-on-Main. Studied at the University of Frankfurt, Ph.D., 1924; studied music composition under Alban Berg, from 1925; postgraduate studies in Frankfurt. Associated with the Institut für Sozialforschung (Institute for Social Research), Frankfurt, from 1928. Editor, Anbruch (Beginning) music journal, Vienna. Fled Nazi regime to Oxford, 1934, then to New York and Los Angeles, 1938. Married Gretel Karplus, 1937. Head of music study, Institute Office of Radio Research, Princeton, New Jersey, 1938–41, and in California, 1941–49; returned to Frankfurt, 1949; assistant director, 1950–55, codirector, 1955–58, and director, 1958–69, Institute for Social Research, Frankfurt; professor of philosophy and sociology, University of Frankfurt, 1958–69. Awards: Arnold Schoenberg Medal, 1954; Critics' Prize for Literature, 1959; Goethe Medal, 1963. Died (of a heart attack) in Visp, near Zermatt, Switzerland, 6 August 1969.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

- Kierkegaard, Konstruktion des Ästhetischen*, 1933; as Kierkegaard: Construction of the Aesthetic, edited and translated by Robert Hullot-Kentor, 1989
- Philosophische Fragmente*, with Max Horkheimer, 1944; as Dialektik der Aufklärung: Philosophische Fragmente, 1947; as Dialectic of Enlightenment, translated by John Cumming, 1972
- Minima Moralia: Reflexionen aus dem beschädigten Leben* (aphorisms), 1951; as Minima Moralia: Reflections from Damaged Life, translated by E.F.N. Jephcott, 1974
- Versuch über Wagner*, 1952; as In Search of Wagner, translated by Rodney Livingstone, 1981
- Prismen: Kulturkritik und Gesellschaft*, 1955; as Prisms, translated by Samuel and Shierry Weber, 1967
- Noten zur Literatur*, 4 vols., 1958–74; as Notes to Literature, vols. 1–2, edited by Rolf Tiedemann, translated by Shierry Weber Nichol森, 1991–92.
- Klangfiguren: Musikalische Schriften I*, 1959
- Einleitung in die Musiksoziologie*, 1962.; as Introduction to the Sociology of Music, translated by E.B. Ashton, 1976
- Quasi una fantasia: Musikalische Schriften II*, 1963; as Quasi una fantasia: Essays on Modern Music, translated by Rodney Livingstone, 1992
- Eingriffe: Neun kritische Modelle*, 1963
- Moments musicaux: Neu gedruckte Aufsätze 1928–1962*, 1964
- Negative Dialektik*, 1966; as Negative Dialectics, translated by E.B. Ashton, 1973
- Drei Studien zu Hegel*, 1966; as Hegel: Three Studies, translated by Shierry Weber Nichol森, 1993
- Ohne Leitbild: Parva Aesthetica*, 1967
- Impromptus: Zweite Folge neu gedruckter musikalischer Aufsätze*, 1968
- Nervenzpunkte der Neuen Musik*, 1969
- Stichworte: Kritische Modelle 2*, 1969
- Über Walter Benjamin*, edited by Rolf Tiedemann, 1970; revised edition, 1990
- Ästhetische Theorie*, edited by Gretel Adorno and Rolf Tiedemann, 1970; as Aesthetic Theory, translated by C. Lenhardt, 1984
- Aufsätze zur Gesellschaftstheorie und Methodologie*, 1970
- Die musikalischen Monographien*, 1971
- Kritik: Kleine Schriften zur Gesellschaft*, edited by Rolf Tiedemann, 1971
- Aufsätze zur Literatur des 20. Jahrhunderts*, vol. 1: Versuch, das Endspiel zu verstehen; vol. 2: Zur Dialektik des Engagements, 1973
- Vorlesung zur Einleitung in die Erkenntnistheorie*, 1973
- Vorlesung zur Einleitung in die Soziologie hielt*, 1973
- Vorlesungen zur Ästhetik*, 1967–68, 1973
- The Culture Industry: Selected Essays on Mass Culture*, edited by J.M. Bernstein, 1991

The Stars Come Down to Earth and Other Essays on the Irrational in Culture, edited by Stephen Crook, 1994

Other writings: works on philosophy, sociology, and musicology.

Collected works edition: Gesammelte Schriften, edited by Rolf Tiedemann, 22 vols., 1973–80.

Bibliographies

Görtzen, R., "Theodor W. Adorno: Vorläufige Bibliographie seiner Schriften und der Sekundärliteratur," in Adorno-Konferenz 1983, edited by Ludwig von Friedeburg and Jürgen Habermas, Frankfurt-on-Main: Suhrkamp, 1983:404–71

Pettazzi, Carlo, "Kommentierte Bibliographie zu Theodor W. Adorno," in Theodor W. Adorno, edited by Heinz Ludwig Arnold, Munich: Text+Kritik, 1977:176–91

Schultz, Klaus, "Vorläufige Bibliographie der Schriften," in Theodor W. Adorno zum Gedächtnis, edited by Hermann Schweppenhäuser, Frankfurt-on-Main: Suhrkamp, 1971:177–239

Further Reading

Alway, Joan, Critical Theory and Political Possibilities: Conceptions of Emancipatory Politics in the Works of Horkheimer, Adorno, Marcuse, and Habermas, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1995

Asiain, Martin, Theodor W. Adorno, Dialektik des Aporetischen: Untersuchungen zur Rolle der Kunst in der Philosophie Theodor W. Adornos, Fribourg: Alber, 1996

Bernstein, J.M., The Fate of Art: Aesthetic Alienation from Kant to Derrida and Adorno, University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, and Cambridge: Polity Press, 1992

Bronner, Stephen Eric, Of Critical Theory and Its Theorists, Oxford and Cambridge, Massachusetts: Blackwell, 1994

Buck-Morss, Susan, The Origin of Negative Dialectics: Theodor W. Adorno, Walter Benjamin and the Frankfurt Institute, New York: Free Press, 1977

Cook, Deborah, The Culture Industry Revisited: Theodor W. Adorno on Mass Culture, Lanham, Maryland: Rowman and Littlefield, 1996

Hohendahl, Peter Uwe, Prismatic Thought: Theodor W. Adorno, Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1995

Jameson, Frederic, Late Marxism: Adorno, or, the Persistence of the Dialectic, London and New York: Verso, 1990

Liessmann, Konrad Paul, Ohne Mitleid: Zum Begriff der Distanz als ästhetische Kategorie mit ständiger Rücksicht auf Theodor W. Adorno, Vienna: Passagen, 1991

Rose, Gillian, The Melancholy Science: An Introduction to the Thought of Theodor W. Adorno, London: Macmillan, and New York: Columbia University Press, 1978

Stamps, Judith, Unthinking Modernity: Innis, McLuhan and the Frankfurt School, Montreal: McGill-Queen's University Press, 1995

Tar, Zoltan, The Frankfurt School: The Critical Theories of Max Horkheimer and Theodor W. Adorno, New York: Wiley, 1977

Zimmermann, Norbert, Der ästhetische Augenblick: Theodor W. Adornos Theorie der

- Zeitstruktur von Kunst und ästhetischer Erfahrung*, Frankfurt-on-Main and New York: Lang, 1989
- Zuidervaart, Lambert, Adorno's Aesthetic Theory: The Redemption of Illusion, Cambridge, Massachusetts: MIT Press, 1991

The Adventurer

British periodical, 1752–1754

Together with Joseph Addison's Spectator and Samuel Johnson's Rambler, the Adventurer was one of the three most influential English-language periodicals of the 18th century. Published serially twice a week by London bookseller John Payne, and running to 140 numbers between 7 November 1752 and 9 March 1754, it was consciously designed to succeed the Rambler, which made its final appearance on 14 March 1752, but greatly outstripped the Rambler's popularity, peaking at a circulation three times that of Johnson's publication. A contemporary hack journalist, Arthur Murphy, author of the competing Gray's Inn Journal, complained in print about the "attachment to the Adventurer" felt by so many readers and the impediment such loyalty placed in the way of his own efforts to generate a reliable circulation (no. 53, 20 October 1753). Another indication of the Adventurer's success was the personal profit it brought to the publisher John Payne, who netted the then considerable sum of £422 from the sale of the 2000 sets of the second edition of the complete Adventurer and an additional £120 from the sale of half the copyright.

When Payne decided to follow up the Rambler with another serial of moral, aesthetic, and reflective essays, he turned to John Hawkesworth, then a little known but widely employed journalist and a fellow member of the Ivy Lane Club, which met at the King's Head, a tavern and beefsteak house located in Ivy Lane near St. Paul's Cathedral. Hawkesworth was a particularly astute choice on Payne's part: he was a regular contributor to Edward Cave's Gentleman's Magazine, where he worked closely with Samuel Johnson and developed an essayistic style so like Johnson's that contemporary and subsequent readers have struggled to distinguish among their many contributions to the Gentleman's Magazine. Furthermore, Johnson had used the weekly Tuesday night meeting of the Ivy Lane Club to test and develop ideas for his Rambler papers. Johnson was the star attraction of that literary society, whose membership included, with Payne and Hawkesworth, the dissenting clergyman Samuel Dyer, the magistrate and editor John Hawkins, and three physicians, William McGhie, Edmund Barker, and Richard Bathurst. The Ivy Lane Club became Hawkesworth's finishing school as an intellectual, and it was there that he learned to emulate so convincingly the moral and literary voice of Johnson.

The Adventurer followed Johnson's Rambler in its thematic content and varied in style only in being a little less difficult in its vocabulary and less baroque in its sentence structures. There were, however, two deliberate breaks with the editorial practice of the Rambler: Payne decided to solicit contributions to the Adventurer from several hands, rather than leave the entire burden of the writing to Hawkesworth; and it was decided from the outset that the number of issues would be finite. The number of 140 was determined with an eye to publishing the complete Adventurer in ready sets as soon as the final paper had been issued. seventy essays printed in folio made an ideal single volume, and Payne guessed from its conception that the Adventurer would sell best as a two-volume first edition in folio and a four-volume second edition in pocket-sized duodecimo. Whatever moral excellence we may now attribute to the Adventurer's reflective essays, its format was entirely determined by a bookseller's understanding of what would be the most valuable way to approach the marketplace.

Along with Hawkesworth, the principal contributors to the Adventurer were Johnson himself, the literary critic Joseph Warton, and the journalist Bonnell Thornton, author of the periodical the Connoisseur. Various individual papers have also been attributed to Thomas Warton, his sister Jane Warton, the early feminist Elizabeth Carter, Hester Mulson, George Colman, and Catherine Talbot. Certainly Hawkesworth and Payne approached a wide community of possible contributors with the intention of insuring that the Adventurer offered a variety of style and opinions in its essays. Despite the ultimate range of hands evident in the Adventurer, Hawkesworth found himself solely responsible for most of the early papers. Johnson first appears with Adventurer no. 34; he would contribute 29 essays in all. There is some speculation that Richard Bathurst of the Ivy Lane Club was originally solicited to contribute but failed to do so, and that Hawkesworth urged Johnson to take Bathurst's place as the periodical prospered and Hawkesworth himself felt the strain of compensating for the delinquent Bathurst. At any rate, the three main authors of the papers each took up different essayistic approaches: Johnson contributed papers that continued the moral reflections which had characterized the Rambler; Joseph Warton wrote on aesthetic matters, producing papers on literary criticism, taste, and scholarship, including memorable pieces on Shakespeare; and Hawkesworth, who wrote the lion's share of the periodical, was particularly predisposed to contribute short fiction, especially oriental tales.

The Adventurer combines aspects of both the Spectator and the Rambler in defining its own place in the history of the essay. As a sort of sequel to the Rambler, it sustained that periodical's philosophical disposition and its determination to instruct its readers in morality and conscience. It reached back to the Spectator in its ambition to attain a popular readership. Where the Rambler is meditative and solitary in its ruminations on the human scene, the Adventurer tends more toward the conversational and the social. Certainly, the Adventurer must be credited with demonstrating the importance of collaboration in sustaining variety and debate in a periodical, especially where the essay was concerned. Looking back on its accumulated achievement in the final issue of the Adventurer, Hawkesworth emphasizes this collaborative effort as crucial to the paper's popular success. Essays from several hands were essential, he writes, "not because I wanted sufficient leisure, but because some degree of sameness is produced by the peculiarities of every writer; and it was thought that the conceptions and expressions of another, whose pieces should have a general coincidence with mine, would produce variety, and by increasing entertainment facilitate instruction" (Adventurer no. 140).

The influence of the Adventurer was, perhaps, strongest in the late 18th century, when Edinburgh fostered a resurgence of interest in the periodical essay. The Mirror, the Lounger, and the Bee would all be conceived after the collaborative model of the Adventurer, acknowledging the truth of Hawkesworth's simple assertion.

STEPHEN W.BROWN

Editions

The Adventurer, 140 nos., 7 November 1752–9 March 1754; in 2 vols., 1753–54; in The Works of Samuel Johnson (Yale Edition) vol. 2: “The Idler” and “The Adventurer”, edited by Walter Jackson Bate, John M. Bullitt, and L.F. Powell, 1963; selections in Essays from the Rambler, Adventurer, and Idler, edited by Walter Jackson Bate, 1968

Further Reading

Abbott, John Lawrence, John Hawkesworth: Eighteenth-Century Man of Letters, Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1982

Bate, W. Jackson, Samuel Johnson, New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1977

Fairer, David, “Authorship Problems in The Adventurer,” Review of English Studies 25 (1974):137–51

Powell, L.F., “Introduction to The Adventurer” in “The Idler” and “The Adventurer”, The Works of Samuel Johnson (Yale Edition), vol. 2, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1963: 323–38

Sherbo, Arthur, Samuel Johnson, Editor of Shakespeare, with an Essay on the “Adventurer”, Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1956

Agee, James

American, 1909–1955

Although James Agee produced journalism, review essays, and short nonfiction pieces throughout his career, his reputation as an essayist derives primarily from his book with Walker Evans, Let Us Now Praise Famous Men (1941), a long study in prose and photographs of the lives of three Southern sharecropper families. Agee both documents the lives of his human subjects—families with whom he and Evans lived during the summer of 1936—and reflects on the problems of documenting without either inventing or concealing. Because Agee confronts the philosophical problems of truth-telling so directly in this work, because he enacts these problems stylistically, and perhaps above all because these have been critical, recurring questions for the essay throughout the genre's history, Let Us Now Praise Famous Men holds great interest for students of the essay, as well as a place of increasing importance in the canon of 20th-century American literature.

For Agee, as for Montaigne, the essay was not a form for conveying a whole and universal truth clearly perceived; on the contrary, it was useful for highlighting both the partiality of any one observer's vision and the great difficulties involved in perceiving the world and communicating one's experience of it to an audience. A form of truth is possible, says Agee, if one is as faithful as possible to one's own knowledge and experience of the world, but it will, of course, be at best a relative truth. Moreover, it is no simple thing to confront that world in an immediate way, "without either dissection into science, or digestion into art, but with the whole of consciousness, seeking to perceive it as it stands"; to do so an observer must strip his or her consciousness until it stands "weaponless" before its subject. This confrontation of two existents, observer and subject, is crucial to Agee's understanding and use of the nonfiction essay form because the meaning of his real, human subjects does not derive from the writer's work (as it does in fiction); both the subject and the writer's writing about this subject have their meaning in the fact that subject and writer both exist. Thus the essayist's responsibility is not to "art" but to that experience, the confrontation of living people. The essay is a form that Agee uses to reveal himself as a "spy," one with the specific goals of observing, recording, and exposing the lives of these families. He uses the reflective, questioning, and self-revealing aspects of the essayistic persona to give voice to the moral and ethical problems of his position—that of an anxious, indignant, and sensitive person, alive to his subjects and at times agonizingly self-conscious about what he is doing.

Agee's style is sometimes called "baroque"; critics have often found his syntax and vocabulary dense, mannered, even "tortured." Certainly his inversions of word order, the intricate syntax of some of his clauses, and his occasionally unorthodox punctuation make careful reading imperative; Agee himself cautions that the reader will have to listen carefully to his prose. But the effects of this are to draw attention to the prose as a thing composed, constructed; thus the reader is discouraged from seeing the writing merely as a transparent "screen" through which to read the world, and encouraged to see it as a reconstruction of the original experience—perhaps a problematic one at that. Although one reviewer of Let Us Now Praise Famous Men doubted Agee's ability to write a clear sentence, Agee had certainly developed a range of styles from which to choose. Much of his writing, here and in his journalism, displays a simple, more "transparent" style, one in which verbs do more of the work and prepositions less. In such "straightforward" passages, however, Agee often makes heavy use of figures of speech to mark the experience as distinctly his.

The critical reception of Let Us Now Praise Famous Men has been varied. Reviewers both praised and criticized its variety and stylistic innovations; some found Agee's tour de force "dazzling," brilliant in its very failure to satisfy conventional expectations, "a distinguished failure," while others thought it self-indulgent and self-important. Commercially the book was not a success, but it did attract a certain following among the literary establishment after Lionel Trilling's favorable review in 1942. It was not until its reissue in 1960 that it began to gain in popularity and influence; it was embraced by young activists eager for social reform, and had a particular impact among practitioners of New Journalism, who, like Agee, questioned the possibility of objectivity, favored recreations of personal experiences, and pushed their craft to stylistic extremes.

Of Agee's other nonfiction, the journalistic pieces he wrote for Fortune reveal flashes of the style and voice of Let Us Now Praise Famous Men, but the articles are, for the most part, journalism rather than essays; he allows himself (or his editors allow him) no reflective excursions from the facts at hand. One exception to this is "Southeast of the Island: Travel Notes” (Collected Short Prose, 1968); tellingly, the piece was never published by Fortune, for whom he was working at the time. The film reviews he wrote for Time and the Nation are more essayistic in their occasional meditations on art, philosophy, and the American culture of the day. Much of Agee’s fiction is autobiographical; the novel A Death in the Family (1957) drew so heavily on his childhood experiences that at least one reviewer called it a memoir, and two of the early stories anthologized in the Collected Short Prose, “Death in the Desert” and “They That Sow in Sorrow Shall Reap,” both feature the intercutting of narrated experience and reflection characteristic of the essay, as well as being stories which, according to editor Robert Fitzgerald, were based on real occurrences. Yet for all the essayistic elements and overtones of his other work, Let Us Now Praise Famous Men stands as Agee’s preeminent work of nonfiction prose. In no other work of nonfiction are his voice, his style, and his ideas about writing given freer rein or clearer expression. In itself, the book has made Agee’s reputation as one of the great writers of nonfiction in this century.

MAURA BRADY

Biography

James Rufus Agee. Born 27 November 1909 in Knoxville, Tennessee. Studied at Phillips Exeter Academy, Exeter, New Hampshire, 1925–28; Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, where he edited the Harvard Advocate, 1918–32, A.B., 1932. Reporter and staff writer, Fortune, 1932–39. Married Olivia Saunders, 1933 (divorced, 1937). Book reviewer, from 1939, and feature writer and film reviewer, 1941–48, Time magazine. Married Alma Mailman, 1939 (later divorced): one son. Film columnist, Nation, 1942–48. Married Mia Fritsch, 1946: one daughter. Codirector of the film In the Street, 1948. Awards: Pulitzer Prize, for A Death in the Family, 1957 (posthumous). Died (of a heart attack) in New York, 16 May 1955.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Let Us Now Praise Famous Men, photographs by Walker Evans, 1941

Agee on Film: Reviews and Comments, 1958

Collected Short Prose, edited by Robert Fitzgerald, 1968

Selected Journalism, edited by Paul Ashdown, 1985

Other writings: two novels (The Morning Watch, 1951; A Death in the Family, 1957) and several screenplays (including The African Queen, with John Huston, 1951; The Night of the Hunter, 1955).

Bibliography

Moss, Mary, “James Agee: A Bibliography of Secondary Sources,” in James Agee: Reconsiderations, edited by Michael A. Lofaro, Knoxville: University of Tennessee

Press, 1992

Further Reading

- Barson, Alfred, A Way of Seeing: A Critical Study of James Agee, Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1972
- Bergreen, Laurence, James Agee: A Life, New York: Dutton, 1984
- Hersey, John, "A Critic at Large," New Yorker, 18 July 1988: 72–82
- Kramer, Victor A., James Agee, Boston: Twayne, 1975
- Kramer, Victor A., Agee and Actuality: Artistic Vision in His Work, Troy, New York: Whitston, 1991
- Larsen, Erling, James Agee, Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1971
- Lofaro, Michael A., editor, James Agee: Reconsiderations Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1992
- Lowe, James, The Creative Process of James Agee, Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1994
- Madden, David, editor, Remembering James Agee, Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1974
- Maharidge, Dale, and Michael Williamson, And Their Children After Them: The Legacy of Let Us Now Praise Famous Men, James Agee, Walker Evans, and the Rise and Fall of Cotton in the South, New York: Pantheon, 1989
- Moreau, Genevieve, The Restless Journey of James Agee, New York: Morrow, 1977
- Ohlin, Peter H., Agee, New York: Obolensky, 1966
- Seib, Kenneth, James Agee: Promise and Fulfillment, Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1969
- Spears, Ross, and Jude Cassidy, editors, Agee: His Life Remembered, New York: Holt Rinehart, 1985

Die Akzente

German journal, 1954–

Die Akzente: Zeitschrift für Literatur (Accent: journal for literature) is one of Germany's most important post-World War II literary journals, both enabling the recovery of literary movements and works brutally suppressed by the National Socialists, and encouraging avant-garde poetry and drama. Founded in 1954 by Walter Höllerer and Hans Bender, with the original subtitle Zeitschrift für Dichtung (Journal for poetry), the journal continues to appear in bimonthly issues, and has a circulation of about 4500. DA has presented works by nearly every major postwar German writer, from fiction by Günter Grass and Gabriele Wohmann to essays concerning aesthetics and politics by Theodor W. Adorno and Martin Heidegger. It has also been an important source of literature and criticism from other European countries and North America. Recent issues of the periodical have included works by Thomas Bernhard, Tankred Dorst, and Günter Kunert.

Essays in DA have often provided the theoretical basis for reclaiming German Modernist literature and for encouraging postwar artistic and cultural movements. Essays in the first years of DA discuss dadaism and surrealism, expressionists such as the poet Georg Heym, and Bertolt Brecht's epic theater, helping to reestablish the importance of these movements and authors. Indeed, Höllerer has remarked that the recovery of these works, and of German literary tradition in general, was a primary motivation for establishing the journal. The first issue of DA (February 1954) included works from the literary estates of the philosopher and cultural critic Walter Benjamin and the Jewish poet Gertrud Kolmar, both of whom had been killed by the Nazis. The same issue included three essays concerning Robert Musil's influential Modernist novel, Der Mann ohne Eigenschaften (1930–43; The Man Without Qualities). Other essays of this period concerning the radio play and the form of the novel, such as Adorno's "Form und Gehalt des zeitgenössischen Romans" (August 1954; Form and content of the contemporary novel), suggest the importance of DA for the development of postwar German literary aesthetics. DA was also an important source of works and criticism by members of Gruppe 47 (Group 47), a union of writers who demanded discussion of the Nazi period and its implications for postwar German culture. Similarly innovative works by the novelist Uwe Johnson and the documentary dramatist Peter Weiss have often appeared in the periodical.

Most characteristic of DA, however, has been its focus on poetry. Höllerer, who is himself a poet and playwright, encouraged other writers of experimental and avant-garde poetry and is largely responsible for the journal's early emphasis on the lyric. Bender, too, has contributed many essays on poetry to DA and other periodicals, and has edited several anthologies of poems. Poems have appeared by such central figures as Helmut Heissenbüttel and Hans Magnus Enzensberger, and poetry continues to play an important role in the journal.

It has always been an important source of works in translation, and has included essays and literature by writers from the United States, England, France, Scandinavia, and Eastern Europe. In 1956 it published essays by Roland Barthes, Luc Estang, and Alain Robbe-Grillet, providing an important forum in Germany for these French thinkers. Robbe-Grillet's essay concerning the contemporary novel, "Für einen Realismus des Hierseins" (August 1956; For a realism of the present), also helped fuel German literary debate and conceptions of the postwar German novel. In 1958 DA introduced the Beat poets to many German readers, publishing works such as Gregory Corso's essay, "Dichter und Gesellschaft in Amerika" (The poet and society in America). The February 1968 edition of DA featured works by Americans Richard Brautigan and Susan Sontag. Since the reunification of Germany in 1990, much attention has been given to writers in the East. In the February 1992 issue of DA, a section of the periodical was devoted to Estonian poets including Doris Kareval and Viivi Luik.

In 1968 Walter Höllerer left DA and Hans Bender became the sole editor of the journal. At that time, Bender changed the subtitle to Zeitschrift für Literatur, indicating more fully the diverse forms of writing included in the journal. Shortly after Höllerer's departure, Michael Krüger was named co-editor, becoming sole editor in 1981, a position he retains today. Krüger continues to include the combination of literature and essays that has characterized DA since its inception. The format of the journal has largely remained the same as well. Booksize, it includes few illustrations or advertisements. With the first issue of 1981, DA began to include photographs on the front cover and in various sections of the journal.

Under Krüger's editorship of DA, editorials have become more polemical, and more willing to discuss specific political and social issues. In 1992, for instance, the opening editorial discussed two ostensible Western "victories": the War in the Persian Gulf, and the dissolution of the East European communist governments. Subsequent issues of DA have brought attention to the literature and culture of Iraq and Bosnia.

While editors of DA have tended toward political liberalism, their understanding of Kultur has changed little since the journal's initial appearance. Krüger, for instance, maintains DA's long tradition of distinguishing between what he calls a German "Vernunftskultur" (high culture) and a "Subkultur" (low culture). Common targets of Krüger's editorials are the media and particularly television, and the destabilizing influence of postmodernism.

CHRISTOPHER P. MCCLINTICK

Further Reading

Bolz, Rüdiger, "Literatur, wie wir sie sehen, kommt nie nach Hause ... Akzente: Ein publizistisches Forum der Nachkriegsjahre," Der Deutschunterricht 33, no. 3 (1981):31–39

Lass, R.H., "Accent on the Sixties," Modern Language Review 61 (1966):455–66

Schroedel, Folker, "Akzente" 1954–1967 (M.A.thesis), Erlangen-Nürnberg: University of Erlangen-Nürnberg, 1987

25 Jahre Akzente (catalogue), Sulzbach-Rosenberg: Literaturarchiv Sulzbach-Rosenberg, 1979

Alain

French, 1868–1951

Alain's career was closely connected with the educational system in France, since he served as professor of rhetoric at the Lycée Henri IV from 1909 until 1933, and had a profound influence on the thinking of a generation of French intellectuals. In his essays he often adopted a professorial position, providing insights and stimulating thought in a concise, meditative prose style. As with so many French essayists, Alain was a philosopher in the style of Montaigne rather than of Descartes. He did not leave a systematic philosophy, nor a major opus, but a large and disparate collection of personal observations that are both penetrating and amusing. The substance of his thought, however, was profoundly influenced by rigorous Cartesian logic.

Starting in 1906 he began writing daily articles, under the pseudonym Alain (in homage to the 15th-century Norman poet Alain Chartier), for La Dépêche de Rouen (The Rouen dispatch), which he entitled “Propos d’un Normand” (Remarks of a Norman). These propos had a set length (two small pages of handwritten script) due to journalistic constraints, and focused on a specific issue in an unpretentious style. In the course of the next eight years over 3000 propos appeared, written on a wide variety of topics, including politics, society, and psychology. The first series of propos ended in 1914, but was followed by two other periods (1921–24 and 1927–36). His writings on specific topics were collected and published, from 1908 until the 1930s, and enjoyed great success. Although in later years Alain wrote more fully developed works, it is the propos that remain synonymous with his name.

Alain once considered becoming a novelist, but rejected both the length of the form and the fictionality of its content. Being a philosopher, a lover of wisdom, he favored the short, fleeting images of the storyteller, who is more free to blend diverse materials and examine the paradoxes of actual, everyday events. Alain preferred to give his thought and imagination the liberty to follow their own course, and develop their own associations, without the constraints of traditional generic conventions. In each propos, the progression is usually thematic rather than argumentative, since ideas and images spiral around a central point, providing different, unexpected perspectives on the main issue. Capable of rigorous thought, as seen in many passages of his work, Alain nonetheless presented his ideas as an interruption in the daily routine, a reexamination of common beliefs. Usually each piece ends with a memorable final statement, which may summarize the preceding ideas with a fresh insight or indicate a practical lesson or action to take. In short, his brief prose pieces are each highly crafted artifacts which are both artistically pleasing and pragmatically useful.

In the Propos sur le bonheur (1925, 1928; Alain on Happiness), Alain contended in general that passions are the major cause of unhappiness, which affects us physically as well as emotionally. Willpower plays a central role in these propos, as in so many others, but Alain was quick to recognize that while we are not able to control our thoughts or emotions, control of the physical body and movement can modify or alleviate causes of unhappiness. It is not through accident that we are happy or unhappy, and happiness must be cultivated, since it is only through individual efforts that we can attain our own bonheur. The physical and mental faculties cannot be separated. The wise and happy person should strive for a healthy mind and body, which will serve for both reflective thought and judicious action. Happiness is equated with virtue, liberty, and justice, as revealed in the wisdom of the classical writers of antiquity, of whose work Alain was a passionate and happy admirer.

A contemporary of Freud, Alain disagreed with the founder of psychoanalysis on the importance of sexuality in human conduct, as well as with Freud’s views concerning the composition and role of the unconscious in mental activity. The basis for Alain’s disagreement can be found in his belief that the soul, and by extension consciousness and thought, are not states of being, nor entities apart, but functions of an integrated self. For him, there can be no unconscious which exists separately, or which contains material hidden from the self. But rather than attempt to refute what he considered “Freud’s ingenious system” with logical arguments, he chose instead to refuse it, claiming that Freud’s views on psychic activity were vague and ultimately useless.

According to Alain, consciousness, thought, judgment, and reflection are all interconnected, so that critical reasoning and examination are elementary to all conscious states. By opposition, the unconscious, including sleep, is merely an absence of functionality and rationality. Alain applied his theories on states of consciousness in his observations (Les Arts et les dieux [1958; The arts and the gods]) on Paul Valéry's La Jeune Parque (1917; The young fate), a poem describing the transitional states of mind. Consciousness is characterized as reflection and light, which allows no partial states, but either is, or is not. Alain also commented on Proust, who "speaks of the unconscious, but doesn't need to in order to account for human actions and passions" ("Propos de littérature" [1922; Remarks on literature]). As for thought, which reveals consciousness, it is considered to be primarily a critical, negating activity. Alain's style of writing is aphoristic in nature; one of his better-known sayings is "Thought is saying no, and it is to itself that thought says no" ("Propos sur la religion" [1924; Remarks on religion]). By these negations consciousness is highly moral in its workings, frequently contrasting an ideal self with the real self. It is the morality of the human will that Alain placed in opposition to Freud's model of the unconscious.

Alain's concept of the interconnection between body and mind was primarily Cartesian, with its emphasis on the role of physical, corporeal determinants. He believed that Freud misinterpreted the symptoms and signs of human behavior, and attributed motives incorrectly to an autonomous and murky unconscious. Physiology plays a more important role in behavior than Freud allowed, and this led him to create an unruly unconscious to explain what are often, in fact, physical causes. As for dreams, they are not the messengers of a hidden spirit, but the weakened, distorted perceptions of a drowsy mind. Finally, Alain did not trust the complicated mechanisms of Freud's concepts, preferring a simpler, more practical, natural explanation of mental phenomena. He saw in psychoanalysis an overly pessimistic view of humankind, which emphasized misery and depravity rather than encouraging nobility of action and the exercise of the will.

With regard to another major influence on modern thought, Marx, the writings of Alain again reveal criticism and reservation. Although he can be considered a socialist, Alain espoused a dialectic which was more specific, emphasizing the individual and each person's role within the class struggle. He was also much less of a dogmatic absolutist than Marx, and his views of politics and history do not reveal the same systematic approach or the inevitability of social revolution. As for war, whose horrors he witnessed firsthand between 1914 and 1917 and which occupied his later thought, he also disagreed with Marxist ideology. He criticized the Marxists for oversimplifying historical and social causes; they blamed capitalists and their greed for causing war when in fact the causes were far more complex, and involved in addition a kind of collective madness of a people intent on war. In Mars (1921) the importance of passion, both individual and collective, and its relationship to war, a "crime of passion," are explored at length. Alain, a determined pacifist, believed that a Marxist state would be just as militaristic as a capitalistic one, since all governing groups have a will to power which tends to be expressed in warfare. Each individual is tempted by the moral perversions of war and violence, which are so often justified by false claims of a transcendent or ultimate justice.

Whatever the content of his writing, Alain often used concrete and innovative images to capture his reader's attention or make a point. These images are often taken from everyday life: a crying baby, a loaf of bread, or a farmer resting in his field. Besides these arresting, poetic images, he formulated his thought in striking phrases, which comprise a stockpile of maxims. He saw ideas as instruments which allow us to grasp reality and to conduct our life with dignity and morality. The issues he discussed were often quite complex, but stated in a simple prose, without philosophical terms or jargon. Although his writing often opposed prevailing thought, the freshness of his style and the rigor of his thought earned him a great reputation. During the first half of the 20th century, a period marked by global atrocities, his propos indicated a path for humankind's secular salvation through reflective thought and moral action.

ALLEN G. WOOD

Biography

Born Émile Auguste Chartier, 3 March 1868 in Mortagne-sur-Huisne (now Mortagne-au-Perche), Normandy. Studied at lycées in Alençon, 1881–86, and Vanves, 1886–89; École Normale Supérieure, Paris, 1889–92, agrégation in philosophy, 1892. Taught at lycées in Pontivy, 1892–93, Lorient, 1893–1900, Rouen, 1900–02, Lycée Condorcet, Paris, 1903–06, Lycée Michelet, Vanves, 1906–09, Lycée Henri IV (where he taught Simone Weil, Henri Massis, and Jean Prévost), Paris, 1909–33, and Collège Sévigné, Paris, 1917–33. Columnist of propos, occasionally, 1903–06, and daily (called “Propos d’un Normand,” 1906–14), from 1906, which he signed “Alain” and which appeared in La Dépêche de Rouen, 1903–14, Libres Propos, 1921–24 and 1927–36, and L'Émandpation, 1924–27. Served in the French Army, 1914–17. Married Gabrielle Landormy, 1945. Awards: National Grand Prize for Literature, 1951. Died in Le Vésinet, 2 June 1951.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Les cent un Propos, series 1–5, 1908–28

Vingt et un Propos d'Alain: Méditations pour les non-combattants, 1915

Quatre-vingt-un Chapitres sur l'esprit et les passions, 1915; revised edition, as Éléments de philosophie, 1941

Les Marchands de sommeil, 1919

Système des beaux-arts, 1920

Mars; ou, La Guerre jugée, 1921; as Mars; or, The Truth About War, translated by Doris Mudie and Elizabeth Hill, 1930

Propos sur l'esthétique, 1923

Propos sur le christianisme, 1924

Propos sur le bonheur, 1925; enlarged edition, 1928; as Alain on Happiness, translated by Robert D. and Jane E. Cottrell, 1973

Jeanne d'Arc, 1925

Éléments d'une doctrine radicale, 1925

Le Citoyen contre les pouvoirs, 1926

Sentiments, passions, et signes, 1926

Visite au musicien, 1927

Esquisses de l'homme, 1927; revised, enlarged edition, 1938

Les Idées et les âges, 1927
Onze Chapitres sur Platon, 1928
Étude sur Descartes, 1928
Vingt Leçons sur les beaux-arts, 1931
Préliminaires à la mythologie, 1932
Propos sur l'éducation, 1932
Propos de littérature, 1933
Les Dieux, 1934; as The Gods, translated by Richard Pevear, 1974
Propos de politique, 1934
Stendhal, 1935
Propos d'économie, 1935
En lisant Balzac, 1935; enlarged edition, as Avec Balzac, 1937
Histoire de mes pensées, 1936
Entretiens chez le sculpteur, 1937
Les Saisons de l'esprit, 1937
Propos sur la religion, 1938
Minerve; ou, De la sagesse, 1939
Préliminaires à l'esthétique, 1939
Suite à Mars, 2 vols., 1939
Vigiles de l'esprit, 1942
En lisant Dickens, 1945
Humanités, 1946; revised, enlarged edition, 1960
Politique, 1952
Propos d'un Normand, 1906–1914, 5 vols., 1952–60
Propos (Pléiade Edition), edited by Maurice Savin, 1956
Les Arts et les dieux, 1958
Propos sur des philosophes, 1961
 Other writings: works on literature and writers.

Bibliographies

Dewit, Suzanne, "Alain: Essai de bibliographie," Bibliographia Belgica 62 (1961)
 Drevit, A., "Bio-Bibliographie d'Alain," Association des Amis d'Alain: Annuaire (1966)

Further Reading

Assoun, P.L., and others, Alain-Freud: Essai pour mesurer un déplacement anthropologique, Le Vésinet: Institut Alain, 1992
 Bénézé, Georges, Généreux Alain, Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1962
 Bourgeois, B., "Alain, lecteur de Hegel," Revue de Métaphysique et de Morale 2 (April-June 1987):238–56
 Bourgne, Robert, editor, Alain, lecteur des philosophes, Paris: Bordas, 1987
Bulletin de l'Association des Amis d'Alain: Annuaire (1954–)
 Gil, Didier, Alain, la République ou le matérialisme, Paris: Klincksieck, 1990
 Halda, Bernard, Alain, Paris: Éditions Universitaires, 1965
 Maurois, André, Alain, Paris: Domat, 1950

Miquel, Jean, Les "Propos" d'Alain, Paris: La Pensée Moderne, 1967

Mondor, Henri, Alain, Paris: Gallimard, 1953

Pascal, Georges, Pour connaître la pensée d'Alain, Paris: Bordas, 1946

Pascal, Georges, Alain éducateur, Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1964

Pascal, Georges, L'idée de philosophie chez Alain, Paris: Bordas, 1970

Reboul, Olivier, L'Homme et ses passions d'après Alain, Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 2 vols., 1968

Sernin, André, Alain: Un Sage dans la cité, 1868–1951, Paris: Laffont, 1985

Amar y Borbón, Josefa

Spanish, 1749–1833

During the last few years of the 18th century, Spanish letters focused almost exclusively on the essay. These writings, much maligned by 19th-century Romantics who saw little of value produced during the Spanish “enlightenment,” provided a critical step in the development of the modern Spanish essay. Josefa Amar y Borbón belongs to a group of intellectuals who read prohibited books, met periodically to discuss issues of concern, and wrote extensively on topics that were bound together by a common theme—a concern for the decadent conditions of Spain and a desire to rectify the situation through education. Whether these writings were called discursos (speeches), cartas (letters), memorias (memoirs), or ensayos (essays), they are recognized today as basic elements of the Spanish essay.

Aragonese by birth, but reared and educated in Madrid, Amar y Borbón was the product, as well as an example, of the enlightened elite in Bourbon Spain. Well versed in Greek, Latin, French, English, and Italian, Amar y Borbón translated many works from these languages into Spanish. In the 1780s she began publishing essays and treatises whose subjects fall into three broad categories: those concerning science and medicine, those dealing with the study of letters and the humanities, and those combating superstition. Aside from her translations, the author’s original literary production, as catalogued to date, includes eight essays published between 1783 and 1787, and a book, Discurso sobre la educación física y moral de las mugeres (1790; Discourse on the physical and moral education of women).

Each of Amar y Borbón’s essays has three main structural components: authority, tradition, and synthesis. Authority is expressed by numerous citations of classical sources. These autoridades, whom the author quotes in the original language before translating, are from all epochs. Tradition refers to Spanish customs; this component not only provides a point of comparison and contrast with “authority,” but is also a minute description of 18th-century society. Tradition also provides the reader with some insight concerning Amar y Borbón’s point of view in many instances. The last component, synthesis, combines what “should be” (authority) with “what is” (tradition) to form what “might be”—the synthesis.

While these structural components appear in most of the author’s essays, her style is far from simple, for like many of her contemporaries, she interjects numerous digressions in the form of philosophical musings: questions about the nature of religion and the religious education of children; diatribes against current practices in Spanish society such as men reserving all honors, awards, and recognition for themselves and wishing to deprive women of their intellects; or historical cataloguing of a subject such as the history of corsets from ancient times to the 18th century.

Authority, tradition, synthesis, and abundant digressions form the basic structure of the essayist's work: these elements are combined as in a mathematical formula; however, the "solution" is seldom stated. Indeed, in many cases Amar y Borbón leaves the solution of the issue to the readers, whether she does so overtly or not. As she defined her style as an essayist, she perfected the rhetorical form of argumentation that moves from the general to the specific. Most of her essays begin with a statement introducing the major theme. Then, as if in a musical variation, the same theme is presented in a series of analogous and yet distinct forms.

Within this basic structure and development, Amar y Borbón presents the reader with a healthy dose of wit and sarcasm. For example, when she describes the benefit of good health for women in her book, she states the obvious need for women to be fit for physical work and interjects that "all ladies, and those not worthy of being called so, must be physically fit for pregnancy, childbirth, and nursing." At other times her sarcasm is not as subtle. For example in her essay, "Discurso en defensa del talento de las mugeres..." (1786; Essay in Defense of Women's Talent), written in response to Francisco, Conde de Cabarrús' fear that allowing women to participate in the Economic Society of Madrid would ruin the organization, she states: "It is obvious that men and women should live entirely separately, and this separation should be complete and forever ...but...this scenario remains impossible—there being a thousand reasons for men and women to come together... not the least of which is that the opposite would bring the destruction of the human race..."

Like her contemporaries, Josefa Amar y Borbón wrote a form of literature characterized by multiple topics bound together by a common major theme: education, enlightenment, and progress. These writers added to the traditions established in the Spanish Golden Age and began to define the literary style later recognized as the modern essay.

CARMEN CHAVES TESSER

Biography

Born February 1749 in Saragossa. Grew up and studied privately in Madrid, tutored in Latin, French, Greek, and literature; taught herself Italian and English. Married Joaquín Fuertes Piquer (died, 1798), 1764: at least one child (a son). Returned to Saragossa, 1772. First female member, Aragonese Economic Society, 1782; member of Ladies' Group, Madrid Economic Society, 1787; member, Medical Society of Barcelona, 1790. Died in Saragossa, February 1833.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

“Discurso en defensa del talento de las mugeres y de su aptitud para el gobierno, y otros cargos en que se emplean los hombres,” in Memorial literario, instructivo y curioso de la Corte de Madrid, 1786:399–430; edited by Carmen Chaves McClendon, in Dieciocho 3 (1980): 144–61, and by Olegario Negrín Fajardo, in Ilustración y educación: La sociedad económica matritense, 1984:162–76; as Essay in Defense of Women’s Talent, translated by Carmen Chaves McClendon (dissertation), 1976
Discurso sobre la educación física y moral de las mugeres, 1790; edited by Constance A. Sullivan, 1994

Other writings: translated a six-volume work on Spanish literature by Francisco Lampillas (1782–84) and a work by Francesco Grisellini (1784).

Further Reading

Franklin, Elizabeth M., “Feijóo, Josefa Amar y Borbón, and the Feminist Debate in Eighteenth-Century Spain,” Dieciocho 12, no. 2 (1989):188–203

McClendon, Carmen Chaves, “Josefa Amar y Borbón: A Forgotten Figure of the Spanish Enlightenment,” in Seven Studies in Medieval English History and Other Historical Essays, edited by Richard H. Bowers, Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1983:133–39

Sullivan, Constance A., “Josefa Amar y Borbón and the Royal Aragonese Economic Society,” Dieciocho 15, no. 1 (1992): Sullivan, Constance A., “Josefa Amar y Borbón,” in Spanish 95–148

Sullivan, Constance A. “Josefa Amar y Borbón,” in Spanish Women Writers: A Bio-Bibliographical Source Book, edited by Linda Gould Levine, Ellen Engelson Marson, and Gloria Feiman Waldman, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1993:33–43

American Essay

1. The Colonial Age

In its broadest denotation, the essay has existed in America almost from the arrival of the first English settlers in 1607. While 17th-century colonists had little or no leisure time in which to produce belles-lettres, there did exist what we might now call nonfictional literature, ranging from a paragraph or two of the almanac—short expositions that questioned natural phenomena—to the long chronicle histories. Growing out of the almanacs were early science essays, primarily on astronomical observations but also on other branches of science such as agriculture, zoology, botany, mineralogy, and meteorology. The clergy of the time, who were often the most educated of the colonists, generally adopted the belief that while God's mysteries were forever unknowable to humans, it was still their duty to ponder those mysteries. Hence, the end aim of science was contemplation. This purpose meant that their scientific writings (which appeared not only in almanacs but also in journals and letters to members of England's Royal Society) were not coldly scientific but tended toward moral interpretation.

The short prose works of the time, in fact, fell into definite literary types, including the "pamphlet of newes" (which described the new country), papers of timely interest on witchcraft and matters of immediate concern, the almanac (which contained short pieces of a moral or scientific nature), and the sermon—in which, apart from spiritual matters, ethics, manners, and social and national progress were also discussed—as well as its related form, the meditation, in which was displayed the most prolific and perhaps most creative prose of the time.

Cotton Mather (1663–1728) wrote what is considered the first verifiable book of American essays, Bonifacius (1710; the later edition was called Essays to Do Good). The book is divided into sections which are similar to 17th-century essays in being axiomatic and didactic philosophical reflections on abstract subjects, commentaries emerging from the wisdom and experience of the author. Nevertheless, the book is a departure from the writings of the early Puritans in that it contains no tedious laudatory biographies of ministers, no accusations of witchcraft, not even the display of pedantry and scriptural learning ordinarily associated with Mather. Instead it provides, in brief, simple, and forthright prose, a discussion of daily conduct, rules of behavior for ministers, doctors, and teachers, and objections to intemperance and corporal punishment. Each essay (and Mather uses the word literally, meaning "attempts to do good") is complete in itself, and each is suggestive rather than exhaustive; the work is unique for its time in both spirit and method.

2. The 18th Century: The Development of the Periodical and Serial Essays

The American essay began in earnest with the mushrooming of American periodicals in the early 18th century. It was modeled closely on the essays of the great contemporary British periodical essayists—Steele, Swift, Goldsmith, and especially Addison. Most early American essays were Addisonian in the sense that they were informal in tone, occasionally satiric, often humorous, most often brief. And like the British essays, American periodical essays were personal, always establishing a sociable intimacy between author and reader. The NewEngland Courant, a Boston weekly established by Benjamin Franklin's older brother James in 1721, was the first colonial newspaper to carry original essays. In his Autobiography (begun 1771 and published in full only in 1868), Benjamin Franklin (1706–90) recalled that his brother James "had some ingenious Men among his Friends who amus'd themselves by writing little Pieces for this Paper, which gained it Credit, and made it more in Demand." The group, who called themselves the "Couranteers," included Matthew Adams, John Checkley, Dr. William Douglass, and a mysterious Mr. Gardner. Initially unbeknownst to James was the fact that Benjamin himself was also a part of that group. Franklin submitted his earliest essays to his brother's newspaper with the signature "Silence Dogood" (1722). In these 14 pieces, Franklin deliberately copied the style of Addison's Spectator. However, he also took the Dogood papers beyond mere imitation, primarily because the Spectator claimed never to have "espoused any Party with Violence," while Mrs. Silence Dogood is a frugal, industrious, prosaic widow, sworn mortal enemy "to arbitrary Government and unlimited Power." Moreover, for all his English borrowings and choice of conventional subjects, Franklin succeeded in imparting to the Dogood essays a measure of originality and American coloration.

Mather Byles (1706–88), grandson of the clergyman Increase Mather, nephew of Cotton Mather, and lifelong friend of Franklin's, was also an early periodical essayist. He joined former Couranteer Matthew Adams and his grandson John Adams (1704–40) to write a serial for the New-England Weekly Journal (1727–41). Called Proteus Echo, it contained essays and poems and appeared weekly for a year. It was more didactic and less diverting than the Dogood papers, containing moral essays on such deadly sins as avarice, idleness, envy, and pride, philosophical essays on the ardor for knowledge, the way love blinds man's reason, and the love of country, and, finally, essays on manners and character. It was more nearly Addisonian than the Dogood papers, particularly because Proteus Echo is an old bachelor and widely traveled scholar like Mr. Spectator. While Franklin's Dogood papers are on balance the more successful of the two (Silence Dogood has more earthy vitality and dramatic energy, and the papers contain a sense of native idiom and environment that is almost wholly missing from Proteus Echo), the two serials firmly established the tradition of periodical essays in Boston, and led the way for others, which soon appeared in Philadelphia, Annapolis, Williamsburg, and Charleston.

Franklin left Boston for Philadelphia in 1723, and six years later launched a new essay serial in the American Weekly Mercury (1719–46) called The Busy-Body. He wrote the first four essays in the series and parts of two others, then withdrew; Joseph Breintnall finished the series, which when it ended in September 1729 contained 32 papers in all. The Busy-Body papers range through all the conventional subjects for periodical essays except criticism: manners, morality, philosophical reflection, character, humor. The liveliest entries are those by Breintnall which focus on the battle of the sexes.

Later in the 18th century—during the two decades before the Revolution—the chief outlet for essay serials became the magazine rather than the newspaper, and it was in magazines that the most notable American literary serials appeared. One of these, called The Prattler, appeared in the American Magazine and Monthly Chronicle for the British Colonies (1757–58), a magazine which promised that part of each issue would be "set aside for MONTHLY ESSAYS, in prose and verse" and that it would try to print every essay submitted "so far as they tend to promote peace and good government, industry and public spirit, a love of LIBERTY and our excellent constitution, and above all a veneration of our holy undefiled CHRISTIANITY." The Prattler generally appeared over the name "Timothy Timbertoe," but was probably the work of several hands. Timbertoe is a dilettante, most at home gossiping over tea tables or in coffeehouses and gathering scandal.

A more ambitious and successful serial was The Old Bachelor, which appeared in the Pennsylvania Magazine; or American Monthly Museum (1775–76). Thomas Paine (1737–1809) was a contributing editor to the magazine and also one of the principal authors of The Old Bachelor, though he seems to have contributed only to the early numbers, and left the rest to be written by Francis Hopkinson (1737–91), whose three-volume Miscellaneous Essays and Occasional Writings (1792) includes not only his Old Bachelor contributions but essays published in other periodicals. The old bachelor had been a convention in the periodical essays of England, and Hopkinson's creation—a character named George Sanby who is inconvenienced by being a bachelor but too chauvinistic to get married—is as good-natured, old-fashioned, and eccentric as any of his British predecessors or American followers (who would include Philip Freneau's Hezekiah Salem, Joseph Dennie's Lay Preacher, William Wirt's Dr. Robert Cecil, and Washington Irving's Jonathan Oldstyle).

The Maryland Gazette, established in Annapolis in 1727, carried one literary serial, The Plain-Dealer, though of its ten essays only two were original. Southern periodical essays got a surer foothold seven years later when the Virginia Gazette (1736–66) was established in Williamsburg. The serial in that newspaper, The Monitor (1736–37), conformed closely in manner and matter to the English periodical essay. It managed the conventions and ranged through the traditional subjects in a lively way. As in other early American serial essays, there was heavy emphasis on manners, and the Monitor and his assistants discussed subjects such as French fashions, being in love, keeping one's temper, and good nature. Maintaining the essentially lighthearted tone of The Monitor, the subject of morality was seldom broached.

The South-Carolina Gazette was established at Charleston in 1731–32, and ran, with occasional interruptions, until 1775. Individual essays began appearing as early as the second number, and in 1735 The Meddlers Club, a serial whose name calls to mind Franklin and Breintnall's Busy-Body, ran for a short time. The only full-fledged literary serial in the South-Carolina Gazette, however, appeared in Winter 1753–54, and was authored by "The Humourist." This series again covered the conventional subjects, with special attention to manners and literary criticism. In fact, the relative lack of topicality in The Humourist and the emphasis on literary criticism reflect the influence of Samuel Johnson's Rambler essays, which the South-Carolina Gazette began reprinting at the end of 1750.

With the rise of the magazine in the late 18th and early 19th centuries, the essay became perhaps the most clearly defined and popular American literary form. Essayist Nathan Fiske (1733–99) remarked near the turn of the century that any periodical without an essay series was doomed. Dozens of anonymous contributors with names like "The Censor," "The Hermit," "Gentleman at Large," and "The Lady's Friend" filled the magazines with comments on fashion, education, manners, courtship, social life, and other topics common to the tradition of Addison, Steele, and the rest. In the rush to print, few essayists distinguished themselves.

One who did was John Trumbull (1750–1831) who, while a graduate student and tutor at Yale, produced two serials, The Meddler (published in the Boston Chronicle, 1769–70) and The Correspondent (published in two series in the Connecticut Journal, 1770 and 1773). The Meddler had the stated purpose (from the first number) of publishing "essays, chiefly of the moral, critical and poetical kinds, upon miscellaneous and mostly unconnected subjects...[which] carefully avoid all strokes of party spirit and personal satire, with everything that had the least tendency to immorality." Indeed, The Meddler was noncontroversial—as well as frequently clumsy and amateurish—choosing instead to depict the coquette and fop so popular with 18th-century readers and to castigate false wit. The Correspondent, while also part of Trumbull's apprenticeship as a serial essayist (he later found his literary calling more successfully in poetry), was a more ambitious serial than The Meddler, instructing the reader more and diverting him less than the Meddler had done. The Correspondent was a more contentious, less genial character than the Meddler, and he frequently attacked Church authority in Connecticut; there was even one essay against slavery, written at a time when almost the only anti-slavery advocates in America were Quakers.

Philip Freneau (1752–1832) was also best known as a poet, though he produced over 400 prose pieces in his career, publishing them in a variety of literary serials. The Pilgrim essays (1781–82) appeared in the Freeman's Journal; six years later, in The Miscellaneous Works of Mr. Philip Freneau (1788), the series was extended and renamed The Philosopher of the Forest. In both incarnations, the speaker resembled Addison's Mr. Spectator in being an old bachelor who wished simply to observe life, though there were partisan essays Freneau was strongly anti-Tory—in which the angry voice of the author was clear and unmistakable. His serial Tomo Cheeki (1795) appeared in the Jersey Chronicle with a grave and melancholy title character based on an historical figure. Freneau had him visit Philadelphia, where he made observations on manners and morality and offered philosophical reflections, all tending to elevate the Native American above the white population. In general, it was a more relaxed and conversational series of essays than The Pilgrim. Hezekiah Salem (1797) is a wholly whimsical series of seven essays with titles such as “On the Culture of Pumpkins” and “A Few Words on Duelling.” Freneau's most extensive and impressive serial was Robert Slender (1799–1801), published in the Aurora (1794–1822, 1834–35), the foremost Republican newspaper of the day. The Slender letters were the most steadily partisan of Freneau's literary serials, though the character of Robert Slender and his Philadelphia milieu were full bodied and alive. It was a series in the British coffeehouse tradition—witty and filled with strong opinions.

In 1794 Joseph Dennie (1768–1812) characterized American essays as having been “hitherto unmarked except for flimsy expression & jejune ideas, they have allowed me the praise of reviving in some degree the Goldsmith vivacity in thought & the Addisonian sweetness in expression.” He was at the time writing his first literary serial, The Farrago (1792–95), and in the first number of that series, he commented on the continuing popularity of essays: “To a lover of abstruse science, desultory essays may appear a minor species of literature. But the majority of mankind are not scholars... They content themselves with the simplest dishes of the literary banquet. Hence the currency of Essays...” Dennie's essays were widely popular, but his unsuccessful attempts to have them published in book form contributed to the literary eclipse into which he was to fall after his death.

Judith Sargent Murray (1751–1820) produced two concurrent serials from 1792 to 1794: The Repository, 27 short moralistic essays, and The Gleaner. Both appeared in the Massachusetts Magazine (1789–96). Murray was married to John Murray, the founder of universalism in America, and was eventually accused of using her essays to propagate universalism; this led to her serials for the Massachusetts Magazine ending in 1794. While in publication, though, her essays distinguished themselves in several ways from the great bulk of other serials of the late 18th century. The Gleaner, which in some of its numbers had a mildly partisan flavor, biased toward Federalism, also showed Murray's concern for the future of American drama. These essays stood out because they appeared at a time when American writers were uncertain of how to develop an American tradition (an uncertainty that would, in fact, last for at least another century). Perhaps The Gleaner's most important contribution to American literature was a sentimental novel—The Story of Margaretta—embedded within the framework of a series of moral essays, allowing Murray not only to tell the story as if it were true (a favored method of making a sentimental novel respectable), but also to make observations on the proper role of the novel in American life.

Another essayist who made it his concern that the new nation have a literature of its own was William Wirt (1772–1834), a Virginian who published three serials, first in local newspapers, then in book form: The Letters of the British Spy (1803), The Rainbow (1804–05), and The Old Bachelor (1810–11). The British Spy provided evidence that the Addisonian essay had all but run its course in America, since Wirt employed only one Addisonian convention (the foreign visitor). Instead, the series contained elements of the travel essay then coming into vogue, especially in its descriptions of the Virginia landscape. The Old Bachelor was undeniably a literary serial, more Addisonian in its manner and matter than The British Spy. It was a series devoted to morals: “virtuously to instruct, or innocently to amuse,” as Wirt phrased it. The Old Bachelor sought, as he said in 1811, “to awaken the taste of the body of the people for literary attainments” and to “see whether a group of statesmen, scholars, orators, and patriots, as enlightened and illustrious as their father, cannot be produced without the aid of such another bloody and fatal stimulant [as the Revolutionary War].” Publication of the series in book form in 1814 helped solidify the reputation of The Old Bachelor. Wirt himself confessed, “I am afraid that both the Old Bachelor and the British Spy will be considered by the world as rather too light and bagatellish for a mind pretending either to stability or vigor,” but critics well into the 19th century highly regarded The Old Bachelor.

Also of note in the last part of the 18th century were the writers who adopted the essay form largely for political purposes. Its most significant practitioners included Thomas Paine (1737–1809), who achieved instant success and lasting fame with his pamphlet Common Sense (1776), and Alexander Hamilton (1757–1804), James Madison (1751–1836), and John Jay (1745–1829), who together anonymously published in 1787–88 a series of political essays called The Federalist Papers in support of the proposed U.S. Constitution. Later collected in book form and called The Federalist, they provide a classic exposition of the U.S. federal system.

3. The 19th Century: The Familiar Essay and Other Essay Types

Washington Irving (1783–1859) provided the last link in American essay writing to the periodical essay which had dominated the 18th century. Irving began his career as a serial essayist and only later moved into writing familiar essays along the lines of the great English Romantic essayists Charles Lamb, William Hazlitt, and Leigh Hunt. Irving made his first foray into essay writing with the Oldstyle letters he published in his brother

Peter's Morning Chronicle (1802–03). The nine letters from Jonathan Oldstyle were highly conventional—three of the letters focusing on manners, the other six on theatrical criticism. Despite their popularity, Irving quickly distanced himself from the essay serial altogether by parodying it in Salmagundi (1807–08), a periodical published irregularly by Irving and a group of young New Yorkers, including the other principal writer, James Kirke Paulding (1778–1860). The work quickly became a bestseller and remained in print throughout the 19th century.

After the War of 1812, the didacticism of the “morals and manners” type of essay gave way to the kind of subjectivity more common to the familiar essay. Irving matured as a familiar essayist with The Sketch Book of Geoffrey Crayon, Gent. (1819–20), then all but abandoned the essay for the tale, travel romance, history, and biography. Still, through his choice of subject and the development of his own style, he gave the familiar essay a particularly American feel, and is considered by many to be the first American essayist.

If any essay form is particularly indigenous to American soil it is the nature essay. French-American J. Hector St. John de Crèvecoeur (1735–1813) wrote Letters from an American Farmer (1782), which are concerned with the plight of the colonial farmer, politics, and economics, but also closely scrutinize phenomena as disparate as snakes, hummingbirds, snowstorms, and anthills. The essays are seasoned with an antipathy toward urban life and industrialism, and give vivid, idealistic pictures of the emergent New World. William Bartram (1739–1823), a more skillful observer of plants and flowers, wrote of his travels in Georgia and Florida. John James Audubon (1785–1851) interrupted the technical descriptions of his ornithological biography to insert charming vignettes of southwestern life, which ranged in subject matter from Mississippi squatters and Kentucky deer to scenes of bird life on the Florida Keys. The American nature essay would later in the century reach a high point in the work of John Burroughs (1837–1921), who wrote over 100 essays devoted chiefly to the birds and flowers and forest paths of the Adirondacks. A contemporary of Burroughs, John Muir (1838–1914), had his own significant influence on American attitudes toward ecology by writing vigorous essays in support of forest conservation, many of them detailing his walking journeys through the northwest United States and Alaska.

Earlier, however, at the same time as the familiar essay was gaining popularity in America, the founding of the great American magazines and quarterlies—the North America Review (1815–1940), the Western Review (1819–21), the American Quarterly Review (1827–37), the Southern Review (1818–32), and others—was encouraging the production of longer, more serious, philosophical or critical essays. Many of the most important and influential of these essays were written by the transcendentalists—including Ralph Waldo Emerson (1803–81), Henry David Thoreau (1817–62), Margaret Fuller (1810–50), and Amos Bronson Alcott (1799–1888). Emerson and Thoreau exerted frequently acknowledged influence on American literature, but Fuller was also a fixture in the transcendentalist scene, as editor of the Dial (1840–44) and writer of both critical essays and longer personal nonfiction such as Summer on the Lakes in 1843 (1844). Alcott left his impression on the essay with his Concord Days (1872) and Table Talk (1877).

Emerson was an agitating and fermentative force, a liberator from convention and timidity, a questioner and an instigator to valor. He did more than any other man, said

John Jay Chapman, “to rescue the youth of the next generation and fit them for the fierce times to follow. It will not be denied that he sent ten thousand sons to war.” The form in which he spread his original beliefs was not always the essay: his earliest compositions were sermons, and he turned from the sermon to the lecture. His essays grew out of this form of public speech, but it was only with the appearance of his second published volume, Essays: First Series (1841), that he placed himself before his readers explicitly in the role of essayist. Once there, his work constituted a new kind of American essay—abstract and aphoristic in a way that probably no writer since has been able to match. Emerson pieced together his essays from his journals, often leaving out explicit transitions from one sentence or one paragraph to the next, for he was willing to leave some of the work of thinking to his readers; he thought of continuity not as a logical but as a superlogical principle. His essays do, however, have a compositional wholeness, and a more orderly one than that in the essays of one of his true influences, Montaigne. As an essayist, Emerson was a masterful rhetorician, not only gifted in crafting the single sentences or phrases that can be lifted from their contexts and quoted with delight, but also blessed with a strong and delicate talent for ail the rhythms of English prose.

Thoreau’s fascination with nature gave rise to almost all his most important works, including A Week on the Concord and Merrimack Rivers (1849), Walden; or, Life in the Woods (1854), The Maine Woods (1864), Cape Cod (1865), and A Yankee in Canada (1866). An exacting sense of detail marks Thoreau’s writing about nature, and he wrote in a style deliberately meant to awaken his readers—through surprising plays on language, arresting turns of speech, unusual images or metaphors. He became and remains one of the strongest influences on American nature writers. His influence also extends into politics. In 1845 he refused to pay his poll tax as a form of protest against the Mexican War and against slavery. He was jailed, an experience which led him to write “Civil Disobedience” (1849), one of his most famous essays. It became a guiding document for eminent 20th-century proponents of passive resistance such as Mohandas Gandhi and Martin Luther King, Jr.

Even with the dominance of transcendentalism among the best American essayists of the early to mid-19th century, the conversational essay practiced earlier by Washington Irving did not die. In fact, it flourished so much in the works of Oliver Wendell Holmes (1809–1914) that his collections became the most popular American works in England since Irving’s Sketch Book. Holmes, a physician who wrote many controversial and ground-breaking medical essays, gained his greatest popularity beginning in 1857 with his Breakfast-Table essays, which were published monthly in the new Atlantic Monthly (1857–). They were often poetic essays filled with wise and witty observations, and threaded through with narratives. Different incarnations of the Breakfast-Table essays ran until 1890.

The greatest American poet of the second half of the 19th century, Walt Whitman (1819–92), published in 1870 a small book called Democratic Vistas, intended to explain the role of the poet in the success and failure of, on the one hand, American civilization and, on the other, civilization as a whole. “Above all previous lands, a great original literature is surely to become the justification and reliance (in some respects the sole reliance) of American democracy,” he wrote. The essays contained the pragmatic idea that democracy is not so much a political institution as a “training school” in character formation. Whitman's other prose publication was Specimen Days and Collect (1882), the title essay of which is based on diary notes of Whitman's observations during the Civil War. To fill out the book, he added "Democratic Vistas" and a "Collect" of his prefaces and literary essays.

The humorous essay had many practitioners in the second half of the 19th century—including the popular Artemus Ward (1834–67) and David Ross Locke (1833–88), both of whom wrote primarily for newspapers—but few of their works hold up today anywhere near as well as do those of Mark Twain (1835–1910). Twain was of course a popular novelist and a lecturer, but his essays—which often combined fictional and nonfictional elements, and so are sometimes difficult to categorize—displayed his deep talent as a humorist just as well as his other work did. Never limiting himself to short pieces, Twain engaged instead in a broad range of essay forms, from travel letters to memoirs to social and political commentary. Though some of his pieces were journalistic and ephemeral, and others—especially later in his career—were polemical and pessimistic, what characterized almost all of his nonfiction work was not only humor but an interest in storytelling, whether a brief anecdote or a full-fledged account. Such a style complemented his skills as a lecturer—though they were much different skills from those of other popular American essayist-lecturers such as, for example, Emerson. For Twain, essays were about the "high and delicate art" or "how a story ought to be told."

Literary essays by lesser-known writers had also taken their place in the American essay tradition in the early to mid-19th century, many of them under the intangible influence of Washington Irving. Soon after his success, American writers began to develop a faculty for the criticism of literature as well as its creation. Henry Wadsworth Longfellow (1807–82), whose volume of essays Outre-Mer was published in 1835 after he had traveled for three years in Europe, was one of the most prominent critical essayists, despite the fact that his criticism was chiefly appreciative rather than analytical. He succeeded, as far as the essay is concerned, in conveying instruction at the same time as he imbued his writing with his personality, never overstepping the bounds of the familiar essay and veering into didactic formality. Edgar Allan Poe (1809–49) made his most famous contributions to the field of critical essays with "The Poetic Principle," "The Rationale of Verse," and "Philosophy of Composition"—all careful and brilliant studies in the art and aesthetics of authorship. One of the few essayists of the 19th century who made criticism his life's work to the exclusion of all other forms of literary creation was Edwin Percy Whipple (1819–86). He wrote finished, formal essays distinctively American in that they emphasized grit and determination and were filled with moral earnestness. James Russell Lowell (1819–91) wrote both critical and personal essays. His first prose work, Conversations on Some of the Old Poets (1845), revived the neglected dialogue essay, and among his later books of criticism was Political Essays (1888). Other writers of both critical and personal essays include George William Curtis (1824–92), who collected his writings for Harper's (1850–) in two volumes called Essays from the Easy Chair (1892, 1897), and Thomas Wentworth Higginson (1823–1911), who wrote reminiscences of great 19th-century writers. Higginson's tendency to look backwards was perhaps prescient, since the next stage in the life of the American essay would have as its focus the essay's impending death.

4. The “Death” of the Essay

The titles and dates tell the tale: “The Passing of the Essay” (1894), “Once and for All” (1919), “A Little Old Lady Passes Away” (1933), “A Disappearing Art” (1933), “The Lost Art of the Essay” (1935), “On Burying the Essay” (1948), “No Essays, Please!” (1951), “A Gentle Dirge for the Familiar Essay” (1955), and “The Essay Lives—in Disguise” (1984). The story of the modern American essay has been the story of its “death,” a death that like Mark Twain’s has been greatly exaggerated, for even as critics declared it dead, the essay thrived by taking up new subjects, reworking old forms, and accommodating new voices.

What was actually dying was not the essay, but a particular kind of essay and the age and essayist associated with it. This type of essay was variously described as the genteel, light, or Lambian essay, and for at least the first four decades of the century American essayists were preoccupied with whether the essay could be anything but light. The alternatives, it was argued, were the column or the article, both of which were largely seen as less literary and more journalistic than the essay. Their ascendancy marked the death of the essay. What at least a few astute critics and some of the practitioners of these new forms recognized was that many columns or articles were actually essays: they were personal in subject matter and familiar in style in the way that the essay has always been. What has changed during the 20th century is that the essay has become increasingly political, revealing, and weighty.

5. The Turn of the Century and the Genteel Tradition

The genteel tradition held sway in American letters at least until World War I. Promoted by an interlocking network of literary critics, magazine editors, and Ivy League English professors, this tradition argued for art that reflected uppermiddle-class American values, Christian morality, the classical unity of truth and beauty, and a belief in the progress of (Anglo-American) civilization. Many, if not most, of the leading figures of the genteel tradition were essayists, and much of the tradition’s cultural work was done in that genre. These “custodians of culture,” as Henry May labeled them in his The End of American Innocence (1959), were troubled by the industrialization of America during the Gilded Age and sought to ameliorate the accompanying materialism by holding tight to Christian traditions and British literary conventions. They distrusted the new waves of immigration, the new rich, and America’s new role as a leader in international affairs. These essayists produced work that was generally sentimental, idealistic, nostalgic, and sometimes pious. They often sported three names and were sometimes more “English” than their English counterparts. They adopted a tone that was decidedly conversational and sometimes even chatty, and cultivated a view of the essayist as a “friend.” In order to maintain this chumminess they kept their subject matter light and noncontroversial. If politics or religion was broached, it was discussed matter-of-factly, with the assumption that the reader would agree with what “we,” all right-thinking people, thought. More often, however, their essays took as their subjects gardening, reading, Christmas dinner, or the family pet. Some representative titles suggest the standard tone and subjects—Reveries of a Bachelor (1850) by Donald Grant Mitchell (1822–1908), My Summer in a Garden (1871) by Charles Dudley Warner (1829–1900), Days Off, and Other Digressions (1907) by Henry Van Dyke (1852–1933), Among Friends (1910) by Samuel McChord Crothers (1857–1927), Days Out, and Other Papers (1917) by Elisabeth Woodbridge Morris (1870–1964), and Like Summer's Cloud (1925) by Charles Brooks (1878–1934). The work of these essayists was tremendously popular and influential; Reveries of a Bachelor, for example, led Scribner's list for 50 years.

These writers sometimes published in other genres, usually poetry or the short story, and often worked as academics or book reviewers. Some were regular critics for outlets of “higher journalism”—Paul Elmer More (1864–1937) and Stuart Pratt Sherman (1881–1926) in the Nation, Hamilton Wright Mabie (1846–1916) in the Outlook (and later, the Ladies Home Journal), Bliss Perry (1860–1954) in the Atlantic Monthly, and Robert Underwood Johnson (1853–1937) in the Century. Their review essays were generally conservative and prescriptive, often enforcing what was called “the parlor table” or “young girl” standard, which specified what reading material was fit to appear on a family's parlor table and, more particularly, to be read aloud by a father to his daughter.

6. The 1920s and 1930s: The Rise of the Columnists and Other Developments

The relatively settled world of the late Victorians, which had allowed the whimsical dalliance with the everyday as well as the enforcement of a strict understanding of good manners, may never have been quite as ordered and sedate as it sometimes appeared, but certainly by the turn of the century it was being challenged by the revelations of the muckrakers, the flood of new immigrants, the rise of the “New Woman,” and the gathering war clouds in Europe. In literature, naturalism and imagism were shaking up fiction and poetry respectively, but the essay was slower to change. Soon, however, World War I began to force essayists out of their libraries and gardens. As Agnes Repplier (1855–1950) put it in a 1918 piece entitled “The American Essay in Wartime,” “The personal essay, the little bit of sentiment or observation, the lightly offered commentary which aims to appear the artless thing it isn't,—this exotic, of which Lamb was a rare exponent, has withered in the blasts of war.”

Repplier's lament may have been a bit hyperbolic, but things were changing. In 1911, Harvard philosopher and cultural critic George Santayana (1863–1952) had named the genteel tradition and argued that it was an outmoded form of New England parochialism. Randolph Bourne (1886–1918), along with Van Wyck Brooks (1886–1963) and H.L. Mencken (1880–1956), built on Santayana's analysis in their critique of “Puritanism” and search for what Brooks called a “usable past.” Bourne died early and Brooks focused on literary criticism, but Mencken, in a prodigious outpouring of personal commentary and cultural criticism, did more than anyone during the immediate prewar and postwar periods to redefine the American essay. His sarcasm and irony poked fun at the genial tone of the light essay, and his love for, knowledge of, and talent at employing a distinctly American idiom helped do for the American essay what Twain had done for fiction and Whitman for poetry—Mencken took the essay from the hands of the Anglophiles who had dominated it and showed that it could be written in American.

The work of Mencken and other new essayists during the 1920s to modernize the essay was undertaken in a rapidly changing social and cultural climate. Thousands of soldiers, including midwestern farm boys and African American sharecroppers from the South, had traveled through New York and other eastern ports on their way to and from war. After the war many of them returned to the cities and stayed on, often working in the fast-growing automobile industry. All of the cities of the North and East were growing, but it was New York that was the center of modern culture. Motion pictures, radio, and mass circulation magazines told New York's story, but so too did the many new syndicated newspaper columns.

Columns or departments had already begun to appear in American newspapers—Eugene Field's (1850–95) "Sharps and Flats" ran in the Chicago Daily News from 1883 to 1895, and Bert Leston Taylor's (1866–1921) "A Line o' Type or Two" appeared in the Chicago Tribune between 1901 and 1920— but the 1920s and 1930s marked the heyday of the column. Not all of the new columns were strictly in the essay tradition. Some were editorials or political commentary, others were a hodgepodge of jokes and jingles sent in by readers. Sunday editions often offered a dozen or more columns on specialized topics such as gossip, sports, movies, fashion, radio, and books, as well as how-to columns on subjects as varied as cooking, bridge, and grammar.

There were also "essay" columns that were more personal, familiar, and discursive. These columns might indulge in gossip, review a book, or tender some light verse, but they consisted mainly of the author's thoughts and stories about everyday life. The popularity of these columns led to versions of them appearing as well in newly established magazines like the New Yorker (1925–) and the Saturday Review of Literature (1924–86). As such, they were more modern, somewhat less bookish versions of departments like "The Editor's Study" and "The Easy Chair" in Harper's or "The Contributor's Club" in the Atlantic Monthly.

Many major critics of the period, including Henry Seidel Canby (1878–1961) in "Out with the Dilettante" (1922), Burton Rascoe (1892–1957) in "What of Our Essayists?" (1922), Carl Van Doren (1885–1950) in "Day In and Day Out: Manhattan Wits" (1923), Stuart Sherman (1881–1926) in "Apology for Essayists of the Press" (1924), and Simeon Strunsky (1879–1948) in "The Essay of Today" (1928), argued that several of these columnists were negotiating their daily deadlines successfully enough to have begun to create a new kind of American essay, one that observed life in the American cities, especially New York, and evoked the idiom of city streets. They praised, in particular, Heywood Broun (1888–1939), Robert Cortes Holliday (1880–1947), Christopher Morley (1890–1957), Robert Benchley (1889–1945), Frank Moore Colby (1865–1925), Don Marquis (1878–1937), and Franklin P. Adams (1881–1960).

These "colymnists," as they called themselves, took different approaches, but all were essentially essayists. Marquis parodied Modernist poetry by pretending his columns were written by a cockroach named Archy whose use of lowercase was not a choice (as it was for e. e. cummings) but a consequence of the fact that he could hop on only one key at a time and so was unable to hit the shift key at the same time. Morley, a more old-fashioned Anglophile, wrote largely about books in "The Bowling Green," which ran first in the New York Post and then moved to the Saturday Review of Literature. Broun argued for various left-liberal political positions, but, like Benchley, also adopted a kind of bumbling “little man” persona in order to tell stories about himself. Adams began with a column called “A Little of Everything” in the Chicago Journal in 1903, but gained greater fame when he moved to New York and created the syndicated column “The Conning Tower,” which was a kind of potpourri of light verse and readers’ contributions, with occasional mock diaries in the manner of Samuel Pepys in which Adams revealed the goings-on of his Algonquin Round Table pals, a group of literary types who met regularly at the Algonquin Hotel to drink and talk.

On the whole, these men were highly educated: Benchley and Broun were Harvard graduates, Colby taught at Columbia and New York Universities, Morley was a Rhodes Scholar. And yet, as E.B.White remarked of Marquis, they were “never quite certified by intellectuals and serious critics of belles lettres.” Though considered hopelessly middlebrow by more academic critics, the “colyumnnists” saw themselves as having sought popularity by choice, as having chosen to write for and educate a broad readership. Their pieces retained some Victorian traits, but on the whole tended to emphasize the humorous and nostalgic over the prim and proper. In his defense of the New York wits, Sherman noted that these “busy newspaper men” had “blazed their way out to the new public” that was “truly democratic,” the “wide circle composed of every man and woman who reads a newspaper.” Van Doren agreed and added that these essayists were not a completely new phenomenon. “They are,” he said, “toWn wits, as Addison and Steele were in their merry London, as Irving and Paulding were in the New York of a hundred years ago.”

Perhaps the most important event in the development of the American essay during this period was the founding in 1925 of the New Yorker by Harold Ross (1892–1951). Influenced by the columnists (Benchley was an early and frequent contributor), Ross’ magazine, especially in its “Talk of the Town” department, told the rest of the nation what was going on in New York even as it claimed (perhaps somewhat disingenuously) not to be for the “little old lady in Dubuque.” It was in the New Yorker that the most popular essayists of the 1930s and 1940s developed their styles. James Thurber (1894–1961) built on Benchley’s little man persona in a number of comic autobiographical pieces (as well as short stories such as “The Secret Life of Walter Mitty”). E.B.White (1899–1985) developed his own mild-mannered, somewhat genteel, wellread man-on-the-street persona in “Notes and Comments.” Alexander Woollcott (1887–1943) poked fun at his own version of the effete urban dandy in a series of celebrity profiles and his back-page column, “Shouts and Murmurs.”

1925 also marked the publication of The New Negro, an anthology of essays and other work edited by Alain Locke (1886–1954) that launched the Harlem Renaissance and with it several African American poets and fiction writers who also wrote essays, especially Langston Hughes (1902–67), Richard Wright (1908–60), and Zora Neale Hurston (1891–1960). These younger writers worked out of a tradition of African American autobiographical nonfiction in which the writer revealed a life in order to claim selfhood, but brought to it the new rhythms of black speech and music emerging from the growing black urban communities of the North, especially Harlem. These voices ranged from the angry polemics of Wright to the affirmative comedy of Hurston, but they were all more informal, less academic, and more likely to employ dialect than the previous generations of African American essayists, which included, besides Locke, the political conscience of freed slave Frederick Douglass (1818–95), antilynching crusader Ida B. Wells Barnett (1862–1931), and the magisterial voice of W.E.B. Du Bois (1868–1963).

The work of the columnists offered probably the most widely read kind of essay and the most important development in the form during the period between the wars, but essays were also put to other kinds of use during this period. Many modern American novelists wrote essays, most notably Ernest Hemingway (1899–1961) in his war dispatches and F. Scott Fitzgerald (1896–1940) in a series of pieces for Esquire about his mental breakdown. Leftist literary critics such as Edmund Wilson (1895–1972), Mike Gold (1894–1967), and Meridel Le Sueur (1900–96) wrote reviews and polemical essays that were only occasionally more personal. Finally, high Modernists such as William Carlos Williams (1883–1963), T.S. Eliot (1888–1965), Ezra Pound (1885–1972), and Gertrude Stein (1874–1946) used the essay mainly to explain and defend their experiments in other genres.

Despite the use of the essay by writers primarily known for their work in fiction or poetry, and the popularity of the essays appearing in magazines and newspaper columns, the essay, especially the personal essay, remained under attack during the 1930s. As editor of the Saturday Review of Literature, Henry Seidel Canby tried to temper and control the debate over the death of the essay, but found this harder to do as the 1930s grew more and more politicized. Katharine Fullerton Gerould (1879–1944), along with Agnes Repplier, had long been leading the defense of the traditional light essay. Throughout the 1920s Gerould had decried the rise of commercialism, the lowering of standards, and what she called “the plight of the genteel.” In 1934, Canby let Gerould call for a “plebiscite” on the essay in the pages of his magazine. “The perfect essayist,” she wrote, “could write a good essay on Hitler or on hogs, and I should be enchanted to read it—but he has not done it yet, and I am not yet enchanted.” Harking back to a distinction William Dean Howells (1837–1920) had noted as early as 1902, Gerould asked if readers wanted mere “articles,” or rather the leisure, the meditations, and the light touch of the genteel essay. Then, making her distinction into a dogmatic either/or, she asked if they wanted “news” or “truth.” Her appeal backfired: she and the essay were branded as retrograde. As one reader put it, “Mrs. Gerould is complacent, slightly irritating. My plebeian vote is in favor of the present and the future against the past.” The editor of Scribner’s got on the bandwagon as well, writing to Gerould that “this is not an age of polite letters, and writing has ceased to be the province of the cultured.” He polled his readers, proudly quantified the results, and notified Gerould that only three per cent wanted a return to her kind of essay. For the time, the debate seemed to be over. Gerould and the genteel essay had lost.

7. The 1940s: The Example of E.B. White

It was E.B. White, himself an Ivy League-educated son of the same Eastern genteel upper middle class that Gerould defended, who provided a way out of the dilemma that threatened to kill the essay. However, he had to leave the New Yorker and become haunted by the rise of fascism in order to do it. In 1938, tired of weekly deadlines and Ross' insistence that he use the editorial "we," White decided to leave New York for Maine and the New Yorker for Harper's. For the next five years he wrote a monthly column entitled "One Man's Meat." In these pieces (collected in a book with the same title in 1942), he found a voice that was at once personal and public. He talked about everyday life on his saltwater farm but also attacked fascism, defended democracy, supported American intervention in Europe, and anticipated the United Nations by calling for world government, or what he called "supranationalism."

White's ability to talk about such politically charged issues in the quiet voice of a Yankee farmer (or at least New York writer playing Yankee farmer) set a precedent and did much to solve a problem that had been facing the American essay since the first challenges to the genteel tradition around the turn of the century. He added weight to the light essay, allowing it to take on controversial public issues while retaining the charm of its familiar style.

In 1943 White returned full-time to the New Yorker, and if he never burned with quite as blue a flame as he had during the period of "One Man's Meat," a period he referred to later as "one of those rare interludes that can never be repeated, a time of enchantment," he would still write enough wonderful essays to remain the dominant voice in the field for at least another 20 years. White continued to write familiar, sometimes almost folksy, pieces, but the political commitment that had fueled "One Man's Meat" remained a part of him; his essays of the 1950s and 1960s spoke eloquently to issues such as civil rights, nuclear testing, and the environment.

8. The 1950s: Political Voices in a Quiet Time

White was hardly the only essayist to take political stands during the 1950s. On the contrary, that decade, usually seen as quiet and complacent, witnessed the appearance of many strong, committed nonfiction writers. But White was the exception in the sense that his voice was generally more personal than those of Lionel Trilling (1905–75), Irving Howe (1920–93), Alfred Kazin (1915–), Mary McCarthy (1912–89), Harold Rosenberg (1906–78), Elizabeth Hardwick (1916–), Stanley Edgar Hyman (1919–70), and Leslie Fiedler (1917–). Primarily literary critics (or in Rosenberg's case, art critic), these New York intellectuals had roots in 1930s radicalism, were associated with journals of cultural criticism such as Partisan Review (1934–) and Dissent, and were public intellectuals in the tradition of Edmund Wilson (himself still quite active in the 1950s) rather than personal essayists like White.

The decade also saw the emergence of three young writers who, though they saw themselves as novelists first, will perhaps be best remembered for their work in nonfiction—James Baldwin (1924–87), Norman Mailer (1923–), and Gore Vidal (1925–). All three brought deep political commitment (Mailer and Vidal both ran for public office) as well as their experience as fiction writers to their essay writing. Sometimes, they also seemed to live their private lives in public: Baldwin and Vidal were openly gay even before the Stonewall Rebellion of 1968, and Vidal and Mailer acquired celebrity status through their work in films and on television. They used their essays to create these well-defined, sometimes defiant public personae.

9. The 1960s and 1970s: Social Upheaval and the New Journalism

Mailer's propensity for putting himself as a character into his narrative essays (and often referring to that self in the third person) made him a pioneer of the New Journalism, which has had a tremendous impact on the development of the personal essay at the end of the century. Many New Journalists used techniques similar to Mailer's to challenge what they felt to be an impossible obsession with objectivity on the part of traditional journalism. Mailer, Tom Wolfe (1930–), Gay Talese (1932–), and others borrowed techniques from fiction such as the extensive use of dialogue, developed scenes, sensory details, experimental punctuation, colloquialisms, and neologisms, and in so doing made their magazine articles more essayistic. Many of these New Journalists focused on longer, book-length pieces, leading to their association (particularly in the case of Truman Capote [1924–84]) with the “non-fiction novel,” but even then their chapters sometimes had the feel of self-contained essays. All in all, they had a major influence on the essay by creatively blurring some of the old distinctions between journalism and belles-lettres that had long dogged the essay.

These and other practitioners of the New Journalism such as Pete Hamill (1935–), Dan Wakefield (1932–), Seymour Krim (1922–89), and Joan Didion (1934–) changed not only the form of creative nonfiction but also broadened its subject matter by reporting as participating observers from the turbulent centers of their times—Mailer marching on the Pentagon to protest the Vietnam War, Krim hobnobbing with his fellow Beats, Didion mixing with the star culture of Los Angeles and Hollywood, and Wolfe spending extended periods with everyone from acid-dropping hippies to straitlaced astronauts.

Debates over the future of the novel, intersections with European culture (especially French critical theory after May 1968), the founding of the New York Review of Books (1963–), accounting for the boom in Latin American literature, and other developments in and out of the academy prompted much activity among more formal, intellectual essayists during this period. As with the New Journalism, much of this work was done by practicing novelists including Didion, William H. Gass (1924–), John Barth (1930–), Susan Sontag (1933–), Cynthia Ozick (1928–), and Stanley Elkin (1930–95). These writers wrote a personal, richly allusive, highly stylized kind of critical essay on subjects ranging from the nature of fiction to the role writers should or should not play in the political movements of the times.

10. The 1980s to the Present: The Revival of the Essay

The political movements of the 1960s and 1970s had a tremendous effect on the development of the essay. Through the experiments of the New Journalists, not only did they make the already loose form of the essay even more open than it had been since at least the 1920s, they also led to new voices using the essay to speak to new constituencies of readers. The result has been an explosion in the number of skilled essayists publishing in America at the century's end.

The civil rights movement, for instance, forced much debate and discussion of issues of race, and the personal essay was a form particularly suited to testimony, witness, and stirring anecdote. During the 1960s leaders of the civil rights movement such as Martin Luther King, Jr. (1929–68), Eldridge Cleaver (1935–), and George Jackson (1941–71) used the essay to advance the cause. The intersection of the women's movement with the civil rights movement resulted in several new voices that focused on the interconnectedness of racism and sexism, among them Alice Walker (1944–), Angela Davis (1944–), Toni Morrison (1931–), and Audre Lorde (1934–92). Other struggles for democratic rights during this period have led to essays emerging from communities that had not normally been associated with the form in the past. Among these new voices are Maxine Hong Kingston (1940–), Richard Rodriguez (1944–), Judith Ortiz Cofer (1952–), Gary Soto (1952–), Leslie Marmon Silko (1948–), and Naomi Shihab Nye (1952–). The success of many of these movements has led to the establishment of new areas of specialization within the academy, the recovery of lost texts, and the insertion of new voices into the canon of Western literature. The backlash against these changes during the Reagan years led to the culture wars of the late 1980s and early 1990s, during which a number of minority academics made names for themselves while using the personal essay to argue their case; these included Henry Louis Gates, Jr. (1950–), Gerald Early (1952–), bell hooks (1952–), and Shelby Steele (1946–).

The second wave of feminism in the 1970s also swept in a number of new writers intent on breaking down barriers between the personal and the political. Besides the minority feminists listed above, other women who have found the essay particularly conducive to this goal are Adrienne Rich (1929–), Gloria Steinem (1934–), Katha Pollitt (1949–), and Nancy Mairs (1943–).

A final kind of essay which has attracted a considerable number of skilled practitioners in recent years is the nature essay. Working from a strong tradition that developed in the 19th century, and energized by the environmental movement, mid-20th-century greats such as Aldo Leopold (1886–1948), Loren Eiseley (1907–77), and Rachel Carson (1907–64) have been joined by a new generation of nature writers, including practicing scientists such as Lewis Thomas (1913–93), Edward O. Wilson (1929–), Stephen Jay Gould (1941–), and popularizers of science such as John McPhee (1931–) and David Quammen (1948–). A host of other writers produce both fiction and nonfiction, but in their nonfiction have often focused on nature and landscape; these include Edward Abbey (1927–89), Edward Hoagland (1932–), Annie Dillard (1945–), Barry Lopez (1945–), Gretel Ehrlich (1946–), and Scott Russell Sanders (1945–).³

11. Conclusion

The view that the essay is inherently precious and irrelevant persists. In the preface to the most recent full-length study of the genre, The Observing Self: Rediscovering the Essay (1988), Graham Good admits that he launched his project with some trepidation because the word “essay” still “conjures up the image of a middle-aged man in a worn tweed jacket in an armchair smoking a pipe by a fire in his private library in a country house somewhere in southern England, in about 1910, maundering on about the delights of idleness, country walks, tobacco, old wine, and old books..."

Despite Good's concerns, the essay seems more alive than ever, even if it "lives in disguise," as Phillip Lopate (1943–), an important contemporary American essayist and anthropologist, put it in a 1984 essay. Whether it is labeled New Journalism, creative nonfiction, or just nature writing, the American essay has, at least since Fitzgerald's pieces about his mental breakdown or E.B.White's essays about Hitler and hogs in One Man's Meat, been moving inexorably toward subjects that are at once more intimate and more public than the safe and chatty reveries of the genteel essayists of the late Victorian era. Today the most respected American essayists write uninhibitedly and skillfully about issues as personal as their own addictions and maladies and as public as women's liberation and environmental awareness, often within the same essay.

DAN ROCHE (PARTS 1–3)

NED STUCKEY-FRENCH (PARTS 4–11)

Anthologies

The Art of the Essay, edited by Leslie Fiedler, New York: Crowell, 1969 (original edition, 1958)

Best American Essays series, edited by Robert Atwan and guest editors, Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1986–

The Bread Loaf Anthology of Contemporary American Essays, edited by Robert Pack and Jay Parini, Hanover, New Hampshire: University Press of New England, 1989

Modern Essays, edited by Russel Nye and Arra M.Garab, Glenview, Illinois: Foresman, 1969 (original edition, 1953)

The Open Form: Essays for Our Time, edited by Alfred Kazin, New York: Harcourt Brace and World, 1970 (original edition, 1961)

The Oxford Book of American Essays, edited by Brander Matthews, New York: Oxford University Press, 1914

The Penguin Book of Contemporary American Essays, edited by Maureen Howard, New York: Viking, 1984

Speech and Power: The African-American Essay and Its Cultural Content from Polemics to Pulpit, edited by Gerald Early, New York: Ecco Press, 2 vols., 1992–93

Further Reading

Anderson, Chris, editor, Literary Nonfiction: Theory, Practice, Pedagogy, Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1989

Atkins, G.Douglas, Estranging the Familiar: Toward a Revitalized Critical Writing, Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1992

Brodbeck, May, American Non-Fiction, 1900–1950, Chicago: Regnery, 1952

Butrym, Alexander J., editor, Essays on the Essay: Redefining the Genre, Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1989

Davis, Hallam Walker, The Column, New York: Knopf, 1926

Drew, Elizabeth, "The Lost Art of the Essay," Saturday Review of Literature, 16

February 1935

Eaton, W.P., "On Burying the Essay," Virginia Quarterly Review 24 (1948):574–83

Edson, C.L., The Gentle Art of Columning: A Treatise on Comic Journalism, New York: Brentano, 1920

Emerson, Everett, editor, Major Writers of Early American Literature, Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1972

Fadiman, Clifton, "A Gentle Dirge for the Familiar Essay," in his Party of One, Cleveland: World, 1955:349–53

Flanagan, John T., "A Word for the American Essay," American Scholar 14, no. 4 (October 1944): 459–66

Good, Graham, The Observing Self: Rediscovering the Essay, London and New York: Routledge, 1988

Granger, Bruce, American Essay Serials from Franklin to Irving, Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1978

Howells, William Dean, "The Old-Fashioned Essay," Harper's (October 1902):802–03

Krutch, Joseph Wood, "No Essays, Please!," Saturday Review of Literature, 10 March 1951:18–19+

Lopate, Phillip, "The Essay Lives—in Disguise," New York Times Book Review, 18 November 1984

Loveman, Amy, "A Disappearing Art," Saturday Review of Literature, 23 July 1932:1

McCord, David, "Once and for All," Saturday Review of Literature, 5 October 1929:208

Piercy, Josephine K., Studies in Literary Types in Seventeenth Century America, 1607–1710, Hamden, Connecticut: Archon, 1969 (original edition, 1939)

Rascoe, Burton, "What of Our Essayists?," Bookman 55 (1922): 74–75

Repplier, Agnes, "The Passing of the Essay," in her In the Dozy Hours, Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1894:226–35

Repplier, Agnes, "The American Essay in Wartime," Yale Review 7, no. 2 (January 1918):249–59

Sherman, Stuart, "An Apology for Essayists of the Press," in his Points of View, New York: Scribner, 1924:173–85

Strunsky, Simeon, "The Essay of Today," English Journal 17, no. 1 (January 1928):8–16

Tanner, William, General Introduction, Essays and Essay-Writing, edited by Tanner, Boston: Little Brown, 1935 (original edition, 1918)

Van Doren, Carl, "Day In and Day Out: Manhattan Wits," in his Many Minds, Port Washington, New York: Kennikat Press, 1966: 181–99 (original edition, 1924)

Waters, John P., "A Little Old Lady Passes Away," Forum and Century 90, no. 1 (July 1933):27–29

The American Scholar

American journal, 1932–

Every issue of the current American Scholar begins with a personal essay by "Aristides," the nom de plume of editor and renowned essayist Joseph Epstein. His familiar writing on such topics as napping, name-dropping, and personal musical tastes is not at all academic in the traditional sense, but then, despite its title, the American Scholar is not a traditional scholarly journal. Rather it draws its name from the 1837 Phi Beta Kappa address at Harvard University by the great American essayist Ralph Waldo Emerson, who enlarged the definition of a scholar to “man thinking.” In this speech, which James Russell Lowell called “an event without any former parallel in our literary annals” and Oliver Wendell Holmes hailed as “our intellectual Declaration of Independence,” Emerson declared that “Man is not a farmer, or a professor, or an engineer, but he is all. Man is priest, and scholar, and statesman, and producer, and soldier.” Unfortunately, Emerson concluded, in our time these functions have been divided one from another so that each person inhabits only one aspect of his or her potential. The American Scholar strives to mitigate this trend by helping its readers embrace all aspects of this Emersonian selfhood.

The American Scholar began publication in 1932, as the successor to the Phi Beta Kappa Key, publishing for members of PBK (the national academic honor society) as well as “for all who have general intellectual interests.” In its first issue, the editorial board promised that the American Scholar would be “devoted to general scholarship,” an assurance reiterated over 60 years later by the current editorial team, who characterized the publication as “fill[ing] the gap between learned journals and good magazines for a popular audience.” In its current format, each quarterly issue leads off with general essays, followed by more specifically topical essays (marked by their smaller print) on the arts, sciences, social sciences, literature, politics, legal issues, and current events, as well as categories such as “memoir” and “reappraisal.” Book reviews, some poetry, and the occasional book excerpt fill out the journal’s offerings; as one reviewer noted, it is “an ideal magazine to be read leisurely.” Commenting on the magazine’s continuing interest in the current affairs of the world, the Winter 1939–40 editorial noted that “The table of contents of a journal of contemporary thought, such as The American Scholar aspires to be, may reflect, more than its editors are aware, the salient features of the modern scene.”

Although the magazine’s first essays were strictly formal, by the 1940s the tone was becoming increasingly familiar as the journal began including more addresses and speeches, thus easing its transition into publishing informal essays. It is this personal tone, one which recognizes that sophisticated and erudite readers not only appreciate serious discussion about wide-ranging issues but also have both a compassionate interest in their fellow humans and a sense of humor, that remains at the forefront of the American Scholar’s publishing sensibility. During much of its history, the magazine has included in every issue a long-running series of familiar essays by a single author, including philosopher Irwin Edman’s “Under Whatever Sky” (1945–54), Joseph Wood Krutch’s “If You Don’t Mind My Saying So” (1955–70), and Epstein’s quarterly “Aristides” essay (1975–). While the journal has also regularly published more formal essays, including René Dubos’ “The Despairing Optimist” series (1970–77), it is the magazine’s personal, informal essays, following in the tradition of Addison, Steele, Edmund Burke, and Montaigne, that have contributed to the popularity of the essay form in contemporary culture. According to Epstein, “The familiar essayist lives, and takes his professional sustenance, in the everyday flow of things,” and the American audience has responded well, giving the journal a circulation of 26,000 (as of 1993), large for a magazine of its type. The American Scholar has clearly played a leading role in claiming for the personal essay its own territory in the American literary landscape.

For a magazine so long-lived, the American Scholar has had a remarkable consistency of editors. The founding editor, William Allison Shimer, held that position until 1943, when he joined the armed forces to fight in World War II. Marjorie Hope Nicolson, president of the United Chapters of PBK, served as interim editor for one year before handing over the reins to Hiram Haydn, editor from Autumn 1944 until his death in 1973. During Haydn's tenure, the magazine was subtitled "A Quarterly for the Independent Thinker," reminding readers of the journal's Emersonian roots. Following Haydn's death, editorial board member Peter Gay served as acting editor for two issues until Joseph Epstein stepped into the editorial role, a position he still holds. This consistency of leadership has also been expressed in the journal's physical appearance, for the packaging of the magazine remains very similar to that of the first issue—quiet, understated, and discreet. The editorial board has seen far more diversity, having included such disparate thinkers as Hannah Arendt, Jacques Barzun, Saul Bellow, Ralph Ellison, Erik Erikson, John Erskine, John Kenneth Galbraith, Clifford Geertz, Lillian Hellman, Randall Jarrell, Judith Martin, Margaret Mead, Daniel P. Moynihan, and Robert Penn Warren, many of whom are themselves innovators of the essay in its various manifestations.

In Winter 1976–77, the editors paused to commemorate the Phi Beta Kappa bicentennial and reexamine the purpose of the American Scholar, one of the honor society's major public activities. Epstein and the editorial board noted that the journal—and by extension the essay genre itself—linked society and the intellectual world, striving to play the same role that David Hume (quoted in that issue's editorial) attributed to his own essay writing: "I cannot but consider myself as a kind of resident or ambassador from the dominions of learning to those of conversation, and shall think it my constant duty to promote a good correspondence betwixt these two states, which have so great a dependence on each other." In fulfilling this function, the American Scholar has changed its focus very little over the years. Echoing the journal's first editorial policy, Epstein recently remarked, "We hope chiefly to be interesting and entertaining to people who are interested in ideas and culture"—people, that is, who are American Scholars.

KAREN A. KEELY

The Anatomy of Melancholy

by Robert Burton, 1621; subsequent revised editions

Robert Burton (1577–1640) was one of the most prolific essayists of the 17th century. He published only one book; yet that book, The Anatomy of Melancholy, was his life's work. Nor did that single volume cramp the range of his style, which flowed, he wrote in his preface, "now serious, then light; now comical, then satirical; now more elaborate, then remiss, as the present subject required, or as at that time I was affected." Burton's claims for the variety of his style are not exaggerated. The title of the work suggests a twofold narrowness of focus, yet Burton somehow escapes the confines of both types of narrowness.

The first restriction is a structural one suggested by Anatomy: an anatomy is both analytical and synthetic, distinguishing a thing into its constituent parts, and highlighting relationships of each to each and each to the whole. Such a genre suggests a clinical, scientific style, which Burton supplies where necessary: “The upper of the hypochondries, in whose right side is the liver, the left the spleen; from which is denominated hypochondriacal melancholy.” Yet within each of the compartments of the anatomy Burton feels free to indulge in a more personal, subjective style, echoing his preface, wherein he urges the reader not to read his book, for “‘Tis not worth the reading” and “thou canst not think worse of me than I do of myself.” Further freedom comes from the nature of anatomy: interconnecting all aspects of melancholy not only allows but requires Burton to touch on a variety of subtopics.

The limitation of the major topic presents the second restriction, one of content. Yet in Burton’s treatment, to write about melancholy is to write about the human condition, the subject of all great writing. To discuss melancholy is to discuss war, love, religion, imagination, sorrow, fear, or virtually any other essential element of human nature. Within the rigid structure of the anatomy Burton has imbedded essays on topics as manifold as Montaigne’s or Bacon’s.

While Burton’s style may vary from scientific to personal, one element is constant: his prose is macaronic, playing Latin off against English. To some extent, this is true of almost all Jacobean prose: Latin intrudes more or less naturally in the works of educated writers of all European languages in the 17th century. Yet what is remarkable about Burton’s Latinity is that it confines itself to parenthetical quotations and, sometimes, to word order: it has comparatively little effect on his diction. The Latinate “inkhorn” terms so prevalent in the writings of his contemporaries appear much less frequently in Burton’s, and those that do tend to be personal favorites used habitually rather than nonce-words. For every constringe, clancular, or calamistrate in Burton’s prose, we find half a dozen Anglo-Saxon colloquialisms such as gubber-tushed, fuzzled, or dizzard. The native vocabulary increases his verbal range, as English, in his century as in ours, has by far the largest vocabulary of any European language: to confine oneself to Latinate diction, even with inkhorn neologisms, is to narrow one’s range severely in comparison to English. Burton’s sentence structure also tends to be less Latinate than that of many contemporaries; rarely subordinating, his clauses and phrases tend to progress by apposition or accretion.

Structurally Burton’s style illustrates the early 17th-century reaction to the Elizabethan imitations of Cicero’s Latin style. Ciceronian prose triumphed in the periodic sentence, lengthy constructions filled out by subordinate clauses and balanced antitheses. Burton and many of his contemporaries (particularly John Donne in his sermons, and Sir Thomas Browne) imitated the contrasting Silver Age style of Seneca and Tacitus, characterized by epigrammatic concision. The epigrammatic unit of Burton’s Senecan style, however, was usually the clause, not the sentence, making his sentences as long as any Ciceronian period, but less symmetrical. The lack of balance and parallelism created the illusion of spontaneity; parallelism is obviously an artistic choice, whereas a Burtonian list or parenthesis sounds like a sudden outburst.

The impression of spontaneity and colloquialism in Burton’s prose is all the more delightful for its ironic context: The Anatomy of Melancholy is a bookworm's distillation of a long life spent in libraries. The word "anatomy" suggests a logical order which this particular anatomy demonstrates only on the surface, in its table of contents and chapter headings. Within an individual topic, which can often be considered a separate essay, Burton's organizing principle seems to be not logical connection but rather free association. One anecdote suggests another, tangentially related, which suggests another, related more to the second than the first, so that a section might end quite a distance from its starting point. This syntactical looseness makes Burton's prose sound quite modern to many 20th-century critics.

JOHN R.HOLMES

Editions

The Anatomy of Melancholy, What It Is, 1621; revised editions, 1624, 1628, 1632, 1638, 1651; edited by Holbrook Jackson, 1932, and Thomas C.Faulkner, Nicolas K.Kiessling, and Rhonda L.Blair, 3 vols., 1989–94

Further Reading

- Babb, Lawrence, Sanity in Bedlam: A Study of Robert Burton's "Anatomy of Melancholy", East Lansing: Michigan State University Press, 1959
- Browne, Robert M., "Robert Burton and the New Cosmology," Modern Language Quarterly 13 (1952):131–48
- Burgess, Anthony, "The Anatomy of Melancholy," Horizon 12, (Autumn 1970):48–53
- Colie, Rosalie, "Some Notes on Burton's Erasmus," Renaissance Quarterly 20 (1967):335–41
- Evans, Bergen, The Psychiatry of Robert Burton, New York: Columbia University Press, 1944
- Fox, Ruth A., The Tangled Chain: The Structure of Disorder in the "Anatomy of Melancholy", Berkeley: University of California Press, 1976
- Gardiner, Judith Kegan, "Elizabethan Psychology and Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy," Journal of the History of Ideas 38 (1977):373–88
- Gottlieb, Hans Jordan, Robert Burton's Knowledge of English Poetry, Berkeley: University of California, 1937
- Korkowski, Bud, "Genre and Satiric Strategy in Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy" Genre 8 (1979):74–87
- Mueller, William R., The Anatomy of Robert Burton's England, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1952
- Osler, Sir William, "Robert Burton: The Man, His Book, His Library," Oxford Bibliographical Society, Proceedings and Papers 1 (1912–26):162–90
- Simon, Jean Robert, Robert Burton (1577–1640) et "L'Anatomie de la Mélancolie", Paris: Didier, 1964
- Traister, Barbara H., "New Evidence About Burton's Melancholy," Renaissance Quarterly 29 (1976):66–70

Andersch, Alfred

German, 1914–1980

Alfred Andersch had a prolific career as an essayist: besides composing a lengthy treatise on the state of German literature after two world wars, he published four volumes of collected essays, produced and hosted numerous radio programs (among them the “radio-essay”) for West Germany’s leading broadcasting companies, and founded two important journals—Der Ruf: Unabhängige Blätter der jungen Generation (The call: independent journal of the young generation) and Texte und Zeichen (Texts and signs), which nurtured the essay tradition among the postwar generation of German writers. The scope and depth of his essays are as diverse as the roles he took on as author, editor, journalist, publisher, and radio man. Scattered among his many literary essays are astute social and political commentaries, art, film, and theater reviews, travel prose, author portraits (Thomas Mann, Ernst Jünger), aphorisms, and short philosophical glosses. The recent critical attention being given to Andersch’s essays and radio work not only provides a glimpse into a brilliant career as a nonfiction writer, but also demonstrates in Andersch an important media figure and cultural talent scout. While foregrounding Andersch’s interest in issues concerned with writing, cultural literacy, and aesthetics, the essays reveal a dynamic style that seeks to mediate continually between the historical, political, and socioeconomic contexts of modernity.

Andersch’s capacity as editor and journalist for Der Ruf sparked his foray into essay writing. Along with Hans Werner Richter, Andersch sought to produce a journal that would capture the energy of the new generation of postwar writers and intellectuals. Throughout his career as an essayist, Andersch published essays in some of West Germany’s principal literary and political journals, including Frankfurter Hefte (Frankfurt numbers), Merkur (Mercury), konkret (concrete), and Kürbiskern (Pumpkins). With the first meeting of the Gruppe 47 (Group 47) in 1947, which he organized, and the publication of the treatise Deutsche Literatur in der Entscheidung (German literature at the turning point) in 1948, Andersch established himself as a perceptive critic of German literature and advocate of Germany’s younger generation of writers. When he began work in broadcasting at Radio Frankfurt (later Hessischer Rundfunk) in 1948, these convictions became guiding forces. Andersch spent the next ten years of his life working for the leading broadcasting companies in West Germany. His creation of such programs as the Abendstudio and the “radio-essay” expanded the role of radio beyond reporting to include literary and artistic productions. In the Funkkurier (1955; Radio courier) Andersch described the “radio-essay” as a “poetic document of the reality of our world and of the life of men in that world.” The unique synthesis in the “radio-essay” of artistic and political expression, musical and literary pieces, forged such critically acclaimed endeavors as the series entitled “Die Professoren” (The professors), which invited scholars like Walter Jens, Theodor W. Adorno, Walter Muschg, and Max Bense out of the classroom and into the studio to perform their ideas and put their theories into practice. The popularity of these talkbased programs stemmed from the expertise which they assumed of their audience, and made Andersch a household name. It is from his development of the “radio-essay” that his conception of the essay is brought forth. Influenced by Adorno’s notion of the “constellation,” Andersch’s inclusion of music, literature, criticism, and politics in any one broadcast allowed for a montage of constantly shifting discourses, thereby illustrating the multifarious nature of the modern world. Andersch himself emphasized the word “trial,” seeing the essay component of these radio broadcasts as providing for “the lively character of the trial or attempt, which remains continuously open to all possibilities.” This intriguing definition of the “radio-essay” acts as an underlying premise for Andersch’s written essays, and thus suggests some motifs common to his essays, radio broadcasts, and editorial ideals.

The essays highlight an attempt to reanimate the spirit of German Modernism, which had fallen victim to the Third Reich. The treatise Deutsche Literatur in der Entscheidung, the essays “Thomas Mann als Politiker” (1955; Thomas Mann as a politician) and “Achtzig und Jünger: Ein politischer Diskurs” (1975; Eighty and Jünger: a political discourse), and the review essays of work by young artists like Heinrich Böll, Arno Schmidt, Pierre Claudel, and Elio Vittorini speak to Andersch’s desire to reconcile the tradition of German Modernism (Mann, Jünger) with the postwar generation’s resuscitation of an avant-garde style attested to in Europäische Avantgarde (1949; European avant-garde), an anthology he edited. Andersch’s work with the technological medium of the radio influenced the pieces he wrote and produced for his weekly features. His realization that his capacity as both radio broadcaster and author magnified the intensity of consumerist culture prompted such radio features as “Denk-Zettel für Kulturkonsumenten” (1959; Thoughts for cultural consumers) and written essays like “Die Blindheit des Kunstwerks” (1956; The blindness of art), “Notiz über die Schriftsteller und den Staat” (1966; Note concerning writers and the state), and “Literatur in den schweizerischen Massenmedien” (1977–78; Literature in the Swiss mass media).

Through Andersch’s editorial ingenuity, which resulted in Der Ruf, Europäische Avantgarde, the brochure-series “studio frankfurt” (1951), and the literary journal Texte und Zeichen, young poets, artists, and essayists were given an intellectual venue where they could showcase their talents. The constellation of ideas set up by Andersch’s role as essayist, radio figure, and editor sketches a trajectory between the height of German Modernism and the birth of a postwar literary tradition, between the machinations of the Third Reich and the economic miracle of the 1950s. The importance of these essays, the care and detail with which they were written and their perceptive analyses of contemporary German culture demonstrate in Alfred Andersch an essayist of great significance in a continued and lively tradition of essay writing in Germany.

DANIEL D.GILFILLAN

Biography

Born 4 February 1914 in Munich. Studied at the Wittelsbacher Gymnasium, Munich, 1924–28. Worked for a publisher, 1928–30. Member of the youth organization of the Communist Party, 1932, and as a result spent six months in Dachau concentration camp, 1933. Office worker, Munich and Hamburg, 1933–40. Married Angelika Albert, 1935 (divorced, 1943): one daughter. Served in the German army, 1940–41, 1943–44: deserted on the Italian front and became a prisoner of war in the United States, where he worked on Der Ruf prisoners' publication, 1945. Editorial assistant to Erich Kästner, Neue Zeitung (New gazette), Munich, 1945–46; coeditor, Der Ruf, Munich, 1946–47. Cofounder, Gruppe 47, 1947. Founder and director of Abendstudio, Frankfurt Radio, 1948–50, and of "radio-essays" for South German Radio, Stuttgart, 1955–58 (assisted by Hans Magnus Enzensberger). Married Gisela GroneuerDichgans, 1950: two sons and one daughter. Founder and editor, Texte und Zeichen, 1955–57. Moved to Switzerland, 1958, and became a Swiss citizen, 1973. Led an expedition to the Arctic, 1965. Member, German Academy of Languages and Literature. Awards: German Critics' Prize, 1958; Nelly Sachs Prize, 1968; Charles Veillon Prize, 1968; Bavarian Academy Literature Prize. Died (of kidney failure) in Berzona, 21 February 1980.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Deutsche Literatur in der Entscheidung, 1948

Wanderungen im Norden, 1962

Die Blindheit des Kunstwerks und andere Aufsätze, 1965

Aus einem römischen Winter: Reisebilder, 1966

Hohe Breitengrade, oder Nachrichten von der Grenze, 1969

Norden, Süden, rechts und links: Von Reisen und Büchern 1951–1971, 1972

Einige Zeichnungen, 1977

Öffentlicher Brief an einen sowjetischen Schriftsteller, das Überholte betreffend:

Reportagen und Aufsätze, 1977

Ein neuer Scheiterhaufen für alte Ketzer: Kritiken und Rezensionen, 1979

Selected Writings, 1979

Es gibt kein fremdes Leid (Briefe und Essays zu Krieg und Frieden), with Konstantin Simonow, edited by Friedrich Hitzer, 1981

Other writings: four novels (Sansibar oder der letzte Grund [Flight to Afar], 1957; Die Rote [The Red-Head], 1960; Efraim [Efraim's Book], 1967; Winterspelt, 1974), short stories, radio plays, poetry, and an autobiography (1952).

Bibliographies

- Kieser, Harro, "Alfred Andersch: Bibliographie der Sekundär-literatur, 1984–1993," in Alfred Andersch, Perspektiven zu Leben und Werk, edited by Irene Heidelberger-Leonard and Volker Wehdeking, Opladen: Westdeutscher Verlag, 1994:221–25
- Williams, R., "Alfred Andersch," Kritisches Lexikon zur Deutschsprachigen Gegenwartsliteratur 1, no. 1 (1984)

Further Reading

- Haffmans, Gerd, editor, Über Alfred Andersch, Zurich: Diogenes, 1987 (original edition, 1974)
- Jendricke, Bernhard, Alfred Andersch in Selbstzeugnissen und Bilddokumenten, Reinbek bei Hamburg: Rowohlt, 1988
- Kunz, Eleonore, Das publizistische und literarische Wirken Alfred Anderschs von 1945 bis zum Ende der fünfziger Jahre (dissertation), Leipzig: University of Leipzig, 1984
- Kunz, Eleonore, "Reise- und Landschaftsprosa seit 1944," in Alfred Andersch, Perspektiven zu Leben und Werk, edited by Irene Heidelberger-Leonard and Volker Wehdeking, Opladen: Westdeutscher Verlag, 1994:65–74
- Liebe, Matthias, Alfred Andersch und sein "Radio-Essay", Frankfurt-on-Main and New York: Lang, 1990
- Liebe, Matthias, "Alfred Andersch als Gründer und Leiter des 'Radio-Essays'," in Alfred Andersch, Perspektiven zu Leben und Werk, edited by Irene Heidelberger-Leonard and Volker Wehdeking, Opladen: Westdeutscher Verlag, 1994:171–77
- Reinhardt, Stephan, Alfred Andersch, eine Biographie, Zurich: Diogenes, 1990
- Schmidt, Arno, Das essayistische Werk zur deutschen Literatur in 4 Bänden, Sämtliche Nachtprogramme und Aufsätze, Zurich: ArnoSchmidt-Stiftung im Haffmanns Verlag, 4 vols., 1988
- Schütz, Erhard, "Alfred Andersch: Reiseprosa und Reportagen," in Zu Alfred Andersch, edited by Volker Wehdeking, Stuttgart: Klett, 1983:132–42
- Wehdeking, Volker, Alfred Andersch, Stuttgart: Metzler, 1983

Aphorism

"Aphorism" is a general, all-encompassing term for a condensed sentence or statement. Short and concise, it is a written or spoken expression of an observation, principle, or precept of truth or advice. (The Oxford English Dictionary defines the aphorism as a "short, pithy sentence expressing a truth of general import.") The etymology of the aphorism is revealing: apo plus horizein denote "away from a marked area or limited boundary." Thus it proceeds by a dual process, of initial divergence from the terms of a given discourse followed by a return to it, but importing an unusual perspective, a process often characterized by a fusion of logic and imagination, or wit. By the 18th century the aphorism had developed into an autonomous literary short form. Descending from the terse scientific-medical precepts of Hippocrates, it extended its range to include Francis Bacon's Novum organum (1620) and the 17th-century philosophical aphorisms of the French moralists such as La Rochefoucauld, La Bruyère, and Chamfort.

The aphorism has included such small forms of brief discourse as the reflection, the apothegm, the axiom, the sentence, the aperçu, the proverb, the adage, the motto, and the maxim. These definitions are determined by a variety of criteria, such as whether the statements are oral or written, authorial or anonymous, practical or theoretical, prosaic or poetic, concrete or metaphorical, descriptive or prescriptive, etc.

The various studies of the aphorism agree in regarding it as a specific mode of inquiry or a particular intellectual response to the relationship between the individual (author, reader) and society. Further, that relationship is articulated through a distinct verbal structure, a literary representation which renders concrete the tension and conflict between individual observation and abstract reflection. Thus, the aphorism is often said to express the uncertainty of experience or a crisis of consciousness.

For many literary critics and theorists, the aphorism remains the sole form of discourse to refuse integration into any system or dominant order of thought. But in breaking up or subverting the status quo from the perspective of observation and presentation, the aphorism simultaneously implies an Other, a contrary order of the “not yet realized.” The aphorism uses rhetorical verbal structures like antithesis, parallelism, proportion, oxymoron, chiasmus, metaphor, and paradox, in a concise, emphatic manner to address this matrix of oppositions.

Like all literary constructions, the aphorism mediates an insight or perception through language. However, the aphorism is highly conscious of the manner in which this mediation occurs. Indeed, it has often been called the literary form that is most aware of itself. But the resulting relationship between writer and reader is neither direct nor conversational, thus differing from that created by the essay. The aphorism’s meaning is not immediately obvious; indeed often at first glance it is impenetrable. It typically works dialectically, through paradox, pun, mixed metaphor, or similarly unexpected verbal and semantic juxtaposition, forcing the reader to rethink, to complete the dialectical process of an active search for an unexpected meaning. Writer and reader require both logic and imagination: first to establish or recognize the digression, the antithesis, the paradox, the hiatus across the linear progression of discourse, and second to make the reconnection.

The essay and the aphorism share many borders, but also demonstrate key contrasts. Both forms require a high degree of learning and sociocultural sophistication by the writer and the reader; both are anti-systematic in their modes of discourse. But the essay is something much greater than an expansion and extension of an aphorism, and an aphorism is more than merely the nucleus of an essay. Whereas the essay is the discourse of experience and observation by the author, subsequently related to an idea or theme, the aphorism proceeds more independently from individual experience. It begins in media res with the initial idea turned inside out. With its greater self-consciousness of language and its closed, inverted form—it is read in an instant, but encourages, even requires, multiple rereadings—the aphorism provides insight but does not provide a basis for dialogue or a dialogic stance by the author toward the reader. In contrast, the essay requires a substantial period of time for its reading, and encourages, with its looser, more open form, a dialogue of thought between author and reader. The aphorism is essentially dictatorial, while the essay is suggestive.

RALPH W. BUECHLER

Anthologies

The Oxford Book of Aphorisms, edited by John Gross, Oxford and New York: Oxford

University Press, 1983

The Viking Book of Aphorisms, edited by W.H. Auden and Louis Kronenberger, New York: Viking, and London: Faber, 1962.

Further Reading

- Blin, Jean-Pierre, "L'Aphorisme dans les romans," Revue Littéraire Mensuelle (November-December 1989):93–103
- Cantarruti, Giulia, and Hans Schumacher, editors, Neuere Studien zur Aphoristik und Essayistik, Frankfurt-on-Main: Lang, 1986
- Crane, Mary Thomas, Proverbial and Aphoristic Sayings: Sources of Authority in the English Renaissance (dissertation), Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University, 1986
- Engel, William E., "Aphorism, Anecdote, and Anamnesis in Montaigne and Bacon," Montaigne Studies 1 (1989):158–76
- Faber, Marion, "The Metamorphosis of the French Aphorism: La Rochefoucauld and Nietzsche," Comparative Literature Studies 23, no. 2 (1986):205–17
- Fricke, Harald, Aphorismus, Stuttgart: Metzler, 1984
- Grenzmann, Wilhelm, "Aphorismus," in Reallexikon der deutschen Literaturgeschichte, edited by Klaus Kanzog, Berlin: de Gruyter, 4 vols., 1958–88 (original edition, edited by Paul Merker and Wolfgang Stammer, 1925–31)
- Jaouen, Françoise, Discours aphoristique et pensée minimaliste: Le Classicisme en petits morceaux (dissertation), Berkeley: University of California, 1991
- Johnston, William M., "The Vienna School of Aphorists 1880–1930: Reflections on a Neglected Genre," in The Turn of the Century: German Literature and Art 1890–1915, edited by Gerald Chapple and Hans H. Schulte, Bonn: Bouvier, 1981
- Kronenberger, Louis, The Last Word: Portraits of Fourteen Master Aphorists, New York: Macmillan, 1972
- Lind, L.R., "The Aphorism: Wisdom in a Nutshell," Classical and Modern Literature 14, no. 4 (Summer 1994):311–22
- Morley, John, Aphorisms: An Address Delivered Before the Edinburgh Philosophical Institution, November II 1887, London and New York: Macmillan, 1887
- Neumann, Gerhard, editor, Aphorismus, Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1976
- Snider, Alvin, "Francis Bacon and the Authority of Aphorism," Prose Studies II, no. 2 (1988):60–71
- Wescott, Roger W., "From Proverb to Aphorism: The Evolution of a Verbal Art Form," Forum Linguisticum 5, no. 3 (1981): 213–25

Apothegm

Since the Renaissance, "apothegm" has been virtually synonymous with "aphorism"—a short, pithy statement of a general truth. Earlier, however, an aphorism was a statement of principle or scientific knowledge, while an apothegm was a statement of ethical, moral, or religious advice from a wise person.

The apothegm emerges in the tradition of “wisdom literature” that stretches back to ancient Egypt. As early as 2500 BCE, Egyptian kings and courtiers instructed their sons or protégés by means of short sayings on good and wise conduct. Jews living in Egypt adopted this practice and, after their expulsion, adapted it to augment religious teachings from the Torah and Talmud. Written records of these oral teachings form the earliest body of wisdom literature.

The early Christians inherited both traditions. In the 4th century, the apothegm appeared as a piece of profoundly considered and heartfelt advice from a holy sage to a seeker after God. At this time, in remote areas of Egypt, an ascetic movement arose: Christians, seeking pure knowledge of God, isolated themselves in the deserts, praying, fasting, and enduring lives of extreme privation, believing that discipline of the flesh brought them closer to God. Some of these anchorites gained reputations as holy men, and younger seekers came to them craving “a word,” in the belief that the older men, through their experience, would be able to direct the younger men’s way to God. Eventually, accounts of the advice thus given were recorded, and came to be known as apophthegmata patrum (sayings of the fathers).

The apothegm as transmitted from the sage to the seeker differs from the bon mot, with which it has more recently been identified. First, the apothegm was delivered to a particular person under particular circumstances: the seeker described his situation and requested guidance; the sage gave advice suited to that unique request. Moreover, the words of advice did not necessarily form the entire message. The face-to-face interaction of seeker and sage—wherein a look or a sign or simply a general sense of the other—was considered a significant element of the transmission of wisdom. Thus the apothegm was not intended to be written down for subsequent generations to apply to their own lives. Nevertheless, sayings were recorded as a way of preserving at least some part of the desert experience, and were later treated as wise sayings of general application. Second, although many hundreds of apothegms came to be collected, so that a medieval monk might read several a day, there might not have been more than a few such sayings received by any one seeker. One story tells of a man who got a word of advice from a sage, practiced it for 20 years, and then returned for another “word.” A single saying, from one who distrusted words to begin with, was a rare event, worthy of much rumination.

The collections of apophthegmata to some extent preserved the context of the sayings by reporting the circumstances under which advice was sought. Although some apothegms are very short (“Abba Alonios said, ‘If I had not destroyed myself completely, I should not have been able to rebuild and shape myself again’”), some are intricate stories of over 1000 words, reporting the condition of the seeker, his relation to the sage, and the circumstances of the question and reply. Thus a longer apothegm resembles a fable.

These sayings were passed down during the Middle Ages in the eastern part of the Christian world, and also made their way, translated and transcribed, into medieval Europe. It seems likely that the transmission process altered the character of these apothegms over time, retaining emphasis on the kernel of the sage’s advice and neglecting the contextualizing story, until by the late 16th century the apothegm was understood among the literate in England as a well-said truth of any sort.

The apothegm clearly influenced the essays of Francis Bacon, who would have been familiar with sayings from the writings of St. Basil the Great, John Cassian, and others. Bacon preserved something like the original concept of the apothegm, in that he treated it as a bit of stored wisdom and sometimes included information about context to clarify the meaning of the saying. With Bacon's emphasis on scientific knowledge, however, the apothegm lost some of its earlier status. In his hands it was no longer the quintessential counsel of an anchorite, but a notable quotation from a famous person. Accordingly, the degree of wisdom that Bacon attributed to the apothegm also diminished. Whereas in ancient times it was the clearest possible statement of transcendent knowledge, with Bacon the apothegm became a rhetorical resource, a means of reinforcing or embellishing an idea already stated. It was the aphorism that was, for Bacon, a vehicle of clear and simple truth; the apothegm was a kind of seasoning or enhancement. Nevertheless Bacon considered this seasoning an important means of making ideas intelligible for a reader, and recommended that apothegms be memorized and used to enliven a text. In Bacon's essay "Of Revenge" (1625) after declaring, "Revenge is a kinde of Wilde Justice..." he adds, among other things:

Cosmus Duke of Florence, had a Desperate Saying, against Perfidious or Neglecting Friends, as if those wrongs were unpardonable: You shall reade (saith he) that we are commanded to forgive our Enemies; But you never read, that wee are commanded, to forgive our Friends.

The anthology Apophthegms New and Old (1625), edited by Bacon, contains nearly 300 examples. His essays, like those of later essayists, are sprinkled with quotations. Because the ideas of such quotations were more important to the essayist than the sources from which they came, however, the sources of quotations were often omitted, and the apothegm became simply the pithy statement of truth that we know it as today.

WILLIAM ZEIGER

Anthologies

The Sayings of the Desert Fathers: The Alphabetical Collection, translated by Sister Benedicta Ward, London: Mowbrays, 1975; revised edition, Kalamazoo, Michigan: Cistercian Publications, 1984

The Wisdom of the Desert: Sayings from the Desert Fathers of the Fourth Century, translated by Thomas Merton, New York: New Directions, 1960

The Wisdom of the Desert Fathers: The Apophthemagta Patrum (the Anonymous Series), translated by Sister Benedicta Ward, Oxford: S.L.G. Press, 1975

Further Reading

Brown, Peter, The Body and Society: Men, Women, and Sexual Renunciation in Early

Christianity, New York: Columbia University Press, 1988

Murphy, Roland E., "Introduction to Wisdom Literature," in The Jerome Biblical Commentary, edited by Raymond E. Brown, Joseph A. Fitzmyer, and Murphy, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice Hall, 1986

Stanton, Leonard J., "Zedergol'm's Life of Elder Leonid of Optima: Apophthegm, Person, and the Chronotope of Encounter," Religion and Literature (Spring 1990): 19–38

Stephens, James, Francis Bacon and the Style of Science, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1975

Torrance, Thomas F., Space, Time and Incarnation, London and New York: Oxford University Press, 1969

Arciniegas, Germán

Colombian, 1900–

The two main forms of literary activity that have earned Colombia's Germán Arciniegas a prominent place in the Latin American essay are his mastery of a distinctive variation of the Spanish and Latin American newspaper column ("Arciniegas' column style," as it is known) and his talent for direct, interesting, and revealing commentary on history. "Elegant," "lucid," and "entertaining" are some of the standard descriptions bestowed by his critics. In both variations of his literary craft (Arciniegas is a writer rather than an informative journalist or bestselling popularizer of history), Latin America—and its relationship with the United States, Spain, and Europe—is the focus of his writings. In the case of the U.S., his essays reveal the uncanny perception of a Latin American observer, making Arciniegas a prominent figure on the level of such figures as Domingo Faustino Sarmiento, José Martí, and Rubén Darío.

For Arciniegas, the mystery of Latin America is a "problem," a temptation, a provocation, and an intellectual challenge. This explains why, in his view, the essay has so often been used to explore the unique features of Latin American culture and the hidden dimensions of its most prominent historical figures, its political and economic factors, and its cultural development. He writes that the essay in Latin America "is not literary entertainment, but an obligatory reflection on the problems that each epoch has imposed upon us. These problems challenge us in more definitive terms than in any other region of the world." Thus, the fitting title of one of his essays is "Nuestra América es un ensayo" (1963; Our America is an essay).

For most of this century readers of the op-ed pages in literally dozens of Latin American newspapers have rarely skipped the articles of the undisputed dean of this journalistic venture. There are crucial explanations for this addiction. When asked by a press syndicate of which he was the founding contributor to provide a clue on how he wrote his columns, Arciniegas said: "I write with the innocent intention of communicating certain personal experiences that give pleasure only to myself, and I invite others to partake in this pleasure...the problem is that I am interested in things lacking importance... I have a sort of inclination for subjects which are dead for most of the people, but they are alive for me” (“Asuntos vivos y asuntos muertos” [1979; Live topics and dead topics]). Arciniegas converts insignificant non-news events or trends into relevant features fit for columns. Circumventing the passage of time, his newspaper contributions can still be read as literature. It is not surprising that a collection of his best columns was edited and enriched with grammatical exercises as a textbook for learning Spanish in U.S. universities because of the clarity of his language, the currency of the subjects, and (most difficult) their attractiveness to young readers belonging to another cultural tradition. Anything might find itself the subject of an Arciniegas column: a black-out in New York, the multiple dimensions of U.S.-Latin American relations, Midwest towns, Christmas in New Jersey, Cuban verbosity, the problems of youth, local conferences and groups, and the lesser-known aspects of literary and political figures, as well as hidden corners of the cities he has visited. His limitless cadre of topics is a characteristic shared with other contributors to Latin American and Spanish newspapers, in contrast to the more specialized U.S. syndicated pundits.

The unique personal form of his columns combines the most outstanding features of both the traditional journalistic crónica and the modern columna in Spanish. Early on Arciniegas understood that newspaper readers do not have the time to discover the hidden message of a column cloaked in convoluted language. Readers are first hooked by a catchy title summoned from his cultural background, a technique Arciniegas uses in the titles of some of his books, such as En el país de los rascacielos y las zanahorias (1945; In the land of skyscrapers and carrots) or El continente de siete colores (1965; The seven-colored continent). Then, instead of offering a summary of the facts as in an information story, Arciniegas complies with the aesthetics of the crónica and gives the reader an opening paragraph full of paradoxes, contradictions, exaggerations, and “news” in personal experiences or in history. From this intriguing beginning, the reader is obliged to follow Arciniegas’ argument until he offers a convincing and usually unforgettable ending which is, in reality, a return to the main point or salient aspect of the piece. Adhering to one of the most important tenets of modern journalism, Arciniegas never overwhelms his readers with unnecessary proof of scholarship or signs of empty erudition. On the other hand, he never insults their intelligence and culture with obvious, elementary facts or interpretations. “Keep the reader in mind” is an American journalism motto which has been mastered best in Latin America by Arciniegas. It is not surprising that his best-known books consist of carefully crafted structures of short columns and essays, each paragraph revealing his distinctive, personal, and humanizing style.

Over the course of his career, Arciniegas has worn many hats—as lawyer and diplomat, minister of education and university professor, newspaper editor and novelist, and member of the Colombian academies of language and history. He has managed at all times through his writings to contribute to the open-ended search to explain Latin American culture with humility, clarity, and good humor.

JOAQUÍN ROY

Biography

Born 6 December 1900 in Bogotá. Studied at the National University, Bogotá, law degree, 1914; delegate to the first National Student Conference; founder and editor, La Voz de la Juventud (The voice of youth) magazine, 1919–10; helped to unionize students in Colombia. Professor of sociology, National University, Bogotá, 1925–28. Founder and editor, Universidad, 1925–29; founder, Ediciones Colombia publishers, 1926. Married Gabriela Vieira, 1926; two daughters. Editor, 1928–30, London correspondent, 1930–33, and editor-in-chief, 1933–39, El Tiempo (The times) newspaper. Vice consul, London, 1930. Member of the Colombian Parliament, 1933–34, 1939–40, and 1957–58, and minister of education, 1941–42 and 1945–46. Chargé d'affaires, Buenos Aires, 1939–41. Director, Revista de las Indias (Review of the Indies), 1939–44; codirector, Revista de America (American magazine), 1945–57. Taught at Columbia University, New York, 1947–59. Ambassador to Italy, 1959–62, Israel, 1960–62, Venezuela, 1967–70, and the Vatican City, 1976–78. Director, Cuadernos (Notebooks), Paris, 1963–65, and Correo de los Andes (Courier of the Andes), 1978–79. Dean of Faculty of Philosophy and Letters, University of the Andes, Bogotá, 1979–81. Awards: Dag Hammarskjold Prize, 1967; honorary degrees from two academic institutions.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

- La universidad colombiana*, 1932
El estudiante de la mesa redonda, 1932
Diario de un peatón, 1936
América, tierra firme: Sociología, 1937
¿Qué haremos con la historia?, 1940
Los alemanes en la conquista de América, 1941
Este pueblo de América, 1945
Biografía del Caribe, 1945
En el país de los rascacielos y las zanahorias, 2 vols., 1945
En medio del camino de la vida, 1949
Entre la libertad y el miedo, 1952; as The State of Latin America, translated by Harriet de Onís, 1952
América mágica, 2 vols., 1959–61
El continente de siete colores, 1965; condensed version, as Latinoamérica: El continente de siete colores, 1967; as Latin America: A Cultural History, translated by Joan MacLean, 1966
Medio mundo entre un zapato: De Lumumba en el Congo a las brujas en Suecia (travel writing), 1969
Nuevo diario de Noé, 1969
Nueva imagen del Caribe, 1970
Transparencias de Colombia, 1973
América en Europa, 1975; as America in Europe: A History of the New World in Reverse, translated by Gabriela Arciniegas and R. Victoria Araña, 1986
El revés de la historia, 1980
Con América nace la nueva historia, edited by Juan Gustavo Cobo Borda, 1990
América es otra cosa, edited by Juan Gustavo Cobo Borda, 1992
América Ladina, edited by Juan Gustavo Cobo Borda, 1993

El mundo cambio en America, edited by Juan Gustavo Cobo Borda, 1993

Cuadernos de un estudiante americano, edited by Juan Gustavo Cobo Borda, 1994

Other writings: works on Latin American history, biographies of Jiménez de Quesada (1942.), Amerigo Vespucci (1955), and Simonetta Cattaneo (1962.), a travel guide to Israel, and a memoir of student days (1932.). Also edited The Green Continent (1944), a collection of essays on Latin America.

Bibliography

Cobo Borda, Juan Gustavo, "Germán Arciniegas: 90 años escribiendo un intento de bibliografía," in Imágenes de América en Alfonso Reyes y en Germán Arciniegas by James Willis Robb, Bogotá: National University, 1990

Further Reading

Cobo Borda, Juan Gustavo, Arciniegas de cuerpo entero, Bogotá: Planeta, 1987

Cobo Borda, Juan Gustavo, editor, Una visión de América: La obra de Germán Arciniegas desde la perspectiva de sus contemporáneos, Bogotá: Instituto Caro y Cuervo, 1990

Córdova y Quesada, Federico, Vida y obras de Germán Arciniegas, Havana: Publications of the Ministry of Education, 1950

González Blanco, Pedro, Adversus Arciniegas: Crítica violenta, Mexico City: Rex, 1946

Robb, James Willis, Imágenes de América en Alfonso Reyes y en Germán Arciniegas, Bogotá: National University, 1990

Arendt, Hannah

German/American, 1906–1975

Hannah Arendt's chief mode of expression was the essay. Several of her books consist of essays she wrote and later assembled and published in book form or added to another work. She preferred the essay genre, because its dialogic form and flexible nature suited her dialectical method of argumentation. Greatly influenced by the German philosophers Martin Heidegger and Karl Jaspers, both of whom she studied under, Arendt was introduced to German Existenz philosophy combined with Søren Kierkegaard's angst and existential themes such as man's solitude and meaningless existence. Moreover, as a German Jew she was influenced by the question "Die Frage nach dem Sinn von Sein" (to question what it means to be) and by Heidegger's "being-question." Throughout her life she explored concepts such as the meaning of existence and the nature of being.

Arendt's first work, the dissertation Der Liebesbegriff bei Augustin (1929; Love and St. Augustine), consumed her for many years. Arendt was obsessed with the concepts of love and goodness, and all of her later topics—political morality, the human condition, evil and totalitarianism, Christian love, and God's love—were related to the ideas she explored in her dissertation. In The Human Condition (1958) she wrote: "Love, although it is one of the rarest occurrences in human lives, possesses an unequalled clarity for the disclosure of WHO, precisely because it is unconcerned to the point of total unworldliness with what the loved person may be, with his qualities and shortcomings no less than with his achievements, failings and transgressions... Love, by its very nature, is unworldly, and it is for this reason that it is not only apolitical but anti-political, perhaps the most powerful of all antipolitical human forces."

For Arendt's mentor Heidegger, the question of being, the relationship between subject and object, and the problem of truth and rational language signaled the end of traditional philosophy. The pre-Socratic philosophers were already occupied with the question of being and the "unhiddenness" (Unverborgenheit) of being, a question which proves impossible to understand by rational philosophy. Heidegger thought philosophy's most important task was how to bring being into the "openness" of its essence. Man must clear the "dark forest," as was claimed by Giambattista Vico, whose work provided the framework for the humanist controversy raging at the time. From this controversy emerged Heidegger's assertion that philosophy has come to an end as metaphysics. Arendt preferred to sidestep this issue, concentrating instead on human action, judgment, and affirmation of man's ontological world and the need for justification of our reality and our connectedness to the world and ourselves. Her philosophical and personal quest, both as a human and as a Jew, was to view the world we live in as more secure and less alien. For Arendt, life is fleeting and precarious, based ontologically on appearance; only judgment allows the historian or philosopher to bestow meaning on our past, our memory, our historical narratives, and our worldliness.

Originally a student of philosophy, Arendt became involved in political theory with the rise of Nazism. Only later did she find her way through political thought back to philosophy. The tension between philosophy and politics represented for her a major impasse; she claimed that the activity of thinking can make philosophers unwilling to go along with political action and inclined to favor tyranny. Historically, she explained, this discord had not always been present. In the days of the Greek polis (city-state), for example, speech and thought went hand in hand. Each Greek had a doxa (opinion), and there were many different views. All this changed with the death of Socrates. Arendt believed his death produced Plato's opposition to politics, as well as his attempt to replace pluralism with absolute truth, something Socrates never dared.

This historical schism between philosophy and politics became even more acute in Arendt's own life experience. In 1933, when she and other Jews were in danger from Nazism, Heidegger, her mentor and intimate companion of many years, proclaimed his affiliation with the Nazis. This eye-opening experience taught her that indeed there may be a link between philosophy and tyranny. In a 1946 essay on German Existenz philosophy, she blasted Heidegger's views and compared him to Karl Jaspers, who always opposed Nazism and behaved more responsibly politically, and in her judgment was a better philosopher; with him there was no impasse between philosophy and politics, or between thought and action. Yet, despite the high esteem she held for Jaspers, she chose to disregard his advice to pay attention to Max Weber, who envisaged violence as at the core of all politics. Nevertheless, Arendt came close to Weber's assertions in her work on tyranny and totalitarianism. She did not call for imitation of Christian goodness as a response to totalitarianism, but insisted on the need for and responsibility of every citizen to keep the world free of tyranny. In the paper "Collective Responsibility" (wr. 1968) she wrote: "In the center of moral considerations of human conduct stands the self; in the center of political considerations of conduct stands the world. If we strip moral imperatives of their religious connotations and origins we are left with the Socratic proposition: it is better to suffer wrong than to do wrong... The political answer to the Socratic proposition would be: what is important in the world is that there be no wrong...never mind who suffers it; your duty is to prevent it."

For Arendt what was unprecedented in totalitarianism was the event of totalitarian domination itself and its relation to racism and racist theories. In The Origins of Totalitarianism (1951), a study of Nazism and Stalinism whose publication linked her name with controversy and made her both famous and infamous, Arendt reiterated that totalitarianism is a new, unprecedented, and terrible phenomenon. It is not simply a form of tyranny, or a special form of cruelty: what is at stake, she believed, is human nature. She wrote of totalitarianism's attempt to "change human nature," not by making something new and good but, much more sinister, by trying "to rob a human being of his nature under the pretext of changing it"; in that way her characterization of totalitarianism is "absolute" and "radical evil." She cited as an example the extermination camps as "laboratories in which the fundamental belief of totalitarianism that everything is possible is verified," by a process in which men became subhuman, deprived of human freedom or moral responsibility, reduced to "ghastly marionettes with human faces who march docilely to death." Arendt claimed that what was truly sinister was the attempt to turn human beings into "specimens of human beast" by stripping all forms of humanity for the sake of total tyranny and domination of members of the herd. Thus, she wrote to Karl Jaspers, men become "superfluous" as human beings. Moreover, the quest for human omnipotence dictates no human plurality. If man is to be omnipotent, human beings as individuals must disappear. The core idea of totalitarianism is the attempt to maintain total tyranny and prove that "everything is possible" by eliminating human plurality, moral decision making, and freedoms of all kinds to fit a predictable ideology. Tyranny and totalitarianism create a drive for expansion of power, "expansion for expansion's sake," as a self-propelled momentum to which everything else is sacrificed; this was manifested in Nazism, with global conquest on the one hand and "total domination" in the camps on the other.

Arendt believed the impetus for this deadly drive began with Western imperialism, particularly with the "scramble for Africa" in the 1880s. Although of economic origin, based on capitalism, the danger developed when a new kind of politics of cut-throat competition and global expansion emerged. Arendt maintained that racism was part of the ideology of imperialism, providing a comfortable excuse for the exploitation of natives removed from their dominated lands. Arendt feared, and wrote in The Origins of Totalitarianism, that although Nazism was finally defeated, racism would continue to be a problem.

Even more than 20 years since her death, Hannah Arendt continues to echo a contemporary voice, carrying humanistic and universal consciousness. Her work is gaining new interest and popularity possibly because of her fears, premonitions, and timely warnings.

DALIA DANIEL

Biography

Born 14 October 1906 in Hannover, Germany. Studied at Königsberg University, B.A., 1924; University of Marburg; University of Freiburg; University of Heidelberg, studying under Martin Heidegger and Karl Jaspers, from 1926, Ph.D., 1928. Married Günther Stern, 1929 (divorced, 1937). Worked for the Youth Aliyah, Paris, 1934–40. Married Heinrich Blücher, 1940. Emigrated to the United States, 1941, becoming a U.S. citizen, 1950. Research director, Conference on Jewish Relations, New York, 1944–46; chief editor, Schocken Books, New York, 1946–48; executive director, Jewish Cultural Reconstruction, New York, 1949–52. Professor at the University of Chicago, 1963–67, and the New School for Social Research, New York, 1967–75; also visiting professor at various American universities and colleges, 1955–60. Awards: many, including the National Institute of Arts and Letters Award, 1954; Lessing Prize, 1959; Freud Prize, 1967; Sonning Prize, 1975; honorary degrees from eight universities. Died in New York, 4 December 1975.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Sechs Essays, 1948

The Origins of Totalitarianism, 1951; as The Burden of Our Time, 1951; enlarged edition, 1958

The Human Condition, 1958

Between Past and Future: Six Exercises in Political Thought, 1961; enlarged edition, as Between Past and Future: Eight Exercises in Political Thought, 1968

Eichmann in Jerusalem: A Report on the Banality of Evil, 1963; revised, enlarged edition, 1964

On Revolution, 1963

Men in Dark Times, 1968

On Violence, 1970

Die verborgene Tradition: Acht Essays, 1976

The Life of the Mind, 2 vols., 1978

Lectures on Kant's Political Philosophy, edited by Ronald Beiner, 1982

Essays in Understanding, 1930–1954, edited by Jerome Kohn, 1994

Other writings: works on political philosophy, Zionism, and other Jewish issues, and correspondence.

Further Reading

Arendt, Hannah, and Mary McCarthy, Between Friends: The Correspondence of Hannah

- Arendt and Mary McCarthy*, 1949–1975, New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1995
- Bradshaw, Leah, Acting and Thinking: The Political Thought of Hannah Arendt, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1989
- Canovan, Margaret, Hannah Arendt: A Reinterpretation of Her Political Thought, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1992
- Disch, Lisa Jane, Hannah Arendt and the Limits of Philosophy, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1994
- Ettinger, Elzbieta, Hannah Arendt/Martin Heidegger, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1995
- Isaac, Jeffrey C, Arendt, Camus, and Modern Rebellion, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1992.
- Kateb, George, Hannah Arendt, Totowa, New Jersey: Rowman and Allanheld, and Oxford: Robertson, 1984
- May, Derwent, Hannah Arendt, Harmondsworth and New York: Penguin, 1986
- Young-Bruehl, Elizabeth, For Love of the World: A Biography of Hannah Arendt, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1982

Areopagitica

by John Milton, 1644

Areopagitica reiterates the title of an oration delivered to the Athenian assembly by Isocrates (436–338 BCE). The Greek patriot and teacher of rhetoric, who rarely spoke publicly himself, pleaded for the reinstatement of the ancient court of the Areopagus, named for Ares, god of war, and essentially a council of nobles. But John Milton (1608–74) would also expect his readers to have in mind St. Paul’s address to the Council of the Areopagus (in Acts 17:22–23). There the God of Christianity is proclaimed as the true object of the pagan altar to an unknown god.

Milton’s tract, published rather than delivered, Ciceronian in style and redolent with the cadences of spoken English, is a plea to the English Parliament for the withdrawal of a new order for the licensing of book publication. Parliamentary reforms in the early 1640s had abolished Archbishop Laud’s elaborate and repressive licensing measures and the courts of the Star Chamber and the High Commission that enforced them. Now Milton saw the new licensing measure, brought in as Presbyterian discipline and authority prevailed in Parliament over Congregational, as dangerously retrograde. Milton’s target was not accountability for the printed word (in which he staunchly believed), let alone for obscene or pornographic materials, but front-end censorship of religious ideas, his own Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce (August 1643) being an egregious target of the new measures. (His vision was not, however, wide enough to include toleration of Catholic writing, which he regarded as radically destructive of true religion and of the state itself.)

Areopagitica follows closely much of the standard rhetorical prescription for classical oration (narration, proposition, proof, etc.). It also runs through a considerable range of tones of address, first assuming the rationality, honor, and goodwill of its parliamentary audience, and pleading for sober attention to “the voice of reason.” Then it turns blisteringly polemical and, at the same time, staunchly patriotic in its mocking attack on censorship as Italianate and Catholic, reminiscent of Inquisition, inappropriate to a “nation not slow and dull, but of a quick, ingenious, and piercing spirit...not beneath the reach of the highest that human capacity can soar to.” Pragmatism raises the problem of the censor, beleaguered by tedium and contamination. Idealistically the concept of the life of the reading intellect as a moral purifying by trial finds context in the spirit of Milton’s “reforming of reformation itself.” It also waxes heroic, celebrating the purifying effects of moral trial: “I cannot praise a fugitive and cloistered virtue, unexercised and unbreathed, that never sallies out and seeks her adversary, but slinks out of the race where that immortal garland is to be run for not without dust and heat.” Quintessentially protestant, it privileges individual conscience, without which a man may be a “heretic in truth”: “There is not any burden that some would gladlier post off to another than the charge and care of their religion.”

Areopagitica, like almost everything Milton wrote, situates its concerns mythologically within the cycle of fall and recuperation, which Milton characteristically reconstructs as the vitiation and reclamation of God’s creation. The writing of books thus becomes a kind of reiteration of the creative act, and censorship thus mindlessly counters creation and Creator alike: “who kills a man kills a reasonable creature, God’s image; but he who destroys a good book, kills reason itself, kills the image of God, as it were, in the eye.” Milton’s fall of man is quintessentially a fall of reason, Adam’s and Eve’s fall being an act of disobedience to God that is also constructed as an act of allowing their reason to be clouded by their appetites. Areopagitica construes man as morally adequate in a world unprotected by “a perpetual childhood of prescription” by virtue of the continuity of man’s prelapsarian freedom of choice. “For reason is but choosing,” Milton proclaims, in phrasing that in the later Paradise Lost (1667; 3.108) becomes God’s defense of Adam’s sufficiency, since “Reason also is choice.”

Areopagitica’s power as an essay depends in large measure on its projection from more primal bodies of mythology drawn by Milton from the classics. Thus the fall is seen to reiterate an ananagnorisis (recognition) in which Truth, like Osiris, is torn apart, and the reclamation of man’s original state comprehends the obligation “to unite those severed pieces which are yet wanting to the body of Truth.” Elsewhere man’s restoration becomes a mythic reawakening in which the fall vanishes into nothingness like a nightmare past: “Methinks I see a noble and puissant nation rousing herself like a strong man after sleep, and shaking her invincible locks.” (Blake’s conception of his audience as Albion, the giant sleeping form of the English nation, needful of a similar rousing from a state of mental and moral torpor, is obviously in Milton’s debt.) Similarly, Milton’s “eagle muing her mighty youth, and kindling her undazzled eyes at the full midday beam” constructs his vision on the folklore eagle that can gaze unblinkered at the sun and also on Plato’s account of man’s emergence from the cave (Republic, Book 7). Also reiterated here is the primal myth of a cosmos snatched from darkness that informs the Genesis creation account, reconstructed by Milton into an analogy of man’s mental state in which “those also that love the twilight” are condemned to a state of intentional self-damnation. And finally there is the appropriating of the Gospel’s reiteration of a primal myth of salvation as a harvest for which “the fields are white already.”

See also Pamphlet

Editions

Areopagitica, 1644; many subsequent editions, including in Milton's Complete Poems and Major Prose, edited by Merritt Y. Hughes, 1957, Complete Prose Works, vol. 2, edited by Ernest Sirluck, 1959, and Selected Prose, edited by C.A. Patrides, 1974

Further Reading

- Achinstein, Sharon, Milton and the Revolutionary Reader, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1994
- Barker, Arthur E., Milton and the Puritan Dilemma, 1641–1660, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1971 (original edition, 1942)
- Corns, Thomas N., The Development of Milton's Prose Style, New York: Oxford University Press, 1982
- Dowling, Paul M., Polite Wisdom: Heathen Rhetoric in Milton's "Areopagitica", Lanham, Maryland: Rowman and Littlefield, 1995
- Haller, William, Liberty and Reformation in the Puritan Revolution, New York: Columbia University Press, 1963 (original edition, 1955)
- Hunter, G.K., "The Structure of Milton's Areopagitica," English Studies 39 (1958): 117–19
- Kendrick, Christopher, Milton: A Study in Ideology and Form, New York: Methuen, 1986
- Parker, William Riley, Milton: A Biography, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 2 vols., 1968; revised edition, 1996
- Stavely, Keith W., The Politics of Milton's Prose Style, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1975
- Wolfe, Don M., Milton in the Puritan Revolution, New York: Humanities Press, and London: Cohen and West, 1963 (original edition, 1941)

Arnold, Matthew

British, 1822–1888

Matthew Arnold's poetic works would be sufficient to establish him as one of the important figures of English literature. Poems such as "Dover Beach," "Thyrsis," and "The Scholar Gypsy" fuse, as Arnold himself says in a letter to his mother, some of Tennyson's "poetical sense" and "Browning's intellectual vigor." However, by the late 1850s he had written most of his poems, and for the next three decades until the end of his life devoted himself single-mindedly to the essay. In the 1860s he wrote numerous essays of literary and social criticism; in the 1870s he concentrated on religious and pedagogical writings; and in the 1880s he returned to the essay of literary criticism. Arnold's poetic decade could be considered a preparation, a period of intellectual gestation. During this time he first considered the questions he later sought to resolve in his essays, an opus of such magnitude (The Complete Prose Works edited by R.H. Super comes to II volumes) that had Arnold not written a single poem he would still occupy an important place in the pantheon of Victorian sages. His movement between the two worlds of poetry and nonfiction prose is, nevertheless, to be understood in an organic sense: the poetry and the prose are part of the coherent growth of Arnold's mind.

Confronted with the advance of modern science, the decline of religion, the impact of industrialization and mechanization on labor and the worker, and the rise of intellectual skepticism, Arnold seeks in his essays ways to answer the age-old question of how a good life is to be lived in the rapidly changing modern world. While treating issues as diverse as literature, science, education, religion, the Bible, and culture in general, Arnold's aim remains constant: to guide and inspire modern man, both ethically and intellectually. His major essays retain a moral force that often surprises the serious reader today.

Although Arnold's intended audience was the ordinary man and woman, particularly those belonging to that middle class which his long experience as school inspector taught him to regard as narrow and lacking in authentic culture (but still educable), the essays were primarily read by the agents of cultural change, those he calls "the men of culture" and "the true apostles of equality" (Culture and Anarchy, 1869). Arnold hoped that the men of culture would transform the masses, bringing out in them what he calls in Culture and Anarchy the "best self." He therefore used the extended philosophical essay rather than more popular essay forms, such as the polemical pamphlet or the familiar essay, to reach those catalysts of social and intellectual change.

Arnold excels in the formal essay, using its impersonal, analytical approach even when engaging in polemics, as we can see in the tightly reasoned reply to T.H. Huxley, defending humanistic learning in "Literature and Science" (1885). But he also experiments with the humorous, satiric essay, as witness the dramatic letters of Baron Arminius von Thunder-tenTronckh, later collected as Friendship's Garland (1871). In any case, with Arnold we are always in the presence of the teacher and lecturer rather than the religious or political zealot or the utilitarian popularizer of ideas. Many of the individual essays, although later collected in various volumes, were first delivered as lectures or appeared in various Victorian periodicals, which served at the time as a forum for lively debate and exposition of ideas. His intellectual and academic conception of the essay—befitting a school inspector and an Oxford Professor of Poetry—influences not only the type of essay Arnold writes but also his prose style.

Arnold's style has many salient virtues, but also some flaws. His critics point to a certain syntactical stiffness, a stilted quality that deadens for some the very real vigor of his ideas. His defenders counter that what those critics are really objecting to are the requirements of austere detachment or objectivity inherent in the formal essay. Less debatable as faults in his prose are Arnold's tendency to repeat himself at times (probably a by-product of his didactic intent and professorial habit of mind) and to leave key concepts, such as the "best self" and "culture," somewhat vaguely defined. Arnold is, however, a strict logician, and his respect for the exigencies of reason results in essays which are lucid, tightly argued, and convincing. They would have pleased classical rhetoricians like Aristotle.

Just as pleasing to a rhetorician is his sense of the essay's structure. Typically, the shorter Arnold essay has an engaging exordium or introduction, an ample expository section (containing both a refutation of opposing views and a defense of the thesis), and a clipped, rhetorically effective peroratio or conclusion. A good example of this classical structure can be found in "Literature and Science." His more expansive essays retain the structural coherence of the shorter pieces even though they present what Arnold in reference to his poetry called "the main movement of mind of the last quarter of a century," indeed a great panorama of some of the most important ideas debated in England and other parts of the Western world throughout the 19th century.

In the first two volumes of Essays in Criticism (1865, 1888), Arnold mainly evaluates through the works of authors from different periods and nations—Homer, Spinoza, Milton, Wordsworth, and Tolstoi, among others—the virtues of good literature: primarily an unadorned, plain style and seriousness or elevation of ideas. In these critical essays, which include the well-known "The Function of Criticism at the Present Time" and "The Study of Poetry," Arnold mainly considers literature as a civilizing, ethical force. It is, therefore, not surprising that there is a connection between his literary and his social criticism. The most important of the latter is perhaps Culture and Anarchy, where Arnold posits that the "priests of culture" can deliver modern men and women from their idolatrous submission to the god of industrial materialism and help restore them to a condition of social and personal wholeness. In this work we encounter Arnold's famous notion of culture, derived mainly from Johann Gottfried Herder, which essentially entails an openness of mind that rejects the embracing of ideas because of tradition or convention.

On the Study of Celtic Literature (1867) is another example of Arnold's combination of literary, political, ethnic, and racial criticism. It remains a delightful apologia for Irish and Welsh poetry, and his argument influenced the eventual establishment of a chair of Celtic studies at Oxford. Irish Essays and Others (1882), which includes "The Future of Liberalism" as well as prefaces to various editions of his poetry, contains essays on both literary and social topics and is an eclectic volume much like the earlier Mixed Essays (1879).

The religious essays are an important part of Arnold's work and in a sense can be considered an extension of his literary and social criticism. They also provide the reader with a vivid sense of Arnold as a moderately liberal Victorian representative of that brand of modern skepticism which remains sympathetic to what it disbelieves. Literature and Dogma (1873) and God and the Bible (1875) expound his theological relativism and propose an ethical system as a substitute for traditional religion's doctrinal strictures. Still, for Arnold the Bible and the Church remain important civilizing forces. St. Paul and Protestantism (1870) contains incisive analyses of the Church of England; A Bible Reading for Schools (1871), edited by Arnold, is basically a catechetical instruction for school children based on the prophecies of the Old Testament and the parables and stories of the New. Although skeptical of the supernatural teachings of Christianity, Arnold nevertheless remained convinced that the Bible and the Church, and even ritualistic worship, are powerful sources of culture.

Arnold's vitality as a major English essayist has not diminished today. He embodies the classical traits of the great writers of expository prose: a humble but firm conviction that the humanist tradition he proposes can enrich both the individual person and society; a breadth of interests that encompasses many disciplines and intellectual traditions; a strong sense of responsibility toward the exigencies of the rational process; a respectful open-mindedness toward the past and the present; and an intellectual curiosity that best illustrates the Arnoldian concept of culture. Whether as a critic of literature, religion, the Bible, or society, in Matthew Arnold we meet that rare individual—the humanist who earnestly and honestly seeks, as does the reticent pilgrim of “Stanzas from the Grande Chartreuse,” “the high, wide star of Truth” wherever it may be found. It was natural, then, that the expansive and accommodating scope of the essay should recommend it as the ideal literary vehicle for his quest, and that Arnold should have been for the greater part of his career a tireless and prolific essayist.

ROBERT CARBALLO

Biography

Born 24 December 1822, in Laleham-on-Thames, Middlesex. Studied at Winchester College, Hampshire, 1836–37; Rugby School, Warwickshire, 1837–41; Balliol College, Oxford, 1841–44, graduated, 1844. Fellow, Oriel College, Oxford, 1845–46; assistant master, Rugby School, 1846; private secretary to Lord Lansdowne (lord president of the Privy Council), 1847–51. Married Frances Lucy Wightman, 1851: four sons and two daughters. Inspector of schools, 1851–86: sent several times to the continent to study education systems. Professor of Poetry, Oxford University, 1857–67. Contributor to many journals, including the National Review, Fraser's Magazine, Cornhill Magazine, Macmillan's Magazine, Pall Mall Gazette, Victoria Magazine, Nineteenth Century, and the Fortnightly Review. Died in Liverpool, 15 April 1888.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

On Translating Homer (lectures), 1861; edited by W.H.D.Rouse, 1905

Essays in Criticism, 3 vols., 1865–1910; vol. 1 edited by Sister Thomas Marion Hoctor, 1964

On the Study of Celtic Literature, 1867

Culture and Anarchy: An Essay in Political and Social Criticism, 1869; edited by J.Dover Wilson, 1932., Ian Gregor, 1971, and Samuel Lipman, 1994

St. Paul and Protestantism, 1870

Friendship's Garland, Being the Conversations, Letters, and Opinions of the Late Arminius, Baron von Thunder-ten-Tronckh, 1871

Literature and Dogma: An Essay Towards a Better Apprehension of the Bible, 1873; edited by James C.Livingston, 1970

God and the Bible: A Review of Objections to "Literature and Dogma", 1875

Last Essays on Church and Religion, 1877

Mixed Essays, 1879

Irish Essays and Others, 1882.

Discourses in America, 1885

Arnold as Dramatic Critic, 1903; as Letters of an Old Playgoer, 1919

Selections from the Prose Works, edited by William Savage Johnson, 1913

Selections from the Prose Writings, edited by Lewis E. Gates, 1926

Five Uncollected Essays, edited by Kenneth Allott, 1953

The Portable Matthew Arnold, edited by Lionel Trilling, 1959; as The Essential Matthew Arnold, 1969

Essays, Letters, and Reviews, edited by Fraser Neiman, 1960

The Complete Prose Works, edited by R.H. Super, II vols., 1960–77

Essays, Letters and Reviews, edited by Fraser Neiman, 1960

Selected Essays, edited by Noel Annan, 1964

Selected Prose, edited by P.J. Keating, 1970

Selected Poems and Prose, edited by Miriam Allott, 1978

Culture and Anarchy and Other Writings, edited by Stefan Collini, 1993

Other writings: many collections of poetry, a play, volumes of correspondence, and reports on elementary education, particularly on the continent.

Collected works edition: The Works of Matthew Arnold, 15 vols., 1904, reprinted 1970.

Bibliographies

Magoon, Joseph, A Bibliography of the Editions of, and Writings About, Matthew Arnold's Works from 1971 to 1985, Bournemouth: privately printed, 1988

Smart, Thomas B., The Bibliography of Matthew Arnold, London: Davy, 1892

Tollers, Vincent L., editor, A Bibliography of Matthew Arnold, 1932–1970, University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1974

Further Reading

Anderson, Warren D., Matthew Arnold and the Classical Tradition, Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1965

Brown, E.K., Studies in the Text of Matthew Arnold's Prose Works, New York: Russell and Russell, 1969 (original edition, 1935)

Carroll, Joseph, The Cultural Theory of Matthew Arnold, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1982

Chambers, E.K., Matthew Arnold: A Study, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1947; New York: Russell and Russell, 1964

Dawson, William Harbutt, Matthew Arnold and His Relation to the Thought of Our Time, New York: Putnam, 1904

DeLaura, David J., Hebrew and Hellene in Victorian England: Newman, Arnold, and Pater, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1969

Eells, John Shepard, Jr., The Touchstones of Matthew Arnold, New Haven, Connecticut: College and University Press, 1955

Faverty, Frederic E., Matthew Arnold the Ethnologist, New York: AMS Press, 1968

(original edition, 1951)

Holloway, John, The Victorian Sage: Studies in Argument, London: Macmillan, 1953; Hamden, Connecticut: Archon, 1962

Honan, Park, Matthew Arnold: A Life, New York: McGraw Hill, and London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1981

Jump, John D., Matthew Arnold, London: Longman, 1955

Lowry, Howard F., Matthew Arnold and the Modern Spirit, Folcroft, Pennsylvania: Folcroft

1974

McCarthy, Patrick J., Matthew Arnold and the Three Classes, New York: Columbia University Press, 1964

Miyoshi, Masao, The Divided Self: A Perspective on the Literature of the Victorians, New York: New York University Press, 1969

Murray, Nicholas, A Life of Matthew Arnold, London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1996

Robbins, William, The Arnoldian Principle of Flexibility, Victoria, British Columbia: University of Victoria, 1979

apRoberts, Ruth, Arnold and God, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1983

Trilling, Lionel, Matthew Arnold, New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1977 (original edition, 1939)

Athenäum

German periodical, 1798–1800

This biannual publication was founded by the brothers Schlegel primarily as an outlet for their own writings, although they also printed contributions by others, notably the poet and novelist Novalis and the theologian Friedrich Daniel Schleiermacher. August Wilhelm Schlegel is now remembered primarily as a translator of Shakespeare and for his Vorlesungen über dramatische Kunst und Literatur (1808; A Course of Lectures on Dramatic Art and Literature), which, translated into English and French, spread the doctrine of “Romantic poetry” throughout Europe. The essays he contributed to the Athenäum can be dealt with briefly. The first issue of the periodical begins with a long parody and criticism of a dialogue in praise of the German language by the poet Friedrich Gottlieb Klopstock, which is now at best of historical interest. His second contribution to the periodical, “Die Gemälde: Gespräch” (The paintings: dialogue), cowritten with his wife Caroline, mingles remarks on the theory of art with descriptions of paintings in the famous art gallery in Dresden. The speakers being a woman and two men, one of them an artist, the dialogue form is used to juxtapose different points of view, male and female, artist and critic. August Wilhelm Schlegel also displays his talent as an art critic in a long essay on John Flaxman.

The contributions to the Athenäum by Friedrich Schlegel were much more substantial: they laid the foundations of the German Romantic theory of literature. The bulk of the second issue of the periodical (Fall 1798) is taken up by a collection of aphorisms (“Fragmente”), mostly by him, but with substantial contributions by his friends; they quickly became famous for their wit and incisiveness and at the same time notorious for their extravagant terminology. The same issue of the Athenäum also contains an essay about the most important German novel of its time, Goethe's Wilhelm Meisters Lehrjahre (1795–96; Wilhelm Meister's Apprenticeship). According to the neoclassical canon that prevailed throughout Europe at that time, the novel was an inferior genre, “mere prose.” Schlegel provided a structural analysis of Wilhelm Meister which showed that by an ingenious narrative technique, the use of contrasts and parallels, foreshadowing, echoes, and similar devices, Goethe had given his novel a kind of unity in diversity that rivaled that achievable in the classical genres and raised his work to the status of “poetry in prose.” In his own essay, Schlegel attempted something similar. He held that critics should not merely provide an objective account of a work of art, but also communicate to their readers their own emotional reaction to the work—a task that is, he thought, best performed by poetry, i.e. by writing “a poem about a poem.” In his essay on Wilhelm Meister, he did the next best thing: he wrote it in elevated, poetic prose—an unusual undertaking at that time for a critic.

By contrast, the form of Friedrich Schlegel's major essay in the Athenäum, Gespräch über die Poesie (1800; Dialogue on Poetry), is quite traditional: it follows the form of Plato's Symposium, though it does not, like that work, privilege a single speaker. In Schlegel's essay, six friends—four men and two women—meet from time to time to talk about literature. The four men give papers, which are discussed by the whole group. Together with the “Fragmente,” these papers and discussions are the earliest, and arguably still the most important formulations of the German theory of Romantic poetry.

The two other essays that Friedrich Schlegel contributed to the Athenäum, “Über die Philosophie: An Dorothea” (1799; On philosophy: to Dorothea) and “Über die Unverständlichkeit” (1800; “On Incomprehensibility”), are less important. The first is interesting mainly because of its form: it is a fictitious letter to a real person—his mistress and later wife, the daughter of the philosopher Moses Mendelssohn. The second, with which Schlegel rang down the periodical when it folded in Fall 1800, is a brilliant exercise in sustained irony a welcome reminder of the fact that Friedrich Schlegel played such a central role in the modern history of this elusive term.

It is striking how often the Schlegels used the dialogue form in the Athenäum. Assertive and cocksure in their aphorisms and shorter reviews, they reveal in their dialogue essays their conviction that nothing can be more damaging to creativity than holding to a system. The dialogue form as they used it precludes systematization and reminds us of an older meaning of “essay”: a tentative approach to a subject. This was, however, not seen by most of their readers. Their virulent attacks on a number of established and beloved writers and poets made them anathema to most of their older contemporaries, though Goethe appreciated and befriended them. Among the younger generation, the Schlegels had an ardent following; but while the young tend to be the most enthusiastic readers, they can rarely afford to be enthusiastic buyers. The Athenäum did not sell well enough to be continued past the third volume. Today, it counts as a major source for the study of German Romanticism and as a milestone in the history of literary criticism.

HANS EICHNER

Editions and Selections

- Athenäum*, edited by August Wilhelm Schlegel and Friedrich Schlegel, 3 vols., 1798–1800, reprinted 1960
- Schlegel, Friedrich, in Kritische Ausgabe, edited by Ernst Behler and others, 28 vols., 1958–95
- Schlegel, Friedrich, Dialogue on Poetry; Literary Aphorisms, edited and translated by Ernst Behler and Roman Struc, 1968
- Schlegel, Friedrich, Lucinde and The Fragments (includes the novel Lucinde; “Critical Fragments”; “Athenaeum Fragments”; “Ideas”; “On Incomprehensibility”), translated by Peter Firchow, 1971

Further Reading

- Behler, Ernst, “Goethes Wilhelm Meister und die Romantheorie der Frühromantik,” Études Germaniques 44 (1989): 409–28
- Behler, Ernst, German Romantic Literary Theory, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993
- Behler, Ernst, “Le Dialogue des ‘Tableaux’ d’August Wilhelm Schlegel et la conception de la peinture dans le premier romantisme,” Revue Germanique Internationale 2 (1994): 29–37
- Eichner, Hans, “Friedrich Schlegel’s Theory of Romantic Poetry,” PMLA 71 (1956): 1018–41
- Eichner, Hans, Friedrich Schlegel, New York: Twayne, 1970
- Eichner, Hans, “Friedrich Schlegel’s Theory of Literary Criticism,” in Romanticism Today, Bonn: Inter Nationes, 1973:17–26
- Hamlin, Cyrus, “Platonic Dialogue and Romantic Irony: Prolegomena of a Theory of Literary Narrative,” Canadian Review of Comparative Literature (1976): 5–24
- Stoljar, Margaret, Athenäum: A Critical Commentary, Berne and Frankfurt-on-Main: Lang, 1973
- Wellek, René, “Friedrich Schlegel” and “August Wilhelm Schlegel,” in his A History of Modern Criticism 1750–1950, 2. The Romantic Age, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1981:1–73 (original edition, 1955)

The Atlantic Monthly

American magazine, 1857–

The Atlantic Monthly was founded in Boston in 1857 by Francis Underwood (an assistant to the publisher Moses Phillips) and a group of New England writers including Ralph Waldo Emerson, Oliver Wendell Holmes, James Russell Lowell, and Harriet Beecher Stowe. Underwood had been trying for several years to launch a uniquely American magazine that would publish primarily contributions from American writers—in contrast to other magazines in New York which relied heavily on pirating or importing English authors—and was finally able to get backing because he had the assurance of contributions not only from his founding collaborators but also from other important and popular writers of the time such as Nathaniel Hawthorne, Henry David Thoreau, Walt Whitman, and Thomas Wentworth Higginson.

Underwood and his cofounders, all Yankee humanists, had two additional goals. First, they intended the Atlantic to be an agent for propagating their own high ethical, aesthetic, and intellectual values; none of them doubted, as Higginson himself explained, that New England “was appointed to guide the nation, to humanize it,” and the Atlantic was the focal point of this cultural mission. Second, and more specifically, the group wanted “to bring the literary influence of New England to aid the antislavery cause.”

Lowell, popular as a poet and widely known for his spirited patriotism, agreed to be the first editor. Under his editorship (1857–61), essays in the Atlantic were characteristically literary, using brief observations of contemporary life as springboards for speculations on immutable truths of morality or human nature. During James T. Fields’ tenure as editor (1861–71), the magazine tried to increase its popularity, in part by publishing essays which were more journalistic than philosophical, observing and recording the contemporary scene. Their subjects were more topical, their styles more direct and concrete. Fields also solicited travel sketches—especially the ones by Hawthorne which later became Our Old Home (1863)—and, knowing that half of his readers were women, he eagerly published several long series of domestic essays. These series, many of their entries written by Stowe under the masculine pseudonym Christopher Crowfield, influenced Harper’s to initiate a domestic department—an imitation which suggested the two magazines were beginning to compete for readers.

Even with his eye toward a more general reading public, Fields did not deviate from the magazine’s original goal of being a forum for the presentation of ideas. In fact, he published, among other essays of intellectual debate and inquiry, both Emerson’s essay on Thoreau, Thoreau’s own “Life Without Principle,” Henry James, Sr.’s four-part investigation of the ethics of marriage, and Louis Agassiz’s “Methods of Study of Natural History.” Fields merely changed the mixture of the Atlantic’s nonfiction prose.

Through the rest of the 19th century and the early part of the 20th, the Atlantic struggled to find a balance between its traditional literary essays and more journalistic articles, between highbrow intellectualism and the mass culture which was giving rise to higher-circulation magazines such as the Century and Ladies’ Home Journal. During the editorships of Thomas Bailey Aldrich (1881–90) and Horace Elisha Scudder (1890–98), the magazine clung tightly to what it saw as its intellectual integrity, frequently publishing essays that discussed the major texts and authors of the Western canon. The Atlantic was, in fact, one of the last general periodicals to carry extensive commentary on the Greek and Roman classics and to defend the study of these works.

Though later, more progressive editors would decide such essays on the classics explored unpromising subjects for the magazine’s audience, the Atlantic continued into the 20th century to be widely recognized as a leading exponent of high culture in America. Most of the writers whom editor Ellery Sedgwick (1909–38) chose to voice the magazine’s views on culture and literature were women: Agnes Repplier, a prolific writer of astringent essays on contemporary manners and morals; Margaret Sherwood and Cornelia Comer, who produced polite essays; and Katherine Gerould, an acute and reactionary Bryn Mawr professor. By 1918, however, as Repplier noted in the Yale Review, the personal essay of the type the Atlantic often published had “withered in the blasts of war.” Gerould and other Atlantic essayists such as Henry Dwight Sedgwick, longing for the rapidly disappearing Victorian ethics of their childhoods, began to see themselves as futile relics of a dying culture.

Under the editorships of Ellery Sedgwick and Edward Weeks (1938–66), the Atlantic also renewed its interest in social and political issues, publishing essays such as Booker T. Washington’s “The Case of the Negro,” Bertrand Russell’s “Individual Liberty and Public Control,” and Woodrow Wilson’s “The Road Away from Revolution.” Throughout most of the 20th century, in fact, the magazine has continued to supplement its in-depth journalistic articles on public policy with long essays on related topics: for example, Albert Einstein’s “Atomic War or Peace,” George Kennan’s “Training for Statesmanship,” and Martin Luther King, Jr.’s “The Negro Is Your Brother.”

As far back as the 1860s, Atlantic editors had been aware that the magazine could be perceived, especially by the publishing industry in New York, as too literary, and hence sought out lighter essays which would serve as relief from the “Emersonian and Whippletonian articles”—and increase circulation. The magazine has consequently long been a major outlet for humorous essays. Mark Twain was one of the first—and certainly one of the most influential—humorists to write for the Atlantic, and there has been a long trail of humorists behind him, especially many who are more closely associated with the New Yorker: James Thurber, E.B. White, Garrison Keillor. In the past 25 years, under the editorships of Robert Manning (1966–80) and William Whitworth (1981–), the magazine has been an outlet for many short, humorous essays, often domestic in nature, which hark back to the genteel tradition preceding World War I, written by such contributors as Andrew Ward, Ian Frazier, and Roy Blount, Jr.

The Atlantic’s devotion to cultural criticism has also led it to be an important voice on environmental issues. Literary essays on nature, in fact, began early, with John Burroughs’ first piece in 1865, and have continued through John Muir and up to recent contributions from writers such as Annie Dillard and Gretel Ehrlich.

DAN ROCHE

Anthologies

Jubilee: One Hundred Years of the Atlantic, edited by Edward Weeks and Emily Flint, Boston: Little Brown, 1957

119 Years of the Atlantic, edited by Louise Desaulniers, Boston: Little Brown, 1977; enlarged edition, as Highlights from 125 Years of the Atlantic, Boston: Atlantic Monthly Press, 1982

Further Reading

Howe, M.A. De Wolfe, The Atlantic Monthly and Its Makers, Boston: Atlantic Monthly

Press, 1919

Sedgwick, Ellery, "The American Genteel Tradition in the Early Twentieth Century," American Studies 25, no. 1 (1984): 49–67

Sedgwick, Ellery, The Atlantic Monthly, 1857–1909: Yankee Humanism at High Tide and Ebb, Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1994

Auden, W.H.

British/American, 1907–1973

W.H.Auden produced an astonishing range of prose works, and his particular and quirky intelligence painted new and challenging portraits of such "major" artists as Shakespeare and Goethe as well as "minor" writers such as Walter de la Mare and G.K.Chesterton. The distinctions between essay and review, criticism and history, philosophy and anthropology, melt in Auden's prose, leaving the reader bewildered by a series of erudite, yet sometimes seriously questionable arguments. The two collections The Dyer's Hand (1962) and Forewords and Afterwords (1973) contain selections of his later essays, while Edward Mendelson's The English Auden (1977) provides a useful cross-section of the vibrant pre-1940 pieces.

In "Psychology and Art To-Day" (1935) Auden suggested that "To a situation of danger and difficulty there are five solutions." It was after rejecting the "solutions" of the idiot, the schizophrenic, the criminal, and the invalid that he accepted the positive and healing fifth solution shared by the scientist and the artist: "To understand the mechanism of the trap." Much of the syncretism and eclecticism that underlie the easy transitions in his prose between various political and religious issues, as well as between disciplines, resulted from his search for synoptic understanding "as the hawk sees it, or the helmeted airman."

Rarely providing an orthodox interpretation of books, events, or artists, Auden thrived on experimental creative error, and the liberties he took with established knowledge—in addition to the half-serious assertion that he "needed the money"—formed part of the price he asked for writing prose. In the early essays, for example, Auden's treatment of Freud and D. H.Lawrence demonstrated how he followed the spirit but rarely the letter of their theories, while in "The Good Life" of 1935 he observed, following T.S.Eliot and I.A.Richards, that "unless people have substantially the same experience, logical controversy is nothing more than systemised misunderstanding." The scientist in Auden saw through to the structures of knowledge and its transmission, hence his preference for "a critic's notebooks to his treatises."

In "Psychology and Art To-Day," Auden claimed that art consists in telling parables "from which each according to his immediate and peculiar needs may draw his own conclusions." For Auden the parable was a secular story, the "only kind of literature which has gospel authority." Politically charged in the 1930s, the later Auden sometimes used the parable as a means of speaking about Christianity at a distance, as in the 1954 essay "Balaam and his Ass": "To illustrate the use of the master-servant relationship as a parable of agape, I will take two examples..." In "The Guilty Vicarage" (1948) Auden found in the detective story a Christian parable of existential guilt. These analogies are typical, and Auden's acknowledgment that "Man is an analogy-drawing animal" applies particularly to himself.

Auden's remark in "The Prolific and the Devourer" (1939) that he found pornographic stories more erotic than physical sexual encounters emphasizes the importance of language and story to Auden's sense of self; this is reflected in his prose when the artist tempers the scientist. The 1938 article "In Praise of Gossip," for example, emphasized the importance of telling a story well, rather than adhering to some notion of veracity which ultimately tames and reduces a narrative to a tedious and factual account. Auden's own tendency toward the anecdote and the aphorism fulfilled this demand throughout his work, while his eye for the revealing quotation was often employed in an arch fashion, as when he complained about the lack of privacy in published letters and then reproduced the most personal letters himself. It is not surprising, then, that as an epigraph to The Dyer's Hand Auden selected Nietzsche's aphorism, "We have Art in order that we may not perish from Truth."

In the autobiographical poem "Letter to Lord Byron" (1936), Auden tells us that it was his precocious desire to observe the "various types of boys" that shocked the matron at his public school; the amateur but perceptive anthropologist was another of Auden's roles. In a later essay, "Notes on the Comic" (1952), Auden described the abuse hurled between truck drivers and cab drivers on the New York streets as a form of flyting, arguing that the participants were more interested in playing with language than insulting each other.

Auden's homosexuality rarely surfaced in his prose, but he occasionally offered some thoughts on the subject (as in the essay "C.P.Cavafy," 1961). When he did discuss homosexuality it was without guilt, sensation, or prevarication; it was simply a choice of object, the important point being the quality of a relationship rather than its constitution. His obvious enjoyment in discussing the sex life of J.R.Ackerley in the essay "Papa Was a Wise Old Sly-Boots" (1969) is a fine example of Auden's double standard when considering biographical material, complaining that Ackerley never said what he "really preferred to do in bed."

Auden's essays combine the confessions of the innocent, the certainty of the dogmatist, the schematizing of the scientist, and the skepticism of the man in the street. These traits occur time and again from the earliest pieces, brash with "youth's intolerant certainty" to the pose of the "booming old bore" of the late prose. Hence while the tone of his later essays emulated the curmudgeonly don rather than the bright young schoolmaster, Auden remained an entertaining teacher, utilizing techniques of defamiliarization alongside a sometimes shocking familiarity. But whether written in the role of parable promoting politician or grand old man of letters bristling with ex cathedra statements, Auden's prose acknowledges itself as a limited and partial offering, revealing a writer intensely aware that his voice is one among thousands, and that an air of impropriety or even charlatanism hangs over his words. There remains a deceptive, studied informality in Auden's prose which allowed him to make risky and unsupported judgments through the pose of the homely amateur. His 1956 inaugural lecture as Professor of Poetry at Oxford captures this tone: "I shall now proceed to make some general statements of my own. I hope they are not nonsense, but I cannot be sure.”

In the essay “Hic et Ille” (1956), using the mirror as an analogy for the ego, Auden stated that “Every man carries with him through life a mirror, as unique and impossible to get rid of as his shadow.” The roles Auden played in his prose constitute a series of ingenious games played with his “mirror,” and take on retrospective meaning from his remark that “We shall be judged, not by the kind of mirror found on us, but by the use we have made of it, by our riposte to our reflection.” Auden’s unique blend of storytelling and analysis, his self-conscious manipulation of knowledge, and his ability to discuss the underlying structures of power and identity constitute a riposte that at once disarms and disquiets.

PAUL HENDON

Biography

Wystan Hugh Auden. Born 21 February 1907 in York. Studied at Gresham’s School, Holt, Norfolk, 1920–25; Christ Church, Oxford, 1925–28, B.A. in English, 1928. Lived in Berlin, 1928–29. Taught privately in London, 1930, at Larchfield Academy, Helensburgh, Scotland, 1930–32, and at Downs School, Colwall, Herefordshire, 1932–35. Married Erika Mann, daughter of the writer Thomas Mann, so that she could get a British passport, 1935. Staff member, GPO Film Unit, London, 1935–36. Traveled in Iceland with Louis MacNeice, 1936, and in China with Christopher Isherwood, 1938; gave radio broadcasts for the Republican forces during the Spanish Civil War, 1937. Emigrated to the United States, 1939, and became a U.S. citizen, 1946; lived primarily in New York, though from 1957 spent summers in Kirchstetten, Austria. Taught at various schools and universities in the U.S., 1939–53. Relationship with the writer Chester Kallman, from 1939. Member of the editorial board, Decision magazine, 1940–41, and Delos magazine, 1968, and editor, Yale Series of Younger Poets, 1947–62. Major with the U.S. Army Strategic Bombing Survey in Germany, 1945. Member, American Academy, 1954. Professor of Poetry, Oxford University, 1956–61. Awards: many, including King’s Gold Medal for Poetry, 1937; American Academy Award of Merit Medal, 1945, and Gold Medal, 1968; Pulitzer Prize, 1948; Bollingen Prize, 1954; National Book Award, 1956; Feltrinelli Prize, 1957; Guinness Award, 1959; Poetry Society of America Droutskey Medal, 1959; Austrian State Prize, 1966; National Medal for Literature, 1967; honorary degrees from seven colleges and universities. Died in Vienna, 29 September 1973.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

The Dyer’s Hand and Other Essays, 1962

Selected Essays, 1964

Forewords and Afterwords, edited by Edward Mendelson, 1973

The English Auden: Poems, Essays, and Dramatic Writings 1927–1939, edited by Edward Mendelson, 1977

Essays and Reviews and Travel Books in Prose and Verse, vol. 1: Prose 1926–1938, edited by Edward Mendelson, 1997

Other writings: many volumes of poetry (collected in Collected Poems, edited by Edward Mendelson, 1976), plays with Christopher Isherwood, and several libretti. Also edited many anthologies of poetry; translated works by Goethe and Scandinavian writers.

Collected works edition: The Complete Works, edited by Edward Mendelson, 1988–(in progress).

Bibliographies

Bloomfield, B.C. and Edward Mendelson, W.H.Auden: A Bibliography, Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press, 1972

Gingerich, Martin E., W.H.Auden: A Reference Guide, Boston: Hall, 1977

Further Reading

Bold, Alan, editor, W.H.Auden: The Far Interior, London: Vision Press, and Totowa, New Jersey: Barnes and Noble, 1985

Bucknell, Katherine, and Nicholas Jenkins, editors, W.H.Auden: "The Map of All My Youth": Early Works, Friends and Influences, Oxford: Clarendon Press, and New York: Oxford University Press, 1990

Carpenter, Humphrey, W.H.Auden: A Biography, London: Allen Unwin, and Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1981

Davenport-Hines, Richard, Auden, London: Heinemann, and New York: Pantheon, 1995

Fuller, John, A Reader's Guide to W.H.Auden, London: Thames and Hudson, and New York: Farrar Straus, 1970

Haffenden, John, editor, W.H.Auden: The Critical Heritage, London and Boston: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1983

Hecht, Anthony, The Hidden Law: The Poetry of W.H.Auden, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1993

Hynes, Samuel, The Auden Generation: Literature and Politics in England in the 1930s, London: Bodley Head, 1976; New York: Viking Press, 1977

McDiarmid, Lucy, Auden's Apologies for Poetry, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1990

Mendelson, Edward, Early Auden, London: Faber, and New York: Viking, 1981

Smith, Stan, W.H.Auden, Oxford and New York: Blackwell, 1985

Spears, Monroe K., The Poetry of W.H.Auden: The Disenchanted Island, New York: Oxford University Press, 1963

Australian Essay

Henry Savery (1791–1842), transported to Van Diemen's Land for forgery, is best known as the author of the novel Quintus Servinton (1831). It is widely accepted, however, that under the nom de plume of “Simon Stukeley” he also wrote a series of 30 sketches of Hobart Town and its inhabitants which, appearing in the Colonial Times through 1829, were published in the following year under the title The Hermit in Van Diemen’s Land. This work makes him the first essayist in Australian literary history.

Following The Hermit in Van Diemen’s Land, the next significant contribution to the form was The Australian Sketch Book (1838), written when its author, James Martin (1820–86), was only 18, and in acknowledged imitation of Washington Irving. Thereafter, H.M.Green asserts in his History of Australian Literature (1961, revised 1985) that between 1850 and 1890 “the only example of the essayist pure and simple was Richard Birnie.” For 18 years from 1870 Birnie (1808–88) was retained to write a regular column for the Australasian, the weekly supplement of the Melbourne Age. Some of these were published as Essays: Social, Moral and Political in 1879. High minded and hortatory, they seem badly dated today.

The prose of other colonial writers, however, retains a livelier appeal. Among them were two short-term visitors from Britain, Richard Rowe (1828–79) and Frank Fowler (1833–63). Rowe’s contributions to a range of Sydney newspapers and journals were collected in 1858 as Peter Possum’s Portfolio. In the following year, and after he had returned to England, Fowler produced Southern Lights and Shadows. Like Rowe, he had written for a number of Sydney publications, and had indeed been the founding editor in 1857 of the Month.

Between the later 1860s and the early 1880s Australia’s most important essayists lived in Melbourne, and wrote for its leading newspapers, the Argus and the Age. Among the earliest and probably the best was Marcus Clarke (1846–81), most widely remembered for his convict novel, His Natural Life (1874). Clarke, who had emigrated to Australia in 1863, began writing for newspapers and magazines soon after his arrival. Most notably from 1867 to 1870, and using the nom de plume “The Peripatetic Philosopher,” he contributed a series of sketches of city life to the Argus and the Australasian.

Another shrewd and lively recorder of Melbourne’s low life was John Stanley James (1843–96), who came to Australia by way of the United States in 1875. From late 1875 to late 1877 he contributed “Notes on Current Events by a Vagabond” to Melbourne Punch. In 1876 he began writing for the Argus under the same pseudonym. His columns proved so popular that they were collected in 1877 and 1878 as The Vagabond Papers. Michael Cannon, his modern editor, described James’ normal method as “the straightforward, sympathetic, never sentimentalized description of his experiences and observations ... a cool unemotional statement of the survival technique of a man who has almost no money and no home of his own.” A third writer to chronicle the life of colonial Melbourne through the prose sketch was Edmund Finn (1819–98), who used both “An Old Colonist” and “Garryowen” as his noms de plume. The Garryowen Sketches (1880) reflect an earlier Melbourne than the observations of either Clarke or James.

By the turn of the 19th into the 20th century, more than 100 years of European experience in Australia had produced a substantial body of literature offering scope for interpretation through the critical essay. Individuals like Douglas Sladen (1856–1946), George Burnett Barton (1836–1901), Henry Gyles Turner (1831–1920), and Alexander Sutherland (1852–1902) had all advanced the understanding and knowledge of Australian writing both at home and abroad well before the 1890s. However, it was that decade which saw the emergence of Australia's first major literary essayist. A.G. Stephens (1865–1933) used his editorship of the Sydney Bulletin's Red Page (a full-page literary section) both to encourage native talent and to create a matrix of critical discussion within which the creative writers might develop their skills. Through his own writing as well as through his editorial authority, Stephens made a major contribution to the development of an informed critical environment in Australia; The Red Pagan (1904), a collection of some of his Bulletin writings, is a landmark volume in the development of the Australian literary-critical essay.

Probably Stephens' most formidable contemporary in the domain of criticism was the poet C.J.Brennan (1870–1932). Around 1900, Brennan wrote a number of substantial critical essays which were included in the edition of his prose works by A.R.Chisholm and J.J.Quinn in 1962.

The decade of the 1890s has acquired legendary status in Australian literary history, a phenomenon partly explained by the appearance of a number of reminiscences by individuals who had participated in the events of those years. Among the most important of these are Those Were the Days (1918) by G.A.Taylor (1872–1928), Knocking Round (1930) by John le Gay Brereton (1871–1933), and The Romantic Nineties (1933) by A.W.Jose (1863–1934).

In the years between the two World Wars there was a steady output of recollections and nostalgia of one kind or another. Bush life in pioneering days, for instance, was a popular subject represented by Mary Fullerton's (1868–1946) Bark House Days (1921) and Mary Gilmore's (1865–1962) Hound of the Road (1922). Pen sketches of old bush ways merged readily into descriptions of the bush itself, ranging from the observations of amateur nature lovers to the more exact observations of serious natural historians. The various works of R.H.Croll (1869–1947) are toward the amateur end of this spectrum, as are the books of Donald Alister Macdonald (1857–1932), James Edmond (1859–1933), Bernard Cronin (1864–1968), and Charles Barrett (1879–1959). The apogee of the lyrical evocation of Australian nature was reached in Images in Water (1947) by Elyne Mitchell (1913–), largely devoted to the alpine regions in the southeastern part of the continent, while probably the most prolific and influential nature writer over many decades was A.H.Chisholm (1890–1977). An intermittent English visitor, Grant Watson (1885–1970), combined scientific inquiry and metaphysical speculation in some highly original essays, some of which were collected by Dorothy Green in Descent of Spirit (1990).

In the middle 1930s two anthologies of essays marked the success the form by that time had achieved: Essays: Imaginative and Critical, Chosen from Australian Writers edited by George Mackaness and J.D.Holmes (1933), and Australian Essays edited by George H.Cowling and Furnley Maurice [i.e. Frank Wilmot] (1935). The editors of the latter had this to say, inter alia, in their introduction: "The Australian essay is the product of that most potent force in the cultural development of Australia, the newspaper. The magazine and review have not flourished here...most of our essays have seen the light of day in the columns of newspapers, especially in the Saturday journals, rather than in more ambitious periodicals. The essay began in Australia with the example of Charles Lamb, William Hazlitt, and Leigh Hunt before it, and it has flourished in their tradition. Reminiscence, description and discussion are its modes." Their observation was, with only minor qualifications, to prove as accurate in prospect as it was true in retrospect.

One medium for comment at essay length not recognized by Cowling and Maurice was radio, which enjoyed considerable popularity and influence through the 1930s and 1940s. The book reviews of Vance Palmer (1885–1959), one of the leading literary figures of the day, reached a wide audience through his weekly broadcasts over the Australian Broadcasting Commission (ABC). Vance's wife Nettie Palmer (1885–1964) also occupied an influential position in the literary community; some of her best and most representative work in the essay form appears in Modern Australian Literature 1900–1923 (1924) and Talking It Over (1932).

Undoubtedly, however, the supreme practitioner of the essay in Australia during the first half of the 20th century was Walter Murdoch (1874–1970). His prose pieces, which cover an astonishing array of subjects from the most trivial to the most profound, are unmistakably in the tradition of Lamb, Hazlitt, and Hunt. Appearing in the press over more than four decades, they were brought together in a number of volumes of which Speaking Personally (1930) and Selected Essays (1956) are representative. Murdoch remains a rare figure in the Australian literary landscape—an essayist first, last, and foremost.

Not all the essayists of the 1930s were content to write within purely belletristic conventions. At least three deserve mention for the intellectual weight and polemical passion they brought to their subjects: John Anderson (1893–1962), P.R. Stephensen (1901–65), and Rex Ingamells (1913–55). For many years professor of philosophy at Sydney University, Anderson used the essay form to expound his own version of the liberal tradition as well as to explain and defend the achievement of then new and challenging writers like James Joyce. Some of his essays were brought together under the title Art and Reality: John Anderson on Literature and Aesthetics (1982) by Janet Anderson, Graham Cullum, and Kimon Lycos. Stephensen's The Foundations of Culture in Australia (1936) was a strongly nationalistic tract which in turn inspired Ingamells, the founder of the Jindyworobak movement, to write (with Ian Tilbrook) Conditional Culture in 1938.

At the other end of the spectrum from such high seriousness, the interwar years also had their quota of essayists who looked at life from a comic point of view. Hal Eyre's Hilarities (1929) touched its subjects with a light brush. Later and more robust humorists included Lennie Lower (1903–47), Ross Campbell (1910–82), and Bernard Hesling (1905–88). Their tradition is continued by current writers like Barry Oakley (1931–), Morris Gleitzman (1953–), and Wendy Harmer, all of whom have contributed regularly to the metropolitan press.

World War II brought something of a hiatus to the development of the essay in Australia. While established writers like Murdoch and the Palmers maintained their positions of eminence, it was not until the late 1940s and early 1950s that any significant new names began to appear. By then there was at least a handful of serious literary and cultural journals capable of publishing sustained analytical essays on literary, cultural, social, and political matters. The career of A.A. Phillips (1900–85) was thus closely associated with Meanjin Quarterly, the best of his critical pieces being collected in 1958 as The Australian Tradition, a volume which remains admired today. For the Uncanny Man (1963) by Clement Semmler (1914–) has also stood up well to the passage of time.

Phillips and Semmler were both literary critics rather than creative writers. Since 1958, however, some of the most distinguished collections of literary essays have come from poets or novelists. They include Poetry and Morality (1959) by Vincent Buckley (1925–88), Because I Was Invited (1975) by Judith Wright (1915–), The Pack of Autolykus (1978) and The New Cratylus (1979) by A.D.Hope (1907–), The Peasant Mandarin (1978) and Persistence in Folly (1984) by Les Murray (1938–), The Music of Love (1984) by Dorothy Green (1915–91), and The Lyre in the Pawnshop (1986) by Fay Zwicky (1933–).

Closely allied to the critical essay is the study which fuses literary insight with comment on broader historical and cultural issues. Many examples of this genre have appeared over the past 20 to 30 years, some of the most impressive being Ockers (1975) and The Unknown Great Australian (1983) by Max Harris (1921–95), Days of Wine and Rage (1980) by Frank Moorhouse (1938–), Gallipoli to Petrov (1984) by Humphrey McQueen (1942–), Hot Copy (1986) by Don Anderson (1939–), and Soundtrack for the Eighties (1983) by Craig McGregor (1933–). In the introduction to this last collection, McGregor asks, “Why a book of essays?” His reply to his own question indicates the essential continuity of the genre from its beginnings with Savery to the present day: “I’ve always liked the essay ever since reading Hazlitt at school ... So to a certain extent this is a deliberate exercise in an honourable and enduring literary form...a conscious attempt to stretch and expand the traditional essay form.”

Other essayists have had less lofty intentions, a number, for instance, being content to continue the tradition of reminiscences of people and places—A.R.Chisholm’s (1888–1981) Men Were My Milestones (1958), for instance, or John Morrison’s (1904–) The Happy Warrior (1987). Probably the most accomplished Australian essayist since World War II was Charmian Clift (1923–69). Returning to Australia in 1964 with her novelist husband, George Johnston, she was soon writing a weekly column for the Sydney Morning Herald which both acquired a wide popular readership and represented the most elegant writing in the belletristic mode since Walter Murdoch. Her topics ranged from the challenges of expatriation through the pangs and pleasures of family life to the changing urban experience of Australians. After her death Johnston brought together many of her best pieces as The World of Charmian Clift (1970).

While Clift did not fully realize her gift as an essayist until after her return home from a long period overseas, it is necessary to conclude this survey by observing that some notable Australian writers have followed the opposite path on their way to achieving a deserved reputation in the essay form. Morris Lurie (1938–), Clive James (1939–), Kate Jennings (1948–), and Meaghan Morris (1950–) have all published collections of essays of real interest and distinction—but only during or after periods of residence away from their native land. Lurie’s The English in Heat (1972) transports the Australian capacity for deflating comedy to London of the 1960s, while Clive James in a collection like Visions Before Midnight (1977) focuses a sardonic eye on British television. Kate Jennings has turned her residence in New York City to real advantage in Save Me, Joe Louis (1988) and Bad Manners (1993), while Meaghan Morris’ The Pirate’s Fiancée (1988) brings a powerful intelligence to bear on contemporary issues in feminism, cultural politics, film, and literary theory.

It is fair to say that the essay as a literary genre has never occupied a central place in the history of Australian writing. Its most important literary practitioners have, with few exceptions, reserved their principal energies for the cultivation of other forms—fiction, poetry, or drama. Literary critics, most notably in the 20th century, have used the essay to offer an interpretation of the emerging corpus of creative achievement. Starting from their own disciplinary base, leading figures in other areas of intellectual endeavor—history, philosophy, science, politics, sociology—have made important contributions. By and large, however, the essay in Australia has developed no distinctively local features of style or structure. The result is a body of work providing a valuable commentary on the changing concerns of Australians and rising at its best to an elegance of expression and force of argument which are part of the common currency of good writing anywhere.

HARRY HESELTINE

Anthologies

Australian Essays, edited by George H. Cowling and Furnley Maurice, Melbourne: Melbourne University Press, 1935

Essays: Imaginative and Critical, Chosen from Australian Writers, edited by George Mackaness and J.D. Holmes, Sydney: Angus and Robertson, 1933

Forum: Contemporary Australian Essays, edited by Bruce Elder, Sydney: Wiley and Sons, 1972

Further Reading

Green, H.M., A History of Australian Literature: Pure and Applied, revised by Dorothy Green, Sydney: Angus and Robertson, 1985 (original edition, 1961)

Hooton, Joy, and Harry Heseltine, Annals of Australian Literature, Melbourne and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1991 (original edition, 1970)

Wilde, William H., Joy Hooton, and Barry Andrews, The Oxford Companion to Australian Literature, Melbourne and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1994 (original edition, 1985)

Autobiographical Essay

The autobiographical essay may be viewed either as a kind of essay recounting some part of the writer's own life or as short autobiography having the character of an essay. Both approaches disclose the formal tensions shaping autobiographical essays: their participation in two genres—essay and autobiography—which, although traditionally distinguished, are here so joined as to foreground the historical dynamism and instability of each.

Although autobiographical essays are found occasionally among the works of the older essayists, their proliferation is largely a 20th-century phenomenon. The term itself appears only at mid-century, despite the much earlier establishment of its components, “essay” (about 1600) and “autobiography” (about 1800). One sometimes finds “autobiographical sketch” used by earlier writers to designate essay-length texts which, from a contemporary standpoint, look like genuine autobiographical essays (e.g. Abraham Cowley’s “Of Myself,” 1668) as well as applied to short self-narratives that lack the ruminative texture of essays (e.g. Sir Thomas Bodley’s “Life,” 1609). Only in recent years has the autobiographical essay begun to assume theoretical status as a “type” which, though often incorporating features of other essay “types” (e.g. the travel essay, the moral essay, the critical essay), is marked by its focus on retrospection and remembrance (Graham Good, 1988).

As modern practices, both autobiography and the essay have their roots in the European Renaissance and enact that cultural epoch’s reconception of the individual life. The essay’s matrix is meditative and epistolary, and, despite its early anti-rhetorical cast in both French and English, its formal affinities lie with the thematizing schemata of commonplace books. Autobiography, on the other hand, may be understood as a confluence of traditions whose characteristic modes are narrative: allegory, hagiography, and history, specifically biography. If both autobiography and the essay are, broadly speaking, genres of self-representation, it is the culturally and historically variable impetus to recount the writer’s own life that informs autobiography and the projection of the writer’s point of view—the reflective and often reflexive gaze provisionally shaping observation and experience—that directs the essay. The autobiographical essay, then, may be viewed as a practice at the intersection of autobiography and essay, a movement between the narratively self-centered imperatives of the former and the worldly discursiveness of the latter. Alfred Kazin’s much-cited delineation in The Open Form: Essays for Our Time (1961) of the essay’s domain—“not the self, but the self thinking”—brings into sharp relief the problematical hybrid character of the autobiographical essay’s simultaneous concern with both “the self” and “the self thinking.” The essay as autobiographical space attempts to accommodate and to bring into artful relation autobiography’s traditional search, by way of writing, for a significant personal past and the essay’s more or less self-conscious immersion in the pleasures and aporias of writing as such. Certain well-known autobiographical essays assume their very form through the negotiative processes entailed in this accommodation. Thus Montaigne’s “De l’exercitation” (1588; “Of Practice”) embeds a self-revising piecemeal account of an accident in an expanding self-meditation; Walter Benjamin’s “Berliner Chronik” (1932; “A Berlin Chronicle”) configures the life of childhood as personal and cultural topography; Virginia Woolf’s “A Sketch of the Past” (1940) juxtaposes then and now in an ever-shifting and evolving retrospective framework; Katherine Anne Porter’s “St. Augustine and the Bullfight” (1955) interweaves a continually deferred autobiographical anecdote with digressive speculation about the autobiographical act itself; Yukio Mishima’s Taiyo to tetsu (1968; Sun and Steel) joins reminiscence and confession to literary and social commentary in a discourse that calls itself “confidential criticism.”

More typically, it is through various foreshortenings and dispersals of narrative that the essay, with its conventions of fragmentariness and provisionality, assimilates to its relatively short span and its characteristically discursive modes the task of recounting the writer’s life. Essays may scale down the amplitude of autobiography by narrowing their retrospective gaze to a single significant experience, as in Washington Irving's "The Voyage" (1819), William Hazlitt's "My First Acquaintance with Poets" (1823), G.K.Chesterton's "A Piece of Chalk" (1905), George Orwell's "Shooting an Elephant" (1936), W.E.Du Bois's "The Guilt of the Cane" (1948), or Graham Greene's "The Revolver in the Corner Cupboard" (1951); or by focusing on a formative stage of the writer's life, the places and people associated with it, as in Thomas De Quincey's "The English Mailcoach" (1849), T.H.Huxley's "Autobiography" (1889), W.B.Yeats's "Reveries over Childhood and Youth" (1914), Eudora Welty's "A Sweet Devouring" (1957), Wallace Stegner's "The Town Dump" (1959), Nadine Gordimer's "A Bolter and the Invincible Summer" (1963), or Shiva Naipaul's "Beyond the Dragon's Mouth" (1984). Most commonly, essays limit their autobiographical scope by pondering some aspect or crux of the writer's creative, social, or spiritual existence, e.g. Jonathan Edwards' "Personal Narrative" (1739), David Hume's "My Own Life" (1776), Zora Neale Hurston's "How It Feels to Be Colored Me" (1928), F.Scott Fitzgerald's "The Crack-Up" (1936), Elizabeth Bowen's "Out of a Book" (1950), Margaret Laurence's "Where the World Began" (1971), or Alice Walker's "Beauty: When the Other Dancer Is the Self" (1983). This alternative has had particular appeal for distinguished writers in languages other than English, as exemplified in Lev Tolstói's Ispoved' (1884; A Confession), Ernest Renan's "St. Renan" (1883), Franz Kafka's "Brief an den Vater" (1919; "Letter to His Father"), Thomas Mann's "Okkulte Erlebnisse" (1924; "An Experience in the Occult"), Albert Camus's "La Mort dans l'âme" (1937; "Death in the Soul"), Jerzy Stempowski's "Księgozbiór przemypników" (1948; "The Smugglers' Library"), Christa Wolf's "Blickwechsel" (1970; "Changing Viewpoint"), and José Donoso's Historia personal del "boom" (1971; The Boom in Spanish American Literature: A Personal History). In all such instances it may be said that, even as autobiography urges its quest for self as life story upon the essay, so, in turn, the essay conducts that quest on a scale suitable to its own rhetorical habits. Nowhere is this generic transaction more intricately sustained than in the autobiographical book composed as a series of separately titled, and sometimes independently published, pieces, e.g. Vladimir Nabokov's Speak Memory (1966), Sara Suleri's Meatless Days (1989), and Tobias Wolff's In Pharaoh's Army (1994); a notable early example is Jean-Jacques Rousseau's Les Rêveries du promeneur solitaire (1782; Reveries of the Solitary Walker). While the chapters that make up such books work as self-contained essays, their internal resonances, thematic coalescences, and cumulative effects create the amplitude, if not the continuity, of autobiography.

Beyond all such patently autobiographical essays lies the larger body of texts drawing upon autobiographical material whose narrativity is so attenuated or diffuse and so persistently subordinate to wide-ranging speculation that many students of the genre would be hard put to call them autobiographical essays. Most of Montaigne's Essais (1580, 1588) belong here, as do, among the works of the early writers, the "Meditations" of John Donne's Devotions upon Emergent Occasions (1624) and, among those of later practitioners in English, William Hazlitt's miscellaneous essays, much of Washington Irving's Sketchbook (1819), William Makepeace Thackeray's Roundabout Papers (1863), and countless 20th-century essays traditionally labeled "familiar" or "informal." Indeed, selfnarrative may recede to the vanishing point in works that are, nonetheless, deeply self-revelatory and/or passionately apologetic (e.g. Henry David Thoreau's "Life Without Principle," 1863, Robert Louis Stevenson's "An Apology for Idlers," 1876, and E.M.Forster's "What I Believe," 1939). The strongly personal character of all such essays suggests deep affinities with autobiography as a mode of self-location; at the same time, it raises difficult, if highly productive, questions about the relationship between the autobiographical essay and what has throughout this century (at least as far back as Virginia Woolf's 1905 piece, "The Decay of Essay Writing") been termed "the personal essay." From one standpoint, the emergence and modern flowering of the autobiographical essay appears as a specialization of this broader "type" in which the writer's perspective and sensibility (what writers such as Woolf called "personality") move into the foreground. On this account, the autobiographical essay represents the most focused historical enactment of the anti-systematic and antiinstitutional tendencies that have marked the essay since its beginnings.

But what if, like many students of the essay past and present, we regard the "personal" as characterizing not a certain range of essays but the genre as a whole? To appreciate the persistence of this view we need only observe how widespread in critical and pedagogic literature has been the sometimes deliberate, sometimes inadvertent, conflation of the terms "personal essay" and "essay," no doubt because of the normative sway of Montaigne's eminently "personal"—some would say "autobiographical"—Essais over the genre's multifarious practices. The theoretical implications of this terminological slippage for both traditions, essay and autobiography, are considerable. Scholars such as Hugo Friedrich (Montaigne, 1949) and Michel Beaujour (The Poetics of the Literary Self-Portrait, 1980) read Montaigne's influential work not as autobiography but as selfwriting of a kind that Beaujour terms "autoportrait" (a genre which might claim such postmodern texts of the self as Roland Barthes par Roland Barthes, 1975). Suppose, however, that the autobiographical mark of Montaigne's essays is their recounting not of the writer's "life" as a past to be recollected but of the autobiographical act per se as self-inscriptive process; the autobiographical essay, in this view, opens the door to a kind of meta-story. Thus the status we assign to Montaigne's Essais positions our conception of both essay and autobiography as discourses of the "personal" and frames our theoretical accounts of such salient notions as "narrative" and "self." In its academically transgressive guise as "autobiographical" or "personal" or "narrative" criticism, the contemporary autobiographical essay engages these and other issues, now explicitly, now implicitly, and demonstrates yet again the protean energies of the two genres in which it participates.

LYDIA FAKUNDINY

Anthologies

- American Lives*, edited by Robert F.Sayre, Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1994
The Art of the Essay, edited by Lydia Fakundiny, Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1991
The Intimate Critique: Autobiographical Literary Criticism, edited by Diane Freedman and others, Durham, North Carolina: Duke University Press, 1993

Further Reading

- Ashley, Kathleen, Leigh Gilmore, and Gerald Peters, editors, Autobiography and Postmodernism, Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1994
- Bruss, Elizabeth W., Autobiographical Acts: The Changing Situation of a Literary Genre, Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1976
- Eakin, Paul John, Fictions in Autobiography: Studies in the Art of Self-Invention, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1985
- Good, Graham, The Observing Self: Rediscovering the Essay, London and New York: Routledge, 1988
- Good, Graham, "Identity and Form in the Modern Autobiographical Essay," Prose Studies 15, no. 1 (April 1992): 99–117
- Hart, Francis R., "Notes for an Anatomy of Modern Autobiography," New Literary History 1, no. 3 (Spring 1970): 485–511
- Lejeune, Philippe, Le Pacte autobiographique, Paris: Seuil, 1975
- Olney, James, Metaphors of Self: The Meaning of Autobiography, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1972
- Peterson, Linda, "Gender and the Autobiographical Essay: Research Perspectives, Pedagogical Practices," College Composition and Communication 42 (May 1991): 171–93
- Terms of Identity: Essays on the Theoretical Terminology of LifeWriting*, special issue of Auto/Biography Studies 10, no. 1 (1995)

Ayala, Francisco

Spanish, 1906–

Having studied political philosophy and sociology in Germany and earned his doctorate in law from the University of Madrid, Francisco Ayala published essays in numerous professional fields, as well as an abundant output of fiction. As a critic for José Ortega y Gasset's prestigious literary periodical, Revista de Occidente (Western review), his literary and cultural essays reflect that master philosopher's tutelage. He has written legal, sociological, and philosophical treatises while teaching at the University of Madrid, journalism and works on political science during his Latin American exile, and studies in linguistics, history, literary theory, and culture. In other words, there are few subjects that have not come under Ayala's scrutiny.

Ayala's essays and fiction are closely interrelated: writings in both genres explore existential alienation, ethical dilemmas, pedagogy, the abuse of power, philosophical and moral questions concerning the mass media, corruption in government, and terrorism. The basic, underlying problem he explores in his essays is the tension between individual liberty and social order, between personal dignity and equality and the common good. Ayala's essays and fiction often contemplate the power exercised by human beings over others, viewed as usurpation capable of destroying basic humanity and degrading humans to animalism. Degradation through loss of liberty (expressed in Ayala's fiction by metaphors of bestiality) appears in his essays as an ethical problem of equilibrium between personal freedom and tyranny or dictatorship.

In Derechos de la persona individual para una sociedad de masas (1953; Individual rights in mass society) and El escritor en la sociedad de masas (1956; The writer in mass society) Ayala paints a portrait of a society in crisis. Concern with juvenile gangs, gratuitous violence, and disregard for the rights of others inspires many pages in these collections and numerous fictional works. Without overt moralizing, Ayala depicts the results of pervasive abdication of moral responsibility (an attribute of the "mass man" mentality analyzed by Ortega). Dehumanization resulting from socialized conformity is a frequent motif. Ayala examines demagoguery, propaganda, censorship, and "information management" calculated to mislead public opinion, exposing (as had Ortega) artifices calculated to deprive the masses of the exercise of conscience. In La crisis actual de la enseñanza (1958; The current educational crisis) and Tecnología y libertad (1959; Technology and liberty), he critiques permissive educational policies, juvenile delinquency, antisocial activity, and gratuitous crime, analyzing discrepancies between technological and moral progress, examining material civilization and the "culture lag," contemporary political institutions' inability to cope with state invasion of individual privacy.

Razón del mundo (1944; Worldly reason) examines historiography and relationships between history and fiction, arguing that philosophy, history, and fiction all attempt to provide orientation and guidance. Without undue insistence upon history's being written by the victors, Ayala suggests its frequent fictionality, implicitly including "official versions" of the past with other forms of usurpation. Challenging readers to think autonomously, he exposes the weaknesses of historical and philosophical dogma. Realidad y ensueño (1963; Reality and daydreams) considers intuition sometimes superior to reason in its epistemological epiphanies. Existentially, Ayala (like Ortega) shows more concern for epistemology than ontology, but balances the psychological and sociological.

Ayala's work, whether fiction or nonfiction, constitutes a continuing linguistic probing of the human condition as a moral and aesthetic project. Seamlessly interfacing reality and literature, he explores and reexamines the implications of their relationship while elaborating his personal, intellectual perception of historical process. As Ortega's disciple, Ayala made contributions to the master's historiographic "method of generations." Profoundly preoccupied by his observations of moral mutability, Ayala offers reflections upon creativity, freedom, power, and poetry in the context of social flux, paradox, and fragmentation. The wide-ranging, polyfaceted nature of his essays overwhelms the average reader, obscuring his significant contributions to literary theory (narratology, genre theory, perspectivism), theory in the social sciences (sociology, political science, history), and more abstract philosophical theorizing (epistemological speculation, reflections on the role of memory, analysis of the psychology of everyday experience in relation to the established order and traditional culture).

Many critical works treat fields related to Ayala's teaching of Spanish literature: Cervantes, the Lazarillo, Quevedo, the Golden Age, Galdós, and major Spanish and Latin American writers of the 20th century. Ayala believes criticism's role is to help reconstruct circumstances at the moment of writing, but he also writes theoretical criticism, documents his readings, identifies antecedents, and traces points of coincidence. Further critical interests include dreams, tragedy and comedy, and relationships between comedy and the grotesque, autobiography and creativity, and an author's sociohistorical reality and his or her work. Ayala's essays also facilitate understanding of his own fiction, indirectly indicating intertexts, apocryphal citations, and tricks on the unwary reader.

Writing with irony and humor, inspired by news items and current events, Ayala frequently addresses themes in his essays such as responsibility and guilt in the anonymous "mass society," existential authenticity, and the ambivalence accompanying recognition of individual responsibility. He treats radical solitude, the difficulties of authentic communication, alienation, and helplessness or desperation in both fiction and essays, believing the writer should investigate the meaning of human life and ultimate mysteries, penetrate profound questions of contemporary existence, and seek answers to questions concerning time, death, and oblivion.

JANET PÉREZ

Biography

Francisco de Paula Ayala y García-Duarte. Born 16 March 1906 in Granada. Studied at the University of Madrid, law degree, 1929, Ph.D., 1931; studied in Germany, 1929–30. Married Etelvina Silva, 1931: one daughter. Professor of law, University of Madrid, 1932–35. Diplomat for the Spanish Republic, 1937; exiled in Buenos Aires, where he taught sociology and founded Realidad (Reality) magazine, 1939–50, Puerto Rico, where he founded La Torre (The tower), 1950–58, New York, 1958–66, and Chicago, 1966–73. Professor at Rutgers University, New Brunswick, New Jersey, Bryn Mawr College, Pennsylvania, University of Chicago, and New York University. United States representative to UNESCO. Began visiting Spain, from 1960, and returned to live there, mid-1980s. Elected to the Royal Spanish Academy, 1983. Awards: National Critics' Prize, 1972; National Literature Prize, 1983; National Prize of Spanish Letters, 1988; Cervantes Prize, 1991.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Indagación del cinema, 1929

El derecho social en la constitución de la República española (treatise), 1932

El pensamiento vivo de Saavedra Fajardo, 1941

El problema del liberalismo, 1941

Historia de la libertad, 1942

Oppenheimer, 1942

Razón del mundo (La preocupación de España), 1944

Histrionismo y representación, 1944

Los políticos, 1944

- Una doble experiencia política: España e Italia*, 1944
Jovellanos, 1945
Ensayo sobre la libertad, 1945
Tratado de sociología (treatise), 3 vols., 1947
La invención del “Quijote”, 1950
Ensayos de sociología política, 1952
Introducción a las ciencias sociales, 1952
Derechos de la persona individual para una sociedad de masas, 1953
El escritor en la sociedad de masas, 1956
Breve teoría de la traducción, 1956; as Problemas de la traducción, 1965
La integración social en América, 1958
La crisis actual de la enseñanza, 1958
Tecnología y libertad, 1959
Experiencia e invención, 1960
Realidad y ensueño, 1963
La evasión de los intelectuales, with H.A.Murena, 1963
De este mundo y el otro, 1963
España, a la fecha, 1965; enlarged edition, 1977
El cine: Arte y espectáculo, 1966
España y la cultura germánica, 1968
Reflexiones sobre la estructura narrativa, 1970
El “Lazarillo”: Nuevo examen de algunos aspectos, 1971
Confrontaciones, 1972
Los ensayos: Teoría y crítica literaria, 1972
La novela: Galdós y Unamuno, 1974
Cervantes y Quevedo, 1974
El escritor y su imagen: Ortega y Gasset, Azorín, Valle-Inclán, Machado, 1975
El escritor y el cine, 1975
Galdós en su tiempo, 1978
España, 1975–1980: Conflictos y logros de la democracia, 1982.
Palabras y letras, 1983
La estructura narrativa, y otras experiencias literarias, 1984
La retórica del periodismo y otras retóricas, 1985
La imagen de España: Continuidad y cambio en la sociedad española, 1986
Obra periodística, 1986
Las plumas del fénix: Estudios de literatura española, 1989
Contra el poder y otros ensayos, 1992,
El tiempo y yo, o, El mundo a la espalda, 1992
 Other writings: many works of fiction (including La cabeza del cordero [The Lamb's Head], 1949; Los usurpadores [Usurpers], 1949; Muertes de perro [Death as a Way of Life], 1958; El fondo del vaso, 1961), autobiography, and books on philosophy, sociology, history, and criticism.

Bibliographies

- Alvarez Calleja, José, Bibliografía de Francisco Ayala, Madrid: Serie Bibliografías, 1983
 Amorós, Andrés, Bibliografía de Francisco Ayala, New York: Syracuse University, 1973

Further Reading

- Anthropos* issue on Ayala, 139 (December 1992)
- Hiriart, Rosario, Conversaciones con Francisco Ayala, Madrid: Espasa-Calpe, 1982
- Irizarry, Estelle, Francisco Ayala, Boston: Twayne, 1977
- Kollatz, Elisabeth, Krieg, Macht, Politik im essayistischen und narrativen Werk Francisco Ayalas, Frankfurt-on-Main: Lang, 1995
- Lindstrom, Naomi, "Creation in Criticism, Criticism in Creation: Four Ibero Exemplars," Discurso Literario 6, no. 2 (Spring 1989): 423–44
- Martínez, Antonio, "The Powers That Usurped Peace: Testimony and Denunciation of Francisco Ayala," in German and International Perspectives on the Spanish Civil War: The Aesthetics of Partisanship, edited by Luis Costa and others, Columbia, South Carolina: Camden House, 1992:376–85
- Mermall, Thomas, Alegorías del poder en Francisco Ayala, Madrid: Espiral, 1983
- Vásquez Medel, Manuel Angel, editor, El universo plural de Francisco Ayala, Seville: Alfar, 1995

Azaña, Manuel

Spanish, 1880–1940

Although Azaña the President and statesman has overshadowed Azaña the essayist and novelist, this tragic figure of Spanish liberalism never retreated from the belief that rational public action, like art, must arise from an all-embracing aesthetics which he referred to as a collective "style." But if his driving intellectual passion was to be the architect of this new order characterized by rhetorical excellence and rational cordiality, his introspective aloofness as a writer often placed him at a remove from his own grand design. Toward the end of his life in his Memorias (Memoirs) he drifted finally into personal detachment in ironic and self-conscious musings over his failures.

In several essays Azaña professed a special fondness for the writings of 19th-century novelist and essayist Juan Valera. Critics J.Ferrer Solà and Francisco Daudet, among others, claim to detect in his own prose a certain imitative resemblance to his predecessor in the archaic overtones, impeccable lexical purity, and classical tenor of his phrasing. Yet unlike Valera, Azaña resisted the lure of belletrism for its own sake; for him art and ideology remained inseparable, although one must add that they did so as an unresolved personal conflict. For if Azaña leaned intellectually toward ideology, his art and oratory remained grounded in vibrant aesthetic instincts. Thus in El jardín de los frailes (1927; The friars' garden), a partially autobiographical novel of his student days in the Escorial, the young protagonist finds consolation for his prison-like confinement in the pleasurable, almost erotic contemplation of pure beauty, a beauty suggested by the interplay of real and imaginary light reflecting a baroque and sometimes grotesque material world. His vision is at once sensuous and sensitive yet defined at more or less regular intervals by introspective rational markers tinged with occasional self-doubt and, for his opponents, frequent sarcasm. As a result of these binary swings between lyric exuberance and critical scrutiny his style exhibits a syncopated cadence that suggests both a predisposition to psychological testimonialism and an affinity for baroque syntax, qualities that seemed to serve him better as an orator than as a novelist or essayist.

The essays of Azaña veer closer in style to his oratory than to his novels. In the latter his penchant for detachment and distance seemed to prevail over the fundamental realism which, generally speaking, was predominant in the other genres he cultivated. It is particularly significant in this regard that for Azaña the creation of a style involved not only the search for a relevant ideological and literary posture before the world but also the means of escaping from it. At his dialectical best in the essay, Azaña achieves a superior level of persuasive communicativeness by the precise logical structure of his prose and by the rigorously clear exposition of arguments informed by a unique view of Spain.

Azaña has been described as “a man without a generation,” but even though he publicized his disagreements with the Generation of 1898, he shared with his older compatriots much of their “landscape lyricism” and the literary temperament that informs their work. Furthermore, within his own generation he exhibited with José Ortega y Gasset, Eugenio d’Ors, Ramón Pérez de Ayala, and Juan Ramón Jiménez a Modernist penchant for metaphorical precision and conceptual elegance.

In the Memorias and other essays an ironic note serves Azaña as a means of distancing himself from the technical incompetence, backwardness, and bad faith of certain contemporaries. As a general rule, his procedure consists of creating a spiral of contrasting images before suddenly demolishing them with a verbal contre-coup that reveals in unmistakable clarity not only the person’s shortcomings but the author’s contempt for mediocrity. Irony in the essays often introduces moments of sarcastic humor which serve to counterbalance the somber intervals of private reflections. Thus he delights in ridiculing the pompous speeches of other political figures, in caricaturing professional groups such as medical doctors, and, occasionally, in poking fun at himself.

In a general way, these moments of irony and humor serve to alleviate a style that tends toward the transcendent. Functionally, therefore, they act as humanizing components by making the text more accessible and, ultimately, more understandable. Nevertheless, the same acerbity of this irony and humor may also point to personal flaws. At times the hauteur that slips into his language seems to betray an impatient, supercilious intellectual who, though sincere and intimate with an anonymous public, scorned his less gifted peers.

Both the style and the person of Manuel Azaña raise contradictory questions. Undeniably of classical, even elitist propensities in his native literary preferences, he nevertheless sought to create a democratic ideological style for the Spanish masses. He inclined naturally to art for art’s sake yet stubbornly insisted publicly that art must be subservient to ideology. And although as President of the Republic he kept watch over Spanish liberalism during its most tragic period, he also jealously guarded and cultivated an inner personal domain remote from politics and devastation, though replete with sympathies for the human condition at the nadir. It was a personal region of ideal hues and sensuous resonance articulated by the aesthetic sentiments of a literary purist. Most likely there, beyond his ideological obsessions, is where one must seek his most enduring legacy.

HAROLD RALEY

Biography

Manuel Azaña y Díaz. Born 10 January 1880 in Alcalá de Henares. Studied at the Real Colegio de Estudios Superiores, San Lorenzo de El Escorial, 1893–97; University of Saragossa, law degree, 1898; University of Madrid, Ph.D., 1900; also studied in Paris. Secretary, 1913, and president, 1930, Ateneo cultural center, Madrid. Founder, with José Ortega y Gasset, League of Political Education, 1913. Joined the Reformist Party, 1913. Cofounder, La Pluma (The pen), 1920–23, and España, 1923–24. Founder, Political Action republican group, 1925. Married Dolores Rivas Cherif, 1929. Minister of war, 1931, Prime Minister, 1931–33, and President of the Republic, 1936–39; then exiled to France. Awards: National Literature Prize, 1926. Died in Montauban, France, 3 November 1940.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Don Juan Valera, 1926

Valera en Rusia, 1926

La novela de Pepita Jiménez, 1927

Valera en Italia, 1929

Plumas y palabras, 1930

Una política (1930–1932) (speeches), 1932

En el poder y en la Oposición (1932–1934) (speeches), 2 vols., 1934

La invención del Quijote y otros ensayos, 1934

Discursos en campo abierto (speeches), 1936

Memorias íntimas, 1938

La velada en Benicarló (dialogue), 1939; edited by Manuel Aragón, 1974; as Vigil in

Benicarló, translated by Josephine and Paul Stewart, 1982

Ensayos sobre Valera, 1971

Memorias políticas y de guerras, 4 vols., 1976–81

Antología I: Ensayos, edited by Federico Jiménez Losantos, 1982

Antología I: Discursos, edited by Federico Jiménez Losantos, 1983

Apuntes de memoria (inédito), edited by Enrique de Rivas, 1990

Discursos parlamentarios, edited by Javier Paniagua Fuentes, 1992

Other writings: the autobiographical novel El jardín de los frailes (1927), two plays, diaries, and correspondence.

Collected works edition: Obras completas, edited by Juan Marichal, 4 vols., 1966–68.

Bibliography

Rivas, Enrique de, Comentarios y notas a "Apuntes de memoria" de Manuel Azaña y a las cartas de 1938, 1939, 1940, Valencia: PreTextos, 1990:187–244

Further Reading

- Alpert, Michael, La reforma militar de Azaña (1931–1933), Madrid: Siglo XXI, 1982
- Aragón, Manuel, "Manuel Azaña: Un intento de modernización política," Sistema 2 (May 1973): 101–04
- Arias, Luis, Azaña o el sueño de la razón, Madrid: Nerea, 1990
- Espín, Eduardo, Azaña en el poder: El partido de Acción Republicana, Madrid: Centro de Investigaciones Sociológicas, 1980
- Ferrer Solà, Jesus, Manuel Azaña: Una pasión intelectual, Barcelona: Anthropos, 1991
- Giménez Caballero, Ernesto, Manuel Azaña (Profecías Españolas), Madrid: Turner, 1974 (original edition, 1932)
- Jackson, Gabriel, Costa, Azaña, el Frente Popular y otros ensayos, Madrid: Turner, 1976
- Jiménez Losantos, Federico, "El desdén con el desdén: Manuel Azaña," in his Lo que queda de España, Saragossa: Alcrudo, 1979
- Julía, Santos, Manuel Azaña: Una biografía política, del Ateneo al Palacio Nacional, Madrid: Alianza, 1990
- Mainer, José-Carlos, "El retorno de Azaña," Insula 342 (May 1975): 4
- Marco, José María, La inteligencia republicana, Manuel Azaña, 1897–1930, Madrid: Biblioteca Nueva, 1988
- Marco, José María, Azaña, Madrid: Mondadori, 1990
- Marichal, Juan, La vocación de Manuel Azaña, Madrid: Alianza, 1982
- Marichal, Juan, El intelectual y la política, 1898–1936: Unamuno, Ortega, Azaña, Negrín, Madrid: Publicaciones de la Residencia de Estudiantes, 1990
- Montero, José, El drama de la verdad en Manuel Azaña, Seville: University of Seville, 1979
- Peña González, José, Los ideales políticos de Manuel Azaña, Madrid: University of Madrid, 1981
- Rivas, Enrique de, Comentarios y notas a "Apuntes de memoria" de Manuel Azaña y a las cartas de 1938, 1939, 1940, Valencia: PreTextos, 1990
- Rivas Cherif, Cipriano, Retrato de un desconocido: Vida de Manuel Azaña, Barcelona: Grijalbo, 1979
- Sedwick, Frank, The Tragedy of Manuel Azaña and the Fate of the Spanish Republic, Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1963
- Serrano, Vicente-Alberto, and José-María San Luciano, editors, Azaña, Madrid: Edascal, 1980

Azorín

Spanish, 1873–1967

Early in his career, José Martínez Ruiz adopted the pen name “Azorín,” under which he published novels, short stories, literary essays, plays, and countless articles in multiple turn-of-the-century magazines and newspapers and, beginning in 1905, in the leading conservative Spanish newspaper, ABC. Azorín was one of a group of important Spanish writers who began publishing in the 1890s and attained their greatest achievements between 1900 and 1930. With Miguel de Unamuno, Antonio and Manuel Machado, Pío Baroja, Jacinto Benavente, Ramón del Valle-Inclán, and others, Azorín undertook a reexamination of the Spanish nation and the modern Spanish subject. Formerly, critics divided these writers and their contemporaries into two distinct groups, the “Modernistas” and the Generation of 1898, but recently the trend has been to collapse this distinction and to classify all as “Modernistas” and to link them more broadly with the Anglo-European Modernist project while allowing for cultural variations according to local historical and social conditions. Modernism represents a break with the traditional sociosymbolic order and a search for new modes to express new experiences and perspectives.

Azorín’s essayistic writing demonstrates a Modernist rejection of the rationalist and scientific discourses that prevailed in the late 19th century and introduces a subjective, impressionistic, and highly poetic style. In some respects, it forges a link with the powerful but abbreviated production of the Romantic writer Mariano José de Larra, but in others it cultivates new modalities of writing in response to new modes of perception. Azorín’s “essays” include both literary criticism and studies of the Spanish character and landscape; frequently these two categories blend in a single text. La ruta de don Quijote (1905; Don Quixote’s route) chronicles Azorín’s retracing of the wanderings of Don Quixote and Sancho Panza in La Mancha, with a continuous melding of literary reminiscence and contemporary commentary. Lecturas españolas (1912; Spanish readings), Clásicos y modernos (1913; Classics and moderns), and De Granada a Castelar (1922; From Granada to Castelar), among others, offer highly personal rereadings of classical and contemporary texts. In works such as Los pueblos (1905; The villages), España (1909; Spain), and Castilla (1912; Castile), literary criticism also appears, but in the service of a re-creation of the Spanish and, in particular, of the Castilian landscape, peoples, and history.

Like many of his contemporaries, Azorín distrusted official history and the 19th-century belief in the objective reconstruction of facts; consequently, his texts repudiate the dispassionate tone, the emphasis on politics, and the reliance on government documents that characterize historical discourse of the period. In contrast, they foreground literary texts as a means to access the past and feature the lesser-known, sometimes anonymous figures of rural and small-town life as better guides to a reconstruction of previous periods than the biographies of notable public statesmen. In novels as well as essays, Azorín obsessively explores the theme of time and its passage, confronting the accelerated rhythm of modernity with a languorous exploration of the past as captured in the nonurban areas of Spain.

Azorín also breaks with literary and journalistic traditions in style and structure. His syntax represents a sharp departure from the heavily rhetorical style of 19th-century oratory, eschewing long sentences with multiple dependent clauses for short sentences with coordinate clauses. In keeping with a desire to bring the Spanish past into the present without sacrificing the cultural and linguistic specificity of Spain, Azorín and his contemporaries employ a rich lexicon that borrows freely from other languages while simultaneously resurrecting forgotten Spanish words drafted from specialized rural vocabularies.

Structurally, Azorín's texts often defy traditional generic boundaries. Many of the "essays" incorporate techniques borrowed from narrative and poetry, and dialogue is a frequent visitor in Azorín's essayistic writing. Castilla, one of his most widely-read publications, deliberately questions the established generic divisions through the careful construction of a collection of essays that move from conventional essay form through those incorporating poetic discourse, to those that take on a decidedly narrative form, and finally to the closing set of three that borrow strongly from dramatic techniques. Furthermore, the final essays introduce yet another form through the use of ekphrasis and the introduction of visual art, thus questioning the borders of literature itself.

Many critics view Azorín's experimentation with language and form as pure aestheticism, with no social or political implications. However, theorists of Modernism have refuted such a separation of content and form, and Azorín's writing can benefit from a revision along the lines that have guided other rereadings of Anglo-European Modernist writers. Notwithstanding the emphasis on Castilian texts, landscape, and culture, Azorín's publications insistently explore margins and boundaries, revising the canon, revisiting and reconstructing the past according to new visions, and denying the separation of art and life.

España, another important collection, demonstrates the insistence on multiple perspectives that cross traditional lines of separation and open up new possibilities for the perception of modern experience. The book combines the diachronic and the synchronic; the first 15 texts follow a chronological order, with each connected to a specific date, while the last 15 essays deal with contemporary issues and are devoid of historical references. Many of the essays emphasize the continuity of the past, while others foreground a disjointed historical evolution that places past and present in opposition.

Moreover, the marginalization of Spain, whether by its own choice or by foreign design, receives close scrutiny. Notwithstanding the title and the insistent examination of Spanish countryside, history, and culture, the text opens with an epigraph from Petrarch which appears in Italian and closes with an epilogue that was written in the French Pyrenees. Throughout the essays, the text speaker intrudes on the materials discussed in a constant reminder of the influence of the observer on what is observed and described, thus debunking any pretense of objectivity. Azorín's essays thus reflect the Modernist impulse to develop new modes of writing and thinking in order to represent the complexities of modern experience.

MARY LEE BRETZ

Biography

Born José Martínez Ruiz, 8 June 1873 in Monóvar, Alicante. Also used the pseudonyms Cándido and Ahrimán. Studied at the Colegio de los Padres Escolapios, Yecla, 1881–88; law at the University of Valencia, from 1888. Moved to Madrid, 1896. Journalist for various newspapers, including ABC, El País (The country), El Progreso (Progress), and El Imparcial (The impartial). Elected deputy to the Spanish Parliament, 1907. Married Julia Guinda Urzanqui, 1908. Undersecretary for the Ministry of Public Instruction, 1917, 1919. Drama critic during the 1920s. Elected to the Royal Spanish Academy, 1914. Columnist for La Nación (Buenos Aires), 1930–67. Lived in Paris, 1936–39. Died in Madrid, 2 March 1967.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

- La crítica literaria en España*, 1893
- Moratin esbozo por Cándido*, 1893
- Buscapiés*, 1894
- Anarquistas literarios*, 1895
- Notas sociales*, 1895
- Literatura*, 1896
- Charivari.*, 1897
- Soledades*, 1898
- La evolución de la crítica*, 1899
- La sociología criminal*, 1899
- Los hidalgos*, 1900
- El alma castellana*, 1900
- Los pueblos*, 1905
- La ruta de don Quijote*, 1905
- El político*, 1908
- España: Hombres y paisajes*, 1909
- La Cierva*, 1910
- Lecturas españolas*, 1912
- Castilla*, 1912
- Clásicos y modernos*, 1913
- Los valores literarios*, 1913
- Al margen de los clásicos*, 1915
- Rivas y Larra*, 1916
- Un pueblecito: Riofrío de Avila*, 1916
- Páginas escogidas*, 1917
- Entre España y Francia*, 1917
- El paisaje de España visto por los españoles*, 1917
- Madrid-Guía sentimental*, 1918
- Paris bombardeado*, 1919
- Fantasías y devaneos*, 1920

- Los dos Luises y otros ensayos*, 1921
De Granada a Castelar, 1922
El chirrión de los políticos, 1923
Una hora de España, 1924; edited by José Montero Padilla, 1993
Racine y Molière, 1924
Los Quintero y otras páginas, 1925
Andando y pensando, 1929
Lope en silueta, 1935
Trasuntos de España, 1938
Valencia, 1941
Madrid, 1941
París, 1945
Memorias inmemoriales, 1946
Con permiso de los cervantistas, 1948
La cabeza de Castilla, 1950
Con bandera de Francia, 1950
Verano en Mallorca, 1952
El oasis de los clásicos, edited by J.García Marcada, 1952
El cine y el momento, 1953
El efímero cine, 1955
El pasado, 1955
Agenda, 1959
Posdata, 1959
Ejercicios de castellano, 1960
La hora de la pluma, edited by Victor Ouimette, 1987
Artículos anarquistas, edited by José María Valverde, 1992
 Other writings: many novels, short stories, and plays.
 Collected works edition: Obras completas, edited by Ángel Cruz Rueda, 9 vols., 1947–54.

Bibliographies

- Fox, E.Inman, Azorín: Guía de la obra completa, Madrid: Castalia, 1992
 Sáinz de Bujanda, Fernando, Clausura de un centerario: Guía bibliográfica de Azorín, Madrid: Revista de Occidente, 1974

Further Reading

- Fox, E.Inman, Azorín as a Literary Critic, New York: Hispanic Institute, 1962
 Glenn, Kathleen M., Azorín, Boston: Twayne, 1981
 Granell, Manuel, Estética de Azorín, Madrid: Biblioteca Nueva, 1949
 Krause, Anna, Azorín, the Little Philosopher: Inquiry into the Birth of a Literary Personality, Berkeley: University of California Publications in Modern Philosophy, 1948
 Pérez de Ayala, Ramón, Ante Azorín, Madrid: Biblioteca Nueva, 1964
 Ríopérez y Milá, Santiago, Azorín íntegro: Estudio biográfico, crítico, bibliográfico y

antológico, Madrid: Biblioteca Nueva, 1979

Torre, Guillermo de, Del 98 al barroco, Madrid: Gredos, 1965

Valverde, José María, Azorín, Barcelona: Planeta, 1971

B

Bacon, Francis

English, 1561–1626

Francis Bacon was the first master of the essay form in English and a philosopher of this and other literary formulas for spreading enlightened thought. While he wrote in an astonishing variety of styles, as to the essay he was essentially a one-book author. But there were three versions of this book. While the Essayes of 1597 marked the first appearance of the term as part of an English book title, it contained only ten compositions, and these were hardly more than little collections of sharp sayings. The Baconian masterwork in the genre is clearly the third version, The Essayes or Counsels, Civill and Morall of 1625. Standing alone like the 1612 edition, but enlarged “both in number and weight,” it is indeed the “new work” which the dedication advertises. There are 58 essays (20 more than in 1612), and those carried over are reordered and revised, and fattened by quotation, authority, and a flow of insinuating reasoning. Of this version Bacon thought well and predicted much. While in summarizing his literary motives he called the work a “recreation,” he added at once that the Essayes had been the easy road to his fame. It was the most popular of his writings then and has been ever since. Bacon had the final version translated into Latin (with small variations) and expected that “in the universal language” it may “last as long as books last.” He included the work among the “civil and moral writings” to be inserted in The Great Instauration, his vast collection of useful arts and sciences that could give man power over his environment. The civil and moral writings show what powers are truly useful, and they elaborate on civil powers such as the nation-state and moral powers such as the work ethic.

Bacon’s Essayes is a variation on Montaigne’s Essais, which was published first in 1580 and then in its full three volumes in 1588. After 1600 a wave of imitative volumes appeared in English, most citing and quoting one of Bacon’s versions, but others showing the influence of the Essais. Bacon himself refers only once to Montaigne, but it is in the first essay, “Of Truth,” and as a sly guide in attacking truth, particularly religious truth. “Of Truth” develops circumspectly the universality and power of falsehood, not least in religious matters. Montaigne saw the worldly passion beneath the pretense; he “saith prettily” that he who lies fears God less and men more.

Like Montaigne, Bacon found in the essay form an informal and winning appeal, which served not least to circumvent the authority of theological works. The Essayes like the Essais are first and foremost in the vernacular, the language of the layman. Each is composed of discrete little compositions, less likely to strain the ordinary attention span. Both have a casual and even disorderly tenor; they avoid the distant formality of an oration, or even of a comedy or tragedy. Bacon no more than Montaigne imposes exhortations, or satires and laments as to virtue and vice. Also, and substantively, the Essayes like the Essais entertains men's opinions. Each adopts a tolerant stance; neither imposes a righteous way. The Essayes is not an application of the Bible or a eulogy of ancient morals (except in quick bows to Seneca and the Stoics as the reader is maneuvered past theological morals and the Peripatetics).

Yet the work directs opinion, albeit indirectly. The Essayes is a self-help book, but the reader is directed deep into a novel spirit of self-help. The extraordinary essay "Of Goodness and Goodness of Nature" moves past charity through humanity, then redefines goodness as self-reliance, even the self-reliance of the maliciously ambitious founder of a state. At the foundation of politics is self-making and badness, rather than goodness, of nature. The Essayes appeals not so much to self-expression as to self-interest, and does so by supplying enlightened ways to satisfy one's interest. The essays have been popular, the dedication explains, because "they come home to men's business and bosoms." Typical titles are "Of Death," "Of Love," "Of Great Place," "Of Riches," and "Of Ambition." Still, all this guidance is under an appearance of reticence. Bacon in his way, like Montaigne in his, seems most unauthoritative. In the only essay devoted to literary style, Bacon explains how literary diffidence can go with literary leadership; it was a lesson that followers like Benjamin Franklin took to heart. "The honorablest part of talk is to give the occasion; and again to moderate and pass to somewhat else; for then a man leads the dance" ("Of Discourse").

Bacon's collection is both more succinct and less charming than Montaigne's. It is more "pragmatic"; his essays are "counsels civill and morall" which concentrate on advancing one's business and state. Montaigne appears eccentric, leisurely, pleasure-seeking, and bemused; he pointedly alludes to the pleasures of freedom, food, sex, talk, and friends. Bacon by contrast writes essays that are comparatively short, intense, and businesslike. The central essay of the Essais is the skeptical "Apologie de Raimond Sebond" ("Apology of Raymond Sebond") and is as long as Bacon's whole volume. The greatest of Bacon's essays, "Of the True Greatness of Kingdoms and Estates," advances ten compressed counsels for building a republican empire. This is a naval and economic variation on Machiavelli's plan for a warlike and imperial republic; several examples come straight from I discorsi (1531; Discourses on Livy). While Montaigne concentrated on inducing skepticism about the old other-worldly faith and learning, reminding the reader of natural pleasures, Bacon could also offer a rival object of belief, a new project of security through a thisworldly nation-state. The Essayes are disciplined by such a plan, and by being one building block in a whole vision of progress, scientific and technological as well as economic and political.

Given the modified Machiavellianism in the content of the Essayes, one must wonder whether there is also a link in form, a relation between a Baconian essay and a Machiavellian "discourse." Bacon writes of speech as "discourse," and the discussions are colored by a Machiavellian concentration on efficacy: on force and fraud in literary "transmission." Still, Bacon's essays are more compressed and less apparently wandering than Machiavelli's discourses, forego the stalking horse of ancient Rome, and thematically address civil, moral, and religious topics. In their focus they resemble Seneca's Moral Epistles to Lucilius, which Bacon once mentions as an "ancient" precedent. But Bacon transforms the precedent. Seneca's 124 compositions had little to do with politics and demonstrated little confidence in political reform. They meditate on the inevitable trials of life (e.g. "On the Futility of Planning Ahead") and exhort to moral restraint and a philosophic life. Bacon's essays are more devious; they follow Machiavelli's Il principe (wr. 1513, pub. 1532; The Prince) and the Discourses in replacing morality with modes of worldly success and meditation with comprehensive planning. Such considerations also dispose of the suggestion that a Baconian essay is like a Platonic dialogue. Bacon disdains Socrates' dialectical winnowing of opinions, as if one could get to wisdom through words rather than through managing forces. In "Of Seeming Wisdom," Bacon identifies dialectic with a wordy pretentiousness that plays with mere seemings and is "the bane of business."

What the essay is, and why Bacon favors it, is clarified in the formulations of literary theory in Advancement of Learning (1605) and its Latin version, De augmentis (1623). Both recommend sharp "fragments," rather than methodical or "magistral" texts, especially when attempting to change belief rather than confirm it. Pungent writings provoke the sharp and conceal from the dull. Being short and seminal, they encourage one's "initiative" in reconsidering "the roots of knowledge" and in progressing for oneself. But being "enigmatical," they baffle "vulgar capacities"; they reserve a teaching for "wits of such sharpness as can pierce the veil." The brief writing Bacon discusses is not the essay but the clipped sentence called the aphorism: "short and scattered sentences not linked together by an artificial method." A Baconian aphorism catches an observation at the core of matters. It catches especially the cause of an important effect. For example: "He that has Wife and Children, hath given Hostage to Fortune, for they are Impediments to great enterprises, either of Virtue, or Mischief" ("Of Marriage and Single Life"). The aphorism is the ammunition of the Baconian essay. The first essays of 1597 were like machine-gun fire, hardly more than staccato collections of these "dispersed directions" for pursuing one's interests.

The developed Baconian essay is typically fattened. Bland, often dense with lists, it oozes quotation and authority. This style seems both to baffle the lazy and to exhibit the politic sugar-coating recommended in De augmentis: introduce "knowledge which is new" with a gloss of the familiar, "with similitudes and comparisons." Govern speech by policy, and therefore with a view to obstacles in the way. This explains many of the apparently traditional doctrines in the developed essays and also the disorderly interspersing of replies to predictable objections. A typical Baconian essay starts with principles that sound like religious or moral orthodoxies and then suppresses or transforms these by degrees until they are replaced. The more closely one follows the precise terms of an argument, and its successive reformulations, qualifications, and manipulation of authorities, the more clearly a direction appears. For example, "Of Riches" begins by treating "riches" in a rather Aristotelian way, as merely "the baggage of virtue." But it jogs quickly to liberate wealth-getting from moral limit, and by the end elaborates the modes of multiplying "riches exceedingly" with only prudential limits. By adopting a disorderly receptivity to other views, one can provoke, guide, and lead—and the more effectively as one's control is hidden. One can "lead the dance" ("Of Discourse”). Dancing with the opinions dear to others, Bacon turns traditional opinions toward enlightened opinions, doing so more effectively by disguising the transformation and the direction beneath the disorder. D’Alembert, in the “Preliminary Discourse” to the Encyclopédie, caught this art. The great Bacon used “subdivisions fashionable in his time,” even “scholastic principles,” for, despite “the most rigorous precision” of style, he was “too wise to astonish anyone.” Hence he and his followers could “prepare from afar the light which gradually, by imperceptible degrees, would illuminate the world.”

Perhaps one could show that the Essays as a whole develops like each essay, that is, from undermining the old ways of Christian Europe to establishing enlightened new ways. It moves from corrosion of the most authoritative pieties, at its beginning (“Of Truth,” “Of Death,” “Of Unity of Religion”), to the production of a new-model, progressive nation-state and of the priority of self-preservation, in its middle (“Of the True Greatness of Kingdoms and Estates,” “Of Regiment of Health”), to intimations of a new-model progressive civilization, at its end (“Of Vicissitude of Things”). There seem to be four stages. The first essays (nos. 1–19) chiefly commit sedition on morality, religion, and the established hierarchy of estates, church, and king. Insofar as innovations are proposed, such as the priority of one’s own rising to great place and the priority of economic development, they borrow a traditional surface, such as duty and the priority of repulsing sedition. The second stage (20–29) tutors those under cover but consciously rising in the new politics. Counselors who seem to advance the business of kingdoms and estates can promote their own place in an expanding and rather republican nationstate. The third stage (30–46) concentrates on what is in the new project for individuals, especially rising individuals, and becomes more open in unveiling the corresponding possibilities of a rather self-regulating civil society based on mutual utility. Moral attitudes are recast as personal incentives, channeled to attract planters of economic colonies, entrepreneurs, investors, and financiers. The final stage (47–58) shows how a superior prince provides honors and other incentives for his superior followers, such as counselors and judges who will introduce the new state of things. In turn, such enlightened public figures will help raise a founding leader to the “sovereign honor”—the dominating fame—for which he is ambitious.

The Essays is a plan for civil nations and civil states, of a kind that will support the scientific civilization that Bacon also proposes. It supplements Bacon’s other political works, such as his models of a state-builder (The History of the Reign of Henry VII, 1622) and of a humane but autonomous scientific technological establishment (New Atlantis, 1626). The Baconian essay is a literary formula used to spread the new teachings to rising entrepreneurs and politicians, just as the form of political history appeals to founders and ministers of states, and that of a future-oriented scientific utopia, to visionary intellectuals.

ROBERT K. FAULKNER

Biography

Born 22 January 1561 in London. Studied at Trinity College, Cambridge, 1573–76; Gray’s Inn, London, 1576, 1579–82; admitted to the bar, 1582. Attaché to Ambassador

Sir Amias Paulet, British Embassy, Paris, 1576–79. Member of Parliament for Melcombe Regis, Dorset, 1584, Taunton, 1586, Liverpool, 1589, Middlesex, 1593, Southampton, 1597, Ipswich, 1604, and Cambridge University, 1614. Bencher, 1586, Lent reader, 1588, and double reader, 1600, Gray's Inn; member of a committee of lawyers appointed to review statutes, 1588. Patronized by the Earl of Essex, from 1591, but took part in treason trial against him, 1601; queen's counsel extraordinary, 1595–1603, and king's counsel, from 1604; commissioner for the union of Scotland and England, 1603. Knighted, 1603. Married Alice Barnham, 1606. Solicitor general, 1607–13; attorney general, 1613–17; member of the Privy Council, 1616; lord keeper of the great seal, 1617–18; lord chancellor, 1618. Created Baron Verulam, and admitted to the House of Lords, 1618. Accused of bribery, found guilty by the House of Lords, and stripped of offices, fined, and temporarily imprisoned, 1621; later pardoned by the king. Created Viscount St. Albans, 1621. Died in Highgate, London, 9 April 1626.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Essays, 1597; revised, enlarged editions, as Essaies, 1612, and as The Essayes or Counsels, Civill and Morall, 1625; many critical editions, including those edited by Michael J. Hawkins (Everyman Edition), 1973, Michael Kiernan, 1985, and John Pitcher, 1985

Francis Bacon (selections), edited by Brian Vickers, 1996

Other writings: longer works on history, law, science, religion, and politics, especially Novum organum (1620), which sets forth the experimental method of useful knowledge, The Advancement of Learning (1605), which recasts all learning, and the fable New Atlantis (1626).

Collected works edition: Works (including life and letters), edited by James Spedding, R.L. Ellis, and D.D. Heath, 14 vols., 1857–74, reprinted 1968.

Bibliography

Gibson, Reginald W., Francis Bacon: A Bibliography of His Works and of Baconiana to the Year 1750, Oxford: Scrivener Press, 1950; supplement privately printed, 1959

Further Reading

Adolph, Robert, The Rise of Modern Prose Style, Cambridge, Massachusetts: MIT Press, 1968: Chapter 2

Cochrane, Rexmond C., "Francis Bacon and the Architecture of Fortune," Studies in the Renaissance 5 (1958): 176–95

Crane, R.S., "The Relation of Bacon's Essayes to His Program for the Advancement of Learning," in Schelling Anniversary Papers, New York: Century, 1923

Engel, William E., "Aphorism, Anecdote, and Anamnesis in Montaigne and Bacon," Montaigne Studies 1 (November 1989): 158–76

- Faulkner, Robert K., "The Art of Enlightenment," in his Francis Bacon and the Project of Progress, Lanham, Maryland: Rowman and Littlefield, 1993: Chapter 2
- Fish, Stanley, "Georgics of the Mind: The Experience of Bacon's Essays," in his Self-Consuming Artifacts: The Experience of Seventeenth-Century Literature, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1972
- Fuller, Jean Overton, Sir Francis Bacon, Maidstone, Kent: George Mann Books, revised edition, 1994 (original edition, 1981)
- Good, Graham, "Bacon: Ramifications of Counsel," in his The Observing Self: Rediscovering the Essay, London and New York: Routledge, 1988:43–54
- Green, A. Wigfall, Sir Francis Bacon, New York: Twayne, 1966
- Hall, Joan Wylie, "Bacon's Triple Curative: The 1597 Essays, Meditations, and Places," Papers on Language and Literature 21, no. 4 (Fall 1985): 345–58
- Jardine, Lisa, Francis Bacon: Discovery and the Art of Discourse, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1974
- Kiernan, Michael, General Introduction and Textual Introduction to The Essays by Bacon, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1985
- Knights, L.C., "Bacon and the Seventeenth-Century Dissociation of Sensibility," Scrutiny 11 (1943): 268–85
- Levy, F.J., "Francis Bacon and the Style of Politics," English Literary Renaissance 16, no. 1 (Winter 1986): 101–22
- Mazzeo, Joseph, Renaissance and Revolution: The Remaking of European Thought, New York: Pantheon, and London: Secker and Warburg, 1965: Chapter 4
- Vickers, Brian, editor, Essential Articles for the Study of Francis Bacon, Hamden, Connecticut: Archon, 1968; London: Sidgwick and Jackson, 1972
- Vickers, Brian, Francis Bacon and Renaissance Prose, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1968

Baldwin, James

American, 1924–1987

For more than three decades beginning in the mid-1950s, James Baldwin was one of the most prominent and prolific writers on race and identity in the United States. Delving into almost every genre, he wrote six novels, three plays, a children's storybook, a book of short stories, a book of poetry, and more than 100 essays. Beginning with a review of a Maksim Gor'kii book in the Nation in 1947, his reviews, critiques, memoirs, and open letters were published extensively in some of the best-known publications, including New Leader, Freedomways, Commentary, Harper's, Mademoiselle, Partisan Review, Atlantic Monthly, Saturday Review, Playboy, Esquire, and the New York Times. Topics included his views on literature, film, history, children, and a host of prominent and notso-prominent individuals, always infused with the issue of race. For Baldwin the essay was a weapon for change. His reports on the civil rights activities of the 1960s provided a definitive analysis of its progress and made him an enemy of the state: James Campbell writes in Talking at the Gates (1991) that the U.S. Federal Bureau of Investigation alone accumulated a 1750-page file on him.

Baldwin's nonfiction is often defined by the autobiographical template he seems unable to escape. In the midst of flowing, poetic prose, he is apt to digress to his life in Harlem, Paris, or elsewhere. Such asides frequently relate the story of his strict Protestant upbringing, of being told by his cruel, minister stepfather—and believing—that he is ugly. This story also includes accounts of his early sexual ambiguities; his brief career as a teenage minister; his determination against all odds to become a writer; his numerous, dangerous encounters with policemen, bar owners, and restaurateurs; and the constant rage that engulfed him—that could ultimately have led to his death—causing him to flee to Paris in 1948.

Stylistically his essays are defined by two elements. The first is a rolling, sometimes convoluted (almost stream-of-consciousness) language, whose rhythms and imagery are born of the fire-and-brimstone sermons of the African American Protestant church. This is seen in what many believe to be his greatest work, The Fire Next Time (1963), when he writes: "...this urgency of American Negroes is not to be forgotten! As they watch black men elsewhere rise, the promise held out, at last, that they may walk the earth with the authority with which white men walk, protected by the power that white men shall have no longer, is enough, and more than enough, to empty prisons and pull God down from Heaven." Many of the titles of his nonfiction also bear witness to his reliance on religious themes and symbols: The Fire Next Time (biblical slave song), No Name in the Street (Job), The Devil Finds Work (a religious homily), The Evidence of Things Not Seen (St. Paul). The second, more subtle element is his biting sardonic, blues-inspired commentary, as in the streetwise metaphor he gives his last collection: The Price of the Ticket (1985). And in The Evidence of Things Not Seen (1985), he deconstructs the mythology of U.S. capitalism and its relationship to the slave auction: "Honest toil and the magic of the marketplace sums up Black American history with a terrifying precision, and is the key to our continuing dilemma. Our first sight of America was this marketplace and our legal existence, here, begins with the signature on the bill of sale."

Early in his career, as he painfully worked on his first novel, Baldwin earned a reputation as a literary critic of some merit, publishing exclusively in the Nation, Commentary, and New Leader from 1947 to 1949. He was also heralded as the next Richard Wright, an African American novelist and social commentator who befriended him and whom he idolized, but from whom he would later become deeply estranged. Both he and Wright were viewed as "protest" writers because of their persistent criticism of the legacy of racism that they perceived in the United States and Europe, but Baldwin eschewed "protest" as a shallow and futile goal. The role of the artist, he said, "is to illuminate that darkness, blaze roads through that vast forest, so that we will not, in all our doing, lose sight of its purpose, which is after all, to make the world a more human dwelling place" ("The Creative Process," 1962).

Baldwin's fiction was much influenced by Wright's masterwork novel, Native Son (1940), which was heralded as the quintessential treatise on the psyche of the black American. For Baldwin, Wright, who mentored the young writer, represented a kind of literary father figure. Yet in much the same way that Baldwin had undermined his minister stepfather's power over him by outdoing him as a teenage minister, he usurped Wright with devastatingly critical analyses of his novel. The first of these criticisms ("Everybody's Protest Novel") was published by a short-lived French publication, Zéro

(Spring 1949), and subsequently republished in Partisan Review (June 1949). Two years later, as a split developed between Baldwin and Wright, Baldwin would insure the schism with a thorough, accurate, but unflattering critique of Native Son in “Many Thousands Gone” (Partisan Review, November/ December 1951). Native Son, Baldwin says, is unquestionably “the most powerful and celebrated statement we have yet had of what it means to be a Negro in America.” But, he opined, it is incomplete: “...though we follow [the anti-hero Bigger Thomas] step by step from the tenement room to the death cell, we know as little about him when his journey is ended as we did when it began; and what is even more remarkable, we know almost as little about the social dynamic which we are to believe created him.” For Baldwin, therefore, Bigger Thomas “does not redeem the pains of a despised people, but reveals, on the contrary, nothing more than his own fierce bitterness at having been born one of them.”

Though Baldwin’s world view is frequently expressed in biting commentary, it is always tempered, paradoxically, with an urgent cry for blacks and whites to come together, in love, to liberate themselves from a history of racism. And his philosophical view of race remains constant throughout his career. Simply put, Baldwin believed that Europeans came to the New World as nationalities, but quickly became “white” as they unified in ritualistic violence, murdered the peoples they found there, and imported African slaves. In their attempt to deny the reality and horrors of the Native American and African “holocaust[s],” whites have trapped themselves in a mythological history that will not allow them to be rid of the guilt and shame of their actions. “Americans passionately believe in their avowed ideals, amorphous as they are, and are terrified of waking from a radiant dream,” he writes in “Lockridge: ‘The American Myth’” (The New Leader, 10 April 1948), a critique of Ross Lockridge’s Raintree County. Almost four decades later, in an open letter to South African Bishop Desmond Tutu in the Los Angeles Times (21 January 1986), he says, “The wealth of England and my country, the wealth of the Western world, in short, is based on slave labor, and the intolerable guilt thus engendered in hearts and minds of the Civilized is the root of what we call racism.”

A consequence of this falsified American history is that “[It] has allowed white people, with scarcely any pangs of conscience whatever, to create, in every generation, only the Negro they wished to see” (“A Fly in Buttermilk,” 1958). Blacks, on the other hand, are expected to believe the lie, or, under pain of death (by vigilantes, policemen, or the state), at least to act as if they believe it. The price of such delusion—The Price of the Ticket he calls it in the title essay of his collected nonfiction—is, for blacks, self-hatred, or rebellion, or both. For the white American, the price is “to become white...nothing less,” and to continue to live with the guilt. To illustrate the paradoxical nature of this “conundrum,” he repeats, in scores of essays, some form of the dialectical paradigm: “... by means of what the white man imagines the black man to be, the black man is enabled to know who the white man is” (“Stranger in the Village,” 1953). Or, conversely, “...if I am not what I’ve been told I am, then it means that you’re not what you thought you were either!” (“A Talk to Teachers,” 1963).

The resolution of this demented game falls heavily on African Americans in a kind of distorted, redemptive process that mirrored the 1960s civil rights movement, in which Baldwin became actively involved as a writer, interpreter, and demonstrator. For example, in August 1965 he writes: “... one enters into battle with that historical creation, Oneself, and attempts to recreate oneself according to a principle more humane and more liberating; one begins the attempt to achieve a level of personal maturity and freedom which robs history of its tyrannical power, and also changes history” (“White Man’s Guilt”). But, he is always careful to add, this cathartic confrontation must be accomplished with love: “And if the word integration means anything, this is what it means: that we, with love, shall force our brothers to see themselves as they are, to cease fleeing from reality and begin to change it” (The Fire Next Time).

Baldwin’s timely explanation of the imperative of nonviolent struggle made him the darling of the mainstream media of the 1960s. Though he sometimes published in African American publications such as Ebony and Freedomways, he wrote almost exclusively to whites, pleading for liberals to get on board, change their ways, before it was too late. Again, in The Fire Next Time, he describes the profound effect of his visit with Elijah Muhammad, the Nation of Islam’s black separatist leader. He notes the unerring logic that brings Mr. Muhammad to an indictment against whites as devils whose reign must end, probably in violence: “All my evidence would be thrown out of court as irrelevant to the main body of the case, for I could cite only exceptions. The South Side [of Chicago] proved the justice of the indictment; the state of the world proved the justice of the indictment.” Still, Baldwin concludes, “one has no choice but to do all in one’s power to change that fate, and at no matter what risk—eviction, imprisonment, torture, death. For the sake of one’s children, in order to minimize the bill that they must pay, one must be careful not to take refuge in any delusion—and the value placed on the color of the skin is always and everywhere and forever a delusion.” Finally, he warns his reader in the last words of the book: “If we do not now dare everything, the fulfillment of that prophecy, recreated from the Bible in song by a slave, is upon us: God gave Noah the rainbow sign, No more water, the fire next time!”

After the assassination of Martin Luther King, Jr. in 1968, when many African Americans had turned away from the civil rights movement and toward more militant strategies, Baldwin began to acknowledge the possibility of some inevitable, cataclysmic confrontation between the races. Though he still clung to his basic notion about the need for love and change, No Name in the Street (1972) ends with a hint that he might have come to the end of his rope: “...it is terrible to watch people cling to their captivity and insist on their own destruction. I think black people have always felt this about America, and Americans, and have always seen, spinning above the thoughtless American head, the shape of the wrath to come.”

Some optimism would later return, particularly with the changes he witnessed with the appointment and election of African Americans in the political arena. But the slow progress made in South Africa against apartheid and his investigation of a series of child murders in Atlanta (The Evidence of Things Not Seen, 1985) kept alive the Baldwinian paradox, which he himself identifies, less than two years before his death, in his 1986 letter to Bishop Tutu: “I am sure that you believe, with me, this paradox: Black freedom will make white freedom possible. Indeed, our freedom, which we have been forced to buy at so high a price, is the only hope of freedom that they have.”

HARRY AMANA

Biography

James Arthur Baldwin. Born 2 August 1924 in New York City. Studied at Public School 134, Harlem, New York, and DeWitt Clinton High School, Bronx, New York, graduated 1942. Briefly a storefront preacher in Harlem during adolescence; worked at various odd jobs in New York, and in defense work, Belle Meade, New Jersey, early 1940s. Lived primarily in Europe (mainly Paris and Istanbul), from 1948, making frequent trips to the U.S. Contributor to many journals and magazines, including the Partisan Review, New Yorker, Atlantic Monthly, Harper's, Freedomways, New Leader, Esquire, Ebony, and the Nation. Awards: several, including four fellowships; American Academy Award, 1956; George Polk Award, for magazine articles, 1963; Foreign Drama Critics Award, 1964; Martin Luther King, Jr. Award, 1978; honorary degree from the University of British Columbia. Member of the American Academy, 1964; Commander, Legion of Honor (France), 1986. Died (of stomach cancer) in St. Paul de Vence, France, 30 November 1987.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Notes of a Native Son, 1955

Nobody Knows My Name: More Notes of a Native Son, 1961

The Fire Next Time, 1963

No Name in the Street, 1972

The Devil Finds Work, 1976

The Evidence of Things Not Seen, 1985

The Price of the Ticket: Collected Nonfiction, 1948–1985, 1985

Other writings: six novels (Go Tell It on the Mountain, 1953; Giovanni's Room, 1956; Another Country, 1962; Tell Me How Long the Train's Been Gone, 1968; If Beale Street Could Talk, 1974; Just Above My Head, 1979), the collection of short stories Going to Meet the Man (1965), three plays, and poetry.

Bibliographies

Fischer, Russell G., "James Baldwin: A Bibliography 1947–1962," Bulletin of Bibliography (January–April 1965): 127–30

Kindt, Kathleen A., "James Baldwin: A Checklist 1947–1962," Bulletin of Bibliography (January–April 1965): 123–26

Standley, Fred L., and Nancy Standley, James Baldwin: A Reference Guide, Boston: Hall, 1980

Further Reading

- Bloom, Harold, editor, James Baldwin, New York: Chelsea House, 1986
- Campbell, James, Talking at the Gates: A Life of James Baldwin, London: Faber, and New York: Viking, 1991
- Cunningham, James, "Public and Private Rhetorical Modes in the Essays of James Baldwin," in Essays on the Essay: Redefining the Genre, edited by Alexander J. Butrym, Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1989
- Dailey, Peter, "Jimmy (The Life of Writer James Baldwin)," American Scholar 62, no. 1 (Winter 1994): 102–11
- Early, Gerald, "James Baldwin's Neglected Essay: Prizefighting, the White Intellectual and the Racial Symbols of American Culture," Antaeus 62 (Spring 1989): 150–65
- Eckman, Fern Marja, The Furious Passage of James Baldwin, New York: Evans, and London: Michael Joseph, 1966
- Gates, Henry Louis, Jr., "The Fire Last Time: What James Baldwin Can and Can't Teach America," New Republic, 1 June 1992: 37–43
- Jothiprakash, R., Commitment as a Theme in African American Literature: A Study of James Baldwin and Ralph Ellison, Bristol, Indiana: Wyndham Hall, 1994
- Kinnamon, Keneth, editor, James Baldwin: A Collection of Critical Essays, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice Hall, 1974
- Leeming, David, James Baldwin: A Biography, New York: Knopf, and London: Michael Joseph, 1994
- Lester, Julius, "Academic Freedom and the Black Intellectual," Black Scholar 19, no. 6 (November-December 1988): 16–27
- Macebuh, Stanley, James Baldwin: A Critical Study, New York: Third Press, 1973
- Möller, Karin, The Theme of Identity in the Essays of James Baldwin: An Interpretation, Gothenburg: Acta Universitatis Gothoburgensis, 1975
- Porter, Horace A., Stealing the Fire: The Art and Protest of James Baldwin, Middletown, Connecticut: Wesleyan University Press, –1989
- Pratt, Louis H., James Baldwin, Boston: Twayne, 1978
- Ro, Sigmund, Rage and Celebration: Essays on Contemporary Afro-American Writing, Atlantic Highlands, New Jersey: Humanities Press, 1984
- Standley, Fred L., and Nancy V. Burt, Critical Essays on James Baldwin, Boston: Hall, 1988
- Sylvander, Carolyn Wedin, James Baldwin, New York: Ungar, 1980
- Troupe, Quincy, editor, James Baldwin: The Legacy, New York: Simon and Schuster, 1989
- Waldrep, Shelton, "'Being Bridges': Cleaver/Baldwin/Lorde and African-American Sexism and Sexuality," Journal of Homosexuality 26, nos. 2–3 (August-September 1993): 167–80
- Weatherby, W.J., James Baldwin, Artist on Fire: A Portrait, New York: Fine, and London: Michael Joseph, 1989
- Wedin, Carolyn, "James Baldwin: Out of the Amen Corner," Christian Century, 16 November 1988:1042–47

Balzac, Jean-Louis Guez de

French, 1597–1654

Jean-Louis Guez de Balzac's production as an essayist spans his literary lifetime. Reflections on politics, literature, religion, and manners are found in all of his writings: letters, treatises (e.g. Le Prince [1631; The Prince]), discourses (e.g. La Harangue célèbre faite à la Reyne sur sa Régence [1641; The famous harangue made to the Queen on her Regency]). 'It was especially in his letters that his readers found his judgments most compelling, and it is because of the correspondence that literary historians have acknowledged Balzac as a definitive master of French prose. In the first half of the 17th century, he demonstrated to members of the literary and privileged social milieux how to write eloquent, forceful, and pleasing French.

Balzac's letters launched his literary career. From the beginning, his letters circulated in aristocratic homes and salons, where they were avidly read. They provoked admiration (Richelieu early encouraged Balzac to continue in this vein) and quarrels, for Balzac ridiculed the authority of the entrenched humanists at the Sorbonne. His criticism of pedantry constituted one of the first outbreaks of the Battle of the Ancients and the Moderns, destined to rage in the 1680s. The success and notoriety of his letters prompted Balzac to publish collections of them, the most famous being the Premières lettres (First letters) of 1624 and 1627. Letters appeared in diverse publications throughout his lifetime, and before the end of his life, Balzac had been preparing a new collection, published posthumously as Les Entretiens (1657; The conversations).

Balzac spent most of his adult life in solitary retirement in the countryside of the Charente, nursing a frail body, removed from the exhausting Parisian circles, and writing letters to influential men of politics, to literary friends and foes, and to intimates. He hoped that the success of these letters would earn him a brilliant position, where he could make a life for himself. In hindsight, it seems clear that because The Prince (Balzac's apology for Richelieu and Louis XIII's political program for the French state) failed to clinch the Cardinal's patronage, Balzac's aspirations were not to be realized; he had been passed over. However, after the treatise's disappointing reception in 1631, Balzac continued to write, suggesting that he never really gave up hope for a brilliant appointment on the basis of his literary accomplishments.

That Balzac could attach the practical consequence of receiving a position of power to his literary endeavors is apparent from the contents and style of his letters and from the very choice of the letter as a literary medium in which to shine. As Jean Jehasse (1977) notes, the humanist Jesuits, who schooled Balzac, accorded great importance to the epistle, conceived of as a literary exercise and occasion for their pupils to prepare persuasive essays on manners, politics, or literature. The hermite of Charente, withdrawn from influential circles, selected this medium as the appropriate means to address topical concerns that would establish and advertise his stand on issues pertinent to his readers—both the specific addressees and their milieux—as well as reveal his commitments and loyalties. In his letters to Richelieu and to other figures of political power he promotes the value of public service and supports the authority of the State grounded in the centralized monarchy, which requires good ministers and subordinate nobles. His correspondence with other men of letters (who were more often to become his addressees as Balzac's hopes for a worthy appointment receded) situates him in the camp of the Moderns. He rejects the humanists' blind acknowledgment of the superiority of the Ancients and pedantic criticism of writing that does not strictly conform to classical models. Insisting on the superiority of judgment and of reason over unquestioning imitation, Balzac defends the educated person's power to assess reality and to act appropriately based on practiced judgment.

However, as an advocate of trained discernment, Balzac appreciates only too well the literary power of the Ancients, who indeed were capable of great writing because they exercised their judgment and aesthetic sense. Despite siding with the Moderns, he owes a debt to the Ancients, and his works testify to it throughout. Balzac sought to emulate them, especially the Roman writers—Cicero, Seneca, Pliny—who took upon themselves the hortatory roles of counselors to the powerful or judges of the state of human affairs. Balzac as a correspondent readily saw himself as an adviser. He set himself the task of persuading his readers about political and literary matters as effectively as possible in order to bring about appropriate thinking and behavior. In concert with the Ancients, he held this role to be a noble vocation, requiring untiring industry and continual polishing. This calling was also to serve as Balzac's ticket to immortality, as it had for the Ancients.

His letters, especially the Premières lettres, strike the modern reader as florid. His reasoning, though cogent, resides in an abundant display of classical rhetoric—images, antitheses, enumerations, crafted transitions—which calls attention to the artistry of the writing and implicitly, to the writer's talent. However, since these flourishes—learned from Roman oratory—are couched in letters, which naturally include direct address, compliments, and personal observations, the form relieves the weight of the pervasive Ciceronian style. The topical issues are necessarily brief, because of the conventions of the epistolary genre, but they were considered well-written because of their style. This balance of brevity and style, which satisfied the mind and aesthetic sensibility of his readers while not taxing them, made for a rewarding experience, to which the enthusiasm of Balzac's audience testifies. This correspondence became an ideal of intelligent discourse directed toward a cultivated though not necessarily learned readership (which included women). Thus, Balzac's letters contributed to the creation of l'honnêteté, an urbane, sophisticated, and elevated comportment, developed in aristocratic salons during Balzac's lifetime and designed to govern the intellectual, moral, and social life of the elite, giving it meaning and beauty. Balzac demonstrated, then, how to write a cultured and persuasive French.

PAMELA PARK

Biography

Born probably May 1597 (baptized 1 June 1597) in Angoulême. Studied at Jesuit colleges in Angoulême and Poitiers; Collège de la Marche, Paris, 1610; enrolled at the University of Leiden, 1615; returned to Paris, c. 1616. Secretary to the Duke of Epernon and one of his sons; aided in the rescue of Marie de Medicis from prison at Blois, 1619; agent to Cardinal de la Valette, Rome, 1620–22; appointed historiographer of France, from 1624; visited Paris, 1624–25, 1626–28. Lived mostly in Angoulême, from 1628. Elected to the French Academy, 1634. Died (after a long illness) in Angoulême, 18 February 1654.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Lettres, 1624; revised edition, 1627; as Les Premières Lettres (1618–1627), edited by H. Bibas and K. T. Butler, 2 vols., 1933–34

The Letters of Monsieur de Balzac, translated by W. Tirwhyt, vol. 1, 1634; vols. 2 and 3, as New Epistles by Monsieur d'Balzac, translated by Richard Baker, 1638; vol. 4, as A Collection of Some Modern Epistles of Monsieur De Balzac, translated anonymously, 1639; in 1 vol., 1654

Lettres, seconde partie, 2 vols., 1636

Recueil de nouvelles lettres, 1637

Œuvres diverses, 1644

Lettres choisies, 2 vols., 1647

Lettres familières à M. Chapelain, 1656; as Lettres inédites à J. Chapelain, edited by Tamizey de Larroque, 1873

Lettres diverses, 1657

Les Entretiens, 1657; edited by Bernard Beugnot, 2 vols., 1972

Lettres à M. Conrart, 1659

Other writings: books on political and moral philosophy (including Le Prince [The Prince], 1631; Le Socrate chrétien, 1652; Aristippe [Aristippus], 1658).

Collected works edition: Les Œuvres de Monsieur de Balzac, 2 vols., 1665.

Bibliography

Beugnot, Bernard, Guez de Balzac: Bibliographie générale, Montreal: Presses de l'Université de Montréal, 1967; supplement, 1969

Further Reading

Carr, Thomas M., Jr., Descartes and the Resilience of Rhetoric: Varieties of Cartesian Rhetorical Theory, Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1990

Guillaumie, Gaston, Jean-Louis Guez de Balzac et la prose française, Paris: Picard, 1927

Jehasse, Jean, Guez de Balzac et le génie romain, 1597–1645, Saint-Étienne: Université de Saint-Étienne, 1977

Sabrie, Jean Baptiste, Les Idées religieuses de J.-L. Guez de Balzac, Paris: Alcan, 1913

Sutcliffe, Frank E., Guez de Balzac et son temps: Littérature et politique, Paris: Nizet, 1959

- Winter, John Francis, A Seventeenth-Century Concept of the Individual and Society: Guez de Balzac (dissertation), Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University, 1950
- Youssef, Zobeidah, Polémique et littérature chez Guez de Balzac, Paris: Nizet, 1972
- Zuber, Roger, Les "Belles Infidèles" et la formation du goût classique: Perrot d'Ablancourt et Guez de Balzac, Paris: Colin, 1968

Barańczak, Stanisław

Polish, 1946–

Stanisław Barańczak belongs to the so-called “Generation of ‘68” (after the student protests in 1968) in Polish literature, whose main discoveries were, as he himself put it (in an interview for Na Głos [Aloud], 1991), that in the age of collective values imposed by communism, “the attempt to save or to defend one’s individuality and one’s right to be an individual is a most subversive act of public significance”; that Marxism cannot be “revised” or improved; and that censorship renders cultural authenticity impossible. When martial law was introduced in Poland in 1981, Barańczak was a visiting professor of literature at Harvard University and he remained there as a full professor, joining the group of prominent Polish writers in exile. Although living in the United States, Barańczak is very much a presence on the Polish literary market with his poetry, essays, and translations.

Barańczak is a “translator” in both the metaphoric and the literal meanings of this term—a mediator between different spheres of life and literature, between English and Polish literature, and between East European experience and the West. He has published 12 volumes of poetry in which the political and the metaphysical coexist, 12 books of essays and literary criticism, translations of 12 Shakespeare plays, and numerous collections of English, American, and Russian poetry in translation.

Barańczak’s most representative collections of essays—Etyka i poetyka (1979; Ethics and poetics), and Breathing Under Water and Other East European Essays (1990)—show his mediative talent in its full lucidity. The author’s reflections on the likenesses, analogies, and contrasts between ethics and poetics involve the works of Thomas Mann, Dietrich Bonhoeffer, Osip Mandel’shtam, Joseph Brodsky, Czesław Miłosz, and Zbigniew Herbert, but also minor works of contemporary Polish authors. In the essay “Zmieniony głos Settembriniego” (1975; The changed voice of Settembrini) Barańczak discusses the possible foundations of a new ethics that is not supported by an irrational authority: in the world without God, any authoritative ethics would be pernicious; the only possible ethical measure is “the other man,” hence everyone is individually responsible for his deeds and has to make his own choice. Poetry has a special mission in this new situation: not only must it adopt some of the traditional functions of the humanistic sciences—that is, as the vehicle of socially important ideas—it must also control the consequences of vague slogans and remote goals introduced into society by ideological dogma. Barańczak believes that poetry, with its inclination toward the concrete, demonstrates how those slogans are fulfilled and by what means the goals of the ideologies are pursued. The dogma, which sets to work on the media, uses methods designed for subliminal persuasion and manipulation of the masses; poetry, on the contrary, rescues man from the automatism of his thinking and speaking—"it teaches him to think, to speak, and to act on his own and therefore responsibly." This new social mission of poetry, however, is not supposed to humble it to the level of the so-called mass audience. To be socially useful, poetry should rather try to uplift the reader ("Uwagi krótkowidza" [1972; Remarks of a shortsighted person]). Barańczak is to a great extent optimistic about the future of the new ethics without authorities. Thus, in "Notatki na marginesach Bonhoeffera" (1974; Notes on the margins of Bonhoeffer), he writes that it is not necessary for the Ten Commandments to disappear with the decline of Christianity. Pure atheism, he notes, reflecting Miłosz, is an unbearable burden; most people who simply want to "be good" feel obliged by Christian ethics even if they have no access to Revelation ("Summa Czesławna Miłosza" [1978; The summa of Czesławna Miłosza]).

In order to pursue its ethical tasks, literature must be born of doubt and creative disagreement, and awaken these in the reader. This seems to be Barańczak's main criterion as a literary critic in Nieufni i zadufani (1971; The diffident and the proud), Ironia i harmonia (1973; Irony and harmony), Etyka i poetyka, Książki najgorsze (1981, enlarged edition, 1990; The worst books), and Przed i po (1988; Before and after). Other indispensable qualities of good literature and especially of poetry, according to Barańczak, are the uniqueness of the individual poetic language (a theme explored in his study Język poetycki Mirona Białoszewskiego [1974; The poetic language of Miron Białoszewski] and summarized in the essay "Proszę pokazać język" [1974; Show your tongue, please]), and the taste for paradox and irony. Zbigniew Herbert's poetry, to which Barańczak devoted his book Uciekinier z utopii (1984; A Fugitive from Utopia), can be seen both as a source of these criteria and as their incarnation.

After years of mediating between life and literature, in the U.S. Barańczak also became a mediator between the political and cultural idioms of the East and the West. His collection of essays Breathing Under Water was praised by critics as "an impressive contribution to bridge-building between separate cultures" (George Gömöri, 1992). According to the author's own confession (in an interview for Dziennik Poznański, 1991), it follows the stylistic formula of George Orwell's essays: an "impossible" alloy of richness and simplicity, complexity and transparency. The relation between ethics and poetics continues to be the main object of Barańczak's reflections, but now he concentrates, on the one hand, on great creative or public figures such as the 20th century's most important Polish writers, Witold Gombrowicz, Bruno Schulz, Alexander Wat, Czesław Miłosz, Miron Białoszewski, and Wisława Szymborska, as well as figures like Pope John Paul II, Lech Wałęsa, Václav Havel, Adam Michnik, and Miklós Haraszti; and, on the other hand, on the untranslatable phenomena of the communist era in East Europe, such as censorship, samizdat (underground publishing), and the "state artist." Once he has delineated America "under Eastern eyes," Barańczak distances himself from the Eastern European mindset and thus manages, if not to "translate" the Eastern reality into the language of the West, at least to explain it convincingly and to abolish the myth that communism is not necessarily antagonistic to creativity. It is clear from Breathing Under Water that anything of value that has been created under communism was born despite it or against it.

Biography

Born 13 November 1946 in Poznań. Studied at Adam Mickiewicz University, Poznań, 1964–69, M.A. in Polish literature, 1969, Ph.D., 1973. Married Anna Barańczak, 1968: one son and one daughter. Assistant professor, Adam Mickiewicz University, 1970–77: expelled for political reasons, but allowed to teach again, 1980–81; invited by Harvard University as a guest lecturer, 1977, but had to wait four years for an exit visa; associate professor, 1981–84, and professor in Polish literature, from 1984, Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts. Active in the Polish human rights movement in the 1980s: one of the cofounders of KOR (Committee for the defense of workers, later renamed Committee for society's self-defense); editor of the underground literary quarterly Zapis (Record); blacklisted from 1975 for signing letters of protest; in 1983 the Polish consulate in New York refused to renew his passport and in effect exiled him. Awards: Kościelski Foundation Prize, 1973; Jurzykowski Prize, 1981; Terrence Des Pres Prize for Poetry, for The Weight of the Body: Selected Poems, 1989; Polish PEN Club Award, 1990.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Nieufni i zadufani: Romantyzm i klasycizm w mfodej poezji lat sześćdziesiątych, 1971

Ironia i harmonia: Szkice o najnowszej literaturze polskiej, 1973

Język poetycki Mirona Białoszewskiego, 1974

Etyka i poetyka: Szkice 1970–1978, 1979

Książki najgorsze (1975–1980), 1981; enlarged edition, 1990

Czytelnik ubezwłasnowolniony: Perswazja w masowej kulturze literackiej PRL, 1983

Uciekinier z utopii: O poezji Zbigniewa Herberta, 1984; as A Fugitive from Utopia: The Poetry of Zbigniew Herbert, 1987

Przed i po: Szkice o poezji krajowej przelo mu lat siedemdziesiątych i osiemdziesiątych, 1988

Tablica z Macondo: Osiem naście prób wytlumaczenia, po co i dlaczego się pisze, 1990

Breathing Under Water and Other East European Essays, 1990

Ocalone w tłumaczeniu: Szkice o warsztacie tłumacza poezji z dołączeniem maiej antologii przekładów, 1992

Zaufać nieufności: Osiem rozmów o sensie poezji, 1990–1992, 1993

Other writings: 12 volumes of poetry (including Selected Poems: The Weight of the Body, 1989). Also edited anthologies of English metaphysical poetry, English and American religious lyric, English and American love poetry, and English and American poetry; translated into English (with Clare Cavanagh) the poetry of Wisława Szymborska (View with a Grain of Sand, 1995); translated into Polish plays by Shakespeare, as well as poems by Dylan Thomas, Osip Mandel'shtam, Joseph Brodsky, Gerard Manley Hopkins, e. e. cummings, John Donne, Emily Dickinson, James Merrill, Philip Larkin, Robert Frost, Robert Herrick, Andrew Marvell, Thomas Hardy, and W.H.Auden.

Further Reading

- Czerwinski, E.J., Review of Breathing Under Water, World Literature Today 65, no. 3 (1991): 512–13
- Gildner, Gary, Review of Breathing Under Water, Georgia Review 45, no. 1 (1991): 191–93
- Gömöri, George, Review of Breathing Under Water, Journal of European Studies 2.2., no. 89 (1992): 288–89
- Gross, Irena G., Review of Czytelnik ubezwtasnowolniony, Slavic Review 46, no. 1 (Spring 1987): 172–73
- Stamirowska, Krystyna, Review of Breathing Under Water, English Studies 74, no. 4 (1993): 404–05
- Taylor, Nina, Review of A Fugitive from Utopia, Modern Languages Review 84 (1989): 815–16
- Zaczek, Barbara, Review of A Fugitive from Utopia, Comparative Literature 44, no.1 (1992): 108–10

Barthes, Roland

French, 1915–1980

Roland Barthes' intellectual course did not follow the traditional university path, due, among other things, to his recurrent health problems. Numerous relapses with tuberculosis prevented him from carrying out his doctoral research: this explains why he published more essays than substantial scientific studies. And because he was not attached to a particular university faculty, he was able to diversify his interests. To begin with, Barthes wanted to be a semiologist and analyze different systems of signification as they are revealed in language (Le Degré zero de l'écriture [1953; Writing Degree Zero]), everyday life (Mythologies, 1957), or clothes (Système de la mode [1967; The Fashion System]). The introduction to Writing Degree Zero specifies that we are reading an essay, in both meanings of the term. It consists of an attempt, “an introduction to what could be a History of Writing,” but also of a marked commitment to an ideological concept of literature perceived as value and as institution. Writing has always functioned as a sign, so much so that the act of writing was claimed by the bourgeoisie as early as the 17th century. The utopia of denotation must therefore be denounced and semiology, among other things, embraced; hence the later editions of this first essay are completed by the Éléments de sémiologie (1965; Elements of Semiology). These two volumes supply the reader with the necessary tools to decode, with the linguistic apparatus, the different discourses that make up the social field.

All signs are full of connotations; that is, they consist of systems of second senses that are well marked ideologically, allowing many signs to reach mythic status. These myths must be exposed, insofar as social objects tend to portray the cultural for the natural, to found common opinion in absolute truth. In Mythologies, then, Barthes points out the mythical dimension of “the face of Garbo,” “steak and chips,” “the Tour de France,” or “the new Citroën,” based on the two-level connotative system analyzed in “Le Mythe, aujourd’hui” (“The Myth Today”), the closing essay of the collection. In the same way, he studies the clothing code in a structuralist manner in The Fashion System by looking for the way this particular type of sign possesses its rhetoric and its poetry. With this semiological approach, it is not surprising that Barthes is fascinated by Japan and that the essay he dedicates to that country is entitled L’Empire des signes (1970; Empire of Signs). He considers Japan as another system, and discovers the symbolic in calligraphy, clothes, food, and urban geography.

But Barthes cannot be reduced simply to a systematic semiologist. On the one hand, he quickly takes issue with those who denounce the common opinion as a new totalitarian system (“Changer l’objet lui-même” [1971; Changing the object itself]); on the other hand, he continues to be fascinated by the classic literary texts of Michelet, Chateaubriand, or Proust. For a time he attempted to unite semiology and literature in an article that has become a classic, “Introduction à l’analyse structurale des récits” (1966; “Introduction to the Structural Analysis of Narratives”), where he again talks about the heritage of Russian formalists to try to extract the elementary functions that make up any narrative. But he quickly perceives that literary work cannot be reduced to a system. Already, in his first literary essay, Michelet par lui-même (1954; Michelet), he is more interested in reconstituting Michelet’s “organized network of obsessions” in a “pre-critique” that clearly illustrates Barthes’ own vocation as an essayist, than in attempting to formalize Michelet’s writing style. In Essais critiques (1964; Critical Essays) and Nouveaux essais critiques (1972; New Critical Essays), Barthes multiplies the “plural” readings of authors as different as Brecht, La Fontaine, Robbe-Grillet, Voltaire, and Kafka.

This freedom in analysis, which is hardly as concerned with critical machinery and philological designs as that practiced in the Sorbonne, was strongly reproached by the university circle when Barthes wrote Sur Racine (1963; On Racine). Raymond Picard wrote a pamphlet about him, Nouvelle critique ou nouvelle imposture (1965; New Criticism or New Fraud?), which reveals the tension between those who believe in traditional biographical criticism and those who take part in a renewed approach to literary criticism, open to the contributions of both semiology and psychoanalysis. Barthes answers these reproaches in Critique et vérité (1966; Criticism and Truth), denouncing the institution of a criticism which would be based on objectivity, good taste, and clarity, without grounding these self-proclaimed values scientifically. He continues his task of tearing down literary work, either by analyzing authors who prefer extremes (Sade, Fourier, Loyola, 1971) or by microanalyzing brief texts such as Balzac’s short story “Sarrasine,” dissected in 561 sequences in S/Z (1970).

In a way S/Z bids farewell to the structural utopia and to Barthes’ pursuit of generalized systematization. The notion of text appears here (and this is Barthes’ central point) as an opposition between “readable,” i.e. classical texts that are no longer likely to be rewritten by the reader, and “writable”—texts that we can desire, write, and rewrite while reading. The text is also seen as a shattered, broken structure which allows itself to be analyzed from many angles.

This idea of the personal dimension in the relationship with the text flourishes in Le Plaisir du texte (1973; The Pleasure of the Text), where 46 entries, classified in alphabetical order, demonstrate the pleasurable relationship Barthes maintains with literary narratives, in the form of an autobiography of him as a reader. The plural form of the text, the enjoyment of reading, the game of intertextuality, the importance of reading aloud, the texture of the voice and the dialogue—all important ideas in the theoretical debates of the moment—were developed here by Barthes, not in the form of theoretical postulates, but in subjective aphorisms.

The subjectivity of style asserts itself with more and more power and independence in relation to the intellectual styles of the moment. The distinction between the critical part of the work and its “literary” dimension decreases to the point that the critic who talks about the writer Barthes is none other than Barthes himself. Roland Barthes par Roland Barthes (1975; Roland Barthes) thus stages this passage to a writing that is no longer separate from critical and autobiographical activity. The essay plays unceasingly on ambiguity, since it begins with his handwritten words—“It must all be considered as if spoken by a character in a novel”—but is full of the author’s photographs and souvenirs. Life, literature, and criticism intermix, with enjoyment as the only rule, as confirmed in these last, also handwritten words: “One writes with one’s desire, and I am not through desiring.”

It is therefore not surprising that Barthes’ next essay is entitled Fragments d’un discours amoureux (1977; A Lover’s Discourse: Fragments). The first fragment, entitled “Comment est fait ce livre” (“How This Book Is Made”), insists on the importance of speech in the first person, “in order to portray an enunciation, not an analysis.” Then Barthes evokes the listed “figures” of the feeling of love, the repertory of which is supposed to be systematic, but with variable contents. Their order is randomly set and their place in the book “absolutely insignificant” since it is based on the arbitrary nature of the alphabet. Without saying so, Barthes is setting the stage for an essay in these introductory directions.

He returns to literature in his study on Sollers, écrivain (1979; Sollers, Writer) and his Leçon inaugurale (1978; “Inaugural Lecture”) to the Collège de France. Here he asks questions about intellectual power, language, literature, and semiology in a masterly synthesis of his great topics of reflection, but concludes by evoking the wisdom he has attained and defines as “no power, a little knowledge, a little wisdom, and as much flavor as possible.” He looks for this flavor again in a last semiological investigation of photography. But La Chambre claire: Note sur la photographie (1980; Camera Lucida: Reflections on Photography) is less a phenomenology of the image than an analysis of the emotional relationship Barthes maintains with the photographs, portraits, and landscapes he has encountered in his life. The time for remembering and admitting to intimate passions has arrived, as shown in the posthumous texts in Incidents (1987), which reveal the author’s homosexuality and secret passions.

Since his death, Barthes’ work has been constantly re-edited and commented upon. A three-volume complete edition of his works and articles has recently been published, a rarity for an essayist who appealed to the intellectual class more than to the public at large. Barthes’ popularity in France and in the world, the pertinence and the originality of his analyses, their diversity and lively actuality, all explain his exceptional posthumous survival.

MARC LITS

Biography

Roland Gérard Barthes. Born 12 November 1915 in Cherbourg. Studied at the Lycée Montaigne, Paris, 1924–30; Lycée Louis-leGrand, Paris, 1930–34, baccalauréat, 1934; the Sorbonne, Paris, from 1936, licence in classical letters, 1939, diploma in Greek tragedy, 1941, licence in grammar and philology, 1943. Contracted tuberculosis, 1934, and relapsed periodically, staying in sanatoria, 1934–35 and 1942–46. Taught at lycées in Biarritz, 1939, Bayonne, 1939–40, and Paris, 1940–41, and at the French Institute, Bucharest, 1948–49, University of Alexandria, 1949–50, and the Direction Générale des Affaires Culturelles, Paris, 1950–52; research appointments with Centre National de la Recherche Scientifique, 1952–59; chair, 1960–62, and director of studies, 1960–76, École Pratique des Hautes Études, Paris; taught at Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, 1967–68; chair of literary semiology, Collège de France, Paris, 1976–80. Cofounder, Théâtre Populaire (Popular theater), 1953, and Arguments, 1956; contributor to various periodicals, including Communications, La Quinzaine Littéraire (The literary fortnightly), Les Lettres Nouvelles (New letters), and Tel Quel (As is). Chevalier des Palmes Académiques. Died (as the result of a street accident) in Paris, 26 March 1980.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Le Degré zéro de l'écriture, 1953; as Writing Degree Zero, with Elements of Semiology, translated by Annette Lavers and Colin Smith, 1967

Michelet par lui-même, 1954; as Michelet, translated by Richard Howard, 1987

Mythologies, 1957; part as Mythologies, translated by Annette Lavers, 1972

Sur Racine, 1963; as On Racine, translated by Richard Howard, 1964

La Tour Eiffel, 1964; as The Eiffel Tower and Other Mythologies, translated by Richard Howard, 1979

Essais critiques, 1964; as Critical Essays, translated by Richard Howard, 1972

Elements de sémiologie, 1965; as Elements of Semiology, with Writing Degree Zero, translated by Annette Lavers and Colin Smith, 1967

Critique et vérité, 1966; as Criticism and Truth, edited and translated by Katrine Pilcher Keuneman, 1987

Système de la mode, 1967; as The Fashion System, translated by Matthew Ward and Richard Howard, 1985

S/Z, 1970; as S/Z, translated by Richard Miller, 1974

L'Empire des signes, 1970; as Empire of Signs, translated by Richard Howard, 1983

Sade, Fourier, Loyola, 1971; as Sade, Fourier, Loyola, translated by Richard Miller, 1976

Nouveaux essais critiques, 1972; as New Critical Essays, translated by Richard Howard, 1980

- Le Plaisir du texte*, 1973; as The Pleasure of the Text, translated by Richard Miller, 1975
Roland Barthes par Roland Barthes, 1975; as Roland Barthes, translated by Richard Howard, 1977
Fragments d'un discours amoureux, 1977; as A Lover's Discourse: Fragments, translated by Richard Howard, 1978
Image, Music, Text (selections), edited and translated by Stephen Heath, 1977
Leçon inaugurale au Collège de France, 1978; as "Inaugural Lecture, Collège de France," translated by Richard Howard, in A Barthes Reader, 1982.
Sollers, écrivain, 1979; as Sollers, Writer, translated by Philip Thody, 1987
La Chambre claire: Note sur la photographie, 1980; as Camera Lucida: Reflections on Photography, translated by Richard Howard, 1981
A Barthes Reader (various translators), edited by Susan Sontag, 1982; as Selected Writings, 1983
L'Obvie et l'obtus, 1982; as The Responsibility of Forms: Critical Essays on Music, Art, and Representation, translated by Richard Howard, 1985
Le Bruissement de la langue, 1984; as The Rustle of Language, translated by Richard Howard, 1986
L'Aventure sémiologique, 1985; as The Semiotic Challenge, translated by Richard Howard, 1988
Incidents, 1987; as Incidents, translated by Richard Howard, 1992
 Other writings: works on semiology, literary theory, and culture.
 Collected works edition: Œuvres complètes, edited by Eric Marty, 3 vols., 1993–95

Bibliographies

- Freedman, Sanford, and Carole Anne Taylor, Roland Barthes: A Bibliographical Reader's Guide, New York and London: Garland, 1983
 Nordquist, Joan, Roland Barthes: A Bibliography, Santa Cruz, California: Reference and Research Services, 1994

Further Reading

- Bensaïa, Réda, The Barthes Effect: The Essay as Reflective Text, Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1987 (original French edition, 1986)
 Calvet, Louis-Jean, Roland Barthes, un regard politique sur le signe, Paris: Payot, 1973
 Calvet, Louis-Jean, Roland Barthes, Oxford: Polity Press, 1994; Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1995 (original French edition, 1990)
Communications issue on Barthes, 36 (1982)
 Culler, Jonathan, Roland Barthes, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1983
 Heath, Stephen, Vertige du déplacement: Lecture de Barthes, Paris: Fayard, 1974
 Jouve, Vincent, La Littérature selon Barthes, Paris: Minuit, 1986
 Lavers, Annette, Roland Barthes: Structuralism and After, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1982
Magazine Littéraire issue on Barthes, 314 (October 1993)
Poétique issue on Barthes, 47 (September 1981)
 Sontag, Susan, Under the Sign of Saturn, New York: Farrar Straus Giroux, 1980;

London: Writers and Readers, 1983

Thody, Philip, Roland Barthes: A Conservative Estimate, London: Macmillan, and Atlantic Highlands, New Jersey: Humanities Press, 1977

Ungar, Steven, Roland Barthes, the Professor of Desire, Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1983

Wasserman, George R., Roland Barthes, Boston: Twayne, 1981

Bataille, Georges

French, 1897–1962

Georges Bataille was an adventurer in the world of ideas and sensations, an explorer who, because he could not abstain from questioning every alternative as it was offered him, intrepidly embarked on an intellectual quest that would go beyond rationality. Endowed with a penetrating and nagging intelligence that he nourished by wide-ranging reading, with concentration on Hegel, Nietzsche, and Heidegger, he was never content with others' speculations even though he never succeeded in systematizing his own, perhaps because it was in their very nature that such a task would remain impossible.

Sharing fully in all the problems of what, at the opening of the essay collection La Littérature et le mal (1957; Literature and Evil) he characterized as a "tumultuous generation," Bataille's first endeavor to compensate for a difficult childhood was a failure, yet it was a tell-tale one. Brought up in the French lay tradition by his blind, paralyzed father, he first attempted to assuage the tempests of his inner life by embracing a religious vocation, entering the seminary of Saint-Fleur to train for the priesthood, and spending a period with the Benedictine congregation at Quarr, on the Isle of Wight. Though the Abbey had a reputation for deepening spirituality, particularly through the beauty of its liturgical observances, Bataille's mystic phase passed rapidly. Despite his faith he continued, as his critics have noted, to crave for deeper satisfactions than reason could offer; henceforth he would seek them not in religion but in the arts, especially literature, which he linked with anthropology.

Surrealism naturally attracted Bataille, though only for a time. As he explains in "Le Surréalisme au jour le jour" ("Surrealism Day by Day"), his restless mind could not brook André Breton's domineering ways, and, though like many other French intellectuals he was attracted by left-wing politics, the Communist Party could not count on his loyalty for long. He joined with Roger Caillois and Michel Leiris to form the so-called Collège de Sociologie and founded journals, but these enterprises were short-lived. Bataille's preference was for the lonely furrow, and his reputation was at its highest not during his lifetime but posthumously, when his thought was taken up and promoted in Tel Quel (As is) in the 1970s.

"A mystic without God," in Boisdeffre's phrase, Bataille discerned the source of all literary creation in the problem of evil, exploring the issue in Literature and Evil. In a wideranging series of essays that were originally published separately in the journal Critique and that are more accessible than some of his other writings, he discusses not only Proust and, inevitably, Sade, Baudelaire, and Genet, but also Franz Kafka, William Blake, and Emily Brontë. He marvels that Wuthering Heights should have been written by a woman whose life was apparently so circumscribed and who still achieved such awareness of what for him are the most significant issues of existence. Bataille's interest in eroticism had found early expression in Histoire de l'œil (Story of the Eye), a novel published under a pseudonym because the frank, if somewhat limited, pornographic first-person narrative would have clashed with his chosen profession in librarianship. In Literature and Evil Bataille presents his case in the more acceptable guise of criticism. Eroticism takes a central place, affirming existence, releasing the individual from the isolation that is otherwise a fundamental concomitant of consciousness, and finding its culmination in death. Where an ancient philosopher might have placed a premium on the equanimity that is the reward of moderation, Bataille values anguish, the emotional turmoil that is the product of excess. This becomes all the stronger when excess can be experienced as transgression, with a genuine and alarming sense of going beyond all normal bounds in search of novel and unprecedented inner responses. The link with sexuality is, of course, strong, but not exclusive, for the special liberating response may equally be triggered by other exceptional stimuli. Bataille returns repeatedly and possibly with some retrospective elaboration to certain experiences, such as witnessing particular horrors at a bull fight. Paradoxically for him, cruelty has positive as well as negative aspects. These ideas, which some might think depend to some degree on religious and social orthodoxies that have been rejected but never totally forgotten, are developed by Bataille in his essay L'Érotisme (1957; Eroticism) and, with a rather different context, in L'Histoire de l'érotisme (History of eroticism).

Another approach to Bataille is through the art criticism that constitutes a significant and characteristically multi-disciplinary part of his work from early on. In 1955 he published not only an essay on Manet, dwelling in particular on the significance of the rejection of his art by his contemporaries, but also a study of the cave painting at Lascaux. Some of the anthropological statements can be considered speculative, but this study offers Bataille the opportunity for reflections on the nature of art and its role in human existence. Arguing that the true dawn of art dates not from ancient Greece but from the time of Lascaux, he salutes a major advance as humankind becomes differentiated from beasts when the self acquires an inner life in the awareness of death and the desire for communication. Previously humans had devoted their energies to practical ends, but now arose the possibilities for something that Bataille regards as far more important: the ludic, which leads directly to ritual and art.

Bataille can write with all the clarity and elegance conventionally regarded as typical of French authors. But he can also be difficult. Modern French prose has a tendency toward ellipsis, and that suits him well. He is content to present his thought in a way that engages his readers by leaving it to them to make connections as best they may, and he is indeed a master of the pregnant pause. He is also fearless in the employment of abstract nouns, the significance of which in the particular context he has created can remain puzzling. This means that reading Bataille can itself be a challenging intellectual adventure.

CHRISTOPHER SMITH

Biography

Born 10 September 1897 in Billom, Puy-de-Dôme. Used many pseudonyms, including Lord Auch and Pierre Angélique. In ill health all of his life, and suffered from periods of depression. Converted to Catholicism, 1914; renounced, 1912. Military service, 1916–17: discharged because of tuberculosis. Joined seminary at Saint-Fleur, 1917–18. Studied at the École des Chartes, Paris, 1918–22; fellowship at the School of Advanced Hispanic Studies, Madrid, 1922. Librarian and deputy keeper, Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris, 1922–42: resigned because of tuberculosis. Married Silvia Maklès, 1928 (divorced, 1934): one daughter. Editor, Documents, 1929–31. Liaison with “Laure” (i.e. Colette Peignot; died, 1938), 1934–38. Cofounder, with André Breton, Contre-Attaque (Counter-Attack) political group, 1935–36; cofounder, Collège de Sociologie, 1936–39, and a secret society, which published Acéphale review, 1936–39; moved to Vézelay, 1942–49. Married Diane de Beauharnais, 1946: one daughter. Cofounder and editor, Critique, 1946–62; librarian in Carpentras, 1949–51, and Orléans, from 1951. Died in Paris, 8 July 1962.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

L'Expérience intérieure, 1943; revised edition, 1954; as Inner Experience, translated by Leslie Anne Boldt, 1988

Sur Nietzsche: Volonté de chance, 1945; as On Nietzsche, translated by Bruce Boone, 1992

La Part maudite: Essai d'économie générale, 1949; as The Accursed Share: An Essay on General Economy, translated by Robert Hurley, 2 vols., 1988–91

Somme athéologique I-II, 2 vols., 1954–61

Lascaux; or, The Birth of Art, translated by Austryn Wainhouse, 1955; as Lascaux, ou, La Naissance de l'art, 1980

L'Érotisme, 1957; as Death and Sensuality, and as Eroticism, translated by Mary Dalwood, 1962

La Littérature et le mal, 1957; revised edition, 1967; as Literature and Evil, translated by Alastair Hamilton, 1973

Les Larmes d'Éros, 1961; enlarged edition, 1971; as The Tears of Eros, translated by Peter Connor, 1989

La Pratique de la joie avant la mort, edited by Bernard Noël, 1967

Documents (articles and reviews), edited by Bernard Noël, 1968

Le Collège de sociologie (1937–1939), with others (includes 8 lectures by Bataille), 1979; as The College of Sociology (1937–1939), edited by Denis Hollier, translated by Betsy Wing, 1988

Visions of Excess: Selected Writings, 1927–1939, edited by Allan Stoekl, translated by Stoekl, Carl R. Lovitt, and Donald M. Leslie, Jr., 1985

Le Dictionnaire critique, 1993

The Absence of Myth: Writings on Surrealism, 1994

Other writings: novels (including Le Coupable [Guilty], 1944; L'Abbé C, 1950; Le Bleu du ciel [Blue of Noon], 1957), poetry, and works on art, eroticism, and literature.

Collected works edition: Œuvres complètes, edited by Michel Foucault and Francis Marmande, 12 vols., 1970–88.

Bibliography

Nordquist, Joan, Georges Bataille: A Bibliography, Santa Cruz, California: Reference and Research Services, 1994

Further Reading

L'Arc issue on Bataille, 32 (May 1967)

Critique issue on Bataille (August-September 1963)

Gill, Carolyn Bailey, Bataille: Writing the Sacred, London and New York: Routledge, 1995

Hollier, Denis, Against Architecture: The Writings of Georges Bataille, Cambridge, Massachusetts: MIT Press, 1989 (original French edition, 1974)

Land, Nick, The Taste for Annihilation: Georges Bataille and Virulent Nihilism, London and New York: Routledge, 1991

Richardson, Michael, Georges Bataille, London and New York: Routledge, 1994

Richman, Michele, Beyond the Gift: Reading Georges Bataille, Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1982

Shaviro, Steven, Passion and Excess: Blanchot, Bataille, and Literary Theory, Tallahassee: Florida State University Press, 1990

Yale French Studies issue on Bataille, 78 (1990)

Baudelaire, Charles

French, 1821–1867

Charles Baudelaire is chiefly known as the author of Les Fleurs du mal (1857, 1861; The Flowers of Evil) and of a collection of experimental prose poems, Le Spleen de Paris (1869; Paris Spleen). But he is also important as a critic of painting and, to a much lesser extent, of literature and music. The essays on art are usually published under the collective title Curiosités esthétiques (Aesthetic curiosities), those on literature and music under the title L'Art romantique (Romantic art; a title not chosen by Baudelaire). The Salon de 1846 (Salon of 1846) first established his reputation as a writer and aesthete, and he is now judged one of the greatest art critics of 19th-century France. Over the last 50 years his critical essays have come to be considered an extension of his creative work because of the insights they provide into his aesthetics as a poet. The best exhibit the qualities one might expect of a poet—imaginative and emotional investment in his subject, allusive intellectual density, sensuous evocativeness—in keeping with Baudelaire's conviction that the only aesthetics worthy of the name are a posteriori, the subsequent analysis of a richly sensuous lived experience, and not a matter of "principles" or abstract preconceptions about the beautiful. We can see this exemplified in "Richard Wagner et 'Tannhäuser' a Paris" (1861; Richard Wagner and Tannhäuser in Paris). Baudelaire's musical experience was limited, but a concert of excerpts from Wagner's music and the premiere of Tannhäuser in Paris in 1861 produced an overwhelming impression, evoked in the essay in terms of the poetic theory of correspondances (mystical correspondences) or synesthesia (in this case, sound suggesting qualities of light and color). Baudelaire referred to experience of this kind—sensation carried in the imagination to a point of almost preternatural intensity—as le surnaturalisme (supernaturalism). Wagner was to Baudelaire in music what Delacroix had been 15 years earlier in painting. A series of essays on drugs, published together under the title Les Paradis artificiels (1860; Artificial Paradise), explore similar states of heightened consciousness produced by alcohol, hashish, and opium, but Baudelaire's celebration of their poetic effects is counterbalanced by his condemnation of drugs in terms of irresponsibility, delusion, and moral disintegration.

The literary criticism does not have quite the same intensity, though Baudelaire's passion for Delacroix and Wagner was matched by his enthusiasm for Poe, whom he translated extensively. Poe provided not so much the revelation of a new experience as the confirmation of a theory of poetry toward which Baudelaire's own intuition was guiding him. His most important collection of essays on literature, Réflexions sur quelques-uns de mes contemporains (1861; Reflections on some of my contemporaries), was commissioned as a series of prefatory essays for an anthology of French poetry produced by Eugène Crépet. Many of the poets discussed would now be considered minor and do not engage Baudelaire's imagination in the same way as music or painting, the essays on Gautier and Hugo being exceptions. In these essays, Baudelaire, reflecting on the work of his contemporaries and thinking back over his own best poetry, comes closest to formulating his own ideal of a "pure poetry."

The "Salon"—a critical account of the annual exhibition of contemporary painting held in Paris—became, in the wake of Diderot, an essay subgenre in the 19th century. They were commissioned by leading Parisian papers and journals and often published separately as brochures. They were often written by established or avant-garde writers (Musset, Heine, Champfleury) and were typical of the cross-fertilization between literature and the fine arts that was a feature of the intense artistic life of Paris from the Constitutional Monarchy onward. The aim in the first place was to offer an intellectual tour of the paintings on view and to act as a guide and stimulus to bourgeois buyers. Baudelaire's first Salon in 1845 follows this format. A year later, electrified by his recent acquaintance with Delacroix, Baudelaire wrote the Salon de 1846 and transformed the genre from a catalogue with commentary into an essay in high aesthetics. The Salon de 1846 is intellectually taut in its construction and polemically committed. In it Baudelaire states his own convictions as an artist at the outset of his career and promotes the genius of Delacroix, seen as the representative of the Romantic movement in France. Much of the essay turns on the distinction and opposition of color (Delacroix) and line (Ingres). Line artificially separates objects and parts of objects from each other and creates stable conceptual identities; color blurs distinctions, including the distinction between subject

(the viewer) and object (the viewed) and tends toward a poetic state of coalescence. The opposition of Delacroix and Ingres, as the two main rival representatives of contemporary French painting, is repeated in the text Baudelaire devoted to the Paris Exposition Universelle of 1855, which is perhaps more interesting in the brief glimpses it affords of the impact of non-European art (for example Chinese art) on Baudelaire's sensibility. The Exposition made Baudelaire aware of the narrowness of the controversies (e.g. Romantic versus neoclassical) that were still feeding artistic debate in France.

Two essays on caricature, "Quelques caricaturistes français" (1857; Some French caricaturists) and "Quelques caricaturistes étrangers" (1857; Some foreign caricaturists), prefaced by a short metaphysical theory of the comic, "De l'essence du rire" (1855; The essence of laughter), show a Baudelaire fascinated by the moral suggestiveness of this genre, which he refused to consider as minor. On the contrary, caricature exhibits, in quintessential form, the processes of simplification and expressive generalization (what Baudelaire calls "idealization") common to all the visual arts.

Baudelaire's last Salon in 1859 is tightly organized around the concept of imagination, in the name of which he rejects realism as a philosophically untenable position. As a subjective idealist, he argues that we do not know nature in any objective sense; all we have are the ways in which individual imaginations totalize experience. Baudelaire's abiding commitment to Delacroix made him hostile to Courbet and unsympathetic to the contemporary developments in French landscape painting that would lead to impressionism (he could not tolerate the erosion of compositional values). It also blinded him to the novel genius of Manet. Le Peintre de la vie moderne (1863; The painter of modern life) is the fullest development of a preoccupation announced as early as the Salons of 1845 and 1846—the necessity for modern painters to find the material of their art in the reality and lifestyle of their own historical moment. A comparatively minor illustrator of worldly life, Constantin Guys, is hailed as the artist who has opened his eyes to the bizarre beauty of Second Empire Paris, its types, its fashions, and the whole new world of nightlife made possible by gas lighting. The essay was influential in creating the climate of thought and sensibility that made possible the work of artists like Toulouse-Lautrec, Degas, and, of course, Manet himself.

BERNARD HOWELLS

Biography

Charles Pierre Baudelaire. Born 9 April 1821 in Paris. Studied at the Collège Royal, Lyon, 1832–36; Lycée Louis-le-Grand, Paris, 1836–39: expelled; Pension Levêque et Bailly, Paris, baccalauréat, 1839; enrolled as a law student at the University of Paris, but led a bohemian life, contracted venereal disease, and fell into debt, 1839–40. Sent on a voyage to India by his parents, 1841, but left the ship at Mauritius and returned to Paris, 1842. Began a lifelong affair with Jeanne Duval, 1842. Lived on an inheritance from his father, from 1842: deprived by law of control over it by the Conseil Judiciaire, 1844. Cofounder, Le Salut Public (The public salute), 1848. Fought on the barricades during the Revolution of 1848; associated with Proudhon and opposed the coup d'état of Louis-Napoleon Bonaparte, December 1851, but subsequently remained aloof from politics and adopted increasingly reactionary attitudes. Involved with Marie Daubrun, 1854–55, 1859, and Apollonie Sabatier, 1857. Publication of Les Fleurs du mal, 1857, led to a trial for indecency, a fine, and suppression of six poems; extended stay in Brussels, 1864; returned to Paris and stayed in a sanatorium, 1866. Died aphasiac and hemiplagiic in Paris, 31 August 1867.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Salon de 1845, 1845; edited by André Ferran, 1933

Salon de 1846, 1846; edited by David Kelley, 1975

Les Paradis artificiels, 1860; as Artificial Paradise: On Hashish and Wine as a Means of Expanding Individuality, translated by Ellen Fox, 1971

Réflexions sur quelques-uns de mes contemporains, 1861

Le Peintre de la vie moderne, 1863

Curiosités esthétiques, 1868

L'Art romantique, 1869

Selected Critical Studies, edited by Douglas Parmée, 1949

My Heart Laid Bare and Other Prose Writings, edited by Peter Quennell, translated by Norman Cameron, 1950

The Mirror of Art: Critical Studies, edited and translated by Jonathan Mayne, 1955

The Essence of Laughter, and Other Essays, Journals, and Letters, edited by Peter Quennell, 1956

Curiosités esthétiques, L'Art romantique, et autres œuvres critiques, edited by Henri Lemaître, 1962

Baudelaire as a Literary Critic, edited and translated by Lois Boe Hyslop and Francis E.Hyslop, Jr., 1964

The Painter of Modern Life and Other Essays, edited and translated by Jonathan Mayne, 1964

Art in Paris 1845–1862: Salons and Other Exhibitions, edited and translated by Jonathan Mayne, 1965

Selected Writings on Art and Artists, translated by P.E.Charvet, 1972

Critique d'art; Critique musicale, edited by Claude Pichois, 1992

Other writings: poetry (including the collections Les Fleurs du mal [The Flowers of Evil], 1857 and 1861, and Petits Poèmes en prose [or Le Spleen de Paris], 1869). Also translated tales by Edgar Allan Poe.

Collected works editions: Œuvres complètes, edited by Jacques Crépet and Claude Pichois, 19 vols., 1922–53; Œuvres complètes (Pléiade Edition), edited by Claude Pichois, 2 vols., 1975–76.

Bibliography

Cargo, Robert T., Baudelaire Criticism 1950–1967, Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1968

Further Reading

- Gilman, Margaret, Baudelaire the Critic, New York: Columbia University Press, 1943
- Hyslop, Lois Boe, Charles Baudelaire Revisited, Boston: Twayne, 1992
- Lloyd, Rosemary, Baudelaire's Literary Criticism, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1981
- Loncke, Joycelynn, Baudelaire et la musique, Paris: Nizet, 1975
- Pichois, Claude, and Jean Ziegler, Baudelaire, New York: Viking Penguin, and London: Hamilton, 1989
- Raser, Timothy, A Poetics of Art Criticism: The Case of Baudelaire, Chapel Hill: North Carolina Studies in the Romance Languages and Literatures, 1989
- Richardson, Joanna, Baudelaire, London: Murray, and New York: St. Martin's Press, 1994
- Starkie, Enid, Baudelaire, London: Faber, 1957; New York: New Directions, 1958

Bayle, Pierre

French, 1647–1706

Pierre Bayle expressed his views on Protestantism and religious tolerance in brief prose forms (letters, thoughts, dictionary entries) which convey the style and methods of an essayist. He is often considered a forerunner to the Enlightenment because of his rigorous examination of religious dogma based on erudition and reason coupled with a perspective that respected a variety of belief systems. He relied upon Cartesian methods and tenets, as filtered through the writings of Malebranche, in the many domains covered in his writings.

Bayle grew up poor, provincial, and Protestant, which marked him an outsider in 17th-century Catholic France and had a profound effect upon his writing. He left his country, in fact, and spent most of his life in Holland to avoid religious persecution and enjoy the freedom of uncensored writing. In the Lettre sur la comète (1682.; Letter on the comet), enlarged a year later to Pensées diverses sur la comète (Miscellaneous Reflections Occasioned by the Comet), the letter form proved an effective means for his arguments disproving any supernatural significance attributed to comets, which Bayle showed to be natural phenomena explained by Cartesian physics. Even in this early text we find the lively, entertaining digressions which characterize Bayle's later style of composition.

He applied his scientific inquiry conveyed with a derisive tone to a review of history in the Critique générale de l'Histoire du calvinisme du P.Maimbourg (1682., 1683; General critique of the History of Calvinism by P.Maimbourg). In this work he adapted his Cartesian principles to the study of history, and stressed the need for historical objectivity and impartiality, based on a careful examination of sources. It signaled a new style of controversy, and one of its most contested concepts was the idea that superstition is the worst of our evils, even worse than atheism. The work was burned by the hangman in Paris, and was a huge success in clandestine circulation.

Bayle's most important and influential work, the two-volume Dictionnaire historique et critique (1697; An Historical and Critical Dictionary), was the only work to bear his name. Its enormous success can be seen in the fact that it was the work most often found in private libraries in the 18th century. It consists of a series of concise biographies marked by a witty, impersonal style. His skepticism often touched on pessimism, and his critique of superstitious, dogmatic elements in all religions earned him enemies among Catholics and Protestants alike. Irony and satire were often used to strip away hypocritical notions and practices, as Bayle displayed the naked truth of human error. His ambiguous treatment of the Bible as an historical document appealing to faith but requiring scrupulous rational examination was one of the most controversial elements of the Dictionary. He believed the practice of supporting governments and justifying political and institutional systems by a biased interpretation of the designs of Providence to be a morally corrupt practice and subversion of the truth.

In Bayle's writing in general, as well as in the Dictionary in particular, the existing order of things is considered better than the chaos that change would entail. To this extent Bayle represents well the transitional period between the 17th and 18th centuries, between an acceptance, albeit critical, of contemporary political and ideological systems, and the more radical rejection of the status quo by writers of the Enlightenment. Bayle's thought reveals the fluid orthodox Calvinism prevalent during the reign of Louis XIV, which encompassed a variety of apparent contradictions (skepticism and faith, monarchy and dissent). But if he refused the role of a revolutionary, Bayle was an ardent and relentless reformer. He destroyed commonplaces, facile logic, and totems in his work, which tends toward an individualistic perspective on society, due perhaps in part to his Protestant background.

A second edition of the Dictionary, which was greatly augmented, appeared in 1702, and conveyed some of Bayle's more recent debates and philosophical arguments. Even in this work there is the journalistic aspect which characterizes so much of his writings, so that we can trace the evolution of his thought and of his polemical contests. His primary opponent was Pierre Jurieu, a fellow Protestant and former friend, who refused the spirit of compromise and tolerance toward the Catholics of France that can be found in Bayle's works. Since he fought dogmatism wherever he found it, all the dogmatists of the period were naturally allied against him. His last texts focused on these ideological conflicts: a five-volume Réponse aux questions d'un provincial (1703–07; Response to questions of a provincial) and the Continuation des Pensées diverses (1705; Continuation of the Miscellaneous reflections).

Bayle was not interested in the earthly rewards of money or honor, but was driven by a tireless pursuit of discovering and expressing the truth, a philosophical goal which he sought with a religious zeal. He can be considered a moralist to the extent that his theological views often emphasize the social consequences of beliefs, and the relationships among peoples as affected by their religious attitudes. He had a great impact upon Voltaire, who found encouragement in his work to criticize Christian doctrine. It was as much the strength of his arguments as his style of writing, humanly imperfect in its rambling digressions yet lively in its witty understatement and sarcasm, that distinguished him as a writer. In many ways he resembled more the humanists of the 16th century than the philosophers of the 18th.

ALLEN G. WOOD

Biography

Born 18 November 1647 in Carla (now Carla-Bayle), southeast of Toulouse. Studied at home; Calvinist academy, Puylaurens, sporadically from 1666; Jesuit college, Toulouse, 1669, where he converted to Catholicism; reverted to Calvinism 17 months later and fled to Geneva to avoid exile as a lapsed Catholic; studied philosophy at the University of Geneva, 1670; tutor in Geneva and Coppet, 1672–74, and Rouen and Paris, 1674; taught philosophy at a Huguenot academy, Sedan, 1675–81, where he became friends with the Calvinist minister Pierre Jurieu; taught philosophy and history at the École Illustre, Rotterdam, 1681–93. Critique générale banned on first publication, 1682, and Bayle's brother Jacob was arrested in France as a result, dying in prison, 1685. Founder and coeditor, with Henry Desbordes, Nouvelles de la République des Lettres (News from the Republic of Letters), 1684–89. Deterioration of his friendship with Jurieu, from 1686. Died (of tuberculosis) in Rotterdam, 28 December 1706.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Lettre sur la comète, 1681; enlarged edition, as Pensées diverses sur la comète, 1683; edited by A.Prat, 2 vols., 1911–12.; revised edition edited by P.Rétat, 1981; as

Miscellaneous Reflections Occasioned by the Comet, translated anonymously, 1708
Critique générale de l'Histoire du calvinisme du P.Maimbourg, 1682.; revised edition, 1683

Commentaire philosophique sur ces paroles de Jésus-Christ, "Contrain-les d'entrer", 1686; as Commentary on These Words of the Gospel Luke XIV 23..., translated anonymously, 2 vols., 1708; as Philosophical Commentary, translated by Amie Godman Tannenbaum, 1987

Dictionnaire historique et critique, 2 vols., 1697; revised and enlarged edition, 3 vols., 1702; edited by A.J.Q.Beuchot, 16 vols., 1820–24, and Alain Niderst, 1974; as An Historical and Critical Dictionary, translated anonymously, 4 vols., 1710; as The Dictionary, Historical and Critical, various translators, 5 vols., 1734–38, reprinted 1984; as A General Dictionary, Historical and Critical, various translators, 10 vols., 1734–41; selections edited and translated by Elmer A.Beller and Marguerite du Pont Lee, 1952, and Richard H.Popkin and Craig Brush, 1965

Réponse aux questions d'un provincial, 5 vols., 1703–07

Continuation des Pensées diverses, 2 vols., 1705

The Great Contest of Faith and Reason: Selections, edited and translated by Karl C.Sandberg, 1963

Other writings: works on religion and moral philosophy, and correspondence.

Collected works editions: Œuvres diverses, 5 vols., 1964–82; Œuvres diverses, edited by Alain Niderst, 1971.

Further Reading

- Brush, Craig B., Montaigne and Bayle: Variations on the Theme of Skepticism, The Hague: Nijhoff, 1966
- Delvolvé, Jean, Religion, critique, et philosophie positive chez Pierre Bayle, Paris: Alcan, 1906
- Dibon, Paul, editor, Pierre Bayle, le philosophe de Rotterdam (essays in French and English), Amsterdam: Elsevier, 1959
- Kenshur, O., "Pierre Bayle and the Structures of Doubt," Eighteenth-Century Studies 21, no. 3 (Spring 1988): 297–315
- Labrousse, Elisabeth, Pierre Bayle, The Hague: Nijhoff, 2 vols., 1963–64
- Labrousse, Elisabeth, "The Political Ideas of the Huguenot Diaspora: Bayle and Jurieu," in Church, State, and Society Under the Bourbon Kings of France, edited by Richard M. Golden, Lawrence, Kansas: Coronado Press, 1982
- Labrousse, Elisabeth, Bayle, London and New York: Oxford University Press, 1983
- O’Cathasaigh, S., "Skepticism and Belief in Pierre Bayle’s Nouvelles Lettres critiques" Journal of the History of Ideas 45, no. 3 (July-September 1984): 421–33
- Rétat, Pierre, Le Dictionnaire de Bayle et la lutte philosophique au XVIIIe siècle, Paris: Les Belles-Lettres, 1971
- Rex, Walter E., Essays on Pierre Bayle and Religious Controversy, The Hague: Nijhoff, 1965
- Robinson, Howard, Bayle, the Skeptic, New York: Columbia University Press, 1931
- Sandberg, Karl C., At the Crossroads of Faith and Reason: An Essay on Pierre Bayle, Tucson: University of Arizona Press, 1966
- Smith, Horatio E., The Literary Criticism of Pierre Bayle (dissertation), Albany, New York: Brandow, 1912.
- Tannenbaum, Amie Godman, and D. Tannenbaum, "John Locke and Pierre Bayle on Religious Toleration," Studies on Voltaire and the Eighteenth Century 303 (1992): 418–21
- Whelan, R., "The Anatomy of Superstition: A Study of the Historical Theory and Practice of Pierre Bayle," Studies on Voltaire and the Eighteenth Century 259 (1989): 1–269

Beauvoir, Simone de

French, 1908–1986

Simone de Beauvoir was a prominent French existentialist writer who worked alongside such notables as Jean-Paul Sartre, Maurice Merleau-Ponty, and Albert Camus. Among the hallmarks of existentialism, and hence of her thought, are an emphasis on radical freedom and its commensurate responsibility, a rejection of the traditional idealistic assumptions about the importance of rationality and universality in favor of an emphasis upon the non-rational and the individual, and a sensitivity to style of expression. The existentialists wrote in a variety of different styles: novels, plays, short stories, as well as essays. Often their essays were more expository than analytic in style, and were occasionally lyrical.

Yet, at her best, Beauvoir is not quite like any of her fellow existentialists. Her unique voice emerged while she directed her thought to the problems affecting her. Sartre, her collaborator and intimate companion for over 50 years, said of her work in an interview in 1965: "I don't pay compliments and I say things simply. She seems to me a very good writer. She has achieved something which has manifested itself particularly since The Mandarins. It's apparent in the memoirs and in her book A Very Peaceful Death, which I consider the best thing she's written. What she has achieved is immediate communication with the public" (Madeleine Gobeil, "Sartre Talks of Beauvoir: An Interview with Madeleine Gobeil," in Marks, 1987). Sartre went on to describe how this immediacy had been achieved through a proper balance of intellectual and emotional reflection: "She has the right relationship with herself. That's what's meant by seeing oneself in perspective. It's not only a matter of literature, it's a matter of life."

Another hallmark of existentialism is the engagement of the author within his or her situation, referred to as "situated" or "committed" literature, in which writing both reflects the situation the author and readers are in and addresses itself to change and revolution rather than settling for the safe accuracy of benign description. This style of writing was meant to emerge spontaneously from a way of living. Unfortunately, this attempt was not always successful. The literary critic Edmund Wilson once said of Sartre—this surely applies to much other existentialist writing—that this style came off as contrived and self-conscious rather than as effective realism: "...a virtuosity of realism and a rhetoric of moral passion which make you feel not merely that the fiction is a dramatic heightening of life but that the literary fantasy takes place on a plane which does not have any real connection with the actual human experience which it is intending to represent" (Edmund Wilson, "Jean-Paul Sartre, the Novelist and the Existentialist," New Yorker, 2 August 1947). However, Beauvoir's essays became more and more effective—more situated and committed—as she found her voice.

Beauvoir enjoyed success with her novels, such as L'Invitée (1943; She Came to Stay), Le Sang des autres (1945; The Blood of Others), and Les Mandarins (1954; The Mandarins). While her initial fame as a novelist was well deserved, it has been eclipsed by the attention resulting from her essays concerning ethics, the social status of women, sexuality, politics, aging, and death. Through her own style of committed literature, she chronicled the myriad social changes of postwar Europe.

Her essay on ethics, Pour une morale de l'ambiguïté (1947; The Ethics of Ambiguity), was an attempt to develop an ethics from existentialism. Some have seen her account as the first step in moving away from the overly individuated world view characteristic of early existentialism toward the socially oriented approach existentialists would later adopt.

She is often seen as a pioneer of contemporary feminist writing. With her classic Le Deuxième Sexe (1949; The Second Sex), a style emerged which was unique among her existentialist cohorts as she began a tradition which describes the human predicament "in a different voice." While subscribing to both existentialism and Marxism, neither existentialism's theoretical emphasis on freedom and authenticity nor Marxism's emphasis on class conflict was sufficient to account for woman's plight as a second-class citizen in a male-dominated world. Indeed, she foresaw an important threat within the promise of both these schools of thought: they must not be allowed to reduce the issues of woman's suffering into generic existential, social, or economic terms.

Beauvoir offers outstanding accounts of death throughout her career, describing the death of her friend Elizabeth Mabilie ("Zaza"), the death of her mother, and finally the death of Sartre. In these works we see in excruciating detail how one comes to live in a world limned with death. The latter two deaths receive book-length analyses in Une mort très douce (1964; A Very Easy Death) and La Cérémonie des adieux (1982; Adieux: A Farewell to Sartre). Her account of aging and growing old in La Vieillesse (1970; The Coming of Age) provides a situated account of another topic our society has tended to avoid: aging is something which will happen to most of us, yet we tend to live as if it should not be discussed. Beauvoir effectively illustrates the social problems of relegating the elderly to the margins of society.

Beauvoir's four volumes of autobiographical reflections offer a valuable inside look into the world of a woman coming to recognize her own outstanding abilities, as well as the personal longitudinal account of aging, sexuality, her relationship with Sartre, her friendships, and the changing intellectual, political, and public scenes in France and elsewhere. These volumes offer a genuine and often courageous personal account from the perspective of a woman engaged in a lifelong struggle to speak, write, and live in a way best described as honest and free.

DUANE H.DAVIS

Biography

Simone Lucie Ernestine Marie de Beauvoir. Born 9 January 1908 in Paris. Studied at the Cours Désir, Paris, 1913–25, baccalauréat; Institut Sainte-Marie, Neuilly-sur-Seine, and Institut Catholique, Paris, 1925–26; the Sorbonne, Paris, 1926–28; École Normale Supérieure, Paris, 1928–29, agrégation in philosophy, 1929. Began a lifelong relationship with Jean-Paul Sartre, 1929. Taught at lycées in Paris, Marseilles, and Rouen, 1929–43. Founding editor, with Sartre, Les Temps Modernes (Modern times), from 1945. Lectured in the United States, 1947; liaison with the writer Nelson Algren, 1947–51; lived with the writer Claude Lanzmann, 1952–58. Cofounder and president, Choisir (Choose) feminist group, 1972, and president, League of Women's Rights, 1974. Awards: Goncourt Prize, 1954; Jerusalem Prize, 1975; Austrian State Prize for European Literature, 1978; honorary degree from Cambridge University. Died in Paris, 14 April 1986.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Pyrrhus et Cinéas, 1944

Pour une morale de l'ambiguïté, 1947; as The Ethics of Ambiguity, translated by Bernard Frechtman, 1948

L'Existentialisme et la sagesse des nations, 1948

- L'Amérique au jour le jour*, 1948; as America Day by Day, translated by Patrick Dudley, 1952
- Le Deuxième Sexe: Les Faits et les mythes* and L'Expérience vécue, 2 vols., 1949; as The Second Sex, edited and translated by H.M. Parshley, 1953; vol. 1 as A History of Sex, 1961; vol. 2 as Nature of the Second Sex, 1963
- Privilèges*, 1955; one essay as Must We Burn de Sade?, translated by Annette Michelson, 1953
- La Longue Marche: Essai sur la Chine*, 1957; as The Long March, translated by Austryn Wainhouse, 1958
- Mémoires d'une jeune fille rangée* (autobiography), 1958; as Memoirs of a Dutiful Daughter, translated by James Kirkup, 1959
- La Force de l'âge*, 1960; as The Prime of Life, translated by Peter Green, 1962
- Djamila Boupacha*, with Gisèle Halimi, 1962; as Djamila Boupacha, translated by Peter Green, 1962
- La Force des choses*, 1963; as Force of Circumstance, translated by Richard Howard, 1965
- Une mort très douce*, 1964; as A Very Easy Death, translated by Patrick O'Brian, 1966
- La Vieillesse*, 1970; as The Coming of Age, and as Old Age, translated by Patrick O'Brian, 1972
- Tout compte fait*, 1972; as All Said and Done, translated by Patrick O'Brian, 1974
- La Cérémonie des adieux*, 1982; as Adieux: A Farewell to Sartre, translated by Patrick O'Brian, 1984
- Other writings: four novels (L'Invitée [She Came to Stay], 1943; Le Sang des autres [The Blood of Others], 1945; Tous les hommes sont mortels [All Men Are Mortal], 1946; Les Mandarins [The Mandarins], 1954; Les Belles Images, 1966), short stories, two plays, biography, and memoirs.

Bibliographies

- Bennett, Joy, and Gabriella Hochmann, Simone de Beauvoir: An Annotated Bibliography (criticism on Beauvoir), New York: Garland, 1988
- Francis, Claude, and Fernande Gontier, Les Écrits de Simone de Beauvoir, Paris: Gallimard, 1979

Further Reading

- Barnes, Hazel E., The Literature of Possibility, Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1959
- Marks, Elaine, editor, Critical Essays on Simone de Beauvoir, Boston: Hall, 1987
- Oakley, Judith, Simone de Beauvoir, New York: Pantheon, 1986
- Schwarzer, Alice, After The Second Sex: Conversations with Simone de Beauvoir, New York: Pantheon, 1984

Beerbohm, Max

British, 1872–1956

In 1921 Max Beerbohm urged Bohun Lynch, an early biographer, not to overanalyze his work, saying of himself that “My gifts are small. I’ve used them very well and discreetly, never straining them; and the result is that I’ve made a charming little reputation.” The blend of self-mockery and selfassertion, as well as the offhand and understated accuracy of the observation, are essential elements of Beerbohm’s style and approach to the essay. Beerbohm was never an especially prolific or an especially innovative writer, but within the limits he set for himself he at times achieved near-perfection in the familiar style of the personal essay.

Beerbohm’s most interesting essays came at the beginning and the end of his literary career. In his earlier work he was, as he mockingly said of himself, “of the Beardsley period,” and his essays of the 1890s reflect certain aspects of the current Aesthetic Movement. Beerbohm’s first published essay, “The Pervasion of Rouge,” appeared, appropriately, in the first issue of John Lane’s Yellow Book in 1894. This essay, written while Beerbohm was still an Oxford undergraduate and with tongue very firmly in cheek, extols the arrival of the “era of rouge” and concludes that the increased use of cosmetics will be a good thing for women, because with the emphasis on cosmetics “surface will finally be severed from soul” and people will now look on women’s faces as things of beauty rather than as indexes of character. “The Pervasion of Rouge” met with the incomprehension often accorded satire, and in the second issue of the Yellow Book Beerbohm had to explain that he was joking.

The first readers of “The Pervasion of Rouge” should not be judged too harshly, for Beerbohm was at this point far from the master satirist and parodist he would soon become, and, while the essay was intended as a parody of preciousness, the style and substance of it and several other essays are themselves somewhat precious. The subjects, style, and narrative voice of the early work were later refined but not transformed. The appreciation of artifice and display, the respect for Beau Brummell and any artist devoted completely to his art (“Dandies and Dandies,” 1896), the new and sympathetic perspectives on unpopular or unknown historical figures (“King George the Fourth,” 1894; Romeo Coates in “Poor Romeo,” 1896) remained constant, as did the characteristic blend of historical background, iconoclastic point of view, use of mild fantasy, and the perception of the extraordinary in the seemingly commonplace, all presented with mild irony in a style of considerable polish and sophistication.

The most lasting and important achievement of Beerbohm’s early essays, however, was their development of the Beerbohm persona, that of an elderly man looking wistfully back to the past. In “1880” (1895), Beerbohm’s description of the birth of the Aesthetic Movement, he treats his recent youth as ancient history, noting with the truth of paradox that 1880, a mere 14 years earlier, is “now so remote from us that much in it is nearly impossible to understand.” In “Diminuendo” (1896), Beerbohm perpetuates this voice of an elderly aesthete when, at the ripe old age of 24, he concludes that “Surely I could have no part in modern life” and bids farewell to literature, finding that as a writer he is already “a trifle outmoded.” The self-characterization and the sense of play pervade Beerbohm’s first book of essays, a slim volume published, with complete bibliography, as The Works of Max Beerbohm (1896).

With his characteristic blend of self-deflation and self-praise Beerbohm remarked of the Aesthetic period when he began writing that “To give an accurate and exhausting account of that period would need a far less brilliant pen than mine” and moved on to new subject matter. The narrative voice, however—so successfully employed that Oscar Wilde remarked that the gods had bestowed on Max the gift of perpetual old age—remained, as did the purity of style. Beerbohm’s powers of observation were soon sharpened by his work as a caricaturist, his style by his experiences as a parodist and the 14 years he spent as a working journalist, primarily as the theater critic of the Saturday Review. Beerbohm was a diligent journalist, and his theater criticism can still be read with pleasure, but the essay remained his preferred form. Beerbohm felt that “what distinguishes literature from journalism is not vigour and sharpness of expression; it is beauty of expression.” Beauty of expression marks all of Beerbohm’s later essays, particularly those in his last and best collection, And Even Now.

By the time And Even Now was published in 1920 Beerbohm had become what he had always pretended to be, “an interesting link with the past” (“A Small Boy Seeing Giants”). While several of the essays in And Even Now treat such recurring Beerbohm themes as the difficulties of current social practices (“Hosts and Guests,” “Servants”) and the preference for imaginary rather than actual works of art (books by fictional characters in “Books Within Books,” the “museum of incomplete masterpieces” in “Quia Imperfectum,” his hilarious deflation of Goethe), the best of the later essays are informed by the real or imagined past. The imagined past is the background for Beerbohm’s remarkable re-creation of an 18th-century conversation in “A Clergyman” (1918), a figure who, Beerbohm informs us, “forever haunts my memory and solicits my weak imagination” by becoming the unwitting victim of Samuel Johnson’s wrath and disdain.

Two other “reminiscial” essays of a more personal nature provide excellent examples of Beerbohm’s differing approaches to the actual past of his youth. “No. 2 The Pines” (1920) is a distillation of several of Beerbohm’s continual themes and techniques. The description of Swinburne’s life in suburbia is a literal example of the fantastic residing in the commonplace. The past intrudes upon the present as Beerbohm enters the house inhabited by Swinburne and Theodore Watts-Dunton and has the “instant sense of having slipped away from the harsh light of the ordinary and contemporary into the dimness of an odd, august past. Here, in this dark hall, the past was the present.” A young writer’s awe and pleasure at meeting one of his idols is beautifully conveyed, but the solemnity of the occasion is lightened by such characteristic touches of humor as the young and old writer nearly colliding as they respectfully bow to each other and by such evocative neologisms as the “tupperrossettine” drawing room. Beerbohm’s use of fantasy appears in his final vision of Swinburne, restored to youth, still being watched over and cared for by WattsDunton, even though the two of them are now in Elysium.

“William and Mary” (1920), Beerbohm’s most personal and perhaps best essay, also plays with memory. Reflecting that as one ages “The World has ceased to be remarkable, and one tends to think more and more often of the days when it was so very remarkable indeed," Beerbohm uses a common sight, in this case a railway station, as a springboard to his past in which he was friends with William and Mary, two figures whose personalities and happy marriage are given permanence by Beerbohm's superb description of their lasting effect on him. Acting on impulse, Beerbohm returns to their deserted cottage and hesitantly rings the doorbell, producing "a whole quick sequence of notes, faint but clear, playful, yet poignantly sad, like a trill of laughter echoing out of the past," and concludes, "I must have rung again and again, tenaciously, vehemently, in my folly"—the folly of the attempt to resurrect the ghosts of his departed friends and so recapture his own past. "Playful, yet poignantly sad, like a trill of laughter echoing out of the past" aptly describes the usual tone of a Beerbohm essay, and the employment of two little-known characters both to demonstrate his belief that "the truth about anyone, however commonplace, must always be interesting" ("A Memory of a Midnight Express," 1909) and to provide a way of objectifying personal emotion, is characteristic of Beerbohm's detached approach.

Beerbohm's "charming little reputation" has never really changed. From the beginning of his career his essays have elicited a strong response from a relatively small but intensely devoted group of readers who relish their wit, their offbeat but fascinating subjects and themes, and above all their exquisite craftsmanship. In a review of The Prisoner of Zenda Beerbohm stated that he was "quite happy to sacrifice a story for style. I rate the essayist far higher than the romancer," the credo of a man and essayist who, as Beerbohm said of Aubrey Beardsley, "enjoyed life but...was never wholly of it."

JOHN H. ROGERS

See also Humorous Essay

Biography

Henry Maximilian Beerbohm. Born 24 August 1872 in London. Studied at Charterhouse, Godalming, Surrey, 1885–90; Merton College, Oxford, 1890–94. Journalist and caricaturist, contributing to various periodicals, including the Yellow Book, the Strand magazine, and the Saturday Review, for which he was drama critic, 1898–1910. Married Florence Kahn, 1910 (died, 1951). Lived in Rapallo, Italy, 1911–14, 1919–37, and 1948–56. Broadcaster, BBC, from 1935. Knighted, 1939. Rede Lecturer, Cambridge University, 1943. Honorary Fellow, Merton College, 1945. Married Elisabeth Jungmann, 1956. Awards: honorary degrees from three universities. Died in Rapallo, 20 May 1956.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

The Works of Max Beerbohm, with a Bibliography by John Lane, 1896
More, 1899

Yet Again, 1909

And Even Now, 1920

Around Theatres (theater reviews), 2 vols., 1924

A Variety of Things, 1928

Mainly on the Air (radio broadcasts), 1946; enlarged edition, 1957

Selected Essays, edited by N.L.Clay, 1958

The Incomparable Max: A Selection, edited by S.C.Roberts, 1962

More Theatres, 1898–1903 (theater reviews), 1969

Last Theatres, 1904–1910 (theater reviews), 1970

The Bodley Head Max Beerbohm, edited by David Cecil, 1970; as Selected Prose, 1971

A Peep into the Past and Other Prose Pieces, edited by Rupert Hart-Davis, 1972

Other writings: fiction (including the novel Zuleika Dobson, 1911), three plays, several volumes of cartoons and caricatures, a study of Lytton Strachey (1943), and correspondence (collected in Letters of Max Beerbohm, 1892–1956, edited by Rupert Hart-Davis, 1988).

Bibliography

Gallatin, Albert E., and Leslie M.Oliver, A Bibliography of the Works of Max Beerbohm, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1952

Further Reading

Behrman, Samuel N., Portrait of Max, New York: Random House, 1960; as

Conversation with Max, London: Hamilton, 1960

Cecil, David, Max: A Biography, London: Constable, 1964; Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1965

Danson, Lawrence, Max Beerbohm and the Act of Writing, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1989; New York: Oxford University Press, 1991

Grushaw, Ira, The Imaginary Reminiscences of Sir Max Beerbohm, Athens: Ohio University Press, 1984

Lynch, John Gilbert Bohun, Max in Perspective, London: Heinemann, 1921

McElderry, Bruce, Max Beerbohm, Boston: Twayne, revised edition, 1987

Moers, Ellen, The Dandy: Brummell to Beerbohm, London: Secker and Warburg, 1960

Riewald, J.G., Sir Max Beerbohm, Man and Writer: A Critical Analysis with a Brief Life and a Biography, The Hague: Nijhoff, 1953

Riewald, J.G., editor, The Surprise of Excellence: Modern Essays on Max Beerbohm, Hamden, Connecticut: Archon, 1974

Viscusi, Robert, Max Beerbohm; or, The Dandy Dante: Rereading with Mirrors, Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1986

Belinskii, Vissarion

Russian, 1811–1848

“Vissarion the furious” was the founding father of Russian literary criticism. During his short life he wrote with “mercurial speed and fanatical enthusiasm.” “Somehow I always run to extremes,” he was to say of himself. Belinskii came from a modest background but soon symbolized the appearance of a new vocal class in Russia, the intelligentsia, those concerned about the state of Russian society and who saw in art and literature a means of improvement. He was also a raznochinets (someone not of the gentry), who had to survive upon his own capabilities as a writer and literary critic.

After studying for three years at Moscow University, Belinskii was expelled for writing a play entitled Dmitrii Kalinin which criticized serfdom (although the official reason was because of poor health). He then went on to become the chief literary critic of the most important journals of the day: Teleskop (The telescope), Moskovskii Nabludatel' (The Moscow observer), Otechestvennye Zapiski (Fatherland notes), and Sovremennik (The contemporary). However, the pressures of journalism left him little time for polishing or refining his thoughts and style. In the same way, he paid almost no attention to the style or use of language of the writers he was criticizing. For him, content was the most important issue: language was meant to communicate, not be an end in itself. Belinskii's own style was erratic, ponderous, and diffuse, marked by repetition, digression, too many quotations, incessant polemic, rhetorical overemphasis aiming at immediate and startling effects, and elementary explanations for a public whose level of critical discrimination was still very low.

After an early infatuation with German idealism and his famous essay “Ideia iskusstva” (1841; “The Idea of Art”), which is saturated with Hegelianism, Belinskii came to see art and literature as primarily utilitarian. It had to go beyond the aesthetic, the romantic, the fantastic, and the grotesque; it had to transform society. He urged literature to be “natural, original and national.” In this sense he accomplished much in encouraging the birth of a national Russian literature after Russian writers of the 18th century had spent most of their time imitating the French classical writers. He was in good part responsible for the fame that Nikolai Gogol', Mikhail Lermontov, Fedor Dostoevskii, and Ivan Turgenev enjoyed. However, he always rejected naturalism and would not have appreciated a writer such as Émile Zola. In his essay “Gore ot uma” (1840; Woe from wit) he wrote: “A man drinks, eats, and dresses—this is a world of phantoms...but as man feels, thinks and recognizes himself as an organ, a vessel of the spirit, a finite particle of the general and the infinite—this is the world of reality.”

As a critic, Belinskii did not use the methodology of French or English critics, who worked close to the text. He never wrote systematic treatises. However, he made up for this lack of method by his complete belief in the power of literature. If he liked a literary work, he put his heart and soul into it, fulfilling Victor Hugo's belief that “true criticism begins with enthusiasm.” As an essayist he was a powerful and passionate writer; many of his sayings were adopted by the Soviet regime. For example, after his conversion to socialism (c. 1841–42), Belinskii wrote “my God is negation” and “men are so witless that they must be led to happiness by force.” In a letter to V. P. Botkin he wrote: “Socialism, socialism—or death! That is my motto. What care I for the existence of the universal when individuality is suffering? What care I if genius on earth live in heaven when the crowd is wallowing in the dirt?... My heart bleeds and shudders when I view the crowd and its representatives... And that is life: to sit in the street in rags with an idiotic expression of face collecting farthings in the daytime to be spent on booze in the evening—and men see it and no one cares about it!”

Belinskii greatly influenced Russian national tastes. His dislike of Slavic folklore and Old Russian literature affected the Russian population for an entire century. But he also refined the Russian language by introducing into it a large body of abstract, philosophical, and literary terminology. All in all, the tone and methods he used set the standard for all Russian 19th-century literary criticism. After the Revolution he became enshrined in the official Marxist-Leninist social realist school of literary criticism.

In his last piece, “Pis'mo k Gogoliu” (1847; “Letter to Gogol”), Belinskii criticized Russian society and the role of religion in society. In it he wrote: “The basis of religion is pietism, reverence, fear of God. Whereas the Russian man utters the name of the Lord while scratching himself somewhere.” Belinskii addressed Gogol', who in Izbrannye mesta iz perepiski s druz'iami (1847; Selected Passages from Correspondence with Friends) had given an odd defense of the status quo. Belinskii wrote: “One could endure an outraged sense of self-esteem, and I should have sense enough to let the matter pass in silence were that the whole gist of the matter; but one cannot endure an outraged sense of truth and human dignity; one cannot keep silent when lies and immorality are preached as truth and virtue under the guise of religion and the protection of the knout [flogging whip].” It was during a reading of this letter by the Petrashevskii circle that Dostoevskii was arrested. The article went on to become the manifesto of Russian liberals for decades to come.

ANDRIUS VALEVIČIUS

Biography

Vissarion Grigorievich Belinskii. Born 12 July 1811 in Sveaborg, Finland. Studied at a gymnasium in Penza, from 1825; Moscow University, 1829–32; expelled for writing a play seen to oppose serfdom. Wrote for Teleskop, 1834–36; editor, Moskovskii Nabliudatel', 1838–39; moved to St. Petersburg, 1839; critic, Otechestvennye Zapiski, 1839. Married Mariia Vasil'evna Orlova, 1843; one son (died, 1847) and one daughter. Suffered from tuberculosis and went abroad briefly, May–November 1847. Wrote briefly for Sovremennik, 1847. Died (of consumption) in St. Petersburg, May 1848.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Selected Philosophical Works, 1956

Belinsky, Chernyshevsky, and Dobrolyubov: Selected Criticism, edited by Ralph E. Matlaw, 1962

Other writings: many articles for journals (not collected during his life) and the play Dmitrii Kalinin (c. 1832).

Collected works edition: Polnoe sobranie sochinenii, 13 vols., 1953–59

Further Reading

- Annenkov, P.V., The Extraordinary Decade: Literary Memoirs, edited by Arthur P.Mendel, Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1968
- Bowman, Herbert E., Vissarion Belinski, 1811–1848: A Study in the Origins of Social Criticism in Russia, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1954
- Proctor, Thelwall, Dostoevskij and the Belinskij School of Literary Criticism, The Hague: Mouton, 1969
- Stacy, R.H., Russian Literary Criticism: A Short History, Syracuse, New York: Syracuse University Press, 1974: Chapter 3
- Terras, Victor, Belinskij and Russian Literary Criticism: The Heritage of Organic Aesthetics, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1954
- Turgenev, Ivan, Literary Reminiscences, New York: Farrar Straus Cudahy, 1958; London: Faber, 1959 (original Russian edition, 1874)
- Wellek, René, A History of Modern Criticism: 1750–1950, 3. The Age of Transition, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1982: Chapter 7 (original edition, 1965)

Belleau, André

French Canadian, 1930–1986

In a seminal essay entitled “Petite essayistique” (1983; Little essayistic piece), André Belleau claims that “At 18, one can be Rimbaud, but not an essayist”—since an essayist needs time to learn and master the languages of culture. This remark aptly describes Belleau’s own career, for he came late to essay writing. During his many years as a civil servant he often wrote short stories and book or film reviews for various literary journals, most notably for the influential Liberté (Liberty), which he cofounded in 1959. Despite these publications, he did not begin to consider himself as a writer until the end of the 1960s. He then completely changed his professional activities: he left the government, went back to school, and subsequently (in 1969) became a literature professor at the newly born University of Quebec in Montreal. This Renaissance scholar was influenced by different theoreticians, but some of Belleau’s more technical readings also changed his relationship to his own writing. Mikhail Bakhtin, for example, not only helped him grasp more firmly the nature of the Québécois novel, he also provided him with the means of creating a personal style.

What distinguishes Belleau’s writing before and after the end of the 1960s is the fact that he finally came to terms with a problem he had faced for almost 15 years: how a writer is to incorporate in his work the many “voices” that inhabit him and, more importantly, that make him what he is. The title of Belleau’s second collection of essays, Surprendre les voix (To catch the voices), shows the reader what the writer had discovered about both the nature of literature and the essayist’s work. Belleau asserts that a writer is someone who listens to the words and phrases traded around him before turning them into something personal, and is thus engaged in what Belleau would later call the polemics of language (“polémique des langages”). From this point on, Belleau paid a tremendous amount of attention to his society’s discourses, whether in literature, journalism, mass media, or everyday life. Some of his best-known essays deal with a French television broadcaster’s English pronunciation (“L’Effet Derome, ou, Comment Radio-Canada colonise et aliène son public” [1980; The Derome effect; or, how Radio-Canada colonizes and alienates its public]), Montreal streets and their idioms, and his political opponents’ use of language (Belleau was a fervent supporter of Quebec’s independence while maintaining a skeptical distance from any form of nationalist thought). Belleau’s interests went far beyond the confines of Quebec, however. He was fond of German philosophy, literature, and music; he wrote essays about Morocco and Guadeloupe; he loved French culture both high and low (Fauré as well as popular singers from his youth); he was well read in cybernetics and linguistics; he was an avid reader of European and North American mystery and gothic novels (as revealed in his reviews and his unpublished Cahiers de lecture [Reader’s notebooks]). Belleau’s openness and curiosity were also evident when in 1972 he cofounded the Rencontre Québécoise Internationale des Écrivains (International Québécois meeting of writers): this annual gathering continues to bring together writers from all over the world.

Belleau published only four books, but they are milestones in Quebec’s literary culture, especially for those interested in sociocriticism. In Le Romancier fictif (1980; The fictional novelist) the critic uses the Quebec novel from 1940 to 1980 as a basis for contrasting the narrative techniques of novelists of the parole (for whom literature is perceived as pure interiority) with those of the code (here, the literary institution takes precedence). Notre Rabelais (1990; Our Rabelais), edited by Belleau’s colleagues after his untimely death, contains radio interviews and scholarly essays on an author to whom Belleau had devoted many years of work, and who fascinated him because of the relationship between his oeuvre and contemporary popular or carnavalesque culture.

While these two books are more critical studies than essays per se, such is not the case with Y a-t-il un intellectuel dans la salle? (1984; Is there an intellectual in the house?) and Surprendre les voix (1986). These are collections of short pieces originally published between 1959 and 1985, although over half of the 51 pieces date from 1976. (Many texts appear in both the collections, for Belleau was dissatisfied with the 1984 publication, and reorganized it two years later.) Here, the voice of Belleau the essayist is heard loud and clear—in his theory of the essay as a “récit idéal” (narrative of ideas), his defense of the intellectual’s role, his conception of language and politics, his ground-breaking reflections on the nature of Quebec’s literary institutions, his love for his city and its culture. Particularly remarkable is Belleau’s personal style of writing, which blends Quebec slang and so-called universal French, his attention to detail, and his fiery comments mixed with self-restraint (in matters of faith and spirituality, for example). Belleau’s use of irony and paradox as well as his need to reach his reader are among the elements that structure his essays. At the same time, the essays are self-reflexive and consistently question the writer’s own identity.

Belleau’s lessons are still heard in Quebec’s culture. To measure his importance, one needs only look at the magazine issues published in his honor by friends and colleagues (Liberté, 1987), and by younger scholars who wished to follow in his footsteps (Études Françaises [1988; French studies]). His passion—for knowledge, literature, and the essay as a genre—did not go unnoticed.

BENOÎT MELANÇON

Biography

Born 18 April 1930 in Montreal. Studied literature at the Collège Marie-Médiatrice; philosophy at Collège Sainte-Marie, B.A., 1952; psychology and literature at the University of Montreal, from 1953, licence, 1968, M.A., 1970, Ph.D., 1979. Federal civil servant, 1954–67, working for the Ministry of Public Health, the Public Service Commission, and the National Film Board. Cofounder, Liberté, 1959. Professor, University of Quebec, Montreal, 1969–86. Cofounder, Rencontre Québécoise Internationale des Écrivains, 1972. Married Jacqueline Belleau: two children. Awards: Prize of Excellence in Canadian Studies, 1984. Died in Montreal, 13 September 1986.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Le Romancier fictif: Essai sur la représentation de l'écrivain dans le roman québécois, 1980

Y a-t-il un intellectuel dans la salle?, 1984

Surprendre les voix, 1986

Notre Rabelais, 1990

Other writings: short stories and numerous texts for radio programs (some were published in Notre Rabelais).

Further Reading

Cantin, Serge, "André Belleau, ou, Le Malheur d'être touriste," Liberté (December 1995):27–69

Cousineau, Gerald, André Belleau, essayiste, Montreal: University of Montreal Department of French Studies, 1989

Dumont, François, "L'Essai littéraire québécois des années quatrevingt: La Collection 'Papiers collés'," Recherches Sociographiques 33, no. 2 (1991):323–35

Dumont, François, "La Littérature comme point de vue: Trois essayistes québécois contemporains: André Belleau, Jean Larose et François Ricard," Itinéraires et Contacts de Culture 18–19 (1995):89–96

Dumont, François, "La Théorisation de l'essai au Québec," in Le Discours de l'université sur la littérature québécoise, edited by Joseph Melançon, Quebec City: Nuit Blanche, 1996:331–56

Études Françaises issue on Belleau, 23, no. 3 (Winter 1988)

Liberté issue on Belleau, 169 (February 1987)

Melançon, Benoît, "Le Statut de la langue populaire dans l'oeuvre d'André Belleau, ou,

- La Reine et la guidoune,” Études Françaises 27, no. 1 (Spring 1991):111–32
 Montreuil, Sophie, Le Travail du recueil, Montreal: University of Montreal Department of French Studies, 1996
- Schendel, Michel van, “Cher André (portrait intellectuel d’un chercheur),” in his Rebonds critiques: Questions de littérature: Essais, vol. 1, Montreal: l’Hexagone, 1992:29–186
- Schnierle, Martina, “André Belleau: Indépendance du discours et discours de l’indépendance,” Französisch Heute 22, no. 1 (March 1991):41–42, 51–55

Bello, Andrés

Venezuelan, 1781–1865

One of the pillars of Latin America’s 19th-century intellectual thought, Andrés Bello is heir to the ideas of the Enlightenment in his rationalist struggle to reconcile national interests with universal good.

His essays on the conception of Latin America as a model society for all nations leading the way toward progress planted seeds among Latin American thinkers of the new generation. Bello was one of the first Latin American writers to articulate the ideology of a Latin American destiny, which would later find a resounding echo in the essayist Pedro Henríquez Ureña’s “La utopía americana” (1926; The American utopia). Yet Bello’s dreams for Latin America were not mere utopian fabrications, as Adalbert Dessau explains in “Revista de crítica literaria latinoamericana” (1982): he proposed clear and specific goals to the emerging Latin American nations to achieve that objective. This shared aspiration for a common good, Bello adds, calls for an alliance or “society of nations” that will insure a strong and united Latin America.

In many of his writings, but particularly in his Principios de derecho de gentes (1832; Principles of the rights of people), Bello argues for the need for a progressive development of the emerging nation-states toward the formation of civilized bourgeois societies. Keenly aware of the lack of solid economic foundations in Latin American societies to propel economic development, Bello designs a model structure that would function as a catalyst for economic growth in Latin America. Both his essays on theories of culture and literature as well as his treatises on education and international law delineate Bello’s proposed model for socioeconomic development that would bring Latin America to the forefront of Western civilization.

Bello’s philosophical ideas lean toward what his critics have called an “objective idealism,” tempered by his scientific vision of the world. In his Filosofía del entendimiento (posthumously pub. 1881; Philosophy of the Understanding), Bello develops his theory of society based on knowledge of the laws of nature. The need to use common sense in our understanding of reality is another important premise in Bello’s philosophy. His contribution to Latin America’s intellectual history is his synthesis of the legacies of modern European philosophy combined with his own philosophical theories. His views emerge from his desire to elaborate an ideology that addresses the needs and specific conditions of the newly independent Latin American countries, while at the same time keeping in mind universal values and principles.

In his essays on historiography, Bello discusses the need to distinguish between principles that are universally viable and those that can be applied only to particular situations. Bello's essential methodology proposes the use of experience and reason in the application, in Latin America, of laws developed in other countries. If Latin Americans were directly to copy the lessons learned by European nations, he cautions his readers, they would be unfaithful to the very spirit of those lessons, which advocate free discussion, observation, and thorough convictions. This creative application of universal ideas calls for a clear understanding of the particular needs and goals of the Latin American people.

Bello's familiarity with English philosophy—from Francis Bacon to David Hume—as well as his knowledge of Scottish thinkers such as Thomas Reid and Dugald Stewart, informs his vision of humankind and constitutes a substantive presence in his theory of knowledge, as Fernando Murillo Rubiera discusses in Andrés Bello: Historia de una vida y de una obra (1986). Bello also translated some of Locke's essays, and most critics indicate that Bello had knowledge of the works of Jeremy Bentham and John Stuart Mill. On the other hand, Bello's ties with the Latin American Enlightenment provide a clear basis for his Americanist thought, as seen in his defense of reason and virtue as essential components of the new Latin American societies.

Bello is considered the precursor of a Latin American school of thought which proposes the construction of a society that would benefit from the material progress achieved by European nations, while also avoiding the pitfalls already evident in the capitalist world.

Bello's search for "human happiness" goes hand in hand with his notion of "progressive improvement." His belief in the social need to promote progress for all is at the root of his Americanist thought. As a jurist he worked to build a society that would ensure all civil liberties and the enjoyment of progress and culture for its citizens, within a system based in the rightful administration of justice.

Bello was one of the most prolific and versatile writers of his time, and his intellectual curiosity was unbounded; his books and essays encompass such diverse topics as cosmography, philosophy, literature, education, science, politics, international law, and Spanish grammar. He is widely known as the poet who sang the beauty of the Americas and traced a social document for peace and creativity in the New World in his Silvas americanas (1823; Odes to America), and as the original author of Gramática de la lengua castellana (1847; A Spanish grammar), a pioneer work in the study of the structure of the Spanish language in Spanish America. His Philosophy of the Understanding has been acclaimed as the most mature expression of his philosophical ideas, and his Principios de derecho de gentes is considered the first work of its kind in the Americas.

LOURDES ROJAS

Biography

Andrés Bartolomé Bello. Born 29 November 1781 in Caracas. Studied at the Royal and Pontifical University, Caracas, 1797–1800, B.A., 1800. Second official of the Captaincy General of Venezuela, 1802–10. Editor of the first Caracas newspaper, Gaceta de Caracas (Caracas gazette), 1808. Traveled to England on diplomatic service, as aide to Simón Bolívar and Luis López Méndez, 1810, but funding withdrawn because of civil strife in Venezuela, 1812. Lived in London, 1810–30. Married Ann Boyland, 1814 (died, 1821). Secretary, Chilean legation, 1822–24, and legation of Great Colombia, 1824–29, both London. Founding editor, Biblioteca Americana (American library), 1823, and El Repertorio Americano (The American repertoire), 1826–27, both London. Married Isabel Antonia Dunn, 1824. Elected to the Venezuelan National Academy, 1826. Moved to Santiago at the invitation of the Chilean government, 1829; named senior official, Chilean Ministry of Finance, and held post in the Foreign Ministry, from 1830. Editor, El Araucano, 1830–53. Senator of the Chilean Republic, 1837–55. Rector, University of Chile, Santiago, from 1843. Elected honorary member, Royal Spanish Academy, 1851. Died in Santiago, 15 October 1865.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Principios de derecho de gentes, 1832; as Principios de derecho internacional, 1844
Filosofía del entendimiento, in Obras completas, vol. 1, 1881; as Philosophy of the Understanding, translated by O. Carlos Stoetzer, 1984

Antología de discursos y escritos, edited by José Vila Selma, 1976

Anthology, edited by Pedro Grases, translated by Barbara D. Huntley and Pilar Liria, 1981

Other writings: poetry, a play, a guide to Castilian grammar (1847), and works on the Spanish epic, philology, civil law, astronomy, and education.

Collected works editions: Obras completas, 15 vols., 1881–93; Obras completas, 9 vols., 1930–35; Obras completas (Ministerio de Educación Edition), various editors, 22 vols., 1951–69.

Bibliographies

Becco, Horacio Jorge, Bibliografía de Andrés Bello, Caracas: Fundación la Casa de Bello, 2 vols., 1987–89

Millares Carlo, Agustín, Bibliografía de Andrés Bello, Madrid: Fundación Universitaria Española, 1978

Further Reading

Alfonso, Paulino, “Don Andrés Bello: Antecedentes de influencias y rasgos íntimos,” in Estudios sobre Andrés Bello, vol. 1, edited by Guillermo Feliú Cruz, Santiago: Fondo Andrés Bello, 1966: 163–72

Amunátegui Aldunate, Miguel Luis, “De la influencia de don Andrés Bello en los orígenes del movimiento intelectual de Chile de 1842,” in Estudios sobre Andrés Bello,

- vol. 1, edited by Guillermo Feliú Cruz, Santiago: Fondo Andrés Bello, 1966:13–60
- Ardao, Arturo, “La etapa filosófica de Bello en Londres,” in Bello y Londres, vol. 1, Caracas: Fundación la Casa de Bello, 1981: 145–70
- Ardao, Arturo, “La relación de Bello con Stuart Gill,” in Bello y Chile, vol. 1, Caracas: Fundación la Casa de Bello, 1981:317–38
- Ardao, Arturo, “Bello y la filosofía latinoamericana,” in Bello y la America Latina, Caracas: Fundación la Casa de Bello, 1982: 179–92
- Avila Martel, Alamiro de, “The Influence of Bentham in the Teaching of Penal Law in Chile,” Revista de Estudios HistoricoJuridicos 5 (1980):257–65
- Brewer-Carías, Allan R., “La concepción del estado en la obra de Andrés Bello,” in Bello y la América Latina, Caracas: Fundación la Casa de Bello, 1982:99–154
- Dessau, Adalbert, “La contribución de Andres Bello a la filosofía latinoamericana,” in Bello y la America Latina, Caracas: Fundación la Casa de Bello, 1982:165–78
- Dinwiddy, John Rocoland, “Los círculos liberales y benthamistas en Londres, 1810–1829,” in Bello y Londres, vol. 1, Caracas: Fundación la Casa de Bello, 1981:377–98
- Fernández Larraín, Sergio, Cartas a Bello en Londres, 1810–1829, Santiago: Editorial Andrés Bello, 1968
- Galoo, Angel C., “Filosofía de Andrés Bello,” in Estudios sobre Andrés Bello, vol. 2, Santiago: Fundación la Casa de Bello, 1971: 125–30
- Gaos, José, Filosofía del Entendimiento: Introducción, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1948
- Gazmuri, Cristián, “Algunas influencias europeas en el método historiográfico de Bello,” in Bello y Chile, vol. 2, Caracas: Fundación la Casa de Bello, 1981:325–38
- Grases, Pedro, Tiempo de Bello en Londres, y otros ensayos, Caracas: Ministry of Education, 1962
- Grases, Pedro, “Bello, humanista y universitario,” in Bello y la America Latina, Caracas: Fundación la Casa de Bello, 1982: 469–78
- Herrera, Felipe, “Presencia de Bello en la integración cultural latinoamericana,” Atenea (1972):175–92
- Kilgore, W.J., “Notes on the Philosophy of Education of Andrés Bello,” Journal of the History of Ideas 22, no. 4 (October-December 1961):550–60
- Murillo Rubiera, Fernando, “Andrés Bello en Inglaterra,” Cuadernos Hispanoamericanos (1948):5–44
- Murillo Rubiera, Fernando, Andrés Bello: Historia de una vida y de una obra, Caracas: Fundación la Casa de Bello, 1986
- Peers, E.Allison, “The Literary Activities of the Spanish Emigrados in England,” Modern Language Review 19 (1924)
- Rodriguez Monegal, Emir, “Bello y la inglesa en el primer tercio del siglo XIX,” in Bello y Londres, vol. 2, Caracas: Fundación la Casa de Bello, 1980:113–18

Belloc, Hilaire

British, 1870–1953

Hilaire Belloc was a writer of great vigor and variety, whose work included poetry, history, biographies, and travel accounts, as well as essays. He is regarded by some as the best prose stylist of his generation. He chose early to write in English rather than French, using simple, unadorned language, only occasionally employing metaphor or other rhetorical embellishment. His plain style is sometimes likened to the “piety of speech” of the 17th century, or described simply as grave and majestic, yet unmistakably Belloc.

Belloc’s interests ranged widely, as did his knowledge and experience. His French and English ancestry insured him an unusual combination of insular and continental interests and sympathies as well as an acute way of analyzing everything he encountered. The essay form was particularly well chosen for his highly personal observations, which are consistently informed by his Roman Catholic sense of order as it existed in the Middle Ages, whose fragmenting with the Reformation Belloc saw as the West’s greatest scandal. But an antipathy to contemporary life does not inhibit Belloc’s enjoyment of the modern fools he saw everywhere. In “Fun for Clio” (1940) he noted: “The times in which we live have one great compensating advantage for their beastliness. They are vulgar and they are chaotic, they are murderous, they are dirty, they are atheist, they are intolerably wearisome, they have every vice, but they are a magnificent aid to the understanding of history.” Such sentiments explain why the essays are not presently in favor; they are dismissed as too conservative because few understand the radical attitudes of Catholic faith when it decries the failings of the world yet celebrates material creation.

Some of Belloc’s essays were published in the Sunday Times, the Weekly Review, and the Tablet. He was a close associate of G.K.Chesterton, with whom he published a weekly political newspaper the Witness. Belloc served as a Liberal Member of Parliament from 1906 to 1910, and many of his attitudes are Edwardian: a belief in arguing issues, social concern and delight in such pleasures of life as wine, but also a sense of foreboding and melancholy. The titles of volumes of essays suggest the quality of his mind: On Nothing and Kindred Subjects (1908), On Everything (1909), On Anything (1910), On Something (1910), First and Last (1911), This and That and the Other (1912), On (1923), Places (1941). Two others, The Silence of the Sea and Other Essays (1940) and Hills and the Sea (1906), reveal Belloc’s lifelong enthusiasm for the sea, ships, and sailing, which coexisted with a delight in landscape that is quintessentially English.

Whatever the subject of an essay, Belloc brings to it energy, thoughtful analysis, and deep feeling. He relishes opposing current fashion and expectation, but is never facile. “On the ‘Bucolics’ of Virgil, a Café in Paris, the Length of Essays, Phoebus, Bacchus, a Wanton Maid, and Other Matters” (1923) more than any other title indicates Belloc’s view of the essay as a free form, but he also acknowledges that there are exact expectations of length that lead to random padding. In “The Higher Criticism” he parodies the ludicrous excesses of Germanic academic analysis, concluding, “That is how the damned fools write.” In “On Footnotes” (1923) Belloc identifies the practice as a form of lying in modern history that begins with Gibbon but is enforced because professional critics accuse authors who lack footnotes of “romancing.” Among British writers Belloc wrote essays on Sir Walter Scott, John Bunyan, Jane Austen, James Boswell, William Tyndale, and John Milton. In “On Milton” he identifies two common qualities of English literature—adventure and mystery—and the English hunger for landscape, which he sees as proceeding from the love of adventure. Such conceptualizing from the particular is typical of how Belloc thinks. His own delight in and ruminations about landscape appear in “About Volcanoes” (1940), “On Town Walls” (1940), and most fully in The Path to Rome (1902). According to “On History in Travel” (1941), guidebooks should present the whole road as a piece of history, and specific descriptions in “On Old Towns” (1909) culminate in the statement that “The Old Towns are ourselves: they are mankind.” For Belloc a place is “a sacramental thing,” encountered on the journey, the pilgrimage of life: “We see some one thing in this world, and suddenly it becomes particular and sacramental...there is a resurrection, and we are refreshed and renewed.”

Part of Belloc’s mental quality is curiosity and skepticism, but beneath this there is a core of conviction rooted in his Catholic belief, which he identifies with European civilization. Belloc saw the decay of much European strength, culminating in World War I and repeated in World War II. He affirmed Europe’s base in Christianity and attacked contemporary views of progress, capitalism, and industrial wealth. Thus in “On an Educational Reform” (1923) he urges that Fraud is the new subject needed to prepare the sons of the wealthy. In “On Truth and the Admiralty” (1923) he observes that only sea charts are trustworthy: “The war has produced propaganda. Truth took to its bed in the spring of 1915 and died unregretted, with few attendants, about a year later. Everything since then has been propaganda.” An essay “On Statistics” (1940) classifies the subject as lies, since truth depends upon proportion, which can be distorted with mere figures. Writing “On Latin,” from which all of the West proceeded, Belloc argues its older openness to all classes; he identifies its residual role as a liturgical language, even though “all religion has now arrived at such a stage that it may be called obsolescent.” The essays become more cogent over the years, as Western society developed in ways that support Belloc, opponent of the Barbarians, as prophet of the 20th century.

The so-called progress of the 20th century that rejected Catholic experience was anathema to Belloc. He was a Liberal, but not of the classical European variety that denied life rooted in the past. His analysis of history is grounded in one tradition, and he becomes a part of its continuity. Like other Edwardians he writes of Northernness, but he avoids simple Teutonic/Nordic enthusiasm, voicing his suspicion of Prussia, made strong in the Reformation and thus not tied to European Catholic morality. Belloc warns against blond supermen. Such anticipations validate many of his essays.

VELMA BOURGEOIS RICHMOND

Biography

Joseph Hilaire Pierre Belloc. Born 27 July 1870 in La Celle, St. Cloud, near Paris. Family moved to England, 1870. Studied at the Oratory School, Edgbaston, Warwickshire; Balliol College, Oxford, 1892–95, B.A. in history, 1895. Editor, with A.H.Pollen, Paternoster Review, 1890–91. Served in the 8th Artillery Regiment of the French Army, 1891. Married Elodie Agnes Hogan, 1896 (died, 1914): three sons (two died) and two daughters. Became a British citizen, 1902. Freelance journalist, tutor, and prolific lecturer. Liberal Member of Parliament for South Salford, 1906–10. Editor, coeditor, or founder of the London Morning Post, 1906–09, North Street Gazette, 1910, Eye Witness, 1911–12, and G.K.’s Weekly, 1936–38; columnist of “A Wanderer’s Notebook,” London Sunday Times, 1938–53. Awards: honorary degree from the University of Glasgow; Knight Commander with Star, Order of St. Gregory the Great, 1934. Died in Guildford, Surrey, 16 July 1953.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

The Path to Rome (travel sketches), 1902

The Aftermath; or, Gleanings from a Busy Life (sketches), 1903

Varied Types, 1903

Avril, Being Essays on the Poetry of the French Renaissance, 1904

Hills and the Sea, 1906

On Nothing and Kindred Subjects, 1908

On Everything, 1909

On Anything, 1910

On Something, 1910

First and Last, 1911

This and That and the Other, 1912

At the Sign of the Lion, and Other Essays, 1916

On, 1923

Short Talks with the Dead and Others, 1926

A Conversation with an Angel, and Other Essays, 1928

Essays of a Catholic Layman in England, 1931; as Essays of a Catholic, 1931

A Conversation with a Cat, and Others, 1931

An Essay on the Restoration of Property, 1936; as The Restoration of Property, 1936

Selected Essays, edited by John Edward Dineen, 1936

An Essay on the Nature of Contemporary England, 1937

The Crisis of Civilization (lectures), 1937

The Silence of the Sea and Other Essays, 1940

Places, 1941

Selected Essays, edited by J.B.Morton, 1948

One Thing and Another: A Miscellany from His Uncollected Essays, edited by Patrick Cahill, 1955

Essays, edited by Anthony Forster, 1955

Selected Essays, edited by J.B.Morton, 1958

Other writings: light verse (including The Bad Child's Book of Beasts, 1896; Cautionary Tales, 1907), a play, fiction, and books on travel, religion, topography, and history, including biographies of Danton (1899), Robespierre (1901), Marie Antoinette (1909), Richelieu (1929), and Napoleon (1932).

Bibliography

Cahill, Patrick, The English First Editions of Hilaire Belloc, London: Tabard Press, 198-? (original edition, 1953)

Further Reading

- Belloc Lowndes, Marie Adelaide, The Young Hilaire Belloc, New York: Kenedy, 1956
- Corrin, Jay P., G.K.Chesterton and Hilaire Belloc: The Battle Against Modernity, Athens: Ohio University Press, 1981
- Markel, Michael H., Hilaire Belloc, Boston: Twayne, 1982
- Speaight, Robert, The Life of Hilaire Belloc, New York: Farrar Straus Cudahy, and London: Hollis and Carter, 1957
- Wilhelmsen, Frederick D., Hilaire Belloc: No Alienated Man: A Study in Christian Integration, London: Sheed and Ward, 1953
- Wilson, A.N., Hilaire Belloc, London: Hamilton, 1984

Belyi, Andrei

Russian, 1880–1934

Even disregarding short book reviews, Andrei Belyi's total output of articles and essays numbers close to 300. The essay is central to his oeuvre, providing a versatile form which can be used to address the reader in a wide variety of ways, and on a wide variety of topics. It is possible to classify Belyi's essays into three broad categories, but individual works frequently straddle the boundaries of different types. Some early essays are close in form to his lyrical prose fragments, while others expand to the dimensions of monographs. He wrote half his output of essays between 1902 and 1910; they are predominantly on literary and philosophical subjects. Even here the manner in which he addresses his reader varies widely between the academic and the lyrical. After 1910 he wrote many pieces about his travels; they are unified by a concern with discovering the inner impulse and identifying the spiritual essence of the cultures he observed. The death of Aleksandr Blok in 1921 stimulated Belyi to write memoirs and autobiography, the third category of essays which accompanied the other two, in the last decade of his life.

Belyi's first substantial essay was "Formy iskusstva" ("The Forms of Art"), published in Diaghilev's journal Mir Iskusstva (The world of art) in December 1902, where he outlined a theory of the hierarchy of art forms closely modeled on Schopenhauer, and reached the lyrical conclusion that all art is moving inexorably toward its highest manifestation—music. Throughout the decade he published extensively in all the major symbolist and allied journals and almanacs—Novyi Put' (The new path), Zolotoe Runo (The golden fleece), Svobodnaia Sovest' (The free conscience)—but above all in the flagship journal of the Moscow symbolists, Vesy (The scales). His essays covered every aspect of symbolist theory, ranging between neo-Kantian epistemology and brash internecine polemics. In 1910 and 1911 the most important of his essays were republished, along with a number of new works, in the three volumes Simvolizm (1910; Symbolism), Lug zelenyi (1910; The green meadow), and Arabeski (1911; Arabesques). Simvolizm contains the most important of Belyi's philosophical and literary-theoretical essays, ten of which had not been published previously. These include “Smysl iskusstva” (The meaning of art), “Emblematika smysla” (“The Emblematics of Meaning”), “Magiia slov” (“The Magic of Words”), and a series of essays on the analysis of verse rhythm, in which Belyi was a pioneer. Arabeski and Lug zelenyi contain both literary-critical works and a range of essays that express the broader cultural hopes of the symbolists for a total transformation of humankind, culture, and society, such as “Simvolizm kak miroponimanie” (“Symbolism as a World-View”) or “Apokalipsis v russkoi poezii” (The apocalypse in Russian poetry).

Belyi continued to write on these topics throughout his life. The teleology of culture is the subject of many works written later, such as Tragediia tvorchestva (1911; The tragedy of creativity), Revolutsiia i kul'tura (1917; Revolution and culture), and the three long essays under the general title Na perevale (1918–20; At the watershed). His literary-critical studies include a series of essays on contemporary writers (Aleksandr Blok, Viacheslav Ivanov, V.F.Khodasevich) and culminate in his monograph, Masterstvo Gogolia (1934; Gogol’s craftsmanship). The study of language is continued in “Zhezl Aarona” (1917; Aaron’s rod) and Glossolaliia (1922.; Glossolalia), in which he set out his ideas on the intrinsic meaning of the sounds of human speech in all languages. The rhythm of poetry formed the subject of a number of shorter pieces in the immediate post-revolutionary period, and found its fullest expression in Ritm kak dialektika i “Mednyi vsadnik” (1929; Rhythm as dialectics and “The Bronze Horseman”), in which he sought to interpret Pushkin’s poem on the basis of a dialectical tension between the surface semantics and the rhythm.

The genre of travel notes first makes its appearance in Belyi’s oeuvre after his visit to Italy and North Africa in 1910–11. Short newspaper pieces were published in 1911, and two longer sections on his sojourn in Egypt appeared in the journal Sovremennik (The contemporary) in 1912. Book-form publication had to wait until the appearance of Ofeira: Putevye zametki, chast' pervaiia (1921; Ofeira: travel notes, part one); some sections never did appear in his lifetime and were published only in 1984. The interest of his notes lies not merely in his detailed observation, but in his sense that every cultural monument he describes contains and still exudes the spirit of the culture that created it. There is no dividing line between his work on cultural history and his personal observations in these notes. The same is true of the newspaper articles he published in Birzhevye Vedomosti (The stock exchange gazette) in 1916 about his impressions of Europe at war, gained from his vantage point in Switzerland. Later works in this genre were Odna iz obitelei tsarstva tenei (1924; One of the mansions of the realm of shadows), a damning indictment of postwar Berlin, and Veter s Kavkaza (1928; A wind from the Caucasus) and “Armeniiia” (1928; Armenia), in which he tried to adapt his vein of cultural criticism to the new Soviet reality.

Memoirs are one of the genres for which Belyi is best known, and the three volumes he published toward the end of his life (Na rubezhe dvukh stoletii [1930; On the border of two centuries]; Nachalo veka [1933; The turn of the century]; Mezhdv dvukh revolutsii [1934; Between two revolutions]) are perhaps the most important single source for the study of the period. These grew out of the original Vospominaniia ob A.A.Bloke (1922–23; Recollections of Aleksandr Blok) and went through several revisions, not all of which have been published. Also related to the autobiographical novels Belyi was working on before Blok's death, the memoir genre includes sketches of the Moscow of his childhood, such as "Arbat" (1923; The Arbat).

Contemporaries often speak of Belyi as a man whose mercurial temperament resisted complete expression in any of his literary works. It is in his essays that his extraordinary range and versatility, his protean ability to vary voice and stance, come fully to the fore. A reliable picture of Belyi will never be attained without his essays. And without such a picture it is doubtful whether Russian symbolism as a whole is to be understood. Belyi embodied its spirit like no one else, and his essays are an indispensable—and almost inexhaustible—source for any student of the period.

JOHN ELSWORTH

Biography

Born Boris Nikolaevich Bugaev, 26 October 1880 in Moscow. Studied at the Polivanov gymnasium, 1891–99; science, philology, and philosophy at Moscow University, 1899–1903, degree in natural sciences. Began using the pseudonym Andrei Belyi with the publication of his first prose work, 1902; reviewer and writer for many periodicals and journals, 1902–10. Close friendship with Aleksandr Blok began through correspondence in 1903, developing later into a painful triangular relationship with Blok's wife; despite personal conflict they retained a deep and sympathetic awareness of each other's spiritual quest until Blok's death in 1921. Associate editor, Vesy, 1907–09; associated with Musagetes publishers, 1909–10. Traveled in Italy and North Africa, 1910–11; lived mostly in Western Europe, from 1912. Married Asia Turgeneva, 1914 (separated, 1921). Became interested in the philosophy of Rudolph Steiner, from 1912: helped with the construction of the Anthroposophical Temple in Dornach, Switzerland. Returned to Russia to join the military reserve, 1916, but was never called up. Archivist and librarian during the revolutionary period; founder and lecturer, Vol'fila (Free philosophical society). Returned to Western Europe, 1921, but was not well received by his wife or Rudolph Steiner; lecturer in Berlin, 1921–23; editor, Epopeia, 1922–23. Returned to Russia, 1923. Married Klavdiia Vasil'eva, 1931. Died in Moscow, 8 January 1934.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Simvolizm, 1910

Lug zelenyi, 1910

Arabeski, 1911

Tragediia tvorchestva: Dostoevskii i Tolstoi, 1911

Rudol'f Shteiner i Gete v mirovozzrenii sovremennosti (Rudolf Steiner and Goethe in the philosophy of the present age), 1917

Revoliutsiia i kul'tura, 1917

Na perevale, 3 vols., 1918–20

Ofeira: Putevye zametki, chast' pervaiia, 1921; later section published as "Afrika zhdet menia (iz Afrikanskogo dnevnika A. Belogo)," in Vstrechi s proshlym, 1984:150–69

Glossolaliia, 1922

Sirin uchenogo varvarstva (The siren bird of scholastic barbarism), 1922

O smysle poznaniia (On the meaning of cognition), 1922

Poeziia slova (Poetry of the word), 1922

Vospominaniia ob A.A.Bloke, 1922–23

Odna iz obitelei tsarstva tenei (One of the mansions of the realm of shadows), 1924

Veter s Kavkaza, 1928

Ritm kak dialektika i "Mednyi vsadnik", 1929

Na rubezhe dvukh stoletii, 1930; revised edition, edited by A.V. Lavrov, 1989

Nachalo veka, 1933; revised edition, edited by A.V.Lavrov, 1990

Mezhdru dvukh revoliutsii, 1934; revised edition, edited by A.V. Lavrov, 1990

Masterstvo Gogolia, 1934

Selected Essays, edited and translated by Steven Cassedy, 1985

Other writings: six novels (Serebryanyi golub' [The Silver Dove]), 1909–10;

Petersburg, 1916; Kotik Letaev, 1922; Moskva, 1926; Kreshchenyi kitaets [The Christened Chinaman], 1927; Maski, 1932), and collections of poetry.

Collected works edition: Sochineniia, edited by V.Piskarev, 1990.

Bibliographies

Benina, M.A., "Andrei Belyi: Bibliograficheskii ukazatel', 1976-avgust 1986," in Andrei Belyi: Problemy tvorchestva, edited by S.Lesnevskii and A.Mikhailov, Moscow: Sovetskii Pisatel', 1988:806–29

Bugaeva, K.N., and G.Nivat, "L'Œuvre polémique, critique et journalistique d'Andrej Belyj," Cahiers du Monde Russe et Soviétique 15 (1974):21–39

Elsworth, John, "Bely Studies Since the Centenary," Scottish Slavonic Review 12–13 (1989):69–98

Russkie sovetskie pisateli: Poety: Biobibliograficheskii ukazatel', vol. 3, part 1, Moscow, 1979:114–96

Further Reading

Cioran, Samuel D., The Apocalyptic Symbolism of Andrej Belyj, The Hague: Mouton, 1973

Elsworth, J.D., Andrej Bely: A Critical Study of the Novels, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1983

Keys, Roger, The Reluctant Modernist: Andrei Belyi and the Development of Russian Fiction, 1902–1914, Oxford: Clarendon Press, and New York: Oxford University Press, 1996

Malmstad, John E., editor, Andrej Bely: Spirit of Symbolism, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1987

Peterson, Ronald E., editor and translator, The Russian Symbolists: An Anthology of Critical and Theoretical Writings, Ann Arbor, Michigan: Ardis, 1986

Pyman, Avril, A History of Russian Symbolism, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1994

Benchley, Robert

American, 1889–1945

Most of Robert Benchley's best essays were written during a 20-year period following the end of World War I, when he was writing columns and serving in various editorial positions, first with Vanity Fair, then with the Life magazine of his day, and finally, from the late 1920s on, with the New Yorker. In addition to his regular columns, Benchley often wrote freelance essays for his own and other periodicals during this productive period. In the late 1930s, fearing that he was beginning to repeat himself, and often short of money, he gave up writing professionally to concentrate on his more financially rewarding alternative career as a radio and motion-picture performer. Books that appeared after 1940 are comprised mostly of pieces written earlier.

Apart from occasional parodies and skits, Benchley showed little interest in writing fiction or drama, and his books were simply compilations under catchy titles of essays published previously in magazines and newspapers. While he wrote many drama reviews and did some other more or less serious journalistic work, he was essentially a humorist and an essayist. Benchley's concentration on humor, often humor of a very playful, almost nonsensical sort, and his apparent disregard for theme, source, or time of original publication in compiling his books encourage the misconception that he took his work lightly. In fact, he wrote with a strong sense of obligation to maintain the quality and freshness of his humor and to resist relying on the stock devices and situations he attacked in his drama reviews; in addition, his diligent, almost obsessive revision made meeting deadlines a constant struggle.

Benchley's style is difficult to characterize because, within the limits of his chosen form, he was so versatile. Moreover, he frequently adopted the voices of personas, worked with parody, and employed stylistic incongruity for humorous effect. Even when writing more or less as himself, Benchley deliberately inflated his style; for the kinds of humorous effects he wanted, a degree of pomposity was essential. The seriousness with which Benchley's central persona took himself, his insecurities, and the things that annoyed him accentuated by contrast the silliness of what he had to say. In general, the further a persona was from Benchley himself, the more pronounced this incongruity between style and substance became. It should be added, however, that most of the inflation in Benchley's prose involved diction and general tone. On the whole, apart from occasional humorous interruptions, his style profited from his early work in newspapers in being syntactically straightforward and easy to read.

As well as being, in his narrow field, a creative, highly original artist, Benchley was also a craftsman, and there were few humorous devices he did not employ effectively. A few suited him particularly well, however. Benchley specialized in logical and structural confusion, usually delivered through an earnest, self-important persona who gave no indication of wanting to be funny. He particularly liked long, apologetic, or self-justifying openings, which he often followed with incongruously short, increasingly illogical essays that set readers up for anticlimactic endings. These structural games supported another of Benchley's favorite devices—satirical reduction through misinterpretation and oversimplification. As usual, working through a persona, characteristically one self-deluded about his grasp of his subject and excessively eager to appear as an authority, Benchley would expose the pretentiousness and sham he saw in some specialized field in the course of attempting to explain it. He frequently used parody to the same end. Psychoanalysis, scientific fads, overly erudite literary criticism, the jargon of professional sports, conventions of operatic plots, stylized crime reporting, obscurity in modern art and literature—such were the typical targets of Benchley's satire. These basic techniques for deflation were hardly new in American humor, but Benchley raised the level. He wrote not for people who distrusted urban values and cultural innovations on principle, but for an audience which, while sharing his dislike of overspecialization, pseudo-sophistication, and needless obscurity, was interested in and informed about the subjects he made fun of.

But Benchley lacked the anger of a true satirist. He used his gift for discovering and revealing the ridiculous side of serious subjects more to amuse than to reform, and he was inclined by temperament to make fun of himself more than any other subject. Many of his best essays were based on humorous experiences in his own life: the challenges and aggravations of parenthood, the frustration of mastering machines and gadgets, the annoyances of traveling and dining out. Even Benchley's eccentric dislike—mutual, apparently—of birds became part of his literary act. This comic representation of himself as a bumbling, insecure, somewhat neurotic, middle-class American male challenged to comprehend and cope with the rapid social and technological changes of his time was central to his popular appeal, as both a writer and a performer. Despite his weaknesses and eccentricities, the central Benchley persona often displayed an estimable pluckiness in situations largely beyond his control. He also embodied, in exaggerated form, a skepticism about trends and fads of the period with which many readers would have identified.

Benchley played a central part in the sophistication of popular American humor that took place between the World Wars. While he maintained the vitality and adapted basic techniques of folk humor and its literary offshoots, he dramatically raised the tonal and intellectual level in order to reach a better educated, more cultured, urban audience. His craftsmanship, originality, and wit won him a following not only among readers but also among other writers, and his influence is especially noticeable in the work of such younger contemporaries as S.J.Perelman, James Thurber, and E.B.White.

WILLIAM CONNOR

See also Humorous Essay

Biography

Robert Charles Benchley. Born 15 September 1889 in Worcester, Massachusetts. Studied at Phillips Exeter Academy, Exeter, New Hampshire, 1907–08; Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1908–12, B.A., 1912; president of the editorial board, Harvard Lampoon. Worked for Curtis publishers, 1911–14, and in the personnel office of a paper company, Boston, 1914–15. Married Gertrude Darling, 1914: two sons. Editor and contributor, New York Tribune and Tribune magazine, 1916–17, and the Tribune Graphic Sunday supplement, 1918. Secretary, Aircraft Board, Washington, DC, 1917–18. Managing editor, Vanity Fair, 1919–20; columnist of “Books and Other Things,” New York World, 1910–21; dramatic editor, 1921–29, and editor, 1924–29, Life magazine; contributor, 1925–40, and dramatic editor, 1929–40, the New Yorker. Founder, with Dorothy Parker and others, Algonquin Hotel Round Table, 1920. Also actor: with the Music Box Revue, 1923–24, and in many films (mostly shorts), 1923–45; radio broadcaster, from 1938. Awards: Academy Award (Oscar), for short film, 1936. Died (of a stroke) in New York, 21 November 1945.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Of All Things, 1921

Love Conquers All, 1922

Pluck and Luck, 1925

The Early Worra, 1927

20,000 Leagues Under the Sea; or, David Copperfield, 1928

The Treasurer's Report and Other Aspects of Community Singing, 1930

No Poems; or, Around the World Backwards and Sideways, 1932

From Bed to Worse; or, Comforting Thoughts About the Bison, 1934

My Ten Years in a Quandary and How They Grew, 1936

After 1903—What?, 1938

Inside Benchley (selection), 1942

Benchley Beside Himself, 1943

One Minute Please, 1945

Benchley—or Else!, 1947

Chips off the Old Benchley, 1949

The “Reel” Benchley, edited by George Hornby, 1950

The Bedside Manner; or, No More Nightmares, 1952

The Benchley Roundup, edited by Nathaniel Benchley, 1954

Benchley Lost and Found: 39 Prodigal Pieces, 1970

Benchley at the Theatre: Dramatic Criticism, 1920–1940, edited by Charles Getchell, 1985

Other writings: 14 screenplays.

Bibliography

Ernst, Gordon E., Jr., Robert Benchley: An Annotated Bibliography, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1995

Further Reading

- Altman, Billy, Laughter's Gentle Soul: The Life of Robert Benchley, New York: Norton, 1997
- Benchley, Nathaniel, Robert Benchley, a Biography, New York: McGraw Hill, 1955; London: Cassell, 1956
- Gehring, Wes D., "Mr. B."; or, Comforting Thoughts About the Bison: A Critical Biography of Robert Benchley, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1992
- Rosmond, Babette, Robert Benchley: His Life and Good Times, Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1970
- Yates, Norris W., Robert Benchley, New York: Twayne, 1968

Benda, Julien

French, 1867–1956

Despite the wide range of his interests, which cover such diverse fields as philosophy, aesthetics, history, sociology, literature, and politics, Benda was and remains known as a man of one idea. It was he more than anyone else in the 20th century who conceptualized the notion of the intellectual. In 1927 Benda published La Trahison des clercs (The Betrayal of the Intellectuals), in which he formulated his famous thesis of the intellectuals' betrayal of their vocation as the guardians of Truth and its absolute character. The book instantly caused a commotion, and its title, like that of Ortega y Gasset's La rebelión de las masas (1930; The Revolt of the Masses), Hermann Rauschning's Die Revolution des Nihilismus (1938; The Revolution of Nihilism), or Raymond Aron's L'Opium des intellectuels (1955; The Opium of the Intellectuals), became a catch-phrase among political scientists. Benda's other works are an elaboration upon the thesis advanced in The Betrayal of the Intellectuals, and they can be properly understood only when read against its background.

The term clerc, which Benda used in the title rather than intellectuel, was applied in the Middle Ages to all those who devoted their lives exclusively to the pursuit of Truth and who, on account of their concerns with "unworldly causes," were not subject to civil jurisdiction. Paradigmatic examples of the clercs whom Benda mentions are Socrates and Jesus, and several thinkers (St. Thomas, Descartes, Pascal, Spinoza, Malebranche, Newton, Kant, Husserl) who openly declared "their kingdom not to be of this world." In contrast to the clerc of old, the modern clerc abandoned his vocation, making Truth subservient to a political program or an ideology. "What a joy for them to learn that this universal is a mere phantom, that there exist only particular truths, Lorraine truths, Provençal truths, Brittany truths...Humanity hears the same teaching about classes and learns that there is a bourgeois truth and a working-class truth; better still, that the functioning of our minds should be different according to whether we are working men or bourgeois." Again, in contrast to the clerc of old, for whom his homeland was a spiritual realm, the modern clerc asserts that he is first of all a member of a nation, a race, a class of which he claims to be the spokesman. “The modern world has made the ‘clerk’ into a citizen...Humanity is national. The layman has won...The ‘clerk’ is not only conquered, he is assimilated. The man of science, the artist, the philosopher are attached to their nations as much as the day-laborer and the merchant.”

Benda links the process of the “nationalization” of the clerc with the gradual demise of Hellenistic metaphysics. He devoted three works to describing this phenomenon: La Fin de l'éternel (1927; The end of the eternal), Essai d'un discours cohérent sur les rapports de Dieu et du monde (1931; Essay on the discourse on the relationship between God and the world), and La Crise du rationalisme (1949; The crisis of rationalism). Although the crisis of rationalism was, as Benda called it, a triumph of “Luther over Erasmus,” it was only after the appearance of German philosophy (especially the philosophies of Schlegel, Fichte, Nietzsche, Lotze) that “Luther’s triumph” became a palpable fact which could be observed in art and literature. In Belphegor (1918), Benda notices that the current public no longer knows how to derive intellectual pleasure from art; it demands instead that art give rise to emotions and sensations. There are essentially three culprits in this situation: the Romantics, the “intuitionists,” and various critics of rationalism. The Romantics declared “artistic sensibility” as the criterion of judgment. As a result a work of art is considered “great as soon it achieves a literary and artistic success,” the intellectual content being of no interest; consequently, when “all arguments are equally defensible... error is no more false than truth” (The Betrayal of the Intellectuals). The authors guilty of “Romanticism” are Mallarmé, Proust, Gide, Valéry, Alain, Giraudoux, Suarès, and the Surrealists (La France byzantine [1945; Byzantine France]). Other culprits are philosophers of a different provenance: Blondel, Lacroix, Rouyer, Gonseth, Bachelard, Le Roy, Rougier, Cuvillier, Brunschvicg, and Lefebvre. All of them rejected “classical rationalism” either as an “inferior form of cognition” on account of its being incapable of “inventing” (La Crise du rationalisme) or, as in the case of the Marxist Lefebvre, as “defective.”

Benda’s true intellectual foe is Henri Bergson. In his three books, Le Bergsonisme, ou, une philosophie de la mobilité (1912; Bergsonism, or, a philosophy of mobilization), Une philosophie pathétique (1913; A pathetic philosophy), and Sur le succès du Bergsonisme (1914; On the success of Bergsonism), Benda attacked Bergson’s concept of “intuition.” However, what in Bergson was an intellectual error became a real threat from the American “apostle” of pragmatism, William James: after over 20 centuries of humankind’s being taught that the morality of an action lies in its disinterestedness, James declared that the moral is that which fits the circumstances.

Benda’s analysis does not stop at the theoretical level, however. The changes which the new intellectual movements brought about in the 19th century lie at the root of the political and social crises in which Europe found itself in the middle of that century. Having rejected the Hellenistic idea of the timeless Absolute, the modern clerc found his vocation in exalting the value of that which exists only “in time”—namely, a nation. It was not until the middle of the 19th century—called by Benda “the age of the intellectual organization of political hatred”—that nations began to see themselves as bearers of Truth in the name of which they fought wars. Benda is far from expressing a naive view of the peaceful coexistence of nations in the past. However, as he observes, in contrast to the 19th century, wars had been for the most part motivated by a desire to annex the other's territory or to extend one's own political control over another nation; they were essentially the wars of kings. In the 19th century wars became an instrument of demonstrating the "cultural superiority" of one nation over another. "This form of patriotism was so little known to preceding ages that there are countless examples of nations adopting the cultures of other nations, even of those with whom they were at war, and in addition reverencing the culture adopted" (The Betrayal of the Intellectuals).

As a result of the growing need for a "unified Europe" in response to the nationalistic tendencies that led to World War I, Benda published Discours à la nation européenne (1933; Discourse on the European nation). He scornfully rejected the European project, finding it to be nothing but an empty idea ("pure reason has never founded anything in the terrestrial order"). Those who had such a dream in the past (Emperor Justinian, Charlemagne, Charles V) were either actual or aspiring tyrants. The new dreamers, like the old, "completely ignore the fact that Europe's peoples have their respective histories, their ideas, their languages." Europe is a spiritual realm; if the European project is ever to come true, its proponents need first to repudiate the myth of Marx (who conceived of man as a product of economic relationships) on behalf of the myth of Plato, who believed man to be first and foremost a spiritual being.

Most of Benda's works did not survive much beyond their author's death, and only a handful are known today by their titles. What remains truly durable in Benda's output is his book-length essay on intellectuals. Benda had written it before the "Great Conversion" of intellectuals to fascism, Nazism, and communism. Most of the names (Mommsen, Treitschke, Ostwald, Brunetière, Barrès, Lemaître, Péguy, Maurras, D'Annunzio, Kipling) and historical events (e.g. the Dreyfus Affair) which served Benda as the material to formulate his thesis, do not say much to a contemporary reader. Yet, if Benda's The Betrayal of the Intellectuals did not share the fate of his other works, it is due to the correctness of his diagnosis of the reasons which lie at the root of the Great Betrayal.

ZBIGNIEW JANOWSKI

Biography

Born 26 (some sources say 28) December 1867 in Paris. Studied at the Lycées Charlemagne, 1876–84, Condorcet, from 1884, Henri IV, 1884–87, Saint-Louis, 1887–88, and the École Centrale, 1888–91; military service, 1891–92; the Sorbonne, 1891–94, licence in history, 1894. Contributor to various periodicals, including Revue Blanche (White review), Revue de Paris (Paris review), Nouvelle Revue Française (New French review), Mercur de France (Mercury of France), Divan, and Le Figaro. Frequented the salon of Simone Casimir-Périer. Went bankrupt, 1913. Lectured at various American universities, 1936–38. Lived in Carcassonne during World War II. Married late in life. Commander, Legion of Honor, 1938. Died in Fontenay-aux-Roses, near Paris, 7 June 1956.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Dialogues à Byzance, 1900

Mon premier Testament, 1910

Le Bergsonisme, ou, une philosophie de la mobilité, 1912

Une philosophie pathétique, 1913

Sur le succès du Bergsonisme, 1914

Les Sentiments de Critias (articles), 1917

Belphegor: Essai sur l'esthétique de la présente société française, 1918; as Belphegor, translated by Sarah J.I.Lawson, 1929

Billets de Sirius (articles), 1915

Lettres à Mélisande, 1925

La Fin de l'éternel, 1927

La Trahison des clercs, 1927; as The Great Betrayal, and as The Treason of the Intellectuals, translated by Richard Aldington, 1928; as The Betrayal of the Intellectuals, 1955

Essai d'un discours cohérent sur les rapports de Dieu et du monde, 1931

Esquisse d'une histoire des Français dans leur volonté d'être une nation, 1932

Discours à la nation européenne, 1933

Précision, 1930–1937 (articles), 1937

Le Rapport d'Uriel, 1943

La Grande Épreuve des démocraties: Essai sur les principes démocratiques, leur nature, leur histoire, leur valeur philosophique, 1945

La France byzantine; ou, Le Triomphe de la littérature pure, Mallarmé, Gide, Proust, Valéry, Alain, Giraudoux, Suarès, les surréalistes: Essai d'une psychologie originelle du littéraire, 1945

Les Cahiers d'un clerc (1936–1949), 1949

La Crise du rationalisme, 1949

Other writings: three novels (L'Ordination [The Yoke of Pity], 1911–12; Les Amorandes, 1922; Songes d'Eleuthère, 1949), a collection of short stories, autobiography, and works on politics, philosophy, and literature. Also edited the Œuvres complètes by La Bruyère and the Dictionnaire philosophique by Voltaire.

Further Reading

Aron, Raymond, The Opium of the Intellectuals, Lanham, Maryland: University Press of America, 1985 (original French edition, 1955)

Furet, François, Le Passé d'une illusion: Essai sur l'idée communiste au XXe siècle, Paris: Laffont/Lévy, 1995

Kołakowski, Leszek, Bergson, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1985:88–93

Kołakowski, Leszek, "The Intellectuals," in his Modernity on Endless Trial, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1990:32–43

Niess, Robert J., Julien Benda, Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1956

Read, Herbert, Introduction to The Betrayal of the Intellectuals by Benda, Boston: Beacon Press, 1955:xiii-xxxii

Bengtsson, Frans G.

Swedish, 1894–1954

Frans G. Bengtsson was the pre-eminent Swedish essayist of the 20th century, successful as the first practitioner of the informal essay in Sweden. Bengtsson associated with literary circles formed at the University of Lund in the early part of the 20th century, although his indifferent performance as a student camouflaged a brilliant mind later given full rein in his essays.

Bengtsson won a large reading public with his historical novel, Röde orm (1941–45; The Long Ships), a work considered by some to have contributed to a reawakening of interest in Viking civilization. He was particularly interested in history, as many of the essays demonstrate, being in some sense historical or based on historical incidents or people. In the 1920s he began publishing historical sketches in the Swedish periodical Ord och Bild (Word and picture), the first of which dealt with Joseph Conrad (1924). It was with his first volume of essays, Litteratörer och militärer (1929; Literary and military figures), that his career as an essayist blossomed. The collection contains several historical sketches, as well as pieces of literary criticism and literary history. Subjects include Sir Walter Scott, sagas, and King Charles XII of Sweden (whose biography he also wrote). He was also interested in historic figures from the American Civil War such as Abraham Lincoln, Jeb Stuart, and Nathan Bedford Forrest. Subsequent essay collections include Silversköldarna (1931; The silver shields), De långhåriga merovingerna (1933; The long-haired Merovingians), Sällskap för en eremit (1938; Company for a hermit), För nöjes skull (1947; For pleasure's sake), and the posthumous Folk som sjöng (1955; People who sang), as well as a volumes of selected essays in Swedish and in translation (A Walk to an Ant Hill, 1950).

Bengtsson was an intensely personal writer, indeed reserved to the point of being secretive. Anyone looking for biographical information will find little available. Whether this reflects his pessimistic philosophy and aestheticism is a matter of conjecture. Swedish critics have pointed out parallels with both Klara Johanson and German idealism, going back to Schopenhauer. Others have identified Bengtsson as both an aesthete and an entertainer.

Bengtsson's use of language, his diction, his large vocabulary, and the literary quality of his formulations are clear indications of why he has not been surpassed by his countrymen as an essayist. He characteristically quotes in foreign languages, but nonetheless carries his learning lightly, managing to combine an encyclopedic knowledge with a relaxed, informal tone and style. As Alrik Gustafson describes in A History of Swedish Literature (1961), Bengtsson's essays are an amalgam of "the whimsicalities of Charles Lamb, the vigor and independence of spirit of William Hazlitt, and the heroic-romantic idealism of Robert Louis Stevenson." His progress through an essay can best be described as leisurely, displaying a penchant for tangents, interjections, and personal reflections. He writes with charm and enthusiasm, particularly for historical subjects. Apart from his historical sketches, his subject matter ranges widely—from the art of lying, detective literature, and chess playing, to battles between red and black ants, ghost stories, and a childhood visit to a photographer—the more exotic and whimsical the better.

In addition to being an essayist, Bengtsson was a successful translator, translating into Swedish such works as Henry David Thoreau's Walden and John Milton's Paradise Lost. In both his essays and translations, Bengtsson was a storyteller and was thus not necessarily aiming for historical accuracy. His work has been “unparalleled”—deserved praise for both the translations and the essays.

P.M.MITCHELL

Biography

Frans Gunnar Bengtsson. Born 4 October 1894 in Tossjö, near Kristianstad. Studied at the University of Lund, fil.kand., 1920, fil.lic., 1930. Married Gerda Fineman, 1939. Died in Ribbingsfors, 19 December 1954.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Litteratörer och militärer, 1929

Silversköldarna, och andra essayer, 1931

De långhåriga merovingerna, och andra essayer, 1933

Sällskap för en eremit, 1938

För nöjes skull, 1947

A Walk to an Ant Hill and Other Essays, translated by Michael Roberts and Elspeth Schubert, 1950

Tankar i gröngräset (selected essays), 1953

Folk som sjöng, och andra essayer, 1955

Äreräddning för Campeadoren (selected articles), 1986

Other writings: novels (including Röde orm [The Long Ships], 1941–45), poetry, a two-volume biography of King Charles XII of Sweden (1935–36), and memoirs (1953). Also translated several works, including Milton's Paradise Lost.

Collected works edition: Samlade skrifter, 1950–55.

Further Reading

Ehnmark, Elof, Frans G. Bengtsson, Stockholm: Norstedt, 1946

Harrie, Ivar, Legenden om Bengtsson, Stockholm: Norstedt, 1971

Lundkvist, A., Frans G. Bengtsson, essayisten, Stockholm: Tiden, 1941

Thompson, L.S., “Frans G. Bengtsson, 1894–1954,” Kentucky Foreign Language Quarterly 2 (1955)

Benjamin, Walter

German, 1892–1940

Walter Benjamin is one of the central essayists of the German-Jewish intellectual tradition. Born and raised in Berlin in a bourgeois household representing both stability and confinement, Benjamin grew into a critic of literature, Western philosophy, and contemporary European culture. His oeuvre consists of hundreds of essays on literature, culture, history, and philosophy as well as book reviews and records of his travels throughout Europe. Benjamin was not in the strict sense a philosopher, nor entirely a creative writer, but a hybrid author who fused his philosophical as well as creative talents. These in turn were often intermingled with early German Romantic ideas on language and translation, Jewish mysticism, and Marxist materialism.

His persona as cultural critic was formed in the years of childhood and youth in Berlin, where the Wilhelmian environment provided both conservatism and confinement. Benjamin's powerful sense of cultural criticism was ignited while participating in the traditional German educational system, notable for its academic rigor and excellence, but also for its suppression of originality and creativity. Benjamin's involvement in educational reform under the auspices of the Youth Movement (1912–17) was instrumental to his future role as cultural critic as well as intellectual and social outsider. His articles of 1913 in the youth journal Der Anfang (The beginning) consistently address issues of repression as well as the multifaceted hypocrisies of bourgeois life.

By means of cultural criticism, the early Benjamin developed a challenging methodology of cognition which earned him mostly criticism from the contemporary German academic establishment. His friends at the Institute for Social Research in Frankfurt-on-Main, including Max Horkheimer and Theodor W. Adorno, were often puzzled by Benjamin's opaque visions and representations. Critical and anti-systematic thinking for Benjamin was the central and almost metaphysical pillar from which he set out as essayist, and to which he returned at the end of most essays. In his well-known essays on Charles Baudelaire, Marcel Proust, Franz Kafka, and Karl Kraus, critical thought is directed and informed by its relation to the autonomous work of art. However, the traditional notions of this autonomy are curiously short-circuited by Benjamin's powerful reflections on the fragmentary constellation of 19th-century and contemporary European culture. For Benjamin, literary works are "irreducible as deeds"; it is to this philosophical and literary complexity that his many essays on writers from the French, German, and Russian literary tradition of Modernism speak.

1924 was a decisive year for Benjamin in his development from eclectic philosopher to more politically engaged essayist as the political force field of the Weimar Republic became more overtly established. His essays of this time were influenced by Marxist dialectical materialism—strangely wed, however, to early Romantic language theories. The collection of this period, Einbahnstrasse (1928; One-Way Street), pays homage to the surrealist avant-garde tradition of representation which would be crucial to his later and most central, yet also most controversial project, Das Passagenwerk (The Arcades project). As the essays of One-Way Street already suggest, objects or marginalia of daily life rather than Platonic ideas would from then on provide the discursive ground from which the most pressing, yet also the most decentering and fragmentary, experiences of Modernism were to be evaluated and rewritten. Moreover, by introducing collage and montage into the essayistic structures of textual representation, Benjamin inaugurated a new way of writing history—the materialist history of modernity as seen from an essayist’s perspective.

Modernism as an aesthetic, philosophical, and cultural phenomenon emerged during the 19th century. For Benjamin this historical moment, when long-cherished symbolic affinities in the material and ideistic world began to crumble, revealed layers of meaning which could then be explored and represented in more fragmentary and allegorical ways. From One-Way Street to the curious Passagenwerk Benjamin explores how meaning is primarily constructed and suspended in relation to objects of daily life which, ordained as “profane illuminations,” hold their own ground as both entirely real and entirely imaginary. Thus Benjamin’s essayistic work addresses in incisive prose the most challenging questions and representational concerns of the German, French, and Russian traditions of Modernism.

At the point of intersection between eclectic philosophy and cultural criticism, Benjamin creates in the almost two thousand pages of the Passagenwerk a materialist philosophy of history consisting of thousands of quotations, reflections, and essays on 19th-century Paris. This test ground for the emergence of Modernism on all fronts represents a collection of raw data in addition to reflective essays and aphorisms rather than a consistent and more traditional univocal narrative. Much like the essay in Montaigne’s tradition of skepticism, understood in the etymological sense of “seeing” and “perceiving,” Benjamin’s essays challenge the boundaries and limits of traditional forms of thought and representation. Readers of this work are forced into a curious paradoxical position: they must both reconstruct and create elements of a former dialogue of cultural construction which in a univocal way will never again be accessible. It is against this curious representational paradox and silence that Benjamin’s work begins to resonate.

Benjamin will always be remembered for his courage to remain a visionary as well as an intellectual outsider somewhere, as he himself put it, “in the folds of time.”

MARION DOEBELING

Biography

Walter Benedix Schönflies Benjamin. Born 15 July 1891 in Berlin. Studied at the Universities of Freiburg, 1912, Berlin, 1913, Munich, 1915–17, Berne, Ph.D., 1919, and Frankfurt-on-Main, thesis rejected, 1925. Married Sophie Pollak, 1917 (divorced, 1930); one son. Contributor to various journals, from the early 1920s. Visited Russia, 1926–27. Forced to leave Germany when the Nazis rose to power, 1933; lived in Paris. Associated with the Institute for Social Research, Frankfurt-on-Main, 1934–37, and wrote for its journal Zeitschrift für Sozialforschung (Journal for social research). Attempted to escape

Nazi regime by emigrating to the United States via Spain, but committed suicide when in danger of being betrayed to the Gestapo. Died (suicide by morphine overdose) in Port Bou, 26 September 1940.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Einbahnstrasse, 1928; as One-Way Street, in One-Way Street, and Other Writings, translated by Edmund Jephcott and Kingsley Shorter, 1979

Illuminationen: Ausgewählte Schriften, edited by Siegfried Unseld, 1961; as Illuminations, edited by Hannah Arendt, translated by Harry Zohn, 1968

Goethes Wahlverwandtschaften, 1964

Zur Kritik der Gewalt und andere Aufsätze, 1965

Versuche über Brecht, edited by Rolf Tiedemann, 1966; as Understanding Brecht, translated by Anna Bostock, 1973

Angelus novus, 1966

Über Literatur, 1969

Charles Baudelaire: Ein Lyriker im Zeitalter des Hochkapitalismus, edited by Rolf Tiedemann, 1969; as Charles Baudelaire: A Poet in the Era of High Capitalism, translated by Harry Zohn, 1973

Berliner Chronik, edited by Gershom Scholem, 1970

Drei Hörmodelle, 1971

Der Stratege im Literaturkampf: Zu Literaturwiss, edited by Hella Tiedemann-Bartels, 1974

Aussichten: Illustrierte Aufsätze, 1977

Reflections: Essays, Aphorisms, Autobiographical Writings, edited by Peter Demetz, translated by Edmund Jephcott, 1978

One-Way Street, and Other Writings, translated by Edmund Jephcott and Kingsley Shorter, 1979

Moskauer Tagebuch, edited by Gary Smith, 1980; as Moscow Diary, edited by Gary Smith, translated by Richard Sieburth, 1985

Benjamin über Kafka: Texte, Briefzeugnisse, Aufzeichnungen, edited by Hermann Schweppenhäuser, 1981

Passagenwerk, vol. 5 of Gesammelte Schriften, edited by Rolf Tiedemann, 1983; part as “N [Re the Theory of Knowledge, Theory of Progress],” translated by Leigh Hafrey and Richard Sieburth Smith, in Walter Benjamin: Philosophy, Aesthetics, History, edited by Gary Smith, 1989

Other writings: works on language, and correspondence (collected and translated in The Correspondence of Walter Benjamin, 1910–1940, 1994). Also translated works by Charles Baudelaire and others.

Collected works edition: Gesammelte Schriften, edited by Rolf Tiedemann and Hermann Schweppenhäuser, 7 vols., 1971–89.

Bibliographies

Nordquist, Joan, Walter Benjamin, Santa Cruz, California: Reference and Research

Services, 1989

Smith, Gary, "Walter Benjamin in English: A Bibliography of Translations," in Walter Benjamin: Philosophy, Aesthetics, History, edited by Smith, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1989

Further Reading

- Adorno, Theodor W., "Benjamin the Letter Writer," in Notes to Literature, vol. 2, edited by Rolf Tiedemann, New York: Columbia University Press, 1992
- Alter, Robert, Necessary Angels: Tradition and Modernity in Kafka, Benjamin, and Scholem, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, and Cincinnati: Hebrew Union College Press, 1991
- Arendt, Hannah, Introduction to Illuminations by Benjamin, edited by Arendt, New York: Harcourt Brace and World, 1968
- Buck-Morss, Susan, The Dialectics of Seeing: Walter Benjamin and the Arcades Project, Cambridge, Massachusetts: MIT Press, 1991
- Bullock, Marcus Paul, Romantidsm and Marxism: The Philosophical Development of Literary Theory and Literary History in Walter Benjamin and Friedrich Schlegel, New York: Lang, 1987
- Cohen, Margaret, Profane Illumination: Walter Benjamin and the Paris of Surreal Revolution, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1993
- Frisby, David, Fragments of Modernity: Theories of Modernity in the Work of Simmel, Kracauer, and Benjamin, Cambridge: Polity Press, 1985; Cambridge, Massachusetts: MIT Press, 1986
- Gilloch, Graeme, Myth and Metropolis: Walter Benjamin and the City, Cambridge: Polity Press, and Cambridge, Massachusetts: Blackwell, 1996
- Handelman, Susan A., Fragments of Redemption: Jewish Thought and Literary Theory in Benjamin, Scholem, and Levinas, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1991
- Jennings, Michael William, Dialectical Images: Walter Benjamin's Theory of Literary Criticism, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1987
- McCole, John, Walter Benjamin and the Antinomies of Tradition, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1993
- Mitchell, Stanley, Introduction to Understanding Brecht by Benjamin, London: Verso, 1983
- Nägele, Rainer, editor, Benjamin's Ground: New Readings of Walter Benjamin, Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1988
- Nägele, Rainer, Theater, Theory, Speculation: Walter Benjamin and the Scenes of Modernity, Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1991
- New German Critique* issue on Benjamin, 39 (Fall 1986)
- Scholem, Gershom, Walter Benjamin: The Story of a Friendship, Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America, 1981; London: Faber, 1982 (original German edition, 1975)
- Smith, Gary, editor, On Walter Benjamin: Critical Essays and Recollections, Cambridge, Massachusetts: MIT Press, 1988
- Smith, Gary, editor, Walter Benjamin: Philosophy, Aesthetics, History, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1989
- Witte, Bernd, Walter Benjamin: An Intellectual Biography, Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1991 (original German edition, 1976)

Wolin, Richard, Walter Benjamin, an Aesthetic of Redemption, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1994 (original edition, 1982)

Benn, Gottfried

German, 1886–1956

The importance of the essay form varied with each period in Gottfried Benn's life. He particularly favored prose in situations of crisis; his use of the essay in the crucial period of the 1930s, for example, is not only a preference for the essay form, but also for its potential readership, since the essay reaches a much wider audience than poetry. Over half of all Benn's essays appeared between 1930 and 1934, when he found himself forced from the position of the outsider to that of a crucially important participant in the conflict between Left and Right.

Benn was never a typical essayist: his greatest achievement was to place current situations into historical, even anthropological frameworks and thus create surprising perspectives. He was a superb stylist, even when his vocabulary at times obscured his subject. He was a master of darkly fascinating statements, but he was a poet rather than a thinker. His essays cannot be compared in argumentative originality and lucidity with those of Robert Musil, Hermann Broch, or Thomas Mann, and many critics have in fact emphasized the stylistic proximity of these essays to poetry, while others have charged that they misuse an essentially philosophical form. Benn's method, to replace logical content with lyrical images, does give his essays a certain monotony, and occasionally betrays intellectual and stylistic sloppiness and carelessness.

A major problem in these essays is the question of public and private, of representative and subjective viewpoints. Indeed, Benn's first essay, Das moderne Ich (1920; The modern self), hovers between the two spheres. On the one hand it is a "public" speech to students of the natural sciences, intended to give an overview of the post-World War I mentality. On the other hand, the shift from politics to the "inner" emotional and spiritual life already betrays Benn's preferences. Benn reveals a more political side in his next major essay, "Neben dem Schriftstellerberuf" (1927; Beside the profession of writer), when he not only affirms the asocial and nihilistic nature of art, but also presents himself as an opponent of the Weimar Republic, though it is as yet difficult to place him in either a leftist or rightist camp.

Increasingly in the late 1920s Benn's interest turned to the definition of art and the artist. In "Totenrede für Klabund" (1928; Eulogy for Klabund), he stresses the sense of mission of the artist, contending that the artist lives between social levels, despised and unknown, while himself a despiser. It was precisely because of this constellation that Benn was vulnerable to the temptation to seek a recognition which lies outside the realm of art, and can only be bestowed at the terrible price of political compromise.

A first indication of the increasing polarization of the German literary scene in fact involved Max Herrmann-Neisse's review of Benn's prose in Die neue Bücherschau (The new book review) in 1929. Herrmann-Neisse's enthusiastic comments included a derogatory remark against literary suppliers of political propaganda materials and the claim that Benn was more “revolutionary” than the propaganda writers on the Left. Two of the magazine’s contributors reacted with a letter to the editor, in which they resigned. Benn himself was invited to respond to these letters and did so in his essay “Über die Rolle des Schriftstellers in dieser Zeit” (1929; Concerning the role of the writer in this era). In 1930 there followed “Zur Problematik des Dichterischen” (On the problem of the poetic), Benn’s first full-blown poetic “theory” in which he concludes that at no time has art been able to fit into a contemporary context, nor have artists been able to influence the contemporary scene. Rather, the poet-artist is a purveyor of dreams and visions, the prophet of ecstatic existence.

Benn was able to conceive of his idea of the poet as having access to archaic visions because of his “geological” interpretation of the personality, which he presented in “Der Aufbau der Persönlichkeit” (1930; The structure of personality). Here he argues for a new image of man built on the latest developments in psychoanalysis, psychiatry, biology, and anthropology. Benn makes Jung’s theory of the collective unconscious the basis for his belief that earlier stages of human development can be accessed in privileged states, such as under the influence of drugs or in a trance. Two further ideas are introduced: that of mutation and that of the phenotype and genotype. His belief in the biological and geological nature of personality allowed him to see the history of humankind in terms of “natural” history. This idea suggested to him that Germany in 1933 entered a phase of mutation, and therefore allowed him to embrace the Nazi doctrine.

Benn’s next collection of essays, Fazit der Perspektiven (1930; The balance sheet of perspectives), met with considerable antagonism. Moreover, in 1931 there took place the incident which some critics have seen as the main reason for Benn’s ultimate decision to move into the rightist camp: his speech at the banquet of the Schutzverband Deutscher Schriftsteller on the occasion of Heinrich Mann’s 60th birthday. Benn’s attempt to pass over completely Mann’s political convictions, and instead to celebrate the earlier, late Romantic and “aesthetic” Mann, met with massive rejection not only in the leftist press but elsewhere as well. In response to the attacks by primarily leftist writers, Benn inevitably found himself in the conservative camp; once there, it was difficult to extract himself from it, as the essays in Nach dem Nihilismus (1932; After nihilism) demonstrate.

Much has been written about the events which in 1933 led to Benn’s complete accommodation with the Nazi regime. Whether his reactions were purely emotional or he placed his hope for social and cultural stability on the Nazi regime, whether opportunism or political blindness, is difficult to ascertain. More than with any other essay, perhaps, critics have had difficulty with “Dorische Welt” (1934; The Doric world), the glorification of the militaristic and eugenic values of the world of Sparta. Benn does not advance our knowledge of the Doric world beyond the positions of Nietzsche and Jacob Christoph Burckhardt; the essay’s force lies in the positive interpretation of Sparta and the parallels Benn provides with the contemporary scene. It is difficult to determine whether or not the piece is blatant propaganda for the Hitler state or the first obvious break with its ideology. History itself has played a role in our assessment of what Benn advances in this essay, yet many critics remain unreconciled to the idea that Benn, as he wrote affirmatively of the virtues of Sparta, anticipated the Nazi state and its death camps.

Benn's efforts to ingratiate himself with the new regime did not prevent him from falling victim to the relentless drive for uniformity of the Nazi ideology. His clinging to a special status for the artist, his defense of certain traditions of which he felt himself part, notably the expressionist movement, caused him, in 1936, to be accused of "Artistik." The publication of his Ausgewählte Gedichte (1936; Selected poems) then provoked the scandal which removed him definitively from the scene he had, perhaps reluctantly in the beginning, occupied in so controversial a fashion. With the collapse of his forum and his readership, Benn almost completely abandoned the genre until after 1945.

1949 saw the publication of Ausdruckswelt (Expressive world), a number of essays Benn had written during the period when he was forbidden to publish. They portray him in the old situation of critic of contemporary situations, as dissector and interpreter, but recent events have changed his attitude: his tone is milder, gentler, almost elegiac. The hoped-for mutation, the new race has not been realized. But if it is true that Benn now attacks the Nazis, he also criticizes the German people as a whole, using the criterion not only of nationalism, but also of archaism and barbarism.

Most of the essays take up familiar themes from the 1920s and 1930s, dealing with the dialectic between nihilism and "Artistik." Benn sees in the rejection of the immediate European past a prerequisite for new art. In "Provoziertes Leben" (1943; A provoked life), he claims that salvation lies in a return to "das Primäre" (the primeval), to the prelogical which would do away with the schizoid split in modern man. In the essay "Pallas" (1943), Benn makes the motherless goddess the symbol of the initial separation between form and formlessness. The goddess becomes not the symbol of nature, but of Geist (spirit or intellect). Both come together in the creative act, which, however, is no longer concerned with "natural" nature, but "thinking" nature, or "stylized" nature—in other words, art.

If Benn's autobiography Doppelleben (1950; Double life) generally found an ambivalent response, the same cannot be said of critical reactions to "Probleme der Lyrik" (1959; Problems of poetry), which originated as a lecture at the University of Marburg in 1951. Many critics have seen in this text a key to the understanding of Benn's poetic practice not only of the late phase, but of his whole career. Benn situates modern poetry squarely in the hallucinatory-constructive tradition, and reacts, consistently with his beliefs expressed both in the lyric poetry and in the essays of the 1930s and 1940s, to the mixing of sociological and poetological categories in poetry.

Benn's insistence in "Probleme der Lyrik" that modern poetry is monologic in essence reiterates a theme he had elaborated in the essays of the 1930s. In "Altern als Problem für Künstler" (1954; "Artists and Old Age") and "Über mich selbst" (1956; About myself), no further shifts of position can be discerned in his religious beliefs, nor in his poetic theory and practice. "Über mich selbst" in fact effortlessly returns to the definition of the "lyrisches Ich" (the lyric "I") of more than 30 years before.

AUGUSTINUS P.DIERICK

Biography

Born 2 May 1886 in Mansfeld. Studied philosophy and theology at the University of Marburg, 1903–04; medicine at the University of Berlin, 1904–05; medicine at the Kaiser Wilhelm Academy, Berlin, 1905–12, Ph.D., 1912. Worked at a hospital, and as a ship's physician, 1912–13. Served in the army: discharged for health problems, 1912; served in the army medical corps, 1914–18, 1935–45: awarded the Iron Cross (second class), 1914. Married Edith Brosin, 1914 (died, 1922): one daughter and one stepson. Skin and venereal diseases specialist, Berlin, after 1917. Supported National Socialism, from 1932, but renounced the National Socialist Party, 1934. Briefly appointed by Nazis acting chair of literary section, Prussian Academy of Arts, 1933. Denounced at various times throughout the 1930s and 1940s by Nazis, Communists, and Democrats. Works banned, 1938–48. Married Herta von Wedemeyer, 1938 (committed suicide, 1945). Ran a private medical practice, Berlin, from 1945. Married Ilse Kaul, 1946. Awards: Büchner Prize, 1951; Order of Merit (Federal Republic of Germany), 1952. Died (of cancer) in Bad Schlangenbad, 7 July 1956.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Das moderne Ich, 1920

Gesammelte Prosa, 1928

Fazit der Perspektiven, 1930

Nach dem Nihilismus, 1932

Der neue Staat und die Intellektuellen, 1933

Kunst und Macht, 1934

Ausdruckswelt: Essays und Aphorismen, 1949

Frühe Prosa und Reden, 1950

Dr. Rönne: Frühe Prosa, 1950

Essays, 1951

Primal Vision: Selected Writings (includes poetry, essays, short stories, and dramatic sketches), edited by E.B.Ashton, 1960

Medizinische Schriften, edited by Werner Rube, 1965

Weinhaus Wolf und andere Prosa, 1967

Das Gottfried-Benn-Brevier: Aphorismen, Reflexionen, Maximen aus Werken und Briefen, edited by Jürgen P.Wallmann, 1979

Prose, Essays, Poetry (various translators), edited by Volkmar Sander, 1987

Other writings: poetry, plays, correspondence, and the autobiography Doppelleben (1950).

Collected works editions: Gesammelte Werke, edited by Dieter Wellershoff, 4 vols., 1958–61; Gesammelte Werke in der Fassung der Erstdrucke, edited by Bruno Hillebrand, 1983–90; Sämtliche Werke, edited by Gerhard Schuster, 5 vols., 1986–91 (in progress).

Bibliographies

Dierick, A.P., Gottfried Benn and His Critics: Major Interpretations, 1912–1992,

Columbia, South Carolina: Camden House, 1992:84–106

Lohner, Edgar, "Gottfried Benn-Bibliographie, 1912–1955," Philobiblon: Eine

Vierteljahrsschrift für Buch- und GraphikSammler 1 (1957):59–70

Lohner, Edgar, and Timm Zenner, Gottfried Benn: Bibliographie, 1910–1956, Munich: Cicero Presse, 1985

Schönemann, Peter, and Oskar Sahlberg, “Bibliographie Gottfried Benn,” Text+Kritik 44 (1985):156–66

Über Gottfried Benn: Kritische Stimmen 1986, vol. 2, edited by Bruno Hillebrand, Frankfurt-on-Main: Fischer, 1987:436–507

Further Reading

Alter, Reinhard, Gottfried Benn: The Artist and Politics (1910–1934), Berne and Frankfurt-on-Main: Lang, 1976

Alter, Reinhard, “Gottfried Benn—zwischen Weimarer Republik und Bundesrepublik,” in “Die Mühen der Ebene”: Kontinuität und Wandel in der deutschen Literatur und Gesellschaft 1945–1949, edited by Bernd Hüppauf, Heidelberg: Winter, 1981

Balser, Hans-Dieter, Das Problem des Nihilismus im Werke Gottfried Benns, Bonn: Bouvier, 1970 (original edition, 1965)

Bense, Max, “Gottfried Benn: Kunst und Macht,” Europäische Revue II (1935):560–62

Dierick, A.P., Gottfried Benn and His Critics: Major Interpretations, 1912–1992, Columbia, South Carolina: Camden House, 1992

Ervail, François, “Gottfried Benn ou la double vie des intellectuels allemands,” Les Temps Modernes 103 (1954)

Exner, Richard, “Zum Problem einer Definition und einer Methodik des Essays als dichterischer Kunstform,” Neophilologus 46 (1962):169–82

Eykman, Christoph, “Der Verlust der Geschichte in der deutschen Literatur des zwanzigsten Jahrhunderts,” Neophilologus 55 (1971):58–72

Garnier, Pierre, Gottfried Benn, Paris: Silvaire, 1959

Grimm, Reinhold, “Ergriffen und dennoch unbeteiligt: Über Gottfried Benns Verhältnis zur Geschichte,” Welt und Wort 14 (1961):269–73

Grundlehner, Philip, The Lyrical Bridge: Essays from Hölderlin to Benn, Rutherford, New Jersey: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1979

Hartung, Günter, “Über die deutsche faschistische Literatur,” Weimarer Beiträge 14 (1968):146–52

Heller, Erich, “Gottfried Benns Hordenzauber,” Die neue Weltbühne 2 (1933):688–91

Jens, Inge, Dichter zwischen Rechts und Links: Die Geschichte der Sektion für Dichtkunst an der Preussischen Akademie der Künste dargestellt nach den Dokumenten, Leipzig: Kiepenheuer, 1994 (original edition, 1971)

Kügler, Hans, “Künstler und Geschichte im Werk Gottfried Benns,” in his Weg und Weglosigkeit: Neun Essays zur Geschichte der deutschen Literatur im Zwanzigsten Jahrhundert, Heidenheim: Heidenheimer Verlagsanstalt, 1970:77–104

Mann, Klaus, “Gottfried Benn: Die Geschichte einer Verirrung,” Das Wort 9 (1937):35–42

Mannzen, Walter, “Die Stunde Gottfried Benns: Die Essays,” Frankfurter Hefte 5 (1950):550–53

Rohner, Ludwig, “Gottfried Benn: ‘Dorische Welt,’” in his Der deutsche Essay: Materialien zur Geschichte und Ästhetik einer literarischen Gattung, Neuwied and Berlin: Luchterhand, 1966: 259–80

Wuthenow, Ralph-Rainer, “Literaturkritik, Tradition und Politik: Zum deutschen Essay in der Zeit der Weimarer Republik,” in Die deutsche Literatur in der Weimarer Republik, edited by Wolfgang Rothe, Stuttgart: Reclam, 1974:434–57

Bense, Max

German, 1910–1990

“Such prose clarifies and vivifies the objects of which it is talking and which it seeks to perceive and communicate, but at the same time such prose is talking about itself, communicates itself as an authentic state of mind...” wrote German philosopher and literary critic Max Bense, describing the essay (“Über den Essay und seine Prosa” [1947; On the essay and its prose]). Having produced numerous essays on topics ranging from the sciences to art and literary criticism, Bense viewed the essay as an expression of the experimental method of thinking and writing—similar to the role of the essay during the 18th-century Enlightenment. What distinguishes his theoretical approach from those of his predecessors, however, is the clear notion that any successful essay creates a certain atmosphere that builds a relationship between the subject matter discussed and the author as well as the reader, an atmosphere which allows the reader to draw further insights. The goal of an essay therefore should be to sum up all possible configurations in which the subject matter can be perceived. Moreover, while the essay is written in prose, it can also become poetry. In each essay there are certain basic sentences, seeds, which are concurrently prosaic and poetic. An essay can therefore never be a theory in itself, it can only be the beginnings, the birth of a theory, if the interaction between the atmosphere created by the essay and the author or reader is productive and thus leads to critical insights on the subject matter.

It is especially in his capacity as a critic that Bense’s theoretical work has been so beneficial for literary theory and criticism as well as for philosophy. Even though he is one of the most quoted authors in German intellectual life, Bense’s voluminous work has not yet become the subject of a comprehensive monograph. Perhaps this is due to the exceptionally wide range of subject matter with which he dealt, making a successful compilation difficult. Even his studies at the Universities of Bonn, Cologne, and Basle ranged from mathematics and physics to philosophy. After World War II, during which he worked as a laboratory physicist, he combined these three fields as a professor of mathematical logic and the philosophy of technology. Striving for justice and equality, he first took up his professorship in Jena, but soon became disillusioned with developments in the east and moved to Stuttgart in 1949.

Bense’s major achievement for aesthetics and literary theory lies in the innovative connection of art and technology based on Hegel’s aesthetics and Wittgenstein’s speech-theories. He introduced scientific methods to traditional aesthetics resulting in a “technological,” “material” aesthetics which could be applied to art works as well as scientific objects. This combination, formulated especially in the Aesthetica tetralogy (1954–60) and Theorie der Texte (1962; Textual theory), results in a fundamentally new approach to semiotics, which uses theories and sign systems that originate in mathematiccybernetic contexts for language and texts. A “text” can thus be anything that consists of linguistic material, such as advertisements, scientific research, and artistic compositions. Harshly attacked by his opponents, who thought of his entire semiotic approach as being “objectivistic,” “barbaric,” and “anarchic,” Bense nevertheless had a tremendous impact on Germany’s so-called “experimental” literature and literary theories of the 1950s and early 1960s, especially on the movement called “Konkrete Poesie” (concrete poetry), including important authors such as Helmut Heissenbüttel, Eugen Gomringer, and Franz Mon.

Besides all his scientific accomplishments, and despite numerous attacks by critics that he was “too scientific” to be a humanist, Bense was deeply concerned with the question of humanitarian tasks for individuals in modern society. This concern seems particularly lucid in his essays on literature: “If the objective of knowledge lies not only in the objectivity of facts but, as in our society, rather in the external habitable condition of the world, a new type of thinker needs to be developed: a thinker who exhausts the rich possibilities of human intelligence not only as researcher or scholar, but at the same time as critic and as writer. Maybe that thinker could adapt to tasks in our society, a society based on a frightening density of outward communications, and an equally frightening lack of inner communications” (Ein Geräusch in der Strasse: Descartes und die Folgen II [1960; Sound in the street: Descartes and the consequences II]). Bense himself embodied this type of thinker by writing essays on such contemporaries as Gertrude Stein, Francis Ponge, Walter Benjamin, Helmut Heissenbüttel, Alfred Andersch, Ferdinand Lyon, Ludwig Harig, Ernst Jandl, Friederike Mayröcker, and many more, who were all concerned with artistically experimental art forms, and who therefore had the potential to add to the “inner communications” of society. These intimate portraits share one of Bense’s most fundamental insights into literature, also advocated by members of the Frankfurt School (Adorno, Benjamin): “reality” is not a category that can be measured or described in scientific terms. It rather manifests itself in one singular act of reflection, while different literary realities coexist. The (literary) text for Bense becomes the object of different realities, one of which remains to be interpreted by the reader of that text—or by the writer of an essay.

AGNES C.MÜLLER

Biography

Born 7 February 1910 in Strasbourg. Studied mathematics, physics, and philosophy at the University of Bonn, diploma in physics, 1932, and geology, 1933, Ph.D., 1937; Universities of Cologne, 1935–36, and Basle. Industrial physicist for two years. Married Elisabeth Bauer (died, 1939), 1938: one son. Served in the German Air Force, 1939. Editor of a science series, Munich, 1940. Married Maria Bauer (died, 1979), 1944: three daughters. Professor of philosophy, mathematical logic, and the theory of science, University of Jena, 1946–49; professor of the philosophy of technology and the theory of science, Technische Hochschule, Stuttgart, from 1949. Traveled extensively in North America, from 1969. Married Elisabeth Walter, 1988: one daughter. Died in Stuttgart, 29 April 1990.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Aufstand des Geistes: Eine Verteidigung der Erkenntnis, 1935

Vom Wesen deutscher Denker; oder, Zwischen Kritik und Imperativ, 1938

Geist der Mathematik: Abschnitte aus der Philosophie der Arithmetik und Geometrie, 1939

Das Leben der Mathematiker: Bilder aus der Geistesgeschichte der Mathematik, 1944

Umgang mit Philosophen, 1947

Technische Existenz, 1949

Ptolemäer und Mauretanier; oder, Die theologische Emigration der deutschen Literatur, 1950

Plakatwelt: Vier Essays, 1952

Descartes und die Folgen: Ein aktueller Traktat, 1955

Rationalismus und Sensibilität: Präsentationen, 1956

Ein Geräusch in der Strasse: Descartes und die Folgen II, 1960

Ungehorsam der Ideen: Abschliessender Traktat über Intelligenz und technische Welt, 1965

Artistik und Engagement: Präsentation ästhetischer Objekte, 1970

Die Realität der Literatur: Autoren und ihre Texte, 1971

Das Universum der Zeichen: Essays über die Expansionen der Semiotik, 1983

Other writings: poetry, and books on philosophy, aesthetics (including the Aesthetica tetralogy, 1954–60), semiotics, mathematics, and existentialism.

Bibliography

Walter, Elisabeth, Bibliographie der veröffentlichten Schriften von Max Bense, Baden-Baden: Agis, 1994

Further Reading

Rohner, Ludwig, Deutsche Essays: Prosa aus zwei Jahrhunderten, vol. 1, Berlin and Neuwied: Luchterhand 1968:54–69

Benson, A.C.

British, 1862–1925

For nearly 30 years, from the late 1890s to his death in the mid-1920s, A.C.Benson was one of England's most prolific, popular, and respected essayists, although the respect came more from the myriad of general readers who conferred the popularity than from his intellectual and social peers at Eton and Cambridge. A man of letters in the fullest 19th-century sense of the term, he also wrote poetry, fiction, biographies, and personal memoirs, to a total of more than 70 books. His editorial work included a three-volume selection of the correspondence of Queen Victoria (1907). Despite this prodigious output, he is today a largely forgotten figure whose tenuous hold on posthumous reputation rests almost solely on his authorship of the words to “Land of Hope and Glory” (1902), written as an ode to welcome Edward VII to the throne and rapidly transformed, in conjunction with Edward Elgar’s “Pomp and Circumstance March No. 1,” into a surrogate national anthem.

Benson’s essays were essentially lay sermons, musings on spiritual, aesthetic, and existential matters directed always toward salutary, and often consolatory, ends. Even when the content is biographical—as in his first essay collection, entitled simply Essays (1896) and containing 13 biographical sketches, all but one of which had been previously published in periodicals—the eulogistic judgments on worthy lives are upliftingly homiletic. His concluding comment on Edmund Gosse’s poetry (“to have made some exquisite mood your own, and to have presented it with passionate accuracy, is no light achievement”) implicitly glosses the modal intensities of many of his own later essays. Their recording of the fruits of moments of quasi-epiphanic insight generates moralistic conclusions that spoke comfortingly to the emotional needs, particularly in times of despair or bereavement, of his worldwide readership. Among those who found solace in Benson’s work was the poet Wilfred Owen, who recorded his admiration of Where No Fear Was: A Book About Fear (1914), read in 1917 during Owen’s treatment for shellshock at Craiglockhart War Hospital (Simon Wormleighton, 1990).

Benson’s distinctive tone owed much to his 18 years as a schoolmaster at Eton, the legacy of which informs one of his most influential books, The Schoolmaster: A Commentary upon the Aims and Methods of an Assistant-Master in a Public School (1902). Confident in their sense of the importance of the schoolmaster’s vocation, these 16 essays are forthright in their recognition of the frequency with which the ideal and the actual part company, particularly in relation to the two great shibboleths of Victorian educational theory and practice, compulsory team sports and classics. The emphasis on both helps account in Benson’s eyes for the unfortunate fact “that we send out from our public schools year after year many boys who hate knowledge and think books dreary, who are perfectly self-satisfied and entirely ignorant.” The stranglehold retained on school curricula by Greek and Latin was a surprising obsession for a man who had himself achieved distinction as a Cambridge classicist. Among the 18 essays included in At Large (1908), published five years after Benson’s departure from Eton for Cambridge, is “A Speech Day,” in which the former schoolmaster worries again at a familiar bete noire: “to persist in regarding the classics as the high-water mark of the human intellect seems to me to argue a melancholy want of faith in the progress of the race.”

When Benson addresses less pragmatic concerns, the tone becomes more precious, its tenor caught in some of the titles of his most spiritually emotive books: The Thread of Gold (1905), Along the Road (1913), and Joyous Gard (1913). The Thread of Gold, which divides into 42 sections of sentimental and vaguely theological rumination on human circumstance, has as its governing metaphor the observation “that there is a certain golden thread of hope and love interwoven with all our lives, running consistently through the coarsest and darkest fabric.” Similarly, all 62 essays in Along the Road, varied as their notional subjects are (“Old England,” “Mr. Gladstone,” “Compulsory Greek,” “Vulgarity,” “Gossip,” “On Being Interrupted”) rarely move far from the Christian apologetics that inform Benson’s advice to his readers: “...if the loneliest soul on earth, lying in darkness of spirit and pain of body, breathes one voiceless prayer upon the night, the world can never be the same as though that prayer had been unprayed” (“Brain Waves”). The paradoxically effete muscularity of Benson’s message is caught in his explanation of the title attached to the Joyous Gard collection: “I have called this book...Joyous Gard, because it speaks of a stronghold that we can win with our own hands, where we can abide in great content, so long as we are careful not to linger there in sloth and idleness, but are ready to ride abroad at the call for help.”

But this chivalric impulse assumed an intransigently sedentary and privileged form, evidenced nowhere more palpably than in Benson’s most famous and popular collection, From a College Window (1906), comprising 18 essays—12 of them formerly published in Cornhill Magazine—written after his election to a fellowship at Magdalene College, Cambridge. Its appeal, like that of most of his work, can in part be explained by the recurrent rhetorical strategy explained in its opening essay, “The Point of View”: “My desire is but to converse with my readers, to speak as in a comfortable tête-à-tête, of experience, and hope, and patience.” For all the conversational manner, with its blend of the avuncular and the priestly, Benson’s essays, even those charting his own recurrent dark nights of the soul, assume an oracular authority that owes more to class confidence than great intellectual insight. A period in which burgeoning literacy rates and the consequent demand for printed materials of a broadly “improving” kind were not yet matched by a correspondingly widespread enlargement of speculative sophistication may arguably have been the only context in which work like Benson’s could enjoy such an appreciative reception.

The vogue for both Benson and the ruminative essay was passing by the end of World War I, whose cataclysm helped create an audience less deferentially accepting of paternalistic bromides about “how to enjoy life or how to endure it” (“Literature and Life,” Escape, and Other Essays, 1915). Benson’s many books are now little more than period pieces, redolent of the sentimentalized world of male companionship that he fostered and was himself cocooned by at Eton and Magdalene.

KEITH WILSON

Biography

Arthur Christopher Benson. Born 24 April 1862, at Wellington College, Crowthorne, Berkshire. Studied at Temple Grove School, Mortlake, south London, 1872–74; Eton College (King’s scholar), Windsor, Berkshire, 1874–81; King’s College, Cambridge, 1881–84, B.A. in classics, 1884. Taught at Eton College, 1885–1903; fellow, from 1904, president, 1912–15, and master, 1915–25, Magdalene College, Cambridge. Contributor to various journals, including Macmillan’s Magazine, National Review, Contemporary Review, and Cornhill Magazine. Suffered from depression and breakdowns, 1907–09 and 1917–22. Commander, Royal Victorian Order. Died (of heart failure) at Magdalene College, Cambridge, 17 June 1925.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Essays, 1896

The Schoolmaster: A Commentary upon the Aims and Methods of an Assistant-Master in a Public School, 1902

The Thread of Gold, 1905

From a College Window, 1906

At Large, 1908

The Leaves of the Tree: Studies in Biography, 1911

Along the Road, 1913

Joyous Gard, 1913

Escape, and Other Essays, 1915

Memories and Friends, 1924

Rambles and Reflections, edited by E.F.Benson, 1926

Other writings: poetry, short stories, two novels, a two-volume biography of his father (1899–1900), biographies of writers, works of autobiography and fictionalized meditation (including The Upton Letters, 1905), and a lengthy diary (selections edited by Percy Lubbock, 1926, and David Newsome, 1981). Also edited a selection of the correspondence of Queen Victoria (3 vols., 1907).

Further Reading

Benson, E.F., Our Family Affairs, 1867–1896, London: Cassell, 1920; New York: Doran, 1921

Benson, E.F., As We Were: A Victorian Peep-Show, London: Hogarth Press, 1985 (original edition, 1930)

Benson, E.F., Final Edition: Informal Autobiography, London: Longman, and New York: Appleton Century, 1940

Brake, Laurel, “Judas and the Widow: Thomas Wright and A.C. Benson as Biographers of Walter Pater: The Widow,” Prose Studies 4 (1981):39–54

Cunich, Peter, David Hoyle, Eamon Duffy, and Ronald Hyam, editors, A History of Magdalene College Cambridge, 1428–1988, Cambridge: Magdalene College, 1994

Howarth, T.E.B., Cambridge Between Two Wars, London: Collins, 1978

James, M.R., Eton and King’s: Recollections, Mostly Trivial, 1875–1925, London: Williams and Norgate, 1926

Lubbock, Percy, editor, The Diary of Arthur Christopher Benson, London: Hutchinson, and New York, Longman Green, 1926

Newsome, David, Godliness and Good Learning: Four Studies on a Victorian Ideal, London: Murray, 1961

Newsome, David, On the Edge of Paradise: A.C.Benson, the Diarist, London: Murray, and Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1980

Newsome, David, editor, Edwardian Excursions: From the Diaries of A.C.Benson 1898–1904, London: Murray, 1981

- Ryle, E.H., editor, Arthur Christopher Benson, as Seen by Some Friends, London: Bell, 1925; New York: Putnam, 1926
- Warren, Austin, "The Happy, Vanished World of A.C.Benson," Sewanee Review 75 (1967):268–81
- Wilson, Keith, "A.C.Benson," in Modern British Essayists, First Series, edited by Robert Beum, The Dictionary of Literary Biography, vol. 98, Detroit: Gale Research, 1990:21–33
- Wormleighton, Simon, "Wilfred Owen and A.C.Benson," Notes and Queries 37 (December 1990):435–37

Bernanos, Georges

French, 1888–1948

Georges Bernanos' essays are far more voluminous than his better-known fiction. Six volumes appeared during his lifetime: La Grande Peur des bien-pensants (The great fear of conformist thinkers) in 1931; Les Grands Cimetières sous la lune (The great cemeteries in the moonlight; translated as Diary of My Times) in 1938; Scandale de la vérité (The scandal of truth) and Nous autres Français (We French) in 1939; Lettre aux Anglais (Plea for Liberty: Letters to the English, the Americans, the Europeans) in 1942; and, finally, La France contre les robots (Tradition of Freedom) in 1944. A further half-dozen compilations of Bernanos' articles and occasional texts were published posthumously. The two most substantial are Le Chemin de la Croix-des-Ames (1948; The way of the Cross-of-Souls), which assembled Bernanos' Brazilian wartime articles in one volume with an important preface-essay by the dying author, and Français, si vous saviez (1961; Frenchmen, if you only knew), a compilation of articles written between his return to France from Brazil in 1945 and his death in Paris in 1948.

Seven additional volumes of essays were published posthumously by Albert Béguin, Bernanos' literary executor. Les Enfants humiliés (The humiliated children), lost during the war and brought out only in 1949, contained Bernanos' 1939–40 poetic meditations on France's plunge into war again. La Liberté, pour quoi faire? (Last Essays) in 1953 brought together lectures from 1946–47. In 1956 Béguin assembled Bernanos' literary criticism and interviews from 1909–39 in Le Crépuscule des vieux (The twilight of old men). Four more recent compilations, prepared by Jean-Loup Bernanos, indiscriminately combine published and unpublished texts. Le Lendemain, c'est vous! (The next day it's you!), published in 1969, was followed in 1970 by a volume deceptively entitled La France contre les robots (France against the robots), even though the 1944 text (translated as Tradition of Freedom) bearing the same title comprises barely half the compilation. Further articles appeared in La Vocation spirituelle de la France (The spiritual vocation of France) in 1975, and Les Prédestinés (1983; The predestined ones) assembled texts on St. Dominic, Joan of Arc, Martin Luther, the few pages of Bernanos' Life of Jesus, and, from Last Essays, Bernanos' famous "last lecture," "Nos Amis, les saints" ("Our Friends the Saints"), in which the author gives a synthesis of his views on God, man, and creation as well as on freedom and human suffering.

As an essayist Bernanos moves effortlessly from the strident tone he learned from Édouard Drumont and Léon Bloy to the subtle, nostalgic irony of Charles Péguy, whom he profoundly admired. His most powerful quality as an essayist, however, is a rare gift he developed as a novelist and shared with Dostoevskii: the ability to pierce his reader's heart through a sorrowing tenderness he himself called the "lost language of childhood." Readers attesting to their admiration for this gift include Antonin Artaud, Jean-Paul Sartre, Simone de Beauvoir, André Malraux, Gaston Gallimard, and Charles de Gaulle.

Bernanos' desire to convince his reader of what he called "that part of the truth" given to him was rooted in his conviction that he must answer to God for all he wrote. For Bernanos, as for Bloy, writing was a divine calling, a vocation, and all true vocations, he said, must lead to Calvary. Having opted at age 18 for a writer's vocation over that of a priest, he strove to defend both Christian civilization and France—for him the foremost Christian country of Europe—with sacerdotal fervor.

As he sought in his essays to make his ideas live, Bernanos often personified them so that they might directly challenge his reader. As for his readers, Bernanos once said he liked to think that they were simply "all those men of good will" to whom the angel of Bethlehem first promised peace. In darker moments, however, he admitted that only those not totally subject to the technological seduction of the modern world remain intact enough to hear his voice.

Bernanos' audience did evolve radically from the right-wing nationalists of the Action Française (French action) for whom he started writing as a student. His long evolution carried him beyond any definable political position. By the end of his life communists no less than the ultra-right claimed him as one of their own. Even in his first essay volume in 1931, La Grande Peur des bien-pensants, Bernanos was already far more preoccupied with the future of French Christian society than with Édouard Drumont, whose biography he was supposedly writing.

His best-known essay, Diary of My Times, determined Gaston Gallimard to attach Bernanos to his publishing house and caused Simone Weil to write that Bernanos alone expressed what she herself had experienced in the Spanish Civil War. Launching "whole squads of images," as he liked to say, Bernanos denounced the Roman Catholic hierarchy for its stance on the Ethiopian conquest as well as on the "crusade" of General Franco.

When Charles Maurras, head of the Action Française, was elected to the French Academy in 1938, Bernanos, from Brazil, denounced the revered master of his youth in Scandale de la vérité for approving the Munich Pact, accurately foreseeing the fate awaiting the French Right during the war. Then, as war loomed, the essayist glorified those Christian values he particularly associated with French history and culture in Nous autres Français.

France's defeat was the subject for his Plea for Liberty: Letters to the English, the Americans, the Europeans, a work triggered by a request in 1940 from the Dublin Review for an article on that subject. After May 1940, and for the duration of the war, Bernanos devoted himself exclusively to essays on the meaning of the conflict, both to France and to the world.

Bernanos' seven years in Brazil (1938–45) and the devotion of the Brazilian elite to French civilization much softened the author's strident nationalism. He now attempted to define France's supernatural destiny to lead the whole postwar world in a spiritual revolution. His violent voice still surged up, however, in both Tradition of Freedom and Last Essays as he denounced technology's increasing threat to human freedom.

Bernanos' wartime essays won him a reputation as "bard of the French Resistance," but after his return to France in 1945 his inability to fuse his ideals with political realities in postwar France disappointed those who had relied on his voice for strength and moral courage during the occupation. To the end, however, Bernanos' articles in newspapers such as La Bataille (The battle), Carrefour (Crossroads), Combat, Le Figaro, and L'Intransigeant won him devoted readers from all social and political strata. Even half a century after his death Bernanos' passionate and thought-provoking assessment of two World Wars, the German occupation of France, and the significance of the atomic bomb remains hardly less gripping than his astonishingly fresh, pertinent, and eloquently challenging denunciation of the threats posed to the freedom of a human race increasingly enslaved by technology.

WILLIAM BUSH

Biography

Born 20 February 1888 in Paris. Studied at the Collège des Jésuits, until 1901; Collège Notre-Dame-des-Champs, Paris, 1901–03; Collège Saint-Célestin, Bourges, 1903–04; Collège Sainte-Marie, Aire-sur-la-Lys, 1904–06, baccalauréat, 1906; the Sorbonne, Paris, 1906–09, licence in law and literature, 1909. Military service, 1909–10. Editor, L'Avant-Garde de Normandie, 1913–14. Served in the French army, 1914–19: wounded. Married Jeanne Talbert d'Arc, 1917: three sons and three daughters. Sold insurance, 1919–27. Columnist, Le Figaro, 1930–32. Crippled for life in a motorcycle accident, 1933. Evicted from family home because of debts, and moved to Majorca, 1934–37, then returned to France; settled in Brazil, and involved in the resistance movement, 1938–44; returned to France, 1945. Contributor to many journals, including Combat, Carrefour, L'Intransigeant, and La Bataille. Gave lectures in Switzerland, Belgium, and North Africa. Awards: Prix Fémina, for novel, 1929; French Academy Grand Prize, for novel, 1936. Died (of liver problems) in Paris, 5 July 1948.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

La Grande Peur des bien-pensants, 1931

Jeanne, relapse et sainte, 1934; as Sanctity Will Out: An Essay on St. Joan, translated by Rosamond Batchelor, 1947

Les Grands Cimetières sous la lune, 1938; as Diary of My Times, translated by Pamela Morris, 1938

Scandale de la vérité, 1939

Nous autres Français, 1939

Lettre aux Anglais, 1942; as Plea for Liberty: Letters to the English, the Americans, the Europeans, translated by Harry Lorin Binsse and Ruth Bethel, 1945

- Le Chemin de la Croix-des-Ames* (articles), 4 vols., 1943–45; in 1 vol., 1948; revised edition, edited by Jean-Loup Bernanos and Brigitte Bernanos, 1987
- La France contre les robots*, 1944; as Tradition of Freedom, translated by Helen B. Clark, 1950
- Essais et témoignages*, edited by Albert Béguin, 1949
- Les Enfants humiliés*, 1949
- La Liberté, pour quoi faire?*, edited by Albert Béguin, 1953; as Last Essays, translated by Joan and Barry Ulanov, 1955
- Le Crépuscule des vieux* (articles), edited by Albert Béguin, 1956
- Français, si vous saviez, 1945–1948* (articles), 1961
- Le Lendemain, c'est vous!*, edited by Jean-Loup Bernanos, 1969
- La France contre les robots*, edited by Jean-Loup Bernanos, 1970
- Essais et écrits de combat* (Pléiade Edition), edited by Yves Bridel, Jacques Chabot, and Joseph Jurt, 1971
- La Vocation spirituelle de la France*, edited by Jean-Loup Bernanos, 1975
- Les Prédestinés*, edited by Jean-Loup Bernanos, 1983
- Other writings: eight novels (Sous le soleil de Satan [The Star of Satan], 1926; L'Imposture, 1927; La Joie [Joy], 1929; Un crime [The Crime], 1935; Journal d'un curé de campagne [The Diary of a Country Priest], 1936; Nouvelle histoire de Mouchette, 1937; Monsieur Ouine [The Open Mind], 1943; Un mauvais rêve [Night Is Darkest], 1951), the screen scenario Dialogues des Carmélites (1949; The Fearless Heart), short stories, and correspondence.

Bibliography

- Jurt, Joseph, Georges Bernanos: Essai de bibliographie des études en langue française consacrées à Georges Bernanos, Paris: Minard, 3 vols., 1972–75

Further Reading

- Béguin, Albert, Bernanos par lui-même, Paris: Seuil, 1982 (original edition, 1954)
- Bénier, Jean, Les Royaumes de Georges Bernanos, Troyes: Librairie Bleu, 1994
- Bernanos, Jean-Loup, Georges Bernanos à la merci des passants, Paris: Plon, 1986
- Bush, William, Georges Bernanos, New York: Twayne, 1969
- Bush, William, "Georges Bernanos," in French Novelists, 1930–1960, edited by Catharine Savage Brosman, Dictionary of Literary Biography, vol. 72, Detroit: Gale Research, 1988:58–76
- Chesterton Review* issues on Bernanos, edited by William Bush, 15, no. 4 (November 1989) and 16, no. 1 (February 1990)
- Cooke, John E., Georges Bernanos: A Study of Christian Commitment, Amersham, Buckinghamshire: Avebury Publishing, 1981
- Estang, Luc, Présence de Bernanos, précédé de "Dans l'amitié de Léon Bloy" de Georges Bernanos, Paris: Plon, 1947
- Estève, Michel, Bernanos, Paris: Gallimard, 1965
- Estève, Michel, Georges Bernanos: Un triple itinéraire, Paris: Hachette, 1981
- Gaucher, Guy, Georges Bernanos; ou, L'Invincible espérance, Paris: Cerf, 1994

- Georges Bernanos in His Time and Ours, 1888–1948*, special double issue of Renascence: Essays on Values in Literature, edited by William Bush, 41, nos. 1–2 (Fall 1988/Winter 1989)
- Gillemin, Henri, Regards sur Bernanos, Paris: Gallimard, 1976
- Hebblethwaite, Peter, Bernanos: An Introduction, London: Bowes and Bowes, 1965
- Milner, Max, Georges Bernanos, Paris: Desclée de Brouwer, 1967
- Molnar, Thomas, Bernanos: His Political Thought and Prophecy, New York: Sheed and Ward, 1960
- Speaight, Robert, Georges Bernanos: A Study of the Man and the Writer, London: Collins and Harvill, 1973
- Urs von Balthasar, Hans, Le Chrétien Bernanos, Paris: Seuil, 1956 (original German edition, 1954)

Berry, Wendell

American, 1934–

Farmer, naturalist, and conservationist Wendell Berry has published nine essay volumes and three additional nonfiction works, along with novels and poetry. His nature essays have called attention to the economic and environmental problems in modern American agriculture, especially the loss of traditional farm communities and rural culture. As a Jeffersonian agrarian, Berry has defended the moral, civic, and environmental values of the family farm. He first gained widespread recognition for The Unsettling of America: Culture and Agriculture (1977), a polemic against the excesses of corporate agribusiness.

Berry's career as an essayist coincided with the American environmental movement, beginning with the first Earth Day in 1972. His essays have appeared in publications ranging from the Whole Earth Catalogue to Smithsonian magazine. As a contributing editor with Rodale Press from 1977 to 1979, Berry promoted the organic farming movement in essays and articles in the New Farm and Organic Gardening. A self-proclaimed generalist in an age of specialists, Berry addresses his essays to a broad and diverse audience of general readers, promoting with evangelistic fervor the values of economic and cultural self-reliance.

The early autobiographical essays, The Long-Legged House (1969) and "A Native Hill" (1969), established Berry's roots as a Kentucky regionalist and agrarian. The long philosophical essay "Discipline and Hope" (1972) presents his criticism of the American consumer culture and calls for renewal through simplicity and self-reliance. As a farmer and writer, Berry writes out of his deep love for land and place. He offers an articulate defense of traditional farming ("A Defense of the Family Farm," 1986) as a viable economic and cultural alternative to corporate consumerism. In "The Making of a Marginal Farm" (1980), he explains his decision to leave a teaching career in New York and return to Kentucky to farm and write. As an agrarian regionalist, Berry is both conservative and radical. His cultural conservatism ("The Work of Local Culture," 1988) has led him to be politically radical in his opposition to the social and economic forces destroying family farms and rural communities. As a regionalist (“The Regional Motive,” 1972) who has struggled to create a wholesome economic, ecological, and moral order within his family, farm, and community, he favors economic self-sufficiency (“The Tyranny of Charity,” 1965) for the Cumberland region and opposes industrialism, urbanization, and technology (“Property, Patriotism, and National Defense,” 1984), but he sharpens his advocacy of rural life with an informed ecological vision and a clear understanding of the complex relationships among the health of the individual, family, community, and environment (“Does Community Have a Value?,” 1986). The themes of home, work, husbandry, rootedness, stewardship, responsibility, thrift, order, memory, atonement, and harmony resonate throughout his essays.

Berry’s regional loyalty has led him to speak out against the ravages of strip-mining in the Cumberland region (“The Landscaping of Hell: Strip-Mine Morality in East Kentucky,” 1965); to protest against the pollution of the Kentucky River by vacationers (“The Nature Consumers,” 1967); and to write an eloquent plea to preserve Kentucky’s Red River Gorge (“The Unforeseen Wilderness,” 1971). But the major target of Berry’s wrath has been the destructive farming practices of corporate agribusiness (“The Body and the Earth,” 1977).

Berry’s ecological essays often assume an almost religious tone. In “A Secular Pilgrimage” (1972), he traces the origins of the environmental crisis to our disdain for the earth. Berry calls for a renewal of biblical stewardship in “The Gift of Good Land” (1979); promotes the idea of usufruct in “God and Country” (1990); and outlines a nondualistic natural theology that affirms the sacredness of the world in “Christianity and the Survival of Creation” (1992). Protection of wildness and careful land use are not incompatible, he argues in “Preserving Wildness” (1985).

As a social critic, Berry examines the cultural influences of industrialism and the consumer economy. He writes about the effects of corporate greed on American culture: the vulgarization of popular culture and the debasement of language; the decline of public education; the destruction of family and community life; and the degradation of the environment. He reaffirms the dignity and value of work (“People, Land, and Community,” 1983); criticizes the destructive assumptions of free market economics (“Two Economies,” 1983); praises the thrift and resourcefulness of Amish culture (“Does Community Have a Value?”); defends marriage against feminist attacks (“Feminism, the Body, and the Machine,” 1987); and protests against the exploitation of sex in American consumer culture (“Sex, Economy, Freedom, and Community,” 1992).

In his literary essays, Berry stresses the importance of regionalism, respect for language, and traditional poetic forms. He values pastoral poetry for its ability to connect us with nature (“A Secular Pilgrimage”); laments the loss of readership for contemporary poetry (“The Specialization of Poetry,” 1974); insists upon the need to protect the integrity of language to prevent cultural decline (“Standing by Words,” 1983); and praises Mark Twain, Sarah Orne Jewett, and Wallace Stegner for their regional loyalty (“Writer and Region,” 1987).

Berry is a polemical writer who emphasizes theme and argument over purely literary stylistics. More didactic than discursive as an essayist, he is nevertheless a clear and forceful writer who resembles Edward Abbey in his passionate defense of environmental concerns. Berry is also a moralist in the tradition of Henry David Thoreau, for whom simplicity and self-reliance are essential virtues. Like Thoreau, he is a writer of deep personal conviction who has articulated the social and economic principles by which he would live and write. He has striven to achieve clarity and directness in his essays by insisting upon the basic harmony among work, vocation, family, community, and nature. One finds in Berry's essays a continual effort to unify life, work, and art.

Berry is essentially a pastoral writer whose inspiration comes from his rural Kentucky heritage. In his essays, he celebrates the personal satisfactions of farming and husbandry. He cares deeply about his subjects: the dignity of work; the proper care of the land; the importance of marriage, family, and community; and the continuities of history and region. Though he regrets the loss of the discipline of thrift, care, and conservation that farming teaches, most of all it is the spiritual value and restorative power of living in harmony with nature that Berry cherishes. Perhaps best known for his agricultural and environmental essays, Berry is an important social and cultural critic whose works have helped preserve the heritage of rural American culture.

ANDREW J. ANGYAL

Biography

Wendell Erdman Berry. Born 5 August 1934 in Henry County, Kentucky. Studied at the University of Kentucky, Lexington, A.B., 1956, M.A., 1957; Wallace Stegner Writing Fellow, Stanford University, California, 1958–59. Married Tanya Amyx, 1957: one daughter and one son. Taught at Stanford University, 1959–60; traveled on a Guggenheim Fellowship to Italy and France, 1961–62; taught at New York University, 1962–64, and the University of Kentucky, 1964–77, and from 1987; staff member, Rodale Press, Emmaus, Pennsylvania, 1977–79. Awards: several grants and fellowships; Poetry magazine Vachel Lindsay Prize, 1962, and Bess Hokin Prize, 1967; Friends of American Writers Award, for novel, 1975.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

The Long-Legged House, 1969

The Hidden Wound, 1970

The Unforeseen Wilderness: An Essay on Kentucky's Red River Gorge, 1971

A Continuous Harmony: Essays Cultural and Agricultural, 1972

The Unsettling of America: Culture and Agriculture, 1977

Recollected Essays 1965–1980, 1981

The Gift of Good Land: Further Essays Cultural and Agricultural, 1981

Standing by Words, 1983

Home Economics, 1987

What Are People For?, 1990

Harlan Hubbard: Life and Work (lectures), 1990

Standing on Earth: Selected Essays, 1991

Sex, Economy, Freedom & Community, 1993

Another Turn of the Crank, 1995

Other writings: many collections of poetry, four novels (Nathan Coulter, 1960; A Place on Earth, 1967; The Memory of Old Jack, 1974; Remembering, 1988), short stories, and a play.

Bibliographies

Griffin, John B., "An Update to the Wendell Berry Checklist, 1979-Present," Bulletin of Bibliography 50, no. 3 (September 1993):173–80

Hicks, Jack, "A Wendell Berry Checklist," Bulletin of Bibliography 37 (1980):127–31

Further Reading

Angyal, Andrew J., Wendell Berry, New York: Twayne, and London: Prentice Hall International, 1995

Merchant, Paul, editor, Wendell Berry, Lewiston, Idaho: Confluence, 1991

Biography and the Essay

Biography is difficult to define succinctly or convincingly. As a genre, its boundaries are elusive, its subject slippery; it is expressive of a human need rather than the answer to that need. In its widest application, the term "biography" describes any attempt to tell the story of what it is to be human; broadly speaking, whatever artifacts, monuments, pictures, or writings people have left behind to mark the spaces they once occupied are kinds of biography. Cave paintings, petroglyphs, hieroglyphs, pyramids, and stone circles are life writings in this sense. Biography is a reflexive human gesture that points to others and says: "You are and, therefore, I am." It is the process by which individuals and cultures codify their consciousness of what it feels like to live a life of significance in time and space. That is the import of Samuel Johnson's much-quoted and deeply felt explanation of how biography works upon the reader: "All joy or sorrow for the happiness or calamities of others is produced by an act of the imagination, that realises the event however fictitious, or approximates it however remote, by placing us, for a time, in the condition of him whose fortune we contemplate; so that we feel, while the deception lasts, whatever motions would be excited by the same good or evil happening to ourselves" (Rambler no. 60). What Johnson describes is not necessarily a literary activity but an imaginative and emotional one, predicated upon the human capacity for empathy. Perhaps this is the closest we can come to a workable definition of biography: the imagining that another life is like our own.

Perhaps the first biographer to meet Johnson's standard in life writing was Plato, whose exploration of the character and mind of Socrates in the dialogues is compellingly intimate. In a similar way the life of Christ is evoked in narrative and dramatic snatches by the Apostles who, like Socrates, achieve their biographical portraits through emphasizing the language of their subject. Recording speeches was one of the more common forms of biography before the advent of the essay in Renaissance Europe; indeed, the best biographical accounts in classical Greek are the dramatic speeches recorded by Thucydides and Herodotus in their Histories. Xenophon's portrayal of Socrates in his 4th-century Memorabilia, however, is the closest approximation to biography to be found before Plutarch's Vitae parallelae (Lives of the Noble Grecians and Romans), a compilation of 44 comparative life studies in which Plutarch sets Greek against Roman, as in his comparison of Alexander and Caesar as generals or Demosthenes and Cicero as orators. Gaius Suetonius Tranquillus, Plutarch's contemporary, produced two important works of biography, the Lives of the Caesars and Agricola, his memoir of his father-in-law.

Medieval biographers like the Venerable Bede in Historia ecclesiastica gentis Anglorum (c. 732; Ecclesiastical History of the English People), with its life of St. Cuthbert, and the monk Eadmer who wrote Vita Anselmi (c. 1124; The Life of St. Anselm) were producing encomia that lacked the sense of personality present in the best classical biographies. Their moral perspective is typical of the pattern we see in the lives of the saints throughout the Middle Ages, but it is their emphasis upon the life to come at the expense of the life lived that diminishes their literary significance as biography. It is only with the return to secular subjects in works like Giovanni Boccaccio's De casibus virorum illustrium (The Fates of Illustrious Men) in the 14th century that life writing comes back to a focus on the shared humanity of the subject and the reader. In fact, before Boccaccio, only Einhard's Vita Caroli Magni (c. 829–36; Life of Charlemagne) offered any sustained human interest as a biography. After Boccaccio, three biographical compilations are particularly important: Giorgio Vasari's Vite de' piu eccellenti pittori, scultori e architettori italiani (1550; Lives of the Most Eminent Painters, Sculptors, and Architects), the biographies of Italian artists from Cimabue to Michelangelo; John Foxe's The Acts and Monuments of the Church, also known as The Book of the Martyrs (1563), the collected lives of the English Reformers persecuted under Mary Tudor; and the eccentric Mirror for Magistrates (1563 and subsequent expanded editions), edited by George Ferrers, a sort of English imitation of Boccaccio's work. These books are also among the first serious attempts to produce national biographies in the vernacular. The 16th century in England saw the greatest surge in life writing with Thomas More, William Roper, and George Cavendish establishing the return of secular and humanist biography and setting the stage for Francis Bacon's The History of the Reign of Henry VII (1622). In France, Pierre de Bourdeille produced collections of brief lives which explored the social intimacy of court life in his Les Vies des dames illustres, Les Vies des dames galantes, Les Vies des hommes illustres et grands capitaines français, and Les Vies des hommes illustres et des grands capitaines étrangers (1665–66). However, it was Izaak Walton and Roger North who moved biography closest to its modern expression. Walton's lives of John Donne, George Herbert, Henry Wotton, Richard Hooker, and Robert Sanderson published between 1640 and 1678 are portraits shaded with private and domestic details, while North's narratives of the lives of his three brothers, accompanied by a prefatory essay on the art of biography and not published until 1742–44, are intimate and imaginatively engaging memoirs of the private lives of regular citizens.

Biography as Johnson described it is the creation of the European Enlightenment and finds its landmark achievements in 18th-century English literature. Notably, this great age of biographic writing was preceded by and coincident with the zenith of portrait painting in Europe. An increasingly secular emphasis in politics and art further emphasized the significance of the individual in his or her own life, but that cultural impulse required a philosophical and linguistic imperative which was provided, ultimately, by such works as Robert Burton's The Anatomy of Melancholy (1621 and subsequent revised editions) and John Locke's An Essay Concerning Human Understanding (1689). The modern notion of private psychology expressed in works like these brought a new language and way of seeing to the practice of life writing, and biographers began to examine the emotional and motivational forces behind the actions of men and women. Rather than looking to an external impetus for actions in life, whether God or the public duty demanded by the state, which had provided the focus of classical, medieval, and Renaissance biographies, the Enlightenment explored the interior terrain of emotional and private motivation. Thus, in his best biography, An Account of the Life of Mr. Richard Savage (1744), Samuel Johnson undertakes to tell the story of a minor writer who was a total failure and died mad, not as an example of a life to be avoided, but as a study of depression and of those ways in which every life is more an experience of disappointment than of fulfillment. He is interested in psychological understanding, not moral allegory. Johnson's own biography, arguably the greatest example of its kind, was written from a similar perspective by the Scot James Boswell. A compulsive diarist, Boswell's exhaustive Life of Samuel Johnson (1791) was based largely upon his extensive notes of Johnson's conversations. Boswell treats Johnson's early life with some abruptness, concentrating the bulk of his massive narration on those years he shared with Johnson. In this, the biography is also a kind of memoir evoking not one but two personalities, those of Johnson and Boswell. It is this impetus to give a psychologically compelling sense of the individual, to paint a personality in words, that is the hallmark of Enlightenment biographies and is a feature held in common with the novel which arose simultaneously with modern biography all across Europe. Biography of this sort shares with the novel an emphasis on domesticity.

Still, 18th-century biography is distinguished by its reliance on the essay for its rhetorical structure. This is especially true in the French tradition where the eulogy (éloge) dominated the style of life writing until Marie-Jean Caritat, Marquis de Condorcet broke entirely with that convention in the biographies of Turgot (1786) and Voltaire (1789). Among other important examples of life writing in Enlightenment France were Voltaire's at times satiric Histoire de Charles XII, roi de Suède (1731; The History of Charles XII, King of Sweden), Diderot's Essai sur Sénèque (1778; Essay on Seneca), and La Beaumelle's Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire de Madame de Maintenon (1756; Memoire for the History of Madame de Maintenon). But it is the early work of Pierre Bayle, the dictionary maker, that alone among French life writing has any long-reaching influence. His Dictionnaire historique et critique (1697; An Historical and Critical Dictionary) is arguably the first example of a modern biographical compilation, taking the tradition of the brief lives that originated with Suetonius and had its English expression in John Aubrey and Anthony Wood's Athenae Oxoniensis (1691) and developing it into an encyclopedic form. Bayle's innovation was introduced to England by Thomas Birch, a hack biographer, and eventually influenced William Oldys, the first editor of the Biography Britannica (1747–66), which was corrected and enlarged in a second edition by Andrew Kippis (1778–93). The biographical dictionary took a number of subsequent forms until biographical essays became a regular feature of the Encyclopedia Britannica in its third edition (1788–97). Among the many imitators of Bayle, William Owen and William Johnston were the first to attempt an internationally and historically inclusive compendium of biographical essays in their New and General Biographical Dictionary...of the Lives and Writings of the Most Eminent People of Every Nation (1761–67). All of these works point forward to the late 19th-century schemes for dictionaries of national biography, such as that edited by Leslie Stephen.

Where Locke's theories tended to shape the idea of biography during the Enlightenment, Charles Darwin eventually dominated 19th-century and Sigmund Freud 20th-century concepts of life writing. In the early 19th century, politics began to displace the domestic as the fulcrum of biographical studies, a trend especially evident in Thomas Carlyle's life of Frederick the Great, some 13 years in the writing and finally published in three massive volumes over a seven-year period (1858–65). David Masson, however, best illustrates the Victorian tendency toward historical inclusiveness with his seven-volume Life of Milton in Connection with the History of His Times, which appeared over a 35-year span (1859–94). While English biography was becoming more historically and politically obsessed, French life writing was taking an inward turn. Introspection is the dominant feature of work like Étienne Pivert de Senancour's Obermann (1804) and continues to be the theme in the biographical writing of Alphonse de Lamartine and Alfred de Musset.

Lytton Strachey's Eminent Victorians (1918) did more than any single work since Boswell to redirect and revive the art of biography. Strachey eschewed the 19th century's respect for biographical subjects, whom he treated with irreverence and irony, writing in a highly individualistic style that harkened back to the elegance of Johnson's essays. Eminent Victorians shows utter disregard for historical veracity and never hesitates to embellish or invent where the events of the subject's life are absent or dull. Here was the beginning of a biographical mode that sought to reveal human weaknesses and folly while setting identification and empathy at a problematic distance. Recognition of shared humanity between the reader and the subject of the biography is more an experience of humiliation than reassurance in Strachey. Biography in the 20th century has continued and refined Strachey's methods, developing a kind of life writing that treats the subject as an opponent to be exposed. Political biography in particular is so directed, among the best examples being William Manchester's life of John F. Kennedy, Death of a President (1967).

Biography and the essay are closely tied for a number of reasons, but the most interesting is their shared inclination toward introspection. The essay after Montaigne offered a medium for intense self-examination that is autobiographical by nature. The most innovative of the early modern biographers, like Diderot, Johnson, and Boswell, were themselves outstanding essayists. But the essay is also essentially an empirical tool, designed to seek out, identify, and convey knowledge of the world as it relates to the self. This dichotomy of the introspective and the empirical that defines the essay as a genre also well describes the activity of life writing where what can be ascertained about a life and what can only be intuited are brought together uneasily into a narrative that is ultimately more an art than a science.

STEPHEN W. BROWN

Further Reading

- Aaron, Daniel, editor, Studies in Biography, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1978
- Altick, Richard D., Lives and Letters: A History of Literary Biography in England and America, New York: Knopf, 1966
- Clifford, James L., Biography as Art: Selected Criticism, 1560–1960, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1962
- Garraty, John A., The Nature of Biography, New York: Knopf, 1957
- Kendall, Paul M., The Art of Biography, New York: Norton, 1985 (original edition, 1965)
- Meyers, Jeffrey, The Spirit of Biography, Ann Arbor, Michigan: UMI Research Press, 1989
- Stauffer, Donald A., English Biography Before 1700, New York: Russell and Russell, 1964 (original edition, 1930)

Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine

British periodical, 1817–1980

The sheer longevity of Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine—163 years—makes it noteworthy among 19th-century periodicals. Following its foundation by William Blackwood, successive generations of the publishing family of Blackwood owned and edited Maga, as it was familiarly known to its proprietors, contributors, and readers. Its founders originally saw Blackwood's as providing a more energetic and powerful Tory opposition to the Whig Edinburgh Review than the Quarterly Review then offered; but its monthly issue and the breadth of its scope made it from the start also a stronger vehicle for creative literature and criticism than the quarterlies.

William Blackwood's aim to produce a daring, sparkling, and successful magazine was in no way met by the editors of his first venture, the Edinburgh Monthly Magazine. They were replaced after a few months, and the new Blackwood's, produced by John Gibson Lockhart, John Wilson, and James Hogg was launched with great élan. In Margaret Oliphant's words, the new number had to be "a sort of fiery meteor to blaze across the Edinburgh sky and call every man's attention" (Annals vol. 1, 1897). It succeeded. In particular its satiric "Chaldee Manuscript," lampooning the deposed editors and local notables, took Edinburgh by storm. In another piece Coleridge's Biographia Literaria was savaged. This combative style marked the early years, notable for the virulence of the attacks on "The Cockney School," i.e. Leigh Hunt, William Hazlitt, and John Keats. The personal assaults brought actions for libel and Blackwood more than once had to pay damages. The “unholy zest and aptitude for the fray” (J.H.Lobban, 1897) shared by Lockhart, Wilson, and Hogg tested Blackwood’s powers of control to the full, but the success of the magazine was established.

The popular “Noctes Ambrosianae” series of papers, humorous tavern conversations between a group of friends discussing contemporary events, books, and people, began in 1822. It featured some fictional characters, but mainly real people under sobriquets, including Maga writers themselves, “Christopher North” (Wilson), “The Ettrick Shepherd” (Hogg), “The Opium-Eater” (Thomas De Quincey), and “Ensign O’Doherty” (William Maginn). De Quincey began writing for the magazine in 1820 and continued on a sporadic, somewhat wayward basis for a decade. Maginn had been appointed Irish correspondent a few months earlier. His witty contributions were valued, though Blackwood had to restrain his propensity both to abuse and to puff.

By the mid-1830s Maga had established the respectable character which was to secure its position in Victorian and Edwardian cultural society, a mix of creative literature, reviews, essays, and serious papers on foreign and domestic issues. William Blackwood’s worries about the damage caused by “the coarse and reckless” vein of writing, and his concern that “anything approaching to grossness or profane feeling” would make his magazine “a sealed book to many families” (Oliphant, Annals vol. 1) eventually triumphed over the rash exuberance of the early years. The magazine became much less contentious, though it developed its own personality and continued to attract writers of calibre. Many of its contributors, as Maga was proud to publicize, were loyal and longstanding, and held for it an affection Margaret Oliphant compared to that which a ship held for its crew. Over its long life it attracted to its ranks such writers as Oliphant herself, George Eliot, Anthony Trollope, Joseph Conrad, Andrew Lang, May Sinclair, Alfred Noyes, and John Buchan.

Within the parameters of decorum it set, the Blackwood dynasty was relatively restrained in its editing of such work as it accepted for publication. “One of the secrets of Maga’s success has been the strictly impersonal nature of her editorship,” wrote J.H.Lobban, reviewing Oliphant’s history. On the whole the editors preferred to discuss and persuade rather than ruthlessly hack and rewrite or bowdlerize. F.D.Tredrey (1954) regarded John Blackwood (editor 1845–79) as an editor whose “methods of conveying suggestions and criticism are models in a difficult art.”

From the beginning William Blackwood had encouraged new writers, and his successors continued this policy. Maga maintained the tradition of anonymity long after other periodicals had introduced the signed article. A.Innes Shand (1897) claimed this enabled more “unknowns” to be given an opportunity. It also prevented an established writer from relying solely upon the power of his name, “forcing him to take more care in his work.” Equally important, it gave the periodical as strong an awareness of its own identity as Charles Dickens, a much more intrusive editor than any of the Blackwoods, bestowed on Household Words and All the Year Round. The magisterial “we” commonly employed in reviews and commentaries established Maga’s air of authority.

But already by the end of the 1860s, its lack of illustrations, in contrast to the Cornhill Magazine, made it appear somewhat old-fashioned, and circulation was adversely affected. The loyalty of its diminished band of readers and the commitment of its publishers, however, enabled it to survive until the final decades of this century. The magazine's early interest in foreign affairs and the ambition of "Christopher North" "that our wit shall be local all over the world" was never quite abandoned. During the two World Wars vivid dispatches from the fronts and topical fiction mingled with lighter reading. More staid, but still entertaining its middle-class readers, Maga traveled in the wake of colonials and expatriate communities, its bound volumes keeping them in touch with home. By the mid-20th century it was becoming something of an anachronism, in Tredrey's words "one of the very few markets left to writers of craftsmanship and integrity who are unable, or who do not wish, to write for the avant-garde journals or the popular press."

Maga always had a powerful sense of its own history. To mark its 1000th appearance in 1899 a special double number contained a celebratory revival of "Noctes," and its centenary issue of 225 pages was similarly nostalgic.

BARBARA MARY ONSLOW

See also Periodical Essay

Further Reading

Oliphant, Margaret, Annals of a Publishing House: William Blackwood and His Sons, Their Magazine and Friends, New York: AMS Press, 3 vols., 1974 (original edition, 1897–98)

Lobban, J.H., "Maga and Her Publishers," Blackwood's Magazine (1897):860–72

Shand, A.Innes, "Contemporary Literature III: Magazine Writers," Blackwood's Magazine (1897):225–47

Tredrey, Frank D., The House of Blackwood 1804–1954: The History of a Publishing Firm, Edinburgh: Blackwood, 1954

Blok, Aleksandr

Russian, 1880–1921

Aleksandr Blok, Russia's most celebrated and arguably most gifted symbolist poet, is known primarily for his lyrics (Stikhi o prekrasnoi dame [1903; Verses about the beautiful lady], "Neznakomka" [1907; "The Incognita"], the cycle "Rodina" [1912; Native land]) and for a narrative poem about the Bolshevik Revolution (Dvenadtsat' [1918; The Twelve]). He is also known for his drama Balaganchik (The Puppet Show), which was staged by the famous director Vsevolod Meyerhold in 1906. By comparison, Blok's critical, philosophical, and historical prose, which consists of over 250 separate pieces, has received rather spotty attention. For Blok's contemporaries, however, his book reviews, essays, and public lectures were major events on the cultural landscape. From the outset of his career, Blok himself considered expository prose an essential part of his creative legacy, very nearly on a par with his poetry. It is significant that he begins the rough draft of his first article with the statement: "The following essay...emerges from the pain of my soul...This is a small work but an inspired one, which I want to leave posterity in addition to my songs" (1902).

An effort must be made to classify Blok's voluminous prose inventory, if only to determine which items can justifiably be called "essays" in the sense he intended ("inspired" pieces that express "the pain of my soul"). Setting aside 40–50 brief reports and notices which clearly do not qualify, we can identify about 100 articles and speeches of substantial length that bear the imprint of Blok's emotional sensibilities and definitely warrant the designation "essays." Occupying a median ground are 150 or so reviews of books and plays, ranging in length from one to five pages. Roughly half of these—especially those devoted to works which had special significance for Blok—are also miniature "essays" inasmuch as they convey not only Blok's judgment but his creative personality.

It is possible to break the inventory down further into various subgenres—articles about individual writers, literary surveys, historical treatises, autobiographical sketches, feuilletons, travel notes, and essay-narratives, to name the most common types. But there is reason to dispense with such categories and group Blok's essays according to the criterion of their relative poeticity, as Dmitrii Maksimov (1981) does. The majority of Blok's essays are written in a highly lyrical, metaphoric, and symbolic style that exploits ambiguity for aesthetic ends. Unabashedly impressionistic, they give free rein to Blok's prodigious imagination. By contrast, the nonpoetic essays, which are fewer in number and less idiosyncratic, tend to be discursive, logical, even academic in manner. They avoid metaphorical leaps and have a better-defined structure.

All of Blok's essays gravitate to one of these poles regardless of their subject matter. Hence there are lyrical book reviews ("Andrei Belyi: Simfoniia," 1903; "Valerii Briusov: Urbi et Orbi," wr. 1903), scholarly articles that tell us more about Blok's experience as a poet than about the topics they ostensibly treat ("Poeziia zagovorov i zaklinanii" [1908; The poetry of magical sayings and incantations]; "O sovremennom sostoianii russkogo simvolizma" [1910; On the contemporary state of Russian symbolism]), and personal memoirs that resemble fairytales ("Devushka rozovoi kalitki i murav'inyi tsar'" [1907; The girl at the pink fence and the ant king]; "Ni sny ni iav'" [1921; Neither dream nor reality]). On the other hand, there are also sober, almost academic essays on poetic topics ("Sud'ba Apollona Grigor'eva" [1916; The fate of Apollon Grigor'ev]; "Iskusstvo i revoliutsiia" [1919; "Art and the Revolution"]) which lack Blok's customary lyricism. His prose exists in a dynamic, complementary relationship with his poetry, and the boundary between the two is constantly fluctuating. Unlike Pushkin, Blok did not believe that prose and poetry were inherently different media that ought to be kept discrete.

In poeticizing the essay Blok followed the norm of his time. Rebellious against the rationalistic bias of the previous century, most essayists of the symbolist era, like Blok, replaced logical persuasion with emotive, imagistic reasoning. Nevertheless, the authorial persona of Blok's essays is unique. Less outlandish than Andrei Belyi, less vain than Konstantin Bal'mont, less cerebral than Viacheslav Ivanov, less pedantic than Valerii Briusov, and more socially committed than all of them, Blok spoke in his own distinct voice. His essays have an affinity to Innokentii Annenskii's in their brazen whimsicality, but they lack Annenskii's intellectuality. In relation to Western essayists, Blok comes closest to Wagner and Nietzsche, whom he knew well.

Not surprisingly, Blok acquired his reputation as an essayist in symbolist journals with an educated and aesthetically refined readership—most notably in Zolotoe Runo (The golden fleece), for which he edited the literary criticism section from 1907. When Zolotoe Runo closed in 1909, Blok was left without a suitable forum for the poetic type of essay which came most naturally to him. His ideal audience had always been an aesthetic elite who read and appreciated his poetry—his prose in fact was designed in part to explicate his own verses. Publishing in daily newspapers, he was forced to tone down his lyricism and reorient himself to a less sophisticated readership. In the years 1910 to 1916 he could hardly tolerate such constraints and contemplated abandoning the genre of the essay entirely. To reach his ideal audience, he relied increasingly on speeches, where he could freely indulge in esotericism.

One of the few symbolists who welcomed the Bolshevik Revolution, Blok experienced a new creative surge as an essayist after 1917. Some of his most inspired pieces were composed shortly after the Revolution (“Ispoved’ iazychnika” [1918; A heathen’s confession]; “Katalina” [1919; Cataline]; “Krushenie gumanizma” [1919; “The Collapse of Humanism”]). A handful of these found their way into the collection Rossia i intelligentsia (1918; Russia and the intelligentsia). Nevertheless, the Bolsheviks were disturbed by Blok’s independent thinking and ultimately suppressed his best prose. Blok himself soured toward Bolshevism after he was arrested and nearly executed in February 1919 on the erroneous charge that he was a counter-revolutionary. The essays of his last years, therefore, reached an extremely limited public. Only two complete editions of his essays appeared in the Soviet era, the earliest of which was prefaced by a stern warning that they were “intolerable” and represented “the ideology of the bourgeoisie” (Vasilii Desnitskii, 1935). Only a small fraction of his essays have been translated into English (more are available in French and German translation).

Blok’s essays treat many topics, but beneath the particulars is an abiding concern over Russia’s fate during the cataclysmic changes of the early 20th century. In his first true essay, written during the Revolution of 1905 (“Tvorchestvo Viacheslava Ivanova” [Work of Viacheslav Ivanov]), Blok quoted Fedor Tiutchev’s words: “Blessed is he who visited this world/In its fateful moments.” Near the end of his life, when Bolshevik authority was thoroughly consolidated, he spoke about the social-political changes of his time as commensurate with those of “several centuries” (“Vladimir Solov’ev i nashi dni” [1920; Vladimir Solov’ev and our times]). Thus Blok thought of himself as a privileged witness of an historic upheaval, and in his essays he continually tried to register its spiritual significance both for himself and his generation. In “Narod i intelligentsia” (1908; “The People and the Intelligentsia”), Blok attributes Russia’s trials to the fragmentation of national culture, to the split between the Westernized elite and the native peasantry. In “Stikhiia i kul’tura” (1909; The natural elements and culture), he describes the popular revolution as kind of natural cataclysm, the nation’s primordial revenge against an alien and artificial culture. Blok believed that the violence of revolution was a necessary stage in the ritual of Russia’s spiritual purification (“Intelligentsia i revoliutsiia” [1918; “The Intelligentsia and the Revolution”]), and in a stark indictment of his own former values, he even welcomed the demise of Western individualism and its humanistic heritage (“The Collapse of Humanism”).

The perspective from which Blok passed such scathing judgments was that of a prophet or seer using poetic clairvoyance to demystify political phenomena. The role of the poet, he believed, was to discern the cosmic harmonies that resonated beyond the chaos of visible experience (“Dusha pisatelia” [1909; The writer’s soul]; “O naznachenii poeta” [1921; On the calling of the poet]), and he found in the peasant’s primitive aestheticism a model for such an oracular art (“Poeziia zagovorov i zaklinanii”). There was, of course, an inherent contradiction between the language of Blok’s essays and this defense of primitivism. He could hardly expect an uneducated reader to follow the trajectories of metaphoric thought in his prose. Nor did he rid his essays of symbolic vagueness—a tendency that infuriated even sophisticated readers like Belyi and Zinaida Gippius. Like many Russian writers, Blok revered the common folk as a repository of truth but could not express this faith in an idiom it understood.

Because Blok’s most inspired essays are written in the arcane idiom of a symbolist poet, reading them as a whole poses the question of how he understood their relation to the purely lyric form. It is interesting that in a plan for his collected works compiled in 1917, Blok referred to the essays simply as “prose,” suggesting that despite their convergence, there was still an inherent difference between his essays and his verse. This difference would seem to be primarily one of focus. Blok’s lyric poetry, in its aggregate, is a mesmerizingly intimate confession which draws the reader deep into the recesses of the poet’s soul. It requires a phenomenal capacity for contextual reading—a knowledge not just of one poem, but of whole cycles and volumes. To the reader who embarks upon the arduous task of deciphering his lyrics, the poems reveal a complex personality, the avenues and alleyways of a vast buried labyrinth. In order not to lose the way through this labyrinth it is essential to recall the paths traversed and strive to divine those ahead—that is, to contemplate the design of the whole poetic oeuvre and the intellect which devised it.

The essays, by contrast, are directed mainly toward external phenomena. They do not have Blok’s inner self as their focus, nor do they reveal (and conceal) a secret world. Whereas his verse is self-referential to an obsessive degree, the essays open onto a wider horizon and show Blok pondering a different reality: the social and political events, the cultural and aesthetic currents of his time. Blok’s persona comes across no less vividly, but the environment is not claustrophobic. It is as if he is contemplating his place in the vast philosophical landscape that history has opened before him.

DAVID A.SLOANE

Biography

Aleksandr Aleksandrovich Blok. Born 28 November 1880 in St. Petersburg. Studied at Vvedenskii School, St. Petersburg, 1891–99; studied law, then philosophy at the University of St. Petersburg, 1899–1906. Married Liubov Dmitrievna Mendeleeva, 1903. Literary editor, Zolotoe Runo, from 1907. Traveled abroad several times, including to Italy and Warsaw, 1909. Served in the army as a record keeper with an engineering unit, stationed at the front near Pskov, 1916–17. Edited testimony of former ministers of the Tsar for the provisional government’s Extraordinary Investigative Commission, 1917–18.

Worked for Gor'kii publishers' Vsemirnaia Literatura (World literature) series, 1918–21, and the Vol'naya Filosofskaia Assotsiatsiia (Free philosophical association). Arrested briefly for supposed counter-revolutionary activities, 1919. Chair, Directorate of the Bolshoi Theater, 1919–21, and the Petrograd division of the All-Russian Union of Poets, 1920–21. Died (of heart failure) in Petrograd, 7 August 1921.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Molnii iskusstva (Lightning flashes of art), 1909–20(?)

Rossiia i intelligentsiia, 1918; revised edition, 1919

Poslednie dni imperatorskoi vlasti (The last days of the Imperial Regime), 1921

The Spirit of Music: Selected Essays, translated by I.Freiman, 1943

Other writings: three volumes of poetry (including Dvenadtsat' [1918; The Twelve]) and several plays.

Collected works editions: Sobranie sochinenii, 12 vols., 1932–36; edited by Vladimir N.Orlov and others, 8 vols., 1960–63, and in 6 vols., 1971.

Bibliographies

Kolpakova, E., and others, in Vilniuskii gosudarstvennyi pedagogicheskii Institut 6 (1959)

Pomirchii, P.E., in Blokovskii Sbornik 2 (1972)

Pyman, Avril, in Blokovskii Sbornik 1 (1964)

Further Reading

Chukovskii, Kornei, Alexander Blok as Man and Poet, Ann Arbor, Michigan: Ardis, 1982

Desnitskii, Vasilii, "A.Blok kak literaturnyi kritik," in Sobranie sochinenii by Blok, vol. 10, Leningrad: Izdatel'stvo Pisatelei v Leningrad, 1935:5–16

Kisch, Cecil H., Alexander Blok: The Prophet of Revolution, London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1960

Kluge, Rolf-Dieter, Westeuropa und Russland im Weltbild Aleksandr Bloks, Munich: Slavistische Beiträge, 1967

Maksimov, Dmitrii E., "Kriticheskaia proza Bloka," in his Poeziia i proza Aleksandra Bloka, Leningrad: Sovetskii Pisatel', 1981

Potsepnia, Dina M., Proza A. Bloka: Stilisticheskie problemy, Leningrad: Izdatel'stvo Leningradskogo Universiteta, 1976

Pyman, Avril, The Life of Aleksandr Blok, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 2 vols., 1979–80

Pyman, Avril, "Blok v angliiskom i amerikanskom literaturovedenii," in Literaturnoe nasledstvo, vol. 92, book 5, Moscow: Nauka, 1993:362–401

Reeve, F.D., Aleksandr Blok: Between Image and Idea, New York: Octagon, 1981

(original edition, 1962)

Vogel, Lucy, editor and translator, Blok: An Anthology of Essays and Memoirs, Ann Arbor, Michigan: Ardis, 1982

Borchardt, Rudolf

German, 1877–1945

Rudolf Borchardt once referred to his life's work as the cultivation of three adjacent fields: those of poetry, philology, and public speaking—a contiguous domain within which he allowed no confining boundaries or frivolous experimentation. He was a prodigiously talented scholar-poet, a poeta doctus in the classicist mold, and a polemical historian who had acquired the full compass of a traditional humanistic education. Yet his output as a writer, primarily of essays, monographs, and carefully crafted speeches, was neither prolific nor multifaceted. This is due at least in part to the fact that his work represents the eccentric position of an outsider. It purposely goes against the grain of contemporary debates or ideological controversies, and it is often freighted with the connoisseur's exquisite erudition, with the learned arcana and suggestive allusions of the expert. Stylistically, this work is animated by an unwavering sense of self-assurance, often enough by an imperious rhetorical will that, for all its politeness, does not seek to persuade so much as to grip and overpower. While it may be easy to list the many experiences and issues of his time which Borchardt haughtily refused to admit even to the periphery of his interests, it is difficult to delineate his work through a survey of its central themes.

There is recognizable, however, a pervasive tendency, sustained over many years, if not decades, to return to a small number of all-important concerns. These are then discussed from shifting vantage points and with added perspectives. This intellectual process brings forth a series of ever-expanding (and occasionally contradictory) refractions and variations. In the end it leads to the conviction that a profound and elusive problem has at last yielded its innermost truth.

Borchardt's concentration, over a lifetime, on a few fundamental verities and their inevitable consequences is rooted in the one premise and overriding experience that defined the impulse behind his entire oeuvre. He was sure to have recognized even as a student that the recently triumphant Germany (both the imperial state Bismarck had created and the ideas of its most vociferous critic, Nietzsche) was about to inaugurate an era of enormous barbarities. To this insight he reacted with the hauteur of the insulted aristocrat and with the sensibilities of an aesthete. The feeling that he and his nation had suffered a profound loss, his sense of chaotic ruptures with their destruction of traditions and of historically vindicated values, elicited a response of inexorable condemnation as well as an alternative program of cultural restitution. Borchardt disdained, maligned, overlooked, or misunderstood nearly every separate aspect of modern life as well as the complex interplay of its constituent forces.

But he did search for causes, and came to hold the country's rapidly expansive transformation from a richly diverse Volk into an industrial mass society responsible for most of its ills. He attributed the triviality of its artistic pursuits to a materialistic faith in instrumental reason—to a simplistic trust in scientific progress, in laissez-faire capitalism, in military recklessness. He despised socialism for the fervor with which it tried to destroy conventions and hierarchies; and he saw nothing but propagandistic mendacity lurking behind every emancipatory effort. This deep disorientation in the face of technological modernity traumatized many cultured individualists of the generation that had grown to adulthood around 1900. Their escape was usually the affectation of an amoral dandyism and of a dignified conservatism.

Borchardt, however, offered a more radical and thus even less pragmatic solution. He was unable to find anything worth preserving from the past hundred years, and he therefore scorned all of the proliferating programs of reform or revival as nostalgic. He considered their purposes ineffectual and a harmful illusion in an age that has replaced the guiding relevance of ideas with the dictates of doctrines. Instead of a gradual assimilation of the new to the old (and vice versa), he advocated a “creative restoration” (1927). He took his cue for this project from the work of classical philologists and archaeologists, who reassemble the surviving fragments of ancient cultures with an insightful logic that, he thought, is akin to the imaginative order of poetry. Yet he was less interested in ascertaining “what actually was” than in reclaiming “what under more propitious circumstances could have been.” Thus he searched for possibilities of historical development that had been suppressed or not fully realized and then lost to posterity. And he looked to discover their continued presence in history as future potential, as a palimpsest beneath the surface of victorious reality.

It was the era of Romanticism, with its universalist and also with its specifically German university culture, from which—as from the last unified European epoch—Borchardt drew his strongest inspiration, and from which the “restitution in integrum of the ideal German people as a whole” would have to originate. This process he saw as a revitalization (“Rückbelebung”), if not a re-experiencing (“Rückerlebnis”) that may have to retrace its historical studies and stages all the way back to “the day of creation and the life-giving spirit from God’s mouth.” The complementary alternative—with its “determined will to renounce our time instead of flattering it with iniquitous optimism”—demands that “we reverse ourselves and go into the underworld like Hercules in order to bring back the dead, or, like Theseus, the friend,” as Borchardt wrote in 1917 in “Die geistesgeschichtliche Bedeutung des neunzehnten Jahrhunderts” (The significance of the 19th century in terms of the history of ideas). Such a reawakening of cultural vitality through a return to its sacred sources or as a descent into the realm of heroic death reveals the extremist logic of a religious fundamentalism that has erased all societal compromises in favor of metahistorical absolutes.

Even before 1900, Borchardt’s poetic defiance of his age had found exemplary support in the verse and personality of Stefan George, who was unwilling, however, to admit so ambitious a rival into his inner circle. His admiring suitor then attached himself to the more tractable Hugo von Hofmannsthal and began to castigate George’s aesthetic politics, ultimately equating it with the work of the Antichrist, who had prepared Germany for submission to Hitler. But when the Viennese poet began to develop his own ideas about a conservative revolution (1927 and earlier), Borchardt drew back again, this time from what he considered an anachronistic concept. Yet the 15 essays he wrote about Hofmannsthal reflect his most consistent critical preoccupation with one author, more specifically with his corpus of “classicist” works. For these he could treat as if they were emanations of his own personality, and therefore he discussed them as their creator’s narcissistic Doppelgänger.

Borchardt’s readers (and audience) were mostly members of the prosperous, educated, conservative bourgeoisie, including both notables and the young academic elite. The preferred venue for his public addresses were the auditoriums of traditional (“prestigious”) universities or similar halls in old merchant cities. When he published his articles in cultural journals and in a few select newspapers he made few concessions to the modus operandi of the medium. He neither popularized his ideas nor softened his often abstract diction, which still makes it difficult to pin him down on specific points. Consequently, the captivating momentum of his political rhetoric, for example, did not derive from a stringent analysis of empirical data or from a critical engagement with provocative opinions. It is rather the elusive openness of his key terms (and in general of the vocabulary of cultural pessimism), and the suggestive tone of his forceful pleadings, that may explain his appeal, which was strongest during the 1920s.

As early as 1902 Borchardt had inherited a substantial private fortune, which allowed him to live with his family where he felt most at home, in the villas of Tuscany. After 1933, when he was prohibited from publishing in Germany because his mother had Jewish ancestors, he returned to historical and philological studies. He wrote, for example, an excellent monograph on Pisa (1938) and unfinished interpretations of Homer (1944), the latter largely from memory because he had no access to library resources. Some 50 years later, little of his copious output—five volumes of collected nonfictional prose, a total of some 2500 pages—arouses more than historical interest. These days, respect for his stylish erudition is invariably coupled with an apologetic discomfiture, to put it mildly, over his Ideenpolitik, his vexatious politics of ideas.

MICHAEL WINKLER

Biography

Born 9 June 1877 in Königsberg. Grew up in Moscow, and Berlin, from 1882. Studied archaeology and classical languages at the Universities of Berlin, from 1895, Bonn, and Göttingen. Became friends with Hugo von Hofmannsthal. Traveled to Italy and England, and took special interest in the Pre-Raphaelite painters; lived in Lucca, from 1903. Married Karoline Ehrmann (divorced, 1919). Served in the German army, 1914–18. Married Marie Luise Voigt, 1919; four children. Lived in Lucca, 1921–44; arrested by the Gestapo, 1944, then released; took refuge at Trins am Brenner. Died in Trins am Brenner, 10 January 1945.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Rede über Hofmannsthal, 1905

Villa, 1908

Der Krieg und die deutsche Selbsteinkehr, 1915

Rede am Grabe Eberhard von Bodenhausens, 1918

Prosa 1, 1920

Über den Dichter und das Dichterische, 1924

Handlungen und Abhandlungen, 1928

Die Aufgaben der Zeit gegenüber der Literatur, 1929

Villa, und andere Prosa: Essays, 1952

Other writings: poetry, plays, a novel, and correspondence, especially with Hugo von Hofmannsthal. Also translated works by various English poets, and Dante; edited anthologies of German authors.

Collected works edition: Gesammelte Werke in Einzelbänden, edited by Marie Luise Borchardt, 14 vols., 1955–85.

Bibliographies

Beerbohm, A.W., Rudolf Borchardt: A Biographical and Bibliographical Guide, New York: New York University, 1952

Rizzi, Silvio, Rudolf Borchardt als Theoretiker des Dichterischen, Dornbirn: Mayer, 1958:109–15

Further Reading

Barstad, Noel Kraig, Rudolf Borchardt's Critical Assessment of Hugo von Hofmannsthal (dissertation), Minneapolis: University of Minnesota, 1973

Beerbohm, A.W., Rudolf Borchardt: A Biographical and Bibliographical Guide, New York: New York University, 1952

Caffrey, George, "Rudolf Borchardt," New Criterion 5, no. 1 (1927):81–87

Glaser, Horst Albert, editor, Rudolf Borchardt 1877–1945: Referate des Pisaner Colloquiums, Frankfurt-on-Main and New York: Lang, 1987

Sommer, Inge, "Das 'klassische Land' in Rudolf Borchardts Essay Villa," Arcadia 1 (1966):83–96

Tgahrt, Reinhard, and others, editors, Rudolf Borchardt, Alfred Walter Heymel, Rudolf Alexander Schröder: Eine Ausstellung des Deutschen Literaturarchivs im Schiller-Nationalmuseum, Marbach am Neckar, Munich: Kösel, 1978

Vordtriede, Werner, "Rudolf Borchardt und die europäische Tradition," Jahrbuch der Deutschen Schillergesellschaft 22 (1978): 728–41

Wagner, Fred, "Restitutio in integrum: Rudolf Borchardt and the Middle Ages," Mosaic 10 (1976):165–82

Wagner, Fred, Rudolf Borchardt and the Middle Ages: Translation, Anthology and Nationalism, Frankfurt-on-Main: Lang, 1981

Borges, Jorge Luis

Argentine, 1899–1986

Although his fame rests mainly on his production of short stories, Jorge Luis Borges began his career writing poems and essays, and continued to do so throughout his life. However, there is no separate Borges the essayist, Borges the poet, or Borges the short-story writer: he continually crossed the boundaries of genre, and could philosophize as a fiction writer or be a poet when he wrote essays. For example, a text such as “Borges y yo” (“Borges and I”) is a story that is also an essay that is also a poem.

Borges’ output of essays as such is not extensive. If we include prologues (a form in which he achieved a mastery of allusion and synthesis), texts from conferences, and short essays included in miscellanies, his work in this genre amounts to no more than a dozen titles. The essays in this body of work appear somewhat disparate, like the browsings of a casual reader: reflections on gauchesco poetry, meditations on the nature of time, the exhumation of a minor poet like Evaristo Carriego—unlikely to be remembered were it not for Borges—or a note on the artificial language invented by John Wilkins in the 17th century. The three key books from this output are Discusión (1932; Discussion), Historia de la eternidad (1936; History of eternity), and Otras inquisiciones (1952; Other Inquisitions).

What strikes the reader immediately is that, in spite of the breathtaking literary knowledge he displays and the precise form in which he manages it, Borges’ tone is almost always cordial and serene, his erudition tempered by self-irony and simplicity of exposition. This was not always the case: the young essayist of the first series of Inquisiciones (1925; Inquisitions) or El tamaño de mi esperanza (1926; The length of my hope) sounds surprisingly baroque, aggressive, and labored to the point of appearing somewhat pedantic. Those were Borges’ avant-garde years, when he placed his revolutionary ardor at the service of a militant and iconoclastic criollismo, of which he was soon to recant.

Perhaps with the exception of Baldomero Sanín Cano, no one in the Americas had written essays like Borges’, because few people had read certain authors in the way he had; still less had anyone written about them with such disconcerting mastery and familiarity. As an essayist, he adopted a literary culture almost entirely alien to Latin American literature and which, thanks to Borges, would become part of its tradition. It is a culture rich in oriental books, ancient philosophers and mystics, Jewish cabbalists and gnostics, forgotten French poets, but above all in English authors. He brought attention to British writers who were little known in the Hispanic world, such as Sir Thomas Browne, John Milton, Samuel Taylor Coleridge, Thomas De Quincey, G.K.Chesterton, John Keats, William Beckford, and George Bernard Shaw, as well as to other writers such as Franz Kafka, Paul Valéry, and Walt Whitman.

What is striking is not only the uniqueness of his literary subjects as an essayist, but also his ability to say something unexpected about them. Like Paul de Man, one can say that these are “imaginary essays,” if we take this expression to mean essays from a personal imagination stimulated by the imagination of others. One of the surprises awaiting a reader who refers to the sources that inspired Borges is to discover that, on reading and interpreting them, the author added as much as (or more than) he took from them, and in this way gave them new meaning. His readings are a form of appropriation and reflected creation; he translates what he reads into his own literary language and his own aesthetic world. This secondhand creativity—of unforgettable suggestion and magic—is characteristic of Borges.

In this way Borges takes possession of all the literature he knows and integrates it into his own system. His books make up a library created by an imagination stimulated by another library. This can be seen especially in the way in which Borges read religious, metaphysical, and philosophical texts; he himself said that in authors such as Spinoza, George Berkeley, Arthur Schopenhauer, and Emanuel Swedenborg he was not interested in the truth of their theories, but rather in their aesthetic value and their ability to amaze. That is, he read them as pure exercises in thought (valid in themselves, not for their objective content) and as fictions conceived in order to explain the world.

Whatever their subject (eternity or the metaphor, Homer or the cyclic nature of time, our idea of Hell or Xenon’s paradox), however modest the form they took (book reviews, footnotes, refutations of a thesis), Borges’ essays are above all unconventional propositions, an invitation to think in a new way about something commonly accepted, a quiet intellectual dissidence. What is admirable about these proposals is that they do not impose on us a formula: everything is transformed into a hypothesis that we are free to agree with or not. The skill and seduction of the text is that, however absurd or incredible the hypothesis may appear at first, in the end the temptation to accept it is irresistible.

The major question underlying a study of Borges, essential to any investigation of literature, concerns the limits of language and how to represent the world with a succession of sounds and conventional signs (Borges, quoting Chesterton, writes of “grunts and squawks”). The very nature of language is a sober warning to the writer who wants to create something new: the most language allows us is to reiterate, with variations, what has already been said. That is, we can achieve success only by working within the tradition, not against it. In this way it is possible to understand why the theorists of modern linguistics and representatives of the French “new criticism” have found Borges’ ideas so stimulating and have added him—to their own surprise—to the list of forerunners of their most sophisticated luminaries.

JOSÉ MIGUEL OVIEDO
translated by Richard Shaw

Biography

Born 24 August 1899 in Buenos Aires. Lived with his family in Europe, 1914–21. Studied at the Collège Calvin, Geneva, 1914–18. Cofounding editor, Prisma, 1921, Proa, 1922–26, and Sur, 1931; literary adviser, Emecé Editores, Buenos Aires; columnist, El Hogar (The hearth) weekly, Buenos Aires, 1936–39. Municipal librarian, Buenos Aires, 1939–46: fired by the Perón regime. Poultry inspector, 1946–54. President, Argentine Writers Society, 1950–53. Lost his sight, 1955. Director (after Perón's deposition), National Library, 1955–73. Taught at the University of Buenos Aires, 1955–70. Married Elsa Millán, 1967 (divorced, 1970); married María Kodama, 1986. Awards: many, including Argentine Writers Society Prize, 1945; National Prize for Literature, 1957; Prix Formentor, 1961; Ingram Merrill Award, 1966; Jerusalem Prize, 1971; Reyes Prize, 1973; Cervantes Prize, 1979; Yoliztli Prize, 1981; honorary degrees from seven universities. Member, Argentine National Academy; member, Legion of Honor (France); Order of Merit (Italy), 1968; Order of Merit (German Federal Republic), 1979; Honorary Knight Commander, Order of the British Empire (KBE). Died (of liver cancer) in Geneva, 14 June 1986.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Inquisidones, 1925

El tamaño de mi esperanza, 1926

El idioma de los argentinos, 1928; enlarged edition, as El lenguaje de Buenos Aires, with José Edmundo Clemente, 1963

Discusión, 1932; revised edition, 1976

Historia de la eternidad, 1936; revised, enlarged edition, 1953

Otras inquisiciones, 1937–1952, 1952; as Other Inquisitions, 1937–1952, translated by Ruth L.C.Simms, 1964

Prólogos con un prólogo de prólogos, 1975

Siete noches, 1980; as Seven Nights, translated by Eliot Weinberger, 1984

Nueve ensayos dantescos, 1982

Textos Cautivos: Ensayos y reseñas en El Hogar (1936–1939), edited by Enrique Sacerio-Gari and Emir Rodríguez Monegal, 1986

El aleph borgiano (book reviews), edited by Juan Gustavo Cobo Borda and Martha Kavasics de Cubides, 1987

Borges, el judaismo e Israel (selected essays on Judaism), 1988

Biblioteca personal: Prólogos, 1988

Other writings: many short stories, poetry, a screenplay, and works on literature. Also edited anthologies of stories (including Antología de la literatura fantástica [The Book of Fantasy], with Silvana Ocampo and Adolfo Bioy Casares, 1940; Cuentos breves y extraordinarios [Extraordinary Tales], with Bioy Casares, 1955); translated works by Franz Kafka, Herman Melville, Thomas Carlyle, Virginia Woolf, William Faulkner, and Ralph Waldo Emerson.

Collected works editions: Obras completas, 9 vols., 1953–60, revised edition in 1 vol., edited by Carlos V.Frías, 1974; Obras completas, 2 vols., 1989.

Bibliographies

Becco, Horacio Jorge, Jorge Luis Borges: Bibliografía total, 1923–1973, Buenos Aires: Casa Pardo, 1973

Foster, David William, Jorge Luis Borges: An Annotated Primary and Secondary

Bibliography, New York and London: Garland, 1984

Further Reading

- Alazraki, Jaime, "Borges: Una nueva técnica ensayística," in El ensayo y la crítica literaria en Iberoamérica, Toronto: University of Toronto, 1970:137–43
- Alazraki, Jaime, "Oxymoronic Structure in Borges' Essays," Books Abroad 45 (1971):421–27
- Hahn, Oscar, "Borges y el arte de la dedicatoria," Revista Iberoamericana 43 (1977):691–96
- Omil de Piérola, Alba, "Jorge Luis Borges: Del ensayo a la ficción narrativa," in El ensayo y la crítica literaria en Iberoamérica, Toronto: University of Toronto, 1970:155–60
- Phillips, Katharine Kaiper, "Borges as Concomitant Critic," Latin American Literary Review 3 (1973):7–17
- Piérola, Raúl Alberto, "Temas de Jorge Luis Borges, ensayista," in El ensayo y la crítica literaria en Iberoamérica, Toronto: University of Toronto, 1970:109–15
- Rodríguez Monegal, Emir, "Borges essayiste," L'Herne (1964): 343–51
- Stabb, Martin S., "Utopia and Antiutopia: The Theme in Selected Essayistic Writings of Spanish America," Revista de Estudios Hispánicos 15 (1981):377–93
- Xirau, Ramón, "Borges refuta el tiempo," in his Antología personal, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1976:36–42
- Zalazar, Daniel E., "Los conceptos de 'instante' y 'eternidad' en la obra de Borges," in his Ensayos de interpretación, Buenos Aires: Crisol, 1976

Bourget, Paul

French, 1852–1935

Though best known for the novels of psychological analysis that gained him a wide reputation in his lifetime, Paul Bourget also made frequent use of the opportunities provided by the French periodical press of his day to present in essays his thoughts about pressing contemporary issues.

His travel writings reveal a good deal about his approach. Crossing over to the United Kingdom for a succession of short visits in the 1880s and 1890s, he came not only well prepared by his wide reading of English classics and what were then the most modern authors, but also with his intellectual agenda already drawn up. Whether on the Isle of Wight in the holiday season, in an Ireland simmering with political discontent, or at Oxford in high summer, the same questions concern him: in what ways does Britain differ from France? And what can discontented Frenchmen learn from the island on the other side of the Channel? In this he is not unlike Voltaire, author of the 18th-century Letters Concerning the English Nation (1733; Lettres philosophiques), with his urge to observe and his restless intellectual curiosity; like Voltaire, Bourget uses to good effect the dodge of sometimes posing as the innocent abroad while in fact pursuing his own theories and analysis. Though he offers alert and entertaining descriptions of the manners of Victorian England and presents Ireland as a country with a different set of acute problems of its own, he is not primarily concerned with evoking the places he visits. By the same token, despite a few personal details to give an initial narrative impetus to his accounts, lend them an air of authenticity, or else provide variety in authorial stance, his travel writings are not really concerned with what he did and felt, where he went and what he saw. Instead, he uses his experience of Britain for an analysis of a country which he realizes is different from his own yet which, despite the problems, prejudices, and incongruities of the Victorian age, he feels is also in many respects more successful than France. To some degree the difference is material; influenced by Hippolyte Taine, Bourget is not predisposed to underestimate economic factors, but in them he sees the consequences of decades of peace under stable monarchical government, especially for a middle class that establishes and maintains its ever more crucial position between an aristocracy whose importance is fading and a proletariat that threatens established values. The implication throughout Bourget's travel writing is that France is in a comparatively parlous state and would be well advised to consider carefully, if not to follow closely, the example of Britain.

A similar spirit informs Bourget's literary essays. In 1883 he set out his program in the preface to his first set of Essais de psychologie contemporaine (Essays in contemporary psychology). His concern, he declares, is not to analyze the literary means by which authors have sought to express themselves, and he also abjures the Sainte-Beuvean temptation to present or explain this or that trait in a writer by reference to a supposedly revealing anecdote. He has, he says, no desire to assess the talents of authors or to depict their personalities. Instead, his ambition is to provide observations that will be of value when historians turn to writing an intellectual history of France in the second half of the 19th century. While conceding that many factors contribute to the intellectual climate of any age, Bourget argues for granting a more significant part to literature in the 19th century for two reasons in particular: other, traditional formative influences are steadily forfeiting their importance, and the reading of printed material is playing an ever greater role in contemporary culture. In the preface to the second volume (1885) of Essais de psychologie contemporaine, Bourget is more explicit. What he seeks to portray in his studies of 19th-century authors are, he explains, the social tendencies in French literature during the Second Empire. In an aside ostensibly providing a clarification that none of his original readers can in fact have needed, he adds the ominous reminder that the period stretched from Louis-Napoleon's coup d'état to the disastrous Franco-Prussian War and the 1871 Commune. One could perhaps have supposed that the imperial debacle itself was explanation enough for the malaise endemic among young people in France during the Third Republic. For Bourget, however, it is the literature of the preceding generation that has left them imbued with deep-rooted pessimism, fatal mental lassitude, and the gloomy conviction that all effort is futile. His answer to the problem, when critics asked him, is that he has none. It seems, however, that his diagnosis points at least to a change of literary role models, just as his travel writing and his novels suggest that the Third Republic was not the ideal response to ills inherited from the discredited Third Empire.

Though Bourget avers that other French authors might well have been considered, those on whom he concentrates make an impressive list: Baudelaire, Renan, Flaubert, Taine, Stendhal, Alexandre Dumas fils, Leconte de Lisle, the Goncourt brothers, the Russian novelist Turgenev, and the Genevan diarist Amiel. Notwithstanding his intention of putting forward his thesis, Bourget discusses these writers sympathetically and in measured tones. He does justice to Dumas as a successful and serious-minded dramatist before drawing our attention to the vein of pessimism about human nature that he sees as fundamental to the plays. He is at pains to be fair to Amiel too, before going on to argue that the diarist stands at the convergence of two traditions, which he calls Germanic and Latin respectively, using the former term to designate a pattern of negative attitudes and response that might be summed up in the convenient shorthand of the adjective “Hamletic.” Before turning to an analysis of Flaubert’s nihilism, Bourget pauses for a penetrating account of the role Romanticism played in the development of the novelist’s outlook.

Well informed and informative, couched in lucid French with crisp formulations, Bourget’s literary essays offer insights that retain their validity even for readers who may prefer not to adhere to the general thesis that he draws from his serious study of the writers of his day.

CHRISTOPHER SMITH

Biography

Paul Charles Joseph Bourget. Born 2 September 1852. in Amiens. Abandoned Catholicism, 1867. Studied at the Lycée Louis-le-Grand, Paris, 1867–71, baccalauréat, 1871, licence in philosophy, 1872. Contributor to various periodicals, including the Revue des Deux Mondes (Review of two worlds), from 1873, and Journal des Débats (Journal of debates); drama critic, Le Globe, 1879, and Le Parlement, 1880–82. Married Minnie David (died, 1932), 1890. Visited Palestine, 1893; lived in New York, 1893–94, writing for the New York Herald and Le Figaro. Elected to the French Academy, 1895. Reverted to Catholicism, 1901. Died (of pneumonia) in Paris, 25 December 1935.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Essais de psychologie contemporaine, 2 vols., 1883–85; revised and enlarged edition, 2 vols., 1901

Études et portraits, 2 vols., 1888; revised edition, 3 vols., 1906; part as Some Impressions of Oxford, translated by M.C. Warrilow, 1901

Pastels: Dix portraits de femmes, 1889

Nouveaux pastels: Dix portraits d’hommes, 1891; as Pastels of Men, translated by Katharine Wormeley, 2 vols., 1891–92

Pages de critique et de doctrine, 2 vols., 1912

Nouvelles pages de critique et de doctrine, 2 vols., 1922

Quelques témoignages, 2 vols., 1928–33

Sur la Toscane, 1929

Au service de l'ordre, 2 vols., 1929–33

Other writings: 28 novels (including Le Disciple [The Disciple], 1889), many collections of short stories, seven plays, travel writing, and poetry.

Collected works edition: Œuvres complètes, 9 vols., 1899–1911 (incomplete).

Further Reading

Austin, Lloyd J., Paul Bourget: Sa vie et son œuvre jusqu'en 1889, Paris: Droz, 1940
 Crouzet, Michel, “La Mode, le moderne, le contemporain chez Paul Bourget: Une lecture des Essais de psychologie contemporaine,” Saggi e Ricerche de Letteratura Francese 26 (1987):27–63

Feuillerat, Albert, Paul Bourget: Histoire d'un esprit sous la Troisième République, Paris: Plon, 1937

Garrett, Crister, Paul Bourget and the Politics of Traditionalism (dissertation), Los Angeles: University of California, 1993

Giraud, Victor, Paul Bourget, Paris: Bloud et Gay, 1934

Klerkx, Henri, Paul Bourget et ses idées littéraires, Nimègue-Utrecht: Dekker en van de Veegt, 1946

Mansuy, Michel, Un moderne: Paul Bourget: De l'enfance au disciple, Paris: Les Belles-Lettres, 1960

Singer, Armand E., Paul Bourget, Boston: Twayne, 1976

Boy-Żeleński

Polish, 1874–1941

Tadeusz Żeleński, called Boy, is one of the most unusual and colorful personalities in the cultural life of 20th-century Poland. He was a practicing doctor, poet, theater critic, columnist, sometime literary director of the Polish Theater, professor of French literature, but above all the most ingenious translator of French literature Poland has had. The role Boy-Żeleński played in the literary world in Poland can be compared to that of Sainte-Beuve in France or of George Saintsbury in England. In old-fashioned cultural terms, one might call him a libertine; in political terms he was a liberal. For all his vast interests, erudition, and tremendous output, he was not, however, an original mind; rather, he was a perceptive, talented, and provocative essayist.

Although Boy-Żeleński is chiefly known as an expert on French literature, his most significant essays are those devoted to his native literature. Most of them are, so to speak, “correctives” to established interpretations. With his characteristic wit and irony and his beautiful style, Boy-Żeleński attacked and ridiculed the recognized scholars—called by him the “gilders” (brązownicy)—for purposefully glossing over the “uncomfortable” details from the lives of great writers and for treating literature as national mythology rather than as a source of human self-knowledge. A model of literary culture for Boy-Żeleński was France, where “one walks around the great genius, one describes him, as if he were a lion or a tiger. One assumes a disinterested scientific approach... One buries him in the Pantheon—but one never overlooks any of his weaknesses. Profanation? I do not think so; rather, the conviction that the mystery of genius lies elsewhere than in ordinary perfection. This ‘mundane, archmundane,’ from which it is born, is the most touching mystery...to catch the moment when genius gels is the most fantastic task of literary criticism” (“Mickiewicz a my” [1928; Mickiewicz and us]). Unlike in France, in Poland, Boy-Żeleński claims, the poets are treated like “gilded gods.” In his provocative essay “Mickiewicz a my”—devoted to the greatest of the Polish Romantics—he launches an unprecedented attack on Mickiewicz’s messianism and his critics. Messianism, according to Boy-Żeleński, is the reaction of an emigrant poet from a country erased from the political map of Europe to the newborn bourgeoisie indifferent to everything that cannot be translated into the values of a commercial society. “Destroy all the monuments of Mickiewicz,” Boy-Żeleński states in his conclusion, “melt them down and cast from them a cannon, and load it with a number of critics of Mickiewicz’s works.” His essay, in which he concentrates on pointing out what was truly original in Mickiewicz, is a novelty in the traditional approach. The Mickiewicz who emerges from Boy-Żeleński’s pen is not a national hero but a great Romantic, perhaps the greatest of all the European Romantics; but as a man, however ingenious, he is not free from weaknesses and errors. Messianism was an “illness”—the illness which afflicted Mickiewicz and then was thoughtlessly glorified by his critics.

Many of Boy-Żeleński’s objections are fully justified and insightful. He is at his worst, however, when his reading is informed by his anticlericalism and his liberal attitude to social life. For example, in “Tajemnica Pascala” (1931; Pascal’s secret), he draws a comparison between the “canonization” of Mickiewicz by his critics in Poland and the attempt on the part of the members of Port-Royal to hide certain details of Pascal’s life in order to attain for him the status of a saint, without noticing, however, that Pascal’s case weakens his own claim about the objectivity of the French approach to literature.

Boy-Żeleński’s work as a translator—quite apart from his intention of filling in the gaps of Polish literary culture—was not merely a matter of rendering in his native tongue the best of French literary achievements. He considered his translations to be a means of counteracting “the didactic tone, temerity, and narrow moral considerations” characteristic of Polish literature. In “O literaturze niemoralnej” (1924; On immoral literature), Boy-Żeleński invokes as examples Octave from Alfred de Musset’s La Confession d’un enfant du siècle (1836; The Confession of a Child of the Century) and Montaigne’s “sober analysis of drunkenness” in order to illustrate the salutary character of “immorality” for “self-knowledge”: “This exhibitionism of one’s self, to its most hidden throbs of thought, the analysis of the motivation standing behind man’s every deed, the attempts to show the shortcomings of human nature in man’s fraudulence—this is the content of almost the whole of French literature. The Pole does all that, perhaps, only at the confessional.”

This search for self-knowledge went hand-in-hand with the development of the French language. In his essay (1925) on La Rochefoucauld’s Maxims (1664), Boy-Żeleński emphasizes the beneficial character of the word games played in 17th-century salons for the precision of the French language. For instance, the maxim questioning whether “one forgives infidelity, but one does not forget it,” or whether “one forgets infidelity, but one does not forgive it,” was originally half a page long; only after the process of “purification” in the course of heated salon discussions did it take on its present form. Such apparent idle considerations contributed to making French as precise as possible.

The soundness and brilliance of many of his observations notwithstanding, a closer look at Boy-Żeleński’s methodology reveals weaknesses. For one thing, French literature is really the only literature with which he makes comparisons; many of his criticisms of Polish literature could with equal force be applied to English and German literature. It seems that the differences between Polish and French literatures—which Boy-Żeleński sometimes claimed had their roots in the Poles’ being “genetically” deprived of the sense of curiosity so characteristic in the French—stem simply from the different historical circumstances which shaped the literary, political, and social lives of the two nations. Probably Boy-Żeleński’s greatest merit was to stir up the Polish literary world, making later critics analyze Polish literature in a broader context.

ZBIGNIEW JANOWSKI

Biography

Born 21 December 1874 in Warsaw. Studied medicine at Jagiellonian University, Cracow, 1892–99. Medical doctor, Cracow, 1901–18. Script writer for Zielony Balonik (Green balloon), the celebrated cabaret in Cracow, from 1906; theater critic, from 1919; literary director, Polish Theater, Warsaw, 1922–23. Contributor to various journals, including Kurier Poranny (Morning messenger), IKC, and the London émigré weekly Wiadomości Literackie (Literary news). Worked on behalf of the organization of “conscious motherhood,” 1930s; fought for the reform of marital law and against the supremacy of clericalism in culture and social life. Moved to Lvov after the outbreak of World War II. Chair of the Department of the French Literature, University of Lvov, after 1939. Member, Polish Academy of Literature. Awards: French Academy Award for Translation, 1914; Knight, Legion of Honor, 1922; Polish Society of Publishers Award, 1928; Warsaw Literary Prize, 1933. Arrested by Nazis after the seizure of Lvov; executed, along with other members of the Polish intelligentsia, 3 July 1941.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Stówka, 1913

Flirt z Melpomeną (theater reviews), 10 vols., 1920–32

Studia i szkice z literatury francuskiej, 1920

Nowe studia z literatury francuskiej, 1922

Ludzie żywi, 1929

Brązownicy, 1930

Zmysły-zmysły, 1932

Nieco mitologii, 1935

Szkice o literaturze francuskiej (includes Studia i szkice z literatury francuskiej and Nowe studia z literatury francuskiej), edited by Wanda Balicka, 2 vols., 1956

Romanse cieniów: Wybór recenzji teatralnych (theater reviews), edited by Józef Hen, 1987

O literaturze niemoralnej: Szkice literackie, edited by Henryk Markiewicz, 1990

Other writings: poetry, works on literature, books defending birth control (Pieśń kobiet, 1930) and advocating the reform of marriage laws (Dziewice Konsystorskie), a biography of King John III Sobieski's French wife, and memoirs (Znasz li ten kraj?, 1931). Also translated many authors from the French, including Montaigne, Balzac, Molière, Beaumarchais, Marivaux, Musset, Villon, Brantôme, La Rochefoucauld, Descartes, Pascal, Rabelais, Diderot, Voltaire, Constant, Chateaubriand, Rousseau, Stendhal, Proust, Gide, and Jarry, as well as Tristan et Iseut and La Chanson de Roland.

Collected works edition: Pisma, edited by Henryk Markiewicz, 28 vols. 1956–75.

Further Reading

Bouteron, Marcel, Études balzacienes, Paris: Jouve, 1954

Makowiecki, Andrzej, Tadeusz Żeleński Boy, Warsaw: Wiedza Powszechna, 1974

Miłosz, Czesław, The History of Polish Literature, Berkeley: University of California Press, 2nd edition, 1983 (original edition, 1969)

Natanson, Wojciech, Boy-Żeleński: Opowieść biograficzna, Warsaw: Ludowa Spółdzielnia Wydawnicza, 1977

Brault, Jacques

French Canadian, 1933–

If one were to choose a single essay as most representative of Jacques Brault's work, "Petite suite émilienne" (1986; A suite of Emilys) would probably come to mind. After meandering about Emily Dickinson's poetry, the author goes on to discover "other Emilys" all over the world, in England (Emily Brontë), in Germany (Annette von Droste-Hülshoff), in France (Danielle Collobert), in Scotland (Margaret Tait), and finally in his native Quebec, for his last Emily—or more precisely Émilienne—is the essayist's own mother. His "rêverie textuelle" (textual reverie) has led him from literature to autobiography, thus stressing the fact that reading is a double gesture: reaching out is always reaching in.

A medievalist by trade, Brault is a professor, poet, novelist, dramatist, editor, translator, critic, publisher, and essayist—a complete homme de lettres. His works of criticism concern mostly Quebec poets (Émile Nelligan, Alain Grandbois, Saint-Denis Garneau, Gaston Miron, Juan Garcia), but, whatever the nature of his writing, it is nurtured by texts from all countries and periods, be it Japanese haiku or Diderot's Neveu de Rameau, E.M.Cioran's aphorisms, or modern French poetry (Baudelaire, Laforgue, Verlaine, Apollinaire, Char, Michaux). Among the many topics he addresses, melancholy, friendship, solidarity, time, and silence are especially frequent. In the visual arts (painting, engraving, collage, drawing), he describes himself as an amateur and apprentice, eager to master yet another language (he illustrates his own books as well as those of others).

It is tempting to explain this hunger for learning new modes of expression by referring to one of Brault's most frequent metaphors, that of the road. His first book of essays was called Chemin faisant (1975; On the way), and his second, La Poussière du chemin (1989; The dirt of the road). Many of his books of poetry convey similar images: Migration (1979), Trois fois passera (1981; It will come around three times), Il n'y a plus de chemin (1990; On the Road No More). The street and the neighborhood are the poet's favorite loci. For the essayist, everything is always evolving: people, works of art, knowledge and the ways to achieve it. A writer worthy of the name never ceases to learn how to read and to follow new paths.

Humility and humor are needed if one is to be a good student and a good reader. The first quality is most visible in Brault's attention to the texts or works of art he comments on; far from submitting them to any preconceived method of analysis, he instead reveals where he believes their meaning lies by means of comparisons and parallels. He makes no apologies for his subjectivity or for using the present time and his own person as the basis for his analysis. There is a humility in this method that is underlined by the recurrent use of the adjective "petit" (small), as if Brault's investigations must be limited in scope to be effective. As for Brault's humor, often overlooked by critics, this is evidenced by his many tongue-in-cheek remarks, as in Ô saisons, ô châteaux (1991; Oh seasons, oh castles; the title is borrowed from Rimbaud), as well as by the word games he plays and his propensity for mocking intellectual fashions.

Brault's style is striking, as a close reading of "Petite Suite émilienne" reveals. His background in philosophy and medieval literature is often visible in his choice of vocabulary. Since he refuses to see the world dualistically, he needs words that will deal with its complexity—hence the many neologisms created with negative prefixes: "désenferme," "inévidence," "non-savoir," and the importance of oxymora, as in "éternité d'un instant" (eternity of an instant). Paradoxes abound in his texts: "She is young and old. Provider and sterile." Brault also likes words seldom used in modern French—"inconnnaissance," "trembleuse"—and is fond of Québécois colloquialisms. He likes to quote at length, for he refuses to lose sight of the object of his divagations. This is not to say that his essays read like affected prose; his language adapts well to the contours of his subject matter.

Brault's humility leads him to provide his readers, whom he often addresses directly, as in a dialogue or a letter, with his personal recollections of his contacts with the world of art. He depicts himself as a reader ("I have only one craft: reading"), as an amateur, and as an apprentice constantly refining his tools—words and images. Central to his work is the "I" who proceeds cautiously to approach the world from his particular point of view. That is the "I" perceived in the marginalia of Chemin faisant, and heard in the last lines of "Petite Suite émilienne": "Émilienne loved me so much—in spite of herself, in spite of me." These closing lines are not a conclusion; they do not summarize a literary analysis. They leave open the essayist's relation to his subject matter, as well as his personal history. This openness, this surrender to the power of the literary and artistic journey, characterizes Jacques Brault as an essayist.

Biography

Born 29 March 1933 in Montreal. Studied at the Collège SainteMarie, Montreal, graduated 1954; philosophy at the University of Montreal, M.A., 1958; the Sorbonne, Paris, and at Poitiers, 1958–60. Married Madeleine Breton, 1955: one daughter. Professor of medieval studies (and later of French literature), University of Montreal, 1960–96. Contributor to various magazines and journals, including Parti Pris (We affirm) and Liberté (Liberty); literary critic and producer of literary radio programming for Radio-Canada. Awards: France-Canada Prize, for poetry, 1969; Duvernay Prize, 1978; Governor-General's Award, for drama, 1970, and for fiction, 1984; David Prize, 1986.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Chemin faisant, 1975

La Poussière du chemin, 1989

Ô saisons, ô châteaux, 1991

Other writings: poetry, short plays, work for television and radio, short stories, a novel (Agonie [Death-Watch], 1984), and a study on Alain Grandbois (1968). Also coedited the work of Saint-Denys Garneau (1971).

Further Reading

Dumont, François, "L'Essai littéraire québécois des années quatrevingt: La Collection 'Papiers collés'," Recherches Sociographiques 33, no. 2 (1992.):323–35

Lemaire, Michel, "Jacques Brault essayiste," Voix et Images 35 (Winter 1987):222–38

Lévesque, Claude, Le Proche et le lointain, Montreal: VLB, 1994

Paquin, Jacques, "Écriture et interlocution chez Jacques Brault," Voix et Images 57 (Spring 1994):568–84

Březina, Otokar

Czech, 1868–1929

Between 1895 and 1901 Otokar Březina, the leading representative of Czech literary symbolism, published five collections of poetry. These received the attention of the foremost critics of the day and have surpassed all other literature of that period in their importance. It is no coincidence that, in addition to his poetry, Březina also wrote essays. He soon realized—probably stimulated by his reading of Maurice Maeterlinck and Ernest

Hello—that great versatility was possible in the essay form. The 1890s, when Březina's essays began appearing in magazines, is now considered the period of some of the best Czech essayistic works. The authors of that time, particularly František Xaver Šalda, the founder of the Czech critical essay, and Březina, the most prominent personality of the poetic essay, laid the foundations of Czech essay writing.

Březina's first book of essays, Hudba pramenů (1903; The music of the springs), and the second, Skryté dějiny (Hidden History)—not published until 1970, long after his death—are artistic expressions of the positive qualities of life, as well as a rich source of Březina's artistic and aesthetic views. In both books the poet deals with fundamental questions of life and art. The essays of Hudba pramenů, written at the same time as his books of poems, make the spiritual and imaginative process of these books in a certain sense more complete, bringing them closer to the reader. Hudba pramenů is a transitional book in the sense that it represents an intermediate stage linking Březina's artistic, aesthetic, and philosophical attitudes with those he had arrived at when he was still writing verse. In Hidden History, written mostly during World War I, the center of interest shifts from art to life. Březina's extraordinary inner strength and certainty in such an uncertain period are clear from the fact that he did not lose his belief in humankind and his creative abilities even in the most difficult years of the war.

In his essays Březina tries, in his often overly rich metaphorical language, to express all the infinite changes of the “hidden history” of the human soul, earth, and cosmos, which—although they take place in a latent, invisible manner, as if under the surface—nonetheless remain the moving force, and therefore the real reason, of all life. It was especially in his essays that the poet was able to find enough space to contemplate freely all the disturbing problems whose solutions became partial contributions to his efforts to achieve a synthesis; he never gave up the search for life's inner core or its unifying meaning, its coherence with truth, beauty, and action. Březina never abandoned his attempt to penetrate—“burn through”—to the essence of things. His will for truth and consequently his will for action did not diminish in spite of his literary silence. The poet's “eternal longing” for a harmonization of all contradictions of life and art, his longing to embrace the world in the totality of its changes and to arrive at the original unity of all cosmic beings, the compelling inner necessity to satisfy fully and truthfully the need for the essence of things, became a fully concrete expression of man trying to achieve unity with himself and the world.

Březina's essays frequently return to the themes of social inequality, poverty, and misery. During the war the poet experienced the oppression of nations and the suffering of the masses. In his essays, from a deep conviction about the importance of a spiritual reality for humankind, grows the permanent necessity for a love which can overcome pain and suffering. There is a great longing for collectivity as well as for peace. In particular, the essay “Mír” (“Peace”) which concludes Hidden History represents the highest values in Czech literature. According to the Czech literary critic Miloš Dvořák, this is one of the most profound works to emerge from Czech literature and should be read and analyzed by all nations.

In the history of Czech literature Březina's essays occupy an exceptional position, even though until now their importance has not been fully understood or appreciated. They are considered to be the most mature form of poetic prose of the 1890s, a time characterized by contradictions in both society and culture as well as in literature, philosophy, politics, and aesthetics. In this sense, his works also represent a search for a way to overcome and harmonize all contradictions; they are one of the solutions which, by their greatness, originality, and courage of conception, won the admiration and respect of those who were not otherwise among the admirers of the poet's work. The mere existence of essays of this caliber is an "utter novelty" in Czech literature, according to Józef Zarek (1979), who describes them as "a work so unique that we may have difficulty in finding analogies with them in present-day literature." Miroslav Červenka (1969) explains that these essays are meant to "present the reader with the drama of ideas themselves, the drama of human collectives, cosmic processes, and even earthly matters." While they undoubtedly contribute to an understanding of his poetry, they are also Březina's most systematic aesthetic confession, from which later Czech artistic and literary criticism was derived.

While the essays make understanding Březina's poetic work easier, they are not a mere accompaniment, appendix, or explanatory commentary on the verses; they represent an autonomous work of art. From them and Březina's correspondence we can clearly see that the poet never gave himself up to uncritical admiration of the works of the Indian poets and philosophers or Christian mystics and intellectuals of the Middle Ages. Even when he is fully occupied with the study of Maeterlinck, Hello, Schopenhauer, Nietzsche, Novalis, Poe, Emerson, or Solov'ev, Březina is fully conscious of his own art, preserving his independence and critical distance from the start.

The list of synonyms by which Březina's essays were designated in the past (prose, poetic prose, philosophical prose, meditation, essayistic meditation, philosophical meditation, rhapsody, essay, philosophical essay), indicates how difficult it was to classify them appropriately and how unusual their position was in the literary world. Whatever name we may give them, clearly Březina gave concrete support to Šalda's principle of synthesisism, trying to realize in his essays his theoretical idea of the integration of art and life, in a completely new kind of essay writing.

PETR HOLMAN

Biography

Born Václav Ignác Jebavy, 13 September 1868 in Počátky, South Bohemia. Used the pseudonyms Václav Danšovský, 1886–92, and Otokar Březina, from 1892. Studied at primary and lower secondary schools in Počátky and at higher secondary school in Telč. Taught at schools in Jinošov, 1887–88, Nová Říše, 1888–1901, and Jaroměřice nad Rokytnou, from 1901. Published his first lyric and epic compositions, sketches, and short stories in the journals Vesna (Spring) and Orel (Eagle), from 1886; worked on the never published and ultimately destroyed Román Eduarda Brunnera (Novel of Eduard Brunner), from 1888; his poems began to appear regularly in journals such as Vesna, Moderní revue (The modern review), Rozhledy (Outlook), Almanach secese (The almanac of secession), and Nový život (The new life), from 1892; his essays began to appear in various journals, from 1897. Corresponding member, 1913, and full member, 1923, Czech Academy of Arts and Sciences. Awards: Czech State Prize, 1928; honorary degree from Charles University, Prague. Died in Jaroměřice nad Rokytnou, 25 March 1929.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Hudba pramenů, 1903

Prvotiny, edited by Miloslav Hýsek, 1933

Prosa, edited by Miloslav Hýsek, 1933

Nové eseje, edited by Otakar Fiala, Matěj Lukšů, and Emanuel Chalupný, 1934

Eseje z pozůstalosti, edited by Otakar Fiala, 1967

Skryté dějiny, edited by Josef Zika, 1970; as Hidden History, translated by Carleton Myles Bulkin, forthcoming

Esej, edited by Josef Glivický, 1988

Hudba pramenů a jiné eseje, edited by Petr Holman, 1989; revised, enlarged edition, as Eseje, 1996

Fragmenty, edited by Petr Holman, 1989 (unofficial publication)

Dokumenty, edited by Petr Holman, 1991 (unofficial publication)

Other writings: five volumes of poetry (Tajemné dálky, 1895; Svítání na západě, 1896; Větry od pólů, 1897; Stavitel chrámu, 1899; Ruce, 1901), short stories, and correspondence.

Collected works editions: Spisy, edited by Miloslav Hýsek, 3 vols., 1933–39; Básnickí spisy, edited by Miroslav Červenka, 1975.

Bibliographies

Holman, Petr, and Jana Sedláková, Otokar Březina, Bibliografie 3, Brno: Státní Vědecká Knihovna, 1988

Kubiček, Jaromír, Otokar Březina: Soupis literatury o jeho životě a díle, Brno: Universitní Knihovna v Brně, 1971

Papírník, Miloš, and Anna Zykmondová, Knížní dílo Otokara Březiny, Brno: Universitní Knihovna v Brně, 1969

Riess, Jiří, "Bibliografie," in Stavitel chrámu, edited by Emanuel Chalupný and others, Prague: (in, 1941:255–74

Further Reading

Červenka, Miroslav, "Tematické posloupnosti v Březinově próze," Česká Literatura 17 (1969):141–58

Deml, Jakub, Mé svědectví o Otokaru Březinovi, Olomouc: VOTOBIA, 1994 (original edition, 1931)

Fraenkl, Pavel, Otokar Březina, Prague: Melantrich, 1937 Heftrich, Urs, Otokar Březina, zur Rezeption Schopenhauers und Nietzsches im tschechischen Symbolismus, Heidelberg: Winter, 1993

Holman, Petr, K historii vzniku a vydávání Březinových esejů, Prague: Literární Archiv, Sborník Památníku Národního Písemnictví, 1989:135–85

- Holman, Petr, Frequenzwörterbuch zum lyrischen Werk von Otokar Březina, Cologne, Weimar, and Vienna: Böhlau, 2 vols., 1993
- Hyde, Lawrence, "Otokar Březina—A Czech Mystic," Slavonic Review 2, no. 6 (March 1924):547–57
- Jelínek, Hanuš, "Un poète de la fraternité des âmes: Otokar Březina," Revue de Genève 2 (1929):223–36
- Králík, Oldřich, Otokar Březina 1892–1907: Logika jeho díla, Prague: Melantrich, 1948
- Lakomá, Emilie, Úlomky hovorů Otokara Březiny, edited by Petr Holman, Brno: Jota & Arca Jimfa, 1992
- Lakomá, Emilie, "Dodatky k Úlomkům hovorů Otokara Březiny," BOX 1, no. 1 (1994):40–47
- Marten, Miloš, Otokar Březina, Prague: Symposion, 1903
- Marten, Miloš, Akkord: Mácha, Zeyer, Březina, Prague: Kočí, 1916
- Novák, Arne, "Otokar Březina, Obituary," Slavonic Review 8, no. 22 (June 1929):206–09
- Selver, Percy Paul, Otokar Březina: A Study in Czech Literature, Oxford: Blackwell, 1921
- Slavík, Bedřich, "Březinův essay," Archa 18, no. 4 (1930):257–78
- Slavík, Bedřich, "Essay Březinův a Unamunův," Akord 3, no. 9 (1930):374–80; 3, no. 10 (1930):403–07
- Vesely, Antonín, Otokar Březina, Brno: Moravské kolo Spisovatelů, 1928
- Zarek, Józef, Eseistyka Otokara Březiny, Wrocław: Ossolineum, 1979
- Zika, Josef, Otokar Březina, Prague: Melantrich, 1970

British Essay

The history of the British essay traces a complex, entwined rise and fall of various emphases. At certain moments, as in the early 19th century, essays celebrate the experiences and personalities of their authors, while at others, as during the Victorian period, the exploration of ideas predominates. At times the essayist's goal is to entertain or render an aesthetic effect, while at others it is to argue a point, and in still others, as in the case of George Orwell, it is to do both. Essayists take their subject matter variously from minor casual events, from literary performances, from political situations, or from the exploration of timeless truths. The genre shifts in relation to neighboring genres—the treatise, the article, the letter, the character sketch, the short story—and even breaks out occasionally in verse. Nonetheless, the steady trajectory of the genre in the 400 years since its British inception is toward short prose pieces that represent ideas as being formed and shaped not through a formal method, but through the consciousness and experience of writers as they interact with the world.

1. Origins and the 17th Century

Perhaps no other genre in British literature appears to have had so clear a beginning.

When Francis Bacon (1561–1626) published the first edition of his Essayes or Counsels, Civill and Morall in 1597, he introduced the genre to the Englishspeaking world, some 17 years after Montaigne had done the same for the French. (As early as 1584 James VI of Scotland, later James I of England, had characterized some writings as essays, though these do not match the genre as presently recognized.) Fittingly, the definitional issues that have marked the essay throughout its history were present at its very birth. A few 20th-century critics, including the essayist J.B.Priestley, have gone so far as to argue that Bacon's works are not essays in the core sense of the genre.

Montaigne's essays are characterized by an insistent firstperson voice. Whether he discusses his reading, his thoughts, or his experiences, the consciousness that shapes his writing is transparently his own. His essays meander and digress, though always more purposefully than might first appear, and their effect is of a man exploring his world and regularly being surprised at what he discovers in the process. In contrast, Bacon's essays almost entirely lack personal references. Propositional rather than experiential, they strike modern readers as having a sermonic, rhetorical quality that contrasts sharply with Montaigne's more casual works, a quality reflected even in their titles: "Of Truth," "Of Studies," "Of Death," and so on. Contributing to this aphoristic effect is the brevity of Bacon's essays, most of them only a page or so long. Bacon published three editions, in 1597, 1612, and 1625, and each was marked by the addition of more essays and the revision, usually by expansion, of works from earlier editions. However, even the pieces in the 1625 edition remain shorter and less obviously personal than those by Montaigne.

Still, Bacon's essays enact qualities beyond relative brevity that would, over the centuries, define the genre. Most importantly, they present multiple perspectives on a given topic. The successions of aphorisms that constitute the essays generally take one position, then its almost opposite, before eventually landing somewhere in the middle. The effect is to represent thought as it occurs rather than to report its results. Later essayists would join Bacon's exploratory method of thinking-in-progress with more explicit narratives of experience and self.

Two factors promoted the rise of the essay during the early 17th century. As demonstrated by Bacon's other works, such as The Advancement of Learning (1605), the bases of knowledge were shifting at this time. Previously, knowledge was still founded on the authority of earlier writers and on principles of deduction. Around 1600, however, observation and experiment began to emerge as plausible and desirable. Since observations were a function of observers, the nature, circumstances, and experiences of the writer became an element for consideration, not just disdain.

Second, during the 17th century several new prose forms proliferated. Three types of writings approached the essayistic: aphoristic writings, such as Ben Jonson's (1572–1637) Timber, or Discoveries (1641), character sketches, such as those by Sir Thomas Overbury (1581–1613) and Nicholas Breton (c. 1545/55–c. 1626), and meditative prose, such as Robert Burton's (1577–1640) Anatomy of Melancholy (1621) and Sir Thomas Browne's (1605–82) Religio Medici (1642, revised 1643), many chapters of which are frequently anthologized as essays and were criticized by some on publication for narrating personal concerns. John Donne's (1572–1631) Meditations (wr. 1612–15, Pub. 1651), by virtue of their brevity, occasional nature, and reflective quality are directly in the essay tradition.

Though perhaps less grounded in presentations of self than these three, the argumentative philosophical treatises of writers like Thomas Hobbes (1588–1679) influenced the genre. John Locke’s (1632–1704) An Essay Concerning Human Understanding (1689) is the most obvious such work, but it is also problematic because its sheer length distinguishes it from essays as usually understood. Locke’s decision to call his work an essay reflects, ultimately, his sense of the method and conditional nature of the work, and it prefigures a later common tendency to speak of “essayistic” qualities of works that themselves are not strictly essays. Finally, and perhaps most significantly, the 17th century also witnessed an expansion of various other types of what might be called “utilitarian” prose writing: travels, biographies, diaries and journals, pamphlets, journalism, and letters. The close affinities during this period between the essay and the letter, both characterized by informality, spontaneity, and a measure of egotism on the part of the author, can be noted in the publishing practice of mixing the genres, as in Charles Gildon’s (1665–1724) Miscellaneous Letters and Essays (1694).

Shortly following the publication of Bacon’s essays, Sir William Cornwallis the Younger (1579–1614) published two volumes of Essays (1600, 1601), in them characterizing the genre in ways that would be repeated through its history: the essay as tentative practice work, “like a Scrivenor trying his pen,” the result being prose that at best is “undigested motions.” Cornwallis’ writings inhabited a territory between Bacon and Montaigne, demonstrating more of the latter’s presentation of self. Even further in this direction were Abraham Cowley’s (1618–67) Several Discourses by Way of Essays, in Verse and Prose (1668), terse pieces each concluding in verse that further challenged the formal definitions of the new genre.

2. The 18th Century: The Essay Transformed by Periodicals

A significant development in the evolution of the essay was the rise of periodical journalism near the beginning of the 18th century. News had been published as early as the 1620s to 1650s; however, by the end of the century periodicals were actively publishing more than accounts of events. The advent of popular periodicals had two important consequences for essays and essayists. First, the regular access to a consistent readership invited essayists to adopt a more familiar, as opposed to formal, style, as if they were corresponding with known readers. Second, the periodical format enhanced the occasional and topical nature of the essay. Not only could writers use current events as points of departure, but the range of appropriate occasions expanded to include personal experiences in the lives of the authors (as in Addison’s “A Visit to Westminster Abbey”) and even fictional ones, as in the Spectator’s Sir Roger de Coverley papers.

Daniel Defoe’s (1660–1731) copious journalistic efforts helped create a space for periodical essays. His works appeared in such short-lived magazines as Mist’s Journal and Applebee’s Journal. In A Review of the Affairs of France (1704–13), most of which he wrote as well as edited, Defoe published opinions on current political topics as well as lighter articles on topics like marriage and gambling. One section of the Review, “Mercur Scandale, or Advice from the Scandalous Club,” provided the germ of the Tatler and Spectator, without a doubt the most important periodicals in the early history of the genre.

Richard Steele (1672–1729) began publishing the Tatler in April 1709 and was quickly joined by Joseph Addison (1672–1719). The Tatler appeared three times a week, and its newspaper-like format invited casual reading in spare moments. As a result its essays were compact and graceful, balancing a need to entertain with its authors' desires to comment on contemporary life and suggest attitudes and behaviors to a middle-class audience. The original design was to have individual essays emanating from various London coffeehouses and chocolate houses, thereby borrowing from news reportage the veneer of the dispatch but with a lighter spirit, facilitated by the ostensible narrator of the periodical, Sir Isaac Bickerstaff. Bickerstaff's name was borrowed from Jonathan Swift (1667–1745), who himself wrote occasional pieces for the Tatler, including a famous one on style (no. 230).

The Tatler closed in January 1711 but was succeeded in March of that year by the Spectator, this periodical chiefly Addison's effort, though both men contributed numerous essays. The Spectator introduced a cast of fictional characters who figured in a number of the pieces and represented different segments of society, for example Sir Roger de Coverley, representative of the gentry, and Will Honeycomb, representative of the town. With this device the essay genre mingled with the tale and short story. By the time the Spectator ceased publication in December 1712, it and the Tatler had published hundreds of essays of various types, ranging from character sketches like "Tom Folio" and "Ned Softly" to more philosophical pieces like "Meditation on Animal Life" (Spectator no. 519) and the frequently jocular narratives of the Spectator Club. The periodicals had also established criticism as an aim of the essay, a tradition that flowered in 19th century periodicals and continued into the 20th century, as is most thoroughly demonstrated by Virginia Woolf's collection The Common Reader (1925). At the broadest level, the aim of these papers was to explore the individual's proper relationship to and behavior in a changing public life, one of whose many facets included not only politics but also social gatherings and the arts.

Addison, Steele, and Jonathan Swift wrote for papers that followed the Spectator, most notably the Guardian, the Intelligencer, and the Examiner (1710–16), a forthright political paper that Swift briefly edited. Swift brought to the genre a stance that was frequently polemical, though polemic is often couched in satire, as in his famous "A Modest Proposal" (1729).

Many of Swift's works appeared as pamphlets or tracts, and others at this time were, of course, publishing essays in venues other than periodicals. Anthony Ashley Cooper, Third Earl of Shaftesbury (1671–1713) published Characteristicks of Men, Manners, Opinions, Times in 1711, a volume accompanied by a collection of "Miscellaneous Reflections," which had more of the light character of Addison's and Steele's works. The letters that Philip Dormer Stanhope, Fourth Earl of Chesterfield (1694–1773), wrote to his son in the 1740s are frequently anthologized as essays and have something of the flavor of Bacon's aphoristic style. However, Chesterfield did not intend them for publication and, in fact, wrote frequently for midcentury periodicals like the World. Henry Fielding's (1707–54) eminence as a novelist all but occludes his own essay writings, although the introductory chapters to the books of Tom Jones (1749) function as essays, and Fielding additionally wrote for periodicals like the Champion (1739–41) and the CoventGarden Journal (1752).

The greatest periodical essayist of the mid-century was Samuel Johnson (1709–84). He wrote the Rambler from 1750 to 1752, a twice-weekly magazine that appeared on Tuesdays and Saturdays. The Rambler obviously owed a great deal to the Tatler and Spectator in terms of conception and even variety of essay forms: letters, characters, tales, and so on. But in other respects, Johnson's essays were of quite a different quality. In seeking to avoid "mere topicality" for what he perceived as more general moral truths, Johnson reached back to the traditions of both Bacon and Montaigne and "serious" 17th-century writers like Browne and Jeremy Taylor (1613–67), a tradition perpetuated in the 18th century by essayists like David Hume (1711–76) in works such as Essays Moral and Political (1741–42.). Johnson's Rambler essays are generally more serious than those of his immediate periodical predecessors. Occasionally they contain autobiographical elements, as in no. 134, "Idleness an Anxious and Miserable State," but these elements tend to introduce more abstract subject matter rather than to serve as the ongoing basis of the essay. Johnson's sense of the proper position of the essayist vis-à-vis the work is suggested by his initial decision to conceal the authorship of the Rambler papers, although not long after publication his hand was revealed.

Johnson's apparent self-distancing is reflected by the fact that some 60 of the approximately 200 essays that he wrote for the Rambler are in the form of letters attributed to correspondents to the magazine. There are letters, for example, in the persona of girls "less than sixteen," of young bachelors, and of women of "antiquated virginity." About half of the Rambler papers are straightforward essays dealing with philosophical or moral topics such as religion and superstition, the vanity of stoicism, the sources of disagreement in marriage, and the value of fame. Approximately 15 are short tales or sketches, including a dream allegory set in "the garden of hope." Some narrative works are "Orientals," fictions set in the exotic locations of the Middle and Far East, a tradition that had preceded Johnson and was later extended by Oliver Goldsmith. Of the remaining works, some 30 are pieces of literary criticism.

The Rambler was hardly a financial triumph, with most issues selling fewer than 500 copies. But later collections of the essays sold well, broadening their readership and thus establishing their place in the genre's history. Johnson went on to contribute a series of essays, known collectively as The Idler, to the Universal Chronicle from 1758 to 1760; these pieces were generally lighter in tone, more like works in the Tatler and Spectator. He also contributed frequently to John Hawkesworth's (1715–73) Adventurer (1752–54), a periodical notable for its frequent narratives and sketches.

Oliver Goldsmith's (1730–74) success with the essay as a periodical genre parallels Johnson's. The Bee (1759) survived for only eight numbers; however, each issue contained several essays, and collectively they demonstrate how far the genre had come. Most striking is how they mingle the aesthetic with the political and moralistic. Essays like "A City Night Piece" and "A Reverie at the Boar's Head Tavern in East Cheap" seem to exist as much to create an atmosphere and to entertain as to instruct or deliver a point. Characters like "The Man in Black" and "Beau Tibbs" are marked by a subtlety not found in earlier works, and even ostensibly instructive and persuasive pieces like "National Prejudices" are carefully given a narrative occasion, so that their topics seem to emerge out of naturally occurring events rather than stock commonplaces. Following the demise of the Bee, Goldsmith published a series of essays in the Public Ledger (1760–61). Collected as The Citizen of the World in 1762, these essays were unified by the conceit of their having been written by a Chinese visitor to England.

Goldsmith's career as essayist encapsulates a number of essay trends during the 18th century. Beyond the influence of periodicals and periodical publication on the readership, style, and subject matter of the genre, two additional qualities are noteworthy. First, a surprising number of essays, from Swift to Addison and Steele to Johnson to Goldsmith, were attributed to a persona other than the author. Despite Montaigne's declaration nearly two centuries earlier that he was the subject of his book and despite the earlier publication of essays like Cowley's "Of Myself" (1668), there remained uncertainty about the propriety and desirability of having one's own experience explicitly serve as the source and object of presentation and exploration. Second, most of the essays appearing in the prominent periodicals were written by the editors of those periodicals. In a sense, then, the periodicals functioned in much the same way that present-day single-author volumes of essays do. While each essay could—and did—stand on its own, it also benefited from its readers' associating it with a larger sense of the author and his work. In some cases, as with the Spectator Club, the essays even cross-refer to one another, thus forming a whole larger than the individual works. Later writers, like Charles Lamb in his Elia essays, would meld and transform the issues of the essayist's persona and of the essay in relation to other essays.

3. The Romantic Movement

If ever a literary and intellectual movement were suited to the essay, it was Romanticism. By emphasizing qualities of emotion, of direct apprehension and interpretation of the natural world beyond social institutions, and, especially, of the centrality of the individual interpreting his or her experience, Romanticism revived and transformed the essay tradition growing out of Montaigne. One hundred seventy-five years later, the American essayist Edward Hoagland would characterize the genre as "existing on a line between 'what I think' and 'what I am'." The second pole of Hoagland's formulation is present only by indirection in most essays written before 1800. That would change in the first third of the 19th century.

The Romantic movement is defined through its poetry, and some poets did, in fact, make a substantial contribution as essayists. The works that come most easily to mind are the prefaces of William Wordsworth (1770–1850) and Percy Bysshe Shelley (1792–1822). Robert Southey (1774–1843), who became Poet Laureate in 1813, wrote reviews for magazines like the Quarterly Review, published aphoristic commonplaces and essayistic observations in Omniana (1812), and wrote more conventional essays of ideas which were collected in the 1832 volume Essays, Moral and Political. Samuel Taylor Coleridge's (1772–1834) reviews, interpretations, and aphorisms were collected in volumes like Aids to Reflection (1825); his weekly periodical the Friend (1809–10) contained essays more general in their occasion, especially those he designated "Landing Places." Most interesting and problematic as an essayistic work is his Biographia Literaria (1817). Too long to be easily considered a single essay, some of its individual chapters able to stand alone but most of them integrated into the larger whole, the Biographia Literaria nonetheless has a strong essayistic quality, intermixing criticism with philosophy and autobiography. Coleridge's critique of empiricism and his privileging of the individual mind's creative powers carved a philosophical pretext for the genre.

But the best and most influential essayists of the period were those writers who worked almost exclusively in prose and almost exclusively in the genre, writers like Lamb, Hunt, Hazlitt, and De Quincey. Leigh Hunt's (1784–1859) career exemplifies the broad belletristic role performed by many of his contemporary essayists, who published a mixture of criticism and reviews, familiar essays, and political and occasional writings. Hunt began as a theater critic before starting, with his brother John in 1808, the Examiner, a weekly political periodical. However, his familiar essays, published in such magazines as the Reflector (1811–12), are most significant in terms of the genre. Works like “Getting up on Cold Mornings” and “A Few Thoughts on Sleep” (both 1820) deal with subjects notable for their plainness and apparent triviality, serving as occasions for Hunt's sometimes whimsical analysis, as if the game of the essay were to see what could be made of such an apparently unpromising topic. Lamb's “A Dissertation on Roast Pig” (1822) also stems from this vein, and the conceit is evident in later essays like G.K. Chesterton's “A Piece of Chalk” (1909). Critics have sometimes pointed to extreme tendencies to inflate minor subjects as evidence of shallowness or the pursuit of style for style's sake.

A more important essayist was William Hazlitt (1778–1830), whose extensive prose output can also be divided into the two broad classes of literary criticism and familiar essays on miscellaneous topics ranging from politics to prizefighting, sometimes with an autobiographical element. In her essay on Hazlitt (1930), Virginia Woolf comments that by both the estimations of his contemporaries and the evidence of his published work, Hazlitt was frequently a hard man and writer to endure. That Woolf was ultimately able to commend his writing, especially in light of such works as “Education of Women” (1815), in which Hazlitt claims that “the writer of this article confesses that he never met with any woman who could reason,” suggests his achievement almost despite himself. In “On Prejudice,” he declares that individuals must “attend to the ‘still, small voice of our own hearts and feelings’ instead of being browbeat by...pedants and sophists,” a Romantic pronouncement that claims not only the right but also the obligation for the essayist's stance. This viewpoint infused his literary essays, such as those published in Characters of Shakespeare's Plays (1817) and Lectures on the English Comic Writers (1819), the latter of which contains “On the Periodical Essayists,” an important discussion of the genre in the 18th century. “On Familiar Style” (1821–22) presents a credo for what many have before and since taken to be a defining characteristic of the essay: a precise conversational style free from pomp and flourish but also free from cant and low language.

Hazlitt's interpretation of this quality is clearest in his two volumes of Table-Talk; or, Original Essays (1821–22). In these essays he most clearly represents his ideas as products ultimately of his own experience and views. “On the Feelings of Immortality in Youth” (1821) begins with observations of how a general universal “we” only gradually come to perceive our own deaths, but by the middle of the essay Hazlitt reveals his personal stake in the issue, musing that “For my part, I started in life with the French Revolution, and I have lived, alas! to see the end of it.” “On Going a Journey” (1822) articulates a now prominent essay convention, the narrative of a journey or even merely a walk. The writer’s progress through a physical space provides the sufficient occasion to organize the mental space of apparently disparate ideas and topics. When Hazlitt writes, “With change of place we change our ideas; nay our opinions and feelings,” he means in a figurative sense as well as a literal one. Just as the decision to travel sets up a range of possible encounters but does not determine precisely what those encounters will be or any logical connection between them, so the decision to essay does not determine the contents or shape of the ensuing text.

Perhaps the most original essayist of the Romantic period was Charles Lamb (1775–1834). In some ways, Lamb’s position as a Romantic writer is contradictory since, like Samuel Johnson, he was more a writer of urban life than of nature, and he affected an older style and voice contrasting with the familiar style that Hazlitt favored; Hazlitt admitted that Lamb was the only practitioner of that style he could tolerate. Lamb’s essays are marked by their pervading sense of nostalgia, their nearly excessive self-deprecation, and most importantly, their central focus on Lamb’s relationship to the world, a relationship usually slightly out of step.

As did many of his essayist contemporaries, Lamb wrote in genres other than the familiar essay, including reviews, poems, plays, and with his sister Mary the successful Tales from Shakespeare (1807). Unlike many of his contemporaries, Lamb never pursued a solely belletristic career. From 1790 until 1825 he worked as a clerk and accountant, which gave him some artistic distance from the literary world. In 1820, he began publishing essays in London Magazine, which also printed Hazlitt’s Table-Talk and De Quincey’s Opium Eater essays. Collected in 1823 as The Essays of Elia and again in 1833 as The Last Essays of Elia, these pieces quietly long for a vaguely distant past. Elia, a persona Lamb named after a clerk at the South Sea House, portrays a genteel sense of life and business at the Inns of Court in “The Old Benchers of the Inner Temple” (1821). In “Old China” (1823), Lamb writes of the nostalgic beauty evoked by old plates, cups, and saucers. In “New Year’s Eve” (1821), he bravely (and unconvincingly) embraces the New Year as an optimistic antidote for an almost paralytic longing for times past; Lamb represents his mind as almost painfully introspective, and confesses: “That I am fond of indulging, beyond a hope of sympathy, in such retrospection, may be the symptom of some sickly idiosyncrasy.” The essayist’s gaze is turned unabashedly inward, topics merely serving as occasions for reflection. Lamb himself recognized the preciousness and self-indulgence this conceit risked. In “A Character of the Late Elia” (1823), a mock literary obituary, he jokes that, “To say truth, it is time he were gone. The humour of the thing, if there was ever much in it, was pretty well exhausted.” The Essays of Elia bring to the genre the quality that Goethe’s Die Leiden des jungen Werthers (1774; Sufferings of Young Werther) brought to the novel. The degree of introspection in essays since then has varied, but its existence in the genre today can be traced from Montaigne through Lamb.

One of his contemporaries, Mary Russell Mitford (1787–1855), shared Lamb’s intimate style and tone, though the focus of her works was ostensibly less that of portraying a sensibility than a way of life. In Our Village, five volumes written between 1824 and 1832, Mitford presented a series of essays, sketches, and stories of life in a fictionalized and romanticized rural village. Rendering country life has become a stock trope for the essay genre, showing up for example in Richard Jefferies' works and Alexander Smith's Dreamthorp (1863), and crossing the Atlantic to manifest itself in works like those of the American essayist E.B.White.

Contrasting sharply with Lamb's rather staid and self-deprecating style are the essays of Thomas De Quincey (1785–1859). De Quincey himself named his style “impassioned prose,” an apt description for the writing in “The English Mail Coach” (1849), especially a section narrating an accident entitled “Dream-Fugue.” His dramatic flair can be seen in the critical essay “On the Knocking at the Gate in Macbeth” (1823), and in his series “On Murder Considered as One of the Fine Arts” (1827, 1839, 1854) published in Blackwood's, both of which use sensational killings to ground contemplations that are nearly decadent in their lack of clear moral pronouncement. Such a quality is hardly surprising from the author of the autobiographical Confessions of an English Opium Eater, published first in London Magazine (1821–22). In “Suspiria de Profundis” (wr. 1845, pub. 1871) De Quincey presents meditations and autobiographical reminiscences from his childhood, many exploring dreams and the subconscious, in a lyric style that Virginia Woolf would later explore in essays like “Old Mrs. Grey” (1942) or “The Moment” (1947). His brief theoretical distinction between “The Literature of Knowledge and the Literature of Power” (the former having as its goal “teaching,” the latter “moving”) has been embraced by later critics and theorists to distinguish essays, as a literature of power, from other nonfiction prose.

Qualities important to the essay in the previous century continued to be manifested during the Romantic period. Maria Edgeworth's (1768–1849) essays in Practical Education (1798) and elsewhere provided the conceptual underpinnings of her didactic novels and continued the tradition of the essay as a genre for transmitting cultural values. Periodicals continued to instruct too, though in a manner different from that of the early 18th century. Magazines and journals published creative and topical works. But a shift in emphasis can be seen with the rise of the review. In reviews the occasions of essays and articles were not events, real or imagined, ideas, or issues but rather published works; reviews approached events or ideas through the gateway of others' writings. The liberal Edinburgh Review (1802–1929), published several of Hazlitt's essays between 1814 and 1830, as well as works by Carlyle and Macaulay, by the middle of the century introducing essays on topical as well as literary matters. The Quarterly Review (1809–1967) condemned Hunt, Hazlitt, and Lamb and provided conservative views through the middle of the century on issues of science, religion, and culture. Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine (1817–1980) published creative works as well as reviews, essays, and treatises on political matters. De Quincey wrote occasionally for the magazine during the 1820s, the “Noctes Ambrosianae” series of conversations among a cast of individuals echoing the Spectator Club of more than a century earlier.

4. The Essay of Ideas in the Victorian Age

The character of the essay changed significantly by the middle of the 19th century, as 18th-century and Romantic concerns with developing polite sensibility (and correcting its lack), presenting individual reflection, and celebrating (and critiquing) belles-lettres were eclipsed by advances in science and technology, and their impact on religion, the economy, and education, which commanded essayists' attention in new ways. Previous writers had dealt with abstract issues, as Bacon's essays demonstrate and Johnson's essays frequently suggest. However, by the Victorian age, philosophical ideas and their implications directly occasioned essays rather than emerging obliquely from the exploration of a specific incident or reading. One sign of this development was the relative disappearance of the familiar essay during the middle third of the century, as the genre bent more toward the treatise, history, or article. (More precisely, one might say that familiar essays were still being written, but they have not endured as the canonical works from this period.) Illustrating this shift was the emergence of periodicals like the Spectator in 1828, which featured political articles and "interesting topics of a general nature" (5 July 1828) along with reviews.

Of course, the essayistic self did not disappear completely during this period. Harriet Martineau's (1802–76) essays frequently employ narrative and anecdotes, her own life circumstances furnishing the impetus for many of them. Her "Letter to the Deaf" (1834) was informed by her own deafness, as was the collection Life in the Sick-Room (1844) by her illness and Letters on Mesmerism (1844) by her treatments. Still, the bulk of Martineau's work, as with the 14 years of articles written for the Daily News, dealt with current events and issues, including many on women's rights.

Thomas Babington Macaulay's (1800–59) numerous essays in the Edinburgh Review (collected as Critical and Historical Essays in 1843) are similarly infused with political concepts, though this was less the cause of their popularity than Macaulay's manner of expression. Many of the essays existed to explain historical events and ideas, and Macaulay frequently created dramatic scenes to do so. Socrates and Phaedrus, for example, talk on "a fine summer day under the plane-tree, while the fountains warbled at their feet, and the cicadas chirped overhead." Although the impulse is historical, the mood is essayistic to the extent that Macaulay colors factual material with an aesthetic sensibility, as well as using history to serve the argument, as in the essay "Lord Bacon" (1837), in which the writer is revealed through thought and style, not autobiography.

Thomas Carlyle's (1795–1881) essays share some of these features with Macaulay's, particularly his lectures On Heroes, Hero-Worship, and the Heroic in History (1841) and Past and Present (1843). However, Carlyle is much more the social critic and philosopher. While he began as a literary reviewer and critic for the Edinburgh Review, continuing this work in places like Fraser's Magazine, essays such as "Signs of the Times" (1829) and "Characteristics" (1831) more clearly signal Carlyle's turn—and the genre's. In "Signs of the Times," Carlyle says that the 19th century should be called "not an Heroical, Devotional, Philosophical, or Moral Age, but, above all others, the Mechanical Age." Most of his subsequent essays critique the times and call for the spiritualism and strength of individual character and leadership that Carlyle perceived in the past. His tone is often polemical and always assured, and while he writes characteristically in the essayistic first person, as in the late essay Shooting Niagara: And After? (1867), his stance is much less that of "friend" than "lecturer." The possible exception is Sartor Resartus (1836), part novel, part autobiography (through the persona of Diogenes Teufelsdröckh), part philosophy, the mixture of exposition, narrative, and reflection placing the work in the essayistic mode.

John Ruskin (1819–1900) shared Carlyle’s vision of modern times, critiquing them in a spirit that was, if anything, ultimately more fierce. Late in life, in the apocalyptic essay “The Storm Cloud of the Nineteenth Century” (1884), Ruskin used the occasion of a walk from Abingdon to Oxford to locate his perception, literally and metaphorically, that a “dark” and “malignant” “plague wind” was destroying the age. Whereas Carlyle grounded his ideas in literary criticism and philosophy, Ruskin grounded his in art criticism and theory. Essays in his five-volume Modern Painters (1843–60) comment as much on the social contexts of art as on the works themselves, as for example in “The Two Boyhoods” (vol. 5, 1860). The Stones of Venice (1851–53) is simultaneously history, descriptive travel writing, and cultural theory. Many of Ruskin’s other works, some published in journals like Cornhill Magazine, are more overtly political, such as those collected in The Two Paths (1859) and Unto This Last (1862). Autobiographical moments or scenes appear in several of these essays, unlike those written by most of his contemporary “sages,” though he did write a separate autobiography, Praeterita (1886–89). Ruskin wrote several of his essays (as letters) for Fors Clavigera, a journal he wrote for the Guild of St. George, thus working in a politicized variant of the single-author periodical tradition last practiced by Johnson and Goldsmith.

John Stuart Mill’s (1806–73) writings were more conventional. He reserved the personal narratives and explicitly self-reflexive materials of his own personal crises for his Autobiography, published posthumously in 1873. Beginning in the 1820s, he wrote review essays in periodicals like the Westminster Review and continued in that mode of publication throughout his life, also publishing pamphlets and monographs. Mill’s essays (in contrast to the Autobiography) argue specific positions, on topics ranging from political economy to women’s issues. Their method is to establish a thoughtful dialectic, in which opposing ideas serve to complicate one another, in an essayistic move that is, however, more purposeful than digressive. The effect on readers is to perceive the essay as driven by inquiry rather than dogma, though Mill’s positions are assuredly evident. The clearest examples of his method (and most influential works) are Principles of Political Economy (1848) and On Liberty (1859); the five chapters of the latter each constitute an essay exploring the relationship of the individual to the group.

John Henry Newman’s (1801–90) essayistic work bears interesting parallels to Mill’s. He too saved personal narratives for an autobiography (Apologia Pro Vita Sua, 1865), and his essays focus squarely on philosophical, educational, religious, and social issues. Logically, owing to Newman’s status as a clergyman who eventually was made Cardinal, many of his essays had their origins as sermons or lectures, as for example, the Oxford University Sermons (1843) and The Idea of a University (published in various forms in 1852, and 1859 and in standard form in 1873). As a result, the essays have a conversational tone, familiar not in the sense of the author telling intimate details of his life but in the sense of a speaker addressing a present and known audience. Yet their purpose is didactic and persuasive, and they demonstrate the blurred boundaries between the essay and various oratorical genres. Two book-length works, An Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine (1845) and An Essay in Aid of a Grammar of Assent (1870) might better be considered treatises or, rather, be viewed as essays in the same sense as Locke's An Essay Concerning Human Understanding.

What Newman was to religious culture Matthew Arnold (1822–88) was to more secular culture, though both writers shared moral, ethical, intellectual, and even spiritual concerns, and even when Arnold took exception to historical religion, as in Literature and Dogma (1873), he did so with respect. Arnold's essays are philosophical, even academic in character, and can be divided into two broad but interpenetrating categories. Essays in Criticism (1865, 1888) discusses specific authors but, more importantly for literary studies, articulates theoretical and literary principles, most famously in "The Function of Criticism at the Present Time" (1864), "The Study of Poetry" (1880), and "The Literary Influence of Academies" (1864). Of broader purview are his social essays, many published originally in Cornhill Magazine and collected in Culture and Anarchy (1869). These works, later given their now familiar chapter titles such as "Sweetness and Light" and "Hebraism and Hellenism," seek directly to influence contemporary culture through carefully reasoned analyses of broad issues. His sustained defense of humanistic learning is exemplified by his later essay "Literature and Science" (1885).

Arnold felt compelled to write such substantial defenses because it was not only poets, artists, and clergy who wrote essays during the period. T.H.Huxley's (1825–95) hundreds of professional and popular essays articulated basic tenets of the new science, most prominently the work of Charles Darwin (1809–82.), who himself wrote popular essays as well as the ground-breaking On the Origin of Species (1859). In the Fortnightly and Westminster Reviews (serving as science columnist for the second), Huxley explored the range from specific topics, as in "On the Physical Basis of Life" (1869), to broader implications of science, as in "Science and Culture" (1881); a corpus of essays was later collected in nine volumes. Huxley is important for establishing the subgenre of essays popularizing and commenting on scientific ideas, practiced in the 20th century by the American writers Loren Eiseley, Lewis Thomas, and Stephen Jay Gould.

Walter Pater's (1839–94) essays looked back rather than forward, both for subject matter, as in his most celebrated work The Renaissance (1873, 1877), and for style, as he privileged imagination, sensation, and private visions, qualities more characteristic of Romantic prose than Victorian utilitarianism. Pater wrote appreciations of Montaigne, Browne, and Lamb, as well as a volume of Imaginary Portraits (1887). Leslie Stephen's (1832–1904) career included numerous studies of earlier writers, as can be seen in Hours in a Library (1874–79) and Studies of a Biographer (1898–1902.). However, his first essays are narratives of hiking and mountain climbing (The Playground of Europe, 1871), befitting someone who edited the Alpine Journal. Other essays deal with issues of modern life and proper conduct in an age "after" religion, for instance in An Agnostic's Apology (1893).

Although the genre from the 1830s to the 1880s is most characteristically defined by the essay of ideas, not all its practitioners were political or moral philosophers or scholars. William Makepeace Thackeray (1811–63), for example, represented that venerable tradition of novelists who include the essay among their palette of genres. Thackeray began as a journalist, writing characters, satires, sketches, and articles, many with a satiric and burlesque quality, which were collected in Comic Tales and Sketches (1841). He reinvigorated the tradition of the character in The Book of Snobs (1848), which first appeared in Punch, where he published extensively. His primary contributions to the genre, though, are the Roundabout Papers (1863), originally published in Cornhill Magazine, of which he was the first editor.

Other prominent Victorian writers also wrote essays. Charles Dickens (1812–70) began his career writing descriptive sketches and essays of places and characters, primarily in London, collected as Sketches by Boz Illustrative of Every-Day Life and Every-Day People (1836). The scenic quality and narrative sense of these essays convey the social criticism that Dickens featured in his novels and that more explicitly formed the subject of later essays like “Wapping Workhouse” (1860). As founder of Household Words, he published dozens of short pieces on various subjects, including rather plain aspects of contemporary life. George Eliot (1819–80) published numerous reviews in Westminster Review, the Leader, and elsewhere, works that, though occasioned as literary criticism, enabled her essayistically to expand to broader topics, as in “Margaret Fuller and Mary Wollstonecraft” (1855). Late in life she published a relatively experimental work, a series of fictional/ essayistic sketches, The Impressions of Theophrastus Such (1879).

In addition to her novels, Margaret Oliphant (1828–97) published essays in a number of periodicals, especially Blackwood’s, where she was a prolific literary reviewer for nearly the last half of the century, often focusing on groups of authors or works rather than single works. Poet and novelist William Morris’ (1834–96) essays, written between 1877 and 1896, articulated the relationship he saw between politics, art, and society, echoing Ruskin’s sentiments and, to some extent, style. Oscar Wilde (1854–1900) wrote literary criticism, reviews, and more political works, including “The Soul of Man Under Socialism” (1891), in the tradition of Arnold. Most famous are his clever essays in the form of dialogues, “The Decay of Lying” (1889) and “The Critic as Artist” (1890), which invert typical relationships, putting art over life, and criticism over creation.

5. Century’s End and Beyond and the Return of the Familiar Essay

In 1863, Alexander Smith (1830?–67) published Dreamthorp: A Book of Essays Written in the Country, which marks the return and evolution of a familiar essay spirit that had waned during the middle third of the century. The essays in this slim book celebrate life on a rural estate and, more importantly, the perspective of Smith himself. Overtly narrative and autobiographical in their content, they demonstrate the qualities Smith describes in “On the Writing of Essays,” in which he distinguishes between the “serious and stately” tradition out of Bacon and the “garrulous and communicative” tradition out of Montaigne. Smith notes that “The essayist plays with his subject, now in whimsical, now in grave, now in melancholy mood... His main gift is an eye to discover the suggestiveness of common things; to find a sermon in the most unpromising texts.” Plain country life is one such text, but Smith’s essays are hardly trivial. “A Lark’s Flight,” for example, deals with issues of capital punishment, but his method is primarily narrative. He recounts watching the hanging of two prisoners and how, at a pivotal moment, a lark flies off singing, the poignancy of the event indicating to him the horror of such occasions. (George Orwell’s “A Hanging” [1931] would later use a happy dog to similar effect.) These essays are grounded not in abstract ideas or books but in direct experience.

Richard Jefferies (1848–87) shared both Smith’s topical matter and his stance, representing the countryside to a largely urban audience. Like Smith, he centers much of his work in place (as in Round About a Great Estate, 1880) and relishes close descriptions of scenes from nature.

More famous than either Smith or Jefferies is Robert Louis Stevenson (1850–94), whose essays in Virginibus Puerisque (1881), Familiar Studies of Men and Books (1882), and Memories and Portraits (1887) recall the style of Lamb and Hazlitt. In several of his essays, such as “An Apology for Idlers” (1877), Stevenson writes successions of aphoristic pronouncements in a vein growing out of Bacon; in others, such as “A College Magazine” (1887), he narrates his own experiences. The interaction of these poles in the bulk of his work distinguishes the familiar essay at the end of the century from the critical and philosophical works of writers like Arnold and Mill. Ruskin’s essays have some of this quality but with the dramatic difference that Ruskin had a sharp political edge and little of the drawing room sentimentality that some have found in Stevenson.

The end and turn of the century thus saw the rise of an essay genre which contrasted strongly with the intellectual essay: the familiar essay as leisure reading and entertainment, an essay less serious in either form or intention. Max Beerbohm’s (1872–1956) essays are perhaps the highest achievement in this manner, and though he published essays well into the 1920s, he is most often associated with the turn of the century. Partly this is because of Beerbohm’s own themes and persona as a man out of step with his times, as much older than his years. In “Diminuendo” (1896), written when he was 24, he describes himself (Elia-like) as already outmoded, and this gentle self-deprecating presentation characterizes most of his essays. Beginning as a writer for the Yellow Book and the Strand, Beerbohm published numerous collections, including the satirically titled Works of Max Beerbohm, with a Bibliography (1896), More (1899), Yet Again (1909), and And Even Now (1920), the very titles suggesting the playful enterprise that he and his readers enjoyed. The quality can be seen in a piece like “Going out for a Walk,” which begins with “It is a fact that not once in all my life have I gone out for a walk. I have been taken out for walks; but that is another matter,” signaling in tone, topic, and stance the easy personal tone and relationship his readers had come to expect.

Beerbohm’s contemporary, Hilaire Belloc (1870–1953), shares elements of both his ethos and his sense of the essay as entertainment, as can be seen through the titles of his own volumes, including On Nothing and Kindred Subjects (1908), On Everything (1909), On Anything (1910), On Something (1910), and four others in a similar vein. Belloc writes on places and landscapes and on past authors (thus appreciations rather than reviews), as well as on “minor” occasional topics, such as “The Crooked Streets” (1912), in which a whole quality of life is invoked by the way a town deploys its roads. In “An Essay upon Essays upon Essays” (1951), he spoofs the already common subgenre.

A third contemporary and a friend of Belloc, G.K. Chesterton (1874–1936), similarly used a casual, even light tone in his diverse essays on familiar topics. A voluminous writer, of novels and detective stories as well as nonfiction, recalling in many respects Hazlitt in his critical as well as familiar essays and in his journalistic interests (including cofounding and editing the periodical Eye Witness in 1911), Chesterton filled a belletristic role common since Addison, Johnson, and the Romantics. Virginia Woolf would fill this role, too, but in a manner more distinctly modern. Chesterton's many essay volumes, including The Defendant (1901), All Things Considered (1908), Alarms and Discursions (1910), A Defence of Nonsense and Other Essays (1911), and All I Survey (1933) demonstrate through their diversity of subject matter and confidence of narrative voice a quality essential to the essay: the claim of a right to explore and explain a position on any topic, simply by virtue of being a careful and sensitive observer.

The revitalization of the familiar essay hardly came at the expense of critical works. Henry James' (1843–1916) discussions of various writers in Partial Portraits (1888) exemplify his extensive critical writings, which include those essays he wrote as critical prefaces to his own novels. However, James also wrote numerous travel essays, primarily for American magazines like the Atlantic Monthly, the Nation, and the North American Review. Collected in such volumes as Transatlantic Sketches (1875) and Portraits of Places (1883), these essays reveal subtle changes in periodicals as distant travel becomes more possible (or at least imaginable), and magazines extend their editorial borders to new places.

James, of course, belongs to that growing tradition throughout the 19th century of writers best known in one literary genre but who wrote essays "on the side." Not only novelists like James or poets like Arnold but also dramatists like George Bernard Shaw (1856–1950) are customarily acknowledged secondarily (if at all) as essayists. This common idea of the essay as a genre supplemental to one's "real work" perhaps originates with Montaigne's modesty, and it may have resulted in essays being excluded from serious study throughout much of their history. That writers like Beerbohm, Belloc, and Chesterton could be known primarily as essayists is a new development in many ways and, in others, a rebirth of the early 18th century.

6. The 20th Century

The essay during the 20th century continues along many of the trajectories traced during the previous period, though the contributions of Virginia Woolf and George Orwell, the genre's leading figures, challenge the boundaries of the personal, the political, and the aesthetic. The tradition of the critical essay and biographical essay was prominently extended by Lytton Strachey (1880–1932.), who began publishing in the Spectator and continued in places like the Athenaeum and the Edinburgh Review; he most notably published Eminent Victorians (1918) and Portraits in Miniature and Other Essays (1931). T.S.Eliot (1888–1965), like Arnold and other prominent poet-essayists before him, published numerous literary critical works, many of them, like "The Function of Criticism" (1923) and "Essay on Style and Order" (1928), articulating broad perspectives about literary matters rather than reviews or appreciations of individual authors. Most famous among these works is "Tradition and the Individual Talent" (1919). Eliot published essays about social and educational issues too, but his literary essays best define him. They are noteworthy today for the utter confidence of his voice and an authoritative stance that contrasts with the more carefully couched and qualified views of most critics and essayists since then. Fellow poet W.H. Auden (1907–73) also published numerous essays from the 1930s to the 1960s, many of them also works of criticism.

However, his pieces demonstrated a somewhat broader range of topics, including analyses of art tempered by views of science.

John Eglinton's (1868–1961) critical essays (especially those collected in Two Essays on the Remnant [1894] and Pebbles from a Brook [1901]) use criticism to the additional ends of nationalistic advocacy. As a theorist of the Irish Literary Renaissance, Eglinton wrote about Yeats, Joyce, George Moore, and others, for a mostly intellectual as opposed to popular audience. In his later Irish Literary Portraits (1935), he tempers the critical essay of ideas with elements of memoir. W.B. Yeats (1865–1939) himself wrote numerous critical essays and prefaces, including some, like “Magic” (1901), that intricately weave autobiographical, critical, and reflective elements.

D.H. Lawrence (1885–1930) continued the tradition of the novelist-essayist. Like James (but reversing him in part by writing from America rather than England), Lawrence published many travel essays collected in four books, including Twilight in Italy (1916) and Mornings in Mexico (1927). His travel writings are a mix of narrative and reflection, intended to render for a general readership a sense of the primitive or strange. Lawrence's literary criticism similarly tours foreign writers, as in Studies in Classic American Literature (1923), but the critical work frequently expands beyond the boundaries of “the literary” per se into broader areas of social criticism. Similarly, his novels, like those of his Austrian contemporary Robert Musil, contain occasional essayistic passages.

However, by far the most important novelist-essayist—in fact, the most important English essayist of the first half of the century—was Virginia Woolf (1882–1941). Like her predecessors, Woolf published in overtly literary forums such as the Times Literary Supplement and the Criterion, but she also published in more popular magazines like Vogue, the Atlantic Monthly, and even Time and Tide. In doing so, she followed a path blazed by Alice Meynell (1847–1922), who wrote for the Pall Mall Gazette as well as the Spectator. Like Woolf after her, Meynell wrote extensively about literary and language subjects (as for example in the collection The Second Person Singular and Other Essays, 1921), but she also wrote about place (London Impressions, 1898) and domestic and other issues, most notably the lives of children (The Children, 1897; Childhood, 1913).

Woolf's publishing outlets demonstrate a quality to which she aspired in even her TLS pieces, namely the suitability of her writings for a “common reader”—as, in fact, two of her volumes were titled (The Common Reader, 1925; The Second Common Reader, 1932). At a time when the world of literary criticism was increasingly shrinking to the province of professionals, Woolf represents the reassertion of the essay's position as a more democratic genre in which the distance between writer and reader is minimized rather than exaggerated. Obviously, Woolf's common reader is not Everyman or Everywoman. Especially her writings about literature assume a fairly high level of reading, background knowledge, and literary interest. But her style is anything but that of the pedant or sage, enacting her own belief that “the principle which controls it [the essay] is simply that it should give pleasure; the desire which impels us when we take it from the shelf is simply to receive pleasure” (“The Modern Essay,” 1922). In so privileging the aesthetic over the didactic, Woolf reverses the assumptions of the Victorian sage essayists. Writers like Beerbohm aspired to this, too, but Woolf is striking because she employs the principle in her criticism as well as her experiential essays.

Among her critical works are several about essayists, including Montaigne, Addison, Goldsmith, Hazlitt, Ruskin, and her own father Leslie Stephen, this last in a curiously distanced tone that scarcely calls attention to his being her father. But more important are her occasional and autobiographical works, especially those collected in The Death of the Moth (1942), The Moment (1947), and The Captain's Death Bed (1950), all published after her death. "The Death of the Moth" (1942) and "Thoughts on Peace in an Air Raid" (1940) demonstrates Woolf's ability to use the narrative of events ranging from the trivial to the dramatic as the occasion for meditation and speculation. "Street Haunting" (1927), "Flying over London" (1950), and "To Spain" (1923) evoke places and times in a lyric mode that reaches its zenith in essays like "The Moment: Summer's Night" (1947) and "Old Mrs. Grey" (1942), in which the essay verges on the prose poem, a static yet dynamic object rich in metaphor, simultaneously drawing a picture of the world and of the author's consciousness. However, Woolf's essays were impelled by political as well as belletristic concerns. "Thoughts on Peace in an Air Raid" calls for an end to war. "Professions for Women" (1931) and "Women and Fiction" (1929) are now classic articulations of problems that women have faced in trying to move beyond a narrow domestic sphere.

Woolf's novelist contemporary E.M.Forster (1879–1970) inhabited much of the essayist space that she helped to establish. Forster turned to essays in the 1920s after he had tired of novels, and his works meld autobiography, literary criticism, and contemporary social issues. Those collected in Abinger Harvest (1936) and Two Cheers for Democracy (1951) are particularly noteworthy in the way they balance the political issues of the day, especially the rise of European fascism, with personal perspectives; in an essay like "My Wood" (1926), for example, Forster's owning a piece of land gives rise to broader considerations about the effect of possession. During the 1940s, Cyril Connolly (1903–74) published essays that more overtly merged politics and literary/cultural criticism in his left-wing periodical Horizon. Connolly's earlier volume Enemies of Promise (1938) blended personal memories with views of earlier writers, and four books of essays published between 1945 and 1973 feature literary and art criticism.

The most artful political essayist of the 20th century is George Orwell (1903–50), whose "Why I Write" (1946) provides a key to his aesthetic. Orwell claims that circumstances of a given age direct writers, and the circumstances of his age—colonialism, fascism, poverty, and war—compel his writing to a political purpose, against totalitarianism and for democratic socialism. Orwell pursues this purpose sometimes in essays that are explicitly argumentative, such as "Politics and the English Language" (1946) or "Antisemitism in Britain" (1945). But his real contribution to the genre are those essays that embed political arguments in personal narratives with fictional qualities. For example, "A Hanging" (1931) consists entirely of an objective account of a prisoner's execution, the narrator commenting only briefly on events that otherwise are left to speak for themselves. "Shooting an Elephant" (1936) contains realizations about imperialism in a dramatic story of Orwell's having to kill a rogue elephant. "Marrakech" (1939) relies on the juxtaposition of several closely described themes to convey an argument about how colonialists treat those they colonize—and the consequences. "How the Poor Die" (wr. 1946, pub. 1950) is a close narrative of Orwell's stay in a Paris hospital for the impoverished. Orwell's essays combine journalism, fictional techniques (if not fiction itself, as some critics have speculated certain events never happened), and autobiography to develop a new form that, nonetheless, is still essayistic in articulating ideas and the mind of its author.

Rebecca West (1892–1983) followed her early political essays on the women’s movement, in Freewoman and the Clarion, with journalistic and essayistic analyses of World War II and its political and social implications. West published widely in American magazines like Harper’s and the New Yorker, and her essays are collected in a few volumes, including The Strange Necessity (1928) and The Meaning of Treason (1947).

As one might assume, the political events of the first half of the 20th century directly and indirectly affected essay writing, topically, tonally, and formally. However, not every essayist was overtly political. Herbert Read (1893–1968) critiqued modern industrial culture and World War II, even publishing collections like The Politics of the Unpolitical (1943); however, he complemented this work with a vast amount of literary criticism in a neo-Romantic vein, as with In Defence of Shelley and Other Essays (1936), and he additionally published autobiographical pieces. Aldous Huxley (1894–1963) wrote numerous travel essays (as, for example, in Along the Road: Notes and Essays of a Tourist [1925] and Essays New and Old [192,6]), but his most important works are those in which he explores the conditions of modern culture by considering developments in science and technology, philosophy, and art, as in Proper Studies (1927) and Ends and Means (1937). A good example of Huxley’s stance is “Tragedy and the Whole Truth” (1931), which explores the nature of truth in science versus the nature of truth in literature. The grandson of T.H.Huxley, he wrote for a similarly broad, popular audience in a voice that is simultaneously familiar and didactic. C.S.Lewis (1898–1963) employs—to quite different intellectual ends—the same voice. As a Christian apologist whose autobiography Surprised by Joy (1955) recalls in purpose, at least, those of Mill and Newman, Lewis seeks to defend theological principles in an age of skepticism; important collections are The Case for Christianity (1943), Mere Christianity (1952), and The Four Loves (1960).

Other essayists throughout the century have embraced the familiar voice minus the overt didacticism. Prominent among them is J.B.Priestley (1894–1984), whose numerous essays cover a wide range of topics and are frequently occasioned by his own experience, as in “On Doing Nothing” and “Money for Nothing.” His collections include Papers from Lilliput (1921), I for One (1923), Open House: A Book of Essays (1927), Thoughts in the Wilderness (1957), and Outcries and Asides (1974). In the introduction to his edited collection Essayists Past and Present (1925), Priestley rejects “all the philosophers and historians and scientists masquerading as essayists,” using De Quincey’s distinction to label such works as belonging merely to the “literature of knowledge.” Thus Macaulay and most of the Victorian essayists are denied the status of true essayists; the debate over the definition of the genre as critical versus creative work continues.

The works of more contemporary writers continue to raise these issues. V.S.Pritchett’s (1900–97) literary criticism over the past 60 years imagines Woolf’s common reader, and other writings enact the travel tradition. Kenneth Tynan (1927–80) accompanied criticism with longer essays on theater and film and the people, places, and events associated with them, most notably in profile essays that appeared originally in the New Yorker and are collected in Show People (1980). Graham Greene (1901–91) similarly published numerous movie reviews in the 1930s but also memoirs, characters, criticism, and even travel pieces, several of them gathered in Collected Essays (1969). The Irish writer Hubert Butler (1900–91) wove together strands of the personal, the political, and the literary in a familiar voice recalling Orwell's, in essays collected in volumes such as Escape from the Anthill (1985) and Grandmother and Wolfe Tone (1990).

7. Conclusion

It would be reductive to assert that in the 400 years of its history, the British and Irish essay has developed along simple, unidirectional lines. The essay in every age has wandered between various apparently polar qualities: the formal versus the informal, the critical versus the creative, the argumentative versus the meditative, the aesthetic versus the didactic, expert knowledge versus lay knowledge. Every period has generated both essays whose central occasion is the presentation of ideas or arguments and essays whose central occasion is the presentation of writers' experiences or perspectives.

Probably the truest general point that can be made about the development of the essay is that it has emerged as a lasting genre, significant in its own right. Periodical publication played a complex role in this transition. At the dawn of the genre, published in collections as books by writers like Montaigne, Bacon, and Cowley, the essay had at least the trappings of permanence and significance enjoyed by other genres. On the one hand, periodical publication in the 18th century as well as today constructs essays as transitory, occasional works, often supplemental to other literary and philosophical texts. Yet, on the other hand, periodical publication both expands a reading audience and has given many writers the constant forum needed to establish their reputations as essayists. The circle is completed when periodically published essays are collected into book volumes, a practice occurring with Samuel Johnson and even before—and certainly since. Most such collections are unified not by subject matter but by their authors' experiences, personalities, and particular ways of seeing the world. While many British and Irish authors have been known as essayists only secondarily in relation to their work as novelists, poets, or dramatists, it is also true that many authors are known primarily as essayists. The sense of the genre has evolved to accommodate such a status. As knowledge has become more specialized and culture more fragmented (or, rather, as the fragments that have always existed become more apparent), the essayist increasingly figures the consoling ability—and right—of individuals to make sense of things, in a genre that consistently acts out the limits and conditional nature of that sense.

DOUGLAS HESSE

Anthologies

A Century of English Essays, edited by Ernest Rhys and Lloyd Vaughan, London: Dent,

- and New York: Dutton, 1929 (original edition, 1913)
A Century of the Essay, British and American, edited by David Daiches, New York: Harcourt Brace, 1951
The Hutchinson Book of Essays, edited by Frank Delaney, London: Hutchinson, 1990
The Oxford Book of Essays, edited by John Gross, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1991

Further Reading

- Dobrée, Bonamy, English Essayists, London: Collins, 1946
 Good, Graham, The Observing Self: Rediscovering the Essay, London and New York: Routledge, 1988
 Pebworth, Ted-Larry, "'Real English Evidence': Stoicism and the English Essay Tradition," PMLA 87 (1972):101–02
 Pebworth, Ted-Larry, "Not Being, but Passing: Defining the Early English Essay," Studies in the Literary Imagination 10, no. 2 (1977):17–27
 Stapleton, Laurence, The Elected Circle: Studies in the Art of Prose, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1973
 Thompson, Elbert N.S., The Seventeenth-Century English Essay, New York: Haskell House, 1967 (original edition, 1926)
 Walker, Hugh, The English Essay and Essayist, London: Dent, and New York: Dutton, 1915

Brodsky, Joseph

Russian/American, 1940–1996

As an essayist Joseph Brodsky (best known to the West by this anglicized form of his Russian name, Iosif Brodskii) was versatile and prolific: in addition to two large, impressive collections of essays and Watermark (1992), an extended essay on Venice, he published more than 100 reviews, introductions, lectures, occasional critical pieces, contributions to conferences, appeals, and letters, in Russian, English, and American periodicals and magazines. Some of his best essays are based on his lectures and seminars, like the painstakingly detailed analyses of the poetry of W.H.Auden, Robert Frost, and Thomas Hardy; others are extensions of introductions. His literary essays, especially on Russian authors, particularly impressed his Western critics. Brodsky brought with him to the West "the most valuable thing Russia can give us—a reaffirmation of the belief that 'art is an alternative form of existence'" (Henry Gifford, 1986). While in Russia Brodsky's reputation is based primarily on his achievement as a poet, in the West his essays have played a major part in creating his ultimate stature as a writer, while also bringing an immense benefit to Russian literature as a whole.

Brodsky made his first excursions into the essay genre soon after his forced emigration in 1972. He wrote his first essays in Russian, but soon switched to English and became a regular contributor to the New York Review of Books, Partisan Review, and the Times Literary Supplement. He wrote mainly about poets whose verses influenced his work or who shared his aesthetic values. His own aesthetic standards were high, demanding much of the people he wrote about, but he was also extremely generous in his evaluation of them. He called Auden “the greatest mind of the twentieth century” and Osip Mandel’shtam “a poet of and for civilization.” His essays are marked by quality of perception and supersensitivity toward other writers’ use of language. He praised Andrei Platonov for inventing a language which compromises not only the Soviet ideology but also “time, space, life itself and death,” while the novels of such writers as Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn and Vasilii Grossman he saw as socialist realism in reverse because they adopted the language strategies of their opponents.

Apart from literature, Brodsky discussed a wide range of topics: civilization, history, political forces, ethical choices, time, faith, memory, and other major themes. He also assimilated and processed material from his ceaseless travels. He viewed Venice as a gigantic orchestra, with a restless chorus of waves and “the falsetto of a star in the winter sky.” His ethical and philosophical interpretations of historical events were as ambivalent and polemical as his scattered comments on political affairs reflecting the intensely political nature of his experience, although his political views were never openly expressed. He captured a feeling about tyranny; the Empire, as one of his principal themes, also figured in his essays and was interpreted as a conceptual metaphor for what Yakov Gordin called “forced harmonization in the face of deep internal troubles” (Valentina Polukhina, 1992). We are offered some of his liveliest controversies on time and space when he meditates upon man’s relationship with time: “What can we learn about ourselves from time?—What does it mean to be insignificant?” According to Brodsky, man in all his vulnerability to time and history should structure himself around reliable ethical and aesthetic principles.

“The Guide to a Renamed City” (1979) is a beautiful evocation of St. Petersburg, a city “where it’s somehow easier to endure loneliness than anywhere else: because the city itself is so lonely.” He also wrote about his childhood and his parents (“In a Room and a Half,” 1985) and the terror inflicted by the state. Perhaps in order to avoid granting himself the status of a victim, he said very little about his life in prison or in exile. In his essays, as in his poems, Brodsky remains an impersonal author, a man of intellectual sobriety with a sense of perspective. He did not believe that a writer’s ego, even a wounded ego, was the best material for literature.

Brodsky’s message can be reduced to one main idea: what a great poet leaves behind is his language. Language, for him, is the vessel and vehicle of civilization. In “On Cavafy’s Side” (1977) he demonstrates how language can triumph when empire fails. Language is older than any state, and superior to history: “language is a millenarian device, history isn’t.” Language operates through and within time but outside history, enlarging writers’ appreciation of life in ethical terms. The writer’s only duty is to his language, to keep it alive “in the light of conscience and culture.” The effect of the Revolution on the Russian language, according to Brodsky, has been “an unprecedented anthropological tragedy...whose net result is a drastic reduction in human potential.”

Exquisite style, poetic energy, sharp intelligence, wit, and paradox are the natural ingredients of his prose. Brodsky’s voice is authoritative, his approach to a subject stripped of sentimentality. In his use of syntax, word order, and lexical nuances he works on extreme levels. Writing at the edge of speech, he increases the depth of the ethical drama played out within his work. “We never forget or are allowed to forget that the critic is a poet” (Gifford). The tension of his essays is created by the rational, skeptical attitude toward what cannot be rationally explained (faith, time, creativity). Believing that “aesthetics is the mother of ethics,” he never fails to make an intrinsic connection between them. He openly declares the unpardonable subjectivity of his views, saying that “extreme subjectivity, prejudice and idiosyncrasy are what helps art to avoid cliché.”

A subtle relationship exists between the style of his essays and his poetry. In his essays Brodsky employs free association, internal rhyme, convoluted syntax, and poetic composition. His first collection of essays, Less than One (1986), forms a cycle, beginning and ending with personal memoirs, with two magnificent pieces on Marina Tsvetaeva at the center, surrounded by essays on Anna Akhmatova, Mandel’shtam, Auden (his “ideal double”), Derek Walcott, appreciations of C.P.Cavafy and Eugenio Montale, homage to Osip’s wife Nadezhda Mandel’shtam, and a criticism of modern Russian prose. Each of his essays, like each of his poems, is a part of the whole. Although they stand as independent, self-sufficient pieces, they benefit enormously from being read in context: their essence becomes more visible.

In 1995, just before Brodsky’s untimely death, his second collection of essays, On Grief and Reason, was published in New York. Like the first collection, it also includes travel essays (“After a Journey”), historical pieces (“Collector’s Item” and “Homage to Marcus Aurelius”), essays on political displacement (“The Condition We Call Exile”), tributes to his favorite poets (Frost, Hardy, Rainer Maria Rilke), and meditations on the past (“Spoils of War”). Inspired by Mozart and Haydn, Brodsky cultivated his own technique of developing “themes and variations”: ideas circulate and reverberate from one essay to the next throughout the book. His Christian attitude toward art is openly stated: every poem is an act of love, a flash of memory and faith.

Two particular qualities characterize his essays. First, Brodsky used the full force of his intellectual power to offer new answers to old questions, thus providing an unforgettable intellectual education. Second, he possessed a remarkable power of observation and a sharp eye for detail. Like Mandel’shtam and Tsvetaeva before him, Brodsky played a pivotal role in re-creating and redefining the essay genre. Like the latter, he allowed the agonies of spirit to flower, taking ideas to their most extreme conclusions; like the former, he tried to control his arguments with the discipline of logic. Like both, he responded to a large diversity of world literature by assimilating not so much Greek, French, or German literary traditions, but those of the Latin, American, and English. His essays are characterized by a dynamic interaction between dazzling language, conceptual thought, and poetic narrative process. They are as brilliant as his poetry, in both their philosophical complexity and their verbal inventiveness. His studies of the poets are models of close reading, a valid demonstration of how poetry works: “how to get to the marrow of every image and phrase” (D.Rayfield, 1986). These essays “should be required reading for students of modern Russian literature and history. They imply a canon” (G.S.Smith, 1988). They are the best introduction to his poetry, for as Brodsky himself put it, poets’ prose is “nothing but a continuation of poetry by other means”: the same precision, speed and intensity of thought, the same syntactic ambiguity, the same density of tropes. They offer an intellectual feast prepared by the master.

VALENTINA POLUKHINA

Biography

Iosif Aleksandrovich Brodskii. Born 24 May 1940 in Leningrad. Studied at schools in Leningrad to the age of 15. Convicted as a “social parasite,” 1964, and served 20 months of a five-years’ hard labor sentence; later exiled by the Soviet government: emigrated to the United States, 1972, and became a U.S. citizen, 1977. Taught at the University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, Queen’s College, City University of New York, Columbia University, New York, New York University, Smith College, Northampton, Massachusetts, Amherst College, Massachusetts, Hampshire College, and Mount Holyoke College, South Hadley, Massachusetts, 1972–96. U.S. Poet Laureate, 1991–92. Married Maria Sozzani: one daughter; also had a son with Marina Basmanova. Awards: Mondello Prize (Italy), 1979; National Book Critics’ Circle Award, 1987; Nobel Prize for Literature, 1987; Guggenheim Fellowship; MacArthur Fellowship; honorary degrees from ten universities. Member, American Academy of Arts and Letters (resigned in protest over the honorary membership of the Russian poet Evgenii Evtushenko, 1987); corresponding member, Bavarian Academy of Sciences; Legion of Honor (France), 1991. Died (of a heart attack) in New York, 28 January 1996.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Less than One: Selected Essays, 1986

Watermark, 1992

On Grief and Reason, 1995

Other writings: many collections of poetry and two plays.

Collected works edition: Sochineniia, 4 vols., 1992–95.

Bibliographies

Bigelow, Thomas, Joseph Brodsky: A Descriptive Bibliography 1962–1996, forthcoming

Kline, George L., in 10 Bibliographies of 20th Century Russian Literature, edited by

Fred Moody, Ann Arbor, Michigan: Ardis, 1977:159–75

Further Reading

Bayley, John, “Mastering Speech,” New York Review of Books, 12 June 1986:3–4

Bethea, David M., “Conjurer in Exile,” New York Times Book Review, 13 July 1986:3, 38

Bethea, David M., Joseph Brodsky and the Creation of Exile, Princeton, New Jersey:

Princeton University Press, 1994

- Coetzee, J.M., "Speaking for Language," New York Review of Books, 1 February 1996:28–31
- Dunn, Douglas, "In Whom the Language Lives," Poetry Review 76, no. 3 (1986):4–6
- Gifford, Henry, "Of Petersburg, Poetry and Human Ties," Times Literary Supplement, 19 October 1986:1019
- Philips, William, "Brodsky's Less than One" Partisan Review 1 (1987):139–45
- Polukhina, Valentina, Joseph Brodsky: A Poet for Our Time, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989
- Polukhina, Valentina, Brodsky Through the Eyes of His Contemporaries, Basingstoke: Macmillan, and New York: St. Martin's Press, 1992
- Rayfield, D., "Grist to the Mill," Times Higher Education Supplement, 10 October 1986:18
- Russian Literature* issue on "Brodsky's Genres," edited by Valentina Polukhina, 37, nos. 2–3 (April 1995)
- Smith, G.S., "Brodsky's Less than One," Slavonic and East European Review 66, no. 2 (1988)
- Venclova, Tomas, "A Journey from Petersburg to Istanbul," in Joseph Brodsky's Poetics and Aesthetics, edited by Lev Loseff and Valentina Polukhina, Basingstoke: Macmillan, 1990:134–49

Brown, E.K.

Canadian, 1905–1951

In his brief career, E.K Brown produced—besides six critical books, four edited works, and two translations from the French of full-length works—over 80 articles and 135 reviews. Since he held academic positions in the Departments of English at four universities between 1929 and 1951, his essays and reviews were often scholarly and critical in nature. They appeared in such North American academic journals as American Literature, College English, Modern Philology, Sewanee Review, University of Toronto Quarterly, Queen's Quarterly, and Yale Review. He wrote literary-critical articles and reviews chiefly on 19th- and 20th-century American, Canadian, and English literature; however, he also wrote for encyclopedias, newspapers and popular reviews such as Chambers, the Winnipeg Free Press, Canadian Forum, and Saturday Night.

In the late 1920s, Brown wrote two doctoral dissertations at the Sorbonne, one of which concerned Matthew Arnold. One of the principal motives for his essays and reviews was an Arnoldian impulse to disseminate culture. More particularly he sought to improve Canadian culture, and to broaden and deepen awareness of the tradition of Canadian poetry in English. This he attempted not only in his ground-breaking book On Canadian Poetry (1943), which he calls in the preface "less an historical enquiry than a critical essay," and in his preface to the second edition "this essay," but also in a series of annual review articles on the year's books of Canadian poetry in English which he contributed to the University of Toronto Quarterly from 1935 to 1949. He wrote an introductory essay to a selection of Victorian poetry as well as introductions to selections of poems by Archibald Lampman and Duncan Campbell Scott whom, together with E.J.Pratt, he considered English Canada's foremost poets. Brown introduced a selection he had made of Canadian poetry for a special issue of Poetry (Chicago) in 1941. He also wrote essays on English and French Canadian politicians and historians for Harper's and Canadian Forum, and 46 essays on literary topics, several of which were Canadian, for the "Causeries" column of the Winnipeg Free Press between 1947 and his death in 1951.

Brown's friends and colleagues Leon Edel and A.S.P. Woodhouse gathered, but failed to publish a collection of his essays shortly after his death. However, David Staines in 1977 (at a high point of renewed interest in Canadian literature) was able to publish a collection of Brown's essays in the New Canadian Library series, entitled Responses and Evaluations: Essays on Canada. Brown is more highly regarded as a pioneer critic in the study of Canadian literature, a position he achieved in part through the writing of essays and reviews, than he is as an Arnold scholar, though his Alexander lectures, Rhythm in the Novel (1950), and his biography of Willa Cather are still kindly remembered.

Brown's biographer, Laura Smyth Groening (1993), argues convincingly that "He wrote articles carefully adapted in tone, style, and content for the general reading public." Of his "Causeries," she remarks that they "allowed him to indulge a less formal voice (for which he had a distinct and perhaps surprising ear) than he needed for his academic prose." However, Brown's two voices are modulated rather than being sharply distinct. Brown always writes clearly and directly; he never patronizes or condescends to his general reader, nor is his style pedantic. A representative example of Brown's essay style can be found in an early essay on Abbé Lionel Groulx for the Canadian Forum published in 1929:

The vials of his wrath are, it will be seen, copious; but in their flow, the British lion has the lion's share. The Abbé Groulx's references to Britain are mostly in the strains of the popular song which long ago ran like wild-fire through Quebec: "Les Français aiment l'équité, Les Anglais la duplicité, Voilà la difference."

This, if a little distressing, is explicable. The Abbé Groulx exhorts, he does not expound; history is to him a mine not for science, but for art, and in particular for the art of preaching.

The elegant repetition of "the British lion has the lion's share" is characteristic, as is the delicate irony of the ending. Imagine the effect of omitting the words "and in particular for"; Brown eschews such brutal directness.

In "The Immediate Present in Canadian Literature" (1933), Brown implies the importance of the essay in literary culture when he connects what he calls "the poverty of our criticism" with the lack of Canadian literary periodicals as venues for critical discussion in essay form:

As Mr. Norris Hodgkins remarks in the excellent introduction to his recent collection Some Canadian Essays: "Essays are rarely written in bookfuls." Essays flourish where literary periodicals flourish; and literary periodicals do not flourish in Canada. How many of Mr. Paul Elmer More's essays would have remained unwritten had he not edited the New York Nation? or of Mr.

Middleton Murry's had he not edited The Adelphi, or even of Mr. T.S.Eliot's without his Criterion as a platform? We have no periodicals of importance in which literature is the sole concern, or even the admittedly chief concern. The periodical which seems to me to have done most for the erection and diffusion of critical standards in Canada is The Canadian Forum.

Though Brown's essays are not well known internationally, they are not likely to be forgotten in his "home and native land," where he entreated and cajoled his countrymen to take literature (particularly their own literature) more seriously. In one of the last "Causeries" pieces written before his death, Brown noted that "Canadians do not care what other Canadians think." Brown cared passionately about what his fellow Canadians thought. In his essays for a wide variety of American and Canadian journals, he sought to leaven the lump of Canadian culture.

JOHN FERNS

Biography

Edward Killoran Brown. Born 15 August 1905 in Toronto. Studied at the University of Toronto, B.A., 1926; the Sorbonne, Paris, Docteur-ès-Lettres, 1935. Taught English at the University of Toronto, 1929-41, University of Manitoba, 1935-37, Cornell University, Ithaca, New York, 1941-44, and the University of Chicago, 1944-51. Contributor to many journals and newspapers; coeditor, Canadian Forum, 1930-33, and the University of Toronto Quarterly, 1932-41. Married Margaret Deaver, 1936: two sons. Died in Chicago, 24 April 1951.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

On Canadian Poetry, 1943

Rhythm in the Novel (Alexander lectures), 1950

Responses and Evaluations: Essays on Canada, edited by David Staines, 1977

Other writings: a biography of Willa Cather (1953) and books on literature. Also translated Balzac and Louis Cazamian; edited works by English and Canadian writers.

Bibliography

Staines, David, "E.K.Brown (1905-1951): The Critic and His Writings," Canadian Literature 83 (Winter 1979):176-89

Further Reading

Breen, Melwyn, "Man of Letters: A Talk with Professor E.K. Brown and Some Facts

- About the State of the Nation's Fiction," Saturday Night, 27 December 1949:12
- Bush, Douglas, "E.K.Brown and the Evolution of Canadian Poetry," Sewanee Review 87 (January-March 1979):186-90
- Fee, Margery, "On E.K.Brown," Canadian Literature 86 (Autumn 1980):142-43
- Fee, Margery, English-Canadian Literary Criticism, 1890-1950: Defining and Establishing a National Literature (dissertation), Toronto: University of Toronto, 1981
- McDougall, Robert L., Introduction and Notes to The Poet and the Critic: A Literary Correspondence Between D.C.Scott and E.K. Brown, Ottawa: Carleton University Press, 1983
- Smyth Groening, Laura, Art, Vision, and Process: The Literary Criticism of E.K.Brown (dissertation), Ottawa: Carleton University, 1985
- Smyth Groening, Laura, "Critic and Publisher: Another Chapter in E.K.Brown's Correspondence," Canadian Literature 110 (Fall 1986):46-58
- Smyth Groening, Laura, E.K.Brown: A Study in Conflict, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1993
- Staines, David, Introduction to Responses and Evaluations: Essays on Canada by Brown, Toronto: McClelland and Stewart, 1977: i-xviii
- Steele, Apollonia, "On E.K.Brown," Canadian Literature 89 (Summer 1981):186-87

Browne, Sir Thomas

English, 1605-1682

Sir Thomas Browne, the Norwich physician, is one of the early masters of the English essay. In addition to writing one of the century's most celebrated autobiographies in Religio Medici (1642), he produced a huge inquiry into popular errors of the times in his Pseudodoxia Epidemica (1646), a pair of elegant treatises on the contrasting subjects of urns and gardens in Hydriotaphia (popularly known as Urn Burial) and The Garden of Cyrus (1658), and a number of shorter works, the best known being the formal letter of consolation entitled A Letter to a Friend, the explicitly didactic Christian Morals, and the brief fragment on dreams—none of which can be dated precisely. Without possessing either the foundational or canonical status of a Montaigne or a Bacon, Browne has nonetheless woven himself deeply into the fabric of the essay tradition. Samuel Johnson wrote a "Life of Browne" (1756), which remains the best introduction to his works. Browne has also been a favorite with later writers on both sides of the Atlantic: most notably Herman Melville and Henry David Thoreau on the one, and Walter Pater, Leslie Stephen, and Lytton Strachey on the other.

As an essayist, Browne's interests reflect those of the educated elite in the mid-17th century, a period when scientific curiosity and antiquarianism were both on the rise, the one not always distinguishable from the other, and both only in the process of becoming organized as distinct branches of knowledge in England at this time. (Browne's eldest son, Edward, also a physician, was made a member of the Royal Society five years after its official inception in 1662; the first museum in England was established at Oxford in 1677, with the help of the noted collector, Elias Ashmole, with whom Browne occasionally corresponded.) To Browne these overlapping fields of inquiry at times blurred with, or were subordinated to, a third: religious belief of a broad Protestant order. An avowed purpose of Religio Medici was to counter the popular saying “ubi tres medici, duo Athei” (of every three physicians, two are atheists), and Urn Burial intones at the outset that the “ancient of dayes”—God—ought to be the antiquarian’s “truest object.”

To these many kinds of inquiry, Browne brought his enormous erudition, his fascination for paradox, his passion for mystery, and his seeming desire for endless questions. Almost no topic was too arcane to be investigated: “What Song the Syrens Sang, or what name Achilles assumed when he hid himself among women, though puzzling Questions are not beyond all conjecture” (Urn Burial). Indeed, the more arcane the better since the challenge to ingenuity would then be the greater, regardless of whether the topic involved querying the particular species of fruit used by the serpent to tempt Eve, the origins of blackness in Negroes, the meaning of burial urns discovered in a field near Walsingham, the possibility that the quincunx was the basic ordering design of the universe, or simply whether elephants had knees—though “simply” turns out to be just the wrong word since Browne also goes on to consider a whole host of other possibilities, including whether elephants were capable of talking. About the only topic this lay philosopher, scientist, physician, antiquarian, and amateur theologian did not puzzle over in print was contemporary politics. On the great events of the day—civil war, the execution of Charles I, the emergence of Cromwell—the irenic Browne is conspicuously silent.

Given Browne’s projected, and sometimes explicitly identified, audience of like-minded inquirers, and his dispassionate temperament, the essay was the ideal vehicle for purposeful expression. Its conceptual and discursive flexibility allowed Browne to set forth, in undogmatic fashion, the principal tenets of his religious beliefs in the manner of a personal essay in Religio Medici. Here Browne describes, for example, his youthful heresies, the delight he takes in exploring the “wingy mysteries in Divinity and the ayery subtleties in Religion,” himself as a microcosm of the world. In the many individual sections or brief essays that make up the two parts of Religio, the often familiar topics of faith serve as the substance out of which Browne fashions his silk-like subjectivity. At the same time, but in a different context, the essay also encourages an equally undogmatic, scrupulous, open-ended inquiry into the many popular beliefs recorded in Pseudodoxia Epidemica. Here Browne speaks in a more scholarly and “scientific” voice, seeking to test the truth of an opinion by invoking the threefold criteria of past authorities, reason, and experience.

Nonetheless, the distance between the rhetorically inflected prose of Browne and, say, the descriptively exact writings of a Newton seems greater than can be accounted for by chronology alone, even by a sea change as large as the emergence of science. Although Browne often wrote about what he observed, his prose is most memorable for its succinct phrasing and rich patterning of sounds, conspicuous in the frequent use of formal devices that we more normally associate with poetry, such as assonance, alliteration, internal rhyme, and parallel and antithetical phrases often of nearly equal syllabic count. These rhetorical effects could be intensified to match the gravity of subject matter, as in a sentence like the following from the famous last chapter of Urn Burial: “Time which antiquates Antiquities, /and hath an art to make dust of all things,/hath yet spared these minor Monuments.” This is prose informed by the cadences of near-perfect blank verse. Or they could be invoked to suggest the proliferating exuberance of nature in The Garden of Cyrus: “The calicular leaves inclose the tender flowers,/and the flowers themselves lye wrapt about the seeds,/in their rudiment and first formations.” “Rudiment” is there to give amplitude to the cadence, to help fill out the line.

The American poet Elizabeth Bishop, having just purchased the elegant six-volume Keynes Edition of Browne’s Works (1928–31), jubilantly remarked: “I should like to do nothing but sit all evening and copy off such sentences as ‘That wee call a bee bird is a small dark gray bird,’ or ‘What word you give our knotts or gnatts, a small marsh bird, very fatte and a dainty dish.’ But Cotton Mather still awaits me with his prayers and groans” (One Art, 1994). Although the choice of sentences to copy might differ from one reader to another, Bishop’s response, right down to the felt contrast with the Puritan Mather, seems otherwise typical of the intoxicating effect Browne has on his readers.

JONATHAN F.S.POST

Biography

Born 19 October (or 19 November) 1605 in London. Studied at Winchester College, Hampshire, 1616–23; Broadgates Hall (now Pembroke College), Oxford, 1623–26, B.A., 1626, M.A., 1629; studied medicine in Montpellier and Padua and at the University of Leiden, M.D., 1633; medical apprenticeship in Oxfordshire and possibly Yorkshire, 1634–37; granted Oxford M.D., 1637. Moved to Norwich and practiced as a physician, 1637–81. Married Dorothy Mileham, 1641:12 children (five died in youth, two as young adults). Died in Norwich, 19 October 1682.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Religio Medici, 1642; revised edition, 1643; edited by W.A. Greenhill, 1881, reprinted 1990, W.Murison, 1922, Jean-Jacques Denonain, 1953, Vittoria Sanna, 2 vols., 1959, and Robin H.A. Robbins, with Urn Burial, 1972

Pseudodoxia Epidemica; or, Enquiries into Very Many Received Tenents and Commonly Presumed Truths, 1646; edited by Robin H.A.Robbins, 2 vols., 1981

Hydriotaphia, Urn-Burial; or, A Discourse of the Sepulchral Urns Lately Found in Norfolk, Together with the Garden of Cyrus; or, The Quincundal Lozenge, or Network Plantations of the Ancients, Artificially, Naturally, Mystically Considered, 1658; edited by W.A.Greenhill, 1896, John Carter, 1958, and Robin H.A.Robbins, with Religio Medici, 1972

Religio Medici and Other Works, edited by L.C.Martin, 1964

The Prose of Sir Thomas Browne, edited by Norman Endicott, 1968

Selected Writings, edited by Geoffrey Keynes, 1968

The Major Works, edited by C.A.Patrides, 1977

Selected Writings, edited by Claire Preston, 1995

Other writings: tracts and notes on natural history.

Collected works editions: Works, edited by Simon Wilkin, 4 vols., 1835–36; Works, edited by Geoffrey Keynes, 6 vols., 1928–31, revised edition, 4 vols., 1964.

Bibliographies

- Donovan, Dennis G., Sir Thomas Browne and Robert Burton: A Reference Guide, Boston: Hall, 1981
- Keynes, Geoffrey, A Bibliography of Sir Thomas Browne, Oxford: Clarendon Press, revised edition, 1968 (original edition, 1924)
- Sununu, Andrea, "Recent Studies in Sir Thomas Browne (1970–1986)," English Literary Renaissance 19 (1989):118–29

Further Reading

- Bennett, Joan, Sir Thomas Browne: A Man of Achievement in Literature, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1962.
- Croll, Morris W., Style, Rhetoric, and Rhythm: Essays, edited by J. Max Patrick and others, Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1966
- Davis, Walter R., "Urne Buriall: A Descent into the Underworld," Studies in the Literary Imagination 10 (1977):73–87
- Finch, Jeremiah S., Introduction and Notes to A Catalogue of the Libraries of Sir Thomas Browne and Dr. Edward Browne, His Son, Leiden: Brill (facsimile reprint), 1986
- Fish, Stanley E., Self-Consuming Artifacts: The Experience of Seventeenth-Century Literature, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1972
- Gosse, Edmund, Sir Thomas Browne, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1970 (original edition, 1905)
- Grey, Robin, The Complicity of Imagination: The American Renaissance, Contests of Authority, and Seventeenth-Century English Culture, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996
- Guibbory, Achsah, "'A Rationall of Old Rites': Sir Thomas Browne's Urn Buriall and the Conflict over Ceremony," Yearbook of English Studies 21 (1991):229–41
- Hall, Anne Drury, "Epistle, Meditation, and Sir Thomas Browne's Religio Medici," PMLA 94 (1979):234–46
- Huntley, Frank L., Sir Thomas Browne: A Biographical and Critical Study, Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1962
- Johnson, Samuel, "Life of Browne," in his Christian Morals, edited by S.C.Roberts, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1927; New York: Kraus, 1960 (original edition, 1756)
- Leroy, Olivier, Le Chevalier Thomas Browne, 1605–1682: Médecin, styliste et métaphysicien, Paris: Gamber, 1931
- Loffler, Arno, Sir Thomas Browne als Virtuoso, Nuremberg: Carl, 1972
- Nathanson, Leonard, The Strategy of Truth: A Study of Sir Thomas Browne, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1967
- Pater, Walter, "Sir Thomas Browne," in his Appreciations, edited by William E.Buckler, in Walter Pater: Three Major Texts, New York: New York University Press, 1986 (original edition, 1889, 1890)

Post, Jonathan F.S., Sir Thomas Browne, Boston: Twayne, 1987

Silver, Victoria, "Liberal Theology and Sir Thomas Browne's 'Soft and Flexible' Discourse," English Literary Renaissance 20 (1990): 69–105

Stapleton, Laurence, The Elected Circle: Studies in the Art of Prose, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1973

Warren, Austin, "The Style of Sir Thomas Browne," Kenyon Review 13 (Autumn 1951): 674–87

Webber, Joan, The Eloquent "I": Style and Self in Seventeenth-Century Prose, Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1968

Brunetière, Ferdinand

French, 1849–1906

Ferdinand Brunetière, literary historian and Catholic apologist, achieved fame for his teaching as a professor at the École Normale Supérieure and, above all, as editor from 1893 to 1906 of the influential Revue des Deux Mondes (Review of two worlds). Brunetière was introduced to the review in 1875 by Paul Bourget, when an essay on contemporary literature was required. Like the editors François and Charles Buloz before him, Brunetière contrived to be slightly ahead of the public opinion he led. A pessimist of the school of Schopenhauer, hostile to Zola and his "naturalist" school, Brunetière also moved toward Catholicism slightly ahead of the general revival of interest in religion in early 20th-century France. He was opposed to Anatole France, whose work he nevertheless published, in his desire to limit the permissible bounds of philosophical speculation in matters of morality, and was favorable to the "Parnassian" poets, particularly Leconte de Lisle and Heredia.

Brunetière's contribution to the essay form in France was concerned with the elevation of pieces of literary criticism above Sainte-Beuve's affectations of intimacy and social analyses into a critical genre based on a strong moral vision. His collected volumes are typically entitled Études critiques (1880–1925; Critical studies), Questions de critique (1889; Questions of criticism), Essais sur la littérature contemporaine (1892; Essays on contemporary literature), Discours académiques (1901; Academic discourses), and Variétés littéraires (1904; Literary varieties). It was the need to find support for his moral vision which led Brunetière to his conversion to Catholicism, writing, "I hope that symbolism will bring poetry toward the realization of its highest definition, which is to be a metaphysic manifested in images and enabled to touch the heart...a conception of the world, or a theory of the relations between individuals." This view was also behind Brunetière's hostility to naturalism, which he felt deliberately restricted our vision to the external aspects of life. The whole corpus of his critical writing was essentially directed at detecting in the past the true sources of the national spirit which had been extinguished by defeat in the Franco-Prussian war. He found it, no doubt too exclusively, expressed in the literature of the 17th century.

Brunetière's name is also too exclusively linked to a new critical method, more forcefully expressed than consistently realized by him at the apogee of Darwin's intellectual influence. It is not surprising that the idea of linking methods of literary criticism to those of scientific inquiry should be conceived and prove attractive in the last decade of the 19th century in France, but Brunetière's expressions, derived from Hippolyte Taine, go beyond an interest in "the evolution of genres" to assume some process of natural selection. He believed he could achieve a balance between understanding the variety of literary genres and the individual personal contribution of each great author. The famous course given at the École Normale in 1889–90 was published in essay form in 1890 as L'Évolution des genres (The evolution of genres), with the 55 lectures divided into four groups. They were devoted to the history of criticism in France, the theory of the evolution of genres, a detailed study of three applications of the theory, and a protracted consideration of the conclusions to which the whole course had led. The three examples chosen for detailed consideration illustrated the history of tragedy, the development of sacred eloquence into lyric poetry, and the genesis of the novel.

The combination of criticism, of editing France's foremost literary review, and of giving important professorial lectures naturally led Brunetière to the essay form. Arguably a stricter form than the large academic study, it obliged Brunetière to make his points succinctly and thus sharpen his ideas for presentation to a potential readership of educated nonspecialists and students. In fact, despite the considerable impact of his essays, Brunetière was not a master of the essay form. Indeed, the celebrated article "Après une visite au Vatican" (1895; After a visit to the Vatican) scarcely hangs together in any formal way. It consists of three badly connected parts: the first attacks the scientism of Ernest Renan's 1890 L'Avenir de la science (The Future of Science), while the other two deal with the development of social Christianity and with the prospect of eventual agreement between the Church and the social moralists. The arguments are intelligent and powerful, and in 1895 capable of stirring considerable passion, but their formal presentation does not suggest a natural essayist, however much Brunetière was accustomed to thinking in terms suitable for articles or lectures.

The essay, or such of its analogues as the letter, were, however, the forms to which Brunetière, by trade more a journalist than a professor, most naturally turned. When, in September 1903, the government wanted officially to inaugurate a statue of Renan, who had died in 1892, Brunetière was invited to attack Renan's lingering influence. The form he chose was the letter, of which he wrote five, the Cinq lettres sur Ernest Renan (1904; Five letters on Ernest Renan).

Brunetière has never passed for a great writer, though he was, in his day and for some time thereafter, an influential thinker. It is not specifically as an essayist that he is best remembered, but as a contributor to the necessary re-evaluation of France's literary culture after the era of positivism which nourished him had passed away. His work emphasizes above all the social and moral value of religion in a way which helped to restore the balance between secular and religious spheres at a time, during the last decade of the 19th century, when French academic life was permeated with hostility to the church and its institutions.

ANTHONY LEVI

Biography

Born 19 July 1849 in Toulon. Studied at a lycée in Marseilles; Lycée Louis-le-Grand, Paris, until 1869; studied law briefly at Rennes, 1871. Tutor for five years. Book reviewer, Revue Bleue, from 1874; contributor, from 1875, editorial secretary, 1877–93, and director, 1893–1906, Revue des Deux Mondes. Professor of French literature, École Normale Supérieure, Paris, 1883–1904. Director, Revue de Paris, from 1894. Elected to the French Academy, 1894. Died in Paris, 6 December 1906.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Études critiques sur l'histoire de la littérature française, 9 vols., 1880–1925

Questions de critique, 1889

L'Évolution des genres dans l'histoire de la littérature, 1890

Nouvelles questions de critique, 1890

Essais sur la littérature contemporaine, 1892

Nouveaux essais sur la littérature contemporaine, 1895

Conférence de l'Odéon: Les Époques du théâtre français (1636–1850), 1896

Essays in French Literature (selection), translated by D. Nichol Smith, 1898

Discours de combat, 3 vols., 1900–07

Discours académiques, 1901

Variétés littéraires, 1904

Cinq Lettres sur Ernest Renan, 1904

Other writings: many works on French literature, including a four-volume history of classical French literature (1904–17) and a study of Balzac (1905).

Further Reading

Bondy, Louis J., Le Classicisme de Ferdinand Brunetière, Paris: Flor Burton, 1930

Clark, John, La Pensée de Ferdinand Brunetière, Paris: Nizet, 1954

Giraud, Victor, Brunetière, Paris: Flammarion, 1932

Gullace, Giovanni, Taine and Brunetière on Criticism, Lawrence, Kansas: Coronado Press, 1982

Hocking, Elton, Ferdinand Brunetière: The Evolution of a Critic, Madison: University of Wisconsin Studies in Language and Literature, 1936

Jequier, Walter, Ferdinand Brunetière et la critique littéraire, Tübingen: Laupp, 1923

Nanteuil, Jacques, Ferdinand Brunetière, Paris: Bloud et Gay, 1933

Brzozowski, Stanisław

Polish, 1878–1911

Despite his premature death at 33, Stanisław Brzozowski left behind an impressive number of books and articles, which exerted great influence on his contemporaries and successors, contributing much to the intellectual climate of 20th-century Poland. His range of interests is equally phenomenal. Known chiefly as a leading literary critic of early Modernism, familiar with Polish and European authors of the 19th century, he was also interested in philosophy, religion, and social problems. Essays on Polish Romantic philosophy and poetry, contemporary fiction, and criticism accompanied portrayals of Dostoevskii and Chekhov, articles about Kant, Taine, Nietzsche, Spencerean ethics, the educational values of English literature, and the syndicalism of Georges Sorel. Brzozowski's memoir (Pamiętnik [Diary; wr. 1910–11, pub. 1913]) leaves aside the mundane course of his life and is dedicated to a personal contemplation of the books and events that shaped his spiritual development or stimulated further reflection or vehement opposition. Moreover, he accumulates a variety of intellectual inspirations into a single Weltanschauung, which he expects will transform Poland and the world.

Brzozowski's ideas underwent various modifications and were related to different philosophers such as Marx, Nietzsche, and Bergson. Finally, he became fascinated by the teaching of Cardinal Newman, whose Grammar of Assent (1870) he translated into Polish (Przeświadczenie wiary, 1915). However, once espoused, those ideas became a creed, which Brzozowski promoted with fervor and a characteristic lack of tolerance for any opposing view. As a result, he played the role of national preacher, who considered the future of Poland and of all humanity, and believed in his ability to postulate their tasks and moral obligations.

If the essay is normally regarded as more relaxed and less complete than other forms of discourse, Brzozowski's works only partly comply with that pattern. He never indulges in detached contemplation or witty paradoxes, and overburdens his writings with many references to contemporary thinkers. Yet his effusive rhetoric creates emotional tension, where the reader feels overwhelmed by the ardor of the dedicated author even more than by the undoubted authority of his arguments. In these national "sermons," Brzozowski's digressive style transgresses the logical sequence of arguments, its free progress approaching essayistic models. He is also capable of encompassing complex thoughts within well-chosen metaphors, which would later become part of Polish critical language—for example, his often quoted description of Romanticism as "a flower rebelled against its roots."

Brzozowski's career is linked with notoriety, as he made himself known by fierce attacks against two recognized luminaries of Polish contemporary literature, Henryk Sienkiewicz and Zenon Przesmycki. The aggressive tone and denigrating assessment of these writers founded his reputation as the Zoilus of Polish criticism. The same uncompromising attitude became the hallmark of his later works as well. Some contained articles printed earlier in literary journals, such as Głos (Voice), Przegląd Społeczny (Social review), and Krytyka (Criticism), but some appeared only as books that immediately galvanized their readers and fomented vigorous disputes, as did his most influential publication, Legenda Młodej Polski (1910; The legend of Young Poland). Brzozowski's most important critical and philosophical works also include Współczesna powieść polska (1906; The contemporary Polish novel), Kultura i życie (1907; Culture and life), Współczesna krytyka literacka w Polsce (1907; Contemporary literary criticism in Poland), Idee (1910; Ideas), and Głosy wśród nocy (1912; Voices in the night).

Best known as a literary critic, Brzozowski developed his own idea of professional responsibility. He treated his task seriously, believing it should surpass personal impressions and establish a deeper order of understanding life than literary works themselves: "Literary criticism constitutes a higher form of contemplating art, it is a further stage of evolution toward the ultimate comprehension of those human activities that produce art" (Współczesna krytyka literacka w Polsce). In accordance with his moralist stance, Brzozowski believed in the practical value of critical appraisals, as they were expected to help writers in solving their dilemmas and benefit readers by advancing their knowledge of modern human life. Since he related literature and the arts to ethics, the problem of aesthetic form eventually became linked with moral judgment and regarded as its unwitting or subconscious expression: "Our art always constitutes our judgment on life, a verdict of condemnation or of elevated rapture" (Współczesna krytyka literacka w Polsce). In the course of time, Brzozowski developed his own philosophy of culture, which then served as a point of reference for his re-evaluation of various forms of human activity. Starting from a "philosophy of action," he eventually developed his acclaimed "philosophy of labor," which also found admirers long after his death. What he had in mind was a major physical effort, capable of reshaping reality in accordance with human will. Consequently, intellectual exertion might have turned into genuine labor only by its links with and influence upon manual toil. Since Brzozowski loftily extolled the gigantic endeavor to conquer nature and struggle with "suprahuman forces," his grand theory, regarded by only a few as utopian, attracted many Polish intellectuals. As a kind of national messianism, revitalized long after the Romantic movement, it proclaimed the emergence of a new Polish mission, whose major message would "reveal ideas undiscovered so far by the rest of the world" (Legenda Młodej Polski).

Brzozowski holds a unique position as an astute critic of Polish contemporary culture, known as Young Poland or NeoRomanticism. His Legenda Młodej Polski represents the most comprehensive denunciation of those forms of the Polish mind, which, in Brzozowski's words, represent "the delusion of cultural consciousness." (Was he, however, free of those delusions himself?) Inspired partly by Marxism, he was convinced that all humans reflected their economic and social conditions. Therefore Romantic attempts at controlling life from above—that is, from high "prophetic" posts of national bards—are regarded as misconceived and deceptive. Similar criteria motivate Brzozowski's condemnation of the shortcomings of leading Young Poland writers such as Stefan Żeromski and Stanisław Wyspiański. Still, he shared the views of his peers that intuition is superior to rational thinking, and that inner life is much more interesting than outer reality, reflected in the novels of conventional realists like Sienkiewicz or Władysław Reymont. His lasting impact and popularity has been confirmed by the critical works of Czesław Miłosz, Kazimierz Wyka, and many others.

STANISŁAW EILE

Biography

Leopold Stanisław Brzozowski. Born 28 June 1878 in Maziarnia, near Lublin. Studied at the Russian Imperial University, Warsaw, 1896–97: suspended for demonstrating against a Russian nationalist professor. Arrested for his activities in the illegal group, Society for Popular Education, and imprisoned for a month, where he contracted tuberculosis, 1898; treated at a sanatorium at Otwock, near Warsaw, 1899, and worked there as a librarian, 1900. Married Antonina Kolberg, 1901: one daughter. Contributor to various journals, including Głos, from 1902, and Naprzód (Forward), 1906. Moved to Zakopane in the Tatra Mountains for treatment of TB, 1905; lectured at Lvov Technical University, from 1905. Went for treatment to Nervi, Italy, 1906, and moved to Florence, 1907. Accused of being an agent of the tsarist police, 1908: he denied charges, the case went to trial, and no verdict was reached. Died (of tuberculosis) in Florence, 30 April 1911.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Kultura i życie, 1907; enlarged edition, edited by Andrzej Walicki, 1973

Legenda Młodej Polski: Studia o strukturze duszy kulturalnej, 1910

Głosy wśród nocy: Studia nad przesileniem romantycznym kultury europejskiej, 1912

Aforyzmy, edited by Andrzej Mencwel, 1979

Humor i prawo: Wybrane studia krytyczne, edited by Tomasz Burek, 1988

Eseje i studia o literaturze, edited by Henryk Markiewicz, 2 vols., 1990

Other writings: several novels (including Pod ciężarem Bogo, 1901; Wiry, 1904–05; Plomienie, 1908; Sam wśród ludzi, 1911; Książka o starej Kobiecie [unfinished], 1914), a treatise on Henryk Sienkiewicz (1903), plays, books on literature (including Współczesna powieść polska, 1906) literary criticism (including Współczesna krytyka literacka w Polsce, 1907), and writers (including on Hippolyte Taine, Jan Sniadecki, Stefan Żeromski, Friedrich Nietzsche, and Fedor Dostoevskii), philosophy, letters (collected in Listy, edited by M. Sroka, 2 vols., 1970), and a diary (Pamiętnik, 1913). Also translated Grammar of Assent by John Henry Newman (1915).

Collected works edition: Dzieła wszystkie, edited by A.Górski and S.Kołaczkowski, 4 vols., 1936–38 (never completed).

Further Reading

Kołaczkowski, Leszek, Main Currents of Marxism, vol. 2, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1978:215–39

Mackiewicz, Witold, Brzozowski, Warsaw: Wiedza Powszechna, 1979

Mencwel, Andrzej, Stanisław Brzozowski: Kształtowanie myśli krytycznej, Warsaw:

Czytelnik, 1976

Miłosz, Czesław, "A Controversial Polish Writer: Stanisław Brzozowski," in California Slavic Studies, vol. 2, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1963:53–95

Miłosz, Czesław, Człowiek wśród skorpionów: Studium o Stanisławie Brzozowskim, Warsaw: Młoda Polska, 1982

Miłosz, Czesław, The History of Polish Literature, Berkeley: University of California Press, 2nd edition, 1983:373–79

Syska-Lamparska, Rena A., Stanisław Brzozowski: A Polish Vision, Florence: Le Lettere Firenze, 1987

Walicki, Andrzej, Stanisław Brzozowski—drogi myśli, Warsaw: Państwowe Wydawnictwo Naukowe, 1977

Walicki, Andrzej, Stanisław Brzozowski and the Polish Beginnings of "Western Marxism", Oxford: Clarendon Press, and New York: Oxford University Press, 1989

Walicki, Andrzej, and Roman Zimand, editors, Wokół myśli Stanisława Brzozowskiego, Cracow: Wydawnictwo Literackie, 1974

Buckley, Vincent

Australian, 1925–1988

In the essays collected as Essays in Poetry, Mainly Australian (1957), the poet Vincent Buckley made a unique contribution to discussions about cultural identity and Australian poetry. Writing in an independent and definitive style, he challenged popular critical opinion, judging the realist-nationalist "Australian Tradition" too descriptive and nostalgic, naming vitalism and nationalism as the main retarding forces on Australian poetry, and favoring writing which demonstrated "a deepening of sensibility to the point where the land is conceived and imagined in terms which are at once spiritual, moral, sensory and directed to the drama of human existence." The most influential of these essays, "The Image of Man in Australian Poetry," established what was to become a characteristic interplay of social and metaphysical, spiritual and sensual, inward and outward perspectives. This incarnational poetics informs particular essays on Kenneth Slessor, A.D. Hope, Judith Wright, and James McAuley, as well as critiques of contemporary leftwing poets and Stephen Spender's "asocial aesthetic" ("Helicon as Jordan"). Although contested (and often simplified as "metaphysical"), Essays in Poetry, Mainly Australian, as well as "Patrick White and His Epic" (1958) and "Capricornia" (1960), were very important to the development of Australian literature as a subject worthy of detailed and extensive criticism.

Questions surrounding national identity are pursued in later essays. "Utopianism and Vitalism" (1958) rejects literary nationalism as the main "line of influence" in Australian writing, nominating instead "two chief lines of influence... a kind of utopian humanism or insistence on the soul's radical innocence, and a kind of vitalism, or insistence on releasing the basic powers of life." "National and International" (1978) recalls the nationalist debates of the 1950s as locked into an either/or structure, which Buckley still disputes, preferring to uncover depths of history and myth in immediate social fact. "A Later Note on ‘Identity’” (1980) remembers how, in the 1950s, it was necessary to avoid both imperialism and nationalism, finding Australian culture now “more in danger from imperialism than from nationalism.” “Ease of American Language” (1982) outlines some of Buckley’s own American influences, but his recognition of the “special naturalness” of American literary speech (especially Gary Snyder’s) serves a notion of “the idiom of sensation” which recapitulates and extends an earlier use of “holy place” into a poetics of interconnected rhythms (of place, sensation, perception, and language). At the time Buckley was trying to make his own poetry “locally mimetic,” so that it discovered and developed the intimate relation between the world outside the self and the language that the self had learned. This did not, however, degenerate into nationalism: “Imagination’s Home” (1979) identifies “Ireland as a source-country...in the sense that the psyche grows from and in it, and remains profoundly attuned to it.” Ireland becomes an active symbol for mythic imagination (not a surrogate mythology) and occupies a central place in Buckley’s late poetry and prose.

Buckley’s attention to “the spiritual and social fact of Australia” derived in part from his Christology, which saw the Incarnation as the prototype of “the union of the sacred and the secular.” Influenced by Cardinal Emmanuel Suhard and Yves Congar as well as by the Apostolate movement at the University of Melbourne, Buckley argued, in “The World Awaiting Redemption” (1957), for a Christian humanism that reconciles freedom and grace, immanence and transcendence, declaring that the Church manifests itself fully in a society when it lives at the center of the problems and values of that society. This theology was to be modified and muted as Buckley became more interested in mythic imagination and less identified with institutionalized Catholicism, but the mediatory act coded into the Incarnation metaphor remained integral to his writing. Buckley’s theopoetics is best represented by Poetry and the Sacred (1968), where individual essays on Wyatt, Donne, Blake, Yeats, and Eliot play out the suggestive opening essay, “Specifying the Sacred.” Buckley’s approach, influenced by Mircea Eliade, was as much anthropological as theological, and his central distinction, between “religion in poetry” and “poetry as a religious act,” provided new ways of discussing the relationship between religion and poetry where religion was not reduced to doctrine, nor religious poetry to piety. Another influential religious essay was “The Strange Personality of Christ” (1970), a provocative piece that took issue with two images of Christ then prevalent in popular theology—“man for others” and political agitator—and reasserted his essential mystery by applying Eliade’s concept of “hierophany.” This essay is characteristic of Buckley’s mature religious writing, standing within and against the Christian tradition, defining a shift from dogma to myth and exploring an imagination which is sacramental because deeply sensate.

Buckley also wrote a number of reminiscences and portraits, writing in such a way that descriptive and speculative memories merged. “Remembering What You Have To” (1968) outlines the origins of his gradualist politics (Irish-Catholic working-class background, Labour sympathies, and distrust of power) and discusses his own relationship to Catholicism, communism, and the Labour Party in the 1940s and 1950s. Such essays in memory dominated his late career. The autobiographical Cutting Green Hay (1983) might be approached as an extended sequence of essays, speculating on such topics as the Irish in Australia, Catholic social action of the 1950s, the Labour Split, and university controversies over Vietnam, and providing memorable portraits of figures such as Archbishop Mannix and James McAuley. Memory Ireland (1985) might be similarly read: the chapter “Election and Death of Bobby Sands,” discovering Sands “at the centre of the mythopoeic universe” and in a deeply realized social context, releasing a voice inflected with Ireland, is a particularly fine example of how Buckley used the essay to mediate mythic and social, deliberative and evocative, subject and style. He often employed the term “rhythm” to indicate the interpenetration of style and insight. This idea receives a final and characteristically supple treatment in “Self Portrait” (1986) in which Buckley tells a “self”: “You affirmed a rhythm in all things: the rhythm in the eye as well as the rhythm of the eye...”

NOEL ROWE

Biography

Born 8 July 1915 in Romsey, Victoria. Studied at the Jesuit college in Melbourne; University of Melbourne, B.A., 1950, M.A., 1954; Cambridge University, 1955–57. Married twice: four children. Lockie Fellow, 1958–60, reader, 1960–67, and Personal Chair in Poetry, from 1967, University of Melbourne. Editor, Prospect, 1958–64; poetry editor, Bulletin, 1961–63. Founder, Committee for Civil Rights in Ireland, 1969. Awards: Australian Literature Society Gold Medal, 1959; Myer Award, for poetry, 1967. Vincent Buckley Prize established, 1993. Died in Melbourne, 12 November 1988.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Essays in Poetry, Mainly Australian, 1957

Poetry and Morality: Studies in the Criticism of Matthew Arnold, T. S. Eliot, and F.R. Leavis, 1959

Poetry and the Sacred, 1968

Cutting Green Hay: Friendships, Movements and Cultural Conflicts in Australia's Great Decades, 1983

Memory Ireland: Insights into the Contemporary Irish Condition, 1985

Other writings: several collections of poetry.

Further Reading

Booth, Elizabeth, “Vincent Buckley, an Interview,” Quadrant (August 1976):27–32

Brady, Veronica, “Return to the Centre: Vincent Buckley's Golden Builders,” Westerly 2 (1973):68–76

Buckley, Brian, “Vincent Buckley's Melbourne,” Quadrant (August 1983):35–58

Colmer, John, “The Quest for Roots: Vincent Buckley and Sally Morgan,” in his Australian Autobiography: A Personal Quest, Melbourne: Oxford University Press, 1989:98–116

Davidson, Jim, “Vincent Buckley,” Meanjin 4 (1979):443–58

- Kavanagh, Paul, and Peter Kuch, "Scored for the Voice: An Interview with Vincent Buckley," Southerly 3 (1987):249–66
- O'Sullivan, Vincent, "Singing Mastery: The Poetics of Vincent Buckley," Westerly 2 (1989):50–57
- Rosenbloom, Henry, "An Interview with Vincent Buckley," Meanjin 3 (1969):317–25
- Rowe, Noel, "Believing More and Less: The Later Poetry of Vincent Buckley," Meridian (May 1991):4–18
- Steele, Peter, "Vincent Buckley as Critic," Meanjin 3 (1969):309–16
- Thomson, A.K., "The Poetry of Vincent Buckley: An Essay in Interpretation," Meanjin 3 (1969):293–308
- Wallace-Crabbe, Chris, "Vincent Buckley: The Poetry of Presence," Overland 114 (1989)31–34

Buies, Arthur

French Canadian, 1840–1901

Arthur Buies is without a doubt the enfant terrible of French Canadian literature. He has been accused of having no philosophical culture or direction, of being an eternal adolescent, a greedy seducer, a bored bourgeois, a cheater, narcissistic, maniacal, and inconsistent; yet he is one of the few French Canadian writers of the 19th century whose legacy still continues. It is said that he was the only writer capable of earning his living from his work at the time. During his lifetime and for many years afterwards, he was both loved and hated, either admired as a writer or totally defamed by his critics.

Buies began his writing career after returning from France where he studied at the Lycée Saint-Louis and the Sorbonne. His first major contribution to French Canadian literature came with his return to Canada in 1862 when he began to publish in the journal Pays (Country), which the then Archbishop of Montreal described as "anti-christian, anti-catholic, anti-social, immoral and dangerous to the young." Buies made himself defender of the liberal ideas he had absorbed while living in France and which were far from making their way to French Canada, still very much under the dominance of the Catholic Church. In 1864 he published the first and second of his Lettres sur le Canada (Letters on Canada); here the diversity and style of Buies is made manifest. The first letter is a description of the port of Quebec City, where Buies exercises his talent as a descriptive and geographical writer (he went on to write several other geographical monographs later in life). Here he expresses his infatuation with the beauty of the landscape surrounding Quebec City. The letter is dreamy, tender, full of enchantment, but at the same the cold, irresistible force of nature is present. Nature is savage and ferocious, majestically monotonous, stormy and aggressive. Buies, who emerges in the second letter (written in the same year) as a vehement enemy of the clergy and the Catholic Church, reveals in this first letter a strong sense of religiosity, bordering on the mystical: "In the silence of the Infinite, we were alone. The Unknowable appeared to encompass us in his mystical sphere, a Universal enveloped heaven and earth. I thought I saw the hills rise slowly, garlanded by long vapors bathing in the sun."

The second letter contains none of this enchantment. It is an attack against the obscurantist dominance of the Catholic Church and the occult power of the clergy, who, together with the British colonialists, held the French Canadian people under their oppression and in a state of almost total ignorance. "A clerical education is the poisoning of the people," he claims. Referring to candidates for the priesthood, he writes: "...are they not certain of the truth that great men of history have sought for a very long time, but which has cost them only five or six mea culpas a day and many genuflections?"

As polemical essayist, pamphleteer, and descriptive writer, Buies retains similar characteristics: his style in all contexts is colorful and artistic, romantic, poetical, and allegorical. His descriptive works are full of small portraits of everyday life, tender, fleeting moments which his observing eye catches and relays in language readers can identify with. Today he would be described as a cinematographic writer. This was undoubtedly the reason for his popularity, even though many were shocked by his libertine and anticlerical positions. However, while his style can be rather basic and common, he never misses the sublime. He also disliked the conventional. His descriptions are exotic, and he enjoys playing on opposites: clear and obscure, classical and romantic, realistic and artistic. His work is full of antitheses: laughter and tears, cradle and tomb. He also uses hyperbole, especially when describing moments of emotional intensity.

Buies' first notion of the essay consisted in not harboring any notions. He "wrote to write," as he himself said. "I wrote by imagination, by inclination, according to taste so that I would not become rusty and to fill, here and there, a few hours of existence..." However, writing essays was also a practical and utilitarian activity with which he encouraged change in French Canadian society. He wanted to raise the cultural level of his society, believing this could come about only through a solid knowledge of the French language and of French literature. He wrote several works against the use of anglicisms and barbarisms in French Canada, and he dreamed of seeing the birth of a national, French Canadian literature. As well as denouncing the ecclesiastically-run educational system, he also wrote to bring about a separation of Church and State according to the American model, to denounce intolerance against other forms of thinking and belief, and to sound a cry of alarm to all French Canadians contemplating emigration to the United States. He was one of the first ideologists of a separate and independent French Canadian nation in North America. He spent the last 20 years of his life writing geographical surveys, attempting to convince French Canadians to populate the vast, rich, uninhabited, and unexplored expanses of the Province of Quebec.

ANDRIUS VALEVIČIUS

Biography

Born 24 January 1840 in Montreal. Studied at the Collèges de Nicolet and Sainte Anne de la Pocatière, Quebec, expelled 1855; joined his father in British Guiana, 1856; studied at Trinity College, Dublin, 1856; moved to Paris, and studied at the Lycée Saint-Louis, 1857–59; joined Garibaldi's army in Italy, 1860; returned to Paris, where he studied at the Sorbonne and failed the baccalauréat examination three times; returned to Canada, 1862.; studied at the Institut Canadien; called to the bar, 1866. Editor, La Lanterne, 1868–69, L'Indépendant, 1870, and Le Réveil (The awakening), 1876. Married Maria Mila Catellier, 1887: five children. Died in Quebec City, 26 January 1901.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Lettres sur le Canada, 3 vols., 1864–67; reprinted 1968

Chroniques, 2 vols., 1873–75; edited by Francis Parmentier, 2 vols., 1986–91

Petites chroniques pour 1877, 1878

Chroniques canadiennes: Humeurs et caprices, 1884; reprinted 1978

La Lanterne (periodical), 1884; as La Lanterne d'Arthur Buies: Propos révolutionnaires et chroniques scandaleuses, confessions publiques, edited by Marcel A.Gagnon, 1964

Anglicismes et canadianismes, 1888; reprinted 1979

Arthur Buies, 1840–1901, edited by Léopold Lamontagne, 1959

Anthologie d'Arthur Buies, edited by Laurent Mailhot, 1978

Other writings: books about the Saguenay and Outaouais Rivers, Canadian flora and fauna, and other travel writing.

Bibliography

Tessier, Rachel, Bio-Bibliographie d'Arthur Buies, Montreal: University of Montreal, 1943

Further Reading

Bender, Prosper, "Arthur Buies," in Literary Sheaves, or, La Littérature au Canada français, Montreal: Dawson, 1881:129–34

Douville, Raymond, La Vie aventureuse d'Arthur Buies, Montreal: Lévesque, 1933

Falardeau, Jean-Charles, "Arthur Buies, l'antizouave," Canadian Literature 11, no. 27 (May 1960):25–32

Gagnon, Marcel A., Le Ciel et l'enfer d'Arthur Buies, Quebec City: Presses de l'Université Laval, 1965

Genest, Jean-Guy, "La Lanterne, 1868–1869," Recherches Sociographiques 10, nos. 2–3 (1969):389–407

Hare, John, "Arthur Buies, essayiste: Une Introduction à la lecture de son œuvre," in L'Essai et la prose d'idées au Québec, Montreal: Fides, 1985:295–310

Lamontagne, Léopold, Arthur Buies, homme de lettres, Quebec City: Presses de l'Université Laval, 1957

Marion, Séraphin, "La Citadelle classique," in Les Lettres canadiennes d'autrefois, vol. 7, Ottawa: L'Éclair, 1952

Roy, Pierre-Georges, "Les Ouvrages d'Arthur Buies," Bulletin des Recherches Historiques 7, no. 5 (1901):150–53

Tusseau, J.-P., "La Fin édifiante d'Arthur Buies," Études Françaises 9, no. 1 (February 1973):45–54

Vachon, G.-André, "Arthur Buies, écrivain," Études Françaises 6, no. 3 (1970):283–95

Bulgarian Essay

The essay is one of the typical genres of 20th-century Bulgarian literature, the fruit of both the native prose tradition and interiorized foreign influence (particularly German, French, and Russian). The native origins of the Bulgarian essay can be traced back to Istoriia sloveno-Bulgarskaia (1762; The Slavic-Bulgarian history), written by Father Paisii Khilendarski (1722–73), the biographical and historical essays of Zakhari Stoianov (1850–89), and Aleko Konstantinov's (1863–97) travel essay Do Chikago i nazad (1894; To Chicago and back). These works are representative of the leading themes in the Bulgarian essay: national identity (initially seen as the institutional unity of the State, the independent Orthodox Church, and common past, but from the beginning of the 20th century understood primarily as cultural identity) and Bulgaria's relationship to the rest of Europe. In general, the Bulgarian essay reflects the peculiarity of the nation's political and social history: from the second half of the 19th century, when Bulgaria was liberated from the Ottoman yoke, the essay was considered to be a means of public discussion of the major problems of the nation.

In Bulgarian literature and fine art at the beginning of the 20th century, the traditional society and the "national soul" were aestheticized. The genre of the essay in its turn was thematically dominated by the idea of "Bulgarian-ness," systematically introduced by the pioneer of the modern Bulgarian essay, Pencho Slaveikov (1866–1912), whose essential contribution to Bulgarian culture was to reject utilitarian tendencies and reconcile the "traditional" and the "modern," for instance in his works on Bulgarian folksongs and on Nietzsche's Also sprach Zarathustra (1883–85; Thus Spoke Zarathustra).

Krustyu Krustev (1866–1912), Boian Penev (1882–1927), Spiridon Kazandzhiev (1882–1951), Petar Mutafchiev (1883–1943), Vladimir Vasilev (1883–1963), Chavdar Mutafov (1889–1954), Nikolai Rainov (1889–1954), Konstantin Petkanov (1891–1952), Konstantin Gulabov (1892–1980), Atanas Iliev (1893–1985), Geo Milev (1895–1925), Atanas Dalchev (1904–77), and Ivan Khadzhiiski (1907–44), each in his own fashion, reflected on a few particular issues that stemmed from the theme of cultural identity: the national psychology of Bulgarians in contrast to Western European or other Balkan nations; changes in the emotional world of Bulgarians in modern times; the spiritual and social state of the Bulgarian intelligentsia; Bulgarian literature and fine art in the context of European culture; cultural kinship of Bulgarians and other Slavic nations. German influence can be detected in the idea of Bulgarian "spirit," "soul," or "fate" (the equivalent of Geist) which preoccupied students of national psychology and culture. By the time of World War II, a whole mythology of national psychology ("narodopsikhologiiia") had developed, ranging from the most positive to the most negative features: the former were seen as the heritage of the idyllic past, while the latter were explained as the result of the lost innocence of peasant life and the lack of national self-consciousness, spiritual and social unity, and stability in the present day. In this period the Bulgarian essay revolved around the questions “Who are we? Where do we come from? Where are we going?,” as Ivan Elenkov formulates them in his preface to the most representative anthology of Bulgarian essays, Zashto sme takiva? (1994; Why are we thus?).

Along with and through the elaboration of the theme of cultural identity, the main characteristics of the Bulgarian essay were constituted: a tendency toward formal objectiveness (the narrative point of view is not “I,” the author, but “we,” which can be denoted as Bulgarians, the Bulgarian intelligentsia, or a group gathered around a particular cultural magazine); a tendency toward generalization and a prophetic tone in some essays which followed naturally from the ambition to answer the most important questions about national existence and the future, even when discussing fleeting subjects; and a succinct style, especially characteristic of followers of the German school of the essay.

After World War II, communists seized political power in Bulgaria. The idea of a gradual Europeanization of Bulgaria, dominant in the interwar period, was replaced by the ideology of the “internationalization” of Bulgarian culture. Literary and art criticism was proclaimed to have a “leading function” in cultural life; critics were supposed to “transmit” the ideological directives of the Communist Party into art, to propagate the “most recent course of the Party” and the “most advanced” literary method—that of “socialist realism” (see The Cultural Policy of Socialism [1986], the selected speeches of Todor Zhivkov, the first secretary of the Communist Party). Because the genre of the essay was treated as an effective literary means of communist control over cultural life, and because, unlike other communist countries, in Bulgaria samizdat (underground) publishing hardly existed, the essay was more deeply harmed than other literary genres.

The 1970s brought the first significant breakthrough to this stagnation. Georgi Markov (1920–78) began broadcasting his political essays about Bulgaria from Radio Free Europe (collected in The Truth That Killed, 1983). Blaga Dimitrova (1922–) and Iordan Vasilev (1928–) published a two-volume essay in 1975 devoted to the Bulgarian poet Elisaveta Bagriana (Mladostta na Bagriana [Bagriana’s youth] and Dni cherni i beli [Days black and white]) and Toncho Zhechev (1929–) brought out a series of essays under the title Mitut za Odisei (1979; The myth of Odysseus). Both publications evoked storms of negative criticism incited by the Communist Party. The 1980s, however, began with the official acceptance of Zhechev’s essay Bulgarskiiat Velikden ili strastite Bulgarski (1980; Bulgarian Easter, or the passion of Bulgarians), which restored the interwar interest in the riddles of national mentality and posed anew the question: Why are we thus?

In the 1980s the essay genre became more popular and obtained greater liberty. Several publishing houses (e.g. Narodna Kultura [National culture], Izdatelstvo na Otechestveniiia Front [Publishing house of the Fatherland Front], Knigoizdatelstvo “Georgi Bakalov” [Georgi Bakalov publishing house]) issued series of essay collections by Bulgarian and foreign authors. The philosopher Isak Pasi (1929–), himself author of essays on German, French, and Spanish thinkers, began promoting European classical essays in Bulgarian translation. In the 1980s two essayists who cherished their spiritual link with the interwar period attracted readers’ attention: Mikhail Nedelchev (1942–) with his Sotsialni stilove, kriticheski siuzheti (1987; Social styles, critical subjects), and Svetlozar Igov (1945–) wrth his critical essays (Groznite pateta [1984, 1989; Ugly ducklings]) and essayistic fragments Prizori (1988; Before dawn). Thematic variety and relative liberty of expression notwithstanding, the Bulgarian essay still had to keep its most important messages “between the lines” in order to avoid censorship or to react playfully to the “deficiencies” and “simulations” of the totalitarian epoch, as did Alexander Kiossev (1953–), Ivailo Dichev (1955–), Vladislav Todorov (1956–), and Ivan Krstev (1965–) in their essays collected in Post-Theory, Games, and Discursive Resistance: The Bulgarian Case (1995).

After the collapse of communism at the end of 1989, Bulgaria found itself “in the hall of democracy,” to use the title of one of the typical collections of essays from the first two years of the political changes (Georgi Velichkov [1938–], V antreto na demokratsiyata, 1990). Liberated from the restraints of censorship, Bulgarian publishers hastened to issue books by émigré writers: Georgi Markov’s political essays Zadochni reportazhi za Bulgaria (1990; Broadcasts about Bulgaria) and Novi zadochni reportazhi za Bulgaria (1991; New broadcasts about Bulgaria); Stefan Popov’s (1906–89) Bezsumitsi (1992; Insomnia), which combines memoir and travel essay features and belongs to the national identity trend in the Bulgarian essay; Atanas Slavov’s (1925–) autobiographical essay S tochnostta na prilepi (1992; With the Precision of Bats) and Bulgarskata literatura na “razmraziavaneto” (1994; The “Thaw” in Bulgarian Literature), as well as a selection of his political essays, Politika: Belezhki po dilemite na promianata (1992; Politics: notes on the dilemmas of the change), in which Slavov reflects on the specifics of the national political tradition which allowed communism to root itself deeper in Bulgaria than in some other East European countries and points out the importance of the well-functioning state institutions for the transition from totalitarianism to parliamentary democracy. Konstantin Katsarov’s (1898–1980) two-volume travel essay Svetut otblizo (1947; The world from close up), once on the censorship index, was reprinted in 1995. Step by step, the higher standards of the interwar Bulgarian essay are returning. The liberation of thought was accompanied by the liberation of language and style; awareness of personal responsibility for the written word along with the immense variety of political opinions brought a new subjectivity to the Bulgarian essay. At the same time, interest in “hot topics,” as well as the fact that during the period of transition to a market economy most of the literary and cultural magazines collapsed and were replaced by newspapers, made a journalistic style prevail in most writings. Typical examples of the contemporary Bulgarian essay can be found in Blaga Dimitrova’s Raznoglasitsy (1996; Discords), in Beliia svyat (1994; The wide world), travel essays by Vera Mutafchieva (1929–), or in the essays of Dimitar Koroudzhiev (1941–), whose main concern is the deformation inflicted by totalitarianism on the human soul (e.g. Hristiianskata svoboda [1996; Christian freedom]).

At the end of the 20th century the Bulgarian essay is returning to the question “Why are we thus?,” burdened—or perhaps enriched—with reflections on the consequences of more than four decades of communist stagnation. Once again the audience expects the essay to address the pivotal problems of the future of Bulgaria, to be a genre with a social mission.

KATIA MITOVA-JANOWSKI

Anthologies

- Izbrani Bulgarski eseta: Bulgarski eseisti mezhdu dvete voini* (Select Bulgarian essays: Bulgarian essayists between the wars), edited by Zdravko Petrov, Varna: Knigoizdatelstvo "Georgi Bakalov," 1981
- Post-Theory, Games, and Discursive Resistance: The Bulgarian Case*, edited by Alexander Kiossev, Albany: State University of New York Press, 1995
- We wlasnych oczach: XX-wieczny esej zachodnio- i południowosłowiański* (In [their] own eyes: the 20th-century West and South Slavic essay), edited by Halina JanaszekIvaničzkova, Warsaw: Państwowy Instytut Wydawniczy, 1977
- Zashto sme takiva? V tursene na Bulgarskata kulturna identichnost* (Why are we thus? In search of Bulgarian cultural identity) edited by Ivan Elenkov and Rumen Daskalov, Sofia: Izdatelstvo Prosveta, 1994

Further Reading

- Elenkov, Ivan, and Rumen Daskalov, Prefaces to Zashto sme takiva? V tursene na Bulgarskata kulturna identichnost (Why are we such? In search of Bulgarian cultural identity), edited by Elenkov and Daskalov, Sofia: Izdatelstvo Prosveta, 1994

Burckhardt, Jacob Christoph

Swiss, 1818–1897

Although Jacob Christoph Burckhardt gained the greatest respect for his seminal study Die Kultur der Renaissance in Italien (1860; The Civilization of the Renaissance in Italy), his contribution as an essayist is equally remarkable, though much less known today and relatively difficult to fathom. Born in Basle, he spent most of his life there teaching and writing, reaching out to the public through lectures and essays and through editorial work with the Baseler Zeitung (Basle news) and other publications. Whereas his books are primarily concerned with historical and art historical subjects, such as Die Zeit Constantins des Grossen (1853; The Age of Constantine the Great), Der Cicerone (1855), The Civilization of the Renaissance in Italy, and, finally, Geschichte der Renaissance in Italien (1867; The History of the Renaissance in Italy), all his other publications, many posthumous, are based on philosophical reflections, lecture notes, and drafts. Burckhardt did not compose essays in the narrow sense of the word, but dealt with history in an essayistic manner. In particular he expressed his view of history in Weltgeschichtliche Betrachtungen (1905; Reflections on History), in Historische Fragmente (1929; Judgements on History and Historians), and in many letters, which were revised and edited by Werner Kägei, Burckhardt's successor in the chair of history at the University of Basle.

Burckhardt was reticent about his lecture notes, refusing to let them be published during his lifetime. Only on his deathbed did he give permission for the printing of his insightful historical-philosophical studies. These lectures focus on the historical process itself, on humans' dependency on time, and on the interaction of state, religion, and culture; others analyze what makes some people famous and what constitutes their fortune. But the majority are purely historical, emphasizing individual periods or personalities.

Friedrich Nietzsche, who came to Basle in 1869 as professor of classics, was one of the few who seemed to have fully understood Burckhardt's complex and not always clearly structured presentations. He praised him for being an individual thinker and an enemy of fashions and modern trends in scholarship. In 1910 Carl Neumann lauded Burckhardt's works as masterpieces of the "cultural-historical" style. Johann Huizinga admired him as the "wisest spirit of the 19th century," and he is now considered to have been one of the finest essayists of the 19th century in the field of world history and art history.

Whereas traditional historians have pursued an interest in the process of times and events, Burckhardt investigated the constitutive elements of specific epochs such as the Italian Renaissance and attempted to grasp its universal characteristics. Moreover, he deliberately distanced himself from structural, social-historical, and economic approaches. Instead he emphasized the individual person, both an active and passive being in history, as the only worthwhile object of study. For that reason he dismissed any questions about the prehistorical origin of peoples and countries because the data about those early periods are too fragmented and do not inform us about actual people from that time. "Primitive" people and religions were of no interest to Burckhardt because he only examined "sophisticated" or "high" European cultures, which excelled through their intellectual productivity and corresponding art forms. The entity of culture as a holistic phenomenon dominated his thinking, but he ignored, deliberately and entirely, Asian and any other non-European cultures, concentrating instead on the history of ancient and modern Europe.

At the same time Burckhardt was neither an idealist nor an elitist, and did not believe in the absolute goodness of humankind. According to his view, in his later years strongly colored by Arthur Schopenhauer's teachings, historical investigations always reveal the good and the evil in humans, and the dream of reform to establish an ideal society is in vain. Even happiness is no guaranteed goal; the best that can be hoped for is the absence of misfortune. In his essayistic writing Burckhardt increasingly expressed a distrust of historical progress and lamented the decline of modern culture in terms of the loss of communication, individualism, leisure, and cultural education.

His essays are cultural-historical studies that examine the totality of a period, a people, or a genre (e.g. arch forms in architecture, madonna paintings in art). Burckhardt studied the difference between barbarism and culture, the contrast between antiquity and the modern world. Characteristic features in his lectures are the reliance on anthropomorphic images (e.g. the youth of the Middle Ages), the preference for organic concepts (e.g. "life of humankind"), emphasis on idealistic concepts, and naive but possibly brilliant generalizations (e.g. "Christianity," "the Church," "the Jews," "Heathendom," and "the forces of a time period").

Burckhardt's basic concept of past cultures was not limited by the approaches and methods traditionally pursued by historians. His essays addressed a more nonacademic audience, being written from a philosopher's rather than an academic scholar's point of view. His understanding of history as an academic discipline was based on the concept of a universal spirit expressed in culture, and the spirit of individual epochs of history, captured in their art. Nevertheless Burckhardt did not believe in the religious telos of history, and considered Christianity, like any other religion, as an historical phenomenon in the cultural process from the past to the present.

Art history represented an important aspect of Burckhardt's research and teaching, and in many of his critical writings he examined the art works from the past as reflections of the human dimension. For many years Burckhardt lectured on both history and art history at the University of Basle; later he even abandoned the purely historical discipline. His highly acclaimed study on The Civilization of the Renaissance in Italy is based not only on many art historical observations, but also includes extensive and detailed examinations of Renaissance art. In this sense Burckhardt developed into a perceptive cultural historian who incorporated the various elements of past cultures in his essays and analyses of those times. The purpose of art was, according to Burckhardt, to serve religion, even during the Italian Renaissance. Yet art appeared to him as an expression of the ineffable, a reflection of the mystical realm, a phenomenon which can be appreciated but not intellectually penetrated. Art is autonomous and can only be approached through feeling and intuition. Art objects are therefore representations of the "true" world and contain the key to absolute truth. Burckhardt did not consider art history from a chronological point of view, but in terms of genres, aesthetics, and styles. He believed art enjoys a form of autonomy and cannot be interpreted using social, economic, and political criteria.

Burckhardt pursued history through the eyes of an art historian, art history through the eyes of a theologian, and the history of religion through the eyes of an historian. For him, cultural history is intellectual history, or the history of the spirit of a culture. Not surprisingly, the individual, as it emerged in the age of the Italian Renaissance, appears as the major factor in the development of culture. The historian must therefore examine all aspects of daily life, in particular literature, arts, religion, the state, the educational system, festivities, and morality. The individual, Burckhardt's prime object of study, reflects the totality of society. The historian's purpose, then, is to trace the development of humanity as it is expressed through both the visible and the invisible, i.e. the factual and the spiritual world. Although this contradicts the search for the individual, Burckhardt was convinced that great men and women determine the course of history and lead to humankind's telos.

Burckhardt writes succinct and carefully crafted sentences, and successfully conveys his opinions and conclusions to his readers. His writings and lectures were especially aimed for the enlightenment of the public, without losing the quality of academic scholarship. With his publications he targeted the thinking reader, those among his audience who could enjoy true beauty and the teachings of the past.

ALBRECHT CLASSEN

Biography

Born 25 May 1818 in Basle. Studied theology at the University of Basle, 1836–39; history and the history of art under Leopold von Ranke, University of Berlin, 1841–43. Editor, Baseler Zeitung, 1844–45. Visited Italy, 1846. Revised and edited the Geschichte der Malerei (History of painting) and the Handbuch der Kunstgeschichte (Handbook of art history) by his teacher Franz Kugler, 1847. Taught at the Pädagogium, Basle, 1848, and at the Polytechnic Institute, Zurich, 1855; chair of history and art history, University of Basle, 1858–93. Rejected offer to succeed von Ranke as chair of history, University of Berlin. Died in Basle, 8 August 1897.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Die Kunstwerke der belgischen Städte, 1842.; in Frühe Schriften, edited by Hans Trog and Emil Dürr, 1930

Griechische Kulturgeschichte (lecture course), edited by Jacob Oeri, 4 vols., 1898–1902, and Rudolf Marx, 3 vols., 1952; abridged version as History of Greek Culture, translated by Palmer Hilty, 1963

Weltgeschichtliche Betrachtungen, edited by Jacob Oeri, 1905, Rudolf Stadelmann, 1949, Rudolf Marx, 1955, and (with Über das Studium der Geschichte), Peter Ganz, 1982; as Force and Freedom: Reflections on History, edited and translated by James Hastings Nichols, 1943; as Reflections on History, translated by M.D.H., 1943

Vorträge, 1844–1887, edited by Emil Dürr, 1918

Unbekannte Aufsätze...aus Paris, Rom und Mailand, edited by Josef Oswald, 1922

Historische Fragmente (vol. 7 of his Gesamtausgabe), 1929; as Judgements on History and Historians, translated by Harry Zohn, 1958

Weisheit aus der Geschichte, edited by Otto Heuschele, 1968

Die Kunst der Betrachtung: Aufsätze und Vorträge zur bildenden Kunst, edited by Henning Ritter, 1984

Other writings: works on the history of art (including Die Zeit Constantins des Grossen [The Age of Constantine the Great], 1853; Der Cicerone [The Cicerone; or, Art Guide to Painting in Italy], 1855; Die Kultur der Renaissance in Italien [The Civilization of the Renaissance in Italy], 1860), poetry, and correspondence.

Collected works editions: Gesamtausgabe, edited by Hans Trog, Emil Dürr, and others, 14 vols., 1929–34; Gesammelte Werke, 10 vols., 1955–59.

Further Reading

Flaig, Egon, Angeschauter Geschichte, zu Jacob Burckhardts "Griechische Kulturgeschichte", Rheinfelden: Schäuble, 1987

Gütermann, Valentin, Jacob Burckhardt als politischer Denker, Wiesbaden: Steiner, 1957

Hardtwig, Wolfgang, Geschichtsschreibung zwischen Alteuropa und moderner Welt:

- Jacob Burckhardt in seiner Zeit*, Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1974
- Heftrich, Eckhard, Hegel und Jacob Burckhardt: Zur Krisis der geschichtlichen Bewusstseins, Frankfurt-on-Main: Klostermann, 1967
- Jaeger, Friedrich, Bürgerliche Modernisierungskrise und historische Sinnbildung: Kulturgeschichte bei Droysen, Burckhardt, und Max Weber, Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1994
- Kaegi, Werner, Jacob Burckhardt: Eine Biographie, Basle: Schwabe, 8 vols., 1947–82
- Maikuma, Yoshihiko, Der Begriff der Kultur bei Warburg, Nietzsche und Burckhardt, Königstein/Ts.: Hain, 1985
- Siebert, Irmgard, Introduction to Aesthetik der bildenden Kunst by Burckhardt, Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1992: 1–34
- Winners, Richard, Weltanschauung und Geschichtsauffassung Jakob Burckhardts, Hildesheim: Gerstenberg, 1971 (original edition, 1929)

Burke, Edmund

Irish, 1729–1797

Edmund Burke's first published writings were periodical essays for the Reformer, a miscellany largely produced by Burke himself at the close of his undergraduate career at Trinity College, Dublin. In the very first paragraph of this paper, which ran to 13 numbers from January to April 1748, Burke asserts the link between taste and morals that underlies his writings for nearly 50 years: "the morals of a Nation have so great Dependence on their taste and Writings, that the fixing the latter, seems the first and surest Method of establishing the former."

In 1758 a more significant opportunity opened for him in London as editor of the Annual Register. Burke wrote the Register's original articles singlehandedly until at least 1764. This job had three main consequences for his later writings and speeches. The Annual Register reprinted a broad variety of historical, scientific, antiquarian, and literary research, whose scope is later revealed in Burke's wide-ranging imagery, diction, and general knowledge. Second, the ideas he expressed in his book reviews developed into longstanding principles which guided his entire life. In 1759 he criticized Rousseau's "satire on civilized society," for instance, because it would "unsettle our notions of right and wrong." He returns to this theme in the Letter to a Member of the National Assembly (1791), where he charges that Rousseau's "paradoxical morality...led directly" to the cultural revolution that preceded the French Revolution.

Most important, the Annual Register's long historical articles, broken up into essay-length chapters, gave Burke practice in making historical exposition interesting to his audience. In these early articles, he experiments with combining extensive knowledge of the events of the year—from the military operations of the Seven Years' War to the conquests of the East India Company—with the strategic significance of any given event and an estimate of the characters of the persons involved. Burke refines and expands this combination of data, character, and underlying historical significance into the powerful rhetoric of his later political writings. It is a logical development from Burke's ironic description of English “astonishment and indignation at finding that an Asiatic prince of their own creation had dared to be a sovereign” (1764) to his bitter sarcasm at the end of Warren Hastings’ trial, where he casts Hastings as Macbeth: ““Thou has it now, King, Cawdor, Glamis, all”” (1794).

In Burke’s writings, definitions and principles arise out of example and experience, rather than vice versa. Even in the very theoretical “Introduction on Taste” (1759) to his A Philosophical Enquiry into...the Sublime and Beautiful, Burke argues that the definition of taste “seems rather to follow than to precede our enquiry...” While he does define taste, he contrasts his inquiry with one based on “naked reason.” The one work where Burke proceeds strictly from propositions to conclusions (A Vindication of Natural Society, 1756) is a satire—undetected by some—on the Enlightenment notion that unaided human reason can establish secure foundations for society, apart from custom and historical precedent.

While the “Introduction on Taste” is sometimes called an “essay,” Burke himself used that term in only one title, “An Essay Toward an Abridgement of English History” (wr. 1756–57, pub. 1812). Only a few sheets of this work, which runs to over 200 pages, were published in Burke’s lifetime. The work is an “essay” in the literal sense of an attempt to account for the growth of the British Constitution, as Burke describes David Hume’s History of Great Britain. Many of his later themes—such as the significance of manners and the historical context for the growth of practical liberty—are found here. Burke probably abandoned it in 1757 because he could not produce a history that would both surpass Hume’s work and satisfy his high expectations of what he should do for his audience and for his own integrity. That balance, between Burke’s self-imposed task and his relation to his audience, is present in all of his writings, from the speeches he prepared for publication as an M.P., to the open letters he wrote after his exile from the Whig Party, through the memos he penned for the eyes of William Pitt.

For Burke, it was not enough to introduce his audience to the proper principles of politics: like many essayists of the 18th century, he felt he was educating his readers’ taste. While he could admit the brilliance of Rousseau, therefore, he simultaneously dismisses him as “totally destitute of taste in any sense of the word.” Burke’s theatrical, highly charged rhetoric reflects his union of an educated taste with an educated moral and political intelligence. For instance, his Reflections on the Revolution in France (1790) describes the fall of Marie Antoinette in the terms of Aristotle on tragedy (“what a heart must I have to contemplate without emotion that elevation and that fall”), then employs Horace’s Poetic Art in a critique of the French revolutionaries’ political system: “The precept given by a wise man as well as a great critic, for the construction of poems, is equally true as to states: Non satis est pulchra esse poemata, dulcia sunt... To make us love our country, our country ought to be lovely.”

The aphorism at the end of this quotation brings up another striking element of Burke’s style. Like English essayists from Francis Bacon through Samuel Johnson, Burke often distills his analysis of history and character into single moments of jewel-like precision, balance, and beauty. For instance, his response to the exponents of natural rights—“art is man’s nature”—arises from a historical and biographical exposition of the controversies surrounding the Revolution of 1688 (An Appeal from the New, to the Old Whigs, 1791). Similarly, his description of the French political situation in 1791 concludes thus: “It is ordained in the eternal constitution of things, that men of intemperate minds cannot be free. Their passions forge their fetters” (Letter to a Member of the National Assembly). Here, as often, Burke’s prose is simultaneously aphoristic, alliterative, and self-consciously rhythmic.

Like many science and philosophical essayists of his century, Burke frequently appeals to experience. Yet he is often self-consciously opposed to the Enlightenment. He sees habit, custom, tradition, and even prejudice as more reliable guides than “the naked reason.” For writers, politicians, philosophers, and historians who have sought an alternative to the purely rationalistic and anti-traditionalist strands of the Enlightenment, Burke’s writings have proven useful for over 200 years.

DANIEL E. RITCHIE

Biography

Born 12 January 1729 in Dublin. Studied at Abraham Shackleton’s Quaker school, Ballitore, County Kildare, 1741–43; Trinity College, Dublin, 1744–48, A.B., 1748; editor, the Reformer, 1748; entered the Middle Temple, London, 1750; left law for literary work, 1755. Married Jane Nugent, 1757: two sons (one died in youth). Editor, 1758–66, and contributor, until 1788, Annual Register, London. Private secretary to William Gerard Hamilton, 1759–64, accompanying him to Ireland, 1763–64, and receiving a pension on Hamilton’s retirement, 1764. Whig Member of Parliament for Wendover, 1765–74, Bristol, 1774–80, and Malton, Yorkshire, 1781–94: active, contentious M.P., opposing Tory government, advocating economic reform, peace with the American colonies, and the limitation of slave trade. Private secretary to the Marquis of Rockingham, 1765; paymaster-general of the Forces in the new Whig government, under Rockingham, 1782, and Portland, 1783, but never given a cabinet post; quarreled with Fox and the Whigs, 1791, and advised support for Pitt and the Tories, 1792; retired from Parliament, and granted government pension, 1794. Member of Samuel Johnson’s literary Club, from 1764. Rector, University of Glasgow, 1784, 1785. Awards: honorary degree from Dublin University, 1791. Died (of stomach cancer) at his Beaconsfield estate, Buckinghamshire, 9 July 1797.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

The Reformer (periodical), 13 nos., 28 January–21 April 1748

A Vindication of Natural Society, 1756; edited by Frank N. Pagano, 1982

A Philosophical Enquiry into the Origin of Our Ideas of the Sublime and Beautiful, 1757; revised edition, 1759; edited by James T. Boulton, 1958, revised 1987, and Adam Phillips, 1990

Reflections on the Revolution in France, 1790; edited by Conor Cruise O’Brien, 1969, J.G.A. Pocock, 1987, and L.G. Mitchell, 1993

Letter to a Member of the National Assembly, in Answer to Some Objections to His Book on French Affairs, 1791; facsimile reprint, 1990

An Appeal from the New, to the Old Whigs, in Consequence of Some Late Discussions in Parliament, Relative to the Reflections on the French Revolution, 1791

Thoughts on the Prospect of a Regicide Peace, 1796

Three Memorials on French Affairs, 1797

Select Works, edited by E.J.Payne, 5 vols., 1874–78

A Note-Book of Edmund Burke: Poems, Characters, Essays and Other Sketches, edited by Henry V.F.Somerset, 1957

Selected Writings and Speeches, edited by Peter J.Stanlis, 1963

On Government, Politics and Society, edited by B.W.Hill, 1975

The Political Philosophy, edited by Iain Hampsher-Monk, 1987

Pre-Revolutionary Writings, edited by Ian Harris, 1993

Other writings: works on history and politics, reports, speeches, and correspondence (collected in The Correspondence, edited by Thomas W.Copeland and others, 10 vols., 1958–78).

Collected works editions: Works, edited by French Laurence and Walker King, 8 vols., 1792–1827; The Works of the Right Honourable Edmund Burke, 9 vols., 1854–62; The Writings and Speeches (Clarendon Edition), general editor Paul Langford, 1981(in progress; 12 vols. projected).

Bibliographies

Cowie, Leonard W., Edmund Burke, 1729–1797: A Bibliography, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1994

Gandy, Clara I., and Peter J.Stanlis, Edmund Burke: A Bibliography of Secondary Studies to 1982, New York: Garland, 1983

Todd, William B., A Bibliography of Edmund Burke, Godalming, Surrey: St. Paul's Bibliographies, 1982 (original edition, 1964)

Further Reading

Blakemore, Steven, Burke and the Fall of Language: The French Revolution as Linguistic Event, Hanover, New Hampshire: University Press of New England, 1988

Boulton, James T., The Language of Politics in the Age of Wilkes and Burke, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1963

Canavan, Francis, The Political Reason of Edmund Burke, Durham, North Carolina: Duke University Press, 1960

Chapman, Gerald W., Edmund Burke: The Practical Imagination, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1967

Cone, Carl B., Burke and the Nature of Politics, Lexington: University of Kentucky Press, 2 vols., 1957–64

Copeland, Thomas W., Our Eminent Friend: Edmund Burke, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1970 (original edition, 1949)

Gengembre, Gérard, "Burke," in A Critical Dictionary of the French Revolution, edited by François Furet and Mona Ozouf, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1989 (original French edition, 1988)

Janes, Regina, "Edmund Burke's Flying Leap from India to France," History of European Ideas 7 (1986):509–27

Kirk, Russell, “Burke and the Politics of Prescription,” in his The Conservative Mind, Washington, D.C.: Regnery, 1986 (original edition, 1953)

Mansfield, Harvey, Statesmanship and Party Government: A Study of Burke and Bolingbroke, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1965

O’Brien, Conor Cruise, The Great Melody: A Thematic Biography and Commented Anthology of Edmund Burke, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, and London: Sinclair Stevenson, 1992

Parkin, Charles, The Moral Basis of Burke’s Political Thought, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1956

Paulson, Ronald, “Burke’s Sublime and the Representation of Revolution,” in Culture and Politics from Puritanism to the Enlightenment, edited by Pérez Zagorin, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1980

Pocock, J.G.A., “Burke and the Ancient Constitution,” in his Politics, Language, and Time: Essays on Political Thought and History, New York: Atheneum, 1971; London: Methuen, 1972

Reid, Christopher, Edmund Burke and the Practice of Political Writing, Dublin: Gill and Macmillan, 1985

Stanlis, Peter, Edmund Burke and the Natural Law, Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1958

Weinsheimer, Joel, “Burke’s Reflections: On Imitation as Prejudice,” Southern Humanities Review 16 (1982):223–32

Weston, John C, “Edmund Burke’s View of History,” Review of Politics 23 (1961):203–29

White, James Boyd, “Making a Public World,” in his When Words Lose Their Meaning: Constitutions and Reconstitutions of Language, Character and Community, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1984

Wilkins, Burleigh Taylor, The Problem of Burke’s Political Philosophy, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1967

Burke, Kenneth

American, 1897–1993

A poet, novelist, and short story writer, Kenneth Burke is best known as one of the most important literary critics and rhetoricians of the 20th century. His essays and reviews encompass a range of subjects from aesthetics and music to anthropology and sociology, and have been influential in areas such as linguistics, communication theory, semiotics, and composition studies. In recent years, Burke’s reputation has grown exponentially as his insights and ideas have been rediscovered and applied in a variety of fields.

Burke was first published in the avant-garde magazines of the 1920s, such as Broom and the Dial. In the 1930s, the major outlets for his essays, book and music reviews were the Nation and the New Republic, magazines that reached a larger general audience. By the 1940s, he had found an academic audience in the critical quarterlies and specialized publications. He began collecting his work in book form in 1931; many important essays, however, remain uncollected.

Stanley Edgar Hyman (1948), an early admirer of Burke, claimed that “Like Bacon, Burke has set out to do no less than to integrate all man’s knowledge into one workable critical frame.” Returning to the Baconian roots of the essay as a vehicle for investigation, Burke devoted his critical efforts to analyzing the effects that symbols, when elaborated into rhetorical systems—whether literary, philosophical, or social—have on human beings. He defined man as “the symbol-using animal” and literature as a variety of “symbolic action” (“Definition of Man,” 1966). The use of language, moreover, is never disinterested, but always motivated; works of art, he stressed, are strategies for encompassing situations (“Literature as Equipment for Living,” 1941). A poet, for example, might write a poem as a way of working out an oppressive sense of guilt (see “The Philosophy of Literary Form,” 1941, on Coleridge). All texts, for Burke, are potential subjects for probing rhetorical analysis.

Burke’s first collection of essays, Counter-Statement (1931), treated artists known for their aestheticism: André Gide, Walter Pater, Gustave Flaubert, Remy de Gourmont. Throughout these essays, Burke considers not only what each artist’s work did for them, but also what it did for the audience they addressed—what “situations” the “strategies” encompassed. Many of Burke’s most memorable aphorisms are found here: “Beauty is the term we apply to the poet’s success in evoking our emotions” (“The Poetic Process”) or “An art may be of value purely through preventing a society from becoming too assertively, too hopelessly, itself” (“Thomas Mann and André Gide”).

In the shadow of the Depression, Burke began to stress “Literature as Equipment for Living.” That essay, and others collected in The Philosophy of Literary Form (1941), treat “a sociological criticism of literature.” In “The Rhetoric of Hitler’s Battle,” for example, Burke analyzes how Mein Kampf helped “unify” the German people by offering Hitler’s “strategy for encompassing a situation”—finding a scapegoat for his own persecution mania—as a “world-view” they might adopt.

Books such as Permanence and Change (1935) and Attitudes Toward History (1937) explore symbolic action in such areas as magic, ritual, history, and religion, while A Grammar of Motives (1945) and A Rhetoric of Motives (1950) work out what Burke calls the “dramatistic” basis of all symbolic action. He argues that “any complete statement about motives will offer some kind of answers to these five questions: what was done (act), when or where it was done (scene), who did it (agent), how he did it (agency), and why (purpose)” (A Grammar of Motives).

Burke’s last major collection, Language as Symbolic Action (1966), contains “Five Summarizing Essays,” including his “Definition of Man.” In elaborate “dramatistic” analyses of several plays by Shakespeare, Goethe’s Faust, Coleridge’s “Kubla Khan,” and Emerson’s Nature, Burke displays the strengths and weaknesses of his style and methods. The essays are, as usual, provocative and surprising, but the style could be seen as abstract, often obscure, repetitious, and too much in debt to Burke’s own terminology. Critics have seized on such phrases as “Where, then, are we?” as evidence of the author’s Byzantine elaboration. Burke’s prose, like Bacon’s, is at its most resonant when it is most aphoristic, e.g. “The poet, in his pious or tragic role, would immunize us by stylistically infecting us with his disease” (“The Philosophy of Literary Form”).

Burke once wrote, “The main ideal of criticism, as I conceive it, is to use all that there is to use” (“The Philosophy of Literary Form”). As modern criticism moves away from an exclusively text-centered study to engage all forms of human behavior—“symbolic actions”—Burke has come increasingly to be seen as a central figure. His essays provoke, inspire, even infuriate. Burke has become, according to the critic Denis Donoghue (in the New York Review of Books, 26 September 1985), an American “sage.”

CHARLES L.O'NEILL

Biography

Kenneth Duva Burke. Born 5 May 1897 in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. Studied at Ohio State University, Columbus, 1916–17; Columbia University, New York, 1917–18. Married Lillian Mary Batterham, 1919 (divorced, early 1930s); three daughters. Coeditor, Secession, 1923; member of the research staff, Laura Spelman Rockefeller Memorial, New York, 1926–27; music critic, Dial, 1927–29, and the Nation, 1934–36; editor, Bureau of Social Hygiene, New York, 1928–29. Married Elizabeth Batterham, 1933; two sons. Lectured and taught at various American colleges and universities, 1937–76. Awards: many, including several grants and fellowships; National Endowment for the Arts Award, 1968; Ingram Merrill Foundation Award, 1970; American Academy Gold Medal, 1975; American Academy of Arts and Sciences Award, 1977; National Medal for Literature, 1981; Bobst Award, 1983; honorary degrees from eight universities. Member, American Academy of Arts and Letters, and American Academy of Arts and Sciences. Died in Andover, New Jersey, 19 November 1993.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Counter-Statement, 1931

Permanence and Change: An Anatomy of Purpose, 1935

Attitudes Toward History, 1937

The Philosophy of Literary Form: Studies in Symbolic Action, 1941; revised edition, 1957

A Grammar of Motives, 1945

A Rhetoric of Motives, 1950

The Rhetoric of Religion: Studies in Logology, 1961

Perspectives by Incongruity; Terms for Order, edited by Stanley Edgar Hyman and Barbara Karmiller, 1964

Language as Symbolic Action: Essays on Life, Literature and Method, 1966

Other writings: the novel Towards a Better Life (1932), poetry, short stories, and literary criticism. Also translated works from the German, including Death in Venice by Thomas Mann (1925).

Further Reading

- Bewley, Marius, "Kenneth Burke as Literary Critic," in The Complex Fate: Hawthorne, Henry James and Some Other American Writers, London: Chatto and Windus, 1952; New York: Grove Press, 1954
- Brown, Merle E., Kenneth Burke, Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1969
- Crusius, Timothy, "A Case for Kenneth Burke's Dialectic and Rhetoric," Philosophy and Rhetoric 19, no. 1 (1986):23–37
- Duncan, Hugh Dalziel, Language and Literature in Society: A Sociological Essay, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1953
- Duncan, Hugh Dalziel, Communication and Social Order, New York: Bedminster Press, 1962; London: Oxford University Press, 1968
- Frank, Armin Paul, Kenneth Burke, New York: Twayne, 1969
- Heath, Robert L., Realism and Relativism: A Perspective on Kenneth Burke, Macon, Georgia: Mercer University Press, 1986
- Henderson, Greig E., Kenneth Burke: Literature and Language as Symbolic Action, Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1988
- Holland, L. Virginia, Counterpoint: Kenneth Burke and Aristotle's Theories of Rhetoric, New York: Philosophical Library, 1959
- Hyman, Stanley Edgar, "Kenneth Burke and the Criticism of Symbolic Action," in his The Armed Vision, New York: Knopf, 1948; revised edition, 1955
- Knox, George, Critical Moments: Kenneth Burke's Categories and Critiques, Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1957
- Lentricchia, Frank, Criticism and Social Change, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1983
- Nemerov, Howard, "Everything, Preferably All at Once: Coming to Terms with Kenneth Burke," Sewanee Review 79 (April-June 1971):189–205
- Ransom, John Crowe, "An Address to Kenneth Burke," Kenyon Review 4 (Spring 1942):219–37
- Rueckert, William H., Kenneth Burke and the Drama of Human Relations, Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1982 (original edition, 1963)
- Rueckert, William H., editor, Critical Responses to Kenneth Burke, 1924–1966, Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1969
- Rueckert, William H., Encounters with Kenneth Burke, Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1994
- Southwell, Samuel B., Kenneth Burke and Martin Heidegger—with a Note Against Deconstructionism, Gainesville: University Presses of Florida, 1987
- Wellek, René, "Kenneth Burke," in A History of Modern Criticism, Volume 6: American Criticism, 1900–1950, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1986
- White, Hayden, and Margaret Brose, Representing Kenneth Burke, Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1982

Burroughs, John

American, 1837–1921

During his lifetime the American nature writer John Burroughs achieved a fame which seemed somehow incongruent with the simplicity of his life and the quiet nature of his work. Growing up in the Catskill Mountains of New York State, “the son of a farmer who was the son of a farmer who was the son of a farmer,” as he put it in his autobiography My Boyhood (1922), he lived simply all his life, and in his middle years returned to making part of his living from fruit and vegetable crops. He walked in nature with unceasing pleasure and perceptiveness, and wrote about it in informal, inviting, yet scientifically responsible essays. His work struck a chord with the public, and his lifetime work of some two dozen books went through many printings. He became the sought-out friend of famous men of the world, such as Henry Ford, Thomas Edison, and Theodore Roosevelt. More significantly, his writings on nature were placed in schools throughout the United States, and became the model through which children learned to observe and appreciate nature; some schools were even named after him.

Because of the tremendous popularity of Burroughs in his own time, and especially his friendships with leading figures of his day, his work was later either forgotten in the shadow of his celebrity, or its literary value underestimated. Either way, Burroughs the public figure seemed to shoulder aside Burroughs the writer. This is not what Burroughs himself would have wanted; his lifelong commitment to his writing for its own sake, and to the active engagement with nature which his writing urges, far outweighed his honest but sometimes ambivalent enjoyment of his fame. For Burroughs, his life was indeed inextricably mingled with his writing: “My books are, in a way, a record of my life—that part of it that came to flower and fruit in my mind. You could reconstruct my days pretty well from these volumes. A writer who gleans his literary harvest in the fields and woods reaps mainly where he has sown himself. He is a husbandman whose crop springs from the seed of his own heart” (My Boyhood).

The accomplishment of his writing, and its great contribution to American nature writing, is in the sunlit work itself, and in the wooded, bird-attended path it helped create for other writers. (Burroughs, sometimes known as “John O’Birds,” was more likely to lavish his sentences and paragraphs on a bird’s song or its nest than on a “scenic view.”) Fortunately, recent reassessments of Burroughs have accompanied a general revival of interest in nature writing, and his work is receiving new attention and appreciation. As a writer Burroughs was greatly influenced by the American transcendentalists, Emerson in particular. As Burroughs wrote of his first reading of Emerson: “I read him in a sort of ecstasy. I got him in my blood, and he colored my whole intellectual outlook. He appealed to my spiritual side; his boldness and unconventionality took a deep hold upon me.” Throughout his writing, Burroughs continually returns to the “gospel of nature,” finding spirituality there rather than in conventional religion. In his late work, Accepting the Universe (1920), Burroughs explores epistemological questions in a way that reflects both his transcendentalist roots and his interest in Darwin and science. He writes, “I have never tried to clothe myself in the delusive garments of a superstitious age. I have ever pinned my faith to a man-made God, however venerable. I have opened my mind to the open air of the universe, to things as they are...”

Burroughs’ work also reveals strong ties to the American Romanticism of Walt Whitman, the close friend of his years in Washington, D.C. Burroughs wrote his first book about Whitman’s work, and it was Whitman who helped him decide on the title of his first book of essays, Wake-Robin (1871). It is likely that the many hours and days spent with Whitman helped to nourish the generous, openhearted, and often lyrical spirit of Burroughs’ own writing style.

Burroughs’ approach to the nature essay was uniquely his own, and yet far more influential than is commonly realized. The writers who extolled the great vistas of the American West and the drama of wilderness explorations and adventures became the more celebrated examples of American nature writing as the 20th century developed. Yet Burroughs’ more quiet and close-to-home approach to experiencing, enjoying, and writing about nature has gained renewed appreciation toward the end of the century. His essays are always close to human life, as well as to nature. They are artfully composed, though casual in style. The sensibility in his essays is a reliable one, which the reader can trust for the “science” of its observations, and for the friendliness of its invitations to participate, appreciate, respect, and enjoy. True essayist that he is, Burroughs builds his observations and interpretations at a comfortable pace, as if taking the reader on one of his countless walks. An observation is followed by interpretation, by further illustration and observation, until a new light of understanding seems to come over writer and reader at the same time. Burroughs trusts the reader to have reached that enlarged understanding with him, and typically does not belabor it in his conclusion. The essay will simply end—often with a graceful echo of the main topic, rather than a methodical reiteration. In “The Spring Bird Procession” (1919), for instance, Burroughs expresses his pleasure at the spring migration of birds, but dwells particularly on the lost pleasure of the great migrations of the now extinct passenger pigeon: “In my boyhood the vast armies of the passenger pigeons were one of the most notable spring tokens. Often late in March, or early in April, the naked beechwoods would suddenly become blue with them, and vocal with their soft, childlike calls.” He describes the last great migration of pigeons he witnessed, concluding, “The pigeons never came back. Death and destruction, in the shape of the greed and cupidity of man, were on their trail.” With typical forthrightness, he confesses to having killed the last passenger pigeon that he himself ever saw, “little dreaming that, so far as I was concerned, I was killing the last pigeon.” He follows this with the rueful statement, “What man now in his old age who witnessed in youth that spring or fall festival and migration of the passenger pigeons would not hail it as one of the gladdest hours of his life if he could be permitted to witness it once more? It was such a spectacle of bounty, of joyous, copious animal life, of fertility in the air and in the wilderness, as to make the heart glad.”

The essay might have ended here, but instead it goes on to describe the migrations of other bird species, and to speculate about their lives, closing many pages later with the description of purple finches stealing cherry blossoms from his orchard. After his alarm that they might ruin his crop, he discovered that “they had only done a little of the much-needed thinning. Out of a cluster of six or eight blossoms they seldom took more than two or three, as if they knew precisely what they were about, and were intent on rendering me a service.” He does not spell out the contrast between the finches’ considerate thinning of his cherry blossoms and the human “greed and cupidity” that drove the passenger pigeon to extinction, but leaves it to the reader to make the connection.

Burroughs is probably best known for his close observation of particular birds, plants, or animals. Yet, as his biographer Edward Renehan (1992.) notes, “As an artist interpreting nature, Burroughs was never to become what he called ‘a strict man of science.’ He evolved not into a naturalist, per se, but into a new hybrid: a literary naturalist with a duty to record his own unique perceptions of the natural world. While remaining loyal to the truth of natural facts, he also remained true to his personal vision of these facts.” His clearheadedness and free use of his own voice, expressing his delight in nature, are the elements of Burroughs’ writing that have been most influential on later nature writers. In his essay “Sharp Eyes” (1879), Burroughs speculates:

Noting how one eye seconds and reinforces the other, I have often amused myself by wondering what the effect would be if one could go on opening eye after eye to the number say of a dozen or more. What would he see? Perhaps not the invisible—not the odor of flowers or the fever germs in the air—not the infinitely small of the microscope nor the infinitely distant of the telescope ... We open another eye whenever we see beyond the first general features or outlines of things—whenever we grasp the special details and characteristic markings that this mask covers. Whenever you have learned to discriminate the birds, or the plants, or the geological features of a country, it is as if new and keener eyes were added.

CHARLOTTE ZOË WALKER

Biography

Born 3 April 1837 near Roxbury, New York. Grew up on a farm in the Catskill Mountains, New York. Taught in schools in New York, New Jersey, and Illinois, 1854–63; studied briefly at Hedding Literary Institute, Ashland, New York, and Cooperstown Seminary, 1856. Married Ursula North (died, 1917), 1857: one son. Contributor to various journals and newspapers, from 1860, including the Atlantic Monthly. Studied medicine privately, Tongore, New York, 1862. Moved to Washington, D.C., 1863, where he met and became lifelong friends with Walt Whitman. Clerk, 1864–72; special bank examiner, from 1873, Currency Bureau, Treasury Department. Traveled to England, 1871 and 1882. Bought a fruit farm on the Hudson River, West Park, New York, 1873, and built on it the house Riverby, living there from 1874, where he soon gave up office work to make his living through writing and farming; later built the cabin Slabsides, near Riverby, 1894, and renovated the farmhouse Woodchuck Lodge, near Roxbury, 1920. Became good friends with Theodore Roosevelt, Henry Ford, and fellow naturalist John Muir; accompanied Muir on a trip to Yosemite, and Roosevelt to Yellowstone National Park. Awards: American Institute of Arts and Letters Gold Medal, 1916; honorary degrees from three universities. Died on a train in Ohio (returning from California to New York State), 29 March 1921.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Wake-Robin, 1871

Winter Sunshine, 1875; revised, enlarged edition, 1877

Birds and Poets, with Other Papers, 1877

Locusts and Wild Honey, 1879

Pepacton, 1881

Fresh Fields, 1884

Signs and Seasons, 1886

Sharp Eyes, and Other Papers, 1886

Birds and Bees, 1887

Indoor Studies, 1889

Riverby: Essays on Birds, Trees, and Prairies, 1894

A Bunch of Herbs, and Other Papers, 1896

The Light of Day, 1900

Literary Values, and Other Papers, 1902

Far and Near, 1904

The Complete Nature Writings, 9 vols., 1904–21

Ways of Nature, 1905

Leaf and Tendril, 1908

Time and Change, 1912

The Summit of the Years, 1913

The Wit of a Duck, and Other Papers, 1913

The Breath of Life, 1915

Under the Apple-Trees, 1916

Field and Study, 1919

Nature near Home and Other Papers, 1919

Accepting the Universe, 1920

Under the Maples, 1921

The Last Harvest, 1922

The Heart of John Burroughs's Journals, edited by Clara Barrus, 1928

John Burroughs's America (selections), edited by Julian Burroughs, 1951

The Birds of John Burroughs, edited by Jack Kligerman, 1976

A River View and Other Hudson Valley Essays, edited by Edward Renehan, 1981

A Sharp Lookout: Selected Nature Essays, edited by Frank Bergon, 1987

Birch Browsings: A John Burroughs Reader, edited by Bill McKibben, 1992

Other writings: the collection of poetry Bird and Bough (1906), a book about mammals (Squirrels and Other Fur-Bearers, 1900), Camping with President Roosevelt (1906; enlarged edition, as Camping and Tramping with Roosevelt, 1907), studies of Whitman (Walt Whitman as Poet and Person, 1867; Walt Whitman, 1896) and John James Audubon (1902), the autobiography My Boyhood (1922), and correspondence. Also edited Songs of Nature (1901), an anthology of nature poetry.

Collected works editions: The Writings (Riverside Edition), 23 vols., 1895–1922; Riverby Edition, 23 vols., 1904–23, reissued as the Wake-Robin Edition, 1924, 1968.

Bibliographies

- Blanck, Jacob, "John Burroughs," in Bibliography of American Literature, vol. 1, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1955:433–48
- Garrison, Joseph M., Jr., "John Burroughs," Bulletin of Bibliography 24 (May-August 1964):95–96

Further Reading

- Kanze, Edward, The World of John Burroughs, New York: Abrams, 1993
- Kelly, Elizabeth Burroughs, John Burroughs, Naturalist: The Story of His Work and Family by His Granddaughter, West Park, New York: Riverby Books, 1959
- Renehan, Edward J., Jr., John Burroughs, an American Naturalist, Post Mills, Vermont: Chelsea Green, 1992
- Walker, Charlotte Zoë, editor, Sharp Eyes: John Burroughs and American Nature Writing: A Collection of Essays, New York: Lang, 1997
- Westbrook, Perry D., John Burroughs, New York: Twayne, 1974

Butler, Hubert

Irish, 1900–1991

Hubert Butler began publishing essays in the 1930s in Irish newspapers and literary magazines such as the Bell, the Twentieth Century, the Irish Times, and the Dublin Magazine. It seems extraordinary that, for whatever combination of personal, political, and literary reasons, his essays did not appear in book form until the Lilliput Press in Dublin published Escape from the Anthill (1985), The Children of Drancy (1988), and Grandmother and Wolfe Tone (1990). Penguin drew from these three for The Sub-Prefect Should Have Held His Tongue and Other Essays (1990). Butler's recent place as a major 20th-century essayist adds to the essay form the sort of late-emergence story that has occasionally marked undiscovered poets or fiction writers, except that Butler wrote and published essays for almost 60 years. His mature vitality (although many of the collected essays are decades old, they are frequently subject to revisions, additions, and epilogues) might be compared to Henry Roth and M.F.K.Fisher (who also had a vibrant autumnal output) in the United States.

Butler's essays have some of the epigrammatic force, allusive erudition, and philosophical range of Montaigne's. As for his 20th-century generic compatriots, Butler moves into the personal and political in ways similar at times to Virginia Woolf, at others to George Orwell. Butler, Woolf, and Orwell also attend to moral conundrums and outrages on large and small scales, from the international, to the intranational, to the small but telling personal decisions that are symptomatic of cultural dis-ease and decline. All three share a balance of jeremiadical pessimism and small sparks of hope.

In “A Fragment of Autobiography” (1987), Butler strikes Orwellian notes, speaking respectively of his school days and his days at Oxford: “I remember all the shrubs between the pavvy and the swimming bath. Hundreds of episodes present themselves in heavy type. Everything else is in italics”; “Religion had become a subject, like Philosophy or Physics. You either took it or you didn’t.” Butler’s attention to detail, image, and metaphor, and his demystifying sardonic nature has some of the flavor of Orwell’s “Such, Such Were the Joys” (1953) or “England, Your England” (1953), as well as the tonal complexity that hedges bets against absolute pronouncement. Butler’s voice, though, has a kind of lyrical crankiness distinctly his own in essays such as “Beside the Nore” (1984): “Various economic causes can be alleged for their [local industry’s] failure but often there is nothing to be said except that men grow old and have bored or stupid sons and that today there are many prosperous industries which would be more admirable as ruins covered with valerian and wild wall flowers.” In “Aunt Harriet” (1987), Butler curves back around toward his topic, following a typical digression, with a mixture of sentiment, self-effacement, and harsh but muted statement: “I have left Aunt Harriet in her coffin a long way behind, but am thinking of the memories she took with her; they were all unimportant but the past is a mosaic of tiny pieces, a fragment of a larger picture, Ireland in the twenties and the last days of the Anglo Irish, and I will continue with more minutiae... It is only because my elder relations are all dead and I am an old man now, soon to go into a box myself, that I can write like this. Perhaps I should for I have nothing interesting to relate, only what happened in my mind, and that is discreditable but not exciting.”

Butler’s range is wide, but certain subjects and themes dominate his essays: his experience in the Balkans and Russia in the 1930s, and in Vienna working to arrange exit visas for Jews in 1938–39, and the war’s incomplete moral reckoning; his ancestral environs above the River Nore in the village of Bennettsbridge, County Kilkenny; telling moments in Irish history; the “troubles,” along with his perspective on both his own Anglo-Irish and the Catholic cultures of Ireland; the impoverished role of religion in late modern life and values, from the failure of sectarian theology in Ireland to the capitulations of religious institutions to nationalist governments and human atrocity during the war; literary essays on writers from Maria Edgeworth (a relation) to Graham Greene (he writes memorably in “Graham Greene and Stephen Spender: The Sense of Evil and the Sense of Guilt,” 1951: “They are inseparable in their dissent, like two sisters quarrelling in the family home. The one wants the front door locked in case there’s a burglar, the other wants it ajar, in case there’s a fire. Or so they say”); and more general “speculative” essays, as Butler called them.

Echoing Auden’s dark imperative at the end of “September, 1939,” Butler frequently calls for realistic or pragmatic peace as a first step toward reconstructing human relations. In “Divided Loyalties” (1984) he writes, “Opposites often attract each other but the attraction seldom lasts if the full extent of the opposition is ignored. It is as neighbours, full of ineradicable prejudices, that we must love each other, not as fortuitously ‘separated brethren.’” Butler often strikes the kind of Montaignean note of “Des cannibales” (1580; “Of Cannibals”), signaling as classical personal essayists always have an ability to step outside of his own culture and find it not only flawed, but ridiculous, ludicrous even in the perpetuation of stagnant modes of thought and inscribed prejudices. In “The Auction” (1957), Butler tells us that “Living in social harmony is a most difficult art; the most absolute concentration is required, and perfect equilibrium. Our island is dangerously tilted towards England and towards Rome, good places in themselves but best seen on the level. Everybody is rolling off it and those that remain, struggling hard for a foothold, drag each other down. But it is not necessary to argue, it is only necessary to look.”

In “Grandmother and Wolfe Tone” (1962) Butler displays his ability to shine the beacon of aphoristic humanism on the murky and intractable conflicts between Irish Catholic and Protestant: “No educated man now dares take up a cause till he has mastered 90 per cent of the facts and all the background... There is only one way out, the way of Jefferson and Tone. In the North the Protestant Parliament for the Protestant people must go and in the South the separation of Church and State must be introduced and adhered to absolutely.” In “The Sub-Prefect Should Have Held His Tongue” (1956), perhaps Butler’s most trenchant analysis of human iniquity married to historical revisionism and ignorance, he speaks specifically of the Catholic responsibility for the forced conversion of thousands of the Serbian Orthodox, including the following indictment of moral compromise and delusion: “In countries where the old beliefs are dying it is the custom for educated people to handle them with nostalgic reverence... If you suppress a fact because it is awkward, you will next be asked to contradict it.”

Two other essays from Butler’s body of work must be singled out: “The Eggman and the Fairies” (1960) and “Little K” (1967). “The Eggman and the Fairies” is a riveting novelistic account of the barbaric attempt in 1895 to exorcise Bridget Cleary, committed by her husband and abetted by the active participation of friends and the indifference of almost all, in a town in the shadow of Slevanam mountain, host to ancient natural beauty and persistent superstition. Butler’s reconstruction and commentary are masterly, distinguished by a kind of shocked horror at the past mixed with restraint and a balance of sympathy. Butler ends the essay with another kind of mystery: the mystery of the missing eggman, the (fellow?) traveler Bridget Cleary claimed to have met on her not-so-mysterious excursion, and whom no one seemed to remember to inquire about.

“Little K” is one of Butler’s longest and most complex essays, a personal lament for a retarded granddaughter (Little K), an ethical history of euthanasia, an accusation of the way an indifferent legal system has appropriated the prerogatives of family and community, and a somber judgment of Christianity. Speaking of Spartan eugenic practices, Butler writes, “All this is very shocking to Christians, if Christians have not forfeited their right to be shocked at such things by their connivance at Auschwitz and Hiroshima... The gospels say that a darkness fell upon the earth when Christ was crucified and when a new era began. Surely the Silence of Pius [concerning the Nazis and their exterminations] has the same symbolic quality. It was mysterious and ominous, like the silence of woods and fields that precedes a total eclipse of the sun.” The end of the essay, a stoical coda, typically combines the qualities of resignation and hope that make one wish Butler’s voice in the wilderness had been more widely available earlier: “Maybe in ten or twenty years, as little K climbing very slowly has reached the highest rung she will ever reach, she will meet me there descending much more rapidly. If that were so, she would be the companion that I would choose above all others to travel back with me into nothingness.”

DAVID LAZAR

Biography

Hubert Marshal Butler. Born 2 October 1900 in Kilkenny. Studied at Charterhouse, Godalming, Surrey; St. John’s College, Oxford. Worked for county libraries movement in Ireland, 1922–23; lived and taught abroad, in Alexandria, Egypt, 1927, Latvia, 1930, Leningrad, 1931, and Zagreb, 1934–37; also traveled in Russia, China, America, and the Balkans. Married Peggy Guthrie, 1930: one daughter. Worked for a Quaker organization helping to obtain exit visas for Jews, Vienna, 1938–39. Returned to Ireland, 1941, when he inherited Maiden Hall country house in Bennettsbridge, near Kilkenny. Journalist, contributing to various newspapers and journals; review editor, the Bell, 1950. Revived the Kilkenny Archaeological Society, 1945. Awards: several literary prizes for his essay collections in the 1980s. Died near Kilkenny, 5 January 1991.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Escape from the Anthill, 1985

The Children of Drancy, 1988

Grandmother and Wolfe Tone, 1990

The Sub-Prefect Should Have Held His Tongue and Other Essays, 1990

Other writings: a study of saints (1972). Also translated Leonov’s The Thief (1931) and Chekhov’s The Cherry Orchard (1934).

Further Reading

Longley, Edna, “‘Defending Ireland’s Soul’: Protestant Writers and Irish Nationalism After Independence,” in Literature and Nationalism, edited by Newey Vincent and Ann Thompson, Liverpool: Liverpool University Press, and Savage, Maryland: Barnes and Noble, 1991:198–124

Butor, Michel

French, 1926–

The objective of Michel Butor’s essays corresponds to the title Répertoire (5 vols., 1960–82), which refers to what is performed during a theater season (repertoire), as well as to the place of a discovery (repertory). Butor's essays are, in fact, the place of an intertextual discovery, not only because they offer a new interpretation of the canonic literary heritage, but also because they reveal the importance of literary and nonliterary traditions, including tales, popular novels, science fiction, travel sketches, and radio plays, all of which have been considered peripheral genres. His essays also explore the intertextual relationship between other artistic systems like music, painting, and literary discourse.

In the first two volumes of Répertoire, Butor expounds the program of the nouveau roman (new novel) in reviewing his own two novels, Passage de Milan (1954; Passage from Milan) and L'Emploi du temps (1956; Passing Time). It is not just explicit statements, but also the open structure of the essays that establish the character of the nouveau roman, a style of novel which Butor founded together with Nathalie Sarraute, Alain Robbe-Grillet, and Claude Simon. In accordance with the experimental conception of literature that emerged in France after World War II within the existentialist movement, Butor also rejects historical and biographical factors as determinants for the novel. His polyphonic writing prefigures the theory of intertextuality developed by Julia Kristeva and the group Tel Quel (As is), which conceives the subject of writing as the point of interconnection of other voices. The subject gets lost in the intricate net of memory and becomes incapable of dominating the outer world. As a result, the concept of author is abandoned. Not surprisingly, then, Butor emphasizes the temporality of the subject of writing. The decline of subject implies denying the mimetic power of narrative. Descriptions work independently from the observer, who is incapable of organizing them into a coherent representation of the world. Things thus appear "deanthropomorphized" and alien. Although descriptions are an invention of heterogeneous realms of the world, Butor nevertheless does not renounce reality. Literature becomes a phenomenological laboratory where the reflection of reality implies the self-reflection of writing. It is an intentional, metafictional (metadiscursive) elucidation of reality and at the same time a mystification of the narrator's ability to grasp it.

The heterogeneity of topics considered in the Répertoire volumes defines the status of literature itself, including all kinds of texts and re-creating the literary discourse as a dialogue between texts and media. In this way Butor transforms the concept of modern literature inherited from Baudelaire and Mallarmé. On the one hand, his essays intertwine narrative and essayistic discourses; on the other, his novels include metafictional considerations. With Répertoire, Butor dissolves the epistemological difference between fiction and nonfiction. Both are a global project theatricalizing the relationship between world and language. Butor's writings are a polyphonic network without center, whose purpose is the renovation of narrative through the destruction of the author as a subject dominating his own discourse. This implies refusing the mimetic status of narrative as well as the epistemological superiority of the narrator. Storytelling is a self-referential process ("mise en abîme") and a series of ruptures of the mimetic illusion. The narrator searches for past events through different stratifications of memory, temporality, and historicity, a labyrinthine confusion between the time of narration and the narrated time; this confusion effaces the narrator. In his commentary on his third novel (La Modification [1957; A Change of Heart]), Butor claims the necessity of an inner monologue in a sphere between the first and the third person beyond the dimension of human beings. Accordingly, in his novel Degrés (1960; Degrees), after the destruction of linearity and the integrity of the narrator, the latter becomes part of the narrated material, to whom a second narrator speaks in the second person.

In his Essais sur "Les Essais" (1968), a study on Montaigne and at the same time the definition of his own theory on essays, Butor underscores the reference to visual arts as the principle organizing the syntactic composition of the essays. As he points out, the architecture of Montaigne's essays corresponds to the composition of mannerist or baroque painting stressing grotesque heterogeneity. The centrifugal "montage" and the hybrid entourage around the central concern of the painting force the viewer to "travel" within the picture. This (cinematographic) "traveling" is the path toward building meaning as a result of the reading process. Butor illustrated this affinity between literature and visual arts (including film), which is a common concern of authors of the nouveau roman. The most important and original "invention" of Butor is the discovery of polyphony as a consequence of the death of the individual. Butor considers the individual an outdated historical narrative category from the 18th and 19th centuries, when individuals were established as heroes coping with the social world. Today, individuals must surrender themselves to the discursive network of the general memory of society.

VITTORIA BORSÒ

Biography

Michel Marie François Butor. Born 14 September 1926 in Mons-en-Barœul. Studied at the Collège Saint-François-de-Sales, Evreux, and Lycée Louis-le-Grand, Paris, 1936–44; the Sorbonne, Paris, 1945–49, licence in philosophy, 1946, diploma in philosophy, 1947. Taught at lycées in Sens, 1950, and El Minya, Egypt, 1950–51, University of Manchester, England, 1951–53, in Salonika, 1954–55, École Internationale, Geneva, 1956–57, Centre Universitaire, Vincennes, 1969, University of Nice, 1970–75, and the University of Geneva, from 1975; also visiting professor of French at several American universities and colleges, 1959–74. Advisory editor, Gallimard publishers, Paris, from 1958. Married Marie-Josèphe Mas, 1958: four daughters. Awards: Fénéon Prize, for novel, 1956; Renaudot Prize, for novel, 1957; Grand Prize for Literary Criticism, 1960. Chevalier, National Order of Merit.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Répertoire, 5 vols., 1960–82

Une histoire extraordinaire: Essai sur un rêve de Baudelaire, 1961; as Histoire

Extraordinaire: Essay on a Dream of Baudelaire's, translated anonymously, 1969

Mobile: Étude pour une représentation des États-Unis, 1962

Essais sur les modernes, 1964

Illustrations (includes poetry), 4 vols., 1964–76

Essais sur "Les Essais" (on Montaigne), 1968

Inventory: Essays (various translators), edited by Richard Howard, 1968

Essais sur le roman, 1969

Improvisations sur Flaubert, 1984

Improvisations sur Henri Michaux, 1985

Improvisations sur Rimbaud, 1989

Improvisations sur Michel Butor, l'écriture en transformation, 1993

Other writings: several novels (including Passage de Milan, 1954; L'Emploi du temps [Passing Time], 1956; La Modification [A Change of Heart], 1957; Degrés [Degrees], 1960), the opera Notre Faust (1962), five books about dreams, several collections of poetry, and works on art, culture, and many other topics.

Bibliography

Mason, Barbara, Michel Butor: A Checklist, London: Grant and Cutler, 1979

Further Reading

Godin, Georges, Michel Butor: Pédagogie, littérature, La Salle, Quebec: Hurtubise, 1987

Lancry, Yehuda, Michel Butor, ou, La Résistance, Paris: Lattès, 1994

Lydon, Mary, Perpetuum Mobile: A Study of the Novels and Aesthetics of Michel Butor, Edmonton: University of Alberta Press, 1980

Mason, Barbara, "Criticism and Invention in Michel Butor's Répertoire Series," New Zealand Journal of French Studies 1 (1986):23–43

Roudiez, Leon S., Michel Butor, New York: Columbia University Press, 1965

Spencer, Michael, Michel Butor, New York: Twayne, 1974

Waelti-Walters, Jennifer, Michel Butor, Victoria, British Columbia: Sono Nis, 1977

Waelti-Walters, Jennifer, "Œuvres et critique: Les Répertoires," Œuvres et critiques: Michel Butor 2 (1985):145–61

Waelti-Walters, Jennifer, Michel Butor (in French), Amsterdam and Atlanta: Rodopi, 1992

World Literature Today issue on Butor (Spring 1982)

This page intentionally left blank.

C

Cadalso, José

Spanish, 1741–1782

The texts of José Cadalso exemplify the ambiguity in style, mood, and tension experienced in the second half of 18th-century Spain. Under the pseudonym “Dalmiro,” Cadalso dedicated many verses to his Filis—was he the first Romantic writer in Spain? Was he one of the first politically charged writers of his time? Was he one of the first to demonstrate psychological development in his characters? All of these questions have concerned Cadalso’s critics throughout the years. This troubled figure of the Spanish Enlightenment is an example of rational aesthetics combined with romantic desperation. During his relatively short life, he wrote drama, poetry, short fiction, and essays. As with many of his contemporaries, the strict lines of genre division do not apply to his texts. Thus, his Cartas marruecas (wr. 1789, pub. 1793; Moroccan letters), a work of fiction by his admission, can be classified as an essay, and Los eruditos a la violeta (1772; The pseudo-intellectuals), an essay satirizing the intellectual climate of the country, can also be classified as fiction.

In his texts Cadalso is able to create tension through differing points of view—what today we would call different voices—through internal dialogue as well as dialogue with contemporary 18th-century characters. In Cartas marruecas, a work that follows the 18th-century utopian tradition, three voices mirror ideological positions in society. Nuño Nuñez, a true Christian beloved by his contemporaries, lives incarcerated within himself. His tone is humorous and accepting of a society that cannot be changed. Gazel, the optimistic young African diplomat, becomes more pessimistic as the text develops. Ben-Beley, an old wise man, provides a philosophical view of the circumstances. The three complement one another in the portrayal of a bitter satire that questions the ideological foundation of Bourbon Spain. Using three different voices, Cadalso presents the reader of this text, as well as of his other essays, with the dilemma faced by the virtuous man—“el hombre de bien”—who is confronted with social evils. This triangular debate highlights one of the most controversial 18th-century polemics: that juxtaposing stoicism and Christianity.

In the tradition of Seneca and Cicero, as well as the Spanish classics, Cadalso reflects on several themes in his essays, debating issues such as virtue, moderation, human misery, and truth. Throughout the Cartas, Cadalso aspires to an impartiality in keeping with the scientific spirit of the Enlightenment. In line with other 18th-century essayists, his texts reveal a concern for Spain's industrial progress, economic stability, educational system, social and political reform, and human welfare.

If in Cartas marruecas Cadalso presents the reader with philosophical debates in his satire, in Eruditos a la violeta his satire is more caustic toward the frivolity of appearances as opposed to well-educated "cultured" people. The stoic, ascetic criticism found in Cartas is replaced by a lighthearted, humorous parody of social conditions and daily customs. More in the tradition of Padre Isla's Fray Gerundio (1787), Cadalso presents a method for educating Spain's idle elite so that they will succeed within the superficiality of manners imposed by society.

When considering the context in which Cadalso lived and wrote, his essays become more cohesive. In all of his texts, whether philosophical, humorous, satirical, or political, Cadalso questions the ability of mortals to survive in a world governed by rational laws. The rules of the Enlightenment that permeated Spanish society in his time also presented a great opportunity for hypocrisy in a society concerned with appearances. Critics have pointed to the fragmentation exhibited by 18th-century essayists in facing, debating, and theorizing about issues of "heart" and "mind." In Spain, Cadalso's essays best exemplify this fragmentation and basic skepticism toward rationality while at the same time creating a world that rejects sentimentality.

Current Cadalso criticism has focused on the epistemology of madness (Paul Ilie, 1986), which can be seen in the fragmentation of discourse more than in thematic development. This more recent reading of the 18th-century essayist may provide more insights into the discursive fragmentation that mirrors philosophical and thematic issues in Bourbon Spain. The complexity of Cadalso's essays, in terms of both rhetoric and theme, indicates a talented observer of society. His constant struggle between optimism and pessimism, reason and emotion, reform and restoration serves to highlight his genius. Through his essays, the 20th-century reader may glimpse the complexity of Spain's French century and the psychological implications of reform and enlightenment. Cadalso's essays present us with one of the best examples of the beginning of modernity: the idea of moving toward a more positive future—the idea of progress.

CARMEN CHAVES TESSER

Biography

José Juan Antonio Ignacio Francisco de Borja de Cadalso. Born 8 October 1741 in Cádiz. Studied at Jesuit schools in Cádiz, Paris, 1750–54, and the Royal Seminary for Nobles, Madrid, 1758–60. Traveled in Europe, 1755–58 and 1760–62. Military career: enlisted for the Portuguese campaign, 1762; made knight of Santiago, 1766. Banished from Madrid under suspicion of writing Calendario manual, which was critical of Madrid customs, 1768, and lived in Aragón, 1768–70. Liaison with the actress María Ignacia Ibáñez (died, 1771). Attended tertulias (literary gatherings) at San Sebastián Inn, Madrid, 1772. Lived in Salamanca, 1773–74. Made colonel shortly before his death. Killed at the siege of Gibraltar, 26 February 1782.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Los eruditos a la violeta, 1772; edited by Nigel Glendinning, 1967, and José Luis Aguirre, 1967

Suplemento al Los eruditos a la violeta, 1772

El buen militar a la violeta, 1790

Cartas marruecas, 1793; edited by Juan Tamayo y Rubio, 1935 (revised 1953), Lucien Dupuis and Nigel Glendinning, 1966, José Sánchez Reboredo, 1978, Aurora Cruzado Díaz, 1984, Manuel Camarero, 1984, Francisco Alonso, 1985, Salvador Sole Camps and José Palomar Ros, 1986, Mariano Baquero Goyanes, 1988, José Miguel Caso González, 1989, Rogelio Reyes Cano, 1989, and Joaquín Arce, 1993

Other writings: the fiction Noches lúgubres (1792), plays, poetry, and autobiography. Collected works edition: Obras, 3 vols., 1818.

Further Reading

Barnette, Linda-Jane, "Male-Female Relationships in Cadalso's Prose: Distancing Techniques," in Selected Proceedings of the Thirty-Eighth Annual Mountain Interstate Foreign Language Conference, edited by Sixto E. Torres and Carl S. King, Clemson, South Carolina: Clemson University Press, 1991

Coloquio internacional sobre José Cadalso, Abano Terme, Italy: Piovan, 1985

Cuadernos Hispanoamericanos issue on Cadalso, 389 (1982)

Edwards, June K., Tres imágenes de José Cadalso: El crítico, el moralista, el creador, Seville: University of Seville, 1976

Glendinning, Nigel, Vida y obra de Cadalso, Madrid: Gredos, 1962

Goldman, Peter B., "What's in a Word? 'Class' and Its Evolution in the Eighteenth Century," Romance Quarterly 39, no. 1 (February 1992):7–16

Ilie, Paul, "Cadalso and the Epistemology of Madness," Dieciocho 9, nos. 1–2 (1986):174–87

Moreno Hernandez, Carlos, "Cadalso y Larra: El fracaso del hombre de bien," Cuadernos de Investigación Filológica 12–13 (May-December 1987):45–68

Sebold, Russell P., Colonel Don José Cadalso, New York: Twayne, 1971

Călinescu, George

Romanian, 1899–1965

The impressive variety of George Călinescu's essayistic output has a distinct place in 20th-century Romanian literature. The essay is protean, impressionistic, and artificial in the oeuvre of this most famous and controversial literary critic, also a noted novelist and a well-known playwright, poet, and translator. His essays elude classical definitions of the genre, but neither do they impose a new definition. These “impure” essays often extend over the borders into the literary review, the treatise, and the monograph. Often contradicting himself, Călinescu ranges from extreme congeniality and playfulness (e.g. “Domina bona” [1946], on I.L.Caragiale’s plays), to pedantic, outright misunderstanding (e.g. his interpretation of Ion Barbu’s “Mallarméan” poetry). Pedantry brands many of Călinescu’s essays during his later years (after Romania came within the zone of Soviet influence), when he shifted his attention to opportunistic issues, writing admiring essays on socialist-realist authors and using lukewarm satire against the weaknesses of the petty bourgeoisie. Throughout his career, however, Călinescu’s writing is always agile, exploiting the powers of aphorism and metaphor. If, at times, the attitude of the critic is unreasonable, the style is always recognizable, with passages of imposing beauty.

After translating into Romanian many Italian writers, as well as Horace, Laurence Sterne, and Hans Jacob Christoffel von Grimmelshausen, and having determined his priorities (“I never read a book: I translated it...When I judge, I create... I had to be a bad poet in order to become a just critic,” Ulysse, 1967), Călinescu set out to analyze the life and works of Mihai Eminescu, the “national poet” whose legacy was to become intertwined with Călinescu. The mythological aura of this last European Romantic touched Călinescu, who came to be called, in the Romania of the 1970s and 1980s, “the divine critic.”

Călinescu’s vocation was that of a builder (expressed especially in his 1953 novel Bietul Ioanide [Poor Ioanide]), who dreams of transforming the Balkanic city of Bucharest into a majestic metropolis with imposing monuments and vast plazas. The grandiose—Călinescu’s mode of choice—is advocated by his essays in ways unprecedented in Romanian culture. The inspiration from both the urban utopias of the Italian Renaissance and his own whim accounts for his fetish of the monumental. Some of Călinescu’s most influential essays follow in the same grandiose vein. His 1941 Istoria literaturii române de la origini pînă în prezent (History of Romanian Literature) is conceived as collection of historical essays on authors and periods written with verve, little objectivity, and in the highly personal style characteristic of Călinescu’s criticism. The monumental History (over 1000 pages in folio) concludes with a powerful and controversial mise en abîme of the entire history of Romanian literature, an essay entitled “Specificul național” (“The National Specificity”), in which Călinescu articulates a geo-national and racial theory of his personal reading of this history.

A sense of classicism pervades much of Călinescu’s late output. Impresii asupra literaturii spaniole (1946; On Spanish literature: impressions), a collection of essays on Spanish and comparative literature, begins with his influential “Clasicism, romantism, baroc” (Classicism, Romanticism, Baroque), in which the essayist analyzes the opposition between classicism and Romanticism viewed as ideal types: the classical is healthy and well balanced, while the Romantic is abnormal, exceptional, unbalanced, and “sick.”

Călinescu finds that friendship, proper to French neoclassicism and to such 19th-century Romanian writers as Vasile Alecsandri, Mihail Kogălniceanu, Costache Negruzzi, Ion Ghica, Titu Maiorescu, and Ioan Slavici, fades rapidly in the first decades of the 20th century (Ulysse). The classical mind is indifferent to events, rather than being absorbed by them. According to Călinescu, modern Romanian culture presents a monochromatic interest in the event, which is sanctioned as the non-negotiable truth of the past and dealt with in the form of the novel. The typically novelistic character is driven by primary instincts, accompanied by a twisted consciousness and complex overinterpretive techniques. The classical is to be seen in the abolition of the genius, reduction of the biographical, of the inner diary. Accompanying his taste for nationally oriented traditionalism is Călinescu's view on the the classicism of the Volk (people), whose imposing anonymity and objectivity destroy personal invention and discard claims to creative subjectivity.

Any great writer is, ultimately, a classic, a dispassionate “peripathetician” in dialogue with his friends. The classic writer attains universality, gives apothegmatic, “architectural” formulations, and “builds solid bodies.” Călinescu's selfassured attack on the French aphoristic writings of the exiled Romanian writer E.M.Cioran, at the time a persona non grata in Romania, depends heavily on metaphor to demonstrate “the banality of Cioran's aphorisms” in a heavy-handed dismissal of the “failed architectonic function of Cioran's aphorisms.”

Călinescu's fidgety essayistic production reveals an author unable to abstain from writing or tame his desire for glory. It is hard to find a week, between 1930 and his death 35 years later, in which Călinescu's name did not appear in print. His ridiculing satires against the Orthodox poets obsessed with the angels of the late 1920s and 1930s, and his dislike of quiet understatement, made him into a champion of the overblown. In a crucial reversal of the Montaignean legacy of the genre, Călinescu's essays resist both radical self-questioning and the appetite for silence.

CĂLIN-ANDREI MIHĂILESCU

Biography

Born 19 June 1899 in Bucharest. Studied philosophy at the University of Bucharest, from 1918; University of Jassy, Ph.D., 1936. Taught at the Romanian School, Rome, 1923–16, and French and Italian in Bucharest, 1926–35. Contributor to various journals, from 1926; coeditor, Viața Românească (Romanian life), 1927–36. Married Alice Vera Trifu, 1929. Member of the Faculty of Letters, University of Jassy, 1937–45. Founder, Jurnalul Literar (Literary journal), 1939. Chair of Romanian literature, University of Bucharest, from 1945. Editor, Lumea (The world), 1945–46, and Națiunea (The nation), 1946–49. Elected to the Romanian Academy, 1948. Director, Institute of the History of Literature and Folklore, from 1948. Awards: Romanian National Prize, 1964. Died in Bucharest, 12 March 1965.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Opera lui Mihaai Eminescu, 5 vols., 1934–36

Principii de estetică, 1939; edited by Alexandru Piru, 1974

Istoria literaturii române de la origini pînă în prezent, 1941; revised edition, edited by

- Alexandru Piru, 1982; as History of Romanian Literature, translated by Leon Levitchi, 1989
- Impresii asupra literaturii spaniole*, 1946; part in Studies in Poetics, translated by Andrei Bantaș and Anda Teodorescu, 1972
- Studii și conferințe Horățiu, Tasso, Cervantes, Tolstoi, Cehov*, 1956
- Cronicile optimistului, Cu un cuvânt înainte al autorului*, 1964
- Studii și cercetări de istorie literară*, 1966
- Studii și comunicări*, edited by Alexandru Piru, 1966 Ulysse, 1967
- Scriitori străini*, edited by Vasile Nicolescu and Adrian Marino, 1967
- Scrieri despre artă*, edited by George Muntean, 2 vols., 1968
- Universul poeziei*, edited by Alexandru Piru, 1971; part in Studies in Poetics, translated by Andrei Bantaș and Anda Teodorescu, 1972
- Texte social-politice, 1944–1965*, edited by Gheorghe Tuțui and Gheorghe Matei, 1971
- Literatura nouă*, edited by Alexandru Piru, 1972
- Gâlceava înțeleptului cu lumea: Pseudojurnal de moralist*, edited by G.Șerban, 2 vols., 1973–74
- Mihai Eminescu: Studii și articole*, edited by Maria and Constantin Teodorovici, 1978
- Aforisme și reflecții*, edited by I.Pîrvănescu and Al.Stănciulescu-Birda, 1984
- Însemnări și polemice* (selected essays), edited by Andrei Rusu, 1988
- Cronici literare și recenzii*, edited by Andrei Rusu, 1991
- Other writings: four novels (Cartea nunții, 1933; Enigma Otiliei, 1938; Bietul Ioanide, 1953; Scrinul negru, 1960), plays (Teatru, 1956), poetry, and works on Romanian literature and writers (including a biography of Mihai Eminescu, 1932). Also translated many writers from the Italian.
- Collected works edition: Opere, 14 vols., 1965–83 (in progress).

Bibliography

- Bălu, Ion, G.Călinescu, 1899–1965: Biobibliografie, Bucharest: Editura Științifică și Enciclopedică, 1975

Further Reading

- Bălu, Ion, G.Călinescu: Eseu despre etapele creației, Bucharest: Cartea Românească, 1981
- Călin, Vera, “Romanian Contributions to the European AvantGarde,” Cross-Currents 4 (1985):337–50
- Livadă, Melania, G.Călinescu, poet și teoretician al poeziei, Bucharest: Cartea Românească, 1982
- Martin, Mircea, G.Călinescu și “complexele” literaturii române, Bucharest: Albatros, 1981
- Micu, Dumitru, G.Călinescu: Între Apollo și Dionysos, Bucharest: Minerva, 1979
- Negoitescu, Ion, Istoria literaturii române, Bucharest: Minerva, 1991:184–88
- Nițescu, Marin, “G. Călinescu,” in his Sub zodia proletcultismului: Dialectic puterii, Bucharest: Humanitas, 1995:188–208

Calvino, Italo

Italian, 1923–1985

“I will begin by saying that I was born under the sign of Libra,” notes Italo Calvino in the brief autobiography offered in the guise of an appendix to Una pietra sopra: Discorsi di letteratura e società (1980; The Uses of Literature). The astrological detail may seem innocuous, but it is perhaps revealing of the ambivalence running through the Italian writer’s work. Calvino does, in fact, use humor to express his concern over what the modern world is becoming, and the place that man may yet take in it. Bearing at one and the same time the imprint of realism and the fantastic, his fiction writing—novels and extended short stories—has shown him to be one of the most original authors of postwar Italian literature. But it is also through his work as an editor, journalist, and essayist that Calvino has commanded attention as one of the outstanding figures of the cultural life of his country.

At the close of World War II, during which he had joined the Resistance, Calvino made his debut as a writer and journalist in the columns of Politecnico, a Marxist-inspired weekly. The experience did not last long, but from it Calvino acquired the certainty that “only a critical attention to everyday reality could underwrite the validity of his [literary and intellectual] commitment” (Germana Pescio Bottino, 1967). More prosaically, the Politecnico venture introduced Calvino to Elio Vittorini—at that time editor of the magazine—who, along with Cesar Pavese, noticed his first novel, Il sentiero dei nido di ragno (1947; The Path to the Nest of Spiders), and introduced him to Einaudi, the Turin publishing house where Calvino was to work for many years. It was with Vittorini, too, that he was subsequently to start Il Menabò di Letteratura (1959–67), a militant cultural magazine which was to introduce many young writers. Calvino himself published a variety of essays in it, most memorably “Il mare dell’oggettività” (1960; “The Sea of Objectivity”), in which he denounced the belief in objectivity which spared the intellectual the need to subject real events to his critical judgment, and “La sfida al labirinto” (1962; “The Challenge to the Labyrinth”), in which he examined the consequences of industrial development on the human condition and contemporary culture.

In the post-1956 period, marked by the events in Hungary which were to cause him to leave the Italian Communist Party, Calvino devoted himself more to his work as an editor than to his literary work. But the novels of this period are also clearly influenced by the uncertainty of the times. The trilogy I nostri antenati (Our Ancestors)—Il visconte dimezzato (1952; The Cloven Viscount), Il barone rampante (1957; The Baron in the Trees), and Il cavaliere inesistente (1959; The Non-Existent Knight)—which was to win Calvino a permanent place in the history of Italian literature, stands out from the ambient neorealistic vein to give precedence to fantasy which came close to fairytale, and which had already been glimpsed in his first novel. Behind the fantastic digressions, the irreverent tone, and the linguistic inventions characterizing these three improbable stories can be seen all of Calvino's questioning about the precise relationship between the individual conscience and the course of history. Exactly like his Baron (who lives in the trees in order to withdraw from the world, but does so without misanthropy, concerned first and foremost with his neighbor), Calvino was never to stop his anxious reflections on the gradual progress of a dehumanized world. Although, over the course of the years, the fantastic assumed an increasingly important place in his literary work, his factual writing and approach, influenced particularly by the group OULIPO (Ouvroir de Littérature Potentielle [Workroom of potential literature]), was often to come close to sheer virtuosity.

At the same time, various texts and essays he published (collected in 1980 under the title Una pietra sopra) were concerned with the execution of literature, the way a literary text works, the combinative processes which give it shape, and the levels of reality it presupposes. Calvino subsequently put his ideas to the test in a series of lectures (collected in 1991 under the title Perché leggere i classici [Why read the classics]) ranging from the Odyssey to Pavese, taking in Ariosto and Voltaire on the way. Another collection of essays and nonliterary texts appeared in 1984 under the title Collezione di sabbia (Collection of sand). In the first section of the collection, Calvino brings together a series of articles written for the newspapers he worked on (among them Il Corriere della Sera [The evening courier], La Repubblica, L'Espresso, and Le Monde [The world]). These articles, devoted to the most unusual subjects, enabled him to comment on the world via an exploration of various unexpected objects. A second section was devoted to the visible, and the very act of seeing, including vision born from the imagination. The last part of the book is dedicated to various incidental reflections during three journeys (to Japan, Mexico, and Iran), which raise questions about other dimensions of the mind.

Six Memos for the Next Millennium (1988) brings together in one place five lectures (he had not yet written the sixth when he died), which Calvino was to have given at Harvard University. Working around five themes which he anchored within a literary discussion—lightness, quickness, exactitude, visibility, and multiplicity—Calvino attempted to draw up a memorandum for the forthcoming millennium, so that the aging world, with the weight of its problems and anxieties, should not find itself unprepared to face the future. In this posthumous book, we once again find the literary and existentialist questionings which guided Calvino throughout his work.

CHRISTINE MASUY

Biography

Born 15 October 1923 in Santiago de las Vegas, Cuba; moved to San Remo, Italy, 1925. Studied at the University of Turin, 1941–47; Royal University, Florence, 1943. Drafted into the Young Fascists, 1940, but left and sought refuge in the Alps, and joined the Communist Resistance, 1943–45. Wrote for various periodicals throughout his life, including L'Unità (Unity), La Nostra Lotta (Our struggle), Il Garibaldino, Voce della Democrazia (Voice of democracy), Contemporaneo, Città Aperta (Open city), and La Repubblica, from 1945. Staff member, Einaudi publishers, Turin, 1948–84. Coeditor, with Elio Vittorini, Il Menabò di Letteratura, 1959–67. Traveled to the Soviet Union, 1952, and the United States, 1959–60. Married Esther Judith Singer, 1964: one daughter. Moved to Paris, 1967, and to Rome, 1979. Member of the editorial board, Garzanti publishers, 1984. Awards: several, including L'Unità Prize, 1945; Viareggio Prize, 1957; Bagutta Prize, 1959; Veillon Prize, 1963; Feltrinelli Prize, 1972. Honorary Member, American Academy, 1975. Died (of a cerebral hemorrhage) in Siena, 19 September 1985.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Una pietra sopra: Discorsi di letteratura e società, 1980; part as The Uses of Literature, 1986, and as The Literature Machine, 1987, translated by Patrick Creagh

Collezione di sabbia, 1984

Six Memos for the Next Millennium (texts for Charles Eliot Norton lectures), translated by Patrick Creagh, 1988; as Lezioni americane: Sei proposte per il prossimo millennio, 1988

Perché leggere i classici, 1991

Other writings: several novels (including Il sentiero dei nido di ragno [The Path to the Nest of Spiders], 1947; I nostri antenati [Our Ancestors] trilogy, 1952–59; Le città invisibili [Invisible Cities], 1972; Il castello dei destini incrociati [The Castle of Crossed Destinies], 1973; se una notte d'inverno un viaggiatore [If on a Winter's Night a Traveller], 1979; Palomar, 1983), short stories, and three libretti.

Further Reading

Baroni, Giorgio, Italo Calvino: Introduzione e guida allo studio dell'opera Calviniana, storia e antologia della critica, Florence: Le Monnier, 1988

Bertoni, Roberto, Int'abrigo int'ubagu: Discorsi su alcuni aspetti dell'opera di Italo Calvino, Turin: Tirrenia, 1993

Bonura, Giuseppe, Invito alla lettura di Italo Calvino, Milan: Mursia, 1972

Bresciani Califano, Mimma, Uno spazio senza miti: Scienza e letteratura: Quattro saggi su Italo Calvino, Florence: Le Lettere, 1993

Calligaris, Contardo, Italo Calvino, Milan: Mursia, 1973

Cannon, JoAnn, Italo Calvino: Writer and Critic, Ravenna: Longo, 1981

Carter, Albert Howard, Italo Calvino: Metamorphoses of Fantasy, Ann Arbor, Michigan: UMI Research Press, 1987

Ferretti, Gian Carlo, Le capre di Bikini: Calvino giornalista e saggista, 1945–1985, Rome: Riuniti, 1989

Gabriele, Tommasina, Italo Calvino: Eros and Language, Rutherford, New Jersey:

Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, and London: Associated University Press, 1994

Hume, Kathryn, Calvino's Fictions: Cogito and Cosraos, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1992

Milanini, Claudio, L'utopia discontinua: Saggio su Italo Calvino, Milan: Garzanti, 1990

Pescio Bottino, Germana, Calvino, Florence: Nuova Italia, 1967

Puletti, Ruggero, Un millenarismo improbabile: Le "Lezioni americane" di Italo Calvino, Rome: Lucarini, 1991

Ricci, Franco, editor, Calvino Revisited, Ottawa: Dovehouse Press, 1989

Camus, Albert

French, 1913–1960

In his monumental biography of Albert Camus, Olivier Todd (1996) makes the point that Camus and George Orwell had much in common; the one big difference, however, was that Orwell's essays were much better than his novels, whereas with Camus it was the other way around: he was a greater novelist than essayist. And yet—like Orwell's fiction—Camus' essays contain some of his finest prose, and have been enormously influential. Like Orwell, too, Camus was remarkably consistent throughout his relatively short life as a writer. His art develops with astonishing internal coherence; there are no abrupt changes of direction.

In 1937, shortly after Camus had at the age of 24 completed his university studies in philosophy with a diploma essay on Plotinus and St. Augustine, his first collection of essays, L'Envers et l'endroit (The wrong side and the right side), was published in Algiers. This short book, some 50 pages long, consists of five essays; unlike Le Mythe de Sisyphe (The Myth of Sisyphus) and L'Homme révolté (The Rebel) it presents no sustained argument, but offers instead a blend of lyrical reflection with self-portrayal, even self-scrutiny, that will come to be seen as characteristically Camusian. Sometimes, when relating his 1936 visit to Prague, for instance, he speaks in the first person, but at other times, for example when speaking of more intimate family matters, he uses the third person: "There were five of them living in the flat: the grandmother, her younger son, her elder daughter and the latter's two sons." The stark poverty of Camus' childhood as described here is contrasted with the superabundant generosity of nature in a country where the sun and the sea cost nothing and are freely available to all. This play of opposites is a constant theme of the collection and helps explain its title. The day of the grandmother's funeral, for instance, is a fine, cold, clear winter's day: "...from the cemetery high above the town the bright transparent sun could be seen shining on the sea which was quivering with light like a moist lip." One person's existence may have come to an end, but life in all its glory flaunts its sensuous splendors unabashed.

This theme recurs in Noces (1939; Nuptials), a collection of four essays published in Algiers two years later. They describe different places in North Africa and Italy, and the title is taken from a passage of characteristically sensual lyricism which concludes the third essay, "L'Été à Alger" (Summer in Algiers): "In the evening or after rain the whole earth, her belly moistened with a seed that gives off an odor of bitter almonds, takes her rest after giving herself all summer to the sun. And so once again this smell hallows the nuptials between man and the earth, and fills our hearts with the only truly virile love available in this world: a love that is generous but cannot last." In tune with the note sounded here—of impermanence and perishability experienced in the midst of the most intense manifestations of ecstasy and joy—Camus' two youthful collections foreshadow the major essays to come, particularly in a revealing remark in Noces, which has rightly been called Camus' manual of happiness, to the effect that whatever exalts life increases its absurdity at the same time.

The absurd is, famously, the theme of Camus' greatest essay, The Myth of Sisyphus (1942). In what Olivier Todd aptly describes as "a philosophical prose poem," Camus explores the implications of the fact that humanity has to learn to live with a historically unprecedented situation, namely a world in which God does not exist. Camus' atheism is no modish affectation, but absolutely fundamental to his thinking; such efforts as are occasionally made to portray him as a kind of covert Christian are doomed to failure, because the texts will simply not bear out such a reading. On the contrary: Camus takes the nonexistence of God for granted, as something needing neither detailed demonstration nor further explanation. If there is no God—if in other words there is no permanent, transcendent being governing the universe—then there can be no such thing as life after death. Indeed, positing the existence of a soul which goes on functioning after our earthly body wears out makes sense only in a universe where a God of sorts presides over some kind of empyrean to which the soul is dispatched pending (according to which faith is involved) reincarnation or resurrection. But if there is no life after death, if death is indeed final, it is death's very finality that raises questions which Camus tackles head-on in The Myth of Sisyphus. He goes straight to the point in the essay's famous opening sentences: "There is only one really serious philosophical question, and that is suicide. Deciding whether or not life is worth living is to answer the fundamental question in philosophy. All other questions follow from that." Humankind finds the finality of death hard to take: hence the existence of religions which claim to abolish it. Once human beings face up to the fact of their mortality they experience the absurd, which is the feeling that since death is the end of everything so far as the individual is concerned, nothing makes sense any more; and if life is not worth living, it is only reasonable to commit suicide.

Camus wrote The Myth of Sisyphus to rebut this argument. He fully accepts the fact of the absurd, but not the conclusions drawn from it. Humankind, he says, can (indeed must) renounce all hope of immortality and accept the transitoriness of life, but it should never assume that this denies the possibility of finding happiness and a sense of purpose in the here-and-now. Suicide is, in fact, a totally unwarranted act of irrational despair; there are instead, he argues, three valid, rational, nonreligious ways of responding to the absurd. The first is to acknowledge that the acceptance of the absurd sets a person free: free to act and function as a genuinely independent being, no longer trammled by the givens of an illusory transcendent reality. The second is passion, the enthusiasm to make the utmost of the present moment; or as the epigraph, taken from Pindar, eloquently puts it: "Aspire not, oh my soul, to immortal life, but exhaust the realm of the possible."

The last is revolt, the refusal to be cowed by the absurd: such an act of rebellion gives value and dignity to life, and is epitomized by the figure at the center of this philosophical meditation, the Greek hero Sisyphus. For daring to flout the wishes of the gods, Sisyphus, according to legend, was condemned through all eternity to push a boulder to the top of a hill and watch helplessly as it rolled down again. But the most unpleasant truths lose their power of discouragement once we recognize and accept them. That explains why, in the magnificently defiant words on which this essay closes, "the struggle toward the summit is itself enough to fill a man's heart: Sisyphus should be seen as someone who has found happiness."

Camus' next, much longer essay, The Rebel (1951), develops the idea of revolt as humanity's only recourse in a world without religious faith, and further defines this kind of metaphysical rebellion as "the urge that impels individuals to defend a dignity common to all humankind." This time Camus misjudges the nature and scope of the essay as a genre; The Rebel lacks the punch of The Myth of Sisyphus, being too ambitious and too liable to get bogged down in historical and political detail to function effectively as an essay. Whereas in the earlier work the end convincingly answers the question raised at the beginning, in the course of The Rebel the definition of the central concept—revolt—shifts unnervingly from a philosophical to a political one. The essay is therefore unsatisfying, even broken-backed. It reads more like the doctoral dissertation Camus (because of ill health) was never allowed to submit than an essay in the usual sense of the term.

His last work in this genre was L'Été (1954; Summer), a collection of eight lyrical essays written between 1939, the year of Noces, and 1951, the year of The Rebel. It therefore harks back to an earlier and better form of the essay as practiced by Camus and to what as a writer of lyrical prose he was best at—celebrating the harsh light and untamed beauty of his native land:

There is an Italian softness about Algiers. The cruel brilliance of Oran has something Spanish about it. Perched on a rock above the Rummel gorges, Constantine reminds one of Toledo. But Spain and Italy are steeped in history, whereas the [three Algerian] towns I'm speaking of have no past at all. During the tedium of the siesta, sadness is both implacable and free from melancholy, while joy lacks softness in the morning light or in the natural luxury of our nights.

JOHN FLETCHER

Biography

Born 7 November 1913 in Mondovi, Algeria. Studied at the Grand Lycée, Algiers, 1924–32, baccalauréat; University of Algiers, 1933–36, licence in philosophy and graduate studies diploma, 1936. Contracted tuberculosis, 1930, with recurrences, 1942–43, and 1949–50. Married Simone Hié, 1934 (divorced, 1940). Held various jobs in Algiers, 1935–39; member of the Communist Party, 1935–39; worked for the Alger-Républicain (Algiers republican; later the Soir-Républicain [Evening republican]), 1938–40, Algiers, and Paris-Soir (Paris-evening), 1940. Married Francine Faure, 1940: twin son and daughter. Taught in Oran, Algeria, 1942.; reader and editor of Espoir series, Gallimard publishers, Paris, from 1943; journalist, Paris, 1943–45; cofounding editor, Combat, 1944–47; journalist for L'Express, 1955–56. Awards: Critics Prize (France), 1947; Nobel Prize for Literature, 1957. Died (in a car accident) at Villeblevin, near Montereau, 4 January 1960.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

L'Envers et l'endroit, 1937

Noces, 1939

Le Mythe de Sisyphe, 1942; as The Myth of Sisyphus and Other Essays, translated by Justin O'Brien, 1955

Actuelles 1–3: Chroniques, 1944–1948, Chroniques, 1948–1953, and Chroniques algériennes, 1939–1958, 3 vols., 1950–58

L'Homme révolté, 1951; as The Rebel: An Essay on Man in Revolt, translated by Anthony Bower, 1953

L'Été, 1954

Resistance, Rebellion, and Death (selection), translated by Justin O'Brien, 1961

Essais (Pléiade Edition), edited by Roger Quilliot and Louis Faucon, 1965

Lyrical and Critical (selection), edited by Philip Thody, translated by Ellen Conroy Kennedy, 1967; as Lyrical and Critical Essays, 1968

Selected Essays and Notebooks, edited and translated by Philip Thody, 1970

Other writings: five novels (L'Étranger [The Stranger], 1942; La Peste [The Plague], 1947; La Chute [The Fall], 1956; La Mort heureuse [A Happy Death], 1971; Le Premier Homme [The First Man] (incomplete), 1994), short stories, several plays, and notebooks.

Collected works edition: Œuvres complètes, edited by Roger Grenier, 9 vols., 1983.

Bibliographies

Crepin, Simone, "Albert Camus: Essai de bibliographie," Bibliographia Belgica 55 (1960)

Roeming, Robert F., Albert Camus: A Bibliography, Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1968

Further Reading

Brée, Germaine, Camus, New Brunswick, New Jersey: Rutgers University Press, revised edition, 1961

Cruikshank, John, Albert Camus and the Literature of Revolt, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1959; New York: Oxford University Press, 1960

Grenier, Roger, Albert Camus, soleil et ombre: Une Biographie intellectuelle, Paris: Gallimard, 1987

Lottman, Herbert R., Albert Camus, Garden City, New York: Doubleday, and London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1979

McCarthy, Patrick, Camus: A Critical Study of His Life and Work, London: Hamilton, 1981

Rhein, Phillip H., Albert Camus, Boston: Twayne, revised edition, 1989

Thody, Philip, Albert Camus: A Study of His Work, London: Hamilton, 1957

Thody, Philip, Albert Camus, 1913–1960: A Biographical Study, London: Hamilton, 1961

Todd, Olivier, Albert Camus: Une Vie, Paris: Gallimard, 1996

Canadian Essay (English)

The great majority of English Canadian essayists of literary quality have preferred the informal, personal approach of the familiar essay, and a discussion of the essay in Canada is therefore essentially a discussion of the familiar essay. The familiar essay became a serious literary art form in Canada only around the turn of the present century. There were of course a great many essays published in Canadian periodicals during the 1800s, and a even few undistinguished collections, but these early essays were written by individuals for whom writing, let alone writing essays, was very much a sideline. Making a living by writing alone was out of the question in 19th-century Canada, and those few who managed to derive significant supplementary income from their pens found themselves better served by other forms than the essay. This general lack of commitment to the genre inhibited its development and often had a detrimental effect on individual essays.

Albeit more distinguished than those of his contemporaries who dabbled with the essay, the career of Joseph Howe (1804–73), who is commonly credited with being the first Canadian essayist of note, serves well to represent the diversity of interests typical of essay writers of his day. In addition to editing and managing newspapers, Howe was a politician and a locally celebrated orator. He served both as premier of Nova Scotia and, after Confederation, briefly as lieutenantgovernor. What Howe wrote served practical concerns—promoting his political views and career, encouraging cultural improvement in his province, and, not least, selling newspapers. While the purposes for which other writers adapted the essay varied considerably, all had to be mindful of the demands of life in what amounted to a frontier, encouraging a focus on practical, immediate concerns; rarely, then, were their ambitions purely literary. Howe’s flexible understanding of the genre is also typical. If his style often seems heavily rhetorical by comparison with that of British and American essayists of the same period, this is to some extent a result of his practice of recycling his speeches as essays. Though less rhetorically pretentious and generally more interesting than his essays, the anecdotes and observations that Howe published in his newspaper the Novascotian as “Rambles” are less essays than travel sketches.

The success of Howe’s sketches suggests a characteristic of popular taste in his time. Particularly in 19th-century Canada, the popularity of sketches both limited and influenced the development of the familiar essay, leading writers away from abstract reflection toward detailed recording of local color. Tending more toward narration and description than most essays, the sketch proved more attractive than conventional essays in a new land in which most readers were inclined to accept the authority of writers in established cultural centers where general ideas were concerned, and in which the diversity and novelty of experience invested observations on local life and the local setting with special interest. As was the case with Howe's rambles, there was often a good deal of overlap between familiar essays and sketches, and an extended discussion of the essay in Canada might well consider the elements of the essay present in (to suggest only a few of the most notable) the autobiographical sketches of Susanna Moodie (1803–85) and Catharine Parr Traill (1802–99), and Anna Jameson's (1794–1860) Winter Studies and Summer Rambles in Canada (1838). In this century, the sketch has often been blended with the essay for humorous purposes, notably by Stephen Leacock, Robertson Davies in many of his Samuel Marchbanks columns, and in personal recollections, such as those of Emily Carr (1871–1945), most notably in Klee Wyck (1941), Ernest Buckler (1908–84) in Ox Bells and Fireflies (1968), and Kildare Dobbs (1923–) in Running to Paradise (1962).

Individual essayists being unremarkable, a useful source of insight into 19th-century Canadian essays is provided by the periodicals for which they were written. While dozens of periodicals willing to publish original Canadian essays followed the first, the Nova-Scotia Magazine (1789–92), most were short-lived, tenuous operations capable of paying little if anything for the material they published. Particularly in the first half of the century, most relied heavily on reprinted material from British and American publications, where the interest of most readers was still focused, and even as locally written material gradually became more common, it consisted more of journalistic reporting, political commentary and polemics, sketches, tales, and poetry, depending on the focus of individual periodicals, than of familiar essays. Colonial Canada lacked anything like the large, intellectually sophisticated audience that encouraged the British familiar essay tradition, and the scattering of the population further limited the potential circulation of early periodicals.

Notwithstanding the obstacles facing them as business ventures, newspapers and periodicals kept springing up, and, in reaching the political and social leaders of the time, they exerted more influence than their numerical readership or the brevity of their individual periods of publication would suggest. Interestingly, more periodicals mainly concerned with literature were initiated between 1820 and 1840 than between 1840 and 1860. The reason was less a decreasing interest in literature than an increase in political excitement. Toward the middle of the century political debates, particularly those related to Confederation, were beginning to overshadow belleslettres in periodicals, and the topicality of most mid-century essays gives them more historical than literary interest. Among the more literary periodicals, Montreal's Literary Garland (1838–51) stands out as a singular success story. The Garland was distinguished by its comparatively long survival and its willingness to encourage local writers to the almost unheard-of extent of paying them for their contributions. Patterned on the successful Godey's Lady's Book in the United States, the Garland assumed as its primary mission the improvement of literary culture. The essay played a relatively small part in this scheme, however, and while the Garland did publish essays on cultural and literary subjects, those on literature were generally no more than reviews, mainly of foreign fiction. Locally written fiction, sometimes long enough to run in serial form, and sketches were far more common than familiar essays.

Following Confederation in 1867, increasing readership and a growing understanding that nationhood depended on cultural as well as political maturity encouraged the founding of several periodicals intended to promote Canadian writing. Although the Canadian Monthly and National Review (1872–78) (which became Rose-Belford's Canadian Monthly and National Review [1878–82]), deserves honorable mention, the best and most influential of the post-Confederation periodicals was the Week (1883–96). Both were published in Toronto, a reflection of a general movement of the publishing industry to the center where it remains focused today. In addition to publishing most of the good young poets of the time, the Week published essays by many of the most interesting Canadian thinkers. Few of these could be thought of as being primarily essayists, however. Sir Charles G.D. Roberts (1860–1943), the Week's first editor, became much better known later for his poetry and animal stories, as did Sara Jeannette Duncan (1861–1922) for her fiction and travel writing. More of an essayist was Goldwin Smith (1823–1910), one of the founders of the magazine, who stated his opinions on a wide range of social issues. Less topical and combative in his stance than Smith was his associate Theodore Arnold Haultain (1857–1941), who later moved on from his social and cultural comment in the Week to write pieces concerned with humans' relationship with nature in Two Country Walks in Canada (1903) and other collections. Of recurrent contributors to the Week, the one most consciously writing in the familiar essay tradition was Archibald MacMechan (1862–1933).

MacMechan is one of three writers, the others being Andrew Macphail and Bliss Carman, whose collections of often estimable essays, published in the first decade of this century, signal the maturing of the essay in Canada as literature. Writing with a confident sense that he was well suited to his assumed purpose of improving society, MacMechan's thinking was guided by Christian ethics, Victorian morality, and a response to the natural world influenced by Romanticism. In addition to literary criticism, including Headwaters of Canadian Literature (1924), verse, and various books concerned with the history and geography of his adopted province, Nova Scotia, MacMechan collected many of his best familiar essays in The Porter of Bagdad and Other Fantasies (1901) and The Life of a Little Colledge (1914).

A medical doctor and eventually a professor of the history of medicine at McGill University, Andrew Macphail (1864–1938) took writing as seriously as he did his profession. After editing medical journals and trying his hand at fiction and drama, he took on the editorship of McGill's University Magazine (1907–20) (formerly McGill University Magazine [1901–06]), during its final 13 years of publication. Many of his collected essays were first published here. Essays in Puritanism (1905), perhaps the best of Macphail's collections, works from biography to celebrate his conception of puritan ideals of independent moral thinking and his belief in social progress based on puritan self-reliance. Essays in Politics (1909) and Essays in Fallacy (1910) demonstrate Macphail's ability to write with authority on a wide range of subjects.

Better known for his poetry, Bliss Carman (1861–1929) was also a prolific writer of essays. Carman contributed essays to a wide range of periodicals, mainly American, throughout the 1890s and brought out his first collection, The Kinship of Nature, in 1903. The Friendship of Art (1904), The Poetry of Life (1905), The Making of Personality (1908), and Talks on Poetry and Life (1926) tend to be similar in their strengths and weaknesses. Carman was too fond of making vaguely Emersonian pronouncements and overly zealous in his advocacy of a variety of self-development activities, but he could also express complex ideas clearly and forcefully, and his prose, like his poetry, benefited from his creative imagery and sensitivity to the rhythms of language.

Although their collections appeared in the 20th century, these three writers tended to echo 19th-century values and ideas. Other Canadian essayists writing only slightly later were much less influenced by the Victorian past. The primary factor contributing to this change in perspective was the growth of journalism—in ever larger daily newspapers and in magazines reaching a much wider audience than was the case with even the most successful 19th-century periodicals. The audience for these publications was growing not only in size; it was also becoming less genteel and more down-to-earth in its interests. A second important factor leading Canadian essayists away from Victorian gentility and Romantic ideas of nature was the inadequacy of the Romantic-Victorian perspective to accommodate genuine responses to Canadian nature and the realities of rural Canadian living. It is significant that these were the focal subjects of several of Canada's more modern essayists early in the century.

Though born in the same year as Bliss Carman, William Hume Blake (1861–1924) took a much more prosaic approach to Canadian nature. A lawyer by profession, Blake was also an avid outdoorsman whose essays express his sensible appreciation of nature and rural life, particularly as he found it in his fishing trips in the Quebec woods, and the satisfactions of outdoor recreation. Blake's essays are collected in Brown Waters and Other Sketches (1915) and In a Fishing Country (1922). Like Blake, Peter McArthur (1866–1924) took a realistic approach to his primary subject—humans' relationship with nature. McArthur's nature, however, was that of farm life rather than the wilderness, and his approach was often humorous. After working for two decades as a journalist, mainly in New York, McArthur retired in 1909 to his family farm in the village of Ekfrid, Ontario, from which he wrote a popular column on rural life for the Toronto Globe (1909–24) and contributed regularly to the Farmer's Advocate. His columns were revised for In Pastures Green (1915), The Red Cow and Her Friends (1919), The Affable Stranger (1920), and various posthumously published collections. Although McArthur also had a good deal to say about political and economic subjects, his primary strengths were his ability to convey the satisfactions of farming and his own deep appreciation of the vitality of nature. McArthur retained the journalist's habit of writing quickly and tended to be careless about structure and style, but his prose is readable and appropriate for his chosen role of farmer-philosopher.

Rural living has provided the subject matter and the inspiration for a number of minor Canadian essayists who to some extent resemble McArthur in approach. Showing most clearly the influence of McArthur's writing, Kenneth McNeill Wells (1905–) concentrated on the lighter side of rural life, but his essays and sketches about farm life, animals, and country people are nonetheless believable. Wells' contributions to the Toronto Evening Telegram were collected in The Owl Pen (1947), By Moonstone Creek (1949), Up Medonte Way (1951), and By Jumping Cat Bridge (1956). His essays benefit from keenly observed descriptive details as well as common sense. Carrying on this rural theme in a mood which by the 1960s had become nostalgic, H. Gordon Greene (1912–) and Harry Boyle (1915–) each produced several collections recalling their youths in small places and simpler times, and Ernest Buckler's Ox Bells and Fireflies stands out for both its subtle perceptions and Buckler's deft handling of language.

Foremost among those essayists who take a more naturalistic approach to Canadian nature are Frederick Philip Grove (1879–1948) and Roderick Haig-Brown (1908–76). Though better known for his novels, Grove was also an accomplished essayist who, notwithstanding his strongly held opinions on social issues, wrote his most memorable essays about nature and pioneer life. Over Prairie Trails (1922), based on weekend journeys he made while teaching in rural Manitoba, and The Turn of the Year (1923), which follows the changing seasons on the prairie, are grounded in keen, almost scientific observation. In powerful prose, they capture both the beauty and the harshness of the prairie environment and pioneer life. While the individual pieces in these collections resemble sketches in consisting largely of description and narration, Grove's continuing search for meaning in what he relates brings them closer to the essay. Grove also wrote more conventional essays for periodical publication, and one collection, It Needs to Be Said (1929), mainly concerned with writing. Haig-Brown is arguably the most accomplished Canadian essayist primarily concerned with nature. After concentrating on fiction, often for young readers, for more than a decade, Haig-Brown discovered his natural medium in the familiar essay. Although he wrote well on a wide range of subjects, his best essays are about nature and fishing. Most were written for such integrated collections as A River Never Sleeps (1946), Fisherman's Spring (1951), which explores the essential meaning fishing holds for him, and Fisherman's Summer (1959), which shows a growing concern with conservation. Haig-Brown's success rests not only on his descriptive power but on his extensive firsthand knowledge of game fish, Canadian waters, and the techniques of fishing, as well as an ability to convey his enthusiasm about nature and fishing that remained undiminished throughout his long career.

Like Grove and Haig-Brown, many of the best Canadian essayists of this century have been novelists as well. Hugh MacLennan (1907–90) concentrated on novels for several years before taking up the essay. MacLennan began by writing comparatively formal essays on topics of public concern in order to support himself between novels, but he gradually developed a deep affection for the familiar essay. His first two collections, Cross Country (1949) and Thirty and Three (1954) won him Governor-General's Awards for nonfiction, and Seven Rivers of Canada (1961), which, in revised form, was the basis of The Rivers of Canada (1974), includes some of the best familiar essays on Canadian regions yet written. MacLennan excelled at explaining complex subjects lucidly and memorably, and his essays reflect the wide range of his enthusiasms. His central concern, however, is personal and national identity, and his explorations of what it meant to be a Canadian in his time played a central role in shaping national self-perception.

Unlike MacLennan and Haig-Brown, who took up the essay only after writing several novels, Robertson Davies (1913–95) began by writing essays and developed his talent for fiction later. Initially, Davies worked through the irascible but perceptive persona of Samuel Marchbanks. As often as not his Marchbanks columns amounted to little more than humorous sketches, but this eccentric, intolerant persona provided Davies with an excellent medium for criticizing Canadian society. Davies published selections from his Marchbanks columns in The Diary of Samuel Marchbanks (1947) and The Table Talk of Samuel Marchbanks (1949), and revived the character in Marchbanks' Almanack (1967) and The Papers of Samuel Marchbanks (1985). Writing in his own voice (which was not unlike that of Marchbanks) Davies wrote numerous periodical essays on a remarkable variety of subjects. These appeared in several collections, such as A Voice from the Attic (1960), The Enthusiasms of Robertson Davies (1979), and The Well-Tempered Critic (1981), which is devoted mainly to literature and Canadian theater. Davies' essays reflect his wide-ranging literary interests, his distaste for intellectual narrowness, and his impressive knowledge of arcane subjects.

Perhaps because Davies drew heavily on his sense of humor in building a following, he took a special interest in the work of another essayist whose intelligence and extensive learning were often overshadowed by his success as a humorist. While Stephen Leacock (1869–1944) is best known for many amusing sketches and essays, he also wrote more serious essays in such general areas as history, politics, education, popular entertainment, and the media, as well as economics, his primary academic interest. Leacock was without rival the foremost Canadian humorist of his day, but his success encouraged others. Canadian journalists especially have relied on humor to build readership for their columns. In addition to Davies, McArthur, and Wells, Greg Clark (1892–1977) and later Eric Nicol (1919–) stand out among the many capable newspaper columnists who owed their popularity largely to their ability to amuse readers. In addition to winning awards for straight reportage, Clark reached a wide audience in the Toronto Star Weekly and later in Weekend Magazine with humorous sketches and essays in which hunting and fishing figure prominently. Before turning to drama in the mid-1970s, Nicol wrote a popular column for the Vancouver Province, in which he specialized in making fun of himself and the trials of middleclass family living, and saw his essays and sketches collected in numerous books. The work of these two writers is typical of humorous columns in Canada through mid-century in that it is amusing rather than pointedly satirical. These columnists often make fun of themselves, partly because establishing themselves as personalities whose foibles, failings, and insights readers can understand easily and quickly saves space in individual essays, and partly because the approach allows them to poke fun at weaknesses often shared by their readers without giving offense. Written under deadline pressure for an audience more concerned with being entertained than enlightened, humorous columns tend to be somewhat repetitive and to rely on formulaic humor.

Journalism has, of course, affected more serious essay writing as well as humor, and there can be no doubt that the continuing growth of newspapers and general interest magazines in this century has made journalism, along with the related focus on a mass audience of average readers, the primary factor shaping the development of the familiar essay in Canada. There is, however, another secondary but still important outlet for publication that has run counter to the leveling effects of popular journalism. University-based journals, which began to appear around the turn of the century, have encouraged a more intellectual, somewhat more formal approach to the familiar essay than that of newspapers and large magazines. While the circulation of journals such as the Queen's Quarterly (1893–), the Dalhousie Review (1921–), and the University of Toronto Quarterly (1895–) has remained relatively small, the essays they publish have reached a more thoughtful and better informed audience; in so doing, they have—as was the case with the early 19th-century periodicals—exerted influence out of proportion to their numerical readership. With the expansion of the university system starting in the mid-1960s came a related increase in the number of more specialized academic journals and little magazines dedicated mainly to poetry and short fiction. A few journals in both these categories publish informal essays along with their usual fare, but the established university journals continue to offer the main outlet for academic essayists seeking to reach an intellectual audience with essays on general topics.

While most essays published in the university-based journals differ in tone and focus from those in the popular press, the distinction between academic and journalistic writers is less clear in that many Canadian academics have also written for popular magazines. Goldwin Smith was a professor at Oxford and Cornell before becoming a driving force behind Canadian periodical publishing in the 1870s and 1880s. Macphail, MacMechan, and Leacock—all professors—were able to appeal to both academic and general audiences. Although primarily creative writers, MacLennan and Davies worked as both journalists and academics. Moreover, Canada has produced a good number of academic writers who, while keeping mainly within their areas of expertise, have managed to capture the interest of a wider, nonspecialist audience. Outstanding in this group were E.K. Brown (1905–51) and Northrop Frye (1912–91). Brown was an accomplished stylist and a prolific writer on literary topics. He edited the University of Toronto Quarterly from 1932 to 1941 and, in addition to his many well-written articles in academic journals, published numerous essays on literature accessible to nonspecialists in better magazines such as Harper's and Canadian Forum. Frye's reputation as one of the foremost literary theorists of the 20th century rests mainly on his highly original and persuasive books, such as Anatomy of Criticism: Four Essays (1957) and The Bush Garden: Essays on the Canadian Imagination (1971), but Frye's books are generally made up of sections constructed with the tradition of the familiar essay in mind. In addition to practical and theoretical criticism, Frye also wrote essays on more general cultural and historical topics for nonspecialized periodicals such as the University of Toronto Quarterly and Canadian Forum, which he edited from 1948 to 1952.

Canadian Forum (1920–) is an interesting instance of a Canadian magazine that bridges the gap between the university-based journals and the popular press. Though eventually expanded, the Forum was started by faculty and students at the University of Toronto. Reaching a wider audience than the university periodicals, the Forum provided a more searching, intellectual alternative to mass-circulation magazines like Maclean's (1896–) and Chatelaine (1928–). More journalistic than the Forum yet still intended for a readership more culturally and socially aware than average, Saturday Night (1887–) stands out, particularly in the 30 or so years after World War I, as the leading outlet for thoughtful Canadian essays. Under the editorial guidance of such accomplished essayists as William Arthur Deacon (1890–1977) and B.K. Sandwell (1876–1954), Saturday Night set the standard for serious essays on Canadian political, cultural, and literary topics. Deacon collected his own essays in Pens and Pirates (1923) and Poteen (1926), Sandwell his in The Privacy Agent and Other Modest Proposals (1928) and The Diversions of Dukesstown and Other Essays (1955). Robertson Davies worked as literary editor for Saturday Night during World War II and continued to contribute later on. Though certainly not without humor, these magazines were devoted to promoting serious consideration of Canada's cultural and literary achievements and failings.

After mid-century the critical temper characteristic of Canadian Forum and Saturday Night intensified and gradually became the norm. Out of the social ferment of the 1960s came a loss of confidence in the traditional values that underlay the writing of most earlier Canadian essayists, even those critical of many aspects of Canadian life. Many writers moved from social criticism toward social activism, and this impatience with things as they are is reflected in stylistic experimentation. The questioning mood of the times has done nothing to slow the production of good essays, however, and the number of essayists writing well on a wide variety of subjects—sports, Canadian politics, world affairs, business, lifestyles, entertainment, literature, to mention a few—has grown with the population and an increasing tendency among educated readers to become involved in social and political movements. Many recent essays are so closely tied to the news of the day that they tend to become dated quickly; this, along with the volume of good writing, makes it difficult to estimate which writers will achieve continuing recognition. A few of the older generation of contemporary essayists—those born before World War II—who transcend topicality and who have seen their work collected in book form seem likely to continue to be read.

Robert Fulford (1932–) began his career in journalism in the early 1950s when still a teenager and worked his way up to become editor of Saturday Night in 1968. In the same year, he published Crisis at the Victory Bursk, a collection of previously published essays on a variety of mainly cultural topics. Fulford continues to write prolifically on an impressive range of subjects, both cultural and, more recently, political. Poet-novelist Alden Nowlan (1933–83) brought shrewd wisdom and a characteristically old-fashioned East Coast perspective to contemporary Canadian subjects in Double Exposure (1978). Another accomplished essayist with roots in the Atlantic provinces is Harry Bruce (1934–). Writing through the persona of Max MacPherson for the Toronto Daily Star, Bruce produced a readable column using the Toronto scene as a starting point. The best of these essays are available in The Short Happy Walks of Max MacPherson (1968). Continuing his practice of using places as a starting point for his reflections, Bruce later moved to his family home in Nova Scotia and based several books of essays, including the exceptionally perceptive collection Down Home (1988), on his explorations of his East Coast cultural roots.

Nature writing since the 1960s reflects the concern with promoting social action common in many recent essays. After a distinguished career as an academic and journalist, David Suzuki (1936–) has turned increasingly to the familiar essay to educate Canadians about nature and promote conservation. In Inventing the Future: Reflections on Science, Technology, and Nature (1989) and Time to Change (1994) Suzuki expresses his personal views on a range of cultural, political, and economic topics, always with a sense of our relationships with the natural environment in the background.

Many prominent Canadian novelists have taken up the informal essay and published excellent collections in recent decades—Hugh Hood (1928–) in The Governor's Bridge Is Closed (1973), Margaret Laurence (1926–87) in Heart of a Stranger (1976), Margaret Atwood (1939–) in Second Words: Selected Critical Prose (1982), a collection of informal essays on literature—but by far the most dedicated and prolific familiar essayist among these has been Mordecai Richler (1931–). Richler has published widely in magazines in Canada and abroad and has collected only a fraction of his periodical publications in such books as Hunting Tigers Under Glass (1968), Shovelling Trouble (1972), Notes on an Endangered Species and Others (1974), and The Great Comic Book Heroes and Other Essays (1978). Richler's essays are more personal than those of most of his contemporaries in that he is characteristically outspoken about his likes and dislikes and writes in a colloquial style that creates a strong impression of his speaking voice. Although Richler owes much of his wide appeal to his well-developed sense of the ridiculous and the satirical cast of his mind, he is a serious critic of society, culture, and, increasingly, in Home Sweet Home: My Canadian Album (1984) and Oh Canada! Oh Quebec! (1992), of political trends, particularly in his native province of Quebec.

Dozens of promising younger essayists are writing in Canada today, many as full-time journalists and many more freelancing, often supported through connection in some capacity with colleges or universities. The latter group are more typically experimental, but both groups are tending to take the familiar essay toward persuasion rather than detached observation and reflection. It might be argued that personal journalism and essays clearly aimed at changing the attitudes of readers stand somewhat apart from the traditional model of the familiar essay, but the essay has at many points in its history been an agent for social change, and the frankness of Canadian writers today about where they stand in relation to controversial subjects reflects the openness of the time. Whatever developments the new century may bring in the familiar essay, the current interest in this flexible but distinctive genre suggests that it will become more central in Canadian literature.

WILLIAM CONNOR

Anthologies

- The Canadian Essay*, edited by Gerald Lynch and David Rampton, Toronto: Copp Clark Pitman, 1991
Modern Canadian Essays, edited by W.H.New, Toronto: Macmillan, 1976

Further Reading

- Cameron, Elspeth, "Essays in English," in The Oxford Companion to Canadian Literature, edited by William Toye, Toronto: Oxford University Press, 1983:231–35
 Conron, Brandon, "Essays 1880–1920," "Essays 1920–1960," and "Essays," in Literary History of Canada: Canadian Literature in English, 2nd edition, edited by Carl F.Klinck and others, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 3 vols., 1976: vol. 1: 354–60; vol. 2:119–25; vol. 3:176–79 (original edition, 1965)
 Gerson, Carole, and Kathy Mezei, Introduction to The Prose of Life: Sketches from Victorian Canada, edited by Gerson and Mezei, Downsview, Ontario: ECW Press, 1981
 Hjartarson, Paul, "Essays (Canada)," in Encyclopedia of PostColonial Literature in English, vol. 1, edited by Eugene Benson and L.W.Connolly, London and New York: Routledge, 1994: 450–54
 McDougall, Robert L., A Study of Canadian Periodical Literature of the Nineteenth Century (dissertation), Toronto: University of Toronto, 1950
 Sutherland, Fraser, The Monthly Epic: A History of Canadian Magazines 1789–1989, Markham, Ontario: Fitzhenry and Whiteside, 1989

Canadian Essay (French)

Until the 1930s, when genuine novels and poems began to be published in Quebec, the largest and most interesting part of French literature in Canada was to be found in all kinds of essays, from “relations de voyages” (travel narratives) to public-speaking and journalism.

Discoverers, pioneers, missionaries, and administrators of New France (1534–1760) left rich narratives describing their explorations, as well as private and public letters, annals, and reports. Jesuit Relations (1632–73) is the best known and most varied collection of journals, documents, moral reflections, and mystical meditations on day-to-day and major events. Mémoires and Dialogues (1703) with a “bon sauvage” (noble savage), by the secular, liberal, republican—perhaps even anarchist—Baron de Lahontan (1666–1716), are the first steps on the road to the Enlightenment and the French Revolution. Father Joseph François Lafitau (1681–1746), comparing Amerindian customs with primitive Christian culture (1724), provides systematic methods which are seen as forerunners to modern ethnology and anthropology. Another Jesuit humanist, Pierre François Xavier de Charlevoix (1682–1761), is a precursor of modern history. In the 19th century, he was read by François-Xavier Garneau (1809–66), author of the first extensive Histoire du Canada (1845–52; History of Canadd). This romantic, nationalist, yet sober and realistic History is considered the keystone of French Canadian literature, thought, and ideology.

With the British regime and the importation of printing presses (1764), newspapermen and journalists came to be the most active thinkers, writers, and publishers. La Gazette de Montréal (1778–; The Montreal gazette)—first French, later bilingual, and today an English newspaper—was founded by two French immigrants, both disciples of Voltaire and friends of Benjamin Franklin. Le Canadien (1806–93; The Canadian), run by liberal professionals and members of the new Parliament in Quebec City, was not a neutral observer of events, but rather a fighter for the nationalist cause. Its writers were the forebears of the 1837–38 Patriots; it was they who gave the French Canadian essay its main themes for decades to come. They were the first to give form and utterance to resistance, survival, and hopes of autonomy.

Étienne Parent (1802–74), editor of Le Canadien, was a moderate who became a respected high official in the civil service and the best lecturer of the 19th century on subjects like industry, economy, education, labor, priesthood, and society. He was a political philosopher, a kind of sociologist, but at the same time a writer. His papers are true texts, serious, free, and open.

The letters that the poet Octave Crémazie (1827–79) wrote to the Abbé Henri Raymond Casgrain (1831–1904), leader of the folklorist Mouvement Littéraire et Patriotique de Québec (Literary and patriotic movement of Quebec), are interpreted by today’s readers as essays of a sort. Crémazie, a good prose writer, critic, and theoretician, dealt in his letters with literature and translation, languages and peoples, cultural institutions and the writer—whom he defined as a desperate prophet in a society of philistine “grocers.”

Arthur Buies (1840–1901) returned to Montreal from his formative years in France with revolutionary ideas and a literary style to match. His Lettres sur le Canada (1864–67; Letters on Canada) are pamphlets in the form of letters against what he termed the contemporary dark ages, characterized by sluggishness, cowardice, and intellectual lethargy. His collected newspaper articles are more tense and passionate than Hector Fabre’s (1834–1910) Chroniques (1877; Columns). The latter are descriptions of promenades and streets, pieces of diplomatic irony, glances and twinklings of a sympathetic eyewitness. Edmond de Nevers (i.e. Edmond Boisvert, 1862–1906), a cultivated polyglot, lived and worked in Berlin, Vienna, and Paris, where he published L’Avenir du peuple canadien-français (1896; The future of the French Canadian people). The utopia he defines in this essay is, in reality, the European past interpreted as a museum of progress in the arts and sciences.

Since almost all schools, colleges, and universities were under the complete control of the clergy until World War II, French Canadian lay intellectuals turned to politics, civil service, newspapers, radio, and later television to express themselves. Among the best journalists and essayists of the first years of the 20th century were two friends: Olivar Asselin (1874–1937) (Pensée française [1937; French thought]) and Jules Fournier (1884–1918) (Mon encrier [1922; My inkpot]), both francophile purists and polemicists. Another bright young nationalist was André Laurendeau (1912–68), editor of Le Devoir (The duty) and disciple of Lionel Groulx (1878–1967): he used his daily to oppose Quebec’s conservative Premier Maurice Duplessis. He was later named royal commissioner on bilingualism and biculturalism.

Fournier and Laurendeau were occasional literary critics, whereas professor Victor Barbeau (1896–1994) and novelist Claude-Henri Grignon (1894–1976) were lonely pamphleteers. The first professional critics in newspapers, magazines, journals, or reviews were a diplomat (René Garneau [1907–83]), a notary (Albert Pelletier [1895–1971]), a neorealist poet enamored of the United States (Alfred DesRochers [1901–78]), and a printer (Louis Dantin [i.e. Eugène Seers, 1865–1945], at Harvard University Press). Dantin’s Gloses critiques (1931; Critical glosses) are often about theories, ideologies, or general questions such as regionalism, subjectivity, art, and morals.

A moralist in the French classical tradition, Pierre Baillargeon (1916–67) is concise, confidential, pessimistic, and rightist. His classmates Jacques Ferron (1921–85) and Pierre Vadeboncoeur (1920–) are more artful in mixing wisdom and freedom, French wit and political insight, ethics and aesthetics. So is Jacques Brault (1933–), who, like Ferron and Vadeboncoeur, contributed regularly to the left-wing, secessionist Parti pris (1965–68; We affirm) as well as to the more moderate Liberté (1959–). More than philosophers or historians, sociologists were the kings and the king-makers of the 1960s and 1970s in universities, mass media, and sometimes in literature. Marcel Rioux’s (1919–92) Les Québécois (1974) is a colorful portrait of Quebec society. Fernand Dumont (1927–) goes from a theoretical Lieu de l’homme (1968; Man’s locus) to a more timely La Vigile du Québec (1971; Quebec’s vigil), about terrorism during the October Crisis of 1970.

What came to be known as the Quiet Revolution—the period of intense social rupture and radical reforms in politics, economy, and lifestyles that started in 1960—was preceded by many cultural movements: manifestos (Refus global [1948; Global refusal] by Paul-Émile Borduas [1905–60]), journals (Cité Libre [1950–66; Free city]), cooperatives of poets (L'Hexagone [1953–]), collections of essays like La Grève de l'amiante (1956; The Asbestos Strike) edited by future Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau (1919–). Another forerunner of this revolution is the personal essay, for example L'Homme d'ici (1952; The man from here) by the Jesuit Ernest Gagnon (1905–78), in which modern Catholicism meets psychoanalysis, existentialism, and African and Oriental myths.

The Quiet Revolution was accelerated by a bestselling essay, Les Insolences du Frère Untel (1960; The Impertinences of Brother Anonymous) by Jean-Paul Desbiens (1927–). The author of this anonymously published book, who was a friar and a teacher, attacked bishops and popularized the word joual to designate the sloppy French spoken mostly in Montreal's East End. Another angry young man of the period was Gilles Leclerc (1928–), whose Journal d'un inquisiteur (1960; An inquisitor's diary) is a dense pamphlet directed at all establishments. Jean Le Moynes's (1913–96) Convergences (1961) concentrated its fire not only on the traditional family, as well as the Jansenism or puritanism of Quebec's society, but also attacked nationalism and separatism—Le Moynes being one of the few essayists to do so.

Jean-Paul Sartre, Albert Memmi, and Frantz Fanon were read by the young founders of Parti pris, Paul Chamberland (1939–) and Pierre Maheu (1939–79). Their collaborators included former terrorist Pierre Vallières (1938–)—his Nègres blancs d'Amérique (1968; White Niggers of America) is an explosive mix of autobiography and ideology—and the journalist Jean Bouthillette (1929–), author of Le Canadien français et son double (1972; The French Canadian and his double), an attempt at political psychoanalysis. For the latter, “French Canadian”—neither French from France nor Canadian in Canada—is a word and concept to be replaced by “Québécois.” This is also the point of view of Hubert Aquin (1929–77), a novelist, political scientist, and philosopher, who wrote about “cultural fatigue,” or Prime Minister Trudeau's constitutional obsessions. His collection Blocs erratiques (1977; Erratic blocks) was published after his suicide.

Less tragic and impatient than the revolutionary Aquin is the novelist and filmmaker Jacques Godbout (1933–), who has a nose for fads, slogans, and day-to-day images in Montreal, Paris, New York, or California. Before Le Murmure marchand (1984; The rumor of merchandise), on media, commerce, and publicity, he published Le Réformiste: Textes tranquilles (1975; The reformist: quiet texts). Playwright and novelist Jacques Ferron mixed political and literary essays with many genres: open letters, autobiography, portraits, satire, history (as in Historiettes [1969; Anecdotes]), and book reviews (as in Escarmouches [1975; Skirmishes]).

A few other novelists, journalists, and poets—for example, Fernand Ouellette (1930–)—are also occasional essayists. Naïm Kattan (1928–), born in Baghdad, educated in Paris, and now living in Montreal, plays on his “triple existence” and on twofold titles to contrast and blend the East and the West, Judaism and Christianity, Le Désir et le pouvoir (1983; The desire and the power). Diplomat Pierre Trottier (1925–) explores similar themes, but expresses them in other ways.

From the 1960s to the 1980s, the so-called “national question”—the vexed issue of the identity of the Québécois people as a nation, as well as the debate on the status of the Province of Quebec within the Canadian Confederation—was one of the principal obsessions of essayists. This issue permeated many domains of thought; it flowed over into discussions of language, individualism and collectivity, fear, action, and freedom. But other subjects—literature and silence, for example—were not neglected. Links between reading, thinking, and writing are the main issues in Le jeu en étoile (1978; The star-shaped game) and Entre l’écriture et la parole (1984; Between writing and speech) by Jean-Louis Major (1937–). The most influential French Canadian literary critic since the 1950s is Gilles Marcotte (1925–), who wrote Une littérature qui se fait (1962; A literature that builds itself), Littérature et circonstances (1989; Literature and circumstances), and La Littérature et le reste (1980; Literature and what remains), which contains correspondence and dialogue with Marcotte’s colleague André Brochu (1942–), himself a scholar, critic, and essayist. Jean Éthier-Blais (1925–95) was more conservative and subjective than Marcotte in his reviews (Signets [1967; Bookmarks]) and in his clever Dictionnaire de moi-même (1976; Dictionary of myself). Georges-André Vachon’s (1926–94) Esthétique pour Patricia (1980; Aesthetics for Patricia) subverted all distinctions between reality and fiction, reading and writing, science and art.

The rise of the essay in Quebec since the Quiet Revolution has depended greatly on two publishers. HMH—later Hurtubise HMH—created the longest lasting series of essays in 1961 with the publication of Le Moyné’s Convergences. The “Constantes” series includes texts by Pierre Baillargeon, Maurice Blain (1925–96) (Approximations, 1967), Fernand Dumont, Ernest Gagnon, Naïm Kattan, Jean-Louis Major, Gilles Marcotte, Fernand Ouellette, Jean Simard (1916–) (Nouveau répertoire [1965; New repository]), Pierre Trottier, and Pierre Vadeboncoeur. Many series were created in the wake of “Constantes”—most notably “Prose exacte” by the Éditions Quinze, and “Essais littéraires” by L’Hexagone—but the most important editor of essays after Hurtubise HMH is clearly Boréal. Created in 1984, the “Papiers collés” series publishes collections of essays, “books of scattered texts, whose assemblage underlines their eclecticism as well as the continuity of thought and style of their authors.” Surprendre les voix (1986; To catch the voices) by André Belleau (1930–86), La Poussière du chemin (1989; The dirt of the road) by Jacques Brault, and La Petite Noirceur (1987; The small darkness) by Jean Larose (1948–), the most important collections of the 1980s, were published in this series, alongside books by Gilles Archambault (1933–), André Brochu, Jacques Godbout, Yvon Rivard (1945–), and François Ricard (1947–), who is the director of the series. It is also in this series that Bernard Arcand (1945–) and Serge Bouchard (1947–) like to pin down the “lieux communs” (commonplaces) of modern life. With the journal Liberté, these two series have been crucial in the field of the Québécois essay. It is still too early to assess the importance of the most recent series of essays in Quebec. “Pour en finir avec” (To be done with, also published by Boréal) attempts to maintain the polemical tradition that dates back to Louis-Antoine Dessaulles (1819–95) or Louis Fréchette (1839–1908) in the 19th century.

Few women writers have seen their books included in series such as “Constantes” or “Papiers collés,” a fact that may partially explain why critics and anthologists seem to be so ill at ease with these books and their place within the genre of the essay in Quebec.

Besides journalists whose articles are frequently collected—Rolande Allard-Lacerte, Lise Bissonnette, Ariane Émond, Lysiane Gagnon, Judith Jasmin (1916–72), Catherine Lord, Hélène Pedneault (1952–), Nathalie Petrowski (1954–)—many women writers use genres that are difficult to categorize, for they often refuse the boundaries imposed upon them by the genres themselves. Nicole Brossard (1943–), Madeleine Gagnon (1938–), and France Théoret (1942–) write about their private lives as well as their theories and ideas in their texts. Michèle Lalonde (1937–) is concerned with matters of language and politics. Louky Bersianik (i.e. Lucile Durand [1930–]) is a novelist and a utopian. Marcelle Brisson (1929–) and Madeleine Ouellette-Michalska (1935–) mix philosophy, anthropology, and feminist theory. Fernande Saint-Martin (1927–) is a historian of both art and literature, and also a semiotician. Simonne Monet-Chartrand (1919–93) used all forms of autobiographical expression in her series of books. Suzanne Lamy (1929–87) wrote literary criticism that was wellinformed, firmly rooted theoretically, ideologically oriented, and personal in the strongest possible sense of the word: she constantly stressed the intimate pleasures of reading and writing. One has to wonder if women writers' choices of publishing houses, coupled with their fondness for personal narratives and political prose, as well as with the literary institution's tendency to treat them as a separate corpus, have not led critics to overlook their role in the Québécois essay.

With the exception of Janusz Przychodzen (1962–) and Lise Gauvin (1940–), who herself published a book of essays in 1984, critics of the genre have not advanced coherent ideas on the matter of essays written by women, a curious oversight given how eagerly Quebec's essayists theorize their own writing. Fernand Ouellette, André Belleau, Jean-Louis Major, Jean-Marcel Paquette (1941–), and François Ricard, all essayists themselves, have written at length on the nature of the essay, its relationship with other genres, its stylistic devices (including the use of paradox), and its peculiar efficiency: "Anybody who has used the essay," Belleau wrote, "knows that it allows him to discover." Critics such as Laurent Mailhot (1931–), Robert Vigneault (1927–), Marc Angenot (1941–), François Dumont (1956–), Janusz Przychodzen, and Jean Terrasse (1940–) have also been concerned with the genre's characteristics and history—in Quebec as elsewhere.

Studies written by these critics are similar to the thoughts of contemporary essayists who deal with the powers of literature. Be it Modernism (Philippe Haeck [1946–]), great literary figures of the past (Victor-Lévy Beaulieu [1945–]), the teaching of literature (Jean Larose), or every author's fight with language (Thomas Pavel [1941–]), Quebec essayists are constantly reassessing questions that confront today's literary theorists and readers alike. What are the "ends" of literature (Chutes: La Littérature et ses fins [1990] by Pierre Ouellet [1950–])? What can it do "against itself" (La Littérature contre elle-même [1985] by François Ricard)? Does it promote a particular "ecology" (L'Écologie du réel [1988] by Pierre Nepveu [1946–])? The spatial metaphors that abound in the texts of the 1990s—the road (Le Bout cassé de tous les chemins [1993] by Yvon Rivard), narrowness (Les Littératures de l'exiguïté [1992] by François Paré), distance (Le Proche et le lointain [1994] by Claude Lévesque [1927–])—remind its reader that the genre of the essay is especially helpful for those who wish to travel along the road of literature.

LAURENT MAILHOT

Anthologies

- Écrivains contemporains du Québec depuis 1950*, edited by Lise Gauvin and Gaston Miron, Paris: Seghers, 1989
- Essais québécois, 1837–1983: Anthologie littéraire*, edited by Laurent Mailhot and Benoît Melançon, Montreal: Hurtubise HMH, 1984

Further Reading

- Andrès, Bernard, "Essai de typologie du discours pamphlétaire québécois," Voix et Images 1, no. 3 (April 1976):417–31
- Angenot, Marc, La Parole pamphlétaire: Contribution à la typologie des discours modernes, Paris: Payot, 1982
- Belleau, André, "Approches et situation de l'essai québécois," in his Y a-t-il un intellectuel dans la salle?, Montreal: Primeur, 1984: 148–53
- Bonenfant, Joseph, "Divergences de l'essai québécois," in Culture populaire et littératures au Québec, edited by René Bouchard, Saratoga, California: Anma Libri, 1980:243–56
- Brisson, Marcelle, "L'Écriture réflexive au Québec," La Nouvelle Barre du Jour 60 (November 1977):53–63
- Dorais, Fernand, L'Essai au Canada français de 1930 à 1970: Lieu d'appropriation d'une conscience ethnique, Sudbury: Prise de Parole, 1984
- Dumont, François, "L'Essai littéraire québécois des années quatrevingt: La Collection 'Papiers collés,'" Recherches Sociographiques 33, no. 2 (1992):323–35
- Dumont, François, "La Théorisation de l'essai au Québec," in Le Discours de l'université sur la littérature québécoise, edited by Joseph Melançon, Quebec City: Nuit Blanche, 1996:331–56
- L'Essai et la prose d'idées au Québec*, Montreal: Fides, 1985
- Études Littéraires* issue on the essay, 5, no. 1 (April 1972)
- Études Littéraires* issue on the pamphlet, 11, no. 2 (August 1978)
- Gauvin, Lise, "Petit Essai sur l'essai au féminin," in L'Autre Lecture: La Critique au féminin et les textes québécois, vol. 2, edited by Lori Saint-Martin, Montreal: XYZ, 1992:117–27
- Mailhot, Laurent, Ouvrir le livre, Montreal: L'Hexagone, 1992
- Marcel, Jean, Pensées, passions et proses, Montreal: L'Hexagone, 1992
- Przychodzen, Janusz, Un projet de liberté: L'Essai littéraire au Québec (1970–1990), Quebec City: Institut Québécois de Recherche sur la Culture, 1993
- Québec Français* issue on the essay, 53 (March 1984)
- Ricard, François, "La Littérature québécoise contemporaine 1960–1977; IV. L'Essai," Études Françaises 13, no. 3–4 (October 1977):365–81
- Simard, Sylvain, "L'Essai québécois au XIXe siècle," Voix et Images 6, no. 2 (Winter 1981):365–81
- Terrasse, Jean, Rhétorique de l'essai littéraire, Montreal: University of Quebec Press, 1977

- Vachon, Stéphane, "Problématique d'une nouvelle forme: L'Essai pamphlet au Québec," Itinéraires et Contacts de Culture 6 (1985):47–57
- Vidricaire, André, "Pour une politique de l'essai en littérature," Livres et Auteurs Québécois 1979 (1980):275–82
- Vidricaire, André, "Les Genres en littérature, en histoire, en art, etc.: Un Conflit de disciplines," Livres et Auteurs Québécois 1980 (1981):241–46
- Vigneault, Robert, L'Écriture de l'essai, Montreal: L'Hexagone, 1994
- Vincenthier, Georges, Une idéologie québécoise de Louis-Joseph Papineau à Pierre Vallières, Montreal: Hurtubise HMH, 1979
- Voix et Images* issue on the age of criticism, 1920–1940, 17, no. 2 (Winter 1992)

Cândido, Antônio

Brazilian, 1918–

After completing a degree in social sciences and beginning a career as a sociologist, Antonio Cândido embarked on a brilliant career as a literary critic. His essays have helped to define the writings of a generation of young Brazilian critics. His objective, as his students and followers have indicated, is not simply to define the parameters of the discipline of literary criticism, but rather to articulate the question of aesthetics through psychology, sociology, economics, philosophy, and art. One could say that he has inaugurated the field of Cultural Studies in Brazil. To this end, Cândido integrates the practice and experience of the critic with the objective data obtained through his investigations. As a trained social scientist, Cândido is just as likely to pursue empirical research—usually considered anathema to literary criticism—as critical textual analysis.

Cândido's essays mobilize information from structuralism, psychological criticism, and sociopolitical empiricism. His genius lies in his ability to combine the disciplines without producing impressionistic texts and, more importantly, without falling into the reductionist trap of a mechanical approximation to a text. Indeed, he has labeled some critics imperialistic for their use of the scientific method alone in the analysis of texts.

Well ahead of the now fashionable New Historicism, Cândido proposed a revisionist reading of Brazilian literature. His project involves a recontextualization of Brazilian letters from the point of view of literary tradition juxtaposed to a critical perspective that he finds missing in most textual analyses. His method, or as some have called it, his theory, involves analyzing the formalistic aspects of a text as merely a step toward comprehending the diversity that encompasses a work of literary art. Once analyzed, the text then becomes organic and dialogic.

To reach his own maximum critical creativity, Cândido attempts "to focus simultaneously on the work as its own reality and on its context as a system of texts" (Formação da literatura brasileira [1959; The formation of Brazilian literature]). For Cândido, the contextualization of a work of literary art involves bringing it into dialogue with all other texts surrounding it, be they literary or not. In this process, he proposes placing the literary text on an equal level with all other texts present when the literary text was written, and more importantly, when it is being read. In the introduction to Formação da literatura brasileira Cândido writes that “it is necessary to see simplicity where there is complexity, trying to point to the harmony in contradiction. The spirit of the system intervenes as form to translate the multiplicity of the real: be this an art form applied to life, or scientific form applied to data.” Cândido proposes that literature and its analysis make up a system of intrinsically linked texts. To understand this system, one must analyze in chronological, sociopolitical, and economic contexts not only the critical terms that are used to define it, but also the very discourse that is present in the text. Rather than discarding some literary works as unworthy of analysis, Cândido proposes a different kind of reading—the deconstruction of these texts’ position in the “literary system.” Not to do so, according to Cândido, is to fall into the trap of “colonizing” the literary text, much as the indigenous ideologies were colonized by the ideal of “civilization.”

Perhaps more so than his contemporaries, Cândido has been able to maintain a balance between ideology and culture. Ideology as he defines it presents all of the political underpinnings suggested by or projected onto the text. Culture, on the other hand, is a mirror of a period’s aesthetic judgment. Within these definitions lies the system that will guide the rereading of all past literary texts.

Cândido’s essays are both products and examples of his system, for he enters into dialogue not only with the literary texts, but also with his own context and ideology. As Celia Pedrosa (1990) has indicated, the essayist “may articulate intelligence and sensibility, information and evaluation, mobilizing at the same time the theoretical-methodological recourses of several disciplines.”

Antonio Cândido continues to develop his essays within an organic system. He has helped to define the field of literary analysis in a culture where imitation is often valued over originality, and the adaptation of foreign models over the development of national ones. Cândido breaks with this tradition in his essays, in doing so pointing an entire generation of young Brazilian critics toward a new vision of Brazilian literature.

CARMEN CHAVES TESSER

Biography

Antônio Cândido Mello e Souza. Born 1918. Studied at home; moved to Paris at age 11, where he was tutored in French culture and language; returned to Brazil as a teenager; studied anthropology at the University of São Paulo. Taught sociology for 15 years at the Universidade Estadual Paulista; coordinator of language studies, Universidade Estadual de Campinas; currently professor of literary theory, University of São Paulo. Founding member, Partido dos Trabalhadores (Workers’ party).

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose
Brigada ligeira, 1945

Ficção e confissão: Ensaio sobre a obra de Graciliano Ramos, 1956

O observador literário, 1959

Tese e antítese, 1964; revised edition, 1971

Literatura e sociedade: Estudos de teoria e história literária, 1965; as On Literature and Society, edited and translated by Howard S. Becker, 1995

Vários escritos, 1970

Teresina, etc., 1980

A educação pela noite e outros ensaios, 1987

Brigada ligeira e outros escritos, 1992

O discurso e a cidade, 1993

Recortes, 1993

Other writings: Formação da literatura brasileira: Momentos decisivos (2 vols., 1959) and a book on Sylvio Romero (1963). Also edited several collections by other writers.

Further Reading

Gomes, Renato Cordeiro, "Um olhar para além das fronteiras: 'Literatura e subdesenvolvimento' de Antonio Cândido," in Toward Socio-Criticism: Selected Proceedings of the Conference "Luso-Brazilian Literatures, a Socio-Critical Approach", edited by Roberto Reis, Tempe: Arizona State University Center for Latin American Studies, 1991:87–94

Leite, Ligia Chiappini Moraes, Formación de la literatura brasileña o la historia de un deseo, Miami: Casa de las Américas, 1990

Pedrosa, Celia, "Antonio Cândido e a crítica como experiência," Chasqui 19, no. 1 (1990):64–76

Schwarz, Roberto, "Presupuestos, salvo engano, de 'Dialectica del malandrinaje'," Revista de Teoría y Crítica Literarias 4, no. 8 (1979):191–211

Canetti, Elias

Bulgarian-born, 1905–1994

Elias Canetti's reputation as an essayist was established on the basis of 15 essays collected in the volume Das Gewissen der Worte (enlarged edition, 1976; The Conscience of Words). With one exception, these essays date from the 1960s and 1970s and so postdate his major study of social collectivities and their rulers, Masse und Macht (1960; Crowds and Power). Most first appeared either in smaller collections of Canetti's essays or in literary periodicals.

The collected essays, while predominantly preoccupied with literary topics, at first glance suggest some thematic diversity. Several take writers as their nominal topic: Büchner, Tolstoi, Kafka, Broch, and Kraus. Others consider different aspects of Canetti's own writing, one treating the autobiographical background of his novel Die Blendung (1936; Auto-da-Fé), another considering what constitutes realistic writing in the new reality of the 20th century, and a third discussing his own unpublished diaries, partly in relation to his extensive production as an aphorist. Others discuss the problems of language and exile and the profession of the writer in the 20th century. Not all the texts on which Canetti writes are purely literary: he also writes on Confucius, on Albert Speer's memoirs, and on a Japanese diary recording the aftermath of the bombing of Hiroshima. Only one essay, "Macht und Überleben" (1972; "Power and Survival"), has no obvious textual or literary referent, but rather elaborates two of the central categories developed in Crowds and Power.

Canetti's preface to the collection argues that any apparent thematic disunity is the result only of a distinction between the public and the private spheres that is no longer tenable in the face of humankind's potential to destroy the earth. What the essays present, according to Canetti, is a series of positive and negative models of behavior—and particularly of writing—vis-à-vis the forms of power explored at length in Crowds and Power and represented here explicitly in one essay. These essays' posteriority to that study is therefore significant since, in their reliance on predominantly modern material, they offer a response to the early criticism of Crowds and Power, which questioned the contemporary usefulness of analytic categories derived almost exclusively from remote historical or anthropological data.

These models cluster around the four main, interrelated themes of his work: crowds, power, death, and metamorphosis. Hitler, for example, is presented as the paranoiac ruler of crowds, obsessed with and fascinated by the size of the crowds of living and dead which he commands ("Hitler, nach Speer" [1972; "Hitler, According to Speer"]); while Kafka, whose whole consciousness as a writer is revealed as negotiating between power and powerlessness, emerges "among all writers as the greatest expert on power" (Der andere Prozess [1969; Kafka's Other Trial]). Similarly, models for Canetti's dogmatic refusal to make peace with the power of death are found in Confucius, who refuses even to discuss death ("Konfuzius in seinen Gesprächen" [1972; "Confucius in His Conversations"]), and in Kraus' lonely and resolute defiance of authority in protesting against World War I ("Der neue Karl Kraus" [1972; "The New Karl Kraus"]). Tolstoi, however, though a clear and uncompromising critic of power in all its forms for most of his life, is rejected as a model for having "struck a kind of pact with death" in his late turn to religion ("Tolstoi, der letzte Ahne" [1972; "Tolstoy: The Final Ancestor"]).

This accumulation of strategic variations on his central themes is typical of Canetti's reflective writings. Indeed it defines the form of Crowds and Power which, though itself subtitled "Essay," is more satisfactorily described as an intricate, kaleidoscopic structure of essayistic fragments whose whole is finally greater than the sum of its parts. (With the difference of its chronological axis, Canetti's autobiography can be seen in similar terms, inviting the suggestion that essayistic forms become Canetti's principal mode of writing following his one early novel.) While some of the collected essays thematize the problems of representing the fractured reality of modernity, the experiments conducted in others are concerned with the essaying of interconnected, passionately subjective approaches to a world which can only be glimpsed, according to Canetti, in small "splinters of astonishment" ("Hermann Broch," 1936).

Canetti's approach to the contemporary topics of these essays echoes his approach to the more esoteric material of Crowds and Power. Thus, for example, he accords Kafka's and Kraus' letters, the Hiroshima diary, and Büchner's play Woyzeck the same degree of reverence which he elsewhere reserves for the most ancient and sacred of myths. In the final essay in the collection, Canetti describes the immense responsibility of the writer—the Dichter—as the “keeper of metamorphosis” (“Der Beruf des Dichters” [1976; “The Writer’s Profession”]), a term which implies a quasi-religious responsibility for the preservation, revivification, and invention of lifesustaining myths and their meanings. The texts he discusses contain for him the fragmentary truths of our age, the myths which recent history has produced. In his essays he effects their perpetuation through what Dagmar Barnouw (1975) has termed a technique of “concentrated retelling.” Like many sections of Crowds and Power, then, these essays have an especially strong narrative component.

The truths which these narratives aim to reveal stand, by virtue of their mythic status, essentially independent of any prior scholarship. Canetti's essays neither acknowledge other discourses on his topic nor invite discussion. Functioning outside any received terminology, they propagate their truths with a remarkable clarity of expression and argument, the rhythm of their revelations attesting to their author's expertise as a storyteller. Canetti's own terminology is provocatively original, often saturated with strikingly evocative metaphors, such as those cited above or his characterization of the writer's role as “the thrall of his time, its serf and bondman, its lowest slave...the dog of his time” (“Hermann Broch”). These essays aim less to persuade than to initiate their reader into the mystery, and the general tone of the critical discussion they have provoked—outside the supporting role they have played in the study of Crowds and Power—suggests the broad success of their project.

DAVID DARBY

Biography

Born 25 July 1905 in Ruse (Ruschuk), Bulgaria. Studied at schools in England, Austria, Switzerland, and Germany; University of Vienna, 1924–29, Ph.D. in chemistry, 1929. Married Veza TaubnerCalderón, 1934 (died, 1963). Left Vienna, 1938; lived in England, from 1938 or 1939; also maintained a home in Zurich, from the 1970s. Married Hera Buschor (died, 1988), 1971: one daughter. Awards: many, including the Foreign Book Prize (France), 1949; Vienna Prize, 1966; Critics Prize (Germany), 1967; Great Austrian State Prize, 1967; Bavarian Academy of Fine Arts Prize, 1969; Büchner Prize, 1972; Nelly Sachs Prize, 1975; Order of Merit (Germany), 1979; Europa Prato Prize (Italy), 1980; Hebbel Prize, 1980; Nobel Prize for Literature, 1981; Kafka Prize, 1981; Great Service Cross (Germany), 1983; honorary degrees from two universities. Died in Zurich, 14 August 1994.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Masse und Macht, 1960; as Crowds and Power, translated by Carol Stewart, 1962

- Aufzeichnungen, 1942–1948*, 1965
Die Stimmen von Marrakesch: Aufzeichnungen nach einer Reise, 1967; as The Voices of Marrakesh: A Record of a Visit, translated by J.A.Underwood, 1978
Der andere Prozess: Kafkas Briefe an Felice, 1969; as Kafka's Other Trial: The Letters to Felice, translated by Christopher Middleton, 1974
Alle vergeudete Verehrung: Aufzeichnungen, 1949–1960, 1970
Macht und Überleben: Drei Essays, 1972
Die gespaltene Zukunft: Aufsätze und Gespräche, 1972
Die Provinz des Menschen: Aufzeichnungen, 1942–1972, 1973; as The Human Province, translated by Joachim Neugroschel, 1978
Das Gewissen der Worte: Essays, 1975; enlarged edition, 1976; as The Conscience of Words, translated by Joachim Neugroschel, 1979
Die gerettete Zunge: Geschichte einer Jugend (autobiography), 1977; as The Tongue Set Free: Remembrance of a European Childhood, translated by Joachim Neugroschel, 1979
Die Fackel im Ohr: Lebensgeschichte, 1921–1931 (autobiography), 1980; as The Torch in My Ear, translated by Joachim Neugroschel, 1982
Das Augenspiel: Lebensgeschichte, 1931–1937 (autobiography), 1985; as The Play of the Eyes, translated by Ralph Manheim, 1986
Das Geheimherz der Uhr: Aufzeichnungen, 1973–1985, 1987; as The Secret Heart of the Clock: Notes, Aphorisms, Fragments, 1973–1985, translated by Joel Agee, 1989
Die Fliegenpein: Aufzeichnungen, 1992; as The Agony of Flies: Notes and Notations, translated by H.F.Broch de Rothermann, 1994
Aufzeichnungen, 1942–1985, 1993
Nachträge aus Hampstead: Aus den Aufzeichnungen, 1954–1971, 1994
Wortmasken: Texte zu Leben und Werk von Elias Canetti (includes seven essays by Canetti), edited by Ortrun Huber, 1995:105–44
 Other writings: the novel Die Blendung (1936; Auto-da-Fé) and three plays.

Bibliography

Bensel, Walter, editor, Elias Canetti: Eine Personalbibliographie, Giessen: DUX, 1989

Further Reading

- Barnouw, Dagmar, "Elias Canettis poetische Anthropologie," in Canetti lesen: Erfahrungen mit seinen Büchern, edited by Herbert G.Göpfert, Munich: Hanser, 1975:11–31
 Barnouw, Dagmar, Elias Canetti, Stuttgart: Metzler, 1979: especially 1–16 and 87–100
 Barnouw, Dagmar, "Elias Canetti: Poet and Intellectual," in Major Figures of Contemporary Austrian Literature, edited by Donald G.Daviau, New York: Lang, 1987:117–41
 Bayley, John, "Canetti and Power," in his Selected Essays, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1984: 176–91
 Düssel, Reinhard, "Aspects of Confucianism in Elias Canetti's Notes and Essays," Tamkang Review 18 (1987): 333–41

- Falk, Thomas H., Elias Canetti, New York: Twayne, 1993: especially 119–45
- Hartung, Rudolf, “Ein neues Kafka-Bild: Anmerkung zu Canettis Essay Der andere Prozess,” Text und Kritik 28 (1970):44–49
- Lawson, Richard H., Understanding Elias Canetti, Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1991: especially 79–89
- Parry, Idris, “Attitudes to Power: Canetti, Kafka, Crowds, and Paranoia,” Times Literary Supplement, 15 January 1971:67–68
- Piel, Edgar, Elias Canetti, Munich: Beck, 1984: especially 7–14 and 147–59
- Sontag, Susan, “Mind as Passion,” New York Review of Books, 25 September 1980:47–52
- Stern, J.P., “Canetti’s Later Work,” in his The Heart of Europe: Essays on Literature and Ideology, Oxford and Cambridge, Massachusetts: Blackwell, 1992:331–40
- Zagari, Luciano, “‘Die Splitter des Staunens’: Canetti über Kafka und Broch,” Annali: Studi Tedeschi 25 (1982):189–212

Čapek, Karel

Czech, 1890–1938

Karel Čapek was almost certainly the Czech nation’s greatest writer, as well as a noted philosopher, political thinker, and teacher. He sought to make his people worthy of the independence they had achieved as a nation, almost without cost (as the gift of the Versailles Treaty). He sought to educate them—in spite of the condescension this implied. He even dared to try to amuse them.

For most of his life Čapek combined a dual role as journalist and creative writer. His numerous essays are the product of both impulses. He was hired to furnish Lidové Noviny (The people’s news), the paper to which he contributed, with one feuilleton or column nearly every day. Not all of these columns were essays, of course. Indeed, most were not: they were daily columns that might present book reviews or articles on Prague and its sights, or on mundane national habits. In them Čapek followed the inspiration of Jan Neruda, the leading Czech feuilletonist, most often employing the point of view of an author chatting familiarly with his reader. Yet a substantial number are essays—enough to make their author the greatest Czech essayist. These are deeply reflective and introspective, frequently centered on nature, and dominated by a profoundly aesthetic view of life. They tend to fuse with the philosophical and lyric reflections we find in Čapek’s fiction, except that introspection—the rule of a lyrical “I”—dominates the essays.

From his literary beginnings—in writings done jointly with his elder brother Josef—Čapek took up the essay. The pieces contained in their early collection, Krakonošova zahrada (1918; The garden of Krakonoš), are customarily referred to as causeries, but at least two are superb essays: one concerned with metaphysical time (“...solitary confinement is the torment of time. And time is suffering and endurance”), the other with artificial flowers (“In the widest sense, artificial flowers are made only from paper and the restless movements of fine hands which feel themselves deserted”). Later Čapek was to employ the predominantly aesthetic point of view implicit in these short pieces, but to forego their effiteness.

Čapek's greatest essays were written for newspapers in the early 1920s; a collection of them was published in book form under the title of O nejbližších věcech (1925; Intimate Things). They deal with a variety of matters, but all are small and intimate, and the Čapekian pan-aesthetic principle applies to almost all of them. We read of frost flowers forming on a windowpane, of maps and the landscapes they symbolize, of the smell of home, of dreams, of being laid up by a cold. Only rarely does Čapek work on a grand scale, such as the essay on Ibsen's heroes as melancholics condemned to live rather than die. One piece voices the playful conceit that the contours and colors of farmland should be copied on a map; another the notion that humankind would move far more efficiently if Nature had supplied us with wheels rather than legs.

Earlier Čapek, inspired by Henri Bergson, the American pragmatists, and the Viennese journalist Karl Kraus, had written a specialized cycle on words and language, the separate essays of which were collected as Kritika slov (1920; A critique of language). Later cycles of essays on particular topics, also published both individually in newspapers as well as in collections, include Zahradníkův rok (1929; The Gardener's Year), Marsyas; čili, Na okraj literatury (1931; In Praise of Newspapers), O věcech obecných; čili, Zoon politikon (1932; On political affairs; or, Zoon Politikon), and Měl jsem psa a kočku (1939; I Had a Dog and a Cat). There are also five volumes of travel sketches of trips Čapek made to Italy, England, Spain, Holland, and Scandinavia, but these are closer to humorously tinged reportage than to essays as such.

A majority of these essays are playful or humorous, although those on domestic pets are interwoven with original and valid observations. The political essays are quite serious and two, "Betlém" (1924; "Bethlehem") and "O malých poměrech (1925; "On a Small Scale"), preach the Čapekian gospel of smallness as a model for his homeland: Czechoslovakia, like Holland, can become great. The most famous is without doubt "Proč nejsem komunistou" (1924; "Why I Am Not a Communist"), which was suppressed during the whole period of communist rule in Czechoslovakia. Finally, In Praise of Newspapers is actually in praise of all the minor literary arts, including folklore and the romance novels popular with maidservants; there is even a lighthearted essay on pornography.

Later in life Čapek, perhaps with age and under the pressure of his quasi-official position (he was the close friend as well as biographer of the president, T.G.Masaryk), moved away from humor; his columns are devoted more to other writers and outstanding personalities, and often have a decidedly official quality to them. As essays they rank below the earlier pieces.

More perhaps than in his other work, in his essays Karel Čapek created a broad panorama of life and the world as he himself viewed it. The diversity of his essays can in part be explained by his need to educate his people in many things, as well as to reconcile them to the small size of their nation's world.

WILLIAM E.HARKINS

Biography

Born 9 January 1890 in Malé Svatoňovice, Bohemia. Studied at Charles University, Prague, 1909–15, Ph.D. in philosophy, 1915; Universities of Paris and Berlin, 1909–10. Wrote for Lidové Noviny (Literary journal). Cofounder, with his brother Josef Čapek, František Langer, and Edmond Konrad, Pátníci (Friday circle) avantgarde group. Associated with the Vinohrady Theater, Prague, 1921–23. Married Olga Scheinpflugová, 1935. Died in Prague, 25 December 1938.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Krakonošova zahrada, with Josef Čapek, 1918

Kritika slov, 1920

Italské listy, 1923; as Letters from Italy, translated by Francis P. Marchant, 1929

Anglické listy, 1924; as Letters from England, translated by Paul Selver, 1925

O nejbližších věcech, 1925; as Intimate Things, translated by Dora Round, 1935

Zahradníkův rok, 1929; as The Gardener's Year, translated by M. and R. Weatherall, 1931

Vylet do Španěl, 1930; as Letters from Spain, translated by Paul Selver, 1932

Marsyas; čili, Na okraj literatury (1919–1931), 1931; as In Praise of Newspapers and

Other Essays on the Margin of Literature, translated by M. and R. Weatherall, 1951

Obrázky z Holandska, 1932; as Letters from Holland, translated by Paul Selver, 1933

O věcech obecných; čili, Zoon politikon, 1932

Cesta na sever, 1936; as Travels in the North, translated by M. and R. Weatherall, 1939

Měl jsem psa a kočku, with Josef Čapek, 1939; as I Had a Dog and a Cat, translated by M. and R. Weatherall, 1940

Kalendář, 1940

O lidech, 1940

Neuskutečný dialog (selected essays), edited by Gustav Földi, 1978

Other writings: several novels (including Hordubal, 1933; Povětroň [Meteor], 1934;

Obyčejný život [An Ordinary Life], 1934), plays with his brother Josef Čapek (including

R.U.R. [Rossum's Universal Robots], 1920; Ze života hmyzu [The Insect Play], 1921), short stories, a biography of T.G.Masaryk (3 vols., 1928–35), and correspondence.

Collected works edition: Spisky bratří, 51 vols., 1928–47.

Bibliography

Křepinská, Margita, Karel Čapek, bibliografie díla a literatury o životě a díle, Prague: Národní knihovna, 4 vols., 1991

Further Reading

- Černý, Václav, Karel Čapek, Prague: Borový, 1936
- Doležel, Lubomír, “Karel Čapek and Vladislav Vančura: An Essay in Comparative Stylistics,” in Narrative Modes in Czech Literature, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1973:91–111
- Harkins, William E., Karel Čapek, New York: Columbia University Press, 1962
- Harkins, William E., “Karel Čapek and the Ordinary Life,” Books Abroad 36 (1962):273–76
- Harkins, William E., “Karel Čapek,” in European Writers, vol. 10, edited by George Stade, New York: Scribner, 1990:1565–89
- Klíma, Ivan, Karel Čapek, Prague: Československý Spisovatel, 1962
- Králík, Oldřich, První řada v díle Karla Čapka, Ostrava: Profil, 1972
- Makin, Michael, and Jindřich Toman, editors, Karel Čapek, Ann Arbor: Michigan Slavic Publications, 1992
- Matuška, Alexander, Karel Čapek, an Essay, London: Allen and Unwin, 1964 (original Czech edition, 1963)
- Mukařovský, Jan, “Karel Čapek,” in Kapitoly z české poetiky, Prague: Svoboda, 1948:325–400
- Wellek, René, “Karel Čapek,” in Essays on Czech Literature, The Hague: Mouton, 1963:46–61

Cardoza y Aragón, Luis

Guatemalan, 1904–1992

Better known in international literary circles for his poetry and his seminal works on Mexican mural painting, Luis Cardoza y Aragón left behind an important body of essays. A constant search for innovation and a surrealist perspective characterize his extensive literary production. This experimentation with literary forms led him to conceptualize the essay as a “genre that has much of poetry and the most rigorous thought.” In his essays, Cardoza y Aragón blends poetic prose, chronicles, memoirs, and other literary forms to provide texture and depth to his analysis. He explores complex issues from several perspectives, allowing tension and doubt to emerge.

A lifetime radical, committed to the cause of socialism, freedom, and democracy, Cardoza y Aragón struggled against all forms of “isms” in the cultural and political arena. In his essays on art production he staunchly defends artistic freedom and rejects any attempt to value the work of art on political or ideological merits. Throughout the years, Cardoza y Aragón openly debated with leftist intellectuals and artists on this question, while proclaiming the need to develop a Marxist aesthetics.

His best-known essay, Guatemala, las líneas de su mano (1955; Guatemala, the lines in her hand), exemplifies both Cardoza y Aragón’s political thought and his hybrid approach to the genre. The book is a mixture of memoirs, short stories, literary and cultural criticism, and political and historical analysis. Exiled in Mexico from 1932, Cardoza y Aragón returned to Guatemala in 1944 to participate in the revolutionary process that took place under the administrations of Juan José Arevalo (1944–51) and Jacobo Arbenz (1951–54). During those years Cardoza y Aragón began to write the essay, but had to finish it in Mexico shortly after the 1954 military coup that ended the Guatemalan democratic experiment. Regarded as a literary classic, Guatemala, las líneas de su mano is a detailed and vivid portrayal of the land and its people. The book is divided into three thematic sections: a nostalgic and poetic evocation of his childhood and the geography of his native land, an overview of Guatemala's history from the Popol Vuh to the present, and, finally, a sociopolitical essay which portrays Guatemala as the "land of the eternal tyranny." Using Marxist analysis, Cardoza y Aragón discusses those issues he considers key to understanding the crossroads facing Guatemala at that historical moment. He questions the idea of a Guatemalan national unity, while bringing the Indian question to the forefront. He also proposes the need for a sweeping revolution to bring about the consolidation of Guatemalan nationality as well as equality and freedom to all its people. Although decidedly anti-imperialist in tone, the essay also emphasizes the internal structure of class and racial oppression, thus breaking away from the nationalist interpretation of Guatemala's socioeconomic plight that dominated the political discourse of the period.

Cardoza y Aragón further develops his thesis regarding the national question and the revolution in La revolución guatemalteca (1955; The Guatemalan revolution). Written during the last days of the Arbenz administration, this controversial essay discusses the external and internal conditions that brought about the 1954 military takeover. Although a rigorous analytical piece, the essay lacks the polished style displayed by Cardoza y Aragón in his previous work.

One of the most important themes of Guatemala, las líneas de su mano, which is further developed in Cardoza y Aragón's subsequent essays, is the role of the indigenous element in the forging of Guatemala's past, present, and future. Cardoza y Aragón sets the liberation and incorporation of this sector into the social, economic, political, and cultural life as a precondition for establishing Guatemalan nationality. While emphasizing the prevalence of the pre-Hispanic culture in contemporary Guatemala, Cardoza y Aragón, however, sharply criticizes the indigenista literary movement for its romantic and simplistic representation of the Indian experience. On the other hand, critics have found Cardoza y Aragón guilty of promoting a static view of the Indian population and culture. Still, Guatemala, las líneas de su mano remains one of the most penetrating and profound analyses of Guatemalan society, having laid the foundations for further discussion concerning the Guatemalan national question, specifically on the role of the indigenous population in the nation-building process.

Cardoza y Aragón's essays on Mexican art are recognized as some of the most thought-provoking works on Mexican artistic trends and their main exponents. La nube y el reloj (1940; The cloud and the clock) is widely regarded as an indispensable work on Mexican painting. In this seminal essay, Cardoza y Aragón traces the historical evolution of Mexican painting, discusses the work of contemporary Mexican painters, and offers his thoughts concerning artistic creation. While recognizing Mexican mural painting as one of the highest expressions of the Mexican Revolution, he also stresses its universal character. In Orozco (1959) and México: Pintura de hoy (1964; Mexican Art Today), as well as in other full-length studies, Cardoza y Aragón offers illuminating insights into the work and personality of the major Mexican artists of this century. Guatemalan artists and writers such as Rafael Landívar and Miguel Ángel Asturias were also the object of Cardoza y Aragón's inquisitive mind. His last major work, Miguel Angel Asturias: Casi novela (1991; Miguel Angel Asturias: almost a novel), is another fine example of his hybrid essay and poetic prose.

Cardoza y Aragón also wrote an array of essays in journals and newspapers. Some of his most important essays, published in the influential journal Cuadernos Americanos (American notebooks), were later included in Guatemala con una piedra adentro (1983; Guatemala with a stone inside). Contrary to what the title seems to imply, the book is not exclusively dedicated to Guatemalan political and cultural themes; it also contains important essays on Mexican artistic life, including sketches of several major Mexican artists and writers, such as David Alfaro Siqueiros and Alfonso Reyes.

CAMILLE VILLAFANE

Biography

Born 21 June 1904 in Antigua, Guatemala. Self-taught. Lived in Paris and studied first medicine, then arts and politics, 1921–29. Lived in Mexico, 1932–44, 1954–92. Returned to Guatemala during the rebellion against Ubizo, 1944, and collaborated with the new president, Juan José Arevalo. Cofounder, Revista de Guatemala (Guatemala review), 1945–51. Founder, Casa de la Cultura y el Movimiento Guatemalteco por la Paz (House of culture and Guatemalan movement for peace). Diplomat in Sweden, Norway, and the Soviet Union; Guatemalan ambassador to Colombia and Chile. Married Lya Kostakowsky. Contributor to El Nacional Dominical and Los Suplementos de El Nacional (Supplements to The national). José Clemente Orozco professor, National Autonomous University of Mexico, Mexico City, from 1980. Awards: Quetzal de Jade Award, 1979; Rubén Darío Prize, 1986. Order of Aguila Azteca, 1979. Died in Mexico City in 1992.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Carlos Mérida, 1927

Torre de Babel, 1930

Rufino Tamayo, 1934

La nube y el reloj, 1940

Apolo y Coatlicue: Ensayos mexicanos de espina y flor, 1944

El pueblo de Guatemala, la United Fruit y la protesta de Washington, 1954

Guatemala, las líneas de su mano, 1955

La revolución guatemalteca, 1955

Orozco, 1959

Nuevo Mundo, 1960

José Guadalupe Posada, 1964

México: Pintura de hoy, 1964; as Mexican Art Today, 1966

Perfiles, 1964

Círculos concéntricos, 1967

Guatemala con una piedra adentro, 1983

Malevich: Apuntes sobre su aventura icárica, 1983

Antología (selections), 1987

Ojo/Voz, 1988

Tierra de belleza convulsiva, edited by Alberto Enríquez Perea, 1991

Miguel Angel Asturias: Casi novela, 1991

Other writings: poetry, memoirs, exhibition catalogues, and books about travels in Russia (1946) and Mexican art and culture.

Further Reading

Albizúres Palma, Francisco, "Cardoza y Aragón," in Diccionario de autores guatemaltecos, Guatemala City: Tipografía Nacional, Colección Guatemala, vol. 13, 1984

Arias, Arturo, "Consideraciones en torno al género y la génesis de Guatemala, las líneas de su mano," Tragaluz 2, no. 15 (May 1987):24–28

Figueroa Ibarra, Carlos, "Luis Cardoza y Aragón: La redención del desterrado," Plural 14, no. 160 (January 1985):26–31

Flores, Angel, "Luis Cardoza y Aragón," in Spanish American Authors: The Twentieth Century, New York: Wilson, 1992

Mandujano Jacobo, Pilar, "Luis Cardoza y Aragón," in Diccionario de escritores mexicanos, siglo XX, Mexico City: National Autonomous University of Mexico, 1988

Paz, Octavio, "Luis Cardoza y Aragón (1904–1992)," Vuelta 16, no. 191 (October 1992):50–51

Rodríguez, Francisco, "Luis Cardoza y Aragón: Las paradojas de la escritura," Plural 22, no. 264 (September 1993):52–55

Salgado, María A., "Guatemala," in Handbook of Latin American Literature, edited by David William Foster, New York: Garland, 1992:317–32

Talavera, Laura, "Luis Cardoza y Aragón: La última entrevista," Nexos 15, no. 178 (October 92):5–7

Xirau, Ramón, "Review of Poesías completas y algunas prosas by Luis Cardoza y Aragón," Vuelta 1, no. 6 (May 1977):32–33

Zimmerman, Marc, and Raúl Rojas, Guatemala: Voces desde el silencio: Un collage épico, Guatemala City: Oscar de León Palacios y Palo de Hormigo, 1993

Carlyle, Thomas

British, 1795–1881

Thomas Carlyle's essay writing career began with two pieces in the Edinburgh Review in 1827: “John Paul Friedrich Richter” and “The State of German Literature.” Reviews of books on Richter and German literature, these first essays were a hybrid of literary criticism and cultural critique. The same can be said—despite their lesser scope—of a number of essays on German literature published in the Foreign Review in 1828 and 1829. Here, and later in Fraser’s Magazine, Carlyle earned a reputation as the interpreter of German literature to England.

In “Burns” (1828), Carlyle took the publication of Lockhart’s life of Burns as an opportunity to articulate a view of Burns and biography which anticipated his own later work in that vein. Combining aphoristic style with Augustan periods, Carlyle emphasized his points with alliteration and antithesis.

Among subsequent essays which identify Carlyle’s unique tone and style are “Signs of the Times” (1829), “Thoughts on History” (1830), “Characteristics” (1831), and “Biography” (1832). “Signs of the Times” articulates an anti-utilitarian philosophy in a style both idiosyncratic and broadly allusive. Neologisms, compounds, and wordplay abound, which critics attribute in part to Carlyle’s familiarity with and love of German language and literature. “Thoughts on History,” a familiar essay manifesting the cadences of Augustan prose, classifies the sources and kinds of history but is also sprinkled with neologisms, references to “the Unknown, the Infinite in man’s life,” and social-critical asides. The essay defends the uses of the past and articulates assumptions which guide Carlyle in such later works as The French Revolution (1837).

If any single essay by Carlyle earns him the honorific, “Sage of Chelsea,” it is the aphoristic and allusive “Characteristics.” Critical of the philosophical and moral state of the modern world, Carlyle stresses the “dynamical” and the “vital,” arguing for “a spiritual principle” in society. Contrasting the health of past societies with the “maladies” and “diseases” that afflict the thought and behavior of the present, Carlyle strikes the first notes of a theme he elaborates on in Past and Present (1843). Highly figured, “Characteristics” trades heavily in images of light and darkness and oppositions of the natural and the artificial, employing metaphors of chaos and the whirlwind.

Like the essay on history, “Biography” manifests the more analytical qualities of Carlyle’s style. Subordinating as he classifies various fictional forms of the biographical, Carlyle praises “the smallest historical fact” because “it is not a dream, but a reality.” Even more than “Thoughts on History,” “Biography” anticipates the biographies Carlyle was to write on John Sterling, Robert Burns, and Frederick the Great.

Modern critics usually class Sartor Resartus (1836) as a hybrid autobiographical novel, philosophical treatise, and cultural critique, but seen in a certain light, it also manifests its affinity with the essay form. Structurally, tonally, and specifically, it focuses on the essayist/editor/reviewer relation. The “editor,” who gathers and presents the papers of one Diogenes Teufelsdröch, is a parody of the journal editor. Teufelsdröch and his pedantic style are a caricature of the more pompous reviewer/essayist—and of Carlyle himself. The subjects Sartor Resartus treats—fashion, philosophy, and mores—are also as varied as the subjects considered in any of the early 19th-century reviews.

Originally written for John Stuart Mill’s utilitarian Westminster Review, the long essay Chartism was rejected by Mill and J.G.Lockhart, editor of the Tory Quarterly Review. Published by itself in 1839, it expresses sympathy for the conditions of the working class but is generally agreed to be an uneven work.

With his reputation assured by the publication of The French Revolution, Carlyle capitalized on that book's popularity by developing a series of six lectures which became On Heroes, Hero-Worship, and the Heroic in History (1841). Combining his interest in history and a focus on individuals, the six lectures expand the conception of the essay as they reflect on different ideas of the hero: as divinity, prophet, poet, priest, man of letters, and king. Structurally, On Heroes is more narrative and descriptive than Carlyle's earlier review essays. Stylistically, the book owes a debt to the lecture hall, its emphatic and oratorical redundancies diluting some of the more Germanic features of the earlier essays. The conservative, authoritarian tone evident in Chartism takes on a new form in On Heroes.

Somewhat in the manner of Sartor Resartus and On Heroes, Past and Present expands the notion of the essay form inasmuch as Carlyle combines historical re-creation, social analysis, and cultural criticism to decry the paradoxical prosperity amid poverty and waste that characterized England as it approached the end of the first half of the 19th century.

The latter 1840s found Carlyle contributing occasional pieces primarily to newspapers. "Occasional Discourse on the Negro-Question" (the more offensive "Nigger" became part of the title when it was published separately in 1853) appeared anonymously in Fraser's Magazine in 1849. It was followed by Latter-Day Pamphlets in 1850, eight essays published separately—possibly because no periodical would print them. In "The Negro Question" Carlyle addresses the subject of West Indian slavery in intemperate and (for the 20th century) doubly repugnant terms. In this essay and the Latter-Day Pamphlets Carlyle's frustration and cynicism with English society become prominent. Strident, satirical, and offensive to former friends like John Stuart Mill, these essays nevertheless raise serious questions about democracy, mass persuasion, and politics in modern society.

Longer biographical essays on Sterling, Samuel Johnson, and Burns followed in the 1850s, along with the monumental History of Friedrich the Second called Frederick the Great (1858–65). Shooting Niagara: and After? appeared first in Macmillan's Magazine in 1867 before being published separately. Critical of England's move toward democracy and its wallowing in hypocrisy, Carlyle in this long essay nevertheless holds out some hope, should the natural aristocrats of the nation "develop themselves into something of heroic Well-doing by act and by word."

One of Carlyle's ablest critics, G.B. Tennyson (1966), has said that Carlyle "created the taste for serious works of nonfiction prose," adding that he was a "pioneer" for the essay as "a form for carrying ideas to a mass audience." Carlyle's passionate, often irreverent tone, and what increasingly reads like oratory, nevertheless elaborates a vision and a critique of England in the middle four decades of the 19th century which remains a landmark not only of social criticism but of the powerful and persuasive force of the essay.

ED BLOCK, JR.

Biography

Born 4 December 1795 in Ecclefechan, Dumfriesshire. Studied at the Annan Academy, 1805–09; University of Edinburgh, 1809–14, B.A., 1813; studied for the ministry of the Church of Scotland, 1813–18; studied Scottish law, 1819. Taught at Annan Academy, 1814–16, Kirkcaldy Grammar School, 1816–18, and privately in Edinburgh, 1818–22. Wrote for the Edinburgh Encyclopaedia; full-time writer, from 1824, contributing to journals such as the Edinburgh Review and Fraser's Magazine. Married Jane Welsh, 1826 (died, 1866). Lived in Craigenputtock, Dumfriesshire, 1828–34, and Chelsea, London, 1834–81. Rector, University of Edinburgh, 1866. Awards: Prussian Order of Merit, 1874; declined a baronetcy from Disraeli. Died in London, 5 February 1881.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Critical and Miscellaneous Essays, 4 vols., 1838

Chartism, 1839

On Heroes, Hero-Worship, and the Heroic in History (lectures), 1841; edited by Michael K. Goldberg, 1993

Past and Present, 1843

Latter-Day Pamphlets (The Present Time; Model Praows; Downing Street; The New Downing Street-; Stump-Orator; Parliaments; Hudson's Statue; Jesuitism), 8 vols. bound into 1 vol., 1850

Occasional Discourse on the Nigger Question, 1853

Shooting Niagara: and After?, 1867

Rescued Essays, edited by Percy Newberry, 1892

Unpublished Lectures: Lectures on the History of Literature or the Successive Periods of European Culture, edited by R.P.Karkaria, 1892

Montaigne and Other Essays, Chiefly Biographical, 1897

Historical Sketches of Notable Persons and Events in the Reigns of James I and Charles I, edited by Alexander Carlyle, 1898

A Carlyle Reader (selections), edited by G.B.Tennyson, 1969

Other writings: the fiction work Sartor Resartus (1836), a three-volume history The French Revolution (1837), a six-volume history of Frederick the Great of Prussia (1858–65), other works on history and biography, and several volumes of correspondence to members of his family and figures such as Goethe, John Stuart Mill, John Ruskin, and Ralph Waldo Emerson. Translated Goethe's Wilhelm Meister's Apprenticeship (1824) and works by other German writers.

Collected works edition: Works (Centenary Edition), edited by H. D.Traill, 30 vols., 1896–99.

Bibliographies

- Dillon, R. W., "A Centenary Bibliography of Carlylean Studies, 1928–1974," Bulletin of Bibliography (October–December 1975); supplements, 1975–1980, 1983
- Dyer, I. W., A Bibliography of Thomas Carlyle's Writings and Ana, New York: Octagon, 1968 (original edition, 1928)
- Tarr, Rodger L., Thomas Carlyle: A Bibliography of English Language Criticism, 1824–1974, Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1976
- Tarr, Rodger L., Thomas Carlyle: A Descriptive Bibliography, Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, and Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1989

Further Reading

- Harrold, Charles Frederick, Carlyle and German Thought, 1819–1834, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, and London: Oxford University Press, 1934
- Heffer, Simon, Moral Desperado: A Life of Thomas Carlyle, London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1995
- Holloway, John, The Victorian Sage: Studies in Argument, London: Macmillan, 1953; New York: Norton, 1965
- LaValley, Albert J., Carlyle and the Idea of the Modern: Studies in Carlyle's Prophetic Literature and Its Relation to Blake, Nietzsche, Marx and Others, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1968
- Leopold, Werner F., Die religiöse Wurzel von Carlyles literarischer Wirksamkeit dargestellt an seinem Aufsatz "State of German Literature" (1827), Halle: Niemeyer, 1922
- Levine, George, The Boundaries of Fiction: Carlyle, Macaulay, Newman, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1968
- Roellinger, F. X., "The Early Development of Carlyle's Style," PMLA (1957)
- Shine, Hill, Carlyle's Early Reading, to 1834, with an Introductory Essay on His Intellectual Development, Lexington: University of Kentucky Libraries, 1953
- Sussman, Herbert L., Fact into Figure: Typology in Carlyle, Ruskin, and the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood, Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1979
- Taylor, Alan Carey, Carlyle, sa première fortune littéraire en France (1825–1865), Paris: Champion, 1929
- Tennyson, G. B., Sartor Called Resartus: The Genesis, Structure and Style of Thomas Carlyle's First Major Work, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1966

Carman, Bliss

Canadian, 1861–1929

While known primarily as a poet, Bliss Carman also developed a considerable reputation in his day as cultural commentator in the American magazine world and as a Canadian and American literary critic, in the period from 1888 to 1922. His essays on everything from canoeing and hiking through to the philosophy of poetry were published mainly from 1890 to about 1905 and appeared in such publications as the Book News Monthly, Bookman, Boston Evening Transcript, ChapBook, Commercial Advertiser, Criterion, Critic, Forum, Independent, Literary World, Literary Miscellany, New York Times, Progress, Saturday Night, and the World.

Carman had a solid reputation as a readable columnist and critic, and many of his efforts were assembled in his lifetime in four collections. The Poetry of Life (1905) is the most representative collection, as it displays the variety of his work and contains some of his best writing. These collections do not contain all of Carman's prose, and a large number of his best pieces (especially his reviews) are today uncollected newspaper clippings in Canadian archives. Work is under way to collect and republish a larger selection from all of Carman's prose.

Carman was a professional, journalistic writer who well understood that his popular audience would not stand for longwindedness, tonal dullness, obscurity of reference, or elaborate theoretical postures. He was an entertaining, cheerful writer, an excellent popular philosopher, and a good scholar who included his scholarly interests in an entertaining, or at least agile, way. He could write about the most potentially banal of topics (the history of the human foot, for example) with a natural intelligence, charm, and wit. He was highly conscious of the limitations of magazine journalism, and once said in a column that "The beauty of style is like the beauty of nature, achieved through infinite care of results, with infinite carelessness of time. The successes of journalism are achieved through infinite care of time, with infinite carelessness of the manner in which results are expressed" ("The Modern Athenian: A Note on Style," 1896). He challenged and provoked his audience as much as possible, within the constraints of popular taste.

As a social critic his efforts ranged from essays advocating socialism and commenting on the moral shame of American imperialism through to his sometimes missionary-like advocacy of mind cure and self-development. He was a vigorous apologist for all sorts of improving spiritual activities (e.g. meditation, nature observation, dance, art and poetry appreciation), and some of his essays had their origin as lectures he gave when on cross-country tours in both Canada and the United States. His audience was more American than Canadian, so his comments on modern society are focused primarily on the American scene. He saw modern American culture as essentially mechanical, soulless, and mentally unhealthy. His readings of Romantic, transcendentalist, and Victorian authors, of advocates of Unitarianism like François Delsarte, and of philosophers such as Josiah Royce and George Santayana (the latter both professors of his when he attended Harvard University), inspired him to write innumerable popular essays in moral philosophy in which he spoke against the distractions of materialism and on behalf of the antidote value of spiritual cultivation. Just as much of his poetry has a proto-hippie ring to it, most of his prose falls within the broadly mystical, curative, and countercultural aims of current New Age writing. His progressive ideas and attitudes give to his prose a very contemporary quality.

Carman always wrote from a solid core of common sense, and this prevented his mind-cure writing from the worst excesses of avuncularity, while it stabilized his literary criticism with a likable tone and a convincing, durable set of aesthetic standards. He could be tough-minded in his reviews of his contemporaries, but most of his works of literary criticism were idealistic, appreciative essays advocating the poets and literary movements he saw as most fit to answer the soullessness of Victorian and impending modern times. He wrote general essays on literary criticism itself, on the artist's role in society, and on the relationships between religion and art. In such pieces he often showed a generous and nicely explorative temperament as an advocate of "the masters and sustainers of the spiritual life, the seers and prophets, but the loving skeptics as well" ("Marginal Notes: Scribes and Pharisees," 1899). As a theorist he commonly reminded himself and others to hold all literary "doctrines lovingly but lightly" ("The Artist and His Critic," 1897). He was a dialogic rather than an authoritarian critic.

Most of Carman's literary criticism advocates the work of the Romantics and the transcendentalist writers, but as editor, with Richard Hovey, of Chap-Book during the 1890s, he became aware of various manifestations of symbolist art and loudly advocated that tradition of writing as he saw it manifested in writers as otherwise diverse as Stephen Crane, Emily Dickinson, Maurice Maeterlinck, and William Butler Yeats. Carman is commonly seen as a straightbackwardly moving writer because of his scorn for the ironic mode, and he was to write that in his view, "Evil is the irony of the universe, the giant sarcasm of existence, the titanic gibe in the teeth of good" ("The Modern Athenian"). Consequently, he appears anti-Modernist in his literary tastes, but his vigorous and very expressive advocacy of the symbolist tradition inspires some of his best critical essays and demonstrates that he understood an affinity between the symbolist writers' aim to "create a sacred book" ("Marginal Notes," 1898) and the more mystical compulsions of emerging Modernism.

Carman's literary criticism was aimed at a popular audience and was clearly and thoughtfully written. It remains highly readable today because of its social progressiveness, its centrality in the literary-critical milieu of North America at the turn of the century, and as prose written by a sage who as a popular writer did not permit himself to become a hack.

TERRY WHALEN

Biography

William Bliss Carman. Cousin of the poet and fiction writer Charles G.D.Roberts and distant relative of Ralph Waldo Emerson. Born 15 April 1861 in Fredericton, New Brunswick. Studied at the University of New Brunswick, Fredericton, B.A. in Latin and Greek, 1881, M.A. in English literature, 1884; Oxford University and Edinburgh University, 1882–83; Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1886–88. Remained a "genteel vagabond" and bachelor all his life. Lived mostly in the United States, working as a literary journalist for journals and magazines in New York and Boston; traveled extensively in both North America and Europe. Cofounding editor, Chap-Book, from 1894. Met Mary Perry King, who became his patron and lifelong friend, 1896. Awards: Lorne Pierce Medal, 1928; many honorary degrees. Died (of a heart seizure) in New Canaan, Connecticut, 8 June 1929.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

The Kinship of Nature, 1903

The Friendship of Art, 1904

The Poetry of Life, 1905

The Making of Personality, 1908

Other writings: many volumes of poetry (including Low Tide on Grand Pré: A Book of Lyrics, 1893; Vagabondia series, with Richard Hovey, 1894–1900; Ballads and Lyrics, 1902, revised edition, 1923; Sappho: One Hundred Lyrics, 1903; Sanctuary: Sunshine House Sonnets, 1929), broadsheets, lyrical pageants, and correspondence (including in Letters, edited by H.Pearson Gundy, 1981, and Bliss Carman's Letters to Margaret Lawrence 1927–1929, edited by D.M.R.Bentley, 1995).

Bibliography

Sorfleet, John R., "A Primary and Secondary Bibliography of Bliss Carman's Work," in Bliss Carman: A Reappraisal, edited by Gerald Lynch, Ottawa: University of Ottawa Press, 1990

Further Reading

Bentley, D.M.R., "Carman and Mind Cure: Theory and Technique," in Bliss Carman: A Reappraisal, edited by Gerald Lynch, Ottawa: University of Ottawa Press, 1990

Sorfleet, John R., Introduction to The Poems of Bliss Carman, Toronto: McClelland and Stewart, 1976

Whalen, Terry, Bliss Carman and His Works, Downsview, Ontario: ECW Press, 1983

Whalen, Terry, "Carman as Critic," in Bliss Carman: A Reappraisal, edited by Gerald Lynch, Ottawa: University of Ottawa Press, 1990

Castellanos, Rosario

Mexican, 1925–1974

Despite meeting an untimely death in 1974, Rosario Castellanos left her readers a sizeable legacy: 12 books of poetry, three novels (one unpublished), three volumes of short stories, several plays, and four collections of essays. Lifelong friend Oscar Bonifaz explains in Remembering Rosario (1990) that Castellanos, best known initially for her poetry, was encouraged by her colleagues to explore additional outlets for her creative and socially conscious talent. Under these auspices, Castellanos' most productive period of prose writing occurred while she was working on her prize-winning second novel, Oficio de tinieblas (1962; The Book of Lamentations), which is considered by many to be her masterpiece. In fact, the years following the writing of The Book of Lamentations reflect a marked change in her writing: where alienation, loneliness, and melancholy were key elements in her early poetry, later literary works are characterized by irony, humor, and wit, as if she had arrived at some point of inner peace.

It is through her craft as an essayist that this development is especially evident. Like many fellow writers, Castellanos was a journalist as well as an author, contributing articles regularly to Mexican newspapers (Novedades [News], ¡Siempre! [Always], and Excelsior) and periodicals (Revista de la Universidad de Mexico [University of Mexico review] and La Palabra y el Hombre [The word and the man]). Many of these are included in Castellanos' collections: Juicios sumarios (1966; Summary judgments), Mujer que sabe latín... (1973; A woman who knows Latin...), El uso de la palabra (1974; The use of the word), and El mar y sus pescaditos (1975; The sea and its little fish). There are also more than 100 uncollected essays.

In this particular genre Castillos cultivates an intimate space in which to discuss a variety of topics, characterized by frequent interior dialogues with her readers in which she shares particular insights or confidences. According to colleague and confidant Emilio Carbadillo, Castellanos' stylistic evolution was due to the relative anonymity of the reading public, which provided her with a "safe" venue in which to reveal perspectives previously stifled by her characteristic reserve. To this assertion Myralyn F. Allgood (1990) adds that Castellanos' reading public was highly receptive, as she was already a household name, synonymous with prize-winning novels, short stories, and poetry. Both Carbadillo and Allgood echo what the author herself describes in "El escritor como periodista" (1972; The writer as journalist), in which she muses about what would have happened had she remained in the "limbo" of her own private world of poetry. She likens her essay style to a spontaneous conversation with friends, finding herself comfortable with the notion of chatting with her reading public as an anonymous and multiple "you."

This is not to say her topics are necessarily informal. With humor and often biting irony, Castellanos' essays address what she considered transcendent truths across personal, social, political, and feminist lines. Her first collection, Juicios sumarios, reveals the strong intellectual influence of existentialist Simone de Beauvoir, social and religious thinker Simone Weil, and literary figures Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz, Gabriela Mistral, Emily Dickinson, and Virginia Woolf. In this volume, Castellanos problematizes specific philosophical positions with regard to social issues.

If Juicios sumarios indicates an interest in "cultural ideology and gender" (Allgood), her next collection, Mujer que sabe latín ..., "argues an overtly feminist viewpoint" (Naomi Lindstrom, 1980). Lindstrom posits that this collection reflects thoughts on the status of women and indicates a future for feminist criticism by superseding the simple denunciation and specific grievances so popular in her time, most notably by contextualizing woman's experience in order to re-examine specific gender roles, as in "Las amistades peligrosas" (1973; Dangerous liaisons). Bonifaz states that her focus is primarily the condition of woman in Mexican culture. This may be the case in "La mujer mexicana del siglo 19" (1973; "19th-Century Mexican Woman"), in which Castellanos describes how myth keeps women marginalized within the culture and history of Mexico (Maureen Ahern, 1988). However, her discussion of the symbiotic relationship between the oppressed and the oppressor in “La participación de la mujer mexicana en la educación formal” (1973; The participation of the Mexican woman in formal education) could well describe a more universal social condition. According to Ahern, this is especially apparent in “La mujer y su imagen” (1973; “Woman and Her Image”), in which Castellanos refutes the idea of biological determinism by way of a parody of scientific language.

The generalizability of Castellanos’ themes seem to increase in El uso de la palabra, a collection compiled posthumously by José Emilio Pacheco, and including essays from the period 1963 to 1974. The topics span commentaries on local and current events as well as personal and professional issues. In all cases, Castellanos illuminates that transcendent kernel of truth for her readers with humor and irony. In “Una propiedad privada” (1969; Private property), she analyzes the social and psychological constructs behind a father’s murder of his sons. In later essays, Castellanos reveals a deeply personal facet, for example in “Anticipación a la nostalgia” (1971; Anticipating nostalgia), in which she confronts the sense of loss with regard to good friends and Mexico. Her experiences as a mother surface as well, for instance in “Mundo de cambios” (1973; World of changes), where a single incident with her son leads her to extrapolate on the experience of motherhood as a whole. On a lighter note, her irascible humor with regard to her role as a diplomat is revealed in “La diplomacia al desnudo” (1974; “Sheer Diplomacy”), where diplomatic subtleties are reduced to one simple recommendation: weather as the suggested topic of conversation.

The last collection Castellanos submitted was received two days before her death. El mar y sus pescaditos was oriented toward literature, including critiques and reviews of Latin American writers and their works.

A review of the material written about Castellanos and her literary work reveals that the bulk of research deals with her novels and poetry as well as feminist thematics. However, her essays, short stories and theater, as well as the social and political themes interwoven in her texts, remain to be fully examined and contextualized. Rosario Castellanos was much more than a talented writer with a specific social agenda: she was diplomat, philosopher, mother, wife, social activist, intellectual, educator, and perhaps most importantly, an artist endowed with the unique ability to connect with her readership through her insightful writing.

JENNIFER FARRAR

Biography

Born 25 May 1925 in Mexico City. Studied at the College of Philosophy and Letters, National Autonomous University of Mexico, Mexico City, 1944–50, M.A. in philosophy, 1950; University of Madrid, 1950–51. Director of cultural programs, 1951–53, and staff member, Institute of Arts and Sciences, both in Tuxtla Gutiérrez, Chiapas. Director, El Teatro Guñol/Petul (puppet theater) for the National Indigenist Institute, San Cristóbal, 1956–59, and toured Chiapas, 1956–58. Married Ricardo Guerra, 1958 (later divorced):

one son. Journalist for various newspapers and periodicals, including Novedades, ¡Siempre!, and Excélsior, 1960–74. Press and information director, 1960–66, and chair of comparative literature, 1967–71, National Autonomous University of Mexico, Mexico City; visiting professor of Latin American literature at various American universities, 1967. Ambassador to Israel, Tel Aviv, and lecturer in Latin American literature, Hebrew University, Jerusalem, 1971–74. Awards: Mexican Critics' Award, for novel, 1957; Chiapas Prize, 1958; Xavier Villaurrutia Prize, 1961; Woman of the Year Award, Mexico, 1967. Died (by accidental electrocution) in Tel Aviv, 7 August 1974.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Juicios sumarios, 1966; revised edition, as Juicios sumarios: Ensayos sobre literatura, 2 vols., 1984

Mujer que sabe latín..., 1973

El uso de la palabra, edited by José Emilio Pacheco and Danubio Torres Fierro, 1974

El mar y sus pescaditos, 1975

A Rosario Castellanos Reader (includes short stories, poetry, and essays), edited by Maureen Ahern, translated by Ahern and others, 1988

Another Way to Be: Selected Works (includes poetry, essays, and stories), edited and translated by Myralyn F. Allgood, 1990

Other writings: two novels (Balún-Canán [The Nine Guardians], 1957; Oficio de tinieblas [The Book of Lamentations], 1962), short stories, poetry, and plays.

Collected works edition: Obras, edited by Eduardo Mejía, 1989– (in progress).

Bibliographies

Ahern, Maureen, in Spanish American Women Writers: A BioBibliographical Source Book, edited by Diane E. Marting, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1990

Foster, David William, in Mexican Literature: A Bibliography of Secondary Sources, Metuchen, New Jersey: Scarecrow Press, 1992

Further Reading

Ahern, Maureen, Introduction to A Rosario Castellanos Reader, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1988

Allgood, Myralyn F., Introduction to Another Way to Be by Castellanos, Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1990

Anderson, Helene, "Rosario Castellanos and the Structures of Power," in Contemporary Women Authors of Latin America, edited by Doris Meyer and Margarite Fernández Olmos, New York: Brooklyn College Press, 2 vols., 1983

Bonifaz, Oscar, Rosario, Mexico City: Presencia Latinoamericana, 1984

Bonifaz, Oscar, Remembering Rosario: A Personal Glimpse into the Life and Works of Rosario Castellanos, Potomac, Maryland: Scripta Humanística, 1990

- Cordero, Dolores, "Rosario Castellanos: 'La mujer mexicana, cómplice de su verdugo,'" Revista de Revistas, supplement to Excelsior (10 November 1971):24–27
- Cresta de Leguizamón, María Luisa, "En recuerdo de Rosario Castellanos," La Palabra y el Hombre 19 (July-September 1976): 3–18
- Dybvig, Rhoda, Rosario Castellanos, biografía y novelística, Mexico City: Andrea, 1965
- Franco, Jean, The Modern Culture of Latin America: Society and the Artist, London: Pall Mall Press, 1967
- Franco, Jean, Spanish American Literature Since Independence, London: Benn, and New York: Barnes and Noble, 1973
- Gómez Parham, Mary, "Intellectual Influences on the Works of Rosario Castellanos," Foro Literario: Revista de Literatura y Lenguaje 7, no. 12 (1984):34–40
- González Peña, Carlos, History of Mexican Literature, Dallas: Southern Methodist University Press, 1969 (original Mexican edition, 1940)
- Lindstrom, Naomi, Rosario Castellanos: Pioneer of Feminist Criticism, edited by Maureen Ahern and Mary S. Vásquez, Valencia: Albatros Hispanófila, 1980
- Miller, Beth, "Women and Feminism in the Works of Rosario Castellanos," in Feminist Criticism: Essays on Theory, Poetry and Prose, edited by Cheryl L. Brown and Karen Olson, Metuchen, New Jersey: Scarecrow Press, 1978
- Miller, Beth, editor, Women in Hispanic Literature, Icons and Fallen Idols, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1983
- Poniatowska, Elena, "¡Te hicieron parque, Rosario!," Revista de Bellas Artes 18 (November-December 1971):2
- Poniatowska, Elena, "Rosario Castellanos, las letras que quedan de tu nombre," La Cultura en Mexico, supplement to ¡Siempre!, 4 September 1974:6–8
- Ruta, Suzanne, "Adiós, Machismo: Rosario Castellanos Goes Her Own Way," Latin American Literary Review, 6 no. II (Fall-Winter 1977):68–80
- Urbano, Victoria E., "La justicia femenina de Rosario Castellanos," Letras Femeninas 1, no. 2 (1975):9–20
- Vásquez, Mary S., "Rosario Castellanos, Image and Idea," in Homenaje a Rosario Castellanos, edited by Maureen Ahern and Mary S. Vásquez, Valencia: Albatros Hispanófila, 1980

Castro, Américo

Spanish, 1885–1972

Américo Castro continued the intellectual tradition of Francisco Giner de los Ríos and the Krausists—followers of the philosophy of Karl Friedrich Christian Krause, a movement begun in Madrid by Sanz del Río in 1868—as well as that of Miguel de Unamuno, example par excellence of the Generation of 1898. The recurrent self-reflections on the Spanish character are characteristic of the period that begins with the Generation of '98. A renewed concept of what Spain is—its reinvention, as we would say today—becomes part of the themes treated not only in the essay (by Ángel Ganivet, Miguel de Unamuno, José Ortega y Gasset, Pedro Laín Entralgo) but in poetry as well (Antonio Machado). The Spanish reality, present or historic, becomes part of the Spanish essay of the time, be it erudite, scientific, polemic, or political in nature.

Américo Castro wrote essays exclusively, with two clearly distinguishable periods in his work, the first phase encompassing essays of literary criticism with a rigorous philological base, the second stage containing his contributions to historiography. The well-defined periods of his work correlate with circumstances, Castro writing the former before the Spanish Civil War and the latter while already in exile and teaching at Princeton University. It is there, and in the subsequent period until his death, that his work reaches full fruition. Nevertheless, in spite of this chronological division, there is a unity in his work.

Before 1936 Castro's work centered on literary figures of the Spanish Golden Age (Lope de Vega, Tirso de Molina, Quevedo, St. Teresa), a study of Cervantes that he later partially repudiated, Erasmus, and theme studies on the concept of honor and the Don Juan figure in Spanish literature. From 1940, and without abandoning essays on literary criticism, Castro began concentrating more and more on themes dealing with historiography: the meaning of Spanish civilization, Ibero-America, Erasmus in Spain, Castile, the concept of historiography, St. James of Galicia, the nature and existence of being Spanish. All these issues culminate in his monumental book España en su historia: Cristianos, moros y judíos (1948; Spain in its history: Christians, Moors and Jews), a revised version entitled La realidad histórica de España (1954; The Structure of Spanish History), and The Spaniards: An Introduction to Their History (1971), fundamental contributions to a new approach to the study of Spanish historiography which in his day provoked heated debate and controversy. To this day Castro's theory has both followers and opponents, but no serious study of Spanish historiography can ignore it.

The first stage of Castro's work is an attempt to place Spanish Erasmists, Cervantes, Lope de Vega, St. Teresa, Quevedo, and Golden Age drama as well as the picaresque novel within the universal European literary movements. The historiographical essays of the second phase deal with the historic meaning of culture through interpretations of Spanish culture on aesthetic and philosophical bases. While using the philological-scientific methods learned with his master Ramón Menéndez Pidal, Castro is influenced by the ideology of Ortega y Gasset and his vitalist philosophy, by new currents of German thought (the philologist Karl Vossler, the philosopher Wilhelm Dilthey), and by other European thinkers (Oswald Spengler, A.J. Toynbee).

Castro acknowledges his work to be a continuation of the Generation of '98 and states first in España en su historia and then in The Structure of Spanish History his intention to be the rendition of "an intellection of what Spain is at present and has been in the past," thus enabling him "to penetrate the entrails of Spanish life." The point of departure is human history, human actions within the life where they happen and where they exist. His postulates originate with concrete and specific facts of life, and then are considered in the generic and universal background of humanity. To that effect he coins his own terminology to express his ideological position: the "vividura" (living or functional context), the "morada vital" (historical dwelling place), the "vivir desviviéndose" (living by denying the reality of one's existence).

Castro proposes not to study the Spanish past but first to establish the peculiarities that are distinctive of the Spanish way of life, that differentiate Spaniards from other peoples, and then to explain the causes of such differences. He believes that the essence of that peculiarity and distinctiveness rests in the medieval cohabitation in the Iberian Peninsula of Christians, Moors, and Jews, called the three castes by Castro. The manner of living was formed in the 8th century when Islam became a presence in the peninsula, while the consciousness of being a Spaniard originated in the 10th and 11th centuries. Hence Viriato, Seneca, and St. Isidore, reputed by many to be Spaniards, for Castro are merely inhabitants of what we call Spain.

The term “morada vital,” an original metaphor of Castro’s and the center of his theory, is not unrelated to Unamuno’s concept of “intrahistoria” (a spiritual history underlying the conventional body of historical data). Ortega y Gasset refers to “the innermost abode of Spaniards” but it is Castro who gives to his term the meaning of a “horizon of possibilities and obstacles—internal and external—that confront our lives.” In Castro the “historical dwelling place” is related to el estar (to be in a given place) and not to el ser (the essence of being).

As expected, his theories became the center of controversy with supporters (Marcel Bataillon, Laín Entralgo) as well as opponents, the most prominent being Claudio Sánchez Albornoz, who wrote España, un enigma histórico (1956; Spain, an historic enigma) as a rebuttal to Castro’s The Structure of Spanish History. There is no doubt that the polemic generated from Castro’s work is one of the most significant in the history of Spanish thought.

Castro’s essays are exploratory in nature but scholarly in form, solidly based in the methodologies of a philologist, conveying both information and the author’s thought and experience. His literary interpretation follows the lines of the Spanish Krausists, with an emphasis on order and progress and a questioning based on reason and documented in science. The structure of the essay is expository as well as argumentative since Castro, in addressing his reader, aims to inform and convince. To that effect he resorts to textual verification in his quest to get the reader to accept his viewpoint.

Castro subjects himself to continual self-examination, constantly going back to previous work in order to submit it to rigorous self-criticism, and at times the reflection serves as a point of departure for a new interpretation. Aware that language is an important tool, he searches to improve his work with more vigorous and exact use of such a critical vehicle.

PILAR G.SÁENZ

Biography

Américo Castro Quesada. Born 4 May 1885 in Cantagalo, Brazil. Family moved to Granada, Spain, 1889. Studied at the University of Granada, arts degree, 1904; the Sorbonne, Paris, 1905–08; Center for Historical Studies, University of Madrid, Ph.D. in history, 1911; Institución Libre de Enseñanza. Married Carmen Medinabeitia. Contributor, Revista de Filología (Philological review), from 1914, and El Sol (The sun), from 1923. Chair of the history of Spanish language, University of Madrid, 1915–36. Toured and lectured in South America and the United States, 1923–24; visiting professor, University of Berlin, 1930–31. Cofounder, International University of Santander, 1933. Left Spain during the Civil War: lived briefly in Argentina, then in United States, where he taught at the Universities of Wisconsin and Texas, then as Emory L.Ford Chair of Spanish, Princeton University, New Jersey, 1940–53; visiting professor at various American universities; post-retirement appointment at University of California San Diego, La Jolla, 1964–68. Returned to live in Madrid, 1969. Awards: honorary degrees from five universities. Officer, Legion of Honor (France); Member, Argentine Academy of Letters. Died (of a seizure while swimming) in Lloret de Mar, Girona, 25 July 1972.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Lengua, enseñanza y literatura, 1924

Santa Teresa y otros ensayos, 1929; as Teresa la Santa; Gracián y los separatismos; con otros ensayos, 1972

España en su historia: Cristianos, moros y judíos, 1948; revised edition as La realidad histórica de España, 1954; as The Structure of Spanish History, translated by Edmund L.King, 1954

Ensayo de historiología: Analogías y diferencias entre hispanos y musulmanes, 1950

Dos ensayos: Descripción, narración, historiografía; Discrepancias y mal entender, 1956

The Spaniards: An Introduction to Their History, translated by Willard F.King and Selma Margaretten, 1971

An Idea of History: Selected Essays, edited and translated by Stephen Gilman and Edmund L.King, 1977

Other writings: works about Spanish history and literature.

Bibliography

Brent, Albert, and Robert Kirsner, "A Bibliography of the Writings of Américo Castro," in Américo Castro: The Impact of His Thought: Essays to Mark the Centenary of His Birth, edited by Ronald E.Surtz, Jaime Ferrán, and Daniel P.Testa, Madison, Wisconsin: Hispanic Seminary of Medieval Studies, 1988

Further Reading

Araya, Guillermo, El pensamiento de Américo Castro, Madrid: Alianza, 1983

Brancaforte, Benito, "Américo Castro and Michel Foucault's 'Filosofía del sospecho'," in Hispanic Studies in Honor of Joseph H.Silverman, edited by Joseph V.Ricapito, Newark, Delaware: Juan de la Cuesta, 1988:371–79

Garagorri, Paulino, "Un mitoclasta nacional: En torno a la tarea desmitificadora de Américo Castro," Revista de Occidente 41, no. 4 (1966):234–44

García Gabaldón, Jesús, "Makbara, espacio de encuentros," La Torre 15, no. 4 (1990):353–60

Gómez Martínez, José Luis, Américo Castro y el origen de los españoles: Historia de una polémica, Madrid: Gredos, 1975

Hornik, M.P., editor, Collected Studies in Honour of Américo Castro's Eightieth Year,

Oxford: Lincombe Lodge Research Library, 1965

Insula issue in honor of Castro (1973)

King, Willard, "Américo Castro y Lope de Vega," Boletín Real Academia Española 68, no. 243 (1988):169–75

Laín Entralgo, Pedro, editor, Estudios sobre la obra de Américo Castro, Madrid: Taurus, 1971

Marichal, Juan, Teoría e historia del ensayismo hispánico, Madrid: Alianza, 1984

Martin, Marina, "Juan Goytisolo en deuda con Américo Castro: Reivindicación del Conde don Julián," Letras Peninsulares 2, no. 2 (1989):211–23

Peña, Aniano, Américo Castro y su vision de España y de Cervantes, Madrid: Gredos, 1975

Pi-Sunyer, Oriol, "The Historiography of Américo Castro: An Anthropological Interpretation," Bulletin of Hispanic Studies 49 (1972):40–50

Rubia Barcia, José, editor, Américo Castro and the Meaning of Spanish Civilization, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1976

Sánchez-Albornoz y Mendiña, Claudio, España, un enigma histórico, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 2 vols., 1956

Sotomayor, Carmen, Una lectura orientalista de Juan Goytisolo, Madrid: Fundamentos, 1990

Surtz, Ronald E., Jaime Ferrán, and Daniel P. Testa, editors, Américo Castro: The Impact of His Thought: Essays to Mark the Centenary of His Birth, Madison, Wisconsin: Hispanic Seminary of Medieval Studies, 1988

Varela, Javier, "La tragedia de los intelectuales y la historiografía de Américo Castro," Insula 48, no. 563 (1993):20–22

Cattaneo, Carlo

Italian, 1801–1869

Carlo Cattaneo, principally known for the active role he played as leader of the War Council during the revolutionary "Five Days" of Milan in 1848, which he related in his highly personal account Dell'insurrezione di Milano nel 1848 (1848; Of the insurrection in Milan in 1848), has recently been rediscovered as one of the most original thinkers of his day and a precursor of positivist philosophy in Italy. He was one of the most dynamic figures in the cultural life of Lombardy, and Milan in particular, during the period of the Risorgimento.

His first articles were published in the Annali di Statistica (Statistical annals) and the Bollettino di Notizie Statistiche (Bulletin of statistical notices), two journals founded by the philosopher and jurist Giandomenico Romagnosi, who taught Cattaneo, and whose influence was considerable in shaping Lombard culture at the turn of the 18th and 19th centuries. Already in these early works, which explore topics in the field of social sciences, it is possible to detect the influence on Cattaneo of Milanese Enlightenment thinking, which, in the previous century, had permeated the social and administrative fabric of the Lombard-Venetian kingdom.

In 1839, after years of effort, he obtained permission from the Austrian rulers to edit his own journal, called Il Politecnico. The first series ran until 1844. In the preface to the first number, Cattaneo clearly stated that the aim of his journal was to further the study of all sciences, in particular applied sciences, in order to promote social progress. His “reviews,” a genre which aimed to inform and educate the public by expounding the most up-to-date ideas, covered a variety of subjects, even though his main interests were economics, history, and literature. His aim was to make Milanese culture less provincial by opening it up to all streams of contemporary debate, and more particularly to the new thinking on economics. This renewal of intellectual life in the capital was intended to modernize the Lombard state, “to free it from many of the anti-scientific opinions in agriculture, public economy, religion and everyday life” (preface to Il Politecnico). The Politecnico cultivated a vigorous dialogue with the mainstream of European thinking in a deliberate attempt to break away from the narrowly academic and humanistic tradition of Italian culture in favor of a more positive engagement with studies of a scientific and technical nature.

The journal was directed at a middle-class public with a sound literary and scientific background. Occasionally, Cattaneo also wrote on arti belle—the theater, opera, painting, architecture, and literature. In these pieces, which were often several pages long and possessed the style and authority of literary essays, Cattaneo sought to demonstrate the interdependence between artistic form and social reality, between literature and life. While recognizing that the creative process was distinct from the rational and practical, he asserted that art, as the expression of beauty, ennobled the human spirit and constituted the most sublime ingredient of social existence. Although his ideas on art and literature were influenced by the Romantics, whose major exponents had lived and worked in Milan a few years earlier, Cattaneo’s philosophy was closer to the Enlightenment, and also to Giambattista Vico, whose work, La scienza nuova (1725; The New Science), he had studied in depth. Utilizing Vico’s ideas, Cattaneo developed his theory that the study of history does not produce merely passive knowledge of the past. Through the investigation of the complex relationship between the individual, his culture, and civilization, and an examination of the “istoria delle idee dei popoli” (history of ideas of the people), it deepens our understanding of human nature. Thus his philosophy is “una filosofia della istoria” (philosophy of history) aimed at discovering the laws of human progress and, through them, enhancing our capacity to shape events; philosophy is a “scola pratica” (school of practice) and has a primarily social role (“La scienza nuova,” Il Politecnico, 1839).

The last reviews in the Politecnico dealt with the problem of the Italian language, a live issue which Cattaneo shared with all the intellectuals of his day. Against the classicists, who proposed a national language derived from popular Florentine dialect, Cattaneo, while recognizing the immense contribution of Dante’s works to Italian literature, puts forward the case for a language which, far from being archaic and academic, should be clear and comprehensible to the majority of the population, but also suitable for expressing elevated concepts.

After winding up the first series of the Politecnico, Cattaneo found more time to dedicate to his geographical articles, which he wrote for Il Crepuscolo (Twilight), a Milanese journal published by Carlo Tenca. He also completed his historical work, Introduzione alle notizie culturali e civili su la Lombardia (1844; Introduction to cultural and civic events in Lombardy), a book which, in the words of Mario Fubini in Romanticismo italiano (1965), celebrates the social, economic, and cultural history of Milan and which, together with his La città considerata come il principio ideale delle istorie italiane (1858; The town considered as the ideal principle of Italian history), provides a clear outline of his vision of a unified and federal Italy.

The main objective of the second series of the Politecnico, which was published immediately on the departure of the Austrians from Lombardy in 1859 and continued until 1864, was to influence the new ruling classes in Italy in supporting scientific progress throughout the newly formed nation. The new Politecnico published mainly economic and technical material, with a few exceptions, for example the now famous literary essay on “Ugo Foscolo e l’Italia” (1860; Ugo Foscolo and Italy), an impassioned defense of the Romantic poet, and a grateful acknowledgment of his undisputed influence on the whole generation that participated in the Risorgimento.

Through his writings, Cattaneo played a crucial role in the development of nationalist ideas throughout Northern Italy. His style, compared by M. Balestrieri in his Antologia della letteratura italiana (1967) to that of the Latin historian Tacitus for his concise paragraphs and the clarity of his “istoriche e sperimentali” (historical and scientific) descriptions, is closely associated with a need for intelligibility and rationality. In this respect, it reflects the position he holds as a transitional figure between the humanistic orientation of the early protagonists of the Risorgimento and the later development of a more technical approach rooted in the social sciences.

VANNA MOTTA

Biography

Born 15 June 1801 in Milan. Studied at a seminary near Milan; Liceo Sant’Alessandro, Milan, from 1817; law courses taught privately by Giandomenico Romagnosi, 1820–21; law degree granted from the University of Pavia, 1824. Taught in public schools, Milan, 1820–35. Contributor to various journals, including Annali di Statistica, from 1828; legal adviser for Società degli Editori (Society of publishers), early 1830s. Married Anna Woodcock, 1835. Legal advisor, then secretary, Società della Strada Ferrata Venezia a Milano (Society for the Venice-Milan railroad), from 1837. Cofounder and editor, Il Politecnico, 1839–44 and 1859–64. Leader in the Five Days of Milan march during the revolutionary uprising of 1848. Fled to Switzerland, August 1848, then Paris, then back to Switzerland, living permanently in Castagnola, near Lugano; became a Swiss citizen, 1859. Died in Castagnola, 5 February 1869.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Scritti politici ed epistolario, edited by Gabriele Rosa and Jessie White Mario, 3 vols., 1892–1901

Saggi di economia rurale, edited by Luigi Einaudi, 1939

Scritti letterari, artistici, linguistici e vari, edited by Agostino Bertani, 2 vols., 1948

Scritti critici, edited by Mario Fubini, 1954

Scritti economici, edited by Alberto Bertolino, 3 vols., 1956

Scritti storici e geografici, edited by Gaetano Salvemini and Ernesto Sestan, 4 vols., 1957

Scritti filosofici, letterari e vari, edited by Franco Alessio, 1957

Scritti filosofici, edited by Norberto Bobbio, 3 vols., 1960

Scritti politici, edited by Mario Boneschi, 4 vols., 1964–65

Scritti filosofici, edited by Alfredo Saloni, 1965

Scritti sulla Lombardia, edited by Giuseppe Anceschi and Giuseppe Armani, 2 vols., 1971

Antologia degli scritti politici, edited by Giuseppe Galasso, 1978

Scritti letterari, edited by Piero Treves, 2 vols., 1981

Scritti su Milano e la Lombardia, edited by Ettore Mazzali, 1990

Other writings: La città considerata come il principio ideale delle istorie italiane (1858), a history of Lombardy (1844), and a book on the 1848 uprising.

Collected works edition: Opere inedite, edited by Agostino Bertani, 7 vols., 1881–92.

Bibliography

Brignoli, Marziano, and Danilo L. Massagrande, Bibliografia degli scritti su Carlo Cattaneo (1836–1987), Florence: Le Monnier, 1988

Further Reading

Ambrosoli, L., “Giuseppe Mazzini e Carlo Cattaneo dal Risorgimento all’unità,” Belfagor 24 (1969)

Angelini, Cesare, Nostro Ottocento: Foscolo, Monti, Leopardi, Cattaneo, Carducci, Lettere di Domenico Gnoli, Bologna: Boni, 1970

Della Peruta, Franco, Conservatori, liberali e democratici nel Risorgimento, Milan: Angeli, 1989

Della Peruta, Franco, Milano nel Risorgimento, Milan: La Storia, 1992

Fubini, Mario, “Introduzione alla lettura del Cattaneo” and “Gli scritti letterari di Carlo Cattaneo,” in his Romanticismo italiano, Bari: Laterza, 1965

Galante Garrone, Alessandro, and Franco Della Peruta, La stampa italiana del Risorgimento, Rome/Bari: Laterza, 1978

Gobetti, Piero, “Cattaneo” (1922), in his Scritti storici, letterari e filosofici, edited by P. Spriano, Turin: Einaudi, 1960

Maturi, Walter, “La scuola democratica: Carlo Cattaneo,” in his Interpretazioni del Risorgimento, Turin: Einaudi, 1962

Salvemini, Gaetano, Preface to Scritti storici e geografici by Cattaneo, Florence: Le Monnier, 1957

Sestan, Ernesto, editor, Romagnosi, Cattaneo, Ferrari, Milan and Naples: Classici Ricciardi, 1957

Voza, Pasquale, Letteratura e rivoluzione passiva: Mazzini, Cattaneo, Tenca, Bari: Dedalo, 1978

Woolf, Stuart, The Italian Risorgimento, London: Longman, and New York: Barnes and Noble, 1969

Chacel, Rosa

Spanish, 1898–1994

Rosa Chacel's works, essays and fiction, share a common discursive tone: logical, measured, dispassionate, abstract, and clear. Chacel studied painting and sculpture before turning to literature, and artistic preoccupations characterize her writing as a whole. This widely traveled, cosmopolitan Modernist was influenced by James Joyce (fiction) and José Ortega y Gasset (essays and thought); other significant writers included Goethe, Jaspers, Rilke, Nietzsche, Kierkegaard, and Freud.

Chacel began writing essays on literature, art, and culture in the 1920s, in the heady atmosphere of vanguardism, and continued during the Spanish Civil War, when she contributed several articles to the wartime republican periodical Hora de España (Spain's hour). Notwithstanding her republican sympathies, she was convinced of the superiority of things of the spirit and that aesthetics and ideology should remain separate; hence her writings have an ahistorical, detached quality seldom reflecting the circumstances of composition.

Chacel's first book of essays was a miscellaneous volume, Poesía de la circunstancia: Cómo y por qué de la novela (1958; Circumstantial poetry: how and why of the novel), followed by La confesión (1970; Confessions), in which Chacel examines the genre and attempts to respond to Ortega's query as to reasons for the scarcity of memoirs and confessional writing in Spanish. Seeking the fundamental condition of all confessions, she examines those she considers most important—St. Augustine (cf. Confessions), Rousseau, Kierkegaard—determining that the most dramatic ones are inspired by guilt, and are thus most truthful. Chacel applies “confessional” principles to a sui generis meditation on Cervantes, Galdós, and Unamuno, concluding that all of the latter's work is a huge, personified confession, while Don Quixote springs from the conclusion that to believe and love, one must be crazy. Special attention is given these writers' pronouncements on love, a major subtheme, as are reflections on contemporary life.

Chacel's longest and most significant work of nonfiction, Saturnal (1972; Saturnalia), was some four decades in the writing. Love constitutes the primary preoccupation, not as passion, charity, agape, or sexual attraction, but as unique poetic truth. Parting from the basic, unstated premise of sexual equality, Saturnal's more than 400 pages elaborate and extend an article first published in Revista de Occidente (Western review) in 1931, “Esquema de los actuales problemas prácticos del amor” (Outline of current practical problems of love). Chacel situates herself between the extremes represented by Denis de Rougemont's L'Amour et l'Occident (1939; Love in the Western World)—passionate love, mystic Christian overtones, and love-death—and Herbert Marcuse's Eros and Civilization (1955)—Freudian implications, Eros as vital impulse, economic factors as discouraging eroticism, death as fatigue. Chacel views love as a blend of the ideal, erotic, and sexual, adding existentialist tones and references to clearly existentialist sources (Kierkegaard, Camus, Unamuno).

Her discussion of relations between the sexes centers around attempts to isolate the essence of feminine psychology, resulting in the conclusion that its distinguishing characteristic is a deep, ancestral fear of rape on the level of the collective unconscious. Chacel discusses various feminists, noting specific divergences: Virginia Woolf, Simone de Beauvoir, the Spanish Countess of Campo Alange. She touches upon homosexuality, maternity, and prostitution, citing readings from Jung to Rosa Luxemburg and Madame Curie. Loosely following Ortega's theory of generations and his method of defining the sensibility of the times, she elucidates characteristics of her own generation, differentiating it from those before and after. For Chacel, one distinguishing "sign of the times" is the "unisex" phenomenon.

Deeply preoccupied with ethical dilemmas, she contemplates good and evil, tolerance, war, the "right to kill," and responsibility (which she believes all share equally). Chacel rejects the cliché blaming wars on men and viewing women as war's enemies, contending that tolerance allows wars to exist and women are to blame for passivity. Saturnal treats many marginal topics, related only most tangentially to the malefemale axis, such as the cinema, to which she accords special significance as a force shaping the modern mentality. She makes excursions into the plastic arts, contemporary painting—areas in which Chacel was very knowledgeable, as was her mentor, Ortega—and fashion. Her theories on love repeatedly parallel those of Ortega, and her readings frequently coincide with his, as she consults sources from Socrates, Plato, Ovid, and Quevedo to Bergson, Kierkegaard, Heidegger, and Freud. Chacel considers platonic love, the nature of beauty, immortality and eternity, good and evil, and several other dense, universal themes in the course of what amounts to an unfinished intellectual journey, expressed with clarity and precision. While the relationship between the sexes forms the axis around which everything else revolves, and sexual relationships are viewed as paradigmatic or symbolic of all others, Saturnal weaves a complex tapestry of topics. Only two acts are recognized as being the same for all: birth and death.

Chacel's writing, whether narrative, essay, or poetry, constitutes in its entirety a vehicle of self-discovery, an aesthetic quest centering around time as genesis of the word (logos), of life and memory and hence of autobiography, history, intimate dialogue, and all creative material. The writer—a pilgrim of illumination—travels toward light, form, truth, will-to-being, creating an aesthetics of rich expressiveness, seeking self-revelation in data extracted from the preconsciousness of time, before truth.

Los títulos (1981; Titles) contains selected articles by Chacel, but was not composed as a volume; nor was Rebañaduras (1986; Slices), a collection of 18 articles written between 1937 and the 1980s and divided into five thematic categories: 1) the feminine condition, love, and genesis; 2) Ortega y Gasset's significance in the 1920s, especially for Chacel's beginnings; 3) Spanish writers Quevedo, Sor Juana, Corpus Barga, and Justo Alejo (two baroque greats, two little-known contemporaries); 4) wartime articles from Hora de España; 5) Chacel's lecture presenting her book on her late husband, their meeting, and his art, Timoteo Pérez Rubio y sus retratos del jardín (1980; Timoteo Pérez Rubio and his portraits of the garden)—part tale, part dream, a strangely beautiful essay reflecting on the mechanisms of memory.

Chacel's novels are very essayistic, especially La sinrazón (1960; Unreason), whose protagonist is meditative, philosophical, preoccupied with truth, beauty, essence and form, time and eternity, pleasure and the forbidden, good and evil, the divine and the transitory, body and soul, faith and doubt, reason and passion, love and death. This most dense and complex of Chacel's novels presents multiple changes of genre—story, confession, essay, diary, autobiography—and treats the aesthetics of peril, will, life as a struggle between loves, love as dialogue, the problems of duplicity, doubt and suicide, and the metaphor of life as a road, with the necessity of choosing a destination.

Other books, of difficult classification, are both autobiographical and essayistic, dealing with the gestation of early works, Chacel's own intellectual formation and that of her generation: Desde el amanecer (1972; From dawn) and La lectura es secreto (1989; Reading is secret). Obsession with her point of origin, repetitive themes, autobiographical character, and constant stylistic rigor endow Chacel's works with unity despite diversity.

JANET PÉREZ

Biography

Rosa Arimón Chacel. Born 3 June 1898 in Valladolid. Studied at the Escuela de Artes y Oficios and Escuela Superior de Bellas Artes de San Fernando, Madrid, 1908–18. Married Timoteo Pérez Rubio, 1921 (died, 1977): one son. Lived in Italy, 1921–27, in France during the Spanish Civil War, 1936–39 and after, in Greece, and in Rio de Janeiro and Buenos Aires, 1940–77. Contributor, Revista de Occidente, Ultra, Caballo Verde para la Poesía (The green horse for poetry), El Mono Azul (The blue monkey), and Hora de España, 1927–36, and Sur, La Nación, and Realidad, 1939–60. Awards: two fellowships; National Critics' Prize, 1970, 1976; National Literature Prize, 1987; honorary degree from the University of Valladolid. Died in Madrid, 27 July 1994.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Poesía de la circunstancia: Cómo y por qué de la novela, 1958

La confesión, 1970

Saturnal, 1972

Desde el amanecer, 1972

Los títulos, edited by Clara Janés, 1981

Rebañaduras: Colección de artículos, edited by Moisés Mori, 1986

Memoria, narrativa y poetica de las presencias: Poesías, relatos, novelas y ensayos, 1988

La lectura es secreto, 1989

Other writings: seven novels (Estación, ida y vuelta, 1930; Teresa, 1941; Memorias de Leticia Valle [Memoirs of Leticia Valle], 1945; La sinrazón, 1960; Barrio de maravillas [The Maravillas District], 1976; Acrópolis, 1984; Ciencias naturales, 1988), two collections of short stories, poetry, diaries, autobiography, two volumes of memoirs (Alcancía: Ida and Alcancía: Vuelta, 1982), and a study of her husband's painting. Also translated works by Albert Camus and Jean Racine.

Collected works edition: Obras completas, 4 vols., 1989–(in progress).

Further Reading

- Beneyto, Antonio, "Rosa Chacel: Esencialmente un ser libre," in his Censura y política en los escritores españoles, Barcelona: Euros, 1975
- Bergés, Consuelo, "Rosa Chacel y la literatura responsable," Insula 183 (February 1961)
- Conte, Rafael, "La realidad de una escritora intelectual," El País, 30 January 1983
- Crispin, John, "Rosa Chacel y las 'Ideas sobre la novela'," Insula 262 (September 1968)
- Gimferrer, Pedro, "Una conciencia puesta en pie hasta el fin," ABC, 3 June 1988
- Herrero, F., "Ciencias naturales: La subversión de la palabra escrita," El Norte de Castilla, 4 June 1988
- Janés, Clara, "Rosa Chacel y la luz," El País, 5 January 1977
- Janés, Clara, Prologue to Los títulos by Chacel, Barcelona: EDHASA, 1981
- Janés, Clara, "Diario de una escritora," Nueva Estafeta 53 (1983): 90–92
- Janés, Clara, "El reclamo de la razón," Diario 16, 20 July 1989
- Mangini, Shirley, "Women and Spanish Modernism: The Case of Rosa Chacel," Anales de la Literatura Española Contemporánea 12 (1987):17–28
- Marra-López, José R., "Rosa Chacel: La búsqueda intelectual del mundo," in his Narrativa española fuera de España, 1939–1961, Madrid: Guadarrama, 1963
- Moix, Ana María, "Rosa Chacel, un clásico: El amor, fuente de creación y armonía," Destino, 10–16 December 1979
- Moix, Ana María, "La agonía de la razón," Camp de l'Arpa 74 (April 1980):74–76
- Moix, Ana María, "El fuego sagrado del diálogo," Diario 16, 28 May 1988
- Pardo, F., "La serena meditación de una filosofía," El Norte de Castilla, 4 July 1988
- Pardo, F., "Estudio preliminar," in Obra completa, 2: Ensayos y poesía by Chacel, Valladolid: Centro Jorge Guillén, 1989:7–43
- Piedra, Antonio, "Saturnal, el laberinto lúcido," Anthropos 85 (1988):54–58
- Rodríguez Fischer, A., "Los diarios de Rosa Chacel," Cuadernos Hispanoamericanos 399 (September 1983):135–47
- Rodríguez Fischer, A., "Cronología intelectual de Rosa Chacel," Anthropos 85 (June 1988):28–34
- Rosa Chacel, premio nacional de las letras españolas 1987*, Barcelona: Anthropos, and Madrid: Ministry of Culture, 1990

Chapter

The word "chapter" is derived from the Latin capitulum, which is also the source of the word "capital." An enlarged capital letter was used to signal a division of thought in early manuscripts. When paper began to replace parchment as the principal writing material, it became economically feasible to start each new chapter on a separate page. Some ancient manuscripts, such as the Bible, were divided into chapters by printers for the convenience of the reader. By the 18th century most long prose works were created with chapter divisions, and the conventions were well enough established by 1760 to enable Laurence Sterne's infamous experiments with chapters (blank chapters, chapters out of order) in Tristram Shandy. In the 19th century, chapter divisions were an important feature of serial publication, and both novels and essays were frequently published by installment. Cornhill Magazine, for instance, published serialized novels by authors such as George Eliot, Hardy, and Thackeray in this manner, along with essays by Arnold, Ruskin, and others.

Chapter divisions are usually indicated by numbers, but practice is quite varied. In Christine de Pizan's Le Livre de la Cité des Dames (wr. 1405; The Book of the City of Ladies), the chapters are marked off with numbers and with running heads that describe the contents and orient the reader to the text. For instance, the opening chapter is headed: "HERE BEGINS THE BOOK OF THE CITY OF LADIES, WHOSE FIRST CHAPTER TELLS WHY AND FOR WHAT PURPOSE THE BOOK WAS WRITTEN." Such practice was also followed by Cervantes in Don Quixote (1605–15); however, Cervantes' chapter headings also contribute to the mockery of his hero. When he titles I: 20, "Of the unparalleled Adventure achieved by the valorous Don Quixote de la Mancha with less peril than any ever achieved by any famous knight in the whole world," the hyperbole and ironic stance are unmistakable. Although the practice of numbering the text suggests narrative progression, it may also be used to show the logical progression of an argument from premise to deduction, as it does in Bacon's Novum organum (1620). In contrast to Bacon's plain style, novelists of the 18th and 19th centuries revived the tradition of elaborate and self-conscious titles, such as Henry Fielding's Chapter 1 of Book 8 of Tom Jones: "A wonderful long chapter concerning the marvellous; being much the longest of all our introductory chapters." Victorian essayists tended both to number and to title the chapters of long works—a practice followed by Carlyle, Ruskin, Mill, Arnold, and others. Modern writers have tended to minimize editorial apparatus, omitting titles and using white space to indicate textual divisions. Contemporary essayists are much less likely to follow the practice of numbering the chapters of book-length works.

Traditional definitions of the essay have emphasized that the individual essay is a complete and self-contained unit. The chapter, on the other hand, is generally considered to be part of a larger work, one division within a sequence. In reality, the concepts of chapter and essay are much more fluid than these definitions suggest. When Montaigne applied the title Essais to his writing, he was referring not to the structural divisions of his work, but to the general enterprise he had undertaken. In his books, he was "essaying," that is, attempting to come to some understanding on a matter of personal concern. The individual units of each book were identified as chapitres and numbered consecutively. Although the chapters do not represent a linear progression of thought, the individual chapters cannot be completely understood without reference to the entire work that Montaigne undertook.

Since the rise of popular journalism in the 18th and 19th centuries, the concept of the essay has also been linked to its means of publication. Essays are generally associated with periodical publication, while chapters are divisions of books. However, many essays appear first in book form, and some chapters of books are published first as essays in periodicals. The distinction, then, between a collection of essays and a nonfiction book may be more slippery than is generally imagined. Thoreau's Walden (1854), for instance, appears to be a collection of essays loosely related to a general theme. A closer inspection, however, reveals a conscious ordering of the essays as part of a larger design.

The distinction between essay and chapter is probably best understood as a tendency rather than as a clear demarcation. The term “essay” stresses the author’s approach to the subject—tentative, reflective, individual. A chapter, conversely, emphasizes a convenient division for purposes of publication. Indeed, long essays may be subdivided into chapters. Although the chapter may signify a continuation of the narrative in fictional works, there may be little distinction at all between an essay and a chapter in a work of nonfiction.

DAVID W.CHAPMAN

Further Reading

- Avrin, Leila, Scribes, Script and Books: The Book Arts from Antiquity to the Renaissance, Chicago: American Library Association, and London: British Library, 1991
- Febvre, Lucien, and Henri-Jean Martin, Coming of the Book: The Impact of Printing, 1450–1800, edited by Geoffrey Nowell Smith and David Wootton, London: NLB, 1976; New York: Verso, 1990 (original French edition, 1958)
- Marr, George S., The Periodical Essayists of the Eighteenth Century, London: Clarke, 1923; New York: Appleton, 1924
- Stevick, Philip, The Chapter in Fiction: Theories of Narrative Division, Syracuse, New York: Syracuse University Press, 1970
- Sultana, Niloufar, “The Principle of Chapter and Volume Division in Tristram Shandy,” Language and Style 20 (1981):185–202
- Walker, Hugh, The English Essay and Essayist, London: Dent, and New York: Dutton, 1915

Character Sketch

The character sketch is a brief prose description of a person or type. The form originated in second-century Greece with Theophrastus (c. 371-c. 287 BCE), a student and friend of Aristotle, whose lasting fame rests on one of his minor works, the Characters. Warren Anderson points out in his translation of Theophrastus (The Character Sketches, 1970) that although modern critics view the philosopher as a proto-scientist collecting observations of character as data, earlier writers saw him as a moralist, with the Characters as illustrations of Aristotle’s doctrine of the golden mean.

There are two main kinds: 1) the type character, known as the Theophrastan character, which generalizes individuals; and 2) the historical character, which depicts a particular individual. Although their purposes are different, both kinds of character sketch have classical roots, the type character in Theophrastus and the historical character in Plutarch, Tacitus, and Suetonius. Rhetoric is another important influence on the character sketch. A number of rhetorical terms were connected with character descriptions (descriptio, ethologia, prosopopoeia, characterismos, etc.), and for centuries the writing of characters was a common rhetorical exercise.

The primary characteristic of the character sketch is its brevity and concision. Very much a set piece and a static form, the character tends toward artificiality, primarily due to the self-consciously literary style in which it is usually written. Wit and irony as well as aphorisms abound in the character sketch. A moral bias is generally prominent, probably derived from Theophrastan connections with morality as well as from the wide use of the character in religious and spiritual writings. All character sketches show considerable abstraction and reductiveness; even the historical characters tend to make their subjects become models of their kind, rather than realistic human beings. Indeed, despite the traditional critical distinction between the two types of character sketches, in practice they often tended to merge, and tracing a specific strain in later manifestations can be difficult.

Aside from Theophrastus himself, the type character is found in Roman comedy, medieval hagiography, homiletic writings, humor characters in drama (particularly Ben Jonson's plays), and literature based on concepts such as the "ruling passion" (as in certain of Alexander Pope's poems). After the classical historians' characters, the form reappeared prominently in the work of 17th-century English historians.

After its original Greek appearance with Theophrastus, the great flowering of the character sketch occurred in 17th-century England, continuing well into the 18th century, and, to a lesser extent, in France. The type character experienced a rapid rise and development in the early part of the 17th century in England. Joseph Hall's Characters of Vertues and Vices, the first English collection of characters, was published in 1608, and by 1632 the English Theophrastan character was, according to Benjamin Boyce (1947), "perfectly developed." Major English writers of the Theophrastan character were Hall and Thomas Overbury. John Earle is generally considered the best; his MicroCosmographie (1628) went through ten editions by 1665. During the Restoration Samuel "Hudibras" Butler wrote type characters, but they remained unpublished until 1759. The 18th-century Theophrastan character is best represented by William Law in A Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life (1728).

During the middle and later years of the 17th century, and well into the 18th, the historical character flourished in England. Civil War and Restoration polemicists drew on it constantly. In historical writings, character sketches had appeared as early as the 16th century in Polydore Vergil, and early 17th-century historians such as William Camden, Edward Hall, and John Speed also employed them. But the greatest historical characters of the period were written at mid-century and during the Restoration by Edward Hyde, the first Earl of Clarendon, and Bishop Gilbert Burnet, both of whom wrote memoirs as well as histories. The most famous character sketch by Clarendon, who is generally acknowledged as the master of the form, is the portrait of his close friend Lord Falkland. Later 18th-century historians such as David Hume and, particularly, Edward Gibbon in his monumental Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire (1776–88) also deployed character sketches effectively.

In France the historical character appeared early in Phillippe de Commines' Mémoires (wr. 1489–90 and 1497–98; pub. 1524–28). More famous were the character sketches of mid-17th-century French memoirs and romances. The master of the French character sketch is Jean de La Bruyère, who translated Theophrastus' Characters and added other portraits to them in his own Caractères (1688; Characters). Among the portraits La Bruyère added were some of his contemporaries, whom he depicted under pseudonyms.

By the early 19th century, the English character sketch had by and large disappeared as an independent genre, although Richard Phillips published his Public Characters each year from 1798 to 1810. Historians obviously continued to describe characters in their works, and journalistic prose and the emerging novel, over the course of the 18th century, incorporated character sketches in different ways. But the character sketch was inherently a genre with limited possibilities for development. In addition to its brevity, it lacked both flexibility and realism. Thus the character was difficult to integrate into narratives; self-contained and too often abstract, it tended to remain an autonomous element, a set piece lacking natural connections to other prose.

The character sketch and the essay emerged at roughly the same time in England, and they are closely related genres. Indeed, the character is in essence a very brief essay. Early 18th-century essayists such as Joseph Addison and Richard Steele, along with Samuel Johnson and others later in the century, produced a number of essays that are basically expanded character sketches. But the character did not typically incorporate either the overtly personal elements or the serious moral and political ideas that have traditionally marked the essay; nor did its brevity, abstraction, and resistance to narrative integration make it particularly suitable for essayists to use. Ultimately, the major contribution of the character sketch was to hasten the development of other genres, particularly biography and autobiography; the essay was a subsidiary beneficiary in this generic process.

MARTINE WATSON BROWNLEY

Anthologies and Collections

A Book of "Characters", edited by Richard Aldington, London: Routledge, and New York: Dutton, 1924

A Cabinet of Characters, edited by Gwendolen Murphy, London: Oxford University Press, 1925

The Character Sketches by Theophrastus, translated by Warren Anderson, Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 1970

The Characters by Jean de La Bruyère, translated by Henri Van Laun, London and New York: Oxford University Press, 1963 (original French edition, 1688)

Characters from the Histories and Memoirs of the Seventeenth Century, edited by David Smith, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1918

Bibliographies

Greenough, Chester Noyes, Bibliography of the Theophrastan Character in English, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1970 (original edition, 1947)

Murphy, Gwendolen, A Bibliography of English Character-Books, 1608–1700, London: Oxford University Press, 1925

Further Reading

- Boyce, Benjamin, The Theophrastan Character in England to 1642, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1947
- Boyce, Benjamin, The Polemic Character, 1640–1661: A Chapter in English Literary History, Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1955
- Brownley, Martine Watson, “Johnson’s Lives of the English Poets and Earlier Traditions of the Character Sketch in England,” in Johnson and His Age, edited by James Engell, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1984
- Clausen, Wendell, “The Beginnings of English Character-Writing in the Early Seventeenth Century,” Philological Quarterly 25 (1946): 32–45
- Ernst, Charles A.S., Contextualizing the Character: Generic Studies of Text and Canon, Rhetoric, Style, and Quantitative Analysis in the Seventeenth-Century English Prose Character (dissertation), Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania, 1988
- Smeed, J.W., The Theophrastan Character: The History of a Literary Genre, Oxford: Clarendon Press, and New York: Oxford University Press, 1985

Characters

by Theophrastus, c. 319 BCE

Characteres (Characters) is a collection of 30 short prose descriptions of human vices written c. 319 BCE by the Greek polymath Theophrastus (c. 371–c. 287 BCE), a student of Aristotle and, after the latter’s retirement, his successor as head of the Peripatetic School; it is also the name given to the 17th- and 18th-century examples of this literary genre produced by English and French writers. The form of the Character by Theophrastus consists of a title naming a vice, an opening sentence that defines this vice first in abstract terms and then in terms of a man who represents it, followed by a collection of human actions or speeches that further illustrates it. As the word “character” originally meant an engraved mark or brand and, by extension, the instrument that makes such a mark, the Theophrastan Character conflates these two meanings, presenting both the distinctive marks or traits that define a particular moral quality and the human type whose behavior habitually enacts them. In this respect, a Character is like a riddle, the answer to which is given at the beginning rather than guessed at the end.

The form of the Theophrastan Character is unique in other respects. Its affinities with Aristotle’s system of ethics and with Theophrastus’ own (now lost) rhetorical treatises are suggestive, but inconclusive. If virtue, for Aristotle, is the mean between the extremes of excess and deficiency, Theophrastus supplies images only of the extremes (the reference to “good” men in the dedication of his book, suggesting a lost second part, may be spurious); furthermore, only a few of his vices (e.g. “Flattery” and “Surliness”) fit Aristotle’s “too much/too little” pairing, and even these are too widely separated in the collection to function as contrasting extremes. Moreover, Theophrastus’ vices are not, for the most part, truly vicious qualities. The norms from which his subjects diverge are social or cultural rather than moral, representing forms of overdoing (“Talkativeness,” “Officiousness”) or underdoing (“Absentmindedness,” “Stinginess”) that would be ignored in existing categories of moral admonition and that are as much a testimony to the observer’s perceptiveness as criticism of the observed. The Theophrastan voice is objective, neutral; its effect depends solely upon the recognition value of the details it cites, as these call forth a representative type of human nature.

In England, the Character emerged as a distinct literary form at about the same time as the essay (Bacon’s Essayes appeared in 1597, 1612, and 1625), and there is a tendency to blur the distinctions between the two genres. Both make use of the curt, pointed, Senecan “Attic” prose that (at least in Bacon’s essays) lends itself to discontinuous aphorism; in their later manifestations, moreover, essays may include illustrative Characters, and Characters become more methodical and discursive. Yet while native traditions of character representation played a part in the development of Character writing in England, writers in the first half of the 17th century found the basic elements of the Character in Isaac Casaubon’s edition and Latin translation of 23 (later 28) of Theophrastus’ Characters, published on the continent in 1592, and 1599. Of the countless imitations and adaptations of this basic model, three collections stand out. The earliest of these, Joseph Hall’s Characters of Vertues and Vices (1608), bears the closest resemblance to the Theophrastan model, notwithstanding its nine innovative virtue-types. But Hall, a churchman and Juvenalian satirist, introduced an element of sincere moral concern to the Character, an exhortative voice that tends to comment and interpret and that undercuts the dramatic objectivity of his model. In a collection of (finally) 83 Characters attached to succeeding editions of Sir Thomas Overbury’s long poem, A Wife (1614), drama and moral earnestness are alike abandoned for the sake of wit and epigram, qualities that would remain standard features of the English Character. The writers of the “Overburian” Characters (John Webster, Thomas Dekker, John Donne, and others) also replaced the ethical subjects of Theophrastus and Hall with the occupational and social types of their own times, often selected as ideological targets for satiric ridicule. Wit and an English repertoire of social and occupational types are also marks of the Characters included in John Earle’s Micro-Cosmographie (1628), the most admired of the English collections. But Earle’s wit is more often sympathetic than satirical, and his subjects do not exclude the ethical dimensions of Theophrastus’ Characters. His commitment to humanist ideals is implicit in the title of the collection, “a discovery of the little world,” i.e. Man.

In France, Casaubon’s Latin version of Theophrastus’ Characters was translated by Jean de La Bruyère, although this seems little more than a pretext for the translator’s own Les Caractères ou mœurs de ce siècle (1688; The Characters, or the Manners of the Age). If the Overburian writers made the character sketch the vehicle of satirical wit and epigram, La Bruyère made satirical portraiture only one element in a larger and expandable medley of maxim and moral reflection on a general topic (e.g. Women, Courtiers, Freethinkers). Framed in this moral discourse, his portraits seem less like specimens of an abstract anatomy and more like the characters of fiction La Bruyère gives them classical names rather than taxonomic labels. Addison and Steele later adopted this successful pattern in the Tatler and Spectator.

In the 1640s and 1650s, the fragmenting of English society into political and religious factions provided a new field of subject matter for Character writers, self-identified types (the Puritan, the Non-Conformist, the Cavalier, etc.) that afforded writers the luxury of indulging their talent for inventing witty variations on the recognized characteristics of the subject. As a consequence, Characters grew longer, at times reaching pamphlet or essay length, and were often published singly rather than in collections. In the late 1660s, Samuel Butler, the author of the Puritan satire Hudibras (1662–77), produced (but did not publish) 198 Characters, several of them (“A Modern Politician,” “A Small Poet,” “An Hermetic Philosopher”) running to a dozen pages or more. By this time the “Character” label was also attached to the verbal portrait of an historical personage who epitomized a social or political class (e.g. Butler’s “A Duke of Bucks,” i.e. George Villiers), and even to the biographical sketch of an individual (e.g. Edward Hyde’s “Character of Charles II”). As Benjamin Boyce remarked in The Polemic Character (1955), however, “when literary terminology becomes so blurred that the tradition of Plutarch can no longer be distinguished from that of Theophrastus it is time to stop.”

GEORGE WASSERMAN

See also Classical Influences

Editions

Characteres (Greek and Latin text), edited by Isaac Casaubon, 1592, 1599, Hermann Diels, 1909, O.Navarre, 1920, O.Immisch, 1923, and R.G.Ussher (with commentary), 1960, revised edition, 1993; as The Characters, edited and translated by J.M. Edmonds (Loeb Edition), 1929, and Jeffrey Ruslen, I.C. Cunningham, and A.D.Knox, 1929; translated by John Healey, 1616 (reprinted 1899), R.C.Jebb, 1870 (revised by J.E.Sandys, 1909), Jean Stewart, 1970, and Warren Anderson, 1970

Bibliography

Greenough, Chester Noyes, A Bibliography of the Theophrastan Character, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1970 (original edition, 1947)

Further Reading

Baldwin, Edward C, “La Bruyère’s Influence upon Addison,” PMLA 29 (1904):479–95
 Boyce, Benjamin, The Theophrastan Character in England to 1642, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1947
 Boyce, Benjamin, The Polemic Character, 1640–1661: A Chapter in English Literary History, Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1955
 Boyce, Benjamin, The Character-Sketches in Pope’s Poems, Durham, North Carolina: Duke University Press, 1962
 Bush, Douglas, English Literature in the Earlier Seventeenth Century, 1600–1660, Oxford: Oxford University Press, revised edition, 1973 (original edition, 1945)

Fortenbaugh, William W., and others, editors and translators, Theophrastus of Eresus: Sources for His Life, Writings, Thought and Influence, Leiden and New York: Brill, 1991

Smeed, J.W., The Theophrastan "Character": The History of a Literary Genre, Oxford: Clarendon Press, and New York: Oxford University Press, 1985

Turner, Margaret, "The Influence of La Bruyère on the 'Tatler' and the 'Spectator,'" Modern Language Review 48 (1953):10–16

Chateaubriand

French, 1768–1848

Despite his grandiose overarching projects, titles, and suggestions, Chateaubriand's writing is expressed, as often as not, as familiar conversation and concrete fragmentariness. Having spent several years of his youth in England, and gained an acquaintance with the traditions of English literature (he wrote a sketchy, subjective history of English literature and culture), Chateaubriand was also influenced by a mode of writing much better established north than south of the English Channel.

Some of Chateaubriand's writings, particularly in the second half of his life, have the length and manner usually expected from the journalistic essay and feuilleton. These appeared largely between 1815 and 1830 when the author was deeply involved in French political life. He fiercely defended the freedom of the press, argued in favor of a constitutional monarchy based on legitimacy and continuity, and philosophized on the accelerated modernization of society and the resulting implicit dangers. Although the purposes of these essays (many of them in periodicals he himself initiated, such as Le Conservateur [The conservative]) are ideological and political, they are always founded on a tone of unabashed subjectivity and appeal to personal preferences and choices.

More significantly and typically, Chateaubriand's two chief works, Les Mémoires d'outre-tombe (wr. c. 1811–41, pub. 1849–50; Memoirs from beyond the grave, translated simply as Memoirs) and Le Génie du christianisme (1802; The Genius of Christianity), consist of short pieces that are not always connected, unless in a somewhat general and abstract way. Thus the latter, which made the young author famous, contains pieces of literary criticism (e.g. the famous comparison between biblical Hebrew poetics and Homeric writings, claiming the superiority of the former), as well as passages of whimsical erudition such as the detailed parallels between the tables of laws and commandments of different cultures, or between the cosmogony of Moses and various philosophies of classical antiquity. Even more typically recognizable as autonomous essays within The Genius of Christianity are "chapters" such as those on the aesthetic appeal of ruins, the vindication of reptiles and amphibians within natural economy, the human relevance of bird song, the evocative power of church bells, and the typology and meaning of cemeteries.

The memoirs of Chateaubriand, perhaps his most durable literary work, are formed from disjointed fragments of varying lengths arranged in approximately chronological order; the great majority can be read separately without any significant loss of sense. Among these are memorable portraits, often devastatingly sarcastic, of major historical figures of the French Revolution and Restoration, or of different imperial and royal courts.

Some of the units or modules into which the text of the memoirs is divided are meditations on issues of political and historical interest, such as the future of the United States, a global society in which mass democracy prevails, or, even more important, the long essay on the life of Napoleon placed at the center of the book. Others are straightforward essays on, for instance, the description of Venice and of Silvio Pellico's prison, an anti-mountain diatribe during his 1832 journey from Paris to Lugano and back via Switzerland, or the parallels between Washington and Bonaparte.

More generally it must be said that Chateaubriand lived and worked under the sign of the essay to the extent to which he rejected the definitive and the complete. He decided he was not in a position to write a history of English literature, but simply a connected series of separate vignettes on some of its highlights, and thus called his work an "essay." Similarly he could not convince himself that his comments on the patterns of revolutions in different historical ages added up to a treatise or manual on the philosophy of history and so, again, he gave it the title of "essay." An exquisite mixture of erudition, subjectivity, moral gravity, and dreamy delight in the face of the world's spectacle characterizes all of these works.

Chateaubriand's style was flamboyant and passionate, expressing his proud, bold, and egocentric temperament. His daring ideological initiatives proved to be of lasting influence: the whole of Christian apologetics of the 19th century was deeply marked by his argument that beauty and the emotional and subjective resources of humankind are the proper environment for spiritual and religious concerns, rather than logic, science, or even the realm of ethical action. Chateaubriand differs from other essayists of the day (particularly from the English tradition) in that he lacks their lightly humorous and playful manner, choosing a discourse of melancholy and pathos. (There are a few exceptions, for instance in parts of the memoirs.) Nevertheless, he shares in the general project of Romantic essayism: finding a place where a trust in completeness and universality meets a firm commitment to the fragmentary and the symptomatic. In this respect, Chateaubriand can be classed with both Lamb and the Schlegel brothers.

VIRGIL NEMOIANU

Biography

François-René August, Vicomte de Chateaubriand. Born 4 September 1768 in Saint-Malo. Studied at the Collège de Rennes, 1781–83; Collège de Dinan, 1783–84. Entered the army, 1786; visited America, 1791; served briefly in the Prussian army, 1792. Married Célèste Buisson de la Vigne (died, 1847), 1792. Exiled to Jersey, 1792, and England, 1793–1800, then returned to France; diplomat, 1803–04. Traveled to the Middle East and Spain, 1806–07. Elected to the French Academy, 1811; exiled by Napoleon to Ghent, 1815; appointed Minister of Interior of the Government in exile, 1815; created peer of France, 1815, and President of the Electoral College of Orléans, 1815. Founder, Le Conservateur, 1818–20. Ambassador to Berlin, 1820–21, London, 1822, and Rome, 1828; Minister of Foreign Affairs, 1822–24. Arrested briefly on suspicion of a conspiracy to overthrow the monarchy, 1832. Liaisons with many women throughout his life. Died in Paris, 4 July 1848.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Essai historique, politique, et moral sur les révolutions anciennes et modernes, 1797; edited by Maurice Regard, 1978

Le Génie du christianisme; ou, Beautés de la religion chrétienne, 5 vols., 1802; edited by Maurice Regard, 1978; as The Genius of Christianity, translated by Charles I. White, 1802, and Rev. E. O'Donnell, 1854; as The Beauties of Christianity, 3 vols., translated by Frederic Shoberl, 1813

Reflexions politiques, 1814; as Political Reflections, translated anonymously, 1814

Mélanges de politique, 2 vols., 1816

Études ou discours historiques sur la chute de l'empire romain, la naissance et les progrès du christianisme, et l'invasion des barbares, 4 vols., 1831

Essai sur la littérature anglaise, 2 vols., 1836

Les Mémoires d'outre-tombe, 12 vols., 1849–50; edited by Maurice Levailant and Georges Moulinier, 2 vols., 1951, and Jean-Claude Berchet, 1989; as Memoirs, translated anonymously, 3 vols., 1848, and by Alexander Teixeira de Mattos, 6 vols., 1902; selections edited and translated by Robert Baldick, 1961

Réflexions et aphorismes, edited by Jean-Paul Clément, 1993

Grands Écrits politiques, edited by Jean-Paul Clément, 2 vols., 1993

Other writings: two short stories (Atala, 1801; René, 1802), a novel (Les Martyrs [The Martyrs], 1809), a play (Moïse, 1831), travel writing (including Itinéraire de Paris à Jérusalem [Travels in Greece, Palestine, Egypt, and Barbary], 1811), studies of literary history, a biography (La Vie de Rancé, 1844), and numerous political and ideological pamphlets and articles.

Collected works editions: Œuvres complètes, 31 vols., 1826–31, 36 vols., 1836–39, and 12 vols., 1859–61; Œuvres romanesques et voyages (Pléiade Edition), edited by Maurice Regard, 2 vols., 1969.

Bibliography

Dubé, Pierre H., and Ann Dubé, Bibliographie de la critique sur François-René de Chateaubriand: 1801–1986, Paris: Nizet, 1988

Further Reading

Barberis, Pierre, À la recherche d'une écriture: Chateaubriand, Tours: Mame, 1974

Barberis, Pierre, Chateaubriand: Une Réaction au monde moderne, Paris: Larousse, 1976

Clarac, Pierre, À la recherche de Chateaubriand, Paris: Nizet, 1975

- Lelievre, Michel, Chateaubriand polémiste, Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1983
- Moreau, Pierre, Chateaubriand, l'homme et l'œuvre, Paris: Hatier, 1956
- Painter, George D., Chateaubriand: A Biography, vol. 1, London: Chatto and Windus, 1977
- Porter, Charles A., Chateaubriand: Composition, Imagination, and Poetry, Saratoga, California: Anma Libri, 1978
- Richard, Jean-Pierre, Paysage de Chateaubriand, Paris: Seuil, 1967
- Sainte-Beuve, Chateaubriand et son groupe littéraire sous l'Empire, Paris: Garnier, 2 vols., 1948 (original edition, 1861)
- Switzer, Richard, Chateaubriand, New York: Twayne, 1971
- Vial, André, Chateaubriand et le temps perdu, Paris: Julliard, 1963

Chernyshevskii, Nikolai

Russian, 1828–1889

Born the son of a priest, Nikolai Chernyshevskii was himself intended for the priesthood. His seminary education, however, was cut short in 1845, but his publicistic writings, characterized by dogmatism, moral fervor, zeal, and dedication, bear its stamp. In 1846, Chernyshevskii entered the University of St. Petersburg. During his years in the capital, acquaintance with members of the Petrashevskii circle and with the works of many Western thinkers, especially Ludwig Feuerbach, Louis Blanc, P.-J. Proudhon, and Charles Fourier, as well as his witnessing the failed revolutions of 1848, persuaded him of the futility of liberalism and helped him to mold a radical world view. After graduation, he taught in Saratov for several years, but returned to St. Petersburg in 1853 to write his Master's thesis. His views also found a new outlet: that year, he began his journalistic career, publishing a few articles for the liberal journal Otechestvennye Zapiski (Fatherland notes) before moving to Sovremennik (The contemporary) early in 1854.

Initially he published mainly literary criticism. Like his predecessor Vissarion Belinskii, who deeply influenced him and whose post as leading critic of Russian literature he would later fill, Chernyshevskii demanded civic responsibility in art, believing that literature was one of the key forces of progress. In his work he maintained that the role of art was to portray real life, to make it understandable to the reader, and to pass judgment on it. However, the extreme materialist aesthetics ("beauty is life") that he formulated in his Master's thesis, Esteticheskie otnosheniia iskusstva k deistvital'nosti ("The Aesthetic Relation of Art to Reality"), which he defended unsuccessfully in 1855, proved to be as offensive to many of his coworkers as they had been to his thesis supervisor, Aleksandr Nikitenko. He succeeded in alienating many of Sovremennik's important writers, including Lev Tolstoi, Ivan Turgenev, and Aleksandr Druzhinin, who eventually left the journal. He continued to express and elaborate his views on the role of the writer and literature in a number of critical reviews, most importantly in "Ocherki gogolevskogo perioda russkoi literatury" (1855–56; "Essays on the Gogol Period of Russian Literature"), in which he hailed Gogol', long revered for what was considered his faithful depiction of the corrupt aspects of Russia, as Russia's greatest writer.

Supported by the editor, Nikolai Nekrasov, Chernyshevskii was the leading critic of Sovremennik and, by 1856, exerted considerable influence on all editorial questions.

In 1857, Chernyshevskii left Sovremennik's literary criticism section in the hands of his protégé, Nikolai Dobroliubov. Hopeful about the possibility of reform under the new tsar, Alexander II, Chernyshevskii was pleased to deal more explicitly with socioeconomic questions, although his literary criticism had always served as a forum for critique of the existing order. In 1858 and 1859, he wrote numerous essays about serfdom and the potential value of the peasant commune, as well as proposals for land reform, which have since caused him to be referred to as a “utopian” socialist. For several years he wrote monthly reviews of political and historical events relevant to Russia's development. In addition to his many articles of a political nature, Chernyshevskii wrote the ethical treatise “Antropologicheskii printsip v filosofii” (1860; “The Anthropological Principle in Philosophy”), which was strongly influenced by the utilitarian principles of John Stuart Mill. In it he maintained that all human behavior is motivated exclusively by self-interest, and that the interests of the individual are inextricably linked to the interests of society; hence man can be taught to serve the common good if he is made to understand that it will ultimately benefit his own interests.

By the close of the decade, however, Chernyshevskii had become doubtful about the prospect of reform from above and began to be recognized as the leader of a section of the intelligentsia which was becoming increasingly radical. Provoked by an alarming rash of peasant disturbances and student unrest, the authorities thought it prudent to remove the apparent leader of the radicals, who had been under surveillance by the Third Section for almost a year. Though they were not able to prove that Chernyshevskii was connected with the events, a letter from Aleksandr Herzen to Nikolai Serno-Solov'evich, in which Herzen offered to print the prohibited Sovremennik in London, gave the authorities a sufficient pretext for his arrest. On 7 July 1862, Chernyshevskii was arrested and imprisoned in the Peter and Paul Fortress. While in prison, he wrote the novel Chto delat'? (1863; What Is to Be Done?), which the censors mistakenly permitted to be serially published in Sovremennik. It was Chernyshevskii's first and last noteworthy work of fiction. Though widely considered didactic and poorly written, the novel was wildly popular and went on to influence a number of later revolutionaries, including Vera Zasulich and Lenin.

Despite an obvious lack of evidence, Chernyshevskii was found guilty of attempting to overthrow the regime, and was sentenced to seven years' hard labor and exile for life. His unreasonably hard sentence helped further to alienate many from the regime, and assured Chernyshevskii's status as a martyr. He was finally permitted to return to his birthplace in 1889, where he died later that year.

JENNIFER LONERGAN

Biography

Nikolai Gavrilovich Chernyshevskii. Born 12 July 1828 in Saratov. Studied at a seminary in Saratov, 1842–45; history and philology at the University of St. Petersburg, 1846–50, graduated 1850. Taught at a gymnasium in Saratov, 1851–53. Married Olga Sokratovna

Vasil'eva, 1853: two sons. Returned to St. Petersburg, 1853; contributor, Otechestvennye Zapiski, 1853; contributor, from 1854, and co-editor, 1856–62, Sovremennik. Arrested and imprisoned for criticizing as insufficient the terms of Tsar Alexander II's emancipation of the serfs, 1862: went through a mock execution, then exiled to Siberia, 1864; worked in silver mines in Irkutsk region for seven years; lived in the Arctic village Vilyuisk for 12 years; suffered from malaria; allowed to return to Astrakhan, 1883, and Saratov, 1889. Died in Saratov, 17 October 1889.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Esteticheskie otnosheniia iskusstva k deistvitel'nosti, 1855; as "The Aesthetic Relation of Art to Reality," in Selected Philosophical Essays, 1953

Ocherki gogolevskogo perioda russkoi literatury, in Sovremennik, 1855–56; as "Essays on the Gogol Period of Russian Literature," in Selected Philosophical Essays, 1953

"Antropologicheskii printsip v filosofii," in Sovremennik, 1860; as "The Anthropological Principle in Philosophy," in Selected Philosophical Essays, 1953

Selected Philosophical Essays, 1953

Belinsky, Chernyshevsky, Dobrolyubov: Selected Criticism, edited by Ralph E. Matlaw, 1962

Other writings: the novels Chto delat'? (1863; What Is to Be Done?) and Prolog (1918; Prologue), and some short stories.

Collected works edition: Polnoe sobranie sochinenii, 16 vols., 1939–53.

Further Reading

Frank, Joseph, "Nikolay Chernyshevsky: A Russian Utopia," in his Through the Russian Prism: Essays on Literature and Culture, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1990

Paperno, Irina, Chernyshevsky and the Age of Realism: A Study in the Semiotics of Behavior, Stanford, California: Stanford University Press, 1988

Pereira, N.G.O., The Thought and Teachings of N.G. Chernyshevskij, The Hague: Mouton, 1975

Randall, Francis B., N.G. Chernyshevskii, New York: Twayne, 1967

Woehrlin, William F., Chernyshevskii: The Man and the Journalist, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1971

Chesterfield, Earl of

English, 1694–1773

The essays of Philip Dormer Stanhope, fourth Earl of Chesterfield, comment on the politics and manners of his contemporaries from the lofty social, political, and intellectual positions available only to someone with Chesterfield's lineage, connections, and talents. The essays draw strength from a long and successful career in diplomacy and a lifetime of reading and writing. They exhibit wit, thought, style, integrity, and contempt—commodities of character and thought too rare to be ignored or forgotten, wherever they may be found. Like his notorious letters to his illegitimate son on how to succeed in the courts of Europe, his essays, several of which metamorphosed into separate political pamphlets, combine long experience in high places with thoughtful reading of classical texts, and great powers of observation and discernment. They exercise a judgment sharpened, but not embittered, by an unsentimental assessment of human nature and its capacities. They also, it must be admitted, reflect, or rather magnify, the prejudices of party and class held by this eloquent earl.

Well-born, well-bred, well-educated, well-read, well-traveled, well-connected, and exceedingly well-spoken, Chesterfield turned his polished hand to social and political essays at several points in his career. He had prepared himself as a writer by translating, memorizing, and emulating Cicero, Horace, Martial, and Ovid, and by reading and meeting all the best writers, French and English, of his own time. The contents of his elegant library resonate in his essays, his letters, and his speeches, proving again and again that this library was for use rather than ostentation.

None of Chesterfield's essays was published under his name. Some 45 essays have been attributed to Chesterfield on the good authority of his first biographer and editor, Matthew Maty, who reprinted them in his Miscellaneous Works edition of 1777. The attributions are discussed by Roger Coxon (1925), who reprints 11 essays. The earliest essays (17, 24 January and 10 April 1736) appeared in Fog's Journal, a weekly paper emanating from, and amplifying, the opposition to Sir Robert Walpole. In the first of them a self-congratulatory "projector" suggests that, based on a German (i.e. Hanoverian) model, the English army should be replaced with wax figures driven by clockwork. This contrivance would provide soldiers of a more uniform appearance and a fiercer demeanor, at great savings to the country, which had not, in any case, sent its army to battle for 25 years, "notwithstanding the almost uninterrupted disturbances that have been in Europe, in which our interests have been as nearly concerned as ever they are likely to be for these five and twenty years to come." Being made of wax, these new soldiers will be more pliable to the demands of the politicians and less of a threat to English liberty than a "standing army." This witty invention attacks the two military policies to which the Opposition most objected—that of maintaining a standing army and the failure to use any army to develop and maintain trade. The second essay deplores flattery as the tickling of the ear. Chesterfield had seen far too much, and practiced far too little, of this commodity in the course of his long diplomatic and short political career. The third essay draws on the same experience to ridicule the distortions of curiosity, vanity, and partiality in the guise of a survey of various optical instruments.

The 17 essays Chesterfield wrote for Common Sense from February 1737 through January 1739 discuss the rare and not very fashionable commodity named in its title and then apply it to such perennial topics of the essay as the balance of power, fashionable attire, misconceptions of honor, corrupt ministers (i.e. advisers such as Walpole), ill-advised efforts to regulate plays, party zeal, country living, coxcombs, the witlessness and ignorance of his competitors, taste, a foolish preference for all things French (few Englishmen understood the French and their language better than Chesterfield), and foreign and military policy. Two of them compete with the Spectator on its own ground, but without notable success. One argues that it is in January, not May, that the virtue and state of mind of women is most threatened, while the other considers, without real regret, the decline of opera.

In two numbers of Old England, or the Constitutional Journal of February 1743 attributed to Chesterfield by Maty, “Jeffrey Broadbottom” defends constitutional opposition and deplors faction and foreign entanglements. These two essays fail noticeably—whether using wit or wisdom—to enlarge upon the issues they consider.

The 23 numbers Chesterfield wrote for the World from retirement between 1753 and 1756 discuss, sometimes at too much leisure, such concerns of the time as family expeditions to the continent in search of fashion and diversion, elegant handwriting, honor, foreign operas, make-up, duels, decorum, and restraint. Two numbers make a halfhearted effort to construct a club of caricatures like that which Sir Roger de Coverley made famous in the Spectator. Given the lineage and nature of their author, three essays on exaggerated notions of noble birth, mistaken ideas of rank and fortune, and good breeding are among the most interesting and surprising. The two most important papers are those of 28 November and 5 December 1754, commending Samuel Johnson’s forthcoming Dictionary. Johnson vigorously repudiated Chesterfield’s support as belated and condescending in one of the most famous letters of rejection ever written (7 February 1755). Nevertheless, Chesterfield’s essays show an admirable understanding of the nature and state of the English language and the power of the English state, as well as a strong sense of Johnson’s abilities and the difficulties facing him. The second essay is bold enough to comment on “the incontinency of female eloquence” and orthography.

The elegance, wit, and experience evident in these social and political essays blend nicely with malice and admiration in a series of 20 character sketches cum memoirs published posthumously as Characters of Eminent Personages of His Own Time (1777). The portraits of George I and II, Queen Caroline, Walpole, and Newcastle are especially vivid, intimate, and severe. Those of Pope, Bolingbroke, and Scarborough are admiring and eloquent. Chesterfield’s life and temperament seem to have qualified him almost uniquely to contribute to this subgenre of the essay.

Many of the 400 surviving letters to his son for which Chesterfield is best known, indeed infamous, are, in effect, essays on the politics of politeness, written with a more specific audience and, sometimes, a more particularized occasion in mind than most essays. Like his political essays, they draw on his long career and studious habits, while exhibiting wit, judgment, discernment, and prejudices of class and culture—in short, the character of their author. Few writers were in a better position to comment on civility than this polite and practiced earl. These letters also exhibit a gift for maxim that would have looked good in the essays (e.g. “Whoever is in a hurry, shows that the thing he is about is too big for him”—10 August 1749).

Writing to educate his illegitimate and, evidently, unpromising and ungainly son for a diplomatic career and to instruct him in ways to prosper in the courts of Europe, Chesterfield provides devastating insights into the courts and the careerism of his era. Many of the manners, morals, and political and economic devices that he exposes seem still to be practiced in courtly and other venues. Whole pages are given over to the discussion of such perennial essay topics as frivolity, dissimulation, handwriting, Italian literature, pedantry, domestic politics, Roman history, treaties, mercenary armies, French politics and manners (a letter of 25 December 1753 seems to predict the French Revolution), sexual liaisons (the eight letters that treat or mention this topic are what made the correspondence notorious), and paternal authority. To the extent that an essay is thoughtful prose by someone who knows what he or she is writing about, and why, most of these letters are essays.

ALAN T. MCKENZIE

Biography

Philip Dormer Stanhope, fourth Earl of Chesterfield. Born 22 September 1694 in London. Studied privately; Trinity Hall, Cambridge, 1711–14. Traveled on the continent, 1714–15. Whig Member of Parliament for St. Germans, Cornwall, from 1715, and Lostwithiel, from 1722; gentleman of the bedchamber, from 1715, and lord of the bedchamber, from 1727, to George, Prince of Wales (George II from 1727); appointed captain of the gentlemenpensioners, 1723. Upon father's death in 1726 became the fourth Earl of Chesterfield and a member of the House of Lords; appointed privy councillor, 1728, and lord steward of the king's household, 1730. British Ambassador in The Hague, 1728–32, where he negotiated the marriage between William, prince of Orange, and Ann, princess royal of England, 1730. Made knight of the garter, 1730. Had one son, Philip Stanhope (died, 1768) by Elizabeth du Bouchet, 1732. Married Melusina de Schulemburg, Countess of Walsingham and Baroness of Aldeburgh, 1733. Began writing to his son, 1736 (over 400 letters extant), and to his godson, from 1761 (236 letters extant). Lord lieutenant of Ireland, 1745–46; secretary of state, 1746–48, then retired from politics. Contributor to various journals, including Common Sense and the World. Died in London, 24 March 1773.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

- Letters to His Son Philip Stanhope*, 2 vols., 1774; several revised, enlarged editions, 1776–1800; edited by Lord Mahon, 5 vols., 1845–53, John Bradshaw (with Characters), 3 vols., 1892, Charles Strachey and Annette Calthrop, 2 vols., 1901, and Bonamy Dobrée, 6 vols., 1932; selections, as The Art of Pleasing; or, Instructions for Youth in the First Stage of Life, 1783, Letters to His Son, edited by James Harding, 1973, Dear Boy: Lord Chesterfield's Letters to His Son, edited by Piers Dudgeon and Jonathan Jones, 1989, and Letters, edited by David Roberts, 1992
- Miscellaneous Works*, vols. 1–2 edited by Matthew Maty, 1777; vol. 3 edited by Benjamin Way, 1778
- Characters of Eminent Personages of His Own Time*, 1777; enlarged edition, 1778, reprinted 1990; edited by John Bradshaw (with Letters to His Son), 3 vols., 1892., and Colin Franklin, 1993
- Letters to His Godson and Successor*, edited by the Earl of Carnarvon, 1890

Some Unpublished Letters, edited by Sidney L. Gulick, Jr., 1937

Other writings: poetry, and letters to colleagues and friends (especially his friend Solomon Dayrolles).

Bibliographies

Gulick, Sidney L., A Chesterfield Bibliography to 1800, Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, revised edition, 1979 (original edition, 1935)

Todd, W.B., "The Number, Order and Authorship of the Hanover Pamphlets Attributed to Chesterfield," Papers of the Bibliographical Society of America 44 (1950)

Further Reading

Connelly, Willard, The True Chesterfield: Manners—Women—Education, London: Cassell, 1939

Coxon, Roger, Chesterfield and His Critics, London: Routledge, 1925

Dobrée, Bonamy, "The Life of Philip Dormer Stanhope, Fourth Earl of Chesterfield," in The Letters of Philip Dormer Stanhope, Fourth Earl of Chesterfield, vol. 1, edited by Dobrée, London: Eyre and Spottiswoode, and New York: Viking Press, 1932

Franklin, Colin, Lord Chesterfield: His Character and Characters, Aldershot, Hampshire: Scolar Press, 1993

Fullen, Charles, "Lord Chesterfield and Eighteenth-Century Appearance and Reality," SEL: Studies in English Literature 1500–1900, 8 (1968):501–15

Korshin, Paul J., "The Johnson-Chesterfield Relationship: A New Hypothesis," PMLA 85 (1970):247–59

Lucas, F.L., "Lord Chesterfield," in his The Search for Good Sense: Four Eighteenth-Century Characters: Johnson, Chesterfield, Boswell and Goldsmith, London: Cassell, and New York: Macmillan, 1958

McKenzie, Alan T., Introduction to Characters by Chesterfield, Los Angeles: Clark Memorial Library, 1990:iii-xii

McKenzie, Alan T., "History, Genre and Insight in the Characters of Lord Chesterfield," in Studies in Eighteenth-Century Culture, vol. 21, edited by Patricia B. Craddock and Carla H. Hay, East Lansing, Michigan: Colleagues Press, 1991:159–76

McKenzie, Alan T., "Philip Dormer Stanhope, Lord Chesterfield," in British Prose Writers, 1660–1800, Second Series, edited by Donald T. Siebert, Dictionary of Literary Biography, vol. 104, Detroit: Gale Research, 1991:61–77

Maty, Matthew, "Memoirs of Lord Chesterfield," in Miscellaneous Works of the Late Philip Dormer Stanhope, Earl of Chesterfield, vol. 1, edited by Maty, London: Edward and Charles Dilly, 1777

Neumann, J.H., "Chesterfield and the Standard of Usage in English," Modern Language Quarterly 7 (1946): 463–75

Shellabarger, Samuel, Lord Chesterfield and His World, 1935; Boston: Little Brown, 1951 (original edition, 1935)

Weinbrot, Howard, "Johnson's 'Dictionary' and 'The World': The Papers of Lord Chesterfield and Richard Owen Cambridge," Philological Quarterly 50 (1971):663–69

Willey, Basil, "Lord Chesterfield (1694–1773)," in his The English Moralists, New York: Norton, and London: Chatto and Windus, 1964:269–82

Chesterton, G.K.

British, 1874–1936

G.K.Chesterton was one of the 20th century's most prolific writers, his range including poetry, dramas, biographies, and novels. As an essayist, however, he was no less productive, and his collected efforts in this category fill dozens of volumes. Considered by some critics to be one of the last of the great "men of letters," Chesterton wrote essays on a wide variety of topics over a span of more than 40 years. As with any author producing such an enormous yield of literature, the quality often varied, but as T.S.Eliot noted in Chesterton's obituary in the Tablet (20 June 1936), "it is not, I think, for any piece of writing in particular that Chesterton is of importance, but for the place that he occupied, the position that he represented, during the better part of a generation."

When his first collection of essays, The Defendant, appeared in 1901, Chesterton had already gained something of a reputation as an essayist for his contributions to a number of English periodicals such as the Speaker, the Bookman, and the Daily News. Thus, as most reviewers were already familiar with Chesterton's style and his sometimes paradoxical approach to his subject matter, few were disappointed in this collection of largely humorous essays on topics ranging from nonsense to ugly things. As an anonymous reviewer for the Whitehall Review (27 February 1902) wrote, "The whole book, in short, is one of the most delightful companions possible for a man to have with him, and if it does not run through two or three editions rapidly then there is no humor left in these decadent days."

This critical observation made so early in his career notes perhaps one of the defining characteristics of many of Chesterton's essays: his humor. While not given to writing overtly funny, rollicking essays, Chesterton was always cognizant of the fact that a little humor in an otherwise serious work could strengthen its argument and draw attention to the essay's salient points. However, these touches of humor were to be consistently observed by critics as evidence of Chesterton's flippancy, charges that he failed to appreciate. In the preface to Orthodoxy (1908), Chesterton—by this time the author of a number of works—refuted his critics' assertions of his often cavalier attitude by claiming that even if the work were dull, "dullness will, however, free me from the charge which I most lament; the charge of being flippant. Mere light sophistry is the thing that I happen to despise most of all things, and it is perhaps a wholesome fact that this is the thing of which I am generally accused."

However, even today it is difficult to read Chesterton's literature without feeling that he is purposely making light of certain situations, leaving the reader uncertain as to whether he is actually attempting to be humorous or not. For example, in one of his most famous works, Charles Dickens (1906), Chesterton makes a typically paradoxical comment concerning Dickens' marriage to Catherine Hogarth. Noting Dickens' often obsessive devotion to her sisters Mary and Georgina, Chesterton claims that Dickens was overwhelmed by the attentions of all of the sisters, and "as sometimes happens in undeveloped youth, an abstract femininity simply intoxicated him. And again, I think we shall not be accused of harshness if we put the point this way: that by a kind of accident he got hold of the wrong sister.” While Dickensian purists might begrudgingly admit that there is perhaps a modicum of truth in the assertion, no doubt the statement ultimately appears to be a humorous attempt to define the reason Dickens chose what appeared to be an incompatible mate. In this and other cases, Chesterton was simply a victim of his own success: he often came across as being funny whether he intended to or not. As for Charles Dickens as a work, critics pointed out that although it purported to be a biography, it was in itself a collection of related essays, much of it literary criticism, relating to the famous author.

In addition to his humor, perhaps the other characteristic Chesterton’s work was noted for was his occasional laudatory stance on Orthodox Christianity. Then, as now, alluding to one’s religious beliefs could be literary suicide, but Chesterton never appeared to worry about offending his readers; in fact he seemed aware that his place as a man of letters provided him a unique opportunity to share his views and religious opinions. Generally, Chesterton was able to avoid being heavyhanded, even in works that were intrinsically religious, such as Orthodoxy, St. Thomas Aquinas (1933), The Everlasting Man (1925), and St. Francis of Assisi (1923). Like many of his volume-length works, these were essentially collections of interrelated essays, and most critics recognized them as such.

Today Chesterton’s reputation as an essayist has been somewhat eclipsed by the continuing popularity of his fictional works, and he is now probably best known for his Father Brown detective stories. Yet there is still much that can be gained by reading Chesterton’s essays. Perhaps his friend Hilaire Belloc best defined how we should evaluate Chesterton’s place as an essayist when he wrote in the Observer (21 June 1936), at Chesterton’s death, that his “was a voice from which I learnt continually, from the first day I heard it until the last; acquiring its discoveries, explanations, definitions which continue to increase my possessions. Nor does it cease. Nor will it cease.”

JAMES R.SIMMONS, JR.

Biography

Gilbert Keith Chesterton. Born in London, 29 May 1874. Studied at St. Paul’s School, London, 1887–92, where he edited the Debater, Slade School of Art, London, 1893–96. Worked for Redway publishers, London, 1896, and T. Fisher Unwin publishers, London, 1896–1902. Married Frances Alice Blogg, 1901. Columnist for the London Daily News, 1901–13, and the Illustrated London News, 1905–36. Moved to Beaconsfield, Buckinghamshire, 1909. Founder, with his brother Cecil Chesterton and Hilaire Belloc, and editor, with others, Eye Witness, 1911–12; contributor, London Daily Herald, 1913–14; editor, New Witness, 1916–23, and G.K.’s Weekly, 1925–36. Leader of the Distributist movement, from 1919, and president of the Distributist League. Joined the Roman Catholic Church, 1922. Radio broadcaster, BBC, 1930s. Illustrated some of his own works and books by others. Awards: honorary degrees from three universities. Fellow, Royal Society of Literature; Knight Commander with Star, Order of St. Gregory the Great, 1934. Died in Beaconsfield, 14 June 1936.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

The Defendant, 1901; revised edition, 1903

Twelve Types, 1902; enlarged edition, as Varied Types, 1903

Charles Dickens, 1906

Orthodoxy, 1908

All Things Considered, 1908

Tremendous Trifles, 1909

Alarms and Discursions, 1910

A Defence of Nonsense and Other Essays, 1911

A Miscellany of Men, 1912

The Victorian Age of Literature, 1913

The Barbarism of Berlin, 1914

Utopia of Usurers and Other Essays, 1917

The Uses of Diversity: A Book of Essays, 1920

St. Francis of Assisi, 1923

The Everlasting Man, 1925

Generally Speaking: A Book of Essays, 1928

(Essays), 1928

The Thing, 1929

Come to Think of It: A Book of Essays, 1930

All Is Grist: A Book of Essays, 1931

Sidelights on New London and Newer York and Other Essays, 1932

All I Survey: A Book of Essays, 1933

St. Thomas Aquinas, 1933

Avowals and Denials: A Book of Essays, 1934

The Well and the Shallows, 1935

As I Was Saying: A Book of Essays, 1936

Essays, edited by John Guest, 1939

Selected Essays, edited by Dorothy Collins, 1949

The Common Man, 1950

Essays, edited by K.E.Whitehorn, 1953

A Handful of Authors: Essays on Books and Writers, edited by Dorothy Collins, 1953

The Glass Walking-Stick and Other Essays from the Illustrated London News, 1905–1936, edited by Dorothy Collins, 1955

Lunacy and Letters, edited by Dorothy Collins, 1958

The Spice of Life and Other Essays, edited by Dorothy Collins, 1964

G.K.Chesterton: A Selection from His Non-Fictional Prose, edited by W.H.Auden, 1970

The Apostle and the Wild Ducks, and Other Essays, edited by Dorothy Collins, 1975

As I Was Saying: A Chesterton Reader, edited by Robert Knille, 1985

The Bodley Head Chesterton, edited by P.J.Kavanagh, 1985; as The Essential Chesterton, 1987

G.K.'s Weekly: A Sampler, edited by Lyle W.Dorsett, 1986

Other writings: several novels, Father Brown detective stories, collections of poetry, plays, and an autobiography.

Collected works edition: Collected Works, edited by D.J.Conlon, 1986–in progress).

Bibliography

Sullivan, John, G.K.Chesterton: A Bibliography, London: University of London, 1958; supplement, 1968; and G.K. Chesterton 3: A Bibliographical Postscript, 1980

Further Reading

- Auden, W.H., Introduction to G.K.Chesterton: A Selection from His Non-Fictional Prose, edited by Auden, London: Faber, 1970
- Boyd, Ian, The Novels of G.K.Chesterton: A Study in Art and Propaganda, New York: Barnes and Noble, and London: Elek, 1975
- Cammaerts, Emile, The Laughing Prophet: The Seven Virtues and G.K.Chesterton, Folcroft, Pennsylvania: Folcroft, 1979 (original edition, 1937)
- Conlon, D.J., G.K.Chesterton: The Critical judgments, Part 1:1900–1937, Antwerp: Antwerp Studies in English Literature, 1976
- Conlon, D.J., editor, G.K.Chesterton: A Half Century of Views, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1987
- Evans, Maurice, G.K.Chesterton, New York: Haskell House, 1972 (original edition, 1939)
- Kenner, Hugh, Paradox in Chesterton, New York: Sheed and Ward, 1947; London: Sheed and Ward, 1948
- Ward, Maisie, Return to Chesterton, London and New York: Sheed and Ward, 1952
- Wills, Gary, Chesterton: Man and Mask, New York: Sheed and Ward, 1961

Chinese Essay

In his book My Country and My People (1936), Lin Yutang (1895–1976), a 40-year-old intellectual educated in China, the United States, and Europe, described traditional Chinese prose literature in terms which if accepted would make the present survey rather short. His opening sentence was “There was very little good prose in the classical Chinese literature.” By “good,” he meant good by modern standards: that is, having a broad sweep and wide canvas, substantial intellectual content, the rhythms of speech, and a familiar, personal tone. Classical Chinese prose, in contrast, was typically euphuistic and poetic, impersonal and stereotyped, economical with words, and cast in a dead language. As an example of its limitations, Lin cited Hou Fangyu’s (1618–54) biography of Li Xiangjun. The liaison between the red-blooded young scholar Hou and the patriotic courtesan Li was the stuff that plays are made of (and, indeed, famously were), yet, as Lin put it, “Hou did his ‘Biography of Miss Li’ in exactly 375 words [characters], written in a manner as if he was describing the virtues of his neighbour’s grandmother.” Another swipe is aimed at the venerated poet Tao Yuanming (365–427 CE), whose portrait of himself, “Mr. Five Willows,” is even shorter (125 characters); this composition, though regarded as a model in the past, Lin found completely devoid of intellectual content. Both criticisms are correct: Hou’s “biography” is insipid, and Tao’s self-portrait vacuous. It is also true that both disappointments can be laid at the door of weaknesses endemic in Chinese prose literature. However, that is the start, not the end, of the story.

It will occasion no surprise to record that Chinese prose goes back a long way. In a divided empire of warring states for several centuries prior to reunification at the end of the third century BCE, many clever men found employment as political advisers. They spoke and wrote voluminously. More permanently employed court historians quite properly also had a great deal to say. If we unpick their works we find a multitude of finely composed “essays” on history and contemporary life and conduct. With the spread of literacy in succeeding ages, the number and output of occasional pieces expressing their author’s views or giving vent to his feelings grew exponentially. However, the channels and compartments for views and feelings differed from those that evolved in Europe; chronologically speaking they were all in place, indeed solidified, before the European “essay” that served as Lin Yutang’s yardstick for prose was ever thought of, and very little tinkering with them was done until the 20th century.

In ancient China those with a high degree of literacy served the state as civil servants. Their best thoughts on social and ethical matters were addressed to the court in the first instance, with all the formality that entailed. Furthermore, as is the way with bureaucracies, forms were codified and rapidly acquired their conventions. Of the many vehicles for prose contained in Chinese anthologies of literature from the sixth to the 19th centuries, few allowed much freedom for maneuver. Personal letters (shu), widely circulated, were sometimes used for informal discussion of general topics, but the very fact that they had to be pressed into service is a token of the rigidity of established forms. Another constraint, before paper and print became common, was the costliness of writing materials and the laboriousness of copying, which naturally encouraged pithiness; those early days set the models and standards for later literature. The search for a personalized essay with a wide canvas as Lin Yutang did was therefore bound to end in disappointment.

The characteristic of euphuism that Lin Yutang objected to was a natural concomitant of brevity: if words were to be few, a premium was placed on craftsmanship. (Conversely, where space is limitless and cost negligible, the opposite holds true—craftsmanship is taboo.) Hence in the first historical period which enjoyed freedom of thought after Confucianism was set up as state orthodoxy, that advantage was offset by the bondage of formalism. The Six Dynasties (third to sixth centuries CE) saw the emergence of some of the most flamboyant individuals in Chinese history, but also the apogee of pianwen (parallel prose, composed in syntactically matching couplets). Even very long treaties and personal letters adopted this form, despite the impediment to the natural flow of thought it constituted. In the same period there developed a sophisticated aesthetic for literature, which reinforced the tendency to strive for artistic effect. The emphasis of this criticism was on performance rather than content, as with a concert where the score is taken as given and the interest is in the virtuosity of the soloist. Within the general directive that belles-lettres should “give pleasure to the ear, delight to the eye,” different genres were assigned their tone-coloring. For instance, the lun (disquisition) was said to be “rarefied and subtle, bright and smooth,” the shuo (plea) “dazzlingly bright and extravagantly bizarre” (Wenfu [3rd century CE; Description of literature])—these formulas themselves being expressed in parallel prose.

While performance criteria were being laid down on a generic level, ideas were formulated on how to assess and describe individual style. The seminal notion was that of qi, a kind of energy or life force, immanent in the author and perceptible in his work, that determined the pace and vigor of a composition. More superficially, works were described in terms of flavors and colors. What the great majority of critical statements had in common was their attention to the aesthetic or sensual experience of reader reception; thought content or mental power was rarely mentioned. The interest was less on what was said than on how it was said. Though this criticism could be extremely perceptive, it could also be looked upon as overrefined, and contributing to the kinship between classical prose and poetry that Lin Yutang deplored.

All was not lost, though: there was an alternative. Even in the heyday of parallel prose, plain prose continued to be written. In time this plain kind of prose came to be known as guwen (ancient prose), as it looked back to the “attic” simplicity of the classics and early histories. Guwen did not become a popular notion until the Tang dynasty (618–907), when the pendulum swing against the mellifluity—associated with decadence—of the preceding age occurred. The guwen school’s view of prose style was close to that taken in the West: a good style consisted of no more and no less than putting in the best order the words that could best express one’s thoughts. Along with disdain for ornament naturally went esteem for substantial content. On the other hand, the emphasis on restoring ancient virtues was not conducive to the independence of thought we associate with the prose essay. Forceful argument, skillful reasoning, vehemence, and subtlety of expression are to be found in quantity in Tang prose, as they should be, considering that the Quan Tang wen (Complete Tang prose) includes 18,000 pieces by 3042 authors. What was lacking was an “I” and a “you”; discourse on serious subjects tended to be delivered from an imaginary pulpit and addressed to the whole of the civilized world, when not to the emperor.

As all scholars were perforce students of Chinese history, historical essays featured prominently among their occasional pieces, highlighting things they admired or censured or found a reinterpretation for. In the works of the two acknowledged guwen masters of the Tang dynasty, Han Yu (768–824) and Liu Zongyuan (773–819), many examples can be found. As the intention was to prove a point, their focus was on clear and cogent reasoning, with no frills attached. Relaxed discussion of familiar matters had to find a home in letters (as mentioned), and of cultural matters in prefaces, neither of which allowed for much expansiveness. In three respects, however, they pushed forward the frontiers of prose composition. First, they used the zhuan (biography) to write of humble tradesmen (masons, nurserymen, snake catchers), not so much for the people themselves but as spokesmen for ways of life or healthy, common-sense attitudes that they, the authors, endorsed; in other words, the subjects were hardly more than borrowed voices. Second, they developed the parable, Han Yu with his “Maoying zhuan” (Mr. Brush Tip) and Liu Zongyuan with his animal parables, which were very like Aesop’s fables. Third, Liu Zongyuan established the landscape essay as an art form. His “Yongzhou ba ji” (809; Eight descriptions of Yongzhou), each taking up on average no more than half a page in a modern edition, are like panels of a painting which put together form a broad vista. Yongzhou was on the remote southwest fringe of Hunan province, a wild region to which Liu had been demoted. There for the first time he apprehended Nature as an overwhelming presence that made his mind “congeal” and his body “dissolve.” From this communion derived the sketches that would inform the consciousness of nearly all subsequent practitioners of this genre.

The next high point in the history of Chinese prose came in the 11th century with the revival of guwen, which had in the interim been overshadowed again by pianwen. Compositions on matters of historical, philosophical, and general interest, previously the province of the disembodied intellect, were personalized in the hands of Ouyang Xiu (1007–72), Su Shi (1037–1101), and their like, and the taut and compact, heavily freighted language of Tang prose loosened and lightened. The sophistication and civility of the Song dynasty (960–1279) brought relatively ordinary and routine aspects of life into the ambit of prose composition, there to be celebrated precisely because they represented sophistication and civility. Ouyang Xiu’s best-remembered pieces are those about pavilions constructed in beauty spots—civilization brought to the wilderness. They gave occasion to talk about the surroundings, local history, and local personages, the author included. “Zuiwen ting ji” (1046; “The Old Drunkard’s Pavilion”), the most famous of all, pictures a scene of perfect rural harmony under the benevolent rule of the prefect—himself. Despite relaxing some tensions, though, Ouyang was still constrained by his literary vehicles: his thoughts on retirement had to be framed as zizhuan (autobiography), and his thoughts on autumn framed as a dialogue and called a fu (description).

His protégé Su Shi went further than Ouyang in shaping what one might call the occasional essay, combining the elements of narrative, description, and reflection. Persuaded of his own genius, justifiably it must be admitted, Su was the first writer in the pantheon of Chinese prose whom modern essayists were willing to recognize as a precursor, on account of his free thinking and uninhibitedness. Though Han Yu could be very witty, Su Shi’s writing was unprecedented in its liberal display of humor, not to say jokiness. His sense of superiority, in being attuned to the true harmonies of creation, led him to put forward his own view of everything, so he is almost always entertaining. On the other hand, his perspective is too elevated for modern tastes: as author he places himself far above what he writes about. This characteristic is general among classical scholar-essayists, but is particularly salient in Su’s case. His occasional essays typically set a scene, introduce someone else’s response to it, then cap that response with his own wiser view, leading to a serene resolution. They are faultlessly written, but they leave the impression that with Su Shi the magic of words takes precedence over truthfulness to experience.

The mainstream of classical prose after Su Shi flowed along a smooth bed for several hundred years. Lin Yutang discovered in it only a purely linguistic craftsmanship, “laid over a paucity of characterization, a vacuity of facts, and a baldness of sentiment.” That criticism was made specially to deflate the reputation of Gui Youguang’s (1506–71) finest piece, “Xianbi shiliüe,” in memory of his mother. But there Lin erred. Granted the brevity (this and similar pieces are only about a page long) and baldness of statement; yet more sympathetic readers have found this piece extremely vivid and unbearably moving. Facts may be few, but they are tellingly chosen; as for sentiment, Lin does not seem to have realized that things half-said or unsaid may be more powerfully affective than things said at length. Classical Chinese prose in fact made as much use of empty spaces as Chinese painting.

The next highwater came with a surge toward individualism at the end of the 16th century, which threw up the Gongan school, headed by Yuan Hongdao (1568–1610), and its successors. Like Su Shi they believed in genius, but unlike him they did not think of genius as a superior accomplishment but rather as innate in all individuals. Hence they rejoiced in popular entertainments and all interests pursued with gusto. Consistent with this attitude, the language they used, while still basically classical—for who would wish to relinquish such a rich inheritance?—straddled the boundary between the refined and vulgar, making raids in both directions, and frequently echoed the rhythms of speech. Zhang Dai (1597–1679) was the last and best exponent of this style and persuasion. The new authoritarian Manchu dynasty closed down their business.

The grip of the classical language was loosened toward the end of the 19th century with the founding of journals and magazines in the principal cities, the heaviest concentration being in Shanghai. At last the time was ripe for the type of essay that the West had been familiar with since the same conditions pertained there: generous space to expatiate in, a readership no longer exclusively of the elite, but increasingly of middle-class citizens eager to expand their horizons, and financial rewards adequate to make writing for journals a valuable source of income. A new kind of written language, popularized by the leading journalist-intellectual of the day, Liang Qichao (1873–1929), became the standard medium for practical purposes. This still employed classical syntax, but its range was limited; more positively, it opened its doors wide to the vocabulary of the social sciences which had been introduced by translations of Western works. Within one generation there was a revolution in the way thoughts were formulated.

History decreed, however, that this simplified literary language would only be transitional. The flower of Chinese youth came back from being educated abroad to support the argument that survival in the 20th century required the unification of written and spoken languages, and the New Literature that took off around 1920 was all written in the vernacular (baihua). To sustain its newness the New Literature looked to foreign models, which included the foreign—principally English—essay. For the first few years when the New Literature was fighting its factional wars the polemical essay reigned supreme: that was when Lu Xun (1881–1936) won his spurs. Thereafter the civil essay shared the living space of prose: in the 1930s the “gentlemanly” essays of Zhou Zuoren (1885–1967) and the humorous essays of Lin Yutang gained a large following; by then the notion that the purpose of the essay was to enrich life, rather than pursue controversy, had taken firm hold.

In this Republican period (1912–49) the Chinese vernacular essay resembled the English essay in the manner of taking its readers into its confidence, and being frank and open; the author placed himself on a level with the reader, in fact often inferior to him, confessing weakness and failings. It also likewise took its subject matter from daily life and personal experience. Nevertheless, comparatively few followed the English model in taking a topic and discussing it intelligently and entertainingly from a variety of angles.

Only two writers stand out in this respect: Liang Yuchun (1906–32), who earned the sobriquet of “the Chinese Elia,” and Liang Shiqiu (1902–87), whose wartime essays reached a peak of urbanity. Adopting a droll and quizzical tone, these essays dealt with universal, everyday topics such as haircuts, illness, and anonymous letters. They included only enough personal matter to create familiarity; otherwise they drew upon observed behavior and the wit and wisdom of others. Liang Shiqiu’s great strength, apart from his way with words, was his knowledge of his native culture and way of life, of course, but also his extensive education in Western literature (he had studied at Harvard). Chinese and foreign old saws and modern instances therefore came easily to him, and put the stamp of a genuine man of the world on his work.

The great majority of modern essayists were, understandably, more native in their values and inclinations. They did not appreciate the rambling sentences and involved reasoning of the foreign essay. Argument, whether or not alleviated with wit or energized by histrionics, they preferred to assign to a separate category known as zawen, or contentions essays. Pure prose, in their book, should exemplify such virtues as sparkling freshness, intricate description, and “truthfulness” (zhen), by which in practice they meant something like soulfulness. In sum, the bent of their essays was toward lyricism—hence the popularity of “sketches” and reminiscences.

In the second half of the 20th century, essay writing did not go into the decline suffered in the West; on the other hand, it is difficult to name any really outstanding exponents of the art. In communist China it was impossible for three decades to write honestly: laudatory “reportage” was the order of the day. Since the relaxation of controls in the 1980s new reputations have yet to be made. In Taiwan the trend in prose has been toward narrative and dramatization, employing a large amount of dialogue. Those who have published most have been academics, but that has not guaranteed freedom from slackness and shallowness. An honorable mention should, however, be made of Yu Guangzhong (1928–), who can be relied upon to write wittily.

To return to where we began, euphuism has not disappeared from Chinese prose: encomia of people and places that bear little relation to reality are still tolerated, especially in mainland China. Nor is wisdom at a premium in the present age; perhaps it is out of fashion everywhere. Wisdom tends to do its work covertly, as in what may be called the “existential” essays of Hong Kong writer Xiao Si (1938–), which hint at the lessons that may be drawn from cameos of commonplace experience, and in the bizarre perceptions of the Taiwanese prose-poet Shang Qin (1920–). Of more lengthy compositions, the most interesting, particularly to the foreign reader, are those that capture the character of life in the community in which the author grew up, cherished mostly as memories now that impersonal urbanization has spread or is spreading everywhere.

D.E.POLLARD

Anthologies

Chinese Classical Prose: The Eight Masters of the T'ang-Sung Period, edited by Liu Shih-shun, Hong Kong: Chinese University of Hong Kong Research Centre for

Translation, 1979

The Columbia Anthology of Modern Chinese Literature, edited by Joseph S.M.Lau and Howard Goldblatt, New York: Columbia University Press, 1995:585–716

The Columbia Anthology of Traditional Chinese Literature, edited by Victor Mair, New York: Columbia University Press, 1994: 507–756

Gems of Chinese Literature, edited by Herbert A.Giles, Shanghai and London: Kelly and Walsh, revised edition, 1922 (original edition, 1884)

Renditions issue on classical Chinese prose, 33–34 (1990)

Renditions issue on classical Chinese letters, 41–42 (1994)

Further Reading

Lin Yutang, My Country and My People, London: Heinemann, 1936

Liu Yan, editor, Zhongguo sanwen shigang (An outline history of Chinese prose), Hunan: Hunan jiaoyu chubanshe, 1994

Pollard, D.E., A Chinese Look at Literature: The Literary Values of Chou Tso-jen in Relation to the Tradition, London: Hurst, 1973

Pollard, D.E., “Ch’i in Chinese Literary Theory,” in Chinese Approaches to Literature from Confucius to Liang Ch’i-ch’ao, edited by Adele Austin Rickett, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1978:43–66

Cicero

Roman, 106–43 BCE

Few writers succeed in becoming an eponym for writing itself. There is no doubt that Cicero is one of those few. To be called a “Cicero” is to be dubbed a master of the periodic sentence and the clausula. Quintilian declared Cicero the name “not of a man, but of eloquence itself.” Throughout Europe, from his own century (or at least from Quintilian’s) until ours, Cicero’s letters and orations became the premier model for prose style, not only in Latin, but in modern European languages as well.

Cicero’s prose composition is actually oratorical composition: it is written to be declaimed, to imitate the cadences of formal speech before a public body. Perhaps this is not as much of a distinction as it first appears, for to some extent all prose style imitates speech. Yet the speech patterns Cicero’s prose records are those of his speeches in the Roman Senate. It would be another generation, the generation of Tacitus and Seneca, before Roman writers would turn to the rhythms of conversational speech for models.

Though the essay as we know it is largely a product of the Renaissance, Cicero’s prose works imitating orations on various subjects certainly qualify as essays in the widest sense, even those which were actually declaimed in the Senate or cast in the form of dialogues. Certainly many of our modern essays were first delivered as lectures or speeches. Cicero’s treatises, whatever form, touch on as many subjects, general and specific, as Montaigne’s essays: oratory itself (De oratore, Brutus, De inventione), old age (De senectute), prophecy (De divinatione), political science (De re publica), law (De legibus), duty (De officiis), friendship (De amicitia).

The hallmarks of Cicero's prose style are the period and the rhythmic clausula. The period is a long, stately sentence which suspends the verb until the end (a natural tendency in Latin style) with chains of subordinate clauses and balanced antitheses. Because the clauses and phrases between subject and predicate can vary in length, the periodic sentence is capable of a variety of rhythmic effects. The clausula or cursus, the rhetorical term for the closing words of a sentence, is another rhythmic device for Cicero. Whether the sentence is short or long, Cicero's control of its final cadence almost invariably follows a specific metrical pattern. Thus the cadence at the end of the period gives to the ear the same sense of closure as the grammatical resolution of the sentence gives to the understanding.

As famous as the more stately effects of period and clausula are in Ciceronian style, Cicero was just as capable of short, swift, staccato rhythms which set his longer sentences into relief. As Cicero himself put it, he could use the dagger (pugiunculus) as well as the broadsword. His most quoted phrase is not only itself a simple vocative phrase, but is also followed by equally simple two- and three-word clauses: "o tempora, o mores! Senatus haec intelligit, consul videt: hic tamen vivit" ("O the times, o the mores! The Senate knows these things, the consul sees them; yet this man lives") (first oration, In Catalinam).

Furthermore, what makes Cicero's use of rhythmic techniques so effective is that they appear to be unstudied, though of course they must be consciously crafted. Though his treatises on rhetoric make clear that he distinguished the composition of oratory from that of the written word, all writing for Cicero should appeal to the ear. Petrarch reported that he fell in love with Cicero's prose by hearing it declaimed, charmed by the sound, long before he could understand what the words meant. Yet euphony at the expense of meaning was anathema to Cicero. He criticized precisely that as a fault of the "Asianist" style of some of his contemporaries. Cicero's choice of a word may depend on its sound value, but it is always found to be precisely the right word in meaning as well.

The direct influence that Cicero has had on modern European prose style is tremendous. Yet indirectly he also influenced virtually every Christian writer of the Middle Ages, for having been St. Jerome's stylistic guide in translating the Bible. In fact, in a fevered nightmare Jerome saw himself at the gates of heaven, begging entrance as a devout Christian, only to be told he was not a Christian but rather a Ciceronian. Though Jerome felt guilty for the association with the pagan writer, few stylists after his day gave it a second thought. Cardinal Newman called Cicero "the only master of style I have ever had." That is what he has represented for many essayists over the centuries: a master of style—a Cicero.

JOHN R.HOLMES

See also Classical Influences

Biography

Marcus Tullius Cicero. Born 3 January 106 BCE in Arpinum (now Arpino, central Italy).

Served in the army of Pompeius Strabo, 89. Appeared in courts as a lawyer, from 81. Married Terentia, 80 (divorced, 47): one daughter and one son. Quaestor (financial administrator) in western Sicily, 75; praetor (judicial officer), 66; consul, 63: exposed Catiline's conspiracy to carry out uprisings in Italy and arson in Rome; declared an exile by Clodius, 58, and lived in Thessalonica and Illyricum, but recalled with the help of Pompey, 57; reluctantly allied himself with triumvirate of Pompey, Caesar, and Crassus, 56, and retired from public life until 51; elected augur of the college of diviners, 53; governor of Cilicia, Asia Minor, 51–50; allied with Pompey in civil war, 49–48: after Pompey's defeat Cicero's safety was guaranteed by Caesar. Married Publilia (divorced, 45). After Caesar's assassination, 44, supported general amnesty (delivered 14 Philippic orations against Antony, 44–43); the triumvirate of Octavian, Antony, and Lepidus put Cicero on the execution list, 43: he was captured and killed in Formiae (now Formia), 7 December 43 BCE.

Selected Writings

Related Prose

- Brutus*, edited by H.Malcovati, 1963, and A.E.Douglas, 1966; translated by H.M.Poteat, 1950
- De amicitia*, edited by H.E.Gould, 1983; as On Friendship, translated by Benjamin E.Smith, 1897, and edited and translated by J.G.F.Powell, 1990
- De divinatione*, edited by Arthur S.Pease, 4 vols., 1920–23; translated by William Arthur Falconer, 1922; as On Divination, translated by H.M.Poteat, 1950
- De domo sua*, edited by R.G.Nisbet, 1939
- De finibus*, edited by J.N.Madvid, 1876; part edited by J.S.Reid, 1925
- De inventione*, edited and translated by H.M.Hubbell (Loeb Edition), 1949
- De legibus*, with De re publica, translated by Clinton Walker Keyes (Loeb Edition), 1928; Book I edited by Niall Rudd and Thomas Wiedemann, 1987
- De natura deorum*, edited by A.S.Pease, 2 vols., 1955–58; as On the Nature of the Gods, translated by H.M.Poteat, 1950, and H.C.P.McGregor, 1972
- De officiis*, edited by P.Fedeli, 1965; as On Duties, translated by H.M.Poteat, 1950, John Higginbotham, 1967, Harry G. Edinger, 1974, M.T.Griffin and E.M.Atkins, 1991, and M.Winterbottom, 1994
- De oratore*, edited by H.Rackham, translated by E.W.Sutton (Loeb Edition), 2 vols., 1959–60
- De re publica*, with De legibus, translated by Clinton Walker Keyes (Loeb Edition), 1928; as On the Commonwealth, translated by G.H. Sabine and S.B. Smith, 1929; selections as Res Publica, translated by W.K.Lacey and Harry G.Edinger, 1974; selections edited by James E.G.Zetzel, 1995
- De senectute*, edited by Leonard Huxley, revised edition, 1923, Ioannes Salanitro, 1987, and J.G.F.Powell, 1988; translated by William Armistead Falconer, 1922; as On Old Age, translated by Frank Copley, 1967
- Epistulae ad Atticum: Letters to Atticus*, edited by W.S.Watt, 2 vols., 1961–65; edited and translated by D.R.Shackleton Bailey, 7 vols., 1965–70
- Epistulae ad familiares*, edited by D.R.Shackleton Bailey, 2 vols., 1977, and W.S.Watt, 1982; translated by D.R.Shackleton Bailey, 1978
- Epistulae ad Quintum frateum et M.Brutum*, edited by W.S.Watt, 1958, and

- D.R.Shackleton Bailey, 1980; translated by D.R. Shackleton Bailey, 1978
In Catalinam, edited by H.Bornecque, 1963
In Pisonem, edited by R.G.Nisbet, 1961
In Vatinius, edited by L.F.Pocock, 1926
Kerrines II, translated by T.N.Mitchell, 1986
Laelius, edited by Frank Stock, revised edition, 1930; as On Friendship, translated by Frank Copley, 1967, and J.G.F. Powell, 1990
 [Letters], edited by R.Y.Tyrrell and L.C.Purser, 7 vols., 1899–1918; selections as Letters, translated by L.P.Wilkinson, 1949; Selected Letters, translated by D.R.Shackleton Bailey, 1980
Philippics I-II, edited by J.D.Denniston, 1939, and D.R. Shackleton Bailey, 1986
Pro M.Caelio, edited by R.G.Austin, 1960
Somnium Scipionis, as The Dream of Scipio, with Nine Orations, translated by Smith P.Bovie, 1967, Percy Bullock, 1983, and J.G.F.Powell, 1990
Tusculanae disputationes, edited by Thomas W.Dougan and Robert M.Henry, 2 vols., 1905; as Tusculan Disputations (Loeb Edition), translated by J.E.King, 1927; part translated by A.E. Douglas, 1990
Selected Works, translated by Michael Grant, 1960
The Caesarian Orations, translated by G.J.Acheson, 1965
Nine Orations and the Dream of Scipio, translated by Smith P. Bovie, 1967
Selected Political Speeches, translated by Michael Grant, 1969; revised edition, 1973
On the Good Life (selections), translated by Michael Grant, 1971
Murder Trials (selected orations), translated by Michael Grant, 1975
Back from Exile: Six Speeches upon His Return, edited and translated by D.R.Shackleton Bailey, 1991
Caesarian Speeches, edited by Harold C.Gotoff, 1993
On Government, translated by Michael Grant, 1993
The Fragmentary Speeches, edited by Jane W.Crawford, 1994
 Collected works edition: Works (Loeb Edition; bilingual), translated by C.Macdonald, 28 vols., 1977.

Further Reading

- Douglas, Alan Edward, "The Intellectual Background of Cicero's Rhetorica," in Aufstieg und Niedergang der römischen Welt, vol. 2, edited by Hildegard Temporini, Berlin: de Gruyter, 1973
 Gotoff, Harold C., Cicero's Elegant Style: An Analysis of the "Pro Archia", Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1979
 Haskell, H.J., This Was Cicero: Modern Politics in a Roman Toga, Greenwich, Connecticut: Fawcett, 1964 (original edition, 1942)
 Hunt, H.A.K., The Humanism of Cicero, Melbourne: Melbourne University Press, 1954
 Johnson, Walter R., Luxuriance and Economy: Cicero and the Alien Style, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1971
 Laurand, Louis, Études sur le style des discours de Cicéron, Paris: Hachette, 1928 (original edition, 1907)
 Mitchell, Thomas N., Cicero: The Ascending Years, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1979
 Petersson, Torsten, Cicero: A Biography, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1920

Rawson, Elizabeth, Cicero: A Portrait, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, and Bristol: Bristol Classical Press, revised edition, 1983 (original edition, 1975)
 Shackleton Bailey, D.R., Cicero, London: Duckworth, 1971; New York: Scribner, 1972
 Stockton, David L., Cicero: A Political Biography, London: Oxford University Press, 1971

Cioran, E.M.

Romanian/French, 1911–1995

E.M.Cioran's work bears the stamp of despair, expressed from the outset in finely honed aphorisms. At the age of 23, after finishing his studies in philosophy, he published a first collection in Romanian, Pe culmile disperării (1934; On the Heights of Despair), in which he was already broaching questions about the meaning of existence, the relationship between man and God, and the problem of death. Here he comes across as a thinker who is convinced of the futility of philosophy and is immersed in tedium, in an agonizing emptiness, even, all of which consumes him to the point of insomnia and brings him close to madness. The titles of the opening sections, "Unable to live any longer" and "The passion for the absurd," give an indication of the work to come, which is an apologia for skepticism, but one that still measures itself against the divine, as does Lacrimi si sfinți (1937; Tears and saints). He wishes then to be the equal of Schopenhauer, or be nothing.

After several other collections written in Romanian, Cioran settled in France in 1937 and made a permanent choice to use the French language, "the ideal idiom for delicately translating elusive feelings," in order to express an increasingly dark pessimism, as is voiced in uncompromising titles: from the Précis de décomposition (1949; A Short History of Decay), De l'inconvénient d'être né (1973; The Trouble with Being Born), or La Tentation d'exister (1956; Temptation to Exist), to the recent Aveux et anathèmes (1987; Anathemas and Admirations). The brief form here is closely implicated with paradox and irony, making it possible for Cioran to escape the overweening presumption of philosophy while still writing rigorously. He resembles Heraclitus in his sense of conciseness, and Mallarmé in the attention he gives to language. This lover of aphorisms has henceforth chosen the humility of the essayist: "How is it possible to be a philosopher? To have the audacity to attack time, beauty, God and the rest? The mind puffs up and struts shamelessly. Metaphysics, poetry—the impertinences of a louse..." (Syllogismes de l'antertume [1952; Syllogisms of bitterness]).

In fact, the philosopher speaks of ideas, constructs a system of abstracts, while the essayist speaks of his own existence: "The aphorism is cultivated only by those who have known fear amidst words, that fear of collapsing with all the words." This existential quest always goes hand in hand with the work of writing, Cioran's tone being particularly easy to locate, in the succinctness of his pessimistic sentences and his taste for paradoxical statements, sarcasm, and derision. Such derision led him, in his early beginnings in Romania, to reactionary statements, and to virulent anti-Semitic positions, which he was to repudiate after World War II in a new awareness of the suffering inflicted upon European Judaism.

Side by side with these aphorisms, a few books are made up of longer pieces, such as Histoire et utopie (1960; History and Utopia), in which he attempts to denounce all ideologies, since no political undertaking could make good the loss of the vanished paradise of one's origins. He therefore followed a course which ran parallel to that of his compatriot Eugène Ionesco, choosing the French language, the better to tell of the absurdity of life. But, being more radical than Ionesco in his options, Cioran also modeled himself on Joseph de Maistre, whom he admired, on another foreigner who chose to write in French, the Irishman Samuel Beckett, and also on Maurice Blanchot and Henri Michaux, other literary figures who were haunted by suicide. Since the irreparable had been committed from birth ("Not to have been born, just to think of it—what happiness, what freedom, what space!"), Cioran was left to live like Job on his dung heap, torn between lamentation and fatalism, but with an increasing mistrust of God, or any other form of the absolute, and a cynicism which held at a distance any new idols we might be tempted to set up. Only lucidity had any importance: according to Cioran we must be mistrustful of ourselves, and resist the desire to organize philosophy like "a coherent vision of chaos." There is no outcome to be hoped for, since "the tragedy of detachment is that we cannot measure its progress. We move forward in a wilderness, and never know where we are." Man, for Cioran, emerged from the Apocalypse to end in disaster. Only music finds favor with him, principally that of Bach—"to whom God owes everything"—and a few writers such as Beckett, Paul Valéry, his compatriot Mircea Eliade, and Michaux, to whom he dedicated his "exercises in admiration."

It is Cioran's lucidity which explains the constant success of an author who never wished to be modern, long after existentialism and the writers of the absurd ceased to occupy center stage. The man who dreamed of writing "a light and unhealthy book, which would be at the edge of everything, and would be addressed to no one," who declared, "a book, which, after demolishing everything, did not demolish itself, will have infuriated us in vain," keeps a large audience of admirers, as much for his uncompromising ethics as for his incisive style. Although the last words of his late book, Anathemas and Admirations, put forward an ultimate paradox—"After all, I have not wasted my time, I, too, have been flung up and down, just like anybody else, in this aberrant universe"—readers are not wasting their time, either, in facing up to the question of the meaning of existence, in a body of work which is the heir to the French moralists of the 18th century.

MARC LITS

Biography

Émile Michel Cioran. Born 8 April 1911 in Rasinari, Romania. Studied at the lycée in Sibiu, 1920–27; philosophy at the University of Bucharest, 1928–31; fellowship to study in Germany, 1934–35; teaching certificate in philosophy, 1936. Won a fellowship from the French Institute, Bucharest, and moved permanently to Paris, 1937. Studied English at the Sorbonne. Part-time translator and manuscript reader, from 1949. Awards: King

Carol II Foundation for Art and Literature Award (Romania), 1934; French Language Prize, 1949. Died in Paris, 20 June 1995.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

- Pe culmile disperării*, 1934; as Sur les cimes du désespoir, 1990; as On the Heights of Despair, translated by Ilinca ZarifopolJohnston, 1992
- Cartea amăgirilor*, 1936; as *Le Livre des leurre*s, 1992
- Schimbarea la față a României*, 1936
- Lacrimi și sfinți*, 1937; as Des Larmes et des saints, 1986
- Amurgul Gândurilor*, 1940; as Le Crépuscule des pensées, 1991
- Précis de décomposition*, 1949; as A Short History of Decay, translated by Richard Howard, 1975
- Syllogismes de l'amertume*, 1952
- La Tentation d'exister*, 1956; as Temptation to Exist, translated by Richard Howard, 1968
- Histoire et utopie*, 1960; as History and Utopia, translated by Richard Howard, 1987
- La Chute dans le temps*, 1964; as The Fall into Time, translated by Richard Howard, 1970
- Le Mauvais Démon*, 1969; as The New Gods, translated by Richard Howard, 1974
- Valéry face à ses idoles*, 1970
- De l'inconvénient d'être né*, 1973; as The Trouble with Being Born, translated by Richard Howard, 1976
- Écartèlement*, 1979; as Drawn and Quartered, translated by Richard Howard, 1983
- Exercices d'admiration*, 1986
- Aveux et anathèmes*, 1987; as Anathemas and Admirations, translated by Richard Howard, 1991
- Revelatiile durerii*, edited by Mariana Vartic and Aurel Sasu, 1991 Bréviaire des vaincus, 1993
- Collected works edition: Œuvres, 1995.

Further Reading

- Cioran, E.M., Entretiens avec Sylvie Jaudeau, Paris: Corti, 1990
- Gruzinska, Aleksandra, "Émile Michel Cioran," Miorita: A Journal of Romanian Studies 10 (1986):27–53
- Gruzinska, Aleksandra, "E.M.Cioran and the Idea of Admiration," Journal of the American Romanian Academy of Arts and Sciences 13–14 (1990):145–61
- Jaudeau, Sylvie, Cioran, ou le dernier homme, Paris: Corti, 1990
- Kimball, Roger, "The Anguishes of E.M.Cioran," New Criterion 6, no.7 (March 1988):37–44
- Liiceanu, Gabriel, Itinéraire d'une vie: E.M.Cioran, Paris: Michalon, 1995
- Massmer, Michael W., "In Complicity with Words: The Asymptotic Consciousness of E.M.Cioran," in The Secular Mind: Transformations of Faith in Modern Europe, edited by W. Warren Wagar, New York: Holmes and Meier, 1982:220–38
- Savater, Fernando, Ensayo sobre Cioran, Madrid: Taurus, 1974

Sora, Mariana, Cioran jadis et naguère, Paris: L'Herne, 1988

Tiffrea, Philippe, Cioran, ou la dissection du gouffre, Paris: Veyrier, 1991

Clarke, Marcus

Australian, 1846–1881

Marcus Clarke is today acknowledged as the most notable prose writer of colonial Australia. Like many postcolonial writers, particularly those of the 19th century, his reputation did not begin to emerge until the 1950s. Even then he was critically reclaimed mainly as the author of the widely read novel, His Natural Life (1874), which dramatizes and explores in depth the horrors of the system of convict transportation. As a consequence, his considerable body of essays, written as a necessary part of the output of most authors of his time, was neglected. In addition, his essays were not collected in substantial (if still incomplete) form until the 1970s because journalism, of which they form a part, was for a long time regarded as an inferior and ephemeral branch of literature. This is ironic because in everything he wrote Clarke was the most literary of writers.

Clarke was an unwilling English emigrant to Australia, uprooted from a comfortable position in upper-middle-class English life and the prospects that went with it at an early age and under the shadow of family tragedy: his widower father collapsed physically and mentally and died shortly after Clarke arrived in Australia when he was 17, having emigrated on the advice of relations. But if he retained traces of exile, he also drew upon the resources of his fertile if mercurial temperament to meet, indeed to enjoy the challenges of post-goldrush Melbourne, which mushroomed into one of the world's considerable and progressive cities.

One of his fellow students at Highgate School in London, Gerard Manley Hopkins, described him as “a kaleidoscopic, particoloured, harlequinesque, thaumatropic being.” Clarke's subject matter and styles grew out of his cross-cultural experiences and the nature of his audience. He had the background to stand apart from the pretensions and rawness of colonial society, yet he could also appreciate its vitality, nascent spirit of difference, and unconventionality. Correspondingly, as a stylist he was able to draw on the intertextuality of British, French, German, and classical literature, not simply to call up tradition but to show how writing is open to rejuvenating change when subjected to the pressures of registering the difference of a new culture.

Hence in writing of Melbourne low life in a series of essays called “Lower Bohemia” (1869), he could remind readers that the misery he was depicting “exists here,” not in Europe but in Europe transposed or translated, and that the low-life genre drew on literary models ranging from popular writers such as Paul de Kock, Eugène Sue, Beranger, Mayhew, Wilkie Collins, back to Defoe, Dante, and beyond. Clarke could call these up, not to echo them, but to appropriate them. Similarly, in “In Outer Darkness” (1869), he alluded to “the wild and fascinating life of the prairies—history told by Cooper, Aimard, Reid and a hundred minor chatterers,” for Clarke was sensitive to emerging American literature and aware of its parallels with Australian literature.

If Clarke could cast a sympathetic yet observant eye on Melbourne low life, he turned his writerly hand to a variety of subgenres and appropriate styles: satirical sketches of the rising professional classes of doctors, lawyers, and nouveaux riches in a series called “The Wicked World” (1874); an out-and-about weekly column, “The Peripatetic Philosopher” (1867–70), using the persona of a literary cynic and fringe dweller who commented on personalities, events (such as the visit of the Duke of Edinburgh), topics of the day, and set pieces, such as colonial holiday-making; write-ups of the theater, to which he was himself a contributor; sketches for a short-lived comic journal he edited, Humbug (1869–70), a rival of the Melbourne Punch; controversy in Civilisation Without Delusion (1880; later as What Is Religion?, 1895), a public debate with the Anglican bishop; and literary criticism or belles-lettres, including reviews and perceptive essays on his two main fictional models, Dickens and Balzac. He also wrote a pioneering piece on the connections between contemporary graphic art and literature, “Modern Art and Gustave Doré” (1867). An essay of art criticism, reprinted as a preface to a volume of Adam Lindsay Gordon’s poetry (1876), was influential in setting the “keynote” of Australian scenery as “weird melancholy,” with reminiscences of E.T.A.Hoffmann and Edgar Allan Poe, for Clarke’s landscapes were typically literary.

In his preface to selections from The Peripatetic Philosopher (1869), Clarke named his models as “Thackeray, Dickens, Balzac, George Sala and Douglas Jerrold”—in other words, the popular novelists and journalists of the day noted for their vivid and satirical social sketches. Clarke hoped to “equal Thackeray in satire and Dickens in description.” He also aimed to capture what he saw in Defoe and Dickens as “the romance of reality,” the extrarealistic.

Clarke’s audience was a local one, the Melbourne metropolis, though he achieved some interstate fame in Australia and sent several dispatches to the London Daily Telegraph. Local magazines were precariously short-lived and Clarke’s main contributions were to the weekend magazines of the leading papers, the Australasian (published by the Argus) and the Leader (the Age). These were the counterparts of British literary weeklies and often had to compete with them and British magazines available at comparative prices. Some of the Australian outlets looked nostalgically back to England, others to the local, developing society, and some swung between the two. Clarke catered for both tastes. His allusiveness appealed to the one, his gusto, tinged with satire, to the other. He was criticized by some contemporaries for his “fluency,” a superficial wit and cleverness, but his stylistic flair, together with his observant eye and his manipulation of the market, made him popular and a target for envy if not an easy model to follow. These qualities insure that many of his essays repay reading today.

LAURIE HERGENHAN

Biography

Marcus Andrew Hislop Clarke. Born 24 April 1846 in London. Studied at Highgate School, London, with fellow students Cyril and Gerard Manley Hopkins. Father committed to an insane asylum, and Clarke emigrated to Australia, 1863. Worked for the Bank of Australia, Melbourne, 1864; worked on sheep stations in Western Victoria, 1865–67, then returned to Melbourne. Began contributing to journals and magazines, from 1865, including the Argus, Australian Monthly Magazine, the Age, the Leader, Melbourne Review, Victorian Review, and the London Daily Telegraph; columnist, as “The Peripatetic Philosopher,” the Australasian, 1867–70; editor, Colonial Monthly, 1868–69, Humbug, 1869–70, and the Australian Journal, 1870–71. Cofounder, Yorick Club, Melbourne, 1868. Married Marian Dunn, 1869: six children. Worked for the Melbourne Public Library, from 1870. Went bankrupt, 1874, 1881. Died (of pleurisy and liver problems) in St. Kilda, 2 August 1881.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

The Peripatetic Philosopher (under the name “Q”), 1869

The Future Australian Race, 1877

Civilisation Without Delusion, 1880; revised edition, as What Is Religion?, 1895

The Marcus Clarke Memorial Volume, edited by Hamilton Mackinnon, 1884

Selected Works (Austral Edition), edited by Hamilton Mackinnon, 1890

A Marcus Clarke Reader, edited by Bill Wannan, 1963

A Colonial City: High and Low Life: Selected Journalism, edited by L.T.Hergenhan, 1972

Marcus Clarke: Portable Australian Authors (also contains the novel His Natural Life), edited by Michael Wilding, 1976

Other writings: three novels (Long Odds, 1869; His Natural Life, 1874 [as For the Term of His Natural Life, 1884]; Chidiack Tichbourne, 1893) tales (including Old Tales of a Young Country, 1871; Stories, edited by Michael Wilding, 1983), plays, and an operetta.

Bibliography

McLaren, Ian F., Marcus Clarke: An Annotated Bibliography, Melbourne: Library Council of Victoria, 1982

Further Reading

Elliott, Brian, Marcus Clarke, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1958

Hergenhan, L.T., Introduction to A Colonial City: High and Low Life: Selected Journalism by Clarke, St. Lucia: University of Queensland Press, 1972

McCann, Andrew, “Marcus Clarke and the Society of the Spectacle: Reflections on Writing and Commodity Capitalism in Nineteenth-Century Melbourne,” Australian Literary Studies 17, no. 2 (October 1995):222–34

Wilding, Michael, Marcus Clarke, Melbourne: Oxford University Press, 1977 (includes a select bibliography)

Classical Influences

The essay genre as pioneered by Michel de Montaigne, Erasmus, Francis Bacon, and their Renaissance contemporaries rose out of the attempt by the first modern theorists of language to negotiate a settlement with the inheritance of classical rhetorical theories. Writers in the 16th and 17th centuries explored the possibilities of exploiting the achievements of classical rhetoric to provide a foundation for the new vernacular humanist culture. As Morris Croll argues in Style, Rhetoric, and Rhythm (1966), his definitive study of 17th-century Attic prose, the conflict between “the oratorical style and the essay style” characterized the debate over the inheritance of classical rhetoric in the Renaissance. The first style, the Gorgian and Isocratean genus grande, was meant to signify the powerful voice of the virtuous public advocate and statesman. This style originated as the rhetorical basis of sophistic education, survived in the dominant Roman tradition of Ciceronianism, and continued to exert a powerful influence on medieval Latin culture. It is characterized by symmetrical phrasing, ornate sentences, and flamboyant periods, and is first and foremost the rhetoric of oral presentation. The style that grew in opposition to the “sophistic” rhetoric of this first school came to be called the genus humile. Finding its ultimate authority in Socratic dialectic, the flexible, formless, “humble” species of discourse is well suited to conversation and philosophical speculation. While we should recognize in this latter tradition the practice of writing that ultimately became the early modern essay, we must also remember that the essay as a literary genre developed out of the various attempts to reconcile and interweave these conflicting traditions.

The most frequently cited classical precursors to the modern essay form are Horace (65–8 BCE), Seneca (c. 4 BCE–65 CE), Tacitus (c. 56–116 CE), Plato (c. 429/27–347 BCE), and Demosthenes (c. 384–322 BCE), among many others. The “curt” and “loose” styles of what became known as the modern essay sought to imitate the pointed language of the mature, self-reflective, and humble mode of the great letter writers and dialecticians of the classical era. Montaigne, inventor of the modern essai, admired the self-critical and autobiographical spirit of skeptical inquiry that he found in this tradition, and sought a vernacular prose form for exploring its possibilities. In the moral treatises of Plutarch (c. 46–0. 120/25 CE) and Seneca, Montaigne found inspiration for his own varied speculations. The titles of Montaigne’s essays, such as “Toutes Choses ont leur saison” (“All Things Have Their Season”) and “Que philosopher c’est apprendre a mourir” (“To Philosophize Is to Learn How to Die”), reflect the influences of classical moralism. A reader of Montaigne’s essays overhears the author’s musings and wanderings across a variety of topics, a “realistic” method that, according to Montaigne’s own admission, harkens back to the Roman satires of Horace and Lucilius (c. 180–c. 102 BCE). “Sur des vers de Virgile” (“On Some Verses of Virgil”) provides an occasion for Montaigne to reflect on his mind’s capacity to produce capricious and fleeting impressions: “But I am displeased with my mind for ordinarily producing its most profound and maddest fancies, and those I like the best, unexpectedly and when I am least looking for them; which suddenly vanish, having nothing to attach themselves to on the spot... So of these chance thoughts that drop into my mind there remains in my memory only a vain notion, only as much as I need to make me rack my brains and fret in quest of them to no particular purpose. Now then, leaving books aside and speaking more materially and simply..." The gesture implied by the final sentence is the signature of the new genus humile characteristic of the essay, which transports the reader out of the monastery and into the worldly experiences and pragmatic wisdom of the new cosmopolitan genre.

When Erasmus published his textbook on producing copious Latin prose, De duplici copia verborum ac rerum (1512.; On Copia [the abundance] of Words and Ideas), arguably the first modern book on the subject, the opening gambit had been made in the move from the study of rhetoric as technical achievement to the modern study of the experience of writing itself. His Encomium moriae (1511; The Praise of Folly) had already shifted the ground of traditional imitation theory by adding the self-conscious sense of a rapidly developing modern subjectivity to the pursuit of truth through a fallen, linguistic medium; and the Adagia (1500; Adages), generically speaking, laid the foundation for the construction of the first properly named Essais (1580, 1588) by Montaigne. The chief intertext for On Copia, as it was for much of the Renaissance, was the tenth book of Quintilian's (c. 35–c. 100 CE) Institutionis oratoriae (Institutes of Oratory). In that section, Quintilian writes, "We must return to what we have read and reconsider it with care, while, just as we do not swallow our food till we have chewed it and reduced it almost to a state of liquefaction to assist the process of digestion, so what we read must not be committed to the memory for subsequent imitation while it is still in a crude state, but must be softened and, if I may use the phrase, reduced to a pulp through frequent perusal." This passage summarizes a central problem of modern interpretation theory: how should the sensus germanus of an Ur-text be rendered adequately by later generations? If texts were to be digested and synthesized, what exegetical principles would ensure that a remnant of the original text would remain? In The Cornucopian Text: Problems of Writing in the French Renaissance (1979), Terrence Cave demonstrates the movement from classical mimesis as technique to exploratory writing as the modern obsession par excellence, arguing that "the Erasmian text, by its very movement from verba towards res, uncovers the essential duplicity of copia."

Another major break with the Ciceronianism of classical rhetorical education came in the last quarter of the 16th century. If the confident rhetoric of Ciceronian education had flourished in a time of relative political and social stability, further cracks began to appear in the classical façade when Marc-Antoine Muret delivered his lectures of 1582, appended to the Epistolae ad Atticum. Muret argues that the training offered by the old genus grande failed adequately to prepare young gentlemen for modern statecraft, a vocation that required the cultivation of conversation, wit, and dialectic. Public oratory rapidly began to be suspected as providing undue might to a mob scarcely ready to assume the mantle of power. As Montaigne suggests in his essay "De la vanité des paroles" ("The Vanity of Words"), public oratory became suspect as the material sign of a dangerously unstable republic. Modern societies needed the "good institution and sound counsel" fostered by the cultivation of dialectic, best instituted by a flexible essayistic rhetoric of self-criticism. This line of thought would be adopted by Milton, Hartlib, Bacon, and English educational reform.

Another force contributing to the decline of the grand style in the late Renaissance is the rapid displacement of classical authority by empirical methodology. The new plain prose style developed by Erasmus, Muret, Justus Lipsius, Francis Bacon, Blaise Pascal, Sir Thomas Browne, Robert Burton, Montaigne, and John Milton in the 16th and 17th centuries sought an appropriate forum for representing “man thinking,” a process necessitated by the new experimental priorities in political and scientific culture.

Rhetorical style—whether oral or written—illustrated the complex interrelationship of political, moral, and ethical positions available to Renaissance culture. Well aware of this connection, political and religious reformers in Britain, taking their cue from continental intellectuals such as Erasmus and Comenius, argued that in order for England to thrive as a rapidly expanding commercial nation, it must produce a confident, outward-looking national leadership, educated in the practical arts of navigation, cartography, and commerce. Not least among these reformers, John Milton added his voice to a national movement that sought radically to shift the foundation of education, a reformation that looked primarily to language and rhetorical training—deeply informed by classical theories—as the key to nation building. From the perspective of the language reformers and new essay writers, the standard academic curriculum in classical scholarship encouraged the development of a psychologically and socially stunted individual. In De augmentis scientiarum (1623), Bacon includes a supplementary comment not included in the English version (The Advancement of Learning) of 1605, which compares the new, plain style favorably to the old expansive rhetoric. He writes “...somewhat sounder is another form of style... [which] consists wholly in this: that the words be sharp and pointed; sentences concise; a style in short that may be called ‘turned’ rather than fused. Whence it happens that everything dealt with by this kind of art seems rather ingenious than lofty. Such a style is found in Seneca very freely used, in Tacitus and the younger Pliny more moderately; and is beginning to suit the ears of our age as never before.”

The practical advantages of this new style for constructing a national identity were explored most extensively by John Milton. As Milton writes in the seventh of the Prolusiones oratoriae, his series of Latin addresses to Oxford—quite plausibly conceived as self-reflexive and playful essays in the Erasmian and Montaignean style—“I confess that the man who shuts himself up and is almost entirely immured in study, is readier to talk with the gods than with men, either because he is habitually at home among celestial affairs...or because a mind which has been enlarged by the steady pursuit of divine interests is irked by physical constraints and disqualified from the more formal social amenities.” The social amenities that would be required in modern political culture would be best cultivated through a plain style of speaking and writing that in turn would be best nourished by the self-reflexive practice of writing.

The new continental essayism of Erasmus had as its goal, as Milton suggests, the production of a fully socialized individual, unburdened of the worst aspects of classical rhetoric that Erasmus and later Bacon and the continental reformers were busily revising. The old rhetorical and logical training—specifically, Milton argues, the oversubtle scholasticism comprising the traditional university curriculum in classical humanism—taught young men to be querulous self-doubters, unfit for public life, for which, presumably, the study of classical Greek and Roman rhetoric ought to prepare them. Citing Erasmus' reformation of classical style as a precursor, Milton writes of the old, unreformed rhetoricians: "...like an evil spirit, they have filled men's breasts with thorns and briars and have brought endless discord into the schools"—and thus into the nation at large. In his Latin orations, Milton describes this scholarly disputation over the fine points in classical rhetoric, against which Erasmus and other reforming humanists would rail, as an "impudent battle of words [which] does nothing for the good of society or for the honor or profit of our fatherland, the first priority, by common consent, in the sciences."

For the new rhetorical reformers the Aristotelian notion that empirical learning produces useful and instructive mental pleasure, contrary to Platonic interdictions against mere mimesis and sensory knowledge, provides another classical authority to replace the now discredited mechanical dryness of classical education. The intellectual pleasure taken in reinventing the correspondent universe that had been celebrated in the essays of Montaigne, Bacon, and Erasmus would be recuperable by a generation of reformers searching for solid rhetorical principles to insure the responsible administration of the nation. As Milton writes in Prolusion VII, "how great an additional pleasure of mind it is to take our flight over all the history and regions of the world, to view the conditions and changes of kingdoms, nations, cities, and people... This is the way to live in all the epochs of history...and to become a contemporary of time itself. And while we are looking forward to the future glory of our name, this will also be the way to extend life backward from the womb and to extort from unwilling Fate a kind of immortality in the past." Figures of spatial and temporal mastery, strongly linking the success of education to the pleasurable experience of acquiring and mastering knowledge, abound in Milton's work. Recalling Adam's panoramic survey of the future from atop a hill in Books XI and XII of Paradise Lost (1667), this new, pleasurable mastery must be achieved by a properly aerial perspective that encompasses the known world. Thus, references to maps, globes, charts, and compasses proliferate in the early modern essay.

A clear precursor to the Enlightenment rationalists, then, Milton's essays, tracts, and pamphlets turn back to Aristotle (384–322 BCE), advocating a detailed knowledge of the sensory experience of every living creature. This reliance on the cultivation of the senses in the early modern essay anticipated the 18th-century medicalization of the body in terms of a fully "disciplined" national individual, a vision which Milton articulates in Prolusion VI: "But if by living a modest and temperate life we...keep the heavenly powers of the mind clean and unstained from all filth and pollution...we would look back after a few years, to see how much distance we had covered, and what a mighty sea of learning we had quietly navigated." But the modest and temperate life advocated here must be enriched by the cultivation of wit and speculation. The connection between the pleasure of learning and the early French essays is clear from Milton's subtitle, "That sportive exercises are occasionally not adverse to philosophic studies," and he later cites Erasmus' The Praise of Folly as an exemplary bridge between duty and necessity provided by the early modern essay.

In Milton's Of Education (1644), even the study of grammar and rhetoric are concretely figured as images of exploration and commerce: "So that they having but newly left those grammatic flats and shallows where they stuck unreasonably to learn a few words of lamentable construction and now on the sudden transported under another climate to be tossed and turmoiled with their unballasted wits in fathomless and unquiet deeps of controversy, do for the most part grow into hatred and contempt of learning.” Milton’s sailing metaphor—so common in the early modern essay—recalls Quintilian’s image of the proper domain of Roman rhetoric in Institutes of Oratory: “Greek keels, even the little ones, know well their ports; let ours usually travel under fuller sails, with a stronger breeze swelling our canvas... They have the art of threading their way through the shallows; I would seek somewhat deeper waters, where my bark may be in no danger of foundering.” If the 17th-century rhetorical reforms had begun by deploring the unfortunate “psychological” consequences of hasty learning, perhaps a grounded flotilla represents the most frightening image of collective failure for the republican imagination in the habit of linking the metaphorical explorations of knowledge with the literal explorations of global expansion. The young student trained in the habit of rote memorization encouraged by the uncritical imitation of the old rhetoricians, hastily entered a public career for which the old rhetoric ill prepared him, and “ground[ed] [his] purposes not on the prudent and heavenly contemplation of justice and equity which was never taught them, but on the promising and pleasing thoughts of litigious terms, fat contentions, and flowing fees...” The metaphor of rhetorical education as grounding, getting solid footing on the moral soil of a Christian commonwealth, seems almost irrelevant here, in light of the massive emphasis placed throughout the reformist essays of the 17th century on secular travel and practical mastery.

The 17th-century essays of Bacon and Milton, in boldly advocating education’s socializing function—as strongly influenced by classical republicanism as by modern Realpolitik—laid the foundation for notions of sentimental education and Bildung that would begin to circulate throughout Europe by the end of the 18th century. It was this new scholarly and public-political rhetoric that would eventually yield the empiricist tradition of Hobbes and Locke, and further the dissemination of Enlightenment ideas in the 18th-century essay. A century after the prose revolution inspired by Milton, Bacon, and their French precursors, however, for many intellectuals, the practical rhetorical education—the plain style—that Erasmus’ generation had identified with republican reform, began to look like a force for repression. Friedrich von Schiller’s Briefe über die ästhetische Erziehung des Menschen (1795; Letters on the Aesthetic Education of Man) is an example of the Romantic tenor of this critique: “But today Necessity is master, and bends a degraded humanity beneath its tyrannous yoke. Utility is the great idol of the age, to which all powers must do service and all talents swear allegiance.” For a whole generation of Romantic essayists, the sublime wonders of the work of art would prepare the skeptical individual for the often unpleasant tasks mandated by the public duties and responsibilities at the moral core of the classical Roman essay and its early modern inheritors.

MATTHEW TITOLO

Further Reading

Cave, Terrence, The Cornucopian Text: Problems of Writing in the French Renaissance,

- Oxford: Clarendon Press, and New York: Oxford University Press, 1979
- Croll, Morris W., Style, Rhetoric, and Rhythm, edited by J. Max Patrick and others, Woodbridge, Connecticut: Ox Bow Press, 1989 (original edition, 1966)
- Curtius, Ernst Robert, European Literature and the Latin Middle Ages, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1990 (original German edition, 1948)
- Fallon, Stephen M., Milton Among the Philosophers: Poetry and Materialism in Seventeenth Century England, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1991
- Greengrass, Mark, Michael Leslie, and Timothy Raylor, editors, Samuel Hartlib and Universal Reformation: Studies in Intellectual Communication, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1994
- Hight, Gilbert, The Classical Tradition: Greek and Roman Influences on Western Literature, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1985 (original edition, 1949)
- Hill, Christopher, Milton and the English Revolution, London: Faber, and New York: Viking Press, 1977
- Lopate, Phillip, Introduction to The Art of the Personal Essay, edited by Lopate, New York: Anchor Doubleday, 1994
- Patrides, C.A., and Raymond B. Waddington, editors, The Age of Milton: Backgrounds to Seventeenth Century Literature, Manchester: Manchester University Press, and Totowa, New Jersey: Barnes and Noble, 1980
- Raab, Felix, The English Face of Machiavelli: A Changing Interpretation, 1500–1700, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1964
- Schoeck, R.J., Erasmus Grandescens: The Growth of a Humanist's Mind and Spirituality, Nieuwkoop: De Graaf, 1988
- Schoeck, R.J., Erasmus of Europe: The Making of a Humanist, 1467–1500, Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, and Savage, Maryland: Barnes and Noble, 1990
- Smith, Henry Goodwin, "The Triumph of Erasmus in Modern Protestantism," Hibbert Journal 3 (1905):64–82

Coleridge, Samuel Taylor

British, 1772–1834

Of the 16 volumes comprising Samuel Taylor Coleridge's collected works, 15 consist of prose discourse. If we add to this corpus eight volumes of letters, four volumes of notes (published thus far), not to mention a considerable amount of manuscript material in collections at the British Museum and at the University of Toronto, we find that Coleridge was a prolific, interdisciplinary prose writer. This brings us to the difficult question: aside from better-known pieces (e.g. "On the Prometheus of Aeschylus," 1825; "On the Principles of Genial Criticism," 1814), what parts of this enormous bulk of material qualify as discrete essays?

The OED defines an essay as "A composition of moderate length on any particular subject, or branch of a subject originally implying want of finish...but now said of a composition more or less elaborate in style, though limited in range." We need only consult Samuel Johnson's Dictionary of the English Language (1755) to see that, by the middle of the 18th century, the essay was an endeavor considered lacking in “finish.” The authorities Johnson cites agree that the essay is little more than an early draft: “(Smith). A Loose sally of the mind; an irregular indigested piece. (Bacon). A trial; an experiment. (Glanville). First taste of anything.” By the turn of the century, however, the essay had become a more serious, formal, and purposeful effort. As Vicesimus Knox wrote in 1819: “Essays...may now convey the idea of regular treatises.” It is important to recognize that the Coleridgean essay is closer to the 20th than to the 18th century, for, in most instances, it exhibits self-conscious craft and persuasive intent.

If an essay is any prose work of limited range having a clearly articulated purpose, as well as formal style and rhetoric, then many more of Coleridge’s writings qualify for inclusion in the genre. Reasoning along these lines, it is possible, therefore, to identify six sets of Coleridgean prose as kinds of “essays”: the topical (periodic, nonperiodic, lectural, homiletic); the aphoristic; the review; the notational (annotative, marginal); the epistolary (confessional, correspondent); and the conversational.

The topical essay, with its four subsets, is the largest category of the Coleridgean essay. Coleridge composed periodical essays intermittently for over 20 years. He contributed an essay to almost every issue of the Watchman (1 March–13 May 1796), most notably “On the Slave Trade,” a reworking of a 1795 Bristol lecture. He was a primary contributor to the Morning Post (1799–1802), submitting over 90 pieces, ranging from paraphrases of parliamentary proceedings to original historical and political analyses. He submitted 140 articles to the Courier (24 February 1804–31 March 1818). Add to these totals nearly 100 conjectural and collaborative pieces, and we have what for many would be the work of a lifetime. Demonstrating an extraordinary understanding of contemporary issues, especially of the French Wars, Coleridge’s journalism is qualitatively impressive as well. Noteworthy are essays on Pitt, Napoleon, ancient Rome, contemporary France, and Wellington’s Peninsular campaign. A third journalistic venue, consisting of 26 numbers (1 June 1809–15 March 1810), is the Friend. In this privately financed journal, Coleridge outlined his political philosophy, expanding upon ideas broached in the public journalism.

Each of Coleridge’s nonperiodic essays has its own history. Some of his best pieces, such as “Essay on Scrofula,” were undelivered and recently published from manuscript. His eclectic and interdisciplinary essays—e.g. “On Free Will” (1800), “On Miracles” (1807), or “On Language and Thought” (1815)—are among the most widely known. The revised “Treatise on Method,” appearing in the 1818 Friend, would introduce the Encyclopedia Metropolitana (1818–45). One of his most intricate, theoretical works on natural philosophy, “Theory of Life,” was published posthumously in 1848.

Coleridge’s lectural essays have great interdisciplinary appeal. His earliest, delivered at Bristol in 1795, were both political and theological in emphasis; “A Moral and Political Lecture,” six “Lectures on Revealed Religion,” and “Lecture on the Two Bills” are the most famous. The sequence of lectures on literature and on philosophy (1808–19) demonstrates Coleridge’s erudition as an historian of ideas. He lectured on many subjects, including poetry, Shakespeare, Milton, Cervantes, Dante, Spenser, Ariosto, European drama, and belles-lettres, as well as delivering philosophical lectures. The coverage in these lectures is encyclopedic: in literature, from Achilles to Ywain; in philosophy, from Abelard to Zoroaster.

As “a discourse, usually delivered from a pulpit and based upon a text of Scripture, for the purpose of giving religious instruction or exhortation” (OED), the sermon, like the essay, is a text that is limited in scope, persuasive in intent, and elaborate in style. Probably the earliest examples of Coleridge’s homiletic essay are “A Sermon Written When the Author Was But 17 Years Old” (1789–90) and the “College Commemorative Sermon” (1799). Better known are the three lay sermons Coleridge planned to publish in a single volume; however, he only wrote two of the three, under the titles The Statesman’s Manual; or, The Bible the Best Guide to Political Skill and Foresight (1816) and A Lay Sermon (1817).

Since an aphorism is an incisive statement conveying a general truth, the notion of an “aphoristic essay” sounds oxymoronic. Occasionally Coleridge begins a piece aphoristically—that is, with a terse, general truth—and then expands upon this idea. He uses this modality in the Omniana (1812), a collection of collaborative essays with Robert Southey; for example, item no. 297 begins aphoristically (“It is the mark of a noble nature to be more shocked with the unjust condemnation of a bad man than of a virtuous one...”) and is developed into a cohesive essay. Aids to Reflection (1825), on the writings of Archbishop Robert Leighton (1611–84), contains “aphorisms” (those of Leighton), upon which Coleridge meditates. In one frequently anthologized example, Aphorism 8, Coleridge ruminates on Leighton’s statement: “Faith elevates the soul not only above Sense and sensible things, but above Reason itself...” Contained in Coleridge’s response is the important section “On the Differences in Kind of the Reason and the Understanding.”

The review constitutes a third category of the Coleridgean essay. The reviews in the Watchman—e.g. of Thomas Lovell Beddoes’ “Essay on the Public Merit of Mr. Pitt” and “A Letter to...Pitt, on...Scarcity”; of Edmund Burke’s “A Letter ...to a Noble Lord”; and of Count Rumford’s “Essays”—vary in critical depth, the Rumford review, for example, consisting mainly of historical paraphrase and of direct quotation. On the other hand, there is the Edinburgh Review essay on Thomas Clarkson’s History of the Abolition of the Slave Trade. An encomium to his friend, this review provides a synopsis, a sketch of the abolition movement, references to parliamentary proceedings, and Coleridge’s original ideas on the issue.

Embedded in over 6000 notes (published and unpublished), in thousands of marginalia, and in innumerable extended footnotes to his own texts, is a surprising resource: clearly discernible essays, some embryonic, some fragmentary, some mature. Amidst the published notes, for instance, is a coherent exposition on the atrocities of the French Revolution (1810; no. 3845); amidst the unpublished manuscripts, an essay on “the true system of philosophy”; and amidst the marginalia, his reaction to Joseph Hughes’ theories on soul and body.

The epistolary essay takes “confessional” and correspondent forms. Confessions of an Inquiring Spirit (1840) comprises six letters, each one beginning with the formulaic salutation, “My dear Friend.” Frequently, in the over 2000 letters, Coleridge wrote small essays, the corpus of which cannot be adequately described in this context. His letters, touching on innumerable topics, exhibit the workings of an inquisitive and encyclopedic intelligence; particularly erudite examples, worth independent study, are letters to Lord

Liverpool and to Hyman Hurwitz, a scholar of Jewish studies.

Coleridge was known to be a great talker who could expostulate intelligently on many subjects. Many of the recorded conversations in the Table Talk (posthumously pub. 1835) are cohesive essays. Those on parliamentary reform and on the threat of civil discord (20 March 1831–9 April 1833) are, in part and parcel, a perfect example of Coleridge's oral discourse. Consisting of small and medium-sized essays, the series presents the intricacies of this national crisis vividly and comprehensively.

Coleridge's use of discrete essays to build larger works (e.g. for the 1818 Friend) sheds some light on the genre and unity of such works as Biographia Literaria; or, Biographical Sketches of My Literary Life and Opinions (1817), the Logic (wr. c. 1823), and On the Constitution of the Church and State (1830). In the Biographia, for example, he states that, under autobiography, he has unified "miscellaneous reflections" on literary criticism, philosophy, and politics, and the narrative provides "continuity to the work." Scholars have devoted much attention to the unity, structure, and compositional process involved in the Biographia (Max F. Schulz, 1985). Specifically, with regard to the essay genre, the organization of these sketches or essays provides the Biographia with relative coherence. Two interwoven strands of essays unify the work to a degree: the first, concerned with Coleridge's literary life and opinions (chapters 1–4, 10–11, 14–23); and the second, with his philosophical, psychological, and theological speculations (chapters 5–9, 12–13, 24). Unifying these two themes is an emphasis on "the Scheme of Christianity" and on the idea that the pursuit of knowledge should be directed toward communion with God. The Biographia is also important for how it adumbrates—stylistically, organizationally, and methodologically—the 1818–19 commentaries on literature and philosophy, as well as the 1818 revision of the Friend, the culmination of his work in the genre.

CHARLES DE PAOLO

Biography

Born 21 October 1772 in Ottery St. Mary, Devon. Studied at Christ's Hospital, London, 1782–90; Jesus College, Cambridge, 1791–94; University of Göttingen, 1798. Married Sara Fricker, 1794 (separated, 1807): three sons (one died in infancy) and one daughter. Lived in Bristol, 1794–96, Clevedon, Somerset, 1796, and Nether Stowey, Somerset, near William and Dorothy Wordsworth at Alfoxden, 1797. Editor, the Watchman, 1796, the Friend, 1809–10, and assistant editor, the Courier, 1810–11; contributor to various other journals and newspapers. Given an annuity by the Wedgwood family, 1798; moved to Greta Hall, Keswick, near Robert Southey and the Wordsworths, 1800. Became addicted to opium, by 1800, and lived in Malta in an effort to restore his health, 1804–06, where he was secretary to the governor, Sir Alexander Bell, 1804–05. Lectured extensively in London, 1808–19. Lived in London, Calne, Wiltshire, and Bath, 1811–15, and in Highgate, London, under the care of Dr. James Gillman, 1816–34. Associate, Royal Society of Literature (with pension), 1824. Died in Highgate, London, 25 July 1834.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

The Watchman (periodical), nos. 1–10, 1 March–13 May 1796

The Friend (periodical), nos. 1–27 (and one supernumerary), 1 June 1809–15 March 1810; in 1 vol., as The Friend: A Series of Essays, 1812; revised edition, 3 vols., 1818

Omniana, or Horae Otiosiores, with Robert Southey, 2 vols., 1812; edited by Robert Gittings, 1969

The Statesman's Manual; or, The Bible the Best Guide to Political Skill and Foresight (sermon), 1816

A Lay Sermon, 1817

Biographia Literaria; or, Biographical Sketches of My Literary Life and Opinions, 1817;

edited by George Watson, 1956

Aids to Reflection in the Formation of a Manly Character on the Several Grounds of Prudence, Morality, and Religion (aphorisms), 1825

On the Constitution of the Church and State, According to the Idea of Each, 1830

Specimens of the Table Talk of the Late Samuel Taylor Coleridge, edited by Henry

Helson Coleridge, 2 vols., 1835, and Carl Woodring, 2 vols., 1990

Confessions of an Inquiring Spirit, 1840; edited by H. St. J.Hart, 1956

Notes and Lectures upon Shakespeare and Some of the Old Poets and Dramatists; with Other Literary Remains, edited by Sara Coleridge, 2 vols., 1849

Essays on His Own Times (2nd series of The Friend), edited by Sara Coleridge, 3 vols., 1850; edited by David V.Erdman, with additional material, in Collected Works, 3 vols., 1978

The Philosophical Lectures, edited by Kathleen Coburn, 1949

The Notebooks, edited by Kathleen Coburn, 4 vols., 1957–90

Writings on Shakespeare, edited by Terence Hawkes, 1959; as Coleridge on

Shakespeare, 1969

Shakespearean Criticism, edited by T.M.Raysor, 1960

Coleridge on Shakespeare, edited by R.A.Foakes, 1971; as Coleridge's Criticism of Shakespeare, 1989

Lectures 1808–1819 on Literature, edited by R.A.Foakes, 2 vols., 1987

Other writings: the poems “Kubla Khan” (wr. 1797, pub. 1816), “The Rime of the Ancient Mariner” (1798), and “Christabel” (1816), as well as many others, four plays, and several volumes of correspondence (collected in The Collected Letters, edited by Earl Leslie Griggs, 6 vols., 1956–71).

Collected works editions: Complete Works, edited by William Greenough Thayer Shedd, 7 vols., 1853; Collected Works, edited by Kathleen Coburn, 16 vols., 1969– (in progress); Coleridge's Writings, general editor John Beer, 1991– (in progress).

Bibliographies

Crawford, Walter B., Edward S.Lauterbach, and Ann M.Crawford, Samuel Taylor Coleridge: An Annotated Bibliography of Criticism and Scholarship 2:1900–1939 (with Additional Entries for 1795–1899), Boston: Hall, 1983

- Haven, Josephine, Richard Haven, and Maurianne Adams, Samuel Taylor Coleridge: An Annotated Bibliography of Criticism and Scholarship 1:1793–1899, Boston: Hall, 1976
- Wise, Thomas J., A Bibliography of the Writings in Prose and Verse of Samuel Taylor Coleridge, London: Bibliographical Society, 2 vols., 1913–19

Further Reading

- Chambers, E.K., Samuel Taylor Coleridge: A Biographical Study, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1938
- Coleman, Dierdre, Coleridge and The Friend (1809–1810), Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1988
- Fogle, Richard H., The Idea of Coleridge's Criticism, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1978 (original edition, 1962)
- Goodson, A.C., Verbal Imagination: Coleridge and the Language of Modern Criticism, New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1988
- Holmes, Richard, Coleridge, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1982
- Holmes, Richard, Samuel Taylor Coleridge: Early Visions, London: Hodder and Stoughton, and New York: Viking, 1989
- Jackson, James Robert de Jager, Method and Imagination in Coleridge's Criticism, London: Routledge, 1969
- Jenkins, Patricia Mavis, Coleridge's Literary Theory: The Chronology of Its Development, 1790–1818, Fairfield, Connecticut: Fairfield University Department of English, 1984
- Leask, Nigel, The Politics of Imagination in Coleridge's Critical Thought, Basingstoke: Macmillan, 1988
- Schulz, Max F., "Coleridge: Prose Writings," in The English Romantic Poets: A Review of Research and Criticism, edited by Frank Jordan and others, New York: Modern Language Association of America, 1985:410–63
- Wellek, René, "Coleridge's Philosophy and Criticism," in The English Romantic Poets: A Review of Research, edited by T.M. Raysor, New York: Modern Language Association of America, revised edition, 1956:110–37

The Compleat Angler

by Izaak Walton, 1653; revised editions 1655 and later

The Compleat Angler by Izaak Walton (1593–1683) is one of the most widely published books in the English language, having appeared in several hundred editions since the author's death. It was first published in 1653 after Walton had already published biographies of John Donne (1640) and Sir Henry Wotton (1651) and before he wrote his lives of Richard Hooker (1665), George Herbert (1670), and Robert Sanderson (1678). Later, he invited his friend, Charles Cotton, to write a continuation, which appeared in 1676.

Ostensibly a book on the sport of fishing, The Compleat Angler, or, The Contemplative Man's Recreation, Being a Discourse of Fish and Fishing Not Unworthy the Perusal of Most Anglers is also a long essay which relates angling to literature and philosophy. Its polished artistry, achieved through numerous revisions, pays high tribute to the ideal of the English literary pastoral tradition in its evocation of personality and landscape. Written and published during one of the most socially, religiously, and politically traumatic periods in British history, the book reflects an ideal world from which all the evils attendant to the human condition have been purged. As Jonquil Bevan (1988) has suggested, the book is in part a royalist's "reaction to the exile and imprisonment of his friends," many of whom had been ravaged by the violent political and religious sectarianism of the times.

The Compleat Angler is a long dialogue involving Piscator (an angler), Venator (a hunter), and Auceps (a falconer) in an area a few miles north of London. Much of the text deals with angling: the kinds of fish available (he lists about 20, ranging from minnow and carp to trout and salmon), their locations, their habits, and the best methods and baits for catching them. The evidence of Walton's extensive reading is everywhere apparent in the text as he cites over 60 writers and works from classical times to the Renaissance. Much of the essay's charm derives from the simple, straightforward way he describes the mechanics of angling and the innocent pleasures derived from it. Angling is an art much like poetry, Piscator tells Venator. People inclined to either must be born with inclinations to it: "He that hopes to be a good Angler must not only bring an inquiring, searching, observing wit; but he must bring a large measure of hope and patience, and a love and propensity to the Art itself; but having once got and practis'd it, then doubt not but what Angling will prove to be so pleasant, that it will prove to be like Virtue, a reward to itself."

Typical of Walton's method is the section on the trout in Chapter 4: "The trout is a fish highly valued both in this and foreign nations; he may be justly said (as the old poet said of wine, and we English say of venison) to be a generous fish: a fish that is so like the buck that he also has his seasons, for it is observed that he goes in and out of season with the stag and buck...and he may justly contend with all fresh-water fish, as the mullet may with all sea-fish for precedence and daintiness of taste, and that being in right season, the most dainty palates have allowed presidency to him." He goes on to describe the kinds and habitats of the trout. In Chapter 5 he gives further directions for fishing for trout and how to make artificial minnows and flies for lures.

But The Compleat Angler is more than just a fishing manual. It is a book that celebrates the wholesomeness of creation and the rural life in which a simple pleasure such as angling can heal the body, cleanse the mind, and refresh the spirit. As Venator says at the end of the book: "So when I would beget content, and increase confidence in the Power, and Wisdom, and Providence of Almighty God, I will walk the Meadows by some gliding Stream, and there contemplate the Lillies [sic] that take no care, and those very many other various little living creatures that are not only created but fed (man knows not how) by the goodness of the God of Nature, and therefore trust in him." Walton's book thus takes its place in the tradition of the literature of retirement so prominent in the 17th century.

Walton's delightful treatment of fishing as sport, recreation, and spiritual refreshment and its smooth, flowing, and engaging style make the book a classic. Overarching The Compleat Angler is his belief that the traditional in state, church, society, and culture, as symbolized in the art of angling, are being overthrown by the religious fanatics who have taken control of England.

ROBERT C. STEENSMA

Editions

The Compleat Angler, or, The Contemplative Man's Recreation, Being a Discourse of Fish and Fishing Not Unworthy the Perusal of Most Anglers, 1653; revised editions, 1655, 1661; in The Universal Angler, with Charles Cotton, 1676; many subsequent editions, including those edited by Richard Le Gallienne, 1897, John Buxton, 1982, and Jonquil Bevan, 1983

Further Reading

Bevan, Jonquil, Izaak Walton's The Compleat Angler: The Art of Recreation, New York: St. Martin's Press, 1988
 Bottrall, Margaret Smith, Izaak Walton, London and New York: Longman Green, 1955
 Coon, A.M., The Life of Izaak Walton (dissertation), Ithaca, New York: Cornell University, 1938
 Cooper, John, The Art of the Compleat Angler, Durham, North Carolina: Duke University Press, 1968

The Confessions

by St. Augustine, 397–398 CE

St. Augustine of Hippo (354–430 CE) is a major figure in the history and development of Western experience. Many biographical details come from the Confessions. Augustine was born in Tageste, in Numidia, the son of Patricius, a small landowner and local official who became a Christian late in life, and of Monica, a devout Christian from girlhood who was a major influence on Augustine. He was educated in the grammar school at Madura, where he became skilled in late Latin literature, if imperfect in Greek. Then came a year at home, while his father saved enough to send him to Carthage, where he trained in rhetoric. As was customary, Augustine took a concubine and fathered a son, called Adeodatus, before he was 20. After teaching a year in Tageste, Augustine taught in Carthage from 376 to 383, and was drawn to the Manichaeans. In 384 he went to Milan to be a professor of rhetoric. There he met Ambrose, a major influence because of his learned eloquence and fervent belief. Several events in 386—the persecution of Justina, the reading of Plotinus that made Augustine a Platonist, the recognition that a Christian soldier like Ponticianus was capable of greater discipline and renunciation than the thoughtful Augustine, the moment of conversion through the episode in the garden, followed by a summer of intellectual dialogues with non-Christian friends near Como—led to his return to Milan and baptism on Holy Saturday, 24 April 387, when he was 32. Augustine decided to return to Africa, with Monica, who died on the journey at Ostia. Here the autobiographical account in the Confessions ends. Subsequent details of his life include three years of study and devotion at Tagaste, during which time Adeodatus died. While on a visit to Hippo Regius, Augustine was selected by the aged bishop's flock and ordained to be a priest in 391. He was consecrated bishop in 395, a fixed appointment from the age of 40, and continued to live and work in this rather remote seaport.

Augustine wrote prodigiously—letters, sermons, and great treatises, notably De trinitate (The Trinity) and De civitate dei (The City of God)—in a style of contemporary Latin with greater flexibility than the classics and a mastery for memorable phrases. Augustine was not so much a systematic thinker as a responder to current opponents and heretics (Donatists, Manichaeans, Pelagians). Obscurely situated during his lifetime, a period of imperial decline, Augustine became the most accessible author in early Christendom, one of the four Latin fathers and a Doctor of the Church. His works were widely circulated, in manuscript and early printings, though first collected in 11 volumes in a Benedictine edition (1679), which became part of Patrologiae latina, edited by J.P.Migne (1845). Comparable to Augustine's place in the Catholic tradition was his impact upon the Reformation, since his thinking was also fundamental to Lutheranism, Calvinism, and Jansenism in the 16th and 17th centuries. Trained as a rhetorician, not as a philosopher, Augustine had a powerful appeal; he wrote always of the journey of the Christian soul to God, concerned with understanding the Scripture and living the Christian life, and vividly asserting the self-knowledge of the individual.

Augustine is not usually thought of as a writer of essays; he lived centuries before Montaigne, whom many identify as the progenitor of the essay form, although there were distinguished classical precedents in Latin writers like Cicero, Marcus Aurelius (Meditations), and Plutarch. The essay is typically defined as “a moderately brief prose discussion of a restricted topic.” The length of the Confessions argues against consideration, but his discursive writing and highlighting of episodes create sections of the book in which can be seen many characteristics of content and style that anticipate the modern essay. Augustine's topic is restricted; he writes always of the Christian soul's relation to God. Seriousness of purpose, an intent to persuade, and dignity of style give the Confessions the quality of a formal essay; but the personal and confidential manner, the use of “I” and indeed the formulation of a “self,” as well as exposition of tentative understanding (albeit leading to truth) suggest the informal essay.

Three selections from the text illustrate how portions of the Confessions can be identified as essays, or attempts at understanding coming from personal analysis. The story of the pear theft (Book II. 4–10) is among the most famous passages, in which Augustine describes his action as a 16 year old and analyzes the meaning of his behavior. With his fellows he steals quantities of pears, not because of hunger but to throw them to the pigs. The real reason for the theft is to do something that is forbidden; the flavor tasted is not pear but sin, and the pleasure is in doing something that is wrong, for the act would have held no appeal but for the companions who shared it. Thus Augustine questions logically and finds answers that culminate in a recognition of a most unfriendly friendship. The conclusion is to compare his wandering away from God into a barren waste with the joy of being with God. Augustine exposes his youthful failings with the skill of a psychologist and an immediacy that vividly evokes the difficulties of adolescence. His style is personal and confessional, with an openness and directness that the best essayists seek.

A slightly shorter passage (Book VII. 9–10) might be called “Of Books,” to use the title of an essay by Francis Bacon. Here Augustine describes how God has mercifully kept him from pride by putting before him many books of the Platonists that helped him to think of God as a Spiritual Being. The classical philosophers give the framework, but the quotations are from Scripture—the Gospels, St. Paul, and the Psalms. The purpose is sober, and the method is an intellectual argument through close reading of texts. In the last section Augustine departs from his narrative recounting and textual presentation to a praise of God as eternal Truth, known through His creation.

A much longer section (Book X. 8–28), analogous to 19th-century longer and more personal essays, may be called “On Memory,” which is again devoted to Augustine’s seeking God. Here his Platonist account, the rising through stages, goes beyond the experiences of the senses to consider the nature of memory, a storehouse of images. Very systematically Augustine explores the nature of memory, how things are preserved—sense experiences, knowledge from study, the process of thought that assembles. He posits that at some time in the past we were happy, and thus all long for happiness, more specifically for God, always in his memory from when Augustine first learned of Him. The style is questioning, with frequent qualifications, and an answer of personal struggle and selfaffirmation, memorably expressed through illustrative descriptive details and exclamations.

VELMA BOURGEOIS RICHMOND

See also Autobiographical Essay; Religious Essay

Editions

Confessiones, edited by P.Knöll, 1909, M.Kutella, revised by H. Juergens and W.Schaub, 1969, revised by James J.O’Donnell, 3 vols., 1992, and Gillian Clark, 1995; as The Confessions, many translations, including by F.J.Sheed, 1943, J.M.Lelen, 1952, R. S.Pine-Coffin, 1961, Rex Warner, 1963, E.M.Blaiklock, 1983, Hal M. Helms, 1986, and Henry Chadwick, 1991

Further Reading

Brown, Peter, Augustine of Hippo, Berkeley: University of California Press, and London: Faber, 1967

McWilliam, Joanne, editor, Augustine: From Rhetor to Theologian, Waterloo, Ontario: Wilfrid Laurier University Press, 1992.

Mallard, William, Language and Love: Introducing Augustine’s Religious Thought Through the Confessions Story, University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press,

1994

Pope, Hugh, Saint Augustine of Hippo: Essays Dealing with His Life and Times and Some Features of His Work, London: Sand and Co., 1937; Westminster, Maryland: Newman Press, 1949

Connolly, Cyril

British, 1903–1974

Although he wrote and published from the late 1920s until the mid-1970s, Cyril Connolly is commonly associated with the 1930s and 1940s. This is due to the lasting impact of his assessment of the period in Enemies of Promise (1938). The book merges Connolly's personal memories, their historical backdrop, and his views on selected authors, mostly Modernists, but also from his favorite period, the 18th century. Enemies of Promise sets the tone for Connolly's career as an essayist, but it also hints at his restricted outlook and the contradictory impulses which shape his essayistic work.

As the editor of Horizon Connolly went on to produce one of the most stimulating periodicals of World War II and the immediate postwar years. First published in 1939, it survived financial and organizational difficulties until 1950. In Ideas and Places (1953) Connolly assembled essays from Horizon (but also from Art News, World Review, Go, the Geographical Magazine, Partisan Review, the New Statesman, the Times Literary Supplement, and the Listener) and prefaced them with a summary of Horizon's intention and problems. Born from the idealistic idea of a "renewal of the world and of letters," the journal maneuvered through left-wing politics, a disenchantment with Russia, and an equally thorough disappointment by the "philistine attitude of the Labour government to culture." Already in 1947 it showed signs of turning away from politics and drifting into an increasingly monotonous condemnation of postwar society. Halfway between initial enthusiasm and eventual decline, Horizon produced some of the most inspired antiwar essays of World War II. The fictional "Letter from a Civilian" of September 1944, which placed the suffering of the so-called "homefront" against the shallow heroism of the fighting troops, especially caused a stir. The wartime issues embraced an eclectic mix of Georgian writers, 1930s authors around W.H.Auden, and new names, such as Alun Lewis, William Sansom, Julian Maclaren Ross, and Laurie Lee. Toward the end of the war Horizon began to feature the literature of the French Resistance.

The problems of Connolly's cultural politics and the internal rift of many of his writings derive from a deeply ambivalent attitude toward the relationship of art and society. His claim to be working for "a new humanism which considers human life vulgar but sacred" encapsulates the impasse. Marxist critics such as Julian Symons were as little pleased with "the quite frankly belles-lettrist Horizon" and its "fagends of the Twenties... bound together by no organized view of Life or Society" as the conservative media who resented Horizon's struggle against puritanism, identity cards, and the death penalty. On the positive side, Connolly used Horizon to fight, among other things, for prison reform and—interestingly enough—a culturally united Europe. Like many authors who grew up in the 1920s, Connolly was torn between a traditional privileged education (he went to Eton and Balliol College, Oxford) and the attempt to transcend it in the direction of a socially responsible, if not socialist perspective. His essentially elitist outlook and its source, his nostalgic and anachronistic orientation toward classical Greece and Rome, the French and English Enlightenment, and the fin de siècle, eventually pushed him toward nostalgia and cultural pessimism.

In a 1946 survey called “The Cost of Letters,” for instance, Horizon had still sought to demonstrate in a very materialistic vein the link between art and real life. The questionnaire on authors’ incomes was answered by John Betjeman, Elizabeth Bowen, C.Day Lewis, Robert Graves, Laurie Lee, Rose Macaulay, George Orwell, Stephen Spender, and Dylan Thomas, among others. In the “Centenary” essay of 1948, on the other hand, Connolly complains about the “continuous decline in all the arts.” After lamenting the deaths of Joyce, Yeats, Woolf, Valéry, Freud, H.G.Wells, and J.G.Frazer, he goes on to state that “their places are not being filled. This is not because there is a decline in talent, but on account of the gradual dissolution of the environment in which it ripens. There is a decay in communication owing to the collapse of that highly cultivated well-to-do world bourgeoisie who provided the avant-garde artists—writer, painter, musician, architect—with the perfect audience.”

A traditionalist liberal humanism which often collapses into an art for art’s sake position is perhaps the best characterization of Connolly’s essays. Yet even his critics applauded the grace and wit of his style. As a confirmed francophile Connolly also introduced a large number of French authors to the British audience. He translated Alfred Jarry’s Ubu plays and promoted Louis Aragon, Paul Éluard, Jean-Paul Sartre, Albert Camus, Francis Ponge, Raymond Queneau, and Maurice Blanchot. His continued praise for Paul Valéry showed Connolly once more establishing his idiosyncratic connection between modern writing, the 19th-century aestheticism of Baudelaire, Rimbaud, Mallarmé, and Huysmans, and his beloved 18th century. Connolly’s old fascination with Modernism (incidentally, he seems to have been the first to write about Joyce’s Finnegans Wake in an essay entitled “The Position of Joyce” of 1929) found an outlet in his book The Modern Movement (1965).

After the demise of Horizon, Connolly continued to contribute to the intellectual debates of the postwar years, though his voice sounded more and more outmoded. Despite his unflinching attachment to his favorite subjects (which culminated in a book on 18th-century French pavilions), he also wrote approvingly about Francis Bacon’s rather antihumanist paintings. The contradictory nature of his politics is evident from the fact that he had no problems working as literary editor for the Observer and writing for the New Statesman, but also for the conservative Sunday Times.

Four volumes of essays arranged by Connolly himself give an overview of his career: The Condemned Playground (1945), Ideas and Places (1953), Previous Convictions (1963), and the rather somber The Evening Colonnade (1973). There, Connolly’s perceptive literary studies are united with his art criticism, but also with often surprisingly superficial travel writings. All this adds up to the curious impression of a Modernist traditionalist, a profoundly English snob with an interest in social reform, in short (and in the words of Peter Quennell): a “jet-propelled armchair.”

RAINER EMIG

Biography

Cyril Vernon Connolly. Born 10 September 1903 in Whitley, near Coventry, Warwickshire. Lived in South Africa as a child, 1906–10, and Ireland, 1910–14. Studied at St. Cyprian's school, Eastbourne, where he met Eric Blair (i.e. George Orwell), 1914–18; Eton College, Berkshire, 1918–22; Balliol College, Oxford, 1922–25, B.A. in history, 1925. Tutor in Jamaica, 1925–26; secretary to Logan Pearsall Smith, 1926–27. Reviewer for the New Statesman, London, 1927–29. Married Frances Jean Bakewell, 1930 (divorced, 1947). Founder, with Stephen Spender, and editor, 1939–50, Horizon; literary editor, the Observer, London, 1942–43. Married Barbara Skelton, 1950 (marriage dissolved, 1954). Columnist and book reviewer, London Sunday Times, 1951–74. Married Deirdre Craig, 1959: one daughter and one son. Fellow, and Companion of Literature, 1972, Royal Society of Literature; Commander, Order of the British Empire (CBE), 1972; Chevalier, Legion of Honor (France). Died in London, 26 November 1974.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Enemies of Promise, 1938; revised edition, 1948

The Condemned Playground: Essays, 1927–1944, 1945

Ideas and Places, 1953

Enemies of Promise and Other Essays: An Autobiography of Ideas, 1960

Previous Convictions, 1963

The Evening Colonnade, 1973

Selected Essays, edited by Peter Quennell, 1984

Other writings: the “word cycle” The Unquiet Grave (1944), two novels (one unfinished), letters, journals (included in Journal and Memoirs, edited by David Pryce-Jones, 1983), and The Modern Movement (1965), a study of Modernism.

Further Reading

Fisher, Clive, Cyril Connolly: A Nostalgic Life, London: Macmillan, 1995

Kramer, Hilton, “Cyril Connolly’s Horizon,” New Criterion 8, no. 1 (September 1989):5–11

Lewis, Jeremy, Cyril Connolly: A Life, London: Cape, 1997

Ozick, Cynthia, “Cyril Connolly and the Groans of Success,” New Criterion 2, no. 7 (March 1984):21–17

Sheldon, Michael, Friends of Promise: Cyril Connolly and the World of “Horizon”, London: Hamilton, 1989

Spender, Stephen, Cyril Connolly: A Memoir, Edinburgh: Tragara Press, 1978

Cornwallis, Sir William, the Younger

English, c. 1579–1614

Sir William Cornwallis the Younger has some claim to the title of England's first essayist; certainly, he was the first to write a substantial book of "familiar" essays with the critical consciousness of working within a new vernacular prose genre. His Essayes were initially published in two parts: 25 essays in 1600 (reprinted with stylistic changes in 1606) and 24 essays in 1601. In 1610 there appeared a "newly enlarged" volume comprising the 1606 edition and a somewhat revised version of the 1601 edition, along with three new essays, bringing the total to 52. A posthumous edition (1632) testifies to the continuing appeal of the Essayes, reflected in Richard Whitlock's tribute to them as an authority for his own "manner of writing" (Zootomia, 1654). Although Francis Bacon's brief aphoristic Essayes were available three years before Cornwallis' first publication, the mature Baconian essay did not reach the public until his revised editions of 1612 and 1625, and there is no evidence to suggest that the two essayists had any direct influence on each other. (Despite their appearance under the title Essayes..., Cornwallis' six posthumously issued pieces of 1616 belong to another genre popular in the Renaissance: the paradox.)

The Cornwallian essay, ranging in length from barely a page to ten or more pages, grafts an informal engagement with humanist learning to the moral typologies of "character" writing. It reads somewhat like the exercise of a youthful Montaigne coming of age in the social and political milieu of a late Elizabethan courtier, poor and debt-ridden but resolved upon taking his own measure through explorations of the world's virtues and vices. The essay titles—e.g. "Of Resolution," "Of Suspition," "Of Love," "Of Feare," "Of Vanitie," "Of Alehouses," "Of Knowledge," "Of Discourse"—give some notion of their author's topical range, the associative movement of his thought testing its vernacular muscle among the neoStoic moral commonplaces that guide him like his own personal courtesy book. Cornwallis read the ancients, including the Greeks, in Latin, and he knew Italian (as well as some Spanish), especially the writings of Guicciardini, Sannazaro, Machiavelli, Petrarch, and Tasso; the ideal of humanist learning is affirmed in his own vision of courts of "gentlemen" enacting the virtues, each according to his capacity and station. In his writing, he appears intent upon preparing himself for a post in such a court by essaying moral commonplaces that have the power to make or break him. Thus, for instance, the discourses of professional men such as surgeons and attorneys are, in Cornwallis' eyes, "places to grow fat in, not wise," and those of scholars "too finicall," prone to fall apart unless they are made to "goe Methodically to worke"; "a Gentleman," he insists, "should talke like a Gentleman," whose knowledge is "generall." A specialized knowledge is "but one part of the house, a baywindow or a gable-ende," and he is brought to ask: "Who builds his house so maimed, much lesse himselfe?" Characteristically, Cornwallis searches out his own moral location in the space of discourse: "It shal be my course...not to loose my self in my tale, to speak words that may be understood, and, to my power, to meane wisely rather than to speake eloquently” (“Of Discourse”).

Viewing his essays as conversations with himself, Cornwallis counterposes a “talking style” (“Of Ambition”) to the Ciceronian model, corrupted, to his way of thinking, by rhetorical verbosity. Avowing allegiance to Seneca and Tacitus, he writes in the “loose” style combined with “curt” elements, but with little of either Ben Jonson’s pointed verve or John Donne’s mannered wit—he counted both among his friends. He leans toward Montaigne’s discursiveness, but with little capacity to sustain the great French essayist’s ruminative and narrative range. “Plainnesse” (“Of Essaies and Bookes”) functions for him as a textual mirror to reflect his mind’s movement; it serves to mediate between thought and action and to bring the particulars of his individuality into accord with the universal “minde.” Thus, says Cornwallis, “I would be as I talke” (“Of Fortune and her Children”). Having read a partial translation of Montaigne’s essays (“divers of his pieces” [“Of Censuring”]) before their appearance in English, he declares that neither they nor those of the ancients are “rightly tearmed Essayes; for... they are strong and able to endure the sharpest tryall.” “But mine,” he claims, “are Essayes, who am but newly bound Prentise to the inquisition of knowledge and use these papers as a Painter’s boy a board, that is trying to bring his hand and his fancie acquainted” (“Of Essaies and Bookes”). At times immediate and self-referential (“I Write this in an Alehouse, into which I am driven by night” [“Of Alehouses”]), or vaguely confessional (“About nothing doe I suffer greater conflicts in my selfe then about induring wrongs” [“Of Patience”]), or casually conversational (“It is a pretty soft thing this same Love, an excellent company keeper” [“Of Love”]), or gnomically brooding (“We are all in darkenesse” [“Of Ambition”]), the openings of the Essayes not infrequently strike a strong personal and experiential note. A crotchety, even harsh sensibility colors many of these pieces, suggesting a spirited youth whose early disillusionment with the world and himself drives him into reclusion, where he earnestly searches his books for understanding. Unlike Bacon, bringing counsel to others on the path to power, Cornwallis writes as physician to his own soul: “without any company but Inke & Paper, & them I use in stead of talking to my selfe” (“Of Alehouses”). Essay writing furnishes him with the “Marchandise of the mind” (“Of Keeping State”) that will, he writes, “cure my bodie in his innate diseases” (“Of Life, and the Fashions of Life”).

England’s first essayist in the spirit of Montaigne, scarcely past adolescence when he embarked on his opus, contemplates himself as a creature of time (“the stuffe that life is made of” [“Of Vanitie”]): the self of his past destined by birth for an “active course” (“Of Life”) but already lost to folly; the self of his present uncertainly taking shape in writing; the self of his anticipated future resolutely adjusting to a neo-Stoic regimen, an increasingly shared nostalgia of the Jacobean age. Thus the temporality of the self unfolds in the Cornwallian essay as a discourse for moral measurement. “Shall it not bee lawful then for us to build our Tombes in our Papers?” asks Cornwallis in “Of Trappes for Fame.”

Although interest in the Essayes waned after the middle of the 17th century, their colloquial candor infuses a tincture of Montaigne into the English practice of the genre, even as the Baconian alternative is still discovering its own form. For the modern reader, the dogged moralizing of Cornwallis’ book somewhat dulls its often engaging immediacy but leaves, at the same time, the emblematic stamp of a rugged, rough-and-ready self-portraiture.

LYDIA FAKUNDINY

Biography

Born probably 1579 in Suffolk. Nephew of Sir William Cornwallis, the Elder. Probably educated privately; knew Spanish and Italian but no French. Married Katherine Parker, 1595:11 children (three died). Member of Parliament for Lostwithiel, 1597, and Orford, Suffolk, 1604, 1614. Accompanied Robert Devereux, second Earl of Essex on his Irish campaign, 1599: knighted as a result. Involved in court life, 1601–05: member of King James' privy chamber, 1603, and carried dispatches between Spain and England for his ambassador father, 1605; renounced court when he failed to win the king's preferment. Friend of Ben Jonson, commissioning him to write Penates, or a Private Entertainment for the King and Queen, 1604. Also associated with John Donne and Thomas Overbury. Apparently lived extravagantly until he lost the inheritance of his uncle's estate; at his death left his wife and children in poverty. Died 1 July 1614.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Essayes, 2 vols., 1600–01; enlarged edition, 1610; edited by Don Cameron Allen, 1946

Other writings: Discourses upon Seneca the Tragedian (1601); The Miraculous and Happie Union of England and Scotland (1604); Essayes; or Rather Encomions, Prayses of Sadnesse (1616); and Essayes of Certain Paradoxes (1616).

Further Reading

Bennett, Roger E., The Life and Works of Sir William Cornwallis (dissertation), Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University, 1931

Bennett, Roger E., "Sir William Cornwallis' Use of Montaigne," PMLA 48 (December 1933):1080–89

Bush, Douglas, "Essays and Characters," in his English Literature in the Earlier Seventeenth Century, 1600–1660, Oxford: Clarendon Press, revised edition, 1962 (original edition, 1945)

MacDonald, W.L., "The Earliest English Essayists," Englische Studien 64 (September 1929):20–52

Price, Michael W., "Sir William Cornwallis," in British Prose Writers of the Early Seventeenth Century, edited by Clayton D. Lein, Dictionary of Literary Biography, vol. 151, Detroit: Gale Research, 1995:82–87

Salmon, J.H.M., "Seneca and Tacitus in Jacobean England," in The Mental World of the Jacobean Court, edited by Linda Levy Peck, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1991:169–88

Sandbank, S., "On the Structure of Some Seventeenth-Century Metaphors," English

Studies 52 (August 1971):323–30

Thompson, Elbert N.S., The Seventeenth-Century English Essay, Iowa City: University of Iowa Press, 1926

Upham, A.H., “Montaigne,” in his The French Influence in English Literature, from the Accession of Elizabeth to the Restoration, New York: Octagon, 1965 (original edition, 1908)

Wedgwood, C.V., “The Later Evolution of Prose,” in her Seventeenth-Century English Literature, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1970 (original edition, 1950)

Whitt, P.B., “New Light on Cornwallis the Essayist,” Review of English Studies 8 (1932):155–69

Williamson, George, “Aculeate Style and the Cult of Form,” in his The Senecan Amble: A Study in Prose Form from Bacon to Collier, London: Faber, and Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1951

Critical Essay

The critical essay has its distant origins in Aristotle’s Poetics, especially in his analysis of the work of Sophocles, and in the work Peri hypsous (On the Sublime), attributed to the first-century Greek critic Longinus. But true critical prose in the modern sense—cultural criticism that takes full advantage of the rhetorical possibilities of the familiar essay—only began during the late 17th century in Europe, coming fully into its own as a genre with the rise of literary periodical journalism in the 18th century. One might reach back in time to include a few earlier seminal expressions of criticism, including such Renaissance works as the Poetice (1562; On Poetry) by the Italian scholar Julius Caesar Scaliger, which gave classicism its first voice, or Sir Philip Sidney’s The Defence of Poesy (wr. 1580–82, pub. 1595), perhaps the earliest example of modern literary criticism. But it was the appearance of John Dryden’s An Essay of Dramatic Poesy in 1667–68 that firmly established the critical essay in prose as a distinct and culturally influential genre. Dryden’s essay took ownership of the literary space between the older form of the treatise, with its theoretical preoccupation, and the soon-to-evolve review, with its emphasis on the evaluation of texts. The critical essay after Dryden has continued to mix a general appreciation of literary history with the analysis of specific works and authors, and has always set its discussion within the contexts of contemporary cultural and political discourse. Whether or not it employs a theoretical framework, the critical essay is always textually grounded and very much preoccupied with the sociological and psychological process of reading.

The 18th century saw a proliferation in production of the critical essay across Europe. John Dennis, the first professional critic, found a popular readership in England and France for criticism in which he stressed the primacy of passion in the literary arts; he published controversial essays on The Usefulness of the Stage (1698), The Advancement and Reformation of Modern Poetry (1701), The Grounds of Criticism in Poetry (1704), and An Essay upon the Genius and Writings of Shakespeare (1712). Dennis’ generation of writers included Richard Steele and Joseph Addison, whose Spectator (1711–12, 1714) was the first periodical to adapt literary criticism to serious journalism. In this periodical Addison published serialized essays on Milton, the ballad, and the theory of the imagination, and did much to make literature a conversational topic in the coffee houses. But it was Samuel Johnson who made of the critical essay in English something definitive: his Lives of the English Poets (1779–81), a series of critical prefaces written for a ten-volume historical collection of English poetry, developed an essay style that mingled moral and aesthetic criticism of literature while showing equal appreciation for classical and contemporary works. Among Johnson's earliest attempts at criticism, his Life of Mr. Richard Savage (1744) emphasized the humanist values that would continue to underpin most critical essays for the next three centuries, even in writers otherwise as diverse as Denis Diderot, Matthew Arnold, and Edmund Wilson.

The French encyclopedists, especially Montesquieu, Voltaire, Rousseau, and of course, Diderot, did much to advance the critical essay on the continent, having themselves been influenced by the style of Addison in particular. They added to the sophisticated classicism of their English models a radicalism that in turn affected much late 18th- and early 19th-century critical writing. The Scottish encyclopedist, essayist, and editor William Smellie and his colleague, the historian Dr. Gilbert Stuart, launched the Edinburgh Magazine and Review (1773–76), which took the radical combination of literature, politics, and opinion to its ultimate expression. They wrote and published regular critical essays which undertook to review current publications against an erudite and idiosyncratic background of selective literary traditions. Their aggressive and very personal critical postures were often inflammatory, and even libelous, but always intelligently original. Their approach to criticism was somewhat before its time, but they defined the anarchic end of the spectrum of critical essay writing, in opposition to Samuel Johnson's position of consolation: where Johnson, even when derogatory, sought to instruct his reader with informed wit, Stuart and Smellie undertook to outrage and alarm. This Scottish style made its real mark in the 19th century in the essays of John Gibson Lockhart, a chief contributor to Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine and editor of the Quarterly Review, both important trend setters in their day. The criticism of most English-language essays down to the 20th century can be grouped around one or other of the two poles defined by Johnson and the Scottish reviewers: there are the antagonists like Thomas Carlyle, Oscar Wilde, and F.R. Leavis, and the consolers like Matthew Arnold, Henry James, and Lionel Trilling.

While the English-language critical essay became more polemical as the 18th century closed, criticism in German tended toward the philosophic and speculative. Following the publications of the classicist Gotthold Ephraim Lessing (Laokoon [1766; Laocoon] and Hamburgische Dramaturgie [1767–69; Hamburg Dramaturgy]), German Romanticism produced lasting contributions to critical-essay writing in the nationalistic work of Johann Gottfried Herder and Friedrich von Schiller, especially Herder's Über die neuere Deutsche Litteratur: Fragmente (1767; Fragments on modern German literature) and Schiller's Über naive und sentimentalische Dichtung (1795–96; On the Naive and Sentimental in Literature). The German critical essay became obsessed with the intricacies of language, in particular etymology, and developed an almost exclusive concern for philology as it proceeded through the 19th century. Friedrich Schlegel's essays in the Athenäum (1798–1800) laid the groundwork for the German critical focus on irony and the inadequacy of literary language. Meanwhile, French criticism in the 19th century continued to reflect the more sociological concerns of the earlier form of the critical essay. Charles-Augustin Sainte-Beuve, in such works as his Critiques et portraits littéraires (1832–39; Literary critiques and portraits) and the collected volumes of his essays in criticism, Causeries du lundi (1851–62; Monday Chats) and Nouveaux Lundis (1863–70; New Mondays), carefully positioned his studies of an author's work against an understanding of the life and times. Hippolyte Taine extended Sainte-Beuve's portraiture into a fully racial and historical account of literary culture in his Histoire de la littérature anglaise (1863–64; History of English Literature). But it was Émile Zola who epitomized the French style in criticism, centering his approach on an exhaustive consideration of literature and the arts as a reflection of the human social condition.

The critical essay became a literary institution in 19th-century Europe when periodicals and magazines as well as daily newspapers established review criticism as the public forum for a nation's examination of its artistic identity. The Scottish reviewers of the early 1800s, so devastatingly satirized by Lord Byron after an Edinburgh Review essay attacked his poetry (English Bards and Scotch Reviewers, 1809), can in fact be credited with making the critical essay an important political and sociological exercise. Blackwood's (established 1817) and the Edinburgh Review (established 1802) greatly influenced both the form of the critical essay and the development of publications in which it was to appear. Scrutiny (1932–53), the Paris Review (1953–), the Times Literary Supplement (1902–), and the New Yorker (1925–) all trace their genealogy back to these sources by one route or another.

If all critical essays can be said, despite their otherwise apparently diverse thematic concerns, to have one common defining feature, it is this: the critical essay is chiefly concerned with engaging its audience in a reflective analysis of the politics of the act of reading. The best essayists of this kind value the texts they critique not for what is said but for how it is said, struggling with the ambiguity of literary language to describe a rhetoric of reading.

STEPHEN W. BROWN

Anthologies

The English Critical Tradition: An Anthology of English Literary Criticism, edited by S. Ramaswami and V. S. Seturaman, Bombay: Macmillan, 2 vols., 1977–78

The Great Criticism: An Anthology of Literary Criticism, edited by James Harry Smith and Edd Winfield Parks, 3rd edition, New York: Norton, 1951 (original edition, edited by Smith only, 1932)

Literature in America: An Anthology of Literary Criticism, edited by Philip Rahv, Cleveland: World, 1957

Further Reading

The Cambridge History of Literary Criticism, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989– (in progress)

Hall, Vernon, Jr., A Short History of Literary Criticism, New York: New York University Press, 1963

Saintsbury, George, A History of Criticism and Literary Taste in Europe, from the Earliest Texts to the Present Day, New York: Humanities Press, 3 vols., 1961 (original edition, 1902–04)

Wellek, René, A History of Modern Criticism, 8 vols., New Haven, Connecticut and (vols. 7–8) London: Yale University Press, 1955–92; vols. 1–2, and 5–6, London: Cape, 1955, 1986; vols. 1–4, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1981–83

Wimsatt, W.K., and Cleanth Brooks, Literary Criticism: A Short History, New York: Knopf, and London: Routledge, 1957

Croce, Benedetto

Italian, 1866–1952

Benedetto Croce was the dominant figure in Italian culture for the first 50 years of the 20th century. His formidable output covers well over a hundred volumes, over half of which consist of collections of essays in philosophy, aesthetics, literary criticism, philosophy of history, narrative history, and politics. Although the essay form was the dominant mode of Croce's writing—even the chapters of his monographs can often be read as self-contained pieces—it was for him an instrument in a literary life dominated by cultural battles rather than a genre chosen for its own sake. Ironically, Croce, one of the most prodigious and effective users of the essay in the 20th century, produced an aesthetic theory which allowed no space for critical consideration of the genre as such.

Croce burst onto the cultural scene in 1896 with the publication in essay form of two lectures given in 1893 and 1894 under the title Il concetto della storia nelle sue relazioni col concetto dell'arte (The concept of history in its relationship to the concept of art). One of the immediate effects of these essays was to bring cultural debate in Italy into the mainstream of European thought. In these writings Croce engaged with the German neo-Kantians in a common enterprise to establish the theoretical foundations of humanistic studies vis-à-vis the natural sciences and to clarify the distinction between Naturwissenschaften (natural sciences) and Geisteswissenschaften/Kulturwissenschaften (sciences of the humanities). In these early writings Croce was not as antipositivist as he later claimed. He attempted to establish the autonomy of art (and historiography as an art form) on the philosophical terrain of naive or uncritical realism. But this was the terrain par excellence of the natural sciences, firmly based on the epistemological assumption that human understanding has an unmediated access to reality. The natural sciences thus had the unassailable advantage of being able to analyze reality with greater explanatory power than the arts, by implication relegating the latter to a second-order, divertive, cognitive activity. Croce's observation in Il concetto della storia nelle sue relazioni col concetto dell'arte that the philosophical foundations of aesthetics did not yet exist was made in recognition of this temporary defeat.

From this point onward, the direction of his thinking took a decisive anti-positivist turn, and began to shift in emphasis away from the desire of the German neo-Kantians to establish the autonomy of the arts; Croce's objective became to demonstrate their cognitive superiority over the natural sciences. His discovery of Hegel (and a strongly idealist Kant), revealed in his letters of the period to Giovanni Gentile, led him to abandon uncritical realism, and with a complete volte face to construct an epistemology in which the human mind or spirit does not so much perceive reality as actually construct it. His monumental Estetica come scienza dell'espressione e linguistica generale (1902; Aesthetic as Science of Expression and General Linguistic), which also contains a collection of discrete essays and studies on the history of aesthetics, and the Logica come scienza del concetto puro (1905; Logic as the Science of the Pure Concept), laid the foundations of Croce's solution to the problem. In these works he establishes a hierarchy in which philosophy, dealing with "pure concepts," is epistemologically superior to the more mundane "pseudo-concepts" of the natural sciences. Art, based on intuition, and philosophy, based on reasoning, are given equal status as the two "cognitive" activities of the human spirit, while science is consigned to the sphere of the multifarious moral and economic "practical" activities of the human spirit. Historiography is transferred from art to become a branch of philosophy. Karl Vossler observed that no previous thinker had put aesthetic theory on the map so effectively, and Croce's influence spread well beyond Italy to inspire critics abroad. These writings, along with his Filosofia della pratica: Economica ed etica (1909; Philosophy of the Practical: Economic and Ethic), laid the foundations of Croce's subsequent theoretical labors. Later, when the positivist threat receded, Croce's antipathy toward the incursions of the scientific mentality into the arts took the form of opposition to methodological developments, whether in literary analysis, historiography, or the study of language.

A deep-rooted conservatism lay at the heart of Croce's thinking: not a sterile conservatism, but a tortured, creative, and challenging questioning of all that was new. Thus while he had an inhibiting effect in many fields of inquiry (e.g. historical and literary methodologies, linguistics, psychology), his passionate commitment to debating all the issues of the day nevertheless broadened the horizons of Italian intellectuals, and his journal La Critica (Criticism), founded in 1903 in collaboration with Giovanni Gentile, remained a critical point of reference for the next 40 years.

As a literary critic Croce developed the theory that the "poetic" core of all art was independent of genre, period, structure, and intellectual and ethical content. This theory, underlying the Aesthetic, discussed in his collection Problemi di estetica (1910; Problems in aesthetics), clearly enunciated in the Breviario di estetica (1913; The Breviary of Aesthetic), and further elaborated in the essays Nuovi saggi di estetica (1920; New essays on aesthetics), was finalized in La poesia (1936; Benedetto Croce's Poetry and Literature). Croce's inability to define the ineffable "poetic" essence of art, which escaped all specificities, made the critic's task impossible to formulate. The critic with true perception simply knows "poetry" when he sees it. The purpose of this "purist" theory (art was simply "art," or in essence "poetry") was twofold: to keep criticism free of "particular" theories (art as pleasure, feeling, moral purpose, etc.), which would transform art into a different order of activity of the spirit, and to protect art from the methodological "technicians" who would collapse genius or inspiration into tecnica. Croce's own literary criticism followed the practice of dichotomizing the work of art into a “poetic” core on the one hand and “extraneous” intellectual, moral, and structural elements on the other.

Some of Croce’s most notable collections of critical essays appear in his six-volume La letteratura della nuova Italia (1914–40; Literature of the new Italy), La poesia di Dante (1921; The Poetry of Dante), Ariosto, Shakespeare e Corneille (1920; Ariosto, Shakespeare, and Corneille), Poesia e non poesia (1923; European Literature in the Nineteenth Century), Poesia “popolare” e poesia d’arte (1933; “Popular” poetry and true poetry), the two volumes of Saggi sulla letteratura italiana del Seicento (1911, 1931; Essays on Italian literature of the 17th century), Conversazioni critiche (1918–39; Critical conversations), Poesia antica e moderna (1941; Ancient and modern poetry), and Letture di poeti (1950; Poetic readings). His classical taste led him to view the experimental movements of the day as decadent. In his Dante essays he contrasted the positive lyrical elements in the Divine Comedy with its “non-poetic” rational and structural dimensions, while his opponents saw the interpenetration of these elements as the very reason for the work’s poetic power. His similar treatment of Manzoni, Leopardi, and other writers produced vigorous opposition to what increasingly came to be seen as an overschematic system of analysis, resulting in the eventual discrediting of the aesthetic theory on which Croce’s style of criticism was based.

His evolving idealist historicism eventually reduced philosophy to historiography according to the formula that the defining cognitive constituent of reality, the spirit, is quintessentially historical. Croce initially defined the historical process as an inscrutable impersonal force that progressively enriches our understanding of the “truth” content of reality. Attempts to steer the course of history violate this process. In his World War I essays Pagine sulla guerra (Notes on the war)—eventually published in 1928—he exhorts Italians to stop debating whether or not Italy should enter the conflict, and to follow their political leaders since “such compliance, such obedience to the word of command issued by the few in number, by the ruling classes, is not blindness but a profound instinct for survival...a profound sense of necessity, of obedience to the laws of history.” This deeply conservative view of history was modified when Croce turned against fascism, from which point he perceived the force of history as promoting the emergence of “liberty” rather than “truth.” His subsequent historical writings reflect this injection of a greater moral purpose into the activities of individuals (but not collective forces) and into the historical process, a position theorized in the collection La storia come pensiero e come azione (1938; History as the Story of Liberty). Yet this new orientation never resolved the tensions between the moral purpose inherent in human activity and Croce’s insistence on ultimate surrender to history’s lofty design. Thus, despite his championing of liberty, his political writings in such collections as Elementi di politica (1925; Politics and Morals), Etica e politica (1931; Ethics and politics), Pensiero politico e politica attuale (1945; Political thought and current politics), and Scritti e discorsi politici (1943–1947) (1963; Political writings and speeches) greatly disappointed the more radical anti-fascist elements of the Liberal party, the postwar reconstitution of which he presided over until 1947. His attachment to the theory of history as an impersonal force led Croce to see political programs for systematic reform as futile attempts to interfere with history’s mysterious purpose. His leadership divided Liberal intellectuals and left the party as a right-wing rump on the margins of postwar Italian politics.

GINO BEDANI

Biography

Born 25 February 1866 in Pescasseroli. Lost his parents and sister in an earthquake on the island of Ischia, 1883. Studied law at the University of Rome, 1883–86. Returned to Naples, and administered family estate, 1886–90. Founder, with Giovanni Gentile, and editor, La Critica, 1903–44, later the Quaderni della "Critica", 1945–51; adviser, Laterza and Sons publishers, Bari, from 1904. Appointed senator for life, 1910. Married Adele Rossi, 1914: four daughters. Minister of education, 1920–21; denounced the fascist dictatorship, 1925; president of the Liberal party, 1943–47, minister without portfolio of the new democratic government, 1944, and member of the Constituent Assembly, 1946–47. Founder, Istituto Italiano per gli Studi Storici (Italian institute of historical studies), Naples, 1947. Awards: honorary degrees from three universities. Died in Naples, 20 November 1952.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Il concetto della storia nelle sue relazioni col concetto dell'arte, 1896

Materialismo storico ed economia marxistica, 1900; as Historical Materialism and the Economics of Karl Marx, translated by C. M. Meredith, 1914

Estetica come scienza dell'espressione e linguistica generale, 1902; as Aesthetic as Science of Expression and General Linguistic, translated by Douglas Ainslie, 1909, revised edition, 1953; as The Aesthetic as the Science of Expression and of the Linguistic in General, translated by Colin Lyas, 1992

Logica come scienza del concetto puro, 1905; as Logic as the Science of the Pure Concept, translated by Douglas Ainslie, 1917

Letteratura e critica della letteratura contemporanea in Italia, 1908

Filosofia della pratica: Economica ed etica, 1909; as Philosophy of the Practical: Economic and Ethic, translated by Douglas Ainslie, 1913

Problemi di estetica e contributi alla storia dell'estetica italiana, 1910

La filosofia di Giambattista Vico, 1911; as The Philosophy of Giambattista Vico, translated by R.G. Collingwood, 1964

Saggi sulla letteratura italiana del Seicento, 1911

Breviario di estetica, 1913; as The Breviary of Aesthetic, translated by Douglas Ainslie, 1915, and as The Essence of Aesthetic, 1921; as Guide to Aesthetics, translated by Patrick Romanell, 1965

Saggio sullo Hegel, seguito da altri scritti di storia della filosofia, 1913; part as What Is Living and What Is Dead of the Philosophy of Hegel, translated by Douglas Ainslie, 1915

La letteratura della nuova Italia, 6 vols., 1914–40

Aneddoti e profili sette centeschi, 1914

Cultura e vita morale, 1914

- Teoria e storia della storiografia*, 1917; as History: Its Theory and Practice, translated by Douglas Ainslie, 1921, and as Theory and History of Historiography, 1921
- Conversazioni critiche*, 5 vols., 1918–39
- Primi saggi*, 1919
- Curiosità storiche*, 1919
- Storie e leggende napoletane*, 1919
- Una famiglia di patrioti, ed altri saggi storici e critici*, 1919
- Pagine sparse*, edited by G.Castellano, 3 vols., 1919–26
- Goethe*, 1919; revised edition, 1939; as Goethe, translated by Emily Anderson, 1923
- Nuovi saggi di estetica*, 1920
- Giosuè Carducci*, 1920
- Giovanni Pascoli*, 1920
- Ariosto, Shakespeare e Corneille*, 1920; as Ariosto, Shakespeare, and Corneille, translated by Douglas Ainslie, 1920
- Storia della storiografia italiana nel secolo decimonono*, 2 vols., 1921
- La poesia di Dante*, 1921; as The Poetry of Dante, translated by Douglas Ainslie, 1922
- Nuove curiosità storiche*, 1922
- Frammenti di etica*, 1922; as The Conduct of Life, translated by Arthur Livingston, 1924
- Poesia e non poesia*, 1923; as European Literature in the Nineteenth Century, translated by Douglas Ainslie, 1924
- Elementi di politica*, 1925; as Politics and Morals, translated by Salvatore J.Castiglione, 1945
- Storia del Regno di Napoli*, 1925; as History of the Kingdom of Naples, translated by F.Frenaje, 1970
- Pagine sparse*, edited by G.Castellano, 1927
- Uomini e cose della vecchia Italia*, 1927
- Pagine sulla guerra*, 1928
- Storia d'Italia dal 1871 al 1915*, 1928; as A History of Italy, 1871–1915, translated by C.M.Ady, 1929
- Storia dell'età barocca in Italia: Pensiero—Poesia e letteratura— Vita morale*, 1929
- Alessandro Manzoni*, 1930
- Eternità e storicità della filosofia*, 1930
- Nuovi saggi sulla letteratura italiana del seicento*, 1931; revised edition, 1949
- Etica e politica*, 1931
- Storia d'Europa nel secolo decimonono*, 1932; as History of Europe in the Nineteenth Century, translated by H.Furst, 1933
- Poesia "popolare" e poesia d'arte*, 1933
- Nuovi saggi sul Goethe*, 1934
- Orientamenti: Piccoli saggi di filosofia politica*, 1934
- La critica e la storia della arti figurative*, 1934
- Ultimi saggi*, 1935
- La poesia: Introduzione alla critica storia della poesia e della letteratura*, 1936; as Benedetto Croce's Poetry and Literature: An Introduction to Its Criticism and History, translated by Giovanni Gullace, 1981
- Vite di avventure, di fede e di passione*, 1936
- La storia come pensiero e come azione*, 1938; as History as the Story of Liberty, translated by Sylvia Sprigge, 1941
- Poesia antica e moderna*, 1941
- Il carattere della filosofia moderna*, 1941

- Storia dell'estetica per saggi*, 1942
Aneddoti di varia letteratura, 3 vols., 1942; enlarged edition, 4 vols., 1953–54
Pagine sparse, 3 vols., 1943
Considerazioni sul problema morale del tempo nostro, 1945
Pensiero politico e politica attuale, scritti e discorsi, 1945
Il carattere della filosofia moderna, 1945
Discorsi di varia filosofia, 2 vols., 1945; selection in My Philosophy and Other Essays on the Moral and Political Problems of Our Time, 1949
Poeti e scrittori del pieno e del tardo Rinascimento, 3 vols., 1945–52
Nuove pagine sparse, 2 vols., 1948–49
Filosofia e storiografia, 1949; selection in My Philosophy and Other Essays on the Moral and Political Problems of Our Time, 1949
My Philosophy and Other Essays on the Moral and Political Problems of Our Time, edited by R.Klibansky, translated by E. F.Carritt, 1949
La letteratura italiana del Settecento—Note critiche, 1949
Lecture di poeti e riflessioni sulla teoria e la critica della poesia, 1950
Filosofia, poesia, storia: Pagine tratte da tutte le opere, 1951; as Philosophy, Poetry, History: An Anthology of Essays, translated by Cecil Sprigge, 1966
Indagini su Hegel, 1952
Terze pagine sparse, 2 vols., 1955
Scritti e discorsi politici (1943–1947), 1963; edited by Angela Carella, 1993
Essays on Marx and Russia, edited and translated by Angelo A.De Gennaro, 1966
Essays on Literature and Literary Criticism, translated by M.E. Moss, 1990
 Other writings: works on aesthetics, logic, economics, ethics, literary criticism, historiography, and Marxism.
 Collected works edition: Edizione nazionale delle opere, 1991–(in progress).

Bibliographies

- Borsari, Silvano, L'opera di Benedetto Croce, Naples: Istituto Italiano per gli Studi Storici, 1964
 Cione, Edmondo, Bibliografia crociana, Turin: Fratelli Bocca, 1956
 Nicolini, Fausto, L'editio ne varietur" delle opere di B.Croce: Saggio bibliografico con taluni riassunti o passi testuali e ventinove fuori testo, Naples: Biblioteca del "Bollettino" dell'Archivio Storico del Banco di Napoli, 1960
 Palmer, L.M., and H.S.Harris, editors, Thought, Action and Intuition: A Symposium on the Philosophy of Benedetto Croce, Hildesheim and New York: Olms, 1975

Further Reading

- Adamson, Walter L., "Benedetto Croce and the Death of Ideology," Journal of Modern History 55 (June 1983):208–36
 Allan, George, "Croce's Theory of Historical Judgement: A Reassessment," Modern Schoolman (January 1975):169–87
 Bedani, Gino, "Art as 'Poesia': The Strategic Dimension of Croce's Aesthetic," in The Italian Lyric Tradition, edited by Gino Bedani, Remo Catani, and Monica

- Slowikowska, Cardiff: University of Wales Press, 1993:7–22
- Bedani, Gino, “Art, Poetry and Science: Theory and Rhetoric in Croce’s Early Anti-Positivist Epistemology,” Italian Studies 49 (1994):91–110
- Bobbio, Norberto, Profilo ideologico del Novecento italiano, Turin: Einaudi, 1986
- Bonetti, Paolo, Introduzione a Croce, Rome: Laterza, 1984
- Brown, Merle E., Neo-Idealistic Aesthetics: Croce-Gentile Collingwood, Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1966
- Carr, Herbert Wildon, The Philosophy of Benedetto Croce, New York: Russell and Russell, 1969 (original edition 1917)
- Corsi, Mario, Le origini del pensiero di Benedetto Croce, Naples: Giannini, 1974
- Garin, Eugenio, Intellettuali italiani del XX secolo, Rome: Riuniti, 1974
- Montale, Eugenio, “Lesson on Croce: Esthetics and Criticism,” Italian Quarterly 7 (1963):48–65
- Moss, M.E., Benedetto Croce Reconsidered, Hanover, New Hampshire: University Press of New England, 1987
- Orsini, Gian N.G., Benedetto Croce: Philosopher of Art and Literary Critic, Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1961
- Palmer, L.M., and H.S.Harris, editors, Thought, Action and Intuition: A Symposium on the Philosophy of Benedetto Croce, Hildesheim and New York: Olms, 1975
- Parente, Alfredo, “Estetica e gusto nell’opera critica di Croce,” Rivista di Studi Crociani 3 (1966):293–94
- Roberts, David D., “Benedetto Croce and the Dilemmas of Liberal Restoration,” Review of Politics 44 (April 1982):214–41
- Roberts, David D., Benedetto Croce and the Uses of Historicism, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1987
- Sprigge, Cecil J.S., Benedetto Croce: Man and Thinker, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, and Cambridge: Bowes and Bowes, 1952
- Wellek, René, Four Critics: Croce, Valéry, Lukács, and Ingarden, Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1981
- White, Hayden V., “The Abiding Relevance of Croce’s Idea of History,” Journal of Modern History 37 (June 1963):109–24

Cuadernos Americanos

Mexican journal, 1942–

The launch of the first volume of Cuadernos Americanos (American notebooks) was celebrated on 30 December 1941 in Mexico City. Since that time, the six annual issues of CA have appeared without interruption. The original objectives of CA, on both the international and the national levels, have remained constant. Yet in its evolution it has followed the transformation of Latin American countries; we can distinguish two clearly delineated stages which correspond to the periods under the direction of Jesús Silva Herzog (1942–86) and Leopoldo Zea (since 1987, under the auspices of the National Autonomous University of Mexico).

CA emerged in 1942 in the middle of what was still an indecisive discourse, which was beginning to be recognized as Mexican but which was also inspired by several mentors who saw the Mexicanness in function with the human and sensed the possibility of formulating a discourse with universal repercussions. From its beginning, CA projected an essayistic perspective with interdisciplinary focus. The original Executive Board had 11 members, six Mexicans (Alfonso Caso, Daniel Cosío Villegas, Mario de la Cueva, Manuel Martínez Báez, Alfonso Reyes, and Jesús Silva Herzog) and five Spanish exiles (Pedro Bosch Gimpera, Eugenio Imaz, Juan Larrea, Manuel Márquez, and Agustín Millares). All were established intellectuals with significant humanist cultural experience and were not only recognized internationally for their essays, but also associated with various fields of specialization, ranging from literature to anthropology, economics, medicine, history, and sociology. For them, CA was responding to a sense of mission which Alfonso Reyes expressed in these words during the launch of the periodical: “The task that presents itself today is not just another literary venture, but rather has been defined by a sense of continental and human service... We understand our work as a moral imperative, as one of the many efforts for the salvation of culture, that is to say, the salvation of man.” From its first issues, CA was the most prestigious Latin American magazine, and had an appeal to the whole continent.

Within the context of World War II, this select group of intellectuals, as Reyes indicates in his statement of purpose, feels destiny’s calling: “[There] has been placed upon us the grave duty of preserving and promoting religion, philosophy, science, ethics, politics, urbanity, courtesy, poetry, music, the arts, industries and professions: as much as it is language that preserves and transmits the conquests of the species, in short, all that is culture.” CA proposed to be a forum reflecting the present, communicating with the world from a Latin American context. For the first time, the Latin American nations felt included in the international community; Reyes reaffirmed what motivated the magazine: “We are an integral and necessary part in the representation of man by man. Whoever does not recognize us is not a whole man.” The prestige of the essayists who collaborated from the beginning (Mariano Picón-Salas, Alfonso Reyes, Raúl Haya de la Torre, Francisco Romero, Waldo Frank, Joaquín Xirau, José Gaos, Edmundo O’Gorman, and Samuel Ramos, among many others) and the quality of the essays that were published served as a model for the Latin American essay during the formative years of the 1940s and 1950s.

During this first stage, the magazine was precisely structured. It consisted of four parts: 1. “Nuestro tiempo” (Our time), 2. “Aventura del pensamiento” (The adventure of thinking), 3. “Presencia del pasado” (Presence of the past), and 4. “Dimensión imaginaria” (The imaginary dimension). Each part was divided into two sections; the first section of each part included essays of variable length (generally between five and 25 pages); the second section, which was much shorter, included critical notes (generally two to ten pages) on the most notable European and American books of the moment.

In 1987, the second stage of CA began, as a “Nueva época” (new period), even though its director, Leopoldo Zea, was among the most frequent contributors to the magazine from the first issues in 1942. In this context, the title “Nueva época” has the double meaning of both “a return” to some of the initial objectives and a formulation of new ideal objectives that serve as a model for the new period. Today, the “aventura del pensamiento” has reached “nuestro tiempo”: the explicit division into four sections has been eliminated. All the fields these sections covered are currently represented by national and international associations promoting their study. They continue to be the center of CA's concerns, but it is no longer considered necessary to categorize so rigidly the journal's contents. What was once used to define its objectives would today limit its freedom.

Much more significant than these changes to the structure of the magazine are the new ideals that accompany the "Nueva época." As the objectives formulated in 1942, by Herzog and Reyes have been realized, Zea now extends his vision: "To know how to recognize oneself in others and upon that recognition, to respect them in order to be respected. Such is the spirit that will have to be maintained in this new stage of Cuadernos Americanos, open to the times that rapidly pass by in our America and in the world of which it is a part. One will have to review and actualize the problems of the region and of the world of which it is now expression" ("Palabras del Director" [1987; Words of the editor]). In order to achieve such goals, CA now relies on the collaboration, as editor, of the essayist and literary critic Lilita Weinberg; in addition to an Editorial Board, it possesses an International Board of recognized essayists (Roberto Fernández Retamar, Domingo Miliani, Francisco Miró Quesada, Gregorio Weinberg, Fernando Ainsa, Tzvi Medin, and Amy Oliver, among others) who encourage the global dimension of contemporary Latin American thought.

JOSÉ LUIS GÓMEZ-MARTÍNEZ

Further Reading

- Gómez-Martínez, José Luis, "La nueva época de Cuadernos Americanos en el desarrollo del pensamiento mexicano," Cuadernos Americanos 31 (1992): 72–81
- Larrea, Juan, "Gestación de Cuadernos Americanos," Cuadernos Americanos 31 (1992):16–40
- Morales Benítez, Otto, "Cuadernos Americanos: Una tribuna para la verdad y la libertad," Cuadernos Americanos 31 (1992):41–71
- Muñoz, Humberto, Leopoldo Zea, Marcos Kaplan, and Juan Ortega y Medina, "Crónica de la presentación de la nueva época de Cuadernos Americanos," Cuadernos Americanos 4 (1987): 225–36
- Reyes, Alfonso, "America y los Cuadernos Americanos," Cuadernos Americanos 2 (1942):7–10
- Weinberg, Gregorio, "Por mis palabras testimonios," Cuadernos Americanos 31 (1992):82–86
- Weinberg, Lilita Irene, "Cuadernos Americanos como empresa de cultura," Cuadernos Americanos 31 (1992): 89–93
- Zea, Leopoldo, "Palabras del Director," Cuadernos Americanos 1 (1987): 9–11
- Zea, Leopoldo, "Cuadernos Americanos cincuenta años después," Cuadernos Americanos 31 (1992):11–15

Cunha, Euclides da

Brazilian, 1866–1909

When Samuel Putman translated Euclides da Cunha's Os sertões (1902.; Rebellion in the Backlands), he called it "Brazil's greatest book." Cunha's masterpiece, as it was labeled, was one of the first prose pieces effectively to combine two genres: essay and fiction. The text is too scientific to be called an historical novel, although it was based on an historical event, and too fictitious to be called a scientific treatise. The essays that make up this "novel" can be classified as geographical, geological, ethnographic, philosophical, sociological, and historical.

All but forgotten, except by students of Brazilian letters, Cunha was once again discovered and analyzed when Mário Vargas Llosa published his La guerra del fin del mundo (1981; The War of the End of the World), a novel based on Cunha's Rebellion. In A Writer's Reality (1990), Vargas Llosa describes his reaction to Cunha's text: "For me all of this was like seeing in a small laboratory the pattern of something that had been happening all over Latin America since the beginning of our independence." Thus, Vargas Llosa recognizes in the turn-of-the-century text the beginning of the current debate on "barbarism and civilization" that still fuels the passions of Latin American essayists.

The three sections of Rebellion—"Land," "Man," "Struggle"—reflect Cunha's scientific knowledge, which is greatly influenced by European positivism. Cunha "proves" that the jagunço (ruffian) is not guilty of rebellion, but is the product of racial, geographical, and historical factors that create a kind of semi-barbaric existence. To be sure, Cunha represented the view of the elite of the time: the struggle between the "primitive" citizens of the interior and the "civilized" citizenry of the coastal areas. Cunha's essay becomes, then, a description of turn-of-the-century Brazilian ideology.

Although one cannot deny the racist implications in Cunha's text, such as the "degeneration" of the races in America due to miscegenation, the author also saw that not all barbarism lay on the side of the rebels, and that civilization meant more than the political and military establishment of Brazil. Cunha's primary purpose was to re-create the peasant revolt against the republic, but what he achieved has been recognized as the first attempt within Brazilian letters to probe beneath the surface of Brazilian reality and to expose forbidden topics of discussion. For the student of turn-of-the-century Brazilian literature, Cunha provides a backdrop against which to measure current trends in the attempt to describe and define Brazilian identity in terms of what is European or North American (i.e. foreign); what is "native"—meaning authentically Brazilian and a problematic term in itself; and what is African. Many critics continue to live under the positivism that gave Brazil its motto "Order and Progress," while unwilling to discuss openly issues of miscegenation, racism, discrimination, and classism. In many cases in the contemporary debate, critics fall into the same trap experienced by Cunha. Raymond Williams, in his book Mário Vargas Llosa (1986), concludes that "Da Cunha was ultimately seduced by the beleaguered inhabitants of Canudos. Consequently, everything that supposedly stood for the opposite of civilization appealed to him most strongly.” It is in this very attraction to the “Brazilian race” - the mixed races that comprise the majority of the population—that Cunha’s essays need re-evaluation. He opened the way for a “scientific” view of culture that today has become fashionable once again.

Cunha’s style is excessively baroque, characterized by antithesis, hyperbole, paradox, and an inordinate use of adjectives and repetition. Critics have noted these flaws in his style, but most have also acknowledged his extraordinary facility with and manipulation of the language. A journalist by training, Cunha was able to combine journalistic prose with a poetic artistry of discourse that made most of his essays masterpieces of discursive development.

CARMEN CHAVES TESSER

Biography

Euclides Rodrigues Pimenta da Cunha. Born 20 January 1866 in Santa Rita do Rio Negro. Studied at the Colégio Aquino, Rio de Janeiro, 1883–84: cofounder, with fellow students, O Democrata (Democracy); Polytechnic School, Rio, 1884–86; Praia Vermelha military school, Rio, 1886–88: expelled for openly insulting minister of war, and briefly imprisoned; traveled briefly to São Paulo, 1888, and began writing for A Província de São Paulo (Province of São Paulo); resumed military education at Praia Vermelha, 1889–92, degree in military engineering. Married, 1890. Worked as a government engineer, from 1892, traveling often on government commissions. Journalist for various newspapers, and covered the War of Canudos for O Estado de São Paulo (The state of São Paulo), 1897. Lived in São José do Rio Pardo, 1898–1901, where he wrote Os Sertões (Rebellion in the Backlands). Member, Brazilian Academy of Letters, 1903. Died (shot by his wife’s lover) 15 August 1909.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Os sertões, 1902; edited by Walnice Nogueira Galvão, 1985; as Rebellion in the Backlands, 1944, and as Revolt in the Backlands, 1947, translated by Samuel Putnam
Contrastes e confrontos, 1907; edited by Dermal de Camargo Montrê, 1967, and Araripe Junior, 1975

A margem da história, 1909; edited by Dermal de Camargo Montrê, 1967

Canudos e inéditos, edited by Olímpio de Souza Andrade, 1967; revised, enlarged edition, as Canudos e outros temas, edited by Cyl Gallindo, 1994

Uma paraíso perdido: Reunião dos ensaios amazônicos, edited by Leandro Tocantins, 1976

Other writings: notebooks and letters.

Collected works edition: Obra completa, edited by Afrânio

Coutinho, 2 vols., 1966.

Bibliographies

- Reis, Irene Monteiro, Bibliografia de Euclides da Cunha, Rio de Janeiro: Ministry of Education and Culture, 1971
- Sousa, J. Galante de, "Algumas fontes para o estudo de Euclides da Cunha," Revista do Livro 15, no. 4 (1959): 183–219
- Venâncio Filho, Francisco, Euclides da Cunha: Ensaio biobibliográfico, Rio de Janeiro: Oficina Industrial Graphica, 1931

Further Reading

- Bernucci, Leopoldo M., Historia de un malentendido: Un estudio transtextual de "La guerra del fin del mundo" de Mário Vargas Llosa, New York: Lang, 1989
- Booker, M. Keith, Vargas Llosa Among the Postmodernists, Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 1994
- Levine, Robert M., Vale of Tears: Revisiting the Canudos Massacre in Northeastern Brazil, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1992
- Reale, Miguel, Face oculta de Euclides da Cunha, Rio de Janeiro: Topbooks, 1993
- Vargas Llosa, Mário, A Writer's Reality, Syracuse, New York: Syracuse University Press, 1990; London: Faber, 1991
- Wasserman, Renata R. Mautner, "Mário Vargas Llosa, Euclides da Cunha, and the Strategy of Intertextuality," PMLA 108, no. 3 (1993): 460–73
- Williams, Raymond Leslie, Mário Vargas Llosa, New York: Ungar, 1986

Curtius, Ernst Robert

German, 1886–1956

In his magisterial study Europäische Literatur und lateinisches Mittelalter (1948; European Literature and the Latin Middle Ages), Curtius collected many of his important essays and articles written during nearly 30 years of philological research. This book made him famous among both medievalists and early modern literary scholars. In it he discussed the cultural world of the Latin Middle Ages, the role of literature and education from the early through the late Middle Ages, rhetoric, topoi or topics, the function of the poetic figure of goddess Natura, the relationship of poetry and rhetoric, the topos of the ideal landscape, the concept of classicism, mannerism, the book as a symbol, the relevance of Dante for medieval literature, and the interplay between theology and poetry among Italian writers of the 14th and 15th centuries. In a voluminous appendix Curtius added a collection of other essays dedicated to themes such as devotional formulae and humility, jest and earnest in the Middle Ages, divine frenzy among poets, numerical composition, the relationship between poetry and scholasticism, self-references of medieval poets, the cultural development of Spain in the 16th and 17th centuries, and, finally, essays on Calderón, Montesquieu, Diderot, and Horace.

Curtius was deeply influenced by classical schooling, and was an ardent defender of the cultural values representative of the European traditions rooted in classical antiquity. He was brought up as a Catholic, but later espoused Anglicanism. His religious orientation connected him with such philosophers and writers as Max Scheler, T.S. Eliot, Romain Rolland, José Ortega y Gasset, and André Gide. The same traditional outlook led Curtius to despise current political events and the trivialization of public culture during the 1930s. In his polemical pamphlet and essay Deutscher Geist in Gefahr (1932; German ideals in danger), he argued against the futile squabbles of the various political parties, seeing grave dangers for German culture resulting from the rise of the mass movement. Individualism and elitism, as represented by his role models Stefan George and Friedrich Gundolf, were much more to Curtius' liking. He also stayed away from narrow nationalism and defended the view of a European political unity with a broadly conceived culture shared by all European nations.

To reach a comprehensive understanding of this culture, the critic himself has to realize the highest educational goals possible and turn into a high priest for the rest of society. As Curtius argued, the essayist best represents this high priest, as demonstrated by the Romanticist Friedrich Schlegel, whom Curtius deeply admired. In Schlegel he also discovered a fighter for "culture," not simply for "civilization," the former supported by the national Geist (spirit), the latter by the masses. Nevertheless, Curtius strove for a cosmopolitan approach to culture, as he outlined in his study on T.S. Eliot (1927). From this perspective the writing of James Joyce, particularly Ulysses, was a true experiment in exploring the essence of human existence, similar to Homer's Odyssey. In this and other essays from this time Curtius hailed the idea of a cult of elite leaders steeped in European traditions. At the same time he rejected the positivistic and scientific method of analysis, instead favoring a form of intuition and the quality of affinities between great spirits as the only meaningful avenue toward true learning.

In a 1950 article on Balzac, Curtius discussed the mystical harmony of spiritual unity and the creative act of writing poetry—aspects academic critics cannot comprehend because of their lack of adequate methodologies with which to grasp a "seer's unity of vision." He expressed similar ideas in his important essay on Proust, which was first published in his book Französischer Geist im neuen Europa (1925; French spirit in the new Europe) and reprinted in Französischer Geist im zwanzigsten Jahrhundert (1952; French spirit in the 20th century). Following Proust in his concept of the "unique spiritual life," Curtius argued that receptivity and musical sensibility are the crucial vehicles for a profound perception of art and the truths of life.

At a time of great political, military, and economic pressure on Germany after World War I, Curtius struggled hard to overcome the cultural differences between France and Germany and to reveal in his many essays and articles the common historical roots connecting both countries. Latinity and the world of classical antiquity were for him the foundation of the entire European culture, a shared heritage that, properly understood, should overcome modern conflicts and nationalistic tensions.

Despite Curtius' efforts to awaken his contemporaries to the values of humanism based on classical learning, the trends of his time were against him. In Deutscher Geist in Gefahr he attacked the new barbarism of the National Socialists and the general decline of cultural values. In particular, he challenged the suddenly fashionable view of Charlemagne as the first perpetrator who alienated the Germanic world from its indigenous values and allowed Christianity and Roman culture to enter the minds of his people. Curtius desperately stressed the European orientation of the emperor and the absolute importance of classical antiquity for the emergence of medieval and Renaissance civilization on North European soil.

On the other hand, Curtius attacked the rise of new schools of thinking and new academic disciplines such as sociology because, as he saw it, they engendered nothing but useless knowledge, whereas traditional humanism would be the only trustworthy guarantor for the survival of culture. The study of the past, in particular of the Middle Ages, would provide modern students with an instrument to grasp both their origins and their present. But Curtius differentiated here, since the study of Greek culture was in such a decline that there was no possibility of its revival in the schools. Instead, the world of Rome and the Middle Ages based on the Latin language promised hope for the future.

Ernst Troeltsch's criticism of historicism, A.J. Toynbee's historical studies, and Jacob Christoph Burckhardt's concept of universal truths and ideals all deeply influenced Curtius' essays. Nevertheless, he carved his own approach to history in his many articles and essays published during the 1930s and 1940s in which he explored the relevance of medieval Latin literature, comparing it with texts from classical antiquity and the postmedieval world. Curtius firmly believed in the importance of medieval Latin writings from which the modern reader could gain profound insights into the basic aspects of life. The study of the Latin Middle Ages, which for him lasted from the 8th through the 18th century, became a struggle for the preservation of Western culture on a large scale.

Curtius repeatedly voiced his conviction that only a solid familiarity with medieval Latin and a great concern for the detailed facts of medieval culture could provide a firm foundation for any philological study of that past. With these two tools Curtius fought against the speculative nature of the so-called "Geistesgeschichte" (history of ideas), a methodology aiming for a broad picture of past cultures, taking into account the various forms of cultural expression. Yet Curtius himself followed the school of Carl Jung in many respects, rejecting art history as an elusive academic subject.

Many of Curtius' essays became the basis for chapters in his famous monograph European Literature and the Latin Middle Ages, which stirred up academic disciplines for many years to come. In particular his perception of topoi as deciding elements in medieval literature was heavily attacked, as was his exclusive focus on Roman heritage, omitting the important Jewish, Arabic, Celtic, and Slavic influences on medieval Europe. Moreover, as critics pointed out, Curtius paid little attention to lyric poetry and the drama.

Nevertheless, Curtius' essays continue to be seminal interpretations despite their denial of the historical individuality of particular periods. His belief in a Zeitgeist was highly provocative, while also demonstrating the superior quality of his essayistic writing. Many of his views may no longer be fully accepted today, but as essays they preserve their historical value, not to speak of their importance as scholarly landmarks.

ALBRECHT CLASSEN

Biography

Born 14 April 1886 in Thann. Traveled widely throughout Europe during his formative years. Studied Sanskrit and comparative literature at the University of Berlin, 1904–11, Ph.D. Traveled to Rome, 1912, where he met Romain Rolland. Privatdozent, 1913, and associate professor, 1914–20, University of Bonn; chair of philology, University of Marburg, 1920–24, and University of Heidelberg, from 1924; chair of Romance philology, University of Bonn, from 1929. Died in Rome, 19 April 1956.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Französischer Geist im neuen Europa, 1925

Die französische Kultur, eine Einführung, 1930; as The Civilization of France, translated by Olive Wyon, 1932

Deutscher Geist in Gefahr, 1932

Europäische Literatur und lateinisches Mittelalter, 1948; as European Literature and the Latin Middle Ages, translated by Willard R. Trask, 1953

Kritische Essays zur europäischen Literatur, 1950; enlarged edition, 1954; as Essays on European Literature, translated by Michael Kowal, 1973

Französischer Geist im zwanzigsten Jahrhundert, 1952

Gesammelte Aufsätze zur romanischen Philologie, 1960

Büchertagebuch, 1960

Kosmopolis der Wissenschaft: Ernst Robert Curtius und das Warburg Institut: Briefe, 1928–1953 und andere Dokumente, edited by Dieter Wuttke, 1989

Other writings: books on French literature, and correspondence (including with André Gide, Charles Du Bos, and Valéry Larbaud). Also translated works by Gide, Jorge Guillén, William Goyen, and The Wasteland by T.S.Eliot.

Bibliography

Richards, Earl Jeffrey, Modernism, Medievalism and Humanism: A Research Bibliography on the Reception of the Works of Ernst Robert Curtius, Tübingen: Niemeyer, 1983

Further Reading

Berschin, Walter, and Arnold Rothe, editors, Ernst Robert Curtius: Werk, Wirkung, Zukunftsperspektiven, Heidelberg: Winter, 1989

Christmann, Hans Helmut, Ernst Robert Curtius und die deutschen Romanisten, Mainz: Akademie der Wissenschaften und der Literatur, and Stuttgart: Steiner, 1987

Evans, Arthur R., in On Four Modern Humanists: Hofmannsthal, Gundolf, Curtius, Kantorowicz, edited by Evans, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press,

1970:85–145

- Forster, L., "Ernst Robert Curtius Commemorated," New Comparisons 4 (1987): 164–72
Freundesgabe für Ernst Robert Curtius zum 14. April 1956, Berne: Francke, 1956
- Godman, Peter, "The Ideas of Ernst Robert Curtius and the Genesis of ELLMA," in European Literature and the Latin Middle Ages by Curtius, Princeton, New Jersey:
Princeton University Press, 1990:599–653
- Hoege, Dirk, Kontroverse am Abgrund: Ernst Robert Curtius und Karl Mannheim, Frankfurt-on-Main: Fischer, 1994
- Lange, Wolf-Dieter, editor, In Ihnen begegnet sich das Abendland: Bonner Vorträge zur Erinnerung an ERC, Bonn: Bouvier, 1990
- Theis, Raimund, Auf der Suche nach dem besten Frankreich: Zum Briefwechsel von Ernst Robert Curtius mit André Gide und Charles Du Bos, Frankfurt-on-Main:
Klostermann, 1984

D

Dalin, Olof von

Swedish, 1708–1763

Olof von Dalin's name is preserved in Swedish history with something of a halo above it. He was not only the first author of weekly and monthly periodicals in Sweden, but was the founder of the important moral weekly in Sweden, Then Swänska Argus (The Swedish Argus), which enjoyed an overwhelming success and great popularity during the two years it appeared. Credit for issuing the first moral weekly goes to the brothers Carl and Edvard Carleson with their important journal Sedolärande Mercurius (Didactic Mercury), which appeared between June 1730 and October 1731. Begun anonymously in December 1732, Argus may have been founded to fill the gap left when the widely-read Carleson brothers' journal ceased publishing. The public may have been surprised by the change, but they took to the Argus enthusiastically.

The Argus was actually an offspring—even an imitation—of the British weeklies the Tatler and Spectator of Addison and Steele, and sometimes published translated material from the British periodicals. The original material appears to have been written by one person, though many found it hard to believe that an unknown young man like Dalin could be the author of such a sophisticated and enlightened periodical. According to Greek mythology, the name Argus signifies a vigilant observer. Dalin not only proved to have a sharp eye, he also wielded his pen with flair and wrote on many subjects satirically—yet cautiously too, as befitted the times. He did not allow himself seriously to satirize the church or the monarchy; nonetheless, his writings about the character of Swedish clergymen managed to be both negatively critical and positively descriptive.

Like the British periodicals, the Swedish Argus was a champion of the Enlightenment and aimed to raise the level of culture in Sweden. Several subjects of concern to Addison and Steele—such as literary standards and social behavior—were also considered in the Argus. While Dalin's essays were hardly original or unusual in style, nonetheless, as Ingemar Algulin explains in A History of Swedish Literature (1989), “their significance lies in Dalin's ability to transfer the ideas to Swedish conditions and to fit the Swedish language to the demands of the genre: a realistic depiction of society, a nimble and satirical analysis of customs and societal conditions, an enlightening, effective discussion of ideas. Then Swänska Argus marks the beginning of a new period in the development of the Swedish language through its realism, its clear form and its effective means of expression.”

After its demise in December 1734, the Argus was sorely missed. Although the journal was of lasting importance and influence in Sweden, it did not evoke imitations. Nor did Dalin attempt to resurrect it or replace it with other journals; instead he turned to poetry and drama, and later produced the allegorical tale Sagan om hästen (1740; The tale of the horse), in which he relates the history of Sweden through the eyes of a horse. His popularity, begun with the Argus, accelerated; he was a favorite at court and in 1751 he was ennobled. However, his position vis-à-vis the Swedish court was not secure and he eventually lost his favored status.

Although Dalin was a champion of modern Swedish, he was not without connections to classical literature. He often cited classical sources: Plautus, Hesiod, Horace, Boileau, and numerous others. Thoroughly grounded in the classics, he was of the old school of the 18th century, which made use of antiquity's literary models. La Bruyère had the greatest influence of any foreign writer besides the British on Dalin. Dalin said of La Bruyère that despite occasionally "losing himself," his lively character sketches were invaluable.

While Dalin did occasionally write satiric essays on historical subjects, none was as sophisticated and widely read as his Argus.

P.M.MITCHELL

Biography

Born 29 August 1708 in Vinberg. Studied at the University of Lund, 1721. Visited Stockholm, 1723, and moved there, 1727, where he was a tutor to various families. Founder and principal contributor, Then Swänska Argus, 1732–34. Tutor to the crown prince (later Gustaf III), 1750. Ennobled, 1751. Associated with the salon of Queen Lovisa Ulrika. Tried for political intrigue: acquitted, but banned from the court, 1756–59. Died in Stockholm, 12 August 1763.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Then Swänska Argus, 104 nos., December 1732–December 1734; edited by Bengt Hesselman and M.Lamm, 3 vols., 1910–19; selections translated by W.H.Carpenter, in Warner's Library of the World's Best Literature, vol. 10, 1917:4278–84

Other writings: two plays, the historical allegory Sagan om hästen (1740), the epic poem Svenska Friherthen (1742), and a four-volume history of Sweden.

Further Reading

Hillman, Rolf, Svensk prosastil under 1700-talet: Dalin, Linné, gustaviansk talekonst, Stockholm: Läromedelsförlaget (Svenska Bokförlaget), 1970

Warburg, Karl Johan, Olof Dalin: Hans life och gerning: Litterturhistorisk Avhandling, Stockholm: Norstedt, 1884

Wikander, Ruth, Studier över stil och språk i Dalins Argus, Uppsala: Appelberg, 1924

Darío, Rubén

Nicaraguan, 1867–1916

Critics and editors of the Latin American essay usually include Nicaraguan Rubén Darío in their survey of this genre in Spanish America. Darío is best remembered, however, as a poet who knitted his craft into standard, well-defined structures in verse, applying and enriching rhyme rules available in Spanish as no one had done before. Cantos de vida y esperanza (1905; Songs of life and hope) is among his most famous collections of verse. He is also recognized for his short stories, some of which are examples of the fantastic, a subgenre dominated by the masters of the Americas such as the U.S. writer Edgar Allan Poe and Argentines Jorge Luis Borges and Julio Cortázar.

However, Darío's creativity challenged the rules by skillfully mixing subgenres in what critics have called prose poems, which he published along with versified compositions in Azul (1888; Blue), the collection that propelled him to literary stardom. As a consequence, his prose has been the subject of conflicting interpretations. For the novice reader, the titles of his collections are deceptive; for example, Prosas profanas (1896; Profane prose) is composed of standard poetic composition using orthodox metrics.

Darío's essayistic production can be divided into at least three distinct categories. The best known takes the form of standard literary criticism as well as highly personalized literary portraits of outstanding figures and the subjects of his artistic admiration. The second category can be considered journalism and is composed of distinctively personal and impressionistic columns resulting from his travels in the United States, Latin America, and Europe. The third is unique pieces in the form of an autobiography and a long essay in which he narrates his return to his native country.

Most of Darío's literary comments meet the canonical expectations of the genre and reveal his innate skills. They are dispersed in numerous literary journals, as prefaces to several of his best-known books of poetry, and collected in anthologies such as Los raros (1896; The rare ones). In these pieces Darío is semantically and lexically precise in his use of language, displays strong cultural sensitivity, and is extremely opinionated. Most of the linguistic characteristics of his best-known poems in the tradition of modernismo are also revealed in his literary comments. Musical tones, baroque variations, and an overwhelming richness of vocabulary and syntactic structures often appear in his literary articles.

It is ironic that Darío himself had little respect for what has become his best-known writing besides his poetry. His articles published in newspapers, especially those commissioned by La Nación (The nation) of Buenos Aires, are among the most impressive generated in Spanish American literature. Darío labeled this task "el trabajo diario y preciso y fatal" (daily, precise, and fatal work), a characterization frequently made by others who have had to earn a living as journalists; however, in Darío's case his journalism had no discernible negative impact on his poetic craft (for which he was paid nothing). The journalistic genre that best applies to Darío is the freestyle crónica, a hybrid of reportage and informative column pieces. In his case, as well as in the journalistic ventures of other established Spanish and Latin American writers, the presence of his voice is paramount, constituting the trademark of the pieces. Still relevant are his lively turn-of-the-century commentaries on post-'98 Spain in España contemporánea (1901; Contemporary Spain), in which he shows increasing awareness of that country's regional and social differences, its rich multilingual cultural heritage, and its search for a new identity as it would be expressed by the Generation of 1898. Several Latin American settings (especially Argentina and Chile, where he resided) became the center of his attention, as did different aspects of the United States, inter-American relations, Italy, and France. In most cases, these articles still reveal a freshness in their analysis and point of view.

A third variation came in the form of personal "artistic prose," timeless essays loaded with commentaries on local customs and less anchored in sentimental diversions; this approach is mostly reserved for his autobiographical pieces. La vida de Rubén Darío escrita por él mismo (1915; The life of Rubén Darío as written by himself) is a short, meticulous document, a fine example of autobiography as a variation of the essay. The use of journalistic leads at the beginning of each chapter captures the attention of readers just as it does in his best poems. El viaje a Nicaragua (1909; Travel to Nicaragua), mixed with poems under the subheading Intermezzo tropical, is a narrative essay, a hybrid of memoirs and journalism, full of personal impressions as well as information and commentary on local mores.

Apart from his standard prose writing, some of Darío's best poems have essayistic qualities. Because of the intimacy between political ideas and the evolution of the essay in Latin America, these poems, as "essays in verse," a common subgenre in Latin American literature, were milestones in the changing attitudes concerning Latin America's search for cultural and political identity, and the use of the United States as a model. Historians of diplomatic and inter-American relations admire these works not so much for their lyricism as for the ideas expressed in them. Three of these poems are classics: "Oda a Roosevelt" (1904; Ode to Roosevelt), "A Colón" (1892; To Columbus), and "Salutación al Aguila" (1906; Salutation to the eagle). They are among the most used and abused documents by politicians, historians, and other essayists in discussing the Latin American perception of and relationship with the U.S. With these poems Darío, along with other modernista masters such as Cuba's José Martí and Uruguay's José Enrique Rodó, ushered in a new era in Spanish American literature and intellectual history.

JOAQUÍN ROY

Biography

Born Félix Rubén García Sarmiento, 18 January 1867 in Metapa (now Ciudad Darío), Nicaragua. Worked for newspapers in Santiago, Valparaiso, and Buenos Aires, from age 14; correspondent for Latin American papers in various parts of Latin America, including La Nación, Buenos Aires, from 1889, and in Paris and Madrid. Served Guatemala in various diplomatic and representative functions. Married Rafaela Contreras, 1890 (died, 1892): one son. Married (under duress) Rosario Murillo, 1893. Colombian consul to Argentina, 1893–94. Cofounder, Revista de América (American review), Buenos Aires, 1896. Long liaison with Francisca Sánchez, from 1899: one son (two other children died in infancy). Traveled in Europe, from 1900; Nicaraguan consul to France, 1903–07. Died (of cirrhosis of the liver) in León, Nicaragua, 6 February 1916.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Los raros, 1896

España contemporánea, 1901

Peregrinaciones, 1901

La caravana pasa, 1902.

Tierras solares, 1904; edited by Noel Rivas, 1991

Parisiana, 1907

El viaje a Nicaragua: Intermezzo tropical (travel writing), 1909

Letras, 1911

Todo al vuelo, 1912

La vida de Rubén Darío escrita por él mismo, 1915

El mundo de los sueños: Prosas póstumas, 1917

Alfonso XIII, y Sus primeras notas, 1921

Rubén Darío periodista (selection), 1964

Escritos dispersos de Rubén Darío (recogidos de periódicos de Buenos Aires), edited by Pedro Luis Barca, 1968

El mundo de los sueños (selected essays), edited by Ángel Rama, 1973

El modernismo y otros ensayos, edited by Iris M.Zavala, 1989

Other writings: poetry (including the collections Azul, 1888; Prosas profanas y otros poemas, 1896; Cantos de vida y esperanza, 1905), three novels, short stories, and two works of autobiography.

Collected works editions: Obras completas, edited by Rubén Darío Sánchez, 22 vols., 1917–19, Alberto Ghirardo and Andrés González-Blanco, 21 vols., 1923–29, and M. Sanmiguel Raimúndez, 5 vols., 1950–55.

Bibliographies

Greco, Arnold Armand del, Repertorio bibliográfico del mundo de Rubén Darío, New York: Las Américas, 1969

Jirón Terán, José, Bibliografía activa de Rubén Darío, Managua: Ministry of Culture, 1981

Woodbridge, Hensley C., Rubén Darío: A Selective Classified and Annotated Bibliography, Metuchen, New Jersey: Scarecrow Press, 1975

Further Reading

- Ellis, Keith, Critical Approaches to Rubén Darío, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1974
- Ingwersen, Sonya A., Light and Longing: Silva and Darío: Modernism and Religious Heterodoxy, New York: Lang, 1986
- Jrade, Cathy Login, Rubén Darío and the Romantic Search for Unity: The Modernist Recourse to Esoteric Tradition, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1983
- Reyes Huete, Alejandro, Darío en su prosa, Granada, Nicaragua: Editorial Hospicio, 1960
- Rodríguez-Hernández, Raúl, “Los raros: La otra estética modernista de Rubén Darío,” Texto-Crítico 14, no. 38 (January-June 1988): 51–58
- Schick Gutiérrez, René, Rubén Darío y la política, Managua: Editorial Nicaraguense, 1966
- Schräder, Ludwig, “Rubén Darío, crítico literario en Los raros,” in El ensayo y la crítica literaria en Latinoamérica, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1970: 95–99
- Watland, Charles Dutton, Poet-Errant: A Biography of Rubén Darío, New York: Philosophical Library, 1965

Darwin, Charles

British, 1809–1882

Charles Darwin’s Journal of Researches (1839), written during the five-year global voyage of the HMS Beagle, and his larger studies, primarily On the Origin of Species (1859) and The Descent of Man (1871), belong to an era in which travel writing, autobiography, literary allusions, scientific observation, and natural philosophy could still be combined in the same work. In this light, Darwin’s fusing of discursive genres as a means of observing and classifying places him firmly in the Baconian empiricist tradition, a tradition codified by the great 18th-century skeptics. Darwin’s ingenious use of the hypothetical-deductive method, with its presuppositions and mediated introspection, received energy from the essay form, which had since Bacon been pressed into the service of natural philosophy. Montaigne’s depiction of the essay as a kind of blueprint of cognition—or as Theodor W. Adorno’s later description of the form as the mimetic representation of “man thinking”—helps to explain why much of Darwin’s work seems essayistic even when it fails to conform fully to the conventions of the genre. As a record of cognition, the essay is conducive to science’s deductive analysis, even as the essay’s open form and resistance to closure dovetail nicely with the Enlightenment ideal (embodied in both Diderot and William Smellie’s encyclopedia projects) that each empirical study become a stepping stone to further reflection, observation, and finally greater knowledge. In this tradition, then, taken together, Darwin’s monographs and essays represent a single persuasive argument for the mutability of plant and animal species throughout history, a unity of thought that represents a major turning point in the history and philosophy of natural science. Thus, through deductive reasoning and associative analysis, Darwin looked beyond specific historical events and particular species in an attempt to formulate a larger world picture of organic history.

Darwin was the heir to Enlightenment naturalism, and his works register the continued evolution of a new form of personal and historical narration, a narration generated after the Western intellectual tradition broke free in the early modern period from the fetters of the Platonic/Aristotelian theories of knowledge. In essence, the essay is the form this new narration takes when the intellectual tradition makes a major shift in perception from a theory of ontic logos, a belief that the external world announces its own truths to the revolutionary understanding of knowledge as a representational construct that becomes dominant with Descartes and Locke. That is, ideas (ontic) for Plato (in an immaterial realm) or forms for Aristotle (in the material realm) are not just objects waiting to be perceived and valued, but rather are self-manifesting sources of light (logos). In contrast, the Cartesian/ Lockean theory of knowledge places the valuation of the object solely with the subject. Thus, before we can begin to understand the reason for the compelling form Darwin's great treatises take, much less understand natural philosophy's (or science's) collusion with the essay form, we need to understand how profoundly the New Science, with its empirical basis, influenced Western intellectual tradition.

The essay had colluded with science since Bacon (following Galileo's precedent) made the account of scientific knowledge representational. According to this modern model, to understand reality is to have a correct representation of ideas and fundamental principles. In the well-known phrase from a letter to Gibieuf (19 January 1642), Descartes writes that he is "certain that I can have no knowledge of what is outside me except by means of the ideas I have within me." Implicit here is the demise of a Platonic self-revealing reality, or realm of ideas; now reality is constructed, not received. Knowledge is not only personalized in the sense that it is the product of self-examination, but it is also personalized by the language of the subject, recorded, as it is, in the first person. But for Descartes and his 18th- and 19th-century scientific heirs, representations have to be ordered through a chain of deductively connected perceptions. Descartes perhaps theorizes this causal order most effectively in the Discours de la méthode (1637; Discourse on Method), where he tells us to break down our perceptions into parts and then to connect those disparate parts, "assuming an order, even if a fictitious one, among those which do not follow a natural sequence relative to one another." Darwin articulated precisely this methodological model in his journals of the late 1830s. Facts, he argued, are meaningless unless ordered by a coherent theory; a theory is useless unless it unites several significant facts; and a new theory is pointless if it does not advance the work of its predecessors. Thus, the essay as the discursive vehicle for the process of cognition is as tenable for the theoretical work of Darwin as it was for Descartes.

The Cartesian model with its narrative component helps to explain why Darwin's scientific journals join empirical observation with classical and contemporary literary tropes and historical allusions, and mix critical analysis with personal anecdotes and autobiographical references. But Darwin's more literary style also owed something to the intervening rise of the essay in popular culture. On the discursive level, his conversational style of writing reflects the didactic essay tradition of Joseph Addison and Richard Steele. Such textual heteroglossia and stylistic hybridization between the social and science essay aside, however, Darwin's intellectual activity was, in and of itself, never a purely endogenous process. His Beagle journals, later synthesized into Journal of Researches and expanded and developed into the Voyage of the Beagle, refer to numerous conversations, scientific books, and articles, all adding to Darwin's explanatory theory of evolution and species dissemination. On the theoretical level, his work depended upon the larger scientific community, an innovation of the "new science," which later reached its apogee with the philosophical and scientific communities of Aufklärer in Germany, the Philosophes in France, and the Enlightenment thinkers in Britain and America. After all, Diderot, La Mettrie, Kant, Goethe, and Hegel, among others, were all moving toward an evolutionary world conception.

Darwin's study, then, drew upon the work of predecessors and contemporaries alike, a fact which helps to explain Alfred Russel Wallace's independent formulation of the theory of evolution in 1858. For example, in his journal for 7 September 1838, Darwin credits his scientific debt: "Seeing what Von Buch [Humboldt], G. St. Hilaire, and [Jean-Baptiste] Lamarck have written I pretend to no originality of ideas." Yet less than three weeks after this entry, Darwin's synthesis and extension of these earlier ideas led him to a recognition of the evolutionary significance of natural selection. This realization compelled him to revise his first monad theory, which had proposed that all species created from the monad die to make room for the progeny of new monads. The new theory accounted for the explanatory mechanism undergirding his later theory of evolution: a species lives on only if it gives rise to new species—that is, if it produces variations.

Among Darwin's and Wallace's other important predecessors in biology, Darwin also named Georges Buffon, his own grandfather, Erasmus Darwin, and later Gregor Mendel for his developments in genetics. In geology his thought built upon the work of Charles Lyell, James Hutton, and John Playfair. On the other end of the epistemological and temporal spectrum, there is no evidence that Darwin had read the presocratic natural philosopher Empedocles, who had introduced the ideas of species variation and adaptation, survival and extinction, a strong prelude to Darwin's and Wallace's explanatory mechanism for natural selection, or that Darwin was familiar with Lucretius, whose narrative poem On the Nature of Things accorded to humans a socio-cultural evolution that began in a cave. Nonetheless, given Darwin's repeated emphasis on his scientific debt, it is easy to underestimate the originality of his work and its impact on Western thought. Ultimately, what Newton had accomplished for the physical cosmos, Darwin accomplished for organic nature. While Newtonian theory set new parameters for the spatial dimensions of the universe, Darwinian theory established new parameters for the temporal dimension of nature, both the scale of its existence and the conceptual immensity of its qualitative organic transformations.

Because of Darwin's work with fossils and his association with the geological work of Charles Lyell, he not only added empirical evidence to organic evolution's (and thus speciation's) encroachment upon the Aristotelian and Thomist belief in the immutability of all animal types, but his work as a whole also reflected the 18th- and 19th-century change in imagination and in the sense of man's place in nature. Such a conceptual revolution in the sweeping geological framework of space, time, and transformation had a dramatic impact upon science and human subjectivity, all of which was imagined and explored through the discursive and elastic dimensions of the essay. To fully appreciate why On the Origin of Species proved explosively controversial, earning it the label “the book that shook the world,” we need to consider the intellectual foundations of the world in which Darwin was born and his part in the overthrow of more than 2,000 years of philosophical stasis.

By recovering Aristotelian natural philosophy for theological ends (in much the same way Augustine had appropriated the Platonic paradigm of the material and immaterial realm for Christian metaphysics), Thomas Aquinas extended the Aristotelian hold over natural philosophy for another millennium. Despite his study of reproductive methods as well as the growth and development of organisms, Aristotle (and later Thomas Aquinas) grounded his view of life in the concept of the immutability of biological types, arguing that each organic kind has its own eternally fixed natural place in this hierarchical order of the living world depending on its degree of complexity and intelligence. Imbricated in religious dogma and a model of static metaphysics, natural philosophy sought, with few exceptions even during the Enlightenment, to support only literal interpretations of biblical narrative and causality. Even in the early modern period when science began to break free from the logic of Aristotelian syllogism, the Christian concept of the “Great Chain of Being,” adapted from Aristotle’s terrestrial continuum, dominated, legislating organic evolution as heretical even to science. Moreover, the rise of Deism in the 18th century had cooperated with the concept of Platonic/Aristotelian stasis to derail material and mechanistic science from inquiry that might have otherwise developed into earlier theories of organic evolution.

In primarily Protestant countries in the two centuries preceding Darwin, the design of nature—or on a grander scale, the universe—supported the existence of the supreme Deity. Alexander Pope’s Essay on Man (1733–34) is the quintessential exemplar of just this: that in God’s universe “All are but parts of one stupendous whole,/Whose body Nature is, and God the soul.” But Deism means that Pope’s harmonious natural order is not ontic like the Aristotelian/Thomist universal order. Rather it is interconnected in a kind of ecological economy that will presage Adam Smith’s political and social theories: although each being has its own internal purpose, by serving itself, it serves the entire order. This is precisely why organic evolution was eventually to have such dramatic consequences for religious belief. The intellectual structures of Christianity had become inextricably tied to the design of nature. Thus by demonstrating that there could be a design without a Designer—not to mention a design with a dynamic, mutable, and organic pattern—Darwin undermined a theological superstructure that had grounded religious faith in a theory of moral sentiment derived (through the Earl of Shaftesbury and Francis Hutcheson) from a hybrid of Lockean rationalism and the humanism of the Cambridge Platonists.

Darwin’s essayistic journals reflect the age’s dawning of a real sense of geological time. Not since Copernicus’ cosmological revolution had such new expanses been opened to the mind and imagination of philosophers. Certainly not since the demise of the geocentric universe in the 16th century did JudeoChristian mysticism receive such a blow from scientific materialism. Significantly, in both historic instances the rent in the ecclesiastic fabric allowed for further secular inquiry. Temporal order played an important part in encouraging literal interpretations of biblical narrative since the Reformation, a trend marked by the gradual displacement of the archetype and allegory for the particular in 17th- and 18th-century narratives. Thus, it is not by chance that the essay and modern novel are products of modernity: the novel for its specificity of time, place, and character; the essay because nothing could be more particular than an infusion of the first person. Not only did the eons required for Darwin's mechanisms of natural selection and adaptation punch a hole in biblical time, but his study proved that these were eons altogether unnarrated, requiring a new kind of imaginative framework for what Walter Benjamin has called "homogenous, empty time."

Darwin's work also turned the scientific lens inward upon the unexplored dimensions of the human mind. His early theories about "primitive" man led to his chapter on "Instinct" in Origin, and a more sophisticated development of that thesis in Descent of Man, opening the way for the 20th century's abiding preoccupation with man's psychological motivations and social unconsciousness. Both Marx and Freud brought Darwin's study to its logical conclusion in the increasing perception of the human as a product of unconscious political, economic, and instinctual impulses of a naturalistic order.

GREGORY S.JACKSON

Biography

Charles Robert Darwin. Born 12. February 1809 in Shrewsbury, Shropshire. Studied at Dr. Butler's boarding school, 1818–25; medical studies at Edinburgh University, 1825–27; theology at Christ's College, Cambridge, 1828–31, B.A., 1831. Investigated biological, zoological, and geological phenomena throughout his life. Sailed to South America as a naturalist on board HMS Beagle, 1831–36; in ill health after return, and for the rest of his life could work only a few hours a day. Lived in London, 1837–42, and in Down, Kent, from 1842. Married Emma Wedgwood, 1839: six sons and four daughters (two children died young). Elected to the Royal Society, 1839. Awards: Royal Society Medal, 1853; Copley Medal, 1864; Royal College of Physicians Daly Medal, 1879; honorary degrees from four universities. Died in Down, Kent, 19 April 1882.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Letters on Geology, 1835

Journal and Remarks, 1832–1836 (on his voyage on the Beagle), 1839; as Journal of Researches into the Geology and Natural History of the Various Countries Visited by HMS Beagle, 1839; edited by Gavin de Beer, 1959; as Diary of the Voyage of the Beagle, edited by Nora Barlow, 1933, Millicent E. Selsam, 1959, Leonard Engel, 1962, Richard Darwin Keynes, 1988, and Janet Browne and Michael Neve, 1989

On the Origin of Species by Natural Selection, 1859; edited by J. W. Burrow, 1968

The Descent of Man, and Selection in Relation to Sex, 2 vols., 1871; several subsequent revised editions

The Foundations of the Origin of Species: Two Essays Written in 1842 and 1844, edited by Francis Darwin, 1909

The Darwin Reader, edited by Marston Bates and Philip S. Humphrey, 1957

Evolution and Natural Selection, edited by Bert James Loewenberg, 1959

Darwin for Today: The Essence of His Works, edited by Stanley Edgar Hyman, 1963

The Essential Darwin, edited by Mark Ridley, 1987; as The Darwin Reader, 1987

The Portable Darwin, edited by Duncan M. Porter and Peter W. Graham, 1993

Other writings: many scientific works (on coral reefs, mold, earthworms, barnacles, plants, and other subjects), journals, an autobiography, and correspondence (collected in The Correspondence, 9 vols., 1985–94 [incomplete]).

Collected works editions: Works, 15 vols., 1910; Works (Appleton Edition), 18 vols., reprinted 1972; The Works, edited by Paul H. Barrett and R.B. Freeman, 29 vols., 1986–89; The Darwin CD Rom, 1992.

Bibliography

Freeman, Richard B., The Works of Charles Darwin: An Annotated Bibliographical Handlist, London: Dawson, 1965; revised edition, 1977

Further Reading

Culler, A. Dwight, "The Darwinian Revolution and Literary Form," in The Art of Victorian Prose, edited by George Levine and William Madden, New York: Oxford University Press, 1968

Descartes, René, Philosophical Letters, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1970; Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1981

Descartes, René, Discourse on Method, Notre Dame, Indiana: University of Notre Dame Press, 1994 (original French edition, 1637)

Friedrich, Hugo, Montaigne, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1991 (original German edition, 1949)

Gibson, Walker, "Behind the Veil: A Distinction Between Poetic and Scientific Language in Tennyson, Lyell, and Darwin," Victorian Studies 2 (1958–59):60–68

Levine, George, "Darwin Among the Critics," Victorian Studies 30 (Winter 1987):253–60

Morton, Peter, The Vital Science: Biology and the Literary Imagination, London and Boston: Allen and Unwin, 1984

Young, Robert, Darwin's Metaphor: Nature's Place in Victorian Culture, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1985

Davies, Robertson

Canadian, 1913–1995

Robertson Davies' accomplishments as a dramatist and novelist tend to overshadow his achievements with the essay, but he wrote a great many essays and was a master of the form. Davies' essays profit from their author's rare but happy combination of, on the one hand, extensive learning coupled with formidable intelligence and, on the other, a fine sense of humor. Opinionated, sometimes defiantly nonconformist, Davies was never dull, and, in addition to the intrinsic interest of their subjects, his essays hold the added attraction of revealing one of the most fascinating and memorable literary personalities of our time.

Although he never abandoned the form completely, Davies wrote most of his essays between 1940 and the mid-1960s, when he turned from journalism to academic life as Master of Massey College at the University of Toronto and began devoting his creative energy increasingly to writing novels. The 1940s and 1950s were extremely busy years for Davies. He was extensively involved in Canadian theater and was widely acknowledged as his country's leading dramatist, and he also turned out three very entertaining novels. His main work, however, was in journalism. In addition to freelancing vigorously, Davies edited and later managed the Peterborough Examiner and wrote columns for his own paper, Saturday Night, and, from 1959 to 1963, the Toronto Star. Most of the material in Davies' columns belongs in one of two general classes: essays on the arts, often reviews or essays growing out of reviews of books or theatrical performances, and the discursive, more oblique cultural criticism he delivered through the humorous persona of Samuel Marchbanks.

The Marchbanks columns appeared between 1943 and 1953, first in Davies' Peterborough Examiner, and gradually, as the character caught on with the reading public, in other Canadian newspapers. Somewhat revised, the Marchbanks writings reached a wider audience in The Diary of Samuel Marchbanks (1947), The Table Talk of Samuel Marchbanks (1949), and Samuel Marchbanks' Almanack (1967). The Papers of Samuel Marchbanks (1985) brought together material from the earlier books with previously uncollected writings. While Marchbanks was initially conceived of as a vehicle for humor, he shared Davies' love of reading, his delight in arcane subjects, and his impatience with cultural narrowness; in time he came to express many of Davies' personal views. The Marchbanks persona also provided Davies with a means of perfecting a writing style that would have seemed more at home in an 18th-century periodical than in a contemporary newspaper. Although the Marchbanks columns consist more of material related to the essay—short humorous sketches, diary entries, observations about human nature and society—than of essays proper, Table Talk at least can be thought of as a collection of genuine essays. While its individual pieces are rarely more than 300 words long, and many are written primarily for humorous effect, more than a few develop ideas that Davies himself takes very seriously. For example, "The man who writes only for the eye generally writes badly; the man who writes to be heard will write with some eloquence, some regard for the music of words, and will reach nearer to his reader's heart and mind" ("The Inner Voice"). In passages like this, we see the rhetorical balance, the emphatic, carefully placed repetition, and the sensitivity to the cadence of speech characteristic of Davies' own mature style.

Davies' essays on theater and books, particularly those that appeared in Saturday Night during his two terms as literary editor (first for a year and a half beginning in November 1940 and later from 1953 to 1959), played an important part in promoting discerning taste and cosmopolitan thinking in Canadian readers. Few were collected, however, until the success of his novels in the 1970s generated widespread interest in his ideas. Containing essays on characters, books, and other subjects he finds stimulating, The Enthusiasms of Robertson Davies (1979) demonstrates Davies' extensive, eclectic erudition. The Well-Tempered Critic: One Man's View of Theatre and Letters in Canada (1981) is aptly described by its title. Both collections were edited by Davies' biographer, Judith Skelton Grant. Davies himself gathered the pieces One Half of Robertson Davies: Provocative Pronouncements on a Wide Range of Topics (1977), a collection of speeches that were for the most part essays written to be read aloud. But the best and most personally revealing of Davies' essay collections came earlier. A Voice from the Attic (1960; published in Britain a year later as The Personal Art: Reading to Good Purpose) is directed to an audience of serious but nonspecialist readers which Davies terms "the clerisy." To Davies, "Curiosity, the free mind, belief in good taste, and belief in the human race are the marks of the clerisy, allied with a genuine love of literature, not as a manifestation of fashion, not as a substitute for life, but as one of the greatest of the arts, existing for the delight of mankind" ("The Shame of Brains"). It is in the "informed, rational, and intellectually adventurous individuality" ("Epilogue") of the clerisy that Davies sees the best hope for Western civilization.

Davies' own essays exemplify splendidly the qualities he values in his projected readers. His wisdom, clarity of thought, and wide learning are always much in evidence, but perhaps the most memorable characteristic of Davies' serious writing is its enthusiasm—the intense intellectual excitement with which he explores the diverse subjects that capture his imagination.

WILLIAM CONNOR

Biography

William Robertson Davies. Born 28 August 1913 in Thamesville, Ontario. Studied at Queen's University, Kingston, Ontario; Balliol College, Oxford, 1936–38, B.Litt., 1938. Teacher and actor, Old Vic Theatre School and Repertory Company, London, 1938–40. Married Brenda Mathews, 1940: three daughters. Literary editor, Saturday Night, Toronto, 1940–42 and 1953–59; editor, and columnist under the pseudonym Samuel Marchbanks, Peterborough Examiner, Ontario, 1942–63. Governor, Stratford Shakespeare Festival, Ontario, 1953–71. Professor, 1960–81, and Master of Massey College, 1963–81, University of Toronto. Elected to the Royal Society of Canada, 1967. Awards: many, including the Leacock Medal, 1955; Lorne Pierce Medal, 1961;

GovernorGeneral's Award, for fiction, 1973; World Fantasy Convention Award, for fiction, 1984; City of Toronto Book Award, 1986; Canadian Authors' Association Award, for fiction, 1986; Toronto Arts Lifetime Achievement Award, 1986; U.S. National Arts Club Medal of Honor, 1987 (first Canadian recipient); Molson Prize, 1988; Foundation for the Advancement of Canadian Letters Award, 1990; honorary degrees from 23 colleges and universities. Fellow, Balliol College, Oxford, 1986, and Trinity College, Toronto, 1987. Companion, Order of Canada, 1972; Fellow, Royal Society of Literature, 1984; Honorary Member, American Academy, 1981 (first Canadian elected). Died in Orangeville, Ontario, 4 December 1995.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

The Diary of Samuel Marchbanks, 1947

The Table Talk of Samuel Marchbanks, 1949

A Voice from the Attic: Essays on the Art of Reading, 1960; as The Personal Art: Reading to Good Purpose, 1961; revised edition, 1990

Samuel Marchbanks' Almanack, 1967

One Half of Robertson Davies: Provocative Pronouncements on a Wide Range of Topics, 1977

The Enthusiasms of Robertson Davies, edited by Judith Skelton Grant, 1979

The Well-Tempered Critic: One Man's View of Theatre and Letters in Canada, edited by Judith Skelton Grant, 1981

The Mirror of Nature (lectures), 1983

The Papers of Samuel Marchbanks (selections from earlier Marchbanks collections), 1985

Reading and Writing (lectures), 1993

The Merry Heart: Reflections on Reading, Writing, and the World of Books, 1997

Other writings: II novels (The Salterton Trilogy, 1951–58; The Deptford Trilogy, 1970–75; The Cornish Trilogy, 1981–88; Murder and Walking Spirits, 1991; The Cunning Man, 1994), a collection of ghost stories, 16 plays, a critical study of Stephen Leacock, and several books on the Stratford Shakespeare Festival.

Bibliography

Ryrie, John, The Annotated Bibliography of Canada's Major Authors, vol. 3, edited by Robert Lecker and Jack David, Downsview, Ontario: ECW Press, 1981:57–280

Further Reading

Buitenhuis, Elspeth, Robertson Davies, Toronto: Forum House, 1972

Cluett, Robert, "Robertson Davies: The Tory Mode," Journal of Canadian Studies 12, no. 1 (February 1977):41–46

Cockburn, Robert H., Introduction to A Voice from the Attic by Davies, Toronto:

McClelland and Stewart, 1972:viii–xii

Grant, Judith Skelton, Robertson Davies, Toronto: McClelland and Stewart, 1978

Grant, Judith Skelton, Robertson Davies: Man of Myth, Toronto and New York: Viking, 1994

Peterman, Michael, Robertson Davies, Boston: Twayne, 1986

The Defence of Poesy

by Sir Philip Sidney, written c. 1580–82; published 1595

Member of a family that had risen to prominence under the Tudor monarchy, Sir Philip Sidney (1554–86) won admiration at an early age for his courtly skills and intellectual curiosity. His wide travel in continental Europe included diplomatic missions on behalf of Elizabeth I. He advocated support for the Protestant Netherlands in their military resistance to the rule of Catholic Spain. When an English force was sent to the Netherlands in 1585, Sidney was given command of a garrison, and died from wounds sustained in a military engagement.

Sidney's major writings probably belong to the period 1578–84, though none can be dated with certainty. Arcadia, a prose narrative interspersed with verse, combines chivalric romance, pastoral, comedy, and debate on ethics and politics. It survives in a complete earlier version and an unfinished expanded version. Astrophil and Stella, a cycle of 108 sonnets and 11 songs, is one of the first English adaptations of Petrarchan love poetry. By turns witty and tormented, it is a lightly disguised and no doubt fictionally embellished treatment of Sidney's thwarted love for Penelope Devereux, sister of the Earl of Essex.

The most likely date for the composition of the Defence is 1580–82. Like Sidney's other writings, it circulated only in manuscript during his lifetime, and was published by two separate printers in 1595 under the titles Defence of Poesy and Apology for Poetry. It is one of several English defenses against moralistic or philosophical attacks on poetry, drama, and music. One of these attacks, Stephen Gosson's School of Abuse (1579), was dedicated to Sidney and possibly prompted the writing of the Defence.

The Defence has the structure of a classical oration, a literary form much utilized in Renaissance education and later adopted in Milton's Areopagitica (1644). Rejecting the methodical order of a treatise and the fantastic elaboration of euphuism, the fashionable literary style of his day, Sidney adopts the varying voice of a public speaker. The Defence expounds ideas with clarity and concision; it wins over the reader through politeness and humor; it assails poetry's enemies with satirical caricature and impassioned rhetorical questions; it rises to a rhapsodic enthusiasm in praising poetry. The persona created by Sidney's style exhibits the sprezzatura of the Renaissance gentleman, in which seriousness and effort were masked by the appearance of ease and casualness.

In the theoretical part of Sidney's Defence, "poetry" means imaginative literature. His purpose is to defend creative writing, whether in verse or prose, against the ethical charges of falsehood and frivolity. Sidney's basic argument is that poetry feigns "notable images of virtues, vices, or what else” and thus provides “delightful teaching.” In developing this argument he makes well-informed and quite sophisticated use of the ancient writers Plato, Aristotle, and Horace. He also draws on medieval doctrines and Italian Renaissance criticism.

From Aristotle comes Sidney’s definition of poetry as “mimesis” or imitation. Imitation is not the copying of particulars but a generalized rendering, in which a particular action and characters are universally representative. For the means by which this imitation is achieved, Sidney adopts the language of Renaissance neoplatonism, which drew a parallel between the activity of God in creating nature and the activity of the human mind, able to “grow in effect another nature.” Possibly on religious grounds, Sidney is reluctant to press the high claim that the poet has intuitive apprehension of an ideal world.

Sidney quotes from Horace’s Ars poetica (Poetic Art) the view that the aim of poetry is “to teach and delight.” The way these purposes work together is the central theme of the essay. The delightfulness of the poet’s fiction and the vividness of his “speaking picture” are the source of his ability to move hearers or readers to virtue. In this ability the poet is superior to his main rivals in the enterprise of Renaissance humanism, the philosopher and the historian. The philosopher’s teaching is too “abstract and general,” while the historian’s is too narrow, tied “to the particular truth of things and not to the general reason of things.” The poet uniquely combines the strengths of the two: “he coupleth the general notion with the particular example.”

Sidney’s emphasis on the power of poetry to move readers to virtuous conduct, and in particular to military valor, is characteristic of the practically oriented Christian humanism of the northern European Renaissance. His lament over the shortcomings of contemporary English poetry shows a cultural nationalism that is also characteristic of the Renaissance. In his review of English poetry, as well as in his earlier discussion of the traditional poetic genres, Sidney drops his broad definition of poetry as fiction and adopts the more conventional definition of poetry as writing in verse. His criticisms of English poetry and drama are based on a more rigid neoclassical ideal of formal “correctness” than is found in the early part of the essay.

The prescriptions about style in the Defence are well applied in Sidney’s other writings. The Defence criticizes English love poets “as men that had rather read lovers’ writings...than that in truth they feel those passions, which easily (as I think) may be bewrayed [revealed] by that same forcibleness or energia (as the Greeks call it) of the writer.” Astrophil and Stella is a brilliant exercise in energia, giving dramatic verisimilitude to Astrophil’s passion. Sidney’s application of the “teaching” power of poetry is more problematic. The Defence makes a sharp division between the representation of vicious characters who show “nothing that is not to be shunned” and virtuous characters who show “each thing to be followed.” Such clearcut characters are rarely exhibited in Sidney’s fictions, or in any fictions. This is a fact that the reader of the Defence can forget under the impact of Sidney’s powerful advocacy.

Like most Renaissance writers on poetry, Sidney restates and reinterprets classical doctrines. Later Renaissance writings that seem to derive from the Defence may simply share the same sources. Shelley’s “A Defence of Poetry” (1821), an answer to Thomas Love Peacock’s satirical The Four Ages of Poetry (1820), borrows Sidney’s title, adopts many of his arguments, and develops his neoplatonic suggestions into a Romantic claim for the transcendent status of the imagination.

ANTHONY MILLER

See also Critical Essay

Editions

The Defence of Poesy, 1595; as Apology for Poetry, 1595; edited by Geoffrey Shepherd, 1965, Jan van Dorsten, 1966, and in Selected Writings, edited by Richard Dutton, 1987

Further Reading

- Atkins, J.W.H., English Literary Criticism: The Renaissance, London: Methuen, 1947
- Barnes, Catherine, "The Hidden Persuader: The Complex Speaking Voice of Sidney's Defence of Poetry" PMLA 86 (1971):422–27
- Craig, D.H., "A Hybrid Growth: Sidney's Theory of Poetry in An Apology for Poetry," English Literary Renaissance 10 (1980): 183–201
- DeNeef, A. Leigh, "Rereading Sidney's Apology" Journal of Medieval and Renaissance Studies 10 (1980):155–91
- Ferguson, Margaret W., Trials of Desire: Renaissance Defenses of Poetry, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1983
- Hamilton, A.C., Sir Philip Sidney: A Study of His Life and Works, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1977
- Hardison, O.B., Jr., "The Two Voices of Sidney's Apology for Poetry," English Literary Renaissance 2 (1972): 83–99
- Heninger, S.K., Jr., Sidney and Spenser: The Poet as Maker, University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1989
- Kinney, Arthur F., "Parody and Its Implications in Sidney's Defence of Poetry," Studies in English Literature 1500–1:900 12 (1972): 1–19
- Miller, Anthony, "Sidney's Apology for Poetry and Plutarch's Moralia," English Literary Renaissance 17 (1987): 259–76
- Myrick, Kenneth, Sir Philip Sidney as a Literary Craftsman, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1965 (original edition, 1935)
- Robinson, Forrest G., The Shape of Things Known: Sidney's "Apology" in Its Philosophical Tradition, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1972
- Rudenstine, Neil L., Sidney's Poetic Development, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1967
- Sinfield, Alan, "The Cultural Politics of the Defence of Poetry," in Sir Philip Sidney and the Interpretation of Renaissance Culture, edited by Gary F. Waller and Michael D. Moore, London: Croom Helm, and Totowa, New Jersey: Barnes and Noble, 1984

Defoe, Daniel

English, c. 1660–1731

The most prolific essayist of early 18th-century England, Daniel Defoe produced some 200 works of nonfiction prose in addition to close to 2000 short essays in periodical publications, several of which he also edited, such as A Review of the Affairs of France. Such profuse output earned for Defoe a contemptuous mention as “Restless Daniel” in Alexander Pope’s Dunciad (1728), but the energy and intelligence of the writing gained for Defoe an influential voice in public affairs from the end of the previous century until his death in 1731, spanning the reigns of William, Anne, and George I.

Defoe’s first success as an essayist came in 1697–98, at the age of 37, with the publication of two pamphlets on the standing army controversy and a longer work, An Essay upon Projects, a collection of proposals for public ventures such as an academy for women, an institution for those born with mental defects, and an expanded national system of roads. Until this time he had published mainly verse pamphlets and concentrated on his business concerns; but after the success of these prose works—and the failure of his mercantile enterprises—he worked almost solely in nonfiction prose for the next two decades, and even after turning to fiction with Robinson Crusoe in 1719, remained prolific in nonfiction, producing in his last five years several of his most substantial and interesting volumes: The Complete English Tradesman (1725–27), A Plan of the English Commerce (1728), the economic geography Atlas Maritimus (1728), and two works involving the supernatural, The Political History of the Devil (1726) and An Essay on the History and Reality of Apparitions (1727). Much more than the novels, the nonfiction works provided Defoe his comfortable income.

Despite (or perhaps because of) this prodigious output, Defoe has until recently not held a secure place in the history of the essay, existing instead in the borderlands between the belletristic essay writing of Addison, Swift, and Johnson, on one side, and the anonymous ephemera of Grub Street, on the other. Certainly his work does not exhibit the self-exploration of Montaigne’s Essais (1580, 1588) or the timelessness of the commonplace topics of Bacon’s Essayes (1597, 1612, 1625); only Defoe’s A Tour Thro’ the Whole Island of Great Britain (1724–27) is widely recognized as having the aesthetic qualities of the belles-lettres. However, recent interest in the rhetorical nature of a wider range of nonfiction has prompted a new exploration of Defoe as a writer who used the flexibility and openness of the essay to investigate and shape the social life around him.

Defoe does share with Montaigne a notion of the essay as an informal and experimental kind of writing. When he uses the word “essay” in a title of a text (as he does a dozen times, e.g. An Essay upon Publick Credit, 1710, or An Essay on the Late Storm, 1704), its primary meaning is an experimental or initial attempt to treat a subject, only secondarily referring to the resulting text. There are several instances of this use of the word, as in Defoe’s remark in the introduction to An Essay upon Projects that “If I have given an Essay towards any thing New, or made Discovery to advantage of any Contrivance now on foot, all Men are at liberty to make use of the Improvement.” In the conclusion to the same work he refers to the essay as a kind of text but one defined only by a “Free and Familiar” language unconcerned with “Exactness of Style.”

The informality and freedom of Defoe’s essays, however, are in their style and tone, not in their structure. Despite the self-effacing tone of the introduction to Upon Projects, the individual essays proceed carefully, if casually, from an exposition of a public problem to a “Proposal” section that lays out the solution methodically, often in enumerated steps. Likewise, the Tour combines an often casual description of landscapes and cityscapes with a meaningful narrative pattern, each essay following a trip out from London and back. The relaxed but consistent repetition of this pattern helps Defoe depict Britain as a regionally diverse but economically unified whole, with London as its heart. When he pauses to reflect on a vista of fine country houses or a once bustling town now desolate, it becomes not a Montaignean digression but simply another illustration of the theme of national growth and decay.

But in tone and style the essays seem thoroughly “Free and Familiar,” and it is this aspect that readers have always found noteworthy. Most of Defoe’s pronouncements on writing urge the use of “Language plain, artless, and true” for the aim of broad comprehension: “A man speaking to five hundred people, of all common and various capacities...should be understood by them all, in the same manner with one another, and in the same sense which the speaker intended to be understood” (Tradesman). Recent studies have discovered in Defoe’s “plain style” an intriguing variety of figures of speech (especially irony and allegory) and levels of formality. But his essays are almost without exception conversational and accessible, and he is credited with being influential in the increasing use of the lower range of styles in 18th-century prose. Defoe’s own style was inspired by a variety of sources: the plain style of Dryden and the Royal Society, the popular preaching style of Defoe’s Presbyterian upbringing, and the premium upon familiar, unadorned prose among merchants.

The broader significance of Defoe’s essays, however, lies in the remarkable range of his work. From his formative commercial beginnings he took a lasting admiration of the merchant, who through his trade “converses with all parts of the world” and builds his enterprises from what is at first “all project, contrivance, and invention” (Upon Projects). That Defoe used the essay as a form whose openness would allow both wide converse and the projector’s focus on the present makes him a pivotal figure in the explosion of nonfiction, in both kind and quantity, for which the 18th century is still known.

STEPHEN M.ADAMS

Biography

Born Daniel Foe c. 1660 in London; used the name Defoe from c. 1703. Studied at Charles Morton’s Academy, London. Hosiery manufacturer and commission merchant, early 1680s: went bankrupt, 1691. Married Mary Tuffley, 1684: two sons and five daughters. Involved in Duke of Monmouth’s rebellion against James II, 1685. Associated with a brick and tile works in Tilbury: business failed, 1703; accountant to the commissioners of the glass duty, 1695–99. Convicted and jailed for seditious libel with

The Shortest Way with the Dissenters, 1703. Political writer for Robert Harley, later Earl of Oxford, 1704–11; editor, A Review of the Affairs of France, and of All Europe, 1704–13, Mercurius Politicus, 1716–20, the Manufacturer, 1720, and the Director, 1720–21; contributor to periodicals published by Nathaniel Mist, from 1715. Died in London, 26 April 1731.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

An Essay upon Projects, 1697; facsimile reprint, 1969; as Several Essays Relating to Academies, 1700, and as Essays upon Several Projects, 1702

An Essay on the Late Storm, 1704

An Essay at Removing National Prejudices Against a Union with Scotland, 6 vols., 1706–07

An Essay upon Publick Credit, 1710

An Essay on the South Sea Trade, 1712

An Essay on the Treaty of Commerce with France, 1713

A Tour Thro' the Whole Island of Great Britain, 3 vols., 1724–27; edited by G.D.H. Cole, 2 vols., 1927, and Pat Rogers, 1971; abridged edition, 1989

The Complete English Tradesman, 2 vols., 1725–27; reprinted 1969

An Essay on the History and Reality of Apparitions, 1727; as The Secrets of the Invisible World Disclosed; or, An Universal History of Apparitions, 1728

The Shortest Way with the Dissenters and Other Pamphlets, 1927

A Review of the Affairs of France, and of All Europe, edited by Arthur Wellesley Secord, 22 vols., 1938; reprinted 1965; Index by William L. Payne, 1948; selection as The Best of Defoe's Review, edited by Payne, 1951

Selected Poetry and Prose, edited by Michael F. Shugrue, 1968

Selected Writings, edited by James T. Boulton, 1975

"The Manufacturer" (1719–1721); Together with Related Issues of "The British Merchant" and "The Weaver", facsimile reprint, 1978

The Versatile Defoe: An Anthology of Uncollected Writings, edited by Laura Ann Curtis, 1979

Other writings: novels (including Robinson Crusoe, 1719; Moll Flanders, 1722; A Journal of the Plague Year, 1722; Roxana, 1724), poetry, and many tracts, pamphlets, broadsides, and other journalism.

Bibliographies

Moore, John R., A Checklist of the Writings of Daniel Defoe, Hamden, Connecticut: Archon, 1971 (original edition, 1960, revised edition, 1961)

Peterson, Spiro, Daniel Defoe: A Reference Guide, 1731–1924, Boston: Hall, 1987

Stoler, John A., Daniel Defoe: An Annotated Bibliography of Modern Criticism, 1900–1980, New York: Garland, 1984

Further Reading

- Backscheider, Paula R., Daniel Defoe: Ambition and Innovation, Lexington: University of Kentucky Press, 1986
- Backscheider, Paula R., Daniel Defoe: His Life, Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1989
- Curtis, Laura, "A Rhetorical Approach to the Prose of Daniel Defoe," Rhetorica 11 (1993): 293–319
- Furbank, P.N., and W.R.Owens, The Canonisation of Daniel Defoe, New Haven, Connecticut and London: Yale University Press, 1988
- Novak, Maximillian E., Economics and the Fiction of Daniel Defoe, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1962
- Novak, Maximillian E., Defoe and the Nature of Man, London: Oxford University Press, 1963
- Richetti, John J., Daniel Defoe, Boston: Twayne, 1987
- Rogers, Pat, "Literary Art in Defoe's Tour: The Rhetoric of Growth and Decay," Eighteenth-Century Studies 6 (1972–73):153–85
- Schellenberg, Betty A., "Imagining the Nation in Defoe's A Tour Thro' the Whole Island of Great Britain" English Literary History 62 (1995): 295–311
- Schonhorn, Manuel, Defoe's Politics: Parliament, Power, Kingship, and Robinson Crusoe, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991

De Quincey, Thomas

British, 1785–1859

With William Hazlitt and Charles Lamb, Thomas De Quincey takes his place as one of the most influential and prolific essayists in Britain in the first half of the 19th century. His Collected Writings (1889–90) edited by David Masson comprises 14 volumes, and includes his autobiography, Confessions of an English Opium Eater (1822), a small number of short stories, the novel Klosterheim (1832), and a dissertation on David Ricardo's economic theory, The Logic of Political Economy (1844). By far his largest output, however, are his essays on topics ranging from philology to astronomy, from ancient history to political affairs, from literary reviews to works of political economy.

De Quincey's literary reputation, as the master of a lyrical and digressive prose style, was established through the Confessions, his first work, published initially in four parts in London Magazine. In it he told the story of his peripatetic, bohemian youth, alongside breathtaking accounts of his opium dream visions. In his lifetime his name came to be synonymous with a lavish and poetic prose style, named by himself as "impassioned prose," but also with an eccentricity and disorderliness held to be characteristic of an opium addict. Less well known is the fact that after the success of the Confessions he became a major contributor to the periodical press, notably for the Edinburgh magazines Blackwood's and Tait's, writing essays on a strikingly broad range of subjects. Although his astute but eccentric intelligence gave an unusual slant to many of the topics he dealt with, he nevertheless played a significant role in the dissemination of contemporary ideas to a more general reading public. He was an enthusiast for German idealist philosophy, and an early translator of Kant and of German Romantic fiction; he had an interest in contemporary linguistic scholarship, in Ricardian economic theory, in new developments in astronomy, and in the new historiography of Barthold Georg Niebuhr. De Quincey was an eccentric polymath and hack journalist, and his works amount to an uneven but unusually broad corpus.

Much of his best prose is to be found in his autobiographical writings: Confessions, and its sequel, Suspiria de Profundis (1845). The latter is a series of reminiscences from his infancy, interspersed with passages of a lyrical and mythic character, such as his short piece on the palimpsest, which for De Quincey acts as a metaphor for the human memory. It is significant that in his autobiographical works he lingers on his childhood and adolescence, playing into the Romantic fascination for the state of childhood as a period of enhanced sensitivity and creativity. His own recurrent documentation of his childhood years has been in part responsible for the somewhat anachronistic estimation of De Quincey as an English Romantic writer, rather than the Victorian he properly is: he published from the 1820s to the 1850s and, moreover, was based in Scotland rather than England. This misplacing of his work has been exacerbated by his early association with the Wordsworths. From 1809 for a period of about 11 years, De Quincey was part of the Wordsworth coterie, a close companion of Dorothy Wordsworth, and intensely involved with the Wordsworth children. Through Wordsworth he was made editor of the provincial newspaper, the Westmorland Gazette—an appointment which, although short-lived, launched his journalistic career. As relations with the Wordsworths soured, he accepted an invitation from John Wilson, editor of Blackwood's, to write for that journal, and eventually moved with his family permanently to Edinburgh in 1830. Notoriously impecunious, spending long periods in a debtors' sanctuary, De Quincey was nevertheless a well-respected figure among Scottish intellectuals and academics, including among his friends Robert Chambers, the philosophers Sir William Hamilton and J.F. Ferrier, the classicist E.L. Lushington, and the astronomer John Pringle Nichol. These contacts account for many of the interests revealed in his journalism. Recent historicist criticism of De Quincey has paid attention to the Scottish context of his work, which for earlier critics had been eclipsed by his Wordsworthian connections.

Noteworthy among his contributions to Blackwood's are the three essays "On Murder Considered as One of the Fine Arts" (1827, 1839, 1854). The first two essays explore the ambiguities of Kantian philosophy, and expose the absurdities of contemporary interest in the lurid and the grotesque. While the jokes are often obscure, these essays nevertheless provide good examples of De Quincey's wit, presenting absurd situations matter-of-factly, and literalizing metaphors to comic effect. The moral ambiguities of the essays give a sense of decadence characteristic of De Quincey's work, and anticipate later Victorian writers such as Oscar Wilde. The final essay in the series provides a chilling and suspenseful account of two recent murder cases, and was influential in the developing trend of crime writing. Also published in Blackwood's was "The English Mail Coach" (1849), a fine example of De Quincey's "impassioned prose."

Less critical attention has been paid to his political commentaries. The essays on the collapse of the Wellington government and on the 1830 revolution in France give clear demonstration of his high Tory affiliations. Seemingly at odds with his political sympathies are his essays on political economy, “The Dialogues of the Three Templars” (1824) in London Magazine and “Ricardo Made Easy” (1842) in Blackwood’s, designed to popularize the works of the Whig economist David Ricardo.

In 1833 De Quincey began a series of anecdotal essays for Tait’s, which would include his “Autobiographical Sketches” (1834–41), “Lake Reminiscences” (1839), and three essays on Samuel Taylor Coleridge (1834–35). The essays on Wordsworth and his circle were particularly popular, as they incorporated frank discussion of the personal lives of these well-known figures, including the revelations of Coleridge’s drug addiction and his plagiarisms. Although they widened the rift between the Wordsworths and De Quincey, they nevertheless enhanced his literary reputation, and have been frequently republished as important documents of English Romanticism.

JOSEPHINE McDONAGH

Biography

Born 15 August 1785 in Manchester. Studied at Worcester College, Oxford, 1803–08; entered Middle Temple, London, 1812. First took opium, 1804, and later became addicted for life. Met William Wordsworth, 1807, and became associated with him, Dorothy Wordsworth, Coleridge, and Robert Southey. Settled in Grasmere, Westmorland, 1809. Married Margaret Simpson, 1817 (died, 1837): five sons (three died) and three daughters. Editor, Westmorland Gazette, 1818–19. Moved to Edinburgh, 1830. Contributor to various journals, including London Magazine, Edinburgh Saturday Post and Evening Post, Edinburgh Literary Gazette, Blackwood’s, and Tait’s. Contributor to the Encyclopaedia Britannica of entries on German and British writers, from 1837. Died in Edinburgh, 8 December 1859.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Confessions of an English Opium Eater, 1822; facsimile reprint, 1989; revised edition, 1856; edited by Malcolm Elwin, 1956, and Alethea Hayter, 1971

China: A Revised Imprint of Articles from “Titan”, 1857

Recollections of the Lakes and the Lake Poets, 1862; edited by Edward Sackville-West, 1948, and David Wright, 1970

Suspiria de Profundis, with Confessions of an English Opium Eater, 1871; edited by Malcolm Elwin, 1956

The Uncollected Writings, edited by James Hogg, 2 vols., 1890

Posthumous Works, edited by Alexander Japp, 2 vols., 1891–93

New Essays by De Quincey: His Contributions to the Edinburgh Saturday Post and the Edinburgh Evening Post, 1827–1828, edited by Stuart M. Tave, 1966

Confessions of an English Opium Eater, and Other Writings, edited by Aileen Ward, 1966

Thomas De Quincey as Critic, edited by J.E.Jordan, 1973

Confessions of an English Opium Eater, and Other Writings, edited by Grevel Lindop, 1985

Other writings: the novel Klosterheim (1832), short stories, and works on political economy.

Collected works edition: Collected Writings, edited by David Masson, 14 vols., 1889–90.

Bibliographies

Dendurent, H.O., Thomas De Quincey: A Reference Guide, Boston: Hall, and London: Prior, 1978

Green, John A., Thomas De Quincey: A Bibliography, New York: Franklin, 1968 (original edition, 1908)

Further Reading

Abrams, M.H., The Milk of Paradise: The Effect of Opium Visions on the Works of De Quincey, Crabbe, Francis Thompson and Coleridge, New York: Harper and Row, 1970 (original edition, 1934)

Barrell, John, The Infection of Thomas De Quincey: A Psychopathology of Imperialism, New Haven, Connecticut and London: Yale University Press, 1991

Baxter, Edmund, De Quincey's Art of Autobiography, Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, and Savage, Maryland: Barnes and Noble, 1990

Hayter, Alethea, Opium and the Romantic Imagination, London: Faber, and Berkeley: University of California Press, 1968

Leighton, Angela, "De Quincey and Women," in Beyond Romanticism: New Approaches to Texts and Contexts 1780–1832, edited by Stephen Copley and John C. Whale, London and New York: Routledge, 1992:160–77

Lindop, Grevel, The Opium-Eater: A Life of Thomas De Quincey, London: Dent, and New York: Taplinger, 1981

McDonagh, Josephine, De Quincey's Disciplines, Oxford: Clarendon Press, and New York: Oxford University Press, 1994

Maniquis, Robert M., "Lonely Empires: Personal and Public Visions of Thomas De Quincey," in Mid-Nineteenth Century Writers: Eliot, De Quincey, Emerson, edited by Eric Rothstein and Joseph Anthony Wittreich, Jr., Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1976

Russett, Margaret, "De Quincey's Gothic Interpreter: De Quincey Personifies 'We Are Seven'," Studies in Romanticism 30 (1991): 345–65

Rzepka, Charles J., Sacramental Commodities: Gift, Text, and the Sublime in De Quincey, Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1995

Snyder, Robert Lance, editor, Thomas De Quincey: Bicentenary Studies, Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1985

Whale, John C., Thomas De Quincey's Reluctant Autobiography, London: Croom Helm, and Totowa, New Jersey: Barnes and Noble, 1984

De Voto, Bernard

American, 1897–1955

Bernard De Voto was a novelist and distinguished historian, critic, and journalist, whose Mark Twain's America (1931), Mark Twain in Eruption (1940), Mark Twain at Work (1942), The Year of Dedstion: 1846 (1943), The Course of Empire (1952), and The Journals of Lewis and Clark (1953) are still standard works in American literature and historiography. But a major part of De Voto's long career involved writing essays for a wide variety of periodicals, beginning with a little essay on world peace in the Ogden, Utah Standard in May 1913 and continuing until his death in 1955, after which about a dozen appeared posthumously.

Over these four decades, De Voto's essays appeared in, among others, American Heritage, American Mercury, Atlantic Monthly, Fortune, Harper's, Holiday, Reader's Digest, Redbook, Saturday Evening Post, Saturday Review of Literature, Woman's Day, the Writer, and other magazines. The best known of these are the 243 "Easy Chair" essays which appeared in Harper's from November 1935 to January 1956 and made him perhaps the most widely recognized magazine columnist of his time. De Voto's most important and distinguished essays are to be found in three collections: Forays and Rebuttals (1936), Minority Report (1940), and The Easy Chair (1955), the latter a selection of essays written for Harper's.

In his essays De Voto focused on many of the same topics that engaged his attention in his nonfiction books: literary criticism, Western American history, and conservation. Much of his writing, in whatever form it took, was concerned with the American West, and his essays on the West reflect his fearlessness in attacking that region's mistaken notions and also defending it against its Eastern exploiters.

The quality of De Voto's essays might well be described in terms that he himself used in explaining the purpose of "The Easy Chair" as it had been carried on by his predecessors (including William Dean Howells): "to have a connotation of urbane informality, of a graceful interplay of thought and personality that used to be more highly regarded as literature than it is now...It has always had a quality it could not get in the study but only down the street, at the square, and in the city hall. If study and reflection have gone into it, so have legwork, sweat, and the opinion that is based not on research but on experience and participation."

Forays and Rebuttals brings together 23 essays, most of them from Harper's and the Saturday Review of Literature. They deal with a wide variety of topics: the American West as a "plundered province" of the East, Mormonism, the education of women, college faculties, New England, historiography, and works by prominent American writers—Mari Sandoz's Old Jules, Sinclair Lewis' Ann Vickers, Malcolm Cowley's Exile's Return, Ernest Hemingway's Green Hills of Africa, and Lloyd Douglas' Green Light. The volume concludes with two addresses: "Mark Twain: The Ink of History" (delivered at the University of Missouri in December 1935) and "Mark Twain and the Limits of Criticism” (given at the annual meeting of the Modern Language Association of America at Cincinnati on 1 January 1936).

Minority Report contains 36 essays reprinted from Harper's and the Saturday Review of Literature. As with his other two volumes of essays, this book demonstrates the range of De Voto's interests. “Passage to India” deals with the Lewis and Clark expedition, “Gettysburg” the fascination that the battlefield has held for generations of Americans. In other essays he discusses the election of 1860, the significance of Christmas in America, life in New York City, the failures of journalism, scholarly conferences, liberalism, literary criticism, semantics, Havelock Ellis, William Faulkner, Ernest Hemingway, Eugene O'Neill, the economics of writing, grammar, the cowboy story, and literary scholarship.

The final book of essays, The Easy Chair, brings together 31 pieces, all but one from Harper's. Again, De Voto's omnivorous mind ranges across many areas: 20th-century American life, communism and ex-communists, Don Marquis and his poetry, doctors and medicine, smoke-jumpers (fire-fighting parachutists), motels, radio and television, the television series “Victory at Sea,” the Civil War, the FBI, censorship and pornography, the American West, federal land policy, the U.S. Forest Service, and conservation.

The guiding principle behind all of De Voto's essays is perhaps contained in a passage from Easy Chair 241: “I have assumed that there was no public demand for me to write about anything at all but that if I was interested in something, some readers would be interested in it too. But also I have written about a good many subjects not primarily because I wanted to write about them but because it seemed likely that no one else would.”

De Voto's essays, early and late, reflect the mind of a writer who did not hesitate to take an unpopular stand on contemporary issues, to support the underdog, and to deflate hypocrisy wherever it might be found—in politics, business, education, religion, or literary criticism.

ROBERT C. STEENSMA

Biography

Bernard Augustine De Voto. Born 11 January 1897 in Ogden, Utah. Studied at the Sacred Heart Academy and Ogden High School; University of Utah, one year; Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1915–20, B.A., 1920. Served in the U.S. Army for two years. Taught English at Northwestern University, Evanston, Illinois, 1922–27, and Harvard University, 1929–36. Married Helen Avis MacVicar, 1923; two sons. Editor, Harvard Graduates' Magazine, 1929–31, and Saturday Review of Literature, 1936–38; columnist of “The Easy Chair,” Harper's, 1935–55. Regular staff member, Bread Loaf Writers' Conference, Middlebury College, Vermont, Summers 1939–49. Literary editor of the Mark Twain estate. Awards: Pulitzer Prize, for Across the Wide Missouri, 1948. Died (of a heart attack) in New York City, 13 November 1955.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Forays and Rebuttals, 1936

Minority Report, 1940

The Literary Fallacy (lectures), 1944

The Easy Chair, 1955

Other writings: five serious novels (The Crooked Mile., 1924; The Chariot of Fire, 1926; The House of Sun-Goes-Down, 1928; We Accept with Pleasure, 1934; Mountain Time, 1947), four novels under the pseudonym John August, books about Mark Twain, and a trilogy on American history (The Year of Decision: 1846, 1943; Across the Wide Missouri, 1947; The Course of Empire, 1952 [also as Westward the Course of Empire], 1953).

Bibliography

Barclay, Julius P., in Four Portraits and One Subject: Bernard De Voto, edited by Wallace Stegner, Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1963

Further Reading

Sawey, Orlan, Bernard De Voto, New York: Twayne, 1969

Stegner, Wallace, editor, Four Portraits and One Subject: Bernard De Voto, Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1963

Stegner, Wallace, The Uneasy Chair: A Biography of Bernard De Voto, Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1974

Dialogue

Throughout its half-millennium history, the essay has proved inseparable from dialogue. Defined as “trials” or “tests” or “attempts,” “essays” keep their distance from the information they would discover. Were the truth about their topics close at hand, the explorations that they undertake would seem superfluous. In dialogue, similarly, diverse interlocutors probe opposing opinions while keeping consensus at bay. To divide essays from dialogue would be then to separate the genre from the dramatic foundations of its defining qualities. Without dialogue, the open rhetorical space of the essay would contract into solid treatises and preacherly monologues. Our contemporary stereotype of the essay as a brash, confident, opinionated, and didactic form should be moderated by an understanding of the fact that almost all essayists, at one time or another, have cast works in dialogic form, made ample use of dialogic elements, or presented themselves as conversationalists.

Buoyed by the renewal of learning during the Renaissance, but befuddled by the resulting wealth of information, the early essayists reconciled ancient authority with modern skepticism by conversing with rather than simply citing the sages of old. Montaigne, a founder of the modern essay genre, creates the illusion of a conversation among the ancients by juxtaposing disparate extracts from their unrelated works and deeds:

Plutarch goes further, asserting that to appear to excel in such unnecessary accomplishments is to bear witness against yourself of time ill-spent on leisure and study which ought to be better spent on things more necessary and more useful. So Philip, King of Macedonia, when he heard his son Alexander the Great singing of a feast and rivaling the best musicians, remarked: “Are you not ashamed of singing so well?”...A king should be able to reply like Iphicrates did to the ambassador who was haranguing him with invectives: “[I am] None of these,” he replied. “But I am the one who can lead them all.”

In classical antiquity, dialogue was a trademark of skepticism, especially of that of the Platonic and Pyrrhic schools. Such mock conversations permitted moderns like Montaigne to tighten this longstanding link between doubt and discussion. Moderns could confirm their skepticism by crediting ancient authorities even while counterpointing differences in ancient opinion.

Britain’s Francis Bacon emulated Montaigne’s method. Although Bacon’s Essayes (1597, 1612, 1625) seldom take an overtly dialogic form, they proceed from, and work within, a conversable environment. The famous prelude to Bacon’s “Of Truth”—“What is Truth, said jesting Pilate, and would not stay for an answer”—is a conclusion to a prior conversation. Pilate has just finished elaborating on the topic of truth with some unknown Judaeian colleague, closing his discussion with dialogic inconclusivity. Bacon, indeed, could be described as an unacknowledged master of aborted conversations, for many of his essays begin with tacit conversational referents. Interrupted offstage discussions lead into dislocated mock conversations comprised of decontextualized quotations. Bacon’s simulated discussions replicate the mixed uncertainty and optimism of early empiricism. As an essayist and empirical scientist, Bacon faced an abundance of new experimental and philological evidence, but had at his disposal only the most provisional, “inductive” methods with which to organize it. Vigorous use of dialogue about diverse discoveries was one robust way of raising a temporary canopy over a circus of seeming contradictions.

Many early essayists applied the dialogic method to religious controversies, of which the later Renaissance never ran short. Essayists on religious topics affected the confidence that comes from zeal, yet the dialogic character of their discourses discloses all the uncertainties and instabilities that riddled the secular lucubrations of Bacon and Montaigne. Doubt-wracked John Donne bolstered his essays on theology with authoritative Scriptural quotations, yet he showed a marked preference for excerpts of a dialogic rather than definitive tone:

In the Morning ye shall see the glory of God, (sayes Moses to them) for, he hath heard your grudging against him. And again, At evening shall the Lord give you flesh; for the Lord hath heard your murmuring. They murmur'd for water, saying, What shall we drink?... When they saw it [Manna] they said to one another, it is Man, for they wist not what it was...(Essayes in Divinity, 1651)

People talk, God listens, Israelites say things to one another. Conversations pack and pile together in close quarters. God himself drops in on conversations.

The density and compactness that distinguish the early essay interact in later eras with the openendedness of conversation. Bacon's brevia cannot compare quantitatively with John Locke's colossal Essay Concerning Human Understanding (1690), yet Locke's encyclopedia of Restoration epistemology is less a unified work than a baroque array of essayistic conversations. The famous (and comical) case of Prince Maurice's rational (and dialogical) Brazilian parrot, who bantered with the best of wits, is one of hundreds of miniature discussions. As scrupulous Locke explained, "I set down the words of this worthy dialogue [with the parrot] in French, just as prince Maurice said them to me." Locke was not the only Restoration researcher to construct agglutinative essays from multiple recorded conversations. John Dryden, the author of Essay of Dramatic Poesy (1668), Lady Margaret Cavendish, and Henry More were only a few of the more notable practitioners of this art.

The inflationary tendencies of the Lockean essay joined with the didactical powers of the Baconian anecdote to propel the doubt-driven essay of the Renaissance toward the comicalinstructive essays of the Addisonian era. Early 18th-century periodical essayists used extended dialogues to teach the proper application of abstractions rather than merely to undercut scholastic generalities. Dialogue in early periodical essays advanced Lockean empiricism, for it showed not only the content of an idea or theory, but also the character and motivations of its advocates. Such dialogue compressed a range of invisible psychological and moral factors into palpable form. The result was a jolly, optimistic skepticism that balanced hard facts and clear ideas against peculiar personalities and private agendas. Joseph Addison relied on dialogue to popularize neoclassical critical ideas while also satirizing their overzealous advocates, and proposing milder manifestos:

In short, sir, (says he), the author [of the comedy under discussion] has not observed a single unity in his whole play; the scene shifts in every dialogue; the villain has hurried me up and down at such a rate, that I am tired off my legs... For my part, (says she), I never knew a play that was written up to your rules...I must confess ...I laughed very heartily at the last new comedy which you found so much fault with...Madam (says he), there are such people in the world as Rapin, Dacier, and others that ought to have spoiled your mirth...I must confess, (continued she), I would not be troubled with so fine a judgment as yours is; for I find you feel more vexation in a bad comedy, than I do in a deep tragedy ... (Tatler no. 165, 1710)

Extended essay sequences like those in the Tatler or the Spectator expanded this comical, empirical, and above all dialogical enterprise. Sequenced essays permit the examination of numerous related phenomena from countless viewpoints in an infinity of settings. The serial technique was taken to the outer limits by the buoyant Lord Shaftesbury, whose gargantuan essay collection Characteristicks of Men, Manners, Opinions, Times (1711, revised 1714) overflows with nonstop dialogues written from every conceivable viewpoint, from St. Paul's to the dung heap's. Later in the 18th century, letterwriting essayists like Philip Dormer Stanhope, the Earl of Chesterfield, interspersed reams of instructive epistles with comic re-creations of cocktail conversations. Repeated satiric dialogues tested the social and psychological limits of essayistic advice. Even the dour objectivist Samuel Johnson capitulated to the delights of serialized dialogic essays, with many of the essays in the Rambler, the Idler, and the Adventurer being comprised completely of dialogue, juxtaposed letters, or simulated conversation. And the trajectory that leads from the melancholy to the comic essay bisects the career of Samuel Taylor Coleridge. Coleridge is most often remembered for such sober (albeit Shaftesburian) projects as his Biographia Literaria (1817); but his most voluminous contributions came in the genre of the tart political essay, sometimes sounding like a highly serious version of coffee house Addison.

From our post-Hegelian perspective, we want to see Romantic essayists as capacious, organic, monumental, and full of grandeur. In fact, they relied on the same sort of conversational snippets as did their Augustan predecessors. William Hazlitt, the unremitting author of 21 immense volumes, could conjure up sublimities concerning just four lines of conversation from Shakespeare:

The character of Cleopatra is a masterpiece...The luxurious pomp and gorgeous extravagance of the Egyptian queen are displayed in all their force and lustre, as well as the irregular grandeur of the soul of Mark Antony. Take only the first four lines that they speak as an example of the regal style of love-making. Cleopatra. If it be love indeed, tell me how much? Antony. There's beggary in the love that can be reckon'd. Cleopatra. I'll set a bourn how far to be belov'd. Antony. Then must thou needs find out new heav'n, new earth.

As a mode of contrast, dialogue compares characters and views. In Hazlitt's consideration, it compares fragmentary utterances with immense conceptions. Hazlitt's metaphysical extrapolation of essayistic patter received a personal touch from Charles Lamb, who entered into simulated conversations with earlier authors hoping that he himself could give voice to a kind of transcendental shock at the inadequacy of their conceptions:

"We read the Paradise Lost as a task," says Dr. Johnson. Nay, rather as a celestial recreation, of which the dullard mind is not at all hours alike recipient. "Nobody ever wished it longer," nor the moon rounder, he might have added. Why, 'tis the perfectness and completeness of it which makes us imagine that not a line could be added to it, or diminished from it, with advantage. Would we have a cubit added to the stature of the Medicean Venus? Do we wish her taller?

Later in the 19th century, the satiric superman Thomas Carlyle continued this practice of turning intended meanings inside-out in order to evoke shattered images of sublimity. Carlyle even suggested that Sir Walter Scott's physical maladies constituted a kind of corporeal conversation with Nature. “A vigorous health seems to have been given by Nature; yet, as if Nature had said withal, ‘Let it be a health to express itself by mind, not body,’ a lameness is added in childhood.” In Carlyle’s twisted world, bad health is dialogically if not dialectically essential to writing good essays.

Wandering wits like Carlyle travel in and around the interstices between individual speakers and impersonal ideas—between quoted speakers, unscrolling essays, and immense conceptions. In earlier times, the confrontation with these rhetorical and epistemological instabilities drove Coleridge to drugs and Montaigne to his tower. In the 20th century, it has produced a darkly erudite, amusingly insufficient climax to the essay tradition: morosely entertaining fragments on the complexities and directionlessness of postmodernity. The collapse of essayistic openness is exemplified by the urbanely essayistic chit-chat of T.S.Eliot (e.g. in “A Dialogue on Dramatic Poetry,” 1928):

B... But the questions which he [Dryden] discussed are not out of date.

E. The Unities of Place and Time, for instance. Dryden gives what is the soundest and most commonsense view for his time and place. But the Unities have for me, at least, a perpetual fascination. I believe they will be found highly desirable for the drama of the future. For one thing, we want more concentration. All plays are now much too long. I never go to the theatre, because I hate to hurry over my dinner, and I dislike to dine early. A continuous hour and a half of intense interest is what we need. No intervals, no chocolate-sellers or ignoble trays. The Unities do make for intensity, as does verse rhythm.

A. You think we need stronger stimulants, in a shorter space of time, to get the same exaltation out of the theatre that a sensitive contemporary may be supposed to have got out of a tragedy by Shakespeare or even out of one by Dryden.

E. And meanwhile let us drink another glass of port to the memory of John Dryden.

Deeply if unwillingly immersed in the contradictions and self-consciousness that characterize the modern and contemporary eras, essayists like Eliot have looped themselves into a dialogue about former dialogues, into wryly repetitive essays about past essays about the future of dramatic poesy. Eliot and his successors have anticipated the dislocation of essaydialogues into serialized television debates about future views of what happened in the past or about past anticipations of future retrospectives. They have captured that strange combination of optimism and despair, certainty and turbulence, that makes essays dialogues rather than declamations.

KEVIN L.COPE

Further Reading

Adams, D.J., Diderot, Dialogue and Debate, Liverpool: Cairns, 1986

Brewer, Daniel, “The Philosophical Dialogue and the Forcing of Truth,” Modern Language Notes 98, no. 5 (1983): 1234–47

Carron, Jean-Claude, “The Persuasive Seduction: Dialogue in Sixteenth-Century France,”

- in Contending Kingdoms: Historical, Psychological and Feminist Approaches to the Literature of Sixteenth-Century England and France, edited by Marie-Rose Logan and Peter L. Rudnytsky, Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1991
- Cope, Kevin L., editor, Compendious Conversations: The Method of Dialogue in the Early Enlightenment, Frankfurt-on-Main and New York: Lang, 1992
- Gilman, Donald, "The Reconstruction of a Genre: Carolus Sigonius and the Theorization of Renaissance Dialogue," in Acta Conventus Neo-Latini Torontonensis, edited by Alexander Dalzell, Charles Fantazzi, and Richard J. Schoeck, Binghamton, New York: Medieval and Renaissance Texts and Studies, 1981
- Haynes, Robert William, The Dramaturgy of the Early Tudor Dialogue (dissertation; on More, Thomas Starkey, Thomas Elyot, and Thomas Lupset), Athens: University of Georgia, 1991
- Himmelfarb, Anne, A Mirror of Conversation: Studies in Late Seventeenth and Eighteenth Century English Dialogue (dissertation), New York: Columbia University, 1990
- Himmelfarb, Anne, "Argument as Imitation: The Prose Dialogue," Age of Johnson: A Scholarly Annual 3 (1990): 281–99
- Keener, Frederick M., English Dialogues of the Dead: A Critical History, an Anthology, and a Checklist, New York: Columbia University Press, 1973
- McCutcheon, R.R., Thomas More and the Limits of Dialogue (dissertation), Stanford, California: Stanford University, 1991
- McCutcheon, R.R., "Heresy and Dialogue: The Humanist Approaches of Erasmus and More," Viator: Medieval and Renaissance Studies 24 (1993): 357–84
- Mortier, Roland, "Variations on the Dialogue in the French Enlightenment," Studies in Eighteenth-Century Culture 16 (1986): 225–40
- Prince, Michael Benjamin, Strains of Enlightenment: Philosophical and Religious Dialogue in England, 1700–1780 (dissertation), Charlottesville: University of Virginia, 1990
- Snyder, Jon R., Writing the Scene of Speaking: Theories of Dialogue in the Late Italian Renaissance, Stanford, California: Stanford University Press, 1989
- Trueblood, Alan S., "The Art of Dialogue in the Early Seventeenth Century: Two Examples," in Studies in Honor of Bruce W. Wardropper, edited by Dian Fox, Harry Sieber, and Robert TerHorst, Newark, Delaware: Juan de la Cuesta, 1989
- Wilson, Kenneth J., "The Continuity of Post-Classical Dialogue," Cithara: Essays in the Judaeo-Christian Tradition 21, no. 1 (1981): 23–44
- Wilson, Kenneth J., Incomplete Fictions: The Formations of English Renaissance Dialogue, Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America Press, 1985

Diary

see Journal

Dickens, Charles

British, 1812–1870

The sketches, polemical pieces, and familiar essays written by Charles Dickens from 1833 to 1869 form a body of remarkable work that doubtless would have assured him fame as a writer had his novels, numerous tales, several plays, and annual Christmas stories never been written. Dickens' career as a novelist has greatly eclipsed his career as an essayist. Although his essays have received much scholarly attention, critics have generally focused on their revelation of Dickens' social views, his relationship to the periodicals publishing them, the autobiographical information embedded in them, and, most often, the connections between the essays and the novels. In addition to these legitimate critical interests, examination of Dickens' style has begun to enrich appreciation for the complexities of his essays. He wrote hundreds of essays and rewrote and edited hundreds of others submitted to the various periodicals he edited.

Although Dickens wrote some sketches as early as 1833, he began to distinguish himself as an essayist in 1834 when he started writing under the pseudonym Boz for publication in the Morning Chronicle. Other essays by Boz and under the pseudonym Tibbs appeared in the Evening Chronicle and Bell's Life in London. Many of these essays, particularly those describing London, are reminiscent of descriptive essays by Oliver Goldsmith, Charles Lamb, Leigh Hunt, and Washington Irving. The social concerns that figure significantly in all genres of Dickens' work appear in such early sketches as "Gin Shops," "The Pawnbroker's Shop," and "The Prisoner's Van," all published in 1835. The comic satire that was to blossom in later essays appears in many of the early essays and is especially notable in the six published in 1835 under the heading "Our Parish." In these, Dickens reveals the techniques—the dramatic scene, detailed and often detached observation, parallelism, and comic exaggeration—that he would refine in later pieces. In the "Our Parish" group, he satirizes the office and process of electing the beadle, the fickle regard of the parish for the curate, and the lofty but fruitless busy-ness of the ladies' societies of the parish, whose members held their meetings "with great order and regularity: not more than four members being allowed to speak at one time on any pretense whatever" ("The Ladies Societies," 1835).

On a more somber note, other essays by Boz reveal Dickens' skills as a journalist whose detachment from the subject creates irony or who frames the essay with detachment but allows his opinions about social issues to erupt at the core. For instance, in “A Visit to Newgate” (1836), Dickens begins with a matter-of-fact description of the prison and prisoners but breaks this tone by passionately reiterating one of his recurrent themes: the loss of childhood innocence. Observing a young girl visiting her inmate mother, Dickens writes: “...she was one of those children, born and bred in neglect and vice, who have never known what childhood is...Tell them of hunger and the streets, beggary and stripes, the gin shops, the station house, and the pawnbroker’s, and they will understand you.” This eruption of emotion about child visiting parent in prison likely reflects Dickens’ painful memory of visiting his own family in the Marshalsea Prison, where his father was imprisoned for debt in 1824. After this emotional outpouring, the detached observer leads the reader through the rest of the prison, the prison yards, the chapel, the press yard, to the cells of condemned prisoners. At this point, detachment dissolves into a fervent expression of sympathy for the condemned prisoner contemplating his impending execution. Here, as he often does, Dickens requires the reader to participate imaginatively, creating not simply a picture of the condemned man but also a series of the prisoner’s dreams of his loving wife, the scenes in the courtroom, and his desperate escape.

From 1836 to 1839 Dickens edited Bentley’s Miscellany, where some essays and the serialized Oliver Twist appeared (1836–39), but problems with the owner provoked him to begin in 1840 the periodical Master Humphrey’s Clock, a weekly he said owed much to the Tatler, the Spectator, and the Bee. Public pressure for serialized novels forced him to reduce the number of essays he was publishing in it and to make it more modern than its 18th-century counterparts had been. In 1850 he founded Household Words, where he published about 200 essays of his own and collaborated on or substantially rewrote many others. Essays in Household Words were aimed at a wide audience, including less well-educated middle-class readers; as such, these pieces include a broad range of subjects and techniques. As Harry Stone points out in his detailed introduction to Uncollected Writings from Household Words 1850–1859 (1968), a new kind of essay, the “process essay,” explained to readers what it was like to be in a certain place or to follow a particular process of experiencing or making something—for example, “Valentine’s Day at the Post-Office” (wr. with W.H.Wills, 1850), “A Paper Mill” (with Mark Lemon, 1850), and “Post-Office Money Orders” (with W.H.Wills, 1852).

In the weekly All the Year Round, which Dickens edited from 1859 until his death, his mastery of the essay is clear. In many pieces (such as those published in a volume entitled The Uncommercial Traveller, 1860), the connections between childhood and adulthood are explored through a skillfully created complex of tone and sensory detail. As Gordon Spence (1977) points out, the self-revelation of the narrator is at the core of a familiar essay. Identifying himself as one who travels for “the great house of Human Interest Brothers” (“His General Line of Business,” 1860), the narrator sets up the framework for his observations in England and on the continent, in the city and in the country. One of the best known of these essays is “Mr. Barlow” (1869), where the narrator reveals his detestation of a former tutor who had no sense of humor or fun and who delighted in destroying all imaginative pleasure his young pupils could have in reading such works as The Arabian Nights. In “Travelling Abroad” (1860) the narrator tells the story of seeing a great house near Chatham when he was a boy and being told by his father that if he worked hard, he could some day buy it. The reference is to Dickens' conversation with his father when he first saw Gadshill, the house which indeed he did buy.

Dickens' social conscience appears in such essays as "Wapping Workhouse" (1860), where he argues that "those Foul wards...ought not to exist; no person of common decency and humanity can see them and doubt it"; "The Great Tasmania's Cargo" (1860), where he urges the country to do its duty by its soldiers; and "The Short-Timers" (1863), which states that the way children, cripples, and paupers are treated is "a disgrace to civilisation, and an outrage on Christianity." The most poignant of the essays urging social reform is "A Small Star in the East" (1868), which juxtaposes scenes of despair and hope. In the first scene, the narrator visits a woman nearly dead from lead poisoning as a result of her work in the lead mills, and interviews a much younger woman who wants to work in the mills because, she says, "Better be ulcerated and paralyzed for eighteen-pence a day, while it lasted, than see the children starve." In the second scene, he visits the East London Children's Hospital, where honest and selfless concern for the malnourished and abused children have reclaimed them from miserable and premature deaths.

Many essays in The Uncommercial Traveller, like those collected in Reprinted Pieces (1861) and other works, explore such topics as church architecture, theater buildings and plays, social customs such as eating in restaurants, morbid settings like the Paris Morgue or a Welsh seacoast where 500 men had been lost in a shipwreck, "shy" neighborhoods where birds, dogs, and cats are personified, travel customs and difficulties, and places and people in London and abroad who are invisible to the masses of people passing them daily. With such a range of topics, Dickens attracted a broad spectrum of readers and engaged them through techniques and tones extending from whimsicality to somberness and zeal.

LINDA A.JULIAN

Biography

Charles John Huffam Dickens. Born 7 February 1812 in Portsmouth, Hampshire. Lived with his family in London, 1814–16, Chatham, Kent, 1817–21, where he attended a school, and London, 1821; worked in a blacking factory, Hungerford Market, London, while his family was in Marshalsea debtor's prison, 1824; studied at Wellington House Academy, London, 1814–27; Mr. Dawson's school, London, 1817. Married Catherine Hogarth, 1836 (separated, 1858): seven sons and three daughters. Long liaison with the actress Ellen Ternan. Law office clerk, London, 1827–28; shorthand reporter, Doctors' Commons, 1828–30, and in Parliament for True Son, 1830–32, Mirror of Parliament, 1832–34, and the Morning Chronicle, 1834–36. Contributor, Monthly Magazine, 1833–34 (as Boz, 1834), and the Evening Chronicle, 1835–36; editor, Bentley's Miscellany, 1836–39, and the London Daily News, 1846; founding editor, Master Humphrey's Clock, 1840. Lived in Italy, 1844–45, and Switzerland and Paris, 1846. Founding editor, Household Words, 1850–59, and its successor, All the Year Round, 1859–70. Gave reading tours in Britain and the United States, 1858–68. Lived at Gadshill Place, near Rochester, Kent, from 1860. Died at Gadshill, 9 June 1870.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Sketches by Boz Illustrative of Every-Day Life and Every-Day People, 1836; second series, 1836

American Notes for General Circulation, 1842; edited by John S. Whitley and Arnold Goldman, 1972

Pictures from Italy, 1846; edited by David Paroissien, 1973

The Uncommercial Traveller, 1860

Reprinted Pieces, vol. 2 of Works (Library Edition), 1861

Speeches Literary and Social, edited by R.H.Shepherd, 1870; revised edition, as The Speeches 1841–1870, 1884; edited by K. J.Fielding, 1960

Speeches, Letters, and Sayings, 1870

To Be Read at Dusk and Other Stories, Sketches, and Essays, edited by F.G.Kitton, 1898

Miscellaneous Papers, edited by B.W.Matz, 2 vols., 1908

Uncollected Writings from Household Words 1850–1859, edited by Harry Stone, 2 vols., 1968

Household Words: A Weekly Journal 1850–1859, edited by Anne Lohrli, 1974

A December Vision: Social Journalism, edited by Neil Philip and Victor Neuburg, 1986

Dickens's Journalism, Volume I: Sketches by Boz and Other Early Papers, 1833–39, edited by Michael Slater, 1993

Dickens's Journalism, Volume II: The Amusements of the People and Other Papers: Reports, Essays and Reviews, 1834–51, edited by Michael Slater, 1997

Other writings: 15 novels (The Pickwick Papers, 1837; Oliver Twist, 1838; Nicholas Nickleby, 1839; The Old Curiosity Shop, 1840; Barnaby Rudge, 1841; A Christmas Carol, 1843; Martin Chuzzlewit, 1844; Dombey and Son, 1848; David Copperfield, 1850; Bleak House, 1853; Hard Times, 1854; Little Dorrit, 1857; A Tale of Two Cities, 1859; Great Expectations, 1861; Our Mutual Friend, 1865), the unfinished novel The Mystery of Edwin Drood (1870), and several plays, including three with Wilkie Collins.

Collected works editions: The Charles Dickens Edition, 21 vols., 1867–75; Nonesuch Edition, edited by Arthur Waugh and others, 13 vols., 1937–38; The New Oxford Illustrated Dickens, 21 vols., 1947–58; The Clarendon Dickens, edited by Kathleen Tillotson and others, 1966– (in progress).

Bibliographies

Chittick, Kathryn, The Critical Reception of Charles Dickens 1833–1841, New York: Garland, 1989

Churchill, R.C., A Bibliography of Dickensian Criticism 1836–1975, New York: Garland, and London: Macmillan, 1975

Cohn, Alan M., and K.K.Collins, The Cumulated Dickens Checklist 1970–1979, Troy, New York: Whitston, 1982

Eckel, John C., The First Editions of the Writings of Charles Dickens, New York: Inman, and London: Maggs Bros., revised edition, 1932 (original edition, 1913)

 Hatton, Thomas, and Arthur H. Cleaver, A Bibliography of the Periodical Works of Charles Dickens, London: Chapman and Hall, 1933

Further Reading

- Ackroyd, Peter, Dickens, London: Sinclair Stevenson, and New York: Harper Collins, 1990
- Butt, John, and Kathleen Tillotson, Dickens at Work, London: Methuen, 1957
- Easson, Angus, "Who Is Boz? Dickens and His Sketches," Dickensian 81 (1985):13–22
- Slater, Michael, Introduction to Dickens' Journalism: Sketches by Boz and Other Early Papers 1833–39, edited by Slater, London: Dent, 1993; Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1994
- Spence, Gordon, Charles Dickens as a Familiar Essayist, Salzburg: University of Salzburg Institute for English Language and Literature, 1977
- Stone, Harry, Introduction to Uncollected Writings from Household Words 1850–1859 by Dickens, edited by Stone, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1968; London: Allen Lane, 1969

Diderot, Denis

French, 1713–1784

Although Denis Diderot wrote only a small number of texts bearing the title "essay," his writing owes much to the essay's conceptual and formal design. Those very essay traits have in fact contributed to a renewed interest in this philosophe's texts and to a transformation of his legacy. Until the 1960s, and from as early as 18th- and 19th-century criticism and commentary, intellectual historians and literary critics—Sainte-Beuve, the Goncourt brothers, and others—often judged Diderot's thinking to be unfocused, digressive, even derivative. As compared with other 18th-century French Enlightenment philosophes—for example, Montesquieu (De l'esprit des lois [1749; The Spirit of the Laws]), Buffon (Histoire naturelle [1749–1804; Natural history]), Rousseau (Du contrat social [1762; Of the Social Contract])—and the 19th-century discipline of philosophy itself, it was thought that Diderot's texts failed to produce either a new system of thought or of knowledge. Nor were his texts esteemed for any rigorous systematic method. In the last 30 years, however, those very properties of the essay which are characteristic of Diderot's texts and of the judgment levied against him have taken on a different significance. Diderot has been projected into a new critical spotlight provided by contemporary criticism in semiotics and poststructuralist analysis.

Indeed, the same characteristics of Diderot's writing which once served as the basis for negative critique now function in an opposite capacity as his indisputable intellectual and literary attributes, and in effect echo some of the basic literary and philosophical traits of the "essay." According to Theodor W. Adorno ("Der Essay als Form" [1958; "The Essay as Form”]), the essay “does not let its domain be prescribed for it. Instead of accomplishing something scientifically or creating something artistically,” the essay thus can seem derivative, taking its inspiration from multiple sources, from “what others have done before him. The essay reflects what is loved and hated instead of presenting the mind as creation ex nihilo...” The essay proclaims a different kind of interdisciplinary, unsystematic allegiance, faithful neither to absolutes nor to preconceived models of truth or knowledge; this defines the salient aspects of Diderot’s writing. But Diderot also influenced the direction of the essay by bringing new elements to this paradoxical writing.

Using “essay” in the actual title, Diderot wrote Essai sur le mérite et la vertu (1745; Essay on merit and virtue); Essai sur Sénèque (1778; Essay on Seneca); Essai sur les règnes de Claude et de Néron (1782; Essay on the reigns of Claudius and Nero); Essais sur la peinture (1795; Essays on painting). Despite this small corpus, essay writing constitutes a paradigm for Diderot’s thinking in texts carrying such diverse titles as Pensées (Thoughts), Discours (Discourse), Entretiens (Discussions), and Lettre (Letter). In each text, in each title, the fragment dominates: in thought, in direction, in the proliferation of different narrative voices, disclaiming exhaustive study of any one particular field, often disavowing any discovery of first or final principles and yet consistently seeking out new directions and territory. Says Adorno, “The essay thinks in fragments.”

Diderot’s equivalent of Francis Bacon’s Novum organum (1622), his Pensées sur l’interprétation de la nature (1753; Thoughts on the interpretation of nature), introduce an 18th-century emphasis on experimental science (“physique expérimentale”) based on a notion implicit in the semantics and form of the essay, that of a trial, an experiment, experience. Empiricism is based here on a renunciation of prescribed principles imposed on nature. Indeed, as Adorno says, the “essay alone has successfully raised doubts about the absolute privilege of method...”

Thus, just as Adorno names Descartes’ perspective as the antithesis to the spirit of the essay, which is “a protest against the four rules established by Descartes’ Discours de la méthode” (Discourse on Method), Diderot also challenges the Cartesian system, distinguishing between “two sorts of philosophy, the experimental and the rational. One has its eyes blindfolded, always goes along groping, seizes everything that comes to it and encounters in the end precious things. The other collects these precious materials and tries to form a torch; but this so-called torch has until now served less than the groping of its rival.” This “groping” is also textually manifest as isolated pensées in the form of fragments: “Experimental philosophy which does not propose anything is always content with what comes to it; rational philosophy is always learned, even when what it proposes does not come to it.”

Emphasis on observation and experience reverses a thinking based on a priori truths established in advance of any direct experience of nature. Both in the Pensées sur l’interprétation de la nature as well as in other writings Diderot places great value on the observer’s experience of discovery and reception. This crucial reversal also finds expression in the text’s narrative voice and direction. In the first fragment of L’Interprétation, Diderot the narrator models his writing on the lack of directed inquiry inherent in the experimental method: “It is of nature that I am going to write. I will let thoughts succeed themselves under my pen, in the same order according to which objects offered themselves to my reflection.” The text’s division into fragments is modeled on the often disconnected trials in nature unearthed by the experimenter and observer. In other words, the attributes of the essay are consonant with the tenets of experimental science in Diderot’s writing; the philosophe always makes an explicit link to the unprogrammatic fragmentary development and uncharted direction of his thought and expression. Adorno says that the “essay allows for the consciousness of nonidentity, without expressing it directly; it is radical in its nonradicalism, in refraining from any reduction to a principle, in its accentuation of the partial against the total in its fragmentary character.”

This seemingly modest concept of hypothesis based in experience delegates new power to the observer. Whether in epistemological, philosophical, aesthetic, or even fictional terms, Diderot’s texts testify to a new concern with the experience of an observer/spectator who is writing in the first person. The letter novel (La Religieuse [1796; The Nun]), and the philosophical novel (Le Neveu de Rameau [1821; Rameau’s Nephew]) derive from fragments which are written letters, or dialogue broken into multiple voices. A new kind of partial agency endows such a spectator with the ability to judge and to experience.

The still dominant norms of 17th-century French classicism were thus also challenged by Diderot’s testimony to a new kind of aesthetic judgment. His texts (Les Salons, 1759–72) on the painting and sculpture exhibited biannually in the Salon Carré of the Louvre form many short essays on artists and their exhibited art work. Such commentaries have long been viewed as digressive and verbose, but also as having inaugurated modern art criticism (see Michael Fried, Absorption and Theatricality, 1980). In fact, Diderot’s art criticism comes into existence precisely through a progressive union of the observer, the spectator, of painting and sculpture with first-person narrators who react to the experience, to the art work on exhibit. Thus, the individual observer’s perspective is embodied in a figure of discourse as a sentient narrative “I/you.”

Each essay in Diderot’s Essais sur la peinture (posthumously pub. 1795), written to accompany his Salon of 1765, treats another aspect of painting: design, color, chiaroscuro, expression, composition, even architecture. Throughout these essays, the reader becomes both listener and spectator. The narrator addresses Grimm, editor of the journal Correspondance Littéraire (Literary correspondence), for whom Diderot wrote both the Salons and his accompanying essays. But it is not solely to address Grimm that Diderot employs forms of direct address: he uses first-person discourse throughout the Essais, creating an atmosphere of informal conversation that contributes to the unfettered free flow of thought and experience. Direct discourse, in which the narrator communicates ostensibly to Grimm, also structures his address to various painters and spectators, adopting alternately formal and informal modes of address: vous/tu; “Look at that woman who lost her eyesight in her youth”; or “Turn your gaze on that man whose back and chest have assumed a convex shape.” The narrator urges the painter to provide new experience: “Touch me, astonish me, rend my heart, make me shudder, cry, tremble, rouse me first; you will remake my eyes afterward, if you can.” The spectators/readers, like the narrator, respond to experience that touches and transfixes them. Other figures also appropriate the “I” of the spectator, including characters from the canvas of painting, or spectators from the exhibit hall who are endowed in Diderot's Salons with spoken language and who begin to speak in their own person.

The classical, generally accepted academic criteria of good painting and sculpture are challenged through this structure of discourse. And the same characteristics of direct discourse mark both Diderot's Salons and his Essais sur la peinture. As one critic remarked already in 1796 in the journal La Décade Philosophique (The philosophical decade): "...those who have already heard him [Diderot] converse have only to open the pages of the Essais at random and will think they hear him speaking." Centuries later, in an introduction to the 1957 edition of Diderot's Salons, Jean Seznec uses almost identical words in describing Diderot's commentary on diverse tableaux and sculpture. Whether labeled "essay," "salon," or "lettre," and whether his essays treat historical, fictional, or pictorial personages, the (dis)order and immediacy of dialogue stage the voices of active controversy. This familiar, idiomatic language coincides with new criteria for painting itself: new appreciation of domestic genre scenes rather than exclusively of the grand canvases of history and mythology. Scenes from everyday life portray experience recognizable by all. Instead of the perfectly formed model, posed within the academy classroom, the narrator encourages painters to dwell outside in the experience of individual subjects whose particular, rare traits, even deformities, should be traced in their influence on all aspects of the body and character ("a system of deformities necessarily interrelated"). The essay is itself a deformity, a heterodoxy. Multiple speakers interrupt the univocal voice of third-person narrative and the unitary coherence of any set of philosophical, epistemological, historical, and aesthetic prescriptions to introduce the immediacy of both thought and experience.

As editor of the Encyclopédie (1746–72), Diderot composed another text of many voices, fragments offering further testimony to the uneven and unresolved experiences and experiments of an entire culture. Like the essay, all Diderot's texts consistently challenge the reigning method and accepted system of knowledge. "Heresy," Adorno says, "is the innermost formal law of the essay." Thus does this philosophe radicalize the notion of essay itself, his hybrid texts remaining unconfined to any single rubric or genre. Diderot reinvents the essay precisely through a new dialogue of proliferating voices which constitute the variegated weave of his diverse experiments.

SUZANNE R.PUCCI

See also Encyclopedias and the Essay

Biography

Born 5 October 1713 in Langres. Studied at a Jesuit school in Langres, 1723–28; Collège d'Harcourt or Lycée Louis-le-Grand, Paris, from 1728; University of Paris, master of arts, 1732. Worked for the attorney Clément de Ris, 1732–34; tutor, freelance writer, and translator, 1734–46. Married Antoinette Champion, 1743: two daughters and two sons (all but one daughter died young). Liaison with Madeleine d'Arsant de Puisieux, 1745–51. General editor and main contributor, Le Breton's Encyclopédie, 1746–72, (first volume published 1751). Imprisoned for three months because of writings, 1749. Intimate friendship with Sophie Volland, from 1755. Contributor, F.M.Grimm's private periodical Correspondance Littéraire, from 1759. Patronized by Catherine the Great, from 1765, and visited Russia, 1773–74. Member, Prussian Royal Academy, 1751; Foreign Member, Russian Academy of Sciences, 1773. Died (of emphysema and dropsy) in Paris, 31 July 1784.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Essai sur le mérite et la vertu, 1745

Pensées philosophiques, 1746; as Early Philosophical Works, translated by Margaret Jourdain, 1916

Lettre sur les aveugles, 1749; edited by Robert Niklaus, 1951; as An Essay on Blindness, translated anonymously, 1750; as A Letter upon the Blind, translated by S.C.Howe, 1857

Lettre sur les sourds et muets, 1751; edited by Paul H.Meyer, 1965

Pensées sur l'interprétation de la nature, 1753

Select Essays from the Encyclopedia (includes essays by others), translated anonymously, 1772

Essai sur Sénèque, 1778

Essai sur les règnes de Claude et de Néron, 1782; edited by Hisayasu Nakagawa, 2 vols., 1966

Essais sur la peinture, 1795

Mémoires, correspondance et ouvrages inédites, 4 vols., 1830–31

Thoughts on Art and Style, with Some of His Shorter Essays, edited and translated by Beatrix L. Tollemache, 1893

Dialogues, translated by Francis Birrell, 1927

Interpreter of Nature: Selected Writings, edited by Jonathan Kemp, translated by Kemp and Jean Stewart, 1937

Selected Philosophical Writings, edited by John Lough, 1953

Les Salons, edited by Jean Seznec and Jean Adhémar, 4 vols., 1957–67

Selections from the Encyclopedia, edited and translated by Stephen Gendzier, 1959

Œuvres philosophiques, edited by Paul Vernière, 1964 Selected Writings, edited by Lester G.Crocker, translated by Derek Coltman, 1966

Political Writings, edited and translated by Robert Wokler and John H.Mason, 1992

Diderot on Art, translated by John Goodman, 2 vols., 1995

Other writings: two novels (Les Bijoux indiscrets [The Indiscreet Toys], 2 vols., 1748; La Religieuse [The Nun], 1796), two dialogues (Jacques le fataliste et son maître [James the Fatalist and His Master], 1796; Le Neveu de Rameau [Rameau's Nephew], 1821), and several plays.

Collected works editions: Œuvres complètes, edited by Jules Assézat and Maurice Tourneux, 20 vols., 1875–77, and Herbert Dieckmann, Robert Mauzi, Jean Varloot, and Jacques Proust, 20 vols., 1975–90 (in progress; 36 vols. projected); Œuvres, edited by Laurent Versini, 3 vols., 1994–95 (in progress; 5 vols. projected).

Bibliography

Spear, Frederick A., Bibliographie de Diderot, Geneva: Droz, 2 vols., 1980–88

Further Reading

- Adorno, Theodor W., “The Essay as Form,” in his Notes to Literature, vol. 1, edited by Rolf Tiedemann, New York: Columbia University Press, 1991:3–23 (original edition, 1958)
- Bukdahl, Else Marie, Diderot, critique d’art, Copenhagen: Rosenkilde & Bagger, 1980
- Cassirer, Ernst, The Philosophy of the Enlightenment, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1968 (original edition, 1951)
- Chouillet, Jacques, La Formation des idées esthétiques de Diderot, 1745–1763, Paris: Colin, 1973
- Creech, James, Diderot: Thresholds of Representation, Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1986
- Fellows, Otis, Diderot, Boston: Twayne, 1977
- France, Peter, Diderot, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1983
- Fried, Michael, Absorption and Theatricality: Painting and the Beholder in the Age of Diderot, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1980
- Furbank, P.N., Diderot: A Critical Biography, London: Secker and Warburg, 1992
- Goncourt, Jules, and Edmond Goncourt, The Goncourt Journals, vol. 7, edited by Lewis Galantière, New York: Greenwood Press, 1968 (original edition, 1891)
- Lacoue-Labarthe, Philippe, “Le Paradoxe et la mimesis,” in his L’Imitation des modernes, Paris: Galilée, 1986:15–36
- Pucci, Suzanne, “The Art, Nature and Fiction of Diderot’s Beholder,” Stanford French Review 8 (Fall 1984): 173–94
- Pucci, Suzanne, Diderot and a Poetics of Science, New York: Lang, 1986
- Pucci, Suzanne, editor, Diderot in the Wake of Modern Critical Thought, special issue of L’Esprit Créateur 24, no. 1 (Spring 1984)

Didion, Joan

American, 1934–

An angelic rattlesnake in our blighted Eden is an apt description of Joan Didion, the penetrating American prose stylist who is likely to be remembered more for her striking essays than for the five novels she has written to date. Her output as a magazine travel writer, book and film reviewer, feature writer, and columnist outweighs her work in fiction. Indeed, certain Didion essays have become classics: “Slouching Towards Bethlehem” (1967) is widely considered the definitive portrait of the “flower children” of the 1960s who flocked to San Francisco in search of peace and love; “The White Album” (1979) is a quintessential evocation of the entire 1960s era. Didion, in fact, is often grouped with the 1960s “new journalists.”

As a sixth-generation Californian, Didion writes with authority on a range of Western American subjects. She has made the Californian and Hawaiian landscapes her own, and has interpreted the Hollywood film industry to a world bedazzled by its glamour. Didion’s greatest gift, in fact, is for exposing the romantic fantasies which propel individual citizens, communities, and the American government as well. Her most recent essays invariably focus on the “narratives” we tell ourselves, and their often damaging consequences.

Didion’s career can be tracked through her magazine associations. The first half of the 1960s mark her apprenticeship as a New York magazine writer. She wrote travel articles for Mademoiselle and Holiday, film reviews for Vogue, and book reviews for William Buckley’s conservative National Review. Then she said “Farewell to the Enchanted City” (1967) and fled to California. The late 1960s and 1970s saw Didion’s emergence as a columnist for the Saturday Evening Post, Life, and Esquire magazines; the 1980s, her book-length travel and political reportage written for the New York Review of Books, collected as Salvador (1983) and Miami (1987); and the 1990s, writing on Washington, D.C., New York City, and California for the New York Review of Books, the New Yorker (“Letters from Los Angeles”), and New West (collected as After Henry, 1992).

Didion writes for the cultural intelligentsia, for styleconscious upscale readers interested in politics and cultural analysis. These readers can (or aspire to) buy the clothes modeled in Vogue and the holidays heralded in Holiday. Nuances of fashion or upper-class life, therefore, often go untranslated in a Didion essay, which will note the Charles Jourdan suede pumps worn by Colombian women (Miami), or the “access to corporate G-3s” possessed by publishers and editors, though not by writers (“After Henry”). Didion’s upscale readers need no gloss of these items. At the same time, such detailed rendering of status life lends an aura of insider authority to Didion’s essays, providing readers with a sense of being both “in the know” with Didion and aware of the barriers to entry illuminated by these codes.

Although the cultural intelligentsia remain Didion’s primary audience, she has secured a larger, popular audience as well through her interest in American icons and in news stories which illuminate the times. Readers of the Saturday Evening Post, Life, and Esquire have been drawn to her telling portraits of John Wayne, Howard Hughes, and Joan Baez—all figures who have engaged the popular imagination. In her later work she dissects the Patti Hearst kidnap and trial and the web of events following the attack on New York’s Central Park jogger in April 1989. What may seem tabloid topics to some become narratives of complex misperceptions in Didion’s enriching hands. Readers seeking the sensational come away with sobering new perspectives on the individual and cultural histories which inform the event, but are misunderstood by most of the story’s major players. Like Virginia Woolf, Didion allows readers to inhabit differing points of view in her essays. Also like Woolf, she employs her outsider’s perspective to critique dominant ideologies, particularly those of the government and press.

Didion’s essays offer an illustration of how a writer’s style and artistic vision may be inescapable embodiments, not only of her personal history, geography, and literary assimilation, but of her very corporeal being. In her “Points West” and “The Coast” columns and her “Letters from Los Angeles,” Didion repeatedly insists that California’s history and geography instill a specific perspective in Californians widely misunderstood by those not native to the terrain. Much of Didion’s mission as a writer seems to be to correct these misconceptions. Didion’s Western perspective explains her defense of Patti Hearst and appreciation of Howard Hughes’ grand antisocial privacy. It explains her suspicion of “civic virtue,” in its myriad forms, and her California-bred awareness of America’s “golden dreamers” who erect their homes on sand.

Didion’s work reflects the strong influence of fellow American writer F. Scott Fitzgerald, who also toiled in the vineyards of fiction and nonfiction. Her early writings contain at least 20 references to Fitzgerald or his work, and the bond is more than parallel histories—of “Westerners” drawn and repelled by the East, of writers of Hollywood movies living in Malibu. It is more than their shared interests in wealth and illusion, the beautiful and the damned, the lost Eden of the American Dream and the dark night of the American soul. It is even more than Didion’s willingness to follow Fitzgerald’s advice of “tearing your...tragic love story out of your heart and putting it on pages for people to see,” which she did in her inaugural Life column (“A Problem of Making Connections,” 1969), as well as when she reprinted the psychiatric report of her own nervous breakdown in “The White Album.” Even more important than these parallels is Didion’s special affinity for Fitzgerald’s “golden moments.” In a lecture at Berkeley in 1976 Didion described an illustration of a cat drawn by a patient suffering from schizophrenia. The cat had a shimmer around it. “Writing is the attempt to understand what’s going on in the shimmer,” Didion explained. “To find the cat in the shimmer, if the cat is the important thing, or to find what the shimmer is.” Here, symbolically presented, is Didion’s ideological project. She employs the perceptions of her (often afflicted) nervous system as a metaphor for illusion and reality in the American experience.

This ideological project explains many of the traits of Didion’s remarkable style. She often begins an essay with description of a place; however, place soon becomes a “landscape of the mind”—with the shimmers of mind sets carefully limned. Didion’s essays are often cautionary tales, parables of illusion, of betrayed or lost promise. She employs anaphora to foreground the dissonant elements of her narratives—even narratives of her own illusions. She writes, for example, in “The White Album”: “It was a time of my life when I was frequently named. I was named godmother to children. I was named lecturer and panelist, colloquist and conferee. I was even named, in 1968, a Los Angeles Times ‘Woman of the Year,’ along with Mrs. Ronald Reagan, the Olympic swimmer Debbie Meyer, and ten other California women who seemed to keep in touch and do good works.” Ironic humor is part of this style. “I did no good works but I tried to keep in touch,” Didion continues. After reprinting her psychiatric report in this same essay, she adds, “By way of comment I offer only that an attack of vertigo and nausea does not now seem to me an inappropriate response to the summer of 1968.”

Didion’s wry and sympathetic persona, in fact, is one of her most successful creations. She uses herself as a probe and as a model of American society. Her confessions of personal illusions both invite reader identification and sympathy with her views, and demonstrate how prone Americans are to illusion. Her effort to discipline her illusions likewise becomes a model for reader behavior. Most cleverly, her assertion in many essays that she can find no meaning to the narrative has the effect of spurring readers to moral understandings she herself refuses overtly to claim.

Those who have read Didion's descriptions of her migraine attacks and possible multiple sclerosis cannot help but wonder if her mythos of shimmering light may be an exquisitely rendered translation of her physical condition. Didion wears oversized sunglasses even indoors to protect her light-sensitive eyes. An "aura" (or shimmer) is a documented early stage in most migraine attacks, preceding the actual headache. Didion has written that "When I am in a migraine aura...I...lose the ability to focus my eyes or frame coherent sentences" ("In Bed," 1968). Dehydration is thought beneficial for migraine sufferers and excessive water harmful. Didion's obsession with water and tropical climates may, therefore, have physical as well as spiritual nuance. Additionally, weariness with life and a wish to die are oft-reported experiences of migraine sufferers.

Certainly Didion's struggle with and acceptance of her physical afflictions have influenced her adamant stance against human improbability. The snakes in our gardens—the wormy truths of error, corruption, and death—are the reality which Didion's essays perpetually sound. We await, almost with dread, her continued rarefied perceptions.

BARBARA LOUNSBERRY

See also New Journalism

Biography

Born 5 December 1934 in Sacramento, California. Studied at the University of California, Berkeley, 1952–56, B.A. in English, 1956. Associate feature editor, Vogue, New York, 1956–63; moved to Los Angeles, 1964. Married the writer John Gregory Dunne, 1964: one adopted daughter. Columnist of "Points West," with Dunne, Saturday Evening Post, 1967–69, and "The Coast," Esquire magazine, 1976–77; contributor to several other magazines, including Harper's Bazaar, New Yorker, Ms., New York Review of Books, and the New York Times Book Review; contributing editor, National Review; Visiting Regents' Lecturer, University of California, Berkeley, 1975. Awards: Vogue Paris Prize, 1956; National Institute of Arts and Letters Morton Dauwen Zabel Award, 1979.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Slouching Towards Bethlehem, 1968

The White Album, 1979

Salvador, 1983

Miami, 1987

After Henry: Sentimental Journeys, 1992

Other writings: five novels (Run River, 1963; Play It as It Lays, 1970; A Book of Common Prayer, 1977; Democracy, 1984; The Last Thing He Wanted, 1996), short stories, four screenplays with John Gregory Dunne (Panic in Needle Park, 1971; Play It as It Lays, 1972; True Confessions, 1981; Up Close and Personal, 1996).

Bibliography

Oldendorf, Donna, "Joan Didion: A Checklist, 1955–1980," Bulletin of Bibliography (January-March 1981): 33–44

Further Reading

Anderson, Chris, "Joan Didion: The Cat in the Shimmer," in his Style as Argument: Contemporary American Nonfiction, Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1987:133–73

Braman, Sandra, "The 'Facts' of El Salvador According to Objective and New Journalism," Journal of Communication Inquiry 9 (1985):75–96

Braman, Sandra, "Joan Didion," in A Sourcebook of American Literary Journalism: Representative Writers in an Emerging Genre, edited by Thomas B. Connery, New York: Greenwood Press, 1992:353–58

Braudy, Susan, "A Day in the Life of Joan Didion," Ms., February 1977:65–68

Diamonstein, Barbaralee, Open Secrets: Ninety-Four Women in Touch with Our Time, New York: Viking Press, 1972

Friedman, Ellen G., editor, Joan Didion: Essays and Conversations, Princeton, New Jersey: Ontario Review Press, 1984

Johnson, Michael L., The New Journalism: The Underground Press, the Artists of Nonfiction, and Changes in the Established Media, Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1971

Lounsbury, Barbara, "Joan Didion's Lambent Light," in her The Art of Fact: Contemporary Artists of Nonfiction, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1990:107–37

Martin, Stoddard, California Writers, London: Macmillan, and New York: St. Martin's Press, 1983

Weber, Ronald, editor, The Reporter as Artist: A Look at the New Journalism Controversy, New York: Hastings House, 1974

Winchell, Mark Royden, Joan Didion, Boston: Twayne, revised edition, 1989

Dillard, Annie

American, 1945

In an author's note to her collection of 14 essays, Teaching a Stone to Talk: Expeditions and Encounters (1982), Annie Dillard asserts that "this is not a collection of occasional pieces, such as a writer brings out to supplement his real work; instead this is my real work, such as it is." This statement attests to Dillard's passionate conviction about the validity and artistic merit of the essay; it also acknowledges the speculation, confusion, and misreading that can arise when a writer refuses to confine herself to one genre. In addition to a wide variety of books of nonfiction prose, including a foray into the natural world, a memoir of childhood, reflections on the writer's craft, an account of her experiences as a member of a literary delegation, an exploration of human suffering, and a book of literary criticism, Dillard has published a novel and two collections of poetry. The Annie Dillard Reader, which draws from a number of these works, was published in 1994.

Though Dillard is quick to assert that Teaching a Stone to Talk is her only essay collection, to her displeasure many continue to use that label to describe Pilgrim at Tinker Creek (1974), which won a Pulitzer prize for general nonfiction. In a 1989 interview, Dillard describes Pilgrim at Tinker Creek as “a single sustained nonfiction narrative.” She acknowledges that her decision to give each chapter a separate title has led readers and critics to call Pilgrim at Tinker Creek a book of essays. Selected chapters of the book have appeared in magazines and anthologies of essays, also contributing to what Dillard regards as genre mislabeling.

While the most fitting classification for any piece of Dillard’s prose can be debated, certainly not in dispute is Dillard’s contribution to modern nonfictional prose. She is often compared with Thoreau and Melville and to her own contemporaries such as Loren Eiseley. Her essays can be found in numerous magazines including Antaeus, the Atlantic Monthly, Christian Science Monitor, Esquire, Harper’s, Harvard Magazine, Living Wilderness, New York Times Review of Books, North American Review, Parnassus, Ploughshares, Yale Literary Magazine, and the Yale Review.

In her introduction to the 1988 volume of The Best American Essays, which she edited with Robert Atwan, Dillard observes, “The essayist does what we do with our lives; the essayist thinks about actual things. He can make sense of them analytically or artistically. In either case he renders the real world coherent and meaningful, even if only bits of it, and even if that coherence and meaning reside only inside small texts.” She restates this assessment of her writerly lot and the company she keeps a year later in an interview recorded for the American Audio Prose Library: “One great advantage of the essay is that it mimics on paper what it is we do with our own minds at their best which is try to make sense of experience—actual experience. Fiction makes sense of imagined experience; nonfiction makes sense of actual experience.” Nowhere does Dillard recast this more eloquently than in “Total Eclipse,” the essay from her collection that is most often anthologized: “The mind—the culture—has two little tools, grammar and lexicon: a decorated sand bucket and a matching shovel. With these we bluster about the continents and do all the world’s work. With these we try to save our very lives.”

In this same interview Dillard admits that she dislikes opinion essays. It is narrative essays that interest her, and these constitute her offerings in Teaching a Stone to Talk. The essays in this collection recall many of the images and themes developed earlier in Pilgrim at Tinker Creek. But unlike Pilgrim at Tinker Creek, which focuses primarily on one geographical location and the reading experiences that Dillard brings to bear on her time spent there, Teaching a Stone to Talk covers much more distance geographically and topically. The essay collection includes “Life on the Rocks: The Galápagos,” “An Expedition to the Pole,” “In the Jungle,” “The Deer at Providencia,” and “Total Eclipse,” an account of that natural phenomenon as viewed near Yakima, Washington in 1979.

In Teaching a Stone to Talk, Dillard continues to probe the act of seeing which she began in Pilgrim at Tinker Creek. In “An Expedition to the Pole,” she says, “I stood on the island’s ocean shore and saw what there was to see...” This sounds very much like a passage early in Pilgrim at Tinker Creek, “Like the bear who went over the mountain, I went out to see what I could see.” She returns to this idea in “In the Jungle”: “The point of going somewhere like the Wapo River in Ecuador is not to see the most spectacular anything. It is simply to see what is there.” This passage is followed by an observation that sounds as if it could easily have come from Pilgrim at Tinker Creek: “We are here on the planet only once, and might as well get a feel for the place.” Dillard entitles one of the chapters in Pilgrim at Tinker Creek “Seeing.” Titles of two essays in Teaching a Stone to Talk, “Lenses” and “Mirages,” also make seeing the subject.

Dillard moves beyond a discussion of seeing in both Pilgrim at Tinker Creek and Teaching a Stone to Talk to an exploration of perception and consciousness. The main focus of Pilgrim at Tinker Creek's chapter “The Present,” the quest for “experiencing the present purely,” is also of primary concern in “Total Eclipse.” Here Dillard says, “We teach our children one thing only, as we were taught: to wake up. We teach our children to look alive there, to join by words and activities the life of human culture on the planet’s crust.” She laments that “We live half our waking lives and all of our sleeping lives in some private, useless, and insensible waters we never mention or recall.” Much of Dillard’s exuberant prose serves as a wakeup call to her reader. Here she keeps company with the young man in “Total Eclipse” whom she labels affectionately “a walking alarm clock.”

Readers of Dillard’s prose are struck as much by her sense of mystery as they are by her sense of humor. At times she can be a prankster and even mislead her readers. She admits in her interview with Kay Bonetti (1989), for example, that when she found out that it was virtually impossible to determine when the next solar eclipse in Yakima would occur, she simply invented a date. While Dillard’s tone can be flippant and whimsical, it can also be celebratory and awestruck. She returns often to an acknowledgment and exploration of the transcendent in her prose. Her Christianity is most evident in Teaching a Stone to Talk's shortest essay, “God in the Doorway,” and in the Yale Review essay, “Singing with the Fundamentalists.” To her credit, Dillard zealously privileges art over ideology in her writing. When asked if she has a theology, she quips, “I have a prose style.”

BEVERLY J. MATIKO

See also Nature Essay

Biography

Born Annie Doak, 30 April 1945 in Pittsburgh. Studied at Hollins College, Roanoke, Virginia, B.A., 1967, M.A., 1968. Married Richard Dillard, 1964 (divorced, 1974). Columnist, Living Wilderness, 1974–76; contributing editor, Harper's, 1974–81 and 1983–85; contributor to many other journals and magazines. Scholar-in-residence, Western Washington University, Bellingham, 1975–78. Married Gary Clevidence, 1980 (later divorced): one child and two stepchildren. Visiting professor, 1979–83, full adjunct professor, from 1983, and writer-in-residence, from 1987, Wesleyan University, Middletown, Connecticut. Married Robert D. Richardson, Jr., c. 1988. Awards: several, including the Pulitzer Prize, for Pilgrim at Tinker Creek, 1975; New York Presswomen’s Award for Excellence, 1975; Washington Governor’s Award, 1978; Appalachian Gold

Medallion, 1989; honorary degrees from three universities.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Pilgrim at Tinker Creek, 1974

Teaching a Stone to Talk: Expeditions and Encounters, 1981

The Annie Dillard Reader, 1994

Other writings: the novel The Living (1992), two collections of poetry (Tickets for a Prayer Wheel, 1974; Mornings Like This, 1995), Holy the Firm (1977), on religious and metaphysical questions, books on literature and writing, and the autobiography An American Childhood (1987).

Further Reading

Bonetti, Kay, "Interview with Annie Dillard," Audio Prose Library, June 1989

Chénétier, Marc, "Tinkering, Extravagance: Thoreau, Melville, and Annie Dillard," Critique 31, no. 3 (1990): 157–72

Clark, Suzanne, "The Woman in Nature and the Subject of Nonfiction," in Literary Nonfiction: Theory, Criticism, Pedagogy, edited by Chris Anderson, Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1989

Dunn, Robert Paul, "The Artist as Nun: Theme, Tone and Vision in the Writings of Annie Dillard," Studia Mystica 1, no. 4 (1978): 17–31

Felch, Susan M., "Annie Dillard: Modern Physics in a Contemporary Mystic," Mosaic 22, no. 2 (1989): 1–14

Hammond, Karla M., "Drawing the Curtains: An Interview with Annie Dillard," Bennington Review 10 (1981): 30–38

Johnson, Sandra Humble, The Space Between: Literary Epiphany in the Work of Annie Dillard, Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 1992

Keller, Joseph, "The Function of Paradox in Mystical Discourse," Studia Mystica 6, no. 3 (1983): 3–19

Lavery, David, "Noticer: The Visionary Art of Annie Dillard," Massachusetts Review 21 (1980): 255–70

McClintock, James, Nature's Kindred Spirits: Aldo Leopold, Joseph Wood Krutch, Edward Abbey, Annie Dillard, Gary Snyder, Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1994

McConahay, Mary Davidson, "'Into the Bladelike Arms of God': The Quest for Meaning Through Symbolic Language in Thoreau and Annie Dillard," Denver Quarterly 20 (Fall 1985): 103–16

McFadden-Gerber, Margaret, "The I in Nature," American Notes and Queries 16 (1977): 3–5

McIlroy, Gary, "Pilgrim at Tinker Creek and the Social Legacy of Walden," South Atlantic Quarterly 85, no. 2 (Spring 1986): 111–22

McIlroy, Gary, "Pilgrim at Tinker Creek and the Burden of Science," American Literature 59, no. 1 (1987): 71–84

Reimer, Margaret Loewen, "The Dialectical Vision of Annie Dillard's Pilgrim at Tinker Creek" Critique: Studies in Modern Fiction 24, no. 3 (1983): 182–91

Scheick, William J., "Annie Dillard: Narrative Fringe," in Contemporary American Women Writers: Narrative Strategies, edited by Catherine Rainwater and William J. Scheick, Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1985

Yancey, Philip, "A Face Aflame: An Interview with Annie Dillard," Christianity Today 22 (1978):14–19

Discourse on Method

by René Descartes, 1637

Published in 1637, the Discours de la méthode (Discourse on Method) stands at a crucial point of transition in the philosophical and scientific thinking of René Descartes (1596–1650). On the one hand it looks back at early works such as the Regulae ad directionem ingenii (wr. 1628, pub. 1701; Rules for the Direction of the Mind), and the aborted Le Monde (begun 162.9; The world), Descartes' vision of the cosmos in response to Galileo's Dialogo dove si discorre sopra il due massimi sistemi del mondo (1632; Dialogue Concerning the Two Chief World Systems). On the other, it anticipates the famous Meditationes de prima philosophia (1641; Meditations on First Philosophy) and the influential Les Passions de l'âme (1649; Passions of the Soul). Presented as an introduction or prologue to his works on optics, meteorology, and geometry, it is concerned with the problem of legitimizing natural philosophy after the condemnation of Galileo by the Church.

Writing in French rather than the more conventional Latin, Descartes addresses himself ostensibly to the general reader in search of truth. At the same time, while he hopes that others will find some value in his intellectual journey, he emphasizes the highly personal nature of the quest. If the Meditations are patterned after the spiritual exercises of Loyola, the Discourse finds its prototype in St. Augustine's Confessions (397–98 CE) and Montaigne's Essais (1580, 1588). He characterizes the Discourse as an autobiographical "story" or "fable," divided into six parts for easy contemplation. Implicitly portraying himself as a sort of Socrates in search of truth and wisdom through skepticism and doubt, he traces his intellectual journey from his early classical education through the breakdown of his certainty and subsequent spiritual and intellectual revelation, to the current state of his thinking. Descartes builds this fable around a series of architectural and travel metaphors, evoking images of foundations and construction, dark forests and roads.

The first two parts of the Discourse present his early philosophical doubts, culminating in the discovery of his "method," while enjoying the solitude of the famous stove-heated room. Echoing the Regulae, he describes four rules for reforming his own ways of thinking: first, accept nothing that is not clear and distinct; second, divide difficult subjects into many small parts; third, start with the simplest problems; and fourth, be comprehensive. By means of the "method" Descartes rehearses his ontological arguments for the existence of God, and enunciates the famous "cogito ergo sum" ("I think therefore

I am”), all of which he develops more fully, systematically, and in a different order in the Meditations. In the third part, he suggests a series of moral maxims, positing tolerance and restraint in the face of uncertainty, an ethical stance that looks back to both Socrates and Montaigne.

After explaining his system of morality in Part 3, and his metaphysics in Part 4, Descartes turns in Part 5 to a summary of the doctrines found in the suppressed Le Monde, and in L’Homme (wr. 1629–33, Pub. 1664; Treatise on Man). Of particular importance to Descartes was the theory of automata and the workings of the circulatory system, both developed more fully later in the Passions of the Soul. Playing on the theme of the fable, he describes his model of the cosmos and the mechanics of the human body in terms of an elaborate fantasy rather than an actuality, a speculative portrait of how the world would be if his assumptions on the nature of God were true. In this way, he can present his theories, suggest their reasonableness, yet not commit himself to their ultimate validity. He cuts off any lengthy scholastic disputation, shortcircuiting the traditional philosophical doctrines that he feels stand in the way of scientific discovery. Part 6 provides an introduction to the essays on meteorology and optics, indicating the present state of his scientific investigations. Having thus explained the method and his state of progress as a result of the method, a movement from the past to the present, Descartes offers a veiled invitation to any patron who would help him continue his search, a turn toward the future.

First published in Leiden by Elzevier, the Discourse had an initial run of 3000 copies. Having already circulated in proof to a number of noted figures, the book attracted a wide and immediate reaction, and Descartes spent the next two years responding to questions and objections. If the Discourse did not provide Descartes with the economic independence he desired, at least until the fateful patronage of Queen Christina of Sweden, it contributed to the composition of the Meditations and his subsequent philosophical works. Perhaps more importantly, however, by introducing the doctrine of the cogito, and the exploration of the limits of human knowledge, Descartes’ philosophical fable influenced all subsequent Western philosophy, from the various empirical schools that accept the role of consciousness in the constitution of reality even while rejecting the proofs of God and the theory of innate knowledge, to the phenomenologists and their followers among the existentialists and poststructuralists who purport to radicalize the Cartesian self. His most personal work, the Discourse stands as the starting point for all modern philosophy.

While Descartes was not the first to use the personal essay, he is one of the first to use it for the development of a full system. Erasmus’ Adagia (1500; The Adages) and Colloquia familiaria (1516; The Colloquies), More’s Utopia (1516), or even Montaigne’s Essais are more modest and random in their treatments; when Erasmus or More wished to explicate a topic systematically, they fell back on the conventions of the scholastic treatise. Informality, flexibility, and narrative qualities were well suited to Descartes’ philosophical and scientific purposes, allowing him to discuss a wide variety of matter with conciseness and clarity without having to address the given body of scholarship. In turn, the essay form allowed him to present his ideas without committing himself to them or having to engage in lengthy scholastic debate. The effect was to take philosophical and scientific discussion out of the university and bring it to the general public, marking the beginning of modern philosophy, and establishing the personal essay as a popular vehicle of discourse.

THOMAS L. COOKSEY

See also Philosophical Essay

Editions

Discours de la méthode pour bien conduire sa raison et chercher la vérité dans les sciences, 1637; edited by Étienne Gilson, 1925 (reprinted 1989), M. Robert Derathe, 1937, Gilbert Gadoffre, 1961, L. Meynard, 2 vols., 1966–68, Jean Costilhes, 1966, François Misrachi, 1977, and Simone Mazauric, 1983; as Discourse of a Method for the Well Guiding of Reason, and the Discovery of Truth in the Sciences, translated anonymously, 1649; as Discourse on Method, translated by John Veitch, 1870, Laurence J. Lafleur, 1950, Arthur Wollaston, 1960, F.E. Sutcliffe, 1968, Donald A. Cress, 1980, and George Heffernan, 1994

Further Reading

- Beck, Leslie, The Metaphysics of Descartes, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1965
- Cottingham, John, Descartes, Oxford and New York: Blackwell, 1986
- Cottingham, John, editor, The Cambridge Companion to Descartes, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1992.
- Dicker, Georges, Descartes: An Analytical and Historical Introduction, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1993
- Frankfurt, Harry G., Demons, Dreamers, and Madmen: The Defense of Reason in Descartes's Meditations, New York: Garland, 1987 (original edition, 1970)
- Garber, Daniel, Descartes' Metaphysical Physics, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1992
- Gaukroger, Stephen, Descartes: An Intellectual Biography, Oxford: Clarendon Press, and New York: Oxford University Press, 1995
- Guerout, Martial, Descartes' Philosophy Interpreted According to the Order of Reasons, Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 2 vols., 1984–85
- Kenny, Anthony, Descartes: A Study of His Philosophy, New York: Random House, 1968
- Schouls, Peter A., Descartes and the Enlightenment, Edinburgh: University of Edinburgh Press, 1989
- Sorell, Tom, Descartes, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1987
- Williams, Bernard, Descartes: The Project of Pure Enquiry, Atlantic Highlands, New Jersey: Humanities Press, and Hassocks: Harvester, 1978
- Wilson, Margaret, Descartes, London and Boston: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1978

Donne, John

English, 1572–1631

Although he is best known for the poetry composed during the first half of his adult life and the sermons written in the latter half, John Donne also produced four collections of brief prose works in the essay and related genres as well as an essay and two characters intended to stand alone. These works are all marked with his characteristic cleverness of thought and expression, and the best reflect an attractive generosity of spirit.

The three uncollected pieces all date from the early part of his career. “An Essay of Valour,” probably written in the late 1590s, may reflect Donne’s service in two of the Earl of Essex’s expeditions. Written in the manner of Montaigne, it consists of a series of arguments proving “that nothinge is so potent eyther to procure, or merrit Love, As Valour.” It was first published in the 11th edition of Sir Thomas Overbury’s A Wife (1622). His “Character of a Dunce,” also first published in the same volume, is in the Theophrastan tradition characterizing vices. It lists unflattering attributes possessed by one who “Is a Soule drownd in a lump of flesh, Or a peece of earth that Prometheus put not halfe his proportion of fire into.” The equally derogatory “Description of a Scot at First Sight” probably dates from the early years of the reign of James I, when many poor Scots came to London to seek their fortunes. No doubt for political reasons it was left unpublished during Donne’s lifetime. Some modern editors have questioned Donne’s authorship of these works, but all three are included in authoritative manuscripts of his poetry and prose compiled during his lifetime.

The two earliest collections of Donne’s short prose pieces were first printed posthumously in an unauthorized edition as Juvenilia, or Certaine Paradoxes, and Problems (1633), which included eleven of the former and ten of the latter. An “authorized” edition of 1652, prepared by Donne’s son and namesake, added a twelfth paradox and seven additional problems. The younger Donne is not accurate in calling these collections “the entertainment of the Author’s Youth.” While the paradoxes were begun during Donne’s years at the Inns of Court in the 1590s and probably completed by 1600, the problems date from the first decade of the 17th century, when Donne was in his thirties.

Two kinds of literary paradoxes were written in the Renaissance, both tracing their roots to classical models: the mock encomium and the argument against received opinion. Donne’s paradoxes are in the latter tradition, and they rejoice in their own cleverness, proving “That Nature is our worst Guide,” “That the guifts of the body are better then those of the Mind or of Fortune,” “That good is more common then evill,” and “That by Discord things increase.” Their wit resides in the framing of each premise in such a way as to disguise its outrageousness so that the conclusions drawn seem to follow logically. For example, Donne begins the paradox “That a wise man is knowne by much Laughinge” with this premise: “...since the powers of discourse, and reason, and laughter, be equally proper to only man, why shall not he be most wise which hath most use of laughing, as well as he which hath most of reasoning and discoursing.”

The problem as a genre also had classical roots, in the problems posed by Aristotle as a method of education. In the Renaissance, the form found expression as a social diversion designed to entertain and to exercise wit. By Donne’s time, problems could be either brief, consisting of a few statements suggesting possible answers to the question posed, or lengthy, consisting of carefully wrought arguments with appeals to authority. Donne wrote both kinds. “Why doth Sir Walter Raleigh write the Historie of these times?” has three suggested answers; “Why doth not Gold soyle the fingers?” has four, all in question form. At the other extreme, “Why hath the common opinion afforded woemen Soules?” is argued in approximately 270 words; “Why have Bastards best Fortune?” and “Why doth the Poxe so much affect to undermine the nose?” both extend to 380 words. Donne’s problems, apparently the earliest literary problems written in English, are as witty as his paradoxes, but they are much darker in tone, doubtless reflecting his straitened circumstances at the time of their composition.

The Essayes in Divinity, first published in 1651, were probably written in 1614, when Donne was preparing himself to enter Holy Orders in the Church of England. Described by his son as “Disquisitions, Interwoven with Meditations and Prayers,” the book contains true essays, in the sense of “attempts” to set down scattered thoughts provoked by the first verse each of Genesis and Exodus. Drawing on Donne’s extensive reading in theology and on his own experience, they explore such topics as “Of Genesis,” “Of the Name of God,” “Diversity in Names,” and “Of Number.” While they are not as polished as his Devotions upon Emergent Occasions, the Essayes in Divinity present Donne in a most attractive light as he deplores the narrow sectarianism of his day and declares, “so Synagogue and Church is the same thing, and of the Church, Roman and Reformed, and all other distinctions of place, Discipline, or Person, but one Church, journeying to one Hierusalem, and directed by one guide, Christ Jesus.”

Certainly the best known of Donne’s short prose works are the 23 “Meditations vpon our Humane Condition” included in Devotions upon Emergent Occasions, written over the Winter of 1623, when Donne was gravely ill, and published in 1624. These meditations react to the stages of his illness, beginning with its onset, progressing to a state near death, and ending in recovery, though with a warning of relapse. The most famous of these meditations (no. 17) is a soaring declaration of the interdependence of humankind: “No Man is an Iland, intire of it selfe; every man is a peece of the Continent, a part of the maine; if a Clod bee washed away by the Sea, Europe is the lesse, as well as if a Promontorie were, as well as if a Mannor of thy friends, or of thine owne were; Any Mans death diminishes me, because I am involved in Mankinde; And therefore never send to know for whom the bell tolls; It tolls for thee.” The first clause of this passage, which has become as much identified with Donne as any of his poetry, is the most quoted nonbiblical prose passage in English.

TED-LARRY PEBWORTH

See also Religious Essay

Biography

Born between January and June 1572. in London. Studied privately with Catholic tutors, and at Hart Hall (now Hertford College), Oxford, 1584–87; possibly studied at Cambridge University; Thavies Inn, London, 1591; Lincoln's Inn, London (master of the revels, 1593–95), from 1591. Renounced his Catholicism, c. 1593. Volunteer on the Earl of Essex's expeditions to Cadiz, 1596, and to the Azores, 1597. Private secretary to Sir Thomas Egerton, lord keeper, London, 1598–1601; member of Parliament for Brackley, 1601. Secretly married Egerton's niece Ann More, 1601 (died, 1617): 12 children (six died before his death); discovery of his marriage caused him to be dismissed from his post and briefly imprisoned, destroying his hopes for a political career. Lived in Pyrford, Surrey, 1602–06, and Mitcham, Surrey, 1606–11; traveled in Europe with Sir Walter Chute, 1605–06, and Sir Robert Drury, 1611–12. Ordained in the Church of England, 1615; chaplain-in-ordinary to James I at Cambridge; rector, Keyton, Hampshire, 1616–21, and Sevenoaks, Kent, 1616; reader in divinity, Lincoln's Inn, 1616–21; held various church positions, 1619–26, including dean of St. Paul's, London, 1621. Justice of the peace, Kent and Bedfordshire, 1622, and Bedfordshire, 1626; served on the Court of Delegates, 1622–31. Awards: honorary degrees from Oxford and Cambridge Universities. Died in London, 31 March 1631.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Devotions upon Emergent Occasions, 1624; edited by J.Sparrow, 1923, Anthony Raspa, 1975, and Elizabeth Savage, 2 vols., 1975

Juvenilia, or Certaine Paradoxes, and Problems, 1633; revised, enlarged edition, as Paradoxes, Problems, Essayes, edited by John Donne (the son), 1652; as Paradoxes and Problems, edited by Helen Peters, 1980

Essayes in Divinity, Interwoven with Meditations and Prayers, 1651; edited by Evelyn M.Simpson, 1952

Selected Prose, edited by Evelyn M.Simpson, 1967

Selected Prose, edited by Neil Rhodes, 1987

Other writings: poetry, satires, a book about suicide (Biathanatos, wr. 1607–08, pub. 1647), and sermons (collected in Sermons, edited by G.R.Potter and Evelyn M.Simpson, 10 vols., 1953–62).

Bibliographies

Keynes, Geoffrey, A Bibliography of Dr. John Donne, Oxford: Clarendon Press, revised edition, 1973 (original edition, 1914)

Roberts, John R., John Donne: An Annotated Bibliography of Modern Criticism, 1912–1967 and 1968–1978, Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 2 vols., 1973–82

Further Reading

Bald, R.C., John Donne: A Life, Oxford: Clarendon Press, and New York: Oxford University Press, 1970

Simpson, Evelyn M., A Study of the Prose Works of John Donne, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1962 (original edition, 1924)

Dostoevskii, Fedor

Russian, 1821–1881

In the course of a literary career spanning about 35 years Fedor Dostoevskii produced over 50 separate essays in addition to a large number of unsigned editorial notes and longer essayistic works—particularly the travelogue Zimnie zametki o letnikh vpechatleniakh (1863; Winter Notes on Summer Impressions) and the periodical miscellany Dnevnik Pisatel'ia (1873–81; A Writer's Diary), which itself consists of over 200 essay entries. The genre of these essays has its roots in the newspaper feuilleton but builds in other directions to include review essays, editorial notes, testimony, travel account, diary, and aesthetic, social, and political polemic. Dostoevskii's essays range over a large number of topics relating to public life: cultural events of current interest, contemporary social and political issues, current aesthetic debates in which the author himself participates, and questions of national identity, as well as questions of historical interest such as Dostoevskii's participation in the “radical” Petrashevskii reading circle.

The topics and genres of Dostoevskii's essay writing emerge from two different traditions. In spirit they are particularly Russian, belonging to and helping to shape the tone of Russian social polemics of the 1860s. In form they are strongly influenced by the French popular news feuilleton. The polyphonic quality of Dostoevskii's journalism reveals it to be the direct heir to the polemics between the Westernizers and the Slavophiles of the generation of the 1840s concerning the fate and national character of Russia. The Westernizers believed that the secularization and modernization of Russia by Peter the Great had been for the best, bringing Russia from a condition of ahistorical stagnation into the family of nations, while the Slavophiles argued that Peter had badly fragmented Russian society and had buried age-old Russian social and cultural values. Dostoevskii was strongly influenced by such leading Westernizing writers as the political thinker Aleksandr Herzen and the literary critic Vissarion Belinskii. Dostoevskii's longer works, especially Winter Notes on Summer Impressions and A Writer's Diary, respond to Herzen's S togo berega (pub. in German, 1850, in Russian, 1855; From the Other Shore), a brilliant philosophical dialogue about the meaning of history and historical change. This influence is felt both in the author's tendency to carry on an imagined argument with his readers and in his ongoing meditations about the possible paths of change in Russia and Europe. Belinskii's presence is felt in Dostoevskii's focus on arousing and shaping the social conscience of his readers.

In the 1840s Dostoevskii was one of four or five promising young writers (among them, Ivan Goncharov, Nikolai Nekrasov, and Ivan Turgenev) who were practitioners of the new French fashion of the feuilleton. Assuming the point of view of the flâneur—or the dreamy young wanderer strolling through St. Petersburg’s streets—Dostoevskii in his earliest work, “Peterburgskaia letopis” (1847; “A Petersburg Chronicle”), plays with the lighthearted reportage of current cultural events, typical of the feuilleton. He uses parody of this form as a way to introduce more serious ethical and aesthetic issues, at times dealing with questions about censorship or the suffering of the poor or, in other instances, arguing about the true social function of art.

After a hiatus of 13 years spent in prison, labor camp, and in exile in the army, all for his participation in the radical Petrashevskii reading group, Dostoevskii developed longer genres building partly from the feuilleton. More weighty essays of the early 1860s, for example, “G. -bov i vopros ob iskusstve” (1861; “Mr. -bov and the Question of Art”), form an important part of the debate between moderates and radical utilitarians (Nikolai Chernyshevskii, Nikolai Dobroliubov, Dmitrii Pisarev). Dostoevskii defends a middle ground between pure aestheticism and a social utilitarian aesthetic, arguing that great art must have liberty to develop its own forms, themes, and techniques, but that great art is always of contemporary interest and always addresses central social concerns.

Dostoevskii once characterized himself as a writer “possessed of a nostalgia for the current moment.” Indeed, his essay writing always focuses attention on two things: the voices of the writer and his interlocutors and the events of the present moment. Selfhood, which is the thematic core of Dostoevskii’s essays, takes shape through discussion and polemic, through forming a position, and through keeping one’s thinking oriented toward the ever-evolving present. Thus, his essay writing is essential to understanding the person and the writer. There is a creative symbiosis between his essays and the great novels written after his incarceration; the essays provide the polemical material for the fictional work. What Mikhail Bakhtin calls the “polyphonic” quality of Dostoevskii’s art, the counterpoint of a number of ideologically distinct voices within one work, is directly related to his experience as an essayist and polemicist. Thus, the travel notes Winter Notes on Summer Impressions have been shown to interact substantially with the later Zapiski iz podpol’ia (1864; Notes from the Underground). A Writer’s Diary was an important laboratory for the generic experiments and polemical complexities of Brat’ia Karamazovy (1880; The Brothers Karamazov).

Dostoevskii’s impact on later essay writing, both philosophical and literary-critical, is overwhelming. “Rech’ o Pushkine” (1880; Pushkin speech) announced a Russian national culture which had the power to redeem a moribund Western European spirit. The Russian symbolists, particularly Dmitrii Merezhkovskii, responded in force. Dostoevskii’s writing inspired a generation of major religious thinkers, including Nikolai Berdiaev, Lev Shestov, and Semion Frank. Probably the clearest example of the influence of his essay writing can be seen in the writings of one of Russia’s most brilliant if problematic essayists, Vasilii Rozanov, whose greatest works emerge directly from A Writer’s Diary.

EDITH W.CLOWES

Biography

Born 30 October 1821 in Moscow. Studied at schools in Moscow; Army Chief Engineering Academy, St. Petersburg, 1838–43, then brief military service, until 1844. Translated Balzac's Eugénie Grandet, 1844; began writing fiction. Joined the Petrashevskii circle, 1847–49: group arrested in 1849 for reading a banned letter by Vissarion Belinskii; mock execution arranged by Tsar Nicholas I: after reprieve, sentenced to four years' hard labor, 1850–54, then exiled as a soldier, 1854–59; suffered worsening epilepsy while in prison and in exile. Married Maria Dmitrievna Isaeva, 1857 (died, 1864): one stepson. Cofounder, with his brother, Vremia (Time), 1861–63, and Epokha (Epoch), 1864–65; took on the debts of his brother's and wife's families when they died, 1864. Had a difficult affair with Apollinaria Suslova, and began gambling, 1865–66. Married Anna Grigorievna Snitkina, 1867: two daughters (one died) and two sons (one died). Lived in Western Europe, partly to escape debts, 1867–71. Editor, Grazhdanin (The citizen), 1873–78, and Dnevnik Pisatel'ia, 1876–77 (also major contributor, 1873–81). Visited Germany, usually Ems, for treatment of emphysema. Died (of emphysema) in St. Petersburg, 28 January 1881.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Zimnie zametki o letnikh vpechatleniiaikh, 1863; as Winter Notes on Summer Impressions, translated by R. Renfield, 1954, Kyril FitzLyon, 1954, and D. Patterson, 1988

Dnevnik Pisatel'ia, 1873–81; as The Diary of a Writer and as A Writer's Diary 1873–1876, translated by Boris Leo Brasol, 2 vols., 1949, and by Kenneth Lantz, 2 vols., 1993–94

Fel'etony sorokovykh godov: Zhurnal'naia i gazetnaia proza I.A. Goncharova,

F.M. Dostoevskogo, i drugikh (Feuilletons of the 1840s: the journal and newspaper prose of I.A. Goncharov, F. M. Dostoevskii, and others), edited by Iu. G. Oksman, 1930
Occasional Writings, edited and translated by David Magarshack, 1963

Ob iskusstve (Of art), 1973

Iskaniia i razmyshleniia (Quests and thoughts), 1983

O russkoi literature (On Russian literature), 1987

Other writings: four novels (Prestuplenie i nakazanie [Crime and Punishment], 1867; Idiot [The Idiot], 1869; Besy [The Possessed], 1872; Brat'ia Karamazovy [The Brothers Karamazov], 1880), four novellas, short stories, the prose work Zapiski iz podpol'ia (1864; Notes from the Underground), and memoirs.

Collected works editions: Polnoe sobranie sochinenii, edited by G. M. Fridlender and others, 30 vols., 1972–90; Sobranie sochinenii, 15 vols., 1988.

Bibliographies

Belkin, A.A., A.S. Dolinin, and V.V. Kozhinov, editors, Dostoevskii: Bibliografiia

- proizvedenii Dostoevskogo i literatury o nem 1917–65*, Moscow: Kniga, 1968
Dostoevskii: Materialy i issledovaniia, Leningrad: Nauka, 1974–(in progress)
 Grossman, Leonid Petrovich, Seminarii po Dostoevskomu: Materialy, bibliografiia i kommentarii, Moscow: Gosizdat, 1922.
 Leatherbarrow, W.J., Fedor Dostoevsky: A Reference Guide, Boston: Hall, 1990

Further Reading

- Chances, Ellen, The Ideology of Pochvennichestvo in Dostoevsky's Thick Journals "Vremja" and "Epoxa" (dissertation), Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University, 1972
 Jackson, Robert Louis, Dostoevsky's Quest for Form, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1966
 Kelly, Aileen, "Irony and Utopia in Herzen and Dostoevsky: From the Other Shore and Diary of a Writer," Russian Review 50, no. 4 (October 1991):397–416
 Kjetsaa, Geir, "Written by Dostoevsky?" Scando-Slavica 26 (1980): 19–31
 Lvovski, Zinoviy, "Dostoevsky feuilletoniste," Revue Politique et Littéraire 69, no. 4 (1931):527–31
 Morson, Gary Saul, The Boundaries of Genre: Dostoevsky's "Diary of a Writer" and the Traditions of Literary Utopia, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1981
 Morson, Gary Saul, "Introductory Study: Dostoevsky's Great Experiment," in A Writer's Diary by Dostoevskii, Evanston, Illinois: Northwestern University Press, 1993:1–117
 Moser, Charles A. "Dostoevsky and the Aesthetics of Journalism," Dostoevsky Studies 3 (1982):27–41
 Nechaeva, V.S., Zhurnal M.M. i F.M.Dostoevskikh "Vremia", 1861–1863, Moscow, 1972
 Perlina, Nina, "Vozdeistvie gertsenovskogo zhurnalizma na arkhitektoniku i polifonicheskoe stroenie 'Dnevnikha pisatel'ia' Dostoevskogo," Dostoevsky Studies 5 (1984):141–55
 Zakharov, V.N., Sistema zhanrov Dostoevskogo: Tipologii i poetika, Leningrad: Izdatel'stvo Leningradskogo Universiteta, 1985
 Zhurbina, Evgeniya Isaakovna, Teoriia i praktika khudozbestvennopublitsisticheskikh zhanrov: Ocherk, fel'eton, Moscow: Mysl', 1969

Douglass, Frederick

American, 1818–1895

Frederick Douglass, a self-taught escaped slave, published Narrative of the Life of Frederick Douglass, an American Slave in 1845 to launch an activist writing career that would make him the dominant African American for the next half century. He wrote two subsequent autobiographies (1855 and 1881) and excelled as statesman, orator, and journalist. He left more than 500 speeches and published abolitionist newspapers for nearly 16 years, and a postwar weekly for nearly four. His commentaries were published in Atlantic Monthly, the London Times, and the New York Herald.

Douglass' fluency with rhythm and imagery is in evidence in his Narrative. Critics note, however, that the narrative owes less to the autobiography genre than to the slave narrative tradition. It is a chronological testimony delivered in understated language, whose shape was determined by abolitionist printers and editors. Its purpose was to document for whites the horrors of slavery and to persuade them to abolish slavery. But the restrained approach of the slave narrative, juxtaposed with Douglass' rhythmic portrayals of anguish, fear, and pathos, creates a tension generally associated with literature. The narrative is hailed as an artistic masterpiece. Its II chapters—essays of sorts—chronicle Douglass' birth in Maryland to a mother he would see only a few times and a father rumored to be a white slave owner. It follows his bestial existence across plantations, his abuse by seven different owners or overseers, his introduction to reading and writing by a kind mistress, and his clever schemes as a shipyard worker to get others to help with his education.

The Narrative was an immediate success, with editions published in England, Ireland, and France, but its publication in the U.S. in May 1845, replete with specific names and places (excluding details of his means of escape) put Douglass in danger of being returned to slavery. He left for Europe in August 1845 to lecture in England, Scotland, and Ireland. After British friends purchased his freedom for 150 pounds (750 dollars) in 1846, he returned to the U.S. in 1847 and settled in Rochester, New York, where he published his first newspaper, the North Star.

Douglass' decision to publish, against the wishes of his abolitionist mentor William Lloyd Garrison, marked the beginning of his re-creation—as a writer, as an independent person of color, as an intellectual. African American newspapers had been published since 1827, but none for more than a few years. Douglass was determined that the North Star would survive, and prove that a man of color could sustain a quality newspaper over a long period of time. “Our race must be vindicated from the embarrassing imputations resulting from former non-success,” he wrote in the inaugural issue. Most of its readers were white. The North Star also provided Douglass the forum he needed for an independent exploration of questions regarding slavery. By early 1848, a North Star article (“The Constitution and Slavery”) confirmed that his break with the Garrisonians was complete. Now he rejected Garrison's notion that the U.S. Constitution was by nature a pro-slavery document that should not be honored, and that, consequently, abolitionists, through the sheer weight of logic and persuasion, would convince good men to effect radical change.

For nearly 13 years the newspaper—changed in name in 1851 to Frederick Douglass's Paper—was the vehicle for hundreds of articles, editorials, and reprinted speeches by Douglass. His best writing is infused with elements of his oratorical delivery: long, sermonesque sentences, filled with anguish, anger, or ridicule, sometimes drawing wry analogies from Old Testament imagery. He railed against colonization, supported women's suffrage, and recorded the resolutions of African American conventions. When the weekly failed in 1860, Douglass relied on Frederick Douglass's Monthly—founded in 1858 as a monthly compendium primarily for foreign distribution—to carry his views. After Abraham Lincoln's election as president, Douglass held him to be “the most dangerous advocate of slave-hunting and slave-catching in the land” (“The Inaugural Address,” April 1861). After the outbreak of the Civil War, Douglass remained critical, lambasting Lincoln and Congress for not outlawing slavery (“The Slave Power Still Omnipotent at Washington,” January 1862) and agitating for the enlistment of African American volunteers in the Union Army (“Services of Colored Men,” July 1862). Not until Lincoln signed the Emancipation Proclamation did Douglass relent, somewhat. Even then he was not completely satisfied: there was still work to be done (“The Work of the Future,” November 1862) and there were still profound questions to be answered (“What Shall Be Done with the Freed Slaves?,” November 1862). In the last issue of the monthly, marking the end of almost 16 years of continuous publication in some form or another, Douglass took one last broadside at Lincoln for not speaking out against Confederate abuse of captured African American troops (“Black Soldiers,” August 1863).

Douglass returned to writing full-time in 1870 when he took control of the New Era, renaming it the New National Era. Here he examined the problems of the newly freed slave, the need for federal commitment to Reconstruction, the evils of Chinese worker exploitation, and the urgency of women’s suffrage. The Era folded in 1874, and Douglass wrote for mainstream publications.

In 1892, Douglass, journalist Ida B. Wells, newspaper historian I. Garland Penn, and attorney Ferdinand L. Barnett published The Reason Why the Colored American Is Not in the World’s Columbian Exposition, 1892; Douglass’ introduction to the pamphlet devoted a few pages to lynchings. He returned to this topic in the North American Review (“Lynch Law in the South,” June 1894), and later in 1894, less than a year before his death, he published a pamphlet addressing the issue fully (Why Is the Negro Lynched? The Lesson of the Hour). In the pamphlet, he notes that at the root of lynchings is the accusation that black men have assaulted white women and, in some cases, white children. Douglass defends, as if before a court of law, the integrity of the Negro “as a class” against this accusation. “Throughout the war,” Douglass writes, “while the slave-masters of the South were absent... in the field of rebellion, with bullets in their pockets, treason in their hearts, broad blades in their bloody hands, seeking the life of the nation... their wives, their daughters, their sisters and their mothers were left in the absolute custody of these same Negroes...and there was never a single instance of such crime reported.” Douglass also notes that slavery “was a system of unmitigated, legalized outrage upon black women of the South, and no white man was ever shot, burned or hanged for availing himself of all the power that slavery gave him.”

When he died in 1895, Douglass left behind an enormous collection of writing, which has yet to be fully evaluated. Clearly his legacy as an intellectual, politically motivated African American has had a marked effect on African American politics and on American political writing in general. His use of the essay form is a good example of the effectiveness of the genre as a tool for political discussion and change, underpinning Douglass’ stature as a man of conscience.

HARRY AMANA

Biography

Born Frederick Augustus Washington Bailey, probably 1818 in Tuckahoe, Talbot

County, Maryland; changed his name to Douglass when he escaped slavery. Worked on a plantation, until 1825; house servant, Baltimore, 1825–33; field hand, St. Michael's, Maryland, 1833–36; ship's caulker, 1837–38; escaped from slavery to New York, 1838. Married Anna Murray, 1838: one daughter and three sons. Worked in shipyards in Massachusetts, 1838–42. Worked on various anti-slavery campaigns, from 1841, and later on women's rights campaigns. Published the first of three autobiographical volumes, 1845; lectured in Britain and Ireland, 1845–47. Friends bought his freedom and he returned to the U.S., 1847. Founder, editor, and main contributor, North Star abolitionist paper, 1847–60 (name changed to Frederick Douglass's Paper, 1851), and Frederick Douglass's Monthly, 1858–63; owner, New National Era newspaper, 1870–74. President, Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, 1873–74; U.S. marshal, 1877–81; recorder of deeds, after 1881. Married Helen Pitts, 1884. U.S. minister to Haiti, 1889–91. Died in Washington, D.C., 2.0 February 1895.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Narrative of the Life of Frederick Douglass, an American Slave, 1845; edited by Benjamin Quarles, 1960, Houston A. Baker, Jr., 1982, and David W. Blight, 1993

My Bondage and My Freedom, 1855; edited by William L. Andrews, 1987

Life and Times of Frederick Douglass, 1881; revised edition, 1892

On Women's Rights, edited by Philip S. Foner, 1976

The Narrative and Selected Writings, edited by Michael Meyer, 1984

The Oxford Frederick Douglass Reader, edited by William L. Andrews, 1996

Collected works editions: Life and Writings, edited by Philip S. Foner, 4 vols., 1950–55; The Frederick Douglass Papers, edited by John W. Blassingame and John R. McKivigan, 5 vols., 1979–92 (in progress).

Further Reading

Andrews, William L., Critical Essays on Frederick Douglass, Boston: Hall, 1991

Baker, Houston A., Jr., "Autobiographical Acts and the Voice of the Southern Slave," in his The Journey Back: Issues in Black Literature and Criticism, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1980

Castronovo, Russ, "'As to nation, I belong to none': Ambivalence, Diaspora, and Frederick Douglass," American Transcendental Quarterly 9, no. 3 (September 1995)

Foner, Philip S., Introduction to Frederick Douglass on Women's Rights, edited by Foner, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1976

Garvey, Gregory T., "Frederick Douglass's Change of Opinion on the U.S. Constitution: Abolitionism and the 'elements of moral power'," American Transcendental Quarterly 9, no. 3 (September 1995)

Gates, Henry Louis, Jr., "Binary Oppositions in Chapter One of the Narrative," in Afro-American Literature: The Reconstruction of Instruction, edited by Dexter Fisher and Robert B. Stepto, New York: Modern Language Association of America, 1979

Gates, Henry Louis, Jr., "A Dangerous Literacy: The Legacy of Frederick Douglass,"

New York Times Book Review, 28 May 1995: 3

McFeely, William S., Frederick Douglass, New York: Norton, 1991

Royer, Daniel J., "The Process of Literacy as Communal Involvement in the Narratives of Frederick Douglass," African American Review 28, no. 3 (Fall 1994)

Sekora, John, "Comprehending Slavery: Language and Personal History in the Narrative," CLA Journal 29, no. 2 (December 1985)

Sekora, John, "'Mr. Editor, if you please': Frederick Douglass, My Bondage and My Freedom, and the End of the Abolitionist Imprint," Callaloo 17, no. 2 (Spring 1994)

Stone, Albert E., "Identity and Art in Frederick Douglass's Narrative" CLA Journal 17, no. 2 (December 1973)

Sundquist, Eric J., editor, Frederick Douglass: New Literary and Historical Essays, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1990

Du Bois, W.E.B.

American, 1868–1963

W.E.B. Du Bois was the preeminent African American writer, scholar, editor, and activist of the first 50 years of the 20th century. He published scores of essays, which range in style from the lyrical to the polemical and in subject matter from the personal to the historical. His influence as an essayist, especially inspiring to African American writers, has been immense. Du Bois showed that the essay could be used to do battle in the struggle for justice and equality as well as to explore the self. In his autobiography, Along This Way (1933), James Weldon Johnson refers to Du Bois' collection of essays The Souls of Black Folk (1903) as "a work, which, I think, has had greater effect upon and within the Negro race in America than any single book published in this country since Uncle Tom's Cabin."

The range of Du Bois' voice as an essayist originates in his awareness that as an African American he could not write a strictly "personal" essay. He believed that the black writer must always speak publicly and politically as well as personally. The Negro, he wrote in "Of Our Spiritual Strivings" (1903), has "no true self-consciousness," but only a "double-consciousness," for he must always "see himself through the revelation of the other world." For Du Bois this meant that he must address the issue of racism even in his most personal essays.

In "Criteria of Negro Art" (1926), Du Bois wrote that he could "conceive" that "somehow, somewhere eternal and perfect beauty sits above truth and right, but here and now in the world in which I work they are for me unseparated and inseparable." For him, "all art is propaganda and ever must be" and "whatever art I have for writing has been used always for propaganda for gaining the right of black folk to love and enjoy."

But, if art was a weapon, it was also art and all the more effective if beautiful. Du Bois' conception of beauty was classical. Raised in the Congregational Church of New England and educated at Harvard and in Berlin, Du Bois was torn at an early age between the elitism and gentility of his education and the militance and outrage forced on him by white racism. A white artist might be able to aspire to beauty in and of itself; a black artist could not. For Du Bois, beauty had to serve truth and justice, and to such ends the plasticity of the essay was well suited. Du Bois was a committed student of the essay, especially the 19th-century English and American essayists. He admired the specific rendering of personality in Hazlitt and Lamb, and the abstract theorizing and magisterial pronouncements of Emerson and Carlyle. He saw the essay as a form that could accommodate scholarship and objectivity as well as opinion and lyricism.

From 1910 until 1934 Du Bois was editor of Crisis, the journal of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. Though he published many of the writers of the emerging Harlem Renaissance, his support of the New Negro movement was qualified. His own classicism and his belief in the leadership of the “talented tenth” of the Negro population led him to want to put the “best foot forward,” and he had difficulty with the blues rhythms, street argot, and sometimes seamy material of the younger writers. Nevertheless, he recognized the difficulties renaissance writers faced as they tried to steer between “the Scylla of prudery and Charybdis of unbounded license” (“Harlem,” 1927) and, in fact, his own writing, especially his essays, presented the example of one who was willing to take political and stylistic risks. In a 1903 essay, “Of Mr. Booker T. Washington and Others” (1903), he had challenged Washington’s accommodationist views on education and the hegemony the older man maintained among black intellectuals. The break with Washington marked a move by Du Bois toward more and more radical positions. First exposed to Marxism during graduate work in Berlin (1892–94), Du Bois maintained an uneasy relationship with socialist thought for the next several decades. Though he did not join the Communist Party until 1961, he used the opinion page of the Crisis from the beginning to support socialist causes, and even, after a 1926 visit, the young Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. Du Bois continued to write political essays throughout his life, promoting pan-Africanism, women’s rights, and the civil rights movement while attacking lynching, segregation, the Ku Klux Klan, fascism, and McCarthyism.

In his attempts to get black readers to adopt a sense of racial pride and white readers to take the issue of race seriously, Du Bois employed a variety of stylistic approaches in his essays. In essays in the Crisis, he turned the style of the gossip column and the celebrity profile to political ends. He even offered a send-up of Swift’s A Modest Proposal (1729) entitled “A Mild Suggestion” (1912), sarcastically proposing to whites that they pick a night on which they might each lure a few blacks into their homes and massacre them: “The next morning there would be ten million funerals, and therefore no Negro problem. Think how quietly the thing would be settled!”

Du Bois employed satire elsewhere (for instance in “The Black Man Brings His Gifts,” 1925), but it was not his favored tone. More often he chose to take seriously that which was too often ignored, such as black spirituals (“Of the Sorrow Songs,” 1903), everyday racial slights (“On Being Black,” 1920), and the lives of poor Negroes in the rural South (“Of the Black Belt,” 1903).

Du Bois exploited a wide range of what the essay offers. He wrote lyrically and allegorically, used classical allusions and rigorous research, and revealed a most personal and even nostalgic voice at times, but almost invariably his subject was too serious for the whimsy and wit of the light essay of the late Victorian period. Even an essay occasioned by his daughter’s wedding makes clear at the outset that it will be about racism: “The problem of marriage among our present American Negroes is a difficult one” (“So the Girl Marries,” 1928). When the subject is a much sadder one—for example, the death of his son—Du Bois knows that the real subject remains racism. In “Of the Passing of the First-Born” (1903), he adds anger to the grand and somber tones of the classical elegy, apostrophizing Death and confronting his own despair before deciding he must return to his work so that some “young souls,” if not his own son, might know a “morning” when the “veil” of racism is lifted.

NED STUCKEY-FRENCH

Biography

William Edward Burghardt Du Bois. Born 23 February 1868 in Great Barrington, Massachusetts. Studied at public schools in Great Barrington; Fisk University, Nashville, Tennessee, 1885–88, A.B., 1888; Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1888–90, A.M., 1891, Ph.D., 1895; University of Berlin, 1892–94. Taught at Wilberforce University, Ohio, 1894–96, the University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia, 1896–97, and Atlanta University, 1897–1910. Married Nina Gomer, 1896 (died, 1950): one son (died in youth) and one daughter. Founder, Pan-African Congress, 1900, and the Niagara Movement, 1904. Editor, Moon Illustrated Weekly, Memphis, Tennessee, 1906–07, and Horizon, Washington, D.C., 1907–10. Cofounder, National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, 1910: director of publicity and research, editor of its magazine the Crisis, 1910–34, and director of Special Research, 1944–48. Editor, with A.G.Dill, Brownies' Book, 1920–21; columnist for the Pittsburgh Courier, 1936–38, Amsterdam News, New York, 1938–44, Chicago Defender, 1945–48, and People's Voice, 1947–48; also wrote for Current History, the Journal of Negro Education, Foreign Affairs, and American Scholar; editor, Phylon, Atlanta, 1940–44. Vice chair, Council on African Affairs, 1949–54; candidate for U.S. Senate for New York, 1950. Married Shirley Graham, 1951. Emigrated to Ghana, 1961, and became citizen, 1963. Awards: Spingarn Medal, 1920; International Peace Prize, 1952; Lenin Peace Prize, 1959. Knight Commander, Liberian Order of African Redemption; Fellow, American Association for the Advancement of Science; Member, American Academy. Died in Accra, Ghana, 27 August 1963.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

The Souls of Black Folk: Essays and Sketches, 1903; revised edition, 1953

Darkwater: Voices from Within the Veil, 1920

The Gift of Black Folk: The Negroes in the Making of America, 1924

Black Reconstruction in America: An Essay Toward a History of the Part Which Black Folk Played in the Attempt to Reconstruct Democracy in America, 1860–1880, 1935

Black Folk, Then and Now: An Essay in the History and Sociology of the Negro Race, 1939

Dusk of Dawn: An Essay Toward an Autobiography of a Race Concept, 1940

- An ABC of Color: Selections from over Half a Century of the Writings*, 1964
W.E.B.Du Bois Speaks: Speeches and Addresses 1890–1963, edited by Philip Foner, 2 vols., 1970
Selected Writings, edited by Walter Wilson, 1970
W.E.B.Du Bois: A Reader, edited by Meyer Weinberg, 1970
The Seventh Son: The Thought and Writings of W.E.B.Du Bois, edited by Julius Lester, 2 vols., 1971
A W.E.B.Du Bois Reader, edited by Andrew D.Paschal, 1971
The Crisis Writings, edited by Daniel Walden, 1972
The Emerging Thought of W.E.B.Du Bois: Essays and Editorials from The Crisis, edited by Henry Lee Moon, 1972
The Education of Black People: Ten Critiques 1906–1960, edited by Herbert Aptheker, 1973
The Writings of W.E.B.Du Bois (selection), edited by Virginia Hamilton, 1975
Against Racism: Unpublished Essays, Papers, Addresses 1887–1961, edited by Herbert Aptheker, 1985
W.E.B.Du Bois: A Reader, edited by David Levering Lewis, 1995
The Oxford W.E.B.Du Bois Reader, edited by Eric J.Sundquist, 1996
- Other writings: five novels (The Quest of the Silver Fleece, 1911; Dark Princess, 1928; The Black Flame trilogy, 1957–61), poetry, many works on African American politics and social conditions, an autobiography (published posthumously, 1968), and correspondence.
- Collected works edition: The Complete Published Works (KrausThomson Organization Edition), edited by Herbert Aptheker, 20 vols., 1973–86.

Bibliographies

- Aptheker, Herbert, Annotated Bibliography of the Published Writings of W.E.B.Du Bois (part of The Complete Published Works), Millwood, New York: Kraus-Thomson Organization, 1973
 Partington, Paul G., W.E.B.Du Bois: A Bibliography of His Published Writings, Whittier, California: privately printed, 1979; supplement, 1984

Further Reading

- Andrews, William, editor, Critical Essays on W.E.B.Du Bois, Boston: Hall, 1985
 Byerman, Keith E., "Hearts of Darkness: Narrative Voices in The Souls of Black Folk," American Literary Realism 14 (1981): 43–51
 Byerman, Keith E., Seizing the Word: History, Art, and Self in the Work of W.E.B.Du Bois, Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1994
 Ikonné, Chidi, From Du Bois to Van Vechten: The Early New Negro Literature, 1903–1926, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1981
 Rampersad, Arnold, The Art and Imagination of W.E.B.Du Bois, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1976

Du Bos, Charles

French, 1882–1939

Educated in France, England, and Germany in the most select schools, Charles Du Bos was an avid reader, who considered that encountering an author was meant to transform one's life. A man who valued spiritual life above all else, he points out that he was born in 1889, the year Henri Bergson published the Essai sur les données immédiates de la conscience (Essay on the immediate givens of the conscience; translated as Time and Free Will). He wrote that he owed to Bergson "what in me is myself," according to the type of spiritual expression also found in Paul Claudel. This spiritual bent led Du Bos to convert from theism to Catholicism in 1927.

At the time of his death, Du Bos had published only a small part of his writings; most readers knew him for his Approximations (1922–37), a seven-volume collection of critical essays and lectures. In 1929 he also published a collection of extracts from his journal, as well as passages in various scholarly magazines. Today readers know him because of his dialogues with André Gide.

Most of Du Bos' publication is posthumous. Nevertheless, in 1939 he was well received in England, where he represented a new kind of French criticism, less attached to reason and lucidity, and more sincerely emotional, according to Charles Morgan. On the continent he had a limited following: Albert Béguin, Georges Poulet, and the brilliant Jean Starobinski may be cited as inheritors of his critical tradition. Du Bos met numerous authors, including Marcel Proust, Bernard Berenson, Ernst Robert Curtius, Rainer Maria Rilke, Georg Simmel, André Maurois, Herbert Dieckmann, Stéphane Mallarmé, Paul Valéry, Edith Wharton, Percy Lubbock, and Marguerite Yourcenar; he became close friends with Gide. Du Bos admired Gide as an author, and shared his spiritual concerns, though he eventually rejected his evangelical leanings. Their friendship is somewhat reminiscent of that of Montaigne and La Boétie: Du Bos felt that he was engaged in a dialogue with Gide "in the margins" of his writings. In 1931, when their friendship declined, Du Bos' assessment was that Gide's "rigorous" and sober literary style displayed a lack of imagination, and an "intricacy" devoid of "complexity."

Du Bos' written production is threefold: literary and aesthetic analysis (Approximations); his autobiographical Journal (composed 1901–39, published in complete form 1946–61); and literary theory with What Is Literature? (1940), a piece composed in English and made up of four lectures on Keats and Shelley, delivered in 1938 at the University of Notre Dame, where he briefly taught. There is much debate as to which of his works is most important, but in 1918 Gide told Du Bos not to abandon his Journal, for this would be his completed oeuvre. As did many of his friends, Gide considered Du Bos essentially a man of dialogue.

Marie-Anne Gouhier (1951) notes Du Bos' frequent use of parentheses and inserted propositions in Approximations. The same could be observed in his Journal. She finds that he needed to integrate ideas complementary or external to the main thrust of his thought without compromising the linearity of his expression. She believes this facet corresponds to a necessity for temporal simultaneity, when a new explanation, a pause for reflection, traverses the text without interrupting it. This method of writing parallels Bergson's conversational style with Du Bos. The philosopher said to him that "Genius consists in...keeping in contact with an internal current," and Du Bos observed that "Bergson thinks aloud in front of you, approves your answer, and continues his thought, without ever an exchange, properly speaking" (Journal, 1922). Du Bos' friends described him as a great conversationalist, who always penetrated his interlocutor's thoughts and showed great receptiveness; but his parenthetical style in Approximations and the Journal resembles an internal Bergsonian-Dubosian dialogue which the readers are invited to witness. A common point between his oral and written expression may have been that he used both to think, explore, and weigh, as in Montaigne's "balance pérenne" (eternal movement of the scales). Yet passages from his journal explain why Du Bos preferred Pascal to Montaigne: Pascal proceeded by a series of provisory certainties, proving to be a resolute, decisive genius inherently necessitating the "parti pris" (Journal, 1923). It is in this spirit that one may understand Du Bos' certainties.

One of the major themes of Dubosian criticism stems from a reaction against the 1913–14 popular conviction that literature is divorced from life. Du Bos repeats that literature and life are one: in Approximations, he declares that "life owes more to literature than literature to life," for literature survives life. He lives through the authors he selects, gathering his essays and critical reflections in Approximations and his Journal. His manner of composing agreed with his method of literary perception, exploring the musical "tempo" of an author and the harmonies (or Baudelairean "correspondences") resulting from it. François Mauriac pointed out that Du Bos was criticized for being so biographical that "one would forget the authors he studied ever wrote." The method of "approximation" relates to an exploration of the author's essential identity, defined not so much by what is said, but rather by what the author cannot refrain from repeating—the monotony inherent to individual genius. The Approximations have been compared to an encyclopedia of Du Bos' favorite European authors, such as Browning, Carlyle, and Keats, from whom he borrowed: "I have relapsed into those abstractions which are my only life."

Compared to the volumes of Approximations, the Journal is at once more intimate and more fragmentary. The contingencies of daily life are often points of departure for literary essays—for instance, bright insights into the creative psychology of Flaubert and Degas. Sometimes a sentence begun in French ends in English. An occasional day will be recorded entirely in English. The fragmentary aspect allowed by the diary form suits Du Bos. He thus avoids the unified coherence of the thesis essay and the task of forcibly organizing materials within a given frame (in 1922 he had already refused to give cohesion to his collection of Approximations).

According to his wife's testimony, in 1921 Du Bos began dictating the Journal to save time. But in 1928 he was taking as much care with it as with any of his writings. During the last ten years of his life, he apparently dictated (and occasionally wrote) his Journal in a masterful delivery exempt from hesitations. In his effort to pinpoint the essential qualities of the authors he studied, Du Bos focused on the "soul" his intuition pursued.

This idea was developed fully in "Literature and the Spirit," the first part of What Is Literature?. In it, the conversation tends to become a catechism. Questions about literature must be answered by the scriptures, which clearly state the meaning of life. The text proceeds by a series of metaphysical equations: “Intellects are God”; they are souls which become themselves by means of the heart; life reaches self-consciousness in creating; literary creation is God’s Creation; creation is emotion; the Creator gives himself and receives the artist’s joy. Thus, Marcelin Pleyne and Michele Leleu (in Charles Du Bos, edited by Dominique Bourel and Hubert Join, 1985) find that Du Bos was somewhat foreign to skepticism. It is difficult to pinpoint the cause of this change of tone. Ian D. McFarlane (1981) notes a “puzzling lack of reference to Montaigne,” whom Du Bos had saluted for his “heroism of non-heroism” in 1933. Du Bos seems to have shied away from Montaigne’s “prudence and moderation” for the sake of “warmth and audacity,” preferring the “pathetic spirituality” of Pascal, Baudelaire, and Péguy.

In What Is Literature? Du Bos advocates a “creative reading” equal to writing, whereby literature becomes consubstantial to its readers. “Literature and Light” shows that culture is a study in perfection, with each literary piece the meeting point of two souls, initiated in wordless communication in the spiritual world. “Literature and Beauty” demonstrates that beauty is order, mathematical and moral, and humans’ raison d’être. “Literature and the Word” criticizes Hamlet’s “words, words, words” to describe books, and Faust’s transformation of “In the beginning was the word” into “was the action”—Du Bos would have preferred “was the act” because the word is active. It is the Word made flesh. In his conclusion to What Is Literature? Du Bos called for the advent of a true Catholic literature to the world.

Du Bos intended to reach a plenitude that the journal form could not reach, because, as he observed during a 1914 discussion with Gide, Goethe once wrote to Lavater that a journal was composed predominantly during moments of emptiness and depression, thus underrepresenting the moments of possession and joy. Perhaps, then, the four lectures from Notre Dame form the complementary counterpart to Du Bos’ Journal.

SERVANNE WOODWARD

Biography

Born 27 October 1882. in Paris. Studied at Lycée Janson de Sailly, from 1895; Balliol College, Oxford, 1901–02. Military service at Évreux, 1901–03. Traveled in Italy, Germany, and England, 1903–05. Contributor to various periodicals, including the Nouvelle Revue Française (New French Review) and the Gazette des Beaux-Arts. Married Juliette Siry: one daughter. Became friends with André Gide during World War I, founding the Foyer Franco-Belge to host people fleeing the German invasion. -Suffered from a spiritual crisis, 1918–27, then converted to Catholicism. Organizer, with Paul Desjardin, “The Decades of Pontigny” intellectual debates, 1922–34. Founder, with François Mauriac, Vigile (Vigil), 1930. Taught at Saint Mary’s College, University of Notre Dame, Indiana, 1937–38 and 1938–39. Died in La Celle-Saint-Cloud, 5 August 1939.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Notes sur Merimée, 1920

Approximations, 7 vols., 1922–37; in 1 vol., 1965

Extrait d'un journal, 1908–1928, 1929; enlarged edition, 1931

Le Dialogue avec André Gide, 1929

Byron et le besoin de la fatalité, 1929; as Byron and the Need of Fatality, translated by Ethel Colburn Mayne, 1932

François Mauriac et le problème du romancier catholique, 1933

What Is Literature?, 1940

Commentaires, 1946

Grandeur et misère de Benjamin Constant, 1946

Journal, 9 vols., 1946–61; the years 1902–20 published in Cahiers Charles Du Bos 10–25 (1966–81)

Goethe, 1949

La Comtesse de Noailles et le climat du génie, 1949

Du spirituel dans l'ordre littéraire, 1967

Robert et Elizabeth Browning, ou, La Plénitude de l'amour humain, 1982

Other writings: letters to and dialogues with André Gide.

Bibliographies

Bourel, Dominique, and Hubert Juin, editors, Charles Du Bos, inédits de Charles Du Bos et d'André Gide, Paris: FAC, 1985: 16–18

Resurrection: Cahiers de Culture Chrétienne issue on Du Bos, 4, no. 13 (1946)

Further Reading

Angles, Auguste, "Charles Du Bos ou l'esthétique d'une belle âme," Bulletin des Amis d'André Gide 12, no. 17 (January 1984):7–10, 61

Bertocci, Angelo, Charles Du Bos and English Literature, New York: King's Crown Press, 1949

Bodart, Roger, À la rencontre de Charles Du Bos, n.p.: La Sixaine, 1946

Bossière, Jacques, Perception critique et sentiment de vivre chez Charles Du Bos, Paris: Nizet, 1969

Bourel, Dominique, and Hubert Juin, editors, Charles Du Bos, inédits de Charles Du Bos et d'André Gide, Paris: FAC, 1985

Crépu, Michel, Charles Du Bos ou la tentation de l'irréprochable, Paris: Félin, 1990

Dédéyan, Charles, Le Cosmopolitisme littéraire de Charles Du Bos, 6 vols., Paris: Société d'Enseignement Supérieur, 1965–71

Devaux, André A., "Charles Du Bos, Jacques Maritain et Gabriel Marcel, ou, Peut-on aller de Bergson à Saint Thomas d'Aquin," Cahiers Charles Du Bos 18 (May 1974):87–103

- Didier, Béatrice, Un dialogue à distance: Gide et Du Bos, Paris: Desclée de Brouwer, 1976
- Gouhier, Marie-Anne, Charles Du Bos, Paris: Vrin, 1951
- Halda, Bernard, Charles Du Bos, Paris: Wesmael-Charlier, 1966
- Jodogne, Pierre, "Charles Du Bos à Florence: Le Dossier de Carlo Placci," Studi Francesi 25, no. 3 (September–December 1981): 472–78
- Leleu, Michèle, Charles Du Bos, Approximations et certitude, Paris: Desclée de Brouwer, 1976
- McFarlane, Ian D., "Charles Du Bos and Montaigne," in Columbia Montaigne Conference Papers, edited by Donald M. Frame and Mary B. McKinley, Lexington, Kentucky: French Forum, 1981: 70–83
- Mertens, Cornelis Joseph, Émotion et critique chez Charles Du Bos, Nijmegen: Janssen, 1967
- Mouton, Jean, Charles Du Bos: Sa relation avec la vie et avec la mort, Paris: Desclée de Brouwer, 1954
- O'Rourke, Maire, L'Article de Charles Du Bos sur Proust: L'Idée de l'exaltation, Berne: Lang, 1979
- Poulet, Georges, and others, editors, Permanence de Charles Du Bos: Colloque de Cerisy, Paris: Desclée de Brouwer, 1976

Dürrenmatt, Friedrich

Swiss, 1921–1990

Friedrich Dürrenmatt's international acclaim as a playwright has long overshadowed his accomplishments as an author of fiction and essays. During the last two decades of his life, when he became gradually disenchanted with the stage, Dürrenmatt increased his production of narrative and essayistic texts. This, in turn, generated renewed critical interest in his work within these genres and a reappraisal—especially of his essays—which is far from complete. From 1947 until 1990, literally a few days before his death, he produced more than 150 essays, speeches, reviews, and critiques. These include six book-length essays, which are outgrowths of public lectures or, in one case, a sequel to his dramatic writings.

Dürrenmatt never saw a clear demarcation between genres: his speeches proliferated into essays, which often display a "dramaturgic" structure interspersed with narration. Some of his essays seamlessly incorporate fictional material. His playful disregard for traditional literary forms and his impromptu creation of strikingly unconventional, often meandering prose lend these essays their unique textuality. Most are concerned with literary/aesthetic or social/political matters. Already in the mid-1950s, these issues became so inextricably entwined that his dramaturgical statements are invariably political, and vice versa. His novel amalgam of the aesthetic and the sociopolitical contributes to Dürrenmatt's original essayistic voice.

The early essays may be divided into two distinct groups: theater critiques and occasional pieces on political topics. Dürrenmatt's growth as an essayist parallels his struggle for his own idiom as a playwright. Between 1947 and 1952, he wrote critiques of current stage performances and short essays on theater for the Berne Nation and the Zurich Weltwoche (The weekly world). Their common thrust lies in their anticlassicist stance and in their plea for a new, “objective” form of comedy: the only kind of theater fit to visualize contemporary reality on stage. At the same time, he sharpened his pen as a political essayist in brief, aphoristic pieces like “Sätze für Zeitgenossen” (1947–48; Sentences for contemporaries) and “Hingeschriebenes” (1947–48; Jottings). In the latter, the effortless transition from literary to political matters typical in all his later essays is already evident: “One must never cease to imagine the world in its most reasonable configuration.”

A summation of the early essays and a reflection of Dürrenmatt’s experience with the stage (he had in the meantime produced five plays) is the lecture Theaterprobleme (1955; Problems of the Theatre). Here he presents his own, full-fledged theory of (tragi)comedy and of the grotesque as its premier revelatory device. The aesthetic and the political are now intricately linked, as only tragicomedy can conceptualize the amorphous, chaotic, and regimented world of the mid-20th century: a world of nuclear threats, oppression, economic exploitation, and total warfare. Ultimate responsibility for humanity’s future rests not with collectives but with the “courageous individual,” as portrayed on stage. The dramatist aims to present viable alternatives to a destructive reality. Problems of the Theatre, Dürrenmatt’s most cogent and polished dramaturgical essay, remains one of the truly innovative and influential statements on theater in the 20th century. Like all his writings, it addresses (and is widely read by) an educated, predominantly bourgeois audience.

By the late 1950s, Dürrenmatt had found his own literary voice. The essays of this period reflect his growing international fame as a playwright; they often provide programmatic commentaries on his plays and on the role of the writer in a capitalist society. Among the more remarkable texts in this group are “Vom Sinn der Dichtung in unserer Zeit” (1958; On the purpose of literature today) and “Friedrich Schiller” (1959). In the former, Dürrenmatt emphasizes the importance of the sciences for modern life—a recurring theme in his works. The latter differentiates his own dramaturgy from that of both Schiller and Bertolt Brecht, as he lays claim to a middle ground between idealistic and materialist ideologies.

In the late 1960s and 1970s, Dürrenmatt’s writings became more overtly political. A second book-length essay, Monstervortrag über Gerechtigkeit und Recht nebst einem helvetischen Zwischenspiel: Eine kleine Dramaturgie der Politik (1969; “A Monster Lecture on Justice and Law Together with a Helvetian Interlude: A Small Dramaturgy of Politics”), which had once again originated as a speech, dramaturgically thematizes the dialectical relationship of individual justice versus organized law—another central aspect in the political essays to come. Many of these essays react polemically to world events, for instance, “Israels Lebensrecht” (1967; Israel’s right to live), a response to the Six-Day War, or “Tschechoslowakei 1968” (1968; Czechoslovakia in 1968), an eloquent protest against Soviet suppression of the Prague Spring. Others are written as the result of Dürrenmatt’s extensive travels: Sätze aus Amerika (1970; Sentences from America) or the most voluminous of all, Zusammenhänge: Essay über Israel (1976; Connections: essay on Israel), with its 1980 addendum “Nachgedanken” (Afterthoughts). All propound Dürrenmatt's critical position between the ideological camps, and his bellicose, often strained neutrality.

Zusammenhänge marks the apex of his production of large-scale political essays. Originally conceived as a speech he delivered in Beersheba, its subject matter grew into a substantial book upon first publication. The essay's structure—typical of the nonfictional prose from Monstervortrag until the end of the 1970s—is sprawling and loose-jointed, interspersed with authorial comments and long narrative passages. Dürrenmatt develops his argument in a rambling, peripatetic fashion. The lack of an authoritative, linear structure makes for a persuasive, almost private voice and a work-in-progress appearance. Zusammenhänge is his best and most personal political essay. The much less coherent “Nachgedanken”—with their strident anticommunism and their barrage of familiar clichés from the militant pseudo-liberal discourse of their time—pale in comparison.

Equally sprawling but not as convincing as Zusammenhänge is its dramaturgic counterpart, Der Mitmacher: Ein Komplex (1976; The collaborator: a complex). Here Dürrenmatt delivers a huge, convoluted essayistic-fictional-rhetorical sequel to his weak drama Der Mitmacher. The text ostensibly deals with the play's political underpinnings in contemporary totalitarianism, but it is hardly more than a rambling, random sequence of stories, polemic, and tedious gripes of a frustrated playwright. Dürrenmatt must have realized that he overextended the essay form into a monstrous parody. From here on, his political prose returns to more manageable proportions. Less freewheeling and somewhat more disciplined in their discourse, the later essays still retain their personal, nonauthoritative tone. Once more they mostly derive from public speeches. In his last major essay, “Über Toleranz” (1977; On tolerance), Dürrenmatt makes a plea for political tolerance and lambasts Marxism as an oppressive concept. For the sake of humanity, he hopes that reason—as a beacon in the search for humane solutions to global problems—may prevail. This quasi-utopian faith in human reason—in the arrival of a new, sober enlightenment—provides the leitmotif for Dürrenmatt's essays after “Albert Einstein” (1979). Among the many shorter political texts from the last decade of his life, those on Václav Havel (“Die Schweiz—ein Gefängnis” [1990; Switzerland—a prison]) and Mikhail Gorbachev (“Die Hoffnung, uns am eigenen Schopfe aus dem Untergang zu ziehen” [1990; Hoping to pull ourselves out of doom by our own bootstraps]) stand out as final assertions of his hope that humanity, after all, may yet conquer the future and avert catastrophe through reason without fear.

Highly improvisational discourse, an innovative textuality, and unflagging humanism are the hallmarks of Dürrenmatt's essayistic oeuvre. Seen as a whole, it appears clearly a cut above much of contemporary nonfictional prose, though uneven and closely bound to the given sociopolitical context at the time of writing. Individual pieces weather the test of time fairly well as the century draws to a close. But even these ultimately fail to attain greatness. A disturbing lack of stringency and intellectual discipline—the trade-off for their spontaneity and work-in-progress openness—mars even the best of the lot.

GERHARD P. KNAPP

Biography

Born 5 January 1921 in Konolfingen, near Berne, Switzerland. Studied at the University of Berne, 1941–42 and 1943–45; University of Zurich, 1942–43. Married Lotti Geissler, 1946 (died, 1983): one son and two daughters. First play, Es steht geschrieben, premiered in Zurich, April 1947. Drama critic, Die Weltwoche, Zurich, 1951–53. Codirector, Basle Theatre, 1968–69. Coeditor, Züricher Sonntags-Journal (Zurich Sunday journal), 1969–71. Traveled to the United States, 1959, 1969, 1981, the U.S.S.R., 1964, 1967, Israel, 1974, Greece and South America, 1983–84, and Egypt, 1985. Married Charlotte Kerr, 1984. Awards: many, including the Schiller Prize (Mannheim), 1959, (Switzerland), 1960; Grillparzer Prize, 1968; Buber-Rosenzweig Medal, 1977; Zuckmayer Medal, 1984; Austrian State Prize, 1984; Bavarian Literature Prize, 1985; Büchner Prize, 1986; Schiller Prize (Stuttgart), 1986; Ernst Robert Curtius Prize, for essays, 1989; honorary degrees from five universities. Died (of heart failure) in Neuchâtel, Switzerland, 14 December 1990.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Theaterprobleme, 1955; as Problems of the Theatre, translated by Gerhard Nellhaus, in Four Plays, 1964, and with The Marriage of Mr. Mississippi, 1966

Friedrich Schiller: Eine Rede, 1960

Theater-Schriften und Reden, edited by Elisabeth Brock-Sulzer, 2 vols., 1966–72; part as Writings on Theatre and Drama, edited and translated by H.M. Waidson, 1976

Monstervortrag über Gerechtigkeit und Recht nebst einem helvetischen Zwischenspiel: Eine kleine Dramaturgie der Politik, 1969; as “A Monster Lecture on Justice and Law Together with a Helvetian Interlude: A Small Dramaturgy of Politics,” in Plays and Essays, edited by Volkmar Sander, 1981

Sätze aus Amerika, 1970

Zusammenhänge: Essay über Israel, 1976; enlarged edition, 1980

Der Mitmacher: Ein Komplex (includes a play), 1976

Stoffe I-III, 3 vols., 1981; revised edition, as Labyrinth: Stoffe I-III, 1 vol., 1990

Plays and Essays (various translators), edited by Volkmar Sander, 1982

Rollenspiele, with Charlotte Kerr, 1986

Versuche, 1988

Turmbau: Stoffe IV-IX, 1990 Gedankenfuge, 1992.

Other writings: many plays (including Der Besuch der alten Dame [The Visit], 1956; Die Physiker [The Physicists], 1961), screenplays, radio plays, and several novels (including Der Richter und sein Henker [The Judge and His Hangman], 1952; Die Panne [A Dangerous Game], 1956; Justiz [The Execution of Justice], 1985; Der Auftrag [The Assignment], 1986).

Collected works editions: Werkausgabe, 30 vols., 1980–90;

Gesammelte Werke, edited by Franz Josef Görtz, 7 vols., 1988.

Bibliographies

- Knapp, Gerhard P., in Friedrich Dürrenmatt, Stuttgart: Metzler, 1993
 Whitton, Kenneth S., in Dürrenmatt: Reinterpretation in Retrospect, New York and Oxford: Berg, 1990

Further Reading

- Arnold, Armin, editor, Zu Friedrich Dürrenmatt, Stuttgart: Klett, 1982
 Bänziger, Hans, Frisch und Dürrenmatt, Berne: Francke, 1976 (original edition, 1960)
 Federico, Joseph A., "The Political Philosophy of Friedrich Dürrenmatt," German Studies Review 12 (1989):91–109
 Keel, Daniel, editor, Über Friedrich Dürrenmatt, Zürich: Diogenes, 1980
 Keel, Daniel, editor, Herkules und Atlas: Lobreden und andere Versuche über Friedrich Dürrenmatt, Zürich: Diogenes, 1990
 Knapp, Gerhard P., and Gerd Labrousse, editors, Facetten: Studien zum 60. Geburtstag Friedrich Dürrenmatts, Berne: Lang, 1981
 Knapp, Gerhard P., Friedrich Dürrenmatt, Stuttgart: Metzler, 1993
 Knapp, Mona, and Gerhard P. Knapp, "Recht—Gerechtigkeit Politik: Zur Genese der Begriffe im Werk Friedrich Dürrenmatts," Text+Kritik 56 (1977): 23–40
 Knopf, Jan, Friedrich Dürrenmatt, Munich: Beck, 1988 (original edition, 1976)
 Lazar, Moshe, editor, Play Dürrenmatt, Malibu: Undena, 1983
 Sheppard, Vera, "Friedrich Dürrenmatt as a Dramatic Theorist," Drama Survey 4 (1965): 244–63
 Whitton, Kenneth S., Dürrenmatt: Reinterpretation in Retrospect, New York and Oxford: Berg, 1990, particularly "The Essays": 158–209

This page intentionally left blank.

E

Eco, Umberto

Italian, 1932–

Umberto Eco has pursued scientific research to the limits of philosophy and semiology; he has also published many articles and reports destined for a wider public, in newspapers such as the Times Literary Supplement and L'Espresso and in collections. More recently, he has also been tempted by novels and has found worldwide success with Il nome della rosa (1980; The Name of the Rose), Il pendolo di Foucault (1988; Foucault's Pendulum), and L'isola del giorno prima (1994; The Island of the Day Before).

He first became known with Opera aperta (1962.; The Open Work), a work in which he develops thoughts on the plural character of artistic productions in an intuitive semiological approach he would later expand thanks to his discovery of structuralist thinkers. From this point on, Eco's work as an essayist oscillates between two issues: on the one hand, the founding of a general semiology sensitive to the questions of interpretation and reception, and on the other, shorter, more personal reflections on the little details of life that he feels illustrate signs of cultural phenomena.

The semiological subjects he focuses on belong to literature as well as to diverse manifestations of popular culture, particularly to the mass media. Thus, in Apocalittici e integrati (1964; Apocalyptic and integrated), Eco opposes both the believers of a superior elitist culture, nostalgic for the past, who keep their distance from the media (which they consider to be akin to bearers of the apocalypse), and the "integrated," who are not only open to this mass culture but so fascinated by it that they submit to its power. Eco advises the consumer to adopt a critical standpoint, to confront actively this media explosion in which modern kitsch takes refuge. Here he develops his first thoughts on Superman and, later, James Bond and other heroes he will discuss in Il superuomo di massa (1976; The mass superman). He also analyzes the social importance of television and the beginning of its evolution, propositions he had already developed in The Open Work, where he questions the aesthetic possibilities of direct televising, and which he takes up again in Faith in Fakes (1986; also published as Travels in Hyperreality) and Il secondo diario minimo (1992.; How to Travel with a Salmon and Other Essays).

In the preface to Faith in Fakes, Eco describes the methods of composition for his articles, which are not semiological exercises but appeal to what Barthes called "semiological flair." He clearly distinguishes between what is particular to scientific work and what is specific to essays: “At white heat, in the rush of an emotion, stimulated by an event, you write your reflections, hoping that someone will read them and then forget them. I don’t believe there is any gap between what I write in my ‘academic’ books and what I write in the papers.” Eco continues that “It is true there is a difference in tone, because in reading about daily events day after day...you don’t start with theoretical hypotheses to underscore concrete examples, you start with events to make them ‘talk’ without having to conclude in definite theoretical terms.” Eco then shows that this “mind wandering,” when faced with particular facts, may be the first necessary step in the elaboration of a scientific project. Thus Diario minimo (1963; Misreadings), published just after The Open Work, uses imitations, parodies, and anachronisms abundantly, and develops ideas on the war games children love or on the passion for football in Italy, but always based on Eco’s knowledge of rhetoric, Aristotelian philosophy, or Charles S. Peirce’s semiology.

The interpenetration between Eco’s journalistic entertainment and his fundamental theoretical reflection becomes clear when comparing these articles with his more rigorous fulllength works such as La struttura assente (1968; The absent structure), Lector in fabula (1979; Role of the Reader), or I limiti dell’interpretazione (1990; The Limits of Interpretation). He begins by reinserting structures in the written codes of a story, and thus strongly denies the structuralist negation of the story, with the aim of founding a social semiology that also rehabilitates the reader’s role. Eco works on the assumption that “the text is a lazy machine demanding strenuous cooperation from the reader to fill in the unspoken or already spoken blanks.” The interpretative adventure builds up, essentially with the help of three notions: the encyclopedia, the topic, and the possible world. The activity of the reader is especially “inferential,” which means that “reading signifies deducing, conjecturing, inferring from a text a possible context that the rest of the book must either confirm or correct.” Thus, while remaining loyal to the notion of sign, which is the basis of his treatise Il segno (1971; The sign) or Trattato di semiotica generale (1975; A Theory of Semiotics), he also gives an important place to what he calls the “Model Reader” and to the procedures of interpretation, in a constant dialectic between the injunctions of the textual sign and their acknowledgment. Even in essays on literary theory, Eco’s choice of works he writes about is significant: serial novels by Dumas or Eugène Sue, spy novels, and comic books, all of which are objects of the popular culture ignored by traditional criticism and which appear as significant witnesses of an era, outside all ideological value judgments.

More recently, Eco’s role as denouncer of all the pretenses invented by mass culture seems to be softened by his fiction writing. But even then he feels the need to put his novels in perspective, for example in Postille a “Il nome della rosa” (1984; Reflections on “The Name of the Rose”), where he reveals his methods as an author by discussing again his conception of intertextuality and the reader’s role, all the while speaking of suspense novels or postmodernism, which he magnificently defines as the triumph of irony in an era of lost innocence. Thus, the creator cannot hide the fact that he is above all a lover of language—of all languages—and of comic books, television series, medieval philosophy, and science fiction. All these beckon to those who can interpret them. This is Eco’s quest.

Biography

Born 5 January 1932 in Alessandria. Also uses the pseudonym Dedalus. Studied at the University of Turin, Ph.D., 1954. Editor of cultural programs, RAI Italian Radio-Television, Milan, 1954–59; taught at the Universities of Turin, 1956–64, Milan, 1964–65, Florence, 1965–69, and Bologna, from 1971 (chair of semiotics, from 1975), and at Milan Polytechnic, 1969–71. Served in the Italian Army, 1958–59. Senior editor of nonfiction, Bompiani publishers, Milan, 1959–75. Columnist of “Diario minimo” for Il Verri, 1959–61. Married Renate Ramge, 1962: one son and one daughter. Visiting professor at various American universities, 1969–84. Cofounder, Marcatré, 1961, and Quindici (Fifteen), 1967; editor, Versus, from 1971; member of editorial board, Semiotica, Poetics Today, Degrés, Structuralist Review, Text, Communication, Problemi dell’Informazione (Problems of information), and Alfabeta. Secretary-general, 1972–79, and vice president, from 1979, International Association for Semiotic Studies. Awards: Strega Prize, 1981; Viareggio Prize, 1981; Anghiari Prize, 1981; Medicis Prize, 1982; McLuhan Teleglobe Prize, 1985; honorary degrees from four universities.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Opera aperta, 1962; revised edition, 1967; as The Open Work, translated by Anna Cancogni, 1989

Diario minimo, 1963; as Misreadings, translated by William Weaver, 1993

Le forme del contenuto, 1971

Il costume di casa: Evidenze e misteri dell’ideologia italiano (articles), 1973

Dalla periferia dell’Impero (articles), 1976

Lector in fabula: La cooperazione interpretativa nei testi narrativi, 1979; as Role of the Reader: Explorations in the Semiotics of Texts, 1979

Semiotics and the Philosophy of Language, 1984

Sugli specchi e altri saggi, 1985

Faith in Fakes, and as Travels in Hyperreality, translated by William Weaver, 1986

Il secondo diario minimo, 1992; as How to Travel with a Salmon and Other Essays, 1994

Interpretation and Overinterpretation, with others, edited by Stefan Collini, 1992

Six Walks in the Fictional Woods (Charles Eliot Norton lectures), 1994

Apocalypse Postponed (various translators), edited by Robert Lumley, 1994

Other writings: three novels (Il nome della rosa [The Name of the Rose], 1980; Il pendolo di Foucault [Foucault’s Pendulum], 1988; L’isola del giorno prima [The Island of the Day Before], 1994), poetry, and many books on semiotics, art, and culture.

Bibliography

Ganeri, Margherita, in Il “caso” Eco, Palermo: Palumbo, 1991: 159–216

Further Reading

- Coletti, Theresa, Naming the Rose: Eco, Medieval Signs and Modern Theory, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1988
- De Lauretis, Teresa, Umberto Eco, Florence: La Nuova Italia, 1981
- Ganeri, Margherita, Il "caso" Eco, Palermo: Palumbo, 1991
- Gritti, Jules, Umberto Eco, Paris: Éditions Universitaires, 1991
- Magazine Littéraire* issue on Eco, 262 (1989)
- Pansa, Francesca, and Anna Vinci, Effetto Eco, Rome: Gallo, 1990
- Robey, David, "Umberto Eco," in Writers and Society in Contemporary Italy, edited by Michael Caesar and Peter Hainsworth, Leamington Spa: Berg, 1984

Edgeworth, Maria

Irish, 1768–1849

Maria Edgeworth was one of the most popular and widely read authors of her time, as the numerous editions of her works reveal. She is recognized as an early innovator of the regional novel and an important writer of instructional tales for children. Current critical interest in Edgeworth focuses mainly on these novels and tales, which established her reputation as a writer. The critical attention given to her best-known works—Castle Rackrent (1800), Belinda (1801), and The Absentee (1812.)—dominates Edgeworth scholarship, so that her essays, which launched her literary career, have been ignored by most critics. This dismissal is unwarranted, for, in addition to being valuable in themselves, the essays explain the moral instruction that is the basis for her novels and stories. As her father Richard Lovell Edgeworth states in the preface to Moral Tales for Young People (1801), the tales were intended to serve as illustrations of the opinions delivered in Practical Education (1798). Maria Edgeworth followed this creative process throughout her literary career: she repeatedly used her essays as foundations for her longer works, either expanding an essay into a tale or writing didactic stories to exemplify the concepts presented in the essays.

Although Edgeworth dabbled in several genres, such as translation, drama, tale, and novel, her first published work, Letters for Literary Ladies (1795), is a collection of three pieces: two written in epistolary form and the third in essay form. "An Essay on the Noble Science of Self-Justification" humorously explores the feminine argumentative method. As Marilyn Butler points out in Maria Edgeworth (1972), Edgeworth later expanded this essay into The Modern Griselda: A Tale (1805), a didactic novel that contrasts two wives: Griselda, the silly wife, and Emma Granby, the sensible wife. The tale comically exemplifies the arguments set forth in the essay, as Griselda insists on having the last word in every argument with her husband.

Edgeworth and her father worked collaboratively on Practical Education; however, she wrote the majority of the essays. Practical Education explains the theories underlying the educational techniques utilized in the Edgeworth family. These theories also served as guidance for Edgeworth in her literary endeavors. In the chapter entitled “Books,” she warns that fiction can give false ideas to children and recommends that writing fiction “should be attended to with care in all books for young people; nor should we sacrifice the understanding to the enthusiasm of eloquence, or the affectation of sensibility.” Edgeworth practiced this cautious approach in writing The Parent’s Assistant (1800) and Moral Tales: the stories in these collections popularized the themes expounded in Practical Education.

Another essay that profoundly affected Edgeworth’s literary career is Essays on Professional Education (1809). In 1807 Edgeworth decided, at her father’s suggestion, to write an essay examining male education, and thus was forced to investigate an unfamiliar, masculine topic. In order to write Professional Education she spent two years researching, reading, and writing about the selection of vocations and the proper education for sons. This rigorous scholarship greatly influenced the topics in her fiction. According to Butler, the later tales in Tales of Fashionable Life (1809–12) illustrate the principles set out in the essay, while Ormond (1817) qualifies them.

In addition to the essays that served as sources for her tales and novels, Edgeworth published Essay on Irish Bulls (1802.), a work closely connected to her best-known novel, Castle Rackrent. In the essay she humorously relates numerous verbal blunders, called “bulls,” many of which were personally observed by either herself or her father. The essay demonstrates that blunders are made by people of all nationalities, not just the Irish. While Butler calls Essay on Irish Bulls an apology for Castle Rackrent, in Family Chronicles (1987) Coilin Owens insists on a closer connection between the essay and the novel: “that the Irish Bull—a general term for a variety of rhetorical tropes in which sense is cunningly encased in apparent nonsense—is a paradigm for the entire novel.” The humor found in Essay on Irish Bulls also exists in Edgeworth’s “Thoughts on Bores” (1826), published anonymously in the almanac Janus. This essay gives a comical overview of the different types of bores, ranging from the parliamentary bore, who is “Fond of high places; but not always found in them,” to bluestocking bores. These humorous essays exhibit Edgeworth’s ability simultaneously to entertain and to instruct the reader.

Because of their important connections to her popular novels and tales, Edgeworth’s essays deserve more critical attention. Although she is remembered as an author of children’s fiction and as an Irish regional novelist, the foundations of her works of fiction exist in her essays. “Essayist” is an appropriate label for Edgeworth, and one she probably would have approved of: she despised being called a “novelist” because of the emphasis on fiction the term implied. Throughout her life, Edgeworth insisted on the truthfulness of the representations in her fictional works, which were intended to illustrate the principles explained in her many essays. Thus, the essays are a major part of the Edgeworth canon, and require further examination.

STACI L.STONE

Biography

Born 1 January 1768 in Black Bourton, Oxfordshire; daughter of the educationist Richard Lovell Edgeworth (died, 1817). Studied at Mrs. Lattuffiere's school, Derby, 1775–80; Mrs. Devis' school, London, 1781–81. Moved with her family to Ireland, living in Edgeworthstown, Longford, from 1782, and helped run the family estates. Lived in England, 1791–93; collaborated with her father on educational works, 1798–1802. First novel published anonymously, 1800. Traveled in England, France, and Scotland, 1802–03, and in France and Switzerland, 1820–21; frequently visited London and made occasional tours of Britain. Died in Edgeworthstown, 21 May 1849.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Letters for Literary Ladies, 1795; Everyman Edition, 1993

Practical Education, with Richard Lovell Edgeworth, 1798; revised edition, 3 vols., 1801; as Essays on Practical Education, 2 vols., 1811

Essay on Irish Bulls, 1802

Essays on Professional Education, 1809

Other writings: moral tales, regional novels (including Castle Rackrent, 1800), plays, and correspondence.

Collected works edition: Tales and Novels (Longford Edition), 10 vols., 1893, reprinted 1969.

Bibliographies

Finneran, Richard J., editor, Anglo-Irish Literature: A Review of Research, New York: Modern Language Association of America, 1976

Slade, Bertha Coolidge, Maria Edgeworth, 1767–1849: A Bibliographical Tribute, London: Constable, 1937

Further Reading

Butler, Marilyn, Maria Edgeworth: A Literary Biography, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1972

Harden, Elizabeth, Maria Edgeworth, Boston: Twayne, 1984

Kelly, Gary, "Amelia Opie, Lady Caroline Lamb, and Maria Edgeworth: Official and Unofficial Ideology," ARIEL 12, no. 4 (1981): 3–24

Kestner, Joseph, "Defamiliarization in the Romantic Regional Novel: Maria Edgeworth, Walter Scott, John Gibson Lockhart, Susan Ferrier, and John Galt," Wordsworth Circle 10, no. 4 (1979): 326–30

Kowaleski-Wallace, Elizabeth, Their Fathers' Daughters: Hannah More, Maria

- Edgeworth, and Patriarchal Complicity*, New York: Oxford University Press, 1991
- Myers, Mitzi, "De-Romanticizing the Subject: Maria Edgeworth's The Bracelets,' Mythologies of Origin, and the Daughter's Coming to Writing," in Romantic Women Writers: Voices and Countervoices, edited by Paula R. Feldman and Theresa M. Kelley, Hanover, New Hampshire: University Press of New England, 1995:88–110
- Myers, Mitzi, "The Dilemmas of Gender as Double-Voiced Narrative; or, Maria Edgeworth Mothers the Bildungsroman," in The Idea of the Novel in the Eighteenth Century, edited by Robert W. Uphaus, East Lansing, Michigan: Colleagues Press, 1988:67–96
- Owens, Coilin, editor, Family Chronicles: Maria Edgeworth's Castle Rackrent, Dublin: Wolfhound Press, and Totowa, New Jersey: Barnes and Noble, 1987
- Tracy, Robert, "Maria Edgeworth and Lady Morgan: Legality Versus Legitimacy," Nineteenth-Century Fiction 48, no. 1 (1985): 1–22
- Wilson, Carol Shiner, "Lost Needles, Tangled Threads: Stitchery, Domesticity, and the Artistic Enterprise in Barbauld, Edgeworth, Taylor, and Lamb," in Re-Visioning Romanticism: British Women Writers, 1776–1837, edited by Carol Shiner Wilson and Joel Haefner, Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1994: 167–90

The Edinburgh Review

British periodical, 1802–1929

In 18th-century Britain, with the number of publications increasing enormously, there was a corresponding increase in the demand for periodicals that would enable readers to select from the mass, and to be offered judgments that they could repeat or contradict. Earlier reviews, like the Monthly, attempted something like comprehensive coverage, with readers in mind like Lady Russell in Jane Austen's Persuasion, who was said to "get all the new publications." The foundation in 1802 of the Edinburgh Review marked the point at which any such attempt was abandoned; instead, a few items were given relatively elaborate consideration. As time went on, the books selected became fewer, the reviews discussing them longer—a development that underlined the salience of the reviewer in comparison to the books reviewed.

The earlier decades of the 19th century saw the emergence of the weightily anonymous reviewer. With the Edinburgh it was well known that the review was in the hands of a group of liberal-minded members of the Scottish capital's establishment, and readers were usually able to recognize the mercurial eloquence of Francis Jeffrey, the editor after the first number, or the animated humor of Sydney Smith, who after editing the first number remained one of the most entertaining contributors, or the slashing vigor of Henry Brougham. But the review itself counted for more than the individuals who composed it, and there is a distinctive Edinburgh house style, supremely confident, determinedly enlightened and humane, avoiding bigotry and exalting good sense, but colored by a severity summed up in the motto that graced the title page of every number: Judex damnatur cum nocens absolvitur—"The judge is condemned when the guilty are acquitted." A presiding judge is a fitting emblem of the editor's role as seen by Jeffrey and his colleagues and imitators. Many years later, Walter Bagehot was to give him the credit for inventing the trade of editorship—no longer a bookseller's drudge, but "a distinguished functionary." But more than that, to be an Edinburgh reviewer was to be a high priest of the Spirit of the Age, an implicit claim that annoyed the many authors whose work was treated unfavorably, and the even greater number of conservative-minded readers who found reformist views objectionable. Of the many rejoinders to the Edinburgh's pretensions, at least one, Edward Copleston's Advice to a Young Reviewer (1807), with its specimen review of Milton's "L'Allegro," is very telling. But nothing could undermine the Edinburgh's commercial success, and this inevitably generated imitators, notably, in 1809, the Quarterly Review. Still, for many years the Edinburgh remained required reading even for those who found its views very disagreeable.

Of the early contributors, Jeffrey and Smith retained the most enduring reputation, and their collected Edinburgh essays were widely read. Jeffrey has earned some notoriety for his dismissive reviews of Wordsworth, and he is probably best remembered for his opening words on The Excursion—"This will never do!" But while his ridicule of Wordsworth's infelicities may now seem obtuse, it is not difficult to appreciate the pleasure a sympathetic reader might have felt at his flamboyant obliteration of a political opponent, e.g. "Though the learned author has not always the gift of writing intelligibly, it is impossible for a diligent reader not to see what he would be at" (in this instance a high Tory trying to discredit libertarian institutions). Sydney Smith shared in this destructive joie de vivre: when he and Brougham had drafted one such review, "we sat trying to find one more chink, one more crevice, through which we might drop one more drop of verjuice, to eat into his bones." But Smith's drollery is usually more humane than this would suggest, and much of it is in the service of a generous indignation against injustice, its perpetrators exposed by their absurdity. His imagination warms to a persecuting bishop or a suppressor of vice; landowners who set spring-guns and mantraps to protect their game do not, he allows, positively want to kill poachers, but if there is a choice between game and poacher, the less worthy must suffer—"the rustic without a soul,—not the Christian partridge—not the immortal pheasant—not the rational woodcock, or the accountable hare" (March 1821).

A startlingly high proportion of the first 20 years of the Edinburgh was written by the founding group, but as time went on new and even more talented writers joined them. William Hazlitt contributed some 16 reviews between 1814 and 1830, and although they are recognizably his work, he is not there quite the fierce radical of the Examiner or the Yellow Dwarf. Thomas Carlyle contrived to gain admission for his idiosyncratic style, perhaps because he was an acknowledged authority on German literature; this was part of the process of introducing readers to an unfamiliar but crucially important agency of enlightenment. As for Thomas Babington Macaulay's disquisitions upon a wide range of literary and historical subjects, these were probably the most widely admired productions of the Edinburgh Review, with a reputation extending far beyond readers of the periodical for which they were written.

Although Macaulay was very much a partisan of the liberalism with which the Edinburgh was associated from the outset, his frequently reprinted essays became part of the broad intellectual culture of the Victorian period to which the periodicals of the time contributed so weightily. In mid-century and afterwards, particularly during the long editorship of Henry Reeve (1855–95), the Edinburgh became just one of a number of serious journals devoted to keeping readers abreast of current information and discussion. Sir Alfred Lyall's articles on India are a fair example, including in 1884 an astonishingly far-sighted analysis of the contradictions between a bureaucratic ruling apparatus and the libertarian ideas cultivated by English education.

The Edinburgh Review continued until 1929, but perhaps was never quite the same after 1912, when its contributors began to be named, as in other journals. While anonymity continued, even though it was an anonymity designed to be penetrated, the immense pretensions of the original publication still left an afterglow. But those pretensions belonged to the world of the early 19th century, and could not be sustained indefinitely.

GEOFFREY CARNALL

See also Periodical Essay

Further Reading

- Clive, John Leonard, Scotch Reviewers: The Edinburgh Review, 1802–1815, London: Faber, 1957
- Fontana, Biancamaria, Rethinking the Politics of Commercial Society: The Edinburgh Review, 1802–1832, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1985
- Greig, James Alexander, Francis Jeffrey of the Edinburgh Review, Edinburgh: Oliver and Boyd, 1948
- Koss, Stephen, The Rise and Fall of the Political Press in Britain, vol. 1: The Nineteenth Century, London: Hamilton, 1981
- Newton, Judith, "Engendering History for the Middle Class: Sex and Political Economy in the Edinburgh Review," in Rewriting the Victorians: Theory, History and the Politics of Gender, London and New York: Routledge, 1992: 1–17
- Pottinger, George, Heirs of the Enlightenment: Edinburgh Reviewers and Writers, 1800–1830, Edinburgh: Scottish Academic Press, 1992
- Shattock, Joanne, Politics and Reviewers: "The Edinburgh" and "The Quarterly" in the Early Victorian Age, Leicester: Leicester University Press, 1989

Eglinton, John

Irish, 1868–1961

Although remembered now as a caricature in James Joyce's Ulysses, during the early 20th century "John Eglinton" (the pseudonym for William Kirkpatrick Magee) was one of the most influential critics in Irish literature and one of the leading theorists of the Irish Literary Renaissance. The early members of this movement, now associated primarily with Joyce and William Butler Yeats, sought to establish an independent, Irish publishing industry as an element of a distinct national literary culture, and the essay was accordingly central to the movement's development. As an essayist, Eglinton helped formulate the defining issues of Irish cultural independence, centering on whether Ireland's literary aspirations lay more in a cosmopolitan, English-speaking, European future or in a concentration on a Celtic, Gaelic-speaking, legendary past. Eglinton's stance on these issues was consistently Anglo-Irish, cosmopolitan, and European; but, however little the modern Irish political map conforms to his ideals, the Modernism of the novels of Joyce and the late poetry of Yeats demonstrates the literary importance of Eglinton's influence.

Eglinton's essays appeared predominantly in the Irish literary magazines and newspapers that sprung up in Dublin around the turn of the century, most of which proved short-lived. Among the more influential to which he contributed were the Shanachie, the Irish Review, the Dublin Daily Express, and Dana: An Irish Magazine of Independent Thought, which he edited (1904–05). He broadened his audience beyond ephemeral publications by collecting many of his essays in books: Two Essays on the Remnant (1894), Pebbles from a Brook (1901), Bards and Saints (1906), and Anglo-Irish Essays (1917). Additionally, Yeats published Some Essays and Passages by John Eglinton (1905). Eglinton also edited an influential series of letters that he, Yeats, and other members of the Irish Renaissance had written to the Daily Express and published them as Literary Ideals in Ireland (1899). Because it helped to frame the issues of the Renaissance, Literary Ideals is one of the most important Irish books of the 1890s. After 1921, responding to the establishment of a Republican government in Ireland, Eglinton lived in voluntary exile in England. There he wrote several reminiscences of key figures in the Irish Renaissance—Yeats, George Russell (Æ), Edward Dowden, George Moore, and James Joyce—published as Irish Literary Portraits (1935).

As an essayist, Eglinton saw himself as a “philosopherpriest,” following an essentially scientific, materialist mysticism developed from early exposure to theosophy. His essays can seem esoteric and abstract, but the abstraction masks a concrete reality, creating parables of the material world, almost always with a counterpart in the practical debates surrounding Irish nationalism. Always concerned with the relation between art and society, Eglinton saw more clearly than most the trajectory that led from old legends of a heroic Ireland to the Irish Revolution and Civil War. Even in his early Two Essays on the Remnant Eglinton warns of what Yeats realized only after the fact: the power of art to unloose the “blood-dimmed tide” of war.

Eglinton's essays fall into three stylistic periods. The tone of Two Essays on the Remnant is prophetic and oracular, drawing heavily on images from the Bible and comparing Ireland with Old Testament Israel (a common trope of the Irish Renaissance). Pebbles from a Brook marks Eglinton's second stylistic period, in which he discontinues the oracular style and develops the detached, ironic tone usually associated with him, and the one parodied in Ulysses. Allusive and dryly witty, he clearly writes for fellow intellectuals, including a wide range of reference to classical literature, oriental religions, and German Romantic philosophy, as well as the English literary tradition. His tone is conversational, but it is the conversation of the literary salon, often as condescending as it is recondite. The third stylistic phase of his Irish Literary Portraits occurs after his voluntary exile in England. These essays are personal reminiscences—often as much memoir as portrait. The erudition remains but is less ostentatiously presented.

Although Eglinton's style changed over his career, the themes of his essays reflected a remarkably consistent world view, based on the idea that old cultures die and are superseded in a process combining aspects of a natural life cycle with a Hegelian historic synthesis. Claiming Anglo-Irish culture as a new synthesis of decadent Celtic and Anglo-Saxon cultures, Eglinton uses this view to argue for an Anglo-Irish rather than a Celtic Ireland. Although no longer plausible as a theory of history, it did lead him to some trenchant criticism of the romantic nostalgia at the heart of Yeats' "Celtic Twilight" movement. Arguing for a "natural" succession of national cultures, he warned that arousing nationalist feelings for purely aesthetic purposes, as Yeats was doing, would lead only to chaos and unrest. His warnings came true in the Easter Rising of 1916 and the subsequent Irish Revolution.

Although Eglinton's early essays retain an historical interest, their late Victorian style limits their interest for modern readers. They are important to an understanding of the Irish Renaissance Movement, and in many ways Eglinton was a perceptive and far-sighted critic of the divorce of aesthetics from social and political concerns. But for all their attempts to generalize and make universal, Eglinton's philosophical essays are, ironically, the most strictly local and time-constrained essays he wrote.

The later Irish Literary Portraits is Eglinton's best work, not merely because it has lost the Victorian hypotaxis of his earlier style but because it is his most human, more concerned with people than ideas. He also has the advantages not only of fascinating subjects, but of an intimate acquaintance with them. The portraits of Yeats and Joyce are particularly worth-while. He writes of Yeats with a mixture of admiration and near bitterness: admiration for Yeats' accomplishments in poetry, bitterness for Yeats' role in dividing Ireland from the Union. There is a poignancy in his description of his literary pretensions being eclipsed by James Joyce, the callow literary poseur to whom Eglinton once could condescend, but who has since become his unquestioned literary master. Joyce's brother Stanislaus accused Eglinton of envious sniping, but his portrait of Eglinton seems more petty than Eglinton's of his brother; and Eglinton, for all his obvious jealousy, is much more willing to give James Joyce his due. Eglinton's humanity—manifest in his pettiness as well as his generosity—gives these essays an interest that his earlier essays lack. They are important because of the portraits they give of writers far more significant than Eglinton himself; but they are also rewarding in their own right as the record of an intelligent, idiosyncratic writer coming to grips with a literary tradition that has passed him by.

JEP C. JONSON

Biography

Born William Kirkpatrick Magee, 1868 in Dublin. Studied at the High School, Dublin, where he met William Butler Yeats; Trinity College, Dublin: won the Vice-Chancellor's Prize four times. Worked at the National Library, Dublin, 1895–1921. Member of the theosophical movement in Dublin, associating with Æ, Stephen McKenna, and George Moore; secretary to Moore for a time. Cofounder, Dana: An Irish Magazine of Independent Thought, 1904–05; contributor to various other Irish journals. Married M.L. O'Leary, 1920. Moved to England after the formation of the Free State, 1921. Died in Bournemouth, 9 May 1961.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Two Essays on the Remnant, 1894

Pebbles from a Brook, 1901

Some Essays and Passages by John Eglinton, edited by W.B. Yeats, 1905

Bards and Saints, 1906

Anglo-Irish Essays, 1917

Irish Literary Portraits, 1935

Other writings: poems (including Confidential; or, Take It or Leave It, 1951), and a memoir of Æ (1937). Also edited and contributed to Literary Ideals in Ireland (1899); edited the Letters of Edward Dowden (1914); translated letters written by George Moore to Édouard Dujardin (1929).

Further Reading

Boyd, Ernest A., Ireland's Literary Renaissance, Dublin: Figgis, 1968 (original edition, 1916)

Boyd, Ernest A., Appreciations and Depredations: Irish Literary Studies, Dublin: Talbot Press, and London: Fisher Unwin, 1917; New York: Lane, 1918

Hall, Wayne E., Shadowy Heroes: Irish Literature of the 1890s, Syracuse, New York: Syracuse University Press, 1980

Joyce, Stanislaus, My Brother's Keeper: James Joyce's Early Years, edited by Richard Ellmann, London: Faber, and New York: Viking, 1958

Morris, Lloyd R., The Celtic Dawn: A Survey of the Renaissance in Ireland, 1889–1916, New York: Cooper Square, 1970 (original edition, 1917)

Eiseley, Loren

American, 1907–1977

Best known as the poet-scientist who wrote hauntingly of time and evolution, Loren Eiseley turned to the popular essay in mid-career, gaining widespread recognition with The Immense Journey (1957). He wrote over 75 essays, along with scientific articles, reviews, and science-fiction sketches, many of which were later incorporated into his books and his autobiography, All the Strange Hours: The Excavation of a Life (1975). A respected anthropologist and expert on evolutionary history, he preferred to write for the general audience, blending scientific insights with moments of wonder and delight. His persona of the compassionate scientist appealed to many readers. A master stylist, Eiseley was a writer of grace and eloquence whose finest essays extend the tradition of American meditative natural history writing.

Eiseley's career as a popular essayist began with a series of science articles he wrote for Harper's and Scientific American during the 1940s. These articles came to the attention of editor John Fisher, who invited Eiseley to rework them in book form. Eiseley spent over eight years preparing the manuscript, which became The Immense Journey. His subsequent books were generally assembled from previously published essays, often revised and adapted for their new context.

Eiseley's mastery of the personal essay developed gradually. His "concealed essay" blends personal anecdotes with thoughts of a more scientific nature. He structured his essays with a kind of "reenactment through memory," in which a dramatically intensified account of past experiences leads the reader to unexpected insights. Memory, landscape, and metaphor combine to shape many of Eiseley's most powerful passages. The "concealed essay" often begins with a vivid reminiscence ("The Slit," 1957) and gradually expands it in a scientific or contemplative direction. The subject matter of the essay is framed or "concealed" by the personal approach ("The Judgment of the Birds," 1957). The "concealed essay" became for Eiseley an elaborate form, combining personal anecdotes, literary allusions, quotations, multiple themes, and a contemplative perspective ("How Natural Is 'Natural'," 1960). Eiseley's later essays evolved toward a more impressionistic, almost surrealistic style ("The Star Thrower," 1969), which depicts the limitations of a strictly scientific world view.

Eiseley's familiar essays often blend the ordinary and the exotic, or point to the miraculous in the commonplace. Beginning with a specific setting or thematic description, sometimes in a remote time or place, his essays create a series of dramatic incidents to illustrate a theme ("The Brown Wasps," 1969). Often there is a touch of the gothic sensibility in Eiseley's use of nocturnal imagery ("Instruments of Darkness," 1971), insomnia ("One Night's Dying," 1971), painful childhood memories ("The Gold Wheel," 1971), bizarre or grotesque events ("The Relic Men," 1971), physical deformities ("The Last Neanderthal," 1969), or grotesque fantasy ("The Dance of the Frogs," 1978).

Through the personal essay, Eiseley was able to connect ideas that seemed quite disparate. Beginning with a specific setting or thematic description, such as the bleak uplands of western Nebraska ("The Slit"), he takes the reader on a metaphoric journey backwards in time, accentuated by his vivid descriptions of a primitive mammal's skull embedded in a sandstone wall. His essays create a dramatic situation, such as a chance encounter on a beach in Costabel ("The Star Thrower"), or take readers on an intellectual journey ("The Ghost Continent," 1969) and bring them back with new insights. Along the way, Eiseley maintains the voice of informed conversation on a common theme, sharing a range of intellectual interests in literature, science, religion, philosophy, and biography.

Eiseley conveys his musings with vivid, arresting images rather than abstract theories. His essays feature a variety of fossilized and living mammals, birds and plants set in past and present dramatic landscapes. They range through topics as diverse as the miracle of water ("The Flow of the River," 1957), the appearance of flowering plants ("How Flowers Changed the World," 1957), the mechanisms of evolutionary adaptation ("The Snout," 1957), and the mystery of the rapid emergence of the human brain ("The Dream Animal," 1957). Several themes unify these speculations: an antimaterialistic bias, an opposition to scientism, and a desire to recover the past by using imagination to transcend temporal restraints.

Central to Eiseley's personal essays is a distinctive voice that appeals to public misgivings about the ideology of science. Eiseley's persona combines the insights of a disillusioned scientist with a distinctly romantic, often pessimistic sensibility. Skeptical of the claims of science and technology, he insists on the uniqueness of the individual and the need for compassion ("The Chresmologue," 1971). We are mysteries to ourselves, he observes ("Strangeness in the Proportion," 1971), part of the unaccountable strangeness and novelty of the universe. Evolution holds no favorites, he warns, and there are no guarantees for our future ("The Spore Bearers," 1970).

Dissatisfied with the restrictive, value-free orientation of modern science, Eiseley turned to the personal essay as a form through which he could articulate his sense of the mystery and wonder of life. For some time he had been disillusioned with the "religion of science," with its rigid assumption that every natural event in the universe could be measured, analyzed, and explained by prior events. He disliked the scientific detachment that would not permit imaginative or aesthetic response to his study of nature.

With this change of orientation, Eiseley placed himself in a long, distinguished tradition of English and American natural history writing—including Gilbert White, Richard Jefferies, W. H. Hudson, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Henry David Thoreau, John Muir, John Burroughs, Ernest Thompson Seton, and Aldo Leopold. Like these earlier writers, Eiseley recorded his impressions of nature in a precise, distinctive, personal style. Eiseley's natural history essays gain vividness and accuracy from the influence of empirical science. His style is both personal and factual, blending objectivity with delight. Eiseley recognized that the study of nature could be both factual and contemplative. He believed that description and analysis alone could not provide a full understanding of the natural world; there is also a need for contemplative natural history, an approach that "contains overtones of thought which is not science, nor intended to be, and yet without which science itself would be poorer" ("The Enchanted Glass," 1957). Contemplative natural history offers what Eiseley calls "a natural history of the soul" ("The Enchanted Glass"). This human response to the world is especially important, he notes, in an age that does not lend itself to contemplation. Eiseley's familiar essays personalize science by balancing fact and knowledge with affection and emotional insight.

Eiseley's models were the great Victorian scientists—Charles Darwin, Alfred Russel Wallace, T.H. Huxley—who could express complex ideas to a general audience. In many ways, Eiseley resembles these gifted Victorians, naturalists with a literary bent, who forever changed human understanding of our place in the natural world. Eiseley had the poetic vision to perceive the natural history of life's emergence as an epic event, a grand unfolding of living forms, capable of being cast in imaginative terms. It took a special kind of talent to accomplish this, one more akin to the Victorian naturalist than the modern specialist, someone not intimidated by the "two cultures" division or the challenge of bridging disciplines. Eiseley had long been pursuing separate careers as a poet and a scientist, with the hope of eventually combining them in some literary form, and the personal essay seemed best to fulfill that promise for him.

Despite these affinities with Victorian men of science, Eiseley's work is neither derivative nor anachronistic. His visionary power, his animistic descriptions, and the range of his philosophical speculations distinguish him from his Victorian predecessors. Eiseley is less optimistic about the prospects of science than either Darwin or Huxley. A strong romantic tendency reinforces his pessimistic tone, particularly in his various self-dramatizations: as the neglected child, the impoverished student, the wandering bone hunter, the midnight scholar, the weary insomniac. While this attitude is largely temperamental, it may also reflect, especially in his most melancholic or somber moods, the influence of his diverse antiquarian reading. Throughout his life, Eiseley's favorite authors remained Coleridge, Hazlitt, De Quincey, Lamb, Poe, Francis Bacon, Robert Burton, and Sir Thomas Browne—all masters of the essay who loved obscure and arcane references, elegant practitioners of an ornate style who emphasized tone and mood in their writing. Eiseley may have learned from Bacon the habit of balancing scientific or scholarly ideas with vivid metaphors, although he is far more candid than Bacon, especially in regard to the painful memories of his childhood. Retaining Bacon's philosophical sweep and scientific vision, Eiseley tempers it with a baroque, introspective style more reminiscent of Robert Burton, Thomas Browne, Abraham Cowley, and the later Thoreau. Like each of these writers, Eiseley cultivated the personal essay in its purest form, as a mode of personal expression.

What Eiseley accomplished through his popular essays was to create an imaginative synthesis of literature and science—one that enlarged the power and range of the personal essay. Eiseley's "literary essay turned to scientific purposes" (All the Strange Hours) became the ideal medium for such self-discoveries as he wished to offer, modest and unassuming, tentative and speculative without appearing dogmatic. Despite changes in literary taste, Eiseley will continue to be read as one of the great modern masters of the personal essay.

ANDREW J. ANGYAL

See also Nature Essay; Science Essay

Biography

Loren Corey Eiseley. Born 3 September 1907 in Lincoln, Nebraska. Studied at the University of Nebraska, Lincoln, B.A., 1933; University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia, A.M., 1935, Ph.D., 1937. Taught sociology and anthropology at the University of Kansas, Lawrence, 1937–44, and Oberlin College, Ohio, 1944–47; professor of anthropology, 1947–61, and Benjamin Franklin Professor of Anthropology and the History of Science, 1961–77, University of Pennsylvania; curator of early man, University of Pennsylvania Museum, 1948–77; visiting professor at various universities during summers. Married Mabel Langdon, 1938. Contributor to various journals (especially science), newspapers, and magazines, including the Saturday Evening Post, Harper's, Scientific American, Horizon, the New York Herald Tribune, and the New York Times. Television host of Animal Secrets program, 1966–68. Awards: many, including the Athenaeum of Philadelphia Award, for Darwin's Century, 1958; John Burroughs Medal, and Pierre Lecomte du Nouy Foundation Award, for Firmament of Time, both 1961; Joseph Wood Krutch Medal, 1976; honorary degrees from dozens of universities. Died (of cancer) in Philadelphia, 9 July 1977.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

The Immense Journey, 1957

The Firmament of Time, 1960

Francis Bacon and the Modern Dilemma, 1962; revised, enlarged edition, as The Man Who Saw Through Time, 1973

Man, Time, and Prophecy, 1966

Science and the Unexpected Universe, 1966

The Invisible Pyramid, 1970

The Night Country: Reflections of a Bone-Hunting Man, 1971

The Star Thrower, 1978

Darwin and the Mysterious Mr. X: New Light on the Evolutionists, 1979

The Lost Notebooks, edited by Kenneth Heuer, 1987

Other writings: poetry, books on evolution (including Darwin's Century: Evolution and the Men Who Discovered It, 1958) and other natural history subjects, and an autobiography (All the Strange Hours: The Excavation of a Life, 1975).

Further Reading

Angyal, Andrew J., Loren Eiseley, Boston: Twayne, 1983

Carlisle, E. Fred, Loren Eiseley: The Development of a Writer, Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1983

Carlisle, E. Fred, "The Literary Achievement of Loren Eiseley," in Essays on the Essay: Redefining the Genre, edited by Alexander Butrym, Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1989

Carrithers, Gale H., Jr., Mumford, Tate, Eiseley: Watchers in the Night, Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1991

Gerber, Leslie E., and Margaret McFadden, Loren Eiseley, New York: Ungar, 1983

McCrae, Murdo William, editor, The Literature of Science: Perspectives on Popular Scientific Writings, Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1993

Pitts, Mary Ellen, "Undermining the Authority of Science: Epistemological Symbiosis in Loren Eiseley and Lewis Thomas," Rendezvous 25, no. 1 (Fall 1989): 83–90

Ekelund, Vilhelm

Swedish, 1880–1949

Vilhelm Ekelund's career as an essayist began only after he had already established himself as one of Sweden's foremost poets of the early 20th century. Between 1900 and 1906 he published seven volumes of poetry which were highly original yet also full of resonances of Paul Verlaine, Stéphane Mallarmé, Stefan George, and Hugo von Hofmannsthal, thereby becoming Sweden's most important contributor to the international symbolist movement. In 1909 he published his first collection of meditations, Antik ideal (The classical ideal), not only launching his career as an essayist but at the same time completely taking his leave of poetry. During his lifetime he published some 20 volumes of prose, consisting overwhelmingly of essays and aphorisms, supplemented by several posthumous volumes.

Ekelund's abandonment of poetry and cultivation of the essay was motivated on one level by a desire to maintain his mental health. His poetry, animated by shifting moods and subtle nuances, seemed to threaten the spiritual health of his overly sensitive soul. In pragmatic terms, he needed a mode of expression that at least seemed to him more objective and univocal. His desire to maintain his mental balance not only required a change in genre but also suggested the theme of mental and spiritual well-being that in some way or other informs everything else he wrote. In more specific terms, Ekelund's essays explore how anxiety, melancholy, and solipsistic introversion can be avoided, and balance, stability, and peace maintained. Although he had great admiration for Friedrich Hölderlin, he saw in him the poet who, unable to withstand the demands of his own poetry, ended in madness; a poet like Walt Whitman, however, was of a more rugged nature and could endure.

On the whole, Ekelund's essays are anti-Romantic and antilyrical. They both reflect and exemplify a commitment often articulated in almost moralistic terms to precision, clarity, and aesthetic rigor. Among ancient authors, they celebrate Heraclitus, Sophocles, and Pindar, while the moderation and deferential if not obsequious attitudes of Socrates are scorned. Fortitude and the search for harmony stand out as the most salient characteristics of antiquity in Ekelund's mind, and are contrasted with the servile and accommodating in contemporary life. In their disparagement of the tepid, impassive, or halfhearted, the essays reveal their kinship with the thought of Friedrich Nietzsche, which is also reflected in their ecstatic exultation. Like Nietzsche, Ekelund despised erudition for its own sake, believing it to be stultifying and lifeless pedantry. "Bagage" is the derisive term Ekelund uses for useless knowledge that fails to engage life. Formally, Ekelund's essays gradually discarded more and more of what was considered inessential and became more narrowly focused. Essays in the usual sense became briefer and more concentrated and were eventually completely supplanted by aphorisms.

In addition to the heroic spirit he shared with Nietzsche, Ekelund also valued the search for balance and harmony as exemplified in more moderate and humane models like Goethe and Ralph Waldo Emerson. Although in general terms Nietzsche loomed larger in Ekelund's earlier essays and Goethe predominated in the later, the two coexisted and exercised influence throughout his career. The essay "Doric Apollo" (1908) compares the two and, with striking insights, delineates the complementary relationship Ekelund saw linking them. Indeed, many of his most significant essays are a form of biographical literary criticism in which Ekelund seeks to unveil the hidden recesses of writers' psyches and reveal what makes their spirits great and of enduring interest. To be counted among such essays are "Carlyle och Emerson" (1915), "James Russell Lowell" (1914), and "Leopardi—Nietzsche" (1918).

Ekelund was an aristocratic and exclusive spirit who could never appeal to a broad audience. After an absence from Sweden of several years, he returned hoping to lead a new generation of writers, but was frustrated and disappointed to find himself isolated and alienated to a degree from the public. Nonetheless, a small group of appreciative readers loyally supported him and saw his works into print (though in relatively small editions) even after his death.

Ekelund was a master of the Swedish prose style, using the language with great flexibility and inventiveness. His fluidity and eloquence reveal frequent traces of his mastery of Greek and Latin but without being labored or heavy-handed. Although capable of great clarity and lucidity, his prose became more cryptic and at times almost opaque as he found himself more and more marginalized. He used common words in personal and unusual ways that all but precluded comprehension except by those acquainted with his specialized vocabulary. He also derived crucial terms from Greek but assigned to each his own personal semantic meaning.

One of the many ironies central to Ekelund's career as an essayist is that the enduring and most obvious influence of his essays is not so much on the genre as such but rather on the poetry of the Finland-Swedish Modernist poets, Elmer Diktonius, Olof Enckell, and Edith Södergran. Not even those who most admired his prose have tried to imitate it. Thus his essays stand as magnificent achievements—though often dense and cryptic—but singular and relatively remote.

STEVEN P.SONDRUP

Biography

Otto Vilhelm Ekelund. Born 14 October 1880 in Stehag. Studied at the University of Lund, from 1898, degree, 1937. Left Sweden to avoid a prison sentence for a minor offence, 1908, living in Berlin for four years, then Denmark until 1921, when he returned to Sweden. Married. Awards: Bellman Prize, 1944; Tegnér Prize, 1947. Died in Saltsjöbaden, 3 September 1949.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Antik ideal, 1909

Böcker och vandrigar, 1910

Båge och lyra, 1912

Tyska utsikter, 1913

Nordiskt och klassiskt aforismer, 1914

Veri similia, 2 vols., 1915–16

Metron, 1918

Attiskt i fågelperspektiv, 1919

På hafsstranden, 1922

Sak och sken, 1922

Lefnadsstämmning, 1925

Väst-östligt: Tankar till en minnesdag, 1925

- Passioner emellan*, 1927
Lyra och Hades, 1930
Spår och tecken, 1930
Valda sidor och essays, 1908–1930, 1933
Det andra ljuset, 1935; as The Second Light, translated by Lennart Bruce, 1986
Elpidi, 1939
Concordia animi, 1942
Atticism, humanism, 1943; enlarged edition, 1946
Plus salis-, 1945
Prosa, edited by K.A.Svensson, 2 vols., 1952
Nya vakten, 1953
Saltet och Helichrysus: Atticism, humanism II, 1956
In silvis cum libro, 1957
Skoltal, ett urval aforismer, 1961
Campus et dies, 1963
Essayer och meditationer, 1901–1943, edited by Nils Gösta Valdén, 1978
Aforismer och sentenser, 1907–1949 (selections), 1980 Den ensammes stämningar: Artikler och dikter, 1898–1910 (includes poems), edited by Jonas Ellerström, 1984
 Other writings: seven volumes of poetry, and journals. Also translated Ralph Waldo Emerson's journal.

Further Reading

- Ekman, Rolf, Vilhelm Ekelunds Estetik, Lund: Gleerup, 1953
 Johannesson, Eric O., "Vilhelm Ekelund: Modernism and the Aesthetics of the Aphorism," Scandinavian Studies 56, no. 3 (Summer 1984): 213–34
 Naert, Pierre, Stilen i Vilhelm Ekelunds essayer och aforismer, Lund: Gleerup, 1949
 Sjöberg, Leif, and Niels Lyhne Jensen, "Early Scandinavian Symbolism," in The Symbolist Movement in the Literature of European Languages, edited by Anna Balakian, Budapest: Akademiai Kiado, 1982: 575–85
 Valdén, Nils Gösta, Inledning till Vilhelm Ekelund, Lund: Gleerup, 1965
 Werin, Algot, Vilhelm Ekelund, Lund: Gleerup, 2 vols., 1960–61

Eliot, George

British, 1819–1880

George Eliot produced over 60 essays and reviews, the majority of which were published in the period 1854–56, immediately preceding her novel-writing career. During this time she published regularly in two radical journals: the quarterly Westminster Review and the weekly Leader. She also contributed a smaller number of essays to the Saturday Review and Fraser's Magazine. The essays largely took the form of literary reviews, but the freedom of this genre allowed her to tackle issues beyond those of the literary as it is narrowly defined: for instance, she wrote a number of important essays on evangelism and religion (“Evangelical Teaching: Dr. Cumming,” 1855), women’s rights (“Woman in France,” 1854; “Margaret Fuller and Mary Wollstonecraft,” 1855), and philosophy (“R.W.Mackay’s Progress of the Intellect,” 1851; “The Future of German Philosophy,” 1855).

Eliot returned to the essay form in 1865 when she was invited to contribute some pieces to the Pall Mall Gazette and the Fornightly Review. These include a short piece on the importance of German philosophical culture, “A Word for the Germans,” and an essay on “The Logic of Servants,” an explanation of why the franchise should not be extended to the servant class, exposing her socially conservative political views. In 1868, Blackwood’s Edinburgh Magazine, the journal which had published most of her fiction, invited her to write an essay on the 1867 Reform Bill in the persona of Felix Holt, the hero of her hugely successful novel of the previous year. An essay steeped in organic metaphors, the “Address to Working Men, by Felix Holt” advises the newly enfranchised class of the gravity of their responsibility, and is a clear statement of the conservatism of her beliefs.

Eliot’s relationship with the Westminster Review began when she moved to London to seek an independent living after the death of her father. At this stage she had already published her translation of D.F. Strauss’ Das Leben Jesu (The Life of Jesus) and Spinoza’s Tractatus theologicopoliticus (Ethics). Later she translated Ludwig Feuerbach’s Das Wesen des Christenthums (The Essence of Christianity). Her translation work is significant for its introduction of German historical criticism, or Higher Criticism, into British intellectual culture. Through her friends in the Midlands she was introduced to the publisher John Chapman, who bought the Westminster Review in 1851. Eliot lodged with the Chapmans for a number of years, writing for the Review, and between 1852 and 1854 took over as managing editor, a position that gave her full editorial control.

Eliot’s essays from the 1854–56 period are noteworthy for their freshness and energy, the breadth of learning they display, their judiciousness, and also their wit and sometimes savage irony. The essay “Silly Novels by Lady Novelists” (1856) is characteristic of Eliot, the essayist, at her best and funniest. However, in critical opinion her achievement as an essayist is generally considered to pale beside that of her subsequent achievements as a novelist. When critical attention is focused on the essays, it is usually to consider them as precursors to her novels. Critics find in the essays the treatment of themes that dominate the novels (e.g. a critique of religious orthodoxies, the development of humanist notions of sympathy, and so on), and the development of stylistic qualities that come to characterize her mature novelistic techniques.

In the context of a literary history of the essay, however, Eliot is significant as one of the most intelligent and elegant practitioners of the genre in the mid-Victorian period. Moreover, the authoritative and sympathetic voice that she was able to assume within the essay form contributed to the development of her distinctive narrative style in the novels. Recent historicist and feminist critics have instigated a reassessment of the essays as works in their own right. In particular her essays on women have been analyzed as an expression of a formation of a distinctive feminist position—a conservative feminism that accepted women’s social inferiority but argued that women should share an equal moral and intellectual culture with men.

A number of essays from Eliot's notebooks have also been published (e.g. "Notes on Form in Art," wr. 1868; "How I Came to Write Fiction," wr. 1857). These pieces deal with technical and aesthetic issues of writing fiction and, together with pieces from her published essays (such as "The Natural History of German Life," 1856), have provided the basis for constructing Eliot's literary theory. The emphasis is largely on realism within fiction.

Also noteworthy is Eliot's last published work, The Impressions of Theophrastus Such (1879). This is a work that has received very little critical attention, possibly on account of its unusual generic status, on the borders of fiction and the essay: it is a series of short sketches written in the persona of bachelor clergyman Theophrastus Such. The essays deal with a variety of issues of topical interest from science, philosophy, and economics. Frequently obscure in their frames of reference and with little by way of a narrative to support them, they are a far cry from Eliot's two late masterpieces, Middlemarch (1872.) and Daniel Deronda (1876); critics have tended to dismiss them as a collection of unconnected essays. Nevertheless they share the intellectual preoccupations of the late works—broadly, a desire to write about the future—and it is significant that in the end it is the essay that provides Eliot with the formal flexibility she requires to consider this in some ways unwritable project.

JOSEPHINE McDONAGH

Biography

Born Mary Ann (later Marian) Evans, 22 November 1819 in Arbury, Warwickshire. Studied at Miss Lathom's school, Attleborough; Miss Wallington's school, Nuneaton, 1828–32; Misses Franklins' school, Coventry, 1832–35. Responsible for the family household after her mother's death, 1836; lived with her father in Foleshill, near Coventry, 1841–49; lived in Geneva, 1849–50; moved to London, 1851. Contributor, from 1851, and managing editor, 1852–54, the Westminster Review. Lived in Germany, 1854–55, Richmond, Surrey, 1855–60, and London, 1861–80. Lived with George Henry Lewes, from 1854 (died, 1878). Married John Walter Cross, 1880. Died (of pneumonia) in London, 22 December 1880.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

The Impressions of Theophrastus Such, 1879; edited by Nancy Henry, 1994, and D.J.Enright, 1995

Essays and Leaves from a Note-Book, edited by Charles Lee Lewes, 1884

Early Essays, 1919

Essays, edited by Thomas Pinney, 1963

A Writer's Notebook, 1854–1879, and Uncollected Writings (includes 16 essays and reviews), edited by Joseph Wiesenfarth, 1981

Selected Essays, Poems, and Other Writings, edited by A.S.Byatt and Nicholas Warren, 1990

Selected Critical Writings, edited by Rosemary Ashton, 1992

Other writings: seven novels (Adam Bede, 1859; The Mill on the Floss, 1860; Silas Marner, 1861; Romola, 1863; Felix Holt, 1866; Middlemarch, 1872; Daniel Deronda, 1876), the collection of stories Scenes of Clerical Life (1858), short stories, some poetry, and correspondence (collected in The George Eliot Letters, edited by Gordon S.Haight, 9 vols., 1954–78). Also translated works from the German.

Collected works edition: The Works, 21 vols., 1878–85(?).

Bibliographies

Fulmer, Constance M., George Eliot: A Reference Guide, Boston: Hall, 1977

Pangallo, Karen L., George Eliot: A Reference Guide, 1972–1987, Boston: Hall, 1990

Further Reading

Ashton, Rosemary, The German Idea: Four English Writers and the Reception of German Thought, 1800–1860, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1980

Beer, Gillian, George Eliot, Brighton: Harvester, and Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1986

Carroll, David, editor, George Eliot: The Critical Heritage, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, and New York: Barnes and Noble, 1971

Ermarth, Elizabeth Deeds, George Eliot, Boston: Twayne, 1985

Haight, Gordon S., George Eliot: A Biography, Oxford: Clarendon Press, and New York: Oxford University Press, 1968

Knoepflmacher, U.C., "George Eliot, Feuerbach and the Question of Criticism," Victorian Studies 7, no. 3 (1964):306–09

Myers, William, "George Eliot's Essays and Reviews," Prose Studies 1, no. 2 (1978): 5–20

Myers, William, The Teaching of George Eliot, Leicester: Leicester University Press, and Totowa, New Jersey: Barnes and Noble, 1984

Robbins, Bruce, The Servant's Hand: English Fiction from Below, New York: Columbia University Press, 1986

Semmel, Bernard, George Eliot and the Politics of National Inheritance, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1994

Shuttleworth, Sally, George Eliot and Nineteenth-Century Science: The Make-Believe of a Beginning, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1984

Stang, G.Robert, "The Voices of the Essayist," Nineteenth Century Fiction 35 (1980):312–30

Uglow, Jennifer, George Eliot, London: Virago, and New York: Pantheon, 1987

Vogeler, Martha S., "George Eliot and the Positivists," Nineteenth Century Fiction 35 (1980):406–31

Welsh, Alexander, George Eliot and Blackmail, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1985

Witemeyer, Hugh, George Eliot and the Visual Arts, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1979

Wright, T.R., "George Eliot and Positivism: A Reassessment," Modern Language Review 76 (1981):257-72

Eliot, T.S.

American/British, 1888-1965

The most influential and, arguably, the most important poet writing in English in the 20th century, T.S.Eliot was also a master essayist. As significant, for contemporary readers, writers, scholars, and teachers of literature in English as his thematic and stylistic innovations in Modernist poetry were his critical analyses and gnomic pronouncements in numerous essays, several of which have become classics of the genre: "Tradition and the Individual Talent" (1919), "Hamlet" (1919), "The Metaphysical Poets" (1921), "The Function of Criticism" (1923), "Dante" (1929), "Milton I" (1936), "What Is a Classic?" (1945), "To Criticize the Critic" (1961), and many more. Beyond literary criticism, there are also Eliot's essays on sociological, educational, and theological subjects: "Thoughts After Lambeth" (1931) and "Modern Education and the Classics" (1932), for example. Two longer works of this kind, The Idea of a Christian Society (1939) and Notes Towards the Definition of Culture (1948) are properly classified as extended essays. Furthermore, in the way of articles and reviews, in the 60 years from 1905 to his death, Eliot contributed some 600 pieces to periodicals such as the Little Review and the Times Literary Supplement. As editor of the Criterion, Eliot was able to nurture the careers of other essayists, just as he promoted the works of younger poets at Faber and Faber.

In his literary-critical essays, especially those gathered in his most important collection, Selected Essays (1932; revised and enlarged, 1934, 1951), Eliot's principal purpose is "the elucidation of works of art and the correction of taste" ("The Function of Criticism"). Most of the "works of art" to which he refers are from the English Renaissance and the "correction of taste" which he would accomplish is that to which he aspired in his own poetry: the eradication of the prevailing hegemony of Romantic priorities and practices (in their Edwardian and Georgian forms) in literary criticism and creativity. However, Eliot wanted to revive not only the appreciation of the artistry of the 17th-century poets, dramatists, and prose writers, but something, too, of the spirit of their cohesive civilization (as he envisaged it) in the fragmented modern world of The Waste Land.

So when Eliot defined "the general point of view" of his "Essays on Style and Order," For Lancelot Andrewes (1928), as "classicist in literature, royalist in politics, and anglocatholic in religion," his inspiration for these convictions came from Jacobean and Caroline England, in the lives and works of such as Andrewes himself, a translator of the Authorized Version of the Bible (1611), and Bishop of Winchester, whose sermons Eliot celebrates for their harmony of "intellect and sensibility" ("Lancelot Andrewes"). Later in the 17th century, however, in the discord of the Civil War, Eliot identified "a dissociation of sensibility...from which we have never recovered" ("The Metaphysical Poets”). This was not merely literary, but cultural and spiritual as well.

The association of “ordnance, or arrangement and structure, precision in the use of words, and relevant intensity” that Eliot admired in Andrewes’ sermons is to be found in his own essays. They exhibit the combination of carefully evolved frameworks of argument (Eliot had begun as a philosopher), intellectual acuteness (seasoned with provocative aperçus), and impassioned assessment. Eliot’s is a prose decidedly not written, as Milton claimed his to be, with the poet’s “left hand.” His intended readership was those with a measure of his own literary culture. Many examples are occasional pieces, such as reviews. Yet as Eliot emerged as the premier poet of the modern age, his prose writings were also disseminated to a wider audience. The brilliant insights and sweeping generalizations achieved the status of canon law, and toward the end of his life Eliot confessed to having been dogged by his quotable pronouncements long after they had ceased to be adequate statements of his convictions (“To Criticize the Critic”).

The famous essay of 1919, “Tradition and the Individual Talent,” is a case in point, its very title being a credal statement about the combination and tension between received and innovative elements in literature. It first appeared in the Egoist and contains an untranslated quotation from Aristotle and references to Homer and Dante, in combination with Modernist convictions about objectivity in creativity and criticism—revolutionary by the literary standards of the time. Eliot’s procedure enacts his thesis, culminating in the declaration: “Poetry is not a turning loose of emotion, but an escape from emotion; it is not the expression of personality, but an escape from personality. But, of course, only those who have personality and emotions know what it means to want to escape from these things.”

Such dicta transformed literary criticism in the 20th century, as Eliot enunciated the precepts by which his own poetry—with its wry, ironic, and fastidious detachment—could be enjoyed: “the more perfect the artist, the more completely separate in him will be the man who suffers and the mind which creates.” The confrontation of the classical ideal and Romantic experience which Eliot constructs in his essays, and the refinement of the latter by the former, is the leitmotif of his theory: “Tennyson and Browning are poets, and they think; but they do not feel their thought as immediately as the odour of a rose. A thought to Donne was an experience; it modified his sensibility” (“The Metaphysical Poets”).

Eliot’s individualistic essays, that is to say, in their iconoclastically legislative character, belong to “the tradition,” as represented in the 19th century by Matthew Arnold’s Essays in Criticism (1865–88) and, in the 18th, by Samuel Johnson’s Lives of the English Poets (1779–81). In “Hamlet,” for example, Eliot employs the quasi-Arnoldian touchstone of the “objective correlative” to pronounce, with a Johnsonian absoluteness, Shakespeare’s tragedy a failure. This judgment, as startling as Johnson’s repudiation of Milton’s “Lycidas,” derives from Eliot’s conviction that there is not “a set of objects, a situation, a chain of events” (that is, an “objective correlative”) to justify the emotion of the central character. Hamlet is “dominated by an emotion which...is in excess of the facts as they appear.”

With Milton, Eliot dealt even more rudely. F.R. Leavis, the Cambridge critic who was a principal purveyor of Eliot’s poetry and literary criticism, summarized (approvingly) the devastating effect of Eliot’s assessment, culminating in the essay of 1936, “Milton I”:

“Milton’s dislodgment, in the past decade, after his two centuries of predominance, was effected with remarkably little fuss. The irresistible argument was, of course, Mr. Eliot’s creative achievement; it gave his few critical asides—potent, it is true, by context—their finality” (“Milton’s Verse,” 1936). The matter was not finalized, however. In “Milton II” (1947), Eliot substantially repudiated his earlier indictments. Here and elsewhere, we can trace the evolution of his thought in the sequence of his essays.

Leavis took a phrase from Eliot—his definition of the collaborative process of literary criticism as “the common pursuit of true judgement” (“The Function of Criticism”)—for the title of his critical collection, The Common Pursuit (1952), which was one of several studies by scholars and, perhaps more importantly, teachers of international stature and influence who propagated Eliot’s precepts in the universities in the mid-20th century. Their graduates took these ideas into the secondary schools to the point where, for two or three generations, Eliot’s literary-critical essays were formative and formidable across the gamut of English studies. The origin of the so-called “New Criticism” of the 1940s, for example, may be traced to the Cambridge of Leavis, I.A.Richards, and William Empson of the 1920s, and they had taken their cue from Eliot.

The breadth of Eliot’s subject matter in his essays, beyond literary criticism, must be emphasized. In “Second Thoughts About Humanism” (1929), for example, the philosopher is to the fore; in “The Aims of Education” (1950), the cultural critic and theologian; while in “Marie Lloyd” (1923), an essay on “the greatest music-hall artist of her time,” we are struck by Eliot’s humanity.

His two long essays remain to be mentioned. The Idea of a Christian Society began as a series of lectures at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, in March 1939, which were published later that year. Eliot reflects, in the months leading up to World War II, on the future of Western civilization bereft of Christian spirituality. The Idea of a Christian Society is a valuable aid to the understanding of some of the themes in Eliot’s last important poetic work, Four Quartets (1936–42).

Eliot introduces Notes Towards the Definition of Culture (1948) as an “essay” which he began in the closing stages of the war, after completing the Quartets. It is, as he says, a piece of “social criticism.” Again, it is the centrality of religion in the development and sustenance of culture which is his theme: “no culture has appeared or developed except together with a religion.” Although by this period in his life Eliot had attained the status of a sage, having acquired the Nobel Prize and been admitted to the Order of Merit (both in 1948), his conservative views in these essays did not achieve popular acceptance.

The influence of Eliot’s essays today, especially in what remains of the discipline of English Literature, is negligible. In the 21st century—like Arnold’s Essays and Johnson’s Lives now—they will probably be regarded only as historical curiosities. Yet, like the essays of those earlier masters, Eliot’s will remain exemplary for their style—erudite, stimulating, and, above all, readable. To paraphrase the closing observation of his essay on “John Dryden” (1921), Eliot is one of those who have set standards for English prose which it is desperate to ignore.

BARRY SPURR

Biography

Thomas Stearns Eliot. Born 26 September 1888 in St. Louis, Missouri. Studied at Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1906–10, 1911–14, A.B., 1909, A.M. in English, 1910; the Sorbonne, Paris, 1910–11; Merton College, Oxford, 1914–15. Married Vivienne Haigh-Wood, 1915 (separated, 1933; died, 1947). Taught at English schools, 1915–17; worked for Lloyd's Bank, London, 1917–25. Assistant editor, the Egoist, London, 1917–19; contributor, the Times Literary Supplement, London, from 1919, and the Athenaeum; founding editor, the Criterion, London, 1922–39. Editor, later director, Faber and Gwyer, 1925–28, and Faber and Faber publishers, London, 1929–65. Became a British citizen, 1927. Editorial board member, New English Weekly, London, 1934–44, and Christian News Letter, Oxford, 1939–46. Charles Eliot Norton Professor of Poetry, 1932–33, and Theodore Spencer Memorial Lecturer, 1950, Harvard University. Married Valerie Fletcher, 1957. Awards: Nobel Prize for Literature, 1948; Order of Merit, 1948; New York Drama Critics Circle Award, 1950; Hanseatic-Goethe Prize (Hamburg), 1954; Dante Gold Medal (Florence), 1959; Order of Merit (Bonn), 1959; Emerson-Thoreau Medal, 1960; U.S. Medal of Freedom, 1964; honorary degrees from 19 universities; Honorary Fellow, Magdalene College, Cambridge, 1948, and Merton College, Oxford, 1949; Officer, Legion of Honor, and Commander, Order of Arts and Letters (France), 1950. Died in London, 4 January 1965.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

The Sacred Wood: Essays on Poetry and Criticism, 1920

Homage to John Dryden: Three Essays on Poetry of the Seventeenth Century, 1924

For Lancelot Andrewes: Essays on Style and Order, 1928

John Dryden: The Poet, the Dramatist, the Critic, 1932

Selected Essays, 1917–32, 1932; revised, enlarged editions, 1934, 1951

The Use of Poetry and the Use of Criticism (lectures), 1933

After Strange Gods: A Primer of Modern Heresy (lectures), 1934

Elizabethan Essays, 1934; revised edition, as Essays on Elizabethan Drama, 1956; as Elizabethan Dramatists, 1963

Essays Ancient and Modern, 1936

The Idea of a Christian Society (lectures), 1939

Notes Towards the Definition of Culture, 1948

Selected Prose, edited by John Hayward, 1953

On Poetry and Poets, 1957

To Criticize the Critic and Other Writings, 1965

Selected Prose, edited by Frank Kermode, 1975

Other writings: several collections of poetry (including Prufrock and Other Observations, 1917; The Waste Land, 1922; Four Quartets, 1936–42; collected in Complete Poems and Plays, 1969), seven plays (including Murder in the Cathedral, 1935; The Family Reunion, 1939; The Cocktail Party, 1950), and works on literature and writers.

Bibliographies

- Gallup, Donald, T.S.Eliot: A Bibliography, London: Faber, 1952; revised edition, Faber, and New York: Harcourt Brace, 1969
- Gunter, Bradley, The Merrill Checklist of T.S.Eliot, Columbus, Ohio: Merrill, 1970
- Martin, Mildred, A Half-Century of Eliot Criticism: An Annotated Bibliography of Books and Articles in English, 1916–1965, Lewisburg, Pennsylvania: Bucknell University Press, and London: Kaye and Ward, 1972
- Ricks, Beatrice, T.S. Eliot: A Bibliography of Secondary Works, Metuchen, New Jersey: Scarecrow Press, 1980

Further Reading

- Asher, Kenneth, T.S.Eliot and Ideology, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1995
- Bergonzi, Bernard, T.S.Eliot, London: Macmillan, 1978 (original edition, 1972)
- Freed, Lewis, T.S.Eliot: The Critic as Philosopher, West Lafayette, Indiana: Purdue University Press, 1979
- Good, Graham, "T.S.Eliot: The Process of Refinement," in his The Observing Self: Rediscovering the Essay, London and New York: Routledge, 1988:135–51
- Gray, Piers, T.S.Eliot's Intellectual and Poetic Development, 1909–1922, Brighton: Harvester, and Atlantic Highlands, New Jersey: Humanities Press, 1982
- Jain, Manju, T.S.Eliot and American Philosophy: The Harvard Years, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1992
- Kojecky, Roger, T.S.Eliot's Social Criticism, London: Faber, and New York: Farrar Straus, 1971
- Margolis, John, T.S.Eliot's Intellectual Development, 1922–1939, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1972
- Newton-de Molina, David, editor, The Literary Criticism of T.S. Eliot: New Essays, London: Athlone Press, 1977
- Rajan, Balachandra, editor, T.S.Eliot: A Study of His Writings by Several Hands, London: Dobson, 1947; New York: Haskell House, 1964
- Ricks, Christopher, T.S. Eliot and Prejudice, London: Faber, and Berkeley: University of California Press, 1988
- Schwartz, Sanford, The Matrix of Modernism: Pound, Eliot, and Early Twentieth-Century Thought, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1985

Emerson, Ralph Waldo

American, 1803–1882

Ralph Waldo Emerson is undoubtedly the premier essayist in American literary history. Over a period of 34 years he produced a remarkable series of essays which expressed a unique literary philosophy characterized by the critic Harold Bloom (in Agon, 1982) as a “literary religion” that did nothing less than express the mythology of America itself. The buoyant spirit, the philosophical light touch, and the pithy diction Emerson injected into his numerous and diverse essays signified what Oliver Wendell Holmes described (particularly in regard to “Man Thinking, or the American Scholar,” but applicable to all the essays of “the Yankee Sage”) as “America’s Declaration of Independence,” its liberation from the long shadow of the dominance of European literary styles and modes of expression. His influence on subsequent American writers—Walt Whitman, William Carlos Williams, Wallace Stevens, Robert Frost, F.Scott Fitzgerald, Willa Cather, Gertrude Stein, and others—is virtually immeasurable. Emerson provided the foundation for the emphasis on immediate experience in the thought of the philosophers John Dewey and William James and for the spirit of the pragmatic movement in philosophy in general. Emerson was at the heart of the then new focus on individuality, on what he called “the sovereign individual.” This influence even extended to the radical German philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche, who referred to him as “the author richest in ideas of this century.” Walt Whitman was stimulated by Emerson’s stress on the promise of the future, his respect for the “common man,” and the transformative power of the poetic spirit. He endeavored to emulate the ideal poet depicted in Emerson’s edifying essay, “The Poet” (1844).

By the time the first edition of his complete works was published in 1903–04, Emerson’s international reputation was already established. Moreover, his essays have had an unusual appeal to a large and diverse audience of general readers. This is no doubt due to the nontechnical and accessible nature of his essays. One of the leading figures in the transcendentalist movement in American literature, Emerson received recognition and serious treatment from literary critics in his own time and well into the 20th century. And, over the last 15 years or so, he has undergone a significant, positive, and sophisticated reappraisal at the hands of a host of critics as a thinker, essayist, and poet. He is generally considered the quintessential American writer.

Emerson’s earliest essay, Nature, was published in book form in 1836 and soon after was christened “the Bible of New England Transcendentalism.” Despite its sometimes murky metaphysical idealism, Nature clearly announced the emergence of a new voice in American literature. In addition to a celebration of the salutary value of communing with nature and the elevation of the affirmative spiritual dimension of life (through the persona of the Orphic poet), Emerson presented a condensed theory of signs that anticipated some aspects of recent semiotics. As if foreshadowing his own rich use of metaphorical imagery in his later essays, Emerson called attention to our natural reliance on analogy in ordinary language, literature, poetry, and philosophical thinking. Language is construed in Nature as pervaded by anthropomorphic metaphors and the natural world itself is described as “a metaphor of the human mind.” There is a “correspondence” between spirit and nature that is reflected in the metaphorical language by which we describe the one in images derived from the other. This general orientation colors many of his later essays insofar as moods are metaphorically expressed and invariably suggest a metaphysics or world view.

Already in Nature Emerson’s ability to create pithy sentences, coin ingenious tropes, and produce compressed insights is apparent. Entire theories are compacted into quotable sentences: “Nature’s dice are always loaded.” “Nature is so pervaded with human life that there is something of humanity in all and every particular.” “The corruption of man is followed by the corruption of language.” Thinking of humankind’s capacity to transform the world by means of its power of spiritual transcendence, Emerson proclaims that “The kingdom of man over nature” is “a dominion such as now is beyond his dream of God.” Edifying prose, bracing optimism, and the centrality of subjective experience, which characterize so many of Emerson’s essays, are already discernible features of his writing. Nature is so passionately devoted to the potentialities of humankind which have not yet been realized that, as Harold Bloom has said, it might as well be entitled “Man.”

In his Essays, First Series (1841) and Essays, Second Series (1844) Emerson’s thought and expression are clear and incisive. He is the master of the aperçu, the arresting trope. His essays have a speech-like character—several are slightly revised or polished lectures or orations, a characteristic often linked to his earlier practice, as a former Unitarian minister, of carefully preparing sermons. Emerson’s prose has a distinctive poetic quality, a prophetic tone. He displays in his essays an unusual talent for epigrammatic statement. Many of his taut sentences are eminently quotable and some of his phrases have long since passed into common English parlance: “the shot heard around the world,” “the devil’s attorney” (as “the devil’s advocate”), “a minority of one,” “a foolish consistency is the hobgoblin of little minds.” The richness of his language and the thematic content of his essays disclose his ability to compress thoughts, to attain an accessible condensation of ideas derived from a variety of disparate domains. The American critic Malcolm Cowley, in his introduction to The Portable Emerson (1981), said that Emerson created “sentences” in the Latin sense of the term: “ideas briefly and pungently expressed as axioms.” Some of his chiseled sentences are both profound and immediately persuasive, as this, from “Self-Reliance”: “In every work of genius we recognize our own rejected thoughts; they come back to us with a certain alienated majesty.” Or this, from “Fate”: “Life is an ecstasy.”

Emerson typically expresses in his essays, with striking rhetorical force and verve, a complexity of ideas that is not so much (as critics have often charged) a catena of contradictions as it is lucid perceptions and expressions of dialectical oppositions, a multiplicity of perspectives. With regard to the shifting standpoints typically found in virtually all of his essays, what Emerson said in “Montaigne” (1850) about the French prototype of the modern prose essay, the Essais, applies to his own writings as well: “An angular dogmatic house would be rent to chip and splinter in this storm of many elements.” He was quite aware of being perceived as never having constructed a conceptual foundation for the flurry of ideas he spun out in his essays; he once remarked that it was his “love of truth” which led him to abstain from propounding dogmatic absolutes. Emerson’s essays reveal a habit of provisional, experimental thinking, a flexibility of mind, an impressionistic mode of reflection clothed in metaphorical expression. He was cognizant of the limits of language and sensitive to the “unspeakable” encountered in experience which eludes precise linguistic determination or articulation. Although he was by no means an uncritical mystic, Emerson evoked the mystery of existence, comparing it to a more perplexing version of the riddle of the sphinx. His writings often point to the wonder of the protean metamorphoses in nature. In “Circles” he celebrates, rather than bemoans, the impermanence of things, ideas, arts, of what is prized, of people, of life itself, affirming the fluidity, volatility, and circular patterns in the world. In “The American Scholar” (1837) he embraces a nature in which “there is never a beginning, never an end, to the inexplicable continuity of this web of God, but always circular power returning into itself.”

Perhaps because of his experience in delivering hundreds of lectures as a participant in the 19th-century Lyceum movement for cultural enrichment, in his essays Emerson seems to “speak” directly to the reader, to be seeking existential communication, to try to stimulate, in a Socratic manner, reflective self-consciousness. His aim is not merely to entertain or charm his readers; rather he encourages them to cultivate “self-trust,” to become what they ought to be, to be open to the internal, private, intuitive, and reflective world of experience. His oracular, “uplifting” rhetoric seems to serve, in an indirect way, a psychagogic purpose. Many of his essays are motivational exhortations to seek the good, the better, the best. Over a hundred years later they still have the power, when read in a receptive mood, to stir in the reader a powerful sense of the possible.

Aside from Nature, it is generally held that the essays of the first series show Emerson at the peak of his form, fully in control of his aphoristic powers. The works in this collection reveal a mastery of style and a confident execution of intention not readily apparent in his last collection of essays, Society and Solitude (1870). There is no doubt that style and intellectual content are synergistically combined in “Self-Reliance,” “Compensation,” “History,” and “Circles” (all 1841). However, some of the essays in the second series—in particular the striking characterization of the nature of the poetic impulse and the invocation of the liberating artist in “The Poet,” as well as the trenchant discourse on the relativity of perspective and subjectivity in “Experience”—are sprightly and convincing. In “Politics” Emerson shows himself to be the opposite of naive by hurling barbs at what is deceptive, fraudulent, and corrupt in the political atmosphere of his day.

In his portraits of various types of men in Representative Men (1850), Emerson alters his style and approach to his material somewhat and, with the exception of a surprisingly weak depiction of Shakespeare, displays a talent for literary portraiture. “Montaigne; or, the Skeptic” is a sympathetic and perceptive depiction of the man and his writings. Of the Essays Emerson tersely but aptly observes that in them we find “the language of conversation transferred to a book.” “Napoleon; or, the Man of the World” is an insightful summary of the positive and negative traits of this “thoroughly modern man” whose virtues, Emerson suggests, are almost deleted by his faults, “who proposed to himself simply a brilliant career, without any stipulation or scruple concerning the means.”

In the book-length series of essays comprising English Traits (1856), Emerson tries to do for the collective character of the English in the mid-19th century what he had done for Plato, Montaigne, Napoleon, and others in Representative Men. English Traits is a departure from his usual essay form and indicates an unsuspected versatility of style and tone. The essays comprising this collection are almost reportorial, casual, friendly toward their subject, but occasionally gently ironic, even witty.

Although the essays comprising The Conduct of Life (1860) have often been minimized in relation to the first and second series of Essays, they can be powerful, surprisingly sharp and biting pieces. Essays such as “Fate,” “Culture,” “Power,” and the barbed “Considerations by the Way” serve to dispel the traditional, projected image of Emerson as sentimental, “genteel,” “naive,” “starry-eyed,” and excessively idealistic. In these essays he concentrates more on content than on form, more on the negative aspects of existence than on the positive, more on a hard-headed realism than edifying discourses. We see in them another aspect of “the Sage of Concord,” one that emphasizes the limitation of our powers, the force of circumstances, the dangers inherent in an emerging mass society. In “Power,” we find the man called “the philosopher of the common man” praising uncommon creative artists (such as Michelangelo and Leonardo) for their energy, surplus power, and boldness. The prose hymn to “The Over-Soul” in the first series of Essays is replaced in The Conduct of Life by a decidedly this-worldly emphasis. Transcendentalism seems to be replaced by an immanent cultural idealism which nonetheless advocates a “sacred courage” in face of the terrible aspects of existence. Nature, humanity, and life are seen from a darker, but not yet pessimistic, point of view.

It is generally believed that the death of his first wife Ellen Tucker at the age of 19, the loss of his six-year-old son, Waldo, and of his two brothers—over a period of a decade—made him painfully aware of the negative aspects of existence. Nonetheless, he continued to produce incisive, carefully crafted essays. Whether his later essays were informed by painful personal experiences or not, Emerson was always prone to extend the range of his interests and adopt multiple perspectives on nature, humankind, society, and life. Invariably he disclosed the oppositions, paradoxes, polarities, and stupendous “antagonisms” in reality.

The pungency, rhetorical power, and insightfulness of Emerson’s essays, as well as his affirmation of “the constant fact of Life” in the face of limitations, imperfections, and the vicissitudes of fate, show him to have been a sensitive, perceptive, and persuasive literary philosopher. In terms of his supreme mastery of the essay genre, the immediacy of his communication with his readers, and his ability to express profound insights in accessible language, Emerson could, with only slight exaggeration, be characterized as the Montaigne of America.

GEORGE J. STACK

Biography

Born 25 May 1803 in Boston. Studied at Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, A.B., 1821; Harvard Divinity School, 1825, 1827. Schoolmaster during the 1820s.

Married Ellen Tucker, 1829 (died, 1831). Assistant pastor, then pastor, Old Second Church, Boston, 1829–32. Traveled to Europe, 1832–33, meeting and becoming lifelong friends with Thomas Carlyle. Lyceum lecturer, after 1833. Moved to Concord, Massachusetts, 1834. Married Lydia Jackson, 1835: two sons (one died as a child) and two daughters. Leader of the transcendentalists, from 1836; contributor, 1849–44, and editor, 1842–44, the Dial transcendentalist periodical. Active abolitionist during the 1850s. Awards: honorary degree from Harvard University. Died (of pneumonia) in Concord, 27 April 1882.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Nature, 1836; facsimile reprint, 1985; edited by Kenneth Walter Cameron, 1940, and Warner Berthoff, 1968

Essays, 1841; revised, enlarged edition, as Essays: First Series, 1847

Essays, Second Series, 1844; revised edition, 1850

Orations, Lectures, and Addresses, 1844

Nature: Addresses and Lectures, 1849; ^{as} Miscellanies: Embracing Nature, Addresses, and Lectures, 1856; as Miscellanies, 1884

Representative Men: Seven Lectures, 1850; edited by Pamela Schirmeister, 1995

English Traits, 1856; edited by Howard Mumford Jones, 1966

The Conduct of Life, 1860

May-Day and Other Pieces, 1867

Prose Works, 3 vols., 1868–78(?)

Society and Solitude, 1870

Letters and Social Aims, 1876

The Senses and the Soul, and Moral Sentiment in Religion: Two Essays, 1884

Two Unpublished Essays: The Character of Socrates, The Present State of Ethical Philosophy, 1896

Uncollected Writings: Essays, Addresses, Poems, Reviews and Letters, edited by Charles C. Bigelow, 1912

Uncollected Lectures, edited by Clarence Gohdes, 1932

Young Emerson Speaks: Unpublished Discourses on Many Subjects, edited by Arthur Cushman McGiffert, Jr., 1938

The Portable Emerson, edited by Mark Van Doren, 1946; revised edition, edited by Carl Bode and Malcolm Cowley, 1981

Selections, edited by Stephen E. Whicher, 1957

Early Lectures, edited by Stephen E. Whicher, Robert E. Spiller, and Wallace E. Williams, 3 vols., 1959–72

Literary Criticism, edited by Eric W. Carlson, 1979

Selected Essays, edited by Larzer Ziff, 1982

Essays and Lectures, edited by Joel Porte, 1983

Complete Sermons, 4 vols., 1989–91

Selected Writings, edited by Brooks Atkinson, 1992

Self-Reliance, and Other Essays, 1993

Nature and Other Writings, edited by Peter Turner, 1994

Antislavery Writings, edited by Len Gougeon and Joel Myerson, 1995

Other writings: poetry, letters, and journals (collected in Journals and Miscellaneous Notebooks, edited by William H. Gilman and others, 16 vols., 1960–83). Collected works editions: Complete Works (Centenary Edition), edited by Edward Waldo Emerson, 12 vols., 1903–04; Collected Works (Harvard Edition), edited by Alfred R. Ferguson, 5 vols., 1971–94 (in progress).

Bibliographies

- Boswell, Jeanetta, Emerson and the Critics: A Checklist of Criticism, 1900–15177, Metuchen, New Jersey: Scarecrow Press, 1979
- Burkholder, Robert E., Emerson: An Annotated Bibliography of Criticism, 1980–1991, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1994
- Burkholder, Robert E., and Joel Myerson, Emerson: An Annotated Secondary Bibliography, Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1985
- Myerson, Joel, Emerson: A Descriptive Bibliography, Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1982
- Putz, Manfred, Ralph Waldo Emerson: A Bibliography of Twentieth-Century Criticism, New York: Lang, 1986

Further Reading

- Allen, Gay Wilson, Waldo Emerson: A Biography, New York: Viking Press, 1981
- Atwan, Robert, “‘Ecstasy & Eloquence’: The Method of Emerson’s Essays,” in Essays on the Essay: Redefining the Genre, edited by Alexander Butrym, Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1989
- Bishop, Jonathan, Emerson on the Soul, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1964
- Buell, Lawrence, Literary Transcendentalism: Style and Vision in the American Renaissance, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1973
- Cavell, Stanley, Conditions Handsome and Unhandsome: The Constitution of Emersonian Perfectionism, La Salle, Illinois: Open Court, 1990
- Cheyfitz, Eric, The Trans-Parent: Sexual Politics in the Language of Emerson, Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1981
- Ellison, Julie, Emerson’s Romantic Style, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1984
- Hughes, Gertrude Reif, Emerson’s Demanding Optimism, Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1984
- Konvitz, Milton R., editor, The Recognition of Ralph Waldo Emerson: Selected Criticism Since 1837, Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1972
- Michael, John, Emerson and Skepticism: The Cipher of the World, Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1988
- Packer, B.L., Emerson’s Fall: A New Interpretation of the Major Essays, New York: Continuum, 1982
- Paul, Sherman, Emerson’s Angle of Vision: Man and Nature in American Experience, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1952
- Porte, Joel, Representative Man: Ralph Waldo Emerson in His Time, New York: Oxford

University Press, 1979

Richardson, Robert D., Jr., Emerson: The Mind on Fire: A Biography, Berkeley:

University of California Press, 1995

Robinson, David, Apostle of Culture: Emerson as Preacher and Lecturer, Philadelphia:

University of Pennsylvania Press, 1982

Stack, George J., Nietzsche and Emerson: An Elective Affinity, Athens: Ohio University

Press, 1992

Thurin, Erik Ingvar, Emerson as Priest of Pan: A Study in the Metaphysics of Sex,

Lawrence: Regents Press of Kansas, 1981

Van Veer, David, Emerson's Epistemology: The Argument of the Essays, Cambridge:

Cambridge University Press, 1986

Whicher, Stephen E., Freedom and Fate: An Inner Life of Ralph Waldo Emerson,

Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1953

Yoder, R.A., Emerson and the Orphic Poet in America, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1978

Encyclopedias and the Essay

Encyclopedias, or comprehensive systems of learning, developed independently of one another in three distinct cultural traditions in Europe, the Near East, and the Orient. The earliest Chinese encyclopedia is recorded in 220 CE but has been completely lost; part of the text of its successor, the Bian zhu (String of pearls of literature), survives and was followed by at least eight other attempts before the appearance in the late 13th century of the Wen xian tong kao (General study of literary remains). The first Arabic encyclopedia is the 9th-century work of Ibn Qutayba, arranged in ten books, each with a defining topic: power, war, nobility, character, eloquence, asceticism, friendship, prayer, food, and women. European encyclopedia-making has its generally accepted origins in Pliny's Historia naturalis (Natural history) in 77 CE.

The word "encyclopedia" was first used by Paul Scalich in 1559, the term "cyclopedia" having been employed initially by Joachim Sterck van Ringelbergh in 1541. Both are derived from the Greek and translate as a "cycle of learning." There are easily hundreds of examples of compilations which could be loosely described as encyclopedias, deriving from all literary traditions from as early as 350 BCE. They share the common purpose of bringing together in one source their culture's accumulated learning, but few if any of these efforts provide a unifying philosophical context for the knowledge they catalogue. Encyclopedias continued to be no more than "strings of pearls" until well into the 18th century, when in the West, the phenomenon of the periodical essay had a great impact on the format and especially on the ideology of encyclopediamaking. At that point the seminal European examples of the encyclopedia appeared under the editorship of Denis Diderot in France and of William Smellie in Scotland, relying on the essay to anchor and give to the encyclopedia the integrity of a true literary construct. Such works continued to be ambitiously comprehensive in content and elaborately schematic in structure, but the whole was made to give place to the part; these encyclopedias are distinguished not for their general attempt to embrace all learning but for the particular achievement of individual contributions on discrete topics. This essayistic approach to compiling encyclopedias, working as it does from part to whole, characterizes all the national encyclopedias which appeared throughout the 19th and early 20th centuries.

Increasingly in the 17th century, beginning with Francis Bacon's plan for the Instauratio magna (1620), which sets out new principles for schematizing learning, and culminating in Pierre Bayle's Dictionnaire historique et critique (1697; An Historical and Critical Dictionary), the first truly "modern" work of this kind, encyclopedias in Europe incorporated the sensibility of the rationalists and became more scientific in their structure and content. But even the influential work of Ephraim Chambers, whose Cyclopaedia (1728) would inspire both Diderot and Smellie, lacked a strong editorial direction; Bayle and Chambers still relied on the traditional illusion of inclusiveness, the impression that their work was exhaustive in its scholarship, to assert their credentials. It was the weight of their learning rather than any professional expertise and opinions that distinguished their efforts. Theirs remained notably the achievements of individuals, encyclopedias produced by the prodigious labors of one man, not the cooperative discourse of a society of scholars and practitioners.

By the mid-18th century, quite a different sort of approach to compiling encyclopedias began to emerge. Innovations appeared in three areas: a new emphasis on the trades and professions with their technical and applied learning; a collaborative approach that enlisted some 160 contributors to Diderot's Encyclopédie (1751–72,); and the editorial choice of the essay to embrace the more important and controversial entries with an individualistic and even polemical tone that challenges the reader to reflection rather than simply providing information. Diderot recruited an international body of experts to write essays that argued theoretical positions often at the expense of facts and particulars, as was the case with Rousseau's notorious entry on Music, a discussion which continues to matter not for what it tells us about music but for what it reveals about Rousseau. Many of the articles Diderot solicited assumed socially and politically critical stances, employing the style of the polemical essay to attack the notion of privilege in European society. The essay as it developed after Montaigne and Bacon, with its emphasis upon the values of the written word and upon subjectively contextualizing its topics, makes possible during the Enlightenment a style of encyclopedia-making that is more critical, more aggressive, and more literary.

The Encyclopaedia Britannica made its first appearance in 1768 in Edinburgh, issued in parts. The editor, William Smellie, compiled much of the material himself, although he seems to have been aided in the original articles by fellow Scot and historian Gilbert Stuart. Smellie's approach to the encyclopedia was novel in one very important respect: as a practicing journalist, distinguished essayist, and recent editor of the Scots Magazine, he compiled the Britannica using the methods of periodical journalism. Smellie mixed in brief factual entries and definitions with long specialized essays written in the periodical style. The article on Medicine is over 100 pages long and closely reflects the essayistic method prevalent in magazine writing in the mid-18th century. In fact, Smellie conceived the Britannica in a periodical format; his first prospectus suggested an ongoing publication, the total number of parts not predetermined. He argued with his partners about this and the paper size; he wanted octavo, the printing size of magazines, but his partners prevailed and the Encyclopaedia was issued in three volumes, quarto. Still Smellie compiled and composed as if he were publishing a periodical paper, and each of the first Britannica's 100 issues has the feel of a magazine.

The Encyclopaedia Britannica owes as much to the influence of the periodical press in the early 18th century as it does to the example of the French encyclopedists. Beginning with John Dunton's innovation, a question-and-answer periodical called the Athenian Gazette (1690–97), English popular journalism displayed a recurrent interest in collecting and disseminating technical and cultural knowledge through periodical essays. Most magazines carried regular columns on medicine, science, and literature, through which the editors provided serialized compilation on various topics which, taken together, comprised crucial popular reference works. William Smellie's own essays on medical and scientific topics written, extracted, and compiled for the Scots Magazine between 1760 and 1765 were a rudimentary version of what he would do for the first edition of the Encyclopaedia Britannica, and Dunton's stunning popular success with the Athenian Gazette did much to influence Ephraim Chambers in his undertaking of the Encyclopaedia in the 1720s.

As the encyclopedia became a European phenomenon through the later 18th, 19th, and 20th centuries, the essay remained its dominant literary feature, and national encyclopedias whose knowledge and learning are now out of date continue to be important historical and cultural documents, because they contain seminal examples of the writing of important figures in the genre of the essay.

STEPHEN W. BROWN

Further Reading

Collison, Robert, Encyclopaedias: Their History Throughout the Ages, New York: Hafner, 1964

Darnton, Robert, The Business of Enlightenment: A Publishing History of the Encyclopédie (1775–1800), Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1979

Kafker, Frank A., "Notable Encyclopedias of the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries: Nine Predecessors of the Encyclopédie," Studies on Voltaire 194 (1981)

Kafker, Frank A., "Encyclopédie," in The Blackwell Companion to the Enlightenment, edited by John W. Yolton and others, Oxford: Blackwell, 1991:145–50

Enzensberger, Hans Magnus

German, 1929–

Called "Germany's most important literary catalyst" by the New York Times Book Review in 1968, the contemporary poet, essayist, and political moralist Hans Magnus Enzensberger made his literary debut in 1955, when he was first invited to join the Gruppe 47, and with the publication of the poetry collections Verteidigung der Wölfe (In defense of wolves) in 1957 and Landesprache (Language of a country) in 1960. Since then, his eclectic production has centered around short literary forms such as the documentary, interview, book and film review, biography, story, and feuilleton. It has found the greatest resonance through mass publication in newspapers and magazines as well as in video and radio.

Widely traveled and multilingual, Enzensberger was influenced foremost by the thought of Germans Brecht, Benn, and Adorno, but also by such foreign writers as Poe, Baudelaire, Valéry, Maiakovskii, and William Carlos Williams. He was editor, lecturer, literary consultant, and professor of painting, as well as a fellow at the Center for Advanced Studies at Wesleyan University in the United States. In 1968 he resigned from Wesleyan in protest against U.S. foreign policy and subsequently moved to Cuba, where he resided until the mid-1970s, in order to demonstrate his personal engagement with the ideas of radical enlightenment and revolutionary change.

Ever intent on being a step ahead of the times while refusing to fall into ideological traps, Enzensberger recognized from the start of his writing career the close and crucial connection between “the medium and the message.” In his enlightening communication on society and culture, he has steadfastly ignored the boundary between fiction and nonfiction and has utilized a wide spectrum of alienation strategies in his literary work of critical enlightenment of the present as well as utopian visions of the future.

Throughout his literary work, Enzensberger has explored the role of the individual in history and the dialectics of adaptation and subversion, of ideology and coercion. Such an exploration consists predominantly of questions and contradictions rather than of answers and generally accepted knowledge. By both examining the construction of the individual within the process of history and questioning the social functions of bourgeois literature itself, Enzensberger has encouraged German society to analyze itself.

Specifically and most importantly, he has posed the question of how the “consciousness industry,” a phrase he coined, maintains and preserves the existing structures of power through the ideologies of capitalism, nationalism, and German history. It is not the means of production or capital nor the goods and services produced, but rather the production of consciousness for purposes of “manufacturing consent” that represents for Enzensberger the central paradigm of postindustrial society. But the consciousness industry is itself trapped in an obvious contradiction, the dialectic of the enlightenment, where it must first give what it later takes away. That is, before consciousness can be appropriated and changed, it must first exist at all. The production of ideology and consent must first raise consciousness before it can be lowered to ideological levels.

Before the enlightenment of power can be instrumentalized and utilized, it exists as the enlightenment of freedom, and, Enzensberger argues, it is within this arena that the future debates on consciousness and information will occur. It is no longer just a political arena, but a ubiquitous sphere ranging from public relations to sports, tourism, marketing, and the media. According to Enzensberger, the consciousness industry will be the key industry of the next century. This implies a change in the role of the intellectual who, voluntarily or by force, knowingly or naively becomes an accomplice to the consciousness industry.

Such a discussion—often provocative and consciously directed against the grain of common assumptions about the form, content, and functions of literature—is perhaps best characterized by the literary-cultural journal Kursbuch (Timetable), which Enzensberger founded in 1965 and edited until 1975, and which has been widely recognized as Germany's most vital cultural medium of critical communication. Kursbuch represents both a politicization of literature and the end of its traditional role. But ironically, subsequent to the 1965 declaration in Kursbuch of the “death of literature,” Enzensberger continued to write essays and poetry with a new power and lyricism, including his epic poem Titanic (1978).

From the Germany of the 1950s, when, as a heretic in the land of status quo, Enzensberger thematized the issues of the Adenauer Era, to the student movement and the anti-Vietnam protests of the 1960s, to the restoration of the private and subjective in the 1970s, to the debate over nuclear power, the environment, and ecology of Germany in the 1980s, and up to the present, Enzensberger has not only instrumentalized literature, but at the same time has questioned the traditional roles of writing, publishing, and reading in the postmodern information age.

RALPH W. BUECHLER

Biography

Born 11 November 1929 in Kaufbeuren. Served in the Volkssturm, 1944–45. Studied at the Universities of Freiburg, Hamburg, and Erlangen, Ph.D., 1955; the Sorbonne, Paris, 1952–54. Assistant to Alfred Andersch on “radio-essays” for South German Radio, Stuttgart, 1955–57; member of Gruppe 47, from 1955; guest lecturer, Academy of Design, Ulm, 1956–57; worked for Suhrkamp publishers, Frankfurt-on-Main, 1960–75. Lived in Norway, 1961–65. Professor of poetry, University of Frankfurt, 1965. Founder, 1965, and editor, until 1975, Kursbuch. Fellow at Wesleyan University, Middletown, Connecticut, 1967–68 (resigned). Lived in Cuba, 1968–mid-1970s. Founding editor, TransAtlantik, 1980–82. Publisher, Die andere Bibliothek book series, from 1985. Married 1) Dagrún Christensen; 2) Maria Makarova (divorced); 3) Katharine Bonitz, 1986; two daughters. Awards: several, including Critics Prize (Germany), 1962, 1979; Büchner Prize, 1963; Etna-Taormina Prize, 1967; Pasolini Prize, 1982; Heinrich Böll Prize, 1985; Bavarian Academy of Fine Arts Award, 1987.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Einzelheiten, 1962

Politik und Verbrechen, 1964

Deutschland, Deutschland unter anderm, 1967

Palaver: Politische Überlegungen (1967–1973), 1974

Raids and Reconstructions: Essays on Politics, Crime, and Culture, translated by Michael Roloff and others, 1976

Politische Brosamen, 1982; as Political Crumbs, translated by Martin Chalmers, 1990

Critical Essays, edited by Reinhold Grimm and Bruce Armstrong, 1982.

- Ach Europa!*, 1987; as Europe, Europe: Forays into a Continent, translated by Martin Chalmers, 1989
- Mittelmass und Wahn*, 1988; as Mediocrity and Delusion: Collected Diversions, translated by Martin Chalmers, 1992,
- Dreamers of the Absolute: Essays on Politics, Crime, and Culture*, translated by Michael Roloff, Stuart Hood, and Richard Woolley, 1988
- Der fliegende Robert: Gedichte, Szenen, Essays*, 1989 Aussichten auf den Bürgerkrieg, 1993; Part in Civil War, 1994 Civil War, translated by Piers Spence and Martin Chalmers, 1994 Diderots Schatten: Unterhaltungen, Szenen, Essays, 1994
- Other writings: poetry, a novel, and a play.

Further Reading

- Dietschreit, Frank, and Barbara Heinze-Dietschreit, Hans Magnus Enzensberger, Stuttgart: Metzler, 1986
- Grimm, Reinhold, Texturen: Essays und anderes zu Hans Magnus Enzensberger, New York: Lang, 1984
- Grimm, Reinhold, editor, Hans Magnus Enzensberger, Frankfurt-onMain: Suhrkamp, 1984
- Schickel, J., editor, Über Hans Magnus Enzensberger, Frankfurt-onMain: Suhrkamp, 1970

Erasmus

Dutch, 1467–1536

Although Erasmus had been dead nearly half a century when Montaigne coined the term essai in 1580 to refer to his new prose composition, he would undoubtedly have shared Francis Bacon's observation that although Montaigne's term was new, the form itself was ancient. Certainly the essay of Montaigne owes a large debt to the Adagia (1500; Adages) and the Colloquia familiaria (1516; The Colloquies) of Erasmus. In the 1870s, at a time when academic divisions of genre did not include a category for the essay, French literary critic Baston Feugère attempted unsuccessfully to sort Erasmus' canon according to standard genres. What is noteworthy about Feugère's failure, however, is how closely his description of Erasmus' eclectic style approximates contemporary definitions of the essay: for Feugère, Erasmus' prose was a conflation of theology, ethics, pedagogy, satire, erudition, and even personal reminiscence; his style was easy, lightly mocking, often personal, and predominantly aphoristic. Feugère, in fact, was merely echoing a complaint that was itself as old as the works of Erasmus. In his own day, Erasmus suffered the harsh slings of the French Ciceronian Étienne Dolet (L'Erasmianus sive Ciceronianus, 1535), who criticized in his rhetorical style what in Montaigne's work would be praised. Dolet resented the base subject matter, the aphoristic style, the familiar and deriding tone, and the rootless and wandering prose.

Attempting to form and define a genre for the essay three decades after Feugère, Pierre Villey (Les Sources et l'évolution des "Essais" de Montaigne, 1908), first suggested a generic link between the literary style of Erasmus and the essai of Montaigne. He argued that Montaigne's Essais were derivative of several genres and subgenres that arose out of the cultural and philosophical milieu of the Renaissance, naming Erasmus' Adages and Apophthegmes (1531) as the Essais' most influential precursors. While Erasmus' works are not, then, essays per se, we can in retrospect recognize elements of the essay in them. Although as a corpus his works chart the development and ascendancy of his rhetorical theory, a theory that by breaking from the Ciceronian model would culminate in Montaigne's Essais, it is his lesser-known, more condensed theoretical works that provide a greater understanding of the Erasmian influence on the formation of the essay.

During the 16th and 17th centuries, Erasmus' rhetorical experiments (and to a lesser extent those of his younger contemporary, François Rabelais) were pivotal in the transmission of essayistic attributes from the works of such classical writers as Lucian, Quintilian, Seneca, and even Plato to the early modern works of Montaigne, Bacon, and their European and British contemporaries, in whose writings the essay began to take form. In his popular (for some heretical) handbook De duplici copia verborum ac rerum (1512.; On Copia [the abundance] of Words and Ideas), Erasmus synthesizes the tenets of his rhetorical style into a theory of writing as an open-ended and spontaneous exercise that escapes the prescriptive parameters and artificial symmetry imposed by classical models of rhetoric and dialectic. In De inventione (On Invention), his first treatise on rhetoric, Cicero delineated five steps in his rhetorical model, placing emphasis on the first three: invention, the discovery of valid arguments; arrangement, the distribution of arguments in appropriate order; and style (elocutio), the expression of the arguments in proper language and syntax. Reacting against the emphasis his Ciceronian contemporaries continued to place on imitation and style over content, Erasmus reverses Cicero's paradigm, subjugating style and the symmetry of syntax to the primacy of the subject matter. Like all subgenres of the modern essay, then, the writings of Erasmus broke with traditional notions of form. His writing burst the seams of the classical—primarily Ciceronian—model, spilling over with a plenitude of language that, although compressed in the eloquence of each individual theme, was expansive in its collective narrative. Thus, the revolution in prose style mounted against the rhetorical conventions of Ciceronianism was initiated by the pen of Erasmus and not at the hands of the earliest essayists, Montaigne and Bacon, as is so often argued.

By the inclusion in his handbook of a section on "imitation," the standard practice in rhetorical theories since classical antiquity, Erasmus would appear to embrace certain elements of standard rhetorical and pedagogic practice. But here, too, he moves counter to convention. For Erasmus, the writer asserts his independence by both replicating and fragmenting the revered classical models to create a new model of intertextuality. The process of naturalizing fragments of alien texts would later be perfected in the writings of Montaigne in terms of what he called topoi, and Bacon would advance the use of topoi by juxtaposing contradictory axioms or precepts of received wisdom, a practice he recommends in The Advancement of Learning (1605). But such conventions were not without their dangers. Borrowing from and alluding to older works implied that meaning was inherent in a fragment or allusion and thus transferable from one context to another.

The difficulties of such a notion would be addressed repeatedly by Erasmus, most explicitly in his Convivium religiosum (Religious Fellowship), and by Montaigne and Bacon, both of whom, not incidentally, freely borrowed from Erasmus' literary corpus.

Erasmus' appropriation and integration of alien texts predicts yet another intriguing metamorphosis found in the essay. We might see such a practice as having anticipated Montaigne and later essayists' projection of the self into their writing as a way of militating against the influence and prestige of an Ur-text.

Finally, because Erasmus' theory of rhetoric came at a time when the high and rigid rhetorical style of Cicero was perceived as antithetical to the precepts of 16th-century humanism, his work dovetailed neatly with contemporary projects on both sides of the English Channel to explore and vigorously defend the use of the vernacular. After all, crucial to the emergence of the essay and its subsequent popularity is the simultaneous rise in literacy, the vernacular, and the bourgeois class.

In De ratione studii (1512; A Method of Study), Erasmus would complete his turn from Ciceronian style. In this text, he argues that although the choice of words is important to the writing process, the subject matter has primacy. That is, Erasmus reconfigures the ancient rhetorical and pedagogic paradigm of natura-doctrina-exercitatio. He elevates performance (experientia) above the exactness of doctrina, a sensibility that would be perfected in the Essais of Montaigne. In effect, Erasmus was guarding against what he perceived as the empty loquacity produced by imitation, a subject touched on by Plutarch and Petrarch, and one which Erasmus expanded upon in his proto-essay, Lingua (1525; Speech). That the motivation to write and the act of writing itself are valued above the mediation of technique helps to explain Erasmus' lifelong custom of elaborating his already printed texts. The gradual evolution of his work on the New Testament, the perennial revisions of Paraclesis (1519; An Exhortation to the Diligent Study of Scripture), and the manifold versions of the Ratio verae theologiae (1518; The Reason of True Religion) all testify to Erasmus' view of the text as a work-in-progress. His practice of continual revision, taken together with his theory of deconstructing and incorporating alien material, reinforces his idea of the text as an object that could continue to be expanded and embedded with additional meaning. Thus, his writing already heralds a theory of textual heterogeneity, the fundamental characteristic of the essay genre that makes the essayist of every age Erasmus' literary descendant. Moreover, the gradual sedimentation of Erasmus' works clearly anticipates Montaigne and Bacon's view of the essay as an open-ended and antisyllogistic narrative, one which advances not logically but obliquely. Each "draft" simply becomes one more brick toward the foundation of reason that leads to a greater truth. This is precisely why the essay, in the empiricist tradition of Bacon, Hobbes, and Locke, flourished as a tool for the collaborative production, accumulation, and dissemination of Enlightenment ideas in the 18th century. In short, what for Erasmus was practice for the essayists would be form.

When weighing Erasmus' influence on the essay, it is essential not only to consider the texts he authored, but also the subsequent interpretations of the ideology those texts were perceived to deploy, especially their influence during the 18th century, a time when the periodical essay—and its division into sociological and scientific subgenres—was codified and commodified in the growing market economy as an agent of an imperial and bourgeois moralism. (Here, we have only to think of Pope's accolades for Erasmus in Essay on Criticism [1711], or the Erasmus invoked in the “practical moralism” of Addison and Steele.) It is Erasmus, more than any of his contemporaries, to whom the 17th- and 18th-century writers and thinkers revert, by both explicit reference and implicit allusion. Erasmus was so popular among Enlightenment thinkers, in fact, that the 18th century saw the publication of no fewer than three complete biographies of him. He is mentioned in many of the great documents of the Enlightenment, including Diderot’s Encyclopédie (1746–72) and Voltaire’s Essai sur les mœurs et l’esprit des nations (1756, 1761–63; Essay on the Manner and Spirit of Nations). His progressive thought resonates in still more of the period’s most influential humanist essays, such as Locke’s treatise, The Reasonableness of Christianity (1695). The 17th-century French Cartesian Pierre Bayle proclaimed Erasmus the church father of the Enlightenment, a title that places Erasmus at the head of a long tradition of modern skepticism, for which Bayle himself is a distinguished forerunner. In a stunning recapitulation of his role in Luther’s 16th-century struggle with the papal court, Erasmus is once again cast as mediator between Catholic and Protestant, in debates that would escalate into Britain’s Glorious Revolution of 1688. As in Luther’s day, both sides would lay claim to Erasmus, finding in the ambiguities of his free and associative rhetorical style support for their respective partisanship.

Given the 18th century’s renewed interest in the classical period, its philosophical rediscovery of neoplatonism, it is not surprising that it is Erasmus to whom pundits returned for a rehearsed argument between the classical and the nascent vernacular models of rhetoric. He was used as a symbol in the conflict between classical restraint and Romantic fervor in late 18th-century Germany. Ultimately the late 18th and early 19th centuries would consider him part of the tradition of “freethinking” education that through Locke would give rise to the essays of Rousseau and Voltaire, to culminate in the work of Jeremy Bentham. Finally, in the grand scheme of the 18th century, Erasmus was summoned forth as the great humanist whose intellect and idea of progress paved the way for the likes of Descartes, Locke, and several other great architects of the Age of Reason. Yet, if it is writers in this period whose praise for Erasmus codified his position as an innovator of language and free thinking, then it is also detractors like Edward Gibbon, historians in and of this period, whose criticism has resulted in modern scholarship’s having glossed too narrowly, or slighted altogether, Erasmus’ manifold contribution to the emergence of the essay as a genre.

GREGORY S.JACKSON

Biography

Desiderius Erasmus. Born in Rotterdam, probably 27/28 October 1467. Studied at schools in Gouda and Deventer, until 1493; a seminary at ‘s Hertogenbosch; entered the monastery of Canons Regular of St. Augustine, Steyn, 1487; ordained priest, 1492.; secretary to the Bishop of Cambrai, 1493–95; studied at the College of Montaigue, Paris, 1495–99 and 1500–01; University of Turin, Doctor of Divinity, 1506. Lived or traveled in England, 1499, 1505–06, 1509–14, 1515, 1516, 1517; lived in Italy, 1506–09, and Louvain, 1517–21. General editor of John Froben’s press, Basle, 1521–29. Lived in Freiburg, 1529–35, and again in Basle, 1535–36. Declined the offer of becoming a Cardinal. Died 12 July 1536.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

- Adagia*, 1500, and later augmented editions; as Proverbs or Adages, translated by Richard Taverner, 1539, and Margaret Mann Phillips, 1964
- Enchiridion militis Christiani*, 1503; as The Manual of the Christian Knight, translated by William Tyndale, 1533 (reprinted 1905), and Anne M.O'Donnell, 1981; as The Christian Manual, translated by John Spier, 1752; as The Handbook of the Militant Christian, translated by John P.Dolan, 1962; as The Enchiridion, translated by Raymond Himelick, 1963
- Encomium moriae*, 1511; revised edition, 1514; edited and translated by Hoyt H.Hudson, 1941; several translations, as The Praise of Folly, including by Thomas Chaloner, 1549, John Wilson, 1668 (reprinted 1961), Leonard F.Dean, 1946, A.H.T. Levi and Betty Radice, 1971, and Clarence H.Miller, 1979
- De ratione studii*, 1512; revised edition, 1514; as On the Aim and Method of Education, edited by W.H.Woodward, 1904; as A Method of Study, translated by Brian McGregor, in Collected Works, 1978
- De duplici copia verborum ac rerum*, 1512; revised edition, 1514; as On Copia of Words and Ideas, translated by Donald B.King and H.David Rix, 1963; as On Copia, translated by Betty I. Knott, in Collected Works, 1978
- Colloquia familiaria*, 1516, and later augmented editions; edited by L.E.Halkin, F.Bierlaire, and R.Hoven, in Opera omnia, 1972; as The Colloquies, translated by H.M.London, 1671, Roger L'Estrange, in Twenty Select Colloquies, 1680, revised edition, 1923, Nathan Bailey, 1725, and Craig R.Thompson, 1965; in part as Ten Colloquies, translated by Craig R.Thompson, 1957
- Institutio principis Christiani*, 1516; as The Education of a Christian Prince, translated by Lester K.Born, 1936
- Julius Exclusus*, 1517; as The Dialogue Between Julius the Second Genius and Saint Peter, translated anonymously, 1534; as The Pope Shut out of Heaven Gates, 1673; also translated by J.A. Froude, 1894
- De libero arbitrio*, 1524; edited by J.Walter, 1910; as Discourse on the Freedom of the Will, edited and translated by Ernest F. Winter, 1961
- Lingua*, 1525
- Dialogus Ciceronianus*, 1528; edited by Pierre Mesnard, in Opera omnia, 1971; as Ciceronianus; or, A Dialogue on the Best Style of Speaking, edited and translated by Izora Scott, 1900
- Apophthegmes*, 1531; translated by Nicholas Udall, 1542, reprinted 1877
- The Complaint of Peace*, translated by Thomas Paynell, 1559, revised edition, 1946
- Opus epistolarum* (in Latin and English), edited by P.S.Allen and others, 12 vols., 1906–58; as The Epistles, edited and translated by Francis M.Nichols, 3 vols., 1901–18; as Correspondence, translated by R.A.B.Mynors and D.F.S.Thomson, annotated by Wallace K.Ferguson, James K.McConica, and Peter G. Bietenholz, in Collected Works, 1974
- Opuscula*, edited by W.K.Ferguson, 1933
- The Essential Erasmus*, edited by John P.Dolan, 1964

Christian Humanism and the Reformation: Selected Writings, edited by John C.Olin, 1965

Essential Works, edited by W.T.H.Jackson, 1965

The Praise of Folly, and Other Writings, edited by Robert M. Adams, 1989

The Erasmus Reader, edited by Erika Rummel, 1990

Other writings: edited works by Ambrose, Aristotle, Augustine, Basil, Cato, Chrysostom, Cicero, Cyprian, Hilary, Irenaeus, Jerome, Lactantius, Origen, Plutarch, Pseudo-Arnobius, Seneca, and others.

Collected works editions: Opera omnia, 6 vols., 1969–95 (in progress); Collected Works, 33 vols., 1974–95 (in progress).

Bibliography

Devereux, E.J., Renaissance Translations of Erasmus: A Bibliography to 1700, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1983

Further Reading

Mansfield, Bruce, Phoenix of His Age: Interpretations of Erasmus, c. 1550–1750, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1979

Mansfield, Bruce, Man on His Own: Interpretations of Erasmus, c. 1750–1920, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1992.

Pavlovskis, Zoja, The Praise of Folly: Structure and Irony, Leiden: Brill, 1983

Schoeck, R.J., Erasmus Grandescens: The Growth of a Humanist's Mind and Spirituality, Nieuwkoop: De Graaf, 1988

Schoeck, R.J., Erasmus of Europe: The Making of a Humanist, 1467–1500, Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1990

Screech, M.A., Ecstasy and "The Praise of Folly", Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1988 (original edition, 1980)

Smith, Henry Goodwin, "The Triumph of Erasmus in Modern Protestantism," Hibbert Journal 3 (1905): 64–82

Thompson, Geraldine, Under Pretext of Praise: Satiric Mode in Erasmus' Fiction, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1974

El Espectador

Spanish journal, 1916–1934

El Espectador (The spectator) was a one-man journal written and published by the Spanish philosopher and public intellectual José Ortega y Gasset between 1916 and 1934. The magazine, whose name appears to have been derived from the title of Addison's and Steele's famous 18th-century publication, was originally conceived as a vehicle which would allow Ortega to share, on a bimonthly basis, his more intimate and transcendent reflections (as opposed to the political ones for which he was already well known) with what he hoped would be a select and discriminating group of paid subscribers. As he said in the initial essay of the magazine's first issue, his goal was "to raise a fortress against politics for both myself and those that share my affection for pure vision and theory."

In founding El Espectador in the spring of 1916, Ortega sought, in a sense, to liberate himself from his largely self-created role as one of Spain's best-known political commentators. Ortega's rise to this status began with his much publicized polemics in 1908 and 1909 with the well-known politician Gabriel Maura and two celebrated members of the so-called Generation of '98, Ramiro de Maeztu and Miguel de Unamuno. As a result of these widely reported conflicts, his tireless journalistic activity, as well as key speeches such as "Los problemas nacionales y la juventud" (1909; National problems and youth) and "La pedagogía social como programa político" (1910; Social pedagogy as political program), Ortega came to be recognized in the years immediately preceding World War I as the leading spokesman for a European-inspired reform of Spain's political culture. In late 1913 he began organizing the Liga de Educación Política (League for political education), which he hoped would enable his generation of young intellectuals to make a clean break with what he saw as the corrupt and antiquated political practices propagated by the "Official Spain" in the years since the restoration of the Bourbon monarchy in 1875. After the publication of his influential Meditaciones del Quijote (1914; Meditations on Quixote), in which he ponders the question of Spain's historical destiny, Ortega, the son and grandson of prominent journalists as well as a veteran of two short-lived publishing ventures, founded España (Spain), a journal aimed at supporting and furthering the goals of the Liga de Educación Política. Within weeks of its appearance in early 1915, España established itself as one of the country's leading journals of social and political thought. However, in January 1916 Ortega, sensing that the Liga would never be able to effect social change on the scale he had envisioned, abruptly resigned his position as España's editor and announced soon thereafter his plans to begin publishing El Espectador.

In the long run, Ortega's adherence to his original concept for El Espectador would prove to be rather inconsistent. The first installment of the series (May 1916) was, as promised, largely free of political commentary. However, as early as the magazine's second volume, published in May 1917, Ortega returned, as he would do intermittently throughout the life of the journal, to the discussion of contemporary political culture. Similarly, Ortega quickly dispensed with his proposed bimonthly schedule of publication. In 18 years, he managed to write and distribute only eight full issues of the magazine, a number of which are little more than compilations of previously written articles.

While El Espectador ultimately failed to engender a sustained and intimate dialogue between Ortega and what he would come to term, in España invertebrada (1921; Invertebrate Spain) and La rebelión de las masas (1930; The Revolt of the Masses), the "select minorities" of society, it nonetheless remains an important showcase of his broad interests and expressive talents. Included in its pages are in-depth analyses of the work of the Spanish novelists Pío Baroja ("Ideas sobre Baroja" [1916; Ideas on Baroja]) and José Martínez Ruiz "Azorín" ("Azorín o primores de lo vulgar" [1917; Azorín or the delicacy of the commonplace]), as well as articles which touch upon the key Orteguian concepts of “perspectivism” (“Verdad y perspectiva” [1916; Truth and perspective]) and “biologism” (“El Quijote en la escuela” [1921; Don Quixote in the schools]). These essentially scholarly articles are joined together with the aforementioned sprinkling of political essays —“La democracia morbosa” (1917; Ailing democracy), a review of Scheler’s “El genio de la guerra y la guerra alemana” (1917; The genius of war and the German war), and “Sobre el fascismo” (1927; On fascism)—numerous travel pieces, and erudite musings on subjects ranging from wine to Egyptian culture.

El Espectador can also be seen as a significant point of departure in Ortega’s longitudinal development as a thinker. The year 1923, in which he founded Revista de Occidente (Western review), is sometimes identified as the point at which Ortega moved from being a Spanish writer largely concerned with national issues to being a “European” philosopher more interested in commenting upon universal themes. If this is indeed the case, then El Espectador, especially its first three, more conscientiously crafted volumes (published in 1916, 1917, and 1921) should be seen as a precursor to the author’s later, universalist production, for it was there that he first openly sought to transcend his devotion to political thought which is, in contrast to theoretical speculation, “located in the realm of man’s secondary spiritual activities.”

THOMAS S.HARRINGTON

Editions

El Espectador: Colección de ensayos filosóficos y literarios, 8 vols., 1916–34; in 1 vol., 1943; vols. 2–3 of Ortega y Gasset’s Obras completas, 1957; selections edited by Gaspar Gómez de la Serna, 1969, and Paulino Garragorri, 1980

Further Reading

Gaos, José, Sobre Ortega y Gasset y otros trabajos de historia de las ideas en España y la América Española, Mexico City: Universidad Nacional Autónoma de México, 1957
 Niedermayer, Franz, José Ortega y Gasset, New York: Ungar, 1973 (original German edition, 1959)

Ouimette, Victor, José Ortega y Gasset, Boston: Twayne, 1982

Romano García, Vicente, José Ortega y Gasset, publicista, Madrid: Akal, 1976

Saiz Barberá, Juan, Ortega y Gasset ante la crítica: El idealismo en “El Espectador”, Madrid: Iberoamericanas, 1950

An Essay Concerning Human Understanding

by John Locke, 1689; revised editions, 1694, 1700

John Locke (1632–1704)—the founding figure of the school of philosophy developed primarily in 18th-century England known as empiricism—wrote An Essay Concerning Human Understanding in addition to other influential books and a voluminous correspondence. The Essay is a vastly larger work than one might expect from its classification as an essay; in fact it constitutes one of the indisputably great works in the history of philosophy, and ranks among the most influential.

The beginnings of the Essay date back to 1671, at a time when Locke was participating in sustained philosophical discussions; during this period he realized that genuine philosophical progress could not be made until a thorough overview of the mind's faculties, capacities, and contents was achieved. Although this initial overarching purpose motivated the Essay, the book was not written during a single uninterrupted period of Locke's life. It is true that he wrote a paper on the capacities of the mind in connection with the discussions of 1671, and this formed the core of two early drafts of the Essay composed during the ensuing years. But in fact the Essay was assembled from many independent parts over many years, and grew vastly beyond its initial proportions: in his "Epistle to the Reader" Locke informs us that the Essay was "written by incoherent parcels; and after long intervals of neglect, resumed again, as my humour or occasions permitted."

There are a number of intersecting reasons for this great philosophical study to have been called an "essay." First, it began in conversation, and was in its earliest manifestation conceived as supplement both to philosophical dialogues and to further philosophical work of a different order. Second, it was composed and augmented over a number of years, with each new section essaying, or initially and in some cases provisionally, mapping out new conceptual territory for inclusion in the large work. Third, the Essay comprised ultimately a very large number of individual essays on multifarious philosophical topics with considerable thematic independence.

There remains a further reason for the aptness of the title, even with the great size of the volume, and this concerns Locke's authorial voice. On Locke's arrival as a student of philosophy in Oxford in 1652 he was taught what the distinguished historian of philosophy Frederick Copleston has called in A History of Philosophy (1946) "a debased and rather petrified form of Scholasticism"; Copleston reports that Locke then and there "conceived a great distaste [for this philosophy], regarding it as 'perplexed' with obscure terms, and useless questions." At that time he was also philosophically stimulated by his private reading of Descartes' philosophical writings, in which the virtues of clarity and distinctness of thought are both exemplified and elevated to a position of epistemological indispensability. Locke was thus in pursuit of a style which would emphasize clarity, avoid obscure terms, facilitate the discussion of useful philosophical questions, and, as mentioned above, arise out of and contribute to philosophical dialogue. The voice at which he arrived, at an early stage in his work, is thus clear, commonsensical, rhetorically undecorated, and perfectly suited to the central philosophical tenets of empiricism. In short, Locke's voice is essayistic; indeed, it became foundational to all of the developments in British empiricism to follow, and we can plausibly argue that it has been foundational to almost all major developments in British philosophy up to the present day (including utilitarianism, positivism, and "ordinary language philosophy"). It will be clear to any reader of the Essay that Locke's authorial voice is integral to the philosophical method being developed and deployed in the book; this grand compendious undertaking is unthinkable in any other voice.

Locke's fundamental philosophical aspirations in the Essay are to delineate the boundary between opinion and knowledge, to inquire into the origins of our ideas, to determine the degree of certainty we are able to achieve with those ideas, and to investigate the nature of faith or opinion (where we give our assent to propositions as true but where we do not possess certain knowledge). These lead him to compose a broad and encompassing typology of the contents of the human mind, providing classifications that are at once psychological and epistemological; indeed, Locke's theory of human knowledge is—like Descartes' philosophy before him and to which his work is in part indebted and in part polemically opposed inextricably intertwined with a theory of the mind.

Locke begins by observing that we have in our minds numerous ideas (he provides the examples whiteness, hardness, sweetness, thinking, motion, man, elephant, army, drunkenness, and others), and asks: How do we come by them? He answers by describing the mind as a "white paper, void of all characters, without any ideas" in its pre-experiential pure state (which he famously characterizes elsewhere in the Essay as a "tabula rasa"). All the multifarious inscriptions made on this paper, he states, are reducible to one word: experience. "In that," he writes, "all our knowledge is founded." With this one-word answer, he lays the cornerstone of British empiricism.

Locke quickly divides experience into two categories, noting that our observation is employed either with "external sensible objects" or with "internal operations of our minds perceived and reflected on by ourselves"; these two categories, ideas of sensation and ideas of reflection, are for him the "fountains of knowledge from whence all the ideas we have, or can naturally have, do spring." (With this latter remark he is initiating a theme much discussed throughout philosophy's history from his Essay onward: the attempt to demarcate the scope and limits of possible experience.) Examples of ideas of sensation are "yellow, white, heat, cold, soft, hard, bitter, and sweet"; examples of ideas of reflection are "perception, thinking, doubting, believing, reasoning, knowing, and willing." Locke has thus elucidated the significance of his one-word answer; at the close of this part of the Essay he concludes that "All of our ideas are of the one or other of these. The understanding seems to me not to have the least glimmering of any ideas which it doth not receive from one of these two. External objects furnish the mind with the ideas of sensible qualities, which are all those different perceptions they produce in us; and the mind furnishes the understanding with ideas of its own operations." Indeed, taking a polemical stand against the theory of innate ideas adumbrated by Descartes and his successors in 17th-century continental rationalism, Locke adds that we "begin to have ideas when [we] first have sensation."

Locke advances his psychological and epistemological typology by distinguishing between simple and complex ideas, as this distinction manifests itself in our experience of both sensation and reflection. Light and colors, with their many shades and combinations, or all kinds of sounds and noises, or all kinds of tastes and olfactory experience, or all sensations of touch, taken together constitute a vast range of sensory experience. Introducing another centrally significant philosophical theme that has been discussed through to the present day, Locke observes that "Few simple ideas have names." In observing that we have far more simple ideas of sensation than we have names for them, Locke gives rise to a newly focused question, inquiring into the very relation between language and perception. (He returns to this at the beginning of Book III of the Essay, articulating a theory of language that, consistent with everything thus far put forward, posits mental entities—ideas—as inner meanings that are contingently externalized through association or linkage to external signs, i.e. spoken or written words. The foundations and central tenets of this theory have been much discussed, and much criticized, in 20th-century analytical philosophy, notably by Ludwig Wittgenstein and his successors.) Locke's fundamental point here is that ideas such as solidity, which we obtain by the experience of, for instance, feeling resistance to the pressure of our hands on an unyielding object, are simple ideas of sensation. Simple ideas of reflection, by contrast, are given to us by direct inspection—or introspection—of the mental activities of perception or thinking, or volition or willing. There are simple ideas of both sensation and reflection: the ideas of pleasure or delight, or their opposites, pain or uneasiness; these ideas, like those of existence, unity, power, and succession, are “suggested to the understanding by every object without and every idea within.”

Before moving to his examination of complex ideas of sense and of reflection, Locke renders a fundamental distinction that has also been developed and discussed ever since. He distinguishes “primary” from “secondary” qualities in objects. The power to produce an idea in us, he explains, is a quality: thus a snowball has the power to produce in us the ideas of white, cold, and round. Primary qualities are those that, for Locke, are “utterly inseparable” from the object in question, in “what state soever it be.” Thus a candle, melted down, may display many changed qualities, but those that do not—that cannot—change are primary. Similarly, a grain of wheat divided into many parts still possesses the qualities of solidity, extension, figure, and mobility in each part. “Divide again,” Locke writes, “and it retains the same qualities.” By contrast, secondary qualities “in truth are nothing in the objects themselves but powers to produce various sensations in us by their primary qualities, i.e., the bulk, figure, texture and motion of their insensible parts”; colors, sounds, and tastes are in this category. Fundamental to Locke's empirical ontology is the related claim that primary qualities resemble the objects really out there in the world; they alone provide true reports of the nature of reality beyond the reach of subjectivity. It is thus an ontological mistake to believe that warmth is actually in the fire, that coldness is in the snow.

Indeed, Locke asserts that if we could directly perceive the primary qualities, the secondary ones would disappear. It was Locke's empiricist follower George Berkeley (1688–1753) who argued that, on these grounds, the idea of the material world must be dismissed as a crude myth, since any knowledge or ideas we have of primary qualities are derived in the first instance from our sensation, and thus are in fact secondary qualities—and hence not true or reliable reports of extrasubjective ontology, but rather only further secondary ideas that thus fail to resemble external reality. In Berkeley's Lockean-inspired idealist ontology, the very idea of “external reality” is highly suspect.

Locke's second great successor in the tradition of British empiricism, David Hume (1711–76), argued that on strict Lockean grounds causation is necessarily illusory; in fact, we only experience the constant conjunction of events in the world, not their causal relations. Causal relations, in that they are projected onto the world subjectively rather than perceived from it objectively, are similar in ontological status to secondary qualities.

In short, Locke's most fundamental distinction within his larger epistemic typology, the distinction between primary and secondary qualities in objects, led to two different extreme ends of empiricism, the first being Berkeleyan idealism and the second Humean skepticism.

Locke's discussion of complex ideas of sensation and of reflection greatly extends his explanation of the origin of our ideas; complex ideas are those that are "made up of several simple ones put together," such as "beauty, gratitude, a man, an army, or the very universe." Here too integrating his concern with linguistic meaning and the philosophy of language, Locke says that while the mind may consider each simple element of these complex ideas independently, in combinations, or as one entire thing, they are still "signified by one name."

There is a vast amount of philosophy in Locke's Essay, including psychological and epistemological subdivisions and distinctions not mentioned here, as well as philosophical examinations of perennial conceptual quandaries such as free will versus determinism, the problem of personal identity (added in the second edition), and fundamental issues in the philosophy of religion. But throughout the Essay Locke remains true to his central empiricist cornerstone: "All those sublime thoughts which tower above the clouds, and reach as high as heaven itself, take their rise and footing here; in all that great extent wherein the mind wanders, in those remote speculations it may seem to be elevated with, it stirs not one jot beyond those ideas which sense or reflection have offered for its contemplation."

GARRY L.HAGBERG

See also Philosophical Essay

Editions

An Essay Concerning Human Understanding, 1689; revised editions, 1694, 1700; edited by Peter Nidditch, 1975; Essay draft A edited by R.I.Aaron and Jocelyn Gibb, 1936; Essay draft B as An Essay Concerning the Understanding, Knowledge, Opinion, and Assent, edited by Benjamin Rand, 1931; drafts A and B edited by Nidditch, 2 vols., 1980–82

Bibliography

Hall, Roland, and Roger Woolhouse, Eighty Years of Locke Scholarship: A Bibliographical Guide, Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1983

Further Reading

Aaron, R.I., John Locke, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1971 (original edition, 1938)
 Aarsleff, Hans, From Locke to Saussure: Essays on the Study of Language and Intellectual History, London: Athlone Press, 1982
 Ayers, Michael, Locke, London: Routledge, 2 vols., 1991

- Bennett, Jonathan, Locke, Berkeley, Hume: Central Themes, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1971
- Brandt, Reinhard, editor, John Locke, Berlin: de Gruyter, 1981
- Colman, John, John Locke's Moral Philosophy, Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1983
- Cranston, Maurice, John Locke: A Biography, London: Longman Green, and New York: Macmillan, 1957
- Dunn, John, Locke, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1984
- Gibson, James, Locke's Theory of Knowledge and Its Historical Relations, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1917
- Mackie, J.L., Problems from Locke, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1976
- Tipton, I.C, editor, Locke on Human Understanding: Selected Essays, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1977
- Woolhouse, R.S., Locke's Philosophy of Science and Knowledge, Oxford: Blackwell, and New York: Barnes and Noble, 1971
- Woolhouse, R.S., Locke, Aldershot: Gregg Revivals, 1994 (original edition, 1983)
- Woolhouse, R.S., The Empiricists, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1988
- Yolton, John W., John Locke and the Way of Ideas, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1956
- Yolton, John W., editor, John Locke: Problems and Perspectives, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1969
- Yolton, John W., Locke and the Compass of Human Understanding, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1970

Essay Film

Essay film is a relatively recent concept used to define a cinematographic (and video) genre that has been gaining growing recognition as a distinct branch of international film production. In its broadest meaning, it is a hybrid medium which falls between, and to an extent combines, the two dominant film categories: feature film and documentary. Like its literary and philosophical ancestor, the written essay, it ignores generic borders or chooses to transgress their norms conceptually and formally. It is generally shorter than standard feature films; its length may vary from one to 90 minutes and over, with an average perhaps of about an hour. The international scope of the essay film results in a great diversity among its many forms of inspiration, but its manifestations tend to have in common a sustained self-reflective questioning both of the subject position of individual filmmakers and of the global imaging technologies themselves, not only of film and video but also, increasingly, of digital electronics. Coming after a long history of film, the essay film readdresses, from a new audiovisual perspective, several basic questions raised by earlier forms of cinema about the tension between verisimilitude (documented reality) and artifice (free imagination). In that process, the essay film problematizes various traditional concepts such as narrative fiction and historical record, truth and fantasy, blurring the boundaries between the stable genres and calling into question all simplifying binary categories of representation.

Conceptually, the essay film can be traced back to a 1948 plea for its autonomous status as the most contemporary of media by the French film theorist Alexandre Astruc. Astruc claimed that if Descartes were alive today his Discours de la méthode (1637; Discourse on Method) would take the form of a 16mm film: that is, it would be “written” as an essay film. However, the essay film has become not merely a filmic rendering of a philosophical text; rather it has developed as a new form of cinema which, with its dual audio and visual dimensions, is progressively transforming the nature of the traditional philosophical discourse just as that discourse, were it filmed, would be transforming the nature of traditional films. The essay film is, moreover, not only a particular genre of film production, albeit one resisting generic norms, but also a hermeneutic procedure, that is, a way of viewing all films.

Astruc promoted the notion of a camera-stylo (camerastylus) that would, in the essay film, “break free from the tyranny of what is visual, from the image for its own sake, from the immediate and concrete demands of the narrative, to become a means of writing, just as flexible and subtle as written language...more or less literal ‘inscriptions’ on images as ‘essays’.” Some essay films have included actual writing or graphic inscription on the celluloid. The result is a multilayered product: an image track, a soundtrack, and a written track often accompanied by a voiceover reading of the written text. The properly textual track or layer is sometimes in direct contradiction with the image track, creating within the total filmic text a jarring collision of opposites and complex levels of meaning which the audience must coproduce.

In response to its literary and philosophical origins, the essay film can also borrow and translate into audiovisual dimensions various classical rhetorical devices. For example, the rhetorical figure of chiasmus (the oscillatory crossing between categories), an integral feature in the work of the German philosopher and promoter of the essay, Theodor W.Adorno, has been adapted to the cinematographic medium in several German essay films. Similarly, the painterly technique of anamorphosis (whereby a change of perspective alters manifest meaning) has been adapted as a methodological tool by film essayists everywhere, insofar as they use various techniques of layering images and sounds.

The earliest examples of the essay film can be found in cinema produced many years before Astruc coined the term and formulated its theory. Most of these early film essays—such as Walter Ruttmann’s Berlin: Symphonie einer Grossstadt (1927; Berlin: Symphony of a Great City) or the Soviet Dziga Vertov’s Chelovek s kino-apparatom (1929; Man with a Movie Camera), both of which articulated images and music tracks with considerable self-reflective artistry—were still mainly filmed in the spirit of documentary. Conversely, the surprising Tabu (1931) by F.W.Murnau and Robert Flaherty remains essentially a fictional feature film despite its documentary orientation, cultural displacement, and essay-like aspects. More importantly, perhaps, unlike the literary essays, few of these early movies presented an ideological argument, an explicit justification of their production as essays rather than as exclusively audiovisual works of art. It is arguably with Les Statues meurent aussi (Statues also die), by French directors Chris Marker and Alain Resnais in 1953, that the combination of formal and thematic innovations with a clearly subversive (and in fact censored) ideological agenda (anticolonialism) was conceived and received as a major illustration of what an essay film could and ought to be. This medium-length film offered remarkable photography of African art, a dislocated narrative, a mixture of fact and imaginative speculation, and a sharp critique of the colonial project and its cultural legacy on location in Africa and in contemporary European museums. The model—always slightly subversive, most typically from a leftwing perspective—was set for future essay films.

In 1979, the Hamburg Declaration of New German Filmmakers officially called for an end to the artificial separation between “the feature film form [and] the documentary” and between “films that reflect on the medium (in a practical way as experiments) [and] the narrative and commercial films.” The resulting hybrid was to uphold the transgressive spirit of that declaration: for instance, joining all manner of avantgardes, promoting all sorts of artistic and political causes (particularly on the left), and maintaining a certain sympathy for gender struggles and for cultural cross-fertilization.

Internationalization of the new genre followed rapidly. Soon it became impossible to categorize the essay film on the basis of the nationality of filmmakers working alone or together in several countries at the same time—in filmic versions of a postmodernist mode of production. Most question or reject the notion of a fixed identity as filmmaker, be it national, sexual, or cultural. Many, like Chilean-born but Paris-based Raul Ruiz, or Vietnamese-born, French-educated, and U.S.-based Trinh T. Minh-ha, have been working in exile. It may even be argued that it is this state of “in-between-ness” which leads these filmmakers to adopt the essay film as a medium of expression in the first place. Falling themselves between categories, more or less finding a home in multicultural lands, they have been inspired, if not forced, to look for their inspiration to a similarly multilayered practice of filmmaking.

There are other ways to order the seeming proliferation of essay films. Some categories—with considerable overlap between them—are basically thematic, corresponding to an inferred intention on the part of the director. For instance, many essay films adopt a “travelogue” or “ethnographic” format as a means of mapping psychological space and time onto geophysical space and time. Issues of tourism and travel in foreign countries emerge on the surface of epistolary films such as Chris Marker’s Lettre de Sibérie (1958; Letter from Siberia) or frank “filmed diaries” such as the German Wim Wenders’ Tokyo-Ga (1985). Marker’s early film contains a famous sequence, seminal for the essay film, in which one image track is replayed three times, each time with a radically different, ideologically coded, voice-over. Wenders’ film, although filmed on location in Japan, problematizes national identity in part by confronting national cinemas with video and television as transnational forces. In short, these films explore problems of cultural displacement, ideological conviction, and cinematographic technique formally as well as thematically. Following the theory of Claude Lévi-Strauss, this mode of essay film tends to become a form of “anthropological bricolage”—offering escape from some of the conceptual limitations of “national identity,” but encountering new limits at home and abroad. In some instances, when travel is impossible, the subgenre is parodied, as in the French omnibus production Loïn du Vietnam (1967; Far from Vietnam), Jill Godmillow’s Far from Poland (1984), and Trinh T. Minh-ha’s Surname Viet, Given Name Nam (1989). In the latter two films, manipulated and/or fabricated documentary footage and interviews are successfully presented as being “authentic,” duping the audience until the end, when the artifice is revealed.

A related strategy motivates “journalistic” essay films, which offer an alternative view to the representation of current events by traditional journalism and television. This is the case for the depiction of the Romanian Revolution in German Harun Farocki’s Videograms einer Revolution (1991; Videograms of a Revolution), of German reunification in French Marcel Ophüls’ November Days (1991), and of the AIDS pandemic in the German Rosa von Praunheim’s Silence=Death (1991). These reportage films counteract the spectacular nature of such world events as covered by other, more powerful media, seeking to communicate greater depth and ambivalence. Together with other types of essay films, they create a half-factual, half-imaginary public sphere that competes with, and undermines, both the ostensible objectivity of documentaries and the commercial subjectivity of fictional features.

Contributing to that subversive—or corrective—effect are various “historical” essay films that focus on both history in general and film history in particular. Like other subgenres, they entail the use and manipulation of documentary footage, but particularly focus on old film clips and soundtracks. This category has expanded tremendously in recent years, as the cinema celebrates its centennial, drawing attention to its own past. The most notable explicit examples are French: Jean-Luc Godard’s Histoire(s) du cinéma (1988; History of Cinema) and Chris. Marker’s Silent Movie (1995). But many essay films reflect on historical figures and problems in a manner that might be called “auto/biographical.” Marker’s Le Tombeau d’Alexandre (1993; The Last Bolshevik) explores the problem of representing a filmmaker who is also a party member. Some films take a clearly solipsistic autobiographical turn, as does Godard’s JLG/JLG (1994; JLG by JLG).

An equally complex development is offered by the “philosophical” essay film, which claims to contribute to (Western) philosophy, to cinema aesthetics, and to their interaction. The films of Farocki (Wie man sieht [1986; As You See]; Bilder der Welt und Inschrift des Krieges [1988; Images of the World and the Inscription of War]), Wim Wenders (Notebooks on Cities and Clothes, 1989), Hartmut Bitmoski (Reichsautobahn, 1984; VW Komplex, 1989), Godard (Photo et Cie. [1976; Photo and Co.]), and Valie Export (Unsichtbare Gegner [1976; Invisible Adversaries]) tend to question, in diverse ways, not only differences between film and rival imaging technologies but also, in the field of public visual representations, differences between visual representation and the modern man-made environment. The essay film is thus poised to trace the history of “mechanical reproduction” since the Enlightenment, contrasting “vision” with “visuality” on the one hand, and with the “reconfigured eye” of digital manipulation and synthesis on the other.

Another important topic of essay films is centered on problems of sexual identity and gender roles. As has been noted by critics, the more traditional written essay itself can be viewed as a “feminine” form because of its rejection of categories fixed by patriarchy. Applying their general policy of cultural transgression, some essay films deconstruct the a priori binary opposition of male versus female, heterosexual versus homosexual. They question the conventional imagery of patriarchal structures, relativize the image of women, sometimes promote feminist theses, and offer probing views of lesbian, gay, or transvestite milieux. Among the best known of these filmmakers are Chantal Akerman (News from Home, 1976), Derek Jarman (Blue, 1992–93), Isaac Julien (Looking for Langston, 1989), Rosa von Praunheim (Anita, Tanze des Lasters [1987; Anita, Dances of Vice]), Yvonne Rainer (Journeys from Berlin, 1971, 1980), Helke Sanders (Redupers [1977; All Around Reduced Personality]), Monika Treut (Female Misbehavior, 1993), and Valie Export (Menschenfrauen [1979; Humanwoman]).

These essay film contributions to modern cinema are paralleled by its equally significant influence on general film production. Many documentary and feature filmmakers follow developments in the essay film, and are increasingly adapting its new themes and forms into works that reach a mass audience. For example, Marker's La Jetée (1962) has clearly inspired Terry Gilliam's commercial Twelve Monkeys (1996). Furthermore, many prestigious feature film directors (e.g. Godard, Wenders, Werner Herzog, Orson Welles) have interspersed their commercial productions with low-budget, nonprofit essays in which they carry out experiments on their more innovative theories of representation. Many avant-garde "investigations" eventually find their way into feature films, such as Oliver Stone's Natural Born Killers (1994). In that sense, the essay film participates in the contemporary form of what Russian and Czech formalists used to call the "canonization of the junior branch": the perpetual circulation between "high" and "low" cultural production and consumption. In this sense, the comparatively unknown essay film irrigates, fertilizes, and stimulates the cinematographic field in an increasingly post-literate technoculture, keeping the critical impulsion of the literary and philosophical essay alive under hostile conditions.

The future of the essay film is linked to the evolution of the major factors that generated it, such as the dispersion of national units into tribes, fragmentation of belief structures, skeptical questioning of values, breaking of traditional boundaries and genres of all types, appeal of irrational ideas and movements, multiplication of political, social, technological, and cultural debates, and the erosion of the public sphere by the mass media. There is no reason to expect a moderating change in the impact of these factors. Nor is it likely that any form of cinema will escape the process that leads aging art forms, tired of creating, to a self-reflective cannibalization of their own past, and to a more or less discrete and obsessive poaching from other disciplines. The essay film or video will likely share for some time the current successes and failures of the literary and philosophical essay, fueled by similar cultural and political disturbances around the globe.

NORA M.ALTER

Further Reading

- Alter, Nora M., "The Political Im/perceptible in the Essay Film: Farocki's Images of the World and the Inscription of War," New German Critique 68 (Spring-Summer 1996): 165–92,
- Astruc, Alexandre, Du stylo à la caméra—et de la caméra au stylo, Paris: L'Archipel, 1992
- Barsam, Richard M., Non-Fiction Film: A Critical History, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1992 (original edition, 1973)
- Bellour, Raymond, editor, L'Entre-image: Photo, cinéma, video, Paris: La Différence,

1990

- Bensmaïa, Réda, The Barthes Effect: The Essay as Reflective Text, Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1987 (original French edition, 1986)
- Blümlinger, Christa, editor, Sprung im Spiegel: Filmisches Wahrnehmen zwischen Fiktion und Wirklichkeit, Vienna: Sonderzahl, 1990
- Blümlinger, Christa, and Constantin Wulff, editors, Schreiben Bilder Sprechen: Texte zum essayistischen Film, Vienna: Sonderzahl, 1992
- Boetcher Joeres, Ruth-Ellen, and Elizabeth Mittman, editors, The Politics of the Essay: Feminist Perspectives, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1993
- Chion, Michel, Audio-Vision: Sound on Screen, New York: Columbia University Press, 1994 (original French edition, 1990)
- Conley, Tom, Film Hieroglyphs: Ruptures in Classical Cinema, Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1991
- Deleuze, Gilles, Cinema 1–2, Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 2 vols., 1986–89 (original French editions, 1983–85)
- Godard, Jean-Luc, Son+Image, New York: Museum of Modern Art, 1993
- Gynn, William, A Cinema of Nonfiction, Rutherford, New Jersey: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, and London: Associated University Presses, 1990
- Halbreich, Kathy, and Bruce Jenkins, editors, Bordering on Fiction: Chantal Akerman's D'Est (exhibition catalogue), Minneapolis: Walker Art Center, 1995
- Images Documentaires* issue on Chris. Marker, 15 (1993)
- Marker, Chris., Commentaires I-II, Paris: Seuil, 2 vols., 1961–67
- Marker, Chris., La Jetée: Ciné Roman, New York: Zone, 1992
- Marker, Chris., Silent Movie (video installation catalogue), Columbus: Ohio State University Wexner Center for the Arts, 1995
- Mueller, Roswitha, Valie Export: Fragments of the Imagination, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1994
- Nichols, Bill, Representing Reality: Issues and Concepts in Documentary, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1991
- Nichols, Bill, Blurred Boundaries: Questions of Meaning in Contemporary Culture, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1994
- Non-Fiction: Über Dokumentarfilme*, Cinema special issue, 39 (1993)
- Renov, Michael, "History and/as Autobiography: The Essayistic in Film and Video," Frame/Work 2/3 (1989):6–13
- Renov, Michael, editor, Theorizing Documentary, New York and London: Routledge, 1993
- Rosenthal, Alan, editor, New Challenges for Documentary, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1988
- Trinh T.Minh-ha, When the Moon Waxes Red: Representation, Gender, and Cultural Politics, New York and London: Routledge, 1991
- Versuch über den Essayfilm*, Augenblick special issue, 10 (1991)

An Essay of Dramatic Poesy

by John Dryden, 1667–68

When John Dryden (1631–1700) published the Essay of Dramatic Poesy late in 1667 or early in 1668, he was already actively engaged in writing for the London stage. He had written, collaborated on, or adapted some seven plays in various genres, including comedy, tragicomedy, and heroic. Inevitably, he had become embroiled in the controversies that arose after the Restoration. Playwrights and critics were beginning to assess their theatrical inheritance and to evaluate precisely what sort of drama gave best expression to the new age's sense of its own modernity.

The Essay was written while Dryden was out of London in flight from the plague. Between June 1665 and December 1666, he was staying at Charlton in Wiltshire, the country estate of his father-in-law, the Earl of Berkshire; this period also saw the composition of the heroically patriotic Annus Mirabilis, the most substantial of Dryden's early attempts to mythologize the Stuart monarchy. Both works have in common the contemporary drama of the sea battles against the Dutch, providing an epic canvas and subject for the poem, and a backdrop and extended metaphor of international conflict for the essay.

Precedent for such a confrontational setting had already been established by some unflattering remarks made upon the English stage by the French commentator Samuel Sorbière in his Relation d'un voyage en Angleterre (1664; Account of a voyage in England). Foreign slanders provoke indignant counterblasts, and, in the following year, Thomas Sprat, the historian of the Royal Society, published his Observations on M. de Sorbière's Voyage into England. At about the same time, Dryden was involved in a debate on the question of rhyme with his brother-in-law and collaborator, Sir Robert Howard (soon to become the Crites of the Essay). In the dedication to The Rival Ladies (1664), Dryden had argued in favor of rhymed drama, to which Howard replied in the preface of his Four New Plays (1665), rejecting the device on the grounds of its "unnaturalness." Here were all the ingredients for civil and international "war," and, in part at least, the writing of the Essay can be seen as an episode in a landscape of critical skirmishes.

Unlike the greater part of Dryden's criticism, which is found in prefaces, prologues, and dedications, the Essay is distinguished by its formally articulated speeches, and by the poise with which conflicting critical positions are offered for the reader's consideration. We are witness to a sophisticated débat between four Restoration gentlemen as they float down the Thames on a barge, the better to catch the sound of "distant Thunder" as the English and Dutch navies "disputed the command of the greater half of the Globe." As his combatants dispute the relative merits of Ancient and Modern drama, of English and French theatrical practice, Dryden conjures up echoes of the Platonic dialogue, although his dramatic reconstructions lack Plato's purposeful drive toward a conclusion. He is at pains to avoid the dogmatism which bedeviled much previous 17th-century criticism. If Dryden has an agenda, it is perhaps no more specific than, as T.S.Eliot suggested in The Use of Poetry and the Use of Criticism (1933), “the necessity of affirming the native element in literature.” As a working dramatist, Dryden has his preferences, but resists that submission to the Rules most often identified with French theorists. Thus, his advocacy of rhyme, echoed in the Essay by Neander, would, in his later career, be revised. In fact, the Essay remains speculative in its presentation of antithetical ideas, and is best characterized by Dryden’s own explanation in his Defence of An Essay of Dramatic Poesy (1688), “My whole discourse was sceptical... You see it is a dialogue sustained by persons of several opinions, all of them left doubtful, to be determined by the readers in general.”

The four occupants of Dryden’s Platonic barge are usually identified with contemporary figures. The three “persons [of] Wit and Quality” are Sir Robert Howard (Crites), Charles Sackville, Lord Buckhurst (Eugenius), and Sir Charles Sedley (Lisideius), and it seems reasonable to assume that the fourth character, Neander, is Dryden himself, the names being almost anagrammatic. Their opening exchanges display the currency of ironic repartee familiar from Restoration comedy, as fears are voiced that an English victory will be heralded by a plethora of outlandish celebrations from those ever-eager “leveller[s] in poetry.” These tart remarks, carrying more than a hint of cultural elitism, lead into a serious discussion of drama.

Lisideius proposes a definition for a play which all accept, although the precise meaning of “A just and lively Image of Human Nature” will be differently interpreted according to each speaker’s idea of how it is that Art should imitate Nature. The Essay is then given over to a series of set speeches in which the companions put forward what they consider to be the best examples of dramatic representation. Crites launches the debate with his advocacy of the Ancients: the radically classical viewpoint. It is true that he states a preference for the plays of “the last age” (Elizabethan and Jacobean) over the present; his central contention, however, is that in classical drama we find the eternal verities, which have never received more powerful expression. The current age has discovered its own genius in scientific progress, but in the theater its best hope is to conform to the rules provided by its predecessors. He cites the application of the pseudo-Aristotelian “Unities” as an example of how far short of the classical model the Moderns have fallen.

Eugenius, in response, attempts to turn Crites’ points against him. Progress in science has been matched by progress in the arts. The Moderns have improved upon the older dramatists’ hackneyed exploitation of myth; furthermore, they are more precise observers of the “Unities,” which, as he accurately observes, are mostly the product of continental criticism. Perhaps most importantly of all, the modern theater has corrected the moral laxity of the Ancients, whose plays too often condoned a “Prosperous Wickedness, and an Unhappy Piety.”

The second topic of debate is introduced by Lisideius. He accepts the success of the earlier English stage, but relocates modern classicism in France. The French are strict observers of the “Unities”; they have rejected that peculiar English hybrid, the tragicomedy; they have modernized and simplified their plots to give them a familiar credibility; and they have engaged in a more searching exploration of human passion. Narration has, to an extent, replaced action, so that the performances are no longer embarrassed by inept death scenes and acts of violence. Out of such classical spareness, claims Lisideius, emerges a new verisimilitude.

It is left to Neander to reply, and to summarize, one suspects, on Dryden's behalf. He acknowledges the superior "decorum" of French drama, but then qualifies his approval by allowing French plays only the lifeless beauty of a statue. And, with a sly glance at the Unity of Place, he describes the scenery moving around two motionless characters as they endlessly declaim. Conversely, the English stage is more vital, more exciting. Subplots and tragicomedy lend variety and contrast, dramatic dialogue is better suited to passion, and even violent action is justified by deference to popular appeal. Neander is realigning the original definition of a play by shifting the focus from "just" to "lively," from an exact verisimilitude to a more dynamic likeness to life.

The Essay has apparently sustained Dryden's claim that it is a skeptical discourse. Three versions of classicism have held the stage, but Neander's deferential conclusions have persuasively illuminated Dryden's true ambition: a vindication of English drama. It is one which will pay sufficient respect to the rules, but which will be generous enough to accommodate the wilder genius of a Shakespeare who "when he describes any thing, you more than see it, you feel it too."

MICHAEL BRUCE

Editions

Of Dramatic Poesy: An Essay, 1667 or 1668; revised edition, 1684; as An Essay of Dramatic Poesy, edited by Thomas Arnold, 1889, P.D.Arundell, 1929, George Watson, 1962., and John L. Mahoney, 1965

Further Reading

- Aden, John M., "Dryden, Corneille, and the Essay of Dramatic Poesy," Review of English Studies 6 (1955):147-56
- Aden, John M., The Critical Opinions of John Dryden: A Dictionary, Nashville, Tennessee: Vanderbilt University Press, 1963
- Archer, S., "The Persons in An Essay of Dramatic Poesy," Papers on Language and Literature 2 (1966):305-14
- Atkins, J.W.H., English Literary Criticism: 17th and 18th Centuries, London: Methuen, 1951
- Davie, D., "Dramatic Poetry: Dryden's Conversation Piece," Cambridge Journal 5 (1952):553-61
- Hume, R.D., Dryden's Criticism, Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press, 1970
- Huntley, Frank L., "On the Persons of Dryden's Essay of Dramatic Poesy," Modern Language Notes 63 (1948):88-95
- Huntley, Frank L., On Dryden's "Essay of Dramatic Poesy", Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1951
- Jensen, H.James, A Glossary of John Dryden's Critical Terms, Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1969
- LeClercq, R. V., "Corneille and An Essay of Dramatic Poesy," Comparative Literature 22

(1970):319–27

LeClercq, R.V., “The Academic Nature of the Whole Discourse of An Essay of Dramatic Poesy,” Papers on Language and Literature 8 (1972):27–38

Mace, D.T., “Dryden’s Dialogue on Drama,” Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institute 25 (1962):87–112

Reverand, C.D., “Dryden’s ‘Essay of Dramatic Poesie’: The Poet and the World of Affairs,” Studies in English Literature 22 (1982):375–93

Thale, Mary, “Dryden’s Dramatic Criticism: Polestar of the Ancients,” Comparative Literature 18 (1966):36–54

Williamson, G., “The Occasion of An Essay of Dramatic Poesy,” Modern Philology 44 (1946):1–9

Wimsatt, W.K., and Cleanth Brooks, Literary Criticism: A Short History, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1978 (original edition, 1957)

An Essay on Comedy

by George Meredith, given as a lecture, 1877; published separately, 1897

George Meredith (1828–1909) first presented what was to be known as the “Essay on Comedy” as a lecture to the London Institution on 1 February 1877. It was his first and only public lecture. In April of that year, the essay was published under the title “On the Idea of Comedy, and of the Uses of the Comic Spirit” in the New Quarterly Magazine. Its first separate publication took place in 1897, in a book titled An Essay on Comedy, and the Uses of the Comic Spirit.

Although Meredith was primarily known as a novelist and poet, he also worked as a journalist, especially in the early years of his career, contributing to the Westminster Review, the Pall Mall Gazette, the Graphic, and the Fortnightly Review, which he also edited for a brief period (November 1867–January 1868). Meredith served as a war correspondent for the Morning Post during the conflict between Italy and Austria in 1866, and, despite his liberal views, he also wrote for the conservative Ipswich Journal from 1858 to 1868. Within this wide range of journalistic prose, the Essay stands out as Meredith’s most significant periodical contribution and his best-known nonfiction prose work. However, the Essay is more closely linked, both stylistically and thematically, to Meredith’s fiction and poetry. Many of the ideas about comedy that he develops in the Essay are put into practice in his short fiction, also published in the New Quarterly Magazine (“The House on the Beach,” 1877; “The Case of General Ople and Lady Camper,” 1877; “The Tale of Chloe,” 1879), and in his most famous novel, The Egoist (1879).

In the Essay, Meredith defines “comedy” primarily by its rarity in British and continental literature, accounting for this absence in part by explaining that comedy demands a particular sociocultural setting. Meredith’s ideal comedy is intellectual; it is “the humour of the mind,” and therefore requires a society “wherein ideas are current and the perceptions quick.” For him, the “thoughtful laughter” of comedy was to serve as a corrective to the “Unreason and Sentimentalism” that permeated British society; its goal was to create a more rational, balanced, and progressive culture while avoiding the emotionally loaded extremes of satire (which Meredith views as meanspirited) and of conciliatory humor. His emphasis on cultural reform provides a link between the Essay and the similarly inspired writings of Matthew Arnold (whose Culture and Anarchy appeared in 1869) and Walter Pater.

If English society, “possessed of wealth and leisure, with many whims, many strange ailments and strange doctors,” was greatly in need of comedy, Meredith believed that the British were likely to be receptive to it, both because Britain’s large middle class provided an appropriate audience, and because, in his view, British women enjoyed a relatively high degree of social freedom. Early in the Essay Meredith stipulates that comedy cannot exist in cultures where one finds a “state of marked social inequality of the sexes.” Much critical attention has been paid to his attempt to link comedy with the status of women, and to promote comedy as a tool for women’s advancement. Meredith’s concern for women manifests itself in the Essay’s frequent references to the condition of women in various cultures throughout history, in its insistence that women should “recognise that the Comic Muse is one of their best friends,” and in various rhetorical strategies, such as his tendency to refer to female comic characters and personifications. His favorite heroines, Molière’s Célimène and Congreve’s Millamant, are praised for their wit, intelligence, and verbal agility, traits that also characterize Meredith’s own heroines, most notably Diana Warwick of Diana of the Crossways (1885).

Meredith’s prose writing is notoriously idiosyncratic, and the Essay, while more readable than many of his novels, is no exception. The difficulty of his sometimes confusing syntax and opaque diction is compounded by the essay’s loose overall structure and his wide-ranging references to ancient dramatists as well as to contemporary British and continental writers. The didactic tone of the Essay bears witness to its origin as a lecture, as well as to his primary stylistic influence, Thomas Carlyle, with whom Meredith shared a belief in the value of work and in the healing power of laughter.

Although Meredith’s literary influence has lessened considerably in the 20th century, the impact of the Essay can be traced in writers as diverse as Oscar Wilde and Virginia Woolf. As the most extensive discussion of the comic genre produced in the 19th century, the Essay remains frequently cited in studies of British comedy and in discussions of the role of women in comedy.

MAURA IVES

Editions

An Essay on Comedy, and the Uses of the Comic Spirit, 1897; edited by Lane Cooper, 1918, reprinted 1972, and Maura Ives, 1997

Further Reading

Beer, Gillian, Meredith: A Change of Masks: A Study of the Novels, London: Athlone Press, 1970

Carlson, Susan, Women and Comedy: Rewriting the British Theatrical Tradition, Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1991

Henkle, Roger B., Comedy and Culture: England, 1820–1900, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1980

McWhirter, David, “Feminism/Gender/Comedy: Meredith, Woolf, and the Reconfiguration of Comic Distance,” in Look Who’s Laughing: Gender and Comedy, edited by Gail Finney, Langhorne, Pennsylvania: Gordon and Breach, 1994:189–204

Martin, Robert Bernard, The Triumph of Wit: A Study of Victorian Comic Theory, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1974

Moses, Joseph, The Novelist as Comedian: George Meredith and the Ironic Sensibility, New York: Schocken, 1983

Polhemus, Robert, Comic Faith: The Great Tradition from Austen to Joyce, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1980

Stevenson, Lionel, The Ordeal of George Meredith, New York: Scribner, 1953; London: Owen, 1954

Stevenson, Lionel, “Carlyle and Meredith,” in Carlyle and His Contemporaries, edited by John Clubbe, Durham, North Carolina: Duke University Press, 1976:257–79

Wilt, Judith, The Readable People of George Meredith, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1975

An Essay on Criticism

by Alexander Pope, 1711

Alexander Pope (1688–1744) was 23 when An Essay on Criticism was published anonymously in May 1711. It appeared while he was engaged in some fairly orthodox prentice work in the pastoral mode, and is flanked by the publication of the Pastorals (1709) and Windsor-Forest (1713). There is an implied context of sophisticated, metropolitan literary life very different from the landscapes of classical eclogue and georgic, although arguably both these worlds coexist in another work of that time, the first version of The Rape of the Lock in 1712. It has been notoriously difficult to identify a precise date of composition for the Essay, but it seems likely that many of the preoccupations were the direct product of what Pope described to Joseph Spence as his “great reading period” of 1701–09. These were years when Pope “went through all the best critics,” and a time also when he fell under the intellectual patronage of William Walsh, who gave wise advice against the tyranny of the “mechanical rules” of neoclassicism. The poem’s appearance immediately provoked a hostile response from John Dennis, who had located an ironic portrait of himself. By the end of the year, however, Joseph Addison had come to Pope’s defense in the Spectator (no. 253), and a month later there was a second “issue,” although a “Second Edition” was not published until November 1712.

There is a long history, extending into the Twentieth-century, of selling the Essay short as a meretricious compendium of critical commonplaces. In his Spectator paper, Addison had drawn attention to the unmethodical structure of the work, reminiscent of Horace’s Ars poetica (The Poetic Art), and had noted the names that stood behind Pope’s verses:

in particular, Aristotle and Longinus (On the Sublime). He had also endorsed Pope as an example of his own maxim, “What oft was thought, but ne’er so well express’d.” But those features that had met with the essayist’s approval, and Pope’s refreshing attempt to reconcile various strands of classical and 17th-century theory, were unlikely to survive the scrutiny of Romantic criticism. De Quincey’s reaction is predictably extreme: for him, the Essay was “substantially a mere versification, like a metrical multiplication-table of commonplaces the most mouldy with which criticism has baited its rat-traps.” Closer attention to the text might have revealed that Pope’s unwillingness to be hampered by any sort of prescriptive formalism made allowance even for the sublime ambitions of Romanticism; but it was inevitable that the debates concerning neoclassical “rules” would find little sympathy by the end of the 18th century. Twentieth-century scholarship has made efforts to rehabilitate the Essay; yet, as recently as 1976, James Reeves concluded that “Pope’s virtuosity has succeeded in blinding [us] to the emptiness and derivative quality of most of what he says” (The Reputation and Writings of Alexander Pope).

Addison’s citation of Horace, and his mention of the Latin poet’s dependency upon Aristotle, highlight the Augustan ethos of tradition and allusion, pointing up its distance from the Romantic preoccupation with “originality.” The Spectator essay was a reminder that Pope’s poem was very much an exercise in consolidation which naturally involved a backwardlooking reflex. Here was an attempt at a judicial review of various modern opinions, all of which claimed the sanction of classical authority. There was an insistence upon the positive and fostering role of the critic whose relationship with the text given into his care was figured in images of friendship rather than competition. And there was a warning against those forms of unregulated individualism and vested interest that persistently distort critical judgment: snobbery, faction, arrogance, modishness, all encourage us in the belief that only our own watches tell the correct time. The critic had a social responsibility which took precedence over the eccentric satisfactions of ego. Taste and morality were not divisible.

By 1711, there was already a minor “tradition” of versified poetic theory. In 1674 Boileau had published his Art poétique (The Art of Poetry), one of many of its type, and soon the French inclination to codify literary “laws” had become a matter for debate among Restoration men of letters. The Earls of Mulgrave and Roscommon, both mentioned approvingly by Pope, respectively brought out an Essay upon Poetry (1682) and an Essay on Translated Verse (1684). Immediately distinctive is Pope’s choice of subject, but it is quickly apparent that he is as much concerned with the business of poetry as he is with criticism. Behind all this activity stands the Ars poetica. The relaxed urbanity of Horace’s verse letter provided Pope with the ideal model: “Horace still charms with graceful negligence,/And without method talks us into sense.” The easy transitions of the “epistle” could perhaps have conflicted with the conventions of the “essay,” but, in fact, there is both fluidity and orderliness in Pope’s poem.

The risk lay in giving birth to an unacceptable hybrid. Certainly the satirical vein in Pope’s verse, with its pyrotechnical wit and substratum of sexual innuendo, might be predicted to undermine the dignity associated with the traditional prose “essay.” However, it is not a form which claims any structured conclusiveness; it is, after all, a “trying out,” and hence possesses a resistance to formalism which was entirely appropriate to Pope's poem. In this sense, his piece had much in common with the early 18th-century journalistic essay. Both are marked by a conversational "easiness" and the balanced, periodic sentences of the prose essayists find their equivalent in Pope's deployment of the heroic couplet, and in the antithetical and epigrammatic quality of the verse. Again, there are larger structures to be discovered, but, in keeping with the tradition of the "essay," symmetry is not an ambition. It is possible to map out a tripartite division, but the sections are unequal in length and loosely coupled. Part I establishes the notion of an ideal Nature, "one clear, unchanged, and universal light," and directs us to discover it in the "Ancients." Part II catalogues the moral and psychological causes of bad criticism. Part III makes suggestions for its rehabilitation, and concludes with a roll call of exemplary critics, both ancient and modern.

In ways reminiscent of Dryden's Essay of Dramatic Poesy (1667–68), Pope set out to navigate between contentious positions. Opposed to neoclassicism's insistence on regulations, Pope's advice was to seek out the "useful Laws" of Greece and Rome, and his characteristically Augustan injunction was to "Avoid extremes." Thus the French were too servile in their deference to the "Rules," while the English, "fierce for the Liberties of Wit," could be too stubbornly individualistic. The crisis Pope attempts to resolve concerns the nature of authority. At times, when dealing with the "bookful blockheads," the essayist gives way to the satirist, yet above all the poem is penetrated by a conciliatory intelligence. Pope is the liberal neoclassicist who respects Horace's recommended "decorum," but never at the expense of that inspired moment of poetic passion which "gloriously offend[s]" to "snatch a grace beyond the reach of art." Pope's commitment to tradition encouraged him to normalize the idiosyncratic; he had no intention, however, of circumscribing genius by "dull receipts."

MICHAEL BRUCE

Editions

An Essay on Criticism, 1711; edited by E.Audra Williams and Aubrey Williams, 1961, Robert M.Schmitz, 1962, Raymond Southall, 1973, and S.L.Paul, 1988

Further Reading

- Aden, John M., "'First follow nature': Strategy and Stratification in An Essay on Criticism," Journal of English and Germanic Philology 55 (1956):604–17
- Adler, Jacob H., "Balance in Pope's Essays," English Studies 43 (1962):457–67
- Atkins, G.Douglas, "Fair Art's 'Treach'rous Colours'," in his Quests of Difference: Reading Pope's Poems, Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1986
- Atkins, J.W.H., English Literary Criticism: 17th and 18th Centuries, New York: Barnes and Noble, 1950; London: Methuen, 1951
- Brown, Laura, "The 'New World' of Augustan Humanism," in her Alexander Pope, Oxford and New York: Blackwell, 1985
- Empson, William, "Wit in the Essay on Criticism," in his The Structure of Complex Words, London: Hogarth Press, 1985; Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University

Press, 1989 (original edition, 1951)

Fenner, Arthur, "The Unity of Pope's Essay on Criticism" Philological Quarterly 39 (1960):435–46

Fogle, R.H., "Metaphors of Organic Unity in Pope's Essay on Criticism" Tulane Studies in English 13 (1963):51–58

Hooker, E.N., "Pope on Wit: The Essay on Criticism, in The Seventeenth Century: Studies in the History of English Thought and Literature from Bacon to Pope by R.F.Jones and others writing in his honor, Stanford, California: Stanford University Press, 1951

Isles, D., "Pope and Criticism," in Alexander Pope, edited by Peter Dixon, London: Bell and Hyman, and Athens: Ohio University Press, 1972

Morris, D.B., "Civilized Reading: The Act of Judgment in An Essay on Criticism," in The Art of Alexander Pope, edited by H. Erskine-Hill and A.Smith, London: Vision Press, and New York: Barnes and Noble, 1979

Ramsay, P., "The Watch of Judgement: Relativism in An Essay on Criticism," in Criticism and Aesthetics, 1660–1800, edited by Howard Anderson and John S.Shea, Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1967

Spacks, P.M., "Imagery and Method in An Essay on Criticism," in Pope: Recent Essays by Several Hands, edited by Maynard Mack and James A.Winn, Brighton: Harvester Press, and Hamden, Connecticut: Archon, 1980

Wimsatt, W.K., and Cleanth Brooks, Literary Criticism: A Short History, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1978 (original edition, 1957)

An Essay on Man

by Alexander Pope, 1733–34

An Essay on Man is a series of four verse epistles by Alexander Pope (1688–1744) addressed to the politician and man of letters Henry St. John, Lord Bolingbroke (1678–1751). It was intended to form Book I of a comprehensive series of essays, to be called Ethic Epistles, which was also to include Pope's Epistles to Several Persons on the characters of men and of women and on the use of riches. This plan was never finally settled or put into effect, but the Essay on Man stands as his most ambitious attempt at setting out his philosophical beliefs, or his "general Map of Man."

Pope began the Essay in 1729. By 1731 he had completed Epistles I-III and had begun Epistle IV. He may then have set the work aside for a period, before publishing Epistles I-III in 1733 and Epistle IV in 1734. Pope had made enemies in the vigorous and often scurrilous literary politics of his time; hence in order to gain the Essay an unprejudiced reception, its first publication was anonymous. It was reprinted with minor revisions in the nine authorized editions of Pope's works published in his lifetime as well as appearing in pirated editions.

Each of the four Epistles is in effect a separate essay, discussing man's place in the universe (I), psychology (II), society (III), and the sources of happiness (IV). These discussions touch on major controversies or developments in 18th-century thought.

Epistle I employs the arguments of natural religion, the attempt to show that the existence of God and other orthodox religious doctrines could be inferred by reason. In confining himself to these arguments, Pope excludes biblical revelation. This need not mean that he rejected the authority of the Bible, though this conclusion has been drawn by some readers from the time the Essay was first published. It may mean rather that Pope wrote for an audience not responsive to traditional religious discourse and that he wished to demonstrate to this audience the compatibility between reason and at least some aspects of Christian orthodoxy. Epistle II expounds the doctrine that each person is governed by a particular “ruling passion,” which reason cannot overcome but may guide. Throughout the poem Pope gives surprising prominence and importance to the passions and to instinct, arguing in Epistle III that human reason is less reliable than animal instinct. In its frequent allusions to the discoveries of Isaac Newton, the Essay reveals skepticism about the usefulness of the new empirical science. Against this science Pope asserts the humanist idea that “The proper study of Mankind is Man,” and that this study is even more demanding than the physical sciences. The prevailing theme of the Essay is a characteristic 18th-century optimism that all aspects of creation, including apparent evils, work together to produce an inclusive good, which may however be beyond the grasp of human understanding.

The Essay also incorporates traditional teachings of classical and Christian philosophers and moralists. It envisages Creation as a “great chain of being,” a hierarchical gradation in which each species has its allotted place. Its history of human society begins with the mythic “golden age,” a state of nature in which all creatures lived in peace. The discussion of happiness in Epistle IV teaches that true happiness consists not in accidents of fortune, like wealth or social rank, nor in military or political achievements, nor even in wisdom, but in virtue. This is a teaching familiar in Roman moralists and poets such as Seneca and Horace. The Essay takes on its most sternly Christian coloration when it attacks human pride and emphasizes the limits of human knowledge and capacities.

This emphasis relates the poem to the questioning and tentative character of the essay as practiced by Montaigne. Pope’s mistrust of systematic science also leads him to adopt the aim of Bacon’s essays, to treat not abstruse but everyday subjects, which “come home to men’s business and bosoms.” One model for Pope’s style are the epistles of Horace, with their good-humored urbanity. Nevertheless there is a tension between, on the one hand, Pope’s protestations of modesty and his insistence on human ignorance, and, on the other, the ambitious scope of his poem and his air of unruffled confidence in his own knowledge and understanding.

The Essay exhibits Pope’s characteristic uses of his verse form, the rhyming couplet. It abounds in parallelism and antithesis and in epigrams and aphorisms. Occasionally the demands of argumentation produce excessively elliptical language, but in general the poem has an easy, conversational quality. This is created by Pope’s use of question and answer and of direct address to an imagined interlocutor. Sometimes the interlocutor’s understanding or opinion is presented only to be disproved or ridiculed; sometimes the interlocutor is imagined to be the poem’s addressee Bolingbroke and is treated respectfully. Vigor and a sense of debate are injected by the poem’s rhetorical questions, its exclamations of wonder or outrage, and its occasional ecstatic visions. An effect of comprehensiveness and variety, appropriate to the poem's large subject, is produced by its lists and catalogues. These may detail the wonders of the universe or the varieties of human nature produced under the direction of wisdom, or they may detail the follies of humanity in doubting or resisting that wisdom. Pope draws on historical examples, such as Alexander the Great or Oliver Cromwell, though the Essay on Man generally lacks the vivid narrative episodes and character sketches that mark his Epistles to Several Persons. Pope's own summary of his style is "happily to steer/From grave to gay, from lively to severe;/Correct with spirit, eloquent with ease,/Intent to reason, or polite to please."

The Essay was widely admired in the 18th century. Besides its English editions, about 100 translations were published. It is frequently quoted by the philosopher Immanuel Kant and was imitated by Voltaire (Discours en vers sur l'homme [1736; Discourse in verse on man]). However, since the 19th century the didacticism, rationalism, and optimism of the Essay have caused it to fall from critical favor.

ANTHONY MILLER

Editions

An Essay on Man, 4 vols., 1733–34; edited by Maynard Mack, 1950

Further Reading

Brower, Reuben A., Alexander Pope: The Poetry of Allusion, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1959

Brown, Laura, Alexander Pope, Oxford and New York: Blackwell, 1985

Ferguson, Rebecca, The Unbalanced Mind: Pope and the Rule of Passion, Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, and Brighton: Harvester, 1986

Nuttall, A.D., Pope's "Essay on Man", London and Boston: Allen and Unwin, 1984

Sutherland, John, "Wit, Reason, Vision and 'An Essay on Man'," Modern Language Quarterly 30 (1969):356–69

White, Douglas, Pope and the Context of Controversy: The Manipulation of Ideas in "An Essay on Man", Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1970

An Essay on the Principle of Population

by Thomas Malthus, 1798; revised edition, 1803

In 1797, Thomas Malthus (1766–1834) read "Of Avarice and Profusion," an essay by William Godwin, author of the famous and influential An Enquiry Concerning Political Justice (1793). Godwin believed there could be justice and happiness for all in a society regulated by reason. To Malthus, Godwin's utopianism marked its proponent as a person blind to the biological facts of human nature. For social progress to continue, solutions would have to be found to the problem of an increasing disproportion between population growth and food supplies. This was Malthus' observation in An Essay on the Principle of Population as It Affects the Future Improvement of Society, with Remarks on the Speculations of Mr. Godwin, M. Condorcet, and Other Writers, which he published anonymously in 1798.

His book caused an enormous outcry, with charges that he was barbarous and inhumane, given his underlying belief that if natural disasters did not check the increase of population, then little could be done by humankind itself, short of cruelty to children: a baby is, he pointed out, "comparatively speaking, of little value to the society, as others will immediately supply its place." Malthus felt the force of his critics' charges that he lacked feeling in his pessimism. In 1803, he published a revision in which he sought to ameliorate the severity of earlier conclusions by arguing that people should exercise "moral restraint," and delay marriage, and so children, until they could afford to support them. The revised Essay went through six editions in Malthus' lifetime, with a seventh shortly after his death in 1834.

Malthus began with the empirical fact that nature wastes a great deal of life. Everything alive has the potential for enormous proliferation; why, then, doesn't a single species fill the earth up to its capacity for reproduction? Malthus' answer included the facts of history and experience, that death and destruction were checks to runaway population growth.

Adam Smith had demonstrated, in his Wealth of Nations (1776), that workers are a commodity which, when increased in production, will suffer a decline in value. In other words, when there are too many people competing for jobs, there will be a consequent decline in the number of people. The economics of wealth production and distribution were functions of population growth and food supplies. Malthus had read Smith's book, as he had read others on these subjects, and so he began with the widely understood proposition that no species of life can multiply beyond the capacity of nature to provide food. Malthus, appointed as a professor of political economy in 1805, developed the implications of his essay on population for various problems of macroeconomics.

There are two postulates from experience from which Malthus argues: "First, that food is necessary to the existence of man. Secondly, that the passion between the sexes is necessary and will remain nearly in its present state." The burden of the Essay on Population is to show how these postulates lead to painful conclusions that "the power of population is indefinitely greater than the power in the earth to produce subsistence for man," and "population, when unchecked, increases in a geometrical ratio. Subsistence increases only in an arithmetical ratio." This Malthusian thesis has been debated ever since.

Since Malthus was responding to the rationalist utopias of Godwin and Condorcet, his Essay on Population takes on the tone of polemic and often satirizes the objects of his criticism. He ridicules the argument of Condorcet for indefinite prolongation of human life, saying that "we may shut our eyes to the book of nature, as it will no longer be of any use to read it." He dismisses Godwin's abstract reasoning, asserting that "his conjectures certainly far outstrip the modesty of nature." Of Godwin's prediction that sexual passion will diminish with the progress of society, Malthus ironically observes that "no observable progress whatever has hitherto been made."

When Charles Darwin read Malthus' Essay, he found there a clue to solve the mystery of the origin of species, since Malthus wrote that “the prodigious waste of human life occasioned by this perpetual struggle for room and food was more than supplied by the mighty power of population, acting in some degree, unshackled from the constant habit of emigration.” In his Origin of Species (1859), Darwin refers to “the doctrine of Malthus applied with manifold force to the whole animal and vegetable kingdoms.” Karl Marx, on the other hand, in Das Kapital (1867–95; Capital) attacks Malthus’ Essay as a “schoolboyish, superficial plagiarist,” and proceeds to make an ad hominem attack on Malthus as a parson of the English State Church.

Malthus published his Investigation of the Cause of the Present High Price of Provisions in 1800, explaining how increased demand, with population growth, will drive up prices, and higher prices will lead to the necessary “checks” of misery. In 1820 he published Principles of Political Economy Considered with a View to Their Practical Application, in which he makes the radical suggestion of public works for the unemployed, to increase means to meet increased demand. As in the Essay on Population, these later essays wrestled with the challenges of balancing production with consumption, though they posed the problems in less graphic and brutal terms.

Anyone who writes of economics or demographics after the publication of Malthus’ Essay on Population must take into account the issues, problems, and solutions which were raised in that classic statement. From Darwin and Marx to John Maynard Keynes and Barry Commoner, there has continued to be a fierce debate on prospects for social progress and individual happiness in a world of burgeoning population, environmental degradation, and improved technologies for food production. It is a measure of his mark on subsequent history that Malthus has lent his name to opponents in the debate between “Anti-Malthusians” and “Neo-Malthusians.”

RICHARD D.McGHEE

Editions

An Essay on the Principle of Population as It Affects the Future Improvement of Society, with Remarks on the Speculations of Mr. Godwin, M. Condorcet, and Other Writers, 1798; revised edition, 1803; many subsequent editions, including those edited by Antony Flew, 1970, Philip Appleman, 1976, E.A. Wrigley and David Souden, 1986, and Geoffrey Gilbert, 1993

Further Reading

Commoner, Barry, The Closing Circle: Nature, Man, and Technology, New York: Knopf, 1971

Godwin, William, An Enquiry Concerning Political Justice, Harmondsworth and New York: Penguin, 1985 (original edition, 1793)

Godwin, William, Of Population, New York: Augustus M. Kelley, 1964 (original edition, 1820)

Heilbroner, Robert L., An Inquiry into the Human Prospect: Updated and Reconsidered for the 1980s, New York: Norton, 1980; revised edition, as An Inquiry into the Human

Prospect: Looked at Again for the 1990s, Norton, 1991

James, Patricia, Population Malthus: His Life and Times, London and Boston: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1979

Parsons, Jack, Population Versus Liberty, London: Pemberton, 1971; Buffalo, New York: Prometheus, 1973

Perrot, Michelle, "Malthusianism and Socialism," in Malthus Past and Present, edited by Jacques Dupaguiet, Antoinette FauveChamoux, and E.Grebenik, London and New York: Academic Press, 1983

Smith, Kenneth, The Malthusian Controversy, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1951; New York: Octagon, 1978

Turner, Michael, editor, Malthus and His Time, Basingstoke: Macmillan, and New York: St.Martin's Press, 1986

The Examiner

British periodical, 1710–1711, 1712–14

In November 1710 Jonathan Swift assumed the writing of a weekly paper consisting of a single political essay, in support of the policies of Robert Harley, the moderate Tory minister. The 13 numbers already produced (by several of the foremost Tory writers, most notably Henry St.John, Francis Atterbury, and Matthew Prior) had leaned too hard to the right to suit Harley's bipartisan method. After Swift left off the project in June 1711, a few more numbers were written by Mary Delarivière Manley before the paper lapsed, to be revived in 1712 to run for two more years, with less distinction, under William Oldisworth; but the significance of the Examiner lies almost wholly in Swift's 33 essays.

The signal distinction of Swift's essays is their marriage of topical politics with a classical equanimity that sets a tone high above the raw-knuckled brawling of much Queen Anne period journalism. Writing from behind the veil of anonymity, Swift could lament the "mad, ridiculous Extreams" of both parties and profess a desire to lend a disinterested "impartial Hand" in the cause of national sanity (no. 16). Of course, Swift's readers have always known that under this purportedly impartial treatment, the Whigs consistently come out the worse for wear. The justly famous no. 15, "Upon the Art of Political Lying," for instance, decries a general decline in truth in favor of expediency but illustrates this general corruption by alluding only to Whig leaders, who, we are told, have overshadowed the "Father of lies" by their "continual Improvements" upon his art. Compared to the frontal attacks of most contemporary political essayists, however, the allusiveness of this satire gives an impression of judiciousness and restraint.

Swift maintained this elevated tone, at least in the early numbers, by ignoring with cool contempt the attacks of opposing writers—"hedge-writers," he calls them, or, in a delightfully disdainful phrase that is perhaps prescient of the Lilliputians, his "little Antagonists" (no. 18). The most persistent antagonist, Arthur Mainwaring, whose Medley was published each Monday to counter the Examiner of the preceding Thursday, ably criticized the the Examiner's representations of the Whig leaders; but Swift kept to his satiric objects instead of being baited into defending his previous issues. As a result of this strategy—and of his obvious care with the composition—Swift’s best essays seem independent and self-contained in contrast to the skirmishing of other political periodicals of the day.

Even more essential to the impression of equanimity was the playfully indirect manner of Swift’s satire. In the essay commonly called the “Impeachment of Verres” (no. 18), for example, not until the midpoint does the real topic surface: the gluttonous exploitation of Ireland by Thomas Wharton during his recent term as Lord-Lieutenant. The opening paragraphs entertain the question of how one is to write on current politics without reflecting scandalously on specific politicians. Noting that some writers have mined ancient texts for parallel histories, the Examiner complains that his own search of Livy and Tacitus for a model of the corrupt senator or proconsul has failed to produce any that he could use “without doing Injury to a Roman memory.” The expectations aroused by these tantalizing preliminaries are not disappointed when Swift’s persona finally announces that he has found a workable parallel in Cicero’s orations impeaching Verres (whose name means “hog”), Roman Governor of Sicily, and presents a selective abstract of the speeches. Swift identifies his target only by highlighting precisely those abuses for which Wharton was criticized—selling public offices to the highest bidder, rendering the law arbitrary, defiling the churches (Verres stole statuary; Wharton smashed furniture and urinated on the altar). Although the reflections on Wharton made by this typology seem damning enough, the Examiner concludes the essay by noting his disappointment that “modern Corruptions are not to be parallel’d by ancient Examples, without having recourse to Poetry and Fable.” In this final move the Examiner evinces the detachment that rankled his opponents, as he treats the demolition of a prominent politician as though merely a thorny artistic exercise.

Arguably the most powerful Examiner essay, the “Bill of Ingratitude” (no. 17) makes a more open attack on its object, the abuses of office by Marlborough; yet the manner again demonstrates a detached irony. It was Swift’s task to deflate the charge by Whig writers that stripping Marlborough of command of the military was to reward heroic service with base ingratitude. The Examiner warms to the task by suggesting that with the enormous wealth he has accumulated from state gifts and privileges, the former Captain-General can hardly be pitied as neglected.

The master-stroke comes deep into the essay, when the Examiner inverts the charge that the British do not reward their heroes as honorably as did the Romans by tallying the gains of a Roman general, under the heading “Roman Gratitude,” against the gains of Marlborough in a second column, ironically headed “British Ingratitude.” Although the inclusion of a balance sheet in a political essay was not entirely new (Defoe had used the device in A Review of the Affairs of France [1704–13]), Swift recognized and took advantage of its potential for satire. The list of Roman gifts is lengthy, miscellaneous, and more honorific than substantial (a bull, a statue, a costly garment, and so on); by contrast, the British column seems meagre in number of gifts, but the items listed (estates, offices, grants, pensions) are followed by valuations in five and six digits. The last item in the British list, “Employments” valued at 100,000 pounds, is set across from “A Crown of Lawrel,” at two pence, dramatizing the magnitude of Marlborough’s gains and deftly implying that his aims were more pecuniary than heroic all along. Moreover, this one line of the account serves as an emblem for the disjuncture between the classical heritage of English (Tory) culture and the grasping commercial ambition of the Whigs.

The Tory readership of the Examiner—mostly rural gentry and parish priests—needed little persuading to believe the worst of the Whig leaders. What Swift provided them was an image of their own political orientation that communicated an unflappable confidence. More than argument or style, it is this austere tone which distinguishes the Examiner from all of its contemporaries.

STEPHEN M.ADAMS

See also Periodical Essay

Editions

The Prose Works of Jonathan Swift, vol. 3, edited by Herbert Davis, 1957

Swift vs. Mainwaring: “The Examiner” and “The Medley”, edited by Frank H.Ellis, 1985

Further Reading

Cook, Richard I., “‘Mr. Examiner’ and ‘Mr. Review’: The Tory Apologetics of Swift and Defoe,” Huntington Library Quarterly 2,9 (1966):127–46

Ellis, Frank H., “‘A Quill Worn to the Pith in the Service of the State’: Swift’s Examiner,” in Proceedings of the First Munster Symposium of Jonathan Swift, edited by Hermann J.Real and Heinz J.Vienken, Munich: Fink, 1985

Rembert, James A.W., Swift and the Dialectical Tradition, Basingstoke: Macmillan, and New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1988

Speck, W.A., “The Examiner Examined: Swift’s Tory Pamphleteering,” in Swift, edited by C.J.Rawson, London: Sphere, 1971

Speck, W.A., “The Examiner Re-Examined,” Prose Studies 16 (1993):36–43

F

Die Fackel

Austrian journal, 1899–1936

Die Fackel (The torch) was an extremely influential literary and cultural journal edited and published by Karl Kraus primarily in Vienna. Even more than contemporaneous literary and cultural journals such as Herwarth Walden's Der Sturm (The storm) and Franz Pfemfert's Die Aktion (The action), DF is indistinguishable from its extraordinary editor. While these other journals published numerous authors, DF always featured Kraus' writings and, from 1911, published only his works. Book-length collections such as Kraus' Sittlichkeit und Kriminalität (1923; Morality and criminality), and his apocalyptic play, Die letzten Tage der Menschheit (1918; The Last Days of Mankind), were first serialized in DF. Kraus expressed his often caustic satire in essays, aphorisms, and even poems, generating a large following as well as a great number of detractors who often became the subjects of Kraus' remarks.

DF appeared three times a month through 1904; after that time the journal was published quarterly, though it often appeared irregularly as the result of frequent double and multiple issues. It had a circulation of approximately 9000 copies from 1910 to 1936 (Harry Zohn, 1971). The polemical tone of DF was clear in the inaugural issue (April 1899) in which Kraus, playing on a Viennese daily newspaper's practice of telling readers "Was wir bringen" (What we will publish), announced in an essay "Was wir umbringen" (What we will destroy). Frequent targets of DF were the daily press and the Viennese justice system, both of which Kraus faulted for double standards and superficiality. Throughout the tenure of DF, Kraus' indignation was directed especially at the popular Viennese paper, Die Neue Freie Presse (The new free press). Attempting to distance himself from the dailies, Kraus refused advertising after the June 1901 issue and even purported not to take the desires of readers into account, stating that the content of each issue was determined solely by his own priorities. Kraus' satires reflected his belief that language, culture, and politics were connected; thus he linked what he perceived as a misuse of language with the immorality and injustice of Austrian cultural and political institutions.

Kraus' harsh assessments extended beyond the press and the justice system, however, and included psychoanalysis, Zionism, and educational institutions. In essays as well as sections entitled "Glossen" (glosses) and "Universitätsbummel" (A stroll around the university), Kraus criticized the educational structures of the day, implicating them in Austria's (and Europe's) decline. He attacked nepotism, rote learning, and the inculcation of bourgeois notions of morality and decorum. In a June 1899 entry Kraus suggested the extent to which nepotism affected the hiring practices of Viennese universities and provided a table listing such instances. Essays such as Adolf Loos' "Der moderne Schulmeister" (April 1904; The modern schoolmaster) identified the schoolmaster as someone who cripples students through "rules, formulas, and numbers." Other writers advancing similar critiques in DF before 1911 included Peter Altenberg, Else Lasker-Schüler, Franz Werfel, and Albert Ehrenstein.

Kraus was a pacifist and an incessant critic of the militarism that was leading Germany and Austria to war. He focused with great zeal on the hypocritical statements and manipulation of language that he believed characterized the actions of many of Vienna and Berlin's most educated and powerful citizens. Few people were spared Kraus' satire, and many writers and artists who were once his friends found themselves accused of commercialism and pandering to popular taste. During the war Kraus often noted the actions of politicians and professors without comment, allowing what he saw as their brutality and irrationality to speak for themselves. In "Glossen" (1916), for instance, he quoted a group of professors who said Germany should not "sheath its sword." In the same issue Kraus reprinted a popular postcard of the time that featured a model-scale church altar made out of shrapnel from grenades, a juxtaposition of war and religion that Kraus found self-evidently ludicrous.

Like Nietzsche, Kraus was a master stylist and often used epigrams and aphorisms to criticize cultural institutions. Kraus' aphorisms addressed nearly every aspect of Austrian culture, and were so prolific that several collections were created from DF. In one aphorism, he aptly described himself: "Many share my intentions, but I do not share theirs." Kraus often played upon the ambiguity of words and exploited their multiple meanings as if to counterbalance the pedestrian uses to which language had been subjected.

DF led to a number of imitative journals and pamphlets within Austria, some of which, like Der Fackel-Reiter (The torch rider), even used the term "Fackel" in their titles. Kraus also influenced German editors and publishers including Herwarth Walden, editor of Der Sturm, and Kurt Wolff, who founded the Kurt Wolff publishing company. Walden helped Kraus establish a short-lived Berlin edition of DF, and his journal, Der Sturm, adopted Kraus' aesthetic and cultural criticism. Wolff was so impressed with Kraus that he established a publishing company—Verlag der Schriften von Karl Kraus—devoted solely to works by Kraus.

The end of World War I did not make Kraus any more sanguine about Austrian cultural institutions or the ethics of his fellow citizens. Poems were frequent in postwar editions of DF and Kraus' interest in the intricacies of language and culture was more pronounced. His prose poems were another means of exploiting the richness of language, but it was his familiar criticisms rather than his lyricism which distinguished them. In "Optimismus" (1925; Optimism) he detailed the ills of Austrian culture, wishing for a day in which the printed word is no longer analogous to lying. Because of Kraus' earlier vociferous criticism of the conditions leading to war, his silence concerning Hitler's rise to power was conspicuous; he published only one issue of DF in 1933. In explaining this hiatus to critics who accused him of cowardice, Kraus wrote that with regard to Hitler he had “nothing to say,” a statement typical in its ambiguity and in the controversy it evoked. DF was published fitfully from 1934 to Kraus’ death on 12 June 1936.

CHRISTOPHER P. MCCLINTICK

Further Reading

- Bilke, Martina, Zeitgenossen der “Fackel”, Vienna: Locker, 1981
- Halliday, John D., Karl Kraus, Franz Pfemfert and the First World War: A Comparative Study of “Die Fackel” and “Die Aktion” Between 1911 and 1928, Passau: Haller, 1986
- Jenaczek, Friedrich, Zeittafeln zur “Fackel”: Themen, Ziele, Probleme, Gräfelfing bei München: Kosel, 1965
- Timms, Edward, Karl Kraus: Apocalyptic Satirist: Culture and Catastrophe in Habsburg Vienna, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1986
- Zohn, Harry, Karl Kraus, New York: Twayne, 1971

Familiar Essay

The familiar essayist has commonly been characterized as curious—in constant search for the significance of the mundane. His or her subjects “spring naturally from the affairs of everyday life.” Familiar essays themselves have traditionally been highly informal in tone, often humorous, valuing lightness of touch above all else. They have been filled with intimate personal observations and reflections, and have emphasized the concrete and tangible, the sensual enjoyment of everyday pleasures. Usually brief, familiar essays have long affected a feeling of careless spontaneity so strong that perhaps no other type of essay is as dependent for its success and popularity on its ability to “present a personality.”

Montaigne, who wrote “I confess myself in public,” produced essays considered familiar. The first popular familiar essayists, however, appeared in the 18th century, especially in Joseph Addison’s and Richard Steele’s Spectator (1711–12; 1714) and Samuel Johnson’s Rambler (1750–52) and Idler (1758–60). Besides their casual tone, these essays were “familiar” because they induced the reader to join the author at a double level. Addison’s essays in the Spectator, as well as most Eighteenth-century essays, are concerned, explicitly and implicitly, with belonging, with membership; the reader is constantly encouraged to recognize kinship, to distinguish himself from one group and ally himself with another. Eighteenth-century familiarity inevitably drew readers into the rhetoric of the essay and induced them to participate in an alliance with the author in a way that essays before that century almost never did.

However, it was in the 19th century—a period of material well-being in England, when there was a leisure class who enjoyed literature, when an education was received by many among the masses—that the familiar essay fully came into its own. The familiar essayist, as Sister Mary Eleanore wrote (1923), “is a veritable Jaques upon a mossy bank, who, while he watches the world go jostling its way down the river of life, extracts from its seemingly confused and meaningless tumbling bits of loving wisdom and quaint chuckles of fun ...” He soothes the pains of the world’s tired travel, and does so through his ability to be whimsical, grave, melancholy, through his love of living and sense of humor over “those ridiculous and pathetic incongruities which are such a necessary part of life.”

The familiar essay reached its zenith with Charles Lamb. Though living a melancholy and often tragic life, Lamb created in his essays a narrator “in love with this green earth,” one who hid wisdom under playfulness. His Essays of Elia (1823, 1828) includes autobiographical pieces such as “A Chapter on Ears” and “Imperfect Sympathies” (in which he is quick to admit to his prejudices), and humorous or farcical ones such as “A Dissertation upon Roast Pig” and “Mrs. Battle’s Opinions on Whist.”

William Hazlitt stands as the other major familiar essayist of early 19th-century England, though his persona was much harsher and crankier than Lamb’s Elia. Hazlitt looked to the exotic, in such essays as “The Indian Jugglers” (1821) and to the contradictory, in such essays as “On the Ignorance of the Learned” (1821) and “On the Pleasure of Hating” (1826). His “On Familiar Style” (1821) is an argument for how precisely and purely a familiar essayist must write.

Contemporary with Lamb and Hazlitt was Leigh Hunt, who chose such common subjects as “Getting Up on Cold Mornings” (1820) and “A Few Thoughts on Sleep” (1820). The second half of the 19th century saw English essayists continue in this vein, such as Robert Louis Stevenson (“A Plea for Gas Lamps,” 1878; “An Apology for Idlers,” 1877), G. K. Chesterton (“A Defence of Nonsense,” 1911; “A Piece of Chalk,” 1909), and E.V. Lucas (“Concerning Clothes,” 1897). In the United States, the tradition was less strong but was still practiced by writers such as Samuel McChord Crothers.

Toward the end of the 19th century, familiar essays often came to be written for their own sake, rather than for the sake of the subject; there was a shift from matter to manner. Augustine Birrell wrote good-humored and whimsical musings which were popular enough to give rise to a new literary term, “birrelling.” So many essayists “birrelled” their way through that era—and were held up as models in the schoolroom that their work helped to give the essay a bad name. Hilaire Belloc, a prolific familiar essayist, poked fun at these tendencies in the titles to his collections: On Nothing, On Everything, On Anything, On Something (1908–11), and On (1923).

Still, as late as 1922, the familiar essay had its host of practitioners, most notably the immensely popular Max Beerbohm and the prolific J.B. Priestley. It had, too, its fierce defenders, such as the critic F.R. Schelling, who wrote in “The Familiar Essay” (in Appraisements and Asperities, 1922) “He who loves the essay—especially the familiar essay, as it is called—and letters, is the aristocrat, the Brahmin among readers, because he, among all others, has the taste of the connoisseur for delicate flavor, for fragrance, for aroma...” But World War I brought out another view. As Agnes Repplier—one of the most important familiar essayists of the late 19th and early 20th centuries—wrote in “The American Essay in War Time” (1918), “To write essays in these flaming years, one must have a greater power of detachment than had Montaigne or Lamb.”

The familiar essay, to review 20th-century commentary on it, was dying a slow death from World War I up through at least 1955, when Clifton Fadiman declared its “digressive and noncommitting” method nearly impossible to practice in “an age of anxiety.” He noted exceptions—E.B.White, Bernard De Voto, John Mason Brown—but said they were simply “exerting their delaying action [on] the eclipse of the familiar essay.” The completely “light” familiar essay has been severely marginalized in the last few decades of the 20th century—reserved for newspaper columnists like Erma Bombeck and Dave Barry, as well as for many pieces in the New Yorker’s “Talk of the Town” section.

The traditional lightness of the familiar essay, however, has been complemented by a new sense of political awareness. E. B.White helped bring about this evolution, by writing not only primarily autobiographical essays such as “Death of a Pig” (1947), but others in which he intertwined his personal stories with calls for one-world government or arguments against racial segregation. The feminist movement of the 1970s produced writers such as Nora Ephron, a humorist who, in essays such as “A Few Words About Breasts” (1972) and “Vaginal Politics” (1972), took the very personal and commonplace and presented them in the contexts of public issues. Other recent essayists who have imbued this formerly “dainty” form with commitment and thereby helped regenerate its popularity include Scott Russell Sanders, Martin Amis, and Fran Lebowitz. Nowadays the familiar essay is often seen as a form particularly well suited to modern rhetorical purposes, able to reach an otherwise suspicious or uninterested audience through personal discourse, which reunites the appeals of ethos (the force and charm of the writer’s character) and pathos (the emotional engagement of the reader) with the intellectual appeal of logos.

DAN ROCHE

See also Personal Essay

Anthologies

- A Book of English Essays*, edited by W.E.Williams, Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1948
The English Familiar Essay: Representative Texts, edited by William Frank Bryan and R.S.Crane, Boston: Ginn, 1916
Familiar Essays, edited by Stuart Robertson, New York: Prentice Hall, 1930
Familiar Essays of Today, edited by Benjamin A.Heydrick, New York: Scribner, 1930
Modern Familiar Essays, edited by William M.Tanner, Boston: Little Brown, 1927
The Oxford Book of Essays, edited by John Gross, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1991
Thought and Form in the Essay: Expository—Familiar—Argumentative, edited by De Calvus W.Simonson and Edwin R. Coulson, New York: Harper, 1933

Further Reading

- Broadhead, Glenn J., The Rhetoric of Conversation: Essays on Eighteenth-Century English Criticism of “Familiar Discourse” (dissertation), Davis: University of California, 1973

- Drew, Elizabeth, "The Lost Art of the Essay," Saturday Review of Literature, 16 February 1935
- Eleanore, Sister Mary, The Literary Essay in English, Boston: Ginn, 1923
- Enright, Nancy, "William Hazlitt and His 'Familiar Style,'" in Essays on the Essay: Redefining the Genre, edited by Alexander J. Butrym, Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1989
- Fadiman, Clifton, "A Gentle Dirge for the Familiar Essay," in his Party of One, Cleveland: World, 1955
- Gross, John, Introduction to The Oxford Book of Essays, edited by Gross, Oxford and New York: Oxford University Press, 1991
- Hansche, Maude Bingham, The Formative Period of English Familiar Letter-Writers and Their Contribution to the English Essay (dissertation), Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania, 1902
- Haskell, Dale E., The Rhetoric of the Familiar Essay: E.B. White and Personal Discourse (dissertation), Fort Worth: Texas Christian University, 1983
- Law, Marie Hamilton, The English Familiar Essay in the Early Nineteenth Century, New York: Russell and Russell, 1965
- Repplier, Agnes, "The American Essay in War Time," Yale Review 7, no. 2 (1918):249–59
- Watson, Melvin R., Magazine Serials and the Essay Tradition, 1746–1820, Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1956

Feijóo y Montenegro, Benito Jerónimo

Spanish, 1676–1764

One of Spain's most important 18th-century scholars, Benito Jerónimo Feijóo y Montenegro represents the burgeoning intelligentsia of the Enlightenment casting off the burdens of traditionalism, conformity, and ignorance. Unlike many of his contemporaries, Feijóo preferred the isolation of his native Galicia where he could enjoy an independence of thought not always allowed in the more confining and politically charged environment of the capital Madrid. From this unique vantage point, Feijóo could observe and synthesize the culture, politics, and social conditions of his homeland. Ivy McClelland in her study of the author (1969) notes that "...as an intelligent man of the perimeter, Feijóo saw things that could not be seen in such clear perspective from the center...when he was urged to transfer permanently to Madrid to live at the heart of Spain's activity, he resolutely refused, showing, by word or implication, that he could think better in less crowded places." Aside from the freedom that his isolation afforded him, Feijóo also had more access to books, pamphlets, and other intellectual material than he could have had in the capital, where strict censorship was enforced. The combination of these two factors created a rich interplay of intellect and practical observation in his discourses.

Feijóo's stance within the milieu of 18th-century Spanish Enlightenment thought manifests itself clearly in a multitude of essays which address a broad range of topics, including the role of women, politics, morality, literature, and medicine. The primary forum for his opinions is a multi-volume series entitled Teatro crítico universal (1725–40; Universal theater of criticism). Essential to Feijóo's philosophical outlook is his perception of what he considered to be the pervasive errors held by the general populace in contrast to his own truth. Feijóo explains in the prologue to Teatro crítico universal that these errors are comprised of "all the opinions" that contradict his perception of truth. Thus, the general tenor of Feijóo's discourses reflects the perspective of a man sitting on a mountain looking down at the clamoring masses. He is an observer whose physical isolation causes him to consider objectively, and somewhat narrowly, the world that surrounds him. This is not to say that Feijóo lacks passion, only that the author's zeal toward his topic appeals to a more restricted class of people, namely other intellectuals like himself. One might consider Feijóo's own words from "Voz del pueblo" (1726; Voice of the people) where he asserts that the masses suffer from the illusion that their numbers alone vindicate their opinions. To this premise, Feijóo warns, "The value of an opinion should be calculated by its profundity, not by the number of souls who believe it. The ignorant, even though they are numerous, do not cease to be ignorant." He later affirms that those who adhere to a single truth should not be surprised that in a time of limited understanding and learning there should be so many false ideas.

Feijóo applies the same measure of truth to all his topics. Whether he addresses politics, patriotism, the role of women, or medicine, the recurring theme is the centrality of truth versus error. Despite his Christian stance, Feijóo often experienced derision because he condemned not only the fallibility of the people, or vulgo, but also the fallibility of the "pueblo de Dios" (people of God). In "El no se qué" (1733; I don't know), Feijóo reiterates his perception that there rests an air of indecision and apathy on the masses that influences the way they act or are acted upon. Feijóo explains, "This I do not know what is the hex over their willpower and the quagmire of their understanding."

In addition to Teatro crítico universal, Feijóo published his memoirs, Cartas eruditas y curiosas (1742–60; Intellectual letters), in five volumes. These documents provide important biographical information regarding the author and his social, political, and intellectual environment. Commenting on the content of Feijóo's autobiography, McClelland notes, "He exposes the whole structure of his personality so completely that we often see parts of it that he cannot see himself. If he is aware of his own makeup he becomes, in his complexity, an even more absorbing study. To know him is to be admitted into the engine room of universal character, to observe a mind in motion, to examine the total product of innumerable trivialities; it is to treat him as someone no less alive than we are."

The context and content of Teatro crítico universal and Cartas eruditas suggest a rich and vigorous intellect. His susceptibility to Enlightenment thought in combination with his religious training combine in a unique vision of right and wrong, truth and error. For Feijóo, as for so many of his contemporaries, Spain was on the cusp of a new age of understanding and learning. Future writers such as Mariano José de Larra would look to Feijóo for inspiration and number him among the great writers of all time: "How would one write today, in our country, without the prior existence of Feijóo, Iriartes, Forner and Moratín?" Herein we see the true genius of the man, the ability to sound the trumpet of discontent and to ignite the intellectual flame not only in those who knew him, but in those who followed.

Biography

Born 8 October 1676 in Casdemiro, Orense. Studied at the monastery of San Julián de Samos, where he was ordained a Benedictine monk, 1690; University of Oviedo, degree in theology, 1709. Lived and taught at the monastery of San Vicente, Oviedo, from 1709; professor of theology, University of Oviedo, 1710–39. Honorary member, Royal Society of Medicine, Seville, 1727. Died in Oviedo, 26 September 1764.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Teatro crítico universal, 9 vols., 1725–40; edited by Carmen Martín Gaité, with Cartas eruditas, 1970, Ángel-Raimundo González Fernández, 1980, and Giovanni Stiffoni, 1986; selection as Essays or Discourses Selected from the Works of Feijóo, translated by John Brett, 1779; several essays also translated anonymously and published separately, including The Honour and Advantage of Agriculture, 1764, An Essay on Woman, 1770, An Essay on the Learning, Genius, and Abilities, of the Fair-Sex, 1774, and Rules for Preserving Health, Particularly with Regard to Studious Persons, 1800 (?)

Cartas eruditas y curiosas, 5 vols., 1742–60; edited by Carmen Martin Gaité, with Teatro crítico universal, 1970

Other writings: poetry.

Collected works edition: Obras completas, edited by José Miguel Caso González, 1981.

Further Reading

Aldridge, A. Owen, "Feijóo, Voltaire, and the Mathematics of Procreation," in Studies in Eighteenth-Century Culture, vol. 4, edited by Harold E. Pagliaro, Richard Morton, and Roy McKee Wiles, Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1975: 131–38

Alvarez de Miranda, Pedro, "Aproximación al estudio del vocabulario ideológico de Feijóo," Cuadernos Hispanoamericanos 347 (1979):367–93

Browning, John, "Fray Benito Jerónimo Feijóo and the Sciences in 18th-Century Spain," in The Varied Pattern: Studies in the 18th Century, edited by Peter Hughes and David Williams, Toronto: Hakkert, 1971:353–71

Camarero, Manuel, "Una lectura de 'El no sé qué' de Feijóo," in Pen and Puke: Spanish Literature of the Eighteenth Century, edited by Monroe Z. Hafter, Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Department of Romance Languages, 1992:203–13

Coughlin, Edward V., "The Polemic of Feijóo's 'Defensa de las mujeres'," Dieciocho 9, nos. 1–2 (1986):74–85

Crusafont y Pairo, M., "El enciclopedismo ortodoxo del Padre Feijóo y las ciencias naturales," Boletín de la Biblioteca de Menéndez Pelayo 40 (1964):65–97

Domergue, Lucienne, "Feijóo y Blanco White: Homenaje de un 'hereje' al Padre

- Maestro," in II simposio sobre el Padre Feijóo y su siglo, Oviedo: Center for Eighteenth-Century Studies, 1981: 333–48
- Dowling, John, "Life, Death, and Immortality in Eighteenth- and Nineteenth-Century Spain," in Selected Proceedings of the Thirty-Fifth Annual Mountain Interstate Foreign Language Conference, edited by Ramón Fernández Rubio, Greenville, South Carolina: Furman University, 1987:121–34
- Elizalde, Ignacio, "La influencia de Bayle y Fontenelle en Feijóo," in Actas del VIII Congreso de la Asociación Internacional de Hispanistas, edited by A. David Kossoff and others, Madrid: Istmo, 2 vols., 1986:497–509
- Fallows, Noel, "'True Wit,' and Feijóo's 'Chistes de N'," Bulletin of Hispanic Studies 70, no. 2 (April 1993):249–53
- Franklin, Elizabeth M., "Feijóo, Josefa Amar y Borbón, and the Feminist Debate in Eighteenth-Century Spain," Dieciocho 12, no. 2 (1989):188–203
- Livermore, A.L., "Goya y Feijóo," Cuadernos Hispanoamericanos 253–54 (1971):17–45
- McClelland, I.L., Benito Jerónimo Feijóo, New York: Twayne, 1969
- Maravall, José A., "Feijóo, el europeo, desde América," Revista de Occidente 7 (1964):313–34
- Maravall, José A., "El espíritu de crítica y el pensamiento social de Feijóo," Cuadernos Hispanoamericanos 318 (1979):736–65
- Mestre, Antonio, "Reflexiones sobre el marco político-cultural de la obra del P. Feijóo," Bulletin Hispanique 91, no. 2 (July-December 1989):195–311
- Sebold, Russell P., "Colón, Bacon y la metáfora heroica de Feijóo," in Homenaje a Don Agapito Rey, edited by Josep Roca Pons, Bloomington: Indiana University Department of Spanish and Portuguese, 1979:333–54

Ferreira, Vergílio

Portuguese, 1916–1996

Vergílio Ferreira, one of the most acclaimed Portuguese novelists of this century, was also a first-class essayist. Early in his career he joined ranks with the neo-realists, who focused on social themes, but he soon parted company from them over their increasing links with socialist realism, as well as his own discovery of existentialism. Under the influence of Dostoevskii, Malraux, Sartre, and Camus, Ferreira made his own way, weaving his personal reflections upon the modern themes of absence of meaning and value in a post-Nietzschean world without foundations, with a fine yet powerful sense of the aesthetic dimension of life. The language he inherited from the prose of the 19th-century Portuguese master novelist Eça de Queiroz was a guiding inspiration for Ferreira, who envisioned the ideal writer as someone who could combine the best of Dostoevskii, Eça de Queiroz, and Malraux. The latter was one of the authors he most admired, not so much as a novelist, but as an essayist. As Ferreira said in an interview, "the Malraux of the novels aged quite a bit; the essayist I find very stimulating, almost as stimulating as listening to Bach" (Um escritor apresenta-se [1981; A writer presents himself]).

There is, indeed, a strong philosophical bent in the writings of this compulsive author, who throughout his life maintained a steady flow of volumes (40 in total) of fiction, essays, and, from 1980, five volumes of a journal, Conta-corrente (1980–87; Running a tab), which are filled with entries easily classifiable as essays. His novels are often philosophical, full of metaphysical obsessions (in that sense, they too are essays), but there are also several volumes of essays in which Ferreira's thoughts are expanded in an analytical yet poetic style. Of these, perhaps Do mundo original (1957; Of the original world) is one key to understanding the mind of this thinker, "a kind of manifesto of his essayism," as Eduardo Lourenço puts it, even though Ferreira would probably have chosen Invocação ao meu corpo (1969; Invocation to my body) as his most representative work.

Lourenço has written extensively about Ferreira; Ferreira himself considered Lourenço to be his best interpreter "because of his exceptional capacities as well as our solid affinity of ideas." Lourenço has pointed out the reactive nature of Ferreira's essayistic discourse, written always in response to someone else's writing. Considering the issue of the originality of Ferreira's thought, Lourenço writes: "Vergílio Ferreira's essayism does not really proceed either from inner demands that are philosophical demands—in the generic or the metaphysical sense—or, even less so, from the sociological or political. The only vital object of meditation, the one in which while questioning he questions himself, in which by inventing justifications he justifies himself, is the one of Art. It is the living experience of Art—as an incomprehensible creative impulse, an incandescence of being and not as a finished product—that constitutes the matrix of all of Vergílio Ferreira's thought" (O canto do signo, 1994).

Reading any of Ferreira's journal volumes can be a pleasant introduction to the world of this artist and thinker, who writes fiction but who still prefers to blend it with essayism in his journal. In his later years he decided to subdivide his journal into two genres: one intellectual, addressing ideas and philosophical themes, the other more mundane, in which he writes of daily life. Pensar (1992.; Thinking) was a concretization of the former. Its title and format reveal an affiliation with Pascal's Pensées, which Ferreira explicitly mentions after describing his volume as "a sort of journal of the haphazard of thinking" ("ir pensando" in Portuguese expresses better the idea of continuity and openness). The fragmented nature of Pascal's work is compared favorably to the completeness Pascal intended for it.

The other, more quotidian segment of the journal has already resulted in four volumes—Conta-corrente, nova série (1993–94; Running a tab, new series). Whether he writes about the ordeal of Lisbon traffic or about a television program he happened to watch, Ferreira never abandons his penchant for the reflective. For him, the "pure" essay is creative and problematizing (problematizante). He establishes a difference between the purely informative or analytical essay on someone else's work and the "problematizing" essay, which should itself be an aesthetic creation, something in which "ideas detain themselves and stay where the work of art dwells"; thus "the essay comes close to the artistic work." However, the closer the essay is to being a work of art the less questionable it becomes, "because one does not argue about emotions" (Conta-corrente, nova série, 1993).

About the essay as a genre he has written: "The essay (in Portugal) basically informs; but what is important is that the essay may discuss, that it may problematize... Infinitely more useful is the fertile error than the sterile truth. But there is an element which is to be incorporated in the essay and that particularly approximates it to literary art—one that particularly makes it a candidate to succeed the novel: emotiveness” (Um escritor apresenta-se).

In another interview he explained: “For me, the novel and the essay were always parallel activities. On the one hand, I do not see the essay as a process, a means, with a merely pedagogic objective. I cultivate the essay, seeking, through it, to explicate problems. I must make clear that the problematics which preoccupy me in my essays are more or less the same as in the novels. The ideal essayistic activity is one that extends the work of the fictionalist, and not one which is subsidiary or which happens in the intervals...if I prefer the novel to the essay, it is because, among other reasons, the novel places me immediately in life and in myself—one exists before, and only afterwards does one speak about what one is” (Um escritor apresenta-se).

Ferreira continued to write both essays and novels until the very end of his life, remaining obsessed with the same themes. In 1987 he published another volume of his collection of essays under the general title of Espaço do invisível (Invisible space), dealing once again, as in the previous volumes of the series, with figures such as Malraux, Queiroz, Sartre, Kafka, and Foucault, and with topics such as art, the critic, death, the novel, disquietude, and the nude. Ferreira was a novelist who never ceased being a philosopher and an essayist who never stopped being a writer of narratives.

ONÉSIMO T. ALMEIDA

Biography

Born 28 January 1916 in Melo. Entered a Catholic seminary in Fundão at age ten, remaining for six years, which had a lasting impact on his religious thought: he wrote a novel about this traumatic experience, Manhã submersa (1954; Submerged morning). Studied classical philology at the University of Coimbra, graduated 1940. High school teacher in Évora, 1945–58, and Lisbon, 1959–81. Married: two adopted children. Awards: many Portuguese prizes; Camões Prize; International Association of Literary Critics Award; Femina Prize; Europalia Award. Died in Lisbon, 1 March 1996.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Sobre o humorismo de Eça de Queirós, 1943

Do mundo original, 1957

Carta ao futuro, 1958

Da fenomenologia a Sartre, 1962

André Malraux: Interrogação ao destino, 1963

Espaço do invisível, 4 vols., 1965–91

Invocação ao meu corpo, 1969

Conta-corrente, 5 vols., 1980–87

Um escritor apresenta-se, edited by Maria de Glória Padrão, 1981

Arte tempo, 1988

Pensar, 1992.

Conta-corrente, nova série, 4 vols., 1993–94

Other writings: many novels (including O caminho fica longe, 1943; Vagão “J”, 1946; Mudança, 1949; Manhã submersa, 1954; Aparição, 1959; Estrela polar, 1962.; Alegria breve, 1965; Nítido nulo, 1972; Para sempre, 1983; Em nome de terra, 1990; Na tua face, 1993).

Further Reading

Anthropos issue on Ferreira (October 1989)

Arenas, Fernando, “Beauty at the Surface of Love’s Nest: Myth and Narratives in Vergílio Ferreira’s Contemporary Writing,” Santa Barbara Portuguese Studies 3 (1997)

Décio, João, Vergílio Ferreira, a ficção e o ensaio, São Paulo: Século XXI, 1977

Godinho, Helder, editor, Estudos sobre Vergílio Ferreira, Lisbon: Imprensa Nacional-Casa da Moeda, 1982

Goulart, Rosa Maria, Romance lírico: O percurso de Vergílio Ferreira, Lisbon: Bertrand, 1990

Lourenço, Eduardo, O canto do signo, Lisbon: Presença, 1994

Feuerbach, Ludwig

German, 1804–1872

It was Das Wesen des Christenthums (1841; The Essence of Christianity) that gave Feuerbach an intense though brief prestige in the 1840s, and this book, together with the fact of his influence on the young Marx, is the main source of contemporary interest in Feuerbach’s work. However, his numerous essays are forceful, entertaining, and often philosophically interesting. Some achieved a certain fame or notoriety of their own, and many are effective expressions of his main philosophical position—his critique of religion, authoritarianism, and dualistic philosophy in the name of concrete, corporeal human life.

Feuerbach’s preferred form of essay was the book review, allowing him to engage in the polemics he clearly relished. In the years 1835–45, particularly, he wrote a flurry of reviews which take advantage of contemporary intellectual controversies or minor publications to stake out his own philosophical position. The books under review are works not only of pure philosophy and the history of philosophy, but also of medicine, theology, and devotional literature. Feuerbach’s reviews do not shy away from blasphemy, as when he compares the beauty of the Virgin Mary to the charms of a Bavarian barmaid—“Über den Marienkultus” (1842; On the cult of Mary). Nor does he hesitate to use the harshest insults, as in “Kritik des ‘Antibegel’” (1835; Critique of “Anti-Hegel”), an early pamphlet in which he defends Hegel against C.F. Bachmann: “Herr Bachmann’s views on thinking display his thoughtless empirical standpoint in all its crassness and barbarity. With a real enthusiasm for dunderheads and cretins, he writes...

Notably, within a few years of writing “Kritik des ‘Antihegel,’” Feuerbach himself was to become a virulent antiHegelian and espouse a materialism quite close to the position expressed by Bachmann. Thus, while the flamboyant tone of Feuerbach’s writing is a constant, the content of his opinions undergoes significant change. Yet he himself might argue that the contradictions to be found in his thought are evidence of depth rather than of carelessness. In his 1836 review of Johann Eduard Erdmann’s Geschichte der neueren Philosophie (History of Modern Philosophy), Feuerbach cites paradoxical lines from Goethe, Petrarch, and Corneille, and asks: “Doesn’t pain, the tragic moment, consist in the presence of two opposed predicates together in one and the same subject? Isn’t the principle of the concurrence of opposites the characteristic principle of living modern philosophy, as against the dead, formal Scholasticism of the Middle Ages...?”

While Feuerbach writes for intellectuals, his fight against “dead, formal” thought and prose leads him to use vivid, colloquial language sprinkled with emphatic typography, exclamation points, and question marks. Above all, he has a flair for direct and catchy phrases. This aphoristic trait is often combined with a sense of humor, as when he writes in the long essay “Zur Kritik der Hegelschen Philosophie” (1839; Contribution to the critique of Hegelian philosophy), “Hegel’s mind is a logical—or more precisely, I would say, an entomological mind.”

Feuerbach puts his gift for aphorisms to good use in “Vorläufige Thesen zur Reform der Philosophie” (1842; Preliminary theses on the reform of philosophy). This text distills Feuerbach’s thought in a series of aphorisms ranging from a sentence to a paragraph. The style recalls Luther’s 95 theses, invites Marx’s famous “Theses on Feuerbach” (wr. 1845), and anticipates Nietzsche in its economical style, its prophetic tone, and its subject matter. Feuerbach’s briefer aphorisms here are thought-provoking and memorable. For example: “What there is, as it is—truth expressed truly—appears superficial; what there is, as it is not—truth expressed untruly, backwards—appears deep.” This thesis illustrates and expresses Feuerbach’s love of the plain statement that cuts to the core of things. In 1843 Feuerbach was to write an entire short book in this genre, Grundsätze der Philosophie der Zukunft (Principles of the Philosophy of the Future).

Feuerbach’s aphoristic gift does not always protect him against effusive passages which string together long lists of adjectives. His talent is also a liability, as it can lead him into sloganeering. A case in point is his most famous (or infamous) one-liner, from “Die Naturwissenschaft und die Revolution” (1850; Natural science and the revolution), a review of a book by the physiologist Moleschott: “Man is what he eats.” (In German, this is an irresistible pun: Der Mensch ist was er isst.) This essay verges on self-parody when it concludes that the 1848 revolution failed in Germany because of the nutritional deficiencies of the German staple, potatoes—the country can find its true salvation in a diet of beans. Such statements drew scornful satire from Feuerbach’s contemporaries. But Feuerbach relished the notoriety of his phrase, and even incorporated it into the title of his piece of 1862., “Das Geheimnis des Opfers, oder der Mensch ist was er isst” (The mystery of sacrifice, or man is what he eats). The phrase in question exemplifies a pattern of hyperbole in Feuerbach’s writings: he is given to identifying now one feature, now another as the sole “essence” of some phenomenon.

In general, while Feuerbach’s essays should never be taken too literally, their exuberance and their flashes of wit give them real rhetorical impact.

RICHARD POLT

Biography

Ludwig Andreas Feuerbach. Born 28 July 1804 in Landshut, Bavaria. Studied at the Ansbach Gymnasium, Munich, 1817–22; theology under Theodor Lehmus at the University of Heidelberg, from 1823; theology and philosophy under Hegel and the theologian Friedrich Schleiermacher at the University of Berlin, 1824; natural sciences at the University of Erlangen, from 1826. Lecturer in the history of modern philosophy, University of Erlangen, 1829–35. Married Berta Löw, 1837. Lived in wife's family's castle near Bruckberg, 1837–60, then moved to Rechenberg, near Munich, 1860–72. Lectured in Heidelberg, 1848–49. Died in Nuremberg, 13 September 1872.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Gedanken über Tod und Unsterblichkeit, aus den Papieren eines Denkers, edited by Johann Adam Stein, 1830; revised edition, 1847; as Thoughts on Death and Immortality, from the Papers of a Thinker, translated by James A. Massey, 1980

Abälard und Heloise, oder, Der Schriftsteller und der Mensch: Eine Reihe humoristisch-philosophischer Aphorismen (aphorisms), 1834

Gmndsätze der Philosophie der Zukunft, 1843; as Principles of the Philosophy of the Future, translated by Manfred H. Vogel, 1966

Das Wesen des Glaubens im Sinne Luthers, 1844; as The Essence of Faith According to Luther, translated by Melvin Chernov, 1967

Vorlesungen über des Wesen der Religion: Nebst Zusätzen und Anmerkungen (Sämtliche Werke, vol. 8), 1851; as Lectures on the Essence of Religion, translated by Ralph Manheim, 1967

The Fiery Brook: Selected Writings, translated by Zawar Hanfi, 1972

Other writings: Das Wesen des Christenthums (1841, revised 1843, 1849; The Essence of Christianity), Das Wesen der Religion (1846; The Essence of Religion), histories of modern philosophy (1833, 1837), a book on Pierre Bayle (1838), and other works on philosophy, religion, and Greek mythology.

Collected works editions: Sämtliche Werke, edited by Wilhelm Bolin and Friedrich Jodl, 10 vols., 1903–11; Gesammelte Werke (East German Academy of Sciences Edition), edited by Werner Schuffenhauer, 1967–(in progress).

Further Reading

Chernov, Melvin, "Feuerbach's 'Man Is What He Eats': A Rectification," Journal of the History of Ideas 24, no. 3 (1963): 397–406

Duquette, David A., "From Disciple to Antagonist: Feuerbach's 'Critique of Hegel,'" Philosophy and Theology 3 (Winter 1988): 183–99

Kamenka, Eugene, The Philosophy of Ludwig Feuerbach, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1970

Wartofsky, Marx W., Feuerbach, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1977

Feuilleton

During the 19th century a famous satirical quatrain was published, mockingly wondering whether the word feuilleton came from the verb feuilleter, to flick through, or vice versa. The genre had already changed by that date, and feuilleton had come to mean any sort of pamphlet, although it usually denoted an adventure novel, and was an abbreviation of roman-feuilleton, which was in turn an expanded form of the original feuilleton. The term's meaning changed again in the 20th century in continental Europe, as it became appropriated to define episodic forms in film and television.

In France, the genre was invented by the Journal de l'Empire (Journal of the empire), which in 1814 became the Journal des Débats (Journal of debates). The early newspapers were simply folded single sheets, printed on both sides, so offering readers four printed pages. The front page was reserved for such matters of public importance as discussions in the Chamber; but on the frequent occasions when there was neither news of sufficient interest to hand, nor anything much to report from current political rhetoric, the editor of the Journal des Débats took to tucking the Abbé Geoffrey's pieces of theater criticism under a horizontal rule at the bottom of the front page. This slot was thereafter known, throughout the 19th century, as the "ground floor."

The first feuilletons were, therefore, columns of drama criticism, a subject of riveting interest in a Paris of some 630,000 people in 1815: although almost half this number were literate, in the early part of the century it was the stage that was the principal public forum for the imaginative exploration of social and political attitudes—hence the prominence given to commentary about the stage, even if it appeared only on the "ground floor." It was an important time for developments in dramatic form: by 1830 neoclassical declamatory drama was being challenged and replaced in the legitimate theater by the Romantic movement's downmarket tragedies in verse; and the boulevard theaters performed the (even) less literate cultural functions that were more than simple entertainment.

The feuilleton evolved as the "ground floor" enlarged its scope beyond drama criticism to include a gazette of events in the worlds of society, the arts, and politics. Sainte-Beuve's Lundis (Mondays) first appeared as feuilletons in a series of newspapers, as he changed his affiliations from the liberal Le Constitutionnel (The constitutional) to the official government organ, Le Moniteur Universel (The universal monitor), and then to the opposition newspaper, Le Temps (The times). Balzac had already used the term feuilleton for the 1830 newspaper Feuilleton des Journaux Politiques (Feuilleton of political journals), which he coedited with Victor Varaigne and Émile de Guardin. And, on 1 July 1836, Armand Dutacq issued Le Siècle (The century) and Girardin brought out

La Presse at a subscription price of 40 francs, exactly half of what the established newspapers were charging, thereby launching the French popular press.

Novelists had never before written novels as feuilletons, for serialization; when they did, they were led inevitably to introduce cliff-hanging breaks in increasingly episodic narratives, full of incredible adventures, and empty of all but the shallowest psychology. Eventually the adventure novels began to appear on their own in weekly or monthly fascicles; these too were known as feuilletons. In the meantime, and until the law curbed the new development by putting a tax on advertising, competition for the best authors of feuilletons became fierce, and the prices they commanded were huge. In response there was an outcry led by Sainte-Beuve against the “industrial” output of literature (and Girardin, fighting what was in effect a battle for the new press, killed Armand Carrel, defending the old style, in a duel).

Balzac was the first French author to publish a novel in a newspaper: La Vieille Fille (The old maid) appeared in 12 installments of La Presse during October and November 1836, and Le Père Goriot (Old Man Goriot), although it originally had six parts, was written to appear in four installments. Even Flaubert’s Madame Bovary first appeared serialized in the Revue de Paris. The great masters of the genre, after Balzac himself, were Frederic Soulié, Alexandre Dumas père, George Sand, and above all Eugène Sue, whose Mystères de Paris (The mysteries of Paris), tracing the relationship between moral values and the social realities of urban life in the capital, was serialized by the Journal des Débats from June 1842 to October 1843. Its success was phenomenal: the newspaper’s circulation doubled from 5000 to 10,000, a much greater percentage increase than Balzac had achieved in other journals. Véron saved Le Constitutionnel by outbidding Girardin’s La Presse and paying a famously large 100,000-franc fee for Sue’s Le Juif errant (The wandering Jew) serialization, from June 1844 to July 1845, which raised the newspaper’s circulation from 3600 to 25,000 by 1846.

After this heyday of the roman-feuilleton, its decline was relatively slow; but the “ground floor” lost all importance after the Franco-Prussian War (1870–71), which few of the large-circulation French newspapers survived.

The feuilleton also flourished in Germany. It is sometimes associated with Christoph Martin Wieland, cofounder of Der Teutsche Merkur (The German Mercury) in 1773, and who edited the newspaper until 1800, after which it declined under K.A. Böttiger. The newspaper ceased publication in 1810. However, the definitive work of Wilmont Haacke, the three-volume Handbuch des Feuilletons (1950–53), regards the feuilleton as simply that aspect of the early newspapers dealing with cultural issues and events, and traces the form proper back to 1740 in France. Its precursor, though, he sees in the German liberal journal known as the Vossische Zeitung (Voss’ newspaper), published from 1683 (formally titled the Berliner Privilegierte Zeitung [The privileged Berliner newspaper] from 1721), which itself had a forerunner in an untitled news sheet of the early 17th century. The German phrase “unterm Strich,” corresponding to the “ground floor” of the French newspapers, has been traced back to the Nürnberger Correspondenten (Nuremberg correspondent) of 1831. Of modern German writers of feuilletons, the best known is Karl Kraus (1874–1936), founding editor of the Viennese satirical journal Die Fackel (1899–1936; The torch).

ANTHONY LEVI

Anthologies

- Klassiker des Feuilletons*, edited by Hans Bender, Stuttgart: Reclam, 1965
Wiener Meister-Feuilletons: Von Kürnberger bis Hofmannsthal, edited by Jörg Mauthe, Vienna: Wiener Verlag, 1946

Further Reading

- Angenot, Marc, "La Littérature populaire française au dix-neuvième siècle," Canadian Review of Comparative Literature 9, no. 3 (1981):307–33
- Atkinson, Nora, Eugène Sue et le roman-feuilleton (dissertation), Paris: University of Paris, 1929
- Bianchi, Angela, La luce a gas e il feuilleton: Due invenzioni dell' Ottocento, Naples: Liguori, 1988
- Chollet, Roland, "Balzac et le 'feuilleton littéraire'," L'Année Balzacienne 5 (1985):71–106
- Eckstein, Ernst, Beiträge zur Geschichte des Feuilletons, Leipzig: Hartknoch, 2 vols., 1876
- Gislason, Donald Garth, Castil Blaze, "De l'opéra en France" and the Feuilletons of the "Journal des Débats" (dissertation), Vancouver: University of British Columbia, 1992.
- Haacke, Wilmont, Feuilletonkunde: Das Feuilleton als literarische und journalistische Gattung, Leipzig: Hiersmann, 1943
- Haacke, Wilmont, Julius Rodenburg und die Deutsche Rundschau: Eine Studie zur Publizistik des deutschen Liberalismus (1870–1918), Heidelberg: Vowinckel, 1950
- Haacke, Wilmont, Handbuch des Feuilletons, Emsdetten: Lechte, 3 vols., 1950–53
- Hallig, Christian, Das Feuilleton der Dresdener Tagespresse von 1864 bis 1880, Borna-Leipzig: Noske, 1933
- Jakoby, Ruth, Das Feuilleton des Journal des Débats von 1814 bis 1830, Tübingen: Narr, 1988
- Meunier, Ernst, Die Entwicklung des Feuilletons der grossen Presse, Nuremberg: Hilz, 1914
- Newby, David Ralph, The Ideology of the Roman-Feuilleton in the French Petite Presse, 1875–1885 (dissertation), Madison: University of Wisconsin, 1993
- Oscarsson, Ingemar, "Le Feuilleton dans la presse française dans les années 1790 et au début du 19^e siècle," Dix-Huitième Siècle 25 (1993):433–56
- Peterson, Gunther, Feuilleton und öffentliche Meinung: Zur Theorie einer Literaturgattung im Kontext mit ihrem Resonanzfeld, Wiesbaden: Flieger, 1992
- Picard, Michel, "Pouvoirs du feuilleton, ou D' Artagnan anonyme," Littérature (May 1983):55–76
- Queffelec, Lise, Le Roman-Feuilleton français au XIX^e siècle, Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1989
- Stanitzek, Georg, "Talkshow—Essay—Feuilleton—Philologie," Weimarer Beiträge 38, no. 4 (1991):506–28
- Wildhagen, Andreas, Das politische Feuilleton Ferdinand Kürnbergers: Themen und Technik einer literarischen Kleinform im Zeitalter des deutschen Liberalismus in

Österreich, Frankfurton-Main: Lang, 1985

Fichte, Johann Gottlieb

German, 1762–1814

The Wissenschaftslehre, hailed by Friedrich Schlegel in 1798 as one of the three major accomplishments of its age, was doubtless Fichte's greatest intellectual achievement. In its attempt to reconcile the palpable epistemological dualism in Kantian philosophy between freedom and necessity, subject and object, through the concept of a practically striving, nonderivative "I," this "science of knowledge" serves as the firm starting point for many of Fichte's conceptual essays, e.g. Das System der Sittenlehre nach den Principien der Wissenschaftslehren (1798; The Science of Ethics as Based on the Science of Knowledge). Even the less technically philosophical and more practical essays, e.g. Der geschlossene Handelstaat (1800; The closed commercial state), are indebted to this theory of knowledge. Understandably, scholarship, encouraged by the publication since 1964 of the critical edition of Fichte's works, has tended to view his essays in the light of his philosophy of practical activity. In Fichte's hand the essay is a demonstration of a rational argument or an exhortation to act on the basis of knowledge. Employing both vehicles of formal, scholarly communication and of informal, social communication, Fichte wrote on an impressive range of topics: the desirability of revolution, the mission of the scholar, the state's economic system, the function of religion and aesthetics, patriotic nationalism and the concept of world history, and the organization of the university. His essays were published as books or in the intellectual journals Allgemeine Literatur-Zeitung (General literary gazette), Die Horen (The muses), and Philosophisches Journal einer Gesellschaft Teutscher Gelehrtern (Philosophical journal of the Society of German Scholars).

The essays of this prolific writer, many of which have been translated into English, are directed toward the academic philosopher and, especially after 1800, toward the educated public. To the professional philosopher, the intended reader of his first essay, the generally well-received, book-length essay Versuch einer Kritik aller Offenbarung (1792; Attempt at a Critique of All Revelation) argued that the basis of revealed religion lies in the sovereignty of a nonempirical law whose acknowledgment strengthens the moral law in humanity. Considered to be Kant's long-awaited treatise on religion because it was published by Kant's publisher and even praised by the Königsberg sage, this essay propelled Fichte to fame and ultimately to his appointment to the philosophy faculty at the University of Jena. As successor to the Kantian Karl Reinhold, Fichte gave many successful public lectures in Jena; his Einige Vorlesungen über die Bestimmung des Gelehrten (1794; "Some Lectures Concerning the Scholar's Vocation") endeavors through cajoling, analysis, and exhortation to convince his largely student audience that they, as scholars, bear responsibility for supervising the advancement of mankind. Hölderlin, Novalis, and Friedrich Schlegel were among the listeners who applauded Fichte's impassioned closing plea for practical engagement: "Act! Act! That is what we are here for!" Following Fichte's relocation to Berlin in 1799, his essays took on a decidedly popular style. Die Bestimmung des Menschen (1800; The Vocation of Man) consciously attempts to overcome the obscurity of his earlier philosophical essays and speaks in a more conversational tone to the average reader: "And it is to be hoped that the reader ...will actually hold converse with himself during the act of reading; that he will deliberate, draw conclusions, and form resolutions...and thus, by his own labor and reflection, develop and build up purely out of himself that mode of thought the mere picture of which is presented to him in the book." This polyperspective essay weighs in an even-measured, dialogical manner the alternatives of doubt, knowledge, and faith as life orientations before depicting faith's triumph over skeptical, deterministic thinking.

The tone of a Fichtean essay varies immensely. While the technical writings associated with the Wissenschaftslehre tend to be demonstrative and sober, the anonymously published lectures of 1794 call passionately, even defiantly, for freedom of the press and represent a rebellious affirmation of nontraditional societal reorganization in terms of Rousseauvian contractualism and Kantian autonomous ethics. The important review of C.G.Schulze's Aenesidemus in 1794 in the Allgemeine Literatur-Zeitung is remarkable as much as for its defense of Kantian epistemology against Schulze's Hume-like skepticism as it is for its sarcastic and polemical barbs. Similarly, Fichte's acridity toward his censors is revealed in the subtitle "A writing one should read before it is confiscated" of Appellation an das Publikum... (1799; Call to the public ...). On the other hand, Fichte could speak in a more moderate voice, as for example in "Über den Grund unsers Glaubens an eine göttliche Weltregierung" (1798; "On the Foundation of Our Belief in a Divine Government of the Universe"), in which he attempted to mediate F.K.Forsberg's radical denial of Christian divinity, but apparently too closely identified God with a self-willed moral world order himself, thus precipitating the famous "Atheismusstreit." This "atheism controversy" was initially a departure of the minds between Fichte and Forsberg, but Fichte's many enemies made sure that he was accused of atheism by the Saxon authorities. The case gained wide popularity as both opponents and defenders of Fichte joined the battle. At stake was essentially Fichte's contention that the existence of God could not be inferred from the moral world order. Ultimately, the debate was a factor in Fichte's dismissal/resignation from his academic post.

If Fichte was considered an effective public orator, his writing was not always accorded equal praise. The conceptual confusion and the abstract, occasionally opaque technical language of his various tracts of the Wissenschaftslehre, which included the coining of new words, e.g. "Tathandlung" ("act"), frequently perplexed his contemporaries. Even Fichte himself abandoned hope that he could articulate his concepts effectively. His philosophical letters Über den Geist und Buchstab in der Philosophie: In einer Reihe von Briefen (1794; "On the Spirit and Letter in Philosophy, in a Series of Letters") were rejected for publication in Schiller's journal Die Horen largely because Fichte, according to Schiller, "thrust[s] the reader directly from the most abstruse abstractions right into harangues." On the other hand, Goethe praised Reden an die deutsche Nation (1808; Addresses to the German Nation), Fichte's most widely known and most accessible essays, for their wonderful style. Based on lectures given in the amphitheater of the Berlin Academy during the Napoleonic occupation (December 1807), these inspirational public talks delineate in a confident, nationalistic tone Fichte's plan for the education of the Germans to their true identity.

Fichte's essays reflect his forceful, occasionally alienating personality. Uncompromising, authoritative, and intense, they vibrate with his contention that "The kind of philosophy one adopts depends upon the sort of man one is..." (Erste Einleitung in die Wissenschaftslehre [1797; First Introduction to the Science of Knowledge]). Fichte's was a moralistic essayism, which sought through linear argument and effective strategies the purposeful if not always aesthetically successful expansion of freedom. Standing in the service of his Strebungsphilosophie (philosophy of activity), his essays demand that the reader act in a manner such that the noumenal idea of freedom can be realized in the practical, social world.

EDWARD T. LARKIN

Biography

Born 19 May 1762 in Rammenau, Lausitz. Studied theology at the Universities of Jena, 1780–81, and Leipzig, 1781–84. Private tutor near Leipzig, 1784–88, and in Warsaw and Danzig. Married Johanna Maria Rahn (Klopstock's niece), 1793: one son. Chair of philosophy, University of Jena, 1793–99; dean of the philosophical faculty, 1810, and rector, 1811, University of Berlin. Died (of typhoid contracted from his wife) in Berlin, 29 January 1814.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Versuch einer Kritik aller Offenbarung, 1792; as Attempt at a Critique of All Revelation, translated by Garrett Green, 1978

Zurückforderung der Denkfreiheit von den Fürsten Europens, die sie bisher unterdrückten (lecture), 1793

Beitrag zur Berichtigung der Urtheile des Publikums über die französische Revolution; Zur Beurteilung ihrer Rechtmässigkeit, 2 vols., 1793; first essay edited by D. Bergner, 1957

Über den Geist und Buchstab in der Philosophie: In einer Reihe von Briefen, 1794; as "On the Spirit and Letter in Philosophy, in a Series of Letters," translated by Elizabeth Rubenstein, in German Aesthetic and Literary Criticism: Kant, Fichte, Schelling, Schopenhauer, Hegel, edited by David Simpson, 1984:74–93

Einige Vorlesungen über die Bestimmung des Gelehrten, 1794; as The Vocation of the Scholar, translated by William Smith, 1847; as "Some Lectures Concerning the Scholar's Vocation," translated by Daniel Breazeale, in Philosophy of German Idealism, edited by Ernst Behler, 1987:1–38

Über den Begriff der Wissenschaftslehre, 1794; revised edition, 1798; edited by Hans Michael Baumgartner and Wilhelm G. Jacobs, 1969; as "Concerning the Concept of Wissenschaftslehre or, of So-Called 'Philosophy'," translated by Daniel Breazeale, in Early Philosophical Writings, 1988

Grundlage der gesamten Wissenschaftslehre, 1794; edited by Hans Michael Baumgartner and Wilhelm G. Jacobs, 1969; as The Science of Knowledge, translated by

- A.E.Kroeger, 1868; as Foundations of the Entire Science of Knowledge (Wissenschaftslehre), with the First and Second Introductions, edited and translated by Peter Heath and John Lachs, 1970
- Grundriss des Eigentümlichen der Wissenschaftslehre*, 1795; edited by Wilhelm G.Jacobs, 1975; as “Outline of the Distinctive Character of the Wissenschaftslehre with Respect to the Theoretical Faculty,” translated by Daniel Breazeale, in Early Philosophical Writings, 1988
- Grundlage des Naturrechts nach Prinzipien der Wissenschaftslehre*, 2 vols., 1796–97; edited by Manfred Zahn, 1967; as The Science of Rights, translated by A.E.Kroeger, 1869; part as “The Foundations of Natural Law According to the Principles of the Theory of Science,” translated by H.S.Reiss and P.Brown, in The Political Thought of the German Romantics, 1793–1815, edited by Reiss, 1955:44–86
- Erste und ziveite Einleitung in die Wissenschaftslehre*, 1797; edited by Fritz Medicus, 1920; as The First and Second Introductions to The Science of Knowledge, edited and translated by Peter Heath and John Lachs, 1970
- Das System der Sittenlehre nach den Principien der Wissenschaftslehren*, 1798; as The Science of Ethics as Based on the Science of Knowledge, edited by W.T.Harris, translated by A.E.Kroeger, 1897
- Appellation an das Publikum über die durch ein Kurf. sächs: Confiscationsrescript ihtn beigemessenen atheistischen Äusserungen: Ein Schrift, die man erst zu lesen bittet, ehe man sie confiscirt*, 1799
- Die Bestimmung des Menschen*, 1800; edited by Theodor Ballauf and Ignaz Klein, 1966; as The Vocation of Man, translated by William Smith, 1848, translation revised by R.M.Chisholm, 1956, and Peter Preuss, 1987; as The Destination of Man, translated by Mrs. Percy Sinnett, 1846
- Der geschlossene Handelstaat: Ein philosophischer Entwurf als Probe einer künftig zu liefernden Politik*, 1800
- Sonnenklarer Bericht an das grössere Publikum, über das eigentliche Wesen der neuesten Philosophie: Ein Versuch, die Leser zum Verstehen zu zwingen*, 1801; as “A Crystal Clear Report to the General Public Concerning the Actual Essence of the Newest Philosophy: An Attempt to Force the Reader to Understand,” translated by John Botterman and William Rasch, in Philosophy of German Idealism, edited by Ernst Behler, 1987:39–115
- Die Grundzüge des gegenwärtigen Zeitalters*, 1806; as The Characteristics of the Present Age, translated by William Smith, 1847
- Die Anweisung zum seeligen Leben, oder auch die Religionslehre*, 1806; edited by Fritz Medicus, 1921; as The Way Towards the Blessed Life; or, The Doctrine of Religion, translated by William Smith, 1849
- Über das Wesen des Gelehrten, und seine Erscheinungen im Gebiete der Freiheit*, 1806; as On the Nature of the Scholar, and Its Manifestations, translated by William Smith, 1845
- Reden an die deutsche Nation*, 1808; as Addresses to the German Nation, translated by Louis H.Gray, in The German Classics, vol. 5, edited by K.Francke and W.G.Howard, 1914:69–105; edited by George Armstrong Kelly, translated by R.F.Jones and G.H.Turnbull, 1913
- Die Thatsachen des Bewusstseyns* (lectures), 1817; as “The Facts of Consciousness,” translated by A.E.Kroeger, Journal of Speculative Philosophy (1871)
- The Popular Works*, translated by William Smith, 2 vols., 1848–49
- Über patriotische Erziehung: Pädagogische Schriften und Reden*, edited by Heinz

Schuffenhauer, 1960

Early Philosophical Writings, edited and translated by Daniel Breazeale, 1988

Introductions to the Wissenschaftslehre and Other Writings (1797–1800), edited and translated by Daniel Breazeale, 1994

Other writings: philosophical works, and correspondence.

Collected works editions: Sämmtliche Werke, edited by Immanuel Hermann Fichte, 8 vols., 1845–46, reprinted 1971; Werke, edited by Fritz Medicus, 6 vols., 1908–12; Gesamtausgabe (Bavarian Academy Edition), edited by Reinhard Lauth, Hans Jacob, and Hans Gliwitzky, 1964–(in progress).

Bibliographies

Baumgartner, Hans Michael, and Wilhelm G.Jacobs, Johann Gottlieb Fichte—Bibliographie, Stuttgart and Bad Cannstatt: Frommann-Holzboog, 1968

Breazeale, Daniel, “Bibliography of English Translations of Fichte’s Works and of Works in English About Fichte,” in Fichte: Historical Contexts/Contemporary Controversies, edited by Breazeale and Tom Rockmore, Atlantic Highlands, New Jersey: Humanities Press, 1994:235–63

Doyé, Sabine, J.G.Fichte—Bibliographie (1968–1992/93), Amsterdam and Atlanta: Rodopi, 1993

Further Reading

Beiser, Frederick C., The Fate of Reason: German Philosophy from Kant to Fichte, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1987

Beiser, Frederick C., “Philosophy and Politics in J.G.Fichte’s 1794 Wissenschaftslehre,” in his Enlightenment, Revolution, and Romanticism: The Genesis of Modern German Political Thought, 1790–1800, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1992

Breazeale, Daniel, “Fichte’s Aenesidemus Review and the Transformation of German Idealism,” Review of Metaphysics 34 (1981):545–68

Breazeale, Daniel, “Fichte and Schelling: The Jena Period,” in The Age of German Idealism, edited by Robert C.Solomon and Kathleen M.Higgins, London and New York: Routledge, 1993

Ebbinghaus, Julius, “Fichtes ursprüngliche Philosophie,” in his Gesammelte Aufsätze, Vorträge und Reden, Hildesheim: Olms, 1968:211–25

Fichte and Contemporary Philosophy, Philosophical Forum special issue, 19 (1988)

Gardiner, Patrick, “Fichte and German Idealism,” in Idealism, Past and Present, edited by Godfrey Vesey, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1982:111–26

Henrich, Dieter, “Fichte’s Original Insight,” in Contemporary German Philosophy, University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1982:15–53 (original German edition, 1967)

Idealistic Studies issue on Fichte, 62 (1979)

Jacobs, Wilhelm G., Johann Gottlieb Fichte, Hamburg: Rowohlt, 1984

Lachs, John, “Fichte’s Idealism,” American Philosophical Quarterly 9 (1972):311–18

Lauth, Reinhard, “Der letzte Grund von Fichtes Reden an die deutsche Nation,” Fichte

Studies 4 (1992):197–231

Lauth, Reinhard, Vernünftige Durchdringung der Wirklichkeit: Fichte und sein Umkreis, Neuried: Ars Una, 1994

Mandt, A.J., “Fichte’s Idealism in Theory and Practice,” Idealistic Studies 14 (1984):127–47

Rockmore, Tom, Fichte, Marx, and the German Philosophical Tradition, Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1980

Seidel, George, Activity and Ground: Fichte, Schelling, and Hegel, Hildesheim and New York: Olms, 1976

Fielding, Henry

British, 1707–1754

Henry Fielding is justly famous for his three great novels—Joseph Andrews (1742), Tom Jones (1749), and Amelia (1751)—and was praised by George Bernard Shaw as “the greatest dramatist, with the single exception of Shakespeare, produced by England between the Middle Ages and the nineteenth century.” His work as an essayist, stretching from the mid-1730s until the last years of his life, is substantial although less well known. He produced four major periodicals—the Champion (1739–40), the True Patriot (1745–46), the Jacobite’s Journal (1747–48), and the Covent-Garden Journal (1752). In addition, it now appears that from 1734 to 1738 Fielding contributed essays to the Craftsman, although his ties to that journal were clandestine. In his essays, Fielding addresses major political and social issues of his day: the prime ministry of Sir Robert Walpole; the Jacobite Rebellion of 1745; problems of crime and poverty in the growing metropolis of London. He comments on literary matters less frequently than he does on political. But the periodicals do include important evaluations of major figures in 18th-century British literature—Pope, Swift, Addison, and Steele—as well as of Fielding’s own work. Parson Abraham Adams from Joseph Andrews reappears in the True Patriot; Fielding defends Amelia from criticism in the Covent-Garden Journal.

Fielding had a complicated family background, which profoundly influenced his political and literary loyalties. Cousin to the Earls of Denbigh, Fielding’s father, Edmund, achieved success and some fame as a soldier, but his splendid social connections paid no bills for him; he was improvident and chronically in debt. Fielding’s mother’s family was wealthy and landed, but its wealth was not Henry’s to inherit. When Henry’s mother died in 1718, a custody battle ensued over her children (Henry had five sisters and one brother) between Edmund Fielding and the children’s maternal grandmother, who eventually won custody of them and control of their inherited property. Fielding’s connections with the social elite, then, were tenuous, even traumatic. He attended Eton with classmates who included William Pitt the Elder and George Lyttelton, but while they went on to Oxford, Fielding attended the University of Leiden for a year until his funds ran out. He then returned to London, a gentleman with no fortune.

Having grown up in Dorset, Fielding tended to idealize rural life, but he chose to earn his living in London. Educated in the classics at Eton, in his career as a playwright he appealed to popular taste, struggling to win the favor of theater managers like Colley Cibber, the prince of Alexander Pope's Dunces. While he admired the work of Swift and Pope, Fielding was loyal to the memory of his father's commander, the Duke of Marlborough, and remained throughout his life a Whig in politics. In the absence of a viable Tory opposition, however, Fielding could remain loyal to Marlborough's memory, even as he sniped at Walpole. Particularly when his essays treat of matters political, Fielding works between the models of Addison and Steele and of Swift and Pope. In their mediation between the Whig sentiment of the former and the Tory satire of the latter, Fielding's essays achieve their distinctive tone.

The format of the Champion—and of all Fielding's subsequent periodicals—followed that of Addison and Steele's Tatler and Spectator. Sections include a lead essay, home and foreign news (with Fielding frequently commenting wryly upon those news items), and advertisements. Appearing three times a week, the paper, like those of Addison and Steele, relies upon a persona, one Captain Hercules Vinegar. Vinegar, whose namesake was a famous cudgel fighter and prize fight promoter, sets down his club and takes up his pen as a weapon. He appoints himself head of a Court of Censorial Inquiry and brings both literary and political figures to the bar. Vinegar has an extended family, which loosely resembles the Spectator Club in that its members can comment upon all parts of British life. One relative is an expert on foreign affairs, one has studied law, another the classics, another medicine. Vinegar's sons visit theaters and other popular entertainments; his wife has connections with polite families and can report on the activities of the great.

The breadth of the Champion diminished over the course of its run. Fielding's coadjutor, James Ralph, who took the pseudonym "Dr. Lillbourne," is described by Fielding in his farewell to the reader (12, June 1740), as ready to "dose" them with political "Physic...as often as it is requisite." As the paper continued under Ralph's supervision, it became an antiWalpole voice. After 12, June, however, Fielding did contribute a series of essays on the "Voyages of Mr. Job Vinegar." Vinegar, in this imitation of Gulliver's Travels, visits the Ptfghsiumski—or "the Inconstants"—who are guilty of all manner of political tergiversation. In a paper for 6 September 1740, Fielding attacks Walpole for patronizing scribblers while the true literary giants—he mentions Pope, Swift, Gay, and Thomson—oppose him.

If Fielding's politics in the Champion are uncertain, his literary opinions can also be surprising. While at times he offers fairly sharp criticism of Pope, he also describes him as a poet "whose works will be coeval with the Language in which they are writ." No. 80 puts Colley Cibber on trial for "assaulting" the English language, while no. 75 attacks his Apology but praises his early plays. Fielding, who in some of his early satires refers to himself as "H.Scriblerus Secundus," writes essays on the model of Steele, the great rival of the Scriblerians, and uses the letters by which Addison, Pope's Atticus, identified his contributions to the Spectator to distinguish his contributions from Ralph's.

In his response to the crisis of 1745 and his subsequent confidence in the "Broad-Bottom" ministry of Henry Pelham, Fielding moved beyond his political uncertainty of the 1730s. The True Patriot gave Fielding a chance to define his political loyalties and also to put his conflicting literary loyalties behind him. In its first number, Fielding not only reports the advance of Bonnie Prince Charlie, he also offers news of the death of Jonathan Swift and a fine eulogy upon him: “He possessed the Talents of a Lucian, a Rabelais, and a Cervantes, and in his Works exceeded them all.” Throughout the True Patriot, Fielding’s treatment of public credit parallels Addison’s in Spectator no. 3—a dream vision in which the Stuarts threaten a female personification of credit, and the Hanoverians rescue her. In no. 2 Fielding explicitly avows Addison’s Freeholder no. 4 as his model for comment upon the stock exchange, particularly those companies like the East India and South Sea, which assumed part of the national debt in exchange for trade monopolies. Fielding celebrates the economic system that Addison and Steele helped to invent and that Swift detested. Defending both the Protestant Succession and the Bank of England, Fielding’s loyalties to both Addison and Swift are no longer troubled by the “curse of party.”

In the Jacobite’s Journal, Fielding maintains the course he took in the True Patriot, placing himself within a recognizably Whiggish political and literary tradition, turning to the models of Addison and Steele, dropping the persona in which he begins the paper (John Trott-Plaid, a bibulous, bellicose Jacobite) to speak directly in support of Pelham. In no. 36, he transcribes Addison’s lead essay from Freeholder no. 28; in no. 37, he cites Addison’s analysis of the dangers of Jacobitism in 1715 and applies it to 1748. He reopens the “Office of Censor” that Steele’s Isaac Bickerstaff established and publishes a letter in no. 30 that refers to “your great Patterns, Addison and Steel [sic].” But Fielding also suggests that Addison and Steele, like Swift and Pope, must now give way to others.

Fielding’s Covent-Garden Journal was his last attempt at an ongoing periodical. He opens the paper announcing, “I disclaim any dealings in Politics,” and returns to literary criticism and religious and moral instruction. Taking the persona of “Sir Alexander Drawcansir, Knight Censor of Great Britain,” he puts himself one last time in the camp of the Tory satirists. Like Hercules Vinegar, Drawcansir concerns himself with “Taste.” Pervasive in the journal is the sense that the taste of the social elite—the old English “Genius”—is in decline. Casting himself as an agent of reform, Fielding compares his task to Hercules’ cleansing the stables of Augeus (no. 5). If Hercules Vinegar in the Champion occasionally brings together political and literary attitudes that reveal Fielding’s uncertainty, here Drawcansir reveals an attitude closer to despair.

Throughout this final journal, however, Fielding generally manages to keep his tone light. He proceeds ironically, returning to the model of Swift. He offers mock etymologies and learned discourses that turn upon his readers. Drawcansir, like Vinegar, is a “Censor,” and Fielding uses the proceedings of his court to comment upon manners. The Covent-Garden Journal also includes a column which reports on cases that Fielding had heard in his magistrate’s court. This column, compiled by Fielding’s clerk Joshua Brogden but frequently revealing Fielding’s hand in it, gives great topicality to the Journal; so too do the news columns in which Fielding reprints items from other journals and then reflects upon or satirizes them.

Fielding’s essays reveal him working between his great predecessors. As he integrates the genial and tolerant modernity of Addison and Steele with the conservative and satiric classicism of Swift and Pope, Fielding, in the course of his essays, defines a transitional moment in 18th-century British life, even as he limns the combination of sentiment and satire that enriches his novels.

BRIAN MCCREA

Biography

Born 22 April 1707 at Sharpham Park, near Glastonbury. Studied at Eton College, Berkshire, 1719–24; University of Leiden, 1728–29; Middle Temple, London, 1737–40, admitted to the bar, 1740. Playwright, 1728–37: writer and manager, Little Theatre, Haymarket, London, 1736–37. Married Charlotte Cradock, 1734 (died, 1744): one son and four daughters (all but one daughter died). Contributor, the Craftsman, 1734–38; editor, the Champion (with James Ralph), 1739–40, the True Patriot, 1745–46, the Jacobite's Journal, 1747–48, and the Covent-Garden Journal, 1752. Appointed high steward of the New Forest, Hampshire, 1746. Married Mary Daniel, 1747: one daughter and two sons (another child died). Principal magistrate, City of Westminster, 1748, and County of Middlesex, 1749; chair, Westminster Quarter Sessions, 1749–52. Traveled to Lisbon for health reasons, 1754. Died in Lisbon, 8 October 1754.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

The Champion; or, British Mercury, with James Ralph, nos. 1–158, 15 November 1739–December(?) 1740; in 2 vols., 1741

Miscellanies, vol. 1, 1743; vol.I edited by Henry Knight Miller, in The Wesleyan Edition of the Works, 1972

The True Patriot; and The History of Our Own Times, nos. 1–33, 5 November 1745–17 June 1746; in The True Patriot and Related Writings, edited by W.B.Coley (part of the Wesleyan Edition), 1987

The Jacobite's Journal, nos. 1–49, 5 December 1747–5 November 1748; in The Jacobite's Journal and Related Writings, edited by W.B.Coley (part of the Wesleyan Edition), 1974

The Covent-Garden Journal, nos. 1–72, 4 January–25 November 1752; edited by Gerard Edward Jensen, 2 vols., 1915, and Bertrand A.Goldgar (part of the Wesleyan Edition), 1988

Criticistn, edited by Ioan Williams, 1970

An Enquiry into the Causes of the Late Increase of Robbers and Related Writings, edited by Malvin R.Zirker, Jr. (part of the Wesleyan Edition), 1988

New Essays by Henry Fielding: His Contributions to the Craftsman (1734–1739) and Other Early Journalism, edited by Martin C. Battestin, 1989

Other writings: five novels (the parody Shamela, 1741; Joseph Andrews, 1742; Jonathan Wild, 1743; Tom Jones, 1749; Amelia, 1751), 26 plays, poetry, and works of nonfiction.

Collected works editions: The Complete Works, edited by William E.Henley, 16 vols., 1902; The Wesleyan Edition of the Works, edited by W.B.Coley and others, 1967–(in progress).

Bibliographies

- Hahn, H.George, Henry Fielding: An Annotated Bibliography, Metuchen, New Jersey: Scarecrow Press, 1979
- Morrissey, L.J., Henry Fielding: A Reference Guide, Boston: Hall, 1980
- Stoler, John A., and Richard Fulton, Henry Fielding: An Annotated Bibliography of Twentieth-Century Criticism, 1900–1977, New York: Garland, 1980

Further Reading

- Battestin, Martin C., and Ruthe R.Battestin, Henry Fielding: A Life, London and New York: Routledge, 1989
- Goldgar, Bertrand A., Walpole and the Wits: The Relation of Politics to Literature, 1722–1742, Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1976
- McCrea, Brian, Henry Fielding and the Politics of Mid-EighteenthCentury England, Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1981
- Paulson, Ronald, Satire and the Novel in Eighteenth-Century England, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1967
- Paulson, Ronald, and Thomas Lockwood, Henry Fielding: The Critical Heritage, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, and New York: Barnes and Noble, 1969
- Rawson, C.J., Henry Fielding and the Augustan Ideal Under Stress, London and Boston: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1972
- Shaw, George Bernard, Preface to Plays Pleasant and Unpleasant, London: Grant Richards, and Chicago: Stone, 1898
- Zirker, Malvin R., Jr., Henry Fielding's Social Pamphlets, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1966

Fisher, M.F.K.

American, 1908–1992.

While the reputation of M.F.K.Fisher as 20th-century America's finest food writer is clearly established, this prolific author and prose stylist rejected the "food writer" label. For Fisher, the writing was never devoted to food or drink itself; her fascination was with the hunger of the human race. Fisher's keen, appreciative eye and elegant, seductive voice earned a wide readership in nonfiction books and in essays, articles, and short stories published in magazines such as the Saturday Review, the New Yorker, Gourmet, and Vanity Fair over a career that spanned almost 50 years. The poet W.H.Auden, among others, noted the excellence of her prose.

Fisher, the daughter of a California newspaper editor and educated at three American colleges and the University of Dijon, began her writing career as a freelance magazine writer. She spent her early adult years in southern France, Switzerland, and Mexico before returning to California, where she worked briefly as a screenwriter at Paramount Studios.

Her first book, Serve It Forth (1937), established Fisher as a charming and nontraditional food writer who combined scholarship with humorous anecdotes and clever social commentary, writing about the world of food and drink as a devoted amateur who combined ambitious research with good grace. Like her subsequent books on food (Consider the Oyster, 1941; How to Cook a Wolf, 1942.; The Gastronomical Me, 1943; and An Alphabet for Gourmets, 1949—all five reprinted as the collection The Art of Eating, 1954), this work revealed Fisher as an intellectually ambitious and perceptive writer for whom food preparation was only a small part of a compelling human story. In How to Cook a Wolf, a deft and humorous treatment of wartime rationing, the resourceful Fisher offers advice on what to do when the wolf is at your door: invite him in, seduce him, and cook him for supper. In her foreword to The Gastronomical Me, she stakes out for herself the territory of hunger: “It seems to me that our three basic needs, for food and security and love, are so mixed and mingled and entwined that we cannot straightly think of one without the other...There is a communion of more than our bodies when bread is broken and wine drunk.”

The decade of the 1960s marked her greatest contribution to scholarly gastronomic writing. She produced a highly entertaining study of folk remedies, elixirs, and nostrums (A Cordiall Water, 1961) and a comprehensive survey of the history of European and American wine-making (The Story of Wine, 1962.). In 1968 she collaborated with fellow gourmets Julia Child and Michael Field on The Cooking of Provincial France. But the scholarly work for which she was most praised was her 1949 translation of Brillat-Savin’s Physiologie du goût (1825; Physiology of Taste).

Fisher also enjoyed a strong reputation as a writer of memoirs whose autobiographical pieces preserve the fragile, disappearing spirit of times and places. Whether the focus of her remembrances is a Quaker community in the southern California of her childhood (Among Friends, 1971), the South of France where she spent some 20 years (A Map of Another Town, 1964; Two Towns in Provence, 1983; The Boss Dog, 1991; Long Ago in France: The Years in Dijon, 1991), or the northern California wine country in which she spent her final 22 years as an elegant Grande Dame of Sonoma Valley gourmet society (As They Were, 1982, and various essays and magazine articles 1970–92), Fisher captures and celebrates precarious 20th-century local cultures whose worlds are being impinged upon by fast food franchises and shopping malls.

Only one volume of her collected essays has been published to date (As They Were). Among the attributes cited by its reviewers is Fisher’s capacity for drawing vignettes in powerfully sensuous language. She brings to the description of everyday activities a cultural anthropologist’s sense of ritual and symbology. Clifton Fadiman has spoken of her as a philosopher of food. Taken as a whole, the body of Fisher’s work celebrates the complexities of satisfying our appetites; it explores the culture of sensual and intelligent living.

Her prose style is warm yet precise, in the fashion of E.B. White (admired for his control of American language and closely observed life), the one essayist Fisher identified as influencing her own writing. Fisher’s readers encounter a passionate and charming voice. In a 1991 interview, the 82-year-old Fisher identified her composed and seductive approach to the reader: "I have to write toward somebody I love. Express myself as that person I love would want me to be." Fisher's essaying voice conveys a rich sense of appreciating the moment, of taking joy in the world she sees around her.

After reaching her 75th year, Fisher entered an impressively productive decade in which she published seven new books and saw several of her earlier works reprinted. After developing rheumatoid arthritis and, later, Parkinson's disease in the 1980s, she wrote by dictating to an assistant. Her book of essays and meditations on aging, Sister Age (1984), expresses the sentiments of a woman who accumulates experience with frank, unsentimental good humor and grace. Near the end of her career, she received considerable recognition for her literary accomplishments, being elected to both the American Academy and the National Institute of Arts and Letters.

DALE E.HASKELL

Biography

Mary Frances Kennedy Fisher. Born Mary Frances Kennedy Brenton, 3 July 1908 in Albion, Missouri. Studied at Illinois College, Occidental College, the University of California, Los Angeles, and the University of Dijon, France, 1929–32. Married Alfred Young Fisher, 1929 (divorced, 1938). Lived in Dijon, from 1929, and Vevey, Switzerland, from 1938. Married Dillwyn Parrish, 1940 (died, 1942). Screenwriter in Hollywood, briefly after 1942. Married Donald Friede, 1945 (divorced, 1951): one daughter and one son. Lived in northern California for the last two decades of her life. Awards: California Literature Silver Medal, for With Bold Knife and Fork, 1970; Los Angeles Times Robert Kirsch Award, 1984. Member, American Academy, and the National Institute of Arts and Letters. Died in Glen Ellen, California, 22 June 1992.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Serve It Forth, 1937

Consider the Oyster, 1941

How to Cook a Wolf, 1942

The Gastronomical Me, 1943

An Alphabet for Gourmets, 1949

The Art of Eating: The Collected Gastronomical Works, 1954

With Bold Knife and Fork, 1969

As They Were, 1982

Sister Age (includes fiction), 1984

Last House: Reflections, Dreams, and Observations, 1943–1991, 1995

Other writings: the novel Not Now But Now (1947) (also coauthored a novel with her second husband, 1939), short stories, books about cooking, food, and wine, and memoirs. Also translated The Physiology of Taste by Brillat-Savarin (1949).

Further Reading

- Angelou, Maya, "M.F.K.Fisher," People Magazine, 24 January 1983:63+
- Eames, David, "How to Cook a Life," Quest 81 (June 1981): 38–42
- Ferrary, Jeanette, Between Friends: M.F.K.Fisher and Me, New York: Atlantic Monthly Press, 1991
- Fussell, Betty, "The Prime of M.F.K.Fisher," Lear's, July-August 1989:67–71
- Greene, Bert, "America's Finest Food Writer—M.F.K.Fisher: An Intimate Portrait," Food and Wine, December 1986:28+
- Hawes, Elizabeth, "M.F.K.Fisher: A Profile," Gourmet, November 1983:50+
- Lazar, David, Conversations with M.F.K.Fisher, Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1992
- Reardon, Joan, M.F.K.Fisher, Julia Child, and Alice Waters: Celebrating the Pleasures of the Table, New York: Harmony, 1991
- Reed, Julia, "Eating Well Is the Best Revenge," U.S. News and World Report, 8 September 1986:62+
- Reichel, Ruth, "M.F.K.Fisher," Los Angeles Times, 6 June 1991: Food Section, 1+
- Shapiro, L., "The Fine Art of Remembering," Newsweek, 24 September 1990:71+

Fontenelle, Bernard de

French, 1657–1757

Bernard de Fontenelle had ceased to write works of literary or philosophical importance by the date of his admission to the French Academy on 5 May 1691. He remained an important literary figure, taking part in the defense of the superiority of modern literature over the antique, and he wrote 69 panegyrics on members of the Académie Royale des Sciences who died during his tenure as permanent secretary from 1697. Those of his works which can be called essays were mostly written by 1688, when Fontenelle was 31. The principal exception, the treatise on religion known as De l'origine des fables (Of the origin of fables) and first published in 1724, a reworking of an earlier Sur l'histoire (On history), used to be thought of as an early work. It seems in fact to have been composed between 1691 and 1699, which actually changes its meaning, making its insinuations much more daring.

Fontenelle came from Rouen in Normandy, and Voltaire said of him that "he knew how to speak Norman," which means that he knew how to insinuate what he meant without even ironically stating it. Perhaps Voltaire was being unfair, but Fontenelle's early works reverberate with compromising innuendos, suggestions, implications, and questions, without actually stating very much. His cultivated literary technique makes straight-faced and perfectly defensible statements bristle with implied skepticism about conservative religious orthodoxy, and leaves the reader's mind teeming with questions which Fontenelle never presumed directly to ask. It was a technique Fontenelle might have found constraining, but which he adopted with relish, and it constitutes his chief contribution to the essay form.

Fontenelle's first work was the two-volume Dialogues des morts and Nouveaux dialogues des morts (Dialogues from the Dead), two sets of 18 dialogues published anonymously in 1683. Loosely based on Lucian as translated by Nicolas Perrot d'Ablancourt, the Dialogues bring together the most unlikely of conversational partners, but permit pointed exchanges. Then appeared the Entretiens sur la pluralité des mondes (1686; Conversations on the Plurality of Worlds), which, though dialogue in form, comes quite near to being a series of conversational essays. It is an astonishing work of astronomical vulgarization, based on the 1656 translation of Discoveries of a New World (1638–40) by John Wilkins. Its tone is provocative. Addressed to a woman, it grossly and amusingly simplifies large concepts: "The whole of philosophy is founded on only two things: we have inquiring minds and poor eyesight."

In 1684 Pierre Bayle put his newly founded Nouvelles de la République des Lettres (News from the Republic of Letters) virtually at Fontenelle's disposal, although he may well never have met him. In January 1685 he printed Fontenelle's obituary essay on one of Fontenelle's famous uncles, the "Éloge de Pierre Corneille" (Elegy of Pierre Corneille), critical, biographical, knowledgeable, and important for the historical background. From September to November 1685 Bayle published Fontenelle's treatise on the number nine, then other pieces designed to flatter him, before anonymously publishing Fontenelle's own daring "Relation de l'île de Bornéo" (Report on the island of Borneo), a strongly satirical account of religious disputes presenting a conflict between three queens representing respectively Calvinism, Judaism, and Catholicism. Voltaire, who mostly disliked Fontenelle's oblique style, thought that he had risked imprisonment in the Bastille by allowing the "Relation" to appear.

It was possibly to avoid trouble that Fontenelle then immediately published two highly orthodox essays, "Le Triomphe de la religion sous Louis le Grand" (The triumph of religion under Louis the Great) and the "Discours sur la patience" (Discourse on patience). However, he also published his best-known essay, Histoire des oracles (1687; The History of Oracles), adapted from Antonius van Dale's 1683 De oraculis ethnicorum, whose purpose was to destroy a commonly used proof of Christ's divinity, that the pagan oracles which had been thought to foretell his coming fell silent after his birth. Fontenelle removed van Dale's identification of Catholicism with superstition, showing that the oracles were not the work of demons, and that they did not stop with the coming of Christ. On the other hand, Fontenelle also opened up a whole array of further questions about the changing forms historically taken by the search for the meaning of human experience.

In 1686 Fontenelle, who had kept away from metaphysics in the Conversations, also published a criticism of Malebranche. His "Doutes sur le système physique des causes occasionnelles" (Doubts about the physical system of occasional causes) criticized the way Malebranche had preserved the credibility of the immortality of the soul by making human knowledge independent of perception by bodily organs.

Fontenelle's literary registers had appeared insubstantial and inconsequential, but he raised by insinuation and innuendo a range of questions covering everything from the nature of the cosmos to the evolution of human belief, and from the triviality of religious disputes to the metaphysics of knowledge. His intervention in major disputes was to be rounded off with the Digression sur les anciens et les modernes (1688; Digression on the Ancients and the Moderns), in which another serious, complex issue is simplified to appear trivial. The whole question is “whether the trees which used to be in our countryside were taller than today’s.” If they were not, then nature has not exhausted itself, and modern authors can equal those of antiquity. In fact, Fontenelle maintains that the race has grown toward its maturity from former childhood, and at their best modern works are superior to those of classical Greece and Rome. Fontenelle, as usual, has protected a radical imaginative power with a flippancy of style and apparent subject.

If De l’origine des fables really was an early work, it is perfectly possible to take it at face value and understand it as an essay in intellectual archaeology. Before 1680 Fontenelle’s development as a writer makes it unlikely that he was deliberately raising the question of whether fables were early attempts at a scientific explanation of the universe, replaced by the Christian revelation, but with the implication that Genesis, rather than revealed truth, might also have been adapted to a particular stage in our understanding of the origins of the cosmos. After about 1690, it is more likely that Fontenelle would have been raising that question, for “The more ignorant we are, and the less experience we have, the more miracles we see.” The chances are that the text was relatively late, and intended to be subversive.

Fontenelle’s contribution to the essay form was therefore principally to use the structured format to write at the same time in a multiplicity of registers. He liked to affect a lighthearted salon style, but had penetrating observations to make about the ultimately important subjects. He wrote half a dozen plays and operas, and some lightweight verse, but not even the dialogues gave him the form he really needed. That was the essay, but the essay of tongue-in-cheek pretense, which he brought to a balanced perfection it has scarcely known before or since.

ANTHONY LEVI

Biography

Bernard le Bovier, sieur de Fontenelle. Nephew of the dramatist Pierre Corneille and the poet and dramatist Thomas Corneille. Born 11 February 1657 in Rouen. Studied at a Jesuit college, Rouen, from 1664; studied law, 1672–77. Moved to Paris; involved in literary circles and frequented many salons, especially those of Mesdames de Lambert, de Tencin, Geoffrin, and du Deffand. Contributor, Le Mercure Galant (The gallant Mercury), 1677–81. Elected to the French Academy, 1691. Permanent secretary, Académie Royale des Sciences, from 1697, and edited its Histoire de l’Académie Royale des Sciences (History of the Royal Academy of Science), 1699–1740, which published éloges on many eminent scientists. Patronized by the Regent, receiving a pension and a lodging in the Palais-Royal, early 17008–31. Elected to the Académie des Inscriptions et des Belles-Lettres, 1701; Member, Arcadian Academy of Rome, Royal Society of London, and the Academies of Berlin, Nancy, and Rouen. Died in Paris, 9 January 1757.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

- Dialogues des morts* and Nouveaux dialogues des morts, 2 vols., 1683; edited by Donald Schier, 1965, and Jean Dagen, 1971; as Dialogues from the Dead, translated by John Hughes, 1708; as Dialogues of Fontenelle, translated by Ezra Pound, 1917
- Entretiens sur la pluralité des mondes*, 1686; enlarged edition, 1687; edited by Robert Shackleton, 1955, and A. Calame, 1967; as A Discourse of the Plurality of Worlds, translated by W.D. Knight, 1687; as A Discovery of New Worlds, translated by Aphra Behn, 1688; as A Plurality of Worlds, translated by John Glanvill, 1695; as Conversations on the Plurality of Worlds, translated by William Gardiner, 1715, Elizabeth Gunnig, 1803, and H.A. Hargreaves, 1990
- Histoire des oracles*, 1687; edited by Louis Maigron, 1908; as The History of Oracles, translated by Aphra Behn, 1699
- Lettres galantes du Chevalier d'Her*, 1687; edited by Daniel Delafarge, 1961; as Letters of Gallantry, translated by John Ozell, 1715
- Digression sur les anciens et les modernes*, 1688; edited by Robert Shackleton, 1955
- Éloges historiques de tous les academiciens morts depuis ce renouvellement*, 2 vols., 1709–20; revised edition, as Éloges des Académiciens de l'Académie Royale des Sciences, 2 vols., 1731; selections as Choix d'éloges des savants, edited by D. Bourel and others, 2 vols., 1981; selections as The Lives of the French, Italian and German Philosophers, translated by John Chamberlayne, 1717
- De l'origine des fables* (treatise), 1724; edited by Jean-Raoul Carré, 1932
- Textes choisis*, edited by M. Roelens, 1966
- Rêveries diverses: Opuscles littéraires et philosophiques*, edited by Alain Niderst, 1994
- Other writings: poetry, plays, operas, and works on literature, the French theater, and science.
- Collected works edition: Œuvres complètes, edited by Alain Niderst, 5 vols., 1990–93 (in progress; 6 vols. projected).

Bibliography

- Delorme, Suzanne, "Contribution à la bibliographie de Fontenelle," Revue d'Histoire des Sciences 10, no. 4 (October-December 1957):300–09

Further Reading

- Bott, François, L'Entreteneur: Esquisses pour un portrait de M. de Fontenelle, Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1991
- Cosentini, John W., Fontenelle's Art of Dialogue, New York: King's Crown, 1952
- Maigron, Louis, Fontenelle: L'Homme, l'œuvre, l'influence, Paris: Plon, 1906
- Marsak, Leonard, Bernard de Fontenelle: The Idea of Science in the French Enlightenment, Philadelphia: Transactions of the American Philosophical Society, 1959

Niderst, Alain, Fontenelle à la recherche de lui-même, Paris: Nizet, 1972

Niderst, Alain, editor, Fontenelle: Actes du colloque de Rouen, 1987, Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1989

Niderst, Alain, Fontenelle, Paris: Plon, 1991

Rendall, Steven F., "Fontenelle and His Public," MLN 86, pt. 2 (1971):496–508

Williams, Charles G.S., editor, Racine, Fontenelle: Actes du XXIe colloque de la North American Society for Seventeenth-Century French Literature, Ohio State University, Columbus, 6–8 April 1989, Paris and Seattle: Papers on French Seventeenth-Century Literature, 1990

Forster, E.M.

British, 1879–1970

E.M. Forster's fifth novel, A Passage to India, was published in 1924. From then, aged 45, until his death at 91, Forster's publications took the form of essays, biographies, reviews, petitions, short stories, lectures, and libretti. After Passage, Forster once explained, his desire to write novels simply "dried up." Notwithstanding, his later writings were to sustain the wisdom of the earlier fiction and also help explain it; Forster's essays in large measure reproduce the insights of his novels, making them explicit and political.

Published originally in periodicals such as the Atlantic Monthly, the Listener, the New Statesman, Oxford and Cambridge Review, the Spectator, and the Times Literary Supplement, Forster's essays are collected in three main volumes: Pharos and Pharillon (1923), Abinger Harvest (1936), and Two Cheers for Democracy (1951). While the first centers on Forster's experiences as a World War I Red Cross volunteer in Egypt, the second and third range widely over literary, social, cultural, and biographical themes: from Proust to Marco Polo, music, liberty, Nazism, tolerance, censorship, chauvinism, anti-Semitism, the countryside, Cambridge, the English character, and America.

The epithet "Forsterian" (liberal, unconventional, skeptical, moral) had been in circulation since the critical success of his 1910 novel, Howards End. It is important in comprehending Forster's influence as an essay writer to appreciate his achievement in maintaining, through some of the most turbulent years of the 20th century, a personal philosophy of liberal humanism. By the mid-1930s, indeed, he had become a principal moralist of his age. He was a sage (with remarkably few open detractors) who brought liberalism to suburbia; who countered the excesses of the world by demonstrating the powers of selfredemption; who garnered the respect of a whole generation of writers (including Auden, Isherwood, Spender, MacNeice, Cyril Connolly, and Iris Murdoch) for prescribing in his writings and exhibiting in his life an outspoken personal integrity. As Isherwood concluded (1962), Forster's work stood for "all that is truly worth saving from Hitler."

The most famously Forsterian of the essays is perhaps What I Believe (1939). "I do not believe in Belief," Forster begins. "But this is an Age of Faith, and there are so many militant creeds that, in self-defence, one has to formulate a creed of one's own... Tolerance, good temper, and sympathy—they are what matter really, and if the human race is not to collapse they must come to the front before long. But for the moment they are not enough, their action is no stronger than a flower, battered beneath a military jackboot. They want stiffening, even if the process coarsens them. Faith, to my mind, is a stiffening process, a sort of mental starch, which ought to be applied as sparingly as possible. I dislike the stuff. I do not believe in it, for its own sake, at all." What he does believe in, Forster then proceeds to enunciate: individualism—even though individual wholeness may be a myth, since an awareness of individual lives and deaths fosters decent personal relations with others; loyalty, trust, and love between friends—even though in theory human beings do not know themselves and cannot know others; human beings who are sensitive, imaginative, and conscientious, who endure through cruelty and chaos and do not see life in terms of power—even while all live in power's shadow; civilization—those intervals when force and violence are not to the fore, when social organization is based on the distribution of native human goodness rather than a dependence on the God of Christianity or of Government; and democracy, because it grants creative people the opportunity and liberty to make and express themselves, and shuns the hero-worship of Great Men. And he concludes: "So Two cheers for Democracy: one because it admits variety and two because it permits criticism. Two cheers are quite enough: there is not occasion to give three. Only Love the Beloved Republic deserves that."

Particularly characteristic is Forster's combination of affirmation and skepticism. He assumes a liberal humanism, for the purpose of living and as a purpose for living, not blindly, sanctimoniously, or dogmatically, but ironically, in spite of the absurdities of the world, despite the limitations of any human philosophy. Semi-cynical, Forster yet remains semi-idealistic.

Forster's technique of writing was memorably described by Isherwood (1938) as "based on the tea-table." It involves a toning down rather than a heightening of drama and import, accentuating through underemphasis. Unceremonious sentences bear a weight of meaning seemingly disproportionate to their spare scaffolding; the particular is offered as stimulus to generalities, the vivid image standing for the implicit wider idea. Hence, across a diversity of essay topics, there is a familiarity of treatment: personal and personable. Presenting particular ideas in a personal way, Forster eschews simple categorizations and conclusions and evinces instead the complexity of things: the disorder of the world, the paradoxical character of human nature. Thus he abnormalizes the everyday and brings it to consciousness. As Virginia Woolf noted, Forster was able to gain perspective on "the simple things which clever people overlooked." He also addresses the reader on equal terms and without trivialization, with an "unforbiddingness" which encourages intimacy and rapport. Finally, while refraining from detailing a political program, and with ready admission of personal inadequacy and provisionality, Forster makes humorous, gentle stabs at pomposity and hypocrisy; by having domestic detail impinge on political sensibility, he makes his politics experiential, of a human size and intelligibility.

Speaking with simultaneous attachment and detachment, as participant, observer, and critic, Forster's essay narration switches between a number of different voices. There is a voice of social realism; there is also a voice of social radicalism and prophecy. There is an ironic voice, veering between the comedic and the satiric, and also a voice of transcendentalism, of Forster proclaiming the inauthenticity of all manner of social exchange, through which (in art) reality only periodically erupts. There is a voice of allegory and romance, as Forster explores elemental human problems in flat characterizations. Finally, there is a voice of mysticism, of Forster seeking insinuations of the infinite in human contact with the earth. There is, in sum, a multiplicity to Forster, of many voices becoming and returning.

When these different voices are critically discussed, their relationship is often found to be perplexing. Woolf claimed an ambiguity and elusiveness at the heart of Forster's writing deriving from the problem of harmonizing the voices so that a coherent vision could emerge. But in not resolving such ambiguity, Forster heightens his writing's effectiveness; reality, he intimates, cannot be described in just one voice. Thus he demonstrates, in Lionel Trilling's phrase (1943), his "whim of iron," insisting that human life must always elude essential definition.

Nonetheless, Trilling (like others) declined to rank Forster as a great critic or theorizer. His critical essays ("T.S.Eliot," 1928; "George Orwell," 1950) are seen as excessively informal, privileging neither distinctions nor judgments. His nonfiction in general is elegant, cultivated, and accomplished, but not unique; contemporary littérateurs—Strachey, Nicholson—might have written similarly. Even his more theoretical essays ("Jew-Consciousness," 1939; "Does Culture Matter?" 1940) are found to be impressionistic, not architectonic, stimulated by a personal need to validate his individual responses. But then Forster never held criticism in particularly high esteem: criticism could not approach the mystery of the creative arts. Meanwhile, his overriding liberal impulse is to extend the range of his audience's moral imagination, connecting all things, seeing all equally: good-with-evil, not good versus evil.

Since his death, a modish antihumanism has caused Forster's liberal reputation to be queried. But then, as Stephen Spender put it, if Forster appears no longer to speak to us directly, it is likely because we have listened and followed his advice: his writing (fiction and nonfiction alike) has passed into our heritage.

NIGEL RAPPORT

Biography

Edward Morgan Forster. Born 1 January 1879 in London. Studied at Kent House, Eastbourne, Sussex, 1890–93; Tonbridge School, Kent, 1893–97; King's College, Cambridge, 1897–1901, B.A., 1901, M.A., 1910. Contributor to various journals and newspapers, beginning at Cambridge and continuing later, including the Nation, the Daily News, the Daily Herald, the Athenaeum, the Listener, London Mercury, New Criterion, Time and Tide, and the New Statesman. Traveled in Italy, 1901–02, and in Greece and Italy, 1903. Lecturer, Working Men's College, London, 1901–07. Cofounder, Independent Review, 1903. Lived in India, 1912–13, and private secretary to the Maharajah of Dewas, India, 1921. Worked for the National Gallery, London, 1914–15. Red Cross volunteer worker, Alexandria, Egypt, 1915–18. Literary editor, London Daily

Herald, 1920. Fellow of King's College, Cambridge, and Clark Lecturer, Trinity College, Cambridge, 1927; Honorary Fellow of King's College, 1946–70. Awards: James Tait Black Memorial Prize, 1925; Femina Vie Heureuse Prize, 1925; Royal Society of Literature Benson Medal, 1937, and Companion of Literature, 1961; honorary degrees from eight universities; Honorary Member, American Academy and Bavarian Academy of Fine Arts; Companion of Honour, 1953; Order of Merit, 1969. Died in Coventry, 7 June 1970.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Pharos and Pharillon, 1923

Anonymity: An Enquiry (pamphlet), 1925

Aspects of the Novel, 1927

A Letter to Madan Blanchard (pamphlet), 1931

Abinger Harvest, 1936

What I Believe, 1939

Two Cheers for Democracy, 1951

Albergo Empedocle and Other Writings, edited by George Thomson, 1971

Aspects of the Novel and Related Writings, edited by Oliver Stallybrass, 1974

The Uncollected Egyptian Essays, edited by Hilda D. Spear and Abdel-Moneim Aly, 1988

Other writings: six novels (Where Angels Fear to Tread, 1905; The Longest Journey, 1907; A Room with a View, 1908; Howards End, 1910; A Passage to India, 1924; Maurice, 1971 [published posthumously]), short stories, travel writing, and three plays.

Collected works edition: Works (Abinger Edition), edited by Oliver Stallybrass and Elizabeth Heine, 1972–(in progress).

Bibliographies

Borrello, Albert, E.M. Forster: An Annotated Bibliography of Secondary Materials, Metuchen, New Jersey: Scarecrow Press, 1973

Kirkpatrick, B.J., A Bibliography of E.M. Forster, Oxford: Clarendon Press, revised edition, 1985 (original edition, 1965)

McDowell, Frederick P.W., editor, E.M. Forster: An Annotated Bibliography of Writing About Him, De Kalb: Northern Illinois University Press, 1976

Further Reading

Beuman, Nicola, Morgan: A Biography of E.M. Forster, London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1993

Bloom, Harold, editor, E.M. Forster, New York: Chelsea House, 1987

Borrello, Alfredo, An E.M. Forster Dictionary, Metuchen, New Jersey: Scarecrow Press, 1971

Borrello, Alfredo, An E.M. Forster Glossary, Metuchen, New Jersey: Scarecrow Press, 1972

- Bradbury, Malcolm, editor, Forster: A Collection of Critical Essays, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice Hall, 1966
- Crews, Frederick, E.M.Forster: The Perils of Humanism, Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1962.
- Dowling, David, Bloomsbury Aesthetics and the Novels of Forster and Woolf, London: Macmillan, and New York: St. Martin's Press, 1985
- Furbank, P.N., E.M. Forster: A Life, London: Secker and Warburg, 2 vols., 1977–78; New York: Harcourt Brace, 1978
- Gillie, Christopher, A Preface to Forster, Harlow: Longman, 1983
- Gransden, K.W., E.M. Forster, Edinburgh: Oliver and Boyd, revised edition, 1970 (original edition, 1962)
- Herz, Judith Scherer, and Robert K.Martin, editors, E.M.Forster: Centenary Revaluations, London: Macmillan, and Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1982
- Isherwood, Christopher, Lions and Shadows: An Education in the Twenties, London, Hogarth Press, 1938; Norfolk, Connecticut: New Directions, 1947
- Isherwood, Christopher, Down There on a Visit, New York: Simon and Schuster, and London: Methuen, 1962
- Jones, D., "An Interview with E.M. Forster on His Life and His Books," The Listener, 1 January 1959
- Page, Norman, E.M.Forster, Basingstoke: Macmillan, 1987; New York: St. Martin's Press, 1988
- Stallybrass, Oliver, editor, Aspects of E.M.Forster: Essays and Recollections Written for His Ninetieth Birthday, 1st January 1969, London: Arnold, and New York: Harcourt Brace, 1969
- Stone, Wilfred, The Cave and the Mountain: A Study of E.M. Forster, Stanford, California: Stanford University Press, 1966
- Summers, Claude J., E.M.Forster, New York: Ungar, 1983
- Trilling, Lionel, E.M.Forster, Norfolk, Connecticut: New Directions, revised edition, 1965; London: Hogarth Press, 1967 (original edition, 1943)
- Warren, Austin, Rage for Order: Essays in Criticism, Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1948
- Wilson, A., "A Conversation with E.M.Forster," Encounter 9 (1957)
- Woolf, Virginia, "The Novels of E.M.Forster," in her The Death of the Moth and Other Essays, London: Hogarth Press, and New York: Harcourt Brace, 1942

Forster, Georg

German, 1754–1794

Georg Forster was born near Danzig and was the oldest of seven children. His father, Johann Reinhold Forster, was a village pastor and played a pivotal role in the younger Forster's life. In 1765 Forster's father received from the St. Petersburg Academy of Science the coveted assignment to travel 4000 kilometers to the German colony along the Volga River, where he was to study the geography, geology, and natural conditions of the region. For the young Forster, who accompanied his father, this experience represented an incomparable early opportunity to observe the relations existing among science, nature, and history. Unfortunately, rightful recognition and compensation for this journey remained mired in the feudal bureaucracy of St. Petersburg. Forster Sr. moved his family to London in 1766, where in the following 12 years the young Forster helped his father with translation work amid economic misery and squalor.

It was at this stage in Forster's development that a momentous adventure once again presented itself in the form of the famous second circumnavigation of the globe by Captain James Cook. England's burgeoning capitalism required new sources of raw materials and production and new markets, along with the knowledge to find and develop them. Such a voyage of discovery was undertaken once again in 1772 by Cook in his ship Resolution and Forster's father received a commission as ship's scientist. He was also granted permission to bring along his son Georg.

The three-year voyage, the longest in history, included visits to Antarctica, the Pacific, and Tahiti. Upon his return to England, the 23-year-old Forster immediately combined the experiences of the voyage with personal interpretations. The resulting essay A Voyage Round the World (1777) proved to be an intellectual deepening of the literary form of the travel essay, taking on board the philosophy of the 18th century.

As a travel essay, Voyage continues the search for new human existence beyond the scientific findings it reports. Rather than a series of conclusive findings, it functions as an open-ended search for and understanding of these conclusions. While facts make up the surface, human questions underlie the text. Moreover, Forster does not fall victim to sentimental Romanticism or Rousseauism; rather he seeks to explain individual qualities and traits and to integrate them into an historical framework.

Upon returning to Germany in 1778, Forster found that his long absence had rendered him a virtual foreigner in his native land. Yet it was precisely his lengthy stays in Russia and England and his sea voyage that gave him a broad perspective and an open mind.

Forster continued to expand his circle of friends and acquaintances. Perhaps most productive of these was his friendship and collaboration with Georg Christoph Lichtenberg, with whom he coedited the literary magazine Göttingisches Magazin (1780–85), where Forster published a dozen or so essays. Essays such as “O-Tahiti” (1783) and “Cook, der Entdecker” (1787; Cook, the discoverer) demonstrate the continuing influence of the Cook voyage. These travel and science essays again emphasize the meaning of science, the search for truth, and the philosophy of life in a synthesizing treatment of nature, science, and history. It was the human face of science and the possibility of social perfectibility in an historical process that characterized Forster's contribution to the Göttingisches Magazin.

After a disappointing teaching stint in Vilnius, Lithuania, Forster returned to Germany in 1787 and in 1788 accepted a position as bibliographer in Mainz. It was here that he wrote the famous “Über Leckereyen” (1788; On sweets) in which he explored issues of nature and culture from the perspective of taste, both palatal and aesthetic. Eschewing both the moral idealist and the physical-materialist traditions, this essay postulates the central theme of human perfectibility through culture, as well as an enlightened-progressive organization of society. At this time Forster also penned his “History of English Literature” (1789), an inquiry written in English into the relationship between a nation's literature and its politics and economics.

In 1789, on the eve of the momentous events in France, Forster, accompanied by the 21-year-old Alexander von Humboldt, undertook another epic journey, producing his best-known travel essay, Ansichten vom Niederrhein, von Brabant, Flandern, Holland, England und Frankreich (1791–94; Views of the Lower Rhine, of Brabant, Flanders, Holland, England, and France). The title Ansichten (Views) is deliberately ambiguous, referring both to objects and to reflection or opinion. By traveling outside of Germany—particularly through Holland, site of the first successful bourgeois revolution—Forster began to understand the connections between the rise of the bourgeoisie and the rise of industry and trade. As a travel essay, the Ansichten remains sketchy, open, associative, and digressive, combining literary forms such as letter, report, treatise, polemic, and meditation, all in a personal, conversational tone.

The final phase of Forster's life was engulfed by the French Revolution and marked his abandonment of bourgeois-humanistic enlightenment in favor of revolutionary-bourgeois democracy. Following the events of 1789 with interest and, later, the rise of the Jacobins with sympathy, Forster was drawn into the midst of the revolutionary debate, not least because he resided in Mainz, which was conquered in 1792 by the French forces. Demonstrating ever more strongly his willingness and enthusiasm for moving from theoretical enlightenment to revolutionary practice, Forster joined the "Society of Friends for Freedom and Equality" and called for political allegiance to France and the Revolution.

After the Parisian National Commune declared Mainz an independent republic in 1793, Forster felt that its survival was possible only if Mainz joined France. He was accordingly one of three representatives who traveled to Paris to petition for admittance to the French state. The petition was successful but irrelevant, for the very day Forster delivered his speech before the National Commune, the counterrevolutionary army of Prussia reconquered the Rhineland. After four months the Republic of Mainz ceased to be.

As a traitor, Forster had a price of 100 ducats placed on his head. His actions were radically unique for German history, in that he completed the transition from revolutionary writing to revolutionary action.

RALPH W.BUECHLER

Biography

Johann Georg Adam Forster. Born 27 November 1754 in Nassenhuben, near Danzig (now Gdańsk). As a child traveled to Russia, 1765, and later lived in London. Accompanied his father on Captain Cook's second voyage to the South Seas, 1772–75. Professor of natural history, Collegium Carolinum, Kassel, 1778–84, and University of Vilnius, 1784–86. Coeditor, Göttingisches Magazin der Wissenschaften und Literatur, 1780–85; contributor to Göttingische Anzeigen von gelehrten Sachen, Der Teutscher Merkur (The German Mercury), and other periodicals. Married Therese Heyne, 1785 (she deserted him, 1792): two daughters (two others died in infancy). Librarian at the University of Mainz, 1788. Supported the French Revolution; representative of the Mainz Republicans, Paris, 1793, and outlawed in Germany. Died (of complications arising from scurvy; possibly of a stroke) in Paris, 10 January 1794.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

A Voyage Round the World in His Britannic Majesty's Sloop, Resolution, Commanded by Capt. James Cook, During the Years 1772, 3, 4, and 5, 2 vols., 1777

Ansichten vom Niederrhein, von Brabant, Flandern, Holland, England und Frankreich im April, Mai und Junius, 3 vols., 1791–94

Ausgewählte kleine Schriften, edited by Albert Leitzmann, 1894

Tagebücher, edited by Paul Zincke and Albert Leitzmann, 1914

Ausgewählte Schriften, edited by Rudolf Leonhard, 1928

Kleine Schriften und Briefe, edited by Claus Träger, 1964

Über die Beziehung der Staatskunst auf das Glück der Menschheit und andere Schriften, edited by Wolfgang Rödel, 1966

Schriften zu Natur, Kunst, Politik, edited by Karl Otto Conrady, 1971

Other writings: books on botany, and correspondence. Also translated Kalidasa's Sakontala from Sanskrit.

Collected works editions: Sämtliche Schriften, edited by G.G. Gervinus, 9 vols., 1843;

Werke (Germany Academy of Science Edition), 18 vols., 1958–82; Werke, edited by Gerhard Steiner, 4 vols., 1967–70.

Bibliography

Fiedler, Horst, Georg-Forster-Bibliographie, 1767–1970, Berlin: Akademischer-Verlag, 1971

Further Reading

Bodi, Leslie, "Georg Forster: The 'Pacific Expert' of Eighteenth-Century Germany,"

Historical Studies of Australia and New Zealand 32 (1959):345–63

Döppe, Friedrich, Forster in Mainz, Berlin: Aufbau, 1987 (original edition, 1956)

Gordon, Joseph Stuart, Reinhold and Georg Forster in England (dissertation), Durham, North Carolina: Duke University, 1975

Kersten, Kurt, Der Weltumsegler: Johann Georg Adam Forster, 1754–1794, Frankfurt-on-Main: Europäische, 1957

Rödel, Wolfgang, Forster und Lichtenberg, Berlin: Rütten & Loenig, 1960

Steiner, Gerhard, Georg Forster, Stuttgart: Metzler, 1977

Thoma, Friedrich M., Georg Forster: Weltreisender, Forscher, Revolutionär, Berlin: Neues Leben, 1954

Franklin, Benjamin

American, 1706–1790

Benjamin Franklin was undoubtedly a living symbol of the Age of Reason; his essays, among the great of that genre, reflect a practical rationalism that goes far beyond a simple record of his life. If Henry David Thoreau was born, as he said, in “the nick of time,” so too was Franklin; if Thoreau revolted against materialism, so too did Franklin revolt against the speculative and introspective reasoning of the Puritans. A materialist and pragmatist, he wanted to be directly involved in the world.

To understand Franklin and his idea of involvement, one must start with his Autobiography (1791). Arguably the first great work in American literature, it presents a guide for living in a world that was vastly different from that of England or Europe. While some have criticized Franklin for a faulty style and a lack of imagination, not to mention a soulless philosophy of life, the Autobiography is clearly a rags-to-riches success story of considerable proportion; moreover, any examination of Franklin’s career will reveal him as a man who could get things done, from starting a lending library in Philadelphia to achieving a treaty with France.

Addressed to his son, the Autobiography has as its central theme Franklin’s rise from poverty and obscurity, as he puts it, “to a state of affluence and some degree of celebrity in the world.” Utilizing a personal, almost folksy, style, he works his way from his infancy to his 51st year in an attempt to create a guide to the achievement of what has come to be called the American Dream. He was mapping new ground, for the New World demanded adaptation to new conditions and a new reality. For Franklin the key was experience and reason. By applying the latter to the former, one could win in the game of life. In a very real sense life was a game to Franklin, one he enjoyed playing, just as he enjoyed the knowledge that he was a symbol of an age. It is the fact of this knowledge that gave Franklin an ironic way of seeing and presenting himself in the Autobiography.

At first the Autobiography appears to be a loosely structured reminiscence expressed in a conversational style. However, there is a method and order to the work, just as there was to Franklin’s everyday life. More important, however, is the tone of the Autobiography, which might best be described as refreshing, not only for the times in which it was written, but also for today. Combining humor with selfexaggeration, Franklin exhibits himself to the reader as a cross between a naive bumpkin and an insightful man of the world. Ever ready to admit to errors in his career, he never lets the reader lose sight of the basis of his success: a pragmatic activism marked by optimism and the desire to make both himself and the world around him better. It may take some stretch of the imagination to agree with Franklin that virtue may be achieved by a specific set of steps or rules, yet in his view becoming virtuous was like the learning of any art. As he wrote to Lord Kanes in 1760, to acquire those virtues that are wanting “is the subject of an art.” As the Autobiography and Franklin’s other writings show, for him there was no such thing as abstract reality.

What the Autobiography lays out in a discursive prose style, Poor Richard's Almanack (begun in 1732) presents in the staccato style of axioms. The fact that Franklin's work sold out in one month attests to the popularity of almanacs at the time. For Franklin, it was the ideal medium in which to present his rules for living the successful life. Along with the sayings of Poor Richard, Franklin's personal essays, the Silence Dogood Papers (1721–23), the Busy-Body Papers (1728), and the Bagatelles (1776–85) illustrate the versatility of his creative talents. These essays cover a wide range of topics, reflecting his seemingly endless interests in the world around him. He is at his best in the Bagatelles, most of which were letters written to Mmes. Brillon and Helvetius while he was in Paris from 1776 to 1785. The bagatelle, as Franklin conceived of it, was a lighthearted essay or letter in which he could make good use of his charm and wit, as well as his broad knowledge and his consummate skill in the essay form.

As he did in so many areas, Franklin left an indelible mark on the essay in America. Perhaps he sums himself up best:

If you wou'd not be forgotten
As soon as you are dead and rotten,

Either write things worth reading
Or do things worth the writing.

WILTON ECKLEY

Biography

Born 17 January 1706 in Boston. Studied at Boston Grammar School, 1714; George Brownell's School, Boston. Apprenticed to half-brother James' printer business, from 1718; contributor of the "Silence Dogood" articles, New-England Courant, 1721–23; worked for printers in Philadelphia, 1723–24, 1728, and London, 1724–25; clerk for Denham merchant, Philadelphia, 1726–27; established his own printing business, publishing the Pennsylvania Gazette, 1728, 1729–66 (copublisher, from 1748), Philadelphische Zeitung (Philadelphia news), 1732, and Poor Richard's Almanack, 1732–57. Married Deborah Read, 1730 (died, 1774): one son and one daughter; also had a son and daughter with another woman. Served in the Pennsylvania Assembly, 1736–64; London agent for the Assembly, 1757–62, 1764–75; also colonial agent for Georgia, 1768, New Jersey, 1769, and Massachusetts, 1770; deputy postmaster, Philadelphia, 1737–53, and joint deputy postmaster of the colonies, 1753–74; publisher and editor, General Magazine and Historical Chronicle, 1741; delegate to the Second Continental Congress, 1775–76; member of the drafting committee and signatory of the Declaration of Independence, 1776; sent to France as commissioner to negotiate with the French, 1776; lived at Passy, near Paris, establishing a press, 1776–85; member of commission to negotiate peace with Britain, from 1781 (treaty signed, 1783); returned to Philadelphia, 1785. Also inventor of the Franklin Stove, 1739; studied electricity and performed the famous kite, key, and lightning experiment, 1752. Awards: Royal Society Copley Medal, 1753; honorary degrees from five colleges and universities. Fellow, Royal Society (London), 1756; Member, French Academy of Sciences, 1772. Died in Philadelphia, 17 April 1790.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

The Silence Dogood Papers, in New-England Courant, 1721–23

The Busy-Body Papers, in American Weekly Mercury, 1728

Political, Miscellaneous, and Philosophical Pieces, edited by Benjamin Vaughan, 1779

Philosophical and Miscellaneous Papers, edited by Edward Bancroft, 1787

Autobiography, 1791; first complete edition edited by John Bigelow, 1868; edited by J.A.

Leo Lemay and P.M.Zall, 1986, and Louis P.Masur, 1993

Satires and Bagatelles, edited by Paul McPharlin, 1937

Autobiographical Writings, edited by Carl Van Doren, 1945

Franklin's Wit and Folly: The Bagatelles, edited by Richard E. Amacher, 1953

The Political Thought, edited by Ralph L.Ketcham, 1965

The Autobiography and Other Writings, edited by Peter Shaw, 1982, Kenneth Silverman, 1986, and Ormond Seavey, 1993

Other writings: works on science, history, and politics.

Collected works editions: Writings, edited by Albert Henry Smyth, 10 vols., 1905–07;

The Papers of Benjamin Franklin (Yale Edition), edited by Leonard W.Labree, Whitfield J.Bell, Jr., and others, 31 vols., 1959–95 (in progress); Writings (Library of America Edition), edited by J.A.Leo Lemay, 1987.

Bibliographies

Buxbaum, Melvin H., Benjamin Franklin, 1721–1906: A Reference Guide, Boston: Hall, 1983

Ford, Paul Leicester, Benjamin Franklin Bibliography: A List of Books Written by, or Relating to, Benjamin Franklin, Brooklyn: Historical Printing Club, 1889

Further Reading

Aldridge, A.O., Benjamin Franklin and Nature's God, Durham, North Carolina: Duke University Press, 1967

Amacher, Richard, Benjamin Franklin, New York: Twayne, 1962

Conner, Paul W., Poor Richard's Politicks: Benjamin Franklin and His New American Order, New York: Oxford University Press, 1965

Crane, Verner, Benjamin Franklin and a Rising People, Boston: Little Brown, 1954

Fay, Bernard, Bernard Fay's Franklin, the Apostle of Modern Times, Boston: Little Brown, 1929

Lingelbach, William, "Studies on Benjamin Franklin," Proceedings of the American

Philosophical Society 99, no. 6 {December 1955}:359–73

Nolan, J.Bennett, Benjamin Franklin in Scotland and Ireland, 1759 and 1771,

Phiadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1956

Parton, James, The Life and Times of Benjamin Franklin, New York: De Capo, 1971
(original edition, 1864)

Sanford, Charles L., editor, Benjamin Franklin and the American Character, Boston:
Heath, 1955

Sellers, Charles Coleman, editor, Benjamin Franklin in Portraiture, New Haven, Connecticut: Yale University Press, 1962

Tourtellot, Arthur Bernon, *Benjamin Franklin: The Shaping of Genius: The Boston
Years*, Garden City, New York: Doubleday, 1977

Van Doren, Carl, Benjamin Franklin, New York: Viking Press, 1938; London: Putnam, 1939

Wright, Esmond, Franklin of Philadelphia, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1986

Freire, Paulo

Brazilian, 1921–1997

Philosopher, educator, attorney, revolutionary, and later secretary of education in São Paulo, Paulo Freire is best known for his work on the themes of oppression and liberation. Literally hundreds of essays stemmed from Freire’s philosophical theories of education, democratization, and “conscientization.” Between 1947 and 1959, Freire was involved with literacy education in the northeast of Brazil, a center of poverty and illiteracy. In the early 1960s, he became more and more involved in literacy projects, usually centered among the student-dominated Popular Culture Movement. Among the Movement’s many goals was that of consciousness-raising among the poor. Freire and his followers had to suspend their efforts abruptly with the Brazilian military coup of 1964, at which time he was arrested; he later left Brazil for Chile, where he worked as a UNESCO consultant and with the Agrarian Reform Training and Research Institute. During these tumultuous years, Freire traveled throughout the “Third World” and began refining his philosophy of education, first published in English as Pedagogy of the Oppressed (1970). The book was then published in Spanish because it was prohibited in Freire’s own country, Brazil.

In Pedagogy of the Oppressed, Freire evolved his theory for the education of illiterate adults based on the conviction that every human being, no matter how “ignorant” or how far submerged in the “culture of silence,” is capable of looking critically at the world in a dialectical encounter with others. This dialogue can only be achieved if each person is conscious of his or her own position in society. Education, Freire argues, cannot be of the “banking” kind. “Banking” education—in which an authoritarian figure “deposits” bits of knowledge into a learner and the latter “receives” this deposit without question—is seen as an instrument of oppression. For Freire, educational systems in the Third World are the chief tools used by oppressive elites to dominate the masses. It is only through “conscientization” that individuals may become aware of true reality.

Freire did not deny the need for factual education—perhaps even some “banking” knowledge may be required; however, this type of learning is to be a step toward the democratization and equalization of the dialectical system. Freire insisted, in both thought and action, that words and themes used in literacy programs must be relevant and common among the people being educated. The content of education is to be determined jointly with the people who are to pursue the learning. Freire’s idea of “learning to question” reaches not only the learner but also the educator. It is only through the “conscientization of the educator that the learner will become more conscious of his or her oppression.” Educators, he maintained, must question their own philosophical stance.

Peter L. McLaren (1994) deconstructs Freire’s essays in a mirror-like opposition to “the discursive trail from consciousness to language, from the denotative to the performative, and from the hypothesis to the speech-act.” What Freire attempted in his own essays was to build from speech-act to performative to denotative to language to consciousness. Is this utopian paradox possible? In The Politics of Education (1985), Freire establishes once again that “it is necessary to have faith in the people, solidarity with them. It is necessary to be utopian.” If educators take this stance, he believes they will be able to carry out the project of “transforming and recreating the world.”

From the publication of the Pedagogy of the Oppressed through the publication of Pedagogy of Hope: Reliving “Pedagogy of the Oppressed” (1994), Freire thought and rethought his position as the consciousness-raising advocate of the early 1960s. He claimed that he “writes what he does”; his essays were merely “reports” of his activities. Freire’s critics claimed that his utopian society is pointless in Brazil, a country dominated by a small elite. His followers expanded his theories to industrialized nations where the “banking” model of education has failed.

In the last 30 years, Freire’s work has been studied throughout the world. His philosophy has been one of the major influences to emerge from Latin America. In his own words, in an interview with Carlos Alberto Torres, Freire concludes, “the limits of education would bring a naive man or woman to desperation. A dialectical man or woman discovers in the limits of education the raison d’être for his or her efficiency. It is in this way that I feel that today I am an efficient Secretary of Education because I am limited.” Thus, Freire returned to his main thesis that it is only through the conscientization of the educator—the understanding of limitations—that dialogue begins.

CARMEN CHAVES TESSER

Biography

Born 19 September 1921 in Recife, Pernambuco. Studied at the University of Recife, Ph.D., 1959. Married Elza Maia Costa Oliveira, 1944 (died, 1986): three daughters and two sons. General coordinator of National Plan for Adult Literacy, northeastern Brazil, 1947–59. Professor of history and the philosophy of education, University of Recife. Imprisoned briefly after military coup, 1964; moved to Chile, where he worked for UNESCO and the Chilean Institute for Agrarian Reform, for five years. Visiting professor, Harvard University School of Education, Cambridge, Massachusetts, from 1969. Consultant to the Office of Education, World Council of Churches, Geneva, 1974–81. Professor of education, Pontifical Catholic University of São Paulo, from 1981. Secretary of education, São Paulo, 1988–91. Married Ana Maria Araújo, 1988. Awards: honorary degrees from 29 universities. Died 2 May 1997.

Selected Writings

Essays and Related Prose

Educação como prática da liberdade, 1967; as Education for Critical Consciousness, 1973; as Education, the Practice of Freedom, 1976

Sobre la accion cultural: Ensayos escogidos, 1969

Pedagogy of the Oppressed, translated by Myra Bergman Ramos, 1970; revised edition, 1996

La demitificación de la concientización y otros escritos, 1975

Ação cultural para a liberdade e outros escritos, 1976

Cartas a Guine-Bissau: Registros de uma experiencia. em processo, 1977; as Pedagogy in Process: The Letters to Guinea-Bissau, translated by Carmen St. John Hunter, 1978

The Politics of Education: Culture, Power, and Liberation, translated by Donald Macedo, 1985

Pedagogy of Hope: Reliving "Pedagogy of the Oppressed", translated by Robert R. Barr, 1994

Letters to Cristina, translated by Donald Macedo, 1996

Further Reading

Bullough, Robert V., Jr., and Andrew D. Gitlin, "Challenging Teacher Education as Training: Four Propositions," Journal of Education for Teaching 20 (1994):67–81

Elias, John L., Paulo Freire: Pedagogue of Liberation, Melbourne, Florida: Krieger, 1994

Elias, John L., and Sharan B. Marriam, Philosophical Foundations of Adult Education, Melbourne, Florida: Krieger, 1995

Kanpol, Barry, and Peter McLaren, editors, Critical Multiculturalism: Uncommon Voices in a Common Struggle, Westport, Connecticut: Bergin and Garvey, 1995

McLaren, Peter L., and Colin Lankshear, Politics of Liberation: Paths from Freire, London and New York: Routledge, 1994

Mayo, Peter, "Synthesizing Gramsci and Freire: Possibilities for a Theory of Radical Adult Education," International Journal of Lifelong Education 13 (1994):125–48

Shor, Ira, and Paulo Freire, A Pedagogy for Liberation: Dialogues on Transforming Education, South Hadley, Massachusetts: Bergin and Garvey, and Basingstoke: Macmillan, 1987

Wong, Pia Lindquist, "Constructing a Public Popular Education in São Paulo, Brazil," Comparative Education Review 39 (1995): 120–41

French Essay

1. Montaigne, The 16th and 17th Centuries

It is in 16th-century France, with the Essais (1580, 1588; Essays) of Michel de Montaigne (1533–92), that the essay had its origins. One of his basic tenets was to write extensively about himself. Autobiography had already been established as an acceptable form in Renaissance Italy and the acceptance of the individual self as subject matter was already affirmed when his Essais appeared on the scene (Peter Burke, 1981). Yet the Essais are not exactly autobiographical in nature, and Montaigne may not have known these autobiographical works when he began writing. As for the existence of short prose pieces on a variety of topics, Burke has this to say: “The idea of publishing a discursive treatment of different subjects within the covers of a single volume was not new in Montaigne’s day.” These collections were called “miscellanies” or “discourses,” the latter being a “revival of the Greek diatribe, which may be defined as the short treatment of a moral theme, written in a vivid, immediate, and humorous way so that the reader has the sense of listening to the author.” Montaigne knew, and was inspired by, Plutarch’s Moralia, a collection of such diatribes; he also knew the French translation of the Spanish author Pedro Mexía’s Silva de varia lección (1544; The Forest; or, Collection of Histories), discourses which deal with many of his own subjects; and the Adagia (1500) and Apophtegmes (1531) of Erasmus, an important precursor as an adversary of Ciceronian discourse. Other proto-essay forms that influenced him, especially from classical antiquity (in addition to Plutarch), were Seneca’s Letters to Lucilius, Horace’s verse epistles, and Plato’s Dialogues. But in the end Montaigne’s originality is unassailable. No one, as he rightly acknowledged, had ever written a work exactly like his Essais.

For Montaigne, his essais were less a literary form created by a self-conscious artist than “attempts” (the original meaning of the word) at “trying himself” in writing against a great number of challenges, with the practical goal of living more wisely. The complete title of his work is in fact Essais de Michel de Montaigne, or “Self-testings of Michel de Montaigne.” Donald Frame (1969) points out that Montaigne’s title was used “to designate not a genre but a procedure for exploring and revealing the self.” Some of the features of the Essais were unique to their author and scarcely imitable by future essayists: the central role of his friend Étienne de La Boétie (1530–63) in their inspiration; the extensive and highly original use of quotations, especially from classical authors; the disguising of his heterodox opinions by means of misleading titles given to individual essays; the abundant additions he made from one edition to the next, rendering the definitive text a palimpsest of meanings; the profound skepticism (that of a Catholic fideist) concerning the possibility of attaining certain truth outside of Christian revelation, a skepticism embodied in the very form of his essays. On the other hand, many features of the Essais were to remain genetically imprinted, so to speak, in the future essay of many lands: the highlighting of the “self” as both subject and point of view, more precisely the “observing self” (Graham Good, 1988), open to reflection on an endless variety of subjects; the tendency to reflect on the essay itself as subject matter (“Others write about various subjects; Montaigne writes about writing itself,” observed Marie de Gournay in her preface to the 1595 edition of the Essais); the fortuitous association of ideas and apparent randomness of form, resulting in a kind of artful disorder; and finally, the foregoing of the definitive expression of thought in favor of the expression of thought, so to speak, “in process.”

Montaigne is a rare example in literary history: the inventor of a literary type whose mastery of the type has remained unexcelled. The Greek tragedians met their match in Shakespeare; Aristophanes and Plautus met theirs in Molière; Cervantes met his in later novelists. “The perfection of any artistic form is rarely achieved by its first inventor. To this rule Montaigne is the great and marvelous exception” (Aldous Huxley, preface to Collected Essays, 1960). Having said this, however, one must also recognize that he left the field open for many types of essays that he could hardly have envisioned, such as the periodical essay, and for essayistic features that would be absorbed into what we might call “disguised essays” in all their various forms.

The development of the essay in France in the late 16th and 17th centuries largely coincides with the story of how the Essais were received and the extent of their influence, a story that has been told by such Montaigne scholars as Frame, Pierre Villey, Alan Boase, and Ian Winter. In the 1580s his example encouraged the vogue of discours and even a few direct imitations of his essay form. His influence reached abroad to Italy, Spain, and England. English followers, unlike their French counterparts, who were shy about adopting a title that seemed to be Montaigne’s private property, eagerly borrowed the title. The most famous of these was Francis Bacon, who in his Essays (1597, 1612, 1625) brilliantly reinvented the form along lines quite different from Montaigne’s. In France, with changes in taste and the advent of the literary movement known as “classicism,” a sharp dichotomy occurred in Montaigne’s reception: on the one hand, his thought as moralist, skeptic, and promoter of the ideal of gentlemanly cultivation (l’honnêteté) was highly respected; on the other, his literary form (or what appeared to be formlessness) as well as his archaic, often coarse language and his abundance of personal detail were frowned upon. (This duality in the reception of his work would continue well into the 18th century.) Few were the writers who admired his whole project and imitated his form. One such was Pierre de L’Estoile (1546–1611) in his RegistreJournal (1606), whose title echoes the master’s view of his essays as being the “register” of his experiences. The well-intentioned Pierre Charron (1541–1603) showed how little he understood Montaigne’s originality as an essayist by publishing De la sagesse (1601; Of Wisdom), the first of what would be a long line of reductions of the Essais to a compendium of systematic thought. The jurist Étienne Pasquier (1529–1615) thought the Essais could be improved upon by eliminating a quarter of the text, cutting out all the self-descriptions!

If 17th-century authors tended to avoid the use of the title essai for their short prose pieces, preferring to call them discours, dissertations, réflexions, considerations, traités, etc., the usage did catch hold of calling long prose explorations of a given subject essais. A precedent existed for this in the 16th century, in the political work of Montaigne’s friend, La Boétie, his Discours de la servitude volontaire (1548; A Discourse of Voluntary Servitude), which Montaigne himself describes as having been written “by way of essay” “par manière d’essai.” Great momentum was given to this use of the title by the philosopher René Descartes (1596–1650), who describes his Discours de la méthode (1637; Discourse on Method) as being “essais de cette méthode.” “Trials of” evolved into “Essays on,” in such later works as the Essai sur les mœurs et l’esprit des nations (1756–63; Essay on the Manner and Spirit of Nations) by Voltaire.

Before surveying the leading 17th-century essayists the essay should be considered in its relation to classical literary doctrine and to a form of resistance to this doctrine, namely, the defense of the literary rights of fragmentary and discontinuous prose. The ideal of French classicism had as its basic principles: imitation (more exactly, emulation) of the Greco-Roman “ancients”; the assignment of the forms (mostly verse) inherited from them to a hierarchy of genres; selectivity in choice of matter; impersonality; and highly polished, well-structured form. Obviously the essay had no place in this canon: its creator was less than a century old; it was all-inclusive in subject matter, defiantly personal, embedded in personal circumstances, loosely structured, open-ended, and closer to the process of thinking itself than to any finished product of thought. But the essay’s exclusion, like the novel’s, from the realm of consecrated literary forms meant that, like the novel, it had no need to conform to the strictures governing such “higher” forms as epic, tragic, comic, or satirical verse and could develop with perfect freedom. Perhaps even more significantly—as has been shown in the pioneer study by Jean Lafond and others, Les Formes brèves de la prose et le discours discontinu (XVIe-XVIIe siècles) (1984; Brief prose forms and discontinuous discourse in the 16th and 17th centuries)—Montaigne’s essays figure prominently in the assault against classical doctrine by partisans of prose forms marked by brevity, fragmentariness, and discontinuity. Traditional rhetoric, deriving in great part from oratory, favored well-rounded, self-contained discourse of a certain amplitude with a beginning, a middle, and an end; it dismissed short prose forms such as maxims as being materials for a literary work rather than a true literary work. Montaigne, an enemy of rhetoric, especially of the Ciceronian style, based his writing not on an oratorical but on a conversational model and defended both discontinuity and the relative autonomy of each fragmentary member (“chaque lopin” was his term) of his discourse. He was thus a pioneer in what Lafond, apropos of La Rochefoucauld (1613–80), calls strikingly “the aesthetics of the unfinished” (“l’esthétique de l’inachèvement”), a concept that was to have important repercussions in the Romantic and post-Romantic eras. The Réflexions; ou, Sentences et maximes morales (1665; popularly known as Maximes) of La Rochefoucauld are too brief to qualify as true essays; but both he and Jean de La Bruyère (1645–96), with his Les Caractères ou mœurs de ce siècle (1688; Characters, or the Manners of the Age), made literary history by boldly defying classical doctrine and claiming for their fragmentary discourse true literary stature.

Among 17th-century essayists who have been relegated by posterity to minor status are François de La Mothe le Vayer (1588–1672), whose loosely constructed self-examination and confession, Prose chagrine (1661; Distressed prose), is directly imitative of the Essais; Jean-Louis Guez de Balzac (1597–1654), an important figure in the evolution of classical French prose whose Dissertations critiques (1657) are ambiguous in their attitude toward Montaigne, deploring the Essais's "lack of construction" but admitting, in a famous phrase, the charm of their digressions: "Montaigne does not always know where he is going [but] when he casts aside something good it is usually to find something better"; and Antoine Gombaud de Méré (1607–84), friend of Balzac and of Pascal (he exerted a marked influence on Pascal's concept of the esprit de finesse), whose essays and letters, published posthumously (Œuvres posthumes, 1700), reveal imitations of Montaigne's essay form (Alan Boase, 1935).

One of the few 17th-century writers to use the title "Essays" was the Jansenist theologian, Pierre Nicole (1625–95), in his Essais de morale (1671; Moral Essays). Little attempt to imitate Montaigne here, either in form or (even less) in self-portraiture (Nicole would have agreed with Pascal that "the 'I' is detestable"—"le moi est haïssable"); the Montaignean tradition he is appealing to is that of the modest attempt to deal with a subject, in this instance Christian ethics, that is too vast to handle otherwise. In any case Nicole is a pale, minor essayist compared to the incomparably greater "essayists in disguise" (that is, who used other titles): Blaise Pascal (1623–62), Madame de Sévigné, La Bruyère, and, the most self-conscious essayist as well as the closest in inspiration to Montaigne, SaintÉvremond.

The unfinished apology for the Christian religion that is Pascal's Pensées, first published in 1670, for obvious reasons figures prominently in the 17th-century debate about the literary fragment, but it also contains Pascal's famous ridicule of Montaigne's "silly project of depicting himself." Pascal's real claim as an essayist is found in his letters to a friend in the provinces and to Jesuit Fathers concerning matters of morality and politics, published under the pseudonym of "Louis de Montalte" and familiarly known as the Lettres provinciales (1656–57; The Provincial Letters). Here he gladly acknowledged his debt to Montaigne's "insinuating" conversational style, the style coupé ("abrupt style") inherited by way of Montaigne from Seneca. The essay as a public letter also harks back to Seneca, and we recall that Montaigne viewed his essays as letters to an ideal friend. The brilliant, highly original polemical masterpiece of The Providal Letters foreshadows such 18th-century polemicists as Voltaire as well as the modern journalistic essay.

Madame de Sévigné (1626–96) also used the letter form: in her case, letters primarily to her daughter which were circulated privately before being first published posthumously in 1725 and then subsequently in much enlarged editions. The 19th-century critic Sainte-Beuve wrote perceptively (in an essay from 1829) of what we would now call her "essayistic" qualities. He compared her humor to that of the English. "As a rule," he added, "she set down whatever sprang to her mind, and as many things as possible," letting her pen "trot along" and "glide over" (a phrase reminiscent of Montaigne) an abundance of ideas. Of the two types of style he found predominant in the 17th century, the one "austere, polished, workedover, learned" (he cites Guez de Balzac's prose) and the other "broad, loose, abundant...far freer, capricious and varied, without traditional method," stemming from Montaigne, there is no doubt to which current Madame de Sévigné belonged, nor is it surprising to learn that Montaigne was among the authors she read daily.

La Bruyère's Characters are in some ways strongly indebted to the Essais and in other ways very unlike them. At first glance the looseness of the overall structure governing the 16 chapters, the apparent absence of a premeditated plan, and the individual chapter titles (“Des ouvrages de l’esprit” [“On Works of the Mind”], “Du mérite personnel” [“On Personal Merit”], etc.) suggest Montaigne, whom La Bruyère admired, from whom he borrowed many thoughts, and of whose style he even wrote a pastiche. But since he belonged to a generation formed by classical doctrine and by the conventions of the polite salon society of his time (the littérature mondaine or worldly literature), he departs in significant ways from Montaigne and thus, like Pascal and Madame de Sévigné, “reinvents” the essay. He expressly “imitates” the ancients, by basing his Characters on those of the Greek philosopher and moralist Theophrastus, whose Characters he also translated and published together with his own. His respect for “impersonality” meant that direct self-portraiture in his essays is rare: when he speaks of himself it is under fictional names or as “le philosophe.” His highly polished and finely chiseled prose bears little resemblance to Montaigne’s. His chapters, unlike Montaigne’s, are broken up into numbered subdivisions, varying in length from a single sentence (often a maxim) or paragraph to two or three pages. His originality is to have renewed the essay as a collection of fragments, intermediary in form between the essays of Montaigne and the maxims of La Rochefoucauld. His originality also lies in his content. A perceptive, sometimes profound, sharply satirical commentator on the society of his time, his “world”—often surprisingly like our own—is a mini “human comedy,” limited in scope compared to the vast canvas of a Montaigne or a Sainte-Beuve but nevertheless the product of one of France’s greatest moralists, a sociologist avant la lettre. His influence was strong on 18th-century writers, especially on Marivaux the essayist, another “modern Theophrastus.” His relevance to 20th-century criticism, thanks to his genius as an “essayist of customs” (“essayiste d’usages”), has been recognized by the major 20th-century critic and essayist, Roland Barthes, in his Essais critiques (1964; Critical Essays).

Saint-Évremond (1614–1703), the descendant of an aristocratic Norman family, a career soldier and courtier, was forced by his involvement in the disgrace of Fouquet to spend roughly the latter half of his very long life as a political exile, first in Holland and then, until his death, in England. Thus, as a “spectator of the Versailles era” (Jean Prévost, Tableau de la littérature française de Corneille à Chénier, 1939) rather than a participant, he enjoyed something of the literary freedom that Montaigne had benefited from during his self-imposed exile in his provincial château. He wrote abundantly but published little during his lifetime. As with Montaigne, his aristocratic code prevented his acknowledging himself as an “author”; he was “the author in spite of himself” (Eugène Joliat, “L’Auteur malgré lui,” University of Toronto Quarterly, 1955). To such writers the essay was perfectly suited as a genre, and so it comes as no surprise that apart from some verse and a few plays he wrote mostly essays, which he preferred to call “dissertations,” “little treatises,” “discourses,” “reflections,” “considerations,” “eulogies,” “characters” (following Theophrastus), “letters,” or “portraits.” His longest and most ambitious essay was his “Reflexions sur les divers génies du peuple romain dans les divers temps de la République” (1662; Reflections on diverse characteristics of the Romans during various phases of the Republic), a pioneer historical work highly esteemed by Montesquieu and other 18th-century writers. But for the most part he wrote “little works” which he considered (at least this was his playful pose, a stance found in many essayists) “trifles,” “bagatelles,” even, in his most self-deprecating mood, “pieces of foolishness” (“sottises”), an attitude straight out of his fellow aristocrat, Montaigne.

Saint-Évremond, traditionally esteemed as a link in the history of ideas between the 17th-century free thought of the libertins and the 18th-century Enlightenment, or as a moralist and literary critic, deserves to be better known as an essayist. His affinities with Montaigne, the reading of whom gave him lifelong pleasure, are many, including: writing essentially in order to know himself better and to live more wisely; the concept of writing as “conversation prolonged in written form” (Maurice Wilmotte, Saint-Évremond critique littéraire, 1921), which he derived also from the “long instances of table talk” in Plutarch; and the habit of presenting his thoughts “without order as they come to my mind.” Morris Croll (1966) places him, with La Bruyère, among the enemies of Ciceronian rhetoric who followed Montaigne’s example in the practice of Senecan or “Attic” prose (the “style coupé” or “loose style”). On the other hand, his vocabulary is severely pruned of what the grammarians of his day considered the overabundance or excrescences of Montaigne’s, appearing austere beside the latter’s marvelous wealth of words. His style, concise, laconic, deceptively simple, much admired by Voltaire and Stendhal for its compressed allusiveness, innuendos, and ironic overtones, lacks Montaigne’s expansiveness and poetic quality. He is the least poetic of the great French essayists. Unlike Montaigne, he rarely writes directly of himself: to speak of oneself intimately and too long was deemed in bad taste by the polite salons he frequented. His breadth of subject matter, while impressive—history, politics, literature, language, music, psychology, morality, religion—seems restricted when placed beside Montaigne’s or Sainte-Beuve’s. Yet this “subdued Montaigne” (“un Montaigne adouci,” in Sainte-Beuve’s happy phrase) must be credited with revitalizing the essay as a form of studied or artful conversation on the part of the honnête homme. With Saint-Évremond, writes Quentin Hope (1962), “a new intimacy and informality [begin] to appear in literary criticism. Like letter writing, it becomes an extension and outgrowth of the art of conversation.” As an essayist Saint-Évremond is important not only in himself but as a link between Montaigne and Addison (George Saintsbury, Collected Papers, 1924), and consequently, as we shall see, between Montaigne and the greatest 18th-century French essayist Marivaux, whose point of departure was the Spectator of Addison and Steele.

2. The 18th Century

The 18th century is marked by a profusion of essay types, some renewed from those already in existence and others relatively new. However, except as a title for longer works, essayists continue to be reluctant to call their short prose works essais, perhaps out of deference to Montaigne. As for the reception given to Montaigne himself, Maturin Dréano has shown in his exhaustive study, La Renommée de Montaigne en France au XVIIIe siècle, 1677–1802 (1952; Montaigne’s fame in the 18th century), how mixed this continued to be: defenses and imitations of his Essais were juxtaposed with bowdlerized versions, compilations, extracts, “breviaries” for the honnête homme, and other variations. Purely as a thinker, he exerted more influence than ever on the Age of Enlightenment, since “the philosophes carried out against classical thought a campaign very similar to that of Renaissance and Reformation writers against the Middle Ages.” “As it emerged from the classical period,” observes Theodore Fraser (1986), “the essay form became in turn for the philosophes the favored literary genre by which they could forward their assault on the traditional citadels of power and prestige.” Furthermore, as the century progressed readers and critics became more appreciative of Montaigne’s so-called “disorder,” recognizing it as perfectly suited to the context of a “conversation.”

The main development in the essay of this time is the emergence of the periodical (la grande presse) as a new vehicle for short works of philosophical, historical, literary, and artistic criticism, as well as a polemical weapon. Older journals, such as Le Journal des Savants (1665; The journal of the sages) and Le Mercure Galant (1672–1724; The gallant Mercury; then Le Mercure de France, 1724–1965), continued to function. The first daily paper, Le Journal de Paris, was founded in 1777. The philosopher Pierre Bayle had established his Nouvelles de la République des Lettres (News from the Republic of Letters), an early example of “literary reportage,” in 1684. These were followed by Le Pour et le Contre (1733–40; The pros and cons) of the Abbé Antoine-François Prévost (1697–1763) and by two distinguished journals produced by opponents of the philosophes: the Journal (originally Mémoires) de Trévoux (1701–62) and L’Année Littéraire (1754–90; The literary year) of Voltaire’s worthy adversary, Elie-Catherine Fréron (1718–76). Much admired by Sainte-Beuve (in Causeries du lundi, 1853) as a precursor of the modern critical essay was the Correspondance Littéraire (1718–96; Literary correspondence) of the German-born Frédéric de Grimm (1723–1807) who, in his role as Paris correspondent of various German sovereigns for literary and artistic “news” became “the literary chronicler of the century.” He also enjoyed the luck to have as his collaborator one of the century’s greatest essayists, Denis Diderot. Many of the new journalists, or nouvellistes as they were also called, prepared their published ideas in the conversational atmosphere of drawing-rooms and cafés such as the Procope, the Régence, and the Rotonde. The “age of criticism,” as it has been called, thus greatly favored the expansion of the essay. A vast new public for the genre appeared in the form of the bourgeoisie libérale, whose power was growing. The 18th was also above all the century of great prose, a fact which added to the essay’s popularity. Between La Fontaine and the Romantic poets, verse went into decline, along with the classical hierarchy of genres favoring verse. As the strict separation of genres promoted by classical doctrine broke down, new forms of prose, such as the prose poem and poetic prose, absorbed lyrical elements once found in verse.

Examples from among the great number of essays in the longer form are: the aforementioned Essay on the Manner and Spirit of Nations by Voltaire; De l’esprit des lois (1748; The Spirit of Laws) and Essai sur le goût (1756; An Essay on Taste) of Charles de Montesquieu (1689–1755); and De l’esprit (1758; Essays on the Mind) of Charles-Adrien Helvétius (1715–71). Short essay forms may be grouped roughly under four types: the éloge (eulogy); the dictionary or encyclopedia article; the letter; and the rêverie.

The most brilliant exponent of the éloge, a forerunner of the biographical essay, was the witty Bernard de Fontenelle (1657–1757), lion of the salons as well as learned “perpetual secretary” of the Royal Academy of Sciences, better known for his longer works (dialogues, satires) popularizing scientific discoveries and boldly undermining religious dogmas. His éloges of Academy members, published in the Histoire de l'Académie Royale des Sciences (History of the Royal Academy of Sciences), a journal he edited from 1699 to 1740, were based on factual accounts and free of the panegyric, declamatory style customary in such tributes; they were much admired by Sainte-Beuve, who recognized in them one of the sources of his own essay-portraits. Another admirer was the English biographical essayist Lytton Strachey; lamenting in 1918 that the art of biography “seems to have fallen on evil times in England,” he added, “We have never had, like the French, a great biographical tradition; we have had no Fontenelles and Condorcets [Jean-Antoine-Nicolas de Condorcet (1749–94)], with their incomparable éloges, compressing into a few shining pages the manifold existences of men” (preface to Eminent Victorians). Fontenelle the essayist is also important for having carried forward from Saint-Évremond, who had in turn learned it from Montaigne, the art one of the marks of the true essayist—of treating serious subjects in a light, ironical vein.

Masterful examples of the essay as dictionary or encyclopedia article are found in the Dictionnaire historique et critique (1697; An Historical and Critical Dictionary), of Pierre Bayle (1647–1706), who emulated Montaigne’s digressive form; Voltaire’s Dictionnaire philosophique portatif (1764; Philosophical Dictionary); and the great Encyclopédie (1751–72), whose chief organizer was Diderot and for which Bayle’s Dictionary had prepared the way. Bayle, though hardly a great stylist, had brought immense learning as well as polemical wit to the essay, providing a model for later writers, including Sainte-Beuve, who named him as one of his “three masters” (the other two were Horace and Montaigne).

The epistolary essay, a firm thread running from Seneca through Montaigne to Pascal and Madame de Sévigné, continues strong into the 18th century. Its three greatest exemplars are Montesquieu’s Lettres persanes (1721; Persian Letters), Voltaire’s Lettres philosophiques, also known as Lettres sur les Anglais (1734; Letters on England), and Diderot’s Correspondance (1830–31). Montesquieu admired his fellow Gascon, Montaigne, whom he called, with great acumen, “man thinking” as opposed to “man writing” and ranked, with Plato, as one of the great poets in prose. His own style was stronger in precision and clarity than in poetic qualities; but he learned from Montaigne how to combine “lightness of tone with basic seriousness” and, unlike Voltaire, was in no way shocked by Montaigne’s “disorder.” Closer in time as models for Montesquieu were La Bruyère’s Characters and Les Amusements sérieux et comiques d’un Siamois (1699) of Charles Rivière Dufresny (1648–1724), the impressions of a Siamese visitor to Paris, the prototype of this kind of semifictional observation (“sociological” in import) of one’s own society as seen through foreign eyes. (Montaigne’s great essay “Des cannibales” [“Of Cannibals”], which criticizes his own society by comparing it with the merits of so-called “savages,” may have originally sparked this type of writing.) The essaystory of Montesquieu’s Persians in Paris serves as the pretext for social satire; it is also one of the earliest examples of the breakdown in the classical distinction between literary forms, leading to the fusion of genres, since it is as much a short novel in letter form as an essay work. Montesquieu was probably justified in claiming that the Lettres persanes “taught others how to write epistolary novels.” The Letters on England by Voltaire (pseudonym of François-Marie Arouet, 1694–1778) gives a new twist to this type of satire by adopting the stance of himself as a foreigner (a Frenchman in exile in England) comparing the failings of the ancien regime with what he considered the superior merits of English society. His letters are cast in a more recognizable essay form than those of Montesquieu: in the first person, without narrative continuity, and with such essayistic chapter headings as “Sur les quakers,” “Sur M. Locke,” etc. He had less enthusiasm for Montaigne than did Montesquieu or Diderot, defending his self-portrayal against Pascal’s attack upon it but complaining that Montaigne the writer lacked “eloquence”; he also denied him a place in his ideal “Temple of Taste” (“temple du goût”). There is, furthermore, a strong polemical strain in Voltaire (pamphlets, diatribes) that is alien to the relative detachment of the Essais.

Denis Diderot’s (1713–84) Correspondance belongs to the tradition of the essay as private letter later made public. Many critics consider his correspondence on a wealth of subjects, carried on over a period of 40 years with friends, family, and especially his mistress, Sophie Volland (a name he immortalized), to be his true masterpiece. Diderot also “created modern French art criticism as a literary genre” (Otis Fellows and Norman Torrey, 1942.) thanks to his articles (the Salons, 1759–72) for his friend Grimm’s Correspondance Littéraire. He provided a model for both Sainte-Beuve’s critical essays in literature and Charles Baudelaire’s Salons on art and music. Nor should we forget the essayistic features found in his many other works (pensées, dialogues, entretiens), in his contributions as chief editor to the Encyclopédie, and even in his novels. He brought to the essay one of the greatest French prose styles, characterized by what Jean Thomas (Histoire des littératures, vol. 3, 1958) calls a unique kind of “lyrisme cerebral.” Only Marivaux, his rival and perhaps superior as an essayist, owed more than Diderot to Montaigne’s example. For Diderot the Essais were “superior to the work of any moralist who has appeared since his [Montaigne’s] time.” He admired their form as much as their content, emulating their imaginative style and their loose, wandering structure (“vagabondage”), arguing that the latter, far from being an idiosyncrasy, conformed to the very nature of the human mind itself. His own mind, like Montaigne’s, “worked through digression and association rather than through logical pattern” (Fellows and Torrey).

The final 18th-century variation on the essay form to be mentioned is the rêverie, a new literary genre created by Jean-Jacques Rousseau (1712–78) in his Rêveries du promeneur solitaire (The Reveries of a Solitary Walker), published posthumously in 1782. In his much more famous Confessions (also posthumously published, 1782 and 1789), to which the Reveries are a kind of epilogue, he also invented another new genre, the modern autobiography, breaking the powerful taboo against intimate self-portraiture which had prevailed in France since Montaigne’s first attempt to challenge it. Unlike Montaigne’s only partly autobiographical Essais, the Confessions are a continuous, integrated narrative of their author’s past; they were meant, furthermore, to surpass in frankness a Montaigne he judged to be only pseudo-sincere. Yet he called Montaigne “the master of us all” (“notre maître a tous”), worthy of emulation for his stylistic “naturalness, grace, and energy” and for his “spontaneous mind” (“esprit primesautier”). It is in the Reveries that Rousseau’s true indebtedness to Montaigne as well as his re-creation of the essay may be found. He achieved the latter, according to Henri Roddier (in his 1960 edition of the Reveries), in two distinct ways: by inventing the “essai-confidence,” confiding intimate feelings and sensations to the reader; and by preparing the way for the related modern genre of the intimate journal (“journal intime”). Having learned from Montaigne’s example, he brought to the essay: 1) an association of ideas based more on sensations than on logical thought; 2) a poetic prose alien to Montesquieu’s or Voltaire’s but akin to that of Diderot; and 3) the concept of what may be called the “peripatetic” essay, reflections arising from his walks in the countryside around Paris, thoughts and feelings stimulated by no precise object, often by pure chance as (so he describes it in the “Seconde Promenade”) “I let my mind be completely free, and my ideas follow their inclination unopposed and unconstrained.” One can hardly imagine a source of inspiration further removed from the polite conversation of the salon or the witty exchanges of the cafés, both of which animated other types of 18th-century essays mentioned earlier.

That it was possible to harmonize both kinds of inspiration had already been proved by the last (but the earliest in date of birth) and in many ways the greatest of the 18th-century essayists to be mentioned: Marivaux (1688–1763). He stands apart from the others in several ways: as the creator of the one-man feuille périodique (periodical folio) or essai journalistique (journalistic essay); as the most self-conscious heir of Montaigne; as a rare student and emulator of the English essay and author of reflections on the nature of the essay itself; and for the unique manner in which his essays are integrated into an organic whole consisting also of his novels and plays. Few French writers of any age have been more original, more daring in their experimentation, and in so many literary genres, than this avant-garde partisan of the Moderns, in the Quarrel of Ancients and Moderns, this subverter of classical doctrine and classical rhetoric, whose reputation has been unjustly overshadowed by those of Montesquieu, Voltaire, Rousseau, and Diderot. To reduce his writing to marivaudage, or the excessively refined, even affected or précieux discourse about love, is to deny its true breadth and depth: his subject was nothing less than what the anti-hero of his novel, Le Paysan parvenu (1734–35; The Upstart Peasant), calls “the art of reading people’s minds and figuring out their secret feelings”—the art, in other words, of discovering not what they say but what they mean (Freud would certainly have understood his approach). An astute contemporary of Marivaux called his field of inquiry, in a memorable phrase, “the metaphysics of the human heart.”

Marivaux began his essay work with a series of articles in the Nouveau Mercure de France (New Mercury of France) entitled Lettres sur les habitants de Paris (1717–18; Letters on the inhabitants of Paris), inspired by La Bruyère’s Characters (like La Bruyère he too fancied himself as a “modern Theophrastus”) and by Dufresny’s Amusements sérieux et comiques d’un Siamois. These essays are less interesting for their satirical content than for their foreshadowing of an aesthetics of the essay which Marivaux would put into practice in his mature essay masterpieces, Le Spectateur Français (1721–24; The French spectator) and L’Indigent Philosophe (1727; The pauper philosopher). Montaigne’s influence is obvious in the essential features of the essay as Marivaux conceived the genre: 1) an infinite number and variety of subjects; 2) a mixture of the serious and the lighthearted (cf. Dufresny’s sérieux et comique), a direct contradiction of the classical doctrine’s proprieties that forbade the mixture of tones and styles; 3) an ordering of subject matter depending largely on chance (cf. Montaigne: “I take the first subject that chance offers. They are all equally good to me”) and on immediate circumstances; 4) a complete freedom of thought (libertinage d'idées) that follows fancy and natural bent (le naturel) rather than logic; and finally 5) the freedom to write primarily to please oneself while at the same time (a paradox here) engaging in a dialogue with one's reader. On this last point, Marivaux's self-portrayal, characteristic of the relative reticence of French essayists as compared with their English counterparts, is rarely as intimate as Montaigne's and much less so than Rousseau's. This in fact adds to his appeal, since it obliges the reader, as Jean Fabre (Histoire des littératures, vol. 3, 1958) has observed, to "search out the true self of Marivaux beneath the first person of Le Spectateur français and L'Indigent philosophe." These two works—the first, using Addison and Steele's Spectator as a springboard for innovation, and the second, an even bolder experiment, described by its author as "an essay of what could be done by writing haphazardly whatever might strike the imagination"—establish Marivaux as one of the greatest French essayists.

3. The 19th Century

The essay as a long continuous discourse prolongs its life into the 19th as well as the 20th centuries. Examples from among many include the Essai historique, politique, et moral sur les révolutions anciennes et modernes (1797; An Historical, Political and Moral Essay on Revolutions, Ancient and Modern) of the great Romantic prose writer, Chateaubriand (1768–1848); De la littérature considérée dans ses rapports avec les institutions sociales (1800; The Influence of Literature upon Society) and De l'Allemagne (1810; On Germany) of Madame de Staël (1766–1817); and the Essai sur les Fables de La Fontaine (1853) of Hippolyte Taine. These longer works cover the broadest range of subjects and vary in approach from the impersonal, even the erudite, to the more personal ones such as De l'amour (1822.; On Love) of Stendhal (pseudonym of Henri Beyle, 1783–1842). Among recurrent types of the short essay inherited from earlier centuries are the essay as public letter and the essay as polemical—usually political—pamphlet. The Romantic poet Alfred de Musset (1810–57) exemplifies the first type in his delightful satire on certain foibles of Romanticism, published in 1836–37 in the form of four letters to the editor of the Revue des Deux Mondes (Review of two worlds), as the Lettres de Dupuis et de Cotonet (the double pseudonym assumed by their author). The Mémoires in letter form (1828) by Paul-Louis Courier (1772–1825), inspired by those of Pliny the Younger, contain many reminiscences of Madame de Sévigné's letters. But it is primarily as one of the last of the great pamphleteers, according to Albert Thibaudet (1936), that Courier deserves to be remembered. His chief model was Pascal's Provincial Letters. Courier defended the pamphlet as a literary genre in his Pamphlet des pamphlets (1824). His younger rival as political essayist was the liberal anti-Second Empire journalist Lucien-Anatole Prévost-Paradol (1829–70), especially in his Essais de politique et de littérature (1859; Essays on politics and literature) and their sequel, the Nouveaux Essais... (1862). Prévost-Paradol ranks high among what the French call écrivains de combat, the best of whom knew how to reveal permanent, universal meaning in the ephemeral issues they addressed. In his ambition for the political essay to win (as he put it) "right of entry into the highest literary regions," he anticipated George Orwell's aspiration “to make political writing into an art.” Among his English models were the pamphleteers Junius and Jonathan Swift (he wrote a doctoral dissertation on Swift).

However, overshadowing in importance these revivals of earlier forms of the essay are several major developments. The most significant is the emergence of the modern periodical; others include the renewal of the aesthetic defense of fragmentary or discontinuous prose works, the shifting relationship of the essay to other genres, and the growing number of writers whose essay work is part of their production as poets, novelists, or dramatists.

Writes Fraser: “The essay’s rise in the nineteenth century to the status of an authentic, widely used, but [n.b.] still undeclared literary genre, is intimately bound up with the rapid growth of journalism in France,” a phenomenon closely paralleled in England. In this great flowering, a new type of essay emerges: first published in one of the new journals or reviews—the Revue des Deux Mondes, the Revue de Paris (The Paris review), the Journal des Débats (Journal of debates), Le Constitutionnel (The constitutional), Le Temps (The times), to name only a few—such essays then reappeared in collections, a new vehicle for diffusion of the genre. The great pioneer in France of this revitalized essay form, its “Montaigne,” is Charles-Augustin Sainte-Beuve (1804–69). His Portraits (1844–46) and Causeries and Nouveaux Causeries du Lundi (1849–69; Monday and New Monday Chats), spanning almost 30 years of production, deal with literary criticism, often (but not always) biographically oriented, and conceived in the broadest sense (he was primarily a moralist), so as to constitute a veritable “human comedy” peopled with hundreds of writers and other figures. Sainte-Beuve aimed, as Virginia Woolf was later to do in her role as critic for the Times Literary Supplement, at something much better than what she called “journalism embalmed in a book.” Another writer who met the challenge—an aesthetic as much as an intellectual one—of the periodical essay was the historian and philosopher Ernest Renan (1823–92) who, from the 1850s until his death, produced several outstanding essay collections, including his Études d’histoire religieuse (1857; Studies of Religious History), Essais de morale et de critique (1859; Moral and critical essays), Questions contemporaines (1868; Contemporary issues), and, the year of his death, the semi-autobiographical Feuilles détachées (1892; Detached leaves). Sainte-Beuve modestly credited his younger contemporary Renan with being “the master of a new genre,” the “article de revue.” It would be more accurate to say that Renan broadened the scope of this kind of essay still further than his predecessor, to embrace religious history, philosophy, politics, and contemporary affairs, bringing to it, in addition, a depth of thought and refinement of poetic style rarely found in Sainte-Beuve. He also added new luster to the essay-as-dialogue in his Dialogues et fragments philosophiques (1876; Philosophical Dialogues and Fragments), inspired by Plato and by Nicolas de Malebranche (1638–1715), and launched the essay as speech or lecture.

Both Sainte-Beuve and Renan stimulated by example a whole succession of younger, less gifted critics and authors of essais, études, and the like, ranging from the (pseudo-) scientific (several were bent on finding physiological or psychological “explanations” for artistic creation) to the frankly subjective and “impressionistic.” Among the most notable were Hippolyte Taine (1828–93), who proposed to make a “science” of literary criticism (Essais de critique et d’histoire [1858; Critical and historical essays]); Anatole France (pseudonym of Jacques Thibault, 1844–1924), for whom, on the contrary, the critic is “one who relates the adventures of his soul among masterpieces” as illustrated in his La Vie littéraire (1888–92; The literary life, translated as On Life and Letters); Ferdinand Brunetière (1849–1906), editor of the Revue des Deux Mondes, best known for his attempt to assimilate Charles Darwin’s theory of evolution to the history of literary genres, L’Évolution des genres dans l’histoire de la littérature (1890; The evolution of genres in the history of literature); Paul Bourget (1852–1935), whose Essais de psychologie contemporaine (1883–85; Essays in contemporary psychology) has outlasted in value his novels; Jules Lemaître (1853–1914), a short-story writer, drama critic for the Journal des Débats, and essayist in his Les Contemporains (1885–1918; Contemporaries), Impressions de théâtre (1888–1910; Theatrical Impressions), and Politiques et moralistes du XIXe siècle (1903; 19th-century political and moralist writers); and finally, in some ways the most original essayist of this later generation, admired by T.S.Eliot, Ezra Pound, and other exponents of Modernism, Remy de Gourmont (1858–1915), who invented in his La Culture des idées (1900; The Culture of Ideas) and Promenades littéraires (1904–27) an early form of “deconstructionism” which he called “dissociation of ideas,” and whose Promenades philosophiques (1905–09) are personal essays directly inspired by Montaigne.

The great poet Charles Baudelaire (1821–67) stands apart as an essayist for his unique approach to criticism, and is superior in his gift to any of the aforementioned periodical essayists except Sainte-Beuve and Renan. His view that criticism should be creative and poetic in nature owed much to Sainte-Beuve; he went even further in claiming paradoxically that the ideal critic inevitably works within the horizon limited by his own passions and prejudices, while always seeking to broaden that horizon. His voluminous critical writing includes remarkable assessments of contemporary artists and penetrating reflections on the nature of the imagination, Romanticism, and modernity in art. His essays on painting and music, especially his Salons (1845–59), link him to the tradition launched by Diderot. The elements of surprise, digression, and paradox, as well as the shifting, multiple perspectives found in his essays, are highly reminiscent of Montaigne (Martha Evans, The French Essay, 1982).

The periodical essay was far from being limited to literary and other kinds of criticism. One of the liveliest guises it assumed, especially with the Romantics, was that of the travel essay, whose improvised, meandering form tended to mimic the unstructured nature of the voyages it described. Its most gifted practitioners were the Romantic poets Gérard de Nerval (pseudonym of Gérard Labrunie, 1808–55) and Théophile Gautier (1811–72), and the lesser-known, unjustly neglected Émile Montégut (1825–95), literary critic for the Revue des Deux Mondes. Although Nerval never uses the term essai, he does call himself an “essayiste,” a word introduced from English in 1821, and refers to his “essayisme.” In his essay masterpiece, Les Nuits d’octobre (1852; October nights), the account of his meanderings in the Île de France, he describes his essayisme as the tendency to wander (“vagabondage”). The spirit of Montaigne’s artful disorder permeates this work and also his Promenades et souvenirs (1854; Walks and reminiscences), but the models he actually acknowledged were Rousseau’s The Reveries of a Solitary Walker and Les Nuits de Paris, ou Le Spectateur nocturne (1788–94; Parisian nights, or the nocturnal spectator) of Nicolas-Edme Restif de la Bretonne (1734–1806). Gautier correctly placed Nerval in their tradition of “peripatetic literature” (“la littérature ambulante”). Gautier himself was no stranger to this same type of essay or to “essayism.” In addition to memorable critical articles such as Les Grotesques (1844), literary portraits of François Villon, Paul Scarron, and others, he published delightful travel sketches: Un voyage en Espagne (1843; A voyage to Spain), Caprices et zig-zags (1852), whose title alone invites us to place him in the essay tradition, and others. The majority of Montégut’s almost 300 published articles, of which only a third have been collected in book form, deal with literary criticism, supplemented by moral essays, political essays, and travel essays centered on his native region of south-central France. This “encyclopedic and cosmopolitan essayist” (Pierre Alexis Muenier, Émile Montégut, 1925) whose breadth of knowledge and interests rivaled those of Sainte-Beuve, Taine, or Renan and included pioneer studies in comparative literature (especially English and American literatures) was also a self-conscious essayist and student of the genre, who derived much of his inspiration from Ralph Waldo Emerson (whom he translated) and Thomas Carlyle. His objective, a highly unusual one for a journalist, was to replace the “artificial linking of thoughts” endemic in the journalistic article with a freer, more “indefinite and indeterminate” order, allowing for the play of the subconscious (“l’inconscience”). His motto might have been a sentence from his Types littéraires et fantaisies esthétiques (1882; Literary types and aesthetic fantasies): “We never go so far as when we know not where we are going.” Montaigne would have smiled on this idea across the centuries, and also on the fact that a 19th-century journalist-critic would be attacking Ciceronian rhetoric as he had attacked it in his own time.

To the flowering of the periodical essay as the most important development of the genre in the 19th century should be added the three other major developments mentioned above. The Romantic defense of fragmentary and discontinuous prose began in the late 18th century when the German critic Friedrich Schlegel discovered the beauty of the maxim. A whole “literature of the fragment” with an influence on the history of the essay emerged, whose vogue was akin to the Romantic taste for paintings of ruined (in other words, fragmentary) edifices. Its later exponents would include the philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche, the poet-essayist Paul Valéry, and the poet René Char (1907–88). Fragments were described by the early German Romantic philosopher and poet Novalis as “literary seeds” capable of germinating larger structures (Lafond, 1984). Both the fragment and the discontinuous discourse found a 19th-century apologist in France in the moralist and pensée writer Joseph Joubert (1754–1824), whose selected thoughts taken from his notebooks were first published by his literary protégé Chateaubriand in 1838 and, in more complete form, by Pierre de Raynal, as Pensées, maximes, essais, et correspondance (1842). Joubert’s debt to Montaigne’s discontinuu is clear from his statement, “I am just as unsuited to continuous discourse as Montaigne.”

A still further major development affecting the 19th-century essay was the decline of the classical tradition of the hierarchy and strict separation of genres, whose political implications Antoine de Rivarol (1753–1801) had shrewdly noted by comparing “the classes of styles in our language” to the “classes of subjects in our monarchy.” The 18th century had already prepared the way for this transformation in such writers as Diderot, who made sport of the “rules” and advocated resorting to new literary forms whenever the traditional genres failed to meet new aspirations. The absorption of poetry into prose made possible the mastery of the poème en prose in such 19th-century poets as Baudelaire and Stéphane Mallarmé (1842–98). The latter wrote not only critical essays on literature, music, theater, and ballet but also prose poems such as Divagations (1897; Ramblings), comparable to very short essays, pondering the mystery of poetry in a difficult, challenging prose unlike that of any essayist before him. Gradually the distinction between genres became blurred (in the 20th century the very concept of genre would be radically questioned); many features of the essay were absorbed into the novel, the autobiography, the intimate journal, or intimate notebooks (cahiers, carnets, etc.). The novel, like the essay, having developed outside classical doctrine, was free to say “almost everything about almost anything” (Huxley). Montégut went on record as deploring the novel’s tendency to “take on the most varied forms [and] to replace other genres.” In a more positive vein, Patrick Henry (1987), commenting on the influence of Montaigne’s concept of “continuous becoming” on such modern novelists as Proust, Joyce, and Woolf, observes: “Like the novel, the essay, which is also a narrative form of continuous becoming, can [quoting the Russian literary theorist Mikhail Bakhtin] ‘include, ingest, devour other genres and still retain its status,’ for once again, like the novel, it has no canon of its own.” As for confessional literature, which had been growing in attraction for writers since Rousseau, it obviously usurped some of the traditional territory of the essay, especially in France, where the essay as a vehicle for intimate self-portrayal was less acceptable than in England. From the intimate journals and notebooks of Sainte-Beuve, Renan, and Baudelaire through those of André Gide, Valéry, and Albert Camus and beyond, this more direct form of self-disclosure would parallel the indirect form found in the essay.

In the 19th century, finally, the distinction between “pure” essayists and those whose essays constitute a more or less integral part of their total work as poets, novelists, or playwrights becomes firmly established. Renan, Montégut, Taine, Brunetière, and Gourmont belong to the first “family.” In the preceding century, Marivaux offers the initial example of a writer whose essays are part of a total vision also involving imaginative works (in his case, novels and plays). Voltaire conteur and dramatist, Rousseau novelist, Diderot novelist and dramatist, also follow this pattern. Nineteenth-century examples abound: Nerval, Gautier, Baudelaire, Mallarmé, Anatole France. Sainte-Beuve’s limited success as poet and novelist should not blind us to the fact that his essays are intimately related to his poems and novel. His special significance from this point of view lies in his theory and practice of criticism as a creative art (Richard Chadbourne, 1977), which gave new prestige to the essay by breaking down the artificial distinction between “critical” and “creative” or “imaginative” literature. “With the example of Sainte-Beuve,” observes Wallace Fowlie (1957), “the critic became a writer, and literary criticism became an art of writing.”

4. The 20th Century

The 20th century witnesses no decline in the fortunes of the essay. On the contrary, it has become an “eclectic kind of literary genre—and one supple enough to be adapted to the many individual styles and varied purposes” of leading 20th-century writers (Fraser). At times the essay not only rivals but surpasses in interest the so-called “creative” genres. New journals and reviews take root as vehicles for essays in their initial form, including the Nouvelle (and later Nouvelle Nouvelle) Revue Française (1908–43, 1953–; New French review), the Cahiers du Sud (1914–; Notebooks of the south), the Nouvelles Littéraires (1920–; Literary news), Les Temps Modernes (1945–; Modern times), Critique (1946), and Tel Quel (1960–82; As is; then L’Infini, 1982–; The infinite). French writers continue to be more reluctant than their English counterparts to use the essay for self-portraiture, preferring autobiography, journal, notebooks, and other forms. New impetus is given to the travel essay and the lyrical essay, and critical awareness grows of the essay, both as a genre unlike any other and as an “anti-genre” undermining all the others.

As in the preceding century, essayists may still be divided roughly into two groups: those who wrote primarily or only essays; and “creative” writers (for want of a better term) who have left an important body of essayistic work. To begin with the lesser lights among the former type: Julien Benda (1867–1956), in his La Trahison des clercs (1927; The Treason of the Intellectuals); André Suarès (1868–1948), literary, musical, and art critic, travel essayist, and moralist (Voici l’homme [1905; Here is man]); Albert Thibaudet (1874–1936), literary critic, historian of modern French literature, author of a series of Reflexions (1938–40) on literature, the novel, and criticism itself; Charles Du Bos (1882–1939), explorer of English literature and of spirituality in literature, in his Approximations (1922–37); Henri Massis (1886–1970), Catholic apologist and critic of the educational system (Agathon, ou, L’Esprit de la nouvelle Sorbonne [1911; Agathon, or, the spirit of the new Sorbonne]); Jean Rostand (1894–1977), who used biology as a springboard for meditations on human nature (Pensées d’un biologiste [1939; Thoughts of a biologist]); Simone Weil (1909–43), spiritual writer, searching and prophetic critic of modern society (Oppression et liberté [1955; Oppression and Liberty], edited by none other than Camus himself); the Romanian-French author E.M.Cioran (1911–95), a relentlessly pessimistic writer whose laconic, fragmentary texts such as Précis de décomposition (1949; A Short History of Decay), Syllogismes de l’amer-tume (1952; Syllogisms of bitterness), and De l’inconvénient d’être né (1973; The Trouble with Being Born) often read like a self-parodying intimate journal, “without chronology or intimate detail, reflecting the disorder inherent in the intellectual life itself” (Bruno Verrier and Jacques Lecarme, 1982); and Michel Serrès (1930–), whose five-volume series of essays, from Hermès: La Communication (1968) to Le Passage du NordOuest (1980; The northwest passage), propose a critique of science from the viewpoint of a new humanism.

